The connection between race and crime is clear in the Los Angeles Riots of 1992. The message sent by the acquittal of four White officers accused of assaulting and using excessive force on a Black man struck a chord across the country. In the years following the civil rights movement and the Watts Riots in the 1960s, Los Angeles had remained highly segregated, with poverty and economic inequalities concentrated within the African American population. The acquittal of the White officers was the proverbial last straw for many Los Angelenos, igniting riots across the city in protest to the inequalities and prejudice felt by many African Americans. Lasting 5 days, the riots resulted in death and injuries among rioters and innocent bystanders, as well as property damage. The riots live on in infamy for those who survived in Los Angeles and those who watched the gruesome scenes unfold on television. Many researchers have compiled studies on how the Los Angeles Riots of 1992 affected the country, ushering in a tide of awareness of the inequalities inherent in American life as well as issues within the criminal justice system.

The Beginning

Shortly after midnight on March 3, 1991, Rodney King was driving down Interstate 210, the Foothill Freeway in Los Angeles. Police officers Tim and Melanie Singer, members of the California Highway Patrol, signaled King's speeding car to pull over, beginning a 7.8-mile pursuit. King's Hyundai Excel was clocked at speeds of 110 to 115 mph while on the freeway and about 85 mph on residential streets. As King led police through the streets of Los Angeles, the Los Angeles Police Department (LAPD) joined pursuit. In total, there were about 15 LAPD officers, including an LAPD helicopter. When King finally heeded orders to stop near Hansen Dam Park, he ignored commands to step out of the vehicle. Officers on the scene described his behavior as erratic; he seemed drunk or under the influence of phencyclidine (PCP). Tasers were readied for action, as King's behavior alarmed Sergeant Stacey Koon. Officers Theodore Briseno, Laurence Powell, Timothy Wind, and Rolando Solano attempted to restrain King, grabbing his arms and legs. Throwing the officers off, King was again ordered to lie on the ground. The Taser was fired as King ignored commands. Unaffected by the Tasings, King appeared to lunge toward officers; they were ordered to hit King with their batons. Throughout the beating, Officers Powell, Briseno, and Wind and Sergeant Koon struck King multiple times with batons and kicked him. King suffered multiple skull fractures, a fractured fibula, brain damage, kidney damage, contusions, bruises, and abrasions. In his own words, he felt like "a crushed can." King was arrested and taken to jail; the report did not refer to the beating explicitly but simply stated that force had been used to make the arrest.

In an apartment across the street, George Holliday had been awakened by the noise of sirens and the hovering LAPD helicopter. As he watched the events unfold from his apartment, he recorded the scene with his video camera. Holliday held onto the tape until March 4, when he delivered it to a local television station, KTLA. As the video was broadcast on television, word of the incident quickly spread across the nation.

The Trial

Many Los Angeles residents and citizens across the country were outraged at the behavior of the LAPD. The videotape provided evidence that the police assaulted a man for no apparent reason. Attention shifted to the police; Koon, Powell, Wind, and Briseno were charged with assault with a deadly weapon and using excessive force. The charges against King were dropped. As the investigation into the behavior of the officers began, it was broadcast from opening statement to verdict across television and radio.

Before the trial began, a request for a change of venue was made due to the extensive media coverage of the incident in Los Angeles County. From March 1991 until the end of the riots, Holliday's videotape was aired 246 times on the three major news networks: ABC, NBC, and CBS. It was presumed that a large proportion of those drawn for jury duty in Los Angeles had already heard of the case and seen the videotape. The trial was moved to Simi Valley in nearby Ventura County. On April 29, 1992, at 3:00 p.m., the jury brought back not guilty verdicts on all charges except for a charge of excessive force against Officer Powell. That charge was later dismissed. All four were later tried in federal court on charges of violating King's civil rights; Powell and Koon were convicted and sentenced to 30 months in prison.

Critics cite several reasons for the acquittals in the criminal trial. Rather than the police, it seemed to be King who was on trial. Continual reference to the trial as the "Rodney King Trial" and the prosecutor's opening statement, which included more than a half-hour focused on the laws that King had broken (driving while intoxicated and evading officers while on probation), added speculation about the verdict. The jury itself, selected in Ventura County, a predominantly White area, may not have been representative of King's peers. The videotape, often cited as clear-cut evidence of the use of excessive force, was cited as a reason for the verdict. An additional portion of the tape, left out by the media, was revealed to the jury; it showed what appeared to be King lunging at police. These few seconds were said to have been justification for the actions of the LAPD officers.

Reaction

After the verdict was announced, anger and outrage were common responses as news spread across the Los Angeles area. Crowds began to gather in south central Los Angeles to discuss the verdict. Many were outraged that what appeared to be blatant assault was not seen as excessive force in the eyes of the law. King had been severely beaten by four LAPD officers, and in the crowds' eyes, the criminal justice system had not delivered justice. Growing more enraged, the crowds developed into mobs of rioters. The first incidents of looting were reported around 4:15 p.m. on Florence Boulevard and Normandie Avenue. Motorists were assaulted and pulled from their cars. A large percentage of the rioters were young males who engaged in looting, assault, arson, and even murder.

As the riots escalated, police officers who were posted in south central Los Angeles were ordered to stand down. Essentially, the LAPD abandoned certain areas of the city to prevent harm to themselves, in effect allowing the riots to continue. The riots continued through the night as fires were set and property destroyed. Though the Justice Department announced that it would be continuing investigation into the Rodney King incident, rioters were not quelled; the riots now symbolized more than retaliation. The governor of California, Pete Wilson, declared a state of emergency, and by May 1 the National Guard, the Army, and the Marines were called in to help calm the riots. Their orders were simple: Fire when fired upon.

During the riots some particularly gruesome incidents occurred. On top of the looting, fires, and gun shots that rang through the city of Los Angeles, there were reports of personal violence against White individuals. Reginald Denny, a White truck driver, was pulled from his truck at an intersection on Normandie Avenue. He had assumed that the cargo in his truck—sand—would be of no value or interest to looters. Denny's memory of the events are not very clear, but a news helicopter overhead filmed the entire event. Rioters threw rocks through the windshield of Denny's truck before dragging him to the ground, kicking him and beating him with a barrage of blows using various items, including a slab of concrete. When Denny lost consciousness, the rioters abandoned Denny's body and left looters to clean out his pockets. His body was rescued by an African American man, and he was treated by paramedics. The video of Denny's beating was shown on television—a message to all viewers about the conditions in Los Angeles. It appeared that the Black community was retaliating for Rodney King's beating—if four White men could beat a Black man and get away with it, Black men could do the same to a White man. Los Angeles had resorted to an-eye-for-an-eye justice. Throughout the city, citizens of Asian and Hispanic ethnicities were also beaten by rioters.

A large portion of the rioting took place in the areas of south central Los Angeles and Koreatown but extended well beyond these areas. Stores targeted were most likely to be owned by Korean Americans, not Caucasians. As the LAPD became overwhelmed with the chaos that ensued, many civilians took it upon themselves to defend their families, property, and stores. Pictures from the riots often show Korean Americans firing back against the rioters and looters attempting to take items from their stores. While this action on the part of Korean Americans may have seemed like a natural course of events as self-defense, it only added to the violence already rampant on the streets.

The riots were declared over when Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley lifted the dusk-until-dawn curfew on the city. By the time the National Guard left on May 8, there were reports of more than $1 billion worth of damage to the area. Of the 51 persons who died, 26 were African American, 14 were Latino, 9 were White (non-Hispanic), and 2 were Asian. The races and ethnicities of some who died in fires could not be determined. Injuries reportedly totaled 2,383, and more than 5,000 individuals had been arrested.

While the Rodney King incident may seem to have been the catalyst for the riots, other precipitating factors existed in Los Angeles. Living conditions in Los Angeles, especially in south central where much of the riots were concentrated, were less than ideal. One major factor cited is the changing population. While south central Los Angeles had been a predominantly African American area, the Hispanic population was increasing in 1992. Shifting power in the area was also a point of contention, as the two groups competed and racial prejudices and conflicts developed. Tensions frequently rose between the longtime residents (African Americans) and the new kids on the block (Hispanic Americans). In addition to the racial and ethnic conflict, the poverty in the area has also been cited as a catalyst for the riots. Aside from high rates of unemployment in the area of south central, Los Angeles was poor in general. Many businesses, banks, and other institutions, including the local government, had moved out. Racial tensions in general between residents of south central and the LAPD were already high before the Rodney King beating. It had long been suggested that the LAPD engaged in racial profiling: targeting racial or ethnic minorities, such as African Americans.

After the riots, many hoped that the conditions in Los Angeles would improve. Sadly, that hope would not quickly be realized. Many business owners struggled to rebuild their sources of income in the wake of the riots. Rioters served jail time, and those injured struggled to pay their medical bills. Many African Americans moved out of south central, making way for an influx of Hispanic Americans. Though the riots shed light on the plight of those living in Los Angeles, specifically poor African Americans, for many people changes in the area were gradual. The riots affected individuals across the country, highlighting the inequalities and magnifying instances of racial prejudice not only in Los Angeles but everywhere.

Kristin Lavin

See also Intraracial Crime; King, Rodney; Police Use of Force; Race Riots

Further Readings

- Baldassare, M. (Ed.). (1994). The Los Angeles Riots: Lessons for the urban future. Boulder, CO: Westview.
- Cannon, L. (1997). Official negligence: How Rodney King and the riots changed Los Angeles and the LAPD. New York: Random House.
- Gooding-Williams, R. (Ed.). (1993). Reading Rodney King/Reading urban uprising. New York: Routledge.
- Olzak, S., Shanahan, S., & McEneaney, E. (1996). Poverty, segregation, and race riots: 1960 to 1993. American Sociological Review, 61, 590–613.
- Tervalon, J. (2002). Geography of rage: Remembering the Los Angeles riots of 1992. Los Angeles: Really Great Books.

LYNCHING

Lynching involves mob violence that is done under the guise of vigilante justice. It has played an extraordinarily important role in American history. For example, from the end of the Civil War in 1865 through the middle of the 20th century, African Americans were subjected to horrific lynchings, often sanctioned by the state, that were aimed at keeping them in their “proper place” in the political, economic, social, cultural, and legal order. “Nigger hunts” and “coon barbecues” were carefully calculated to achieve a common end: limiting the rights of free Blacks, forcing them into submission, and returning them to their pre-Civil War slave status. It should be noted that lynching also occurred in the western United States, with Latinos, Native Americans, and Asian Americans being the targets of the violence. This entry focuses primarily on lynching targeted at African Americans in the southern United States.

The Mechanics of Lynching

Each lynching was wholly unique. They were generally spontaneous events—a response to a local crisis, rumored or real—that escalated into a deadly drama. Lynch mobs were often made up of a collection of local rabble and respected upper-class citizens who added moral authority and legitimacy to the lynching process. Some lynch mobs consisted of only two, three, or four “righteous” citizens; others were composed of hundreds, even thousands, of participants and curious onlookers, including women and children. Some mobs held informal trials; others dispensed with any semblance of legal formality.

Moreover, they did not always kill their victims. Whipping, beating, branding, and tarring and feathering were sometimes used for lesser offenses, especially before the 1880s. But serious crimes, especially attacks on White women by “savage Black beasts,” warranted a more dramatic and bloody response, one that would serve as an example and deterrent to other “disrespectful niggers.” Hanging, burning, and a variety of barbaric tortures—for example, cutting off fingers, toes, or ears—were common. Rapists were frequently castrated. The sexual organ was a prized souvenir.

The 1899 execution of Sam Hose in Georgia reflects the elaborate rituals and bloody carnival of fury that surrounded many Black lynchings. Hose, a farm hand charged with killing his employer and then ravishing his wife, was captured by a lynch mob on April 23, 1899. A crowd of more than 3,000 spectators—some coming aboard a special excursion train from Atlanta, arriving after church services—assembled to witness the ritual. Hose was stripped, chained to a tree, surrounded with logs, and doused with kerosene. His face was skinned and his fingers, ears, and genitals cut off. Then, the fire was lit. After death, his bones were broken and sold as souvenirs, along with his extremities and body parts. Hose’s knuckles were put in a jar and placed on display in a grocery store. Mob members were proud of their work. They traveled to the state capitol to present the governor with a souvenir from their work. He declined.

Spectacles of Hose-like public savagery were common. Jesse Washington was dragged from a Waco, Texas, courtroom on May 8, 1916, minutes after a jury convicted him of raping a White woman. Washington was kicked, beaten, stabbed, doused with oil, and suspended from a tree limb. His fingers, toes, ears, and penis were cut off. Then, he was set on fire. A man on horseback dragged his charred corpse through the streets.

The 1934 Florida lynching of Claude Neal was equally brutal. Neal, a farm worker accused of killing a White woman, was abducted by a mob, which then took 2 days to plan the execution. The Associated Press followed the case closely, providing announcements of when, where, and how the lynching was to take place. A crowd of more than 7,000 spectators from 11 states gathered to witness the event. Newspapers provided graphic first-hand accounts: Neal’s penis and testicles were cut off; he was poked with hot irons, cut with a knife, and strung up. After several hours, he died. His body was tied to a truck and dragged to the home of the victim’s mother, where the orgy of violence continued. Neal’s ravaged remains were then put on display in the courthouse.

Women were not exempt from mob violence. In May 1918, Mary Turner threatened to pursue legal action against Georgia mob members who had lynched her husband. She paid for her insolence. A large crowd, including women and children, assembled to witness Mary Turner receive southern justice. Mary, who was 8 months pregnant, was stripped, hung by her ankles, doused with gasoline, and set on fire. Before the flames engulfed her, a mob member pulled out a knife and slit open her stomach. As soon as the baby fell to the ground, its head was smashed under a boot heel.

Lynching: The Body Count

The body count is staggering. Although estimates vary, Walter White (1929) uncovered 4,951 lynchings in the United States between 1882 and 1927. Predictably, most of this violence was racially driven: 3,513 Blacks and 1,438 Whites. Ninety-two females were also killed: 76 Blacks and 16 Whites. Seventy-four percent of these lynchings occurred in 10 southern states:

Mississippi:	561 (517 Blacks, 44 Whites)
Georgia:	549 (510 Blacks, 39 Whites)
Texas:	534 (370 Blacks, 164 Whites)
Louisiana:	409 (347 Blacks, 62 Whites)
Alabama:	356 (304 Blacks, 52 Whites)
Arkansas:	313 (244 Blacks, 69 Whites)
Florida:	275 (247 Blacks, 28 Whites),
Tennessee:	268 (213 Blacks, 55 Whites)
Kentucky:	253 (154 Blacks, 79 Whites)
South Carolina:	174 (165 Blacks, 9 Whites)

Several states—New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Delaware—had no lynchings. Western lynch mobs were formed primarily to deal with White criminals: thieves, cattle rustlers, rapists, and murderers. In fact, several western states and territories—Arizona (31), Idaho (21), and Nevada (6) lynched only Whites. Lynching was primarily a late 19th-century phenomenon. Mob violence peaked in 1892, with 253 recorded lynchings in the United States and the next highest numbers being 211 in 1884 and 200 in 1893. According to White (1929), lynchings steadily declined in the 20th century: 1890–1900 recorded 1,665; 1900–1910 saw 921; 1910–1920 saw 840, 1920–1927 saw 304.

These statistics do not, however, reflect the full body count. Some lynchings were recorded as murders, with no indication of the dynamics of death. Moreover, some victims were disposed of without a trace, leaving their families to say that their loved ones had “disappeared” or “gone missing.” Newspaper coverage, which served as a foundation for lynching tallies, was erratic, especially when it became a relatively common occurrence (i.e., “hardly newsworthy”). Sheriffs and police officials, especially in the South, sometimes recorded lynchings as “justifiable homicide” or “suicide.”

Attacks on Blacks committed during riots were not recorded. In the 1863 New York Draft Riot, for example, an unknown number of Blacks, some hung from telegraph poles and lamp posts, were killed by White rioters. Blacks were also murdered with impunity in riots in New Orleans (1900), Atlanta, Georgia (1906), Springfield, Illinois (1908), East St. Louis, Illinois, (1917), and Chicago, Illinois (1919). Lynchings were also an integral component of “clearances.” Blacks were given a choice: Leave the area and abandon your homes and possessions, or face death. Some clearances were aimed at driving out individuals or families. Others involved mass clearances—for example, Wilmington, North Carolina (1898), and Rosewood, Florida (1923)—that drove virtually every Black resident out of town.

Although most accounts of lynching in the United States have focused on violence against African Americans in the South, Gonzales-Day uncovered 350 instances in California between 1850 and 1935. Most of these victims were Latinos, Native Americans, and Asian Americans, with the greatest number being Latino.

Terrorizing Black America: Lynching and Social Control

The unpredictable nature of White mobs terrorized African Americans. African American males knew that a charge of rape, assault, or remotely improper behavior directed at a White woman was tantamount to a death sentence, especially in the South. But Blacks were also lynched for a range of other “socially unacceptable” acts: stealing a chicken, stealing a shoe, making an insulting remark, saying hello, bumping into a girl, jostling a horse, being involved in a buggy collision, refusing to remove a military uniform, testifying for a Negro, writing an improper note, refusing to dance on a White's command, trying to pass as a White man, refusing to move, being boastful, committing slander, accruing personal debt, discussing a lynching, public drunkenness, disorderly conduct, failing to yield the sidewalk, refusing to take off a hat to a White person, resisting assault by a White person, improper laughing, and finally, displaying a sarcastic grin.

Black Americans were fully aware that education, personal achievement, and social status would not protect them from mob violence. James Weldon Johnson, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), was nearly lynched in Florida in 1901 for sitting on a park bench with a White woman. Walter White, Weldon's successor as the NAACP's executive director, was nearly lynched during the 1906 Atlanta race riot when he was just 12 years old and on several other occasions when he was working as an undercover NAACP investigator. In 1946, a group of armed Black World War II veterans rescued a lawyer who had just won a case in Tennessee involving two Black defendants. Spared from the hangman's noose, Thurgood Marshall went on to become the nation's first Black Supreme Court Justice.

Black Americans also knew that they could not rely on the criminal justice system to protect them from lynching. Sympathetic sheriffs aided mobs by failing to adequately protect their prisoners and by revealing transportation routes and arranging abductions. In some instances, they directly coordinated and openly participated in the execution. Despite the fact that mob members did not wear masks and often posed for photos—even lynching postcards, which were legally sent through the mail—investigations rarely resulted in arrests. If an arrest was made, prosecutors dropped the charges. Judges who might be facing reelection did not want to anger voters. Jurors were often ardent racists or did not want to face the wrath of the community by convicting their White neighbors.

On a larger contextual scale, the U.S. Supreme Court provided indirect cover for lynching by issuing a series of rulings that reinforced the sanctity of states' rights. Federal investigators and courts were blocked from intervening in lynching cases until the middle of the 20th century. Put simply, bigots—sometimes members of the Ku Klux Klan—were in charge of southern justice.

“Nigger hunts” received direct and indirect support from a number of sources. Some southern governors, senators, and congressmen openly endorsed lynching. Ben Tillman, South Carolina's governor and later a U.S. senator, maintained that Blacks were related to baboons and that slavery was the best thing that ever happened to the African race. In a 1903 speech on the Senate floor, Tillman proudly described his role in stuffing ballot boxes, disenfranchising Blacks, and participating in lynch mobs. A number of conservative Protestant evangelical ministers were also avid racists, preaching that lynching was a necessary evil, especially when the cursed children of Ham assaulted White women.

“Scientific evolutionary theories” provided indirect justification for lynching by supporting notions of Negro inferiority. In 1890, Daniel Brinton, professor of archaeology at the University of Pennsylvania, declared that Blacks were located somewhere between orangutans and European Whites on the evolutionary scale. Louis Agassiz, chairman of the anthropology department at Harvard University, maintained that Africans were a separate and inferior species. Late 19th- and early 20th-century Social Darwinists were firmly convinced that the quality of American racial stock was being diluted by immigrants and Blacks. Eugenicists called for protective measures: immigration restriction, miscegenation laws, as well as laws permitting the sterilization of criminals and mental defectives. For eugenical extremists, lynching was a form of race control: God-approved social engineering.

Antilynching Campaigns

Lynching did not go unchallenged. Ida Wells-Barnett, a Black journalist who was enraged by an 1892 Tennessee lynching, was the nation's foremost antilynching campaigner, writing books and newspaper articles and giving speeches across the United States and in Europe. Frederick Douglass, William Monroe Trotter, W. E. B. Du Bois, Walter White, and dozens of other Black civil rights leaders also campaigned against lynching. Black and White organizations—the National Association of Colored Women, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, British Anti-Lynching Committee, Association of Southern Women for the Prevention of Lynching—launched national and international campaigns aimed at exposing the horrors of lynching.

Courageous White governors, senators, and congressmen battled southern bigots, vainly trying to pass antilynching legislation: Dyer Act, Wagner-Costigan Bill, Gavagan Bill. Liberal academicians—sociologists, psychologists, and biologists—provided scathing critiques of studies that argued that Blacks were biologically, mentally, and morally inferior. Conservative southern Protestant ministers eventually joined Catholic and Jewish religious leaders in denouncing racism and lynching. Southern newspapers, responding to public pressure and rising standards of journalism, increasingly called for an end to “nigger hunts.” In the 1950s and 1960s, the U.S. Supreme Court issued a series of rulings that expanded due process rights for Black citizens and dismantled the racist shield of states’ rights. The Federal Bureau of Investigation conducted lynching investigations. Collectively considered, Hose-like lynching carnivals became morally, politically, and legally risky.

Declining southern support for lynching was, however, largely a function of economics. Northern and European business interests became increasingly reluctant to invest in a part of the country that engaged in crass barbarity. A low point: the Nazis mocked Americans for preaching equality, democracy, and justice and then tolerating, if not supporting, lynching. But southern businessmen and farmers had more immediate concerns.

Lynching, the sharecropping system, Jim Crow laws, political disenfranchisement, discrimination in housing, health care, recreation, and education made life in the South intolerable for Blacks. During World War I and World War II, millions of southern Blacks migrated to the North to work in factories and seek a better life. The loss of servants, sharecroppers, factory workers, and skilled artisans created severe labor shortages that alarmed southerners, including the Ku Klux Klan. Simply stated, lynching was bad for business.

National responses to two mid-20th-century lynchings reflected this new mind-set. In November 1933, Governor James Rolph of California created an international sensation by openly supporting a lynching. After hearing that two suspected murderers were going to be abducted by a San Jose mob, Rolph declined an invitation to an out-of-state governor’s convention, fearing that his lieutenant governor, who would be acting governor, would thwart the lynching. According to plan, the mob stormed the jail and hung the suspected murderers. Rolph sparked an international debate by openly commending the mob. Rolph’s decision was hailed by a number of groups, including the editors of the Harvard Crimson. But many other prominent religious, media, and legal organizations denounced the governor, calling him a national disgrace.

The August 1955 murder of 14-year-old Emmett Till in Mississippi, who was killed for whistling at a White woman in a convenience store, was another pivotal event in the history of American lynching and race relations. Till’s deformed and bloated body was displayed in an open casket. The nation, with the exception of ardent racists, was shamed and enraged. The age of bloody state-sanctioned orgies of violence was at an end.

The efforts of antilynching crusaders did not, however, end racism or racist killings. By the late 1940s and 1950s, the age of public sadistic spectacles—burning bodies, taking souvenirs, posing for pictures, circulating lynching postcards—was clearly over. Racially motivated killings were increasingly carried out by individuals or small groups of men who committed their acts in secrecy, shunning publicity. Numerous unsuccessful attempts have been made to pass federal legislation outlawing lynching, although it would now fall under the definition of a hate crime. In 2005, an antilynching resolution was passed by the Senate apologizing to victims of lynching for the Senate’s historical and consistent failure to outlaw lynching.

Lynching is not merely a historical curiosity. Black Americans who grew up in the South under Jim Crow in the 1950s and 1960s still remember riding in the backs of buses, being prohibited from entering restaurants, drinking out of “colored only” water fountains, and being forced to attend segregated schools. For them, the threat of lynching and “underground lynching” was real. “Nigger hunts” and “coon barbecues” provide a troubling reminder that the United States has a long history of racial oppression and state-sanctioned savage cruelty. The 1998 murder of James Byrd, who was chained to a pickup truck and dragged to death on a rural Texas road by three White men, was a demonstration of the continued existence of racial brutality.

Alexander W. Pisciotta

See also African Americans; Black Codes; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Dyer Bill; Hate Crimes; Ku Klux Klan; Ku Klux Klan Act; Race Riots; Till, Emmett; Tulsa, Oklahoma, Race Riot of 1921; Wells-Barnett, Ida B.

Further Readings

- Allen, J., Als, H., Lewis, J., & Litwack, L. F. (2004). Without sanctuary: Lynching photography in America. Santa Fe, NM: Twin Palms.
- Ayres, E. L. (1984). Vengeance and justice: Crime and punishment in the 19th-century American South. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Dray, P. (2002). At the hands of persons unknown: The lynching of Black America. New York: Modern Library.
- Gonzales-Day, K. (2006). Lynching in the West: 1850–1935. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Litwack, L. F. (1998). Trouble in mind: Black southerners in the age of Jim Crow. New York: Vintage Books.
- Patterson, O. (1998). Rituals of blood: Consequences of slavery in two American centuries. New York: Basic Civitas Books.
- Royster, J. J. (Ed.). (1997). Southern horrors and other writings: The anti-lynching campaign of Ida B. Wells, 1892–1900. Boston: Bedford Books.
- White, W. (1929). Rope and faggot: A biography of Judge Lynch. New York: Knopf.

MANDATORY MINIMUMS

Mandatory minimum sentencing laws remove judges' discretion in the sentencing process by requiring a sentence of a specific length for a convicted individual when certain criteria have been met. For example, a federal conviction for possession of half a kilogram or more of powder cocaine leads to a mandatory sentence of at least 5 years in prison. Drug cases are the most common offenses receiving mandatory minimums. While mandatory minimums have proven to be effective when targeted at higher-level offenders, they have also dramatically increased incarceration rates for nonviolent offenders and have contributed to sentencing disparities. This entry describes the objectives of mandatory minimum sentencing and examines both the effectiveness and the unintended consequences of these laws.

Before the standardization of minimum sentencing under mandatory minimum laws, judges had unlimited discretion in the sentencing of convicted individuals. Personal views regarding crime and sentencing inevitably differed among judges, so the amount of time offenders received for similar crimes varied greatly. Standardizing the base sentence of such crimes was meant to fulfill several objectives. A major goal of mandatory minimums was to reduce the sentencing disparity that had occurred as a result of judicial discretion.

Mandatory minimums were also seen as a means to deterrence and incapacitation. It was expected that offenders' knowledge that judges would impose mandatory sentences would deter potential offenders, especially drug offenders, from further involvement in crime because punishment would be serious and likely. Giving serious offenders lengthier sentences and placing them in prison would remove serious offenders from society and prevent them from additional criminal acts. These efforts at deterrence and incapacitation were also a response to public opinion that offenders were not being sufficiently punished under previous sentencing alternatives. Last, mandatory minimums were aimed at increasing offenders' cooperation and pleas. If a defendant helped in an investigation that led to prosecution of others, the judge was authorized to impose a sentence for that defendant below the mandatory minimum. Thus, it was thought, defendants would be more motivated to cooperate with authorities and to plead guilty to a lesser offense in order to reduce a mandatory minimum sentence. This anticipated increase in guilty pleas would save the government the cost of trials.

Background

Congress began enacting mandatory minimum penalties in 1984 specifically to address sentencing for drug offenses and violent crime. These sentencing policies were extensively altered 2 years later by connecting the minimum penalty for a drug offense to the gross weight of drugs involved, as well as by placing greater scrutiny on drug trafficking and distribution offenses. Enhancements for the use and/or possession of a firearm were enacted, as well as for drug offenders who dealt to minors or who used weapons while engaging in their offense. In 1988, Congress created further mandatory minimum penalties for conspirators in certain offenses and for the possession of crack cocaine. For drug offenses, the level of dealing that defendants must reach before being subject to mandatory sentences depends on the type of drug and whether the defendant is a repeat offender.

The federal sentencing system is made up of two tiers of mandatory minimums, both of which double for defendants with prior convictions. The first level mandates a minimum sentence of 5 years for drug possession, or a minimum of 10 years for individuals with prior felony drug convictions. The second requires a minimum imprisonment sentence of 10 years for drug possession, 20 years with a prior felony drug conviction, or mandatory life imprisonment with two prior felony drug convictions. Good behavior makes defendants eligible for a reduction in the amount of time they must serve. The reduction amounts to about 54 days per year, reducing the offender's time served to roughly 85% of the original sentence.

The purpose of mandatory minimum sentencing is to target higher-level offenders and higher-level drug trafficking organizations. To be eligible for a mandatory minimum sentence of 5 years for marijuana, the defendant must be convicted of an offense involving at least 220 pounds, or at least 100 plants. To be bumped up to the next level and subject to a mandatory minimum of 10 years imprisonment, the defendant must be convicted of an offense involving 1.1 tons of the substance or 1,000 plants.

Unintended Consequences

The anticipated benefits of mandatory minimums have resulted in several serious yet unintended outcomes, including the impact of these laws on minorities and female offenders, the opportunity for plea bargaining, and the purity of drugs sold.

First, the disparity in the amount of powder versus crack cocaine required for the mandatory minimum sentence, currently at a 100-to-1 ratio in the federal court, punishes crack cocaine users much more severely than powder cocaine users. In order to receive a mandatory 5-year prison sentence for cocaine, one must be in possession of either 5 grams of crack cocaine or 500 grams of powder cocaine. The reason for this disparity stems from the fact that crack is a smokable base. It is thought to be more addictive than powder cocaine because it results in a rapid and intense euphoria that is not experienced with powder cocaine. At the time the legislation was passed, there was a great amount of public fear regarding crack cocaine; this was partially responsible for tougher sanctioning for crack cocaine than for powder cocaine. This disparity has become a racial issue, because crack cocaine is more commonly sold by African Americans than by Whites. In crack cocaine cases, more than 90% of the defendants are African American, compared to roughly 25% in powder cocaine cases. The percentage of minorities in prison is greater than their presence in the general population, and minorities have been found to constitute a disproportionate number of arrests for these drug offenses.

Second, defendants who are able to cooperate with authorities for a lesser sentence are disproportionately upper-level dealers—those who are often middle- or upper-class individuals who treat drug dealing and smuggling in a businesslike fashion and who are in control of large smuggling or dealing operations. According to the U.S. Sentencing Commission, only 11% of federal drug offenders are characterized as high-level offenders. This is because the chain of command in drug rings purposely prevents low-level sellers from obtaining any information about the individuals above them in the pyramid, to prevent these low-level sellers from negotiating with information about the smuggling or dealing orchestration when caught by authorities. Conversely, the higher-level dealers and smugglers know all the details regarding their operation(s) and are able to trade information about all those working for them for a lesser sentence. This disproportionately affects lower-level drug “mules” or street dealers, who are more often minorities, in that they are unable to trade information for a lesser sentence. High-level dealers are rarely in physical possession of the drugs they own, sell, or control. They are able to hire others to sustain the associated risk of carrying the substances. While the cooperation of defendants was an objective of the implementation of mandatory minimums, it fails to take into account the fact that those who receive a reduced sentence by cooperating with authorities by disclosing names of other workers are often the exact higher-level dealers and smugglers that mandatory minimums were created to target and harshly punish.

Third, defendants charged with possession of smaller amounts of drugs are often involved in nonviolent rather than violent offenses. Due to the fact that sentences are predetermined, the defendants' role cannot be taken into account. Roles in drug offenses can vary widely, and all roles are considered equally deviant. As a result, there has been an increase in the number of females serving drug offenses even though females typically play less involved roles in drug offenses; often their involvement results from relationships with male family members and partners. This involvement can be as little as unknowingly dating someone who sells illegal substances or driving someone to the bank to deposit drug-dealing profits. Because of this, the implementation of mandatory minimum drug sentences has increased the female prison population as well as contributing to prison overcrowding.

Also an issue in mandatory minimum drug sentencing is the fact that penalties are determined by the total weight of the substance, without taking into account the purity of the drug. For example, possession of 100 grams of powder that contains only 10% pure heroin and 90% inactive cutting ingredients would receive a federally mandated 5-year mandatory minimum. However, a person with 25 grams of pure heroin would not receive a federally sanctioned minimum even though he or she is in possession of 2.5 times the amount of substance than the first person. Consequently, dealers may choose to obtain and sell drugs of a higher purity. Like those involved in selling and trafficking drugs, those who grow and manufacture drugs are aware of laws defining the quantity of drugs. Thus, for example, marijuana growers may be careful to grow fewer than 100 or 1,000 plants to avoid harsh mandatory minimum sentences.

Effectiveness of Mandatory Minimums

While mandatory minimums were intended to reduce sentencing disparities, discretion is often simply shifted from the judge to the prosecution. Prosecutors may opt to seek convictions on lesser charges rather than on ones that would have resulted in mandatory minimums, and defendants committing similar offenses may receive different sentences as a result of plea bargaining. Such plea bargains may also enable higher-level offenders, drug dealers, and drug smugglers to receive reduced sentences because of their ability to cooperate and assist authorities. Because this option is often unavailable to lower-level and nonviolent offenders, they may be disproportionately subjected to mandatory minimums. These outcomes also limit the effectiveness of mandatory minimums in addressing the public perception that criminals are not punished sufficiently.

Critics of mandatory minimums also note that deterrence and incapacitation are not achieved when higher-level offenders, drug dealers, and drug smugglers receive sentences below federally instituted mandatory minimums.

Policy Implications

The effectiveness of mandatory minimums could be enhanced if sentences were to take into account the offender's role, motivation, and propensity of recidivism. Mandatory minimums may prove to be an effective policy if targeted at the highest-level offenders.

An alternative approach to decreasing drug offenses would be to focus on decreasing drug consumption. Advocates for substance abuse treatments note that such programs may be more cost effective than mandatory minimums in reducing crime and in enabling individuals to overcome their addictions.

Julie Yingling

See also Cocaine Laws; Drug Sentencing; Drug Sentencing, Federal; Sentencing Disparities, African Americans; Sentencing Disparities, Latina/o/s; Sentencing Disparities, Native Americans; Sentencing Project, The; Three Strikes Laws; United States v. Booker

Further Readings

Caulkins, J. P., Rydell, C. P., Schwabe, W. L., & Chiesa, J. (1997). Mandatory minimum drug sentences. Santa Monica, CA: RAND.

- Drug Enforcement Administration. (2007). Federal trafficking penalties. Retrieved from <http://www.usdoj.gov/dea/agency/penalties.htm>
- Drug Policy Alliance. (2007). Mandatory minimum sentences. Retrieved from <http://www.drugpolicy.org/drugwar/mandatorymin>
- U.S. Sentencing Commission. (1991). Special report to the Congress: Mandatory minimum penalties in the federal criminal justice system. Washington, DC: Author. Retrieved from http://www.ussc.gov/r_congress/MANMIN.PDF

MANN, CORAMAE (1931–2004)

Coramae Richey Mann was a scholar in the areas of women and race and crime and the criminal justice system. Her career spanned 2 decades and included numerous awards and several books, chapters in books, scholarly articles, and other types of writings. Her books include Female Crime and Delinquency (1984), Unequal Justice: A Question of Color (1993), When Women Kill (1996); she coauthored Images of Color, Images of Crime (2nd ed., 2002) with Marjorie Zatz. Mann's work emphasized that not only do minority women have a different experience from White men, but each minority group has its own unique experience. This entry provides biographical information on Mann as well as a review of her research and a discussion of her scholarly contributions.

Mann was born in Chicago, Illinois, on January 25, 1931. She received her undergraduate degree in 1956 and a graduate degree in 1961, both in clinical psychology from Roosevelt University. In 1976, Mann earned a PhD in sociology with an emphasis in criminology from the University of Illinois at Chicago. She spent her academic career first at Florida State University, where she was the only African American female on the faculty, and then at Indiana University–Bloomington, where she helped establish a PhD program in criminology. While at Indiana University, she recruited and mentored minority faculty. She retired from Indiana University–Bloomington and academics in 1996. Mann died in 2004, after being diagnosed with lung cancer.

In her book Unequal Justice: A Question of Color, Mann called attention to the need of a “minority view” on crime and the criminal justice system. She outlined three requirements for the application of a minority view. First, she discussed the need to identify and discuss the effects of violence, discrimination, and oppression that exist in the lives of minorities in America. Her work, in particular, looked at the unique experiences of each minority group in America. Second, Mann outlined several methodological requirements, which include qualitative methods to bring context and meaning to minority research. In addition, she saw a need to do in-group comparisons rather than evaluating behavior of minorities according to conventional definitions and labels. Mann called for greater participation in research by minority scholars in order to bring their definitions into the field of criminology. Finally, Mann was a proponent of the discrimination thesis that disputed the position of those such as William Wilbanks, who argued that the criminal justice system was not racist.

Mann's book Female Crime and Delinquency discusses female deviance and analyzes females' processing through the criminal justice system. At the time of her analysis, biological explanations of female crime were popular. Mann challenged these assertions, successfully discrediting the idea that female offenders were more masculine than women in the general population. In addition, she challenged the idea that female crime was a result of the women's liberation movement. Mann concluded that the criminal justice system systematically discriminates against women, both as juveniles and adults. Moreover, she pointed out that laws and policies that were gender specific, such as sexual misconduct, were disproportionately applied to women. Methodologically, she contributed to the literature by analyzing women as part of their ethnic groups, comparing them to White women, and found many differences. She began her discussion about female criminals by challenging the then-current research that described women as unique, and both physically and psychologically different from men. Mann argued for a holistic approach, one that could explain all crime and delinquency and perhaps lead to a gender-neutral theory.

Mann's book When Women Kill contributed to the literature by closely examining women who were convicted of murder. In this book, Mann reviewed previous literature on female perpetrators of homicide and presented the findings of a study that looked at six major U.S. cities that had high homicide rates at the time of data collection. She was interested in the motivations of female-perpetrated homicide, as well as homicide in general, as a way to understand violence as a human issue rather than a gender issue. Her research found that female-perpetrated homicide, like all homicide, is mostly intraracial, and African Americans were overrepresented as both victims and offenders. Specific to female-perpetrated homicide, the victims tended to be intimate partners or relatives rather than strangers. Mann found a strong case for “victim precipitation,” where an interpersonal conflict preceded the homicide. She did not, however, find evidence of battered women’s syndrome in any of the cases she analyzed. Other contributions from When Women Kill include a profile of a typical female homicide perpetrator, arrest histories of the women, and the vast differences Mann found in the way that these cases were handled by the criminal justice system. Interestingly, she found that White and African American women perpetrators of homicide tend to receive similar sentences, with African American women receiving a slightly lesser sentence, which was inconsistent with previous research in the study of female crime and delinquency.

Mann made suggestions to alleviate some of the conditions that women face in the criminal justice system. She pointed out the need for law enforcement to undergo community training with regard to culture, race, and gender. She suggested that minority women offenders should be released during the pretrial stages because they were largely unable to secure bail and they were likely to have children at home to care for. She pointed to ill-conceived correctional policies that serve to disintegrate family structure and ties, and she emphasized the need to minimize this harm. She further stated that drug and alcohol problems should be treated as a health issue rather than a criminal issue. Finally, she concluded that the criminal justice system needs to do a better job of addressing language and cultural barriers.

The work of Coramae Mann provided a comprehensive look at numerous key aspects of the criminal justice system and called particular attention to issues regarding race/ethnicity and gender. Her work provided the discipline with a holistic and humanistic approach in which to view the criminal justice system and those that are affected by it.

Jennifer Hartsfield

See also Black Feminist Criminology; Domestic Violence; Female Juvenile Delinquents; Violent Females

Further Readings

- Bing, R. L. (2004). Dr. Coramae Richey-Mann (1931–2004). Academy of Criminal Justice Sciences ACJS Today, 29(4), 1–2.
- Gabbidon, S. L., Greene, H. T., & Young, V. D. (2002). African American classics in criminology and criminal justice. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
- Greene, H. T., & Gabbidon, S. L. (2000). African American criminological thought. Albany: SUNY Press.
- Mann, C. R. (1984) Female crime and delinquency. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press.
- Mann, C. R. (1993). Unequal justice: A question of color. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Mann, C. R. (1996). When women kill. New York: State University of New York Press.
- Mann, C. R., & Zatz, M. (Eds.). (1998). Images of color, images of crime. Los Angeles: Roxbury.
- Mars, J. R. (2001). Coramae Richey Mann on women, crime and the color of American Justice. Women and Criminal Justice, 13(1), 1–25.

MAPP V. OHIO

The decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in Mapp v. Ohio in 1961 is one of the seminal decisions in criminal procedure and race relations in American criminal justice. Mapp v. Ohio was decided during the tenure of the Warren Court, which in 1954 inaugurated the era of judicial recognition of civil rights with its decision in Brown v. Board of Education. In its decision in Mapp v. Ohio, the Supreme Court extended the existing rule that evidence obtained through an illegal search was inadmissible in federal courts, holding that such evidence was also inadmissible in state courts. Thus, the decision of Mapp v. Ohio extended to state law enforcement the existing protection of the Fourth Amendment in federal law enforcement.

From the perspective of race relations, Mapp v. Ohio placed the nation on notice that, in the context of criminal procedure, the same standards applied at the federal level would apply throughout the nation. A continuation of the Warren Court's legacy of breathing life into the Bill of Rights, Mapp marked the beginning of a decade that brought great advances in civil rights for African Americans and other minorities, not only in the courts but also through legislation such as the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The Facts

Dollree Mapp was an African America woman residing in Cleveland, Ohio. Based on an anonymous tip, the police went to Mapp's residence to look for a person suspected of being involved in a bombing incident and for gambling paraphernalia. The police produced a paper that was alleged to be a warrant but was not. Mapp refused to allow the search. The police broke into Mapp's residence, forcibly seized and handcuffed her, and proceeded to search her residence. The search included the bedrooms and the cellar and a search of the furniture, closets, luggage, and a trunk. The police also searched her personal papers and her photo album. During the search, the police found pornographic material, which was illegal under Ohio law. Mapp was arrested and brought to trial. No search warrant was produced in court. She was convicted. Her case was appealed to the Ohio Supreme Court, which found that it was proper to admit the pornographic material into evidence, even though the search was unlawful, and upheld her conviction. Mapp then appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

The major issue on appeal was the issue of pornography and the First and Fourteenth Amendments. Although the issue of the warrantless search was a secondary issue, the decision of Mapp v. Ohio is renowned to this day for the basic principles of law it established concerning the Fourth Amendment and for the revolution in criminal procedure it started.

The Legal Background

The Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution states, "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, homes, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause. . . ." The Constitution did not provide a remedy for violations of the Fourth Amendment by the government. Therefore, the U.S. Supreme Court created a remedy, now referred to as the "exclusionary rule," that prohibits the introduction of illegally seized evidence in a criminal proceeding. The Supreme Court first enunciated the rule in Weeks v. United States (1914). The exclusionary rule mandates that illegally seized evidence is inadmissible in a criminal proceeding. In affirming the rule in Silverthorne Lumber Company v. United States (1920), Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., recognized that without the exclusionary rule, the protections of the Fourth Amendment would become just a "mere form of words." However, before Mapp v. Ohio, the U. S. Supreme Court had held, in Wolf v. Colorado in 1949, that the states could allow illegally seized evidence into evidence in a criminal proceeding. At that time, the exclusionary rule was essentially only enforced in federal courts and not in state courts.

The reason for this state of affairs was the haphazard application of the Fourteenth Amendment and the Bill of Rights to the states. The Fourteenth Amendment states that no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

In practice, however, many rights guaranteed by the Bill of Rights and made applicable to the states were not enforced by the states. Under what is termed the "doctrine of selective incorporation," only some of the rights enumerated in the Bill of Rights are applicable to the states.

In its decision of Wolf v. Colorado, even though the U.S. Supreme Court recognized the validity of the exclusionary rule as protecting the rights guaranteed under the Fourth Amendment, it essentially declined to make it applicable to the states. Simply stated, although the Fourth Amendment was the law of the land and applicable to the states, the exclusionary rule was a judicially created remedy that was not part of the Fourth Amendment. It was up to each state to determine how it would enforce the Fourth Amendment. This set the stage for Mapp v. Ohio in 1961.

The Decision

By its decision in Mapp v. Ohio, the U.S. Supreme Court overruled Wolf v. Colorado and held that the exclusionary rule was directly applicable to the states. Evidence seized in violation of the Fourth Amendment was inadmissible in criminal proceedings. The Court noted,

Since the Fourth Amendment's right of privacy has been declared enforceable against the States through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth, it is enforceable against them by the same sanction of exclusion as is used against the Federal Government. Were it otherwise, then just as without the Weeks rule the assurance against unreasonable federal searches and seizures would be "a form of words," valueless and undeserving of mention in a perpetual charter of inestimable human liberties, so too, without that rule the freedom from state invasions of privacy would be so ephemeral and so neatly severed from its conceptual nexus with the freedom from all brutish means of coercing evidence as not to merit this Court's high regard as a freedom "implicit in the concept of ordered liberty."

The Court summed up its decision by asserting that its decision, founded on reason and truth, gives to the individual no more than that which the Constitution guarantees him, to the police officer no less than that to which honest law enforcement is entitled, and, to the courts, that judicial integrity so necessary in the true administration of justice.

Mapp and Crime

There is no doubt that the decision of Mapp v. Ohio started a revolution in criminal procedure. At that time, many police departments across the United States routinely executed illegal searches that, as a matter of practice, had no effect on the adjudication of criminal matters except the encouragement of continued illegal searches and seizures, at least by state and local police departments and in state criminal proceedings. The effect of Mapp v. Ohio was almost immediate. Many police officials criticized Mapp v. Ohio and its broad application of the exclusionary rule to the states as too restrictive of police investigations. In fact, this criticism has been shown to be false. Enforcement of the criminal law, with due respect for the Fourth Amendment, has not suffered because of Mapp v. Ohio. What has happened is that the police are now required to follow the Fourth Amendment and cannot conduct searches of residences without first obtaining a valid search warrant. Mapp v. Ohio changed the face of routine law enforcement across the United States.

Mapp and Race

Mapp was African American. However, the opinion issued by the U.S. Supreme Court in Mapp v. Ohio apparently did not rely on race as a factor. Indeed, throughout the opinion, the U.S. Supreme Court made reference to the applicability of the Fourth Amendment to all people. The implication, considering Brown v. Board of Education and the fact that it was the Warren Court that decided both Brown v. Board of Education and Mapp v. Ohio, was clear. Race should not be an issue when applying the protections guaranteed by the Bill of Rights. Indeed, the decision of Mapp v. Ohio sent a clear message to the African American community in the context of criminal procedure: African Americans should be and would be granted the same rights guaranteed to all people, and the U.S. Supreme Court would enforce those rights.

It is interesting to note that Mapp v. Ohio appeared to have much more lasting effect than the infamous trials of the Scottsboro Boys in the 1930s. In that case, nine African American youths were arrested for raping two White women. They were repeatedly tried, found guilty, and sentenced to death despite reversals by the U.S. Supreme Court. The trials garnered international attention, and all of the Scottsboro Boys were eventually found innocent and released. Despite the fact that Mapp v.

Ohio concerned much less serious crimes, it set constitutional standards that were applicable to all law enforcement, whereas the Scottsboro Boys cases did not. Essentially, Mapp v. Ohio accomplished much more for the protection of African Americans than the internationally condemned trials of the Scottsboro Boys.

William C. Plouffe, Jr.

See also Norris v. Alabama; Powell v. Alabama

Further Readings

- Garrow, D. J. (2008). Bad behavior makes big law: Southern malfeasance and the expansion of federal judicial power 1954–1968. St. John's Law Review, 82, 1.
- Katz, L. R. (2001). Mapp after forty years: Its impact on race in America. Case Western Law Review, 52, 471.
- Long, C. N. (2006). Mapp v. Ohio: Guarding against unreasonable searches and seizures. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas.
- Machado Zotti, P. H. (2005). Injustice for all: Mapp v. Ohio and the Fourth Amendment. New York: Peter Lang.
- Nardulli, P. F. (1983). The societal costs of the exclusionary rule: An empirical assessment. American Bar Foundation Research Journal, 8(3), 585.

MARA SALVATRUCHA (MS-13)

The gang problem has become pervasive in all types of communities nationwide. Mara Salvatrucha (MS-13) has garnered extensive media attention and is considered to be one of the fastest-growing and most violent ethnic international gangs in North America. There are very few empirical studies to support its reputation, but journalists have raised concern, and Congress is actively targeting this gang. MS-13 reportedly has managed to find and recruit members in many states, including Alaska, Oregon, Texas, Nevada, Maryland, as well as in Mexico and Central America.

Mara Salvatrucha has been recognized by federal, state, and local law enforcement agencies as among the most powerful yet loosely structured gangs in the northern hemisphere, and it is responsible for brutal gang wars, drug smuggling, and illegal transport of aliens across the U.S.-Mexico borders. The gang is accused of seeking alliances with organized crime entities, and members are reportedly responsible for carrying out criminal activities such as protecting territories, facilitating drugs and weapons, and human trafficking. Financial gain is the primary goal shared by these alliances, and relationships among gangs are becoming more sophisticated, thus providing access to technology and weapons that increase gangs' ability to carry out lethal acts against a larger section of society.

The gang reportedly originated in El Salvador in the 1970s as a result of a civil war between government forces and an upper-middle-class revolutionary group, Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front (in Spanish, the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional, or FMNL), which claimed to represent those individuals in the bottom social and economic tiers of their nation. By the end of the civil war in El Salvador, more than 70,000 people were dead and another 900,000 were displaced (Federal Bureau of Investigation, 2005). Thousands of these Salvadorans fled to the United States and migrated to largely Hispanic areas of southern Los Angeles. Most of these areas in Los Angeles were already inundated with powerful Mexican gangs who preyed on weaker cultural groups. So as not to be victimized, former members of the FMNL and other refugees formed a mara or posse, which was composed of salvatruchas or "street-tough Salvadorans," becoming Mara Salvatrucha in the early 1980s.

Government officials have expressed extreme concern about Mara Salvatrucha because of its ties to powerful ex-paramilitary members in El Salvador, which make it a truly international gang. In the mid-1990s, changes in U.S. immigration laws allowed deportations of convicted criminals, including many gang members. Salvadoran officials claim that many deported gang members returned to the disorganized neighborhoods of El Salvador and other Central American countries in search of eager converts. Youthful recruits from severely impoverished neighborhoods found discipline, purpose, and income. Many then found their way back into the United States illegally, thus increasing the problem in the United States to pandemic proportions.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation indicates that although the majority of members come from Hispanic cultures, MS-13 has all but lifted the ethnic barriers and now includes African Americans as well. The majority of its members are between the ages of 11 and 40, and they are easily identified through their very visible tattoos. Perhaps one of the biggest problems in ameliorating the influence of this gang is the fact that they are very fluid and operate with no centralized leadership.

Members of MS-13 are presently involved in numerous illegal activities; increasing the difficulty of thwarting these concerns is the gang's international presence. For example, members found their way into smuggling illegal aliens into the United States. As refugees from Guatemala, Honduras, and El Salvador fled their homelands due to economic issues and civil wars, MS-13 members used their gang affiliations to monopolize this illegal trade. As with most gang members, they are willing to participate in nearly any act to gain monetary compensation. They are known to forge alliances with drug cartels and smuggling operations and tend to have a higher level of organization and criminal involvement than other American street gangs.

Mara Salvatrucha's notoriety is a growing concern in the United States, Central America, and Mexico. The Federal Bureau of Investigation and other federal, state, and local law enforcement agencies continue to document its terror tactics and use of brutal violence to enforce its control of certain territories. Members reportedly see themselves as above reproach and above the law and often use bribery, extortion, and physical threats of violence against officials unwilling to cooperate with their plans of action.

Governmental agencies are continuing their efforts at national and international collaboration in an effort to curtail the activities of MS-13. Many of its youthful members are living under deplorable social and economic conditions and are thus highly susceptible to the appeal of an organization that promises to deliver them and their families from poverty and does so by socializing them to reach a level of monetary success through illegal and violent acts.

The increasing urbanization of the United States has led to a disproportionate amount of crime and delinquency in crowded inner cities. Unfortunately, these areas are characterized by poverty, inferior housing, cultural and ethnic segregation, ineffective schools, subpar health care, and high unemployment, and these factors make disadvantaged youth vulnerable to gang recruitment. Advocates for social reform emphasize the need for policies that will enhance the abilities of the poor and underserved to participate in U.S. society as equal citizens, thus reducing the need to survive at the cost of committing criminal and violent acts. Research on gangs is needed not only to help ensure factual accuracy in media reports of their activities, but also to increase the effectiveness both of law enforcement in countering gang-related crime and of governmental and non-governmental agencies working to alleviate the social conditions that foster criminality.

Danny Pirtle

See also Drug Trafficking; Immigrants and Crime; Latino Gangs

Further Readings

- Campo-Flores, A., & Romano, A. (2005, March 28). The most dangerous gang in America. Newsweek, 145, 23–26.
- Federal Bureau of Investigation. (2005, July). How we're ganging up on MS-13 and what you can do to help. Retrieved from <http://www.fbi.gov/page2/july05/ms071305.htm>
- National Alliance of Gang Investigators Associations. (2005). 2005 National Gang Threat Assessment (Grant No. 2003-DD-BX-0311). Washington, DC: Bureau of Justice Statistics.

MARIEL CUBANS

Hispanics are the largest ethnic minority in the United States. Social scientists are finding that they have to broaden their scope of research to be inclusive of this demographic shift. Contemporary research efforts in the area of race and crime are moving toward revisiting traditional ways of theorizing about race and ethnicity and their centrality to our understanding of crime and criminality. Although past research practices either omitted or subsumed Hispanic identity along a common racial dichotomy, White or Black, contemporary scholars recognize that Hispanics are multiracial, multilingual, and defined by a host of varied experiences, most notably immigration.

Cubans are the third largest Hispanic (ethnic) group in the United States. While Cubans have been migrating to the United States for well over 100 years, the Mariel exodus in 1980 was a pivotal experience in that it redefined U.S. immigration policies for Latin and Central America, accelerated unprecedented growth, and brought dramatic social change to south Florida (Miami-Dade County) and beyond. This entry provides a brief historical framework outlining the significance of such experiences for a cohort of Cuban immigrants whose influence across matters pertaining to immigration, crime, and social policy has crystallized the public's perception of both Cubans and Hispanics in general.

Historical Background

From April 4 through September 26, 1980, about 1% of the Cuban population (i.e., 146,965 men, women, and children) migrated throughout Latin America and Europe via the port of Mariel, Cuba. Of the 146,965 “new” Cuban migrants, an estimated 120,000 to 125,000 arrived in the United States courtesy of the Freedom Flotilla, a volunteer group of exiled or expatriate Cuban men and women who employed their own private vessels in making the roundtrip voyage from Key West, Florida, to Mariel Harbor, Cuba. This heterogeneous group of Cuban migrants came to be known as “Marielitos.” The epicenter for this monumental migration was south Florida; in particular, Key West, where today a small monument commemorates this entry point for thousands of Marielitos and the coordinated efforts among the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Services (INS), the U.S. Coast Guard (USCG), and the U.S. Navy in ensuring the safe passage, processing, and documentation of thousands of men, women, and children. The south Florida Cuban exile community or el excilio and members of the Freedom Flotilla have also erected their own commemoratives to honor those who did not survive the journey. For Marielitos, Key West was Ellis Island.

Although initial resettlement in the United States for Mariel Cubans included major urban cities throughout the country, a larger percentage—estimates range from 35% to 45%—settled in Miami-Dade County, Florida. The massive Mariel exodus arose from specific economical, political, and social forces burgeoning from the island as a result of the Cuban Missile Crisis aftermath. Moreover, these same migratory preconditions in Cuba also distinctively defined Marielitos in terms of their political ideology, social views, and labor market participation. Specifically, this generation of Cubans represented a third wave of émigrés unlike the first two in terms of age, social class, race, and racial and social identity. Mariel Cubans were primarily male, younger, working class, and a greater percentage than in the earlier waves was non-White. In terms of political ideology and social views, Marielitos were postrevolutionaries in that they came of age under a socialist/authoritarian government and had firsthand experience with the hard realities such a regime entails.

Tangible cohort differences between Marielitos and earlier Cuban émigrés of Wave I (1959–1962) and Wave II (1965–1973) are highlighted by Jose Llanes's skillful analysis of 187 life stories in Cuban Americans: Masters of Survival. Llanes effectively demonstrates how 1980 not only marked the third wave of Cuban migrants to the United States but also initiated a new era in U.S.-Cuban immigration (foreign) policies and, for the first time in the 21-year cycle of contemporary Cuban migration (1959–1980), the United States itself was experiencing unprecedented fiscal and social challenges that contributed to the negative stereotypes, misperceptions, and criminal “imaging” that led to the social construction of Marielitos as an immigrant group consisting solely of Cuba's outcasts, for example, criminal offenders, mental patients, sexual deviants, drug addicts, and so on. In reviewing government documents for his landmark book, The Abandoned Ones: The Imprisonment of the Mariel Boat People, Mark S. Hamm reported fewer than one half of 1% of the total number of Marielitos (i.e., just under 400) were found to have significant criminal backgrounds. Despite this critical finding, the social construction of Marielitos as a largely deviant or criminal group persisted. Marielitos found themselves entering a very different American society than did earlier Cuban émigrés.

Mariel Cubans and Crime

By the late spring of 1980, public opinion polls clearly showed U.S. and Cuban American sentiments becoming galvanized against the new arrivals; many, even those in the Cuban community, supported repatriating efforts as national and local news coverage of a rise in street crime, especially drug-related violence, became commonplace. The accuracy of such reports was never rigorously investigated, and they led to the criminal imaging of Mariel Cubans. For many people in south Florida and across the United States, an image immortalized in Brian De Palma's 1983 film Scarface—a fictional tale of the rise and fall of a Mariel Cuban, Tony Montana, in the cocaine drug world—became the archetypical representation of the new Cuban immigrant: male, young, and violent. Criminologists such as Ramiro Martinez, Jr., have argued the contrary and provide empirical evidence to suggest Mariel Cubans were no more violent than other racial and ethnic groups in Miami at the time. Moreover, empirical evidence has consistently challenged the “crime-prone” imaging used against Mariel Cubans and other Hispanic/Latina/o groups. Although in the 1980s, Miami, Florida, not unlike most cities comparable in size, did experience a rise in crime, Mariel Cubans were not the protagonists portrayed in Scarface or in television shows such as Miami Vice.

Conclusion

South Florida (Miami-Dade County) became a microcosm for national events unfolding in the United States at the beginning of the Mariel exodus; a fragile local economy, a dwindling property tax base, political scandals involving prominent community leaders, the inception of an anti-immigrant movement, a rising unemployment rate, and an increasing crime rate (especially for homicides), to name a few, created an anti-Mariel fervor that was fueled by suspicion and condemnation by the established Cuban community. Moreover, the U.S. government underestimated the social, financial, and political impact the Mariel exodus would have on the south Florida landscape. For many people living in the United States, the Mariel exodus was their first contemporary experience with immigration.

This experience was largely shaped by media accounts, both in the United States and Cuba, that served only to further marginalize Mariel Cubans from both the larger south Florida community and the established Cuban community.

Wilson R. Palacios

See also Critical Race Theory; Immigrants and Crime; Latina/o Criminology; Latina/o/s

Further Readings

- Garcia, M. C. (1996). Havana USA: Cuban exiles and Cuban Americans in south Florida, 1959–1994. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Hamm, M. S. (1995). The abandoned ones: The imprisonment and uprising of the Mariel boat people. Boston: Northeastern University Press.
- Llanes, J. (1982). Cuban Americans: Masters of survival. Cambridge, MA: Abt Books.
- Martinez, R., Jr. (2002). Latino homicide: Immigration, violence, and community. New York: Routledge.
- Martinez, R., Jr., & Valenzuela, A., Jr. (Eds.). (2006). Immigration and crime: Race, ethnicity, and violence. New York: New York University Press.
- Moore, J., & Pachon, H. (1985). Hispanics in the United States. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall.

MARSHALL HYPOTHESES

The Marshall hypotheses are a series of conjectures by Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall regarding the value of opinion poll data on public sentiments about capital punishment. Because the results of such polls can be of great importance to the U.S. Supreme Court's assessment of the constitutionality of various criminal statutes and policies and practices, the validity of these data is especially important. Justice Marshall's opinions regarding both the importance of public opinion data and the limits of their validity opened an area of social scientific research. This entry describes the origins and precise nature of the Marshall hypotheses. This is followed by a brief review of the social scientific studies (both the methodologies employed and the findings of these studies) that were spawned from Justice Marshall's claims.

In 1972, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in the case of Furman v. Georgia that all death penalty statutes within the United States violated the Constitution's Eighth Amendment ban on cruel and unusual punishment because they required jurors in capital cases to make sentencing recommendations without any legal guidance as to what characteristics of the offense, the offender, and/or the victim should be employed to distinguish between those to be sentenced to death and those to be punished by a sentence less than death. This unguided discretion also led some capital juries to base their capital sentencing decisions on legally irrelevant factors such as the victim's or the offender's race or socioeconomic status. The pattern of sentencing that resulted from this unguided discretion was found by the Court to be both arbitrary, capricious, and discriminatory and, thus, in violation of "the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society"—one of the legal tests used by the Supreme Court to assess cruel and unusual punishment.

One of the great problems for the Court when invoking the evolving standards of decency test is to identify valid and reliable indicators of these evolving standards. Frequently the Court has examined the results of public opinion polls and social scientific research on opinions and attitudes. The Court, however, has not been particularly impressed with the accuracy of such polls. In fact, one of the first to criticize the validity of the results of public opinion polls on the level of support for capital punishment was former Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall, the first Black to be appointed to the U.S. Supreme Court. Ironically, Marshall not only presented a critique of these polls but also emphasized their importance.

Justice Marshall noted that capital punishment would be constitutionally invalid if the public abhorred it; furthermore, he argued that it was imperative for the Court to discern the sentiment of an informed public. He emphasized that the probative value of public opinion regarding capital punishment lay only in the opinions of those who were knowledgeable or informed. Marshall opined that support for the death penalty was largely the product of a lack of information about it, but, if the public were fully informed, the majority would conclude that capital punishment is immoral and unconstitutional. Marshall acknowledged one exception to this assertion: for those who support capital punishment for retributive reasons (i.e., eye for an eye, just desert, etc.), knowledge about the death penalty would not be persuasive.

Justice Marshall's claims regarding the effects of knowledge and information on public support for capital punishment are referred to as the "Marshall hypotheses." The hypotheses are as follows:

1. Support for capital punishment is associated with a lack of knowledge about it.
2. Exposure to information about capital punishment produces sentiments opposed to the death penalty.
3. Exposure to information about capital punishment will not influence the sentiments of those who support the death penalty for retributive reasons.

These assertions by Marshall opened a line of inquiry and led to a number of social scientific examinations into their validity.

To date, there have been at least 20 published tests of the Marshall hypotheses, and, while there have been many variations in the research methodologies employed, these studies have all tended to share several common methodological features: (a) a pretest measure of subjects' attitudes toward capital punishment, (b) exposure of at least some of the subjects to information about the death penalty, (c) a posttest measure of subjects' attitudes toward capital punishment, and (d) a comparison of the degree of change in opinion, if any, between subjects exposed to information and those not exposed. In most of these studies, the subjects were undergraduate college students, and the studies varied considerably in terms of both the quantity and quality of the subjects' exposure to capital punishment information. Many of these studies employed a simple one-group, pretest-posttest research design; others compared a treatment group (those exposed to information) to a control or comparison group that was not exposed to the death penalty information.

Despite the variation in research designs used across these studies, the results have tended to be supportive of the Marshall hypotheses, though they are also often mixed. That is,

1. Persons most supportive of capital punishment tend to be the least informed about it.
2. Exposure to information about capital punishment tends to reduce support for it.
3. Those who support capital punishment for retributive reasons tend to be immune to the effects of exposure to information.
4. Despite the effects of exposure on public sentiments toward the death penalty, the majority of the public tends to support the death penalty.
5. Exposure to information about the death penalty tends to polarize opinion such that many of those opposed to capital punishment tend to become more opposed, and several of those supportive of the death penalty tend to become more supportive of it after exposure to information.
6. Those who have publicly pronounced their sentiments for the death penalty are more resistant to changing their opinions after exposure to information.
7. Many initial beliefs about the death penalty, such as its general deterrent effects, tend to be resilient to information contrary to these beliefs.
8. When public sentiments toward the death penalty changed, the change was primarily due to exposure to information regarding the execution of innocent persons and to evidence of racial disparities in capital sentencing outcomes and processes.
9. When public sentiments toward the death penalty changed, the change tended to be slight in magnitude and to rebound to their original, preinformed position.
10. The pattern of findings mentioned does not appear to differ substantially across races, genders, and other social aggregates.

While generally supportive of the Marshall hypotheses, this body of research has not proven very compelling, at least with regard to its influence on subsequent Supreme Court cases regarding capital punishment. Since the reinstatement of capital punishment in 1976 following the Court's decision in Gregg v. Georgia, the Supreme Court Justices have relied on other indicators of public sentiment toward the death penalty in their effort to gauge the evolving standards of decency. Most commonly, the justices have relied on the proportion of states that have enacted the death penalty.

Despite the currently diminished salience of public opinion polls to the Supreme Court, such studies are salient for other reasons. First, they constitute a continuing area of study for many social scientists by providing us a near-real-time barometer of public sentiments on important political and social issues. Such data also allow these social scientists to test important hypotheses regarding the social forces and psychological processes of attitude formation and change. Second, public opinion data have very important influences on political processes. For instance, legislators might be swayed against the death penalty if a majority of their constituencies opposed capital punishment; likewise, strong public opposition to capital punishment might influence prosecutorial discretion against seeking the death penalty, and trial judges might feel pressured against sentencing capital offenders to death. Similarly, governors might be less inclined to support death penalty legislation and to sign execution warrants and more inclined to consider commutations and pardons from death row inmates. Finally, the fact that the current Court appears disinclined to consider the potential probative value of such polls does not mean that future Courts will be equally disinclined. Thus, continual work in this area of study remains necessary, including additional tests of the Marshall hypotheses. A badly needed element of such research is the extension of such studies into samples of the general population rather than the more common practice of relying upon undergraduate student samples.

John K. Cochran

See also Death Penalty; Furman v. Georgia; Gregg v. Georgia; Public Opinion, Death Penalty; Public Opinion, Punishment

Further Readings

- Bohm, R. M. (2007). Deathquest III. Cincinnati, OH: Anderson.
- Bohm, R. M., Clarke, L. J., & Aveni, A. F. (1991). Knowledge and death penalty opinion: A test of the Marshall hypotheses. Journal of Research in Crime and Delinquency, 28, 360–387.

Cochran, J. K., & Chamlin, M. B. (2005). Can information change public opinions? Another test of the Marshall hypotheses. Journal of Criminal Justice, 33, 573–584.

MARTINSVILLE SEVEN

The Martinsville Seven were a group of young Black men convicted of raping a White woman in Martinsville, Virginia. Frank Hairston, Booker Milner, Joe Henry Hampton, Howard Hairston, James Luther Hairston, John Taylor, and Francis DeSales Grayson were executed in February 1951 for the rape of 32-year-old Ruby Stroud Floyd. This was the first time the State of Virginia had executed so many men for a single rape incident, and the fact that all seven of the men were Black served as a reminder of the harsh treatment of Blacks who violated southern racial codes. This entry describes the crime committed by the Martinsville Seven as well as the subsequent trial and execution of the men.

Ruby Stroud Floyd was walking through the predominantly Black neighborhood of east Martinsville on January 8, 1949, in order to collect a debt that she was owed. Because Mrs. Floyd was unfamiliar with the area, she asked four young Black men—Frank Hairston, Booker Milner, Joe Henry Hampton, and Howard Hairston—for directions to the house that she was trying to locate. Milner directed her to the second house on the right, and Hampton commented that she “looked good enough to hug.” The other men ignored Hampton’s comment, assuming that he was joking, as the group had been drinking heavily that day. A few moments later, Mrs. Floyd walked past the men again, and Hampton approached her and put his arm around her. Mrs. Floyd began running, but Hampton and the other men pursued her into a wooded area and forced her to the ground. The four men took turns holding her down while the others raped and beat her. Eventually, Mrs. Floyd managed to escape the men and tried to get help from a woman who was walking down the street, but the men dragged her back into the woods. Around 6:00 p.m., James Luther Hairston, John Taylor, and Francis DeSales Grayson came upon the group and took turns raping Mrs. Floyd. After the assault, which lasted about 2 hours, the men left Mrs. Floyd alone in the wooded area. Mrs. Floyd left the scene and went to the nearby house of Jesse and Mary Wade for help. The police were called immediately, and by late Monday morning all seven men who had participated in the attack on Mrs. Floyd were in custody and had signed written confessions.

The case went to the Henry County Grand Jury in early April 1949, and all seven men were indicted on rape charges on April 11. According to Virginia law, the penalty for rape was death. Although Blacks who raped Whites at that time typically paid for their crimes with their lives, Judge Kennon Whittle insisted that the case would be tried in such a way that it would not disrupt the harmonious relationship between Blacks and Whites in the community. The defense had requested a change of venue for the trials, but the request was denied; Hampton, the first of the seven, was tried on April 21, 1949. Later that day, an all-White jury found Hampton guilty of rape. Over the next few days, the other six men were also tried and convicted for the rape of Mrs. Floyd. No Black man or woman sat on any of the juries for the seven men.

Although the juries had each taken a separate ballot for the penalty phase during the trial and had decided on death, there was the possibility that the court might show some mercy since no one had been killed during the attack. Judge Whittle, however, agreed with the juries and sentenced each of the seven men to be executed on July 15, 1949. The defense appealed all of the verdicts, condemning the court’s failure to grant a change of venue and the court’s willingness to execute Black men for the rape of a White woman, while no White man had ever been sentenced to death for the rape of a Black woman. The appeal was denied on all counts.

Many citizens of Martinsville felt that the penalties that had been imposed against the seven men were unfair, even though juries had the power to recommend the death penalty in rape cases in the state of Virginia. What caused a great deal more controversy than the sentence itself was the way in which the death penalty was applied in Virginia. Statistics showed that no White man convicted of rape had ever received the death penalty, while Blacks convicted of rape received the punishment fairly often. The defense took this and a plethora of additional evidence regarding the discriminatory application of the death penalty in Virginia to the court of appeals, but, again, the appeal was denied.

Throughout the summer and fall of 1950, support for the Martinsville Seven grew, and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and the Civil Rights Congress made efforts to rally additional support. Supporters obtained a number of stays of execution, which gave the defense team more time to prepare additional appeals. The New York Council of Arts held a vigil at the White House and presented a petition to President Harry Truman asking him to intervene and save the lives of the seven men. An appeal was made to Virginia Governor John S. Battle to commute the men's sentences to life in prison, but the governor declined. Shortly after, the U.S. Supreme Court denied a stay of execution and refused to hear the case for the third and final time.

By early February, thousands of letters and telegrams had been sent to Governor Battle's office and hundreds of people picketed the governor's Richmond mansion, hoping for a last-minute reversal. A few dozen supporters marched in protest outside of the prison on the day the seven men were scheduled to be executed. During the first week of February 1951, the Martinsville Seven were executed by electrocution.

Amanda K. Cox

See also African Americans; Coker v. Georgia; Death Penalty; Jury Selection; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); Sentencing Disparities, African Americans

Further Readings

- Gado, M. (2007). The Martinsville Seven. Retrieved from http://www.trutv.com/library/crime/notorious_murders/famous/martinsville_seven
- Rise, E. W. (1992). Race, rape, and radicalism: The case of the Martinsville Seven, 1949–1951. Journal of Southern History, 58, 461–491.
- Rise, E. W. (1995). The Martinsville Seven: Race, rape, and capital punishment. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia.

Zahm, D. L., & French, B. (1993). Equal protection and the death penalty in historical perspective: The case of the Martinsville Seven (Academically Speaking: Criminal Justice Related Research by Florida's Doctoral Candidates). Tallahassee: Florida Department of Law Enforcement.

MARYLAND V. WILSON

In Maryland v. Wilson (1997), the U.S. Supreme Court decided by a 7–2 majority that police officers can order passengers out of their vehicles without violating the Fourth Amendment, which prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures. This was an extension of the Court's previous decision in Pennsylvania v. Mimms (1977), which established the rule that it is not an unreasonable search or seizure for police officers to order drivers of lawfully stopped vehicles to exit their vehicles. The Wilson decision gave police officers the ability to stop vehicles and detain all the occupants for any justifiable reason. Some opponents of the Wilson decision argue that this ability contributes to "racial profiling," which is the inclusion of racial or ethnic characteristics in determining the likelihood that a person would commit a particular crime or illegal act.

At around 7:30 p.m. on June 8, 1994, a Maryland state trooper observed a motor vehicle speeding on the south side of Interstate 95 in Baltimore. The car did not have a regular license plate but instead had a torn Enterprise Rent-a-Car tag dangling from its rear. The trooper observed this and turned on his lights, signaling the driver to pull over. The driver continued down the highway for another mile and a half until pulling the car to the side of the road. During the pursuit, the trooper noticed that there were three occupants in the car and that the two passengers, one in the front seat and one in the rear, turned to look back at him several times, repeatedly ducking below his line of sight and then reappearing. As the trooper approached the car, the driver exited the vehicle and met him halfway. The driver was shaking and seemed to be nervous, but he showed the trooper a valid Connecticut driver's license. The trooper instructed the driver to return to the car and get the rental papers. During the traffic stop, the trooper noticed that the front seat passenger also appeared extremely nervous and jittery. While the driver was sitting in the driver's seat looking for the rental papers, the trooper ordered the passenger, Jerry Lee Wilson, out of the car. When Wilson exited the car, a significant amount of crack cocaine fell onto the ground. The trooper then placed Wilson under arrest for possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute.

Jerry Wilson filed a motion to suppress the evidence that was found when the officer ordered him out of the rental car, arguing that this constituted an unreasonable search and seizure under the Fourth Amendment. The Baltimore County Circuit Court granted the motion, and the Maryland Court of Special Appeals affirmed, holding that while Mimms allows officers to order drivers out of legally stopped vehicles, the law does not extend to passengers. The Supreme Court reversed this decision, ruling that officers may constitutionally order passengers out of legally stopped vehicles.

The Wilson Court's rationale followed its Mimms decision, which had held that vehicle passengers do not have Fourth Amendment protection from being ordered from their vehicles once a proper stop has been made. Chief Justice William Rehnquist, writing for the Wilson majority, stated that the "interest of an officer's safety makes asking a passenger to step out of a vehicle a mechanism for deterring a possible assault because a passenger can be equally as violent towards a cop as a driver." The Court also stated that "the passenger as a practical matter is already stopped by virtue of the vehicle being stopped." The Court decided that the intrusion is minimal and that vehicle passengers can pose a greater risk to police officers than vehicles without passengers.

Justice John Paul Stevens, joined by Justice Anthony Kennedy, acknowledged the danger created for police officers when they order someone out of a vehicle, noting that the risk of assault was increased when the passengers fear they are about to be snagged for some contraband that might be hidden on or around their bodies. The dissenters noted that police were at risk in only a miniscule number of the approximately 1 million traffic stops per year in Maryland. Thus, the benefit of allowing police to order passengers out of the car was marginal when weighted against the inconvenience for ordinary law-abiding citizens that would arise as a result of the ruling.

In a footnote of the majority opinion, the Court addressed the State of Maryland's request that the Court extend the ruling to allow officers to forcibly detain passengers throughout the stop. The Court pointed out that Wilson had not been subjected to detention based on the stopping of the car once he had stepped out; rather, he was arrested on the basis of probable cause—the belief that he was guilty of possession of cocaine with intent to distribute. Since the State of Maryland's position was not presented in Wilson, the Justices expressed no opinion on it. Therefore, it remains to be seen whether officers may forcibly detain passengers for the entire duration of the stop.

The Wilson case is significant for the topic of race and justice because it gave police officers and law enforcement agencies more discretion in traffic stops. They may now constitutionally order both drivers and passengers out of their vehicles without a warrant. The concern of many opponents of the Wilson decision is that this discretion may be abused and may lead to greater racial profiling.

Scott H. Belshaw

See also Profiling, Ethnic: Use by Police and Homeland Security; Profiling, Racial: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives; State v. Soto

Further Readings

Maryland v. Wilson, 519 U.S. 408 (1997).
 Pennsylvania v. Mimms, 434 U.S. 106 (1977).

MASCULINITY AND CRIME

It has long been recognized that men commit more crimes than do women, as reported by official law enforcement sources such as the FBI's Uniform Crime Report (UCR). The 2005 UCR demonstrates that this holds true for adult males as well as juveniles (under age 18). Although the arrest rates for the past 10 years have demonstrated a decrease in rates for men and an increase for women, the 2005 UCR data indicate that men still accounted for 76% of adult arrests. For the same year, 82% of violent crime arrestees were male, and males accounted for 68% of property crime arrests. Being male could be considered the single greatest predictor of criminal behavior. Scholars have explored this fact from a variety of approaches, examining how the concept of masculinity (or at least some malfunctioning types of masculinity) may account for this phenomenon. Obviously, not all males are criminals, and many criminals are indeed female. The notion of masculinity is associated with certain tendencies and characteristics that may not always be tied to an offender's physical sex.

The Criminal Male

It is so widely acknowledged that most crimes are committed by men that criminologists and other social scientists studying crime might not even consider sex or gender in explaining or predicting crime. It may seem such an obvious given premise that it may be missed entirely when theories of crime are developed. However, many scholars have recognized the importance of understanding the role of masculinity in crime. Traits such as toughness, defiance, dominance, power, and willingness to use violence have been identified as masculine traits that also serve as tendencies toward criminality. Research into gang activity has also demonstrated that projection of a tough, masculine persona is an integral part of peer acceptance within violent subcultures.

Scholars assert that because men hold different positions in society due to class, race, or social status, the manner in which they construct their masculinity will vary in accordance with their individual relationships and circumstances. Prominent researcher R. W. Connell developed the concept of hegemonic masculinity as an assertion of masculine tendencies that spins off into various effects, such as marginalizing the role of women. Although hegemonic masculinity is not thought to apply to most men, it represents a powerful force of global patriarchy that legitimizes male dominion over women. Although hegemonic masculinity does not explicitly condone violence, it assumes a legitimate use of force, and its effect has also been linked to the vast majority of crimes, including white-collar crimes. Proponents of the concept assert that hegemonic masculinity glorifies and normalizes the overall oppression of women by men and legitimizes it at a societal level.

Crime and masculinity have been historically linked, and early biological explanations held that traits associated with being male, such as dominance and aggression, were the result of evolutionary or physiological tendencies. Psycho-evolutionary perspectives hold that criminality among women was eventually suppressed by natural selection processes, just as aggressiveness was evolutionarily encouraged for men. However, the recent trend in rising criminality among women suggests that physiology and evolutionary processes may not be the sole factor in female offending. One study reports that female offenders scored higher on self-reported "masculinity" traits than did nonoffenders, although the source of these attitudes is not yet clear. Whether they come from overall cultural socialization, specific environmental influences (such as the upbringing or the experience of incarceration), or other sources, it is apparent that the idea of masculinity goes beyond one's actual physiological sex, at least when attempting to define masculinity for research purposes. Between 1996 and 2005 (the last year available at this time for complete FBI UCR reporting), women gained 7.4% in overall offense rates. The murder offense rates declined for women (-11.8%), but they did demonstrate an increase in aggravated assaults (+5.4%), burglaries (+5.5%), and other assault (+15.8%) offenses. Whether this is due to women becoming more "masculine" remains a subject to be explored by further research, but it is noteworthy that these offenses reflect a more aggressive, violent, and action-oriented dynamic than other offenses more traditionally associated with women, such as shoplifting.

It is also clear that physical strength alone does not account for the greater prevalence of male offending, because men also offend more than women in property and white-collar crimes. These offenses do not require physical power; nonetheless, they reflect "masculine" aspects of behavior such as toughness, aggressiveness, ruthlessness, and an orientation toward action.

Gender, Race, Class, and Crime

Prominent sociologist James Messerschmidt proposes that race, gender, and class provide the social structures within which criminal activities take place. Just as one's conceptions of how to regulate one's own behaviors can result in different types of masculinities or femininities, so can race and social class reflect differential criminal offending. Crime takes place within the structures of race, gender, and class. Therefore, one must look at the interaction of these variables when studying crime. Crime occurs through a complex series of relationships among these variables, according to Messerschmidt.

Because crime is generally recognized to be the result of many interacting correlations and causes, a single trait such as one's gender cannot adequately explain the phenomenon. Furthermore, it has been reported that the factors associated with "masculinity," such as aggressiveness, dominion, and "toughness," can also appear in women, although to a lesser statistical degree than in men. Many aspects of masculinity are not necessarily violent or criminal, however. Soldiers who serve bravely and honorably in combat, law enforcement officers who risk their own safety to defend helpless citizens against violent aggressors, and firefighters who rush into burning buildings exhibit positive aspects of these same behavioral traits. Although being male is probably the single most powerful predictor of crime, defining and exploring how masculinity is related to crime remains an open area of research for social scientists.

David R. Champion

See also Biological Theories; Hypermasculinity; Violent Females

Further Readings

- Connell, R. W. (1987). Gender and power. Oxford, UK: Polity Press.
- Herrington, V., & Nee, C. (2005). Self-perceptions, masculinity and female offenders. Internet Journal of Criminology. Available at <http://www.internetjournalofcriminology.com>
- Messerschmidt, J. W. (1993). Masculinities and crime. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Messerschmidt, J. W. (1997). Crime as structured action: Gender, race, class and crime in the making. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

McCLESKEY V. KEMP

McCleskey v. Kemp was the last serious challenge to the death penalty in the United States based on race. Numerous criminal justice issues are addressed by this case: equal protection, the application of the death penalty, jury discretion, the use of academic research in court, and racial discrimination. After reviewing the facts of the case, this entry examines all of the critical issues presented during McCleskey's appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Facts of the Case

On October 12, 1978, Warren McCleskey and three other Black men robbed a furniture store. All four men were armed when they entered the store. The employees were gathered and tied, while store patrons were forced to lie face down on the floor. During the course of the robbery, a White police officer entered the store, called by a silent alarm triggered from within the store. The officer was shot twice and died from the wound. McCleskey left the scene of the crime before the authorities arrived.

Weeks later, McCleskey was arrested for another offense. He confessed to being involved in the robbery of the furniture store. The bullet that struck the officer matched the gun that McCleskey had in his possession at the time of the robbery. There were also two witnesses who said they heard McCleskey admit that he had shot the officer. McCleskey was tried in Fulton County, Georgia, and convicted of murder. The jury sentenced him to death.

Basis for McCleskey's Appeal

McCleskey took his case to the U.S. Supreme Court in the hopes of having his death sentence reversed. McCleskey had two grounds upon which he felt the sentence had violated his constitutional rights. First, he felt that the Georgia capital punishment laws violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. McCleskey argued that the Georgia court had violated his rights by giving him the death sentence based on the fact that he was a Black man accused of killing a White man. He felt that race played more of a part in determining the outcome of his case than did the facts, and that his sentence was disproportionate to other similarly situated offenders. Second, McCleskey argued that the death penalty was cruel and unusual punishment and thus forbidden by the Eighth Amendment. He claimed that the death penalty in Georgia was being applied in a discriminatory manner. Moreover, it was an arbitrary system that allowed too much discretion on the part of the juries to impose sentences.

To support this belief, McCleskey introduced a study published by Baldus, Woodworth, and Pulaski (1990) to make a prima facie case of racial discrimination. The Baldus study had gathered information on approximately 2,500 murder cases tried in Georgia in the 1970s. After controlling for more than 200 factors, the results showed that race had had a significant effect on the sentencing of offenders. The results of the study showed that Blacks who killed Whites had a greater likelihood than Whites of receiving the death penalty. This strongly suggested racial bias on the part of the state when sentencing minority offenders and therefore violated constitutional rights.

The Court's Opinion

Ultimately, the Court rejected McCleskey's claims and upheld his sentence. The court outlined several reasons for disagreeing with McCleskey's rationale. The Court felt that the use of discretion in determining sentences was one of the components of the U.S. justice system that made it unique. The fact that juries are able to consider the circumstances surrounding a crime and make a decision individually tailored to each case is a foundational part of the system. Defendants are given the right to introduce mitigating circumstances for sentencing considerations. The Court did not want to eliminate this right but instead wanted to preserve it. Otherwise, it would be far too easy for the judicial system to become one in which predetermined sanctions were imposed for each offense and meted out to individuals regardless of the circumstances. The Court felt that would be an even bigger injustice to those brought before the Court in the future. It would also completely change the makeup of the system.

The justices did not agree with McCleskey's argument that the lower court had too much discretion in his particular case. After the Furman decision, in an effort to reduce the amount of discretion a jury had, guidelines were implemented for all juries to follow. Under Georgia law, in order to impose a death sentence, 1 or more of 10 possible aggravating circumstances had to be present. In this particular case, two of these factors were present: the murder was committed during a robbery, and it was committed against a peace officer performing official duties. Due to these circumstances, the court was reasonably and legally able to sentence McCleskey to death.

This rationale had also been upheld in Gregg v Georgia in 1976, when it was determined that these guidelines effectively channeled jury discretion. The court in McCleskey's case acknowledged that race (as well as other factors) might play a part in sentencing decisions. However, the court could not find a way to censor discretion in this case without destroying other "acceptable" forms of discretion. Noting that all systems have the potential for some sort of problems, the Court had done its part to be as fair as possible and preserve the integrity of the system. Regardless, the Court felt that McCleskey had not successfully shown that there was evidence of bias in his particular case that had affected his sentencing outcome.

Implications

There would have been serious ramifications had the Court allowed McCleskey's sentence to be overturned. The Baldus study did suggest that sentencing practices in Georgia were racially biased. The Court did not question the validity of the study, but it saw potential problems with acceptance of this information as evidence of wrongdoing. A decision in favor of McCleskey would have meant that the Court acknowledged that the bias in the judicial system was serious enough to cause long-term problems. It would have required states to take long looks at their systems and determine where they needed to make changes. It would have suggested that the system needed to be overhauled, or at least studied, to determine exactly where these potential discriminatory practices were entering the system.

There was another consequence of overturning McCleskey's death sentence. If he was successful in getting his sentence overturned based on the racial disparities in the system, there would be nothing to prohibit subsequent defendants sentenced to death from making similar claims. Anyone could present studies similar to the Baldus study as a basis for having their death sentences overturned. The acceptance of this study as sufficient evidence of wrongdoing would have essentially overturned the death penalty as a viable option in the United States. For this reason, this case marked one of the last major challenges to the death penalty for adults in the United States.

Kenethia L. McIntosh

See also Baldus Study; Death Penalty; Furman v. Georgia; Gregg v. Georgia

Further Readings

- Baldus, D., Woodworth, G., & Pulaski, A., Jr. (1990). Equal justice and the death penalty: A legal and empirical analysis. Boston: Northeastern University Press.
- McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279 (1987).

MCVEIGH, TIMOTHY (1968–2001)

On April 19, 1995, the United States was shaken when the federal courthouse in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, was destroyed by a truck bomb set by Timothy McVeigh. This tragic event has since become known as the Oklahoma City bombing. The resulting initial law enforcement activity and blame initially suggested by various media outlets and political authorities highlighted the continuing problems of race relations and assumptions about race and crime in America.

Background

Timothy McVeigh was a decorated U.S. Army veteran and a Caucasian male. McVeigh, after his discharge from the military, apparently became involved with various militia activities and came under the influence of right-wing authors and works, including the Turner Diaries, well known for their message of hate and revolution against the U.S. government. However, he had no criminal record. After engaging in extensive planning and preparation, McVeigh drove a Ryder rental truck filled with explosives to the federal courthouse in Oklahoma City and detonated it. Numerous innocent people were injured, and 169 people were killed in this act of domestic terrorism.

After leaving Oklahoma City, McVeigh was arrested by an Oklahoma state trooper on unrelated traffic and firearms charges and was brought to a local jail. At that time, law enforcement had no idea that McVeigh was one of the persons responsible for the Oklahoma City bombing.

Two days later a connection was made between McVeigh and the bombing. At that time, the federal authorities took custody of McVeigh to hold him on suspicion of the bombing. But what happened during the course of the investigation until McVeigh became the prime suspect raises serious questions about the perspective of American law enforcement concerning race.

The Investigation

Almost immediately after the bombing occurred, the media and the political authorities were rife with theories about the cause of the bombing. Numerous media outlets, including the respected United Press International (UPI), reported that people of Middle Eastern descent were possible perpetrators of this tragic occurrence of domestic terrorism. The San Diego Union-Tribune reported some of these occurrences. Cable News Network (CNN) reported that three Middle Eastern-type men had been seen in downtown Oklahoma City at the time of the bombing. The State Department and the Pentagon made public promises to send Arabic translators to Oklahoma City to help with the investigation. An Oklahoma state representative, Dave McCurdy, charged that there was clear evidence of Muslim fundamentalist involvement. All of these statements were untrue and were based on the incorrect assumption of race-connected criminal activity.

The furor resulted in the arrest of an Oklahoma City resident of Middle Eastern descent, Abraham Ahmad. The UPI provided a succinct summation of the facts. Ahmad had left Oklahoma City to travel to Jordan. He was detained in Chicago and questioned for 6 hours before he was allowed to continue on his flight. He was then detained in London, England, and sent back to the United States, where he was forced to undergo further questioning, even though he had had nothing to do with the bombing. Apparently, the only link Ahmad had to the bombing, which was shown to be illusory, was his race and national origin.

The Problem

Ahmad's arrest was a function of his race—nothing more. Despite the known growth of right-wing militia movements in America, which were fueled by the tragedy in Waco, Texas, 2 years before April 19, 1995, there was an assumption that the perpetrators of the Oklahoma City bombing were Middle Eastern or Muslim.

The history of race relations and criminal justice in America is not a secret. There exists a well-documented prejudice against African Americans and other racial minorities in the American criminal justice system that includes disproportionate stops, disproportionate arrests, disproportionate convictions, and disproportionate punishments. Much of these preconviction violations involve racial profiling, which is highly relevant to the situation involving Timothy McVeigh.

Attempts have been made to address this problem through training, legislation, and judicial decisions, one of the most notable decisions being Mapp v. Ohio in 1961. Indeed, starting in the 1960s, numerous statutes have been enacted to address the problem of racial discrimination. These efforts have met with varying degrees of success; however, racial discrimination is still present in the criminal justice system.

Timothy McVeigh is symbolic of this continuing problem. McVeigh was White and was not considered to be a perpetrator of the Oklahoma City bombing until direct evidence linking him to the crime was obtained. However, Abraham Ahmad, a Jordanian American who was not even indirectly linked to the Oklahoma City bombing, was detained, extensively questioned, released, then arrested again, and transported back from a foreign country simply because his race was considered a sufficient basis to detain and interrogate him. Even though it had been 30 years since the Warren Court and the start of the revolution in race relations until the date of the Oklahoma City bombing, the situation involving Timothy McVeigh demonstrates that there is still much to be done. Racial discrimination continues to have a disproportionate effect in the criminal justice system on racial minorities in America.

William C. Plouffe, Jr.

See also Discrimination–Disparity Continuum; Disproportionate Arrests; Mapp v. Ohio; Militias; Profiling, Ethnic: Use by Police and Homeland Security; Profiling, Racial: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives; White Crime

Further Readings

- Campbell, J. R. (1995, November 9). Government sued in bombing probe. UPI. Available at <http://lexisnexis.com>
- Goldsborough, J. O. (1995, April 27). The real bomb culprits: Home grown boys and guns. The San Diego Union-Tribune. Available at <http://lexisnexis.com>
- Kirkland, M. (1995, April 21). Justice will probe harassment of Arabs. UPI. Available at <http://lexisnexis.com>
- Serrano, R. A. (1998). One of ours: Timothy McVeigh and the Oklahoma City bombing. New York: Norton.
- Smith, D. (1998). Passenger profiling: A greater terror than terrorism itself? John Marshall Law Review, 32, 167.

MEDIA, PRINT

The audience for print news media is decidedly different from the television news media audience. Those who read newspapers are more likely to have a higher degree of education and higher economic status than persons who rely on television news. This entry discusses print media and its presentation of images and depictions of race and crime.

During the 18th and 19th centuries, American newspapers were very different from those of today. Newspapers were geared toward an elite audience and were highly subjective. In 1833,

The New York Sun was the first to produce a newspaper for a wider audience; this led to the creation of a new form of highly sensationalistic journalism. This ratings-g geared style of journalism is still present today, cloaked by a claim to objectivity. Then and now, news media are owned and operated mostly by Whites, which can create a bias in reporting. Even well-intentioned journalists may rely on racist or stereotypical themes and narratives.

More recently there has been a transformation of the print media industry. Newspapers are increasingly owned by a few large corporations and are geared toward a wide audience. Advertising typically constitutes 50% or more of newspaper content and, according to the Newspaper Association of America, it accounts for 75% to 80% of a newspaper's revenue. In an effort to capture audiences with the spending power to purchase advertisers' products and services, newspapers and magazines try to appeal to readers whom they think will have the greatest buying power. News that is covered is primarily local and more in-depth than television news. Minorities are not completely absent from print media; for example, today there are more than 200 Black newspapers published in the United States, and according to the Latino Print Network, Spanish-language newspapers had a circulation of 17.8 million in 2006. Nevertheless, the modern news landscape is made up primarily of Whites. Media ownership tends to be even less diverse than the newsrooms. This creates a climate in which the interests of minorities are often underrepresented if not ignored.

The Image of Race and Crime

While the news media do not tell their audiences what to think, they are quite adept at telling their audiences what to think about. In terms of race and crime, the media set non-White criminal acts as a political issue and emphasize that non-Whites are a problem that must be addressed. This is evident in print media's setting the agenda with the issues of poor African American neighborhoods, illegal Latina/o immigrants, and Islamic terrorists. Non-White perpetrators of crime and White victims are grossly overrepresented in the media, despite the availability of accurate crime statistics. The print media, in effect, set an agenda of issues and events in our social consciousness regardless of reality, which often reinforces stereotypes and creates misplaced fear.

The National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, better known as the Kerner Commission, reported in 1968 that the media failed in reporting what life was like for Blacks in America by failing to show Black Americans as a regular part of society. Instead, Black Americans were portrayed in a way that promoted stereotypes and reinforced prejudicial attitudes. In addition, the committee found that the media did not correctly report underlying conditions and problems with regard to race relations. Furthermore, the Kerner Commission believed that it was the job of the media to make the realities of race relations known to White Americans. For example, the commission found that while newspapers covered racial protests in the 1960s, they did not report the causes of the protests. This is evident in the coverage of the 1965 Selma to Montgomery march that was led by Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. The New York Times reported the march on its front page and in some of the inside pages of the paper, but it did not give background information on the low number of Black registered voters and the obstacles faced by African Americans when they tried to register.

While the press is supposed to be a neutral source of information, members of the press rely heavily on the use of "sources" or contacts for their reported information. These sources are often quoted and stories are slanted toward their recount and perception of events. Often these sources do not reflect the opinions and perceptions of the Black community.

Depictions of Race and Crime

The news media frame how crime issues are presented to the public and contribute to our beliefs about crime. Most members of the general public do not witness crime firsthand. Instead, they rely on second-hand information presented by the media. Print media often state the race of the victim, the particulars of the crime, and the neighborhood in which the crime took place. There is less room for graphic or suggestive imagery, which makes word choice important. This was evident during the 2005 Hurricane Katrina, when in some media sources Black residents of New Orleans were described as looting and stealing food, while their White counterparts were described as finding food.

Communication researchers explain such phenomena in terms of episodic framing that focuses on crime events as singular and random occurrences without putting the story in context. Television news lends itself to this type of coverage and tends to disproportionately show non-White perpetrators committing “random” acts of violence on White victims. Thematic framing, on the other hand, provides a broader context; print media lend themselves well to this format. Crime may be put into a greater context of poverty, drug abuse, and systematically racist policies. However, print media still tend to segregate non-Whites and Whites by using racist narratives that place non-Whites as a problem to be dealt with by White leaders.

Gwendelyn S. Nisbett and Jennifer Hartsfield

See also Fear of Crime; Hurricane Katrina; Media Portrayals of African Americans; Media Portrayals of Asian Americans; Media Portrayals of Latina/o/s; Media Portrayals of Native Americans; Media Portrayals of White Americans; Television News

Further Readings

- Entman, R. M. (1993). Framing: Toward clarification of a fractured paradigm. Journal of Communication, 43, 51–58.
- Johnson-Cartee, K. S. (2005). News narratives and news framing: Constructing political reality. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Lotz, R. (1991). Crime and the American press. New York: Praeger.
- Martindale, C. (1986). The White press in Black America. Westport, CT: Greenwood.
- Radford, B. (2003). Media mythmakers: How journalists, activists, and advertisers mislead us. Amherst, NY: Prometheus.
- Stabile, C. A. (2006). White victims, Black villains: Gender, race, and culture. New York: Routledge.

MEDIA PORTRAYALS OF AFRICAN AMERICANS

The media have long been known to influence the public’s view of crime, and the media’s depictions of race and crime have interested social scientists for decades. African Americans are portrayed by the media in many diverse ways, some positive, some negative. This entry examines social scientists’ and media consultants’ assessment of factors that influence media portrayals of African Americans and contrasts the media’s portrayal of African Americans, crime, and police for the general population with media portrayals by African Americans themselves that are aimed at promoting positive images and countering negative stereotypes.

Background

In the 1950s, television became greatly influenced by the economic class system. The media portrayal of African Americans and crime to the general public was no exception to this class system’s influence. Hidden audience research, news consultant firms, and the Warner Class Model (which proposed that Americans could be divided into six classifications: upper class, upper middle class, lower middle class, upper lower class, middle lower class, and lower class) has greatly influenced the way the media began to portray events and the content of news programming. Mass communication agencies and journalists contend that the Warner Class Model changed television forever.

This model was then used by a research institute at the University of Chicago, called Social Research, Inc. (SRI), to fashion a model for television executives to determine what type of programming should be used in presenting news. Media executives were informed that the great majority of Americans were in the lower class and thus would form their largest viewing public. Research consultants told executives that the majority of Americans watching television did not have a college degree, maintained menial positions of employment, and planned family gatherings around media programming. This research, however, painted an overly simplistic image of the average viewer. With the help of focus groups and field surveys, the researchers went so far as to indicate that the common viewer preferred pictorials, enjoyed storytelling, and found the didactic reading of news reports uninteresting and confusing. They determined that the lower class was “living with television.” This spurred a frenzy of “eyewitness news” media tools as viable methods for reaching the identified lower-class viewer. Networks began to use pictures, graphic images, and oversimplified versions of news content to report crime to its viewers. Today, researchers contend that this type of news programming oversimplifies issues and bombards the audience with visual images that further promote the use of stereotypical and fictitious depictions of African Americans and crime.

“Eyewitness” news boomed in the 1960s when it seized on the civil rights movement. Images of African Americans being assaulted and sprayed with fire hoses by local law enforcement officers, and stories of children killed in church bombings, filtered into living rooms across the country.

Depictions of African Americans and Crime

Social scientists, race theorists, and criminologists have long held interest in the media’s influence on the perception of African Americans and criminalization. Theorists purport that news media and crime dramas disproportionately align violence with African Americans.

Media Portrayal of African American Victims and Perpetrators

Studies show the media pay more attention to wealthy or affluent victims than to economically disadvantaged victims. Nevertheless, when accounting for economics and other social factors, news broadcasts overly represent African American perpetrators while underrepresenting African American victims, according to Robert M. Entman and Andrew Rojecki. These social scientists contend that studies conducted in the 1990s in Chicago, Los Angeles, and other markets across the nation documented a racial skew in the portrayal of violence and crime in the news media: reports indicated that news media disproportionately portrayed Whites as victims, although African Americans were more likely to be victimized. Consequently, more airtime was devoted to stories featuring White victims. In fact, the time spent on White victims as compared to African American victims was 3 to 1.

Researchers nationwide have noted the tendency of media to underreport crimes against African Americans. When examining the news media’s portrayal of African American victims, the story of Terrell Pough caught many researchers’ interest. Terrell Pough was featured in People magazine in 2005. The magazine honored Pough for being a young, single, African American father. Pough attended school while working two jobs, inspired by the love of his toddler daughter, whom he cared for by himself. The media proclaimed Pough an example for men of all races. The Philadelphia 76ers honored both Pough and his daughter at a basketball game. Pough was reportedly offered gifts, a car, and jobs following his feature in People. Pough was brutally murdered outside his Germantown, Philadelphia, apartment on November 17, 2005. The media’s response to Pough’s death, according to journalist Jill Porter of the Philadelphia Daily News, is an indication of how African American victims are valued less than White victims. Pough was allegedly killed for failure to pay for a large shipment of cocaine. The media signaled their disapproval by a lack of interest and scant coverage of Pough’s killers’ trial and of African American communities’ outrage at his death. Although Pough had been treated as a hero, the media’s depiction of him quickly changed upon the accusation of his involvement in the sale of illegal drugs.

Media Portrayal of African American Perpetrators

Even if the media portrayals of African Americans in violent stories are accurate, the fact that they are done so disproportionately and without contextual explanation further exacerbates and promotes negative stereotyping of African Americans and crime. Studies show that African American suspects are 4 times as likely to be depicted in the media by a police “mug shot” than White suspects, for whom a family, class, or work photo is used. Data also showed that local news programs provided an onscreen name for Whites accused of violence. In fact, a 1993–1994 study showed that in 47% of cases when Whites were accused of violence, pictorials included their names. Only 26% of cases when African Americans were accused of violence included pictorials with names. Social scientists argue the absence of a suspect’s name implies the person’s identity does not matter, lending credibility to the stereotypical implication that “Blacks are all alike.”

Additionally, African American suspects are often shown in police custody, handcuffed and/or in prison attire. Often, pictorials of African Americans are also more violent and less humanistic than those of Whites accused of the same crimes.

Depiction of White Police Authority

Media consultants and social scientists examined the depiction of police authority and control as it influences the media's portrayal of African Americans and crime. The image of White police authority, according to the research, is portrayed as more valid and credible than are the images of police from Black and other groups. Studies show that in 95% of news stories in which a White was accused of a crime, the media sought White police officers for comment. African American officers were rarely used as consultants. Studies indicate that even when African Americans were accused, African American officers were sought for comment only 35% of the time. African Americans are frequently displayed in the custody of Whites, but the reverse situation is rarely if ever shown.

Several studies have been conducted on the media's influence in cases such as California v. Powell. This famous case, recognizable to the general public as the case involving Rodney King and the Los Angeles Police Department (LAPD), has been credited with inciting the 1991 Los Angeles riots. On March 3, 1991, members of the LAPD were filmed kicking and striking King 56 times with their batons, along with stunning him twice with an electric Taser gun. This amateur videotape flooded American living rooms with images of law enforcement brutally arresting an African American male. Reports stated that the public anxiously awaited verdicts that would condemn the actions of the Los Angeles Police Department. When the jury verdicts of acquittal were announced, news media reported shocked and surprised responses from communities around the nation, while legal specialists and commentators explained that the video shown in court depicted a violent and uncontrollable Rodney King that justified the officers' tactics. Researchers once again noted how quickly the media's interest switched from King to law enforcement's response to King. Although a civil suit followed and some of the officers involved were held accountable for their actions, the media's lack of response, some experts contend, was an indication of the media's minimal interest in Black victims.

Depiction of Negative African American Role Models

Scientists have acknowledged an additional perspective and classification for evaluating the media's portrayals of African Americans and crime. Portrayals of African Americans and crime that are created and designed by African Americans themselves, often with the goal of influencing African American viewers, differ from those created by White producers for the general viewer. Race theorists contend that the media play a role in forming individuals' self- and salient identities. Production of media by and for African Americans is necessary to decrease negative stereotyping and influence positive social change. Many race theorists argue that African Americans influence the promotion of positive African American images and crime when they are given the opportunity to provide positive role modeling.

Although critics recognize the influence of positive role modeling and its increase in positive media portrayals of African Americans and crime, some theorists argue that the media continue to promote negative stereotypes. According to some racial critics, African American writers, producers, and artists have contributed to these factors. Social and racial theorists argue that the images of African Americans used in rap and hip hop videos further contribute to the negative stereotypes promoted in the media. Explicit lyrics that describe the brutal killing of rival gang members and the aggressive, sexual African American male are commonly found in rap music videos and films. The images of African American males as gangsters and drug lords promulgate stereotypes of African Americans as criminals.

Recently, African American journalists and other media researchers have examined contentions that popularized criminal cases such as the O. J. Simpson trial, and the media's coverage of these events has polarized Americans along racial lines. African Americans eagerly awaited the jury verdict in the Simpson trial because it would indicate whether an African American could receive a fair trial either in the media or in a court of law. However, many researchers today are suggesting that Americans' responses to this publicized trial, although they appear to be divided along racial lines, stem less from allegiance (or lack thereof) with the race of the accused and more from an increased distrust of the criminal justice system as it appears to favor the wealthy.

Conclusion

Public attitudes about race and crime are subject to many influences. Two clear perspectives emerge from research on the media's portrayal of African Americans and crime: (1) portrayals of African Americans and crime for general viewing has been predicated on economic class and the "eyewitness" news format, and (2) the media created by African Americans for African Americans continues to seek a balance between the economic pressure of creating profitable media and the aim of providing positive role modeling for African Americans. Researchers continue to watch for diverse trends in the media's portrayal of African Americans and crime and continue to search for its meaning within the communities that they represent.

Allison M. Cotton and Rhonda Ntepp

See also Blaxploitation Films; King, Rodney; Media Portrayals of White Americans; Race Relations; Racial Hoax

Further Readings

- Entman, R., & Rojecki, A. (2000). The Black image in the White mind: Media and race in America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Newkirk, P. (2000). Within the veil: Black journalists, White media. New York: New York University Press.
- Roberts, G., & Kliganoff, K. (2006). The race beat: The press, the civil rights struggle and the awakening of a nation. New York: Knopf.
- Wortley, S., Hagan J., & Macmillan, R. (1997). Just des(s)erts? The racial polarization of perceptions of criminal justice. Law & Society Review, 31, 637-676.

MEDIA PORTRAYALS OF ASIAN AMERICANS

Historically, media portrayals of Asian Americans have been ambivalent. Asian Americans have been depicted either as a threat—the "yellow peril"—or as a role model for other minority groups. In the late 19th century, Asian Americans were considered a threat because of their differences in physical characteristics, cultures, and work ethics from those of Whites and European Americans. In the 1960s, the term model minority emerged, casting Asian Americans as role models because of their accomplishments. Asian Americans were recognized by the media for their success in business and education; this success was attributed to Asian Americans' close-knit family ties, moral values, and diligent work habits. These two stereotypes are the basis for media portrayal of Asian Americans in movies and television sitcoms, television news, magazines, and newspapers. This entry examines the accomplishments of Asian Americans and how the images depicted of them (favorable or not) have affected their status in the United States.

Accomplishments by Asian Americans

Asian Americans have made some notable accomplishments in the United States. In education, 83.3% of Asian Americans have graduated from high school and 43.6% hold bachelor's degrees or higher, in comparison to European Americans' percentages of 80.7% and 24.6%, Blacks' percentages of 74.3% and 15.1%, and Hispanics' percentages of 55.5% and 10.0%, respectively. As to social-economic status, Asian Americans have a higher annual income level of $64,238, compared with Whites', Blacks', and Hispanics' income levels of $52,423, $31,969, and $37,781, respectively. Besides having attained higher education and income compared with other racial groups, Asian Americans have reportedly the lowest percentage of arrest rate at 1.1%.

Because of these significant achievements, Asian Americans have since the 1960s been portrayed by the media as a "model minority." Historically, however, Asian Americans have not always been portrayed so positively; as noted earlier, they had been labeled the “yellow peril”—a threat to Whites culturally, economically, politically, and militarily.

The Yellow Peril Versus the Model Minority

The term yellow peril was believed to have been coined in the late 19th century by the German Kaiser, Wilhelm II. At this time and in the early 20th century, White Americans in the United States were in fear of the massive Asian population migrating from the Philippines, India, and especially from China and Japan. Yuko Kawai has observed that these Asian immigrants were considered an economic threat to U.S. workers, and their cultural differences were seen as endangering American culture.

Shah noted that many Asians leased unwanted swamp land and made it arable for agricultural purposes, so they succeeded in the produce business. Asians were also competing against unskilled poor Whites for cheap labor. Asians’ willingness to work hard angered many White Americans. The Asian Exclusion League (AEL) was formed in 1905 to expel all Asians from the United States and prevent any more Asian immigrants from entering the country. At the same time, a negative view of Asians was being portrayed in an article in The New York Times that alleged that the Chinese were a threat to the United States as a nation because they were uncivilized people with social vices who had no knowledge or appreciation of free institutions or constitutional liberty. Notwithstanding such portrayals, Asian immigrants remained in the United States, although still considered to be foreigners; and the negative image of the “yellow peril” continued to influence American attitudes.

In the 1960s, the media constructed the model minority stereotype to describe Asian Americans. In 1966, William Petersen wrote an article in the New York Times Magazine titled “Success Story, Japanese-American Style” to recognize Japanese Americans’ achievement of success on their own. Petersen was given credit for coining the term model minority in this article. Kawai notes that at the end of 1966, another model minority article about Chinese Americans moving ahead on their own without anyone’s help, titled “Success Story of One Minority in U.S.,” appeared in U.S. News and World Report. These two articles initiated the positive stereotype of Asian Americans that is still prevalent today.

The media depict Asian Americans as the model minority groups, with attributes such as having close-knit families, being law-abiding citizens, and dedicating their best efforts to education and work. Asian American parents instill in their children moral values, proper conduct, and the importance of education. In 1986, Anthony Ramirez stated in a Fortune magazine article, “America’s Super Minority,” that Asian American children scored higher than White American children in various academic, cognitive, and intelligence tests; they received As more often and received failing grades less often than White American children. Due to the portrayals of Asian Americans as being serious about work and education, which has led to their success, they are seen as silent, disciplined, and serious, although sometimes socially inept. Asian Americans are considered fierce competitors in the workplace, academia, and the economy.

Asian Americans in the Media

Asian Americans in the Film Industries and Television Sitcoms

In investigating the yellow peril and model minority stereotypes, Hemant Shah found that there are four common images the film industries use to portray Asian Americans. In movies and television sitcoms, Asian Americans are depicted as the yellow peril and the Charlie Chan for males, and the dragon lady and the lotus blossom for females.

The yellow peril image was used in the early 20th century in Hollywood to portray Asian American men as menacing, predatory, and lusting after White American women. Throughout American film history, Asian American men have been given roles such as frosty killers, martial artists, and cunning villains. According to Shah, movies such as Broken Blossoms and The Cheat showed Asian men as a threat to Americans. The yellow peril character could be seen in some more recent films such as Big Trouble in Little China (1986) featuring James Hong, Peter Kwong, Carter Wong, and James Pax; Lethal Weapon 4 (1998) featuring Jet Li; and Rising Sun (1993) featuring Cary-Hiroyuki Tagawa.

In 1936, Hollywood created the positive image of Charlie Chan to illustrate the benign and mysterious Chinese. In movies, the Charlie Chan character was often a mysterious man with awesome powers of deduction and wisdom. He is quiet, unassertive, and nonthreatening to White Americans. The Charlie Chan image remains very popular, appearing in recent movies like the Rush Hour series (1998, 2001, 2007) featuring Jackie Chan; Romeo Must Die (2000), The One (2001), and Kiss of the Dragon (2001) featuring Jet Li; and The Replacement Killers (1998) and Bulletproof Monk (2003) featuring Chow Yun Fat.

The female version of the yellow peril is identified as the dragon lady. This term was used by a journalist to describe the late 19th-century Chinese empress Tsu Hsi, who arranged the poisoning, strangling, beheading, or forced suicide of anyone who challenged her rule. In the movies, Asian American women were portrayed as evil, sneaky, mean, and a threat to White American women because they are sexually alluring and seductive to White men. The dragon lady image illustrates an Asian woman who is desirable yet dangerous and untrustworthy. The dragon lady character can be seen in movies such as Payback (1999) and Kill Bill (2003), and television shows Ally McBeal (1997–2002), featuring Lucy Liu, and Gray's Anatomy, featuring Sandra Oh.

The opposite of the dragon lady is the lotus blossom. By the end of World War II, the film industries began to show positive representations of Japan and the Japanese in relation to the United States. From this context, the lotus blossom image emerged to portray Asian American women as beautiful and exotic, yet submissive, meek, faithful, and eager to fulfill their men's needs. Recent movies such as The Samurai featuring Koyuki, Memoirs of a Geisha featuring Ziyi Zhang, and the 1969–1972 television show Courtship of Eddie's Father, featuring Miyoshi Umeki, depicted Asian American women with the lotus blossom's attributes.

Asian Americans on Television News

Asian Americans have had very limited exposure on television news as anchors and/or reporters, subjects, and sources. In fact, only 2% of Asian Americans are second-chair anchors, who speak after the head anchors in reporting the news. In the past 3 decades, there have been only a few Asian American anchors and/or reporters appearing on national television. For instance, Connie Chung started her career in 1973 with CBS News and since then has worked with NBC News, Evening News with Dan Rather, and ABC 20/20. Julie Chen is another Asian American anchorwoman who appears in CBS programs such as the The Early Show, CBS Morning News, and Big Brother. In addition, Lisa Ling was known for her appearance in The View on ABC and is currently working for the National Geographic Channel.

In most places the news itself shows Asian Americans as a minute presence, since only 1% of the news stories have an Asian American focus. Further, 60% of stories reported by the local television news in which the race of the perpetrators is revealed are crime related. It was noted that only 1% of the perpetrators mentioned in these stories were Asian Americans. These numbers further stress the media's portrayals of Asian Americans as the model minority in that they are law-abiding citizens.

Asian Americans in U.S. Newspapers

Wu and Izard completed a study to determine whether Asian American journalists contribute to news stories related to Asian Americans. One of the research findings indicated that newspapers in cities with large Asian American populations tend to hire more Asian American staff members. The research also found that the number of Asian American journalists positively related to the number of stories about Asian Americans, meaning that Asian American journalists are more likely to have an Asian focus in their news stories.

Within a wide variety of news coverage, Asian American news stories often involve issues of culture and immigration. Cultural events and reviews of movies, live theater, and concerts reportedly have the most news coverage. Immigration issues such as immigration procedures and issuing of student visas ranked after cultural topics in coverage. Ranking third were stories of Asian Americans in the community who are successful and prominent in their businesses. Education, domestic politics, food, and social issues in the Asian community were also covered.

Asian Americans in Magazines

Magazines have certain ways in which they choose to represent Asian Americans in advertisements, all essentially in keeping with the model minority image. Brendan Coats and Silvia Knobloch-Westerwick found that Asian Americans were underrepresented in magazines, in that Asian American models showed up in only 7% of ads in magazine for the general public and 12% of ads in magazines favored by Asian American readers. Research by Hye Jin Paek and Hemant Shah pointed out that 10.3% of magazine ads included Asian Americans, a small percentage compared with Blacks and Hispanics. Although Asian Americans have limited representation in magazines, according to Sung-Hee Joo and Ki-Young Lee, they typically feature in a major or leading role when they do appear.

Marketers often feature Asian Americans as professionals, technicians, and business people in magazine ads whose contents include high-tech products such as computers, automobiles, and the Internet. Specifically, Asian American portrayals were concentrated 35.3% in business, 18.5% in computers, and 16.7% in Internet ads; these numbers are considerably higher than those for Blacks and Hispanics.

In ad settings, Asian Americans are primarily featured in a business environment versus a social, home, or nonbusiness setting, which portrays Asian Americans as industrious and hard-working but nonsociable people. Joo and Lee found that 62% of ads with Asian Americans are in a business setting, and 12.4% are in social and home settings. It is believed that Asian Americans dedicate most of their time to work; therefore, they do not have time for a social life. Settings for Black or Hispanic models vary from workplace to outdoors.

Conclusion

Through the communications and entertainment media, society forms its stereotypes of Asian Americans and expects them to possess certain characteristics associated with membership in a model minority. In striving for success, Asian Americans can benefit from widespread contemporary positive images of themselves. At the same time, considerable pressure to live up to high expectations can result in social stigma for young Asian Americans if they should fail and thereby bring disgrace to their families.

Hong-Le Ha

See also Asian American Gangs; Asian Americans; Immigrants and Crime; Model Minorities

Further Readings

- Coats, B., & Knobloch-Westerwick, S. (2006). Minority models in advertisements in magazines popular with minorities. Journalism & Mass Communication Quarterly, 83(3), 596–614.
- Izard, R., & Wu, D. (2005, August 5). Representing the total community: Relationships between Asian-American staff and Asian-American coverage in U.S. newspapers. The 2005 Asian American Journalists Association Focus Study Report, 1–10.
- Joo, S.-H., & Lee, K.-Y. (2005). The portrayal of Asian Americans in mainstream magazine ads: An update. Journalism and Mass Communication Quarterly, 82(3), 654–671.
- Kawai, Y. (2005). Stereotyping Asian Americans: The dialectic of the model minority and the yellow peril. The Howard Journal of Communications, 16, 109–130.
- Paek, H. J., & Shah, H. (2003). Racial ideology, model minorities, and the “not-so-silent partner”: Stereotyping of Asian Americans in U.S. magazine advertising. The Howard Journal of Communications, 14, 225–243.
- Shah, H. (2003, August). Asian Culture and Asian American identities in the television and film industries of the United States. Simile, 3(3). Retrieved from <http://www.journalism.wisc.edu/mpi/shah/asiancult.pdf>

MEDIA PORTRAYALS OF LATINA/O/S

In recent decades, with regard to the topic of race and crime, the majority of scholarly and critical analyses of media portrayals have focused primarily on African Americans in relation to White Americans. However, a growing body of research activity has increasingly begun to explore media portrayals of Latinos and the effects of such portrayals on audience members. To date, U.S. media offerings have done a comparatively poor job in portraying Latina/o Americans in fair and diverse ways. At the same time, Latinos today represent the largest and fastest-growing minority group in the United States; additional care and effort devoted to portraying them more accurately will inform audience members about the diverse realities and lived experiences of members of this important demographic group. This entry explores typical media representations of Latinos (both generally and in relation to crime), the likely effects of continual exposure to them, and promising strategies by which to improve the quality of such portrayals in the years to come.

Media Portrayals of Latinos

The clear majority of media portrayals of Latinos to date have been inaccurate, stereotypical, culturally insensitive, and/or demeaning in content. In large part, that is because many of these portrayals have been created and disseminated by individuals in positions of power who are not Latina/o themselves and lack an adequate understanding of contemporary lived realities of Latinos. In portrayals spanning several decades and ranging from news to entertainment offerings, it has been common for Latino men to be portrayed as poor, uneducated, lazy individuals who do not speak English well and have little regard for law and order, as well as for Latina women to be portrayed as foreign, exotic looking, promiscuous, impoverished individuals who take but give little back to their country. Typical stereotypical and quite limiting roles pertaining to Latina/o Americans in U.S. films have included the “bandito,” the harlot, the dark lady, and the Latin lover. Many starring roles for Latinos in U.S. films are played by a limited number of the same performers, including Antonio Banderas, Penelope Cruz, Andy Garcia, Jennifer Lopez, Edward James Olmos, and Rosie Perez.

Media offerings regularly condense information and alter social and cultural facts, with the aim of accommodating market tastes and desires. It is perhaps unsurprising, therefore, that media portrayals of Latinos have changed over time, frequently as a reflection of U.S. political and economic relationships with Latin American and other countries throughout the world. For example, most scholars who study media portrayals of Latinos agree that such portrayals improved dramatically during both World War I and World War II. In contrast, during the early years of the 21st century, media portrayals of members of this demographic group have at times been negatively affected by racism resulting from immigration and terrorism concerns.

In contemporary media offerings of all kinds, it is not uncommon for Latino men to be portrayed as overly macho, controlling, passionate, or even abusive. Similarly, it is not uncommon for Latinas to be portrayed as impoverished mothers with too many children, all of whom depend on welfare to survive or work as servants to non-Latina/o others. One-dimensional, highly stereotypical portrayals tend to be the norm rather than the exception, and their continual presence emphasizes the importance of analyzing the relationship between media portrayals and personal problems and perceptions. This brief discussion is not meant to imply that there are no media portrayals of Latinos that defy such representational patterns. At the same time, it is important to note that well-developed, well-rounded portrayals of such individuals, still today, remain few and far between. In addition, several scholars maintain that images of Latinos in Hollywood films and related media artifacts have become increasingly negative and unfavorable rather than more positive over time.

Media Portrayals of Latinos and Criminal Activities

The most typical media portrayals of Latina/os to date, in relation to crime, have featured them as gang members, drug dealers, illegal immigrants, transients, prostitutes, and young mothers with large numbers of children who either regularly partake in criminal behaviors themselves or benefit from the criminal activities of others who are close to them. This has been the case both in news and entertainment offerings. In addition, entertainment-based reality television programs such as America's Most Wanted and Cops regularly portray Latinos as criminal perpetrators to such an extent that they offer substantially distorted representations when compared to rates of crimes committed by members of this demographic group.

Because the contemporary definition of “news” places a substantial degree of importance on crime stories in relation to racial and ethnic minorities, it is perhaps unsurprising (albeit highly unfortunate) that Latina/o Americans are portrayed regularly in relation to the problem of crime. With regard to news portrayals specifically, researchers with the National Association of Hispanic Journalists and related organizations have found that Latina/o-related stories typically comprise less than 1% of all stories on network newscasts, despite the reality that Latinos comprise approximately 15% of the U.S. population. At the same time, in the instances when Latinos are portrayed in such newscasts, they are quite commonly depicted as criminals, with the total percentage of stories and airtime devoted to covering Latina/o-related crime stories far exceeding the actual statistics pertaining to crimes involving Latinos. Researchers have also found that Latinos are much more likely to be portrayed using mug shots than are non-Latina/o Whites.

However, when it comes to depicting Latinos in relation to crime in U.S. media offerings, a small but growing number of Latina/o actors in films and prime-time crime-based television series have played the roles of law enforcement officials, and a small but growing number of Latina actresses have played the roles of hospital nurses who interact with those officers. Critics believe that such opportunities for enhanced portrayals of Latinos in U.S. media offerings reflect the growing awareness by media professionals that a rapidly expanding segment of their potential audience members is Latina/o and desires to see itself reflected onscreen.

Impact of Exposure to Media Portrayals of Latinos

Distorted and very limited media portrayals of Latinos can produce a range of real-world effects that influence various aspects of contemporary life, including those pertaining to domestic policy, foreign policy, human rights, and the criminal justice system. Continual exposure to such portrayals can substantially influence the way that non-Latinos regard and respond to members of this demographic group, especially among audience members who have few or no firsthand encounters with Latinos as they go about their daily lives. In addition, academic and cultural critics alike fear that the overrepresentation of Latina/o Americans as undesirable individuals and criminals is directly related to their substantial degree of underrepresentation as analysts and experts in media offerings.

The overrepresentation of Latinos in news stories pertaining to crime has been found to result regularly in prejudicial pretrial publicity. For example, researchers have found that both Latinos and African Americans today are at least twice as likely as Whites to be the victims of prejudicial statements in television news. They have also found that Latinos who allegedly victimize Whites are nearly 2 times more likely than Whites to be the victim of prejudicial information, often resulting in serious social, legal, and psychological ramifications. In addition, this overrepresentation of Latinos as criminals and its corresponding stereotypical portrayals have been found to exacerbate women’s fear of crime, for they come to believe that they are extremely likely to become the victims of out-of-control dangerous strangers in the form of poor minority men. As a result, large numbers of audience members regularly develop distorted, culturally dangerous notions about what types of individuals are most likely to commit crimes, and when and where various crimes are most likely to occur.

Despite the aforementioned trends in media portrayals of Latinos, it is important to note that Latinos are widely regarded as the most underrepresented demographic group on U.S. television and in various other kinds of media offerings. The relative scarcity of media portrayals of Latinos overall can also have negative effects on members of this demographic group. As researchers have continually demonstrated, a lack of media portrayals of members of any demographic group typically maintains the comparatively powerless and/or marginalized status of that group (in relation to members of other demographic groups that are more regularly portrayed in media offerings) through a process that has come to be known as “symbolic annihilation.” With regard to Latinos specifically, this phenomenon refers to their historical nonrepresentation and current underrepresentation in U.S. media offerings of all kinds, which implies that Latinos are not as important as members of other cultural backgrounds (because they are so rarely portrayed) and implicitly contributes to a culture of low expectations for Latina/o students as well as stereotypical distortions with regard to Latinos and their lived realities.

Improving the Quality of Media Portrayals of Latinos

Change and improvement in the quality and range of media portrayals of Latinos is clearly required in order to more accurately represent the members of this demographic group. Such modifications may result from various means. Ongoing efforts to attract and retain Latina/o journalists, for example, are expected to continue to improve the quality of news portrayals of Latinos in the coming years. In this regard, it is believed that increased numbers of Latinos and members of other racial and ethnic minorities who make the decisions in news organizations—such as by deciding which stories to cover and who gets to cover them—will result in a much broader range of Latinos featured in news accounts and a much more accurate picture of the realities of Latina/o life in the United States.

The growing number of U.S. television programs featuring Latina/o performers—including the recent sitcoms Freddie (starring Freddie Prinze, Jr.) and George Lopez (starring George Lopez), the dramedy series Ugly Betty (starring America Ferrera and Salma Hayek), and the half-hour comedy show Mind of Mencia (starring Carlos Mencia)—are similarly serving to expand the range of more accurate and fair representations of Latina/o Americans. In interviews, Mencia has referred to his effective ability to invoke stereotypes, mix them with humor, and use them to achieve anti-stereotypical ends. Ugly Betty emerged as an adaptation of a Colombian telenovela and includes a number of Latina/os in important behind-the-scenes positions, including the roles of creator, producer, and writer. Alternative movies created by Latina/o filmmakers have also been utilized effectively in recent years to explore and address important issues of exclusion and discrimination.

Self-representation of Latinos in documentaries offers another promising approach to improving the quality of portrayals of members of this sizable demographic group. Such media artifacts enable Latinos to document their own lived experiences, with assistance from loved ones, friends, and trusted associates, for presentation to audience members of similar as well as quite different ethnicities and backgrounds. Such documentaries are made with the goal of more accurately depicting conditions encountered regularly by Latinos in various aspects of their everyday lives. As such, these media offerings represent an important form of alternative representational production, because they involve the creation of potentially influential portrayals of Latinos from within their own communities.

Kylo-Patrick R. Hart

See also Latina/o Criminology; Media, Print; Sentencing Disparities, Latina/o/s; Victimization, Latina/o

Further Readings

- Berg, C. R. (2002). Latino images in film: Stereotypes, subversion, and resistance. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Dixon, T. L., & Linz, D. (2002). Television news, prejudicial pretrial publicity, and the depiction of race. Journal of Broadcasting and Electronic Media, 46, 112–136.
- Lane, J., & Meeker, J. W. (2003). Ethnicity, information sources, and fear of crime. Deviant Behavior, 24, 1–25.
- Madriz, E. I. (1997). Images of criminals and victims: A study on women's fear and social control. Gender and Society, 11, 342–356.
- Padin, J. A. (2005). The normative mulattoes: The press, Latinos, and the racial climate on the moving immigration frontier. Sociological Perspectives, 48, 49–75.
- Rodríguez, C. E. (Ed.). (1997). Latin looks: Images of Latinas and Latinos in the U.S. media. Boulder, CO: Westview.

MEDIA PORTRAYALS OF NATIVE AMERICANS

Native Americans historically and in the present day are portrayed by media that reflects and alters social realities. Their portrayals, images, representations (misrepresentations and stereotypes) socially construct the realities of culture, collective identity, ideology, and policy. Often Native Americans are viewed as victims of these portrayals and as actors with power to alter those images and realities. Among scholars, including many who are Native Americans, the media portrayals of Native American crimes and the criminalization of Native Americans are understood within a wide social and historical context. This entry presents an overview of types of media portrayals of Native Americans in historical and contemporary contexts.

Types of Media and Types of Native American Portrayals

News and entertainment media in today's multi-media landscape present a myriad of images in newspapers, movies, comics and cartoons, television, music, literature, and textbooks and websites. Historically, stereotypical portrayals of Native Americans have included the Indian enemy; the hostiles; the bloodthirsty savage; the noble savage; the Indian as spirit guide; the American Indian sports team mascot and warrior symbol; redskins; squaws; wild Indians; the drunken Indian; the vanishing Native; the Native as people of the past; the good Indian and the bad Indian. The U.S. government recognizes more than 550 distinct American Indian nations, with diverse customs, language, use of natural resources, sources of wealth, and governmental and judicial structures, but the dominant mainstream media make this rich diversity invisible through underrepresentation as well as gross misrepresentation.

Indians have appeared in U.S. newspapers since the first papers in the English colonies, including Publick Occurrences, Both Forreign and Domestick, which was the first multipage newspaper in America. News about Natives emphasized them as enemies and allies in the French and Indian Wars. Later accounts, emphasizing attacks and atrocities, are described by the norms of the White society. Among the early publishers was Horace Greeley, who decided to "Go West" when he was a popular editor of the New York Tribune. Greeley, by 1859, with a transcontinental railroad to promote, began his journey west, filing news dispatches to the Tribune. Seeing the west as a large open space for U.S. expansion, Greeley experienced western Indians, including the Delaware, Ottawa, and Osage, and reservations as impediments to progress. He saw Arapahos who were begging or stealing and stopping wagons until their demands were met. He described the Indian wars as cruel, cowardly, plundering forays, which brought disgust. His harsh judgment also revealed an ideology that Native Americans should help themselves, subdue and cultivate the earth, and with those views helped sustain decades of ideology that mythologized Native Americans.

Native Americans were portrayed in news media as treacherous Seminoles of Florida and the Sioux camp of cutthroats along Montana's Little Bighorn River. Newspapers reported conflicts in graphic, sensational detail, typically describing hostile Indians maiming, mutilating, kidnapping, and killing Whites. The "Indian Problem" emphasized the violence, sometimes advocating White revenge and genocide. Though "bad Indians" were featured, the "good Indians" emerged in the press portrayals in honest and sympathetic terms, showing the humanity in the Natives. Such "noble savages" were thought to be saved through Christianity and the application of civilization.

Native American news and press coverage show patterns of misinformation that link with the historic process of dispossession, when Native Peoples have been removed from their lands, their resources, self-governance rights, and freedoms. Scholars have argued that media misinformation prevented Indian peoples from getting their stories told accurately. Moreover, the mainstream press, which has shaped public perceptions of Native Americans, paved the way for human rights abuses and atrocities. Believers in the manifest destiny of Whites to own the "new world" advocated violence against Indian people. The negative reporting during the western movement of the 1800s and 1900s occurred at a time when most newspaper owners and publishing empires also owned the mines and railroads that were a major part of that westward expansion.

Contemporary news media studies show biased press coverage in such mainstream media as The Boston Globe and The Wall Street Journal. Studied in 2001 and 2002, the newspapers editorialized about the New York Indian casino issues, using stereotypical images to strike tribal development. The former state governor was called the “chief” and later the “Great White Father,” reducing journalism to prejudicial name calling. Gaming enterprises were labeled bad, since they, according to the news media, would bring lowlifes, organized crime, drugs, prostitution, loan sharking, and money laundering. A Time magazine cover story, “Look Who’s Cashing In at Indian Casinos,” was deemed negative by Native Americans, since the series reported antitribal ideas that self-governance rights are unfair, corrupt, and inept. Other reporters picked up on that story, and by late 2002 this pattern of media coverage had resulted in the criminalization of Natives by association and innuendo.

Similarly, in 2007, The New York Times reported and editorialized against the Long Island Shinnecock Indian Nation’s building a casino in the wealthy Hamptons. The paper argued that while economic development is an issue for the tribe, whose members have long struggled against poverty, drug abuse, and limited opportunity, gambling is an illegitimate route to wealth. A more balanced news report was published by the Long Island Press, titled “Gambling With Tradition,” which reviewed local and national development strategies including redistribution programs. The visual image on the cover, however, presented the stereotype of the warrior chief in war headdress staring at oversized dice suspended in the air. News coverage in New York State most recently has been limited to the illegal sales of cigarettes among the Poospatucks.

Along with newspapers, narrative literature, including the work of James Fenimore Cooper, continued the stereotype of the ennobled though bloody savage. Generally, this growing literature, the “dime novels,” Wild West shows and theater, along with the press, provided useful stereotypes, supporting the business of building a nation. The Native American portrayal as the noble savage provided a symbol of natural virtue, an idealized identity that helped make a case for American abundance and optimism. As sociologists like Todd Gitlin and others have argued, the media are a major force in the establishment and maintenance of an ideological hegemony and the power to define identity and the boundaries of everyday. Changes in journalistic conventions, practices of selection and emphasis, technology, and news organizations shape the portrayals and provide ways to read the portrayal more critically. For example, news that reinforced images of Indians as warlike often took precedence over stories of importance to Native Americans, including land claims and government policies. Important, also, are the social movements that foster Native American media enterprises, newspapers, and use of the Internet. Mainstream media are challenged to respond to the Kerner Commission reports that not enough people of color are on staffs of mainstream media, distorted coverage persists, ordinary lives and community activities of people are not covered to the same extent as those of Whites, and sources of news are too seldom drawn from non-Whites. Native Americans, like other minorities, can tell their stories and portray themselves through media for community building and to provide alternative portrayals to the broader public. The alternative press uses Indians to strike against capitalism and racism, using the struggle for rights; the environmental press tries to debunk the myth of natural conservation; the New Age press generated the Indian as the symbol of spirituality. More research is needed on the topic of news media portrayals and the connection among news media, social scientific, and ethnographic documentaries.

The “celluloid Indians,” Hollywood movies and the Native Americans portrayed in film, have been researched extensively. Filmographies and analyses of stereotype pervade the research, which treats film as more than an instrument of representation. Films are objects of representation that are not merely a reflection of the “real.” Images, both photography and film, reach over time and can have multiple interpretations. Viewers over time respond to portrayals that pass through layers of interpretation. There is no simple Hollywood Indian; portrayals of Native Americans in film span more than 100 years. The Native American is a definable Other in an emerging national mythology dominated by Euro-American groups, using the power of film media to define itself and Others. Portrayals in film often relied on the stereotypes that Native Americans are stupid, dirty redskins, heathens, with primitive spirituality. Other negative stereotypes persisted, but there were changes during the 20th century that show more nuanced portrayals of Native Americans; images nevertheless are still stereotyped, from “savages” to “noble red men.” The film westerns did not attempt the historical accuracy that was expected from newspapers, and directors used images to show the superiority of their heroes and to comment on political, social, and moral issues. In such early films as D. W. Griffith’s The Battle of Elderbus Gulch (1913), a tribe attacks settlers who have killed their chief’s son. A cavalry attacks them after the warriors attack a town, kill men, women, and a baby. In Griffith’s later film, America, savage Mohawks fight with the British and attack a fort, then are driven off by the hero and his men. A staple of the westerns, the portrayal of Native Americans as wild savages, motivated by vengeance, who rape and kill, persists through the history of the western film genre. Later films—Little Big Man (1970) or Dances With Wolves (1990)—transfer the negative image to evil White soldiers or politicians. Films are viewed over time and through diverse media, including television and the Web. Because of this reach, these media portrayals are more powerful in an increasingly wired globe. Native American images and the western movement are seen throughout the world, with questionable effects that should be researched further.

The Missing Media Portrayals of Native Americans

Missing from the media portrayals of Native Americans are images that adequately account for the long, complex history of a diverse population. History texts and other educational media often have similar negative stereotypes, although there are movements to redress those errors. Such topics as the American Indian identity, activism and change, tribal nationalism and governmental recognition, the arts and expression of today’s Native Americans, museums and educational institutions, the “vanishing” and “returning” Native Americans, resistance, politics and rights doctrines, the power of Native languages, the power of Native women, the world of children and youth that is not “juvenile delinquency,” current environmental and land practices, and Native American justice on and off the reservations would enlighten the public. These representations would move beyond the stereotypes, providing a fuller portrayal of Native Americans in a multimediated world.

Social scientific research on Native American crimes, the changing definitions of crime historically, the process of criminalizing minority populations, working together with the mainstream media and the academy would make this knowledge more available. Ethnographies, including the photodocumentary work of Edward Curtis, archives, and the anthropological tradition can be reinvestigated for the purpose of doing additional research and comparative analysis, correcting misrepresentations of the past and adding perspectives and Native voices to our knowledge. One location for a more interactive multimedia source for research and study is the National Museum of the American Indian. It offers DVDs, including titles like The Sand Creek Massacre: Seven Hours That Changed American History, winner of the best documentary short film in the American Indian Film Festival.

Diana Papademas

See also Indian Civil Rights Act; Indian Self-Determination Act; Native American Courts; Native American Massacres; Native Americans; Native Americans: Culture, Identity, and Criminal Justice System; Native Americans and Substance Abuse; Racialization of Crime; Victimization, Native American

Further Readings

- Capture, G. H., Champagne, D., & Jackson, C. C. (Eds.). (2007). American Indian nations. Lanham, MD: AltaMira Press.
- Coward, J. M. (1999). The Newspaper Indian: Native American identity in the press, 1820–90. Chicago: University of Illinois Press.
- Curtis, E. S. (1997). The North American Indian. New York: Taschen.
- Dines, G., & Humez, J. M. (Eds.). (2003). Gender, race, and class in media. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
- Grounds, R. A., Tinker, G. E., & Wilkins, D. E. (Eds.). (2003). Native voices. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press.
- Kilpatrick, J. (1999). Celluloid Indians/Native Americans and film. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.
- Merskin, D. (1998). Sending up signals: A survey of Native American media use and representation in the mass media. The Howard Journal of Communications, 9, 333–345.

MEDIA PORTRAYALS OF WHITE AMERICANS

The media exert a significant influence on Americans in the 21st century, since many people rely on the media as their primary source of information about issues and people with whom they have little direct contact. In one form or another, whether television shows, news reports, movies, or magazine and newspaper articles, the media affect and influence virtually everyone. This influence extends to public perceptions of race and crime.

In general, the media portray White Americans in proportion to their share of the total U.S. population, except in crime-based reality shows, where research shows that Whites are depicted as suspects significantly less often than they are in fact criminal suspects. This entry describes portrayals of White Americans in various types of media, including television network news and crime shows, movies, magazines, and newspapers.

Network News and Crime

Numerous scholars have examined the portrayal of Whites in the news media. In one study by Christopher Beaudoin and Esther Thorson that focused on local news coverage, 18% of Whites were depicted as being restrained by a police officer and 65% were mentioned by name. Two prominent sociologists, Ted Chiricos and Sarah Eschholz, found that White criminals and victims appeared in the television news at the same rate, but non-White victims were shown one fourth as often as non-White suspects. Travis Dixon hypothesized that unidentified suspects will be perceived as being Black to heavy news viewers, whereas unidentified officers will be perceived as being White. He also hypothesized that unidentified and White officers will be perceived more positively than Black officers. In line with his hypothesis, Blacks were stereotyped as being the criminal and Whites were stereotyped as being the officer. Robert Entman found in several studies that crime news heightened Whites' fears of crime and their tendency to support public policy such as the death penalty and longer sentences for criminals. Kenneth Dowler argues that in American newscasts, racial images saturate media portrayals of crime and victims, and White victims receive more sympathy and attention by the news media than do minorities.

Depictions of White Americans on TV Crime Shows

Because most people do not have firsthand experience with the criminal justice system, they learn about crime from the media. Often, crime reality shows take the form of "infotainment"—a highly stylized, edited, and formatted form of entertainment that, according to Ray Surette, is presented as realistic depictions of crime and the criminal justice system. Similarly, crime drama shows such as Law & Order and NYPD Blue appear to offer accurate portrayals of law enforcement and criminal justice.

Crime Dramas

Content analysis of fictional programs has demonstrated that they depict Whites as criminal suspects more often than members of other racial groups as criminal suspects. Whites, however, should be depicted more than any other racial group since they are the largest majority in the United States. Researchers who reviewed 103 programs in a one-week sample of prime-time TV programming that aired on ABC, NBC, CBS, and FOX during the 1997 season found that suspects were portrayed as White 82% of the time. The same analysis indicated that these programs portrayed officers and representatives of the court as White 83% of the time. Thus, Whites were being overrepresented, since according to the U.S. Census, Whites accounted for about 71% of the population.

Researchers have found that Whites are more likely to be portrayed as victims of crime, especially of violent crimes. Sarah Eschholz, Matthew Mallard, and Stacey Flynn selected 44 one-hour episodes, with 20 from ABC's NYPD Blue and 24 from NBC's Law & Order, as a sample from the entire 2001 season of both the shows. They noted the racial composition of all the characters on the two shows, such as the characters, victims, offender, violent offender, handcuffed, criminal justice personnel, law enforcement personnel and attorneys, and compared these with New York City population data. They found that Whites made up 65% of all the characters on NYPD Blue and 75% of all the characters on Law & Order, as compared to the New York City Census that showed Whites made up only 45% of the New York City population. On NYPD Blue, Whites made up 50% of the victims, but the NYC data shows Whites are victims only 19% of the time. Also Whites were represented as offender or suspect 65% of the time, violent offender 75% of the time, and handcuffed 71% of the time on Law & Order. But the NYC data shows they actually account for only 13% of these. Therefore there is a significant overrepresentation of Whites in all the categories in both Law & Order and NYPD Blue. This shows an overrepresentation of Whites on these two shows as compared to the NYC data, but it does not show an overrepresentation of Whites for the national population. An example of overrepresentation that was found is, according to the 2000 Uniform Crime Report, Black males are most often victims of violent crimes, but in television programs, Whites are more likely to be shown as the victims of crimes, especially violent crimes. Chiricos and Eschholz also found that Whites are much more likely to be shown as police officers and tend to hold other noncriminal positions. When African Americans and other minorities are shown, they are more likely to be cast as an offender than their White counterparts.

Crime Reality Shows

Content analysis of crime reality shows has results similar to those for crime dramas. During a 2-month time span, Kathleen Curry watched 45 episodes of the primetime reality-based TV show COPS during the 1996 season. Curry then selected one episode that was chosen by how closely it corresponded with the issues mostly represented on reality police shows. She gave a survey to 117 Arizona State University students and did a focus group session with the students. She found that mainly White middle-class Americans were watching COPS in order to get a glimpse of the lower class and the crimes they committed. Whites are depicted more often as the police officers whereas minorities are depicted as the criminals. Additional research has shown that Whites are depicted as suspects about 38% of the time. Whites are underrepresented as suspects on COPS compared with their population and arrest statistics. COPS also demonstrates a more negative portrayal of African Americans than of Whites.

Movie Portrayals of White Americans

Billions of dollars are invested in the production of movies each year, and billions of dollars in profits are earned. For the most part, these movies portray White Americans in mostly respectful, nonviolent, middle-class roles. Entman and Rojecki, for example, found that 486 of the 630 actors were White in the top 63 films during 1996. Nineteen of the films listed used exclusively White actors in the top 10 cast positions, a significantly higher rate than for other races. In these movies, Whites were more likely to be authority figures, be depicted as less violent, use correct grammar, and be seen in less sexual roles than African Americans.

White Americans in Magazines and Newspapers

Another area where the media is influencing the American public is through magazines. According to Hazim-Adams, who reviewed People magazine in the years 2001 through 2005, there were a total of 256 articles, and 191 of those were about White female celebrities. Seventy-four percent of female articles were about White female celebrities, and 71 White female celebrities were the cover stories. Only 6.3% of the articles addressed White celebrities having trouble with the law. Therefore, People magazine tends to downplay criminal activities by White celebrities.

Unlike viewers of television news, readers of newspapers normally do not know the race of the perpetrators or victims. According to R. M. Entman and Andrew Rojecki, the Chicago Tribune portrays a somewhat less threatening world than the television news does. They found that the newspaper did not carry as many articles about violence as did local television. Seventy-eight percent of violent crimes had no picture attached to the article. This means that Whites were not portrayed either positively or negatively in the Tribune with respect to their crime reporting.

Conclusion

Whites dominate every arena of American society including the media coverage. On television news and reality-based crime shows, Whites occupy positive roles such as those of police officers and attorneys but are underrepresented as suspects. Prime-time television shows such as NYPD Blue, Law & Order, and COPS depict Whites more than they portray members of other racial/ethnic groups. Although Whites do make up the largest ethnic group in the U.S. population, they are under- or overrepresented in some types of programming. Both how often members of various ethnic groups are portrayed and how they are portrayed have an impact on viewers' perceptions. Images of Whites in the media tend to reinforce White status and power and often convey a sense that America is essentially a White society of White people. Such portrayals may produce a distorted picture of the world of crime and criminality.

Jennifer Williams

See also Media Portrayals of African Americans; Media Portrayals of Asian Americans; Media Portrayals of Latina/o/s; Media Portrayal of Native Americans

Further Readings

- Beaudoin, C. E., & Thorson, E. (2006). The social capital of Blacks and Whites: Differing effects of the mass media in the United States. Human Communication Research, 32(2), 157–177.
- Chiricos, T., & Eschholz, S. (2002). The racial typification of crime and the criminal typification of race: The social construction of social threat by local TV news. Journal of Research in Crime and Delinquency, 39, 400–420.
- Entman, R. M., & Rojecki, A. (2000). The Black image in the White mind. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Eschholz, S., Mallard, M., & Flynn, S. (2004). Images of prime time justice: A content analysis of NYPD Blue and Law & Order. Journal of Criminal Justice and Popular Culture, 10(3), 161–180.
- Surette, R. (2007). Media, crime and criminal justice: Images and realities (3rd ed.). Belmont, CA: Thomson-Wadsworth.
- Tamborini, R., Mastro, D., Chory-Assad, R. M., & Huang, R. H. (2000). The color of crime and the court: A content analysis of minority representation of television. Journalism and Mass Media Communication Quarterly, 77(3), 639–653.

MEDIATION IN CRIMINAL JUSTICE

Since the 1970s, mediation has been gaining widespread popularity, visibility, and acceptance around the world, from the interpersonal level to the international. Its presence is evident in a wide range of contexts, particularly those situations in which disputing parties can be engaged to play a role in managing their own outcomes. When racially sensitive situations occur, mediation is a particularly useful intervention process, since it helps the parties communicate directly, break down their stereotypes or images, and facilitate a better understanding of each other.

Despite the fact that the criminal justice system has historically relied on adversarial methods resulting in win/lose outcomes and the idea that guilt must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt, mediation, a nonadversarial process, has increasingly been embedded in many components of the system. Although not a panacea, mediation does provide an opportunity to address allegations that the criminal justice system is insensitive to situations when race is involved. In short, the growing use of mediation has the potential of stimulating a major paradigm shift in the criminal justice system's management of race-related matters.

Mediation

Generally speaking, mediation refers to a process whereby a third party, known as a mediator, assists the disputing parties to have a difficult conversation by empowering them to share their concerns and helping them find creative ways to work through their differences. Mediators are trained to listen actively, identify and reframe issues, reflect emotions, help the parties brainstorm options, and bring closure to situations. Relying on a structured process using ground rules to assure respectful and safe interactions, mediators engage the parties to share, listen to, and understand each other's needs and perceptions, and lay the foundation for more constructive interactions in the future.

Central to mediation are several key principles, including self-determination by the parties and confidentiality of the information shared. Because mediation relies on parties' willingness, readiness, and ability to participate, it is essential that the parties not be coerced to reach agreements or that decisions not be made for them while engaged in the mediation process. To help create an open environment, which is crucial for parties to share information and concerns during mediation, parties are typically assured that information they share will be kept confidential. Exceptions to confidentiality usually include child abuse, domestic violence, and knowledge that a crime will be committed.

There is no universally accepted way to mediate. Mediators use personal styles and a variety of philosophies and techniques. The three types of mediation that are most recognizable are facilitative, transformative, and evaluative. Generally speaking, facilitative mediation assists the parties to communicate better and understand their concerns in order to solve their own problems; transformative mediation seeks the empowerment and mutual recognition of the parties involved using a nondirective approach for the parties to understand their situation; and evaluative mediation is a more directive approach that assesses the parties' situation and offers guidance about the outcomes. Depending on the mediator and context, variations of the types may be used; however, in the criminal context, facilitative and transformative mediation dominate.

Mediators are expected to bring particular qualities to interventions. Among them are open-mindedness and tolerance of differing cultures and styles. Mediators need to be aware of their own biases, assumptions, and beliefs and how they may affect the process. Training targeted to enhance cultural competence and knowledge about race relations is a component of many mediation training initiatives.

Uses of Mediation in the Criminal Justice System

The uses of mediation in the criminal justice system vary markedly. There are two basic ways in which criminal justice professionals use it: first, as trained mediators who convene parties in face-to-face sessions themselves; second, as referrers of parties to mediation services. For those who are trained mediators, their own understanding about biases and prejudices as well as their ability to work with individuals from diverse backgrounds is increased. However it is used, mediation can provide a window of opportunity to enhance race relations in the criminal justice system.

Community Mediation

Evidence of mediation in the criminal justice system is most palpable among community mediation programs, which have proliferated in local communities. Drawing on the diversity of their local communities, these programs have made significant inroads in demonstrating how mediation can be of value to the criminal justice system. They have trained thousands of local citizens as mediators, usually volunteers, to handle a wide range of cases that would otherwise be handled by the criminal courts. While most of the criminal matters processed by these programs tend to be on the misdemeanor level, in fact felony cases, albeit less frequently, are also processed. Given the strong ties to their local communities, these programs have routinely reached out to local police departments and other criminal justice agencies where they have conducted training programs or served as referral sources. For situations involving race-related concerns, mediation is particularly useful since it allows for sensitivity to the parties' different communication and conflict management styles. Additionally, in racially and culturally diverse communities, mediators at local mediation programs often reflect the composition of the residents.

Restorative Justice and Victim–Offender Mediation

Mediation is often crucial to restorative justice initiatives. Restorative justice, with roots in indigenous communities, is an umbrella term that refers to a variety of informal justice processes that rectify harm and restore relationships by involving victims, offenders, and members of the community. Among the processes are family group conferences, circle sentencing, peacemaking circles, community reparative boards, and victim–offender mediation. Of these processes, victim–offender mediation has been one of the most popular forms of restorative justice, in which victims and offenders participate in an informal, nonadversarial face-to-face process to discuss how they see the situation. Victims have an opportunity to share their concerns, get answers, and begin to recover. Offenders have a chance both to provide information about why they engaged in the offense and to be restored to the community. If others from the community are present, they can expand the discussion regarding ways to respond to an offense. Outcomes can include restitution, apologies, and creative work arrangements. When situations involve race relations, for example, some hate crimes, a variety of offenses in racially mixed neighborhoods, or offenses where offenders and victims are racially or culturally different, mediation can provide victims and offenders with an opportunity to better understand each other and heal.

Police Use of Mediation

The growth of community policing and proliferation of community mediation programs have both played a significant role in expanding the use of mediation among the police. Community policing's emphasis on creative problem solving and establishment of partnerships with the citizens highlight the need for police officers to work closely with the community in order to address its concerns creatively.

There are two basic ways in which the police can use mediation. First, police trained as mediators have acquired a set of skills that enables them to assist parties to work through their differences on the scene. They listen to the parties and help them to reach mutually agreed-upon outcomes. Mediation deliberately encourages the police to pay attention to their own attitudes, values, and behavior regarding situations involving race.

Second, the police can refer cases to mediators, usually at local community mediation programs. These mediators can devote more time to exploring some of the underlying concerns so that the potential of enhancing race relations in the community is maximized.

Numerous police departments have added mediation to their responses to civilian complaints against the police. Among the types of complaints sent to mediation are improper, discourteous, or offensive language, use of verbal threats, and mild use of physical force. Mediation provides all parties involved, citizens and the police, with an opportunity to meet face to face and discuss the interaction that triggered the complaint. Citizens can get answers to their questions. Police can explain what they did, why they did it, and help to clear their records. Mediation in this context provides citizens and police an opportunity to discuss issues that can often strain relationships between the police and members of minority communities.

Challenges

While the use of mediation has been widely introduced in all aspects of the criminal justice system, it faces a wide range of ongoing challenges. Among them are the perception that mediation is soft on crime, a potential violation of due process, unsuitable for situations in which there is an imbalance of power, and a second-class form of justice. It is often misunderstood and mistrusted by criminal justice professionals and the public. For instance, if mediation is conducted on the scene by police officers, parties who are often in the middle of emotionally charged situations are not ready, willing, or able to participate in a process that relies on more deliberate, rational discussion. On-the-scene mediation does not lend itself to the kinds of preparatory measures taken by mediators in more traditional contexts, where they pay attention to getting parties ready to meet, consider meeting location, write agreements, and do follow-up. For prosecutors and judges, mediation raises questions about the suitability of sending their cases to a nonadversarial, win/win process.

Of particular note, mediation usually occurs behind closed doors. In instances where there could be irregularities, parties' interests or rights can be violated without any oversight. Racial minorities could be especially vulnerable since mediation is so dependent on the knowledge skills and sensitivity of the mediator.

Future Prospects

The potential use of mediation in all components of the criminal justice system where there is an intersection of race and crime has yet to be fully tapped. While there continues to be a need for more research on the use of mediation, it is safe to say that mediation provides the criminal justice system with a valuable tool in managing race-related situations. Trained criminal justice professionals bring additional skills either to intervene more sensitively or to refer cases to other mediators. Disputing parties who experience race-related differences in the criminal justice context would benefit from the kind of opportunity to understand each other as provided by mediation.

Maria R. Volpe

See also Drug Courts; Juvenile Drug Courts; Restorative Justice

Further Readings

- Berger, V. (2000). Civilians versus police: Mediation can help to bridge the divide. Negotiation Journal, 16, 211–235.
- Cole, S. R., Rogers, N. H., & McEwen, C. A. (2001). Mediation law, policy, practice. Eagan, MN: Thomson/West.
- Herrman, M. S. (2006). The Blackwell handbook of mediation bridging theory, research, and practice. Malden, MA: Blackwell.
- Johnstone, G., & Van Ness, D. W. (2007). Handbook of restorative justice. Portland, OR: Willan.
- Menkel-Meadow, C., Love, L. P., & Schneider, A. K. (2006). Mediation practice, policy, and ethics. New York: Aspen.
- Moore, C. W. (2003). The mediation process: Practical strategies for resolving conflict (3rd ed.). San Francisco: Jossey-Bass.
- Umbreit, M. S., Coates, R. B., & Kalanj, B. (1994). Victim meets offender: The impact of restorative justice and mediation. Monsey, NY: Criminal Justice Press.
- Umbreit, M. S., & Greenwood, J. (2000). Directory of victim-offender mediation programs in the United States. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs, Office for Victims of Crime.
- Volpe, M. (1991). Mediation in the criminal justice system: Process, promises, problems. In H. E. Pepinsky & R. Quinney (Eds.), Criminology as peacemaking (pp. 194–205). Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Volpe, M., & Phillips, N. (2003). Police use of mediation. Conflict Resolution Quarterly, 21, 263–267.
- Walker, S., Archbold, C., & Herbst, L. (2002). Mediating citizen complaints against police officers: A guide for police and community leaders. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Community Oriented Policing Services.

Wright, M., & Galaway, B. (Eds.). (1989). Mediation and criminal justice: Victims, offenders, and community. London: Sage.

Websites

Conflict Resolution Information Source: <http://www.crininfo.org>
 Mediate.com: <http://www.mediate.com>

MENTORING PROGRAMS

Race and crime are two major factors associated with many of the mentoring programs that have been established to date. Programs are not typically designed to target specific races or criminogenic behaviors; rather they focus on youth who are seen to be “at risk” for individual and/or environmental reasons. Such youth are empirically and theoretically identified as being members of minority, low-income or poor single-parent families, who reside in socially disorganized urban, rural, and suburban areas more prone to criminal activity. In the past decade there has been an influx of mentoring programs initiated to address the needs and problems of these young people. This entry examines mentoring programs, why they exist, and their benefits to at-risk youth and identifies targeted populations.

Mentoring

Mentoring has traditionally been used to make differences in the lives of young individuals through support, guidance, and assistance as a means to promote and guide positive youth development. Mentoring is not used to change behaviors, but rather to provide long-lasting friendships. This is accomplished through personal activities between mentor (i.e., adult or student) and mentee (i.e., younger person). For example, visiting museums or libraries, attending sports games and theatrical plays, going to the park or shopping, spending time talking about life and everyday experiences, or going over a homework assignment.

Mentoring programs have been established to provide children with the opportunity to have influential one-to-one relationships with caring adults or high school students built on trust and dedication. These relationships are typically structured around initiatives designed and funded to focus solely on providing mentoring relationships for youth. Therefore this entry focuses only on those programs geared mainly toward mentoring. Throughout the United States there have been many initiatives that have established far-reaching youth mentoring programs, many of which are federally supported and targeted specifically for at-risk youth.

Federally Funded Mentoring Programs for Targeted Populations

Federal funding is the current financial support for mentoring programs throughout the United States, all of which have been allocated funds to provide mentoring services to specific populations of at-risk youth. The federal government provides funding for mentoring programs to specific populations through the several agencies, including the U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention; U.S. Department of Defense/National Bureau; U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Administration for Children and Families; U.S. Department of Education, Office of Elementary and Secondary Education/Safe and Drug Free Schools; and the U.S. Department of Justice, Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The Juvenile Mentoring Program

The Juvenile Mentoring Program is targeted toward those youth who are at risk of delinquency, gang involvement, educational failure, or dropping out of school. Agencies with juvenile mentoring programs include private, nonprofit, faith-based, and national youth service groups, for example Big Brothers Big Sisters of America (BBBSA) and Boys & Girls Clubs throughout the United States. Interested adults and high school students, who are at least 18 years old, offer their services through the Juvenile Mentoring Program. BBBSA provides school-based mentoring services that also allow for mentoring services to be provided to a youth mentee from a youth mentor. This program is school based and specifically targets schools in low-income areas.

Youth Challenge Program

The Youth Challenge Program is targeted to youth (16–18 years) who are school dropouts. This program provides youth with a residential experience and mentor services. The program outcome is to assist school dropouts to obtain their high school diplomas or GEDs or become involved in productive work, such as providing their services in the military. This is an example of a mentoring program that has been creative in developing a mentoring initiative that not only provides youth with educational attainment and mentor support but a challenge as well.

Mentoring Programs for Success

These programs support at-risk youth who live in rural areas, neighborhoods characterized by high crime, youth living in troubled households, or those experiencing educational failure. Mentoring is used to promote a healthy relationship between child and adult, to produce youth success. Program success is defined as providing a healthy adult-child friendship over a period of time.

Mentoring Children of Prisoners

Mentors for children whose parents are incarcerated work to provide youth with (a) trusting relationships, (b) messages about acceptable social behaviors, (c) positive adult guidance, (d) reinforcement for participation and advancement in school, and (e) civic involvement and community services. Mentors to children whose parent is incarcerated do not provide services for directly dealing with the loss of a parent to prison. Similar to other mentoring programs, they provide children with a positive adult friendship as a means for promoting healthy child development. Mentoring programs range in services provided, population targeted, length of program participation, and program objectives.

Benefits of Mentoring Programs

It is believed that at-risk youth benefit from mentoring programs. Research confirmed that youth participants benefited significantly in refraining from antisocial behaviors and acts of aggression toward other children. Participants also benefited from self-confidence, which boosted their performance in school. Families benefited as well as youth participants involved in mentoring programs. Children were found to have better relations within their home environments as a result of their participation in the program.

Bahiyyah M. Muhammad

See also Children of Female Offenders; Delinquency Prevention; Evidence-Based Delinquency Prevention for Minority Youth; Faith-Based Initiatives and Delinquency; Youth Gangs, Prevention of

Further Readings

- DuBois, D. L., Holloway, J. V., Valentine, J. C., & Cooper, H. (2002). Effectiveness of mentoring programs for youth: A meta-analytic review. American Journal of Community Psychology, 30, 157–197.
- Grossman, J. B., & Tierney, J. P. (1998). Does mentoring work? An impact of the Big Brothers Big Sisters program. Evaluation Review, 22(3), 403–426.
- Herrera, C., Grossman, J. B., Kauh, T. J., Feldman, A. F., McMaken, J., & Jucovy, L. Z. (2005). Making a difference in schools: The Big Brothers Big Sisters school-based mentoring impact study. Philadelphia: Private/Public Ventures.
- Rhodes, J. E. (1994). Older and wiser: Mentoring relationships in childhood and adolescence. Journal of Primary Prevention, 14, 187–196.
- Save the Children. (1999). Overview of Save the Children's national mentoring database. Retrieved from <http://www.savethechildren.org/mentors2d.html>

METHAMPHETAMINE

Methamphetamine is a drug that works as a stimulant; it causes neurotransmitters to release dopamine, serotonin, and norepinephrine. This drug has a relatively short history compared to some other drugs. Yet in this short time, methamphetamine has had a paralyzing impact on human lives, public safety, and the American economy.

Methamphetamine has a sordid history in terms of its regulation and treatment, and some researchers assert that differences in the approach to methamphetamine reflect differences in racial/ethnic patterns of drug use. This entry reviews the impact of methamphetamine on individuals and society, describes regional patterns of methamphetamine use and manufacture, and examines differences in social and legal responses to methamphetamine and crack cocaine.

Medical and Social Costs

In terms of how methamphetamine is a societal problem, many indicators exist. For example, according to the National Association of Counties, 40% of out-of-home placements of children were due to methamphetamine in 2005 alone. Between 2000 and 2005, law enforcement seizures by federal or state officials of methamphetamine manufacturing laboratories affected more than 15,000 children; nearly 4,000 children were exposed to chemical toxins, and 8 children died in connection with these laboratories. During the same year, the U.S. Office of National Drug Control Policy attributed nearly 11,000 drug-related emergency room visits to methamphetamine. The medical costs associated with methamphetamine are staggering as well. Not only is methamphetamine a health issue for people never caught, it is a financial and resource drain for those convicted of methamphetamine-related charges. One example of the health issues for those convicted is that methamphetamine use impacts the health of the teeth and gums; this has been a serious issue for departments of correction across the United States in that increased medical resources have been needed to address an issue that began prior to incarceration.

Demographics

The reason that methamphetamine use has increased, or become mainstream, has to do with the ease of obtaining the needed materials to manufacture the drug. Several processes exist; the simplest one, ephedrine/red phosphorus methamphetamine, uses either ephedrine or pseudoephedrine as a precursor (i.e., an ingredient needed to create something else). An increasing issue for pharmacies nationwide is the fact that criminals wanting to manufacture methamphetamine attempt to purchase cold medications containing pseudoephedrine. This problem for pharmacies is so extreme that many states have resorted to requiring identification to purchase these over-the-counter medications and limiting the amount that can be purchased. In response to this policy, criminals have resorted to hijacking chemical trucks carrying pseudoephedrine in order to have direct access for manufacturing. With this relative ease of access, the United States has a three-tiered methamphetamine problem. The first tier (i.e., most serious) exists in the western portion of the United States and tapers off around the Rocky Mountains. The second tier (i.e., midrange seriousness) exists in the eastern portion of the United States and tapers off around the Smoky Mountains. The third tier (i.e., lowest level of seriousness) is what some call “Middle America.” According to the U.S. Substance Abuse and Mental Health Administration, the spread of methamphetamine manufacturing and use has also affected some states unusually, meaning that they are in the third tier area yet have a methamphetamine problem at the same level as either the first or second tier; Arkansas is one such state. It is important to note that in the late 1980s, Congress adopted the Chemical Diversion and Trafficking Act of 1988 (CDTA). This act was the first attempt to promote chemical company accountability to public safety officials with respect to record keeping and security of chemicals in order to reduce the diversion (i.e., illegal transfer) of said chemicals outside of what is allowed by law for legitimate purposes.

Figure 1 Methamphetamine Racial Data by Fiscal Year

Source: Texas Department of State Health Services (January 25, 2007).

Issues Related to Race/Ethnicity

One of the realities associated with methamphetamine use is that it has historically been associated with European Americans. Figure 1 is an example of this reality along racial/ethnic lines in Texas. Nationally, this reality is changing each year as methamphetamine is used as a drug of choice, and now many African Americans and Latinos are increasing use of this drug at a significant level. Some scholars assert that the societal problems related to methamphetamine and crack cocaine (largely associated with African Americans) are similar. Researchers at the University of Arkansas at Little Rock and North Carolina Central University have examined the terminology used by politicians and the media with respect to both drugs and noted that use of each drug has been labeled “epidemic.”

Similarities exist with respect to many aspects of these drugs over time. Efforts to address the methamphetamine problem have differed from those undertaken to address the crack problem. The methamphetamine problem has existed for a longer period of time than has crack cocaine, yet efforts to address it more vigorously were not placed on the policy agenda until the problem became more mainstream and affected the cities and suburbs; these efforts are now quite heavy in some geographic areas. The policy agenda enforced mandatory minimums for crack cocaine almost instantly. More directly along racial/ethnic lines, for years there have been attempts to reduce the sentencing guidelines of 100-to-1 for federal crack cocaine convictions; all have resulted in only one substantive effort for change at the federal level (via the courts and not Congress) and virtually no effort at the state level to address the impact in terms of the high level of incarcerations of nonviolent offenders for inordinate amounts of prison time. In contrast, many states have begun efforts to address reducing sentencing for methamphetamine convictions. One defense attorney referred to the racial overtones by stating, "In 21 years of practice, I think I've had one crack defendant who was White, and I'm talking out of hundreds of defendants" (McGlone, 2007). Many researchers and advocacy groups are involved in trying to equalize how society perceives and responds to drug crime. So, while all within society should participate in addressing the public problems associated with methamphetamine, it is important and appropriate to consider how race/ethnicity are important in properly addressing these societal problems.

David R. Montague

See also Anti-Drug Abuse Acts; CIA Drug Scandal; Crack Babies; Crack Epidemic; Crack Mothers; Decriminalization of Drugs; Drug Courts; Drug Dealers; Drug Sentencing; Drug Sentencing, Federal; Drug Trafficking; Drug Treatment; Drug Use; Drug Use by Juveniles; Kimbrough v. United States; Mandatory Minimums; Myth of a Racist Criminal Justice System; War on Drugs; White Gangs

Further Readings

Ball, J., et al. (2005). Drug Abuse Warning Network 2005: National estimates of drug-related emergency department visits. Rockville, MD: Office of Applied Studies and Substance Abuse and Mental Health

- Services Administration. Retrieved from <http://dawninfo.samhsa.gov/files/DAWN2k5ED.htm#TopOfPage>
- Coker, D. (2003, Fall). Foreword: Addressing the real world of racial injustice in the criminal justice system. The Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology, 93(4), 827-880.
- Drug Enforcement Administration. (1994, October 13). Implementation of the Domestic Chemical Diversion Control Act of 1993 (P.L. 103-200). Retrieved from https://www.erowid.org/freedom/law/federal_register/59.FR.51887.shtml
- Jenkins, P. (1994). The ice age: The social construction of a drug panic. Justice Quarterly, 11, 7-31.
- King, R. (2006, June). The next big thing? Methamphetamine in the United States. Retrieved from The Sentencing Project website: http://www.sentencingproject.org/Admin/Documents/publications/dp_nextbigthing_meth.pdf
- Mears, B. (2007). Justices: Judges can slash crack sentences. Retrieved from Cable News Network website: <http://www.cnn.com/2007/US/law/12/10/scotus.crack.cocaine>
- National Institute of Drug and Health. (2005). Methamphetamine use, abuse, and dependence: 2002, 2003, 2004. The National Survey on Drug Use and Health Report (1-5). Washington, DC: Author.
- Office of National Drug Control Policy. (2004, March). FY 2005 national drug control strategy: Budget summary. Retrieved from <http://www.whitehousedrugpolicy.gov/publications/policy/budgetsum04>
- Stanberry, A., & Montague, D. (in press). Travesty of justice: African Americans and the politics of crack-cocaine. Albany: SUNY Press.
- Stern, S. (2006, June 5). Meth vs. crack: Different legislative approaches. Congressional Quarterly. Retrieved from November Coalition website: <http://www.november.org/stayinfo/breaking06/Meth-Crack.html>
- Texas Department of State Health Services. (2007, January 25). Methamphetamine racial data by fiscal year. Retrieved from <http://www.dshs.state.tx.us/sa/meth/MethRace.shtml>

MIAMI RIOT OF 1980

The Miami, Florida, riot of 1980 was a culmination of a sequence of events that were seen by many of the city's Black residents as clear evidence of a pattern of racial bias and outright racism directed against African Americans. Although Miami, like many other American cities, had experienced racial tensions in the past, the series of incidents that began in 1979 would lead to an eruption of violence that crippled Miami for days, leaving 18 people dead and close to 1,000 wounded. This episode did not result in the most monetary damage or the greatest number of casualties of any riot in U.S. history. It differed from previous race riots, however, in the way it began and progressed and the extent of anti-White violence that occurred.

In 1979 the climate of race relations in Miami was already somewhat fragile. Then, a series of five court cases reinforced perceptions within the Black community that African American residents of Miami could not expect fair treatment from the criminal justice system. The first case involved a man named Nathaniel Lafleur. The police raided his home looking for drugs and, in the process, beat him and his son and verbally abused them and a female friend who was present. No drugs were found; the police had raided the wrong home. The officers involved were suspended from the police department, but a grand jury did not indict the officers. The second case involved a 22-year-old Black man who was urinating outside of his car when an officer came up behind him and held a gun to his head. The gun went off; the officer first claimed that it was self-defense but then said that the gun went off by accident. The officer involved was not suspended or prosecuted for a criminal act. The third case involved an 11-year-old Black girl who was molested by a police officer in the back of his patrol car. The officer was allowed to resign before being arrested. As punishment, he was supposed to have counseling and to pay for any counseling the girl would need and to serve 3 years probation. After 4 months he was let out of counseling, and he stopped paying for his victim's counseling. Publicity surrounding the case caused it to be reopened and new charges filed, at which time the former officer left the county. The fourth case involved the first Black superintendent of schools in Dade County. He was accused of stealing plumbing fixtures from the construction site of his new vacation home. He was indicted and found guilty by an all-White jury and sentenced to 3 years in prison. All four of the cases were widely publicized and received a substantial amount of media coverage in the Miami metroplex. Although each one had an effect on the Black community, the fifth case was the most offensive.

Arthur McDuffie was a 33-year-old Black man who was chased by Miami police on the night of December 17, 1979. He was an insurance salesman and a father of two. The police chase lasted 8 minutes and involved at least 12 police cars when McDuffie stopped his motorcycle. Six to 12 officers pulled him from his motorcycle and beat him for about 3 minutes. His injuries were so severe that he died 4 days later.

In an effort to cover up the beating, officers on the scene immediately called dispatch for an ambulance, stating that the suspect had fallen off his motorcycle. The officers then vandalized McDuffie's motorcycle by hitting it with their nightsticks and ran over it with a squad car, all in an effort to cover up their actions. Officers crushed McDuffie's glasses and one officer shot his watch. Later, these actions would give rise to questions that could not be satisfactorily answered: for example, how did the motorcycle incur damage to both of its sides? A routine investigation of the accident was ordered, but could not be completed due to the quick cleanup of the officers involved with the chase. At 5:30 a.m., one of the officers at the scene admitted that McDuffie had been beaten with police flashlights.

As a result of the inconsistent accounts of that night, the commander in charge became suspicious; the Internal Review Section began questioning the officers in detail on December 17 and was not satisfied with their accounts of the incident. The state attorney, Janet Reno, was notified.

The Miami Herald ran its first article about the incident on December 24, 1979. On December 28, Janet Reno announced that four officers were charged with manslaughter and tampering with evidence and a fifth officer was charged with tampering with evidence and leading a coverup. Arthur McDuffie's funeral was held on December 29, and the Miami Herald ran a picture of his mother and the announcement of the charges against the five police officers on December 30. In response, Black newspapers and radio stations expressed anger over the charges, calling Janet Reno a racist. The consensus was that murder, not manslaughter, should be the charge. This outrage would grow again on January 1, 1980, when two of the officers were given immunity to testify against a third, whose charges were increased to second-degree murder. A protest march ensued on January 3 in front of the county criminal justice building. This protest was carried in the national news, and coverage of the Miami case grew. Locally, coverage grew to such a point that the defense asked to move the trial out of Dade County; the judge agreed.

The trial began on March 31, 1980, with an all-White jury. During the course of the trial, the beating was recounted in horrific detail. On May 17, just before noon, a verdict of not guilty was read, and the courtroom erupted. The Associated Press wire went out at about 2:30 p.m.; most Miami stations interrupted their programming to report the verdict. By 4 p.m., 300–400 people had gathered outside a popular Black radio station, while other crowds of Blacks gathered near African Square Park, the location of the city's largest housing project. By 5 p.m., the crowds had begun throwing rocks and bottles at passing cars driven by Whites. Within the next hour, rumors had begun to circulate of a White man shooting a young Black girl; as a result the crowds grew larger. At this point, concerned for their own safety, police patrol cars left the area around African Square Park. Soon afterward, a rock struck a car driven by a White driver; the car ran off the road and struck a Black girl in the crowd. The crowd pulled the man and his two passengers from the car and beat them. By 8:15 p.m. that night, more than 3,000 Black people gathered at the metro justice building for a rally arranged by the local National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Later that evening, the crowd attacked the police headquarters, vandalizing and setting fire to patrol cars as well as the building itself. The crowd then broke into other state buildings to vandalize and set fire to them. Additionally, Whites who passed through the area were attacked.

It took until 10 p.m. for the police to gather enough of a force to challenge the mob; once they did, the rioters moved north, to Liberty City, and began to destroy the White-owned businesses there. At midnight, the National Guard began to arrive, and a perimeter was created around the Black area of the city with the most rioting. The rioters continued to loot and set fires for most of the night. After a lull in the early morning of May 18, looters were back out by 10 a.m. The rioting, looting, and burning continued all day and for most of the next. By midnight of May 19, it was beginning to diminish. By then, 3,000 National Guardsmen had arrived and the perimeter around the looting was moving in. The situation continued to improve on May 20; the volume of 911 calls returned to normal, and there were only 10 riot-related arrests. Officially, the riot ended on May 21. On this date, the National Guard left, all of the barricades were opened, and public school classes resumed, although a curfew remained in effect for the next several days.

In the end, property loss was estimated at about $80 million and approximately 240 businesses had suffered looting and arson. Approximately another 100 businesses suffered losses in the neighboring areas of Perrine and Opa Locka. There were 18 deaths: eight White and nine Black civilians, and one police officer who had a heart attack. Unlike earlier riots across the nation in the 1960s, Whites were specifically targeted and assaulted. Additionally, the intensity of the damage was greater. The businesses that were affected suffered near-total losses, and while there was some looting, the intent apparently was to destroy property rather than to steal it.

Jennifer Hartsfield

See also Detroit Race Riot of 1967; Los Angeles Race Riot of 1965; Los Angeles Race Riots of 1992; Race Relations; Race Riots

Further Readings

Porter, B., & Dunn, M. (1984). The Miami riot of 1980. Lexington, MA: Heath.

MILITIAS

Militias have long played a prominent role in American history. Following the American Revolution, these organizations of both men and women have evolved as the foundation or model for many of the anti-government movements in current society, such as the infamous Ku Klux Klan, tax protesters, White supremacists, border patrols, and even self-proclaimed state military groups. Militias have historically engaged in violent behavior toward both law enforcement and civilians, which has resulted in hundreds of deaths over the past 2 decades and is directly fueled by their own agenda to influence the actions of the federal government.

Current militia groups in the United States are considered extremists within the right-wing movement because of their paramilitary training in arms and explosives, coupled with their strong anti-government ideology. The Anti-Defamation League estimates that there are as many as 50,000 militia members in the United States. Militia groups in American society are often varied in their motivations for assembly; ideologies range from religion to survivalism, and sometimes include White racial supremacy. A common factor that unites the militias is their defiance of—and their efforts ultimately to overthrow—the federal government, which members believe blatantly violates citizens' constitutional rights by imposing harsh taxes and infringing upon citizens' right to bear arms. This entry provides an overview of the history, ideology, description of the recent militias, and the political influence of such groups.

History

Militias first gained attention in the colonial era during the struggle for American independence from Britain in the battles of Lexington and Concord. The Articles of Confederation originally included a provision concerning militias, and in the absence of any formal military body, the U.S. Constitution continues to allow Congress to call upon militias in times of war or impending invasion. Following the American Revolution, the Constitution's Bill of Rights stated that "a well regulated militia" is "necessary to the security of a free State." Most acting militias are often seen as groups of radicalized people who are striving to depose the federal government and are preparing for this imminent battle by gathering and storing weapons and survival equipment. Many of these militias also have affiliations with White supremacist organizations or exhibit White supremacist ideologies themselves. The Ku Klux Klan at one time was considered a militia; they armed themselves both at the end of the 19th century and in the 1920s while traveling across the southern United States, harassing and murdering African Americans and civil rights sympathizers.

Ideology

The right to bear arms, detailed in the Second Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, is one of the principles militias espouse, citing American citizens' right to defend themselves against unwarranted government intrusion. Modern militias typically form and act in response to one body or event they see as encroaching on the independence and freedoms associated with being a citizen of the United States. Many different types of militia groups have emerged, fueled by a variety of ideologies. Among these, survivalists believe that individuals should be wholly independent of the larger economy and should be capable of protecting and sustaining themselves in the event of universal social chaos and disorder. Religiously or racially motivated groups are most frequently fueled by radicalized Christian views, often blaming the "Zionist-driven media" and government machines for government intrusions and injustices. These distinctions aside, most militia organizations engage in paramilitary training and are known to cache large quantities of weapons, ammunition, and supplies.

Militia Groups

One of the first militia groups to exist with this new anti-government mentality was the Posse Comitatus, formed in the 1980s by William Gale and Mike Beach, along with other right-wing groups such as the White supremacist White Patriot Party and the Christian Patriot Defense League. The Posse Comitatus viewed the county sheriff as the highest elected official in the county, who would form local armed units to implement those laws and regulations designated by the U.S. Constitution. This type of enforcement would allow for a designated local law enforcement body to protect and put into effect those rights guaranteed to the people by the Constitution. In the interest of preventing unlawful government intrusion, citizens would have greater power in affecting government decisions, as they could address concerns at the local level. In 1983, Gordon Kahl, a member of the Posse, became a fugitive after killing two U.S. Marshals in a shootout when they came to arrest him for parole violations. A few months later, another confrontation ensued, and both Kahl and another law enforcement officer were killed. This conflict was only one of a string of events that preceded a resurgence of the militia groups in the United States.

Following this incident, militias became popular during the early 1990s chiefly in response to two incidents that involved federal government intrusion on anti-government activities. Randy Weaver, a radical White supremacist, was living at a home in Ruby Ridge, Idaho, with his family in 1992 when the FBI and Federal Marshals came to arrest him for refusing to pay his taxes. Shots were exchanged from both sides, resulting in the death of Weaver's wife and son. Another incident, in 1993, involved David Koresh and the Branch Davidians, an extremist, revolutionary Christian sect that resided in a compound in Waco, Texas. Various federal law enforcement agencies sent officers to the compound to conduct a search for illegal weapons the group was believed to be stockpiling. The Davidians resisted, and four federal agents were killed. The Davidians and David Koresh were holed up in the compound for the next month and a half, while the government attempted to negotiate with them. Finally, the Federal Bureau of Investigation decided to raid the property in order to end the siege in April by releasing tear gas into the buildings. Several fires broke out, and the compound was burned to the ground. Eighty-two members of the Branch Davidians, including men, women, and children, were killed in the fire.

Both of these incidents received extensive coverage by the media, and thus the mistakes and failures of the federal government were broadcast around the country. Fear of excessive government intrusion began mobilizing different militia groups around the United States, and activity slowly increased. These organizations of men and women feared that this was one sign that federal government activities were growing more invasive, which would ultimately lead to greater abuse of civil rights. As these sentiments began mounting, another occurrence added to the generalized hysteria when, in 1995, Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols bombed the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, and killed 168 individuals. The two extremists declared that the attack was in response to the incidents at Ruby Ridge and Waco. While neither of these individuals were members of militia groups, they brought widespread attention to the radical movement around the country and mobilized further militias into increasing both recruitment efforts and survivalist training.

Militias during the 1990s were largely high profile due to both their presence in the media as well as their increased activity on the Internet. Group websites were dedicated to spreading militia ideologies, posting anti-government propaganda, and recruiting new members. Militias such as the Kentucky State Militia, Michigan Militia, or the Montana Freeman, a Christian patriot group, would often gather for group meetings to discuss conspiracy theories and to receive training in survivalist techniques such as building retreats, self-defense, and learning how to stockpile food and water. Also central to such gatherings was a fascination with weaponry, and members participated in arms training and other paramilitary activities. It was such behavior that U.S. government and law enforcement agencies feared would encourage many members to engage in more violent and extremist actions directed at government targets.

Militias in the United States have been re-forming and growing in membership since the attacks of September 11, 2001. Some observers have warned of a resurgence of militias in reaction against certain decisions by the current political administration. The Anti-Defamation League has reported that since 2004, various militia groups have had an increase in membership, similar to the increase of militia activity that took place in the early 1990s following the Ruby Ridge and Waco incidents.

Megan L. Gray and Stephanie Oakley

See also Anti-Defamation League; Ku Klux Klan; McVeigh, Timothy; Minutemen; Vigilantism; White Supremacists

Further Readings

- Abanes, R. (1996). American militias. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity.
- Anti-Defamation League. (2005). The militia movement. Retrieved from http://www.adl.org/learn/ext_us/Militia_M.asp?xpicked=4&item=mm
- Freilich, J. D. (2003). American militias: State-level variations in militia activities. New York: LFB Scholarly Publishing.

George, J., & Wilcox, L. (1996). American extremists: Militias, supremacists, klansmen, communists, and others. Amherst, NY: Prometheus.

Pitcavage, M. (2001). Camouflage and conspiracy: The militia movement from Ruby Ridge to Y2K. American Behavioral Scientist, 44(6), 957–981.

MINORITY GROUP THREAT

An inspection of arrest, sentencing, and incarceration statistics in the United States discloses substantial racial disparities. African Americans, in particular, are overrepresented in each of these areas. While the disproportionate representation of African Americans and other minorities is beyond dispute, explanations for this disparity are frequently debated in academic circles. One prominent explanation for the racial disparity found in criminal justice statistics utilizes a conflict perspective. According to this theoretical perspective, crime is socially defined, and the behaviors that are designated as violations of the criminal code tend to reflect the interests of the more powerful groups within society. Moreover, societal elites influence the ways in which the laws are implemented. Conflict theory therefore suggests that when relatively powerless groups in society are seen by the powerful as posing a threat to the status quo, formal social control agents may be deployed to repel these threats to the social order. Consequently, much of the racial disparity found in the criminal justice system reflects this bias, according to the conflict perspective.

In the United States, where Whites have historically wielded power over other racial/ethnic groups, it is possible to view Whites as the dominant group (or societal elite) and non-Whites as the subordinate group. An historical overview of the U.S. legal system discloses the privileged status of Whites. According to Chief Justice Roger Taney in Dred Scott v. Sanford (1857), under slavery African Americans “had no rights which the White man was bound to respect.” Indicative of this was the legal system, which often drew distinctions between African Americans and Whites. During the antebellum period in South Carolina, for example, slaves who murdered their masters could be burned alive. Further evidence of the lowly position of the African American in early American history can be found in statutes that until 1821 classified the murder of a slave as a misdemeanor. After the Civil War, Black codes quickly replaced the slave codes, and the “separate but equal” doctrine applied to Black/White relations until Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka in 1954. In the postslavery South, the law continued to differentiate between African Americans and Whites. African Americans were subjected to more capital offenses than their White counterparts, while White victims continued to be more highly valued by the legal system than African American victims. The harshest penalties of the criminal justice system were typically reserved for cases involving the rape of a White woman by an African American man. In contemporary society the greater value placed on White lives is epitomized by capital trials in which homicides involving White victims are significantly more likely to elicit a death penalty response than those involving African American victims.

Borrowing from the conflict perspective, Hubert Blalock posits that perceived threat can be influenced by a fear of competition over economic resources. Thus the economic well-being of Whites may be perceived to be in jeopardy as non-Whites are better able to compete for jobs, positions, and economic resources. Blalock also argues that the White majority may perceive a threat to their political power as the proportion of non-Whites increases. This fear, in turn, heightens the probability of discriminatory behavior and leads to greater inequality. Nevertheless, the relationship between racial composition and use of social control by Whites should be curvilinear; discriminatory behavior should decline after the non-White population becomes a numerical majority, since this enables the non-White population to influence the political process that resulted in its subordination. This approach to comprehending race relations in the United States has been termed power threat by Blalock and social threat by Allen Liska. Other scholars have employed the terms minority group threat or racial threat to describe this approach.

Measuring Perceived Minority Group Threat

Measurement of perceived minority group threat is imprecise, since numerous factors may contribute to the perceptions that groups have of one another. Empirical investigations of minority group threat theory typically employ macro-sociological approaches that compare the racial composition of an area (city, county, state) with some measure of social control within the same area. Among the dependent variables examined by researchers are police force size; arrest rates; expenditures for policing; police brutality; police use of deadly force; bail and pretrial release decisions; prosecutorial decisions; use of the death penalty; individuals' chances of incarceration; and expenditures for corrections. Other researchers have examined the theory using lynching and disenfranchisement as dependent variables.

Despite the growing accumulation of investigations of minority group threat theory, most have neglected micro-sociological variables that are implied by the theory. Although the response by the dominant White group is assumed to be related to the perceived threat posed by the non-White group, an increase in the size of the non-White population does not necessarily raise the level of perceived threat. To address this possibility, some researchers have examined other potentially relevant factors (e.g., race relations in the area, degree of racial segregation) that might affect the perception of racial threat. Nonetheless, few studies have actually employed micro-sociological variables to rigorously test the assumptions of the theory.

Impact of Perceived Minority Group Threat on Social Control

Empirical investigations of this theory suggest that the impact of perceived minority group threat on social control may vary depending on the circumstances. Of particular interest is the notion that the percentage of non-White residents does not affect the use of agents of social control until it exceeds some threshold. Stated somewhat differently, a relatively small percentage of non-Whites may not be perceived as threatening by the White status quo. Accordingly, measures of social control should be unrelated to non-White increases as long as these increases do not exceed that threshold. Examining these notions empirically, some researchers have hypothesized that minority populations may be perceived as threatening to Whites once they represent approximately 10% of the population. Because studies frequently examine cities with larger minority populations, however, this proposition remains largely untested.

Additionally, some researchers have posited that the size of the city affects the proposed relationship between percentage of minority residents and use of the social control apparatus. These investigators contend that race relations in smaller cities may be qualitatively different from those characterizing larger cities. Given the group dynamics of smaller cities, it is typically suggested that when cities are small, inhabitants know one another more intimately and the perception of minority group threat is consequently less prominent. Despite its intuitive appeal, the impact of city size on the racial composition/social control relationship remains unknown.

The impact of perceived minority group threat on social control may also be mediated by historical antecedents. In particular, race relations specific to a region may influence the proposed relationship between racial composition and social control. An investigation using Standard Metropolitan Statistical Areas as the unit of analysis revealed a positive relationship between the percentage of African American inhabitants and per capita police detectives in 1970, after the urban riots of the 1960s, whereas data prior to the civil unrest failed to disclose an empirical relationship between racial composition and per capita police detectives.

It is also conceivable that different minority groups may vary in the degree to which they are perceived as threatening to the White status quo. This possibility was raised in an investigation of 74 police precincts in New York City during three time periods from 1975 to 1992. The researcher found that the effect of the size of the minority group on police deployment varied by minority group. In this study, the percentage of Latina/o residents was related to police deployment, whereas the percentage of African American residents was not. When Latinos accounted for at least 23% of the precinct population, increases in the Latina/o population were accompanied by increases in police deployment. In explaining this apparent anomaly, the researcher analyzed demographic changes in each precinct. Because African Americans became more concentrated within a declining number of precincts during this time frame, the investigator speculated that they were perceived by the police as being “under control.” In contrast, the Latina/o population that had grown in size across precincts represented a greater threat that necessitated increased deployment of police. Although this finding suggests an important qualifier to the theory, more research is needed before definitive conclusions can be drawn.

Another potential qualification of the broader theoretical perspective involves the level of racial segregation. It has been speculated that the segregation of non-Whites from Whites diminishes the level of perceived threat by the White majority. Conversely, in an integrated community where Whites and non-Whites come into more frequent contact with one another, the growing presence of the non-White population may be more likely to elicit feelings of threat among the White population. Although inadequately tested in the scholarly research, one major study of large U.S. cities over three census periods found that segregated cities with larger African American populations had smaller police departments than their more integrated counterparts.

Conclusion

Empirical investigations of minority group threat theory have been inconclusive and sometimes contradictory. Numerous factors may be responsible for the mixed results found in the literature, including differences in analytical strategies employed, differences in time periods examined, use of different units of analysis, and use of different control variables. Also contributing to the mixed support is the frequent reliance on a single measure of minority group threat, typically the percentage of African Americans in the population. The use of an aggregate measure of minority group threat is particularly problematic given that the theory suggests the need to measure perceived minority group threat which may or may not possess a direct linear relationship with minority population size. Ethnographic research, such as that conducted by William Julius Wilson and Richard P. Taub in their investigation of four Chicago communities that had undergone racial/ethnic transition, would facilitate our understanding of this micro-sociological process. At the macro-sociological level, both political and economic measures as suggested by Blalock’s version of this theory should be more thoroughly investigated.

A final caveat bearing on this theoretical perspective should be noted. Although minority group threat theory posits that social control measures are used by the White majority to control “threatening” non-White populations, the perspective does not specify the extensiveness of the social control process. Future research that would enhance our understanding of this perspective should focus on the informal methods of social control utilized by the dominant group to maintain control over the subordinate group. Additionally, future studies should ascertain the extent to which various formal social control measures are employed by the dominant group to keep the minority population in check.

Marvin D. Free, Jr.

See also Conflict Theory; Critical Race Theory; Disproportionate Arrests; Disproportionate Incarceration; Institutional Racism; Myth of a Racist Criminal Justice System; Race Relations; Racialization of Crime; Sentencing Disparities, African Americans; Sentencing Disparities, Latina/o/s

Further Readings

- Crawford, C., Chiricos, T., & Kleck, G. (1998). Race, racial threat, and sentencing of habitual offenders. Criminology, 36, 481–511.
- Free, M. D., Jr. (2005). Prosecutorial decision making and minority group threat theory. Criminal Justice Studies, 18, 7–28.
- Jacobs, D., & Carmichael, J. T. (2004). Ideology, social threat, and the death sentence: Capital sentences across time and space. Social Forces, 83, 249–278.
- Kent, S. L., & Jacobs, D. (2005). Minority threat and police strength from 1980 to 2000: A fixed-effects analysis of nonlinear and interactive effects in large U.S. cities. Criminology, 43, 731–760.
- King, R. D., & Wheelock, D. (2007). Group threat and social control: Race, perceptions of minorities and the desire to punish. Social Forces, 85, 1255–1280.
- Parker, K. F., Stults, B. J., & Rice, S. K. (2005). Racial threat, concentrated disadvantage and social control: Considering the macro-level sources of variation in arrests. Criminology, 43, 1111–1134.

- Sharp, E. B. (2006). Policing urban America: A new look at the politics of agency size. Social Science Quarterly, 87, 291–307.
- Stolzenberg, L., D'Alessio, S., & Eitle, D. (2004). A multilevel test of racial threat theory. Criminology, 42, 673–698.
- Wilson, W. J., & Taub, R. P. (2006). There goes the neighborhood: Racial, ethnic, and class tensions in four Chicago neighborhoods and their meaning for America. New York: Knopf.

MINUTEMEN

Historically, the term minutemen originally referred to those individuals who took up arms against the increasing presence of British soldiers in the American colonies. During the American Revolution, these men formed a portion of the Massachusetts militia that was ready to fight at a moment's notice; hence the name "minutemen." Nowadays, individuals calling themselves Minutemen have organized in opposition to the movement of undocumented immigrants into the United States. This entry examines the nature and scope of this controversial recent movement.

Minuteman Project

The Minutemen formed in response to the presence of illegal immigrants in the United States and the increasing demonstrations by various immigrant groups demanding residency and citizenship rights. According to the Center for American Progress, as of May 2007, there are 11.1 million undocumented migrants residing in this country. Most of these undocumented workers are Hispanic/Latina/o and live in the southwestern United States. Since the beginning of the 21st century, increasing media and political attention has focused on this issue, and in response, restrictive legislation has been proposed and in some cases enacted by state and local governments, further attracting the attention of American society. In October 2004, Jim Gilchrist created the Minuteman Project in Aliso Viejo, California. The project is a non-profit organization consisting of volunteers whose activities include border watches, rallies, and fundraising. Funding is derived from donations, membership fees, and the selling of Minutemen paraphernalia such as T-shirts, hats, and flags. This organization consists of a national board of directors with chapters located throughout the country. The project has chapters positioned at both the state and local levels, with chapter leaders in each division.

Membership grew rapidly over the first year, as some citizens recognized an outlet for their frustrations over the rise of illegal immigration. These members participate in protests, fundraising, and border patrols. According to the group's website, members often carry firearms, binoculars, flashlights, and radios while on patrol, and if apparent illegal immigrant activity is observed, they contact local or federal authorities. While this movement continued to grow steadily, some members became displeased with the way that Gilchrist was structuring the group and organizing their labors. In 2005, Chris Simcox, a cofounder of the original Minutemen Project, decided to break with the project and form a new group, the Minutemen Civil Defense Corps (MCDC).

Minutemen Civil Defense Corps

The MCDC, in contrast to the project, is frequently involved in armed border patrols, resulting in a more extreme militia group of minutemen. They are also involved in the Border Fence Project with other anti-illegal immigration groups, such as Ranch Rescue. Construction of the 700-mile fence began in 2006 and is currently being built in Arizona along the U.S.–Mexico border to help deter illegal crossings. The groups have also installed surveillance equipment along the fence to monitor a greater distance along the border, which requires fewer workers to patrol. Simcox prescribes that the surveillance system will be easily accessible from home computers to monitor and report any suspicious activity without the individual having to be at the actual location. The group actively promotes communication between MCDC members and border patrol agents reporting immigration violations.

While border patrol is a major function of the group, the MCDC is also involved in regular protests of undocumented workers, in which altercations with counter-protesters are not unusual. This group's structure and funding are similar to those of the Minuteman Project. Attempting to appear as a paramilitary group, the organization has an application process for prospective members, and a training manual is available online. The manual includes instructions on the proper use of radios and describes appropriate etiquette among volunteers and with other individuals encountered during group functions. The MCDC claim that they do not interact with illegal border crossers; they simply report suspicious or illegal activities they observe and let the border patrol take control of the investigations and arrests. However, it is common for MCDC to often carry firearms while on border watch. The MCDC will waive its volunteer registration fee if the prospective member has a license to carry a concealed weapon.

Politics

Both groups, the MCDC and the project, have become more involved in politics to promote their views against undocumented immigrants. Backed by Tom Tancredo, a House representative from Colorado, the project continues to gain attention and support from citizens around the country. Along with Tancredo, both Jim Gilchrist and Chris Simcox have dedicated time to speaking at colleges and various community events around the country to garner support and recruit new members. With the onset of his new political career, Jim Gilchrist was ousted from the Minuteman Project by board members for accusations of embezzlement during the spring of 2007. After failing to successfully sue the organization in a California court in response to the allegations, Gilchrist officially left the group and went on to form Jim Gilchrist's Minuteman Project. Problems with leadership are not the only troubles these minutemen face; criticisms from other groups are sometimes brutal.

Criticisms and Trends

The Minutemen groups' efforts are focused chiefly on the U.S. southern border and on Hispanic immigrants crossing into the United States from Mexico. Minutemen groups have continually been labeled as racist organizations by the media, various politicians, and pro-immigrant groups across the country for their conservative stance on illegal immigration.

Support for their movement has been provided by members of neo-Nazi and White supremacist groups. According to the Southern Poverty Law Center, their mission has been defended by groups such as the Ku Klux Klan and Aryan Nations, and they have been affiliated with the National Alliance, in addition to various other groups that target minorities. Associations also include numerous border patrol and anti-illegal immigration groups, such as Save Our State and the San Diego Minutemen, and other local groups that often rally at day labor sites and collect information on employers and employees to protest the endorsement of illegal workers in the United States. Members of these groups have also been known to film, photograph, and confront citizens who pick up immigrants from these sites. Heated protests have led to scuffles and the use of pepper spray by members and counter-protesters. MCDC has also been criticized for being connected to acts of vandalism at immigrant camps and with various armed assaults against alleged undocumented workers. Some members of these organizations are viewed as unstable individuals who are willing to engage in violence, threats, and Mexican flag burnings in protest.

As the immigration controversy continues to grow and public opinion has become increasingly divided, Minutemen groups are becoming more politically active, focusing on current and future legislation intended to curb illegal immigration. Local chapters unable to participate in border watches are encouraged to contribute by reporting immigration violations to authorities. Notwithstanding charges of racism from civil rights organizations such as the Southern Poverty Law Center and the American Civil Liberties Union, MCDC officials report that membership in the corps nationwide now exceeds 9,000, and the numbers continue to increase.

Megan L. Gray and Stephanie Oakley

See also Alienation; Deportation; Immigrants and Crime; Immigration Legislation; Immigration Policy; Latina/o/s; Militias; Victimization, Latina/o; Vigilantism

Further Readings

Anti-Defamation League. (2006, May 23). Extremists declare "open season" on immigrants: Hispanics target of incitement and violence. Retrieved

- November 19, 2008, from http://www.adl.org/main_Extremism/immigration_extremists.htm
- Anti-Defamation League. (2008). The Minutemen. Retrieved November 19, 2008, from <http://www.adl.org/Extremism/minutemen.asp>
- Gilchrist, J., & Corsi, J. R. (2006). Minutemen: The battle to secure America's borders. Los Angeles: World Ahead Media.
- Southern Poverty Law Center. (2005, April 22). Nazis, racists join Minutemen Project. Retrieved November 19, 2008, from <http://www.splcenter.org/intel/news/item.jsp?aid=13>

MIRANDA V. ARIZONA

The 1966 case of Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, has remained at the forefront of legal discussion and has become a benchmark for violations of the Fifth, Sixth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. Miranda v. Arizona has been immortalized through the adaptation of Miranda warnings required to be given by law enforcement officers before taking an individual into custody for questioning. Miranda warnings provide that “you have the right to remain silent, that anything you say can and will be used against you in a court of law; that you may request the presence of an attorney, either retained by you or appointed by the court; and that you have the right, even after beginning to answer questions, to stop answering or request an attorney.”

One significant problem that has arisen concerning Miranda warnings is the language in which they are given to suspects taken into custody. Ultimately, if a suspect does not understand his or her rights, he or she cannot intelligently waive those rights. The following sections describe the case of Miranda v. Arizona and discuss how language barriers impede understanding of Miranda warnings.

Case History Prior to Miranda v. Arizona

Prior to Miranda v. Arizona, the U.S. Supreme Court, then headed by Chief Justice Earl Warren, applied the due process voluntariness test in cases requiring regulation of police interrogation practices.

The Court derived this test from a common-law rule that prohibited the use of involuntary confessions at trial. The Court’s move toward protecting citizens from the perceived harm of police interrogation involved two cases: Messiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964), and Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964). In the case of Messiah, the Court mandated that any incriminating statements deliberately elicited from an indicted accused in the absence of counsel must be excluded. This was an important, yet limited, decision by the Court in that most police interrogations occur before the indictment phase begins. In Escobedo, the Court further applied the Sixth Amendment protections to preindictment interrogation. Although the Escobedo decision was significant, its exact scope was ambiguous, causing confusion and generating a heated debate between legal analysts at the time. In order to clarify the ambiguity of the Escobedo decision, the U.S. Supreme Court accepted four cases for review, including Miranda v. Arizona.

Miranda v. Arizona

In 1965 the U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari in four cases, Vignera v. New York, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), Westover v. United States, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), California v. Stewart, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), and Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966). The Court granted certiorari to evaluate whether the four defendants’ Fifth Amendment rights were violated by the admission of their confessions at trial, as well as to provide concrete constitutional guidelines for law enforcement agencies and courts to follow. All four cases began with similar circumstances in that the petitioners had been taken into custody and interrogated without being informed of their right to an attorney.

The case of Miranda v. Arizona began on the morning of March 13, 1963, when Ernesto Miranda, a poor Mexican immigrant with a prior criminal record, was taken by police to the station house, accused of the rape and kidnapping of an 18-year-old woman. Police placed Miranda in a lineup before the crime victim and interrogated him for more than 2 hours in an interrogation room. Eventually, Miranda confessed to the rape and kidnapping as well as to the robbery of a bank worker. Miranda signed a written confession typed by police that was later used against him at the trial in which a jury convicted him of kidnapping and rape. Miranda was sentenced to 20–30 years of imprisonment on each count, the sentences to run concurrently.

Miranda's lawyers appealed his conviction, arguing that he did not know he was protected from making self-incriminating statements by the Fifth Amendment. On appeal, the Arizona Supreme Court affirmed Miranda's conviction emphasizing that Miranda never specifically requested counsel and holding that Miranda's constitutional rights were not violated. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed the Arizona Supreme Court's decision, holding that Miranda was not in any way informed of his right to counsel or his right against self-incrimination, therefore making his confession and subsequent conviction invalid. The Court decided the other three cases similarly, reversing the convictions of Vignera and Westover and affirming the acquittal of Stewart by the California Supreme Court.

In collectively deciding these cases as such, the U.S. Supreme Court further established that accused persons, prior to indictment, are afforded Fifth, Sixth, and Fourteenth Amendment protections. The Court also stated that unless adequate protective devices are established to shield a suspect from the pressures of police interrogation, such interrogation will be invalid, and that in the absence of other safeguards, interrogations will be considered invalid unless police inform suspects of four rights, including the right to remain silent and the right to have an attorney present during interrogation. Additionally, interrogations will be invalid unless the suspect voluntarily and intelligently waives those rights. By establishing the now well-known Miranda warnings and waiver, the U.S. Supreme Court created what some refer to as the most important constitutional guidelines for police seeking to interrogate suspects.

Impact of Miranda v. Arizona

Following the Supreme Court's decision in Miranda v. Arizona, a great debate ensued between those claiming such warnings would hinder law enforcement and those vested in protecting individual rights against governmental interests. Courts of criminal procedure are faced with discerning the admissibility of evidence due to the restrictions placed on law enforcement officers in obtaining incriminating statements as well as physical evidence gathered from such statements given by suspects. Research conducted during the 1960s and 1970s, however, demonstrated that Miranda had proved to cause little difficulty for police in their pursuit to solve crimes. Empirical studies in the 1990s found that a majority of suspects waive their Miranda rights and choose to make some kind of statement to the police.

Although the Miranda warnings were groundbreaking at their onset, many feel that the warnings do not provide adequate protection in cases of abusive or overreaching interrogation practices. Mere awareness of one's rights does not ensure understanding or provide a suspect with the means to counter coercive interrogation practices utilized by law enforcement. According to legal analysts, there are two significant limitations to Miranda. When a suspect waives his or her rights and is subjected to police interrogation, Miranda (1) fails to address the problem of inadequate fact finding in interrogation cases and (2) fails to provide guidelines or restrictions on police interrogation methods that are likely to produce untrustworthy statements. Once a suspect waives his or her Miranda rights, law enforcement need only be concerned if the suspect later invokes his or her right to have an attorney present.

The Language of Miranda

Many cases have followed Miranda in which courts have had to reevaluate the way that Miranda protections are given by law enforcement. One issue that has surfaced is whether or not individuals given the Miranda warnings actually understand their rights and therefore whether they can knowingly and intelligently waive those rights. As per Miranda, a waiver is "valid only if it is made knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently." In the case of Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412, 421 (1986), the Court stated that a waiver is knowing and intelligent if it is "made with full awareness of both the nature of the right being abandoned and the consequences of the decision to abandon it." Due to this, the courts have seen many cases where defective intelligence, language differences, and the lack of hearing ability have been raised as reasons why Miranda warnings were not understood and therefore not knowingly and intelligently waived.

The U.S. encompasses a very diverse population. Not every individual residing in the United States today speaks or understands the English language. For example, there are thousands of Hispanic individuals across the nation whose primary language is Spanish. Law enforcement agencies have attempted to adapt to Spanish speakers by hiring bilingual officers, teaching their English-speaking officers Spanish, and by creating cards with translated Miranda warnings that the officers carry with them when on duty. Even with these efforts, courts have seen the issue of language raised as pertains to the suppression of statements and confessions. In the case of U.S. v. Hernandez, 913 F. 2d 1506, 1510 (10th Cir. 1990), the appeals court acknowledged that “language barriers may inhibit a suspect’s ability to knowingly and intelligently waive his Miranda rights.” Further, in the case of People v. Aguilar-Ramos, 86 P.3d 397 (Colo. 2004), the Colorado Supreme Court held that mistranslated Miranda warnings are grounds for the suppression of statements made during interrogation because the defendant could not have knowingly and intelligently waived his rights.

The U.S. Supreme Court’s Miranda decision has had far-reaching effects beyond most people’s expectations when the case was decided in the 1960s. Issues, such as unconstitutional interrogation practices and the language barriers faced by some law enforcement officers, are still arising today and, if the past is any indication, will continue to appear in the future. It will be up to the courts to establish what future acts constitute Miranda violations, and only time will reveal how Miranda will continue to impact criminal justice agencies and U.S. citizens who come under the purview of the criminal justice system.

Ashley G. Blackburn

See also Escobedo v. Illinois; Latina/o/s; Mapp v. Ohio;
Police Accountability

Further Readings

Brière, E. (1978). Limited English speakers and their Miranda rights. TESOL Quarterly, 12, 235–245.

Cassell, P., & Hayman, B. (1996). Police interrogation in the 1990s: An empirical study of the effects of Miranda. UCLA Law Review, 43, 839.

