LIBRARY OF THE UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN

294.1 M890
1868 v. 1

STX

ORIGINAL SANSKRIT

ON THE

ORIGIN AND HISTO

OF

THE PEOPLE OF I

THEIR RELIGION AND INSTITUTION

COLLECTED, TRANSLATED, AND ILLUSTRATED in

BY

J. MUIR, D.C.L., LL.D.

VOLUME FIRST.

MYTHICAL AND LEGENDARY ACCOUNTS OF THE ORIGIN OF CASTE, WITH AN ENQUIRY INTO ITS EXISTENCE IN THE VEDIC AGE.

SECOND EDITION,

REWRITTEN AND GREATLY ENLARGED.

LONDON:

TRÜBNER & CO., 60, PATERNOSTER ROW.

1868.

(All rights reserved.)

Na viśesho'sti varṇānāṁ sarvam brāhmam idaṁ jagat |
Brahmaṇā prūva-sṛishṭaṁ hi karmabhir varṇatāṁ gatam |

Mahābhārata.

"There is no distinction of castes. This world, which, as created by Brăhmā, was at first entirely Brahmanic, has become divided into classes in consequence of men's works."—See pages 138 and 140.

HERTFORD:
STEPHEN AUSTIN, PRINTER.

294.1
M890
1868
V.1

PREFACE.

THE main object which I have proposed to myself in this volume is to collect, translate, and illustrate the principal passages in the different Indian books of the greatest antiquity, as well as in others of comparatively modern composition, which describe the creation of mankind and the origin of classes, or which tend to throw light upon the manner in which the caste system may have arisen.

I have not, however, hesitated to admit, when they fell in my way, such passages explanatory of the cosmogonic or mythological conceptions of the Indians as possess a general interest, although not immediately connected with the chief subject of the book.

Since the first edition appeared my materials have so much increased that the volume has now swelled to more than twice its original bulk. The second and third chapters are almost entirely new.[1] The fourteenth and fifteenth sections of the fourth chapter are entirely so. Even those parts of the book of which the substance remains the same have been so generally expanded that comparatively little continues without some alteration of greater or less importance.

[1] The contents of these chapters are not, however, absolutely new, but drawn from articles which I have contributed to the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society since the first edition of the volume appeared.

In order that the reader may learn at once what he may expect to find in the following pages, I shall supply here a fuller and more connected summary of their contents than is furnished by the table which follows this preface.

The Introduction (pp. 1–6) contains a very rapid survey of the sources from which our information on the subject of caste is to be derived, viz. the Vedic hymns, the Brāhmaṇas, the Epic poems, and the Purāṇas, in which the chronological order and the general characteristics of these works are stated.

The first chapter (pp. 1–160) comprehends the mythical accounts of the creation of man and of the origin of castes which are to be found in the Vedic hymns, in the Brāhmaṇas and their appendages, in the Rāmāyaṇa, the Mahābhārata, and the Purāṇas. The first section (pp. 7–15) contains a translation of the celebrated hymn called Purusha Sūkta, which appears to be the oldest extant authority for attributing a separate origin to the four castes, and a discussion of the question whether the creation there described was intended by its author to convey a literal or an allegorical sense. The second, third, and fourth sections (pp. 15–34) adduce a series of passages from the works standing next in chronological order to the hymns of the Rig-veda, which differ more or less widely from the account of the creation given in the Purusha Sūkta, and therefore justify the conclusion that in the Vedic age no uniform orthodox and authoritative doctrine existed in regard to the origin of castes. In the fifth section (pp. 35–42) the different passages in Manu's Institutes which bear upon the subject are quoted, and shewn to be not altogether in harmony with each other. The sixth section (pp. 43–49) describes the system of great mundane periods called Yugas, Manvantaras, and Kalpas, as explained in the Purāṇas, and shews that no traces of these periods are to be found in the hymns of the Rig-veda, and but few in the Brāhmaṇas (compare p. 215 f.). Sections seventh and eighth (pp. 49–107) contain the accounts of the different creations, including that of the castes, and of the primeval state of mankind, which are given in the Vishṇu, Vāyu, and Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇas, together with references (see pp. 52 ff., 68 ff.) to passages in the Brāhmaṇas, which appear to have furnished some of the germs of the various Puranic representations, and a comparison of the details of the latter with each other which proves that in some respects they are mutually irreconcileable (see pp. 65 ff., 102 ff.). The ninth section (pp. 107–114) adduces the accounts of Brahmā's passion for his daughter, which are given in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa and the Matsya Purāṇa. In the tenth section (pp. 114–122) are embraced such notices connected with the subject of this volume as I have observed in the Rāmāyaṇa. In one of the passages men of all the four castes are said to be the offspring of Manu, a female, the daughter of Daksha, and wife of Kaśyapa. The eleventh section contains a collection of texts from the Mahābhārata and its appendage the Harivaṁśa, in which various and discrepant explanations are given of the existing diversity of castes, one of them representing all the four classes as descendants of Manu Vaivasvata (p. 126), others attributing the distinction of classes to an original and separate creation of each, which, however, is not always described as occurring in the same manner (pp. 128 ff. and 153); whilst others, again, more reasonably, declare the distinction to have arisen out of differences of character and action. This section, as well as the one which precedes it, also embraces accounts of the perfection which prevailed in the first yugas, and of the gradually increasing degeneracy which ensued in those that followed. The twelfth section (pp. 155–158) contains extracts from the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, which coincide for the most part with those drawn from the other authorities. One text, however, describes mankind as the offspring of Aryaman and Mātṛikā; and another distinctly declares that there was originally but one caste. The thirteenth section (pp. 159 f.) sums up the results of the entire chapter, and asserts the conclusion that the sacred books of the Hindus contain no uniform or consistent theory of the origin of caste; but, on the contrary, offer a great variety of explanations, mythical, mystical, and rationalistic, to account for this social phenomenon.

The second chapter (pp. 160–238) treats of the tradition of the descent of the Indian nation from Manu. The first section (pp. 162–181) contains a series of texts from the Rig-veda, which speak of Manu as the progenitor of the race to which the authors of the hymns belonged, and as the first institutor of religious rites; and adverts to certain terms employed in the hymns, either to denote mankind in general or to signify certain tribal divisions. The second section (pp. 181–196) adduces a number of legends and notices regarding Manu from the Brāhmaṇas and other works next in order of antiquity to the hymns of the Rig-veda. The most interesting and important of these legends is that of the deluge, as given in the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, which is afterwards (pp. 216 ff.) compared with the later versions of the same story found in the Mahābhārata and the Matsya, Bhāgavata and Agni Purāṇas, which are extracted in the third section (pp. 196–220). Some remarks of M. Burnouf and Professor Weber, on the question whether the legend of a deluge was indigenous in India, or derived from a Semitic source, are noticed in pp. 215 f. The fourth section adduces the legendary accounts of the rise of castes among the descendants of Manu and Atri, which are found in the Purāṇas; and quotes a story given in the Mahābhārata about king Vitāhavya, a Kshattriya, being transformed into a Brāhman by the mere word of the sage Bhṛigu.

In the third chapter (pp. 239–295) I have endeavoured to shew what light is thrown by a study of the hymns of the Rig- and Atharva-vedas upon the mutual relations of the different classes of Indian society at the time when those hymns were composed. In the first section (pp. 240–265) the various texts of the Rig-veda in which the words brăhmăn and brāhmaṇa occur are cited, and an attempt is made to determine the senses in which those words are there employed. The result of this examination is that in none of the hymns of the Rig-veda, except the Purusha Sūkta, is there any distinct reference to a recognized system of four castes, although the occasional use of the word Brāhmaṇa, which is apparently equivalent to Brăhmă-putra, or "the son of a priest," and other indications seem to justify the conclusion that the priesthood had already become a profession, although it did not yet form an exclusive caste (see pp. 258 f., 263 ff.). The second section (pp. 265–280) is made up of quotations from the hymns of the Rig-veda and various other later works, adduced to shew that persons who according to ancient Indian tradition were not of priestly families were in many instances reputed to be authors of Vedic hymns, and in two cases, at least, are even said to have exercised priestly functions. These two cases are those (1) of Devāpi (pp. 269ff.), and (2) of Viśvāmitra, which is afterwards treated at great length in the fourth chapter. This section concludes with a passage from the Matsya Purāṇa, which not only speaks of the Kshattriyas Manu, Iḍa, and Purūravas, as "utterers of Vedic hymns" (mantra-vādinaḥ); but also names three Vaiśyas, Bhalanda, Vandya, and Sankīrtti, as "composers of hymns" (mantra-kṛitaḥ). The third section (pp. 280–289) shews by quotations from the Atharva-veda that at the period when those portions of that collection which are later than the greater part of the Rig-veda were composed, the pretensions of the Brāhmans had been considerably developed. The fourth section (pp. 289–295) gives an account of the opinions expressed by Professor

R. Roth and Dr. M. Haug regarding the origin of castes.

The fourth chapter (pp. 296–479) contains a series of legendary illustrations derived from the Rāmāyaṇa, the Mahābhārata, and the Purāṇas, of the struggle which appears to have occurred in the early ages of Indian history between the Brāhmans and the Kshattriyas, after the former had begun to constitute an exclusive sacerdotal class, but before their rights had become accurately defined by long prescription, and when the members of the ruling caste were still indisposed to admit their pretensions. I need not here state in detail the contents of the first five sections (pp. 296–317) which record various legends descriptive of the ruin which is said to have overtaken different princes by whom the Brāhmans were slighted and their claims resisted. The sixth and following sections down to the thirteenth (pp. 317–426) contain, first, such references to the two renowned rivals, Vasishṭha and Viśvāmitra as are found in the hymns of the Rig-veda, and which represent them both as Vedic rishis; secondly, such notices of them as occur in the Brāhmaṇas, and shew that Viśvāmitra, as well as Vasishṭha, had officiated as a priest; and, thirdly, a series of legends from the Rāmāyaṇa and Mahābhārata which describe the repeated struggles for superiority in which they were engaged, and attempt, by a variety of fictions, involving miraculous elements, to explain the manner in which Viśvāmitra became a Brāhman, and to account for the fact which was so distinctly certified by tradition (see pp. 361 ff.), but appeared so unaccountable in later ages (see pp. 265 f., 364 ff.), that that famous personage, although notoriously a Kshattriya by birth, had nevertheless exercised sacerdotal functions.[2] The fourteenth section (pp. 426–430) contains a story from the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa about king Janaka, a Rājanya, renowned for his stoical temperament and religious knowledge, who communicated theological instruction to some eminent Brāhmans, and became a member of their class. In the fifteenth section (pp. 431–436) two other instances are adduced from the same Brāhmaṇa and from two of the Upanishads, of Kshattriyas who were in possession of truths unknown to the Brāhmans, and who, contrary to the usual rule, became the teachers of the latter. The sixteenth section (pp. 436–440) contains an extract from the Aiṭareya Brāhmaṇa regarding king Viśvantara who, after at first attempting to prevent the Śyāparṇa Brāhmans from officiating at his sacrifice, became at length convinced by one of their number of their superior knowledge, and accepted their services. In the seventeenth section (pp. 440–442) a story is told of Matanga, the spurious offspring of a Brāhman woman by a man of inferior caste, who failed, in spite of his severe and protracted austerities, to elevate himself (as Viśvāmitra had done) to the rank of a Brāhman. The eighteenth section (pp. 442–479) contains a series of legends, chiefly from the Mahābhārata, regarding the repeated exterminations of the Kshattriyas by the war-like Brāhman Paraśurāma of the race of Bhṛigu, and the ultimate restoration of the warrior tribe, and a variety of extravagant illustrations of the supernatural power of the Brāhmans, related by the god Vāyu to king Arjuna, who began by denying the superiority of the priests, but was at length compelled to succumb to the overwhelming evidence adduced by his aerial monitor.

[2] As I have omitted in the body of the work to say anything of the views of Signor Angelo de Gubernatis about the purport of the Vedic texts relating to Vasishṭha and Viśvāmitra, I may state here that this young Italian Sanskritist, in his Essay, entitled "Fonti Vediche dell'Epopea" (see the Rivista Orientale, vol. i. pp. 409 ff., 478 ff.), combats the opinion of Professor Roth that these passages refer to two historical personages, and to real events in which they played a part; and objects that Roth "took no account of the possibility that a legend of the heavens may have been based upon a human foundation" (p. 409). Signor de Gubernatis further observes that the 33rd and 53rd hymns of the third Maṇḍala of the Rig-veda "may perhaps have been recited at a later period in connection with some battle which really occured, but that the fact which they celebrate seems to be much more ancient, and to be lost in a very remote myth" (p. 410). Viśvāmitra, he considers, is one of the appellations of the sun, and as both the person who bears this name, and Indra are the sons of Kuśika, they must be brothers (p. 412. See, however, the remarks in p. 347 f. of this volume on the epithet Kauśika as applied to Indra). Sudās, according to Signor de Gubernatis (p. 413), denotes the horse of the sun, or the sun himself, while Vasishṭha is the greatest of the Vasus, and denotes Agni, the solar fire, and means, like Viśvāmitra, the sun (p. 483). Signor de Gubernatis is further of opinion (pp. 414, 478, 479, and 483) that both the 33rd and 53rd hymns of the third, and the 18th hymn of the seventh Maṇḍala are comparatively modern; that the names of Kuśikas and Viśvāmitras claimed by the authors of the two former, are fraudulently assumed; while the last (the 18th hymn of the seventh Maṇḍala) was composed by a sacerdotal family who claimed Vasishṭha as its founder. I will only remark that the theory of Signor de Gubernatis appears to me to be an improbable one. But the only point of much importance for my own special purpose is that ancient Indian tradition represents both Vasishṭha and Viśvāmitra as real personages, the one of either directly divine, or of sacerdotal descent, and the other of royal lineage. They may, however, have been nothing more than legendary creations, the fictitious eponymi of the families which bore the same name.

In the fifth chapter (pp. 480–488) I have given some account of the opinions entertained by Manu, and the authors of the Mahābhārata and the Purāṇas, regarding the origin of the tribes dwelling within, or adjacent to, the boundaries of Hindustan, but not comprehended in the Indian caste-system.

The sixth and concluding chapter (pp. 489–504) contains the Puranic accounts of the parts of the earth exterior to Bhāratavarsha, or India, embracing first, the other eight Varshas or divisions of Jambudvīpa, the central continent; secondly, the circular seas and continents (dvīpas) by which Jambudvīpa is surrounded; and, thirdly, the remoter portions of the mundane system.

The Appendix (pp. 505-515) contains some supplementary notes.

As in the previous edition, I have been careful to acknowledge in the text and notes of this volume the assistance which I have derived from the writings of the different Sanskrit Scholars who have treated of the same subjects. It will, however, be well to specify here the various publications to which I have been indebted for materials. In 1858, I wrote thus: "It will be seen at once that my greatest obligations are due to Professor H. H. Wilson, whose translation of the Vishṇu Purāṇa, with abundant and valuable notes, derived chiefly from the other Purāṇas, was almost indispensable to the successful completion of such an attempt as the present." In this second edition also I have had constant occasion to recur to Wilson's important work, now improved and enriched by the additional notes of the editor Dr. Fitzedward Hall. It is to his edition, so far as it has yet appeared, that my references have been made. I acknowledged at the same time the aid which I had received from M. Langlois' French translation of the Harivaṁśa, and from M. Burnouf's French translation of the first nine books of the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, which opened up an easy access to the contents of the original works. A large amount of materials has also been supplied to me, either formerly or for the preparation of the present edition, by Mr. Colebrooke's Miscellaneous Essays; by Professor C. Lassen's Indian Antiquities; Professor Rudolph Roth's Dissertations on the Literature and History of the Vedas, and contributions to the Journal of the German Oriental Society, and to Weber's Indische Studien, etc.; Professor Weber's numerous articles in the same Journals, and his History of Indian Literature; Professor Max Müller's History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature, Chips from a German Workshop, article on the Funeral rites of the Brāhmans, etc.; Professor Benfey's Glossary of the Sāma Veda, and translations of Vedic hymns; Dr. Haug's text and translation of the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa: while much valuable aid has been derived from the written communications with which I have been favoured by Professor Aufrecht, as well as from his Catalogue of the Bodleian Sanskrit MSS. I am also indebted to Professor Müller for pointing out two texts which will be found in the Appendix, and to Professor Goldstücker for copying for me two passages of Kumārila Bhaṭṭa's Mīmansā-vārttika, which are printed in the same place, and for making some corrections in my translations of them.

I formerly observed that at the same time my own researches had "enabled me to collect a good many texts which I had not found elsewhere adduced;" and the same remark applies to a considerable portion of the new matter which has been adduced in the present edition.

CONTENTS.

PAGES.

v.—xvi. PREFACE.

1—6. INTRODUCTION, CONTAINING A PRELIMINARY SURVEY OF THE SOURCES OF INFORMATION.

7—160. CHAPTER I.—MYTHICAL ACCOUNTS OF THE CREATION OF MAN, AND OF THE ORIGIN OF THE FOUR CASTES.

7— 15. SECT. I. Ninetieth hymn of the tenth Book of the Rig-veda Sanhitā, called Purusha-Sūkta, or the hymn to Purusha.

15— 16. SECT. II. Quotation from the Taittirīya Sanhitā, vii. 1, 1, 4 ff.

17— 22. SECT. III. Citations from the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, the Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa, the Vāyasaneyi Sanhitā, and the Atharva-veda.

22— 34. SECT. IV. Further quotations from the Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa, Sanhitā, and Āraṇyaka, and from the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa.

35— 42. SECT. V. Manu's account of the origin of castes.

43— 49. SECT. VI. Account of the system of yugas, manvantaras, and kalpas, according to the Vishṇu Purāṇa and other authorities.

49— 73. SECT. VII. Account of the different creations, including that of the castes, according to the Vishṇu Purāṇa, with some passages from the Brāhmaṇas, containing the germs of the Puranic statements.

74—107. SECT. VIII. Account of the different creations, including that of the castes, according to the Vāyu and Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇas.

PAGES.
107—114. Sect. IX. Legend of Brahmā and his daughter, according to the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, and of Śatarūpā, according to the Matsya Purāṇa.

114—122. Sect. X. Quotations from the Rāmāyaṇa on the creation, and on the origin of castes.

122—155. Sect. XI. Quotations from the Mahābhārata and Harivaṁśa on the same subjects, and on the four yugas.

155—158. Sect. XII. Citations from the Bhāgavata Purāṇa on the creation and on the origin of castes.

159—160. Sect. XIII. Results of this chapter.

161—238. CHAPTER II. — Tradition of the descent of the Indian race from Manu.

162—181. Sect. I. On Manu as the progenitor of the Āryan Indians and the institutor of religious rites, according to the hymns of the Rig-veda.

181—196. Sect. II. Legend of Manu and the deluge from the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, and other notices regarding Manu from the Śatapatha, Aitareya, and Taittirīya Brāhmaṇas, the Taittirīya Sanhitā, and the Chāndogya Upanishad.

196—220. Sect. III. Extracts from the Mahābhārata and the Matsya, Bhāgavata, and Agni Purāṇas regarding Manu, and the deluge; and comparison of the versions of this legend adduced in this and the preceding section.

220—238. Sect. IV. Legendary accounts of the origin of castes among the descendants of Manu and Atri, according to the Purāṇas.

239—295. CHAPTER III. — On the mutual relations of the different classes of Indian society, according to the hymns of the Rig- and Atharva-vedas.

240—265. Sect. I. On the signification of the words brāhmăn and brāhmaṇa, etc., in the Rig-veda.

265—280. Sect. II. Quotations from the Rig-veda, the Nirukta, the Mahābhārata and other works, to show that according to ancient Indian tradition persons not of priestly families were authors of Vedic hymns, and exercised priestly functions.

280—289. Sect. III. Texts from the Atharva-veda, illustrating the progress of Brahmanical pretensions.

289—295. Sect. IV. Opinions of Professor R. Roth and Dr. M. Haug regarding the origin of caste among the Hindus.

PAGES.
296—400. CHAPTER IV.— Early contests between the Brāhmans and the Kshattriyas.

296—298. Sect. I. Manu's summary of refractory and submissive monarchs.

298—306. Sect. II. Legend of Veṇa.

306—307. Sect. III. Legend of Purūravas.

307—315. Sect. IV. Story of Nahusha.

316—317. Sect. V. Story of Nimi.

317—337. Sect. VI. Vasishṭha, according to the Rig-veda and later works.

337—371. Sect. VII. Viśvāmitra, according to the Rig-veda, Aitareya Brāhmaṇa and later authorities; earlier and later relations of priestly families and the other classes.

371—375. Sect. VII*a*. Do the details in the last two sections enable us to decide in what relation Vasishṭha and Viśvāmitra stood to each other as priests of Sudās?

375—378. Sect. VIII. Story of Triśanku.

379—388. Sect. IX. Legend of Hariśchandra.

388—397. Sect. X. Contest of Vaśishṭha and Viśvāmitra, and entrance of the latter into the Brāhman caste, according to the Mahābhārata.

397—411. Sect. XI. The same legend, and those of Triśanku, and Ambarīsha, according to the Rāmāyaṇa, with a further story about Viśvāmitra from the Mahābhārata.

411—414. Sect. XII. Other accounts from the Mahābhārata of the way in which Viśvāmitra became a Brāhman.

414—426. Sect. XIII. Legend of Saudāsa, and further story of the rivalry of Vaśishṭha and Viśvāmitra, according to the Mahābhārata, with an extract from the Rāja Taraṅgiṇī.

426—430. Sect. XIV. Story from the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa about king Janaka becoming a Brāhman, with extracts from the Mahābhārata about the same prince.

431—436. Sect. XV. Other instances in which Brāhmans are said to have been instructed in divine knowledge by Kshattriyas.

436—440. Sect. XVI. Story of king Viśvantara and the Śyāparṇa Brāhmans.

440—442. Sect. XVII. Story of Matanga, who tried in vain to raise himself to the position of a Brāhman.

PAGES.
442—479. Sect. XVIII. Legend of the Brāhman Paraśurāma, the exterminator of the Kshattriyas, according to the Mahābhārata and the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, with a series of narratives from the former work illustrating the superhuman power of the Brāhmans.

480—488. CHAPTER V. Relation of the Brahmanical Indians to the neighbouring tribes, according to Manu, the Mahābhārata, and the Purāṇas.

489—504. CHAPTER VI. Puranic accounts of the parts of the earth exterior to Bhāratavarsha, or India.

505—516. Appendix, containing supplementary notes.

517—532. Index.

ERRATA ET CORRIGENDA.

Page 23, line 19, for "beingy ellow" read "being yellow."
„ 38, „ 17 ff., for "59-64" read "58-63."
„ 42, „ 4 from foot, for "p. 36" read "p. 37."
„ 46, „ 26, for "p. 42" read "p. 43."
„ 47, „ 8, for "12,826" read "iii. 826."
„ 51, „ 17, for "Purushottasna" read "Purushottama."
„ 123, „ 19, for "to" read "tu."
„ 127, „ 18 f., for "the two by which these three are followed," read "two of those which follow, viz. in pp. 134 and 139."
„ 136, „ 18, for "116" read "11 and 12."
„ 169, „ 26, for "Vivaswat" read "Vivasvat."
„ 170, „ 28 and 33, for "Mātaris'wan" read Mātaris'van."
„ 171, „ 26, for "As'wins" read "Aśvins."
„ 180, „ 28, before "Prajāpatir" insert "ii. 33."
„ 194, „ 5, for "mā bhaja" read "mā ābhaja."
„ 221, „ 20, before "Pṛishadhras" insert "iv. 1, 12."
„ 222, „ 7, for "ix. 2" read "ix. 2, 16."
„ — „ 13, before "Nābhāgo" insert "iv. 1, 14."
„ 235, „ 19, for "iv." read "ix."
„ 251, „ 27, for "3" read "2."
„ 258, „ 3 from the foot, for "viii." read "vii."
„ 274, „ 8, for "Dīlipāt" read "Dilīpāt."
„ 280, „ 14, for "was" read "were."
„ 307, „ 10, for "virāṭ" read "virāj."
„ 308, „ 24, before "Nahusho" insert "12460."
„ 318, „ 4, for "139 f." read "161 f."
„ 371, „ 12, for "vii." read "viia."
„ 399, „ 18, for "58, 18" read "56, 18."
„ 487, „ 2, for "thei rdesertion" read "their desertion."

ORIGINAL SANSKRIT TEXTS.

PART FIRST.

INTRODUCTION

CONTAINING A PRELIMINARY SURVEY OF THE SOURCES OF INFORMATION.

I PROPOSE in the present volume to give some account of the traditions, legends, and mythical narratives which the different classes of ancient Indian writings contain regarding the origin of mankind, and the classes or castes into which the Hindus have long been distributed. In order to ascertain whether the opinions which have prevailed in India on these subjects have continued fixed and uniform from the earliest period, or whether they have varied from age to age, and if so, what modifications they have undergone, it is necessary that we should first of all determine the chronological order of the various works from which our information is to be drawn. This task of classification can, as far as regards its great outlines, be easily accomplished. Although we cannot discover sufficient grounds for fixing with any precision the dates of these different books, we are perfectly able to settle the order in which the most important of those which are to form the basis of this investigation were composed. From a comparison of these several literary records, it will be found that the Hindus, like all other civilized nations, have passed through various stages of development,—social, moral, religious, and intellectual. The ideas and beliefs which are exhibited in their oldest documents, are not the same as those which we encounter in their later writings.

The principal books to which we must look for information on the subjects of our enquiry are the Vedas, including the Brāhmaṇas and Upanishads, the Sūtras, the Institutes of Manu, and the Itihāsas and Purāṇas. Of these different classes of works, the Vedas are allowed by all competent enquirers to be by far the most ancient.

There are, as every student of Indian literature is aware, four Vedas,—the Rig-veda, the Sāma-veda, the Yajur-veda, and the Atharva-veda. Each of the collections of works known as a Veda consists of two parts, which are called its mantra and its brāhmaṇa.[1] The Mantras are either metrical hymns, or prose forms of prayer. The Rig-veda and the Sāmaveda consist only of mantras of the former description. The Brāhmanas contain regulations regarding the employment of the mantras, and the celebration of the various rites of sacrifice, and also embrace certain treatises called Āraṇyakas, and others called Upanishads or Vedāntas (so called from their being the concluding portions of each Veda), which expound the mystical sense of some of the ceremonies, and discuss the nature of the godhead, and the means of acquiring religious knowledge with a view to final liberation.

The part of each Veda which contains the mantras, or hymns, is called its Sanhitā.[2] Thus the Rig-veda Sanhitā means the collection of hymns belonging to the Rig-veda. Of the four collections of hymns, that belonging to the last-mentioned Veda, which contains no less than 1,017 of these compositions, is by far the most important for historical purposes. Next in value must be reckoned those hymns of the Atharva-veda, which are peculiar to that collection, another portion of which, however, is borrowed, in most cases, verbatim, from the Rig-veda.[3]

[1] Sāyaṇa says in his commentary on the Rigveda (vol. p. i. p. 4): Mantra-brāhmaṇātmakam tāvad aḍushṭam lakshaṇam | ata eva Āpastambo yajna-paribhāshāyām evāha 'mantra-brāhmaṇayor veda-nāmadheyam' | "The definition (of the Veda) as a book composed of mantra and brāhmaṇa, is unobjectionable. Hence Āpastamba says in the Yajnaparibhāshā, 'Mantra and Brāhmaṇa have the name of Veda.'"

[2] This definition applies to all the Sanhitās, except that of the Taittirīya, or Black Yajur, Veda, in which Mantra and Brāhmaṇa are combined. But even this Sanhitā had a separate Brāhmaṇa connected with it. See Müller's Anc. Sansk. Lit. p. 350, and Weber's Indische Literaturgeschichte, p. 83. The general character of the Vājasaneyi and Atharva Sanhitās is not affected by the fact that the last section of the former is an Upanishad, and that the fifteenth book of the latter has something of the nature of a Brāhmaṇa.

[3] For further information on the Vedas, reference may be made to Professor Max Müller's Ancient Sanskrit Literature, passim, and also to vols. ii. iii. and iv. of the present work.

From this succinct account of the contents of the Vedas, it is clear that the Mantras must constitute their most ancient portions, since the Brāhmanas, which regulate the employment of the hymns, of necessity pre-suppose the earlier existence of the latter. On this subject the commentator on the Taittirīya, or Black Yajur-veda, Sanhitā thus expresses himself (p. 9 of the Calcutta edition):—

Yadyapi mantrabrāhmaṇātmako vedas tathāpi brāhmaṇasya mantra-vyākhāna-rūpatvād mantrā evādau samāmnātāḥ | "Although the Veda is formed both of Mantra and Brāhmaṇa, yet as the Brāhmaṇa consists of an explanation of the Mantras, it is the latter which were at first recorded."[4]

The priority of the hymns to the Brāhmaṇas is accordingly attested by the constant quotations from the former which are found in the latter.[5] Another proof that the hymns are far older than any other portion of Indian literature is to be found in the character of their language. They are composed in an ancient dialect of the Sanskrit, containing many words of which the sense was no longer known with certainty in the age of Yāska, the author of the Nirukta,[6] and many grammatical forms which had become obsolete in the time of the great grammarian Pāṇini, who refers to them as peculiar to the hymns (chhandas).[7] A third argument in favour of the greater antiquity of the mantras is supplied by the fact that the gods whom they represent as the most prominent objects of adoration, such as Indra and Varuṇa, occupy but a subordinate position in the Itihāsas and Purāṇas, whilst others, viz., Vishṇu and Rudra, though by no means the most important deities of the hymns, are exalted to the first rank, and assume a different character, in the Puranic pantheon.[8]

[4] See also the passage quoted from the Nirukta in p. 174 of the 2nd vol. of this work, and that cited from Sāyaṇa in p. 195 of the same vol. Compare the the following passage of the Muṇḍaka Upanishad, i. 2, 1: Tad etat satyam mantreshu karmāṇi kavayo yāny apaśyams tāni tretāyām bahudhā santatāni | "This is true: the rites which the rishis saw (i.e. discovered by revelation) in the hymns—these rites were in great variety celebrated in the Tretā (age)."

[5] See vol. ii. of this work, p. 195, and the article on the "Interpretation of the Veda" in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, vol. ii. new series, pp. 316 ff.

[6] See vol. ii. of this work, pp. 178 ff, and my article on the "Interpretation of the Veda" in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, vol. ii. new series, pp. 323 ff.

[7] See vol. ii. of this work, pp. 216 ff.

[8] See vol. ii. of this work, 212 ff, and vol. iv. 1, 2, and passim.

On all these grounds it may be confidently concluded that the mantras, or hymns, of the Rig-veda are by far the most ancient remains of Indian literature. The hymns themselves are of different periods, some being older, and some more recent. This is shown not only by the nature of the case,—as it is not to be supposed that the whole of the contents of such a large national collection as the Rig-veda Sanhitā should have been composed by the men of one, or even two, generations,—but also by the frequent references which occur in the mantras themselves to older rishis, or poets, and to older hymns.[9] It is, therefore, quite possible that a period of several centuries may have intervened between the composition of the oldest and that of the most recent of these poems. But if so, it is also quite conceivable that in this interval considerable changes may have taken place in the religious ideas and ceremonies, and in the social and ecclesiastical institutions of the people among whom these hymns were produced, and that some traces of these changes may be visible on comparing the different hymns with each other.

No sufficient data exist for determining with exactness the period at which the hymns were composed. Professor Müller divides them into two classes, the Mantras or more recent hymns, which he supposes may have been produced between 1000 and 800 years,—and the older hymns, to which he applies the name of Chhandas, and which he conceives may have been composed between 1200 and 1000 years,—before the Christian era. Other scholars are of opinion that they may be even older (see Müller's Anc. Sansk. Lit., p. 572, and the Preface to the 4th Vol of the same author's edition of the Rig-veda, pp. iv.-xiii). This view is shared by Dr. Haug, who thus writes in his introduction to the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, p. 47: "We do not hesitate, therefore, to assign the composition of the bulk of the Brāhmaṇas to the years 1400–1200 B.C.; for the Saṁhitā we require a period of at least 500–600 years, with an interval of about two hundred years between the end of the proper Brāhmana period. Thus we obtain for the bulk of Saṁhitā the space from 1400–2000; the oldest hymns and sacrificial formulas may be a few hundred years more ancient still, so that we would fix the very commencement of Vedic literature between 2000–2400 B.C."

[9] See vol. ii. of this work, pp. 206 ff., and vol. iii. pp. 116 ff., 121 ff.

Next in order of time to the most recent of the hymns come, of course, the Brāhmaṇas. Of these (1) the Aitareya and Sānkhāyana are connected with the Rig-veda; (2) the Tāṇḍya, the Panchaviṁśa and the Chhāndogya with the Sāma-veda; (3) the Taittirīya with the Taittirīya or Black Yajur-veda; (4) the Śatapatha with the Vājasaneyi Sanhitā or White Yajur-veda; and (5) the Gopatha with the Atharva-veda.[10] These works, written in prose, prescribe, as I have already intimated, the manner in which the Mantras are to be used and the various rites of sacrifice to be celebrated. They also expound the mystical signification of some of the ceremonies, and adduce a variety of legends to illustrate the origin and efficacy of some of the ritual prescriptions. That in order of age the Brāhmaṇas stand next to the Mantras is proved by their simple, antiquated, and tautological style, as well as by the character of their language, which, though approaching more nearly than that of the hymns, to classical or Pāninean Sanskrit, is yet distinguished by certain archaisms both of vocabulary and of grammatical form which are unknown to the Itihāsas and Purāṇas.[11] The most recent portions of the Brāhmaṇas are the Araṇyakas and Upanishads, of which the character and contents have been already summarily indicated. The remaining works which form the basis of our investigations come under the designation of Smṛiti, as distinguished from that of Śruti, which is applied to the Mantras, Brāhmaṇas, Araṇyakas, and Upanishads.

The term Smṛiti includes (1) the Vedāngas, such as the Nirukta of Yāska, (2) the Sûtras or aphorisms, śrauta and gṛihya, or sacrificial and domestic, etc., (3) the Institutes of Manu, (4) the Itihāsas and Purāṇas. To the class of Itihāsas belong (1) the Rāmāyaṇa (said to be the work of Valmīki), which contains an account in great part, at least, fabulous, of the adventures of Rāma, and the Mahābhārata, which describes the wars and adventures of the Kurus and Pāndus, and embraces also a great variety of episodes and numerous mythological narratives, as well as religious, philosophical, and political discussions, which are interwoven with, or interpolated in, the framework of the poem. This work is said to be the production of Vyāsa, but its great bulk, its almost encyclopædic character, and the discrepancies in doctrine which are observable between its different parts, lead inevitably to the conclusion that it is not the composition of a single author, but has received large additions from a succession of writers, who wished to obtain currency and authority for their several opinions by introducing them into this great and venerated repository of national tradition.[12]

[10] For further details on these Brāhmanas, the reader may consult Professor Max Müller's Anc. Sansk. Lit. pp. 345 ff.; Professor Weber's Indische Literaturgeschichte, and Indische Studien; and Dr. Haug's Aitareya Brahmana.

[11] See, for example, the Ś. P. Br. xi. 5, 1, 15; and the Taitt. Sanhitā, ii. 2, 10, 2, and ii. 6, 7, 1.

The Purāṇas are commonly said to be eighteen in number, in addition to certain inferior works of the same description called Upapurāṇas. For an account of these books and a summary of their contents, I must refer to the late Professor H. H. Wilson's introduction to his translation of the Vishṇu Purāṇa.[13]

In treating the several topics which are to be handled in this volume, I propose in each case to adduce, first, any texts bearing upon it which may be found in the hymns of the Rig-veda; next, those in the Brāhmaṇas and their appendages; and, lastly, those occurring in any of the different classes of works coming under the designation of Smṛiti. By this means we shall learn what conceptions or opinions were entertained on each subject by the oldest Indian authors, and what were the various modifications to which these ideas were subjected by their successors.

[12] On the Rāmāyaṇa and Mahābhārata, see Professor Monier Williams's "Indian Epic Poetry," which contains a careful analysis of the leading narrative of each of the poems.

[13] See also the same author's analyses of the contents of the Vishṇu, Vāyu, Agni, and Brāhma-vaivartta Purāṇas in the "Gleanings of Science," published in Calcutta, and those of the Brāhma and Pādma Purāṇas in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, No. ix (1838) and No. x. (1839).

CHAPTER I.

MYTHICAL ACCOUNTS OF THE CREATION OF MAN, AND OF THE ORIGIN OF THE FOUR CASTES.

It will be seen from the different texts to be adduced in this chapter, that from a very early period the Indian writers have propounded a great variety of speculations regarding the origin of mankind, and of the classes or castes into which they found their own community divided. The most commonly received of these explanations is the fable which represents the Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and Sūdras, to have been separately created from the head, the breast or arms, the thighs, and the feet of the Creator. Of this mythical account no trace is to be found in any of the hymns of the Rig-veda, except one, the Purusha Sūkta.

Although for reasons which will be presently stated, I esteem it probable that this hymn belongs to the most recent portion of the Rig-veda, it will be convenient to adduce and to discuss it first, along with certain other texts from the Brāhmaṇas, Itihāsas, and Purāṇas, which professedly treat of the origin of mankind and of caste, before we proceed to examine the older parts of the hymn-collection, with the view of ascertaining what opinion the authors of them appear to have entertained in regard to the earliest history of their race, and to the grounds of those relations which they found subsisting between the different classes of society contemporary with themselves.

Sect. I.—90*th Hymn of the* 10*th Book of the Rig-veda Sanhitā, called Purusha Sūkta, or the hymn to Purusha.*

This celebrated hymn contains, as far as we know, the oldest extant passage which makes mention of the fourfold origin of the Hindu race.

In order to appreciate the character of this passage, we must consider it in connection with its context. I therefore quote the whole of the hymn:[14]

R. V. x. 90. 1. Sahasra-śīrshā Purushaḥ sahasrākshaḥ sahasrapāt | sa bhūmim viśvato vṛitvā atyatishṭhad daśāṅgulam | 2. Purushaḥ evedaṁ sarvaṁ yad bhūtaṁ yachcha bhāvyam | utāmṛitatvasyeśāno yad annenātirohati | 3. Etāvān asya mahimā ato jyāyāṁścha Pūrushaḥ | pādo 'sya viśvā bhūtāni tripād asyāmṛitaṁ divi | 4. Tripād ūrdhva ud ait Pūrushaḥ pādo 'syehābhavat punaḥ | tato vishvaṇ vyakrāmat sāśanānaśane abhi | 5. tasmād Virāḷ ajāyata Virājo adhi Pūrushaḥ | sa jāto aty arichyata paśchād bhūmim atho puraḥ | 6. Yat Purusheṇa havishā devāḥ yajnam atanvata | vasanto asyāsīd ājyam grīshmaḥ idhmaḥ śarad haviḥ | 7. Taṁ yajnam barhishi praukshan Purushaṁ jātam agrataḥ | tena devāḥ ayajanta sādhyāḥ ṛishayaś cha ye | 8. Tasmād yajnāt sarvahutaḥ sambhṛitam pṛishadājyam | paśūn tāṁś chakre vāyavyān āraṇyān grāmyāś cha ye | 9. Tasmād yajnāt sarvahutaḥ ṛichaḥ sāmāni jajnire | chhandāṁsi jajnire tasmād yajus tasmād ajāyata | 10. Tasmād aśvā ajāyanta ye ke cha ubhayādataḥ | gāvo ha jajnire tasmāt tasmāj jātāḥ ajāvayaḥ | 11. Yat Purushaṁ vi adadhuḥ katidhā vi akalpayan | mukham kim asya kau bāhū kā ūrū pādā uchyete | 12. Brāhmaṇo 'sya mukham āsīd bāhū rājanyaḥ kṛitaḥ | ūrū tad asya yad vaiśyaḥ padbhyāṁ śūdro ajāyata | 13. chandramāḥ manaso jātaś chakshoḥ sūryo ajāyata | mukhād Indraś cha Agniś cha prāṇād Vāyur ajāyata | 14. Nābhyāḥ āsīd antarikśham śīrshṇo dyauḥ samavarttata | padbhyām bhūmir diśaḥ śrotrāt tathā lokān akalpayan | 15. Saptāsyāsan paridhayas triḥ sapta samidhaḥ kṛitāḥ | devāḥ yad yajnam tanvānāḥ abadhnan Purusham paśum | 16. Yajnena yajnaṁ ayajanta devās tāni dharmāṇi pratha-

[14] The Purusha Sūkta is also found in the Vājasaneyi Sanhitā of the White Yajar-veda (31. 1–16) and in the Atharva-veda (19. 6. 1 ff.) See Colebrooke's Miscellaneous Essays, i. 167 f., and note in p. 309 (or pp. 104, and 197, of Messrs. Williams and Norgate's edition); Burnouf's Bhāgavata Purāna, vol. i. Preface, pp. cxxiii. ff.; Wilson's Preface to his translation of the Rigveda, vol. i. p. xliv.; Professor Roth's remarks in the Journal of the German Oriental Society, i. pp. 78 f.; Müller in Bunsen's Philosophy of Univ. History, vol. i. p. 344; Müller's Anc. Sank. Lit., pp. 570 f.; Professor Weber's translation in Indische Studien ix. p. 5; and my own translation, notes and remarks in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society for 1865, pp. 353 ff., and for 1866, pp. 282 f.

māni āsan | te ha nākam mahimānaḥ sachanta yatra pūrve sādhyāḥ santi devāḥ |

"1. Purusha has a thousand heads,[15] a thousand eyes, a thousand feet. On every side enveloping[16] the earth, he overpassed[17] (it) by a space of ten fingers. 2. Purusha himself is this whole (universe), whatever has been and whatever shall be. He is also the lord of immortality, since (or, when) by food he expands.[18] 3. Such is his greatness, and Purusha is superior to this. All existences are a quarter of him; and three-fourths of him are that which is immortal in the sky.[19] 4. With three quarters Purusha mounted upwards. A quarter of him was again produced here. He was then diffused everywhere over things which eat and things which do not eat. 5. From him was was born Virāj, and from Virāj, Purusha.[20] When born, he extended beyond the earth, both behind and before. 6. When the gods performed a sacrifice with Purusha as the oblation, the spring was its butter, the summer its fuel, and the autumn its (accompanying) offering. 7. This victim, Purusha, born in the beginning, they immolated on [15] The Atharva-veda (xix. 6, 1) reads sahasra-bāhuḥ, "having a thousand arms," the transcriber, perhaps, taking the verse literally, and considering that a being in human form, if he had a thousand eyes and a thousand feet, ought only to have five hundred heads, and not a thousand as in the text of the Rig-veda.