Leo, R., & Thomas, G., III. (1998). The Miranda debate: Law, justice, and policing. Boston: Northeastern University Press.

Stuart, G. (2004). Miranda: The story of America’s right to remain silent. Tucson: University of Arizona Press.

White, W. (2001). Miranda’s waning protections: Police interrogation practices after Dickerson. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

MISSOURI V. CELIA, A SLAVE

A Black slave woman, Celia (no known last name), was approximately 14 years old when Robert Newsom bought her in 1850 as a slave for his Missouri farm. After several years of being raped repeatedly by Newsom, Celia killed him, was convicted of murder, and hanged. Her trial and execution illustrate the limited rights available to female slaves and the way in which the criminal justice system of the time left them with little protection against abusive masters.

There is little doubt that Newsom raped Celia on the way home from the sale, and he continued this behavior in the years that followed. At the farm, Celia was separated from the five male slaves Newsom owned and given her own cabin located close behind the main house. Within a few years, Celia had two children who were fathered by Newsom. Around February 1855, Celia became pregnant again. During this time she was involved with George, another slave on Newsom’s farm. According to interviews presented during trial testimony, the following occurred: George thought the child was his and wanted Celia to put an end to Newsom’s visits. Newsom entered Celia’s cabin on the evening of June 23, 1855, despite Celia’s telling him earlier in the day that she didn’t want him visiting any more. As Newsom continued approaching her, Celia claimed she was protecting herself against him and his sexual advances when she struck him twice with a stick. Realizing she had killed him, Celia burned his body in her fireplace and had the remaining bones and buttons buried. On December 22 of the same year, having been convicted of murder, Celia was hanged.

As a Black female slave, Celia's rights within the existing laws were exceedingly limited. The following is a brief synopsis of Celia's trial and appeal. At the time of the incident, strong pre-war activities between pro- and antislavery activists in the bordering states of Missouri and Kansas were taking place. It is certain that these uprisings led to politically motivated court decisions. Additionally, the Dred Scott case had just been decided, in which the Missouri Supreme Court reversed a prior ruling concerning free slaves. This did not add favor to Celia's case. In essence, Celia's story reflects a denial of laws and dignity for slaves.

At the time Newsom acquired Celia, he was 60 years old. His wife had died the year before; his two sons were married and lived elsewhere. His two grown daughters lived with him on the property the family had acquired in Callaway County in 1822 after traveling from their former home in Virginia.

It would have been highly inappropriate for George to confront Newsom regarding his involvement with Celia. It might have meant his own death, because Newsom would likely have interpreted that George was trying to overstep his master. Moreover, according to slave law, marriages between slaves were not acknowledged, and any offspring of any female slave were the property of the master, even if the female slave left that master's ownership. Hence, female slaves were valuable by virtue of the children they were to bear.

On June 24, around breakfast time, Newsom's daughters concluded their father was missing and instituted a search. Questioned several times, Celia finally admitted what had happened and claimed that she only meant to hurt him, not kill him. Both the inquest jury and trial jury consisted of all White men. Celia's 2-day trial started on October 9, 1855. Celia was prohibited from testifying because she was a slave, and to do so would put the word of a female slave against her White master, which was unthinkable within the laws. Had it been allowed, her testimony would have brought forward that Celia was a minor when Newsom began to rape her.

However, slave law also held that rape by a master was virtually impossible; a sexual assault of a slave was considered more of a trespass. Because a female slave was a master's property, it was impossible for an owner to be viewed as trespassing property owned by himself. And even though a wife could not allege being raped by her husband, Missouri code held that any woman could allege being raped by a man. However, "any woman" referred to White women, though Celia's attorney tried using the defense that Celia fit into the category of "any woman." Another defense was that slaves were lawfully allowed to use self-defense against a master if they felt their life was being threatened. However, these defenses and other defenses of motive were objected to by the prosecution and struck down by the judge. Likewise, they were rejected as jury instructions. Basically, the jury was asked to consider only the narrow question of whether Celia killed her master.

Celia's execution by hanging was scheduled for November 16. Her attorney attempted to have the case retried on the basis of trial error, but the trial judge denied the motion. The only option was to appeal for retrial and delay the hanging. Celia escaped for about 3 weeks, but she reappeared in jail after the November hanging date. Celia's court-appointed lawyer seemed genuinely concerned that Celia be given every benefit. During Celia's absence, his unique application via personal letter to one state supreme court justice resulted in Celia's case being reviewed by the three-judge panel. However, the appeal for retrial was denied in an abrupt two-paragraph decision.

Throughout the trial and afterward, Celia never faltered in her claim that she had carried out the crime alone. Although it was asked during trial (but objected to and penned out of the court record), the question remains unanswered as to how Celia, pregnant and sickly, could accomplish getting Newsom's body to the fireplace and burning it in the course of the overnight time span, considering also that her two children were in her cabin.

The location of the remains of Celia's body is unrecorded. Her two children are unaccounted for as well, though one of them may have been sent to Newsom's older son. Official payment records disclose Celia's third child was delivered stillborn by a county doctor, presumably during the time she was jailed. Had Celia been allowed to testify about her motives and circumstances of the crime, her death sentence might have been lifted.

Diane Cismowski

See also African Americans; Death Penalty; Dred Scott Case; Interracial Crime

Further Readings

- McLaurin, M. (2002). Celia, a slave. New York: Perennial HarperCollins.
- State of Missouri versus Celia, a Slave. File 4496, Callaway County Court, October Term, 1855. Callaway County Courthouse, Fulton, MO.

MODEL MINORITIES

The phrase model minority stereotype is used in the social sciences to describe a racial minority group that has excelled in the United States despite prejudice and discrimination. Specifically, this stereotype has become synonymous with the Asian American population. Although there are no standard model minority traits, characteristics include a strong work ethic, educational achievement, and economic success. In addition to these traits, the model minority stereotype also highlights the low involvement of Asian Americans in criminal activities. Asian Americans have maintained this role in criminology, because as a group they have significantly lower crime and incarceration rates than other racial minority groups. Adversely, the model minority stereotype has led to resentment toward Asian Americans by other minority groups. The attention drawn toward crimes against Asian Americans tends to eclipse the occurrence of any crimes committed by this population. Over time, the model minority stereotype has resulted in the creation of unrealistic standards and social and psychological pressures among the Asian American population. This entry examines the history of the model minority stereotype, as well as the characteristics of and problems with such stereotypes.

Origin of Model Minority Stereotype

Coined in 1966 by the sociologist William Peterson, the expression “model minority” was first presented in The New York Times to highlight the upward mobility and success of the Asian American population in the United States. Peterson suggested that the Japanese culture’s strong emphasis on work and education prevents Japanese immigrants and their offspring from becoming American’s problem. Therefore, Asians, such as Japanese Americans, are able to succeed and overcome racial discrimination. This image was gradually generated in response to the civil rights movement, portraying Asian Americans as having succeeded in the United States through hard work and merit. The model minority stereotype spotlights the success of Asian Americans, consequently understating the prevalence of racism against them and other minority groups.

Characteristics of the Model Minority

The model minority stereotype is a multifaceted myth that is viewed from various perspectives. The characterization of the model minority image created a new set of stereotypes that was used to capture the achievements of the Asian American population. Many social scientists attribute the model minority labeling of Asian Americans to their strong work ethic and educational achievement. Others deem this image to be related to the continuing objectification, the “outsider within,” and victim images that Asian Americans have maintained throughout American history.

Asian Americans have filled labor pools in agriculture, low-skill jobs, technical and professional fields. As a whole, they have the second lowest poverty rate, the greatest proportion of immigrants who become U.S. citizens, the highest median family income, and lower crime rates than other minority groups. These factors all contribute to the ability of Asian Americans to succeed and aid in the perpetuation of unrealistic standards that constitute the model minority stereotype.

Stereotypical images of Asian Americans are conveyed through the mass media and primarily depict them excelling academically, socially, and economically in spite of adverse conditions. This portrait suggests that the characteristics of this particular racial group should serve as an example to other minority groups. Despite the positive association, it can be misleading and foster disproportionate and unrealistic standards for Asian Americans and other minority groups. The model minority image also eclipses the accounts of major crime, youth gang activities, prostitution, and drug extortion committed by Asian Americans in larger cities. Asian Americans who live in large, crowded cities have more barriers that make it difficult to achieve the unrealistic model minority success. Therefore, many who live in crowded areas tend to find other means of achieving success through gangs and criminal involvement.

Problems of the Model Minority Stereotype

The media often depict Asian Americans as the image of success, portraying them as technologically advanced, highly educated, and hardworking. Historically, however, Asian American immigrants have been subject to prejudice and economic exploitation. For example, the notion of the “yellow peril” was circulated in California in the 1870s following an influx of Chinese immigrant laborers, reflecting the resentment by White working-class laborers competing for jobs against Asian Americans and fueling anti-Chinese discrimination in employment, housing, and elsewhere. These and similar efforts led to the national Chinese Exclusion Act of 1882 that prohibited further immigration from China and prevented legal residents of Chinese origin from becoming citizens. Today, Asian Americans still encounter resistance and discrimination, but because many have middle-class backgrounds and job skills, adjustment has been relatively less problematic. Unfortunately, the model minority image makes it difficult to identify the hardships and discrimination that Asian Americans have faced throughout U.S. history.

Similar to negative stereotypes, those positive traits incorporated in the model minority stereotype negatively affect the Asian American population and leave little room for ethnic differences. For example, as with other racial groups, the Asian American population consists of a variety of ethnicities. The model minority image reflects the success primarily of Japanese, Chinese, and Korean Americans and draws less attention to the disproportionate representation of Vietnamese, Filipino, and Laotian ethnic groups within the Asian American population. Many of these groups face problems of language barriers impeding social interaction with the general populace, difficulty adjusting from a rural to an urban society, and economic exploitation.

The model minority stereotype places enormous pressure on Asian American youth to excel and to conform to the expectation that Asian Americans are disciplined, quiet, and intelligent. Many are also expected to enter the technical and professional occupations. The pressure to conform to both Asian family norms and the norms of the society at large can lead to frustration and confusion. Expectations for high achievement create societal pressure whose consequences have at times included not only the rejection of Asian American youth by their peers but also a rise in depression and suicide among Asian American youth.

Such rejection, and the inability to conform to the model minority stereotype, is also related to the recent growing number of Asian American youth gangs and criminal activities in large cities and Chinatowns. Although the existence of Asian American gangs dates back to the 1800s, these earlier gangs were a way for early immigrants to adapt to their new environment and overcome hardships through mutual reliance. Today, such gangs offer Asian American youth a way to cope with contemporary societal pressures. They also serve as an alternative means of gaining respect, status, and independence. Negatively, youth gangs are the sources for criminal activity and violence. Asian American youth gang members participate in drugs, sex, prostitution, sexual violence, theft, robbery, and other illicit acts. The growth of gangs in New York City, Los Angeles, and San Francisco has resulted in an increase of gang-related homicides within the Asian American community. These gangs are also the source of violence toward Asian American families and of fear in Asian American neighborhoods.

The problem-free model minority image of Asian Americans has also given rise to controversy, ethnoviolence, and hate crimes against Asian Americans from other racial groups. Asian Americans are often viewed as victims of hate crimes and out-group victimization. For example, the incidence of violent crimes increased 57% from 1998 to 1999 cross-nationally. The Los Angeles riots of May 1992 prompted the destruction of Korean-owned stores by African American neighborhood residents. During that period, these patterns suggested a rise of hate crime against Asian American across the United States.

LaSheila S. Yates

See also Asian Americans

Further Readings

- Chin, A. (2001, April). Origins. Retrieved from <http://www.modelminority.com/article72.html>
- Jang, S. J., Messner, S. F., & South S. J. (1991). Predictors of interracial homicide victimization for Asian Americans: A macrostructural opportunity perspective. Sociological Perspectives, 34, 1–19.
- Marger, M. N. (1991). Race and ethnic relations: American and global perspective (2nd ed.). Belmont, CA: Wadsworth.
- National Commission on Asian American and Pacific Islander Research in Education. (2008). Asian Americans and Pacific Islanders: Facts, not fiction: Setting the record straight. New York: College Board. Retrieved from <http://professionals.collegeboard.com/profdownload/08-0608-AAPI.pdf>
- Parrillo, V. N. (2006). Strangers to these shores: Race and ethnic relations in the United States (8th ed.). Boston: Allyn & Bacon.
- Wong, P., Lai, C. F., Nagasawa, R., & Lin, T. (1998). Asian Americans as a model minority: Self-perceptions and perceptions by other racial groups. Sociological Perspectives, 41, 95–118.

MOLLEN COMMISSION

Two decades after the seminal report of the Knapp Commission, New York City Mayor David N. Dinkins issued an Executive Order in July 1992 to establish the Commission to Investigate Allegations of Police Corruption and the Anti-Corruption Procedures of the Police Department. The commission—which was commonly known as the Mollen Commission, in recognition of its chair, Milton Mollen—was given a threefold mandate: to investigate the nature and extent of corruption in the New York Police Department; to evaluate the department’s procedures for preventing and detecting corruption; and to recommend changes and improvements in those procedures.

The commission categorized patterns of corruption as corruption for profit, corruption for power, and corruption for “street” law enforcement purposes. To a great extent, the victims of police corruption are the many law-abiding people who reside in the densely populated, drug-ridden, high-crime police precincts within the city that foster patterns of police corruption. Since these areas are the neighborhoods where many people of color live, the ramifications of police corruption as it relates to race and crime are profound.

The State of Modern Police Corruption

The Commission’s Investigations

The commission based its findings on field investigations, on analysis of patterns of corruption complaints, and by developing cooperation from numerous corrupt police officers. They discovered that past beliefs that corrupt officers would not turn on fellow officers or cooperate with corruption investigations were wrong. Officers were often eager to cooperate and assist prosecutors in exchange for leniency against them.

The New Nature of Corruption

The commission determined that most police corruption in New York City arises from the drug trade. Much drug-related police corruption in the city is traced to the explosion of the cocaine and crack trade, which created opportunities for corrupt police officers and criminals to profit from each other. Previously it was thought that most drug-related police corruption involved corrupt police officers stealing from drug dealers. The commission, however, learned that additionally, much drug-related police corruption involved officers using their authority as law enforcement officers to allow open-air drug markets to flourish in the city. In this way, the commission concluded that today’s corruption involves police officers using their police powers actively to assist, facilitate, and strengthen the drug trade in New York City. The commission determined that drug dealers often pay corrupt police officers to work hand in hand with them to actively facilitate their drug-related criminal activities. To that end, the commission determined that the victims of police corruption are not the city’s drug dealers; dealers are often the beneficiaries of corruption. The victims of police corruption are the many law-abiding people who reside in the neighborhoods where corruption thrives.

The commission developed an erosion theory of police corruption. Many officers who fall prey to corrupt activities in their role as law enforcement officers seemed to be the result of regular and constant exposure to conditions and opportunities of corruption in crime-ridden police precincts that worked to change the attitudes and behaviors of some police officers. The commission hypothesized that this also worked as erosion on many honest police officers who developed a tolerance for widespread police corruption among their colleagues.

Patterns of Corruption

Cops Committing Theft

Patterns of thefts by corrupt police officers were found to be strikingly similar across the city from precinct to precinct, according to the commission. These patterns included thefts from street dealers in the form of “shakedowns,” thefts from radio runs, thefts from unlawful searches and seizures, thefts from lawful searches and seizures, thefts from car stops and drug couriers, and off-duty robberies, all committed by police officers. Theft-related police corruption is usually motivated by greed but sometimes is simply an effort to gain power over street criminals.

Cops Protecting and Assisting Narcotics Traffickers

Some corrupt police officers were motivated by money to conspire with drug dealers to protect, assist, and strengthen illegal drug enterprises. Opportunities to engage in corruption related to narcotics trafficking has increased not only for officers in special narcotics units, as was the case a generation ago, but also for many officers assigned to routine patrol duties. As the narcotics trade has grown in the past few decades, so has the extent to which patrol officers come into regular contact with drug operations.

Cops as Drug Dealers and Users: Distributing and Using Drugs

The commission found that some corrupt police officers were drug dealers motivated by profit, and others were drug users themselves. Some officers acted as drug dealers in the course of their police duties, cultivating connections with drug dealers who lived in their precincts, and selling drugs on duty, and off duty, often in full police uniform. Other corrupt officers used fellow police officers as fences to sell their stolen drugs. Some officers acquired illegal drugs while on duty as police officers in the city, and then, in turn, distributed the drugs while off duty in their home neighborhoods and towns, often outside the city. Finally, the commission determined that drug abuse among police has grown considerably in recent years, especially the use of cocaine and steroids.

Perjury and Falsifying Documents

Perjury and falsification of documents is the most common form of police corruption. This form of corruption is not motivated by greed, but rather by a perverted sense of justice that tolerates and even encourages falsification to achieve otherwise legitimate law enforcement ends. Falsifications include testimonial perjury, that is, lying under oath; documentary perjury, that is, falsely swearing under oath in an affidavit or criminal complaint; and falsification of police records, that is, falsifying facts and circumstances of an arrest when writing police reports. Unlike other areas of police corruption, the commission found that falsification is often encouraged by police supervisors and prosecutors and is rarely, if ever, the subject of any internal affairs investigations or employee disciplinary actions against police officers. In sum, the practice of falsification is generally accepted as a law enforcement tool to achieve legitimate law enforcement ends, when hampered by constitutional constraints, in order to obtain criminal convictions that would, but for acts of police falsification, result in dismissals of charges.

Police Violence and Brutality

The commission found that there is often a link between police violence and acts of police corruption. It was noted by the commission that historically there has been a distinction drawn between police corruption and police brutality. That distinction has become blurred in much of the corruption investigated by the commission, as violence by the police sometimes occurs to facilitate thefts of drugs and money by the police. The commission found that police officers who are corrupt are more likely to be brutal. Corrupt police officers appear to be more violent than others, even in situations unrelated to corruption. Finally, the commission noted that police violence is an engrained part of the police culture. Some officers engage in violence for the sake of violence. The same loyalty that fosters police violence also fosters and conceals police corruption.

Police Culture and Corruption

The commission determined that certain aspects of police culture work to facilitate corruption. Corruption is encouraged by setting a standard that nothing is more important than loyalty to fellow police officers, resulting in an environment that emboldens corrupt police officers and those who are susceptible to corruption. Ultimately, these attitudes work to thwart all efforts to control police corruption. Aspects of the police culture that facilitate police corruption include the code of silence, an us-versus-them attitude prevalent among police officers, erosion of traditional law enforcement values and pride, police cynicism, weakened moral character and fitness, and police unions that fuel the insularity that characterizes police culture.

The Collapse of Corruption Controls

The commission concluded that the police department had abandoned its responsibility to police itself and failed to take any substantive steps to create a culture dedicated to rooting out corruption within the New York Police Department. There was a great institutional reluctance to uncover police corruption and no independent external pressure to counter that reluctance. Throughout the department—from the highest-ranking officials to the officers on patrol—there was a widespread belief that any efforts to uncover police corruption would have devastating effects on the police department's morale and reputation. This paralyzing fear led to a police culture that tolerated corruption among its ranks.

Recommendations for Reform

The commission concluded its report with recommendations for reform in five areas: (1) police culture and management (including specific recommendations relating to recruitment and screening, recruit and in-service performance evaluations, integrity training, corruption susceptibility and police management, drug testing, and city residency requirements for police officers); (2) command accountability (including supervision and enforcement of command accountability); (3) internal investigations (including internal affairs operations, recruitment of qualified investigators, intelligence-gathering operations, investigative approach, organizational structure, command liaisons, and civil rights investigations); (4) heightening deterrence and sanctions (including discipline, department's advocate office, and disability pensions); and (5) community outreach (including community policing).

Philip Matthew Stinson

See also Christopher Commission; Police Accountability; Police Corruption; Rampart Investigation

Further Readings

- Commission to Investigate Allegations of Police Corruption and the City's Anti-Corruption Procedures. (1972). Knapp Commission report on police corruption. New York: George Braziller.
- Ivkovic, S. K. (2005). Fallen blue knights: Controlling police corruption. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Kappeler, V. E., Sluder, R. D., & Alpert, G. P. (1994). Forces of deviance: Understanding the dark side of policing (2nd ed.). Prospect Heights, IL: Waveland.
- New York City Commission to Investigate Allegations of Police Corruption and the Anti-Corruption Procedures of the Police Department [Mollen Commission]. (1994). Commission report. New York: Mollen Commission.
- Sherman, L. W. (1978). Scandal and reform: Controlling police corruption. Berkeley: University of California Press.

MOORE V. DEMPSEY

In the 1923 case of Moore v. Dempsey, the U.S. Supreme Court case held that where public opinion overwhelmed the trial process, such as when an agitated lynch mob waited for a verdict on the grounds of the courthouse, the trial was void. Additionally, even though the state appellate court dismissed the habeas corpus petition, an inadequate corrective measure, it would not prevent federal habeas corpus review from determining whether federal constitutional rights had been violated. This holding was a landmark decision that affected the interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment's requirement of due process on the state and federal levels, as well as the right to federal habeas corpus review. This entry reviews the facts of the case and the activities and critical role of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) leading up to the Supreme Court decision.

Facts of the Case

On the night of September 30, 1919, a group of African American sharecroppers met in a church in Hoop Spur, Arkansas (near Elaine, Arkansas), to organize a chapter of the Progressive Farmers and Household Union of America. Although the media and prosecutor later claimed that the group was planning insurrection against the local White community, some contemporary historians now believe that meeting was the beginning of a labor union that was intent on suing the local farmers for various social and work-related issues. Robert Hill, organizer of the meeting, had also organized the union and had contacted a White attorney, U. S. Bratton, to represent the union in litigation against the local White landowners. During that meeting, several shots were fired into the church by a passing car occupied by police officer W. A. Adkins and railroad security guard Charles Pratt, as well as an African American informant. The men inside the church returned fire; Adkins was killed and Pratt was wounded.

Over the course of the next day, this event resulted in a chaotic free-for-all of shootings, beatings, and arrests that fractured this small town and resulted in the deaths of at least 30 people, five of whom were White men. Governor Charles Brough requested and deployed federal military personnel into the area to quell the "insurrection" and thereby imposed martial law on the area. He also appointed the Committee of Seven to investigate the "insurrection." When order was restored, several hundred African American men were arrested; 79 were eventually sentenced to prison, 12 of whom received the death penalty.

The trials of the arrested men began immediately. An angry mob gathered outside the courthouse, and lynchings were threatened for any defendant not found guilty and sentenced to the death penalty, where that defendant had been charged with the killing of any White man. As the federal troops stood guard around the courthouse, the mob was placated with promises by a few members of the Committee of Seven that those defendants found guilty of murder would be executed. Several African American witnesses were tortured to force them to make incriminating statements that were used to convict all 12 capital defendants. The remaining 67 defendants were given prison sentences of up to 21 years in prison each.

NAACP Involvement

Walter White, who later rose to be the executive secretary of the NAACP, and Scipio Africanus Jones, a middle-class African American attorney from Little Rock, Arkansas, came to the aid of these defendants. From the beginning of the 20th century through World War II, the NAACP grew rapidly and provided legal representation for defendants across the United States. As a small, but vocal, number of African Americans became professionals and businesspersons, they guided the larger population toward cultural development. Incidents such as the violence and riot of Elaine, Arkansas, were not uncommon in America during this period.

Endangering himself, White visited Elaine and wrote articles publicizing the church meeting, the social chaos that followed, and the subsequent trials. He further hired a White attorney, who was also the former Arkansas attorney general, Colonel George Murphy, to represent the capital defendants in appeals. Jones raised money and offered to also represent the defendants. The Arkansas Supreme Court presented two opinions, consolidating the cases: Banks v. State, which combined the cases of Alf Banks, Jr., John Martin, Albert Giles, Joe Fox, Will Wordlow, and Ed Ware, and Hicks v. State, which combined the cases of Frank Hicks, Frank Moore, Ed Hicks, J. E. Knox, Ed Coleman, and Paul Hall. Through the efforts of Murphy and Jones over the next 2 years, 1920 and 1921, the Banks cases were overturned twice, retried, and the death penalty was reimposed on both occasions, but the case was appealed a third time. The Hicks case was reaffirmed. During this time, Colonel Murphy died and his law partner, Edgar McHaney, replaced him. Working under the deadline of the death penalty, McHaney and Jones filed an appeal with the chancery court of Arkansas. The chancery judge, John E. Martineau, ordered a stay against carrying out the death sentence, thereby giving the defense attorneys time to file their case in federal court. At approximately the same time, the Supreme Court of Arkansas overturned the chancery court's stay, Hicks v. State was accepted for federal review, and a federal stay was then filed.

After four years in state court, Hicks v. State came to the Supreme Court under pleadings written by Scipio Africanus Jones, yet presented by White NAACP attorney Moorfield Storey. The Supreme Court evaluated the case in light of the precedent set by Frank v. Mangum (1915). The Frank case held that trials convened under undue pressure from angry mobs violated constitutionally protected rights to due process.

Ending the Ordeal

The Supreme Court held that Hicks v. State should have been heard by the district court, given the mutually accepted fact that the trial court had operated under the undue pressure of the lynch mob that waited outside its doors. By that time, the general population of Arkansas had become sympathetic with the group of 79 incarcerated African American men. Scipio Africanus Jones was able to use the Supreme Court remand and the change in public opinion to negotiate a settlement that all of the capital inmates would receive 12 years in prison. This eliminated the possibility that the Banks case would be retried. Within months, Governor Thomas C. McRae pardoned the remaining incarcerated capital defendants, and Jones was able to get the other 67 released when the governor granted indefinite furloughs to all remaining inmates incarcerated on charges stemming from this event.

Maldine Bailey

See also Brown v. Mississippi; Lynching; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); Race Riots; Vigilantism

Further Readings

- Cortner, R. C. (1988). A mob intent on death: The NAACP and the Arkansas riot cases. Middletown, CT: Wesleyan University Press.
- Frank v. Mangum, 237 U.S. 309; 35 S. Ct. 582; 59 L. Ed. 969; 1915 U.S. LEXIS 1338 (1915).
- Gilje, P. A. (1996). Rioting in America. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press.
- Kerner, O. (1968). Report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders (Executive Order #11365). Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office.
- Kilpatrick, J. (2000). Ordinary men: African American lawyers and the civil rights in Arkansas before 1950. Arkansas Law Review and Bar Association Journal, 53, 299.
- Moore v. Dempsey, 261 U.S. 86 (1923).

MORAL PANICS

Moral panics—artificially created crime scares—have long and strong roots in American history. Researchers, often influenced by critical conflict-oriented Marxist themes, have demonstrated that moral entrepreneurs demonized “dangerous groups” to serve their own religious, political, economic, social, cultural, and legal interests. Although the aims, form, dynamics, and outcome of moral panics vary throughout history, they have, with isolated exceptions, been initiated by powerful interest groups to manage the minds, bodies, morals, and behavior of threatening groups—often, the poor and powerless.

Colonial Era Panics

Colonial era moral panics were, in large part, based in religion. The early colonies were small, closely knit, religiously based societies. The early settlers knew their neighbors and regarded themselves as their brother's keepers. Outsiders were viewed as deviant and dangerous. The Puritans, intent on building God's “shining city on the hill,” viewed Quakers as a threat to religious and social order. Laws were passed banishing them from the colony. When this did not work, punishments were escalated, resulting in a number of hangings. Similarly, Anne Hutchinson and her followers were banished from Massachusetts in 1638 for heresy and for challenging the authority of the government. The 1692 witchcraft trial of Salem Village, Massachusetts, resulting in 20 executions, was a product of a collective moral panic.

The colonists were also concerned with race issues. Slave codes were carefully crafted to regulate every aspect of slave behavior. However, fear of slave revolts sometimes escalated to the level of mass hysteria. Responses to real and perceived threats of slave insurrection were swift and severe. In 1741, for example, 170 people were put on trial in New York, charged with conspiracy and arson. Legal formality was suspended. Seventy Blacks and seven Whites were banished from North America. Sixteen Blacks and four Whites were hanged, and 13 Blacks burned at the stake.

19th-Century Panics

Nineteenth-century moral panics reflected a variety of dynamic and dialectically interacting forces. The arrival of millions of immigrants transformed the United States from a small, isolated agrarian society into a world industrial power. But the Irish, Italian, and German immigrants who served as the backbone of the industrial revolution were, from the perspective of native-born Americans, deviant and dangerous. Their dress, speech, behavior, and religion—especially Catholics, who were viewed as mindless servants of the Pope—threatened American institutions. Native Protestants viewed the vice, sin, and crime of emerging cities as a reflection of the immigrants' immoral character. Alcohol consumption was a particularly serious concern: the Irish drank hard liquor, Italians wine, Germans beer—and they disrespected God by drinking on Sunday.

Nineteenth-century moral entrepreneurs tried to regulate America's new "dangerous classes." Throughout the 19th century, Protestants and Catholics battled over the control of American political, economic, educational, and legal institutions. State legislatures, still governed by native Protestants, passed laws controlling bars, brothels, gambling, card playing, and billiard halls. The passage of the Comstock Law by Congress in 1873 reflected the mind-set and fears of the times.

Anthony Comstock, a politically connected Connecticut dry goods salesman, was charged with the authority to regulate American obscenity and vice. Prostitution, gambling, abortion, immoral books and literature (e.g., crime stories) were subjected to the critical gaze of Comstock and elitist moral entrepreneurs.

Nineteenth-century race-based threats and moral panics were regionalized. Post-Civil War Southerners believed that savage Black rapists were lusting after White women. Harsh Jim Crow laws and barbaric public lynchings were needed to maintain social and moral order and keep newly freed Blacks in their "proper place." Post-Civil War Northerners were alarmed by unfettered Black migration. Segregated schools, restrictive housing laws, and a variety of other formal and informal methods of degradation and oppression introduced a new form of American apartheid aimed at dealing with the Black threat.

Westerners felt besieged by Chinese immigrants, who had been imported to build railroads. Orientals, like Blacks, were viewed as subhuman. White European Americans believed that opium dens lured unsuspecting Whites, particularly females, to their doom. Legislatures in western states passed race control legislation. Chinese immigrants were forced to live in segregated areas, prohibited from testifying in court, forced to pay special taxes, and prohibited from wearing the queue hairstyle—a symbol of their heritage and culture.

Modern Panics

Early 20th-century moral panics were also driven by race, religion, politics, and economics. The passage of the Mann Act in 1910—federal legislation prohibiting the transportation of females across state lines for immoral purposes—was, in large part, introduced to prohibit sexual contacts between Black men and White women. The 1920 Red Scare and Palmer raids, which resulted in the arrest of thousands of suspected socialists, communists, and anarchists, was a product of fears of political revolution following the Russian Revolution of 1918. Drugs were also perceived as a serious threat to social order. The passage of the Volstead Act in 1919 launched a national war on alcohol. The appointment of Harry Anslinger as head of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics in 1930 marked the beginning of a 30-year war on marijuana. “Reefer madness,” warned Anslinger, threatened to ruin America’s youth.

Crime scares and moral panics continued in the second half of the 20th century. During the 1950s, Americans were consumed with the threat posed by Russia and the cold war. The McCarthy hearings—in retrospect, a modern witch hunt—were, in many ways, a continuation of the Red Scare of the 1920s. Drug wars were redirected to new real and exaggerated threats. During the 1960s and early 1970s, American authorities were fixated on the threat of marijuana, heroin, and LSD. In the 1980s, the attention of drug czars turned to cocaine. Alarmist politicians and criminal justice experts, with the assistance of the press and criminal justice agencies, convinced the public that crack cocaine babies were going to overwhelm the health care system and bankrupt the nation. The passage of harsh cocaine laws—making 1 ounce of crack the equivalent of 10 ounces of powder cocaine, the drug of choice of White Americans—was indirectly aimed at African Americans. These laws contributed to an explosion in Black incarceration in the 1980s and 1990s.

Over the past several decades, new threats have emerged: child molesting, child abduction, child pornography, serial killers, mass murderers, satanic rituals, school violence, juvenile superpredators, violent rap music, Internet pornography, and more recently, illegal Mexican immigration and terrorism. Many of these issues are, to be sure, legitimate and warrant serious public concern. But we would be well advised to consider the history of misguided moral panics when we think about these issues, assess threats, and pass new social control legislation. The history of moral panics offers valuable lessons—particularly, a path to avoiding future witch hunts.

Alexander W. Pisciotta

See also Black Codes; Chinese Exclusion Act; Cocaine Laws; Immigrants and Crime; Immigration Legislation; Lynching; Media Portrayals of African Americans; Minority Group Threat; Racialization of Crime; Television News

Further Readings

Friedman, L. (1993). Crime and punishment in American history. New York: Basic Books.

Jenkins, P. (1992). Intimate enemies: Moral panics in contemporary Great Britain. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction.

McCorkle, R. C., & Miethe, T. D. (2002). Panic: The social construction of the street gang problem. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall.

Walker, S. (2006). Sense and nonsense about crime and drugs: A policy guide. Belmont, CA: Thomson Wadsworth.

MOVIES

Film, as a reflection of society, conveys the hopes and anxieties of the culture in which it is created. In American film, criminal characters—mob bosses, robbers, contract killers, gangsters—have become posterized icons. The crime movie includes such subgenres as gangster films, film noir, prison films, detective films, cop action films, and serial killer or horror films. Traditionally, crime movies have centered on White male cops or criminal enterprises, though the minority criminal/cop has gradually come to be more commonly represented in film.

The crime genre is nearly as old as film itself. Edwin S. Porter’s The Great Train Robbery, a silent short western, was released in 1903. D. W. Griffith introduced organized crime to film with The Musketeers of Pig Alley (1912). But it was real-life gangster Al Capone and the organized crime of Prohibition era bootlegging that coincided with the rise of talkies (films with audible speaking) to propel the popularity of crime movies. The three classic gangster films of the era, all based loosely on Capone, were Little Caesar (1930), The Public Enemy (1931), and Scarface: The Shame of a Nation (1932), the release of which was delayed 2 years due to its portrayal of excessive violence. It was at this time that the Hays Production Code was adopted to instate moral acceptability codes and ultimately to censor film. For movie production studios, Hays proscribed the glorification of crime, restricted the amount of violence and drug use, and ordered retribution for criminal acts. In 1967, the Motion Picture Association of America (MPAA) film rating system replaced Hays.

In 1939, The Roaring Twenties, which portrays rival bootlegging gangs during Prohibition and solidified the reputations of actors Humphrey Bogart and James Cagney, became the last of the classic gangster films. The 1940s saw the birth of American film noir, a dark cinematographic and thematic style of filmmaking that featured plots ranging from mystery (The Maltese Falcon, 1941) to murderous double cross (Double Indemnity, 1944) to bank heist (The Killing, 1956) and even espionage (Notorious, 1946). Orson Welles's Touch of Evil (1958) is arguably the last true film noir picture, though many subsequent crime films (i.e., Blood Simple, 1984; Reservoir Dogs, 1992; A History of Violence, 2005) have been derived from classic film noir.

Prison films have portrayed life behind bars and commented on such issues as harsh prison conditions, wrongful imprisonment, and the lives of prisoners awaiting execution. The Defiant Ones (1958) is a particularly renowned film in this genre that deals with race relations between two escaped convicts shackled together by chain: one White (Tony Curtis) and one Black (Sidney Poitier), as the two are forced to overcome their racial hatreds in order to survive life on the run. For their roles, both actors, in addition to the film itself, were nominated for Academy Awards. Cool Hand Luke (1967), a story of prisoner rebellion, and Escape From Alcatraz (1979), which details an escape from the infamous prison, respectively made Paul Newman and Clint Eastwood prisoner antiheroes. The Shawshank Redemption (Best Picture Academy Award nominee, 1994), which revisited prison race relations, featured a Black protagonist (Academy Award-nominated Morgan Freeman) prison con man who befriends a wrongly imprisoned White banker (Tim Robbins). American History X (1998) tells the story of a neo-Nazi murderer liberated by an old teacher and a fellow prisoner, both African Americans.

Cop films focused on the "good" guys: cops, detectives, and law enforcement agents. G-Men (1935) starred Cagney as a haughty government agent infiltrating criminal organizations. Years later, In the Heat of the Night (1967) would become the first cop film to deal with racial issues. Starring Sidney Poitier (who that year also starred in the interracial marriage-themed Guess Who's Coming to Dinner) as a smart-minded detective and Rod Steiger as a bigoted sheriff, the film deals with racial tension as the two attempt to solve a murder. In 1971 Clint Eastwood tracked a serial killer as badass cop Dirty Harry, which spawned four sequels. The cop genre gradually evolved into the buddy cop film. Freebie and the Bean (1974) was the first of its kind, and Colors (1988), which unites a veteran and a rookie cop, provides an interesting perspective on gangs and racial conflict in Los Angeles. Films such as Lethal Weapon (1987) and the comedy Rush Hour (1998) have paired interracial cops as partners, and in 48 Hours (1982), a convict on a 2-day pass partners with a cop.

The 2-minute-long Le Manoir de Diable (1896) initiated horror film, followed by such classics as Nosferatu (1922), Frankenstein (1931), The Mummy (1932), The Birds (1963), The Night of the Living Dead (1968), and The Shining (1980). The serial killer film would parallel horror, and the first of its kind was the German film M (1931), based on the real-life Vampir von Düsseldorf serial murderer. Other notable serial killer/horror films based on actual murderers include Hitchcock's Psycho (1960), Badlands (1973), Silence of the Lambs (1991), and Monster (2003). A direct descendent of horror, the slasher film achieved notoriety with The Texas Chainsaw Massacre (1974), Halloween (1978), and Friday the 13th (1980).

It was the rebirth of the gangster film in the 1970s that intensified the status of crime film. Francis Ford Coppola's The Godfather (1972) and The Godfather II (1974), which tell the story of an Italian American Mafia family, are considered two of the greatest films of all time by the American Film Institute. These films paved the way for such modern gangster classics as Brian De Palma's Scarface (1983) and The Untouchables (1987), Martin Scorsese's Goodfellas (1990), Casino (1995), and The Departed (2006), and Quentin Tarantino's Reservoir Dogs (1992) and Pulp Fiction (1994). Only the latter film features interracial characters.

The crime and race relations genre is gradually becoming more racially diversified. African American directors like Spike Lee (Do the Right Thing, 1989), John Singleton (Boyz n the Hood, 1991) and the Hughes Brothers (Menace II Society, 1993) introduced the world to hood movies. Chinese director John Woo became noteworthy for his Chinese mob films A Better Tomorrow (1986), The Killer (1989), and Hard Boiled (1992). The Brazilian film City of God, which portrays the chaotic youth violence of the self-titled housing project in 1980s Rio de Janeiro, achieved critical success in America, garnering four Academy Awards.

Doug Evans

See also Prison Gangs; Profiling, Serial Killer; Scarface Myth; Social Construction of Reality

Further Readings

- Munby, J. (1999). Public enemies, public heroes. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Strickland, R., Foste, T. E., & Banks, T. L. (2006). Screening justice: The cinema of law: Significant films of law, order, and social justice. Buffalo, NY: W. S. Hein.

Websites

- The Greatest Films: <http://www.filmsite.org>
- Mafia Movie Database: http://www.mafiaflix.com/movie_list.php

MYTH OF A RACIST CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM

The criminal justice system is an integral part of American government and the American historical experience. The system's institutional components, law enforcement, courts and corrections, derive their authority from constitutional and statutory sources. Historically, the concepts of justice and criminality in the United States originate from English common law and Judeo-Christian ideas. The praxis of justice and criminality, however, has been shaped by the historic encounter of diverse peoples and interests. As a result, justice has not been experienced by all classes of Americans. Likewise, the concept of criminality has been manipulated to disadvantage certain classes of Americans. The disproportionate representation of racial and ethnic minorities in the criminal justice system supports the inference that the system is racially biased. There are those, however, who assert that such an inference is ideologically driven and that any disparity in the criminal justice system is due to other variables. Essentially, these proponents argue that it is a myth that the criminal justice system is racist. This entry examines these two varying points of view, which have shaped the discourse on race and crime and have been focal points for much conflict in American society.

As a modern idea, race is a scientific tool used to identify and classify humans by physiological and genetic traits. At its most extreme, race theory hypothesizes that intelligence, criminal behavior, and sexual disposition are predetermined by racial traits and classification. Some proponents of this view argue that the disproportionate presence of racial minorities in the criminal justice system may be a result of racially linked criminal propensities. According to this view, the criminal justice system is neutral, and the incidence of disparate treatment of racial minorities once in the system is a result of the individual prejudice of criminal justice professionals and not due to systemic factors. Further, criminal justice institutions have been modernized and criminal justice employees have been professionalized. Some proponents of this view believe that the egregious practices of the past are no longer permitted or sanctioned and that statistical evidence does not support any assertion of disparate treatment in arrests, conviction, and incarceration. They assert that anecdotal or personal observations that support the claim of racism in the criminal justice system are functions of subjective bias. According to this perspective, the nature or inherent traits of offenders are responsible for their encounters with the criminal justice system. The criminal justice system, admittedly, has its flaws, but fundamentally the administration of justice has guided its ideals and practice throughout history. Emphasis is placed on the person's individual and/or racial characteristics to explain disparities with the system.

A second view, however, asserts that race is an artificial concept that arbitrarily attributes characteristics to classes of people to support the goals of social engineering and economic enterprise. Proponents of this view note that, historically, American society embraced the concept of race and racial ideas were used to justify the subjugation of the American Indian, who was often referred to as heathen, uncivilized, and subhuman. Race theory was also used to justify the enslavement and exploitation of Africans. Similarly, race theory supported the exploitation of Chinese and Japanese laborers. The racial constructs as they pertain to these classes of people were codified into law and established as the protocol for social usage. Thus racism became systematic and systemic. The tragic history of these subject classes is well documented. The criminal justice system, its institutions and processes, operated within a society in which racial ideology prevailed. By extension, then, the criminal justice system can be construed as racist. Proponents of this view argue that in addition to the historical record, the fact that racial minorities are disproportionately represented in arrests, convictions, imprisonment, and executions supports the view that the criminal justice system is racist.

It is an historical fact that the criminal justice system originated, developed, and operated within the context of a society marred by racial ideology. On more than one occasion, the U.S. Supreme Court failed to uphold the rights of racial minorities as citizens, and state legislatures enacted laws entrenching racial disparity. Racism is not merely an individual attitude but is supported by institutional and systemic concepts, patterns, and practices. Racial inequities are evident in criminal justice policies today, such as different criminal penalties for possession and sale of crack as compared to powder cocaine. Critics of the prison industrial complex point to the economic benefits for Whites of prisons located in predominantly White rural communities. The acquittal of White police officers in several cases involving the use of deadly force reinforces the notion that the rules of engagement for policing have not changed.

James P. Mayes

See also Biological Theories; Discrimination–Disparity Continuum; Dred Scott Case; Native Americans: Culture, Identity, and the Criminal Justice System

Further Readings

- Barlow, D., & Barlow, M. (2000). Police in a multicultural society: An American story. Long Grove, IL: Waveland.
- Gabbidon, S. L., & Greene, H. T. (2009). Race and crime (2nd ed.). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
- Kappeler, V. E., & Potter, G. W. (2005). The mythology of crime and criminal justice. Long Grove, IL: Waveland.
- Reiman, J. (2007). The rich get richer and the poor get prison (8th ed.). Boston: Pearson/Allyn & Bacon.
- Walker, S., Spohn, C., & Delone, M. (2007). The color of race (4th ed.). Belmont, CA: Thomson Wadsworth.
- Washington, L. (1994). Black judges on justice. New York: New Press.
- Wilbanks, W. (1987). The myth of a racist criminal justice system. Monterey, CA: Brooks/Cole.

NAACP LEGAL DEFENSE FUND

The NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., which is also known as the “NAACP LDF,” “LDF,” or the “Inc. Fund,” is a unique public interest law firm. The firm was founded in 1940 and has litigated civil rights issues nationwide in the state and federal courts. Its efforts in the criminal law area have not been as overwhelmingly successful as in desegregating public facilities, but the firm’s legal victories have changed the quality of life for all within the United States. Today, LDF has many public interest law firm imitators. LDF also awards college scholarships to highly qualified African American students.

Founding of the NAACP

LDF’s parent organization, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), was founded in 1909 by a group of White and African Americans to improve the economic, political, and legal plight of African Americans. The organization engaged in lobbying and publicity-related activities. The importance of using the law to effect the goals of the NAACP was apparent at the organization’s founding, as one of the group’s original aims was the enactment of a federal antilynching law. Despite its lobbying efforts, Congress never passed such a bill. The NAACP’s National Legal Committee, which consisted of volunteer lawyers who served as an advisory board, handled requests for assistance, and provided advice in individual cases to African Americans accused of interracial violence.

Overwhelmed with requests for assistance, the national office adopted a policy of handling legal issues of national import, leaving the local branches of the organization to deal with legal matters that had a more local focus. In the 1920s, NAACP leaders believed that the federal courts could provide a hospitable forum for the legal redress they sought. They eventually settled on implementing a large-scale, widespread, dramatic campaign to give the Southern Negro his constitutional rights, his political and civil equality, and therewith a self-consciousness and self-respect which would inevitably tend to effect a revolution in the economic life of the country.

That campaign turned into a litigation strategy to desegregate public education.

Desegregation in Education Litigation Campaign

The effort was designed and led by Charles Hamilton Houston, who joined the national office as special counsel in July 1935. For 5 years, Houston was the driving force in devising the legal strategy and educating the public on the NAACP’s legal campaign against segregation. His goal was realized after his 1950 death, when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in Brown v. Board of Education (1954) that the “separate but equal” doctrine had no place in education. The Supreme Court would eventually apply that principle to all areas of U.S. public law. During his time at the NAACP, Houston hired his protégé, former student and eventual successor, Thurgood Marshall. Marshall became the NAACP’s special assistant counsel in late 1936, and 2 years later succeeded Houston as special counsel. He served in that capacity until 1961.

Creation of the Legal Defense and Educational Fund

During the midst of the desegregated education campaign, in 1940, the NAACP created LDF, as a separate charitable organization to take advantage of newly enacted laws that would make donations to it tax deductible. According to its charter, the organization’s purpose is to “render free legal aid to Negroes who suffer legal injustice because of their race or color,” to “seek and promote educational opportunities denied to Negroes because of their race or color,” and to “conduct research and publish information on educational facilities and inequalities furnished for Negroes out of public funds and on the state of the Negro in American Life.” Despite the formal separation in the organizations, for several years the NAACP and LDF had overlapping boards, and the NAACP financially supported LDF lawyers and their work. Marshall was named director-counsel of LDF. Following Houston’s example, Marshall relied heavily on lawyers trained at Howard Law School to work in association with LDF. During the 1940s and 1950s, among the lawyers who joined LDF were Robert L. Carter, Constance Baker Motely, and Spottswood W. Robinson III, each of whom later served as a federal judge. Many other lawyers served as cooperating attorneys with LDF, providing legal assistance nationwide. In the early 1960s, LDF separated from the NAACP, establishing separate offices and an autonomous board of directors. The separation was spurred partly by personality conflicts and philosophical disagreements within the organizations over their direction, including the refusal of Director-Counsel Jack Greenberg, a longtime LDF staff member, to relinquish the position so that LDF could be led by an African American attorney. In 1979, the NAACP passed a resolution and filed suit seeking that LDF discontinue its use of the NAACP initials. LDF prevailed on appeal.

Criminal Litigation and LDF

Unlike in the education area, LDF did not have a comprehensive litigation strategy for criminal cases. Part of the reason was strategic: it was often difficult to raise support for those who had ostensibly committed a criminal wrong. While the NAACP’s and later LDF’s efforts were more ad hoc in the criminal area, the organizations were successful. Success was often measured by securing a new trial or less severe sentence for the criminally accused. Ironically, one impetus for the establishment of LDF was the inability of local NAACP branches to handle a criminal case in which nine African American youth were accused of raping two White women in Alabama in 1931; the defendants were known collectively as the “Scottsboro Boys.” The NAACP eventually became heavily involved in the case and assisted as the case reached the U.S. Supreme Court twice. There the Court established in Powell v. Alabama (1932) that criminal defendants were entitled to the appointment of trial counsel who will be able to consult with the defendant and prepare a defense, and in Norris v. Alabama (1934) the Court held that systematically depriving African Americans of jury service violated due process. The exact record of LDF’s achievements in criminal cases is unknown, because in many state and lower federal courts, LDF attorneys successfully argued for the establishment of constitutional protections for criminal suspects, including the exclusion of forced confessions and challenging instances of police brutality.

National Office for the Rights of the Indigent Program

It took until the 1960s for LDF to launch serious, sustained efforts aimed at reforming the criminal justice system. LDF attempted to address criminal law matters indirectly by addressing poverty issues. In 1965 LDF created the National Office for the Rights of the Indigent (NORI). NORI was the first national poverty law program. The goal was to aid the poor, much as LDF was making law favorable toward African Americans, such as litigating cases involving welfare law and consumer fraud. African Americans were likely beneficiaries of NORI because they made up a disproportionate share of the poor. As originally envisioned, NORI was to coordinate the work of government legal services offices and to establish legal precedents that would help the poor. For example, cases were filed in small towns and municipalities, seeking improvement in government services provided in the poor section of cities with heavy concentrations of African Americans. NORI developed into a community service model, with emphasis on providing services for individuals for their individual claims. Eventually, NORI faded away, and LDF received the remainder of the grant.

Changing Course in the 1960s

The focus of LDF's general litigation strategy changed in the 1960s. The organization found itself litigating enforcement of the Brown mandate, defending sit-in protestors in cases like Boynton v. Virginia (1960) and Shuttlesworth v. Alabama (1969), the civil rights Freedom Riders in Abernathy v. Alabama (1965) and Thomas v. Mississippi (1965), and challenging excessive bail requirements of civil rights protesters. LDF's policy, which was subject to much criticism, was to represent persons involved in major constitutional litigation that would have an impact on the lives of African Americans. This meant that the organization did not handle run-of-the-mill criminal cases. Sometimes the organization did get involved in cases in which the legal process was directed toward a person because of his or her race. By the end of the 1960s, LDF began to focus on enforcing in the courts the legislative victories won in Congress, including eliminating discrimination in voting, employment, and educational opportunities.

Capital Punishment and LDF

Capital punishment was an area of concern for LDF. In 1963, LDF attorneys joined with lawyers in other organizations to challenge the administration of the death penalty. The strategy expanded from focusing on racism in the use of the death penalty and death sentences on rapists, especially when an African American man had been convicted of the crime against a White woman, to cover murder cases as well. Gradually, the U.S. Supreme Court became involved in announcing constitutional principles governing the administration of capital punishment. The effectiveness of the litigation campaign was evident, as state and federal courts issued rulings that effectively imposed moratoriums on executions from the mid-1960s through the early 1970s. Four cases, collectively known as Furman v. Georgia (1972), held that the death penalty as administered in the United States violated the U.S. Constitution. For the first time in this nation's history, it was illegal to carry out a death sentence. The racially disproportionate application of the death penalty was present in the cases, though that matter was not relied on heavily by the lawyers. However, Justice William O. Douglas, in his separate opinion, noted that the death penalty had been historically disproportionately imposed against the poor and persons of color.

By the time of Furman, Thurgood Marshall was an Associate Justice on the Supreme Court. In Furman, Justice William Brennan and Justice Marshall, in separate opinions, catalogued a number of reasons for rejecting the death penalty. Both justices continued to hold this view for the remainder of their judicial careers, and in every subsequent capital case that the Court considered they reiterated their continuing rejection of the death penalty. In fact, many of the issues that the Court has considered after Furman were presaged in their concurrences. Within months of Furman, capital laws were rewritten, and in Gregg v. Georgia (1976), the Court ruled that the death penalty did not invariably violate the Constitution. It held that the death penalty was an appropriate sanction for the taking of a human life, as long as the process under which the sentence was imposed was "suitably directed and limited so as to minimize the risk of wholly arbitrary and capricious action." The mandatory imposition of a death sentence was ruled unconstitutional because it did not allow for sufficient individualized consideration of the circumstances of the crime and the background of the defendant. Thus, in sharp contrast to its campaign against legally desegregated education, LDF's campaign to outlaw capital punishment proved short-lived.

The question of the impact of race on the administration of the death penalty was repeatedly avoided by the Court until McCleskey v. Kemp (1987). In McCleskey, LDF had commissioned a comprehensive study of the influence of race on the death penalty in Georgia. The study indicated that in a midrange of capital cases, the race of the victim and the race of the defendant were more determinative of who received the death sentence; African American murderers of Whites were more likely sentenced to death than other defendant-victim combinations. The Court rejected the argument, despite the study, ruling that the defendant did not show that race discrimination played a role in his receiving a death sentence. McCleskey requires that capital defendants prove that they were sentenced to death because of intentional—and not systemic—race-based discrimination by prosecutors, jurors, or judges.

Jury Selection and Prisoner's Rights Cases in the 1970s

LDF has been successful in eliminating discriminatory jury selection procedures and developing prisoner's rights through litigation. The law of nondiscriminatory jury selection was developed through LDF-led litigation. LDF introduced the use of statistics as proof of discrimination. It was also the innovator in filing civil suits on behalf of potentially excluded jurors. Those suits sought desegregation of jury rolls and the use of less subjective jury selection methods. Prior to these suits, the jury selection process was only being challenged by convicted defendants who sought to overturn his or her conviction based on discriminatory jury selection. For example, in LDF cases, the U.S. Supreme Court in Carter v. Jury Commission (1970) held that a federal lawsuit could be filed by potentially excluded jurors to challenge jury discrimination, and 2 years later it accepted the use of statistical evidence to prove racial discrimination in jury selection in Alexander v. Louisiana (1972). After Ham v. South Carolina (1973), defendants could have the trial judge question potential jurors about whether jurors harbored racial prejudices. LDF filed an influential amicus brief in Batson v. Kentucky (1986), which overruled Swain v. Alabama (1965), when it held that it was illegal to use peremptory challenges in a racially discriminatory manner, unless the prosecutor could come forth with a nondiscriminatory reason for the removal of potential jurors.

In the prisoner's rights context, through various suits LDF successfully challenged prison overcrowding, unsanitary living conditions, inadequate nutrition and medical care, solitary confinement practices, and prison disciplinary processes. Arkansas', Texas', and Georgia's prison systems were reformed through litigation brought by LDF. After initial LDF victories, other organizations began litigating prisoner's rights claims, too.

Criminal Justice Project

LDF continues to press for equality in the criminal justice system through its Criminal Justice Project. Since 1975, the project has produced a quarterly publication, Death Row U.S.A., which is a comprehensive collection of national data of the demographics of death row, including the race and sex of the defendant and victims, and those who have been executed by each state. Death Row USA is frequently used as an authoritative source by scholars, courts and the media on the demographics of the nation's death row. In fact, it is the nation's most comprehensive source of information on executions and death row demographics. Attorneys associated with the project challenge through litigation, public education, policy initiatives, and racial bias in the criminal justice system. The focus is on representing death-sentenced clients in state and federal postconviction proceedings, coordinating programs within jurisdictions where there is a demonstrated inequality in the delivery of defense services, representing clients in noncapital cases, submission of amicus briefs in court cases, and supervising law students who have been placed at the LDF.

Today, LDF is involved in a number of important areas of criminal law, including capital punishment, indigent defense, war on drugs, discrimination in jury selection, and claims of legal innocence by convicted defendants. LDF does not limit its efforts to litigating cases, though its attorneys do engage in direct representation of the criminally accused and the organization does submit amicus briefs in selected cases. The organization also promotes policy reform and public education, including the issuance of reports that highlight racial and class disparities in criminal justice matters.

Scholarship Program

LDF offers scholarships. The Herbert Lehman Education Fund issues scholarships to first-time, 4-year, full-time college students. The scholarship was established in 1963 to help African American students attending formerly segregated 4-year public colleges and universities that were desegregated as a result of LDF's efforts. Today, these scholarships are awarded to deserving African Americans to attend colleges and universities nationwide. In 1972, LDF created the Earl Warren Legal Training Program, Inc., which offers two scholarships: Earl Warren Civil Rights Training Scholarships, which have a preference for law students; and Earl Warren, Shearman & Sterling Scholarships, which are offered to African American law students.

One continuing criticism of the NAACP is that its efforts overwhelmingly benefit middle-class persons of color. This has led to some derisively claiming that the last two initials of the organization's name really are abbreviations for "certain people" and not "colored people." Similar consternation exists with regard to LDF's practices because systematic and societal changes have been slow in coming. While it is true that civil rights litigation and legislation proceed at an incremental pace and have an ad hoc nature, it is important to keep in mind that changes in the legal and social landscape during the past 70 years have been fostered by the work of LDF.

Dwight Aarons

See also League of United Latin American Citizens; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund; U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Civil Rights; W. Haywood Burns Institute for Juvenile Justice Fairness and Equity

Further Readings

- Finch, M. (1981). The NAACP: Its fight for justice. Metuchen, NJ, and London: Scarecrow.
- Greenberg, J. (1994). Crusaders in the courts: How a dedicated band of lawyers fought the civil rights revolution. New York: Basic Books.
- Kellogg, C. F. (1967). NAACP: A history of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Kluger, R. (1975). Simple justice: The History of Brown v. Board of Education and Black America's struggle for equality. New York: Knopf.
- Meltsner, M. (1973). Cruel and unusual: The Supreme Court and capital punishment. New York: Random House.
- Motley, C. (1998). Equal justice under law: An autobiography of Constance Baker Motley. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux.
- Schlanger, M. (2006, May). Civil rights injunctions over time: A case study of jail and prison court orders. New York University Law Review, 81, 550–630.
- Southworth, A. (2005, April). Conservative lawyers and the contest over the meaning of "public interest law." University of California, Los Angeles Law Review, 52, 1223–1278.
- St. James, W. D. (1980). NAACP: Triumphs of a pressure group, 1909–1980. Smithtown, NY: Exposition Press.
- Tushnet, M. V. (1987). The NAACP's legal strategy against segregated education, 1925–1950. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Tushnet, M. V. (1994). Making civil rights law: Thurgood Marshall and the Supreme Court, 1936–1961. New York: Oxford University Press.

NATIONAL AFRICAN AMERICAN DRUG POLICY COALITION

The United States has one the largest correctional populations in the industrialized world. Additionally, African Americans are approximately 6 times more likely to be incarcerated than are Whites, while Latinos are more than twice as likely to be incarcerated than Whites. The 1970s Controlled Substance Act, the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984, and the Anti-Drug Abuse Acts of 1986 and 1988 have all had a devastating impact on American society and, in particular, on members of the African American community. Mandatory sentencing, three strikes laws, and the War on Drugs are major contributors to the disproportionate amount of incarceration among African American and other racial and ethnic minorities. Many have argued the War on Drugs unfairly targets poor and minority populations, as they are the groups with the highest numbers of incarceration within the criminal justice system. Additionally, these drug laws attach lengthy sentences to first-time nonviolent drug offenders, many of whom are young Black men. Growing concern about excessive incarceration rates, drugs, and crime attracted great attention and sparked the development of multiple advocacy organizations. One such organization is the National African American Drug Policy Coalition (NAADPC). This entry reviews the founding of the organization, the mission of the organization, and its organizational goals.

Origin and Structure

Founded in 2003, the National African American Drug Policy Coalition was organized by the National Bar Association (NBA) to address the multifarious issues of drug policies and laws. The organization is supported by a group of African American professional organizations (currently 23), which act as the legislative body of advocates for drug policy and laws as well as address specific public health concerns including the epidemiology of drug use and abuse. The National African American Drug Policy Coalition has chapter affiliates nationwide who have become the voice of the organization. On April 1, 2004, a distinguished group of leaders representing nine African American organizations met on Capitol Hill to endorse a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) to enhance existing principles and practices of drug abuse and addiction policies.

The National African American Drug Policy coalition is an organization that aims to reduce and prevent the onset of illegal drug usage and related crimes within the African American community through a 5-year plan. The coalition seeks an alternative method that not only aims to decrease drug abuse and crime but also to develop alternatives to incarceration through diversion programs and utilizing therapeutic sentencing over criminal sanctions. Furthermore, the alternative sentencing would allow members of the organization to divert public resources into research, education, prevention, and treatment programs.

Mission

The National African American Drug Policy Coalition is a coalition of preeminent African American professional organizations united to promote drug policies and laws that embrace the public health nature of drug abuse and provide an effective and humane approach to address the chronic societal problem of drug abuse. More important, the National African American Drug Policy Coalition plans to accomplish this mission (a) addressing racial disparities in substance abuse policies, (b) holding annual conferences to address drug policies and African Americans, and (c) implementing and evaluating pilot projects that will enhance pretrial diversion and therapeutic sentencing aimed at lowering recidivism rates; reduction of incarceration cost; reduction in criminal activity and violence, child abuse, and neglect cases; and increase the participation in drug compliance and therapy.

Organizational Goals

The National African American Drug Policy Coalition outlines six organizational goals.

The first goal is to create an organizational structure for ongoing operation and coordination of the coalition. It is the goal of the coalition to incorporate itself as an independent, not-for-profit organization with space, staff, policies, and procedures consistent with the mission and philosophy of NAADPC.

The second goal is to build a revenue base to sustain and generate support for the coalition. It is the goal of the coalition leadership to identify funding from private and public sources to support and sustain the home office.

The third goal is to enhance pretrial diversion and therapeutic sentencing services and programs in selected communities. It is the goal of the coalition to enhance existing and implement new pretrial diversion and therapeutic sentencing services and programs using a multidisciplinary approach through the talents and expertise of coalition members and supporting organizations and volunteers.

The fourth goal is to advance knowledge regarding substance abuse policies and programs and their impact on African Americans through research and evaluation. It is the goal of the coalition to be producers of information by identifying best practice models through research and evaluation of both NAADPC programs and general programs.

The fifth goal is to create for the public a national clearinghouse of new and relevant information regarding African Americans and substance abuse. It is the goal of the coalition to be disseminators of information by providing the public and key stakeholders with evidence-based information on African Americans and substance abuse using a variety of media.

The sixth goal is to serve as a catalyst for the refocusing of drug laws and policies toward a public health approach. It is the goal of the coalition to educate and inform the legislatures and policymakers regarding the impact of specific drug laws and policies on the African American community and make recommendations for more effective laws and policy.

Carla Miller

See also Drug Courts; Drug Dealers; Drug Trafficking; Drug Treatment; Drug Use

Websites

National African American Drug Policy Coalition: <http://www.naadcp.org>

NATIONAL AMERICAN INDIAN COURT JUDGES ASSOCIATION

The National American Indian Court Judges Association (NAICJA), established in 1969, is a professional society for tribal court judges, similar to the American Judicature Society or the American Judges Association. NAICJA recognizes the unique position faced by tribal courts. Often underfunded and typically staffed by lay personnel, tribal courts need high-quality, culturally sensitive training for court personnel and access to easy-to-use materials to ensure the courts' functioning. The tribal courts also need strong advocates to advance the cause of courts and justice in Indian Country (which includes all tribal lands and allotments). The NAICA is important to the study of race and crime because tribal courts play an important role in the tribal justice system.

NAICJA was founded to support tribal justice systems and the judges and peacemakers who preside over the processes in those courts. The organization has had 501(c)(3) approval since 1973 and hosts annual meetings focused on improving justice in Indian Country. The association also conducts training relevant to tribal courts, including recent conferences on using and overseeing probation as a sanction, training for court clerks aimed at teaching them how to manage tribal courts, and a series of workshops on sovereignty issues and tribal courts.

Some critics note that while NAICJA conducts trainings, rapid turnover among tribal court personnel often means that key staff cannot benefit from them as they are seldom offered more than once per year. NAICJA's published guides, however, are available to all court staff and can serve as initial starting points for new personnel. Tribal court judges can also attend training sessions offered by the National Indian Justice Center and other groups to supplement those offered by NAICJA.

In addition to the valuable educational programming it offers, an important part of NAICJA's mission is to provide information to the public, especially federal, state, and tribal lawmakers. In its advocacy role, NAICJA works with Congress to ensure that tribal courts are not forgotten by legislators or budgeting agencies and that tribal justice is always on the national agenda. The group has prepared oral and written testimony for the House Appropriations Committee, the U.S. Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, and other government entities. Through surveys and other research, NAICJA has become a respected clearinghouse for information on tribal courts.

NAICJA creates and distributes a large library of publications designed for tribal courts, including its popular Tribal Criminal Court Benchbook and Tribal Criminal Court Clerks Manual, both of which are practical guides for tribal court personnel. The judges' benchbook, for example, contains clear descriptions of the complex jurisdictional issues facing tribal courts, arrest, extradition, search and seizure processes, pretrial and trial procedures, sentencing, and postconviction relief. Given the high number of lay tribal judges, the benchbook is a valuable resource. The benchbook and manual were the most requested forms of technical assistance listed by tribal court personnel in surveys conducted by NAICJA. The published guides have been praised as helpful, although they are sometimes criticized for not being comprehensive or sophisticated. The guides are among the few that are customized for tribal courts, however, so they are among the most used resources in Indian Country.

One of its most cited publications is Indian Courts and the Future: Report of the NAICJA Long Range Planning Project, published in 1978. This publication detailed the strengths and weaknesses of tribal courts and included a number of suggested remedies to the ills it documented. Some of the problems NAICJA reported included political interference in the courts and high staff turnover, both of which affect judicial independence and quality, lack of attorneys for native accused, and inadequate tribal laws. NAICJA has worked to remedy these problems, focusing on improving access to materials and training for judges in Indian Country and serving as an impetus for positive legal change.

NAICJA frequently partners with the National Tribal Justice Resource Center, an organization it founded in 2000. With the National Tribal Justice Resource Center, the NAICJA serves as a clearinghouse resource for tribal constitutions, bylaws, codes, and charters. The collection of these documents in one easy-to-access location means they are available both to tribal members, who did not always have a way to review the laws they were expected to follow, and to tribal governments that wish to analyze how other tribes have dealt with particular issues as models for their own code drafting. NAICJA and the National Tribal Justice Resource Center also publish model legal codes, such as the Sample Tribal Evidence Code, which can easily be adapted and adopted by tribes as part of their own governing documents. When drafted, these model codes were important documents for tribal consideration, because many tribes had failed to define personal or subject matter jurisdiction and other significant issues in their legal codes. The sample codes allowed tribes to modernize their legal protocols without having to reinvent the proverbial wheel.

A recent project of NAICJA is addressing the problem of domestic violence on reservations through tribal legal reform. Using a grant from the Department of Justice, NAICJA set out to collect and analyze resources regarding domestic violence for the purposes of ensuring that legislation regarding that social ill is included in tribal legal codes. Continually poised at the forefront of tribal justice, the NAICJA will remain a strong coalition for justice in Indian Country.

Jon'a F. Meyer

See also National Tribal Justice Resource Center; Native American Courts

Further Readings

- Doucet, R. A. (2003). Tribal criminal court clerks manual. Boulder, CO: National American Indian Court Judges Association.
- Kalin, S. (1971). Criminal court procedures manual: A guide for American Indian court judges. Washington, DC: National American Indian Court Judges Association.
- National American Indian Court Judges Association. (2002). Tribal criminal court benchbook. Boulder, CO: Author.
- NTJRC to update tribal criminal court benchbook and clerk's manual. (2001). Tribal Justice Today, 1(1), 10–11.
- Olney, O. N., & Getches, D. N. (Eds.). (1978). Indian courts and the future: Report of the NAICJA Long Range Planning Project. Washington, DC: National American Indian Court Judges Association.
- Richland, J. B., & Deer, S. (2004). Introduction to tribal legal studies. Walnut Creek, CA: AltaMira Press.

Websites

National American Indian Court Judges Association:
<http://www.naicja.org>

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE (NAACP)

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) is one of the most influential and successful civil rights groups in America. Its mission is to guarantee political, educational, social, and economic equality for all persons and to abolish racial discrimination and racial hatred. For nearly 100 years, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has taken its fight for racial equality and the protection of civil rights across the United States and now globally. Though the organization struggled through its humble beginnings and suffered much controversy and adversity throughout the 1900s, today there are more than 390,000 members worldwide. This entry first reviews the NAACP's intricate history and then describes its recent achievements and key objectives.

History

Although slavery ended with President Abraham Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation in 1863, there was still extreme prejudice against African Americans during the 1900s. African Americans suffered from poorer living conditions, limited job opportunities, and were often treated like lesser citizens than were White Americans. Likewise, African Americans of the South had taxation without representation, since only Whites were allowed to vote. At that time, both African American and White activists decided to answer "The Call" to help combat these racial injustices.

The NAACP was originally known as the National Negro Committee and was officially founded on February 12, 1909, in New York City. Its founders included Ida Wells-Barnett, Henry Moskowitz, Mary White Ovington, Oswald Garrison Villard, William English Walling, and later W. E. B. Du Bois. They chose this founding date because it was the 100th anniversary of Abraham Lincoln's birth. W. E. B. Du Bois, a well-known scholar from Atlanta University, had previously been part of the civil rights group called the Niagara Movement. The organization was limited to African Americans and was suffering from insufficient funds. In 1910 many prominent members decided to join both organizations' forces and became the NAACP.

That same year, the Pink Franklin case represented the NAACP's first landmark legal battle when the organization defended a Black farm worker who claimed he killed a police officer in self-defense after that officer broke into his house at 3 a.m. to arrest him. Although the organization lost this case in the U.S. Supreme Court, it set a precedent for the NAACP's legendary brothers, Joel and Arthur Spingarn, to defend African Americans' civil rights in the courtroom. Three years later, however, to the shock of many people, President Woodrow Wilson sanctioned segregation in the U.S. government. The NAACP immediately formed united public protests. More demonstrations were launched in 1915 by the NAACP, to protest the movie The Birth of a Nation, which was perceived as a highly racist film.

In 1917, the NAACP won a significant legal battle when the Supreme Court ruled that states could not formally segregate residential neighborhoods. In that same year, the NAACP won a legal battle to allow African Americans to become officers during World War I. A year later, after continual protests by the NAACP, President Wilson spoke publicly against the horrible atrocity of lynching. Even though Atlanta, Georgia, was a prominent KKK region, the NAACP held their annual conference there in 1920 to demonstrate to the nation that they would not be frightened into hiding. Two years later, the NAACP put prominent advertisements in key newspapers nationwide that taught about the realities of lynching.

In 1930, the NAACP successfully launched protests against John Parker, a nominee to the Supreme Court who publicly supported discriminatory laws. These protests set a precedent for future victorious NAACP protests against judicial nominees whom they believed would not support civil rights. Subsequently, in 1935, NAACP attorneys Charles Houston and Thurgood Marshall won a legal victory that required the University of Maryland to admit its first African American student. At the beginning of World War II, the NAACP commenced efforts to guarantee that President Franklin Roosevelt would create nondiscriminatory policies regarding federal jobs and industries pertaining to the war in 1941. In 1945, the NAACP again launched national protests when the government stopped financially supporting the Federal Fair Roosevelt Employment Practices Commission.

During the 1930s through the 1950s, Harry T. Moore, the famed NAACP attorney and secretary, investigated numerous lynchings and the Groveland Rape Case, in which four young Black men were accused of raping a White woman. Moore sought an indictment of the sheriff for allegedly murdering one of the defendants. One month after these accusations, on Christmas Day 1951, Moore was killed by a bomb placed underneath the floorboards by his bed. Nine days later his wife Harriette also died as a result of the explosion. As of August 2006, this case had never been solved and was officially closed by the FBI.

In 1954, in one of the most important court decisions of all time, the NAACP attorney Thurgood Marshall won the legal case Brown v. Board of Education to desegregate schools. In this landmark case, the U.S. Supreme Court, in a unanimous (9–0) decision, overturned earlier rulings going back to Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), with its “separate but equal” philosophy that tried to justify segregation in schools. One year later, in Montgomery, Alabama, Rosa Parks was arrested after she refused to give up her bus seat to a White person. Parks was a member of the NAACP at the time, and her daring efforts sparked the beginning of the grassroots movement to fight for African American civil rights throughout the entire nation.

In 1960, after a series of nonviolent sit-ins in Greensboro, North Carolina, more than 60 restaurants eventually desegregated. Yet despite many efforts of the NAACP to lead nonviolent protests and rallies, Medgar Evers, the NAACP’s first field director, was murdered in front of his home in Jackson, Mississippi, in 1963. However, 1964 marked an historic year in which Congress passed the Civil Rights Act, which banned segregation in public places including schools, government, housing, and employment that invalidated the southern Jim Crow laws. One year later, Congress passed the Voting Rights Act, which outlawed the use of literacy requirements for voting, a practice that had discriminated against poor and less educated African Americans. The NAACP began a nationwide effort to encourage African Americans to register to vote. These efforts have continued through the present day, and the NAACP continues to encourage minorities to vote.

Recent Achievements

The fight for African American civil rights by the NAACP has continued into the 21st century. On January 17, 2000, the NAACP held its largest civil rights gathering when it protested in Columbia, South Carolina, against those who honored the Confederate Battle Flag. Furthermore, on July 9, 2007, the NAACP held a mock funeral to bury the N-Word in Detroit, Michigan, and to draw national attention to help eliminate the use of racist and degrading slurs. Hundreds of attendees celebrated putting to rest the N-Word to help combat the use of images in rap and hip hop music that demeaned Black women and promoted “hurtful and false stereotypes” of Black youth.

Key Objectives

Today, the NAACP has six major objectives through which they endeavor to improve the lot of those suffering from racial inequality. These objectives include civic engagement, criminal justice, economic empowerment, education, health, and international affairs.

Civic Engagement

The first key objective of the NAACP is helping more minorities vote and become actively involved in the governmental decision-making process. In 2004, only 56.3% of African Americans voted, compared to 60.3% of Whites. To help combat these racial discrepancies in voting, the NAACP provides information to educate people of color on how to register and why they should vote. The “Arrive W 5” campaign encourages African Americans to bring five friends or family with them to vote on Election Day. In addition, the NAACP strives to ensure the ballot-counting process is fair and that every vote is counted.

Fairness in the Criminal Justice System

The second goal is eradicating the discrimination toward minorities in the criminal justice system. The NAACP promotes the idea that there is a racially disproportionate number of African Americans in the prison system because of the cumulative effects of judicial system discrimination against African Americans during street interrogation, jury selection, trial, sentencing procedures, and appeal processes. Specifically, the NAACP has focused on several target areas of law enforcement and the court system in which they strive to increase racial equality. For example, the NAACP has worked toward ending the practice of racial profiling.

The NAACP also strives to guarantee equal treatment of minorities during trials and sentencing procedures. One example of unequal treatment in the criminal justice system is the ability of offenders to pay for an upscale jail cell for nonviolent offenses, and they may receive cleaner, more private cells with special privileges like listening to iPods or working on computers. In turn, the NAACP tries to help those incarcerated minorities and those recently released from prison have access to voting, higher education, and job training. Last, the organization is against the death penalty for anyone until the racial inequalities are addressed, since a much higher proportion of African Americans receive the death penalty.

Economic Empowerment

The third key objective of the NAACP strives to improve minority economic empowerment and help decrease economic inequalities among races. In 2006 the median income for households by race was $64,238 for Asians, $52,423 for Whites, $37,781 for Hispanics, and only $31,969 for African Americans. Besides decreasing the racial gap in yearly earnings, the NAACP also strives to create programs to help more minorities buy their own homes.

Raising the Quality of Education

The fourth objective of the NAACP is to eliminate racial inequalities in education by raising the quality of education for those of color. In 2006, the percentage of people with a high school diploma or higher education was 91% for Whites, 87% for Asians, 81% for African Americans, and 59% for Hispanics. To help raise minority education standards, the NAACP has numerous educational programs that aim to make school resources more equitable, obtain more qualified teachers, encourage parent involvement in their children's education, increase child literacy, oppose school voucher programs, increase school attendance, lower dropout rates, and provide scholarships to disadvantaged children.

Better Health Care

The fifth vital objective of the NAACP is to improve the overall health of minorities. The NAACP has created programs to help eliminate racial inequalities and increase minorities' access to affordable, quality health care. The organization strives to lower the disproportionate number of African Americans who get infected with HIV, AIDS, and respiratory diseases. At the same time the NAACP is working to decrease African American obesity-related diseases, such as heart disease, diabetes, and hypertension.

Global Civil Rights

Last, the sixth objective of the NAACP strives to decrease the racial inequalities of minorities throughout the world by supporting global civil rights and improving international economic equality. For instance, although sub-Saharan Africa holds most of the earth's natural resources, half of their countries are the poorest in the world. The NAACP continually fights internationally for equal rights, fair trade, increasing the quality of health care, aiding and building democracy, and preventing the genocide and murders of innocent civilians.

Alisa Neilan

See also NAACP Legal Defense Fund; National African American Drug Policy Coalition; National Association of Blacks in Criminal Justice; National Organization of Black Law Enforcement Executives

Further Readings

Associated Press. (2007, July 9). NAACP delegates "bury" N-word in ceremony. Retrieved from <http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/19680493>

Steinhauer, J. (2007, April 29). For $82 a day, booking a cell in a 5-star jail. The New York Times. Retrieved from

<http://www.nytimes.com/2007/04/29/us/29jail.html?ex=1335499200&en=904a68b4f0ef0a46&ei=5090>

U.S. Census Bureau. (2007, August). Income, poverty, and health insurance coverage in the United States: 2006. Retrieved from <http://www.census.gov/prod/2007pubs/p60-233.pdf>

U.S. Census Bureau News. (2007, March). Earnings gap highlighted by Census Bureau data on educational attainment. Retrieved from <http://www.census.gov/Press-Release/www/releases/archives/education/009749.html>

Websites

National Association for the Advancement of Colored People: <http://www.naacp.org>

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF BLACKS IN CRIMINAL JUSTICE

The National Association of Blacks in Criminal Justice (NABCJ) is an organization that addresses the need for more equitable treatment of African Americans within the criminal justice system. This entry describes the purpose, historical origin, and activities of NABCJ during the past 2 decades and discusses the disproportional arrests and conviction rates between African American and Whites in the U.S. criminal justice system that led concerned African Americans to form NABCJ.

Purpose and Mission

NABCJ plays an active role in supporting studies, processes, laws, and judicial systems in an effort to correctly address equality issues among African Americans and other minorities in the criminal justice system, particularly with regard to inequalities or at least the human conditions that cause one to have such a perspective. A change agent like NABCJ is needed to address conflict and disparity between ethnic groups living in the same communities. The formation of NABCJ was a prime example of society supplementing the need for more equality.

NABCJ is one such organization created to focus attention on relevant legislation, law enforcement, prosecution, and defense-related needs and practices. One of NABCJ's chief concerns is the general welfare of and efforts to increase influence of African Americans and people of color as it relates to the administration of justice. This national organization was formed to examine and respond to the needs of African Americans, their interests, and the contributions they offer with the goal of administration of equal justice for all as envisioned by the founding fathers. In other words, its focus is upon any injustice found within the justice system.

In the past, African Americans have been frustrated with the lack of representation, participation, and communication within the administration of justice. However, NABCJ members have made huge progress in opening communication networks in the justice system and influencing public policy change through its regional, state, and local chapters. Before the 1970s only a small percentage of African Americans were employed in the justice system, especially in executive leadership positions.

The mission of NABCJ is to instill professionalism and competence within all components of the criminal justice system to better address the needs and uncertainties of African Americans and other minorities, at all levels, in the quest of equal justice for all. The purpose of this organization becomes quite clear when reading the historical purpose/mission statement. As stated on its website, NABCJ has the following objectives:

1. To ensure Black representation and participation as policy makers in the administration of justice nationally, regionally, and locally.
2. To aggressively assist in recruiting Blacks and other minorities for all areas and levels of the criminal justice system.
3. To stimulate research and other documentation related to minorities and the criminal justice system.
4. To actively encourage and support the development of local, community, state, and regional chapters.
5. To serve as a vehicle for input into legislation and public policy formulations in areas of criminal justice related to crime, the administration of justice, and crime prevention.
6. To network with other organizations and groups with similar objectives and interests.

Membership

A large portion of NABCJ's membership comes from the many criminal justice system professionals and community leaders within the United States who are dedicated to the process of evaluating, improving, and working in an evolving criminal justice system. Many NABCJ members have backgrounds in law enforcement, correctional institutions, courts, academia, social work, religious, and other public and community-related programs. Strength can be seen in the growing number of local and state chapters around the country whose members volunteer their personal time to develop a sound and fair criminal justice system. NABCJ chapters are located in the Midwest, Northeast, Northwest, South, Southeast, and Southwest regions of the United States. This undertaking is possible through annual, regional, and state conferences.

Origin

According to Dr. Charles Owens and Jimmy Bell, authors and cofounders of the National Association of Blacks in Criminal Justice Official History, at a 1973 conference on "Minorities in the Criminal Justice System" at Chicago State University, several participants expressed a similar dissatisfaction with the coverage of Blacks in the criminal justice system. From February 24 to 27, 1974, the University of Alabama Psychology Department convened the first national conference on Blacks in the Criminal Justice System.

Owens and Bell articulate that changes in the mission of NABCJ have occurred during its approximately 25 years, as the group recognized that it needed to clarify its message in order to reach additional people and become more effective. For example, the NABCJ constitution and by-laws were examined and modified for clarification. Members of the organization reviewed and evaluated key questions in the effort to reach communities throughout the United States.

Direction and Concerns

NABCJ records indicate the association was frustrated with the criminal justice system due to the disproportionate number of African American offenders serving prison time compared to other racial groups. This disproportionate number of African American arrestees has been a principal concern for the members of NABCJ and others because many perceive that it is caused by racial injustice. NABCJ members are committed to reducing the negative disproportional number of African American offenders behind bars by developing and supporting programs that will reduce this imbalance.

NABCJ is currently involved in such projects as reducing the disproportionate minority confinement (DMC) that is ideally aligned with the mission of NABCJ and has adopted DMC as its National Program Plan. A longtime goal of NABCJ is sentencing reform, especially for nonviolent offenders, when other alternatives might be used to create an effective and fair criminal justice system. This type of program would also include the establishment of intervention programs before offenders are released back into their communities. Such programs can provide resources such as job training and housing assistance that can be used by all levels of government and private and nonprivate organizations in the common goal of reducing recidivism.

Since 1974, NABCJ has worked to offer creative and informational presentations, educational workshops, and addresses from well-known and celebrity-status keynote speakers during its annual Conference and Training Institutes. The organization promotes an Annual Conference and Training Institute through their Commitment Newsletter, Pre-Conference and Training Institute Brochures, and the Conference and Training Institute Program Journal. Such publications provide helpful information about upcoming conferences and training events. NABCJ ensures that the location of each conference and training institute is in a significant area of the country that will enhance training and informational experiences that include culture development.

NABCJ state and national training events also allow students to have the opportunity to meet other students and professionals around the country. During these training events, students who are graduating from high school or attending college are encouraged to participate in the college scholarship programs awarded by NABCJ.

NABCJ continues to be a prime example of a strong and viable organization supplementing and addressing the need for more equitable treatment of African Americans within the criminal justice system. With sound and tested research on the subject of disproportional incarceration rates of African Americans, we are able to focus more on the causes rather than the symptoms.

Darrell McCloud

See also Disproportionate Minority Contact and Confinement; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

Further Readings

- Case, P. F. (2008). The relationship of race and criminal behavior: Challenging cultural explanations for a structural problem. Critical Sociology, 34(2), 213–238. Retrieved from <http://crs.sagepub.com/cgi/content/abstract/34/2/213>
- Gabbidon, S. L. (2007). Criminological perspectives on race and crime. New York: Routledge.
- Gabbidon, S. L., & Greene, H. T. (2005). Race, crime, and justice: A reader. New York: Routledge.
- Owens, C. E., & Bell, J. (1994). National Association of Blacks in Criminal Justice official history 1974–1994 (Vol. I). Durham: North Carolina University.
- Prior, R. (2004, July). Adam's Mark hosts criminal justice convention. Daily Record. Retrieved from http://www.jaxdailyrecord.com/showstory.php?Story_id=41254
- Richburg, H. (2005, July). A message from the chief domestic strategist: Mission possible. The Commitment: The Newsletter of the National Association of Blacks in the Criminal Justice System, 16(14), 2, 4.
- Sumter, M., & Dyk, G. (2007). The case for diversity in criminal justice practice. National Association of Blacks in the Criminal Justice System, 16(1), 18.

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON LAW OBSERVANCE AND ENFORCEMENT

The National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement was the first national commission to study crime in the United States. Also known as the Wickersham Commission, after its chair George Wickersham, the commission systematically studied the growing national crime problem that arose in the 1920s. The commission included legal scholars, practitioners, and veterans from various state and city crime commissions. During its work from 1929 to 1931, the commission held hearings, collected evidence, reviewed statistics, and debated policy options. Several issues in the commission reports are related to race and crime, including Mexican American immigrants, the third degree, crime and the foreign-born, and early statistics on prison populations.

The idea for a national crime commission surfaced during the 1928 presidential contest between Republican Herbert Hoover and Democrat Al Smith. For the first time, crime appeared as a significant campaign issue in a presidential election. Prohibition revealed glaring weaknesses within the administration of federal criminal justice. High caseloads overwhelmed the courts, and lack of professionalism hampered proper investigations. People displayed open contempt for the law. Most prominent were “organized crime” figures who led large organizations devoted to violating Prohibition, prostitution, and gambling laws. When these organizations clashed, violence ensued. The organizations became so politically powerful that local law enforcement opted to ignore the problem. As a result, national concern about crime rose.

Hoover made crime a central feature of his campaign and the primary concern of his new administration. As a Prohibition supporter, he talked extensively about the need for better enforcement and the problems associated with the lack of public observance of the law. To address these problems, he proposed a commission to study Prohibition enforcement and recommend changes. Upon taking office, he expanded the study beyond Prohibition to include all federal law enforcement and adjudication.

Within 2 months of taking office, Hoover assembled and convened the commission. Its chair, George Wickersham, had served as attorney general during the Taft Administration and had led the push for antitrust enforcement against large corporations. Other members included federal judges Paul McCormick, from the Southern District of California; William Kenyon, from the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals; and William Grubb, from the Northern District of Alabama. Other legal practitioners included Monte Lemann, a trial attorney from New Orleans; Kenneth Mackintosh, a Seattle lawyer and former Washington State Chief Justice; and Henry Anderson, former president of the Virginia Bar Association. Academics included Ada Comstock, the president of Radcliffe College; Roscoe Pound, Dean of Harvard Law School; and Newman Baker, a Northwestern political science professor and former secretary of defense under President Woodrow Wilson. Among the commissioners, Wickersham, Pound, and Baker took the lead.

Although Hoover assembled talented commissioners, the composition of the commission still received criticism. Despite several quality applicants, no racial or ethnic minorities served on the commission. Many prominent African American applicants had sought positions on the commission, hoping to voice their perspectives and address lynching as a national problem. Their efforts failed when Hoover did not select any of them as commissioners and the problem of lynchings did not become a prominent issue before the commission.

On May 28, 1929, the commission held its first meeting. Hoover laid out his intent for the commission in his address to the members. He emphasized organized crime, law enforcement abuses, and the growing rate of law disobedience. He told them that his goals were to determine the cause of these problems and to find resolutions to them. Hoover's speech highlighted the principal concerns he hoped the commission would address, including causes of crime, organized crime, and abuses in law enforcement. Wickersham responded to the president, on behalf of the commission, underscoring the task's importance and complexity.

Having heard Hoover's priorities, the commission continued meeting to divide the work. Several issues rose to the forefront. Prohibition became the central focus of the commission, and its first reports centered on the topic. Criminal statistics also became a prominent topic. Discussions of both topics were complicated by political factors and ideologies. Other important topics included organized crime, crime among the foreign born, and official lawlessness.

The problems arising from attempts to enforce Prohibition and the increase in crime were the driving force behind the commission's creation. The Eighteenth Amendment, which prohibited alcohol, and the Volstead Act, which authorized enforcement, delegated enforcement responsibility to the states and federal government. This was the first time both federal and state governments jointly enforced a criminal law. The ensuing lack of cooperation and coordination permitted large organizations to develop and profit from violating the alcohol prohibition. Because these organizations operated outside the law, they also resolved problems outside the law with violence. The violence led to media coverage, and public outrage ensued.

The public reaction to Prohibition also further polarized the "wet" and "dry" supporters. Both sides found reason to distrust the commission's work. The "wets"—those opposed to Prohibition enforcement—found the study of Prohibition with crimes like murder and rape disturbing. To them, it placed drinking alcohol on the same footing as life and death. The "drys"—those supporting Prohibition enforcement—believed including other crimes obscured the importance of Prohibition enforcement. The political division appeared in testimony presented to the commission. Several Prohibition enforcement agents testified that the government had been gaining ground in its enforcement efforts. One commissioner, Frank Loesch, doubted the testimony based on his experience with the Chicago Crime Commission. He questioned how criminal organizations obtained their alcohol if the federal government was having success keeping illegal alcohol from entering the country.

The debate about enforcement highlighted another major problem the commission sought to address. Charged with determining the reasons for the large increase in crime, the commission first sought to prove crime had increased. To do this, they needed statistics. They found that no reliable statistics existed on criminal justice issues. How to create these statistics, who should do it, and who should store them became another political battleground. In this debate, the scholars on the committee battled the practitioners. The former group wanted an organization apart from the police to collect and maintain the nation's crime statistics. They favored using the Census Bureau because of its experience with the task. The practitioners preferred using the newly formed international association of police chiefs to perform the work. They argued the police organization was best suited for the task because of its familiarity with concerns of local police departments and the trust placed in the organization by its members. The scholars countered the arguments, claiming that if the police maintained their own statistics, then they would manipulate the statistics to support the position avored by the police. To resolve the dispute, the sides agreed to have the Justice Department collect and store the data. The scholars approved because it placed responsibility with an organization unconnected to the local police departments who collect the data. The practitioners approved because the department also enforced laws and could understand the police function.

Another divisive topic proved to be the report on how law enforcement failed to obey the law. Discussion began about whether it should be included as a topic because of its controversial nature. Some working with the commission thought exposing such acts would generate a tremendous amount of controversy and would overshadow other important work. Others believed official lawlessness was one of the primary causes of the more general condition of law nonobservance. Another faction sought to limit the group's work to police interrogation tactics and violation of the Fourth Amendment. Others believed unfair prosecutions also needed to be included in the report. Ultimately, work was completed on the topic and a report generated. An early draft included several case studies of unfair prosecutions. These studies were omitted from the final report and became a source of controversy and basis for criticism of the commission.

A less contentious issue was the study of crime among the foreign-born. The increase in crime perceived since World War I gave rise to the complaint that the most recent wave of immigrants were more criminal than were "native" Americans. Studies in the late 1920s had found this was not the case. As part of its work in this area, the commission undertook another study to determine if current immigrants were more criminal than people already living in the country. The findings indicated that those entering the country were no more likely to commit crime than those already living in the country.

By July 1931, the commission had produced 14 volumes of reports. Topics ranged from Prohibition to the workings of the federal court system and from the prosecution function to the costs of crime. Due to the lack of statistical information to support their conclusions, the commission's reports were seen as a catalogue of ills without adequate remedies. The commission was also keenly aware that any statements made would be used for political purposes to support one argument or another. This was particularly true with regard to recommendations about Prohibition. This position caused many to disregard the findings of the commission.

Despite the generalities, some changes did come about as a result of the commission's work. The most lasting change was the work on crime statistics. The compromise reached by the commission to house statistics with the Department of Justice has withstood the test of time. The U.S. Supreme Court, during Earl Warren's tenure as Chief Justice, also incorporated some of the commission's recommendations on procedure, such as the law of arrests and the process by which jurors are examined. Other procedural recommendations were adopted later. For example, the commission made recommendations on revisions to the juvenile justice process. Congress acted on these recommendations and amended the juvenile justice statutes applicable to the federal courts. Finally, some aspects of the reports held academic value. For example, the work on costs of crime touched on the phenomenon of "organized crime." The term quickly became synonymous with those who operated rackets in urban communities. However, the commission also applied the term to those in legitimate businesses who committed crime. Later, sociologist Edwin Sutherland, who worked with the commission, took advantage of the cooptation of "organized crime" to coin the term "white-collar crime." This distinction has become significant in both law enforcement and criminal justice research.

Overall, after initial attention upon their release, the reports did little to alter the day-to-day work of criminal justice professionals. They did not solve the crime problem or the overcrowding of the court system. The reports also did not improve Prohibition enforcement or bring about its end. Instead, as one commentator noted 4 years after the reports' publication, the reports were gathering dust on the shelves of college libraries. Along the way the commission encountered both political and funding difficulties that hampered and limited its effectiveness. In the end, the commission expressed many opinions but supported them with few facts. Among its conclusions were that Prohibition should continue with enforcement modifications, crime statistics need to be maintained nationally, costs of crime were exorbitant, immigrants were not more criminal than “natives,” and official lawlessness hampered law enforcement. While its impact immediately following its reporting was limited, the commission’s long-term impact has been greater.

Despite little attention at the time, the commission’s lasting legacy proved more positive. When President Lyndon Johnson created his Crime Commission, the Wickersham Commission’s experience guided the Crime Commission’s research and allowed the latter commission to extend its predecessor’s findings. The Crime Commission also benefitted from statistics the government collected as a result of the Wickersham Commission’s work. More important, the Wickersham Commission brought the problem of crime to the national consciousness. It would soon become a political issue dominating national elections and affecting millions of lives.

Scott Ingram

See also Crime Statistics and Reporting; Immigrants and Crime; Organized Crime; Police Use of Force; President’s Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice

Further Readings

- Booth, D. A. (1969). On crime commission reports. Polity, 2, 92–99.
- Calder, J. D. (1993). The origins and development of federal crime control policy. Westport, CT: Praeger.
- Fausold, M. L. (1985). The presidency of Herbert C. Hoover. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press.
- National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement. (1931). Report on the enforcement of the Prohibition laws of the United States. 71st Congress, 3d Session, House of Representatives, Document No. 722.
- National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement. (1931). Reports (14 vols.). Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office.
- Smith, D. C. (1991). Wickersham to Sutherland to Katzenbach: Evolving an official definition for organized crime. Crime, Law and Social Change, 16, 135–154.

United States. Its advocacy work with community-based organizational affiliates has challenged the problems of crime and race throughout their 40-year history as it affects Hispanics/Latinos. The history of NCLR, its partnerships, its activities as they relate to the criminal justice system, and its leadership are discussed in this entry. (The term Hispanic indicates a mainstream orientation; Latino most often describes the masses. Both are being used to represent all forms of acculturation.)

The National Organization for Mexican American Services (NOMAS), located in Washington, D.C., in the early 1960s, was the first to endorse a need for unification of Mexican organizations; Raul Yzaguirre worked with this group. By the late 1960s, Dr. Julian Samora, Herman Gallegos, and Dr. Ernesto Galarza were commissioned by the Ford Foundation (which had been previously approached for funding by NOMAS) to explore ways that the foundation could help Mexican Americans. These three are the founding members of the Southwest Council of La Raza (SCLR), which predated NCLR. The founding chair of the board was Maclovio Barraza, a union organizer from Tucson. There were 26 members on the board, representing five states: Arizona, California, Colorado, New Mexico, and Texas. Audrey Rojas Kaslow, a probation officer from California, was one of the founding members of NCLR; they had a criminal justice perspective that was sympathetic to the needs of Hispanics/Latinos from the beginning. Gallegos, a San Francisco activist, became executive director.

SCLR received initial funding from the Ford Foundation, United Auto Workers, and the Council of Churches in 1968 to begin activities, influence national policy, and disseminate subgrants. The funding agent was OBECA/Arriba Juntos Center in San Francisco. MALDEF (Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund) was founded and funded in 1968 by the Ford Foundation. MALDEF worked with SCLR, as the organization believed that technical assistance was needed to strengthen grassroots advocacy.

Original affiliates included the Mexican American Unity Council (Texas, 1967), Chicanos Por La Causa (Arizona, 1969), Spanish-Speaking Unity Council (California, 1964), Mexican American Community Programs Foundation, Inc. (California, 1968), East Los Angeles Community Union (California, 1968), Mission

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF LA RAZA

The National Council of La Raza (NCLR) is the largest Hispanic/Latina/o civil rights group in the Development Council (California, 1967), and OBECA/Arriba Juntos Center (California, 1965). The first three organizations mentioned received funding from the Ford Foundation in 1972, having previously been granted subgrants under the umbrella organization.

The Southwest Council of La Raza changed its name to the National Council of La Raza in 1972. Soon after, it opened its headquarters in Washington, D.C. The following year, the bylaws were amended to reflect equal male and female representation on the board. Seventy organizations were represented by NCLR by the mid-1970s. The bylaws were changed in 1975 so that NCLR would represent not just Mexican Americans, but all Hispanics/Latinos. The president of NCLR was regarded as the spokesperson in 1979.

By 1980, there were 125 affiliates and six field offices of NCLR: Albuquerque, Chicago, Dallas, south Texas, Phoenix, and San Francisco. There were some financial difficulties as their staff fell by half by 1987 due largely to government cutbacks. However, NCLR was able to offset some of the losses by the development of their Corporate Advisory Council, which was formed in 1982. The first organizations on the council included Coca-Cola, The Equitable, Gulf, G. D. Searle, General Motors, and Time, Inc. Donald Rumsfeld and James Lee, CEOs of two of these companies, were instrumental in recruiting other corporations for sponsorship of NCLR. An AIDS center was established in 1988 with a 5-year grant from the Centers for Disease Control.

The Office of Institutional Development was initiated in 1990 to lend credence to NCLR's organizational acumen; it had 90 sources of funding by this time. NCLR is one of the board members of the Independent Sector, a coalition of hundreds of nonprofit organizations. NCLR received even more prominence nationally in the 1990s. Twenty-five years of existence saw 158 affiliates serving 39 locations, including Washington, D.C., and Puerto Rico. In 1993, there were 23 corporations on the Corporate Advisory Council. A grant from Kellogg was the impetus behind leadership development training in 1991 meant to ultimately benefit the Hispanic/Latina/o community. NCLR has partnered with other organizations to fight discrimination in housing as well. Some of these organizations include the National Fair Housing Alliance and the Children's Defense Fund. The home ownership program has assisted African Americans and Whites in addition to Hispanics/Latinos.

NCLR has been involved in criminal justice issues from its early days. Civil rights and justice are topics of concern, and the organization worked with MALDEF in 1972 on its National Conference on Administration of Justice and the Mexican American. MALDEF had these conferences from 1970 to 1982. Much of the work has been in racial profiling and juvenile justice issues. For instance, NCLR provided testimony to Congress regarding racial profiling in 2001. Since 1999, NCLR has called for hiring more Hispanic/Latina/o police officers to curb the problem with racial profiling in their communities. This is analogous to what the NAACP has suggested would alleviate police harassment among African Americans. However, an increase in the number of police officers whose cultural background matches communities being served has not stemmed the issue to a great degree. A panel moderator at the NCLR Conference in 1999, Roberto Rodriguez, noted that quandary when he talked about minority officers stereotyping. According to a newspaper article in the Houston Chronicle, written by Jo Ann Zuniga, Carmen Joge, a panelist, cosigned suggesting that minority police officers were not exempt from being abusive. These comments were in response to the acting assistant U.S. attorney general at that time proposing that officers of color take the lead in tackling racial profiling.

Letters indicative of hate crimes were sent to NCLR, MALDEF, and other Hispanic/Latina/o organizations in 2002. It was reported by Gwendolyn Crump in the Sacramento Bee. The letters were filled with white powder that tested negative for anthrax.

In 2003, NCLR formed coalitions with the Mexican American Unity Council, First Mexican Baptist Church, Community Council of Southwest Texas, and the Association for the Advancement of Mexican Americans to form the Texas Criminal Justice Project. The project is designed to explore alternatives to incarceration and focus on disseminating information about problems in criminal justice regarding Hispanics. The following year, the Texas Coalition Advocating Justice for Juveniles, consisting of community- and faith-based organizations, juvenile justice experts, and youth advocates, was formed. Its recommendations included initiatives for nonviolent offenders to be given the opportunity to benefit from community-based alternatives and changing the way that abuse and neglect in the Texas Youth Commission facilities are investigated.

Analysis of criminal and juvenile justice policies spurred NCLR to publish its 2004 seminal report, Lost Opportunities: The Reality of Latinos in the U.S. Criminal Justice System, in conjunction with coauthors at the Center for Youth Policy Research and the Office of University Outreach and Engagement, Michigan State University. They presented their findings to Congress in which they suggested that Hispanics/Latinos are overrepresented in the penal system; they are 3 times more likely to be imprisoned than are their White counterparts. NCLR's president suggested at this time that criminal justice issues were the focus of the modern civil rights era. The organization reported on obstacles such as language barriers from arrest to sentencing, as well as immigration violations. It was called a "lost opportunity" due to the criminal justice system's overdependence on punitive measures (expensive) over rehabilitation (inexpensive).

The Latino Juvenile Justice Network (LJJN) aims to foster relationships among affiliates in order to challenge the juvenile justice system's current state. Cassandra Villanueva coordinates the network, which exists in four states: Pennsylvania, Illinois, Washington, and Louisiana. Four issues of concern to LJJN include (1) disproportionate minority confinement, (2) antigang laws resulting in harsher treatment of Hispanic/Latina/o youth, (3) trying juveniles as adults, and (4) community support after juvenile confinement. As well, the network is considered one of the MacArthur Foundation's Models for Change Initiative. As a NCLR project, LJJN has partnered with Congreso de Latinos Unidos in Philadelphia to educate Hispanic/Latina/o parents and their children regarding their interactions with law enforcement and assurance that their civil rights are not compromised. LJJN also planned to host a community forum on this issue in Reading, Pennsylvania.

NCLR has been an advocate for documented and undocumented immigrants. For instance, it was instrumental in granting temporary legal status to those from El Salvador and Nicaragua through passage of the Moakley-DeConcini Bill as early as the 1980s. However, NCLR does not support open borders, undocumented immigration, or amnesty. Current efforts to curb immigration have many Hispanics/Latinos believing they are being unfairly targeted, according to Michele Waslin, NCLR's director of immigration research.

A newspaper article by Mark Minton in the Arkansas Democrat Gazette from November 2007 reported on the Urban Institute's finding that immigration raids historically and currently tear families apart. The report was conducted for NCLR, and it also noted that children are hurt in the end as oftentimes they are U.S.-born citizens, but their parents are undocumented. In the study of three raids that took place between December 2006 and March 2007 in Colorado, Nebraska, and Massachusetts, 900 adults were arrested who had 500 children.

NCLR has fought against the CLEAR (Clear Law Enforcement for Criminal Alien Removal) Act since its introduction in 2003 to Congress. Variations of it are designed to criminalize immigration matters. For instance, the NCIC (National Crime Information Center) database would swell if the names of suspected immigration violators were added; this is one of the measures that have been proposed as part of the CLEAR Act. It also allows for local and state law enforcement to work with Immigration and Customs Enforcement for enforcement of federal laws.

The current president of NCLR is Janet Murguía; the board chair is Andrea Bazán. There are eight regional offices: Atlanta, Georgia; Sacramento, California; Los Angeles, California; Phoenix, Arizona; Chicago, Illinois; New York, New York; San Juan, Puerto Rico; and San Antonio, Texas. The Raul Yzaguirre Building opened in 2007 in Washington, D.C., the location of NCLR's national office, in anticipation of the organization reaching its 40-year milestone. Since 1993, the number of affiliates has nearly doubled; many of them are community-based organizations. The Corporate Board of Advisors (formerly the Corporate Advisory Council) has grown to include 27 corporate partners.

Marilyn D. Lovett

See also Gringo Justice; Latina/o Criminology; League of United Latin American Citizens

Further Readings

- Garza, S. (2003, July 16). Minorities fill state prisons: Group's program aims to shed light on disparity shown in study. San Antonio Express-News, pp. 1B, 5B.
- Lash, S. (1999, December 15). Wanted: More Latino police: Racial profiling at core of groups' push to recruit. Houston Chronicle, p. A11.
- McKay, E. G. (1993). National Council of La Raza: The first 25 years. Washington, DC: National Council of La Raza.

Websites

National Council of La Raza: <http://www.nclr.org>

NATIONAL CRIMINAL JUSTICE ASSOCIATION

The National Criminal Justice Association (NCJA) is a nonprofit organization that represents state, tribal, and local government efforts that focus on community crime prevention and control. The NCJA has issued policy statements that address key issues specific to minorities and their roles as victims, defendants/prisoners, and professionals within the criminal justice system. The entry examines the mission of the NCJA and policy statements that focus specifically on race and ethnicity.

Mission

From its inception in 1971, the Washington, D.C.-based NCJA's primary purpose has been to serve as a formal mechanism among state, tribal, and local governments and federal agencies. NCJA members collaborate with local law enforcement, court and corrections officials, educational institutions, and elected officials in order to identify pressing crime concerns. The crime concerns are then communicated to federal agencies, Congress, and public and private agencies.

The NCJA has identified numerous components of their mission. They direct the focus of state, tribal, local, and federal governments to the needs of the criminal and juvenile justice systems and provide support for the development of criminal and juvenile justice policy. They support the public and all levels of government in achieving public safety by coordinating education, community, and social service agencies and serve as a catalyst for the consideration, promotion, and implementation of effective criminal justice policies and practices. Last, they advocate for resource support and act as a go-between for the different branches and levels of government.

Policy Statements

In the 1990s, the NCJA responded to community crime concerns regarding minorities' unequal representation within the criminal justice system. They issued two policy statements that address the status of minorities within the American criminal justice system.

Minorities and the Criminal Justice System

African Americans and Hispanic Americans are disproportionately over- and underrepresented within the criminal justice system. They are characterized by a high victimization rate and are significantly more likely to become murder victims than are nonminorities. They comprise a large majority of felony defendants for robbery, drug offenses, youth held in custody for a violent offense, and are also overrepresented in custodial juvenile justice facilities. African Americans and Hispanics are considerably more likely to go to prison in their lifetime than nonminorities. Conversely, minorities are significantly underrepresented in the employment sectors of policing, courts, corrections, and law.

The NCJA policy statement addressing these issues demands that policymakers and officials continuously address criminal justice issues focused on African Americans and Hispanic Americans. They suggested that the following issues regarding racial minorities be focused on and addressed in a systematic manner:

- Overrepresentation of minorities in the juvenile and adult criminal justice populations and underrepresentation of minority employment in law enforcement, legal professions, corrections, and membership in the NCJA

- Conscious and unconscious tensions and stresses between minorities and law enforcement personnel
- Accurate reporting of racially motivated hate crimes
- Minorities as crime victims
- Racial profiling by law enforcement
- Equal access to the court system
- Effects upon parole and probation
- Unintended racially biased effects of drug laws and enforcement strategies
- Racially disparate sentencing patterns

The NCJA policy stipulated that among others, government officials, law enforcement, educational institutions, and human service organizations must be included in the solution to this dilemma.

Native Americans and the Criminal Justice System

While Native Americans' minority status is analogous to that of African Americans and Hispanic Americans, they are distinct in their manner of legal representation and governing. The NCJA reiterates that Native Americans have a constitutional right to self-govern and that in order to understand the unique situation of Native Americans, policy- and lawmakers must familiarize themselves with tribal government systems.

Native Americans are significantly more likely to be victimized by non-Native Americans and have disproportionately higher interracial victimization rates than Caucasians or African Americans. Native Americans are less than 1% of the nation's population, yet both males and females of Native American status become the victims of violent crime at double the rate of all other races. Native Americans are overrepresented in the state prison system, the federal prison system, and arrests for public order crimes. They are underrepresented in all employment sectors of the criminal justice system.

The NCJA policy suggested that the following issues regarding Native Americans be focused upon and addressed in a systematic manner:

- Failure of law enforcement in Indian Country to meet public safety needs
- Rise of serious and violent crime in Indian Country
- Lack of adequate resources in Indian Country
- Overrepresentation in the criminal justice system as both victims of crimes and criminal defendants
- Underrepresentation of Native Americans in the employment sectors of criminal justice
- Conscious and unconscious racial profiling
- Unintended racially biased effects of drug laws and enforcement strategies
- Inaccurate reporting of racially motivated hate crimes
- Equal access to the criminal justice system
- Standards by which Native American law enforcement personnel are evaluated
- Racially disparate sentencing patterns
- Lack of clarity in jurisdictional boundaries

The NCJA policy recommendations shed light on the unique and distinct experiences of Native Americans within the nation's criminal justice system. The self-governing tribal nations reflect the situations of most minority groups within the criminal justice system with an overrepresentation of victims, offenders, and prisoners and an underrepresentation within employment sectors of the police, courts, and corrections. The NCJA policy recommendations stipulate community involvement, official involvement, and an inquiry into the plight of Native Americans within the criminal justice system.

Alana Van Gundy-Yoder

See also Disproportionate Arrests; Disproportionate Incarceration; Disproportionate Minority Contact and Confinement; Native Americans: Culture, Identity, and the Criminal Justice System

Further Readings

- Bureau of Justice Statistics. (2004). A BJS statistical profile, 1992–2002: American Indians and Crime (NCJ 203097). Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs.
- Finn, P., & McNeil, T. (1988). Biased crime and criminal justice response: A summary report prepared for the NCJA. Cambridge, MA: Abt Associates.

Pope, C. E., Lovell, R., & Hsia, H. M. (2002). Disproportionate minority confinement: A review of the research literature from 1989 through 2001 (NCJRS NCJ 198428). Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, Juvenile Justice Clearinghouse.

Websites

National Criminal Justice Association: <http://www.ncja.org>

NATIONAL NATIVE AMERICAN LAW ENFORCEMENT ASSOCIATION

The National Native American Law Enforcement Association (NNALEA) was created as a non-profit organization in the spring of 1993. The organization, which was created by Native American men and women who were working in some area of law enforcement, is open to non-Native Americans and non-law enforcement personnel. The mission statement of NNALEA is "to promote and foster mutual cooperation between American Indian Law Enforcement Officers/Agents/Personnel, their agencies, tribes, private industry and public." NNALEA has three chapters, with the originating chapter in Washington, D.C. There are also chapters in New Mexico and Oklahoma.

Chief Executive Officer

Gary Edwards is the current chief executive officer of NNALEA. Edwards, with the help of other Native American law enforcement officers, helped establish the organization. Prior to his retirement, Edwards spent 28 years with the U.S. Secret Service, achieving the rank of deputy assistant director.

Objectives of the NNALEA

The objectives of NNALEA, as listed on its website, are as follows:

- To provide media for the exchange of ideas and the new techniques used by both criminals and investigators

- To conduct training seminars, conferences, and research into educational methods for the benefit of American Indians in the law enforcement profession
- To keep the membership and public informed of current statute changes and judicial decisions as they relate to the law enforcement community
- To establish a network and directory consisting of Native American enforcement officers/agents/employees
- To provide investigative assistance to Association members within the various aspects of law enforcement investigations
- To promote a positive attitude towards law enforcement in the American Indian community and other communities
- To provide a support group for Native American officers/agents/employees through the utilization of a national organization

Scholarships

NNALEA sponsors two scholarships that are provided to deserving Native American students. One of the scholarships is named after NNALEA member Don Leonard, who was killed in the April 19, 1995, bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City. At the time of his death, Leonard was on assignment with the Secret Service. Students are awarded scholarships on the basis of their grade point average, a required essay, and an application that shows how they intend to contribute to their community. The scholarships are funded through both private donations and the NNALEA executive board. Scholarships that have been awarded include those for study at the University of Illinois at Chicago, Haskell Indian Nations University in Lawrence, Kansas, and the University of Massachusetts.

Conferences

NNALEA has conducted National Training Conferences across the United States. In October 2007, NNALEA held its 15th Annual National Training Conference in Memphis, Tennessee, with approximately 600 members in attendance. Presentations included "Elements of Homeland Security,” “Methamphetamine/Substance Abuse,” “Embracing Tribal Partnerships for Regional Homeland Security,” and “Executive Leadership Training.” The 15th Annual National Training Conference was accredited by the Council on Law Enforcement, Education and Training (CLEET), allowing Oklahoma officers, federal law enforcement officers, and private investigators to receive 20 hours’ credit toward the number of training hours required by CLEET. Speakers at the conference included law enforcement officers from such agencies as the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, Department of Homeland Security, U.S. Department of Justice, White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, U.S. Marshal’s Service, U.S. Customs and Border Protection, U.S. Secret Service and National Sheriffs’ Association. Attendance was limited to Native Americans who were law enforcement officers. Louis Quijas, Assistant Director, Office of Law Enforcement Coordination of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), spoke at the conference on the FBI’s long history of working closely with NNALEA. Members of NNALEA also participated in the Third Annual Crisis Intervention Team Conference in Memphis in August 2007.

Community Involvement

NNALEA is active in its support and partnership of the Boys & Girls Clubs of Indian Country. At their 11th Annual Training Conference, which was held in 2003 in Fort Worth, Texas, a letter from former First Lady Laura Bush was read. The letter from Mrs. Bush expounded on the importance of providing positive experiences and opportunities for Native American youth and praised the work of Boys & Girls Clubs in America, especially as it related to youths in Indian country. NNALEA also works with the Department of Justice Office of Community Oriented Policing (COPS), the Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms Gang Resistance Education and Training (GREAT) program, the Indian Health Service, and the Bureau of Indian Affairs–Office of Law Enforcement Services in an effort to increase opportunities for Native American youths. In 2007, the shoe company Nike provided 19,000 pairs of shoes to Native American youths. NNALEA assisted in the cost of shipping these shoes.

2006 National Congress of American Indians Resolution

In the 2006 National Congress of American Indians Resolution #MIC-06-011, it was noted that NNALEA had developed a method of collecting data on Homeland Security needs and on tribal law enforcement. It also addressed the fact that NNALEA’s “approach is to work directly with tribal leaders and with local tribal law enforcement professionals to evaluate current conditions and identify current tribal law enforcement needs” and that it shares “the information that it collects with the duly elected Tribal Governments of each tribe that it surveys and with their law enforcement agencies.”

Awards

NNALEA presents numerous awards to both Native Americans and to individual Indian tribes. In 2006, NNALEA named Navajo Division of Public Safety Director Samson Cowboy as Professional of the Year in recognition of his outstanding work in improving the emergency services of the Navaho Nation and his work with the regional homeland security initiative. Also in 2006, the Cocopah Indian Tribe was awarded the Unity Award for its outstanding leadership in working with federal, state, and local law enforcement agencies.

Debbie Mills

See also Methamphetamine; Native Americans; Tribal Police

Further Readings

National Congress of American Indians. (2006). Resolution in support of NCAI law enforcement study and NCAI sponsored 2006 Law Enforcement Conference (Resolution # MIC-06-0111). Proceedings of National Congress of American Indians. Retrieved from http://www.ncai.org/ncai/resolutions/doc/MIC-06-011_Law_Enforcement.pdf

Websites

National Native American Law Enforcement Association: <http://www.nnalea.org>

NATIONAL ORGANIZATION OF BLACK LAW ENFORCEMENT EXECUTIVES

The National Organization of Black Law Enforcement Executives (NOBLE) is a national nonprofit organization of higher-ranking professionals in law enforcement agencies across the United States. Calling itself the “The Conscience of Law Enforcement” and following the motto “Justice through Action,” its leadership and membership, representing six regional and nearly 50 state and local chapters, supports Blacks in leadership roles of governmental law enforcement agencies. With a focus on unity and training, through its conventions, symposia, projects, publications, advocacy, and initiatives, it has sought to further awareness and advancement of shared issues of Blacks in supervisory roles of law enforcement and in urban communities. In addition, for more than 3 decades, NOBLE has been in the forefront of promoting awareness about several important issues related to race and crime, including the importance of community-oriented policing, the eradication of racial profiling and hate crimes, as well as others. This entry describes the founding of NOBLE, its mission, activities, governance, and growth.

The Founding of NOBLE

NOBLE was founded in 1976 during a 3-day urban crime symposium cosponsored by the Police Foundation and the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (LEAA). In attendance were 60 top-ranking Black law enforcement executives—delegates from 24 states and 55 major cities—who together immediately recognized a need for organizational unity to address mutual issues of concern. As a result, the existing conference agenda was altered in favor of discussions and debate related to forming NOBLE, electing its leadership, and establishing its mission and purpose. Hubert Williams, then-director of the Newark, New Jersey, Police Department, was unanimously elected as the founding executive director.

This was the first organized exchange of ideas among high-ranking Black law enforcement officers about urban crime and associated socioeconomic conditions in urban communities. It also was the beginning of an ongoing conversation at the executive level about racial biases in the administration of justice, police–community relations, and the hiring and promotion of Black police officers. Since then, NOBLE has provided a unified voice of opinion and experience to influence the criminal justice system and a platform for its growing membership to share their concerns and challenges. While crime control was the concern within which NOBLE was born, its beginnings can be traced to the urban civil unrest of the 1960s, which was exacerbated by a breakdown of communication and lack of trust between Blacks and White police supervision. As pointed out by Lloyd Sealy, a founding member, in a paper presented at the 1976 conference, analysis of the failures in police response to riots, civil unrest, and urban crime concluded that Black representation was needed in the sworn ranks of police departments to develop new policies and procedures. The founding members of NOBLE agreed that Black law enforcement executives could have a significantly more effective impact upon the criminal justice system and related issues of concern through a unified voice.

Many of the 60 founding members led major urban police departments or educated young colleagues entering the profession, including men such as Lee Brown, William Bracey, Vernon Gill, and Lloyd Sealy and a few women. It is notable that the impetus for its founding came from a woman, Peggy Triplett, then the special assistant to the director of the National Institute for Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice. Triplett, who is known as the “Mother of NOBLE,” had the idea for NOBLE and organized the now-famous 1976 conference initiative. NOBLE has long supported Black women who rose to executive roles in law enforcement; at present a large percentage of women are full members and two women have served as the organization’s president.

Mission, Principles, Purposes, and Objectives of NOBLE

The stated mission of NOBLE is “to ensure equity in the administration of justice in the provision of public service to all communities, and to serve as the conscience of law enforcement by being committed to justice by action”; this has been shortened to the motto “Justice by Action.” There are seven guiding principles to which all members of NOBLE are committed: respect, uncompromising integrity, courage of convictions, accountability, community, diversity, and mentoring. The stated purposes of NOBLE are still quite close to those agreed upon at its 1976 inception: to unify Black law enforcement officers at executive and command levels by offering means of communication and exchange of information between them and a platform with which they can voice their concerns. Organizational activities and publications seek to present relevant research in law enforcement, with which NOBLE can recommend legislation and establish effective means and strategies for dealing with racism in the criminal justice system and sensitize the criminal justice system to the problems of the Black community. There is also an ongoing effort to outreach to and establish linkages and liaisons with organizations of similar concern.

Activities of NOBLE

The activities of NOBLE grow out of the group’s general mission and include research, publication, training, advocacy, and conferences, as well as working for equity for Blacks in law enforcement and in urban communities. Foremost are activities that carry out their mission of involving minority executives in law enforcement in policy and procedure decision making and implementation at the highest levels. Under the umbrella of NOBLE, its members and leadership have consulted and testified on a variety of criminal justice issues affecting law enforcement executives and the Black community to Congress and local governments as well as individual law enforcement agencies. Over the years, issues of interest have focused upon community-oriented policing, technical assistance and training, as well as advocacy against excessive use of deadly force, hate crimes, racial profiling, and racism.

NOBLE provides platforms for discussion and forums for unifying and supporting Black law enforcement executives through training, fellowships, symposia, publications, and its website. Fellowships, internships, and mentoring programs are available to NOBLE members in order to facilitate participation in organizational leadership, training, and professional support. NOBLE continues to be an active supporter of affirmative action in the promotion of officers of color to sworn ranks, arguing that the standardized promotional tests are biased to White officers and that affirmative action is needed to eliminate discrimination and promote cultural diversity. NOBLE has publicly discussed racism as integrally related to crime, civil unrest, and the need for reform of the criminal justice system including the advancement of Black officers. Educational scholarships and travel grants to the annual conference are offered to youth by the national, state, and local chapters. Local chapters continue to provide outreach on a number of matters of concern to the Black community, including distributing their pamphlet, The Law and You: A Guide to Communicating With Law Enforcement Officials.

A yearly opportunity for networking, unifying, and support, NOBLE’s annual training conference presents relevant practical, technological, and global issues in policing and offers attendees the skills and training required for promotion and advancement taught by faculty tapped from the membership. In addition to chapter, committee, and business meetings, the bulk of the conference is dedicated to workshops, symposia, and presentations offering the opportunity to earn continuing education units and exchange ideas. Each conference now includes a CEO symposium, a women’s symposium, and, a youth leadership conference. Major political figures often address the conference; proclamations and resolutions are ratified by the membership; and awards are presented to accomplished members as well as community leaders and innovators furthering civil rights.

Advocacy for community-oriented policing began by assisting police departments in Newark, Detroit, and Houston that implemented some of the first programs using community-oriented policing strategies (COPS), which was developed by NOBLE through a grant from the Ford Foundation in the 1980s. In consortium with other organizations and funded by the U.S. Department of Justice, NOBLE continues to offer technical assistance, training, and policy and procedural recommendations to implement and improve community-oriented policing programs in law enforcement agencies. Related initiatives focusing on police responses to domestic violence, victim assistance programs, police stops, child safety, and youth leadership can be directly linked to an ongoing enthusiasm within the NOBLE membership for expansion of community-oriented policing programs nationwide.

NOBLE continues to receive government and private support to conduct research, produce publications, and implement related programs providing training and assistance on a number of issues of interest to NOBLE. Reports, pamphlets, training kits, and other publications have resulted from this work, and many are freely available on their website. Publications from NOBLE have provided important data and recommendations on such topics as racial profiling, traffic safety, firearms sales, use of deadly force, family violence, stop-and-frisk policies, traffic safety, law enforcement technology and personnel practices, affirmative action, hate crimes, community-oriented policing, victim assistance and law enforcement personnel practices. NOBLE has recently expanded its areas of concern to include environmental crimes and justice.

The governance of NOBLE is hierarchical, with a national president serving as the CEO of the organization, supported by a national vice president and six regional vice presidents as well as other member-elected officers serving on the executive board. The NOBLE national office is situated in Landover, Maryland, where a small staff, including the president and vice president, coordinate the work and activities of NOBLE national as well as its chapters and committees. Regional chapters are divided into five regional areas of the United States and one international chapter; approximately 48 state and local chapters operate under the regional chapters, with all chapter members belonging also to the NOBLE national organization. Much of the ongoing networking and community outreach of NOBLE is carried out in the regional, state, and local chapters. National committees oversee critical issues, governance, awards, and conferences and are chaired by appointees of the national president or serve also as executive board members and include representatives from the six regional chapters. Levels of membership in NOBLE are based upon the governmental rank, and membership levels change as members are promoted within their agencies; full members are at the command level and higher. A sustaining-level membership is available to businesses and individuals who are not in law enforcement but support NOBLE's mission.

From 60 founding members in 1976, the membership of NOBLE has now grown to well over 4,000 members, representing a diverse group of professionals employed in supervisory roles at a myriad of law enforcement agencies. This exponential growth of membership is a clear indication that the original NOBLE goal to have many more Black officers assume executive positions in law enforcement has been a resounding success; however, the work of NOBLE remains as relevant today as it was over 30 years ago. A study conducted by Thompson in 2003 revealed that the highest ranking members of NOBLE still perceive personal marginalization at all ranks in their agencies. A significant percentage of respondents reported lack of respect from subordinates of all races as well as a corresponding lack of respect from White peers and supervisors. The same study concluded that NOBLE continues to play a vital role of support and guidance in the professional lives of Black law enforcement executives.

Ellen H. Belcher

See also Brown, Lee P.; Community Policing; National Association of Blacks in Criminal Justice

Further Readings

- National Organization of Black Law Enforcement Executives. (1982). Stop—Or I'll shoot: The use of deadly force by law enforcement officers. Landover, MD: Author.
- National Organization of Black Law Enforcement Executives. (1998). NOBLE: National Association of Black Law Enforcement Executives—Justice by action. Paducah, KY: Turner.
- New head at the helm of Noble. (1998, April 4). New York Amsterdam News, 89(16), 44.
- Scott, E. L. (1986). Racial and religious violence: A law enforcement guidebook. Landover, MD: National Organization of Black Law Enforcement Executives.

- Scott, E. L. (n.d.). Victim Services Program Planning Guide: Suggested activities for police departments. Landover, MD: National Organization of Black Law Enforcement Executives.
- Sealy, L. (1977). The dilemma of the Black police executives. In H. J. Bryce (Ed.), Black crime: A police view (pp. 141–156). Washington, DC: Joint Center for Political Studies.
- Thompson, R. A. (2005). Black skin–brass shields: Assessing the presumed marginalization of Black law enforcement executives. American Journal of Criminal Justice, 30(2), 163–175.

Websites

- National Organization of Black Law Enforcement Executives: <http://www.noblenational.org>

NATIONAL TRIBAL JUSTICE RESOURCE CENTER

The National Tribal Justice Resource Center (NTJRC) was established in 2000 by the National American Indian Court Judges Association with funding from the U.S. Department of Justice and the Bureau of Justice Assistance. The NTJRC is the tribal equivalent of the much larger National Criminal Justice Reference Service (NCJRS). Like its larger cousin, the NTJRC hosts a comprehensive website with materials on all facets of justice in Indian Country (which includes all tribal lands and allotments). In addition to serving as an information clearinghouse, NTJRC provides technical assistance to tribal governments.

In its most visible role, NTJRC serves as a centralized location for grant and funding announcements relevant to justice in Indian Country, a calendar of conferences and other pertinent events, an online message board, and other appropriate information. The organization hosts more than 35 listserv mailing lists related to tribal justice issues, including trial courts, corrections/police, court technology, and other topics. In partnership with the National American Indian Court Judges Association, NTJRC distributes a variety of useful publications and practical guides on tribal courts and justice and hosts digital copies of some publications on their comprehensive website. The organization also provides sample job descriptions for a variety of justice positions ranging from police officers to court workers to employees in detention to grant writers. Solicitations are posted on their website for relevant career opportunities across Indian Country. NTJRC is a clearinghouse for tribal constitutions, by-laws, codes, and charters. The fully searchable collection of these documents on one easy-to-use website means they are available for both the public and tribal governments who wish to analyze how other tribes have dealt with particular issues as models for writing their own laws. The organization also provides model and sample codes for a variety of legal issues (e.g., criminal law, environmental law, and victim services), which can easily be adapted and adopted by tribes as part of their own governing documents. Finally, NTJRC publishes a quarterly newsletter, Tribal Justice Today, that is distributed to tribal courts and justice agencies; copies appear on the organization's website for the general public.

In conjunction with the online legal research organization VersusLaw, NTJRC houses a searchable database of court opinions from a growing list of tribes. The online database helps tribes establish precedents and distribute caselaw in addition to showcasing legal opinions that demonstrate that tribal courts are credible courts that deserve comity and respect for their decisions. In the past, locating tribal court decisions was a time-consuming and often frustrating process. The NTJRC database, on the other hand, is easy to search or browse and is available 24 hours a day on the Internet. As more tribes join the court opinions project, the growing database may help establish a general tribal legal jurisprudence.

A useful directory of tribal courts and justice systems on the NTJRC site contains telephone, fax, and address information for all federally recognized tribes and links to the appropriate websites when available. NTJRC has been at the forefront of encouraging tribal courts to create their own websites. Online forms and information improve constituent services (e.g., information is easier to find and clients can download forms and legal information at any time of day) while simultaneously reducing duplication and staffing costs for the hosting court. An additional benefit to independently operated court websites is that they allow for the appropriate use of tribal languages and symbols, which can both cultivate community understanding of tribal justice systems and play a role in furthering sovereignty.

One of the unique programs offered by NTJRC is the Lending a Helping Hand project, which pairs fledgling tribal courts with more established tribal courts that agree to mentor and assist the newer courts by providing advice, guidance, access to forms, and technical assistance in creating and operating a viable tribal court. Initiatives like Lending a Helping Hand are culturally appropriate arrangements that have great potential to improve justice in Indian Country. Allowing tribes with well-established and respected justice systems to mentor tribes with less advanced systems serves to foster cooperative solutions to common problems and can mutually benefit both mentor and mentee.

The provision of technical assistance is at the center of NTJRC's mission. Along those lines, the organization hosts a toll-free hotline for questions about tribal justice, an online chat-based helpline that is staffed during working hours, and on-site technical assistance and evaluation referrals. On-site technical assistance can involve establishing new justice systems or programming, evaluating current justice initiatives or programming, case management, or other appropriate issues.

Through its service as a clearinghouse and provider of technical assistance, NTJRC has played a strong role in the transformation of tribal justice systems from quaint forums about which few were knowledgeable to modern institutions capable of serving their communities in improved ways. In conjunction with the National American Indian Court Judges Association, NTJRC will continue to play an important role in the support and advancement of justice issues in Indian Country.

Jon'a F. Meyer

See also Native American Courts; National American Indian Court Judges Association

Further Readings

The benefits of having published tribal court decisions online. (2003). Tribal Justice Today, 2(2), 4–6.
Charging, L. R. (2005, August). Practicing in tribal courts: A rewarding opportunity. The Nebraska Lawyer, pp. 15–19.

New tribal justice system website leads to a treasury of resources. (2001). Tribal Justice Today, 1(1), 7.

NTJRC to update tribal criminal court benchbook and clerk's manual. (2001). Tribal Justice Today, 1(1), 10–11.

Welcome to the National Tribal Justice Resource Center! (2001). Tribal Justice Today, 1(1), 1–2.

Websites

National Tribal Justice Resource Center: <http://www.ntjrc.org>

NATIONAL URBAN LEAGUE

The National Urban League (NUL) is the oldest and largest nonpartisan, nonprofit community-based organization of its kind. This organization advocates eliminating racial discrimination and segregation against African Americans and other minority groups in America. The league provides various social services and programs to more than 2 million people every year. It is based in New York City, with functioning affiliates in more than 100 cities in 35 states and the District of Columbia. This topic is related to race and crime due to the role of the National Urban League in combating crime in Black communities and in ensuring that African Americans and other minorities have equal social and economic opportunities in every facet of American life. This entry will outline the National Urban League's mission and strategy, its organizational history, and its efforts toward crime control and prevention in the African American community.

Mission and Strategy

The National Urban League's mission is to enable African Americans to secure economic self-reliance, parity, power, and civil rights. This mission is implemented through a five-point strategic empowerment agenda that targets the local needs of African Americans and other ethnic communities. The points include Education and Youth Empowerment, Economic Empowerment, Health and Quality of Life Empowerment, Civic Engagement and Leadership Empowerment, and Civil Rights and Racial Justice Empowerment.

History

When the U.S. Supreme Court approved segregation in Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), it prompted a mass movement of Blacks from the rural South to the cities of the North in hopes for freedom and opportunity. However, Black newcomers to the North realized that they had not fled racial discrimination. Yet, they recognized that they did have something in the North that was not available in the South, which was an opportunity. To take advantage of their opportunities while adapting to their new life and working to reduce discrimination, the Committee on Urban Conditions Among Negroes was established. This organization was founded by Ruth Standish Baldwin and Dr. George Edmund Hayes on September 29, 1910, in New York City. The committee eventually merged with the Committee for the Improvement of Industrial Conditions Among Negroes (1906) and the National League for the Protection of Colored Women (1905) to become the National League on Urban Conditions Among Negroes. The name was shortened in 1920 to its current name, the National Urban League (NUL). The NUL aimed to provide counseling to Black migrants, train Black social workers, and bring educational and employment opportunities to Blacks. The organization quickly grew, with 81 members working in 30 cities by the end of World War I. Since its inception, the organization has been instrumental in conducting research that documented educational, housing, health, and employment problems faced by Blacks.

Professor Edwin R. A. Seligman served as chair from 1911 to 1915. Ruth Baldwin took over in 1915. Eventually, Eugene Kinkle Jones led the agency until he retired in 1941. His guidance led the NUL to break barriers to employment through a major expansion of their campaign by boycotting, pressuring schools for expanded vocational opportunities, and prodding for the inclusion of Blacks.

Other past leaders also made momentous contributions to the efforts of the NUL. Lester Granger fought to integrate the racist trade unions and was a major supporter of the March on Washington to contest discrimination in defense plants and in the armed services. Another notable executive director, Whitney Young, Jr., led the league in partnership with the civil rights movement and, most important, worked to abolish poverty through more government and private-sector endeavors. After Young's tragic death, Vernon E. Jordan became the fifth executive director, but was the first to be called the league's president, when the title of executive director was changed to president in 1977. Jordan took the league to new horizons by expanding social services efforts, instituting programs that increased Black voters and addressed energy, environment, and nontraditional jobs and by developing the publication The State of Black of America. As the years progressed, there were more great leaders, such as John Jacobs and Hugh B. Price, who also did exemplary work and made great accomplishments that continued to mount the success of the NUL through its advocacy and dedication to making the conditions of minorities better in America.

The NUL's current president, Marc H. Morial, was appointed on May 15, 2003. He has built upon the legacy of the league by rebuilding the movement through his five-point agenda. Morial has acquired more than $10 million in funding, created "NUL on the Hill" a legislative policy conference, obtained a multimillion-dollar fund for minority businesses, and restored the annual The State of Black America report, all within his first year.

Crime Control and Prevention

In addition to the many social services and advocacy programs offered by the National Urban League to develop African Americans economically, the organization has also made crime control and prevention in the Black community through public policy one of its top priorities. During the 1980s, the NUL Research Department located in Washington, D.C., was involved in several research projects that addressed race and crime, including the compilation of one of the first bibliographies that included contributions by minority scholars. More recently, as a result of the disproportionate number of Black males in the criminal justice system, the NUL conducted a 6-month study titled "Lockdown: The Race to Incarcerate African Americans," which was a national evaluation of the treatment of Black male prisoners. The findings unmasked that Black prisoners were not offered ongoing rehabilitation. The report concurred with the National Commission on the Black Male, a NUL initiative, which explores the adverse disparities and trends that affect Black males. Consequently, the NUL has insisted that lawmakers convene to investigate high incarceration rates and look for solutions related to the dubious quality of life for many African American males. The organization has also petitioned for increased vocational training and drug treatment programs for Black inmates.

The league continues in its crime prevention efforts through the recruitment of Blacks for law enforcement positions, seeking out alternatives to incarceration, working on crime prevention and prison reforms, advocating against police brutality and for affirmative action through its program, Community-Oriented Policing Services (COPS), and by conducting media campaigns on crime prevention in the Black community.

Deonna S. Turner

See also Community Policing; Crime Statistics and Reporting; Delinquency Prevention; National African American Drug Policy Coalition; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP)

Further Readings

- Parris, G., & Brooks, L. (1971). Blacks in the city: A history of the National Urban League. Boston: Little, Brown.
- Woodson, R. L. (Ed.). (1977). Black perspectives on crime and the criminal justice system. Boston: G. K. Hall.

Websites

The National Urban League: <http://www.nul.org>

NATION OF ISLAM

The term Black Muslims refers to the Blacks in America who belong to the Lost and Found Nation of Islam in the West. The Nation of Islam, or NOI, as it is popularly known, was founded July 4, 1930, in Detroit, Michigan, upon the appearance of a man identifying himself as W. D. Fard. The importance of this topic for race and crime lies in understanding the phenomenal growth of Islam, particularly in the Black community, as well as Islam's widespread presence in the penal institutions of North America.

The term Black Muslim was popularized after the publication of C. Eric Lincoln's book Black Muslims in America in 1960. However, even though others use this name, members of the Nation of Islam do not describe themselves in this way, and they see themselves simply as Muslims. Members of the Nation of Islam describe themselves as lost members of a worldwide "nation" of Islam that had been founded in the west by their "Savior" W. D. Fard after a period of prophesized enslavement. Fard was reportedly born in Mecca on February 26, 1877, the son of a Black father and White mother. He studied for 42 years in preparation for his mission of deliverance and had been in and out of the United States for 20 years before making himself known in Detroit. He produced thousands of converts to his brand of Islam in the city of Detroit. Adherents to the NOI creed joined the ranks through a process of acceptance, filing a form, reciting, and registering. Members who are registered are given an X or a Muslim name in place of the "slave names" they inherited from the period of slavery. In the third year, W. D. Fard identified himself as W. F. Muhammad. He taught one of his converts, Elijah Poole, night and day for 40 months, naming him his supreme minister and assigning 104 books to read on the life of Muhammad ibn Abdullah, the prophet of Islam. He gave him the surname Elijah Karriem and eventually Elijah Muhammad.

Early NOI involvement with the criminal justice system included the arrest of W. D. Fard in Detroit and Chicago. Elijah Muhammad was arrested for refusing to enroll the Muslim children in public schools. Upon W. D. Fard's departure in 1934, internal dissention over doctrine and succession forced Elijah Muhammad to flee for his life for 7 years to Chicago, Milwaukee, and the eastern seaboard. He was arrested by the FBI on May 8, 1942, for sedition and not registering for the draft during World War II. Since Elijah Muhammad was too old for the draft, he argued he was arrested to silence his opposition to Black participation in the war effort. Many of his male followers were arrested also. They were refused the Muslim holy book, the Qur'an, and were not allowed to follow Muslim dietary laws while incarcerated. On August 24, 1946, Elijah Muhammad was released from FCI Milan, Michigan, and began rebuilding the remnants of the movement. The Muslim presence in the federal system was the genesis of Islam in the criminal justice system.

Elijah Muhammad's rebuilding effort would be greatly assisted by the prison conversion of Malcolm Little. Beginning in 1949, Little corresponded with Muhammad while serving a 77-month sentence in Norfolk Prison Colony, Massachusetts, for breaking and entering. He was released from prison August 7, 1952, joined the NOI, changed his name to Malcolm X, and began rising through the ranks to eventually become minister of the Harlem, New York, mosque and the NOI's national spokesman. His oratory and organizing skills enabled him to establish mosques up and down the eastern seaboard, thereby helping to thrust the NOI into national prominence.

In 1959, Mike Wallace hosted the made-for-television documentary The Hate That Hate Produced, which introduced the NOI and Black Nationalism to White America. In this documentary, the Nation of Islam and other Black Nationalist organizations were juxtaposed with the civil rights organizations such as the NAACP and integrationist leaders like Roy Wilkins.

The turbulent 1960s was a time of the rise of Black consciousness, pride, and activism. The civil rights movement, led most notably by Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and the NOI, represented by Elijah Muhammad's national spokesman, Malcolm X, presented White America with a choice between granting African Americans full citizenship rights as demanded by the civil rights movement or allowing Blacks to establish a state or territory in America or elsewhere, as the NOI insisted. Federal law enforcement's response to this dilemma was to step up surveillance and infiltration of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, the Nation of Islam, and other organizations through the FBI's Counter Intelligence Program, COINTELPRO. Through this program, the FBI attempted to discredit Black leaders and disrupt the organizations they led. Malcolm X's 1964 defection from the NOI, his establishment of the secular nationalist Organization of Afro-American Unity, and his subsequent assassination in 1965 tarnished the image of the NOI. Simultaneously, the conversion of newly crowned heavyweight champion Cassius Clay, Jr., a.k.a. Muhammad Ali, to the NOI in 1964 was equally powerful in regaining legitimacy among the Black masses. Despite the FBI's bugging the motel rooms of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and their documented claims of having successfully engineered the split between Malcolm X and Elijah Muhammad and causing internal dissention in both movements, the demand for civil rights and growth of Islam in the urban ghettos and prisons in America continued unabated. A temporary de facto fusion of the civil rights movement and NOI was brought about by opposition to the Vietnam War.

Muhammad Ali being stripped of his boxing title for refusing to register for the draft and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s open opposition to the war in 1967 influenced a generation of college-aged youth.

For the NOI, 1965 to 1975 represented a zenith of economic, social, and religious progress and influence under the leadership of Elijah Muhammad. In 1965, Malcolm X was replaced in New York by Minister Louis Farrakhan, head of the Boston mosque, who joined the NOI in 1955. Farrakhan successfully rebuilt the New York mosque and was appointed the NOI national spokesman. By the end of 1974, the NOI had established more than 100 mosques and dozens of schools. It owned tens of thousands of acres of farmland, canning factories, slaughter houses, bakeries, restaurants, apartments, houses, a trucking fleet, and it imported frozen fish and engaged in foreign trade. In 1975, Elijah Muhammad was succeeded by his son Wallace D. Muhammad, who moved the NOI toward Islamic orthodoxy. Imam W. Deen Mohammed, as he would later become known, would lose the support of Minister Louis Farrakhan. In 1978, Minister Farrakhan began to rebuild the NOI according to the teachings of his mentor the "Honorable Elijah Muhammad, Messenger of Allah." Despite the public split, there has not been any reported bloodshed between the two factions. Minister Farrakhan came to the attention of the general American public as a result of his conflict with members of the Jewish community in the 1980s. He is perhaps best known for leading the Million Man March on Washington, D.C., in 1995.

The Nation of Islam has been criticized as being a Black separatist hate group by some. It has also been hailed for instilling self-esteem, promoting economic self-sufficiency, and reforming criminals by others.

In 2004, the Federal Bureau of Prisons reported that of the approximately 150,000 inmates, 9,000 or 6% sought Islamic religious services (U.S. Department of Justice, 2004). Of those identifying themselves as Muslim, 85% were Sunni or Nation of Islam.

Robert Muhammad

See also Black Panther Party; COINTELPRO and Covert Operations; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; No-Fly Lists

Further Readings

- Accomplishments of the Muslims*. (n.d.). [Brochure]. Chicago: Muhammad Temple no .2.
- Alexander, E. C. (1981). Elijah Muhammad on African American education: A Guide for African and Black studies programs. New York: ECA Associates.
- Bennett, L., Jr. (2003). Before the Mayflower: A history of Black America (7th ed.). Chicago: Johnson Publishing.
- Breitman, G., Porter, H., & Smith, B. (1991). The assassination of Malcolm X. New York: Pathfinder.
- Clegg, C. A. (1997). An original man: The life and times of Elijah Muhammad. New York: St. Martin's.
- Farrakhan, L. (1993). A torchlight for America. Chicago: Final Call.
- Haley, A. (1964). Autobiography of Malcolm X. New York: Ballantine.
- Lincoln, C. E. (1991). The Black Muslims in America (Rev. ed.). New York: Kayode.
- Nu'Man, M. A. (1989). What every American should know about Islam and the Muslims (Rev. ed.). Jersey City, NJ: New Mind Productions.
- U.S. Department of Justice. (2004). A review of the Federal Bureau of Prisons' selection of Muslim religious services providers. Washington, DC: Office of Inspector General. Retrieved from <http://www.usdoj.gov/oig/special/0404/index.htm>
- Wilmore, G. S. (1983). Black religion and Black radicalism (2nd ed.). Maryknoll, NY: Orbis.

Websites

Nation of Islam: <http://www.noi.org>

NATIVE AMERICAN COURTS

The ability of governments to regulate their society depends heavily on the ability of their justice systems to respond adequately to crime. The rising crime and victimization rates on American Indian and Alaska Native lands have heightened the attention to this matter for Native American courts. The purpose of this entry is to provide an overview of Native American courts, including the historical development of the court system, the current state of the courts, and some critical issues they currently face. However, it is important to first discuss the context of Indian Country, since it is this population Native American courts serve. (American Indian and Alaska Native are terms that describe any person whose origins can be traced to North, Central, or South America and who maintains tribal affiliation. For this entry, the term American Indian and Native American will be used interchangeably to denote both Native American and Alaska Native. Indian Country is a term that denotes land belonging to American Indians or Alaska Natives.)

Crime in Indian Country

According to recent census data, approximately 4.3 million American Indian and Alaska Natives live in the United States. Approximately half live in Indian Country, which comprises more than 50 million acres of land spread across more than 30 continental states. Although the majority of reservations and off-reservation trust lands lie west of the Mississippi River, there are some tribes located in the east as well.

Although tribes vary significantly in terms of social, economic, and cultural characteristics, Indian Country is currently experiencing severe social and economic problems. The Native American unemployment rate hovers around 50%, making them the poorest of all minority groups. Their school dropout rate is twice the national average, with many youth dropping out before the 10th grade. With the exception of a few densely populated areas on reservations, most Native Americans live in geographically isolated areas. As a consequence, Native Americans and communities are often characterized by high rates of alcoholism and substance abuse, high suicide rates, poor health, lack of affordable housing, substandard education, a critical lack of jobs, and high crime rates.

Unlike U.S. police departments and courts, it is difficult for tribal criminal justice agencies to collect systematic data because of the lack of resources such as understaffing, funds, data collection systems, and analysis software. It is also difficult to obtain data on court statistics because of the cultural diversity between tribes and court structures. Since criminal offenses can be tried at multiple governmental levels (i.e., tribal, state, or federal court), tribal data collection efforts are further hampered. Statistics that are reported are likely to be underestimated because of victim hesitation to report the crime and the high level of discretion of criminal justice actors. Nonetheless, there are some data available that provide a tentative picture of what Native courts are currently facing.

The National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS) collects information on violent crimes including rape, sexual assault, robbery, and aggravated and simple assault for persons 12 and older. Based on data over a 9-year period (1992–2001), American Indians experienced 1 violent crime for every 10 residents ages 12 or older. Compared to both African Americans (1 out of 20) and Whites (1 out of 25), Native Americans in this sample were victimized at an alarming rate. American Indians were more than twice as likely as Whites, African Americans, and Asians to experience a sexual assault or rape, aggravated assault, and simple assault. Robbery was the only violent crime for which American Indians were victimized at a rate more similar to African Americans, although it was still double that of other races.

The rate of violent victimization among American Indian women was more than 2.5 times the rate for African American and White females and 5 times greater than for Asian women. American Indians were more likely to be victimized across all age categories, but it was highest for those between the ages of 18 and 24. There was also a great deal of victimization among the elderly. Among persons age 55 or greater, the victimization rate was 22 per 1,000 compared to the overall rate of 8 per 1,000.

Based on these statistics alone, Native American courts have a daunting task ahead of them. As discussed in more detail following, tribal courts must address these social problems while facing a host of other barriers. First, it is important to take a step back and examine the historical development and current context of Native American courts.

Historical Development

Formal court systems in Native American communities are a relatively recent development. It was not until the 1930s that tribes operated their court systems based on their laws, although prior to this they did have formal methods for resolving disputes. Although there are some variations among contemporary Native American courts, there are generally three types of courts: indigenous forums, Courts of Indian Offenses, and tribal courts. (Some tribes also have an appellate review court.) In recent years there has been an increased interest and utilization in specialized courts (e.g., Healing to Wellness Courts). Each is discussed in turn.

The most traditional type of court for Native American communities is called an indigenous forum, or a traditional court. Also referred to as peacemaking or sentencing circles, this approach focuses on mediating cases to the satisfaction of all parties involved. This method encourages the offender to take responsibility and acknowledge the harm done to the victim and the community. Unlike most forms of justice today, this method of justice occurs within the community and stresses the importance of rehabilitation over incarceration. Approximately 20% of tribes with a justice system operate this court system on their reservation.

The Court of Indian Offenses (CFR) was established in the late 1880s by the U.S. Department of Interior and the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) to help tribal communities resolve less serious criminal offenses. It was with this development that Native American values and customs were suppressed in order to promote the philosophy of justice of the dominant society. For example, the majority of judges were non-Native and the codes by which they operated did not reflect the traditional values and customs of Native Peoples. Justice took place in a formal setting with rules and structures foreign to Native Americans. For many years, this was the most commonly operated court system on reservations. Today, only 25% of tribes with a justice system have CFR courts.

The most common court system operating in Indian Country today is known as a tribal court. First established in the early 1930s with the passage of the Indian Reorganization Act, it was at this time that tribes were encouraged to enact their own laws and establish their own court system to reflect those laws. Under this structure, the courts are controlled by the tribe and tailored to the needs of tribal members. Although some tribes initially could not afford to establish their own court (and thus kept the CFR model), most tribes today (approximately 56%) have established a tribal court. Some of these tribal courts are a hybrid judicial system that incorporates elements of both the indigenous forum and CFR courts. For example, the court may include the dispute resolution elements of the indigenous forum and the due process rights first practiced in the CFR courts.

Similar to the U.S. court system, specialized courts have gained increasing recognition in Indian Country. Healing to wellness courts (also called tribal drug courts or wellness courts) is one example of specialized court that is considered to be of great benefit to tribes. This type of specialized court arose from the drug court movement of the mid-1980s. These courts are considered an important component of the tribal justice system because they address the deleterious consequences of alcohol and drug use in Indian Country. The focus is on rehabilitating the offender through a multidisciplinary approach; the judge, prosecutor, defense counsel, law enforcement and correctional personnel, education experts, and community leaders work together to aide the offender in the recovery and rehabilitation process. Given the high rate of alcohol-related crimes and arrests on reservations, these courts hold great promise for reducing the crime and victimization rates.

Native American Courts: A Contextual Description

In total, more than 200 courts are in operation in Indian Country. They are staffed with approximately 200 judges, 153 prosecutors, and 20 peacemakers. Nearly half of all tribes rely on state courts for judicial services due to a lack of resources and a shortage of personnel. The majority of Native American courts handle criminal misdemeanor cases, such as traffic cases. However, a fair number of courts also hear wildlife offenses, juvenile cases, family law cases, requests for domestic violence protective orders, and civil matters (for example, probate cases). Most felony cases are resolved in the federal or state court. In terms of punishments, the majority of tribes impose some type of intermediate sanction the majority of the time. The most popular sanctions include probation, monetary fines without incarceration, alcohol and/or drug rehabilitation, counseling or therapy, community service, and restitution.

Although there are some similarities between American and Native American courts, there are three important distinctions that make courts in Indian Country unique. First, the jurisdictional scope of American Indian courts is much narrower than American courts. In contrast to state courts with general jurisdiction over all crimes that occur within that state, tribal courts only have jurisdiction over criminal offenses when (a) both the offender and victim are Native American, (b) the crime occurs on the reservation, and (c) the punishment does not result in longer than a year imprisonment or exceed $5,000 in fines.

Second, tribes are not bound by the U.S. Constitution because they are sovereign nations. The Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968 ensures basic rights for individuals processed in the Native American court system. Compared to the U.S. Constitution, this act provides similar protection in some areas but less protection in others. For example, defendants have the right to be read the charges, to confront witnesses, not to be confined, and not to be prosecuted twice for the same offense. However, the act does provide less protection in other areas. It only guarantees the right to a jury of six peers, and there is no requirement for the court to appoint and pay counsel fees for those who can not afford an attorney.

Perhaps the most fundamental difference between the U.S. and American Indian court systems is the difference in the philosophy of justice. The U.S. legal system is an adversarial and conflict-oriented approach that emphasizes punitive measures to vindicate society for the crime committed. In contrast, the Native American legal system is primarily based on restorative justice, a holistic approach that builds trust relationships between all involved parties to promote healing. Rehabilitation is valued over punitive measures, and traditional sanctions are utilized (as opposed to state-prescribed penalties) to restore the relationship among the offender, the victim, and the community at large.

Critical Issues

Although tribes have made great advancements in their court systems, there are several critical issues that face Native American courts today, including the lack of jurisdiction over non-Indians; sentencing limitations; overlapping jurisdiction; the relationship between tribes and state courts; lack of resources, and the underdevelopment of court infrastructure. Although they are discussed following as distinct issues, there is considerable overlap. Furthermore, these critical issues are experienced at varying degrees because of the economic, cultural, and social variation among tribes.

The first critical issue faced by Native American courts is that they do not have jurisdiction over criminal offenses committed by non-Native Americans. This is true regardless of whether the crime occurred on the reservation or whether the offender lives in Indian Country. Unfortunately, more than half of all crime in Native communities involves a non-Indian offender. Consequently, tribal courts are limited in their ability to effectively address crime in their community and must rely on either the state or the federal court system to administer law.

Another critical issue is the limit on the maximum punishment allowable in Native American courts. Native American courts can not impose punishments that exceed 1 year of incarceration or $5,000 in monetary fines. Since Native courts are unable to impose sentences commensurate to the severity of the act, they are limited in their coercive power to deter crime. This limitation extends to those offenders who need treatment as well. Offenders who need substance abuse treatment for a period of a year or more (e.g., methamphetamine users) are unable to get it from Native courts. The courts are hampered further because detention and correctional facilities on reservations are scarce, they lack sentencing alternatives, and many Indian Nations lack probation and aftercare programs.

Public Law 83-280 (PL-280) is a federal law that transfers criminal jurisdiction to the state government and severely reduces tribal authority over less serious offenses. PL-280 has drastically altered the justice system for more than 70% of all Native Americans living in Indian Country, yet there is very little systematic research exploring the impact on tribal justice systems. Initial research suggests that the passage of PL-280 has resulted in a complex jurisdictional maze by which Native Americans can be subject to tribal, state, and federal criminal jurisdiction. The incomplete understanding of PL-280 has resulted in jurisdictional disputes and increased tribe dependence on the state government for social order. This dependence on external authorities (state or federal) often results in long delays between apprehension and prosecution, if the offender is prosecuted at all.

The historical relationship between tribes and other levels of government has been tenuous. The resistance to communicate, collaborate, and cooperate with each other is evidenced by the unwillingness of courts to honor each other's court rulings. Many times state courts do not enforce protective orders or child support orders from American Native courts. The lack of coordination among agencies during the phases of case processing hinders the ability to track offenders as well as the ability to notify victims of important case proceedings or case status. For these reasons, it is important that all levels of government find more fruitful mechanisms to compromise with each other.

Lack of resources is perhaps one of the most glaring obstacles facing contemporary Native American courts. Recall that the majority of American Indians living in Indian Country live in poverty. The poor economic state of tribes makes it difficult for tribal government to provide adequate resources to assist in crime control. These resources are not limited to funds but extend to personnel to staff the court (judges, attorneys, and other court actors), facilities to support the justice system (courthouses, jails, detention centers), and technology to help the system run efficiently (computers, telephones).

The limited infrastructure of court systems and other social justice agencies also limits the ability of tribes to operate effective justice systems. For example, some tribes lack codes, facilities to house offenders, and training for officers and other court officials. As a result, the Native American courts have a difficult time addressing the concerns raised by the community, victims, and offenders. For example, few tribal communities have shelters or other transitional housing for domestic violence victims and child abuse victims. There is also a great need for long-term advocacy and service programs for victims and offenders. For victims, the trauma is often long lived, and such programs can help the victim heal. Long-term services also help address offender accountability and rehabilitation. Many tribes also have few detention facilities to house offenders prior to trial, thus they are free to live in the community within close proximity of their victims. Native American courts also lack programs and resources to provide offenders, such as GED programs, substance abuse treatments, and vocational training. Finally, lack of clear definitions makes it harder to collect statistics to determine where the courts should be focusing their efforts, resources, and time.

Conclusion

Although tribes have always had formal methods for addressing crime and deviance, the development of the American Native court systems of today are relatively recent advancements. A detailed discussion of the differences between tribes regarding the history, jurisdiction, and structure of their court is beyond the scope of this entry. At the most basic level, some tribes mirror the U.S. court structure and philosophy, many others have retained their indigenous justice forms, and there are those tribes that have created a mix of the two. In recent years, there has also been an increased interest in using specialized courts (e.g., wellness courts) to address specific types of crime.

Despite the advancements made, Native American courts are still faced with a myriad of critical issues that must be resolved, including lack of resources, sentencing limitations, and jurisdictional scope. These issues hinder the courts' ability to effectively address crime in their communities. Yet with increasing frequency, American Native courts are asked to resolve domestic, commercial, and civil cases occurring in Indian Country. Consequently, tribal courts are in a position to reintegrate tribal members with their culture by utilizing traditional forms of punishment. While the future of Native American courts is unknown, it is likely that they will continue to perform the vital function of safety for the communities that they serve.

Jaclyn Smith

See also Indian Civil Rights Act; National American Indian Court Judges Association; National Tribal Justice Resource Center; Native Americans; Tribal Police

Further Readings

- Brimley, S., Garrow, C., Jorgensen, M., & Wakeling, S. (2005). Strengthening and rebuilding tribal justice systems: Learning from history and looking towards the future. Retrieved from <http://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/nij/grants/210893.pdf>
- Gross, E. K. (2001). Evaluation/assessment of Navajo peacemaking. Retrieved from <http://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/nij/grants/187675.pdf>
- Jones, B. J. (2000). Role of Indian tribal courts in the justice system. Retrieved from <http://www.icctc.org/Tribal%20Courts-final.pdf>
- Perry, S. (2004). American Indians and crime. Retrieved from <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/pub/pdf/aic02.pdf>
- Perry, S. (2005). Census of tribal justice agencies in Indian Country, 2002. Retrieved from <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/pub/pdf/ctjaic02.pdf>
- Tribal Law & Policy Institute. (1999). Healing to wellness courts: A preliminary overview of tribal drug courts. Retrieved from <http://www.tribal-institute.org/download/heal.pdf>
- Tribal Law & Policy Institute. (2003). Tribal healing to wellness courts: The key components. Retrieved from <http://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/bja/188154.pdf>

NATIVE AMERICAN MASSACRES

According to President Abraham Lincoln, the difference between a “massacre” and a “battle” is that there is wanton killing of noncombatants in a massacre. The concept of an Indian massacre might conjure the notion of the slaughter of White settlers or Indian ambushes of military personnel of the U.S. government. Indeed, there were atrocities and massacres committed by Indians against White settlers. Some of these massacres were used to justify atrocities and violence against the Indians—it was claimed that such actions showed that the Indians were “savages” who deserved harsh treatment. However, it was the Indians who suffered the greatest atrocities and massacres at the hands of White people and the U.S. government.

With the coming of the Europeans to the Americas, vast Indian civilizations fell as the land and way of life of Indians was stripped through treaties, the breach of treaties, and ultimately the forced placement on reservations. Violent and brutal force against those Indians who resisted, bolstered by racist and ethnocentric ideology, produced massacres with impunity at various sites, including Blue River (1854), Bear River (1863), Sand Creek (1864), 104 Washita River (1868), Sappa Creek (1875), Camp Robinson (1878), Wounded Knee (1890), and others. This entry describes the massacres at Jamestown and Sand Creek, as well as Indian resistance at the Battle at Little Bighorn. Last, it reviews the evolution of the Ghost Dance and the efforts by the U.S. government to extinguish it, culminating in the massacre of Indians at Wounded Knee in South Dakota in 1890. These massacres were a part of government actions that took the lives of Indian men, women, and children and destroyed Indian culture in what many Indians view as genocide.

The Arrival of the Europeans

When Europeans came to the Americas, they found whole nations of indigenous people with centralized governments and subsistent economies. Estimates of the indigenous population prior to the arrival of the Europeans, in what later became the United States, range from 5 million to 94 million people. By 1880, after the impact of White-borne and previously unknown diseases, slavery, starvation, and ethnic cleansing on a genocidal level, that population had been reduced to 300,000, and their landholdings were reduced to inconsequential reservations.

When the White settlers came to the Americas, they wanted the land and riches it provided, but they faced the problem of what to do about the present owners of this land. Ideologically, forced removal and violence could be supported by assertions of racial or cultural superiority, economic determinism, or God’s manifest will. However, in the beginning the strength of the tribes deterred attempts at military conquest and subjugation. Early White settlers secured footholds with negotiation and purchase. Treaties of peace and concession became the means to obtain land until White settlements were large and strong enough to impose unilateral decision making and to remove indigenous people from their lands as forged treaties were abandoned.

Jamestown Massacre

However, from the very beginning, Indians sometimes fought back. Jamestown was the first successful English settlement in North America. Conflict over land ensued between the settlers and the Powhatans. The colonists were growing tobacco and needed new soil in a few years because the soil nutrients had been depleted. They sought to gain more land for agriculture, while the Powhatans wanted the land for hunting and to remain separated from the colonists. When the Powhatans became aggressive and made small-scale attacks, settlement troops responded by raiding Indian villages. This marked the beginning of the First Anglo-Powhatan War in 1609. The Powhatans were militarily superior and nearly succeeded in forcing the English off the land after they laid siege to the fort in Jamestown. In 1614, the war was ended by a peace agreement, along with the marriage of a chief’s daughter to a colonist. This peace lasted until the settlers again began breaching agreements on land. On March 22, 1622, in what is called the Jamestown Massacre, the Powhatans initiated a sneak attack on English settlements surrounding Jamestown and murdered significant numbers of the settlers. The Powhatans did not press the fight after the one-day attack, but it led to 10 years of open warfare between the colonists and the Indians. The English called the attack a “massacre” and used it to justify a war against the “savages.” While the Powhatan were initially militarily superior, their number dwindled from warfare and disease, and they were eventually decimated.

Assimilation and the Sand Creek Massacre

As the United States expanded into other Indian lands, more lives from both sides were lost, and more treaties were forged and breeched. With the loss of their land, the Indians lost their ability to subsist off the land using traditional means. As the United States grew dominant, the government adopted a policy whereby Indians were to give up their lands and be placed upon reservations to be dependent upon the federal government and to engage in ranching and farming. Many tribes resisted and were forced onto reservations after government troops hunted them down and destroyed their means of subsistence, including the extermination of the buffalo.

Indians who refused to move to the reservations or engaged in resistance were seen as treacherous savages whose brutal extermination was justified. Support for “search and destroy” missions by White military forces was granted. In 1864, a group of Southern Cheyennes reported to Fort Dyon, in Colorado, to declare their peaceful intentions. After doing so, they set up camp at Sand Creek. They were assured of peace and sent out their able-bodied men to hunt. On November 24, 1864, Colonel John Chivington and troops of Colorado Territory militia attacked the camp and killed 150 defenseless men, women, and children. They mutilated the bodies of dead Indians and created a display of dismembered body parts, and the annihilation was celebrated in Denver.

Resistance and the Little Bighorn Battle

Like the Powhatans before them, some tribes fought back. At the Battle of Little Bighorn, on June 25, 1876, Sioux and Cheyenne warriors killed more than half of the army troopers in the Seventh Cavalry Regiment, including General George Armstrong Custer. Custer was no stranger to massacres. On November 27, 1868, at the so-called Battle of Washita River, Custer led the Seventh Cavalry in a dawn attack on Southern Cheyenne Indians, killing peaceful Indians and burning their village. The attacked village was within the boundaries of the Cheyenne reservation, and a White flag flew over the chief’s tipi. Custer reported significant numbers of warriors killed, but the Cheyenne claimed that the majority of the dead were women and children.

Believing that the sacred land of the Sioux contained gold deposits, the U.S. government intended to remove the Sioux and place them on reservations. By 1876, thousands of Indians had slipped away from the reservations. Custer was part of a large military operation that was to force the Indians back to their reservations, and his unit headed into the Dakota Territory. On June 25, 1876, Custer, driven by a need for notoriety and perhaps sheer arrogance, assaulted a very large camp of several Sioux tribes. The Cheyenne, Brule, Oglala, Minneconjou, Sans Arc, and Hunkpapa, under the leadership of Chiefs Crazy Horse, Gall, and Sitting Bull, rose up and slew Custer and his troops. Custer’s force was badly outnumbered, and there appear to have been problems with weapons malfunctioning. This resistance and counterattack by Indian forces, and the annihilation of Custer and his men, were seen by the White citizens of the United States as a “massacre,” and it marked one of the last major victories by the American Indians. However, the victory resulted in a backlash against any tribe that resisted placement on reservations, resulting in atrocities and the massacre of Indians.

Wounded Knee and Extermination

The situation for Indians was dire by the late 1880s. Many had been placed on reservations, the rations provided by the government were insufficient, and attempts to indoctrinate the Indians into agricultural subsistence had not always been successful. This lack of success was partially due to the nature of the land or environment allotted Indians, and the inability of the Indians to adapt to this new way of life may also have been a factor. Some White observers may have considered the lack of success to be a result of “laziness” and therefore cut back on staples supplied to support Indians on reservations; starvation ensued.

The Ghost Dance

Some Indians turned to mysticism as the answer to suffering. In 1888, Wovoka, a Paiute holy man and prophet from Nevada, experienced visions showing what needed to happen for the White men to be eradicated and for Indians to resume their former ways of life. He said that the earth would be replenished and inherited by Indians, and that the dead would rise to live eternally without suffering. Wovoka preached that Indians needed to do a host of things to bring this about, including dancing the Ghost Dance. White people called it the Ghost Dance religion because of the doctrine involving resurrection. In addition, some Indians believed that special Ghost Dance shirts could not be penetrated by bullets fired by an attacker or White soldiers.

The Ghost Dance spread to the Lakota Sioux reservations by 1890. The dancing and the excited states of dancers frightened White observers, who saw it as the beginning of an uprising. Authorities of the U.S. government banned the Ghost Dance and called up military troops to have it choked off when the ban did not stop the dance.

An order was issued for the arrest of Chief Sitting Bull, an adherent of the Ghost Dance religion. On December 15, 1890, he was killed during the course of the arrest. Chief Big Foot was also sought out for arrest. When Big Foot heard of Sitting Bull's death, he moved his band toward the Pine Ridge Reservation. While en route they were intercepted by military forces of the United States.

The Massacre at Wounded Knee

On December 29, 1890, Chief Big Foot and his band of followers were camped next to Wounded Knee creek. There were around 350 Indians, the majority of whom were women and children. Big Foot was gravely ill with pneumonia. They were surrounded by approximately 500 troops of the reconstituted Seventh Cavalry, and lightweight Hotchkiss artillery weapons capable of rapid firing were pointed in their directions. The U.S. troops were attempting to take away firearms held by the Indians. The Indians did not wish to relinquish their weapons, partially because this was the manner in which they hunted for scarce food. During the stress of forcing the Indians to relinquish their weapons, shooting began between the troops and the Indians. The Hotchkiss artillery weapons were used to shoot down fleeing Indians, including women and children. Firing continued after the Indians were easily overwhelmed and took place even miles away from the site of the initial engagement, as women and children sought to get away. The majority of the band was cut down by the cavalry, including significant numbers of women and children. The cavalry suffered approximately 25 deaths in the engagement, some of whom may have been killed by "friendly fire."

A blizzard began after the fighting and the bodies of the dead were not collected until after it subsided, 3 days later. Some of the Indian dead may have died while hiding from hypothermia. The bodies of the dead were searched out in the snow and returned for burial in a mass grave. The command officer was later charged with murder, but was exonerated. Several members of the military were awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor for "bravery." In 1973, Indian activists including Russell Means and Dennis Banks, and other members of the American Indian Movement (AIM), would stage another confrontation there. Activists occupied the Wounded Knee Massacre site, now called "Wounded Knee II." The occupation resulted in a 71-day stand-off with federal troops.

J. Michael Olivero

See also Domestic Violence, Native Americans; National American Indian Court Judges Association; Native American Courts; Native Americans; Native Americans and Substance Abuse; Tribal Police; United States v. Antelope

Further Readings

- Andrist, R. (2001). The long death: The last days of the Plains Indians. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.
- Bradford, W. (2002). "With a very great blame on our hearts": Reparations, reconciliation, and an American Indian plea for peace with justice. American Indian Law Review, 27, 1.
- Bradford, W. (2005). Beyond reparations: An American Indian theory of justice. Ohio State Law Journal, 66, 1.
- Brown, D. (2001). Bury my heart at Wounded Knee: An Indian history of the American West. New York: Owl Books.
- Churchill, W. (1998). A little matter of genocide: Holocaust and denial in the Americas, 1492 to the present. San Francisco: City Lights.
- Coleman, N. (2000). Voices of Wounded Knee. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.

- Deloria, V. (1988). Custer died for your sins: An Indian manifesto. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.
- Dolan, E. (2003). The American Indian wars. Brookfield, CT: Vikings Millbrook Press.
- Keenan, J. (1999). Encyclopedia of American Indian wars 1492–1890. New York: Norton.
- Marshall, J. (2007). The day the world ended at Little Bighorn: A Lakota history. New York: Viking.
- Mooney, J. (1991). The Ghost-Dance religion and Wounded Knee. Mineola, NY: James Dover.
- Phillips, C. (2005, December). A day to remember: December 29, 1890. American History, 40(5), 16.
- Price, D. (2005). Love and hate in Jamestown: John Smith, Pocahontas, and the start of a new nation. London: Vintage.
- Viola, H. (1999). Little Bighorn remembered: The untold Indian story of Custer's last stand. New York: Crown.
- Wiley, T. (2004). Black Kettle: The Cheyenne chief who sought peace but found war. Hoboken, NJ: Hatch Wiley.

NATIVE AMERICANS

Native Americans have populated the Americas for 20,000 to 30,000 years. It is believed that they came to America from Asia, across a land bridge over the Bering Sound during the last Ice Age. Relics of Native American cultures date to 15,000 years ago. The Native American or Indians, so named by Christopher Columbus, lived a relatively stable life until the arrival of Europeans in the Americas. Tribes occasionally warred among themselves but intermarried at an extremely high rate and coexisted fairly well. The arrival of Europeans resulted in disease, conflict, and near-annihilation of many Native Americans and their cultures. Some early Native American groups and their cultures are now extinct.

Today, approximately 560 Native American tribes are recognized as “sovereign” by the U.S. government. Further, according to the 2000 U.S. Census Bureau, nearly 3 million Native Americans were residing in the United States at the time of the census. While Native Americans account for less than 1% of the American population, they represent 4% of the population under correctional supervision. They are twice as likely to become victims of violent crimes as non-Native Americans, and persons of another race/ethnic group commit at least 70% of the violence committed against Native Americans. Although these numbers are alarming, very little research is available concerning Native Americans and crime. This entry examines Native American history, along with a review of the criminal justice-related challenges faced by this group.

Native American History

When Europeans first arrived on the North American continent, they were met by Native Americans. It is estimated that there were 10 million Native Americans inhabiting America at that time. The arrival of the first Europeans was seen as a good thing by the tribes. Even though the Europeans dressed and looked different, they brought advanced technologies to America. For example, steel tools such as knives and agricultural implements, cookware made of copper and brass, glass items such as mirrors and beads, and weapons that included guns and metal swords were nonexistent in the Americas before the arrival of Europeans. In fact, a number of animals—for example horses, cattle, and sheep—and numerous agricultural products were unknown to Native Americans.

The Native Americans soon began to realize that the Europeans also brought some things that were not compatible with Native American ideals and attitudes. Europeans realized the wealth that could be gained from the vast natural resources that were available in the Americas. Native Americans were content to live in the forest and take what they needed to survive, whereas Europeans saw the forest as lumber and not trees. They viewed the forest animals as products to be harvested and sold for a profit. Soon Europeans saw the Native American as a nuisance and something that should be removed or obliterated.

Europeans also introduced European diseases to Native Americans. For example, Europeans brought with them diseases such as cholera, measles, chicken pox, and smallpox. Native Americans had no natural immunities for these diseases. Measles and chicken pox were common in Europe and seldom deadly; however, they proved devastating to the Native American population. It was common for Native American tribes, infected with these diseases, to suffer mortality rates between 80% and 90%.

Prior to and during the American Revolution, frontier warfare was common among many of the Native tribes and settlers. The warfare was particularly brutal, and there were many atrocities committed by both sides. After the American Revolution, the newly formed United States wanted to expand westward and attempted to purchase Native American lands using treaties. However, this approach was not satisfactory to many states and settlers. Beginning in the early 19th century, a new policy was put in place, forced relocation westward. The Indian Removal Act of 1830 allowed the president to exchange lands west of the Mississippi River to Native Americans for their lands east of the river. However, as the United States expanded farther and farther west, there were no western lands left for resettlement of Native Americans.

Eventually the U.S. government adopted a policy of assimilation. This process involved moving Native Americans onto reservations and teaching them how to farm. It was generally believed that isolating Native Americans on reservations would encourage them to replace their traditional life and culture with European culture, thus, facilitating their assimilation. By the time the federal government began to resettle Indian tribes inhabiting the eastern United States, many of the tribes were already extinct, either from European diseases or government-sanctioned genocide.

Life on the reservations was not fulfilling to the majority of the Native Americans, and conflicts were common. In many instances, conflicts escalated into wars between Native Americans and European settlers. One such conflict culminated in the 1890 massacre of Native Americans by the U.S. Army at Wounded Knee, South Dakota. Military defeats, resettlement on reservations, and the near-extinction of the buffalo, which the plains Indians used for food, clothing, and shelter, resulted in the end of Native American culture as it had been practiced.

Current Native American Status

In 1924, Congress enacted the Indian Citizenship Act, which provided U.S. citizenship to Native Americans. The act was implemented because of the desire of the government for Native Americans to become part of mainstream America and in recognition of the large number of Native Americans who served in the military forces during World War I.

Federally recognized tribes were granted sovereignty and allowed to form their own governments, were granted the ability to enforce both criminal and civil law, to tax, establish membership criteria, and to license and regulate activities on their lands. Like states, the tribes were excluded from waging war, engaging in foreign relations, and coining money. Although the federally recognized tribes are recognized as sovereign entities, the Native American tribes continue to be regulated by the Bureau of Indian Affairs and are not accorded recognition as sovereign nations.

The federal government has never practiced a consistent policy when handling issues relating to Native American peoples. It has been more characteristic of the government to change its policies to the benefit of the government. The effects of this haphazard shifting of policies have been devastating to Native Americans. It has often contributed to the destruction of Native American cultures that had previously held their societies together. Native American people have seen their social, cultural, spiritual, political, and economic beliefs destroyed. Native Americans have been negatively affected in many ways, for example, Native American military defeats, forced confinement on reservations, outlawing of Native languages and cultural practices, cultural pressure, and poverty. All of these contribute to contemporary Native Americans experiencing disproportionate health problems and involvement with criminal justice systems.

Crime and Native Americans

For centuries, Native Americans have experienced government-sanctioned genocide, forced relocation from their homelands, and compulsory assimilation into the dominate culture. When governments needed or wanted the lands inhabited by Native Americans and the Native Americans would not voluntarily move to other locations, the Native Americans were forcefully relocated by the military. When Native Americans did cede land through treaties, the terms were mostly unfulfilled by the government.

Government assimilation policies included outlawing of Native religions and Native languages and forced removal of Indian children from their families so that the children could attend boarding schools to Americanize them. These factors have contributed to a plethora of social problems characteristic of many Native Americans. For example, they have disproportionate rates of poverty, unemployment, and alcohol and substance abuse. These have contributed to a shorter life expectancy than other Americans and a high rate of victimization and incarceration. These factors and others contribute to Native Americans being disproportionately represented in the criminal justice system, both as victims and perpetrators.

Substance Abuse and Native Americans

Like the early European infectious diseases, alcohol has had a significant negative impact on the Native American population. Prior to the arrival of Europeans, most Native Americans did not use alcohol or drugs, even during their religious ceremonies. European traders and explorers introduced alcohol to the Native population. A common practice was for Europeans to encourage the consumption of alcoholic drinks by Native Americans in an effort to dull their senses so the traders could make better trades. Many of the trappers and explorers, if not alcoholics, used alcohol to experience the euphoria of being drunk; therefore, Native Americans learned to use alcohol in much the same way. Many became addicted to alcohol. Reportedly, their reliance on alcohol became much stronger as they saw their lands and culture disappear. As they found themselves caught between two worlds, the disappearing Native American culture and advancing European culture, many used alcohol to ease their feelings of disenfranchisement.

Researchers identified three factors that are predictors of alcohol and substance abuse among Native Americans: ethnic dislocation, identification with non-Native American Indian values, and a lack of familial sanctions. Alcohol usage has accelerated the decline of their culture and culminated in health issues such as hypertension, cirrhosis, heart disease, diabetes, and other long-term medical problems.

Nationally, Native Americans' alcohol dependence rates are 3 times higher than the national average. The Veterans Administration reports that 45% of Native American veterans were alcohol dependent compared to less than 12% of non-Native American veterans. The high alcohol dependency rate among Native Americans has led to elevated crime rates and to devastating health issues. For non-Native Americans, 4.7% of all deaths are alcohol related; these include homicides, suicide, accidents, and deaths attributed to alcoholism. For Native Americans, this percentage ranges from 17% to 19%. In recent years, Native American victims are dying younger; for example, Native Americans ages 15 to 24 are dying from alcohol-related deaths 11.4 times faster than are other Americans in the same age group.

To address the high correlation between alcohol usage and victimization among Native Americans, many Native American criminal justice agencies have made a concentrated effort to enforce all alcohol and substance abuse laws. In jurisdictions where this approach has been initiated, it has been determined that extensive enforcement of these laws is correlated to declines in other types of crime normally associated with alcohol usage. One agency reported a 35% decrease in arrests for other crimes during the period of mandatory arrests of people characterized as exhibiting public intoxication. Even though this finding is encouraging, currently comprehensive data are lacking, as too few Native American criminal justice agencies have implemented this approach to excessive alcohol use.

From 1995 to 2006, Native American arrests for drug offenses rose by 20%, but they accounted for only six tenths of 1% of the total drug abuse arrests in the United States. What is of concern about these numbers is that the drug-abuse arrests are on the rise in Native American communities. In recent years, drug-abuse arrests among Native Americans under the age of 18 have increased by nearly 40%.

Native American Victimization

Native Americans experience violent victimization at a rate that is twice as high as the national average. Bureau of Justice Statistics data reveal that victimization occurs across all Alaska Native and American Indian age groups, gender, housing locations, and income groups. While it is generally accepted that these rates are high, the precise rate of criminal victimization of Native Americans is not known. This is due to inadequacies in victimization sampling and nonreporting by some tribal police agencies. Some tribes have taken a progressive approach to understanding criminal victimization of Native Americans. For example, with the aid of Tribal Victim-Assistance organizations, they are gathering victimization information using the National Crime Victimization Survey. These agencies are attempting to capture unreported crimes in an effort to provide accurate crime and victimization rates. Tribal authorities and the local Native American communities realize that accurate crime and victimization data are required in order to develop meaningful policies to address crime, victimization, and related social problems.

Research indicates that Native American perpetrators of violence are more likely to have consumed alcohol before the attack. Not all Native Americans use alcohol or use it to excess. Many drink because there is not much else to do; they are chronically unemployed, underemployed, or have no prospects. Alcohol has the same effect on Native Americans as it has on non-Native Americans. It contributes to a sense of euphoria and aids in removing inhibitions, thus leading to a loss of self-control. When this occurs, a joke or a simple disagreement can escalate to a quarrel or an assault. Uniform Crime Report data for 2006 indicate that 33% of all Native American arrests were for drunkenness or protective custody (domestic violence) crimes.

Native American women experience crime victimization at approximately twice the national average. In fact, they experience the highest rate of violent victimization as any group in the United States. It is estimated that three fourths of Native American women have been victims of some type of sexual assault. The likelihood of assault and other victimization contributes to Native American women more likely becoming victims of homicide. Research indicates that homicide is the third leading cause of death for Native American women, with 75% of these victims being killed by an acquaintance or a family member.

Native Americans are also more likely to be victimized by members of other racial or ethnic groups when compared to non-Native Americans. Native Americans report that persons of another race perpetrate 70% of the violence they experience. For example, 60% of Native American victims of assault identify their assailants as White.

Native American Incarceration

In the United States, 4% of Native Americans, ages 18 or older, are under the jurisdiction of criminal justice systems. This per-capita rate is 2.4 times the rate for Whites and about half the rate of Black Americans. The Uniform Crime Reports for 2006 indicate that Native Americans are overrepresented in arrest rates for crimes of murder and nonnegligent manslaughter, forcible rape, burglary, larceny-theft, motor vehicle theft, arson, aggravated assault, other assaults, vandalism, prostitution and commercialized vice, sex offenses (except forcible rape and prostitution), offenses against the family and children, liquor law violations, drunkenness, suspicion, and runaways.

Currently more than one third of the Native American population of the United States resides in three states: California, Oklahoma, and Arizona. The states with the highest percentage of their population being Native American are Alaska, New Mexico, and Oklahoma. To fully understand the disproportionate rate of Native American incarceration, we have to look at individual states. A good example would be the state of Montana; currently Native Americans make up 6% of the state's population, yet 16% of its male prison inmates are Native American and 40% of the state's female prisoners are Native American. These numbers only account for Native Americans incarcerated in state facilities and do not take into account local jail populations or the number Native Americans on probation and parole.

Correctional facilities have traditionally been less than sympathetic or hospitable to Native American inmates. Most did not allow Native American prisoners to express their culture. For example, authorities in correctional facilities did not allow Native dress, hairstyle, spirituality, and language. In 1972, a group of Native American prisoners in Nebraska filed a class action suit in a U.S. district court, Indian Inmates of the Nebraska Penitentiary v. Charles L. Wolff, Jr. This suit later became Indian Inmates of the Nebraska Penitentiary v. Joseph Vitek. It resulted in a consent decree that stipulated that the Native American inmates be allowed to wear traditional Native hairstyles and to have access to Indian medicine men and spiritual leaders. As a result, correctional officials became cognizant of religious and cultural needs of Native American inmates and made an effort to accommodate these needs of Native American inmates. The decree subsequently provided that accredited courses in Indian studies be made available to Native American inmates.

American Indian Movement

The American Indian Movement (AIM), begun in 1968, encouraged Native Peoples to renew their spirituality and to unite to confront the governments of the American continents regarding treaties and policies the governments used to disenfranchise Native Peoples. The 1960s were a time of social unrest in the United States, and the formation of AIM was a product of the Native American urban relocation movement of the 1950s. AIM, headquartered in Minneapolis, Minnesota, has chapters throughout the United States. One of AIM's mandates is to persuade the U.S. government to fulfill the treaties the governments signed with Native American peoples. This mandate has led to numerous court cases and many violent confrontations.

In November 1972, AIM brought Native Nation representatives to Washington, D.C., and presented the president with The Preamble and Complete Text of the Trail of Broken Treaties 20-Point Indian Manifesto. This manifesto articulated 20 points that the United States government needed to address to (a) ensure the protection of Native rights, (b) provide a future that is not dictated by the U.S. government, and (c) reaffirm that Indian people are sovereign people. To date the manifesto has not been addressed by the U.S. government. The AIM movement has been compared to the civil rights movement of the 1960s; however, instead of asking for individual rights, AIM's goal is Native Nation sovereignty.

John A. McConnell and Elizabeth H. McConnell

See also Alienation; Bureau of Indian Affairs; Domestic Violence; Gambling; Indian Civil Rights Act; Indian Self-Determination Act; Interracial Crime; Media Portrayals of Native Americans; National American Indian Court Judges Association; National Native American Law Enforcement Association; National Tribal Justice Resource Center; Native Americans: Culture, Identity, and the Criminal Justice System; Native Americans and Substance Abuse, Peltier, Leonard; Tribal Police; Victim Services

Further Readings

- Alvarez, A., & Bachman, R. D. (2005). American Indians and sentencing disparity: An Arizona test. In S. L. Gabbidon & H. T. Greene (Eds.), Race, crime, and justice: A reader (pp. 319–332). New York: Routledge.
- Bachman, R. (2005). An analysis of American Indian homicide: A test of social disorganization and economic deprivation at the reservation county level. In S. L. Gabbidon & H. T. Greene (Eds.), Race, crime, and justice: A reader (pp. 277–286). New York: Routledge.
- BigFoot, D. S. (2000). History of victimization in Native communities. Oklahoma City, OK: Center on Child Abuse and Neglect.
- Bureau of Justice Statistics. (2003). American Indians and Crime: A BJS Statistical Profile, 1992–2002 (NCJ-203097). Retrieved from <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/abstract/aic02.htm>
- French, L. A. (2003, March). Wounded Knee II and the Indian prison reform movement. The Prison Journal, 83(1), 26–37.
- Herring, R. D. (1994, July/August). Substance use among Native American Indian youth: A selected review of causality. Journal of Counseling & Development, 72(6), 578–584.
- National Tribal Justice Resource Center. (2004). Tribal justice programs: Victims of crime. Retrieved from <http://www.tribaljusticeprograms.org/resources/resources.asp?39>
- Szlemko, W. J., Thurman, P. J., & Wood, J. W. (2006, October). Native Americans and alcohol: Past, present, and future (Clinical report). The Journal of General Psychology, 133(4). Retrieved from <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/pub/pdf/aic02.pdf>

NATIVE AMERICANS: CULTURE, IDENTITY, AND THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM

Historically, the fate of American Indians has been in the hands of others: politicians, the military, and varying justice jurisdictions at the federal, state, and local levels. Simultaneously, Native Peoples' success was dependent upon functioning in a European-based sociocultural environment that was diametrically opposed to their own social and cultural foundations. The entry reviews the experience of the Native Peoples and the adaptations they have had to make in order to survive. It also examines their perception of and relationship to the U.S. criminal justice system.

First Contact and Conflict

Unlike ethnic minorities that have migrated to the United States, American Indians were indigenous First Peoples. At the time Europeans "discovered" the New World, Native Peoples had developed a remarkable diversity of languages, politics, religious expression, and other cultural patterns. First contact with Europeans brought with it diseases to which tribes had no resistance and no immunity. Populations declined further due to conflicts with the settlers over trade practices and land. Native Peoples greeted the newcomers with hospitality; they were not prepared for the subsequent disputes, in which the policies of European sovereigns promoted the detachment of First Peoples from their land, water, and culture.

As differences between the two races and cultures emerged, Eurocentric procedures set the foundation for Indian policy in the United States. The European legal discourse sought to limit the self-government and land rights of "pagans" and "heathens" with force based on religious justifications.

Paternalism and Dependence

Many of the problems Native Peoples face are a result of contact with Europeans who used the "discovery doctrine" to justify their dispossession and domination of Native Peoples. This doctrine was the guiding practice of dominant culture with Native Peoples and took the form of institutionalized superiority of Europeans over Native Peoples.

Before 1492, Native Peoples controlled their own lives and cultures through inherent powers of government. Their concepts of law, crime, criminal behavior, social controls, restitution, and community were restorative justice oriented. As early as the 1500s, Native Peoples were portrayed as problems to be dealt with in the process of gaining control over the resources of the land. Native Peoples were regarded as simple savages in desperate need of guidance and containment. The use of religion by missionaries in conjunction with the U.S. government coerced First Peoples to establish agrarian Christian communities that were forerunners to the reservations.

The 1600s provided numerous examples of the disenfranchisement of Native Peoples by Europeans through the use of treaties, laws, and military force. They justified their actions with false claims of intellectual and cultural superiority over Native Peoples and a right to the land by divine rights and discovery. Surviving Native Nations forced the Europeans to deal with them on a government-to-government basis. As Native Nations lost their ability to resist through the effects of starvation, disease, slavery, and warfare, they fell under the laws and customs of the invaders.

The 1700s brought the establishment of a U.S. Congress as the authority whose goal was to control Native Peoples rather than preserve peace and protect them. The U.S. Constitution stands as evidence of the relationship between Native Peoples and the federal government. The U.S. Constitution provides that "Congress shall have Power . . . to regulate Commerce . . . with the Indian Tribes." During this period, the United States ultimately negotiated, signed, and ratified nearly 390 treaties with American Indian tribes. The political interest of the United States, at that time, was to keep the tribes happy with the new American government and to keep First Nation tribes from fighting for the English in the American Revolutionary War during 1775 to 1781. Additionally, reservations were established to contain Native Peoples who were at the time considered to be independent foreign nations with no control over their future. The General Crimes Act, passed by Congress, established the first legislative expression of federal jurisdiction over Native Peoples who commit federal offenses against non-Native Peoples in Indian Country. This statute excludes federal jurisdiction over all crimes involving only Native Peoples in Indian Country.

Allotment and Assimilation

By the 1800s, the U.S. government moved to absorb Native Nations via a twofold process: allotment and assimilation. The Indian Allotment Act (Dawes Act) established Native Peoples' land ownership on the worst land in the country. Assimilation was forced by mainstreaming the Native children via boarding schools and by criminalizing Native Peoples' spirituality. The intended destruction of First Nations and cultures through coercive assimilation and allotment devastated Native Peoples' sovereignty, governmental functions, civil and human rights, and ways of living. With its assertion that Native Peoples were wards of the federal government, the U.S. Supreme Court demonstrated that it would not interfere with the operations of Congress, leaving Native Peoples essentially no legal recourse in their relations with the U.S. government. The destruction of Indian rights and heritage through political, economic, cultural, and religious change characterized the loss of sovereignty the First Nations experienced. Since First Peoples were not the same as they had been at the time of the first contact, newcomers assumed that First Peoples could now be fully assimilated and changed to meet the needs of dominant culture.

Native Peoples quietly returned to many of the old cultural and religious practices in a search to regain their own identity and heritage. Congress responded to the continuance of Native culture through both legal and military aggression. In the process, U.S. policy bestowed federal agents with powers enabling them to control and regulate virtually every aspect of Native life and governmental decision-making processes.

In 1883, the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) launched a direct assault on traditional justice systems of First Nations by establishing Courts of Indian Offenses on most reservations. These courts sought to force First Peoples to abandon their "heathen" practices and terminate their old lifestyles completely. Native Peoples were prosecuted for engaging in customary religious practices (pipe ceremonies, purification, crying for a vision, sun dance, keeping of the soul, puberty rites, throwing of the ball, the healing ceremony, and consulting a medicine person).

The 1834 Trade and Intercourse Act provided a basic framework of relationships for dealing with Indians, but it was not until June 1874 that the first codified laws pertaining to Indian jurisdiction were passed. More than 10 years later, the Major Crimes Act of 1885 was passed; it included a short paragraph dealing with seven major crimes, as a rider to the general appropriation act of that year. The Major Crimes Act divested Native tribes of their jurisdiction over seven felony offenses, but over time it was amended to include 14 felonies. The Assimilative Crimes Act of 1898 permitted the federal government to apply (assimilate) minor state criminal laws to deferral enclaves, such as Indian reservations, where no definitive statement on certain activities had existed before. This legislation was one of many intrusions into tribal affairs by which dominant culture can assume jurisdiction over what it has labeled as criminal offenses.

Indian Rights and Movement Toward Self-Determination

The 1900s brought with them the termination of tribal sovereignty, forcing many Native Peoples into urban areas across many states. Additional power was given to state courts over tribal decisions, including but not limited to land disputes, gaming law, environmental law, intergovernmental agreements, juvenile justice, criminal law, alcohol and substance abuse, child support, and domestic violence.

The Indian Citizenship Act of 1924 granted the right to vote to Native Peoples. However, many states refused to allow Native Peoples to vote, claiming that they were under guardianship and were not competent to vote. It was argued that they were not residents of the states in which they lived if they lived on reservations and that they were therefore ineligible to vote. The Wheeler Howard Indian Reorganization Bill of 1934 would have created separate Indian Courts and self-governing communities that were empowered to make their own law and make contracts with the federal and state governments. Congress and the BIA heard many debates over the restoration of traditional culture versus assimilation.

The atmosphere of the mid-1940s was one of conformity. Congress decided to resolve the Indian problem through a policy called termination. This was by far the most invasive penetration of law into Native Peoples' lives; it allowed five states to unilaterally assume criminal and some civil jurisdictions over Native lands. Termination ended the federal government's trust and guardian-ward relationship with over 109 Native Nations by abolishing the functions of tribal government and leaving Native Peoples under the jurisdiction of the states. Relocation incentives were offered to Native Peoples, and cities were soon inundated with dislocated Native Peoples who were ill equipped to function in the dominant society. Sovereignty was difficult to maintain when states exercised authority over the tribal land base, the population was heavily transient, and policing on Native land was not a priority. Reservation residents could not rely on police to address criminal activities.

By the 1960s, termination policies were eliminated, and many of the land holdings and services provided by the federal government were restored. A movement toward self-determination and activism replaced the devastating termination policies that had been instituted by the U.S. federal government. During this period the BIA came to be responsible for land, leases, forests, and water resources, internal infrastructure, and economic development. Native governments could apply for federal grants that would enable them to provide jobs and to establish courts, police agencies, and stronger governments. The BIA was also responsible for educational services to Indian students; thus, the agency responsible for Native People's formal initial educational experiences was the same one that had historically implemented governmental abuses of Native Peoples.

In this new period of Indian support, the Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968 was enacted to impose certain restrictions and protections of the U.S. Constitution on tribal governments. The most revealing provisions of the Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968 were the guarantees of the right to free speech, press, and assembly, the right of a criminal defendant to a speedy trial, to be made aware of the charges, and to confront an adverse witness. This legislation guaranteed the right to an attorney in a criminal case and protection against self-incrimination, cruel and unusual punishment, and excessive bail. It also provided that tribal governments could not impose sentences of more than 1 year and/or fines in excess of $5,000 for any offense. Furthermore, it provided for protection from double jeopardy or ex post facto laws, the right to a trial by jury for offenses punishable by imprisonment, equal protection under the law, and due process. Finally the Indian Civil Rights Act stipulated that a writ of habeas corpus would be available in tribal court.

The Indian Civil Rights Act guaranteed many of the protections of individual rights to First Peoples that were included in the U.S. Constitution and applied to all others. It failed to impose the establishment clause, the guarantee of a republican form of government, separation of church and state, the right to a jury trial in civil cases, or the right of a court-appointed attorney for those who could not afford one in criminal cases. Congress contended that it excluded these provisions because it recognized the unique political and cultural status of tribes. First Peoples have difficulty reconciling the words of the Congress with its limited efforts to protect the culture of First Peoples.

Through the 1970s, laws existed to prohibit sacred ceremonies of First Peoples. Sacred ceremonies support First People's culture and spiritual beliefs, which are quite complex and vary by tribe. Conflicts with the dominant culture seem to stem from issues related to access to sacred places that are now designated as national parks or federal land, restriction of sacred items (such as eagle feathers, bones, sacred artifacts, or, in some cases, peyote), and interference with ceremonies by officials or curious onlookers. The American Indian Religious Freedom Act of 1978 was passed to protect traditional religious practices of many First Peoples. However, enforcement of the act remains problematic in that it has functioned more as a policy statement. More recently, additional protections have been provided through passage of the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (1993) and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Acts (2000), which provide additional protections for First Peoples.

Another provocative issue in the relationship between First Peoples and the U.S. system of justice is the issue of blood quantum. Federal law requires that an individual be registered with a federally recognized tribe to qualify as a Native American. Presently more than 550 federally recognized tribes have tribal governments recognized by the United States, and there are approximately 300 federal Indian reservations in the United States. Each tribe has its own blood quantum (BQ) requirement, ranging from no BQ required but proof of ancestry to a BQ minimum of five eighths. Once registered with a federally recognized tribe, the individual is issued a tribal card and is listed on a federal registry maintained by the secretary of the interior. Blood quantum requirements will become more problematic as blood lines are diluted by interracial mixing to an extent that the U.S. government is no longer required to count individuals as Native American Indians and thus holds no responsibility for them. The dilution effect is that the American Indian will cease to exist by governmental guidelines, releasing the U.S. government and its agents from any type of economic, social, educational, recreational, familial, or political support. Additionally, an individual cannot be a card-carrying member of two federally recognized tribes. Critics of the blood quantum policy argue that it ignores the fact that being Native carries with it great responsibility—it is not simply a racial and ethnic category that is in dispute. Even before the Dawes Act, labeling oneself an Indian provided a basis for both discriminatory practices and exclusionary practices in American society.

As a nation, the United States has been very slow to acknowledge the impact of history on First Peoples and the need for healing the multigenerational trauma that has been inflicted in the name of justice. Native ways held no value in the dominant culture, and the U.S. system of justice was used repeatedly as a weapon against First Peoples as a measure of social control. Despite attempts to allow self-determination that have strengthened First Peoples' pride and ability to preserve their culture, the loss of Native culture in America is ongoing.

From a criminological standpoint, it is easy to see how the newcomers identified the First Peoples as targets of social control because they resisted, disrupted, or otherwise threatened the structured inequality. Social control is the exercising of social power through a series of institutional constructs. Indian culture is perceived as resistance; resistance is disruptive; therefore, Indian resistance is deemed criminal behavior that requires social control. Criminological research suggests that little change has occurred in First Peoples' communities to heal what is broken. The trust that has been broken between First Peoples and the justice system that provides social control over them remains in severe disrepair. Recognition and support of sovereign nations and interdependent tribal governments that genuinely support First Nation autonomy would be a large first step in reparation. First Peoples have proven repeatedly that they are capable of handling their own criminal justice issues in their own way, and advocates of First Peoples' autonomy have urged that they be allowed to design, implement, and test their own criminal justice systems rather than be forced to abide by an external reviewers set of standards. Some tribes adopted their own terminology in naming their new court system. Early names were Wellness Court, Healing Court, Treatment Court, Alternative Court, and Tribal Wellness Court in an attempt to incorporate two important concepts, healing and wellness. Other tribal courts drew from their Native languages. Native societies have long utilized restorative justice as the means of restoring harmony to the community rather than emphasizing punishment.

The disruption of Native societies continues to affect Native Nations as evidenced by the social problems Native Peoples confront: racism, unemployment, alcohol-related problems, and crime. In early 1999, the Bureau of Justice Statistics released its first compilation and analysis of data on the effects of violent crime among Native Peoples. Since the 1999 report, the Bureau of Justice Statistics has continued to reveal a disturbing picture of Native Peoples' involvement in crime as both victims and offenders. Native Peoples are victims of violent crime at a per capita rate of more than twice that of the U.S. general population. Fifty-two percent of violent crimes against Native Peoples were perpetrated on victims between the ages of 12 to 24 years of age. Native women were victims of violence 50% more than were Black males. Ninety percent of Native victims of sexual assault and rape and 70% of Native victims of violence describe their attackers as non-Native. BIA and tribal police records indicate most violent crimes on the reservation are Native-on-Native offenses.

Racial stereotyping by law enforcement and judges contributes to Native Peoples being arrested more often, sentenced to longer prison sentences, and receiving lower rates of probation than several other racial groups. In part this can be attributed to a cultural divide in which judges interpret the reluctance of Native Peoples to speak up as a sign of a lack of remorse. In reality, many Native Peoples do not understand the justice system and their rights; consequently they plead guilty without benefit of counsel, even when they are innocent.

For more than 200 years, the U.S. government has attempted to destroy Native societies and their justice systems. Ironically, Native methods of resolving conflict are now of interest to members of the dominant culture who want to update their courts by integrating the concept of restorative justice into their own legal system.

Sharon RedHawk Love

See also Bureau of Indian Affairs; Indian Civil Rights Act; National American Indian Court Judges Association; Native American Courts

Further Readings

- Barker, M. L. (1998). Policing in Indian Country. New York: Harrow & Heston.
- Nielson, M. O., & Silverman, R. A. (1996). Native Americans, crime and justice. Boulder, CO: Westview.
- Ross, J. I., & Gould, L. (Eds.). (2006). Native Americans and the criminal justice system. Boulder, CO: Paradigm.

NATIVE AMERICANS AND SUBSTANCE ABUSE

While Native American, Alaskan Indian, and Native Hawaiian societies have traditionally used intoxicating substances in religious rituals, the introduction of alcoholic beverages by European explorers and settlers in the New World can be considered the beginning of substance abuse by the Indigenous people of the United States. This entry reviews patterns and rates of substance use and abuse among Native Americans and examines causes of substance abuse in this population. It then explores methods of preventing and treating substance abuse among Native Americans and discusses the importance of community involvement.

Epidemiology

Substance abuse rates for Native Americans tend to be higher for many substances than rates for non-Native People. Inhalant use among Native adolescents (ages 12–17) is more than 3 times that of non-Natives (32% compared to 9%). Twenty percent of Native American adolescents report having used illicit drugs in the past month, 27% report binge drinking, and 26% report smoking. These rates are the highest of any ethnic group. Methamphetamine production and use is becoming a major problem on reservations, as evidenced by a tripling in the number of seizures in Arizona between 1997 and 2000. Illicit drug use also appears to be increasing among Native Americans nationwide. Treatment facility admittance rates for marijuana abuse increased 86% for males and 57% for females between 1994 and 1999. Cocaine treatment admittance rates increased 25% and 12% for males and females respectively. Similar patterns exist for opiates (100% and 38%) and stimulants (100% and 60%). Females are more likely than males to be in treatment for cocaine, opiates, and stimulants; males for marijuana and alcohol.

Alcohol, however, remains the most seriously abused substance by Native Americans, both on and off the reservation. Five of the top 10 causes of deaths among Native Americans are alcohol related (e.g., homicides, suicides, cirrhosis, accidents). Alcoholism rates among Native People are 3 times that of non-Natives. Nearly one half of deaths of Native Americans in Arizona can be attributed to alcohol, and another 8.5% attributed to drugs. Fetal alcohol spectrum disorders (FASD) are another unfortunate and unintended consequence of high rates of alcoholism in the Native communities of the United States. The FASD rates run as high as 2.5 per 1,000 live births in some communities and as high as 5.6 in Alaska, compared with the .2 to 1.0 rates in the general population.

Clearly, high rates of substance use and abuse have many negative consequences for Native Americans and Alaskan/Hawaiian natives. Many explanations have been suggested, including biological factors that make these indigenous populations more susceptible to alcohol addiction. Most theoretical and treatment models, however, point to societal and cultural factors that contribute to high rates of substance abuse and dependence in Native communities.

Causes of Substance Abuse by Native Americans

Native American adolescents are most likely to engage in substance use and abuse. Not surprisingly, most studies evaluating risk factors associated with substance use and abuse in Native American populations focus on adolescent risk factors. There are three general categories of risk factors: individual level (including peer), family, and school. Native American adolescents are more likely to believe there is moderate to no risk associated with smoking one pack of cigarettes per day than members of other racial/ethnic groups. They are also less likely to believe that their peers disapprove of tobacco or alcohol use than other ethnic groups. Native American youth are also less likely than their non-Native American peers to believe that their parents disapprove of drug use. Poor performance in school has been associated with substance use and abuse among all racial/ethnic groups; Native Americans are more likely than others to report doing poorly in school (averaging a D or lower). There is also a higher perceived rate of peer substance use among the adolescent Native American population than among other groups.

Other explanations of Native American substance use and abuse address more closely the unique experiences of the Native American population as an internally colonized minority, sometimes living in small nations (reservations) within a nation. Among some Native American groups, mind-altering substances have spiritual value through the creation of altered states of consciousness. It has also been suggested that Native American substance use and abuse is a coping response to the stresses of acculturation.

Prevention and Treatment

Most prevention and treatment programs designed for Native American communities are developed around four concepts: the idea that (1) substance abuse affects not just the abuser and his or her immediate family but also the entire community; (2) substance abuse, and particularly alcoholism, in Native American communities is a multigenerational problem; (3) it is a visible indicator of a multitude of larger, societal problems; and (4) it coexists with depression, cultural shame, self-hate, and stress-associated behavior issues.

While some of these concepts are found across racial and ethnic groups, others (e.g., focus on community, cultural shame) reflect the history and structure of Native American society. Many treatment specialists recommend incorporating traditional Native American culture and values into both prevention and treatment programs, emphasizing that in order to successfully prevent and treat substance abuse Native American communities should become directly involved in the process. Gale (1991) suggests the following steps as an antecedent to the creation of prevention programming:

- Have the community define and describe the effect substance abuse has on its members.
- Get community members talking about the problem.
- Ask the community what is currently being done about substance abuse, and to identify what else needs to be done.
- Have a community committee develop, plan, and assign tasks. Encourage innovation in planning activities.
- Get as many community members involved as possible, recruiting volunteers from the community, and use existing community resources.
- When gaps exist, train local community members to fill positions whenever possible.
- If absolutely necessary, use outside resources but ensure that the locus for control and responsibility for resources is kept at the local level.

This emphasis on tradition and community can be seen in programs in use in Native communities throughout the United States. The three most common programs aimed at preventing Native youth substance use and abuse include (1) programs that emphasize physical activity in tribal environments, which provide excitement and self-esteem; (2) tribal-sponsored mainstream youth organizations such as Boy and Girl Scouts and 4-H, which facilitate self-actualization and self-esteem; and (3) peer support groups incorporating Native American culture and tradition, which are designed to promote a healthy lifestyle. A direct prevention program focusing on Native culture and tradition is the bicultural competence skills approach, which seeks to teach Native youth to blend the skills and traditions from both their traditional cultures and mainstream culture, and use these to help them adapt to living in a bicultural environment and avoiding stress and other factors that may contribute to substance use and abuse. This process also involves enhancing communication skills to assist with self-determination, coping skills to help resist pressure to acculturate or assimilate, and discrimination skills to help learn appropriate behavior patterns in both their native cultures and outside.

While approximately .9% of the population of the United States, Native Americans accounted for nearly 2.5% of admissions to public substance abuse treatment facilities in 1999. This can be interpreted two ways. A more negative view would be that this group is about 3 times more likely to suffer from substance abuse than we would expect; however, this disparity may also indicate a greater willingness in this population to seek treatment than other racial or ethnic groups. Either way, public rehab centers tend to have greater numbers of Native Americans than would be expected. This emphasizes a need for cultural sensitivity and exposure to Native American mores and customs among substance abuse treatment professionals.

As of 2004, 283 of 13,454 (2.1%) public treatment programs served the American Indian and Alaskan Native populations. Most (nearly 61%) were operated by tribal governments, followed by Indian Health Services (12%), or other public or private institutions (27%). These programs targeted Native populations and offered treatment, emphasizing Native language and culture. Thirty-two states offer this type of facility, primarily in the West and Midwest.

Treatment facilities and programs devoted to Native populations are, in many ways, different from other programs. For example, more than 90% of Native-focused treatment programs offer aftercare, compared to 78% of non-ethnic specific ones. They are also more likely to offer family counseling (85% vs. 76%). Surprisingly, Native-focused treatment programs are less likely to serve criminal justice clients than are other facilities.

The Future

There are a number of factors that will continue to make it difficult to address high rates of substance abuse both on reservations and off. In addition to structural factors, such as poverty and unemployment, and individual factors such as stress, cultural shame, and acculturation pressures, the legal status of Native American nations may inhibit all best intentions to reduce substance abuse problems. Tribal justice systems lack the resources to actively seek out, prosecute, and incarcerate offenders. Tribal justice systems also lack jurisdiction over persons who do not belong to their tribe, enabling outsiders to operate with impunity on reservation lands. Finally, as sovereign nations, tribes may not have adopted the federal Controlled Substances Act. Consequently, in some cases, the manufacture of designer drugs and methamphetamine may not even be illegal on tribal lands.

The Department of Justice, along with other federal agencies, offers aid to Native American communities for drug prevention and treatment. Holistic tribal justice techniques designed to control crime and violence related to substance abuse receive support from the Indian Alcohol and Substance Abuse Program. Since 2001, more than $27 million in grants were given to 65 tribes, including technical training and assistance. Tribal courts receive support from the Drug Court Discretionary Grant Program for the creation and implementation of treatment-oriented drug courts.

Despite this bleak picture, there is some evidence that alcohol abuse is decreasing in Native American and Alaskan Indian communities. A 2000 study suggests that the percentage of middle-aged (45 and older) Native men who report chronic drinking behavior was only 3.5%, compared to 7.6% of non-Hispanic Whites. Chronic drinking rates for younger Native American and White men were similar. Alcohol abuse rates for Native Americans did not increase between 1991 and 2001; all other ethnic groups except Asians saw increases in abuse. Admittance to substance abuse facilities for alcohol abuse by Native Americans decreased 11% between 1994 and 1995. However, admittance for illicit drug abuse increased 78%.

While considerable progress has been made in addressing alcohol abuse in Native communities, it still accounts for over half of those admitted for treatment. Alcohol abuse has been a recognized problem in Native communities and among Native Americans and Alaskan Natives for nearly 200 years. Despite successful prevention and treatment programs, the underlying causes of substance abuse have not been eradicated in Native communities. Illicit drugs appear to have replaced alcohol as the drug of choice for the indigenous people of the United States.

Pamela Preston

See also Drug Use; Native Americans and Substance Abuse

Further Readings

- American Indian and Alaska Native Substance Abuse Treatment Services. (2004). The DASIS report: American Indian and Alaska Native Substance Abuse Treatment Services. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration.
- Beauvais, F., Wayman, J. C., Jumper-Thurman, P., Plested, B., & Helm, H. (2002). Inhalant abuse among American Indian, Mexican American, and non-Latino White adolescents. American Journal of Drug and Alcohol Abuse, 28(1), 171–187.
- Gale, N. (1991). Fighting alcohol and substance abuse among American Indian and Alaskan Native Youth. Charleston, WV: ERIC Clearinghouse on Rural Education and Small Schools. (ERIC Digest No. ED335207)
- Gerhard, S. (2005). Prevention and treatment of substance abuse in Native American communities. Phoenix, AZ: IHS Area Health Summit.
- Join Together. (2000, December 12). Alcohol abuse among Native Americans reassessed. Retrieved from <http://www.jointogether.org/news/research/summaries/2000/alcohol-abuse-among-native.html>
- National Survey on Drug Use and Health. (2004, September). Risk and protective factors for substance use among American Indian or Alaska Native youths. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration.
- Schinke, S. P., Gilchrist, L. D., Botvin, G. J., Orlandi, M. A., Trimble, J. E., & Locklear, V. S. (1988). Preventing substance abuse among American-Indian adolescents: A bicultural competence skills approach. Journal of Counseling Psychology, 35(1), 87–90.
- U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. (2007). Fetal alcohol spectrum disorders among Native Americans. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Center for Substance Abuse Prevention.

NO-FLY LISTS

Racial profiling, typified in the phrase “driving while Black,” remains an important feature in the study of discrimination in criminal justice. Moreover, the tendency for such tactics to extend to other sectors of social control is being witnessed in the form of “no-fly lists,” whereby certain individuals have been barred from boarding commercial aircrafts. Since the hijackings on September 11, 2001, government officials along with airlines have compiled names of persons who may not be permitted access to air travel due to concerns over national security. A closer look at the controversy, however, reveals that those persons have been subject to a distinctive type of profiling that some critics call “flying while Muslim.” This entry points to some well-publicized incidents involving no-fly lists so as to illuminate the significance of profiling based on ethnicity, religion, and in some cases political affiliation.

In 2004, while traveling to the United States from London, the plane carrying Yusuf Islam, popularly known in the music world as Cat Stevens, was rerouted to Bangor, Maine, where the aircraft remained for four and a half hours. During the layover, Islam was removed from the plane because agents who detained and interrogated the famous singer said that he appeared on a no-fly list. The government claimed that it had evidence that Islam had donated money to groups suspected of terrorism and chastised United Airlines for allowing him to board the aircraft. Reaction to the obvious blunder was swift and sharp. Britain's Foreign Minister, Jack Straw, formally criticized the Bush administration for deporting Islam, who has frequently toured the United States. Earlier that year Islam had visited the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community initiatives to speak about philanthropy. In addition to being renowned for his music, Islam is admired for his commitment to charity, such as his fundraising for children victimized in Bosnia.

While the targeting of Islam appears to embody ethnic and religious profiling, the reliability of no-fly lists sheds light on deeper problems that shake the faith of some who question whether the government is actually competent to safeguard its citizens. The degree of mismanagement is at times astonishing (National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States, 2004). Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democratic stalwart and one of the most recognizable faces in Washington, D.C., also had his name appearing on no-fly lists. Between March 1 and April 6, 2004, agents tried to block the senator from boarding airplanes on five occasions because his name resembles an alias used by a suspected terrorist. In one of those incidents, Kennedy was told that he could not purchase a ticket to fly to Boston, and officials refused to give him an explanation. Eventually, airline supervisors intervened and allowed Kennedy to travel, but it took several weeks for Homeland Security to correct the problem.

Due in part to the celebrity status of Islam and Senator Kennedy, greater public awareness is being raised about the no-fly lists and their breach of civil liberties involving persons clearly not involved in terrorism. In 2004, a federal judge in San Francisco accused the government of relying on "frivolous claims" to avoid publicly disclosing who is banned from boarding airplanes on the basis of terrorism risks. The case stems from a lawsuit brought by the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) and others in pursuit of information explaining how hundreds of people have had their names entered on the no-fly list since September 11, 2001. In his ruling, Judge Charles R. Breyer determined that the government lawyers had not met their burden of proving that the material was exempt from the Freedom of Information Act. The ACLU estimates that more than 500 people in San Francisco alone have been kept from boarding aircraft because of what the government cites as terrorist concerns. However, many of those barred from flying believe that they were targeted for their strong liberal politics and criticisms of the Bush administration. In one incident in 2002, two dozen members of a group called Peace Action Wisconsin, including a Catholic nun and high school students who were traveling to a teach-in on the war in Iraq, were detained in Milwaukee, missing their flight.

Thomas Burke of the ACLU called the ruling a significant victory in stripping away the secrecy shrouding the no-fly lists. It may also help people who have been mistakenly registered to get their names removed from the lists. The development of the no-fly lists is a tightly controlled secret, but some government officials have acknowledged that the standards for banning certain passengers due to terrorism concerns were "necessarily subjective" with "no hard and fast rules" (Lichtblau, 2004). The original no-fly list grew from 16 names on September 11, 2001, to more than a few thousand by 2004, including about 10,000 names that appear on a secondary list that require that those passengers get closer scrutiny. The lists developed amid signs of internal confusion and dissension over how the list would be implemented. Civil liberties organizations complain that the use of no-fly lists violates airline passengers' constitutional protection against unreasonable searches and seizures and denies their right to due process necessary to correct any mistakes. Moreover, the government has been criticized for its failure to put two of the 9/11 hijackers on the watch list even after their ties to terrorism became known. The controversy over no-fly lists sheds critical light on the rationale for profiling whether based on race, ethnicity, or religion; indeed, that particular form of social control not only is rooted in prejudice but also is self-defeating since it fails to contribute to community safety or national security.

Michael Welch

See also Arab Americans; Profiling, Racial: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives; State v. Soto; Whren v. United States

Further Readings

- Lichtblau, E. (2003, June 19). Bush issues racial profiling ban but exempts security inquiries: Use of race and ethnicity in “narrow” instances. The New York Times, pp. A1, A16.
- Lichtblau, E. (2004, April 23). Government’s “no fly” list is challenged in a lawsuit. The New York Times, p. A17.
- Lichtblau, E. (2004, June 16). Judge scolds U.S. officials over barring jet travelers. The New York Times, p. A19.
- Lichtblau, E. (2004, October 9). Papers show confusion as watch list grew quickly. The New York Times, p. A9.
- National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States. (2004). The 9/11 commission report. New York: Norton.
- Swarns, R. L. (2004, August 20). Senator? Terrorist? A watch list stops Kennedy at airport. The New York Times, pp. A1, A18.
- Wald, M. L. (2004, September 23). Accusations on detention of ex-singer. The New York Times, p. A18.
- Welch, M. (2006). Scapgoats of September 11th: Hate crimes and state crimes in the war on terror. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press.
- Welch, M. (2007). Immigration lockdown before and after 9/11: Ethnic constructions and their consequences. In M. Bosworth & J. Flavin (Eds.), Race, gender and punishment: From colonialism to the war on terror (pp. 149–163). New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press.

NORRIS V. ALABAMA

America’s forefathers wanted to ensure that the principle “all men were created equal” would be a cornerstone of American society. But it took numerous amendments to the Constitution, a civil war, extensive legislation, and significant Supreme Court decisions to ensure that equality applied to all men and women. Racism in America has taken many forms. A keystone to equality is ensuring that the justice system is blind to all factors that could jeopardize liberty and freedom. Every defendant has the right to due process, a fair trial, and to be judged by a jury of his or her peers. When racism restricts the eligibility of any group of citizens from being included in a potential jury pool (venire) or serving on a jury, there cannot be a fair trial and justice will not prevail. When the court decided Norris v. State of Alabama in 1935, it played a key role in ensuring that all citizens’ constitutional rights were protected in America.

The Facts

In March 1931, nine Black youths were arrested and eight were convicted of the charge of rape in Jackson County, Alabama. The Alabama Supreme Court reversed the conviction of one youth, but affirmed the convictions of seven others, including Clarence Norris (Powell v. Alabama, 1932). The U.S. Supreme Court heard the case and reversed the convictions for violations of due process of law “upon the grounds that the trial court had failed in the light of the circumstances disclosed, and of the inability of the defendants at the time to obtain counsel, to make an effective appointment of counsel to aid them in preparing and presenting their defense.”

After remand to the trial court, the judge granted a motion for a change of venue and the trial was moved to Morgan County, Alabama. The defendant then made a motion to quash the indictment on the ground that Blacks had been excluded from juries in Jackson County. There was also a motion to quash the trial venire in Morgan County because of the exclusion of Blacks from juries. (The venire is the group of citizens called for possible jury duty from whom the jury will be selected.) The exclusion of Blacks from the jury process is a violation of the defendant’s constitutional guarantee of due process. The trial judge denied the two motions. Norris was convicted and sentenced to death. Upon appeal to the Alabama Supreme Court, the conviction was affirmed. The U.S. Supreme Court agreed to hear the case based on a federal question and granted a writ of certiorari.

The U.S. Supreme Court, in Carter v. Texas (1900), had confirmed that it is a violation of the Constitution when race is the basis for exclusion of a group of citizens from grand jury service. The court stated that whenever by any action of a state, whether through its Legislature, through its courts, or through its executive or administrative officers, all persons of the African race are excluded, solely because of their race or color, from serving as grand jurors in the criminal prosecution of a person of the African race, the equal protection of the laws is denied to him, contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. (Carter, at 488)

In numerous other cases, the court has also held unconstitutional similar exclusions from service on petit juries. Even when a statute relating to service on juries may be fair on its face, the court will look to the administration of the statute and the impact on jury composition, such as when Blacks are not included among jurors.

The population of Jackson County in 1930 was 36,881; 2,688 were Black, and 666 out of 8,801 males over 21 were Black. Those males who were to be included on the jury roll and in the jury box were to include individuals who were “generally reputed to be honest and intelligent men, and are esteemed in the community for their integrity, good character and sound judgment . . .” (Norris, at 591). While the testimony indicated that there were Blacks who were qualified to serve on the juries, neither the clerk of the jury commission nor the clerk of the court was able to identify a Black male who served on a grand jury in the county (in more than 20 years). A review of the jury roll for the year 1930–1931 revealed the names of only six Black men. These individuals were not called for service and it appeared that the names were out of order on the list and may have been added (superimposed) to the list after the fact. The court determined that based on the information available to it, the motion to quash the indictment should have been granted by the trial court.

In 1930, 8,311 of the 46,176 residents of Morgan County were Black. None of the interviewed witnesses was able to recall that any of the more than 2,500 individuals who were called for jury service were Black, even though there were a large number who were qualified for jury service. The trial court inappropriately limited the extensive evidence that the defense wanted to present in support of its motion, to prove their qualifications as jurors. The court found that there had been a “long-continued exclusion of negroes from jury service” (Norris, at 599). On that basis, the court determined that the motion to quash movement of the trial to Morgan County where due process would be denied was unconstitutional.

Conclusion

The Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the lower court and returned the case for action consistent with its ruling. The court clearly established that the exclusion of a particular group from jury service based on the color of their skin was a denial of due process and a violation of the Constitution. This decision did not direct that the jury must “include” Blacks or any other group, but it did direct that the “exclusion” of a group based on race was a denial of due process.

The court noted that in Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303 (1880), the Supreme Court declared that a statute denying Blacks from service on juries denied the defendant his due process rights guaranteed in the Constitution. In Norris v. Alabama there was a racially neutral statute that was implemented improperly; but the racist result was the same. It is amazing that this kind of racism went unabated until the Supreme Court reached its decision in this case. However, other more subtle forms of racism affecting the composition of juries continued for 55 years until the court reached another significant decision.

The Supreme Court continued to ensure due process with more recent decisions. In the case of Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986), the Supreme Court denied the prosecution the opportunity to remove Blacks from juries through the exercise of peremptory challenges in criminal cases. In Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co., 500 U.S. 614 (1991), the court extended the ruling to civil cases. The court now requires both the prosecution and the defense to strike jurors on race neutral grounds. The courts continue to address issues of race and ethnicity in jury composition (e.g., in Mattern v. State, 2007).

Keith Gregory Logan

See also Batson v. Kentucky; Jury Selection; Powell v. Alabama

Further Readings

- Carter, D. T. (1979). Scottsboro: A tragedy of the American South. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.
- Carter v. Texas, 177 U.S. 4428 (1900).
- Mattern v. State, 2007 WY 24.
- Norris v. State of Alabama, 294 U.S. 587 (1935).
- Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932).

NORTHEASTERN UNIVERSITY INSTITUTE ON RACE AND JUSTICE

The Institute on Race and Justice (IRJ) brings together experts from Northeastern University's College of Criminal Justice, School of Law, Department of Sociology and Anthropology, Department of African American Studies, and School of Education to examine questions on race and justice facing communities both nationally and internationally. The institute works on projects toward the goal of conducting nationally recognized research and providing leadership on race and justice issues. This entry describes the mission and goals of the institute, its history and projects.

Mission and Goals of Institute

The mission of the institute is to utilize strategic social science research methodologies to assist government agencies, educational institutions, and community stakeholders in the development of policy changes to advance the cause of social justice. The institute was founded on the premise that academic institutions can work with communities to provide rigorous and objective information that can be used to influence policy changes that advance the cause of social justice. This research model attempts to enhance scientific inquiries with the input and experiences of community stakeholders who struggle with issues of racial injustice. The coupling of community practitioners and social scientists allows practitioners access to academic input while providing academics with more current and salient ideas about and data on issues in the field.

As part of this combination of traditional empirical questions and community-based problem solving, the institute has brought together members from the community to form an advisory board. The Community Advisory Board provides for close partnerships between community members and organizations. IRJ can then become directly aware of the community's needs, which helps guide the institute's research focus.

Development of the Institute

The institute was established through a generous start-up grant from Northeastern University in August 2001. Its accomplishments would not be possible without the support from Northeastern University's President Joseph Aoun, Provost Ahmed Abdelal, Dean Jack Greene (College of Criminal Justice), Dean Emily Spieler (School of Law), and Dean James Stellar (College of Arts and Sciences). In 2006 the institute received the Presidential Aspiration Award, from then-President Richard Freeland, for its work advancing the urban agenda of the university.

Though IRJ's research projects are all interdisciplinary in nature, they tend to focus on race and justice issues within two main arenas: criminal justice and education. As the projects are developed, the institute uses its steering committee and community advisory board as sounding boards to provide feedback and ideas to strengthen the projects. In addition, many of the projects include community and practitioner components, so community stakeholders, police departments, legislators, teachers, school administrators, and students are involved in the process of framing research questions and conducting research. In addition, the institute has developed a fellowship program to further its goal of broadening discussions and research around race and justice issues within the scholarly community at Northeastern University.

Institute on Race and Justice Projects

The institute has received more than $2 million in external grant support for a variety of research initiatives. The types of research projects IRJ has led involve a broad range of subjects; from projects addressing racial bias in policing to projects dealing with human trafficking.

In one of the first projects to utilize the new collaborative model of research, IRJ researchers worked with the attorney general of Rhode Island to develop, collect, and analyze data of traffic stops with a goal of understanding whether or not racial profiling was occurring in Rhode Island, known as the Rhode Island Traffic Stop Statistics Study. The data collection included all traffic stops conducted by each Rhode Island Police Agency between January 2001 and December 2002. The institute completed and released the final report in June 2003, which documented racial disparities in stops and searches in a number of Rhode Island communities.

Following the Rhode Island Project the institute conducted the Massachusetts Statewide Racial and Gender Profiling Study. This study reviewed approximately 1,400,000 traffic stops from 350 separate police agencies across Massachusetts and again found racial disparities in who was stopped and cited as well as in who was searched. This report served as the basis for the continuation of data collection in more than 200 Massachusetts communities. This project fully incorporated the model of collaborative research between stakeholders. On a monthly basis throughout the project, community representatives, police officials, and advocacy groups met with the research team to review and refine data analysis and interpretation.

As a result of the initial racial profiling work of the institute, the Bureau of Justice Assistance funded the development of a web-based Racial Profiling Data Collection Resource Center. This website has become one of the most comprehensive resources on the issue of racial profiling available. The website provides a central clearinghouse for police agencies, legislators, community leaders, social scientists, legal researchers, and journalists to access information about current data collection efforts, legislation and model policies, police-community initiatives, and methodological tools that can be used to collect and analyze data.

In October 2005, the Institute on Race and Justice was awarded a grant from the National Institute of Justice to assess the current state of law enforcement responses to human trafficking. Trafficking in persons has become a critical human rights and law enforcement issue in the 21st century. Building on previous research around police recognition and reprioritization of new types of crimes (e.g., domestic violence, stalking, bias-motivated crime), this project sought to understand how police identify, report and investigate trafficking incidents. The research included a survey of more than 3,000 law enforcement agencies nationally and among the findings were that many more police agencies had investigated cases of human trafficking than had previously been known and that police agencies that were better prepared to deal with potential cases of human trafficking, by having developed policies and having provided training to their officers, were more successful in identifying cases of human trafficking.

In addition, the institute is currently serving as statewide technical assistance partner for the Massachusetts Shannon Comprehensive Safety Initiative, a statewide initiative that has provided more than $20 million to Massachusetts communities to support comprehensive approaches to reduce gang violence. As the statewide technical assistance partner, IRJ provides technical assistance to individual communities and assists in acquiring information for an evaluation of the effectiveness of the effort.

IRJ researchers are also examining the importance of diversity in courtroom workgroups. IRJ Associate Director Amy Farrell and Professor Geoff Ward were awarded the National Institute of Justice's W.E.B. DuBois Fellowship in 2006 to examine the impact of federal court workgroup racial diversity on criminal case outcomes.

In addition to conducting research, IRJ has hosted a number of events and forums for civic organizations and academic institutions to enhance the dialogue on matters of social justice. For example, IRJ has collaborated with WGBH Television and the Ford Hall Forum to host film screenings such as Two Towns of Jasper, Citizen King, and Unforgiveable Blackness. The institute worked in collaboration with the National Office of the ACLU to host an intensive conference around the ACLU Report of Disproportionate Minority Confinement in Massachusetts and the Harvard Civil Rights Project to sponsor a conference examining "The School to Prison Pipeline." In March 2003, IRJ sponsored Angela Davis to deliver a keynote lecture, "Radical Frameworks for Social Justice," for the Boston-area community.

Jack McDevitt and Amy Farrell

See also Human Trafficking; Profiling, Racial: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives

Websites

Institute on Race and Justice: <http://www.irj.neu.edu>

O. J. SIMPSON CASE

In 1994, O. J. Simpson, an African American actor and former all-American football star, was accused of murdering his ex-wife, Nicole Brown, and her friend, Ronald Goldman. A jury composed of seven African American women, two White women, one Hispanic man, and one African American man acquitted Simpson of all charges on October 4, 1995. This entry examines the O. J. Simpson case from various perspectives. It focuses chiefly on media coverage of sensationalized crimes, the impact that this coverage has on the general public, the facts of the case, the role of the jury in determining guilt or innocence, and the prosecution and defense's challenge in providing evidence to prove a defendant's guilt or innocence beyond a reasonable doubt.

Sensational Crimes

The communications media play a major role in the reporting of crimes; television news, print media, and Internet sources all have made it possible for the general public to gain knowledge about certain crimes and to localize the intensity of the offense committed.

Despite the public's dependence on the media for "truth," media sources may have their own agendas when selecting what to report. This same observation is made with respect to the intensity of media coverage. Since one of the primary goals of the media is to sell the story, events are often sensationalized. Put differently, the media may not report the whole story. One such sensational case that has gained worldwide notoriety and engendered much public discourse is the O. J. Simpson case.

One of the main issues of sensationalized crimes is how they influence people's perception in terms of what the typical and most common type of crime in America looks like. Even more complicated, in the O. J. Simpson case, is the offender-victim racial composition: a Black male offender and a White female victim. In that sense, the media produces a more distorted image of crime in America. Ostensibly, the media feeds into the public's appetite for issues specific to race and criminality, especially if the victim is White and the offender is Black.

Facts of the Case

On June 12, 1994, O. J. Simpson's ex-wife, Nicole Brown, and her friend Ronald Goldman were found stabbed to death outside Brown's condominium, located in the Brentwood district of Los Angeles. Simpson and Brown's two children, Sydney and Justin, who were 8 and 5 years old, respectively, at the time of the crime, were asleep in an upstairs bedroom. Evidence collected at the crime scene led police to suspect O. J. Simpson as the murderer.

On the day of his arraignment, June 21, Simpson pleaded not guilty, and a grand jury was convened to determine whether or not to indict Simpson.

Because of the extraordinarily high level of media coverage of the case, it was believed that no potential jurors would not have been exposed to any of the intense press coverage and could not be impartial, and the grand jury was dismissed. After the dismissal of the grand jury, the case moved through the criminal justice process and was scheduled for trial.

Simpson's defense team, led by the late Johnnie Cochran and F. Lee Bailey, demonstrated that the police had mishandled the case and tainted the evidence. Among jurors there arose a reasonable doubt that O. J. Simpson was the murderer, which eventually led to Simpson's acquittal. Even in the presence of evidence proving guilt, a jury has the right to exercise what is often referred to as "jury nullification." This concept, which has been adopted from English common law, proposes that regardless of evidence against a defendant, a jury may still choose to acquit. Jurors may acquit on the basis of a belief that the defendant has suffered enough and should not be punished further by the law, or that the law is discriminatory and unjust toward people of color. In the O. J. Simpson case, the jury did not believe that the state had sufficient evidence beyond a reasonable doubt to convict Simpson. In the state of California, a double homicide is a capital crime. Therefore, had O. J. Simpson been found guilty, he would have been charged with a double murder, with no bail and possibly a death penalty verdict.

The Prosecution

Part of the argument provided by Christopher Darden, the Los Angeles County prosecutor, was that O. J. Simpson's killing of his ex-wife resulted from jealous rage. The prosecution had retrieved and played a 911 call made by Nicole Brown (in 1989) expressing her fear that O. J. Simpson could physically harm her. Simpson was also heard yelling in the background. In addition to this 911 call possibly linking O. J. Simpson to the two homicides, the prosecution also presented DNA evidence, shoeprint analysis, blood marks on the driveway of Simpson's home, a black leather glove with both murder victims' blood on it, and the testimony of expert witnesses linking O. J. Simpson to the case. During the trial, one of the attorneys for the prosecution decided to have Simpson try on the glove, which had been found on the premises of Simpson's home with the blood of both murder victims. The leather glove was too tight for Simpson to put on easily, resulting in Cochran's argument that "if it doesn't fit, you must acquit," suggesting a lack of sufficient and reliable evidence linking Simpson to the murder. The fact that the O. J. Simpson case featured a Black offender and a White victim raised racial tensions during the trial. To some extent it influenced the way Americans felt about Simpson's sentencing: while a large percentage of African Americans believed that O. J. Simpson did not commit the crime, most White Americans believed that the evidence against Simpson was solid enough to convict him of the murders.

Conclusion

The O. J. Simpson trial has come to epitomize some of the many tensions that exist within U.S. society. These tensions also emerge in the American system of justice. One such issue is how fame and socioeconomic status, in addition to the victim-offender relationship, contribute to sensationalizing some crimes while overlooking others. Another is the significance and importance of meticulous police work in securing evidence at the crime scene that may be of value to the prosecution or defense when examining the particulars of any criminal case. Finally, the jury's racial and gender composition has been seen to impact issues associated with jury selection, deliberation, nullification, and final verdict. Whether or not the jury's racial composition and gender contributes to unintended consequences remains controversial.

Reem Ali Abu-Lughod

See also Domestic Violence; Interracial Crime; Jury Nullification; Media Portrayals of African Americans

Further Readings

- Fuller, J. R. (2006). Criminal justice: Mainstream and crosscurrents (Anno. instructor's ed.). Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson Prentice Hall.
- Kennedy, R. (1997). Race, crime and the law. New York: Pantheon.

- Reiman, J. (2007). The rich get richer and the poor get prison: Ideology, class, and criminal justice (8th ed.). Boston: Allyn & Bacon
- Walker, S., Spohn, C., & DeLone, M. (2004). The color of justice: Race, ethnicity, and crime in America (3rd ed.). Belmont, CA: Wadsworth.

OLIPHANT V. SUQUAMISH INDIAN TRIBE

Oliphant v. Suquamish Indian Tribe is a 1978 U.S. Supreme Court case dealing with whether Native American tribal courts maintain criminal jurisdiction over individuals who are not Native American. The ruling has been criticized as a setback to Indian (Native American) tribal sovereignty in the United States that took power away from the tribal courts in governing matters that occur on tribal lands. The facts and opinion in the case are presented following.

The offenses in this matter occurred on the Port Madison Indian Reservation in the state of Washington. The reservation consists of approximately 7,275 acres of land, with non-Indians owning 5,231 acres of the land within the reservation. The Suquamish Indians adopted a Law and Order Code in 1973 that had the effect of extending the tribe's criminal jurisdiction to both Indians and non-Indians. David Oliphant, a non-Indian resident of the Port Madison reservation, was arrested by tribal authorities during a Suquamish annual celebration and charged under the Law and Order Code with resisting arrest and assaulting a tribal officer. Daniel Belgarde, also a non-Indian resident, was arrested by tribal authorities and charged under the Law and Order Code with damaging tribal property and recklessly endangering another person when an alleged high-speed race on the highways of the reservation ended with his collision with a tribal police vehicle.

Oliphant and Belgarde filed petitions for writ of habeas corpus to the U.S. federal courts. They argued that the Suquamish Indian Tribal Court did not have criminal jurisdiction over non-Indians. The federal courts upheld the tribal jurisdiction. Oliphant and Belgarde petitioned for review by the U.S. Supreme Court, seeking for the Court to make a decision regarding whether the tribal court had jurisdiction in their cases.

The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari to decide the issue of whether Indian tribal courts maintained criminal jurisdiction over non-Indians. On March 6, 1978, the Court issued a 6–2 split decision, holding that Indian tribal courts do not maintain criminal jurisdiction over non-Indians. The Court, in the majority opinion written by Justice William Rehnquist, noted that there was a relative lack of precedent involving tribal jurisdiction over non-Indians. He stated in the body of the Oliphant opinion that Indian reservations are part of the territory of the United States of America and hold their authority only upon the assent of the U.S. government. As such, the power of Indian courts is constrained so as not to conflict with the interests of the territorial sovereignty of the United States. Thus, the Court noted, tribal courts give up their power to try non-Indian citizens of the United States except as specifically prescribed by Congress.

Justice Rehnquist then focused his attention on the 1883 case of In Ex parte Crow Dog. He noted that in that case the U.S. Supreme Court was faced with the almost inverse issue of whether federal courts had jurisdiction to try Indians who had offended against fellow Indians on reservation land. Justice Rehnquist noted that in that case the Court held that criminal jurisdiction, under such circumstances, lay exclusively in the tribal court.

The U.S. Supreme Court acknowledged that certain tribal Indian courts have become increasingly sophisticated and resemble their state counterparts, that certain basic procedural rights have been extended to any defendant in the Indian tribal court, and that there does exist a prevalence of non-Indian crime on reservations today. However, the Court stated that these are considerations that Congress must consider in its future determinations regarding whether Indian tribes should finally be authorized to try non-Indians for offenses committed on reservations.

The Court noted that under the Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968, defendants in tribal courts are entitled to many of the due process protections accorded in federal or state criminal proceedings, but that such guarantees are not identical. The Court stated, as an example, that non-Indians are excluded from Suquamish tribal court juries. The Court's concern appears to be that an exclusion may appear to violate the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, wherein a defendant in a criminal proceeding is entitled to a jury of one's peers.

The case of Oliphant v. Suquamish Indian Tribe has received considerable criticism. Critics of the decision state that this Court opinion establishes a precedent that allows for the diminution of tribal sovereignty without legislative approval by the U.S. Congress. Andrew Fletcher notes that this decision not only has the effect of abrogating sovereign rights from the tribal courts and Indian nations but also represents a proposed shift in power between the branches of the U.S. government by allowing the courts to make determinations regarding issues that are best left to Congress. Geoffrey C. Heisey considers the decision as an affront to Indian tribes because it fails to provide a satisfactory option for controlling the conduct of non-Indians who either live on or merely visit a reservation. Heisey also posited that the decision encourages lawlessness by non-Indians on reservations. One particular critic calls for Congress to recognize Indian tribal jurisdiction over offenses committed by non-Indians on reservations. Moreover, one critic of the decision states that the Court did not consider the issue of whether tribal police retain any authority to arrest non-Indians for offenses committed in Indian Country. It is presented here, however, that even if tribal police retained the power to arrest non-Indian offenders, this case holds that tribal courts lack the jurisdiction to try and/or punish such offenders. Proponents supporting the decision prefer that non-Indians who are permanent residents of the reservation have no say in the creation, enforcement, or adjudication of tribal laws and, as such, should not be subjected to these laws.

George E. Coroian, Jr.

See also National Tribal Justice Resource Center; Native American Courts; Native Americans; Tribal Police

Further Readings

Duro v. Reina, 495 U.S. 767 (1991).

Fletcher, A. (2007, Winter). Suffocating sovereignty:

Implicit divestiture and the violation of first principles. Dartmouth Law Journal, 5(1), 31–48. Retrieved from http://rockefeller.dartmouth.edu/assets/pdf/dlj_W07_fletcher.pdf

Heisey, G. C. (1997). Oliphant and tribal criminal jurisdiction over non-Indians: Asserting Congress's plenary power to restore territorial jurisdiction. Indiana Law Journal, 73(3). Retrieved from <http://www.law.indiana.edu/ilj/oldsite/volumes/v73/no3/heisey.html>

Oliphant v. Suquamish Indian Tribe, 435 U.S. 191 (1978).

OMNIBUS CRIME CONTROL AND SAFE STREETS ACT

The Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 (OCCSSA) was a major step toward federalization of crime policy and a distinct shift toward retributive responses. The legislation was enacted following several years of racial and civil unrest in urban areas across the United States. Commonly known as the Crime Bill, it established the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (LEAA) and regulations for the use of wiretaps and handgun ownership. This entry discusses the sociopolitical climate in which the act was passed and the contents and effects of provisions therein.

Sociopolitical Climate

According to the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Uniform Crime Reports, violent crime was increasing at an accelerated rate in the 1960s.

Year	Violent Crime Rate per 100,000
1960	160.9
1962	162.3
1964	190.6
1966	220
1968	298.4

By 1965, a majority of citizens polled had named crime as the primary problem facing the country. Such fears are attributable to forces beyond crime itself. The politicization of the crime problem resulted from attention to the call for "law and order" amid rising crime rates, anti-(Vietnam) war and civil rights rallies, and ghetto riots. The only real connection between street crime and civil disorder is that both were concentrated in urban areas with disproportionately African American populations. The link was accepted into policy discourse. Both southern officials and the federal government sought law and order. Government activities in the 1960s are illustrative of the various approaches taken to this end.

President Lyndon Johnson responded by declaring in his State of the Union Address on January 8, 1964, a program designated as the War on Poverty, which he believed to be the root cause of crime. The Warren Court rendered several decisions, increasingly ruling to protect defendants' rights from government abuses, including Mallory v. United States (1957) and Miranda v. Arizona (1966). Segregationists and conservatives castigated such decisions as "handcuffing the police."

Responding to the findings of the Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, President Johnson sent S 917, the first incarnation of the OCCSSA, to Congress in 1967. One significant finding of the commission was that the various institutions of justice were operating independently, with little regard for how each institution's work affected the others. As a result, the commission replaced "Law Enforcement" as the heading for police, courts, and corrections with "the Criminal Justice System" to encourage cooperation. A finding of the commission's report not represented in the text of the bill became evident in the commentary surrounding it. Crime was not rising as significantly as people believed; new crimes and increased reporting inflated the statistics. It was the fear of crime more than the fact of it that demanded action.

The OCCSSA was passed on June 6, 1968, following lengthy debates by a Congress often divided not along party lines but in response to various political pressures. The assassinations of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and Senator Robert Kennedy occurred at pivotal moments in the voting. Facing an increasingly fearful, demanding electorate, representatives felt compelled to vote for the bill; public perception, not the presentation of adept legislation, dictated the OCCSSA's passage. This sentiment underscores the legacy of the OCCSSA.

In its final form, the OSSCCA only faintly resembled the bill President Johnson first proposed. The legislation is organized into four main parts: grants, admissibility of confessions, wiretapping, and firearms, as summarized in the following sections.

Grants: Law Enforcement Assistance Administration

Title I established the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration under the Department of Justice. Previously, criminal justice planning was not an officially recognized task. The LEAA provided funding for states to create planning agencies, improve law enforcement overall, educate officers, and distribute grants from a block grant fund to efforts at the local level.

The LEAA had been involved in studies of victimization, patterns of crime, public reaction to crime, juvenile diversion programs, and community mediation. When it dissolved in 1981, it had granted more than $8 billion; states retained some form of 70% of LEAA-sponsored programs. The National Institute of Justice was created by the LEAA and has continued to revolutionize the study of crime through analysis and dissemination of crime studies and statistics.

Confessions

Title II attempted to overturn U.S. Supreme Court decisions regarding defendants' constitutional rights under the Fourth Amendment. Despite the Supreme Court's Miranda ruling that voluntary confessions are inadmissible at trial if the defendant was not informed of his or her rights to remain silent and have an attorney present, Title II allowed for the admission of confessions under such circumstances. Officially, Title II was found unconstitutional in Dickerson v. U.S. (2000).

Wiretapping

Title III concerns wiretapping or electronic surveillance. The Communications Act of 1934 made wiretapping a crime; yet, law enforcement continued to perform it. Congress reacted to the Supreme Court decisions in Berger (1967) and Katz (1967) that evidence gathered in this manner constitutes a Fourth Amendment "search and seizure." They delineated the exceptions in which wiretapping is allowed and specified court procedures to regulate such. Wiretap evidence has since been used to fight organized crime and in the wake of the attacks of September 11, 2001, terrorist activity.

Congress authorized the use of roaming wiretaps in 1986; after the September 11 attacks, the USA Patriot Act expanded this authority. Previously, separate court orders were required for each communication carrier (cell phone, instant messaging, etc.) used by an individual under investigation. The USA Patriot Act allows a single wiretap to legally “roam” devices, tapping the person rather than the phone.

Handguns

The National Firearms Act of 1934 required that gun owners register their weapons. Title IV provided the first significant restrictions on handgun ownership, including establishing a national licensing system for manufacturers, dealers, and importers. Interstate trade was prohibited, and the minimum age for purchase rose to 21. Sales of guns to and possession of guns by categories of individuals thought to pose a threat to public safety were made illegal.

The Gun Control Act and the Firearm Owners Protection Act, both of 1968, added to that list and extended these provisions to rifles and other firearms. In 1993, the Brady Bill implemented a 5-day waiting period for firearms purchases; when this provision expired in 1998, it was replaced by the National Instant Criminal Background Check System. The 1994 Federal Assault Weapons Ban prohibited the sale of certain semiautomatic “assault weapons” to civilians; it expired in 2004. A bill was introduced in February 2007 to reinstate and expand the assault weapons ban. In March of that year, the bill was deferred to the House Subcommittee on Crime, Terrorism, and Homeland Security.

Heather R. Tubman-Carbone

See also Fear of Crime; President’s Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice

Further Readings

Harris, R. (1969). Fear of crime. New York: Praeger.
Scheingold, S. A. (1984). The politics of law and order: Street crime and public policy. New York: Longman.

100 BLACKS IN LAW ENFORCEMENT WHO CARE

100 Blacks in Law Enforcement Who Care (hereafter “100 Blacks”) is a New York City–based organization of law enforcement professionals. An outspoken advocate for issues of concern to African American law enforcement officers, 100 Blacks also actively supports the New York City African American community at large, especially relating to their interactions with the New York City Police Department (NYPD). This entry reviews the history, mission, and current activities of the organization.

History

100 Blacks was founded in 1995 by police officers Eric Adams and Noel Leader, who together with a core group of officers wanted to address internal as well as external African American relations with NYPD administration. Present membership numbers well over 100, consisting of active duty and retired personnel from a variety of agencies, even though the NYPD has never officially recognized or authorized this organization. Much of the organizational leadership is now retired from service with their respective agencies but still remain active members of 100 Blacks. A notable exception is Eric Adams, who resigned as the founding executive director of the organization after being elected to the New York State Senate (Brooklyn, 20th district).

The executive director of 100 Blacks is elected by the membership. Organizational governance follows a nonhierarchical structure with a slate of directors who oversee functional aspects of the organization, including finance, public relations, research, communications, social support, legal defense, education, community outreach, and legal affairs. The member-directors work independently and jointly to advance the mission-oriented activities and functions by planning, organizing, grant making, networking, and fundraising.

Mission

The mission of 100 Blacks has led them to confront controversial topics that have often put them at odds with city administration. One of many groups and organizations to which officers of color from New York criminal justice agencies belong, 100 Blacks is perhaps unique in its external focus on African American communities of New York, to whom it provides financial, educational, legal, and media support.

Vowing to “Never stop until the victory is won,” the publicly stated mission of 100 Blacks has seven objectives:

1. To fulfill our moral mandate to our creator, to enhance and cultivate the blessings that have been bestowed upon us
2. To serve as a model organization for individuals and other professionals in our communities so that we can again take our rightful place on the stage of history as a free, proud, and productive people
3. To offer (via non repayable grants) a minimum of $1,000 a month to a worthy cause in the African American community
4. To be the vanguard for justice on the behalf of those who traditionally have no voice in society
5. To vigorously challenge racism, sexism, and all of the debilitating ism's that retard the growth of today's global community
6. To economically empower our people by pooling our resources
7. To uplift our people through education

This mission directs 100 Blacks toward active participation in debating city policy through political and media engagement as well as providing community support through grant making, educational outreach, and legal guidance. Organizational activities, public statements, and educational materials are available on its website, which also provides discussion forums for members.

Current Activities

Befitting their mission, 100 Blacks is an outspoken advocate of civil rights and community justice issues, especially as they relate to African Americans in New York City. 100 Blacks regularly confronts City policy and procedure through the media on issues within its mission and affecting its membership. It has been vocal on racial disparities in recruiting, assignment, hiring, and promotion practices within the NYPD. Members of the organization have been leaders of public protest of high-profile NYPD shootings of African Americans, such as Amadou Diallo in 1998 and Sean Bell in 2006. The public statements of 100 Blacks have often been harsh criticisms of the policies and practices not only of the NYPD but also of New York City mayors and the New York City Council. Perhaps as a result of these criticisms, the organization and its leadership were the subject of a NYPD undercover investigation that monitored its communications and activities until the investigation was revealed in 2000.

Much of the focus of the organization remains on educational and financial outreach. Since the first year of its existence—when $10,000 was donated—100 Blacks has regularly offered financial support to worthy groups and individuals as determined by the membership, who remain committed to sustaining New York's diverse communities. At times funds have also been used to offer rewards for information leading to arrests of crime suspects.

Community education takes the form of workshops, a television show, and an informative website. As Eric Adams told The New York Times in 1999, “Reaching while black shouldn't be punishable by death. But I can't teach kids on the way it ought to be, I have to teach them on the way it is.” 100 Blacks wrote and distributed a pamphlet, now available on its website, for the controversial 1998 Million Youth March on police stop-and-frisks. Members regularly teach community workshops on recommended behavior when interacting with the police, disaster preparedness, and careers in law enforcement. Members Marquez Claxton and Noel Leader produce a weekly call-in show called Community Cop Live on local cable television.

100 Blacks issues periodic report cards on the NYPD with statistical and analytical reporting of racial bias in the NYPD. Its website lists a busy schedule of press conferences, media appearances, community workshops, meetings, protests, and court support. 100 Blacks regularly partners with other organizations such as the Guardians Association, the National Latino Officers Association, the New York Civil Liberties Union, and other groups to make statements on issues of mutual concern such as basic civil rights, due process, youth, racial profiling, racial bias, and community empowerment.

Ellen H. Belcher

See also Community Policing; Guardians, The (Police Associations); Institutional Racism

Further Readings

- Abel, R. (2006). 100 Blacks in Law Enforcement Who Care (pp. 454–458). In R. Abel (Ed.), The Black shields. Bloomington, IN: AuthorHouse.
- Boyd, H. (2004, April 1). NYPD flunks. New York Amsterdam News, pp. 1, 41.
- Flynn, K. (2000, July 15). Police Dept. defends inquiry into Black officers' group. The New York Times, p. B2.
- Gross, J. (1999, April 13). Behind a badge, confronting issues of race. The New York Times, p. B2.
- 100 Blacks in Law Enforcement Who Care. (2004). State of Blacks in the NYPD: Annual report on the commissioner. Retrieved from http://www.townsunited.org/Eric%20Adams/blacks_in_nypd.htm
- 100 Blacks in Law Enforcement Who Care. (2006–2007). 100 Blacks helpful tips. Retrieved from <http://www.100blacksinlawenforcement.org>

Websites

- 100 Blacks in Law Enforcement Who Care: <http://www.100blacksinlawenforcement.org>

OPERATION WETBACK

Operation Wetback began in 1954 as an effort to remove undocumented and illegal Mexican sharecropper workers from the United States. Vetted by President Dwight Eisenhower and drafted by Attorney General Herbert Brownell, Operation Wetback arose as a result of an angry citizenry. The public had become disgruntled over the widespread corruption of employers of sharecroppers and growers along the Mexican border—the recent influx of illegal workers had made the border patrol a risible arm of law enforcement.

Although Operation Wetback was deemed a success, the numbers of successful deportations are often the source of controversy. Some argue the numbers were inflated by the Eisenhower administration, while others suggest that such a contention misses the larger goal and purpose of the legislation (to address the corrupt practices of those who employed illegal workers and deported said workers). This entry reviews the historical context, purpose, and impact of Operation Wetback.

History

The Mexican government repeatedly failed to secure equal pay and workers' rights for many of its citizens within the southwestern United States; millions crossed the border from Mexico as undocumented workers, with the term wetback originating from immigrants' use of the Rio Grande to cross illegally (in 1952 alone, some 852,000 persons were seized by the federal government). In the United States, many political ideologues branded illegal immigrants recalcitrant brigands bent on harming the nation and everything its citizens valued. Although the United States eventually created the bracero program to combat the increasing number of illegal immigrants, the citizenry desired a more hard-line approach that eventually led to the creation of Operation Wetback.

The illegal immigrant influx did have observable damaging effects on wages. Most of the Mexican undocumented workers were willing to work for significantly lower wages than the average American blue-collar worker. Employers were able to pay more workers for less work within the cotton and produce industries; the potential for mass profit without the provision of worker benefits was too attractive for many of these business owners to turn away. Finally, the significance of this issue remains even today, with illegal immigration a hot-button issue in many electoral campaigns throughout the United States.

The Role of the Bracero Program

In 1942, the U.S. government enacted the bracero program, presaging the guest worker program that gained notoriety during President Ronald Reagan's administration in the 1980s. The program was originally conceived in the early 1940s to combat a wartime dearth of labor power through taxpayer labor subsidies; the plan lasted until 1964. However, most contract employers did not pay enough for many poor Mexican documented workers to make a living. As a result of the inadequate wages and the ease with which illegal immigrants could be hired without the burden of the immigration bureaucracy, only 1 in 10 were issued valid worker certificates from 1947 to 1960. The problems with the bracero program immediately led to more undocumented workers in the United States, prompting an ineffective Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) to take advantage of the widespread public outcry over the mass illegal immigration's depressive effect on wages for U.S. workers. Moreover, the bracero program failed in the eyes of many American workers by increasing the number of undocumented workers as opposed to contracting legal ones.

The Emergence of Operation Wetback

Genesis of the Plan

In 1954, Attorney General Brownell created the legislation that would eventually become known as Operation Wetback. The bill contained two primary initiatives: (1) to stem the flow of illegal and undocumented Mexican workers into the United States and (2) to punish the employers who harbored such workers. The plan was met with resistance among some legislators as well as agricultural and farming groups that lobbied the Congress. Many legislators objected to one of the bill's central tenets—that employers of illegal workers should be punished—because proving awareness of that fact would be difficult. Also, a few lawmakers were hesitant about Brownell's militaristic approach that involved carrying out the plan like an invasion. However, after much debate the legislation passed both houses of Congress and was enacted that same year.

The Military Plan

The appointment of General Joseph Swing, along with other top military commanders, to the lead position in the implementation of Operation Wetback led to a campaign of intelligence gathering, aggression, and precision on par with a large-scale offensive. The summer months saw tens of thousands of illegal immigrants arrested and, at the same time, a great deal of traffic at the border with many illegal immigrants attempting to get back into Mexico. The use of military and local law enforcement led many employers to support the return of their undocumented workers to Mexico so that they themselves could avoid prosecution and/or closure of their businesses.

Conclusion

The INS placed the number of undocumented workers leaving the country either voluntarily or through prosecution at 1.3 million. The number of illegal immigrants that left continues to be disputed, as measurements of "voluntary" departures from the country are difficult to implement. Although Operation Wetback temporarily mollified an angry citizenry, the bracero program remained in place and, ultimately, continued to allow the influx of Mexican immigrants, albeit now under a licit banner. Operation Wetback, moreover, may have deterred illegal immigration for a time, but it did not relieve the demand for labor power in the United States. Therefore many employers in the agricultural industries still needed the work of immigrants in order to adequately meet demands and compete in the marketplace.

The INS ultimately let many illegal Mexican workers back into the United States under an expedited process; the hard-hitting initial campaign of Operation Wetback appeared poorly attuned to the demands on the agriculture business as the use of Mexican laborers was the only way to keep the industry afloat and solvent. Operation Wetback did deport many illegal workers but lacked a clear vision for ameliorating the larger social issues, such as poverty and strained diplomatic relations with Mexico, that seemed to cause much of the undocumented worker problems. Because the United States continues to need illegal immigrants to meet work demands, the case of Operation Wetback reveals many of the larger political and structural problems that led many Mexican immigrants to illegally cross the border. The bracero program aided the effort to document illegal workers but did not have the strength and resources to keep pace with the market demands of the agricultural industry. The militaristic nature of Operation Wetback also illustrates the national consciousness at the time; the United States had recently experienced an attack by a foreign power at Pearl Harbor, the deployment of thousands of troops in World War II, and the fear associated with spreading anti-Communist sentiment.

Brent Funderburk

See also Inequality Theory; Public Opinion, Punishment; Racialization of Crime

Further Readings

- Garcilazo, J. M. (2001). McCarthyism, Mexican Americans, and the Los Angeles committee for the protection of the foreign-born, 1950–1954. The Western Historical Quarterly, 32(3), 273–295.
- Wetbacks: Can the states act to curb illegal entry? (1954). Stanford Law Review, 6(2), 287–322.

OPIUM WARS

The Opium Wars were conflicts between China and the United Kingdom from 1839 to 1842 and 1856 to 1860. Britain defeated China in both wars and coerced the Chinese government into signing treaties opening up foreign trade, including British importation of opium, a narcotic, to China from British-controlled India. Britain's import of opium contributed to a great increase in the number of opium addicts in China. Issues arising around the use of opium for smoking played a role in Western fears of the "yellow peril" and became part of a larger effort to stigmatize the Chinese as dangerous and insidious, to be condemned and isolated. The criminalization of certain types of opium used by Chinese in the early 20th century in Canada and the United States was in part a response to these racist fears. This entry first describes the origins of British importation of opium into China and then examines the events and impact of the First and Second Opium Wars.

Background

In order to offset its trade deficit with China, Britain had begun to illegally export opium to China from British India during the 18th century. While there was great demand in Britain for tea, silk, and porcelain from China, there had been little demand in China for British exports; however, the opium trade quickly flourished and reversed the trade deficit. The Chinese emperor declared a prohibition on the sale and smoking of opium because of the increasing number of addicts, but this ban did not stop the drug trade.

After Britain defeated Bengal (India) in 1757, the British East India Company (a government company) was able to establish a monopoly on the production and exportation of opium in India that lasted for nearly a century. Despite China's ban on the importation of opium, British exports of opium to China skyrocketed from an estimated 15 tons in 1730 to 75 tons in 1772, shipped in more than 2,000 "chests," each containing 140 pounds (64 kilograms) of opium. In 1799, the Chinese Empire again banned opium imports; however, the ban had little effect because the Chinese government in Beijing could not stop merchants from smuggling opium into China from the south. This, along with the addictive properties of the drug, the desire for more profit by the British East India Company, which had been granted a monopoly on trade with China by the British government, and the fact that Britain wanted silver, greatly increased the opium trade. By the 1820s, China was importing 900 tons of opium from Bengal each year.

In the summer of 1833, the East India Company's monopoly on trade to China was abolished by the British Parliament. This provided an incentive for other nations to increase private trade with China, including trade in opium. The Americans and the Portuguese soon joined the opium importation business. The British sent a new representative, Lord Napier, to open up more trade with China, including legal trade in opium. Although Chinese leaders were debating the legalization of opium, in 1838 the Chinese government imposed the death sentence on Chinese traffickers. It is estimated that Britain was selling about 1,400 tons of opium a year to China. Of course, British subjects were not subject to Chinese laws.

First Opium War

In 1839, the Emperor of China appointed a new commissioner, Lin Zexu, who was charged with addressing opium trade at the port of Canton. Lin He immediately demanded a halt to British imports, but the British refused to stop, and Lin imposed a trade embargo on the British. Given the embargo, the British superintendent of trade demanded that all British subjects turn in all opium to him. All this opium, nearly a year's supply, was then turned over to Lin, who destroyed it. After this confiscation, Lin demanded that all British merchants sign a bond promising not to deal in opium, with dealers subject to the death penalty. While the British government opposed the signing of such a bond, some merchants nevertheless signed. Lin also sent a letter to Queen Victoria challenging the British policy of profiting from opium trade to China while the opium trade was prohibited in England, Ireland, and Scotland. Queen Victoria never responded to this letter, but both the British government and British merchants deemed the destruction of their private property (opium) by Lin as criminal.

In June 1840 the British Indian army was sent to China, and the first Opium War began. British military superiority was clearly evident during the brief armed conflict. British warships wreaked havoc on coastal towns, and British troops, armed with modern muskets and cannons, overpowered the Chinese forces. After the British took Canton, they sailed up the Yangtze River and took the tax barges, a devastating blow to the Chinese Empire that slashed the revenue of the imperial court in Beijing to just a small fraction. During the first 6 months of war, the opium trade was revived, and more than 40 ships were reported involved in smuggling opium. Following this military conquest came the missionaries.

The Chinese authorities sued for peace in 1842, and the Treaty of Nanking was negotiated in August 1842 and ratified in 1843. According to the terms of the treaty, China was forced to pay an indemnity to Britain, agreed to open five ports to Britain, and ceded Hong Kong to Queen Victoria. In the subsequent Treaty of Bogue, the Chinese Empire also granted Britain most favored nation treatment and gave British subjects extra-territorial privileges in the treaty ports. In 1844, the United States and France also concluded similar treaties with China—the Treaty of Wanghia and the Treaty of Whampoa, respectively. Opium importation was particularly lucrative to traders, and it gained wide popular use in the “new” China. However, the Chinese government greatly resented the economic advantage that Britain had gained through military force and their nation's subjugation to opium trade controlled by “foreign devils.” This led to the Second Opium War.

Second Opium War

Hong Kong became not only a center of opium traffic but also a source of pirates. Although the Chinese still had laws against opium, the British government did not respect those laws. In fact, most non-British governmental employees in Hong Kong were involved in the opium trade. The British government put a price (bounty) on each pirate's head. While this helped to catch many pirates, it did not affect the balance of trade between Britain and China. In fact, by 1854, China was buying fewer cotton goods from England than it had bought a decade earlier. However, the trade in opium was flourishing. Further frustrating British authorities was their inability to ship goods to the interior of China and the various Chinese custom duties on cotton.

The Second Opium War began with a dramatic but relatively minor incident. A boat owned by Chinese privateers, the Arrow, was registered in Hong Kong, with British command and a Chinese crew. It was confiscated by Chinese officials and all crew, including the British, were arrested on piracy and smuggling charges. The arrested British subjects alleged that the Chinese officials had torn down and insulted the British flag during their inspection of the boat. This gave the British government an excuse to wage war again on China.

British forces attacked the city of Guangzhou in 1856, starting the Second Opium War. French forces joined the British intervention after a French missionary, Father Auguste Chapdelaine, was killed by a local mandarin in China. Other nations became involved diplomatically, although they did not provide military personnel. The Treaty of Tientsin was created in July 1858 to end the war, but it was not ratified by China until 2 years later. This would prove to be a very important document in China's early modern history, as it was one of the primary unequal treaties that opened China to ultimate foreign domination and exploitation.

Hostilities broke out once more in 1859, after China refused to establish a British embassy in Beijing, which had been promised by the Treaty of Tientsin. Fighting erupted in Hong Kong, and in Beijing, where the British set fire to the Summer Palace after considerable looting took place. Britain prevailed with its superior military power and increased its power over China. China ratified the Treaty of Tientsin at the Convention of Peking in 1860, ending the war, legalizing the import of opium and granting a number of privileges to British and other Western countries and their subjects.

Total opium exports from British India to China rose from 58,681 chests in 1859–1860 to 105,508 chests in 1879–1880. Also, trade in cotton quadrupled during the same time. The complete conquest of China led to the growth of vast fortunes in England. Of course, victory by Britain in the second opium war saw the spread of opium use expand even more dramatically in China. As part of the exploitation of China, cheap Chinese labor was imported to the United States and Canada.

Opium and the “Yellow Peril”

The association of the “drug problem,” and specifically opiate addiction, with racism was particularly acute during the first few decades of the 20th century in both the United States and Canada. Opiate addiction was linked with the “yellow peril” and characterized as incompatible with White morality and superiority. As a specific ideology, the yellow peril rationalized the low wages and danger that often accompanied what was disparagingly termed “coolie labor.” “Anti-drug policies” became a rallying point for racists and nativists who felt themselves in the throes of a life-and-death struggle with alien forces.

The Anti-Opium Act passed by Canada in 1908 was largely a product of fear of the “yellow peril.” Such fears also provided a motivation for the Harrison Narcotics Act of 1914, one of the first attempts by the U.S. Congress to regulate drugs. Supporters of the Harrison Act appealed to stereotypes of the Chinese and other ethnic minorities who were portrayed as the primary users of opium and cocaine. Ironically, the use of opium by Chinese had been established by the British Empire, only to lead to the criminalization of this “Chinese habit” in North America.

Charles E. Reasons

See also Asian Americans; Biological Theories; Chinese Exclusion Act; Harrison Narcotics Tax Act of 1914

Further Readings

- Beeching, J. (1975). The Chinese Opium Wars. New York: Harcourt, Brace, Jovanovich.
- Brook, T. J., & Wakabayashi, B. T. (Eds.). (2000). Opium regimes: China, Britain and Japan, 1839–1952. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Collis, M. (1968). Foreign mud: The opium imbroglio at Canton in the 1800s and the Anglo-Chinese war. New York: Norton.
- Fay, P. W. (1975). The Opium War 1840–1842. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Owen, D. E. (1934). British opium policy in China and India. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Reasons, C. E., & Perdue, W. D. (1981). The demonology of drugs. In The ideology of social problems (pp. 489–541). Sherman Oaks, CA: Alfred Publishing.
- Trocki, C. A. (1999). Opium: Empire and the global political economy: A study of the Asian opium trade 1750–1950. London: Routledge.
- Zheng, Y. (2005). The social life of opium in China. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

ORGANIZED CRIME

Despite the American fascination with organized crime, as evidenced in popular media and academic attention, there is considerable disagreement as to what the term means or how to define it. The following discussions are each related to the social construction of organized crime and thus have theoretical and policy implications. Furthermore, because the operational definition of organized crime necessarily affects the criminal justice system vis-à-vis such matters as resource allocation, priority assessments, criminal sanctions, and so on, these contentious “academic” debates are, of course, ultimately related to issues of race, ethnicity, fairness, and justice.

The Definition of Organized Crime

Though the study of organized crime is primarily a sociological pursuit, the phenomenon is a subject of study in numerous other disciplines, including anthropology, economics, history, and political science. Despite, if not because of, this broad and varied inquiry into the topic, there is little consensus regarding what constitutes “organized crime” nor on who engages in such activities and why.

Rather than offering an explicit definition, most authors have opted to identify the key characteristics of organized crime, and four of these are most frequently cited in the academic literature: a continuing enterprise, using rational means, profiting through illegal activities, and utilizing the corruption of officials. Several authors have also argued that groups must also use (or threaten) violence and involve themselves in multiple criminal enterprises to merit inclusion in the organized crime discussion.

While these “defining characteristics” are commonly cited among scholars, this should not be interpreted as settling the issue. For instance, there is no consensus regarding what constitutes “continuity.” Is it continuity of a group, of a conspiracy, or of a crime pattern? What duration of time constitutes continuity, regardless of which factor is chosen? Similarly, there are questions regarding “multiple enterprises.” How many are required and how would this be operationally defined? For example, an organization may be grounded on narcotics trafficking while by necessity evading taxes and laundering money. Furthermore, it can be argued that violence and corruption are merely “management tools” and that criminal enterprises may indeed thrive without the necessity of these tools (e.g., if law enforcement is ignorant of the problem).

There are other ongoing debates in the study of organized crime, and three stand out. Researchers continue to discuss such issues as the distinctions between organized crime and “white-collar” crime and between organized crime and gangs. The other dispute concerns the degree of organization or sophistication exhibited by syndicates.

White-collar crime has been most commonly defined as “crimes committed by persons of high social status and respectability in the course of their occupation.” However, if one focuses on the activities as opposed to the individuals involved in the activities, numerous white-collar conspiracies quite easily fit the criteria listed previously (i.e., continuity, corruption, multiple enterprises). For instance, several studies have demonstrated that securities frauds are often enduring and complex, requiring the use of financial “fronts,” money laundering and the artful skills of accountants, financiers, and lawyers, the corruption of public and regulatory officials, and/or violence and so on. These studies have thus demonstrated that without an emphasis on the economic and social standing of the offender, these offenses would be considered organized crimes.

Today, numerous gangs engage exclusively in narcotics trafficking. Some scholars thus argue such organizations do not meet widely held characteristics of organized crime (i.e., these groups do not engage in multiple enterprises). There is no consensus in the academic literature on this matter, however. Some gang researchers delineate between gangs and “drug gangs,” with the latter obviously focusing on the drug trade and monopolizing sales market territories instead of residential territories, among other differences. Other researchers argue some gangs have become so sophisticated they are in fact organized crime groups. One example of such a “gang” is Chicago’s infamous Gangster Disciples.

The most fundamental and contentious issue concerns the extent to which organized crime is, in fact, organized. Early studies stressed bureaucracy, adherence to protocols and rules, and what was essentially a business model for illicit endeavors. Later studies emphasized more informal relationships that were often fleeting and predicated on patron-client networks. The distinction can be viewed through the prism of two different models of research, each identified by a variety of terms. The more bureaucratic interpretation of organized crime was characterized as the governmental/law enforcement/traditional view, whereas the other perspective was considered the informal structural-functional system/developmental association model. Earlier studies emphasizing bureaucracy eventually gave way to the latter subset of models that now dominate the literature. Though membership in an organized crime group provides access to networking channels and increases the predictability of illegal venture, economic conditions trend against rigid structure in the “underworld.” As an economist and renowned expert on the subject has stated, there are three risks associated with the illegality of organized crime: underworld contracts are not legally enforceable; the entrepreneur might be arrested; and criminal assets might be seized. Thus, the key contradiction of organized crime is that there is a need to provide substantial information to prospective customers but this process places the conspiracy in jeopardy because of fears of detection (by authorities and competitors).

Race, Ethnicity, and Organized Crime

Much of the academic and popular literature on organized crime—not to mention the news and entertainment media—is preoccupied with Italian and Sicilian American groups. Indeed, a casual observer may conclude that organized crime in the United States is and/or has been the exclusive province of those of Italian and Sicilian descent. Such an observation—though understandable given all the attention to such groups—is patently false. What then accounts for this state of affairs, and what merits does the claim hold that non-Italian or non-Sicilian groups are recently “emerging”?

The discussion of organized crime in academic literature exhibits remarkable variation. One common hypothesis argues that organized crime committed by groups other than Sicilian or Italian Americans is emerging. There is a competing hypothesis, however, that argues many supposedly emerging groups have long organized crime histories and that it is the research in this area that is emerging. As the following review of numerous published works demonstrates, there is little consensus among academics on what is emerging, particularly among those without an extant research agenda on organized crime.

Non-Sicilian/Italian Organized Crime Is Emerging

Several authors have adopted this theme, either explicitly or by implication. For instance, a popular criminology textbook explicitly states, “In recent years, ethnic and national groups other than Italian-Americans have developed organizations to pursue profits through illegal means” (emphasis added). There is another manner in which this discussion is presented. Often, authors do not address this debate specifically but implicitly adopt the emerging group paradigm by omitting any reference to groups other than Sicilian or Italian Americans.

Non-Sicilian/Italian Organized Crime Research Is Emerging

This subset of literature casts doubt on the “emerging” organized crime hypothesis and, either explicitly or by inference, argues that it is the research on non-Sicilian/Italian American organized crime that is emerging. Concerning the broad concept of emerging organized crime, one scholar notes, “Historically, discussions of organized crime have focused almost exclusively on . . . groups like the Mafia and La Cosa Nostra . . . more recent analyses, however, have extended their interest to other criminal groups . . .” (emphasis added). Others have explicitly and implicitly addressed the notion of supposedly “emerging” organized crime groups: “It is important to keep in mind that members of organized crime networks in the United States are by no means exclusively of Italian descent, nor were they ever.” Similarly, a criminal justice textbook points out, “Thanks in large part to popular culture and the media, organized crime is often associated with the Italian Mafia. Indeed, to many, organized crime and the Mafia are synonymous, and the myth has become more powerful than reality,” before concluding, “In fact, organized crime is an equal opportunity field of criminal activity, with nearly every ethnic group . . . represented.” The “emerging” organized crime logic is not only incorrect but also damaging to criminological study. That is, emphasizing Sicilian/Italian American groups not only ignores the long history of organized crime before Italian immigration but also overlooks the involvement of many other ethnic and racial groups. As noted by Steve Barkan, “It also diverts attention away from organized crime’s roots in poverty, in the readiness of citizens to pay for the goods and services it provides, and in the willingness of politicians, law enforcement agents, and legitimate businesses to take bribes and otherwise cooperate with organized crime.”

There are two related reasons for the competing “emerging” organized crime paradigms. The first concerns how authors define “organized crime,” and the second revolves around the utter lack of quality data regarding non-Sicilian/Italian organized crime (though data are lacking for these groups as well). The lack of data directly affects the ability to operationally define organized crime.

Definition of Organized Crime Revisited

If mere participation in the vices and/or racketeering and/or political graft alone is the operational threshold, there should be no debate about the existence of extra-Sicilian/Italian American organized crime dating back to the 1800s, if not before. Conversely, one could adopt a more stringent threshold, such as mandating that groups exhibit division of labor, corruption, or use of violence to maintain networks and thus group continuity. If this latter approach is adopted, the issue regarding whether such ethnic organized crime has a long history is less settled, since there are few substantive studies, and perhaps even less data, on the matter.

Relative Lack of Non-Sicilian/Italian American Organized Crime Data

One glaring reason regarding the absence of data in this area concerns the government’s absolute preoccupation with Sicilian/Italian American organized crime. The federal government has convened a number of panels and committees over the years to address the issue of criminal syndicates and to create related policies. Most notable are the following: Senator Estes Kefauver’s Committee (1951); Senator John L. McClellan’s Committee (1963); President Lyndon Johnson’s Task Force (1967); the National Advisory Committee’s Task Force (1976); and, most recently, President Ronald Reagan’s Commission on Organized Crime (1983). The clear preoccupation of these panels has been the so-called National Crime Syndicate and La Cosa Nostra. Although President Reagan’s commission did, somewhat tentatively, expand the boundaries of organized crime beyond Italian Americans, certainly this group was the major emphasis.

On a state level, the situation is much the same. Pennsylvania’s commissions and task forces, for instance, have also consistently focused on Italian American groups rather than others. As two organized crime researchers noted in 1987, “The [Pennsylvania Crime Commission] itself has mentioned in passing that black-run numbers banks were dealing in annual sums several times greater than Italian-run organizations. But it is Italian criminality that is discussed at length.”

Scholars may have thus confined their studies of organized crime to Sicilian/Italian American groups partly because of the attention being paid them. Furthermore, the government’s focus necessarily affects other components in the criminal justice system, many of which produce the data of criminological studies. For example, law enforcement agencies and prosecutors, of course, adopted the focus on Sicilian/Italian American groups, and thus researchers who used these data exclusively arrived at narrow, and biased, conclusions. Donald Cressey’s 1969 book Theft of the Nation is perhaps the embodiment and certainly among the most significant examples of the literature promoting this paradigm. He wrote, “An Italian organization in fact controls all but an insignificant proportion of the organized-crime activities in the United States,” and added, “If one understands Cosa Nostra he understands organized crime in the United States.” Perhaps such conclusions prompted a renowned organized crime scholar to sarcastically note that while discussion of Prohibition has centered around smugglers who were Italians, Irish, and Jewish in Chicago and northeastern cities, “thirsty people must also have lived outside these cities; but who was distilling and selling bootleg liquor in the American South and in the rural areas where there were few if any recent immigrants?”

One organized crime author has recently stated, “While the last fifty years in the United States have witnessed the period of Sicilian-Italian domination of syndicate crime, this was preceded by Jewish . . . and Irish domination.” He added, “Prior to these groups, WASPs (White Anglo-Saxon Protestants) controlled organized crime. During these periods, many other ethnic groups—for example, Germans, Lebanese, Greeks, blacks—also participated in organized crime.” In sum, non-Italian/Sicilian American groups have existed for generations, though their structure and significance have been the subject of considerable debate. Another problem with the “emerging” organized crime hypotheses concerns the operational definition of the term recent. Authors who loosely state that organized crime among certain ethnic groups has “recently” emerged leave open a host of possible interpretations. If “recent” refers to activities within the past 5 or 10 years, these characterizations are quite likely flawed. Several authors have documented a variety of ethnic syndicates, fitting the more restrictive characterization of organized crime, were present in numerous U.S. cities as early as the 1800s. For example, historical work on New York City around 1900 found that Chinese organized crime “predates, in structure and sophistication, organizations of other ethnic origins later recognized as ‘modern’ organized crime by academics, the media and the government.” The study’s author thus concluded the common, trendy discussion of Chinese organized crime as “emerging” is ahistoric. Other recent historical analyses have concluded that much of the current academic literature on African American organized crime in Philadelphia and Chicago is equally unsophisticated and suspect. Thus, as more studies are conducted, the social system accounting for the multifarious phenomenon of organized crime is commonly exhibited. By definition, these studies will conclude organized crime is, and has been, an equal opportunity employer. Accordingly, the historical record is continually being revised and reinterpreted, with an as yet unknown impact on public opinion, criminological theory, and public policy.

Sean Patrick Griffin

See also Drug Cartels; Drug Dealers; Drug Trafficking; Gambling; Harrison Narcotics Act of 1914; Jamaican Posses

Further Readings

- Barkan, S. E. (2001). Criminology: A sociological understanding (2nd ed.). Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall.
- Berger, R.J., Free, M., & Searles, P. (2001). Crime, justice and society: Criminology and the sociological imagination. New York: McGraw-Hill.
- Bovenkerk, F. (1998). Organized crime and ethnic minorities: Is there a link? Transnational Organized Crime, 4, 109–126.
- Calavita, K., & Pontell, H. N. (1993). Savings and loan fraud as organized crime. Criminology, 31, 519–548.
- Conklin, J. E. (1995). Criminology (5th ed.). Boston: Allyn & Bacon.
- Cressey, D. R. (1969). Theft of the nation: The structure and operation of organized crime. New York: Harper & Row.
- Decker, S. H., Bynum, T., & Weisel, D. (1998). A tale of two cities: Gangs as organized crime groups. Justice Quarterly, 15, 395–425.
- Gaines, L. K., & Miller, R. L. (2003). Criminal justice in action. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth.
- Griffin, S. P. (2005). Black Brothers, Inc.: The violent rise and fall of Philadelphia's Black mafia. Leicester, UK: Milo.
- Hagan, F. E. (2002). Introduction to criminology: Theories, methods, and criminal behavior. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth.
- Inciardi, J. A. (2002). Criminal justice (7th ed.). Orlando, FL: Harcourt Brace.
- Jenkins, P., & Potter, G. W. (1987). The politics and mythology of organized crime: A Philadelphia case study. Journal of Criminal Justice, 15, 473–484.
- Lombardo, R. M. (2002). The Black mafia: African-American organized crime in Chicago, 1890–1960. Crime, Law & Social Change, 38, 33–65.
- McIlwain, J. S. (2004). Organizing crime in Chinatown: Race and racketeering in New York City, 1890–1910. Jefferson, NC: McFarland.
- Naylor, R. T. (1997). Mafias, myths and markets: On the theory and practice of enterprise crime. Transnational Organized Crime, 3, 1–45.

PEACE PLEDGE

Peace as an end state of individual and international relations is widely accepted as desirable, yet peace remains elusive. Although it is easy to condemn wanton attacks upon the unwitting and the peaceable, whether that violence occurs at the individual, group, or world level, what is more challenging is the commitment to bring about an end to all violence, including the many harms of racism in all its guises. Such a discipline as a commitment to the eradication of violence is not a task for the faint of heart; it is a monumental challenge. This entry presents a device—the peace pledge—that has been employed toward the cultivation of peace in various different forms and discusses its current and potential use in the amelioration of harm resulting from all forms of social injustice, such as racism.

Peace

Most people understand peace to be an absence of war or conflict. This usage often is referred to as “negative peace,” as when two nations—or two spouses—are not in a state of formalized conflict. Alternatively, “positive peace” is used to describe a state of existence free from oppression, exploitation, patriarchy, racism, and class struggle and characterized by acceptance, love, mutuality, freedom, equity, equanimity, and liberation. The common view has been that the degree to which a culture can be described as positively peaceful is the degree to which that culture is likely to be without war.

Cultural positive peace, according to Johan Galtung, results from a de-legitimization of violence in its many forms (e.g., direct, structural, cultural) and a legitimization of nonviolence as a means for conflict resolution. Examples of direct (verbal) violence include the use of racist labels for people or hurling racial epithets at an individual. Biases designed into or existing in the justice system that, intentionally or not, treat or affect individuals of different races differently are examples of structural violence. Religious teachings that separate races and treat some races as less deserving than others of spiritual merit or forgiveness are examples of cultural violence. It should be clear, then, that racism in its myriad forms is an example of violence and that the general level of violence in a society may well play a role in that society’s overall safety and health.

The Pledge

All people have a stake in the cultivation of peace, both positive and negative. A peace pledge is one useful tool employed on occasion in the cultivation of positive peace. Such a pledge is simply a series of statements that an individual formally adopts as a symbol of a personal commitment to peace. Although simple, even naive in appearance, the power of the peace pledge should not be understated. According to many peace activists, including Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Thich Nhat Hanh, and Mohandas K. Gandhi, the basis of lasting peace is a deep personal commitment to peace on the part of each individual. The peace pledge is both an outward sign of commitment to others and a reminder to the individual of what one must do to help realize the dream of lasting, positive peace. Often, the pledge is printed on a card or document and carried around with the individual as a reminder of its contents and as a symbol of one's pledge.

Historically, peace pledges have taken many forms and focused on many different aspects of the effort for peace. For instance, the organization Democracy in Action offers a pledge for its members not to vote for a candidate for Congress or the presidency who does not openly support a rapid end to the current war in Iraq.

Other pledges are more directly addressed to the issues of positive peace, and specifically to an end to inequity (i.e., racism). The now-defunct organization Peace Links offered a pledge that invites takers to commit to respecting the value of all people, and indeed all life; to accept people as they come; and to seek commonality with people who seem to be not like ourselves. The Dayton Peace Bridge pledge is far more detailed and involves several specifics, including commitments to volunteer with the organization Habitat for Humanity, to participate in Martin Luther King Day celebrations, and to attend a religious service other than one's own in order to learn about others' beliefs and traditions. The Dayton pledge also calls on pledge-takers to be proactively accepting of others and rejecting of derogatory humor; pledgers are to agree to greet warmly people of a race or culture that is not their own; not to laugh at racist, sexist, or culturist jokes; and to take someone from a different race/culture to lunch.

Some peace pledges come directly from religious scripture. The Five Mindfulness Trainings offered by Thich Nhat Hanh, a pledge taken by some of Hanh's students, is adapted from teachings of the historic Buddha as presented in the Sutra on the White-Clad Disciple. Hanh's formulation of the pledge invites pledge-takers to cultivate compassion, loving kindness, responsibility, loving speech and deep listening, and good mental and physical health. Additionally, an argument can be made that the Lord's Prayer, or Pater noster, taught by Jesus to his disciples at the Sermon on the Mount, constitutes a type of peace pledge. Although often less specific than the Peace Links or the Dayton Peace Bridge offerings, religious pledges like the Lord's Prayer or the Five Mindfulness Trainings have the potential of being more profound, longer-lasting commitments that are held more deeply than those crafted and offered by secular organizations. Occasionally, religious organizations will offer peace pledges with content specific to inequity, however. The National Council of Churches in Australia, for example, invites individuals to pledge to "stand with others who are treated unfairly, even if it means standing alone."

Conclusion

Although many have found it a useful tool in the cultivation of positive peace and in catalyzing an end to all forms of inequality, the peace pledge remains underused relative to its potential. Pledges offered by political organizations not to vote for candidates who are not committed to realizing an end to the Iraq war may be appealing now, but once the war is over, other challenges to peace will remain. Additionally, peace pledges rarely specify a particular social category of oppressed toward which one should target one's compassionate or ameliorative actions. This omission likely is intentional because racial and cultural strife are often particular to context, whereas a true commitment to peace is timeless and invariant with respect to context.

There is a growing belief that mindful, compassionate, decisive statements of commitment to positive peace can be valuable in the effort to realize an end to all forms of violence. A number of organizations that seek to confront racism or other forms of cultural violence have crafted formal pledge statements for members to take and to carry on their persons as a reminder of their promises and as a symbol to others of their willingness to stand for peace.

Michael DeValve

See also Center for the Study and Prevention of Violence; Faith-Based Initiatives and Delinquency; Faith-Based Initiatives and Prisons; Mediation in Criminal Justice; Restorative Justice; Social Justice

Further Readings

- Addison, B. E. (2004). Pragmatic pacifist: Devere Allen and the interwar peace movement, 1918–1940. Peace and Change, 29(1), 81–105.
- Barash, D. P., & Webel, C. P. (2002). Peace and conflict studies. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
- Brincat, C. A. (1997). Commentary: Moving beyond the metaphors of conflict toward a true(er) peace. Peace and Change, 22(3), 272–280.
- Galtung, J. (1996). Peace by peaceful means: Peace and conflict, development and civilization. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
- Hanh, T. N. (1991). Peace is every step: The path of mindfulness in everyday life. New York: Bantam.
- Hanh, T. N. (2007). Chanting from the heart: Buddhist ceremonies and daily practice. Berkeley, CA: Parallax.
- Holmes, R. L., & Gan, B. L. (2005). Nonviolence in theory and practice (2nd ed.). Long Grove, IL: Waveland Press.
- Ilman, R. (2007). Words of worth: Talking religiously about peace and dialogue. Peace and Change, 32(3), 415–434.
- Little, D. (2007). Peacemakers in action: Profiles in religion and conflict resolution. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Monseau, V. R. (Ed.). (2004). A curriculum of peace: Selected essays from English Journal. Urbana, IL: National Council of Teachers of English.

Websites

- Dayton Peace Pledge: <http://www.markings.bc.ca/mind/peace/pledges.html>
- Democracy in Action: <http://www.democracyinaction.org>
- National Council of Churches in Australia: <http://www.ncca.org.au>
- Peace Links—North Carolina: <http://www.main.nc.us/peacelinks>

PELTIER, LEONARD (1944–)

Leonard Peltier is a Native American who was born on the Anishinabe Turtle Mountain Reservation in North Dakota. An Indigenous rights activist who spent many years providing community service to other Native Americans, Peltier has been incarcerated for more than 27 years due to his conviction for the murder of two agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) during a 1975 shootout on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation. Since his conviction, there has been a great deal of debate regarding Peltier's guilt. Peltier has a number of supporters who, along with a few organizations such as Amnesty International, consider him to be a political prisoner. Despite support for Peltier, the numerous appeals filed on his behalf have been unsuccessful, and he remains incarcerated at Leavenworth Penitentiary in Leavenworth, Kansas.

Although his ability to continue providing community service is limited by his incarceration, Peltier remains active by helping to establish scholarships and special programs for Native American youth. He has also served on the advisory board of the Rosenberg Fund for Children, sponsored children in Central America, donated to battered women's shelters, organized the annual Christmas drive for the people at Pine Ridge Reservation, and promoted prisoner art programs since his incarceration. This entry describes Peltier's life as an Indigenous rights activist, as well as the crime for which he was convicted and the current status of his case.

Peltier was exposed to political activism early in his life. As a teenager, he lived on the Turtle Mountain Reservation with his father and witnessed protests and demonstrations by tribal members in response to U.S. termination policy, which forced Native Americans off their reservations and into cities. The termination policy withdrew federal assistance, including food, from those Native Americans who chose to remain on their land. When the Bureau of Indian Affairs came to investigate the situation, Peltier accompanied a social worker to each of the homes on the reservation to warn residents to hide what little food remained. At each home, Peltier learned that there was no food to hide. It was this incident, as well as his travels to many reservations as a migrant farm worker with his father, which made him realize that the policies of relocation, poverty, and racism were widespread issues affecting tribes across the United States.

Peltier moved to Seattle in 1965 and worked as part-owner of an auto body shop, which he used to employ Native People and to provide cheap automobile repairs for those in need. During this time, he was active in the founding of a Native American halfway house for ex-prisoners. Peltier also became involved in Native Land Claim issues, alcohol counseling, and protests concerning the preservation of Native land in the city of Seattle. During the late 1960s and early 1970s, Peltier continued providing community service to Natives through his work as a welder, carpenter, and community counselor. In the course of this work, he became involved with the American Indian Movement (AIM) and eventually joined the Denver chapter. While working as a community counselor in Denver, Peltier became highly involved in the spiritual and traditional programs of the AIM. Peltier's membership in the AIM led him to become involved in a number of protests and rights movements, including the 1972 Trail of Broken Treaties. Eventually, Peltier's involvement in the AIM brought him to help the Oglala Lakota People of the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in South Dakota in the mid-1970s. Peltier assisted the people of Pine Ridge to plan community activities, religious ceremonies, programs for self-sufficiency, and the improvement of living conditions. Peltier also participated in the organization of security for the people of Pine Ridge. It was here that the shootout that resulted in Peltier's conviction occurred on June 26, 1975.

On this day, two FBI agents, Jack Coler and Ron Williams, entered the Jumping Bull Ranch, allegedly to arrest a young Native American man who was wanted for burglary and whom they had seen in a red pickup truck. Many AIM supporters, including Peltier, were camping there. A shootout began between the FBI agents and the occupants of the red pickup truck. Many residents returned fire from the ranch. The identity of those who fired the first shots is a matter of dispute. When the shooting ceased, the two FBI agents were dead, shot in the head at close range. The red pickup truck was never found or identified.

Peltier, a high-level AIM leader, as well as Dino Butler and Bob Robideau, had been present during the shootout and were charged with the murder of the two FBI agents. Peltier fled to Canada, allegedly convinced that he could not receive a fair trial in the United States, while Butler and Robideau were tried in a federal court and found not guilty of the murders. The "not guilty" findings were based on a lack of evidence to link the two men to the fatal shots and the exchange of gunfire from a distance, which appeared to be in self-defense.

Peltier was eventually arrested by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Later, he was extradited to the United States based, almost exclusively, upon the testimony of Myrtle Poor Bear, a woman who would later be declared too mentally unstable to testify at Peltier's trial.

A number of issues surrounding Peltier's case make it controversial. First, no known witnesses to the deaths of the FBI agents were located. There has also been a great deal of debate regarding the gun that fired the shots killing Coler and Williams. While an FBI ballistic expert claimed the casing from the scene matched a gun belonging to Peltier, documents obtained years later through the Freedom of Information Act showed the fatal bullets did not come from Peltier's gun. There are also a number of discrepancies regarding the vehicle in the case. Agents Coler and Williams had radioed that they were looking for a red pickup truck, whereas evidence at the trial stated that the agents had been looking for a red and White van, which could be more easily linked to Peltier. There is no witness testimony that Peltier actually shot the two FBI agents or that he was near the scene at the time of the shooting. Finally, the defense claimed that thousands of FBI documents holding information that would be valuable to the defense were withheld.

On April 18, 1977, Leonard Peltier was convicted of two counts of first-degree murder and was sentenced to two consecutive life sentences. Since his conviction, the courts have repeatedly rejected petitions for a new trial. In 2002, federal authorities denied him a parole hearing, departing from federal sentencing guidelines and ruling that no hearing could be held until 2008. Despite such legal setbacks, Peltier's defense team is in the process of filing a number of cases challenging his conviction, and Peltier's supporters continue to hope that he will be granted executive clemency.

Amanda K. Cox

See also Bureau of Indian Affairs; Indian Civil Rights Act; Innocence Project; Native Americans; Pictou-Aquash, Anna Mae; Political Prisoners

Further Readings

McGraw, S. (2007). The Crime Library: Leonard Peltier. Retrieved from http://www.crimelibrary.com/notorious_murders/not_guilty/peltier/index.html

- Messerschmidt, J. (1983). The trial of Leonard Peltier. Boston: South End Press.
- Peltier, L. (1999). Prison writings: My life is my sun dance. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Taubner, J. L. (1992). Political prisoners in the United States. New England Journal of Criminal and Civil Confinement, 18, 63–90.

PETIT APARTHEID

Criminologist and social-political geographer Daniel E. Georges-Abeyie introduced the concept and theory of petit apartheid in criminal justice and juvenile justice in 1990 to describe discriminatory, discretionary acts by law enforcement, correctional officers, and jurists that advantage or disadvantage an individual, or individuals, on grounds of their identity characteristics, such as race, ethnicity, gender, sex, sexual orientation, age, religion, or nationality. The concept has since been discussed on university and college campuses and written about in scholarly publications. The most notable exploration of the concept is Dragan Milovanovic and Katheryn K. Russell's edited volume, Petit Apartheid in the U.S. Criminal Justice System: The Dark Figure of Racism (2001).

The theory of petit apartheid has been refined to note its applicability to the juvenile justice systems as well as to the adult criminal justice systems, operative wherever social distance has the opportunity to transmute discretion into positive or negative discriminatory actions. The theory of petit apartheid notes that petit apartheid continues to manifest in both subtle and overt ways, including but not limited to psychiatric remands by courts; job assignments and security and custody ratings in correctional, jail, and detention settings; and via traffic stops and the subsequent search of motor vehicles. The theory of petit apartheid posits that the key to understanding the transmutation of discretion into positive or negative discrimination in criminal justice systems or juvenile justice systems is to understand the reality of actual outcome, not fixate on alleged intent.

The theory of petit apartheid is indebted to the sociological theories and the social-psychological and psychoanalytic theories of structural-functionalism, cognitive dissonance, and Freudian and neo-Freudian theory, respectively. Structural-functionalism notes that manifestations (i.e., norms, behaviors) remain long after the original reason for their origin. Thus, should one desire to permanently change a belief, one needs to change one's behavior first. Structural-functionalism notes that one has to get persons to choose the desired behaviors because of perceived benefits, not because of coercion. Only then can the desired behaviors be rationalized and result in permanent cognitive change. Freudian theory and neo-Freudian theory acknowledge motivation on three levels of consciousness: the conscious, which is self-explanatory; the preconscious, which is readily brought to consciousness by psychoanalysis and therapeutic psychopharmacological intervention; and the unconscious, which stubbornly resists conscious comprehension even after protracted psychoanalysis and long-term comprehensive therapeutic psychopharmacological intervention. The theory of petit apartheid acknowledges that certain discretionary discriminatory acts may be conscious and overtly discriminatory by the actor while others are not. Nonetheless, petit apartheid focuses on outcome, not intent.

In brief, the theory of petit apartheid is the legacy of three realities:

- De jure racism, that is, grand apartheid or statutory racism, which is currently unconstitutional in the United States and other Western nation-states
- De facto racism, that is, customary racism based upon the acting out of mores via norms, roles, and so on
- Social distance, that is, the degree of closeness or remoteness one desires in interaction with members of a particular group, including one's own; also the type, duration, frequency, and level of desired or acceptable/tolerable intimacy

The theory of petit apartheid acknowledges that there are many opportunities within the criminal justice system or juvenile justice system for discretion to transmute into positive or negative discrimination, such as the following:

- Entry into the criminal justice system or juvenile justice system—crime reported, investigation, arrest, booking, initial appearance
- Prosecution and pretrial services—charge dropped, preliminary hearing, bail or detention, information, grand jury, refusal to indict, mental health remand, police juvenile unit response, release or station adjustment, nonpolice referrals, intake hearing, nonadjudicatory disposition, petition to the court

- Adjudication—arraignment, adjudicatory hearing, mental health remand or mental health hearing/insanity hearing, charge dismissed, acquittal, trial, guilty plea, reduction of the charge
- Sentencing and corrections—sentencing, appeal of sentence, probation, fine, nonpayment of fine, probation disposition, revocation of probation, habeas corpus, penitentiary, security and custody rating by the correctional agency or juvenile justice agency or juvenile justice institution, work or program assignment, institution assignment, parole, revocation of parole, jail, pardon and clemency, commutation of sentence, and capital punishment

Thus, according to the theory of petit apartheid, the transmutation of discretion to discrimination can result in a positive or a negative decision—for example, to not formally process the suspect or defendant, or to formally process the defendant or suspect. The issue, in terms of social distance and petit apartheid within the U.S. criminal justice system or within the juvenile justice system, is what non-crime-related social, cultural, spatial, biological (including racial), gender, and sex-related factors result in the decision to formally process, or not process, a suspect or defendant, and then, if the decision is to process, how severe to make the processing or penalty option. Social distance and resultant petit apartheid also impact the quality and type of response to noncriminal requests for service or assistance.

Current research by Georges-Abeyie on petit apartheid has identified 27 specific conscious, unconscious, and preconscious social-cultural-spatial-biological salient factors, which can be scaled, that result in social distance and subsequent petit apartheid discriminatory actions:

- Racial delineation—a composite of perceived shared physical characteristics common to a subgroup within a species and alleged to be the result of heredity but that is, in fact, a social construction, which may ignore some shared characteristics while stressing others
- Ethnic delineation—the actual or perceived intersection of race, place/nation of origin, and culture; biological delineation plus norms and beliefs with a spatial delineation or origin
- Phenotypic difference and similarity in terms of phrenology—the contour of the skull; the bony and cartilage parts of the face
- Phenotypic difference and similarity in terms of physiognomy—the fleshy parts of the face
- Phenotypic difference and similarity in terms of skin color, including tint and hue
- Phenotypic difference and similarity in terms of the amount and physical characteristics of facial hair and body hair
- Hair style and hair color
- Body/facial adornment, such as tattoos and body/facial piercing
- Phenotypic difference and similarity in terms of somatotype (body type in terms of ectomorphy, endomorphy, and mesomorphy as well as the crude realization of differences in height and weight)
- Facial expression, including attentiveness and movement, and nonmovement, of eyebrows and lips
- Difference in attire, including jewelry, ethnic identifiers, neatness, and slovenliness
- Linguistic characteristics, including dialect, accent, grammar, vocabulary, and syntax
- Body language, including gait and posture, whether seated or standing, as well as body juxtaposition and personal spacing
- Gaze—eye movement, visual contact and/or avoidance
- Body odor, which is, in part, the result of diet as well as hygiene/cleanliness
- Actual and perceived age
- Physical indicators of perceived intelligence, such as Down syndrome
- Scarification as a result of intentional or unintentional wounds
- Actual or apparent sex
- Perceived, or actual, sexual orientation difference, or similarity to the respondent/observer
- Gender difference or gender similarity to the respondent/observer
- Site of the incident
- Situational factor existent between where the incident occurred; where the offender resides relative to the site location and whether the observer/respondent resides in, at, or near the site of the incident

- Site difference (whether the site of the incident or residence of the observed/subject has characteristic(s) different from the site of residence of the respondent)
- Actual or apparent religion of the subject
- Actual or apparent income/ wealth of the subject
- Grunt (sound nonword)/nod response to spoken and nonspoken verbal and nonverbal cues

The application of the theory of petit apartheid posits that the 27-factor Georges-Abeyie Social Distance Petit Apartheid Severity Scale can predict when discretion transmutes into discrimination. The theory of petit apartheid also posits that the Georges-Abeyie Social Distance Petit Apartheid Severity Scale can be utilized in the selection and subsequent training of criminal justice officials, juvenile justice officials, and jurists.

In summation, petit apartheid is discretion transmuted into officially unsanctioned positive and/or negative discrimination. Petit apartheid is the result of positive or negative social distance resulting from the conscious, preconscious, and unconscious social-cultural-biological-spatial computations of the brain. The theory of petit apartheid is, in its simplest form, the following:

If “A,” that is, specific conscious, unconscious, and preconscious social-cultural-spatial-biological salient factors, are present, then “B,” that is, discretion, will transmute into positive or negative discrimination.

The positive or negative discrimination noted in the theory of petit apartheid includes, but is not limited to, traffic stops without due, reasonable, or probable cause; acts of jury nullification; conscious, preconscious, and unconscious bias during the voir dire; overly severe or unreasonably lenient sentences; excessive or lenient security and custody rating of inmates and detainees; preferential job assignment and institution assignment for adjudicated and subsequently imprisoned inmates and detainees; and myriad, other officially unsanctioned acts, which disadvantage some individuals and advantage others.

Daniel E. Georges-Abeyie

See also Black Ethnic Monolith; Disproportionate Arrests; Disproportionate Incarceration; Profiling, Ethnic: Use by Police and Homeland Security; Profiling, Racial: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives; Social Distance

Further Readings

- Bohm, R. M., & Haley, K. N. (2005). Introduction to criminal justice (4th ed.). New York: McGraw-Hill.
- Georges-Abeyie, D. E. (1990). Criminal justice processing of non-White minorities. In B. MacLean & D. Milovanovic (Eds.), Racism, empiricism and criminal justice (pp. 25–34). Vancouver, BC, Canada: The Collective Press.
- Georges-Abeyie, D. E. (1990). The myth of a racist criminal justice system? In B. MacLean & D. Milovanovic (Eds.), Racism, empiricism and criminal justice (pp. 11–14). Vancouver, BC, Canada: The Collective Press.
- Georges-Abeyie, D. E. (2001). Petit apartheid in criminal justice: “The more ‘things’ change, the more ‘things’ remain the same.” In D. Milovanovic & K. K. Russell (Eds.), Petit apartheid in the U.S. criminal justice system: The dark figure of racism (pp. ix–xiv). Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press.
- Georges-Abeyie, D. E. (2006, July). Toward the development of a social distance severity scale for the processing of juvenile justice system offenders and adult criminal justice system offenders: The phenomenological reality of race, ethnicity, social ecology, and social distance—The Georges-Abeyie Petit Apartheid Social Distance Severity Scale. Paper presented at the meeting of the National Association of Blacks in Criminal Justice, Denver, CO.
- MacLean, B. D., & Milovanovic, D. (1990). Racism, empiricism and criminal justice. Vancouver, BC, Canada: The Collective Press.
- Milovanovic, D., & Russell, K. K. (Eds.). (2001). Petit apartheid in the U.S. criminal justice system: The dark figure of racism. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press.
- Parrillo, V. N. (2000). Strangers to these shores: Race and ethnic relations in the United States. Boston: Allyn & Bacon.

PHILLIPS COUNTY, ARKANSAS, MASSACRE OF 1919

See Elaine Massacre of 1919 (Phillips County, Arkansas)

PICTOU-AQUASH, ANNA MAE (1945–1975)

Anna Mae Pictou was born on March 27, 1945, in an Indian village near Shubenacadie, Nova Scotia, Canada. According to her daughters and others, Anna Mae holds a place in history as a committed advocate of Native rights, which ultimately led to her death at the young age of 30. During the tumultuous era of civil rights efforts, she encountered many risks.

She was raised as a Micmac Indian, amid poverty and the racism she encountered at off-reservation schools she attended. She dropped out of high school after her freshman year and became a berry and potato harvester in Maine. At age 17, she and fellow Micmac Jake Maloney headed to Boston to make a life for themselves among other Micmacs who had settled there. Their daughters, Denise and Deborah, were born in 1964 and 1965, respectively. Jake and Anna married afterward in New Brunswick, Canada, though by 1968 they were separated.

By that time, Native Indians, following on the heels of the civil rights movement, had begun to seek their rights relative to various treaties. Through her volunteerism at the Boston Indian Council at around the same time, Anna Mae became aware of the American Indian Movement (AIM). Her direct involvement with AIM did not come until several years later, as a Native activist. Since the time her decomposed body was found in February 1976, the precise circumstances of her death have remained a mystery.

In March 1972, Anna Mae was among the Trail of Broken Treaties marchers in Washington, D.C., during which time a siege of the Bureau of Indian Affairs building occurred to bring attention to Indian rights. The march is said to have started with AIM. In April 1973, AIM organized a protest in South Dakota at the location of the 1890 Wounded Knee massacre. The purpose was to help end a corruptive administration on the nearby Pine Ridge Reservation. It took 70 days and federal intervention to bring order. Anna Mae and Nogeeshik Aquash, who attended the march with Anna Mae and who became her husband on April 12, 1973, were instrumental in supplying underground food and other supplies to the Indian protesters at Wounded Knee.

In early 1974, Anna Mae worked in AIM's St. Paul, Minnesota, office. In the fall of 1974, she was director of AIM's Los Angeles office. In early 1975, a major event in which she was active occurred at an abbey in Gresham, Wisconsin, where Menominee Indians protested being stripped of their standing as federal Indians. These positions led to Anna Mae's status within AIM reaching a national level.

In mid-1975, Anna Mae took part in an AIM conference in Farmington, New Mexico, to support Navajo protests regarding mining issues. Leonard Peltier, AIM's security chief, also attended. From there, both were summoned back to the Pine Ridge Reservation to help provide security. Then, the Jumping Bull shootout occurred on June 26, 1975, in which two agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) and a Native Indian were killed during a confrontation between AIM members and FBI agents. Peltier was convicted over a half year later of the two agents' deaths. Shortly after Peltier's arrest, Anna Mae was murdered. It is believed that Peltier questioned Anna Mae in Farmington about her potential involvement with the FBI.

Before her death, Anna Mae and her husband were separated. She was arrested on South Dakota's Rosebud Reservation in September 1975 on charges of, among other things, weapons possession. She jumped bail and in November was arrested in Oregon (for nine counts involving an incident in Ontario) by federal agents, who interrupted an AIM caravan traveling from Washington State's Port Madison Reservation. She was sent back to South Dakota and released on personal recognizance to appear the next day for a November 25, 1975, trial. A bench warrant was issued for her arrest when she failed to appear. From then until only 3 months later, on February 24, 1976, when her bodily remains were discovered on the northeast border of Pine Ridge Reservation, accounts of her life remain as double hearsay testimony within court proceedings.

One belief is that Anna Mae was an FBI informant and was killed by AIM members. It was also rumored that she was having an affair with Dennis Banks, an AIM leader indicted for his activities at Wounded Knee. Another notion is that she was killed by the FBI because she knew of their informants who had infiltrated AIM. The circumstances of the identification of her decayed body initiated many unanswered questions.

The first autopsy, conducted by Pine Ridge Health Service, listed exposure as the cause of death. Unidentified, her hands were cut off and sent to the FBI, and she was buried anonymously at Holy Rosary Mission. On March 3, 1976, Anna Mae's fingerprints were identified by the FBI. Her family was notified, and they turned to AIM to help them obtain another autopsy, which was conducted by the same agency on March 10. Claiming merely that it was overlooked on the first autopsy, a .32 caliber bullet hole at the back of Anna Mae's skull concluded her death by homicide.

By 1994, three grand juries had been called to explore the circumstances of Anna Mae's death. After many years and several trials, Arlo Looking Cloud was sentenced to life in prison for his association with the murder. He claims that her real killer is John Graham, also known as John Boy Patton. Although Graham was indicted in 2003, his extradition from his native Canada has delayed his U.S. trial.

Anna Mae Pictou-Aquash was reburied alongside the grave of Joe Stuntz, the Native Indian who died in the aforementioned June 26, 1975, shootout.

Diane Cismowski

See also Bureau of Indian Affairs; Native Americans; Racism

Further Readings

- Black Mesa Indigenous Support. (n.d.). Anna Mae Aquash. Retrieved June 8, 2007, from http://www.blackmesais.org/Anna_Mae_Aquash.htm
- U.S. Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, Case No. 04-2173. United States of America v. Fritz Arlo Looking Cloud. Brief of Defendant-Appellant, Aug. 2004; Appellee's Brief, Sept. 2004; Decision, Aug. 19, 2005.

Websites

Justice for Anna Mae and Ray: <http://www.jfamr.org>

PLEA BARGAINING

Plea bargaining is an admission of guilt in exchange for a reduced charge or sentence. It is arguably one of the most publicized and controversial manifestations of the courtroom. Affecting practically every phase of the criminal justice system, plea bargaining is used as a substitute for jury trials, disposing of almost 90% of criminal cases. Those who favor this type of case disposition argue that without plea bargaining, the entire criminal justice system would collapse under the weight of an excessive caseload. On the other hand, those who oppose plea bargaining argue that it erodes the foundation of the judicial system. The truth, however, is that the viability of plea bargaining is determined by members of the so-called courtroom work group: judges, defense lawyers, and prosecuting attorneys. The point to be made here is that members of this work group determine the prevalence and frequency of plea bargaining. Similarly, one can make the point that the courtroom work group determines the success and failure of reform efforts as well.

The Myth of Plea Bargaining

There is a tendency to see plea bargaining as a necessary evil within the U.S. judicial system: Without its use, the entire criminal justice system, or rather the court system, would fall apart. Of course, this is not necessarily the case. The prevalence of plea bargaining can be viewed from at least two different perspectives: First, it is the preferred way of "doing justice" within the courtroom, and second, perhaps the most important reason, plea bargaining represents a way to reduce the risk and uncertainty of a jury trial. The point here is that plea bargaining is all about risk reduction and predictability of outcome.

Plea Bargaining and Race

Not unlike the controversy over plea bargaining, there remains considerable controversy and dispute about the impact of race and the sentencing process. Some studies suggest that first, there is research suggesting that Whites plea bargain at greater rates than their Black counterparts; the average Black defendant is less likely to plead guilty, when compared with an average White defendant. One reason may reflect the seriousness of the offenses committed by Blacks; Black defendants, for example, are more likely to have used a weapon to commit the offense and are also more likely to be charged with an offense that carries a longer sentence, than their White counterparts. And prosecutors are less likely to offer plea bargains for these more serious crimes. Second, Black defendants are less likely to admit guilt than are their White defendants, are less likely to have retained the services of an attorney, and may not be inclined to accept pleas with the criminal justice system. The reason for this is Black defendants may have less confidence in the judicial system, especially when one considers that judges are not bound to any plea agreement. Concomitantly, according to John Hagan and Celesta Albonetti, Black defendants are simply less trusting of the criminal justice system. Meanwhile, others have argued the Black defendant reluctance to accept plea deals may reflect the fact that White defendants receive better offers.

Conclusion

Research on this topic is surprisingly scant. There are studies purporting to show that race is not a factor in plea bargaining decisions. Many of these studies go on to suggest that prosecuting attorneys make plea arrangements (regardless of race) on the basis of weak cases, if only to ensure predictability of outcome. Next, there are less than a handful of studies indicating that Blacks receive better plea bargaining deals than their White counterparts. Conversely, Walker, Spohn, and DeLone, citing research findings from the U.S. Sentencing Commission, found that Blacks and Hispanics were less likely than their White counterparts to receive better deals. Although the research findings appear contradictory, race does appear to matter in the processing of criminal cases. Individuals reviewing the few studies that do exist should ask the following questions: Who were the victims? Who were the offenders? What type of multistage research has been done? How generalizable are research findings on the issue of race and plea bargaining. Why are Black defendants less likely to accept plea deals when they are offered? Why are we still talking about race now? It could be that because race (as evidenced by the recent reduction in sentencing for crack cocaine users, who are disproportionately Black) remains very relevant in the processing of criminal cases.

Robert L. Bing III

See also Kimbrough v. United States; Sentencing; Sentencing Disparities, African Americans

Further Readings

- Albonetti, C. (1997). Sentencing under the federal sentencing guidelines: Effects of defendant characteristics, guilty pleas, and departures on sentence outcomes for drug offenses, 1991–1992. Law and Society Review, 31, 789–822.
- Davis, A. 2007. Arbitrary justice. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Humphrey, J., & Fogarthy, T. (1987). Race and plea bargaining outcomes: A research note. Social Forces, 66(1), 176–187.
- Kennedy, R. (1997). Race, crime and the law. New York: Vintage Books.
- Maxfield, L. D., & Kramer, J. (1998). Substantial assistance: An empirical yardstick gauging equity in current federal policy and practice. Washington, DC: United States Sentencing Commission.
- Miller, J. (1996). Search and destroy: African American males in the criminal justice system. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Roberts, D. (1991). Punishing drug addicts who have babies: Women of color, equity and the right to privacy. Harvard Law Review, 104, 1419–1454.
- Stout, D. (2007, December 11). U.S. panel cuts jail time for crimes tied to crack. The New York Times. Retrieved from http://www.nytimes.com/2007/12/11/washington/11cnd-sentence.html?_r=2&hp&oref=slogin&oref=slogin
- Tonry, M. (1995). Malign neglect: Race, crime, and punishment. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Walker, S., Spohn, C., & DeLone, M. (2000). Race, ethnicity and crime in America: The color of justice (2nd ed.). Belmont, CA: Wadsworth.

Websites

The Sentencing Project: <http://www.sentencingproject.org>

POLICE ACCOUNTABILITY

The primary function of the police is criminal law enforcement—in other words, holding individual citizens accountable for their criminal acts. However, accountability is a double-edged sword. There are few who would disagree that there must be some degree of accountability for police misconduct. Yet, there are some who hold the position, at least in actual practice if not in professed theory, that there should be and is a different standard (less strict) for police officers. This issue is directly related to race and crime in that, as law enforcement investigations, convictions, and punishments have been, arguably, directed disproportionately against African Americans, holding the police accountable for misconduct is a priority in race relations.

But police accountability requires the answering of several questions. The first question is for what misconduct should police officers be held accountable? The second question is how and by whom should the police be held accountable? The third question is by what standard should the police be held accountable? And the fourth question is what relief or punishment would satisfy the principle of accountability?

Police Misconduct

The term misconduct can mean almost anything. However, when referring to police misconduct, a general scale of misconduct can be employed to understand exactly what type of misconduct is being addressed. At the top of the list are criminal acts. This type of misconduct would include any criminal act, whether it was a misdemeanor, a felony, or a capital crime. When considering police officers, the relevant offenses generally include speeding, DWI (driving while under the influence [of alcohol or drugs]), assault, battery, extortion, conspiracy, and murder. As a general rule, simply because a person is a police officer does not excuse that person from criminal acts. Although police officers may be subject to criminal prosecution for civil rights violations and conspiracy under 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242, these statutes are not frequently enforced.

Next on the list would be civil wrongs. These acts are more commonly known as torts. These torts occur when a person commits certain intentional or negligent acts that result in damages to another person. Relative to police officers, applicable torts may include assault, battery, false imprisonment, and wrongful death. Concerning negligence, they may include cruiser accidents. Many jurisdictions have laws that protect police officers from liability for civil wrongs. Many of these laws involve the principle of sovereign immunity, whereby a political entity or its officers cannot be sued. Some jurisdictions, however, will allow suits against individual police officers to proceed if the civil wrong was intentional as opposed to negligent.

Further down on the list are policy and procedural requirements. All police officers are subject to the administrative and policy and procedural requirements of their respective law enforcement agencies. Almost every law enforcement agency has a formal written set of policies and procedures to guide police officers in their job performance. Such policies and procedures usually include, but are not necessarily limited to, directions on processing cases, criminal investigations, emergency medical procedures, the law and procedures for searches and arrests, the use of force, the handling of prisoners, public relations, court procedures, and civil rights so as to ensure that all people are given due process and equal protection of the law. Police officers who fail to follow an agency's policies and procedures can be subjected to administrative discipline and punishment that may range from corrective training to termination of employment.

Next on this list are ethical requirements. Each police officer, before taking office, is usually required to swear an oath of office. Such oaths usually include a promise to faithfully defend and enforce not only the criminal laws but also the constitution of that particular state and the Constitution of the United States, which includes the Bill of Rights. Also, a number of police organizations have adopted a code of ethics. These codes of ethics usually include, but are not limited to, requirements for police officers to act fairly and impartially in the execution of their duties. In contrast to the recognized professions such as doctors and lawyers, there are few, if any, mechanisms to punish police officers who violate these ethical precepts.

The last, but definitely not the least important, type of police misconduct is the civil rights violation. Indeed, this is probably the most publicized form of police misconduct. Each citizen is guaranteed certain civil rights under the U.S. Bill of Rights. Some of the most common civil rights violations concerning police officers include false arrest and the use of excessive force. Some other civil rights violations concerning police officers include interference with freedom of speech, denial of medical care, violation of due process, and violation of equal protection of the law by such acts as illegal discrimination. Individual persons can bring civil rights suits against police officers and some political entities to enforce their civil rights or receive damages for violations of their civil rights.

These categories of police misconduct are general and are presented here to provide an understanding of the various types of misconduct. There is overlap among the different categories of police misconduct, and what might be acceptable under one category may be a violation in another category.

The How and the Whom

As with all criminal violations in the United States of America, prosecution of crimes is within the sole discretion of the prosecutor. The prosecutor has the unfettered discretion to choose which crimes to prosecute, and the prosecutor generally cannot be called to account for such decisions. Individual persons cannot compel the prosecutor to bring criminal charges. Because of this fact, criminal prosecutions against police officers are rare and usually do not occur unless the evidence is so overwhelming that the failure to prosecute would result in a great hue and cry from the public. Even then, halfhearted criminal prosecutions by local prosecutors may occur, resulting in no convictions and no relief for the victims of police misconduct.

It is not just local prosecutors who can bring a criminal prosecution against police officers. Under 18 U.S.C. §§ 241 and 242, federal criminal charges may be brought against police officers for civil rights violations and conspiracy by the U.S. Attorney or the U.S. Attorney General. However, as with local prosecutors, the ultimate authority to bring such charges rests with the U.S. Attorney or the U.S. Attorney General. Individuals may not compel the U.S. Attorney or the U.S. Attorney General to bring criminal charges under these statutes.

For tort violations, the burden is on the injured party to bring a lawsuit against the police officer. In such a case, the injured person would have to hire an attorney, or represent him- or herself pro se, and then file his or her own suit in court. The State would not represent the injured person. However, as previously mentioned, in many jurisdictions there are various laws, including laws of sovereign immunity, which prevent individuals from suing police officers or political entities for torts.

For violations of the policies and procedures of a law enforcement agency, an aggrieved person may bring a complaint against the offending police officer with that police officer's agency. There are three major ways such complaints are usually handled. The first way is usually through that law enforcement agency's chain of command, which would entail an investigation and possible discipline from the offending police officer's supervisors. The second way is through the agency's Internal Affairs Unit. Almost every major law enforcement agency has a separate Internal Affairs Unit. The rationale for the separate existence of the Internal Affairs Unit is to prevent favoritism and to help ensure that the complaining citizen's complaint is not simply ignored or given only a perfunctory examination. The third way is through the political entity's external civilian review board. Many political entities, unsatisfied with the way in which law enforcement agencies have handled civilian complaints internally, have formed separate and external civilian review boards. Civilian review boards were usually formed only after it was apparent that internal police investigations of civilian complaints were not being adequately answered. Many law enforcement agencies resist external civilian review boards, as they are frequently viewed as not having sufficient understanding of the problems in law enforcement. Proponents of civilian review boards frequently view police resistance as symbolic of the inability to obtain a fair investigation of citizen complaints. Due to the ease of seeking redress and the minor cost, many people who have been victimized by police misconduct frequently choose this method to seek help. However, even favorable decisions by civilian review boards generally cannot provide wronged civilians with damages.

Concerning ethical violations, police officers are simply not punished for ethical violations, unless of course, the violation can be also charged under one of the other methods addressed in this encyclopedia entry. Police organizations do not have professional conduct boards, as do doctors and lawyers, which investigate and punish members of their organizations for professional or ethical misconduct. Although there is the argument that such ethical and moral obligations should be binding upon police officers, unless a basis for prosecution can be found in one of the other methods of enforcement, there is no mechanism to compel a police officer to follow the precepts set in codes of ethics.

Definitely not the least important way to hold police officers accountable is by the civil rights lawsuit. Most civil rights suits are brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, which is the federal civil rights statute. This statute allows persons to bring suits against individual police officers and some political entities for civil rights violations. Some states have corresponding laws that allow civil rights suits under state law; however, most civil rights law suits against police officers are brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.

Individuals are the parties who bring civil rights lawsuits under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Such suits not only allow for the award of damages for civil rights violations, they can also yield equitable relief, whereby police officers and certain political entities can be enjoined from continuing to violate civil rights. Further, individuals whose rights have been violated can obtain declaratory relief, which is a statement that certain civil rights have been violated, even if no damages are awarded. Such declarations can serve to place police officers on notice as what misconduct will be recognized as illegal.

The Standards

As with any criminal case, the standard of proof is beyond a reasonable doubt. Police officers should not lose this protection under the U.S. Constitution when charged with a criminal act. The issues arise when the decision to prosecute is being made. Some critics hold the position that prosecutors tend to be overly deferential in the charging decision if the defendant is a police officer. As prosecutors have the sole discretion to decide to charge, it is not easy to show that the police have been given special treatment.

The civil standard of proof that applies to any tort or civil rights case is the preponderance of the evidence. As there is no gate-keeping function performed by a government official prior to the initiation of a lawsuit, such as with the prosecutor in a criminal case, it is easier to obtain relief and hold police officers accountable.

The standard of proof in an administrative proceeding is usually the preponderance of the evidence. However, as administrative proceedings are not subject to the rules of evidence or the rules of court procedure, the standard is quite flexible and is usually in favor of the law enforcement agency. Thus, police accountability may be more difficult to obtain in internal administrative proceedings.

The Relief

Whenever any person is wronged, it is only natural that justice is sought. Frequently, the focus of such a desire for justice is the wish for the offending police officer to be held accountable and punished. Frequently, even when a person who has been subjected to police misconduct is successful, he or she does not feel that justice was served, usually because the punishments imposed were mild. This is one of the reasons why independent tribunals are essential for a fair adjudication of when to hold police officers accountable for their misconduct.

Conclusion

In the context of race relations, it is vitally important that the process to hold police accountable is fair. This is especially true in recent years, as, for example, the issue of racial profiling in the context of law enforcement has arisen so many times.

Racial profiling occurs when police officers base their enforcement of the criminal law on race. This does not mean that any subsequent conviction necessarily has to be based on race, only that the actual investigation was conducted, at least in part, based on the race of the suspect. Examples of racial profiling include incidents in the southern United States in which non-White people driving on certain highways in expensive cars were stopped on suspicion of being involved in illegal drug trafficking. Or, in some cities in the Northeast, if an African American was driving a car and was spotted by the police in certain areas, he was stopped for no reason other than what has been called, ruefully, DWB—"Driving While Black." These are only two examples of how African Americans are treated with discrimination in the context of law enforcement. The literature available on police brutality toward African Americans is extensive, and the incidence of such abuse is not limited to any particular region of the country.

Despite the several avenues available for holding police officers accountable, there is a continuing view that they are, in fact, not being held fully accountable for their misconduct. If the process for holding police officers accountable is not fair and is not perceived as fair, then not only will respect for the criminal justice system fail, but efforts to address racial discrimination in the American criminal justice system will be ineffective.

William C. Plouffe, Jr.

See also Police Use of Force; Profiling, Racial: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives; Public Opinion, Police; Tennessee v. Garner; Tulsa, Oklahoma, Race Riot of 1921

Further Readings

- Braziller, G. (Ed.). (1972). The Knapp Commission report on police corruption. New York: Author.
- Human Rights Watch. (1998). Shielded from justice: Police brutality and accountability in the United States. Retrieved from <http://www.hrw.org/reports98/police>
- Maas, P. (1997). Serpico. London: Bloomsbury.
- Skolnick, J. H., & Fyfe, J. J. (1993). Above the law: Police and the excessive use of force. New York: The Free Press.

POLICE ACTION, CITIZENS' PREFERENCES

Different societies have different traditions and different needs; even within the same country, different constituents care about different issues.

Citizens' preferences are their choices between alternatives and their rank ordering of the importance of those alternatives. A preference serves as a cognitive marker that tells people how to interact with the various elements in their environment. Thus, preferences are stored in memory and drawn on when individuals make decisions. Within this context, citizens' preferences and attitudes are intricately related.

The United States is widely considered to be an advanced industrial democracy where classical liberalism has had the most visible and enduring influence on public policy and consequently on public institutions. Yet in some areas, citizens' ideas and beliefs about the proper roles and functions of governmental institutions have been given limited consideration by governmental institutions, particularly with respect to the role of the police. Minorities' enduring uneasiness toward the police, as highlighted by the attitudinal literature, continues to pose a significant obstacle in improving the police relations with minority citizens. This is likely attributable to police institutions ignoring what citizens, especially minorities, want. A failure to identify and respond to particular groups' preferences will continually be highlighted by dissatisfaction with the police. This entry examines the importance of citizens' preferences with regard to police action and the impact of racial differences in citizens' preferences for police action on the formation of their attitudes toward the police.

Citizens' Preferences and Their Impact on Attitudes

Citizens' preference refers to citizens' predisposition in favor of certain police actions over others and the level of importance citizens place on police actions and behaviors. Police action includes both policing functions, such as order maintenance, law enforcement, service, and constitutional guarantees, and police behavior, that is, how the police carry out these functions, for example, what levels of respect they demonstrate and what levels of force are used. Citizens have preferences with regard to police functions and how these functions are executed. When these preferences or hopes regarding police action are not fulfilled, the result is likely to be dissatisfaction with the police.

Preferences for how the police carry out their mission are dictated by both socialization and personal experience; Blacks' preferences may differ from those of Whites. Scholars argue that organizations have many tasks and functions, and each organization gives priority to certain functions over others. Organizational theorists argue that goal-based organizations, such as the police, will misrepresent the values of some constituents, but more importantly, such organizations will also view some constituents as more important than others. That is, some constituents' value preferences will count as more important than others, and these are the preferences that the organization will address. By ignoring or misrepresenting the preferences of some constituents, the organization will experience conflicts with its environment and will also be the subject of conflicting and diverse evaluation among its audiences. In particular, police organizations often tend to focus on meeting majority expectations and fail to address minority expectations.

It is reasonable to think that preferences differ among groups in society, given that different groups may well have different needs—group needs may not be monolithic. If these needs are not met, these groups will be unhappy. If minority dissatisfaction with the police is to be addressed, police action needs to address the preferences of all citizens, not just those who actively participate in the political process, or the majority.

Racial Differences and Citizens' Preferences

Research in other areas of policing, such as domestic violence, shows that much dissatisfaction with the police is grounded in police failure to act within the frame of what citizens want. The research has identified many correlates of those attitudes but has not investigated the impact of differential preferences for police action. Analyzing the desired connections between what citizens want and what the police do is important in bridging the dissatisfaction gap evident between minorities and White citizens. There is reason to believe that different audiences served by the police hold differing preferences as to what they want the police to do or how they would like the police to handle situations. It is possible that there could be racial variation in preferences for police action and behavior and that these differences in preferences explain racial differences in attitudes toward the police. It could be argued that when citizens' expectations, based on their preferences, are not met—that is, when groups' preferences are not minimally satisfied—then they will be dissatisfied with the police. Police organizations often tend to focus on meeting majority expectations and fail to address minority expectations. That minority citizens continue to have less-favorable attitudes toward the police compared to Whites may be a result of the failure of the police to address minority preferences and the needs that underlie them.

Research Direction

A question that has yet to be explored thoroughly is whether minorities and Whites differ with respect to their preferences for police action. Although studies have shown that ethnicity is a consistent variable that is primarily responsible for variations in satisfaction and attitudes, the research to date has paid scant attention to the notion that fundamental differences may exist across social groups with regard to underlying preferences for police action. Demographic group preferences are not monolithic, and it is reasonable to argue that sizable segments of the society hold divergent perspectives on the police mission. The differences in assessment of the police that are evident in the literature may be related to racial differences in preferences for police action—both what the police do and how the police carry out the various roles and functions. It is possible that when preferences of a segment of the society are not met, there may be the potential for disenchantment with the police—this is an area of research that needs further exploration.

Denise D. Nation

See also Community Policing; Public Opinion, Police

Further Readings

Brown, B., & Benedict, W. R. (2002). Perceptions of the police: Past findings, methodological issues, conceptual issues & policy implications. Policing: An International Journal of Police Strategy & Management, 25(3), 543–580.

- Chandek, M. S. (1999). Race, expectations, and evaluations of police performance: An empirical assessment. Policing: An International Journal of Police Strategy & Management, 22(4), 674–695.
- Druckman, J. N., & Lupin, A. (2000). Preference formation. Annual Review of Political Science, 3(1), 1–24.
- Nation, D. D. (2008). An exploratory study of racial variations in preferences for police work. Unpublished doctoral dissertation, University of Cincinnati, Ohio.

POLICE CORRUPTION

Police corruption may be viewed as a distinct mode of police transgression, which involves the misuse of police power for officers' benefit or managerial advantage. Police corruption activities include taking bribes in exchange for not reporting incidents of crimes by drug syndicates, traffic violators, and prostitution rings and other illegal activities such as involvements in forging evidence against defendants, false arrest, false confession, intimidation, and police brutality. Officers themselves may be involved in illegal distribution of illicit drugs for financial and personal gains. These behaviors are generally not reported because of the police code of silence rooted in secrecy.

Historically, African Americans, and in some cases, Latinos, have suffered soaring levels of lethal force by the police, bogus arrests, harassment, and maltreatment.

When compared to many other criminological pathologies in vogue today—violent crimes, white-collar crimes, terrorism, gangs, prison overcrowding, illegal immigration, environmental crimes, and drug syndicates—police corruption generally lags behind on the radar screen of criminologists, policymakers, and the public. However, this form of criminogenic pathology thrives in a democracy and affects the everyday lives of the populace, especially the minority population. Surprisingly, theoretical criminology has not focused suitable attention on the malady of police corruption as it has done in other areas of criminological themes. The reason may be that the symptoms of police corruption do not offer fascinating theoretical questions. Additionally, police officers are ordinary human beings perceived to be providing essential services to society and working in jobs that are professed to be dangerous. Moreover, such corruption is characterized by multifaceted incidents that make it a difficult target for scrutiny. Politically, the trend toward a “get tough” philosophy may blind politicians from objectively examining the pertinent issues of police corruption and misconduct, which come in different forms with different meanings.

As in other areas of human endeavor such as corporations, criminal gangs, school classes, and some dictatorial regimes, secrecy in policing maintains group identity and supports camaraderie among members of the group. Preservation of secrecy can foster corruption in a police organization and acts as an elemental rule among the cadre or a tightly knit group of professionals. This is especially true in the area of the narcotics trade, where police officers have been recorded to have engaged in cocaine deals by distributing the illegal product or coalescing with drug dealers for profit. Individual officers, as well as groups of police officers, have been caught and prosecuted, under the rubric of internal and external corruption, in cities such as New York, New Orleans, Washington, D.C., and Los Angeles.

Internal and External Corruption

Although the distinction between internal and external corruption may be blurred because of the interrelatedness of official actions, internal corruption occurs when more than one police officer agrees to participate in illegal activities within a police department. On the other hand, external corruption occurs when one or more police officers within a police department agree to engage in illegal activities with the public or third parties. Assuredly, internal corruption in a police department refers to cases of alleged corruption involving police officers or other officials of police organization involved in corrupt practices, such as fraud, bribery, compulsion or coercion, collusion, blackmail or extortion, or any kind of abuse or misuse of authority. One contemporary example comes from Mexico, a country that has become the cardinal exporter of illicit drugs to the United States. Mexico supplies narcotics, including Colombian cocaine, through various smuggling strategies to the United States. Mexico also supplies marijuana to the Americas. Mexican drug cartels (the Gulf cartel, the Sinaloa cartel, the Tijuana cartel, and the Juarez cartel) are able to accomplish this task because there is a market for narcotics in the United States and because U.S. officials have been unable to control the border regions. Through corrupt practices, the drug cartels, in tandem, have successfully bribed police, border officials, and other government officials for easy drug traffic. Because some police departments are underfunded and officers underpaid, they may fall prey to the cartels' lure of money. Additionally, departments need money to fund their arsenal to better fight the well-funded cartels' often superior resources.

In the United States, examples of internal police corruption are plentiful. Some criminologists have labeled as "petit apartheid" the overpolicing of Blacks in urban ghettos where police officers, during "ride arounds," have placed Black males in their cars and beaten them without charging them for crimes. One typical and popular example of internal corruption in this manner was the 1991 videotaped beating of Rodney King in Los Angeles. This experience illustrated to the international community that police brutality in the ghettos continues to inflict deadly damage on the physical bodies of America's minority poor and racial groups. In another horrendous incident, Abner Louima in New York City was arrested in a scuffle outside a Brooklyn nightspot in 1977 and was taken to the 70th precinct stationhouse. While he was there, an officer named Volpe shamelessly and brutally sodomized Louima with a broomstick, resulting in internal injuries requiring surgical repair. Later, Louima sued the New York City Police Department, insisting that its officers had conspired to create a wall of secrecy and lies to obstruct justice. Punitive force as envisioned by the courts must be used by police only if the lives of the officers are in danger or the lives of civilians are threatened. To put it in another way, justification for the use of force must be based on the rule of law, the arresting officer's safety, and the protection of human life.

Police officers are expected to maintain the highest ethical standards in the performance of their official duties. External corruption results when police officers, in the capacity of their authorized roles, conspire with third parties, such as drug dealers, for personal gain. External corruption usually includes bribery of the police by violators of the traffic laws, settlement of the police by individuals who consistently contravene the criminal law for monetary gain, or officers' receipt of discounts and favors from businesses in the course of their duties.

Beyond excessive force, slightly more than a decade or so ago, drug incidents involving the police in Miami, Florida, received extensive media coverage. The events involved drug-related corruption and large sums of money. In what is generally referred to as the "Miami River Cops" case, about 100 police officers were mixed up in multimillion-dollar drug dealings with third parties. Indeed, some of the officers were charged with planting evidence such as guns, manipulating evidence, or covering up crimes by others. For all intents and purposes, the officers were allegedly accused of shooting and killing suspects and fabricating evidence to cover up their own misconduct. Some of the police officers were fired, sentenced to prison, reprimanded, arrested, or suspended for robbing cocaine dealers of cash and dope and for shooting unarmed young Black men. This scandal generated a lack of trust and confidence in the Miami police department.

Reportedly, the chief of police in Miami requested that the U.S. Department of Justice conduct a study aimed at combating corruption in police departments. The department's study, conducted by the International Association of Chiefs of Police, identified a number of important areas for battling corruption. These include that the leadership of the police department must provide a strong direction that corruption should not be part of the police culture, an emphasis on police accountability and integrity, the monitoring and evaluating of police actions, and the development of training manuals about police corruption and strategies to control it.

Analysis of Police Corruption

Police corruption is a symptom as well as a source of dysfunction within a police department that operates within a democracy. Corruption leads to inefficiency of a police department and creates distrust and lack of confidence between the police and the citizens that they police. In a democracy, the police must operate based on the principles of good policing, which includes the total observance of the rule of law in the discharge of official police duties. Police officers who take bribes, plant evidence, forge documents, and use excessive force against individuals are in violation of the democratic principles that govern their duties. Corruption breaks the relation between collective decision making and citizens' desire to help the police solve crimes. Moreover, a corrupt officer undermines the democratic capacities of the relations between the police and the community. Corruption threatens proper police–community relations and creates hostility between police and citizens.

Each police department must take seriously any act of abuse or misuse by officers for personal enrichment by establishing committees that report directly to the internal affairs arm for disciplinary and investigative actions. To properly battle the problem of corruption, there should be good governance that emphasizes transparency, predictability, accountability, responsibility, and disclosure. At the same time, it is important to recognize that not all alleged accusations of corruption are true. This means that there must be an objective investigation of all allegations prior to any official actions against officers. The work of police officers is dangerous, and some citizens may dislike police officers generally—leading to false accusations. Where prudent investigation determines culpability and the effective weeding out of corrupt officers from the department, punishment must follow in order to prevent recurrences of such incidents as that of the Miami River Cops discussed earlier.

Finally, society's need to control police corruption calls for a sustained and dedicated effort to reform the unwritten law of police secrecy. The literature suggests that the norm of the police code of silence emerges from occupational needs and is so strong that officers will break the law in order to preserve it. Although it may prove exceedingly difficult to eliminate the wall of secrecy from policing, police chiefs and commissioners need to take the initiative by officially discouraging the practice of secrecy within police culture and by continual reminders of the high ethical and moral standards the public expects police officers to uphold.

Ihekwoaba D. Omwudiwe and Chibueze W. Omwudiwe

See also Mollen Commission; Police Accountability; Police Use of Force; Rampart Investigation

Further Readings

- Barlow, D. E., & Barlow, M. H. (2000). Police in a multicultural society: An American story. Prospect Heights, IL: Waveland Press.
- Carter, D. L. (2002). The police and the community. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall.
- Georges-Abeyie, D. (1984). The criminal justice system and Blacks. New York: Clark Boardman.
- Holloway, B. (2002). Police corruption. In A. J. McKee (Ed.), International encyclopedia of justice studies. Retrieved from http://www.iejs.com/Policing/police_corruption.htm
- Warren, M. E. (2004). What does corruption mean in a democracy? American Journal of Political Science, 48, 328–343.
- Westley, W. A. (1956). Secrecy and the police. Social Forces, 34, 254–257.

POLICE USE OF FORCE

Police officers act as agents of social control in a society. As such, one of their most readily distinguishing characteristics is their lawful authorization to use coercive force during the conduct of their duties. While a society gives law enforcement officers the authority to impose force on its citizens for the sake of public safety and protection, at the same time the officers have obligations to use their coercive powers legitimately. The issue of race takes on importance because alienation and distrust of police by particular groups in the community can emerge as a consequence of improper use of police force. This can have negative effects for both the police and the community.

Most broadly defined, police use of force involves any type of physical control or restraint imposed upon a member of the public. Use of force may occur during arrests, in the course of interventions in ongoing assaults, or in crowd control situations. Officers use various levels of force to protect themselves or others, to sustain an apprehension or to maintain control of a situation. Police use of force includes a range of responses, such as establishing a physical presence; giving verbal commands; administering weaponless holds, punches, or kicks; using chemical irritant sprays, batons or stun guns, and lethal force. The majority of arrest situations do not involve physical force, and most of those uses are weaponless applications of force. However, some of the most controversial issues associated with law enforcement revolve around the use of force, particularly when the public or media perceive that the force was unnecessary or excessive. Force is considered excessive when an officer uses more than is needed to maintain control of a situation, induce compliance of a suspect, or sustain an apprehension. Excessive force by police can result in citizen distrust and outrage, as was made clear by the overwhelming public reaction to the 1991 beating of Rodney King by Los Angeles police officers.

When Police Use Force

A 2001 study conducted by the International Association of Chiefs of Police (IACP) resulted in several key findings. The report was based on data collected nationwide from 1994 to 2000. The principal finding was that overall, police rarely use force. The study reports that police use force 3.6 times per 10,000 calls for service, or less than 1% of the time. The report noted that this finding is consistent with other studies.

The IACP study also reported that complaints of excessive use of force by police were comparatively rare, with 750 complaints being registered out of over 174,000 calls for service incidents, or 0.42% prevalence.

Other findings of the study were that arrest situations were the most common conditions in which force was used, followed by disturbances and traffic stops. The study also reported that situations in which the suspect was under the influence of alcohol or drugs were most likely to result in use of police force. Finally, the study stated that in incidents where racial descriptions of the officers and suspects were reported, 44% involved White officers using force on African American suspects, 39% involved White officers using force on White suspects, 7% involved African American officers using force on African American subjects, and 3% involved African American officers using force on White subjects.

Race and Police Use of Deadly Force

Although the issue of White officers using deadly force against minority suspects is a controversial and highly charged issue, research by James Fyfe suggests that although minorities are more likely to be shot by police, they are also more likely to attack police with weapons. The study also reported that minority police officers are more likely to use deadly force than are White officers. This finding might be partially explained by patrol assignments: Minority officers might be more apt to be assigned to crime-ridden urban sectors. Another study by Fyfe, conducted in Memphis, reported that police were twice as likely to use deadly force against African American property offenders as against White property offenders. Therefore, the issue of racially biased use of deadly force remains a controversial issue for scholars, police officers, and citizens.

The Continuum of Force

For the use of force by police to be considered proper, officers must act in accordance with the law and with departmental policies. One of the standard requirements for officers to follow is the force continuum, which sets forth progressive levels of permissible force to be used by officers in response to suspect actions. Law enforcement officers must base their actions on the level of resistance offered by the suspect. Although there are different models of the force continuum, most share the basic progressive use of escalating levels of force as determined by levels of suspect resistance. In general, officers begin with the least amount of force needed to control the suspect or a situation and progress to higher levels as necessary. The lowest level of force is officer presence, or command presence. The officer's projection of authority through posture, identification as a law enforcement officer, uniform, stance, and physical presence is sufficient to be considered the first level of force. The next level of force is the use of command voice (or verbal force), in which the officer gives spoken directives to the suspect. An example of this might be instructing a suspect to halt aggression, come out of hiding, or to remain in one area. The Department of Justice notes that verbal directives should first be used to attempt to control a situation if feasible. The next step, less-than-lethal force, includes a variety of tactics that can be further subdivided into the use of hands (compliance holds, blocking, striking, etc.), chemical irritant weapons, impact weapons (collapsible or fixed batons), Taser weapons, canines, or less-lethal projectiles such as rubber bullets. These less-than-lethal measures are used to control physically combative suspects, prevent the escape of fleeing felons, and protect the officer and others. It should be noted that these measures should be considered as “less-lethal,” not “nonlethal,” because they can carry varying degrees of risk of accidental death to the suspect. An example of this would be positional asphyxia, in which a suspect who is “hog-tied” with hands and feet restrained together can suffocate, especially if the police officers apply weight to the suspect’s back for prolonged periods. The highest level of force, lethal, refers to force by firearm. This level of force is authorized only to protect the officer or others from imminent threat to life or from gravely serious physical injury. This extends to stopping a fleeing suspect who poses such immediate threat to others. Although this level of force is most commonly used against suspects who offer a threat with a firearm, the reasonableness of the officer’s perception is the key point in determining whether this use of force is proper or not.

Police training authorities and scholars note that every use-of-force situation is unique and that agencies should supplement their continuum model with written policies. The Department of Justice advises that law enforcement agencies develop written policies not only for the levels of force set forth in the continuum model but also for other circumstances, such as firing at moving vehicles. The force continuum provides a structure for officers to escalate or de-escalate their own actions, as dictated by the actions of the suspect, but the Department of Justice notes that the particular circumstances of each situation must be taken into account by the officer. It should also be noted that officers are not required to exhaust all initial levels of force before progressing to higher levels if the actions of the suspect warrant them. For example, an officer conducting a traffic stop in which the driver jumps out of the car with a gun can reasonably jump directly to lethal force without first going through the lower levels.

Federal policy on the use of lethal force includes several components. Besides the requirement that lethal force be reserved for suspects who pose the threat of death or great bodily injury to the officer or others, it also requires a verbal warning to the suspect before using deadly force, as long as doing so would not subject the officer or a citizen to greater danger. This policy also forbids the use of warning shots and prohibits firing at a moving vehicle to stop it (unless there is an additional threat to life posed by the vehicle’s occupants).

The Legal Environment

Two important Supreme Court decisions that apply to the police use of force are Tennessee v. Garner (1985) and Graham v. Connor (1989). The first decision applies to the use of deadly force in stopping fleeing felons. In Garner, a 15-year-old unarmed burglary suspect, Edwin Garner, was fatally shot by Memphis police after attempting to flee the officers by climbing a 6-foot-high fence. The Memphis officers did not believe that the youth was armed and were acting under a Tennessee statute that “the officer may use all the necessary means to effect the arrest” of a fleeing or forcibly resisting criminal suspect. Garner’s father claimed that his son’s constitutional rights had been violated and filed suit against the city. The action eventually made its way to the U.S. Supreme Court, which ruled that police apprehension of a suspect constituted a seizure under the Fourth Amendment and must therefore be “reasonable.” The Court further stated that the use of deadly force to seize nondangerous fleeing felons was not reasonable when balanced against the suspect’s rights. The key finding of the decision was that police may not use lethal force to stop fleeing suspects unless the suspect “poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.”

In Graham v. Connor, the Court addressed the subjective idea of reasonableness as it applies to the use of police force and in determining if the use of force was excessive. This resulted in the establishment of the “objective reasonableness” standard. In this case, Graham, a man with diabetes, was suffering from an insulin reaction. He and a friend stopped at a grocery store to buy orange juice to offset the effect. Seeing a long line of customers in front of him, Graham left the store and returned to the vehicle to ask his friend to drive him somewhere else. Police officer Connor thought that Graham's behavior was suspicious and stopped the men to investigate further. Connor had the men step out of the car, considered Graham to be acting strangely, and the confusion of the situation escalated into the use of physical force by officers on Graham. Graham sustained multiple injuries, including a broken foot. Graham claimed that police used excessive force. The Supreme Court eventually heard the case and ruled in favor of Officer Connor. The Court decided that claims of police use of excessive force must be examined by the Fourth Amendment standard of reasonableness and that cases should be determined by how a reasonable police officer might act in a certain situation. The Court ruled further that the motivations or thoughts of the officer were not to be considered, only the officer's actions in light of the facts and circumstances of the particular situation. The Court further noted that police officers are required to make decisions in the face of quickly unfolding events. The objective reasonableness standard remains the benchmark by which police use of force is analyzed.

Excessive Force and Police Brutality

Any force that exceeds the amount necessary to control a suspect or to maintain order in a situation is considered to be excessive and is judged by the objective reasonableness standard of how a hypothetical, reasonably competent officer would act under the same circumstances. Police brutality, unlike excessive force, occurs when there is evidence of malice and intent to harm on the part of the officers. Although unnecessarily pushing or striking a suspect in the course of an arrest could be deemed excessive force, such actions would be judged without looking at the officer's intent or motivations. In the case of brutality, the officer's intent and motivations are relevant. The distinction between these two becomes clear when one considers the case of Abner Louima as an illustration of police brutality.

Louima was a Haitian immigrant who was arrested in 1997 for disorderly conduct during a fracas outside a New York City nightclub. He reported that while in custody he was forced into the station restroom and sodomized with a toilet plunger by one officer while another held him down. Louima's injuries to his rectum, intestine, and bladder were extensive and required several surgical procedures. Officer Justin Volpe later admitted to the assault, and Officer Charles Schwarz was also convicted for participating. Several other officers were convicted for related charges.

Legal Consequences

Police agencies and individual officers are subject to a range of legal consequences, both civil and criminal, for excessive force and brutality. Individual officers who use excessive force or exercise brutality are subject to criminal prosecutions, as in the Louima case. They are also subject to civil lawsuits from citizens who claim that their rights have been violated. Agencies, municipalities, states, and the federal government can be held liable for the actions of law enforcement officers if it can be demonstrated that these bodies were negligent in hiring, assigning supervising, or training them. Louima was awarded $8.7 million in his civil lawsuit against the city and the police officers' union.

Officers can also be charged in federal court for violating the constitutional rights of citizens. In the case of the 1991 beating of Rodney King, the officers involved were acquitted of criminal charges in state court (with the jury being unable to decide on a count against one officer). However, in federal court, Sergeant Stacey Koon and Officer Laurence Powell were found guilty of violating King's constitutional rights and were sentenced to 30 months in a federal correctional camp.

In another case, three White Detroit police officers were tried for the murder of Malice Green. In November 1992, Green, an unemployed African American steelworker, refused to exit his vehicle when questioned by undercover officers Larry Nevers and Walter Budzyn. The officers summoned backup and dragged Green from the car, striking him with their flashlights. Five additional officers arrived, including Robert Lessnau, who also began beating Green. Green later died from his injuries. The officers were later tried in criminal court. Nevers and Budzyn were convicted of murder, although Nevers's murder conviction was later overturned and he was subsequently found guilty of involuntary manslaughter. Lessnau was found not guilty of aggravated assault.

Clearly, when officers make the decision to use any level force in a particular situation, their choices of action may come under intense scrutiny by the media, the public, the police department, the judiciary, and the legislature. The right of police officers to protect themselves and their obligations to public safety and the criminal apprehension mission are counterbalanced against citizens' rights against unlawful seizure and to equal protection under the law. When officers employ deadly force, they also may face other consequences for their actions.

Deadly Force: Other Consequences

The use of deadly force by officers can have effects beyond legal or agency disciplinary action against them. Police use of deadly force against suspects is relatively rare. One source reports that an average of 600 suspects a year are killed by police, while twice as many are shot and wounded.

Officers who do employ deadly force often suffer traumatic emotional effects from their actions. Police agencies are now developing support systems to counsel officers and assist them in dealing with their feelings of depression and stress. One particular phenomenon that takes a devastating emotional toll on officers is "suicide by cop," in which suicidal individuals force an officer to use deadly force against them by posing a lethal threat to police or others. One source reports that as much as 10% of police shootings in Los Angeles could be considered as suicide-by-cop incidents.

The use of force by police continues to present controversial issues with respect to the nature of the relationship between law enforcement and society. Perceptions of discriminatory brutality or excessive force against particular groups based on racial or ethnic biases can have harmful effects on both the community and the police who serve it. The objective reasonableness standard provides guidance for judicial decision making when addressing excessive force suits, but true understanding of the reality of each set of circumstances of officer-citizen force situations may be difficult to discern. The force continuum also provides officers with a tool to use when making decisions about their actions, but training should also focus on descending the levels of the continuum ladder, when appropriate, in response to suspect resistance levels. Although the Supreme Court recognizes the difficulty officers face in making split-second decisions about how to apply force, law enforcement agents will continue to face public scrutiny in high-profile cases of egregious brutality or excessive force.

David R. Champion

See also Brown v. Mississippi; King, Rodney; Los Angeles Race Riots of 1992; Police Accountability

Further Readings

- Birzer, M. L., & Roberson, C. (2007). Policing: Today and tomorrow. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall.
- Crank, J. P. (2003). Understanding police culture (2nd ed.). Cincinnati, OH: Anderson.
- Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989). Retrieved from <http://caselaw.lp.findlaw.com/scripts/getcase.pl?court=us&vol=490&invol=386>
- International Association of Chiefs of Police. (2001). Police use of force in America. Retrieved from <http://www.theiacp.org/documents/pdfs/Publications/2001useofforce.pdf>
- Schmallegger, F. (2007). Criminal justice today: An introductory text for the 21st century (9th ed.). Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall.
- Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985). Retrieved from <http://www.augustana.edu/users/Podehnel/cases/Garner%20ed.htm>
- U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics. (1999). Use of force by police: Overview of national and local data (Report No. NCJ 176330). Retrieved from <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/abstract/ufbponld.htm>

POLITICAL PRISONERS

The concept of political prisoners is one that is hopelessly trapped in definitional nebulosity and falls within the scope of issues related to the infringement of basic human rights. The problem of defining the term political prisoners is related to several factors, and lacking a standard legal definition, the term has been employed in a variety of differing contexts. In view of several international agreements expressly prohibiting behavior that falls within a colloquial understanding of the concept, several examples of political prisoners throughout history are highlighted in this entry. Finally, the role of nongovernmental organizations in tracking and assisting political prisoners is addressed.

Defining Political Prisoners

Defining political prisoners in a strictly legal sense is, at present, a task that is simply not possible. In a 1961 letter that served as a catalyst for the establishment of the international human rights organization Amnesty International, Peter Benenson coined the term prisoner of conscience to describe two Portuguese students who had been sentenced to 7-year prison terms for the alleged “crime” of making a simple toast to freedom in spite of the dictatorial Salazar government in power at the time. Since then, the terms political prisoner and prisoner of conscience have been used interchangeably, although most agree that the latter expressly refers to dissident prisoners who neither condone nor advocate personal violence.

The specific legal definition of what constitutes a political prisoner is elusive, as it has been used in many contexts. This is clearly indicated even when limited to one specific nation-state. For example, amid the turmoil of the civil rights movement in the United States during the 1960s, the term political prisoner was used to denote those who had been imprisoned for their opposition to a government that supported a system of racial segregation. The following decade saw the internment of those who conscientiously opposed U.S. expansion of the Vietnam War, and as a result both AWOL (“absent without leave”) draftees and concerned protesters were arrested and subsequently declared themselves political prisoners. To add further confusion, there was yet another subsequent movement in the United States, which recognized the disparate rates at which minority groups were sentenced to incarceration, and there was a complementary push to define all criminal offenders as political prisoners in light of what appeared to be a tacitly racist government agenda.

What all conceptualizations and working definitions of political prisoners have in common is their acknowledgment of the importance of power relations, specifically between dissidents and agents of governmental authority or ruling elites; political prisoners stand as symbolic representations of attempted challenges to the status quo. Whatever ideological context that challenge is embedded within—be it racial, economic, political, or religious—a standard definition of political crimes (and hence political prisoners) must differentiate them from the activities and behaviors of common criminals. Some scholars have specified the criteria by which political prisoners can be differentiated from common criminals: The former are involved in some type of group struggle against ruling elites, whereas the latter’s activities typically involve an element of satisfying self-interests.

Unfortunately, it is not possible to classify the concept of political prisoners as purely political or legal, as it incorporates elements of both aspects in its nature. Consequently, standard legal definitions have remained elusive. Despite this lack of legal clarity, historical and contemporary examples of political prisoners underscore the fact that individuals have been sanctioned by legal systems and imprisoned by political regimes not for their violation of codified laws but for their thoughts and ideas that have fundamentally challenged existing power relations.

Some legal institutions have attempted to define the term political prisoners, most commonly within the context of a particular country or regime. For example, the U.S. Congressional Executive Commission on China defines a political prisoner as any individual who is detained for exercising “his or her human rights under international law, such as peaceable assembly, freedom of religion, freedom of association, free expression including the freedom to advocate peaceable social or political change, and to criticize government policy or government officials.” The sweeping set of behaviors that potentially fall within this definitional umbrella make it difficult to differentiate the behavior of the political prisoner from that of the criminal seditionist, given that the nature of the dissident’s activity is a matter of interpretation.

Despite this particular formal working definition, it appears unlikely that any ground will be gained in the near future with respect to codifying a standard legal definition of political prisoners for the following reasons. First, a legal definition is hindered by the logical notion that one is ascribed the status of being a political prisoner only after capture; prior to that, potential political prisoners may be considered dissidents, revolutionaries, social reformers, or radical thinkers, depending upon the nature of their activities and how their activities are interpreted. Second, a political trial is neither necessary nor sufficient in producing a political prisoner, as there are numerous examples of political prisoners interned without trial or even without charges to respond to. Third, the nature of the behavior that leads to political imprisonment is indefinable, as authorities have often justified internment as necessary to protecting state security without providing clarification as to how the behavior of the political prisoner presented a challenge to the maintenance of such. To make matters worse, in some instances political prisoners have been interned for mere suspicion of activity deemed questionable by ruling elites. Fourth, government denial is an unfortunate characteristic of political imprisonment, much to the detriment of post hoc legal codification. The political prisoner often exists in a legal quagmire without access to representation within a state apparatus that expressly denies his or her existence, where cruel and inhumane methods of punishment and internment can proceed without any realistic hope of protective oversight or intervention. Despite the lack of a standard legal definition of political prisoner, nongovernmental organizations like Amnesty International track the status of political prisoners worldwide and, with the assistance of legal scholars on a case-by-case basis, determine whether prisoners meet their criteria of political prisoners.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights and Political Prisoners

The mere existence of contemporary political prisoners highlights the fact that states holding them are acting in disaccord with several major international humanitarian agreements. Most relevant is the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which was adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in December of 1948. While not legally binding, the declaration was intended to serve as “a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations.” Several articles are of particular relevance to the issue of political prisoners. Article 5 states that “no one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.” Because political prisoners are often held under conditions of secrecy, without independent oversight or restraint, reports of their treatment have been expectedly deplorable.

To follow suit, Article 6 of the Universal Declaration states that “everyone has the right to recognition everywhere as a person before the law.” Political prisoners are often held on trumped-up charges or no charges at all, effectively denied this right. In addition, related to the issue of political prisoners are cases of forced “disappearances,” where those opposed to ruling elites have been made to physically and legally vanish without governmental acknowledgment of their detention. A practice that historians believe began with the Nazi regime, “disappeared” persons are denied even the right to legally exist and be labeled a political prisoner.

In similar fashion, Article 9 of the Universal Declaration states that “no one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention or exile.” Although most countries recognize the offenses of treason and sedition, these categories of offenses do not capture the essence of political crimes that fall under the rubric of voicing opinion contrary to that of ruling elites. Given the lack of a standard legal definition of political crimes in most countries, political prisoners are often faced with either answering to charges that are manufactured to fit the situation or being held without cause, depending on the sociolegal structure of the government or regime in power.

Of particular relevance to political prisoners is Article 18, which guarantees the right to “freedom of thought, conscience and religion.” As has been noted, one of the hallmarks of historical and contemporary examples of political prisoners is the challenge they represent to the status quo. The free expression of contrary and dissenting opinion is not a legitimate rationale for internment, despite vague and clichéd state concerns for national security.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights influenced the human rights provisions of the subsequent Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe (commonly referred to as the “Helsinki accord”). Signed in 1975 by 35 countries, the pact holds that participating states “will respect human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief, for all without distinction to race, sex, language or religion.” Following its adoption, some of the major signatories to the pact have been charged by human rights organizations with holding political prisoners, interned for little more than exercising their right to differ ideologically with those in power.

Historical Examples of Political Prisoners

Perhaps the earliest record of political imprisonment involved the famous Greek philosopher and educator Socrates, imprisoned in ancient times for the crime of allegedly “poisoning” the minds of Grecian youth through his incisive and epistemic critique of Athenian social and political life. Historians affirm another early example of political imprisonment lay in the internment of Joan of Arc following her opposition to the ruling Normans/English, who convicted her, via faux trial, for heresy.

Modern examples of political prisoners can be divided into several categories depending upon the type of opposition they present to ruling elites—be it along racial, religious, economic, or political lines (to mention a few). In the United States, the modern era of political prisoners began on December 1, 1955, when Rosa Parks refused to relinquish her seat on a Birmingham, Alabama, public bus. Her patent refusal to accept legislative policy that held African Americans in a position of inferiority resulted in only one night of confinement, but it set off a civil rights movement that would see thousands revolt and face punishment for railing against governmental policies viewed as fundamentally racist.

Perhaps the most famous of political prisoners associated with the civil rights movement in the United States was Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., who was imprisoned in October 1960 for attempting to receive service at a segregated lunch counter. His detention on trumped-up charges related to a minor traffic offense was intended to conceal governmental disdain for his activities, which were aimed at challenging existing racial hierarchies. A subsequent internment for participating in a nonviolent demonstration resulted in the publication of the “Letter From a Birmingham City Jail” in April 1963, one of the most important historical documents penned by a modern political prisoner.

Nelson Mandela represents another example of a former political prisoner interned for his resistance to racial hierarchies. Although not completely resigned to using nonviolent means, Mandela was interned for 27 years for fighting the government-supported system of apartheid in South Africa. His imprisonment set the stage for his eventual role as president of South Africa, proving that, however improbable, political prisoners can use their status to fundamentally challenge and alter existing racial and social power relations.

Political prisoners have also been interned in the United States for acts of omission, particularly when expressing an ideology of pacifism or unwillingness to comply with governmental policy advocating violence. Conscientious objectors of the U.S.-led Vietnam War faced either court-martial or ostracization to neutral countries to avoid facing imprisonment for failing to abide by the will of a ruling class that had decided war was the appropriate course for promoting democracy.

An extreme example of political imprisonment can be found in the sad history of the Cambodian revolution, led by the dictatorial government of Pol Pot. Those who even tacitly denied the legitimacy of the Khmer Rouge’s agricultural revolution were interned in “reeducation” facilities or killed outright, including those who were viewed as potentially hostile to the regime, such as academics, urban dwellers, and bureaucrats.

Conclusion

Amnesty International is the most powerful and visible opponent of political imprisonment on the global stage and has quixotically attempted to track and provide support for political prisoners throughout the world. Committed to assisting only prisoners of conscience who advocated nonviolent methods of dissent, the organization maintains registers of political prisoners for most of the countries of the world who intern such populations. Amnesty International orchestrates mass letter-writing campaigns to appeal for the release of political prisoners, incarcerated for their beliefs, worldwide.

Douglas J. Dallier

See also Abu-Jamal, Mumia; Black Panther Party; Davis, Angela; Jackson, George; Peltier, Leonard; Sentencing; Wrongful Convictions

Further Readings

- Becker, T. L. (Ed.). (1971). Political trials. Indianapolis, IN: Bobbs-Merrill.
- Benenson, P. (1961, May 28). The forgotten prisoners. The Observer Weekend Review.
- Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe: Final Act*. (1975). Retrieved from http://www.osce.org/documents/mcs/1975/08/4044_en.pdf
- Congressional-Executive Commission on China. (2004, November 5). Political prisoner database. Retrieved June 15, 2008, from <http://www.cecc.gov/pages/victims/databasefaq.php>
- Goodell, C. (1973). Political prisoners in America. New York: Random House.
- Morsink, J. (1999). Universal Declaration of Human Rights: Origins, drafting, and intent. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Sobel, L. A. (Ed.). (1978). Political prisoners: A world report. New York: Facts on File.

POWELL V. ALABAMA

The 1932 case of Powell v. State of Alabama was the first of three U.S. Supreme Court cases (Powell; Patterson v. State of Alabama, 1935; and Norris v. State of Alabama, 1935) that arose as a result of events beginning on March 25, 1931, in Alabama. Nine African American males ranging in age from 13 to 20 were arrested for allegedly raping two White females, Victoria Price and Ruby Bates, while hopping a ride without fare on a train through Alabama on its way to Tennessee. This entry describes the initial events and the Court's reasoning in Powell v. Alabama. In their ruling, the Court threw out the convictions of the men, who came to be known as the Scottsboro Boys; however, they were subsequently retried and convicted.

Arrest and Trial

Accounts of the events indicate that a fight broke out between a number of African American males and a group of seven White males, resulting in six of the White males being thrown off the train. When the train reached the town of Paint Rock, Alabama, reports of rapes by the African American men had already been wired ahead. Authorities took the men into custody, and they were brought to the county seat of Scottsboro where a mob was already gathered. The presiding judge had arranged for the militia to transport, safeguard, and provide courtroom security during the proceedings due to the hostility and negative overall sentiment of the local public.

The men were indicted on rape charges 6 days after their arrest. The judge presiding over the pretrial proceedings had appointed all the members of the bar to represent the defendants for the purpose of arraigning the defendants. Pleas of "not guilty" were entered into the record. The men were held pending their trial, which began literally less than 2 weeks following their arrest. Reports indicate that they did not have extensive contact with legal representation or family members prior to trial.

The nine men were tried on rape charges in three separate trials, each of which was dispatched within a single day. All were convicted of rape, despite the lack of physical evidence, failure to provide due process, and unconvincing testimony from the two women who had made the accusations. The jury determined the punishment, which could have ranged from 10 years in prison to death. A mistrial was declared in the case of the youngest defendant, Roy Wright, because the jury had held out for the death penalty even though the prosecution had asked only for a life sentence because of his age. The remaining defendants were sentenced to death. The International Labor Defense, which was a legal arm of the Communist Party of the United States, came to the legal aid of the men. After national and international protests, the cases were appealed to the Alabama Supreme Court. The attorney general of Alabama argued the case at the Alabama Supreme Court, where his father sat as one of the seven justices. The Alabama State Supreme Court upheld seven of the eight verdicts on appeal.

The Supreme Court's Ruling

The case was appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court on the grounds that the defendants were denied due process and equal protection of the law as guaranteed in the Fourteenth Amendment. The constitutional violations were alleged due to denial of the right to adequate counsel, denial of a fair and impartial trial, and denial of the right to a jury of their peers since qualified members of their race were excluded from the jury pool.

The issue central to the decision in Powell v. Alabama was whether the defendants were denied the effective assistance of counsel, which the Court concluded would negate the discussion of the other legal issues if decided in the affirmative. The U.S. Supreme Court decision noted that all the defendants were illiterate and were without the economic means to secure their own legal representation. No specific legal counsel had been named, appointed, or otherwise secured for the defendants after the arraignment until the morning of the day the trial began. In the Supreme Court decision in Powell v. Alabama, the transcript of the exchange between the trial judge and lawyers present in the courtroom just prior to the start of the first trial indicated that no attorney in particular was ready to take on the role of the defense. The Supreme Court noted that the appointment of defense counsel had been arranged for the arraignment, but it had left open the question as to the status of defense counsel for trial. Two attorneys were present in the courtroom, although one attorney was not a member of the Alabama bar; he specifically stated that he would assist another attorney appointed by the court, as he did not prepare a defense and he was unfamiliar with Alabama law.

The Supreme Court noted that by naming all the members of the bar as the men's legal representation, the presiding judge ensured that, even if all the members had shown up to participate, no specific person would have had the responsibility to conduct a thorough investigation and a zealous representation of their clients. The appointment of legal counsel just prior to the start of the trial resulted in merely pro forma legal representation for the men. Because the trial would begin that day, there was literally no time to become familiar with the facts of the case, adequately investigate the facts of the case, or build a credible defense to the charge prior to trial.

Because the trial, for potentially a capital crime, began only days after the arrests, the Supreme Court was troubled by the lack of contact between the men and their families prior to trial. The Court noted that with adequate notice and communication, family members might have been able to help secure representation, given that representation was secured after conviction as noted with the efforts of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the International Labor Defense. The Court also noted that the question was not asked whether the defendants were able to secure legal assistance through family or friends, and no delay in the trial schedule was offered to determine whether outside legal assistance was possible.

In its ruling, the Court noted that if the case had concerned only the right to counsel recognized by state law or state constitution, the U.S. Supreme Court would have been powerless to intervene because the matter was addressed by the Alabama Supreme Court. The Court noted that the right to adequate legal counsel is of a fundamental character to the notion of due process of law. The Court determined that the denial of the trial court to make effective appointment of counsel was in violation of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment; the case was remanded for a new trial.

After Powell v. Alabama

The Scottsboro incident would symbolize the dual system of American justice based on race conspicuously present in the early 20th century. There were eventually seven retrials in the case. Although the physical and testimonial evidence against the men was considered weak, Wright remained in prison until he was paroled in 1950. Patterson, who escaped from prison in Alabama in 1948, was taken into custody in Michigan 2 years later. When Michigan did not cooperate with the extradition order of Alabama, legal efforts against Patterson were dropped. In 1976, Alabama Governor Wallace pardoned Norris.

David A. Mackey

See also Death Penalty; Institutional Racism; Norris v. Alabama; Racism

Further Readings

- Goodman, J. (1994). Stories of Scottsboro. New York: Pantheon Books.
- Kennedy, R. (1997). Race, crime and the law. New York: Pantheon Books.
- Norris v. Alabama*, 294 U.S. 587 (1935).
- Patterson v. Alabama*, 294 U.S. 600 (1935).
- Powell v. Alabama*, 287 U.S. 45 (1932).

PRESENTENCING

The presentencing phase of the criminal justice process is the time period after a defendant is found guilty of a crime and before the judge imposes a sentence. One of the most important documents considered during the presentencing phase is the presentence investigation report, which provides comprehensive coverage of a defendant's social and criminal history for the court. Ultimately, the aim is to provide guidance to the judge in matching the severity of the crime and the harm that it causes to a punishment deemed appropriate. Generally, a probation officer is responsible for conducting the investigation. During the investigation, the probation officer may review many documents, such as plea agreements, probation and parole violations, and other information pertaining to the defendant, such as medical history, physical and mental health, substance abuse, educational attainment, employment, and family history. After an evaluation of the data, the probation officer submits the report, including a sentencing recommendation, to the judge.

Brief History of Presentence Investigation Reports

Presentence investigation reports date back to the late 1800s in the criminal justice system. By 1943, federal courts issued a handbook designed to provide guidance on conducting presentence investigation reports. Over time, presentence investigation reports have evolved to become one of the most important sources of information utilized by sentencing judges. Initially, presentence investigation reports were designed to promote individualized sentencing by utilizing information only specific to the offender. Over time, victims' rights advocates have successfully argued for greater consideration of the impact of crimes on victims or their families, resulting in the creation of victim impact statements. In some jurisdictions, victim impact statements are included as a part of the presentence investigation report. A victim impact statement provides victims with an opportunity to express their feelings through an oral or written personal statement that the judge can take into consideration prior to sentencing.

Role of the Probation Officer

A primary role of the probation officer is to serve as an advisor to the sentencing judge. As changes in sentencing policy have taken place over the past 2 decades, so has the role of probation officers. In addition to preparing presentence investigation reports, probation officers are now often responsible for completing risk assessment instruments and sentencing guidelines. The utilization of these tools varies from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. Nevertheless, where available, the completion of these instruments occurs during the presentencing phase and can have a tremendous impact on the sentencing outcome. Risk assessment instruments are often offense specific and are used to gauge whether an offender will commit future crimes and whether an offender is worthy of diversion from incarceration to a less-restrictive sanction. Sentencing guidelines, on the other hand, paint a picture of how offenders convicted of similar crimes and criminal histories historically have been sentenced. Occasionally, probation officers may be required to testify in court with respect to the accuracy of their presentence investigation report findings and sentencing recommendation.

In addition to the advisory role bestowed upon probation officers, a high level of discretion accompanies the position. Consequently, the level of discretion that probation officers are afforded in preparing presentence investigation reports often goes unnoticed by researchers. For example, in an examination of sentencing patterns, the role of the probation officer is often underestimated due to the fact that presentence investigation reports do not carry the same level of visibility as indictments, plea agreements, or trials. The information contained in presentence investigation reports is confidential and is disclosed only to the defendant, defense counsel, prosecutor, and other authorized criminal justice personnel. Thus, the information contained in the report is not scrutinized to the level of other documents, which are matters of public record.

Role of the Prosecutor

Like probation officers, prosecutors can also wield a tremendous amount of influence during presentencing. Prosecutors are commonly referred to as the gatekeepers of the sentencing process by way of their bail recommendations, plea negotiations, and pursuance of criminal charges. For example, a defendant's ability to post bail is directly related to sentence length. Research indicates that offenders who fail to post bail have a greater likelihood of receiving a harsher sentence than offenders who do post bail. With respect to demographics, some research indicates that Caucasian defendants are more likely than African American defendants to engage in plea bargaining. Several studies have found that Whites fare far better in plea bargaining than do African Americans.

Impact of Presentencing Investigations

Finally, the impact of the presentencing phase of the criminal justice process should not be underestimated. Evidence of racial disparities exists at all levels of the criminal justice system, including arrests, bail dispositions, plea negotiations, and in the type of legal counsel that a defendant is able to secure. These disparities are important because they impact the message that a presentence report sends to a judge about an offender's background and propensity to violate the law in the future and thus impact sentencing outcomes. Furthermore, presentence investigation reports have lasting ramifications. For example, after an offender is remanded to the department of corrections, the presentence investigation report may be used to determine the appropriate level of custody and supervision within an institution and eligibility for substance abuse or mental health treatment. The report may also be used to determine the offender's eligibility for community diversion programs, such as electronic monitoring or boot camp. Parole boards may utilize the report when evaluating an offender's potential for successfully reintegrating into society upon release from incarceration. Once the offender is released from incarceration and seeks employment, potential employers review criminal background checks, which are compiled from various documents, including presentence investigation reports.

Further, the combination of a probation officer's ability to prepare presentence investigation reports under a veil of invisibility and racial disparities existing at every level of the criminal justice system is a volatile combination, whereby African Americans often receive harsher treatment than Whites. More research is needed to explore the relationship between presentence investigation reports and sentencing outcomes.

Jacqueline Smith-Mason

See also Plea Bargaining; Sentencing; Sentencing Disparities, African Americans

Further Readings

- Free, M. D. (2002). Race and presentencing decisions in the United States: A summary and critique of the research. Criminal Justice Review, 27(2), 203–207.
- Harlow, C. W. (2000, November). Defense counsel in criminal cases (Report No. NCJ 179023). Retrieved from U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics: <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/pub/pdf/dccc.pdf>
- Hebert, C. J. (1997). Sentencing outcomes of Black, Hispanic, and White males convicted under federal sentencing guidelines. Criminal Justice Review, 22(2), 133–156.
- Mauer, M., & King, R. S. (2007, July). Uneven justice: State rates of incarceration by race and ethnicity. Washington, DC: The Sentencing Project. Retrieved from http://www.sentencingproject.org/Admin%5CDocuments%5Cpublications%5Crd_stateratesofinbyraceandethnicity.pdf
- Petersilia, J. (1983). Disparity in the criminal justice system. Santa Monica, CA: RAND.

Sidanius, J. (1988). Race and sentence disparity: The case of American justice. Journal of Black Studies, 18(3), 273–281.

Talbert, P. A. (1988). The relevance of victim impact statements to the criminal sentencing decision. UCLA Law Review, 36, 199.

PRESIDENT'S COMMISSION ON LAW ENFORCEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

In 1965 President Lyndon Johnson appointed the 19-member President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice to examine crime and crime control in the United States. The commission's findings, regarded by many as the most comprehensive evaluation of crime and crime control in the United States at the time, was published in 1967 as The Challenge of Crime in a Free Society: A Report by the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice. It is recognized as a basic reference work for American criminal justice systems and was widely used as a college textbook.

The relevance of the commission to the topics of race and crime is twofold: (1) the disproportionate number of minorities reflected in crime statistics and (2) the time period in which the commission was appointed. During this period, racial discrimination and segregation, which permeated much of American life, were being challenged. Race riots in U.S. cities and growing opposition to the war in Vietnam placed criminal justice agencies in conflict with youth and minority groups.

Causes of urban violence in the 1960s were also examined by another Johnson commission, that is, the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, also known as the Kerner Commission. It was created in July 1967 by President Johnson to study the causes of urban violence associated with the civil rights movement. Its findings, like the President's Commission, linked urban violence with racism and segregation and frustration due to lack of economic opportunity.

As recently as 2007, National Institute of Justice researchers acknowledged that commission findings were instrumental in bringing public attention to ordinary street crime and fostering the development of crime-control policies by the federal government. The commission's findings are regarded as providing the foundation for the development of many national, state, and local crime-control policies throughout the United States.

The Commission

The President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, consisting of 19 commissioners, 63 staff members, and 175 consultants, convened three national conferences, conducted five national surveys, hosted hundreds of meetings, and interviewed tens of thousands of persons from 1965 to 1967. The commissioners were men and women of distinction, including Leon Jaworski, who would later be appointed special prosecutor during the Watergate scandal and who had previously prosecuted Nazi war criminals at the end of World War II; Thomas J. Cahill, chief of police in San Francisco; Nicholas deBelleville Katzenbach, President Johnson's attorney general, who served as chair of the commission; Genevieve Blatt, an appellate court judge from Pennsylvania; and Julia D. Stuart, a member of the Washington State Commission on Law and Justice. In fact the commissioners were a carefully balanced team that included members of the law enforcement establishment, two law professors, a civil rights leader, mayor of New York City, a publisher, a university president, lawyers, and judges. Criminologists Lloyd E. Ohlin and Alfred Blumstein served as associate director and director of science and technology, respectively.

Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach and the 19-member commission created task forces and committees around major crime issues, such as juvenile delinquency, policing, courts, corrections, organized crime, and drugs. These groups collected data and analyzed statistics on crime and crime control in the United States on an unprecedented scale. The commission issued its report in 1967, only 18 months after receiving its mandate from President Johnson.

Impact of Commission Recommendations

More than 200 specific recommendations were made in the report, many of which were implemented and continue today.

Proactive Policing. One of the most innovative recommendations was the need to prevent crime before it occurs. This approach to crime ushered in proactive policing policies that are characteristic of the community policing model, which became commonplace following the commission report.

Reduced Criminal Opportunities. Another approach to preventing crime before it occurs was the suggestion by the commission to reduce criminal opportunities. This could be accomplished through the implementation of crime prevention through environmental design policies. For example, many police departments established community-relations units consisting of police officers who worked with community residents to reduce opportunities for crime. Some of the more common programs include the registration of one's property with police departments, home security analysis, and neighborhood watch programs.

Rehabilitation of Offenders. The commissioners recognized the need for criminal justice agencies to develop a broader range of techniques for dealing with offenders; thus emerged diverse approaches to rehabilitation. By the 1980s the rehabilitation of offenders was replaced with warehousing of offenders serving deserved punishments, but in 1965 the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice recognized the need for juvenile justice agencies to provide underprivileged youths with opportunities for successes, including jobs and education. The commission also advocated the development of effective law enforcement procedures to control hard-core youthful offenders that adhere to principles of due process.

Professionalism. The commission recognized the need to elevate the workforce to that of professionals. This resulted in the establishment of minimum standards for law enforcement personnel and other criminal justice professionals. Accompanying the standards was a requirement for preservice training with additional requirements for annual in-service training.

Employment of Minorities. The commission recognized the need to improve relationships between criminal justice agencies and citizens of racial and ethnic communities. To improve these relationships, it was suggested that law enforcement and corrections agencies hire personnel that reflect the makeup of the communities the agencies serve. As a result, hiring policies endorsing the hiring and promotion of minorities (i.e., racial, ethnic, and gender minorities) were implemented in criminal justice agencies. Today the numbers of minority employees working in criminal justice agencies are significantly greater than could have been imagined in 1967.

Research. The need to research crime, administration of criminal justice agencies, and the impact of the criminal justice system on the public was also acknowledged in the report. The commission called for more research and experimentation in criminal justice, especially in the area of agency administration. As a result, criminal justice-related research significantly increased.

National Crime Victimization Survey. One of the most important contributions of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice was the establishment of the National Crime Victimization Survey. It is generally acknowledged that this approach to researching violent crime on a national level had not been used before it was implemented by the president's commission. An astonishing finding from the survey was that less than half of all crimes are reported to the police. The commission conducted the first National Crime Victimization Survey, which has been continued to the present.

National Institute of Justice and Office of Justice Programs. In 1965 Congress established the Office of Law Enforcement Assistance, which was the conduit for the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice and later became the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration. Because the nation lacked the most basic reliable information about crime and crime trends, the commission, in its final report, recommended the continuation of the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration. Today it is known as the Office of Justice Programs and the National Institute of Justice. This group continues to deliver federal monies for research, training, program development, and other needs to state and local criminal justice agencies.

Due Process. The President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice also acknowledged the need to eliminate existing injustices in criminal justice agencies, for example, violation of citizens' due process in the enforcement of law. Employment of a professional workforce, training that acknowledges the role of due process in a democracy, and managements' commitment to due process are commonplace in criminal justice agencies today. Also, criminal justice agencies have policies in place that protect citizens' rights.

Community Relations. Another recommendation by the commission was the implementation of processes that encouraged collaboration among individual citizens, civic and business organizations, other social institutions, and criminal justice agencies to reduce crime. These groups work together planning and implementing changes for reducing crime. Today most criminal justice agencies have advisory boards, ombudsmen, citizen action committees, and volunteers that contribute to agency operations. The community policing model is a classic example of law enforcement's attempt to engage the community in policing.

Funding. The commission recognized the importance of increasing criminal justice agency budgets to enhance their ability to control crime; this includes budget increases across all types of criminal justice agencies, including policing, courts, and corrections. To compete with private industry, agencies required budget increases to attract and keep quality personnel. An examination of entry-level salaries for many criminal justice agencies indicates that salaries are competitive and are expected to remain so. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, in May 2006 median annual earnings of police and sheriff's patrol officers were $47,460, while median annual earnings of police and detective supervisors were $69,310.

Higher Education. The President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice suggested that higher education can be an effective crime control agent. Criminal justice agencies were encouraged to hire personnel with some higher education. In fact some criminal justice positions required the minimum of a baccalaureate degree; for example, most probation and parole officer positions now require the 4-year degree and most mid-size to larger police departments require the 2-year or 4-year degree. Even those departments that do not require degrees often pay salary differentials for various levels of higher education or have tuition reimbursement programs to encourage their personnel to attend college. The impact of criminal justice agency changes regarding higher education has been considerable. For example, in 1967 there were 39 baccalaureate degree programs in criminal justice, but by 1977 the number had increased to 376.

Discipline of Criminal Justice. Commission recommendations were instrumental in the emergence of a new academic discipline, that is, criminal justice. Prior to the commission report, a few law enforcement degree programs, as well as criminology programs, offered college courses reflective of sociology and public administration degrees. The commission focused on higher education as the conduit to prepare personnel with higher levels of knowledge, expertise, initiative, and integrity. In addition, the commission acknowledged the need for scholars and other experts in the field to assist with the development of a body of knowledge focused on understanding the problems and operation of criminal justice agencies. By 1969 Congress had appropriated $6.5 million for the Law Enforcement Education Program. The funding paid education expenses for over 20,000 students (19,000 were in-service personnel) at 485 colleges and universities. By the mid-1970s the annual appropriation was $40 million, with over 250,000 students receiving financial assistance at 1,200 colleges and universities. The funding, designed to provide grants to in-service students and loans to preservice students, also spurred the development of academic programs in criminal justice throughout colleges and universities in the United States.

Criminal Justice System. A significant consequence of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice has been an increased awareness that criminal justice agencies are components of a system. The commission offered a conceptual framework of criminal justice as a coherent system. An example of this perception is the diagram, found in most criminal justice textbooks published since 1967, of the flow of a case through a criminal justice system. Although the diagram has changed over the years, it continues to illustrate the movement of cases from one criminal justice agency to the next, suggesting that police, courts, and corrections are components of one system.

Technology. The commission was futuristic in its recommendation regarding technology. At the very advent of the computer age, the commission recommended significant investments in computing and computer information systems. It also recognized the need for separate radio bands for police communication and automated fingerprint systems.

Juvenile Delinquency. The commission report acted as the catalyst for the passage of the federal Juvenile Delinquency Prevention and Control Act of 1968. This law created the Youth Development and Delinquency Prevention Administration, which concentrated on helping states develop new juvenile justice programs. The commission proposed the following major strategies to reduce juvenile crime: decriminalization of status offenders, diversion of youth from the court system into alternative programs, deinstitutionalization by using community homes rather than large training schools, and extending due process rights to juveniles.

Causes of Crime. According to the president's commission, crime is symptomatic of broad social problems such as poverty, racism, and social injustice. This perception of crime resulted in the implementation of crime and delinquency programs and policy changes that targeted social problems that contribute to crime and delinquency. This approach reflected President Johnson's goals for achieving a Great Society.

Elizabeth H. McConnell and John A. McConnell

See also Chicago Race Riot of 1919; Community Policing; Crime Statistics and Reporting; Institutional Racism; Los Angeles Race Riot of 1965; Victim Services

Further Readings

- Governor's Select Committee on Civil Disorder, State of New Jersey and Report for Action. (1968). Report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders. New York: Bantam.
- President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice. (1967). The challenge of crime in a free society. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office.

PRESIDENT'S INITIATIVE ON RACE

On June 13, 1997, President William Jefferson Clinton issued Executive Order No. 13050, which created the Initiative on Race. The program authorized the creation of an advisory board to inform the president on the state of race relations in the United States. Board members traveled the country speaking with thousands of people about the role of race in various critical areas where racial tensions lingered, including civil rights, education, and poverty. The Initiative on Race also examined issues directly related to race and crime, such as racial profiling, sentencing disparities, and victimization disparities. This project was designed to take stock of race relations in America and to propose recommendations aimed at creating a more racially unified and equitable society. This entry reviews the advisory board's findings and summarizes their recommendations to improve the state of race relations.

President Clinton and his staff chose individuals from different backgrounds to compose the advisory board. The members included historian John Hope Franklin (chair), union organizer Linda Chavez-Thompson, the Reverend Suzan D. Johnson, former Governor of New Jersey Thomas H. Kean, attorney Angela E. Oh, former CEO of Nissan Robert J. Thomas, and former Governor of Mississippi William F. Winter. Over the course of 15 months, the board was tasked with examining race and the potential for reconciliation in the United States through dialogue and action. Their investigation resulted in the publication of several reports: One America in the 21st Century: Forging a New Future, which was a summary of their research efforts, and the One America Dialogue Guide: Hope in the Cities, an instruction manual on creating dialogues on race. In conjunction with the Initiative on Race, the White House Council of Economic Advisors published Changing America: Indicators of Social and Economic Well-Being by Race and Hispanic Origin, a report that discussed issues of race and economic disparities in the United States. This report provides evidence that, though some progress has been made, significant economic disparities carry on despite over 30 years of civil rights laws and positive momentum through affirmative action.

The theme of the dialogues mirrored the results of the Council of Economic Advisors report: that persistent racial disparities and discrimination continue to affect the everyday lives of Americans. In the summary to the president, the advisory board determined that there are substantial barriers to full racial inclusion in U.S. society, which consist of inconsistent enforcement of civil rights violations, unequal access to quality education, the gap in economic prosperity between Whites and minority groups, substantial discrimination in housing markets, racial disparities and prejudice in the way minorities are treated by the criminal justice system, and disparities in access to quality health care for racial minorities. Though these barriers remain, the board also discovered that areas of racial progress were also apparent across the country.

Regarding race, crime, and the administration of justice, the board concluded that people of color often absorb a disproportionate amount of the economic, social, and personal costs of crime. Minorities express significantly less trust in law enforcement than nonminorities. For example, minorities have the experience of racial profiling, and minorities are disproportionately arrested, convicted, and sentenced to harsher periods of incarceration. The advisory board recommended reducing the use of racial profiling, eliminating the drug sentence disparities, and diversifying law enforcement to address issues related to race and the administration of justice.

In addition to these recommendations, the advisory board encountered various programs already in place to improve race relations in various community contexts. They named over 300 of these programs "Promising Practices." Promising practices range from one-time, informal events to long-term, sustained efforts by large organizations aimed at either bringing together multiracial groups of people in community service projects, thereby expanding opportunities for racially marginalized groups, or coordinating efforts to reduce racial disparities. The programs varied in scope, length, duration, and intensity, but all aimed in some way to improve the racial climate of the United States. According to the advisory board, these practices should serve as the model for future efforts to create one America in the 21st century.

The advisory board was also tasked with proposing recommendations to address some of the barriers to full racial inclusion. They proposed a list of 10 things Americans can do to improve race relations in the United States. Their suggestions include the following:

- Make a commitment to become informed about, and get to know, people from other races and cultures.
- Raise concerns about comments or actions that appear prejudicial, even if one is not the target of these actions.
- Initiate dialogues on race within the workplace, school, neighborhood, or religious community.
- Support institutions that promote racial inclusion.
- Participate in a community project to reduce racial disparities in opportunity and well-being.
- Advocate that groups you can influence (whether as a volunteer or employee) examine how they can increase their commitment to reducing racial disparities, lessening discrimination, and improving race relations.

From the dialogues, town meetings, and open forums initiated by the advisory board, the board concluded that this nation has much work to do to achieve the dream of one America, where respecting and celebrating racial differences is standard practice as well as embracing what Americans have in common. According to Dr. Franklin, to achieve one America, our nation needs to engage in healthy dialogues about race, provide equal opportunities to education for all, reduce disparities in the administration of justice, and give people the tools to become leaders and role models for future generations.

Nadine P. Frederique

See also Discrimination–Disparity Continuum; Ethnicity; Immigrants and Crime; Institutional Racism

Further Readings

- Council of Economic Advisors. (1998, September). Changing America: Indicators of social and economic well-being by race and Hispanic origin. Retrieved from <http://www.access.gpo.gov/eop/ca/pdfs/ca.pdf>
- Franklin, J. H. (1998, September). One America in the 21st century: Forging a new future: The President's Initiative on Race. Advisory board's report to the President. Retrieved from <http://clinton2.nara.gov/Initiatives/OneAmerica/PIR.pdf>
- Winston, J. A., & Ochi, R. M. (1998, March). One America in the 21st century: The President's Initiative on Race. One America dialogue guide: Conducting a discussion on race. Retrieved from <http://clinton2.nara.gov/Initiatives/OneAmerica/pirdoc1.pdf>

PRISON, JUDICIAL GHETTO

The term judicial ghetto is similar to the concept of prison as an ethnoracial ghetto. This entry provides additional evidence that the burgeoning prison system is modeled after American ghettos. U.S. prisons currently supervise about 1.5 million offenders. Prisons are institutions designed to house convicted, adult felons serving a sentence of 1 year or more. Over the past 2 decades, toughening public attitudes toward crime and criminals created the assumption that prisons are the most effective sanction to meet the goals of punishment, deterrence, and incapacitation. This tremendous growth in the role of prisons in the U.S. criminal justice system over the past 25 years has raised many questions about its effectiveness and importance to society. The function of modern-day prisons is questionable, considering racial disparity among prison inmates. This problem has initiated debates about the present-day purpose of prisons.

In 1986, Whites made up 65% of the correctional population. In 2006, the population of state and federal prisons was 35.0% White, 37.4% Black, 20.5% Hispanic, and 6.9% other races. This vast racial disparity within the U.S. correctional population warranted researchers to question whether the criminal justice system and correctional policies are in fact discriminatory, and these facts have given rise to the idea that prisons are in actuality judicially created ghettos. This entry describes the similarities between prisons and ghettos as institutions of forced confinement targeting a specific group that is viewed as a threat by the larger society. These parallels have led to the coining of the term judicial ghetto.

Ghettos

Many studies have linked crime to poverty, drug use, and lack of opportunity for legitimate approaches to economic success. A common explanation of why African Americans are arrested at a higher rate than Whites is that crime is more common in neighborhoods where African Americans reside. Criminal justice efforts are more intense in urban areas with high crime rates and high drug use. Such locations are commonly labeled as the ghetto. The most common depiction of the ghetto is that it is a segregated district, an ethnic neighborhood, or area of extreme poverty where members of the “underclass” reside. Some depict the 20th-century U.S. ghetto as a sociospatial device that enables a dominant status group in an urban setting simultaneously to ostracize and exploit a subordinate group. These areas are an ethnoracial prison because ghettos encage a dishonored category and severely curtail the life chances of its members, including their chances to attain material goods or opportunities. This suppression is carried out by the dominant status group. Scholars have argued that ghettos were created to protect the city's residents from the pollution of an outcast group.

Judicial Ghetto

There is an overrepresentation of Blacks behind bars due to mass imprisonment in the United States. This is linked to the crime and punishment model practiced by the present criminal justice system. One popular criticism of prison is that it is one of the peculiar institutions that attempts to confine African Americans, along with other peculiar institutions throughout the history of the United States. Other similar institutions are slavery, the Jim Crow regime, and the ghetto. The term judicial ghetto describes what some believe to be our modern-day prison. Many comparisons have been made with prisons and ghettos.

Much as the ghettos protect the upper class from the lower class, prison cleanses society of the flaw of those who have committed crimes. Researchers who have studied inmate populations have noted that inmates create their own rules and standards as a response to the pains of imprisonment, much like residents of ghettos develop what is said to be a separate subculture from those who are of higher socioeconomic status. Both were created to exploit and separate a specific social group from the larger society, and in both, order is secured by the use of external force.

Historical links of prisons to ghettos emerged in the backdrop of the social movements in the 1970s. Prisons became the solution to most social problems. The problem most focused on was the breakdown of social order in the inner city. The ghetto was the location that produced most of this breakdown. This area was described as especially dangerous due to the negative publicity deriving from the violent riots of the mid-1960s. The threat of the ghetto no longer existing or that those who lived in this area were now allowed the opportunities of mainstream society promoted prisons to become a tool utilized to keep this group in control or separated. Some scholars believe that the prison was the auxiliary foundation for caste preservation and labor control in the United States. Slavery no longer existed, Jim Crow was no longer upheld, and the separation of those in the ghetto from those in mainstream society was no longer as clear as it was before the 1970s.

The final argument that prisons are judicial ghettos is that they serve as a way to warehouse certain members of the Black working class. Restrictions on penal labor are becoming more relaxed and private enterprises are being introduced inside American prisons. Inmates are subject to poor work conditions and very little pay. They are separated from mainstream society and not governed by the same protections of those that are outside of prison. This is another comparison of why prisons today are institutions very similar to that of slavery, Jim Crow, and finally the ghettos.

Liza Chowdhury

See also Ghetto, Ethnoracial Prison; Prison Abolition; Racism

Further Readings

- Sabol, W. J., Couture, H., & Harrison, P. M. (2007). Prisoners in 2006. Bureau of Justice Statistics Bulletin (Report No. NCJ 219416). Retrieved from U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics: <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/pub/pdf/p06.pdf>
- Wacquant, L. (2000). The new "peculiar institution": On the prison as surrogate ghetto. Theoretical Criminology, 4(3), 377–389.
- Wacquant, L. (2001). Deadly symbiosis: When ghetto and prison meet and merge. Punishment and Society, 3(1), 95–133.
- Weber, M. (1978). Economy and society (G. Roth & C. Wittich, Eds.). Berkeley: University of California Press.

PRISON ABOLITION

Prison abolition refers to the ideal of eliminating prisons, lockups, and other incarceration facilities, and the current movement toward doing so. The intent is to replace prisons with alternative correctional methods that are more humane and useful than imprisonment in addressing the response to crime and criminality in contemporary society. Prisons in the United States have a disproportionate minority population. Prison abolitionists and some social scientists believe that in many states and at every stage of the justice system, there is overrepresentation of minorities and the poor. This entry presents the arguments of prison abolitionists.

Prison abolition has a long history in the United States. Although the development of U.S. prisons in the early 1800s reflected the Enlightenment idea that prisons were a more humane alternative to corporal and capital punishment, by the late 19th century the inadequacies of most prisons and prison facilities had led many experts to call for their abolition. Imprisonment was viewed by some not as an enlightened approach but as a stain on civilization that demonstrated a lack of compassion for the poor and the marginalized in society. Others viewed prisons as inherently brutal and useless in fighting crime. Today, proponents of prison abolition see the prison system as unfit to manage the social problems it was designed to resolve. The perspective is based on overwhelming statistical data that show that the present correctional methods are ineffective in rehabilitating offenders. For example, a study by the U.S. Department of Justice found that 67.5% of prisoners released in 1994 were rearrested within 3 years, an increase over the 62.5% found for those released in 1983. Instead, in many cases the prison system actually worsens the criminal behavior of incarcerated offenders. Prison abolitionists do not believe that prisons either reduce crime or curtail criminal behavior.

Abolitionists postulate a radical and new paradigm shift from institutionalization to elimination of prisons and the removal of government control of these facilities. They propose (a) community-controlled forums for crime prevention and control, (b) replacing the economic system from capitalism to self-management of production workers and citizens, and (c) removal of nonviolent offenders from prisons. Abolition advocates suggest penal system reforms that replace institutionalization with alternative sentencing that utilizes supervised releases, probation, community service, restitution to victims (not the state), and other community-based sanctions. They also support abolishing mandatory minimum sentencing and primary crime prevention efforts rather than tertiary or secondary crime prevention. They also believe that policies (such as those tied to the War on Crime and the War on Drugs) that contribute to increases in prison populations should be eliminated.

One pressing issue for abolitionists is the disproportionate number of minority prisoners. In the United States, for example, there is overrepresentation of African Americans, people of color, and the poor in the prison population. African Americans are more likely to be incarcerated than European Americans and those who are wealthy. Another focal point of dissent from the abolitionist point of view is that those who are judicially processed, convicted, and imprisoned for theft, prostitution, or property crimes are in one way or another ostracized and sometimes permanently marginalized. They find it extremely difficult to find employment once they have been released from prison. They are thereby systematically magnetized back to the prison industry as their only hope and option for survival. Prison abolition requires the development of social programs such as affordable and adequate education and health care and employment opportunities in order to reduce and eliminate the overrepresentation of minority groups, especially Black males, in the prison population.

Abolitionists argue that society must confront the problem of poverty with a comprehensive approach that provides help to those citizens who need the resources for survival rather than increase the likelihood of recidivism by those that rely on committing property crimes for survival. Furthermore, it is estimated that the majority of those in prison are there for nonviolent offenses, and the states have not devoted enough effort toward rehabilitation.

Finally, abolitionists believe that prison has not deterred criminals or reduced crime rates or criminal behavior. It is their position that in fact prisons promote violence by allowing cohabitation of violent and nonviolent offenders and denying most incarcerated people access to families, friends, love, care, and psychologically healthy emotional support. Deaths in prison are increasing partly as a result of the culture of prison violence and the job stress of supervisors who are becoming increasingly victims of the same violence. However, many abolitionists believe that imprisonment should be a last resort for those crimes that are inherently evil and for virtually incorrigible recidivists. It is necessary to decriminalize victimless offenses, especially for behavior not detrimental to others. Overcriminalization encourages net-widening and expands a commercialized prison industry. Because crime is a consequence of the structure of society, according to some abolitionists, there is a need to address the nature of the societal structures that perpetuate criminal behavior. These abolitionists believe reconciliation, not punitive sanctions and imprisonment, is a viable alternative to incarceration. They further argue that institutionalization is morally repulsive and abominable.

If society were to eliminate prisons, how then do we address the problem of crime, especially violent crime? Opponents of prison abolition do not believe proponents adequately address this issue. Violent offenders and those who pose a danger to society (e.g., chronic offenders) must be controlled, and society must solve the problem of crime before addressing the position of the prison abolition movement. Furthermore, if society focuses on abolition of prison at this point, without concrete alternatives for those who must be confined, we will relegate these offenders to intolerable conditions.

Abolitionists have responded by noting that prison abolition must be seen as a long-range goal that will require cultural, political, economic, and structural changes in society to reduce crime and thereby facilitate prison abolition.

Evaristus Obinyan

See also Disproportionate Incarceration; Disproportionate Minority Contact and Confinement; Prisoner Reentry; Racialization of Crime; Recidivism

Further Readings

Davis, A. (2003). Are prisons obsolete? New York: Seven Stories Press.

Newton, V. (1971, January 18). The shame of prisons. Time.

U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics. (2002). Reentry trends in the U.S.: Recidivism. Retrieved September 11, 2008, from <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/reentry/recidivism.htm>

Websites

Bar None: <http://www.barnone.mahost.org>

Prison facts and statistics: http://www.prisonjustice.ca/politics/facts_stats.html

PRISONER REENTRY

Many issues in criminal justice are inextricably linked to the study of race. Although prisoner reentry has become a popular topic in criminal justice policy, research into the relationship between race and prisoner reentry is scant. Yet, such research is necessary for a more useful understanding of prisoner reentry policies. This entry discusses the consequences of racial disparities in imprisonment rates and of the evolving nature of parole on an offender's ability to successfully reenter society. It also explores culturally competent (and socially responsible) means of assisting a prisoner in his or her reentry.

Racially Disparate Imprisonment Rates

Prisoners have been reentering communities since the turn of the 18th century, when the first U.S. prison began operating in Philadelphia. Since then, the U.S. corrections model has shifted back and forth from punishment and deterrence to rehabilitation. The unprecedented, threefold increase of prisoners over the past 20 years, however, has resulted in an increasing number of offenders leaving prison and attempting to reenter society. These prisoners reflect an increasingly diverse population, both within and outside of prisons.

Racial minorities (i.e., Black Americans and Latinos) make up a disproportionate amount of the more than 2 million people in federal, state, and local prisons and jails. While Blacks and Latinos represent approximately 12% and 14% of the general U.S. population, they account for 45% and 18% of the total inmate population, respectively. This is compared to Whites, who make up almost 75% of the general U.S. population but account for only 34% of the imprisoned population. With well over half a million offenders leaving prison each year (many of them racial minorities returning to the same neighborhoods where they offended), effective reentry policies and procedures are necessary to ensure community safety, justice, and fiscal responsibility.

Barriers to Reentry

When attempting to successfully reenter society, most offenders will face many of the same factors that contributed to their involvement in crime in the first place (i.e., impoverishment, lack of education, few career opportunities, familial and cultural influences, disease, disenfranchisement, and socially disorganized neighborhoods). For the reentering offender, these effects are even harsher than when he or she was initially imprisoned. Consider the following: Inmates have little or no income while incarcerated, and they may have no place to live following release from prison. Many states have laws that prohibit parolees or formerly imprisoned individuals from holding careers such as physician, teacher, lawyer, real estate agent, and engineer. Only 15% of marital relationships will survive a spouse's incarceration. Children of incarcerated parents are 5 times more likely to be arrested and are more apt to exhibit antisocial behaviors and use drugs. HIV affects the prison population at a rate 6 times higher than that of the general population. And, having been convicted of a felony, 14% of Black men cannot vote to change the laws that affect them after their release from prison. Finally, consider that most of these factors contribute to the likelihood that the ex-offender will turn to drug use and abuse.

It is not surprising, then, that 67% of ex-offenders will be rearrested for a serious offense within 3 years of their release and 52% of the same group will be sent back to prison, with rates for Blacks being slightly higher (and rates for Whites being slightly lower) than those for Latino ex-offenders. Given the racial disparities in arrest and imprisonment rates and the high concentration of the aforementioned social crises in minority communities, Blacks and Latinos are also overrepresented in the population of those offenders returning to prison. The constant revolving door of offenders into and out of the community drastically hinders the economic, social, and familial developments of racially distinct neighborhoods, thereby increasing the likelihood of criminality in new offenders and of unsuccessful reentry of ex-offenders. A discussion of the changing nature of parole, "get tough" policies, and rehabilitation helps to highlight the racial differences in offender reentry.

Sentencing, Parole, and Prisoner Reentry

During the 1960s and early 1970s, indeterminate sentencing (sentencing that does not have defined parameters) was used in conjunction with parole to give the parole board the responsibility of deciding if and when an individual was ready to successfully reenter society and the responsibility of maintaining supervision of the individual, while also helping him or her to reintegrate into the community. During this time, 72% of all released inmates were placed on parole. Currently, only 30% of eligible prisoners are released on parole. Over the past 2 decades, criminal justice policy, fueled by the "get tough" and "nothing works" philosophies, have increasingly turned to determinate sentencing (clearly defined sentences) and truth in sentencing (the move toward having offenders serve at least 85% of their sentences) policies that increase prison sentences and limit the use of parole (again, negatively and disproportionately affecting racial minorities).

The limited use of parole and parole boards has a number of effects on offender reentry. First, it reduces the number of ex-offenders who have access to the educational, employment, and rehabilitative programs (offered through parole) that aid in the offender's reentry. The lack of these resources affects each offender differently, depending on his or her race. For instance, Blacks and Latinos report higher unemployment rates and lower high school graduation rates than Whites, and Blacks and Whites report higher drug use rates than Latinos. Also, Latinos are more likely to have had a family member incarcerated, but they also have the lowest rate of incarceration for violent offenses of the three groups. These facts underscore the diverse obstacles an offender faces when reentering society.

Second, abolishing parole boards results in extended prison stays for offenders and in a lack of offender supervision (after release) that is necessary for the community's safety. Although parole supervision can help offenders successfully reintegrate into society, it can also result in higher rates of reincarceration for minor offenses and parole violations. For those parolees who are reincarcerated, 67% are for technical violations, not for committing a new crime. Furthermore, parole violators account for 34% of all new prison admissions. Some view these recidivists as unnecessary additions to an already overcrowded prison system. Others see this as a "no nonsense" policy that protects the community from future offending. Opponents of parole believe that determinate sentences and truth in sentencing will result in longer sentences, thereby increasing the deterrent effect of prison. However, offenders in states that have abolished their parole boards end up serving less total time under state supervision than those in states with parole.

While parole currently serves as one of the main pathways to an offender's reentry, some practitioners are focusing their efforts on rehabilitation and the offender's time in prison as effective ways of helping an offender become a responsible and productive member of his or her community. As the system more accurately balances the ex-prisoner's risks and needs, the parole officer's function becomes less supervisory and more casework oriented.

Pathways to Prisoner Reentry

The public's dismay with the ineffectiveness of the corrections system to reform criminals is bringing about a reemergence of rehabilitative programs in prison. This, along with sound evaluations of such programs, foreshadows a promising future for effective prisoner reentry. It also illuminates the need for prisoner reentry efforts to begin as soon as the offender enters the corrections system.

What Works

Richard Seiter and Karen Kadela conducted a study of program evaluations to determine which types of services are most useful in helping the offender to reenter society. It should be noted that of the hundreds of programs implemented over the past 3 decades, only a handful of evaluations were methodologically proficient enough to be considered in their study. This serves as an astounding commentary on the lack of sincere empirical attention to prisoner reentry. Nonetheless, they concluded that job training, work release, drug treatment, and halfway house programs were most conducive to easing the offender's transition into the community.

Other research has found that individuals need to have access to such programs from the time they are incarcerated until their reentry into their communities and families. However, these types of programs need to be more universally and more thoroughly implemented and should also consider the individualized needs of the various populations that attend the programs. Viewed in light of the previously discussed social ills that disproportionately distress racial minorities, the significance of a culturally responsive approach to such programs is apparent.

The Family

While ex-offenders face many structural issues when reintegrating into their communities, they also bring with them their own cultural realities that need apposite addressing throughout the reentry process. Rehabilitative efforts must consider the individual's ethnic and racial background, especially when dealing with family issues (e.g., physical abuse, estrangement from children, and divorce). Only 4% of marriages will survive the incarceration of a spouse 1 year after his or her release from prison. Many inner-city Black households are already headed by single women due to the high incarceration, homicide mortality, and divorce rates and the low employment rates among young, Black men. Add to this the fact that Black females are much more likely to be incarcerated than both White and Latina females, and the devastation to Black, urban neighborhoods becomes apparent. Successful reentry initiatives, then, that appreciate the social and cultural differences among the various racial and ethnic groups correspond with research that demonstrates the impact of positive familial relationships in a prisoner's successful reentry.

The Community

Neighborhoods, communities, lawmakers, the criminal justice system, and society as a whole must do their part to accept the offender back into society. This requires a fundamental shift in the U.S. consciousness regarding incarceration and offenders, a shift from a view of the offender as eternally, morally incorrigible to one of a citizen who has paid off his or her debt to society and who is now responsible for becoming a productive member of it. If nothing else, citizens must be made aware of the inequitable and costly system of revolving door prisons. Fortunately, it is the high economics of maintaining the system that is finally drawing the public's attention to the racial disparities and to the ineffectiveness of many correctional programs. The problem of prisoner reentry is no longer regarded as simply a concern of only those people living in high-crime areas.

That said, there are tangible steps that communities can take to help clear the path for an offender's reentry into society. First, ex-offenders should be given back the right to vote so that they can exercise the most fundamental right to being a free, responsible, and productive member of society. Additionally, states should adopt expungement procedures to aid in the social and professional rehabilitation of nonviolent offenders. Also, parole should concentrate its resources on managing only those ex-offenders who are most at risk for reoffending. This would better ensure the public's safety, while also keeping nonviolent offenders from returning to prison on minor violations of parole. Finally, racially distinct communities need to support reentering offenders through the already established (and successful) social support mechanisms that exist (e.g., church and mosque groups and extended family members).

Although an insufficient amount of research has been conducted with respect to racial differences in prisoner reentry, this entry explored the well-established body of literature that deals with many of the corollary issues impacting individuals when they reenter society. The disproportionate effects of poverty, unemployment, familial problems, drug use, and social disorganization on racial minorities further exacerbate the inequities racial minorities face when attempting to successfully reenter society.

Michael J. Jenkins

See also Disproportionate Incarceration; Sentencing Disparities, African Americans; Sentencing Disparities, Latina/o/s

Further Readings

- Anderson, E. (1990). Streetwise: Race, class, and change in an urban community. New York: Norton.
- Marbley, A. F., & Ferguson, R. (2004, May). Responding to prisoner reentry, recidivism, and incarceration of inmates of color: A call to the communities. Journal of Black Studies, 35(5), 633–649.
- Petersilia, J. (2003). When prisoners come home: Parole and prisoner reentry. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Seiter, R. P., & Kadela, K. R. (2003). Prisoner reentry: What works, what does not, and what is promising. Crime and Delinquency, 49(3), 360–388.
- Travis, J. (2005). But they all come back: Facing the challenges of prisoner reentry. Washington, DC: Urban Institute Press.
- Travis, T., & Waul, M. (Eds.). (2004). Prisoners once removed: The impact of incarceration and reentry on children, families, and communities. Washington, DC: Urban Institute Press.

PRISONERS, INFECTIOUS DISEASES AND

Prisoners experience some of the same health-related conditions as the general population. However, the prevalence and incidence of certain infectious diseases are markedly higher among institutionalized offender populations. With the U.S. prison population now surpassing 2.2 million, the control and management of infectious disease has become a dominant concern for groups both inside prisons and in the community. This concern is driven by the fact that an overwhelming number of those incarcerated are from minority groups. Additionally, the National Commission on Correctional Health Care has identified communicable diseases and chronic diseases as priorities for correctional health care. Communicable diseases are diseases that can be transferred from one individual to another via direct or indirect contact. The communicable diseases of greatest concern for correctional populations are HIV/AIDS, hepatitis B, hepatitis C, and tuberculosis.

HIV/AIDS

Human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) is the agent that causes acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS). HIV destroys white blood cells and attacks the immune system. According to the National Minority Aids Council, the incarceration of people of color has “created one of the major challenges in the HIV/AIDS epidemic for minority communities in the United States.” A quick glance at the national picture reveals that Blacks represent 49% and Hispanics/Latinos 18% of new HIV/AIDS cases. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention also report that Black and Hispanic males are more likely to catch the virus through sexual contact with other men, injection drug use, and high-risk heterosexual conduct. Transmission of the virus to Black and Hispanic women often is a result of engaging in high-risk heterosexual contact and drug use.

While there is some variation in the percentages of people incarcerated who are positive for HIV/AIDS, the data reveal that prisons are places where HIV/AIDS cases are highly concentrated.

For example, according to Theodore Hammett and colleagues, 22% to 31% of people with HIV and 16% of those with AIDS have been incarcerated in state or local correctional facilities. Similarly, Cindy Weinbaum and colleagues report that 20% to 26% of HIV carriers have spent some time in a correctional facility. Nationally among the prison population, 51 out of every 10,000 inmates have been predicted to be HIV positive. Although the majority of inmates who test positive acquired the infection before being imprisoned, prison sex is an undeniable part of institutional life, and as a result inmates are at increased risk for acquiring the disease.

Hepatitis

Hepatitis is a viral infection that attacks the liver and often causes inflammation. Two types of hepatitis are common in correctional settings: hepatitis B (HBV) and hepatitis C (HCV). HBV, which is transmitted via high-risk behaviors such as intravenous drug use, tattooing, and sexual contact, causes lifelong infection, cirrhosis (scarring) of the liver, liver cancer, liver failure, and death. HCV is found in the blood of infected individuals and is transmitted via contact with the blood of an infected person. Whereas a vaccine is available to prevent HBV, there is no known cure for HCV. In states that test inmates for HCV, at least a third of the inmates test positive. Some estimates suggest that U.S. prisoners' rates of HCV are 9 to 10 times higher than among the general population. According to the National Commission on Correctional Health Care, approximately 2% of the inmate population is infected with HBV. Hammett and colleagues report that an estimated 29% to 43% of individuals diagnosed with HCV were incarcerated in the past year. In a related study, Weinbaum and colleagues report that approximately 12% to 15% of Americans diagnosed with chronic HBV infection and 39% of those with HCV infection can be found in correctional facilities.

Tuberculosis

Tuberculosis (TB) is an airborne disease spread when an infected individual with TB of the lungs or the throat coughs, sneezes, speaks, or sings. Although TB can affect other parts of the body, TB is infectious when it is the type that impacts the lungs or throat. A person with active TB usually experiences several of the following symptoms: a bad cough that lasts at least 3 weeks or more, coughing up blood or sputum, pain in the chest, night sweats, fever, loss of appetite, and weakness. The majority of all reported cases of TB occur in racial and ethnic minorities. Active TB cases have been directly linked to incarceration, with approximately 40% of individuals with active TB having been incarcerated in the previous year. Moreover, outbreaks of TB in New York were found to be a result of released inmates returning to local communities.

Prevention Efforts

Prevention efforts for communicable diseases have primarily emphasized three strategies: harm reduction strategies, education, or punishment designed to get inmates to completely cease engaging in risky activities. Harm reduction strategies recognize that the risky behaviors associated with the spread of communicable diseases will always occur. Thus, the focus is on reducing the dangers associated with the risky behaviors themselves. An example of a harm reduction strategy initiated in a small number of prisons to reduce the spread of communicable diseases is condom distribution programs. In these institutions condoms are distributed by medical staff or placed in general areas for inmates to obtain. Prison facilities also may provide HIV/AIDS and hepatitis education and awareness classes. The majority of prisons around the country address the transmission of communicable disease only when an inmate tests positive or is caught in the act of engaging in a risky behavior associated with one of the diseases.

Martha L. Henderson

See also Disproportionate Incarceration; Prison, Judicial Ghetto

Further Readings

Hammett, T. M., Harmon, M. P., & Rhodes, W. (2002). The burden of infectious disease among inmates of and releases from U.S. correctional facilities, 1997. American Journal of Public Health, 92(11), 1789–1794.

Maddow, R. (2002). Pushing for progress: HIV/AIDS in prisons. Washington, DC: National Minority AIDS Council.

Weinbaum, C., Lyerly, R., & Margolis, H. (2003). Prevention and control of infections with hepatitis viruses in correctional settings. Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report, 52(1). Retrieved from <http://www.cdc.gov/mmwr/PDF/rr/rr5201.pdf>

PRISON GANGS

Prison gangs are organized groups of individuals that exist in jails and prisons at the local, state, and federal levels. Gang members often expect to go to prison sooner or later, and gang culture is often an extension of street life that is imported into the penitentiary. Gangs are very influential in some jails, prisons, and penitentiaries. Prison gangs coalesce around race, ethnicity, nationality, and neighborhood. African American, Hispanic, and White gangs dominate many correctional facilities. This entry provides an overview of the race and ethnicity of prison gangs, how they work in prisons, and possible solutions to the problems prison gangs pose.

Race and Ethnicity in Prison Gangs

Most prison gangs have long histories and considerable ethnic and racial diversity. Among the African American gangs, prisons have incarcerated members of the Black Guerrilla Family, the Vice Lords, the Crips, and the Bloods. Hispanic and Latino gangs have included Neta and the Latin Kings, which are predominantly Puerto Rican and Hispanic, and the Mexican Mafia and La Nuestra Familia, which are mainly Mexican American. White gangs include the Aryan Brotherhood, Dirty White Boys, Outlaws, and Hells Angels. Some, like the Colombians (many of whom are affiliated with the drug cartel), are multiracial, which makes trying to identify groups based solely on skin color difficult, but members share similar mannerisms, language, and style of dress.

Gang affiliation will typically depend on the region of the country in which convicts have to do time. For example, in Illinois and New York, a disproportionate number of Hispanic gangs, such as Latin Kings, or Black gangs, such as El Rukin or Black Gangster Disciples, are part of the criminal element. In Florida one may see Puerto Rican gangs like the Nietas and 27s. In California and Texas, correctional facilities house the Mexican Mafia, Texas Syndicate, Texas M, and Texas Family, among other gangs. Much like political parties, gangs have different factions or divisions. In the Mexican organizations, for instance, there are both urban and rural components.

Gang membership often evolves and spreads geographically. In the California institutions, some of the Blue Bird Gang and Hells Angels of San Quentin (motorcycle gangs) eventually became the White supremacist Aryan Brotherhood. The Black gangs of the 1970s, like the Crips and Bloods, first started in Los Angeles. Soon they started in other cities in California, then made their way across the Midwest to the East Coast, where they became established in New York City, Boston, and Philadelphia.

Gang Affiliation in Prison

In 1988, Hagedorn found that gangs recruit new members on the street, in jail, and in prison and have colonized many state and federal institutions. A gang may serve as a surrogate family providing social and emotional needs for its members, both on the street and in prison. In fact, some members refer to the gang as their family. Joining a gang carries many obligations and responsibilities, including participating in feuds, revenge, and retaliation against rival factions. These conflicts may extend from the "hood" to the penitentiary and last for years.