[16] For vṛitvā in the R. V. the Vājasaneyi Sanhitā, 31. 1, reads spṛitvā, which seems to mean nearly the same.

[17] The word is atyatishṭhat. Compare the S'atapatha Brāmaṇa, xiii. 6, 1, 1, and atishṭhāvānaḥ in S'. P. B. iv. 5, 4, 1, 2. Professor Weber renders atyatishṭhat "occupies" (Indische Studien, ix. 5).

[18] The sense of this is obscure. Instead of yad annenātirohati, the A. V. reads yad anyenābhavat saha, ("that which," or, "since he) was with another."

[19] Compare A. V. x. 8, 7: ardhena viśvam bhuvanam jajāna yad asya ardham kva tad babhūva: "with the half he produced the whole world; what became of the (other) half of him?" See also ibid. v. 13.

[20] This sentence is illustrated by R. V. x. 72, 5, where it is said, Aditer Daksho ajāyata Dakshād u Aditiḥ pari | "Aditi was born from Daksha and Daksha from Aditi"—a text on which Yāska remarks (Nirukta, xi. 23): tat katham upapadyeta | samāna-janmānau syātām iti | api vā deva-dharmeṇa ītaretara-janmānau syātām itaretatara-prakṛitī | "how can this be possible? They may have had a common birth; or, conformably with their nature as deities, they may have been produced from one another, and possess the properties of one another." Compare A. V. 13. 4. 29 ff., where Indra is said to have been produced from a great many other gods, or entities, and they reciprocally from him. In regard to Virāj, compare the notes on the verse before us in my article on the "Progress of the Vedic religion," etc., in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society for 1865, p. 354.

the sacrificial grass. With him the gods, the Sādhyas,[21] and the rishis sacrificed. 8. From that universal sacrifice were provided curds and butter. It formed those aerial[22] (creatures) and animals both wild and tame. 9. From that universal sacrifice sprang the ṛich and sāman verses, the metres, and the yajush. 10. From it sprang horses, and all animals with two rows of teeth; kine sprang from it; from it goats and sheep. 11. When (the gods) divided Purusha, into how many parts did they cut him up? what was his mouth? what arms (had he)? what (two objects) are said (to have been) his thighs and feet? 12. The Brāhman was his mouth;[23] the Rājánya was made his arms; the being (called) the Vaiśya, he was his thighs;[24] the Śūdra sprang from his feet. 13. The moon sprang from his soul (manas), the sun from his eye, Indra and Agni from his mouth, and Vāyu from his breath.[25] 14. From his navel arose the air, from his head the sky, from his feet the earth, from his ear the (four) quarters: in this manner (the gods) formed the worlds. 15. When the gods, performing sacrifice, bound Purusha as a victim, there were seven sticks (stuck up) for it [21] See on the Sādhyas, Professor Weber's note, Ind. St. ix. 6 f., and the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society for 1866, p. 395, note.

[22] See, however, Vāj. Sanh. xiv. 30, to be quoted below.

[23] Compare the Kaushītakī Brāhmaṇa Upanishad, ii. 9: atha paurṇamāsyām purastāch chandramasam dṛiśyamānam upatishṭheta etayā eva āvṛitā "somo rājāsi vichakshaṇo pancha mukho'si prajāpatiḥ | brāhmaṇas te ekam mukham | tena mukhena rājno 'tsi | tena mukhena mām annādam kuru | rājā te ekam mukham | tena mukhena viśo'tsi | tena mukhena mām annādam kuru | śyenas te ekam mukham "ityādi | which is thus translated by Mr. Cowell: "Next on the day of the full moon let him in this same way adore the moon when it is seen in front of him (saying), 'thou art Soma, the brilliant, the wise, the five-mouthed, the lord of creatures. The Brāhman is one mouth of thine, with that mouth thou eatest kings, with that mouth make me to eat food. The king is one mouth of thine, with that mouth thou eatest common men, with that mouth make me to eat food. The hawk is one mouth of thine," etc. The fourth mouth is fire, and the fifth is in the moon itself. I should prefer to render the words somo rājā'si, "thou art king Soma,"—"king" being a frequent designation of this god in the Brāhmaṇas. See also M. Bh. iii. 12,962, where Vishṇu is introduced as saying in the same mystical way: Brahma vaktram bhujau kshattram ūrū me saṁsthitāḥ viśaḥ | pādau śūdrāḥ bhavantīme vikrameṇa krameṇa cha | "The Brahman is my mouth; the Kshattra are my arms; the Viśas are my thighs; these Śūdras with their vigour and rapidity are my feet."

[24] Instead of ūrū, "thighs," the Atharva-veda, xix. 6, 6, reads madhyam, "middle."

[25] The Vāj. S. xxxi. 13, has a different and singular reading of the last half verse: śrotrād vāyuś cha prāṇaś cha mukhād agnir ajāyata | "From his ear came Vāyu and Prāṇa (breath) and from his mouth Agni."

(around the fire), and thrice seven pieces of fuel were made. 16. With sacrifice the gods performed the sacrifice. These were the earliest rites. These great powers have sought the sky, where are the former Sādhyas, gods."[26]

I have above (p. 7) intimated an opinion that this hymn does not belong to the most ancient portion of the Rig-veda. This view is, however, controverted by Dr. Haug, who, in his tract on "the origin of Brāhmanism" (published at Poona in 1863), p. 5, writes as follows: "The few scholars who have been engaged in the study of the Vedas unanimously regard this hymn as a very late production of Vedic poetry; but there is no sufficient evidence to prove that. On the contrary, reasons might be adduced to shew that it is even old. The mystical character of the hymn is no proof at all of its late origin. Such allegorical hymns are to be met with in every book of the collection of the mantras, which goes by the name of Rig-veda samhitā. The Rishis, who were the authors of these hymns, delighted in such speculations. They chiefly were suggested to them by the sacrificial rites, which they daily were performing. According to the position which is assigned to it in the Yajur-veda (where it is found among the formulas referring to the human sacrifice), the hymn appears to have been used at the human sacrifices. That, at the earliest period of the Vedic time, human sacrifices were quite common with the Brahmans, can be proved beyond any doubt. But the more eminent and distinguished among their leaders soon abandoned the practice as revolting to human feelings. The form of the sacrifice, however, seems to have been kept for a long time; for the ritual required at that occasion is actually in the Yajur-veda; but they only tied men of different castes and classes to the sacrificial posts, and released them afterwards, sacrificing animals instead of them."

If it could be satisfactorily shewn that this hymn, in the same form as we now possess it, existed contemporaneously with the barbarous practice of human sacrifices which Dr. Haug believes to have at one time prevailed in India, we should, no doubt, have in this circumstance a strong proof of its antiquity. But if it was merely adopted as a part of the ceremonial at a later period, when the immolation of human beings had ceased to be otherwise than formal and nominal, and animals were substituted as the actual victims, the evidence of its remote antiquity is greatly weakened.

[26] This verse occurs also in R. V. i. 164. 50, and is quoted in Nirukta, xii. 14. See the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society for 1866, p. 395, note, already referred to.

If we now compare the Purusha Sūkta with the two hymns (162 and 163) of the first Mandala of the Rig-veda, it will, I think, be apparent that the first is not adapted to be used at a literal human sacrifice in the same manner as the last two are to be employed at the immolation of a horse. There are, no doubt, some mystical passages in the second of these two hymns, as in verse 3, where the horse is identified with Yama, Āditya, and Trita; and "in the last section of the Taittirīya Yajurveda the various parts of the horse's body are described as divisions of time and portions of the universe: 'morning is his head; the sun his eye; the air his breath; the moon his ear,'" etc. (Colebrooke's Essays, i. 62).[27] But the persons who officiate at the sacrifice, as referred to in these hymns, are ordinary priests of the ancient Indian ritual,—the hotṛi, adhvaryu, āvayaj, etc. (i. 162, 5); and details are given of the actual slaughter of the animal (i. 162, 11). The Purusha Sūkta, however does not contain the same indications of the literal immolation of a human victim. In it the sacrifice is not offered to the gods, but by the gods (verses 6, 7, 15, 16); no human priests are mentioned; the division of the victim (v. 11) must be regarded, like its slaughter (v. 7), as the work of the deities only. And the Purusha mentioned in the hymn could not well have been regarded as an ordinary man, as he is identified with the universe (v. 2), and he himself, or his immolation, is represented as the source of the creation (vv. 8, 10, 13, 14), and of the Vedas (v. 9).

As compared with by far the largest part of the hymns of the Rig-veda, the Purusha Sūkta has every character of modernness both in its diction and ideas. I have already observed that the hymns which we find in this collection are of very different periods. This, I believe, is not disputed.[28] The authors themselves, as we have seen, speak of newer and older hymns. So many as a thousand compositions of this description could scarcely have been produced within a very short space of time, and there is no reason to suppose that the literary activity of the ancient Hindus was confined to the period immediately preceding the collection of the hymns. But if we are to recognize any difference of age, what hymns can we more reasonably suppose to be the oldest than those which are at once archaic in language and style, and naive and simple in the character of their conceptions? and, on the other hand, what compositions can more properly be set down as the most recent than those which manifest an advance in speculative ideas, while their language approaches to the modern Sanskrit? These latter conditions seem to be fulfilled in the Purusha Sūkta, as well as in hymns x. 71 and 72, x. 81 and 82, x. 121, and x. 129.

[27] Compare the commencement of the Bṛihadāraṇyaka Upanishad.

[28] See Dr. Haug's own remarks (quoted above, p. 4) on the period when the hymns were composed.

On this subject Mr. Colebrooke states his opinion as follows (Miscellaneous Essays i. 309, note): "That remarkable hymn (the Purusha Sūkta) is in language, metre, and style, very different from the rest of the prayers with which it is associated. It has a decidedly more modern tone; and must have been composed after the Sanscrit language had been refined, and its grammar and rhythm perfected. The internal evidence which it furnishes serves to demonstrate the important fact that the compilation of the Vedas, in their present arrangement, took place after the Sanscrit tongue had advanced from the rustic and irregular dialect in which the multitude of hymns and prayers of the Veda was composed, to the polished and sonorous language in which the mythological poems, sacred and prophane (purānas and cāvyas), have been written."

Professor Max Müller expresses himself in a similar sense (Anc. Sansk. Lit., p. 570 f.): "There can be little doubt, for instance, that the 90th hymn of the 10th book . . . . is modern both in its character and in its diction. It is full of allusions to the sacrificial ceremonials, it uses technical philosophical terms, it mentions the three seasons in the order of Vasanta, spring; Grīshma, summer; and S'arad, autumn; it contains the only passage in the Rig-veda where the four castes are enumerated. The evidence of language for the modern date of this composition is equally strong. Grīshma, for instance, the name for the hot season, does not occur in any other hymn of the Rig-veda; and Vasanta also, the name of spring, does not belong to the earliest vocabulary of the Vedic poets. It occurs but once more in the Rig-veda (x. 161. 4), in a passage where the three seasons are mentioned in the order of S'arad, autumn; Hemanta, winter; and Vasanta, spring."

Professor Weber (Indische Studien, ix. 3) concurs in this view. He observes: "That the Purusha Sūkta, considered as a hymn of the Rig-veda, is among the latest portions of that collection, is clearly perceptible from its contents. The fact that the Sāma-sanhitā has not adopted any verse from it, is not without importance (compare what I have remarked in my Academical Prelections, p. 63). The Naigeya school, indeed, appears (although it is not quite certain),[29] to have extracted the first five verses in the seventh prapāṭhaka of the first Archika, which is peculiar to it."

We shall see in the following chapter that the word brāhmaṇa occurs but rarely in the Rig-veda Sanhitā, while brahman, "a priest," from which the former is derived, is of constant occurrence. From this circumstance also, it may be reasonably concluded that the hymns in which the derivative occurs are among the latest. The same remark may be made of the word vaiśya, as compared with viś.[30]

Mr. Colebrooke's opinion of the character of the Purusha Sūkta is given in the following passage of his "Miscellaneous Essays" (vol. i. p. 161, note; or p. 105 of Williams & Norgate's ed. of 1858); "I think it unnecessary to quote from the commentary the explanation of this curious passage of the Vedas as it is there given, because it does not really elucidate the sense; the allegory is for the most part sufficiently obvious.

In his tract on "on the origin of Brahmanism," p. 4, Dr. Haug thus remarks on verses 11 and 12: "Now, according to this passage, which is the most ancient and authoritative we have on the origin of Brahmanism, and caste in general, the Brahman has not come from the mouth of this primary being, the Purusha, but the mouth of the latter became the Brahmanical caste, that is to say, was transformed into it. The passage has, no doubt, an allegorical sense. Mouth is the seat of speech. The allegory thus points out that the Brahmans are teachers and instructors of mankind. The arms are the seat of strength. If the two arms of the Purusha are said to have been made a Kshattriya (warrior), that means, then, that the Kshattriyas have to carry arms to defend the empire. That the thighs of the Purusha were transformed into the Vaiśya means that, as the lower parts of the body are the principal repository of food taken, the Vaiśya caste is destined to provide food for the others. The creation of the Shudra from the feet of the Purusha, indicates that he is destined to be a servant to the others, just as the foot serves the other parts of the body as a firm support."

[29] See on this subject Weber's foot-note, p. 3.

[30] Professor Aufrecht informs me that the word vaiśya does not occur in any other hymn of the Rig-veda but the Purusha Sūkta; only once in the Atharva-veda, v. 17, 9; and not at all in the Vāj. Sanh., except in the Purusha Sūkta. The same scholar remarks, as another proof of the comparatively late date of the Purusha Sūkta, that it is the only hymn which refers to the four different kinds of Vedic compositions ṛich, samān, chhandas, and yajush.

But whether the writer of the hymn intended it to be understood allegorically or not, it conveys no distinct idea of the manner in which he supposed the four castes to have originated. It is, indeed, said that the S'ūdra sprang from Purusha's feet; but as regards the three superior castes and the members with which they are respectively connected, it is not quite clear which (i.e., the castes or the members) are to be taken as the subjects and which as the predicates, and consequently, whether we are to suppose verse 12 to declare that the three castes were the three members, or, conversely, that the three members were, or became, the three castes.

But whatever may be the sense of the passage, it is impossible to receive it as enunciating any fixed doctrine of the writers of what is called the Vedic age in regard to the origin of the four castes; since we find, if not in the mantras or hymns, at least in the Brāhmaṇas (which, as we have seen in page 2, are esteemed by orthodox Indian writers as being equally with the hymns a part of the Veda), not only (1) texts which agree with the Purusha Sūkta, but also (2) various other and discrepant accounts of the manner in which these classes were separately formed, as well as (3) third a class of narratives of the creation, in which the production of the human race is described without allusion to any primordial distinction of castes.

To the first of these classes (viz., that of texts which coincide more or less exactly with the Purusha Sūkta) belongs the following passage from the Taittirīya Sanhitā.

SECT. II.—Quotation from the Taittirīya Sanhitā, vii. 1. 1. 4 ff.

Prajāpatir akāmayata "prajāyeya" iti | sa mukhatas trivṛitaṁ niramimīta | tam Agnir devatā 'nvasūyata gāyatrī chhandro rathantaram

sāma brāhmaṇo manushyāṇām ajaḥ paśūnām | tasmāt te mukhyāḥ mukhato hy asṛijyanta | uraso bāhubhyām panchadaśam niramimīta | tam Indro devatā 'nvasṛijyata trishṭup chhando bṛihat sāma rājanyo manushyāṇām aviḥ paśūnām | tasmāt te vīryāvanto vīryād hy asṛijyanta | madhyataḥ saptadaśaṁ niramimīta | tam Viśvedevāḥ devatāḥ anvasṛijyanta jagatī chhando vairūpam sāma vaiśyo manushyāṇām gāvaḥ paśūnām | tasmāt te ādyā annadhānād hy asṛijyanta | tasmād bhūyāṁso 'nyebhyaḥ | bhūyishṭhāḥ hi devatāḥ anvasṛijyanta | pattaḥ ekaviṁśam niramimīta | tam anushṭup chhando 'nvasṛijyata vairājam sāma śūdro manushyāṇām aśvaḥ paśūnām | tasmāt tau bhūta-saṅkrāmiṇāv aśvaś cha śūdraś cha | tasmāt śūdro yajne 'navakḷṛipto na hi devatāḥ anvasṛijyanta | tasmāt pādāv upajīvataḥ | patto hy asṛijyetām |

"Prajāpati desired, 'may I propagate.' He formed the Trivṛit (stoma) from his mouth. After it were produced the deity Agni, the metre Gāyatrī, the Sāman (called) Rathantara, of men the Brāhman, of beasts the goats. Hence they are the chief (mukhyāḥ), because they were created from the mouth (mukhataḥ). From (his) breast, from (his) arms, he formed the Panchadaśa (stoma). After it were created the god Indra, the Trishṭubh metre, the Sāman (called) Bṛihat, of men the Rājanya, of beasts the sheep. Hence they are vigorous, because they were created from vigour. From (his) middle he formed the Saptadaśa (stoma). After it were created the gods (called) the Viśvedevas, the Jagatī metre, the Sāman called the Vairūpa, of men the Vaiśya, of beasts kine. Hence they are to be eaten, because they were created from the receptacle of food. Wherefore they are more numerous than others, for the most numerous deities were created after (the Saptadaśa). From his foot he formed the Ekaviṁśa (stoma). After it were created the Anushṭubh metre, the Sāman called Vairāja, of men the Śūdra, of beasts the horse. Hence these two, both the horse and the Śūdra, are transporters of (other) creatures. Hence (too) the Śūdra is incapacitated for sacrifice, because no deities were created after (the Ekaviṁśa). Hence (too) these two subsist by their feet, for they were created from the foot."

SECT. III.—Citations from the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, the Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa, the Vājasaneyi Sanhitā, and the Atharva-veda.

The following texts belong to the second class—i.e., that of those which recognize a distinct origination of the castes, but describe their creation differently from the Purusha Sūkta:

Ś. P. Br. ii. 1, 4, 11 ff.—"Bhūr" iti vai Prajāpatir imām ajanayata "bhuvaḥ" ity antarīksham "svar" iti divam | etāvad vai idam sarvaṁ yāvad ime lokāḥ | sarveṇa eva ādhīyate | "bhūr" iti vai Prajāpatir brahma ajanayata "bhuvaḥ" iti kshattram "svar" iti viśam | etāvad vai idam sarvaṁ yāvad brahma kshattraṁ viṭ | sarveṇa eva ādhīyate | "bhūr" iti vai Prajāpatir ātmānam ajanayata "bhuvaḥ" iti prajāṁ "svar" iti paśūn | etāvad vai idam sarvaṁ yāvad ātmā prajāḥ paśavaḥ | sarveṇa eva ādhīyate |

"(Uttering) 'bhūḥ,' Prajāpati generated this earth. (Uttering) 'bhuvaḥ,' he generated the air, and (uttering) 'svaḥ,' he generated the sky. This universe is co-extensive with these worlds. (The fire) is placed with the whole. Saying 'bhūḥ,' Prajāpati generated the Brahman; (saying) 'bhuvaḥ," he generated the Kshattra; (and saying) 'svaḥ,' he generated the Viś. All this world is so much as the Brahman, Kshattra, and Viś. The fire is placed with the whole. (Saying) 'bhūḥ,' Prajāpati generated himself; (saying) 'bhuvaḥ' he generated offspring; (saying) 'svaḥ,' he generated animals. This world is so much as self, offspring, and animals. (The fire) is placed with the whole."

Taitt. Br. iii. 12, 9, 2—Sarvaṁ hedam brahmaṇā haiva sṛishṭam | ṛigbhyo jātam vaiśyam varṇam āhuḥ | yajurvedam kshattriyasyāhur yonim | sāmavedo brāhmaṇānām prasūtiḥ | pūrve pūrvebhyo vacha etad ūchuḥ |

"This entire (universe) has been created by Brahma. Men say that the Vaiśya class was produced from ṛich-verses. They say that the Yajur-veda is the womb from which the Kshattriya was born. The Sāma-veda is the source from which the Brāhmans sprang. This word the ancients declared to the ancients."

To complete his account of the derivation of the castes from the Vedas, the author had only to add that the Śūdras had sprung from the Atharvāngirases (the Atharva-veda); but he perhaps considered that to assign such an origin to the servile order would have been to do it too great an honour.

Vājasaneya Sanhitā, xiv. 28 ff. (= Taittirīya Sanhitā, iv. 3, 10, 1).— ekayā astuvata prajāḥ adhīyanta Prajāpatir adhipatir āsīt | tisṛibhir astuvata brahma asṛijyata Brahmaṇaspatir adhipatir āsīt | pañchabhir astuvata bhūtāny asṛijyanta Bhūtanāmpatir adhipatir āsīt | saptabhir astuvata sapta ṛishayo 'sṛijyanta Dhātā adhipatir āsīt | navabhir astuvata pitaro 'sṛijyanta Aditir adhipatny āsīt | ekādaśabhir astuvata ṛitavo 'sṛijyanta ārtavāḥ adhipatayaḥ āsan | trayodaśabhir astuvata māsā asṛijyanta samvatsaro 'dhipatir āsīt | pañchadaśabhir astuvata kshattram asṛijyata Indro 'dhipatir āsīt | saptadaśabhir astuvata paśavo 'sṛijyanta Bṛihaspatir adhipatir āsīt | navadaśabhir astuvata śūdrāryāv asṛijyetām ahorātre adhipatnī āstām | ekaviṁśatyā astuvata ekaśaphāḥ paśavo 'sṛijyanta Varuṇo 'dhipatir āsīt | trayoviṁśatyā astuvata kshudrāḥ paśavo 'sṛijyanta Pūshā adhipatir āsīt | panchaviṁśatyā astuvata araṇyāḥ paśavo 'sṛijyanta Vāyur adhipatir āsīt | saptaviṁśatyā astuvata dyāvāpṛithivī vyaitām | Vasavo Rudrā Adityāḥ anuvyāyan | te eva adhipatayaḥ āsan | navaviṁśatyā astuvata vanaspatayo 'sṛijyanta Somo 'dhipatir āsīt | ekatriṁśatā astuvata prajā asṛijyanta yavāś cha ayavāś cha adhipatayaḥ āsan | trayastriṁśatā astuvata bhūtāny aśāmyan Prajāpatiḥ Parameshṭhī adhipatir āsīt |

"He lauded with one. Living beings were formed: Prajāpati was the ruler. He lauded with three: the Brahman (Brāhman) was created: Brahmanaspati was the ruler. He lauded with five: existing things were created: Bhūtānāmpati was the ruler. He lauded with seven: the seven rishis were created: Dhātṛi was the ruler. He lauded with nine: the Fathers were created: Aditi was the ruler. He lauded with eleven: the seasons were created: the Ārtavas were the rulers. He lauded with thirteen: the months were created: the year was the ruler. He lauded with fifteen: the Kshattra (the Kshattriya) was created: Indra was the ruler. He lauded with seventeen: animals were created: Bṛihaspati was the ruler. He lauded with nineteen: the Śūdra and the Arya (Vaiśya) were created: day and night were the rulers. He lauded with twenty-one: animals with undivided hoofs were created: Varuṇa was the ruler. He lauded with twenty-three:

small animals were created: Pūshan was the ruler. He lauded with twenty-five: wild animals were created: Vāyu was the ruler (compare R.V. x. 90, 8). He lauded with twenty-seven: heaven and earth separated: Vasus, Rudras, and Ādityas separated after them: they were the rulers. He lauded with twenty-nine: trees were created: Soma was the ruler. He lauded with thirty-one: living beings were created: The first and second halves of the month[31] were the rulers. He lauded with thirty-one: existing things were tranquillized: Prajāpati Parameshṭhin was the ruler." This passage is explained in the Śatapatha Brāhmana viii. 4, 3, 1 ff.

The following text is of a somewhat mystical description; but appears to intimate a distinction in nature between the different castes corresponding to that of the gods with whom they are associated:

Ś. P. Br. xiv. 4, 2, 23 (= Bṛihadāraṇyaka Upanishad, i. 4, 11 ff. (p. 235).—Brahma vai idam agre āsīd ekam eva‖ tad ekaṁ san na vyabhavat | | tat śreyo rūpam aty asṛijata kshattraṁ yāny etāni devatrā kshattrāṇi Indro Varuṇaḥ Somo Rudraḥ Parjanyo Yamo Mṛityur Īśānah iti | tasmāt kshattrāt param nāsti | tasmād brāhmaṇaḥ kshattriyād adhastād upāste rājasūye kshattre eva tad yaśo dadhāti | sā eshā kshattrasya yonir yad brahma | tasmād yadyapi rājā paramatām gachhati brahma eva antataḥ upaniśrayati svām yonim | yaḥ u ha enaṁ hinasti svām sa yonim ṛichhati | sa pāpīyān bhavati yathā śreyānsam hiṁsitvā | 24. Sa na eva vyabhavat | sa viśam asṛijata yāny etāni deva-jātāni gaṇaśaḥ ākhyāyante vasavo rudrāḥ ādityāḥ viśvedevāḥ marutaḥ iti | 25. Sa na eva vyabhavat | sa śaudram varṇam asṛijata pūshaṇam | iyaṁ vai pūshā iyaṁ hi idam sarvaṁ pushyati yad idaṁ kincha | 26. Sa na eva vyabhavat | tat śreyo rūpam aty asṛijata dharmam | tad etat kshattrasya kshattraṁ yad dharmaḥ | tasmād dharmāt paraṁ nāsti | atho abalīyān balīyāṁsam āsaṁśate dharmeṇa yathā rājnā evam | yo vai sa dharmaḥ satyaṁ vai tat | tasmāt satyaṁ vadantam āhur "dharmam vadati" iti | dharmaṁ vā

[31] The Taittirīya Sanhitā reads yāvāḥ and ayāvāḥ (instead of yǎvāḥ and ayǎvāḥ as in the Vājasaneyi Sanhitā) and in another passage, v. 3, 4, 5 (as I learn from Prof. Aufrecht), explains these terms to mean respectively months and half months (māsā vai yāvāḥ ardhamāsāḥ ayāvāḥ), whilst the commentator on the V. S. understands them to mean the first and second halves of the month, in accordance with the S'.P. B. viii. 4, 3, 18, and viii. 4, 2, 11 (pūrvapakshā vai yavāḥ aparapaksha ayavāḥ | te hi idaṁ sarvaṁ yuvate chāyuvate cha) | Prof. Aufrecht also points out that yāva is explained in Kātyayana's S'rauta Sūtras, iv. 11, 8, as equivalent to yavamayam apūpam, "a cake of barley."

vadantam "satyam vadati" iti | etad hy eva etad ubhayam bhavati | 27. Tad etad brahma kshattraṁ viṭ śūdraḥ | tad Agninā eva deveshu brahmābhavad brāhmaṇo manushyeshu kshattriyena kshattriyo vaiśyena vaiśyah śūdreṇa śūdrah | tasmād Agnāv eva deveshu lokam ichhante brāhmaṇe manushyeshu | etābhyāṁ hi rūpabhyāṁ brahma abhavat |

23. "Brahma (here, according to the commentator, existing in the form of Agni, and representing the Brāhman caste[32]) was formerly this (universe), one only. Being one, it did not develope. It energetically created an excellent form, the Kshattra, viz., those among the gods who are powers (kshattrāṇi), Indra, Varuṇa, Soma, Rudra, Parjanya, Yama, Mṛityu, Īśāna. Hence nothing is superior to the Kshattra. Therefore the Brāhman sits below the Kshattriya at the rājasūya-sacrifice; he confers that glory on the Kshattra (the royal power).[33] This, the Brahma, is the source of the Kshattra. Hence, although the king attains supremacy, he at the end resorts to the Brahma as his source. Whoever destroys him (the Brāhman) destroys his own source. He becomes most miserable, as one who has injured a superior. 24. He did not develope. He created the Viś—viz., those classes of gods who are designated by troops, Vasus, Rudras, Ādityas, Viśvedevas, Maruts. 25. He did not develope. He created the Śūdra class, Pūshan. This earth is Pūshan: for she nourishes all that exists. 26. He did not develope. He energetically created an excellent form, Justice (Dharma). This is the ruler (kshattra) of the ruler (kshattra), namely, Justice. Hence nothing is superior to justice. Therefore the weaker seeks (to overcome) the stronger by justice, as by a king. This justice is truth. In consequence they say of a man who speaks truth, 'he speaks

[32] Atra yad ātma-śabdenoktaṁ srashṭṛi Brahma tad Agniṁ sṛishṭvā agre Agni-rūpāpannam Brāhmaṇa-jāty-abhimānavad asmin vākye Brahma-sabdenābhidhīyate |

[33] This rendering of the last few words is suggested by Professor Aufrecht. The commentators understand them to mean that the Brāhmans give the king their own glory (that of being a Brahman): and they refer to a formula by which at the rājasūya-sacrifice the king, after addressing the priest as Brāhman, is addressed in return with the word "Thou, king, art a Brāhmăn" (tvaṁ rājan brahmāsi), etc. See the Taittirīya Sanhitā i. 8, 16, 1, where the commentator remarks. "As in common life domestic priests and others, sitting below a king seated on his throne after his return from conquering a foreign territory, address him with many benedictions and eulogies, so here too service is presented. By this benedictory service the power of cursing and showing kindness existing in the Brāhmans is transferred to the king." Reference is then made to the passage before us, as noticing this custom.

justice;' or of a man who is uttering justice, 'he speaks truth.' For this is both of these. 27. This is the Brahma, Kshattra, Viś, and Śūdra. Through Agni it became Brahma among the gods, the Brāhman among men, through the (divine) Kshattriya a (human) Kshattriya, through the (divine) Vaiśya a (human) Vaiśya, through the (divine) Śūdra a (human) Śūdra. Wherefore it is in Agni among the gods and in a Brāhman among men, that they seek after an abode."

Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa, i. 2, 6, 7.—Daivyo vai varṇo brāhmaṇaḥ | asuryyo śūdraḥ. "The Brāhman caste is sprung from the gods; the Śūdra from the Asuras."

Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa, iii. 2, 3, 9.—Kāmam eva dāru-pātreṇa duhyāt | śūdraḥ eva na duhyāt | asato vai esha sambhūto yat śūdraḥ | ahavir eva tad ity āhur yat śūdro dogdhi iti | agnihotraṁ eva na duhyāt śūdraḥ | tad hi na utpunanti | yadā khalu vai pavitram atyeti atha tad havir iti | "Let him at his will milk out with a wooden dish. But let not a Śūdra milk it out. For this Śūdra has sprung from non-existence. They say that that which a Śūdra milks out is no oblation. Let not a Śūdra milk out the Agnihotra. For they do not purify that. When that passes beyond the filter, then it is an oblation."

Atharva-veda, iv. 6, 1.—Brāhmaṇo jajne prathamo daśaśīrsho dasāsyaḥ | sa somam prathamaḥ papau sa chakārārasaṁ visham | "The Brāhman was born the first, with ten heads and ten faces. He first drank the soma; he made poison powerless."

As the description (which is, perhaps, a fragment of a longer account), stops short here, we are left in the dark as to the author's ideas about the creation of the other castes. It would have interested us to know how many heads and faces he would have assigned to the other three castes. The student of Indian poetry is aware that the giant Rāvana is represented in the Rāmāyaṇa both as a Brāhman and as having ten heads.

As implying a separate origination of the Rājanya caste, the following text also may find a place here:

Taittirīya Sanhitā, ii. 4, 13, 1.—Devā vai rājanyāj jāyamānād abibhayuḥ | tam antar eva santaṁ dāmnā 'paumbhan | sa vai esho 'pobdho jāyate yad rājanyo | yad vai esho 'napobdho jāyeta vṛittrān ghaṁś charet | yaṁ kāmayeta rājanyam "anapobdho jāyeta vṛittrān ghaṁś chared" iti tasmai etam aindrā-bārhaspatyaṁ charuṁ nirvapet | aindro vai rājanyo

brahma Bṛihaspatiḥ | brahmaṇā eva enaṁ dāmno 'pombhanād muñchati | hiraṇmayaṁ dāma dakshiṇā sākshād eva enaṁ daṁno 'pombhanād muñchati | "The gods were afraid of the Rājanya when he was in the womb. They bound him with bonds when he was in the womb. Consequently this Rājanya is born bound. If he were born unbound he would go on slaying his enemies. In regard to whatever Rājanya any one desires that he should be born unbound, and should go on slaying his enemies, let him offer for him this Aindra-Bārhaspatya oblation. A Rājanya has the character of Indra, and a Brahman is Bṛihaspati. It is through the Brahman that anyone releases the Rājanya from his bond. The golden bond, a gift, manifestly releases from the bond that fetters him."

In the following text of the Atharva-veda, xv. 8, 1, a new account is given of the origin of the Rājanyas:

So 'rajyata tato rājanyo 'jāyata |

"He (the Vrātya) became filled with passion: thence sprang the Rājanya."

And in the following paragraph (A. V. xv. 9, 1 ff) we have the same origin ascribed to the Brāhman also:

Tad yasya evaṁ vidvān vrātyo rājño 'tithir gṛihān āgachhet śreyāṁsam enam ātmano mānayet | tathā kshattrāya nāvṛiśchate tathā rāshṭrāya nāvṛiśchate | ato vai brahma cha kshattraṁ cha udatishṭhatām | te abrūtām "kam praviśāva" iti |

"Let the king to whose house the Vrātya who knows this, comes as a guest, cause him to be respected as superior to himself. So doing he does no injury to his royal rank, or to his realm. From him arose the Brahman (Brāhman) and the Kshattra (Kshattriya). They said, 'Into whom shall we enter,' etc."

Sect. IV.—Further Quotations from the Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa, Saṁhitā, and Āraṇyaka, and from the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa.

The following passages belong to the third of the classes above adverted to, as in the descriptions they give of the creation, while they refer to the formation of men, they are silent on the subject of any separate origination of castes:

Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa, ii. 3, 8, 1.—Prajāpatir akāmayata "prajāyeya" iti | sa tapo 'tapyata | so 'ntarvān abhavat | sa haritaḥ śyāvo 'bhavat | tasmāt strī antarvatnī hariṇī satī śyāvā bhavati | sa vijāyamāno garbheṇa atāmyat | sa tāntaḥ kṛishṇa-śyāvo 'bhavat | tasmāt tāntaḥ kṛishṇaḥ śyāvo bhavati | tasya asur eva ajīvat | 2. Tena asunā asurān asṛijata | tad asurāṇam asuratvaṁ | ya evam asurāṇām asuratvaṁ veda asumān eva bhavati | na enam asur jahāti | so 'surān sṛishṭvā pitā iva amanyata | tad anu pitṛīḥ asṛijata | tat pitṛīṇām pitṛitvam | ya evam pitṛīṇām pitṛitvam veda pitā iva eva svānām bhavati (3) yanty asya pitaro havam | sa pitṛīn sṛishṭvā 'manasyat | tad anu manushyān asṛijata | tad manushyāṇām manushyatvam | yaḥ evam manushyāṇām manushyatvaṁ veda manasvī eva bhavati na enam manur jahāti | tasmai manushyān sasṛijānāya divā devatrā abhavat | tad anu devān asṛijata | tad devānāṁ devatvam | ya evam devānāṁ devatvaṁ veda divā ha eva asya devatrā bhavati | tāni vai etāni chatvāri ambhāṁsi devāḥ manushyāḥ pitaro 'surāḥ | teshu sarveshu ambho nabhaḥ iva bhavati |

"Prajāpati desired, 'may I propagate.' He practised austerity. He became pregnant. He became yellow-brown.[34] Hence a woman when pregnant, beingy ellow, becomes brown. Being pregnant with a foetus, he became exhausted. Being exhausted, he became blackish-brown. Hence an exhausted person becomes blackish-brown. His breath became alive. 2. With that breath (asu) he created Asuras. Therein consists the Asura-nature of Asuras. He who thus knows this Asura-nature of Asuras becomes a man possessing breath. Breath does not forsake him. Having created the Asuras, he regarded himself as a father. After that he created the Fathers (Pitṛis). That constitutes the fatherhood of the Fathers. He who thus knows the fatherhood of the Fathers, becomes as a father of his own: (3) the Fathers resort to his oblation. Having created the Fathers, he reflected. After that he created men. That constitutes the manhood of men. He who knows the manhood of men, becomes intelligent. Mind[35] does not forsake him. To him, when he was creating men, day appeared in the heavens. After that he created the gods. This constitutes the godhead of the gods. To him who thus knows the godhead of the gods, day appears in the heavens. These are the four streams,[36] viz., gods, men, Fathers, and Asuras. In all of these water is like the air."

[34] Nīla-śveta-miśra-varṇaḥ, "of a mixed blue and white colour," says the Commentator.

[35] Manuḥ = manana-śaktiḥ, "the power of thinking." Comm.

Śatapatha Brahmaṇa, vii. 5, 2, 6.—Prajāpatir vai idam agre āsīd ekaḥ eva | so 'kāmayata "annam sṛijeya prajāyeya" iti | sa prāṇebhyaḥ eva adhi paśūn niramimīta manasaḥ purusham chakshusho 'śvam prāṇād gām śrotrādavim vācho 'jam | tad yad enān prāṇebhyo 'dhi niramimīta tasmād āhuḥ "prāṇāḥ paśavaḥ" iti | mano vai prāṇānām prathamam | tad yad manasaḥ purusham niramimīta tasmād āhuḥ "purushaḥ prathamaḥ paśūnāṁ vīryyavattamaḥ" iti | mano vai sarve prāṇāḥ | manasi hi sarve prāṇāḥ pratishṭhitāḥ | tad yad manasaḥ purusham niramimīta tasmād āhuḥ "purushaḥ sarve paśavaḥ" iti | purushasya hy ete sarve bhavanti |

"Prajāpati was formerly this (universe), one only. He desired, 'let me create food, and be propagated.' He formed animals from his breaths, a MAN from his soul, a horse from his eye, a bull from his breath, a sheep from his ear, a goat from his voice. Since he formed animals from his breaths, therefore men say, 'the breaths are animals.' The soul is the first of the breaths. Since he formed a man from his soul, therefore they say, 'man is the first of the animals, and the strongest.' The soul is all the breaths; for all the breaths depend upon the soul. Since he formed man from his soul, therefore they say, 'man is all the animals;' for all these are man's."

S. P. Br. xiv. 4, 2, 1 (= Bṛihadāraṇyaka Upanishad, p. 125).—Ātmā eva idam agre āsīt purusha-vidhaḥ | so 'nuvīkshya na anyad ātmano 'paśyat | "so 'ham asmi" ity agre vyāharat | tato 'haṁ-nāmā abhavat | tasmād apy etarhy āmantrito "'ham ayam" ity eva agre uktvā atha anyad nāma prabrūte yad asya bhavati | 2. Sa yat pūrvo 'smāt sarvasmāt sarvān pāpmanaḥ aushat tasmāt purushaḥ | oshati ha vai sa taṁ yo 'smāt pūrvam bubhūshati yaḥ evaṁ veda | 3. So 'bibhet | tasmād ekākī bibheti |

[36] The Commentary not very satisfactorily explains this as meaning, "All these four abodes of the gods, etc., are like waters—i.e., suited to yield enjoyment, as ponds, rivers, etc., are fit for bathing, drinking," etc. The phrase is repeated in the Vishṇu Purāṇa, i. 5 (vol. i., p. 79, of Dr. Hall's edition); and in his note Professor Wilson says ambhāmsi "is also a peculiar and probably a mystic term." It is explained in the Vāyu Purāṇa, as will be seen further on. The last words of the quotation from the Brāhmaṇa are obscure. In another passage of the same work (iii. 8, 18, 1, 2) the terms ambhas, nabhas, and mahas, are declared to denote respectively "earth," "air," and "sky" (. . . ayaṁ vai loko 'mbhāṁsi . . . antarikshaṁ vai nabhāṁsi . . . asau vai loko mahāṁsi).

sa ha ayam ikshānchakre yad "mad anyad nāsti kasmād nu bibhemi" iti | tataḥ eva asya bhayaṁ vīyāya | kasmād hy abheshyat | dvitīyād vai bhayam bhavati | 4. Sa vai naiva reme | tasmād ekākī na ramate | sa dvitīyam aichhat | sa ha etāvān āsa yathā strī-pumāṁsau samparishvaktau | 5. Sa imam eva ātmānam dvedhā 'pātayat | tataḥ patiḥ patnī cha abhavatām | tasmād "idam ardhavṛigalam iva svaḥ" iti ha sma āha Yājnavalkyaḥ | tasmād ākāśaḥ striyā pūryate eva | tām samabhavat | tato manushyāḥ ajāyanta | 6. Sā u ha iyam ikshānchakre "kathaṁ nu mā ātmanaḥ eva janayitvā sambhavati hanta tiro 'sāni" iti | 7. Sā gaur abhavat vṛishabhaḥ itaras tāṁ sam eva abhavat | tato gāvaḥ ajāyanta | 8. Vaḍavā itarā abhavad aśvavṛishaḥ itaraḥ gardabhī itarā gardabhaḥ itaras tām sam eva abhavat | tataḥ ekaśapham ajāyata | 9. Ajā itarā abhavad vastaḥ itaraḥ avir itarā meshaḥ itaraḥ | tām sam eva abhavat tato 'jāvayo 'jāyanta | evam eva yad idaṁ kiñcha mithunam ā pippīlikābhyas tat sarvam asṛijata |[37]

"This universe was formerly soul only, in the form of Purusha. Looking closely, he saw nothing but himself (or soul). He first said, 'This is I.' Then he became one having the name of I. Hence even now a man, when called, first says, 'this is I,' and then declares the other name which he has. 2. Inasmuch as he, before (pūrvaḥ) all this, burnt up (aushat) all sins, he (is called) purusha. The man who knows this burns up the person who wishes to be before him. 3. He was afraid. Hence a man when alone is afraid. This (being) considered that 'there is no other thing but myself: of what am I afraid?' Then his fear departed. For why should he have feared? It is of a second person that people are afraid. 4. He did not enjoy happiness. Hence a person when alone does not enjoy happiness. He desired a second. He was so much as a man and a woman when locked in embrace. 5. He caused this same self to fall asunder into two parts. Thence arose a husband and a wife.[38] Hence Yājvanalkya has said that 'this one's self is like the half[39] of a split pea.' Hence the void is filled up by [37] This passage has been already translated by Mr. Colebrooke, Essays i. 64, as well as by Dr. Roer, in the Bibliotheca Indica.