In the institution, gang members are known by the ways in which they carry themselves, including altering their uniforms, sharing their food and contraband, and associating with particular individuals during meals and recreation. Gang members basically "hang together": This means eating as a group in the cafeteria, walking the yard together, pumping iron (lifting weights), and sticking close to each other at work assignments or in housing units. In prison, gang members try to make themselves comfortable. This means that they want new uniforms that are sharply pressed and a locker full of cigarettes and commissary food. Some want nothing more than to watch sports channels like ESPN every day, all day.

Even if convicts want to “do their own time” and be left alone, there are strong pressures to join a gang for self- and mutual protection. In situations like these, unaffiliated individuals are subject to routine victimization, and they may not be able to defend themselves. Gang members may coerce, extort, or steal material possessions or services from convicts. This can occur in any number of places inside the correctional facility. Sometimes this is done when inmates conduct a cell invasion, by running en masse into the victim’s cell and grabbing anything of value. The loners—the people without, or with minimal, social skills or friends—and those who are physically weak are vulnerable to being physically attacked or preyed upon by prison gang members.

Gangs are organized to carry out business, not only on the street but also in prison. They are heavily involved in bringing contraband into the penitentiary. These items vary from institution to institution, state to state, and typically include alcohol, cell phones, cigarettes, condoms, currency, drugs, tobacco, tattooing materials, and nicotine patches. These are often components of the “inmate economy,” used for exchange. Gangs use many methods to get illegal drugs into prisons. One way is to have visitors bring drugs into the visiting room. Another method is to simply throw the drugs over the wall or fence in a tennis ball or to use slingshots to propel the projectile. Another method is air drops, in which packages of drugs are released from small airplanes that fly over the institution at night.

Gang members may also recruit or coerce correctional officers (COs) to bring drugs and other contraband into prison. They may compromise the COs by threatening to report any deviant or illegal behavior they observe or hear about: This includes drinking alcohol on the job, appearing intoxicated, doing drugs, or having sex with a prisoner. Alternatively, a convict may successfully threaten an officer’s family by finding out where they or their loved ones live. Still, some COs—because they are paid so little or want to make extra money—smuggle contraband into the institution.

In many prisons, it is not uncommon to find that some gangs focus a lot of their attention on sports betting. Because the standard currency in prison is a carton of cigarettes or postage stamps, this is usually the minimum bet placed. On the other hand, convicted drug dealers who are used to “living large” and having a lot of money will bet $10,000 to $20,000 on a game. The loser will need to have the money sent in from the outside. If he is lucky, his girlfriend, relative, or friend will arrange to have the money put on his commissary account. Then he needs to go to the commissary and purchase items on a regular basis to pay his gambling debt. Alternatively, if he owes $1,000, he may have a buddy on the street pay it to the gang on the outside.

Finally, a sophisticated gang may actually get new members or wannabes (who do not have a criminal record) to apply for a job as a CO with the state departments of corrections. Some jurisdictions appear so desperate to hire and have such low qualification requirements that they will employ anyone who does not have a felony conviction. If hired, the person then acts as the go-between to smuggle drugs and other forms of contraband into the prison.

Solutions

Many prison systems have implemented gang prevention strategies. Identification of gangs is included in CO training. During classification, gang affiliation is determined, and efforts are made to separate gang members from the general population so that they do not threaten other inmates. Once gang members are incarcerated, intelligence officers and/or chiefs of security monitor gang activity and share this information with their counterparts at other institutions. Other options are to place gang leaders in super-max (maximum security) prisons, where they will have minimal or no contact with fellow inmates.

Gang treatment and rehabilitation are other options. Occasionally, departments of corrections institute these kinds of programs. For example, in 1993 at the Hampden County Correctional Institution in Massachusetts, gang members were segregated, then given a cognitive training program. Such programs are often used to help individuals think before they act. In some prison systems, such as those in New York State, programs led by inmates are implemented. The Alternatives to Violence Program, which started in 1975, is run by lifers who hold workshops and teach younger inmates about the causes of violence, how it can escalate, and how to avoid it.

Jeffrey Ian Ross

See also African American Gangs; Latino Gangs; Prison, Judicial Ghetto; Supermax Prisons

Further Readings

- American Correctional Association. (1993). Gangs in correctional facilities: A national assessment. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice.
- Bourgois, P. (2002). In search of respect: Selling crack in El Barrio (2nd ed.). New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Camp, G., & Camp, C. (1985). Prison gangs: Their extent, nature, and impact in prisons. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice.
- Fong, R., Vogel, R. E., & Buentello, S. (1992). Prison gang dynamics: A look inside the Texas Department of Corrections. In P. Benekos & A. V. Merlo (Eds.), Corrections: Dilemmas and directions (pp. 57–78). Cincinnati, OH: Anderson.
- Hagedorn, J. (1988). People and folks: Gangs, crime and underclass in a rustbelt city. Chicago: Lakeview.
- Hassine, V. (2004). Life without parole (3rd ed.). Los Angeles: Roxbury.
- Lavigne, Y. (1989). Hell's Angels: Three can keep a secret if two are dead. Toronto, ON, Canada: Lyle Stuart.
- Moore, J. W. (1978). Gangs, drugs and prison in the barrios of Los Angeles. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Ross, J. I., & Richards, S. C. (2002). Behind bars: Surviving prison. Indianapolis, IN: Alpha Books.
- Stastny, C., & Tyrnauer, G. (1982). Who rules the joint? The changing political culture of maximum-security prisons in America. Lexington, MA: Lexington Books.
- Toller, W., & Tsagaris, B. (1996). A comparison of gang members and non-gang members in a prison setting. The Prison Journal, 81(2), 50–60.

PRIVATE PRISONS

The Bureau of Justice Statistics designates a prison as private when the facility is privately owned or operated. This definition of private prison includes detention centers, jails, and other correctional facilities that hold adults and, in a growing number of cases, juveniles. It also includes halfway houses, work farms, and specialized jail facilities such as medical, treatment, and release centers. Temporary facilities where inmates are transferred out within a 72-hour period are not included in the bureau's definition of private prisons.

Corporatization of Prisons

The demand for prison cells in the United States swelled in the mid- to late 1970s and into the 1980s for several reasons:

1. Increased rates of immigration and violent crime, such as murder, rape, and robbery—much of the violent crime concomitant with immigration is ascribed to increased smuggling, higher smuggling fees, and the inability of migrants to pay those fees. According to Alan Bersin, many of the migrants smuggled drugs to pay their passage. Trafficking drugs left many migrants vulnerable to assault and robbery.
2. The War on Drugs.
3. The “get tough on crime” campaign.
4. “Weed and Seed” initiatives. The principal mission of the U.S. Department of Justice's Weed and Seed Initiative was to help communities “weed out” violent crime by “seeding” the communities with a variety of social services. Critics of weed and seed programs contend that the weeding component of the initiative brought about overpolicing in communities, which in turn led to increased incarceration.

In response to the need for new prison cells, a case can be made that the for-profit prisons, through their lobbying efforts, were able to influence sentencing reforms, which stiffened penalties meted out to criminals.

As shown in Table 1, lobbying by for-profit prisons was so successful that 25 states passed truth-in-sentencing legislation and 11 passed habitual offender laws. They were also effective in orchestrating the opening of four new private prisons and one prison industry. The impact of their efforts translated into inmates serving more time in

Table 1 Impact of For-Profit Prisons' Lobbying

Legislation	Number of Enactments	States
Truth in Sentencing Act (inmates serve as least 85% of their sentence)	25	Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, West Virginia, Wyoming
Habitual Offender/Three Strikes (life imprisonment for a third violent felony)	11	Arkansas, Florida, Indiana, Montana, New Jersey, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Vermont, Virginia, Wyoming
Private Correctional Facilities	4	Arkansas, Connecticut, Mississippi, Virginia
Prison Industries (requires prisoners to work for private companies)	1	Mississippi

Source: Bridgette Sarabi and Edward Bender, "The Prison Payoff: The Role of Politics and Private Prisons in the Incarceration Boom," published by Western Prison Project (November 2000). Used by permission of Partnership for Safety and Justice (previously Western Prison Project).

Note: Three strikes legislation was previously passed in Washington State in 1993 and California in 1994.

prisons and the prison population increasing. As a result of more time served in prisons, more money changed hands between the government and for-profit providers who owned and managed the prisons. The industry giant Corrections Corporation of America's market capitalization was $1.4 billion in 2003.

Impact on African American Males

The U.S. Department of Justice found in 2003 that the U.S. prison population surpassed 2 million for the first time, and according to the California Prison Focus, the United States incarcerated 500,000 more people than did China. The race to incarcerate and the laws concomitant with this period resulted in the prison population doubling. The increasing focus on prisonization disproportionately impacted African Americans. The Bureau of Justice Statistics reported that in 2003 10.4% of the entire African American male population in the United States ages 25 to 29 was incarcerated. This statistic, according to them, represents by far the largest racial or ethnic group to be incarcerated in the United States. The Justice Policy Institute in 2002, in a similar vein found that the number of Black men in prison has grown to 5 times the rate it was 20 years ago.

Critics of prison privatization contend that the increased lobbying by private prisons coupled with the overpolicing of minority communities has led to more African American men in jail than in college. For instance, in 2000—the year 25 states passed truth-in-sentencing legislation along with habitual offender laws (Table 1)—there were 791,600 Black men in prison and 603,032 enrolled in college. Two decades earlier there were 143,000 Black men in prison and 463,700 enrolled in college.

Table 2 underscores the use of imprisonment and demonstrates the inimical effect incarceration has had on African American males since slavery. Graham Boyd contends that incarceration is the new form of slavery; Boyd does this by comparing the number of Black males who were enslaved and the projected Black male inmate population. His point is that slaves provided free labor under slavery, and once they were emancipated, the prison system was born to recapture the free labor that Blacks provided under slavery. The convict leasing system also played a prominent role in exploiting

Table 2 Projected Black Inmate Population and Black Male Slaves

Year	Projected Black Male Inmate Population	Year	Black Male Slave Population
2000	792,000	1820	783,781
2005	1,040,027	1830	1,001,986
2008	1,224,719	1840	1,244,000
2017	1,999,916	1860	1,981,395

Sources: Boyd (2001b); U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics (2001).

Note: Number of African American male inmates is derived from a baseline of 2 million prisoners and assumes that African American men represent 41.3% of the total inmate population. The growth in prison population assumes a constant yearly growth rate of 5.6%. This was the average rate of growth for the decade from 1990 to 2000.

Black prison labor. Convicts provided free labor under the convict leasing system. The author compares the 1860s to the 2000s and shows that the justice system has statistically replicated slavery in 2000 and 2005 in the number of Black males who were under involuntary servitude. The author avers that this trend will continue, and it is suspected by critics that it is being fueled by private prisons' lobbying efforts.

The Case for Prison Privatization

Support for any form of privatization has always focused on the purported ability of private entities to be more efficient and effective because they are subject to competition. With states being plagued by budgetary concerns, privatization of prisons was a natural progression when juxtaposed to the costs being spent on corrections versus education, for example. Many states privatized their prisons because of overcrowding concerns and to secure additional bed space. The privatization campaign was strengthened by advocates of prison privatization by amplifying states' fiscal woes and appealing to the tax-resistant climate. They were also aided by their promise to manage prisons more economically, build them faster, and operate them more effectively.

Several independent studies funded by for-profit prison providers found that the private sector can finance, construct, service, and operate most types of correctional facilities more efficiently than can the government. Corporations that manage prisons also position themselves as efficient because they are not hampered by public personnel policies and unionized workforces.

The Case Against Private Prisons

Critics of the argument that the private sector can deliver corrections cheaper and more effectively and provide better quality point out that the public sector exists because of the inability or unwillingness of the private sector to engage in particular activities thought necessary to achieve the ideal of the common good. It is untenable to suggest that the private sector can do it cheaper when one considers that many for-profit prisons receive subsidies to site a prison in the community. A cost is incurred any time a subsidy is paid, and costs occur because states have to regulate the private prisons.

Finally, the decision to privatize prisons ultimately rests on the discussion about how privatization lowers costs to the taxpayer, although the argument should be much broader and address hidden expenses for the states that contract, such as the costs to monitor the prison. A question that continues to be raised by critics of prison privatization concerns what they see as the vested interest in incarceration for private providers of correctional services; namely, that they can remain profitable only by making sure that prison beds are filled. Thus, say critics, goals to reduce recidivism are not at the fore for private prisons, because no incentive exists for private prisons to take any actions that might reduce the recidivism rate. If private prisons lowered the recidivism rate, their bottom lines would be adversely affected.

Speculative Prisons

Private firms began to build speculative prisons in rural communities in the 1990s. Most of the speculative prisons were sited for economic development. A few characteristics of speculative prisons are (a) the prison is built without a contract and without the state's involvement as to where the prison is built, (b) most of the inmates in speculative prisons are from a different state, and (c) prisoners are brought from all over the United States to serve their time in these prisons.

Speculative prisons were not regulated when they first began to appear because the demand for additional space continued to grow, and the for-profit providers began to recognize the potential profitability prisons offered, especially in communities starved for jobs. Corrections Corporation of America and the Geo Group (formerly known as Wackenhut) circumvented the request-for-proposal process by assuming the risk of building private prisons without a commitment or contract from the state. These companies felt that profit was certain, that prisons were recession proof, and that they would be able to fill the prisons they built without a guarantee of prisoners from a corrections department. Wall Street agreed that prison construction is a potentially lucrative business. Companies such as E. F. Hutton and Merrill Lynch readily provided financing and capital to these private corporations and have underwritten $2 billion to $3 billion for construction of speculative prisons.

Research Directions

Before private prisons can solidify their position of being more efficient, effective, and providing better quality than public prisons, more empirical research must be conducted to substantiate their claims. The research should not be value-laden, which has been the case with respect to those who argue for and against private prisons. Another focus of research should be on the impact of prisons on children. This is important because so many Black men are in prison and to date, the research that attempts to establish the nexus between having a parent in prison and children's psychosocial functioning has been criticized as lacking an empirically sound basis.

Byron E. Price

See also Attica Prison Revolt; Convict Lease System; Fear of Crime; Ghetto, Ethnoracial Prison; Mandatory

Minimums; Myth of a Racist Criminal Justice System; Sentencing Disparities, African Americans; War on Drugs

Further Readings

- Blakely, C. R. (2005). America's prisons: The movement toward profit and privatization. Boca Raton, FL: Brown Walker Press.
- Boyd, G. (2001a, July/August). The drug war is the new Jim Crow. NACLA report on the Americas. Retrieved from <http://www.aclu.org/drugpolicy/racialjustice/10830pub20010731.html>
- Boyd, G. (2001b). Historical demographics, economic, and social data: U.S., 1790–1970. Ann Arbor, MI: Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research.
- Coyle, A., Rodley, N., Campbell, A., & Neufeld, R. (Eds.). (2003). Capitalist punishment: Prison privatization & human rights. Atlanta, GA: Clarity Press.
- Hallett, M. A. (2006). Private prisons in America: A critical race perspective. Chicago: University of Illinois Press.
- Logan, C. (2002). Changing the guard: Private prisons and the control of crime. Oakland, CA: The Independent Institute.
- Price, B. E. (2006). Merchandizing prisoners: Who really pays for prison privatization? Westport, CT: Praeger.
- U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics. (2001, March). Prisoners and jail inmates at midyear 2000. Washington, DC: Author.

PROFILING, ETHNIC: USE BY POLICE AND HOMELAND SECURITY

Ethnic profiling, also called racial profiling, is a controversial issue in the criminal justice system. It is a new term for old practices of institutional discrimination and racial or ethnic bias. The term profiling has its roots in profiling serial murderers by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and drug law enforcement in the late 1970s and early 1980s. The basic concept of profiling involves using characteristics of captured offenders as a guide in apprehending potential offenders. Racial/ethnic profiling is a controversial issue, with advocates and opponents squaring off on the practice. Civil rights groups and minority groups often accuse police of using race/ethnicity as a basis for detaining, searching, arresting, and incarcerating people. Police argue that race/ethnicity is only one characteristic used in a profile of criminal offenders.

Problems with the practice of racial/ethnic profiling began to emerge in the 1980s when police began using drug courier profiles to combat the illegal transportation of drugs into, and within, the United States. These profiles were created by analyzing characteristics of apprehended drug couriers. Police commonly used race or ethnicity as one factor in predicting or identifying possible drug couriers in the airports and on the highways. As a result, patrol officers received training on drug interdiction on the highways so that they could successfully profile vehicles and drivers transporting illegal drugs. This practice was very popular throughout the law enforcement community in the southern United States and quickly spread to other police agencies across the country. Much debate and controversy surround the use of racial/ethnic profiling to target potential criminal offenders. However, the practice of profiling has continued and is especially significant today with the perceived constant threat of terrorism.

The use of profiling by police was brought to the national spotlight in the early 1990s. The urgency of this issue began with complaints from citizens directed at the New Jersey State Police. The accusations claimed that troopers were stopping Black and other minority motorists solely because of their race/ethnicity in order to search their vehicles for drugs. In 1997, researcher John Lamberth completed a study of whether the percentage of Black drivers stopped and searched by police was occurring naturally by chance. Although there is no way to determine the motivation of every police officer who initiates a traffic stop, Lamberth concluded that his study showed discriminatory behavior by police against racial minorities. His research was successfully used by the defense in State v. Soto.

Other researchers have studied this issue using local and state police data and have come to similar conclusions. Based on the research findings, the American Civil Liberties Union and other civil rights groups argue that the disproportionate number of convicted minority offenders is due to profiling. The phrases "driving while Black" and "driving while Brown" have originated from the practice of profiling by police. Because of the controversy surrounding this issue, legislation has been enacted in many states directed at prohibiting the use of racial/ethnic profiles by police. Many police agencies have also developed policies requiring officers to collect race, ethnicity, sex, and age data from every stopped motorist so that it can be analyzed to ensure that profiling is not occurring.

Police possess a different opinion on the use of racial/ethnic profiles. They argue that the use of race/ethnicity as a valid characteristic of an offender or potential offender is a time-tested tool of law enforcement; it is accepted nationally in the law enforcement community and should be allowed to continue. They also contend that the results of research studies can be manipulated for political reasons and as such, these studies reflect police in a bad light, making them appear to be biased against minorities.

The position of the American public on profiling is dependent upon the conditions. It has been found that a vast majority of Americans do not support police use of domestic profiling (i.e., use of race/ethnicity to profile drug couriers). However, since the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon on September 11, 2001, polls show that a majority of Americans do feel that it is acceptable to profile Arabs and South Asians.

National security has become a matter of increased concern to government agencies as well as the general public since the events of September 11, 2001. Racial/ethnic profiling is a hot topic in the homeland security arena. At issue is whether race/ethnicity can and should be used in airports or in our communities as a tool to apprehend potential terrorists before they can act. The Supreme Court has stated that the government may use race/ethnicity as a profiling tool if the reason is compelling (potential terrorism is considered to be a compelling reason). However, by the same token the government must use the least-restrictive means available to investigate individuals. This means that the government should rely not only on these characteristics but more importantly on individual behavior and mannerisms. With the support of the American people and lawmakers, law enforcement personnel are careful when using race/ethnicity as the sole terrorist characteristic, but they also realize that many of the terrorists identified to date have been Arab.

The examination of racial/ethnic profiling illustrates that as the world changes, so do ideas of prejudice and discrimination (i.e., what is acceptable and what is not). The United States is currently at a point where race and/or ethnicity may be used for law enforcement purposes but not as the sole reason for detaining, arresting, searching, or incarcerating an individual. This issue will continue to be debated based on the Supreme Court's least restrictive means requirement and changing public opinion.

Todd E. Bricker

See also Disproportionate Arrests; Disproportionate Incarceration; Disproportionate Minority Contact and Confinement; Profiling, Racial: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives; State v. Soto

Further Readings

- Gallup News Service. (1999, December). Racial profiling is seen as widespread, particularly among young Black men [Poll release]. Princeton, NJ: Gallup Poll Organization.
- Harris, D. A. (1997). "Driving while Black" and all other traffic offenses: The Supreme Court and pretextual traffic stops. Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology, 87(2), 544–582.
- Harris, D. A. (1999). The stories, the statistics, and the law: Why "driving while Black" matters. Minnesota Law Review, 84, 265–326.
- Smith, M. R., & Petrocelli, M. (2001). Racial profiling? A multivariate analysis of police traffic stop data. Police Quarterly, 4(1), 4–27.

PROFILING, MASS MURDERER

Mass murder refers to the slaying of a number of people at the same time, within the same event. This distinguishes mass murderers from serial killers, who murder a number of people over an extended period (perhaps months or years). Mass murder is also distinct from spree killing. Spree killers slay a number of people over a short period of time in a connected but separate series of events. Serial killers also tend to actively evade detection by law enforcement to operate over time, whereas mass murderers often die at the hands of police or by suicide during or immediately after the commission of the crime. Some scholars hold that mass murder should apply to the slaying of four or more people; others disagree and assert that two or three could also be considered mass murder.

Scholars also differ on the motivation and profile of the mass murderer. The term is wide ranging and can encompass terrorists, genocidal dictators, family annihilators, school shooters, workplace murderers, and other types identified by researchers. Whereas some researchers prefer to focus on the criminological aspects of the lone, socially isolated, private citizen mass murderer, others include the more institutionalized form of mass murder/genocide when discussing the issue.

Organized Mass Murder

Organized, institutionalized, political genocide and mass murder are driven by racial, ethnic, religious, and intragroup conflicts. Examples include the Turkish genocide of Armenians in 1915–1917; the mass murder of Jews by Germans and their collaborators during World War II; the murder of intellectuals and potential dissidents by the Khmer Rouge communist regime of Cambodia in the 1970s, and currently the Sudan government and its allied militias in Darfur. These mass murders are orchestrated by organized factions and driven by political and ideological motivations. Systematic political genocide by governments or other factions include executions, starvation, mass rapes, and death camps. Racial and ethnic hatreds contribute greatly to this systemized murder of another culture. Terrorist groups such as al-Qaeda commit acts of mass murder to further a religious and political agenda, and they often use techniques such as remote explosions and suicide attacks.

The Mass-Murdering Individual

The mass-murdering individual also often commits suicide afterward, which is one reason why it is difficult to collect primary data about their motivations. Several motivations for the mass murderer have been offered by various scholars. These models include perverted love, revenge, sexual homicides, psychosis, and politically motivated hate. Other scholars have focused on school shooters, family annihilators, and revenge-driven disgruntled types such as workplace killers.

Perverved love murderers and family annihilators commit familicides based on their own egocentrism, inability to perceive their family members as distinct people, and need for control. Like other mass murderers, they are almost always men and usually White. Revenge murderers, akin to the disgruntled types, harbor resentment and seek a sense of payback against others for real or perceived wrongs done to them. One type of revenge mass killer is the workplace murderer, who tends to also be male and older than other murderers. Workplace murderers are driven by work-related issues and social isolation, as well as the depersonalization of the victims, who come to symbolize the work environment. These typologies may overlap, and it is important to remember that mass murder is a complex phenomenon involving multiple factors.

Mass murderers tend to use firearms, and the victims are deliberately selected. There is usually a precipitating event, such as a romantic or work-related setback. They tend to be male, White, and socially isolated; have poor coping skills; harbor rich revenge fantasies; and are perhaps socially and sexually inept and often suicidal. They tend not to be truly psychotic, in that they are usually oriented to reality and are not suffering hallucinations or delusions. One exception to the latter is the case of Charles Weston, a mentally ill man who fired shots at the White House in 1998.

Mass Murderers: The Role of Race

Compared with other homicides, mass murders are rare. The 2005 Federal Bureau of Investigation statistics indicate that of all homicides for that year, 4% involved two victims, and murders with three or more victims made up less than 1%. Still, there are demographic patterns that have emerged in multiple-victim homicides, including the role of race. In general, mass murderers tend to be White males of a broad range of ages (although there is a tendency toward middle age). Notable exceptions include the 2007 Virginia Tech killer (an Asian male), 1993 subway killer Jamaican-born Colin Ferguson, and Julio Gonzalez, the Cuban-born murderer who burned down a Bronx night club in 1990, killing 87 people. Mass murderers such as Pittsburgh lawyer Richard Baumhammer or Oklahoma bomber Timothy McVeigh are examples of what may be the more familiar model of this offender profile: middle-class White males with intense grievances against either the government or some select group of people.

One source stated that mass murder, or "sudden mass assault by a single individual" (SMASI), broke down demographically as 77% White offenders, 15% Black, and 7% other, whereas overall homicide rates reported in a 2005 Bureau of Justice Statistics 30-year study were 51% White, 47% Black, and 2% other. Data on the motivations of mass murderers are difficult to obtain, in part because, as noted earlier, the mass murderer often does not survive his rampage. Therefore, the reason behind the higher SMASI offense rates for Whites (compared to general homicide rates) remains unclear. One expert has stated that research into the dynamics of the individual mass murderer is in its very earliest stages. Further studies exploring this and other questions about the complex series of motivational factors behind this crime seem warranted.

Mass Murder and the Media

Scholars have noted the influence of media notoriety and attention that mass murderers seek (and often receive) through their actions. This was apparent in the Virginia Tech murders, in which the killer sent a package of self-interviews on CDs, DVDs, and other materials to NBC News. This act was reminiscent of the videos and other media materials released by Islamist fundamentalist terrorist groups and leaders. In this attention-seeking behavior and clear desire for notoriety and media coverage, the mass-murdering loner and the al-Qaeda terrorists may share a common trait.

David R. Champion

See also Ferguson, Colin; McVeigh, Timothy; Profiling, Serial Killer; Violent Crime

Further Readings

- Crissman, J. K., & Chmelier, S. B. (2007). Mass killers. Retrieved from <http://www.deathreference.com/Ke-Ma/Mass-Killers.html>
- Fox, J. A., & Levin, J. (1994). Overkill: Mass murder and serial killing exposed. New York: Plenum.

Holmes, R. M., & Holmes, S. T. (2000). Mass murder in the United States. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall.

PROFILING, RACIAL: HISTORICAL AND CONTEMPORARY PERSPECTIVES

The concept of racial profiling has surged in recent years as one that seems to drive policy at the state and federal levels. In the study of race and crime, racial profiling refers to the use of an individual's racial and ethnic characteristics in decisions about participation in crime. Racial profiling is most often associated with traffic stops but also includes profiling illegal immigrants and retail shoppers. The idea of drivers being pulled over or ticketed on the basis of their race and ethnicity has led politicians and civil rights activists to launch campaigns across the United States, to inform the public, particularly minorities, of their apparent vulnerability to this form of institutional racism. This entry provides an overview of the history, challenges, and future of racial profiling. Although the term racial profiling is a relatively recent one, the broader practice of using racial/ethnic characteristics as a basis for immigration and criminal justice policy and practice has a long history. This entry reviews the historical background of racial profiling and reviews the issues underlying contemporary debates about this practice.

Historical Background

Although it is difficult to trace the history of racial profiling per se, the principle of targeting individuals based on their race and ethnicity existed before, during, and after slavery in the United States. As American history books show, profiling based on race was prevalent during slavery. Segregated railroad cars for Blacks were in existence in the 19th century, before the Jim Crow era, and even during the early stages of the Jim Crow years, in the 1890s, racial profiling was practiced.

As the era of slavery ended, several forms of racial profiling continued in the United States. For instance, during the immigration era, when hundreds of thousands of immigrants arrived in the United States hoping to find a better way of life, a few were labeled and isolated for various reasons. Those from southern and eastern Europe were considered less able to assimilate, and their race and ethnicity were considered strong predictors or indicators of predispositions relevant to criminal behavior. Some immigrants were labeled "unhealthy" because they came from countries in Europe where famine and diseases were believed to be rampant. The Immigration Act of 1875 was intended to prevent Chinese and Japanese individuals who were suspected of being prostitutes or convicts from entering the United States.

The exclusion of certain individuals from entering the United States was not limited to official operations overseas. In fact, in ports of entry such as Ellis Island, New York, individuals were marked on their foreheads if they were believed to exhibit a disease or characteristic not desirable among the American population. Once the immigrants were marked by one or more letters or designations, they were removed from the inspection line and placed in examination rooms where they were checked for further signs of illnesses. Those whose illnesses were not considered to be serious were sent to the hospitals for observation and care. Those whose illnesses were determined to be serious were deported back to their countries of origin.

The underlying factor here is that individuals who were more likely to present illnesses originated from poor countries in Africa and other underdeveloped areas of the world. In other words, people of color or those considered at the time to be ethnically inferior were overrepresented among the isolated population at Ellis Island and other similar immigration ports.

The labeling or profiling of individuals based on their physical appearance was not limited to public policy in the United States. In fact, at the same time as the Jim Crow era, the Italian physician and criminologist Cesare Lombroso (1835–1909) began to identify patterns of criminality based on the physical appearances of individuals. Lombroso influenced the academic stance on physical appearance being associated with behavior; in this case, criminality.

More recently, U.S. public policy has been used to profile individuals on the basis of appearance through the Drug Courier Profiles developed by the Drug Enforcement Administration in the 1980s.

When the United States launched the “Say No to Drugs” campaign, it became clear that drug couriers carried a particular profile that could be detected. In addition to the basic behavioral patterns (i.e., little or no luggage, use of an alias), it became important to also include race and ethnicity as components of the profile used by the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Since the advent of the drug courier profiles, the media have presented numerous stories related to ordinary citizens, mostly minorities, who claim to have been racially profiled by police officers while driving, commonly referred to as “driving while Black” or “driving while Brown.” In a case that brought national attention to the topic of racial profiling, in April 1998 two New Jersey state troopers fired 11 shots into a van carrying four Black men on their way to a basketball clinic. After the shooting, the troopers brought in drug-sniffing dogs in an effort to find drugs and thus make it seem that the shooting had been justified. To the displeasure of the troopers, they found only basketball equipment and a Bible inside the vehicle.

This and other similar cases gave rise to public awareness regarding racial profiling. In addition, a publication by the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) titled “Driving While Black: Racial Profiling on Our Nation’s Highways,” which illustrated cases where racial profiling had taken place, led to a public outcry. After the release of the ACLU report, President Clinton invited academics, legislators, civil libertarians, and practitioners to participate in the “Strengthening Community Partnerships” conference held in Washington, D.C., in June 1999. Following the conference, President Clinton directed the Departments of Justice, Treasury, and Agriculture to collect data on the race, ethnicity, and gender of all individuals subject to stops by federal law enforcement officials. It should be noted that this initiative also had a profound effect at the state level as more than half of all states modeled legislation similar to the federal initiative requiring the collection and reporting of traffic contact data.

Challenges Presented by Racial Profiling

From discussions and debates involving legislators, academics, and civil libertarians, several central points on this topic have emerged:

1. Racial profiling is not a myth but a real phenomenon that occurs in contemporary police practices. Even if media reports overestimate the number of actual incidents, it is a practice that some law enforcement officials follow. There are approximately 20,000 law enforcement agencies and over 600,000 law enforcement professionals in the United States. Most of these are honest and law-abiding individuals who strive to make a positive difference in the lives of people on a daily basis. However, a few engage in the practice of selective enforcement of the law by utilizing race and ethnicity as indicators of criminality. Although some people deny the existence of racial profiling, it certainly exists; on the other hand, it does not take place across the board on a daily basis. The truth lies in the middle.

2. Racial profiling in the law enforcement community is, for the most part, an individual problem rather than an institutional one. The media often report data that seem to imply that police departments are engaging in racial profiling. A careful review of hundreds of these reports indicates that racial profiling cannot be determined by data alone. That is, the practice of racial profiling stems from individual-based bias that cannot be quantified by an organization’s overall practice regarding traffic stops. The days when police chiefs would instruct police officers to racially profile are part of a dark past. Today, most police supervisors would not remain long in their position if they instructed officers to target minorities. This is not to say that a few officers may not exhibit personal biases toward minorities. However, such personal biases cannot be detected using institutional data regarding traffic stops unless individual-based analyses are performed. In this case, the data would need to be accompanied by other factors (i.e., racist remarks, complaints by citizens, abuse of force) that would indicate, when analyzed together, an obvious bias on behalf of the officer.

3. The September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks gave greater prominence to the topic of racial profiling. Some argued that after the September 11 terrorist attacks took place, racial profiling would no longer be an issue because the United States would be concerned with more serious matters. In fact, the opposite took place. That is, more civil rights–based lawsuits associated with racial profiling seem to have been filed since the 9/11 attacks than at any other time. Further, states have increasingly become concerned because individuals are being targeted not only on the basis of their race and ethnicity but also because of their religious affiliation. Also, there is current disagreement between local and federal law enforcement regarding the extent to which individuals should be targeted for the sake of national security. The federal government currently has programs in place at major airports that profile individuals based on their race and ethnicity; in contrast, local officials, for the most part, have declined to participate in similar practices, citing constitutional rights that would be violated.

The Future of Racial Profiling

Racial profiling is a complex issue, and it cannot be measured or understood in its entirety simply through collection and analysis of traffic contacts between police officers and the public. Such data collection is nevertheless important. Some contend that we must record the nature and disposition of all such contacts, a difficult task to accomplish, particularly by large police departments. The future of racial profiling is uncertain, but its use is likely to continue, and it is difficult to imagine that it will disappear from public attention. It is a vital issue for public officials, academics, and civil libertarians, and social scientific research is needed to guide efforts to reach a consensus on this topic.

Alejandro del Carmen

See also Black Codes; Immigrants and Crime; Northeastern University Institute on Race and Justice; Profiling, Ethnic: Use by Police and Homeland Security; State v. Soto

Further Readings

Davis, R. L. F. (2005). From terror to triumph: Historical overview. Retrieved from <http://www.jimcrowhistory.org/history/overview.htm> del Carmen, A. (2008). Racial profiling in America. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall.

- Harris, D. A. (1999, June). Driving while Black: Racial profiling on our nation's highways (American Civil Liberties Union special report). Retrieved from <http://www.aclu.org/racialjustice/racialprofiling/15912pub19990607.html>
Heumann, M., & Cassak, L. (2005). Good cop, bad cop: Racial profiling and competing views of justice. New York: Lang.
Hutchinson, E. P. (1981). Legislative history of American immigration policy (1798–1965). Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
Kraut, A. H. (1955). Ellis Island: Historical overview. Frederick, MD: University Publications of America.

PROFILING, SERIAL KILLER

In Waterbury, Connecticut, in 1957, police arrested the “Mad Bomber” George Metesky in connection with a string of bombings in New York City that had plagued the city over a 16-year period. Upon his arrest, Metesky donned a double-breasted suit—just one of many details about the suspect that had been predicted by Dr. William Brussel, a psychiatrist who had constructed a profile of the bomber. Brussel’s profile also matched Metesky in several other key details: His predictions about Metesky’s ethnicity, age, paranoia level, and other personal characteristics were all validated. The Mad Bomber case has been recognized as the first use of psychological profiling by authorities to detect and apprehend criminal offenders.

Serial Murder and Profiling

Serial murder is distinguished from other multiple-homicide classifications in that the repetitive slayings are part of discrete events, separated by time. This differentiates serial killing from spree killings (in which several slayings are committed within a short time, stemming from the same event) and mass murder (in which several victims are killed at once). Serial murder is often sexual in nature, and the killer may follow a behavioral pattern that may be detected through interpretation of evidence. There is usually no prior relationship between the victim and the killer. Killers may select victims for their symbolic meaning to the killer or because of their lack of power. Therefore, serial murderers often choose homeless people, prostitutes, and others who may appear unable to defend themselves or who have been so marginalized by society that their disappearance or death may not be aggressively investigated by authorities. Many sexual serial killers select victims as symbols for a general object of antipathy, such as offenders who act in response to their intense hatred for, and need to control and subjugate, women.

The term profiling refers to the interpretation of evidence in order to construct a model of traits and behaviors of the perpetrator. Profiles may cover a wide range of characteristics, including social skills, race, job status, living arrangements, intelligence, the presence of criminal or psychiatric records, even birth order. Aside from assisting in the identification and apprehension of suspects, profiles may provide information about what kind of evidence to search for at a suspect's residence, such as violent pornography or personal effects taken from the victim as trophies. Profiles are most effective when grounded in the evidence and constructed from experience, common sense, data from past cases, and basic psychological principles. Profiles examine crime scene aspects such as weapon use, positioning of the body, and other factors that might provide insights about the nature of the offender. Profiling is not an exact science, however, and should be considered as an investigatory tool that can supplement traditional methods of detection. The Federal Bureau of Investigation's National Center for the Analysis of Violent Crime provides profiling and other support to local and state law enforcement agencies for repetitive violent crimes.

Robert Ressler and John Douglas are two pioneers of modern criminal profiling. They devised the distinction between organized and disorganized offenders, one of the most fundamental tenets of profile construction. These categories are based on attempt to evade detection, the apparent planning of the crime, the victim approach (such as luring the victim to a car or a secluded area or launching a blitz attack), and other features that would indicate how thought-out and carefully planned the murder was. Profilers then build their model on the perceived functioning and organizational skills of the murderer.

Serial Murder and Profiling: The Role of Race

In 2002, two African American men were apprehended as the "D.C. Beltway murderers," who had driven around the Washington, D.C., Virginia, and Maryland area and shot people from the trunk of their vehicle. The apprehension followed an intense media speculation cycle that often unfortunately included false witness reports and inexperienced "profiles" describing the unknown assailant as a lone White male. The D.C. Beltway case demonstrated flaws in the profiling approach, including the dependence upon false data as well as the difficulty of constructing a profile of a crime for which there were no similar past cases. Serial killers are indeed most often lone White males, but like all crimes, repetitive murder can be committed by people of any race or ethnicity. Prominent African American serial murderers also include Wayne Williams (the Atlanta murders), Kendall Francois, Coral Watts, and Cleophus Prince, Jr. The Baton Rouge killer turned out to be an African American male who was originally profiled as White (although the profile was correct on several other points). Profiling is often described as being more art than science and is based, to an extent, on the characteristics and statistics of past crimes. Because serial killers tend to be young White males, profiles often go in that direction unless the evidence indicates otherwise.

The arrest of the D.C. murderers led many people, both Black and White, to revisit the lone White male stereotype of a serial murderer. Studies estimate the percentage of African American serial killers to be between 13% and 16%. When considering this percentage against the fact that Blacks make up 12% of the U.S. population, it is apparent that the commission of serial murder, as with any crime, is not confined to any particular racial or ethnic group.

Some observers speculate that Black serial killers may be largely ignored by the mass media compared to White ones for a number of reasons, including a cultural tendency in the United States to ignore Black victims of crime (in intraracial serial slayings) or a reluctance to identify African American males as perpetrators of another type of offense when that group already struggles with unfair stereotypes of criminality. Serial murder is driven by many factors, including childhood abuse; an overwhelming need to control and subjugate others; and intense, sadistic, violent fantasies. These factors may be assumed to have the potential to converge in anyone, regardless of race. Whatever the reasons for the relative cultural indifference to, and ignorance of, African American serial killers (as compared to White ones), additional studies would be useful in determining whatever influence race may have on serial murder.

David R. Champion

See also Profiling, Mass Murderer; Violent Crime

Further Readings

- Douglas, J., Burgess, A. W., Burgess, A. G., & Ressler, R. K. (1997). The crime classification manual: A standard system for investigating and classifying violent crimes. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass.
- Holmes, R. M., & Holmes, S. T. (2002). Profiling violent crimes: An investigative tool. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
- Ressler, R. K., Burgess, A. W., & Douglas, J. E. (1995). Sexual homicide: Patterns and motives. New York: Simon & Schuster.

PUBLIC OPINION, DEATH PENALTY

The death penalty has long been an issue that divides Americans along racial lines. Since the American Institute of Public Opinion (the producer of the Gallup polls) first began systematically recording death penalty opinion in 1936, racial differences in opinion have been evident. Indeed, during the first half-century of Gallup death penalty opinion polling, between 1936 and 1986, racial differences in death penalty opinion were greater than any other demographic characteristic, and that remains the case in most years since 1986. In the 38 Gallup polls with data on race that have been conducted between 1936 and 2006, the percentage of Whites who have favored the death penalty has always exceeded the percentage of Blacks who have favored it; and the percentage of Blacks who have opposed the death penalty has always exceeded the percentage of Whites who have opposed it. Over the 70-year period, an average of 67% of Whites have favored the death penalty compared to 44% of Blacks, and 46% of Blacks have opposed the death penalty compared to 26% of Whites. In every polling year during this period, except 1953, 1965, and 1999, the percentage of Blacks undecided about the death penalty has surpassed or equaled the percentage of Whites who have been undecided about it. About 3 percentage points more Blacks than Whites, on average, have responded “no opinion” or “don’t know” to a question about the death penalty.

Despite these consistent trends, racial differences in death penalty support and opposition have varied greatly over the 70-year period. The mean difference has been 23 percentage points. The largest difference in support was 34 percentage points, recorded in 2005, whereas the smallest difference was the 6 percentage points recorded in 1953. The largest racial difference in opposition was 30 percentage points in 2005, whereas the smallest difference was 5 percentage points in both 1937 and 1957.

For Whites, the high point in support and low point in opposition between 1936 and 2006 were in 1995, when 81% indicated support and only 10% registered opposition. The low point in support and high point in opposition for Whites were in 1966, when 44% supported the death penalty and 46% opposed it. In only 1957, 1965, and 1966 have less than 50% of Whites supported the death penalty (in 1957, 48% supported it; in 1965, 46% supported it; and, as noted, in 1966, 44% supported it). As for Blacks, the high point in support was in 1953, when 65% expressed support; the low point was in 1966, when only 22% did so. The high point in opposition for Blacks came in 1972, when 64% of Blacks opposed the death penalty; the low point was in both 1991 and 1995, when 31% were opposed. In only 12 of the 38 polling years, 1953, 1982, 1985, 1989–1996, and 1999 did a majority of Blacks favor the death penalty. However, in 27 of the 38 poll years, a majority of Blacks did not oppose the death penalty either, which is mostly attributable to the large percentages of Blacks who were undecided about the penalty. The percentage of Blacks undecided varied between 0% in 1953 and 20% in 1957 and 1966, whereas the percentage of Whites undecided varied between 1% in 1953 and 18% in 1957.

As noted, during most of the 1990s, a majority of Blacks supported the death penalty, which constituted a dramatic change from their historical pattern. However, there have always been Black proponents of the death penalty. A recent study found that Black proponents are hardly distinguishable in other characteristics from their White counterparts. Black proponents tend to be male, married, politically conservative, have high incomes, come from middle- and upper-class backgrounds, live in urban areas and the South, are afraid of crime, have never been arrested, and perceive that the courts are too lenient with criminals.

It has been suggested that racial differences in death penalty support and opposition during the pre-1975 period can be attributed to “the disproportionate application of the death penalty to Blacks” and to “the civil rights movement, which increased Black sensitivity to such inequalities.” That may be true for the 1953 to 1966 period, when Black support decreased 16 percentage points more than White support and Black opposition increased 7 percentage points more than White opposition, but it does not seem to apply as neatly to other periods. Between 1966 and 1985, for example, Black support of the death penalty increased by 24 percentage points, just 10 percentage points less than the increase by Whites. White opposition, on the other hand, declined 31 percentage points between 1966 and 1985, while Black opposition declined only 16 percentage points. In the 1966 to 1967 period, at the heart of the civil rights movement, Black support of the death penalty increased 6 percentage points more than White support. Despite these disparities, White and Black support and opposition have always increased and decreased in the same directions.

Death penalty opinion research published prior to 1975, when death penalty support was more moderate than it generally has been since, frequently attributed support of capital punishment to some rather unflattering social psychological characteristics such as dogmatism, authoritarianism, and racism. Proponents of capital punishment were less likely than opponents to approve of gun registration laws or to favor open housing legislation and more likely to favor restrictive abortion laws, to approve of the ultra-right-wing John Birch Society, to move if Blacks moved into their neighborhoods, and support such things as restrictions on civil liberties, discrimination against minority groups, and violence for achieving social goals. However, in light of the dramatic increase in death penalty support since 1975 (until recently), one might have hoped that such a distinctive personality profile of death penalty proponents no longer applied. Unfortunately, recent evidence suggests otherwise. Support of capital punishment by many Whites continues to be associated with prejudice against Blacks.

Furthermore, these racial differences in death penalty opinion do not appear to be a function of other factors. Research shows that the race/ethnicity difference in death penalty opinions holds after controlling for the effects of socioeconomic status, religion/religiosity, political ideology, positions on right-to-life and other social issues, fear of crime and victimization experience, experience with the criminal justice system, philosophies of punishment, and attribution styles. In another recent analysis, death penalty opinion was found to be a product of both the characteristics of individuals and the social environment. Significant community-level variation in support of the death penalty was discovered, while controlling for standard demographic characteristics. Some areas had very high levels of support, other areas had more modest levels of support, and, in some areas, a majority of residents opposed the death penalty. Residents of local areas with higher levels of homicide, a larger proportion of Blacks (but much less than a majority), and a more conservative political climate were more likely to support the death penalty. These data show there is much variation in death penalty opinions within various groups and not just between them. Still, for the most part, the same sorts of people continue to favor and oppose the death penalty the most strongly. The characteristics (for which there are comparable data) that have consistently distinguished death penalty proponents from death penalty opponents between 1936 and 2007 are race, sex, political party, and income. Over the 70 years between 1936 and 2007, Whites, males, Republicans, and wealthier people have been more likely to support the death penalty than non-Whites, females, Democrats, and poorer people. Conversely, non-Whites, females, Democrats, and poorer people have been more likely to oppose the death penalty than Whites, males, Republicans, and wealthier people.

In sum, if the numbers of Blacks and Whites in the population were reversed, perhaps there would be no death penalty in the United States. On the other hand, if Blacks constituted a majority of the American population and Whites a minority, perhaps Blacks would exercise their political power as Whites have and support the death penalty, while a majority of Whites, having become politically subservient, would oppose it. Either way, the death penalty in America remains a racially divisive issue.

Robert M. Bohm

See also Death Penalty; Marshall Hypotheses; Public Opinion Polls

Further Readings

- Arthur, J. (1998). Proximate correlates of Blacks' support for capital punishment. Journal of Crime and Justice, 21, 159–172.
- Barkan, S. E., & Cohn, S. F. (1994). Racial prejudice and support for the death penalty by Whites. Journal of Research in Crime and Delinquency, 31, 202–209.
- Baumer, E. P., Messner, S. F., & Rosenfeld, R. (2003). Explaining spatial variation in support for capital punishment: A multilevel analysis. American Journal of Sociology, 108, 844–875.
- Bobo, L. D., & Johnson, D. (2004). A taste for punishment: Black and White Americans' views on the death penalty and the war on drugs. Du Bois Review, 1, 151–180.
- Bohm, R. M. (1991). American death penalty opinion, 1936–1986: A critical examination of the Gallup polls. In R. M. Bohm (Ed.), The death penalty in America: Current research (pp. 113–145). Cincinnati, OH: Anderson.
- Cochran, J. K., & Chamlin, M. B. (2006). The enduring racial divide in death penalty support. Journal of Criminal Justice, 34, 85–99.
- Smith, T. W. (1975). A trend analysis of attitudes toward capital punishment, 1936–1974. In J. E. Davis (Ed.), Studies of social change since 1948 (Vol. 2, pp. 257–318). Chicago: University of Chicago National Opinion Research Center.

PUBLIC OPINION, JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

Delinquency has always existed in American society; however, in the past decade the public has begun to perceive juvenile delinquency as a major threat to the safety and stability of society. This is so even though national crime data do not support this perception. For example, an analysis of Uniform Crime Report statistics for 1995 and 2006 indicate that even though the country's population increased by 20 million, the total number of juveniles arrested decreased by 460,000. In fact, serious crimes of murder and nonnegligent manslaughter, forcible rape, robbery and aggravated assault decreased 64%. This leads one to wonder why the public has become so concerned about delinquency that it supports the growing national trend toward juvenile waivers, in which jurisdiction is transferred from the juvenile justice system to the criminal justice system, so that children become eligible for prosecution as adults. Nine out of 10 respondents in a 1995 national poll agreed with the practice of waiving serious juvenile offenders to adult court. This entry examines this and other aspects of public opinion and juvenile delinquency.

To understand this phenomenon, one must examine how the public's perception of delinquency is determined. It is generally agreed that most Americans' perceptions about crime and delinquency are derived from newspapers and television news stories. The term moral panic has been used to describe a reaction to a perceived threat to the prevailing moral order or value system of society by some group or cultural behavior. Although the term itself is relatively new, this is a phenomenon that has been around many years, most likely since the advent of the town crier. This perceived threat has to be spread in some manner. In modern society the news media saturate the airways 24 hours a day and require exciting or controversial subjects to air and to maintain their audience ratings. Many news outlets today use the motto "if it bleeds, it leads" in determining the focus of their broadcast. History is replete with examples of moral panic; most in the past 50 years were promoted and exploited by the news media. McCarthyism in the 1950s, the portrayal of Arabs and Muslims on American television after September 11, the so-called War on Drugs, and many pedophilia laws like Megan's Law are modern examples of events that either triggered or were the result of moral panic.

However, studies indicate that even as juvenile crime rates have declined, there has been a significant increase in news coverage on the topic, thus contributing to an erroneous perception regarding the severity and magnitude of juvenile delinquency in America. For example, studies conducted in Houston, Chicago, and New Orleans indicate that approximately 0.4% of all crimes are murders, yet 46% to 50% of all crime stories reported by local television newscasters in those cities were about murders.

It could be argued that the crack cocaine scare of the 1980s was the impetus for the public's changing perception of juvenile delinquency, as this was the decade that the public was inundated with images of young Black males openly dealing and using crack. Crack, a cheaper form of cocaine than powder, became the drug of choice in low-income communities, and thus it was often associated with Black Americans. When a promising college athlete, Len Bias, died from an overdose of cocaine that was thought to have been in the form of crack, the media engaged in a frenzy of news coverage about crack. Several factors contributed to the skyrocketing popularity of crack: Its highly addictive nature made it attractive to dealers, and the immediate high following inhalation, combined with the lower cost compared with powder cocaine, made it attractive to users. With its increasing availability and the perception that it was related to violent street crime, legislators, with the urging and full support of the Congressional Black Caucus, quickly passed legislation that enhanced criminal sanctions for drug dealers convicted of selling crack. For example, drug dealers selling small amounts of crack often received the same sentence as someone in possession of 100 times the amount of powder cocaine. Because crack was disproportionately sold in African American communities, more than 85% of those receiving the lengthier sentences were African Americans.

In the early 1990s, even though the number for total juvenile crime was declining, there was a spike in violent crimes committed by juveniles. This spike included offenses such as murder and nonnegligent manslaughter, forcible rape, robbery, and aggravated assault. This led many social pundits, criminologists, and the media to provide social commentaries about a new type of juvenile offender; this new breed of delinquent was characterized as impulsive and brutal, with tendencies to show no remorse, often using or dealing illegal narcotics and being armed with powerful guns. This "superpredator" became the focus of media fascination worldwide, often increasing parental fear of one's own children and laying the foundation for passage of some of the most punitive legislation for juvenile offenders ever enacted.

Approaching the second decade of the 21st century, U.S. society continues to experience the effects of juvenile delinquency, although not to the alarming extent that some had predicted. Barring a shift in editorial and broadcast policies by the newspaper and television industries, however, the daunting image of juvenile delinquency, too often represented as a young Black male terrorizing society, will remain in public view.

John A. McConnell

See also African American Gangs; Criminalblackman; Delinquency and Victimization; Juvenile Waivers to Adult Court; Moral Panics; Racialization of Crime; Sentencing Disparities, African Americans; Superpredators; Willie Bosket Law

Further Readings

- Cohen, S. (1972). Folk devils and moral panics: The creation of the Mods and Rockers. London: MacGibbon & Kee.
- Dilulio, J. (1995). The coming of the super-predators. The Weekly Standard, 1(11), 23.
- Domanick, J. (2008, January 6). Prisoners of panic: Media hype and political quick fixes have swelled our inmate population. Los Angeles Times. Available at <http://www.latimes.com>
- Federal Bureau of Investigation. (1996). Uniform crime report: Crime in the United States, 1995. Retrieved from <http://www.fbi.gov/ucr/95cius.htm>
- Federal Bureau of Investigation. (2007). Uniform crime report: Crime in the United States, 2006. Retrieved from http://www.fbi.gov/ucr/cius2006/data/table_43.html
- Jan, I. F., Ball, J. D., & Walsh, A. (2008). Predicting public opinion about juvenile waivers. Criminal Justice Policy Review, 3, 285-300.
- Lowry, D. T., Nio, T. C., & Leitner, D. W. (2003, March). Setting the public fear agenda: A longitudinal analysis of network TV crime reporting, public perceptions of crime, and FBI crime statistics. Journal of Communications, 53(1), 61-73.

Pizarro, J. M., Chermak, S. M., & Gruenewald, J. A. (2007). Juvenile "super-predators" in the news: A comparison of adult and juvenile homicides. Journal of Criminal Justice and Popular Culture, 14(1), 84–111.

Tiegreen, S., & Newman, E. (2006, November). How are crime and violence covered in the news? Comparing reporting with reality [Fact sheet]. Retrieved from http://www.dartcenter.org/research/fact_sheets/fact_sheet5.php

PUBLIC OPINION, POLICE

Since the late 1960s, there has been a rich tradition in criminological research studying public opinion of police. Such research is important because it provides a knowledge base for policy-makers and police administrators to design and implement better policies and practices that can enhance public support and subsequently improve police accountability and police–community relations. Given the gate-keeping role that the police play in the contemporary criminal justice system, negative perceptions toward the police not only reduce the ability of police to control and prevent crime but also undermine public trust in the legitimacy of law enforcement, the criminal justice system, and even the whole government. History has shown that when the relationship between police and citizens, particularly residents in minority communities, is intense, a single, high-profile incident can trigger deteriorating effects, such as deadly confrontations between police and citizens and urban riots. Indeed, research has shown that public ratings of police declined precipitously after major incidents of police brutality, such as the 1991 beating of Rodney King, and the 1996 assaulting of two Mexican immigrants in California.

Nevertheless, research on public opinion of police has consistently found widespread positive evaluations of the police. The majority of Americans give the police very favorable ratings, especially in areas such as responding quickly to calls for help and assistance, not using excessive force, and being helpful and friendly. Nationwide surveys repeatedly show that the general public rates the police more favorably than many other professions, such as college professors, bankers, journalists, lawyers, elected officials, and union leaders. Studies also indicate that the level of satisfaction and support for police varies by individual demographic characteristics, crime and criminal justice experiences, and neighborhood contexts.

Individual Demographic Characteristics

Race

Race has been the focal concern of a considerable number of studies on public opinion of police. Racial minorities, African Americans in the case of the majority of research, are found to be less likely than Whites to view the police favorably. The racial difference can be explained using two theoretical frameworks: the sense-of-injustice perspective and the group-position perspective. The sense-of-injustice perspective posits that racial minorities, especially African Americans, tend to have a less-favorable view of police because they are more likely to have a sense of unequal treatment by the criminal justice system, in general, and the police, in particular. Two sources may contribute to the higher level of sense of injustice among African Americans. First, they are consistently overrepresented in the criminal justice system, which has generated serious concerns among Blacks about the fairness of American law enforcement. Second, African Americans are more likely to be victims of both violent and property crimes, which has raised the question of equal protection by police.

The group-position perspective asserts that group orientations toward social institutions spring mainly from a sense of group position. As members of the dominant group, Whites tend to share a sense of superiority and are more likely to hold favorable opinions of the police because they perceive this social institution as providing critical and scarce resources to which they are entitled and with which their interests and superiority are ensured. The stereotyping images of African Americans (e.g., more violent and prone to crime) commonly held by many Whites also lead to strong support among Whites for aggressive law enforcement against African Americans and their neighborhoods. Racial prejudice associated with a sense of group position thus is one of the key factors differentiating Blacks' and Whites' views of the police.

Class

Class, or socioeconomic status, is another factor that influences public opinion of police. As with race, both the sense-of-injustice and the group-position perspectives are appropriate for the explanation of class differences in attitudes toward police. The sense-of-injustice perspective suggests that working-class people hold less-favorable attitudes toward police than wealthy people because they are more likely to be the subjects of police control actions. Similarly, the group-position perspective suggests that members of a higher socioeconomic tier are more inclined to have a close relationship with police because they rely on the police to serve their interests.

A number of empirical studies have found that people in the lower socioeconomic status are more likely to have less-favorable attitudes toward police than are the wealthy. Other studies argue that class conditions the relationship between race and satisfaction with police, but the findings are less conclusive. Whereas some find that Blacks' perceptions of the police become more positive as they move up the social structure, others show that wealthy Blacks are more likely than poor Blacks to be less supportive of the police. Still others find that economically and educationally advantaged Blacks have more-favorable evaluations of police.

Age

It has been widely observed that younger citizens tend to have less-favorable attitudes toward police than older citizens. Some researchers actually argue that age is the strongest predictor among all individual demographic characteristics. This age effect could be explained by the different orientations that people have: Younger people are more freedom oriented, whereas older people are more safety oriented. In addition, the types of contact between youth and police could be the determinants of the less-favorable attitudes toward police. Younger people are more likely to engage in risky behaviors than are elderly people; thus they are more likely to have negative or involuntary encounters with the police. It is also argued that youth do not hold negative perceptions of the police but are just indifferent in their opinion of police.

Gender

Findings on the impact of gender on public opinion of the police are more equivocal. Studies demonstrated that males tend to hold less-favorable attitudes toward police than females, while a few others reached exactly the opposite conclusion. Moreover, an interactive effect may exist between age and gender. For example, younger men tend to hold the most negative attitudes toward police.

Crime and Criminal Justice Experience

Victimization and Fear of Victimization

Researchers have yet to reach a consensus on the relationship between victimization and satisfaction with police. Some early studies found that neither having a recent experience as a crime victim nor being threatened with criminal victimization (either property or personal crime) affected attitudes toward police. More recent studies, however, indicated that victimization experiences tended to increase unfavorable attitudes toward police. Studies also discovered that the effect of victimization on perception of police could vary by race. For example, victimization could be negatively associated with perception of police for Whites but not for Blacks.

The most satisfied crime victims are those who perceived police officers as helpful, concerned, and courteous. A study done in New Zealand showed that younger victims, victims of burglary, and victims who were beneficiaries were more likely than other types of victims to express higher levels of dissatisfaction with police responses. Two top reasons that victims give for their dissatisfaction were reported: The police had not done enough, and the police appeared uninterested.

Contact With Police

It can be argued that regardless of the nature of contacts, as the number of contacts with police increases, the level of public satisfaction with police decreases. However, the majority of studies on the relationship between contact with police and public opinion of police reveal a more complex picture, in which the relationship can vary by two main factors: the type of police contact and the performance of the police on the scene.

Generally speaking, people who come in contact with police involuntarily are more likely to hold less-positive views than those who come in contact with police voluntarily. For example, individuals who came into contact as a result of criminal victimization or traffic stops tended to express lower levels of satisfaction with police, whereas individuals who called for service did not show such a trend. A recent study, however, found that it was not the contact type, but the satisfaction level with the contact, that determined the overall satisfaction with police. Researchers reported that individuals who were satisfied with either a call for service or a traffic stop were more satisfied with police than persons who had no contact with police at all. Other researchers have argued that the positive interactions between police and residents do not improve public opinion of police. Rather, it was the simple visibility of officers in the neighborhoods that contributed to the positive evaluation of the police.

Officers' actions on the crime scene are also important predictors. The length of the response time, the efforts that officers take to explain their course of action, and the attitudes they hold toward average citizens can all affect public opinion of police. Moreover, the effects of individual demographic characteristics on public perception of the police can function primarily through the mediating effects of these experiential, on-scene factors. The close relationship between the way in which citizens are treated and their positive perceptions of the police reinforces the notion that perceptions of procedural fairness and justice are as important as, if not more important than, perceptions of fair outcome.

Neighborhood Contexts

Racial Composition

The effects of neighborhood characteristics on public opinion of police are relatively underresearched. A small number of studies have reported a link between neighborhood racial makeup and attitudes toward police. For example, studies have found that African Americans' dissatisfaction with police decreased from all-Black, to most-Black, to mixed and to most-White neighborhoods, whereas Whites' dissatisfaction increased each step of the way from all-White to most-Black neighborhoods. Researchers claimed that it is not the color of skin but the color of the neighborhood that is associated with dissatisfaction with police.

A possible interaction between individual racial background and neighborhood racial composition has been noted. Researchers found that African Americans' perceptions of the quality of police services declined when the percentage of African Americans in the neighborhood rose, but Whites' perceptions were not significantly related to neighborhood percentage of African Americans. The interactive effects between neighborhood racial composition and class level have also been revealed. For example, it was found that there were attitudinal variations between Blacks in a Black middle-class neighborhood and Blacks in a Black lower-class neighborhood, with Blacks in the middle-class neighborhood being more skeptical of the ability of the police to use discretion without racial discrimination.

Class Composition

Some researchers argue that the crucial factor in shaping public perception of police misconduct or police-community relationship is neighborhood class position, rather than neighborhood racial composition or individual class. Based on data collected from three neighborhoods in Washington, D.C., one research study found that residents of a Black lower-class neighborhood were more likely than those who lived in a Black middle-class or a White middle-class neighborhood to perceive or experience police abuse. In addition, it was found that residents in the Black middle-class neighborhood were more likely to perceive fair police treatment than those in the Black lower-class and White middle-class neighborhoods.

The connection between neighborhood racial composition and class position is most evident in recent research that has incorporated percentage of Blacks into the scale of neighborhood class status and created a new concept of concentrated disadvantage. Concentrated disadvantage represents an economic disadvantage factor in racially segregated urban neighborhoods that is characterized by percentages of Black, poverty, public assistance, unemployment, and female-headed households. Concentrated disadvantage has been found to be inversely related to satisfaction with the police.

Crime Rates

Public perceptions of the police could be a function of the real or perceived crime problems in neighborhoods. It has been found that people who reside in high-crime neighborhoods and people who are fearful of crime in their neighborhoods tend to hold less-positive views of police. The violent crime rate could be a significant factor in explaining why residents of concentrated disadvantaged neighborhoods are the most dissatisfied with police. It is also reasonable to expect that high crime rates have their independent impact on resident satisfaction with local police. High crime rates can heighten people's fear of crime and undermine their confidence in the ability of police to control crime. Meanwhile, more police officers are assigned to the high-crime-rate areas, which might increase the negative or involuntary encounters between residents with officers and subsequently lead to lower satisfaction with the police.

Yuning Wu and Ivan Y. Sun

See also Police Action, Citizens' Preferences; President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice; Public Opinion, Punishment; Public Opinion Polls

Further Readings

- Apple, N., & O'Brien, D. (1983). Neighborhood racial composition and residents' evaluation of police performance. Journal of Police Science & Administration, 11, 76–84.
- Brown, B., & Benedict, W. (2002). Perceptions of the police: Past findings, methodological issues, conceptual issues and policy implications. Policing: An International Journal of Police Strategies & Management, 25, 543–580.
- Cao, L., Frank, J., & Cullen, F. (1996). Race, community context and confidence in the police. American Journal of Police, 15, 3–22.

- Dunham, R., & Alpert, G. (1988). Neighborhood differences in attitudes toward policing: Evidence for a mixed-strategy model of policing in a multi-ethnic setting. Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology, 79, 504–523.
- Frank, J., Smith, B., & Novak, K. (2005). Exploring the basis of citizens' attitudes toward the police. Police Quarterly, 8, 206–228.
- Jesilow, P., Meyer, J., & Namazzi, N. (1995). Public attitudes toward the police. American Journal of the Police, 14, 67–88.
- Reisig, M., & Parks, R. (2000). Experience, quality of life, and neighborhood context: A hierarchical analysis of satisfaction with police. Justice Quarterly, 17, 607–630.
- Tyler, T. (2005). Policing in Black and White: Ethnic group differences in trust and confidence in the police. Police Quarterly, 8, 322–342.
- Weitzer, R., & Tuch, S. (2002). Perceptions of racial profiling: Race, class, and personal experience. Criminology, 40, 435–457.

PUBLIC OPINION, PUNISHMENT

The relationship between public opinion and punishment in the United States has recently come to the forefront of criminological and criminal justice scholarship. Much of this is due to the political context in which criminal justice policy is discussed—a context that hinges on political rhetoric and attempts to justify tough crime policies by referencing the “will of the people.” However, the people referenced are not a homogenous group of “tough on crime” advocates. New scholarship in this area has highlighted the diverse perspectives Americans have on capital punishment, three strikes legislation, and rehabilitation as a component of, or alternative to, incarceration. More specifically, research in this area suggests a rather ubiquitous influence of race and ethnicity on perceptions of punishment and fairness of justice systems. Accordingly, this entry examines the current state of public opinion on punishment by reviewing new scholarship in this area and further describes how research in the area of race and ethnicity has contributed to the debates about perceptions of disparity in the criminal justice system and punishment.

Current State of Public Opinion and Punishment Studies

Most scholarship on public opinion and punishment has been focused on capital punishment for adult offenders, possibly because this issue can be seen as politically divisive and a powerful way to get Americans engaged in political debates about crime and punishment. As such, a considerable amount of scholarship has highlighted several noteworthy trends regarding the preferences of individuals' attitudes toward the death penalty. For example, some scholars have suggested that on average most Americans support capital punishment for cases where the defendant has been convicted of murder. The levels of support, however, are lower and less consistent for other criminal offenses. Research in this area has found over the past 25 to 50 years, between 66% and 80% of Americans say they support capital punishment.

Scholarship outside the study of public opinion and punishment has recently called attention to the issue of executing the innocent. The Innocence Project and Frontline's documentary Burden of Innocence have suggested that there have been individuals wrongfully executed, and there remain many more people who could potentially be exonerated through the use of DNA testing, thus calling into question the issues of fairness, consistency, and justice with respect to this type of crime policy and punishment technique. Owing to technological advances and prisoner rights advocacy groups, new questions have emerged that may shake the foundation on which individuals justify their beliefs—namely, the belief in a fair and equitable system. Because of this, new theories and empirical studies have investigated the links between public opinion and support for capital punishment. The data suggest that the belief that innocent people have been executed has an overall impact on levels of support for capital punishment and is most notable among minority groups, which are often the ones most affected by injustices in the U.S. system of corrections.

Moving beyond work focused solely on capital punishment, recent scholarship has called attention to changing support for correctional rehabilitation programs, perceptions about the goals of prisons, and alternative ways of processing and punishing juvenile offenders. Work in this area has tried to uncover what the differences are in what Americans believe prisons are doing and what they expect the justice system should be doing. The innovative findings of this body of work suggest that the American public may not in fact be as punitive as previously thought after looking solely at support for capital punishment. In fact, the majority of Americans would prefer to see rehabilitation as a central component of incarceration. These findings are even more impressive when children are considered. Specifically, the American public has been more concerned with helping children who fall into the criminal justice system and who have historically been thought to be more amenable to treatment than adults. As such, the American public tends to favor funding programs that are intended to rehabilitate rather than incarcerate.

Race and Ethnicity: The Enduring Cleavage

Recent scholarship that focuses on racial and ethnic cleavages has further contributed to the understanding of Americans' support for various justice policies. Work in this area has sought to better explain variation in levels of support for different kinds of punishment as a function of racial cleavages. Most notable findings of this work suggest that minorities are far less supportive of capital punishment and three strikes legislation, which mandates life sentences for repeat felony offenders. The evidence derived from this body of work suggests that an individual's racial/ethnic background has a significant effect on his or her support or opposition to capital punishment. The greatest difference in levels of punitiveness is between Blacks and Whites, with Latinos falling somewhere in the middle. Essentially it appears that Americans have fundamentally different worldviews of what American justice is and how it functions.

The scholarship reviewed suggests that race/ethnicity is still an enduring factor that shapes public perceptions about social policy, criminal justice, fairness, and the use of capital punishment. Future scholars should more thoroughly consider what public sentiment is being cited in justification for tough-on-crime sentencing and policies, and who is being affected.

Jennifer Christian

See also Death Penalty; Public Opinion, Death Penalty; Public Opinion Polls

Further Readings

- Callanan, V. J. (2005). Feeding the fear of crime: Crime-related media and the support for three strikes. New York: LFB Scholarly.
- Roberts, J. V., Hough, M., & Hough, J. M. (Eds.). (2002). Changing attitudes to punishment: Public opinion, crime and justice. Portland, OR: Willan.
- Unnever, J. D., & Cullen, F. T. (2007). Reassessing the racial divide in support for capital punishment: The continuing significance of race. Journal of Crime and Delinquency, 44, 127–158.

PUBLIC OPINION POLLS

Public opinion polls have become commonplace in the United States. Polls, sometimes referred to as surveys, are the systematic collection of opinions, attitudes, and perceptions of citizens, usually captured by way of a sample of some larger population. Writing in the 1920s, the journalist and political commentator Walter Lippmann expressed antipathy to polling citizens, believing that knowing what ordinary citizens think about a particular social issue would be no help to those whose purpose it was to make decisions about public policy. During the same period, George Gallup and Elmo Roper believed just the opposite, arguing forcefully that what people think quite often can put people in and out of public office, contribute to decisions about whether to take the nation to war, and can set the tone and the standard for public morality in general. The first Gallup poll, for example, received quite a debut in The Washington Post, with a headline that noted the poll's contribution to government through Americans' speaking their minds.

Since the first Gallup poll in 1935, there has been an explosion in public opinion surveys. There is little doubt that findings from these polls are taken seriously by elected officials. Political campaigns and the media alike pay homage to public opinion polls, releasing continuous information about where political candidates stand in the eyes of the public and from one day to the next.

Other surveys ask questions about a host of societal issues other than politics. Thousands of polls and surveys are conducted each year, and one would be hard pressed to find an individual over the age of 18 who has not been asked to take part in a poll. Just as is the case with most scientific research, race and/or ethnicity is often included as a question in public polling to enable comparisons among various subgroups of the population.

Public Polling or Surveys in the Social Sciences

In the social sciences, survey research is one of the most widely used methodologies. The U.S. Census has played a major role in the employment and proliferation of this type of research. The purpose of the census is to provide up-to-date information about the demographic and economic profiles of U.S. citizens. It does so while trying to capture information within all U.S. households and, as such, is often considered to be a study of an entire population as opposed to a survey of a sample of that greater population. Nonetheless, the work of the U.S. Census has provided an invaluable roadmap for researchers when it comes to questionnaire design and the use of various sampling techniques.

Major universities often house centers or institutes whose sole purpose is to engage in public opinion surveying. In these survey research centers, faculty and students, as well as public and private clients, make use of modern techniques such as the computer-assisted telephone interviewing system for random-digit-dialing telephone surveys. The American Association for Public Opinion Research serves as a major resource for novice and experienced scholars of the survey research method.

The types of questions included in public opinion surveys in the social sciences vary widely and are directly related to the interest of the researcher or the agency or organization on behalf of whom a study is being conducted. For example, the Texas Crime Poll, conducted by the Survey Research Center of the College of Criminal Justice at Sam Houston State University, has been asking the public what it thinks about crime and justice since the 1970s. The crime poll was administered by way of a mail survey for over 2 decades and in the 1990s began to make use of telephone surveying techniques. As with other repeat polls and surveys, the Texas Crime Poll, conducted annually, makes use of a base set of questions, such as attitudes toward rehabilitation or opinions about the death penalty. Those base questions are asked every year in an effort to measure the extent to which public opinion might be shifting over time. In addition, questions about “hot topic” issues are included in order to gauge how Texans think about them. Every year, the results of the Texas Crime Poll are widely disseminated to members of the Texas legislature, county and local officials, and other public officials and agencies. Just as was noted by Gallup in the early days of polling, there is a general notion that officials pay attention to public opinion as represented in the Texas Crime Poll and others like it around the country.

On a national level, the National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS) randomly selects households, approximately 66,000 or so, and asks questions of participants about their personal victimization experiences. Questions are included that capture information about the characteristics of the victim, the offender, and the event. As such, the NCVS is thought to obtain the so-called dark figure of crime that is associated with crime data from the Federal Bureau of Investigation’s Uniform Crime Reports, those crimes reported to the police and for which arrests were made.

Another example of a national public opinion survey is the National Survey on Drug Use and Health, formerly the National Household Survey on Drug Abuse. This study yields estimates of substance abuse patterns and behaviors. In 2006, for example, the survey found no significant differences between White and African American youth when it comes to illicit drug use.

There are countless other national, state, and local polls and surveys whose aim it is to better illuminate the mind of the public. As mentioned earlier, one variable that is typically included in these studies, regardless of the subject matter, is race/ethnicity. It is almost always hypothesized that there are key and statistically significant differences among various racial and/or ethnic groups. These hypotheses, however, are not without basis. Rather, they have been shown to have ample support in survey research that has been completed over time and in different geographical locations (e.g., urban vs. rural or suburban areas).

Key Examples of Differences by Race/Ethnicity in Public Opinion Research on Crime and Justice

Many studies have examined differences by race/ethnicity in attitudes toward the police. Most studies suggest statistically significant differences, for example, between Whites and African Americans, with the latter being far less satisfied with their local police. This finding usually remains the same regardless of the type of contact with the police, that is, whether police or the citizen initiated the contact. In the most recent research, however, there seems to be a shift in the data. Evidence now suggests that in some locations, African Americans actually hold more positive attitudes toward their local police than do their White counterparts. This is explained, at least in part, by a change in the demographics of the city and, simultaneously, by the hiring of more African American police leaders and the election of African American mayors. Another explanation, however, is that African Americans who reside in socially disorganized, high crime areas have developed a positive relationship with the police (due to greater responsiveness on the part of the police) in that citizens are sometimes forced to call upon the police to solve crime-related problems. Regardless of which group holds more negative attitudes toward local police and under what conditions, the fact remains that there are statistically significant differences between these two demographic groups.

Most public opinion research on crime and justice suggests also statistically significant differences between Whites and African Americans when it comes to attitudes toward the key purpose of punishment. Whereas African Americans are more likely to express support for rehabilitation, Whites are more likely to support retribution or incapacitation. Also, African Americans are more likely to oppose capital punishment than are Whites.

Researchers have long theorized about why these differences exist, arguing most often that African Americans are less likely than Whites to believe that the criminal justice system in general is fair, just, and free of bias. The racial divide on punishment questions, therefore, could be explained by distrust of the system among minorities.

In attitudes toward capital punishment, for example, there is evidence to suggest that the race of the offender and of the victim matters when it comes to prosecutors' decision to seek the death penalty in capital punishment states. Other evidence suggests disparate treatment between Whites and African Americans when it comes to plea bargaining and non-death penalty offenses. Although an argument suggesting that the entire U.S. criminal justice system is racist would probably fail—and findings from several national studies sponsored by the National Institute of Justice dispute such an argument—there is much scientific evidence from both quantitative and qualitative studies to support the contention that such disparities do exist within various pockets of the system and across geographical boundaries. Thus, it is not surprising that those most likely to feel the brunt of these racial disparities, namely African Americans, might express different opinions about, or attitudes toward, the criminal justice system and people who work within it.

Conclusion

Public opinion polls seek to gauge the views of the citizenry. As such, they provide invaluable data for social and political scientists as well as for elected officials and policymakers. Survey research will continue to be a widely used social science method. One caution is called for, however, when it comes to attempts to examine the differences between one racial/ethnic group and another. Users of the data from key public opinion polls and/or surveys would be mistaken to conclude that any one group is monolithic in its thinking. Surely all African Americans do not think alike; no less so than do Whites, Hispanics/Latinos, Asians or members of any other demographic group. Although, statistically significant differences exist between Whites and African Americans with respect to crime and justice in the United States, sweeping generalizations about intraracial thinking on these issues should be avoided.

Barbara Sims

See also Public Opinion, Death Penalty; Public Opinion, Juvenile Delinquency; Public Opinion, Police; Public Opinion, Punishment

Further Readings

- Bradburn, N. M., & Seymour, S. (1988). Polls and surveys: Understanding what they tell us. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass.
- Cochran, J. K., & Chamlin, M. B. (2005). The enduring racial divide in death penalty support. Journal of Criminal Justice, 34, 85–99.
- Flanagan, T., & Longmire, D. (Eds.). (1996). Americans view crime and justice: A national survey of public opinion. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
- Frank, J., Brandl, S. G., Cullen, F. T., & Stichman, A. (1996). Reassessing the impact of race on citizens' attitudes toward the police: A research note. Justice Quarterly, 13(2), 321–334.
- Sims, B., Hooper, M., & Peterson, S. (2002). Determinants of citizens' attitudes toward police: Results of the Harrisburg Citizen Survey—1999. Policing: An International Journal of Police Strategies and Management, 25(3), 457–471.

PUERTO RICAN LEGAL DEFENSE AND EDUCATION FUND

See LatinoJustice PRLDEF

RACE CARD, PLAYING THE

“Playing the race card” is a derogatory phrase that refers to unnecessarily and inflammatorily interjecting the issue of race into a discussion, particularly when dealing with important socio-political events or criminal justice issues. It is extremely important to the study of criminal justice because of the need to accurately understand the true nature of crime and victimization rather than being distracted by superfluous issues that have little to do with a given problem. The race card can victimize members of any race but is most commonly aimed at portraying Whites as racist. Playing the race card has become standard operating procedure today concerning the issue of illegal immigration.

Typically, the race card is played as a way of obfuscating issues. For example, when Cynthia McKinney (former U.S. House of Representatives member from Georgia) physically attacked a Capitol Hill police officer in Washington, D.C., and was subsequently arrested, race card players argued that she was being targeted because she was Black and not because of her abusive and assaultive behavior. Similarly, when Ray Rhodes was fired as the head coach of the National Football League’s Green Bay Packers, it was argued that it was not because of missing the playoffs with a mediocre 8–8 record, but because he was Black. In New Orleans, Mayor Ray Nagin was given ample warning that Hurricane Katrina was headed directly toward his city, one that is below sea level and therefore vulnerable to flooding. Rather than use all available school buses to evacuate the city, he chose to do little. Mayor Nagin delayed the evacuation order, had no one ready to drive the buses, neglected to prepare the Superdome with supplies, and allowed looters to run amok while police stood by. The race card players choose to blame the resulting deaths not on an incompetent Black mayor but rather on racism emanating from Washington, D.C. Former President George W. Bush, a Republican, was routinely excoriated because of a poor response by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, and some critics charged that he intentionally let people die in New Orleans because poor Blacks have a history of voting overwhelmingly Democratic. Playing the race card made it more difficult to objectively analyze the cause of the flood damage as well as how to improve the response of federal, state, and local governments to reduce the loss of life in future crises.

The issue of illegal immigration also provides an illustration of playing the race card. The traditional theme consistent with playing the race card involves portraying Americans as preoccupied with the race of illegal immigrants rather than the behaviors in which they engage. For example, it is not uncommon to see headlines such as “Is Racism Fueling the Immigration Debate?” “Racist Groups Exploit Immigration Issues in Effort to Promote Anti-Hispanic Agenda,” “Anti-Immigrant Sentiments Fuel Ku Klux Klan Resurgence,” “Anti-Immigrant Racism in the U.S. Growing,” and “Deadly Toll of Anti-Immigrant Racism.” According to this line of reasoning, the enforcement of federal immigration laws is motivated by an intense paranoia that the United States will be overrun by darker-skinned people. In this case, playing the race card focuses attention on immutable traits such as race while largely ignoring behaviors such as crime and disorder that can be controlled.

It is difficult to measure precisely the impact that illegal aliens have on crime rates. One difficulty is that sanctuary cities prohibit local police from inquiring about an illegal alien's citizenship status. However, a review of available crime statistics in America indicates that illegal aliens are substantially represented in serious crimes including human smuggling, drug smuggling, homicide, and assaults on U.S. Border Patrol agents. This population also strains the resources of hospitals in border cities and contributes to costs associated with law enforcement. There is evidence that illegal immigration has produced problems in the area of crime, gangs, and communicable diseases, and opponents of illegal immigration argue that their employment lowers wages for U.S. citizens, as well as damaging the health care and education systems and the social safety net. It is important to remember that all of these problems are related to behaviors of criminals and are not immutable traits such as race. Opponents of illegal immigration argue that playing the race card hinders an understanding of the complex relationship between criminal justice variables (e.g., causes of crime and victimization). They hold that playing the race card blurs the distinction between legal and illegal entry into the country by unnecessarily portraying supporters of border security as racists or xenophobes and undermines the nation's ability to address real problems associated with race relations.

Billy Long

See also Immigrants and Crime; O. J. Simpson Case; Racial Hoax

Further Readings

- Anti-Defamation League. (2005, April 15). Racist groups exploit immigration issues in effort to promote anti-Hispanic agenda [Press release]. Retrieved from http://www.adl.org/PresRele/Extremism_72/4731_72.htm
- Buchanan, P. J. (2002, July 15). Endlessly playing the race card [Commentary]. Retrieved from http://www.worldnetdaily.com/news/article.asp?ARTICLE_ID=28284

- MacDonald, H. (2004, Winter). The illegal alien crime wave. City Journal, 14(1). Retrieved from http://www.city-journal.org/html/14_1_the_illegal_alien.html
- Montes, C. (2006, February–March). Anti-immigrant racism in the U.S. growing [Commentary]. Retrieved from <http://www.fightbacknews.org/2006/01/immigrant.htm>
- Smith, S. (2006, May 26). Deadly toll of anti-immigrant racism. Retrieved from http://socialistworker.org/2006-1/590/590_07_AntiImmigrant.shtml

RACE RELATIONS

To truly understand race relations, one must understand race. As currently defined, a racial group is different from an ethnic group in that an ethnic group shares a common culture, whereas a racial group shares common physical characteristics. In the latest U.S. Census (2000), Asian, Black, and White were the only races identified. The term race has been used in various ways throughout history. For example, in 16th-century Europe, the word race was used in terms of one's ancestry—what we now call ethnicity. Although there is no scientific basis for determining racial categories, societies have learned to differentiate and classify race based on social beliefs and stereotypes associated with physical characteristics. Thus, racism (the belief that one race is superior to the other) becomes the ideological base in a society where physical traits are used to subjectively characterize a person or a group.

It has been shown that members of one racial group will likely see members of another racial group as being similar or different based on the attitudes and behaviors socially assigned to each of those racial categories, thus creating an “us and them” belief system. This process of categorizing creates an in-group and out-group, leading to a system of stereotyping marked by failure to see the similarities in each other's background sufficient to unite the groups as one.

Over the centuries, racial categories and classifications have changed and continue to do so. There are no specific genes that determine race (approximately .01% of our genes are reflected in our external appearances). Thus, in lieu of a blood test, people have chosen to use external differences (skin tone, hair texture, etc.) as a way to categorize and determine who belongs to each respective racial group. Sociologists have long argued that racial categories are designed to create an opportunity for those in the majority to socially and politically construct a ranking system through physical differentiation in order for those with lighter skin to gain and maintain power economically, politically, and socially. The biological and anthropological use of a person's or group's physical characteristics as the definition of race is a relatively new phenomenon (beginning mainly in the 19th century) and has allowed groups to socially rank each other on the basis of purported inferiority and superiority. For example, the Black (color of skin) race has been associated with social inferiority compared to the White race. In this example, the physical characteristics of a person have been singled out as inferior to another's physical characteristics. In turn, negative social stigmatization is associated with the subjectively inferior racial group, and positive characteristics are associated with the subjectively superior racial group.

As an example, research shows that if criminal behavior (negative) occurs at the same rate among members of both majority and minority groups, members of the majority group are more likely to develop prejudicial attitudes toward the minority group than toward their own. In addition, Whites in the United States tend to overestimate the crime rates of African American men. Such stereotyping and prejudicial patterns are thought to have an effect on arrest patterns, criminal prosecutions, and conviction rates.

Some groups are required to prove their ancestry to be accepted as part of a classified group (e.g., American Indian); others can classify themselves based on where they are from (e.g., German Americans taking on a White classification). However, many minority categories have not had the luxury to define the group that they would like to fit into because of an exclusionary process by the majority group (e.g., African Americans and the "one-drop" rule). In the 21st century, defining race is becoming more complicated because of the increasing number of mixed-race categories and with people (e.g., the athlete Tiger Woods) embracing this self-definition. In addition, with a growing U.S. Hispanic population, the topic of race takes on another dimension for debate. The newest generation is one that is accustomed to diversity and having people from "different" backgrounds within their intimate environments (schools, clubs, etc.). Adding to the complexity is the support among evolutionary biologists for sociologists who argue that race categories are socially constructed, because it has been concluded that all humans have origins in Africa.

The study of race relations is concerned with ways in which the various groups in a multiracial society or institution come together and interact over extended periods. Often race relations take the form of conflict; however, this is not always the case. Throughout U.S. history, cooperation and accommodation have been as common as conflict (e.g., the civil rights movement).

From the colonial period to the Civil War, African Americans were stereotyped as mentally inferior by European Americans. The belief that Blacks are not as intelligent or have lower moral standards became embedded throughout U.S. institutions (economic, educational, legal, political, etc.). Today Blacks are still fighting these embedded stereotypes. In addition, current rhetoric not only involves Black versus White but also White versus Brown and Black versus Brown. Often there is no clear-cut solution to solving the issues that created these conflicts. Still, the goal of any multiracial society should be to understand one another and the differences that exist among racial groups while celebrating their similarities as members of the human race.

Aaron Thompson

See also Ethnicity; Racial Conflict; Racism

Further Readings

- Baron, R. A., Byrne, D., & Brauscombe, N. R. (2006). Social psychology (11th ed.). Boston: Pearson.
- Cuseo, J. B., Fecas, V. S., & Thompson, A. (2007). Thriving in college and beyond: Research-based strategies for academic success & personal development. Dubuque, IA: Kendall/Hunt.
- Hamilton, D. L., & Sherman, S. J. (1989). Illusory correlations: Implications for stereotype theory and research. In D. Bar-Tal, C. F. Graumann, A. W. Kruglanski, & W. Strobe (Eds.), Stereotyping and prejudice: Changing conceptions (pp. 59–82). New York: Springer.

- Hawkins, D. F. (1995). Ethnicity, race, and crime: Perspectives across time and place. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Kennedy, R. (1997). Race, crime, and the law. New York: Random House.
- Myrdal, G. (1944). An American dilemma: The Negro problem and modern democracy. New Brunswick: Transaction Publishers.

RACE RIOTS

In the 19th and 20th centuries, hundreds of racially motivated battles—primarily between Whites and Blacks—occurred in all sections of the United States, including urban and rural areas. The causes, dynamics, outcome, and impact of each race riot were unique. But, they shared one common thread: an intense hostility between White and Black Americans rooted in long-standing and far-reaching economic, political, social, cultural, and legal oppression.

A historical analysis of race riots reveals that their basic character and contours changed markedly over time. In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, African Americans were nearly defenseless against White attacks. White mobs—often with the approval and support of police and governmental officials—attacked, murdered, and lynched Black citizens with impunity. White mobs struck Black neighborhoods with the force and savagery of an invading army, burning, looting, and killing. But toward the end of the Progressive era—particularly, the “Red Summer” of 1919—Blacks began to offer more resistance. Increasingly, race riots were initiated by African Americans. They became political expressions of racial alienation and resistance to pervasive White oppression—irrefutable evidence that there was, indeed, a wide disparity between the promise and practice of American freedom, equality, and justice.

19th-Century Riots: The Mechanics of Race Control

Race riots were relatively rare before the Civil War. There were, perhaps, 40 race battles in the antebellum period. Blacks were regularly subjected to mob assaults and “crackdowns” following real and rumored slave revolts. But slave codes, Black codes, and the oppressive gaze of the White community were generally effective at keeping “niggers”—both slaves and free Blacks—in their “proper place” in the economic, political, social, cultural, and legal order. Blacks were generally reluctant to respond to White assaults. Violent Black protest in the antebellum period was tantamount to suicide.

The 1863 New York City Draft Riot was, to that point, the largest race riot in American history. For many years New York City’s poor and working-class Whites had been harboring resentment against Blacks, who offered competition for jobs. However, two events played a central role in sparking the riot. President Lincoln’s Emancipation Proclamation, issued in January of 1863, implied that working-class Whites were now fighting in the Civil War to free Blacks, not preserve the Union. The passage of the Conscription Act in March of 1863 further infuriated White workers. This legislation introduced a draft for White males but not Black males; it also allowed rich Whites to hire an alternate for $300 to take their place. Simply stated, the bloody conflagration was a poor White man’s war.

On July 13, 1863, the first day of formal conscription, thousands of workers, including many Irish immigrants, took to the streets carrying “No Draft” signs. Mobs of angry White men and women formed all over the city. Telegraph lines were cut, stores were broken into, and symbols of state authority were attacked. The mob burned draft offices and assaulted policemen and firemen. Mobs then began to turn their attention to Chinese peddlers, German and Jewish store owners, and other despised minorities. The greater share of the mob’s rage was, however, aimed at one group: Blacks.

Black men, women, and children were subjected to unprovoked savage attacks. Mobs invaded Black neighborhoods, dragging Negroes from their homes. They were shot, beaten, stabbed, and hanged from lampposts. The Colored Orphan Asylum was attacked and set on fire. Over the course of 5 days, dozens of Blacks were assaulted and killed and thousands fled the city. Order was not restored until federal troops, returning from the battle of Gettysburg, were called in to police the city. The New York City Draft Riot set the stage for ensuing race wars: Blacks could be attacked and murdered with impunity.

Other late 19th- and early 20th-century race wars and “clearances”—calculated attacks aimed at driving Blacks out of an area—were, with isolated exceptions, also one-sided assaults on African Americans. In 1898 the White citizens of Wilmington, North Carolina, became enraged when an editorial in a Black newspaper stated that many sexual contacts between White women and Black men were consensual, not the product of rape by “savage Black beasts.” The mob burned down the newspaper and raided Black neighborhoods, focusing on successful propertied citizens—“uppity niggers.” Fifteen hundred Blacks were forced to leave the city. Their houses, businesses, and personal property were looted and confiscated.

Nineteenth-century riots were not, however, solely aimed at Blacks. Nativism, xenophobia, and religious conflicts, as well as disputes between workers and capitalists, also sparked violent confrontations. In 1871, for example, White mobs in Los Angeles attacked Chinese workers, who had been imported to build the railroads, killing 18. The 1870 New York City Orange Day Parade, held by Protestants to celebrate the victory of William of Orange over Catholic King James II at the 1690 Battle of the Boyne in Ireland, resulted in a riot that left 6 dead. The 1871 Orange Parade was even more deadly, as 60 were killed and hundreds wounded. Hundreds of labor wars, many taking the form of riots, occurred in the late 19th century. A series of strikes in 1877, and again in the early 1890s, were particularly violent. Hundreds of workers were injured or killed in such labor battles.

Progressive Era Riots: The Rise of the “New Negro” and Black Resistance

Race riots continued during the Progressive era. Attacks on Blacks in Springfield, Ohio (1904); Atlanta, Georgia (1906); Greensburg, Indiana (1906); Springfield, Illinois (1908); East St. Louis, Illinois (1917); Tulsa, Oklahoma (1921); and Rosewood, Florida (1923), to mention just a few, were aimed at striking fear in Black communities. Blacks were often reluctant to respond. They lacked weapons, leadership, cohesion, and communications systems. Beyond that, they knew that resistance invited harsh retaliation. The full force of the law and the criminal justice system would be arrayed against them. If necessary, local police would be reinforced by state militias and federal troops to quell Black resistance—and courts would not be lenient.

There were, however, instances of courageous Black resistance. A 1900 race riot in New Orleans—the “Robert Charles Rebellion”—signaled the beginning of a new era in racial confrontations. On the night of July 24, 1900, three White police officers stopped to question what they considered two suspicious-looking Black males who were sitting on a porch stoop. Robert Charles and Leonard Pierce were merely waiting for a friend, but the police suspected that they might be planning a burglary. The interrogation was brief. When Robert Charles rose, one of the officers struck him with a club. Charles and the officer drew their guns and fired. The officer was shot in the hip. Charles was slightly wounded in the leg but managed to escape.

Charles knew that shooting a White New Orleans police officer was a capital, if not lynching, offense. In essence, he was marked for death. But he was determined not to go peacefully. Charles returned to his rooming house and got his Winchester rifle, along with ammunition. When the police came to arrest him, he shot and killed two officers, including a police captain. Over the next 4 days, Charles eluded the police and thousands of enraged mob members, who were ravaging Black neighborhoods. Charles was finally cornered and killed on July 28, but the carnage and consequences of his 4-day resistance were staggering: Twenty-seven White men had been shot; seven were dead, including four policemen. Robert Charles was a hero to African Americans across the nation—a symbol that they could stand up to White mobs, as well as bigotry and oppression.

Modern Race Riots: Black Resistance and Political Protest

The “Red Summer” of 1919 marked a pivotal turning point in the history of race riots. Chronic poverty, Jim Crow laws, unchecked lynching, police brutality, segregated schools, and overt discrimination in employment, housing, recreation, public transportation, and virtually every other aspect of society—including restaurants, “colored only” water fountains, even cemeteries—took its toll. In 1919, 25 significant race riots exploded across the United States. The causes and dynamics of each of these race wars were, once again, unique. However, there were two major changes from past conflicts: (1) African Americans met White violence with spirited resistance, and (2) Blacks initiated race riots as a form of protest against White hypocrisy and oppression.

The 1919 Chicago Race Riot was particularly violent. On July 27 a Black boy who had crossed an imaginary “colored only” line in Lake Michigan was, it was reported, stoned by White beachgoers and drowned. Blacks were enraged. Groups of angry Blacks formed across the city. Violence erupted. After 13 days of riots, 38 were dead (23 Blacks and 15 Whites), more than 500 were injured, and 1,000 families, mostly Black, were homeless. This race war—coupled with 1919 riots that followed in Knoxville, Tennessee; Omaha, Nebraska; Elaine, Arkansas; and other cities—stunned Whites and sent a clear message: African Americans would defend their homes and families.

The 1935 Harlem Race Riot reflected the new willingness of African Americans to use collective violence as a tool of political, social, economic, and legal protest. On March 19 a rumor engulfed the city: A Black youth caught shoplifting a knife had been beaten to death. Black citizens—angry over ongoing police brutality, high prices charged by store owners, discrimination in hiring, and the general effects of the Depression—struck back. Two hundred stores were looted, resulting in more than $2 million in damage.

The riots of the 1960s were, however, particularly striking. Starting in the summer of 1964, dozens of race riots occurred in cities across the nation. Black rioters looted stores and burned cars and businesses, striking fear in White neighborhoods. Americans watched Black rioters battle policemen and national guardsmen on television. America’s major cities—New York, Los Angeles, Philadelphia, Newark, Chicago, Detroit—were under siege, with rioters chanting “burn, baby, burn.” The body count was staggering: Six days of rioting in Los Angeles in 1965 left 34 dead; in 1967, 23 died in Newark and 43 in Detroit. These race wars, coupled with peaceful civil rights protests led by Martin Luther King, Jr., and other moderate Black leaders, called the attention of the world to the plight of African Americans and impact of ongoing American racism.

Since the 1960s, major race riots have become relatively infrequent. The death of an unarmed Black man, Arthur McDuffie, at the hands of police officers in Miami, Florida, in 1979 was an exception. A dozen officers, after savagely beating McDuffie to death, elaborately staged an accident to cover their brutality. When they were acquitted at trial in 1980, the city exploded in violence, with 18 killed and more than $80 million in property damage. A riot erupted in New York City in 1991 after a Black boy was accidentally killed while a Hasidic funeral procession passed by, and it was rumored that an ambulance, staffed by Hasidics, refused to render aid. Similarly, the 1992 acquittal of four Los Angeles police officers who arrested and assaulted Rodney King in 1991 led to a race riot: Fifty-two people were killed, over 2,300 injured, with more than $1 billion in damage.

Many factors have contributed to the decline in American race riots. U.S. Supreme Court decisions have prohibited overt segregation and discrimination in education, employment, housing, voting, and recreation. The number of ardent White racists committed to keeping Blacks in their “proper place” in the social, economic, and political order—the foundation of White lynch mobs and race wars—has, to be sure, greatly diminished. And, African Americans have taken advantage of the demise of overt institutional racism. Police departments in some of the largest American cities, one of the sources of the worst race wars, are now under the control of African American police chiefs; and, many politicians, policemen, prosecutors, and judges are Black.

Americans would, though, be well advised to remember the past and consider the causes, costs, and consequences of race riots. History matters. Race wars—along with Jim Crow laws, lynching, and other forms of calculated overt repression—provide a telling commentary on American society. The battle for African American freedom, equality, and justice has, indeed, been hard-fought and elusive—a painful reminder of our racist past.

Alexander W. Pisciotta

See also Alienation; Chicago Race Riot of 1919; Detroit Race Riot of 1967; Harlem Race Riot of 1935; Los Angeles Race Riot of 1965; Los Angeles Race Riots of 1992; Media Portrayals of African Americans; Miami Riot of 1980; Race Relations; Rosewood, Florida, Race Riot of 1923; Tulsa, Oklahoma, Race Riot of 1921; Zoot Suit Riots

Further Readings

- Balbus, I. D. (1973). The dialectics of legal repression: Black rebels before the American criminal courts. New York: Russell Sage.
- Bernstein, I. (1990). The New York City draft riots: Their significance for American society and politics in the age of the Civil War. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Jaspin, E. (2007). Buried in the bitter waters: The hidden history of racial cleansing in America. New York: Basic Books.
- Madigan, T. (2001). The burning: Massacre, destruction, and the Tulsa Race Riot of 1921. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Pinkney, A. (1972). The American way of violence. New York: Random House.
- Rudwick, E. M. (1964). Race riot at East St. Louis, July 2, 1917. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press.
- Rule, J. B. (1988). Theories of civil violence. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Tuttle, W. M. (1970). Race riot: Chicago and the Red Summer of 1919. New York: Atheneum.

RACIAL CONFLICT

Racial conflict is defined as societal controversies related to variances in ethnic, cultural, or national affiliation. Specifically, racial conflict is the result of one dominant culture's control of differing cultures through economics, politics, social policy, and law. In the U.S. juvenile and criminal justice systems, the term racial conflict can be used to refer to discriminatory practices by those who work in the juvenile and criminal justice systems against minority persons. Recent literature expanding the racial conflict concern to include U.S. policy, murder as the result of identity internalizations, and merchant–consumer relationships is not discussed here. Instead, this entry examines the literature depicting racial conflict as a systemic and controversial topic in the juvenile and criminal justice systems. In addition, the relationship between racial conflict and a maintained societal ideology is examined.

Historical accounts of violent racial conflict have existed since before the 1800s and up to the present day. Likewise, the relationship between racial conflict, crime, and minority processing has been examined. In addition to its explaining why some people commit crime, racial conflict has also been linked to disparate decision-making practices at both the arrest and the punishment stages for ethnic minorities. Specifically, African American males represent the most prevalent minority group at each of these stages. Empirical findings show that disproportionate minority confinement exists partly as the result of police discretion to arrest. Accordingly, minorities, particularly African Americans, find themselves at a disadvantage in the criminal justice system.

Recent accounts of racial conflict in the criminal justice system came to the fore during the 1992 riots after a verdict of not guilty was returned for the officers involved in the Rodney King incident in Los Angeles, California. More recently, in 2005, racial conflict was linked to the government's response and policies after Hurricane Katrina in New Orleans, Louisiana. Specifically, victims of this natural disaster were outraged at the lack of governmental support and the assignment of the label "refugee" to American survivors in this largely minority populated area. To some, the use of the term refugee was symbolic of the perception that the survivors were "outsiders" to begin with. This was seized on by the national media, and the survivors were quickly recast as "evacuees."

Similar to disparities in the adult justice system, minority disparities in the juvenile justice system exist. Specifically, African American youth, similar to their adult counterparts, are disproportionately represented throughout the system. On one hand, criminologists argue that ethnic and racial minorities commit more crimes than their White counterparts and thereby have greater representation in the system. On the other hand, criminologists and sociologists argue that racial conflict in American society acts interchangeably with the law as a method to control minority power. Thus, as a result, disparities are found in arrest, charge, and confinement of African American youth when compared to White youth who commit the same serious and violent criminal acts. The larger implication here is consistent with the belief that racial conflict is supported and maintained by actors in the juvenile and criminal justice systems.

Theoretical Explanations

Racial conflict in America remains one of the most controversial topics in the literature and continues to be of interest to both sociologists and criminologists in their attempts to explain minority disparities in the juvenile and criminal justice systems. Accordingly, racial conflict has been rooted in ideological, theoretical, and methodological conflicts. The argument that there is a presumed interconnection between crime and minority men, particularly Black men, is prevalent throughout American society. Specifically, the ideological perspective that African American males are a criminal threat continues to be accepted by many in society. Many criminologists argue that the diverse nature of arrest and confinement data is a depiction of racial conflict in the larger society. Accordingly, researchers have concluded that racial conflict is not only a criminal justice concern but also a societal one.

Strain Theory

Most criminological theories incorporate concepts such as strain, social control, and social learning. The primary premise of Robert Merton's strain theory is that social structures, particularly those in the United States, produce strain on some people that may lead to criminal activity. As for its specific relationship to racial conflict, strain theory stipulates that while many ethnic minorities conform to the dominant culture and thus seek legitimate work, others experience blocked opportunities to success by legitimate means and instead resort to crime. As an explanation of juvenile delinquency, strain theorists argue that youth who are rejected, on the basis of their lower-class status, become frustrated, form subcultures, and commit delinquent and criminal acts.

Conflict Theory

Conflict theory explains crime as the result of a power struggle in society where social class differences are the primary source of stability and change in a community. More importantly, the conflict perspective explains that conflict exists between competing interest groups where group dynamics are directly related to crime commission and crime control. Conflict theorists maintain the idea that crime control is used by those with power to regulate any threat to their interests, thereby preserving the existing social structure, through the use of police power, the courts, sentencing, and incarceration. Accordingly, power control legislation continues to be in conflict with minorities who represent a threat to those in power. As a result of this continued conflict, conflict theorists believe that the criminal justice system cannot be impartial but rather exists to impart a form of justice that curries to the powerful by keeping them safe and secure from minorities, who symbolize a threat to their power position. When examining the relationship between racial conflict and minority overrepresentation in the juvenile and criminal justice systems, conflict theorists suggest that the law, policies, and punishment all act as social control tools that the powerful use to keep minority groups "under control."

Societal Perceptions

The relationship between societal perceptions and disparate treatment based on racial conflict has been examined. Findings reveal that racial disparities exist as the result of perceptions, maintained in society and by police, of minorities as criminal. Practices such as racial profiling support the conflict perspective as an explanation for disparate minority treatment in both the juvenile and the criminal justice systems. While racial profiling and disparate sentencing practices have sparked some degree of outrage, criminologists and sociologists stipulate that these issues are only a fragment of the larger pattern of systemic racial conflict in the criminal justice system.

In the literature there appear to be conflicting conclusions regarding the relationship between societal perceptions of racial conflict and minority disparities in the justice systems. Some criminologists have concluded that unequal minority representation in jails and prisons is the result of unfair sentencing practices against racial and ethnic minorities. Contrarily, others argue that minorities are overrepresented as the result of their offending patterns. Researchers further conclude that as a result of the limits of the measures used to test the veracity of the theory, the racial conflict–crime relationship is not empirically supported.

Racial Conflict and Justice

Research on the relationship between racial conflict and crime commission has examined interracial killings, economic and power competition, and disparities within the criminal justice system. Racial conflict has been linked to delinquent behavior by juveniles and has been linked to school violence, juvenile homicide, gangs, theft, and other serious and violent crimes. One of the more engrossing questions facing criminologists and indeed our nation is whether the two justice systems are impartial. Criminologists have studied the relationship between judicial processes and discrimination, and some evidence suggests that ethnic minorities are overrepresented at arrest and, when compared to White offenders, are punished more severely. Similar results were found in examinations of pretrial processes where racial injustices in jury selection and judge bias against minorities were present.

Whether or not African Americans and other ethnic minorities are overrepresented in the criminal justice system is not a question here, as official data provide a clear depiction of this disparity. The concern here is, however, focused on why racial disparities continue to exist in the juvenile and criminal justice systems. The existence of conflicts between police and racial/ethnic minorities has historically been related to riots that are often the result of racial conflict. Many researchers argue that juvenile and adult processing of ethnic minorities as the result of racial conflict continues and is maintained by the continuous cycle of analyses, recommendations, and inaction that have resulted in ineffective identification and reduction of racial disparities. Contrary to this argument, other researchers point out that racial disparities exist largely as the result of serious and violent offending patterns of ethnic minorities.

Sentencing Practices

In a pioneering study, Baldus and his colleagues (1990) examined the relationship between race and sentencing practices and revealed that minority members who killed Whites were 4 times more likely to receive the death penalty than in cases where their victims were Black or ethnic minorities. Results showed that prosecutors sought the death penalty for 70% of Black defendants with White victims compared to 15% of the time when the victims were Black. This research revealed that the race of the victim and the defendant were significant predictors of receiving the death penalty. Similar results were revealed in a 1995 examination (Baldus & Woodworth, 1998) of race and sentencing practices showing that Blacks and Hispanics were not only more likely than Whites to be sentenced to prison but were more likely to receive longer sentences as well. Official data show racial disparities at various decision points within the juvenile justice system. African American youth are disproportionately represented in arrest, number of cases deferred to court, and detention when compared to both White and other minority groups.

Future Research

The literature is filled with options for reducing racial conflict in the criminal justice system. The argument is made that to effectively address racial conflict, research should be conducted at each stage of processing so as to increase the level of accountability of officials and agencies within jurisdictions where racial disparities continue to exist. Others stipulate that researchers must identify the problem, change and create policies that effectively address the real concerns, and implement and fund programs dependent upon evaluative measures.

At the theoretical level, many criminologists recognize that extensive changes within both the juvenile and the criminal justice systems are needed to address prejudices in the system that exist as the result of policies and practices. Hence, the argument of racial conflict and discrimination in the criminal justice system remains unresolved. Conflict theorists believe racial conflict is the reason for minority differences in criminal and even juvenile justice processing. Even so, differing arguments are presented stipulating that the empirical nature of racism is not measurable and thus is questionable. While there are two dominant opinions, it remains evident that many researchers hold the view that racial disparities as the result of racial conflict continue to exist and should be addressed in juvenile and criminal justice processing.

Tiffiney Y. Barfield-Cottledge and Alfonzo Greenidge

See also Colonial Model; Conflict Theory; Disproportionate Arrests; Minority Group Threat; Race Relations; Race Riots

Further Readings

- Akers, R. L., & Sellers, C. S. (2004). Criminological theories: Introduction and evaluation (4th ed.). Los Angeles: Roxbury.
- Baldus, D., & Woodworth, G. (1998). Race, discrimination and the death penalty in the post Furman era: An empirical and legal overview, with recent findings from Philadelphia. Cornell Law Review, 83, 1638–1770.
- Baldus, D. C., Woodworth, G., & Pulaski, C. A. (1990). Equal justice and the death penalty: A legal and empirical analysis. Boston: Northeastern University Press.
- Chiricos, T., Welch, K., & Gertz, M. (2000). Racial typification of crime and support for punitive measures. Criminology, 42, 359–390.
- Hagan, J., Shedd, C., & Payne, M. (2005). Race, ethnicity and youth perceptions of criminal injustice. American Sociological Review, 70, 381–407.
- Mann, C. M. (1993). Unequal justice: A question of color. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Nellis, N., Greene, J., & Mauer, M. (2008). Reducing racial disparity in the criminal justice system: A manual for practitioners and policymakers (2nd ed.). Retrieved from The Sentencing Project: http://www.sentencingproject.org/Admin/Documents/publications/rd_reducingracialdisparity.pdf
- Snyder, H. N., & Sickmund, M. (2006). Juvenile offenders and victims: A national report. Retrieved from Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention: <http://ojjdp.ncjrs.org/ojstatbb/nr2006>
- Spohn, C. C. (2002). How do judges decide? The search for fairness and justice in punishment. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Walker, S., Spohn, C., & DeLone, M. (2004). The color of justice: Race, ethnicity, and crime in America (3rd ed.). Belmont, CA: Wadsworth/Thomson Learning.

Zatz, M. (2000). The convergence of race, ethnicity, gender and class on court decision-making: Looking toward the 21st century. In J. Horney (Ed.), Criminal justice: Vol 3. Policies, processes, and decisions of the criminal justice system (pp. 503–552). Washington, DC: National Institute of Justice.

RACIAL HOAX

A racial hoax is a false accusation of criminal victimization that is contingent on the race of a fictitious perpetrator. Typically, these lies are used to direct attention away from the individual making the accusation, who is often the actual criminal offender. Race is a central factor in these stories, because the stories are generally created by individuals attempting to increase the credibility of their allegations by capitalizing on the fears, stereotypes, and assumptions about those of another race. Although racial hoaxes may be created by individuals of any race against individuals of any other race, it is most often the case that Blacks are the victims of racial hoaxes perpetrated by White accusers. The racialization of crime in America has increased the likelihood that racial hoaxes will continue to proliferate, unquestioned by criminal justice authorities, and serve as further justification for the questionable practices of racial profiling and DNA sweeps.

The racial typification of crime and the criminal typification of race have enabled many racial hoaxes to go unchallenged precisely because the accusations make sense in light of public fears and stereotypes. Though some racial hoaxes are revealed to be fraudulent within a relatively short time, many nevertheless tend to be so compelling because much of the public has come to associate crime with Blacks and Blacks with crime. Phenomena like the actual and perceived involvement of Blacks in crime, the well-known War on Drugs that has disproportionately targeted Blacks, particularly harsh punishments for minority offenders, and the criminal images of Blacks portrayed in various media have all reinforced this linkage. Therefore, the phenomenon of Black typification of crime must exist at some level in order for the racial hoax to be at all compelling.

The scope of fabricated victimizations has been wide and has ranged from accusations about routine ordinance violations to rape and murder. Some of the more notable examples of racial hoaxes during the past several years have misled law enforcement investigations and public searches for imaginary Black offenders and have elicited a significant amount of media coverage. Criminological research conducted by Katheryn Russell indicates that there were 67 incidents of racial hoaxes between the years 1987 and 1996, although not all received equal media coverage. The incident that probably received the greatest amount of attention is the 1994 South Carolina case in which Susan Smith killed her two children. To misdirect the investigation, Smith reported to emergency operators, as well as both state and federal law enforcement authorities, that she had been the victim of a carjacker who was a young, Black male while her sons were in the car. This outraged the community and elicited widespread concern and offers of assistance. It was not until a couple of weeks after the event that Smith admitted to having murdered her own children by drowning them in her vehicle. No third party of any race had been involved.

Other memorable hoaxes that involved White accusers and fictional Black criminals include the case of Robert Harris, who hired a hit man to shoot and kill his fiancée but claimed that the perpetrator was an armed Black man in camouflage; Jesse Anderson, who reported to the police that two Black men stabbed him and his wife, resulting in her death, only to have investigators discover later that Anderson had killed her and then tried to make it seem as though he, too, had been attacked; and a female student at George Washington University, who claimed to have been raped on a college campus by two young Black men but later admitted that she had made up the story to heighten rape awareness among the student body. In all of these instances of individuals using a racial hoax, there is no apparent reason to have identified the suspect as Black except to exploit society's fears and anxieties about a racialized criminal type in hopes of strengthening their own story.

The use of the racial hoax takes advantage of pre-existing ideas about young Black males' involvement with crime, but it also serves to propagate it by further providing violent and threatening examples of unknown threatening Black criminals. These hoaxes, then, actually reinforce the stereotypes and anxieties that they draw upon in the first place. The more the racial hoax is used, by accusing fictitious Blacks of committing falsified crimes, the more the racial typification of crime is solidified in the public psyche and the more likely it is that subsequent racial hoaxes will go unquestioned.

It is not surprising that the use of this red herring by those seeking to validate their false reports has had a direct and consequential impact on the Black community as a whole as well as the hoax victims themselves. One such effect may be the tendency for Blacks to protect one another, even in cases where they may actually be blameworthy, as described by Katheryn Russell-Brown. However, it should be noted that there have been a limited number of incidents of racial hoaxes perpetrated by minorities against Whites. In these cases, though, it seems that the motive is entirely different. Instead of playing upon public fears in order to obscure the truth, when Whites are the victims of racial hoaxes, it tends to be so that the accuser can claim to have been a victim of a hate crime and, thus, fuel their greatest concerns about Whites. These hoaxes have been referred to as hate crime hoaxes to differentiate their objectives. Regardless of who it is that formulates a racial hoax or the race of the falsified offender, it seems that the hoaxes are usually not successful for long. In the meantime, the temporary efficacy of using a racial hoax to mislead the public has capitalized on and strengthened views about race and crime.

Kelly Welch

See also Criminalblackman; Fear of Crime; Hate Crimes; Profiling, Racial: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives; Racialization of Crime

Further Readings

- Hall, S. (2003). The whites of their eyes: Racist ideologies and the media. In G. Dines & J. M. Humez (Eds.), Gender, race, and class in media (2nd ed., pp. 89–93). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
- Russell, K. K. (1998). The color of crime: Racial hoaxes, White fear, Black protectionism, police harassment, and other macroaggressions. New York: New York University Press.

- Russell, K. K. (2002). The racial hoax as crime: The law as affirmation. In S. Gabbidon, H. T. Greene, & V. D. Young (Eds.), African American classics in criminology and criminal justice (pp. 351–376). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
- Russell-Brown, K. K. (2006). Protecting our own: Race, crime, and African Americans. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

RACIALIZATION OF CRIME

For a variety of reasons, the association of race with crime and crime according to race has been an enduring feature of American culture. In fact, race-based assumptions about crime have become so ingrained in public consciousness that the racial identity of suspects need not be mentioned in order for race to be conjured along with crime. This is particularly true for African Americans, whose race seems to be the most closely related to crime in the minds of many Americans. The development of this inextricable linkage between race and crime is referred to as the racialization of crime and has influenced attitudes about crime among the public and functioned as a subtle rationale for both official and unofficial policies and practices that perpetuate differential treatment by criminal justice officials. Factors contributing to the racialization of crime for Blacks have included actual and perceived participation in crime, the 1980s War on Drugs, disproportionate involvement in the criminal justice system, and media portrayals of criminality.

Although the racialization of crime has had some effect on individuals of various races, the prevalent representation of criminality in American culture is that crimes are committed overwhelmingly by young Black men. The familiarity of much of the public with the image of young Black men as violent or predatory street criminals is reinforced by common depictions everywhere. These portrayals of crime as disproportionately attributable to Blacks are not a completely new phenomenon, however. Historical analysis of evolving perceptions of race from the time of slavery to the present suggests that Whites have long viewed criminal behavior as an inherent characteristic of Blacks. Following the civil rights movement, the perceived connection between Blacks and crime took hold of the public imagination, and the popular stereotype of the young Black man evolved from a thief or rapist into that of an ominous violent gangster or criminal predator.

Today the racialization of crime has intensified in such a way that many believe Blacks are even more threatening than at any other time in U.S. history. It is the near inability to distinguish between criminality and Blacks that prompted Katheryn Russell's coining of the term criminal-blackman in reference to the modern image of criminals as Black. Similarly, Jerome Miller, the former executive director and founder of the National Center on Institutions and Alternatives, has argued that crime is a "code" word that inherently implies race. Some research has suggested that it is the racial typification of crime and the ability to talk about race in code that allows for increasingly punitive crime control policies that promote "getting tough" on crime.

Actual and Perceived Criminality

One might assume that the primary factor responsible for the formation of the racialization of crime is the actual number of Blacks represented in crime arrest and conviction statistics. We would also expect that if Blacks are disproportionately involved in criminal activity and, therefore, over-represented among criminals convicted by the criminal court system, they would be perceived as being more involved in crime and criminal justice measures than others. Indeed, there is substantial research, from the United States and other countries, showing the prevalence of the belief that Blacks commit most crime, corroborating the racialization of crime. Of course, data show that it is Whites who actually compose the greatest percentage of criminals and convicts in the United States, contradicting this common perception that crime is perpetrated mostly by Blacks. However, statistics do indicate that Blacks are involved in crime at percentages greater than their representation among the general public, although they are still outnumbered by White offenders. It is possible that crime committed by Blacks may be especially salient not only because it exceeds what would be expected based on the racial composition of the country, but also because the crimes that tend to be most fearsome are the ones that are most disproportionately perpetrated by Black men.

Additional influences may also increase the perception that Blacks are more criminal than individuals of other races. The use of racial hoaxes, which are fabricated accusations about criminal victimizations in which the race of the supposed offender is central to obscuring the truth about the false allegations, is dependent upon the racialization of crime. But racial hoaxes also perpetuate the perception that most—and the most fearsome—crimes are committed by Blacks, as it is most often the case that Whites are responsible for racial hoaxes in which the fictitious perpetrators are Black. These allegations exploit preexisting racial stereotypes and race-based anxieties of the public to increase the credibility of the crime reports, but they also reinforce the racialization of crime.

The law enforcement practice of racial profiling may have a similar effect on the racialization of crime. Police officials may justify racial profiling on the grounds that there is disproportional involvement of members of a particular race in certain types of crime. However, an unintended consequence of doing this may be that authorities actually uncover more criminality, not because it is more prevalent among minorities but because their offenses are being discovered more often as a result of the profiling.

War on Drugs

The War on Drugs of the 1980s is another factor that has contributed to the racialization of crime. Its influence on Blacks in particular—a phenomenon generally attributed to strict crack cocaine laws that target impoverished minorities who are less likely to afford drugs favored by the affluent (which also happen to be accompanied by only minor penalties)—has been so striking that some suggest that it may be more appropriately termed a war on Blacks or a war on Black drug use. Studies indicate that the War on Drugs has been harder on Blacks than on Whites. Blacks are over-represented among those who are processed through the criminal justice system directly because of the War on Drugs, and as a result they are frequently depicted as the principal source of the U.S. drug problem. The consequence of this is that many have come to associate Blacks with illegal drug use and illegal drug use with Blacks.

The racialization of criminal drug crime may not make sense based on the fact that national surveys indicate most racial and ethnic groups consume illegal drugs at rates that approximate their percentage of the general population. However, when conviction and incarceration statistics are reviewed, Blacks consistently account for well over 50% of the nation's drug prisoners. This finding reveals the extreme disparity manifest in the national crackdown on the drug problem. It is not merely racial profiling that has resulted in these surprising statistics, but the heavier criminal sanctions attached to the drugs sold and used more often by Blacks. So, while minorities and Whites commit drug offenses at equivalent levels, the policies of the War on Drugs itself are responsible for strengthening the racialization of crime.

Race and Punishment

Racial differences that may exist at the level of actual criminal behavior are clearly amplified by differences in criminal justice punishment. It is widely recognized that at any given time, a disproportionate number of Blacks are under some form of correctional control. Research on the treatment of defendants in court proceedings shows that part of this discrepancy is sometimes a consequence of prosecutors capitalizing on and perpetuating racial stereotypes, by characterizing Blacks as particularly prone to violent crime, in order to achieve higher conviction rates. Studies on race and sentencing have shown that young Black males are sentenced more severely than members of other racial or ethnic groups and that they serve more time than their White counterparts who are similarly charged. The disparity in convictions, sentences, and punishments applied to Blacks may corroborate the common notion among the public that being Black equates with criminality, which perpetuates the racialization of crime.

Race and Crime in the Media

The media provide readily accessible depictions of criminality, which may help to shape perceptions about crime. Because media also presumably have the power to help construct the meaning of race in U.S. society, it is apparent that they play a major role in the racialization of crime. Research aimed at examining the racial content of television news found that there is a disproportionate amount of the media coverage devoted to violent crimes for which Black males are more likely than others to be arrested, thus reinforcing the idea that race and crime are closely connected. But, in addition to finding that Blacks are more often shown as criminals in the news, they are also more likely to appear as criminally threatening when they are portrayed. Therefore, the message conveyed is that Blacks are not only more criminal than Whites but that their offenses are more fearsome.

Those who have greater access to the media, such as politicians and government leaders, also frequently link race and crime, strengthening the racialization of crime. The “racial politics” conveyed by media has been employed to garner constituent support at various points in U.S. history, including the 1960s when there was widespread concern about Blacks and the intensifying civil rights movement. The “get tough” advertising rhetoric of both conservative and liberal politicians serves to elevate partisan popularity and frequently manipulates public fear and indignation by conjuring fright-inducing images of minority criminals.

It is possible that celebrities in the media have contributed to the racialization of crime in their own way. Some suggest that the media focus on Black athletes accused of committing crimes is serving to reinforce the perception that Blacks are more crime-prone than criminals of other races. Depictions by the media of Black men as rapists and murderers are well documented by scholars interested in film and rap music, as well. In fact, there are several recent examples of Black men in the entertainment industry who have been subject to criminal allegations, which may have also strengthened the association that many make between race and crime.

Conclusion

Many factors have contributed to the racialization of crime, by solidifying the relationship in the minds of Americans between racial minorities—especially Blacks—and crime. The actual involvement of Blacks in crime, especially crack cocaine violations and violent offenses, is certainly one source of this phenomenon. But perhaps even more influential are perceptions about participation in crime, which are often fueled by racial hoaxes and racial profiling. The disproportionate number of Blacks arrested, convicted, sentenced, and punished by the criminal justice system suggests that there is an inextricable association between race and crime. And, finally, media perpetuate the racialization of crime by depicting Black offenders with greater frequency and with a more menacing demeanor than Whites. Moreover, the media capture politicians, government officials, and celebrities who often convey the idea that crime is a race-related problem.

Kelly Welch

See also Criminalblackman; Discrimination–Disparity Continuum; Disproportionate Arrests; Disproportionate Incarceration; Fear of Crime; Media Portrayals of African Americans; Minority Group Threat; Profiling, Racial: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives; War on Drugs

Further Readings

- Chiricos, T., Welch, K., & Gertz, M. (2004). The racial typification of crime and support for punitive measures. Criminology, 42, 359–389.
- Hawkins, D. F. (1995). Ethnicity, race and crime: A review of selected studies. In D. Hawkins (Ed.), Ethnicity, race and crime: Perspectives across time and place. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Henry, F. (1996). Perceptions of race and crime in Ontario: Empirical evidence from Toronto and Durham region. Canadian Journal of Criminology, 38, 469–476.
- Kennedy, R. (1997). Race, crime and the law. New York: Vintage Books.
- Mauer, M. (1999). Race to incarcerate. New York: The New Press.
- Miller, J. (1992). Hobbling a generation II: Young African American males in the criminal justice system of America's cities: Baltimore, Maryland (NCIA report). Washington, DC: National Center on Institutions and Alternatives.
- Miller, J. (1996). Search and destroy: African-American males in the criminal justice system. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

- Russell, K. K. (1998). The color of crime. New York: New York University Press.
- Steffensmeier, D., Ulmer, J., & Kramer, J. (1998). The interaction of race, gender, and age in criminal sentencing: The punishment cost of being young, Black, and male. Criminology, 36, 763–797.
- Tonry, M. (1995). Malign neglect. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Wilson, W. J. (1987). The truly disadvantaged. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

RACIAL JUSTICE ACT

The Racial Justice Act was a proposed federal bill that sought to reform the operation of the death penalty. The act would have required prosecutors to explain apparent racial disparities in the imposition of death sentences. The idea is traceable to McCleskey v. Kemp, a 1987 U.S. Supreme Court decision that rejected a constitutional challenge to racial disparities in Georgia's capital punishment system.

In McCleskey, lawyers for an African American sentenced to death relied on two sophisticated statistical studies that examined over 2,000 murder cases in Georgia during the 1970s to allege that Georgia's capital punishment system was unconstitutional. The studies indicated that in a midrange of capital prosecutions, the race of the victim and the race of the defendant were determinative of who received the death sentence. Stated most bluntly, in this midrange, Black murderers of Whites were more likely sentenced to death than any other defendant–victim combination.

Notwithstanding the studies, the Court ruled that McCleskey failed to establish a constitutional violation. According to the Court, the studies only showed a discrepancy in the imposition of death sentences that appeared to correlate with race. McCleskey's claim, the Court wrote, if taken to its logical conclusion could undermine the criminal litigation process, as defendants, supported by a statistical study, could challenge as arbitrary any sentence they received. Finally, the Court suggested that reform efforts were best directed to the legislatures.

In 1988, members of Congress took the Court's advice and submitted legislation to enact a Racial Justice Act, designed to overturn McCleskey. The bill was to create a federal statutory prohibition against carrying out any execution if the death sentence “was imposed based on race.” According to the bill, an inference that race was the basis for the death sentence was established if the defendant presented evidence demonstrating that when sentenced, race was a statistically significant factor in the decision to seek or impose the death sentence within the jurisdiction. The evidence had to establish that in the jurisdiction, death sentences were imposed significantly more frequently on persons of one race than on persons of another race or as punishment for capital offenses against persons of one race in comparison to persons of another race. The evidence had to take into account the statutory aggravating factors of the crime and include comparisons of similar cases involving persons of different races. Once the inference that race was the basis for a death sentence arose, the execution could not occur unless the prosecution rebutted the inference. The inference could only be rebutted by showing that the death penalty was sought in all cases meeting the statutory criteria for imposing the death penalty. Finally, no person was barred from raising the issue because he or she failed to raise the issue before the law was enacted or due to any previous adjudication before the enactment of the law.

The bill was not enacted. Reintroduced during the next Congress, the act passed the House of Representatives but was set aside in conference with the Senate; consequently, the Crime Control Act of 1990 contained no death penalty provisions. In 1991, the House rejected the act. In 1994, an act with a similar goal, the Fairness in Death Sentencing Act, was passed by the House and set aside in conference with the Senate, resulting in the 1994 Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act not including the measure.

Though the act has a noble goal, its language—as reflected in the 1994 version—is imprecise. The Racial Justice Act establishes nearly an improbable goal of ferreting out death sentences imposed based on the defendant's race. Rarely will there be direct evidence of racial animus. When that evidence exists, the sentence would ordinarily be invalid under the Fourteenth Amendment. The act does not address unconscious racism and the many different ways that racially infected decisions may lead to a defendant facing a death sentence. For instance, studies show that African Americans receive harsher sentences than members of other races for the same criminal activity. Thus, a previous conviction for a violent crime, which might be used as an aggravating factor justifying a death sentence, could itself be the product of decisions based on race.

The Racial Justice Act is vague on which races are to be compared in making the assessment. This could lead to every conceivable racial group being compared with each other. Not only could this lead to racial group accounting, the act does not define the critical requirement that race is a statistically significant factor in the decision to seek or impose a death sentence. Thus, after the racial group comparisons occur, the question becomes when is a variation sufficiently significant to raise the inference of racial discrimination? A perverse consequence of the act might be to encourage prosecutors to seek the death penalty more frequently. By doing so, the state would preemptively rebut an inference that the prosecutor's office sought the death penalty in a racially discriminatory manner. Further, the act does not separate out prosecutorial discretion from sentencing discretion. Nor does the act require the sentencer—whether the judge or jury—to explain why it imposed the death sentence.

In 1998 Kentucky became the first state to enact a Racial Justice Act. A few other states, like Georgia, North Carolina, and Tennessee, have had similar legislation proposed. Kentucky's law provides that a capital defendant may allege and submit evidence supporting a claim that the prosecutor is seeking the death penalty on the basis of race. The evidence, which may consist of statistical information, must show that racial considerations played a significant part in the prosecution's decision to seek death, including, for instance, that a death sentence is sought significantly more frequently either upon persons of one race than of another race or as punishment for capital offenses against persons of one race in comparison to persons of another race. The defendant has to establish the claim by clear and convincing evidence. The prosecution is provided with an opportunity to rebut the claims and the evidence. If the court finds in the defendant's favor, it must order that a death sentence cannot be sought in the case. There are no reported cases in which a Kentucky capital defendant prevailed on a Racial Justice Act claim.

Critics of the Racial Justice Act claim that it was an indirect effort to abolish the death penalty. The essence of their claim is that imposing rigorous statistical review of capital sentences will inevitably result in the reversal of many death sentences because verbal non-race-based explanations of charging decisions will usually not be convincing in the face of the statistics. Kentucky's limited experience with a Racial Justice Act has neither proven nor debunked this reasoning.

Dwight Aarons

See also Baldus Study; Death Penalty; McCleskey v. Kemp

Further Readings

- Arnold, J. R. (2005). Race and the death penalty after McCleskey: A case study of Kentucky's Racial Justice Act. Washington & Lee Journal of Civil Rights & Social Justice, 12, 93–107.
- Baldus, D., Woodworth, G., & Pulaski, C. A., Jr. (1994). Reflections on the "inevitability" of racial discrimination in capital sentencing and the "impossibility" of its prevention, detection, and correction. Washington & Lee Law Review, 51, 359–430.
- Edwards, D., & Conyers, J., Jr. (1994). The Racial Justice Act—A simple matter of justice. University of Dayton Law Review, 20, 699–713.
- Lungren, D. E., & Krotoski, M. L. (1994). The Racial Justice Act of 1994—Undermining enforcement of the death penalty without promoting racial justice. University of Dayton Law Review, 20, 655–697.
- McCleskey v. Kemp*, 481 U.S. 279 (1987).

RACISM

Racism is an excusatory and justificatory tendency existing in all multiethnic societies in which one or more cultures are subordinated (marginalized) by another culture predicated on race. Evidence of the phenomenon manifests in social and civic institutions such as government-sanctioned racial segregation in the United States prior to court rulings and the passing of congressional laws, beginning in the 1950s removing de facto (factual occurrence) as well as de jure (lawful occurrence) government support for it. Racism in the United States, though lacking legal means of expression, continues to be shared by individuals within private and public organizations. This entry will discuss racism as a discursive construct and its functions and implications.

Racism is a learned hegemonic attribute of dominant culture. The tendency is constructed, passed, and preserved through language. The language sets apart one culture from another in terms of ethnicity predicated on genetic differences which register often in physical appearance such as skin pigmentations, countenance, and stature. The discourse derives from historical legacy and/or attempts by members of the dominant culture to protect themselves from perceived threats or challenges. In the first instance, the discourse of American racism opposing African Americans has a trajectory to the discourse from legal documents and popular media of the period which formed and recycled the national consciousness of the time. Such documents include U.S. Supreme Court interpretations of law. For instance, the 1857 U.S. Supreme Court's Dred Scott decision stated that Blacks could not claim any rights or protections promised by the Constitution. In 1896, after passage of the antislavery amendments, the Court ruled in Plessy v. Ferguson that social discrimination based on color, designed to prevent the commingling of races, was legal. An example of historic discourse from popular mainstream media is the 1943 Warner Brother's cartoon short, Coal Black and de Sebben Dwarfs caricaturing the 1937 Walt Disney animated production, Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs. The humor of the film drew from existing exaggerated racial perceptions of African Americans by the dominant culture. The film was thought innocuous when released to the general public. However, at the time of its release, the general movie audience was predominately Caucasian due to the social segregation of the 1896 Plessy decision. Blacks were not permitted to attend theaters operated and attended by Whites.

Racism also emerges as a defense to a real or imagined threat or challenge. Competition for lands and resources from European settlements and expansions of North American territories held by Native Americans led to perceptions of their nations and tribes as one rubric—Indian—and denigrated their members with slang terms such as savages and redskins. These perceptions were recycled into contemporary culture by popular media, including 19th-century Dime Novels, also known as Penny Dreadfuls, which sensationalized fictional western and frontier experiences at the expense of Native Americans.

More recently, with heightened anxiety concerning terrorist actions in the aftermath of the 2001 attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon and the subsequent military actions in Afghanistan and Iraq, U.S. citizens of Middle Eastern descent or those thought to be, have been subjected to more suspicion and have become the focus of more prejudicial language than other individuals of perceived non-European ancestry. Racist discourse has also emerged against Hispanics because of the fear of the loss of American jobs. Both Hispanic and African American ethnicities have been villainized in the wake of perceived escalating drug use, violence, and crime.

The forms of the discourse resonate in cultural legend narratives (stories repeated over time until achieving an unquestioned validity), anecdotes (derogatory statements disguised as humor), and defamatory expressions (slang), which distort and magnify the unacceptability of behaviors, attitudes, and values purportedly held by differing ethnic groups. This discourse serves to construct a reality in which the superiority of the dominant culture is assumed to be innate or hereditary, reinforcing that culture's worth and its members as participants, beneficiaries of resources and rewards through comparisons with other culture(s). Likewise, the discourse defines other culture(s) as inferior, relegating them as naturally deserving of only the resources and rewards willingly relinquished by their superiors and assigned to them. Such discourse serves to preserve the authority of the members of the dominant culture while marginalizing the other culture(s) and minimizing if not discounting the value of members. For example, racism has marginalized Native Americans to the point of invisibility for many members of the dominant culture. At the extreme, the discourse constructs the marginalized cultures, by their very existence, as a threat to the sustainability of the established order. Racism in the United States places African Americans, Hispanics, and individuals of Arab descent in this position.

Racism provides an excuse for the dominant culture's view and subsequent treatment of the marginalized cultures. First, members of the dominant culture, informed by the legacy of racism, may construct racial stereotypes of outside members. From this schema, or interpretive framework, individuals are excused to make certain judgments. Individuals of Arab descent may be viewed as potential terrorists, African Americans as more inclined to be involved in robbery and sexual assault, and Hispanics as undocumented or illegal aliens. In this context, some law enforcement officials operating from the schema may have the tendency to use racial profiling as a preemptive strategy for crime prevention or post hoc as a means to discover perpetrators during the investigation of crimes. These assumptions also serve to excuse harsher sentencing for members of marginalized cultures by the dominant one.

Marginalized cultures find excuse, as well, for criminal actions in their perceived victimization by racism. Members of these cultures may believe that civil and criminal disobedience is justified as a restorative function in a society in which their members have been deprived of resources. Furthermore, because of the process of marginalization, individuals from these cultures may, through historic segregation from the mainstream and/or suspicions resulting in the loss of educational and employment opportunities and adequate living conditions, have a sense of hopelessness and may see crime as an attractive if not the only available choice to escape their plight. Perceptions of both the dominant and marginalized cultures tend to be self-perpetuating and, as such, provide justification for continuing the cycle of racism.

Ralph A. Hamlett

See also Chinese Exclusion Act; Discrimination–Disparity Continuum; Institutional Racism; Japanese Internment; Minority Group Threat; Native American Massacres; Profiling, Racial: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives; Victimization, African American; Victimization, Asian American; Victimization, Latina/o; Victimization, Native American; White Privilege

Further Readings

Cole, D. (1999). No equal justice: Race and class in the American justice system. New York: The New Press.
Ellison, C. G., & Martin, W. A. (Eds.). (1999). Race and ethnic relations in the United States: Readings for the 21st century. Los Angeles: Roxbury.

Mann, C. R., Zatz, M. S., & Rodriguez, N. (Eds.). (2006). Images of color, images of crime: Readings (3rd ed.). Los Angeles: Roxbury.
Plessy v. Ferguson, 153 U.S. 537 (1896).
Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393 (1857).

RAMPART INVESTIGATION

There have been many corruption scandals in police agencies across the United States. The Rampart Division scandal in 1999, involving officers from the Los Angeles Police Department, is perhaps one of the worst. More than 70 officers were implicated in misconduct, including unprovoked beatings and shootings, planting and covering up evidence, stealing and dealing drugs, and perjury. The officers involved in the Rampart corruption scandal were driven by power, racism, and greed. The City of Los Angeles faced more than 140 civil lawsuits with an estimated settlement cost of $125 million. Consequently, more than 100 cases have been overturned and many more are tainted.

The Rampart Division of the Los Angeles Police Department is located west of downtown Los Angeles. It is the most populous area of Los Angeles, consisting chiefly of a large Latina/o population. This division is one of the busiest for the police in terms of calls for service and criminal activity. In the late 1970s and 1980s this area experienced an increase in violent crime, particularly crime involving gangs, drugs, and weapons. To combat the rising violent gang crime, the department, headed by Chief Daryl Gates, created a group of elite antigang units called CRASH (Community Resources Against Street Hoodlums). According to former Chief Gates, the type of officers selected for these units were those who were not afraid to talk to gang members. He wanted officers who were willing to go out and mix with gang members in order to gather intelligence and use it to prevent violent crime.

According to some, CRASH was very successful in reducing crime. CRASH officers were gratified because they were no longer tied to the radio (handling calls for service), and they no longer had to wear uniforms. CRASH developed a culture of its own, in which officers began dressing like gang members and mimicking them. They had a reputation among Los Angeles street gangs as being tough and promoting violence. The temptation of corruption became too much for some officers to resist, and they soon began stealing and selling drugs. Many officers went “native,” which is a term often used when a police officer loses focus on the law enforcement goal and begins to live the life of a gangster or drug user or dealer.

The corrupt and illegal behavior continued for several years until Officer Rafael Perez was caught stealing 8 pounds of cocaine valued at more than $1 million from a police evidence locker in 1998. As a part of a plea agreement for a reduced sentence, Officer Perez agreed to cooperate with investigators and provided information on more than 70 officers, including police supervisors who committed corrupt acts or allowed them to occur.

Perez testified in court that CRASH officers essentially became a gang. They wore skull tattoos with cowboy hats and poker cards portraying the dead man’s hand of aces and eights. Officers also mimicked the dress and behavior of gang members. Besides the typical economic corruption, such as the theft of money and drugs, Perez described some of the horrific actions that police officers in the CRASH unit committed. Some of the more chilling events involved officers murdering or attempting to murder innocent people and planting weapons on them to cover up the crimes. One of the more disturbing crimes occurred when officers shot a man named Juan Saldana while he was running in an apartment hallway. Saldana fell to the floor and the officers planted a gun on him to justify the shooting. Officers then fabricated a cover-up story while Saldana bled to death. Other innocent victims were paralyzed or served time in prison on trumped-up charges.

Perez also described the culture of the CRASH units. Officers routinely gathered at a bar and celebrated the shootings. Supervisors (including at least one lieutenant) who participated or supported the CRASH officers routinely distributed plaques to officers who committed the shootings. It was more prestigious to murder people than wound them. As such, the plaques depicted playing cards: black for murder and red for wounding a person.

Officers were able to operate undetected because they insulated themselves from “by the book” officers and supervisors. For an officer to become a CRASH member, he or she needed to have a CRASH member as a sponsor. Even after being selected, a new member’s behavior was monitored to make sure that he or she was not a snitch. There were also tests of planting weapons in which new members had to participate in order to show their loyalty to the CRASH unit. It became a well-known fact that many officers who worked in the Rampart Division were corrupt. Law-abiding officers transferred out of Rampart and corrupt officers requested transfers into Rampart. Little was done to curb the corruption because the units were reducing crime in the area. Because of Perez’s cooperation with investigators, he was sentenced to 5 years in prison and received immunity from further prosecution. He was released from prison in July 2001.

The racial/ethnic implications of these events are evident. The victims of the police killings and woundings, and those who were routinely arrested on fabricated evidence and charges, were young, poor, working-class, immigrant African Americans or Latinos. These minorities consistently felt victimized by the police. Racial tensions were already running high between citizens and police because of the 1991 Rodney King beating by several Los Angeles police officers. Following this incident, three of the officers were acquitted by a jury in 1992; the acquittal sparked 4 days of violent riots in Los Angeles.

The Rampart corruption scandal culminated with an investigation of the division by Chief Bernard Parks. The report blamed a lack of managerial oversight and a failure to properly review reports as the primary causes of the Rampart corruption. Policy recommendations called for an increase in the number of internal affairs officers and the increased use of the polygraph during the hiring process in order to weed out corrupt applicants. During the entire investigation, there was no mention of race/ethnicity as a factor contributing to the corruption.

Todd E. Bricker

See also King, Rodney; Los Angeles Race Riots of 1992; Police Corruption

Further Readings

Knowland, D., & Nebbia, G. (2000, March). The Los Angeles police scandal and its social roots (4 Parts). Retrieved from <http://www.wsws.org/articles/2000/mar2000/lapd-m13.shtml>

Reese, R. (2003). The multiple causes of the LAPD Rampart scandal. Retrieved from <http://www.csupomona.edu/~jis/2003/Reese.pdf>

Sullivan, R. (2003). Labyrinth. New York: Grove Press.

RASTAFARIANS

A millenarian movement of Afrocentric Black Jamaicans deriving their tag, “Rastafari,” directly from their deity, Emperor Haile Selassie I (Ras meaning duke or head combined with the emperor’s precoronation name Tafari Makonnen), Rastas emerged from the Jamaican working classes in the 1930s. The group mirrors a number of African diasporic separatists in the western hemisphere, the most notable being Marcus Garvey’s United Negro Improvement Association, the Afro-Athlican Constructive Church, the Moorish Science Temple, and the Nation of Islam of the United States, which were organized at roughly the same time. Rastafarians were by far the most successful in terms of longevity and influence on their home turf.

Representing approximately one of every nine Jamaicans today, they are a considerable political force on their home island and have had a cultural impact on the arts and cuisine of the Caribbean and West African regions. Haile Selassie I of Ethiopia was the living God for Rastafarians, an earthly deity tracing his ancestry to Solomon of Israel and Queen Sheba, supported by the Old Testament sources and the Book of Revelations in the New Testament. Most prominent among the range of decentralized belief systems held by “righteous” Rastas are the adherence to an ideal world (Zion); disdain for the forces of oppression (Babylon), most often a euphemism for Anglo-American nations and White people in general; and beliefs about cleanliness, mysticism-magic, dreadlocks, and the racial solidarity of Africans. The Rastas have dietary laws similar to kosher guidelines, which provide for “ital” food (ital is a variation on “vital”).

A milestone in Rastafarianism was the visit to Jamaica of Emperor Haile Selassie I in April 1966, which eased the political repression brought by conservatives in the island government and served to mainstream the Rasta faith in the West. In a wider sense, the Rasta look and sound—dreadlocks, knitted caps, colors (i.e., red, gold and green), and use of marijuana (ganja), along with reggae music—have become popular cultural symbols that have far outdistanced fundamental Rastafarianism itself, being embraced by both Black and White youth since the late 1960s in what can be called “reggae culture.” Rastafarian religious proliferation was also no doubt aided by the burgeoning popularity of reggae music and the prominence of its most accomplished and widely known performers, Bob Marley, Black Uhuru, Burning Spear, and Peter Tosh, who electrified American audiences in the 1970s. Reggae’s driving “earth beat” caught on in the United States, England, and Canada in large part because of the presence of Afro-Caribbean peoples in those nations and their high-profile dreadlocks that were adopted as cultural symbols of ethnic purity, revolutionary consciousness, and the ritual (or other) use of ganja. More importantly, ideological links within revolutionary movements in the United States, West Africa, and the Caribbean were cemented by Guyanese author and activist Walter Rodney. It was Rodney who, before his assassination, published the influential pamphlet Groundings With My Brothers (1968), detailing his associations with Rastafarians and the need for solidarity among peoples of color. Rodney’s recognition of the Rastafari as a restorative force for Black peoples and his call to arms in many ways echoed the sentiments of other famous insurrectionist icons, Frantz Fanon, Ernesto “Che” Guevara, and Eldridge Cleaver, in their characterizations of the United States as “Babylon,” an evil power, similar to the Ayatollah Khomeini’s branding of America as the “Great Satan.”

Most notable for criminology students is the Rastafarian tradition of using marijuana as a sacrament and a recreational drug. The reputation of Jamaican marijuana and the proliferation of Jamaican gangs in the United States and United Kingdom through the last 2 decades of the 20th century have been distinctly, and in most cases mistakenly, tied to Rastafarians. Although Rastas in most respects reject violence and forbid the use of addictive drugs, Jamaican immigrants to cities in the United States, many who dress, speak, and imitate the Rasta traditions, as members of reggae culture, have become associated with criminal gang activities. The “Shower Posse,” so named for the showers of lead shot at its rivals, has operated in Miami, New York City, and a number of large cities. Jamaican police have also noted that the United Kingdom has become a refuge for those avoiding capture, many of whom have gang affiliations and have adopted the Rastafarian mode of appearance. This association with street crime, drug trafficking, and general lawlessness has been in large part erroneous, in that Rastafarians occupy their own psychic space characterized largely by ambivalence for the activities of those outside the faithful, licit and illicit.

As Rastas maintain a nonviolent militancy and ideological resistance to the established Jamaican status quo in government, religious, and social circles, patriotism and national loyalty were transferred to Africa in general and Ethiopia specifically. Although Rastas greet each other with appeals to “peace and love,” they view the actions of outsiders as separate from their own religious agendas and consequently as of little concern. For a devout Rastafarian, the objective elements of reality are always subordinated to the prevailing Rasta belief system, the deification of Haile Selassie, and the received view that the media and the White world in particular are threats to Rastas. Consequently, Rastas expend very little energy or resources in dispelling myths or rebutting misinformation about their religion’s involvement in gang activities or narcotics trafficking, focusing instead on the notion that adversaries sponsor all sorts of mendacity and are best ignored. The stubborn resistance of Rastafarianism has effected a process whereby it has run its course as a millenarian movement, found numerous and creditable adherents, and emerged as full-fledged religious faith. By 1985, Rastafarianism was represented in nearly all of the 50 United States and every medium-to-large city in the country. Rastafarians were participants in the overthrow of the Eric Gairy regime in Grenada by Maurice Bishop and the People’s Revolutionary Army, evoking concern among establishment elites across the hemisphere. At the same time, Rastafarianism, through political acumen and religious persuasion, became a vital part of the Jamaican officialdom and an influential alternative to Christianity throughout West Africa and the Caribbean.

David Keys

See also Black Panther Party; Deportation; Jamaican Posse; Nation of Islam; Religious Minorities

Further Readings

- Barrett, L. E., Jr. (1997). The Rastafarians. Boston: Beacon Press.
- Mack, D. R. A. (1999). From Babylon to Rastafari: Origin and history of the Rastafarian movement. Washington, DC: Frontline.

RECIDIVISM

In America, issues of race and recidivism have been the focus of academic and practical concern since the post–Emancipation Proclamation days. Recidivism is widely accepted as a term used to define the rates or chances of reoffending after an offender has been released from probation or corrections. The term also denotes the chances or rates of re-arrest during terms of probation, albeit for a new offense or a violation of conditions of supervision.

Research has identified 14 different terms used to define recidivism. Of those, re-arrest, reconviction, and resentencing are the most widely used terms by various departments, agencies, and researchers. Predominate research operationalizes (defines) recidivism as offender re-arrest and reconvictions as a result of secondary data being readily available and nonoffender participation. The amount of time between release from probation, parole, or prison, and reoffense, re-arrest, or readmittance to prison is used as a standard parameter of recidivism. Most studies utilize a 12- to 36-month window after release to determine recidivism, with 12 months being the most common time of analysis. Given that research has demonstrated that approximately 70% of recidivist actions within the initial 3 years occur in the first 12 months, a majority of studies examine offender recidivism within 1 year of release.

Factors Associated With Recidivism

Recidivism research has established a set of recidivism predictor variables by examining offenders after being released from prison, probation or while an offender was currently on probation, in addition to extensive research examining offender risk variables. A review of the literature reveals that the offender's criminal history, type of instant offense (property or person crime), unemployment, age, gender, and history of antisocial behavior are significantly correlated with recidivism. Literature also demonstrates that factors related to an offender's lifestyle, such as his or her living situation, degree and type of drug use, criminogenic needs and criminal associates, are associated with the likelihood of reoffense.

Race and Recidivism

In the initial national recidivism study conducted in 1994, the U.S. Department of Justice revealed that 63% of all convicted felons were re-arrested for a felony or serious misdemeanor within 3 years of being released. Forty-seven percent of all reoffenders were reconvicted of new crimes, and 41% were reincarcerated. The rates of recidivism (i.e., re-arrest, reconvictions, and reincarcerations) were highest among Blacks. Hispanics had a higher rate of recidivism than non-Hispanics.

In 2002 the U.S. Department of Justice again examined the rates of recidivism among released U.S. prisoners. Of 272,111 released offenders, 68% were re-arrested for a new offense within 3 years. Blacks were more likely than Whites to be re-arrested (73% vs. 63%), reconvicted (51% vs. 43%), returned to prison with a new prison sentence (29% vs. 23%), and returned to prison with or without a new prison sentence (54% vs. 50%). Non-Hispanics were more likely than Hispanics to be re-arrested (71% vs. 65%), reconvicted (51% vs. 44%), and returned to prison with or without a new prison sentence (57% vs. 52%). It should be noted that Hispanics (25%) and non-Hispanics (27%) did not significantly differ with regard to being returned to prison with a new prison sentence.

Research has revealed that under a time-series analysis, although Blacks and Hispanics have a higher rate of recidivism, Whites are more likely to reoffend earlier upon release from custody. Findings such as these have forced a change in the paradigm of focusing on binary operationalizations of recidivism to one of continuous understanding in terms of time to reoffense upon release. In other words, new recidivism research now focuses on the amount of time that it takes for a released offender to reoffend as opposed to focusing on simply whether or not an offender recommitted a new offense upon release.

Limitations of Race and Recidivism Research

Recidivism data are based primarily upon an evaluation of official criminal history checks. As a result, the knowledge of actual offender arrest, convictions, and re-admittances, as determined by these databases, are dependent upon department and agency submissions of factual information. In some cases, even when the factual data is sent to the repositories, there may not be the ability to match the offender to the existing database. For example, the date of birth, social security number, or other identifiers may be different.

There is also the issue relating to the operationalization of recidivism. Due to the numerous definitions, researchers should be cognizant of the manner in which recidivism has been defined. For example, if one defines recidivism as any new arrest as opposed to new convictions, the recidivism rate will be higher, given the reality that more people are arrested than convicted.

Research Considerations

After examining the literature, one has to be extremely careful not to assume that race is the cause of recidivist actions. Researchers must look closer at the causal factors to determine the true relationship between race and recidivism. Race and recidivism are only the beginning of criminological inquiry. Additional research is needed to understand those factors that increase the rates of recidivism among Black and Hispanics as well as to decipher the reasoning behind why Whites recidivate faster. Perhaps the focus should be taken away from recidivism and refocused on criminal desistance.

Howard Henderson and David Rembert

See also Myth of a Racist Criminal Justice System; Restorative Justice; Sentencing Disparities, African Americans

Further Readings

- Andrews, D., & Bonta, J. (1994). The psychology of criminal conduct. Cincinnati, OH: Anderson.
- Beck, A., & Shipley, B. (1989). Recidivism of prisoners released in 1983 (NCJ Publication No. 116261). Washington, DC: Bureau of Justice Statistics.
- Gendreau, P., Little, T., & Goggin, C. (1996). A meta-analysis of predictors of recidivism: What works! Criminology, 34, 575–608.
- Henderson, H. (2006). The predictive utility of the Wisconsin risk needs assessment instrument in a sample of Texas probationers. Unpublished doctoral dissertation, Sam Houston State University, Huntsville, TX.
- Langan, P., & Levin, D. (2002). Recidivism of prisoners released in 1994 (NCJ Publication No. 193427). Washington, DC: Bureau of Justice Statistics.

REFORMATORIES

A reformatory is an institution for juvenile lawbreakers. Reformatories were originally intended to reform and educate young offenders rather than to punish them. In theory, a key differentiating characteristic of the reformatory was that it removed youth from contact with adult prisoners. However, early reformatories were organized much like adult prisons, making them inadequate and not much of a substitute for adult correctional facilities. As a result, the term reformatory has not been used much since the 1960s. Instead, institutions for young offenders are more often referred to as youth detention centers, training schools, forestry camps, youth camps, honor farms, or juvenile residential facilities. Today, reformatories are financed by city, county, and state governments, as well as by the federal government. The first reformatories to operate in the United States were established in the early 1800s in Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania. This entry examines the history and current state of reformatories. It also explores the race-related aspects of the development and current conditions found in reformatories.

History and the Reformatory Era

In response to the overcrowding of prisons in the 1800s, U.S. prison administrators began to look to models of reform instituted by other countries. Of particular interest were the British and Irish penal systems. These systems were generally seen as more humane than the U.S. systems in existence at the time. They emphasized and expanded educational and vocational programs intended to train and prepare offenders for release and return to the community, all the while striving to reduce recidivism.

The principles of the foreign prison systems were formally accepted in 1870 after a meeting of politicians, prison administrations, and local citizens was held in Cincinnati, Ohio. In particular, they adopted the ideologies of rewarding good behavior and of emphasizing reform rather than punishment and suffering. In addition, they made use of indeterminate sentences to allow for the release of prisoners when it could be shown that they were prepared and ready to return to the community and to become contributing members of society. This period became known as the reformatory era and lasted from 1870 to 1910; however, many of its principles and programs are still considered vital to the organization of today's correctional systems.

Women and Children

Although quickly replaced by the industrial prison era, the reformatory era's influence can still be seen today, particularly when it comes to women and youthful offenders who are housed and dealt with separately from their adult male counterparts. In 1873, the Indiana Reformatory for Women and Girls—the first separate state prison for females—opened its doors. Shortly thereafter, states in the eastern part of the United States opened reformatories with entirely separate facilities for both women and juvenile offenders.

The design of the reformatories intended for use by women and youthful offenders was very different from the prisons used for men. The facilities used to house women were made up of small living quarters—built to resemble cottage-style architecture—and were designed to hold no more than 30 inmates at one time. Each unit included a kitchen, living room, common dining area, and oftentimes a nursery for those inmates who had children.

The residential facilities used for the custodial care of delinquent children were similar to those used for female inmates. Due to the rehabilitative nature of these institutions, their main goal was the social reeducation of delinquents. These institutions were first established in New York City in 1825 as houses of refuge from the prisons to which delinquent children had been previously committed. These early facilities emphasized hard work, strict discipline, and the bare minimum in education. Oftentimes, these institutions were called “reform schools” or “industrial schools” and had programs of rehabilitation and reeducation based on military discipline, country living, and vocational training. The early institutions resembled prisons in their organization; however, in the 1850s a few of the schools integrated the cottage plans, used with female offenders, in which the inmates resided in relatively small housing units.

Convict Leasing and Chain Gangs

As women’s reformatories expanded after the Civil War, so did Southern chain gangs and the leasing of inmates to private companies as an extension of antebellum slavery. In fact, convict leasing and chain gangs—made up of African American inmates—were the American South’s way of perpetuating plantation slave-labor and lasted from 1883 to 1910. The practice proved to be highly profitable for the government; the convicts did not receive any payment for their work.

During the day, inmates worked outside the prison for private companies, and supplied labor to mining, farming, logging, and railroad industries. In the evenings, they were returned to their cells for meals and sleep. Many of the inmates involved in the convict leasing system endured severe abuse and neglect at the hands of private business owners. Although the system drew opposition from the start, legislation outlawing the practice was not passed until well into the 20th century. Although, the convict leasing system has been phased out, other forms of convict labor still exist today, including industrial prisons and work camps.

Juvenile Residential Facilities

Today, reformatories and reform schools are often referred to as juvenile residential facilities. These facilities are much like the prisons that are used to hold adult offenders, but they house mostly youth found to be delinquent and those who have received orders of commitment. Unlike the reformatories of the past, whose primary focus was on educational and vocational training, today’s institutions include drug and substance abuse programs, as well as programs on recreation and religion. The average offender housed in a juvenile residential facility is roughly 16 years old but, depending on jurisdiction, can range as high as 25 years of age.

Juvenile offenders are usually placed under the supervision of a state department of youth services. Prior to being placed in a residential facility, they spend time at diagnostic centers where they receive psychological testing, as well as undergo aptitude and risk assessments to determine appropriate facility placement. After being assessed at the diagnostic centers, these juveniles are then sent to a long-term confinement facility or reformatory. Today, most juveniles are placed in public reformatories; however, public reformatories are outnumbered by private facilities that are under contract to state agencies.

The vast majority of offenders who are confined to juvenile residential facilities are there as a result of committing juvenile delinquency offenses that would be considered criminal law violations if committed by adults. Status offenses, such as curfew or loitering violations, account for a minimal number of confined youth. The number of juveniles committed to juvenile residential care facilities increases every decade. The increase in juvenile commitment has led to the overcrowding of facilities, making them less secure and more difficult to manage.

An imperfect solution to the problem of overcrowded juvenile facilities has been to place young offenders back into the adult prison system. In fact, there has been an increase in the number of offenders under the age of 18 who are being placed directly into state and federal adult prisons. In the past 10 years, the publicity of serious crimes committed by juveniles has led states to enact legislation allowing for the prosecution of serious juvenile offenders as adults. Upon the successful prosecutions of such cases, youths are being sentenced to terms of imprisonment in adult correctional facilities rather than juvenile residential facilities. With an increase in the commission of violent crimes by youthful offenders, it is predicted that more and more juveniles will be committed to adult facilities in the coming years.

Juvenile Gangs and Drug Use

The increase in juvenile commitment to residential facilities is attributed, in part, to the increase in gang activity by minority youth. Over the past several decades, there has been a dramatic increase in the number of juvenile gangs in the nation's inner cities, as well as rural communities. Research indicates that gang membership has a direct correlation to delinquent behavior, in particular to violent offenses. Most gangs are formed within racial or ethnic boundaries. Law enforcement statistics indicate that gang membership is mainly an African American and Hispanic phenomenon. However, there are indications that Asian gangs are significant contributors to the rate of serious offenses against persons and property.

Crimes committed by juveniles are also closely linked to poverty, drug use, and a lack of opportunity. Crime is most prevalent in neighborhoods with high African American and Hispanic populations, usually urban areas. As a result, the arrest and incarceration rates of these minority groups tend to be higher than the arrest and incarceration rates of Whites. Law enforcement efforts tend to be more intense in urban neighborhoods with high rates of crime and drug use. Studies of the War on Drugs indicate that arrest rates for drug use and possession are higher in cities than in suburban areas and have a disproportionate effect on African Americans. Overall, the disproportionate number of racial minorities that are arrested and placed into correctional facilities may have more to do with social and economic factors and less to do with discriminatory practices on the part of the criminal justice system. However, the high percentage of racial minorities under correctional supervision does contribute to a perception of racism that creates challenges for the effective management of correctional institutions, including juvenile residential facilities.

Background Expectations

The statistical indication of a socioeconomic correlation to criminal activity by minority juvenile offenders may be the inadvertent result of what is known as background expectations. Police and probation field researcher Aaron Cicourel, in The Social Organization of Juvenile Justice, questions the validity of such statistics. Cicourel's theory of background expectations states that research has found a link between broken homes and juvenile delinquency and that the finding is discussed often in the media. As a result, the police are then led to believe that children from broken homes are more apt to be delinquent. Subsequently, the police focus on, and arrest, a great many children from such homes. Based on these arrests, statistics show that children from broken homes are more likely to be delinquent. These statistics are then used by researchers to develop theories on a link between social status and crime. In all, such inaccurate and misleading information produced by the media can bias police action toward juvenile offenders, in particular minority youth offenders, and has the potential to increase their rates of arrest and confinement to residential facilities.

Racial Disparity of Inmates

As is the case in facilities for adult males, the reform and detention facilities for juveniles house primarily racial minorities. Statistics show that there is an overrepresentation of minorities in reformatories and that a significant percentage of the overall minority youth population has spent time in reform or correctional institutions. This racial disparity within the makeup of the U.S. correctional population has sparked debate as to whether criminal justice procedures and correctional policies are discriminatory. In an examination of the discretionary decision making by members of the criminal justice profession, Marc Morial, president of the National Urban League, discovered an alarming trend. According to Morial, 2002 census figures show that with 875,000 African Americans incarcerated in the United States, one out of every seven African American men, ages 25 to 29, is in jail or in prison.

In an attempt to understand why arrest and incarceration rates are disproportionate to the racial and ethnic makeup of the U.S. population, William Wilbanks, in The Myth of a Racist Criminal Justice System, claims that most studies of the criminal justice system do not show sufficient evidence of racism. Wilbanks, among others, argues that the proportion of incarcerated minorities to the overall minority population has mainly to do with the fact that minorities are disproportionately involved in crime, both as victims and as perpetrators. In the end, the issue may not be one of race but rather one of social class and economic status, which contributes to minorities—in particular those in poverty-stricken urban neighborhoods—being more likely to become the victims and perpetrators of violent crimes.

Racial Disparity of Correctional Staff

The disproportionate number of minorities in reformatories, jails, and prisons has made it increasingly important that correctional agencies recruit and staff their facilities with minority employees. In the past, there have been serious repercussions, such as the 1971 riot in the New York State Penitentiary in Attica, from having nearly all White employees supervise offender populations that are predominantly made up of minority groups. One of the main issues is the culture clash that can inevitably arise when correctional facilities, usually located in remote and rural White areas, are staffed by locals to guard urban African American and Hispanic populations. Often these groups are separated by a lack of trust and a lack of understanding or appreciation of cultural or racial differences. The result can manifest itself in hostility or a sense of discrimination that, when allowed to fester, can become explosive.

Since the Attica riot, there has been an increase in the hiring of minority staff in reform and detention facilities. This change in hiring practices has not necessarily quashed the issues of racial tension in today's reform institutions. When minority staff members were first recruited to rural institutions, some of the existing White staff members feared that the new non-White staff would be overly sympathetic to minority offender populations. In addition, the problem has bred a lack of trust among staff members, fear regarding the security of facilities, as well as concern regarding the job security of rural Whites. In the end, what was once a culture clash between staff and inmates has become a clash among correctional staff.

Krystal E. Noga

See also At-Risk Youth; Child Savers; Female Juvenile Delinquents; Juvenile Drug Courts; Status Offenses

Further Readings

- Cicourel, A. (1995). The social organization of juvenile justice. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Books.
- Penn, E. B., Greene, H. T., & Gabbidon, S. L. (Eds.). (2006). Race and juvenile justice. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press.
- Wilbanks, W. (1987). The myth of a racist criminal justice system. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole.
- Young, V. (1994). Race and gender in the establishment of juvenile institutions: The case of the South. Prison Journal, 74, 244–265.

RELIGIOUS MINORITIES

A religious minority is a minority of the population in a given society who profess a religion markedly different from the conventional religious culture of that society. For example, Buddhists, Hindus, and Muslims are counted as religious minorities in the United States, where Christianity has retained its dominant normative religious status. In the Islamic world, however, it is Christians with small population percentages that are among the ranks of religious minorities. In the social sciences (especially sociology), researchers have been increasingly concerned with social phenomena that center on religious minorities (i.e., cults/new religious movements). Not only does the religious minority group, as a social phenomenon, deserve serious research in its own right, but also there might exist significant associations between the religious minority identity and deviant behaviors, particularly when confounded with race and ethnicity, under certain social conditions. This has been particularly the case after 9/11. Since this period, Muslims in particular have been demonized as being criminals.

While the research on religious majority groups has dominated the scientific study of religion, remarkable progress has also been made in understanding religious minority groups. One of the earliest such studies dates back to 1965 when John Lofland and Rodney Stark published their well-known research on the formative years of the Unification church (Moonies) in the United States. Several decades later, in 1996, Rodney Stark and William Bainbridge defined sects and cults as the two basic forms of deviant religious groups. While the former (and churches as well) belong to the conventional religious culture, the latter are referred to as a religious minority group that engages in religious deviance. In other words, minority religion per se is deviance.

To be more specific, as religious minorities, members of most cults (or new religious movements) tend to reject the conventional religious culture of a given society and attempt to replace it with an entirely new culture. For example, New Paganism in the Christianity-dominated Western nations is a cult, given its attempt to replace the conventional Judeo-Christian culture of the West with an exotic religious culture claimed to predate Christianity. In addition, it also has been suggested that some conventional religious groups can automatically transform into cults by creating and adding new cultural elements into the existing conventional culture. As a consequence, members of such groups become religious minorities, being socially marginalized and rejected by the dominant religious culture, which views them as heretics and potential threats (e.g., the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints [Mormons] and the Unification Church, which rest on Christian beliefs and teachings with newly developed theological elements).

In the exploration of religious minorities as deviant, one area that cannot be neglected is race and ethnicity. Individuals who belong to a religious minority group may be subjected to social discrimination and prejudice from the larger society; this is particularly true when the religious differences correlate with racial and ethnic differences. One exemplary case is Japanese Buddhism during early Japanese immigration to the United States in the late 19th and the early 20th centuries. In this period, when anti-Asian sentiment was commonplace, Japanese ethnic identity aroused considerable hostility and oppression from the surrounding Christian culture against ethnic Japanese Buddhists. At this time, although often looked on with scorn by Christians, White Buddhist practitioners were spared from serious religious persecution. With the double burden of religious minority and racial and ethnic minority identities, a group may appear all the more “deviant” in the eyes of “mainstream” culture.

Admittedly, some religious groups, including minority groups, have the power to harm. Consequently, their actions can, at times, be extremely detrimental to the society—the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks against the United States are a striking example. But as sociologists of religion have pointed out, most religious minority groups are deviant mainly because their cultures differ dramatically from that of the conventional religious denominations in a given society. As a matter of fact, in most instances a religiously deviant group does not do any harm to the community to which it belongs or to its members (e.g., the sitting meditation of the Transcendental Meditation Groups).

Not only are religious minority groups deviant in comparison with dominant religious groups of the conventional culture, but religion has also been found to correlate with various forms of deviant behavior, such as crime, suicide, delinquency, and so on. The study of suicide, a basic form of individual-level deviant behavior, for example, played a crucial role in the founding of modern sociology; sociologists Thomas Masaryk and Émile Durkheim were among the first in the late 19th century to investigate the striking differences between suicide rates among Catholic and Protestant denominations. Henry Morselli also suggested, as early as in 1879, that members of religious minority groups particularly demonstrated low rates of suicide, for religious sentiment—which is believed to help deter suicide—increases in proportion to the degree of social isolation that religious minorities experience in a society. Unlike the linkage between suicide and religion that has received consistent examination based on hard evidence, the relationships of religion to other forms of deviance received little scholarly attention in the early studies on religious minorities.

Indeed, such research did not begin until 1969, when Travis Hirschi and Rodney Stark, in their study of religion and juvenile delinquency on the West Coast, found that the religiosity of youth had no relationship to their level of delinquent behavior.

Their work revitalized scholarly interest in religion and deviance. After a growing body of literature replicated the results from Hirschi and Stark's study, it became common knowledge within sociology that religion does not deter deviance. However, later research by Stark and others also found that religion does have a deterring effect on deviance—but that effect is dependent heavily upon social context. In regions where religious beliefs are not as strong (such as on the West Coast), individual religiosity does not have the power to constrain deviance. But when a religious person is in a religious setting (such as the South), religion is a powerful inhibitor of deviant behaviors. Indeed, this general rule of “moral communities” applies as nicely to religious minorities as to religious majority groups.

With regard to ethnoreligious minorities, once again race and ethnicity play a crucial role in understanding the linkage between minority religion and deviance. A substantial number of religious minority groups in the United States (e.g., Hinduism, Buddhism, Islam) have rapidly grown through immigration, and the vast majority of their members are ethnic minorities. As fundamental attributes of social relations, race and ethnicity are included in almost all the significant social scientific research, at least as a control variable. In any event, as findings from previous literature have demonstrated, the religious effect on deviant behavior conditioned by social contexts differs significantly between racial/ethnic minorities and majorities. For instance, Asian American adolescents from Confucian or Buddhist family backgrounds are less likely than others to commit deviant behaviors. Within such an ethno-religious-cultural social context, the religious emphasis on submission to parents' authority and conformity creates a sturdy parents–children social bond to effectively deter delinquency and crime. Unfortunately, however, research on the connections between religious minorities, crime and deviance, and race and ethnicity has been meager to date, and thus this subject clearly offers an opportunity for an exciting scholarly adventure.

Eric Yang Liu

See also Ethnicity; Race Relations; Racial Conflict; Racialization of Crime

Further Readings

- Durkheim, É. (1951). Suicide: A study in sociology (J. A. Spaulding & G. Simpson, Trans.). New York: The Free Press. (Original work published 1897)
- Lofland, J., & Stark, R. (1965). Becoming a world-saver: A theory of conversion to a deviant perspective. American Sociological Review, 30(6), 826–875.
- Stark, R. (1996). Religion as context: Hellfire and delinquency one more time. Sociology of Religion, 57(2), 163–173.
- Stark, R., & Bainbridge, W. (1996). Religion, deviance, and social control. New York: Routledge.

RESTORATIVE JUSTICE

Restorative justice is a peacemaking process that focuses on reducing the conflict and inequality created by the criminal justice system. Whereas the result of the traditional adversarial, offender-centered criminal justice system is the mass incarceration of minorities, nonadversarial restorative justice programs avoid this through community reintegration. Restorative justice involves the community in the process of crime control, improves relations between the victim and the offender, and constructively contributes to offender reintegration. This entry examines the history and principles of restorative justice, the process and agents of restoration, and the intersection of race and restorative justice.

History

The system of restorative justice is often understood from the context of the Native Americans' cultural practice of healing and reintegration, also termed peacemaking. The Native American peacemaking process serves as a venue to bring together victims, offenders, and the community, to solve what is viewed as a community problem. Within the history of Native American culture, reintegration of offenders is viewed as fundamental to maintaining the harmony and balance of a community. Instead of focusing on what happened, they often focus on why it happened, that is, why the social harm occurred in the first place. This process of reintegration focuses on active problem solving through (a) showing individuals the harm that their actions caused and (b) teaching offenders a constructive way of dealing with their situations and emotions.

The basic concepts of Native American justice include relationships, reciprocity, solidarity of the community, and the process of justice, as opposed to the dominant system of justice in the United States, which focuses on hierarchy and punitive judgment. Native American justice also focuses on preventive tactics. Whereas the U.S. criminal justice system responds to criminality after the fact, the Native American justice system focuses on prevention and the importance of a community raising a child. This focus on prevention allows the community to have a large impact on an individual and his or her behavior. Native Americans also believe in separating the individual from the crime; that is, while a criminal act is disrespectful, the individual is not. In contrast to the punitive function of the current criminal justice system, the separation between the crime and the individual results in a focus on rehabilitation and community reintegration.

The Native American cultures' focus on peacemaking has existed as long as the culture itself. They practice spirituality, community culture, and reintegration. While Native American cultures have a court system, the court system functions to repair the community harm and not necessarily to harshly punish the individual who has committed the harm. This allows all individuals involved (victim, offender, relatives, and community) to maintain dignity and integrity and to accept responsibility for the situation. As a result, the social stigma and negative consequences that result from a punitive system are avoided. When a Native American individual completes the process of restoration, his or her dignity and worthiness are considered restored, all individuals involved are active in the process, and the community is viewed as being restored to its harmonious nature.

These Native American components of reintegration and peacemaking were first utilized in the U.S. correctional system in 1972. The Minnesota Department of Corrections began using victim-offender meetings as an experimental component of state restitution programs. In the 1980s, numerous programs focused on community-based mediation programs for juvenile courts. Two decades later, hundreds of restorative programs were placed within juvenile and adult courts and corrections, each focusing on victim reparation, offender responsibility, and community reintegration.

Principles

Stemming from the Native American concepts of peacemaking and reintegration, current forms of restorative justice encompass a variety of programs and practices. At the core of restorative justice is the concept of restoring the imbalance that results from criminal behavior. Restorative justice addresses victims' harms and needs, holds offenders socially accountable for their behavior, and involves the community, victims, and offenders in this process. Instead of the punitive viewpoint of a traditional criminal justice system, restorative justice is a justice policy that repairs the harm caused by crime and includes all parties that were harmed to be involved within this process.

In 2002, the National Victim Assistance Academy identified the following seven principles as basic principles of restorative justice:

1. Crime is an offense against human relationships.
2. Victims and the community are central to justice processes.
3. The first priority of justice processes is to assist victims.
4. The second priority is to restore the community, to the degree possible.
5. The offender has personal accountability to victims and to the community for crimes committed.
6. The offender will develop improved competency and understanding as a result of the restorative justice experience.
7. Stakeholders share responsibilities for restorative justice through partnerships for action.

These principles serve the purpose of having offenders accept accountability for their actions and accept the responsibility for the harm that their criminal act caused. Unlike the traditional criminal justice system, restorative justice allows for a non-adversarial decision-making justice process that focuses on the offenders' and victims' healing through alternatives to incarceration or as a supplement to court sanctioning. As a result of this healing process, the offender can then become restored as a successful member of the community.

Process and Agents of Restoration

Restorative justice allows restoration to take place in a nonadversarial manner within the community in which the crime occurred, not within a traditional, adversarial court system. The restorative justice process may include family group conferences, community mediation, victim-offender mediations, sentencing circles (common within Native American communities) and reconciliation commissions. The process may occur in a formal or an informal manner, but it will occur within a structured, mediated environment.

The first step of a restorative justice program will include an element in which the offender is asked to recognize the injury that he or she caused. This is done through a personal statement from the offender to the victim. Next, the offender is expected to commit to reparation or make a symbolic commitment to restitution through the form of an apology. Through dialogue with those involved in the social harm (victims, offenders, community), the community will then voice support and assistance for all parties involved. The end result of the restorative justice process is the offender's reintegration into the community.

These programs have been implemented within many levels of society. Communities implement forms of restorative justice through community dialogue and involvement. In turn, communities with these programs foster a sense of interconnectedness and result in fewer neighborhood and community risks. Law enforcement utilizes components of restorative justice through the process of mediation, negotiation, and counseling. Community policing provides a catalyst for the utilization of restorative justice principles within the community. Courts have implemented the principles of restorative justice through diversion programs and alternatives to sentencing. Lastly, schools have created restorative justice programs within their system. Offenders involved in violent and property criminal activity, as well as drug and alcohol abuse, are given community work, service, and mentors as means to repair their social ties within the community. Rather than resorting to expulsion, restorative justice attempts to reintegrate students into the schools and communities as successful and productive citizens.

Restorative justice is commonly used to respond to young offenders. Young offenders are at high risk of recidivating and continuing on a life course trajectory toward crime. Instead of being placed in a facility or getting little attention from juvenile justice officials, restorative justice allows for early intervention. By focusing on reintegrative shaming (John Braithwaite's argument that individuals are deterred from committing criminal acts through fear of social disapproval), juvenile offenders are provided an environment in which they learn to understand the consequences of their actions, take responsibility for them, and make reparations to society. During this process, the juvenile offenders will be held accountable and will be provided a community of support, and will begin to identify with a sense of their community.

Intersection With Race

The traditional criminal justice system results in mass incarceration of minorities, negative labeling of offenders, and harsh social consequences to those who have been through the system. Restorative justice policies avoid these consequences through community reparation and individual development. They provide the social context for the successful reintegration of offenders into the community.

Many minorities claim that restorative justice programs fail to provide for remedies against minorities, because minorities are often not seen as victims, let alone the "ideal" victim to participate in a restorative justice program. Minority cultures are also more likely to risk rejection and hostility if they turn to the police for help. Because restorative justice is a policy that is remanded through these formal agencies, minorities often never have the opportunity to become involved in the healing and reparation that results from restorative justice. The number of police and court referrals for restorative justice programs has historically been lower for members of minority cultures when compared to members of the dominant culture.

Studies suggest that restorative justice does not work the same way for all groups and cultures and that this oversight may be repaired by changes in government involvement. It has been suggested that restorative justice can deliver a more effective and appropriate form of justice if it is well resourced and tied to a political process. For restorative justice programs to be successful for minority group members, engagement between political minority groups and governments must occur. Restorative justice programs often lack a focus on culturally appropriate services and have been unresponsive to cultural differences. This has resulted in an erosion of belief and trust in the legitimacy of the criminal justice system and restorative justice programs. The intersection of race and current programs of restorative justice may result in the assimilation of minorities into a process that may not be sufficient for restoring, repairing, or involving minority communities.

The current criminal justice system faces many challenges. Courts are overcrowded, offenders play a passive role within the system, victims are often excluded from the process, and resources are saved for the most serious cases. Restorative justice and its principles allow society to redefine how the current criminal justice system addresses crime. When crime is viewed as a social harm, the justice process must emphasize repairing that harm. To provide safety and stability to society, actively engaging victims, offenders, and citizens in the solution is necessary. This engagement allows for alternatives to incarceration, community “watch” programs, and community solidarity, which in turn repairs harm, restores balance, and allows for peace.

Alana Van Gundy-Yoder

See also Conflict Theory; Mentoring Programs; Native Americans: Culture, Identity, and the Criminal Justice System

Further Readings

Bazemore, G., Seymour, A., Day, S., & Rubin, T. (2000, October). Victims, judges, and juvenile court reform through restorative justice. OVC Bulletin. Retrieved from Office for Victims of Crime website: http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/ovc/publications/bulletins/vjj_10_2000_2/welcome.html

- Braithwaite, J. (1989). Crime, shame, and reintegration. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Braithwaite, J. (1998). Restorative justice. In M. Tonry (Ed.), The handbook of crime and punishment (pp. 323–344). New York: Oxford University Press.
- McGarrell, E. F. (2001, August). Restorative justice conferences as an early response to young offenders. Juvenile Justice Bulletin. Retrieved from Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Problems website: http://www.ncjrs.gov/html/ojjdp/jjbul2001_8_2/contents.html
- Mirsky, L. (2004). Restorative justice practices of Native American, First Nation and other Indigenous people of North America (2 parts). Bethlehem, PA: International Institute for Restorative Practices.

r/K THEORY

r/K theory, derived from evolutionary biology, describes a continuum of reproduction strategies. Species on the r-strategy end of this continuum reproduce quickly, in large numbers, and spend little time nurturing their young, while K-strategy animals reproduce slowly, in low numbers per birthing event, and nurture their young carefully. Although humans are believed to be K-strategy animals on the whole, this theory has been applied to criminal behavior by assuming there is discernable variation in reproductive strategies within the human species itself. More specifically, criminal behaviors have been linked to a relativistic r-strategy within the continuum of human reproduction. Groups with more r-traits are postulated as being more likely to engage in crime. Empirically, the claims of r/K theory are difficult to prove and have caused a great deal of controversy with regard to racial applications to criminal behavior.

r/K in Biology

Regular use of r/K theory to describe reproduction within evolutionary biology began in the late 1960s with the work of Robert MacArthur and E. O. Wilson. The use of r and K reflects the inherent differences between the reproductive strategies—r, in reference to the growth rate of a population, is connected to animal species that expand rapidly in a noncompetitive environment; in contrast, K refers to the carrying capacity or equilibrium point of the environment and is associated with species that breed slowly in highly competitive niches. All organisms are thought to fall at some point between the r and K extremes, and such biological realities influence subsequent behavior regarding reproduction. However, some researchers have refined this theory to account for further variability within the animal kingdom.

Animals reflecting r-strategies have developed abilities through evolution to have low gestation periods and large quantities of offspring, but also have short life spans; from an evolutionary standpoint, such qualities could be highly beneficial in a rapidly changing environment, where high rates of genetic turnover produce the best odds of finding successful adaptations. These traits influence animal behavior, as r-strategy species will begin reproduction early in their life cycles to maximize genetic chances and have less ability to care for and cultivate offspring because of large birth cohorts. In this strategy, individual organisms are less important than the overall perpetuation of the species as a result of rapid evolutionary development, large numbers, and short life spans. Many insect species would fit into this reproductive strategy.

Species that represent K-strategies have large gestation periods and small quantities of offspring per birth, though individual organisms tend to have long expected life spans. Evolution occurs slowly for such animals, and environmental adaptation results more from the abilities of the individual organisms rather than rapid genetic turnover. As a result of having slower reproduction and a lessened priority to produce immediate genetic variation, K-strategists will need to invest more energy into offspring than will r-strategists. This leads to cautious reproduction strategies to maximize resources, manifesting in delayed commencement of reproduction and greater ability to assist and protect offspring. Humans and other large, warm-blooded mammals are indicative of this overall strategy.

According to behavioral geneticist and psychologist David Rowe, the fundamental difference between these two reproductive extremes is that r-strategists emphasize mating, whereas K-strategists emphasize parenting. Different skill sets and assumptions are required for each strategy. Species using an r-strategy focus on immediate action to maximize their biological advantages; hence prolonged sex drive, sexual aggressiveness, and detachment from offspring are useful. In contrast, maximizing K-strategy advantages require actions such as mate discernment, enhanced loyalty to biological relations, and prospective stability for the offspring's environment.

r/K in Human Behavior and Crime

Whereas human beings are considered K-strategists from a biological standpoint, there is sufficient variation in human behavior for some researchers to suggest homo sapiens are not a monolithic or uniform K species. This is accounted for in the general biological theory, as organisms are seen as falling within a continuum between r and K with a combination of traits to various degrees. In this schema, criminal acts in humans are regarded as an r-strategy behavior—offending is an aggressive, opportunistic action that requires a detachment from others and is often focused on immediate gains rather than long-term consequences.

Though intraspecies variation is built into the r/K theory, theorists such as Lee Ellis and J. Philippe Rushton propose there is a systematic variation within our species such that specific groupings of humans can be differentiated in comparison to each other along this r/K continuum. In addition to previously mentioned r-traits, those who are evolutionarily predisposed to the r-strategy end of human reproductive variation will have shorter gestation and lower birth weight, will mature more quickly, and will be more sexually promiscuous than others overall. Additionally, because dispositions are genetic, humans with a propensity to r-strategies should have biological parents with the same propensity and families with large numbers of biological siblings and higher rates of neglect and/or abuse than the general population or than other groups in comparison. Within human populations, males as opposed to females, antisocial as opposed to social personalities, and African as opposed to other ancestries are seen to manifest r-traits and therefore are thought more likely to engage in r-strategies (including criminal behavior).

r/K and Race

Psychologist and behavioral geneticist J. Philippe Rushton is one of the leading proponents of racial differences in physical and behavioral traits according to r/K theory. Evidence for this position comes from trait differences across three major racial ancestries: Black African, White European, and East Asian.

This position starts with the assumption that human life evolved from the great apes found in the tropical environments of Africa. This environment is relatively unstable, prone to extreme weather, disease, and predators. Such characteristics are more evolutionarily favorable to an r-strategist who can reproduce quickly and does not rely on stability and long-term investment in offspring to ensure the continuation of the species. However, once some humans migrated out of Africa, their environment changed and evolutionary adaptations resulted in order to propagate survival. Humans who moved to Europe, and later Asia, found environments better suited to K-strategists—regular patterns of weather, along with less disease and fewer predatory animals. Additionally, two negative environmental characteristics fostered long-term planning, namely, periods of cold weather and less-abundant food sources. All of these new environmental factors required an evolution of mental capacities in order to plan long-term survival. Human populations outside of tropical Africa could not simply rely on a rapid rate of reproduction to ensure survival, but rather would have to learn new techniques (tools, farming, social support structures). The mental evolution shifted these populations toward more K-strategies than Africans had, but at the cost of the physical advantages still found in r-strategy African populations (quicker growth, athleticism, higher sexual hormones, etc.). This position concludes that racial differences should be exhibited according to this migratory and evolutionary pattern, such that African ancestries will have r-traits and be predisposed to r-strategies while Asian ancestries will have K-traits and be predisposed to K-strategies, with Europeans located in the middle of this scale (though closer to the K-traits and K-strategies because their split with Asians occurred recently in the evolutionary past and Europeans faced more common conditions with Asians than with Africans).

Evidence of physical and anthropological differences between these racial groups has been documented for over a century. Various studies have suggested that African ancestries possess more r-traits than other racial groups on average, whereas Asians possess the fewest of these traits, with those of European ancestries falling between the two other races. Traits noted in support of race differences, in addition to general biological r-strategies previously mentioned, include the following:

- Brain size and IQ scores, with Africans lowest and Asians highest
- Degree of cultural and organizational achievements (societal complexity, architectural prowess), with Africans less than both Europeans and Asians
- Sexuality (rate of twin births, hormone levels, size of sexual characteristics, promiscuity, rate of sexually transmitted diseases), with Africans highest and Asians lowest
- Personality features such as aggressiveness and impulsivity, highest in Africans and lowest in Asians
- Health issues (mental stability, resistance to disease, and life expectancy), with Africans lowest and Asians highest
- Family characteristics, including more siblings, weaker bonds, weaker supervision, and higher rates of child abandonment, found most often in African ancestries and least often in Asian ancestries

It should be noted again that advocates of this perspective see these traits in the aggregate and recognize that extreme examples of these traits can be found in all races.

r/K, Race, and Crime

r/K theorists believe the theory explains why African Americans have higher rates of criminal offending than Whites and why Asian American rates are lower than White offending rates within the United States. Additionally, advocates of this position suggest that global data support this hierarchy of criminal offending across cultures. Rates of offending are a matter of self-selection based on genetic traits and environmental adaptation—criminality is an r-strategy behavior rooted in impulsivity, lack of control, and immediate gratification (r-traits), so racial groups that manifest more r-traits on average will therefore manifest r-strategy behaviors. Crime also serves to independently undermine K-strategy principles necessary for organizing familial and societal structures. Accordingly, populations with African ancestries are less likely, on average, to be predisposed to follow rules that enforce self-control and delayed gratification.

Criticisms of r/K Theory and Racial Applications

The rise of r/K theory and its application in criminology has not been without criticism. As with many biological theories of crime, especially those incorporating a race-specific typology, there is a concern regarding criminal determinism. The dangers of broad generalization and stereotyping are acknowledged by this theory, and the common defense is that the theory's postulates fit the facts without making value judgments. While this theory attempts to incorporate environmental considerations, the primary focus is on genetic differences manifesting in both physical and behavioral traits and thus ignores alternative hypotheses related to societal structure and culture. It can be argued that this theory suffers from an embarrassment of riches in that rates of criminal participation should be considerably higher within African populations given an average r-strategy disposition.

Empirical evidence for this theory is mixed. Although anthropological and behavioral differences between races have been discovered, issues related to sample selection for measurement, racial interbreeding, and environmental effects on development (such as prenatal and postnatal nutrition) have yet to be fully accounted for in the causal relationship. Numerous studies have detailed racial differences in criminal behavior, but the most comprehensive and systematic studies of race and crime have been conducted in predominantly White countries, thus potentially confounding biological and social effects. In addition, it can be suggested that this theory confuses crime and criminality—high rates of criminal activity are cited as direct evidence of heightened propensity in comparison to other races, without accounting for differential opportunity structures.

The logical extension of this theory in race and crime, if correct, creates a question left unanswered for now: How will modern society affect the evolutionary trends? The genesis of r-strategies is biological, whether as a species on the whole or a subgroup within a species. It is a genetic compulsion perpetuated by evolutionary advantage in an environment. However, modern societies often have degrees of racial intermixing and reproduction within the same environment; additionally, it can be argued that the impact of environment on basic survival and evolution has been reduced through technology, allowing for possibilities not previously possible in nature. If crime is a function of r-strategy, is it possible that modern society will make r-traits an evolutionary dead end and thus breed crime out? Or may modern society intercede in natural selection and create a setting where r-strategists can survive through protection from natural weaknesses (low birth weights, shorter life spans, susceptibility to disease) that would potentially eliminate such groups in an environment favoring K-strategists? Given the pace at which such evolutionary trends are hypothesized to take place in human beings, it is unlikely such answers will come anytime soon if at all, making improbable a full assessment of the veracity of the theory's claims regarding race and crime.

Sean Goodison

See also Biological Theories; Conservative Criminology; General Theory of Crime; IQ; Myth of a Racist Criminal Justice System; Racism

Further Readings

- Ellis, L., & Walsh, A. (1997). Gene-based evolutionary theories in criminology. Criminology, 35, 229–276.
 Rushton, J. P. (2000). Race, evolution, and behavior: A life-history perspective. Port Huron, MI: Charles Darwin Research Institute.

ROPER V. SIMMONS

Racial discrimination in the imposition of the death penalty continues as a subject of controversy within the criminal justice system. In 2004, juveniles who were members of ethnic/racial minorities were disproportionately sentenced to death. But in 2005, the issue of race in such cases became moot as a result of the Supreme Court's ruling in Roper v. Simmons. The issue for the Court to decide was whether the meaning of "cruel and unusual punishment" was to remain unchanged since the adoption of the Bill of Rights in the 18th century or whether it should be defined by current events and a new consensus in the United States or among nations. This question had been presented to the Supreme Court numerous times from different perspectives. In Roper v. Simmons, the Court was asked to decide whether executing an individual for a murder committed when he was 17 constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment to the Constitution. In a 5–4 decision, the justices determined that the imposition of the death penalty in such a case was indeed cruel and unusual and thus violated the Eighth Amendment prohibition.

The Facts

The defendant, Christopher Simmons, a high school student in Missouri, was 17 years old when he and two friends, Charles Benjamin (age 15) and John Tessmer (age 16) talked about committing a burglary and a murder. Simmons told his friends that he wanted to kill someone and assured them that they could "get away with it" because they were considered minors. As part of their plan, they met at 2:00 a.m. on the morning of September 9, 1993. Tessmer left the meeting before Simmons and Benjamin set out for the home of Shirley Crook. Simmons was able to unlock the back door through an open window. Benjamin and Simmons walked through the house and up to Crook's bedroom. As they had planned, they used duct tape to cover her eyes and mouth and bind her hands. They drove Crook's minivan to a state park, where they bound the victim even further with duct tape and electrical wire. They took her from the vehicle to a railroad trestle over the Meramec River and threw her over the side into the river, where she drowned.

Later that day, Steven Crook returned home, found his bedroom in disarray, and called police to report that his wife was missing. In the afternoon, Shirley Crook's body was recovered from the river by fishermen. By the time of the recovery, Simmons had already been bragging about having killed Crook, telling his friends that he killed her because she had seen his face.

By the next day, police had received information about Simmons's activity; they went to his high school and placed him under arrest. Simmons waived his rights and proceeded to answer questions from the police. Within 2 hours, Simmons had confessed to killing Crook. The police took him to the crime scene, where Simmons performed a reenactment of the crime that was videotaped by the police. Simmons was charged as an adult with burglary, kidnapping, stealing and murder in the first degree. Tessmer was charged with conspiracy to commit murder, but the charges were dropped in return for his testimony. The state introduced the statements that Simmons had made both before and after the crime, his confession, and the video recording of the reenactment of the crime. Simmons's attorneys did not call any witnesses during the guilt phase of the trial. However, they did present information indicating that Simmons did not have any prior charges against him and had a clean record. Family and friends talked about his character, their relationships with him, his age, and, among other things, his capacity to love; they pleaded for mercy. But the jury also heard from Shirley Crook's family and the devastation that her horrible death had caused. Accepting the jury's recommendation, the trial judge imposed the death penalty.

After obtaining a new attorney, Simmons filed an appeal alleging ineffective assistance of counsel during his trial. His new counsel attempted to show that there was information about Simmons that should have been raised during the trial by counsel that could have had an effect on the outcome. His counsel argued that numerous mitigating points should have been raised during the trial, including that Simmons was immature, susceptible to manipulation, a poor student, absent from home for long periods, and an abuser of drugs and alcohol. The case was appealed in the Missouri courts. The courts did not find that there were any constitutional violations regarding the alleged ineffective assistance of counsel. An appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court was denied (see State v. Simmons, 1997).

Prior Case Law

In Thompson v. Oklahoma (1988), the U.S. Supreme Court, in a plurality opinion, stated that the “standards of decency do not permit the execution of any offender under the age of 16 at the time of the crime.” It noted that the last execution of a juvenile under 16 occurred in 1948. A year later, in Stanford v. Kentucky (1989), the Supreme Court held that the Eighth Amendment did not forbid the execution of youth between the ages of 16 and 18, and that there was not at that time a “national consensus” that this would be “cruel and unusual punishment.” In that same year, the Court decided Penry v. Lynaugh (1989). The defendant in this case was 22 with an IQ of 54. He was found responsible for the rape and murder of Pamela Carpenter in Texas. The Court concluded that the Eighth Amendment did not preclude the imposition of capital punishment for the mentally retarded. Writing the majority opinion, Justice O’Connor noted there was not a “national consensus” opposed to the execution of the mentally retarded. It was believed that mental retardation should only be a mitigating factor in a capital punishment decision. It is the issue of a “national consensus” that was a major factor when the Court decided Atkins v. Virginia (2002).

In Atkins v. Virginia, the Supreme Court again addressed whether it was “cruel and unusual punishment” to execute a mentally retarded individual. In this case, the Court noted that the societal standards of decency had evolved since its decision in Penry v. Lynaugh. The Court now held that the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution prohibited a state from executing a mentally retarded individual (Atkins v. Virginia, 314–315). It was because of this decision, reflecting an apparent change in the national consensus, that the attorney for Simmons filed a new appeal with the Missouri Supreme Court. His attorney reasoned that because Simmons was only 17, a juvenile, when the crime occurred and the Court now indicated that the Constitution’s Eighth Amendment prohibited the execution of a juvenile as a “cruel and unusual punishment,” Simmons’s sentence should be reviewed.

The Missouri Supreme Court agreed with Simmons in State ex. rel. Simmons v. Roper (2003) (en banc), and it ignored the U.S. Supreme Court’s earlier decision in Stanford v. Kentucky. It held that a national consensus has developed against the execution of juvenile offenders, as demonstrated by the fact that eighteen states now bar such execution for juveniles, that twelve other states bar executions altogether, that no state has lowered its age of execution below 18 . . . that five states have legislatively or by case law raised or established the minimum age at 18, and that the imposition of the juvenile death penalty has become truly unusual over the past decade.

The opinion of the Missouri Supreme Court did not agree with the U.S. Supreme Court’s decision in Stanford v. Kentucky; the Supreme Court granted a Writ of Certiorari (2004) to review the Simmons sentence. After hearing the case, it affirmed the decision of the Missouri Supreme Court.

The Court’s Ruling

In this case, the Supreme Court took a bold step in deciding that it was “cruel and unusual” to put a juvenile, who was 17 at the time of the crime, to death. Although Justice O’Connor had written for the majority in Stanford v. Kentucky, she wrote a dissenting opinion in this case.

The Court relied on several factors in reaching its opinion. It recognized that there was an evolving societal standard both within the United States and among other Western nations. It observed that there was a direct parallel between the movement against the death penalty for the mentally retarded and opposition to the execution of juveniles under the age of 18. The Court indicated that a majority of the states now reject the death penalty for juvenile offenders. It recognized three general differences between juveniles and adults: (1) Juveniles may exhibit a lack of maturity and an underdeveloped sense of responsibility (Johnson v. Texas, 1993), (2) juveniles are more susceptible to pressures (Eddings v. Oklahoma, 1982), and (3) a juvenile’s character is not fully formed. The Court also questioned whether the possible imposition of the death penalty actually had a deterrent effect on juveniles and noted that it was a “disproportionate punishment” for someone under 18.

The Court also looked at the treatment of juveniles regarding capital punishment in the world community. It noted that the respondent and several amici briefs indicated that Article 37 of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child prohibited capital punishment for crimes committed by juveniles and was ratified by every country with the exception of the United States and Somalia. The United Kingdom, the source of the U.S. Constitution's Eighth Amendment, prohibited the capital punishment of anyone under the age of 18 when the crime was committed.

There were two dissenting opinions. Justice O'Connor wrote that the evidence before the Court failed to reflect a "national consensus" against the capital punishment of 17-year-old offenders, since the Court upheld the constitutionality of that practice in Stanford v. Kentucky. Although Justice O'Connor noted that the Eighth Amendment standards on "cruel and unusual punishments" are evolving, she felt that it was improper for the Court to substitute its judgment in place of the nation's legislatures.

In his dissent, Justice Scalia was critical of how the Court could determine that the "national consensus" regarding the imposition of the death penalty for those between the ages of 16 and 18 could have changed so dramatically in the 15 years since Stanford v. Kentucky. He indicated that the amendment regarding "cruel and unusual punishments" was originally intended to describe those punishments that were "not authorized by common law or statute." With that reasoning, he wrote, "The death penalty for under 18 offenders would easily survive (review)." He determined that the Court "wrongly rejected a purely originalist approach to our Eighth Amendment."

The Eighth Amendment continues to remain active in U.S. courts. On April 16, 2008, the Supreme Court decided that a particular form of lethal injection that is used by 30 of the states as a form of execution did not violate the ban on "cruel and unusual punishments." In Base et al. v. Rees, Commissioner, Kentucky Department of Corrections, et al. (No. 07-5439), the Supreme Court affirmed the ruling of the Kentucky Supreme Court, holding that the protocol of drugs used "does not violate the Eighth Amendment because it does not create a substantial risk of wanton and unnecessary infliction of pain, torture, or lingering death."

Keith Gregory Logan

See also Death Penalty; Juvenile Crime; Sentencing; Violent Juvenile Offenders

Further Readings

- Atkins v. Virginia*, 536 U.S. 304 (2002).
Base et al. v. Rees, Commissioner, Kentucky Department of Corrections, et al., No. 07-5439 (2008).
Eddings v. Oklahoma, 455 U.S. 104, 115 (1982).
Johnson v. Texas, 509 U.S. 350, 367 (1993).
Penry v. Lynaugh, 492 U.S. 302 (1989).
Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 541 (2005).
Stanford v. Kentucky, 492 U.S. 361 (1989).
State ex. rel. Simmons v. Roper, 112 S.W.3d 397, 399 (2003) (en banc).
State v. Simmons, 944 S.W.2d 165, 169 (en banc), cert. denied, 522 U.S. 953 (1997).
 Streib, V. L. (2005). The juvenile death penalty today: Death sentences and executions for juvenile crimes, January 1, 1973–February 28, 2005 (Issue 77). Ada: Ohio Northern University. Retrieved September 25, 2008, from http://www.law.onu.edu/faculty_staff/faculty_profiles/coursematerials/streib/juvdeath.pdf
Thompson v. Oklahoma, 487 U.S. 815 (1988).
Writ of Certiorari, 540 U.S. 1160 (2004).

ROSEWOOD, FLORIDA, RACE RIOT OF 1923

Over the course of 6 days in January of 1923, the predominantly Black town of Rosewood, Florida, was mobbed by Whites from surrounding areas, and the entire town was burned to the ground. In February of that year a grand jury found insufficient evidence to prosecute, and the truth behind this atrocity lay dormant for decades. Finally, in the early 1990s there was an attempt to retrieve the truth. Many of the recorded stories are conflicting; the anecdotal accounts of White individuals differ from the accounts of Black individuals, but some facts have been established. In 1994, Florida Governor Lawton Chiles signed legislation that would compensate Black victims and their families for past racial violence. This entry examines the history of the incident at Rosewood, and then, Rosewood's renewed significance in a more recent public policy decision in the state of Florida.

History of the Rosewood Riot

Rosewood in 1923 was a relatively small community (approximately 350 people) that had three churches, a train station, a Black Masonic hall, and a school. The closing of a local pencil mill in 1890 had led to an exodus of White families, so that by around 1900 the remaining population was almost entirely African American. Until the events of 1923, most Rosewood residents found employment in the nearby town of Sumner, where a large saw mill was located.

The full conflicting story of the Rosewood Riot (also called the Rosewood Massacre) has only been recently documented in 1993 by a group of Florida professors and graduate students at the behest of the Florida Board of Regents. Prior to this time, it had been reported in 1923 by the Associated Press but not pursued by investigative journalists; since then the story had been passed on through word of mouth by those who had experienced or witnessed it. What had actually occurred remained for a long time a partial mystery, even considered by some to be a myth because of the conflicting nature of oral histories as told by Blacks versus those told by Whites.

The chain of events that occurred during the first week in January 1923 reportedly began with an incident on New Year's morning with an assault on a married White woman, Fannie Taylor, at her home. According to many Whites in Rosewood, this crime was supposedly perpetrated by a Black man and included rape; some accounts added that she was robbed as well.

Another version of the tale, as recalled by Blacks in the community, was that a White man had entered the Taylor house that morning who was supposed to have been Fannie's illicit lover. During a quarrel he physically assaulted her. Her husband returned home around noon to find his wife apparently beaten. To keep him from finding out about her affair, she allegedly told her husband that it was a Black man who had assaulted her.

Whatever the truth may have been, it is the former version of the story that was quickly spread and was deemed to be true by the White community of Sumner. Levy County Sheriff Walker immediately organized a search for the supposed offender, who was alleged to have fled in the direction of Gulf Hammock, a swamp. A large search party consisting of both officers and residents was described by some as "out for blood." Accounts of the ensuing events, although somewhat muddled, yielded the following summary.

At the time of the search, a man named Jesse Hunter was identified as a suspect. Meanwhile, White vigilantes from the surrounding area decided to take matters into their own hands and stormed into the town of Rosewood. Because Jesse Hunter had allegedly been seen in the company of Sam Carter, the group set out for Carter's home. Carter admitted being in the company of a wanted man, but did not specifically name Hunter. Other accounts place Carter with the White man who had been seen leaving Fannie Taylor's house. According to one version of events, Carter led the posse to a spot where he alleged that he had last seen the fugitive, but the bloodhounds with the posse were unable to pick up any scent. Now dissatisfied and furious, members of the mob tortured Carter, shot him repeatedly, and then lynched him.

According to the account published in the newspaper, Carter was found dead on the road. Black families maintained, however, that he had been shot and hanged in Rosewood. Nevertheless, a six-man jury convened on January 2 concluded that Sam Carter was found dead and shot by an unknown assailant.

According to another account, Fannie Taylor's White lover had fled to Sam Carter's house to seek assistance. Both men were allegedly members of the Freemasons, a brotherhood that reaches beyond racial boundaries. Carter agreed to help the White man, and together they went to the home of Aaron Carrier, also a Mason, who gave him food; Carter and Carrier then took him into Gulf Hammock, where he escaped in a boat.

A slightly differing account states that the White man first went to Carrier's house and then Carter's before the escape, but the remaining events were the same. Omitted from newspaper accounts was that earlier that afternoon another Black man had been harassed and beaten but survived; this man was Aaron Carrier, who, it is said, fled Rosewood after the incident. It is reported that after these events, the posse confronted Sylvester Carrier (Aaron's cousin) and ordered him out of town. He instead went to the home of his mother, Sarah Carrier.

On January 4, White vigilantes took to Rosewood, again on rumors of Blacks congregating and plotting. They gathered at Sarah Carrier's house, owing to Sylvester Carrier's having failed to obey the order to leave town and in response to rumors that he been making comments about the Fannie Taylor incident. The newspaper account reported that the Blacks inside the Carrier house had opened fire on the vigilantes; other accounts had Whites firing the first shots. The violence resulted in a Black woman (Sarah Carrier) and two White men being killed; others were reported killed, and several others wounded. Descendants of the Carriers report that Sylvester Carrier escaped and many years later died in Texas. The havoc continued well until the early hours of January 5. The story started spreading quickly, and the Alachua County sheriff was requested to respond along with other officers.

The violence continued as vigilantes burned the Carrier house to the ground and then wreaked havoc on the town. A Black church and five houses were burned, and a Black woman, Lexie Gordon, was shot and killed. It was said that she was trying to flee her house after it had been set on fire. This placed the official death toll at six. The role of law officials at this point remains unclear. In addition at this time, terrified Black residents started to flee from Rosewood into the nearby swamp.

The violence continued on January 5. Many Whites—an estimated 200 to 300—descended on Rosewood. Another Black victim, Mingo Williams, was killed on Friday afternoon after he unluckily encountered the White mob. At this point, Sheriff Walker told the Associate Press reporter that the violence would continue because relatives of the Black victims were armed and would potentially retaliate. The Alachua County sheriff, however, returned to Gainesville Friday afternoon because he thought the local sheriff could control the situation. According to newspaper accounts, Sheriff Walker sent a telegram to the Florida governor and told him the situation was under control; consequently, the National Guard was not deployed.

Another death also occurred Friday after the Alachua County sheriff had already decided to leave; the victim was James Carrier, one of the men who had been inside the house Thursday night. He reportedly left his hideout in the woods, and when he emerged he was questioned, tortured, and then shot.

Many Rosewood residents remained in hiding in the swamps, still afraid of the mob; others reportedly evacuated on January 6 on a train to Gainesville. On Sunday, January 7, an estimated 100 to 150 Whites descended on Rosewood again and burned the remaining structures to the ground. Accounts differ as to how many were killed, but the final reported death toll was eight. The number of homes destroyed was 18, and the residents of Rosewood who had fled would never return. Finally, on February 15, a grand jury found insufficient evidence to prosecute anyone for the Rosewood riot.

In 1994, the Florida State Rosewood Claims bill awarded survivors and their descendants monies for the wrongs that were imposed upon them and for the burning of their town. Residents and descendants who were evacuated also received some compensation. As of 2007, 5 of the 10 known survivors were reportedly still alive; there are an estimated 400 descendants.

Rebecca Hayes

See also Chicago Race Riot of 1919; Detroit Riot of 1967; Harlem Race Riot of 1935; Los Angeles Race Riot of 1965; Los Angeles Race Riots of 1992; Miami Riot of 1980; Race Riots; Tulsa, Oklahoma, Race Riot of 1921; Zoot Suit Riots

Further Readings

Displays for Schools. (n.d.). Remembering Rosewood. Retrieved May 31, 2007, from <http://www.displaysforschools.com/history.html>

Jones, M. D., Rivers, L. E., Colburn, D. R., Dye, R. T., & Rogers, W. R. (1993). A documented history of the incident which occurred at Rosewood, Florida in January 1923. Tallahassee: Florida State Archives. Retrieved September 28, 2007, from <http://www.displaysforschools.com/rosewoodrpt.html>

SCARFACE MYTH

The Scarface myth refers to a set of beliefs about the violent and crime-prone nature of a specific group of Cuban immigrants, known as Marielitos. The myth gets its name from the character of Scarface, portrayed by Al Pacino in the 1983 film of that name directed by Brian De Palma. Although the Scarface myth emerged nearly 25 years ago, it remains a relevant topic for criminologists because as national rates of immigration have increased, a similar set of beliefs has been applied to foreign-born groups more generally.

Approximately 125,000 Marielitos relocated to the United States from Cuba during a period of relaxed immigration standards authorized by the Cuban government in the early 1980s. They were called Marielitos because the port of origin for most of their boats was Mariel, in northern Cuba. The fact that a portion of the arriving immigrants were involved in the criminal justice and/or mental health systems in Cuba was seized upon by news and media outlets in Miami (Florida) and across the country. This information led many to conclude that the Marielito population included a disproportionate number of violent criminals. This entry examines the Scarface myth in the context of historical reactions to immigration and describes its continued importance to the study of immigration and crime.

It is certainly true that the emergence of the Scarface myth was a response to a specific pattern of immigration and circumstances in Miami and, to a lesser extent, the patterns of immigration to the United States during this period. It is possible to interpret the particulars of the myth as an isolated response to a particular wave of immigrants. However, taking a broader historical perspective, it appears that the sentiment advanced by the Scarface myth, which focuses on the criminality of newcomers, is a relatively common response to immigration. Indeed, immigration opponents have argued about the perils of the “criminal aliens” for over a century. For example, some scholars contend that immigration has been a principal factor in surges in levels of national crime across various historical periods. Similarly, researchers also point out that dating back more than 150 years, anti-immigration proponents have often claimed that immigration is a sufficient condition to cause increases in levels of criminal deviance. When placed in a comparative context, the evidence suggests that perhaps the more recent Scarface myth represents a new incarnation of an established practice of influencing public perceptions regarding immigration.

Since the Mariel boatlift in 1980, the size of the foreign-born population in the United States has grown exponentially. In addition, as the immigrant population in this country has become increasingly diverse, elements of the Scarface myth are still advanced by the mainstream media. One notable difference, however, is that current representations relating to immigration and crime are no longer restricted to largely fictional portrayals (i.e., movies, television). Instead, politically based talk shows, on both radio and television, offer a new vehicle by which the myth's support for the immigration-crime link is disseminated. Reports issued by media-monitoring agencies have documented the fact that it is common for television and radio personalities to discuss the criminal and noncriminal deviance of immigrants. Although such claims have been criticized for their factual inaccuracies, the use of these journalistic and nonfictional outlets represents a relatively new mechanism for promoting popular and long-standing beliefs about immigration.

The beliefs about the crime-producing effects of immigration remain strong, despite the quantitative evidence to the contrary. Most of the research on the link between immigration and crime with respect to the Scarface representations of Marielitos has examined patterns of violence in Miami. A consistent finding reported in this body of research is that the presence of recent immigrants is inversely associated with levels of lethal violence. In fact, communities with higher numbers of recent immigrants tend to have lower levels of lethal and nonlethal violence.

A negative impact of immigration on criminal deviance is also reported in research that focuses on other immigrant destination cities. Indeed, findings such as these have led some researchers to take seriously the notion that immigration may impact broader crime trends. For example, Harvard University criminologist Robert J. Sampson recently speculated that immigration may be partially responsible for the recent decreases in national levels of violent criminal behavior. Although this hypothesis has yet to be tested empirically, it raises questions about the accounts of the relationship between immigration and crime as presented in both the Scarface myth and criminological theory.

Research suggests that the Scarface myth has endured despite, or perhaps because of, the arrival of large numbers of foreign-born individuals. Indeed, it appears that current high rates of immigration generate support for the notion that increases in levels of violence will be a natural outcome, a response not entirely unlike the one that stemmed from the arrival of the Marielitos. Moreover, to the extent that previous practices offer insight into future trends, recent immigrants will continue to be perceived as possessing a similar set of criminogenic qualities, thus contributing to the enduring quality of the Scarface myth.

Jacob I. Stowell

See also Immigrants and Crime; Immigration Legislation; Media Portrayals of African Americans; Media Portrayals of Asian Americans; Media Portrayals of Latina/o/s; Media Portrayals of Native Americans; Media Portrayals of White Americans

Further Readings

- Chácon, J. A., & Davis, M. (2006). No one is illegal: Fighting racism and state violence on the U.S.-Mexico border. Chicago: Haymarket Books.
- Martinez, R. (2002). Latino homicide: Immigration, violence, and community. New York: Routledge.
- Martinez, R., & Valenzuela, A. (Eds.). (2007). Immigration and crime: Race, ethnicity, and violence. New York: New York University Press.
- Sampson, R. J., & Bean, L. (2006). Cultural mechanisms and killing fields: A revised theory of community-level racial inequality. In R. Peterson, L. Krivo, & J. Hagan (Eds.), The many colors of crime: Inequalities of race, ethnicity and crime in America. New York: New York University Press.
- Stowell, J. I. (2007). Immigration and crime: Considering the direct and indirect effects of immigration on violent criminal behavior. New York: LFB Scholarly.

SCHOOL SHOOTINGS

The term school shootings typically refers to events in which a student at an elementary, middle, junior, or high school shoots and injures or kills at least one other student at school during the school day. They are typically characterized by multiple deaths. Rampage school shootings are a type of school shooting where no single or specific individual is targeted by the shooter.

School shootings are neither new nor common. However, the threat they pose within institutions that are supposed to educate and keep our youth safe, along with the intense media attention to these shootings when they occur, has resulted in heightened awareness and an unrealistically elevated sense of threat among parents, youth, and the general public. Significantly, whereas many of the early journalistic and scholarly writings on the patterns of school shooters and shootings identified social rejection, bullying, gun availability, and the rampant consumption of violent media as the key risk factors, the roles of race, gender, and class were almost completely ignored despite their profound consistency: The early reports on school shootings failed to account for the overwhelming pattern that the shooters have been almost entirely White males in rural and suburban schools.

This entry highlights the fact that school shootings are perpetrated almost exclusively by White, middle-class boys in suburban or rural communities and explores intense bullying in White communities as an explanation for these shootings. It also addresses the racist manner in which these school shootings are typically interpreted by researchers, the media, and the public.

Sites of School Shootings

The 1990s were a pivotal point in the history of U.S. school shootings, with high-profile occurrences in small towns (e.g., Pearl, Mississippi, in 1997; West Paducah, Kentucky, in 1997; Springfield, Oregon, 1998; Jonesboro, Arkansas, in 1998; Conyers, Georgia, in 1999), affluent communities (e.g., Littleton, Colorado, in 1999), and even some elementary and middle schools (e.g., Moses Lake, Washington, in 1996; Fort Gibson, Oklahoma, in 1999). These shootings challenged popular stereotypes and assumptions that schools in urban, poor, and largely African American neighborhoods were the most dangerous.

Risk Factors for School Shooters

For obvious reasons, the primary concern in most of the journalistic and scholarly investigations of school shootings focuses on identifying the major risk factors for becoming a school shooter. Most scholarly studies identify extreme social rejection and (verbal and physical) bullying as key risk factors. Social rejection, perpetrated by peers, often includes romantic rejection. Bullying can take numerous forms, both verbal and physical, and is heavily characterized by actions and words to humiliate the victim. In addition to social rejection and bullying, other research-identified risk factors include the availability of guns and the consumption of violent media (especially violent video games, but also violent music, television shows, and films).

Significantly, a more recently identified risk of would-be school shooters is bullying and social rejection that challenges boys' masculinity, particularly in the form of "gay-baiting." Notably, despite the homophobic labeling and taunting, research indicates that none of the gay-baited school shooters actually were gay. In addition to gay-baiting, other masculinity-driven taunting of boys who became shooters includes mocking these boys' physical bodies with labels such as scrawny, little, short, fat, skinny, chubby, and small. Shooters are often the most bullied male members in the school, and the primary bullies of future school shooters are often the most popular male youth in the school, often the male athletes and "preppies." Thus, it is hardly surprising that when these bullying victims became shooters, they often attack the popular males who bullied them. However, they are also likely to attack others with low status in the school, such as girls and students of color, and it is not unusual for school shooters to espouse racist (e.g., Nazi) dogmas.

Notably, the preponderance of school shooters as White boys in rural and suburban schools is associated with a focus on the shooters' individual psychological problems rather than on their race (and often class), as often occurs when people of color (regardless of gender) offend. Stated differently, when urban African Americans kill, their violence is often normalized as cultural, whereas when White middle-class and rural boys commit school shootings, their acts are viewed as stemming from the individuals' pathologies, not from their culture.

Media Portrayals of School Shootings

Research on media representations of school shootings suggests that in the case of White, rural school shootings, the media attempt to shock the readers and elicit sympathy for the victims in lengthy newspaper articles, whereas articles on urban shootings are shorter and portray urban crime as "reality." Furthermore, newspaper articles on shootings in chiefly White, rural locales are written in a manner more likely to foster sympathy for the shooters, whereas the articles on the Black, urban shootings are more likely to stress the need to pursue the shooters and hold them accountable.

Indeed, research on the White, affluent Columbine High School (Littleton, Colorado, in 1999) killers Dylan Klebold and Eric Harris indicates an empathetic view of these school shooters. They were often portrayed as hapless youth who were victims of a society inundated with violent video games and handguns, blocked from the entitlements their social status typically promised. Thus, it is hardly surprising that these bullied White boys who became school shooters attacked the social structure that had deprived them of the consideration and esteem their race, gender, and class typically guaranteed. Although Klebold and Harris shot White students, it is noteworthy that when they shot Black classmate Isaiah Shoels in the head three times, they shouted racist slurs.

In stark contrast is the media portrayal of a 1992 school shooting by Joseph White, a 15-year-old African American male who shot and killed another 15-year-old African American male and injured two other students at his Chicago high school. What was portrayed as another typical school shooting, except that it was in an urban school and the shooter was Black, was actually quite different. Unlike the bullied individuals in the White school shootings, this shooting was gang-related, with the shooter caught in the dynamics of race and place for youth growing up with gangs and guns in the South Side of Chicago. Unlike the more sympathetic portrayals of the White shooters in the suburban and rural school shootings, the press portrayed Joseph White's shooting as random and without provocation, although the resulting court case naming this young African American school shooter indicated the shooter was responding to the reality of the prevalent, dangerous youth and gang culture in which he lived. Thus, this youth's actions were framed through the lens of the high-profile White male school shootings, which were significantly different from his situation and with a different motivation for committing the shootings.

Race, Class, Gender, and School Shootings

How, then, do we explain the White, male, middle-class, suburban/rural pattern of the vast majority of school shootings? Retrospective research on African Americans reporting a positive relationship between racial discrimination/prejudice victimizations and subsequent self-reported violent behavior is inconsistent with the predominance of White, middle-class, male shooters. The vast majority of African American parents recognize the need to prepare their children to face not only bullying but also humiliating racist comments and acts from the dominant culture. African Americans frequently emphasize to their children that racist behaviors are wrong and that their children need not feel alone in their struggle. African American parents teach their children how to appropriately display and direct their anger resulting from racist humiliation and attacks.

Research on the actions of parents and school staff in the predominantly or exclusively White communities where the White, male, middle-class school shooters resided paints a very different picture. In contrast to African American parents' awareness that their children were likely to face racist humiliation and their advice and guidance on potential responses, research on parents and school staff in the White communities indicated that they offered little or no opportunity either to stop these youth's intense bullying victimizations or to help them process the emotions involved in such victimizations and identify strategies for responding. Because the boys were sometimes ashamed to report these violations of their masculinity, White parents and school staff were often ignorant of, or ignored, the daily demoralizing, humiliating, and taunting environments embedded in the school and community cultures where the White school shooters lived. These future school shooters were left to determine on their own how to negotiate their feelings of intense rejection and discrimination relating to their social standing in their schools and among their peers—they were on their own in defending their sense of self in the context of their often extreme physical and verbal bullying and severe personal humiliation.

Joanne Belknap and Tanya Greathouse

See also Juvenile Crime; Media Portrayals of African Americans; Media Portrayals of White Americans; Victimization, Youth; Violent Crime; Violent Juvenile Offenders

Further Readings

- Cook, D. T. (2000). Childhood is killing “our” children: Some thoughts on the Columbine high school shootings and the agentive child. Childhood, 7, 107–117.
- Hagan, J., Hirschfield, P., & Shedd, C. (2002). First and last words: Apprehending the social and legal facts of an urban high school shooting. Sociological Methods & Research, 31, 218–254.
- Harding, D. J., Fox, C., & Mehta, J. D. (2002). Studying rare events through qualitative case studies: Lessons from a study of rampage school shootings. Sociological Methods & Research, 31, 174–217.
- Kimmel, M. S., & Mahler, M. (2003). Adolescent masculinity, homophobia, and violence. American Behavioral Scientist, 46, 1439–1458.
- Klein, J. (2006). Sexuality and school shootings. Journal of Homosexuality, 51, 39–62.
- Leary, M. R., Kowalski, R. M., Smith, L., & Phillips, S. (2003). Teaching, rejection, and violence: Case studies of the school shootings. Aggressive Behavior, 29, 202–214.
- Menifield, C. E., Rose, W. H., Homa, J., & Cunningham, A. B. (2001). The media’s portrayal of urban and rural school violence. Deviant Behavior, 22, 447–464.
- Moore, M. H., Petrie, C. V., Braga, A. A., & McLaughlin, B. L. (2003). Deadly lessons: Understanding lethal school violence. Washington, DC: National Academic Press.
- Newman, K. S., Fox, C., Harding, D., Mehta, J., & Roth, W. (2004). Rampage: The social roots of school shootings. New York: Basic Books.
- Poussaint, A. F. (1972). Why Blacks kill Blacks. New York: Emerson Hall.
- Verlinden, S., Hersen, M., & Thomas, J. (2000). Risk factors in school shootings. Clinical Psychology Review, 20, 3–56.

SELF-ESTEEM AND DELINQUENCY

Kiri Davis was 16 in 2005 when she reproduced a famous “doll test” in her amateur documentary, A Girl Like Me. Her documentary showed that 15 out of 21 Black children (71%) preferred to play with a White doll, commonly identifying the Black doll as the “bad” doll and the White one as the “nice” or “good” doll. Davis’s results virtually mirror those of Kenneth Clark’s doll test, conducted in the 1940s and cited in Brown v. Board of Education (1954).

Clark’s telling results were used by the Supreme Court to reject the concept of “separate but equal” and to officially overturn racial segregation in public schools. Although Clark died unaware of Davis’s recent findings, he predicted that present-day results probably would not vary. Unfortunately, he was correct. In a striking moment in Davis’s experiment, one girl, after identifying the “bad” doll, sadly and slowly pushed the Black doll toward Davis, acknowledging it as the one that looked like herself. Historically, people of color are valued less by society and, as evidenced by Clark’s and Davis’s results, children are well aware of this fact.

Because self-esteem is highly valued in American society and thought to be a protective factor in life, the question becomes, Does self-esteem matter in the nexus between race and crime? This entry addresses the association between race and measures of self-esteem, discusses the complexity of the association through other points of social difference, and reviews connections among race, self-esteem, and criminal behavior.

Race and Self-Esteem

Self-esteem involves individuals’ perception of their own worth, and higher self-esteem is viewed not only as desirable for individuals, but also as beneficial for society. Extreme levels of self-esteem, whether extraordinarily high or unsettlingly low, are often connected to various kinds of pathologies, including depression, low school achievement, early pregnancy, suicide risk, drug and alcohol abuse, and personality disorders. Measures of self-esteem traditionally have been based on experiences of Caucasian (typically, middle-class) populations. In the 1950s, researchers began to examine self-concepts that include race identity.

Self-esteem, as connected to racial identity, incorporates concepts of group self-esteem and personal self-esteem. Group self-esteem represents how an individual feels about their membership in a particular racial/ethnic group. Personal self-esteem alludes to how individuals feel about the self specifically. Historically, studies showed that members of minority groups express lower levels of self-esteem. This research was based on the assumption that Blacks were irreparably damaged because of their legacy of slavery and racism. The Supreme Court cited Clark's "doll test" in Brown by emphasizing the connection between racial segregation and feelings of self-worth, claiming that segregating schoolchildren generates a feeling of inferiority that is difficult, if not impossible, for many to overcome. This landmark case indelibly marked the American landscape. However, few scholars would argue that race has ceased to be an issue today.

After the civil rights movement was under way and Blacks pushed back against overt discrimination, empirical findings on self-esteem were mixed. Some found that Blacks' self-worth was still depressed because of their consistently diminished status compared to Whites. Others claimed that some Blacks, especially youth, were socialized into a subculture of resistance and that a new focus on Black pride resulted in enhanced self-evaluations. Still others subscribed to a theory of alienation in which Blacks constantly find themselves on the margins of a society that undervalues Black life. (The scant research on self-esteem issues for other minority groups—most notably, Hispanics and Asians—is contradictory and fails to provide consistent conclusions.)

Most current evidence supports the association between Black identity and higher self-esteem, though inconsistent findings are associated with lower-class populations and adolescents. The broad trend is that Whites slightly surpass Blacks in self-esteem before age 10, the self-esteem of both races suffers blows through puberty, and then Blacks slightly surpass Whites by age 21. However, research findings are complicated and sometimes contradictory. For example, low-income Blacks show higher self-esteem than low-income Whites. The following section further explores these complications.

Intersectionality

Several reasons may account for conflicting findings between racial identity and measures of self-esteem, including measurement and other methodological inconsistencies (one should be suspicious of measures and models that do not account for cultural and structural differences). However, for purposes of this entry, this section focuses on various social factors—generally known as intersectionality—that complicate the relationship between race and self-esteem. That is, other points of social difference such as gender and social class interact with both race and self-esteem to produce qualitatively different experiences.

Regarding the gender–race intersection, studies of adolescent self-esteem tend to show that males have higher self-esteem than females. Explanations generally focus on body image (strength) for males and perceived math and science weaknesses for females. Further, there are gender-based disparities in levels of self-esteem within a racial class. For Black women, skin color is an important predictor of self-esteem, but for Black men it is not. The disadvantages of being dark-skinned were more prominently noted in the lower self-esteem of Black women compared with their male counterparts.

Minority females are not alone in experiencing low self-esteem, however. As most notably illustrated in Bad Boys by Ann Ferguson, Black adolescent males struggle to construct a sense of self when they are labeled as troublemakers early in their school years. Once young Black boys are labeled "bad" in school, they are segregated and treated as deviant; these circumstances elevate their risk for a criminal lifestyle. However, it should be noted that external factors, rather than a simple internal negative assessment, seem to be the causal mechanism. The racialized and gendered platform to which young Black males are exposed in schools across the United States continues to illuminate how various factors play a central part in developing, perpetuating, and shaping self-esteem.

Race, Self-Esteem, and Criminal Behavior

Several theories of crime consider low self-esteem to be a significant factor in various risk outcomes, including delinquent behavior. Most of these theories (almost all based on male populations) assume that self-esteem works as an "inner containment" that controls behavior. Once a child experiences significant failures and subsequent drops in self-worth, low self-esteem becomes a powerful source of aggression, which often results in violence toward others. Violence becomes a way to compensate for feelings of inadequacy, and a temporary surge in self-esteem often results. Some researchers believe the cycle is usually temporary, whereas others have found a lasting positive relationship between delinquent behavior and self-assessment.

Typically, researchers identify one of three links between self-esteem and delinquency. The first claim is that low self-esteem weakens ties to society. According to a theory of social bonding, weakened social relationships decrease conformity to the norm, increasing delinquency. Second, a social psychology perspective predicts that a lack of positive self-regard is linked to psychological dysfunctions, including aggression. Third, a life-course perspective proposes that low self-esteem is linked to aggression in two ways: (1) Early feelings of inferiority via rejection and humiliation motivate aggression and (2) individuals protect themselves against these feelings of inferiority by externalizing responsibility for their failures, ultimately resulting in hostility toward other people. However, these connections develop within complex structural arrangements that produce both risk and protective factors. Generally, this body of literature supports the idea that links between self-esteem and delinquency are mediated by certain socially constructed categories, such as race, class, and gender.

Recent studies stress that self-esteem cannot stand alone in explaining criminality. Rather, the role of intervening factors must be closely examined. Consistent results emphasize the role of delinquent peers as a central intervening variable between self-esteem and delinquency, especially for youth, and this holds true for all races. In particular, several studies have found that low self-esteem does not increase delinquent associations or delinquent behavior. In contrast to earlier research, this subset of literature finds that when controlling for delinquent associations, delinquency actually reduces positive self-esteem, and most assert that a youth's association with delinquent peers is a stronger predictor of self-esteem than the actual delinquent behavior.

Despite generalities, gender differences are evident. For example, the effect of delinquent associations on self-acceptance is greater for girls than for boys. This may be because there is less tolerance for female delinquency compared to male delinquency, thus enhancing the effect of external influences. Additionally, girls are conditioned to place greater value on relationships and thus become more vulnerable to dating relationships and other intimate violence. Both sexes use various strategies to optimize ways in which they accomplish femininity and masculinity. In particular, boys "do gender" by emphasizing toughness and violence. Inevitably, these "doings" of gender become intertwined with self-competence.

Further, there appear to be significant race differences among men and among women in the context of the relationship between self-esteem and delinquency. African American men, often perceived as existing at societal margins, have more to prove and are more likely to live in areas where violence is expected. Among women, the causal processes for White females' risk factors focus on social-psychological factors (bonding, maturation, attitudes of self-esteem), whereas the same social-psychological factors exert weaker effects for Black women and delinquency. In fact, the more important factor for predicting criminality in Black women centers on structural indicators, such as education and opportunity. Theorists propose that self-esteem (a social-psychological factor) plays a greater intervening role for White women engaging in criminal behavior, as compared to Black women, who are more affected by structural processes.

There is no doubt that self-esteem plays an important role throughout life, especially for adolescents. However, it is important to keep in mind that concepts of self-worth do not override considerations of structural disadvantage. That is, simply feeling confident about one's self does not guarantee insulation from risky behavior.

Conclusion

Research cannot identify self-esteem as a singular causal mechanism connected to crime. Researchers still face great challenges in considering measures of self-competence and its connection to delinquency. Studies do demonstrate that self-esteem is embedded in structural factors such as racism, discrimination, and social disadvantage. In particular, studies must look at the ability of self-esteem to hook onto structural predictors such as peer associations, class, and gender. Low or high self-esteem, or even fluctuations in assessment, cannot account for the overrepresentation of Blacks in the criminal justice system.

Policy implications are particularly difficult because of the embeddedness of self-esteem with other structural factors, including minority relations. While the public and media may look for a scapegoat in recent incidents of violence, no clear answer is readily available. Kiri Davis's 21st-century doll test provides a good example of overreliance on individual-level factors. Although her results are just as shocking as Clark's results from the 1940s, the media snatched up her study as evidence of a pervasive self-esteem problem for racial minorities. Certainly, Black adolescents may face self-esteem problems that no other group faces in quite the same way. However, as documented in this entry, it is vital to consider external forces. Further, when addressing the nexus among race, crime, and self-esteem, it is important to consider both self-identity and racial identity. The results of the "doll test" cannot be ignored; the feelings of those young children come from somewhere. Although it is crucial to build self-esteem in children, it must be done while simultaneously dismantling inequitable structural walls.

L. Susan Williams

See also At-Risk Youth; Labeling Theory; Social Construction of Reality; Youth Gangs

Further Readings

- Eitle, D., & Turner, R. J. (2003). Stress exposure, race, and young adult male crime. Sociological Quarterly, 44, 243–269.
- Mason, W. A. (2001). Self-esteem and delinquency revisited (again). Journal of Youth and Adolescence, 30, 83–102.
- Ross, L. (1992). Blacks, self-esteem, and delinquency: It's time for a new approach. Justice Quarterly, 9, 609–624.

SENTENCING

Sentencing is the imposition of punishment. After a defendant pleads guilty to a crime or is convicted as the result of a trial, the focus shifts from prosecution to the sanctioning of guilty defendants.

The judge imposes the sanctions on the defendant. The punishment of guilty defendants has philosophical justifications and occurs as the result of a codified process. Despite the philosophical justifications and structured process, some research suggests that there is disparity and discrimination in sentencing. The research findings helped spur a 30-year reform movement. Some of the reforms appear to be at least partially successful. Despite the success of some reforms, research continues to identify race-related sentencing disparity. A number of sentencing-related cases mark the legal landscape in the early 21st century, with the continuing goal of amending the sentencing process to ensure that it is consistent with the protections of the Constitution of the United States.

Philosophies of Punishment

The philosophies of punishment provide different answers to the questions of whether, how, and for how long to punish an individual. The five philosophies are retribution, deterrence, incapacitation, rehabilitation, and restoration/restorative justice. The answers derived from the philosophies of punishment have practical implications for sentencing policy and practice.

Retribution is premised upon the notion that criminals are guilty of the accused crimes and, therefore, deserve to be punished. The punishment is justified by the fact that criminals chose to engage in illegal behavior. Retribution is not geared toward preventing future crime but solely on sanctioning past behavior. The amount of punishment is determined through the principle of proportionality—the punishment assigned to offenders should be equal to the harm that they caused through their crimes. The punishment is determined by the seriousness of the crime and the culpability of the offender. The punishment does not have to resemble the crime.

Deterrence can be specific or general in nature. The purpose of specific deterrence is to dissuade a specific offender from committing future crimes, or recidivism. General deterrence is intended to prevent others from engaging in criminal activity similar to that of the offender by demonstrating the consequences associated with the crime. The amount of punishment should be only significant enough to outweigh the benefits of the crime, and no more. Deterrence utilizes cost–benefit analyses to determine the quantity of punishment with the goal of crime prevention and is calculated through a balance of certainty, swiftness, and severity in punishment.

Incapacitation is the isolation of high-risk offenders in order to limit the opportunities that they have to commit additional crimes. Incarceration is the most popular form of incapacitation, but incapacitation also includes forms of home confinement and electronic monitoring, boot camps, and chemical castration for some sex offenders. The punishment should be proportionate to the risk posed by the offender; high-risk offenders should be punished more severely than low-risk offenders. One of the biggest criticisms of incapacitation is that it involves the assessment of dangerousness and the prediction of those offenders at the highest risk of recidivism. The determination of high risk and dangerousness is complicated—those who have committed the most serious offenses (murderers) are the least likely to repeat their offenses, whereas shoplifters and petty drug dealers are the most likely to repeat their offenses. If dangerousness and punishment are determined based on likelihood of recidivism, then shoplifters would be punished more harshly than murderers. Additionally, prediction can result in a high rate of false positives—treating people harshly because they have been deemed high risk when they may not have ever reoffended. These two scenarios present ethical problems.

Rehabilitation focuses on addressing offenders' treatment needs, thereby reducing the likelihood of recidivism. Rehabilitation is based on the assumption that there is some characteristic(s) that drives an offender's behavior. An assessment is needed to identify these characteristics and treatment needs, which may include substance abuse or mental health treatment, education, job training, or other forms of behavior modification. The amount of punishment/treatment should be based on offenders' needs and potential for reform. Rehabilitation is criticized on the grounds that it is difficult to determine true causal factors and design effective treatment programs.

Restoration/restorative justice is different than the other philosophies, which focus on punishing or treating the offender. The aim of restoration is to repair the harm done to the victim and his or her community and to repair the relationship between the victim and the offender. Advocates of restoration argue that this approach to punishment meets the requirements of justice and prevents the ostracism of offenders that can result in the traditional criminal justice system through the use of reintegrative shaming.

The Sentencing Process

After defendants are found guilty beyond a reasonable doubt through plea agreements or trial, they move to the sentencing phase. A plea agreement may include an agreed-upon sentence that is consistent with the offense(s) pled to and the designated range in sentencing statutes. The shift to determinate sentencing drastically reduced the practice of sentence bargaining. The judge generally imposes the sanctions agreed upon in the plea deal but is not required to do so. In misdemeanors and disorderly persons cases, defendants may plead guilty at the initial appearance and be sentenced immediately. Felony trial convictions involve a more complex sentencing process.

Upon conviction for felonies or serious misdemeanors that can result in periods of incarceration, a presentence investigation is completed by the probation office. The presentence investigation report includes information on the offense(s) of conviction, the defendant's role, background, prior record, and possibly an assessment of potential for reform. This report is submitted to the court for the judge's review prior to the sentencing hearing. Prosecutors and defense attorneys also receive a copy of the report.

The judge hears arguments from opposing counsel at the sentencing hearing. After oral arguments, the judge sanctions the defendant in a manner consistent with sentencing laws and with consideration toward the presentence report. Sentences may include periods of incarceration or a variety of alternatives to incarceration, such as probation, fines, community service, and restitution. Sentences often include multiple sanctions. The presentence report may also be used to sentence offenders who plead guilty but for whose cases judges have very limited information.

Capital cases use a bifurcated trial system. The first phase determines guilt. If the defendant is found guilty, then the case moves to a second phase during which the jury decides whether to impose the death penalty or a life sentence. The bifurcated trial system is intended to reduce the disparate, discriminatory, and capricious application of the death penalty.

Disparity, Discrimination, and Reform

Traditionally, the U.S. legal system utilized an indeterminate sentencing system. This system either allowed judges to craft sentences that were appropriate to individual offenders or allowed a conditional release authority to determine when offenders had been sufficiently reformed and ready for return to the community. This process naturally required discretion and often resulted in sentencing disparity. Disparity rooted in legally irrelevant sentencing or release criteria is discrimination.

Legally relevant sentencing criteria include the nature of the offense(s) of conviction, aggravating or mitigating factors, and the offender's prior record. Some jurisdictions allow for the consideration of community stability, employment history, and education. Sentences tailored for individual offenders vary based on the crimes, criminal history, and personal circumstances and may be desirable from a rehabilitative perspective.

Legally irrelevant sentencing criteria include race/ethnicity, sex, religion, socioeconomic status, political orientation, and sexual orientation. When any or all of these criteria are involved in the decision-making process, the sentencing differentials shift from disparity to discrimination; discrimination is unacceptable in all circumstances.

Research suggests the presence of sentencing disparity and discrimination based on a multitude of criteria. Racial discrimination remains one of the most problematic and persistent issues in the criminal justice system, generally, and in the sentencing process, specifically. Research highlights myriad manifestations of racial discrimination in sentencing ranging from systematic discrimination to contextual discrimination and individual acts of discrimination by judges. The research also highlights several origins of the discrimination beyond racist judges and prosecutors, including criminal laws that have a disproportionate and detrimental impact on racial and ethnic minorities, differential enforcement by police officers, and conditional release decisions by parole boards. Further confounding the situation is research that does not support findings of racial discrimination.

A sentencing reform movement began in the 1970s with a shift to determinate sentencing in the form of fixed sentencing schemes that prescribed particular sentences based solely on offense of conviction, offender criminal history, and the abolition of parole. The intent of these reforms was to reduce sentencing disparity and discrimination. A host of additional reforms followed these initial reforms.

Sentencing reforms include descriptive and prescriptive sentencing guidelines; mandatory-minimum sentences for drug, firearm, and habitual offenders; three-strikes-and-you're-out laws; and truth-in-sentencing laws. The intent of these reforms was to make sure that similarly situated offenders who commit similar offenses receive similar sentences and that they serve those sentences, thus reducing sentencing disparity. Some research suggests that racial disparity and discrimination have been reduced, whereas other research indicates that disparity and discrimination persist as reflected in the disproportionate representation of racial and ethnic minorities in U.S. jails and prisons. Any remaining racial disparity or discrimination is likely to be contextual or the result of an interaction effect because direct, systematic racial discrimination has been eliminated from the legal system.

Legal Developments

The 21st century has produced several important sentencing-related legal developments. The first set of cases starts with Apprendi v. New Jersey (2000), in which the Supreme Court of the United States held that any fact, besides criminal history, that increases the sentence beyond the statutory maximum must be presented and proved beyond a reasonable doubt to a jury. The Apprendi rule was applied in Blakely v. Washington (2004), establishing that failure to admit facts that increase the sentence beyond the statutory maximum for jury deliberation violates the Sixth Amendment right to a trial by jury. This rule was subsequently applied to the federal sentencing guidelines in the consolidated matters of United States v. Booker (2005) and United States v. Fanfan (2005). In these cases, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the Sixth Amendment does apply to the federal sentencing guidelines and that the real conduct sentencing practice violates the requirement that all factors that increase the sentence beyond that in the guidelines must be submitted to a jury for consideration. The Court went on to state that the provisions of the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984 that make the guidelines mandatory are stricken from the act, and the federal sentencing guidelines are advisory to federal judges.

The second set of cases deals with special types of offenders. In Atkins v. Virginia (2002), the Court held that the execution of mentally retarded offenders is prohibited by the Constitution of the United States. The ruling was primarily attributable to the national consensus that had developed against the practice and to the idea that mentally retarded offenders operate with diminished capacity, which renders execution an excessive and unconstitutional punishment. The same reasoning was applied in Roper v. Simmons (2005), in which the Court held that the execution of individuals who were under the age of 18 when they committed their crimes is unconstitutional and thus prohibited.

These five cases and the reform movement dealt with ensuring that sentencing occurs as the result of a systematic process that is consistent with the protections of the Constitution of the United States, which should have the effect of reducing sentencing disparity.

Jennifer L. Lanterman

See also Disproportionate Incarceration; Sentencing Disparities, African Americans; Sentencing Disparities, Latina/o/s; Sentencing Disparities, Native Americans

Further Readings

Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000).
 Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304 (2002).
 Blakely v. Washington, 542 U.S. 296 (2004).
 Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551 (2005).

Spohn, C. (2000). Thirty years of sentencing reform: The quest for a racially neutral sentencing process. In National Institute of Justice: Criminal justice 2000. Washington, DC: National Institute of Justice.
 Tonry, M. (1995). Malign neglect: Race, crime, and punishment in America. New York: Oxford University Press.
 United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220 (2005).
 United States v. Fanfan, 543 U.S. 220 (2005).
 Von Hirsch, A., & Ashworth, A. (1992). Principled sentencing. Boston: Northeastern University Press.

SENTENCING DISPARITIES, AFRICAN AMERICANS

There is a voluminous literature that seeks to address the impact of defendant race on sentencing outcomes. Although the manner and extent to which defendant race impacts sentencing outcomes has changed over time, current empirical evidence confirms the persistence of racial disparities in certain sentencing contexts. Whereas the earliest research in this area revealed direct effects of defendant race on sentencing, more recent analyses highlight the complex relationships that exist among defendant race and other legally relevant predictors of sentencing. The entry examines disparities in sentencing outcomes that exist for African American defendants, with special consideration given to contemporary research in this area.

Evidence of the Changing Effects of Defendant Race Over Time

The Impact of History

Scholars have examined the effect of defendant race on sentencing for approximately 8 decades. A number of comprehensive reviews exist that summarize the important trends and findings in this vast literature. Several reviews confirm that the effect of defendant race has changed over this time period. Similarly, the mechanisms through which defendants are sentenced and the methods through which scholars have examined defendant race have changed as well.

With few exceptions, early studies in this area provided evidence of direct effects of defendant race; when compared with White defendants,

African American defendants received much harsher sentences. The studies in this early time period were not methodologically rigorous; most of the examinations involved bivariate comparisons only and did not include controls for the type of offense committed or the defendant's prior criminal history. Nonetheless, the findings from this time period were consistent with race relations in the country. As legal scholars have pointed out, many antebellum statutes proscribed punishments based upon defendant race; the most severe sentences—including castration and death—were reserved for African American defendants who allegedly victimized Whites. Remnants of those race-based sanctions—and the overt discrimination that bore them—continued to characterize the sentencing landscape for years following the Civil War. Despite the consistent findings of significant and direct effects of defendant race on sentencing outcomes, the mechanisms through which defendants were sentenced remained largely unchanged until the 1980s.

Sentencing Reform

Prompted in part by concerns about racial disparities and the lack of uniformity in sentencing, many states and the federal government adopted sentencing guideline structures in the 1980s. Although there was variation in terms of the amount of judicial discretion that remained within each of the respective guideline structures, all systems were based upon a sentencing grid in which the defendant's prior criminal history was represented on one axis, with the severity of the offense on the other. Accordingly, judges were instructed to assign sentences based upon the intersection of the scores of these two variables; the corresponding cell on the grid provided the appropriate sentence. Though jurisdictions with strict guidelines severely reduced or eliminated judicial discretion, those in which a proscribed range of appropriate sentences were provided in each respective cell of the sentencing grid produced a much smaller constraint on judicial discretion.

Postreform Studies

As previously mentioned, there is a vast literature that examines sentencing disparities between

African American and White defendants. The research that has been conducted over the past 2 decades, in the postreform era, is much more methodologically robust than that in the prereform era. Unlike the principally bivariate examinations of the past, the multivariate contemporary studies do not reveal direct effects of defendant race on sentencing outcomes. This is not to suggest that race no longer affects sentencing decisions; contemporary examinations underscore the complex and intricate ways in which race affects sentencing in terms of both disposition (type of sentence) and duration (length).

As Marjorie Zatz noted, the changing effects of race on sentencing decisions are directly linked to the manner in which race relations in U.S. society have changed over time. Race continues to play a role in sentencing, but it is a much more complex one. Postreform research is characterized by what Samuel Walker, Cassia Spohn, and Miriam DeLone have described as contextual discrimination—race matters in some, but not all, contexts or situations of sentencing. Even after controlling for relevant variables—namely, the seriousness of the offense and the defendant's prior criminal record—race remains important in certain situations and contexts.

Contexts of Discrimination

Guideline-Based Decisions and Departures. Wide variations exist among postreform research studies at the state and federal levels in terms of both methodology and findings. These variations notwithstanding, there is some evidence to suggest that African American defendants at the federal level face a higher likelihood of incarceration than White defendants for some kinds of crimes and may be sentenced to longer periods of incarceration than other defendants. Likewise, some state-level studies confirm both an increased likelihood of incarceration for African American defendants and longer periods of incarceration, whereas others find that disparities are confined to sentence length only.

Moreover, a sizeable literature examining decision making under the federal and state-level sentencing guidelines indicates that African American defendants are less likely than White defendants to receive mitigating or downward sentencing departures. This reduced benefit for African American defendants who are convicted of drug offenses has been confirmed at the federal level. Moreover, some state-level data indicate that African Americans have a reduced likelihood of receiving a downward dispositional departure (i.e., receiving probation instead of incarceration) and are given smaller durational departures than White defendants.

Victim Value. There is empirical evidence in the sexual assault and death penalty literatures to suggest that victim value is an important context for potential racial discrimination. A growing body of research that examines sexual assault has tested the ways in which the likelihood of incarceration and the length of incarceration vary based upon the racial composition of the offender–victim dyad. Although there are inconsistencies in the literature, some studies reveal that African Americans who were convicted of victimizing Whites are more likely than other racial combinations of offenders and victims to receive a sentence of incarceration (vs. probation) or to be sentenced to lengthier periods of incarceration or both. Those defendants who were convicted for victimizing African Americans, on the other hand, received less-severe sentences. Thus, though there are some inconsistencies across the literature, some evidence suggests that those defendants who victimize Whites are given more substantial sentences than those who victimize African Americans.

Another subset of the literature that underscores the linkages between victim value and sentencing outcomes is capital punishment. Certainly, the historical constant across capital punishment findings was that African Americans who allegedly victimized Whites were almost always singled out for the death penalty. Some of the most recent examinations of death penalty application reveal that certain victims—based upon either race (read White) or socioeconomic status (read higher socioeconomic status)—have a seemingly higher value than others. In other words, contemporary death penalty research indicates that sentences no longer reflect direct effects of defendant race, but the composite of the offender–victim dyad in terms of the racial and socioeconomic composition produces disparate capital punishment decisions.

Variation Based Upon Crime Type. Some scholars propose that sentencing disparities are more prevalent among less-serious crimes. More to the point, contexts in which decision makers have high levels of discretion are especially prone to sentencing disparities. Much of the literature examining the relationship between offense severity and sentencing disparities builds from Harry Kalven and Hans Zeisel’s study of the American jury system, in which the authors developed the liberation hypothesis. The authors found that in cases in which the offense was serious, the level of evidence was strong, and there was information directly linking the suspect to the case, jurors’ decisions were not influenced by their own values and beliefs about the defendant. In less-serious cases, however, jury members’ values and belief systems were more likely to influence their assessments about the case.

The growing body of literature that examines drug sentencing provides some support for the liberation hypothesis; racially disparate sentences appear for African American defendants who have been convicted of drug offenses at both federal and state levels of sentencing. The War on Drugs and related policies produce a number of important implications for African American defendants in terms of both the 100:1 crack versus powder cocaine punishment disparities, which were recently modified, as well as the other seemingly race-neutral policies that produce disparately harsher sentences for African Americans. Included among those are enhancement penalties for selling illicit substances near schools and public housing; both contribute to the disparate impact of the War on Drugs on African American defendants, who are more likely to be offending within an urban setting.

Indirect Effects and Accumulation Over the Justice Process. Recent research identifies a number of ways in which defendant race operates through legally relevant contexts to produce harsher sentences for African Americans. Considered another way, although defendant race no longer has a direct effect on sentencing outcomes, African American defendants are disproportionately represented on many of the legally relevant factors that contribute to overall sentence severity. Although there is some variation across the literature, two seemingly race-neutral criminal justice decisions leading up to the sentencing phase—pretrial release and mode of conviction—are often characterized by an overrepresentation of African American defendants. Additionally, African Americans often have lengthier criminal histories and are disproportionately represented by public defenders versus privately attained legal counsel, both of which exert significant effects on sentence severity. Patterns such as these have been confirmed in examinations of sentencing involving both misdemeanants and felons. These smaller disparities throughout the justice process accumulate and produce differences in sentences for African American versus White defendants.

Multiplicative or Interactive Effects. The work of Darrell Steffensmeier, Jeffrey Ulmer, and John Kramer was instrumental in providing insight into the ways in which some defendant characteristics combine with race to produce a more amplified effect on sentencing outcomes. The authors examined the combined impact of defendant race, sex, and age on both disposition (incarceration in prison or jail vs. probation) and duration (length of incarceration sentence) and found that young, African American males were sentenced more harshly than other defendants. Later research, which examined interactive effects of defendant race, age, sex, and employment status in other jurisdictions, produced consistent results; young, unemployed, African American males were substantially more likely to receive a sentence of incarceration than were their White counterparts.

Research Directions

Despite significant reforms of sentencing structures, uniformity in sentencing remains elusive and certain contexts of racial disparities persist. Sentencing guidelines significantly constrain the amount of discretion allowed in judicial decision making; however, there are many other unregulated decisions and processes that precede and impact sentencing decisions. Future research is needed to unpack the many intricate ways in which defendant and victim race affects the various states of the justice process leading up to the sentencing phase. Moreover, with the recent Supreme Court decision making federal sentencing advisory rather than mandatory and the U.S. Sentencing Commission actively dismantling the crack versus powder punishment disparity, it appears that judicial discretion is slowly being restored to the sentencing process. More research is needed to determine the extent to which the changing forms of discretion impact sentencing outcomes.

Dawn Beichner

See also Death Penalty; Discrimination–Disparity Continuum; Disproportionate Incarceration; Drug Sentencing; Drug Sentencing, Federal

Further Readings

- Chiricos, T. G., & Crawford, C. (1995). Race and imprisonment: A contextual assessment of the evidence. In D. F. Hawkins (Ed.), Ethnicity, race, and crime: Perspectives across time and place. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Kalven, H., & Zeisel, H. (1966). The American jury. Boston: Little, Brown.
- Spohn, C. (2000). Thirty years of sentencing reform: A quest for a racially neutral sentencing process. In Criminal justice 2000: Vol. 3. Policies, processes, and decisions of the criminal justice system (pp. 427–501). Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice. Retrieved from http://www.ncjrs.gov/criminal_justice2000/vol_3/03i.pdf
- Steffensmeier, D., Ulmer, J., & Kramer, J. (1998). The interaction of race, gender, and age in criminal sentencing: The punishment cost of being young, Black, and male. Criminology, 36, 763–797.
- Walker, S., Spohn, C., & DeLone, M. (2007). The color of justice: Race, ethnicity, and crime in America (4th ed.). Belmont, CA: Thomson/Wadsworth.
- Zatz, M. (1987). The changing form of racial/ethnic biases in sentencing. Journal of Research in Crime and Delinquency, 25, 69–92.
- Zatz, M. (2000). The convergence of race, ethnicity, gender, and class on court decisionmaking: Looking toward the 21st century. In Criminal justice 2000: Vol. 3. Policies, processes, and decisions of the criminal justice system (pp. 503–552). Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice. Retrieved from http://www.ncjrs.gov/criminal_justice2000/vol_3/03j.pdf

SENTENCING DISPARITIES, LATINA/O/S

There is lingering debate as to whether or not the disproportionate sentencing of non-White convicted criminals to incarceration and for longer periods of time is due to legal or extralegal variables. Some investigators assert that much of the racial/ethnic disparity in criminal sentencing is accounted for by legal factors such as prior record, type and seriousness of offense, bail/bond amount, public defender versus private attorney, and so on. Others contend that racial/ethnic disparities in sentencing decisions are the outcome of systematic and institutionalized racial/ethnic discrimination that can be found at all levels of criminal justice decision making, from law enforcement to criminal processing and on to court adjudication. A fundamental issue that arises in this debate is whether or not non-Whites participate at higher rates of more-serious criminal activity than do Whites. This entry reviews evidence for the disparate sentencing of Latinos and examines possible causes of such disparities, both historically and in the present.

While the majority of sentencing research indicates that legal factors outweigh extralegal factors in criminal sentencing decision making, evidence still shows that race and ethnicity are particularly important criminal justice determinants. They are especially important when examining the social context of criminal sentencing, which includes such factors as highly varied law enforcement and sentencing jurisdictions, the multiple aspects of criminal justice decision making, and the appropriate disaggregation of criminal justice data.

A great deal of sociohistorical research has documented the stricter social control of non-Whites, particularly in areas where they are perceived to be a threat to White social, economic, and political control. Empirical research shows that biased law enforcement is the beginning of a cumulative disadvantage for non-Whites in the criminal adjudication process. Sentencing outcomes differ for all racial/ethnic groups and are based on particular White and non-White criminal stereotypes that have been socially constructed and maintained by mainstream society.

The scholarly examination of Latina/o criminal sentencing disparities is relatively new, beginning about 1980 and continuing to the present, a time period that many commentators have labeled “the browning of America.” This expression refers to the dramatic racial/ethnic demographic shift that has seen Latinos become the largest racial/ethnic minority group in the United States. It also comes at a time of increased theoretical specificity and methodological rigor in the explanation and analysis of criminal sentencing disparities. In fact, the recent spotlight on Latina/o ethnicity has helped make clear previous discrepancies in sentencing research that was mainly centered on White/Black or White/non-White racial dichotomies.

Latinos as Symbolic Assailants

Jerome Skolnick long ago noted how many law enforcement officers developed mental classifications to help them distinguish offenders from nonoffenders. These “symbolic assailants” are persons whom police consider highly likely to be potential perpetrators and who have easily identifiable physical features, dress, mannerisms, and/or speech. Symbolic assailants, then, are susceptible to an elevated risk for questioning, arrest, or both, despite any observed or actual criminal behavior. This lies at the heart of academic and community debates on racial profiling.

For Latinos, criminal stereotypes took hold during intensified Anglo–Mexican contact in the early 19th century in northern Mexico borderlands now more commonly known as the American Southwest. Since then, the Mexican bandito stereotype has evolved into a variety of criminal stereotypes based on race, ethnicity, class, and gender—the Mexican illegal alien drug courier, the thieving Central American domestic (nanny), the untrustworthy Puerto Rican welfare mom, the violent Cuban Marielito refugee. Today, these current perceptions of Latina/o criminality are often used as justifications for xenophobic rhetoric and legislation. A great deal of research, however, fails to support high levels of immigrant criminal activity. In any case, these preconceived notions of inherent Latina/o criminality are a deep-rooted tradition that may be worst in regions where Latinos are relatively recent newcomers.

Theoretically speaking, then, racially/ethnically biased law enforcement can produce larger numbers of Latina/o offenders. Equally damaging is that these Latina/o criminal stereotypes can lead to larger numbers of Latinos being prosecuted for alleged criminal misconduct. It could also impact the number and types of charges brought forth at arraignment, as well as the judgment of various court officials. Judges may be less willing to provide favorable bail decisions and plea bargains. Probation officers may be reluctant to recommend probationary sentences for felony convictions. Jurors may be less likely to reject proof raising a reasonable doubt about alleged wrongdoing. In sum, notions of Latina/o criminality impact all phases of criminal justice and produce what Marjorie Zatz has referred to as a “cumulative disadvantage” effect that results in the harsher sentencing of Latina/o defendants convicted for criminal offenses.

Latinos and Criminal Sentencing

The majority of early Latina/o criminal sentencing research revolved around Mexican American felony convictions in the southwestern United States. The magnitude of differentials between Mexican Americans and Whites varied and was strongest for those convicted on drug-related criminal charges. Contemporary research examining other local, regional, and national data has produced findings consistent with this early line of research, but nuances are providing a clearer picture. The few empirical studies that have been conducted indicate that Latinos are at a higher risk for disparate sentencing when convicted for property-related offenses. Latinos are likely to receive longer sentences of incarceration when convicted on drug-related charges. Often this observed pattern of unsympathetic judicial punishment is explained by the greater reluctance of Latinos to cooperate with investigators and law enforcement personnel in the apprehension and conviction of other suspected drug traffickers.

Recent analyses of sentencing decisions in jurisdictions employing determinate sentencing guidelines paint an even bleaker picture. Determinate sentencing guidelines were established to help provide more legal rationality for courtroom actors by reducing the amount of judicial discretion. This is accomplished by providing judges with a sentencing grid for particular types of criminal convictions that take into account specific legal characteristics of the case. Judges can, however, depart from suggested sentences of incarceration, probation, or both, based on their view of extenuating circumstances, such as cooperation with law enforcement personnel. Research on determinate sentencing guidelines departures shows that younger Latinos are significantly more at risk than their Black and White counterparts for upward departures from the guidelines and have significantly lower probabilities of receiving downward departures. Similarly, and in line with both symbolic assailant and cumulative disadvantage theses, findings demonstrate a significantly higher risk for Latinos of pretrial detention that limits the quality of a felony defense. The pervasiveness of Latina/o immigrant stereotypes has been forwarded as an explanation for disparate sentencing outcomes even though the majority of Latinos convicted and sentenced in U.S. criminal courts are nonimmigrants.

Felony Versus Misdemeanor Criminal Sentencing

There is a dearth of scholarly information on misdemeanor sentencing decisions, which is somewhat surprising considering the overwhelming volume of misdemeanor offenses that are brought forth for adjudication on a daily basis. The sheer magnitude in the number of cases settled each day increases the risk for disparate treatment as county, city, and/or township court officials often have only a police report or citizen complaint at their disposal when deciding upon whether a case should go forward for prosecution. At various points in time, moral panics have been shown to drive law enforcement, criminal prosecution, and conviction with respect to misdemeanor sentencing.

For example, research on the development of Mexican immigrant communities at the turn of the 20th century demonstrates how influential social and economic elites worked in concert with local public officials and law enforcement to enact and enforce misdemeanor criminal codes that would serve as a means to indirectly control Mexican immigrant labor for Anglo social, economic, and political advantage. Misdemeanor vagrancy, drug and alcohol, prostitution, weapons, smuggling, and disorderly laws were used to manage the Mexican population much like Jim Crow laws were used to manage the Blacks in the South.

Misdemeanor sentencing research shows that Latinos are disproportionately charged with more-serious offenses and disproportionately charged with more than one offense, which in turn manifests in more-punitive sentencing. Data suggest that U.S.-born Latinos may be involved in more misdemeanor criminal activity than their immigrant counterparts; yet, immigrant Latinos receive the most punitive treatment. Both of these findings are alleged to be the outcomes of cultural assimilation: Immigrant Latinos are less likely to be involved in criminal activity, but their lack of English speaking skills and their unfamiliarity with the American criminal justice system put them at a stark disadvantage for adjudication.

Conclusion

Although much empirical evidence points to the importance of legal variables in criminal sentencing outcomes, it is clear that U.S. racial and ethnic stratification are still important factors to consider. With regard to Latina/o sentencing disparities, notions of Latina/o criminality impact all aspects of the criminal justice adjudication process. Biased law enforcement is the beginning of a cumulative disadvantage that carries over into criminal processing and judicial treatment.

An individual's prior record, a primary factor used in determining felony criminal sentences, may consist of a number of "less-serious" misdemeanor offenses that add to the perceived dangerousness, culpability, and/or rehabilitation of an individual. At a glance, this appears to be a rational strategy to determine incarceration for an individual and to what length. However, the use of prior record as a major sentencing determinate is not as viable when one considers the apparent racial/ethnic bias in criminal justice sentencing decisions prior to felony sentencing decisions.

Ed A. Muñoz and Casey C. Watkins

See also Latina/o Criminology; Latina/o/s; Media Portrayals of Latina/o/s; Minority Group Threat; Profiling, Ethnic: Use by Police and Homeland Security; Profiling, Racial: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives; Racialization of Crime

Further Readings

- Escobar, E. J. (1999). Race, police, and the making of a political identity: Mexican Americans and the Los Angeles Police Department, 1900–1945. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Johnson, B. D. (2005). Contextual disparities in guidelines departures: Courtroom social contexts, guidelines compliance, and extralegal disparities in criminal sentencing. Criminology, 43(3), 761–796.

- Muñoz, E. A., McMorris, B. J., & DeLisi, M. J. (2004). Misdemeanor criminal justice: Contextualizing effects of Latino ethnicity, gender, and immigrant status. Race, Gender & Class, 11(4), 112–134.
- Rosales, F. A. (1999). ¡Pobre raza! Violence, justice, and mobilization among México lindo immigrants, 1900–1936. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Skolnick, J. H. (1966). Justice without trial: Law enforcement in a democratic society. New York: Wiley.

SENTENCING DISPARITIES, NATIVE AMERICANS

Research examining the differential or discriminatory application of the law in the United States has typically neglected the position of Native Americans. The majority of studies examining race and disparities in adjudication outcomes have concentrated exclusively on the legal treatment of African Americans. Other minority groups are often either ignored or clustered together under a general heading. Research explicitly looking into the criminal justice processing of Native Americans remains sparse. This omission in the research literature is of concern, given that Native Americans are overrepresented in both the judicial and correctional systems relative to their numbers in the general population. Coupled with the fact that Native Americans are one of the most oppressed minority groups in the American society and are subject to racist and degrading stereotypes, this lack of research attention clearly highlights the need to more thoroughly explore legal treatment of this group. The entry examines the results of extant research looking at sentencing disparities between Native Americans and other ethnic groups, primarily Caucasians.

Jurisdictional Complexities

Examination of the legal treatment of Native Americans is complicated by the existing jurisdictional arrangements surrounding the prosecution of crime in Indian Country. Native American offenders are subject to three separate jurisdictional levels: tribal, state, and federal. The appropriate jurisdictional level is determined by a combination of the type of offense (whether the offense is a major crime or misdemeanor), its location (on or off reservation land), and the ethnic identities of the involved parties (whether the victim and/or the offender are Native American). Tribal courts deal nearly exclusively with Native American offenders who have committed misdemeanors, but their sentencing ability is limited to a maximum of 1 year's imprisonment, a fine of $5,000, or both. These characteristics render tribal courts unsuitable for examination of sentencing patterns between Native Americans and other ethnic groups.

Due to Native American tribes' distinctive status as "domestic dependent nations" within the United States, the federal government holds criminal jurisdiction over most crimes committed within Indian Country. An exception to this arrangement was crafted by Public Law 83-280 (18 U.S.C. § 1162, 28 U.S.C. § 1360, commonly known as PL-280), which was passed in 1953. PL-280 required that federal criminal jurisdiction in Indian Country over offenses involving Native Americans be shifted to the state courts in Alaska, California, Minnesota, Nebraska, Oregon, and Wisconsin. In addition to the mandatory shift of jurisdiction in these six states, PL-280 also granted an additional 10 states the option of assuming such jurisdictional authority in the future. These so-called optional states were Arizona, Florida, Idaho, Iowa, Montana, Nevada, North Dakota, South Dakota, Utah, and Washington. In the ensuing decades some PL-280 states returned the jurisdiction to the federal government. Currently about 70% of all federally recognized tribes (including Alaska Native villages) are subject to state criminal jurisdiction due to their PL-280 status. Native Americans living off the reservation are subject to state jurisdiction regardless of whether their state is a PL-280 state.

Sentencing Disparities in State Courts

Results of existing research investigating sentencing disparities between Native Americans and other ethnic groups, primarily Caucasians, in state courts remain inconclusive. Whereas a few researchers have failed to find any evidence of discrimination against Native Americans in the adjudication process, several studies have discovered that Native Americans are indeed treated more harshly by the judicial system compared to Caucasians. There are also studies that find that Native Americans are treated more leniently than non-Native Americans.

Studies examining data from Nebraska, Minnesota, South Dakota, North Dakota, Arizona, and several other states have indicated that Native Americans are overrepresented among the prison population compared to their numbers among the general population demographics. Although it is important to keep in mind that overrepresentation of a particular race or ethnic group in the criminal justice system does not automatically imply existing judicial discrimination, the staggering gap in Native American figures leads many researchers to voice concerns over this group's discrimination in the courts. In the state of Minnesota, for example, where Native Americans represent less than 1% of the total population, their overall imprisonment rate has reached an all-time high of 24.6% in 2003 compared to a 22% imprisonment rate of Caucasians. Furthermore, Native Americans had a higher rate of receiving a prison sentence when a stayed sentence was an option and a lower rate of receiving intermediate sanctions instead of incarceration.

Recent research highlights the importance of examining sentencing disparities between Native Americans and other ethnic groups for particular types of crimes. These studies argue that adjudication outcomes for Native Americans vary considerably depending upon the offense committed and the state in which it was carried out. For example, in California, Native Americans receive shorter sentences for homicide and drug trafficking than Caucasians do, while in Minnesota these felony crime categories render a longer sentence for Native Americans whereas sexual assault and larceny are associated with longer sentences for Caucasians. In North Carolina, Native Americans are sentenced more harshly than Caucasians for all the analyzed crimes except for robbery, whereas in North Dakota, robbery and drug trafficking are the only two offenses associated with longer sentences for Native Americans. In Arizona, Native Americans were found to receive significantly longer sentences for burglary and robbery than Caucasians even after defendants' prior felony record and other demographic variables were controlled for. Caucasians received significantly lower sentences for cases of homicide.

South Dakota Case Study

Data from South Dakota clearly illustrates that Native Americans are not treated equally in the state criminal justice system, specifically the courts. Although Native Americans make up 8.3% of the South Dakota's population, they comprise 22% of the state's inmate population (34% of the female inmate population). In response to extended criticisms of the state's discriminatory judicial treatment of Native Americans, the governor of South Dakota has commissioned a study from the Government Research Bureau at the University of South Dakota. The study's findings revealed that Native Americans do not commit more crimes per individual or more-serious crimes per individual than non-Native Americans do. A higher percentage of Native Americans accepted plea agreements or were convicted of crimes—77.8% of non-Native American defendants were acquitted compared to only 11.1% of Native Americans. There was also a sizable disparity concerning the suspension of sentences: Only 13.9% of Native Americans received suspended sentences compared to 80.4% for non-Native Americans.

Data suggested that Native Americans were also at a disadvantage in length of sentence, although this trend was not uniform. Although Native Americans had a greater mean sentence length than Caucasians, the distribution of sentences fluctuated greatly by the type of offense. Native Americans typically received longer sentences for cases involving violent crimes with the exception of violent crimes involving domestic violence and vehicular homicide. Caucasians alternatively received longer sentences for the latter two categories of crimes and for cases involving nonviolent crimes.

Sentencing Disparities in Federal Courts

Federal courts represent another arena for examining possible sentencing disparities between Native Americans and non-Native Americans. However, at the federal level these disparities may be attributed, at least in part, to a set of complex jurisdictional arrangements associated with adjudication of Native Americans and the adherence to the federal sentencing guidelines. Because the majority of crimes committed within Indian Country are subject to federal criminal jurisdiction, Native Americans are adjudicated in federal courts for many offenses that are almost exclusively within states' criminal jurisdiction (e.g., manslaughter, assault, and sex offenses). In 2002 for example, Native Americans nationally comprised 3.6% of all federal criminal defendants but 36.9% of those defendants prosecuted for assault. Federal sentences are often harsher than their state counterparts. Consequently, Native American defendants who have committed certain crimes on the reservation suffer disproportionately harsher sentences than if they were non-Native American or had committed the offense outside of Indian Country. For example, Native Americans brought to federal court on assault charges receive sentences 62% higher than sentences received by defendants convicted in state court for the same offense.

Prior to the establishment of the federal sentencing guidelines, federal judges had virtually unregulated discretion in imposing sentences below the statutory maximum penalty for a crime. They were free to adjust federal sentences by taking into account corresponding state punishments as well as unique circumstances surrounding the problem of Native American crime. The federal sentencing guidelines, guided by principles of honesty, uniformity, and proportionality in sentencing, have significantly limited judicial discretion, preventing judges from mitigating the disparity between federal and state statutory sentence lengths. Furthermore, judges were expressly forbidden from taking into account race, national origin, and socioeconomic status of offenders.

The example of South Dakota may be used once again to illustrate the disparate effect these policies have had on the sentencing of Native American defendants. Federal sentencing of Native American defendants for aggravated assault has been widely cited as an example of discriminatory practices by the criminal justice system. Federal sentences for Native American defendants who have committed assault on the reservation averaged 47 months in the year 2005. A similar sentence awaits a non-Native American who committed the same offense against a Native American on the reservation. A non-Native American who has committed assault against another non-Native American on the reservation is subject to the jurisdiction of state courts where an average sentence for this type of offense, according to 2002 data, is 34 months. Finally, Native Americans committing assault off the reservation in South Dakota are also subject to jurisdiction of state courts; in 2002 a typical average sentence was 22 months.

The U.S. Sentencing Commission has responded to rising concerns over the disparate treatment of Native Americans in federal courts by creating the Native American Advisory Group. The latter was charged with investigating whether Native Americans are indeed unfairly sentenced as a result of the operation of the federal sentencing guidelines; the advisory group was also given the task of developing approaches to redress the disparity. The group focused on jurisdictions with large Native American populations and three specific offenses that disproportionately impact Native Americans: manslaughter, sexual abuse, and aggravated assault. The research revealed that the impact of the federal sentencing guidelines on Native American defendants varies across jurisdictions and across offense types. For many, the group's recommendations were rather conservative and fell short of eliminating the problem. The final report suggested modifying the recommended sentencing ranges to account for both sentencing disparity and the unique circumstances characterizing life on the reservation.

The Supreme Court's 2005 decision in United States v. Booker represented a more radical solution to the state-federal sentencing disparity problem. The Court held that the federal sentencing guidelines were unconstitutional as applied and made them advisory rather than mandatory in nature. Post-Booker the judges are once again free to consider the mitigating factors surrounding the crime on the reservation in sentencing Native American defendants. However, research has shown that the federal sentencing dynamics have not considerably changed. Multivariate studies have shown that post-Booker, sentences of Native American offenders are 10.8% higher than those for their Caucasian counterparts.

Research Directions

The relative paucity and inconclusiveness of studies examining sentencing disparities between Native Americans and other ethnic groups necessitates a more expanded and thorough investigation of this subject matter. Many studies mention the lack of reliable data in this area as the greatest challenge to current research. Furthermore, the majority of existing studies are of a descriptive nature. There are relatively few multivariate analyses that take relevant control variables into consideration. Meanwhile, findings from these studies are arguably more comparable, and of better quality, than simple descriptive or bivariate analyses. Another drawback to the current state of research in the area is the primary focus of the studies on the sentence length variable. This stems from the fact that the data for these studies come from an already incarcerated population. Consequently, there is little research exploring sentencing disparities between Native Americans and other ethnic groups that takes into account the nonincarcerative dispositions. Finally, the importance of studies that focus on crime-specific analysis has been stressed by researchers examining the legal treatment of Native Americans.

Margarita Poteyeva

See also Native American Courts; Native Americans

Further Readings

- Advisory Group on Native American Sentencing Issues. (2003, November 4). Report of the Native American Advisory Group. Retrieved from <http://www.ussc.gov/NAAG/NativeAmer.pdf>
- Bachman, R., Alvarez, A., & Perkins, C. (2003). Discriminatory imposition of the law: Does it affect sentencing outcomes for American Indians? In M. O. Nielsen & R. A. Silverman (Eds.), Native Americans, crime, and justice (pp. 197-208). Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Brumsten, R., & Freimer, S. (2003). A review of South Dakota criminal justice: A study of racial disparities. South Dakota Law Review, 171, 1-24.
- Droske, T. J. (2007). Correcting Native American sentencing disparity post-Booker. Retrieved from http://works.bepress.com/timothy_droske/1

Goldberg, C., & Singleton, H. V. (2005, December). Public Law 280 and law enforcement in Indian Country—Research priorities (Research in Brief, NCJ Publication No. 209839). Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, National Institute of Justice.

SENTENCING PROJECT, THE

The Sentencing Project is a nonprofit organization based in Washington, D.C. It is funded by money obtained through foundations, private gifts, the sale of publications, and technical assistance grants. The Sentencing Project was founded in 1986 to provide sentencing advocacy training to defense attorneys and to draw attention to, and ultimately reduce, what was perceived to be an overreliance upon incarceration as a criminal sanction. Out of this commitment, The Sentencing Project sponsored the development of the National Association of Sentencing Advocates, now known as the National Association of Sentencing and Mitigation Specialists, which is part of the National Legal Aid and Defender Association, which provides assistance and guidance to those who represent criminal defendants. While The Sentencing Project has remained true to its original goals, its contemporary activities and interests are considerably more diverse. For example, while it continues to advocate for just treatment of the accused, The Sentencing Project engages in extensive research to understand complex justice-related issues related to minorities and women; seeks to reform unfair and ineffective criminal justice policies by using the media to educate the public and policymakers; and promotes proportionality in criminal sentencing through the use of alternatives to incarceration.

Justice-Related Issues

The Sentencing Project focuses on seven justice-related issues: sentencing policy, incarceration, racial disparity, felony disenfranchisement, drug policy, female offenders, and collateral consequences. Those issues are broadly defined and are not mutually exclusive. On the contrary, many of them are closely interrelated. From the perspective of The Sentencing Project, it is within those issues where evidence is found of unfair and ineffective criminal justice policies and practices.

Sentencing Policy. Tougher sentencing laws and policies that are geared toward minimizing judicial discretion, such as setting mandatory minimum terms, have resulted in a nationwide expansion of the federal and state prison systems.

Incarceration. Prisons and jails house more than 2 million men and women today, and the rate at which offenders are incarcerated has increased steadily for decades.

Racial Disparity. Racial and ethnic minorities are disproportionately represented in prisons and jails. The extent to which minorities are overrepresented in the justice system has increased with the enforcement of laws and policies that are associated with the War on Drugs.

Felony Disenfranchisement. With disproportionate minority representation in prison and the prohibition against voting among convicted felons, millions of U.S. citizens are prohibited from participation in the democratic process.

Drug Policy. The War on Drugs has made drug offenders the largest inmate population in the federal prison system and the fastest-growing inmate group at the state level. Most drug offenders sentenced to prison are low-level offenders without a history of violent criminal conduct.

Female Offenders. Female offenders are sentenced to prison at about twice the rate as their male counterparts. Many female inmates have histories of physical, sexual, and substance abuse. Also, they are often single parents who face many challenges related to the custody of their children while they serve out their incarceration sentences.

Collateral Consequences. Criminal convictions involve more than the legally prescribed penalties. They also involve consequences that result from criminal convictions, such as barriers to certain professions and careers and being disqualified from voting in federal elections, living in federally funded residences, receiving welfare benefits, and obtaining student loans.

Research and Advocacy

The Sentencing Project is involved in many research projects and advocacy activities that span across several of the justice-related issues described earlier in this entry. For example, unfair sentencing policies have established a 1-to-100 sentencing disparity for crack and powder cocaine convictions. That disparity translates into a 5-year prison term for 5 grams of crack cocaine or 500 grams of powder cocaine. Notably, this disparity was recently reduced because of recommended changes by the sentencing commission. Researchers have also focused on the use of drug courts as an alternative to incarceration to reduce recidivism and justice system expenses. Similarly, there is interest in assessing the practice of alleviating prison crowding through the early release of inmates to community transition programs or early parole.

Other areas of interest that cut across justice-related issues include how mandatory minimum sentences are related to prison crowding; the extent to which federal judges should be empowered to use discretion when imposing criminal penalties and what should be considered aggravating and mitigating circumstances in such cases; racial and ethnic disparities in criminal sentencing, especially how it relates to the War on Drugs; the incarceration of the mentally ill in correctional facilities following the deinstitutionalization of psychiatric hospitals; and the Second Chance Act, which provides federal money to states for the establishment of programs that would help former inmates reintegrate into their home communities.

The collateral consequences of a felony conviction have come under renewed scrutiny with the Right to Vote Campaign, a nationwide collaborative effort by the American Civil Liberties Union, the Brennan Center for Justice at the New York School of Law, and The Sentencing Project. The primary goal of the campaign is to remove barriers to voting, experienced by people with felony convictions, by reforming voting rights policies through litigation and by educating the public. In addition, there is considerable interest in how the War on Drugs has impacted females and the collateral consequences of a drug conviction. Much of that research has examined the physical and mental health issues faced by female inmates, their children, and their extended family members. There is also interest in the differences between male and female inmates. Females are usually incarcerated for less-violent crimes than males, and they also tend to suffer more from emotional and mental health issues.

Michael P. Brown

See also Intermediate Sanctions; Prison Abolition

Further Readings

- King, R. S., & Mauer, M. (2002). Distorted priorities: Drug offenders in state prisons. Washington, DC: The Sentencing Project.
- Mauer, M., & Kinsal, T. (2005). Barred for life: Voting rights restoration in permanent disenfranchisement states. Washington, DC: The Sentencing Project.
- Mauer, M., & King, R. S. (2007). Uneven justice: State rates of incarceration by race and ethnicity. Washington, DC: The Sentencing Project.
- Vagins, D. J., & McCurdy, J. (2006, October). Cracks in the system: Twenty years of the unjust federal crack cocaine law. Retrieved from http://www.aclu.org/pdfs/drugpolicy/cracksinsystem_20061025.pdf

Websites

The Sentencing Project: <http://www.sentencingproject.org>

SIMPSON, O. J.

See O. J. Simpson Case

SIXTEENTH STREET BAPTIST CHURCH BOMBING

On Sunday, September 15, 1963, a bomb exploded under the steps of the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church in Birmingham, Alabama. The explosion killed four African American girls, Denise McNair, 11 years old; Carole Robertson, age 14; Addie Mae Collins, age 14; and Cynthia Wesley, age 14. The four girls were killed instantly as the blast ripped through the church basement. Sarah Collins, age 12, was also inside the church but survived. She sustained severe injuries and was permanently blinded in one eye.

Although the bombing of the church rocked Birmingham and the country, it was not the first bombing to happen in the city. Birmingham, Alabama, was notorious for racial bombings during this period, and was sometimes referred to as "Bombingham." There were over two dozen unsolved bombings between the 1940s and 1960s, but no other bombing during this time was as catastrophic. This bombing appeared to be a response to the rise of civil rights activism. In the 1960s, Blacks were fighting for equality under law and the freedom to live as full citizens with dignity. Not only were adults marching, but young people were getting involved in the struggle as well. It was a very dramatic and violent time, during which many young people were beaten and arrested.

In 1963, events in Birmingham became national front page news. Footage of police using fire hoses and attack dogs to disperse crowds of Black people was seen on television around the world. At the time, many African Americans lacked good paying jobs. In the Deep South, the best jobs Black people were offered were either in houses and restaurants cooking and cleaning or working in iron or steel factories. Blacks generally could not obtain the positions of clerks, secretaries, police officers, librarians, or firefighters. There were very few Black professionals. The most common Black professionals were schoolteachers at Black-only schools or preachers at Black churches. Birmingham still posted signs stating "Whites only" over water fountains, bathrooms, and sections in movie theaters.

In April 1963, civil rights activist Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., arrived in Alabama and stirred the city. He and fellow leaders organized several marches, and thousands were arrested. King and his associates also organized "sit-ins," a form of nonviolent civil disobedience, at Whites-only lunch counters in Birmingham. The protesters would sit themselves in Whites-only establishments and remain seated until they were removed. The sit-ins often were highly successful at causing major disruptions in business.

In May 1963, King and other civil rights leaders met with Birmingham business owners, who agreed to desegregate lunch counters and start hiring Blacks as lunch counter clerks and other previously Whites-only positions. After the announcement was made, the city erupted in violent attacks, in which 500 Blacks were injured.

The Sixteenth Street Baptist Church bombing occurred when the entire state of Alabama was in turmoil over school desegregation. On September 4, 1963, the federal court had ordered that a total of 24 Black children, including 5 from Birmingham, were to be enrolled as students in hitherto all-White public schools throughout the state. On the morning of September 15, 1963, immediately after the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church bombing, the scene at the church was described as very chaotic. Dozens of survivors stood outside the church, some with blood dripping from their faces, having been struck by shards of glass from the church's stained-glass windows. The bomb had exploded in the basement, blowing down a wall and sending stone flying into the room where the four girls were. It was reported that a crowd formed outside as the victims' bodies were carried away. Family members and neighbors cried out. It was accounted in the newspapers as a sad and gruesome scene.

On the same day of the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church bombing, two young Black boys were also killed. Virgil Ware, age 13, was shot by a White teenager while riding on the handlebars of his brother's bike. An Eagle Scout named Johnnie Robinson, age 16, was shot in the back and killed by police for throwing rocks at a White segregationist's car. As evening approached in the city, shots rang out in many neighborhoods; many people reported hearing glass shattering as stones smashed into windows. These incidents made headlines all over the country, but the death of the little girls shamed the city of Birmingham.

Local residents Robert Chambliss, Tom Blanton, Bobby Frank Cherry, and Herman Cash were the prime suspects in the bombing. All four men were active members of the Ku Klux Klan. They were part of a very violent sect of the Klan called the Cabala Boys. The Federal Bureau of Investigation identified them early in their search. However, the state and federal governments took no action to bring these men to justice.

The church bombing galvanized Black and White civil rights activists in the effort to end institutionalized racism. Nationwide horror and revulsion at the bombing created widespread support for the enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. These far-reaching changes in the law were to mark the end of official segregation and discrimination in the United States.

Although four young girls died in the blast and many citizens of Birmingham were hurt and outraged, it was not until 1977 that a trial was set for one of the men. A jury found Robert Chambliss guilty of one count of murder for his part in the bombing of the church. For many years, it was the only justice the families and the city could cling to and even hope for. In 1997, the incident was brought back to light by Spike Lee's renowned documentary Four Little Girls. Shortly after the release of the film, the U.S. Justice Department moved to reopen the investigation.

In 2001, nearly 40 years after the bombing, a jury convicted Thomas Edwin Blanton of four counts of murder. Bobby Frank Cherry was also convicted for his part in the bombing in 2002. Herman Cash died before he was able to be brought to trial.

Teresa Francis

See also Ku Klux Klan; Race Relations; Racial Conflict

Further Readings

- McWhorter, D. (2001). Carry me home: Birmingham, Alabama, the climatic battle of civil rights revolution. New York: Touchstone.
- Padgett, T., & Sikora, F. (2003). The legacy of Virgil Ware. Time. Retrieved from <http://www.time.com/time/printout/0,8816,1005718,00.html>
- Romano, C. R., & Raiford, L. (Eds.). (2006). The civil rights movement in American memory. Athens: University of Georgia Press.
- Sikora, F. (1991). Until justice rolls down. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press.
- United Press International. (1963, September 16). Six dead after church bombing. Retrieved from <http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-srv/national/longterm/churches/archives1.htm>

SKINHEADS

In the mid-1980s, neo-Nazi skinheads emerged as the new face of racial hatred in the United States. Sporting close-cropped hair or shaved heads, suspenders, steel-toed boots, and Nazi-themed tattoos, these youth vaulted to the forefront of public concerns about racism, largely because of their commitment to violence and their confrontational style.

The skinhead subculture began in England in the late 1960s, emerging as an affirmation of British working-class values and style. Unlike other youth subcultures of the day, skinheads rejected trendy upscale fashion, opting instead for an exaggerated working-class uniform—simple button-down Fred Perry or Ben Sherman shirts, “sta-prest” trousers or denim jeans, suspenders (or “braces”), and Doctor Marten work boots. The ideology of early skinhead groups was a reflection of their clean-cut style, strictly adherent to a version of proletarian values that emphasized traditional masculinity and territoriality. Interestingly, the first skinheads lacked the explicitly racist ideology of their successors. In fact, they embraced the rocksteady and ska music and rude boy styles imported by Jamaican immigrants. Early skinheads also embraced violence, quickly gaining a reputation for assaulting hippies, homosexuals, Pakistani immigrants, and any other group that offended their sensibilities. In this sense, their close-cropped or shaved heads served a practical purpose, giving their opponents nothing to grasp during a fight. It was the skinheads' violent propensities, especially their targeting of innocent civilians, which led to considerable outrage. Following a crackdown by the London police in 1972, the skinhead subculture faded.

The transformation of this working-class subculture into a hate group occurred in the early 1980s when England was gripped by economic struggles and anti-immigrant sentiment. Within this political climate, the ultraconservative National Front Party was revived, promoting a fascist and racist ideology to the disenfranchised working class. This ideology gained a foothold in the skinhead subculture through its incorporation into aggressive punk-influenced music. Specifically, the band Skrewdriver, founded in 1977 by National Front organizer Ian Stuart Donaldson (later Ian Stuart), merged rabid neo-Nazism with the hard-edged sounds of punk and the sing-along nationalism of British pub songs, establishing a new musical genre: White power rock. In the early and mid-1980s, Skrewdriver inspired a number of other White supremacist bands and helped establish a global network of venues for White power rock shows. The music and the scene served as a powerful recruiting tool and indoctrination system for the National Front and other White supremacist movements. As White power rock spread and the subculture expanded, skinhead violence in England and throughout Europe increased dramatically.

Music was also central to the development of the neo-Nazi skinhead subculture in the United States. After Skrewdriver signed with Rock-O-Rama, a West German record label specializing in White supremacist music, their albums (as well as those of similar bands) were exported to the United States, as were copies of Blood and Honour, a fanzine-like publication produced by Stuart that celebrated White power rock. The aesthetics of this music—its simplicity, fast pace, and aural “rage,” as well as its emphasis on hypermasculinity and violence—were similar to those of the American hardcore music scene, which provided bands access to an audience of alienated young White males. It was from the ranks of the American hardcore scene that early skinhead groups, like Chicago’s Romantic Violence (widely recognized as the first skinhead gang in the United States), drew their soldiers.

In the mid-1980s, small gangs of skinheads were emerging in urban centers across the country and quickly gaining reputations for harassment, vandalism, and violence. These loosely organized gangs were transformed into a national movement by Tom Metzger, an ex-Ku Klux Klan Grand Wizard and founder of the White Aryan Resistance (WAR). Under the umbrella of WAR, Metzger supplied a structure to the fragmented skinhead subculture, networking gangs and linking skinheads and other White supremacist groups. He further provided a variety of resources to aid in organization and recruitment, including a telephone hotline, a public-access television show titled Race and Reason, and even an electronic billboard. Unlike other domestic White supremacist groups, WAR and Metzger directed their message at adolescents by embracing rock-and-roll culture, specifically through the production of a youth-oriented magazine (à la Skrewdriver’s Blood and Honour) and the promotion of White power rock. Metzger also mobilized the skinhead underground, deploying experienced skinheads to assist inexperienced and disorganized gangs, particularly in terms of recruitment. Largely through Metzger’s efforts, the number of American neo-Nazi skinheads increased significantly in the late 1980s, as did the incidence of skinhead violence.

On November 13, 1988, on a narrow street in Portland, Oregon, three skinheads murdered a 27-year-old Ethiopian immigrant named Mulugeta Seraw—an event that galvanized the American public against the skinhead threat. What started as a traffic conflict between Kenneth “Ken Death” Mieske, Steven Strasser, and Kyle Brewster, all of whom were members of the East Side White Pride skinhead gang, and two of Seraw’s Ethiopian friends quickly escalated into a street fight with overt racial elements. While Seraw attempted to keep the peace, Strasser and Brewster brawled with his friends, and Mieske, who initially stayed in the car, grabbed a baseball bat and smashed the taillights and windshield of the Ethiopians’ vehicle. He then unleashed his rage on Seraw, delivering the fatal blow with a single strike to the head. After Seraw fell to the pavement, Mieske struck him several more times with the bat while Strasser and Brewster kicked his lifeless body. Information from a confidential source led the police to the skinheads involved, all of whom eventually pleaded guilty (Mieske to first-degree murder and Brewster and Strasser to manslaughter) to their parts in the crime.

The response to Mulugeta Seraw’s murder was tremendous. Antiracism rallies, nationwide media attention, and general public outrage over the incident spurred ambitious hate crime legislation in and beyond Oregon. Seraw’s family, working with Morris Dees and the Southern Poverty Law Center, sued the skinheads involved, as well as Tom Metzger and WAR, for wrongful death. In a civil trial where Metzger acted as his own attorney, the jury returned a $12 million verdict against the defendants, financially crippling Metzger and effectively shutting down WAR. Dees and the Southern Poverty Law Center used a similar approach in 2000 to shut down Richard Butler’s Aryan Nations compound in northern Idaho, a noted skinhead training center and social retreat.

Although these strikes to the White supremacist infrastructure dramatically curtailed skinhead recruitment and activity, by no means did this eliminate the skinhead threat. Although fragmented once again, regional skinhead gangs remain active in the United States, and there is evidence of both expansion and attempts to redevelop national networks. Other information suggests that the American skinhead subculture has become the main exporter of White power rock to Europe, where this commodity is tightly controlled, thus contributing to skinhead violence in Russia, France, and other nations. Finally, Tom Metzger remains active, speaking to skinhead groups and advocating a “lone wolf” approach by which skinheads abandon their traditional style in an effort to blend into society and infiltrate positions of power. As such, even though the old skinhead ideology remains, the new skinhead threat likely looks different than it has in the past.

Vikas Gumbhir

See also Slavery and Violence

Further Readings

- Hamm, M. (1993). American skinhead: The criminology and control of hate crime. Westport, CT: Praeger.
- Langer, E. (2003). A hundred little Hitlers: The death of a Black man, the trial of a White racist, and the rise of the neo-Nazi movement in America. New York: Picador.

SLAVE PATROLS

Slave patrols were organized groups that regularly patrolled both rural and urban areas of the Southern United States to enforce restrictions that White colonists placed upon enslaved African Americans during the 18th and 19th centuries. Comprising four to six men, patrollers, or “patty rollers” as enslaved African Americans dubbed them, were responsible for apprehending runaways, breaking up unsanctioned gatherings and celebrations of enslaved people, searching slave dwellings for weapons and contraband, preventing enslaved African Americans from engaging in individual economic activity (“huckstering”), and, at times, suppressing slave rebellions. In fact, the history of police work in the Southern states grew out of Whites’ early fascination with what African Americans, both enslaved and free, were doing. By definition, the majority of Southern law enforcement was White patrollers, watching, catching, or beating enslaved African Americans. The slave patrol was among the first community-organized, race-based methods of social control in the United States.

Patrols existed in nearly every slave-holding county, but the implementation of a formal patrol system depended on several variables: the date of the colony’s settlement, the size of the enslaved population, the overall population of the colony, the threat of insurrection, and the geographic location and density of the area. In the early colonial period, British colonists were fearful of outside invasions by competing colonial powers; consequently, they drew upon their knowledge of posses and militias in England to form state militias, but the dual task of protecting colonists from invasions and enforcing emergent slave laws proved to be too burdensome for the militia. Hence, slave patrols were created as a kind of supplementary force to reinforce slave owners’ authority as well as to protect the larger White community from supposed licentious and devious African Americans, who were thought to be regularly engaged in criminal activity.

Insurrection, conspiracy, and striking a White person were the slave crimes, each punishable by death, that Whites most feared, especially those White people who lived in counties where the enslaved population outnumbered the free White population. Many Whites lived in constant fear of insurrection, so Southern states adopted a series of laws to restrict the activities and behavior of enslaved people to prevent potential slave revolts. These so-called slave codes included a pass system, which forbade slaves from traveling without a pass, or ticket, which was written permission for an enslaved person to be off of the plantation. Enslaved African Americans were prohibited from carrying weapons, and in many cases, they were denied the right to assemble without the presence of a White person.

Initially the entire White community was responsible for the enforcement of the slave codes. For example, an early Virginia law stated that landowners could question and whip any enslaved person traveling on their land. As the colonies began to depend more heavily on bondsmen's labor and their numbers increased, the White community developed the slave patrol to monitor the activities of African Americans. Some states required patrols by law, whereas others gave authorization to local communities to organize patrols. Many patrols were derived from the compulsory state militia. Called "musters," these groups of four to six militia men would serve on a patrol for a week's time. Some patrollers performed their duties voluntarily; others were paid wages or given tax exemptions for their service. Some professions were exempt from the patrols, but harsh fines were levied upon those who shirked their responsibility or failed to provide a substitute. Contrary to long-held assumptions that patrols were staffed primarily by poor Whites, patrol duty was shared across class lines, and patrol captains were often slave holders.

Patrollers generally made their rounds at night, some patrolling every week night, although many patrols were carried out on Saturdays and Sundays, when African Americans were more likely to move about. Most planters gave enslaved people Sundays off, and many took this opportunity to visit family or friends on nearby plantations. Rural patrollers usually traveled on horseback and carried guns, whips, and ropes; urban patrollers walked a beat and even engaged in stakeouts. Patrollers frequently punished offenses or disobedience with lashings, and enslaved African Americans who were caught without passes were routinely whipped. Patrollers often inspected the slave quarters and had the power to summarily punish runaways and enslaved African Americans who harbored fugitives or hid weapons. Some Southerners complained about the patrols' failure to function and frequent abuses of power. The most frequent complaint was that patrollers did not do their jobs, either because they failed to make their rounds or because they were drunk.

All African Americans had to watch out for the patrols, for the patrollers could not distinguish between free and enslaved people. Despite their fear of the patrols, enslaved African Americans resisted them with preventive measures, such as learning when to expect the patrols, establishing warning systems, and feigning innocence or ignorance when caught. Evading the patrollers took ingenuity and speed. Some slaves rubbed cow manure or turpentine on their feet to throw off the dogs used to track them. Others resisted more aggressively by tying ropes or vines around their meeting places to trip the patrollers' horses or by throwing hot coals in the face of the patrollers. Both enslaved people and patrollers were killed during these encounters.

After African Americans were emancipated, Whites wanted to reassert the dominant position they had enjoyed prior to the Civil War. Because their racial attitudes toward African Americans had not changed, many Southern Whites believed that the activities of African Americans had to be closely monitored or else the lazy and licentious freedmen would refuse to work and resort to criminal activities. Thus, the duties of the former slave patrollers were taken over by economic associations, rifle clubs, and White vigilante groups, namely, the Ku Klux Klan. Although they donned sheets and changed their name, the activities of the Ku Klux Klan were much the same as slave patrols: They took away weapons from freedmen, whipped them, demanded that all African American dances and meetings end by 11 p.m. so as to quash any plans for insurrection, and even required rural African American dwellers to carry passes from their former masters. The slave codes were eventually replaced by Jim Crow laws, but ultimately, Southern police officers adopted methods used by slave patrollers, such as enforcing curfews and vagrancy laws targeted at African Americans. These practices endured well into the 20th century, and terms used during slave patrols, such as walking the beat and patrolling, have become commonplace in American parlance.

Jessica James

See also Ku Klux Klan; Slavery and Violence

Further Readings

- Blassingame, J. (1972). The slave community: Plantation life in the antebellum South. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Franklin, J. H. (1989). Slavery and the martial South. In Race and history: Selected essays, 1938–1988

- (pp. 92–103). Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.
- Genovese, E. D. (1972). Roll Jordan, roll: The world the slaves made. New York: Pantheon.
- Hadden, S. (2001). Slave patrols: Law and violence in Virginia and the Carolinas. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Stamp, K. (1952). The peculiar institution: Slavery in the antebellum South. New York: Knopf.
- Wood, B. (2005). Slavery in colonial America, 1619–1776. New York: Rowman & Littlefield.

SLAVE REBELLIONS

Slave rebellions began with slavery itself. Slave revolts took place in ways large and small. The fear and paranoia of slave holders led to the enactment of criminal laws with brutal consequences for those convicted of crimes against slavery. Noted leaders of slave rebellions—Denmark Vesey, Nathaniel Turner, Sengbe Pieh (known as Jose Cinque), and John Brown—paid the ultimate price in their quest for freedom, giving their lives to strike a blow against human bondage. Insurrections against human bondage took place across the country in every state in which slavery existed. Yet, history may never cite all of those men, women, and children who rebelled individually or led others in protests against enslavement.

Acts of Rebellion: Real and Imagined

Slave rebellions were acts of protest. Africans in America rose up against oppression in acts of violence and civil disobedience deemed crimes against slavery. Enslaved farmworkers sabotaged tools. Cooks ruined meals or even poisoned the food of slave holders. Slave escapes were acts of rebellion. Laws with harsh penalties were enacted to intimidate slaves from revolting. Escape attempts were met with lashes on the bare back and branding. Acts of self-protection, overt defiance, or confidence on the part of an enslaved person was viewed by many Whites as rebellious and worthy of punishment. Repeated escape attempts could lead to castration, mutilation, and death. Despite these harsh consequences, slaves rebelled, escaped, and staged uprisings, using any means within their power to fight against perpetual servitude. Ultimately, rebellions led by enslaved Blacks, free Blacks, and White abolitionists were acts of war against slavery.

Courts of law were used to try acts of slave rebellion, real or imagined. In New York City, fear of a slave revolt led to harsh penalties and greater restrictions in mobility. A mysterious fire flamed hysteria and paranoia of a slave protest or act of sabotage. In 1741, New York City was the site of several unexplained fires. Many Whites viewed the fires as acts of slave protest. Following a farce of a trial, dozens of slaves were found guilty. In the end, 13 slaves were burned alive, 18 were hanged, and 70 were banished. There was little evidence to support slave involvement with these fires. The cruelty of the verdict reveals the deep paranoia and fear of slave revolts on the part of many Whites. Those fears, and an addiction to slave-related profits, led to the manipulation of the rule of law to favor slave holders.

Denmark Vesey

Denmark Vesey was born in Saint Domingue (now Haiti) in 1767. He was enslaved in South Carolina by Joseph Vesey. In 1800, Denmark Vesey won a lottery and used the proceeds to purchase his freedom. Vesey was greatly influenced by the French Revolution (1789–1799) and the slave uprisings in Haiti led by Toussaint L'Ouverture (1791–1804). In Haiti, L'Ouverture's army of slaves defeated Napoleon Bonaparte's army to gain the independence of that country. Denmark Vesey led a relatively prosperous life as a carpenter. However, Vesey read newspaper articles that set forth the resistance of slave holders to the Missouri Compromise and the emancipation of Blacks.

Vesey believed that God told him to lead an attack against slavery. However, in 1822, Vesey's plan was undermined before it could be executed. Vesey and 72 others were arrested, tried, and convicted of attempting to overthrow slavery. Although many others were involved in the plot, Vesey refused to divulge the names of coconspirators. Vesey and 35 coconspirators were hanged, and 37 coconspirators were deported to plantations on the Caribbean islands. Vesey's planned rebellion terrified slave holders, who, in turn, enacted harsher criminal laws intent on preventing future slave uprisings. South Carolina placed guards around the military arsenal in Charleston to prevent slaves from acquiring weapons.

Nathaniel Turner

Nathaniel Turner was born in 1800 to slave holder Benjamin Turner of Southhampton, Virginia. Nathaniel Turner's mother despised slavery and taught her son to despise it, as well. On the plantation, Nat Turner was taught to read the Bible by the slave holder's son. From this, Nat Turner developed a deep faith in God. Turner believed God was preparing him to lead an uprising against slavery. He waited years for a sign from God. In 1831, Nat Turner was sold to Joseph Travis. That same year, a solar eclipse occurred. Turner saw the eclipse as a sign that the rebellion was to begin. On August 21, 1831, Nat Turner began his revolt. Turner and members of his rebellion killed the Travis family and at least 50 other Whites and then escaped into the woods.

Over 3,000 Whites were deputized to capture Turner and his accomplices. Hundreds of innocent slaves were tortured and murdered in retaliation for Turner's revolt. After a fierce battle, Nathaniel Turner was apprehended on October 30, 1831. Turner stood trial in Southhampton County court and was found guilty of murder and leading a rebellion against slavery. He was sentenced to death. During his imprisonment, Turner dictated a statement to Thomas Gray detailing his insurrection for posterity. To the last, Turner maintained his belief in the emancipation of Blacks. When questioned, he refused to provide the names of escaped co-conspirators. Turner and 13 Black members of his rebellion, including a woman, were executed on November 11, 1831. Turner was hanged, skinned, and beheaded. The malevolence shown Turner at death evidences the fear and animosity toward Blacks who engaged in rebellions against slavery. States enacted even stricter slave laws. However, the rebellions continued.

The state of Maryland enacted a law forbidding any free Blacks from entering the state. Free Blacks living in Maryland were prohibited by law from possessing weapons. Harsher criminal laws were enacted throughout the country. In Virginia, the Assembly enacted a law that stated "No slave, free negro, or mulatto, whether he shall have been ordained or licensed, or otherwise, shall hereafter undertake to preach, exhort, or conduct, or hold any assembly or meeting, for religious or other purposes either in the day time, or at night." Violating this Virginia statute would result in Blacks receiving 30 lashes. Slaves were whipped, hanged, or tortured in the presence of other slaves to inspire terror and prevent acts of rebellion. The gatherings of Blacks were watched with suspicion. Even sanctioned religious meetings created great unease. Many Whites suspected Blacks used church services as a mechanism for cultivating dissent and planning uprisings against slavery. Despite it all, Africans in America rebelled against slavery.

The Amistad

African rebellions aboard slave ships were frequent. Terrified African men, women, and children captured by marauding raiders bore witness to heinous acts of brutality as warnings against insurrection. Upon reaching the coastal holding pens, they awaited ships to cross the Middle Passage. Rebellious slaves were tortured and killed. Once on the ship, human beings, chained one to another for weeks in cargo holds without room to stand, still found the courage to rebel. For Africans aboard the Amistad, rebellion meant freedom. In 1839, the Amistad was en route from Havana, Cuba, to Puerto Principe, Cuba, when the slaves aboard revolted. An enslaved African named Sengbe Pieh led the rebellion. During the revolt, the ship's captain, Ramon Ferrer, and another member of the Amistad crew were slain.

Having gained his freedom, Sengbe demanded that the ship be turned around and taken back to Africa. The surviving White members of the crew sailed the ship toward Africa by day. However, each night the ship was turned back toward Cuba. For 2 months, the ship sailed this erratic course. Then, gale force winds drove the ship to Long Island Sound near New York, where it traveled along the East Coast in search of food and supplies. The U.S. Navy brig Washington spotted the ship and forced the Amistad to dock in Connecticut. Based on the word of the surviving White crew members, Sengbe and 37 other Africans were arrested and charged with murder and piracy. Sengbe's name was changed to Jose Cinque, a Spanish name, by a White crew member to deceive the court into believing that he had been a slave in Cuba as opposed to a person recently captured in Africa.

The trial of Sengbe/Cinque placed the role of slave rebellions before the court and the country. The government of Spain demanded the return of its ship, the slaves, and a trial in Spain for the murder of Captain Ferrer, a Spanish subject. At that time, Cuba was a Spanish territory. However, based on international law the slave trade had been outlawed under the Anglo-Spanish Treaty of 1820. Sengbe/Cinque's future would be determined by whether the court found him free or slave. Whereas a free man can defend that freedom to the death, a slave cannot. If found to be a free human being, Sengbe/Cinque would be the lawful owner of the Amistad. Sengbe/Cinque and the 37 other men on trial would be subjects of Africa, not Spain, and would be returned to freedom. The first trial ended with a verdict favorable to Sengbe/Cinque and the others. However, President Van Buren refused to acknowledge the court's ruling and would not allow the men to go free. Van Buren was running for reelection and depended on the southern vote, which favored the Africans either deported to Spain or executed in the United States for murder. Van Buren promised his southern constituents and the Spanish government that the ship and Africans would be returned to Spain.

Under pressure from Van Buren, the case was retried. For the second trial, abolitionists enlisted the assistance of a respected elder statesman, former president of the United States John Quincy Adams. Once again, the ruling was in favor of Sengbe/Cinque and his men. This second favorable verdict was appealed by the government. Throughout this ordeal, Sengbe/Cinque and his men remained imprisoned. The case reached the U.S. Supreme Court. Before the Court, Adams was forceful and eloquent in his defense of the ideals of freedom and justice. The Supreme Court ruled in favor of Sengbe/Cinque. In 1841, Sengbe/Cinque and his fellow captives were taken back to Africa.

John Brown

In June of 1859, John Brown, a White abolitionist, led a rebellion to free the slaves of Virginia. Deeply religious, John Brown believed that God had pre-ordained him to lead a slave uprising. He armed himself with guns from an armory located in Harper's Ferry, Virginia. He was accompanied by 16 Whites, including his son, and 5 Blacks. Although heavily armed, Brown had inadvertently alerted the town. He seized control of the armory. Thousands of Whites, apprehensive about slave rebellions, descended upon the armory. A battle ensued during which Brown's son was killed as well as many members of his rebellion. Outnumbered, John Brown was captured, arrested, and convicted of treason. He was sentenced to death by hanging. In his final address to the court that convicted him on November 2, 1858, Brown declared, "Now, if it is deemed necessary that I should forfeit my life for the furtherance of the ends of justice, and mingle my blood further with the blood of my children and with the blood of millions in this slave country whose rights are disregarded by wicked, cruel, and unjust enactments, I submit: so let it be done!"

Conclusion

Historians debate the value of slave rebellions and the sanity of those who would risk their lives against the laws, society, and armies set to enforce human bondage. However, slave rebellions fit securely within America's history of revolution and insurrection in the name of freedom.

Gloria J. Browne-Marshall

See also Lynchings; Slave Patrols; Slavery and Violence

Further Readings

- Acts of the General Assembly of Virginia, 1831.
- Aptheker, H. (1993). American slave revolts. New York: International Publishers.
- Frazier, E. F. (1957). The Negro in the United States. New York: Macmillan.
- General Assembly of the State of Maryland, Annapolis, 1832, Chapters 281, 325.
- James, C. L. R. (1963). The Black Jacobins: Toussaint L'Ouverture and the San Domingo revolution. New York: Vintage Books.

- Killens, J. (Ed.). (1970). The trial record of Denmark Vesey. Boston: Beacon Press.
- Turner, N. (1831). The confession of Nat Turner. Baltimore: Thomas Gray/ Lucas & Deaver.
- United States v. The Libellants, et al., 40 U.S. 518 (1841).

SLAVERY AND VIOLENCE

Economics and the search for profits was the driving force behind the African slave trade. But violence was the cornerstone of forced human bondage. Cold, cruel, and calculated acts of violence were used to psychologically intimidate African slaves, as individuals and as a collective, and transform them into obedient servants, keeping them in their “proper place” in the economic, political, social, cultural, and legal order. However, the dynamics of managing human chattel was extremely complex. The power of masters was far from complete. Instead of simply succumbing, slaves often responded with passive and active resistance, including violent counterattacks on White masters and symbols of power. Masters and slaves were engaged in ongoing psychological warfare, using violence as a weapon of survival and control—often with unpredictable and dangerous results.

Out of Africa: The Roots of Slave Violence

Between the 1520s and 1860s, slave traders—English, Portuguese, French, Dutch, Swedish, and American—placed 11 million African men, women, and children on ships bound for the New World. Only 9 million survived the perilous journey. Despite this high death rate, the triangular trade was enormously profitable. During the first stage, slave ship captains brought a variety of European-made goods to Africa to trade for slaves. In the second stage, the dreaded Middle Passage, captured Africans were transported to Central, North, and South America, where they were sold. Slave ship captains then returned to Europe with cotton, tobacco, sugar, rum, and molasses and a variety of other products.

Violence was the key to the African slave extraction process. European slave traders did not, with the exception of the Portuguese, actually capture slaves. Instead, they relied upon Africans to collect bodies for the Middle Passage. African kings and war lords launched attacks on neighboring tribes to capture human chattel. Africans who violated customs and laws were also sometimes sold to the European and American traders. In addition, there were professional kidnappers. African slave traders hunted lone men, women, and children who strayed from the protection of their families and tribes, putting them in chains. African kings, war lords, and kidnappers marched their captives, sometimes hundreds of miles, to European slave-processing factories and forts on the coast, where they were sold or traded for European goods. European and American slave traders were, in essence, paying Africans to enslave their countrymen and -women and ravage their homeland. War, murder, and kidnapping were the catalysts for slave-trading profits.

The second stage of the journey, the Middle Passage, required different forms of violence and terror. Ship captains and their crews, like guards in a prison, were outnumbered by their desperate and dangerous cargo. The journey from Africa to the slave ports in the Americas took between 3 weeks and several months, depending upon the point of embarkation and the final destination. Slave ships, which were essentially floating carceral cities, required carefully planned total control, including, at every stage, the use of violence. From the forts, slaves were securely bound and transported to the ships in boats or canoes. Once onboard, they were locked in irons and placed below deck. Hot, unsanitary, and inhumane conditions took their toll, with mortality rates between 10% and 20%—sometimes much higher on an individual voyage. Many ship captains kept their desperate cargo in chains for the entire journey. Others—with an eye on profits—brought them on deck for fresh air and exercise, particularly dancing. Slaves who would not dance or refused to eat or drink were disciplined. Whippings, iron collars, thumb-screws, and other forms of punishment were used to maintain order and prevent revolt. Many slave ships were structurally designed for planned violence: Small cannons and guns were strategically placed to fire down at rioting slaves.

The balance of power between slavers and slaves at sea was, however, extremely precarious.

The slaves—again, much like inmates in a prison—sometimes managed to challenge and defeat the planning and power of their keepers. Historians have documented 450 cases of shore-based attacks on American and European slave ships by Africans. In a number of instances, they overpowered the slavers and freed their family members, neighbors, and friends. Many of the 150 slave mutinies that occurred at sea were defeated by superior force. But in a number of cases—for example, the famed Amistad mutiny in 1839—slaves were able to overpower their captors and, eventually, return to Africa. However, for some slaves, there was no hope of escape. Rather than submit to a life in forced bondage—or, as some feared, cannibalism by their captors—they turned their violence inward, committing suicide by hanging themselves or jumping off the ship, sometimes holding their children in their arms.

Making Obedient Slaves: The Dynamics of White Violence, Surveillance, and Social Control

Life as a slave required different forms and systems of discipline, surveillance, violence, and social control. Slave masters shared a common end: transforming Africans, who did not speak English and were unfamiliar with American customs and institutions, into obedient, loyal, and hardworking servants. American political, economic, social, cultural, and legal institutions were carefully structured to build a carceral society and help masters achieve this end. However, strategies used to manage the minds, bodies, and souls of African men, women, and children, including the use of force and violence, varied in the North and South and changed over time.

Slave discipline in pre-Revolutionary War Northern colonies reflected a unique version of the “peculiar institution.” Northern masters generally owned only a few slaves; these slaves lived and worked with their owners. Moreover, the relatively small number of slaves made them less of a criminal and revolutionary threat. Some Northern masters were, to be sure, brutal. Slaves were whipped, beaten, branded, mutilated, tortured, and, in some instances, even murdered. Many female slaves in the North, much like the South, were sexually abused by their masters. However, the historical record suggests that Northern pre-Revolutionary War slave discipline was, collectively considered, less brutal than in the South. Northerners were, however, willing to respond with swift and draconian state-sanctioned violence when they felt threatened. A 1712 slave revolt in New York City resulted in the execution of 21 rebels. A 1741 revolt led to the execution of 4 Whites and 31 slaves; some Black rebels were burned at the stake.

The rise of large plantations in the South, following the invention of the cotton gin in 1793, posed a new and much more serious challenge for slave masters. Some Southern plantations held hundreds, if not several thousands, of slaves. These plantations were highly complex social and economic institutions. On some large plantations, slaves were divided into specialized tasks: field corps (plowman, hoe hand, wagon driver, cook), stable and pasture staff (carriage driver, hostler, shepherd, cow herder, hog herder), domestics (butler, waiter, laundress, seamstress, dairy maid, gardener), and artisans (carpenter, miller, blacksmith, shoemaker, spinner, weaver). Formal and specialized rules of behavior were needed to maximize profits and maintain order. Large plantations also required more surveillance, particularly in states where slaves outnumbered Whites (e.g., South Carolina). Simply stated, violence was often needed on Southern plantations to deter “bad behavior” and maintain discipline and social control.

Masters were the undisputed lords of their plantations. They had the power to decide guilt and innocence and prescribe and mete out “appropriate” punishments. However, these tasks were often assigned to managers and overseers, who were sometimes slaves. Some masters were, indeed, benevolent and tolerant, establishing close personal relationships with their slaves. But many others viewed them as cogs in the production process, much like farm animals: subhuman chattel. Slaves were worked on a daily basis to physical exhaustion, if not near death. Bondsmen who did not perform their assigned tasks or obey the commands of the master or overseer could expect swift and severe punishment: whipping, beating, burning, branding, and starving, along with other forms of torture, including cropping body parts (e.g., ears). Recalcitrant bondsmen were locked in irons, tied to a ball and chain, and fitted with demobilizing iron neck collars. Slaves who did not submit to these “corrections” faced even more draconian punishments. Some, including Frederick Douglass, were sent to “nigger breakers” who attempted to “break” slaves physically and psychologically. Others were sold into the Deep South to work and live under the harshest conditions and, more importantly, to be forever cut off from their families and friends.

Southern legal systems played an integral role in sanctioning, enforcing, and legitimizing slave-directed violence. Sheriffs, constables, slave patrols, slave catchers, urban police, militias, and vigilance committees—along with slave spies—turned the South into a police state. In many Southern states, all Whites were expected, even required by law, to confront all Negroes who were traveling alone to make sure that they had a pass and, if they did not, arrest them and administer a beating. Some Southern legislatures passed laws limiting the number of strokes that a master could administer. However, these laws were rarely enforced. Masters and overseers could beat, maim, and kill their charges without worrying about state intervention. Masters who were uncomfortable administering discipline could hire a substitute. For a fee, slave patrollers and county and city jailers would whip or incarcerate disobedient slaves. Southern plantations and the South as a whole were, by design, repressive carceral states.

Black Resistance: The Dialectics and Mechanics of Slave Violence

Slave masters, particularly in the post-Revolutionary War South, created an expansive and oppressive system of social control. However, the power of slave masters and the state was far from complete. Many slaves recognized the hopelessness of their situation and did, indeed, become obedient and loyal workers. But many others refused to surrender their minds, bodies, and souls. These Black rebels responded with passive and active resistance, including violence. Masters and slaves were constantly engaged in intense psychological warfare—an ongoing dialectical battle for dignity, survival, and control.

Much of the resistance offered by slaves was work related and nonviolent. Some slaves feigned stupidity and illness to avoid work and challenging tasks. They moved slowly—hence, White legends of the “lazy nigger”—damaged farm tools, vandalized wagons, trampled crops, and pulled down fences, allowing valuable farm animals to escape. Others harmed and even poisoned horses, cows, pigs, chickens, and sheep. Theft was rampant. Bondsmen stole food, money, watches, silverware, clothes, and liquor, viewing these things as entitlement for enslavement and hard labor. Some took great pride in their ability to steal, butcher, cook, and eat hogs and sheep without being detected. Some slaves talked back to their masters and refused to complete assigned work. “Lying out” was not uncommon: Many slaves ran away on a temporary basis, often for a few hours or a few days, and returned after negotiating terms with their masters. More courageous and innovative slaves simply ran away, depriving their masters of valuable property.

Frustration, hopelessness, and alienation drove other slaves to more desperate acts, including violence. All slaves knew, as a matter of law and custom, that an attack on a White person, irrespective of provocation, was tantamount to a death sentence in the South. This was not a deterrent, however. “Bad niggers” attacked, assaulted, and even killed their masters, mistresses, and overseers. Many masters and mistresses lived in constant fear of being poisoned by their slaves. Some masters responded by using slaves, even their cooks, as food testers. Some Southern legislatures made it illegal for slaves to administer medicine to Whites. Arson was another constant concern. Slaves set fire to barns and storehouses. The homes of slave patrollers and masters were particularly favorite targets. In cities, Southern Whites knew that a well-placed conflagration would cause massive destruction.

White Southerners were, however, most fearful of slave revolts. Herbert Aptheker’s classic study, American Negro Slave Revolts, uncovered over 250 slave rebellions in the United States prior to the end of the Civil War. Black rebels defied the surveillance and power of masters, militias, slave patrols, and punishment of the courts—in most cases, a sentence of death—in an effort to secure their freedom and attack the White establishment and symbols of power. Many slave revolts were uncovered before they got started (e.g., Gabriel Prosser’s rebellion in Virginia in 1800). But revolts that shed White blood—most notably Nat Turner’s 1831 3-day rebellion, which resulted in 57 Whites killed and Turner, along with over 100 rebels, murdered or executed in retaliation—struck fear in the hearts of White Southerners. “Savage Black rebels” like Turner would indiscriminately kill White men, women, and children and destroy Southern civilization. For many White Southerners, cold, cruel, and calculated violence was the only force that could prevent Armageddon and preserve the Southern way of life.

Alexander W. Pisciotta

See also African Americans; Alienation; Black Codes; Lynching; Minority Group Threat; Moral Panics; Race Relations; Race Riots; Racial Conflict; Racism; Slave Patrols; Slave Rebellions

Further Readings

- Aptheker, H. (1993). American Negro slave revolts. New York: International Publishers.
- Bellesiles, M. A. (Ed.). (1999). Lethal imagination: Violence and brutality in American history. New York: New York University Press.
- Blassingame, J. W. (Ed.). (1977). Slave testimony: Two centuries of letters, speeches, interviews, and autobiographies. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.
- Cash, W. J. (1991). The mind of the South. New York: Vintage Books.
- Douglass, F. (1982). Narrative of the life of Frederick Douglass, an American slave. New York: Penguin Books. (Original work published 1845)
- Franklin, J. H., & Moss, A. A. (1994). From slavery to freedom: A history of African Americans. New York: McGraw-Hill.
- Franklin, J. H., & Schweninger, L. (1999). Runaway slaves: Rebels on the plantation. New York: Oxford University Press.

SOCIAL CAPITAL

Few concepts in contemporary social sciences have been subject to such a high degree of scholarly and public attention as social capital. The term social capital has been given a plethora of meanings, often ambiguous or tautological in nature.

Nevertheless, the richness of its definitions has made social capital an attractive, all-encompassing concept that resonates with various community social problems. Its appeal is largely credited to social capital’s analytical flexibility and a multitude of available empirical applications. In particular, a number of studies in the past decade have analyzed the correlation between communities’ levels of social capital and crime. This entry outlines the definition and characteristics of the social capital concept as it has been developed in recent research literature. This is followed by a discussion of the concept’s relevance to the study of crime and its potential to affect and shape crime in minority communities.

Social capital is a property of social context. Existing definitions of social capital revolve around three dimensions: interconnected networks of relationships between individuals and groups (social ties or social participation), levels of trust that characterize these ties, and resources or benefits that are both gained and transferred by virtue of social ties and social participation. Many scholars have criticized definitions that equate social capital solely with acquired resources. Rather, social capital is the potential of individuals to secure benefits and invent solutions to problems through membership in social networks. These networks increase the flow of information and facilitate coordinated action for mutual benefit.

A high degree of trust among network participants fosters a sense of mutual obligation and permits them to be more effective in pursuing shared objectives. Social participation may take place in political, civil, or religious arenas or even in the workplace. Additionally, scholars assign great significance to building social capital through informal social ties such as interactions with family, friends, and neighbors. Social capital is also enhanced through network closure—when individuals know each other in several capacities, for example, as neighbors, business partners, parents of same-age children, and so on.

Recent research has pointed out that social capital can also be associated with some negative characteristics. Though some forms of social capital have positive outcomes for certain social groups, the same forms can adversely affect other groups. Although tightly knit networks make possible the achievement of certain ends for their members, this inner cohesion may restrict entry and deny benefits to nonmembers. A good example of this phenomenon is the monopoly of certain ethnic groups over particular professions (e.g., dominance of Jewish merchants over the diamond trade in New York City). Strong bonding may also produce excessive social pressure for conformity, thus undermining personal freedoms. Members forming the majority have an opportunity to fulfill their own agenda, whereas individuals who fail to obey the rules can find themselves in a position of outsiders.

Effects of Social Capital on Race and Crime

Social capital has been shown to be of great importance for societal well-being. Studies have shown that levels of social capital are related to levels of employment in communities, academic performance, individual physical health, economic growth, immigrant and ethnic enterprise, and lower crime rates in the community.

A number of empirical studies have examined the relationship between the different dimensions of social capital (e.g., trust, civic engagement, religiosity, political activism) and crime. The units of analysis vary from nations to states to clusters of counties. Overall, the findings of these studies have confirmed the connection between social capital and various forms of crime, such as homicide, firearm violence, and juvenile delinquency. Trust was the dimension of social capital that demonstrated the most consistent negative effect on crime rates.

Social disorganization theory is useful in helping explain the relationship between social capital and crime. In brief, structural disadvantages like economic deprivation, high residential mobility, and population heterogeneity hinder the ability of residents to be proactive for the benefit of their community and exert effective social control. When communities are socially fragmented, they are characterized by a low degree of social participation and mutual trust. Truncated social networks are not conducive to formulating and enforcing clear definitions and ideas about the values, problems, and needs of the community, and they may in fact weaken supervision, guardianship, and other types of informal social control. Bereft of prosocial ties, communities are defenseless in the face of destructive forms of social participation (e.g., gangs).

A major perspective linking race, crime, and social capital maintains that minority communities may experience low levels of social capital, making them more vulnerable to crime and disorder problems. The weakened solidarity of such neighborhoods may be due to their racially heterogeneous makeup—it is an empirical fact that racial diversity erodes a community's cohesion. Other potential reasons for lower levels of interpersonal contact and lack of engagement in local organizations include poverty, family disruption, and other socioeconomic problems that often plague minority communities in the United States.

A competing perspective posits that minority communities are far from bereft of social capital. This perspective argues that social capital has been examined primarily through the lens of middle-class White America. As such, the structural and historical social inequality sustained by minority populations has been overlooked, and certain “nontraditional” types of social networks that are embedded in the cultural experiences of racial minorities have been disregarded. This logic makes the connection between crime and social capital not as straightforward. A proposition has been advanced that criminal associations such as gangs represent a negative form of bonding social capital. A disadvantaged community segregated along race, socioeconomic, and other dimensions may foster its own cultural order that condones deviant behavior and allows alternative routes to achieve status and prestige—routes not consonant with conventional values.

Conclusion

Social capital can be either an anti- or a procriminal mechanism in minority communities. While the concept, as it is traditionally understood, carries a beneficial potential for the communities to combat crime, minority communities may suffer from a lack of this positive resource. Unfortunately, there is a paucity of studies that direct their attention to how racial composition of the communities shapes the relationship between crime and social capital. Furthermore, the sorts of social networks and resulting social capital available to minority communities are underexplored.

Margarita Poteyeva

See also Family and Delinquency; Social Disorganization Theory

Further Readings

- Jennings, J. (Ed.). (2007). Race, neighborhoods, and the misuse of social capital. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Messner, S. F., Baumer, E. P., & Rosenfeld, R. (2004). Dimensions of social capital and rates of criminal homicide. American Sociological Review, 69, 882–903.
- Portes, A. (1998). Social capital: Its origins and applications in modern sociology. Annual Review of Sociology, 24, 1–24.
- Putnam, R. D. (1995). Bowling alone: America's declining social capital. Journal of Democracy, 6, 65–78.

SOCIAL CONSTRUCTION OF REALITY

The social construction of reality is a sociological premise that individuals' reality is "invented" as a product of the objective "real" world they experience; the subjective meanings they bring to, and draw from, these experiences; and the intersubjective agreements produced in interactions with other individual actors in which they construct an agreed-upon perception of reality. This entry outlines the intellectual foundations of social constructionism. It also provides an illustration of how the philosophy can be applied to race and crime.

Intellectual Foundations of Social Constructionism

Ideas about a socially constructed reality were introduced by the early phenomenologist philosophers Edmund Husserl and Max Scheler. In their efforts to understand the structures of consciousness, they observed that the mind can be directed at real things (e.g., the dog barking in your backyard), as well as nonexistent things (e.g., your anxieties related to dogs barking in your backyard). The term was actually coined by Alfred Schutz, who sought to employ a phenomenological approach to more fully explain Max Weber's sociology of social action. Schutz's ideas about how ordinary people structure the commonsense world of everyday life inspired sociologists Peter Berger and Thomas Luckmann to write an essay on the role of knowledge in society, titled The Social Construction of Reality: A Treatise in the Sociology of Knowledge, originally published in 1966. The Social Construction of Reality is essentially a critical assessment of the fragmented state of structural theories of sociology (particularly the structural-functionalism of Émile Durkheim and the conflict theories of Weber) and Freudian psychoanalysis, approaches that were in vogue at the time. Berger and Luckmann saw a connection between these three seemingly disparate approaches and envisioned the sociology of knowledge as a method for a comprehensive understanding of the interactions between the individual person and society. Their ideas have since given rise to the study of how knowledge systems are produced, organized, stored, and distributed within society. How people think and behave is a function of the knowledge systems they have access to. Hence, the realities of a Latino gang member, a biology professor, or an Islamic jihadist vary in content, quality, and texture.

Basically, our everyday reality has a complexion made up of three domains: objective reality, subjective reality, and intersubjective reality. Objective reality is the real world independent of our thoughts, wishes, and beliefs. Subjective reality is the world as we perceive it through our thoughts, emotions, and beliefs. Intersubjective reality is the perceived world we invent in communication with other individuals as we construct ad hoc, agreed-upon views of the world.

These domains constantly intersect but are rarely congruent. Most often they collide like cars in a demolition derby. This "collision of multiple realities" has been a subject of interest among philosophers, especially phenomenologists, social scientists interested in the sociology of knowledge, and clinical practitioners, in particular cognitive-behavioral therapists.

Beginning in the Renaissance, scholars began to reexamine the cultures of antiquity and discovered that the ancients' view of reality differed from their own. This awareness of a world of multiple realities was reinforced during the Age of Exploration as Europeans came into contact with foreign cultures with radically different world views.

With the emergence of sociology in the 19th century, the notion that consciousness is embedded within social structure became a major theme in understanding social behavior. To this extent, the sociology of knowledge has been an important tool in the development of sociological theory.

Application of Social Constructionism to Race and Crime

To illustrate the relationship among social constructionism, race, and crime in the United States, consider the following question: What came first, slavery or racism? According to the social constructionist argument, it was slavery. Businessmen along with other financial speculators in Europe and North America came up with a plan for economic development in the colonies. This was simply a fiscal enterprise aimed at accruing a profit for themselves and their investors. Their aims were nothing out of the ordinary, maybe a bigger home, some financial security, possibly a chance of advancing up the social ladder—nothing one wouldn't want for oneself or one's families.

Unfortunately, their plan involved the conspiracy to commit the premeditated crimes of kidnapping, unlawful restraint, assault, and even murder when African victims attempted to protect themselves, their families, and their freedom. It also involved the sexual abuse of many of those victims while they were held in captivity. These are some of the most feared and heinous crimes that can be perpetrated on a human being: stranger-on-stranger abduction, forced servitude for life, assault, rape, and murder. Crimes like these are committed by hardened criminal and psychopaths, not businessmen. The conspirators were faced with a moral dilemma. To maintain this enterprise, the participants and those who benefited from it were forced to construct an ideology, White Supremacy, to assuage their consciences. So, along with fellow conspirators, they constructed a reality (e.g., viewing slaves as chattel/property) in which they convinced themselves that they were not perpetrating crimes against other human beings at all. As this fiscal enterprise grew and became part of the economic and social fabric of American society, it became a national agenda to maintain this constructed view of reality.

From the social constructionist perspective, objective reality provides the real account. Slavery was a composite of serious crimes, and racism provided the rationalization needed to commit those crimes. Even in the aftermath of slavery, racism remained embedded in our cultural psyche and continued to serve to control and victimize minorities. Because socially constructed reality serves the function of keeping reality intact, racism has also been useful in convincing some minorities that they are less worthy of equality and social justice, thus maintaining the existing power structure.

John Lemmon

See also Conflict Theory; Minority Group Threat; White Crime

Further Readings

- Beck, J. S. (1995). Cognitive therapy: Basics and beyond. New York: Guilford Press.
- Berger, P. L., & Luckmann, T. (1966). The social construction of reality: A treatise in the sociology of knowledge. Garden City, NY: Doubleday Anchor Books.
- Holzner, B., & Marx, J. H. (1979). Knowledge application: The knowledge system in society. Boston: Allyn & Bacon.
- Schutz, A. (1967). The phenomenology of the social world. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press.
- Wagner, H. R. (Ed.). (1970). Alfred Schutz on phenomenology and social relations. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

SOCIAL CONTROL THEORY

Race (i.e., the major biological divisions of humankind that are indicated by color of skin, color and texture of hair, bodily proportions, and other physical features) and ethnicity (i.e., differences among people that are based on cultural customs [e.g., language, religion, food, family patterns, and other characteristics]) are important contributors to criminal behavior, especially in the United States. A substantial amount of attention is given to this issue, particularly from the media and academia. This entry provides an overview of the role of race/ethnicity in criminal behavior and the use of social control theory to explain this role. Empirical literature in this area is reviewed, and future research directions are provided.

Overview of Race and Ethnicity in Criminal Behavior

Few will argue that criminal behavior occurs in disparate ways among different races and ethnicities. Some research indicates that violent crime disproportionately occurs in the minority community. For instance, academics have documented that violent crime occurs more among young African American males than among any other subgroup in the United States. In particular, young African American males are more likely than White males to commit homicide and robbery offenses. Various data sources (e.g., official statistics, self-reports) provide evidence that supports these academic findings.

Minorities also are more likely than Whites to be victims of crime. For instance, African Americans are more likely than any other racial group to be victims of homicides. Some have documented that homicide is a major cause of death for African Americans. Further, African Americans have high rates of victimization in other offenses (e.g., robbery). These issues have particular import not only for U.S. society as a whole but in particular for African American communities.

Explaining the disparities among the races and ethnicities in the context of the criminal behavior has been a challenge for criminologists. This entry outlines two types of social control theory—social bonding theory and self-control theory—and describes how they may be used to explain these disparities.

Explaining Racial Disparities in Crime

Criminologists have provided several different theoretical rationales to help explain the disparities that occur in minority groups' connections to crime. Two of these theoretical rationales come from the social control perspective in criminology. One of these theories is social bonding theory, which emphasizes a strong connection with society as an insulator against the tendency or attraction to criminal behavior. Another of these theories is self-control theory, which is an update of social bonding theory. Self-control theory emphasizes that criminal behavior is the result of a propensity (i.e., self-control) toward criminal activity and behavior. Each of these theories and empirical evidence for and against them are described next.

Social Bonding Theory

The social control theory that was formally introduced in 1969 is now known as social bonding theory. This theoretical basis provides criminologists with a different perspective on viewing criminal behavior. That is, rather than asking “why do people commit crime?” social bonding theory is designed to answer the question “why don't people commit crime?” The theory is an expansion of previous control theories. The theory proposes that individuals who have strong bonds or connections with society are likely not to commit crime. Thus, the bonds serve as a form of insulation from criminal behavior. Therefore, criminal behavior becomes likely when the bonds are worn or broken.

Social bonding theory suggests there are four “bonds” that insulate individuals from criminal behavior: attachment, commitment, involvement, and belief. Attachment is the emotional connection to others (e.g., family or friends) or some other entity (e.g., school or church) that makes it less likely that an individual will commit crime. Commitment to a conventional activity such as education or a career makes it more likely that an individual will think through the implications that can arise from criminal activity. Involvement in conventional activities makes it less likely for an individual to commit criminal acts because he or she does not have the time to perpetrate such acts. Belief is an understanding that a common value system exists in society. Weakening or breaking one or more of these bonds will increase the susceptibility of an individual to criminal behavior. That is, an individual that is not bonded to society is likely to be attracted to criminal activity because he or she has less to lose.

The original social bonding study, conducted by Travis Hirschi in 1969, shows that racial differences occurred in criminal offending. While acknowledging sociological differences among the races (i.e., opportunity structure, stake in conformity, lower socioeconomic class culture, difficulties in family life), this research does not account for the racial differences in criminal offending. Specifically, this interpretation indicates that the racial differences may be attributed more to police presence.

Additional research has examined the connection between race and criminal behavior. In particular, the research shows mixed results of the efficacy of the theory to explain the racial differences. That is, the early research on social bonding has not accounted for the racial differences in criminal activity. Recent research, however, has shown that the four bonds are able to account for these disparities. However, this research has primarily been used to account for the differences among African Americans and Whites. Additional research has been able to show that social bonding can account for these disparities in Hispanic and Asian populations. Because social bonding theory has a substantial amount of simplicity in its central components, some have written that it is one of the most studied theories in criminology. While social bonding is one of the most studied criminological theories, self-control theory is a revision of social bonding theory. Importantly, self-control theory has been used to provide some explanation of the racial differences in criminal behavior.

Self-Control Theory

Furthering control theory in criminology, self-control theory is based on rational choice, self-control, parenting, and opportunity. To begin, self-control theory is built on the rational choice perspective, which assumes that individuals weigh the potential pleasure of an act against the potential pain of an act. To be consistent with classical school criminology, Michael Gottfredson and Hirschi (1990) argued that individuals would seek and choose pleasurable acts and avoid painful acts.

One potential pleasurable act is crime. Crime is an act of force or fraud that an individual pursues for his or her interest. Crime has several attributes (i.e., short-lived, immediately gratifying, easy, simple, exciting). Crime is believed to be attractive to individuals that have a tendency to be impulsive, insensitive, physical (as opposed to verbal), risk-taking, short-sighted, and nonverbal—that is, they have low self-control. These tendencies influence how individuals view the potential pleasure of an act. In particular, the characteristics of self-control cloud an individual's judgment concerning the decision to commit a crime. This suggests that individuals with low self-control are likely to see the benefits of potential acts for themselves and to forsake the implications of their acts for others or any long-term consequences for themselves. Low self-control is the tendency to avoid acts whose long-term costs exceed their momentary advantages.

Self-control theory posits that low self-control is the likely result of poor or ineffective parenting practices. According to the theory, parents must first form an emotional bond with their child. Given the emotional bond, parents are more likely to monitor their child's behavior. Parents evaluate their child's behavior to determine if the behavior is delinquent. If the behavior is delinquent, then parents use noncorporal punishment to discipline their child's behavior. However, if these parenting practices do not take place effectively and early in life—before the child is 8 years old—then the child is likely to develop low self-control, thus becoming more susceptible to engaging in criminal activity.

Gottfredson and Hirschi's self-control theory contains hypotheses about race and criminal behavior based on a comparison of strain theory and their version of self-control. Importantly, Gottfredson and Hirschi present these differences not only for certain minority groups but for all minority groups. They argue that strain theorists tend to overstate the connection between race and criminal behavior because they see strain as governing the behavior. Hypothesized in self-control theory is that opportunities and ease, rather than strain, tend to govern criminal behavior. Thus self-control would account for all the differences in criminal offending. In a step further, self-control theory suggests racial disparities in criminal behavior may be best understood by examining differences in direct supervision.

The empirical research on self-control theory is mounting. To date, a meta-analysis shows self-control has a moderate link with criminal behavior.

Research Directions

Few will argue that disparities exist among the different races when it comes to crime in the United States. Criminologists have not been able to adequately explain this particular connection. Two explanations of these disparities are social bonding theory and self-control theory. Social bonding theory suggests that individuals that do not have strong bonds are likely to commit crime, whereas self-control theory suggests that individuals are susceptible to criminal behavior because they lack self-restraint.

Despite the research that has been produced using these theories, additional research is necessary to provide a better understanding of these disparities. Researchers should consider using more longitudinal studies. Further, additional research that includes multiple groups is necessary. That is, researchers should examine more than just two groups in their research endeavors. Additional research should include multiple theories in their examinations.

George E. Higgins

See also Conservative Criminology; General Theory of Crime; IQ

Further Readings

- Gabbidon, S. L. (2007). Criminological perspectives on race and crime. New York: Routledge.
- Gottfredson, M. R., & Hirschi, T. (1990). A general theory of crime. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.
- Higgins, G. E., & Ricketts, M. L. (2005). Self-control theory, race, and delinquency. Journal of Ethnicity in Criminal Justice, 3, 5–22.
- Hirschi, T. (1969). Causes of delinquency. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Pratt, T. C., & Cullen, F. T. (2000). The empirical status of Gottfredson and Hirschi's general theory of crime: A meta-analysis. Criminology, 38, 931–964.
- Vazsonyi, A. T., & Crosswhite, J. M. (2004). A test of Gottfredson and Hirschi's general theory of crime in African American adolescents. Journal of Research in Crime and Delinquency, 41, 407–432.
- Winfrey, L., Taylor, T., He, N., & Esbensen, F. (2006). Self-control and variability over time: Multivariate results using a 5-year, multisite panel of youths. Crime & Delinquency, 52, 253–286.

SOCIAL DISORGANIZATION THEORY

Social disorganization theory argues that crime and delinquency rates are a direct result of a heterogeneous, transitional, and poverty-stricken social ecology. Over time, poverty-stricken neighborhoods decay and deteriorate into crime-filled neighborhoods. Individuals from various ethnic and cultural backgrounds who cannot afford suburban living will move into cheap urban housing without strong ties to each other. The diversity of cultures will not allow strong social bonds to develop, and individuals become disinterested in maintaining community ties to prevent criminal activity. As the community continues to deteriorate, residents who can afford to relocate to other neighborhoods will leave at their earliest opportunity, thus even further hindering the development of community attachment.

Social disorganization theory was first developed by Ernest Burgess and Robert Park, who were associated with the famed Chicago School of Sociology in the early 20th century. They argued that the social ecology of a city could be examined through a pattern of five concentric zones. At the heart of the concentric zone was Zone 1, the central business district, which was surrounded by Zone 2, the zone of transition. The zone of transition was followed by Zone 3, the working-class zone, which was bordered by Zone 4, the middle-class residential zone, and finally Zone 5, the upper-class commuter zone. Each zone had its own unique personality and could be expected to produce its own distinct social behavior. Their work helped pioneer the way for future research. Clifford R. Shaw and Henry D. McKay used the concentric zone theory to examine crime and delinquency rates.

Shaw and McKay conducted several studies on delinquency over a 30-year period (1900–1906; 1917–1923; and 1927–1933). They examined court and police records of delinquents and determined that Zone 2, the zone of transition, was the area with the highest rates of delinquency. Zone 5, the zone that was the furthest from the center of the city was the least prone to delinquency. Their findings indicated that high-risk areas, not high-risk people, were associated with delinquency rates.

According to Shaw and McKay, there are three main elements of society that cause crime and delinquency rates to rise and fall in certain areas: cultural heterogeneity, geographical mobility, and poverty. When all three elements are present, crime and delinquency rates will be at their highest.

The first element, cultural heterogeneity, was based on the idea that in the late 1800s and early 1900s the constant influx of European migration caused the poorest parts of Chicago (and other major cities in America) to be filled with highly diverse populations. Immigrants from various ethnic backgrounds filled inner cities with a variety of different cultures. The assortment of ethnicities provided an opportunity for a clash in cultural norms; such a clash can lead to crime, delinquency, disorder, and deviance.

The lack of homogeneous neighborhoods would not allow for the development of traditional ethnic and cultural values. Members of these ethnically mixed neighborhoods were unable to establish solid foundations for societal agreement on what was considered acceptable or unacceptable behavior in society. Without a common set of guiding principles, these neighborhoods would be filled with chaos.

The second element in Shaw and McKay's social disorganization theory, mobility, was based on the idea that transitional neighborhoods were most likely to be targeted for criminal activity as a result of their inability to keep long-term residents. The short-term resident would not have a vested interest in fighting off criminal activity and would allow crime and delinquency to flourish. High crime rates in lower-class neighborhoods would prevent individuals from permanently establishing themselves. As a result of this constant mobility of neighbors moving in and out of the neighborhood, meaningful relationships between neighbors could not be established to help prevent criminal activity from prospering. However, in upper-class neighborhoods where residents established themselves over a long period of time, there would be a greater unity among neighbors in fighting criminal activity.

The final element in social disorganization theory, poverty, argued that areas that were the most poverty stricken would have the highest crime and delinquency rates. Individuals that were the most economically disadvantaged would be the most likely to engage in criminal acts. Conversely, highly affluent neighborhoods, where individuals were economically stable, would have the least amount of crime and delinquency. The argument that poverty produces an increase in crime and delinquency rates has repeatedly been supported through empirical research.

Social disorganization theory had a huge impact on empirical research in criminology and criminal justice. Its multifaceted legacy includes but is not limited to the idea that it helped replace the notion that all criminals were biological throwbacks, as argued through biological criminology, or psychologically impaired, as argued through psychological theories. Social disorganization theory refuted the assumption that criminal behavior is limited to any one particular ethnic or minority group. It established the notion that communities that are stable will have lower rates of crime and delinquency. Additionally, it established that areas will have different rates of crime and delinquency depending on the social values of the area. Social disorganization theory is also credited for putting theory into practice through the establishment of numerous youth programs to aid in the fight against crime and delinquency; one such program is the Chicago Area Project, which was directly implemented by Shaw and McKay and celebrated its 70th year in operation in 2004.

Although the term social disorganization theory was developed in the early 20th century, social disorganization was a direct by-product of the African American migration from the Jim Crow South. Thousands of Blacks left the South for Kansas and Oklahoma during the Kansas Exodus of the 1880s and 1890s, another half million during the Great Migration between 1916 and 1919, and over a million migrated during the 1920s to Chicago, Detroit, Pittsburgh, New York, and Los Angeles.

These migrations forced cities to develop urban ghettos where African Americans were left without any job skills, education, or proper housing. Over time these urban ghettos continued to deteriorate and developed into housing areas for the most disadvantaged in society. Even after years of attempting to rebuild these areas, the truly disadvantaged of these urban ghettos are hurt even more through governmental programs that do not reach the most in need, thus allowing the elements of modern-day social disorganization (poverty, unemployment, single parent families, etc.) to continue to flourish.

Georgen Guerrero

See also Biological Theories; Chicago School of Sociology; "Truly Disadvantaged"

Further Readings

- Shaw, C. R., & McKay, H. D. (1942). Juvenile delinquency in urban areas. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Wilson, W. J. (1987). The truly disadvantaged. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

SOCIAL DISTANCE

Social distance calls to mind several competing images: spatial distance between individuals or groups of individuals, psychological distance, emotional distance, empathy or lack thereof, and many more. This entry defines social distance, as it is used by sociologists and other social scientists; traces its historical development; and describes its measurement and outcomes.

What Is Social Distance?

Social distance is thought of as a measurable feeling of intimacy between individuals and other socially defined groups. The term is most often used when describing interracial or interethnic relations, but it has also been applied to other social groups characterized by occupation, education, socioeconomic status, and the like.

As originally conceptualized by Georg Simmel in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, social distance incorporated both spatial (or physical) distance and metaphorical (or symbolic) distance. Spatial distance can be reflected in physical segregation (residential, occupational, etc.), whereas symbolic distance can be thought of as the degree to which two individuals have things “in common” or share cultural and social similarities.

Robert Parks, a student of Simmel, utilized the concept of social distance in analyzing racial and ethnic “consciousness”—the degree to which members of different racial and ethnic groups felt closeness or distance from one another. Parks was interested in race relations and predicted that members of different racial and ethnic groups would increasingly feel less social distance from one another over time.

How Is Social Distance Measured?

To measure whether social distance increases or decreases with time, Emory Bogardus, working under the influence of Parks, developed the Bogardus Social Distance Scale (see Table 1). Starting in the 1920s, Bogardus administered the survey to students in U.S. colleges and universities approximately every 10 years (except in the 1930s when he was out of the country) between 1926 and 1966. In 1977, subsequent to Bogardus’s death, the survey was administered again by Carolyn Owen, Howard Eisner, and Thomas McFaul. The survey asked respondents to rate a number of racial and ethnic groups on a scale from 1 to 7, with 1 representing the closest social distance, and 7 representing the widest (see Table 1). The possible responses were revised slightly between the first and subsequent surveys (see Table 1). The respondent’s leftmost answer (on the survey) in each racial/ethnic category was taken to reflect that individual’s sense of social distance from members of that category. The survey results were then compared over time to measure the relative increase or decrease in social distance.

Table 1 The Bogardus Social Distance Scale in Its Original and Subsequent Revision

“Would willingly admit members of each race . . .”

	Bogardus 1925	Bogardus 1933–1966
1	To close kinship by marriage	To marry
2	To my club as personal chums	To have as regular friends
3	To my street as neighbors	To work beside in an office
4	To employment in my occupation in my country	To have several families in my neighborhood
5	To citizenship in my country	To have merely as speaking acquaintances
6	As visitors only in my country	To have live outside my neighborhood
7	Would exclude from my country	Would have live outside my country

Findings

As was predicted by Bogardus, and later by Owen, Eisner, and McFaul, social distance did decrease (however slightly, in many cases) among social groups over time, but individual respondents tended to feel closest to members of groups with more similarities to their own. In all studies, non-ethnic U.S. Whites scored closest to 1 (least social distance), followed by northern and western European Whites, while racial minorities tended to score closer to the bottom. Historic events had an effect on outcomes (World War II, the Korean War, the cold war), as did the respondents' race and/or ethnicity, gender, and place of birth (U.S./foreign and region within the United States). Two measurements were analyzed in each survey: the overall mean of the sum of all responses and the social distance spread (difference in mean score between the highest- and lowest-scoring groups). Between 1926 and 1977, the overall mean decreased from 2.14 in 1926 to 1.93 in 1977, while the spread decreased from 2.85 in 1926 to 1.37 in 1977, thereby indicating an increase in social acceptance among groups.

In 2001, the Bogardus study was replicated for the first time since 1977. Updates were made to the list of ethnic and racial groups to reflect current demographic realities in the United States, but apart from that, the survey was administered as it had been in previous studies. Additions to the list of ethnic and racial groups included Muslims, Arabs, Africans, and a number of groups from the Caribbean. Ironically, the survey was administered in the weeks just prior to and following the 9/11 attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon. Interestingly, but perhaps not surprisingly, Arabs and Muslims scored the highest number of 7s ("bar from entering my country"), and Arabs ranked last among the 30 groups represented in the survey. Surveys administered prior to 9/11 were excluded from the final analysis but were compared with responses obtained after 9/11, with the results that Arabs and Muslims received much more favorable scores prior to 9/11.

Apart from the unsurprising effect of 9/11, the 2001 survey had at least one very surprising finding: African Americans had, for the first time, scored in the top third of groups when ranked according to mean score. This result seems to contradict others' research on racial divisiveness in the United States, but it can possibly be explained by the relatively larger Hispanic population among respondents (who tended to rate African Americans as socially closer) or the increase in the numbers of African Americans among the middle class (thereby suggesting the influence of socioeconomic status on responses). Also interesting to note is the relative tolerance of African Americans toward Hispanics and a relatively lower tolerance of African Americans toward Whites.

Overall, the 2001 survey suggests a relative decrease in social distance, but with interesting trends among various ethnic and racial groups that defy the expected dominance of White nonethnic groups in setting social trends.

Elizabeth M. Fathman

See also African Americans; Ethnicity; European Americans; Latina/o/s; Race Relations; Racial Conflict; Racism; Structural-Cultural Perspective

Further Readings

- Bogardus, E. (1967). A forty-year racial distance study. Los Angeles: University of Southern California Press.
- Ethington, P. (1997). The intellectual construction of "social distance": Toward a recovery of Georg Simmel's social geometry. Cybergeo: The European Journal of Geography. Retrieved from <http://www.cybergeo.eu/index227.html>
- Owen, C., Eisner, H., & McFaul, T. (1977). A half-century of social distance research: National replications of Bogardus' studies. Sociology and Social Research, 66, 80-98.
- Parrillo, V., & Donoghue, C. (2005). Updating the Bogardus social distance studies: A new national survey. Social Science Journal, 42, 257-271.

SOCIAL JUSTICE

Defining social justice is difficult. Among the important writers and scholars who have addressed this subject are Aristotle, Plato, Immanuel Kant, Karl Marx, and John Rawls. These thinkers appreciate the variable meanings of justice and have argued variously that social justice is one of many different types of justice, such as criminal, distributive, procedural, and retributive. In this entry, social justice refers to an equitable distribution of benefits available in a society to all individuals and groups and concerted attempts to minimize the suffering of others.

In general, social justice is understood to mean the achievement of widespread fairness in a community. It focuses on the collectivity rather than on the individual. Social justice seeks to protect the rights of all citizens by advocating fair wages, affordable health care, improved access to education, and proper and safe work and living conditions. It includes such issues as the handling of criminals, the rehabilitation of convicts, the treatment of victims, and the prevention of conditions that foster criminality. Thus, social justice is connected to the distribution of power in society, the relative benefits groups receive, inequality, and necessities required to form and run an effective and respected democracy.

Comparing Social and Criminal Justice

A complex relationship exists between social justice and criminal justice. Most noticeably, many social injustices lead to criminal actions. For example, it is no surprise that inequality leads some individuals to engage in crime. In general, social justice looks at the bigger picture; it is a wider concept than criminal justice. Criminal justice, on the other hand, deals with the four dominant agencies that monitor or implement the criminal laws. Social justice focuses more on what is right or wrong in society and not necessarily on what is legal or illegal. Many argue that social justice may lead to criminal justice. However, rarely does criminal justice lead to social justice. Social justice is part of the larger concept of justice. This is why some university departments call themselves departments of justice, justice studies, or social justice. In essence, social justice is a broader yet more intangible term than criminal justice.

Bruce Arrigo presented one of the best explanations of the connection between social justice and criminal justice. He outlined four possibilities with respect to the association between criminal justice and social justice: Social justice is a beginning, criminal justice is the beginning, criminal justice acts dynamically with social justice, and criminal justice is independent of social justice. As he explains, one can see criminal justice as the initial starting point for dealing with individuals and organizations who violate the law, and through this process it leads to social justice. Alternatively social justice is what we start with, and through attempts to achieve social justice we also accomplish criminal justice. Then again social and criminal justice might simply go hand in hand in our attempts to deal with violations of the law, and then finally there may be no relationship whatsoever between social and criminal justice. Finally, Richard Quinney, perhaps the best-known criminologist associated with this perspective, champions the creation of a better criminology based on compassion, forgiveness, and love rather than on the concepts of guilt and retribution.

Distinguishing Social Justice From Private Justice

Perhaps the easiest way to understand social justice is to distinguish it from private justice. Private justice generally refers to a system of fairness in a private relationship (e.g., employer–employee or family matters). In this context, private justice shares many similarities with civil law.

An example of private justice might be a situation in which a worker and an employer have decided upon a suitable wage for the employee's contribution to the business. However, if it is discovered that another worker who does the same type of job is paid more at a different business, then the employer may have committed an act of social injustice.

Social justice is a dominant concern among critical criminologists and those studying race and crime. This subfield emphasizes the inalienable right of individuals to adequate and meaningful work, safe and affordable housing, proper education, and medical attention.

Jeffrey Ian Ross

Further Readings

- Arrigo, B. A. (Ed.). (1999). Social justice/criminal justice: The maturation of critical theory in law, crime and deviance. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth.
- Bedau, H. A. (1982). Social justice: What it is and why it matters. In M. Bradie & D. Braybrooke (Eds.), Social justice (pp. 85–97). Bowling Green, OH: Bowling Green State University.

- Miller, D. (1976). Social justice. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.
- Quinney, R. (1980). Class, state and crime. New York: Longman.
- Quinney, R. (1991). The way of peace: On crime, suffering, and service. In H. Pepinsky & R. Quinney (Eds.), Peacemaking as criminology (pp. 3–13). Bloomington: University of Indiana Press.
- Tyler, T. R. (Ed.). (1998). Social justice in a diverse society. New York: HarperCollins.
- Young, T. R. (1983). Social justice vs. criminal justice: An agenda for critical criminology. Longmont, CO: Red Feather Institute.

SOUTHERN POVERTY LAW CENTER

The Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC) is a nonprofit legal services organization with a long record of involvement in groundbreaking civil rights litigation, advocacy, and education. It seeks justice by helping individuals and organizations to transcend hatred and discrimination. This entry describes the history and work of the center.

Founded in 1971 by two attorneys, Morris Dees and Joseph J. Levin, Jr., SPLC began as a small legal firm based in Montgomery, Alabama, focusing on civil rights and dedicated to taking pro bono cases. Since its founding, SPLC has spearheaded or supported important lawsuits against government entities, industries, companies, organizations, and individuals at local, state, regional, and federal levels, including several pioneering cases brought to the U.S. Supreme Court. It has achieved remarkable and, at times, historic results: eliminating segregationist laws, removing racist policies, changing entrenched discriminatory practices, setting legal precedents, uncovering new information in long-unsolved cases, and many other advances. Some lawsuits have forced White supremacist groups to disband; others have brought them down by securing monetary damages into the millions of dollars. In 1987, for example, SPLC sued the Ku Klux Klan in Alabama on behalf of the mother of a teenager who had been abducted and beaten, had his throat cut, and had been lynched; a $7 million judgment against the group led to criminal convictions and to that group's losing its headquarters. Similarly, in 1998, the Macedonia Baptist Church—one of several Black churches burned in the mid-1990s—was backed by SPLC in a lawsuit that led to a $37 million judgment against the Klan in South Carolina that eventually led to the group's losing its headquarters property.

Through the years, the work of SPLC expanded, and the center became involved in a wide range of areas of discrimination, developing several creative initiatives along the way. In 1981, for example, it began monitoring hate activities in the United States, establishing a program called Klanwatch and eventually developing the Intelligence Project, which by late 2007 was tracking almost 900 hate groups around the country. Those examined include larger and more organized alliances such as the Aryan Nations and the Ku Klux Klan, smaller splinter and independent groups, racist skinheads, White nationalists, the growing nativist and anti-immigrant movement, and, more recently, extremist and anti-government organizations such as militia and patriot groups. It also tracks over 600 hate websites. The project is a major source of information, analysis, and training for law enforcement and other U.S. government officials, the media, domestic and international nongovernmental organizations, and various committees of the U.S. Congress.

In 1989, SPLC created the Civil Rights Memorial, a public facility that offers a chronological, multimedia record of the names, images, and histories of 40 martyrs of the civil rights movement killed between 1954 and 1968. In 2005, it established the Civil Rights Memorial Center, which houses both static and dynamic exhibits, a small theater, and the Wall of Tolerance (a creative opportunity to make a public commitment to strive for justice and human rights).

In 1991, SPLC began the Teaching Tolerance initiative, which offers educational resources at no cost for schoolteachers (grades K–12) in more than 80,000 schools, offers small anti-bias grants, and publishes a magazine with a circulation of over 600,000. Further, in 2006, SPLC began the Esperanza initiative, which provides legal representation in lawsuits to immigrant, farmworker, and low-income women facing sexual harassment, sexual assault, or other forms of gender discrimination on the job. It also offers holistic services, such as rape crisis counseling. This is part of a broader, multistate, cooperative immigrant justice effort that, for example, includes lawsuits against companies for unpaid wages to migrant workers.

Other initiatives include Every Victim Counts, which seeks to reduce undercounting in hate crime reporting; the School-to-Prison Reform Project, which seeks changes in the juvenile justice system; and the Hate Groups Map, which geographically charts hate groups around the country.

From its establishment, SPLC has been attacked for its investigative and legal work. In the summer of 1983, for instance, SPLC offices were fire-bombed, and although no one was killed, many historic and important documents were destroyed. The offices are the sites of protest demonstrations by hate groups, and staff members receive many death threats; yet, the work continues to grow and receive accolades from a variety of sectors. In fact, SPLC has received much recognition for its work, including Oscar and Emmy Awards and other honors from organizations such as the Educational Press Association of America, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the National Association for Multicultural Education. SPLC staff persons have been acknowledged by the American Bar Association, the National Education Association, Trial Lawyers for Public Justice, and others.

SPLC looks into situations in which elements of the administration of justice have been moved from public to private arenas. It seeks to improve social relations for all peoples, especially national, racial, ethnic, gender, and other minorities. Today, SPLC continues its work against racism and discrimination and for justice through litigation, publishing, and education.

Raúl Fernández-Calienes

See also Anti-Immigrant Nativism; Anti-Semitism; Hate Crimes; Ku Klux Klan; Ku Klux Klan Act; Lynching; Militias; Minutemen; Race Relations; Racial Conflict; Racism; Sixteenth Street Baptist Church Bombing; Skinheads; White Supremacists

Further Readings

- Anonymous. (2000, September 2). United States: Making racists pay. The Economist, 356, 30.
- Bullard, S. (Ed.). (1991). The Ku Klux Klan: A history of racism and violence. Montgomery, AL: Klanwatch.
- Connors, P. (Ed.). (2007). Hate crimes. Detroit, MI: Greenhaven Press.
- Dees, M. (2001). A season for justice. Washington, DC: American Bar Association.
- Guggenheim, C. (1991). A time for justice: America's civil rights movement [Video]. Montgomery, AL: SPLC.

Houston, B., & Hudson, R. (2005). Mighty times: The children's march [Video]. Montgomery, AL: Teaching Tolerance.

Shapiro, J. P., & Kaplan, D. E. (1999, September 6). Hitting before hate strikes. U.S. News & World Report, 127, 56.

Websites

Hatewatch: <http://www.splcenter.org/blog>

Intelligence Report: <http://www.splcenter.org/intel/intelreport/intrep.jsp>

SPLC Report: <http://www.splcenter.org/center/splcreport/report.jsp>

Teaching Tolerance: <http://www.teachingtolerance.org>; <http://www.tolerance.org>

STATE V. SOTO

State of New Jersey v. Pedro Soto (1996) was an important case argued in the New Jersey courts that dealt with the suppression of evidence gathered in violation of the equal protection and due process clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court found in favor of the defendants, holding that they had presented a prima facie case of selective enforcement by the New Jersey State Police. Attorneys for the State of New Jersey were unable to refute the case brought against it.

Background

The Soto case concerned combined motions to suppress evidence that the defense claimed had been obtained as a result of selective enforcement of traffic laws by New Jersey State Troopers. Seventeen African American defendants asserted that their arrests on drug charges, which had occurred on the New Jersey Turnpike between 1988 and 1991, were the results of biased enforcement of the traffic laws by the New Jersey State Troopers.

Criminal defense lawyer William H. Buckman, representing Pedro Soto in Gloucester County as well as the 16 other Blacks arrested on drug cases by New Jersey State Troopers on the New Jersey Turnpike, mounted a successful motion to suppress drug evidence seized during a traffic stop.

To set about proving its case, the defense conducted a “windshield survey” by positioning observers on the side of the roadway at randomly selected periods of 75 minutes between 8:00 a.m. and 8:00 p.m. The purpose was to make an accurate count of the number of vehicles that passed and the race of the occupants of those vehicles. The results of this windshield survey indicated that out of 40,000 New Jersey Turnpike motorists who were observed, 13.5% were Black.

The lawyer for the defense in this case also conducted a survey of the traffic violations issued by New Jersey State Troopers. This survey was conducted 10 times in 4 days between Exits 1 and 3 on the New Jersey Turnpike. The researchers drove their vehicles with the cruise control standardized and set at 55 miles per hour. This setting was 5 miles an hour over the posted speed limit. The researchers observed and documented the number of vehicles that passed their locations, the number of vehicles they passed in traffic, the race/ethnicity of each driver, and whether the driver was speeding. They found that 15% of all drivers in violation were Black; however, Black drivers accounted for more than 46% of all drivers stopped by the New Jersey State Troopers, a discrepancy greater than 3 to 1. The court found in favor of the defendants, holding that they had presented a prima facie case of selective enforcement by the New Jersey State Police. Attorneys for the State of New Jersey were unable to refute the case brought against it.

In a similar study on a section of I-95 in Florida, which had a reputation as a favorite route for those trafficking in drugs, Blacks and Hispanics made up only 5% of drivers, yet 70% of motorists stopped by members of the Florida Highway Patrol were Black or Hispanic.

Subsequent Developments

One person or case can have an immense impact upon police operations by exposing deviant and perhaps illegal police operating procedures. State v. Soto is just such a case. Soto came to the forefront as the result of an incident on the New Jersey Turnpike in April 1998 in which three unarmed minority males, two Black and one Hispanic, were shot during what was first classified as a routine traffic stop by two New Jersey State Troopers. This incident intensified claims by minorities that the New Jersey State Police had a de facto policy of drug profiling minorities driving on the New Jersey Turnpike, despite their vehement claims to the contrary.

Not only was Buckman successful on behalf of Soto and the 16 other defendants, Soto led to the dismissal of over 230 similar drug cases.

Buckman appeared before New Jersey Superior Court Judge Robert E. Francis representing Soto and the other 16 Black arrested persons. After a trial lasting 72 days, Judge Francis declared that it was his belief that racial profiling had been used in making the traffic stops that had eventually led to the arrests of the defendants. Moreover, Judge Francis stated that racial profiling by New Jersey State Troopers was not only allowed but that top administrators in the New Jersey State Police actually encouraged this practice.

With Soto as the foundation, combined with the shooting of the three minorities on a traffic stop by the New Jersey State Police, then New Jersey State Attorney General Peter Verniero announced that an investigation was under way into the operations and procedures of the 2,600-member New Jersey State Police. Indeed, at the height of the turmoil surrounding these allegations there were no less than four separate official investigations under way by the New Jersey State Attorney General’s Office. The investigation was centered on the New Jersey Turnpike between Interchanges 1 and 8, which incorporates the Cranbury and Moorestown state police barracks.

The motion filed by Buckman in Soto centered on the guarantee of equal protection under the law contained in the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution. Heretofore, similar motions had been filed under the due process clause of the Fourth Amendment. However, the Fourth Amendment argument was dismissed out of hand by judges who, more often than not, acquiesced to the assessment of police officers in deciding what warranted rational suspicion of illegal action to bring about a vehicle search.

Buckman and his assistants convinced the judge to allow them to subpoena data that might demonstrate that minority drivers were being targeted for traffic stops at a disproportionate rate to their representation on the turnpike. Once the data had been gathered, analysis indicated that more Black and Hispanic motorists were involved in drug arrests resulting from traffic stops in all categories than were Whites. Judge Francis placed the burden of proof on the prosecution to demonstrate that the drug laws of the State of New Jersey were not being selectively enforced in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. In March 1996, Judge Francis granted a motion to suppress the drug evidence. Suppression of drug evidence in a drug case is almost always a fatal blow to the prosecution in that without the drug evidence, there is no case. However, the state refused to drop the case and continued to drag out the case until April 1999 when it finally dropped its appeal. Indeed, Soto embodies the primary judicial determination that permitted data concerning racial profiling to be employed as a defense in a criminal case.

In essence, Soto lent credibility to the assertions that the shootings of the three minority males were the result of racial profiling. However, were it not for the shootings that attracted news headlines, Soto may have gone totally unnoticed and unheralded in the criminal justice system. In attorney Buckman's words, "The shooting stood out in relief because of Soto. Soto stood out in relief because of the shooting."

Jim Ruiz

See also Profiling, Ethnic: Use by Police and Homeland Security; Profiling, Racial: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives; Racialization of Crime

Further Readings

- Herron, D. (2000, December 4). Verniero is culpable in racial profiling. The Star-Ledger, p. A1.
- Saharko, P. (2001, March 28). Verniero's ex-aide says office erred/But tells senate panel racial profiling mistakes not intended. Press of the Atlantic, p. A1.
- State v. Pedro Soto, 324 N.J. Super. 66; 734 A.2d 350 (1996).
- Strunsky, S. (2002, June 30). Pursuing justice, rewriting law. The New York Times. Retrieved from <http://query.nytimes.com/gst/fullpage.html?res=9C04E4DB123EF933A05755C0A9649C8B63>

STATUS OFFENSES

Status offenses are acts deemed illegal only when persons committing the offense are of juvenile status. Offenses characterized as unlawful only for juveniles include but are not limited to habitual truancy, curfew law violations, repeated running away, underage liquor law violations, tobacco offenses, and ungovernability or incorrigibility in failing to respond to the reasonable requests of parents. The range of behaviors considered status offenses varies greatly throughout the United States. Curtailing status offenses is said to be a preventive measure against future, more serious juvenile delinquent behavior. Only juvenile courts can adjudicate status offenders. Adjudicatory hearings establish responsibility for an alleged act. Critics argue that status offenders are different from delinquent youth, and contact with the courts should be avoided. The adjudication of youth for committing a status offense may lead to continued contact with the juvenile justice system, especially for minority youth. This entry presents a brief overview of status offense cases, juvenile courts, the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act, and the overrepresentation of minorities in status offense referrals.

Anne Stahl reported that in 2004, juvenile courts in the United States formally processed an estimated 159,400 status offense cases. Once a status offense case has been referred for court intake, the court must decide whether to process the case by filing a petition or to refer the youth away from the juvenile justice system to other juvenile delinquency service agencies. At times, juveniles charged with status offenses are held in secure detention, although this practice has been discouraged since the implementation of the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act (1974). The number of petitioned status offense cases processed by juvenile courts increased 39% between 1995 and 2004, with the likelihood of adjudication for petitioned status offense cases increasing from 50% to 63% in the same time frame. Truancy is the most common status offense, which accounted for 35% of petitioned status offense cases; 19% were attributed to liquor law violations, 14% involved ungovernability, 13% involved runaways, 10% involved curfew violations, and miscellaneous (9%) accounted for the least number of petitioned status offense cases. Fifty-six percent of the total petitioned status offense cases were committed by males, yet females accounted for the majority (62%) of runaway cases, the only category in which girls represented a larger proportion of offenders. As of 2004, petitioned status offenses involving liquor law violations were most likely to be adjudicated (78%), and runaway cases were least likely (43%). In 2004, 54% of petitioned status offense cases committed by Black youth were adjudicated, with 59% leading to probation.

Juvenile Court

The juvenile court was established as a social welfare agency commissioned to perform the role of guardian or substitute parent of juveniles who violated the law and to act in the best interest of the child. Also, the court intended to separate accused youth from the harsh adult criminal court, impose age-appropriate correction treatment, and provide social welfare services for children who were dependent or neglected. The juvenile court's purpose involved informality, individualization, and intervention. Over the years, the juvenile court has been transformed from a social welfare model to a criminal court for young offenders. The main goal of the court is no longer treatment and rehabilitation. In 1999, Barry C. Feld, one of the nation's leading scholars of juvenile justice, argued that the transformation is a result of fears about other children, especially minority youth.

The Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act

During the juvenile rights era, approximately 1960 to 1980, the United States enacted the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act (JJJPA). Enacted in 1974 the JJJPA mandated that states remove status offenders from secure detention facilities and separate juveniles from adult offenders in correctional institutions. This federal mandate provided a unified national program to deal with juvenile delinquency prevention and control within the context of the total law enforcement and criminal justice effort. JJJPA was meant to launch the development of alternatives to detention in dealing with status offenders. Jurisdictions took various approaches to complying with the act, ranging from those that developed appropriate community-based programming, others that possessed a harder-line approach and charged youth with delinquency, and others that disregarded status offenders altogether.

In 1976, the Deinstitutionalization of Status Offender provision originally included in JJJPA was further clarified in an effort to swiftly remove juvenile status offenders from secure detention and correctional facilities. The mandate included a compliance standard requiring states to reduce the number of confined status offenders and nonoffenders by 75% over a 2-year period. In 1977 Congress amended the act, bringing nonoffenders such as dependent and neglected youth under the provision and eliminating the requirement that deinstitutionalized youth be placed in shelter facilities, allowing states the option of nonplacement. In 1980, Congress specified that status offenders and nonoffenders must be removed from secure detention facilities and prohibited the detention of juveniles in jails. Another Deinstitutionalization of Status Offender amendment approved an exception for status offenders and nonoffenders who are found to have violated a valid court order. As of 1992, Congress required states that receive JJJPA formula grants to provide assurances that they will develop and implement plans to reduce overrepresentation of minorities in the juvenile justice system. If a state failed to make sufficient progress toward the assurances, it became ineligible for continued funding. In 2004, juveniles were securely detained in 7% of petitioned status offense cases, with liquor law violations accounting for the largest portion of detentions. Dispositions for status offense cases include formal probation, referral to an outside agency, community service, or restitution.

Status Offenses and the Overrepresentation of Minority Youth

Researchers have expressed concern about whether the juvenile justice system operates with a selection bias that differentially disadvantages minority youth. Since the inception of JJJPA, states have referred more status offenders to private-sector mental health and chemical dependency industries; however, obtaining these resources may prove to be challenging for economically disadvantaged families, resulting in these youth being disproportionately sentenced to confinement. Other jurisdictions transfer these youth directly into the criminal justice system.

Although in 2004 the racial distribution of the U.S. juvenile population was 78% White, 17% Black, 4% Asian/Pacific Islander, and 1% American Indian (Hispanic juveniles were classified as White), Black youth accounted for 46% of violent crime arrests and 28% for property crime arrests. Of the total arrests for runaway and liquor law violations, the proportion of Black juveniles arrested was 21% and 5%, respectively. Between 1995 and 2004, the number of status offense cases increased 72% for Black youth compared to 30% for White youth. Although petitioned status offense cases increased for all racial groups during this period, the increase in runaway and ungovernability cases for Black youth outpaced that for other juveniles. Fifty-four percent of petitioned status offense cases committed by Black youth were adjudicated compared to the adjudication of 73% of American Indian, 65% of White, and 64% of Asian status offenders. However, 59% of the Black youth received the most restrictive disposition (i.e., probation), compared to only 50% of White youth, 49% Asian, and 45% American Indian. The overrepresentation of minority youth is attributed to institutional racial discrimination within the juvenile justice system. For example, the courts often set criteria for diversion and pretrial release that focus on family support and cooperation, which may prove difficult for single-parent households. In fact, the juvenile justice system is cited as intervening at a higher rate in the lives of children from divorced homes. It is important for the court to carefully consider the family risks and needs of the status offender and create appropriate and affordable programming specific to them.

Shenique S. Thomas

See also At-Risk Youth; Delinquency Prevention; Disproportionate Minority Contact and Confinement; Juvenile Crime

Further Readings

Bishop, D. M., & Frazier, C. E. (1996). Race effects in juvenile justice decision-making: Findings of a statewide analysis. Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology, 86(2), 392–414.

Feld, B. (1999). A funny thing happened on the way to the centenary: Social structure, race and the transformation of the juvenile court. Punishment & Society, 1(2), 187–214.

Gavazzi, S. M., Yarcheck, C. M., & Lim, J. (2005). Ethnicity, gender, and global risk: Indicators in the lives of status offenders coming to the attention of the juvenile court. International Journal of Offender Therapy and Comparative Criminology, 49(6), 696–710.

Holden, G. A., & Kapler, R. A. (1995). Deinstitutionalizing status offenders: A record of progress. Juvenile Justice, 2(2), 3–10.

Stahl, A. L. (2008, February). Petitioned status offense cases in juvenile courts, 2004 [Fact sheet]. Retrieved from <http://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/ojdp/fs200802.pdf>

STOP SNITCHING CAMPAIGN

A highly controversial yet understudied area on the dynamics of the relationship between the police and minority communities is the Stop Snitching Campaign. The Stop Snitching Campaign stands for an informal approach primarily used to deter young African American men and others from becoming snitches. The Stop Snitching Campaign is an example of the divisiveness between policing practices and community relations in minority communities. This entry explores the polemics of the Stop Snitching Campaign and offers information on differing viewpoints of this social movement that was driven by the friction between race, crime, and justice in American minority communities.

A snitch is the colloquial term for police informants, usually known criminals who have access to criminal groups and are able to observe illegal activities. Snitches are viewed differently from other community residents who witness illegal activities and report them to the police. In most minority communities there is a distinct difference between offering crime information as a witness and offering it as a snitch. The Stop Snitching Campaign that became popular in many minority communities across the United States targeted those individuals, mainly offenders, who in exchange for their information are able to receive leniency for their crimes and in some cases financial rewards. The use of snitches or police informants is not new in American policing crime-control practices. However, the Stop Snitching Campaign painted a different picture of this practice. The social movement was a deliberate public attempt to persuade young Black men to stop the practice of snitching, believing it had created an indelible and noxious presence in Black and Latina/o communities.

The Stop Snitching Campaign involved multiple players and included Black celebrities and hip-hop artists, law enforcement officials, politicians, and social activists. The social demonstration against snitching acquired momentum in 2004 when a DVD prompting people not to snitch widely circulated the streets of minority neighborhoods. Following this, the campaign was marketed on the Internet, on DVDs, and on several garments such as caps and T-shirts. The DVD featured a rapper from Maryland, a National Basketball Association star, and others claiming to be drug dealers.

The Stop Snitching Campaign came under heavy scrutiny and scathing criticisms from law enforcement agents who construed it as an attack on witnesses and a serious threat to the information gathering needed to solve criminal and drug cases. The dependency on snitching is such a pervasive part of police work that without the assistance of known criminals, active drug dealers, gang members, and citizens, the arrest and prosecution of lawbreakers would be extremely difficult. As such, police agencies across the United States launched the Start Snitching/Keep Talking Campaign in response to the growing attention people were giving to the Stop Snitching Campaign. Equally, others in favor of snitching argue that it is an indispensable crime prevention strategy and that it encourages people to come forward and share information with the police. Still others claim that the Stop Snitching Campaign intimidates members of minority communities into not offering any information to the police, and this, in the end, will obstruct public safety efforts.

Despite the efforts of law enforcement to discredit the Stop Snitching Campaign movement, the tenor of the debate increased public awareness on the perpetuating racial problems that plague certain types of communities. The Stop Snitching Campaign, some will debate, highlights the overreliance of a practice that advertently creates distrust and a lack of community cohesion among residents. Some scholars have argued that snitches are pressured by officials to incriminate mostly friends and family. In addition, the divulgence of information to law enforcement officials about criminal activity has been questioned in terms of its reliability. The fact that snitches, at times, continue to commit crimes while working with law enforcement agents questions the ethics of such a practice.

The Stop Snitching Campaign is further viewed as a social demonstration on policing practices that result in the unprecedented high rates of imprisonment among young Black men from communities where snitching is ubiquitous. Those who oppose snitching further attest that the increase in the use of snitches in neighborhoods rife with disorder and distrust among residents will exacerbate the already fragile interpersonal relationships in these high-crime areas and weaken communal relations. The dissemination of Stop Snitching Campaign information opened up the discourse about race and crime and the polarized views on crime prevention strategies in minority communities. But equally important, on the individual level, it points out the dangers associated with being a police informant. The result of snitching could have high costs and lead to the victimization or death of the person involved with the exchange of information with police and court officials. Predictably, those who cooperate with law enforcement place themselves at risk of being labeled a betrayer and treated as a community pariah.

The goal of the campaign was to discourage cooperation with the police on criminal matters that would incriminate others, create community discord, and negatively add to the already troubled state of many minority communities. Although the Stop Snitching Campaign has waned since its inception, it is one of the most blatant portrayals of the diametrical views on crime prevention and control in African American and minority neighborhoods. An examination of the issues during the high peak moments of the Stop Snitching Campaign showed a racial divide between the techniques currently used by the police to gather crime information and the collateral consequences of those techniques on the levels of crime and social disorder in minority neighborhoods. The campaign has led to a call to reexamine the nature of police information gathering in minority communities and the heavy reliance of the justice system on information from snitches.

Patrice Morris and Vivian Pacheco

See also Code of the Streets; Drug Sentencing; Sentencing Disparities, African Americans

Further Readings

- Hill, M. L. (2006, February 24). Damned if you do. Damned if you don't. Retrieved from <http://www.popmatters.com/columns/hill/060224-1.shtml>
- Natapoff, A. (2004). Snitching: The institutional and communal consequences. University of Cincinnati Law Review, 73, 645–702.

STRAIN THEORY

Strain theory proposes that socially generated pressure, and the negative emotions that flow from such pressure, drives people to commit crime. Researchers' attention to this pressure, or strain, evokes more than 60 years of scholarship that tracks Robert Merton in the 1930s, Albert Cohen in the 1950s, Richard Cloward and Lloyd Ohlin in the 1960s, and Robert Agnew in the 1980s to 2000s. Although differing in detail, each of these traditions centers on a disparity between shared ambitions and failure in realizing those ambitions as a source of crime among disadvantaged groups. Each argues that we aspire to achieve some manner of success but that segments of the population are prevented from doing so through legal channels, such as a good job or quality education.

Strain in Society

Marking the inception of research in this area, Robert Merton argued that a socially induced disjunction between culturally valued goals and the means available for their attainment facilitates an anomic breakdown, or state of deregulation, leading to high rates of deviance. As opposed to Émile Durkheim's earlier conceptualization of anomie as an abnormal, pathological phenomenon, this social-structural formulation presumed that the U.S. market economy of the 1930s, a utilitarian culture that placed great emphasis on the conditions of success and failure, was characterized by a built-in disposition toward moral normlessness amid the "American dream" ideal. Here, the link between strain and delinquency is instrumental as delinquency becomes a way of obtaining what one wants but cannot get through legitimate channels.

Adaptations

Individuals facing such pressures, particularly those in the lower socioeconomic classes who are at a disadvantage, are thought to have a number of ways to respond to the stressful situation of being unable to achieve monetary success through legitimate channels. Robert Merton described the possible adaptations as innovation, conformity, ritualism, retreatism, and rebellion.

Most crime manifests through a process of innovation. Innovators remain allegiant to monetary culture goals but find they cannot succeed through education, a legitimate career, or other legitimate paths. Although adaptations focus primarily on the lower classes due to the potential for inadequate socialization in that social stratum, innovation may take form in variants of White-collar crime and in more traditional operations such as prostitution, drug dealing, or robbery. Despite the foundational work's relative lack of attention to the precise factors that determine whether one reacts to blocked goals by innovating, so-called Mertonian strain theory predicts that those who are less likely to internalize dominant societal norms are more likely to violate such norms in the pursuit of goals.

Conformists generally accept cultural goals (e.g., monetary success) and institutionalized means (e.g., education, legitimate career) and strive to achieve wealth through "approved" middle-class values. In stable societies, most persons will choose conformity; because such behavior aligns with basic societal values, Merton argued that conformity is critical for the stable formation and sustainment of society.

The third adaptation, ritualism, might best be depicted by novelist Herman Melville's well-known character Bartleby, the scrivener: a man who would "prefer not to" face life on life's terms. Although ritualists reject the goal of material success, they concentrate on retaining what little is to be gained by adhering to norms such as honesty and hard work. Retreatists, in contrast, drop out:

They withdraw from society by rejecting both the cultural goals of material success and the conventional means of achieving this success, often through excessive substance use. Rebellion, the final adaptation, is marked by individuals who replace societal values with new ones, values that can be political (e.g., socialist renewal) or spiritual (e.g., transcendence) or can take other forms.

It is important to note that adaptations are not static personality traits; instead, they are better viewed as a choice of behaviors in response to strain. Individuals may develop patterns of behavior that draw on several adaptations simultaneously, as in innovation, retreatism, and rebellion being brought to bear by a drug-abusing, spiritual huckster espousing higher forms of enlightenment for his adherents. In short, crime and delinquency tie in most directly with innovation (primarily), retreatism, and rebellion.

Delinquent Boys

As a point of contrast to the claim that the link between strain and delinquency is primarily utilitarian, Albert Cohen argued that the “facts” of delinquency suggest otherwise: that most delinquency is nonutilitarian, malicious, and negativistic (i.e., most delinquents do not hurt or steal for money, but do so for the “hell of it”) and that delinquency is a by-product of lower- and working-class gang formation.

Here, schools provide the testing ground for criminogenesis in that children of lower social class are unprepared for the behavioral and educational expectations (“measuring rods”) that dominate middle-class culture. As a result of the strain, some youth undergo a “reaction formation” and commit malicious, negativistic crimes owing to their lack of stature in the status hierarchy and their rejection of middle-class standards.

One solution to this strain is the formation of a separate, delinquent subculture in which the working-class boy can compete successfully. The delinquent subculture provides an alternative avenue to status: one that explicitly repudiates the middle-class standards that had placed the child at such a disadvantage in the first place. Rather than strained individuals using illegitimate channels to achieve their goals, Albert Cohen argues that delinquents construct a new set of goals and means altogether.

Delinquency and Opportunity

But what of lower-class juveniles who appear to resist both a utilitarian and nonutilitarian criminal calculus? As Richard Cloward and Lloyd Ohlin questioned, why do some strained youth engage in delinquent adaptations or join delinquent subcultures, while other youth choose stable “corner-boy” responses? The corner-boy response may involve nonconforming behaviors, such as truancy, but generally does not include violent acts that repudiate middle-class standards.

In an effort to answer this question, the researchers focused on the relationship between community dynamics and strain. More specifically, they argued that while some delinquency is, in fact, based on a rejection of middle-class values, these delinquents tend to engage in less-serious offenses. The more-serious offenders, on the other hand, are more utilitarian in their outlook: They desire money more than status, and their desire to spend money is conspicuous in nature. Rather than wishing to live by middle-class standards, these juveniles wish to achieve status on their own terms.

Importance of Community Dynamics

Richard Cloward and Lloyd Ohlin align with Robert Merton by arguing that most lower-class youth are blocked (or anticipate being blocked) from achieving goals of monetary success but that their conspicuous emphasis on acquiring and spending money is uniquely lower-class in nature. Perhaps most importantly, the dynamics of the community within which an anticipated goal blockage is nested will determine whether delinquency will emanate. Thus, Cloward and Ohlin assert that delinquent subcultures are necessary to translate strain into crime because social support acts as an enabler. If an individual’s neighborhood is highly disorganized, a “conflict” subculture will form that is violence-oriented (and harkens back to Albert Cohen’s model for a delinquent subculture). Due to the social disorganization of the neighborhood, few illegal opportunities are available to offset the lack of legal opportunities.

Mentors are few, whether conventional or deviant. As opposed to earning status through personal connections, technical skills, or even mere physical strength, status is earned by one's willingness to risk personal harm.

If an individual's neighborhood is more integrated, a "criminal" subculture forms where older criminals mentor younger ones in obtaining money and power through offenses such as theft and extortion. As described by Ross Matsueda and colleagues, the criminal subculture's illicit acts lead to success as conventionally defined and are marked by relatively organized slums with relatively stable relationships between both young and old criminals and conventional and criminal elements.

Related to one's degree of unequal access, individuals who have failed in both legitimate and illegitimate worlds (and have thereby relinquished both goals and means, legitimate and illegitimate) will join "retreatist" subcultures focused primarily on the consumption of illicit substances. These individuals are in effect "double failures" who have prospects in neither prosocial nor criminal activities.

General Strain Theory

After many years of prominence, strain theory received strong criticism during the 1970s as research began to suggest a weak relationship between the disjunction of aspirations and expectations for success and the theory's inability to explain middle-class delinquency. Other criticisms focused on the apparent inability of strain theory to explain variability in delinquency, such as why many delinquents go for long periods without committing delinquent acts, why many strained individuals respond in a conventional manner, and how family-related variables such as marital adjustment and parental discipline relate to delinquency.

Robert Agnew responded to the criticism with a social psychological strain theory that attempted to address criticism by reframing the issue: Rather than treating strain as a blockage of goal-seeking like his predecessors, the revised theory argued that the blockage of pain avoidance more closely resonates with adolescents' life realities as they are often in aversive situations from which they have no legal means of escape. Later, Agnew elaborated on the social-psychological ethos with general strain theory

(GST) in 1992. Finding its theoretical lineage in the earlier models, GST emphasizes how negative relations create pressure toward crime and delinquency. Defined as relationships in which an individual is not treated as he or she would like to be treated, strain is thought to increase negative emotions (anger primarily, but also fear, guilt, or depression) and to increase the need for corrective action, with crime being one such response. Although most research on GST has focused on juvenile populations, the theory has also been applied to adult populations and to deprived communities.

Whereas life stressors can number in the many hundreds, GST is organized around three scenarios in which individuals are likely to feel they are being treated badly: when others (1) prevent, or threaten to prevent, an individual from achieving positively valued goals; (2) remove, or threaten to remove, positively valued stimuli; or (3) present, or threaten to present, negatively valued stimuli. Therefore, GST extends strain theory's focus on the disjunction between aspirations and expectations.

GST advances a range of factors that influence whether an individual adapts to strain using delinquent or nondelinquent means. The theory points to cognitive, behavioral, and emotional adaptations to strain conditioned by personal and social resources to include deviant attitudes, deviant peers, and external attribution. Additionally, the theory draws attention to the impact of magnitude, recency, duration, and clustering of strainful events inasmuch as adverse events are more influential under these conditions.

"Strain" can be thought of as a distal cause of crime; it is through the processes of mediation and conditioning that crime is explained. Negative affect is presented as mediating the relationship between strain and crime, while other variables condition strain's effect on crime. As a response to criticism of GST's breadth, Robert Agnew recently completed narrative reviews of GST and attempted to tighten unnecessary amorphism by specifying the types of strain that appear to be most associated with crime. Agnew's review points to strains such as verbal and physical assaults, parental rejection, and poor school performance as being associated with crime. Among other factors, an expected failure to achieve educational or occupational success and a youth's unpopularity with peers have little association with crime.

Strain and Race

Researchers have begun to explore general strain theory's ability to account for demographic differences in crime with regard to gender and race and have begun to assess the theory among youth in different cultures and economic systems—subpopulations that have generally received little attention regarding the impact of stress on offending. With regard to race, researchers have found that discrimination (as a form of strain) is associated with feelings of anger, depression, and subsequently with aggression as a necessary interpersonal tactic. In short, race has been found to be a marker for increased risk of stress exposure.

The Way Forward

Robert Agnew's recent elaborations also provide guidance on the way forward. Outlining gaps in the literature and lessons learned, he recommends that the next wave of research on GST use strain-specific data resources, explore the utility of strain in new contexts (e.g., more robust discussions of race), and be more explicit about the conditions that facilitate crime. To the last point, research specifies that strains appear to be more likely to lead to crime when they are seen as unjust, high in magnitude, and associated with low social control and when they create pressure or incentive to engage in criminal coping.

Stephen K. Rice

See also Code of the Streets; Culture Conflict Theory; Racism

Further Readings

- Agnew, R. (1992). Foundation for a general strain theory of crime and delinquency. Criminology, 30, 47–87.
- Agnew, R. (1999). A general strain theory of community differences in crime rates. Journal of Research in Crime and Delinquency, 36, 123–155.
- Agnew, R. (2001). Building on the foundation of general strain theory: Specifying the types of strain most likely to lead to crime and delinquency. Journal of Research in Crime and Delinquency, 38, 319–361.
- Agnew, R. (2006). Pressured into crime: An overview of general strain theory. Los Angeles: Roxbury.

- Agnew, R., & White, H. R. (1992). An empirical test of general strain theory. Criminology, 30, 475–499.
- Cloward, R. A., & Ohlin, L. E. (1960). Delinquency and opportunity: A theory of delinquent gangs. New York: The Free Press.
- Cohen, A. K. (1955). Delinquent boys: The culture of the gang. Glencoe, IL: The Free Press.
- Merton, R. K. (1938). Social structure and anomie. American Sociological Review, 3, 672–682.
- Vold, G. B., Bernard, T. J., & Snipes, J. B. (2002). Theoretical criminology (5th ed.). New York: Oxford University Press.

STRUCTURAL–CULTURAL PERSPECTIVE

In the social sciences, specifically criminology, the structural–cultural perspective is an alternative theoretical model that explains how social problems in Black communities are the result of structural-level inequalities and dysfunctional cultural response patterns. This emerging theory introduces the role of race in creating structural constraints that are systematically embodied in community-level contexts and attribute to high crime rates within the African American community.

Proposed in the 1980s by William Oliver, the structural–cultural perspective introduces an integrated theory that combines structural conditions and cultural adjustments to such environments in the field of criminology. Oliver, who applied the theory in several writings, suggests that the causes of social problems and violence among African Americans are associated with disproportionate opportunities created by various social structures in the United States. He used the perspective in his earlier works to explore the alternative image of masculinity among African American males. Oliver proposed that racial oppression has led to a dysfunctional masculine identity that is associated with violence and aggressive behavior. He also used the theory to examine other forms of violence within the African American community, theorizing ways for improving social problems by using the perspective as a basis for refining the Afrocentric ideology. In the 1990s, Douglas S. Massey and Nancy A. Denton incorporated structural and cultural factors, suggesting that residential isolation and poverty is the product of structural inequalities rooted in racial discrimination. Robert Sampson and William Julius Wilson integrated both factors when exploring community-level crime patterns and structural inequalities in underprivileged communities.

Basic Assumptions

The structural–cultural perspective is based on two basic assumptions. The first assumption is that structural constraints contribute to increasing social problems among African Americans. Oliver uses the term structural pressures to refer to the structural transmission of White supremacy through education, economics, and the workforce. He suggests that these social institutions were produced by prevailing prejudice, racism, and discrimination. Therefore, the same inequalities that are used to create these social structures are responsible for social constraints that hinder the advancement and progression of the African American communities.

The second assumption of the structural–cultural perspective draws on the inadequate response to racial discrimination and prejudice among African Americans. Dysfunctional cultural adaptation is a term that refers to the form of group response that African Americans use to culturally adapt in disadvantaged structural and cultural settings. Instead of adequately responding to racial discrimination and prejudice, this assumption suggests that Blacks have dysfunctionally adjusted to conditions of structural inequalities.

Two Major Problems of Dysfunctional Cultural Adaptations

An underdeveloped Afrocentric thought and the tendency of Black males to embrace nonconventional identities of masculinity are two major problems of dysfunctional cultural adaptations. The lack of success African Americans have achieved developing a collective Afrocentric identity is directly associated with the sociohistorical projection of minorities throughout various social institutions in the United States. In the educational system, religious philosophy, and other agents of socialization, the contributions made to the growth and the development of the United States by minorities are often excluded. Socializing agents tend to attribute major contributions and accomplishments to individuals of European descent, which depicts Whites in superior and authoritative roles. Whites are inherently perceived as civilized, attractive, scholarly, and desirable, whereas non-Whites are considered as uncivilized, unattractive, ignorant, and undesirable. Thus, these images became ingrained in the sociopsychological thought of both Whites and non-Whites, affecting each group differently. Whereas Whiteness becomes accepted and embraced, non-Whiteness is often rejected and regarded as insignificant. The image and cultural identity of Blackness is demised, and individuals of color have difficulty developing a Black cultural identity.

The second major problem of dysfunctional cultural adaptations is the tendency of African American males to embrace nontraditional identities of masculinity. William Oliver suggests that manhood depends on the ability for males to attach themselves to the roles that constitute masculinity within any given society. In the United States, traditional masculinity is achieved when an individual is able to provide for his household, is emotionally stable, and has achieved economic stability. Because a society has various sets of accepted gender-based behaviors and roles, factors such as race, ethnicity, and social positioning affect men's ability to successfully achieve masculinity.

Environmental constraints, such as unemployment and poor education, are other barriers that make it difficult for men in racial minority groups to adapt to traditional male gender roles. When racial groups are systematically deprived of equal access to economic success, political power, and educational opportunities, they tend to be disproportionately disadvantaged. These disadvantages create restraints that limit the skills and resources needed to enact traditional male gender roles.

In the United States, African American men are viewed as threatening by many Whites. As a result, many Black men experience systematic forms of oppression that are embedded in structural and cultural contexts. Social institutions condition Black men to adapt to dysfunctional roles and behaviors to counteract oppressive conditions. During this process, African American men are subject to receiving messages of inferiority through various agents of socialization. When Black men are not able to achieve traditional gender roles, they tend to develop other meanings of masculinity within that particular racial group. These nontraditional definitions tend to portray Black men as “tough guys,” “players,” or both. These definitions are then passed from one generation to the next generation. Over time, various agents of socialization convey White supremacy to Black males and aid in the development of an inferiority complex. This course of action is referred to as the inferiorization process.

“Tough Guys” and “Players”

In the United States, many Black men have disproportionate rates of unemployment, incarceration, and illiteracy as a result of institutionalized racism. Therefore, many construct culturally specific masculine identities to adapt to institutionalized forms of White racism. Instead of adopting the roles of protectors and providers of communities, many are often viewed as being responsible for dysfunction and panic within these neighborhoods. The development of these nontraditional roles of masculinity has contributed to the formation of “tough guy” and “player” identities among Black males.

The lack of skills, education, and economic success has also attributed to the construction of a culturally specific tough guy identity. Adherence to this tough guy identity plays a significant role in Black-on-Black crime and domestic violence within the African American community. Because Black men disproportionately commit community-level crimes, neighborhood residents often fear them. Some Black men adapt the tough guy identity by committing spousal abuse, homicides, and other forms of violent behavior. The adaptation of this identity has led to the high rates of crime in Black neighborhoods and a generalized fear of Black men.

In addition to violence, Black males also adapt the roles of players, by engaging in sexual promiscuity. Culturally, the transition from adolescence to adulthood for Black men is often based on sexual conquest. When Black men accept the role of players, they tend to disrespect women and exploit them sexually disproportionately. Because of this role adherence, Black males are viewed as highly sexual, violent, and dangerous. Traditional roles of masculinity depict men as monogamous individuals who are responsible for the family household. Unfortunately, many poor and uneducated Black men experience structural-level constraints that have emerged from a history of systematic racism and oppression. These environmental constraints make it difficult for poor Black males to provide for their families and households; thus teenage mothers and female-headed households in poverty are common among Black families.

Although the structural–cultural perspective is used to explain social problems and crime, the adoption of a communal Afrocentric perspective would prove beneficial in improving social problems in the African American community. Afrocentricity is a standpoint that is founded on traditional African societies, beliefs, and principles that is used to reestablish the influence of African culture in a contemporary African American society. It recognizes historical injustices experienced by Africans and African Americans, identifies the day-to-day oppression that African Americans face, and promotes methods for navigating through systems of oppression. It involves socializing Black youth with Afrocentric values through the family, church, and mass media. This intervention process encourages Black youth and adults to remove constraints that hinder cultural and structural achievement.

LaSheila S. Yates

See also Race Relations; Racialization of Crime; Sentencing Disparities, African Americans

Further Readings

- Massey, D. S., & Denton, N. A. (1993). American apartheid: Segregation and the making of the underclass. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Oliver, W. (1984). Black males and the tough guy image: A dysfunctional compensatory adaptation. Western Journal of Black Studies, 8, 199–203.
- Oliver, W. (1989). Black males and social problems: Prevention through Afrocentric socialization. Journal of Black Studies, 20, 15–39.
- Oliver, W. (1989). Sexual conquest and patterns of Black-on-Black violence: A structural-cultural perspective. Violence and Victims, 4, 257–273.
- Oliver, W. (1994). The violent social world of Black men. New York: Lexington Books.

- Oliver, W. (2003). The structural-cultural perspective: A theory of Black male violence. In D. F. Hawkins (Ed.), Violent crime: Assessing race and ethnic differences (pp. 280–318). Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Sampson, R. J., & Wilson, W. J. (1995). Toward a theory of race, crime, and urban inequality. In J. Hagan & R. D. Peterson (Eds.), Crime and inequality (pp. 37–54). Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.
- Wilson, W. J. (1987). The truly disadvantaged: The inner city, the underclass and public policy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

SUBCULTURE OF VIOLENCE THEORY

The subculture of violence refers to a set of norms, values, or attitudes that exist within a group and in which violence is an accepted part of the lifestyle of that group. In general, a subculture is formed by those who share something in common, such as class, ethnicity, religion, or place of residence. Social science theorists have observed that subcultures may establish social norms that are in opposition to those of the society at large, such as those regarding violence. A subculture of violence is characterized by its members' shared belief that violence is part of a way of life, a way to end disputes, and a way to gain respect and prove one's manhood. In the United States, subcultures of violence are commonly associated with certain regions or groups of people, for example, among young urban minority males and in the rural South, though such subcultures exist in other nations as well. This entry reviews the history of the subculture of violence theory, outlines its main theoretical contributions, and describes several instances of subcultures of violence outside the United States.

The emergence of the concept of subcultures in social science following World War II introduced a new phenomenon for study. It led social scientists, especially criminologists, to explore how a subpopulation's behavior could be influenced by their acceptance of a set of values that deviated from those of mainstream society. Thus, members of a given subculture that has different norms regarding crime will pursue activities that conflict with the law, bringing them into contact with the criminal justice system and affecting its ability to deter crime. The subculture of violence began to be researched frequently in the 1950s and 1960s and has continued up to the present day.

Pioneering Research

Albert K. Cohen, in his 1955 book Delinquent Boys, examined the subculture of urban, low-income working-class youth who were gang members. Cohen argued that subcultures form because individuals share the same beliefs, values, or experiences and find comfort in being with others who are similar. In this subculture the boys' hostility toward middle-class norms led them to create their own oppositional system of values, which legitimated violence against others and destruction of property.

Many observers have noted the persistence of such subcultures in low-income urban neighborhoods, particularly those with large African American populations. Young males who feel alienated from middle-class values and unable to succeed on those terms instead create their own value system that involves objectives they are able to obtain, such as enhanced social status based on the perpetration of violent acts. This is often seen in relation to rivalry between gangs, in which young men fight each other to gain recognition. In this way a subculture arises, with its own rules and codes of behavior.

Walter B. Miller furthered the work of Cohen in the study of subcultures. In an article that appeared in the Journal of Social Issues in 1958, Miller detailed his explanation for subcultures based on research he conducted that focused on the differences between the cultures of the middle and lower social classes. Within lower-class culture, certain traits and beliefs are valued that are not valued within the dominant, middle-class structure. These include the knack for getting into trouble and avoiding consequences, exhibiting physical toughness, having street sense and being able to outsmart someone else, seeking excitement, and believing that things are left up to fate. Members of such an inner-city community might emphasize toughness and outsmarting others because their neighborhood is a violent place where being able to defend oneself is important.

Richard Cloward and Lloyd Ohlin took the idea of subcultures further in their 1960 book Delinquency and Opportunity: A Theory of Delinquent Gangs, which was based on their field research. In this book, the authors detail the lives of members of a delinquent subculture. Individuals within the gang prize violence and fighting as a way to gain respect for themselves and their gang. Physical aggression is accepted and expected when rival gangs battle. Like Miller, Cloward and Ohlin argue that one reason subcultures form is the inability of their members to achieve success on the terms dictated by mainstream society; in reaction, they band together to create an oppositional set of values. For example, those who are unable to achieve financial success might value dominance through physical aggression.

The subculture of violence theory gained further recognition with the 1967 publication of Marvin Wolfgang and Franco Ferracuti's The Subculture of Violence: Towards an Integrated Theory in Criminology, which integrated both psychological and sociological constructs to explain deviant behavior in a subculture. The authors included such sociological constructs as culture conflict, differential association, and theories pertaining to social systems and personality. From psychology they incorporated theories on socialization, as well as learning and conditioning. Wolfgang and Ferracuti argued that the violence of such subcultures is passed down through cultural transmission in which the subculture itself serves as a learning environment.

On the basis of research conducted by Wolfgang in 1958 on homicide in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Wolfgang and Ferracuti concluded that the highest rates of homicide were found within a mainly homogeneous subcultural group in an urban community and also in some rural communities. Wolfgang and Ferracuti's subculture of violence thesis included the notion that those within the subculture are not entirely different from those in the larger culture; they differ only in the norms they hold regarding certain issues such as violence. Also, individuals who are part of a subculture of violence are not violent in every situation; there are rules and norms for when violence is appropriate to use and when it is not. Although the belief that violence is acceptable is shared by those of all ages within the subculture, it is especially prominent among males in later adolescence to middle age. Wolfgang and Ferracuti argue that violence within a subculture is learned and that those who use violence within this alternate culture do not have to deal with feelings of guilt for using violence, because violence is accepted in their culture.

In inner cities, the subculture of violence is most prominent among youth gangs. However, neighborhood residents are well aware that the culture of violence exists and that violent incidents are all too commonplace. Many minority males are concentrated within these inner-city neighborhoods and subscribe to this subculture of violence. Gangs are often divided along racial lines, so that subcultures exist within subcultures. A larger subculture of violence may exist in a disadvantaged neighborhood, and each gang may have its own customs regarding the appropriate use of violence in situations.

Recent Research

Elijah Anderson presents a current contribution and application of the subculture of violence thesis in his research in the 1990s on inner-city communities. He argues that there is a "code of the streets" that young African American men living in these communities abide by. For example, according to the code, the way to respond to someone disrespecting you is with violence. This subculture influences the lives of all community residents. Anderson argues that although there are those that may not live by the code, they still must act a certain way on the street to avoid violence and harm.

A subculture of violence is also related to the environment of urban women and certain roles they undertake. Women who work as prostitutes find themselves immersed in a subculture of violence. Many of these women have experienced violence throughout childhood and as adults; as sex workers they may be subject to violence from the men they serve as customers and the men they work for, known as pimps. These women come to regard violence as a normal part of life and may themselves use violence against other women, their own children, or the men in their lives.

Much research has focused on subcultures of violence in cities; however, subcultures of violence also exist in rural areas. A number of researchers have examined the connection between high levels of violence seen in the southern United States and a subculture of violence, especially racial violence, and particularly among rural Whites. The subculture of violence in the South, with its historical recourse to vigilante justice, is rooted in events associated with slavery, the exploitation of the Southern states by the North after the Union victory in the Civil War, and the code of honor upheld by many southerners who identified themselves with the antebellum southern aristocracy. Religion can contribute to an acceptance of violence in some subcultures, particularly in rural areas. A principle such as “an eye for an eye” can be viewed as a guiding principle that can justify violence.

The southwestern United States has long been associated with tolerance for a subculture of violence, including vigilante justice, as portrayed in countless “dime novels,” western movies, and television series. Among the southwestern rural population, extralegal violence has sometimes been justified by readings of biblical texts that support the principle of “an eye for an eye.”

Civic involvement is one of the factors that may reduce an individual’s participation in a violent subculture through increasing that person’s investment in mainstream society and its norms.

Subcultures of Violence in Other Nations

There is ample evidence that subcultures of violence exist outside the United States. In 2008, Jukka Savolainen, Martti Lehti, and Janne Kivivuori published the findings of their research in Finland in the journal Homicide Studies. In this study, the authors examined homicide rates in Finland from 1750 to 2000. They found that Finland has seen an increase in post–World War II lethal violence in certain regions and within certain populations in the country. The regions that have experienced homicide rate increases are those that have been plagued by long periods of high unemployment rates and increased migration of citizens out of the area. These authors also found that alcohol consumption has played a role in Finnish homicide rates.

The authors’ examination of the data led them to conclude that the persisting homicide rate in Finland is a result of a subculture of violence and not, for example, the national economic welfare system or the structure of government. Finnish homicide rates deviate from other western European nations, beginning in the 19th century. The data reveal that the highest rates of homicide are found among a particular population: Middle-age, uneducated, and unemployed men who reside in semi-rural areas and drink alcohol account for large proportions of violence in Finland. This population has built a subculture of violence separate from the mainstream Finnish culture. Its members generally do not kill for monetary or material gain. The violence is often a result of conflicts that arise while drinking in private homes. When a dispute arises, differences are settled by violence. The men who make up this subculture have little incentive from the government to refrain from using violence; little social support is offered to them to pursue a mainstream Finnish middle-class lifestyle. Thus they act outside the norms, using their own rules and guidelines to live by, which include the use of violence.

Another subculture of violence can be seen in Colombia in connection with the trafficking of narcotics. Colombia’s history includes many episodes of violence, civic and political; however, today the violence has become concentrated in a subculture of those involved in the drug trade, who use and accept violence as part of everyday life and as a way to settle disagreements. The Colombian illicit drug industry draws heavily on the peasant population, and historically peasants have often settled disputes in villages with violence; this in turn has influenced the world of drug trafficking. The subculture of violence associated with drug trafficking in Colombia has been elevated further to include acts of terrorism. Those involved believe that violence is acceptable not only against those involved in the trade but also against others who are not. This group accepts violence as a norm, as an accepted means to an end, regardless of outside influences or attempted interventions from their own or other nations’ governments.

Shelly Clevenger

See also At-Risk Youth; Code of the Streets; Cool Pose; Focal Concerns Theory; Structural–Cultural Perspective

Further Readings

- Anderson, E. (2000). Code of the street: Decency, violence, and the moral life of the inner city. New York: Norton.
- Bibes, P. (2001). Transnational organized crime and terrorism: Colombia, a case study. Journal of Contemporary Criminal Justice, 17(3), 243–258.
- Cloward, R., & Ohlin, L. (1960). Delinquency and opportunity: A theory of delinquent gangs. Glencoe, IL: The Free Press.
- Cohen, A. K. (1955). Delinquent boys. Glencoe, IL: The Free Press.
- Dixon, J., & Lizotte, A. J. (1987). Gun ownership and the southern subculture of violence. American Journal of Sociology, 93, 383–405.
- Hackney, S. (1969). Southern violence. American Historical Review, 74, 906–925.
- Lee, M. R., & Bartowski, J. P. (2004). Civic participation, regional subcultures, and violence: The differential effects of secular and religious participation on adult and juvenile homicide. Homicide Studies, 8(1), 5–39.
- Miller, W. B. (1958). Lower class culture as a generating milieu of gang delinquency. Journal of Social Issues, 14, 5–19.
- Parker, K. F., & Pruitt, M. V. (2000). How the West was one: Explaining the similarities in race-specific homicide rates in the West and South. Social Forces, 78, 1483–1508.
- Savolainen, J., Lehti, M., & Kivivuori, J. (2008). Historical origins of a cross-national puzzle: Homicide in Finland, 1750 to 2000. Homicide Studies, 12(1), 67–89.
- Surratt, H. L., Inciardi, J. A., Kurtz, S. P., & Kiley, M. C. (2004). Sex work and drug use in a subculture of violence. Crime & Delinquency, 50(1), 43–59.
- Wolfgang, M. E., & Ferracuti, F. (1967). The subculture of violence: Towards an integrated theory in criminology. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

SUPERMAX PRISONS

Over the past 25 years, changes in correctional policies at federal and state levels have resulted in the creation of supermax housing for inmates in more than 44 states. Supermax prisons are defined as prisons, or separate housing units within maximum-security prisons, designed for the secure control of inmates who have engaged in the following activities in prison settings: (a) committed violent or assaultive behavior against other inmates or staff in another institution, (b) have had difficulty following the rules in lower prison security settings, or (c) have been defined as an inmate who requires housing in a more controlled and restrictive prison setting for some other reason associated with being a threat to institutional security. Thus, these facilities are said to have been designed to house inmates described as the “worst of the worst,” hardened criminals, and inmates who are unable to be controlled through other means.

There is no uniform term used consistently by correctional officials when referring to supermax facilities. For example, a review of the literature reveals that supermax facilities have been referred to as special housing units, intensive prison management units, maxi-maxi, secured housing units, and administrative maximum units. Regardless of the term used, supermax facilities have two primary goals: to isolate disruptive inmates from the general population and to serve as a deterrent for future misbehavior on the part of inmates.

Supermax prisons house a growing number of inmates. Currently, it is estimated that more than 25,000 inmates in the United States reside in some form of supermax housing. As supermax prisons have grown in popularity across the country, a significant number of minority inmates have been subject to the extreme restrictions associated with life in such institutions. According to Relly, two thirds of inmates in supermax facilities are minorities. Supermax prison populations vary from state to state, ranging from a low of 1% of all offenders in one state to 5% in another. Given that African Americans and Hispanics comprise 60% of all inmates sentenced to 1 year or more in prison, it is expected that the supermax prison environment has a dramatic impact on the incarceration experiences of minorities.

Driving Forces

There are several reasons why there has been a dramatic increase in the number of supermax facilities. First, in the 1980s when the first supermax prisons appeared, there was a significant increase in prison violence, riots, and correctional staff killed by inmates housed in maximum-security facilities. The federal penitentiary in Marion, Illinois, considered to be the first supermax prison by many, experienced significant inmate violence, which resulted in the death of two correctional officers in 1983. As a result of the deaths of the correctional officers, the federal penitentiary in Marion placed inmates on 23-hour-a-day lockdown and implemented numerous other policies restricting inmate movement and outside contact. Other states modeled their supermax programs after the federal penitentiary in Marion in response to their own increases in institutional violence and loss of institutional control in maximum-security prison settings. At the same time, many correctional officials associated the loss of institutional control in maximum-security settings with the fact that there were few options for dealing with disruptive inmates who were already serving long sentences in the most restrictive environments available at the time. Finally, the creation of additional supermax units received widespread public support. Public support was in part a result of the “get tough” attitude en vogue at the time and a consequence of the tough economic times that hit rural communities starting in the 1980s. Supermax prisons were seen as a boon to rural economies.

Characteristics

Although the terms used to define supermax prisons vary, there are certain common characteristics associated with prison or unit operations. Prison design reflects an emphasis on security and control. Supermax buildings or housing units are designed to minimize inmate movement, increase the ability of correctional officers to observe inmates, and isolate the inmates from negative prison influences. Thus, supermax prisons built within the past 10 years have significant architectural and technological advancements not seen in other types of correctional facilities, such as closed-circuit television; the provision of medical and psychological treatment services via remote technology; and the use of robotics for the delivery of food, opening doors, and closing inmate cell doors. Moreover, in most supermax facilities, inmates are single-celled, locked down for 23 hours a day, receive only 1 hour of recreation (which may or may not take place outside prison walls), and have limited contact with correctional staff and visitors. If visits with family or friends are allowed, these are no-contact visits. These facilities are often located in rural areas far away from the locations where inmates had previously lived and worked. Inmates are fed in their prison cells and rarely leave the institution, even for medical care or court appearances. The majority of supermax prisons offer very limited rehabilitative program possibilities. When rehabilitative programming is offered, typically the service is one-on-one and conducted with bars separating the inmate from the service provider.

Related Issues

Recent literature reviews and research reports have identified several problematic areas related to incarceration in the highly restrictive supermax environment. One issue raised by detractors is the fact that the extreme isolation experienced by inmates housed in supermax facilities increases mental health problems (e.g., depression, suicide, and violent tendencies) among inmates rather than reducing problematic behaviors. Still others argue that as correctional agencies have struggled to fill beds in supermax facilities, correctional agencies have begun to house inmates who are not necessarily disciplinary problems in this more restrictive environment. For example, several states now house or intend to house their death row inmates in supermax facilities. Inmate gang members, regardless of whether the gang member has engaged in disruptive behaviors, are also being placed in supermax prisons. Moreover, critics of supermax prisons report that these facilities are more expensive than housing inmates in regular maximum-security prisons. Lawsuits are pending in several states over the constitutionality of supermax facilities; many argue that the prisons represent a violation of inmate rights and protections against cruel and unusual punishment. Supporters of supermax prisons continue to assert that regardless of cost or other negative consequences for inmates, supermax prison environments increase the safety and security of inmates, staff, and society.

Martha L. Henderson

See also Prison, Judicial Ghetto; Prison Gangs

Further Readings

- Mears, D. P. (2006, March). Evaluating the effectiveness of supermax prisons (Research Report, Urban Institute, Justice Policy Center). Retrieved from http://www.urban.org/UploadedPDF/411326_supermax_prisons.pdf
- Relly, J. E. (1999, April 29–May 5). Supermax: Inside, no one can hear you scream. Tucson Weekly. Retrieved from <http://www.tucsonweekly.com/tw/04-29-99/feat.htm>

SUPERPREDATORS

Superpredator is a term coined by John Dilulio to capture the spirit of immoral, violent, and out-of-control juveniles. In a 1995 article titled “The Coming of the Super-Predators,” Dilulio predicted that the juvenile crime and delinquency rates were headed for epidemic proportions. This anticipated epidemic led to social and political outcries for less pampering of juveniles and more punitive treatment. Scholars have given significant attention to discussing the literature on superpredators. To that aim, this entry defines and describes the nature of the superpredator, reviews legislative and judicial responses that represented a more punitive approach to dealing with superpredators, and considers the impact of these policies on juveniles, particularly African Americans.

The Concept of Superpredators

Juveniles of the late 20th and early 21st centuries are described as being better educated and confident than any previous generation. Yet, the label “superpredators” has been attached to some of these youth; they are described as being materialistic, egoistic, apathetic, irresponsible, and amoral, and ultimately are stereotyped as being a generation that is dangerous and unconscionable. Scholars postulate that the decadent behavior of these juveniles results from their exposure to negative events (e.g., poverty, graphic violence, broken families, and sexual abuse) that predict the likelihood of engaging in crime and delinquency. For example, the National Center for Children in Poverty (NCCP) indicated in 2004 that approximately 18% of all children in the United States lived in poverty. After hitting a low of 12.1 million children in 2000, more than 1.4 million children have been added to the poverty rolls, becoming members of this country’s “new poor.” After a decade of decline, the NCCP’s September 2007 report indicated that the proportion of children living in low-income families is increasing again, a trend that began in 2000. In 2006, the overall child poverty rate was 17%; the rate was 33% for African Americans and 27% for Hispanics. Children who grow up in poverty experience significant hardships that can have lasting effects well into adulthood and can contribute to joblessness and incarceration.

Juveniles are bombarded with graphic violence in the media. For example, approximately 98% of all households in the United States have a television. These households operate their televisions on an average of 28 hours per week, exposing teenagers to approximately 23 hours per week and younger youth to approximately 2 to 11 hours per week. As a result, children are exposed to approximately 8,000 murders and 100,000 other acts of violence on television by the time they have completed elementary school. According to the American Psychiatric Association, these figures double by the age of 18.

Juveniles who have been victims of sexual abuse are more likely to engage in delinquent behavior. Girls are more likely to be victimized by family members and often respond by running away from home, which leads to street-level crimes, such as prostitution, theft, and selling drugs, as well as further abuse and exploitation of others.

Juveniles born to single-parent families are subjected to more strain, partly because of limited financial support, a lack of parental supervision, and a negative school experience. Among African American families, this phenomenon is exacerbated by the high rate of male incarceration. In the United States, African Americans comprise 12% of the population; yet, 1 in 13 of all adult African American males are incarcerated in a prison or jail. In fact, an African American boy has a 32% chance of being incarcerated at some point in his life, compared to a 17% chance for Hispanics and a 6% chance for Whites. For African American women, the incarceration rate is not as high as it is for African American men, but it is increasing more rapidly; the growth trend is alarming by doubling the rate for men; the incarceration rate for African American women grew 267% between 1985 and 2000 in federal and state prisons.

Although research indicates that there is a direct correlation between juveniles' exposure to negative events and their involvement in crime and delinquency, this correlation fails to explain the decline in crime and delinquency rates during the 1990s, particularly for numerous major cities. A significant example is the murder rate for teenagers, which tripled from 1985 to 1993 but has since sharply declined. Despite this trend, some scholars continue to argue that society should remain punitive. Notably, from 1985 to 1993, the murder rate for teenagers tripled before making a sharp decline. When crime and delinquency statistics are disaggregated, there is further evidence of the superpredator myth. For example, in 2005, although murder arrest rates were higher among Blacks under the age of 18, Whites under the age of 18 had higher arrest rates for forcible rape, robbery, aggravated assault, burglary, larceny-theft, motor vehicle theft, and arson. Yet, incarceration rates for Blacks were higher than those for Whites.