[38] Manu and S'atarūpā, according to the Commentator.

[39] Compare Taitt. Br. iii. 3, 3, 5. Atho arddho vai esha ātmano yat patnī | "Now a wife is the half of one's self;" and ibid. iii. 3, 3, 1: Ayajno vai esha yo 'patnīkaḥ | na prajāḥ prajāyeran | "The man who has no wife is unfit to sacrifice. No children will be born to him." We must not, however, suppose from these passages that the woman.[40] He cohabited with her. From them MEN were born. 6. She reflected, 'how does he, after having produced me from himself, cohabit with me? Ah! let me disappear.' 7. She became a cow, and the other a bull; and he cohabited with her. From them kine were produced. 8. The one became a mare, the other a stallion, the one a she-ass, the other a male-ass. He cohabited with her. From them the class of animals with undivided hoofs was produced. The one became a she-goat, the other a he-goat, the one a ewe, the other a ram. He cohabited with her. From them goats and sheep were produced. In this manner pairs of all creatures whatsoever, down to ants, were created."

The next passage describes men as descendants of Vivasvat, or the Sun, without specifying any distinction of classes:

Taittirīya Sanhitā vi. 5, 6, 1 f.—Aditiḥ putrakāmā sādhyebhyo devebhyo brahmaudanam apachat | tasyai uchchheshaṇam adaduḥ | tat prāśnāt sā reto 'dhatta | tasyai chatvāraḥ Adityāḥ ajāyanta | sā dvitīyam apachat | sā 'manyata "uchchheshaṇād me ime 'jñata | yad agre prāśishyāmi ito me vasīyāṁso janishyante" iti | sā 'gre prāśnāt sā reto 'dhatta tasyai vyṛiddham āṇḍam ajāyata | sā Ādityebhyaḥ eva tṛitīyam apachat "bhogāya me idam śrāntam astv" iti | te 'bruvan "varaṁ vṛiṇāmahai yo 'to jāyātai asmākaṁ sa eko 'sat | yo 'sya prajāyām ṛidhyātai asmākam bhogāya bhavād" iti | tato Vivasvān Āditya 'jāyata | tasya vai iyam prajā yad manushyāḥ | tāsv ekaḥ eva ṛiddho yo yajate sa devānām bhogāya bhavati |

"Aditi, desirous of sons, cooked a Brahmaudana oblation for the gods the Sādhyas. They gave her the remnant of it. This she ate. She conceived seed. Four Adityas were born to her. She cooked a second (oblation). She reflected, 'from the remains of the oblation these sons have been born to me. If I shall eat (the oblation) first, more brilliant estimation in which women were held by the authors of the Brāhmaṇas was very high, as there are other texts in which they are spoken of disparagingly; such as the following: Taitt. Sanh. vi. 5, 8, 2.—Sa somo nātishṭhata strībhyo gṛihyamāṇaḥ | tam ghṛitaṁ vajraṁ kṛitvā 'ghnan tam nirindriyam bhūtam agṛihṇan | tasmāt striyo nirindriyā adāyādīr api pāpāt puṁsa upastitaram vadanti | "Soma did not abide, when being poured out to women. Making that butter a thunderbolt they smote it. They poured it out when it had become powerless. Hence women, powerless, and portionless, speak more humbly than even a poor man." (Compare the quotation in the Commentary on the Taitt. Sanhitā, Vol. i. p. 996.) Taitt. Sanh. vi. 5, 10, 3. Tasmāt striyaṁ jātām parāsyanti ut pumāṁsam haranti | "Hence they reject a female (child) when born, and take up a male." (Compare Nirukta, iii. 4.)

[40] Compare Taitt. Br. iii. 3, 10, 4. Prajayā hi manushyaḥ pūrṇaḥ, "For by offspring a man is completed."

(sons) will be born to me. She ate it first; she conceived seed; an imperfect egg was produced from her. She cooked a third (oblation) for the Ādityas, (repeating the formula) 'may this religious toil have been undergone for my enjoyment.' The Ādityas said, 'Let us choose a boon: let any one who is produced from this be ours only; let anyone of his progeny who is prosperous be for us a source of enjoyment.' In consequence the Āditya Vivasvat was born. This is his progeny, namely MEN.[41] Among them he alone who sacrifices is prosperous, and becomes a cause of enjoyment to the gods."[42]

The passages next following do not specify separately the creation of men (who must, however, be understood as included along with other beings under the designation prajāḥ, "offspring," or "creatures,") and therefore afford less distinct evidence that their authors did not hold the fourfold origin of mankind.

The first of these extracts is especially interesting, both on account of its own tenor, and because (along with Taitt. Br. ii. 3, 8, 1 ff. quoted in p. 23) it contains the germ of one of the Puranic accounts of the creation which will be adduced in a subsequent section.

Taitt. Br. ii. 2, 9, 1 ff.—Idaṁ vai agre naiva kinchana āsīt | na dyaur āsīd na pṛithivī na antariksham | tad asad eva sad mano 'kuruta "syām" iti | tad atapyata | tasmāt tapanād dhūmo 'jāyata | tad bhūyo 'tapyata tasmāt tapanād Agnir ajāyata | tad bhūyo 'tapyata | 2. Tasmāt tapanāj jyotir ajāyata | tad bhūyo 'tapyata | tasmāt tapanād archir ajāyata | tad bhūyo 'tapyata | tasmāt tapanād marīchayo 'jāyanta | tad bhūyo 'tapyata | tasmāt tapanād udārāḥ ajāyanta | tad bhūyo 'tapyata | tad abhram iva

[41] Compare Taitt. Br. i. 8, 8, 1. Ādityāḥ vai prajāḥ, "Creatures are descended from Aditi."

[42] This story is told also, but with more detail of names and somewhat differently, in Taitt. Br. i. 1, 9, 10 ff.. Aditiḥ putrakāmā sādhyebhyo devebhyo brahmaudanam apachat | tasyai uchchheshaṇam adaduḥ | tat prāśnāt | sā reto 'dhatta | tasyai Dhātā cha Aryamā cha ajāyetām | sā dvitīyam apachat tasyai uchchheshaṇam adaduḥ | tat prāśnāt | sā reto 'dhatta | tasyai Mitraś cha Varuṇaś cha ajāyetām | sā tṛitīyam apachat | tasyai uchchheshaṇam adaduḥ | tat prāśnāt | sā reto 'dhatta | tasyai Aṁśaścha Bhagaś cha ajāyetām | sā chaturtham apachat | taysai uchchheshaṇam adaduḥ | tat prāśnāt | sā reto 'dhatta tasyai Indraś cha Vivasvāṁś cha ajayetām | "Aditi, desirous of sons, cooked a Brahmaudana oblation to the gods the Sādhyas. They gave her the remnant of it. She ate it. She conceived seed. Dhātṛi and Aryaman were born to her." She does the same thing a second time, when she bears Mitra and Varuṇa,—a third time, when she bears Aṁśa and Bhaga,—and a fourth time, when she bears Indra and Vivasvat.

samahanyata | tad vastim abhinat | 3. Sa samudro 'bhavat | tasmāt samudrasya na pibanti | prajananam iva hi manyante | tasmāt paśor jāyamānād āpaḥ purastād yanti | tad daśahotā anvasṛijyata | Prajāpatir vai daśahotā | yaḥ evaṁ tapaso vīryyam vidvāṁs tapyate bhavaty eva | tad vai idam āpaḥ salilam āsīt | so 'rodīt Prajāpatiḥ (4) "sa kasmai ajñi yady asyāpratishṭhāyāḥ" iti | yad apsv avāpadyata sā pṛithivy abhavat | yad vyamṛishta tad antarikṣham abhavat | yad ūrdhvam udamṛishṭa sā dyaur abhavat | yad arodīt tad anayoḥ rodastvam | 5. Yaḥ evaṁ veda na asya gṛihe rudanti | etad vai eshāṁ lokānāṁ janma | ya evam eshāṁ lokānāṁ janma veda na eshu lokesho ārttim ārchhati | sa imām pratishṭhām avindata | sa imām pratishṭhāṁ vittvā akāmayata "prajāyeya" iti | sa tapo 'tapyata | so 'ntarvān abhavat | sa jaghanād asurān asṛijata | 6. Tebhyo mṛiṇmaye pātre 'nnam aduhat | yā asya sā tanūr āsīt tām apāhata | sā tamisrā 'bhavat | so 'kāmayata "prajāyeya" iti | sa tapo 'tapyata | so 'ntarvān abhavat | sa prajanānād eva prajāḥ asṛijata | tasmād imāḥ bhūyishṭhāḥ | prajanānād hy enāḥ asṛijata | 7. Tābhyo dārumaye pātre payo 'duhat | yā asya sā tanūr āsīt tām apāhata | sa jyotsnā 'bhavat | so 'kāmayata "prajāyeya" iti | sa tapo 'tapyata so 'ntarvān abhavat | sa upapakshābhyām eva ṛitūn asṛijata | tebhyo rajate pātre ghṛitam aduhat | yā asya sā tanūr āsīt (8) tām apāhata | so 'ho-rātrayoḥ sandhir abhavat | so 'kāmayata "prajāyeya" iti | sa tapo'tapyata | so 'ntarvān abhavat | sa mukhād devān asṛijata | tebhyo harite pātre somam aduhat | yā asya sā tanūr āsīt tām apāhata | tad ahar abhavat | 9. Ete vai Prajāpater dohāḥ | ya evaṁ veda duhe eva prajāḥ | "divā vai no 'bhūd" iti tad devānām devatvaṁ | ya evaṁ devānāṁ devatvaṁ veda devavān eva bhavati | etad vai aho-rātrāṇāṁ janma | ya evam aho-rātrāṇāṁ janma veda na aho-rātreshu ārttim ārchhati | 10. Asato 'dhi mano 'sṛijyata | manaḥ Prajāpatim asṛijata | Prajāpatiḥ prajāḥ asṛijata | tad vai idam manasy eva paramam pratishṭhitaṁ yadidaṁ kiñcha | tad etat śvovasyasaṁ nāma Brahma | vyuchhantī vyuchhantī asmai vasyasī vasyasī vyuchhati prajāyate prajayā paśubhiḥ pra parameshṭhino mātrām āpnoti ya evaṁ veda |

"At first this (universe) was not anything. There was neither sky, nor earth, nor air. Being non-existent, it resolved 'let me be.' It became fervent.[43] From that fervour smoke was produced. It again became fervent. From that fervour fire was produced. It again became fervent. From that fervour light was produced. It again became fervent. From that fervour flame was produced. It again became fervent. From that fervour rays were produced. It again became fervent. From that fervour blazes[44] were produced. It again became fervent. It became condensed like a cloud. It clove its bladder. That became the sea. Hence men do not drink of the sea. For they regard it as like the place of generation. Hence water issues forth before an animal when it is being born. After that the Daśahotṛi (a particular formula) was created. Prajāpati is the Daśahotṛi. That man succeeds, who thus knowing the power of austere abstraction (or fervour), practises it. This was then water, fluid. Prajāpati wept, (exclaiming), (4) 'For what purpose have I been born, if (I have been born) from this which forms no support?'[45] That which fell[46] into the waters became the earth. That which he wiped away, became the air. That which he wiped away, upwards, became the sky. From the circumstance that he wept (arodīt), these two regions have the name of rodasī, (worlds). 5. They do not weep in the house of the man who knows this. This was the birth of these worlds. He who thus knows the birth of these worlds, incurs no suffering in these worlds. He obtained this (earth as a) basis. Having obtained (this earth as a) basis, he desired, 'May I be propagated.' He practised austere fervour. He became pregnant. He created Asuras from his abdomen. 6. To them he milked out food in an earthen dish. He cast off that body of his. It became darkness.[47] He desired, 'May I be propagated.' He practised

[43] The word thus rendered is atapyata, which has the sense of "being heated" as well as "practising austere abstraction." I have purposely given an equivocal rendering, which may bear either sense.

[44] Such is the sense the commentator gives to the word udārāḥ, which he makes = ulvaṇa-jvālāḥ. Professor Roth (s. v.) explains the word as meaning "fogs."

[45] This is the mode of rendering suggested to me by Professor Aufrecht. After "if" the Commentator supplies the words—"from this non-existing earth I can create no living creature."

[46] "Prajāpati's tears," etc., according to the commentator.

[47] Compare S'. P. Br. xi. 1, 6, 8: Atho yo 'yam avāñ prāṇas tena asurān asṛijata | te imām eva pṛithivīm abhipadya asṛijyanta | tasmai sasṛijānāya tamaḥ iva āsa | 9. So 'vet "pāpmānaṁ vai asṛikshi yasmai me sasṛijānāya tamaḥ iva abhūd" iti | tāṁs tataḥ eva pāpmanā 'vidhyat | tataḥ eva te parābhavann ityādi | "Then he created the Asuras from this lower breath of his. It was only after reaching this earth that they were created. On him, as he continued to create, darkness fell. 9. He understood, 'I have created misery, since darkness has fallen upon me as I was creating.' Then he pierced them with misery, and they in consequence succumbed," etc. The word rendered in the text by "cast off" is applied in Taitt. Sanh. i. 5, 4, 1, to serpents austere fervour. He became pregnant. He created living beings (prajāḥ) from his organ of generation. Hence they are the most numerous because he created them from his generative organ. 8. To them he milked out milk in a wooden dish. He cast off that body of his. It became moon-light. He desired, 'May I be propagated. He practised austere fervour. He became pregnant. He created the seasons from his armpits. To them he milked out butter in a silver dish. He cast off that body of his. It became the period which connects day and night. He desired, 'May I be propagated.' He practised austere fervour. He became pregnant. He created the gods from his mouth.[48] To them he milked out Soma in a golden dish. He cast off that body of his. It became day. 9. These are Prajāpati's milkings. He who thus knows milks out offspring. 'Day (divā) has come to us:' this (exclamation expresses) the godhead of the gods. He who thus knows the godhead of the gods, obtains the gods. This is the birth of days and nights. He who thus knows the birth of days and nights, incurs no suffering in the days and nights. 10. Mind (or soul, manas,) was created from the non-existent. Mind created Prajāpati. Prajāpati created offspring. All this, whatever exists, rests absolutely on mind. This is that Brahma called Svovasyasa.[49] For the man who thus knows, (Ushas), dawning, dawning, dawns more and more bright; he becomes prolific in offspring, and (rich) in cattle; he obtains the rank of Parameshṭhin."

S. P. Br. vi. 1, 2, 11.—Atho āhuḥ | "Prajāpatir eva imān lokān sṛishṭvā pṛithivyām pratyatishṭhat | tasmai imāḥ oshadhayo 'nnam apachyanta | tad āśnāt | sa garbhī abhavat | sa ūrdhvebhyaḥ eva prāṇebhyo devān asṛijata | ye 'vāñchaḥ prāṇās tebhyo martyāḥ prajāḥ" iti | yatamathā 'sṛijata tathā 'sṛijata | Prajāpatis tv eva idaṁ sarvam asṛijata yad idaṁ kiñcha |

"Wherefore they say, 'Prajāpati, having created these worlds, was shedding their old skins (sarpāḥ vai jīryanto 'manyanta . . . tato vai te jīrṇās tanūr apāghnata).

[48] Compare S. P. Br. xi. 1, 6, 7, quoted in the 4th Vol. of this work, p. 22 f.

[49] The Commentator explains this word to mean "that which each succeeding day becomes transcendently excellent (uttarottara-dine vasīyo 'tiśayena śreshṭham). Here, he says, the highest and absolute Brahma is not meant, but mind, which has the form of Brahma, and, by means of the series of its volitions, is every successive moment more and more world-creating" (sankalpa-paramparayā pratikshaṇam uttarottarādhika-jagat-srashṭṛitvād īdṛig-Brahma-rūpatvād manaḥ praśastam | supported upon the earth. For him these herbs were cooked as food. That (food) he ate. He became pregnant. He created the gods from his upper vital airs, and mortal offspring from his lower vital airs. In whatever way he created, so he created. But Prajāpati created all this, whatever exists.'"

S. P. Br. x. 1, 3, 1.—Prajāpatiḥ prajāḥ asṛijata | sa ūrdhvebhyaḥ eva prāṉebhyo devān asṛijata | ye 'vāñchaḥ prāṉās tebhyo martyāḥ prajāḥ | atha ūrdhvam eva mṛityum prajābhyo 'ttāram asṛijata |

"Prajāpati created living beings. From his upper vital airs he created the gods; from his lower vital airs mortal creatures. Afterwards he created death a devourer of creatures."

Taitt. Ār. i. 23, 1.—Āpo vai idam āsan salilam eva | sa Prajāpatir ekaḥ pushkara-parṇe samabhavat | tasya antar manasi kāmaḥ samavarttata "idaṁ sṛijeyam" iti | tasmād yad purusho manasā 'bhigachhati tad vāchā vadati tat karmaṇā karoti | tad eshā 'bhyanūktā "kāmas tad agre samavarttatādhi | manaso retaḥ prathamaṁ yad āsīt | 2. Sato bandhum asati niravindan hṛidi pratīshyā kavayo manīshā" iti | upa evaṁ tad upanamati yat-kāmo bhavati yaḥ evaṁ veda | sa tapo 'tapyata | sa tapas taptvā śarīram adhūnuta | tasya yad māṁsam āsīt tato 'ruṇāḥ Ketavo Vātaraśanāḥ ṛishayaḥ udatishṭhan | 3. Ye nakhās te Vaikhānasāḥ | ye bālās te Bālakhilyāḥ | yo rasaḥ so 'pām antarataḥ kūrmam bhūtam sarpantam tam abravīt "mama vai tvaṉ-māmsā samabhūt" | 4. "na" ity abravīt "pūrvam eva aham iha āsam" iti | tat purushasya purushatvam iti | sa "sahasra-śīrshā purushaḥ sahasrākshaḥ sahasra-pād" bhūtvā udatishṭhat | tam abravīt "tvam ve (sic. me or vai?) pūrvaṁ samabhūt tvam idam pūrvaḥ kurushva" iti | sa itaḥ ādāya apo (5) 'ñjalinā purastād upādadhāt "evā hy eva" iti | tataḥ Ādityaḥ udatishṭhat | sā prāchī dik | atha Aruṇaḥ Ketur dakshiṇataḥ upādadhād "evā hy Agne" iti | tato vai Agnir udatishṭhat | sā dakshiṇā dik | atha Aruṇaḥ Ketuḥ paśchād upādadhād "evā hi Vāyo" iti | 6. Tato Vāyur udatishṭhat | sā pratīchī dik | atha Aruṇaḥ Ketur uttarataḥ upādadhād "evā hi Indra" iti | tato vai Indraḥ udatishṭhat | sā udīchī dik | atha Aruṇaḥ Ketur madhye upādadhād "evā hi Pūshann" iti | tato vai Pūshā udatishṭhat | sā iyam dik | 7. Atha Aruṇaḥ Ketur uparishṭād upādadhād "evā hi devāḥ" iti | tato deva-manushyāḥ pitaro gandharvāpsarasaś cha udatishṭhan | sā ūrdhvā dik | yāḥ viprusho vi parāpatan tābhyo 'surāḥ rakshāṁsi piśachāścha udatishṭhan | tasmāt te parābhavan viprudbhyo 'hi samabhavan | taa

eshā bhyanūktā (8) "āpo ha yad bṛihatīr garbham āyan daksham dadhānāḥ janayantīḥ svayambhūm | tataḥ ime 'dhyasṛijyanta sargāḥ | adbhyo vai idam samabhūt | tasmād idam sarvam Brahma svayambhv" iti | tasmād idam sarvaṁ śithilam iva adhruvam iva abhavat | Prajāpatir vāva tat | ātmanā ātmānaṁ vidhāya tad eva anuprāviśat | tad eshā 'bhyanūktā (9) "vidhāya lokān vidhāya bhūtāni vidhāya sarvāḥ pradiśo diśaścha | Prajāpatiḥ prathamajāḥ ṛitasya ātmanā "tmānam abhisaṁviveśa" iti |

"This was water, fluid. Prajāpati alone was produced on a lotus-leaf. Within, in his mind, desire arose, 'Let me create this.' Hence whatever a man aims at in his mind, he declares by speech, and performs by act.[50] Hence this verse has been uttered, 'Desire formerly arose in it, which was the primal germ of mind, (2) (and which) sages, searching with their intellect, have discovered in the heart as the bond between the existent and the non-existent' (R. V. x. 129, 4). That of which he is desirous comes to the man who thus knows. He practised austere fervour. Having practised austere fervour, he shook his body. From its flesh the rishis (called) Aruṇas, Ketus, and Vātaraśanas[51] arose. 3. His nails became the Vaikhānasas, his hairs the Bālakhilyas. The fluid (of his body became) a tortoise moving amid the waters.[52] He said to him, 'Thou hast sprung from my skin and flesh.'[53] 4. 'No,' replied the tortoise, 'I was here before.' In that (in his having been 'before' pūrvam) consists the manhood of a man (purusha). Becoming 'a man (purusha) with a thousand heads, a thousand eyes, a thousand feet'

[50] Compare Taitt. S. vi. 3, 10, 4, (quoted by Roth. s. v. abhigam) yad vai hṛidayena abhigachhati taj jihvayā vadati |

[51] They are mentioned again in Taitt. Ār. i. 24, 4. See Böhtlingk and Roth's Lexicon s.v. Ketu (where the Aruṇa Ketus are stated to be a sort of superior beings or demons); Artharva-veda, xi. 10, 2; Weber's Indische Studien, ii. 177; and the verse of the M. Bh. xii. 774: Aruṇāḥ Ketavāś chaiva svādhyāyena divaṁ gatāḥ | "By sacred study the Aruṇas and Ketus have ascended to heaven."

[52] The Sanskrit scholar will observe that the text here is rather obscure. It is either corrupt, elliptical, or grammatically irregular.

[53] Here the Sanskrit, if it be not corrupt, must be irregular and incorrect. On the style of the Āraṇyakas, see Mr. E. B. Cowell's Preface to the Kaushītakī Upanishad, p. viii., where it is remarked: "The Āraṇyakas appear to belong to a class of Sanskrit writings, whose history has not yet been thoroughly investigated. Their style, if we may judge from that of the Taittirīya and Kaushītakī, is full of strange solecisms which sometimes half remind us of the gāthās of the Lalita Vistara. The present Upanishad has many peculiar forms, some of which are common to both recensions, while others appear only in one. Such are: nishincha, in p. 10; praiti for prayanti, in p. 51; saṁveśyan, in p. 56; veti for vyeti, in p. 78; adūḍham, in p. 89, etc."

(R.V. x. 90, 1), he arose. Prajāpati said to him, 'Thou wert produced before me: do thou first make this.' He took water from this (5) in the cavity of his two hands, and placed it on the east, repeating the text, 'so be it, o Sun.'[54] From thence the sun arose. That was the eastern quarter. Then Aruṇa Ketu placed (the water) to the south, saying, 'so be it,' o Agni.' Thence Agni arose. That was the southern quarter. Then Aruṇa Ketu placed (the water) to the west, saying 'so be it, o Vāyu.' 6. Thence arose Vāyu. That was the western quarter. Then Aruṇa Ketu placed (the water) to the north, saying 'so be it, o Indra.' Thence arose Indra. That is the northern quarter. Then Aruṇa Ketu placed (the water) in the centre, saying 'so be it, o Pūshan.' Thence arose Pūshan. That is this quarter. 7. Then Aruṇa Ketu placed (the water) above, saying 'so be it, o gods.' Thence arose gods, MEN, fathers, Gandharvas and Apsarases. That is the upper quarter. From the drops which fell apart arose the Asuras, Rakshases, and Piśāchas. Therefore they perished, because they were produced from drops. Hence this text has been uttered; (8) 'when the great waters became pregnant, containing wisdom, and generating Svayambhŭ, from them were created these creations. All this was produced from the waters. Therefore all this is Brahma Svayambhu.' Hence all this was as it were loose, as it were unsteady. Prajāpati was that. Having made himself through himself, he entered into that. Wherefore this verse has been uttered; (9) 'Having formed the world, having formed existing things and all intermediate quarters and quarters, Prajāpati, the firstborn of the ceremonial, entered into himself with himself.'"

From an examination of the legends contained in the Brāhmaṇas, of which some specimens have just been given, it appears (1) that they are generally, if not always, adduced, or invented, with the view of showing the origin, or illustrating the efficacy, of some particular ceremony which the writer wished to explain or recommend; (2) that the accounts which they supply of Prajāpati's creative operations are various and even inconsistent; and (3) that they are the sources of many of the details which are found in a modified form in the cosmogonies of the Purānas.

[54] The formula is in the original evā hy eva. The Commentator says that the first word means "objects of desire to be obtained," and that the second eva signifies "the moving (Sun);" the sense of the entire formula being, "Thou, o Sun, art thyself all objects of desire." The six formulas here introduced had previously occurred at the close of a preceding section, i. 20, 1.

When we discover in the most ancient Indian writings such different and even discrepant accounts of the origin of man, all put forth with equal positiveness, it is impossible to imagine that any uniform explanation of the diversity of castes could have been received at the period when they were composed, or to regard any of the texts which have been cited as more orthodox and authoritative than the rest. Even, therefore, if we should suppose that the author of the Purusha Sūkta meant to represent the four castes as having literally sprung from separate parts of Purusha's body, it is evident that the same idea was not always or even generally adopted by those who followed him, as a revealed truth in which they were bound to acquiesce. In fact, nothing is clearer than that in all these cosmogonies, the writers, while generally assuming certain prevalent ideas as the basis of their descriptions, gave the freest scope to their individual fancy in the invention of details. In such circumstances, perfect coincidence cannot be expected in the narratives.

We shall hereafter see that the Puranic writers reproduce some of these discrepancies in the traditions which descended to them from earlier generations, and add many new inconsistencies of their own, which they themselves, or their commentators, endeavour to explain away by the assumption that the accounts so differing relate to the occurrences of different Kalpas or Manvantaras (great mundane periods). But of a belief in any such Kalpas or Manvantaras no trace is to be found in the hymns or Brāhmaṇas: and, as we shall hereafter see, they must be held to be the inventions of a later age. The real explanation of these differences in the Brāhmaṇas is that the writers did not consider themselves (as their successors held them) to be infallibly inspired, and consequently were not at all studious to avoid in their narratives the appearance of inconsistency with the accounts of their predecessors.

Sect. V.—Manu's Account of the Origin of Castes.

I shall first quote a few verses from the beginning of Manu's account of the creation:

i. 8. So 'bhidhyāya śarīrāt svāt sisṛikshur vividhāḥ prajāḥ | apa eva sasarjādau tāsu vīyam avāsṛijat | 9. Tad aṇḍam abhavad haimaṁ sahasrāṁśu-sama-prabham | tasmin jajne svayam Brahmā sarva-loka-pitāmahaḥ | 10. Āpo nārā iti proktāḥ āpo vai narasūnavaḥ | tāḥ yad asyāyanam pūrvam tena Nārāyaṇaḥ smṛitaḥ | 11. Yat tat kāraṇam avyaktaṁ nityaṁ sad-asadātmakam | tad-visṛishṭaḥ sa purusho loke Brahmeti kīrttyate | 12. Tasminn aṇḍe sa bhagavān ushitvā parivatsaram | svayam evātmano dhyānāt tad aṇḍam akarod dvidhā |[55]

"8. He (the self-existent) having felt desire,[56] and willing to create various living beings from his own body, first created the waters, and threw into them a seed. 9. That seed became a golden egg, of lustre equal to the sun; in it he himself was born as Brahmā, the parent of all the worlds. 10. The waters are called nārāḥ, for they are sprung from Nara; and as they were his first sphere of motion (ayana=path), he is therefore called Nārāyaṇa.[57] 11. Produced from the imperceptible, eternal, existent and non-existent, cause, that male (purusha) is celebrated in the world as Brahmā. 12. After dwelling for a year in the egg, the glorious being, himself, by his own contemplation, split it in twain."

After a description of various other preparatory creative acts (vv. 13–30) the author proceeds in vv. 31 ff. to inform us how the four castes were produced:

i. 31. Lokānāṁ tu vivṛiddhyartham mukhabāhūru-pādataḥ | brāhmaṇaṁ kshattriyaṁ vaiśyaṁ śūdraṁ cha niravarttayat | 32. Dvidhā kṛitvātmano deham ardhena purusho 'bhavat | ardhena nārī tasyāṁ sa Virājam asṛijat prabhuḥ | 33. Tapas taptvā 'sṛijad yaṁ tu sa svayam purusho

[55] The ideas in this passage are derived (with modifications expressive of the theories current in the author's own age) from the S'atapatha Brāhmaṇa, xi. 1, 6, 1 ff. (see vol. iv. of this work, p. 21 f.); or from some other similar account in another Brāhmaṇa.

[56] See S'. P. Br. i. 7, 4, 1: Prajāpatir ha vai svāṁ duhitaram abhidadhyau.

[57] In the M. Bh. iii. 12952, Krishṇa says: apām nārāḥ iti purā sanjñā-karma kṛitam mayā | tena Nārāyaṇo py ukto mama tat tv ayanaṁ sadā | "The name of nārāḥ was formerly assigned by me to the waters: hence I am also called Nārāyaṇa, for there has always been my sphere of motion."

Virāṭ | taṁ māṁ vittāsya sarvasya srashṭāraṁ dvija-sattamāḥ | 34. Aham prajāḥ sisṛikshus tu tapas taptvā suduścharam | patīn prajānām asṛijam maharshīn ādito daśa | 35. Marīchim Atryangirasau Pulastyam Pulahaṁ Kratum | Prachetasam Vasishṭhaṁ cha Bhṛigum Nāradam eva cha | 36. Ete Manūṁs tu saptānyān asṛijan bhūritejasaḥ | devān devanikāyāṁś cha maharshīṁś chāmitaujasaḥ | 37. Yaksha-rakshaḥ-piśāchāṁś cha gandharvāpsaraso 'surān | nāgān sarpān suparṇāṁś cha pitṛīṇāṁ cha pṛithaggaṇān | 38. Vidyuto 'śani-meghāṁś cha rohitendradhanūṁsi cha | ulkā nirghāta-ketūṁś cha jyotīṁshy uchchāvachāni cha | 39. Kinnarān vānarān matsyān vividhāṁś cha vihangamān | paśūn mṛigān manushyāṁś cha vyālāṁś chobhayatodataḥ | 40. Kṛimikīṭa-patangāṁś cha yūkā-makshika-matkuṇam | sarvaṁ cha daṁśa-maśakam sthāvaraṁ cha pṛithagvidham | 41. Evam etair idaṁ sarvam man-niyogād mahātmabhiḥ | yathākarma tapo-yogāt sṛishṭaṁ sthāvara-jangamam |

31. "That the worlds might be peopled, he caused the Brāhman, the Kshattriya, the Vaiśya, and the Śūdra to issue from his mouth, his arms, his thighs, and his feet.[58] 32. Having divided his own body into two parts, the lord (Brahmā) became, with the half a male (purusha), and with the half, a female; and in her he created Virāj.[59] 33. Know, O most excellent twice-born men, that I, whom that male, (purusha)[60] Virāj, himself created, am the creator of all this world. 34. Desiring to produce living creatures, I performed very arduous devotion, and first created ten Maharshis (great rishis), lords of living beings, (35) viz., Marīchi, Atri, Angiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, Prachetas, Vaśishṭha, Bhṛigu, and Nārada.[61] 36. They, endowed with [58] On this Kullūka the Commentator remarks: Daivyā cha śaktyā mukhādibhyo brāhmaṇādi-nirmāṇam Brahmaṇo na visankanīyaṁ śruti-siddhatvāt | "It is not to be doubted that, by his divine power, Brahmā formed the Brāhman and the other castes from his mouth and other members, since it is proved by the Veda. He then quotes the 12th verse of the Purusha Sūkta.

[59] See the Purusha Sūkta, verse 5.

[60] It will be observed that Manu applies this term purusha to three beings, first to Brahmā (v. 11), second to the male formed by Brahmā from the half of his own body (v. 32), and third to Virāj, the offspring of the male and female halves of Brahmā's body (v. 33). It will be noticed that this story of Brahmā dividing his body is borrowed from the passage of the S'. P. Br. xiv. 4, 2, 1, quoted above.

[61] In the Rāmāyaṇa, ii. 110, 2 ff., a different account is given of the origin of the world, in which no reference is made to Manu Svāyambhuva. The order of the creation there described is as follows: First everything was water. Then Brahmā Svăyămbhū, with the deities, came into existence—Brahmā being said to have sprung great energy, created[62] other seven Manus, gods, and abodes of gods, and Maharshis of boundless might; (37) Yakshas, Rakshases, Piśāchas, Gandharvas, Apsarases, Asuras, Nāgas, Serpents, great Birds, and the different classes of Pitṛis; (38) lightnings, thunderbolts, clouds, Indra's bows unbent and bent, meteors, portentous atmospheric sounds, comets, and various luminaries; (39) Kinnaras, apes, fishes, different sorts of birds, cattle, deer, MEN, beasts with two rows of teeth; (40) small and large reptiles, moths, lice, flies, fleas, all gadflies and gnats, and motionless things of different sorts. 41. Thus by my appointment, and by the force of devotion, was ALL THIS WORLD BOTH MOTIONLESS AND MOVING, created by those great beings, according to the (previous) actions of each creature."

The different portions of the preceding narrative of the creation of the human species are not easily reconcileable with each other. For it is first stated in verse 31, that men of the four castes proceeded separately from different parts of Brahmā's body,—prior (as it would appear) (1) to the division of that body into two parts and to the successive production (2) of Virāj, (3) Manu, and (4) the Maharshis, who formed all existing creatures. And yet we are told in verse 39, that MEN were among the beings called into existence by those Maharshis, and in verse 41, that the entire MOVING as well as motionless WORLD was their work. It is not said that the men created by the Maharshis were distinct from those composing the four castes, and we must, therefore, assume that the latter also are included under the general appellation of men. But if men of the four castes had been already produced before the formation of all living creatures by the Maharshis, what necessity existed for the men of these castes being a second time called into being as a part of that later creation? It is possible that this from the æther (ākāśa). Brahmā, with his sons, created the world. From Brahmā sprang Marīchi; from Marīchi, Kaśyapa; from Kaśyapa, Vivasvat; and from Vivasvat, Manu Vaivasvata. The original of this passage is quoted in the 4th vol. of this work, p. 29 ff.

[62] These great rishis seem to be the beings denoted by the word viśvasṛijaḥ, "creators of the universe," in the verse of Manu (xii. 50), which will be quoted below. Reference to rishis, or to seven rishis, as "formers of existing things" (bhūta-kṛitaḥ), is also found in the Atharvaveda, vi. 108, 4; vi. 133, 4, 5; xi. 1, 1, 3, 24; xii. 1, 39; and the word bhūtakṛitaḥ, without the addition of rishis, is found in the same work iii. 28, 1; iv. 35, 2, and xix. 16, 2.

allegation of the separate creation of castes may have been engrafted as an after-thought on the other account.[63]

After other details, regarding the propagation, nature, etc, of created things (vv. 42–50), the re-absorption of Brahmā into the Supreme Spirit, and his alternations of sleep and repose, etc. (vv. 50–57), Manu proceeds:

58. Idaṁ śāstraṁ tu kṛitvā 'sau mām eva svayam āditaḥ | vidhivad grāhayāmāsa Marīchyādīṁś tv aham munīn | 59. Etad vo 'yam Bhṛiguḥ śāstraṁ śrāvayishyaty aśeshataḥ | etad hi matto 'dhijage sarvam esho 'khilam muniḥ | 60. Tatas tathā sa tenokto maharshir Manunā Bhṛiguḥ | tān abravīd ṛishīn sarvān prītātmā "śrūyatām" iti | 61. Svāyambhuvasyāsya Manoḥ shaḍ-vaṁśyā Manavo 'pare | sṛishṭavantaḥ prajāḥ svāḥ svāḥ mahātmāno mahaujasaḥ | 62. Svārochishaś chauttamiś cha Tāmaso Raivatas tathā | Chākshushaś cha mahātejā Vivasvat-suta eva cha | 63. Svāyambhuvādyāḥ saptaite Manavo bhūritejasaḥ | sve sve 'ntare sarvam idam utpādyāpuś charācharam |

59. "Having formed this Scripture, he (Brahmā) himself in the beginning caused me to comprehend it according to rule; as I did to Marīchi and the other munis. 60. This Bhṛigu will give you to hear this scripture in its entirety; for this muni learned the whole from me. 61. Then that Maharshi (great rishi), Bhṛigu being so addressed by Manu, with pleasure addressed all those rishis, saying, 'Let it be heard.' 62. 'From this Manu Svāyambhuva sprang other Manus in six successive generations, great and glorious, who respectively created living beings of their own,—(63) viz., Svārochisha, Auttami, Tāmasa, Raivata, Chākshusha, and the mighty son of Vivasvat. 64. These seven[64] Manus of great power, of whom Svāyambhuva was the first, have each in his own period (antara) produced and possessed the world.'"

[63] In the same way it may be observed that in v. 22 Brahmā is said to have formed the subtile class of living gods whose essence is to act, and of the S'ādhyas (karmātmanām cha devānām so 'sṛijat prāṇinām prabhuḥ | sādhyānāṁ cha gaṇaṁ sūkshmam), and in v. 25, to have "called into existence this creation, desiring to form these living beings" (sṛishṭiṁ sasarja chaivemāṁ srashṭum ichchann imāḥ prajāḥ). But if the gods and all other creatures already existed, any such further account of their production by the Maharshis, as is given in verse 36, seems to be not only superfluous but contradictory.

[64] It will be observed that here Svāyambhuva is included in the seven Manus, although in verse 36 (see above) it is said that the ten Maharshis, who had themselves been created by Svāyambhuva (vv. 34 f.), produced seven other Manus.

After some preliminary explanations regarding the divisions of time as reckoned by men and gods, etc. (vv. 64-78), the author proceeds to tell us how long each of these Manus reigns:

79. Yat prāk dvādaśa-sāhasram uditaṁ daivikaṁ yugam | tad eka-saptati-guṇam manvantaram ihochyate | 80. Manvantarāṇy asankhyāni sargaḥ saṁhāra eva cha | krīḍann ivaitat kurute Parameshṭhī punaḥ punaḥ |

"The age (yuga) of the gods mentioned before, consisting of twelve thousand (years), when multiplied by seventy-one, is here called a manvantara. 80. There are innumerable manvantaras, creations and destructions. The Supreme Being performs this again and again, as if in sport."

A more detailed account of these great mundane periods will be given in the next section, when I come to take up the Vishṇu Purana. Meanwhile it may be remarked that the present manvantara is that of the last of the Manus above enumerated, or Manu Vaivasvata, who, according to verse 63, must have created the existing world. But if such be the case, it does not appear why the creation of Manu Svāyambhuva, with which the present race of mortals can have little to do, should have been by preference related to the rishis in vv. 33 ff. It must, however, be observed that in v. 33 Manu Svāyambhuva described himself as the former of "this" (i.e., the existing) universe, and there is no doubt that the whole code of laws prescribed in the sequel of the work is intended by the author to be observed by the existing race of Indians (see verses 102 ff. of the first book). We must, therefore, suppose that the creations of the later Manus are substantially identical with that of the first; or that there is some confusion or inconsistency in the accounts which I have cited. Perhaps both suppositions may be correct.

In vv. 81-86, the four Yugas (or great ages of the world) the Kṛita, Tretā, Dvāpara, and Kali, their gradual deterioration, and the special duties peculiar to each, are described.[65]

[65] In v. 86 these predominant duties are said to be austere fervour in the Kṛita age, knowledge in the Tretā, sacrifice in the Dvāpara, and liberality alone in the Kali (tapaḥ paraṁ Kṛita-yuge tretāyāṁ jñānam uchyate | dvāpare yajnam evāhur dānam ekam kalau yuge). This, as remarked in Weber's Indische Studien, 282 f., note, is not quite in conformity with the view of the Muṇḍaka Upanishad, i. 2, 1, which states:

At verse 87, Bhṛigu recurs to the four castes:

87. Sarvasyāsya tu sargasya gupty-artham sa mahādyutiḥ | mukha-bāhūru-paj-jānām pṛithak karmāṇy akalpayat |

"For the preservation of this whole creation, that glorious being (Brahmā) ordained separate functions for those who sprang from his mouth, his arms, his thighs, and his feet."

These functions are then detailed (vv. 88-92). In verse 93, the grounds of the Brāhmans' pre-eminence are stated:

93. Uttamāngobhavāj jyaishṭhyād brahmaṇaś chaiva dhāraṇāt | sarvasyaivāsya sargasya dharmato brāhmaṇaḥ prabhuḥ | 94. Taṁ hi svayambhūḥ svād āsyāt tapas taptvā "dito 'sṛijat |

Since the Brahman sprang from the most excellent organ, since he is the first-born and possesses the Veda, he is by nature the lord of this whole creation. Him, the self-existent (Brahmā) after exercising fervid abstraction, formed at the first from his own mouth."

But as there are grades of excellence among created things, and among men themselves (96), so are there also among Brahmans:

97. Brāhmaṇeshu cha vidvāṁso vidvatsu kṛita-buddhayaḥ | kṛita-buddhishu karttāraḥ karttṛishu brahma-vedinaḥ |

"Among Brāhmans the learned are the most excellent, among the learned the resolute, among the resolute those who act, and among them who act they who possess divine knowledge."

In a subsequent part of the work (xii. 40 ff.) we find men in general, the castes, and indeed all existing things, from Brahmā downwards, classified according to their participation in different degrees in the three guṇas, or qualities (sattva, "goodness," rajas, "passion," and tamas, "darkness").

39. Yena yāṁs tu guṇenaishāṁ saṁsārān pratipadyate | tān samāsena vakshyāmi sarvasyāsya yathākramam | 40. Devatvaṁ sāttvikā yānti manushyatvaṁ cha rājasāḥ | tiryaktvaṁ tāmasā nityam ity eshā tri-

tat etat satyam mantreshu karmāṇi kavayo yāny apaśyaṁs tāni tretāyām bahudhā santatāni | "This is true: the rites which sages beheld in the hymns, are in great variety celebrated in the Tretā." In the same way the M. Bh. iii. v. 11,248, says that sacrifices and rites prevail in the Tretā (tato yajñāḥ pravarttante dharmāś cha vividhāḥ kriyāḥ | tretāyām ityādi). See also M. Bh. xii. 13,090. The word kṛita, as the name of the first yuga is thus explained in a previous verse of the former of these two passages (11,235): kṛitam eva na karttavyaṁ tasmin kāle yugottame | "In the time of that most excellent Yuga (everything) has been done, (and does) not (remain) to be done."

vidhā gatiḥ | . . . 43. Hastinaś cha turangāś cha śūdrā mlechhāś cha garhitāḥ | siṁhā vyāghrā varāhāś cha madhyamā tāmasī gatiḥ | . . . 46. Rājānaḥ kshattriyāś chaiva rājnaś chaiva purohitāḥ | vādayuddha-pradhānāś cha madhyamā rājasī gatiḥ | . . . 48. Tāpasā yatayo viprā ye cha vaimānikā gaṇāḥ | nakshatrāṇi cha daityāś cha prathamā sāttvikī gatiḥ | 49. Yajvāna ṛishayo devā vedā jyotīṁshi vatsarāḥ | pitaraś chaiva sādhyāś cha dvitīyā sāttvikī gatiḥ | 50. Brahmā viśvasṛijo dharmo mahān avyaktam eva cha | uttamāṁ sāttvikīm etāṁ gatim āhur manīshinaḥ |

"39. I shall now declare succinctly in order the states which the soul reaches by means of each of these qualities. 40. Souls endowed with the sattva quality attain to godhead; those having the rajas quality become men; whilst those characterized by tamas always become beasts—such is the threefold destination . . . 43. Elephants, horses, Śūdras and contemptible Mlechhas, lions, tigers, and boars form the middle dark condition . . . 46. Kings, Kshattriyas, a king's priests (purohitāḥ), and men whose chief occupation is the war of words, compose the middle condition of passion . . . 48. Devotees, ascetics, Brāhmans, the deities borne on aerial cars, constellations, and Daityas, constitute the lowest condition of goodness. 49. Sacrificing priests, rishis, gods, the vedas, the celestial luminaries, years, the fathers, the Sādhyas, form the second condition of goodness. 50. Brahmā, the creators,[66] righteousness, the Great One (mahat), the Unapparent One (avyakta), compose the highest condition of goodness."

[66] These "creators" (viśvasṛijaḥ) are thus mentioned in Taitt. Br. iii. 12, 9, 2. Ādarśam Agniṁ chinvānāḥ pūrve viśvasṛijo 'mṛitāḥ | śatāṁ varsha-sahasrāṇi dikshitāḥ satram āsata | 3. tapaḥ āsīd gṛihapatir Brahma brahmā 'bhavat svayam | satyaṁ ha hotaishām āsīd yad visvasṛija āsata | amṛitam ebhya udagāyat sahasram parivatsarān | bhūtaṁ ha prastotaishām āsīd bhavishyat prati chāharat | prāṇo adhvaryur abhavad idaṁ sarvaṁ sishāsatām | . . . 7. Viśvasṛijaḥ prathamāḥ satram āsata | . . . . | tato ha jajne bhuvanasya gopāḥ hiraṇmayaḥ śakunir Brahma nāma | yena sūryas tapati tejaseddhaḥ | . . . . 8. Etena vai viśvasṛijaḥ idaṁ visvam asṛijanta | yad viśvam asṛijanta tasmād viśvasṛijaḥ | viśvam enān anu prajāyate | "2. The ancient and immortal creators of the universe, keeping fire kindled till they saw the new moon, and consecrated, were engaged in a sacrifice for 100,000 years. 3. Austere fervour was the householder; Prayer itself (brahma) was the brahmā priest; Truth was their hotṛi, when the creators were so occupied. Immortality was their udgātṛi for a thousand years. The Past was their prastotṛi, the Future their pratihartṛi; Breath was the adhvaryu, whilst they were seeking to obtain all this." After a good deal more of this allegory, the author proceeds in para.: 7. "These first

It will be observed that the different parts of this account of the mode in which the three qualities are distributed, are not quite in harmony. From v. 40 it would appear that all souls having the quality of passion become men; and yet we find from vv. 43, 48, and 49, that Śūdras belong to the tāmasa class, and Brāhmans, of different descriptions, to two of the Sāttvika grades. According to the rule enunciated in v. 40, the latter ought to have been born as gods.

It is, further, remarkable that in this enumeration Śūdras are found in the same category with Mlechhas (v. 43), that the Vaiśyas are not accommodated with a position in any of the classes, that Kshattriyas and kings' domestic priests, who are of course Brāhmans, and others (who must be Brāhmans) fond of disputation on learned questions[67] (though not stated to be heretical) are ranked together as "passionate" (v. 46), while other Brāhmans of different characters are placed in two of the higher grades, Brāhmans simply so called (viprāḥ) being regarded as "good" in the lowest degree (v. 48), and sacrificing priests (yajvānaḥ) sharing with rishis, gods, the vedas, etc., the honour of the middle condition of goodness. It is not clear whether the devotees, and ascetics, mentioned in v. 48, belong to the same caste as the Brāhmans with whom they are associated, or may also be men of the inferior classes. Nor is it evident for what reason the sacrificing priests (yajvānaḥ), specified in v. 49, are so much more highly estimated than the king's priests (rājnaḥ purohitāḥ) in v. 46, since the latter also officiate at sacrifices. The honourable position assigned to Daityas in the lowest class of "good" beings (v. 48) is also deserving of notice. We shall see in the following chapter that the Purānas variously describe mankind as belonging entirely to the "passionate" class (see v. 40, above) and as characterized by the three other "qualities," according to their caste.

creators were engaged in sacrifice . . . Thence was born the preserver of the world, the golden bird called Brahma, by whom the sun glows, kindled with light. . . . 8. . . . Through this the creators created this universe. As they created the universe, they are called vis'vasṛijaḥ. . Everything is created after them." See above the reference made to ṛishayo bhūta-kṛitaḥ in p. 36. The allegory in this extract from the Taitt. Br. resembles in its character that in the sixth verse of the Purusha Sūkta.

[67] S'ārstārthakalaha- priyās cha | Comm.

SECT. VI.—Account of the System of Yugas, Manvantaras, and Kalpas, according to the Vishṇu Purāṇa, and other authorities.

I shall in the next section adduce the description given in the Vishṇu Purāṇa of the creation of living creatures, and the origin of the four castes, after first supplying in the present some explanation of the great mundane periods, the Yugas, Manvantaras, Kalpas, etc.

The computations of these great periods are stated in the third chapter of the first book, and in the first chapter of the sixth book, and are clearly explained by Professor Wilson in his notes to page 50 of his translation.

One year of mortals is equal to one day of the gods.[68]

12,000 divine years are equal to a period of four Yugas, which is thus made up, viz.:

Kṛita Yuga with its mornings and evenings					.....	4,800	divine years
Tretā Yuga	,,	,,	,,	,,	.....	3,600	,, ,,
Dvāpara Yuga	,,	,,	,,	,,	.....	2,400	,, ,,
Kali Yuga	,,	,,	,,	,,	.....	1,200	,, ,, making...						12,000	divine years.[69]

As a day of the gods is = to one year of mortals, the 12,000 divine years must be multiplied by 360, the assumed number of days in a year, to give the number of the years of mortals in this great period of four yugas, thus: 12,000 divine years × 360 = 4,320,000 years of mortals. 1000 of these periods of 12,000 divine, or 4,320,000 human, years—i.e., 4,320,000,000 human years are = 1 day of Brahmā,[70] and his night is of the same duration. Within that period of a day of Brahmā, 14 Manus reign,[71] and a Manvantara, or period of Manu,

[68] Vishṇu P. vi. 1, 4 ahorātram pitṛīṇāṁ tu māso 'bdas tridivaukasāṁ | See also Manu i. 66 and 67. The Taitt. Br. iii. 9, 22, 1, too, states: ekaṁ vai etad devānām ahar yat saṁvatsaraḥ | "This period of a year is one day of the gods."

[69] i. 3, 10. Divyair varsha-sahasraistu kṛita-tretādi-sanjnitam | chaturyugaṁ dvādaśabhis tad-vibhāgaṁ nibodha me | 11. chatvāri trīṇi dve chaikam kṛitādishu yathākramam | divyābdānām sahasrāṇi yugeshv āhur purāvidaḥ | 12. Tat-pramāṇaiḥ śataiḥ sandhyā pūrvā tatrābhidhīyate | sandhyāṁśakaś cha tat-tulyo yugasyānantaro hi saḥ | 13. Sandhyā-sandhyāṁśayor antar yaḥ kālo muni-sattama | yugākhyaḥ sa tu vijneyaḥ kṛita-tretādi-sanjnitaḥ |

[70] V. P. i. 3, 14. Kṛitaṁ tretā dvāparaś cha kalis chaiva chaturyugam | prochyate tat-sahasraṁ cha Brahmaṇo divasam mune | See also Manu i. 72.

[71] V. P. i. 3, 15. Brahmaṇo divasc brahman Manavaś cha chaturdaśa | bhavanti | is consequently = the 14th part of a day of Brahmā. In the present Kalpa (= a day of Brahmā) six Manus, of whom Svāyambhuva was the first, have already passed away, the present Manu being Vaivasvata.[72] In each Manvantara seven rishis, certain deities,. an Indra, a Manu, and the kings, his sons, are created and perish.[73] A thousand of the systems of 4 Yugas, as has been before explained, occur coincidently with these 14 Manvantaras; and consequently about 71 systems of 4 Yugas elapse during each Manvantara, and measure the lives of the Manu and the deities of the period.[74] At the close of this day of Brahmā a collapse (pratisancharaḥ) of the universe takes place, which lasts through a night of Brahmā, equal in duration to his day, during which period the three worlds are converted into one great ocean, when the lotus-born god,[75] expanded by his deglutition of the universe, and contemplated by the yogis and gods in Janaloka, sleeps on the serpent Sesha. At the end of that night he awakes and creates anew.[76]

A year of Brahmā is composed of the proper number of such days and nights; and 100 such years constitute his whole life. The period of his life is called Para, and the half of it Parārddha, or the half of a Para. One Parārddha, or half of Brahmā's existence, has now expired, terminating with the great Kalpa, called the Pādma Kalpa. The now existing Kalpa, or day of Brahmā, called Vārāha (or that of the boar), is the first of the second Parārddha of Brahmā's existence.[77] The

[72] This is stated by Manu i. 62 ff. (see above), as well as in the third book of the V. P. i. 3, which gives the names in the same order: Svāyambhuvo Manuḥ pūrvo Manuḥ Svārochishas tathā | Auttamis Tāmasaś chaiva Raivataś Chākshushas tathā | shaḍ ete Manavo 'tītāḥ sāmprataṁ tu Raveḥ sutaḥ | Vaivasvato 'yaṁ yasyaitat saptamaṁ varttate 'ntaram |

[73] V. P. i. 3, 16. Saptarshayaḥ surāḥ S'akro Manus tat-sūnavo nṛipāḥ | ekakāle hi sṛijyante saṁhriyante cha pūrvavat |

[74] Ibid ver. 17. Chaturyugānāṁ sankhyātā sādhikā hy eka saptatiḥ | manvantaram Manoḥ kālaḥ suradīnāṁ cha sattama | See also Manu i. 79.

[75] The birth of Prajāpati on a lotus-leaf is mentioned in the Taitt. Āranyy. i. 23, 1, quoted above, p. 32.

[76] Ibid 20. Chaturdaśa-guṇo hy esha kālo brāhmam ahaḥ smṛitam | brāhmo naimittiko nāma tasyānte pratisancharaḥ | . . . 22. Ekārṇave tu trailokye Brahmā Nārāyaṇātmakaḥ | bhogi-śayyāgataḥ śete trailokya-grāsa-vriṁhitaḥ | 23. Janasthair yogibhir devaiś chintyamāno 'bja-sambhavaḥ | tat-pramāṇāṁ hi tāṁ rātriṁ tadante sṛijate punaḥ | See also V. P. i. 2, 59–62, as translated by Wilson, vol. i. p. 41.

[77] Ibid ver. 24. Evam tu Brahmaṇo varsham evaṁ varsha-śataṁ cha tat | śatam hi tasya varshāṇām param āyur mahātmanaḥ | 25. Ekam asya vyatītaṁ tu parārddham Brahmaṇo 'nagha | tasyānte 'bhūd mahākalpaḥ Pādmaḥ ity abhiviśrutaḥ | dvitīyasya

dissolution, which occurs at the end of each Kalpa, or day of Brahmā, is called naimittika, incidental, occasional, or contingent. (See Wilson's Vishṇu Purana, vol. i. of Dr. Hall's edition, p. 52, with the editor's note; and vol. ii. p. 269. For an account of the other dissolutions of the universe I refer to the same work, vol. i. p. 113, and to pp. 630–633 of the original 4to. edition.)

Of this elaborate system of Yugas, Manvantaras, and Kalpas, of enormous duration, no traces are found in the hymns of the Rig-veda. Their authors were, indeed, familiar with the word Yuga,[78] which frequently occurs in the sense of age, generation, or tribe. Thus in i. 139, 8; iii. 26, 3; vi. 8, 5; vi. 15, 8; vi. 36, 5; x. 94, 12, the phrase yuge yuge[79] means "in every age." In iii. 33, 8; x. 10, 10, we have uttarā yugāni, "future ages," and in x. 72, 1, uttare yuge, "in a later age;" in vii. 70, 4, pūrvāṇi yugāni, "former ages,"[80] and in i. 184, 3, yuga jūrṇā, "past ages." In i. 92, 11; i. 103, 4; i. 115, 2; i. 124, 2; i. 144, 4;[81] ii. 2, 2; v. 52, 4; vi. 16, 23; vii. 9, 4; viii. 46, 12; viii. 51, 9; ix. 12, 7;[82] x. 27, 19; x. 140, 6[83] (in all of which places, except i. 115, 2, the word is combined with manushyā, mānushā, manushaḥ, or janānām), yuga seems to denote "generations" of men, or parārddhasya varttamānasya vai dvija | Vārāhaḥ iti kalpo 'yam prathamaḥ parikalpitaḥ |

[78] In Professor Willson's Dictionary three senses are assigned to yuga (neuter) (1) a pair; (2) an age as the Kṛita, Tretā, etc.; (3) a lustre, or period of five years. When used as masculine the word means, according to the same authority, (1) a yoke; (2) a measure of four cubits, etc.; (3) a particular drug.

[79] Sāyana, on iii. 36, 3, explains it by pratidinam, "every day;" on vi. 8, 5; vi. 15, 8; vi. 36, 5, by kāle kāle, "at every time."

[80] Sāyana takes the phrase for former "couples of husbands and wives," mithunāni jāyāpatirūpāṇi.

[81] In i. 92, 11 and i. 124, 2, Ushas (the Dawn) is spoken of as, praminatī manushyā yugāni, "wearing away human terms of existence, or generations." In commenting on the former text Sāyana explains yugāni as equivalent to kṛita-tretādīni, "the Kṛita, Tretā, and other ages," whilst in explaining the second, he takes the same word as signifying yugopalakshitān nimeshādi-kālāvayavān, "the seconds and other component parts of time indicated by the word," or as equivalent to yugmāni, "the conjunctions of men,"—since the dawn scatters abroad to their several occupations men who had been previously congregated together!" In his note on i. 144, 4, he gives an option of two different senses: manoḥ sambhandhīni yugāni jāyāpati-rupāṇi hotradhvaryurūpāṇi vā | "couples consisting of husband and wife, or of the hotṛi and adhvaryu priests."

[82] This verse, ix. 12, 7, is also found in Sāma V. ii. 552, where, however, yujā is substituted for yugā.

[83] This verse occurs also in Sāma V. ii. 1171, and Vāj. S. xii. 111.

rather, in some places, "tribes" of men. In v. 73, 3, the phrase nāhushā yugā must have a similar meaning. In i. 158, 6, it is said that the rishi Dīrghatamas became worn out in the tenth yuga; on which Professor Wilson remarks (R. V. vol. ii. 104, note): "The scholiast understands yuga in its ordinary interpretation; but the yuga of five years is perhaps intended, a lustrum, which would be nothing marvellous." Professor Aufrecht proposes to render, "in the tenth stage of life." The first passage of the Rig-veda, in which there is any indication of a considerable mundane period being denoted, is x. 72, 2 f., where "a first," or, "an earlier age (yuga) of the gods" is mentioned (devānām pūrvye yuge; devānām prathame yuge) when "the existent sprang from the non-existent" (asataḥ sad ajāyata); but no allusion is made to its length. In the same indefinite way reference is made in x. 97, 1, to certain "plants which were produced before the gods,—three ages (yugas) earlier" (yāḥ oshadhīḥ pūrvāḥ jātāḥ devebhyas triyugam purā). In one verse of the Atharva-veda, however, the word yuga is so employed as to lead to the supposition that a period of very long duration is intended. It is there said, viii. 2, 21: śatañ te ayutañ hāyanān dve yuge tṛiṇi chatvāri kṛiṇmaḥ | "we allot to thee a hundred, ten thousand, years, two, three, four ages (yugas)."[84] As we may with probability assume that the periods here mentioned proceed in the ascending scale of duration, two yugas, and perhaps even one yuga, must be supposed to exceed 10,000 years.

The earliest comparison between divine and human periods of duration of which I am aware is found in the text of the Taitt. Br. quoted above in a note to p. 42: "A year is one day of the gods.[85] But so far as that passage itself shows, there is no reason to imagine that the statement it contains was anything more than an isolated idea, or that the conception had, at the time when the Brāhmaṇas were compiled, been developed, and a system of immense mundane periods, whether human or divine, had been elaborated. That, however, the authors of the Brāhmanas were becoming familiar with the idea of extravagantly large numbers is clear from the passage in the Taitt. Br. iii. 12, 9, 2, quoted above, p. 41, in the note on Manu xii. 50, where it is said that the creators were engaged in a sacrifice for 100,000 years.

[84] For the context of this line see Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society for 1866, page 42.

[85] An analogous idea is found in the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa xiv. 7, 1, 33 ff. (=Bṛihadāraṇyaka Upanishad pp. 817 ff. of Cal. ed.) atha ye śatam manushyāṇām ānandāḥ sa ekaḥ pitṛiṇāñ jitalokānām ānandaḥ | "now a hundred pleasures of men are one pleasure of the Pitṛis who have conquered the worlds." And so on in the same way; a hundred pleasures of the Pitṛis equalling one pleasure of the Karmadevas (or gods who have become so by works); a hundred pleasures of the latter equalling one pleasure of the gods who were born such, etc.

Professor Roth is of opinion (see his remarks under the word Kṛita in his Lexicon) that according to the earlier conception stated in Manu i. 69, and the Mahābhārata (12,826 ff.), the four Yugas—Kṛita, Tretā, Dvāpara, and Kali, with their mornings and evenings, consisted respectively of no more than 4,800; 3,600; 2,400; and 1,200 ordinary years of mortals; and that it was the commentators on Manu, and the compilers of the Purāṇas, who first converted the years of which they were made up into divine years. The verse of Manu to which Professor Roth refers (i. 69), and the one which follows, are certainly quite silent about the years composing the Kṛita age being divine years:

Chatvāry āhuḥ sahasrāṇi varshāṇāṁ tu kṛitaṁ yugam | tasya tāvachchhatī sandhyā sandhyāṁśchaścha tathāvidhaḥ | 70. Itareshu sasandhyeshu sasandhāṁśeshu cha trishu | ekāpāyena varttante sahasrāṇi śatāni cha | "They say that four thousand years compose the kṛita yuga, with as many hundred years for its morning and the same for its evening. 70. In the other three yugas, with their mornings and evenings, the thousands and hundreds are diminished successively by one."

Verse 71 is as follows: Yad etat parisankhyātam ādāv eva chaturyugam | etad dvādaśa-sāhasraṁ devānāṁ yugam uchyate | which, as explained by Medhātithi, may be thus rendered: "Twelve thousand of these periods of four yugas, as above reckoned, are called a Yuga of the gods." Medhātithi's words, as quoted by Kullūka, are these: Chaturyugair eva dvādaśa-sahasra-sankhyair divyam yugam | "A divine Yuga is formed by four yugas to the number of twelve thousand." Kullūka, however, says that his predecessor's explanation is mistaken, and must not be adopted (Medhātither bhramo nādarttavyaḥ). His own opinion is that the system of yugas mentioned in vv. 69 and 71 are identical, both being made up of divine years. According to this view, we must translate v. 71 as follows: "The period of four yugas, consisting of twelve thousand years, which has been reckoned above, is called a Yuga of the gods." This certainly appears to be the preferable translation, and it is confirmed by the tenor of verse 79. Verse 71, however, may represent a later stage of opinion, as it is not found in the following passage of the Mahābhārata, where the previous verse (69) is repeated, and verse 70 is expanded into three verses, though without any alteration of the sense:

M. Bh. iii. 12826 ff. — Ādito manuja-vyāghra kṛitsnasya jagataḥ kshaye | chatvāry āhuḥ sahasrāṇi varshāṇāṁ tat kṛitaṁ yugam | tasya tāvachchhatī sandhyā sandhyāṁścha tathāvidhaḥ |

"In the beginning, after the destruction of the entire universe, they say that there are four thousand years: that is the Kṛita Yuga, which has a morning of as many hundred years, and an evening of the same duration." And then, after enumerating in like manner the other three Yugas with their respective thousands and hundreds successively diminished by one, the speaker (the sage Mārkaṇḍeya) proceeds in verse 12831: Eshā dvādaśahasrī yugākhyā parikīrttitā | etat sahasra-paryantam aho brāhmam udāhṛitam | "This period of twelve thousand years is known by the appellation of the Yugas. A period extending to a thousand of these is called a day of Brahmā."

Nowhere, certainly, in this passage is any mention made of the years being divine years.

The earliest known text in which the names of the four Yugas are found is a verse occurring in the story of Śunaḥśepha in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa vii. 15: Kaliḥ śayāno bhavati sanjihānas tu dvāparaḥ | uttish-ṭhaṁs tretā bhavati kṛitaṁ sampadyate charan | "A man while lying is the Kali; moving himself, he is the Dvāpara; rising, he is the Tretā; walking, he becomes the Kṛita."[86] But this brief allusion leaves us

[86] This verse has been already translated no less than six times; twice into German by Weber and Roth (Ind. Stud. i. 286 and 460), once into Latin by Streiter (see Ind. Stud. ix. 315), and thrice into English, by Wilson (Journ. R. A. S. for 1851, p. 99), Müller (Anc. Sansk. Lit. p. 412), and Haug (Ait. Br. ii. 464). All these authors, except the last, concur in considering the verse as referring to the four Yugas. Dr. Haug, however, has the following note: "Sāyana does not give any explanation of this important passage, where the names of the Yugas are mentioned for the first time. These four names are, as is well known from other sources, . . . names of dice, used at gambling. The meaning of this Gāthā is, There is every success to be hoped; for the unluckiest die, the Kali is lying, two others are slowly moving and half fallen, but the luckiest, the Kṛita, is in full motion. The position of dice here given is indicatory of a fair chance of winning the game." Both Dr. Haug's translation and note are criticised by Professor Weber (Ind. Stud. ix. 319). Of the following verses, which occur in Manu ix. 301 f., the second is a paraphrase of that in the Aitareya Brāh-quite in the dark as to the duration which was assigned to these yugas in the age when the Brāhmaṇa was compiled.

Sect. VII.—Account of the different creations, including that of the castes, according to the Vishṇu Purāṇa.

I commence with the following general account of the cosmogony of the Vishṇu Purāṇa, extracted from Professor Wilson's Preface to his translation of that work, vol. i. p. xciii. :

"The first book of the six, into which the work is divided, is occupied chiefly with the details of creation, primary (sarga), and secondary (pratisarga); the first explains how the universe proceeds from Prakṛiti, or eternal crude matter;[87] the second, in what manner the forms of things are developed from the elementary substances previously evolved, or how they re-appear after their temporary destruction.[88] Both these creations are periodical; but the termination of the first occurs only at the end of the life of Brahmā, when not only all the gods and all other forms are annihilated, but the elements are again merged into primary substance, besides which only one spiritual being exists. The latter takes place at the end of every Kalpa or day of Brahmā, and affects only the forms of inferior creatures and lower worlds, leaving the substances of the universe entire, and sages and gods unharmed."[89]

mana: Kṛitam tretā-yugaṁ chaiva dvāparaṁ kalir eva cha | rājno vṛittāni sarvāṇi rājā hi yugam uchyate | 302. Kaliḥ prasupto bhavati sa jāgrat dvāparam yugam | karmasv abhyudyatas tretā vicharaṁs tu kṛitaṁ yugam | "301. The Kṛita, Tretā, Dvāpara, and Kali yugas are all modes of a king's action; for a king is called a yuga. 302. While asleep he is the Kali; waking he is the Dvāpara age; intent upon action he is the Tretā, moving about he is the Kṛita." The former of these two verses of Manu is reproduced nearly verbatim in the M. Bh. xii. 3408; and the same idea is expanded in the same book of the same poem, vv. 2674 ff., 2682, 2684, 2686, 2693 ff. The words kṛita, tretā, dvāpara, and kali, are found in the Vāj.-Sanhitā, xxx. 18, and in the Taitt. Brāhmana, iii. 4, 1, 16; but in both places they denote dice, as does also the word kṛita in the Chhāndogya Upan. iv. 1, 4 (where see the commentary). On the Yugas the reader of German may also consult Weber's Indische Studien, i. pp. 39, 87 f., 282 ff.

[87] [See Book i. chapter ii.]

[88] [See the fourth and following chapters of Book i.]

[89] See Book i. at the close of chapter vii. p. 113 of vol. i. of Professor Wilson's translation, 2nd edition, and also p. 621 and 630 of the original 4to. edition. As regards,

I proceed with the details of the creation which took place in the Vārāha Kalpa, as described in book i. chapter 4, vv. 2, ff: :

Atīta-kalpāvasāne niśā-suptotthitaḥ prabhuḥ | sattvodriktas tato Brahmā śūnyaṁ lokam avaikshata | 3. Nārāyaṇaḥ paro 'chintyaḥ pareshām api sa prabhuḥ | Brahma-svarūpī bhavagān anādiḥ sarva-sambhavaḥ | . . . 6. Toyāntaḥ sa mahīṁ jñātvā jagaty ekārṇave prabhuḥ | anumānād tad-uddhāraṁ karttu-kāmaḥ prajāpatiḥ | 7. Akarot sa tanūm anyāṁ kalpādishu yathā purā | matsya-kūrmādikāṁ tadvad vārāhaṁ vapur āsthitaḥ | 8. Veda-yajnamayaṁ rūpam aśesha-jagataḥ sthitau | sthitaḥ sthirātmā sarvātmā paramātmā prajāpatiḥ | 9. Jana-loka-gataiḥ siddhair Sanakādyair abhishṭhutaḥ | praviveśa tadā toyam ātmādhāro dharā-dharaḥ | . . . . 45. Evaṁ śaṁstūyamānastu paramātmā mahīdharaḥ | ujjahāra mahīṁ kshipraṁ nyastavāṁś cha mahāmbhasi | 46. Tasyopari jalaughasya mahatī naur iva sthitā | vitatatatvāt tu dehasya na mahī yāti samplavam | tataḥ kshitiṁ samāṁ kṛitvā pṛithivyāṁ so 'chinod girīn | yathā-vibhāgam bhagavān anādiḥ purushottamaḥ | 47. Prāk-sarga-dagdhān akhilān parvatān pṛithivītale | amoghena prabhāvena sasarjāmogha-vāñchhitaḥ | 48. Bhuvi bhāgaṁ tataḥ kṛitvā sapta-dvīpān yathātathā | bhūr-ādyāṁś chaturo lokān pūrvavat samakalpayat | 49. Brahma-rūpadharo devas tato 'sau rajasā "vṛitaḥ | chakāra sṛishṭim bhagavāṁś chatur-vaktra-dharo Hariḥ | 50. nimitta-mātram evāsau sṛijyānāṁ sarga-karmaṇām | pradhāna-kāraṇībhūtā yato vai sṛijya-śaktayaḥ | 51. Nimitta-mātram muktvaikam nānyat kinchid apekshyate | nīyate tapatāṁ śreshṭha sva-śaktyā vastu vastutām |

"2. At the end of the past (or Pādma) Kalpa, arising from his night slumber, Brahmā, the lord, endowed predominantly with the quality of goodness, beheld the universe void. 3. He (was) the supreme lord Nārāyaṇa, who cannot even be conceived by other beings, the deity without beginning, the source of all things, existing in the form of Brahmā." [The verse given in Manu i. 10, regarding the derivation of the word Nārāyaṇa (see above p. 35) is here quoted]. "6. This lord of creatures, discovering by inference,—when the world had become one ocean,—that the earth lay within the waters, and being desirous to raise it up, (7) assumed another body. As formerly, at the beginnings of the Kalpas, he had taken the form of a fish, however, the statement with which the paragraph concludes, compare vol. i. p. 50, as well as vol. ii. p. 269, of the same work.

a tortoise, and so forth,[90] (so now) entering the body of a boar (8),—a form composed of the vedas and of sacrifice,—the lord of creatures, who, throughout the entire continuance of the world, remains fixed, the universal soul, the supreme soul, self-sustained, the supporter of the earth (9),—being hymned by Sanaka and the other saints, who had (at the dissolution of the lower worlds) proceeded to Janaloka,—entered the water." [He is then addressed by the goddess Earth in a hymn of praise, as Vishṇu, and as the supreme Brahmă, vv. 10-24. The boar then rises from the lower regions, tossing up the earth with his tusk, and is again lauded by Sanandana and other saints in a second hymn, in the course of which he himself is identified with sacrifice, and his various members with its different instruments and accompaniments, vv. 25-44]. "45. Being thus lauded, the supreme soul, the upholder of the earth, lifted her up quickly and placed her upon the great waters. 46. Resting upon this mass of water, like a vast ship, she does not sink, owing to her expansion. Then, having levelled the earth, the divine eternal Purushottasna heaped together mountains according to their divisions. 47. He whose will cannot be frustrated, by his unfailing power, created on the surface of the earth all those mountains which had been burnt up in the former creation. 48. Having then divided the earth, just as it had been, into seven dvīpas, he formed the four worlds Bhūrloka and others as before. 49. Becoming next pervaded with the quality of passion, that divine being Hari, assuming the form of Brahmā, with four faces, effected the creation. 50. But he is merely the instrumental cause of the things to be created and of the creative operations, since the properties of the things to be created arise from Pradhāna as their (material) cause. 51. Excepting an instrumental cause alone, nothing else is required. Every substance (vastu) is brought into the state of substance (vastutā) by its own inherent power."[91]

[90] No mention is made in the Brāhmaṇas (as I have already observed) of any such periods as the Kalpas. But here an attempt is made to systematize the different stories scattered through those older works which variously describe the manner in which the creation was effected—with the view, perhaps, of reconciling the discrepancies in those free and artless speculations which offended the critical sense of a later age.

[91] See Professor Wilson's translation of these verses, and the new version proposed by the editor of the second edition, Dr. Hall, p. 66, note. I do not think the phrase

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS LIBRARY

[Before proceeding further with the narrative of the Vishṇu Purāṇa, I wish to quote or refer to some passages from the Taittirīya Sanhitā and Brāhmaṇa and from the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, which appear to furnish the original germs of the legends of the boar, fish, tortoise, and dwarf incarnations.

The first of these texts is from the Taittirīya Sanhitā, vii. 1, 5, 1 ff: Āpo vai idam agre salilam āsīt | tasmin Prajāpatir vāyur bhūtvā acharat | sa imām apaśyat | taṁ varāho bhūtvā āharat | tām Viśvakarmā bhūtvā vyamārṭ | sā aprathata | sā prithivy abhavat | tat prithivyai prithivitvam | tasyām aśrāmyat Prajāpatiḥ | sa devān asṛijata Vasūn Rudrān Ādityān | te devāḥ Prajāpatim abruvan "prajāyāmahai" iti | so 'bravīd "yathā aham yushmāṁs tapasā asṛikshi evaṁ tapasi prajananam ichchhadhvam" iti | tebhyo 'gnim āyatanam prāyachhad "etena āyatanena śrāmyata" iti | te 'gninā āyatanena aśrāmyan | te saṁvatsare ekāṁ gām asṛijanta |

"This universe was formerly waters, fluid. On it Prajāpati, becoming wind, moved.[92] He saw this (earth). Becoming a boar, he took her up. Becoming Viśvakarman, he wiped (the moisture from) her. She extended. She became the extended one (prithivī). From this the earth derives her designation as the extended one. In her Prajāpati performed arduous devotion. He created gods, Vasus, Rudras, and Adityas. The gods said to Prajāpati, 'let us be propagated.' He answered, 'As I have created you through austere fervour, so do ye seek after propagation in austere fervour.' He gave them Agni as a resting-place (saying), 'With this as a resting-place perform your devotion.' They (accordingly) performed devotion with Agni as a resting-place. In a year they created one cow, etc."[93]

sva-saktyā can be properly rendered, as Dr. Hall does, "by its potency." The reading of the MSS. in v. 50, pradhāna-kāraṇībhūtāḥ seems to me doubtful, as it would most naturally mean "have become the Pradhāna-cause." I conjecture pradhāna-kāraṇodbhūtaḥ, which gives the sense which seems to be required.

[92] It is possible that the idea assigned to the word Nārāyaṇa (see Manu i. 10, above), "he whose place of movement is the waters," may be connected with this passage. See also Genesis i. 2, "And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters."

[93] After having noticed this passage in the Taittirīya Sanhitā, I became aware that it had been previously translated by Mr. Colebrooke (Essays i. 75, or p. 44 of Williams & Norgate's edition). Mr. Colebrooke prefaces his version by remarking, "The pre-

The second passage is from the Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa, i. 1, 3, 5 ff. Āpo vai idam agre salilam āsīt | tena Prajāpatir aśrāmyat "katham idaṁ syād" iti | so 'paśyat pushkara-parṇaṁ tishṭhat | so 'manyata "asti vai tad yasminn idam adhitishṭhati" iti | sa varāho rūpaṁ kritvā upanyamajjat | sa pṛithivīm adhaḥ ārchhat | tasyā upahatya udamajjat | tat pushkara-parṇe 'prathayat | yad "aprathata" tat pṛithivyai pṛithivitvam | "abhūd vai idam" iti tad bhūmyai bhūmitvam | tāṁ diśo 'nu vātaḥ samavahat | tāṁ śarkarābhir adṛiṁhat |

"This (universe) was formerly water, fluid.[94] With that (water) Prajāpati practised arduous devotion (saying), 'how shall this (universe be (developed)?' He beheld a lotus-leaf standing.[95] He thought, 'there is somewhat on which this (lotus-leaf) rests.' He as a boar—having assumed that form—plunged beneath towards it. He found the earth down below. Breaking off (a portion of) her, he rose to the surface. He then extended it on the lotus-leaf. Inasmuch as he extended it, that is the extension of the extended one (the earth). This became (abhūt). From this the earth derives its name of bhūmī. The wind carried her, to the four quarters. He strengthened her with gravel, etc., etc.

The Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, xiv. 1, 2, 11, has the following reference to the same idea, although here Prajāpati himself is not the boar:

Iyatī ha vai iyam agre pṛithivy āsa prādeśa-mātrī | tām Emūshaḥ iti varāhaḥ ujjaghāna | so 'syāḥ patiḥ Prajāpatis tena eva enam etan-mithunena priyeṇa dhāmnā samardhayati kṛitsnaṁ karoti |

"Formerly this earth was only so large, of the size of a span. A boar called Emūsha raised her up. Her lord Prajāpati, therefore, prospers him with (the gift of) this pair, the object of his desire, and makes him complete."

Another of the incarnations referred to in the preceding passage of sent extract was recommended for selection by its allusion to a mythological notion, which apparently gave origin to the story of the Varāha-avatāra, and from which an astronomical period, entitled Calpa, has perhaps been taken."

[94] The Commentator gives an alternative explanation, viz., that the word salila is the same as sarira, according to the text of the Veda, "these worlds are sarira" ("ime vai lokāḥ sariram" iti śruteḥ).

[95] "Supported upon the end of a long stalk" (dīrghanālāgre 'vasthitam), according to the Commentator. In a passage from the Taitt. Āranyaka, already quoted (p. 32, above), it is said that Prajāpati himself was born on a lotus-leaf.

the Vishṇu Purāṇa is foreshadowed in the following text from the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, vii. 5, 1, 5 :

Sa yat kūrmo nāma | etad vai rūpaṁ kṛitvā Prajāpatiḥ prajāḥ asṛijata | yad asṛijata akarot tat | yad akarot tasmāt kūrmaḥ | kaśyapo vai kūrmaḥ | tasmād āhuḥ "sarvāḥ prajāḥ kāśyapyaḥ" iti | sa yaḥ sa kūrmo sau sa Ādityaḥ |

"As to its being called kūrma (a tortoise); Prajāpatị having taken this form, created offspring. That which he created, he made (akarot); since he made, he is (called) kūrmaḥ. The word kaśyapa means tortoise; hence men say all creatures are descendants of Kaśyapa. This tortoise is the same as Āditya."[96]

The oldest version of the story of the fish incarnation, which is to be found in the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, i. 8, 1, 1 ff., will be quoted in the next chapter.

For the passages which appear to supply the germ of the dwarf incarnation, the reader may consult the fourth volume of this work, pp. 54–58 and 107 f.

It will have been noticed that in the passage above adduced from the Vishṇu Purāṇa, the word Nārāyaṇa is applied to Vishṇu, and that it is the last named deity who (though in the form of Brahmā) is said to have taken the form of a boar. In the verses formerly cited from Manu (i. 9, 10), however, Nārāyaṇa is an epithet, not of Vishṇu, but of Brahmā; and in the following text, from the Rāmāyaṇa, xi. 110, 3, it is Brahmā who is said to have become a boar :

Sarvaṁ salilam evāsīt pṛithivī tatra nirmitā | tataḥ samabhavad Brahmā svayambhūr daivataiḥ saha[97] | sa varāhas tato bhūtvā projjahāra vasundharām ityādi |

"All was water only, and in it the earth was fashioned. Then arose [96] With this compare the mention made of a tortoise in the passage cited above, p. 32, from the Taitt. Āranyaka.

[97] Such is the reading of Schlegel's edition, and of that which was recently printed at Bombay, both of which, no doubt, present the most ancient text of the Rāmāyaṇa. The Gauḍa recension, however, which deviates widely from the other, and appears to have modified it in conformity with more modern taste and ideas, has here also introduced a various reading in the second of the lines quoted in the text, and identifies Brahmā with Vishṇu in the following manner : tataḥ samabhavad Brahmā svayambhūr Vishṇur avyayaḥ | "Then arose Brahmā the self-existent and imperishable Vishṇu."

Brahmā, the self existent, with the deities. He then, becoming a boar, raised up the earth," etc.

I now return to the narrative of the Vishṇu Purāṇa.]