Legislative and Judicial Responses to Superpredators

In the late 20th century, the United States witnessed a major transformation of the juvenile court from a rehabilitative model (initiated by the child savers movement of the late 19th century and early 20th century) to a more punitive model. Society's fear of superpredators created an urgency to "get tough" on juvenile offenders. In response to these fears, legislators enacted a variety of laws reflecting this more punitive approach, including curfew ordinances, mandatory sentencing guidelines, laws requiring longer sentences, and laws allowing more frequent transfer of juveniles to the adult court system.

For example, between 1991 and 1996, 47 states implemented substantive changes to laws governing the transfer of youth to adult courts. Several judicial responses contributed to the transformation of the criminal justice system. In the 1991 Illinois case of People v. P.H., the Illinois Supreme Court decided that the gang-transfer provision of a transfer statute was constitutional. In other words, if the juvenile has a prior adjudication of delinquency for a felony and is later charged with a felony in furtherance of gang activity, the state may transfer the juvenile to the adult court. The Illinois Supreme Court also found that the gang-transfer provision did not violate constitutional provisions regarding separation of powers, double jeopardy, equal protection, or due process.

In 1994, the Illinois Supreme Court ruled in People v. R.L. that automatically trying youth 15 and 16 years of age as adults on charges of committing a drug offense on a public space within 1,000 feet of public housing is constitutional. Although arguments were presented to show that the law was racially discriminatory, the rationale for the court's decision was that racial discrimination is not the sole determinate triggering strict scrutiny.

Many states have adopted laws to make it easier for juveniles to be tried as adults, but these laws vary among states, and critics note that the decisions-to-transfer process may be arbitrary. For example, the State of Maryland can automatically transfer juveniles (depending on the age) to the adult court after they are charged with committing serious crimes, such as murder, rape, aggravated assault, or armed robbery. In most states, 14 is the age at which juveniles may be transferred to the adult court; however, some states do not have a minimum age. Maryland law also grants the juvenile court the right to waive its jurisdiction in any case, including those involving a misdemeanor, when the juvenile is 15 years of age or older.

The prosecutorial direct-file provision grants prosecutors the discretion in deciding which offender and what type of offenses will be transferred to the adult court. In fact, prosecutors often overcharge the juvenile with committed offenses to ensure that the juvenile receives a transfer to the adult court.

Laws that facilitate transfer of juveniles to adult court have several significant consequences. First, juveniles transferred to the adult court do not receive an individualized assessment of their potential to be rehabilitated. Second, juveniles transferred to the adult court may spend a significant amount of time in adult detention (potentially 6 months or more) before a ruling in the case. Finally, the impact of juvenile transfer policy may vary among racial groups. Research shows that African Americans are more likely than Whites to be transferred to adult facilities. For example, the Maryland Department of Juvenile Justice reported in 1995 that 73% of the juvenile transfer cases to the adult court involved African American juveniles. Similar findings were reported in Ohio, Minnesota, California, Florida, Pennsylvania, and South Carolina.

Opposition to the Punitive Approach

Opponents of juvenile transfer statutes argue that U.S. society demonizes children by inflicting punitive policies on children when, in fact, claims concerning increased crime and delinquency rates are unfounded. These critics argue that minority children are particularly demonized because they are more likely to be impacted by these policies. They also note that juveniles in adult facilities are a vulnerable population among adult offenders. For example, juveniles in adult facilities, compared with juveniles in juvenile facilities, are 5 times as likely to be sexually assaulted, 2 times as likely to be beaten by staff, and 8 times as likely to commit suicide. Finally, juveniles in adult facilities are more likely to recidivate than juveniles in juvenile facilities. The controversy about rehabilitative versus punitive approaches continues among policymakers, although some research suggests that support for rehabilitation of juveniles is strong among some segments of the public.

Sherrise Y. Truesdale-Moore

See also Juvenile Waivers to Adult Court; Violent Juvenile Offenders

Further Readings

- Agnew, R. (2009). Juvenile delinquency: Causes and control (2nd ed.). Los Angeles: Roxbury.
- Bartol, C. R., & Bartol, A. M. (2009). Juvenile delinquency and antisocial behavior: A developmental perspective (3rd ed.). Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson.
- Dilulio, J. J. (1995, November 27). The coming of the super-predators. Weekly Standard.
- Elikann, P. (1999). Superpredators: The demonization of our children by the law. Reading, MA: Perseus.
- Federal Interagency Forum on Child and Family Statistics. (2005). America's children: Key national indicators of wellbeing 2005. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office.
- Mauer, M. (1999). Race to incarcerate. New York: The New Press.
- Merlo, A. V., & Benekos, P. J. (2003). Defining juvenile justice in the 21st century. Youth Violence and Juvenile Justice, 1(3), 276–288.
- Moon, M. M., Sundt, J. L., Cullen, F. T., & Wright, J. P. (2000). Is child saving dead? Public support for juvenile rehabilitation. Crime & Delinquency, 46, 38–60.
- People v. P.H., 582 N.E.2d 700 (1991).
- People v. R.L., 634 N.E.2d 733 (1994).
- Reiman, J. (2007). The rich get richer and the poor get prison: Ideology, class, and criminal justice. Boston: Pearson.
- Young, D. A. (1998, June 5). Trying children in adult courts (Human Rights Watch report). Retrieved from <http://www.hrw.org/reports/1999/maryland/Maryland-02.htm>
- Zimring, F. (2007). The great American decline. New York: Oxford University Press.

TASERS

Taser is an acronym for the Tom A. Swift Electronic Rifle. It is a brand name for an electronic device for the control of people. It was first developed in the 1960s and 1970s. During the 1990s, the Taser was introduced to law enforcement use as an alternative to the use of deadly force. It has been reported that as of 2007, more than 11,000 law enforcement agencies in the United States use the Taser. Although in itself the Taser is a race-neutral tool, police use of the Taser has been disproportionately directed toward minorities. This entry describes Tasers, principles of use of force escalation, and issues related to race and the use of Tasers.

A Taser is a hand-held device that fires two small darts, connected to the device with thin wires, up to a distance of approximately 35 feet. The darts can penetrate clothing and once they make contact with the target, a 50,000-volt electric shock is transmitted. The electric shock results in the disruption of the target's nervous system, resulting in the temporary incapacitation of the target. The Taser is not considered a firearm because it uses compressed nitrogen to launch the darts. A Taser can also be used as a stun gun by pressing it directly against the body of the target, thereby administering the electric shock.

Since the practical recognition of civil rights by the Warren Court concerning police abuse in the 1960s, the improper use of deadly force has become a significant problem for law enforcement agencies. The U.S. Supreme Court decision of Tennessee v. Garner (1985) highlighted that there were significant limits to the use of deadly force under the Bill of Rights.

The general principle of escalation of force by law enforcement consisted of the following continuum: verbal control, hand control, handcuffs, mace, batons, and finally firearms. The huge gap between the use of the baton and the use of a firearm presented problems for law enforcement. As a result, a number of people shot by law enforcement personnel, who arguably should not have been shot, could have been saved if there was a less-lethal alternative.

A number of alternatives were tried. The Taser, in the 1990s, became the primary selection of law enforcement as a nonlethal alternative to the use of deadly force where the baton was insufficient to control persons. However, the Taser has presented its own set of problems, which have resulted in lawsuits and limiting legislation.

Many law enforcement agencies have reported outstanding success concerning the Taser. These agencies cite numerous examples where the use of the Taser has prevented the use of deadly force in many situations, thereby saving lives. There is little doubt that the availability of a nonlethal tool to control people who need to be subdued is much preferable to the use of a firearm.

As of 2007, according to Amnesty International USA, there had been at least 250 deaths as a result of the use of the Taser by law enforcement in the United States and Canada, which belies the "non-lethal" claim concerning the use of the Taser. Many of the deaths have been attributed to related medical conditions, such as heart disease, to illicit drug use at the time the Taser was used, and to Tasers.

There has been extensive criticism of the method and circumstances in which the Taser has been used. For example, law enforcement personnel have used the Taser on a 6-year-old boy who held a broken piece of glass, on a 12-year-old girl who was running from a law enforcement officer, on an elderly person who failed to stand up when ordered to do so by a law enforcement officer, and on a person already handcuffed, who subsequently died. Also, there have been numerous criticisms of the use of the Taser on people with mental illnesses. Further, there have been numerous complaints of the Taser being used to torture subjects, by both multiple and extended applications of the electric shocks.

The resulting furor about the problems with Tasers has resulted in numerous lawsuits and calls for controlling legislation. In partial response to these complaints, special cameras can now be attached to Tasers whenever they are used. However, the problems with the use of Tasers are not color blind. Numerous newspapers and official reports address this issue. For example, from 2006 to 2007, in Sioux City, Iowa, of 70 uses of the Taser, 33 were against racial minorities. Over a recent 2½-year period, the city of Houston, Texas, employed the Taser over 1,000 times, 63% of the time against African Americans, even though African Americans constitute 25% of Houston's population. Another study showed that between November 2004 and March 2005, Tasers were used by Houston police officers 87% of the time against minorities. Between 2001 and 2003, in Seattle, Washington, 45% of the subjects of Taser use were African American, even though they constitute just 8% of the population.

What is unique about the Taser is its ability to inflict a high degree of pain and suffering on a suspect while leaving few marks, such as those that would be left by a baton or a firearm. When Taser use results in death, there is physical evidence of its misuse, but in nonlethal cases, it is more difficult to prove misuse. As demonstrated in the case of Rodney King, without evidence such as a videotape or physical evidence, it is difficult to establish charges of police abuse through the use of Tasers.

William C. Plouffe, Jr.

See also Discrimination–Disparity Continuum; Disproportionate Minority Contact and Confinement; King, Rodney; Police Accountability; Profiling, Racial: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives; Tennessee v. Garner

Further Readings

- Amnesty International. (2007, October 1). Amnesty International's concerns about Taser use: Statement to the U.S. Justice Department inquiry into deaths in custody. Retrieved from <http://www.amnesty.org/en/library/info/AMR51/151/2007>
- Kedir, S. H. (2007). Stunning trends in shocking crimes: A comprehensive analysis of Taser weapons. Cleveland State University Journal of Law and Health, 20, 357–384.
- Seals, E. (2007). Police use of Tasers: The truth is “shocking.” Golden Gate University Law Review, 38, 109–138.

TELEVISION DRAMAS

The category “television drama” includes episodic crime series and nongenre series that have a strong criminal justice component. Examples of the latter include the nongenre series I'll Fly Away (NBC, 1991–1993). This critically acclaimed but short-lived series, set at the dawn of the civil rights era, was narrated by a young African American woman (Regina Taylor), who worked as the housekeeper for the district attorney (Sam Waterson) in a southern town. Also set in the South, the Lifetime series Any Day Now (1998–2002) chronicled the renewed interracial friendship between the two female protagonists. Rene (Lorraine Toussaint) was a lawyer, the daughter of a civil rights attorney, who has returned to Atlanta. Mary Elizabeth (Annie Potts), wife, mother, and would-be writer, had been her best friend when they were children. Although set in modern-day Birmingham, Alabama, each episode included flashbacks to the 1960s when Mary Elizabeth's uncle, who was both a sheriff's deputy and a member of the Ku Klux Klan, symbolized the corrupt criminal justice system. As television dramas, I'll Fly Away and Any Day Now were rare exceptions to standard primetime programming. Dramas that focus with sensitivity and depth on race/ethnicity and criminal justice have not been standard television fare. Until the 1960s, with the exception of situation comedies in which they were cast as servants or in stereotypical roles, African Americans and other racial/ethnic minorities were a barely visible presence on television. This entry examines the progression of the representation of race/ethnicity in television crime dramas.

Crime Series

In 1965, I Spy, a groundbreaking series, debuted on NBC. Reflecting the popularity of James Bond films, I Spy (1965–1968) featured two American espionage agents who traveled the world posing as a professional tennis player (Robert Culp) and his trainer (Bill Cosby). The first primetime drama to feature an interracial partnership, I Spy was also the first television drama to feature an African American actor (Cosby) in a starring role.

During the civil rights era, a number of other series debuted featuring racial/ethnic minority characters as law enforcement officers. Among these series, Mod Squad (1968–1973) featured a trio of young undercover cops (one White male from a wealthy family; one attractive blonde White female from a troubled home; one intense, brooding Black male). The three worked undercover for a middle-aged, White male police supervisor who had recruited them for assignments involving the 1960s counterculture (i.e., hippies, drugs, political and social conflicts). Other crime shows, such as Adam-12 (1968–1975), Hawaii Five-O (1968–1980), The Rookies (1972–1979), and Police Woman (1974–1978), featured police officers of color as part of an ensemble cast.

Although the presence of a laugh track precludes describing this show as a drama, Barney Miller (ABC, 1975–1982) often took on serious issues (including ageism, sexism, and racism). Set in a New York City police precinct, the characters were as diverse as those of any crime drama on television. Captain Barney Miller (Irish American) was in charge. The squad room regulars included Fish (White, elderly, and Jewish); Harris (African American); Wojciehowicz (Polish American); Amanguale (Puerto Rican American); and Yemana (Japanese American). The presence of these characters and the two female detectives and a brainy White detective (Dietrich) who appeared later in the series fueled debates about attitudes and perceptions. In a memorable fifth season episode (“The Harris Incident,” November 30, 1978), Harris’s colleagues are shocked by his emotional response when he is shot at by two White patrol officers who mistook him for a suspect.

The debut of Hill Street Blues (NBC, 1981–1987) brought audiences into a gritty urban precinct where comedic incidents were interspersed with moments of high drama. In the first episode, two patrol officers, Andy Renko (Charles Haid) and Bobby Hill (Michael Warren), were gunned down. Because of audience response to the “chemistry” between the two characters (White “cowboy” and more serious Black partner), the two survived the shooting. The series featured another “salt-and-pepper” partnership between Detectives Johnny (J. D.) LaRue, who liked to party, and his more serious partner, Neal Washington (Taurean Blacque). The show also featured a Hispanic lieutenant, Ray Calletano (Rene Enrique) and an Italian American precinct captain, Frank Furillo (Daniel J. Travanti). Frank Furillo’s lover and (later) wife, Public Defender Joyce Davenport (Veronica Hamel), affectionately called him “Pizza Man.” The police in this urban precinct were involved in an ongoing effort to keep the peace among warring local gangs.

The debut of Miami Vice (CBS, 1984–1989) heralded the birth of the “cool” cop as reflected in the fashions worn by Ricardo “Rico” Tubbs (Philip Michael Thomas), the debonair, suit-clad African American detective from New York City, and his White partner, James “Sonny” Crockett (Don Johnson), who made pastel tee-shirts and rolled-cuff jackets look manly. The ensemble cast also included a Hispanic commander, Lieutenant Martin Castillo (Edward James Olmos); a Hispanic female detective (Saundra Santiago); and the detective’s partner, an African American female (Olivia Brown). While the women spent much of their time going undercover as the girlfriends of the crime bosses the team was targeting, Tubbs and Crockett posed as drug buyers, arms dealers, and other high-profile criminals. The episodes played out against the soundtracks that accompanied Tubbs and Crockett as they rolled through nighttime Miami in expensive cars.

In 1990, Law and Order debuted on NBC. This series became the first in the Law and Order franchise, including Law and Order: Special Victims Unit (1999–) and Law and Order: Criminal Intent (2001–). On ABC, NYPD Blue (1993–2005) offered a racier (e.g., bare posteriors in showers and lovemaking) look at the personal lives of its detectives. Unlike the Law and Order series, NYPD Blue spotlighted the private lives of its characters. As other characters came and went, Detective Andy Sipowicz (Dennis Frantz) emerged as a leading character. A bigoted alcoholic, Sipowicz frequently locked horns with the squad's African American commander, Lieutenant Arthur Fancy (James McDaniel). With the departure of his White male partner, Sipowicz was teamed with a Latino detective, Bobby Simone (Jimmy Smits). During the course of the series, grumbling and often ill at ease, Sipowicz adapted to racial/ethnic and sexual diversity in the squad room (including a gay civilian clerk).

On television crime shows, as in real life, politics and the police bureaucracy may affect both interpersonal relationships and how cases are handled. Based on David Simon's nonfiction book, the NBC series Homicide: Life on the Street (1993–1999) was set in Baltimore. As in the city itself, the series portrayed African Americans holding positions high in the hierarchy of the police bureaucracy. However, as a middle manager at the precinct level, Lieutenant Al Giardello (Yaphet Kotto) was forced to navigate the often treacherous waters of the bureaucracy. His detectives included Frank Pembleton (Andre Braugher), who was African American and Catholic. Pembleton, who became a favorite of viewers and critics for his skills as an interrogator of suspects, was partnered with Tim Bayliss (Kyle Secor), a less-experienced White male detective. Although much of the focus of the series was on crime solving, certain storylines reminded viewers that many of the victims and offenders in the city of Baltimore were African Americans. For example, Bayliss was haunted by the fact that he was never able to solve the murder of a little Black girl named Adena. Race also played a role in the personal lives of the detectives. In one episode, the widowed Al Giardello (a dark-skinned Black male) had a blind date. Displaying intraracial color prejudice, Giardello's lighter-skinned date rejected him.

Narrative Complexity and Ambiguity

One of the hit crime shows of the 1960s and 1970s, Mission: Impossible (CBS, 1966–1973), featured a Black male (Greg Morris) as the electronics wizard Barney Collier, who was the mastermind that allowed the espionage team to carry out its carefully timed missions. In modern crime series, characters of color often provide the expertise essential to either solving the crime or evaluating victims and suspects. Contemporary crime dramas, such as Law and Order: Special Victims Unit (1999–), CSI: Crime Scene Investigation (CBS, 2000–), and The Women's Murder Club (ABC, 2007–), routinely feature characters of color as forensic experts (i.e., medical examiners, psychiatrists, or crime science technicians).

Yet, for all of this “virtual integration,” scholars and media observers have expressed concern about the distortions that occur in television crime dramas. In contrast to the real-life demographics of violent crime, the focal victims presented in these dramas tend to be White and middle or upper class. The presence of victims and offenders of color is often open to multiple and ambiguous readings by the audience. For example, on Law and Order (1990–), there is often a plot twist aimed at the snug assumptions of the police or the prosecutors. In her first appearance on the series, S. Epatha Merkerson, who would later be cast as Lieutenant Anita Van Buren, played a cleaning woman whose infant was killed when someone shot into her house. The detectives came to the office building where she was working to tell her about her baby's death. She collapsed, sobbing. Later, she responded with anger when the detectives asked if her 10-year-old son is involved in a gang. The twist came when it was revealed during the trial that the African American youth who was the shooter killed the baby because he couldn't read his instructions and went to the wrong address. In another episode, an African American associate in a Wall Street firm killed his boss. The novel defense used in this case was “Black rage.” An African American researcher testified about the rage-inducing humiliations experienced by Black high achievers. White District Attorney Jack McCoy (Sam Waterson) argued that the homicide was premeditated murder and won a conviction. The twist came outside the courthouse, when a taxi passed a Black man in a suit to pick up Jack McCoy.

This same ambiguity can be seen in the casting of a police detective on Law and Order: Special Victims Unit (1999–). Rapper-turned-actor Ice-T, notorious for his hard-hitting musical commentary on police violence, plays politically conservative Detective Odafin “Fin” Tutuola. In one episode, after the discovery of several children who had been killed in a cult mass murder, Tutuola decided to take some time off to deal with his strong emotional reaction to what he had seen. This was in marked contrast to the response of White male detective Elliot Stabler (Christopher Meloni), who insisted that he was unaffected and could cope. On the surface, the viewer might assume that Fin is better adjusted than Elliot, who is angry, volatile, and had been sent to psychiatric counseling on other occasions. However, the decision by Fin to remove himself from an ongoing investigation in which children have been killed might also be interpreted by some members of the audience as lack of dedication to his job. But regular viewers of the show would be aware of the fact that on numerous other occasions, Fin had displayed compassion and concern for victims and been passionate in his commitment to obtain justice for them. As with the other characters, Fin’s personal life, including his troubled relationship with his son, has gradually been revealed. When contemporary television dramas combine episodic storytelling with serial elements, it makes for what communications scholar Jason Mittell has described as “narrative complexity.” At the same time, the incorporation of serial elements raises intriguing questions about the perceptions that audiences develop of the characters in these dramas.

Recent crime series, especially those on cable networks, have presented morally ambiguous characters in series with high levels of graphic violence. Such series include Oz (HBO, 1997–2003), The Wire (HBO, 1997–2003), and The Shield (FOX, 2002–), about a special unit in the Los Angeles Police Department. In these series, it may be that race/ethnicity is less relevant to the viewing audience than the enjoyment of the moves and counter-moves engaged in by the characters. However, when a series is set in a maximum security prison (Oz), the city of Baltimore (The Wire), or Los Angeles (The Shield), one of the questions that should be of interest to researchers is how the series negotiates the terrain. For example, does the series offer an accurate presentation of an urban inner city? Does the series attempt to avoid stereotypes and allow the characters to be complex regardless of race/ethnicity? Or, for example, on a show about White ethnic protagonists, such as HBO’s The Sopranos (1999–2007), about an Italian American Mafia family, how was race “coded”?

Stages of Representation

The representation of race/ethnicity and justice issues in television dramas, particularly crime dramas, is important because most people acquire their knowledge about crime, justice, and race-related issues from news and entertainment media. In their research on the depiction of racial minority characters on television, Bradley S. Greenberg and P. Baptista-Fernandez concluded that there are several phases of representation, as the groups move from invisibility to egalitarian depictions. The presence of characters of color in crime dramas, and the fact that these characters are sometimes invested with both legal and moral authority, might suggest that these depictions have moved toward the egalitarian end of the continuum. However, researchers have found that the racial “coding” that occurs in television dramas may be conveying another message to viewers. Prior research has indicated distortion in the images of race/ethnicity on television primetime shows. Future research must examine the evolution of characters in television dramas and audience perceptions of character complexity.

Frankie Y. Bailey

See also Media, Print; Media Portrayals of African Americans; Media Portrayals of Asian Americans; Media Portrayals of Latina/o/s; Media Portrayals of Native Americans; Media Portrayals of White Americans

Further Readings

- Bogle, D. (2001). Primetime blues: African Americans on network television. New York: Farrar, Straus, & Giroux.
- Chopra-Gant, M. (2007). The law of the father, the law of the land: Power, gender and race in The Shield. Journal of American Studies, 41(3), 659–673.

- Eschholz, S., Mallard, M., & Flynn, S. (2004). Images of prime time justice: A content analysis of NYPD Blue and Law & Order. Journal of Criminal Justice and Popular Culture, 10(3), 161–180.
- Gerbner, G. (1970). Cultural indicators: The case of violence in television drama. ANNALS of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 388, 69–81.
- Kocela, C. (2005). Unmade men: The Sopranos after Whiteness. Postmodern Culture, 15(2).
- Mastro, D. E., & Greenberg, B. S. (2000). The portrayal of racial minorities on prime time television. Journal of Broadcasting & Electronic Media, 44(4), 690–703.
- Surette, R. (2006). Media, crime, and crime justice: Images, realities, and policies. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth.

TELEVISION NEWS

The way that people perceive race and crime is often driven by the media. The public may simply assume that crime happens and the news media report the details. On the contrary, the media construction of race and crime is a complex interweaving of both fact and fiction oftentimes set in an overarching racist narrative.

The depiction of race by the media is impacted by three primary factors: media influence on an audience, media ownership, and media depictions of race and crime. Although the media have a somewhat moderate influence on audiences, they do have the power to narrate how race and crime is discussed. Lastly, common depictions of race and crime contribute to the social construction of beliefs about who commits crime and who are the victims of crime. This entry examines all of these areas as they relate to television news.

Media Influence

Communication researchers argue that the media do not tell us how to think, but they are rather effective at telling us what to think about. This is known as the “agenda-setting” function of the media. For instance, if the media focus on the number of murders in a city, audiences will tend to believe that the murder rate is an important issue. Moreover, when the media tend to cover certain races and neighborhoods, audiences begin to associate crime with a particular race and neighborhood.

Coupled with this agenda-setting function, the media also guide us in how we think about an issue. This is known as media “framing.” A recent example of media framing can be seen in the coverage of Hurricane Katrina in New Orleans, Louisiana. African Americans that took items from abandoned stores were called “looters,” whereas their White counterparts were called “survivors.”

Researchers suggest that the media use two forms of framing: episodic and thematic. Episodic framing of crime may include particular instances of criminal and police activities. This style is common in local television news coverage where crime appears disjointed and random. Episodic framing fails to set crime into a wider context. Television news, especially local news, often fails to address issues of poverty, racial tensions, and the activities of government officials. To the average viewer, crime may seem chaotic and random.

Thematic framing sets crime into a greater context such as race and politics; an example of this type of framing is an in-depth look at the effects of poverty on crime. However, thematic framing is not the norm, especially with local television stations that pour money into helicopters and news vans that bring “late breaking” news. Moreover, critics suggest that thematic framing tends to be just as racist as episodic framing because it creates a narrative of non-White criminals burdening a White society.

Researchers also argue that the media may shape our perceptions of race and crime over time. When the media portray an issue in a certain way, there is a cumulative effect over an extended period of time in which the public begins to believe that the media depiction is reality. For instance, when the media repeatedly links violent crime with low-income African American and Latina/o neighborhoods, audiences may begin to believe these depictions to be reality. Or if the media continuously link terrorism with people of Arab descent or with Muslim beliefs, an association between race and crime is created. Thus, people may believe that the world is a much more violent place than it is in reality. Moreover, people may also believe that violence and crime are more prevalent in certain races.

Research also suggests that television viewers have been conditioned to associate crime with a certain race, to the point that if television depicts a White perpetrator, viewers may later remember the perpetrator as non-White. This occurs even though a number of surveys found that most people, regardless of race, think that non-Whites are over-represented in crime coverage.

The Business of the Media

In the 20th century, the media morphed from community storytellers into profit-driven enterprises. Newspapers, television, radio, film, and the Internet all depend on advertising money to produce the stories we read, watch, and hear. Driven by the need for higher ratings (and thus higher advertising revenue), the media tend to be drawn to sensationalistic stories and episodes of extreme violence.

Media ownership is primarily made up of White males. This in turn impacts the diversity of content and the depictions of non-Whites in the media. Moreover, media content and advertising have historically been geared toward a White audience. Though the characterization of non-Whites has been slowly changing, the media often fall back on stereotypic depictions of race.

In terms of audience, those who obtain news primarily from television are more likely to be less educated and be at a lower economic status than people who obtain news from print media.

Television News Depictions of Race and Crime

The way the news media tell stories of race and crime influences how we perceive the reality of race and crime. Yet, television is, by design, built for sound bites, images, and sensationalistic hooks; such a format lacks the necessary depth to fully tell the narrative of race and crime. These quick images tend to subtly, and at times overtly, promote stereotypical and racist beliefs. For example, when talking about a rise in violent crime, news stations tend to use non-White people and neighborhoods as background images.

Research has shown that violent crime involving African Americans and Latina/o Americans is more prevalent in media news than are incidents of White crime. Moreover, Whites are more likely to be portrayed as the victims of violent crime (even though crime statistics suggest that non-Whites are actually more likely to be victimized by violent crime). Media narratives also construct race and crime in such a way as to promote hostility toward non-Whites. For example, television news often uses frames suggesting that crime is inevitable and typical in non-White communities; thus the issue of non-White crime is constructed as a problem for White society.

The Future of News Coverage

As news and television coverage continues to change, future research will examine the transforming landscape of news audiences and media technology. New media formats such as Internet blogging and viral video become decentralized and “unofficial” sources of information. Moreover, as audiences become diversified, news broadcasters will change to cater to a growing demand for diversified coverage. Non-White ownership of media companies and non-White representation on television news are slowly changing. These changes, however, do not ensure that news narratives in the future will be free of racial bias.

Gwendelyn Nisbett and Jennifer Hartsfield

See also Fear of Crime; Hurricane Katrina; Media, Print; Media Portrayals of African Americans; Media Portrayals of Asian Americans; Media Portrayals of Latina/o/s; Media Portrayals of Native Americans; Media Portrayals of White Americans

Further Readings

- Entman, R. M. (1993). Framing: Toward clarification of a fractured paradigm. Journal of Communication, 43, 51–58.
- Entman, R. M. (1994). Representation and reality in the portrayal of Blacks on network television news. Journalism Quarterly, 71, 509–520.
- Gallagher, C. A. (2007). Rethinking the color line: Readings in race and ethnicity. New York: McGraw-Hill.
- Iyengar, S. (1994). Is anyone responsible? How television frames political issues. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Johnson-Cartee, K. S. (2005). News narratives and news framing: Constructing political reality. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- McCombs, M. (2004). Setting the agenda: The mass media and public opinion. Cambridge, UK: Polity.

TELEVISION REALITY SHOWS

The popular subgenre of crime-based reality television shows regularly contains influential, often distorted representations of individuals of various races and demographic backgrounds. Such programs feature a blend of entertainment and news attributes and promote themselves as representing “reality” as it exists in everyday life, whether or not this is actually the case. Crime-based reality shows are based on the assumption that law-abiding individuals compose an ideal world that is the most desirable state of being. They have descended from a range of preceding media offerings—including reality-crime radio programs, “true crime” magazines, and tabloid newspapers—and have benefited in their longevity from the growing and seemingly insatiable appetite of viewers for reality programming during the late 1990s and beyond.

Most Popular Crime-Based Reality Television Shows

In the United States, the two most popular crime-based reality television shows to date have been America’s Most Wanted (which began airing in February 1988) and COPS (which began airing in March 1989), both broadcast on the Fox television network (although COPS has aired regularly in syndication on various other networks since the mid-1990s, as well).

America’s Most Wanted profiles the most-wanted criminals in the United States—many of whom are wanted for offenses such as armed robbery, gang violence, murder, and rape—with the hope that one or more of the show’s weekly viewers will recognize these individuals in their own communities and assist law enforcement officials in apprehending them. Within days of its initial broadcast, viewer tips led to the capture of one of the Federal Bureau of Investigation’s 10 most wanted fugitives and, over the course of the program’s first 2 decades, it had successfully assisted in the identification and capture of approximately 950 of the most dangerous U.S. fugitives. One of the show’s hallmarks is its low-budget reenactments of the crimes that are featured each week.

From its beginning, the show has been hosted by John Walsh, a man whose 6-year-old son was abducted and murdered in 1981 and who has since dedicated his life and career to enhancing the lives of crime victims by seeing that (at least some of) their victimizers are brought to justice. Despite all of his valiant efforts in this regard, after 2 decades on the air, Walsh and his wife had still not been able to achieve justice in their own son’s case. In the early 1990s, America’s Most Wanted also began profiling missing children and other missing individuals, and in late 2001 it endeavored, upon special request from President George W. Bush, to assist in America’s War on Terror by airing an episode devoted to the most-wanted suspected al-Qaeda fugitives.

Perhaps best known for its appealing reggae-style theme song “Bad Boys,” COPS is a documentary-style reality television show whose cameras follow actual law enforcement officials on their everyday patrols and crime-filled adventures, with the goal of offering a voyeuristic perspective on contemporary criminals and police work. Viewers experience a sense of “being there” as the show’s weekly episodes are created with regular use of shaky video footage and actual police dialogue; no traditional documentary-style commentary or narration is provided to formally guide the viewers or their impressions. Each half-hour installment typically features three different crime segments, which to date have been shot in more than 100 cities across the United States and in several cities abroad (including London and Hong Kong), with commercial breaks in between them. More than 650 episodes of this program had aired by the end of the 2005 to 2006 television season.

Additional popular crime-based reality television shows in the United States since the early 1990s have included Armed and Famous, LAPD: Life on the Beat, Police Beat, Real Stories of the Highway Patrol, and World’s Wildest Police Videos.

Concerns Pertaining to Crime-Based Reality Television Shows

Many popular and academic critics maintain that crime-based reality television shows perpetuate feelings of fear, despair, and cynicism among their viewers. Many also argue that they contribute to distorted perceptions of members of various racial and ethnic groups and hold the potential to fuel discrimination and racial intolerance. For example, it is not uncommon for crime-based reality shows to continually provide images of African Americans as crime-committing “villains” in relation to (primarily) White cops, or for regular viewers of such programs to believe that the odds of being a crime victim themselves are much higher than they actually (statistically) are.

As numerous researchers have demonstrated, most people rely on media offerings to provide them with the majority of their pictures of crime, as compared with personal experience. Many have also convincingly demonstrated that media offerings contribute continuously to the types of issues that people collectively think about and regard as being of greatest relevance and importance. Crime-based reality shows, like television news programs and newspaper articles, regularly depict crime significantly out of proportion to its actual rates of occurrence, with the most unusual or “entertaining” instances of crime attracting the greatest amount of airtime or coverage. In addition, and perhaps even more problematically, crime-based reality television programs tend to feature people of color and individuals of the lower classes with far greater frequency than Whites and individuals of the middle and upper classes, despite the fact that all types of individuals in society regularly commit various types of crimes. As a result, such programs endlessly perpetuate and reinforce negative perceptions of the connections between race/ethnicity, class, and (most notably, violent) crime.

Despite the fact that many television viewers readily acknowledge that the contents of reality television programs are often far from “real,” this does not mean that they are necessarily (or even likely) shielded from the potential or actual effects of exposure to their contents. Numerous researchers have concluded that crime-based reality television shows tend to be most popular among White, middle-class viewers and that those viewers are more likely to misperceive the realities of contemporary crime and criminal justice.

Comedic Variations on Crime-Based Reality Television Shows

Although the serious nature and somber tone of America's Most Wanted have prevented it from being parodied extensively, COPS and the related reality shows inspired by it have not succeeded in avoiding the same fate. These latter programs have been the subject of parody in numerous media offerings over the past 2 decades, including the television programs Beavis and Butt-Head, The Ben Stiller Show, In Living Color, Mad TV, Married . . . With Children, My Name Is Earl, and South Park as well as the films Run Ronnie Run! and Shrek 2.

Arguably the most effective comedic commentary on offerings of this popular subgenre of reality television shows, however, has occurred in the Comedy Central series Reno 911! which began airing in July 2003. This comedy series features fictional law enforcement officials with the fictional Reno sheriff's department being videotaped as they go about their everyday work lives. Much of the dialogue contained in each episode of this show is improvised rather than scripted, with the aim of creating an illusion of “reality” akin to that fostered in a show such as COPS. This popular parody of COPS and the previously mentioned parodies perform the cultural work of calling attention to the representational issues and shortcomings that are typically associated with crime-based reality television shows, including the distorted, racist, classist, and homophobic social constructions of crime and criminals to which they continually contribute. They are able to do so effectively and efficiently because viewers have become so intimately familiar with the type of show they are (subtly or not so subtly) critiquing.

If cultural critics are correct, the next wave of crime-based reality television programs may likely emerge from footage gathered by security cameras and other surveillance devices that are increasingly found in daily life during the early 21st century, including those placed near entry and exit doors, in stairwells and building nooks and crannies, and various other public areas.

Kylo-Patrick R. Hart

See also Media, Print; Media Portrayals of African Americans; Media Portrayals of Latina/o/s; Television News

Further Readings

- Cavender, G., Bond-Maupin, L., & Jurik, N. C. (1999). The construction of gender in reality crime TV. Gender & Society, 13, 645–663.
- Curry, K. (2001). Mediating COPS: An analysis of viewer reaction to reality TV. Journal of Criminal Justice and Popular Culture, 8, 169–185.
- Dowler, K., & Zawilski, V. (2007). Public perceptions of police misconduct and discrimination: Examining the impact of media consumption. Journal of Criminal Justice, 35, 193–203.
- Fishman, M., & Cavender, G. (Eds.). (1998). Entertaining crime: Television reality programs. New York: de Gruyter.
- Goidel, R. K., Freeman, C. M., & Procopio, S. T. (2006). The impact of television viewing on perceptions of juvenile crime. Journal of Broadcasting and Electronic Media, 50, 119–139.
- Prosise, T. O., & Johnson, A. (2004). Law enforcement and crime on COPS and World's Wildest Police Videos. Western Journal of Communication, 68, 72–91.

TENNESSEE V. GARNER

Tennessee v. Garner (1985) is a U.S. Supreme Court case whereby the Court held the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution prohibits the use of deadly force by a police officer to prevent the escape of a suspected felon unless (a) the use of such force is necessary to prevent the escape and (b) the police officer has probable cause to believe that the suspected felon poses a significant threat of serious bodily injury and/or death to the police officer and/or other persons. This decision invalidated as unconstitutional a state statute in Tennessee that allowed police officers to use all necessary means to effectuate the physical apprehension and arrest of a fleeing suspect without consideration of whether the suspect was armed with a dangerous weapon. In the years leading up to Tennessee v. Garner, there were numerous reported shootings by police officers of unarmed Black men throughout the United States and allegations that many of these police shootings were motivated by systematic race-based discrimination by law enforcement.

The Supreme Court Case

Procedural History

The appellant in this case was the father of a 15-year-old who was shot and killed by a Memphis, Tennessee, police officer. Mr. Garner brought suit in the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Tennessee pursuant to a federal civil rights statute, 42 U.S.C. §1983 (the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871, as amended) contending that the police, acting under the color of state law, violated his son's federally protected rights under the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The district court dismissed the complaint on the grounds that the police officer was acting under a valid state law that was constitutional. On appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit reversed and remanded the case to the trial court, holding that the Tennessee statute violated the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The U.S. Supreme Court granted a writ of certiorari and affirmed the decision of the court of appeals. Associate Justice White delivered the opinion of the Court, joined by Associate Justices Blackmun, Brennan, Marshall, Powell, and Stevens. Associate Justice O'Connor, joined by Chief Justice Burger and Associate Justice Rehnquist, dissented.

Facts of the Case

On October 3, 1974, at approximately 10:45 p.m., two Memphis police officers were dispatched to a private residence to investigate a citizen complaint of a prowler inside. When they arrived at the scene, a neighbor standing on her porch pointed to an adjacent house and told the officers that she heard glass breaking and that someone was breaking into the house next door. One of the officers, Elton Hyman, went to the rear of the house, heard a door slam, and then saw someone—later identified as Edward Garner—run across the backyard. Garner stopped when he reached a 6-foot-high chain-link fence separating the yard from the neighbor's property. Using a flashlight, Hyman was able to see Garner's face and hands and was reasonably certain that Garner was unarmed and not carrying any weapons. Hyman later recalled that he thought Garner was crouched against the fence, and appeared to be a teenager, probably about 17 or 18 years old and about 5 feet, 6 inches tall. Hyman yelled, “police, halt,” and Garner started to climb over the fence. To keep Garner from eluding capture by climbing over the chain-link fence, Hyman shot him in the back of the head. Garner succumbed to his injuries and died at a local hospital. The police reported that a purse and $10 taken from the house were found on Garner’s body.

Hyman, in using deadly force to prevent Garner’s escape from the scene of an apparent residential burglary, was acting pursuant to a Tennessee statute and written policy of the Memphis Police Department. The relevant statute provided that a police officer may use all the means necessary to effectuate an arrest of a fleeing suspect, as long as the police officer gave notice to that person of his or her intention to arrest the person. The policy of the Memphis Police Department allowed for its officers to use deadly force against suspected burglars. Although Hyman’s actions in using deadly force against an unarmed teenager were investigated by the police department and a grand jury, no disciplinary action was taken against Hyman, and no criminal charges were brought against him.

Legal Issues, Holding, and Rationale of the Court

The Supreme Court held that the use of deadly force by law enforcement officers to prevent the escape of all felony suspects, whatever the circumstances, is constitutionally unreasonable, and that the use of deadly force cannot be justified to kill nonviolent crime suspects. As such, the Court held that the aforementioned Tennessee statute is only unconstitutional insofar as it authorizes the use of deadly force by law enforcement officers against an unarmed, nondangerous fleeing suspect.

In abrogating the common law rule that allowed law enforcement officers to use all necessary force, including the application of deadly force, against a fleeing felon in any circumstances, the Supreme Court noted that changes in the technological context and the law over time have resulted in a common law rule that is now distorted beyond recognition and, in some instances such as this one, cannot be construed as a reasonable seizure under the Fourth Amendment. Further, the Court noted that the common law rule allowing for the use of deadly force in such instances was established at a time when nearly all felonies were capital offenses. Few such crimes are classified as capital offenses today, making the common law rule unnecessary and unreasonable as a legal principle. Finally, the Court noted that many police departments had invoked policies regarding the use of deadly force by police officers that were far more restrictive than allowed by the common law rule, and that the Commission on Accreditation for Law Enforcement Agencies required agencies seeking accreditation to restrict the use of deadly force to those situations where an officer reasonably believes that he or she must use deadly force to defend human life or in defense of any person who is in immediate danger of the application of deadly force by an armed and dangerous fleeing felon.

Implications and Discussion

Numerous states amended their statutes regarding the use of deadly force by law enforcement officers, and many police departments promulgated new policies, all in an effort to comply with the mandates of Garner. Scholars have noted that those statutes and policies that limit the use of deadly force by police officers in defense of human life are constitutionally appropriate, and that numerous statutes and policies that control the application of deadly force in less-restrictive situations are likely unconstitutional in violation of Garner and the Fourth Amendment. The more restrictive policies have helped to lessen tension between the police and citizens, particularly in those communities that have historically experienced racially motivated police violence.

Philip Matthew Stinson, Sr.

See also Ku Klux Klan Act; Police Use of Force

Further Readings

Smith, M. R. (2005). Police use of deadly force: How courts and policy-makers have misapplied Tennessee v. Garner. In R. G. Dunham & G. P. Alpert (Eds.), Critical issues in policing: Contemporary readings (5th ed., pp. 468–491). Long Grove, IL: Waveland Press.

Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985).

TERRY V. OHIO

Terry v. Ohio was a landmark U.S. Supreme Court decision concerning search and seizure, specifically in the context of street-level police encounters with the public resulting in a stop and frisk. The case arose following the actions of Martin McFadden, a Cleveland police detective, in conducting a search to prevent a possible armed robbery. On the afternoon of October 31, 1963, McFadden, a 39-year veteran of the police department, observed three men who he believed were about to commit an armed robbery. The men, one of whom was John Terry, gave an unsatisfactory response to McFadden's inquiry as to their names and business in the area, and McFadden then conducted a pat-down search of Terry's jacket in search of a weapon. The U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the officer had the authority to conduct a limited pat-down for weapons for officer safety because the suspects were observed engaging in suspicious behavior that warranted inquiry by the police. The stop-and-frisk tactic, based on a standard of evidence that amounts to less than probable cause, often accompanies proactive police efforts in high-crime areas that tend to be populated by the poor as well as racial and ethnic minorities.

The subsequent U.S. Supreme Court decision defined the authority of police officers in conducting pat-down searches in situations where there is reasonable belief criminal behavior is in progress. The Court held that stopping someone for brief questioning and conducting a pat-down search did constitute a search as defined by the Fourth Amendment; however, it held that such a stop-and-frisk did not necessarily violate the constitutional ban of unreasonable searches and seizures. The police may search the person during this threshold inquiry if the officer has reasonable suspicion the person may have a weapon and his or her responses to the officer's questions have not assuaged that concern.

The Court was unwilling to create a category of police actions, namely the stop-and-frisk, that did not have to meet the constitutional standard of probable cause. The Court's analysis of whether McFadden violated Terry's constitutional protections against unreasonable searches and seizures focused squarely on whether the officer's actions were reasonable at the inception of the search and whether McFadden's actions were reasonably consistent in scope to the circumstances that provided the justification for the initial search. The purpose of the frisk was viewed as detecting concealed weapons on the person of interest rather than evidence of a crime. The Court rejected the contention that a pat-down frisk is a petty indignity for the individual subjected to the search. The Court also noted the potential detrimental impact which the practice of stop-and-frisks may have on police-community relations that may disproportionately impact poor communities as well as racial and ethnic minorities. Nevertheless, it held that when an officer suspects that a person may be armed, it is reasonable to search for weapons because of the danger to the officer or to others.

Facts of the Case

McFadden had been assigned to a particular section of downtown Cleveland for about 30 years. His main area of responsibility with the police assignment was targeting shoplifters and pick-pockets in the downtown area. The officer observed two men engage in what the police officer described as unusual behavior. The two men, John Terry and Richard Chilton, repeatedly walked individually past a particular storefront window and then conferred with each other upon their return to the other man. In total, the officer observed the two men make about one dozen trips individually past a particular storefront window. They were met by and briefly conversed with a third man, Carl Katz, who walked away alone in another direction. Terry and Chilton met up with Katz shortly after he left their company.

The three men were approached by the police officer as they stood outside another store. The officer believed that the three men were casing the first business for an armed robbery. After the officer identified himself as a police officer, he inquired as to their names. After an unsatisfactory response, the police officer grabbed Terry and spun him around so that he was facing the two other men and was physically between the officer and the two men. The police officer patted down the outer garments of Terry in search of a weapon. The police officer felt a pistol located in the breast pocket of Terry's jacket. The officer tried to remove the pistol but he could not pull it out from the pocket. The officer ordered all three men into the nearby store. Upon entering, the officer completely removed Terry's jacket and successfully removed the pistol from the pocket. With the three men against the wall in the store, McFadden conducted a pat-down search of the outer garments of Chilton and Katz. A pistol was discovered on Chilton during a search of his outer garments, and no weapon was found on Katz. Terry and Chilton were transported to the police station and booked on concealed weapons charges. Terry was later convicted of illegally carrying a concealed weapon and was sentenced to 1 to 3 years in the state penitentiary.

There was a motion to suppress the weapons from evidence. Interestingly, the prosecution had initially claimed that the weapons were legally seized as the result of a search incident to an arrest. Although the trial judge denied the motion to suppress, the judge did not accept the prosecution's rationale to allow the weapons to be introduced as evidence. The trial judge noted that the police officer did not have probable cause to legally support an arrest of the three men prior to the search; therefore, the weapons could not be seized during the course of a search incident to an arrest. The trial court noted that the officer had the authority to conduct a limited pat-down search for weapons in the possession of the men for the specific purpose of officer safety, because the suspects were observed engaging in suspicious behavior that warranted inquiry by the police.

The U.S. Supreme Court Decision

The U.S. Supreme Court held that the search was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment, which protects citizens against unreasonable searches and seizures by government agents, and thus evidence obtained during the pat-down search could be introduced into evidence. The Court noted that the context of the search is essential for determining the reasonableness of the search and subsequent intrusion upon the individual. The Court sought to reach a decision that weighed the competing interests relevant to stop and frisk. On the one hand, there is the need to maintain judicial protection of individual liberty and freedom from government intrusions. Judicial oversight in the area of searches and arrest would be weakened if frisks could be conducted upon mere suspicion of criminal wrongdoing rather than requiring probable cause. On the other hand, the Court noted that law enforcement agencies have a keen interest in conducting pat-down searches for weapons in cases involving suspicious individuals, even in the absence of probable cause for an arrest.

A key element in these competing interests is the legality and appropriateness of a police stop and inquiry in matters where probable cause does not exist. The Court noted the threat to individual liberty when a police frisk but not a full search of the person is legally permitted. The Court noted that one position related to the use of frisks is that a frisk amounts only to a mere inconvenience and petty indignity for the person, but it disagreed with this view and held that a frisk constitutes "a serious intrusion upon the sanctity of the person." Nevertheless, an individual's liberty, autonomy, and personal interests may be countered by the need for effective law enforcement.

The Court also noted the historic tradition of searches and seizures being based on the stringent requirement of probable cause. With the exception of cases that fall in the category of exigent circumstances, the Court emphasized the critical nature of prior judicial review for police action. Prior judicial review for police frisks do not lend themselves to prior judicial review due to the immediacy of action and the potential costs of inaction. The Court relied on a balancing test of interests at hand, which involved the interests of the government to search the individual and the nature of the intrusion for the individual.

The Court noted that the practice of stop-and-frisk may have likely continued absent judicial authority. Evidence seized during searches conducted absent judicial authority would be excluded from evidence. The Court noted that if the exclusionary rule is used to exclude evidence obtained from a stop-and-frisk, the judiciary would not be able to completely eliminate the practice of a stop-and-frisk because some police encounters with the public have intentions other than strict law enforcement. The exclusionary rule applied to stop-and-frisk encounters would also have a negative impact on community protection and officer safety.

Dissenting Opinion

In the dissenting opinion, Justice Douglas noted that the Court created a context that provided the police with more legal authority to conduct searches and seizures than justices have to provide a court order that authorizes the action. Justice Douglas noted that police searches should remain constrained and limited by the standard threshold of probable cause. In addition, Justice Douglas was troubled by the implications that clearly provide more power and authority to the police at the expense of individual liberty.

David A. Mackey

See also Police Accountability

Further Readings

Fyfe, J. (2004). Stops, frisks, searches, and the Constitution. Criminology and Public Policy, 3(3), 379–396.

Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968).

THOMAS, CLARENCE (1948–)

Clarence Thomas was nominated in 1991 by President George H. W. Bush to serve on the U.S. Supreme Court and remains one of the most controversial justices on the Court. After a highly contentious judicial hearing, he was confirmed. The judicial hearing attracted considerable attention both from the media and from political action groups, some of which supported his nomination and others that were vehemently opposed. The controversy stemmed from President Bush's selection to replace Thurgood Marshall, the first African American Associate Justice, who was retiring after a career marked by a history of leadership and activism in civil rights and social justice, with Thomas, a young man, also African American, but who did not share Marshall's tenacity with respect to social justice. In comparison with Justice Marshall, widely revered as an icon, Thomas was viewed by many not only as an intellectual lightweight but also by the left as “Uncle Thomas,” an unflattering label alluding to a troubling contradiction about the nominee—that he, who had benefited from affirmative action policies, was known for his public condemnation of affirmative action.

During the judicial hearings, there was testimony against Thomas and words of support offered by friends, former classmates, and colleagues. Some of the most controversial and widely publicized criticisms were made by Anita Hill, a former employee who came forward to accuse Thomas of sexual harassment. The confirmation hearing became a test of political wills and a media circus, which culminated in Thomas's accusing the Senate Judiciary Committee of a high-tech lynching on “uppity” Blacks who were independent thinkers. The vote of October 15 was close, at 52–48, and although the controversy subsided somewhat after confirmation, it has never gone away. Public attitudes about Clarence Thomas remain deeply divided, particularly among those Americans who witnessed (or viewed on television) the nomination process. After the hearings, Thomas seemed embittered by the experience, and many African Americans continued to dissociate themselves from him, saddened by what they perceived as the symbolism and the irony of his appointment.

Clarence Thomas's biography reveals a man with academic triumphs, career achievements, and challenges. He was born June 23, 1948, in rural Pin Point, Georgia, a former plantation site near Savannah. After his parents divorced, he was sent to Savannah to live with his maternal grandparents and he credits both grandparents for raising him. Through his eyes, his grandfather, known as “Daddy,” was an American hero. The influence of his grandfather and Thomas's fondness for him is evident in Thomas's memoir, titled My Grandfather's Son: A Memoir. Thomas attended the College of the Holy Cross in Worcester, Massachusetts, and later studied law at Yale University. He developed a penchant for speaking out about the Black power movement and isolationism. While at Holy Cross College, he was strongly opposed to a decision made by the Black Student Union that resulted in the designation of a corridor to be used exclusively by Black students. The corridor was to be painted in liberation colors: red, black, and green. During this period, Thomas also protested in Boston against the Vietnam War, and after much reading and acclimation to Holy Cross College, he began to speak about the importance of tackling the mainstream head on—through involvement and not isolation. Some observers have commented on the irony that Thomas chose Yale Law School over Harvard because he viewed Harvard as too conservative and Yale as much more liberal.

After graduation from Yale Law School in 1974, Thomas began his legal career working for the State Attorney General of Missouri John Danforth, after which he found employment with Monsanto Chemical Company in St. Louis. After Danforth had been elected to serve as a U.S. senator, Thomas was offered a position to work with him again, but this time in Washington, D.C. Shortly after relocating to D.C., he separated from his first wife Kathy. After his return to Washington, D.C., he worked with the Department of Education and in 1982 was appointed by President Ronald Reagan to head the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC).

Thomas had made the essential political connections for advancement. He is known to have been very protective of Ronald Reagan and did not share the belief that Reagan was a racist; Thomas has written that he believed in Reagan's philosophy that the government's influence on the lives of Americans should be kept at a minimum. It is not surprising that Thomas began to extend this philosophy to apply to the lives of African Americans and to embrace the belief that government intervention was not the solution to their problems. Thomas's stance seems wedded to the notion that race-based policies were largely ineffective and were hurting Black men and women.

During his term as director of EEOC and his more recent tenure as Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, it has been difficult for many Americans to reconcile Thomas's deeply conservative policies and stern judicial philosophy with the struggles and hardships, poverty, and discrimination he personally experienced earlier in life. Because many of his opinions as a justice of the Supreme Court favor the wealthy and the state over the rights of the individual, he has been criticized for having turned his back on poor people and ordinary Americans. Among African Americans in particular, there are those who hold Clarence Thomas in contempt as someone who has betrayed not only his own people but, it is thought, his own inner being as well.

Robert L. Bing III

See also Kennedy v. Louisiana; Kimbrough v. United States

Further Readings

- Merida, K., & Fletcher, M. (2007). Supreme discomfort: The divided soul of Clarence Thomas. New York: Doubleday.
- Thomas, C. (2007). My grandfather's son: A memoir. New York: HarperCollins.

THREE STRIKES LAWS

In the past 15 years, the criminal justice system has undergone a movement to increase punishments for offenders. This increase reflects public demands for harsher sanctions for offenders and a shift in punitive philosophies as part of a movement to "get tough on crime." As part of this social climate, various states began to pass habitual offender laws, with the best known being those defined as three strikes laws. With the passage of these laws, the media, politicians, the public, and social scientists have focused their attention on this issue. This entry examines the nature and variations of three strikes laws, the debate over these policies, and the laws' impact on crime, the criminal justice system, and the African American community.

Types of Three Strikes Legislation

Currently about half of the states and the federal government have some form of three strikes laws. These laws, which often receive the moniker of "three-strikes-and-you're-out laws," vary across jurisdictions but also have some key similarities. With regard to similarities, these jurisdictions limit offenders' eligibility by the nature of the prior criminal offenses and that of the charge that they face for their current offense. Typically, eligible offenses are those involving violent felonies.

The punishments result in lengthy periods of incarceration. Some jurisdictions allow the possibility of parole after serving a substantial period of incarceration, usually between 25 to 40 years. However, the jurisdictions with some of the most severe penalties require mandatory sentences of life without parole. In terms of differences, some states also have provisions for two or four strikes before an offender is “out.” Furthermore, a few versions include drug offenses, financial crimes, and minor property crimes.

Whereas Washington was the first state with a three strikes law, California is arguably the best-known state with this type of law. Its law took effect in 1994, and it contains both two and three strikes provisions that ensue in the face of felony convictions. According to these provisions, a variety of violent offenses serves as “strikeable” offenses. Other eligible crimes include property, weapons, and drug offenses. Offenders face the two strikes provision when an offender with a prior felony for an eligible offense earns a conviction for the commission of another felony. The result is a penalty enhancement in the length of incarceration. Offenders face the three strikes provision for a conviction on any felony offense in the face of having two prior felony convictions for eligible offenses. This provision makes California notable relative to most other states with strikes laws. Offenders who prompt this provision face a mandatory sentence of 25 years to life, with no parole eligibility for 25 years. As with other strikes laws, numerous debates occurred over the creation of this legislation and its likely impact on crime and the criminal justice system, but those in support of this type of legislation have largely prevailed. Nevertheless, debates continue to abound on this issue.

Debating Three Strikes Laws

In addressing the need for three strikes laws, their validity, and their effects, those on both sides of the debate staunchly hold to their views. Proponents of these policies stress the need to respond to the dangers posed by repeat offenders, particularly persistent violent offenders. They maintain that these offenders are incorrigible and that available punishments are insufficient to address the gravity of their actions. More specifically, they charge that existing laws fail to meet the punitive goals of incapacitation, deterrence, and just deserts. Incapacitation serves to prevent offenders from committing any crimes external to the prison because they do not interact with the public. Deterrence comes in two forms: general and specific. General deterrence focuses on reinforcing social norms by sending a message to the larger community that committing certain acts will result in stringent punishments. Specific deterrence focuses on preventing recidivism by offenders. A philosophy of just deserts stresses proportionately in sentencing. Supporters note that this type of legislation targets only the most violent habitual offenders. They assert that removing these offenders from society for a substantial period, or permanently, is just punishment. Advocates of three strikes laws also stress that these policies reflect public demands for more punitive sanctioning of offenders and that they serve to reduce crime rates because they remove dangerous criminals from society. Finally, they maintain that these policies are highly cost-effective for jurisdictions, which allows them to allocate greater resources to areas such as education and health care.

Researchers examined these arguments to see if these laws reduce crime; their research indicates that the argument of proponents is erroneous. Increasing reliance on imprisonment undoubtedly exerted marginal effects, but to argue that it solely influenced crime rates is disingenuous. Research reveals that other factors, such as a strong economy and strong job market, served to provide conventional alternatives for people. Moreover, studies show a decline in crime rates prior to passage of three strikes legislation. Also, states without these laws experienced a decline, whereas some states with three strikes legislation saw little or no change.

Researchers also explored the role of public opinion. They found that the public sought harsher punishments during the period when states and the federal government passed this type of legislation for the most violent offenders. However, critics argue that those facing severe penalties are often nonviolent offenders. They also note that while supporters of three strikes legislation claim that these new laws are necessary to deal with this special class of offenders, the jurisdictions that enacted these laws already had laws that doled out severe punishments for repeat offenders. California offers a perfect example. At the time that California passed its version of three strikes laws, penalties existed that required that offenders with a third violent felony conviction serve a minimum of 20 years before they reach parole eligibility. Activation of this policy requires that offenders serve their first two sentences separately. Additionally, California required that offenders receive life without parole for a fourth violent felony conviction. Most other jurisdictions enacted laws requiring penalty enhancements. Research on the severity of penalties in the periods before and after the passage of three strikes laws reveals that these laws broadened the range of offenses eligible for these penalties but produced similar punitive outcomes.

Critics challenge the deterrence argument by noting that proponents assume that offenders continue their offending throughout their life course. Research on the age-crime relationship consistently shows that most offending occurs between 15 and 29 years of age and declines thereafter. This phenomenon occurs even without these types of laws. The average age of inmates begins to increase by incarcerating offenders beyond the ages when they are most active in criminal activity. Critics claim this reality undercuts arguments about the cost-effectiveness of these laws. Aging inmates require greater amounts of costly medical care because their health begins to decline with age.

Resource strain serves as another focal point of critics. They assert that offenders will demand more trials because of fewer incentives to plead guilty. More trials pose the risk of case backlogs and increasing demands on limited court personnel and financial resources. Prisons and jails face similar strains on their resources. The rising prison population and the increase in the average amount of time served deplete resources for facilities that already operate beyond capacity in most jurisdictions.

Increasing racial and ethnic disparities in sentencing and incarceration patterns also shape opponents' attitudes toward these laws, as Blacks and Latinos face higher odds of incarceration and longer sentences than Whites do. Some debate remains over whether these disparities reflect greater involvement in crime by racial and ethnic minorities or discrimination. Regardless of the source of this disparity, Black offenders have higher rates of arrests than Whites do. This results in higher numbers of prior convictions, especially felony convictions. Social scientists note that prior felony convictions result in Blacks and Latinos facing the application of three strikes laws. The next section elaborates on the effects of strikes laws on the courts and correctional agencies.

Impact on the Courts and Corrections

Initial information gathered after implementation of these laws suggested that the fears of many opponents appeared to be correct. Specifically, examinations of several states with three strikes laws, particularly Washington and California, showed increases in the court caseloads, namely, the trial component. However, as the states began to adjust to these policies, the overall pattern reversed. The number of admissions to state prisons for those sentenced under these laws is not only relatively low but also below critics' estimates. While the effects on court and corrections caseloads appear not to have manifested as critics expected, racial and ethnic minorities, especially African Americans, face considerable consequences.

Impact on African Americans

Some research indicates that the brunt of the impact created by these policies is borne by African Americans, which raises several issues for these offenders, their families, and their communities. Proponents of three strikes laws argue that although there may be some adverse consequences, the benefits of increased public safety obtained by removing violent offenders from society outweigh them. Critics cite evidence that indicates that contrary to the intent of these laws, many offenders sentenced under these laws are nonviolent property and drug offenders, for whom alternatives to incarceration may serve to meet punitive goals as effectively as, if not more effectively than, prison. Related to this point, although critics agree that some societal benefits accrue in terms of crime reduction when judges impose incarceration sentences, they argue that at some point, rates of incarceration for affected communities pass a threshold that works to their detriment.

Research indicates that high levels of incarceration serve to weaken informal social control mechanisms, which exert greater influence on individuals' conduct than formal social controls imposed by the criminal justice system. In addition, the children of offenders face feelings of abandonment, shame, distrust, alienation, and weakened social bonds with their parents and others, which often leads them to commit crimes. Another area of concern is felony disenfranchisement involving voting rights for convicted felons. Many states have some form of legislation that prevents convicted felons from voting while they are under correctional supervision or for life. These policies arguably pose major threats to the political power of African American communities. Regardless of the impact of these laws on African Americans or others, debates over these policies and their effects are likely to dominate policy initiatives for the near future.

Melissa A. Logue

See also Disproportionate Arrests; Disproportionate Incarceration; Felon Disenfranchisement; Sentencing; Sentencing Disparities, African Americans; Sentencing Disparities, Latina/o/s

Further Readings

- Clark, J., Austin, J., & Henry, D. A. (1997, September). Three strikes and you're out: A review of state legislation (Research in Brief, National Institute of Justice). Retrieved from <http://www.ncjrs.gov/txtfiles/165369.txt>
- Dickey, W. J., & Hollenhorst, P. S. (1998). Three strikes laws: Five years later. Washington, DC: Campaign for an Effective Crime Policy.
- King, R. S., & Mauer, M. (2001). Aging behind bars: Three strikes seven years later. Washington, DC: The Sentencing Project.
- Kovandzic, T. V., Sloan, J. J., III, & Vieraitis, L. M. (2004). Striking out as crime reduction policy: The impact of three strikes laws on crime rates in U.S. cities. Justice Quarterly, 21, 207–239.
- Mauer, M. (1999). The crisis of the young African American male and the criminal justice system (Testimony by Marc Mauer before the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights). Retrieved from http://www.sentencingproject.org/Admin/Documents/publications/rd_crisisoftheyoung.pdf

TILL, EMMETT (1941–1955)

Emmett Louis Till was an African American teenager whose brutal murder in August 1955 galvanized the nascent civil rights movement in the United States. Born in Chicago in 1941 to Mamie and Louis Till, Emmett “Bobo” Till had just turned 14 when he was savagely beaten, shot to death, and his body dumped into the Tallahatchie River near Money, Mississippi. His “crime” was that he had whistled at a White woman. A fisherman found Till 3 days after two White men had abducted him from his great-uncle’s home; his horribly disfigured and bloated body was found with a bullet hole behind his ear and a 70-pound cotton gin fan attached to his neck with barbed wire. African Americans were incensed by the violence inflicted upon such a young boy for a minor infraction of Mississippi’s Jim Crow policies, and the case garnered international outrage when Till’s killers were acquitted by an all-male, all-White jury.

Described by his friends and cousins as a practical joker, Emmett, who spoke with a slight stutter because of a childhood bout with polio, had visited Mississippi only twice before when he was a young boy. Growing up in Chicago, Emmett was unaccustomed to the Jim Crow policies of the South, and Till’s mother had warned her son to mind his manners around Whites. She told him to drop his eyes, and even drop to his knees, for White people if they asked. Till had been in Mississippi a mere 3 days when he and his cousins stopped at a store owned by Roy and Carolyn Bryant, a White couple whose business catered primarily to African American sharecroppers. Accounts of the actual events vary, but Till entered the Bryants’ store on August 24, 1955, purchased two pieces of chewing gum, and exited the store. Carolyn Bryant exited the store shortly thereafter, and Till allegedly whistled at the 21-year-old proprietor. Although his cousin Wheeler said that Emmett had made the whistling sound because he was stuck on a word, his cousins knew that the whistle would bring trouble, so they left hastily and decided not to tell Till’s great-uncle, Mose Wright. Three days later, on August 28, Roy Bryant and his half-brother, J. W. Milam, arrived at the Wrights’ house with a gun, shone a flashlight in Mose Wright’s face, and asked for the boy from Chicago “who had done the talking” in Money. Wright and his wife pleaded with the men and even offered to pay them. Milam told Wright that he would not live to see his 65th birthday if he identified them, and then the men abducted Till.

Despite Milam’s warning, when Emmett had not returned the following day, Wright notified the Leflore County sheriff of his nephew’s abduction. Bryant and Milam admitted to taking the boy but insisted that they had released him. They were arrested for kidnapping and then charged with murder when Till’s body was discovered on August 30, 1955. Bryant and Milam stood trial for the murder of Emmett Till from September 19 to 23, 1955; their defense was that the disfigured body found in the Tallahatchie had not been positively identified as Till’s. During the trial, Wright testified that the body found in the river was Till’s, as evidenced by the engraved signet ring belonging to Till’s father that had been found on the body. Mamie Bradley also testified that Emmett had been wearing his father’s ring and that the body she examined in Chicago was indeed her son.

In a courageous move, Mamie Till Bradley had demanded that her son’s body be sent back to Chicago, where she held an open-casket funeral for an estimated 25,000 to 50,000 mourners. Moreover, Bradley allowed photos of Emmett’s battered body to run in the Chicago Defender and Jet Magazine, bringing worldwide attention to the brutality being inflicted upon African Americans in the southern United States.

Violence against African Americans was nothing new in the Jim Crow South; lynching had been used as a method to intimidate African Americans into “keeping their place” since the 19th century. For over 50 years, a separate “Negro justice” prevailed in the Mississippi Delta; Jim Crow laws depended on an unwritten de facto jurisprudence between African Americans and Whites. Till’s murder occurred 1 year after the landmark Supreme Court decision Brown v. Topeka Board of Education in 1954, which declared segregated educational facilities unconstitutional. In response to the Brown decision, Mississippi Whites had formed citizen’s councils to promote the maintenance of segregation. Just 10 weeks prior to Emmett Till’s arrival in Money, the Supreme Court had issued a decree to commence desegregation with all deliberate speed, and several African Americans had been murdered in Mississippi in the months leading up to Till’s murder. Reverend George Lee, an organizer for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, was murdered in Belzoni for trying to vote, and Lamar Smith was murdered in front of the Brookhaven county courthouse for attempting to register to vote. No one was arrested for either murder. During the Till trial, every juror was contacted by Mississippi citizen’s councils to encourage them to vote the “right way.” The jury deliberated for a mere 67 minutes and returned a not-guilty verdict. One juror later told a journalist that they had drawn out the process by having a soda pop. A grand jury was assembled 2 months later to consider kidnapping charges against Milam and Bryant, but the jury did not indict them and issued a No Bill.

In an interview with William Bradford Huie for Look magazine in January 1956, Bryant and Milam confessed that they had indeed killed Till because he failed to show any remorse for what he had done. Milam died in 1981, and Bryant died in 1994. The Federal Bureau of Investigation in Jackson, Mississippi, reopened the case in 2004, and Emmett Till’s body was exhumed and reexamined in June 2005. To date, no other charges have been brought against Milam, Bryant, or any other person connected with the murder. Nonetheless, Till’s murder is often cited as the spark that began the American civil rights movement; in fact, the Montgomery Bus Boycott led by Martin Luther King, Jr., began just 3 months later, ushering in a decade of activism to end segregation in the South.

Jessica James

See also Hate Crimes; Lynching; Vigilantism; Violent Crime; White Crime

Further Readings

- Federal Bureau of Investigation. (2006). Prosecutive report of investigation concerning Emmett Louis Till. Retrieved from <http://foia.fbi.gov/foiaindex/till.htm>
- Huie, W. B. (1956). The shocking story of approved killing in Mississippi. Look Magazine. Des Moines, IA: Cowles Communications.
- Metress, C. (Ed.). (2002). The lynching of Emmett Till. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press.

- Noe, D. (2007, November 27). Cold case: The murder of Emmett Till. Crime Magazine. Retrieved from <http://crimemagazine.com/06/emmett-till,1127-06.htm>
- Stanley, N. (Producer & Director). (2003). The murder of Emmett Till. [Documentary film]. New York: Public Broadcasting Service.
- Till-Mobley, M., & Benson, C. (2003). Death of innocence: The story of the hate crime that changed America. New York: Random House.

TRIBAL POLICE

In recent years there has been a heightened concern for crime in American Indian and Alaska Native communities (hereafter referred to as Indian Country) and the response to it. This attention is warranted, as data suggest these populations are currently experiencing high rates of crime and victimization. Law enforcement officials, in particular police officers, play a prominent role in a community's ability to fight crime. The purpose of this entry is to explore the unique characteristics and challenges of policing in Indian Country. More specifically, this entry will outline some of the arrangements tribes have for administering justice with state and federal officials as well as some challenges police departments on reservations face.

Indian Country: The Context

American Indian and Alaska Native are terms that describe any person whose origins can be traced to North, Central, or South America and who maintains tribal affiliation. According to the 2000 census, there are approximately 4.3 million American Indians and Alaska Natives (collectively referred to in this entry as American Indians or Natives) in the United States and 562 federally recognized Indian tribes and Alaskan Native groups. A little under half of all Native Americans reside in Indian Country, which comprises more than 50 million acres of land spread across more than 30 continental states. Most of Indian Country is located west of the Mississippi River, but there are some tribes located in the East.

Although they vary significantly in terms of social, economic, and cultural characteristics, most tribes are currently experiencing severe social and economic problems. Native Americans remain the poorest of all minority groups, with unemployment rates hovering around 50%. They have the highest school dropout rate of all racial groups, a rate that is twice the national average. Although there are some densely populated areas on reservations, many Native Americans live in geographically isolated areas. As a consequence, Native Americans and communities are often characterized by high rates of alcoholism and substance abuse, high suicide rates, poor health, lack of affordable housing, substandard education, a critical lack of jobs, and high crime rates.

Available data suggest that crime rates are much higher for Native Americans compared to the national average. According to the National Crime Victimization Survey, American Indians experience a per capita rate of violence that is twice the amount of the U.S. resident population. Among American Indians ages 25 to 34, the rate of violent crime victimization is more than twice the rate for all persons in the same age category. Much of the crime appears to be alcohol related; approximately 62% of American Indian victims report experiencing violence by an offender under the influence of alcohol. This is much higher than the national average of 42%. Increased youth gang activity in the past few years has also increased the violent crime in Indian Country. Yet despite this, the violent crime arrest rate of American Indians declined 26% between the years 1992 and 2001.

Policing in Indian Country

Policing in Indian Country is complex; law enforcement can be the responsibility of the local, tribal, state, or federal government depending on the race of the offender and victim, the location of the crime, and the actual crime committed. Many tribes utilize Public Law 93-638, which allows tribes the opportunity to create their own police department and criminal justice system by contracting with the Bureau of Indian Affairs. Police officers and employees in this arrangement are tribal members. This is the most common way for tribes to have greater control over their police departments. Police departments in Indian Country are also administered by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, but in this arrangement employees and officers are federal employees. As a result of Public Law 83-280, a number of tribes must rely on state authorities for police services. Finally, American Indian police departments can also receive complete funding from tribal finances. This arrangement allows for tribes to have the highest degree of organizational freedom and tribal control of their criminal justice system, but it is rare because of tribal resource constraints.

There are approximately 154 local tribal police departments in operation in Indian Country. The number of police officers employed at each department varies greatly depending on tribal size, available resources, and demand. As of September, 2004, there were a total of 2,490 sworn full-time tribal officers. Most police officers are high school graduates and certified in law enforcement training academies, although it does not necessarily follow that they are well qualified or experienced. Slightly more than half are Native American. They provide a wide range of services, including responding to calls for service, executing arrest warrants, serving court papers, providing court security, performing search and rescue operations, participating in crime prevention activities, and enforcing traffic laws. Several tribal police departments are also responsible for operating one or more jails.

The sovereignty of each tribe, coupled with the various police arrangements, makes it impossible to delineate a typical police department in Indian Country. Nonetheless, it is possible to provide a broad description with the caveat that there are tremendous variations among tribes. The typical police department is responsible for patrolling an area the size of Delaware with a population of approximately 10,000 people. Oftentimes there are no more than three officers patrolling at a time and sometimes as few as one. The distance between police departments and parts of the reservation spans 100 miles or more; thus it may take several hours for officers to respond to calls. The majority of calls for service and arrests are for alcohol-related offenses.

The current state of policing in Indian Country leaves much to be desired. Despite the limited resource base, most police departments are attempting to cope with an increasing workload. This workload is a result of high crime rates and greater demands by the community for police services. Due to jurisdictional complexities, officers often have to answer to multiple authorities; they operate with little direction from their leaders, and they may fail to establish relationships with the citizens and other agencies. Furthermore, police officers must deal with political interference, which inhibits their ability to be fair and decreases their credibility in the community. These problems are exacerbated because many police departments have organizational structures and police standards that are contrary to the tribe's culture and expectations. The disjunction between the community's needs and the officer's duty creates additional stress.

Avenues for Increasing Police Effectiveness

Despite the problems that plague policing in Indian Country, there are several avenues that can increase police effectiveness, including cooperative agreements, community policing, and adequate resources.

A tribal-federal or tribal-state cooperative agreement is a potential mechanism for generating more effective tribal law enforcement control. These agreements are not without criticisms, including inadequate funding and slow responses to reservation calls by non-Indian agencies. Another serious criticism is that such agreements encourage a crime control model of policing that is contrary to the American Indian culture. Despite these criticisms, many tribes have these agreements and report several benefits. In particular, they report increased crime control, increased mutual assistance, faster response times, and greater resources, including staff, equipment, and facilities.

Community policing is an approach that holds great promise in increasing the effectiveness of policing in Indian Country. Most tribal police chiefs agree that community involvement is important because the community has a stake in the success of the department's efforts. Compared to the Western punitive crime control model, community policing provides a framework that fits with the traditional Native American approach to law enforcement. Some of the advantages of community policing include reduction of fear, increased citizen satisfaction, and increased officer morale and job satisfaction. Community policing also brings law enforcement into closer and more frequent contact with the public. Because of these advantages, some believe that community policing is the first step for improving policing in tribal communities.

Of paramount importance are sufficient resources for reservation police, relating to not only funding but training as well. As it currently stands, many argue that the funding levels are too low to support adequate law enforcement in Indian Country. For example, the number of police officers per capita in Indian Country is significantly less than the national average (1.3 compared to 2.3), yet violent crime in Indian Country is at least double the national average. Because many communities are widely distributed, having adequate personnel is critical. This is especially the case for remote locations in Alaska, where location and weather can prevent officers from arriving on the scene for days. Unfortunately, this is one of the most glaring problems facing Indian Country law enforcement today. Reservation police chiefs are in general agreement that the primary resource need is more personnel, including patrol officers. However, tribal police departments lack the incentives to attract officers because they cannot afford to pay reasonable salaries.

Training is also a fundamental resource need. In addition to greater trust, enhanced professional knowledge, and skills, training increases the level of recognition of tribal police by other law enforcement agencies. Ongoing training is necessary to keep officers up to date with contemporary practices and techniques of policing. Importantly, training should be local so that officers have a better understanding of the government and culture of the particular tribe for which they work.

Conclusion

Policing in Indian Country is both unique and complex. It is unique because each tribal nation is sovereign; thus, each tribe has the ability to create its own laws and criminal justice system. It is complex because of the overlapping tribal, state, and federal jurisdictions. Despite this diversity, all reservation police departments face significant crime problems and must do so with limited resources. They must operate within a complicated jurisdictional web, whereby they answer to multiple authorities and may lack a clear direction from their tribal and state governments. The language and cultural diversity exhibited by tribal nations and their geographic isolation also make it difficult to police reservations. These problems affect the quality and effectiveness of policing in Indian Country as well as the community's willingness to utilize their services.

Although the workload of Native American police departments is increasing at a substantial rate, many tribes are making significant advancements in their ability to effectively police their communities. Tribes use cooperative arrangements with either the state or the federal government to increase the number of resources and personnel available to their reservation. Many tribes are also gravitating away from a crime control model of policing to a community policing approach. By doing so, tribes are better able to implement policing strategies and goals that are more in keeping with traditional Native American values.

Jaclyn Smith

See also Native American Courts; Native Americans; Victimization, Native American

Further Readings

- Goldberg, C., & Singleton, H. V. (2005). Public Law 280 and law enforcement in Indian Country: Research priorities. Retrieved from <http://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/nij/209839.pdf>
- Hickman, M. (2003). Tribal law enforcement, 2000 [Fact sheet]. Retrieved from Bureau of Justice Statistics website: <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/pub/pdf/tle00.pdf>
- Perry, S. (2005, December). Census of tribal justice agencies in Indian Country, 2002. Retrieved from Bureau of Justice Statistics website: <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/pub/pdf/ctjaic02.pdf>
- Reaves, B. A. (2007, June). Census of state and local law enforcement agencies, 2004 (NCJ Publication No. 212749). Retrieved from Bureau of Justice Statistics website: <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/pub/pdf/csllea04.pdf>
- Wakeling, S., Jorgensen, M., Michaelson, S., & Begay, M. (2001). Policing on American Indian Reservations: A report to the National Institute of Justice. Retrieved from <http://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/nij/grants/180774.pdf>
- Wood, D. (2000). Turnover among Alaska village public safety officers: An examination of the factors associated with attrition. Retrieved from <http://justice.uaa.alaska.edu/research/1990/9901vpso/9901vpso.pdf>

“TRULY DISADVANTAGED”

The phrase “truly disadvantaged” refers to a segment of the American population often referred to as the “underclass” or the “ghetto underclass,” predominantly Black, who often live in inner cities and urban areas stricken with poverty, family instability, unemployment, a poor educational system, and crime. This population also suffers from problems such as high rates of drug addiction, out-of-wedlock births, and welfare dependency. The number of truly disadvantaged is increasing, as unsound public policies continue to increase poverty while also failing to create opportunities for those living in these areas. Thus, hopelessness is often an attribute that is seen among the underclass.

The Concept of the Truly Disadvantaged

The term truly disadvantaged originated in the work of William Julius Wilson. Wilson is known for his book, The Truly Disadvantaged: The Inner City, the Underclass, and Public Policy, in which he addresses the issue of the poor who, as a class, have become socially isolated into certain geographic areas. Inevitably, this has had an effect on the continuance of and increase in the incidence of poverty. While in Wilson’s research the truly disadvantaged were primarily African American, the term also refers to members of any ethnic group with high levels of poverty. The growth of this underclass has resulted chiefly from economic decisions that have adversely affected the unemployment opportunities of urban residents over the past half century.

In the 1950s and 1960s African American males began to experience higher unemployment rates as a result of agricultural jobs that they once performed in the South being increasingly taken over by mechanical labor. This led many to travel to the North in search of work. However, in the 1970s the labor market was flooded with White women, and by members of the baby boom generation who were entering the workforce for the first time with more skills and education than most of these men possessed. The same period also witnessed the closing of manufacturing plants in the North, where many Black men had worked, for example, in steel and automobile manufacturing.

As time went on, the number of jobs that required formal education increased, and Black men were unable to catch up. Jobs that required less education were moving away from the inner city, so Black men had fewer job opportunities. This affected, in turn, the family structure in primarily African American neighborhoods. Women did not want to marry men who were unemployed and unable to support themselves. This led to the increase in female-headed households; women had fewer options for marrying men in their neighborhood, who lacked the means necessary to start a family.

The pattern of loss of jobs helped to create the underclass seen in inner cities, but there were also other factors. In these neighborhoods there existed working-class and middle-class Blacks, living side by side. But as middle-class Blacks began to prosper, many moved out of the neighborhood. This was detrimental to working-class families, who now were without positive role models, or “social buffers,” as Wilson calls them, for the neighborhood children and other adults in the neighborhood. At times, these residents had acted as a stabilizing influence. With their departure, all that remained were the families who were too poor to leave the neighborhood. This further increased the gap between middle-class African Americans and those poor families who have stayed. Policies such as affirmative action tend to benefit middle-class Blacks more so than the underclass, who lack the education and job skills that they might otherwise use to get ahead through affirmative action initiatives.

Wilson identifies historical racism as the reason for the modern-day racism that has led to the creation of today’s underclass, the truly disadvantaged. In the past, racism was overt. There were laws that enabled discrimination against Blacks in employment and education. After the civil rights movement and the passage of the Civil Rights Act in 1964, it became illegal to discriminate against a person based on race. However, more covert ways of discrimination began to emerge, which have contributed to the creation of the truly disadvantaged. As a result of the Civil Rights Act, Blacks could now legally live or work anywhere they chose. Yet the majority could not afford to live in White suburban neighborhoods or to attend college or job training. Furthermore, many of the government programs that followed the passage of civil rights legislation continued to neglect poor Blacks.

Truly Disadvantaged Women

Much attention in the literature is focused on the issues of truly disadvantaged men. However, the women who fall into this category deserve special consideration. In poor, urban neighborhoods, Wilson acknowledges that a great number of teens are having out-of-wedlock births. He rejects, however, the idea that welfare benefits have directly contributed to the decrease in traditional family living and the increase in out-of-wedlock births. Wilson notes that studies on the subject have found only a moderate relationship between welfare benefits and marital status. The status of the current benefits may influence the living situations of unmarried teen mothers. Currently, the welfare system is set up so that it is in the financial interest of the woman to live alone rather than to reside with her parents or a partner.

Women who are among the truly disadvantaged are faced with scant opportunities for education and employment. Their decisions to have children are often not based on a life plan but are often unplanned or accidental.

Conclusion

To combat the many problems seen among the truly disadvantaged, Wilson has emphasized the importance of providing job and educational training to the poor. To accomplish this, a strategy needs to be implemented on a national level. In addition, Wilson suggests the need for universal health care. Many poor, unemployed individuals cannot afford health care and suffer as a result. Reforming existing social structures to enable the poor to have greater access to health care would allow them to better compete for jobs, because it would help eliminate illness as a cause of unemployment.

Shelly Clevenger

See also Code of the Streets; Family and Delinquency; Focal Concerns Theory; Institutional Racism; Racism; Structural–Cultural Perspective

Further Readings

- Wilson, W. J. (1980). The declining significance of race: Blacks and changing American institutions. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Wilson, W. J. (1981). The Black community in the 1980s: Questions of race, class and public policy. Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 54, 26–41.
- Wilson, W. J. (1984). The Black underclass. Wilson Quarterly, 8, 88–99.
- Wilson, W. J. (1987). The truly disadvantaged: The inner city, the underclass, and public policy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

TULIA, TEXAS, DRUG STING

Early in the morning of July 23, 1999, dozens of arrests occurred in the town of Tulia, a small town in the Texas panhandle. As part of a drug sting operation, police raided homes and arrested people, most of whom had no idea what was going on, why they were being arrested, or what crime they were supposed to have committed. A total of 46 people (approximately 20% of the town's population) were targeted in this mass arrest, 40 of whom were African American. The six non-African Americans arrested had strong ties to the African American community in Tulia. Afterward, Tulia would become known as a place where a grave injustice had taken place, but only after many of the town's African American citizens had been tried, convicted, and sent to prison.

From the beginning of this sting operation, there were questions about everything from how the evidence was gathered to why so many people in Tulia were being arrested. Some wondered who was buying all of the drugs that were being sold by so many alleged dealers. It was clear, however, that Tulia's law enforcement officials had targeted the town's small African American population, among whom many were unemployed and living on a relatively small income, in public housing or trailer courts. This entry reviews the investigation that preceded the arrests, the trials and their outcome, and the aftermath, which eventually led to pardons of all those who had been convicted.

Undercover Investigation

Among the citizens of Tulia there had been concern about incidents of illegal drug use, and in an effort to clean up the town, the officials of Tulia hired a private informant, Tom Coleman, to work undercover as a narcotics agent to seek out drug dealers. Coleman was hired for this position despite a questionable past and no experience in the area of undercover narcotics. In the course of his undercover assignment, Coleman claimed to have made over 100 drug buys in the small town, using the alias of "T. J." This would have been a major accomplishment for even an experienced narcotics agent, but in the case of Coleman, lacking previous experience, it seemed a nearly impossible claim. Notwithstanding Coleman's claim, searches related to the drug busts failed to turn up any evidence related to drug dealing.

Coleman claimed that as he was working undercover, he wrote down important information on his leg when nobody was watching. The small amount of evidence that Coleman was able to piece together was inconsistent and unreliable. Most of the arrests made dealt with powdered cocaine, a substance most of the poor African Americans in Tulia could hardly afford. After making the arrests and claiming to have evidence on each person arrested, Coleman was unable to identify many of these same people in court.

Without Due Process

The only evidence offered in the trial was that based on the work of Coleman. In essence, those who were arrested in Tulia were tried, convicted, and sent to prison, all entirely based on Coleman's word. The accused citizens also lacked the funds to hire lawyers, so they were represented by court-appointed attorneys. The result was nearly all of those arrested ended up being falsely accused and charged.

Coleman was living in the shadow of his father, a former Texas Ranger. His goal, it seems, was to make a huge drug bust by any means possible, whether legal or not. As the accused drug dealers started going to trial, they were quickly convicted by the all-White juries hearing the cases in Tulia. In nearly all of the trials of the accused, nothing was brought up about Coleman's past career in law enforcement or his lack of evidence in the Tulia cases. The juries that convicted the accused believed that they were convicting drug dealers. In fact, after the arrests were made, it was widely believed that the law enforcement personnel had cleaned up Tulia and had virtually eliminated the city's drug problem.

Nearly all of the 46 people arrested were charged with dealing cocaine, and 7 of these people received prison terms. Fourteen people pleaded guilty, believing that this would be their best chance at a lesser sentence.

Even though a few of the accused admitted they had sold drugs to Coleman when he was working undercover, many more claimed that they did not even recognize Coleman. At the time of the trials, nobody seemed especially concerned whether the accused were receiving fair and adequate legal representation. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the American Civil Liberties Union filed complaints alleging racial discrimination and prosecutorial misconduct, as well as violations of the defendants' rights under the Fourth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments.

The Accused

One of the accused, Joe Moore, a farmer, received an especially long sentence of 90 years and was, according to Coleman, one of the leaders of the drug operation in Tulia. In a very short time, Coleman had gone from an inexperienced narcotics officer to the most celebrated lawman in Texas. Many viewed him as a hero who had rescued Tulia from the problem of drug dealers. Nearly everyone arrested was charged with selling small amounts of cocaine, but the charges were increased because Coleman alleged that the drugs were sold within a short distance of a nearby school. This charge was made even though most of the defendants lived in a trailer court located several miles from the school where the drugs were alleged to have been sold. The result was much longer sentences for those accused.

Another arrested Tulsa resident was Cash Love, accused by Coleman of selling drugs. Love is Caucasian but has strong ties to the African American community in Tulsa and ended up being sentenced to over 300 years in prison. It is believed that Cash was made an example, so that the drug sting did not appear racist. Consider the case of Tonya White, another citizen of Tulsa accused of selling cocaine. Coleman claimed that she sold him drugs at the same time she was actually in Oklahoma City making a withdrawal at a local bank. After White was able to produce a withdrawal slip with her name plus the time and date on it, the case was dropped. Another person turned out to have been at work, at his place of employment, when Coleman alleged that the accused had been elsewhere, selling cocaine to him.

The Aftermath

Eventually, a group of lawyers from around the country, working pro bono, secured new trials for the residents of Tulsa accused of drug trafficking. Many of the accused had already served time in prison before anyone had attempted to reopen their cases. In 2003, Texas Governor Rick Perry issued a pardon for those accused in the Tulsa case. The falsely accused citizens of Tulsa have also since sought out monetary compensation for false arrest, loss of income, and suffering, and a lawsuit was filed on their behalf. In March 2004, a $5 million settlement was agreed on as compensation for having been falsely accused and, in many cases, sent to prison. At the same time, the federally funded narcotics task force responsible for the arrests was disbanded. Tom Coleman was charged with and convicted of perjury. The conviction ended his career in law enforcement, and he received a sentence of 10 years' probation.

Mitch Ruesink

See also Crack Epidemic; Disproportionate Arrests; Disproportionate Incarceration; Drug Sentencing; War on Drugs

Further Readings

- Drug Policy Alliance Network. (2007). Drugs, police and the law: Tulsa, Texas. Retrieved from <http://www.drugpolicy.org/law/police/tulia/index.cfm>
- Gabbidon, S. L., & Greene, H. T. (2005). Race and crime (see highlight box 4.2, pp. 117–120). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
- Hockstader, L. (2002, August 28). Texas to review Tulsa drug sting. The Washington Post, p. A2.

TULSA, OKLAHOMA, RACE RIOT OF 1921

The Tulsa Race Riot took place on May 31 and June 1, 1921, in the economically prosperous Greenwood section of Tulsa, Oklahoma. Some 35 square blocks of Black-owned businesses and homes were burned to the ground, and more than 300 people were killed. The immediate cause of the violence was a sharp rise in racial tensions fueled by an inflammatory story that appeared in the Tulsa Tribune, describing an encounter between a Black man and a White woman in Tulsa's business district. The newspaper's highly distorted account of the event led to the forming of a racist lynch mob and ultimately to the destruction of a thriving African American community amid great loss of life. Only after nearly 50 years of official silence, amounting to a virtual taboo on the subject, was an investigation finally authorized.

Allegations of Interracial Assault

The origin of the riot lay in the allegations of Sarah Page, a White elevator operator in the Drexel office building in downtown Tulsa. Page alleged that she had been assaulted by Dick Rowland, a young Black man who operated a shoe shine stand in the building. Rowland, like other Negroes, was not permitted under Jim Crow laws to use the restroom in downtown business establishments. Intending to use the facility on the fourth floor, he tripped while entering the elevator because the elevator platform was not level with the floor. In an attempt to break his fall he grabbed Page's arm, which frightened her. Her cry of "Rape!" attracted the attention of Whites in the establishment, and in the ensuing commotion and amid accusations, Mr. Rowland became nervous and fled the building. Arrested and questioned, he gave an account that contradicted the account provided by Page. Rumors of the incident had quickly begun to spread around Tulsa, and it was thought prudent to keep Rowland in custody for his protection. Shortly thereafter, the Tribune published the article that ultimately led to the riot.

The Tribune Story

Rumors of the encounter in the elevator of the Drexel building continued to circulate. Although the chief detective stated that the case for prosecution was uncertain, Rowland was kept in protective custody. Meanwhile, Tribune publisher Richard Lloyd Jones, in keeping with the standards of “yellow journalism,” saw an opportunity to sensationalize the incident and thereby perhaps boost the circulation of his newspaper. Under the headline “Nab Negro for Attacking Girl in Elevator,” the story appeared alongside another story, featuring pictures of local White beauty pageant contestants. Jones exaggerated the details of the story and invented for Rowland the nickname “Diamond Dick,” describing him as a predator who had committed a premeditated assault on Page. He reported that Rowland had looked down the hallway, jumped into the elevator, scratched Page’s arm, and begun tearing off her clothes. Jones’s lies contradicted both Page’s and Rowland’s accounts, but the combination of story placement, sensational headline, and lurid details incited outrage and created an uproar among some White citizens, who railed publicly against the Negro perpetrator and called for his immediate release to vigilantes intent on administering “justice.” Further inflaming the already charged atmosphere, as Tim Madigan notes, newsboys were yelling, “Extra! Extra! To Lynch a Negro Tonight! Read All About It!”

Some of Tulsa’s citizens regarded the headlines skeptically and viewed the story simply as a means for Jones to seek monetary gain and a competitive edge over the rival newspaper, the World. For others, however, the Tribune’s account was all that was necessary to bring racial tensions in Tulsa to a boil. When reports of an impending Negro lynching traveled back to the Tribune office, editors pleaded with Jones to retrieve the edition containing the story. By the time Jones agreed, it was too late; the newsboys were unsuccessful in their efforts to get the newspapers back. Shortly after learning how the story was affecting the citizenry, the sheriff’s deputies secretly moved Rowland to a safer location, a jail cell on the fourth floor of the courthouse.

A Lynch Mob Assembles

By the afternoon of May 31, 1921, an angry mob of White citizens began to assemble before the county courthouse. Sheriff William McCullough assured Dick Rowland that he would live to see his day in court even if the townspeople wanted to see him lynched. Three Klansmen from out of town arrived at the courthouse with intentions to gain access to Rowland. McCullough turned them away without incident, but one then spoke to the crowd, saying, “The honor and purity of White women everywhere is at issue right here in Tulsa! A young orphan girl has been horribly violated! Can Tulsa stand by for that?” Sheriff McCullough tried to calm the mob but without success. He went back inside the courthouse and advised his deputies to shoot anyone that entered with intent to harm the suspect.

Greenwood Citizens Respond

As rumors of a forthcoming lynching reached Greenwood, prominent Black citizens began to mobilize efforts to make sure that Dick Rowland would not die the way that White murderer Roy Melton had; the previous sheriff had surrendered that prisoner to an angry mob to be hanged. The Greenwood residents loaded cars and marched single file with weapons to the courthouse to protect Rowland. When the mob saw weapons being brandished, they retreated to their homes and to the National Guard Armory for guns and ammunition. The Black citizens’ militant stance was viewed as an unacceptable threat against the White citizens of Tulsa, and Whites assembled by the score to respond.

McCullough convinced the armed Black citizens to return to Greenwood, but they later reconvened at the rumor of Whites storming the courthouse. The rumor was untrue, but more Greenwood men gathered to protect Rowland. A tall, Black World War I veteran named O. B. Mann directed his associates to form a line to guard the courthouse entrance. According to witnesses, Mann stood his post when an older, White man approached him, saying, "Nigger, what are you going to do with that pistol?" Mann replied, "I'm going to use it if I need to." The White man said, "No, you give it me," and Mann replied, "Like hell I will." The old White man lunged for the pistol and, in the ensuing tussle, the gun discharged. Immediately, hundreds of shots rang out.

The Tulsa Riot

The shootout at the courthouse ignited the Tulsa Race Riot of 1921. What had begun days before as an encounter between two people in an elevator had now become an armed mass conflict. The White man who had initiated the confrontation was among the first to die. Sheriff McCullough understood that he could do nothing to halt the melee outside the courthouse. Whites began to fire on any Black person in sight, and many lifeless bodies, mostly Negro, lay on the streets. The Black residents of Tulsa retreated beyond the tracks into Greenwood. During that day and the next, many families lost their savings, their property, and their lives. Klansmen forced Black families out of their homes, and those who resisted were shot. Homes and businesses were looted, and mobs brought trucks to carry off the valuables of the more affluent Negro families. Afterward, houses and places of business in Greenwood were burned to the ground.

Surrendering Blacks were rounded up and treated as prisoners of war. They were paraded, with hands raised, through the streets of Tulsa to the Convention Center and a baseball park. As they were led in, crowds of White Tulsans cheered. Some Blacks were shot to death, while some Whites fired shots at the feet of those who did not move fast enough during the procession. Several Blacks were tied to car bumpers and dragged to their deaths; others were tied together and pulled by a motorcycle police officer.

Destruction of Greenwood

As gunfire ceased momentarily, Whites were planning a more vicious attack. At 5:08 a.m. a loud whistle was the signal for Whites to invade Greenwood. Corpses already lay throughout Greenwood, some burned and others shot to death. The National Guard received orders from the governor to protect the Whites from the "Negro uprising." This order turned into an outright attack on the Black citizens of Tulsa, in which airplane assaults were used to lethal effect and to ensure the burning of Greenwood. Approximately 75 residents were killed in the aerial attack. During the burning, neither fire trucks nor ambulances were permitted in the area. Anyone attempting to defy mob orders would be threatened with their own demise. In all, 35 square blocks of Greenwood were burned to the ground, including hotels, drugstores, movie theaters, grocery stores, law offices, dry cleaners, schools, residential zones, churches, service stations, and other establishments. At the end, over 300 Blacks and 13 Whites lay dead, and more than 4,000 Blacks were left homeless.

Aftermath of the Riot

Afterward, Negroes were blamed for having instigated the Tulsa race riot; Greenwood residents' attempt to defend Dick Rowland for an alleged offense against a White woman caused some Whites to hold the Black citizens of Tulsa collectively responsible for the tragedy. But other Whites believed that the riot was caused by drunken White out-of-towners, who were given license to exercise their racist beliefs toward the "uppity" Negroes of Greenwood. After the riot had ended, several benefactors were interested in providing resources to help rebuild Greenwood, but funds were refused by the mayor of Tulsa. Many former residents remained homeless and lived in tents provided by the Red Cross; others left with intentions never to return.

Early on, Greenwood, in spite of its location in the segregated South, had become a beacon of success among Negro communities across the United States. Many of its citizens were educated and had strived to achieve prosperity. They owned their homes and businesses and had become a proudly self-sustaining Negro community. Years later, Black survivors of the riot of 1921 spoke with pride of the wealth attained in their former community and of the envy this had created among many of the White citizens of Tulsa.

In September 1921, Sarah Page decided to drop the charges against Dick Rowland, who had been smuggled out of town on the morning of June 1, 1921, by sheriff's deputies, and sent to Kansas City. Page also later relocated to Kansas City following her divorce, and Rowland's mother told an interviewer that Page and Rowland saw each other often, and that Page admitted to feeling terrible that the police had arrested Rowland for something he did not do. Of her feelings concerning the riot and the fiery demise of Greenwood, no record remains.

The Tulsa Race Riot Commission was formed in 1997 to investigate the riot. The commission recommended that the state pay restitution, including payment to surviving victims. Although the Oklahoma legislature passed the 1921 Tulsa Race Riot Reconciliation Act in 2001, it did not implement the commission's recommendations. A legal team led by Johnnie Cochran and Charles Ogletree sought compensation for victims and their families, but the suit was ultimately dismissed.

Vincent E. Miles

See also Lynching; Media, Print; Race Relations; Race Riots; Vigilantism

Further Readings

- Hirsch, J. A. (2002). Riot and remembrance: The Tulsa race war and its legacy. New York: Houghton Mifflin.
- Madigan, T. (2001). The burning: Massacre, destruction, and the Tulsa Race Riot of 1921. New York: Thomas Dunne Books.

than for any significant scientific findings. When the study's true nature was made public, 40 years after the project began, the effect was not only a national scandal but a considerable increase in distrust by African Americans toward the U.S. government. This entry examines the design and implementation of the Tuskegee study and discusses its lasting social implications and its impact on research methodology and ethics.

Background of the Study

In 1928 a Chicago-based philanthropic organization, the Julius Rosenwald Fund, approached the U.S. Public Health Service (PHS) in an effort to improve health care services and education for Black Americans in the rural South. Previously, the PHS had conducted a study in Mississippi concluding that 25% of more than 2,000 Black participants had tested positive for syphilis. On the basis of these findings, the two groups collaborated to improve syphilis treatment in the region of Mississippi where the study took place. The initial project was a success, and the PHS requested additional monies from the Rosenwald Fund to expand the project into five additional poor rural counties in Georgia, Tennessee, North Carolina, Virginia, and Alabama. Referred to as "syphilis control demonstrations," the project was designed to first test for syphilis and later provide treatment for the disease within these Black communities. The expanded program was funded from 1929 to 1931. During that time, researchers determined the Alabama site, Macon County, had the highest rates of syphilis, 35% to 40% of those tested.

Prior to the beginning of the treatment phase of the project, the financial impact of the Depression had eliminated its philanthropic funding. The PHS no longer had the financial resources needed to develop and implement treatment programs. Rather than abandon the research, the PHS decided to modify the focus of the study from detecting and treating syphilis to studying the health effects of untreated syphilis. This "revised" study was intended to continue for 6 months to 1 year. Optimistic researchers believed that documenting the negative health effects of untreated

TUSKEGEE SYPHILIS STUDY

The Tuskegee Syphilis Study is most often remembered for its unethical research design rather syphilis would lend support for improved medical attention for Blacks and force southern legislators to fund treatment programs.

How could a project originating from such good intentions result in one of the most often cited examples of unethical research? Clearly the social and cultural beliefs of the time must be considered when analyzing the design and implementation of the revised study. During that period in U.S. history, strong beliefs about racial disparities prevailed. Specifically, Blacks were still widely believed to be physically and mentally inferior to Whites; they were segregated within society and treated as second-class citizens. The PHS, Tuskegee Institute, and other participating agencies were certainly influenced by these factors when designing and carrying out the revised study.

Renamed “The Tuskegee Study of Untreated Syphilis in the Negro Male,” the study began in 1932 and ended in 1972. The new study was designed to record the long-term effects of untreated syphilis in Black males. Research conducted in Norway on untreated syphilis in White males had been published in 1929. The researcher concluded that untreated syphilis resulted primarily in cardiovascular damage. American scientists disagreed with the findings and believed syphilis affected Blacks and Whites differently. American scientists believed untreated syphilis chiefly affected neurological systems in Whites but, due to purported lower intellectual abilities, instead chiefly affected cardiovascular systems in Blacks. It was this belief that fueled the continuation of the study.

Macon County, Alabama, was selected for the study because of the already established high rates of syphilis within the Black population. The original study consisted of 399 syphilis-infected subjects and 201 noninfected subjects. Believing the subjects would not be able to understand medical terminology, researchers told subjects they were being tested, and treated, for “bad blood.” A common term within the community, “bad blood” included a variety of ailments, including syphilis and fatigue. In exchange for participating in the study, the men received medical exams, treatment for illnesses other than syphilis, free meals, free transportation to and from examinations, and free burial if an autopsy was performed after their death.

The Study Exposed

After 40 years of ongoing research, the true nature of the study was exposed to the public. In 1972 the first newspaper article about the study was published, calling into question the validity of the government’s research. It should be noted that several articles based on the findings of the study had been published in medical and research journals throughout the 40 years of the study. However, when the story was published in the newspaper for the general public, it became clear that participants had been lied to not only by the government about the true nature of the research but also by those trusted institutions enlisted to encourage participation. For example, churches, schools, employers, and Black doctors and nurses were used as sources of potential subjects and to keep track of participants.

Many people were infuriated to learn that treatment had been deliberately withheld from infected subjects, even after simple penicillin treatments were discovered in the 1940s. In addition, the recognition that it was known that untreated individuals posed significant health risks to others and were needlessly suffering the effects of the disease illustrated the cruelty of the study. In 1997, 25 years after the study ended, President Bill Clinton offered the first public apology for the study.

Consequences

In relation to research design, methodology, and ethics, Tuskegee and government researchers violated basic research principles, such as informed consent, not deceiving subjects, and guaranteeing anonymity/confidentiality to participants. This has had a lasting effect on trust within the Black community when it comes to participating in research. Researchers have confronted fears stemming from the Tuskegee study as reasons not to take part in AIDS and HIV research. The Tuskegee Syphilis Study has become synonymous with government conspiracy and abuse of trust.

If there is one positive outcome of the Tuskegee study, and other questionable studies, it is the creation of the Institutional Review Board (IRB). IRBs are charged with reviewing and approving research proposals that include human subjects before the research begins. This process allows others to scrutinize the proposed research for any unethical and/or harmful behavior in an attempt to prevent any future research like the Tuskegee Syphilis Study.

Amie R. Scheidegger

See also HIV/AIDS; Race Relations

Further Readings

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. (n.d.).

U.S. Public Health Service syphilis study at Tuskegee:

The Tuskegee timeline. Retrieved May 12, 2007, from <http://www.cdc.gov/tuskegee/timeline.htm>

Jones, J. (1981). Bad blood: The Tuskegee syphilis experiment—A tragedy of race and medicine. New York: The Free Press.

Reverby, S. M. (Ed.). (2000). Tuskegee's truths: Rethinking the Tuskegee Syphilis Study. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Thomas, S. B., & Quinn, S. C. (1991). The Tuskegee Syphilis Study, 1932 to 1972: Implications for HIV education and AIDS risk education programs in the Black community. American Journal of Public Health, 81, 1498–1505.

UNITED STATES v. ANTELOPE

In the 1977 case of United States v. Gabriel Francis Antelope, the U.S. Supreme Court held that no violation of due process or equal protection occurred, wherein three Coeur d'Alene Indian men were charged and prosecuted under federal law based upon the fact that the crime occurred on an Indian reservation, which is a federal enclave. A federal enclave is a designated geographic region over which the federal government holds sole jurisdiction, as permitted by Article 1, Section 8, clause 17 of the U.S. Constitution. A federal enclave is distinguished from territories and possessions obtained under other constitutional provisions. The Court further held that there was no equal protection violation in the federal charge of felony murder, although the state of Idaho did not have a felony murder rule.

Gabriel Antelope, Leonard Davison, and William Davison broke into the house of Emma Johnson on the night of February 18, 1974. Although she was not a Coeur d'Alene Indian, the 81-year-old woman resided within the boundaries of the Coeur d'Alene Reservation in the state of Idaho. The three men, who were enrolled Coeur d'Alene Indians, proceeded to rob and murder Johnson and burglarize her home.

The three men were charged in federal court with the crimes of felony murder, burglary, and robbery. This was done under the authority of Title 18 of the U.S. Code, which is commonly known as the Major Crimes Act and was written specifically to delineate the procedure to be followed when "Indians" committed criminal violations while on reservation land. Title 18 of the U.S. Code (USC §1153) states:

Offenses committed within Indian country (a) Any Indian who commits against the person or property of another Indian or other person any of the following offenses, namely, murder, . . . burglary, robbery, . . . within the Indian country, shall be subject to the same law and penalties as all other persons committing any of the above offenses, within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States.

Antelope and Leonard Davison were found guilty of all three charges. William Davison was convicted of one charge, second-degree murder.

Antelope and Leonard Davison appealed their convictions for felony murder to the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals based upon the claim that they were the victims of racial discrimination violating their Fifth Amendment due process and equal protection rights. Their claim stated that had they been non-Indian they would have been tried under Idaho state law, which did not have a felony murder provision; therefore, to try them by federal law was an aggrievous race-based discrimination that put them at undue danger to life and limb. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the original convictions for felony murder because it determined that the lesser standard required of the prosecutor in federal court, or the elimination of the requirement to show premeditation and deliberation by the respondents, did put the respondents “at a serious racially-based disadvantage” (523 F. 2d 400, 406 (1975)). After the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the felony murder portion of their convictions, the Supreme Court granted certiorari to review the felony murder conviction.

The defendants alleged to the Supreme Court that their Fifth Amendment due process and equal protection rights had been violated by the choice to pursue charges under federal law that applied to them unfairly only because of their enrollment as Coeur d’Alene Indians, rather than an Idaho state prosecution that would apply to everyone else. As a second claim, they alleged that the difference in laws and sanctions between the federal jurisdiction and the state created unlawful discrimination against enrolled Indians.

The Supreme Court disagreed on both counts. Basing their decision upon the U.S. Constitution, precedent, and the history of relations between Indian tribes and the American government, the Supreme Court held that charging the three defendants under federal law was not racially discriminatory and, therefore, a violation of neither equal protection nor due process. Stating that all persons upon federal enclaves were subject to the identical federal law, these defendants were not treated differently than any other violator of law would have been. Last, the Court notes in footnotes that the supremacy clause of the U.S. Constitution, Article VI, clause 1.2, voids any sort of forum shopping by defendants for a court with the most sympathetic penalties.

As to the difference between federal and state law, the Court held that both the federal legislature and the state legislature have the right to promulgate law for their respective jurisdictions, even if those laws differ in content and penalty. As long as each set of laws is consistent and impartial, there is no due process violation. In footnotes, the Court went further to note that based upon precedent, if the defendants had been tried in state court those convictions could have been overturned for lack of jurisdiction.

Maldine Beth Bailey

See also Native American Courts; Native Americans

Further Readings

- Keeble v. United States*, 412 U.S. 205, 93 S.Ct. 1933, 36 L.Ed.2d 844 (1973).
Morton v. Mancari, 417 U.S. 535, 94 S.Ct. 2474, 41 L.Ed. 2d 290 (1974).
United States v. Gabriel Francis Antelope, et al., 430 U.S. 641, 97 S.Ct. 1395, 51 L.Ed2d 701 (1977).

Websites

- 18 U.S.C. §1153: http://www.usdoj.gov/usao/eousa/foia_reading_room/usam/title9/crm00679.htm

UNITED STATES V. ARMSTRONG

United States v. Armstrong was a court case involving Christopher Lee Armstrong and other defendants who had been indicted on federal drug charges after selling 124 grams of cocaine base (crack) to police over a period of several months. The defendants alleged that they had been selectively prosecuted because they were Black, in violation of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. In its ruling, the U.S. Supreme Court held that in order to establish selective prosecution claims, defendants must show that the government failed to prosecute similarly situated suspects of other races.

Background

The defendants, who were charged with conspiring to possess with intent to distribute more than 50 grams of cocaine, filed a motion for discovery or dismissal. In support of their motion, they presented anecdotal evidence alleging that the Inglewood, California, Police Department had demonstrated a pattern of discriminatory behavior against Blacks. This evidence consisted of an affidavit from a paralegal specialist stating that all the defendants in the 24 comparable crack cocaine cases handled by the federal public defenders during the preceding year were Black.

The U.S. District court ruled in favor of the defendants and ordered the government to (a) provide a list of all cases from the previous 3 years involving cocaine and firearms offenses, (b) identify the race of all defendants in these cases, (c) identify the types of investigative procedures involved, and (d) provide a detailed explanation as to how the government came to the decision to pursue charges in federal, rather than state, courts (federal penalties are greater than penalties in California, where the defendants had been indicted).

The government refused to provide the requested information to the defense, and as a result the federal trial court judge dropped the charges. Subsequently, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed the lower court decision, holding that the defendants, in order to claim selective prosecution, were not obligated to prove that the government failed to prosecute similarly situated Whites.

The government asserted that race played no role in the police undercover operations, the investigation, or the decision to prosecute. According to the government, the decision to prosecute was based on the facts that the case involved (a) more than 100 grams of crack (any amount in excess of 50 grams is considered to be a major felony), (b) multiple sales that involved multiple defendants (evidence of a crack distribution ring), (c) weapons violations, and (d) government-held audio and video proof of the illegal activities. Finally, the government pointed out that Armstrong and other defendants in the case had extensive criminal histories complete with not only serious drug violations but also weapons charges and that any similarly situated individual would have been prosecuted regardless of his or her race.

Citing Oyler v. Boyles (1962), the government also pointed out that in order to prove a selective prosecution claim, the defendant must show not only that the prosecutor followed a policy resulting in discrimination, but also that such action was motivated by a discriminatory intent. In effect, it asserted that the burden of proof requires defendants to prove that a similarly situated defendant of another race would not have been charged by this particular prosecutor. The prosecution noted that attorneys for the defendants could not produce a single suspect satisfying this requirement; in other words, the defense could not find a single example of a White person selling a similar amount of crack who was not arrested and charged by the prosecution.

The Supreme Court's Ruling

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled 8–1 in favor of the government, finding no support for the claim of selective prosecution. The Court ruled that in order to avoid unduly hampering the goals of the prosecution, the demands for proving selective prosecution must be rigorous. The defendants in Armstrong, however, provided only unreliable anecdotes that the federal prosecutor pursued charges only for Blacks who were involved in crack sales.

The Court noted the court of appeals began with the presumption that people of all races commit all types of crime. Contrary to this assumption, however, U.S. Sentencing Commission data for 1994 indicated that more than 90% of those convicted of crack dealing were Black, more than 93% of those convicted of LSD dealing were White, and 91% of those convicted of pornography or prostitution were White. The statistics, the Court asserted, suggest that in fact the probability of engaging in certain crimes correlates strongly with race.

This finding, in addition to the legally incriminating characteristics of the defendants discussed previously, means that no constitutional violation occurred during the decision to arrest and prosecute the defendants. Also, the Court held, citing Bordenkircher v. Hayes (1978), that when prosecutors have probable cause to believe that a suspect committed a crime defined by statute, that the decision to prosecute rests entirely with the discretion of the prosecutor. In Armstrong, the defendants failed to present meaningful evidence that the prosecutor intentionally violated the equal protection or due process clauses of the Constitution.

Impact

The Supreme Court ruling in Armstrong cleared the way for police and prosecutors to use “soft” racial profiling as a law enforcement tool. Soft profiling must be distinguished from “hard” profiling in that the latter uses race as the only factor in determining criminal suspiciousness. In other words, if an officer or prosecutor confronts a suspect or defendant, he or she makes the decision to arrest or charge based solely on the suspect's race. Soft profiling, on the other hand, means that the police and prosecutors can implement policies conducive to aggressive law enforcement without concern for the demographic makeup of those who get prosecuted.

For example, the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) has developed a drug suspect profile using 13 race-neutral criteria. However, when implemented, these criteria could result in a disproportionate percentage of Blacks and Hispanics being arrested. Supporters of soft profiling argue that the ruling in Armstrong allows the use of methods such as the drug runner profile in order to identify and apprehend drug offenders, regardless of any superfluous appearance of selective enforcement and prosecution. The DEA profile that is taught to state police uses the following cues to "red flag" potential drug couriers:

- Drivers/passengers who turn around to see if police pursue them after passing
- Nervousness, lack of eye contact
- Conflicting information about origin or destination among the vehicle's occupants
- Inappropriate amounts of luggage in the vehicle
- Excessive cash in the vehicle
- No driver's license or registration or insurance card
- Spare tire in the backseat
- Rental license plates or plates from key source states (e.g., Arizona, Florida, New Mexico)
- Loose screws or scratches around the vehicle's hollow spaces (e.g., a sign of hiding drugs)
- A single key in the ignition
- Signs of drug use
- Computer-generated statistics showing crime hotspots
- Excessive trash in the vehicle, suggesting trepidation in stopping regularly

While all of the criteria are race neutral, some believe there is still a strong correlation between race and the probability of being apprehended by the police and subsequently prosecuted.

Although some critics argue that the use of drug courier profiling is racially discriminatory, others argue that United States v. Armstrong has led to improved strategies for addressing drug trafficking. From this perspective, an important positive outcome of Armstrong is the enhancement of law enforcement's ability to aggressively pursue dangerous drug criminals.

Billy Long

See also Drug Trafficking; Profiling, Ethnic: Use by Police and Homeland Security; Profiling, Racial: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives; Race Card, Playing the

Further Readings

- Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357 (1978).
 Gabbidon, S. L., & Greene, H. T. (2009). Race and crime (2nd ed.). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
 Oyer v. Boyles, 368 U.S. 448 (1962).
 Russell, K. K. (1998). The color of crime. New York: New York University Press.
 United States v. Christopher Lee Armstrong et al., 517 U.S. 456 (1996).
 Walker, S., Spohn, C., & DeLone, M. (2007). The color of justice (4th ed.). Belmont, CA: Wadsworth/Thomson.

UNITED STATES V. BOOKER

The Preamble to the U.S. Constitution starts with the statement: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal and that they are endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights. . . ." One of the key points listed in the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution is the right to a jury trial. This right applies throughout the legal process, up to and including sentencing. In United States v. Booker (2005), the defendant challenged his sentence on the basis that his rights under the Sixth Amendment had been violated. This entry reviews the facts of the case, the issues involved, and related cases. The case pertains to race and crime in that there have been serious concerns regarding sentencing guidelines and racial disparities in sentences—particularly in drug cases. This case provided some additional direction on these two issues.

The Case

In 2003, the defendant, Freddie J. Booker, was convicted in the Western District of Washington State of possessing with intent to distribute at least 50 grams of cocaine base, in violation of 21 U.S. Code (U.S.C.) Section 841. However, when Booker was arrested, the police found 92.5 grams of cocaine and $400 in his duffle bag, and Booker admitted in a written statement to the police of selling an additional 566 grams of cocaine.

While the statutory penalty for Booker's conviction pursuant to 21 U.S.C. 841 was 10 years to life, enhancements by the sentencing judge, based on additional facts, increased the possible sentence to a range of 30 years to life. Based on the jury verdict and the defendant's criminal history, the federal sentencing guidelines authorized 210–262 months in prison. (The sentencing guidelines were passed as a result of the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984 and became effective on November 1, 1987, as part of the government's attempt to control judicial sentencing discretion.)

The judge found by a preponderance of the evidence that Booker distributed 566 grams of cocaine (which was beyond the jury verdict) and that Booker had obstructed justice. According to the federal sentencing guidelines, this increased Booker's base level of offense and resulted in a longer sentence; the sentence was 30 years, nearly 10 years longer than supported by the jury verdict. Booker appealed his sentence to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. Although the court of appeals affirmed the conviction, it reversed the sentence and found that the sentencing guidelines, as applied in this case, were in violation of the Sixth Amendment. The court of appeals relied on the holding of Blakely v. Washington (2004), where the court found that a sentence, enhanced based on facts other than admitted by the defendant or determined by a jury beyond a reasonable doubt, violated the Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial. In Blakely, the sentencing guidelines were those of the state of Washington and not the federal government. The government appealed the Seventh Circuit's decision on Booker (375 F.3d 508 [7th Cir. 2004]) to the U.S. Supreme Court.

The Issue

The question presented to the Court was whether a sentencing judge could use information other than a jury verdict, statements made by the defendant, and prior convictions when following the sentencing guidelines for sentencing enhancement. Did the reliance by the judge on facts in addition to those determined by the jury to be beyond a reasonable doubt deny Booker his Sixth Amendment guarantee to a jury trial?

Related Case

In United States v. Fanfan (2005), federal agents found 1.25 kilograms of cocaine and 28.6 grams of cocaine base in Ducan Fanfan's vehicle. Fanfan was charged and convicted in the U.S. District Court of Maine with conspiracy to possess and distribute 500 or more grams of cocaine, in violation of 21 U.S.C. 841 and 846. Pursuant to the sentencing guidelines, this conviction authorized a sentence in the range of 188 to 235 months' imprisonment. At the time of sentencing, the trial judge found the defendant was responsible for 2.5 kilograms of cocaine powder and 261.6 grams of crack and had a leadership role in the criminal activity. If these factors were considered at sentencing, the sentence could have risen to about 16 years instead of the 5 to 6 years authorized by the jury verdict alone. The Supreme Court handed down its decision in Blakely 4 days before the sentencing judge passed sentence in Fanfan. As a result, the sentencing judge considered the findings in Blakely and limited the sentence only to those factors relative to the jury's verdict; the sentence was 78 months. The prosecution appealed, requesting that the additional factors be considered pursuant to the sentencing guidelines. It also filed a petition for a writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court; this was granted. This case was consolidated with United States v. Booker before the Supreme Court. Other key cases that were reviewed by the Supreme Court in reaching its decision are Jones v. United States (1999), Apprendi v. New Jersey (2000), Ring v. Arizona (2002), Regan v. Time, Inc. (1984), and In re Winship (1970).

The Court's Ruling

The Supreme Court affirmed the ruling of the Seventh Circuit in United States v. Booker and vacated the judgment of the district court in United States v. Fanfan; both cases were remanded. In a 5–4 decision, the Court found that the Sixth Amendment requires juries and not judges to determine the facts relevant to sentencing. The sentencing of Booker was a violation of the Sixth Amendment.

The Court determined that the Sixth Amendment is violated by the imposition of an enhanced sentence under the sentencing guidelines based on the sentencing judge's determination of a fact that was not found by a jury beyond a reasonable doubt or admitted by the defendant. The Court also determined that the statute that makes the sentencing guidelines mandatory (18 USC Annotated Section 3553(b)(1) (Supp. 2004)) was incompatible with its decision and must be severed, making the guidelines advisory.

Keith Gregory Logan

See also Drug Dealers; Drug Sentencing, Federal; Drug Trafficking; Drug Treatment; Drug Use

Further Readings

- Apprendi v. New Jersey*, 530 U.S. 466 (2000).
Blakely v. Washington, 542 U.S. 296 (2004).
 Clancy, K., et al. (1981). Sentence decisionmaking: The logic of sentence decisions and the extent and sources of sentence disparity. Journal of Criminal Law & Criminology, 72, 24–26.
In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970).
Jones v. United States, 526 U.S. 227 (1999).
Regan v. Time, Inc., 468 U.S. 641 (1984).
Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584 (2002).
United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220 (2005).
United States v. Fanfan, 543 U.S. 220 (2005).

UNITED STATES V. BRIGNONI-PONCE

Concerns about racial and ethnic profiling by law enforcement have bedeviled American courts for decades. These concerns gained new currency following the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center in New York City on September 11, 2001. Issues involving profiling have become intertwined with debates about immigration and the porous nature of international borders, with particular attention directed at undocumented aliens crossing the Mexico–U.S. border. The constitutional issues surrounding border enforcement have involved the U.S. Supreme Court in deciding the limits of law enforcement powers to search and detain individuals at or near the international border. In essence, the Court has had to determine which tactics used by the U.S. Border Patrol run afoul of the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures. In United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, the U.S. Supreme Court confronted the issue of roving patrols stopping vehicles near an international border to inquire about citizenship and immigration status.

Brignoni-Ponce's Arrest

On March 11, 1973, Felix Brignoni-Ponce, accompanied by two passengers, was driving an automobile near the Mexican border in southern California. He approached a fixed checkpoint employed by the Border Patrol in furtherance of its regular traffic-checking operations in the area. However, that evening the checkpoint was closed due to bad weather; instead, Border Patrol officers, parked in a patrol car at the side of the highway, used their headlights to observe passing cars on the dark road. The officers observed Brignoni-Ponce's automobile and, by their own admission, initiated a pursuit and stop of the vehicle solely because the occupants of the car appeared Mexican. The officers then questioned the occupants about their citizenship and discovered that the passengers had illegally entered the United States. The three occupants were then arrested, with Brignoni-Ponce being charged with two counts of knowingly transporting illegal immigrants. At his trial, Brignoni-Ponce attempted to suppress any testimony either about or by the passengers, arguing it was the product of an illegal seizure. However, his motion to suppress the evidence was denied by the trial court, and he was convicted on both counts based on the testimony of his passengers.

Legal Background

During Brignoni-Ponce's appeal of the conviction, the U.S. Supreme Court decided in Almeida-Sanchez v. U.S. that, absent a warrant or probable cause, roving patrols away from the border or its functional equivalents (for example, arrival gates at international terminals in airports) are under the Fourth Amendment prohibited from searching vehicles. Applying these principles in Brignoni-Ponce's case, the court of appeals held that stopping a vehicle and questioning the occupants, absent what the court termed a "founded suspicion" that the individuals had entered the United States illegally, violated the Fourth Amendment. In particular, the court rejected the notion that Mexican ancestry alone provided sufficient justification for such stops and questioning.

Subsequently, before the Supreme Court, the government argued statutory authority allowing any Immigration and Naturalization Service officer to interrogate, without a warrant, any alien concerning his or her right to be in the country. The government contended that since the statute provided no geographic limitations upon this authority, nearness to the Mexican border permitted officers to infer that Mexican ancestry justified a belief that an individual was an alien. The government connected this statute to a second enactment permitting under federal regulations the search of vehicles within 100 miles of the border. This statute was interpreted by the Border Patrol as permitting vehicles to be stopped and occupants questioned absent any belief that the individuals are aliens or that aliens might be contained in the vehicle.

The Court's Ruling

In resolving U.S. v. Brignoni-Ponce, the Supreme Court acknowledged a strong public interest in preventing illegal aliens from entering the United States. Citing statistics about the numbers of illegal immigrants entering or remaining in the country and noting the social and economic issues posed by these aliens, the Court noted the Herculean task confronting the Border Patrol in securing the border.

However, the Court recognized that weighing against this important public interest was the invasion of the individual's liberty interest during even the briefest stop and interrogation. Noting that such stops generally impose only a modest intrusion on individual liberty interests, the Court allowed that these stops may be justified on less than probable cause. Citing decisions in Terry v. Ohio and other cases allowing limited stops and searches with less than probable cause in cases involving danger to police officers, the Court determined that because of the important governmental interest of securing the borders, the minimal intrusion caused by a brief stop, and the lack of any practical alternatives, officers may stop and investigate vehicles based on a reasonable suspicion that the vehicle is occupied by illegal aliens. Nevertheless, the Court refused to countenance roving patrols stopping vehicles without even a modicum of reasonable suspicion. Absent such a requirement, the Court observed that the lives of countless individuals living near the border would be subject to unlimited interference based only on their use of the highways. In addition, the Court observed that illegal traffic involving aliens produced characteristics amenable to recognition by officers and generating articulable facts for use in developing reasonable suspicion.

In addition, the Court rejected the government's argument of broad congressional authorization to stop any person for questioning who might be an alien. While allowing that Congress had broad authority to condition the admission of aliens into the country, the Court refused to accept this authority as lessening the rights of American citizens mistaken to be aliens. Applying the same reasoning used to reject the government's previous contention, the Court refused to allow stops and questioning of persons regarding citizenship absent reasonable suspicion of them being aliens.

In its decision, the Supreme Court set forth numerous factors that officers can take into account in the formation of reasonable suspicion, and it held that officers need to assess these facts in light of their experience. Nonetheless, a clear distinction was drawn by the Court between stops and questioning based upon reasonable suspicion and merely believing that individuals appeared to be Mexican. Simply appearing Mexican does not justify interfering with individual liberty interests.

Richard Janikowski

See also Consumer Racial Profiling; Profiling, Racial: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives

Further Readings

Almeida-Sanchez v. U.S., 413 U.S. 266 (1973).

Soltero, C. R. (2006). Latinos and American law: Landmark Supreme Court cases. Austin: University of Texas Press.

Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968).

United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873 (1975).

United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543 (1976).

United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531 (1985).

UNITED STATES V. WHEELER

The U.S. Supreme Court, in United States v. Wheeler (1978), highlighted the continuing problems concerning race, justice, and equal protection in the U.S. criminal justice system. The case involved a member of an Indian tribe and the question of double jeopardy. The entry begins with a review of the facts in the case, which is followed by the effects of the decision on Indians.

The Facts

The defendant, Anthony Wheeler, was a member of the Navajo Indian tribe and resided on a reservation in Arizona. He apparently had sex with an underage minor who was also a Navaho Indian. Wheeler was arrested by the tribal police. In the Navajo Tribal Court, he pled guilty to disorderly conduct and contributing to the delinquency of a minor, in violation of the Navajo Tribal Code. He was sentenced to 15 days in jail or a fine of $30 on the first charge and sentenced to 60 days in jail or a fine of $120 on the second charge.

More than a year later, Wheeler was indicted by the grand jury for the U.S. District Court for the District of Arizona with the crime of statutory rape under the federal Major Crimes Act, based on the same events that formed the basis of his convictions in the Navajo Tribal Court. The defendant moved to dismiss the charge under the double jeopardy clause, as he had already been convicted of contributing to the delinquency of a minor, which was a lesser included offense of statutory rape. The motion to dismiss was granted by the district court. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed the dismissal. The matter was appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which accepted certiorari.

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed the court of appeals' decision. The Supreme Court recognized that Indian tribes retained some limited degree of sovereignty, although they were not totally independent from the United States. Indian tribes had the power and authority to regulate and prosecute criminal conduct between tribal members, although they did not have the power or authority to address the criminal behavior of nontribal members, who were subject to punishment under the law of the United States. Tribal members thus were subject to prosecution under both the tribal law and the law of the United States, whereas a non-Indian would not be subject to such dual prosecution. Thus, the Supreme Court ruled that the indictment against the defendant was properly brought.

The basis for this ruling was the dual sovereign doctrine. Under this doctrine, a person can be punished for the same act under both state and federal law, as the states are separate sovereign entities from the United States. A well-known example is the beating of Rodney King, in Los Angeles, in which the police were exonerated in state proceedings but were convicted in federal proceedings for violating King's civil rights. The U.S. Supreme Court held that the Navajo tribe had sufficient independence to be considered a separate sovereignty entity such that the defendant could be punished for the same act under both tribal law and federal law.

Effect of the Wheeler Ruling

In addition to subjecting the defendant to additional punishment for the same act, the decision in Wheeler also highlighted the fact that a non-tribal member would not have received this type of double punishment. The Indian tribes have no criminal jurisdiction over non-Indians (see Oliphant v. Suquamish Indian Tribe, 1978). It is interesting to note that in the decision of Lara v. United States (2004), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that it was permissible to criminally prosecute a nonmember Indian who belonged to a different tribe.

Although the Supreme Court recognized the political and social differences between tribal members and nontribal members, it failed to recognize that these differences were fundamentally based on race, even though tribal membership is itself a racial classification. Yet in United States v. Antelope (1977), the U.S. Supreme Court rejected an equal protection claim in similar circumstances based on race discrimination. Critics of Wheeler thus argue that the double punishment Wheeler received was a form of racial discrimination. They point out, too, that while the doctrine of dual sovereignty is not discriminatory on its face, its effects may nevertheless have discriminatory effects.

William C. Plouffe, Jr.

See also Discrimination–Disparity Continuum; Indian Civil Rights Act; Native American Courts; Oliphant v. Suquamish Indian Tribe; United States v. Antelope

Further Readings

- Berger, B. R. (2005). Justice and the outsider: Jurisdiction over nonmembers in tribal legal systems. Arizona State Law Journal, 37, 1047.
- Burleson, E. (2007). Tribal, state, and federal cooperation to achieve good governance. Akron Law Review, 40, 207.
- Lara v. United States*, 541 U.S. 193, 124 S.Ct. 1628, 158 L.Ed.2d 420 (2004).
- Oliphant v. Suquamish Indian Tribe*, 435 U.S. 191, 98 S.Ct. 1011, 55 L.Ed.2d 209 (1978).
- Seibert, A. L. (2003/2004). Who defines tribal sovereignty? An analysis of United States v. Lara. American Indian Law Review, 28, 393.
- Stapleton, W. (1997). Indian Country federal justice: Is the exercise of federal jurisdiction under the Major Crimes Act constitutional? Arizona State Law Journal, 29, 337.
- United States v. Antelope*, 430 U.S. 641, 97 S.Ct. 1395, 51 L.Ed.2d 701 (1977).
- United States v. Wheeler*, 435 U.S. 313, 98 S.Ct. 1079, 55 L.Ed.2d 303 (1978).

UNIVERSAL NEGRO IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATION

The Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA) and African Communities League was history's first Black empowerment movement of massive proportions, with its apex occurring in the United States during the 1920s. The organization still exists today, but it experienced a dramatic decline in membership following the 1923 mail fraud conviction of its leader, Marcus Mosiah Garvey. Garvey's conviction, imprisonment, and subsequent deportation to Jamaica were significant barriers to the establishment of a permanent African homeland for the unification of all people of African descent scattered about the globe by the African Diaspora. The movement's original goals included racial purity, economic and political independence, as well as the general uplift of the Negro race. The importance of the UNIA to Black history and the unfair prosecution of the organization's founding leader are the reasons for its inclusion in this volume. This entry covers the life cycle of the UNIA from its inception, providing a timeline of important events in the early development of the organization. Also discussed are the organization's ideology, goals, membership commitment, and founding leadership.

Life Cycle

The UNIA was founded in Jamaica, the West Indies, in 1914 by Garvey, along with the help of Amy Ashwood, the woman who would later become his first wife. By 1916, Garvey had arrived in New York City and began organizing a UNIA branch in Harlem. From 1916 to 1917, Garvey undertook a speaking tour of the United States, stirring up pride in his audiences in 38 states, giving them hope for African redemption and a sovereign African state with which to identify. Garvey's philosophy became known as Garveyism and his followers gained recognition as Garveyites. In 1918, Garvey began publishing The Negro World, the UNIA's weekly newspaper, which would later reach a readership of possibly 200,000 and be published in Spanish and French as well as English. Garvey wrote weekly front page editorials for the paper. In 1919, Garvey formed the Negro Factories Corporation, whose $5 shares financed Black businesses, including grocery stores, restaurants, a printing plant, a millinery store, and a steam laundry in New York City. At about the same time, the Black Star Line steamship company was established for commercial trade and to provide passage from the United States to the Caribbean, South America, and African countries (primarily Liberia) that did not carry with it the Jim Crow treatment of the existing White-owned passenger liners. The Black Star Line was also a symbol for the Back-to-Africa plan envisioned by Garvey. The plan was for a portion of followers to settle in Liberia. Although the Black Star Line was able to purchase three ships, the vessels were in poor shape, Garvey had overpaid for them, and the company was plagued with incompetence, mismanagement, and financial problems. In spite of the Black Star Line's troubles, the UNIA was approaching its highest point of membership. In 1919, Garvey claimed to have had more than 2 million members dispersed over 30 branches. In 1920, while claiming 4 million members worldwide, the UNIA held its first International Convention, attracting a crowd of 25,000 (including the mayor of Monrovia, Liberia). At the 1920 convention in New York's Madison Square Garden, the UNIA drew up a document known as the Declaration of Rights of the Negro Peoples of the World, which called for all nations to respect the rights of Negroes everywhere.

The Bureau of Investigation (later known as the Federal Bureau of Investigation), through a young, ambitious J. Edgar Hoover, had been pursuing Garvey for several years. While the U.S. government had hoped to prove Garvey and the UNIA's activities seditious, it resorted to a mail fraud indictment in 1922. The only charge Garvey was convicted of involved the fraudulent sale of five shares of stock to one stockholder. The photo on the stock brochure sent through the mail had misrepresented Black Star Line ownership of a particular ship that the company was still negotiating to buy. By 1923, the year of Garvey's trial and conviction, legal entanglements brought about the near-demise of the UNIA. In 1924, the Liberian government ordered its ports closed to any Garveyites and turned away the UNIA expedition that arrived there. Land that the Liberian government had originally promised to the UNIA was instead leased to the Firestone Rubber Company. It is believed that the United States pressured Liberia to make this change.

After a failed court appeal, Garvey was incarcerated in 1925. In 1927, President Calvin Coolidge commuted his sentence. Upon his release, Garvey was deported to Jamaica. In Jamaica, Garvey had two sons with his second wife, Amy Jacques (his former personal secretary, whom he had married in 1922). During these years in Jamaica, Garvey held local office and tried to revive the UNIA. Garvey died of a stroke in London in 1940. In 1964, he was declared Jamaica's first national hero. The UNIA has had a number of successors to Garvey, including his son, Marcus, who headed the organization from 1993 to 2004. The junior Garvey was succeeded by Redman Battle. As the UNIA was a leader-dominated movement, it never really gained back the momentum it had lost with the senior Garvey's departure.

There have been attempts to posthumously exonerate Garvey, the most recent being that of U.S. Congressman Charles Rangel (whose district includes Harlem). Rangel's 2007 House Resolution requested a presidential pardon and declaration of innocence for Garvey. Garvey's legacy remains strong in the self-pride he instilled in many. Garveyism's influence on Black separatism and Black Nationalism is seen in subsequent movements such as the Black Muslims and especially in Rastafarianism. Black Muslim leader Malcolm X had grown up in a Garveyite household, as his father was a UNIA member. Rastafarians acknowledge Garvey in reggae lyrics and regard Garvey as a prophet who foresaw the crowning of a Black king in Africa.

Ideology and Goals

Garveyism rested on the following beliefs: Black separatism, Black Nationalism, Pan Africanism, and anticolonialism. Garvey and the prevailing conditions in the United States convinced many Black Americans that they would never be accepted by Whites as equals. Their only solution to disparities and mistreatment was to seek political and economic independence, along with racial purity. Garvey instilled in his followers a sense of importance and pride in their race, by exalting Blackness and viewing God as Black. Geographic secession was not necessary for all American Blacks. Those who would repatriate to a liberated nation in Africa would stand symbolically for their Black brethren around the world. As provisional president of Africa (a post to which Garvey was elected at the 1920 UNIA International Convention), Garvey would seek the liberation of Africa from colonial rule.

Membership Commitment

In the early years, dues were 35 cents per month. Today, members join for $5 and pay monthly dues of $2. Garveyism in its heyday was characterized by grand displays, including rallies, parades, and public speeches with pageantry and pomp. Marchers are believed to have numbered in the thousands, with countless others turning out to line the streets or watch through open apartment windows along the route. Esprit de corps was enhanced by UNIA songs and the organization's motto, "One God! One Aim! One Destiny!" To anchor a member's identity to the movement, Garvey provided his followers with such symbols as a national anthem, flag (of red, green, and black), and a constitution. UNIA meetings had a quasi-religious tone to them, opening with a prayer and including hymns. While many historians have ignored the religious significance of Garveyism, Randall Burkett has devoted attention to the theory that Garvey had endeavored to start a civil religion through the UNIA.

While the primary reason for joining the UNIA was the belief in the movement's goals, there were secondary rewards for participation in the form of uniforms, honorific titles, and ranks in the various auxiliaries of the organization, some of which were paramilitary. These groups included the Universal African Legion, African Black Cross Nurses, Universal Motor Corps, Royal Guards, Royal Engineering Corps, Royal Medical Corps, and others. Another secondary reward for participation was the opportunity to have stock holdings. Individuals could purchase stock certificates in the Negro Factories Corporation and in the Black Star Line for $5 per share. Historians do not agree upon the number of members the movement had in Garvey's day. In addition to dues-paying members, there were those who identified with the movement and lent support. When Garvey was deported under what many consider questionable conditions, a large number of members dropped out. For others, their commitment to the movement was strengthened by their belief in Garvey's martyrdom.

While Garvey had insisted on allegiance to him, there had been some disloyalty among those who at one time had been closest to him. At about the time that Ashwood's marriage to Garvey was being dissolved, she is believed to have offered to help the federal authorities with their case against Garvey. Another example of disloyalty was the case of the Reverend James W. H. Eason. At one time Eason had been Garvey's second in command, having been elected at the 1920 convention as the Leader of American Negroes. But only 3 years later, no longer a member of the UNIA, he was slated to be the prosecution's chief witness in Garvey's trial. During this time, Eason was murdered in New Orleans. The accusation against two UNIA officials for the murder was damaging to the organization, even though the two were later acquitted.

Leadership

The grassroots rise of Garveyism and the UNIA is best explained by a conjuncture of both Garvey's own personal frustration experienced at the bottom of a three-tiered color structure in Jamaica and the frustration, second-class citizenship, lynchings, and race riots experienced by American Blacks during and following World War I. Although a proud descendant of the Maroons (Jamaica's escaped African slaves), Garvey's dark skin placed him beneath the mulattoes (who were in the middle) and Whites (who were at the top) in Jamaica's color scheme. His primary appeal in the United States was to dark-skinned working-class and lower-class Blacks who were not able to relate to the prevailing elitist light-skinned Black leadership. W. E. B. Du Bois, the Harvard-educated Ph.D. and editor of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People's publication, the Crisis, became Garvey's chief foe and pressured the government to stop him.

Garvey was charismatic and visionary. As a theorist, he rewrote Black history, proposed a separate economy for Black businesses, and envisioned a Black separatist colony in Africa. As an orator, Garvey gained adherents among the down-trodden Blacks who were ripe for his message. In his efforts to inspire his followers, he offended other Black leaders like Du Bois and A. Philip Randolph, publisher of the Messenger. Du Bois and Randolph considered Garvey to be impractical and an embarrassment to his race. They were not impressed with his gaudy uniform and feathered hat worn at UNIA parades. Garvey's alliance with the Ku Klux Klan, particularly a meeting he had in Atlanta in 1922 with high-ranking Klan official Edward Young Clarke, infuriated Du Bois and Randolph. While Garvey saw an alliance with White supremacists as a strategy to further a shared stance against miscegenation, other Black leaders regarded Garvey as a race traitor for this move. In the end, Garvey's enemies helped to bring about his downfall. However, in the eyes of those who believe Garvey suffered for the cause, he has become a martyr.

Joan Luxenburg

See also Black Panther Party; Colonial Model; Nation of Islam; Rastafarians

Further Readings

- Burkett, R. K. (1978). Garveyism as a religious movement: The institutionalization of a Black civil religion. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow.
- Cronon, E. D. (1969). Black Moses: The story of Marcus Garvey and the Universal Negro Improvement Association (Rev. ed.). Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Hill, R. A. (Ed.). (1987). Marcus Garvey, life and lessons: A centennial companion to the Marcus Garvey and the Universal Negro Improvement Association papers. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Martin, T. (1976). Race first: The ideological and organizational struggle of Marcus Garvey and the Universal Negro Improvement Association. Westport, CT: Greenwood.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, OFFICE OF CIVIL RIGHTS

The U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ), Office of Civil Rights, also known as the Civil Rights Division (CRD), is the division within the Department of Justice charged with enforcing federal laws prohibiting discrimination based upon race, sex, religion, disability, and national origin. As such, the Office of Civil Rights investigates and prosecutes racially motivated crimes and violations, such as unfair housing practices and hate crimes. The division has been responsible for numerous significant prosecutions of race crimes from its inception to the present time. Recently, the division has seen an increased caseload, even in the face of budget constraints. Some organizations, such as the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), as well as the U.S. Congress, criticize the division for not doing enough to ensure that civil rights laws are adequately enforced.

The U.S. Department of Justice, which is headed by the attorney general of the United States, is composed of numerous divisions, each with its own area of responsibility, such as the Criminal Division, Tax Division, Anti-Trust Division, and Civil Rights Division, among others. The CRD was established in 1957 and is headed by an assistant attorney general, who is appointed by the president of the United States. The CRD is the only division within the DOJ to handle both civil and criminal law violations. The CRD is divided into 10 sections, each with its own specialty. These sections include the appellate section, the disability rights section, the educational opportunities section, the employment litigation section, the housing and civil enforcement section, the voting section, the criminal section, the special litigation section, and others.

The legal framework in which the CRD operates was created by the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Although some civil rights and antidiscrimination laws existed prior to the passage of this act, the 1964 Civil Rights Act was the genesis of combined civil and criminal legal remedies against racial, and other, discrimination. This bill, which was signed into law by President Lyndon Johnson on July 2, 1964, prohibited unequal application of voting rights; banned discrimination in public places, such as restaurants and theaters; authorized the withdrawal of federal funds from programs that practiced discrimination; and barred discrimination in businesses employing more than 25 people.

From the 1964 Civil Rights Act and other legislation, the CRD enforces several laws relating to race. Title 18, Section 241, of the U.S. Code makes it illegal for two or more people to conspire to injure, threaten, or intimidate another person who is freely exercising his or her rights as guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. Persons in official positions, such as police officers and judges, can be prosecuted under Title 18, Section 242, if they use their official influence to deny a person his or her rights under U.S. laws. Title 18, Section 245, makes it illegal to intimidate or injure a person, based upon race, because of that person's activity in a public school, program of state or local government, labor union, jury service, or public accommodation. Title 42, Section 3631, makes it illegal to deny a person a right to fair housing based upon race. In addition, the CRD enforces numerous laws relating to forced labor and human trafficking. Depending on the circumstances of the crimes, punishment can range from probation up to life imprisonment or death.

The CRD receives complaints from citizens or is referred cases from federal agencies such as the U.S. Department of Education or U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development. However, most criminal violations prosecuted by the CRD are investigated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI).

The criminal section of the CRD handles the division's criminal prosecutions. The criminal section's earliest investigations and prosecutions involved the murder of minorities and civil rights workers in the South during the 1960s. These have included the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr., and Medgar Evers, the fatal shootings of students at Kent State University in Ohio, and the deaths of three civil rights workers in Mississippi, which was the basis for the film Mississippi Burning. Two new priorities were established after 2000 to address more recent race-based crime. The first focused on the widespread problem of human trafficking. The second focused on "backlash" discrimination, which was an increase in violence and other forms of discrimination against Arabs, Muslims, and others after the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

The special litigation section of the CRD also handles race-based crime matters. These issues include the conditions of jails and prisons and the conduct of law enforcement agencies. The CRD is empowered to seek civil remedies for violations based upon race. These remedies can include civil fines and injunctions to cease or limit civil rights violations, such as mandating the hiring of more minority police officers or ensuring equal access for all inmates to prison programs.

Since 1990, the number of civil rights complaints filed in U.S. district courts increased from approximately 18,000 to more than 40,000 in 2000. During 2007, the criminal section set a record by convicting 189 defendants for civil rights violations, the most ever in its history. Between 2001 and 2007, the CRD convicted 391 defendants for official misconduct, representing a more than 50% increase over the 256 defendants who were convicted between 1994 and 2000. One hundred twenty-two defendants were prosecuted for human trafficking between 2001 and 2004. During that same time period, the CRD investigated more than 500 incidents of 9/11 backlash discrimination, which resulted in the conviction of 18 defendants.

Critics claim that the CRD does not do enough to sufficiently protect civil rights. In 2005, the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights reported that Congress often appropriated less money for the CRD than requested by the president. An investigation in 2003 found that the CRD employed only two African American attorneys; the same number since 1978, even though the entire CRD staff size more than doubled during that time. In 2007, the ACLU criticized DOJ for diverting CRD resources to taking on smaller, easier cases that have no real impact on securing civil rights.

The U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Civil Rights, was created to ensure equality for all members of society, especially for those most susceptible to discrimination. Although discrimination in voting, housing, and education is addressed by this branch of the federal government, its most important work is done in the area of racially motivated crimes. Throughout its existence, the Office of Civil Rights has attempted to secure racial justice through the investigation and prosecution of race-based crimes, from the atrocities committed against civil rights workers in the 1960s to the backlash discrimination after September 11, 2001. In spite of varying levels of criticism, it is expected that this office will continue to adapt its priorities to combat new and emerging race-based crimes.

Todd F. Prough

See also Hate Crimes; Human Trafficking; Racism

Further Readings

- Bureau of Justice Statistics. (2000). Civil rights complaints in U.S. District Courts, 1990–98 (NCJ 173427). Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office.
- U.S. Commission on Civil Rights. (2005). Funding federal civil rights enforcement: The president's 2006 request. Washington, DC: Author.
- U.S. Department of Justice, Civil Rights Division. (2007). Civil rights activities and programs (2006 ed.). Retrieved from <http://www.usdoj.gov/crt/activity.html>
- U.S. House of Representatives, Committee on the Judiciary. (2004). Civil Rights Division of the U.S. Department of Justice. Hearings of the 108th Congress. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office.

VERA INSTITUTE OF JUSTICE

The Vera Institute of Justice (VERA) is a nonprofit independent organization based in New York. The institute originated in the early 1960s when a project initiated by Louis Schweitzer and Herb Sturz assessed an unjust bail system in New York City as one in which people with higher incomes were often more able to secure bail than were lower-income people. Their work led to the establishment of the Vera Institute, named for Schweitzer's mother, to continue the investigation of related issues of injustice. For more than 40 years, Vera has produced neutral, unbiased, innovative research reports by individuals with diverse backgrounds and specializations. Vera's goal is to make justice systems in the United States and other countries more effective, humane, and fair. Vera has published numerous research reports on race and crime topics that include troubled youth, prison populations, and racially biased practices within the legal system. This entry describes Vera's first project, how the organization operates, and some of its research and projects.

The first Vera project, known as the Manhattan Bail Project, showed that people accused of a crime who are too poor to pay bail but have strong bonds within their community are able to be released and still appear at their trials, thus reducing costs and lowering the interference in innocents' lives. In 1961, Schweitzer and Sturz worked closely with criminal justice leaders to examine injustice in the New York City bail system, develop a solution, and test their findings. After Schweitzer and Sturz tested their findings on a small scale, city government officials implemented a major reform to the bail system. The alternative to bail changed the manner in which judges approach decisions on bail in New York City and eventually nationwide.

Vera partners with local, state, federal, national, and international officials in seeking reforms in the criminal justice system. The organization operates with a set structure of guidelines when working to develop projects to implement in the criminal justice system. First, the members identify a national issue that requires research attention and attempt to come up with innovative ideas to resolve it. This idea usually inspires the creation of a practical experiment or suggestions for improvement and rational reform. Demonstration projects by Vera researchers test potential solutions on a small scale. The completion of such projects takes at least a year. Vera strives to seek solutions to persistent problems by conducting evidence-based and empirically sound research performed by a cadre of social science and criminal justice researchers. Its findings include information on the demonstration projects as well as the financial and political implications of implementation of similar projects in other cities.

Findings from Vera's research projects are intended to be used by government officials as a tool to implement change in those areas where social sciences and the criminal justice system intersect. Vera's aim includes efforts to replicate instituted programs on national and international levels, though the replicated designs vary. It is important to note that Vera researchers are not advocates and that they partner with governmental officials to advance reforms.

Programs

Vera has three main centers, which focus on immigration and justice, sentencing and corrections, and youth justice.

Immigration and Justice

Vera's Center on Immigration and Justice focuses on issues dealing with immigrants and their families. Since September 11, 2001, relations between law enforcement and Arab Americans have become a core issue. Vera has since published the results from 2 years of research in a report titled, Building Strong Police-Immigrant Community Relations After September 11th, 2001: Engagement in a Time of Uncertainty (2006). The report highlights the fear of intrusive federal practices and policies among Arab Americans and provides recommendations to restore trust and form alliances to reduce crime and concerns on terrorism.

Sentencing and Corrections

The Center on Sentencing and Corrections uses a multifaceted approach to advance sentencing and corrections program reform, utilizing research in the field to help identify emerging issues and trends that may provide solutions for criminal justice professionals and government officials who need assistance in developing cost-effective strategies that are most likely to protect the public's safety. Two of Vera's core areas of concern involve the high recidivism rates of offenders and the disproportionality of minorities, particularly African Americans, in the prison population. In 2006, Vera produced two major reports dealing with sentencing and corrections: Confronting Confinement and Assessment of Inmate Prison Population Characteristics and Jail Management Processes in Hamilton County, Ohio. The latter report examined racial characteristics of inmates to identify disparities.

Youth Justice

The Center on Youth Justice assists in reforming and/or improving local and state government's current juvenile justice system via research, technical assistance, and planning services. The center seeks to help implement reforms that prevent youths who have entered the juvenile justice system from being institutionalized; rather, Vera aims to attach services that will affect the juvenile as well as his or her family within the home setting. It also seeks to advance rational decision making within the process of the juvenile justice system.

Other Programs

The Vera Institute also has other programs and projects that deal with justice issues but are not within the scope of the aforementioned centers. One program is the Prosecution and Racial Justice (PRJ) project. This project strives to guard citizens against racially biased practices within the legal system. The project has collaborated for 3 years with district attorneys located in three jurisdictions within the United States to track and identify race-based indicators and patterns that suggest inappropriate racially or ethnically based disparities in treatment and decision making at important stages that affect the end result of criminal cases, particularly for Latinos and African Americans. Other projects assist various disenfranchised or indigent groups of people and provide knowledge of and access to fair treatment within the justice system.

Lindsey Kane

See also Delinquency Prevention; Immigrants and Crime; Juvenile Crime; Police Use of Force; Prisoner Reentry; Sentencing Disparities, African Americans; Sentencing Disparities, Latina/o/s

Further Readings

Vera Institute of Justice. (2006). Assessment of inmate population characteristics and jail management processes in Hamilton County, Ohio. New York: Author. Retrieved January 2, 2009, from <http://www.hamiltoncountyohio.gov/administrator/bsi/jail/D%20-%20Vera%20Assessment.pdf>

Websites

Vera Institute of Justice: <http://www.vera.org>

VICTIM AND WITNESS INTIMIDATION

Victim or witness intimidation is the practice of threatening, harming, or otherwise instilling fear in a victim of, or witness to, a crime, in an effort to prevent him or her from reporting a crime or testifying in court. It may also be used to convince a victim or witness to recant testimony that has already been made. The intimidation may involve physical violence, explicit threats of physical violence, implicit threats, and/or property damage. Threats may be made by the defendant or by his or her friends, family, fellow gang members, or other associates. Most victim and witness intimidation takes place in time either between the defendant's arrest and his or her trial or during the trial, in the courtroom.

The current practice of victim and witness intimidation can be categorized into two broad types. Overt intimidation takes place when a witness or victim or his or her family or friends are harmed or threatened explicitly, often in connection with a specific case. Implicit intimidation occurs when there is a legitimate but unexpressed threat of harm. In communities with high rates of gang or drug activity, actual threats may not need to be made. It may simply be understood that cooperation with criminal justice authorities will result in retaliation, and this may be sufficient to create a pervasive atmosphere of fear and silence.

Prevalence

Estimates of the prevalence of victim and witness intimidation vary widely. A 1990 study conducted by the Victim Services Agency (VSA) in the Bronx, New York, found that 36% of 260 victims who were interviewed reported having been threatened; the figure was higher (54%) for those who had romantic or blood ties to the offenders. A 1980 VSA study in Brooklyn found that 39% of witnesses who were surveyed feared revenge and that 26% of 295 witnesses had been threatened. More recent surveys of prosecutors have found that victim and witness intimidation is suspected in upward of 75% of crimes committed in gang-dominated neighborhoods, and that the practice is increasing in frequency. According to New York Times reports, at least 19 witnesses were killed in New York City from 1980 to 2003. The British Crime Survey has found lower estimates of victim and witness intimidation in the United Kingdom than in the United States.

Researchers have found that victim or witness intimidation is more likely to occur in cases where guns, gangs, or serious violence is involved, the defendant has a personal connection to the witness, and/or the defendant and witness live in close proximity. The elderly, children, physically or mentally handicapped persons, and recent or illegal immigrants are especially vulnerable. Victim intimidation is also common in cases of domestic violence.

Victim and Witness Intimidation in Minority Communities

Community-wide implicit victim and witness intimidation has become particularly severe and widespread in neighborhoods dominated by gangs and drugs, including many predominantly African American and Latina/o inner-city areas. Asian gangs also engage in intimidation. A well-known example of implicit intimidation is a grassroots campaign known as "Stop Snitchin'," which began in Baltimore around 2004 and quickly spread to other urban areas by several means, including CDs and DVDs, websites, T-shirts, and rap lyrics. The movement's purpose is to urge community members not to cooperate with criminal justice authorities, and to remind them that "snitches wear stitches." Gang members have appeared in courtrooms wearing Stop Snitchin' T-shirts, provoking efforts to ban the shirts by judges and political officials. The success of the Stop Snitchin' movement can be attributed in part to some community members' anger regarding the high rate of incarceration among minority men, frustration over criminal justice authorities' use of informants from the community and jails or prisons to facilitate the prosecution and incarceration process, and general mistrust of law enforcement officials, who often do not provide adequate protection for those who do cooperate and sometimes reward unreliable informants with leniency in prosecution or sentencing. The Stop Snitchin' mantra is redolent of the Italian Mafia's centuries-old code known as omertà, an oath of silence prohibiting cooperation with the authorities under any circumstances.

The culture and attitudes surrounding rap and hip hop music have perpetuated the practice of victim and witness intimidation and the implicit code of silence. Some well-known rap artists have refused to cooperate in criminal cases in which they or their friends or members of their entourages were victims or suspects. Other popular rappers have produced songs urging listeners not to speak with the police. The murders of several rap and hip hop stars, including Tupac Shakur, the Notorious B.I.G., and Jam Master Jay from Run D.M.C., remain unsolved because of witnesses' unwillingness to violate the "code of the street" by speaking to the police or testifying in court.

Consequences

The continuing practice of victim and witness intimidation has widespread and serious consequences. Witness intimidation forces prosecutors to drop or lose cases, often despite the fact that the crimes in question may have been observed by numerous bystanders and a suspect identified with certainty. It permits offenders to remain free and to continue committing crimes. It prevents victims and their families from experiencing closure or regaining a sense of security. It undermines confidence in law enforcement officials and criminal justice authorities by revealing the extent to which criminals and their associates exert control over the streets and even over the criminal justice process. Drug and gang activity and violent crime may continue unchecked and escalate when victims and witnesses are unwilling or afraid to cooperate with officials.

As a result of the inability to secure witness testimony or ensure the safety of those who do testify, some prosecutors now use civilian testimony only very rarely. Instead, their cases rely more heavily on evidence from sources such as police testimony, video surveillance, and sting operations. Unfortunately, without witness testimony, prosecutors are often unable to proceed with cases involving powerful gang members or drug dealers suspected of serious offenses such as homicide, assault, or kidnapping.

Policy Responses and Remedies

Many efforts have been made, with limited success thus far, to prevent victim and witness intimidation. Approaches include requesting high bail or pretrial detention of defendants, aggressive prosecution of those accused of tampering with witnesses, and providing information, protection, relocation, material support, and other services to witnesses.

Pretrial detention of defendants has limited effects on victim and witness intimidation, because threats are often made and carried out by parties other than the defendant. This is particularly true in cases involving gang members. Although witness tampering and obstruction of justice are illegal, these crimes are not always punished. Some jurisdictions have made efforts to prosecute or revoke the probation or parole of those who threaten or harm witnesses or attempt to influence their testimony. Efforts have also been made in some states to increase penalties for those offenses.

The proactive management of witnesses is essential to reduce intimidation and its consequences. Some law enforcement agencies have encouraged victims and witnesses to file reports at the police station rather than at the scene of a crime, so their cooperation with the authorities will be less obvious. Some police officers have even led witnesses away from crime scenes in handcuffs to conceal their role in the process. Greater availability of 'round-the-clock, confidential, or even anonymous avenues for crime reporting would allow witnesses and victims to speak up with less fear of retaliation.

Witness relocation programs are sometimes used in criminal cases when victim or witness intimidation is a problem. Witnesses are commonly relocated temporarily to hotels or motels in undisclosed locations, or are asked to stay with relatives or friends outside their neighborhood before or during a trial. More rarely, they may be housed in a hotel or motel for a longer period of time, provided a nominal sum of money for moving expenses, or given assistance moving from one public housing development to another. The success of these approaches depends largely on the witnesses' ability to refrain from returning to their old neighborhoods or reestablishing communication with former contacts while they remain at risk. Due to resource constraints, district attorneys usually cannot provide sustained financial support for permanent relocation or 24-hour police protection of witnesses. Incarcerated witnesses, often disparagingly labeled "jailhouse snitches," can be protected by being separated from the defendant and his or her known associates who are held in the same facility or by being moved to a different correctional institution. Incarcerated relatives or friends of nonincarcerated witnesses may require similar protection.

Judges have taken steps such as prohibiting the use of cell phones to take photographs or send text messages in the courtroom and banning Stop Snitchin' shirts from courthouses. Removing or barring spectators from courtrooms is not commonly used because it conflicts with the defendant's right to a public trial and might increase the likelihood that a conviction would be overturned on appeal. Likewise, the use of videotaped testimony from victims and witnesses conflicts with the defendant's right to cross-examine witnesses and therefore is usually not used.

Other approaches that have been taken to reduce courtroom intimidation include escorting witnesses to and from court appearances, allowing witnesses to be "on call" rather than making unnecessary trips to court, providing separate waiting areas for defendants and witnesses, arresting gang members entering the courtroom if they have outstanding warrants or are in violation of the terms of their probation by associating with other known gang members, and filling courtroom audiences with members of community support groups to counterbalance the influence of spectators who side with the defendant.

Reducing community-wide intimidation is clearly very difficult. Relatively new approaches to combating victim and witness intimidation include the use of federal racketeering laws, formerly used mainly in organized crime cases, to prosecute street gang members. This method allows for use of the federal witness protection program and more severe penalties, including federal prison time, for those who are convicted. Some prosecutors' offices have introduced the practice of "vertical prosecution," where the same attorney or team follows a case from beginning to end; among other benefits, this can make it easier to maintain contact with witnesses, who may otherwise abscond. Assignment of police officers or prosecutors to multiple cases involving the same community or gang can also promote the development of expertise and relationships. Increased application of injunctions, civil suits, local ordinances, and other legal remedies has also played a role in broader efforts to reduce gang activity. Innovations such as gang-tracking databases, crime-mapping software, and gun- or bullet-tracing technologies have also been used.

In addition to gang suppression measures, successful efforts to reduce community-wide intimidation also require criminal justice officials to establish and build relationships of trust with members of crime-ridden neighborhoods. This process can be initiated through increased community outreach and public relations efforts. Interagency cooperation and communication between prosecutors, law enforcement agencies (including the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the Department of Housing and Urban Development, and other federal agencies), correctional authorities, code enforcement offices, social service organizations, public housing authorities, tenant associations, religious organizations, and community groups can enhance victim support and prevent intimidation. For example, one approach sometimes taken by district attorneys is community prosecution, where attorneys work closely with community policing units and form partnerships with neighborhood residents and local groups. Some police departments and prosecutors' offices have gang units whose role can be not only to arrest and prosecute gang members but also to develop in-depth understanding of local gangs and to try to build a positive rapport and earn the trust and respect of local youth. Greater efforts by criminal justice authorities and public officials to increase the public's awareness of available legal and social resources would help combat victim and witness intimidation as well.

Elsa Y. Chen

See also Brown v. Mississippi; Drug Cartels; Drug Dealers; Drug Trafficking; Jamaican Posse; Stop Snitching Campaign

Further Readings

- Butterfield, F. (2005, January 16). Guns and jeers used by gangs to buy silence. The New York Times. Retrieved from <http://www.nytimes.com/2005/01/16/national/16gangs.html>
- Davis, R. C., Smith, B. E., & Henley, M. (1990). Victim/witness intimidation in the Bronx courts: How common is it, and what are its consequences? New York: Victim Services Agency.
- Elliott, R. (1998). Vulnerable and intimidated witnesses: A review of the literature. London: Home Office Research and Statistics Directorate.
- Finn, P., & Healey, K. M. (1996). Preventing gang and drug-related witness intimidation. Washington, DC: National Institute of Justice.
- Glaberson, William. (2003, July 6). "Lie or Die"—Aftermath of a murder; justice, safety, and the system: A witness is slain in Brooklyn. The New York Times. Retrieved from <http://query.nytimes.com/gst/fullpage.html?res=9F05EFDE163DF935A35754C0A9659C8B63>
- Hampson, R. (2006, March 29). Anti-snitch campaign riles police, prosecutors; Is it a grass-roots backlash against criminals turned informers or intimidation? USA Today. Retrieved from <http://www.november.org/stayinfo/breaking06/StopSnitchin06.html>
- Healey, K. M. (1995). Victim and witness intimidation: New developments and emerging responses. Washington, DC: National Institute of Justice.
- Kocieniewski, D. (2007, March 1). With witnesses at risk, murder suspects go free. The New York Times. Retrieved from <http://www.nytimes.com/2007/03/01/nyregion/01witness.html>
- Kocieniewski, D. (2007, November 19). Keeping witnesses off stand to keep them safe. The New York Times. Retrieved from <http://www.nytimes.com/2007/11/19/nyregion/19witness.html>
- Powell, B., & Small, P. (2007, April 26). Hip hop code of silence envelops youths; Critics blame rap for some people's refusal to "snitch" on criminals. Toronto Star, p. A1.
- Tarling, R., Dowds, L., & Budd, T. (2000). Victim and witness intimidation: Key findings from the British Crime Survey. London: Home Office Research, Development, and Statistics Directorate.
- Whitman, J. L., & Davis, R. C. (2007). Snitches get stitches. Washington, DC: National Center for Victims of Crime.

VICTIMIZATION, AFRICAN AMERICAN

African Americans have higher rates of victimization than any other race in the United States. The most basic definition of a victim is someone who has been harmed in some way; a crime victim, then, is an individual who has been victimized by a criminal. Criminologists historically have focused on criminals rather than on victims. With the recent advent of the field of victimology, more attention has been given to victims, although much of the early research focused on defining the ways in which victims had contributed to their own victimization. In the late 1960s, criminologists began to devote more attention to victims, particularly child abuse and domestic violence victims. However, it is only in recent years that criminologists have begun to devote more attention to African American victims. Fully understanding the plight of African American victims requires that consideration be given to six different areas:

1. The extent of victimization against African Americans
2. Patterns of victimization
3. Risk factors for victimization among African Americans
4. Consequences of victimization
5. Factors related to help-seeking behavior
6. Problems inhibiting understanding about the victimization of African Americans

Extent of Victimization Against African Americans

Table 1 shows the victimization rates of African Americans and Whites for several different offense categories, according to the National Crime Victimization Survey. The National Crime Victimization Survey is an annual survey conducted by the U.S. Department of Justice that assesses self-reported victimization among individuals 12 years of age and older in the United States.

Several patterns can be readily seen in these data. First, the overall rates of violence for African

Table 1 Number of Victimizations and Victimization Rates for Persons Ages 12 and Over by Type of Crime and Race of Victim

Type of Crime	White		Black
	Number	Rate	Number	Rate
All personal crimes	4,190,620	20.9	846,730	28.7
Crimes of Violence	4,015,910	20.1	796,800	27.0
Completed violence	1,178,140	6.9	364,650	12.4
Attempted/threatened violence	2,837,780	14.2	432,150	14.7
Rape/sexual assault	124,930	0.6	61,980	1.8
Rape/attempted rape	83,170	0.4	32,210*	1.1*
Rape	37,950	0.2	28,680*	1.0*
Attempted rape ^b	45,220	0.2	3,630*	0.1*
Sexual assault ^a	41,760	0.2	19,770*	0.7*
Robbery	447,030	2.2	136,310	4.6
Completed property taken	253,280	1.3	127,800	4.3
With injury	106,250	0.5	28,690*	1.0*
Without injury	147,020	0.7	99,110	3.4
Attempted to take property	193,750	1.0	8,510*	0.3*
With injury	68,100	0.3	2,670*	0.1*
Without injury	135,650	0.7	5,840*	0.2*
Assault	3,443,950	17.2	608,510	20.6
Aggravated	757,950	3.8	225,480	7.6
With injury	219,920	1.1	85,100	2.9
Threatened with weapon	538,030	2.7	140,380	4.8
Simple	2,695,010	13.4	383,030	13.0
With minor injury	635,900	3.2	106,280	3.6
Without injury	2,060,110	10.2	276,760	9.4
Purse Snatching/Pocket Picking	174,700	0.9	49,930	1.7
Population Age 12 and Over	200,263,410	N/A	29,477,890	N/A

Source: U.S. Department of Justice (2006).

Notes: Rates are per 1,000 persons. Detail may not add to total shown because of rounding.

* Estimate is based on 10 or fewer sample cases.

N/A = Not applicable.

a. Includes verbal threats of rape.

b. Includes threats.

Americans tend to be higher than they are for Whites. In 2005, 27 out of 1,000 African Americans reported being victims of violence, compared to 20 out of 1,000 Whites. Among acts of completed violence (violent act was completed), the victimization rate for African Americans is 2 times higher than the victimization rate for Whites. Specifically, 12.4 out of 1,000 African Americans were victims of completed violence, as compared to 5.9 out of 1,000 Whites. For rape, the victimization rate for African Americans was 3 times higher than it was for Whites. Nearly 2 out of 1,000 African Americans were victims of rape, as compared to 0.6 out of 1,000 Whites. African Americans were also 3 times more likely than Whites to be victims of aggravated assaults with injury, and they were 2 times more likely than Whites to be threatened with a weapon. The robbery victimization rate of African Americans is also 2 times higher than it is for Whites. Some evidence suggests that African Americans are less likely than Whites to disclose their victimization experiences to authorities, so the victimization rate for African Americans could be higher than these data indicate.

African Americans are also overrepresented as victims of homicide. According to data from the U.S. Department of Justice, in murder cases in which the race of the victim was known in 2004, about half of the murder victims were White and about half were African Americans. Given that African Americans make up less than 20% of the population, it is clear that they are overrepresented as murder victims. Related to this finding, there is an unfortunate tendency among criminologists to stress that homicides are intraracial when considering the high rate of homicide victimization among African Americans. To point out that the victims were killed by members of their own race implicitly diminishes the importance of the fact that minorities have disproportionately higher homicide victimization rates.

Patterns of Victimization Against African Americans

In considering the victimization of African Americans, several patterns are noteworthy. First, in violent offenses and robberies, the use of a gun is common. Second, reported victimizations tend to increase in summer months. Third, many offenses are committed by offenders known to the victims. Fourth, there are distinct age patterns in African American victimization. The age differences between African American and White victims are presented in Table 2. Particularly noteworthy in the table is the significantly high victimization rate among younger African Americans. More than 60 out of 1,000 African American teenagers were victims of violence in 2005. This means that in a given year, 6% of African American teenagers are victims of violence. If one were to extend this over one African American's teenage years, during the ages of 12 to 19 (8 years), 48% of African Americans would be victims of violence. This means 1 in 4 African Americans will be victims of violence before they reach the age of 20.

Researchers focusing on elder abuse (e.g., crimes against older adults) have long recognized that underlying racial factors influence the experience of abuse among older persons. African Americans between the ages of 50 and 64 years are more likely than Whites in the same age group to be victims of violent acts. In all, 16.2 out of 1,000 African Americans between the ages of 50 and 64 were victims of violence, as compared to 10.6 out of 1,000 Whites in the same age group. Research shows that older African American women are less likely than older White women to be victims of property crime.

Risk Factors for Victimization

Various risk factors increase the likelihood of victimization. Common risk factors for youth violence have been identified in the literature (e.g., community support for drug use and crime, presence of gangs in the community, poor schools, family conflict, single-parent families). Many African Americans live in environments where many of these risk factors are present.

Taking this a step further, researchers have suggested that living in a disorganized community increases individuals' risks of victimization. Many urban neighborhoods with high rates of poverty and disorder characterize what researchers mean by a "disorganized neighborhood." In Code of the Street, sociologist Elijah Anderson argues that young people must adopt a certain standard of public behavior in order to be safe. The code of the street defines a set of expectations that are believed to make individuals safe. Looking tough and aggressive is central to this code. Eric Stewart and his colleagues considered whether African Americans who adopted this code were truly safer than young people who did not adopt the code. This research found that those who adopted the code, rather than being safer, were more at risk for victimization.

Criminologists have also suggested that the presence of capable guardians can prevent victimization. Somewhat supportive of this suggestion is Zina McGee's recent research showing that African American males are most at risk of being harmed by their peers "while traveling to and from school." In further considering the presence of capable guardians, some have argued that the presence of male role models can serve to protect

Table 2 Victimization Rates for Persons Ages 12 and Over by Race and Age of Victims and Type of Crime

Race and Age	Total Population	Crime of Violence	Completed Violence	Attempted/Threatened Violence	Rape/Sexual Assaults	Robbery
						Total	With Injury	Without Injury
White
12–15	13,082,800	39.9	11.7	28.2	1.0*	2.8	.8*	2.0*
16–19	12,788,770	42.3	13.9	28.4	2.7*	5.4	2.0*	3.4
20–24	16,207,550	49.0	14.4	34.6	1.2*	5.8	1.8*	4.0
25–34	31,335,920	22.4	6.7	15.8	0.3*	2.4	0.7*	1.7
35–49	53,731,450	17.4	5.2	12.1	0.6*	1.8	0.7	1.1
50–64	42,433,220	10.6	2.4	8.2	0.3*	1.4	0.7*	0.7*
65+	30,683,680	2.4	0.6*	1.7	0.0*	0.7	0.3*	0.4*
Black
12–15	2,744,230	59.5	25.4	34.1	2.6*	8.4*	4.5*	3.9*
16–19	2,568,780	62.6	41.1	21.5	7.5*	16.6	1.6*	15.0
20–24	2,678,780	45.8	19.9	16.0	0.0*	6.4*	0.0*	6.4*
25–34	5,250,410	21.9	10.0	11.8	2.1*	3.9*	0.5*	3.4*
35–49	8,062,610	17.9	6.4	11.6	0.0*	3.2*	1.5*	1.7*
50–64	5,208,900	16.2	6.2*	10.0	2.8*	1.3*	0.0*	1.3*
65+	2,968,590	2.2	0.0*	2.2*	0.0*	0.0*	0.0*	0.0*

Source: U.S. Department of Justice (2006).

Note: Rate is per 1,000 persons in each age group.

* Estimate is based on 10 or fewer sample cases.

young people. According to criminologists Dina Rose and Todd Clear, one issue that arises in minority communities is that the criminal justice system's aggressive incarceration policies that remove minority males from their neighborhoods for extended periods of time further exacerbates the disorganization found in these communities. Ironically, while the proponents of these stiff criminal penalty statutes claim that the policies make society safer, by removing minority males (e.g., capable guardians) from their communities, the criminal justice system may actually place minorities at greater risk for victimization.

Consequences of Victimization

Criminologists and victimologists have devoted a great deal of effort to increasing understanding of the consequences of victimization. As with all racial and ethnic groups, studies of African American victims show that all forms of victimization have the potential to result in negative psychological outcomes, including problems with emotional development.

In terms of criminological consequences, there is a limited body of research pointing to the fact that being a victim at one stage in the life course may increase the likelihood that an individual becomes an offender later in life. This may be particularly problematic for African American males who experience different forms of victimization early in life and have few protective factors in their lives or communities.

In terms of victimological consequences, victimologists note that being a victim once increases the likelihood of being a victim on subsequent occasions. One study by Gayle Wyatt found that African American females are more likely than White females to be repeat victims of sexual assault.

Another consequence of victimization has to do with the erosion of trust that occurs among victims. Erosion of trust occurs in two ways. First, Wyatt's research shows that African Americans are more likely than Whites to blame their current living situations for their victimization. On the one hand, this blaming process is a normal part of the victimization experience. Victims tend to assign blame so that they can, at least mentally, take control of their lives in the future and prevent victimization. On the other hand, this blaming process results in victims having less confidence in their communities.

An erosion of trust also occurs with regard to the way that minorities perceive public institutions. This erosion of trust in public institutions may be particularly significant for African American victims. Some have suggested that African Americans' victimization experiences help to explain why African Americans have more negative attitudes toward the police. A study by Thomas Priest and Deborah Carter of a sample of African Americans found that age, education, evaluations of neighborhood safety, assessments of police response time, and victimization worked together to influence perceptions of the police.

Help-Seeking Behavior by Victims

Decisions to seek help from formal social institutions vary by race. African American victims are less likely than White victims to report victimization and are less likely to seek help from various agencies. One of the reasons many African American victims choose not to seek help has to do with the African American community's lack of confidence in the police. Another barrier that African American victims face has to do with institutional racism in the criminal justice system, as well as the discriminatory practices that have been found to be common among different types of human services professionals. Janette Taylor has argued that African American females must confront problems of both racism and sexism when they call upon agents of formal institutions for help.

Several studies have found that African American victims experience different barriers to seeking help than do other racial groups. A study of domestic violence victims by Katherine Morrison and her colleagues found that African American victims perceived their social networks as being willing to provide instrumental support, but not emotional support. The victims also indicated that the African American community perceives victims of domestic violence as "stupid" for not leaving abusive situations. To some, this dynamic explains why African American victims report receiving less social support than other victims, as was the case in Gayle Wyatt's research. Because of the importance of social support in dealing with the negative consequences of victimization, Laura Salazar and her coauthors have suggested that African American violence intervention programs should "incorporate family, church, and other networks in the community to foster support" for African American victims.

Barriers to Understanding African American Victimization

There is a lack of awareness about, and understanding of, the plight of African American victims. This lack of understanding can be attributed to the following factors: conceptual issues; historical distrust of researchers; media influences; funding issues; and societal devaluing of African American victims. Each of these factors is considered in the following.

Conceptual Issues

First, in terms of conceptual issues, criminologists have narrowly defined victimization by focusing on crime victims from a legalistic perspective. What this means is that criminologists tend to focus on those behaviors that society, and politicians, define as crime. Consequently, crime victims are individuals who experience those crimes. Unfortunately, a number of harmful actions are not defined as criminal, or treated as criminal, and these actions disproportionately influence minorities. Discrimination, racism, unfair labor practices, systemic policies promoting poverty among minorities, and unequal access to health care are all harmful actions. As an academic discipline, however, criminology does not focus on institutional harms against minorities. The result is a lack of understanding about the harms perpetrated against African Americans.

Distrust of Researchers

Second, when criminologists study specific forms of victimization in the African American community, they tend to rely on methodologies that are typically appropriate for the White community. Scholars have noted that a historical distrust by African Americans toward researchers has contributed to African Americans' decisions not to report victimization or participate in research studies. To increase participation of African Americans in these studies, criminologists have called for empowerment-based studies in which members of the African American community being studied are actively involved in the entire research process—from defining the research question to developing the methodology, gathering the data, analyzing the data, interpreting the findings, and making recommendations about the findings.

Media Influences

Third, the media have also contributed to misunderstanding about the plight of African American victims. The media tend to minimize African American victims. Marian Meyers studied violence against African American women in Atlanta, Georgia, during the 1990s “Freaknik” event (during which Black college students converged on Atlanta, Georgia, to attend parties and have festive activities) and found that the media coverage “portrayed most of [the African American] victims as stereotypical Jezebels whose lewd behavior provoked assault and absolved the perpetrators of responsibility.” One can readily point to different examples in the national media when African American victims were portrayed differently than White victims. Consider the rape accusations against Mike Tyson and Kobe Bryant—one involving an African American victim and the other a White victim. In Tyson’s case, media attention focused on what his victim did to contribute to the sexual assault (why she would have entered his room). In Bryant’s case, there was a mix of commentaries related to the victim. Some of the commentaries were sympathetic to the victim, while others focused on her promiscuous behavior.

Funding Issues

Fourth, funding issues have also made it difficult to understand the plight of African American victims. Federal funding for criminological research tends to focus on specific crimes, and this funding is typically crime and criminal based rather than victimization based. Researchers have suggested that there is a “funding ladder” that prioritizes criminological research. Rarely does the federal government solicit proposal requests for funding for research on the victimization of African Americans. Without a great deal of funding, it is difficult for criminologists to devote the necessary amount of research to African American victims.

Societal Devaluation of Victims

A fifth factor that contributes to a lack of understanding about African American victims has to do with the way that society has historically devalued African American victims. Consider the past laws that provided different penalties for offenders based on whether the victim was a White victim or African American victim. As an example, some states stipulated that the rape of a White woman would result in the death penalty, while the rape of an African American woman would result in a lesser penalty. Some “disbelievers” would say that these laws no longer exist and that society now treats all victims the same. This is not yet wholly the case. As a simple example, one recent study by Amanda Robinson and Megan Chandek found that police in a midwestern police department were less likely to arrest accused domestic abusers if the victim was an African American.

Future Research

More empirical research on African American victims is needed. Explanations of victimization should be developed based on the assumptions, characteristics, and dynamics of the African American community as opposed to the assumptions, characteristics, and dynamics of the majority community. In addition, there is a need for public policies that address the needs of African American victims and their communities.

Brian K. Payne

See also Victimization, Latina/o; Victimization, White; Victimization, Youth

Further Readings

- McGee, Z. (1999). Patterns of violent behavior and victimization among African American youth. Journal of Offender Rehabilitation, 30, 47–65.
- Meyers, M. (2004). African American women and violence. Critical Studies in Media Communication, 21, 95–119.
- Morrison, K. E., Luchok, K. J., Richter, D., & Parra-Medina, D. (2006). Factors influencing help-seeking networks among African American victims of intimate partner violence. Journal of Interpersonal Violence, 21, 1492–1522.
- Priest, T. B., & Carter, D. B. (1999). Evaluations of police performance in an African American sample. Journal of Criminal Justice, 27, 457–466.
- Robinson, A. L., & Chandek, M. (2000). Differential police response to Black battered women. Women and Criminal Justice, 12, 29–62.
- Rose, D., & Clear, T. (1998). Incarceration, social capital, and crime. Criminology, 36, 441–479.
- Salazar, L., Wingood, G., DiClemente, R., Lang, D., & Harrington, K. (2004). The role of social support in the psychological well-being of African American girls who experience dating violence victimization. Violence and Victims, 19, 171–186.
- Stewart, E., Schreck, C. J., & Simons, R. L. (2006). “I ain’t gonna let no one disrespect me”: Does the code of the street reduce or increase violent victimization among African American adolescents? Journal of Research in Crime and Delinquency, 43, 427–459.
- Taylor, J. (2005). No resting place: African American women at the crossroads of violence. Violence Against Women, 11, 1473–1489.
- U.S. Department of Justice. (2006). National Crime Victimization Survey. Washington, DC: Author.
- Wyatt, G. (1992). The sociocultural context of African American and White American women’s rape. Journal of Social Issues, 48, 77–91.

VICTIMIZATION, ASIAN AMERICAN

According to data reported by the U.S. Census Bureau in 2007, 14.9 million U.S. residents were Asian, or Asian in combination with other races—the third largest minority group in the country. Although the Asian community is growing, Asian immigrants and their descendants are still vulnerable to racially motivated crimes. The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) began collecting hate crime data in 1991 after the Hate Crimes Statistics Act of 1990 was enacted, yet the extent of Asian victimization has not been well documented due to reporting deficiencies at the state level. Until 2002, 11 states had not compiled hate crime statistics on a consistent basis, including Alaska, Georgia, Mississippi, Missouri, and New Mexico, and six others. The reluctance of Asian victims to report crimes to the police, especially those who are newcomers and illegal immigrants, has also contributed to the underreporting of Asian victimization in the United States. Although some victims’ legal status and language ability dispose them to contact the authorities, a lack of confidence in the police and fears of retaliation also contribute to the community’s relative tolerance of racially motivated crimes. Indeed, among all ethnic groups in the country, Asians are least likely to report crimes to the police.

Most crimes committed against Asians in the United States are racially motivated. Although the Chinese Exclusion Act (1882) was repealed in 1943, resentment of Asians has never been completely eradicated from American society. Anti-Asian biases and hostilities certainly have a historical basis, though the specific targets of those biases have changed as American political and social cultures have evolved—that is, such hostility is socially constructed. For instance, after the events of September 11, 2001, Arab Americans, Muslim Americans, and South Asian Americans became new targets of hate crimes. Those who perpetrate hate crimes against Asians might be motivated by different reasons, but personal prejudice against Asians is the most important contributing factor. As a matter of fact, anti-Asian crimes are mostly committed by Whites who hold notions of racial superiority, even if resentments and conflicts between Asians and other ethnic minorities also exist.

Anti-Asian crimes are more likely to involve an attack against an individual—including intimidation, simple assault, and aggravated assault—though various forms of crimes against property also frequently occurred, including destruction, theft, and arson. Research indicates that it might be overly simplistic to attribute hate crimes to organized criminal groups known to harbor racially biased ideologies. In fact, the majority of racially motivated offenders were not affiliated with criminal organizations. Rather, most crimes were committed by otherwise law-abiding individuals or a loose band of residents in a particular neighborhood. For this reason, one of the distinguishing features of anti-Asian crimes is that victims were mostly attacked in or near their homes or business venues.

Asians' victimization is closely correlated to victims' immigrant status, age, gender, place of residence, and income. Comparatively, the newcomers (both legal and illegal immigrants) of the country were more likely to be the targets of anti-Asian crime. Interestingly, the victimization rate is unbalanced among different age groups: highest among people who were between 12 and 24; victimization rates gradually decrease with age. Gender differences in victimization are also significant. Except for rape and sexual assault, Asian males are more vulnerable to hate crimes than are Asian females. Although victimization in the form of simple assault has been constant across geographical location and people's incomes, with respect to serious violent crimes, including rape, sexual assault, robbery, and aggravated assault, the victimization is geographically and economically related: Urban Asian communities have higher victimization rates than do suburban and rural communities, and people who have less income are more likely to be victimized.

The consequences of anti-Asian crimes are apparent both at the individual level and the societal level. On an individual level, victims have suffered physical injuries and psychological trauma due to both the crime and its racially motivated basis. Moreover, these psychological injuries were more likely to stay longer in victims' lives, resulting in increased levels of anxiety, depression, and fear of being revictimized. Victimization of the individual also damages the Asian community. Many of these hate crimes are predicated on the notion that the victim—either as individual or as a subgroup within the community—is merely symbolic, as the perpetrators are usually not interested in harming particular individuals. Rather, their purpose is often to threaten and intimidate the victims' ethnic community. Thus, formulating a civil response to bias crimes against Asians is a great challenge to both American legislators and the criminal justice system.

Violence against Asians has been frequent and sometimes brutal, but in many cases the perpetrators were not held accountable for their crimes. Although there are various reasons for this tendency, the critical factor seems to be that the assailants are members of an ethnic majority. To effectively prevent the further victimization of individual Asians and, by extension, their communities, local law enforcement agencies should respond to anti-Asian crimes effectively and treat such incidents as seriously as they deal with other violent crimes—practices supported by the National Asian American Pacific Legal Consortium, a leading advocacy group. It is more likely that victims will be encouraged to report crimes if they believe that the police and other agencies in the criminal justice system will act justly and fairly on their behalf.

Huan Gao

See also Victimization, African American, Victimization, Latina/o; Victimization, Native American; Victimization, White; Victimization, Youth; Victim Services

Further Readings

- Choi, N. (Ed.). (2001). Aspects of the Asian-American experience: Diversity within diversity. New York: Haworth.
- Gerstenfeld, P. B., & Grant, D. R. (Eds.). (2003). Crimes of hate: Selected readings. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
- National Asian American Pacific Legal Consortium. (2002). Audit of violence against Asian Pacific Americans (10th annual report). Washington, DC: Author.
- Perry, B. (2001). In the name of hate: Understanding hate crimes. New York: Routledge.
- Perry, B. (2003). Hate and bias crime: A reader. New York: Routledge.
- Wong, H. P., & Hwang, V. M. (Eds.). (2001). Anti-Asian violence in North America: Asian American and Asian Canadian reflections on hate, healing, and resistance. New York: AltaMira Press.

VICTIMIZATION, LATINA/O

Understanding violent victimization against Hispanics and how their victimization differs from that of non-Hispanic groups is essential for developing more efficient and effective policies designed to minimize future victimization. Further, understanding Hispanic victimization and how it may differ from that of other groups makes it possible to assess the extent to which there is fair and equitable access to the benefits of the criminal justice system. Should victimization research reveal a systematic bias in the access to the criminal justice system for any group, the cornerstone of the system—equity—is threatened.

This entry outlines current levels and rates of fatal and nonfatal violent victimization; describes victim, offender, and incident characteristics; and offers a brief discussion of some gaps in our understanding about Hispanic violent victimization.

Data

Homicide estimates come from 2004 death certificate data from the National Vital Statistics System (NVSS). The Supplemental Homicide Reports of the Uniform Crime Reports are not suitable to estimate homicide against Hispanics, because many jurisdictions do not gather data on whether the victim was of Hispanic origin.

Nonfatal violent victimization estimates come from National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS) data. The NCVS offers a nationally representative sample of noninstitutionalized persons in the United States age 12 or older. The NCVS is a good source for examining nonfatal victimization because it offers a large, nationally representative sample of Hispanic victims; a range of victim, offender, and incident characteristics; and information on violence regardless of whether it was reported to the police. Nonfatal estimates are based on 2004 data from the NCVS.

“Hispanic” refers to self-identified Mexican Americans, Mexicans, Puerto Ricans, Cubans, and people from Central or Spanish South American countries or some “other” Spanish origin. Nonfatal violence refers to threatened, attempted and completed rape, sexual assault, robbery, and aggravated and simple assault. Fatal violence refers to homicide.

Homicide

In 2004, 1,319 Hispanics were victims of homicide. These homicides included 1,041 Hispanic males and 278 Hispanic females. Stated differently, in 2004, an estimated 4.2 homicides per 100,000 Hispanics occurred (6.6 per 100,000 males and 1.8 per 100,000 females). The Hispanic homicide rate is lower than the non-Hispanic rate. Non-Hispanics were characterized by a rate of 6.6 homicides per 100,000 non-Hispanic persons (10.5 per 100,000 males and 3.0 per 100,000 females). The pattern by gender is similar, with males evidencing a higher rate than females.

Nonfatal Violent Victimization

While Hispanics age 12 or older comprise 13% of the population, they experienced 12% of all violent crime in the United States. Hispanics were victims of about 621,718 violent crimes, leading to a rate of 19.8 violent victimizations per 1,000 Hispanic persons. Specifically, Hispanics sustained 17,316 rapes and sexual assaults (0.6 per 1,000), 71,707 robberies (2.3 per 1,000), 113,187 aggravated assaults (3.6 per 1,000), and 419,507 simple assaults (13.4 per 1,000).

Victim Characteristics

Victimization rates differ among race and Hispanic groups. Hispanics (19.8 per 1,000) were victimized at a rate lower than non-Hispanic Blacks (27.8 victimizations per 1,000), and at a rate lower than non-Hispanic American Indians (50.0 per 1,000). In contrast, Hispanics were victims of violence at a rate greater than non-Hispanic Asian/Pacific Islanders (8.3 per 1,000). And Hispanics were victimized at rates similar to non-Hispanic Whites during 2004 (19.8 and 20.9 violent victimizations per 1,000, respectively).

Relative differences in victimization rates change little by crime type. Hispanic rates of victimization are similar to non-Hispanic White rates (14.1 simple assaults, 4.1 aggravated assaults, 2.0 robberies, and 0.7 rape/sexual assault victimizations per 1,000 non-Hispanic Whites). Non-Hispanic Blacks experienced each type of crime at a higher rate than Hispanics with the exception of simple assault (12.8 simple assaults, 8.0 aggravated assaults, 5.1 robberies, and 1.9 rape/sexual assaults per 1,000).

Unlike broader patterns in the population, data reveal that Hispanic males and females are victims of overall violence at similar rates (20.2 and 19.4 victimizations per 1,000). No symmetry exists among non-Hispanic groups. Non-Hispanic White males are victimized at a rate higher than non-Hispanic White females (24.8 and 17.1 per 1,000, respectively). Non-Hispanic Black males and females are victimized at different rates (34.2 and 22.5 per 1,000), as are non-Hispanic American Indian males and females (55.7 and 45.2 per 1,000), and non-Hispanic Asian/Pacific Islander males and females (12.0 and 4.7 per 1,000).

Similarity in Hispanic male and female victimization rates is found among specific crime types. Simple assault victimization against Hispanic males and females are similar (13.7 and 13.1 per 1,000 respectively). Identical aggravated assault rates are found between Hispanic males and females (3.6 per 1,000). And Hispanic males are robbed at a rate of 2.6 per 1,000 while Hispanic females experienced 2.0 robberies per 1,000. An exception to the similarity in rates is found when investigating rape and sexual assault between Hispanic females and males (0.7 and 0.4 rape/sexual assaults per 1,000, respectively).

Hispanics who were separated or divorced were most likely to experience a violent victimization (46.5 and 38.9 per 1,000). Hispanics who had never married were violently victimized at a rate of 26.6 per 1,000. And the lowest rate of violent victimization characterized Hispanics who are married (10.3) and widowed (14.4 per 1,000).

In general, age and violent victimization risk are inversely related. Younger Hispanics are more likely to be victims of violence than are older Hispanics. The peak age category of individuals experiencing violent victimization was found among those ages 20 to 24 years (32.7 per 1,000 Hispanics). From this category, victimization rates fall to the lowest rate of 3.4 victimizations per 1,000 among those age 65 or older.

Like age, annual household income is inversely related to rates of violent victimization among Hispanics. The higher one's annual household income, the less likely he or she is to experience violence. The highest rate of victimization was noted among those with an annual household income of $7,500 to $14,999 (30.7 per 1,000 Hispanics). And the lowest rate of violence was estimated to be experienced by those with annual incomes of $75,000 or more.

Offender Characteristics

The NCVS offers insight into the characteristics of offender. And while offender characteristics are based on the victim's perceptions, research assessing the correspondence between victim perception and offender characteristics (i.e., offender's age and race) recorded in police reports demonstrates significant agreement.

According to the NCVS, most violence against Hispanics was committed by a male or a group of males (73.6%). Nearly 1 in 5 victimizations (19.1%) was perpetrated by a female or a group of female offenders. And a relatively small percentage (4.1%) of violence against Hispanics was committed by a group of offenders that included both males and females. The remaining violence was perpetrated by offenders of unknown gender.

Most violence against Hispanics was committed by an offender, or offenders, described by the victim as White (37.4%); 16.6% of the violence committed against Hispanics was described as being perpetrated by a Black offender or offenders. Nearly one quarter (23.0%) of all violence against Hispanics was committed by an offender or offenders described by the victim as "Other" (i.e., not White or Black). And a group of offenders comprised of different races committed 5.0% of all violence against Hispanics. Finally, 17.9% of the violence committed was perpetrated by an offender with a race the victim could not identify.

Violence against Hispanics is positively related to the offender's age. Most offending against Hispanics is committed by offenders age 30 or older (34.4%). Nominally less (32.2%) of all violence sustained by a Hispanic was described by the victim as having come at the hands of an offender or offenders between the ages of 18 and 29. Only about 15.6% of violence against Hispanics came from an offender or offenders under the age of 18. Groups of offenders with perpetrators of a variety of ages were responsible for 9.9% of all violence against Hispanics, while offenders of unknown ages are attributed with committing 7.9% of all violence against Hispanics.

Victim and Offender Relationship

Nearly half (46.7%) of all violent victimization against Hispanics was committed by a stranger. Slightly less violence—30.7%—was committed by a friend or an acquaintance. An intimate partner—current or former spouse, boyfriend or girlfriend—perpetrated 14.0% of all violence experienced by a Hispanic person. And finally, other family members were responsible for 7.3% of all violence against Hispanics.

The distribution of victim and offender relationship changes when examining male and female victims separately. Hispanic females are more likely to be victimized by someone they know, and Hispanic males are about equally likely to be victimized by a stranger or someone they know. Stranger violence accounted for 53.9% of the violence experienced by Hispanic males, and 39.1% of the violence against Hispanic females. An intimate partner was responsible for 23.7% of violence against Hispanic females, whereas 4.9% of the violence sustained by Hispanic males was perpetrated by an intimate partner. Discrepancies between male and female violent victimization are muted when considering friend and other family member violence. Friends and acquaintances were responsible for 33.6% of all violence against Hispanic males, and 27.6% of all violence against Hispanic females. And finally, 6.5% of violence against men and 8.1% of violence against women was committed by an “other” family member (i.e., not an intimate partner).

Incident Characteristics

Violence against Hispanics generally did not involve a weapon. 70.2% of violent victimizations against Hispanics did not involve any weapon. Much less (6.7%) violence involved a firearm or any type. Knives or sharp objects were brandished during 5.8% of all victimizations, while some “other” type of weapon was present during 8.1% of all violence. In 10.2% of all violent victimizations against Hispanics, the victim was unsure of the type of weapon brandished, or they were not sure that a weapon was involved.

Violent victimizations against Hispanics generally did not lead to an injured victim. Nearly 7 of 10 victimizations (69.2%) resulted in no injury. A serious injury (e.g., broken bones, gunshot wounds, internal injuries) was sustained during 4.2% of victimizations, 25% of violence resulted in a minor injury (e.g., bruises, cuts, scrapes, chipped teeth), and 1.6% led to a completed rape without additional injuries.

Like the overall population, about half of violence against Hispanics comes to the attention of the police. 51.3% of violence against Hispanics was reported. Research demonstrates differences among reporting by crime type. Hispanics are less likely to report the most serious of violent victimization compared to non-Hispanic Whites, but are more likely than non-Hispanic Whites to report simple assaults to the police.

Directions for Future Research

While research examining Hispanics has been growing over time, significant gaps in our understanding of Hispanic victimization experiences remain. For example, nationally representative victimization data allowing the disaggregation of “Hispanics” is needed. The aggregation “Hispanic” encompasses a widely varied group of individuals and likely masks important within-group variation. Data collection should expand Hispanic origin measures to include greater detail (i.e., Mexican, Puerto Rican, Colombian, Cuban, etc.).

A second gap in the literature is the lack of an immigration measure in nationally representative data. Reasons exist to suspect differences in victimization experiences between legal and illegal groups, and between new immigrants and those who have lived in the United States for an extended period of time. The added precision afforded by these two measures would allow greater understanding of the victimization experiences and access to the criminal justice system among the Hispanic population.

Callie Marie Rennison

See also Domestic Violence; Ethnicity; Latina/o/s; Violence Against Women; Violent Crime

Further Readings

- Lauritsen, J. L., & Rennison, C. M. (2005). The role of race and ethnicity in violence against women. In K. Heimer & C. Kruttschnitt (Eds.), Gender and crime: Patterns in victimization and offending. New York: New York University Press.
- Martinez, R., Jr. (2002). Latino homicide: Immigration, violence and community. New York: Routledge.
- Nielsen, A. L., Lee, M. T., & Martinez, R., Jr. (2005). Integrating race, place and motive in social disorganization theory: Lessons from a comparison of Black and Latino homicide types in two immigrant destination cities. Criminology, 43, 837–872.
- Ramirez, R., Jr. (1996). Latinos and lethal violence: The impact of poverty and inequality. Social Problems, 43, 131–145.
- Ramirez, R., Jr. (2002). Latino homicide: Immigration, violence, and community. New York City and London: Routledge.
- Rennison, C. M. (2001). Violent victimization and race, 1993–98. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office.
- Rennison, C. M. (2002). Hispanic victims of violent crime, 1993–2000/Víctimas Hispanas de crímenes violentos, 1993–2000. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office.
- Rennison, C. M. (2007). Reporting to the police by Hispanic victims of violence. Violence and Victims, 22, 6.

VICTIMIZATION, NATIVE AMERICAN

According to the 2000 census, 4.1 million American Indians and Alaska Natives (collectively referred to in this entry as American Indians, Native Americans, or Natives) currently reside in the United States. There are 562 federally recognized Indian tribes and Alaska Native groups who speak altogether more than 250 different languages. Although tribal nations maintain separate cultures, histories, and customs, they share several commonalities. All tribes are similarly affected by many of the same issues such as poverty, unemployment, lack of education, and victimization. This entry outlines the prevalence of victimization in Native American communities (hereafter referred to as Indian Country) and discusses the context in which such victimization occurs. Attention is given to services offered to victims and the challenges to providing such services. First, it is important to understand the available data sources from which information on victimization in Indian Country is drawn.

Victimization Statistics

It is difficult to draw an accurate portrayal of American Indian victimization because of the obstacles in obtaining reliable data in Indian Country. Many tribal police departments do not systematically collect data due to lack of resources: understaffing, funds, data collection systems, and analysis software. Crime victims are hesitant to report victimization due to the distrust of law enforcement, fear of retaliation, and the perception that law enforcement is not effective. Furthermore, American Indians are a difficult population to reach with current data collection methods. Many Native Americans live in geographically isolated locations, making it difficult to include them in samples. It is also difficult to obtain a representative sample because of the cultural diversity between tribes. Nonetheless, there are some data available that suggest victimization in Indian Country warrants serious attention.

The Supplementary Homicide Report (SHR) from the Uniform Crime Reporting Program provides information on crimes that result in a death. Results from a recent report found that over a 23-year period (1976–1999), an estimated 2,469 American Indians were murdered. Consistent with other racial groups, males comprised the majority of the victims. However, there was a notable difference. African Americans and Whites were more likely to be murdered by someone of the same race, but American Indians were more likely to be murdered by someone of a different race. While informative, the SHR provides detailed information only on homicides, and it does not distinguish between Natives who live on and off the reservation.

The National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS) collects information on violent crimes including rape, sexual assault, robbery, and aggravated and simple assault for persons 12 and older. Compared to the SHR, the NCVS provides a more complete picture of victimization, although it also does not distinguish between Natives who live on and off the reservation. Based on data over a 9-year period (1992–2001), American Indians accounted for approximately 1.3% of all victims of violence, but they represented only .5% of the sample. This translates into approximately 1 violent crime for every 10 residents age 12 or older. Compared with both African Americans (1 out of 20) and Whites (1 out of 25), Natives in this sample were victimized at an alarming rate. American Indians were more than twice as likely as Whites, African Americans, and Asians to experience a sexual assault or rape, aggravated assault, and simple assault. Robbery was the sole violent crime for which American Indians were victimized at a rate more similar to African Americans, although it was still double what it was for Whites and Asians.

The rate of violent victimization among American Indian women was more than 2.5 times the rate for African American and White females and 5 times greater than for Asian women. A similar pattern was found for Native American males. Natives were more likely to be victimized across all age categories, but it was highest for those between the ages of 18 and 24. There was also a great deal of victimization among the elderly. Among persons age 55 or greater, the victimization rate was 22 per 1,000 compared to the overall rate of 8 per 1,000.

Contributing Factors

As evidenced by the aforementioned statistics, American Indians are experiencing high rates of victimization, much higher than those experienced by other ethnic groups and the national average. The question, then, is why? There are several potential historical and current contributing factors, including colonization, substance abuse, and lack of jurisdiction over non-Native offenders.

The increased likelihood of victimization can be traced back to the treatment of American Indians by colonists and the government. Historically, violence among the American Indian population was rare because of the cultural emphasis on harmony. The transition experienced by Native Americans because of colonization has drastically altered the social and cultural structures that originally provided sources of social control. For example, the introduction and growth in popularity of boarding school programs for Native children greatly undermined traditional Native values and family structure. Students were often punished for speaking their language or engaging in other Native cultural rituals and were unable to see their family for long periods of time. Several generations of students lost their language, cultural practices, and ties to their communities, which contributed to the breakdown of informal social controls and the increase in crime and victimization.

Alcohol abuse in Indian Country is another contributing factor to high rates of victimization. Alcohol-related offenses among American Indians are more than double those found among the rest of the population. According to some estimates, nearly 70% of all violent crimes in Indian Country involve alcohol, compared to approximately 41% for other racial groups. Alcohol abuse also has a significant impact on violence against women. Several studies have found a high correlation between alcohol use and intimate partner violence; with more than half of all incidents occurring while the perpetrator was under the influence.

The jurisdictional complexities relating to criminal offenses are another contributing factor to the high rates of victimization in Indian Country. Tribes lack jurisdiction to prosecute crimes that involve a non-Native offender. Yet according to a Bureau of Justice Statistics (BJS) study, at least 70% of the crime experienced by Native Americans is interracial. Tribes also do not have jurisdiction for crimes that result in more than 1 year of imprisonment. For some tribes, the Federal Bureau of Investigation has jurisdiction to prosecute serious offenses, whereas some tribes must rely on the state. As such, it is difficult for Native law enforcement to enforce the law, deter crime, and prevent victimization.

Barriers to Victim Services

Given the magnitude of victimization in Indian Country, Native communities are increasingly concerned with providing adequate services to victims. Unfortunately, there are four major impediments that tribal justice systems have to overcome before they can better address victim needs: limited resources, poor law enforcement services, limited training for service providers, and lack of system reliability.

The ability of tribal nations to provide victim services is hampered by the poverty that plagues most Native communities. The unemployment rate for American Indians is approximately 50%, the highest among all minority groups. The lack of financial resources not only hinders the communities' ability to provide services, but it inhibits victims from seeking services in surrounding areas. Native communities are geographically isolated, further limiting the available resources. Geographical isolation generates additional stress for victims because offenders typically live in the same community. Living in such close proximity hinders service availability because victims alienate themselves as a result of fear of retaliation and other safety concerns.

Inadequate law enforcement services must also be addressed in order to provide appropriate victim services. Due to a number of factors, it is difficult for law enforcement to provide assistance and protection to victims of crime in Indian communities. Many tribal nations do not have an emergency response system; they are understaffed; and they police a large geographical area. These conditions result in lengthy response times to calls for help, which inhibits the willingness of victims to call and the ability of police to provide victim services.

The limited training for service providers is another barrier to providing victim resources. Most tribal police and social service providers are not properly trained in victim response. The opportunities for ongoing specialized training in particular areas such as child abuse, sexual assault, elder abuse, and gang violence are also limited due to strained budgets. The importance of training to provide mental and emotional health, to address safety and protection concerns, and to help with medical related issues cannot be overstated. Service providers also need extensive training relating to the tribal culture to ensure the services offered are culturally appropriate.

The final barrier involves the lack of confidence in the justice system. Due to the lack of infrastructure, such as laws, staff, detention facilities, and victim shelters, many victims do not seek help.

Those that do find themselves in a complex judicial process involving the tribal, local, state, or federal government. The quality and amount of victim services offered are diminished because there are few coordinated approaches among the various governments to assist victims of crime. As such, victims often fall through the cracks.

Victim Services

Despite the aforementioned barriers, great strides have been made in protecting victims and providing culturally appropriate interventions. Since each tribe is unique in its customs and traditions, the specifics of these interventions vary considerably. However, it is generally agreed that services staffed with providers who are aware of the tribal history, traditional sanctions, and cultural beliefs are more likely to be successful. The restorative and reparative approach to victimization can fulfill these criteria.

The restorative and reparative approach has gained considerable popularity within the Native community. Within this framework, the community is responsible for taking the corrective actions necessary to redirect the offender and to provide safety for the victim. It is a holistic approach that focuses on addressing the needs of the victim but recognizes the need to include the offender and the community in the healing process. Many times the offender will take deliberate steps to assist the victim in the healing process. This is especially important when the offender and victim have a close relationship, are family members, or live near each other. The restorative and reparative approach helps promote the accountability of offenders to crime victims, local communities, and the state. It increases the use of restitution while decreasing the cost of punishment. This is important, since tribes operate with limited resources. Most important, this approach is consistent with the traditional Native American attitudes toward justice.

Conclusion

Social problems, including victimization, affect all racial and ethnic groups. Although more research is necessary before drawing definitive conclusions, available statistics suggest that Native Americans are victimized at a much higher rate than other racial groups, and a rate significantly higher than the national average. The factors contributing to the victimization rates include poverty, colonization, substance abuse, and jurisdictional complexities.

Despite the tremendous obstacles, tribal communities are increasingly concerned with providing adequate services to victims and their families. The resurgence among American Indians to strengthen their tribal justice system by returning to a restorative and reparative approach has been to the benefit of the victims and the larger community. There is great potential for the needs of victims to be addressed in Indian Country, but it requires adequate resources, coordination and cooperation among all criminal justice actors, and a firm commitment by the community.

Jaclyn Smith

See also Native Americans; Tribal Police

Further Readings

- Baldridge, D., & Brown, A. (2000). Native American elder abuse. Retrieved from <http://www.ncjrs.gov/App/publications/Abstract.aspx?id=203670>
- Bigfoot, D. S. (2000). History of victimization in Native communities. Retrieved from <http://devbehavpeds.ouhsc.edu/assets/pdf/pmm/History%20of%20Victimization%20Issues.pdf>
- Deer, S., Flies-Away, J., Garrow, C., Naswood, E., & Payne, D. (2004). Victim services: Promising practices in Indian Country. Retrieved from http://www.ovc.gov/publications/infores/victimsrvsindian_country2004/729404.pdf
- Perry, S. (2004). American Indians and crime: A BJS statistical profile, 1992–2002. Retrieved from <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/pub/pdf/aic02.pdf>
- Thurman, P. J., Roe Bubar, J. D., Plested, B., Edwards, R., LeMaster, P., Bystrom, E., et al. (2003). Violence against Indian women. Retrieved from <http://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/nij/grants/198828.pdf>

attention and societal concern are often invested in crimes against Whites. The socially constructed image of the White victim and disproportionate attention to crimes against Whites are often incongruous with the statistical realities of race and criminal victimization.