The further process of cosmogony is thus described in chapter v.:

Maitreya uvācha | 1. Yathā sasarjja devo'sau devarshi-pitṛi-dānavān | manushya-tiryag-vṛikshādīn bhū-vyoma-salilaukasaḥ | 2. Yad-guṇaṁ yat-svabhāvaṁ cha yad-rūpaṁ cha jagad dvija | sargādau sṛishṭavān Brahmā tad mamāchakshva vistarāt | Parāśara uvācha | 3. Maitreya kathayāmy esha śṛiṇushva susamāhitaḥ | yathā sasarjja devo'sau devādīn akhilān vibhuḥ | sṛishṭiṁ chintayatas tasya kalpādishu yathā purā | abuddhi-pūrvakaḥ sargaḥ prādurbhūtas tamomayaḥ | 4. Tamo moho mahāmohas tāmisro hy andha-saṁjnitaḥ | avidyā pancha-parvaishā prādurbhūtā mahātmanaḥ | 5. Panchadhā'vasthitaḥ sargo dhyāyato'pratibodhavān | vahir-anto-'prakāśaś cha saṁvṛittātmā nagātmakaḥ | 6. Mukhyā nagā yataś choktā mukhya-sargas tatas tv ayam | 7. Taṁ dṛishṭvā'sādhakaṁ sargam amanyad aparam punaḥ | tasyābhidhyāyataḥ sargas tiryak-srotā[98] 'bhyavarttata | 8. Yasmāt tiryak pravṛittaḥ sa tiryak-srotas tataḥ smṛitaḥ | 9. Paśvādayas te vikhyātās tamaḥ-prayāḥ hy avedinaḥ | utpatha-grāhiṇaś chaiva te'jnāne jnāna-māninaḥ | 10. Ahaṁkṛitā ahammānā ashṭāviṁśad-vadhānvitāḥ | antaḥ-prakāśās te sarve āvṛitāś cha parasparam | 11. Tam apy asādhakam matvā dhyāyato'nyas tato'bhavat | ūrdhvasrotas tṛitīyas tu sāttvikorddhvam avarttata[99] | 12. Te sukha-prītibahulā bahir antaś cha nāvṛitāḥ[100] | prakāśā bahir antaś cha ūrdhva-sroto-bhavāḥ smṛitāḥ | 13. Tushṭy-ātmakas tṛitīyas tu deva-sargas tu yaḥ smṛitaḥ | tasmin sarge'bhavat prītir nishpanne Brahmaṇas tadā | 14. Tato'nyaṁ sa tadā dadhyau sādhakaṁ sargam uttamam | asādhakāṁs tu tān jnātvā mukhya-sargādi-sambhavān | 15. Tathā'bhidhyāyatas tasya satyābhidyāyinas tataḥ | prādurbhūtas tadā'vyaktād arvāk-srotas tu sādhakaḥ | 16. Yasmād arvāg vyavarttanta tato'rvāk-srotasas tu te | te cha prakāśa-bahulā tamodriktā[101] rajo'dhikāḥ | tasmāt te duḥkha-bahulā bhūyo bhūyaś cha kāriṇaḥ | prakāśā bahir antaś cha manushyā sādhakās tu te | . . . . 23. Ity ete tu samākhyātā nava sargāḥ Prajā-

[98] iti sandhir ārshaḥ.—Comm.

[99] The reading of the Vāyu P., in the parallel passage, is tasyābhidhyāyato nityaṁ sāttvikaḥ samavarttata | ūrdhvasrotas tṛitīyas tu sa chaivordhvaṁ vyavasthitaḥ | The combination sāttvikordhvam in the text of the Vishṇu P. must be ārsha.

[100] For nāvṛitāḥ the Vāyu P. reads saṁvṛitāḥ.

[101] Iti sandhirārshaḥ | Comm. But there is a form tama. The Vāyu P. has tamaḥ-saktāḥ.

pateḥ | prākṛitā vaikritāś chaiva jagato mūla-hetavaḥ | sṛijato jagadīśasya kim anyach chhrotum ichhasi | Maitreya uvācha | 24. Saṁkshepāt kathitaḥ sargo devādīnāṁ tvayā mune | vistarāch chhrotum ichhāmi tvatto munivarottama | Parāśara uvācha | karmabhir bhāvitāḥ pūrvaiḥ kuśalākuśalais tu tāḥ | khyātyā tayā hy anirmuktāḥ saṁhāre hy upasaṁhṛitāḥ | 25. Sthāvarāntāḥ surādyāścha prajā brahmaṁś chaturvidhāḥ | Brahmaṇaḥ kurvataḥ sṛishṭiṁ jajnire mānasīs tu tāḥ | 26. Tato devāsurapitṛīn mānushāṁś cha chatushṭayam | sisṛikshur ambhāṁsy etāni svam ātmānam ayūyujat | 27. Yuktātmanas tamomātrā udriktā 'bhūt Prajāpateḥ | sisṛikshor jaghanāt pūrvam asurāḥ jajnire tataḥ | 28. Utsasarja tatas tāṁ tu tamo-mātrātmikāṁ tanum | sā tu tyaktā tanus tena Maitreyābhūd vibhāvarī | 29. Sisṛikshur anya-deha-sthaḥ prītim āpa tataḥ surāḥ | sattvodriktāḥ samudbhūtāḥ mukhato Brahmaṇo dvija | 30. Tyaktā sā 'pi tanus tena sattva-prāyam abhūd dinam | tato hi balino rātrāv asurā devatā divā | 31. Sattvamātrātmikām eva tato 'nyāṁ jagṛihe tanum | pitṛivad manyamānasya pitaras tasya jajnire | 32. Utsasarja pitṛīn sṛishtvā tatas tām api sa prabhuḥ | sā chotsṛishṭā 'bhavat sandhyā dina-naktāntara-sthitiḥ | 33. Rajo-mātrātmikām anyāṁ jagṛihe sa tanuṁ tataḥ | rajo-mātrotkaṭā jātā manushyā dvija-sattama | tām apy āśu sa tatyāja tanum ādyaḥ Prajāpatiḥ | jyotsnā samabhavat sā 'pi prāk-sandhyā yā 'bhidhīyate | 34. Jyotsnodgame tu balino manushyāḥ pitaras tathā | Maitreya sandhyā-samaye tasmād ete bhavanti vai | 35. Jyotsnā-rātry-ahanī sandhyā chatvāry etāni vai vibhoḥ | Brahmaṇas tu śarīrāṇi triguṇāpāśrayāṇi cha | 36. Rajo-mātrātmikām eva tato 'nyāṁ jagṛihe tanum | tataḥ kshud Brahmaṇo jātā jajne kopas tayā tataḥ | 37. Kshut-khāmān andhakāre 'tha so 'sṛijad bhagavāṁs tataḥ | Virūpāḥ śmaśrulā jātās te 'bhyadhāvaṁs tataḥ prabhum | 38. "Maivam bho rakshyatām esha" yair uktaṁ rākshasās tu te | ūchuḥ "khādāma" ity anye ye te yakshās tu yakshaṇāt |

"Maitreya said: 1. Tell me in detail how at the beginning of the creation that deity Brahmā formed the gods, rishis, fathers, dānavas, men, beasts, trees, etc., dwelling respectively on the earth, in the sky, and in the water; 2. and with what qualities, with what nature, and of what form he made the world. Parāśara replied: 3. I declare to thee, Maitreya, how that deity created the gods and all other beings; listen with attention. While he was meditating on creation, as at the beginnings of the (previous) Kalpas, there appeared an insentient creation, composed of gloom (tamas). 4. Gloom, illusion, great illusion, darkness, and what is called utter darkness—such was the five-fold ignorance, which was manifested from that great Being, 5. as he was meditating—an insensible creation,[102] under five conditions, devoid of feeling either without or within,[103] closed up, motionless. 6. And since motionless objects are called the primary objects, this is called the primary (mukhya) creation.[104] 7. Beholding this creation to be ineffective, he again contemplated another. As he was desiring it the brute (tiryaksrotas) creation came forth. 8. Since (in its natural functions) it acts horizontally it is called Tiryaksrotas. 9. The (creatures composing it) are known as cattle, etc., distinguished mainly by darkness (tamas) ignorant, following irregular courses,[105] while in a state of ignorance having a conceit of knowledge, (10) self-regarding, self-esteeming, affected by the twenty-eight kinds of defects, endowed with inward feeling, and mutually closed. 11. As Brahmā, regarding this creation also as ineffective, was again meditating, another creation, the third, or ūrdhvasrotas, which was good, rose upward. 12. They (the creatures belonging to this creation) abounding in happiness and satisfaction, being unclosed both without and within, and possessed both of external and internal feeling, are called the offspring of the Ūrdhvasrotas creation. 13. This third creation, known as that of the gods, was one full of enjoyment. When it was completed, Brahmā was pleased. 14. He then contemplated another creation, effective and most excellent, since he regarded as ineffective the beings sprung from the primary and other creations. 15. While he, whose will is efficacious, was so desiring, the Arvāksrotas, an effective creation, was manifested.[106] 16. They [103] Vahir-anto'prakāśascha appears to be the true reading, as the Commentator renders the last word by prakrishṭa-jnāna-śūnyaḥ, "devoid of knowledge." But if this be the correct reading, it is ungrammatical, as antaḥ and aprakāśa would properly make antar-aprakāśa, not anto'prakāśa. But the Purāṇas have many forms which are irregular (ārsha, "peculiar to the rishis," "vedic," or "antiquated" as the Commentators style them). The Taylor MS. of the Vāyu Purāṇa reads in the parallel passage bahir-antaḥ-prakāśaścha.

[102] The Vāyu P. here inserts an additional line, sarvatas tamasā chaiva dīpaḥ kumbha-vad āvritaḥ | "and covered on all sides with darkness, as a lamp by a jar."

[104] See Dr. Hall's note p. 70 on Professor Wilson's translation; and also the passage quoted above p. 16 from the Taitt. Sanh. vii. 1, 1, 4, where the word mukhya is otherwise applied and explained.

[105] Bhakshyādi-vivekak-hīnāḥ | "Making no distinction in food, etc., etc." Comm.

[106] Compare M. Bh. xiv. 1038.

(the creatures belonging to it) are called Arvāksrotas, because (in their natural functions) they acted downwardly. And they abound in sensation (prakāśa) and are full of darkness (tamas) with a preponderance of passion (rajas). Hence they endure much suffering, and are constantly active, with both outward and inward feeling. These beings were men, and effective."[107]

In the next following verses, 17–22, the names of the different creations, described in the first part of this section, and in the second chapter of the first book of the Vishṇu Purāṇa, are recapitulated, and two others, the Anugraha and the Kaumāra, are noticed, but not explained.[108]

The speaker Parāśara then adds: "23. Thus have the nine creations of Prajāpati, both Prākṛita and Vaikṛita, the radical causes of the world, been recounted. What else dost thou desire to hear regarding the creative lord of the world? Maitreya replies: 24. By thee, most excellent Muni, the creation of the gods and other beings has been summarily narrated: I desire to hear it from thee in detail. Parāśara rejoins: Called into (renewed) existence in consequence of former actions, good or bad, and unliberated from that destination when they were absorbed at the (former) dissolution of the world, (25) the four descriptions of creatures, beginning with things immovable and ending with gods, were produced, o Brāhman, from Brahmā when he was creating, and they sprang from his mind. 26. Being then desirous to create these streams (ambhāṁsi)[109]—the four classes of Gods, Asuras, Fathers, and Men, he concentrated himself. 27. Prajāpati, thus concentrated, received a body, which was formed of the quality of gloom (tamás); and as he desired to create, Asuras were first produced from his groin. 28. He then abandoned that body formed entirely of gloom; which when abandoned by him became night. 29. Desiring to create, when he had occupied another body, Brahmā experienced pleasure; and then gods, full of the quality of goodness, sprang from his mouth. 30. That body

[107] The Vāyu P. adds here: Lakshaṇais tārakadyaiścha ashṭadhā cha vyavasthitāḥ | siddhātmāno manushyās te gandharva-saha-dharmiṇaḥ | ity esha taijasah sargo hy arvāksrotāḥ prakīrttitaḥ | "Constituted with preservative(?) characteristics, and in an eightfold manner. These were men perfect in their essence, and in nature equal to Gandharvas. This was the lustrous creation known as Arvāksrotas."

[108] See Dr. Hall's edition of Wilson's V. P. pp. 32 ff.; and pp. 74 ff.

[109] This word is borrowed from the passage of the Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa, ii. 3, 8, 3, quoted above, p. 23. Most of the particulars in the rest of the narrative are imitated from another passage of the same Brāhmaṇa, ii. 2, 9, 5 ff., also quoted above, p. 28.

also, being abandoned by him, became day, which is almost entirely good. Hence the Asuras are powerful by night[110] and the gods by day. 31. He then assumed another body formed of pure goodness; and the Fathers were born from him, when he was regarding himself as a father.[111] 32. The Lord, after creating the Fathers, abandoned that body also; which, when so abandoned, became twilight, existing between day and night. 33. He next took another body entirely formed of passion; and men, in whom passion is violent, were produced. The primeval Prajāpati speedily discarded this body also, which became faint light (jyotsnā), which is called early twilight. 34. Hence, at the appearance of this faint light, men are strong, while the fathers are strong at evening-twilight. 35. Morning-twilight, night, day, and evening-twilight, these are the four bodies of Brahmā, and the receptacles of the three qualities. 36. Brahmā next took another body entirely formed of passion, from which sprang hunger, and through it anger was produced. 37. The Divine Being then in darkness created beings emaciated with hunger, which, hideous of aspect, and with long beards, rushed against the lord. 38. Those who said, 'Let him not be preserved' (rakshyatām) were called Rākshasas, whilst those others who cried, 'Let us eat (him)' were called Yakshas from 'eating' (yakshanāt).[112]

It is not necessary for my purpose that I should quote at length the conclusion of the section. It may suffice to say that verses 39 to 51 describe the creation of serpents from Brahmā's hair; of Bhūtas; of Gandharvas; of birds (vayāṁsi) from the creator's life (vayas), of sheep from his breast, of goats from his mouth, of kine from his belly and sides, and of horses,[113] elephants, and other animals from his feet; of plants from his hairs; of the different metres and vedas from his eastern, southern, western, and northern mouths. Verses 52 ff. contain a recapitulation of the creative operations, with some statement of the

[110] In the Rāmāyaṇa, Sundara Kāṇḍa 82, 13 f. (Gorresio's edit.) we read: Rakshasāṁ rajanī-kālaḥ saṁyugeshu praśasyate | 14. Tasmād rājan niśā-yuddhe jayo 'smākaṁ na saṁśayaḥ | "Night is the approved time for the Rakshases to fight. We should therefore undoubtedly conquer in a nocturnal conflict."

[111] This idea also is borrowed from Taitt. Br. ii. 3, 8, 2.

[112] See Wilson's V. P. vol. i. p. 83, and Dr. Hall's note.

[113] See the passage from the Taitt. Sanh. vii. 1, 1, 4 ff. quoted above, p. 16, where the same origin is ascribed to horses.

principles according to which they were conducted. Of these verses I quote only the following: 55. Teshāṁ ye yāni karmāṇi prāk-sṛisṭhyāṁ pratipedire | tāny eva pratipadyante sṛijyamānāḥ punaḥ punaḥ | . . . 60. Yathārtāv ṛitu-lingāni nānārūpāṇi paryaye | dṛiśyante tāni tānyeva tathā bhāvā yugādishu | 61. Karoty evaṁvidhāṁ sṛishṭim kalpādau sa punaḥ punaḥ | sisṛikshāśakti-yukto 'sau sṛijya-śakti-prachoditaḥ | "These creatures, as they are reproduced time after time, discharge the same functions as they had fulfilled in the previous creation . . . 60. Just as, in each season of the year, all the various characteristics of that season are perceived, on its recurrence, to be the very same as they had been before; so too are the beings produced at the beginnings of the ages.[114] 61. Possessing both the will and the ability to create, and impelled by the powers inherent in the things to be created, the deity produces again and again a creation of the very same description at the beginning of every Kalpa."

The sixth section of the same book of the V. P., of which I shall cite the larger portion, professes to give a more detailed account of the creation of mankind.

V. P. i. 6, 1. Maitreya uvācha | Arvāksrotas tu kathito bhavatā yas tu mānushaḥ | brahman vistarato brūhi Brahmā tam asṛijad yathā | 2. Yathā cha varṇān asṛijad yad-guṇāṁś cha mahāmune | yacheha teshāṁ smṛitaṁ karma viprādināṁ tad uchyatām | Parāśara uvācha | 3. Satyābhidhyāyinas tasya sisṛikshor Brahmaṇo jagat | ajāyanta dvijaśreshṭha sattvodriktā mukhāt prajāḥ | 4. Vakshaso rajasodriktās tathā 'nyā Brahmaṇo 'bhavan | rajasā tamasā chaiva samudriktās tathorutaḥ | 5. Padbhyām anyāḥ prajā Brahmā sasarjja dvija-sattama | tamaḥ-pradhānās tāḥ sarvāś chāturvarṇyam idaṁ tataḥ | brāhmaṇāḥ kshattriyā vaiśyāḥ śūdrāścha dvija-sattama | pādoru-vakshaḥ-sthalato mukhataś cha samudgatāḥ | 6. Yajna-nishpattaye sarvam etad Brahmā chakāra vai | chāturvarṇyam mahābhāga yajna-sādhanam uttamam | 7. Yajnair āpyāyitā devā vṛishṭy-utsargeṇa vai prajāḥ | āpyāyayante dharma-jna yājnāḥ kalyāṇa-hetavaḥ | 8. Nishpadyante narais tais tu sva-karmābhirataiḥ sadā | viruddhācharaṇāpetaiḥ sadbhiḥ sanmārga-gāmibhiḥ | 9. Svargāpavargau mānushyāt prāpnuvanti narā mune | yach chābhiruchitaṁ sthānaṁ tad yānti manujā dvija | 10. Prajās tāḥ Brahmaṇā sṛishṭāś chāturvarṇya-vyavasthitau | samyak śraddhā-samāchāra-pra-

[114] Verses similar to this occur in Manu i. 30; and in the Mahābhārata xii. 8550 f.

vaṇā muni-sattama | 11. Yathechhā-vāsa-niratāḥ sarvābādha-vivarjitāḥ | śuddhāntaḥ-karaṇāḥ śuddhāḥ sarvānushṭhāna-nirmalāḥ | 14.[115] Suddhe cha tāsām manasi śuddhe 'ntaḥ-saṁsthite Harau | śuddha-jnānam prapaśyanti Vishṇv-ākhyam yena tatpadam | 15. Tataḥ kālātmako yo 'sau sa chāṁśaḥ kathito Hareḥ | sa pātayaty agho ghoram alpam alpālpa-sāravat | 16. Adharma-vīja-bhūtaṁ tu tamo-lobha-samudbhavam | prajāsu tāsu Maitreya rāgādikam asādhakam | 17. Tataḥ sā sahajā siddhis tāsāṁ nātīva jāyate | rasollāsādayaś chānyāḥ siddhayo 'shṭau bhavanti yāḥ | 18. Tāsu kshīṇāsv aśeshāsu varddhamāne cha pātake | dvandvādi-bhava-duḥkhārttās tā bhavanti tataḥ prajāḥ | 19. Tato durgāṇi tāś chakrur vārkshyam pārvatam audakam | kṛitimaṁ cha tathā durgam pura-karvaṭakādi yat | 20. Gṛihāṇi cha yathānyāyaṁ teshu chakruḥ purādishu | śītātapādi-bādhānām praśamāya mahāmate | 21. Pratikāram imaṁ kṛitvā śītādes tāḥ prajāḥ punaḥ | vārttopāyaṁ tataś chakrur hasta-siddhaṁ cha karma-jam | . . . 26. Grāmyāraṇyāḥ smṛitā hy etā oshadhyaś cha chaturdaśa | yajna-nishpattaye yajnas tathā "sāṁ hetur uttamaḥ | 27. Etāś cha saha yajnena prajānāṁ karāṇam param | parāpara-vidaḥ prājnās tato yajnān vitanvate | 28. Ahany ahany anushṭhānam yajnānām munisattama | upakāra-karam puṁsāṁ kriyamāṇāch cha śānti-dam | 29. Teshāṁ tu kāla-sṛishto 'sau pāpa-vindur mahāmate | chetassu vavṛidhe chakrus te na yajneshu mānasam | 30. Veda-vādāṁs tathā devān yajnakarmādikaṁ cha yat | tat sarvaṁ nindamānās te yajna-vyāsedha-kāriṇaḥ | 31. Pravṛitti-mārga-vyuchchitti-kāriṇo veda-nindakāḥ | durātmāno durāchārā babhūvuḥ kuṭilāśayāḥ | 32. Saṁsiddhāyāṁ tu vārttāyām prajāḥ sṛishṭvā Prajāpatiḥ | maryādām sthāpayāmāsa yathā-sthānam yathā-guṇam | 34. Varnāṇām āśramāṇāṁ cha dharmān dharma-bhṛitāṁ vara | lokāṁś sarva-varṇānāṁ samyag dharmānupālinām | 35. Prājāpatyam brāhmaṇānāṁ smṛitaṁ sthānaṁ kriyāvatām | sthānam aindraṁ kshattriyānāṁ sangrāmeshv anivarttinām | 36. Vaiśyānām mārutam sthānaṁ sva-dharmam anuvarttinām | gāndharvaṁ śūdra-jātīnām paricharyāsu varttinām |

"Maitreya says: 1. You have described to me the Arvāksrotas, or human, creation: declare to me, o Brahman, in detail the manner in which Brahmā formed it. 2. Tell me how, and with what qualities, he created the castes, and what are traditionally reputed to be the functions of the Brāhmans and others. Parāśara replies: 3. When, true to his design, Brahmā became desirous to create the world, creatures in whom goodness (sattva) prevailed sprang from his mouth; (4) others in whom passion (rajas) predominated came from his breast; others in whom both passion and darkness (tamas) were strong, proceded from his thighs; (5) others he created from his feet, whose chief characteristic was darkness. Of these was composed the system of four castes, Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and Śūdras, who had respectively issued from his mouth, breast, thighs, and feet. 6. Brahmā formed this[116] entire fourfold institution of classes for the performance of sacrifice, of which it is an excellent instrument. 7. Nourished by sacrifices, the gods nourish mankind by discharging rain. Sacrifices, the causes of prosperity, (8) are constantly celebrated by virtuous men, devoted to their duties, who avoid wrong observances, and walk in the right path. 9. Men, in consequence of their humanity, obtain heaven and final liberation; and they proceed to the world which they desire. 10. These creatures formed by Brahmā in the condition of the four castes, (were) perfectly inclined to conduct springing from religious faith, (11) loving to dwell wherever they pleased, free from all sufferings, pure in heart, pure, spotless in all observances. 14. And in their pure minds,—the pure Hari dwelling within them,—(there existed) pure knowledge whereby they beheld his highest station, called (that of) Vishṇu.[117] 15. Afterwards that which is described as the portion of Hari consisting of Time[118] infused into those beings direful sin, in the form of desire and the like, ineffective (of man's end), small in amount, but gradually increasing in force, (16) the seed of unrighteousness, and sprung from darkness and cupidity. 17. Thenceforward their innate perfectness was but slightly evolved: and as all the other eight perfections called rasollāsa and the rest (18) declined, and sin increased, these creatures (mankind) were afflicted with suffering arising [116] How does this agree with the statements made in the Taitt. Sanh. vii. 1, 1, 4 ff. as quoted above, p. 16, and in the Taitt. Br. iii. 2, 3, 9, p. 21, that the Śūdra is incapacitated for sacrifice, and that anything he milks out is no oblation?

[115] There are no verses numbered 12 and 13, the MSS. passing from the 11th to the 14th.

[117] This alludes to an expression in the Rig-veda, i. 22, 20. See the 4th vol. of this work, p. 54.

[118] In regard to Kāla, "Time," see Wilson's V. P. vol. i. p. 18 f., and the passages from the Atharva-veda, extracted in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society for 1865, pp. 380 ff.

out of the pairs (of susceptibilities to pleasure and pain, etc., etc.) 19. They then constructed fastnesses among trees, on hills, or amid waters, as well as artificial fortresses, towns, villages, etc. 20. And in these towns, etc., they built houses on the proper plan, in order to counteract cold, heat, and other discomforts. 21. Having thus provided against cold, etc., they devised methods of livelihood depending upon labour, and executed by their hands." The kinds of grain which they cultivated are next described in the following verses 22 to 25. The text then proceeds, verse 26: "These are declared to be the fourteen kinds of grain, cultivated and wild, fitted for sacrifice; and sacrifice is an eminent cause of their existence. 27. These, too, along with sacrifice, are the most efficacious sources of progeny. Hence those who understand cause and effect celebrate sacrifices. 28. Their daily performance is beneficial to men, and delivers from sins committed. 29. But that drop of sin which had been created by time increased in men's hearts, and they disregarded sacrifice. 30. Reviling the Vedas, and the prescriptions of the Vedas, the gods, and all sacrificial rites, etc., obstructing oblations, (31) and cutting off the path of activity,[119] they became malignant, vicious, and perverse in their designs. 32. The means of subsistence being provided, Prajāpati, having created living beings, established a distinction according to their position and qualities (see verses 3 to 5 above), (and fixed) the duties of the castes and orders, and the worlds (to be attained after death) by all the castes which perfectly fulfilled their duties. 33. The world of Prajāpati is declared to be the (future) abode of those Brāhmans who are assiduous in religious rites; the realm of Indra the abode of those Kshattriyas who turn not back in battle; (34) that of the Maruts the abode of those Vaiśyas who fulfil their duties; and that of the Gandharvas the abode of the men of Śudra race who abide in their vocation of service." In the remaining verses of the chapter (35 to 39) the realms of blessedness destined for the reception of more eminent saints are briefly noticed, as well as the infernal regions, to which the wicked are doomed.

[119] Pravṛitti-mārga-vyuchchhitti-kāriṇaḥ. The Commentator ascribes this to the human race being no longer sufficiently propagated, for he adds the explanation: yajñānanushṭhāne devair avarshaṇād annābhāvena prajā-vriddher asiddheḥ | "because population did not increase from the want of food caused by the gods ceasing to send rain in consequence of the non-celebration of sacrifice."

At the beginning of the seventh section, without any further enquiry on the part of Maitreya, Parāśara proceeds as follows:

V. P. i. 7, 1. Tato 'bhidhyāyatas tasya jajñire mānasīḥ prajāḥ | tachchharīra-samutpannaiḥ kāryais taiḥ kāraṇaiḥ saha | 2. Kshettrajñāḥ samavarttanta gātrebhyas tasya dhīmataḥ | te sarve samavarttanta ye mayā prāg udāhṛitāḥ | 3. Devādyāḥ sthāvarāntāś cha traiguṇya-vishaye sthitāḥ | evam bhūtāni sṛishṭāni charāṇi sthāvarāṇi cha | 4. Yadā 'sya tāḥ prajāḥ sarvā va vyavarddhanta dhīmataḥ | athānyān mānasān putrān sadṛiśān ātmano 'sṛijat | 5. Bhṛigum Pulastyam Pulahaṁ Kratum Angirasaṁ tathā | Marīchiṁ Dakshaṁ Atriṁ cha Vasishṭhaṁ chaiva mānasān | nava brahmāṇa ity ete purāṇe niśchayaṁ gatāḥ | 6. Sanandanādayo ye cha purvaṁ sṛishtās tu Vedhasā | na te lokeshv asajjanta nirapekshāḥ prajāsu te | sarve te chāgata-jñānā vīta-rāgā vimatsarāḥ | 7. Teshv evaṁ nirapeksheshu loka-sṛishṭau mahātmanaḥ | Brahmaṇo 'bhūd mahākrodhas trailokya-dahana-kshamaḥ | 8. Tasya krodhāt samudbhūta-jvālā-mālā-vidīpitam | Brahmaṇo 'bhūt tadā sarvaṁ trailokyam akhilam mune | 9. Bhrūkuṭī-kuṭilāt tasya lalāṭāt krodha-dīpitāt | samutpannas tadā Rudro madhyāhnārka-sama-prabhaḥ | ardhanārī-nara-vapuḥ prachaṇḍo 'tiśarīravān | vibhajātmānam ity uktvā tam Brahmā 'ntardadhe punaḥ | 10. Tathokto 'sau dvidhā strītvam purushatvaṁ tathā 'karot | bibheda purushtvaṁ cha daśadhā chaikadhā cha saḥ | 11. Saumyāsaumyais tathā śāntāśāntaiḥ strītvaṁ cha sa prabhuḥ | bibheda bahudhā devaḥ svarūpair asitaiḥ sitaiḥ | 12. Tato Brahmā "tmasambhūtam pūrvaṁ svāyambhuvam prabhum | ātmānam eva kṛitavān prajāpālam Manuṁ dvija | 13. Śatarūpāṁ cha tāṁ nārīṁ tapo-nirdhūta-kalmashām | svāyambhuvo Manur devaḥ patnyarthaṁ jagṛihe vibhuḥ | 14. Tasmāch cha purushād devī Śatarūpā vyajāyata | Priyavratottānapādau Prasūtyākūti-sanjñitam | kanyā-dvayaṁ cha dharma-jña rūpaudārya-guṇānvitam | 15. Dadau Prasūtiṁ Dakshāyāthākūtiṁ Ruchaye purā ityādi |

"1. Then from him, as he was desiring, there were born mental sons with effects and causes[120] derived from his body. 2. Embodied spirits sprang from the limbs of that wise Being. All those creatures sprang forth which have been already described by me, (3) beginning with gods and ending with motionless objects, and existing in the condition of the three qualities. Thus were created beings moving and stationary. 4. When none of these creatures of the Wise Being multiplied, he next formed other, mental, sons like to himself, (5) Bhṛigu, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, Angiras, Marīchi, Daksha, Atri, and Vasishṭha, all born from his mind. These are the nine Brahmās who have been determined in the Purāṇas. 6. But Sanandana and the others who had been previously created by Vedhas (Brahmā) had no regard for the worlds, and were indifferent to offspring. They had all attained to knowledge, were freed from desire, and devoid of envy. 7. As they were thus indifferent about the creation of the world, great wrath, sufficient to burn up the three worlds, arose in the mighty Brahmā. 8. The three worlds became entirely illuminated by the wreath of flame which sprang from his anger. 9. Then from his forehead, wrinkled by frowns and inflamed by fury, arose Rudra, luminous as the midday sun, with a body half male and half female, fiery, and huge in bulk. After saying to him, 'Divide thyself,' Brahmā vanished. 10. Being so addressed, Rudra severed himself into two, into a male and a female form. The god next divided his male body into eleven parts, (11) beautiful and hideous, gentle and ungentle; and his female figure into numerous portions with appearances black and white. 12. Brahmā then made the lord Svāyambhuva, who had formerly sprung from himself, and was none other than himself, to be Manu the protector of creatures. 13. The god Manu Svāyambhuva took for his wife the female Śatarūpā, who by austere fervour had become freed from all defilement. 14. To that Male the goddess Śatarūpā bore Priyavrata and Uttānapāda, and two daughters called Prasūti and Ākūti, distinguished by the qualities of beauty and magnanimity. 15. He of old gave Prasūti in marriage to Daksha, and Ākūti to Ruchi."

[120] The Commentator explains these words kāryais taiḥ kāranaiḥ saha to mean "bodies and senses."

From a comparison of the preceding narratives of the creation of mankind, extracted from the fifth and sixth chapters of the First Book of the Vishṇu Purāṇa, it will be seen that the details given in the different accounts are not consistent with each other. It is first of all stated in the fifth chapter (verse 16) that the arvāksrotas, or human creation was characterized by the qualities of darkness and passion. In the second account (verse 33) we are told that Brahmā assumed a body composed of passion, from which men, in whom that quality is powerful, were produced.[121] In neither of these narratives is the slightest allusion made to there having been any primeval and congenital distinction of classes. In the third statement given in the sixth chapter (verses 3 to 5) the human race is said to have been the result of a fourfold creation; and the four castes, produced from different parts of the creator's body, are declared to have been each especially characterized by different qualities (guṇas), viz., those who issued from his mouth by goodness (sattva), those who proceeded from his breast by passion (rajas), those who were produced from his thighs by both passion and darkness (tamas), and those who sprang from his feet by darkness. In the sequel of this account, however, no mention is made of any differences of conduct arising from innate diversities of disposition having been manifested in the earliest age by the members of the different classes. On the contrary, they are described (verses 10 ff.) in language applicable to a state of perfection which was universal and uniform, as full of faith, pure-hearted and devout. In like manner the declension in purity and goodness which ensued is not represented as peculiar to any of the classes, but as common to all. So far, therefore, the different castes seem, according to this account, to have been undistinguished by any variety of mental or moral constitution. And it is not until after the deterioration of the entire race has been related, that we are told (in verses 32 f.) that the separate duties of the several castes were fixed in accordance with their position and qualities. This sketch of the moral and religious history of mankind, in the earliest period, is thus deficient in failing to explain how beings, who were originally formed with very different ethical characters, should have been all equally excellent during their period of perfection, and have also experienced an uniform process of decline.

In regard to the variation between the two narratives of the creation found in the fifth chapterof the Vishṇu Purāṇa, Professor Wilson remarks as follows in a note to vol. i. p. 80: "These reiterated, and not always very congruous, accounts of the creation are explained by the Purāṇas as referring to different Kalpas or renovations of the world, and therefore involving no incompatibility. A better reason for their appearance is the probability that they have been borrowed from different original authorities."[122]

[121] Compare the passage given above at the close of Sect. V. pp. 41 ff., from Manu xii. 39 ff. and the remarks thereon.

As regards the first of these explanations of the discrepancies in question, it must be observed that it is inapplicable to the case before us, as the text of the Vishṇu Purāṇa itself says nothing of the different accounts of the creation having reference to different Kalpas: and in absence of any intimation to the contrary we must naturally assume that the various portions of the consecutive narration in the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh chapters, which are connected with each other by a series of questions and answers, must all have reference to the creation which took place at the commencement of the existing or Vārāha Kalpa, as stated in the opening verse of the fourth chapter. Professor Wilson's supposition that the various and discrepant accounts "have been borrowed from different original authorities" appears to have probability in its favour. I am unable to point out the source from which the first description of the creation, in the early part of the fifth chapter, verses 1 to 23, has been derived. But the second account, given in verses 26 to 35, has evidently drawn many of its details from the passages of the Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa ii. 2, 9, 5–9, and ii. 3, 8, 2 f., and Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa xi. 1, 6, 6 ff. which I have quoted above. And it is possible that the references which are found in the former of these descriptions in the Vishṇu Purāṇa to different portions of the creation

[122] The discrepancies between current legends on different subjects are occasionally noticed in the text of the Vishṇu Purāṇa. Thus in the eighth chapter of the first book, v. 12, Maitreya, who had been told by Parāśara that S'rī was the daughter of Bhṛigu and Khyāti, enquires: Kshīrābdhau S'rīḥ purotpannā śrūyate 'mṛita-manthane | Bhṛigoḥ Khyātyāṁ samutpannety etad āha katham bhavān | "It is reported that S'rī was produced in the ocean of milk when ambrosia was churned. How do you say that she was born to Bhṛigu by Khyāti?" He receives for answer: 13. Nityaiva sā jagan-mātā Vishṇoḥ S'rīr anapāyinī (another MS. reads anuyāyinī) yathā sarvagato Vishṇus tathaiveyaṁ dvijottama | "S'rī, the mother of the world, and wife of Vishṇu, is eternal and undecaying" (or, according to the other reading, "is the eternal follower of Vishṇu"). "As he is omnipresent, so is she," and so on. The case of Daksha will be noticed further on in the text. On the method resorted to by the Commentators in cases of this description Professor Wilson observes in a note to p. 203 (4to. edition), "other calculations occur, the incompatibility of which is said, by the Commentators on our text and on that of the Bhāgavata, to arise from reference being made to different Kalpas; and they quote the same stanza to this effect: Kvachit kvachit purāṇeshu virodho yadi lakshyate | kalpa-bhedādibhis tatra virodhaḥ sadbhir ishyate | 'Whenever any contradictions in different Purāṇas are observed, they are ascribed by the pious to differences of Kalpas and the like.'" being ineffective may have been suggested by some of the other details in the Brāhmaṇas, which I shall now proceed to cite. At all events some of the latter appear to have given rise to the statement in the fourth verse of the seventh chapter of the Vishṇu P. that the creatures formed by Brahmā did not multiply, as well as to various particulars in the narratives which will be quoted below from the Vāyu and Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇas. The Brāhmanas describe the creative operations of Prajāpati as having been attended with intense effort, and often followed by great exhaustion; and not only so, but they represent many of these attempts to bring living creatures of various kinds into existence, to sustain them after they were produced, and to ensure their propagation, as having been either altogether abortive, or only partially successful. The following quotations will afford illustrations of these different points:

Taitt. Br. i. 1, 10, 1. Prajāpatiḥ prajāḥ asṛijata | sa ririchāno 'manyata | sa tapo 'tapyata | sa ātman vīryam apaśyat tad avarddhata |

"Prajāpati created living beings. He felt himself emptied. He performed austere abstraction. He perceived vigour in himself. It increased, etc."

Taitt. Br. i. 2, 6, 1. Prajāpatiḥ prajāḥ sṛishṭvā vṛitto[123] 'śayat | taṁ devāḥ bhūtānāṁ rasaṁ tejaḥ sambhṛitya tena enam abhishajyan "mahān avavartti" iti |

"Prajāpati after creating living beings lay exhausted. The gods, collecting the essence and vigour of existing things, cured him therewith, saying he has become great, etc."

Taitt. Br. ii. 3, 6, 1. Prajāpatiḥ prajāḥ sṛishṭvā vyasraṁsata | sa hṛidayam bhūto 'śayat |

"Prajāpati, after creating living beings, was paralysed. Becoming a heart, he slept."

S. P. Br. iii. 9, 1, 1. Prajāpatir vai prajāḥ sasṛijāno ririchānaḥ iva amanyata | tasmāt parāchyaḥ prajāḥ āsuḥ | na asya prajāḥ śriye 'nnādyāya jajnire | 2. Sa aikshata "arikshy aham asmai (? yasmai) u kāmāya asṛikshi na me sa kāmaḥ samārdhi parāchyo mat-prajāḥ abhūvan na me prajāḥ śriye 'nnādyāya asthishata" iti | 3. Sa aikshata Prajāpatiḥ "kathaṁ nu punar ātmānam āpyāyayeya upa mā prajāḥ samāvartteraṁs tishṭheran me prajāḥ śriye annādyāya" iti | so 'rchhan śrāmyamś cha-

[123] Śrāntaḥ—Comm.

chāra prajā-kāmaḥ | sa etām ekādaśinīm apaśyat | sa ekādaśinyā ishṭvā Prajāpatiḥ punar ātmānam āpyāyayata upa enam prajāḥ samāvarttanta atishṭhanta asya prajāḥ śriye 'nnādyāya sa vasīyān eva ishṭvā 'bhavat |

"Prajāpati when creating living beings felt himself as it were emptied. The living creatures went away from him. They were not produced so as to prosper and to eat food. 2. He considered: 'I have become emptied: the object for which I created them has not been fulfilled: they have gone away, and have not gained prosperity and food.' 3. He considered: 'how can I again replenish myself; and how shall my creatures return to me, and acquire prosperity and food?' Desirous of progeny, he went on worshipping and performing religious rites. He beheld this Ekādaśinī (Eleven); and sacrificing with it, he again replenished himself; his creatures returned to him, and gained prosperity and food. Having sacrificed, he became more brilliant."

S. P. Br. x. 4, 2, 2. So 'yaṁ saṁvatsaraḥ Prajāpatiḥ sarvāṇi bhūtāni sasṛije yach cha prāṇi yach cha aprāṇam ubhayān deva-manushyān | sa sarvāṇi bhūtāni sṛishṭvā ririchāna iva mene | sa mṛityor bibhiyāṅchakāra | 2. Sa ha īkshāṅchakre "kathaṁ nv aham imāni sarvāṇi bhūtāni punar ātmann āvapeya punar ātman dadhīya kathaṁ nv aham eva eshām sarveshām bhūtānām punar ātmā syām" iti |

"This Year, (who is) Prajāpati, created all beings, both those which breathe and those that are without breath, both gods and men. Having created all beings he felt himself as it were emptied. He was afraid of death. 2. He reflected, 'How can I again unite all these beings with myself, again place them in myself? How can I alone be again the soul of all these beings?'"

S. P. Br. x. 4, 4, 1. Prajapatiṁ vai prajāḥ sṛijamānam pāpmā mṛityur abhiparijaghāna | sa tapo 'tapyata sahasraṁ saṁvatsarān pāpmānaṁ vijihāsan |

"Misery, death, smote Prajāpati, as he was creating living beings. He performed austere abstraction for a thousand years, with the view of shaking off misery."