Take, for example, the social construction of the child abduction victim. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that it is a dramatic microcosm of the racial imbalance in mainstream America's perspective on crime and race. In the past quarter-century, numerous policies that memorialize famous victims have been enacted in response to horrific crimes against children. Among these are the Missing Children Act (Etan Patz and Adam Walsh), sex offender registration requirements (Jacob Wetterling and Megan Kanka), habitual offender laws (Polly Klaas), and the AMBER Alert system (Amber Hagerman). More recently, a majority of states have enacted "Jessica's Law" sex offender enhancements (Jessica Lunsford), and stricter revocation criteria for probationers have been proposed as "Carlie's Law" (Carlie Brucia).

The deaths of all of these children have aroused intense grief and public outrage, and rightly so, but it is noteworthy that all these child victims were White. In fact, no "memorial crime control" legislation has ever been inspired by the death or serious abuse of a non-White child in the United States.

Mass media portrayals might be in part to blame. It is illustrative to contrast the late 1996 murder of child beauty queen JonBenet Ramsey, a White female, with that of 9-year-old Black female Toya Currie (initially identified as "Girl X" to protect her privacy), who was found near death in a stairwell in Chicago's notorious Cabrini-Green housing project after being savagely raped, tortured, poisoned, and permanently disabled by a then-unknown attacker. Given the similar severity of the offenses and sympathetic power of the victims, one would suspect that the two crimes would command comparable media and public interest, but they did not. A Lexis-Nexis search of electronic archives of North American newspapers for the 120 days after the Ramsey murder identifies 298 stories that reference the case. In the year after the respective crimes, there were 660 stories mentioning JonBenet Ramsey, but only 20 that referenced Toya Currie.

VICTIMIZATION, WHITE

Members of all races have been victims of crime in the United States. However, disproportionate

While no exact measures of “stereotypical” child abduction and murder have ever been developed, it is possible to estimate its prevalence using the Federal Bureau of Investigation’s (FBI) Supplementary Homicide Reports. From 1973 to 2003, the SHR identified 2,055 children under the age of 18 who were murdered as part of a sex crime. Of these, 1,358 of the victims were White and 118 were Black, although the statistics for Whites are certainly misleading because Hispanic victims are conflated with Whites in the data. Even with this conflation, the data show that there are potentially hundreds of non-White victims of child abduction or murder—and yet only White victims have inspired memorial crime control legislation.

Perhaps even more important than popular portrayals and perceptions is the compelling evidence that crimes against Whites command even greater social concern—and legal response—if their attackers are non-White. For example, while patterns differ by jurisdiction, it has been repeatedly shown that African American murderers whose victims are White are more likely to receive the death penalty. Similarly, some studies show that African American men convicted of raping White women have often received more severe prison terms than any other offender category, leading some to argue that it reflects an implied societal “sexual stratification” in which the justice system is employed to reinforce historically prescribed sexual boundaries in which minority men are denied the opportunity to date and have sexual relations with White women.

Recent information on White victims in the National Crime Victimization Survey indicates that their violent crime victimization rate is 23.2 (per 1,000) and 155.8 for their property crime victimization. Disproportionate media attention to White victims and disproportionately punitive treatment of minorities who victimize Whites are ironic, because the victims of violent crime are disproportionately non-White. National Crime Victimization Survey and Uniform Crime Report data show that Whites are much less likely to be victims of all forms of violent crime than African Americans and other minorities. For example, despite the fact that African Americans constitute less than 13% of the general population, they compose nearly half of all homicide victims. Similar disproportions can be demonstrated for rape, armed robbery, and so forth. White victimization is real but not predominant, as popular portrayals would suggest.

Timothy Griffin

See also Baldus Study; Central Park Jogger; Delinquency and Victimization; Interracial Crime; Media Portrayals of White Americans; Myth of a Racist Criminal Justice System; Racialization of Crime; Sentencing; Victimization, African American; Violent Crime

Further Readings

- Catalano, S. M. (2006). National Crime Victimization Survey: Criminal victimization, 2005. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs.
- Fox, J. A. (2005). Uniform Crime Reports: Supplementary homicide reports, 1976–2003. Retrieved from <http://ojjdp.ncjrs.org/ojstatbb/ezashr>
- Mann, C. R. (1993). Unequal justice: A question of color. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Mann, C. R., & Zatz, M. S. (2002). Images of color; Images of crime: Readings. Los Angeles: Roxbury.
- Ordonez, J. (1997, February 21). Race as Chicago case’s “X” Factor; Attack draws comparisons to JonBenet Ramsey case. The Washington Post, p. 2.
- Rand, M., & Catalano, S. (2007). Criminal victimization, 2006. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs.
- Surette, R. (2007). Media, crime, and criminal justice: Images, realities and policies (3rd ed.). Belmont, CA: Wadsworth.
- Walker, S., Spohn, C., & DeLone, M. (2004). The color of justice: Race, ethnicity, and crime in America (3rd ed.). Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, Thomson Learning.

VICTIMIZATION, YOUTH

Youth victimization is generally defined as violence and/or crimes perpetrated against youth. This definition can include physical assaults such as hitting, punching, and kicking, sexual assaults such as rape and molestation, and other crimes such as theft and bullying. Furthermore, youth victimization can be both direct (being the victim of violence or crime) and indirect (witnessing violence and crimes perpetrated against others). Research shows that youth between the ages of 12 and 17 have the highest rates of victimization for both crime of violence and crimes of theft. This entry addresses specific factors that lead to minority youth victimization and their subsequent involvement in violence.

Explanations for Youth Victimization

Criminologists and sociologists have suggested several possible explanations for patterns of youth victimization. Some theorists suggest that lifestyle and routine activities contribute to victimization, while others suggest that a victim's individual traits may increase victimization. Those suggesting lifestyle explanations emphasize the lack of protection and guardianship for the victim and the presence of a capable offender. According to the routine activities theory, individuals are at an increased risk for victimization when they are placed in daily situations with lower protection and increased exposure and proximity to offenders. Criminologists suggest that offenders victimize individuals due to several different factors, such as weakened social bonds, poverty, and cultural conflicts. Other theorists suggest the integration of theories of victimization and criminology to explain how the interaction of criminal motivation and availability of victims increases victimization. Regarding the nexus between victimization and violence among minority youth, one major concern is the disproportionate minority confinement that occurs when a large percentage of juveniles who have previously been victimized find themselves detained or confined in secured detention facilities. Black, Hispanic, and other minority youth are often at a higher risk of victimization and subsequent violence, often leading to disproportionate targeting and unfair treatment by law enforcement officials and obtaining racially skewed charges and plea bargaining decisions of prosecutors by discriminatory sentencing practices.

Structural and Choice Components in Explanations of Victimization

Structural components of the explanations of victimization, proximity and exposure, are increasingly significant due to the social and physical contexts in which victimization occurs. Proximity relates to the ecological proximity or closeness to criminal behavior. Exposure is the rate at which individuals are faced with motivated offenders. An individual increases his or her exposure to crime when he or she participates in activities in dangerous environments. Both of these are often determined by neighborhood and community characteristics. The choice components of victimization are related to the particular offenders and victims. A lack of guardianship will yield an environment in which an offender feels safe to commit an offense. Guardianship can be viewed as the ability to prevent the occurrence of a crime, such as the presence of others or alarm systems. Attractiveness of a victim will then determine who an offender will violate based on assumptions that an individual has some value to the offender.

Rational Choice Explanation

According to the rational choice explanation of victimization and crime, offenders commit crimes based on personal benefit that can be derived from that offense. Following this line of theory, criminals weigh the costs and benefits of their actions prior to making them. A situational perspective is used to address the connection between situations and behaviors. Contextual information is gathered to determine the likelihood of victimization. The decision to commit a crime is made in stages, the first being the decision to participate in criminal activity. The second stage involves selecting a crime that fulfills the needs of the offender. Given this theoretical perspective, victims are identified by the offenders, therefore suggesting the likelihood of victimization to increase in areas with more offenders.

There is, however, a distinction between the decision to become involved in crime and the decision to commit an individual crime. The process of deciding to become involved in crime is the process through which offenders determine whether or not they will participate in particular types of crime; this process is a multistage process that occurs over time and is based on a range of information. The decision to commit an individual offense is based largely on immediate circumstances and occurs over a shorter period of time.

Routine-Activities Explanation

The routine-activities explanation of victimization is very similar to the rational choice explanation because both stem from the idea that offenders are rational beings who make decisions based on the comparison of costs and benefits of their future actions. It is suggested that the routine activities of some groups and some people may expose them to higher risks of victimization. Additionally, the routine-activities explanation suggests that there are certain conditions that must occur at the same time and place in order for an offense to be committed. These conditions are the presence of a motivated offender, a suitable target, and the lack of a guardian or source of prevention. Rates of victimizations will therefore change whenever there is a change in available targets or the lack of prevention mechanisms. Some routine-activities theorists present the changes in routine activities, such as working outside of the home or the increased portability of goods.

Rates of Youth Victimization

Data from the School Crime and Safety Survey indicate that, in 2005, students ages 12 to 18 were victims of about 1.5 million nonfatal crimes (theft plus violent crime) while they were at school and about 1.2 million nonfatal crimes while they were away from school. Generally, more students ages 12 to 18 were victims of theft at school than away from school between 1992 and 2005. In 2005, students were victims of 868,000 crimes of theft at school and 610,000 crimes of theft away from school. The victimization rates for students ages 12 to 18 varied according to certain student characteristics in 2005. A greater percentage of younger students (ages 12 to 14) than older students (ages 15 to 18) were victims of crime at school, but the reverse was true away from school. Students residing in suburban areas had a lower rate of violent victimization at school and away from school than students in urban areas.

The consequences of youth victimization can be very detrimental, causing psychological disorders, substance abuse and dependence, and delinquency. A study conducted with a sample of 2,030 children (ages 2 to 17) showed that nearly 10% reported a household income of less than $20,000; and 34% had an annual household income between $20,000 and $50,000. The survey contained 76% White, 11% Black, 9% Hispanic, and 3.5% from other races. More than half of the youth in this sample experienced an assault in the course of the study year. One in 10 experienced an assault-related injury including a bruise, a cut, or broken bone. About one fifth of children and youth also experienced bullying; and one fourth had been teased and harassed. Boys had higher rates of assault victimization than girls for nearly all types of assaults. However, the girls had higher rates of attempted and completed kidnapping. Physical assaults overall occurred at a higher rate for elementary school-age children (ages 6 to 12). However, nonsexual assaults to the genitals and bias attacks were higher for the teenage group. Additionally, dating violence was reflected only in the teenage group. A majority (54%) of the assaults were committed by family members, including siblings and acquaintances.

One in 12 of respondents in the national sample of children had experienced sexual victimization. A little more than one fourth of the children and youth experienced property victimization in the study year. One third of the national sample of children and youth had witnessed victimization of another person or had been exposed indirectly. Among 71% of children and youth who reported at least one direct or indirect victimization over the course of the year experienced about three victimizations that year. In disadvantaged neighborhoods, the incidence of victimization is higher.

According to Wilson, the growth of neighborhoods with extreme levels of poverty has created conditions that isolate residents from mainstream society and tie them to a local setting of multiple disadvantages. Drawing on this argument, scholars have explored the association between concentrated poverty and various types of "deviance" such as drug use, teenage childbearing, and violent crime. Research has found that youth in disadvantaged neighborhoods report higher rates of neighborhood victimization. Furthermore, neighborhood disadvantage leads to higher rates of violence, which, due to the social organization of this violence, leads to greater interaction between younger adolescents and older adolescents and young adults, who socialize youth to cultural models.

Because those older youth and young adults who are visible and available in disadvantaged neighborhoods often present models at odds with those of mainstream society, these relationships can adversely affect younger adolescents' later decision making regarding education, sex, and romantic relationships. Nonetheless, within neighborhoods plagued by high crime rates, youth vary in the extent to which they witness violence. One of the more promising factors that may protect youth from exposure is family functioning. The family is seen as the most prominent, persistent, and proximal developmental influence for children and thus is seen as a likely focus for intervention. Research found family structure (level of organization and support within the family) to moderate the relation to both aggression and anxiety or depression for those exposed to community violence.

Research on Youth Victimization

While youth victimization may not be considered a pressing issue, research suggests the contrary. Youth who are victimized are more likely to exhibit delinquent and aggressive behavior and engage in illegal activities. Furthermore, research suggests a link between victimization and post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and substance abuse and dependence. As the literature of youth victimization grows, research combining both the empirical and theoretical is essential. Policy implications from such research can work to prevent youth victimization. Although it is impossible for all youth victimization to be prevented, it is possible for the negative effects, such as delinquent behavior and substance abuse, to be mitigated. Additionally, youth who have been victimized can be treated effectively.

Future research should include qualitative and longitudinal methodologies to effect deeper understanding of this phenomenon.

Zina McGee, Adrienne Gilbert, and Kendrick Henley

See also Delinquency and Victimization; Delinquency Prevention; Juvenile Crime

Further Readings

McGee, Z. (2003). Community violence and adolescent development: Assessing risk and protective factors among African American youth. Journal of Contemporary Criminal Justice, 19, 293–314.

McGee, Z. (2003). Weapons, violence, and youth: A study of weapon-related victimization among urban high school students. In J. Joseph & D. Taylor (Eds.), With justice for all: Minorities and women in criminal justice (pp. 191–208). Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall.

U.S. Department of Education. (2007). School crime and safety. Washington, DC: Author.

VICTIM SERVICES

The term victim services refers to various ways that victims of crime are being assisted. Victims of crime are people who have experienced direct physical, emotional, or pecuniary harms as a result of a compensable crime. Victim services are an important stabilizing agent in society as they help victims of crime cope with trauma and other negative effects of crime.

Even though services are provided to all victims of crime, the role of victim services has special meaning to minority crime victims. According to the Bureau of Justice Statistics, Blacks' homicide victimization rates were 6 times higher than Whites', and Blacks were much more likely to be killed in drug-related circumstances. Other statistics also indicate that racial minorities are disproportionately victims of crime. For example, according to the 2005 NCVS, the rate for Black victims of personal crimes, for every 1,000 people, is 28.7, compared to 20.9 White victims of personal crime and 14.1 victims in the other minority category. The data further indicated that Blacks in the United States experience property crime less often than Whites, 144.6 compared to 155.7, respectively. Even so, minority members of society continue to need and benefit from victim services.

In the early 1970s, criminal justice systems in the United States began showing greater sensitivity to the needs of crime victims. This occurred in part as a result of prosecutors' recognition of the important roles played by victims in the successful prosecution of offenders. To garner the support of victims in criminal prosecutions, many prosecutors began offering a variety of support services to crime victims who were also witnesses. For example, some prosecutors offered financial support to victims to address the income lost by victim-witnesses while assisting with prosecutions. Other services included counseling to assist with the psychological needs of victims, and even educational briefings to prepare victims for trial. By the mid-1970s, prosecutors in seven states implemented pilot victim-witness assistance projects. The success of pilot programs played an integral role in the political support for passage of the 1984 Victims of Crime Act (VOCA). Since that time, most local prosecutors' offices have provided varying levels of service to crime victims in the United States. The types of services provided are often a reflection of individual state policies and collaboration with the federal Office of Victims of Crime (OVC). A result of these early beginnings was the establishment of victim-witness assistance programs that currently provide victim services throughout the nation.

The Crime Victims' Fund, created by VOCA and administered through OVC, is a non-taxpayer-funded resource that pays for services provided to crime victims. Funding to support victim compensation and victim assistance programs is collected at the federal level and then awarded by the OVC to the states for disbursement to local programs. Funds are derived from several sources, that is, fines paid by the convicted, forfeited bail bonds, penalties, special assessments collected by the federal courts and U.S. attorneys' offices, fees collected by the Federal Bureau of Prisons from offenders convicted of federal crimes, private gifts, bequests, and donations. These funds support two types of locally administered programs, for example, those that provide victim compensation or victim assistance.

Crime victim compensation programs reimburse victims for a variety of expenses incurred as a result of criminal victimization, for example, medical and counseling costs, funeral bills, and lost wages. Some states provide compensation for property that is lost due to crime, for example, property that is stolen or destroyed. Victim compensation is usually paid only when other financial resources, such as private insurance and offender restitution, do not cover losses. Maximum compensation ranges from $10,000 to $25,000 depending on individual state policies.

Eligibility for federally funded victim compensation is defined in the U.S. Code, Title 42, Section 10602. For example, a crime victim compensation program is eligible for federal funds only if it is operated by the state and offers compensation to victims and survivors of criminal violence, including drunk driving and domestic violence, and it encourages victims to cooperate with law enforcement authorities. The code also indicates that victims are eligible for compensation for (a) medical expenses only if the medical expenses are attributable to a physical injury associated with a compensable crime, including expenses for mental health counseling and care; (b) lost wages that result from physical injury from a compensable crime; and (c) funeral expenses resulting from a compensable crime death.

Federal funds distributed to victim assistance programs are used to support grassroots-level victim service providers such as rape crisis centers, domestic violence shelters, child abuse programs, and victim service units in law enforcement agencies, prosecutors' offices, hospitals, and social service agencies. Representatives from more than 4,000 local agencies in 50 states and several territories annually deliver victim services to nearly 4 million crime victims. The services assist victims of domestic violence, sexual assault, child abuse, elder abuse, drunk driving, attempted homicide, terrorism, and mass violence. Victims of domestic violence and sexual assault account for half of those receiving services. Local child abuse prevention programs and grants are also supported by VOCA funds. Some of the services provided include counseling, criminal justice advocacy, crisis intervention, emergency shelter, and emergency transportation.

Since the mid-1970s, numerous crime victim advocacy organizations have been established in the United States. For example, the National Organization for Victim Assistance (NOVA), the oldest national group of its kind, founded in 1975, is recognized as a leading advocate in the worldwide victims' movement. Its mission is to promote rights and services for victims of crime and crisis throughout the world.

Another noteworthy victim advocacy organization is the National Center for Victims of Crime (NCVC). Established in 1985, it works with more than 10,000 grassroots organizations and criminal justice agencies providing services to millions of crime victims. It is recognized as the nation's leading resource for crime victims. The organization collaborates with local, state, and federal partners, such as the OVC, to provide direct services and resources to crime victims; advocate for the passage of laws and public policies that create resources, rights, and protection for victims; and deliver training and technical assistance to victim service providers. Some of their resource centers include the Training Institute; Stalking Resource Center; Parallel Justice; Teen Victim Project; Resilience Project; and Dating-Violence Resource Center.

Since 1982 the OVC has worked with faith-based community organizations in the development of programs to provide services to victims of crime in the United States. In an effort to engage faith-based community organizations in victim services, the OVC provides funding, training, and technical assistance to such organizations, whose mission is to cofacilitate the healing process of victims in collaboration with government victim assistance agencies.

Elizabeth H. McConnell

See also Victim and Witness Intimidation; Victimization, Asian American; Victimization, Latina/o; Victimization, White

Websites

Justice Solutions: <http://www.justicesolutions.org>

National Association of Crime Victim Compensation

Boards: <http://www.nacvcb.org>

National Association of Victims of Crime Assistance

Administrators: <http://www.navaa.org>

National Center for Victims of Crime: <http://www.ncvc.org>

National Crime Victimization Survey: <http://www.ncvs.org>

National Organization for Victim Assistance: http://

www.trynova.org

VIDEO GAMES

Media messages have the ability to influence the attitudes, self-concepts, and values of a young person. One area that has remained relatively absent from the public discourse on diversity in the media is that of race and video games. There are a number of important issues that make this conversation important to parents, children, and the society at large. First, it is important to understand the influence that video games have on the gamer; further, given this influence on the gamer, it is important to understand the nature of the messages being sent by video games; and finally, it is important to understand how race is represented in these messages.

The media is a source of information, education, and entertainment for many Americans and is often cited as a pulse of American values. Mediated information extends far beyond television, encompassing newer, more controversial forms of interactive media. Among these interactive media are video games, which are threatening to replace television as the primary entertainment outlet for children. In fact, previous research found that adolescent boys average about 11 hours of video game play per week. Video games have evolved into a multibillion-dollar-a-year industry, with nearly three quarters of American households having a game console of some kind. This industry has drawn criticism from many parents, advocacy groups, public health officials, and scholars for the perceived harms of video games, such as higher rates of violence and aggression among males, and even higher obesity rates among gamers. Yet despite the fact that past research has indicated that violent perpetrators with shared demographics relative to media users may be especially potent behavioral models, very little research has examined the portrayal of video game aggression with regard to race.

The scant research into the issue of race and video games suggests that the majority of characters and heroes in popular video games are White, while Latina/o and Native American characters were practically nonexistent. White characters were also found to be the most common characters to carry and use weapons as part of aggressive behavior. The most common representation of African American males (80%) is as athletes, who were also portrayed as the most verbally and physically aggressive; however, the African American male characters were the least likely to exhibit harm when victimized, suggesting a nonrealistic response to violence and aggression. Unlike their male counterparts, 90% of African American female characters were victims of violence and aggression. Latina/o characters, exclusively found in sport games, were noted to express the most pain and suffering when victimized. Finally, Asian/Pacific Islanders were commonly found in fighting games as fighters or wrestlers as well as the antagonists in many situations. In many instances, these characters were not player controlled, but were characters within the game set to antagonize the player.

Recent research has also found that violent perpetrators in video games are almost always Caucasian or Asian. Interestingly, research further reports that Caucasian and Asian perpetrators are nearly always presented in a manner suggesting that their aggression is socially acceptable, while perpetrators of other ethnicities are just in their aggression in less than 2% of the violent interactions documented. This research also reports that White and Asian perpetrators are more likely to commit acts of extremely graphic violence than perpetrators of other races.

The importance of these findings comes in the impact that these messages have on the game player. The messages suggest that video games are reinforcing stereotypes present in society today. Race in many instances is not in the foreground of the player's mind, yet, after hours of play the gamer eventually interprets the message that certain characters are superior to others, and no player will choose a character that is easily injured or does not carry appropriate weapons, thus devaluing particular characters.

While research on race and video games has remained relatively absent from the public discourse, the research findings suggest that there is a need for far more research in the area. If video games are reinforcing the racial stereotypes present in society today, these messages are silently re-creating the stratification in the social structure in a manner where the gamer has the power and agency to select out the unattractive characteristics. The impact that this repeated action might have on society is important and significant given the large number of young people playing video games. Further, research has not yet addressed the impact these messages may have on the self-concept of the gamer, especially if the gamer is an individual who identifies with the race or ethnicity of the weaker character. This can be of particular importance if the gamer is playing in a group, leading to comments and critiques of particular characters, though the racial or ethnic implications would remain below the surface, again reinforcing the social stratification of race in American society.

Christine Eith and Kenneth A. Lachlan

See also Media, Print; Media Portrayals of African Americans; Media Portrayals of Asian Americans; Media Portrayals of Latina/o/s; Media Portrayals of Native Americans; Media Portrayals of White Americans; Racism

Further Readings

- Bandura, A. (1986). Social foundations of thought and action: A social cognitive theory. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall.
- Gegax, T. T., Adler, J., & Pedersen, D. (1998, April 6). The boys behind the ambush. Newsweek, pp. 21–26.
- Jose, P. E., & Brewer, W. F. (1984). Development of story liking: Character identification, suspense, and outcome resolution. Developmental Psychology, 20, 911–924.
- Kaiser Family Foundation. (1999). Kids and media @ the new millennium: A comprehensive national analysis of children's media use. Menlo Park, CA: Author.
- Lachlan, K. A., Smith, S. L., & Tamborini, R. (2005). Models for aggressive behavior: The attributes of violent characters in American video games. Communication Studies, 56(3), 313–329.
- Sherry, J., Lucas, K., Greenberg, B. S., & Lachlan, K. A. (2006). Video game uses and gratifications as predictors of use and game preference. In P. Vorderer & J. Bryant (Eds.), Playing video games: Motives, responses, and consequences. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates.

VIGILANTISM

The term vigilantism emanates from the Spanish word for watchman: vigilante, which has its origins in the Latin word for observant, vigil. The most basic definition of a vigilante, or vigilantism, is a person or group of persons who take the law into their own hands. Vigilantism is related to race and crime because Whites and minorities often are its victims. In the 19th and 20th centuries, vigilantes were involved in the lynching of African Americans. More recently, illegal Latina/o immigrants are targeted by vigilantes along the U.S.–Mexico border. This entry briefly describes explanations, types, and examples of vigilantism, including cyber-vigilantism.

Individuals or groups of people may take the law into their own hands for any of a variety of reasons. Some underlying themes are that the vigilante or vigilantes intend to effect some punishment to avenge a wrong committed by someone, to deter future misconduct by a certain person or persons, to carry out personal agendas to protest or enforce existing law, or to incapacitate a person or persons who are perceived by the vigilante or vigilantes to be dangerous to society. Indeed, the motivations underlying vigilantism vary according to the individual or individuals seeking perceived justice. Whatever the reason, vigilantes believe that resorting to force is necessary, and justifiable, because of the perceived refusal or incapacity of government to provide desired protection.

Vigilantism can occur in two main forms: individual vigilantism or group vigilantism. The individual vigilante is the one most often portrayed in media such as movies and television, or in video games and comic books. The individual vigilante can also be one who seeks to involve others in his or her plans. Group vigilantism, much more common than individual vigilantism, can take either of two main forms: crime control or social control. Group vigilantism for crime control seeks to punish people believed to be guilty of criminal wrongdoing. Group vigilantism for social control seeks to repair some perceived injustice in the social order that affects or threatens to affect the community's values.

Whatever the form, vigilantism in the United States has been a popular response to the perceived failure of the government in protecting or enforcing public safety. Vigilance committees were formed in the South during the 1830s to protect the institution of slavery against dissolution by abolitionists. A vigilance committee was a voluntary group of men (sometimes but rarely including some women) who joined together to defend against an actual or perceived harm to their families or community. These vigilance committees generally targeted the lower socioeconomic class and certain other groups that were actual or perceived threats to the vigilance committee's way of life. Common forms of punishment meted out by the vigilance committees included banishing, harassing, or shunning individuals or groups of individuals, and sometimes involved killing certain perceived or actual offenders.

When the first groups of settlers in this country moved west, there were no criminal justice systems to protect them or to maintain order. Absent such a protective system of law and order, victims of offenses and their friends commonly formed vigilante groups to track down and punish offenders. It is reported that some of our country's bloodiest vigilante movements occurred in the state of Montana from 1863 to 1865, and again in 1884. There are accounts of 65 people being killed by vigilante justice in Montana during these time periods, including a sheriff who was accused of being involved with highway robbers and horse thieves.

A problem with this type of perceived justice is that there is a difference between when a person intentionally commits a crime and when a person accidentally commits a crime. Thus, when vigilantism occurs, the justice being sought is sometimes too swift and certain and does not allow for a full inquest into the particular matter. In other words, the vigilantes are more concerned with punishing or halting certain behavior rather than respecting the due process rights of the accused. However, this raises the problem that one punishment does not always work for or fit various offenses. This is why there is an established governmental system of laws and courts to carefully sort through the evidence and apply the appropriate punishment.

While the laws of the United States generally shun vigilantism, one must remember that vigilantism is not expressly prohibited by law. It is the action taken by the vigilante that rises to the level of a defined crime according to established governmental laws. There is a difference between vigilantism and rebellion or revolution against the government. Revolutionary or rebellion violence is undertaken to overthrow the established governmental order, while vigilante violence is used to restore perceived order and maintain the status quo. Indeed, one must remember that vigilantism, even in its crudest form, equates to the form of a social control device in that it represents a response to deviance, whether such deviance is actual or merely perceived.

When people think of classical vigilantism they usually envision a lynching, with a body hanging suspended by a rope. However, such lynchings became rare as far back as the 1940s. Today's newest vigilantism comes in the form of cyber-vigilantism. Digital vigilantes use computers and the Internet to seek justice against individuals who steal identities electronically, who seek to pursue minor children for sexual purposes through chat rooms on the Internet, or who seek to operate fraudulent businesses and scams through the Internet. Just as with classical forms of vigilantism, however, the perceived offender may not be the actual offender, and the justice administered may be done in such a swift fashion as to trample the due process rights of the accused.

George Coroian

See also Goetz, Bernard; Lynching; Slave Patrols; Slave Rebellions

Further Readings

- Brown, R. M. (1975). Strain of violence: Historical studies of American violence and vigilantism. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Culberson, W. C. (1990). Vigilantism: Political history of private power in the United States. New York: Greenwood.

VIOLENCE AGAINST GIRLS

The world watched as Natalee Holloway's story unfolded. The blonde, all-American teenager was abducted while on a 2005 graduation trip in Aruba; she was never found. Recently, another American girl, Phylcia Moore, was found dead on a school trip, this time in Ghana. Moore was Black, and the world hardly noticed. These two cases illustrate what media refer to as "missing White woman syndrome." This entry addresses the intersection of gender and race as it relates to violence against girls. Several subtopics are covered, including maltreatment of girls, dating/sexual and gang violence, global sex trafficking, and race-based crime policies and practices.

Maltreatment

A 2003 report from the Children's Bureau, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, provides a snapshot of child maltreatment and victimization. Though most abuse goes unreported, conservative figures indicate that nearly 1 million children are victims of abuse or neglect annually. More than half of child victims are 7 years or younger, female, and White. However, girls of minority groups have higher rates of victimization.

According to the Children's Bureau report, with the exception of sexual abuse, rates for male and female victimization are similar: 11.2 and 12.8 per 1,000 children, respectively. The rate of sexual abuse for girls is 1.7 per 1,000, 4 times that for boys (0.4). In most cases, the child victim knew the sex offender. For girls, 29% of the perpetrators were relatives and 60% were acquaintances; estimates place 38% of girls as sexually abused before the age of 18.

Teen Years

Adolescence is a trying time for all teens, but girls face a unique type of violence throughout puberty, including dating or sexual violence and gang involvement. As in adult domestic violence, most teen dating violence involves the abuse of girls by male partners. According to the Harvard Children's Initiative of 2001, 36% of teenage girls and 37% of boys reported some form of physical aggression from dating partners. However, girls reported that boyfriends initiated violence 70% of the time, compared to boys reporting girlfriends as instigators 27% of the time.

Dating violence transcends race/ethnicity, class, and sexual orientation. Gay, lesbian, and bisexual teens are just as likely to experience relationship violence as their straight counterparts. Though all racial/ethnic groups experience dating violence, studies generally demonstrate higher rates among Blacks and lower rates among Asians and Hispanics. Dating consequences, including intimate partner violence, are associated with increased risk of substance abuse, unhealthy weight control behaviors, risky sexual behaviors, early pregnancy, and suicide. Often, young girls are conditioned to think that a relationship with a boy, especially a popular boy, is the way to status. Sadly, this is frequently true in high schools across the nation, leading to violence being defined as normative and becoming a precursor to the acceptance of violence later in life.

Much like dating violence, sexual violence is a fact of life for many teenage girls. Based on national victimization surveys, experts estimate that 1 in 6 U.S. women are victims to attempted or completed rape sometime in their lifetime. Strikingly, half of all reported date rapes occur among teenagers, and 58% of rape victims report being raped between the ages of 12 and 24. Again, sexual violence occurs across all races, but minority groups are overrepresented. Feminist criminologists such as Meda Chesney-Lind argue that as race and culture collide, stereotypes of “sexual savages” contribute to the acceptance of sexual violence against Black and American Indian women. For example, 19% of female rape victims are Black, while nearly 35% are American Indian or Alaskan Native—numbers that far exceed their population representation.

Approximately 8% of youth identified by police as gang members are female. Though limited in number, gangs pose specific risks for girls. Gang initiations can be particularly brutal—girls may be beaten, sexually assaulted, and/or gang raped. Additionally, girls in gangs face increased risks of unsafe sex, sexual abuse, teen pregnancy, drug abuse, and suicide. Research such as that by Jody Miller shows that female gang members tend to come from families with a high incidence of sexual abuse, domestic violence, and various other family dysfunctions, and minority status is a prominent predictor of female gang membership. Growing up in a context marginalized by race, class, and gender, minority girls are often pushed into gang culture because they feel hopeless about their future. Studies show that about 35% of youth gang members are Black and approximately 48% are Hispanic; one study demonstrates that 87% of Hispanic girls and 30% of Black girls said they were treated as boys’ possessions. Girls in gangs often suppress anger, resentment, humiliation, and shame, sometimes becoming violent themselves. Most recently, research suggests that girls are resisting such repression and are forming gangs of their own.

Sex Trafficking

Violence against girls is universal, often taking different forms in various contexts. One extreme example is teen sex trafficking. Sex trafficking is not just a problem that faces poor countries—it is one way that violence against girls is sexualized universally. Trafficking happens in two general ways. Foreigners travel to other countries for sex with very young girls, while up to 4 million women and children are trafficked across the world annually for sex trade. Over the past decade, approximately 750,000 women and children have been trafficked into the United States alone, one half for sexual exploitation with the remaining for domestic servitude and other forced labor.

Although women of all nationalities can fall victim to sex trafficking, the largest source is Southeast Asia, followed by the Soviet Union, and Central and Eastern Europe. Increasingly, sex trafficking is recognized as a modern form of slavery that reinforces gender-, race-, and socioeconomic-based hierarchies. Trafficking in women is a rapidly growing business; just behind guns and drugs, it is the most profitable industry used by organized crime.

Crime Policy

One would hope that violence against any girl would be promptly, adequately, and even-handedly addressed. However, ample evidence demonstrates that both media and the criminal justice system treat girls differently based on race. As the opening paragraph of this entry states, violence against a young Black girl does not receive the same media attention as a young White female victim.

In the same way, crime reform policies are spurred by young White victims. Several examples are noteworthy. The Violent Crime Control Act of 1994 was enacted following the murder of 12-year-old Polly Klaas by an ex-convict. The Violent Crime Control Act, more commonly known as the Three Strikes Law, was passed in the wake of Klaas’s highly publicized murder. Megan’s Law—named after Megan Kanka, a White girl who was raped and murdered by a multiple sex offender in her neighborhood—requires sex offenders to register upon release from prison. Finally, the AMBER Alert bill, a national alert system for abducted children, was named after a young White girl, Amber Hagerman, who was raped and murdered after being abducted in Texas. It was the abduction and recovery of Elizabeth Smart, another White girl, that drove the legislation forward.

Regrettably, stories of young minority girls go untold and unheard. For example, little is known of the striking stories of two 7-year-old Black girls who faced similar tragedies. Alexis Patterson was abducted in Milwaukee just months before Elizabeth Smart was kidnapped; Alexis was never found. Sherrice Iverson, raped and murdered while the perpetrator's friend stood by, received slightly more attention, though the case never mustered the same momentum as Klaas's or Hagerman's. Sherrice's Law, which imposed criminal penalties on anyone who witnessed child sexual abuse without intervening, was signed into law in 2007.

The examples of Polly Klaas, Amber Hagerman, Megan Kanka, and Elizabeth Smart are not meant to discount the violence that these young girls suffered. It is, however, useful to examine how images and practices of race, crime, and violence against girls are embedded in American culture, providing stark examples of how deeply race runs throughout the criminal justice system.

L. Susan Williams

See also At-Risk Youth; Child Abuse; Female Gangs; Victimization, Youth

Further Readings

- Aldama, A. J. (Ed.). (2003). Violence and the body: Race, gender, and the state. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Chisholm, J. (2006). Cyberspace violence against girls and adolescent females. Annals of the New York Academy of Sciences, 1087, 74–89.
- Denmark, F., Krauss, H. H., Halpern, E., & Sechzer, J. A. (Eds.). (2006). Violence and exploitation against women and girls. Boston: Blackwell.
- Miller, J. (2000). One of the guys: Girls, gangs, and gender. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Silverman, J., Raj, A., Mucci, L., & Hathaway, J. (2001). Dating violence against adolescent girls and associated substance use, unhealthy weight control, sexual risk behavior, pregnancy, and suicidality. Journal of the American Medical Association, 286, 572–579.

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Children's Bureau Report. (2003). Maltreatment of children. Retrieved from <http://www.acf.hhs.gov/programs/cb/pubs/cm03>

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Violence against women, also known as gender-based violence, is a global problem that crosses all levels of society. However, poor women are more likely to be victims of abuse than are women in higher socioeconomic groups. Gender-based violence includes abuse by intimate partners, coerced sex during childhood and adulthood, forced prostitution, female infanticide, and female genital mutilation. The United Nations defines it as physical, sexual, or emotional abuse or suffering of women. Violence against women is a serious public health problem and a violation of human rights. The entry defines violence, provides current U.S. victimization rates, explains the role of power and control, explores theories, identifies interventions, and outlines future research.

According to the Center for Health and Gender Equity (1999) 1 out of every 3 women worldwide has been the victim of abuse or coerced sex. Abuse ranges across countries. Approximately 69% of women in Nicaragua, 58% in Turkey, 56% in Papua New Guinea, 47% in Bangladesh, 45% in Ethiopia, 40% in India, 27% in Canada, and 22% in the United States have reported physical abuse by an intimate partner (spouse or boyfriend). Although these numbers address physical abuse only, it is estimated that about one third of cases also involve sexual abuse. The two most common types of abuse are physical abuse and coerced sex.

In the United States, the focus is on domestic violence, which gained wider public attention in the 1970s during the emergence of the women's movement, when it was often referred to as "wife beating." The 1980s and 1990s witnessed a continued focus on domestic violence. Finally, Congress passed the Violence Against Women Act of 1994 (Public Law 103-322), which was reauthorized in 2000. The act increases prosecutions of crimes against women and provides funding for the National Domestic Violence Hotline, which provides victims access to shelters across the country. In the United States, violence against women takes the form of stalking, domestic violence, dating violence, and sexual assault. Violence against women affects women of all walks of life, regardless of education, income, social status, race, religion, sexual orientation, or age. Violence against women is about control, domination, and power; typically, it is a means of men's exerting power over women. This is not to say that men or same-sex partners have not been victims of domestic violence, but historical data show that women are more likely to have been victimized by men, and by someone they know.

Domestic violence, also known as domestic abuse, partner abuse, or intimate partner violence, occurs when intimate partners (husbands and boyfriends) attempt to dominate a wife or girlfriend. The perpetrator exerts consistent control over the victim. The key is that a pattern of abuse is established over time. The abuse can be physical, sexual, emotional, and/or economical. Physical abuse includes being hit, kicked, bitten, choked, burned, or kidnapped. Often the women are pregnant. Sexual abuse includes rape and/or sodomy. Emotional abuse includes insults, criticisms, humiliation, intimidation, manipulation, isolation, and threats. Economic abuse involves the control of finances and employment. The goal of the perpetrator, regardless of the mode of abuse, is to maintain and exert power over the victim.

Abuse varies by mode and severity. Some victims suffer mild bruises, or moderate injuries like broken arms, legs, or ribs, while others suffer permanent injuries or disabilities. Approximately 20% to 35% of all emergency room visits by women are the result of domestic violence. In the most severe cases of physical abuse, the injuries result in death or homicide. Sexual abuse or coercion can result in unwanted pregnancies, or in HIV/AIDS or other sexually transmitted infections (in addition to psychological trauma). Victims of emotional abuse have no visible infections or injuries, but the impact can be severe. They usually suffer from low self-esteem, depression, and or post-traumatic stress disorder. In severe cases of depression the women may become suicidal. In general, victims tend to develop negative health behaviors as a coping mechanism, including alcohol and or drug abuse, smoking, risky sexual behaviors, and eating disorders. As for perpetrators, individuals who use drugs or alcohol, were abused as children, witnessed abuse as children, or are unemployed are more likely to abuse a significant other.

Victimization Rates and Cycle

According to the National Violence Against Women Survey, 4.8 million women are physically assaulted or raped annually by intimate partners. Moreover, approximately 50% of children whose mothers are abused are also abused (by either the partner or the mother). This is doubly significant because abused children or children who witness abuse are more likely to become abusers, thus perpetuating the cycle of abuse. On average, three women are killed by their partners each day in the United States. African American women are more likely to be killed by intimate partners than any other race. The data illustrate that domestic violence is a serious problem.

Because domestic violence involves a pattern of control and domination, practitioners in the field often describe it or refer to it as a cycle of abuse. The cycle of abuse consists of three stages or phases: (1) honeymoon, (2) tension building, and (3) acting out. In the first stage, honeymoon, the abuser behaves in a pleasant way, is apologetic, and may deliver on his promises. In some circumstances, the victim starts to believe that the abuse has ended. In stage two, the tension builds up. The abuser may become angry and the victim may feel the need to pacify the perpetrator to avoid further abuse. In stage 3, the perpetrator abuses the victim physically, psychologically, and/or sexually. This is followed by another honeymoon stage, initiating another cycle of abuse. Most women leave and go back to their abusive partners several times before they leave the relationship forever. This process is not to be taken lightly, given that the chances of being murdered by a partner increase exponentially after leaving. To avoid additional abuse or death, victims need to have a solid plan in place to protect themselves and their children.

Theories

The cycle of violence describes the process but does not explain the cause. There are several theories as to why domestic violence occurs in society, some of which focus on individual factors (psychological traits), external factors, and a combination of psychological and external factors (ecological framework). Psychological theories point to the characteristics of the perpetrator. Specifically, abusers have low self-esteem, have poor impulse control, and may suffer from psychopathology such as borderline personality. In contrast, social theories point to external factors. Specifically, social learning theory postulates that abuse is a learned behavior. For example, individuals who witness abuse as a child become abusers because there are minimal to no consequences for the abuser. This theory explains why abuse is passed down from one generation to the next. Resource theory suggests that the more dependent the partner is on the spouse for economic survival the more likely she will stay in an abusive relationship. Without resources, it is difficult for the woman to survive and feed her children, thus she continues living with the abuser. Other experts view violence as a reaction to social stress. Unable to pay the bills and hold down a job, the man may control his partner or spouse through abuse as a way of attempting to prove his manhood. This may explain why women in lower socioeconomic classes are more likely to experience domestic violence.

The ecological framework combines external and psychological factors to provide a holistic view. The framework contains four concentric circles: (1) individual, (2) family relationship, (3) community, and (4) society. The individual level assesses the background that the abuser and victim bring to the relationship. Specifically, this may include the witnessing of abuse, a rejecting or absent father, and use of alcohol. The family relationship level looks at the immediate abuse within the context of the family unit. At the community level one can see such issues as social isolation from peers, and the influence of the workplace and social networks and their values regarding the role of men and women. Some communities support or condone abuse of women. The fourth level, society, contains the cultural beliefs and norms and economic, social, and religious aspects and influences. By addressing both individual and external factors, the model explains why some societies do not experience violence. Furthermore, it points out that no single factor causes domestic violence, but a number of factors contribute to violence against women.

Prevention and Intervention

In general, women do not report abuse because they do not think the police can help them or that friends and family will believe them. As a result, domestic violence often goes unreported. In order to encourage reporting and prevent violence against women, women need to be educated on the warning signs of abuse. At a minimum, this education should start in high school if not before. In addition, it is critical that young women observe healthy male-female relationships. This is critical to preventing abuse because role modeling socializes women to expect a certain level or standard of behavior from men. Role modeling and educating young women can prevent domestic violence.

In terms of intervention, today there are more than 5,000 domestic violence shelters across the country. The Domestic Violence Hotline provides services 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, 365 days a year. The hotline receives approximately 16,500 calls a month. Women need to know that their reports of abuse will be taken seriously and there is help available. Domestic violence centers, churches, shelters, law enforcement, the courts, social service agencies, and physicians or hospitals respond to domestic violence. To decrease domestic violence it is critical that these organizations collaborate.

Research Directions

Future research on domestic violence in the United States should focus on the attitudes of African American and other minority women. African American and other minority women may report violence to police but are not likely to report it to domestic violence centers or shelters. In other words, they are less likely to use victim assistance. The beliefs and roles of minority women are critical to understanding how to better assist them and meet their needs.

Lorenda A. Naylor

See also Center for the Study and Prevention of Violence; Crack Epidemic; Domestic Violence, African Americans; Domestic Violence, Latino/a/s; Domestic Violence, Native Americans; Masculinity and Crime

Further Readings

- Center for Health and Gender Equality. (1999). Population reports: Ending violence against women. Retrieved from <http://www.infoforhealth.org/pr/111/violence.pdf>
- Walker, L. (1979). The battered woman. New York: Harper & Row.

Websites

- Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, Injury Center: <http://www.cdc.gov/ncipc/dvp/IPV/default.htm>
- Family Violence Prevention Fund: <http://www.endabuse.org>
- National Coalition Against Domestic Violence: <http://www.ncadv.org>
- National Sexual Violence Resource Center: <http://www.nsvrc.org>
- National Violence Against Women Prevention Research Center: <http://www.vawprevention.org/index.html>

VIOLENT CRIME

Violent crime is crime committed by an individual with the threat or use of force upon a victim. The category of violent crime in America includes the following offenses in order of descending severity: murder or nonnegligent manslaughter, forcible rape, robbery, and aggravated assault. Foreign countries categorize violent crime differently. For instance, Australia and Canada include abduction and non-assaultive sexual offenses in their lists of violent crimes, while New Zealand adds group assemblies to its definition of violent crime. Data on violent crime rates in America can be found in the Uniform Crime Reports (UCR), which are published by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the U.S. Department of Justice and include statistics from law enforcement agencies nationwide. In the instance that one criminal commits several offenses, only the most serious offense is recorded.

According to the 2005 UCR data, 1,390,695 violent crimes were committed, with a violent crime rate of 469.2 per 100,000 inhabitants. The violent crime rate peaked in 1991 at 758.2 violent offenses per 100,000 and has since experienced a general decrease. By region, the South has the highest recorded percentage of violent crime (41.9%) when compared with the Northeast (15.5%), Midwest (19.6%), and West (23.0%).

The most severe crime in the category of violent crime is murder, which the UCR defines as the willful killing of a human being by another. Murder statistics are reported through police investigations and do not depend on court convictions. The UCR excludes deaths caused by accident, suicide, negligence, and justifiable homicides from murder classification. In 2005 an estimated 16,692 persons were murdered in America. According to UCR data, males are the most likely victims of murder. In 2005, 78.7% of known murder victims were male. There is no significant difference among murder victims by race; of known murder victims in 2005, 48.7% were White and 48.6 were Black. Regarding murder offenders, 89.9% were males and 52.6% were Black. Where the weapon was specified, firearms were used in 72.6% of murders.

Forcible rape statistics include all those in which force is used to commit rape but exclude non-aggressive offenses such as statutory rape and sexual attacks on males. The UCR recorded 93,934 forcible rapes in 2005 with a rate of 62.5 offenses per 100,000 females. In 2005, 417,122 robberies and 862,947 aggravated assaults were reported to law enforcement.

The violent crime victimization rate for Whites and Blacks has declined in recent years, according to the U.S. Department of Justice statistics. In 2005 Blacks and Whites were assaulted at about the same rate, and similarly, there was no significant difference between rape victims in terms of race. Blacks experienced more violent crime victimization (27) per 1,000 than Whites (20) and people of other races (14), though at 49% apiece, Blacks and Whites were equally likely to be the victim of a murder in 2005. The racial group with the highest rate of violent crime victimization was Native Americans, who were twice as likely as Blacks to be violently victimized.

Research into the causes of violent criminal behavior has given rise to more questions than answers. Regarding a biological origin, no study has yet found a link between genetics and violent behavior. In a groundbreaking study, Clifford Shaw and Henry McKay found a relationship between environment and crime. They noticed that crime rates tended to be elevated in cities with higher rates of poverty, social change, and disorganization when compared to more affluent cities. Paul Stretesky and Michael Lynch found that airborne lead levels directly affect violent crime rates, which supports earlier research on the effects of lead on delinquency.

Violent Crime and the Media

Violent crime has become a popular commodity for the news and entertainment media, which give the illusion that violent crime is more prevalent than the statistics actually indicate. Studies on the effects of exposure to violent media have not yielded an irrefutable behavioral link between high exposures to violent media and committing acts of violence, though some researchers claim that watching violence increases aggression. There is strong debate regarding the possibility of a specific cause of criminal behavior, but it is more likely that violent behavior is the result of an interaction between a multitude of hereditary, environmental, social, economic, and cultural factors.

Stories about violent crime have become a major focus of news media as well as a popular source of material for the entertainment industry. The news media in particular tend to broadcast and sensationalize a heavy amount of stories involving crime. According to Vincent Sacco, crime is a durable news commodity that is readily available and always appealing to the public. In addition to having dramatic value, especially in the case of a violent crime, crime stories are easy to write and edit and typically lack complexity. The media's focus on crime news has negative effects on audience consumption of crime stories. The fear of victimization unreasonably increases and becomes disproportionate to the amount of crime that is actually committed, so that a moral panic may be the result.

In the contemporary film industry, there is an inclination to glorify violent criminals. Movie studios in the early days of movies were forced to adhere to the Hays Code, which forbade the glamorization of crime through the 1950s, but more recently, violent criminals as portrayed in The Godfather (1972), Scarface (1983), and Goodfellas (1990) have achieved iconic status. In Natural Born Killers (1995), director Oliver Stone satirizes the public obsession with serial killers and violent crime.

Doug Evans

See also Fear of Crime; Moral Panics; Social Disorganization Theory; Violent Juvenile Offenders

Further Readings

- Sacco, V. F. (1995). Media constructions of crime. Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 539, 141–154.
- Shaw, C. R., & McKay, H. D. (1942). Juvenile delinquency and urban areas. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Stretesky, P. B., & Lynch, M. J. (2004). The relationship between lead and crime. Journal of Health and Social Behavior, 45, 214–229.
- U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics. (2008). Victim characteristics. Retrieved from http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/cvict_v.htm

Websites

- FBI Uniform Crime Reports: <http://www.fbi.gov/ucr/ucr.htm>

VIOLENT FEMALES

In January 2006, a 14-year-old White girl burned down her family's home in Paris, Texas, and received probation. Three months later, a 15-year-old Black girl, Shaquanda Cotton, was sentenced to 7 years for pushing a school hall monitor. These incidents provide a basis for examining the relationship between race and female violence, as well as the myth of the "new violent woman."

Women and Crime

Since 1980, the number of women incarcerated increased at double the rate of men, and much hype surrounds the idea of a "new violent woman." However, women still represent a small percentage of arrests. As of 2007, 107,500 women were incarcerated, comprising 7% of prison populations. Still, the number of women arrested represented a 7.4% increase for the decade, while male arrests decreased 7.6%.

The percentage change for women, while important, is modest considering the relatively small base, and increases are not due to violent offenses. The most marked increase in arrests for females has been for drug offenses. In 1996, drug arrests for women totaled 142,678, climbing to 202,137 in 2005, a 41.7% increase.

Despite escalating drug-related arrests, some politicians maintain that women are increasingly violent. However, according to the Uniform Crime Reports, women make up about 18% of persons arrested for violent crime, with decreasing arrests for murder, rape, and robbery. Female homicide arrests in 2007 decreased 11.8% from 1996. In fact, the female arrest rate for murder declined to its lowest point since 1976: 1.3 per 100,000, compared to 11.5 for men. Other violent crime arrests for women decreased in the past decade, except aggravated assault, which increased 5.4%. In 2007, female offenders made up 20.7% of all arrests for aggravated assault; of those, three fourths victimized other women, and 40% were under the influence of drugs or alcohol.

Experts such as Jocelyn Pollock assert that women's motivations for violence include self-defense, fear, retribution, protection for children, and control. Susan Miller attributes the rise in female assault arrests to domestic violence mandated arrests; others such as Barbara Koons-Witt and Pamela Schram look to the intersection of race, class, and gender to explain discrepancies between White and Black offending rates among women.

Women, Race, and Crime

Research suggests that race is a critical factor in female criminality, demonstrating that Black female offenders are more likely than White counterparts to commit violent crimes and are incarcerated at a rate 6 times higher than White women. In 2007, Black women were imprisoned at a rate of 615 per 100,000, White women at 109 per 100,000, and Hispanic women at 196 per 100,000. The Black-to-White ratio of incarcerated females is 5.6, and the Hispanic-to-White ratio is 1.8. Overall, violent crime rates tend to be higher in lower-income communities.

Numbers fail to tell the full story; one must consider history, culture, and the context in which women live, including prior abuse. Most research on violent females has focused on Black women who murder. In addition to being more likely than Whites to commit homicide, Black women are more likely to be victims of homicide compared to White men and women. In general, female homicides are intersexual and intrafamilial, but Black females are even more likely than White females to offend against friends, acquaintances, and other females. Researchers contend that the disadvantaged position of Black women in the economy and culture elevates their risk of involvement in homicides.

Interestingly, research indicates that arrest rates for non-White women are very similar to those for White men, underscoring the importance of recognizing race, class, and gender as intersectional. Black females are distinctively positioned as victims of race, class, and patriarchal relations. In 15 states, Black women are incarcerated at rates up to 35 times greater than those of White women. In eight states, Hispanic women are incarcerated at 7 times the rate of White women.

Minority women face more obstacles than just race; they are multiply marginalized. They are disadvantaged not only by gender and race but also by their economic position, violent victimization and degradation, and social support systems. Minority women are less likely to have access to coping and survival resources and are even less likely to be emotionally and socially attuned to them. For many minorities, violence is normalized and is often viewed as a survival strategy. Even though women who commit acts of violence are atypical, they are often punished more harshly. To explain this seeming contradiction as well as the generally low rates of violence in women offenders, some scholars point to cultural or socialization theory, where boys are rewarded for aggression and girls punished. Feminist criminologists agree that both socialization and patriarchy are explanations for harsher treatment of girls and women who threaten the status quo.

Conclusion

Women of color who commit violent crime often do so as a response to subordination in a patriarchal and racialized society—as victims who sometimes turn to violence as a survival mechanism. Resources available to White middle-class women are rarely accessible or even known to poor, minority women. What must remain in the forefront of consideration is that “bad” girls and women must be viewed within the social construct of triple minority status.

L. Susan Williams

See also Black Feminist Criminology; Drug Sentencing; Female Gangs; Racialization of Crime; Violent Juvenile Offenders

Further Readings

- Koons-Witt, B. A., & Schram, P. J. (2006). Does race matter? Examining the relationship between co-offending and victim characteristics for violent incidents involving female offenders. Feminist Criminology, 1, 125–146.
- Pollock, J. M., & Davis, S. M. (2005). The continuing myth of the violent female offender. Criminal Justice Review, 30, 5–29.
- U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics. (2008). Prison statistics. Retrieved from <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/prisons.htm>

Websites

FBI Uniform Crime Reports: <http://www.fbi.gov/ucr/ucr.htm>

VIOLENT JUVENILE OFFENDERS

A violent crime is defined as a crime in which the offender uses or threatens to use violent force upon the victim. These include willful homicide, forcible rape, robbery, and aggravated assault. In many communities across the United States, the number of juvenile offenders has become an important issue, posing problems for juvenile authorities and the public. Youth in Black and Latina/o communities are often depicted as the predominant perpetrators of violent crimes. This entry examines and compares the rates of violent offenses and reviews structural explanations of juvenile violence among communities.

Rates of Violent Juvenile Offending

Although juvenile violence occurs at many different ages, the average age of a juvenile's first court appearance is 14. Behavior problems are known to develop around age 7, and crimes are committed around age 12. Of the various types of violent crimes, murder is the most severe form of all violent crimes. Firearms are used in the majority of the murders committed by juveniles. When the access to obtaining firearms became easier, the rates of murder began to rise. Firearms are more likely to be involved in murders by male offenders than by female offenders and in murders by Black offenders than by White offenders.

The nature of murders committed by juvenile offenders varies by race, gender, and age. A greater percentage of the victims of male juvenile murder offenders are adults than are the victims of female offenders. According to National Center for Juvenile Justice statistics from 2002, adults are typically the victims of 70% of White juvenile murder offenders and 77% of Black juvenile murder offenders. Although 76% of the victims of Black juvenile murder offenders are Black, Black murder offenders are much more likely than White offenders to have victims of another race. Juvenile murder offenders' age and gender are unrelated to the race of the victim. Female juvenile murder offenders are more likely than male juvenile murder offenders to have female victims and to have victims who were family members. Female juvenile murder offenders are more likely than male offenders to commit their crimes alone.

The 1990s saw a dramatic rise in the arrests of juvenile females; increases in girls' arrests dramatically outstripped those of boys for most of the past decade. In 2000, girls accounted for 27% of juvenile arrests, up from 22% at the beginning of the past decade. These shifts bring into sharp focus the need to better understand the dynamics involved in female delinquency and the need to tailor societal responses to the circumstances of girls growing up in the new millennium.

Risk Factors

Research defines risk factors as individual characteristics or factors found in family, school, community, and among peers that place youth at risk for becoming serious violent offenders. It is rare that a single factor can influence a child enough to commit a violent crime; usually more than one factor is needed for violent behavior to occur.

Psychological Factors

There are several psychological aspects that can later lead a child into developing violent behavior patterns. The relationship between hyperactivity and violent behavior later in life has been identified consistently in the research. Having low self-control is a leading cause for becoming hyperactive. Concentration problems are also closely associated with being hyperactive as well. Concentration problems are considered good predictors for violent behaviors as well as poor academic achievement in school. This can lead to frustration and anger within the child, which can cause the child to lash out aggressively. Aggressive behavior that is demonstrated in the earlier years of childhood can strongly predict violent behaviors in the future of that child. Research has shown that early aggressive behavior can be associated with more chronic and serious violence.

The beliefs and attitudes of juveniles can also lead to violent crimes. The control theory argues that beliefs or norms serve as internal controls against violent behaviors. A major attitude change that most children experience throughout their life is their view on substance abuse. Most young children are not involved in drugs and crime, and find those behaviors unacceptable during their elementary years. However, upon entering middle school, these illicit behaviors are more acceptable when others they know begin to engage in these problem behaviors. Attitudes of dishonesty, anti-social beliefs, and even hostility toward police have been known to be strongly associated with juvenile violence.

Family Factors

The family plays a vital role in a child's life, especially as a predictor of violent behavior for children. A parent's criminal history is known to be an influence on juveniles' behavior patterns. Children with criminal fathers are more likely to commit violent crimes later in their lives as compared to children with noncriminal fathers. Research has not discovered if there is a biological link to violence, but it can be assumed that violent behavior is more likely learned within a criminal family. Abuse and neglect are also leading reasons as to why children develop problem behaviors. However, research has found that there can be different outcomes for the variations of abuse. Adults who were physically abused as children were found to be slightly more likely to commit a violent crime as an adult, while a child who was neglected was much more likely to commit a crime of violence as an adult.

Exposure to high levels of conflict or abuse within the home can be harmful to a child's psychological well-being and increase the risk of becoming a juvenile delinquent. The age of the child when witnessing familial conflict can be crucial to his or her behavioral outcomes. Generally, exposure to conflict at the age of 10 may not be as critical, but at the ages of 14 to 16, witnessing high levels of conflict in the home increases the likelihood of violent behaviors. Having delinquent siblings can also influence a child's behavior. Some research has found that delinquent siblings have the most influence during adolescence and typically have a greater influence over girls than boys.

Educational Factors

Poor academic achievement is a factor that is consistently reported with violent delinquent youth. Research has commonly expressed that poor academic performance will increase the likelihood of violent behaviors. Students on low academic tracks in secondary school have been found to be twice as likely to be convicted of a violent crime. In the elementary grades, 20% of the boys with teacher reports of low grades ended up being convicted of a violent crime as an adult, nearly twice the rate found among other students. Problem behaviors can be a result of the child coping with poor education performance by focusing his or her attention on behaviors and off academic progression.

Peer-Related Factors

The behaviors and attitudes of a juvenile's peers can have a major impact on a child's behavioral outcomes. During middle school, children strive to be socially accepted by their peers. The attitudes and beliefs of that particular peer group will more than likely influence an adolescent looking to be accepted by that group. Although delinquent peers influence the violence of youth, peers who disapprove of delinquent behavior have been known to inhibit future violence. A significant issue that is present within peer relations is gang membership. Gang membership has become a growing problem within many areas of the country. This can stem from having problems within the household, often causing juveniles to search for a more stable family type environment elsewhere, typically within gangs. Most gangs promote violent behaviors along with protection and security. The prevalence of gangs has decreased within nonurban communities, but still remains a heavy problem in cities.

Community Factors

Certain circumstances within communities increase the risk of violent behavior among youth. Elijah Anderson, in his ethnographic study Code of the Street, traces the ways in which living in a disorganized community can lead to an individual adopting problematic behavioral traits. Growing up in poverty-stricken homes is a significant predictor of violent behaviors from juveniles. Lacking environmental resources is a major cause for crime within urban areas. Living in low-income families increases the likelihood of teen violence and criminal conviction. Poor communities also frequently have low academic success, which can lead to juvenile violence as well. The development of several forms of interventions have resulted from the juvenile delinquent's issues with violence within communities.

Family-Focused Intervention

Family-based interventions are important because most of the problems experienced by juveniles usually begin within the family environment. Family preservation programs are a widely used approach that offers a range of services, such as parent management and life training skills, usually used to help families deal with unemployment and family conflict. Parent management training helps improve a child's behavior by critiquing parenting techniques. This type of program teaches parents better communication skills, responding in positive ways to good behavior and appropriately punishing bad behavior. Family therapy can also help decrease the chances of violent behavior. Parents are commonly taught to use behavioral techniques such as setting clear and specific rules and consequences, use of social reinforcement, and employing a token economy. This technique is primarily used with adolescents and has helped to improve family communication and lower recidivism among delinquent youth.

Child- and School-Focused Intervention

Aggressive children often lack certain cognitive and social skills. This can lead juveniles to fail to read social cues or to believe that violent behavior is acceptable. Social competence training teaches children to increase the use of positive social behaviors, such as conversation skills, academic performance, and behavioral control strategies. Social-cognitive processes, such as problem solving and self-control, are also taught. This approach was used in a violence prevention curriculum for troubled African American youth; those who participated showed improved behavior and fewer school suspensions and expulsions over time.

It is equally important to address the school environment when implementing intervention programs. Programs that focus on school performance and attendance can decrease the chances of adolescents behaving violently. Classroom contingency training is another intervention that attempts to improve student behavior. Parenting techniques are incorporated with the teachers' teaching style to establish a clear set of rules and expectations for the students.

Future Research

A considerable amount of research has been conducted on juvenile delinquents and the factors that influence their behavior. Reducing the problem of violent juvenile offenders, and producing desired optimal outcomes for troubled juveniles, requires an emphasis on research to identify effective interventions and programs for youth residing in high risk environments. Ongoing critique and analysis of the efficacy of such interventions is also needed to help decrease the rates of violent juvenile behaviors.

Zina McGee and Tiffany Latham

See also Female Gangs; Female Juvenile Delinquents; Violent Females

Further Readings

- Anderson, E. (1999). Code of the street: Decency, violence, and the moral life of the inner city. New York: Norton.
- Farrington, D. P. (1989). Early predictors of adolescent aggression and adult violence. Violence and Victims, 4, 79–100.
- McCord, W., & Ensminger, M. (1995, November). Pathways from aggressive childhood to criminality. Paper presented at the American Society of Criminology, Boston, MA.
- Snyder, H. N., & Sickmund, M. (2006). Juvenile offenders and victims: 2006 report. Pittsburgh, PA: National Center for Juvenile Justice.

WALKER, ZACHARIAH (?-1911)

On August 13, 1911, a mob of allegedly more than 1,000 people lynched a Black man, Zachariah Walker, just outside of the borough of Coatesville, in Chester County, Pennsylvania. Walker had been accused of killing a security guard, who was also a former local police officer, at a Coatesville steel mill 2 days earlier. Although more than a dozen people were indicted for Walker's murder, none was convicted at trial. The Walker lynching and resulting acquittals of his killers led to widespread criticism of the local community and outrage across the country, resulting in the involvement of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) in antilynching efforts in the decades ahead.

The Coatesville Events

On the evening of Saturday, August 12, 1911, Walker got drunk and fired two shots from a revolver over the heads of two Polish workers from Worth Brothers Steel Works. The noise attracted the attention of a security guard at the steel mill (called a "company policeman") named Edgar Rice. Rice left the grounds of the Worth Brothers mill and located Walker a short distance away. In the course of arresting Walker, Rice was shot and killed. A posse gathered, and after a lengthy search Walker was taken into custody after allegedly trying to kill himself the following afternoon. Rice, a former Coatesville police officer, was liked and well known in the community. News accounts of the incident failed to mention that Rice—as a security guard—had no legal authority to arrest Walker, as Walker committed no crime in Rice's presence, and that the weapons discharge incident and subsequent arrest of Walker occurred off of Worth Brothers property and outside of Coatesville. Several news accounts mention that Walker claimed that he shot Rice in self-defense, but all made light of the fact that Rice had beaten Walker with his nightstick.

Walker was taken to the Coatesville Hospital, where he was left under the guard of one rookie police officer. News of Walker's capture spread quickly through Coatesville and the surrounding areas, and soon a large mob was parading through Coatesville on the way to the hospital to lynch him, all the while yelling racial epithets directed at Walker. By late evening, the mob had grown to more than 1,000 men, women, and children. They surrounded the hospital, and eventually several went inside and seized Walker, who was cuffed to the bed frame. They grabbed Walker and dragged him—and the bed frame—out of the building, where they were met by a crowd roaring with approval. Walker was then taken a short distance down the road outside the borough where, just out of the jurisdiction of the Coatesville Police, he was heaped upon a fire. What happened next by all accounts was horrific as Walker was burned alive in front of the mob of more than 1,000 onlookers.

News Coverage in The New York Times

On August 15, 1911, an article about the Walker lynching was published in The New York Times, which at that time was considered the national newspaper of record. The article was remarkable for several reasons. First, it was prominently placed—squarely on the front page, with the headline in the center above the fold. Second, the length of the article was noteworthy—it contained almost 4,200 words. Third, the Times published an editorial critical of the barbaric nature of the crime on the very day the first article on the incident appeared in its paper. The editorial stated that nowhere in the country had a man ever been lynched with less justification or with such horror. Fourth, it is striking that on the same day, the newspaper also published several companion stories outlining unrelated incidents of racially motivated crimes across the country, including stories about two lynchings in Oklahoma and the rise of lynchings in the North. Racially motivated crimes of violence were a national concern in the summer of 1911.

Reaction Beyond Coatesville

Outside of Coatesville and across the country, there was a great deal of discussion and commentary about the Walker lynching. What distressed people beyond the horror of the lynching itself was a fear that what happened in Coatesville meant that lynching as a practice might be ready to establish itself outside the backwoods South. The lynching of Walker was a major event in the life of the then-fledgling NAACP. In response to a wave of racial violence spreading to northern states, NAACP leaders reacted swiftly to the Walker lynching in Coatesville. The association's response in the Walker case foreshadowed the efforts of the NAACP during much of the 20th century in terms of investigations, assisting with prosecutions, holding community-based protest meetings, and the relentless pursuit of civil rights remedies in the law. John Jay Chapman, a New York essayist, was so infuriated with the Walker lynching and the subsequent failure to convict anyone for killing Walker that he rented a church hall in Coatesville on the first anniversary of Walker's death. There he gave a speech, billed as a prayer meeting, even though only two people showed up to hear him speak. The speech was later published in Harper's Weekly.

The national press coverage of the Walker case in The New York Times was important. The local newspaper, the Coatesville Record, was not truthful in reporting the events surrounding the lynching of Walker. In the months following the lynching, numerous individuals were charged with Walker's murder, but Chester County juries acquitted each of them. Outside of Chester County, there was widespread condemnation of each of the acquittals. Continuing coverage by the national press served to monitor the local press and educate the country on the existence of racially motivated crimes of violence and jury nullification.

Postscript on the Walker Lynching

Almost a century after Walker's death, in December 2006, the Pennsylvania Historical and Museum Commission placed a historical marker at the site of the 1911 lynching. The marker is located on Route 82 South, approximately one-quarter mile south of the Coatesville borough line in Chester County, Pennsylvania.

Philip Matthew Stinson, Sr.

See also Lynching; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); Racial Conflict

Further Readings

- Chapman, J. J. (1912). Address at a prayer meeting in Coatesville. Harper's Weekly, 125.
- Downey, D. B., & Hyser, R. M. (1991). No crooked death: Coatesville, Pennsylvania, and the lynching of Zachariah Walker. Chicago: University of Illinois Press.
- Goldman, E. F. (1964). Summer day. American Heritage, 15(4), 50–53, 83–89.

WARD, BENJAMIN (1926–2002)

Benjamin Ward's route to becoming New York City's first African American police commissioner on January 1, 1984, is more than the traditional story of starting as a police officer and rising to the top job. Along the way he overcame the hostility of White colleagues and achieved a number of firsts in New York City and New York State criminal justice agencies.

Early Years

Ward was born August 10, 1926, in Brooklyn, New York's African American Weeksville section. He was the 10th of 11 children of a 78-year-old White laborer father and a younger Black mother who worked as a domestic to support the family after his father died; only he and four siblings survived illnesses to reach adulthood. To help with expenses, Ward worked shining shoes and as a delivery boy. Although Ward had avoided the police, crossing the street when he saw an officer even though he had done nothing wrong, his views began to change when, at age 15, he won a citywide essay contest that awarded him the job of police commissioner for a day.

He graduated in 1944 at the top of his class from Brooklyn's Automotive Trades High School and drove a truck until he was drafted into the U.S. Army, where he served as a military police officer and a criminal investigator in Europe for 2 years. Returning to Brooklyn, he held a series of jobs and, seeking to better himself, took numerous civil service tests, including for the New York City Police Department (NYCPD). Because his career choices were limited by his vocational degree, he began working in the Department of Sanitation. During this period, he completed courses to attend the City University of New York (CUNY), which was then tuition free for New York City residents.

Criminal Justice Career

While in college, on June 1, 1951, Ward entered the NYCPD. He had attained the third highest score of the 78,000 test takers that year. A misunderstanding while he was working at the Brooklyn Navy Yard almost ended his career before it began. Ward had refused to fraudulently punch someone else's time card, resulting in an argument that ended with his foreman calling the military police to remove him from the navy yard. A day later, arrests for extortion at the yard received local press coverage. Ward kept copies because he had argued with some of those arrested. Unknown to him, he had been charged with inciting to riot and assault on government property; a report in his personnel folder surfaced while he was attending the Police Academy, and his applicant investigation was being completed. Once this was resolved, he became the first African American patrolman assigned to Brooklyn's 80th Precinct, where he faced hostility from White residents and White colleagues. At work, he was denied a locker and forced to commute to work via public transportation in full uniform for his first three years as a patrolman.

Despite this poor reception, he continued his studies and his mastery of the civil service process. Ward passed the tests for sergeant and lieutenant quickly. Upon promotion to sergeant, he was placed in charge of a precinct's youth aid squad; he also worked in patrol and as a detective. He graduated at the top of his class from CUNY's Brooklyn College in 1960 and, although he had wanted to become a sociologist, attended Brooklyn Law School when he won a scholarship. With additional scholarships, he graduated with top honors in 1965. This led to an assignment in the NYCPD's legal bureau, where lawyer/police officers and civilian attorneys developed policies based on court decisions and served as the department's in-house legal firm.

Ward, a tall, broad-shouldered, outspoken man whose comments often drew him into the city's racial politics, was next tapped to serve as special counsel to Police Commissioner Howard R. Leary, a non-New Yorker selected by Mayor John V. Lindsay primarily because he was amenable to a civilian review board. The all-civilian board was defeated in 1966 in a referendum supported by the police unions and was replaced by the Civilian Complaint Review Board, made up of police rather than outside employees. Ward's first high-level appointment was as executive director of the Civilian Complaint Review Board in early 1969. Two years later he was named a deputy police commissioner assigned as chief hearing officer for all disciplinary matters and then deputy commissioner for community affairs. Ward was the first African American to serve in that position. Racial issues continually followed Ward; he was criticized by many, particularly police officers, in 1971 for apologizing to Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan after a police officer was shot and killed in a Harlem mosque that officers had entered with drawn guns.

In 1973 Ward left the NYCPD when Lindsay appointed him traffic commissioner. Under his tenure, uniformed traffic controllers, mostly women known as “meter maids,” began directing traffic, freeing police for patrol duties. A year later, Lindsay selected Ward to lead the Pretrial Services Agency of the Vera Institute of Justice, an agency created to perform bail risk evaluations designed to allow those arrested for nonviolent, misdemeanor offenses to be released for a later court date as a way to help reduce backlogs in New York’s criminal courts.

In 1975, Ward left New York City for the only time in his 40-year career, when Governor Hugh L. Carey named him the state correctional services commissioner. He was the first African American to lead the 12,000-person agency, whose employees were responsible for about 20,000 inmates and an equal number of parolees. In 1977, over Ward’s objections and testimony to the State Senate’s Crime and Corrections Committee, legislators severely curtailed temporary release programs after three highly publicized cases of inmates fleeing overshadowed the more than 3,000 successful participants in the program.

Mayor Edward I. Koch lured Ward back to the city, appointing him to the first of three posts he held in Koch’s administration. In 1978, Ward was named chief of the New York City Housing Authority Police, then a 1,700-person separate agency from the NYCPD that was the fifth largest police department in the state. The agency provided all policing for the 600,000 residents of the Housing Authority’s more than 250 developments. A year later, Ward became commissioner of the New York City Correction Department, the largest municipal detention system in the nation. During Ward’s tenure, escapes decreased and the number of employees increased. As he had as traffic commissioner, Ward instituted administrative reforms, including a new inmate classification system.

Police Commissioner

Ward remained as correction commissioner until he was sworn in as the city’s 34th, and first African American, police commissioner. Rarely afraid of controversy, Ward invited two critics of the NYCPD to his public swearing-in: Representative John Conyers, Jr. (D–MI), who had chaired congressional subcommittee hearings into allegations of police brutality against Blacks and Hispanics, and the Reverend Herbert Daughtry, a Brooklyn clergyman often critical of the police. During Ward’s tenure, the NYCPD, the nation’s largest police department, faced increasing crime rates attributed to the crack cocaine epidemic, which hampered his efforts to introduce community policing styles into the department. His tenure was also a time of racial unrest in the city, highlighted by the subway shooting of four Black youth by Bernhard Goetz; the shooting of Eleanor Bumpurs, an elderly Black woman in the Bronx by White police trying to enter her apartment; and the death of a Black man, Michael Griffith, chased by a White gang onto a highway. Ward, who said that Bumpurs reminded him of his grandmother, also said he doubted he would have shot her had he been one of the responding officers.

The percentages of Black, Hispanic, and female officers increased during Ward’s 5-year tenure as police commissioner. In 1987 Ward urged the city to add a residency requirement to its hiring policy, which would likely have further increased the percentages of minority officers. The suggestion was not enacted, but Mayor David Dinkins, the city’s first African American mayor, urged the city’s personnel department to add 5 points to the written scores of city residents who passed the test, a policy that continues despite challenges from applicants who reside outside the five boroughs that make up New York City.

Ward retired on October 22, 1989, citing his chronic asthma, large pension awaiting him, and the desire to avoid any potential scandals. He remained active in New York’s criminal justice community, teaching at Brooklyn Law School and John Jay College of Criminal Justice (CUNY) in New York City and serving on numerous boards. Ward was found unconscious at his home on June 7, 2002, and died 3 days later at the age of 75. He was survived by his wife of 46 years, Olivia (Tucker) Ward, a retired public school principal; two sons and three daughters; and nine grandchildren and two great-grandchildren.

Although a life-long New Yorker whose accomplishments were all within the city or state, Ward received national attention as the first African American in at least two positions he held, especially his role in breaking the racial barrier to serve as the city's police commissioner. Possibly because so much of Ward's early success was due to civil service, he often reminded young people to check federal and city job listings and bulletin boards for test schedules and other job opportunities and stressed the value of education in overcoming poverty and discrimination.

Dorothy Moses Schulz

See also Police Accountability; National Organization of Black Law Enforcement Executives; Vera Institute of Justice

Further Readings

- Abel, R. L. (2006). The Black Shields. Bloomington, IN: AuthorHouse.
- Buder, L. (1984, January 6). Ward sworn in, and top police critic is guest. The New York Times, p. A1.
- Dulaney, W. M. (1996). Black police in America. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Gorta, W. J. (2002, June 11). Ex-top cop Ward dies; NYPD's 1st Black commish was 75. The New York Post, p. 30.
- Martin, D. (2002, June 11). Benjamin Ward, New York City's first Black police commissioner, dies at 75. The New York Times, p. 27.
- New York Correction History Society. (n.d.). In memoriam—Benjamin Ward. Retrieved from <http://www.correctionhistory.org/html/BenWard/wardtoc.html>
- Travis, J. (2007, November 18). Watch and release. The New York Times, p. 11.
- Ward, B. (2002, July 8). New York's first Black police commissioner dies. Jet, p. 15.

increasing penalties, enforcement, and incarceration. It began with the efforts of conservative Republicans to capture the historically democratic South during the late 1960s. Nixon led this attempt to attract White voters by having the federal government take the lead in the War on Drugs and crime control, and the implementation of the policies was carried further by the Reagan administration. Like earlier drug legislation and the enforcement of drug laws, the War on Drugs was characterized by racial and ethnic bias. The astronomical increase in funding initiated during the Reagan administration brought a dramatic increase in incarceration rates, particularly of Blacks and Hispanics; erosion of civil liberties; discriminatory practices in policing; racial differences in sentencing and incarceration; and the emergence of a large drug/prison/treatment complex. The War on Drugs has led to international efforts to control drug production and trafficking and to increasingly intrusive practices. Based largely upon myth and legend, it has had a devastating impact on the U.S. economy and poor, largely minority communities. An alternative to the failed war is the "harm reduction" approach.

History

In the 1960s the civil rights movement, backed largely by Democratic leaders, resulted in the passing of historic civil rights legislation, eliminating long-standing segregation laws, mainly in the South. However, the rising expectations of Blacks in northern states were largely unmet. Riots took place in many northern cities. An unpopular war in Vietnam, college student protests, and recognition of great poverty in the United States led to more protests and conflict. The Republicans capitalized on this, and Nixon won the 1968 presidential election. While a Democratic president had declared a war on poverty in the mid-1960s, President Nixon declared war on crime and called for law and order. "Law and order" became a catch phrase for stopping protests and cracking down on Black crime and violence. In 1971, Nixon identified drug abuse as "America's public enemy number one." The Law Enforcement Assistance Administration grew dramatically under Nixon, with federal drug enforcement resources climbing from 65 million in 1969 to 719

WAR ON DRUGS

The War on Drugs refers to the effort since the 1970s to combat illegal drug use by greatly million in 1975. The various community and social programs of the Democratic Party's "Great Society" in the 1960s gave way to a punitive crime control strategy with drugs as a key element. Although crime control is primarily a state and local matter, the federal government had an established place on drug control through federal laws. As the War on Drugs greatly escalated, President Reagan characterized the poor, particularly Blacks, as lazy, referred to "welfare Cadillac moms," and identified illegal drugs as public enemy number one. This led to massive funding for both federal and state law enforcement, plus a massive increase in arrests, correctional institutions, and imprisonment based upon new, more severe penalties.

Race

Historically, race and ethnicity have played a central role in drug legislation, with concerns raised about the Chinese and opium, Blacks and cocaine, and Hispanics and marijuana. Racism and stereotypes were crucial in these antidrug campaigns. This was also true during Prohibition, when images of "drunken negroes" in the South and "drunken immigrants" (particularly Irish Catholics) in the North fueled the effort to ban alcohol. However, the War on Drugs has led to even more dramatic racial and ethnic disparities. Over half of federal and state inmates today are minorities. About 30% of all young African American men in the United States are under correctional supervision on any given day. Although the majority of crack users are White, nearly 80% of sentenced crack offenders are Black, and approximately 10% are Hispanic. The Black incarceration rate nearly tripled between 1980 and 2000 and is now over 8 times that for non-Hispanic Whites. Native Americans are also disproportionately represented by a figure approximately 10 times that for non-Hispanic Whites.

These racial disparities are a product of differential law enforcement, discrimination in the courts, and statutory differences. Racial profiling was promoted by the federal government in the 1980s to go after illegal drug users. Under "Operation Pipeline," officers were trained to look for minorities, particularly Blacks, in pursuing illegal drugs. Also, the great bulk of drug enforcement efforts have been directed at poor, inner-city, largely Black and Hispanic communities. Given the open air nature of the drug exchange, it is easy to make arrests. Police corruption and abuse of power have often been found to be related to drug law enforcement, as it was with enforcement of Prohibition era laws on alcohol. Study after study shows that African Americans are more likely to be arrested for illegal drugs, prosecuted, convicted, and sentenced to incarceration, compared to Whites. This research suggests that the cumulative effort of discrimination at every stage leads to the highly racialized U.S. correctional population.

Crack cocaine has carried a penalty much harsher than that of powder cocaine. Crack is more commonly used by low-income people, because powder is more expensive. Selling 1,000 grams of powder cocaine receives a 10-year mandatory sentence, whereas selling only 10 grams of crack receives the same sentence. Most powder cocaine users are White, middle and upper class and are rarely arrested, prosecuted, convicted, and sentenced. Although most crack users are poor Whites, over 80% of convicted crack inmates are Black. This is due to differential laws, law enforcement, and stereotypes. During the 1980s, media publicity created the myth of an "epidemic" of crack babies resulting from drug use by Black addict mothers. This led to mandatory reporting laws and further criminalizing of Black women. Subsequent research showed that this was a classic "moral panic" based upon mythology and stereotypes; the harmful effects of prenatal use of nicotine and alcohol are much more prevalent. Nonetheless, the myth led to policy that further damaged poor Black women.

Another reason for the racial disparity in drug enforcement is that illegal drugs have become an important part of many low-income, inner-city neighborhood economies. The illegal drug trade has created financial opportunities for marginalized minorities, as did the illegal alcohol trade during Prohibition. Part of the money goes back into the community through expenditures for rent, food, entertainment, goods, and services. In such communities, drug busts and arrests are easy to make; there is always another person ready to take the place of an arrested drug dealer.

Over the past several decades the United States has spent billions of dollars each year to fight illegal drugs nationally and internationally. Thousands of jobs in law enforcement have been created and others in the courts and in corrections. Mandatory drug treatment has led to scores of treatment programs. Drug forfeiture laws have created incentives to pursue the War on Drugs in order to obtain money for further enforcement. While illegal drug use has decreased among the general population since the 1970s, there is little indication that this is due to enforcement policy.

As many observers have noted, a focus on supply and policies emphasizing punitive methods has a limited effect on drug availability and use. This apparent lack of a deterrent effect may be one reason why most other Western democratic countries have not pursued the extreme punitive approach toward illegal drugs that the United States has pursued.

Consequences of the War on Drugs

Critics of the War on Drugs argue that it has resulted in significant violations of human and civil rights, particularly among the poor and minorities. In an effort to get tough on crime, politicians have enacted laws that change the balance between the right of the citizens and the procedural laws that guide law enforcement. These new laws, or new interpretations of old laws, while aimed at the criminal, may also reduce the freedom of law-abiding citizens.

For example, drug dealing is a cash business; drug dealers do not use checks and credit cards because the paper trail would lead to their arrest and conviction. Money used in drug deals can be confiscated by law enforcement officers without their having to prove it was actually used to buy drugs. Asset forfeiture laws allow law enforcement agencies to keep money and property without the accused being charged of any crime. Many people innocent of any crime and without intention of engaging in behaviors harmful to society are stopped, and large amounts of their cash may be taken by law enforcement authorities based simply on some stereotypic profiles of what drug dealers look like. These profiles have an impact on youth and minorities, and the burden of proof then falls on them to prove the cash is not to be used for drugs. This is extremely expensive and difficult to accomplish, and the result is that law enforcement agencies end up with a great deal of cash and property.

Another criticism of the War on Drugs is that the use of intrusive searches has diminished the rights to privacy and freedom. The Supreme Court has expanded the ability of government agents to intrude on the privacy of citizens through search and seizure and increased surveillance, in rulings that validate aerial surveillance; searches in airports without probable cause of people who fit a drug-courier profile; warrantless searches of automobiles and inside compartments; surveillance of suspects with electronic devices placed inside cars, briefcases, or trunks; the acquisition of warrants to search private homes based on anonymous tips; police inspections of bank records without customer consent; and the reading and inspecting of contents of a person's trash without warrant or probable cause.

Limitations on the freedom of speech have been established in order to facilitate detection of drug offenses. For example, advertising in a pro-marijuana magazine such as High Crimes has led to legitimate businesses being targeted by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration for investigation. There is a long history of the government attempting to intimidate those who question the War on Drugs. In the 1960s, renowned criminologist Alfred Lindesmith was visited by agents from the Federal Bureau of Narcotics because of his critical research and writing on drug policy. A well-known advocate of legalizing marijuana was arrested in Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada, in 2007 and extradited to the United States by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. This was due, in part, to his outspoken criticism of U.S. drug policy. Because criminals use banks to turn their profits into legitimate assets, banks are under constant pressure to cooperate with law enforcement officers attempting to detect money laundering. The government can freeze bank accounts of persons whom they suspect of illegal activities. Critics argue that this policy reverses the principle that one is innocent until proven guilty, as accounts can be frozen on the basis of suspicion alone, and assets may be tied up for months or years during the legal process.

The exclusionary rule prohibits the use of evidence in criminal cases if that evidence was not obtained legally. The Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 eased this restriction, allowing flawed evidence to be used if it was gathered by law enforcement officials in good faith. Case law in recent decades has established exceptions to the exclusionary rule that allow illegally obtained evidence to be presented.

The War on Drugs has captured the imagination of the public to such an extent that procedures that would have been dismissed as outrageous a generation ago are accepted today to ensure public safety. Drug testing of prisoners, employees, athletes, and students has become widespread in American society. From a legal point of view, drug testing is problematic because of the Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable search and seizure. Drug testing in some contexts, such as testing airline pilots for intoxication, is generally accepted; however, other types of testing are more controversial. For example, student athletes may be subject to drug testing based simply on their status as a team member. Opponents argue that such policies negate the presumption of innocence and require students to prove their conformity to school drug policies. While most people agree that schools should be free of drugs, the zero tolerance programs imposed by some schools and universities require resources to be directed away from academic and student service activities toward enforcement efforts whether or not there is a demonstrated drug problem.

Drug testing in the workplace is a technique used by employers to enforce company drug policies. In some cases, undercover private security agents pose as workers attempting to buy drugs in order to detect drug use at the workplace. Again, there is a legitimate need for corporations to ensure a safe and healthy work environment for all employees, but the lengths to which some companies have gone to detect unlawful behavior, even when they have no reason to suspect it, are questionable in a society that values individual liberties.

Other concerns raised about the War on Drugs include the possibility that it increases distrust and cynicism regarding law and the criminal justice system and that it fosters militarization of civil society: the military rhetoric, the actual use of the military, and the quasi-military nature of civilian programs used to deal with domestic crime—for example, use of the military to attempt to seal the borders to stem the influx of drugs and illegal immigrants, the use of the National Guard and Army Reserve units to detect and destroy the domestic marijuana crop, and the use of the military model of discipline in boot-camp prisons.

Harm Reduction: An Alternative Approach

Harm reduction has been proposed an alternative basis for drug policy. The harm reduction approach begins from the premise that consciousness-altering substances have been used in all known societies in which they are available and that some drug use is inevitable. Furthermore, this approach suggests that not all drug use is personally or socially harmful. Harm may be a result of the social context in which drugs are used or the policies that prohibit their use. The harm reduction perspective suggests that one of the most effective ways of minimizing both the primary and secondary harm associated with drugs is by addressing the social conditions that underpin the most serious drug problems. A substantial body of research demonstrates that the distribution, seriousness, and consequences of drug abuse are shaped by social conditions. It is clear, for example, that those who have a stake in “conventional life” are much better able to establish control over their drug use and are more likely to benefit from treatment programs. There is also evidence that the impact of drug use by pregnant women on fetal health is mediated by diet, prenatal care, and other factors associated with social class. In other words, ensuring that all pregnant women have access to health care and sound nutrition during their pregnancies would help minimize the potentially adverse effects of drugs on their babies, both legal and illegal.

Dramatically reducing the reliance upon the criminal justice system in dealing with drug abuse might also reduce both primary and secondary drug problems. Making drug treatment more available and getting drug users out of the criminal justice system not only would reduce the size and expense of the system but would also encourage people with drug problems to seek help rather than go underground. The United States spends billions of dollars each year on the War on Drugs, but little of it is spent on treatment.

Although nearly half of Americans believe that possessing marijuana should not be criminal and one third favor legalization, there are powerful interests opposed to the harm reduction approach. Nonetheless, there are increasing efforts to end the War on Drugs from a wide range of groups, including Law Enforcement Against Prohibition, Families Against Mandatory Minimum, and National African American Drug Policy Coalition. Many states are reevaluating drug penalties and policies such as mandatory minimums, increased incarcerations, and felony disenfranchisement.

There are also small signs of a growing willingness to focus more explicitly on race, such as the formation of a coalition of African American professional organizations dedicated to drug-law reform and public-health alternatives. More significant has been the recent and growing movement to encourage legislatures to produce racial-impact assessments. Such assessments are crucial to discover the de facto impact of the United States' so-called color-blind laws and policies.

Charles E. Reasons

See also Cocaine Laws; Crack Babies; Crack Mothers; Decriminalization of Drugs; Drug Dealers; Drug Sentencing; Drug Trafficking; Drug Use; Mandatory Minimums; Media Portrayals of African Americans; Media Portrayals of Asian Americans; Media Portrayals of Latina/o/s; Media Portrayals of Native Americans; Media Portrayals of White Americans; Moral Panics; Profiling, Racial: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives; Racialization of Crime; Three Strikes Laws; Zero Tolerance Policies

Further Readings

- Beckett, K., & Sasson, T. (2003). The politics of injustice: Crime and punishment in America (2nd ed.). Thousand Oaks, CA: Pine Forge Press.
- Human Rights Watch. (2008). Targeting Blacks: Drug law enforcement and race in the United States. New York: Author.
- Kappeler, V., & Potter, G. W. (2005). The mythology of crime and criminal justice (4th ed.). Long Grove, IL: Waveland Press.
- King, R. S. (2008). Disparity by geography: The War on Drugs in America's cities. Washington, DC: The Sentencing Project.

- Lusone, C. (1991). Pipe dream blues: Racism and the War on Drugs. Boston: South End Press.
- Miller, J. (1996). Search and destroy: African American males in the criminal justice system. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Musto, D. (1999). The American disease: Origins of narcotic control. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Provine, D. M. (2007). Unequal under the law: Race in the War on Drugs. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Torry, M. (1995). Malign neglect: Race, crime and punishment in America. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Valentine, D. (2004). The strength of the wolf: The secret history of America's War on Drugs. London: Verso.
- Walker, S., Spohn, C., & DeLone, M. (2007). The color of justice: Race, ethnicity, and crime in America (4th ed.). Belmont, CA: Wadsworth.

WAR ON TERROR

The War on Terror continues to garner attention from the media and numerous individuals and organizations that have a vested interest in its outcome. This was brought to the forefront with former President George W. Bush declaring the War on Terror, against al-Qaeda, an international alliance of Islamic militant terrorist organizations founded in 1988 and led by Osama bin Laden. Al-Qaeda has attacked civilian and military targets in various countries and is said to be responsible for the September 11, 2001, attacks against the United States, which prompted the president to make his declaration. Al-Qaeda has also been designated as a foreign terrorist organization by the U.S. State Department. Following President Bush's declaration, the U.S. government launched a military and intelligence campaign against al-Qaeda. The War on Terror is not an exclusive label attached to the military response, but rather it is the action addressing the prevention, detection, and response to acts of terrorism. This entry examines issues brought forth because of the War on Terror and ways in which race has played an integral part in the outcomes of the War on Terror.

Legislation

On September 18, 2001, the U.S. Congress passed the Authorization for Use of Military Force Against Terrorists ([AUMF] Public Law 107-40). The AUMF allowed the president to use whatever means necessary to bring those responsible for terrorism to justice. This allowed the U.S. Armed Forces to actively engage in the War on Terror, which in this case meant declaring war on Iraq. However, the engagement against Iraq was not the only result of the president's declaration against the War on Terror; it has also led to additional legislation and court cases, and it has created much controversy.

One of the most notable pieces of legislation that emerged in the War on Terror is the Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act (USA PATRIOT Act) of 2001, which was passed by Congress just 45 days after the September 11 attacks, with very limited debate. Critics of the Patriot Act point to significant flaws in this legislation, including threats to fundamental freedoms resulting from government access to medical records, tax records, and library user records about the books bought or borrowed, without probable cause. They have also criticized the authorization of governmental searches of homes without notification that the search was carried out. However, two provisions of the Patriot Act that allowed such searches and intelligence gathering were subsequently struck down on the grounds that they violated the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures.

The PATRIOT Act was reauthorized by two subsequent bills. The first, the Patriot and Terrorism Prevention Reauthorization Act of 2005, reauthorized provisions of the PATRIOT Act and the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004. It created new provisions dealing with the death penalty for terrorists, the enhancement of security at seaports, new measures to combat the financing of terrorism, new powers for the Secret Service, and a number of other miscellaneous provisions. The second reauthorization act amended the first and was passed in 2006. Patriot Act II expanded the reach of government agencies.

The President's National Strategy for Homeland Security of 2007 was created to "guide, organize, and unify our Nation's homeland security efforts." Among several goals, a key point of the National Strategy for Homeland Security of 2007 was to prevent persons or groups from recruiting and radicalizing individuals in the United States.

The U.S. military and local, state, and federal law enforcement have relied heavily on technology in the War on Terror. The increased use of technology in counterterrorism efforts has reduced the role of human intelligence, an important component of intelligence gathering.

Criticisms of the War on Terror

Critics argue that the War on Terror has led to abuses of power by the U.S. government, especially the executive branch, and that it has legitimated decisions, such as declaring war on Iraq, that would otherwise lack support. Others maintain that because there is no way to eliminate terrorism completely, the War on Terror is merely rhetoric that has led to what some believe is a permanent state of war and that has encouraged legislation reducing and ultimately infringing on the rights of Americans.

Because of its focus on al-Qaeda and its connection to Islam, the War on Terror has led to adverse actions not only against Muslims but also against persons of Middle Eastern descent and those traditionally assumed to be Muslim. A significant criticism of the War on Terror deals with the USA PATRIOT Act and the increasing powers given to law enforcement through a broad and sweeping justification for what appears to be racial profiling. Historically used in association with African Americans, racial profiling has become increasingly and more recently associated with those of Middle Eastern descent. After 9/11, law enforcement publicly arrested hundreds of Muslims as a way to show the world it was taking a stand against terrorism. In fact, many of the arrestees were not even given the reason for their arrest.

The War on Terror may remain a contentious issue for generations to come, and the balance between preserving civil liberties and protecting the United States may continue to be blurred.

Kathryn Scarborough and Kelli Frakes

See also Profiling, Ethnic: Use by Police and Homeland Security; Profiling, Racial: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives

Further Readings

- Ahmed, N. M. (2005). The war on truth: 9/11, disinformation, and the anatomy of terrorism. Northampton, MA: Olive Branch Press.
- American Civil Liberties Union. (2003). Safe and free: Restore our constitutional rights. Retrieved January 2, 2008, from <http://www.aclu.org/safefree/resources/17343res20031114.html>
- Carr, M. (2006). The infernal machine: A history of terrorism. New York: The New Press.
- Corum, J. (2007). Fighting the war on terror: A counterinsurgency strategy. St. Paul, MN: Zenith Press.
- Homeland Security Council. (2007, October). National strategy for homeland security. Retrieved from <http://www.whitehouse.gov/infocus/homeland/nshs/NSHS.pdf>
- Laqueur, W. (2004). No end to war: Terrorism in the twenty-first century. New York: Continuum.

WELLS-BARNETT, IDA B. (1862–1931)

Ida B. Wells-Barnett—teacher, journalist, feminist, human and civil rights activist—was one of America’s most courageous champions for social justice. In the 1890s, Wells-Barnett launched a campaign that called the attention of the nation and the world to the horrors of lynching. Wells-Barnett, a former slave, exposed the crassest dimensions of American racism, as well as the myth of freedom, equality, and justice for all.

Early Years

Ida Wells was born on July 16, 1862, in Holly Springs, Mississippi. Her mother, Lizzie Bell, was a slave. Her father, James Wells, was the son of a slave and her White master. Fortunately, James’s father-master gave his son favored treatment, teaching him to read and write. James Wells understood the importance of knowledge and encouraged Ida and her six siblings to value education.

Lizzie and James Wells also instilled their children with strict Christian values: piety, honesty, and integrity. The Wells children were taught to look out for the poor and do God’s work on earth.

Ida heeded her parent’s call to proper conduct and education. She attended school and showed a keen interest in learning. But life took a hard turn in 1878. A yellow-fever epidemic took both of her parents and her younger brother. Ida was left, at the age of 16, with the responsibility of caring for five younger siblings. Ida was resourceful. She secured a teaching position at a rural Black school by convincing the principal that she was 18. When Ida’s siblings were old enough to care for themselves, she moved to Memphis, Tennessee, to live with her aunt. Ida was not a certified teacher, so she was forced to take a position, once again, as a teacher at a rural Black school. When she was certified, she secured a position at a Black school in Memphis, teaching there from 1884 to 1891.

Wells’s first encounter with legal activism took place on May 4, 1884. She was traveling on a first-class train ticket to Nashville, where she was taking classes at Fisk University. Wells boarded the train and chose a seat. The conductor quickly informed her she was in the “Whites only” section and would have to move to the “Negro car.” Wells refused. When the conductor tried to use force, she bit him. The White passengers cheered as she was forcibly removed. But she did not let the matter pass. She filed a suit against the railroad company. In December 1884 a Tennessee court awarded her $500, but the victory was short-lived. The Tennessee Supreme Court reversed the ruling on April 5, 1887, ordering her to return the $500, as well as $200 in punitive court fees.

Wells’s interest in justice, politics, and literature led her to a related career that would change her life: journalism. While still teaching, she began to write articles for Black newspapers. Using the pseudonym “Iola,” she wrote about discriminatory laws, women’s rights, Black disenfranchisement, and a variety of other race-related issues. Iola’s biting style and insightful critiques quickly captured the attention of Black readers. In 1887 the National African-American Press Convention named her the nation’s most outstanding Black correspondent. In 1889 she became part-owner (one third) in a newspaper, the Memphis Speech and Headlight. She solicited subscribers and served as editor; meanwhile, articles by Iola continued to call for social, economic, political, and legal justice.

In 1891 Wells wrote a controversial article on Black schools that redirected her career. Drawing upon her experience as a teacher, she charged that Black education was inexcusably inferior: Black schools were underfunded, classrooms were run-down and overcrowded, books and school supplies were in short supply, and teachers were marginally competent—a step ahead of their students. These criticisms were not new. However, Wells crossed the prohibited race line when she charged that White school board members were coercing sexual favors from Black teachers in exchange for employment. In 1891 her teaching contract was not renewed.

Wells was now a full-time journalist. In 1891 she increased her stake in the Memphis Speech and Headlight from one-third to one-half ownership, making her a full partner. Wells and her co-owner, J. L. Fleming, changed the paper's name to more clearly reflect its focus: Free Speech. Wells assumed responsibility for writing and editing. Fleming took charge of subscriptions and circulation. The partnership was highly successful, and the paper thrived. Circulation increased from 1,500 to over 4,000. Wells now had an expanding platform to express her ideas and calls for racial and social justice.

Antilynching Campaigner

A series of events that began on March 5, 1892, laid the foundation for Wells's emergence as an internationally acclaimed champion for social justice. Three Black men—Thomas Moss, Calvin McDowell, and Henry Stewart—opened a grocery store on the outskirts of Memphis. Unfortunately, their store was in direct competition with a White-owned business. Tempers rose and a confrontation ensued. Nine deputies, dressed in civilian clothes, were sent to arrest the “troublemakers.” Moss, McDowell, and Stewart, thinking that they were under attack by a White mob, opened fire, wounding several deputies. They were arrested and put in jail. Suspecting lynching, a group of armed Black volunteers—the Tennessee Rifles—stood guard at the jail. When the court forced the Tennessee Rifles to leave, their worst fears were confirmed. On March 9 a White mob stormed the jail, seized the prisoners, and shot them.

Wells was enraged. She knew all three men and was godmother to Moss's child. Wells urged Memphis's Black citizens to boycott White businesses, refuse to ride on White-owned streetcars, and move to western states, particularly Oklahoma. On May 21, 1892, she published a scathing critique of lynching in her newspaper. Her attack on lynching and southern racism sparked a firestorm. On May 27, 1892, 6 days after the article appeared, a White mob burned the Free Speech to the ground.

Wells, who was out of state when the article was published, received death threats and knew that returning to Tennessee would invite lynching. She secured a position as a reporter with the New York Age, a Black-owned newspaper. In the fall of 1892 she published a pamphlet, Southern Horrors: Lynch Law in All Its Phases, which created a national and international sensation. Wells provided graphic descriptions of the hanging, burning, shooting, and dismembering of Black men, women, and children. She denounced the myth of the sex-crazed Black rapist, lusting after White women, by charging that many of the sexual encounters between Black men and White women were, in fact, consensual. Beyond that, she declared that politicians, the press, Christian ministers, and criminal justice officials—sheriffs, judges, prosecutors—had done little to stop the carnage. In fact, some people openly sanctioned lynching and participated in lynch mobs.

Wells was now widely acclaimed as the world's foremost authority on lynching. She was invited to give lectures in a number of northern states and went on two extensive speaking tours in England, one in 1893 (3 months) and another in 1894 (6 months); meanwhile, she continued to write. In 1895 she published A Red Record: Tabulated Statistics and Alleged Causes of Lynching in the United States, 1892, 1893, 1894. This work, later published in London under the title United States Atrocities, provided an updated statistical summary of hundreds of lynchings, along with graphic descriptions of individual cases. Lynch Law in Georgia provided an account of the barbaric extralegal execution of a Black man, Sam Hose, in 1899. Mob Rule in New Orleans described the lynching of Robert Charles in 1900. Charles, after resisting arrest, waged a one-man war on the White citizens of New Orleans. For 5 days he eluded White mobs and the city's police. In the process, he shot 27 White people, killing a total of 7, which included 4 police officers.

Wells's position as the world's foremost anti-lynching campaigner was short-lived. A variety of unrelated interest groups rallied to undercut her work. Conservative southerners charged that Wells was ignoring the threat posed by Black rapists. White lynch mobs were merely protecting their wives, mothers, and daughters from "savage Black beasts." White men and White women in the South and North unequivocally rejected her claim that White women voluntarily engaged in sexual relations with Black men. Black leaders were also reluctant to embrace Wells's message. Booker T. Washington and other Black conservatives believed that her confrontational style was fanning the flames of racial conflict. W. E. B. Du Bois and Black liberals shared her disgust with lynching, but Progressive era Black males, reflecting gender notions of the day, did not believe that Black women were suited for the "manly" battle for social justice. Increasingly, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and its leaders—particularly Du Bois and later Walter White—took the lead in the nation's antilynching campaign. Simply stated, Wells was marginalized by both White and Black Americans.

There were, however, other factors that drained her energy and distracted her attention from the war on lynching. Family commitments were particularly time consuming. In 1895 she married Ferdinand Barnett, a lawyer, journalist, and social activist. They bought a home in Chicago and, over the next decade, had four children: Charles (1896), Herman (1897), Ida (1901), and Alfreda (1904). Wells assumed the primary responsibility for raising the children, instilling them with the values that she had learned as a child: piety, honesty, integrity, discipline, courage, and hard work.

Later Years: Crusades for Justice

Domestic responsibilities did not, however, end her interest in social issues and community betterment. In 1910 Wells-Barnett opened a settlement house in Chicago, the Negro Fellowship League, which operated until 1920. Between 1913 and 1915 she worked as a probation officer in the municipal court. Wells-Barnett actively campaigned for temperance reform, arguing that alcohol diverted Black men from their responsibilities and provided police with an excuse for harassment. She was also committed to women's suffrage. She joined a number of organizations that promoted women's right to vote and worked for Republican candidates at the local, state, and federal levels. In 1930 she ran for the state senate but lost the election. In her spare time, she worked on her biography. Crusade for Justice was never completed, but it was published in 1970, thanks to the efforts of her daughter, Alfreda Duster.

Justice-related issues remained a central concern for Wells-Barnett. Outraged by the lynching of a Black man, William James, in Cairo, Illinois, in 1909, she launched an investigation of the case and played an instrumental role in convincing the governor to dismiss the county sheriff for failing to protect his prisoner. The 1917 East St. Louis Riot, which was sparked by an attack on the Black community by White policemen, resulted in another Wells-Barnett inquiry, as well as the publication of another scathing report: The East St. Louis Massacre: The Greatest Outrage of the Century. During the 1919 Chicago Race Riot, which left 23 Blacks dead, Wells-Barnett took to the streets, armed with a pistol, to observe. She later offered first-hand testimony of injustices before a grand jury. She investigated and protested the execution of 13 Black soldiers by a military court in 1917, and she published a critical account of a legally questionable 1919 Arkansas trial that resulted in death sentences for 12 Black farmers.

Wells-Barnett died at the age of 69 on March 25, 1931, after a short illness. Her accomplishments were, to be sure, extraordinary. She overcame race, gender, and her social status as a slave to become the world's leading campaigner against lynching, and for decades, she courageously battled for racial and gender equality in all economic, political, social, cultural, religious, and legal institutions. Wells-Barnett was also a tragic historical figure, for she was too visionary, too outspoken, and too radical for her times—a true crusader for justice.

Alexander W. Pisciotta

See also Chicago Race Riot of 1919; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Dyer Bill; Elaine Massacre of 1919 (Phillips County, Arkansas); Lynching; Race Relations; Race Riots; Racial Conflict; Till, Emmett

Further Readings

- Dray, P. (2002). At the hands of persons unknown: The lynching of Black America. New York: Modern Library.
- Duster, A. M. (Ed.). (1970). Crusade for justice: The autobiography of Ida B. Wells. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Royster, J. J. (Ed.). (1997). Southern horrors and other writings: The anti-lynching campaign of Ida B. Wells, 1892–1900. Boston: Bedford Books.
- Schechter, P. A. (2001). Ida B. Wells-Barnett and American reform, 1880–1930. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

W. HAYWOOD BURNS INSTITUTE FOR JUVENILE JUSTICE FAIRNESS AND EQUITY

The proportion of minority youth involved in the juvenile justice system and adult criminal justice systems in the United States increased by 47% between 1983 and 1997. In response to the problems of disproportionate minority youth arrests, detention, and commitment to juvenile facilities and adult prisons, the W. Haywood Burns Institute for Juvenile Justice Fairness and Equity was founded in 2002 in San Francisco, California. Thus, the institute was created to protect and improve the lives of youth of color, poor children, and their communities.

The institute was named for W. Haywood Burns, a Harvard honors graduate and Yale-educated civil rights lawyer who died in an automobile accident while attending the International Association of Democratic Lawyers conference in Cape Town, South Africa, in 1996. Burns was the former dean of the City University of New York School of Law at Queens College and a longtime civil rights advocate who worked with the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., represented the Black activist Angela Davis against charges of kidnapping and murder, and coordinated the defense for inmates indicted in the Attica prison riot. Burns believed that human rights and justice could be achieved through activism.

The institute's core mission was built around the premise that most children in trouble with the law are best served by alternatives to incarceration because children cannot be rehabilitated when housed in a cage and that all children deserve to be treated equally and fairly by the system that serves them. Further, the institute believed that to achieve change in the treatment of children within the juvenile and criminal justice system, the process had to be one that is intentionally inclusive of many voices and opinions, even those of divergent views.

To achieve the goal of using inclusiveness to assist children of color and poor children, the institute convenes law enforcement representatives, youth-serving professionals, legal system representatives, community leaders, parents, and youth across the United States. The participants are led through a consensus-based data-driven approach to change policies, procedures, and practices that impact children of color and poor children. Through these forums, the institute believes that it is building the capacity of local organizations to improve and strengthen their own local programs and subsequently reduce the rate of disproportionate minority youth confinement.

Since 2002 the Burns Institute has worked nationally to reduce the level of disproportionate minority youth confinement and improve the overall treatment of children of color and poor children in the juvenile justice system. In providing national leadership in working to reduce the overrepresentation of youth of color and poor youth in the juvenile justice system, the Haywood Burns Institute suggests that they, the institute, must engage traditional and nontraditional stakeholders in the dialogue to develop plans of action with measurable results in all states. New York and North Carolina, the only two states in the country where the legal upper age for juveniles is 15, provide examples of the institute's involvement in addressing disproportionate minority confinement (DMC) rates across the nation. In utilizing data supplied by the North Carolina 2004 Formula Grant Update report, the Burns Institute concluded that African American youth were overrepresented in juvenile detention facilities in North Carolina in 2003. Those youth represented 27% of the overall youth population, yet represented 59% of those youth in detention. In 2002, while being monitored by the institute, the North Carolina Governor's Crime Commission hired a full-time DMC coordinator to staff the DMC subcommittee and maintain the state's momentum in developing strategies to reduce minority overrepresentation in the juvenile justice system. North Carolina's overall approach to addressing DMC consisted of working with four demonstration counties to provide resources, technical assistance, and ongoing monitoring and evaluation of programs and activities designed to reduce DMC in these jurisdictions. Further, it included collaborating with the North Carolina Department of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention in developing a uniform data collection system that would allow for accurate collection of data disaggregated by race. The purpose for the data to be collected at the decision points was that it could allow for an accurate measurement of possible disparities in decision making. Lastly it was to increase the awareness of disproportionate minority contact in the juvenile justice system and educating the public, juvenile justice professionals, as well as the Governor's Crime Commission through conference presentations, developing print materials to be disseminated, and utilizing technical assistance resources available through the federal government, thus satisfying a key mission of the Burns Institute. The Department of Juvenile Justice's 2006 annual report suggested that 23,837 African American youth had complaints issued against them while 19,770 Whites had similar complaints; these figures represent a continued state of disproportionate minority youth involvement in the juvenile justice system.

New York, which represents the second of two states that try youth age 16 and over in the adult court and subsequently confine them in adult jails and prisons, still maintains a disproportionate number of youth of color in their youth detention facilities. Youth of color are reportedly disproportionately incarcerated in the New York State Office of Children and Family Services. A report issued in March 2007 by the Correctional Association of New York suggested that 86% of youth in the New York State Office of Children and Family Services were African Americans, Latinos, or Native Americans. The same report suggested that over half of the youth in state custody were convicted of misdemeanors or low-level nonviolent offenses. The Burns Institute collected minority youth confinement data for nearly all 50 states. The statistics reported by New York and North Carolina did not appear to suggest progress as sought by the Burns Institute, yet it also was not seen as a sign of failure of programmatic oversight in the treatment of minority youth in the juvenile and adult systems.

According to the institute, which is funded through grants and private support, the task of reducing racial disparities was once viewed as intractable and overwhelming. The institute's involvement with several jurisdictions around the country has already demonstrated that reducing racial disparity is indeed a solvable problem. The W. Haywood Burns Institute for Juvenile Justice Fairness and Equity suggests that the active commitment and participation of key traditional and nontraditional participants in the juvenile justice system at each site and in each state—including judges, prosecuting attorneys, public defenders, police, probation officers, political leaders, service providers, and community leaders—can reduce the racial disparities in the juvenile justice system. Success of the institute is measured in terms of changes in treatment and numbers of minority youth involved in the system.

Elvira White

See also Disproportionate Minority Contact and Confinement; Juvenile Waivers to Adult Court; Sentencing Disparities, African Americans; Sentencing Disparities, Latina/o/s

Further Readings

North Carolina Department of Juvenile Delinquency and Prevention. (2006). Annual report. Raleigh: Author.

Websites

Correctional Association of New York: <http://www.correctionalassociation.org>

W. Haywood Burns Institute: <http://www.burnsinstitute.org>

WHITE CRIME

Understanding the idea of “White crime” requires not only an appreciation of modern statistics on crime commission but a broader perspective on the history and definition of “crime.” White Americans are, by some limited measures, less crime prone but have historically engaged in a host of “crimes” that are ignored or downplayed by official tallies and definitions. While it would be inappropriate to speak of criminality as stemming from genetic qualities essential to being White, it would be equally inappropriate to ignore the role of history and social situation in explaining and accounting for the entire reality of White crime. Despite this, it is also important to recognize that White crime cannot be inappropriately stereotyped as merely an act of racist hatred, despite the wide publicity that hate crimes against minorities may receive.

White Crime Rates

Like members of all other races and ethnicities, White Americans engage in crime. However, the patterns of White offending differ from those of other racial and ethnic groupings. Whereas Whites engage in low-level property, drug, and various public order offenses (like driving under the influence) at rates roughly comparable to other races and ethnicities, the racial patterns diverge widely when trends in violent crime are examined. The Federal Bureau of Investigation Uniform Crime Reports show that, on average, Whites engage in proportionately less “street crime” of virtually all categories, especially violent crime. A salient example is murder. In 2006, approximately 5,000 Whites and 5,000 African Americans were arrested for homicide, which is remarkable considering that Whites constitute the largest share of the U.S. population (about 75%).

Some have argued that a backdrop of oppression and deprivation that has historically crippled African Americans’ social development was absent from White society, and that relative historic privilege for most Whites and a dearth of the social conditions (poverty, lack of education, discrimination) that explain crime account for these striking differences. But the fact remains that, by some measures, Whites commit crime at a far lesser rate than African Americans. Such statistics on White crime, taken at face value, have been misused to support arguably racist contentions that Whites are inherently less criminal than African Americans and other racial and ethnic groups. However, this simplistic understanding, based on modern statistics covering narrow definitions of crime, ignores the crucial role of history and culture in shaping current racial patterns of crime commission. It also fails to acknowledge that a broad understanding of White crime must include historic and definitional clarifications that paint a very different picture than the limited one portrayed by modern official statistics.

Some would argue that the idea of White crime should include a critical examination of historic, large-scale injustices, such as the European conquest of the western hemisphere from indigenous populations and the forced transportation of Black Africans, both of which resulted in the death and/or enslavement of millions. This could be a compelling argument, as some of the crime types discussed in this entry are a distant echo of this era in which Whites’ abuse of minorities was widespread. Indeed, one of the difficulties in defining and interpreting the idea of White crime is that many wrongs historically committed by Whites were not, at the time, defined as crimes at all. For example, although modern criminal statutes specifically outlaw kidnapping and false imprisonment, millions of Black Africans were captured and brought to the Americas as slave labor. Not only were these acts tolerated under the law, but they were specifically sanctioned and defended by it. Technically then, the captain of the slave ship, the trafficker in human flesh at the auction, and the owner and driver of slaves were not criminals under the laws of their day, even though they seem so by our modern sensibilities.

Second, some of the most salient White crimes were those committed as part of a historic pattern of populist, racist subversion of the rule of law, even after laws were officially changed to abolish abuses such as slavery. In theory, after the Civil War, when the exploitation of all Americans was rendered unconstitutional by the Fourteenth, Fifteenth, and Sixteenth Amendments, racial minorities enjoyed theoretical protection under the law from White exploitation and terror. But for many it was theory only. Especially (but not exclusively) in the South, African Americans and other minorities were still victims of acts that were previously sanctioned by the legal system but later only technically prohibited. Lynching, in particular, was a terror tactic used by White supremacists, such as members of the Ku Klux Klan, to maintain White hegemony over African American lives even after Emancipation. Such acts were common for decades after the Civil War and were rarely subject to legal response. One famous instance occurred in 1955, when two White men from Money, Mississippi, offended by an alleged insult toward one of the men's wives, brutally murdered Emmett Till, an African American boy from Chicago visiting relatives for the summer. The two killers were acquitted in 67 minutes by an all-White state jury, after which they promptly sold their detailed confession of the crime to a popular magazine, since they were immune to prosecution under the double jeopardy clause.

Because of such historic cases, the stereotypical White crime today could manifest itself as a retrograde act of overt racist violence, of which there are many well-publicized and shocking recent examples. Among these would be the week-long captivity and barbaric torture of 20-year-old African American Megan Williams in Logan County, West Virginia, in early September 2007 by six Whites who repeatedly berated her with racial taunts. Another is the famous case of James Byrd, Jr., a disabled Black man who was dragged to death behind a truck by three White men with affiliations with various racist groups in Jasper, Texas, in 1998. Despite the horror these crimes incite, some might argue that it is partial consolation that such episodes of overtly racially motivated White crime occur at nowhere near the frequency of lynching in the decades after the Civil War. Furthermore, in both of these cases the perpetrators were aggressively prosecuted and punished by the justice system. Thus, despite the horrific nature of the crimes committed, the legal outcomes in these cases could at least be regarded as signs of substantial historic progress when compared to past eras when Whites committed such crimes with relative impunity.

Because of the publicity associated with crimes such as the murder of James Byrd, Jr., or the captivity and brutalization of Megan Williams, the idea of White crime could accrue an incomplete image of suggesting "crime against non-Whites." However, the statistical realities belie this. As is the case with all other racial and ethnic groups, the crimes White Americans commit are generally against members of their own race. While most domestic violence cases and relatively mundane conflicts among circles of friends and acquaintances compose the bulk of all street crimes, they lack the high-profile severity and sensationalism that make overtly racial attacks so newsworthy, so we are not as aware of them. But as Whites mostly live and work with, or in proximity to, other Whites, the victims of White crime are of course disproportionately White.

Still, there are other aspects of White crime that beg examination, even if society has evolved past the time of pervasive and direct White crimes against minority victims. Many scholars argue that what we commonly think of as crime—street crimes such as robbery, rape, and assault—is far less damaging than the numerous violations of environmental, occupational safety, and product quality laws committed by major corporations and rogue government officials. As Whites disproportionately occupy positions of privilege in government and business, they have disproportionate opportunities to commit this category of crime. And yet, some argue, because of the excessive attention paid to street crimes committed by poor, urban minorities, we do not adequately appreciate and respond to these crimes of the predominantly privileged White classes and instead marshal the justice system's resources disproportionately toward the lower classes and minorities.

Finally, it is important to bear in mind that few experts would agree that White crime as such is a feature of White persons' Whiteness; rather, it is a result of their humanity. In this line of reasoning, the historic and present character of White crime derives not from attributes that are genetically unique to Western Europeans but from the historic and cultural situation of Whites and the criminal opportunities presented that some of them chose to exploit. It is necessary to document the historic and present realities of White crime to avoid the converse errors of either under- or overestimating its nature based on stereotypes and misconceptions, but it would be an equal mistake to assume that any attribute inherent to the White race is the cause of White crime—just as it would be to make a similar inference about any other race.

Timothy Griffin

See also Black Codes; Byrd, James, Jr.; Conflict Theory; Crime Statistics and Reporting; Hate Crimes; Institutional Racism; Interracial Crime; Ku Klux Klan; Ku Klux Klan Act; Lynching; Media Portrayals of White Americans; Racialization of Crime; Rosewood, Florida, Race Riot of 1923; Violent Crime; White Supremacists

Further Readings

- Brophy, A. L. (2002). Reconstructing the dreamland: The Tulsa Riot of 1921: Race, reparations, and reconciliation. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Christianson, S. (1998). With liberty for some: 500 years of imprisonment in America. Boston: Northeastern University Press.
- Jackson, J. L., Sr., Jackson, J. L., Jr., & Bruce, S. (2001). Legal lynching: The death penalty and America's future. New York: The New Press.
- Jones, E. P. (2003). The known world. New York: Amistad.
- Kappeler, V. E., & Potter, G. W. (2005). The mythology of crime and criminal justice. Long Grove, IL: Waveland Press.
- Kennedy, R. (1998). Race, crime, and the law. New York: Vintage Books.
- Reiman, J. (2007). The rich get richer and the poor get prison: Ideology, class, and criminal justice (8th ed.). Boston: Pearson/Allyn & Bacon.
- Silberman, C. E. (1978). Criminal violence, criminal justice. New York: Vintage Books.
- U.S. Department of Justice, Federal Bureau of Investigation. (2007, September). 2006: Crime in the United States. Retrieved from http://www.fbi.gov/ucr/cius2006/data/table_43.html

WHITE GANGS

Although the number of gangs in general greatly expanded during the 20th century, such gangs have earlier roots in U.S. history. The spread of the industrial revolution during the 1800s contributed to their growth, as did increased immigration.

This entry examines the historical background of White gangs, explores their roots in the values underlying slavery, describes the Christian Identity movement, and briefly reviews the state of White gangs in America.

America's first White gangs began in urban centers in the Northeast along Euroethnic divisions. They bonded together based on common language, culture, and their connection to their region or country of origin. Each major wave of first-generation Euroethnic gangs acted as a resistance movement to thwart the loss of their ethnic identity through assimilation and as protection against violent discrimination from native-born Americans. Native-born Americans have traditionally felt threatened economically and culturally by each new Euroethnic group, whom they felt did not share similar economic, religious, and cultural values. Early America was predominantly White and Protestant. These perceived differences among new White ethnic immigrant groups stocked fears of loss of economic power and cultural dominance.

During the early 1800s, Irish-Catholic immigrants flooded into America, causing many native-born Americans to feel threatened by a White, yet culturally and religiously different, ethnic group. The influx of Irish immigrants caused an increase in discrimination and violence, which in turn caused the Irish immigrants to form gangs out of a need for protection. Yet, the racial and ethnic undertones of early America's White gangs and conflicts were generally propaganda to justify competition over territory, political power, and control of lucrative criminal enterprises. Even so, this pattern of discrimination and gang creation continued with each successive wave of immigrants, such as Italian, Jewish, and eastern European ethnic groups, into the 1920s. As each time a new wave of immigrants appeared, the native-born population felt a need to protect and reinforce the idea of America being a Protestant, Anglo-Saxon country against waves of ethnic immigrants who might challenge their status as the dominant racial group in America.

Sociologist Frederick Thrasher, in his 1927 book The Gang, found that Chicago-based White gangs were comprised of poor White immigrant groups such as Polish, Italian, German, Slavic, and Swedish youth (Skolnick, 2002). After the Great Depression, the New Deal, and World War II, many of the previously impoverished White underclass that produced White gang members gained entry into the middle class due to government programs stemming from the New Deal, the GI bill, and an exodus to new suburban areas through Federal Housing Administration loan programs.

In this transition, many White Americans began to lose much of their Euroethnic differentiation due to assimilation and declines in ethnic discrimination and religious persecution and became Americans. This single identity created a commonality among White Americans steeped in the need for racial superiority and cultural dominance based in the cultural racism of the American South.

Southern Christian Roots of White Gangs

To better understand the racial ideology of some modern White gangs in America, Christianity and the antebellum South go hand in hand. In the antebellum South, racism steeped in Christianity was the underlying justification for slavery and Jim Crow. The Protestant church justified the enslavement of Black slaves with biblical references to Genesis 9:25–26 in which after the flood, Noah cursed the offspring of Ham to be servants of the offspring of Japheth and Shem for eternity. With this biblical justification, Black slaves were considered amoral, being neither immoral or moral, but innately animalistic and instinctual in behavior. To control “amoral” Black slaves, strict codes of racial interaction and conduct were devised. To enforce these codes of conduct, slaveholding communities set up vigilante police forces called slave patrols.

Slave patrollers were White men drawn from southern communities who volunteered or performed compulsory service as slave patrolmen. Slave patrolling was a community-supported effort designed to protect the White population by preemptively snuffing out rebellions and reinforcing racial dominance. Slave patrollers were responsible for policing the slave population by checking the identification and permission of slaves moving between plantations, breaking up gatherings, capturing fugitive slaves, and punishing or killing unruly slaves. After the Civil War, the slave patrol concept metamorphosed into the Ku Klux Klan, a terrorist organization with the objective of reinforcing the antebellum South strict code of racial segregation and denial of civil rights. The Ku Klux Klan had the unspoken consent of the community to maintain racial dominance over the southern United States. At that time, a great underlying fear of the American South was of miscegenation or a “mongrelization” of the White population in which Black men and White women could marry across racial lines. The Ku Klux Klan saw themselves as race warriors against the possibility of being dominated by a morally and intellectually inferior mixed race population. The Ku Klux Klan’s goal of preserving an Anglo-Saxon Christian America has continued to the present day.

Christian Identity Movement

After the 1964 Civil Rights Act and the 1965 Immigrant Act, the Ku Klux Klan’s power began to wane and a new wave of White separatist groups began to arise, each espousing the idea of Christian Identity. The Christian Identity is an overarching ideology that merges Christianity and Nazism centered around four major points: (1) Anglo-Saxons are the direct blood descendents of Adam’s son Abel, therefore making the White race the true Israelites. (2) Jewish people are considered the descendents of Cain and are referred to as Satan’s seed. (3) Adam and Eve are White and their Anglo-Saxon descendents are the keepers of God’s word and are his chosen people. (4) Miscegenation is contamination and destruction of the White race’s direct lineage back to Adam and to God. Christian Identity practitioners maintain that Black, Asian, Hispanics, and other groups of color to be “mud people,” people who are spiritually and intellectually inferior to White people and with whom miscegenation destroys the White race’s direct blood connection to Adam (Kingdom Identities Ministries, n.d.).

Like the Ku Klux Klan of earlier generations, the Christian Identity movement is dedicated to racial separation and White purity, and that they will be God’s instrument in a race war/apocalypse meant to cleanse impure and “mud” people from the earth.

Modern White Gangs

Christian Identity ideology is the foundation for most modern White gangs in America. The mingling of Christianity and Neo-Nazism has given rise to gangs such as the American Nazi Party, Aryan Brotherhood National Association for the Advancement of White People, White Aryan Resistance, and younger generations of the Ku Klux Klan. Increased immigration (both legal and illegal), America's loss of economic power, and America's changing racial demographics foster resentment among White gangs, who believe White Americans are losing their homeland identity to invaders.

Leaders such as David Duke and Tom Metzger have been instrumental in the growth of White gangs among young White Americans after the civil rights movement. They espouse an assumed White superiority that justifies White privilege and separation. Under the leadership of such men, the concepts of White gangs and Christian Identity have gone global via the Internet. Many of the American-based groups are now working in a loose affiliation to create a new White American Homeland in the states of Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and Montana. They believe that America's decline is due to the influx of non-White immigrants and social programs designed to help historically disenfranchised groups and that the only hope for the survival of the White race is separation into a designated part of America where they can maintain a majority White population and preserve Western civilization and Christianity. It is important to note that other White gangs exist in the United States, such as the Outlaw Motorcycle club, that are known for their involvement in violent crimes and drugs.

Eran Reya

See also Ku Klux Klan; McVeigh, Timothy; Prison Gangs; White Supremacists

Further Readings

Kingdom Identity Ministries. (n.d.). Doctrinal statement of beliefs. Retrieved from <http://www.kingidentity.com/doctrine.htm>

Macdonald, A. (1999). The Turner diaries. Hillsboro, WV: National Vanguard Books.

Reya, E. (2007). The death of Black America. Bloomington, IN: AuthorHouse.

Robb, J. (2007). Brave new war. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley.

Skolnick, J. H. (2002, November 30). Gangs in the post-industrial ghetto. The American Prospect. Retrieved from http://www.prospect.org/cs/articles?article=gangs_in_the_postindustrial_ghetto Steele, J. E. (2004). Defensive racism. Sagle, ID: ProPer Press.

WHITE PRIVILEGE

White privilege can be defined as an advantage given to or enjoyed by White people in the United States and elsewhere. This advantage has been viewed as a "right" that exempts those of European descent from restrictions and burdens imposed on members of groups that do not fall within the category of White. Educators and others who define White privilege and challenge its structure argue that this privilege is so pervasive and part of everyday society in the United States that those who benefit from it often fail to recognize it and may even deny its existence (e.g., "I am not racist" and "Everyone has an equal chance of being successful in our society"). This advantage of White persons over non-White persons creates disparities between Whites and non-Whites. Examples of common disparities between Whites and minorities can be found in societal institutions such as health care, education, the economy, and the criminal justice system. White privilege is also expressed in stereotypes of racial/ethnic minorities. Both the macro (economic, educational, political, and familial systems, etc.) and micro (beliefs, attitudes, values, friends, etc.) elements of U.S. society seem to indicate that people conduct their everyday lives differently depending on whether or not they possess White privilege.

There are several ways one can look at and discuss how privilege has been assigned to selected groups and taken away from other groups. Some scholars associate White privilege with male privilege. Their argument is that White people are carefully taught not to recognize White privilege in the way that men are taught not to recognize male privilege—privilege takes the form of unearned assets that are cashed in every day while those who benefit remain oblivious of their advantage.

Few examples of White privilege are as explicit as the process of Black slavery in North America. The way in which Africans in the Americas were exploited and stereotyped made its mark on the economic and social system in the United States as well as in other countries. Thus, to truly discuss and understand privilege, one must understand oppression. For instance, Black Americans and their families have faced segregation, discrimination, and inequalities throughout the history of industrial America. When compared to Whites, Blacks were more often faced with discriminatory laws, individually and in the family structure. Under slave law, Blacks and their children were the property of slave owners. Although during the slave period there were many freed married Blacks, family units under slavery existed at the slave master's discretion. Those who were given legal standing as persons could marry, while those who were considered property could not, and slaves were considered property. Although many slaves defied this law and were married within their own community, slave owners could destroy this bond at any time by merely selling one or both of the partners to different owners. After slavery, Whites created formal and informal laws for the domination of Black labor, a labor they once owned. These "Jim Crow" laws were enacted after Reconstruction and, as much as anything else, fostered an ideology of Blacks as subordinate and Whites as superordinate.

An example of this intersection can be given in the familial roles of Blacks and Whites strongly rooted in U.S. history. Work roles inside and outside the household seem to be one of the major differences. American plantation slavery did not make a distinction between the work performed by Black men and Black women. Both worked in the fields and within the household doing domestic labor. Gender role expectations were very different for Black and White women. Black women were not seen as weak; in fact, they were seen as being able to work in the fields, have a baby in the evening, and cook breakfast the next day. White women, on the other hand, were viewed as weaker than Black women, unable to deal with the normal stresses of the day-to-day activities of the plantation. A woman's duties centered on pleasing her husband, whatever his wishes might be. Black men also experienced different gender role expectations than did White men. Under slavery, the Black male understood that both he and his family were at the service of the White family.

After industrialization, Black women most often were paid less than Black men or White women and often maintained jobs in the paid labor market as servants, seamstresses, laundresses, and other domestic positions. Black women were not allowed to serve as salesclerks, cashiers, or bookkeepers, which were jobs filled by many White women in the labor market.

Black men who had job skills in many cases could not practice those skills. As a case in point, Blacks were not allowed to join many of the trade unions in the South, where most Blacks lived. The United Mine Workers Union in the South used Blacks as strikebreakers but had problems getting Black members accepted as regular union members. Thus, in many cases, Blacks who worked as miners remained outside the union, with inadequate pay compared to White union members. The few jobs that were available to Black men were domestic in nature and tended to pay less than jobs that were reserved for White males.

As mentioned earlier, current examples of White privilege come in the form of what is taking place in the criminal justice system. Most Whites in America would not openly say that they believe Blacks are more dangerous or have more criminal tendencies than Whites.

The overrepresentation of Blacks in arrest and prisoner statistics fosters not only the racialization of crime but also feelings of White privilege.

Aaron Thompson

See also Race Relations; Racialization of Crime; Racism

Further Readings

- Gutman, H. G. (1975). Work, culture & society. New York: Vintage Books.
- Kessler-Harris, A. (1981). Women have always worked. Old Westbury, NY: Feminist Press.
- McIntosh, P. (1988). White privilege and male privilege: A personal account of coming to see correspondences through work in women's studies (Working paper).

Wellesley, MA: Wellesley College Center for Research on Women.

Thompson, A. (2007). Boy, you better learn how to count your money. In R. Luhman (Ed.), Sociological outlook (8th ed.). Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

WHITE SUPREMACISTS

In the century that preceded the September 11, 2001, attacks on the United States, most extremist violence on U.S. soil came not from foreign threats but from homegrown fighters with a right-wing ideology. Many of these radical right extremists, then and now, subscribe to the tenets of White supremacists, with their core belief in strict racial hierarchy according to which those who belong to the White race are naturally superior socially, intellectually, and physiologically to those outside of this group. White supremacists believe that Whites are more capable and better equipped to perform roles in society more effectively and efficiently because of the advantages they supposedly hold above all other races. Historically, the ideology of White supremacy has given rise to social movements in the United States and abroad, some of which have had far-reaching consequences and continue to exert an influence on society.

Among the characteristics shared by U.S. White supremacist groups are an antigovernment mentality; hatred of Jews; a belief in both conspiracy and apocalyptic theories; a strong aversion to gays and lesbians; vehement nativism and dislike of non-White foreigners, American Indians, and immigrants; and a propensity for violence. Organized White supremacist groups in the United States evolved from roots in the Ku Klux Klan, a racist organization that arose among White Protestants in the rural South during the period of Reconstruction following the Civil War, and have borrowed elements from the ideology of the National Socialist German Workers (Nazi) Party led by Adolf Hitler. As a social movement, White supremacy continues to challenge America's progress toward a color-blind, racially unbiased society.

Historical Background

White racism was of course deeply ingrained in American society before the Civil War, but as the war approached, and with it the obvious threat to the institution of slavery, the doctrine of White supremacy found clear expression in writings and public oratory by sympathizers with the Southern cause. Following the defeat of the Confederacy, the doctrine was absorbed into the ideology of the Ku Klux Klan and similar organizations intent on maintaining, by any means necessary, the old social order in which non-Whites "knew their place."

Historically, White supremacist thinking has strongly influenced societies in other parts of the world, such as South Africa during apartheid, and various regions of Europe within the past 2 centuries, most especially Nazi Germany from the early 1930s until the end of World War II. Today's supremacist ideologies draw heavily on discredited 19th-century quasi-scientific theories of the genetic superiority of Europeans and their descendents. In the period just prior to and during World War II, eugenicists in Germany performed unethical medical experiments on Jews and others, such as Gypsies. The findings were used to defend the idea of White supremacy and served to justify racist beliefs during the time and in the decades following the war. In various forms, White supremacy as an element of right-wing populism has continued to exert an influence on American society.

Many countries around the world have felt the influence of White supremacy and its presence within and among government and law enforcement in European-settled countries. The situation surrounding the oppression of Australian Aborigines, similar to that of the Native Americans, has been extensive; for example, Australian Aborigines previously were barred from holding any type of government job. Additionally, many Aborigines were forced to live in sequestered areas. Many other countries settled by Westerners have historically limited or banned immigration and naturalization services to non-Whites or non-Europeans. And most recently, South Africa was governed by an oppressive White supremacist regime, whose rule ended in the 1990s.

In the United States, non-Whites have experienced varying degrees of discrimination on the basis of White supremacist thinking since the European presence in North America began in the 17th century. The slave trade and allowance of slave labor in the south and southwest regions of the country was legal until 1864 with the passage of the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution and the Emancipation Proclamation. A century later, minorities were still subject to differential treatment as late as 1967 when antimiscegenation laws banning interracial marriage were finally prohibited by constitutional law.

Ku Klux Klan

The Ku Klux Klan is the oldest and most infamous racist group in the United States, often using violence and acts of intimidation such as cross burnings and lynchings to harass non-Whites or other groups they deem inferior to the European, Christian race. For over a century, this group has engaged in a campaign of racist violence and intimidation throughout America. The Klan was formed during the Reconstruction era in 1866 and played an important role in restoring power to White Democratic control in the South through a violent terrorist campaign directed at Blacks and Unionists. Klan activity gradually subsided, but over the next century there were two more revivals of the Klan, each characterized by multiple incidents of racial violence, followed by legal or criminal sanctions against the group, weakening its structure and rendering it ineffective. During the civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s, firebombs were used by the Klan to burn churches, houses, and vehicles. Such attacks continued into the next decade when Klan violence became directed at affirmative action and desegregation efforts. After a prominent faction of the Klan was sued for millions of dollars, the organization's activities again subsided.

The Anti-Defamation League estimates that there may currently be more than 100 different chapters of Klan organizations, made up of more than 5,000 members. It is believed a third revival of the organization may be imminent as the political and social controversy surrounding the illegal immigration movement increases in the United States. While still espousing White supremacist and fundamental Christian ideologies, the Klan has changed since the beginning of the movement over a century and a half ago. The group has become wholly decentralized. Membership is informal and often changes, although the group continues to engage in violent and threatening actions against Blacks, Jews, and other minorities.

Belief Systems Among White Supremacists

Most White supremacists have been of Protestant denomination, although the melding of Klan, militia, and Nazi elements have encouraged other religious bases for the White power ideology. In addition to Protestantism, the Christian Identity movement, the World Church of the Creator, and various forms of Odin worship have also played a prominent role in integrating the concept of race into religion. The Christian Identity movement broke into the mainstream in the late 20th century and is based on the belief that White people of European descent originally hail from the "Lost Tribes" of Israel and that non-Whites do not have souls and therefore can never earn God's favor or be saved. Groups that ascribe to this religion include the Order, Aryan Nations, and many anti-government militia groups such as the Militia of Montana and the Michigan militia. The Order, also known as the Silent Brotherhood, was founded by Robert Mathews in 1983 and committed armed robberies, the bombing of a synagogue, and the murder of a radio talk-show host in the early 1980s. Many of the members of the Order were recruited from the Christian Identity-based Aryan Nations, National Alliance, and the Ku Klux Klan. A member named David Lane is credited with creating and popularizing the so-called Fourteen Words common to the supremacist movement and its members: "We must secure the existence of our people and a future for white children."

The World Church of the Creator (WCOTC) is a non-Christian religious organization that has become popular among White power groups. Founded in the 1970s, WCOTC largely believes that a person's race dictates his or her religion, and the organization's primary objective is "the survival, expansion, and advancement of the White race." WCOTC advocates the Aryan people to engage in a Racial Holy War (RaHoWa) based on the apocalyptic conspiracy that Jews will one day mobilize all non-Whites and “race traitors” in order to take over the world and kill or suppress all European-descended Caucasians. Most White supremacist subcultures envisage a wide-reaching Jewish conspiracy, alleging that all Jews belong to a single race, which makes it easier to promote bigotry on both religious and racist fronts. Still active in many areas of the United States, WCOTC was renamed the Creativity Movement in the early 1990s when a similarly titled group trademarked the name World Church of the Creator.

Another non-Christian religious practice, Germanic neopaganism, is becoming common among White supremacists both in and out of prison. These neopaganists, often considered Odinists or Asatru leaders, have opened numerous prison ministries and are boasting increasing membership throughout the nation. These churches emphasize the supernatural characteristics of pre-Christian European polytheism and, according to the Southern Poverty Law Center, appeal to those urban White supremacists who seek to reject more conservative Christian-based religions.

White Supremacist Groups

Categorized by common ideologies, religious foundations, and member characteristics, the following groups are interrelated and often work with one another in their mission to promote White power.

Nazis

The Nazi Party, led by Adolf Hitler, an Austrian-born veteran of World War I, originated in Germany and stressed the idea of racial purity of the so-called Aryan heritage. Not only were Jews targeted, but also homosexuals, the mentally disabled, Slavs, Poles, and various other non-Aryans. The end of World War II saw the collapse of the Nazi Party, although Nazi beliefs continue to spread in both Europe and North America today. These groups and individuals are referred to as neo-Nazis. Neo-Nazi organizations range from small groups, such as the National Alliance and White Revolution, to widespread factions like the National Socialist Movement and the American National Socialist Workers Party.

According to the Anti-Defamation League, the National Socialist Movement, based in Minneapolis, Minnesota, is the largest neo-Nazi group in the United States. Members wear Nazi uniforms and proudly display swastikas on their hats and sleeves. The National Socialist Movement promotes anti-Semitic and racist ideology through Internet-based radio, video games, literature, and “White power” music. The group was originally founded in 1974 by Robert Brannen and Cliff Herrington but is currently led by Jeff Schoep. The National Socialist Movement traces its roots back to George Lincoln Rockwell’s American Nazi Party of the 1960s. George Lincoln Rockwell started the party, originally named the American Nazi Party, which became the first well-established neo-Nazi organization in America.

The second largest organization, the American National Socialist Workers Party, was formed by William “Bill” White in 2006 after he was expelled from the National Socialist Movement. White, a Holocaust denier, spreads anti-Semitic and racist propaganda through both the Internet and radio outlets. In the forefront of the media machine, he runs the largest White supremacist Internet forum, Overthrow.com, and has also created a magazine called National Socialist: Journal of the American National Socialist Workers Party.

Skinheads

The skinhead movement began as an urban subculture in the United Kingdom during the 1960s and attracted mostly young males, who shaved their heads, wore black boots and suspenders, and obtained tattoos and piercings depicting their White power beliefs. Skinhead groups presently exist in both Europe and North America and are heavily associated with the White supremacist movement. Punk rock is one common theme the original faction shares with the current movement, although the new music has adopted lyrics espousing White power ideals.

One major group, Blood and Honour, originated from British White supremacists and grew to become international, with an extensive presence in the United States, Canada, and many European countries. Volksfront claims to represent the American chapter of the group and is also affiliated with the Hammerskins. Blood and Honour is often represented by the letters B and H, or the number 28 correlating to the letters B and H. Other groups, such as Hammerskin Nation, Keystone State Skinheads, and White Aryan Resistance, the latter founded by notorious skinhead Tom Metzger, are well known for their violent activity at home and abroad, having committed murder, firebombings, and assaults.

Prison Gangs

A high concentration of White supremacist ideology is located within correctional facilities across America. Prisons are a breeding ground for hatred because of preexisting conflicts among individuals and street gangs. The Aryan Brotherhood was formed in the 1960s in San Quentin Prison in California. Currently, the members engage in a high level of criminal activity inside and outside of the prison system. The 1998 murder of James Byrd, Jr., an African American man in Jasper, Texas, was linked to the Aryan Brotherhood. Byrd was tied up and dragged behind a pickup truck until he died. Despite this incident, the Aryan Brotherhood has become less affiliated with the White supremacist movement because of their drug trafficking actions and cooperation with the Mexican Mafia and other non-White prison gangs.

The Aryan Circle, a prominent group in Texas and other southern states, is another White supremacist prison gang involved in murder and other high-ranking criminal acts. In August 2007, both male and female Aryan Circle members were involved in the shooting death of two Louisiana detectives. Although women are not typically considered as social or intellectual equals to men by most White supremacists, they are often involved in group activities and are referred to as “featherwoods.” Both in and outside of the prison system, the group is heavily involved in the trafficking of methamphetamine.

According to the Anti-Defamation League, the Public Enemy Number 1 (PEN1) racist skinhead group has approximately 350 current documented members. PEN1 is based in California and is led by an Aryan Brotherhood associate, Donald Reed Mazza. The group recruits members both in and outside of correctional facilities in order to widen their area of accessibility. All members participate in various illegal activities, including drug trafficking, identity theft, and murder. The group has a strict policy of “Whites only” even though the association of non-Whites is allowed when conducting their illegal activities.

Lone Wolves

Although most notable individuals who ascribe to the White power ideology belong to a group, some have acted independently of a larger unit. Timothy McVeigh, the Oklahoma City bomber, supported various militia movement ideals but still preferred to operate outside of a group. After being arrested, McVeigh was found to have The Turner Diaries in his possession. A cult classic for White supremacists, The Turner Diaries was written by the founder of the National Alliance, William Pierce, under the pseudonym Andrew Macdonald. His novel depicts the overthrow of the American government and the extermination of all Jews and non-Whites. Another lone wolf, Randy Weaver, moved to Ruby Ridge, Idaho, because, he said, he believed in White separatism and wanted better religious opportunities for his family. He soon became involved with the Christian Identity movement and Richard Butler’s Aryan Nations. In 1992, Weaver, faced with federal weapons charges, was involved in a standoff with federal agents that resulted in the death of his wife and son.

Internet Activities

White supremacist activity has been expanding over the years, and the expansion is often attributed to the use of the Internet. The Internet allows White supremacist groups to reach out and express their views to a greater number of individuals at a faster rate. Many young individuals begin subscribing to the ideology or are recruited into White power groups because they are uncomfortable with their multicultural surroundings or are misfits or outcasts looking to belong to something larger to identify with. White supremacist groups often attract many young members through social networking sites such as MySpace.com, group chat functions, discussion forums, and punk band websites set up by groups. This exchange of information frequently reaches a greater number of contacts than does physical recruiting at rallies or concerts. Groups disseminate information more readily on the Internet and have the ability to discuss group progress with like-minded individuals. The progression of group growth and communication also leads to more activities, including rallies and demonstrations, which further promote the mission of each organization.

Current Activities

According to the Anti-Defamation League and other sources, recruitment efforts in groups such as the National Socialist Movement and the Ku Klux Klan have increased recently in an effort to combat the ensuing illegal immigration movement, a political and social issue that many individuals believe will greatly affect the balance of power between Whites and non-Whites in America. More violent White supremacist activity is seen to target undocumented immigrants, or alleged illegals, as the illegal immigration problem continues to be at the forefront of both the mainstream and White supremacist media reports. Growing numbers of White supremacists are engaging in numerous protests and rallies around the country, alongside other anti-illegal immigration movements such as the Minuteman Project.

Megan L. Gray and Stephanie M. Oakley

See also African Americans; Anti-Semitism; Hate Crimes; Ku Klux Klan; Ku Klux Klan Act; Lynching; Militias; Minutemen; Southern Poverty Law Center; White Gangs

Further Readings

- Adams, J., & Roscigno, V. J. (2005, December). White supremacists, oppositional culture and the World Wide Web. Social Forces, 84, 2.
- Berlet, C., & Vysotsky, S. (2006, Summer). Overview of U.S. White supremacist groups. Journal of Political and Military Sociology, 34(1), 11–48.
- George, J., & Wilcox, L. (1992). Nazis, Communists, Klansmen, and others on the fringe: Political extremism in America. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books.
- Schlatter, E. A. (2006). Aryan cowboys: White supremacists and the search for a new frontier, 1970–2000. Austin: University of Texas Press.

WHREN V. UNITED STATES

Among the issues present in this case is the concern with police encounters with citizens of interest that may be viewed as pretextual in nature. The petitioners in Whren v. United States contend that the police stop for a relatively minor motor vehicle violation was used only to justify a subsequent lawful encounter with the occupants of the vehicle to investigate potential violations of drug laws rather than the stated reason for the vehicle stop, which, in this situation, was the enforcement of the motor vehicle code. This entry describes the facts of the case and the decision of the U.S. Supreme Court. A major concern was the extent to which pretextual stops may primarily target young African American males in high-crime areas with the goal of enforcing drug and weapon offenses.

The Vehicle Stop

Michael Whren was a passenger in a vehicle driven by James L. Brown on June 10, 1993, in Washington, D.C. Brown's vehicle was pulled over by an undercover officer for a number of traffic violations, including turning without proper signal and driving at an unreasonable speed. The events leading up to the traffic stop began with police officers observing the vehicle taking too much time at a stop sign and its driver being distracted by the passenger. At the time of the traffic stop, Whren was in possession of two bags of crack cocaine and marijuana laced with PCP (phencyclidine, a hallucinogen). The drugs were observed in plain sight as the police officer approached the vehicle as it was penned in by traffic at a red light. In addition to possession and intent to distribute 50 or more grams of crack cocaine, the vehicle stop occurred in a school zone; this resulted in additional charges against Brown and Whren. Both defendants received a 14-year prison sentence for the drug offense. The admissibility of the drug evidence was challenged and eventually reached the U.S. Supreme Court.

An interesting aspect of the Whren case involved the use of unmarked police vehicles and undercover police officers in Washington, D.C., in making vehicle stops for traffic violations. For a variety of reasons, Washington, D.C., police department policy in effect at the time discouraged unmarked police vehicles from making routine traffic stops unless the nature of the traffic violation rises to the level as to pose an immediate threat to public safety. One may question whether the motor vehicle violations described in Whren rose to the level of an immediate threat to public safety although the stop eventually took place in a school zone. The officers in the Whren case stated that it was not their intention to write a summons to the driver for the moving violations, beginning with staying too long at a stop sign, but to probe why the driver caused the traffic obstruction and his motivations for the other violations, such as driving at an unreasonable rate of speed for the area.

The U.S. Supreme Court Decision

The Court noted that a traffic stop is reasonable and permissible as long as probable cause of a violation of the law existed to initiate the vehicle stop rather than the motivations of the officer for the stop. In the present case, Washington, D.C., police officers patrolling a high drug area in an unmarked police vehicle had probable cause to stop the vehicle driven by Brown. It was during that legitimate police stop that Officer Soto observed crack cocaine in Whren's hands. The evidence observed during the valid police encounter was ruled admissible in court. The petitioners in Whren advocated for a new standard for Fourth Amendment consideration in traffic stop cases based on whether a reasonable officer would have made the stop for the initial violation observed, a test that was used by two federal circuit courts at the time, rather than the eventual accepted doctrine of the U.S. Supreme Court which concerns whether the police could have made the vehicle stop.

The decision in Whren v. United States was contrasted against previous cases involving inventory searches and administrative searches that were conducted in situations absent probable cause of a specific criminal offense and, as the Court noted, amounted to a rummaging of the suspect's property. Justice Scalia points out that pretext searches conducted without probable cause are unreasonable.

The Court in the unanimous opinion in Whren found that evidence obtained during a reasonable search would be admissible in court regardless of whether that evidence was related to the original justification for the search.

Racial Profiling

Washington, D.C., experienced a dramatic problem with drug offense violations and violent crime during the early 1990s. In June 1993, Washington, D.C., had experienced a number of murders, including 10 homicides within 36 hours. A concern emerged as to whether the vehicle driven by Brown, with Whren as a passenger, was targeted by police because the occupants were African American males who may be violating drug laws. The vehicle, a Toyota Pathfinder with temporary license plates, was being driven by a youthful-looking African American male in a high drug area. Such a motivation for the stop may rise to the level of a violation of the equal protection clause due to its selective enforcement of the law against protected classes of individuals based on legally irrelevant factors. Violations of the equal protection clause, if it was supported, would not be accompanied with exclusion of the evidence in the case. It has been noted that the two Washington, D.C., police officers in the Whren case would later run into legal trouble themselves, including allegations of perjury, planting evidence, and excessive force.

The issue of pretext stops is connected to the practice of profiling suspected offenders, which dispatches the need for individualized suspicion of wrongdoing. An additional problem concerns the difficulty in adequately demonstrating a violation of equal protection. Although a disproportionate application of the law may exist, it is difficult to prove; plaintiffs would also need to demonstrate discriminatory actions in their particular case. This concern is heightened based on the disproportionate impact of drug law enforcement on racial and ethnic minorities. For example, United States v. Armstrong noted that all the defendants in the jurisdiction (Washington, D.C.) who were arrested for crack cocaine possession were African American.

David A. Mackey

See also Profiling, Racial: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives; United States v. Armstrong

Further Readings

- Johnson, K. R. (2006). The story of Whren v. United States: The song remains the same. Davis: School of Law, University of California, Davis.
- LaFave, W. R. (2004). The “routine traffic stop” from start to finish: Too much “routine,” not enough Fourth Amendment. Michigan Law Review, 102(8), 1843–1905.

WILDING

The term wilding first arose in connection with the Central Park jogger rape case in New York City in 1989 and generally refers to random crime sprees by urban youth for recreational purposes. The origins of the term are somewhat murky, but its subsequent widespread use by media outlets is well documented. The term was usually employed with distinct racial and ethnic overtones and applied to particular kinds of crimes, though its meaning and usage shifted over time. The use of the term promoted public fear of crime and contributed to racial tension in New York City during the early 1990s.

Origins

After the woman in the Central Park case, who was beaten, raped, and left for dead in a ravine, was found, police rounded up minority youth who had been in the park that night. Five boys, ages 14 to 16, were ultimately convicted of the crime and served 5 to 10 years in prison. In 2002, a man serving sentences for other violent crimes confessed to the rape, insisting that he acted alone, and DNA testing confirmed his claims. The convictions of the five boys were vacated. Although there is some debate over the actual origin of the term wilding, it probably first appeared in a New York Times article quoting a detective who reported that some of the youth brought in for questioning in the case had said the attack, and other lesser crimes in the park that night, were part of a pastime called “wilding.” Others have attributed the term to a misunderstanding between a tabloid reporter and a teenager from the same neighborhood as the accused, arguing that the youth had actually been referring to the Tone Loc song “Wild Thing.” When asked what his peers were doing that night in the park, he allegedly said they were out “going wild thing,” referring to either having fun or looking for consensual sex. The reporter may have misheard this and come up with the term wilding, in reference to the crime. Others have argued that the term was purely a deliberate invention of the police and the media. Either way, the term became the primary way of framing the Central Park jogger case and was quickly branded a new kind of urban threat. However, the term never had any basis in actual youth culture or behavior and existed solely in the realm of the media and public consciousness.

Usage and Meanings

The term wilding has no legal meaning, and its popular usage and meaning continually shifted during the jogger case and in the years following the case. As a result of popular disagreement over the meaning of wilding, the application of the term to specific incidents was often inconsistent and almost exclusively a media exercise. Although the police reported that the jogger case had nothing to do with race, and wilding initially referred only to sex crimes committed by groups of teenagers, the term quickly became racialized, and the media classified any violent crimes committed by Black and Latino youth against Whites as wilding. The term played on criminal racial stereotypes of young Black and Latino men as dangerous threats to social stability. It also invoked animalistic stereotypes of minority youth and was often combined with such terms as savages, animals, and wolf packs. The key criteria in labeling an incident wilding, in most cases, seemed to be Black and Latino teenage offenders and White victims. Critics were quick to point out that the term was rarely used to describe crimes where the offenders were White youth. Later, the media began applying the term more widely, to include minor crimes such as vandalism and street harassment. The use of the term wilding tapered off over time, and by 2000, the word was very rarely used. After the youth in the jogger case were exonerated in 2002, the term was revisited, but largely from a retrospective position.

Wilding also contributed to the popularization of the myth of the juvenile “superpredator,” which predicted that by the year 2010, the streets of America would be flooded with nearly 300,000 brutal, amoral teenage criminals who were beyond reach of social and rehabilitative programs. The superpredator myth was employed primarily as a justification for “tough on crime” policies in spite of the historic drop in crime rates during the 1990s.

Wilding and Public Fears

Public concern and reaction to wilding was greatly disproportionate to its actual threat. Constant police and media reinforcement of the idea of wilding as a new kind of criminal menace created a sense of fear and hostility in New York City residents that has been described by some as a moral panic. The framing of wilding in racial terms encouraged fear among Whites and hostility toward minority youth, who were stereotyped as an out-of-control, amoral, and dangerous class of people. Although wilding was initially viewed as a distinctly New York phenomenon, public fear and hostility toward minority youth spread outward to other metropolitan areas. The media’s selective, racialized application of the term strengthened this hostility and fear.

Monica Erling

See also Central Park Jogger; Moral Panics

Further Readings

- Hancock, L. (2003). Wolf pack: The press and the Central Park jogger. Columbia Journalism Review, 41(5), 38–42.
- Welch, M., Price, E., & Yankey, N. (2002). Moral panic over youth violence: Wilding and the manufacture of menace in the media. Youth Society, 34(1), 3–30.
- Welch, M., Price, E., & Yankey, N. (2004). Youth violence and race in the media: The emergence of “wilding” as an invention of the press. Race, Gender & Class, 11(2), 36–48.

WILLIE BOSKET LAW

The Willie Bosket Law refers to the Juvenile Offenders Act, a New York State law that lowered the age of original jurisdiction for the juvenile justice system for specific violent offenses. In effect, the law made more juvenile offenders, as young as 13, subject to the adult criminal justice system as a means of getting tough with juvenile offenders. The Willie Bosket Law predates many similar substantive changes to the juvenile justice systems in other states. This entry presents a brief description of the crimes committed by Willie Bosket that led to the passage of the law as well as an outline of the most significant changes in the area of juvenile justice concerning waivers and transfer provisions.

Bosket’s Crimes

New York dramatically changed its juvenile justice system in the wake of two homicides committed on the New York transit system by 15-year-old Willie Bosket. Public and political sentiment, as a result of the crimes, was to get tough with violent, predatory juvenile offenders. Just a short time before the two homicides and another shooting that resulted in serious injury to the victim, Bosket got into a fight with a drug dealer who was trained as a boxer. During the fight, the drug dealer fell to his death from a tenement rooftop. Bosket was charged with two counts of murder and one count of attempted murder. He pled guilty to the three felonies. The juvenile court judge administered the most punitive penalty available in the juvenile justice system, which was 5 years; Bosket would be released when he reached the age of 21. He escaped from the juvenile facility at age 16. He was sentenced to 4 years in an adult facility for the escape since he was considered an adult at age 16 under New York law. At age 20, he was returned to the juvenile facility to serve his remaining time for his original juvenile convictions. After his release, he was later convicted of attempted assault and was sentenced to 3½ to 7 years in prison. While in prison, Bosket was convicted for arson and two counts of assault. These convictions resulted in a persistent offender sentence of 25 years to life for his third felony conviction. He would later be convicted of attempted murder for stabbing a correctional officer as well as other subsequent assault charges.

Bosket's Background

Willie Bosket, Jr., was born on December 9, 1962, to Laura and Butch Bosket. At the time of his birth, Butch Bosket was in prison for a double homicide. Willie Bosket's criminal career and involvement in the criminal justice system had very striking similarities with his father's, including identical criminal charges as well as placements. From a very early age, Willie Bosket was involved in thefts and assaults. Bosket was motivated by his reputation on the streets, which rewarded violence and intimidation. Common themes of his adolescence were feelings of abandonment, such as when he was left at Bellevue Hospital and Wiltwyck (a juvenile facility), and rejection by parents. He also expressed a desire to imitate his father in terms of his criminal career. While he was in Wiltwyck, Bosket assaulted other youth, lit a youth's bed on fire, made numerous attempted and successful escapes, and assaulted staff (biting, kicking, punching, strangulation, and assault with a board with nails, pool cue stick, scissors, and chairs). The decision was finally reached to transfer Bosket from Wiltwyck to Bellevue. While at Bellevue, he also set another bed on fire with a sedated patient and assaulted staff. By age 13 he had served 3½ years in a number of juvenile institutions. Bosket had been in and out of numerous institutions as a result of escapes, transfers, and ineffective case management.

Juvenile Offender Act

The Juvenile Offender Act was passed by the state legislature in New York in 1978 during a special session following Bosket's sentencing. The act created a new legal category called juvenile offenders. These offenders, ages 13 to 15, faced adult sanctions but, because of their ages, were housed with juveniles in the juvenile justice system. New York defines the jurisdiction of its juvenile justice system for delinquent acts from age 7 for the youngest age of original jurisdiction to age 15 for the oldest age for original jurisdiction. The juvenile justice system may retain jurisdiction over juvenile offenders until their 21st birthday. Juvenile proceedings in New York are generally closed to the public.

Key Provisions

From 1992 to 1997, the majority of states made significant changes to key provisions of their juvenile justice system. In particular, 45 states made changes to their transfer provisions, which had the effect of making it easier to try youths in adult court. The most common mechanism to move juveniles from the juvenile court to the adult court was through judicial waivers. A discretionary judicial waiver is a process that relies on a judge's discretion to determine whether a juvenile is no longer amenable to treatment in the juvenile justice system and instead is deserving of a more punitive response in the adult criminal justice system. A number of the more recent juvenile justice provisions were efforts to move discretion away from the juvenile court judge and to move the discretion for the waiver decision-making process to the prosecutor. One legal mechanism to move discretion from judges to prosecutors was with concurrent jurisdiction. Concurrent jurisdiction allows a prosecutor to determine whether to file charges in the adult court or the juvenile court.

Another area of the juvenile justice system that underwent significant change during the same time period was the sentencing authority for adult and juvenile court judges. Thirty-one states made changes regarding sentencing authority. Within the category of sentencing authority changes, one example of statutory changes allowed juvenile court judges to give blended sentences; these sentences provided the legal authority for a judge to deliver both a juvenile sanction and an adult sanction for the same offense. The adult sanction would begin at the conclusion of a juvenile sanction, usually at the oldest age the juvenile justice system would retain jurisdiction over the youth. In addition, nearly all states (47 states total) made changes with regard to the confidentiality of juvenile records and proceedings. New York is among 29 states that utilize statutory exclusion as a mechanism to try juveniles as adults. In this model, judicial and prosecutorial discretion is limited by state legislative decision making that determines at what age a youth will be charged as an adult for specific charges.

Reverse Waiver System

Changes in the New York juvenile justice system predate the changes that occurred in many states during the 1990s. The intent and purpose of these changes were to make more juveniles subject to sanctions within the adult criminal justice system rather than having them remain in what was perceived as a lenient juvenile justice system. Many of these changes were the result of political and public influences that were further instigated by the actions of Bosket. Consequently, some juveniles end up in the adult system but, by the nature of their physical and emotional maturity, would be better served in the juvenile justice system. As a result, New York is among half the states that also have a reverse waiver provision. A reverse waiver is a mechanism to transfer youths from the adult criminal justice system to the juvenile justice system. Reverse waivers can provide some mechanism to provide more individualized response for youth who fall under statutory exclusion laws, for example, youth who are physically and emotionally immature as well as youth who would benefit from the treatment philosophy of the juvenile justice system.

David A. Mackey

See also Family and Delinquency; Juvenile Waivers to Adult Court; Violent Crime; Violent Juvenile Offenders

Further Readings

- Butterfield, B. (1995). All God's children: The Bosket family and the American tradition of violence. New York: Knopf.
- Snyder, H. N., & Sickmund, M. (2006). Juvenile offenders and victims: 2006 national report. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention.
- Tanenhaus, D. S., & Drizin, S. A. (2002). "Owing to the extreme youth of the accused": The changing legal response to juvenile homicide. Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology, 92(3-4), 641-705.

WILMINGTON TEN

The Wilmington Ten were those arrested, tried, wrongfully convicted, and incarcerated for arson and for firing guns at responding emergency personnel during a violent 1971 episode in the North Carolina seaport, following sudden school desegregation in 1969. Although the 1954 U.S. Supreme Court decision in Brown v. Board of Education had struck down the "separate but equal" ruling of Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), many southern school boards resisted integration for over a decade before it was finally instituted. Wrongfully convicted of violent crimes, the Wilmington Ten—eight Black high school students, a Black minister of the United Church of Christ, and a White female social worker—were actually victims of the racial and political turmoil during America's civil rights era.

Wilmington's modern racial unrest began when Martin Luther King, Jr., who was scheduled to visit Wilmington on April 4, 1968, instead stayed in Memphis, Tennessee, after violence erupted there, and was killed that day. Black high school students in Wilmington peacefully protested King's murder on April 5, but 3 days of rioting followed, with order restored only when 150 National Guardsmen occupied the city.

Until 1969 Wilmington had three high schools: all-White New Hanover and Hoggard and all-Black Williston Industrial. When desegregation came in the summer of 1969, Black students and teachers were reassigned to New Hanover and Hoggard, while Williston was summarily closed (later to become a junior high school). The closure of Williston stunned the Black community, which had taken great pride in the school. Blacks' sudden presence in the formerly all-White schools brought resentment from both sides. Blacks who had been active in athletics and clubs at Williston were excluded from sports teams and clubs at New Hanover and Hoggard high schools. Taunts and attacks resulted in fights, and police presence was constant. High school unrest became citywide and included rioting and arson, including the burning of the school board's building.

In January 1971, hundreds of Black students boycotted the schools. The White pastor of Gregory Congregational United Church of Christ, Eugene Templeton, offered his integrated church as a gathering place and school alternative. On February 1, 1971, the national United Church of Christ's Commission on Racial Justice sent the young Reverend Benjamin Chavis to Wilmington to organize and provide structure for the students. Chavis, sporting a large Afro, delivered fiery speeches denouncing segregation and demanding social justice. Images of Chavis speaking and crowds of Black youth responding with raised fists dominated local news.

Soon members of a White supremacist group, The Rights of White People (ROWP), a Ku Klux Klan affiliate, arrived. Heavily armed, the ROWP held Klan-like meetings in a public park, ratcheting up tension. Black protesters marched repeatedly to City Hall, requesting a citywide curfew to stop the gunfire that nightriders aimed at the Gregory church. (One night, a Black witness counted over 30 cars with White occupants circling Gregory church.) Curfew was denied.

On February 6, 1971, Mike's Grocery, a convenience store a few hundred yards from Gregory church, was firebombed. Responding police and firefighters were met with sniper fire, which they returned, killing a Black teenager with a gun, Steve Mitchell, in an alley near the store. There was a perception that snipers were in or near the church. The next day a White man with a pistol, Harvey Cumber, was killed in his truck near the church by persons unknown. Rumors of guns, dynamite, and bomb-making in Gregory church circulated. Mayor Williams requested assistance from the National Guard and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, and a curfew was finally declared.

By March, police had compiled a list of 16 suspected to have either conspired or participated in the firebombing and shooting. Ultimately 10 were arrested and convicted of felonious burning and conspiracy to assault responding emergency personnel, based on the testimony of three Black teenagers. The Wilmington Ten—nine Black men (Benjamin Chavis, Willie Vereen, Wayne Moore, Marvin Patrick, William "Joe" Wright, Reginald Epps, Connie Tindall, James McKoy, and Jerry Jacobs) and a White social worker (Anne Sheppard Turner) were sentenced. All were high school students except Chavis and Turner. Their story gained international attention as Amnesty International publicized and protested their status as political prisoners. Writer James Baldwin, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Andrew Young, and many others condemned their convictions and long sentences. In 1978, thousands of protesters marched in Washington, D.C., demanding the release of the Wilmington Ten.

North Carolina Governor James Hunt commuted their sentences in 1978 but refused to pardon them. Although he refused to release them, he did reduce their sentences in 1978. By 1979, all the Wilmington Ten had been released. In 1980, the U.S. Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals voided the convictions on the basis of prosecutorial misconduct by Assistant District Attorney Jay Stroud, who coached and bribed the witnesses and altered the written statement of the primary witness, Allan Hall. Three key witnesses had also recanted.

Elizabeth Hines

See also African Americans; Ku Klux Klan; Media Portrayals of African Americans; Political Prisoners; Race Riots; Racism; Sentencing Disparities, African Americans

Further Readings

- Chavis v. State of North Carolina, 637 F.2d 213 (4th Cir. 1980).
- Fraker, S. (with Smith, V. E., & Lee, E. D.). (1978, July 31). US political prisoners? Newsweek, p. 23. Retrieved from <http://web.mit.edu/esg-conscience/www/rest/mmr-young.shtml>
- Grimsley, W. (2003). Jim Hunt's political prisoners: The Wilmington Ten and the Charlotte Three. In James B. Hunt: A North Carolina progressive (pp. 137–158). Jefferson, NC: McFarland.
- King, W. (1978, December 3). The case against the Wilmington Ten. New York Times Magazine.
- Reaves, W. M. (1998). Strength through struggle: The chronological and historical record of the African American community in Wilmington, North Carolina, 1865–1950. Wilmington: New Hanover County Public Library.
- Tyson, T. (2004). Blood done sign my name. New York: Crown.

WILSON, GENARLOW (1986–)

Wilson v. State was a case involving a Genarlow “Genardo” Wilson, a high school senior in Georgia who was convicted of aggravated child molestation. He served more than 2 years before the Georgia Supreme Court found his sentence “cruel and unusual” and ordered his release. Wilson is an African American, and his victims were White females. His experience has been widely criticized as an example of racial bias in the criminal justice system.

In 2003, Wilson was a 17-year-old senior at Douglas County High School in Douglasville, Georgia. He had everything going for him: He was an honor student, star athlete, and homecoming king. That year, Wilson attended a New Year’s Eve party in a Douglasville, Georgia, hotel room that was later investigated by police. The police found evidence at the hotel room of drinking and sexual activities—alcohol containers and condoms were left in the room from the night before. The police also found a video camera that contained footage of Wilson having sexual intercourse with a 17-year-old female and oral sex with a 15-year-old female. The 17-year-old accused Wilson of rape, and the police charged him with the crime. The video footage did show that the girl appeared to be sleepy or intoxicated; however, the girl never said the word “no” on the video. The 15-year-old female maintained that the oral sex with Wilson was consensual. Wilson maintained that the sexual activities with both girls were consensual. Nevertheless he was charged with sex crimes at a time when there was increased national attention on these types of offenses.

Trial

Wilson’s case went to trial in February 2005. He was charged with two counts: rape of the 17-year-old female and aggravated child molestation of the 15-year-old. The jury acquitted him of raping the older girl; however, they convicted him of the charge involving the oral sex with the 15-year-old, despite the 15-year-old’s repeated claims that the oral sex was consensual. However, under Georgia law at that time, the age of consent for that act was 16. Since Wilson was 17 and the 15-year-old was a minor, the jury found him guilty of aggravated child molestation. The mandatory minimum sentence for aggravated child molestation in Georgia is 10 years, while the maximum sentence is 30 years.

The trial court gave Wilson an 11-year sentence, 10 to be served in prison and 1 year to be served on probation. Under the terms of the sentence, Wilson also would have been required to register as a sex offender after his release. Such registration would have required that he provide officials with his new address, fingerprints, his social security number, and a photograph, among other things, and update this information annually throughout his lifetime. The requirement reflected the concerns that had led to the enactment of Megan’s Law legislation to deter sex crimes. Many states and localities have very strict laws that allow monitoring of sex offenders who are released into the community after serving their sentence. (“Megan’s Law” refers to both the federal Sexual Offender Act of 1994 and the various state laws that were passed requiring registration of sexual offenders and community notification concerning their place of residence.)

After the trial, some of the jury members admitted to not knowing that the verdict Wilson received could result in such a harsh punishment. An irony of Wilson’s case is that if he and the 15-year-old girl had engaged in sexual intercourse rather than oral sex, Wilson would have been charged with a misdemeanor and would not have had to register as a sex offender. After his conviction, the loophole in the law that allowed this distinction was eliminated, changing the offense to a misdemeanor carrying a maximum sentence of 1 year in prison. Some of the legislators admitted that the law was intended to safeguard women and children from sexual predators, not to police teen sex. Wilson appealed the conviction twice to the Georgia Supreme Court; however, the court refused to hear the case both times, stating that the new legislation passed could not be applied retroactively.

Habeas Corpus

Wilson’s attorney filed a writ of habeas corpus, arguing that Wilson was imprisoned unlawfully. In June 2007, the Superior Court of Monroe County of Georgia reduced Wilson's sentence to a misdemeanor aggravated child molestation. The court also ordered that his name not be put on the sex offender registry and resentenced him to 12 months, allowing time served to count. The ruling judge, in reaction to Wilson's case, admitted that the case was an example of injustice. Wilson's attorneys filed an appeal because the state would not release him on bail, and the State Attorney General, Thurbert Baker, also filed an appeal challenging the reduction of Wilson's sentence and his release.

Wilson v. State

The Georgia State Supreme Court, on October 26, 2007, upheld the lower court's ruling and ordered his release from prison, holding that Wilson's sentence constituted cruel and unusual treatment. The Supreme Court held that in its ruling on habeas corpus, the lower court had erred in convicting and sentencing Wilson. The high court ordered the habeas corpus court to reverse Wilson's conviction and sentence and release him from custody. The majority opinion of the judges was that the sentence Mr. Wilson received was grossly disproportionate for his crime.

Reactions

Wilson had served 2½ years of his sentence by the time he was freed from prison. The race of the defendant in this case and how he was treated are hard to ignore. Former U.S. President Jimmy Carter questioned whether race had played a role in Mr. Wilson's treatment, given that White defendants had received lesser punishments for the same conduct as Wilson's. Black leaders have also criticized the way the case was handled.

Kendra Bowen

See also Crime Statistics and Reporting; Disproportionate Incarceration; Sentencing Disparities, African Americans

Further Readings

Supreme Court of Georgia. (2007). Wilson v. The State. Retrieved from <http://www.gasupreme.us/pdf/s07a1481.pdf>

WORK, MONROE NATHAN (1866–1945)

Monroe Nathan Work was one of the first African American sociologists in the history of the United States. His work was derived from his vision of enlightening both African Americans and Whites about African American history and the causes of African American criminal offending. In his research, Work sought to eradicate some of the false assumptions held about African Americans. His extensive research showed that endemic African American criminality was a myth. Work used sociological research to explain that African Americans were not inferior to White Americans as previously perceived. Using knowledge as a means to advance the status of African Americans in America, he campaigned for improving African American health, exposing lynching, and using interracial cooperation to impart knowledge.

Work is best known for compiling comprehensive information about African Americans in his publication of A Bibliography of the Negro in Africa and America (1928). He provided information about the life of African Americans, including their employment, religion, living conditions, marital status, and criminal offending. He suggested that there appeared to be a relationship between the social condition of African Americans, specifically economics, and crime. Work published numerous research articles that used quantitative data to illustrate the criminal offending rates of African Americans. In his research, Work supposed that African American crime was typically the result of African Americans' economic condition. Work noted that criminal offending of African Americans was sanctioned much more harshly than offenses committed by Whites. Specifically, Work noted how the convict-lease system exploited African Americans.

Work lived in an extraordinary period in African American history. He was born only a few years after the Emancipation Proclamation, at the height of racial ignorance, lynching, and segregation. He endured pervasive, overt racism that was ever-present during his lifetime. His research challenged the status quo by informing and educating American society of the prejudice and discrimination endured by African Americans. He was a member of several professional associations and published numerous research articles on the causes and extent of African American crime.

Background

Monroe Work was born August 15, 1866, in North Carolina to ex-slaves. He worked on the family farm before beginning his high school education at the age of 23. Work entered the Chicago Theological School and worked briefly as a Methodist minister before beginning his formal education. He received a bachelor's degree in philosophy in 1902 and a master's degree in sociology in 1903. In 1900, Work became the first African American to be published in the American Journal of Sociology. The publication focused on African American crime in the city of Chicago. Work developed an interest in African culture and began to conduct research in the area under the direction of University of Chicago professor W. I. Thomas. Work completed his graduate work at the University of Chicago. He was the first African American to receive a master's degree from the university. The University of Chicago's sociology department was pioneering during its time, as the paradigm of both sociological and criminological thought shifted from explaining crime using personal and genetic characteristics to explanations involving the social structure and the physical environment. Monroe Work used research to illustrate the plight of the African American, thus increasing awareness of how the social structure and the physical environment were used as tools in the oppression of African Americans.

Research Contributions

From 1903 to 1908, Work served as a faculty member at Georgia State Industrial College in Savannah, Georgia. He became disenchanted with the treatment of African Americans in the Deep South. The passage of the Jim Crow laws in 1906 further dismayed Work and encouraged him to pursue more extensive African American research. During his tenure, he continued his African culture studies and began working on his soon-to-be best-known work, A Bibliography of the Negro in Africa and America. In 1908, Work accepted a position at the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute and later became the director of records and research. Although he was employed to maintain existing research and analyze statistics, Work used his position as a platform to educate and produce writings that exposed the segregation, discrimination, and White supremacy that perpetuated everyday African American life. In 1912, Work produced the first edition of the Negro Year Book. The Negro Year Book, founded and edited between the years 1912 and 1938, examined sentencing disparities, police brutality, and juvenile rates of offending. The Negro Year Book was a comprehensive reference of African American works and was expanded to include bibliographies of Africa.

Work devoted much time and effort to ascertain the excessive use of lynching in the South. African Americans who were charged with rape were typically hanged, and racially motivated lynching of African Americans generally stemmed from the assumption that African Americans raped White women because they sexually craved and desired White women. Work believed that unmasking racial stereotypes would help to ease racial tensions and reveal the truth behind lynching. Thus, he presented facts to illustrate that the lynching of African Americans was used as a tactic to terrorize African Americans, that lynching was used as an institutionalized method of social control orchestrated by racist Whites to threaten African Americans and maintain the status quo.

After the Civil War, lynchings were pervasive in the South. To expose and publicize the prevalence of lynching, Work provided data on lynching to two rival newspapers so that they could compete against one another to reveal the statistics. By 1915, Work's lynching reports were published in the World Almanac. During his work at the Tuskegee Institute, Work produced the Tuskegee Lynching Report. The report provided information on all lynchings, regardless of the victim's race. Work recorded all incidents in the Tuskegee Lynching Report, which included indictments, convictions, and sentencing data. The reports also provided specific information such as grisly details and murders of innocent individuals.

A Bibliography of the Negro in Africa and America is Work's most revered piece of research.

The bibliography has 17,000 entries and 74 chapters with pages 1–247 focusing on Africa and pages 251–660 focusing on African Americans. He recorded the African American experience by creating a comprehensive reference. His works provided a context for understanding crime within a sociological and historical context. The bibliography included data from numerous sources, including periodicals, books, official documents, and government reports. The research is very inclusive, as Work traveled to Europe to obtain data on Africa and African people. The bibliography includes information on African American history, business, crime, culture, art, and literature. The work has been widely used in research. Work had many research interests and published a number of works on race relations, lynching, family, and African American health.

Influence

Although Work used scholarly research to increase African American awareness, he also invested time in the community through his participation in the Niagara movement. The Niagara movement was a revolutionary movement by African Americans to publicly oppose the African American condition and end racial discrimination. The movement provided a platform for discussing issues that directly impacted African American life. In 1905, Work's interest in increasing African American health care awareness resulted in the creation of a Men's Sunday Club in Savannah, Georgia. The Men's Sunday Club organized a health campaign drive to increase access to health care information and services. As a result of Work's interest in promoting general health care, African Americans were given access to medical doctors, dentists, and health care educators. Health care information was presented during Sunday morning worship so that all African Americans, regardless of class, could receive access to such critical, life-sustaining information. During this period, African Americans suffered from myriad disadvantages, including high mortality rates, poverty, substandard living conditions, poor diets, and inadequate access to health care. Inadequate housing and health care for African Americans resulted in many deaths from chronic and infectious disease. Work suggested that life expectancy could increase with adequate health and sanitation. The club meetings, with the support of Booker T. Washington, prompted the beginning of Negro Health Week, which, in 1915, became National Negro Health Week. Work's efforts and determination resulted in Negro Health Week becoming a national campaign with involvement from the federal government. There were several activities in place to educate African Americans about good health practices. The health week included such activities as school health, sanitation, general cleanup, and health week sermons. Work stressed the importance of African American health and appealed to Whites, citing economic loss for illness and death as a direct result of poor health. Work's perseverance resulted in a large decrease in the death rate of African Americans. Further, the life span of African Americans increased approximately 7 years as a result of Work's hard work.

Legacy

Monroe Nathan Work was regarded as a quiet, peaceful advocate for racial equality. He used scholarly research, statistics, history, periodicals, and official documents to create a monument of factual information that has been used to gain insight into African Americans. He worked with two of the most influential African American leaders of the early 20th century: Booker T. Washington and W. E. B. Du Bois. Washington and Du Bois had opposing views of how to improve the African American condition. Although he worked with both men, Work used his own methods to eradicate discrimination and prejudice. He used information as a knowledge base to both educate about the injustices that occurred in African American daily life and bring to light the intricate beauty and uniqueness that is ever-present in African American culture. Work's research has proven to be a valuable and insightful resource. It is a comprehensive record of factual information about African American life.

Traqina Quarles Emeka

See also Atlanta University School of Sociological Research; Chicago School of Sociology; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Lynching

Further Readings

- Gabbidon, S. L., Greene, H. T., & Young, V. D. (2002). African American classics in criminology and criminal justice. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
- Greene, H. T., & Gabbidon, S. L. (2000). African American criminological thought. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Guzman, J. P. (1949). Monroe Nathan Work and his contributions: Background and preparation for life's career. The Journal of Negro History, 34, 428–461.
- McMurry, L. O. (1985). Recorder of the Black experience: A biography of Monroe Nathan Work. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press.
- Quinn, S. C., & Thomas, S. B. (2001). The National Negro Health Week, 1915 to 1951: A descriptive account. Minority Health Today, 2, 44–49.

WRONGFUL CONVICTIONS

Wrongful conviction can be defined as an instance in which a person is tried and convicted for a crime he or she did not commit. Although wrongful convictions may not be commonplace in the United States, such convictions nevertheless do occur, and those who are wrongfully convicted, as well as their families, experience a variety of negative consequences. In the most extreme case, wrongful conviction of a capital offense can lead to wrongful execution of the death sentence.

When someone is wrongfully convicted of a crime, the actual offender is likely to remain free and commit further crimes. In this way the occurrence of a wrongful conviction has the potential to affect every person living in the United States, whether he or she is the wrongfully convicted, a relative of the wrongfully convicted, or simply an individual who is victimized by a criminal who remained free due to the conviction of an innocent person. This entry presents an account of wrongful convictions in the United States, based on empirical studies and statistical evidence. The factors that contribute to wrongful convictions, the frequency of wrongful conviction in the United States, and consequences of wrongful conviction are also examined. Of particular importance in the context of this encyclopedia is that minority individuals, especially African Americans, are more likely than Whites to be wrongfully convicted; the reasons for this disparity are also discussed in this entry.

Factors Contributing to Wrongful Conviction

Research has shown that a variety of errors that may occur within the criminal justice system have resulted in the wrongful conviction of innocent persons. Typically, such factors work in tandem rather than being the sole cause of a wrongful conviction.

Coerced Confessions

The first factor contributing to the wrongful conviction of innocent persons is the incidence of coerced confessions. A coerced confession can occur when police interrogators begin by encouraging the suspect to feel confident about him- or herself but quickly shift to making the suspect's legal situation seem hopeless. Interrogators might begin by claiming their belief in the suspect's innocence but ultimately explain to the suspect that he or she is looking at prison time, or even execution, unless he or she admits guilt and works out a deal with the district attorney. Because confessions are commonly considered to be the most credible evidence of an individual's guilt, the effect that a coerced confession might have on a person's chance of being wrongfully convicted is significant.

Inadequate Assistance of Counsel

A second factor frequently involved in the wrongful conviction of an innocent person is inadequate representation by counsel during trial. Because many individuals cannot afford to hire an attorney, they are often forced to rely on public defenders to handle their cases. Public defenders frequently possess huge caseloads, a minimal budget with which to prepare defenses for clients, and receive insufficient monetary compensation. For these reasons, many public defenders have neither the resources nor the motivation to prepare an effective and sufficient defense for indigent clients. Some defense attorneys even plead defendants guilty without having properly investigated the case or interviewed the defendants in the case. When defense attorneys fail to make a satisfactory effort to establish their client's innocence, the chance of a wrongful conviction is greatly increased. Because minority individuals are much more likely to be of low socioeconomic status, they are also more likely to be affected by inadequate assistance of counsel. Thus, minority individuals are more likely than their White counterparts to be wrongfully convicted.

Unethical Actions by Police Officers and Prosecutors

Unethical actions by police officers and prosecutors also contribute to wrongful convictions. Law enforcement officers and prosecutors are entrusted with much power and discretionary authority in making arrests and charging individuals. Consequently, it is possible that a dishonest individual in such a position may arrest or charge a person even if he or she is factually innocent. Such officials may claim that they are removing dangerous criminals from the streets when, in fact, they are likely doing more to exacerbate the crime problem by using unethical and illegal methods to "put away" individuals who are innocent. Police officers or prosecutors may justify such unethical behavior by the rationale that, although the individual may not have committed the crime in question, he or she is most likely guilty of another crime anyway. Such unethical and illegal actions by police officers and prosecutors are more frequent in situations involving high-profile crimes, which involve a great deal of public pressure to make an arrest or conviction. The problem of unethical actions by police officers and prosecutors is far from insignificant, according to a study by C. Ronald Huff, former president of the American Society of Criminology, which showed that 63% of cases concerning subsequent exonerations on the basis of DNA evidence had involved such actions.

Eyewitness Identification Error

Although it is often unintentional, eyewitness identification error is the factor most often associated with the occurrence of wrongful convictions. Seventy-nine percent of DNA exonerations examined in Huff's study were based, at least in part, on eyewitness identification error. A similar study by Barry Scheck, Peter Neufeld, and Jim Dwyer showed that as many as 84% of DNA exonerations involved eyewitness identification error. Much literature has been generated concerning the appropriate ways in which to conduct police lineups in order to ensure fairness to all suspects, as well as eyewitness perception and the fact that it can be significantly influenced by systemic, cultural, societal, and psychological factors. Despite all of this, the general public, as well as the jurors serving on various cases at trial, are still apt to believe that eyewitnesses are one of the most credible sources of evidence against a defendant, since these individuals were at the scene and observed the events that occurred. The effect of eyewitness identification error on the likelihood of wrongful convictions is undeniable. It is also important to note that minority individuals, in particular African Americans, are more likely to be misidentified by witnesses. As such, the effects of eyewitness identification error are significantly worsened for minority individuals.

Inappropriate Use of Informants

Another contributing factor to wrongful convictions is inappropriate use of informants. Jailhouse informants are often willing to make false claims about their knowledge of an accused individual's guilt in exchange for some type of personal benefit. Although prosecutors should, and often do, remain skeptical of any information that a convicted criminal provides, there are still those prosecutors who are willing to overlook the informant's prior history and put their skepticism aside in order to gain a more promising chance at a conviction, especially in the instance of a high-profile case. Such weak and fabricated evidence is often adequate in contributing to a conviction since its validity is rarely tested in court. It is estimated that inappropriate use of informants is a contributing factor in approximately 21% of DNA exoneration cases in the United States.

Plea Bargaining

Plea bargaining is also a significant contributing factor in cases of wrongful conviction. Because so many cases are plea bargained and never have the chance to go to trial, police have learned that it is unlikely their evidence will be tested in the courtroom; thus the importance of such police work is greatly undermined. Consequently, carelessness and negligence in the collection of important crime scene evidence may be viewed as acceptable, so that the chance of detaining the actual criminal is lessened significantly, in turn making a wrongful conviction more likely.

Fraud, Incompetence, and Forensic Error

The final factors contributing to the wrongful conviction of innocent persons are fraud, incompetence, and forensic error. Although advances in forensic technology may be beneficial in improving the precision of the criminal justice system, the control, training, and sometimes the ethics of individuals working in crime labs may be deficient. DNA analyses are relied upon quite heavily in order to exonerate wrongfully convicted persons, and there are instances in which human subjectivity as well as the incompetent, unethical, and unprofessional behavior of some individuals employed in crime labs have affected the outcome of DNA analyses, resulting in wrongful convictions of innocent individuals.

Wrongful Conviction and DNA Technology

All of the factors previously mentioned, usually collaboratively, contribute to wrongful convictions. Yet, the question of the frequency of wrongful convictions remains. The advent of sophisticated DNA technology in the past decade has contributed to an increase in DNA exonerations, shedding some light on the number of wrongful convictions that may occur within the criminal justice system. Although it is not possible to ascertain the exact number of wrongful convictions that may occur in a given year, it is estimated that wrongful convictions occur in less than 5% of cases in the United States.

Increased awareness of wrongful convictions as a result of the increasing number of DNA exonerations has led to new hope for those wrongfully convicted of crimes. In 1992, Barry C. Scheck and Peter Neufeld created the Innocence Project, a nonprofit legal clinic. The project is a national litigation and public policy organization dedicated to the exoneration of wrongfully convicted people through DNA testing and the improvement of the criminal justice system to prevent further wrongful convictions. Dedicated law students handle the cases, supervised by attorneys and clinical staff. Over the past decade the Innocence Project became a founding member of the Innocence Network, which enlists a group of law schools, journalism schools, and public defender offices across the country to assist inmates in trying to prove their innocence. The Innocence Network also consults with legislators and law enforcement officials at the state, local, and federal levels, conducts research and training, produces scholarship, and proposes a number of recommendations to prevent wrongful convictions.

Consequences of Wrongful Conviction

Individuals wrongfully convicted, as well as their families, suffer numerous negative consequences aside from a loss of freedom. The wrongfully convicted and his or her family experience tremendous financial and emotional strain. Many wrongfully convicted individuals spend years in prison and experience anger, fear, and trauma. Many children of wrongfully convicted individuals develop psychological and social problems due to their experiences and are frequently alienated by other children. There is also a good chance that the wrongfully convicted will experience some degree of victimization during imprisonment.

The wrongfully convicted almost always experience the same social stigma as those individuals who were factually guilty of the crime for which they were convicted. Even when wrongfully convicted individuals are exonerated of guilt, many people will remain wary of them; maintaining personal bonds or finding employment after a wrongful conviction can be extremely difficult. Additionally, those individuals absolved of the original charges and released from prison must readjust to society after having fallen behind socially, psychologically, and economically during their imprisonment. Such obstacles can be quite complicated to overcome.

Amanda K. Cox

See also African Americans; Discrimination–Disparity Continuum; Disproportionate Arrests; Disproportionate Incarceration; Disproportionate Minority Contact and Confinement; DNA Profiling; Innocence Project; John Jay College Center on Race, Crime and Justice

Further Readings

- Aprille, J. V., II. (2004). Convicting the innocent: An instructional issue. Criminal Justice, 18, 50–51.
- Denov, M., Campbell, K., & Huff, C. R. (2004). Wrongful convictions: Perspectives, experiences, and implications for justice. Canadian Journal of Criminology and Criminal Justice, 46, 101–217.
- Huff, C. R. (2002). Wrongful conviction and public policy: The American society of criminology 2001 presidential address. Criminology: An Interdisciplinary Journal, 40, 1–18.
- Leo, R. A., & Ofshe, R. J. (1998). The consequences of false confessions: Deprivations of liberty and miscarriages of justice in the age of psychological interrogation. Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology, 88, 429–497.
- Poveda, T. G. (2001). Estimating wrongful convictions. Justice Quarterly, 18, 689–708.
- Radelet, M. L. (2002). Wrongful conviction of the innocent. Judicature, 86, 67–121.
- Roberts, P. C. (2003). The causes of wrongful conviction. Independent Review, 7, 567–575.
- Scheck, B., Neufeld, P., & Dwyer, J. (Eds.). (2000). Actual innocence. New York: Doubleday.

YOUTH GANGS

Youth gangs constitute a different subculture in American society. They have existed for years among virtually all ethnic groups, and they continue to expand, recruit, and commit a variety of illegal offenses in diverse neighborhoods across the country. While there has been a problem in social science research with defining gangs, a list of general characteristics for youth gangs has survived from the onset of the 20th century to the present day. Those characteristics include age, clothing, symbols, and deviant behavior. Youth gangs differ from adult gangs not only with respect to characteristics such as age, symbols, and clothing but also in terms of the relationships between members.

Youth associate with each other for legitimate and non-gang-related relations, including social, educational, and sports-related activities. Some youth associate with each other because they share the same religious or ethnic interests, which may increase their comfort level in certain settings or in certain neighborhoods. Youth have a natural tendency to want to associate with each other as part of the growing-up process. Alternatively, youth who are loners are often characterized as maladjusted and therefore warrant suspicion as to potential future violent behavior, as evidenced by recent school shootings. Some youth form groups to promote legitimate activities and have no interest in participating in deviant behavior; therefore, it is important not to generalize all youth who belong to social groups as gang members.

Generalizations and stereotypes about gang members can increase at times and in neighborhoods when crime rates spiral upward. Such stereotyping is further fueled by media hype of impending crime, like coverage of the superpredator myths during the 1980s and 1990s that caused the public to exhibit greater fear of its youth with the age. The media were assisted in the creation of hysteria and fear of gang crime by police who responded to the much touted “War on Drugs,” which concentrated its efforts in the inner cities and urban areas where a majority of low-income minority youth resided. If more than two youths congregated on a street corner, they were considered gang members, interrogated, and on many occasions detained for further police processing. Concern about youth gangs, that is, moral panic, is precipitated by concern for important issues in decaying urban and city areas. The preoccupation with youth gangs has in the 21st century been almost exclusively focused on African Americans and Hispanic youth.

Today youth gang refers to a youth or adolescent group concerned with status, prestige, and turf protection. Typically, the gang has a name, has a location, is relatively well organized, and persists over time. Youth gangs often have a leadership structure that is either explicit or implicit, codes of conduct, colors, special dress, signs, and symbols. Youth gangs can vary across time in terms of age, gender, community, race, and ethnicity, in addition to scope of delinquent or criminal activities. Variations of youth gangs exist. A posse or a crew is characterized by commitment to criminal activity for economic gain, which oftentimes involves drug trafficking. Historically, youth gangs were mostly males who engaged in deviant behavior, particularly turf battles and gang fights. The gender roles of gang members have changed in recent years. While female gang activity has not reached the level of that of their male counterparts, female violent gang activity is not significantly different, nor are their reasons for joining gangs significantly different, from those of males. For males and females gang membership entails belonging, self-esteem, protection, and fulfillment of a need to belong to a family. It appears that some female gang members face the additional stigma of being poor, minority, and female.

Youth gangs, male and female, have reportedly become increasingly more violent in recent years. They are involved in major crimes; however, it has become difficult to identify what constitutes gang-related offenses or crimes. Law enforcement has been given the responsibility of such definitions, which may change according to respective agencies that have different procedures for identification of crime categories. Some law enforcement agencies do not distinguish delinquent acts from criminal offenses, while others have separate categories for gang-on-gang violence. Other law enforcement agencies categorize some youth gangs as more violent than others.

Youth gangs are often categorized by ethnicity, race, and class. Hispanic youth gangs have traditionally had a presence in California and other entry points to the United States. Some persist from one generation to another. One of the earliest recognized youth gangs in this country, with a 50-year history, is the Mexican American gang in southern California commonly referred to as Chicanos, yet this group did not have its origin as a youth gang. The Chicanos began as a sports- and church-related group of boys who subsequently developed over the years as youth gangs intended to protect families when men from their community were drafted into World War II. The tradition of gang membership was passed down from one generation of younger boys to the next, with increasingly delinquent behavior as a staple of its existence.

The Chicano youth gangs did not operate as the only gangs in the United States. Historically, youth gangs of Asian descent evolved as immigrant youth who had formed gangs within their own home countries continued the same behavior upon arriving in the United States. Earlier, Asian youth gangs were responsible for a variety of property offenses; however, they eventually graduated to more serious crimes involving home invasions and drug offenses. These gangs have presented particular problems for law enforcement due to their more secretive nature. Vietnamese youth who immigrated in large numbers to the United States at the end of the Vietnam War arrived with few skills, an inability to speak the language, and increased frustration at their apparent inability to assimilate into the American culture. They formed youth gangs. Asian gangs preyed upon their own communities in large part because other Vietnamese were fearful of law enforcement. As youth committed auto thefts, burglaries, extortion, and other forms of violence, little reporting of their activities was conducted. Unlike African American and Hispanic youth gangs, Asian youth did not claim turf or wear colors or exhibit symbols; therefore, it has been difficult for law enforcement to gain an exact assessment of their number or the true extent of their delinquent or criminal behavior. Similarly, Chinese youth gangs originated in China, yet a majority of the membership today was born in the United States. These youth often operated out of legitimate businesses while engaged in violent behavior. They too preyed more upon their own communities due to a sense of fear and vulnerability instilled in the community not to report the gang's behavior to law enforcement. Chinese youth gangs have more recently been involved in human smuggling in addition to other violent offenses that are similar to activity of Hispanic youth gangs.

African American youth gangs are older and larger than the media hype that suggested that the late Tookie Williams was responsible for the growth of youth gangs such as the Bloods and Crips in Los Angeles. Though Williams was influential in early gang activity, these two gangs have expanded far beyond California in recent decades and exist in major cities across the country. They are associated with violence such as drug dealing accompanied by drive-by shootings without regard to age or circumstances of victims.

While law enforcement traditionally targeted minority group gang membership, White youth gangs provided a violent element to the community. White youth known as skinheads are not all avowed racists, as has been depicted in the media. Some gangs advocate White supremacy while other groups have multiracial memberships. Some youth skinheads, known as the Aryan Brotherhood, have as their mission the elimination of minority groups.

While research suggests that youth gangs exist in most racial and ethnic groups today, the nature and extent of youth gangs remains one of the most perplexing problems facing law enforcement, social service agencies, and researchers. Without a clear definition of youth gangs, there is a distinct danger of misidentifying youth who associate with each other for the sole purpose of being teenagers as opposed to those who associate for delinquent reasons. The lack of a uniform youth gang definition also prohibits a clear delineation between troublesome youth gangs and adult criminal organizations. In order to resolve real and perceived youth gang threats within communities and make the best use of law enforcement resources, consensus must be reached as to what constitutes a youth gang. Without such a definition, there is a risk that some youth will continue to be stereotyped, even with innocent teenage behavior, and law enforcement will concentrate its efforts on the wrong groups at the expense of true crime fighting.

Elvira White

See also African American Gangs; Asian American Gangs; Latino Gangs; White Gangs

Further Readings

- Ball, R. A., & Curry, G. D. (1995). The logic of definition in criminology: Purposes and methods for defining "gangs." Criminology, 33, 225.
- Huff, C. R. (1989). Youth gangs and public policy. Crime & Delinquency, 35, 524-537.
- Hughes, L. (2005). Studying youth gangs. Journal of Contemporary Criminal Justice, 21, 98-119.
- Knox, G. W. (1994). An introduction to gangs. Lima, OH: Wyndham Hall Press.
- Sense, F. A., Winfred, L. T., Jr., He, N., & Taylor, T. J. (2001). Youth gangs and definitional issues: When is a gang a gang, and why does it matter? Crime & Delinquency, 47, 105-130.
- Sheldon, R. G., Tracey, S. K., & Brown, W. B. (2004). Youth gangs in American society. Belmont, CA: Thomson-Wadsworth.

YOUTH GANGS, PREVENTION OF

Race and ethnicity have significant implications for the prevention of youth gangs. Structural factors that researchers identify as predicting risk of gang formation include minority segregation among the urban underclass. In addition, many of the named gangs, such as the Bloods, Crips, and Latin Kings, fall along racial and ethnic lines.

Efforts to prevent youth gangs are impaired by several factors. First of all, society and law enforcement have struggled to adequately define youth gangs. Second, the line between youth gangs and other groups designated as "gangs" often becomes blurred, leading to the term gang being applied to groups that often exclude youth. Third, the youth gang problem is not amenable to simple suppressive law enforcement measures, which may actually reinforce gang cohesion.

The first American gangs comprised youths from European immigrant families. Today, African American and Hispanic/Latina/o gangs are generally more numerous than other racial and ethnic groups. Agencies and researchers involved with addressing the youth gang members often use a multitude of competing, and often conflicting, layers of definitions and strategies when approaching the youth gang problem. Unfortunately, youth gangs do not stand still for researchers, despite many attempts to carefully define and categorize them. Lawmakers, police agencies, and the media often depict gangs as cohesive, structured, and durable despite their ephemeral nature. The more common prevention strategies involve various social service agencies, schools, religious organizations, and, of course, law enforcement. When attempting to identify gang prevention and intervention strategies, several gang researchers such as Irving Spurge and David Curry group these initiatives into four broad categories: community organization, social intervention, providing opportunities, and suppression.

Community Organization to Prevent Gangs

The community organization strategy seeks to enhance, modify, or change relationships among groups within a city in order to better cope with various problems. Community organizational prevention approaches normally refer to cross-agency initiatives. Some of the goals or activities that can be included in this strategy are graffiti removal and involving parent groups in community activities.

Building social cohesion places gang prevention within the context of a recognized deterioration of the social fabric of inner urban communities. This theoretical development stresses a link between the decline of collective efficacy and an increase in fear of crime, leading to a downward spiral of decay as fewer residents are willing to intervene on behalf of their neighbors or address incivilities and delinquent acts among youth in the community.

Social Intervention to Prevent Gangs

The goal of social intervention is to reduce gang involvement by focusing on changing the youth's value system. Several of the social intervention approaches include crisis intervention, counseling services, and drug use prevention and treatment.

One of the best-known prevention programs aimed at a wide audience of potentially at-risk youth within the schools is the Gang Resistance, Education, and Training (G.R.E.A.T.) program, which was based on the well-established Drug Abuse Resistance Education (D.A.R.E.) program. The G.R.E.A.T. program paralleled the lesson contents of the D.A.R.E. program, substituting gang issues for drug issues. Two of the most prominent and influential gang researchers, Malcolm Klein and Cheryl Maxson, identified the weaknesses revealed in evaluations of the G.R.E.A.T. program, most notably the weak decline in subjects' levels of delinquency and, most critical to the program, levels of gang membership.

Providing Conventional Opportunities to Prevent Gangs

Opportunities provision initiatives focus on job training and education, which specifically target gang youth. The approach addresses institutional structures and the fostering of youth participation in society as a way of preventing involvement in the gang. Opportunities provision strategies include the teaching of job skills and providing youth with academic tutoring.

One example of the opportunities provision approach to gang prevention is the Glen Mills

Schools, located on a 756-acre campus in Delaware County, Pennsylvania. The school is America's oldest residential facility for court-referred young men between the ages of 15 and 18. Glen Mills seeks to teach the youth life skills by providing vocational instruction in various trades, including photography, printing, carpentry, and automotive technology. The idea is that, by learning a useful skill, the Glen Mills graduate will have little use for returning to life in the gang and committing further delinquent acts.

Gang Suppression

Suppression describes strictly criminal justice responses to gang prevention efforts. Some of these strategies include the use of saturation patrols by special gang units, the arrest of suspected gang members, imprisonment, and surveillance, as well as legislative sanctions targeting suspected gang members.

The paradoxical view of youth gangs as something to be feared and loathed, while individual youths within it are basically good and in need of protection, also contributes to much confusion among policymakers and so-called gang experts. Gang prevention should begin by eliminating anything that would bring a gang together. Marcus Felson's recent work discusses the importance of reducing gang cohesion, observing that a gang's level of cohesiveness is likely to increase if youth have a physical location conducive to congregating or receive increased attention from the police or media.

Understanding gang dynamics, particularly gang cohesiveness, is critical when formulating any prevention strategy. Cohesiveness tends not to be strong unless reinforced by external sources. Race is one of the characteristics of gang membership that can encourage cohesion, with the majority of gang members being of a particular racial and ethnic minority. Even before World War II, when gangs were predominantly Caucasian, they tended to be members of minority groups, such as the Irish, Italians, or various eastern European nationalities. This sense of belonging to a larger minority group, along with poverty, decay of inner-city neighborhoods, and the dearth of social services, may encourage gang cohesiveness.

Immediate reduction in gang-related activity can be achieved by suppressing places, not people.

A more effective approach in the long-term reduction of gang activity would likely involve addressing the racial, social, and economic exclusion that contribute to the flourishing and cohesion of marginalized youth. Prevention strategies that have any hope for long-term success must be multidimensional, community oriented, and emphasize early intervention during the first years of school. There must also be sufficient financial resources to implement and sustain the strategies over the long term.

The miscellany of gang prevention programs has yielded mixed results. Many prevention initiatives tend to be eclectic, lacking a coherent theory, or viewed by policymakers as a panacea. The outcome is often confusion over many goal priorities, whether the objective is treatment of individual problems, providing access to opportunities, changing values, prevention of delinquency, or fighting the gang. The more recent reliance upon specifically gang-targeted police and prosecutorial programs (suppression) would likely enhance the legitimacy and cohesiveness of the gang.

Jonathan Kramer

See also Delinquency Prevention; Evidence-Based Delinquency Prevention for Minority Youth

Further Readings

- Felson, M. (2006). Crime and nature. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
- Klein, M. (1995). The American street gang: Its nature, prevalence, and control. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Klein, M. (1995). Street gang cycles. In J. Q. Wilson & J. Petteril (Eds.), Crime (pp. 217–236). San Francisco: Institute for Contemporary Studies.
- Klein, M., & Maxson, C. (2006). Street gang patterns and policies. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Sheldon, R., Tracy, S., & Brown, W. (2004). Youth gangs in American society (4th ed.). Belmont, CA: Thomson/Wadsworth.
- Spurge, I. (1990). Youth gangs: Continuity and change. Crime and Justice, 12, 171–275.
- Spurge, I., & Curry, G. (1990). Strategies and perceived agency effectiveness in dealing with the youth gang problem. In C. R. Huff (Ed.), Gangs in America (2nd ed., pp. 288–309). Newbury Park, CA: Sage.
- Sullivan, M. (2005). Maybe we shouldn't study "gangs": Does reification obscure youth violence? Journal of Contemporary Criminal Justice, 21, 170–190.

ZERO TOLERANCE POLICIES

In recent years, increased arrests of minority youth on school property have led juvenile justice policymakers to conclude that specific practices related to federal and state zero tolerance policies have become a significant source of disproportionate minority contact (DMC) and confinement. Originally enacted in the early 1990s to counter the increase in violent tendencies among youth as well as the fear of an increase in fire-arm-related incidents in schools, zero tolerance policies have become applicable to nearly all rule-breaking behavior that occurs on school grounds. In many cases, children punished in accordance with these policies are deemed by administrators as “stepping out of line.” Public school systems throughout the United States utilize zero tolerance policies, which call for severe punishments for all offenses, even transgressions minor in nature. The ideal behind these policies is deterrence from rule-breaking behavior through equal punishment for all offenders. Thus, schools use zero tolerance policies to reiterate an intolerance of rule breaking, no matter the seriousness of the infraction or its implication, perceived or real, for teachers and students. However, this blanket approach to school discipline has not been implemented without severe consequences for educational systems, the juvenile justice system, and students. Since many students subject to the consequences of these policies are of minority status, discussions of zero tolerance policies have been incorporated into the broader realm of the DMC issue.

Disproportionate Minority Confinement and Contact

In the late 1980s, the problem of disproportionate minority confinement in juvenile justice systems throughout the United States was brought to national attention by the Coalition for Juvenile Justice. In the 1988 Amendments to the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (JJDP) Act of 1974, Congress required that in order to qualify for federal funding to assist in the development of programming for youth, states must take steps to address DMC. Specifically, each state must assess to what degree DMC exists, as well as develop efforts to reduce the proportion of youth detained or confined in secure juvenile detention facilities, secure juvenile residential correctional facilities, adult jails, and police lockups who are members of minority groups if their representation exceeds the proportion of such groups in the general population. For purposes of this requirement, the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (OJJDP) has defined minority populations as African Americans, American Indians, Asians, Pacific Islanders, and Hispanics.

The Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (JJDP) Act of 2002 modified the DMC requirement of the original 1974 Act as follows: “addressing juvenile delinquency prevention efforts and system improvement efforts designed to reduce, without establishing or requiring numerical standards or quotas, the disproportionate number of juvenile members of minority groups who come into contact with the juvenile justice system.” This change broadens the DMC initiative from disproportionate minority “confinement” to disproportionate minority “contact” by requiring the examination of possible disproportionate representation of minority youth at all decision points along the juvenile justice system continuum. The general premise is that racial disproportionality throughout the juvenile justice system is a result of practices that begin with a minority child’s first encounter with the police, as disparity tends to be most pronounced at the stages of arrest and referral to court.