S. P. Br. ii. 5, 1, 1. Prajāpatir ha vai idam agre ekaḥ eva āsa | sa aikshata "kathaṁ nu prajāyeya" iti | so 'śrāmyat sa tapo 'tapyata | sa prajāḥ asṛijata | tāḥ asya prajāḥ sṛishṭāḥ parābabhūvuḥ | tāni imāni vayāṁsi | purusho vai Prajāpater nedishṭham | dvipād vai ayam purushaḥ | tasmād dvipādo vayāṁsi | 2. Sa aikshata Prajāpatiḥ | "yathā

nv eva purā eko 'bhūvam evam u nv eva apy etarhy eka eva asmi" iti | sa dvitīyāḥ sasṛije | tāḥ asya parā eva babhūvuḥ | tad idaṁ kshudraṁ sarīsṛipaṁ yad anyat sarpebhyaḥ | tritīyāḥ sasṛije ity āhus tāḥ asya parā eva babhūvuḥ | te ime sarpāḥ . . . . | 3 So 'rchhan śrāmyan Prajāpatir īkshāṅchakre "kathaṁ nu me prajāḥ sṛishṭāḥ parābhavanti" iti | sa ha etad eva dadarśa "anaśanatayā vai me prajāḥ parābhavanti" iti | sa ātmanaḥ eva agre stanayoḥ paya āpyāyayāṅchakre | sa prajāḥ asṛijata | tāḥ asya prajāḥ sṛishṭāḥ stanāv eva abhipadya tās tataḥ sambabhūvuḥ | tāḥ imāḥ aparābhūtāḥ |

"1. Prajāpati alone was formerly this universe. He reflected, 'How can I be propagated?' He toiled in religious rites, and practised austere fervour. He created living beings. After being created by him they perished. They were these birds. Man is the thing nearest to Prajāpati. This being, man, is two-footed. Hence birds are two-footed creatures. Prajāpati reflected, 'As I was formerly but one, so am I now also only one.' He created a second set of living beings. They also perished. This was the class of small reptiles other than serpents. They say he created a third set of beings, which also perished. They were these serpents . . . 3. Worshipping and toiling in religious rites, Prajāpati reflected, 'How is it that my creatures perish after they have been formed?' He perceived this, 'they perish from want of food.' In his own presence he caused milk to be supplied to breasts. He created living beings, which resorting to the breasts were then preserved. These are the creatures which did not perish."

Taitt. Br. i. 6, 2, 1. Vaiśvadevena vai Prajāpatiḥ prajāḥ asṛijata | tāḥ sṛishṭāḥ na prājāyanta | so 'gnir akāmayata "aham imāḥ prajanayeyam" iti | sa Prajāpataye śucham adadhāt | so 'śochat prajām ichhamānaḥ | tasmād yaṁ cha prajā bhunakti yaṁ cha na tāv ubhau śochataḥ prajām ichhamānau | tāsv Agnim apy asṛijat | tā Agnir adhyait (2) Somo reto 'dadhāt Savitā prājanayat | Sarasvatī vācham adadhāt | Pūshā 'poshayat | te vai ete triḥ saṁvatsarasya prayujyante ye devāḥ pushṭipatayaḥ | saṁvatsaro vai Prajāpatiḥ | saṁvatsareṇa eva asmai prajāḥ prājanayat | tāḥ prājāḥ jātāḥ Maruto 'ghnan "asmān api na prāyukshata" iti | 3. Sa etam Prajāpatir mārutaṁ saptakapālam apaśyat | taṁ niravapat | tato vai prajābhyo 'kalpata | . . . sa Prajāpatir aśochat "yāḥ pūrvāḥ prajāḥ asṛikshi Marutas tāḥ avadhishuḥ katham aparāḥ

sṛijeya" iti | tasya śushma āṇḍam bhūtaṁ niravarttata | tad vyudaharat | tad aposhayat | tat prājāyata |

"Prajāpati formed living creatures by the vaiśvadeva (offering to the Viśvedevas). Being created they did not propagate. Agni desired' 'let me beget these creatures.' He imparted grief to Prajāpati. He grieved, desiring offspring. Hence he whom offspring blesses, and he whom it does not bless, both of them grieve, desiring progeny. Among them he created Agni also. Agni desired (?) them. Soma infused seed. Savitṛi begot them. Sarasvatī infused into them speech. Pūshan nourished them. These (gods) who are lords of nourishment are employed thrice in the year. Prajāpati is the Year. It was through the year that he generated offspring for him. The Maruts killed those creatures when they had been born, saying 'they have not employed us also. 3. Prajāpati saw this Māruta oblation in seven platters. He offered it. In consequence of it he became capable of producing offspring . . . . Prajāpati lamented, (saying) 'the Maruts have slain the former living beings whom I created. How can I create others?' His vigour sprang forth in the shape of an egg. He took it up. He cherished it. It became productive."

Taitt. Br. iii. 10, 9, 1. Prajāpatir devān asṛijata | te pāpmanā sanditāḥ ajāyanta | tān vyadyat |

"Prajāpati created gods. They were born bound by misery. He released them."

Taitt. Br. ii. 7, 9, 1. Prajāpatiḥ prajāḥ asṛijata | tāḥ asmāt sṛishṭāḥ parāchīr āyan | sa etam Prajāpatir odanam apaśyat | so 'nnam bhūto 'tishṭhat | tāḥ anyatra annādyam avitvā Prajāpatim prajāḥ upāvarttanta |

"Prajāpati created living beings. They went away from him. He beheld this odana. He was turned into food. Having found food nowhere else, they returned to him."

Taitt. Br. i. 6, 4, 1. Prajāpatiḥ Savitā bhūtvā prajāḥ asṛijata | tā enam atyamanyanta | ta asmād apākrāman | tā Varuṇo bhūtvā prajāḥ Varuṇena agrāhayat | tāḥ prajāḥ Varuṇa-gṛihītāḥ Prajāpatim punar upādhāvan nātham ichhamānāḥ |

"Prajāpati, becoming Savitṛi, created living beings. They disregarded him, and went away from him. Becoming Varuṇa he caused Varuṇa to seize them. Being seized by Varuṇa, they again ran to Prajāpati, desiring help."

Taitt. Br. ii. 2, 1, 1. Tato vai sa (Prajāpatiḥ) prajāḥ asṛijata | tāḥ asmat sṛishṭā apākrāman |

"Prajāpati then created living beings. They went away from him."

I have perhaps quoted too many of these stories, which are all similar in character. But I was desirous to afford some idea of their number as well as of their tenor.

As regards the legend of Śatarūpā, referred to in the seventh chapter of the first book of the Vishṇu Purāṇa, I shall make some further remarks in a future section, quoting a more detailed account given in the Matsya Purāṇa.

Of the two sons of Manu Svāyambhuva and Śatarūpā, the name of the second, Uttānapāda, seems to have been suggested by the appearance of the word Uttānapad in Rig-veda x. 72, 3, 4, as the designation (nowhere else traceable, I believe) of one of the intermediate agents in the creation.[124] A Priyavrata is mentioned in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa vii. 34, and also in the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa x. 3, 5, 14, (where he has the patronymic of Rauhiṇāyana) but in both these texts he appears rather in the light of a religious teacher, who had lived not very long before the age of the author, than as a personage belonging to a very remote antiquity. Daksha also, who appears in this seventh chapter as one of the mindborn sons of Brahmā, is named in R. V. ii. 27, 1, as one of the Ādityas, and in the other hymn of the R.V. just alluded to, x. 72, vv. 4 and 5, he is noticed as being both the son and the father of the goddess Aditi. In the Ś. P. ii. 4, 4, he is identified with Prajāpati.[125] In regard to his origin various legends are discoverable in the Purāṇas. Besides the passage before us, there are others in the V. P. in which he is mentioned. In iv. 1, 5, it is said that he sprang from the right thumb of Brahmā, and that Aditi was his daughter (Brahmaṇaścha dakshiṇāngushṭha-janmā Dakshaḥ | Prajāpater Dakshasyāpy Aditiḥ). In another place, V. P. i. 15, 52, it is said that Daksha, although formerly the son of Brahmā, was born to the ten Prachetases by Mārishā (Daśabhyas tu Prachetobhyo Mārishāyām Prajāpatiḥ | jajne Daksho mahābhāgo yaḥ pūrvam Brahmaṇo 'bhavat |). This double pa-

[124] See the 4th vol. of this work, pp. 10 f.

[125] See the 4th vol. of this work, pp. 10 ff. 24, 101; Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, for 1865, pp. 72 ff.; Roth in the Journal of the German Oriental Society, vi. 75.

rentage of Daksha appears to Maitreya, one of the interlocutors in the Purāṇa, to require explanation, and he accordingly enquires of his informant, vv. 60 ff.: Angushṭhād dakshiṇad Dakshaḥ pūrvaṁ jātaḥ śrutam mayā | katham Prāchetaso bhūyaḥ sa sambhūto mahāmune | esha me saṁśayo brahman sumahān hṛidi varttate | yad dauhitraś cha somasya punaḥ śvaśuratāṁ gataḥ | Parāśara uvācha | utpattiś cha nirodhaś cha nityau bhūteshu vai mune | ṛishayo 'tra na muhyanti ye chānye divya-chakshushaḥ | 61. Yuge yuge bhavanty ete Dakshādyā muni-sattama | punaś chaiva nirudhyante vidvāṁs tatra na muhyati | 62. Kānishṭhyaṁ jyaishṭhyam apy eshām pūrvaṁ nābhūd dvijottama | tapa eva garīyo 'bhūt prabhāvaś chaiva kāraṇam |

"60. I have heard that Daksha was formerly born from the right thumb of Brahmā. How was he again produced as the son of the Prachetases? This great doubt arises in my mind; and also (the question) how he, who was the daughter's son of Soma,[126] afterwards became his father-in-law. Parāśara answered: Both birth and destruction are perpetual among all creatures. Rishis, and others who have celestial insight, are not bewildered by this. In every age Daksha and the rest are born and are again destroyed: a wise man is not bewildered by this. Formerly, too, there was neither juniority nor seniority: austere fervour was the chief thing, and power was the cause (of distinction)."

The reader who desires further information regarding the part played by Daksha, whether as a progenitor of allegorical beings, or as a creator, may compare the accounts given in the sequel of the seventh and in the eleventh chapters of Book I. of the V. P. (pp. 108 ff. and 152 ff.) with that to be found in the fifteenth chapter (vol. ii. pp. 10 ff.).

I will merely add, in reference to Akūti, the second daughter of Manu Svāyambhuva and Śatarūpā, that the word is found in the Rig-veda with the signification of "will" or "design;" but appears to be personified in a passage of the Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa, iii. 12, 9, 5 (the context of which has been cited above, p. 41), where it is said: Irā patnī viśvasṛijām ākūtir apinaḍ haviḥ | "Irā (Iḍā) was the wife of the creators. Akūti kneaded the oblation."

[126] See Wilson's V. P. vol. ii. p. 2, at the top.

SECT. VIII.—Account of the different creations, including that of the castes, according to the Vāyu and Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇas.

I now proceed to extract from the Vāyu and Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇas the accounts which they supply of the creation, and which are to the same effect as those which have been quoted from the Viṣhṇu Purāṇa, although with many varieties of detail.

I shall first adduce a passage from the fifth chapter of the Vāyu (which to some extent runs parallel with the second chapter of the Vishṇu Purāṇa[127]), on account of its containing a different account from that generally given of the triad of gods who correspond to the triad of qualities (guṇas).

Vāyu Purāṇa, chapter v. verse 11. Ahar-mukhe pravṛitte cha paraḥ prakṛiti-sambhavaḥ | kshobhayāmāsa yogena pareṇa parameśvaraḥ | 12. Pradhānam purusham chaiva praviśyāṇḍam Maheśvaraḥ | 13. Pradhānāt kshobhyamānāt tu rajo vai samavarttata | rajaḥ pravarttakaṁ tatra vījeshv api yathā jalam | 14. Guṇa-vaishamyam āsādya prasūyante hy adhishṭhitāḥ | guṇebhyaḥ kshobhyamāṇebhyas trayo devā vijajnire | 15. Āśritāḥ[128] paramā guhyāḥ sarvātmānaḥ śarīriṇaḥ | rajo Brahmā tamo hy Agniḥ sattvam Vishnur ajāyata | 16. Rajaḥ-prakāśako Brahmā srashṭṛitvena vyavasthitaḥ | tamaḥ-prakāśako 'gnis tu kālatvena vyavasthitaḥ | 17. Sattva-prakāśako Vishṇur audāsīnye vyavasthitaḥ | ete eva trayo lokā ete eva trayo guṇāḥ | 18. Ete eva trayo vedā ete eva trayo 'gnayaḥ | parasparāśritāḥ hy ete parasparam anuvratāḥ | 19. Paraspareṇa varttante dhārayanti parasparam | anyonya-mithunā hy ete hy anyonyam upajīvinaḥ | 20. Kshaṇaṁ viyogo na hy eshāṁ na tyajanti parasparam | Īśvaro hi paro devo Vishṇus tu mahataḥ paraḥ | 21. Brahmā tu rajosa-driktaḥ sargāyeha pravarttate | paraścha purusho jneyaḥ prakṛitiścha parā smṛitā |

"11, 12. At the beginning of the day, the supreme Lord Maheśvara, sprung from Prakṛiti, entering the egg, agitated with extreme intentness both Pradhāna (= Prakṛiti) and Purusha. 13. From Pradhāna, when agitated, the quality of passion (rajas) arose, which was there a stimulating cause, as water is in seeds. 14. When an inequality in the Guṇas arises, then (the deities) who preside over them are generated. From the Guṇas thus agitated there sprang three gods (15), indwelling, supreme, mysterious, animating all things, embodied. The rajas quality was born as Brahmā, the tamas as Agni,[129] the sattva as Vishṇu. 16. Brahmā, the manifester of rajas, acts in the character of creator; Agni, the manifester of tamas, acts in the capacity of time; 17. Vishṇu, the manifester of sattva, abides in a condition of indifference. These deities are the three worlds, the three qualities, (18) the three Vedas, the three fires; they are mutually dependent, mutually devoted. 19. They exist through each other, and uphold each other; they are twin-parts of one another, they subsist through one another. 20. They are not for a moment separated; they never abandon one another. Iśvara (Mahādeva) is the supreme god; and Vishṇu is superior to Mahat (the principle of intelligence); while Brahmā, filled with rajas, engages in creation. Purusha is to be regarded as supreme, as Prakṛiti is also declared to be."

[127] See pp. 27 and 41 f. of Wilson's V. P. vol. i.

[128] The Gaikowar MS. of the India office, No. 2102, reads āsthitāḥ, instead of āśritāḥ, the reading of the Taylor MS.

The sixth section of the Vāyu P., from which the next quotation will be made, corresponds to the fourth of the Vishṇu P. quoted above.

1. Āpo hy agre samabhavan nashṭe 'gnau pṛithivī-tale | sāntarālaikalīne 'smin nashṭe sthāvara-jangame | 2. Ekārṇave tadā tasmin na prājnāyata kinchana | tadā sa bhagavān Brahmā sahasrākshaḥ sahasra-pāt | 3. Sahasra-śīrshā Purusho rukma-varṇo hy atīndriyaḥ | Brahmā Nārāyaṇākhyaḥ sa sushvāpa salile tadā | 4. Sattvodrekāt prabuddhas tu śūnyam lokam udīkshya saḥ | imam chodāharanty atra ślokam Nārāyaṇam prati | 5. Āpo nārā vai tanavaḥ[130] ity apām nāma śuśruma | apsu śete cha yat tasmāt tena Nārāyaṇaḥ smṛitaḥ | 6. Tulyaṁ yuga-sahasrasya naiśam kālam upāsya saḥ | śarvary-ante prakurute brahmatvam sarga-kāraṇāt | 7. Brahmā tu salile tasmin vāyur bhūtvā tadā 'charat | niśāyām iva khadyotiḥ prāvṛiṭ-kāle tatas tataḥ | 8. Tatas tu salile tasmin vijnāyāntargatām mahīm | anumāṇād asammūḍho bhūmer uddharaṇam prati |

[129] The Märk. P. chap. 46, verse 18, has the same line, but substitutes Rudra for Agni, thus: Rajo Brahmā tamo Rudro Vishṇuḥ sattvaṁ jagat-patiḥ | The two are often identified. See Vol. IV. of this work, 282 ff.

[130] See Wilson's Vishṇu Purāṇa, p. 57, with the translator's and editor's notes. Verses 1 to 6 are repeated towards the close of the 7th section of the Vāyu P. with variations.

9. Akarot sa tanuṁ hy anyām kalpādishu yathā purā | tato mahātmā manasā divyaṁ rūpam achintayat | 10. Salilenāplutām bhūmim dṛishtvā sa tu samantataḥ | "kim nu rūpam mahat kṛitvā uddhareyam aham makām" | 11. Jala-krīḍā-suruchiram vārāhaṁ rūpam asmarat | adhṛishyaṁ sarva-bhūtānāṁ vāṅmayam dharma-saṁjnitam |

"1. When fire had perished from the earth, and this entire world motionless and moving, together with all intermediate things, had been dissolved into one mass, and had been destroyed—waters first were produced. As the world formed at that time but one ocean, nothing could be distinguished. Then the divine Brahmā, Purusha, with a thousand eyes, a thousand feet, (3) a thousand heads, of golden hue, beyond the reach of the senses—Brahmā, called Nārāyaṇa, slept on the water. 4. But awaking in consequence of the predominance (in him) of the sattva quality, and beholding the world a void—: Here they quote a verse regarding Nārāyaṇa: 5. 'The waters are the bodies of Nara: such is the name we have heard given to them; and because he sleeps upon them, he is called Nārāyaṇa.' 6. Having so continued for a nocturnal period equal to a thousand Yugas, at the end of the night he takes the character of Brahmā in order to create. 7. Brahmā then becoming Vāyu (wind) moved upon that water,[131] hither and thither, like a firefly at night in the rainy season. 8. Discovering then by inference that the earth lay within the waters, but unbewildered, (9) he took, for the purpose of raising it up, another body, as he had done at the beginnings of the (previous) Kalpas. Then that Great Being devised a celestial form. 10. Perceiving the earth to be entirely covered with water, (and asking himself) 'what great shape shall I assume in order that I may raise it up?'—he thought upon the form of a boar, brillant from aquatic play, invincible by all creatures, formed of speech, and bearing the name of righteousness."

The body of the boar is then described in detail, and afterwards the elevation of the earth from beneath the waters, and the restoration of its former shape, divisions, etc.[132]—the substance of the account being [131] This statement, which is not in the corresponding passage of the Vishṇu P., is evidently borrowed, along with other particulars, from the text of the Taittirīya Sanhitā, vii. 1, 5, 1, quoted above p. 52.

[132] Following the passage of the Taittirīya Sanhitā, quoted above, the writer in one verse ascribes to Brahmā as Viśvakarman the arrangement of the earth, tatas teshu viśīrneshu lokodadhi-girishv atha | Viśvakarmā vibhajate kalpādishu punaḥ punaḥ | much the same, but the particulars different from those of the parallel passage in the Vishṇu Purāṇa.

Then follows a description of the creation coinciding in all essential points[133] with that quoted above, p. 55, from the beginning of the fifth chapter of the Vishṇu Purāṇa.

The further account of the creation, however, corresponding to that which I have quoted from the next part of the same chapter of that Purāṇa, is not found in the same position in the Vāyu Purāṇa,[134] but is placed at the beginning of the ninth chapter, two others, entitled Pratisandhi-kīrttana and Chaturāśrama-vibhāga, being interposed as the seventh and eighth. With the view, however, of facilitating comparison between the various cosmogonies described in the two works, I shall preserve the order of the accounts as found in the Vishṇu Purāṇa, and place the details given in the ninth chapter of the Vāyu Purāṇa before those supplied in the eighth.

The ninth chapter of the Vāyu Purāṇa, which is fuller in its details than the parallel passage in the Vishṇu Purāṇa, begins thus, without any specific reference to the contents of the preceding chapter:

Sūta uvācha | 1. Tato 'bhidhyāyatas tasya jajnire mānasīḥ prajāḥ | tach-chharīra-samutpannaiḥ kāryais taiḥ kāraṇaiḥ saha | 2. Kshetrajnāḥ samavarttanta gātrebhyas tasya dhīmataḥ | tato devāsura-pitṛīn mānavaṁ cha chatushṭayam | 3. Sisṛikshur ambhāṁsy etāni svātmanā samayūyujat | yuktātmanas tatas tasya tamomātrā svayambhuvaḥ | 4. Tam abhidhyāyataḥ sargam prayatno 'bhūt Prajāpateḥ | tato 'sya jaghanāt pūrvam asurā jajnire sutāḥ | 5. Asuḥ prāṇaḥ smṛito viprais taj-janmānas tato 'surāḥ | yayā sṛishṭāsurās tanvā tāṁ tanuṁ sa vyapohata[135] | 6. Sā 'paviddhā tanus tena sadyo rātrir ajāyata | sā tamo-bahulā yasmāt tato rātris triyāmikā | 7. Āvritās tamasā rātrau prajās tasmāt svapanty uta | dṛishṭvā 'surāṁs tu deveśas tanum anyām apadyata | 8. Avyaktām sattva-bahulāṁ tatas tāṁ so 'bhyayūyujat | tatas tāṁ yunjatas tasya priyam āsīt prabhoḥ kila | 9. Tato mukhe samutpannā dīvyatas tasya devatāḥ | yato 'sya dīvyato jātās tena devāḥ

[133] This is also the case with the details given in the Mārk. P. xlvii. 15-27 and ff.

[134] The Mārk. P. however observes the same order as the Vishṇu P.

[135] The reading in the passage of the Taitt. Br. ii. 2, 9, 6, from which this narrative is borrowed (see above, p. 28), is apāhata,—which, however, does not prove that that verb with vi prefixed should necessarily be the true reading here; as the Taylor and Gaikowar MSS. have vyapohata throughout, and in one place vyapohat.

prakīrttitāḥ | 10. Dhātur divīti yaḥ proktaḥ krīḍāyāṁ sa vibhāvyate | tasmāt (? yasmāt) tanvāṁ tu divyāyāṁ jajnire tena devatāḥ | 11. Devān sṛishṭvā 'tha deveśas tanum anyām apadyata | sattva-mātrātmikāṁ devas tato 'nyāṁ so 'bhyapadyata[136] | 12. Pitṛivad manyamānas tān putrān prādhyāyata prabhuḥ | pitaro hy upapakshābhyām[137] rātry-ahnor antarā 'sṛijat | 13. Tasmāt te pitaro devāḥ putratvaṁ tena teshu tat | yayā sṛishṭās tu pitaras tām tanuṁ sa vyapohata | 14. Sā 'paviddhā tanus tena sadyah sandhyā prajāyata | tasmād ahas tu dēvānām rātrir yā sā "surī smṛitā | 15. Tayor madhye tu vai paitrī yā tanuḥ sā garīyasī | tasmād devāsurāh sarve ṛishayo manavas tathā | 16. Te yuktās tām upāsante rātry-ahnor[138] madhyamāṁ tanum | tato 'nyāṁ sa punar Brahmā tanuṁ vai pratyapadyata | 17. Rajo-mātrātmikāṁ yāṁ tu manasā so 'sṛijat prabhuḥ | rajaḥ-prāyān tataḥ so 'tha mānasān asṛijat sutān | 18. Manasas tu tatas tasya mānasā jajnire prajāḥ | dṛishṭvā punaḥ prajāś chāpi svāṁ tanuṁ tām apohata | 19. Sā 'paviddhā tanus tena jyotsnā sadyas tv ajāyata | tasmād bhavanti saṁhṛishṭā jyotsnāyām udbhave prajāḥ | 20. Ity etās tanavas tena vyapaviddhā mahatmanā | sadyo rātry-ahanī chaiva sandhyā jyotsnā cha jajnire | 21. Jyotsnā sandhyā tathā 'haścha sattva-mātrātmakaṁ svayam | tamo-mātrātmikā rātriḥ sā vai tasmāt triyāmikā | 22. Tasmād devā divya-tanvā[139] dṛishṭāḥ sṛishṭā mukhāt tu vai | yasmāt teshām divā janma balinas tena te divā | 23. Tanvā yad asurān rātrau jaghanād asṛijat punaḥ | prāṇebhyo rātri-janmāno hy asahyā niśi tena te | 24. Etāny evam bhavishyāṇāṁ devānām asuraiḥ saha | pitṛīnām mānavānāṁ cha atītānāgateshu vai | 25. Manvantareshu sarveshu nimittāni bhavanti hi | jyotsnā rātry-ahanī sandhyā chatvāry ambhāṁsi tāni vai | 26. Bhānti yasmāt tato 'mbhāṁsi bhā-śabdo 'yam manīshibhiḥ | vyāpti-dīptyām nigadito pumāṁś chāha Prajāpatiḥ | 27. So 'mbhāṁsy etāni dṛishṭvā tu deva-dānava-mānavān | pitṛīṁś chaivāśṛijat so 'nyān ātmano vividhān punaḥ | 28. Tām utsṛijya tanuṁ kṛitsnāṁ tato 'nyām asṛijat prabhuḥ | mūrttiṁ rajas-tama-prāyām punar evābhyayūyujat | 29. Andhakāre kshudhāvishṭas tato 'nyāṁ sṛijate punaḥ | tena sṛishṭāḥ kshudhātmānas te 'mbhāṁsy ādātum udyatāḥ | 30. "Ambhāṁsy etāni rakshāma" uktavantaścha teshu ye | rākshasās te smṛitāḥ loke krodhātmāno niśācharāḥ |

[136] This line is omitted in the Gaikowar MS.

[137] The Gaikowar MS. seems to read upapārśvābhyām.

[138] The Gaikowar MS. reads Brahmaṇo madhyamāṁ tanum.

[139] The Gaikowar MS. reads divā tanvā.

"Sūta says: 1. Then, as he was desiring, there sprang from him mind-born sons, with those effects and causes derived from his body. 2. Embodied spirits were produced from the bodies of that wise Being. 3. Then willing to create these four streams (ambhāmsi) gods, Asuras, Fathers, and men, he fixed his spirit in abstraction. As Svayambhū was thus fixed in abstraction, a body consisting of nothing but darkness (invested him). 4. While desiring this creation, Prajāpati put forth an effort. Then Asuras were first produced as sons from his groin. 5. Asu is declared by Brahmans to mean breath. From it these beings were produced; hence they are Asuras.[140] He cast aside the body with which the Asuras were created. 6. Being cast away by him, that body immediately became night. Inasmuch as darkness predominated in it, night consists of three watches. 7. Hence, being enveloped in darkness, all creatures sleep at night. Beholding the Asuras, however, the Lord of gods took another body, (8) imperceptible, and having a predominance of goodness, which he then fixed in abstraction. While he continued thus to fix it, he experienced pleasure. 9. Then as he was sporting, gods were produced in his mouth. As they were born from him, while he was sporting (dīvyataḥ), they are known as Devas (gods). 10. The root div is understood in the sense of sporting. As they were born in a sportive (divya)[141] body, they are called Devatās. 11. Having created the deities, the Lord of gods then took another body, consisting entirely of goodness (sattva). 12. Regarding himself as a father, he thought upon these sons: he created Fathers (Pitṛis) from his armpits in the interval between night and day. 13. Hence these Fathers are gods: therefore that sonship belongs to them. He cast aside the body with which the Fathers were created. 14. Being cast away by him, it straightway became twilight. Hence day belongs to the gods, and night is said to belong to the Asuras. 15. The body intermediate between them, which is that of the Fathers, is the most important. Hence gods, Asuras, Fathers, and men (16) worship intently this intermediate body of Brahmā. He then took again another body. But from that body, composed altogether of passion (rajas), [140] This statement, which is not found in the parallel passage of the Vishṇu Purāṇa, is borrowed from Taitt. Br. ii. 3, 8, 2, quoted above.

[141] Divya properly means "celestial." But from the play of words in the passage, the writer may intend it to have here the sense of "sportive."

which he created by his mind, he formed mind-born[142] sons who had almost entirely a passionate character. 18. Then from his mind sprang mind-born sons. Beholding again his creatures, he cast away that body of his. 19. Being thrown off by him it straightway became morning twilight. Hence living beings are gladdened by the rise of early twilight. 20. Such were the bodies which, when cast aside by the Great Being, became immediately night and day, twilight and early twilight. 21. Early twilight, twilight, and day have all the character of pure goodness. Night has entirely the character of darkness (tamas); and hence it consists of three watches. 22. Hence the gods are beheld with a celestial body, and they were created from the mouth. As they were created during the day, they are strong during that period. 23. Inasmuch as he created the Asuras from his groin at night, they, having been born from his breath, during the night, are unconquerable during that season. 24, 25. Thus these four streams, early twilight, night, day, and twilight, are the causes of gods, Asuras, Fathers, and men, in all the Manvantaras that are past, as well as in those that are to come. 26. As these (streams) shine, they are called ambhāṁsi. This root bhā is used by the intelligent in the senses of pervading and shining, and the Male, Prajāpati, declares (the fact). 27. Having beheld these streams (ambhaṁsi), gods, Dānavas, men, and fathers, he again created various others from himself. 28. Abandoning that entire body, the lord created another, a form consisting almost entirely of passion and darkness, and again fixed it in abstraction. 29. Being possessed with hunger in the darkness, he then created another. The hungry beings formed by him were bent on seizing the streams (ambhaṁsi). 30. Those of them, who said 'let us preserve (rakshāma) these streams,' are known in the world as Rākshasas, wrathful, and prowling about at night."

This description is followed by an account of the further creation corresponding with that given in the same sequence in the Vishṇu Purāṇa; and the rest of the chapter is occupied with other details which it is not necessary that I should notice. I therefore proceed to make some quotations from the eighth chapter, entitled Chaturāśrama-vibhāga, or "the distribution into four orders," which corresponds, in its general contents, with the sixth chapter of the Vishṇu Purāṇa, book i., but is of far greater length, and, in fact, extremely prolix, as well as confused, full of repetitions, and not always very intelligible.

[142] Mānasān. We might expect here however, mānavān or mānushān, "human," in conformity with the parallel passages both in the Vishṇu Purāṇa (see above, p. 56), and the Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa, xlviii. 11.

The chapter immediately preceding (i.e. the seventh), entitled Pratisandhi-kīrttanam, ends with the words: "I shall now declare to you the present Kalpa; understand." Sūta accordingly proceeds at the opening of the eighth chapter to repeat some verses, which have been already quoted from the beginning of the sixth chapter, descriptive of Brahmā's sleep during the night after the universe had been dissolved, and to recapitulate briefly the elevation of the earth from beneath the waters, its reconstruction, and the institution of Yugas. At verse 22 the narrative proceeds:

Kalpasyādau kṛitayuge prathame so 'sṛijat prajāḥ | 23. Prāg uktā yā mayā tubhyam pūrva-kāle prajās tu tāḥ | tasmin samvarttamāne tu kalpe dagdhās tadā 'gninā | 24. Aprāptā yās tapo-lokaṁ jana-lokaṁ samāśritāḥ | pravarttati punaḥ sarge vījarthaṁ tā bhavanti hi | 25. Vījārthena sthitās tatra punaḥ sargasya kāraṇāt | tatas tāḥ sṛijyamānās tu santānārtham bhavanti hi | 26. Dharmārtha-kāma-mokshāṇām iha tāḥ sādhikāḥ smṛitāḥ | devāś cha pitaraśchaiva ṛishayo manavas tathā | 27. Tatas te tapasā yuktāḥ sthānāny āpūrayanti hi | Brahmaṇo mānasās te vai siddhātmāno bhavanti hi | 28. Ye sangādvesha-yuktena karmaṇā te divaṁ gatāḥ | āvarttamānā iha te sambhavanti yuge yuge | 29. Svakarma-phala-śeshena khyātyā chaiva tathātmikā (? tathātmakāḥ) | sambhavanti janāl lokāt karma-saṁśaya-bandhanāt | 30. Āśayaḥ kāraṇaṁ tatra boddhavyaṁ karmaṇā tu saḥ | taiḥ karmabhis tu jāyante janāl lokāt śubhāśubhaiḥ | 31. Gṛihṇanti te śarīrāṇi nānā-rūpāṇi yonishu | devādyāḥ sthāvarāntāś cha utpadyante parasparam (? paramparam) | 32. Teshāṁ ye yāni karmāṇi prāk-sṛishṭau pratipedire | tāny eva pratipadyante sṛijyamānāḥ punaḥ punaḥ | 33. Hiṁsrāhiṁsre mṛidu-krūre dharmādharme ṛitānṛite | tadbhāvitāḥ prapadyante tasmāt tat tasya rochate | 34. Kalpeshv āsan vyatīteshu rūpa-nāmāni yāni cha | tāny evānāgate kāle prāyaśaḥ pratipedire | 35. Tasmāt tu nāma-rūpāṇi tāny eva pratipedire | punaḥ punas te kalpeshu jāyante nāma-rūpataḥ | 36. Tataḥ sarge hy avashṭabdhe sisṛikshor Brahmaṇas tu vai | 37.[143] Prajās tā dhyāyatas

[143] The narrative in the 49th chapter of the Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa (verses 3–13) begins at this verse, the 37th of the Vāyu Purāṇa, and coincides, though with verbal differences, with what follows down to verse 47. After that there is more variation.

tasya satyābhidhyāyinas tadā | mithunānāṁ sahasram tu so 'sṛijad vai mukhāt tadā | 38. Janās te hy upapadyante sattvodriktāḥ suchetasaḥ[144] | sahasram anyad vakshasto mithunānāṁ sasarja ha | 39. Te sarve rajasodriktāḥ śushminaś chāpy aśushminaḥ[145] | sṛishṭvā sahasram anyat tu dvandvānām ūrutaḥ punaḥ | 40. Rajas-tamobhyām udriktā īhāśilās tu te smṛitāḥ | padbhyām sahasram anyat tu mithunānāṁ sasarja ha | 41. Udriktās tamasā sarve nihśrīkā hy alpa-tejasāḥ | tato vai harshamānās te dvandvotpannās tu prāṇinaḥ | 42. Anyonya-hṛichhayāvishṭā maithunāyopachakramuḥ | tataḥprabhṛiti kalpe 'smin maithunotpattir uchyate | 43. Māsi māsy ārttavaṁ yat tu na tadā "sīt tu yoshitām[146] | tasmāt tadā na sushuvuḥ sevitair api maithunaiḥ | 44. Āyusho 'nte prasūyante mithunāny eva tāḥ sakṛit | kunṭhakāḥ kunṭhikaś chaiva utpadyante mumūrshatām[147] | 45. Tataḥ prabhṛiti kalpe 'smin mithunānāṁ hi sambhavaḥ | dhyāne tu manasā tāsām prajānām jāyate sakṛit | 46. Śabdādi-vishayaḥ śuddhaḥ pratyekam pancha-lakshaṇaḥ | ity evam mānasī[148] pūrvam prāksṛishṭir yā Prajāpateḥ | 47. Tasyānvavāye sambhūtā yair idam pūritaṁ jagat | sarit-saraḥ-samudrāṁś cha sevante parvatān api | 48. Tadā nātyanta-śītoshṇā yuge tasmin charanti vai | pṛithvī-rasodbhavaṁ nāma āhāraṁ hy āharanti vai[149] | 49. Tāḥ prajāḥ kāma-chāriṇyo mānasīm siddhim āsthitāḥ | dharmādharmau na tāsv āstām nirviśeshāḥ prajās tu tāḥ | 50. Tulyam āyuḥ sukhaṁ rūpaṁ tāsāṁ tasmin kṛite yuge | dharmādharmau na tāsv āstām kalpādau tu kṛite yuge | 51. Svena svenādhikāreṇa jajnire te kṛite yuge | chatvāri tu sahasrāṇi varshāṇāṁ divyasankhyayā | 52. Ādyaṁ kṛita-yugam prāhuḥ sandhyānāṁ tu chatuḥśatam | tataḥ sahasraśas tāsa prajāsu prathitāsv api | 53.[150] Na tāsām pratighāto 'sti na dvandvaṁ nāpi cha klamaḥ | parvatodadhi-sevinyo hy aniketāśrayās tu tāḥ | 54. Viśokāḥ sattva-bahulāḥ hy ekānta-sukhitāḥ prajāḥ | tāḥ vai nishkāma-chāriṇyo nityam mudita-mānasāḥ | 55. Paśa-

[144] For suchetasaḥ the Mārk. P. reads sutejasaḥ.

[145] For aśushminaḥ the Mārk. P. reads amarshiṇaḥ, "irascible."

[146] I have corrected this line from the Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa, 49, 9 b. The reading of the MSS. of the Vāyu Purāṇa cannot be correct. It appears to be: māse māse 'rttavaṁ yad yat tat tadāsīd hi yoshitām | The negative particle seems to be indispensable here.

[147] This half verse is not found in the Mārk. P.

[148] The Mārk. P. has mānushī, "human," instead of mānasī, "mental."

[149] This verse is not in the Mārk. P.; and after this point the verses which are common to both Purāṇas do not occur in the same places.

[150] Verses 53–56 coincide generally with verses 14–18 of the Mārk. P.

vaḥ pakshiṇaś chaiva na tadāsan sarīsṛipāḥ | nodbhijjā nārakaś[151] chaiva te hy adharma-prasūtayaḥ | 56. Na mūla-phala-pushpaṁ cha nārttavam ṛitavo na cha | sarva-kāma-sukhaḥ kālo nātyarthaṁ hy ushṇa-śītatā[152] | 57. Manobhilashitāḥ kāmās tāsāṁ sarvatra sarvadā | uttishṭhanti pṛithivyāṁ vai tābhir dhyātā rasolvaṇāḥ | 58. Balavarṇa-karī tāsām siddhiḥ sā roga-nāśinī | asaṁskāryyaiḥ śarīraiś cha prajās tāḥ sthirayauvanāḥ | 59. Tāsāṁ viśuddhāt sankalpāj jāyante mithunāḥ prajāḥ | samam janma cha rūpaṁ chd mriyante chaiva tāḥ samam | 60. Tadā satyam alobhaś cha kshamā tushṭiḥ sukhaṁ damaḥ | nirviśeshās tu tāḥ sarvā rūpāyuḥśīla-cheshṭitaiḥ | 61. Abuddhipūrvakaṁ vṛittam prajānāṁ jāyate svayam | apravṛittiḥ kṛita-yuge karmaṇoḥ śubhapāpayoḥ | 62. Varṇāśrama-vyavasthāś cha na tadā "san na sankarah | anichhādvesha-yuktās te varttayanti parasparam | 63. Tulya-rūpāyushaḥ sarvāḥ adhamottama-varjitāḥ[153] | sukha-prāyā hy aśokāś cha udpadyante kṛite yuge | 64. Nitya-prahṛishṭa-manaso mahāsattvā mahābalāḥ | lābhālābhau na tāsv āstām mitrāmitre priyāpriye | 65. Manasā vishayas tāsāṁ nirīhāṇām pravarttate | na lipsanti hi tā'nyoyaṁ nānugṛihṇanti chaiva hi | 66. Dhyānam paraṁ kṛita-yuge tretāyāṁ jnānam uchyate | pravṛittaṁ dvāpare yajnaṁ dānam kali-yuge varam | 67. Sattvaṁ kṛitaṁ rajas tretā dvāparaṁ tu rajas-tamau | kalau tamas tu vijneyam yuga-vṛitta-vaśena tu | 68. Kālaḥ kṛite yuge tv esha tasya sankhyāṁ nibodhata | chatvāri tu sahasrāṇi varshāṇāṁ tat kṛitaṁ yugam | 69. Sandhyāṁśau tasya divyāni śatāny ashṭau cha sankhyayā | tadā tāsām babhūvāyur na cha kleśa-vipattayaḥ[154] | 70. Tataḥ kṛitayuge tasmin sandhyāṁśe hi gate tu vai | pādāvaśishṭo bhavati yuga-dharmas tu sarvaśaḥ | 71. Sandhyāyām apy atītāyām anta-kāle yugasya vai | pādaśas chāvaśishṭe tu sandhyā-dharme yugasya tu | 72. Evaṁ kṛite tu niḥśeshe siddhis tv antardadhe tadā | tasyāṁ cha siddhau bhrashṭāyām mānasyām abhavat tataḥ | 73. Siddhir

[151] The Mārk. P. has nakrāḥ, "crocodiles," in its enumeration.

[152] The Mārk. P. here inserts some other lines, 18*b*–21*a*, instead of 57 and 58*a* of the Vāyu P.

[153] The Mārk. P. inserts here the following verses: 24. Chatvāri tu sahasrāṇi varshāṇām mānushāṇi tu | āyuḥ-pramāṇāṁ jīvanti na cha kleśād vipattayaḥ | 25. Kvachit kvachit punaḥ sā bhūt kshitir bhāgyena sarvaśaḥ | kālena gachhatā nāśam upayānti yathā prajāḥ | 26. Tathā tāḥ kramaśaḥ nāśaṁ jagmuḥ sarvatra siddhayaḥ | tāsu sarvāsu nashṭāsu nabhasaḥ prachyutā narāḥ (latāḥ in one MS.) | prāyaśaḥ kalpavṛikshās te sambhūtā gṛiha-saṁsthitāḥ |

[154] Instead of babhūvāyuḥ, etc., the Gaikowar MS. has prayuktāni na cha kleśo babhūva ha |

anyā yuge tasmiṁs tretāyām antare kṛitā | sargādau yā mayā 'shṭau tu mānasyo vai prakīrttitāḥ | 74. Ashṭau tāḥ krama-yogena siddhayo yānti sankshayam | kalpādau mānasī hy ekā siddhir bhavati sā kṛite | 75. Manvantareshu sarveshu chatur-yuga-vibhāgaśaḥ | varṇāśramāchāra-kṛitaḥ karma-siddhodbhavaḥ (karma-siddhyudbhavaḥ?) smṛitaḥ | 76. Sandhyā kṛitasya pādena sandhyā pādena chāṁśataḥ | kṛita-sandhyāṁśakā hy ete trīṁs trīn pādān parasparam | 77. Hrasanti yuga-dharmais te tapaḥ-śruta-balāyushaiḥ | tataḥ kritāṁśe kshīṇe tu babhūva tad-anantaram | 78. Tretā-yugam amanyanta kṛitāṁśam ṛishi-sattamāḥ | tasmin kshīṇe kṛitāṁśe tu tach-chhishṭāsu prajāsv iha | 79. Kalpādau sampravṛittāyās tretāyāḥ pramukhe tadā | praṇaśyati tadā siddhiḥ kāla-yogena nānyathā | 80. Tasyāṁ siddhau praṇashṭāyām anyā siddhir avarttata | apām saukshmye pratigate tadā meghātmanā tu vai | 81. Meghebhyaḥ stanayitnubhyaḥ pravṛittaṁ vṛishṭi-sarjjanam | sakṛid eva tayā vṛishṭyā saṁyukte pṛithivī-tale | 82. Prādurāsaṁs tadā tāsāṁ vṛikshās tu griha-saṁsthitāḥ[155] | sarva-pratyupabhogas tu tāsāṁ tebhyaḥ prajāyate | 83. Varttayanti hi tebhyas tās tretā-yuga-mukhe prajāḥ | tataḥ kālena mahatā tāsām eva viparyayāt | 84. Rāgalobhātmako bhāvas tadā hy ākasmiko 'bhavat | yat tad bhavati nārīṇāṁ jīvitānte tad ārtavam | 85. Tadā tad vai na bhavati punar yuga-balena tu | tāsām punaḥ pravṛitte tu māse māse tad ārttavam (-ve?) | 86. Tatas tenaiva yogena varttatām maithune tadā | tāsāṁ tāt-kāla-bhāvitvād māsi māsy upayachhatām | 87. Akāle hy ārttavotpattir garbhotpattir ajāyata | viparyyayena tāsāṁ tu tena kālena bhāvinā| 88. Praṇaśyanti tataḥ sarve vṛikshās te gṛihasaṁsthitāḥ | tatas teshu praṇashṭeshu vibhrāntā vyākulendriyāḥ | 89. Abhidhyāyanti tāṁ siddhiṁ satyābhidhyāyinas tadā | prādurbabhūvus tāsāṁ tu vṛikshās te gṛihasaṁsthitāḥ | 90.[156] Vastrāṇi cha prasūyante phaleshv ābharaṇāni cha | teshv eva jāyate tāsām gandha-varṇa-rasānvitam | 91. Amākshikam mahāvīryam puṭake puṭake madhu | tena tā varttayanti sma mukhe tretā-yugasya vai | 92. Hṛishṭa-tushṭās tayā siddhyā prajā vai vigata-jvarāḥ | punaḥ kālāntareṇaiva punar lobhāvṛitās tu tāḥ | 93. Vṛikshāṁs tān paryagṛihṇanta madhu chāmākshikam balāt | tāsāṁ tenāpachāreṇa punar lobha-kṛitena vai | 94. Praṇashṭā madhunā sārdham kalpa-vṛikshāḥ kva-

[155] Verses 27–35 of the Mārk. P. correspond more or less to this and the following verses down to 93.

[156] This and the following verses correspond more or less closely to the Mārk. P. 30 ff.

chit kvachit | tasyām evālpa-śishṭāyāṁ sandhyā-kāla-vaśāt tadā | 95. varttatāṁ tu tadā tāsāṁ dvandvāny abhyutthitāni tu | śītavātātapais tīvrais tatas tāḥ duḥkhitā bhṛiśam | 96. Dvandvais tāḥ pīḍyamānās tu chakrur āvaraṇāni cha | kṛitvā dvandva-pratīkāram niketāni hi bhejire | 97. Pūrvaṁ nikāma-chārās te aniketāśrayā bhṛiśam | yathā-yogyaṁ yathā-prīti niketeshv avasan punaḥ | 98. Maru-dhanvasu nimneshu parvateshu darīshu cha[157] | saṁśrayanti cha durgāṇi dhanvānam śāśvatodakam | 99. Yathā-yogaṁ yathā-kāmaṁ sameshu vishameshu cha | ārabdhās te niketā vai karttuṁ śītoshṇa-pāraṇam | 100. Tatas tā māpayāmāsuḥ kheṭāni cha purāṇi cha | grāmāṁś chaiva yathā-bhāgaṁ tathaivāntaḥ-purāṇi cha | . . . . 123.[158] Kṛiteshu teshu sthāneshu punaś chakrur gṛihāni cha | yathā cha pūrvam āsan vai vṛikshās tu gṛiha-saṁsthitāḥ | 124. Tathā karttuṁ samārabdhāś chintayitvā punaḥ punaḥ | vṛidhāś chaiva gatāḥ śākhā natāś chaivāparā gatāḥ | 125. Ata ūrdhvam gatās chānyā enam tiryaggatāḥ parāḥ | buddhyā 'nvishya tathā 'nyā yā vṛiksha-śākhā yathā gatāḥ | 126. Tathā kṛitās tu taiḥ śākhās tāsmāch chhālās tu tāḥ smṛitāḥ | evam prasiddhāḥ śākhābhyaḥ śālāś chaiva gṛihāṇi cha | 127. Tasmāt tā vai smṛitāḥ śālāḥ śālātvaṁ chaiva tāsu tat | prasīdati manas tāsu manaḥ prāsādayamś cha tāḥ | 128. Tasmād gṛihāṇi śālāś cha prāsādāś chaiva sanjñitāḥ | kṛitvā dvandvopaghātāṁs tān vārttopāyam achintayan | 129.[159] Nashṭeshu madhunā sārddhaṁ kalpa-vṛiksheshu vai tadā | vishāda-vyākulās tā vai prajās tṛishṇā-kshudhānvitāḥ | 130. Tataḥ prādurbabhau tāsāṁ siddhis tretā-yuge punaḥ | vārttārtha-sādhikā hy anyā vṛishṭis tāsāṁ hi kāmataḥ | 131. Tāsāṁ vṛishṭy-udakānīha yāni nimnair gatāni tu | vṛishṭyā nimnā(?) nirabhavan srotaḥ-khātāni nimnagāḥ | 132. Evaṁ nadyaḥ pravṛittās tu dvitīye vṛishṭi-sarjane | ye purastād apām stokā āpannāḥ pṛithivītale | 133. Apām bhūmeś cha saṁyogād oshadhyas tāsu chābhavan | pushpa-mūlaphalinyas tv oshadhyas tāḥ prajajnire | 134. Aphāla-kṛishṭās chānuptā grāmyāraṇyaś chaturdaśa | ṛitu-pushpa-phalāśchaiva vṛikshāḥ gulmāś cha jajnire | 135. Prādurbhavaś cha tretāyām ādyo 'yam aushadhasya tu | tenaushadhena varttante prajās tretāyuge tadā | 136. Tataḥ punar abhūt tāsāṁ rāgo lobhaś cha sarvaśaḥ | avaśyam-

[157] I have corrected this line from Mārk. P. xlix. 35.

[158] Verses 52–54 of the Mārk. P. correspond in substance to verses 123–128 of the Vāyu P.

[159] Verses 55–62 of the Mārk. P. correspond to verses 129–137 of the Vāyu P.

bhāvinā 'rthena tretā-yuga-vaśena tu | 137. Tatas tāḥ paryagṛihṇanta nadīḥ kshetrāṇi parvatān | vṛikshān gulmaushadhīś chaiva prasahya tu yathā-balam | 138. Siddhātmānas tu ye pūrvam vyākhyātaḥ prāk kṛite mayā | Brahmaṇo mānasās te vai utpannā ye janād iha | 139. Śāntāś cha śushmiṇaś chaiva karmiṇo duḥkhinas tadā | tataḥ pravarttamānās te tretāyāṁ jajnire punaḥ | 140. Brāhmaṇāḥ kshattriyā vaiśyāḥ śūdrā drohijanās tathā | bhāvitāḥ pūrva-jātīshu karmabhiś cha śubhāśubhaiḥ | 141. Itas tebhyo 'balā ye tu śatyaśīlā hy ahiṁsakāḥ | vīta-lobhā jitātmāno nivasanti sma teshu vai | 142. Pratigṛihṇanti kurvanti tebhyaś chānye 'lpa-tejasaḥ | evaṁ vipratipanneshu prapanneshu parasparam | 143. Tena dosheṇa teshāṁ tā oshadhyo mishatāṁ tadā[159] | praṇashṭā kriyamāṇā vai mushṭibhyāṁ sikatā yathā | 144.[161] Agrasad bhūr yuga-balād grāmyāraṇyāś chaturdaśa | phalam gṛihṇanti pushpaiścha phalaiḥ patraiḥ punaḥ punaḥ | 145.[162] Tatas tāsu praṇashṭāsu vibhrāntās tāḥ prajās tadā | Svayambhuvam prabhuṁ jagmuḥ kshudhāvishṭāḥ prajāpatim | 146. vṛitty-artham abhilipsantaḥ ādau tretā-yugasya tu | Brahmā Svayambhūr bhagavān jnātvā tāsām manīshitam | 147. Yuktam pratyaksha-dṛishṭena darśanena vichāryya cha | grastāḥ pṛithivyā oshadhyo jnātvā pratyaduhat punaḥ | 148. Kṛitvā vatsaṁ sumerum tu dudoha pṛithivīm imām | dugdheyaṁ gaus tadā tena vījāni pṛithivī-tale | 149. Jajnire tāni vījāni grāmyāraṇyās tu tāḥ punaḥ | oshadhyaḥ phala-pākāntāḥ śaṇa-saptadaśās tu tāḥ | . . . . 155. Utpannāḥ prathamaṁ hy etā ādau tretā-yugasya tu | 156. Aphāla-kṛishṭā oshadhyo grāmyāraṇyās tu sarvaśaḥ | vṛikshā gulmalatā-vallyo vīrudhas tṛiṇa-jātayaḥ | 157. Mūlaiḥ phalaiś cha rohiṇyo 'gṛihṇan pushpaiś cha yāḥ phalam | pṛithvī dugdhā tu vījāni yāni pūrvaṁ Svayambhuvā | 158. Ṛitu-pushpa-phalās tā vai oshadhyo jajnire tv iha | [163] yadā prasṛishṭā oshadyo na prarohanti tāḥ punaḥ | 159. Tataḥ sa tāsāṁ vṛitty-artham vārttopāyaṁ chakāra ha | Brahmā Svayambhūr bhagavān hasta-siddhaṁ tu karma-jam | 160. Tataḥ-prabhṛity athaushadhyaḥ kṛishṭa-pachyās tū jajnire | saṁsiddhāyāṁ tu vārttāyāṁ tatas tāsāṁ Svayambhuvaḥ | 161. Maryādāḥ sthāpayāmāsa yathārabdhāḥ parasparam | [164] ye vai parigṛihītāras tāsām āsan badhātmakāḥ | 162. Itareshāṁ kṛita-trāṇān sthāpayāmāsa kshattriyān | upatishṭhanti ye tān

[159] Märk. P. verse 63*a*.
[161] Märk. P. verse 68*b*.
[162] Verses 64–67 of the Märk. P. correspond to verses 145–149 of the Vāyu P.
[163] Verses 73–75 of the Märk. P. correspond to verses 158*b*–160*a* of the Vāyu P.
[164] This with all what follows down to verse 171 is omitted in the Märk. P.

vai yāvanto nirbhayās tathā | 163. Satyam brahma yathā bhūtam bruvanto brāhmaṇās tu te | ye chānye 'py abalās teshāṁ vaiśasaṁ karma saṁsthitāḥ | 164. Kīnāśā nāśayanti sma pṛithivyām prāg atandritāḥ | vaiśyān eva tu tān āhuḥ kīnāśān vṛitti-sādhakān | 165. Śochantaś cha dravantaś cha paricharyyāsu ye ratāḥ | nistejaso 'lpa-vīryyāś cha śūdrān tān abravīt tu saḥ | 166. Teshāṁ karmāṇi dharmāṁś cha Brahmā 'nuvyadadhāt prabhuḥ | saṁsthitau prakṛitāyāṁ tu chāturvarṇyasya sarvasaḥ | 167. 'Punaḥ prajās tu tā mohāt tān dharmān nānvapālayan | varṇa-dharmair ajīvantyo vyarudhyanta parasparam | 168. Brahmā tam artham buddhvā tu yāthātathyena vai prabhuḥ | kshattriyāṇām balam daṇḍam yuddhaṁ ājīvam ādiśat | 169. Yājanādhyayanam chaiva tṛitīyaṁ cha parigraham | brāhmaṇānāṁ vibhus teshām karmāṇy etāny athādiśat | 170. Pāśupālyaṁ vāṇijyaṁ cha kṛishiṁ chaiva viśāṁ dadau | śilpājīvam bhṛitiṁ chaiva śūdrāṇāṁ vyadadhāt prabhuḥ | 171. Sāmānyāni tu karmāṇi brahma-kshattra-viśām punaḥ | yājanādhyayanaṁ dānam sāmānyāni tu teshu vai | 172. Karmājīvaṁ tato datvā tebhyaś chaiva parasparam | lokāntareshu sthānāni teshāṁ siddhyāy[165] adāt prabhuḥ | 173.[166] Prājāpatyaṁ brāhmaṇānām smṛitaṁ sthānaṁ kṛiyāvatām | sthānaṁ aindraṁ kshattriyāṇām saṅgrāmeshv apalāyinām | 174. Vaiśyānām mārutaṁ sthānaṁ sva-dharmam upajīvinām | gāndharvaṁ śūdra-jātīnām pratichāreṇa (parichāreṇa?) tishṭhatām | 175. Sthānāny etāni varṇānāṁ vyasyāchāravatāṁ svayam | tataḥ sthiteshu varṇeshu sthāpayāmāsa chāśramān | 176. Gṛihastham brahmachāriṇaṁ vānaprastham sabhikshukam | āśramāṁś chaturo hy etān pūrvam asthāpayat prabhuḥ | 177. Varṇa-karmāṇi ye kechit teshām iha na kurvate | kṛita-karmakshitiḥ(?) prāhur āśrama-sthāna-vāsinaḥ | 178. Brahmā tān sthāpayāmāsa āśramān nāma nāmataḥ | nirdeśārthaṁ tatas teshām Brahmā dharmān prābhāshata | 179. Prasthānāni cha teshāṁ vai yamāṁścha niyamāṁś cha ha | chāturvarṇyātmakaḥ pūrvaṁ gṛihasthas tv āśramaḥ smṛitaḥ | 180. Trāyāṇām āśramāṇāṁ cha pratishṭhā yonir eva cha | yathākramam pravakshyāmi yamaiś cha niyamaiś cha taiḥ | . . . . 190. Vedāḥ sāṅgāś cha yajñāś cha vratāni niyamāś cha ye | 191. Na siddhyanti prādushṭasya bhāvadoshe upāgate | bahiḥ-karmāṇi sarvāni prasiddhyanti (na siddhyanti?) kadāchana |

[165] I conjecture siddhyāy adāt to be the proper reading. The MSS. have siddhyādadāt, or siddhyādadāt, etc.

[166] Verses 173 f. are found in the Mārk. P. verses 77 f.; but all that follows down to verse 193 is omitted there.

192. Antar-bhāva-pradushṭasya kurvato 'hi parākramāt | sarvasvam api yo dadyāt kalushenāntarātmanā | 193. Na tena dharma-bhāk sa syād bhāva eva hi kāraṇam | . . . . 199. Evaṁ varṇāsramāṇāṁ vai pratibhāge kṛite tadā | 200. Yadā 'sya na vyavardhanta prajā varṇāśramatmikāḥ | tato 'nyā mānasīḥ so 'tha tretā-madhye 'sṛijat prajāḥ | 201. Ātmanas tāḥ śarīrāchcha tulyāś chaivātmanā tu vai | tasmin tretā-yuge prāpte madhyam prāpte krameṇa tu | 202. Tato 'nyā manasīs tatra prajāḥ srashṭum prachakrame | tataḥ satva-rajodriktāḥ prajāḥ so 'thāsrijat prabhuḥ | 203. Dharmārtha-kāma-mokshāṇāṁ vārttāyāś chaiva sādhikāḥ | devāś cha pitaraś chaiva ṛishayo manavas tathā | 204. Yugānurūpā dharmeṇa yair imā vichitāḥ prajāḥ | upasthite tadā tasmin prajādharme (-sarge?) Svayambhuvaḥ | 205. Abhidadhyau prajāḥ sarvā nānārūpās tu mānasīḥ | pūrvoktā yā mayā tubhyaṁ jana-lokaṁ samāsritāḥ | 206. Kalpe 'tīte tu tā hy āsan devādyās tu prajā iha | dhyāyatas tasya tāḥ sarvāḥ sambhūty-artham upasthitāḥ | 207. Manvantara-krameṇeha kanishṭhe prathame matāḥ | khyātyā 'nubandhais tais tais tu sarvārthair iha bhāvitāḥ | 208. Kuśalākuśala-prāyaiḥ karmabhis taiḥ sadā prajāḥ | tat-karma-phala-śeshena upashṭabdhāḥ prajajnire | 209. Devāsura-pitṛitvais tu paśu-pakshi-sarīsṛipaiḥ | vṛiksha-nāraka-kīṭatvais tais tair bhāvair upasthitāḥ | ādhīnārtham prajānāṁ cha ātmanā vai vinirmame |

"22. At the beginning of the Kalpa, in the first Kṛita age, he created those living beings (23) which I have formerly described to thee; but in the olden time, at the close of the Kalpa, those creatures were burnt up by fire. 24. Those of them who did not reach the Tapoloka took refuge in the Janaloka; and when the creation again commences, they form its seed. 25. Existing there as a seed for the sake of another creation, they then, as they are created, are produced with a view to progeny. 26. These are declared to accomplish, in the present state (the four ends of human life, viz.), duty, the acquisition of wealth, the gratification of love, and the attainment of final liberation, — both gods, Fathers, Rishis, and Manus. 27. They, then, filled with austere fervour, replenish (all) places. These are the mental sons of Brahmā, perfect in their nature. 28. Those who ascended to the sky by works characterized by devotion to external objects, but not by hatred, return to this world and are born in every age. 29. As the result of their works, and of their destination, (returning) from the Janaloka, they are born of the same character (as before), in consequence of the (previous) deeds by which they are bound.[167] 30. It is to be understood that the cause of this is their tendency (or fate), which itself is the result of works. In consequence of these works, good or bad, they return from Janaloka and are born, (31) and receive various bodies in (different) wombs. They are produced again and again in all states, from that of gods to that of motionless substances. 32. These creatures, as they are born time after time, receive the same functions as they had obtained in each previous creation. 33. Destructiveness and undestructiveness, mildness and cruelty, righteousness and unrighteousness, truth and falsehood—actuated by such dispositions as these, they obtain (their several conditions); and hence particular actions are agreeable to particular creatures. 34. And in succeeding periods they for the most part obtain the forms and the names which they had in the past Kalpas. 35. Hence they obtain the same names and forms. In the different Kalpas they are born with the same name and form. 36. Afterwards, when the creation had been suspended, as Brahmā was desirous to create, (37) and, fixed in his design, was meditating upon offspring,—he created from his mouth a thousand couples of living beings, (38) who were born with an abundance of goodness (sattva) and full of intelligence.[168] He then created another thousand couples from his breast: (39) they all abounded in passion (rajas) and were both vigorous and destitute of vigour.[169] After creating from his thighs another thousand pairs, (40) in whom both passion and darkness (tamas) prevailed, and who are described as active,—he formed from his feet yet another thousand couples (41) who were all full of darkness, inglorious, and of little vigour. Then the creatures sprung from the couples (or thus produced in couples) rejoicing, (42) and filled with mutual love, began to cohabit. From that period sexual intercourse is said to have arisen in this Kalpa. 43. But at that time women had no monthly discharge: and they consequently bore no children, although cohabit-

[167] Karma-saṁśaya-bandhanāt. I am unable to state the sense of saṁśaya in this compound.

[168] Suchetasaḥ. The reading of the Mārk. P. sutejasaḥ, "full of vigour," is recommended, as an epithet of the Brāhmans, by its being in opposition to alpa-tejasaḥ, "of little vigour," which is applied to the Śūdras a few lines below.

[169] The reading of the Mārk. P. amarshinaḥ, "irascible," gives a better sense than aśushminaḥ, "devoid of vigour," which the Vāyu P. has.

ation was practised. 44. At the end of their lives they once bore twins. Weak-minded boys and girls were produced when (their parents) were on the point of death. 45. From that period commenced, in this Kalpa, the birth of twins; and such offspring was once only born to these creatures by a mental effort, in meditation (46),—(offspring which was) receptive (?) of sound and the other objects of sense, pure, and in every case distinguished by five marks. Such was formerly the early mental creation of Prajapāti. 47. Those creatures by whom the world was replenished, born as the descendants of this stock, frequented rivers, lakes, seas, and mountains. 48. In that age (yuga) they lived unaffected by excessive cold or heat, and appropriated the food which was produced from the essences of the earth. 49. They acted according to their pleasure, existing in a state of mental perfection. They were characterized neither by righteousness nor unrighteousness; were marked by no distinctions. 50. In that Kṛita yuga, in the beginning of the Kalpa, their age, happiness, and form were alike: they were neither righteous nor unrighteous. 51. In the Kṛita age they were produced each with authority over himself. Four thousand years, according to the calculation of the gods, (52) and four hundred years for each of the morning and evening twilights, are said to form the first, or Kṛita, age.[170] Then, although these creatures were multiplied by thousands, (53) they suffered no impediment, no susceptibility to the pairs of opposites (pleasure and pain, cold and heat, etc.) and no fatigue. They frequented mountains and seas, and did not dwell in houses. 54. They never sorrowed, were full of goodness (sattva), and supremely happy; acted from no impulse of desire,[171] and lived in continual delight. 55. There were at that time no beasts, birds, reptiles, or plants,[172] (for these things are produced by unrighteousness),[173] (56) no roots, fruits, [170] The first of the verses, which will be quoted below, in a note on verse 63, from the Mārk. P., seems to be more in place than the description of the Kṛita age given here, of which the substance is repeated in verses 68 and 69.

[171] Perhaps we should read here nikāma-chāriṇyo instead of nishkāma-: if so, the sense will be, "they moved about at will."

[172] The text adds here nārakāḥ or narakāḥ, which may mean "hellish creatures."

[173] This, although agreeing with what is said further on in verses 82, 133, and 155, does not seem in consonance with what is stated in the Vishṇu Purāṇa, verse 45, where it is declared: oshadhyaḥ phala-mūlinyo romabhyas tasya jajnire | tretā-yuga-mukhe Brahmā kalpasyādau dvijottama | sṛishṭvā paśv-oshadhīḥ samyag yuyoja sa tadā 'dhvare | "Plants bearing roots and fruits sprang from his hairs. At the com-

flowers, productions of the seasons, nor seasons. The time brought with it every object of desire and every enjoyment. There was no excess of heat or cold. 57. The things which these people desired sprang up from the earth everywhere and always, when thought of, and had a powerful relish. 58. That perfection of theirs both produced strength and beauty, and annihilated disease. With bodies, which needed no decoration, they enjoyed perpetual youth. 59. From their pure will alone twin children were produced. Their form was the same. They were born and died together. 60. Then truth, contentment, patience, satisfaction, happiness, and self-command prevailed. They were all without distinction in respect of form, term of life, disposition and actions. 61. The means of subsistence were produced spontaneously without forethought on their parts. In the Kṛita age they engaged in no works which were either virtuous or sinful. 62. And there were then no distinctions of castes or orders, and no mixture of castes. Men acted towards each other without any feeling of love or hatred. 63. In the Kṛita age they were born alike in form and duration of life, without any distinction of lower and higher,[174] with abundant happiness, free from grief, (64) with hearts continually exulting, great in dignity mencement of the Tretā age Brahmā—having at the beginning of the Kalpa created animals and plants—employed them in sacrifice." Although the order of the words renders the sense in some degree uncertain, it appears to be that which Prof. Wilson assigns in his translation (i. 84), "Brahmā, having created, in the commencement of the Kalpa, various [animals and] plants, employed them in sacrifices in the beginning of the Tretā age." This interpretation is supported by the Commentator, who remarks: Tad evaṁ kalpasyādāv eva paśūn oshadhīś cha sṛishṭvā 'nantaraṁ tretā-yuga-mukhe prāpte sati samyag grāmyāraṇya-vyasthāyā tadā 'dhvare sānatayā (samyaktayā ?) yuyoja kṛita-yuge yajnasyāpravṛitteḥ | "Having then thus at the very beginning of the Kalpa created animals and plants, he afterwards, when the commencement of the Tretā age arrived, employed them properly, according to the distinction of domestic and wild, in sacrifice,—since sacrifice did not prevail in the Kṛita age." This agrees with the course of the preceding narrative which makes no allusion to plants and animals having been produced in a different Yuga from the other beings whose creation had been previously described. (See Wilson i. 82–84.) The parallel passage in the Vāyu P. x. 44–46, is confused.

[174] The Mārk. P. xlix. 24 inserts here the following lines: "They lived for four thousand years of mortals, as the measure of their existence, and suffered no calamities from distress. 25. In some places the earth again enjoyed prosperity in every respect. As through lapse of time the creatures were destroyed, so too those perfections everywhere gradually perished. 26. When they had all been destroyed, creeping-plants fell from the sky, which had nearly the character of Kalpa-trees (i.e. trees which yield all that is desired), and resembled houses."

and in force. There existed among them no such things as gain or loss, friendship or enmity, liking or dislike. 65. It was through the mind (alone, i.e. without passion?) that these disinterested beings acted towards each other. They neither desired anything from one another; nor shewed any kindness to each other.[175] Contemplation is declared to be supreme in the Kṛita age, knowledge in the Tretā; sacrifice began in the Dvāpara; liberality is the highest merit in the Kali. 67. The Kṛita age is goodness (sattva), the Tretā is passion (rajas), the Dvāpara is passion and darkness (tamas), in the Kali it is to be understood that darkness (prevails), according to the necessary course of these ages. 68. The following is the time in the Kṛita age: understand its amount. Four thousand years constitute the Kṛita; (69) and its twilights endure for eight hundred divine years. Then their life was (so long?)[176] and no distresses or calamities befel them. 70. Afterwards, when the twilight in the Kṛita was gone, the righteousness peculiar to that age was in all respects reduced to a quarter (of its original sum). 71. When further the twilight had passed, at the close of the Yuga, and the righteousness peculiar to the twilight had been reduced to a quarter, (72) and when the Kṛita had thus come altogether to an end, — then perfection vanished. When this mental perfection had been destroyed, there arose (73) another perfection formed in the period of the Tretā age. The eight mental perfections, which I declared (to have existed) at the creation, (74) were gradually extinguished. At the beginning of the Kalpa mental perfection alone (existed), viz., that which existed in the Kṛita age. 75. In all the Manvantaras there is declared to arise a perfection proceeding from works, produced by the discharge of the duties belonging to castes and orders, according to the fourfold division of Yugas. 76. The (morning) twilight (deteriorates) by a quarter of the (entire) Kṛita,—and the evening twilight by (another) quarter;—(thus) the Kṛita, the morning twilight, and the evening

[175] This representation of the condition of mankind during the Kṛita age, the period of ideal goodness, was no doubt sketched in conformity with the opinions which prevailed at the period when the Purāṇa was compiled; when dispassion was regarded as the highest state of perfection.

[176] It would seem as if the writer here meant to state that the period of life was that which in the verse of the Mārk. P. (xlix. 24), quoted in the note on verse 63, it is declared to have been. But the expression here is, from some cause or other, imperfect.

twilight (together) deteriorate successively to the extent of three quarters, in the duties peculiar to the Yuga, and in austere fervour, sacred knowledge, strength, and length of life.[177] Then after the evening of the Kṛita had died out, (78) the Tretā age succeeded,—(which) the most excellent rishis regarded as the evening of the Kṛita. But when the evening of the Kṛita had died out, (79) from the influence of time, and for no other reason, perfection disappeared from among the creatures who survived at the commencement of the Tretā age which ensued at the beginning of the Kalpa. 80. When that perfection had perished, another perfection arose. The subtile form of water having returned in the form of cloud (to the sky),[178] (81) rain began to be discharged from the thundering clouds. The earth having once received that rain, (82) trees resembling houses[179] were provided for these creatures. From them all means of enjoyment were produced. 83. Men derived their subsistence from them at the beginning of the Tretā. Subsequently, after a great length of time, owing to their ill fortune, (84) the passions of desire and covetousness arose in their hearts uncaused. The monthly discharge, which occurred at the end of women's lives, (85) did not then take place: but as it commenced again, owing to the force of the age (yuga), (86) and as the couples, in consequence of it, began to cohabit, and approached each other monthly, from necessity occasioned by the time,—(87) an unseasonable[179a] production of the monthly discharge, and of pregnancy ensued. Then through their misfortune, and owing to that fated time, (88) all those house-like trees perished. When these had been destroyed, men disturbed and agitated, (89) but genuine in their desire, longed after that perfection (which they had lost). Then those house-like trees appeared to them; (90) and among their fruits yielded clothes and jewels. On these trees too, in the hollow of every leaf, there was produced, (91) without the aid of bees, honey of great potency, having scent, colour, and flavour. By this means they subsisted at the beginning of the Tretā, (92) delighted with this per-

[177] Such is the only sense I can extract from these rather obscure lines.

[178] Such is the only sense of the words here rendered which occurs to me.

[179] Gṛiha-saṁsthitāḥ. Professor Wilson, in his Dictionary, gives "like, resembling," among the meanings of saṁsthita.

[179a] Instead of ākāle, "out of season," Professor Aufrecht suggests ākāle, "in season," as the proper reading.

fection and free from trouble. Again, through the lapse of time, becoming greedy, (93) they seized by force those trees, and that honey produced without bees. And then, owing to that misconduct of theirs, occasioned by cupidity, (94) the Kalpa trees, together with their honey, were in some places destroyed. As but little of it[180] remained, owing to the effects of the period of twilight, (95) the pairs (of opposites, as pleasure and pain, etc.) arose in men when existing (in this state); and they became greatly distressed by sharp cold winds, and heats. 96. Being thus afflicted by these opposites, they adopted means of shelter: and to counteract the opposites they resorted to houses. 97. Formerly they had moved about at their will, and had not dwelt at all in houses: but subsequently they abode in dwellings, as they found suitable and pleasant, (98) in barren deserts, in valleys, on mountains, in caves; and took refuge in fortresses,—(in a) desert with perpetual water.[181] 99. As a protection against cold and heat they began to construct houses on even and uneven places, according to opportunity and at their pleasure. 100. They then measured out towns, cities, villages, and private apartments, according to the distribution of each." [The following verses 101–107 give an account of the different measures of length and breadth, which is followed, in verses 108–122, by a description of the various kinds of fortresses, towns, and villages, their shapes and sizes, and of roads. The author then proceeds in verse 123:] "These places having been made, they next constructed houses; and as formerly trees existed, formed like houses,[182] (124) so did they (now) begin to erect them, after repeated consideration. (Some) boughs are spread out, others are bent down, (125) others rise upwards, while others again stretch horizontally. After examining thus by reflection how the different boughs of trees branch out, (126) they constructed in like manner the apartments (śākhāḥ) (of their houses): hence they are called rooms (śālāḥ).[183] In this way rooms and houses derive their appellation from branches. 127. Hence rooms are called śālā, and in that their character as rooms (śālātvam) consists. And inasmuch as the mind takes pleasure in them, and as they have gladdened (prāsādayan), the mind, (128) houses, rooms, and palaces are termed respectively gṛiha, śālā, and prāsāda. Having adopted these means of defence against the 'opposites,' they devised methods of subsistence. 129. The kalpa-trees having been destroyed along with their honey, those creatures, afflicted with thirst and hunger, became disquieted by dejection. 130. Then again another perfection arose for them in the Tretā age,—which fulfilled the purpose of subsistence,—viz., rain at their pleasure. 131. The rain-water, which flowed into the hollows, burst out in the form of springs, water-courses, and rivers,[184] through the rain. 132. Thus at the second fall of rain rivers began to flow. When the drops of water first reached the ground, then (133) from the conjunction of the waters and the earth plants sprang up among them, which bore both flowers, roots, and fruits. 134. Fourteen kinds of plants, cultivated and wild, were produced without ploughing or sowing, as well as trees and shrubs which bore flowers and fruit at the proper season. 135. This was the first appearance of plants in the Tretā age, and by them men subsisted at that period. 136. Then there again arose among them, universally, desire and cupidity, through a necessary process, and as a result of the Tretā age. 137. They then appropriated to themselves, by force and violence, rivers, fields, hills, trees, shrubs, and plants. 138. Those perfect beings, who were described by me as existing formerly in the Kṛita, — the mind-born children of Brahmā, who had been produced in this world when they came from the Janaloka,—(139) who were (some) tranquil, (some) fiery, (some) active, and (others) distressed,—were again born in the Tretā, (140) as Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, Śūdras, and injurious men, governed by the good and bad actions (performed) in former births. 141. Then those who were weaker than they, being truthful and innocent, dwelt among them, free from cupidity, and self-restrained; (142) whilst [183] The reasoning here does not seem very cogent, as the two words śākhā and śālā do not appear to have any close connection. But such unsuccessful attempts at etymology are frequent in Sanskrit works.

[180] "Perfection" seems to be here intended. If so, it would seem as if this line had been separated from its proper context.

[181] Dhanvānam sāśvatodakam. Perhaps we should read here with the Märk. P. xlix. 35, vārkshyam pārvatam audakam "(fortresses) protected by trees, built on mountains, or surrounded by water."

[182] Whatever may be thought of this rendering of the phrase, vṛikshāḥ gṛihasaṁsthitāḥ, the Märk. P. (xlix. 52), at least, is quite clear: gṛihākārā yathā pūrvaṁ teshām āsan mahīruhāḥ | tathā saṁsmṛitya tat sarvaṁ chakrur veśmāni tāḥ prajāḥ | "As they had formerly had trees with the shape of houses, so recalling all that to mind, these people built their dwellings."

[184] The text here does not seem to be in a satisfactory state. The Calc. edition of the Mārk. P. reads vṛishṭyāvaruddhair abhavat, etc.

others, less glorious than they, took and did.[185] When they had thus become opposed to each other,—(143) through their misconduct, while they struggled together, the plants were destroyed, being seized with their fists like gravel. 144. Then the earth swallowed up the fourteen kinds of cultivated and wild plants, in consequence of the influence exerted by the Yuga: for men had seized again and again the fruit, together with the flowers and leaves. 145. After the plants had perished, the famished people, becoming bewildered, repaired to Svayambhū the lord of creatures, (146) in the beginning of the Tretā age, seeking the means of subsistence.[186] Learning what they desired, (147) and determining by intuition what was proper to be done, the Lord Brahmā Svayambhū, knowing that the plants had been swallowed up by the earth, milked them back. 148. Taking Sumeru as a calf, he milked this earth. When this earth (or cow)[187] was milked by him, roots were produced again in the ground,—(149) those plants, whereof hemp is the seventeenth, which end with the ripening of fruits." [The plants fit for domestic use, and for sacrifice are then enumerated in verses 150–155.] "155. All these plants, domestic and wild, were for the first time[188] produced at the beginning of the Tretā age, (156) without cultivation, trees, shrubs, and the various sorts of creepers and grasses, both those which produce roots as their fruits, and those which bear fruit after flowering. The seeds for which the earth was formerly milked by Svayambhū (158) now became plants bearing flowers and fruits in their season. When these plants, though created, did not afterwards grow, (159) the divine Brahmā Svayambhū devised for the people means of subsistence depending on labour effected by their hands. 160. From that time forward the plants were produced and ripened through cultivation. The means of subsistence having been provided, Svayambhū (161) established divisions among them according to their tendencies.[189] Those of them who were rapacious, and destructive, (162) he ordained to be Kshattriyas, protectors of the others.[190] As many men as attended on these, fearless, (163) speaking truth and propounding sacred knowledge (brahma) with exactness, (were made) Brāhmans. Those others of them who had previously been feeble, engaged in the work of slaughter,[191] who, as cultivators (kīnāśāḥ), had been destructive, and were active in connection with the ground, were called Vaiśyas, husbandmen (kīṇāśān), providers of subsistence. 165. And he designated as Sūdras those who grieved (śochantaḥ), and ran (dravantaḥ),[192] who were addicted to menial tasks, inglorious and feeble.

[185] It is difficult to extract any satisfactory sense out of this line.

[186] The S'. P. Br. ii. 4, 2, 1, also speaks of different classes of creatures applying to the creator for food: Prajāpatiṁ vai bhūtāny upāsīdan | prajāḥ vai bhūtāni | "vi no dhehi yathā jīvāma" iti | tato devā yajnopavītino bhūtvā dakshiṇaṁ jānv āchya upāsīdan | tān abravīd "yajno vo 'nnam amṛitatvaṁ va ūrg vaḥ sūryo vo jyotir" iti | 2. Atha enam pitaraḥ prāchīnāvītinaḥ savyaṁ jānv āchya upāsīdan | tān abravīd "māsi māsi vo 'śanām svadhā vo manojavo vas' chandramā vo jyotir" iti | 3. Atha enam manushyāḥ prāvṛitāḥ upasthaṁ kṛitvā upāsīdan | tān abravīt "sāyam prātar vo 'śanam prajāḥ vo mṛityur vo 'gnir vo jyotir" iti | 4. Atha enam paśavaḥ upāsīdan | tebhyaḥ svaisham eva chakāra "yadā eva yūyam kadācha labhādhvai yadi kāle yady anākāle atha eva aśnātha" iti | tasmād ete yadā kadācha labhante yadi kāle yady anākāle atha eva aśnanti | 5. Atha ha enam śas'vad apy asurāḥ upasedur ity āhuḥ | tebhyas tamas cha māyāṁ cha pradadāu | asty aha eva asura-māyā iti iva | parābhūtā ha tv eva tāḥ prajāḥ | tāḥ imāḥ prajās tathaiva upajīvanti yathaiva ābhyaḥ Prajāpatir adadāt | "All beings resorted to Prajāpati,—(creatures are beings),—(saying) 'provide for us that we may live.' Then the gods, wearing the sacrificial cord, and bending the right knee, approached him. To them he said, 'let sacrifice be your food, your immortality your strength, the sun your light.' 2. Then the Fathers, wearing the sacrificial cord on their right shoulders, and bending the left knee, approached him. To them he said, 'you shall eat monthly, your oblation (svadhā) shall be your rapidity of thought, the moon your light.' 3. Then men, clothed, and inclining their bodies, approached him. To them he said, 'ye shall eat morning and evening, your offspring shall be your death, Agni your light.' 4. Then cattle repaired to him. To them he accorded their desire, (saying), 'Whensoever ye find anything, whether at the proper season or not, eat it.' Hence whenever they find anything, whether at the proper season or not, they eat it. 5. Then they say that the Asuras again and again resorted to him. To them he gave darkness (tamas) and illusion. There is, indeed, such a thing as the illusion, as it were, of the Asuras. But those creatures succumbed. These creatures subsist in the very manner which Prajāpati allotted to them."

[187] Gauḥ means both.

[188] See the note on verse 55, above.

[189] Yathārarabhāḥ. The Märk. P. has yathā-nyāyaṁ yathā-guṇam, "according to fitness and their qualities."

[190] Itareshāṁ krita-trāṇān. The M. Bh. xii. 2247, thus explains the word Kshattriya: brāhmaṇānāṁ kshata-trāṇāt tataḥ kshattriya uchyate | "(a king) is called Kshattriya because he protects Brāhmans from injuries."

[191] Vaiśasaṁ karma. The former word has the senses of (1) "hindrance, impediment," and (2) "slaughter," assigned to it in Wilson's Dictionary.

[192] The reader who is familiar with the etymologies given in Yāska's Nirukta, or in Professor Wilson's Dictionary on Indian authority, will not be surprised at the absurdity of the attempts made here by the Purāṇa-writer to explain the origin of the words Kshattriya, Vaiśya and Śūdra. To account for the last of these names he combines the roots śuch, "to grieve," and dru, "to run," dropping, however, of necessity the last letter (ch) of the former. The word kshattriya is really derived from kshattra, "royal power;" and vaiśya comes from viś, "people," and means "a man of the people."