All states that continue to receive federal funding for juvenile justice programming are required by OJJDP to identify sources of DMC; furthermore, states must develop multiple intervention strategies, including not only juvenile delinquency prevention efforts, but also juvenile justice system improvement efforts at all decision points to ensure equal treatment of all youth entering the juvenile justice system. For this reason, states have begun to look at non-justice system components of informal social control, such as the school, as potential sources of DMC. Because of this, interest has grown concerning the impact of zero tolerance policies and the contribution that these policies may have on DMC.

Background of Zero Tolerance Policies

Although the use of out-of-school suspension and expulsion took hold in the late 1960s, and the use of in-school suspension increased in the 1970s, zero tolerance policies in public schools are based on an ideology rooted in the strict federal and state drug legislation of the late 1980s. These laws were designed to shape and support policies with a tough stance toward most drug-related behavior, especially the import of illegal drugs into the United States. This zero tolerance approach to law and order quickly spread to other social issues, such as homelessness and teen loitering. With the concern over the “superpredator” juvenile delinquent at the forefront of juvenile justice discourse in the early 1990s, schools began to enact mandatory one-year expulsions followed by referral to authorities for the possession of a firearm, per the 1994 Gun-Free Schools Act. By the late 1990s, 90% of school districts in the United States had implemented zero tolerance policies for firearms and other weapons; furthermore, many school districts had expanded the use of zero tolerance to other infractions, such as violent behavior, drug possession/use, and tobacco possession/use. Currently, school systems will suspend or expel students who engage in minor offenses (i.e., minor assault or threats), and in some cases, students deemed disruptive. The goals of a blanket approach to the breaking of school rules include deterrence from engaging in such behavior, fairness and equity in punishment, and the promotion of an environment intolerant of rule-breaking.

Implementation and Use

Several points of support have been made for the implementation and use of zero tolerance policies, including lax discipline leading to unsafe learning environments (which has been argued as the cause of increased violence in schools in the 1980s and 1990s), the need for security to facilitate a safe and comfortable learning environment for students, and concern for the protection and welfare of school personnel and students as a group—not the specific individuals and their special needs—which can lead to lawsuits if differential punishments are used.

Nevertheless, there are problems surrounding the implementation and use of zero tolerance policies as they exist today. It has been proposed that the policies eradicate positive attitudes and beliefs toward justice and fairness in society, and foster student mistrust and disrespect of school officials and teachers. Furthermore, students are alienated from teachers, and they are less likely to confide in teachers when they feel as if they need assistance. This can be especially important to consider when some youth may not have role models in the home. If a child is suspended and unsupervised in the home, a delinquent peer group may become the predominant influence in his or her life.

Through suspension and expulsion, zero tolerance policies deprive children of an education, which is contrary to the developmental and behavioral needs of children and may place them in unsupervised environments where negative associations with other suspended or expelled students can be fostered. Through these associations and the negative labels placed on children who are suspended or expelled via such policies, children could be “pushed” into the juvenile justice system, and the adult criminal justice system in some jurisdictions, prematurely. This is especially important to consider when examining sources of DMC in the juvenile justice system, as African American students are suspended and expelled at higher rates nationwide than their white peers; furthermore, African American and Hispanic students are more likely to be disciplined for subjective offenses such as defiance, disrespect, and disruption. Many youth do not return to school once they are expelled. Furthermore, the quality of alternative schooling has been questioned. Currently, there is a lack of data concerning the quality of instruction and services, and only about half of the states require alternative forms of education for expelled students.

It has been argued that the one-size-fits-all approach that many school districts have taken when implementing zero tolerance policies does not account for the variation in adolescent behavior. Arguments have been made that circumstances concerning incidents will vary, and therefore, such circumstances must be considered. Furthermore, the student may or may not have a behavioral history that should be addressed, which zero tolerance policies fail to do. Some school districts have chosen to subject very young children to the policies with little consideration for options that may help them instead of stunt their educational growth.

It has been argued that zero tolerance policies do not address the issues that youth face today, as they are not proactive policies but reactive actions. Furthermore, alternative education often has few resources to help these youth as well, which contributes to the likelihood that these youth will be pushed into the juvenile and criminal justice systems. Youth are labeled as deviant, and the net of youth brought under control of the justice system is widened. Unless the zero tolerance policies utilized by school districts throughout the United States are revised, the juvenile and criminal justice systems will handle the cases that come before them in situations already indicative of minimal resources, overcrowding, and increased DMC.

Recommendations

Several recommendations have been made in light of the unintended consequences of zero tolerance policies on students, particularly minorities, in public schools. Graded sanctions, sometimes referred to as tough-as-necessary policies, have been proposed as an alternative to current zero tolerance policies. With tough-as-necessary policies, circumstances and motivation are taken into account. Another recommendation that has the attention of many juvenile justice administrators is making active efforts to monitor schools through the collection and analysis of data on the demographic characteristics of children impacted by the policies. Compliance reviews and investigations of teachers, school administrators, and school resource officers can be completed so that effective teacher and school resource officer training can be developed and provided. Another recommendation that is commonly mentioned is the establishment of quality programs for alternative schools. Positive and prosocial attitudes that students may develop in regard to teachers, school activities, and society can take shape and minimize the negative impacts of peers and family for specific youth. When effective programs are established, documentation is important, as school districts wanting to develop similar services for expelled youth can look to these established programs for guidance.

Courtney A. Wade

See also Anti-Drug Abuse Acts; Disproportionate Arrests; Disproportionate Incarceration; Disproportionate Minority Contact and Confinement

Further Readings

- Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. (n.d.). Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 2002. Retrieved from <http://ojjdp.ncjrs.org/about/ojdpact2002.html>
- Scuba, R. J. (2001). When is disproportional discrimination? The overrepresentation of Black students in school suspension. In W. Ayers, B. Dohrn, & R. Ayers (Eds.), Zero tolerance: Resisting the drive for punishment in our schools (pp. 176–187). New York: New Press.
- Scuba, R. J., & Leone, P. E. (2001). Zero tolerance and school security measures: A failed experiment. In T. Johnson, J. E. Boyden, & W. J. Pitts (Eds.), Racial profiling and punishment in U.S. public schools: How zero tolerance policies and high stakes testing subvert academic excellence and racial equity (pp. 34–38). Oakland, CA: Applied Research Center.

Scuba, R. J., & Nesting, K. (2002). Zero tolerance, zero evidence: An analysis of school disciplinary practice. In R. J. Scuba & G. G. Noam (Eds.), Zero tolerance: Can suspension and expulsion keep schools safe? (New Directions for Youth Development, no. 92, pp. 17–44). San Francisco: Jossey-Bass.

ZOOT SUIT RIOTS

Zoot suit riots is the name given to a series of conflicts that occurred in the summer of 1943 in Los Angeles, California, between servicemen and Mexican American youths who wore outfits called zoot suits. The zoot suit consisted of a broad-shouldered drape jacket, balloon-leg trousers, and, sometimes, a flamboyant hat. Mexican and Mexican American youths who wore these outfits were called zoot-suiters. These individuals referred to themselves as pachucos, which is a name linked to the Mexican American generation's rebellion against both Mexican and American culture.

Pressures related to U.S. involvement in World War II contributed to the racial tensions that preceded the riots. Workers were needed in the agricultural and service sectors of the United States to fill the jobs vacated by those who were serving in the military. An agreement was reached with Mexico whereby temporary workers from Mexico were brought into the United States. This influx of Mexican workers was not particularly welcomed by the White Americans in the area.

As part of the war efforts, in March 1942, the United States had begun rationing various resources. Restrictions on wool had a direct effect on the manufacture of wool suits and other clothing. There were regulations prohibiting the manufacturing of zoot suits, but a network of bootleg tailors continued to manufacture them. This exacerbated racial tensions, because Mexican American youths wearing the zoot suits were seen as un-American because they were deliberately ignoring the rationing regulations.

The zoot suit riots are commonly associated with the Sleepy Lagoon murder that occurred in August 1942. The Sleepy Lagoon, as it was nicknamed, was one of the larger reservoirs outside the city of Los Angeles, California. On the night of August 1, 1942, two groups of zoot-suiters were involved in a fight near the Sleepy Lagoon. The next morning one of the zoot-suiters was dead. There was a racially based public outcry against the zoot-suiters, fueled by local tabloids. Citing concerns about juvenile delinquency, Governor Cuthbert Olson used the zoot-suiter's death as the impetus for a roundup by the Los Angeles Police Department of more than 600 Mexican American people on two consecutive nights. Several of the zoot-suiters who were arrested were tried and convicted of murder. However, many people saw the trial as a railroading and attacked the verdict as a miscarriage of justice. The convictions of the Mexican American youths were reversed on appeal in October 1944.

However, during the period from 1942 through 1943, the news media continued to portray the zoot-suiters as dangerous gang members who were capable of murder. Based on the news reports, more and more people began to believe that the Mexican American youths, particularly the zoot-suiters, were predisposed to committing crime. Although these youths were engaging in rising gang violence, the news media exaggerated and sensationalized the extent of this problem. It is in this racially charged atmosphere that the conflict between the servicemen and the Mexican American youths began.

Within months of the Sleepy Lagoon convictions, in June 1943, Los Angeles erupted in what is commonly referred to as the Zoot Suit Riots. From May 30, 1943, through June 8, 1943, a series of confrontations occurred between servicemen and Mexican American youths. The so-called riots began when 11 sailors stated they had been attacked by a group of Mexican American zoot-suiters. As a result, a number of uniformed sailors chartered cabs and proceeded to the Mexican American community, seeking out the zoot-suiters. What followed was a series of conflicts between servicemen and zoot-suiters, sometimes including civilians. Both sides reported that their wives and girlfriends were subjected to sexual taunts and assaults from the other side. Servicemen on their way back to base at night were often attacked by the zoot-suiters, who were attempting to teach the servicemen some respect. The zoot-suiters set traps for servicemen and assaulted them in their cars.

Many zoot-suiters were beaten by servicemen and stripped of their zoot suits on the spot. The servicemen sometimes urinated on the zoot suits or burned them in the streets. One local paper actually printed an article describing how to “de-zoot” a zoot-suiter, including directions that the zoot suits should be burned. The servicemen were also portrayed in local news publications as heroes fighting against what was referred to as a Mexican crime wave.

In response to these confrontations, police arrested hundreds of Mexican American youths in what they described as a preventive measure. In fact, there are reports of Mexican American youths requesting to be arrested and locked up in order to protect themselves from the servicemen in the streets. Nine sailors were arrested, but eight were released with no charges being filed. The ninth sailor had to pay a minimal fine. The other military participants were left to the military justice system.

Shortly after midnight on June 7, 1943, military officials declared Los Angeles off-limits to all military personnel. Deciding that the local police were completely unable or unwilling to handle the situation, officials ordered military police to arrest disorderly military personnel. The next day, the Los Angeles City Council passed a resolution that banned the wearing of zoot suits on Los Angeles streets.

After the riots, California Governor Cuthbert Olson ordered the creation of a citizens’ committee. The purpose of the committee was to investigate and determine the cause of the zoot suit riots. The committee subsequently issued its report, wherein it determined that racism was a central cause of the riots. Los Angeles Mayor Fletcher Bowron issued his own conclusion about the riots, separately from the governor’s committee. Mayor Bowron concluded racial prejudice was not a factor and that the riots were caused by juvenile delinquents and White southerners.

George Coroian

See also Los Angeles Race Riot of 1965; Los Angeles Race Riots of 1992; Race Relations; Race Riots

Further Readings

American experience: The zoot suit riots. (2001).

[Documentary Film]. Retrieved from <http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/amex/zoot>

Mazón, M. (1988). The zoot-suit riots: The psychology of symbolic annihilation. Austin: University of Texas Press.

Appendix A

Locating and Interpreting Statistical Data on Race and Crime

Most federal statistics include at least five racial categories: American Indians/Alaska Natives, Asians/Pacific Islanders, Blacks, Hispanics, and Whites. A category for other is also available. The 2000 U.S. Census of the Population implemented several changes in racial and ethnic categories that took into consideration intraracial and intraethnic heterogeneity (Gabbidon & Greene, 2009). Now, more than 60 combinations of racial categories are available to respondents, and the Hispanic or Latino category has been revised to permit classification of Mexican, Puerto Rican, Cuban, and other Hispanic or Latino persons. The U.S. Census Bureau makes population estimates available for the world, the United States, and individual states, cities, and towns. This information can be accessed on its website: www.census.gov.

Unlike census data, there is considerable variation in the availability of data on racial and ethnic categories in federal crime, justice, and victimization statistics. Most crime-related data do not capture the cultural differences within racial categories and how this might impact involvement in crime, decision making by justice professionals, and within-group victimizations. Another problem in the collection of data is that there may be inaccuracies in the identifications of racial categories made by police and other justice officials. Another important issue is the time lapse between when data are collected and when they are available. Some data are available annually while other data sets only appear periodically. While limitations persist, there is a considerable amount of information available about race and ethnicity in federal (and state) crime statistics.

Most crime-related data is collected under the auspices of the U.S. Department of Justice. Since the 1930s, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) has conducted the Uniform Crime Reporting (UCR) Program and publishes an annual report, Crime in the United States. The FBI is also responsible for the Hate Crime Statistics Program and the National Incident-Based Reporting Program. The Bureau of Justice Statistics provides valuable information on crime, justice, and victimization data on the Web. The data are readily available and helpful in analyzing racial/ethnic categories within compilations on the death penalty, juvenile delinquency and juvenile justice, probation/parole/incarceration, and victimization. The Bureau of Justice Statistics also publishes special reports related to race and crime that are available at the National Criminal Justice Reference Service website (www.ncjrs.gov). Another useful source of information on crime-related research is the National Archive of Criminal Justice Data (www.icpsr.umich.edu/NACJD/index.html).

The two primary statistical programs designed to measure the magnitude, nature, and impact of crime in the United States are the UCR Program and the National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS), which are described in the next section.

UCR Program and the NCVS Data

The UCR Program and the NCVS produce valuable information about aspects of the nation's crime problem. Because the UCR and NCVS programs are conducted for different purposes, use different methods, and focus on somewhat different aspects of crime, the information they produce together provides a more comprehensive panorama of the criminal justice system than either could produce alone.

Uniform Crime Reporting Program

The UCR Program, administered by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), began in 1929 and collects information on the following crimes reported to law enforcement authorities: murder and nonnegligent manslaughter, forcible rape, robbery, aggravated assault, burglary, larceny-theft, motor vehicle theft, and arson. Law enforcement agencies report arrest data for 21 additional crime categories.

The UCR Program compiles data from monthly law enforcement reports or individual crime incident records transmitted directly to the FBI or to centralized state agencies that then report to the FBI. The program thoroughly examines each report it receives for reasonableness, accuracy, and deviations that may indicate errors. Large variations in crime levels may indicate modified records procedures, incomplete reporting, or changes in a jurisdiction's boundaries. To identify any unusual fluctuations in an agency's crime counts, the program compares monthly reports to previous submissions of the agency and with those for similar agencies.

In 2007, law enforcement agencies active in the UCR Program represented more than 285 million U.S. inhabitants—94.6% of the total population. The UCR Program presents crime counts for the nation as a whole, as well as for regions, states, counties, cities, towns, tribal law enforcement, and colleges and universities. This permits studies among neighboring jurisdictions and among those with similar populations and other common characteristics.

The FBI annually publishes its findings in a preliminary release in the spring of the following calendar year, followed by a detailed annual report, Crime in the United States, issued in the fall. In addition to crime counts and trends, this report includes data on crimes cleared, persons arrested (age, sex, and race), law enforcement personnel (including the number of sworn officers killed or assaulted), and the characteristics of homicides (including age, sex, and race of victims and offenders; victim-offender relationships; weapons used; and circumstances surrounding the homicides). Other periodic reports are also available from the UCR Program.

The state and local law enforcement agencies participating in the UCR Program are continually converting to the more comprehensive and detailed National Incident-Based Reporting System (NIBRS). The NIBRS provides detailed information about each criminal incident in 22 broad categories of offenses.

National Crime Victimization Survey

The Bureau of Justice Statistics' (BJS) National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS), which began in 1973, provides a detailed picture of crime incidents, victims, and trends. After a substantial period of research, the BJS completed an intensive methodological redesign of the survey in 1993. The BJS conducted the redesign to improve the questions used to uncover crime, update the survey methods, and broaden the scope of crimes measured. The redesigned survey collects detailed information on the frequency and nature of the crimes of rape, sexual assault, personal robbery, aggravated and simple assault, household burglary, theft, and motor vehicle theft. It does not measure homicide or commercial crimes (such as burglaries of stores).

Two times a year, the U.S. Census Bureau personnel interview household members in a nationally representative sample of approximately 43,000 households (about 76,000 people). Approximately 150,000 interviews of persons age 12 or older are conducted annually. Households stay in the sample for 3 years. New households rotate into the sample on an ongoing basis.

The NCVS collects information on crimes suffered by individuals and households, whether or not those crimes were reported to law enforcement. It estimates the proportion of each crime type reported to law enforcement, and it summarizes the reasons that victims give for reporting or not reporting.

The survey provides information about victims (age, sex, race, ethnicity, marital status, income, and educational level), offenders (sex, race, approximate age, and victim–offender relationship), and the crimes (time and place of occurrence, use of weapons, nature of injury, and economic consequences). Questions also cover the experiences of victims with the criminal justice system, self-protective measures used by victims, and possible substance abuse by offenders. Supplements are added periodically to the survey to obtain detailed information on topics like school crime.

The BJS published the first data from the redesigned NCVS in a BJS bulletin in June 1995. BJS publication of NCVS data includes Criminal Victimization in the United States, an annual report that covers the broad range of detailed information collected by the NCVS. The BJS publishes detailed reports on topics such as crime against women, urban crime, and gun use in crime. The National Archive of Criminal Justice Data at the University of Michigan archives the NCVS data files to enable researchers to perform independent analyses.

Comparing the UCR Program and the NCVS

Because the BJS designed the NCVS to complement the UCR Program, the two programs share many similarities. As much as their different collection methods permit, the two measure the same subset of serious crimes, defined alike. Both programs cover rape, robbery, aggravated assault, burglary, theft, and motor vehicle theft. Rape, robbery, theft, and motor vehicle theft are defined virtually identically by both the UCR Program and the NCVS. (Although rape is defined analogously, the UCR Program measures crime against women only, and the NCVS measures it against both sexes.)

There are also significant differences between the two programs. First, the two programs were created to serve different purposes. The UCR Program's primary objective is to provide a reliable set of criminal justice statistics for law enforcement administration, operation, and management. The BJS established the NCVS to provide previously unavailable information about crime (including crime not reported to police), victims, and offenders.

Second, the two programs measure an overlapping but nonidentical set of crimes. The NCVS includes crimes both reported and not reported to law enforcement. The NCVS excludes, but the UCR Program includes, homicide, arson, commercial crimes, and crimes against children under age 12. The UCR Program captures crimes reported to law enforcement but collects only arrest data for simple assaults and sexual assaults other than forcible rape.

Third, because of methodology, the NCVS and UCR Program definitions of some crimes differ. For example, the UCR Program defines burglary as the unlawful entry or attempted entry of a structure to commit a felony or theft. The NCVS, not wanting to ask victims to ascertain offender motives, defines burglary as the entry or attempted entry of a residence by a person who had no right to be there.

Fourth, for property crimes (burglary, theft, and motor vehicle theft), the two programs calculate crime rates using different bases. The UCR Program rates for these crimes are per capita (number of crimes per 100,000 persons), whereas the NCVS rates for these crimes are per household (number of crimes per 1,000 households). Because the number of households may not grow at the same rate each year as the total population, trend data for rates of property crimes measured by the two programs may not be comparable.

Each program has unique strengths. The UCR Program provides a measure of the number of persons arrested and crimes reported to law enforcement agencies throughout the country. The UCR's Program Supplementary Homicide Reports provide the most reliable, timely data on the extent and nature of homicides in the nation. The NCVS is the primary source of information on the characteristics of criminal victimization and on the number and types of crimes not reported to law enforcement authorities. It is possible to use the UCR Program and NCVS to achieve a greater understanding of crime trends and the nature of crime in the United States. For example, changes in police procedures, shifting attitudes toward crime and police, and other societal changes can affect the extent to which people report and law enforcement agencies record crime. NCVS and UCR Program data can be used in concert to explore why trends in reported and police recorded crime may differ.

Further Readings

Gabbidon, S., & Greene, H. G. (2009). Race and crime (2nd ed.). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

U.S. Department of Justice, Federal Bureau of Investigation. (2005). Crime in the United States, 2004. Retrieved November 26, 2008, from http://www.fbi.gov/ucr/cius_04/appendices/appendix_04.html

Appendix B

Statistics and Race and Crime: Accessing Data Online

Instructions on accessing statistical data from both governmental and nongovernmental sources on the Web are presented here to enable readers to access the most recent information related to selected topics on race and crime, including arrests, contacts between the police and the public, the death penalty, drugs and crime, gang membership, hate crimes, homicide trends in the United States, juvenile justice, racial profiling, and victimization.

Arrests

Option 1

The best source of information on race and arrests in the United States is the U.S. Department of Justice, Federal Bureau of Investigation.

- Step 1
Go to the website for United States Department of Justice, Federal Bureau of Investigation: <http://www.fbi.gov>
- Step 2
On the left-hand column click on the link labeled Reports and Publications.
- Step 3
On this new page, scroll down to On Statistics and click on Crime in the United States.
- Step 4
On the Uniform Crime Reports page, scroll down to Crime in the United States and click on the year for which you want information.

If there is a pop-up, click on Continue to Crime in the United States (year).

- Step 5
Then, find Persons Arrested and click on Go To Arrest Tables.
- Step 6
Click on Table 43 for data on total arrests and arrests for specific offenses by race for adults and juveniles.

Option 2

FBI arrest data can also be accessed via the Bureau of Justice Statistics:

- Step 1
Go to the website for United States Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics: <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs>
- Step 2
On the right-hand column under the heading labeled Data from other sources, find and click on the link labeled FBI's Uniform Crime Reports.
- Step 3
On this new page, under Crime in the United States, click on the appropriate year. If there is a pop-up, click on Continue to Crime in the United States (year).
- Step 4
Then, find and click on the heading labeled Persons Arrested, in the middle of the page.

- Step 5
Scroll down and find the heading labeled Expanded arrest data. Under this heading, you will find tables for data by race.

Contacts Between Police and the Public

A good source of information on race and contact with the police, including traffic stops, is the United States Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics.

- Step 1
Go to the website for United States Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics: <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/welcome.html>
- Step 2
Under the heading Law enforcement click on state and local.
- Step 3
On this new page, under the listing of BJs Publications, scroll down until you locate Contacts Between the Police and the Public, 2005, and Characteristics of Drivers Stopped by the Police, 2002, or the most recent report available on these topics.
- Step 4
When you click on a link to one of these links to findings on police and public contact for a specific year, you will be able to open an Adobe Acrobat file (PDF) providing statistics on various characteristics (including race) of those who have been stopped by the police in their vehicle or had contact with the police under other circumstances.

Death Penalty

Option 1

- Step 1
Go to the Death Penalty Information Center (DPIC) website: <http://www.deathpenaltyinfo.org>
- Step 2
On the left-hand side of the page, find the heading Issues.

- Step 3
Under Issues find and click on Race.
After clicking Race you will find multiple links to issues related to race and the death penalty. Click on them to find charts and statistics.

Option 2

- Step 1
Go to the website for United States Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics: <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs>
- Step 2
In the Statistics About box, find the heading Corrections
- Step 3
Under the heading Corrections, find and click on the link labeled Capital Punishment.

Drugs and Crime

The Bureau of Justice Statistics has a large amount of information on drugs and crime.

Option 1

Locate Table 43 using the procedure described in Option 1 for Arrests. This table contains data on arrests for drug abuse violations by race.

Option 2

For information on drugs and prisoners:

- Step 1
Go to the website for United States Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics: <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs>
- Step 2
In the Statistics About box, find the heading Corrections.
- Step 3
Under the heading Corrections, find and click on the link labeled Prisons.
- Step 4
On this new page, under BJs Publications, scroll down to Drug Use and Dependence, State and Federal Prisoners, 2004.

- Step 5
Click on the Acrobat file. This document contains data on drug use and dependence by race.

Option 3: Sentencing for Federal Drug Offenses

Following the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in U.S. v. Booker, 543 U.S. 160 (2005), judges were given greater latitude in sentencing for drug offenses. The U.S. Sentencing Commission provides data on the length of sentences that have been imposed in federal court for such offenses since the 2005 ruling.

- Step 1
Go to the Sentencing Commission website: <http://www.ussc.gov/linktojp.htm>
- Step 2
Click on Data on Retroactive Application of Crack Cocaine Amendment and go to Table 5.

Gang Membership

- Step 1
Go to the website for Institute for Intergovernmental Research: <http://www.iir.com>
- Step 2
Near the top of the page, find and scroll the mouse over the square labeled Gangs. You will find that three additional links drop down. Find and click on the drop-down link labeled National Youth Gang Center.
- Step 3
On the right-hand column under the heading Publications find and click on the link labeled National Youth Gang Survey Analysis.
- Step 4
Scroll down toward the bottom of this new page and find and click on the heading labeled Demographics.
- Step 5
Toward the bottom of this new page, you will find charts for Race/Ethnicity of Gang Members and Race/Ethnicity of Gang Members by Area Type.

Hate Crimes

Option 1

- Step 1
Go to the website for the Federal Bureau of Investigation: <http://www.fbi.gov>
- Step 2
On the left-hand column find and click on Reports & Publications.
- Step 3
Scroll all the way down to the bottom and under the heading On Statistics, find and click on Uniform Crime Reports: Hate Crime Statistics, then click on a specific year. On the next screen, you will find data on incidents and offenses, victims, offenders, and location type (where the offense occurred).

Option 2

- Step 1
Go to the website for the Southern Poverty Law Center: <http://www.splcenter.org>
- Step 2
On the left-hand column find and click on Hate Incidents.
- Step 3
Click on the state of interest.

Homicide Trends in the United States

- Step 1
Go to the website for United States Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics: <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs>
- Step 2
In the Statistics About box, find and click on the heading Special Topics.
- Step 3
Under Special Topics find and click on the link labeled Homicide Trends.
- Step 4
On the right side of the page you will see Contents. Find and click on the subheading labeled Race (which is under the heading Demographic trends by).

Juvenile Justice

- Step 1
Go to the website for the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention: <http://www.ojjdp.ncjrs.org>
- Step 2
In the left-hand column, find and click on the link for Statistics.
- Step 3
In the left-hand column find and click on the link for Juvenile Population Characteristics.
- Step 4
Under the heading Juvenile Population Characteristics on this new page, find and click on the link labeled Related FAQs.
- Step 5
Under the heading Juvenile Population, find the subheading Within States, how do juvenile populations vary by race? and click on the link labeled Answer.

Prison Populations

Option 1

- Step 1
Go to the website for United States Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics: <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs>
- Step 2
In the Statistics About box, find the heading Corrections.
- Step 3
Under the heading Corrections, find and click on the link labeled Prisons.
- Step 4
For the most recent data on prison inmates, scroll down to Prison Inmates at Midyear 2007 or the most recent report available.

Scroll down and click on Acrobat File.

See Tables 9, 10, and 11 for data by race/ethnicity.

Option 2

- Step 1
Go to the website for the Sentencing Project: <http://www.sentencingproject.org>
- Step 2
Click on Statistics by State and then put your cursor over the state for which you want information (but don't click on the state). Data on rates of incarceration and felony disenfranchisement will appear to the right of the map.

Racial Profiling

- Step 1
Go to the website for Ethnic Majority: <http://www.ethnicmajority.com>
- Step 2
In the middle of the page, find and click on the square link for Civil Rights.
- Step 3
On the right-hand column under the heading Topics, find and click on the link labeled Racial Profiling.
On the right-hand column of this new page, you will find multiple links to information on racial profiling.

Victimization

Option 1

- Step 1
Go to the website for U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics: <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs>
- Step 2
In the Statistics About box, find the heading Crime & Victims and click on it.

- Step 3
Under the heading Pages with additional information, statistics, and publications about, find Criminal Victimization and click on it. Here you will find Summary findings for the most recent year available.

Option 2

To find tables on criminal victimization in the United States along with tables for other years:

- Step 1
Go to the website for U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics: <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs>
- Step 2
In the Statistics About box, find the heading Crime & Victims and click on it.

- Step 3
On the new page, scroll all the way to the bottom of the screen to find the heading Selected Statistics. Under this head, find and click on Criminal Victimization in the United States—Statistical Tables.

Under the heading Download you are given 3 options to view statistics (or you can just scroll down through the page):

One table at a time

Complete set of tables

Sections of tables

Find the year for which you want to see statistics and click on the Acrobat file link to view.

Index

Entry titles and their page numbers are in bold; illustrative material is identified by (figure) and (table).

- AAUW/National Conference for College Women
Student Leaders Women of Distinction, 1:339
- Aban Aya Youth Project, 1:273
- Abandoned Ones, The* (Hamm), 2:480
- Abdelal, Ahmed, 2:596
- Abernathy v. Alabama*, 2:543
- Abolition Democracy* (Davis), 1:178
- Abramoff, Jack, 1:311
- Abu-Jamal, Mumia, 1:2
- Abuse, child. See Child abuse
- Abuse, elder. See Elder abuse
- Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, 1:16–17
- Academy of Criminal Justice Sciences (ACJS), 1:152
- Access to Justice Project, 1:12
- Adam-12*, 2:791
- Adams, Eric, 2:604–605
- Adams, John Quincy, 2:752
- Adams v. Williams*, 1:370
- Adkins, W. A., 2:534
- Administration of Criminal Justice, The* (Misner), 1:79
- Adolescent Transitions Program, 1:272
- Advancing Justice Through DNA
Technology Act, 1:388
- African American gangs, 1:3–4
- African Americans, 1:5–9
- crack cocaine epidemic and, 1:159
- crime and, 1:7–8
- gangs, 1:3–4
- historical perspective, 1:5
- identity, 1:5–7
- males, private prisons and, 2:660–661
- media portrayals of, 2:493–496
- meeting needs of African American inmates, 1:280
- sentencing disparities, 2:733–736
- three strikes laws and, 2:805–806
- victimization, 2:840–846
- African Black Cross Nurses, 2:831
- African Diaspora of North America, 1:60–61, 1:63
- African Square Park, Miami, Florida, 2:517
- Afro-American Patrolmen’s League, 1:331
- Afro-American Policemen’s League of Chicago, 1:331
- Afro-Athlican Constructive Church, 2:702
- Afrocentric Black Jamaicans, 2:702
- Afromestizos, 1:327
- Agassiz, Louis, 1:468
- Agnew, Robert, 2:774–777
- Agnew’s Powder, 1:17
- Ahmad, Abraham, 2:491
- Aid to Dependent Children, 1:111
- Aikens v. California*, 1:305
- Air America, 1:123
- Aitken, Spottiswoode, 1:55
- Akerman, Amos, 1:438
- Alabama Supreme Court, 2:594, 2:640
- Alaska Gold Rush, 1:34
- Alaska Natives. See Native Americans
- Alba, Richard, 1:19
- Albanese, Jay, 1:373
- Albonetti, Celesta, 2:624
- Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms Gang Resistance Education and Training (GREAT), 2:563
- Alcoholics Anonymous, 1:238
- Alexander v. Louisiana*, 2:544
- Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building, 2:519, 2:562
- Ali, Muhammad, 2:571
- Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798, 1:193
- Alienation, 1:9–11
- Allen, Barry, 1:320
- Allen, Bryant, 1:121
- Allen, E. M., 1:253
- Allen, Floyd, 1:325
- Allen, George, 1:250
- Alliance for Justice, 1:11–12
- Ally McBeal*, 2:498
- Almeida-Sanchez v. U.S.*, 2:827
- Almighty Latin King and Queen Nation
(ALKQN), 1:453–454

- Almighty Latin Queen Nation, 1:453
 al-Qaeda, 2:664, 2:883
 Alternative Court, 2:588
 Alternatives to Violence Program, 2:658
 AMBER Alert, 2:854, 2:865
 Amendments to the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act, 1988, 2:921
 American Anthropological Association, 1:62
 American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, 1:29
 American Association for Public Opinion Research, 2:679
 American Bar Association, 1:357–358, 2:768
 American Civil Liberties Union, 1:208, 1:278, 2:524, 2:593, 2:663, 2:667, 2:744, 2:813
 American College of Trial Lawyers, 1:129
 American Communist Party, 1:134
 American Community Survey, 1:6
 American Film Institute, 2:538
 American Friends Service Committee, 1:177
American History X, 2:538
 American Indian Law Enforcement Officers/Agents/Personnel, 2:562
 American Indian Movement (AIM), 1:88, 1:133, 2:579, 2:584, 2:618, 2:622
 American Indian Religious Freedom Act of 1978, 2:587
 American Indians. See Native American courts; Native American massacres; Native Americans; Native Americans: culture, identity, and the criminal justice system; Native Americans and substance abuse
 American Institute of Public Opinion, 2:670
 American International Pictures, 1:70
American Journal of Sociology, 2:909
 American Judges Association, 2:547
 American Judicature Society, 2:547
 American Legion, 1:252
 American Mafia, 1:267
 American National Socialist Workers Party, 2:898
 American Nazi Party, 1:437, 2:894, 2:898
American Negro Slave Revolts (Aptheker), 2:755
 American Psychiatric Association, 2:785
 American Psychological Association, 1:214, 1:401
 American Revolution, 2:518, 2:523
 American Revolutionary War, 2:585
 American Social Science Association, 1:37
 American Society of Criminology (ASC), 1:152
 American Sociological Society, 1:304
 American White Nationalist Party, 1:437
America's Most Wanted, 2:500, 2:796–797
 Amherst College, 1:357
Amistad (ship), 2:751–752
 Amnesty International USA, 1:148, 2:617, 2:637, 2:906
 Anderson, Elijah, 1:129–130, 1:299, 2:781, 2:842, 2:873
 Anderson, Henry, 2:554
 Anderson, Jesse, 2:693
 Anderson Bill, 1:459
 Andrades, Julio Cesar, 1:134
 Angel Island Immigration Station, 1:120
 Anglo-American Catarrh Powder, 1:17
 Anglo-Powhatan War, 2:577
 Anglo-Spanish Treaty of 1820, 2:752
 Anishinabe Turtle Mountain Reservation, North Dakota, 2:617
 Annie E. Casey Foundation, 1:412
Another Mother's Son, 1:413
 Anslinger, Harry J., 1:336–337, 2:536–537
 Antelope, Gabriel, 2:821
 Anti-Boycott Bill (1977), 1:14
Anti-Defamation League, 1:12–15, 1:22, 1:25
 Hate Crime Statistics Act and, 1:343 on Ku Klux Klan, 1:436, 2:897 on militias, 2:518–519
 1900–1940s, 1:13
 1950–1970s, 1:13–14
 1980s–present, 1:14–15
 on white supremacist groups, 2:898, 2:899, 2:900
Anti-drug abuse acts, 1:15–18, 1:125, 2:882 of 1986 and 1988, 1:16–17, 2:545
 history of, 1:15–17
 race and, 1:17–18
Anti-immigrant nativism, 1:18–23
 history of, 1:19–20
 social concerns, 1:20–21
 social consequences, 1:22
 Anti-Lynching Crusaders, 1:249
 Antioch College, 1:344
 Anti-Opium Act of 1908, 2:610
Anti-Semitism, 1:23–27
 early history, 1:23
 Enlightenment and, 1:24–25
 Holocaust and, 1:26
 Israel and, 1:27
 post-World War II, 1:26–27
 race and, 1:25–26
 rise of Christianity and, 1:23–24
 in U.S., 1:26
 Anti-Terrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, 1:192
Any Day Now, 2:790
 Aoun, Joseph, 2:596
Apprendi v. New Jersey, 2:732, 2:826
 Aptheker, Herbert, 2:755
 Aquash, Nogeeshik, 2:622
Arab Americans, 1:27–30
 Arab-American Law Enforcement Association, 1:30
 demographics, 1:28
 hate crimes against, 1:29
 history of, 1:27–28

- law enforcement and, 1:30
 September 11 attacks and, 1:28–29
 Arapaho Indians, 2:503
 Arellano-Felix organization, 1:373
Are Prisons Obsolete? (Davis), 1:179
 Arguellas, John, 1:121
 Aristotle, 2:765
 Arizona State University, 2:507
 Arizona Supreme Court, 2:526
 Arkansas Delta, 1:251
Arkansas Democrat Gazette, 2:559
 Arkansas Supreme Court, 2:534
 Armstrong, Christopher Lee, 2:822
 Armstrong, Gaylene Styve, 1:74
 Aron, Nan, 1:11
 Arrigo, Bruce, 2:766
 Arrivi, Carlos Soto, 1:134
 Arthur, Chester A., 1:119
 Articles of Confederation, 2:518
 Aryan Brotherhood, 2:657, 2:894, 2:899, 2:917
 Aryan Circle, 2:899
 Aryan Nations, 1:437, 2:524, 2:748, 2:767, 2:897
 Asante, Molefi Kete, 1:170
 Asatrú, 2:898
 Ashland, Virginia, 1:180
 Ashwood, Amy, 2:829, 2:831
Asian American gangs, 1:31–33
Asian Americans, 1:33–37
 crime and, 1:35–36
 defined, 1:33–34
 gangs, 1:31–33
 history, 1:34–35
 media portrayals of, 2:496–499 research on crime and, 1:36–37
 victimization, 2:846–847
 Asian Exclusion League (AEL), 2:497
 Aspen Hill, Maryland, 1:179
 Aspira, 1:456
Aspira v. the Board of Education of the City of New York, 1:456–457
 Assimilative Crimes Act of 1898, 2:586
 Assize of Clarendon, 1:93
 Associated Press, 1:466, 2:517, 2:720–721
 Association for the Advancement of Mexican Americans, 2:558
 Association of American Law Schools, 1:71, 1:357
 Association of Black Journalists, 1:1
 Association of Southern Women for the Prevention of Lynching, 1:469
 Astrodome, Houston, Texas, 1:364
Atkins v. Virginia, 1:183, 1:429, 2:718, 2:733
 Atlanta Police Department, 1:78, 1:337–338
Atlanta University School of Sociological Research, 1:37–40, 1:244, 1:349
 Atlanta University Conferences (AUCs), 1:37–38
 Atlanta University Publications, 1:38
 Du Bois and, 1:39
 founding of, 1:37–38
 lasting significance of, 1:40 works of, 1:39–40
At-risk youth, 1:40–42
Attica prison revolt, 1:42–44
 Burns and, 2:888
 Ferguson and, 1:297–298
 Jackson and, 1:404
 racial disparity of prison staff and, 2:708
 Auburn Correctional Facility, 1:43
Audit of Anti-Semitic Incidents, 1:14
 Australia Black Panther Party, 1:67
 Authorization for Use of Military Force Against Terrorists, 2:884
 Automotive Trades High School, Brooklyn, 2:877
 Ayatollah Khomeini, 2:702

 Baadsager, Pernille, 1:143
 Babbitt, Bill, 1:413
 Baby Cribs, 1:3
Bad Boys (Ferguson), 2:728
Badlands, 2:538
 Bailey, Beverly Joyce, 1:337
 Bailey, F. Lee, 2:600
 Bailey, Robert, 1:409–411
 Bainbridge, William, 2:709
 Baker, Newman, 2:555
 Baker, Thurbert, 2:908
Baldus Study, 1:44–49
 David C. Baldus and, 1:45, 2:691
 findings, 1:47–48
 McClesky v. Kemp and, 1:48–49, 2:489–490 methodology, 1:46–47
 research design, sample, data, 1:45–46
 Baldwin, James, 2:906
 Baldwin, Ruth Standish, 2:569
 Ball, R. A., 1:52
 Ballentine, Warren, 1:410
 Baltimore County Circuit Court, 2:486
 Banderas, Antonio, 2:500
 Banks, Alf, Jr., 1:252, 2:534
 Banks, Dennis, 2:579, 2:622
Banks v. State, 2:534–535
 Baptista-Fernandez, P., 2:793
 Baraugh, Andre, 2:792
 Bardolph, Richard, 1:5
 Barkan, Steve, 2:612
 Barker, Justin, 1:409
 Barnett, E. G., 1:436
 Barnett, Ferdinand, 2:887
Barney Miller, 2:791
 Barraza, Maclovio, 2:557
 Barrio Elmwood Rifa, 1:313

- Barry, Marion, 1:415
Base et al. v. Rees, Commissioner, Kentucky Department of Corrections, et al., 2:719
 Bates, Attorney General, 1:222
 Bates, Ruby, 2:640
 Batista, Jorge, 1:456
 Baton Rouge River Center, 1:364
 Batson, James, 1:49
Batson v. Kentucky, 1:49–50, 1:182, 1:417–418, 2:544, 2:595
 Battle, John S., 2:485
 Battle, Redman, 2:830
 Battle, Samuel, 1:330
Battle of Elderbus Gulch, The, 2:505
 Battle of the Boyne, Ireland, 2:687
 Baumhammer, Richard, 2:665
 Baumrind, Diana, 1:282
 Bazán, Andrea, 2:559
 Beach, Mike, 2:518
Bean v. Southwestern Waste Management Corporation, 1:256–257
 Beard, Jesse Ray, 1:409–411
 Bear River, 2:577
 Beaudoin, Christopher, 2:506
 Beauty Enterprises, 1:457
 Beaver, Frank, 1:69
 Becker, Howard, 1:441
 Bedford Hills, New York, 1:113
 Bednarsky, Joseph, 1:436
Behrman v. United States, 1:336
 Belenko, Steven, 1:17
 Belfi, Donald, 1:297
 Belgarde, Daniel, 2:601
 Bell, Derrick, 1:167
 Bell, Eldrin, 1:338
 Bell, Jimmy, 2:553
 Bell, Lizzie, 2:885
 Bell, Mychal, 1:409–411
 Bell, Sean, 1:413, 2:605
Bell Curve, The (Herrnstein and Murray), 1:53, 1:401–402
 Bellevue Hospital, 2:904
 Benenson, Peter, 2:637
 Benjamin, Charles, 2:717
 Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law, 1:386, 1:389
 Berger, Peter, 2:758
 Berry, Anthony, 1:436
 Berry, Jeff, 1:436
 Berry, Shawn Allen, 1:89
Better Tomorrow, A, 2:538
 Betting on numbers, 1:311
 Bias, Len, 2:673
Bibliography of the Negro in Africa and America, A (Work), 2:908 Bicultural Competence Skills Program, 1:273
Big Brother, 2:498
 Big Brothers, 1:272
 Big Brothers Big Sisters of America (BBBSA), 2:512
 Big Foot, Chief, 2:579
 Big Sisters of America, 1:272
Big Trouble in Little China, 2:497
 Bill of Rights, 1:80, 2:476–477, 2:717
 Billson, Janet Mancini, 1:155
 Binet, Alfred, 1:399
 Bin Laden, Osama, 2:883
Biological theories, 1:50–54 biochemical, 1:53
 biological risk factors, 1:53
 biosocial, 1:52–53
 early, 1:51
 early theories and policy implications, 1:51–52 environmental toxins, 1:53 evolution, 1:52
 modern theories, 1:52–53
 modern theories and policy implications, 1:53–54
Birds, The, 2:538
 Birmingham, Alabama, 1:177
Birth of a Nation, The, 1:54–56, 1:367, 1:434, 2:549
 Bishop, Maurice, 2:703
 Black Belt, Chicago, 1:102
 Black Belts, 1:318
Black Caesar, 1:70
 Black child saving movement, 1:117–119
Black Codes, 1:56–58, 1:289
Black criminology, 1:58–61
 Black Death, 1:143
 Black Diaspora, 1:303
Black Enterprise, 1:350
 Black Entertainment Television (BET), 1:4, 1:368
Black ethnic monolith, 1:61–64
Black feminist criminology, 1:64–66
 Black Gangster Disciples, 1:3, 2:657
 Black Guerrilla Family, 1:403, 1:453, 2:657
 Black Hand, The, 1:267
 Black Harlem, 1:334
 Black Liberation, 1:177–178
 Black Liberation Army, 1:135
Black Magna Carta, 1:358
 Blackmun, Harry, 1:94, 1:136, 1:306
 Black Muslims, 1:42
Black Muslims in America (Fard), 2:570
Black Panther Party, 1:1, 1:42–43, 1:66–69, 1:178
 COINTELPRO and, 1:133, 1:134–135
 Marxism and, 1:403
 Black Power, 1:195
 Black Shadow, 1:455
 Black Solidarity Day, 1:43
 Black Star Line, 2:830–831
 Blackstone Rangers, 1:3
 Black Uhuru, 2:702

- Blacque, Taurean, 2:791
Blakely v. Washington, 2:732, 2:825
 Blalock, Hubert, 2:520
 Blanco, Kathleen, 1:363, 1:410
 Blandon, Danilo, 1:124
 Blanton, Tom, 2:745–746
 Blatt, Genevieve, 2:644
Blaxploitation movies, 1:69–70
Blood and Honor, 2:747
 Blood and Honour, 2:898
 Bloods, 1:3–4, 2:657, 2:916–917
Blood Simple, 2:538
 Bloodsworth, Kirk, 1:388
 Blue Bird Gang, 2:657
 Bluefield State University, 1:349
 Blueprints Conference, 1:97
 Blueprints for Violence Prevention, 1:96, 1:271–272
 Blueprints Replication Initiative, 1:96
 Blue River, 2:577
 Blumer, Herbert, 1:441
 Blumstein, Alfred, 2:644
 Bobby Hutton Community Clinic, 1:68
 Bogardus, Emory, 2:764–765
 Bogardus Social Distance Scale (table), 2:764
 Bogart, Humphrey, 2:538
Bonger, Willem Adriaan, 1:70–72
 Booker, Freddie J., 2:825
 Boorne, Jesse, 1:386–387
 Boorne, Stephen, 1:386–387
Boot camps, adult, 1:72–73
Boot camps, juvenile, 1:74–75
Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 2:823
 Border Fence Project, 2:523
 Bork, Robert, 1:12
 Bosket, Laura and Butch, 2:904
 Bosket, Willie, 2:903–904
 Boston Field Office of the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms (ATF), 1:76
Boston Globe, The, 2:503
Boston Gun Project, 1:75–77
 Boston Indian Council, 2:622
 Boston Mid-City Project, 1:191
 Boston Police Department, 1:76
 Boston School Police, 1:76
 Bottcher, Jean, 1:75
 Bowie, Maryland, 1:180
 Bowron, Fletcher, 2:925
 Boyd, Graham, 2:660
 Boyd, Gwendolyn V., 1:142
Boynton v. Virginia, 2:543
 Boys & Girls Clubs, 2:512
 Boys & Girls Clubs of Indian Country, 2:563
Boyz N the Hood, 2:538
 Bracero program, 2:606–607
 Bracey, William, 2:564
 Bradford, George, 1:38
 Bradley, Mamie, 2:807
 Bradley, Tom, 1:121, 1:465
 Brady Bill, 2:604
 Braithwaite, John, 1:394, 1:442–443, 2:712
 Branch Davidians, 2:519
Branch v. Texas, 1:305
 Brandeis University, 1:135, 1:177
 Brannen, Robert, 2:898
 Bratton, U. S., 1:252, 2:534
 Braun Center for Holocaust Studies, 1:14
Breed v. Jones, 1:425
 Breithaupt, Roy, 1:410
 Brennan, William, 1:136, 1:305, 2:543
 Brenner, Claudia, 1:341
 Brewer, Earl, 1:83
 Brewer, Lawrence Russell, 1:89
 Brewster, Kyle, 2:747
 Breyer, Charles R., 2:593
 Brief Strategic Family Therapy, 1:272
 Brighton Beach, Brooklyn, 1:269
 Brignoni-Ponce, Felix, 2:826–827
 Brinton, Daniel, 1:468
 Briseno, Theodore, 1:432–433, 1:463–464
 British Anti-Lynching Committee, 1:469
 British Crime Survey, 1:109, 2:837
 British East India Company, 2:608
Broken Blossoms, 2:497
 Bronx Botanical Gardens, 1:67
Bronx Tale, A, 1:268
 Brooklyn Law School, 2:877–878
 Brough, Charles, 1:252, 2:534
 Brown, Ed, 1:83, 1:462
 Brown, Elaine, 1:66, 1:68
 Brown, H. Rap, 1:134–135
 Brown, James L., 2:900–901
 Brown, Jim, 1:69–70
 Brown, John, 1:220, 2:750, 2:752
Brown, Lee P., 1:77–79, 1:338, 2:564
 Brown, Olivia, 2:791
 Brown, William, 1:248
 Brownback, Sam, 1:360
Brown Berets, 1:79–81
 Brownell, Herbert, 2:606–607
 Brown Group International, 1:78
 Brown Pride Gang, 1:455
Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, Kansas, 2:520, 2:550, 2:727
 ADL and, 1:14
 Bell and, 1:167
 Charles Houston and, 1:357, 1:358
Dred Scott and, 1:223
Johnson v. California and, 1:414
 LULAC and, 1:459
Mapp v. Ohio and, 2:475, 2:477

- NAACP and, 1:118, 2:542
Wilmington Ten and, 2:905
Brown v. City of Oneonta, 1:81–82
Brown v. Mississippi, 1:82–85, 1:260 facts of case, 1:83
historical context, 1:83–84
modern criminal procedure and, 1:84–85
Brown v. Texas, 1:370
Brucia, Carlie, 2:854
Brule Indians, 2:578
Brussel, William, 2:668
Bryant, Kobe, 2:845
Bryant, Roy and Carolyn, 2:806
Buck, Amanda, 1:387
Buckman, William H., 2:768
Bucqueroux, Bonnie, 1:139
Buddha, 2:616
Budzyn, Walter, 2:635
Bullard, Robert, 1:258
Bulletproof Monk, 2:498
Bully, Ella May, 1:85
Bully-Cummings, Ella, 1:85–86
Bumpurs, Eleanor, 2:878
Bumstead, Horace, 1:38
Burbank City Attorney's Office, 1:313
Burden of Innocence, 2:678
Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF), 1:180, 1:406, 2:563
Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, 1:450 Bureau of Indian Affairs, 1:86–89, 1:383–384 controversy, 1:88
history, 1:87–88
Office of Law Enforcement Services, 2:563
Peltier and, 2:617
present-day BIA, 1:88
tribal police and, 2:808
Bureau of Justice Assistance, 2:567
Bureau of Justice Statistics (BJS), 1:8, 1:161, 1:200, 1:204–205, 1:233, 1:240, 1:277, 2:582, 2:588, 2:660, 2:852, 2:858
Bureau of Justice Statistics State Court Processing Statistics, 1:450
Bureau of Labor Statistics, 2:646
Burger, Warren, 1:136, 1:306
Burgess, Ernest, 1:105–107, 2:762
Burkett, Randall, 2:831
Burma, 1:123
Burning Spear, 2:702
Burns, W. Haywood, 2:888
Burt, Cyril, 1:401
Bush, George H. W., 1:165, 1:285, 1:342, 2:802
Bush, George W., 1:15, 1:276, 1:278, 1:285, 2:683, 2:796, 2:883
Bush, Laura, 2:563
Butler, Dino, 2:618
Butler, Paul, 1:168, 1:416
Butler, Richard, 2:747, 2:899
Byrd, James, Jr., 1:89–90, 1:188, 1:339–340, 1:436, 1:470, 2:891, 2:899
Byrd, James, Sr., 1:89
Byrd, Stella, 1:89
Cabaia Boys, 2:745
Cabazon tribe, 1:310
Cabey, Darrell, 1:320–321
Cable News Network (CNN), 2:490
Cagney, James, 2:538
Cahill, Thomas J., 2:644
Cain, Burl, 1:365
Calabresi, Guido, 1:82
Calhoun, John C., 1:87
California Department of Corrections, 1:414
California Highway Patrol, 1:121, 1:432, 1:463
California v. Cabazon Band of Mission Indians, 1:310
California v. Powell, 2:495
California v. Stewart, 2:525
Cambridge-Somerville Youth Study, 1:191
Campbell, Bill, 1:338
Campbell, Terry, 1:94
Campbell v. Louisiana, 1:94
Campos, Pedro Albizu, 1:133
Camp Robinson, 2:577
Camp Savage, Minnesota, 1:408
Canty, Troy, 1:320
Capital Jury Project, 1:91–93
Capital punishment. See Death penalty
Capone, Al, 1:266, 1:268, 2:537
Carey, Hugh L., 1:44, 2:878
Carlie's Law, 2:854
Carmichael, Stokely, 1:134–135
Carpenter, Pamela, 2:718
Carrier, Aaron, 2:720
Carrier, James, 2:721
Carrier, Sarah, 2:721
Carrier, Sylvester, 2:721
Carrillo Fuentes organization, 1:373
Carter, Deborah, 2:844
Carter, Jimmy, 2:908
Carter, Robert L., 2:542
Carter, Sam, 2:720
Carter v. Jury Commission, 2:544
Carter v. Texas, 2:594
Carver, Allen, 1:136
Carver, Elnita, 1:136
CASASTART, 1:272
Cash, Herman, 2:745–746
Casino, 1:268, 2:538
Cass Technical, 1:85
Castaneda v. Partida, 1:93–95

- CBS Morning News*, 2:498
CBS News, 2:498
 Celia (slave), 2:527–528
Census of Juveniles in Residential Placement, 1:74
 Centennial Olympic Games, Atlanta, 1:338
 Center for American Progress, 2:523
 Center for Health and Gender Equity, 2:865
Center for the Study and Prevention of Violence, 1:95–97 model and promising programs (table), 1:97
 Center for Youth Policy Research, 2:559
 Center on Immigration and Justice, 2:836
 Center on Race, Crime and Justice. See John Jay College Center on Race, Crime and Justice
 Center on Sentencing and Corrections, 2:836
 Center on Youth Justice, 2:836
 Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, 1:96, 1:352, 2:558, 2:655
 Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), 1:123, 1:297
 Central Park, New York City, 1:98, 2:902
Central Park jogger, 1:98–99
 Centurion Ministries, 1:387
 Cerro Maravilla, 1:134
Chain gangs, 1:99–102
 dissolution/reemergence of, 1:101–102
 “good roads” movement and, 1:100–101 living conditions under convict leasing, 1:99–100, 2:706 Progressive Movement and, 1:99
 in South, 1:101
Challenge of Crime in a Free Society, The, 1:284, 2:644
 Chamberlain, Houston Stewart, 1:25
 Chambliss, Robert, 2:745–746
 Chambliss, William, 1:143
 Chan, Charlie, 2:497–498
 Chan, Jackie, 2:498
 Chandek, Megan, 2:845
 Chaney, James, 1:435
Changing America: Indicators of Social and Economic Well-Being by Race and Hispanic Origin, 2:648
 Chapdelaine, Father Auguste, 2:609
 Chapman, John Jay, 2:876
 Charging and Sentencing Study (CSS), 1:45
 Charitable Choice, 1:278
 Charles, Robert, 2:687
 Charleston Mob, 1:266
 Chavez-Thompson, Linda, 2:647
 Chavis, Rev. Benjamin, 2:906
Cheat, The, 2:497
 Chemical Diversion and Trafficking Act of 1988 (CDTA), 2:514
 Chen, Julie, 2:498
 Cherokee Nation, 1:380
 Cherry, Bobby Frank, 2:745–746
 Chesney-Lind, Meda, 2:864
 Cheyenne Indians, 2:578
 Cheyney State University, 1:349
 Chicago Alternative Policing Strategy (CAPS), 1:141
 Chicago Area Project, 2:763
 Chicago Crime Commission, 2:555, 2:557
Chicago Defender, The, 1:251, 1:322
Chicago race riot of 1919, 1:102–105, 2:688, 2:887 causes of, 1:104–105
 events of, 1:103
 precursor to, 1:102
 timeline of, 1:103–104
Chicago School of Sociology, 1:105–110, 1:302, 2:762 early work of, 1:106–107
 general concepts, 1:105–106
 juvenile delinquency, Shaw and McKay on, 1:107–109
 Chicago Theological School, 2:909
Chicago Tribune, 2:507
 Chicago White Sox, 1:267
 Chicago Youth Movement (CYM), 1:80
 Chicanos Por La Causa, 2:557
Child abuse, 1:110–112
 U.S. child population by race (2001) (figure), 1:110
 U.S. foster care population by race (2001) (figure), 1:110
Children of female offenders, 1:112–115 effect on children, 1:112–114 female offenders, 1:112
 research on, 1:114
 Children’s Bureau, 2:863
 Children’s Defense Fund, 2:558
Child savers, 1:115–119, 1:420
 Black child saving movement, 1:117–119
 history of, 1:115–117
Child Savers: The Invention of Juvenile Delinquency, The (Platt), 1:116
 Chiles, Lawton, 2:719
 Chilton, Richard, 2:800–801
 Chin, Ko-Lin, 1:17, 1:31–32
 Chin, Vincent, 1:35, 1:340
Chinese Exclusion Act, 1:119–121
 of 1882, 1:19, 1:34, 1:193, 1:374, 2:530
 of 1888, 1:374
 Chinese gambling, 1:309–310
 Chiricos, Ted, 1:165, 2:506
 Chivington, Colonel John, 2:578
 Choctaw tribe, 1:311
 Chomsky, Noam, 1:14
 Christian Front, 1:13
 Christian Identity, 2:892–894, 2:897
Christian Missions and Social Progress, 1:310
 Christian Patriot Defense League, 2:518

- Christopher, Warren, 1:121
Christopher Commission, 1:121–123
 Chung, Connie, 2:498
 Chung Ching Yee, 1:452
 Church, Frank, 1:133
 Churchill, Ward, 1:133
 Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 2:709
CIA drug scandal, 1:123–125
 Cicourel, Aaron, 2:707
 Cinque, Jose, 2:750–752
 Citibank, 1:269
Citizen King, 2:597
 Citizens Committee to Investigate the FBI, 1:133
 Citizens' preferences, 2:628–630
City of God, 2:538
 City University of New York, 2:877
 City University of New York School of Law at Queens College, 2:888
 Civil gang injunctions. See Gang injunctions
 Civilian Complaint Review Board, 2:877
 Civil Liberties Act of 1988, 1:409
 Civil rights. See Black Codes; Brown v. City of Oneonta; Brown v. Mississippi; Death penalty; Escobedo v. Illinois; Illinois v. Wardlow; Mapp v. Ohio; Maryland v. Wilson; Miranda v. Arizona; Moore v. Dempsey; Norris v. Alabama; Petit Apartheid; Profiling, ethnic: use by police and Homeland Security; Terry v. Ohio; United States v. Armstrong; United States v. Booker; United States v. Brignoni-Ponce; United States v. Wheeler Civil Rights Act
 of 1866, 1:150
 of 1957, 1:438
 of 1964, 1:14, 1:150–151, 1:223, 1:257, 1:258, 2:550, 2:746, 2:811, 2:832–833, 2:893
 of 1965, 1:336
 of 1968, 1:14
 Civil Rights Congress, 2:485
 Civil Rights Memorial, 2:767
 Civil Rights Memorial Center, 2:767
Civil Rights Record, The (Bardolph), 1:5
Clansman, The (Dixon), 1:54, 1:367
 Clark, Kenneth, 2:727, 2:730
 Clark, Mark, 1:67, 1:135
 Clarke, Edward Young, 2:832
 Claxton, Marquez, 2:605
 Clay, Cassius, Jr., 2:571
 Clean Air Act, 1:256
 Clean Water Act, 1:256
 Clear, Todd, 2:843
 Clear Law Enforcement for Criminal Alien Removal (CLEAR), 2:559
 Cleaver, Eldridge, 1:67, 1:135, 2:702
 Clement VI, Pope, 1:24
 Clinton, William J., 1:78, 1:124, 1:353, 1:360, 2:647, 2:667, 2:818
 Cloward, Richard, 2:774–775, 2:781
 Clutchette, John, 1:178, 1:404
Coal Black and de Sebben Dwarfs, 2:699
 Coalition for Juvenile Justice, 2:921
 Coatesville, Pennsylvania, 2:875–876
Coatesville Record, 2:876
 Coats, Brendan, 2:499
 Coca-Cola, 2:558
Cocaine laws, 1:125–128
 crack babies, 1:156–158
 crack epidemic, 1:59, 1:156, 1:158–160
 crack mothers, 1:160–161
Cochran, Johnnie, 1:128–129, 1:345, 2:600, 2:817
 Cochran Firm, 1:129
 Cocopah Indian Tribe, 2:563
Code of Theodosius II, 1:24
Code of the streets, 1:129–132
 Code of the Street (Anderson), 1:130, 1:299, 2:842, 2:873
 Coeur d'Alene Indians, 2:821–822
 Cohen, Albert K., 2:774–775, 2:780
COINTELPRO and covert operations, 1:133–135, 2:571
 Coker, Ehrlich Anthony, 1:136
Coker v. Georgia, 1:135–137, 1:429
 Colby, William, 1:124
 Coleman, Ed, 1:252, 2:534
 Coleman, Tom, 2:813–814
 Coler, Jack, 2:618
 Colfax, Louisiana, 1:434
 College of the Holy Cross, Worcester, Massachusetts, 2:802–803
 Collins, Addie Mae, 2:745
 Collins, Patricia Hill, 1:64
 Collins, Sarah, 2:745
Colonial model, 1:137–139
 Colorado College, 1:179
 Colorado Division of Criminal Justice, 1:96
 Colorado Trust, 1:95
 Colored Orphan Asylum, 2:686
Colors, 2:538
 Colson, Charles, 1:152, 1:279
 Columbine High School, 1:96, 2:726
 Columbus, Christopher, 2:580
 Colvin, Russell, 1:386–387
 Combined DNA Index System, 1:208
 Combs, Sean “Diddy,” 1:129
 Commission for Racial Justice, 1:256
 Commission on Accreditation for Law Enforcement Agencies, 1:339, 2:799
 Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, 2:603
 Commission on Organized Crime, 2:613

- Commission on Safety and Abuse in America's Prisons, 1:413
- Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians, 1:408
- Commission to Investigate Allegations of Police Corruption and the Anti-Corruption Procedures of the Police Department, 2:531
- Committee for the Improvement of Industrial Conditions Among Negroes, 2:569
- Committee on Urban Conditions Among Negroes, 2:569
- Common, 1:348
- Communications Act of 1934, 2:603
- Communist Party USA, 1:133–134, 1:178, 2:640
- Community Cop*, 2:605
- Community Council of Southwest Texas, 2:558
- Community policing, 1:139–142
Community Policing: A Practical Guide for Police Officers (Misner), 1:79
 defined, 1:139
 evaluation of programs, 1:140–142
 history of, 1:139–141
 role of research in, 1:140
- Community Resources Against Street Hoodlums (CRASH), 1:314, 2:700–701
- Community Right to Know Act, 1:257
- Compass, Eddie, 1:363
- Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984, 1:16
- Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, 1:186, 2:545
- Comstock, Ada, 2:555
- Comstock, Anthony, 2:536
- Comstock Law, 2:536
- Confederate Battle Flag, 2:550
- Confederate Knights of America, 1:89, 1:436
- Confederate Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, 1:436
- Conflict theory, 1:142–145, 2:690
 criminal justice policies, 1:143–144 culture conflict theory, 1:174–175
 racial conflict, 2:689–692
- Congreso de Latinos Unidos, 2:559
- Congress for Racial Equality (CORE), 1:134
- Congressional Black Caucus, 1:124, 1:410, 2:673
- Connell, R. W., 2:487
- Conservative criminology, 1:145–147
- Consumer racial profiling, 1:147–151 detailed look at, 1:148–149
 future of, 1:151
 legal issues of, 1:150–151
 overview of, 1:148
 prevalence/evidence of, 1:148
 research/theory of, 1:149–150
- Continental Congress, 1:87
- Controlled Substances Act of 1970, 2:545, 2:591
- Convention of Peking, 2:610
- Convict criminology, 1:152–153
- Convict lease system, 1:153–154
- Conyers, Georgia, 2:725
- Conyers, John, Jr., 2:878
- Cook, Wesley, 1:1
- Cook, William, 1:1
- Cook County, Illinois, 1:294, 1:420, 1:425
- Cooley, Charles Horton, 1:441
- Cool Hand Luke*, 2:538
- Coolidge, Calvin, 2:830
- Cool pose, 1:155–156
Cool Pose: The Dilemmas of Black Manhood in America (Majors), 1:155
- Cooper, James Fenimore, 2:504
- Copolla, Francis Ford, 2:538
- COPS, 2:500, 2:507–508, 2:796–797
- Corpus Christi, Texas, 1:458
- Correctional Association of New York, 2:889
- Corrections Corporation of America, 2:660, 2:662
- Cortez, Gregorio, 1:328
- Cortina, Juan, 1:328
- Cosby, Bill, 2:791
- Costigan-Wagner bill, 1:248
- Cotton, Shaquanda, 2:869
- Cottrol, Robert, 1:168
- Coughlin, Charles, 1:13
- Council of Churches, 2:557
- Council of Orleans, 1:24
- Council on American-Islamic Relations, 1:29
- Council on Law Enforcement, Education and Training (CLEET), 2:563
- Countdown to Lockdown*, 1:368
- Court of Indian Offenses, 2:573
- Court of Last Resort, 1:387
- Courtship of Eddie's Father*, 2:498
- Courts of Indian Offenses, 1:381
- Cowboy, Samson, 2:563
- Crack babies, 1:156–158
- Crack epidemic, 1:59, 1:156, 1:158–160
- Crack mothers, 1:160–161
Crack Mothers (Humphries), 1:160
- CRASH (Community Resources Against Street Hoodlums), 1:314, 2:700–701
- Crawford, James, 1:103
- Crazy Horse, Chief, 2:578
- Creativity Movement, 2:898
- Crenshaw, Kimberle, 1:169
- Cressey, Donald, 2:613
- Crime Bill, 2:602
- Crime Control Act
 of 1984, 1:17
 of 1990, 1:16–17, 2:697
 of 1994, 1:139

- Crime Control and Law Enforcement
 Act of 1994, 2:697
 Crime Index, 1:161–162
Crime in the United States, 1:161
Crime statistics and reporting, 1:161–165
 common offenses resulting in arrest by race in U.S.
 (2006) (table), 1:163
 National Crime Victimization Survey
 (NCVS) and, 1:164
 Part I offense arrest in U.S. by race
 (2006) (table), 1:162
 racial differences and, 1:162–164
 Uniform Crime Reports, 1:161–162
 Crime Victims' Fund, 2:859
Criminalblackman, 1:165–166
Criminalité et Conditions Économique
 (Bonger), 1:71
Criminality and Economic Conditions
 (Bonger), 1:71
Criminal Victimization in the
 United States (BJS), 1:8, 1:161
Criminological Theory (Lilly, Cullen, Ball), 1:52
 Crips, 1:3–4, 2:657, 2:916–917
Crisis, The, 1:39, 2:831
Critical race theory, 1:166–169 of crime, 1:167–168
 gender and crime in, 1:168–169
 history of, 1:167
 trends in, 1:169
 Critical Resistance: Beyond the Prison Industrial Complex, 1:178
Critical White studies, 1:170–171
 Crook, Shirley, 2:717
 Crook, Steven, 2:717
 Crouch, Stanley, 1:347
 Crouse, Mary Ann, 1:356
 Crump, Gwendolyn, 2:558
Crusade for Justice (Wells-Barnett), 2:887
 Cruz, Penelope, 2:500
CSI: Crime Scene Investigation, 2:792
Cuban Americans: Masters of Survival, 2:480
 Cuban Missile Crisis, 2:480
 Cullen, F. T., 1:52
 Cullen, Francis, 1:402
 Culp, Robert, 2:791
Cultural literacy, 1:171–173
 Cultural Literacy (Hirsch), 1:171
Culturally specific delinquency programs, 1:173–174
Culture conflict theory, 1:174–175
 Cumber, Harvey, 2:906
 Currie, Toya, 2:854
 Curry, David, 2:917
 Curry, Kathleen, 2:507
 Curtis, Edward, 2:505
 Curtis, Lynn A., 1:62
 Curtis, Tony, 2:538
 Custer, General George Armstrong, 2:578
 Customs and Immigration Enforcement, 1:224

 Dahmer, Vernon, Sr., 1:435
 Dakota Territory, 2:578
 Dallas Police Department, 1:330
Dances With Wolves, 2:505
 Dandridge, Dorothy, 1:187
 Danforth, John, 2:803
 Darden, Christopher, 2:600
 D.A.R.E. (Drug Abuse Resistance Education), 1:96, 1:271
Dateline, 1:148
 Dating-Violence Resource Center, 2:860
 Daughtry, Rev. Herbert, 2:878
Davis, Angela, 1:177–179, 2:597, 2:888
 Davis, Kiri, 2:727, 2:730
 Davison, Leonard, 2:821
 Davison, William, 2:821
 Dawes Act, 1:288, 2:586
 Dayton Peace Bridge, 2:616
D.C. sniper, 1:179–181, 2:669
 Deadwyler, Leonard, 1:128
Dearborn Weekly, The, 1:26
Death of Police Community Relations,
 The (Misner), 1:79
Death penalty, 1:181–184
 gender and, 1:183
 historical perspective, 1:181
 innocence and, 1:182
 international community on, 1:183–184 juveniles and mentally retarded persons, 1:183
 Martinsville Seven and, 2:484–485
 McClesky v. Kemp, 2:488–490
 public opinion on, 1:183, 2:670–672
 in U.S., 1:181–182
 See also Gregg v. Georgia
 Death Row U.S.A., 2:544
 Debbie Smith DNA Backlog Grant Program, 1:388 Declaration of Rights of the Negro Peoples of the World, 2:830
Decriminalization of drugs, 1:184–186
 Dee, Henry Hezekiah, 1:436
 Dees, Morris, 1:435, 2:747, 2:767
Defender, The, 1:103
 Defense Language Institute, 1:408
Defiant Ones, The, 2:538
Dehumanization of Blacks, 1:186–188
 Deinstitutionalization of Status Offender, 2:771
 Delaware Indians, 2:503
 DeLay, Tom, 1:311
 Delgado, Richard, 1:168, 1:412
Delinquency and Opportunity: A Theory of Delinquent Gangs (Cloward, Ohlin), 2:781

- Delinquency and victimization, 1:188–190.
See also Juvenile delinquency
- Delinquency prevention, 1:190–192. See also Juvenile delinquency
- Delinquent Boys* (Cohen), 2:780
- DeLone, Miriam, 1:197, 2:734
- Democracy in Action, 2:616
- Dennis, Rev. James S., 1:310
- Denny, Reginald, 1:464
- Denton, Nancy A., 2:777
- De Palma, Brian, 2:481, 2:538, 2:723
- Departed, The*, 2:538
- Department of Housing and Urban Development, 1:384
- Deportation, 1:192–194
- Detroit College of Law at Michigan State University, 1:85
- Detroit Free Press*, 1:86
- Detroit Police Department (DPD) Academy, 1:85
- Detroit riot of 1967, 1:194–195
- Deutch, John, 1:124
- Deviance, 1:441
- Dewey, John, 1:441
- Dial, Deputy Sheriff, 1:83
- Diallo, Amadou, 2:605
- Diamond, Raymond, 1:168
- Dickerson v. U.S.*, 2:603
- Dictionary of Film Terms* (Beaver), 1:69
- Differential social control theory (Matsueda, Heimer), 1:442, 1:443
- Differential treatment, 1:204
- DiGerlando, Benedict, 1:260
- Dill, Augustus Granville, 1:39
- Dilulio, John, 2:785
- Dime Novels, 2:699
- Dinkins, David N., 1:78, 2:531, 2:878
- Dirty Harry*, 2:538
- Dirty White Boys, 2:657
- Disciplining Bodies: Black Female Sexuality and Citizenship From Jim Crow to the Patriot Act* (Irving), 1:412
- Discrimination-disparity continuum, 1:195–199 debate on, 1:198
 definitions, 1:196
 discrimination-disparity continuum (figure), 1:197
- Disproportionate arrests, 1:199–200
- Disproportionate incarceration, 1:200–203 explanations for disparities, 1:202–203
 history, 1:201–202
 statistics, 1:201
 War on Drugs and, 1:203
- Disproportionate minority contact and confinement, 1:203–207 approaches to address minority overrepresentation, 1:206–207 court systems and, 1:205
 disproportional involvement and treatment, 1:204
 law enforcement and, 1:204–205
 risk factors (figure), 1:205
 War on Drugs and, 1:205–206
- Dixon, Thomas, 1:54–56, 1:367
- Dixon, Travis, 2:506
- DNA Evidence Backlog Elimination Act, 1:388
- DNA Fingerprint Act of 2005, 1:208
- DNA Identification Act of 1994, 1:208
- DNA profiling, 1:207–209, 1:388, 2:913
- DNA Sexual Assault Justice Act, 1:388
- Domestic violence, 1:209–211
- Domestic violence, African Americans, 1:211–216
 Battered Women's Syndrome, 1:214 intimate partner violence, explanations of, 1:212–214 intimate partner violence and arrest rates, 1:211–213 intimate partner violence and homicide, 1:212 offending/victimization rates, 1:211 perception as reality, 1:214–215
 research on, 1:215
- Domestic violence, Latina/o/s, 1:216–217
- Domestic violence, Native Americans, 1:218–219
- Donald, Michael, 1:435
- Donaldson, Ian Stuart, 2:747
- Door, The, 1:276
- Do the Right Thing*, 2:538
- Double Indemnity*, 2:538
- Douglas, John, 2:669
- Douglas, Stephen A., 1:219, 1:221–222, 1:306
- Douglas, William O., 2:543
- Douglas County High School, Douglasville, Georgia, 2:907
- Douglass, Frederick, 1:468, 2:755
- Dowler, Kenneth, 2:506
- Draft riot, New York City, 1:467, 2:686.
See also Race riots
- Draft riots. See Race riots
- Dred Scott case, 1:5, 1:219, 1:219–223, 2:520, 2:528, 2:699
- Drew, Charles, M.D., 1:357
- Drug Abuse Resistance Education (D.A.R.E.), 2:918
- Drug Abuse Warning Network, 1:241
- Drug cartels, 1:223–225
- Drug Courier Profiles, 2:666
- Drug courts, 1:225–228
 Drug Court Discretionary Grant Program, 2:591 juvenile, 1:423–424
- Drug dealers, 1:228–229
- Drug Enforcement Administration, 1:76, 1:124, 1:224, 2:666, 2:824
- Drug Policy Alliance, 1:286
- Drug sentencing, 1:229–233

- Drug sentencing, federal, 1:233–235
Drug trafficking, 1:235–237
Drug treatment, 1:237–239
Drug use, 1:239–241
Drug use by juveniles, 1:241–242
 Drumgo, Fleeta, 1:178, 1:404
Du Bois, W. E. B., 1:5, 1:37–39, 1:54–55, 1:167, 1:170, 1:242–246, 1:403, 1:468, 2:549, 2:831–832, 2:887, 2:910 in Atlanta, 1:244–245
 Du Boisian criminology, 1:245–246
 in Philadelphia, 1:243–244
 Dukakis, Michael, 1:165
 Duke, David, 1:435–436, 2:894
Duke University assault case, 1:246–248
Duncan v. Louisiana, 1:381
 Durkheim, Émile, 1:105, 1:442, 2:709, 2:758, 2:774
 Duster, Alfreda, 2:887
 Duster, Troy, 1:208
 Duvall County, Florida, 1:164
 Dwyer, Jim, 1:389, 2:912
 Dyer, Leonidas, 1:248
Dyer Bill, 1:248–250, 1:469
 Dyson, Michael Eric, 1:347–348
- Earl Warren, Shearman & Sterling
 Scholarships, 2:545
 Earl Warren Civil Rights Training Scholarships, 2:545
 Earl Warren Legal Training Program, Inc., 2:545
Early Show, The, 2:498
 Eason, Rev. James W. H., 2:831
 East Los Angeles Community Union, 2:557
East St. Louis Massacre: The Greatest Outrage of the Century, The (Wells-Barnett), 2:887
 East St. Louis riot of 1917, 2:887
 Eastwood, Clint, 1:367, 2:538
 Eaves, A. Reginald, 1:337
Ebony, 1:69
Eddings v. Oklahoma, 2:718
Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co., 2:595
 Educational Press Association of America, 2:768 Education Assistance Act, 1:88
 Edwards, Gary, 2:562
 Edwards, Ron, 1:436
 E. F. Hutton, 2:662
 E. Franklin Frazier Center, Howard University School of Social Work, 1:304 Eighteenth Amendment, 2:555
 18th Street Gang, 1:455
 Eighth Amendment, 1:45, 1:48, 1:136–137, 1:181, 1:183, 1:305, 1:325–326, 1:381, 2:482, 2:718–719
 Eighth World Youth Festival, 1:177
 Eisenhower, Dwight, 1:13, 2:606
 Eisenhower Commission, 1:345
 Eisner, Howard, 2:764–765
Elaine Massacre of 1919 (Phillips County, Arkansas), 1:251–253
 Elaine 12, 1:252–253
 Moore v. Dempsey, 1:253, 2:533–535
Elder abuse, 1:253–255
 Elizabeth Irwin High School, 1:177
 Ellington, Arthur, 1:83
 Elliot, Edward Charles, 1:344
 Elliott, Delbert, 1:95
 Ellis, Lee, 2:714
 Ellis Island, New York, 2:666
 El Rukin, 1:3, 2:657
 El Salvador, 1:454
 Emancipation Proclamation, 1:222, 2:549, 2:686
 Emerson, John, 1:220
Engel v. Vitale (1962), 1:14
 Enrique, Rene, 2:791
 Entman, Robert M., 2:494, 2:506–507
Environmental crime, 1:255–257
 Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), 1:257, 1:259, 1:384
Environmental racism, 1:257–259
 Epps, Reginald, 2:906
 Equal Employment Opportunity
 Commission (EEOC), 2:803
 Equal Protection Clause, U.S. Constitution, 1:258
 Equitable, The, 2:558
 Erikson, Kai T., 1:442
 Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, 1:364
Escape from Alcatraz, 2:538
 Eschholz, Sarah, 1:165, 2:506
 Escobar, Pablo, 1:223
 Escobedo, Danny, 1:260–261
Escobedo v. Illinois, 1:259–262, 2:525
 Esperanza initiative, 2:767
 Ethical Police Society, 1:331
Ethnicity, 1:262–265
 background, 1:262–263
 crime and, 1:263–264
 offending, incarceration, and victimization, 1:263
 research on, 1:264
 Ethnic profiling. See Profiling, ethnic: use by police and Homeland Security
 Ethnoracial prison ghetto. See Ghetto, ethnoracial prison
European Americans, 1:265–270 historical perspective on crime and, 1:265–268
 Russian Mafia and, 1:269–270 theoretical perspective on crime and, 1:268–269
 Evans, David, 1:247
 Evans, Hiram W., 1:435–436
Evening News with Dan Rather, 2:498
 Evers, Medgar, 1:435, 2:550, 2:833
 Every Victim Counts, 2:767

- Evidence-based delinquency prevention for minority youth, 1:270–273 effectiveness of, 1:272–273
 push for, 1:270–272
 Executive Order 9066, 1:406, 1:408
 Executive Order 12898, 1:258
Ex Parte Crouse, 1:356, 1:391
Ex Parte Crow Dog, 2:601
 Exposition Universelle, Paris, 1900, 1:38
Exxon Valdez, 1:256
 Ezell, Michael, 1:75
- Faces at the Bottom of the Well* (Bell), 1:167
 Fagan, Jeffrey, 1:17
Failure of the Negro Intellectual, The (Frazier), 1:303
 Fairness in Death Sentencing Act, 2:697
Faith-based initiatives and delinquency, 1:275–277
Faith-based initiatives and prisons, 1:277–281 initiatives, 1:278–280
 meeting needs of African American inmates, 1:280 participating agencies, 1:277–278 policy, 1:278
 statistics, 1:277
 Families Against Mandatory Minimum, 2:883
Family and delinquency, 1:281–284 prevention/intervention, 1:283–284
 research on, 1:281–283
 theories, 1:281
 Fanon, Frantz, 1:66, 1:137, 1:167, 1:403, 2:702
 Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front, 1:454, 2:478
 Fard, W. D., 2:570
 Farrakhan, Louis, 1:15, 2:571, 2:878
 Farrell, Amy, 2:597
 Fat, Chow Yun, 2:498
 Faulkner, Daniel, 1:1–2
Fear of crime, 1:284–286
 Federal Assault Weapons Ban of 1994, 2:604
 Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), 1:161, 1:178, 1:242, 1:340, 1:343, 1:406, 1:469, 2:478, 2:512, 2:519, 2:768, 2:796, 2:846, 2:852
 Citizens Committee to Investigate the FBI, 1:133
 Pictou-Aquash and, 2:622
 Supplemental Homicide Reports (UCR), 1:212, 2:848, 2:851, 2:855
Uniform Crime Reports (UCR), 1:8, 1:29, 1:35, 1:199, 1:204, 1:312, 1:396, 1:444, 2:486, 2:583, 2:672, 2:868, 2:870, 2:890 on violent crime rates (1960–1968) (table), 2:602
 Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 2:881
 Federal Bureau of Prisons, 1:278, 1:320, 2:572, 2:859
 Federal Communication Commission (FCC), 1:134
 Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), 1:364, 2:683
- Federal Fair Roosevelt Employment Practices Commission, 2:550
 Federal Housing Authority (FHA), 1:322
 Federal Trade Commission, 1:345
 Federation for Immigration Reform (FAIR), 1:22
 Feld, Barry C., 2:771
Felon disenfranchisement, 1:286–291 categories under state law (table), 1:287–289 current laws, 1:286–289
 history of, 1:289
 impact of laws, 1:289–290
 public opinion of, 1:290
 War on Drugs and, 1:290
 Felson, Marcus, 2:918
Female Crime and Delinquency (Mann), 2:474
Female gangs, 1:291–294
 ethnicity and gender issues, 1:292–293
 history of, 1:291
 reasons for membership in, 1:292
 research on, 1:293–294
 statistics, 1:291–292
 violence and criminality, 1:293
Female juvenile delinquents, 1:294–296
 Feminism
 Black feminist criminology, 1:64–66 perspectives on domestic violence, 1:213–214
 Ferguson, Ann, 2:728
Ferguson, Colin, 1:296–298, 2:665
Ferguson et al. v. the City of Charleston et al., 1:160
 Ferracuti, Franco, 1:130, 2:781
 Ferrer, Ramon, 2:751–752
 Ferrera, America, 2:502
 Ferri, Enrico, 1:51
 Fetchit, Stephin, 1:69
 Fickenauer, Jim, 1:373
 Fifteenth Amendment, 1:201, 1:222, 1:289, 1:438
 Fifth Amendment, 1:84, 1:93, 1:221, 1:262, 1:380, 2:822
 50 Cent, 1:347, 1:367
 Fine, Sidney, 1:194
 Finkelstein, Norman, 1:14
 Finnerty, Colin, 1:247
 Firearm Owners Protection Act of 1968, 2:604
 Firestone Rubber Company, 2:830
 First Amendment, 1:276, 1:380, 2:476
 First Crusade (1096), 1:24
 First Mexican Baptist Church, 2:558
 First Peoples. See Native American courts; Native American massacres; Native Americans; Native Americans: culture, identity, and the criminal justice system; Native Americans and substance abuse
 Fishbein, D. H., 1:54
 Fisk University, 1:243, 1:349, 2:885
Fist Full of Dollars, A, 1:367

- Fitzhugh, Howard Naylor, 1:357
 522nd Field Artillery, 1:408
 Five Mindfulness Trainings, 2:616
 Five Points, New York City, 1:266, 1:269
 Five Points gang, 1:28
 Fleming, J. L., 2:886
 Flemming Rule, 1:111
 Fletcher, Andrew, 2:602
 Fletcher, Ernie, 1:288
 Florida Board of Regents, 2:720
 Florida Department of Corrections, 1:278–279
 Florida State University, 2:474
 Floyd, Ruby Stroud, 2:484
 Flynn, James, 1:400
 Flynn, Stacey, 2:506
Focal concerns theory, 1:298–300
Focal concerns theory, labeling, 1:300–301
 Foley & Lardner, 1:86
 Ford, Gerald, 1:408
 Ford, Henry, 1:13, 1:26
 Ford Foundation, 2:557–558, 2:565
 Ford Hall Forum, 2:597
 Forester, J. Owen, 1:48
 Forrest, Nathan Bedford, 1:434
 Fortas, Abe, 1:390
 Fort Gibson, Oklahoma, 2:725
 Fort Snelling, Minnesota, 1:408
Fortune, 2:497
48 Hours, 2:538
 42nd Street Little Criminals, 1:455
 Forty Thieves, 1:266
 Foucault, Michel, 1:59
 Foundation Advocacy Initiative, 1:11
Foundations of the 19th Century,
The (Chamberlain), 1:25
 442nd Regimental Combat Team, 1:407–408
Four Little Girls, 2:746
 Fourteenth Amendment, 1:45, 1:93, 1:181,
 1:201, 1:261, 1:358, 1:381, 1:414, 1:438,
 2:476, 2:641, 2:769
Batson v. Kentucky, 1:48–50
Brown v. Mississippi, 1:81–84
Dred Scott, 1:222
 felon disenfranchisement and, 1:289
Furman v. Georgia, 1:305
Gregg v. Georgia, 1:325
McClesky v. Kemp, 2:488
In re Gault, 1:390
 Fourth Amendment, 1:81–82, 1:369–370,
 1:380, 2:556, 2:769, 2:827
Maryland v. Wilson and, 2:485–486
Tennessee v. Garner, 2:799
Terry v. Ohio, 2:801
 wiretapping and, 2:603
- Fox, Joe, 1:252, 2:534
 Foxman, Abe, 1:15
 Foxwoods Resort Casino, Connecticut, 1:311
 Francis, Robert E., 2:769–770
 Francois, Kendall, 2:669
 Frank, Leo, 1:13, 1:25, 1:434
Frankenstein, 2:538
 Franklin, Benjamin, 1:87
 Franklin, John Hope, 2:647–648
 Franklin, Shirley, 1:339
Frank v. Mangum, 2:535
 Frantz, Dennis, 2:792
 Fraternal Order of Police, 1:331
Frazier, E. Franklin, 1:301–305, 1:335 legacy of, 1:304
 on scholarship, 1:304
 on vestiges of slavery, 1:302–304
 Frederick, Maryland, 1:180
Freebie and the Bean, 2:538
 Free Breakfast for Children Program, 1:67
 Freedom Fest (Freaknik), 1:338
 Freedom Flotilla, 2:480
 Freedom of Information Act, 1:133, 2:593
 Freedom Riders, 2:543
 Freeland, Richard, 2:596
 Freeman, Alan, 1:167
 Freeman, Morgan, 2:538
 Freeport Doctrine, 1:222
Free Speech, 2:886
 French and Indian Wars, 2:503
 French Revolution, 2:750
 Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación
 Nacional (FMNL), 2:478
 Fresno State University, 1:77
 Frey, John, 1:67
Friday the 13th, 2:538
 Friends of the Earth, 1:256
 Frontline, 2:678
 Frye, Marquette, 1:461
 Frye, Ronald, 1:461
 Fuhrman, Mark, 1:128
 Fuk Ching, Chinese, 1:373
 Fulton County, Georgia, 2:488
 Furious Five, 1:348
Furman v. Georgia, 1:45–48, 1:181, 1:305–307,
 1:324–326, 1:429, 2:482, 2:543
- Gairy, Eric, 2:703
 Galarza, Ernesto, 2:557
 Gale, William, 2:518
 Gall, Chief, 2:578
 Gall, F. J., 1:51
 Gallegos, Herman, 2:557
 Gallup, George, 2:679

- Gallup polls, 2:670
- Gambling, 1:309–312
 betting on numbers, 1:311
 Chinese, 1:309–310
 criminal dynamics of, 1:311–312
 Native American, 1:310–311
- Gandhi, Mohandas K., 2:616
- Gang, The* (Thrasher), 2:892
- Gang injunctions, 1:312–314
- Gang Resistance, Education, and Training (G.R.E.A.T.), 2:918
- Gangster Disciples, 2:611
- Garafalo, Raffaele, 1:51–52
- Garcia, Andy, 2:500
- Garcia, Hector P., 1:459
- Gardner, Erle Stanley, 1:387
- Gardner, Howard, 1:400
- Garner, Edward, 2:798
- Garner, Edwin, 2:634
- Garvey, Marcus Mosiah, 1:253, 2:702, 2:829–832
- Garveyism, 2:830–832
- Garza, Ben, 1:458
- Gates, Daryl, 2:700
- Gault, Gerald F., 1:390
- Gavagan Bill, 1:469
- G. D. Searle, 2:558
- Geary Act, 1:119
- Gender entrapment theory, 1:314–316
- General Accounting Office, 1:227
- General Allotment Act, 1:382
- General Crimes Act, 2:585
- General Motors, 2:558
- General theory of crime, 1:316–318
General Theory of Crime, A (Gottfredson, Hirschi), 1:281, 1:316
- Gentleman's Agreement, 1:19, 1:34
- Geo Group, 2:662
- Georges-Abeyie, Daniel E., 1:61–62, 1:392, 2:619–621
- George (slave), 2:527–528
- George Washington University, 2:693
- Georgia Department of Offender Rehabilitation, 1:46
- Georgia Department of Pardons and Parole, 1:46
- Georgia Negro Exhibit, 1:38
- Georgia State Industrial College, 2:909
- Georgia State Supreme Court, 2:908
- Georgia Supreme Court, 1:46–47, 1:325, 2:907
- German-American Bund, 1:13
- Ghetto, ethnoracial prison, 1:318–320, 2:649
- Ghost Dance, 2:578–579
- Ghost Shadows, 1:36
- G.I. Bill, 1:145, 2:893
- GI Forum, 1:459
- Gilchrist, Jim, 2:523–524
- Giles, Albert, 1:252, 2:534
- Gill, Vernon, 2:564
- Gilmore, Gary, 1:306
- Ginsburg, Ruth Bader, 1:431
- Girl Like Me, A*, 2:727
- Gitlin, Todd, 2:504
- Giuliani, Rudolph, 1:141
- Glen Mills Schools, 2:918
- Gluek, Eleanor, 1:51
- G-Men*, 2:538
- Goddard, H. H., 1:399–400
- Godfather, The*, 1:268, 2:538, 2:869
- Godfather II, The*, 2:538
- Goebbels, Joseph, 1:13
- Goetz, Bernard, 1:320–321, 2:878
- Goldberg, Arthur, 1:261
- Goldman, Ronald, 1:128, 2:599
- Goldwater, Barry, 1:145
- Gonzalez, Julio, 2:665
- Goodfellas*, 1:268, 2:538, 2:869
- Goodman, Andrew, 1:435
- Gordon, Lexie, 2:721
- Gordon, Milton, 1:62
- Goring, Charles, 1:51
- Gorras Blancas, Las, 1:328
- Gottfredson, Michael, 1:281, 1:316–317, 2:761
- Gover, Angela R., 1:74
- Graham, John, 2:623
- Graham v. Connor*, 2:634
- Grand Council of Guardians, 1:332
- Granger, Lester, 2:569
- Grant, Ulysses S., 1:266, 1:434, 1:438
- Gray, Fred, Sr., 1:412
- Gray, Thomas, 2:751
- Gray's Anatomy*, 2:498
- Grayson, Francis DeSales, 2:484
- Great Depression, 1:329, 1:333, 1:375
- Great Migration, 1:318, 1:322–324, 2:763
- Great Society, 2:647, 2:880
- Great Train Robbery, The*, 2:537
- Greeley, Horace, 1:221, 2:503
- Green, Malice, 2:635
- Green Bay Packers, 2:683
- Greenberg, Bradley S., 2:793
- Greenberg, Jack, 2:542
- Green Dragons, 1:36
- Greene, Jack, 2:596
- Greensboro, North Carolina, 2:550
- Gregg, Troy, 1:325
- Gregg v. Georgia*, 1:45–48, 1:92, 1:181, 1:306, 1:324–326, 1:326, 1:429, 2:483, 2:489, 2:543.
See also Death penalty
- Gregory Congregational United Church of Christ, 2:906

- Griffin, Junius, 1:69
Griffith, D. W., 1:54–56, 1:367, 2:505, 2:537
Griffith, Michael, 2:878
Gringo Justice, 1:326–329 development of, 1:326–327
 Gringo Justice (Mirandé), 1:326
 Mexican-American War and Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, 1:327–328
 20th-century, 1:328–329
Groundings With My Brothers (Rodney), 2:702
Groveland Rape case, 2:550
Grubb, William, 2:554
Guardians, The (Police Associations), 1:329–332,
 2:605
Guardians Civic League of Philadelphia, 1:330
Guardians Club, 1:330
Guardians of Michigan, 1:331
Guerrilla Warfare (Guevara), 1:66
Guerry, Andre Michel, 1:106
Guess Who's Coming to Dinner, 2:538
Guevara, Ernesto "Che," 1:66, 2:702
Gulf, 2:558
Gulf Hammock, Florida, 2:720
Gun Control Act of 1968, 2:604
Gundlach, R. H., 1:51
Gun-Free Schools Act of 1994, 2:922
Gusman, Marlin, 1:365–366
Gutmann, Joe, 1:49

Habeas Corpus Restoration Act of 2007, 1:11
Habitat for Humanity, 2:616
Hagan, John, 1:17, 2:624
Hagerman, Amber, 2:854, 2:865
Haid, Charles, 2:791
Haile Selassie I, 2:702–703
Hairston, Frank, 2:484
Hairston, Howard, 2:484
Hairston, James Luther, 2:484
Hale v. Kentucky, 1:358
Hall, Allan, 2:906
Hall, Paul, 1:252, 2:534
Halloween, 2:538
Hamel, Veronica, 2:791
Hamilton, Mary Ethel, 1:357
Hamilton v. Morial, 1:365
Hamm, Mark S., 2:480
Hammerskin Nation, 2:899
Hammett, Theodore, 2:656
Hampden County Correctional Institution,
 Massachusetts, 2:658
Hampton, Fred, 1:43, 1:67, 1:135
Hampton, Joe Henry, 2:484
Hampton Institute, 1:38
Ham v. South Carolina, 2:544
Hard Boiled, 2:538
Harlem, New York City, 1:330, 1:333–336
Harlem Hospital, 1:335
Harlem race riot of 1935, 1:333–336, 2:688 aftermath of, 1:335
 events of, 1:334–335
 Great Depression and Harlem, 1:333–334
 Jim Crow and Harlem, 1:333
Harlem Riot, The (X), 1:335
Harm reduction, drugs and, 2:882–883
Harper's Ferry, Virginia, 2:752
Harper's Weekly, 2:876
Harris, David, 1:168
Harris, Eric, 2:726
Harris, Robert, 2:693
Harrison, Francis B., 1:336
Harrison Narcotics Tax Act of 1914, 1:16–17,
 1:336–337, 2:610
Hart-Celler Act, 1:375
Hartnett, Susan, 1:141
Hartsfield International Airport, 1:338
Harvard, Beverly, 1:78, 1:86, 1:337–339
Harvard, Jim, 1:338
Harvard Children's Initiative, 2:863
Harvard Civil Rights Project, 2:597
Harvard Crimson, 1:469
Harvard Law Review, 1:200, 1:357
Harvard Law School, 1:357
Harvard University, 1:243
Harvard University Pathways to Identity
 Project, 1:155
Haskell Indian Nations University, Lawrence,
 Kansas, 2:562
Hastie, William, 1:357
Hate crimes, 1:339–342
Hate Crime Statistics Act, 1:14, 1:29,
 1:342–344, 2:846
Hate Crime Statistics (NIBRS), 1:161
Hate Groups Map, 2:767
Hate That Hate Produced, The, 2:571
Hawaii Five-O, 2:791
Hawkins, Darnell, 1:353–355
Hawkins' Hierarchy of Homicide Seriousness
 (table), 1:354
Hayek, Salma, 2:502
Hayes, George Edmund, 2:569
Hays Production Code, 2:537, 2:869
Head Start, 1:191
Healing to Wellness Courts, 2:573, 2:588
Health Care Improvement Act, 1:88
Heanes, Herbert, 1:67
Hebert, Christopher, 1:17–18
Heimer, Karen, 1:442, 1:443
Heisey, Geoffrey C., 2:602

- Hells Angels, 2:657
 Hells Angels of San Quentin, 2:657
 Helmer, John, 1:16–18, 1:337
 Helms, Freddie, 1:121
 Henry, Patrick, 1:87
 Henry County Grand Jury, 2:484
 Hensley, Jarred, 1:436
 Hepatitis, 2:656
 Herbert Lehman Education Fund, 2:545
Hernandez v. New York, 1:417
Herrera v. Collins, 1:182
 Herrington, Cliff, 2:898
 Herrnstein, Richard, 1:9, 1:53, 1:401
 Hicks, Ed, 1:252, 2:534
 Hicks, Frank, 1:252, 2:534
Hicks v. State, 2:534–535
 Hidalgo County, Texas, 1:94
Higginbotham, A. Leon, Jr., 1:344–346
High Crimes, 2:881
 High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area (HIDTA), 1:78
 Hill, Anita, 2:802
 Hill, Lauren, 1:348
 Hill, Oliver W., 1:357
 Hill, Robert, 1:252, 2:534
 Hillsborough Correctional Institute, 1:278
Hill Street Blues, 2:791
Hip hop, rap, and delinquency, 1:346–349
 crime and, 1:346–347
 misplaced blame of hip hop, 1:347–348
 Hirabayashi, Gordon, 1:409
Hirabayashi case, 1:408
 Hirsch, E. D., Jr., 1:171–172
 Hirschi, Travis, 1:281, 1:316–317, 2:709–710,
 2:760–761
Historically Black colleges and universities, 1:349–351
History of Violence, A, 2:538
 Hitler, Adolf, 1:13, 1:15, 1:25–26, 2:896, 2:898
 Hitz, Frederick, 1:124
HIV/AIDS, 1:351–353, 2:655–656
 Hoffman, Darnay, 1:321
 Hoggard High School, Wilmington, 2:905
 Hohri, William, 1:408
 Holliday, George, 1:432, 1:463
 Holloway, Natalee, 2:863
 Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr., 2:476
 Home Depot, 1:460
Homicide: Life on the Street (Simon), 2:792
Homicide seriousness dyad, 1:353–355
 Hawkins' Hierarchy of Homicide
 Seriousness (table), 1:354
Homicide Studies, 2:782
 Hong, James, 2:497
 hooks, bell, 1:170
 Hoop Spur, Arkansas, 1:252, 2:534
 Hooten, Earnest, 1:51
 Hoover, Herbert, 2:554–555
 Hoover, J. Edgar, 1:134, 1:337
 Horizon Communities, 1:277, 1:279
 Horowitz, Carl, 1:372
 Horton, Willie, 1:59, 1:165, 1:285
 Hose, Sam, 1:466, 2:886
 Houlihan, Gerald, 1:44
 House of Detention (Tombs), 1:43
Houses of refuge, 1:111, 1:355–357
 House Subcommittee on Crime and Homeland
 Security, 2:604
Houston, Charles Hamilton, 1:357–359,
 2:541–542, 2:549
 Houston, William LePre, 1:357
Houston Chronicle, 2:558
 Howard Law School, 1:357–358, 2:542
 Howard University, 1:304, 1:349
 Howe, Frederic, 1:55
 Huff, C. Ronald, 2:912
 Huggins, Ericka, 1:68
 Hughes Brothers, 2:538
 Huie, William Bradford, 2:807
 Hull, John, 1:124
 Human Genetics Commission, 1:209
 Human Rights Watch, 1:29, 1:123
Human trafficking, 1:359–362
 antitrafficking efforts, 1:361–362 prevention and control of, 1:361 prosecution and treatment of, as organized crime, 1:360–361
 scheme of, 1:359
 U.S. legal response to, 1:360 victim protection through TVPA, 1:360–361
 Humphries, Drew, 1:160
 Hunkpapa Indians, 2:578
 Hunt, James, 2:906
 Hunter, Jesse, 2:720
 Huntington, Samuel, 1:21
Hurd v. Hodge, 1:358
Hurricane Katrina, 1:78, 1:362–366,
 2:492, 2:689, 2:794
 Husserl, Edmund, 2:758
 Hutchinson, Anne, 2:536
 Hutton, Bobby, 1:135
 Hyman, Elton, 2:798
Hypermasculinity, 1:366–368

 Ibn Abdullah, Muhammad, 2:570
 Ice-T, 2:793
 Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act, 1:192, 1:376
I'll Fly Away, 2:790

- Illinois Court of Appeals, 1:369
 Illinois State Militia, 1:103
 Illinois Supreme Court, 1:356, 1:369
Illinois v. Wardlow, 1:369–370
Images of Color, Images of Crime
 (Mann, Zatz), 2:474
Immigrants and crime, 1:370–374
 federal imprisonment, 1:371 gang-related delinquency and, 1:371–372
 organized crime and, 1:373
 segmented assimilation theory and, 1:372–373 social disorganization theory and, 1:372 traditional crime, 1:371
 underreporting of victimization and, 1:371 undocumented entry and deportation, 1:370–371 Immigration Act
 of 1875, 2:666
 of 1882, 1:119
 of 1917, 1:19
 Immigration and Customs Enforcement, 2:559
 Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965,
 1:20, 1:193, 1:375
 Immigration and Naturalization Act of 1924, 1:193
 Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS),
 1:180, 1:217, 2:607
Immigration legislation, 1:374–377
 race and, 1:374–375
 race as criterion for admission, 1:375–376 refugees and, 1:375
 unauthorized immigration, 1:376–377
See also individual names of laws
Immigration policy, 1:377–379
 Immigration Reform and Control
 Act of 1986, 1:20, 1:376
 Immigration Relief and Control Act, 1:376
 Immigration Restriction Act of 1924, 1:400
 Imperial Klans of America, 1:436
 Imus, Don, 1:188, 1:348
 Independent Commission on the Los Angeles Police Department, 1:121
 Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, 1:13
 Indian Alcohol and Substance Abuse Program, 2:591
 Indian Allotment Act, 2:586
 Indiana Reformatory for Women and Girls, 2:705
 Indiana University-Bloomington, 2:474
 Indian Child Welfare Act, 1:88
 Indian Citizenship Act of 1924, 2:581, 2:586
Indian Civil Rights Act, 1:379–382, 2:601
 Bill of Rights protections, 1:380–382 self-determination and, 2:587. See also Indian Self-Determination Act
*Indian Courts and the Future: Report of the NAICJA
 Long Range Planning Project*, 2:548
 Indian Gaming Regulatory Act, 1:311
 Indian Health Service, 1:384, 2:563, 2:591
*Indian Inmates of the Nebraska Penitentiary v.
 Charles L. Wolff, Jr.*, 2:584
Indian Inmates of the Nebraska Penitentiary v. Joseph Vitek, 2:584
 Indian Removal Act of 1830, 2:581
 Indian Reorganization Act (IRA), 1:87,
 1:383, 2:574, 2:586
Indian Self-Determination Act, 1:88, 1:382–384
 Industrial Workers of the World, 1:251
Inequality of Justice: A Report on Crime and the Administration of Justice in the Minority Community, The, 1:79
Inequality theory, 1:384–386
 Inglewood, California, Police Department, 2:822
 InnerChange Freedom Initiative, 1:280
Innocence Project, 1:386–389, 2:678, 2:913
 after exoneration, 1:388 applying for consideration by, 1:387 federal legislation, 1:388–389
 future of, 1:389
 history of exoneration, 1:386–387
 Innocence Protection Act, 1:388
 results, 1:387–388
In re Gault, 1:389–391, 1:425
In re Winship, 1:425, 2:826
 Institute for Urban Affairs and Research, Howard
 University, 1:77
 Institute on Race and Justice. See Northeastern University Institute on Race and Justice
 Institutional Review Board (IRB), 2:818
 Intelligence Project, 2:767
 Interagency Committee for the Review of Racial and Ethnic Standards, 1:449
 Intercourse Acts, 1:87
Intermediate sanctions, 1:394–395
 International Academy of Trial Lawyers, 1:129
 International Association of Chiefs of Police (IACP),
 1:78, 1:86, 2:631, 2:633
 International Association of Democratic Lawyers, 2:888
 International Labor Defense, 2:640–641
 International Monetary Fund, 1:361
 Internet, white supremacists and, 2:899–900
Interracial crime, 1:395–397
In the Heat of the Night, 2:538
In the Matter of Color (Higginbotham), 1:344 Intimate Partner Violence. See individual domestic violence entries
Intraracial crime, 1:397–399
IQ, 1:399–402
 Irish Americans, 1:265–266
 Irish Diaspora, 1:265
 Irving, Toni, 1:412

- Irwin, John, 1:152
 Islam, Yusuf, 2:592
I Spy, 2:791
 Israel-PLO treaty, 1993, 1:15
 Italian Americans, 1:267–268
 Italian Mafia, 1:267–269, 2:612, 2:838
 Iverson, Sherrice, 2:865
- Jackson, Andrew, 1:220
 Jackson, Anthony, 1:2
Jackson, George, 1:43, 1:403–404
 Davis and, 1:178
 George Jackson Brigade, 1:404
 Jackson, Jonathan, 1:178, 1:404
 Jackson, Maynard, 1:7, 1:77
 Jackson, Michael, 1:128
 Jackson, Rev. Jesse, 1:15, 1:69, 1:410
 Jackson County, Texas, 1:459
Jackson v. Georgia, 1:305
 Jacobs, Jerry, 2:906
 Jacobs, John, 2:569
 Jacques, Amy, 2:830
 Jade Squad Detective Unit, 1:36
Jamaican Posse, 1:404–406
 James, William, 2:887
 James II, King, 2:687
 Jamestown, Virginia, 2:577
 Jam Master Jay, 2:838
Japanese internment, 1:406–409 assembly centers and relocation camps, 1:407 internees return home, 1:408
 Japanese Americans in armed forces, 1:407–408 life in internment camps, 1:407
 Pearl Harbor and, 1:406 redress and reparations for, 1:408–409
 Jaworski, Leon, 2:644
 Jay Z, 1:347
J.E.B. v. Alabama, 1:417
Jena 6, 1:188, 1:409–411
 Jena, Louisiana, 1:164, 1:188, 1:409–410
 Jena High School, 1:409
 Jenks, Isaac, 1:252
 Jensen, Arthur, 1:401
 Jessica's Law, 2:854
 Jesus, 2:616
Jet Magazine, 2:807
 Jewish Americans, 1:266–267
 Jim Crow, 1:56–57, 1:117, 1:153, 1:175, 1:188,
 1:201, 1:289, 1:318, 1:322, 1:329, 1:335,
 1:469, 2:536, 2:649–650, 2:666, 2:738,
 2:806, 2:830, 2:893
 Disciplining Bodies: Black Female Sexuality and Citizenship From Jim Crow to the Patriot Act
 (Irving), 1:412
 discrimination-disparity continuum and, 1:197
 Great Migration and, 1:322
 Harlem race riot and, 1:333
Jin Fuey Moy v. United States, 1:336
 Joan of Arc, 2:639
 Jockey Club, 1:310
 Joge, Carmen, 2:558
 Johann Wolfgang von Goethe University, 1:178
 John Birch Society, 2:671
John Jay College Center on Race, Crime and Justice,
 1:411–413, 2:878
 Johnnie L. Cochran Jr. Middle School, 1:129
 Johnson, Alfred, 1:79
 Johnson, Byron R., 1:280
 Johnson, Charles Spurgeon, 1:5
 Johnson, Don, 2:791
 Johnson, Emma, 2:821
 Johnson, Guy, 1:353–354
 Johnson, James Weldon, 1:468
 Johnson, Lyndon B., 1:195, 1:345, 1:383, 2:557,
 2:603, 2:613, 2:644, 2:832
 Johnson, Rev. Suzan D., 2:647
 Johnson-Reed Act of 1924, 1:19
Johnson v. California, 1:413–415, 1:417
Johnson v. Texas, 2:718
 Jones, Audrea, 1:68
 Jones, Carwin, 1:409–411
 Jones, Eugene Kinkle, 2:569
 Jones, Richard Lloyd, 2:815
 Jones, Scipio Africanus, 1:252–253, 2:534–535
 Jones, T. K., 1:252
 Jones Act, 1:133
 Jonesboro, Arkansas, 2:725
 Jones-Brown, Delores, 1:412
 Jones-Shafroth Act, 1:456
Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Co., 1:150
Jones v. United States, 1:325, 2:826
 Joo, Sung-Hee, 2:499
 Jordan, Vernon E., 2:569
 Joseph, Peniel, 1:135
 Joseph Waddell People's Free
 Ambulance Service, 1:68
Journal of African American Studies, 1:413
Journal of Negro Education, 1:304
Journal of Social Issues, 2:780
 Judicial Conference, 1:345
 Judicial ghetto. See Prison, judicial ghetto
 Judicial Selection Project, 1:12
 Julius Rosenwald Fund, 2:817
 Jumping Bull, 2:622
Jurek v. Texas, 1:306
Jury nullification, 1:415–416
Jury selection, 1:416–419
 case law, and race, 1:417

- NAACP Legal Defense Fund on, 2:544 process of, 1:416–417 racial bias and, 1:418
research on, 1:418–419
- Justice for All Act, 1:388–389
- Justice Now, 1:178
- Justice Policy Institute, 2:660
- Justice Quarterly*, 1:58
- Justinian Code, 1:24
- Juvenile crime, 1:419–423
defining, 1:420–421
explanations for, 1:422
statistics on, 1:421–422
See also Juvenile delinquency
- Juvenile delinquency
Amendments to the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act, 1988, 2:921 boot camps and, 1:74–75
Chicago School of Sociology on, 1:107–109
Child Savers: The Invention of Juvenile Delinquency, The (Platt), 1:116 evidence-based delinquency prevention for minority youth, 1:270–273
female juvenile delinquents, 1:294–296
Juvenile Delinquency Prevention and Control Act of 1968, 2:647
Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act
of 1974, 1:190, 2:770–771
Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act
of 2002, 2:921
Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency
Prevention, 1:204, 1:207, 1:271, 1:276, 1:425, 2:512, 2:921
public opinion, 2:672–674
public opinion on, 2:672–674
Society for the Reformation of Juvenile Delinquents, 1:115
Youth Development and Delinquency Prevention
Administration, 2:647
See also Delinquency prevention; Juvenile crime
- Juvenile drug courts, 1:423–424
- Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act
of 1974, 1:190, 2:770–771
of 2002, 2:921
- Juvenile Mentoring Program, 2:512
- Juvenile Offenders Act, 2:903–904
- Juvenile Offenders and Victims: 2006 National Report*, 1:421, 1:427
- Juvenile waivers to adult court, 1:424–427 development of American juvenile justice system, 1:425 “get tough” philosophy and, 1:425–426
race and, 1:427
types of, 1:426–427
- Kaczynski, David, 1:413
- Kadela, Karen, 2:654
- Kahl, Gordon, 2:518–519
- Kairos Outside, 1:278–279
- Kairos Prison Ministry, 1:277–279
- Kairos Torch, 1:279
- Kairos Weekend, 1:278
- Kalven, Harry, 2:735
- K & A Mob, 1:266
- Kanka, Megan, 2:854, 2:864
- Kansas City Preventive Patrol, 1:141
- Kansas Exodus, 2:763
- Kansas-Nebraska Act of 1854, 1:220–221
- Kant, Immanuel, 2:765
- Karriem, Elijah, 2:570
- Kaslow, Audrey Rojas, 2:557
- Katz, Carl, 2:800–801
- Katz, Charles, 1:141
- Katzenbach, Nicholas deBelleville, 2:644
- Kawai, Yuko, 2:497
- Kean, Thomas H., 2:647
- Kefauver, Estes, 2:613
- Kelling, George L., 1:140, 1:145
- Kelly, Paul, 1:268
- Kemper County Trio, 1:83
- Kennedy, Anthony, 2:486
- Kennedy, Edward M., 2:593
- Kennedy, John F., 1:14, 1:173, 1:383
- Kennedy, Patrick, 1:137, 1:429
- Kennedy, Robert, 1:43, 1:345, 2:603
- Kennedy v. Louisiana*, 1:183, 1:429–430
- Kent State University, Ohio, 2:833
- Kentucky House of Representatives, 1:289
- Kentucky State Militia, 2:519
- Kent v. United States*, 1:425
- Kenyon, William, 2:554
- Kerner Commission, 1:345, 2:492, 2:504, 2:644
- Kerry, John, 1:124
- Keystone State Skinheads, 2:899
- Key West, Florida, 2:480
- KGB, 1:270
- Khmer Rouge, 2:639, 2:664
- Kill Bill*, 2:498
- Killen, Edgar Ray, 1:436
- Killer, The*, 2:538
- Killing, The*, 2:538
- Killing the Black Body* (Roberts), 1:169
- Kilpatrick, Kwame, 1:85
- Kimbrough, Derrick, 1:431
- Kimbrough v. United States*, 1:127, 1:393, 1:430–432
- King, John William, 1:89, 1:436
- King, Martin Luther, III, 1:410
- King, Martin Luther, Jr., 1:43, 1:277, 2:492,
2:571, 2:639, 2:688, 2:745, 2:833

- beginning of civil rights movement and, 2:807
 Burns and, 2:888
 COINTELPRO and, 1:134
 critical race theory and, 1:167
 OCCSSA and, 2:603
 peace pledge and, 2:616
 Wilmington Ten and, 2:905
- King, Rodney, 1:59, 1:336, 1:432–433, 2:495, 2:631, 2:635, 2:674, 2:688, 2:828
 Christopher Commission and, 1:121–123
 Los Angeles race riots of 1992 and, 1:463–465
 Taser evidence and, 2:790
- King County, Washington, 1:202
- Kirk Bloodsworth Post-Conviction DNA Testing Program, 1:388
- Kiss of the Dragon*, 2:498
- Kivivuori, Janne, 2:782
- Klaas, Polly, 2:854, 2:864
- Klan Courage*, 1:437
- Klansmen, The*, 1:437
- Klanwatch, 2:767
- Klebold, Dylan, 2:726
- Klein, Herbert M., 1:225
- Klein, Malcolm, 2:918
- Knapp Commission, 2:531
- Knights of America, 1:458
- Knights of Mary Phagan, 1:434
- Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, 1:435.
See also Ku Klux Klan
- Knights of the White Kamelia, 1:436
- Knobloch-Westerwick, Silvia, 2:499
- Knox, Joe, 1:252, 2:534
- Koch, Edward I., 2:878
- Koon, Stacey, 1:432–433, 1:463–464, 2:635
- Koons-Witt, Barbara, 2:870
- Korematsu, Fred, 1:409
- Korematsu case*, 1:408
- Koresh, David, 2:519
- Kornhauser, Ruth, 1:130
- Kotto, Yaphet, 2:792
- Koyuki, 2:498
- Kramer, John, 2:734
- Kuby, Ronald, 1:297, 1:321
- Kuhn, Fritz, 1:13
- Ku Klux Klan, 1:13, 1:21, 1:25–26, 1:135, 1:249, 1:433–437, 1:468, 1:469, 2:518, 2:749, 2:767, 2:832, 2:893, 2:896–897, 2:900
The Birth of a Nation and, 1:54–56
 history, 1:433–436
 modern-day Klan, 1:436–437
- Ku Klux Klan Act, 1:434, 1:437–439, 2:798
- Kunstler, William, 1:297
- Kurtis Blow, 1:348
- Kwong, Peter, 2:497
- Labeling theory, 1:441–444 behavior and, 1:441–442
 criticisms of, 1:443–444
 key concepts: primary and secondary deviance, 1:442 theoretical contributions, 1:442–443
- La Causa*, 1:80
- La Cosa Nostra, 2:613
- La 18, 1:455
- La Eme (Mexican Mafia), 1:452, 2:657, 2:899
- Lafleur, Nathaniel, 2:516
- La Guardia, Fiorello, 1:335
- Lake Michigan, 1:103
- Lakota Sioux Indians, 2:579
- La Mano Nera, 1:267
- La Mara, 1:454
- Lamberth, John, 2:663
- Lansky, Meyer, 1:267
- La Nuestra Familia, 1:452–453, 2:657
- Laos, 1:123
- Laqueur, Walter, 1:14
- La Raza, 1:22. See also National Council of La Raza
- Larson, David B., 1:280
- Latina/o criminology, 1:444–447
 city- and community-level studies, 1:446 immigration and, 1:446–447
 National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS) and, 1:444–445 national self-report surveys, 1:445
 research on, 1:447
- Latina/o/s, 1:447–451
 criminology, 1:444–447
 domestic violence and, 1:216–217
 historical context, 1:448
 identities and categorization, 1:448–449 incarceration and imprisonment, 1:449–450 media portrayals of, 2:499–502
 research on, 1:450–451
 sentencing disparities, 2:736–739
 victimization, 2:848–851
- Latin Kings, 1:452, 1:455, 2:657, 2:917
- Latino gangs, 1:451–455
 Almighty Latin King and Queen Nation (ALKQN), 1:453–454
 La Nuestra Familia, 1:452–453
 Mexican Mafia and, 1:452
 MS-13, 1:373, 1:454–455, 2:478–479
- LatinoJustice PRLDEF, 1:455–458 first case, 1:456–457
 history of, 1:456
 recent case of, 1:457
- Latino Juvenile Justice Network (LJJN), 2:559
- Latino Print Network, 2:492
- Lauter, Deborah, 1:22

- Lavater, Johann, 1:51
Law and Order, 2:506–508, 2:792
Law and Order: Special Victims Unit, 2:792
 Law Enforcement Against Prohibition, 2:883
 Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (LEAA),
 2:564, 2:602–603, 2:879
 Law Enforcement Education Program, 2:646
Law Enforcement Officers Killed and Assaulted
 (NIBRS), 1:161
 Lawrey Correctional Institute, 1:278
 Lazer, David, 1:208
 Leader, Noel, 2:604–605
League of United Latin American Citizens, 1:458–460
 Leary, Howard R., 2:877
 Leavenworth Penitentiary, Kansas, 2:617
 Lee, Bruce, 1:367
 Lee, Cynthia, 1:168
 Lee, George, 2:807
 Lee, James, 2:558
 Lee, Ki-Young, 2:499
 Lee, Spike, 2:538, 2:746
Legions v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 1:358
 Legomsky, Stephen H., 1:20
 Lehti, Martti, 2:782
 Lemann, Monte, 2:554
 Lending a Helping Hand, 2:568
 Lenin, Vladimir, 1:403
 Leonard, Don, 2:562
 Lerner, Rabbi Michael, 1:14
 Lessnau, Robert, 2:635–636
Lethal Weapon, 2:538
Lethal Weapon 4, 2:498
 Levin, Joe, 1:435
 Levin, Joseph J., Jr., 2:767
 Levine, James, 1:412
 Lewontin, Richard, 1:401
 Li, Jet, 2:498
 Liberia, 2:830
 Life Skills Training Program, 1:272–273
 Lil' Kim, 1:368
 Lilly, J. R., 1:52
 Lincoln, Abraham, 1:219, 1:221–222, 1:266, 2:576
 Lincoln, C. Eric, 2:570
 Lindesmith, Alfred, 1:336, 2:881
 Lindley, William Marvin, 1:387
 Lindsay, John V., 2:877–878
 Ling, Lisa, 2:498
 Lin He, 2:609
 Link, Bruce, 1:442
 Lin Zexu, 2:609
 Lippmann, Walter, 2:679
 Liska, Allen, 2:520
 Litras, Marika, 1:371
 Little, Malcolm, 2:571
 Little Bighorn, Battle of, 2:578
Little Big Man, 2:505
Little Caesar, 2:537
 Little Italy, New York City, 1:269
 Littleton, Colorado, 2:725
 Liu, Lucy, 2:498
 Liuzzo, Viola, 1:435
 Livingston, Sigmund, 1:13
 Llanes, Jose, 2:480
 Locke, Alain, 1:335
 Loesch, Frank, 2:555
 Lofland, John, 2:709
 Lombroso, Cesare, 1:51–52, 1:106, 1:145, 1:243, 2:666
 “Lone wolves,” 2:899
 Long Cheng, 1:123
Long Island Press, 2:504
 Long Island Rail Road, 1:296
 Looking Cloud, Arlo, 2:623
 Lopez, George, 2:502
 Lopez, Jennifer, 2:500
 Lord’s Prayer, 2:616
Los Angeles Business Journal, 1:129
 Los Angeles City Council, 2:925
 Los Angeles County District Attorney’s
 Office, 1:313
 Los Angeles Police Department (LAPD),
 1:80, 1:121, 1:432–433, 1:461,
 2:495, 2:793
Los Angeles race riot of 1965, 1:460–463
 criticism of McCone Commission Report,
 1:462–463
 Governor’s Commission on, 1:462
Los Angeles race riots of 1992, 1:463–465
 Los Angeles Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, 1:178
 Lost and Found Nation of Islam in the West, 2:570
 Louima, Abner, 2:631, 2:635
 Louisiana Department of Corrections, 1:365
 Louisiana State Penitentiary, Angola, 1:365
 Louisiana Supreme Court, 1:137, 1:430
 L’Ouverture, Toussaint, 2:750
 Love, Cash, 2:814
 Love Canal, 1:256
 Lowden, Frank, 1:103
 Lowndes County Freedom Organization, 1:66
 Loyola Law School (Loyola Marymount
 University), 1:128
 Luciano, Lucky, 1:267–268
 Luckmann, Thomas, 2:758
 Lunsford, Jessica, 2:854
 Lusane, Clarence, 1:347
 Lynch, Michael, 2:869
Lynching, 1:466–470
 antilynching campaigns, 1:468–470
 mechanics of, 1:466–467

- as social control, 1:467–468
 statistics, by state (figure), 1:467
Lynch Law in Georgia (Wells-Barnett), 2:886
- MacArthur, Robert, 2:713
 MacArthur Foundation's Models for Change Initiative, 2:559
 Macau, 1:309
 Macedonia Baptist Church, 2:767
 MacKenzie, Doris Layton, 1:74
 Mackintosh, Kenneth, 2:554
 Macon County, Alabama, 2:818
 Mad Bomber case, 2:668
 Madigan, Tim, 2:815
 Madison Square Garden, 1:26
 Madonna University, 1:85
 Mafia, 1:19
 American, 1:267
 Italian, 1:267–269, 2:612, 2:838
 Mexican, 1:452, 2:657, 2:899
 organized crime and, 2:610–614
 Russian, 1:269–270, 1:373
 Magnuson Act, 1:119
 Major Crimes Act of 1885, 2:586, 2:821
 Majors, Richard, 1:155
 Makonnen, Tafari, 2:702
 Malcolm X, 1:42, 1:167, 1:335, 2:571, 2:830
 MALDEF, 2:557
 Mallard, Matthew, 2:506
Mallory v. United States, 2:603
Malloy v. Hogan, 1:84
 Maloney, Jake, 2:622
Maltese Falcon, The, 2:538
 Malvo, Boyd Lee, 1:180
 Mamaroneck, New York, 1:457
Mandatory minimums, 2:471–474
 effectiveness of, 2:473
 historical perspective, 2:471–472
 policy implications, 2:473
 unintended consequences, 2:472–473
 Mandela, Nelson, 1:345, 2:639
 Mangum, Robert L., 1:331
 Manhattan Bail Project, 2:835
 Manifest Destiny, 1:327
Mann, Coramae, 1:198, 2:474–475
 Mann, O. B., 2:816
 Mann Act, 1:360, 2:536
Manoir de Diable, Le, 2:538
 Mapp, Dollree, 2:476
Mapp v. Ohio, 2:475–478, 2:491
 case facts, 2:476–477
 decision, 2:477–478
 Maranzano, Salvatore, 1:268
Mara Salvatrucha (MS-13), 1:452, 1:454–455, 2:478–479
 Central American, 1:373, 1:454–455
 National Gang Task Force, 1:455
Marcha de la Reconquista, La, 1:80
 March of the Reconquest, The, 1:80
 Marcuse, Herbert, 1:178
Mariel Cubans, 2:479–481
 Mariel Harbor, Cuba, 2:480, 2:723
 “Marielitos,” 2:480, 2:723–724
 Marijuana Tax Act of 1937, 1:16–17
 Marin County Courthouse, 1:178
 Marley, Bob, 2:702
 Marrero, Victor, 1:456
 Marseilles, France, 1:123
 Marshall, Thurgood, 1:94, 1:128, 1:136, 1:305, 1:357–358, 1:468, 2:481–484, 2:542–543, 2:549
Marshall Hypotheses, 2:481–484
 Martin, John, 1:252, 2:534
 Martineau, John E., 2:535
 Martinez, Ramiro, 1:372, 2:481
 Martin Luther King Day, 2:616
 Martinsville, Virginia, 2:484
Martinsville Seven, 2:484–485
 Maruna, Shadd, 1:146
 Marx, Karl, 1:9, 1:167, 1:403, 2:765
 Black Panther Party and Marxism, 1:403
 Bonger and, 1:71–72
 COINTELPRO and Marxism, 1:134
 Du Bois and, 1:245
 moral panics and Marxism, 2:535
 Maryland Court of Special Appeals, 2:486
 Maryland Department of Juvenile Justice, 2:787
Maryland v. Wilson, 2:485–486
 Masaryk, Thomas, 2:709
Masculinity and crime, 2:486–488
 Mason, B. J., 1:69
 Mason, Perry, 1:387
 Massachusetts Department of Youth Services, 1:76
 Massachusetts Shannon Comprehensive Safety Initiative, 2:597
 Massachusetts State Police, 1:76
 Massachusetts Statewide Racial and Gender Profiling, 2:597
 Massey, Douglas S., 2:777
 Massiah, Winston, 1:261
Massiah v. United States, 1:261, 2:525
 Mathews, Robert, 2:897
 Matsueda, Ross L., 1:443, 2:776
Mattern v. State, 2:595
 Maxson, Cheryl, 2:918
 Mazza, Donald Reed, 2:899
 McCarren-Walter Act, 1:374

- McCarthy, Carolyn, 1:297
 McCleskey, Warren, 1:48–49, 2:488–490
McCleskey v. Kemp, 1:45, 1:48–49 1:182, 2:488–490, 2:544, 2:697
 McCloskey, James, 1:387
McCollum v. Board of Education (1948), 1:13
 McCone, John, 1:462
 McCone Commission, 1:462–463
 McCormick, Paul, 2:554
 McCullough, William, 2:815
 McCurdy, Dave, 2:490
 McDaniel, James, 2:792
 McDowell, Calvin, 2:886
 McDuffie, Arthur, 2:516, 2:688
 McFadden, Martin, 2:800
 McFaul, Thomas, 2:764–765
McGautha v. California, 1:305–306
 McGee, Zina, 2:842
 McHaney, Edgar, 2:535
 McKay, Henry D., 1:105–109, 2:762–763, 2:868
 McKay Commission, 1:42
McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 1:425
 McKinney, Cynthia, 2:683
 McKinney, Gene, 1:67
 McKoy, James, 2:906
 McNair, Denise, 2:745
 McRae, Thomas C., 2:535
McVeigh, Timothy, 2:490–491, 2:519, 2:665, 2:899
 Mead, George Herbert, 1:105, 1:441
 Meade County Fairgrounds, Brandenburg, Kentucky, 1:436
 Means, Russell, 2:579
 Medellín, 1:124, 1:159, 1:223, 1:228
 Medgar Evers College, 1:413
 Media
 mass murder and, 2:665
 portrayals of school shootings in, 2:725–726
 racialization of crime and, 2:695–696
 See also individual media entries
Media, print, 2:491–493
Media portrayals of African Americans, 2:493–496
 depiction of crime and, 2:494–495 depiction of negative role models, 2:495–496
 depiction of White police authority, 2:495
 historical perspective, 2:493–494
Media portrayals of Asian Americans, 2:496–499
 accomplishments of Asian Americans and, 2:496–497
 Asian Americans in media, 2:497–499
 “yellow peril” vs. “model minority,” 2:497
Media portrayals of Latina/o/s Americans, 2:499–502 criminal activities and, 2:500–501 impact of exposure to, 2:501–502 improving quality of, 2:502
Media portrayals of Native Americans, 2:502–505
 missing media portrayal of Native Americans, 2:505 types of media and types of portrayals, 2:503–505
Media portrayals of White Americans, 2:506–508
Mediation in criminal justice, 2:508–511 challenges of, 2:510
 defined, 2:508–509
 future of, 2:510–511
 uses of, 2:509–510
 Megan’s Law, 2:672, 2:864, 2:907
Mein Kampf (Hitler), 1:25
 Meloni, Christopher, 2:793
 Melton, Roy, 2:815
 Melville, Herman, 2:774
Memoirs of a Geisha, 2:498
 Memphis Police Department, 2:798
Memphis Speech and Headlight, 2:885–886
Menace II Society, 2:538
 Mencia, Carlos, 2:502
Mendez v. Westminster, 1:459
 Menominee Indians, 2:622
 Men’s Sunday Club, 2:910
Mentoring programs, 2:511–513
 Meriam Report, 1:87
Meridian Star, The, 1:84
 Merkerson, S. Epatha, 2:792
 Merrill, Silas, 1:386
 Merrill Lynch, 2:662
 Merton, Robert, 2:690, 2:774–775
Messenger, 2:832
 Messerschmidt, James, 2:487–488
 Metesky, George, 2:668
Methamphetamine, 2:513–515
 racial data by fiscal year (figure), 2:514
 Metzger, Tom, 2:747–748, 2:894, 2:899
 Mexican American Community Programs Foundation, Inc., 2:557
 Mexican-American Legal Defense and Educational Fund (MALDEF), 1:460
 Mexican American Unity Council, 2:557–558
 Mexican-American War, 1:327–328, 1:448
Mexican Labor in the United States, 1:446
 Mexican Mafia (La Eme), 1:452, 2:657, 2:899
 Meyer, Michelle, 1:208
 Meyers, Marian, 2:845
 Miami, Florida, 1:225
 Miami Colored Police Benevolent Association, 1:330
 Miami-Dade County, Florida, 2:480–481
Miami Herald, 2:516
Miami riot of 1980, 2:515–517
 Miami River Cops, 2:631–632
Miami Vice, 2:481, 2:791
 Michigan Militia, 2:519
Michigan v. Chesternut, 1:370

- Micmac Indians, 2:622
 Middle Passage, 2:753
 Midwestern Prevention Project, 1:272
 Mieske, Kenneth "Ken Death," 2:747
 Mike's Grocery, 2:906
 Milam, J. W., 2:806–807
 Military Intelligence Service, 1:408
 Military Intelligence Service Language School, 1:408
 Militia of Montana, 2:897
Militias, 2:517–520
 history, 2:518
 ideology, 2:518
 militia groups, 2:518–519. See also individual names of militia groups
 Miller, Canfield, Paddock & Stone, 1:86
 Miller, Jerome, 2:694
 Miller, Jerry, 1:387
 Miller, Jody, 2:864
 Miller, John, 1:253
 Miller, John F., 1:120
 Miller, Kelly, 1:5
 Miller, Susan, 2:870
 Miller, Walter B., 1:143, 1:298–299, 2:780
Miller-El v. Dretka, 1:417
 Million Man March, 2:572
 Million Youth March, 2:605
 Milner, Booker, 2:484
 Milovanovic, Dragan, 2:619
Mind of Mencia, 2:502
 Minneconjou Indians, 2:578
 Minnesota Department of Corrections, 2:711
 Minority Aids Initiative, 1:353
Minority group threat, 2:520–523
 impact of perceived threat, 2:521–522 measurement of perceived threat, 2:520–521
 Minton, Mark, 2:559
Minutemen, 2:523–525
 criticisms and trends, 2:524
 Minuteman Project, 2:523–524, 2:900
 Minutemen Civil Defense Corps (MCDC), 2:523–524
 politics, 2:524
 Miranda, Ernesto, 2:525–526
Miranda v. Arizona, 1:84–85, 1:260, 1:262, 2:525–527, 2:603
 Mirandé, Alfredo, 1:326
 Misner, Gordon C., 1:79
 Missing Children Act, 2:854
 Mission Development Council, 2:557–558
Mission Impossible, 2:792
Mississippi Burning, 2:833
 Missouri Compromise of 1820, 1:220–221, 1:327, 2:750
Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 1:358
 Missouri Supreme Court, 1:220, 2:528, 2:718
Missouri v. Celia, a Slave, 2:527–529
 Mitchell, John P., 1:55
 Mitchell, Ojmarrh, 1:74
 Mitchell, Steve, 2:906
 Mittell, Jason, 2:793
 Moakley-DeConcini Bill, 2:559
 Mobilization for Youth, 1:191
Mob Rule in New Orleans (Wells-Barnett), 2:886
Model minorities, 2:529–531
 Modern Criminal Sciences Series, 1:71
 Modified labeling theory (Link), 1:442
Mod Squad, 2:791
 Mohammed, Imam W. Deen, 2:571
 Mohawk Indians, 2:505
 Mohegun Sun, 1:311
 Mohr, G. J., 1:51
 Mollen, Milton, 2:531
Mollen Commission, 2:531–533
 M-1, 1:348
 Money, Mississippi, 2:891
 Monitoring the Future, 1:241
Monster, 2:538
 Montana Freeman, 2:519
 Montgomery, Alabama, 1:180
 Montgomery Bus Boycott, 2:807
 Moore, Bob, 1:325
 Moore, Charles Eddie, 1:436
 Moore, Frank, 1:252, 2:534
 Moore, Harry T., 2:550
 Moore, Joe, 2:813
 Moore, Mark, 1:140
 Moore, Phylcia, 2:863
 Moore, Wayne, 2:906
Moore v. Dempsey, 1:251–253, 2:533–535
 Moorish Science Temple, 2:702
Moral panics, 2:535–537
 Colonial era, 2:535–536
 modern, 2:536–537
 19th-century, 2:536
Morals and Manners Among Negro Americans (AUSSR), 1:39–40
Moran v. Burbine, 2:526
 Morgan County, Alabama, 2:594–595
 Morial, Marc H., 2:569, 2:707
 Morongo tribe, 1:310
 Morrill Act of 1890, 1:349
 Morris, Greg, 2:792
 Morris Brown College, 1:338, 1:339
 Morrison, Katherine, 2:844
 Morselli, Henry, 2:709
 Mos Def, 1:348
 Moses Lake, Washington, 2:725
 Mosher, Donald, 1:366

- Moskowitz, Henry, 2:549
 Moss, Thomas, 2:886
 Motely, Constance Baker, 2:542
 Motion Picture Association of America (MPAA), 2:537
 MoveOn.org, 1:15
Movies, 2:537–539. See also individual titles of movies
 Moyo, Ki-Afi, 1:410
 M Street High School, Washington, D.C., 1:357
 Muhammad, Elijah, 2:570–571
 Muhammad, John, 1:180
 Muhammad, W. F., 2:570
 Muhammad, Wallace D., 2:571
 Multisystemic Therapy, 1:272
Mummy, The, 2:538
 Murder, Inc., 1:267
 Murguía, Janet, 2:559
 Murphy, Col. George, 2:534–535
 Murphy, Patrick, 1:140
 Murray, Charles, 1:9, 1:53, 1:401
Murray v. Pearson, 1:358
Musketeers of Pig Alley, The, 2:537
My Grandfather's Son (Thomas), 2:802
 MySpace.com, 2:899
Myth of a racist criminal justice system, 2:539–540
Myth of a Racist Criminal Justice System, The (Wilbanks), 1:392, 2:707–708
- NAACP Legal Defense Fund, 1:46, 2:541–545
 on capital punishment, 2:543–544 creation of, 2:542
 Criminal Justice Project, 2:544–545
 criminal litigation and, 2:542 desegregation in education litigation campaign, 2:541–542
 founding of, 2:541
 jury selection and prisoner's rights cases, 1970s, 2:544
 National Office for the Rights of the Indigent (NORI), 2:542–543 in 1960s, 2:543
 scholarship program, 2:545
See also National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP)
- Nabrit, James, 1:357
 Nagin, Ray, 1:363, 2:683
 Nancy, Ashis, 1:366
 Napier, Lord, 2:608
 Napier, Samuel L., 1:68
 Napier Intercommunal Youth Institute, 1:68
 Napoleon Bonaparte, 2:750
 Narcotic Drugs Import and Export Act of 1909, 1:337
- Narcotics Anonymous, 1:238
 National Academy, Federal Bureau of Investigation, 1:338
 National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, 1:345, 2:492, 2:644
 National Advisory Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence, 1:345
National African American Drug Policy Coalition, 2:545–547, 2:546, 2:883
 National African-American Press Convention, 2:885
 National Alliance, 2:524, 2:897–898
National American Indian Court Judges Association, 2:547–548, 2:567–568
 National Asian American Pacific Legal Consortium, 2:847
 National Association for Multicultural Education, 2:768
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), 1:39, 1:54–55, 1:83, 1:252–253, 1:345, 1:435, 1:469, 2:485, 2:517, 2:534, 2:549–552, 2:641, 2:807, 2:813, 2:887, 2:894 on Brown v. Board of Education, 1:118, 2:542
 Charles Houston and, 1:358
 Dyer Bill and, 1:248–249
 history of, 2:549–550
 key objectives, 2:550–551
 Legal Defense Fund, 1:46, 2:541–545
 recent achievements, 2:550
 National Association for the Advancement of White People (NAAWP), 1:435
National Association of Blacks in Criminal Justice, 2:552–554
National Association of Blacks in Criminal Justice Official History, 2:553
 National Association of Colored Women, 1:469
 National Association of Counties, 2:513
 National Association of Hispanic Journalists, 2:501
 National Association of Sentencing Advocates, 2:743
 National Association of Sentencing and Mitigation Specialists, 2:743
 National Bar Association, 1:358, 2:546
 National Basketball Association, 2:773
 National Black Officer Association, 1:332
 National Board of Censorship, 1:55
 National Center for Children in Poverty, 2:785
 National Center for Educational Statistics, 1:350
 National Center for Juvenile Justice, 2:871
 National Center for the Analysis of Violent Crime, 2:669
 National Center for Victims of Crime, 1:253, 1:352, 2:859
 National Colored League, 1:56
 National Commission on Correctional Health Care, 2:655–656

- National Commission on Excellence in Education, 1:41
- National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement, 2:554–557
- National Commission on the Black Male, 2:570
- National Conference on Administration of Justice and the Mexican American, 2:558
- National Congress of American Indians, 2:563
- National Council of Churches in Australia, 2:616
- National Council of Colored Women's Clubs, 1:118
- National Council of La Raza, 2:557–560
- National Council on Crime and Delinquency, 1:393
- National Crime Survey, 1:244
- National Crime Syndicate, 2:613
- National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS), 1:8, 1:200, 1:450, 2:573, 2:808, 2:840,
2:848, 2:851, 2:855
crime statistics and reporting, 1:161, 1:164
establishment of, 2:645
on interracial crime, 1:396, 1:398
Latina/o criminology, 1:444–445
on Native American victimization, 2:582–583 polling for, 2:680
- National Criminal Justice Association, 2:560–562
- National Criminal Justice Reference Service,
1:207, 2:567
- National DNA Database, 1:208
- National DNA Index System, 1:208
- National Domestic Violence Hotline,
2:865, 2:867
- National Drug Threat Assessment, 1:235–236
- National Environmental Policy Act, 1:257
- National Episcopal Church, 1:68
- National Evaluation of the Gang Resistance
Education and Training, 1:317
- National Fair Housing Alliance, 2:558
- National Family Violence Survey, 1:211
- National Father's Day Committee, 1:79
- National Firearms Act of 1934, 2:604
- National Front Party, 2:746–747
- National Gang Peace Summit, 1:3
- National Geographic Channel, 2:498
- National Guard, 1:364, 1:407
- National Household Survey on Drug Abuse, 2:680
- National Incident-Based Reporting System (NIBRS), 1:161, 1:398
- National Indian Gaming Commission, 1:310
- National Indian Justice Center, 2:547
- National Instant Criminal Background
Check System, 2:604
- National Institute for Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice, 2:564
- National Institute of Correction Information Center, 1:277
- National Institute of Justice, 1:74, 1:233, 1:271,
1:339, 2:603, 2:644, 2:681
- Nationalist Socialist: Journal of the American National Socialist Workers Party, 2:898*
- National Latino Officers Association, 2:605
- National Law Journal, 1:129*
- National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health, 1:445
- National Minority Advisory Council on Criminal Justice to LEAA (Law Enforcement Assistance Administration), 1:79
- National Minority Aids Council, 2:655
- National Museum of the American Indian, 2:505
- National Native American Law Enforcement Association, 2:562–564
- National Negro Committee, 2:549
- National Negro Health Week, 2:910
- National Office for the Rights of the Indigent (NORI), 2:542–543
- National Organization for Mexican American Services (NOMAS), 2:557
- National Organization for Victim Assistance (NOVA), 2:859
- National Organization of Black Law Enforcement Executives, 1:78, 1:86, 1:339, 2:564–567 activities of, 2:565–566
founding of, 2:564
mission, principles, purpose, objectives, 2:565
- National Security Entry/Exit Registration System
(NSEERS), 1:21
- National Socialist German Workers Party (Nazi), 2:896, 2:898
- National Socialist Movement, 1:437, 2:898, 2:900
- National Survey on Drug Use and Health, 1:125,
1:240–242, 1:294, 2:680
- National Tribal Justice Resource Center, 2:548,
2:567–568
- National Urban League, 1:322, 2:568–570
- National Victim Assistance Academy, 2:711
- National Violence Against Women Survey, 2:866
- National Vital Statistics System (NVSS), 2:848
- National Wildlife Federation, 1:256
- National Youth Gang Survey, 1:4
- Nation at Risk, A, 1:41*
- Nation of Islam, 1:134, 2:570–572, 2:702, 2:878
- Native American Advisory Group, 2:742
- Native American courts, 2:572–576
contextual description of, 2:574–575
crime and, 2:572–573
critical issues of, 2:575–576
historical perspective, 2:573–574
- Native American massacres, 2:576–580
arrival of Europeans and, 2:577
Jamestown, 2:577

- Little Bighorn Battle, 2:578
Sand Creek, 2:578
Wounded Knee, 2:578–579, 2:581, 2:622
- Native Americans, 2:580–584
American Indian Movement (AIM), 2:584
crime and, 2:581–582
current status of, 2:581
domestic violence and, 1:218–219
gambling by, 1:310–311
historical perspective, 2:580–581
incarceration of, 2:583–584
media portrayals of, 2:502–505
sentencing disparities, 2:739–743
substance abuse and, 2:582, 2:589–592 victimization of, 2:582–583, 2:851–854
- Native Americans: culture, identity, and the criminal justice system, 2:585–589
allotment and assimilation, 2:586
conflict and, 2:585
Indian rights and movement toward self determination, 2:586–589
paternalism and, 2:585–586
- Native Americans and substance abuse, 2:582, 2:589–592
causes of, 2:590
epidemiology, 2:589–590
future of, 2:591–592
prevention and treatment, 2:590–591
- Native Land Claims, 2:618
Natural Born Killers, 2:869
Navajo Nation, 1:381, 2:563, 2:828
Navajo Tribal Code, 2:828
Navajo Tribal Court, 2:828
Navarette, Lisa, 1:22
Nazis, 1:437, 2:894, 2:896, 2:898
NBC News, 2:498
Neal, Claude, 1:466
Negro Factories Corporation, 2:829, 2:832
Negro Fellowship League, 2:887
Negro Health Week, 2:910
Negro Law Enforcement Association, 1:330
Negro World, The, 2:829
Negro Year Book, 2:909
Neighborhood Team Policing (Brown), 1:77
Neta, 2:657
Neufeld, Peter J., 1:386, 1:389, 2:912–913
Nevers, Larry, 2:635
New Anti-Semitism, The, 1:14
Newark Foot Patrol Experiment, 1:141
New Deal, 1:145, 1:382, 2:893
New Hanover High School, Wilmington, 2:905
New Jersey State Police, 2:663
New Jersey State Troopers, 2:768–769
New Jersey Turnpike, 2:768–769
Newman, Paul, 2:538
New Orleans, Louisiana, 1:99
Police Department (NOPD), 1:78, 1:363
Newsom, Robert, 2:527–528
Newspaper Association of America, 2:492
Newton, Alan, 1:413
Newton, Huey P., 1:66–67, 1:135, 1:403
New York Age, 2:886
New York City Board of Education, 1:456
New York City Census, 2:507
New York City Correction Department, 2:878
New York City Housing Authority Police, 2:878
New York City Police Department (NYCPD), 1:17, 1:78, 1:329, 1:457, 2:604, 2:631, 2:877
New York Civil Liberties Union, 2:605
New York Council of Arts, 2:485
New York Court of Appeals, 1:321
New York Draft Riot, 1:467, 2:686
New York Evening Post, 1:55
New York Guardians Association, 1:330
New York House of Refuge, 1:115
New York School of Law, 2:744
New York Society for the Prevention of Pauperism, 1:115
New York State Office of Children and Family Services, 2:889
New York State Penitentiary, Attica, 2:708
New York Sun, The, 2:492
New York Times, The, 1:13, 1:346, 2:492, 2:497, 2:529, 2:837, 2:876, 2:902
New York Times Magazine, 2:497
New York Tribune, 1:221, 2:503
New York Women's House of Detention, 1:178
Ney, Robert, 1:311
Nhat Hanh, Thich, 2:616
Niagara Movement, 2:549
Nichols, Terry, 2:519
Nietas, 2:657
Nifong, Michael, 1:247
Night of the Living Dead, The, 2:538
Nike, 2:563
Ninth Federal District Court, 1:459
Nisei Battalion, 1:407
Nixon, Richard, 1:279, 1:345, 1:383, 2:879
Nixon v. Condon, 1:357
No-fly lists, 2:592–594
Nonprofit Advocacy Project, 1:11
Norfolk Prison Colony, 2:571
Noriega, Manuel, 1:124
Norris, Clarence, 1:412, 2:594
Norris, Green, Harris & Higginbotham, 1:345
Norris v. Alabama, 2:542, 2:594–595, 2:640
Nortenos, 1:453
North Carolina Central University, 1:246, 2:514

- North Carolina Department of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, 2:889
- North Carolina Governor's Crime Commission, 2:889
- North Carolina State Geological Survey, 1:100
- Northeastern University Institute on Race and Justice, 1:148, 2:596–597
- North Side Gang, 1:266
- Northwestern Law, 1:386, 1:389
- Northwest Ordinance of 1787, 1:220
- Norton, Eleanor Holmes, 1:357
- Nosferatu*, 2:538
- Notorious*, 2:538
- Notorious B.I.G., 2:838
- Nugan Hand Bank, 1:123
- Nunn, Kenneth B., 1:168–169
- Nuremburg Laws (1933), 1:25
- N.W.A., 1:346
- NYPD Blue*, 2:506–508
- Oakland Community School (OCS), 1:68
- OBECA/Arriba Juntos Center, 2:557
- Ochs, Adolph, 1:13
- O'Connor, Sandra Day, 2:718–719
- Odessa, Russia, 1:269
- Odin, 2:897
- Odinists, 2:898
- Office of Community Oriented Policing (COPS), 2:563, 2:570
- Office of Immigration Statistics, 1:376
- Office of Institutional Development, 2:558
- Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, 1:204, 1:207, 1:271, 1:276, 1:425, 2:512, 2:921
- Office of Management and Budget (OMB), 1:262, 1:264, 1:449
- Office of National Drug Control Policy (ONDCP), 1:78, 1:127, 1:239
- Office of University Outreach and Engagement, Michigan State University, 2:559
- Office of Victims of Crime (OVC), 2:859
- Officers for Justice, 1:331
- Oglala Indians, 2:578
- Oglala Lakota People, 2:618
- Ogletree, Charles, 2:817
- Oh, Angela E., 2:647
- Oh, Sandra, 2:498
- Ohio Supreme Court, 2:476
- Ohlin, Lloyd E., 2:644, 2:774–775, 2:781
- O. J. Simpson case, 1:128, 1:345, 1:415, 2:495, 2:599–601
- Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, 2:490–491
- Oliphant, David, 2:601
- Oliphant v. Suquamish Indian Tribe*, 2:601–602, 2:829
- Oliver, Jerry, 1:86
- Oliver, William, 2:777–778
- Olmos, Edward James, 2:500, 2:791
- Olson, Cuthbert, 2:924–925
- Olympic Security Support Group, 1:338
- Omnibus Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986, 1:430
- Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act, 1:284, 2:602–604
- violent crime rates (1960–1968) (table), 2:602
- One, The*, 2:498
- O'Neal, Ron, 1:69
- One America Dialogue Guide*, 2:647
- One America in the 21st Century*, 2:647
- 100 Blacks in Law Enforcement Who Care, 2:604–606
- 100th Battalion, 1:407–408
- On Lynching* (Wells-Barnett), 1:249
- Operation Ceasefire, 1:75
- Operation Pressure Point, 1:143
- Operation Rum Punch, 1:406
- Operation Wetback, 1:20, 1:375, 2:606–608
- Opium Exclusion Act of 1909, 1:16–17
- Opium Wars, 2:608–610
- First Opium War, 2:609
- Second Opium War, 2:609–610
- Orange Day Parade, New York City, 2:687
- Order, The, 2:897
- Order of the Sons of America, 1:458
- O'Reilly, Bill, 1:15
- Organization of Afro-American Unity, 2:571
- Organized crime, 2:610–614
- defined, 2:611–612
- human trafficking and, 1:360–361
- immigrants and crime, 1:373
- race, ethnicity, and, 2:612–614
- See also* Mafia
- Orleans Parish Prison, 1:364
- Osage Indians, 2:503
- Oscar Joel Bryant Association, 1:331
- Oswald, Russell, 1:43
- Ottawa Indians, 2:503
- Outlaw Josey Wales, The*, 1:367
- Outlaws, 2:657
- Overthrow.com, 2:898
- Ovington, Mary White, 2:549
- Owen, Carolyn, 2:764–765
- Owens, Charles, 2:553
- Oyler v. Boyles*, 2:823
- Oz, 2:793
- Pacino, Al, 2:723
- Paek, Hye Jin, 2:499
- Page, Sarah, 2:814–817
- Paint Rock, Alabama, 2:640
- Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO), 1:14

- Parallel Justice, 2:860
 Park, Robert Ezra, 1:105–107, 2:762
 Parker, John, 2:549
 Parks, Bernard, 2:701
 Parks, Gordon, Jr., 1:69–70
 Parks, Robert, 2:764
 Parks, Rosa, 2:550, 2:639
 Parsons, Johnny, 1:80
 Partida, Rodrigo, 1:93–94
 Partnership for a Drug-Free America, 1:159
 Pataki, George, 1:44
 Patrick, Marvin, 2:906
 Patriot Act II, 2:884
 Patriot and Terrorism Prevention Reauthorization Act of 2005, 2:884
 Patterson, Alexis, 2:865
Patterson v. McLean Credit Union, 1:150
Patterson v. State of Alabama, 2:640
 Patton, John Boy, 2:623
 Patton, Paul, 1:288
 Patz, Etan, 2:854
 Pax, James, 2:498
Payback, 2:498
 Peace Action Wisconsin, 2:593
 Peace and Freedom Party, 1:67
 Peace Commission, 1:87
 Peace Links, 2:616
Peace Pledge, 2:615–617
 Pearl, Mississippi, 2:725
 Pearl Harbor, 1:406–407
 Peel, Sir Robert, 1:140
Pell v. Proconier, 1:414
Peltier, Leonard, 2:617–619, 2:622
 Pennsylvania Commission on Crime and Delinquency, 1:96, 2:613
 Pennsylvania Historical and Museum Commission, 2:876
 Pennsylvania State Correctional Institution–Greene, 1:1
 Pennsylvania Supreme Court, 1:391
Pennsylvania v. Mimms, 2:485
Penny Dreadfuls, 2:699
Penry v. Lynaugh, 2:718
 Pentagon, 2:490, 2:699, 2:765
People, 2:494, 2:507
 People's Revolutionary Army, 2:703
People v. Aguilar-Ramos, 2:527
People v. P.H., 2:786
People v. Turner, 1:356
 Perales, Cesar, 1:456–457
 Perez, Rafael, 2:701
 Perez, Rosie, 2:500
 Perlmutter, Nathan, 1:15
 Perry, Rick, 2:814
Personal Justice Denied, 1:408
 Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act, 1:278, 1:376
 Petersen, William, 2:497, 2:529
 Petersilia, Joan, 1:146, 1:395
 Peterson, Ruth, 1:17
Peters v. Kiff, 1:417
Petit apartheid, 2:619–621
Petit Apartheid in the U.S. Criminal Justice System: The Dark Figure of Racism (Milovanovic, Russell-Brown), 2:619
 Pew Public Safety Performance Project, 1:59
 Phi Beta Kappa, 1:357
Philadelphia Daily News, 2:494
Philadelphia Negro, The (Du Bois), 1:243–244, 1:246
 Phillips County, Arkansas, Massacre of 1919. See Elaine Massacre of 1919 (Phillips County, Arkansas)
Phylon: The Atlanta University Review of Race and Culture, 1:39
 Pickens Fellowship (National Institute of Justice), 1:339
Pictou-Aquash, Anna Mae, 2:622–623
 Pierce, Leonard, 2:687
 Pierce, William, 2:899
 Pine Ridge Health Service, 2:623
 Pine Ridge Reservation, 2:579, 2:617, 2:622
Pink Franklin case, 2:549
 Piru Crips Street Boys, 1:3
 Piru Street Crips, 1:3
 Plaquemines Parish Prison, 1:364
 Plato, 2:765
 Platt, Anthony, 1:116, 1:117
 Playboy Gangster Crips, 1:312
Plea bargaining, 2:623–624, 2:912–913
Plessy v. Ferguson, 1:5, 1:7, 1:223, 1:357–358, 2:550, 2:569, 2:699, 2:905
 Poitier, Sidney, 2:538
Police accountability, 2:624–628
 how and whom, 2:626–627
 police misconduct, 2:625–626 relief, 2:627
 standards, 2:627
Police action, citizens' preferences, 2:628–630
Police and Society: An Environment for Collaboration and Confrontation, The (Brown, Johnson, Misner), 1:79
 Police Benevolent Associations, 1:330–331
Police corruption, 2:630–632
 Police Executive Research Forum (PERF), 1:86
 Police Foundation, 2:564
Police use of force, 2:632–636
 continuum of force, 2:633–634 deadly force and consequences, 2:636
 excessive force and police brutality, 2:635–636 legal environment, 2:634–635
 race and, 2:633

- Police Woman*, 2:791
- Political prisoners, 2:636–640
 defined, 2:637–638
 historical perspective, 2:639
 Universal Declaration of Human Rights (United Nations), 2:638–639
- Pollock, Jocelyn, 2:870
- Pol Pot, 2:639
- Poole, Elijah, 2:570
- Poor Bear, Myrtle, 2:618
- Porter, Anthony, 1:181
- Porter, Edwin S., 2:537
- Porter, Jill, 2:494
- Port Madison Indian Reservation, 2:601, 2:622
- Posse Comitatus, 2:518
- Potok, Mark, 1:22
- Pottawatomie Massacre, 1:220
- Potts, Annie, 2:790
- Pough, Terrell, 2:494
- Pouissant, Alvin, 1:69
- Pound, Roscoe, 2:555
- Powell, Adam Clayton, 1:330
- Powell, Laurence, 1:432–433, 1:463–464, 2:635
- Powell, Lewis, 1:136–137, 1:306
- Powell v. Alabama*, 1:84, 2:542, 2:594, 2:640–642
- Powhatan Indians, 2:577
- Prairie View A&M University, 1:350
- Pratt, Charles, 2:534
- Pratt, Elmer “Geronimo,” 1:129
- Preamble and Complete Text of the Trail of Broken Treaties 20-Point Indian Manifesto, The*, 2:584
- Presentencing, 2:642–644
- President’s Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, 2:644–647
- President’s Initiative on Race, 2:647–649
- President’s National Strategy for Homeland Security of 2007, 2:884
- Presidio of San Francisco, 1:408
- Pretrial Services Agency, 2:878
- Price, Hugh B., 2:569
- Price, Victoria, 2:640
- Priest, Thomas, 2:844
- Primary deviance, 1:442
- Prince, Cleophus, Jr., 2:669
- Prinze, Freddie, Jr., 2:502
- Prison, judicial ghetto, 2:649–650
- Prison abolition, 2:650–652
- Prison Activist Resource Center, 1:178
- Prisoner reentry, 2:652–655
 barriers to reentry, 2:652–653
 pathways to, 2:654–655
 racially disparate imprisonment rates, 2:652
 sentencing, parole, and, 2:653–654
- Prisoners, infectious diseases and, 2:655–657
- Prison Fellowship Ministries, 1:152, 1:277, 1:279–280
- Prison gangs, 2:657–659, 2:899
- Prison Industrial Complex, The* (Davis), 1:179
- Private prisons, 2:659–662
 case against, 2:661
 case for, 2:661
 corporatization of, 2:659–660 impact of for-profit prisons’ lobbying (table), 2:660 impact on African American males, 2:660–661 projected Black inmate population and black male slave population (table), 2:661
 research on, 2:662
 speculative prisons, 2:661–662
- Probation officers, presentencing and, 2:642–643
- Problem-Solving Strategies for Community Policing* (Misner), 1:79
- Procedural Reform Study (PRS), 1:45
- Profiling, ethnic: use by police and Homeland Security, 2:662–664
 Racial Profiling Data Collection Resource Center, 2:597
- Profiling, mass murderer, 2:664–666
- Profiling, racial: historical and contemporary perspectives, 2:666–668
- Profiling, serial killer, 2:668–670
- Profitt v. Florida*, 1:306
- Progressive Farmers and Household Union of America (PFHUA), 1:251, 2:534
- Prohibition, 1:266–268, 2:556
- Project FLAVOR, 1:273
- Project Northland, 1:272
- Prosecution and Racial Justice, 2:836
- Prosecutors, presentencing and, 2:643
- Prosser, Gabriel, 2:755
- Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, The* (Weber), 1:243
- Protocols of the Elders of Zion, The* (Ford), 1:13
- Psycho*, 2:538
- Public Enemy, The*, 2:537
- Public Enemy Number 1 (PEN 1), 2:899
- Public Occurrences, Both Foreign and Domestick*, 2:503
- Public Law 83-280, 2:575, 2:740, 2:809
- Public opinion, death penalty, 1:183, 2:670–672
- Public opinion, juvenile delinquency, 2:672–674
- Public opinion, police, 2:674–677
 crime and criminal justice experiences, 2:675–676 individual demographic characteristics and, 2:674–675
 neighborhood contexts, 2:676–677
- Public opinion, punishment, 2:677–679
- Public opinion polls, 2:679–681
- Public Opinion Quarterly*, 1:290
- Puerto Rican Independence Movement, 1:133–134

- Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund. See LatinoJustice PRLDEF
- Puerto Rican Nationalist Party (NPPR), 1:133
- Puerto Rican Nationalists, 1:133–134
- Pulaski, Charles A., Jr., 1:45
- Pulp Fiction*, 2:538
- Purdue University, 1:344
- Pure Food and Drug Act of 1906, 1:16–17
- Puritans, 2:535
- Purvis, Bryant, 1:409–411
- Qaeda, al-, 2:664, 2:883
- Quakers, 2:535
- Queen Latifah, 1:348
- Quételet, Adolphe, 1:106
- Quijas, Louis, 2:563
- Quinney, Richard, 1:142–143, 2:766
- Rabin, Yitzhak, 1:15
- Race and Crime* (Bonger), 1:71
- Race and Reason*, 2:747
- Race and the American Legal Process* (Higginbotham), 1:344
- Race card, playing the, 2:683–684
- Race relations, 2:684–686
- Race riots, 2:686–689
- Chicago (1919), 1:102–105, 2:688, 2:887
 - East St. Louis riot of 1917, 2:887
 - Harlem (1935), 1:333–336, 2:688
 - Los Angeles (1965), 1:460–463
 - Los Angeles (1992), 1:463–465
 - Miami (1980), 2:515–517
 - in modern era, 2:687–688
 - in the 19th century, 2:686–687
 - in Progressive Era, 2:687
 - Rosewood, Florida (1923), 2:719–721
 - Tulsa, Oklahoma (1921), 2:814–817
 - Zoot Suit riots, 2:924–925
- Racial conflict, 2:689–692
- future research on, 2:691–692
 - justice and, 2:691
 - theoretical explanations, 2:690–691
- Racial hoax, 2:692–694
- Racial Holy War (RaHoWa), 2:897–898
- Racial Integrity Act, 1:7
- Racialization of crime, 2:694–697
- actual and perceived criminality, 2:694–695
 - race and crime in media, 2:695–696
 - race and punishment, 2:695
 - War on Drugs and, 2:695
- Racial Justice Act, 2:697–698
- Racial profiling. See Consumer racial profiling; Profiling, ethnic: use by police and Homeland Security
- Racial Profiling Data Collection Resource Center, 2:597
- Racism, 2:698–700
- Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act (RICO), 1:361, 1:453
- Ragen's Colts, 1:102–103
- Rainbow Coalition, 1:67
- Ramirez, Anthony, 2:497
- Rampart investigation, 2:700–702
- Rampart Division, Los Angeles Police Department, 2:700
- Ramseur, James, 1:320–321
- Ramsey, JonBenet, 2:854
- Ranch Rescue Construction, 2:523
- Randolph, A. Philip, 2:832
- Rangel, Charles, 2:830
- Rape kits, 1:388
- Rastafarians, 2:702–703, 2:830
- Rawls, John, 2:765
- Reagan, Ronald, 1:98, 1:178–179, 1:409, 2:606
- Supreme Court justices and, 1:12, 2:803
 - War on Drugs and, 1:16, 1:159–160, 1:228, 1:285
- REAL ID, 1:379
- Reaves, James N., 1:330–331
- Recidivism, 2:703–705
- Red Record* (Wells-Barnett), 1:249, 2:886
- Red Scare of 1920, 2:536–537
- Red Summer, 1919, 1:102, 1:105, 1:357, 2:686–687
- Reed, Ralph, 1:311
- Reformatories, 2:705–708
- background expectations, 2:707
 - convict leasing and chain gangs, 1:99–100, 2:706
 - history, 2:705
 - juvenile gangs and drug use, 2:707
 - juvenile residential facilities, 2:706–707
 - racial disparity of correctional staff, 2:708
 - racial disparity of inmates, 2:707–708
 - women and children, 2:705–706
- Regan v. Time, Inc.*, 2:826
- Rehnquist, William, 1:136, 1:306, 2:486, 2:601
- Reid, Ira de Augustine, 1:5
- Reintegrative shaming theory (Braithwaite), 1:442–443
- Religious Freedom Restoration Act, 2:587
- Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, 1:278, 2:587
- Religious minorities, 2:708–710
- Rell, Jodi, 1:127
- Reno 911!*, 2:797
- Reno, Janet, 1:431, 2:516
- Replacement Killers, The*, 2:498
- Report of Disproportionate Minority Confinement in Massachusetts, ACLU, 2:597
- Resendez, Rafael, 1:373
- Reservoir Dogs*, 2:538
- Resilience Project, 2:860
- Response Analysis Corporation, 1:268
- Ressler, Robert, 2:669

- Restorative justice, 2:710–713
 history, 2:710–711
 intersection with race, 2:712–713
 principles, 2:711–712
 process, 2:712
- Revolutionary Action Movement (RAM), 1:134
 Rhode Island Police Agency, 2:596
 Rhode Island Traffic Stop Statistics Study, 2:596
 Rhodes, Ray, 2:683
 Rice, Edgar, 2:875–876
 Rice University, 1:78
 Richie, Beth E., 1:314–315
 Riggs, Frank, 1:133
 Rights of White People, The (ROWP), 2:906
 Right to Vote Campaign, 2:744
Ring v. Arizona, 2:826
 Rio de Janeiro, 2:538
 Rio Grande River, 2:606
Rising Sun, 2:498
 Rivera, Lino, 1:334
 Rizzo, Frank, 1:1
r/K Theory, 2:713–716
 in biology, 2:713–714
 criticism of, 2:716
 in human behavior and crime, 2:714
 race and, 2:714–715
 race and crime, 2:715–716
- Roaring Twenties, The*, 2:537
 Robbins, Tim, 2:538
 Robert Charles Rebellion, 2:687
 Roberts, Dorothy, 1:169
 Robertson, Carole, 2:745
Roberts v. Louisiana, 1:306
 Robideau, Bob, 2:618
 Robinson, Amanda, 2:845
 Robinson, Johnnie, 2:745
 Robinson, Reginald, 1:169
 Robinson, Spottswood W., III, 1:357, 2:542
Robinson v. California, 1:305
 Rock-O-Rama, 2:747
 Rockwell, George Lincoln, 2:898
 Rodney, Walter, Jr., 2:702
 Rodriguez, Roberto, 2:558
 Roesch, James, 1:436
 Rojecki, Andrew, 2:494, 2:507
 Rolph, James, 1:469
 Romantic Violence, 2:747
Romeo Must Die, 2:498
Rookies, The, 2:791
 Roosevelt, Franklin, 1:383, 1:406, 2:549
 Roosevelt, Theodore, 1:34, 1:87, 1:116
 Roosevelt University, 2:474
 Roper, Elmo, 2:679
Roper v. Simmons, 1:92, 1:183, 1:391, 1:429, 2:716–719, 2:733
 case facts, 2:717
 decision, 2:718–719
 prior case law, 2:718
- Rosado, Arnaldo, 1:134
 Rose, Alton, 1:297
 Rose, Dina, 2:843
 Rosebud Reservation, South Dakota, 2:622
 Rosenberg Fund for Children, 2:617
Rosewood, Florida, race riot of 1923, 2:719–721
 Rosewood Massacre, 2:720
 Ross, “Freeway Rick,” 1:124
 Ross, Tricia, 1:347
 Rothstein, Arnold, 1:267
 Rowe, David, 2:714
 Rowe High School, 1:89
 Rowland, Dick, 2:814–817
 Royal Engineering Corps, 2:831
 Royal Guards, 2:831
 Royal Medical Corps, 2:831
 Ruby Ridge, Texas, 2:519
 Rumbaut, Rubén, 1:371–373
 Rumsfeld, Donald, 2:558
 Run D.M.C., 2:838
Rush Hour, 2:498, 2:538
 Rushton, J. Philippe, 2:714
 Russell-Brown, Katheryn K., 1:58, 1:165, 2:619,
 2:693–694
 Russian Mafia, 1:269–270, 1:373
 Russian Revolution of 1918, 2:536
 Rutgers University, 1:348
 Ryan, George, 1:181
 Ryan White Care Act, 1:353
- Sabo, Albert F., 1:2
Sacramento Bee, 2:558
 Safe Communities-Safe Schools, 1:95
 Safe Drinking Water Act, 1:257
 Salazar, Laura, 2:844
 Saldana, Juan, 2:701
 Salemme, Elisabeth, 1:388
 Salem Village, Massachusetts, 2:536
 Salomon Brothers, 1:98
 Salvadorans With Pride (SWP-18), 1:455
 Sam Houston State University, Survey Research Center, College of Criminal Justice, 2:679
 Samora, Julian, 2:557
Sample Tribal Evidence Code, 2:548
 Sampson, Robert J., 1:372, 1:446, 2:724, 2:778
Samurai, The, 2:498
 Sanchez, David, 1:79
 Sand Creek, 2:577–578
 San Diego Minutemen, 2:524
 San Diego Police Department’s Community-Oriented Policing, 1:141
San Diego Union-Tribune, 2:490
 Sandinista, 1:124
 Sanford, John F. A., 1:220

- San Francisco State University, 1:152
San Jose Mercury News, 1:124
 San Quentin Prison, 1:404, 2:899
 Sans Arc Indians, 2:578
 Santa Ana, California, 1:312
 Santa Anita Racetrack, 1:407
 Santa Anna, 1:458
 Santiago, Sandra, 2:791
 Sappa Creek, 2:577
 Save Our State, 2:524
 Savolainen, Jukka, 2:782
 Scalia, John, 1:371, 2:719
 Scared Straight, 1:271
Scarface myth, 2:723–724
 Scarface: The Shame of a Nation,
 2:481, 2:537, 2:869
 Scheck, Barry C., 1:386, 1:389, 2:912–913
 Scheler, Max, 2:758
 Schoep, Jeff, 2:898
 School Crime and Safety Survey, 2:857
School shootings, 2:724–727
 media portrayals of, 2:725–726
 race, class, gender, and, 2:726 risk factors for, 2:725 sites of, 2:725
 School-to-Prison Reform Project, 2:767
 Schram, Pamela, 2:870
 Schutz, Alfred, 2:758
 Schwarz, Charles, 2:635
 Schweitzer, Louis, 2:835
 Schwerner, Michael, 1:435
 Scorsese, Martin, 2:538
 Scott Campbell, Stephanie Roper, Wendy Preston, Louarna Gillis, and Nila Lynn Crime Victims'
 Rights Act, 1:388
 Scottsboro Boys, 2:477–478, 2:542, 2:640
Scott v. Emerson, 1:220
 Seale, Bobby, 1:66, 1:68, 1:135, 1:403
 Seale, James Ford, 1:436
 Sealy, Lloyd, 2:564
 Second Amendment, 1:168, 1:380, 2:518
 Secondary deviance, 1:442
 Second Chance Act, 2:744
 Second Crusade (1147), 1:24
 Secor, Kyle, 2:792
 Secure Fence Act of 2006, 1:379
 Segmented assimilation theory, 1:372–373
 Seiter, Richard, 2:654
 Selassie I, Haile, 2:702–703
 Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities, 1:133
 Selective Service, 1:407
 Self-control theory, 2:761
Self-esteem and delinquency, 2:727–730
 intersectionality, 2:728
 race, criminal behavior, and, 2:728–729
 race and, 2:727–728
 Seligman, Edwin R. A., 2:569
 Seligmann, Reade, 1:247
 Sellin, Thorsten, 1:174
Seminole Court Tribe v. Butterworth, 1:310
 Seminole Indians, 2:503
 Senate Judiciary Committee, 1:375, 2:802
 Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, 1:380
 Senate Subcommittee on Terrorism, Narcotics, and International Operations, 1:124
 Sengbe Pieh, 2:750–751
 Senior Justice Center, University of Arkansas, 1:253
 Seniors Against a Fearful Environment (SAFE), 1:68
Sentencing, 2:730–733 disparity, discrimination, and reform, 2:732
 drug sentencing, 1:229–233
 drug sentencing, federal, 1:233–235
 legal developments, 2:732–733
 philosophies of punishment, 2:730–731
 presentencing, 2:642–644
 process, 2:731–732
 racial conflict and, 2:691
 U.S. Sentencing Commission, 1:126–127, 1:431,
 2:472, 2:624, 2:736, 2:742, 2:823
Sentencing disparities, African Americans, 2:733–736 evidence of changing effects of defendant race over time, 2:733–736
 research, 2:736
Sentencing disparities, Latina/o/s, 2:736–739 criminal sentencing and, 2:738–739
 Latinos as symbolic assailants, 2:737–738
Sentencing disparities, Native Americans, 2:739–743
 in federal courts, 2:741–742 jurisdictional complexities, 2:739–740
 research, 2:742
 in state courts, 2:740–741
Sentencing Project, The, 1:286–290, 2:743–744
 Sentencing Reform Act of 1984, 1:233–234,
 2:733, 2:825
 SER, 1:460
 Seraw, Mulugeta, 2:747
 Sermon on the Mount, 2:616
 Serve the People Program, 1:67
 Seventh Amendment, 1:381
 S.H. Kress Department Store, 1:334
Shades of Freedom (Higginbotham), 1:344
 Shah, Hemant, 2:497, 2:499
 Shakur, Afeni, 1:67
 Shakur, Tupac, 1:67, 1:347, 1:367, 2:838
Shanghai Sun, 1:310
 Sharpton, Rev. Al, 1:410
 Shaw, Clifford R., 1:105–109, 2:762–763, 2:868
 Shaw, Theo, 1:409–411
Shawshank Redemption, The, 2:538
 Sheldon, William, 1:51
Shelley v. Kraemer, 1:358

- Shelly v. Kraemer*, 1:13
 Shelton, Robert, 1:435
 Shepard, David, 1:413
 Shepard, Matthew, 1:341
 Shepherd's Crusades of 1251 and 1320, 1:24
 Sherman, Lawrence, 1:271
 Sherrice's Law, 2:865
Shield, The, 2:793
 Shield Club, 1:331
 Shields, Henry, 1:83
Shining, The, 2:538
 Shinnecock Indian Nation, 2:504
 Shoels, Isaiah, 2:726
 Shower Posse, 2:703
Shuttlesworth v. Alabama, 2:543
 Sicilian Mafiosos, 1:268
 Siegel, Bugsy, 1:267
 Siegel, Larry, 1:171–172
Silence of the Lambs, 2:538
 Silent Brotherhood, 2:897
Silverthorne Lumber Company v. United States, 2:476
 Simcox, Chris, 2:523–524
 Simmel, Georg, 2:764
 Simmons, Christopher, 2:717
 Simmons, Fred, 1:325
 Simon, David, 2:792
 Simon, Theodore, 1:399
 Simpson, Nicole Brown, 1:128, 2:599–600
 Simpson, O. J. See O. J. Simpson case
 Singer, Melanie, 1:432, 1:463
 Singer, Tim, 1:463
 Singleton, John, 2:538
 Sioux Indians, 2:503, 2:578
 Sisters Inside, 1:178
 Sitting Bull, Chief, 2:578–579
Sixteenth Street Baptist Church Bombing, 2:744–746
 Sixth Amendment, 1:49, 1:261, 1:380, 1:416–417, 2:601, 2:733, 2:825
Skinheads, 2:746–748, 2:898–899
 Skogan, Wesley, 1:141
 Skrewdriver, 2:746–747
Slaughter, 1:70
Slave patrols, 2:748–750
Slave rebellions, 2:750–753
 Amistad, 2:751–752
 Denmark Vesey, 2:750–751
 John Brown, 2:752
 Nathaniel Turner, 2:751
 Slavery
 convict lease system and, 1:153–154
 Slave Codes, 1:56–57
 Social Construction of Reality, 2:759
 United Slaves, 1:135
 White Slave Traffic Act, 1:360
Slavery and violence, 2:753–756
 Sleepy Lagoon, 2:924
 Slotnick, Barry, 1:321
 Smalls, Biggie, 1:367
 Smart, Elizabeth, 2:865
 Smiddy, H. F., 1:252
 Smith, Al, 2:554
 Smith, Herman, 1:68
 Smith, Lamar, 2:807
 Smith, Susan, 1:166
 Smith, William French, 1:124
 Smits, Jimmy, 2:792
 Snoop Dogg, 1:347–348
Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs, 2:699
 Social bonding theory, 2:760–761
Social capital, 2:756–758
Social construction of reality, 2:758–759
 crack mothers and, 1:160–161 critical race theories of crime and, 1:167–168 critical White studies and, 1:170 domestic violence and, 1:213
 Gringo justice and, 1:326
 Marielitos and, 2:480
 organized crime and, 2:610
 petit apartheid and, 2:620–621
 slavery and, 2:759
 Social Construction of Reality (Berger, Luckmann), 2:758
 White victimization and, 2:854
Social control theory, 2:759–762
 race and ethnicity in criminal behavior, 2:760 racial disparity in crime, 2:760
 research, 2:761–762
 self-control theory, 2:761
 social bonding theory, 2:760–761
 Social Darwinists, 1:468
Social disorganization theory, 1:107–109, 1:372, 2:762–763
Social distance, 2:764–765
 Bogardus Social Distance Scale (table), 2:764
 Socialist Workers Party, 1:133–134
Social justice, 2:765–767
Social Organization of Juvenile Justice, The (Cicourel), 2:707
Social Reality of Crime, The (Quinney), 1:143
 Social Research, Inc. (SRI), 2:493
 Society for the Reformation of Juvenile Delinquents, 1:115
Sociobiology (Wilson), 1:52
 Socrates, 2:639
 Solano, Rolando, 1:463
Soledad Brother (Jackson), 1:403
 Soledad Brothers, 1:43, 1:178, 1:404
 Soledad Prison, 1:403–404
 Solomon of Israel, 2:702
 Sombra Negra, 1:455
Some Notes on Negro Crime, Particularly in Georgia (AUSSR), 1:39–40

- Sopranos, The*, 1:268
Soto, Pedro, 2:768
Souls of Black Folk, The (Du Bois), 1:38
Southern Cheyennes, 2:578
Southern Christian Leadership Conference, 1:80, 1:134, 2:571
Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), 1:134. See also King, Martin Luther, Jr.
Southern Horrors (Wells-Barnett), 2:886
Southern Poverty Law Center, 1:22, 1:435, 2:524, 2:747, 2:767–768, 2:898
Southern Tenant Farmers Union, 1:253
Southwest Council of La Raza, 2:557–558
Soviet Union, 1:269
Spanish-American War, 1:133, 1:456
Spanish-Speaking Unity Council, 2:557
Sparf and Hansen v. United States, 1:415
Spieler, Emily, 2:596
Spingarn, Joel and Arthur, 2:549
Spohn, Cassia, 1:197, 2:734
Springfield, Oregon, 2:725
Spurge, Irving, 2:917
Stahl, Anne, 2:770
Stalking Resource Center, 2:860
Standard Metropolitan Statistical Areas, 2:521
Standing Rock casino, 1:311
Stanford v. Kentucky, 1:183, 2:718–719
Staples, Robert, 1:137
Stark, Rodney, 2:709–710
Start Snitching/Keep Talking Campaign, 2:773
State ex rel. Simmons v. Roper, 2:718
State of Black America, The, 2:569
State Training School for Girls at Geneva, 1:294
State University of New York College at Oneonta (SUCO), 1:81
State v. Celia (1855), 1:5
State v. Kennedy, 1:137
State v. Soto, 2:663, 2:768–770
Status offenses, 2:770–772
Steele v. Louisville & Nashville R.R. Co., 1:358
Stefancic, Jean, 1:412
Steffensmeier, Darrell, 2:734
Steiger, Rod, 2:538
Stellar, James, 2:596
Stern, Wilhelm, 1:399
Stevens, Cat, 2:592
Stevens, J. Morgan, 1:83
Stevens, John Paul, 1:136, 2:486
Stewart, Eric, 2:842
Stewart, Henry, 2:886
Stewart, Potter, 1:136, 1:306
Stinney, George, Jr., 1:413
Stone, Oliver, 2:869
Stop Snitching Campaign, 2:772–774, 2:838
Storey, Moorfield, 2:535
Straight Outta Compton, 1:346
Strain theory, 2:690, 2:774–777
 adaptations, 2:774–775
 delinquency and opportunity, 2:775–776
 delinquent boys, 2:775
 general strain theory, 2:776
 race, 2:777
 strain in society, 2:774
Strasser, Steven, 2:747
Strategy Against Gang Environments (SAGE), 1:313
Strauder v. West Virginia, 1:416, 2:595
Stretesky, Paul, 2:869
Strong African American Families Program, 1:273
Stroud, Jay, 2:906
Structural-cultural perspective, 2:777–780
 assumptions, 2:778
 problems of dysfunctional cultural adaptations, 2:778–779
 “tough guys” and “players,” 2:779
Structural-functionalism, 2:611–612, 2:619, 2:758
Stuart, Julia D., 2:644
Stuart, Raymond, 1:83
Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), 1:66, 1:134
Students for a Democratic Society, 1:67
Stuntz, Joe, 2:623
Sturz, Herb, 2:835
Subculture of violence theory, 2:780–783
 research, 2:780–782
 Subculture of Violence (Wolfgang, Ferracuti), 2:781
 subcultures of violence in other nations, 2:782
Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, 1:239, 1:272
Sugarhill Gang, 1:348
Sullivan, William C., 1:134
Superfly, 1:69, 1:367
Superior Court of Monroe County, Georgia, 2:907
Supermax prisons, 2:783–785
Superpredators, 2:785–787
Supplemental Homicide Reports (UCR) (FBI), 1:212, 2:848, 2:851, 2:855
Supreme Warlord Nation, 1:453
Suquamish Indians, 2:601–602, 2:829
Surenos, 1:452
Surette, Ray, 2:506
Survey Geographic (Locke), 1:335
Sutherland, Edwin, 2:556
Sutra on the White-Clad Disciple, 2:616
Swain v. Alabama, 1:50, 1:417, 2:544
Sweet Sweetback’s Baadasssss Song (Van Peebles), 1:69–70
Swing, General Joseph, 2:607
Symbolic interactionism, labeling theory and, 1:441, 1:443

- Tacoma, Washington, 1:180
 Tagawa, Cary-Hiroyuki, 2:498
 Talbert, Mary, 1:249
Talton v. Mayes, 1:380
 Tammany Hall, 1:266, 1:268
 Tancredo, Tom, 2:524
 Taney, Roger B., 1:220–221, 1:223, 2:520
 Tanforan Racetrack, 1:407
 Tarantino, Quentin, 2:538
Tasers, 2:789–790
 Taub, Richard P., 2:522
 Taylor, Fannie, 2:720
 Taylor, Janette, 2:844
 Taylor, John, 2:484
 Taylor, Paul S., 1:446
 Taylor, Regina, 2:790
 Teaching of Tolerance, 2:767
 Teen Victim Project, 2:860
Television dramas, 2:790–794
 crime series, 2:791–792
 narrative complexity and ambiguity, 2:792–793
 stages of representation, 2:793
 See also individual television programs
Television news, 2:794–795
Television reality shows, 2:796–798. See also individual television programs
 Templeton, Eugene, 2:906
 Tennessee Rifles, 2:886
 Tennessee Supreme Court, 2:885
Tennessee v. Garner, 2:634, 2:789, 2:798–799
 TenPoint Coalition, 1:76
 Terman, Lewis, 1:399
 Terry, John, 2:800–801
Terry v. Ohio, 1:369–370, 2:800–802, 2:827
 Tessmer, John, 2:717
Texas Chainsaw Massacre, The, 2:538
 Texas Coalition Advocating Justice for Juveniles, 2:558
 Texas Crime Poll, 2:679–680
 Texas Criminal Justice Project, 2:558
 Texas Department of Criminal Justice, 1:280
 Texas Family, 2:657
 Texas M, 2:657
 Texas Negro Peace Officers Association, 1:330
 Texas Rangers, 1:327–328
 Texas Southern University, 1:350
 Texas Syndicate, 2:657
 Texas War of Independence, 1:458
 Texas Youth Commission, 2:559
Theft of the Nation (Cressey), 2:613
 Thich Nhat Hanh, 2:616
 Third Council of Toledo, 1:24
 Thirteenth Amendment, 1:56, 1:153, 1:222, 1:360
Thomas, Clarence, 1:346, 2:802–803
 Thomas, Michael, 2:791
 Thomas, Robert J., 2:647
 Thomas, W. I., 1:441, 2:909
Thomas v. Mississippi, 2:543
 Thompson, William Hale, 1:103–105, 1:310
Thompson v. Oklahoma, 2:718
Thompson v. United States, 1:183
 Thornberry, Terence, 1:171–172
 Thorson, Esther, 2:506
 Thrasher, Frederic, 1:105, 2:892
 Three Mile Island, 1:256
Three strikes laws, 2:803–806, 2:864
 debating, 2:804–805
 impact of, 2:805
 impact on African Americans, 2:805–806
 types of, 2:803–804
 T.I., 1:347
 Tigua tribe, 1:311
 Tijerina, Pete, 1:460
Till, Emmett, 1:469, 2:806–808, 2:891
 Tillman, Ben, 1:468
Time, 1:388
 Time, Inc., 2:558
 Tindall, Connie, 2:906
 Tom A. Swift Electronic Rifle, 2:789
 Tomoka Correctional Institution, 1:279
 Tone Loc, 2:902
 Tonry, Michael, 1:168
 Top Ladies of Distinction, 1:339
Torch, The, 1:437
 Torres, Ernest, 1:127
 Tosh, Peter, 2:702
Touch of Evil, 2:538
 Toussaint, Lorraine, 2:790
 Toy, Calvin, 1:32
 Trade Acts, 1:87
 Trade and Intercourse Act of 1834, 2:586
Trafficking in Persons Report, 1:361
 Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA),
 1:360–361
 Trail of Broken Treaties, 2:618, 2:622
Training Guide for Hate Crime Data Collection,
 1:342
 Transcendental Meditation Groups, 2:709
 Trans-Continental Railroad, 1:34
 Travanti, Daniel J., 2:791
 Travis, Jeremy, 1:412
 Travis, Joseph, 2:751
 Treatment Court, 2:588
 Treaty of Bogue, 2:609
 Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, 1848, 1:80,
 1:327–328, 1:448
 Treaty of Nanking, 2:609
 Treaty of Tientsin, 2:609–610
 Treaty of Velasco, 1836, 1:458
 Treaty of Versailles, 1:25
 Treaty of Wanghia, 2:609
 Treaty of Whampoa, 2:609

- Trenton State Prison, 1:387
 Trial Lawyers for Public Justice, 2:768
Tribal Criminal Court Benchbook, 2:547
Tribal Criminal Court Clerks Manual, 2:548
Tribal Justice Today, 2:567
Tribal police, 2:808–810
 Tribal Wellness Court, 2:588
Tribune (Tulsa, Oklahoma), 2:814–815
 Triplett, Peggy, 2:564
 Trojanowicz, Robert, 1:139
 Trotter, William Monroe, 1:468
“Truly disadvantaged,” 2:811–812
Truly Disadvantaged: The Inner City, the Underclass, and Public Policy, The (Wilson), 2:811
 Truman, Harry, 2:485
 Tsu Hsi, 2:498
 Tuberculosis (TB), 2:656
 Tucker’s Asthma Cure, 1:17
Tulia, Texas, drug sting, 2:812–814
Tulsa, Oklahoma, race riot of 1921, 2:814–817
 Tulsa Race Riot Commission, 2:817
 Tumulty, Joseph, 1:56
Tunstall v. Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, 1:358
 Turk, Austin, 1:142–143
 Turner, Anne Sheppard, 2:906
 Turner, Benjamin, 2:751
 Turner, Mary, 1:466–467
 Turner, Nat, 1:244, 2:750–751, 2:756
 Turner, Susan, 1:395
Turner Diaries, 1:89, 2:490, 2:899
 Tuskegee Institute, 1:38, 1:248, 2:818, 2:909
Tuskegee Lynching Report, 2:909
Tuskegee Syphilis Study, 2:817–819
 Tweed, Boss, 1:266
 Twelfth Council of Toledo, 1:24 27s, 2:657
Twining v. New Jersey, 1:84
Two Towns of Jasper, 2:597
 Tyson, Mike, 2:845
- Ugly Betty*, 2:502
 Ulmer, Jeffrey, 1:394, 2:736
 Umeki, Miyoshi, 2:498
Unequal Justice (Mann), 2:474
 UNESCO, 1:385
Unforgiveable Blackness, 2:597
 Unification Church, 2:709
 Uniform Crime Reporting Program, 1:161, 1:342
Uniform Crime Reports (UCR) (FBI), 1:8, 1:29, 1:35, 1:199, 1:204, 1:312, 1:396, 1:444, 2:486, 2:583, 2:672, 2:868, 2:870, 2:890
 Uniform Narcotic Drug Act, 1:337
 Union Correctional Institution, 1:278
 United Airlines, 2:592–593
 United Auto Workers, 2:557
 United Church of Christ, 1:258, 2:905, 2:906
 United Klans of America (UKA), 1:435
 United Mine Workers Union, 2:895
 United Nations, 1:359
 Convention on the Rights of the Child, 2:719
 General Assembly, 2:638
 UNESCO, 1:385
 Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 2:638–639
 World Drug Report, 1:229
 United Negro Fund, 1:350
 United Negro Improvement Association, 2:702
 United Press International (UPI), 2:490–491
 United Slaves, 1:135
United States Atrocities (Wells-Barnett), 2:886
United States Reports, 1:305
United States v. Antelope, 2:821–822, 2:829
United States v. Armstrong, 2:822–824, 2:901
United States v. Booker, 1:126–127, 2:733, 2:742, 2:824–826
United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 1:370, 2:826–828
United States v. Cortez, 1:370
United States v. Fanfan, 2:733, 2:825–826
United States v. Gabriel Francis Antelope, 2:821
United States v. Hernandez, 2:527
United States v. Sokolow, 1:369
United States v. Wheeler, 2:828–829
 Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act (USA PATRIOT Act), 1:375, 1:412, 2:604, 2:884
 Universal African Legion, 2:831
 Universal Declaration of Human Rights (United Nations), 2:638–639
 Universal Motor Corps, 2:831
Universal Negro Improvement Association, 2:829–832 ideology and goals, 2:830–831
 leadership, 2:831–832
 life cycle, 2:829–830
 membership commitment, 2:831
 University of Alabama, 2:553
 University of Arkansas at Little Rock, 2:514
 University of California, 1:14
 University of California, Berkeley, 1:77, 1:79
 University of California, Los Angeles, 1:128, 1:178
 University of California, Santa Cruz, 1:177
 University of Chicago, 1:263, 2:493, 2:909
 University of Colorado at Boulder, 1:95
 University of Illinois at Chicago, 2:474, 2:562
 University of Maryland, 1:271, 2:549
 University of Massachusetts, 2:562
 University of Missouri Law School, 1:358
 University of Pennsylvania, 1:243
 University of Pittsburgh School of Law, 1:412
 University of Puerto Rico, 1:133
 University of South Dakota, Government Research Bureau, 2:741 University of Texas Law School, 1:346

- Uno, Edison, 1:408
Untouchables, The, 2:538
 Urban League. See National Urban League
 USA PATRIOT Act. See Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act (USA PATRIOT Act)
 U.S. Attorney, 2:626
 U.S. Attorney General, 2:626
 U.S. Border Patrol, 2:684, 2:826–827
 U.S. Census Bureau, 1:6, 1:28, 1:37, 1:161, 1:254, 1:264, 1:371, 1:448
 U.S. Coast Guard, 2:480
 U.S. Conference of Mayors, 1:78
 U.S. Congressional Executive Commission on China, 2:637
 U.S. Constitution, 1:80, 1:258, 1:380, 2:543, 2:585, 2:627. See also individual Amendments
 U.S. Court of Appeals
 Federal, 1:44
 Second Circuit, 1:81
 Third Circuit, 1:2, 1:344
 Fourth Circuit, 1:431
 Fifth Circuit, 1:94
 Sixth Circuit, 2:798
 Seventh Circuit, 2:825
 Ninth Circuit, 1:414, 2:821–823, 2:828
 Eleventh Circuit, 1:49
 U.S. Department of Agriculture, 1:16
 U.S. Department of Defense/National Guard, 2:512
 U.S. Department of Education, Office of Elementary and Secondary Education/Safe and Drug Free Schools, 2:512
 U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Administration for Children and Families (ACF), 2:512
 U.S. Department of Homeland Security, 1:21, 2:563, 2:604, 2:662–664, 2:884
 U.S. Department of Human Services, 1:353
 U.S. Department of Justice, 1:4, 1:65, 1:86, 1:124, 1:126, 1:200, 1:342, 1:397, 1:438, 2:556, 2:634, 2:660, 2:704
 mentoring programs, 2:512
 National Criminal Justice Reference Service, 1:207, 2:567
 Office of Civil Rights, 2:832–834
 Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, 1:204, 1:207, 1:271, 1:276, 1:425, 2:512, 2:921
U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Civil Rights, 2:832–834
 See also U.S. Department of Justice
 U.S. Department of Labor, 1:38, 1:101
 U.S. Department of State, 1:361, 2:883
 U.S. Department of the Interior, 1:87
 U.S. Department of the Treasury, 1:336
 U.S. District Court for the District of Arizona, 2:828
 U.S. District Court for the Northern District of New York, 1:81
 U.S. District Court in Missouri, 1:220
 U.S. District Court of Maine, 2:825
 U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, 1:229, 1:235, 2:881
 U.S. Food and Drug Administration, 1:185
 U.S. Government Accountability Office (GAO), 1:258, 1:371, 1:378
 U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Services (INS), 2:480
 U.S. Industrial Commission, 1:38
 U.S.-Mexican War, 1:458
 U.S. Navy, 2:480
U.S. News and World Report, 2:497
 U.S. Office of National Drug Control Policy, 2:513
 U.S. Public Health Service, 2:817–818
 U.S. Secret Service, 1:180, 2:562
 U.S. Sentencing Commission, 1:126–127, 1:431, 2:472, 2:624, 2:736, 2:742, 2:823
 U.S. State Department, 2:490
 Report on Global Anti-Semitism, 1:27
 U.S. Substance Abuse and Mental Health Administration, 2:514
 U.S. Supreme Court, 1:7, 1:12, 1:49–50, 1:83, 1:92–93, 1:136, 1:144, 1:150, 1:182, 1:278, 1:325, 1:336, 1:369, 1:380, 1:390, 1:432, 1:437, 1:468, 2:476, 2:586, 2:601, 2:822, 2:828. See also individual names of cases; individual names of judges
 U.S. Veterans' Administration, 1:459
 Vaccarelli, Paolo Antonio, 1:268
 Van Buren, Martin, 2:752
 Vander Wall, Jim, 1:133
 Vang Pao, 1:123
 Van Peebles, Melvin, 1:69–70
 Vatican II Council, 1:14
 Ventura County, California, 1:433, 1:464
Vera Institute of Justice, 1:30, 2:835–837
 Vereen, Willie, 2:906
 Verniero, Peter, 2:769
 VersusLaw, 2:567
 Vesey, Denmark, 2:750
 Vesey, Joseph, 2:750
 Vice Lords, 2:657
Victim and witness intimidation, 2:837–840
 consequences, 2:838
 in minority communities, 2:837–838 policy responses and remedies, 2:838–839
 prevalence, 2:837
Victimization, African American, 2:840–846 barriers to understanding, 2:844–845 extent of, 2:840–842

- help-seeking behavior by victims, 2:844
- patterns of, 2:842
- rates of, by race and age of victims and type of crime (table), 2:843
- rates of, by type of crime and race of victim (table), 2:841
- research, 2:845
- risk factors, 2:842–843
- Victimization, Asian American, 2:846–847
- Victimization, Latina/o, 2:848–851
 - data, 2:848
 - homicide, 2:848
 - nonfatal violence, 2:848–850
 - research, 2:848–850
- Victimization, Native American, 2:851–854
 - barriers to victim services, 2:852–853
 - contributing factors, 2:852
 - statistics, 2:851–852
 - victim services, 2:853
- Victimization, White, 2:854–855
- Victimization, youth, 2:855–858
 - explanations for, 2:856
 - rates of, 2:857–858
 - research, 2:858
 - structural and choice components in explanations for, 2:856–857
- Victim services, 2:858–860
- Victim Services Agency (VSA), 2:837
- Victims of Crime Act (VOCA), 2:859
- Victoria, Queen, 2:609
- Video games, 2:860–861
- Vietnam War, 1:123, 1:345, 2:637, 2:639
- Vigilantism, 2:861–863
- Vignera v. New York*, 2:525
- Villa, Pancho, 1:328
- Villanueva, Cassandra, 2:559
- Villard, Oswald Garrison, 1:55, 2:549
- Violence against girls, 2:863–865
- Violence against women, 2:865–868
 - prevention and intervention, 2:867
 - rates and cycle, 2:866
 - research, 2:867
 - theories, 2:866–867
 - Violence Against Women Act of 1994, 2:865
 - Violence Against Women Act of 2005, 1:208
- Violence in American Schools, 1:95
- Violence Prevention Initiative, 1:95
- Violent crime, 2:868–869
- Violent Crime Control Act of 1994, 2:864
- Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994, 1:17, 1:342
- Violent females, 2:869–871
- Violent juvenile offenders, 2:871–874
 - child- and school-focused intervention, 2:873
 - family-focused intervention, 2:873
 - rates of, 2:871
 - research, 2:873–874
 - risk factors, 2:872–873
- Vioxx, 1:185
- Virginia Technological Institute, 1:36, 2:665
- Vold, George, 1:142–143
- Volksfront, 2:898
- Volpe, Justin, 2:631, 2:635
- Volstead Act of 1919, 2:536, 2:555
- Von Düsseldorf, Vampir, 2:538
- Voting Rights Act of 1965, 1:14, 1:223, 2:746

- Waco, Texas, 2:491, 2:519
- Wacquant, Loïc, 1:318
- Wade, Jesse and Mary, 2:484
- Wagner-Costigan Bill, 1:469
- Wah Ching, 1:452
- Wakshul, Gary, 1:2
- Wakulla Correctional Institute, 1:278
- Walker, John M., 1:82
- Walker, Samuel, 1:197, 2:734
- Walker, Zachariah, 2:875–876
- Wallace, George, 1:1
- Wallace, Mike, 2:571
- Walling, William English, 2:549
- Wall of Tolerance, 2:767
- Wall Street Journal, The*, 2:503
- Walsh, Adam, 2:854
- Walsh, David, 1:55
- Walsh, John, 2:796
- Walt Disney Co., 2:699
- Walters, Reed, 1:409–410
- War Between the States, 1:220, 1:222
- Ward, Benjamin, 2:876–879
 - biographical information, 2:877
 - criminal justice career, 2:877–878
 - as police commissioner, 2:878–879
- Ward, Geoff, 2:597
- Ward, Olivia Tucker, 2:878–879
- Warden, Rob, 1:386
- War Department, 1:87
- Wardlow, William “Sam,” 1:369–370
- Ware, Ed, 1:252, 2:534
- Ware, Virgin, 2:745
- Ware Correctional Institution, 1:136
- Warner Brothers, 2:699
- Warner Class Model, 2:493
- War of Northern Aggression, 1:220
- War on Crime, 1:20, 1:152, 1:165, 1:285
- War on Drugs, 1:16–18, 1:61, 1:125,
1:164–165, 1:319, 1:392, 2:546, 2:707, 2:735,
2:743, 2:879–883
 - consequences, 2:881–882
 - convict criminology and, 1:152
 - crack cocaine epidemic and, 1:59, 1:156,
1:159, 1:160, 1:161
 - disproportionate incarceration and, 1:203

- disproportionate minority contact and confinement, 1:205–206
 drug courts and, 1:226 drug sentencing and, 1:229–230 fear of crime and, 1:285
 felon disenfranchisement and, 1:286, 1:290
 harm reduction, 2:882–883
 history, 2:879–880
 law enforcement tactics and, 1:154
 race and, 2:880–881
 racialization of crime and, 2:694–695
- War on Gangs, 1:165
 War on Poverty, 1:383, 2:603
War on Terror, 1:285, 2:883–885
 War Relocation Authority (WRA), 1:406–407
 Warren, Earl, 1:260, 1:459, 2:525, 2:556
 Warren, Michael, 2:791
 Warren County, North Carolina, 1:258
 Warren Court, 2:475–477, 2:491, 2:603, 2:789
 Washington, Booker T., 1:39, 2:887, 2:910
 Washington, Jesse, 1:466
Washington Post, The, 2:679
Washington (ship), 2:751
 Washita River, Battle of, 2:577–578
 Waslin, Michele, 2:559
 Watergate, 1:279
 Waters, Crystal, 1:432
 Waters, Maxine, 1:124
 Waterson, Sam, 2:790, 2:792
 Watkins, Andrew, 1:436
 Watson, Elizabeth (Betsy), 1:78, 1:86
 Watts, Coral, 2:669
 Watts, Los Angeles, 1:460–461
 Weather Underground, 1:135
 Weaver, Randy, 2:519, 2:899
 Webb, Gary, 1:124
 Webb, Vincent, 1:141
Webb v. United States, 1:336
 Weber, Max, 1:243, 1:245, 2:758
 Weed and Seed Initiative, 2:659
Weeks v. United States, 2:476
 Weinbaum, Cindy, 2:656
 Welch, Michael, 1:21
 Welfare Reform Act of 1996, 1:275
 Welles, Orson, 2:538
 Wellness Court, 2:588
 Wells, James, 2:885
Wells-Barnett, Ida B., 1:249, 1:252, 1:468, 2:549, 2:885–888
 antilynching campaign of, 2:886–887
 biographical information, 2:885–886
 crusades for justice, 2:887
 Wellstone, Paul, 1:360
 Wesley, Cynthia, 2:745
 Westies, 1:266
 Weston, Charles, 2:665
Westover v. United States, 2:525
 West Paducah, Kentucky, 2:725
 West Virginia State University, 1:349
 Wetterling, Jacob, 2:854
 WGBH-TV, 2:597
W. Haywood Burns Institute for Juvenile Justice Fairness and Equity, 2:888–889
 Wheaton, Maryland, 1:179
 Wheeler, Anthony, 2:828
 Wheeler-Howard Indian Reorganization Act of 1934, 1:87, 1:383, 2:574, 2:586
When Women Kill (Mann), 2:474–475
 White, Byron, 1:136–137, 1:306
 White, Edward D., 1:55
 White, Joseph, 2:726
 White, Tonya, 2:814
 White, Walter, 1:252–253, 1:467–468, 2:534, 2:887
 White, William “Bill,” 2:898
 White American Homeland, 2:894
 White Aryan Resistance (WAR), 2:747, 2:894, 2:899
White Beret, 1:437
White crime, 2:890–892
White gangs, 2:892–894
 White House Conference on Civil Rights, 1:345
 White House Council of Economic Advisors, 2:648
 White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, 1:278, 2:593
White Patriot, 1:437
 White Patriot Party, 2:518
White privilege, 2:894–896
 White revolution, 2:898
 White Slave Traffic Act, 1:360
White supremacists, 2:896–900
 belief systems, 2:897–898
 current activities, 2:900
 groups, 2:898–899
 history, 2:896–897
 Internet activities, 2:899–900
 Ku Klux Klan, 2:896–897. See also Ku Klux Klan
 Whitmore, Kathy, 1:78
 Whittle, Kennon, 2:484
 Whren, Michael, 2:900–901
Whren v. United States, 2:900–902
 Wickersham, George, 2:554
 Wickersham Commission, 2:554, 2:557
 Widom, Cathy Spatz, 1:295
 Wilbanks, William, 1:198, 1:392, 2:707–708
 Wilberforce University, 1:243
Wilding, 2:902–903
 Wilhelm II, Kaiser, 2:497
 Wilkins, Roy, 2:571
 William of Orange, 2:687
 Williams, Eugene, 1:103
 Williams, George, 1:438
 Williams, Hubert, 1:140, 2:564
 Williams, Megan, 2:891

- Williams, Mingo, 2:721
 Williams, Norman, 1:142
 Williams, Ron, 2:618
 Williams, Tookie, 2:916
 Williams, Wayne B., 1:77, 2:669
 Williams, Willie, 1:338
 Williamson, Fred, 1:69–70
Willie Bosket Law, 2:903–905
 Williston Industrial High School, Wilmington, 2:905
Wilmington Ten, 2:905–906
 Wilson, E. O., 1:52, 2:713
 Wilson, Fred, 1:436
Wilson, Genarlow, 2:907–908
 Wilson, James Q., 1:145
 Wilson, Jerry Lee, 2:486
 Wilson, Lionel, 1:68
 Wilson, Mary Ellen, 1:111
 Wilson, Pete, 1:464
 Wilson, William Julius, 1:109, 1:130, 1:198, 1:446, 2:522, 2:778, 2:811–812
 Wilson, Woodrow, 1:13, 1:54–56, 1:133, 1:456,
 2:549, 2:555
 Wiltwyck, 2:904
 Wind, Timothy, 1:432–433, 1:463–464
 Windham, Scott, 1:410
 Winter, William F., 2:647
 Winter Hill Gang, 1:266
Wire, The, 2:793
Witherspoon v. Illinois, 1:305
 Wolfgang, Marvin, 1:130, 1:397, 2:781
Wolf v. Colorado, 2:476–477
 Woman's Christian Temperance Union, 1:336
Women's Murder Club, The, 2:792
 Wong, Carter, 2:497
 Woo, John, 2:538
 Woods, Tiger, 2:685
Woodson v. North Carolina, 1:306
 Woodworth, George C., 1:45
 Wordlow, Will, 1:252, 2:534
Work, Monroe Nathan, 2:908–911
 biographical information, 2:909 influence of, 2:910
 legacy of, 2:910
 research of, 2:909–910
World Almanac, 2:909
 World Bank, 1:361
 World Church of the Creator, 2:897–898
 World Health Organization, 1:351
 World Series, 1919, 1:267
 World Trade Center, 1:21, 1:371, 2:699, 2:765, 2:826
World (Tulsa, Oklahoma), 2:815
 Worth Brothers Steel Works, 2:875
 Wounded Knee, South Dakota, 2:577, 2:581, 2:622
 Wounded Knee II, 2:579
 Wovoka (Paiute holy man), 2:578–579
Wretched of the Earth (Fanon), 1:66
 Wright, Hamilton, 1:336
 Wright, Mose, 2:806–807
 Wright, Rebecca, 1:341
 Wright, Roy, 2:640
 Wright, William “Joe,” 2:906
Writings at the Intersection of Race, Crime and Justice, 1:413
Wrongful convictions, 2:911–914
 consequences of, 2:913
 DNA technology and, 1:207–209, 1:388, 2:913 factors contributing to, 2:911–913
 W.T. Grant Foundation, 1:95
 Wyatt, Gayle, 2:844
- X, Malcolm. See Malcolm X
- Yale Law School, 1:344, 2:803
 Yasui, Min, 1:409
Yasui case, 1:408
Yearbook of Immigration Statistics, 1:192
 “Yellow peril,” 2:497, 2:610
 Yerkes, Robert, 1:400
 Yeshiva University, 1:386
 Yohn, William, 1:2
 Yom Kippur War of 1973, 1:14
 Young, Andrew, 2:906
 Young, Gordon, 1:436
 Young, Whitney, Jr., 2:569
 Young Citizens for Community Action, 1:79
 Young Communist League, 1:334
 Young Liberators, 1:334
 Young Lords, 1:43, 1:67
 Young Patriots, 1:67
 Youth and Congregations in Partnership, 1:276
 Youth Development and Delinquency Prevention
 Administration, 2:647
Youth gangs, 2:915–917
Youth gangs, prevention of, 2:917–919
 Youth Handgun Violence Prevention Project, 1:95
 Yzaguirre, Raul, 2:557
- Zaitchik, Matt, 1:366
 Zalman, Marvin, 1:171–172
 Zatz, Marjorie, 2:474, 2:734, 2:738
 Zeisel, Hans, 2:735
Zero tolerance policies, 2:921–924
 background of, 2:922 disproportionate minority confinement and contact, 2:921–922
 implementation and use, 2:922–923
 recommendations, 2:923
 Zhang, Ziyi, 2:498
 Zheng Yuhu, 1:311
 Znaniecki, Florian, 1:105
Zoot suit riots, 2:924–925
 Zuniga, Jo Ann, 2:558