166. Brahmā determined the respective functions and duties of all these persons. But after the system of the four castes had been in all respects established, (167) those men from infatuation did not fulfil their several duties. Not living conformably to those class-duties, they came into mutual conflict. 168. Having become aware of this fact, precisely as it stood, the Lord Brahmā prescribed force, criminal justice, and war, as the profession of the Kshattriyas. 169. He then appointed these, viz., the duty of officiating at sacrifices, sacred study, and the receipt of presents, to be the functions of Brāhmans. 170. The care of cattle, traffic, and agriculture, he allotted as the work of the Vaiśyas; and the practice of the mechanical arts, and service, he assigned as that of the Śūdras. 171. The duties common to Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, and Vaiśyas were the offering of sacrifice, study, and liberality. 172. Having distributed to the classes their respective functions and occupations, the Lord then allotted to them abodes in other worlds for their perfection. 173. The world of Prajāpati is declared to be the (destined) abode of Brāhmans practising rites; Indra's world that of Kshattriyas who do not flee in battle; (174) the world of the Maruts that of Vaiśyas who fulfil their proper duty; the world of the Gandharvas that of men of Śūdra birth who abide in the work of service. 175. Having allotted these as the future abodes of (the men of the different) classes, who should be correct in their conduct, he ordained orders (āśramas) in the classes which had been established. 176. The Lord formerly instituted the four orders of householder, religious student, dweller in the woods, and mendicant. 177. To those of them who do not in this world perform the duties of their castes, the men who dwell in hermitages apply the appellation of 'destroyer of works.' 178. Brahmā established these orders by name, and in explanation of them he declared their duties, (179) their methods of procedure, and their various rites. First of all there is the order of householder, which belongs to all the four classes, (180) and is the foundation and source of the other three orders. I shall declare them in order with their several observances." [The following verses 181–189, which detail these duties, need not be cited here. I shall, however, quote verses 190 ff. for their excellent moral tone.] "190. The Vedas, with their appendages, sacrifices, fasts, and ceremonies, (191) avail not to a depraved man, when his disposition has become corrupted. All external rites are fruitless (192) to one who is inwardly debased, however energetically he may perform them. A man who bestows even the whole of his substance with a defiled heart will thereby acquire no merit—of which a good disposition is the only cause." [After giving some further particulars about the celestial abodes of the righteous, verses 194–198, the writer proceeds:] "199. When—after the division into castes and orders had thus been made—(200) the people living under that system did not multiply, Brahmā formed other mind-born creatures in the middle of the Tretā (201) from his own body and resembling himself. When the Tretā age had arrived, and had gradually reached its middle, (202) the Lord then began to form other mind-born creatures. He next formed creatures in whom goodness (sattva) and passion (rajas) predominated, (203) and who were capable of attaining (the four objects of human pursuit) righteousness, wealth, love, and final liberation, together with the means of subsistence. Gods, too, and Fathers, and Rishis, and Manus (were formed), (204) by whom these creatures were classified (?) according to their natures in conformity with the Yuga. When this character(?) of his offspring had been attained, Brahmā (205) longed after mental offspring of all kinds and of various forms. Those creatures, whom I described to you as having taken refuge in Janaloka, (206) at the end of the Kalpa, all these arrived here, when he thought upon them, in order to be reproduced in the form of gods and other beings. 207. According to the course of the Manvantaras the least were esteemed the first (?), being swayed by destiny, and by connections and circumstances of every description. 208. These creatures were always born, under the controuling influence of, and as a recompence for their good or bad deeds. 209. He by himself formed those creatures which arrived in their several characters of gods, asuras, fathers, cattle, birds, reptiles, trees, and insects, in order that they might be subjected (anew) to the condition of creatures."[193]

The substance of the curious speculations on the origin and primeval condition of mankind contained in the preceding passage may be stated as follows: In verses 22–34 we are told that the creatures, who at the close of the preceding Kalpa had been driven by the mundane conflagration to Janaloka, now formed the seed of the new creation, which took place in the Kṛita Yuga, at the commencement of the present [193] I confess that I have had great difficulty in attaching any sense to the last words.

Kalpa. These were mind-born sons of Brahmā, perfect in nature, and they peopled the world. As a rule, we are informed, those beings who have formerly been elevated from the earth to higher regions, return again and again to this world, and, as a result of their previous works, are born in every age, in every possible variety of condition, exhibiting the same dispositions and fulfilling the same functions as in their former states of existence. It is next stated, verses 35–40, that when creation had, in some way not explained, come to a stand-still, four classes of human beings, consisting each of a thousand pairs of males and females, characterized respectively by different qualities, physical and moral, were produced from different members of the Creator's body.[194] These creatures sought to propagate the race, but abortively, for the reason specified (43). Children however were produced by mental effort (45 and 59), and in considerable numbers (52). The state of physical happiness, absolute and universal equality, moral perfection, and complete dispassion, in which mankind then existed, is depicted (48–65). The means of subsistence and enjoyment, which they are said to have drawn from the earth (48 and 57), were not of the ordinary kind, as we are informed (55 f.) that neither animals nor plants, which are the products of unrighteousness, existed at that period. No division into castes or orders prevailed during that age of perfection (62). A gradual declension, however, had been going on, and at the end of the Kṛita Yuga, the perfection peculiar to it had altogether disappeared (70–79). Another kind of perfection, peculiar to the Tretā, however, subsequently arose (73 and 80), and in the different Yugas there has existed a perfection springing from the performance of the duties belonging to each caste and order (75). The perfection described as prevailing in the Tretā was of a physical kind, consisting in the production of rain and the growth of trees, shaped like houses, which at the same time yielded the materials of all sorts of enjoyments (80–82). Passion, however, in its various forms began to take the place of the previous dispassion (84). The constitution of women, which had formerly incapacitated them for effective impregnation, became ultimately so modified as to ensure the successful propagation of the species, which [194] This statement agrees with that in the Mārk. P. xlix. 3 ff. but differs from that already given from the Vishṇu P. in so far as the latter does not specify the numbers created, or say anything about pairs being formed.

accordingly proceeded (84–87).[195] We have then the destruction, and subsequent reproduction of the trees, formed like houses, described (88–91). These trees now produced clothes and jewels, as well as honey without bees, and enabled mankind to live in happiness and enjoyment. Again, however, the trees disappeared in consequence of the cupidity which led to their misuse (92–94). The absence of perfection occasioned suffering of various kinds, from moral as well as physical causes, and men were now driven to construct houses, which they had hitherto found unnecessary (96–99 and 123), and to congregate in towns and cities (100). Their houses were built after the model furnished by trees (123–128). The hunger and thirst which men endured from the loss of the trees which had formerly yielded all the means of subsistence and enjoyment, were relieved by means of a new perfection which appeared in the shape of rain, and the streams thereby generated, and by the growth of plants, which now sprang up for the first time as a result of the conjunction of water and earth (130–135 and 155). Desire and cupidity, however, now again arose and led to acts of violent appropriation (136 f.). At this juncture the perfect mind-born sons of Brahmā, of different dispositions, who had formerly existed in the Kṛita age, were reproduced in the Tretā as Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, Śūdras, and destructive men, as a result of their actions in their former existence (138–140). But in consequence of their dissensions and rapacity, the earth swallowed up all the existing plants (142–144). Under the pressure of the distress thus occasioned the inhabitants of the earth resorted to Brahmā, who milked the earth, through the medium of mount Sumeru acting as a calf, and recovered the plants which had disappeared (145–149). As, however, these plants did not propagate themselves spontaneously, Brahmā introduced agriculture (158–160). Having thus provided the means of subsistence, he divided the people into classes according to their characteristics (160–165). But as these classes did not perform their several duties, and came into mutual conflict, Brahmā prescribed their respective functions with greater precision (166–171); and assigned the future celestial abodes which the members of each class might attain by their fulfilment (172–174). He then ordained the four orders of householder, religious student, etc. (175–190). After a few verses in praise of moral purity (190–193), the abodes and destinies of the eminently righteous are set forth (194–199). Just when we had arrived at a point in the narrative, from which we might have imagined that it had only to be carried on further to afford us a sufficient explanation of the state of things existing up to the present age, we are suddenly arrested (199–202) by being informed that the people distributed according to the system of castes and orders did not multiply, and are introduced to a new mind-born creation, which took place in the Tretā age, to remedy this failure. We are next told (203) of what appears to be another creation of beings endowed with goodness and passion. And, finally, a yet further re-incorporation of previously existing souls is described as having taken place (205–209). It would thus seem that after all we are left without any account of the origin of the system of castes which prevailed when the Purāṇa was compiled. The only suppositions on which this conclusion can be avoided are either (1) that the cessation in the increase of the generation alluded to in verse 200, which led to the new creation, was not universal, that the race than existing did not entirely die out, but that the old blood was re-invigorated by that of the newly created beings; or (2) that the other set of creatures, mentioned in verse 203, as characterized by goodness and passion, were the progenitors of the present race of men. On these points, however, the text throws no light.

[195] It is not quite clear, however, what is intended by the word akāle, "out of season," in verse 87. See the emendation proposed above in the note on that verse.

The preceding account of the creation of mankind and of the vicissitudes and deterioration of society, is in some places obscure and confused, and its several parts do not appear to be consistent with each other. At the outset the writer describes the creation of four thousand pairs of human beings, of whom each separate set of one thousand is distinguished by widely different innate characters, the first class having the quality of goodness, the second that of passion, the third those of passion and darkness, and the fourth that of darkness. Nevertheless (as in the parallel passage of the Vishṇu Purāṇa) we cannot find in the narrative the least trace of those inherent differences of character having for a long time manifested themselves by producing dissimilarity either of moral conduct or of physical condition; for the perfection, which is described as existing in the Kṛita age, is spoken of as if it was universal; and not only is no distinction alluded to as prevailing at this period between the component parts of society, but we are expressly told that no castes or orders then existed. The deterioration also, which ensued towards the end of the Kṛita age, is described as general, and not peculiar to any class. How is this complete uniformity, first of perfection, and afterwards of declension, which, for anything that appears to the contrary, is predicated of the descendants of the whole of the four thousand pairs, to be reconciled with the assertion that each thousand of those pairs was characterized by different innate qualities? The difficulty is not removed by saying that the writer supposed that these inherent varieties of character existed in a latent or dormant state in the different classes, and were afterwards developed in their descendants; for he distinctly declares (verse 54) in general terms that mankind were at that period sattva-bahulāḥ, i.e. "possessed the quality of goodness in abundance;" and in the earlier part of the subsequent narrative no allusion is made to the different qualities at first ascribed to the four sets of a thousand pairs being separately developed in the members of the four classes respectively. In verse 74, indeed, it appears to be assumed that the division into castes had existed from the creation; for we there find an assertion that in "all the Manvantaras, according to the division of the four yugas," (including apparently the Kṛita) "there is declared to have existed a perfection effected by the observances of the castes and orders, and arising from the fulfilment of works;" but how is this to be reconciled with the express statement of verses 60 and 61, that "in the Kṛita age no works were performed which were either virtuous or sinful," and that "there then existed neither distinctions of caste or order, nor any mixture of castes?" In the Tretā age the state of deterioration continued, but no reference is made of any separation of classes till we come to verse 138, where it is said that the beings who in the Kṛita age had existed as the perfect mind-born sons of Brahmā, were now, as a consequence of their former actions, recalled into human existence, and in conformity with their previous characters as calm, fiery, laborious, or depressed, became Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, Śūdras, and men of violence. These creatures, after they had been furnished with the means of subsistence, were eventually divided into classes, according to their varieties of disposition, character, and occupation; and as at first they did not fulfil their proper duties, but encroached upon each others' provinces, their functions were afterwards more stringently defined and the means of enforcing obedience were provided. Here it is intimated that different sets of beings were born as Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and Sūdras, on account of the different qualities which they had manifested in a previous existence, and that in conformity with those same characteristics they were afterwards formally distributed into castes. This description is therefore so far consistent with itself. The difference of caste is made to depend upon the dispositions of the soul. But how are we to reconcile this postulation of different characters formerly exhibited with the description given in the previous part of the narrative, where we are informed that, in the earlier parts, at least, of the Kṛita age, all men were alike perfect, and that no actions were performed which were either virtuous or vicious? If such was the case at that period, how could the beings who then existed have manifested those differences of disposition and character which are asserted to have been the causes of their being subsequently reborn as Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Sūdras, and Vaiśyas? It may be admitted that the differences of character, which are attributed in the Purāṇa to the four primeval sets of a thousand pairs of human beings, correspond to those qualities which are described as having subsequently given rise to the division into castes; but the assertion of such a state of uniform and universal perfection, as is said to have intervened between the creation of mankind and the realization of caste, seems incompatible with the existence of any such original distinctions of a moral character.

As regards this entire account when compared with the other two descriptions of the creation given in the previous part of this section, the same remarks are applicable as have been made in the last section, p. 65 f., on the corresponding passages from the Vishṇu Purāṇa.

The chapter which I have just translated and examined, is followed immediately by the one of which I have already in a preceding page quoted the commencement, descriptive of the creation of Asuras, Gods, Fathers, etc., from the different bodies assumed and cast off successively by Brahmā.

I shall now give an extract from the following, or tenth chapter, in which the the legend of Śatarūpā is related.

Sūta uvācha | 1. Evambhūteshu lokeshu Brahmaṇā loka-karttṛiṇā[196] |

[196] This form karttṛiṇā (one which, as is well known, may be optionally employed in yadā tāḥ na pravarttante prajāḥ kenāpi hetunā | 2. Tamo-mātrāvṛito Brahmā tadā-prabhṛiti duḥkhitaḥ | tataḥ sa vidadhe buddhim arthaniśchaya-gāminīm | 3. Athātmani samasrākshīt tamo-mātrāṁ nijātmikām | rajaḥ-sattvam parājitya varttamānaṁ sa dharmataḥ | 4. Tapyate tena duḥkhena śokaṁ chakre jagat-patiḥ | tamas tu vyanudat tasmād rajas tach cha samāvṛinot | 5. Tat tamaḥ pratinuttaṁ vai mithunaṁ samvyajāyata | adharmaś charaṇāj jajne hiṁsā śokād ajāyata | 6. Tatas tasmin samudbhūte mithune charaṇātmani | tataś cha bhagavān āsīt prītiśchainam aśiśriyat | 7. Svāṁ tanuṁ sa tato Brahmā tām apohad abhāsvarām | dvidhā 'karot sa taṁ deham ardhena purusho 'bhavat | 8. Ardhena nārī sā tasya Śatarūpā vyajāyata | prākṛitām bhūta-dhātrīm tāṁ kāmād vai sṛishṭavān vibhuḥ | 9. Sā divam pṛithivīṁ chaiva mahimnā vyāpya dhishṭhitā | Brahmaṇaḥ sā tanuḥ pūrvā divam āvṛitya tishṭhati | 10. Yā tv ardhāt sṛijate nārī Śatarūpā vyajāyata | sā devī niyataṁ taptvā tapaḥ parama-duścharam | bharttāram dīptayaśasam Purusham pratyapadyata | 11. Sa vai Svāyambhuvaḥ pūrvam Purusho Manur uchyate | tasyaikasaptati-yugam Manvantaram ihochyate | 12. Labdhvā tu purushaḥ patnīṁ Śatarūpām ayonijām | tayā sa ramate sārddham tasmāt sā Ratir uchyate | 13. Prathamaḥ samprayogaḥ sa kalpādau samavarttata | Virājam asṛijad Brahmā so 'bhavat Purusho Virāṭ | 14. Sa samrāṭ māsarūpāt tu vairājas tu Manuḥ smṛitaḥ | sa vairājaḥ prajā-sargaḥ sa sarge purusho Manuḥ | 15. Vairājāt purushād vīrāch chhatarūpā vyajāyata | Priyavratottānapādau putrau putravatāṁ varau |

"1. When the worlds had thus been formed by Brahmā their creator, but the creatures, for some reason did not engage in action,[197] (2) Brahmā, enveloped in gloom, and thenceforward dejected, formed a resolution tending to ascertain the fact. 3. He then created in himself (a body) of his own, formed of pure gloom (tamas), having overpowered the passion (rajas) and goodness (sattva) which existed (in him) naturally. 4. The Lord of the world was afflicted with that suffering, and lathe neuter, but not in the masculine) is here used for metrical reasons. Such irregularities are, as we have seen, designated by the Commentators as ārsha. It is unlikely that Brahman should be here used in a neuter sense.

[197] The true reading here may be pravarddhante, in which case the sense will be "did not multiply." Compare the parallel passage in the Vishṇu Purāṇa, i. 7, 4, p. 64.

mented.[198] He then dispelled the gloom, and covered over the passion. 5. The gloom, when scattered, was formed into a pair.[199] Unrighteousness arose from activity (?), and mischief sprang from sorrow. 6. That active (?) pair having been produced, he became glorious (?) and pleasure took possession of him. 7. Brahmā after that cast off that body of his, which was devoid of lustre, and divided his person into two parts; with the half he became a male (purusha) (8) and with the half a female: it was Śatarūpā who was so produced to him. Under the impulse of lust he created her a material supporter of beings. 9. By her magnitude she pervaded both heaven and earth. That former body of Brahmā invests the sky. 10. This divine female Śatarūpā, who was born to him from his half, as he was creating, by incessantly practising austere fervour of a highly arduous description, acquired for herself as a husband a Male (purusha) of glorious renown. He is called of old the Male, Manu Svāyambhuva; and his period (manvantara) is declared to extend to seventy-one Yugas. 12. This Male, having obtained for his wife, Śatarūpā, not sprung from any womb, lived in dalliance with her (ramate); and from this she is called Rati (the female personification of sexual love). 13. This was the first cohabitation practised in the beginning of the Kalpa. Brahmā created Virāj; he was the Male, Virāj. 14. He is the sovereign (samrāj), from his having the form of a month; and Manu is known as the son of Virāj.[200] This creation of living beings is called that of Virāj. In this creation Manu is the male. 15. Śatarūpā bore to the heroic Purusha, son of Virāj, two sons, Priyavrata and Uttānapāda, the most eminent of these who have sons." This is followed by a further genealogy, into which I will not enter.

By comparing this account with the one extracted above, p. 64 f., from the Vishṇu Purāṇa, i. 7, 1 ff., it will be seen that while it makes no allusion to the production of Rudra, as related in the Vishṇu Purāṇa (which, as well as the birth of the mental sons of Brahmā, the Vāyu Purāṇa had described in the preceding chapter, verses 67–83), it is somewhat fuller in regard to the legend of Śatarūpā; and although it does not allow that Brahmā cohabited with his daughter, and assigns to her another husband, Manu Svāyambhūva, it describes the creator as having been actuated by carnal desire in generating her. I shall give further illustrations of this story in the next section.

[198] With this account of Brahmā's dejection and grief the accounts quoted above pp. 68 ff. from the Brāhmaṇas may be compared.

[199] Compare the narrative of the Vishṇu Purāṇa i. 7, 9 ff. quoted in p. 64 f.

[200] Compare the account given in Manu's Institutes, above, p. 36.

Sect. IX.—Legend of Brahmā and his daughter, according to the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, and of Śatarūpā, according to the Matsya Purāṇa.

The story which forms the subject of the present section is noticed at some length in the fourth volume of this work, pp. 38–46, where one of the oldest passages in which it is related, is quoted from the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, i. 7, 4, 1 ff., together with one of a comparatively late age from the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, iii. 12, 28 ff. As however the legend, though repulsive in its character, is not without interest as illustrating the opinions which Indian mythologists have entertained regarding their deities, I shall quote two other texts in which it is narrated.

The first, from the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, iii. 33, has, no doubt (along with the passage of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa just referred to, and another from the same work, xiv. 4, 2, 1 ff., quoted above, in p. 24 ff.), furnished the ideas which are expanded in the later versions of the story. It is as follows:

Prajāpatir vai svāṁ duhitaram abhyadhyāyat | Divam ity anye āhur Ushasam ity anye | tām ṛiśyo bhūtvā rohităm bhūtām abhyait | tam devā apaśyan | "akṛitaṁ vai Prajāpatiḥ karoti" iti | te tam aichhan yaḥ enam ārishyati | etam anyonyasmin na avindan | teshām yā eva ghoratamās tanvaḥ āsaṁs tāḥ ekadhā samabharan | tāḥ sambhṛitāḥ esha devo 'bhavat | tad asya etad bhūtavan-nāma | bhavati vai sa yo 'sya etad evaṁ nāma veda | taṁ devā abruvann "ayaṁ vai Prajāpatir akṛitam akar imam vidhya" iti | sa "tathā" ity abravīt | "sa vai vo varaṁ vriṇai" iti | "vriṇīshva" iti | sa etam eva varam avriṇīta paśūnām ādhipatyam | tad asya etat paśuman-nāma | paśumān bhavati yo 'sya etad evaṁ nāma veda | tam abhyāyatya avidhyat | sa viddhaḥ ūrddhve udaprăpatad ityādi[201] |

[201] See the translation of this passage given by Dr. Haug in his Aitareya Brāhmaṇa

"Prajāpati lusted after his own daughter. Some call her the Sky, others Ushas. Becoming a buck, he approached her after she had become a doe. The gods saw him; (and said) Prajāpati does a deed which was never done (before).[202] They sought some one who should take vengeance on him. Such a person they did not find among themselves. They then gathered together their most dreadful bodies. These when combined formed this god (Rudra). Hence (arises) his name connected with Bhūta (Bhūtapati). That man flourishes[203] who thus knows this name of his. The gods said to him, 'This Prajāpati has done a deed which was never done before: pierce him.' He replied, 'so be it,' (adding), 'let me ask a boon of you.' They rejoined, 'ask.' He asked for this boon, viz., lordship over cattle. Hence arises his name connected with Paśu (Paśupati). He who thus knows his name, becomes the owner of cattle. He then attacked (Prajāpati) and pierced him. He, when pierced, soared upwards," etc. etc.

The second passage I proposed to cite is from the Matsya Purāṇa, chapter iii. verses 32 ff.: Etad tattvātmakaṁ kṛitvā jagad dvedhā ajījanat | 33. Sāvitrīm loka-siddhyartham hṛidi kṛitvā samāsthitaḥ | tataḥ sanjapatas tasya bhitvā deham akalmasham | 34. strī-rūpam arddham akarod arddham purusha-rūpavat | Satarūpā cha sā khyātā Sāvitrī cha nigadyate | 35. Sarasvaty atha Gāyatrī Brahmāṇī cha parantapa | tataḥ sa Brahmadevās tām ātmajām ity akalpayat | 36. Dṛishṭvā tāṁ vyathitas tāvat kāma-vāṇārdito vibhuḥ | "aho rūpam aho rūpam" ity uvācha tadā 'vyayaḥ | 37. Tato Vasishṭha-pramukhā "bhagiṇīm" iti chukruśuḥ | Brahmā na kinchid dadṛise tan-mukhālokanād ṛite | 38. "Aho rūpam aho rūpām" iti āha punaḥ punaḥ | tataḥ praṇāma-namrāṁ tām punas tām abhyalokayat | 39. Atha pradakshiṇām chakre sā pitur varavarṇinī | putrehhyo lajjitasyāsya tad-rūpāloka-nechhayā | 40. Āvirbhūtaṁ tato vaktram dakshiṇam pāṇḍu-gaṇḍavat |

vol. ii. pp. 218 ff.; and the remarks on this translation by Professor Weber, Indische Studien, ix. 217 ff.; and also Professor Roth's explanation of the word bhūtavat in his Lexicon.

[202] This seems to be imitated in the line of the Bhāgavata Purāṇa iii. 12, 30, quoted in vol. iv. of this work, p. 40: naitat pūrvaiḥ kṛitaṁ tvad ye na karishyanti chāpare | "This was never done by those before thee, nor will those after thee do it."

[203] Bhavati. In the Brāhmaṇas this verb has frequently the sense of prospering, as opposed to parābhavati, "he perishes." See Böthlingk and Roth's Lexicon, s. v., and the passages there referred to.

vismaya-sphurad-oshṭhaṁ cha pāśchātyam udagāt tataḥ | 41. Chaturtham abhavat paśchād vāmaṁ kāma-śarāturam | tato 'nyad abhavat tasya kāmāturatayā tathā | 42. Utpatantyās tadā "kāśe ālokena kutūhalāt | sṛishṭy-arthaṁ yat kṛitam tena tapaḥ paramadāruṇam | 43. Tat sarvam nāśam agamat sva-sutopagamechhayā | tenāśu[204] vaktram abhavat panchamaṁ tasya dhīmataḥ | 44. Āvirbhavaj jaṭābhiścha tad vaktranchāvṛiṇot prabhuḥ | tatas tān abravīd Brahmā putrān ātma-samudbhavān | 45. "Prajāḥ sṛijadhvam abhitaḥ sa-devāsura-mānushāḥ" | evam uktās tataḥ sarve sasṛijur vividhāḥ prajāḥ | 46. Gateshu teshu sṛishṭyartham praṇāmāvanatām imām | upayeme sa viśvātmā S'atarūpām aninditām | 47. Sambabhūva tayā sārddham atikāmāturo vibhuḥ | salajjāṁ chakame devaḥ kamalodara-mandire | 48. Yāvad abda-śataṁ divyaṁ yathā 'nyaḥ prākṛito janaḥ | tataḥ kālena mahatā tasyāḥ putro 'bhavad Manuḥ | 49. Svāyambhuva iti khyātaḥ sa Virāḍ iti naḥ śrutam | tad-rūpa-guṇa-sāmānyād adhipūrusha uchyate | 50. Vairājā yatra te jātāḥ bahavaḥ saṁśita-vratāḥ | Svāyambhuvā mahābhāgāḥ sapta sapta tathā 'pare | 51. Svārochishādyāḥ sarve te Brahma-tulya-svarūpiṇaḥ | Auttami-pramukhās tadvad yeshāṁ tvaṁ saptamo 'dhunā | (Adhyāya. 4.) Manur uvācha | 1. Aho kashṭataraṁ chaitad angajāgamanaṁ vibhoḥ | Kathaṁ na dosham agamat karmaṇā tena Padmajaḥ | 2. Parasparañcha sambandhaḥ sagotrāṇām abhūt katham | vaivāhikas tat-sutānām chhindi me saṁśayaṁ vibho | Matsya uvācha | 3. Divyeyam ādi-sṛishṭis tu rajo-guṇa-samudbhavā | atīndriyendriyā tadvad atīndriya-śarīrikā | 4. Divya-tejomayī bhūpa divya-jnāna-samudbhavā | na chānyair abhitaḥ śakyā jnātuṁ vai māṁsa-chakshushā | 5. Yathā bhujangāḥ sarpāṇām ākāśe sarva-pakshiṇām | vidanti mārgām divyānāṁ divyā eva na mānavāḥ | 6. Kāryākāryeṇa devāścha śubhāśubha-phala-pradāḥ | yasmāt tasmād na rājendra tad-vichāro nṛiṇāṁ śubhaḥ | 7. Anyachcha sarva-devānām adhishṭhātā chaturmukhaḥ | gāyatrī Brahmaṇas tadvad anga-bhūtā nigadyate | 8. Amūrtta-mūrttimad vāpi mithunancha prachakshate | Viranchir. yatra bhagavāns tatra devī Sarasvatī | 9. Bhāratī yatra yatraiva tatra tatra Prajāpatiḥ | yathātapena rahitā chhāyā vai (? na) dṛiśyate kvachit | 10. Gāyatrī Brahmaṇaḥ pārśvam tathaiva na vimunchati | veda-rāśiḥ smṛito Brahmā Sāvitrī tad-adhishṭhitā | 11. Tasmād na kaśchid doshaḥ syāt Sāvitrī-gamane vibhoḥ | tathāpi lajjāvanataḥ Prajāpatir abhūt purā | 12. Sva-sutopagamād Brāhmā śaśāpa Kusumāyudham | yasmād mamāpi

[204] Instead of tenāśu the Gaikowar MS. reads tenordhva.

bhavatā manaḥ saṁkshobhitaṁ śaraiḥ | 13. Tasmāt tvad-deham achirād Rudro bhasmīkarishyati | tataḥ prasādayāmāsa Kāmadevas Chaturmukham | 14. " Na mām akāraṇaṁ śaptuṁ tvam ihārhasi mām ava | aham evaṁ-vidhaḥ sṛishṭas tvayaiva chaturānana | 15. Indriya-kshobha-janakaḥ sarveshām eva dehinām | strī-puṁsor avichāreṇa mayā sarvatra sarvadā | 16. Kshobhyam manaḥ prayatnena tvayaivoktam purā vibho | tasmād anaparādhena tvayā śaptas tathā vibho | 17. Kuru prasādam bhagavan sva-śarīrāptaye punaḥ | Brahmā uvācha | 18. Vaivasvate 'ntare prāpte Yādavānvaya-sambhavaḥ | Rāmo nāma yadṛā martyo mat-sattva-balam āśritaḥ | 19. Avatīryyāsura-dhvaṁsī Dvārakām adhivatsyati | tad-dhātus tat-samaścha[205] tvaṁ tadā putratvam eshyasi ityādi |

" 32. Having thus formed the universe, consisting of the principles, he generated a twofold creation, (33) having, with a view to the completion of the world, placed and kept Sāvitrī in his heart. Then as he was muttering prayers, he divided his spotless body (34) and gave to the half the form of a woman, and to the half that of a male. (This female) is called Śatarūpā, Sāvitrī, (35) Sarasvatī, Gāyatrī, and Brahmāṇī. Brahmā then took her for his daughter. 36. Beholding her, the imperishable deity, distressed, tortured with the arrows of love, exclaimed, 'o what beauty! o what beauty!' 37. Then (his sons) headed by Vasishṭha, cried aloud, '(our) sister.' Brahmā saw nothing else, looking only at her face; (38) and exclaimed again and again, 'o what beauty! o what beauty!' He then again gazed upon her, as she bend forward in obeisance. 39. The fair woman then made a circuit round her father. As on account of his sons he felt ashamed; from his desire of gazing on her beauty (40) there appeared (on his head) a southern face with pale cheeks; and there was afterwards manifested a western face with lips quivering with astonishment. 41. A fourth was subsequently formed, beautiful, disquieted by the arrows of love. Then another was produced from the disturbing influence of the same passion, (42) and from eagerness in gazing after her as she rose upwards in the sky. That austere fervour, extremely dreadful, which Brahmā had practised with a view to creation, (43) was entirely lost through his desire to approach his daughter (carnally). Through this was produced speedily the fifth face (or, according to one MS., the upper, the fifth face) of the wise deity, (44) which appeared with matted hair, and which he covered up. Brahmā then said to the sons who had sprung from him, (45) 'create living beings everywhere, gods, asuras, and men.' They, being thus addressed, created beings of various kinds. 46. When they had gone away for the purpose of creating, he, who is the universe, took for his wife the unblamed Śatarūpā. 47. Sickened with love, he cohabited with her: like any ordinary being, he loved her,—though she was full of shame—embowered in the hollow of a lotus, (48) for a hundred years of the gods. A long time after, a son was born to her, Manu (49) called Svāyambhuva, who, as we have heard, is Virāj. From their community of form and qualities he is called Adhipūrusha.[206] 50. From him were sprung those numerous Vairājas, steadfast in religious observances, those seven glorious sons of Svayambhū, and those other seven Manus, (51) beginning with Svārochisha and Auttami, in form equal to Brahmā, of whom thou[207] art now the seventh. (4th chapter) 1. Manu says: 'Ah! this is most afflicting, this entrance of love into the god. How was it that the lotus-born did not incur guilt by that act? 2. And how did a matrimonial connection take place between persons of the same family who were sprung from him? Solve this doubt of mine, o Lord. The Fish replied: 3. This primeval creation was celestial, produced from the quality of passion (rajas); it had senses removed beyond the cognizance of sense, and bodies of the same description, (4) was possessed of celestial energy, derived from celestial knowledge, and cannot be perfectly perceived by others with the eye of flesh. 5. Just as serpents know the path of serpents, and (beings living) in the sky know the path of all sorts of birds, so too the celestials alone, and not men, know the way of celestials. 6. And since it is the gods who award the recompence, favourable or unfavourable, according as good or bad deeds have been done,—it is not good for men to examine this (question). 7. Furthermore, the four-faced (Brahmā) is the ruler of all the gods, and in like manner the Gāyatrī is delared to be a member of Brahmā. 8. And, as they say, there is a pair consisting of the formless, and of that which has form. Wherever the divine Viranchi (Brahmā) is, there is also the goddess Sarasvatī. 9. Wherever Bhāratī (a name of Sarasvatī) is, there is also Prajāpati. Just as shadow is nowhere seen without sunshine, (10) so Gāyatrī never forsakes the side of Brahmā. He is called the collected Veda, and Sāvitrī rests upon him; (11) there can therefore be no fault in his approaching her. Nevertheless, Brahmā, the lord of creatures, was bowed down with shame, (12) because he had approached his own daugther, and cursed Kusumāyudha [208] (Kāma), (in these words) 'As even my mind has been agitated by thy arrows, Rudra shall speedily reduce thy body to ashes.' Kāmadeva then propitiated the four-faced deity, saying, (14) 'Thou oughtest not to curse me without cause: preserve me. It is by thee thyself that I have been created with such a character, (15) an agitator of the organs of sense of all embodied creatures. The minds both of men and women must always and everywhere (16) be energetically stirred up by me without hesitation: this thou thyself hast formerly declared. It is therefore without any fault of mine that I have been thus cursed by thee. 17. Be gracious, lord, that I may recover my body.' Brahmā answered: 18. 'When the Vaivasvata Manvantara shall have arrived, a mortal, named Rāma, sprung from the Yādava race, deriving force from my essence, (19) and, becoming incarnate as a destroyer of Asuras, shall inhabit Dvārakā. Thou shalt then become a son of his substance and like to him," etc.

[205] Such appears to be the reading of the Gaikowar MS. The original reading of the Taylor MS. has been erased, and another substituted, tatas tat-samaye tvam cha.

[206] Compare the Purusha Sukta, above p. 8, in the fifth verse of which the words Virājo adhi pūrushah occur. If the last two words are combined they give the name in the text.

[207] This account is given by the deity represented as incarnate in a Fish, to Manu Vaivasvata.

The narrator of this legend does not hesitate to depict in the strongest colours (though without the least approach to grossness) the helpless subjection of Brahmā to the influence of sexual desire. This illicit indulgence was regarded by the authors of the Satapatha and Aitareya Brāhmaṇas as in the highest degree scandalous, and they do not attempt to palliate its enormity by any mystical explanation, such as that which we find in the Matsya Purāṇa. Whether this apology proceeded from the original narrator, or from a later writer of a more sensitive disposition, who perceived its inconsistency with any elevated idea of the superior powers, is difficult to say. It is quite possible that the same writer who gave his fancy scope in describing the unbecoming scene, of which the substance had been handed down in works regarded as authoritative, may also have thought it necessary to discover some device for counteracting the scandal. On the other hand, the original writer seems to cut himself off from the privilege of resorting to any mystical refinements to explain away the offence, by having in the first instance represented Brahmā's indulgence as on a level with that of ordinary beings. And even after the apology has been concluded, we are still told that Brahmā could not help feeling ashamed of what he had done. The writer of the explanation ought to have perceived that if his defence was of any value, the deity for whom he was apologizing had no ground for humiliation. But he did not venture to expunge the popular features of the story. The grounds on which the apology proceeds are partly of the same character as those which the writer of the Bhāgavata Purāṇa assumes in the passage (x. 33, 27 ff.) which is given in the fourth volume of this work, pp. 42 f., viz., that the gods are not to be judged on the same principles as men,—that "the celestials have laws of their own" (sunt superis sua jura). The Bhāgavata Purāṇa has, however, different measures for Brahmā and for Krishṇa; for whilst the adultery of the latter is defended in the verses just referred to, no desire is shown to vindicate the former in the other passage, iii. 12, 28 ff., adduced in the same volume, page 40.

[208] The word means "He whose weapons are flowers."

As regards the details of the story according to the different Purāṇas, I may observe that while the Vishṇu, the Vāyu (see above, pp. 65, and 106), and the Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇas, xl. 13 f., represent Śatarūpā as the wife of Manu Svāyambhuva, the Matsya Purāṇa, as we have just seen, declares her to have been the spouse of Brahmā himself, and the mother of Manu Svāyambhuva.[209] This is repeated in the twenty-sixth verse of the fourth chapter:

Yā sā dehārddha-sambhūtā Gāyatrī brahma-vādinī | jananī yā Manor devī Śatarūpā Śatendriyā | 27. Ratir Manas Tapo Buddhir mahad-ādi-samudbhavā[210] | tataḥ sa Śatarūpāyāṁ saptāpatyāny ajījanat | 28. Ye Marīchyādayaḥ putrāḥ mānasās tasya dhīmataḥ | teshām ayam abhūl lokaḥ sarva-jñānātmakaḥ purā | 29. Tato 'śrijad Vāmadevam triśūla-vara-dhārinam | Sanatkumārañcha vibhum pūrveshām api pūrvajam | 30.

[209] Compare the account given in Manu's Institutes (above, p. 36), which does not coincide in all particulars with any of the Purāṇas here quoted.

[210] In this line the original readings are in several places erased in the Taylor MS. I have endeavoured to restore it with the help of the Gaikowar MS.

Vāmadevaś tu bhagavān asṛijad mukhato dvijān | rājanyān asṛijad bāhvor Viṭ-śūdrāv, ūru-pādayoḥ | . . . . 35. Svāyambhuvo Manur dhīmāṁs tapas taptvā suduścharam | patnīm avāpa rūpāḍhyām Anantām nāma nāmataḥ | Priyavratottānapādau Manus tasyām ajījanat |

"She who was produced from the half of his body, Gāyatrī the declarer of sacred science, she who was the mother of Manu, the goddess Śatarūpā (i.e. having a hundred forms), Śatendriyā (i.e. having a hundred senses), (27) (was also) Rati, Mind, Austere Fervour, Intellect, sprung from Mahat and the other principles. He then begot upon Śatarūpā seven sons. 28. This world, composed of all knowledge, sprang from Marīchi, and the others who were the mind-born sons of that wise Being. He next created Vāmadeva (Mahādeva), the wielder of the excellent trident, and the lord Sanatkumāra, born before the earliest. 30. Then the divine Vāmadeva created Brāhmans from his mouth, Rājanyas from his breast, the Viś and the Śūdra from his thighs and feet." [After describing in the following verses some other creations of Vāmadeva, the writer proceeds in verse 35:] "The wise Manu Svāyambhuva, having practised austere fervour of the most arduous kind, obtained a beautiful wife named Anantā. On her he begot Priyavrata and Uttānapāda."

Having made Manu the son of Śatarūpā, the writer was obliged to give him another female for a wife, as we see he has here done.

It will be observed that in this passage Vāmadeva—and not Brahmā, as in the other Purāṇas—is described as the creator of the four castes.

Sect. X.—Quotations from the Rāmāyaṇa on the Creation, and on the Origin of Castes.

The substance of the first of the following passages has already been stated above in a note on page 36. Part of it is also quoted in p. 54, and it is more fully cited in the fourth volume of this work, p. 29, but for facility of reference I repeat it here.

Rāmāyaṇa (Bombay edition) ii. 110, 1. Kruddham ājñāya Rāmaṁ tu Vasishṭhaḥ pratyuvācha ha | Jābālir api jānīte lokasyāsya gatāgatim | 2. Nivarttayitu-kāmas tu tvām etad vākyam abravīt | imām loka-samut-

pattiṁ loka-nātha nibodha me | 3. Sarvaṁ salilam evāsīt pṛithivī tatra nirmitā | tataḥ samabhavat Brahmā Svayambhūr daivataiḥ saha | 4. Sa varāhas tato bhūtvā projjahāra vasundharām | asṛijach cha jagat sarvaṁ saha putraiḥ kṛitātmabhiḥ | 5. Ākāśaprabhavo Brahmā śāśvato nitya avyayaḥ | tasmād Marīchiḥ sanjajne Marīcheḥ Kaśyapaḥ sutaḥ | 6. Vivasvān Kaśyapāj jajne Manur Vaivasvataḥ svayam | sa tu prajāpatiḥ pūrvam Ikshvākus tu Manoḥ sutaḥ | 7. Yasyeyam prathamaṁ dattā samṛiddhā Manunā mahī | tam Ikshvākum Ayodhyāyāṁ rājānaṁ viddhi pūrvakam |

"1. Perceiving Rāma to be incensed[211] Vasishṭha replied: 'Jābāli also knows the destruction and renovation of this world. 2. But he spoke as he did from a desire to induce you to return. Learn from me, lord of the earth, this (account of) the origin of the world. 3. The universe was nothing but water. In it the earth was fashioned. Then Brahmā Svayambhū came into existence, with the deities. He next, becoming a boar, raised up the earth, and created the entire world, with the saints his sons. 5. Brahmā, the eternal, unchanging, and undecaying, was produced from the æther (ākāśa). From him sprang Marīchi, of whom Kaśyapa was the son. 6. From Kaśyapa sprang Vivasvat: and from him was descended Manu, who was formerly the lord of creatures (prajāpati). Ikshvāku[212] was the son of Manu (7) and to him this prosperous earth was formerly given by his father. Know that this Ikshvāku was the former king in Ayodhyā."

The account which I next quote does not agree with the last in its details, as, besides representing the Prajāpatis or sons of Brahmā to be seventeen in number, it places Marīchi, Kaśyapa, and Vivasvat in the same rank as contemporaries, while the former narrative declares them to have been respectively father, son, and grandson.

Rāmāyaṇa iii. 14, 5. Rāmasya vachanaṁ śrutvā kulam ātmānam eva cha | āchachakshe dvijas tasmai sarva-bhūta-samudbhavam | 6. Pūrvakāle mahābāho ye prajāpatayo 'bhavan | tān me nigadataḥ sarvān āditaḥ śṛiṇu Rāghava | 7. Kardamaḥ prathamas teshāṁ Vikṛitas tad-anantaram | S'eshaś cha Saṁśrayaś chaiva Bahuputraś cha vīryavān | 8.

[211] On account of a materialistic and immoral argument which had been addressed to him by Jābāli to induce him to disregard his deceased father's arrangements regarding the succession to the throne. See Journ. Roy. As. Soc. vol. xix. pp. 303 ff.

[212] The name Ikshvāku occurs in R. V. x. 60, 4. See Professor Max Müller's article in Journ. Roy. As. Soc. for 1866, pp. 451 and 462.

Sthāṇur Marīchir Atriś cha Kratuś chaiva mahābalaḥ | Pulastyaś chāṅgirāś chaiva Prachetāḥ Pulahas tathā | 9. Daksho Vivasvān aparo 'rishṭanemiś cha Rāghava | Kaśyapaś cha mahatejās teshām āsīch cha paśchimaḥ | 10. Prajāpates tu Dakshasya babhūvur iti viśrutāḥ | shashṭir duhitaro Rāma yaśasvinyo mahāyasāḥ | 11. Kaśyapaḥ pratijagrāha tāsām ashṭau sumadhyamāḥ | Aditiṁ cha Ditiṁ chaiva Danūm api cha Kālakām | 12. Tāmrāṁ Krodhavaśāṁ chaiva Manuṁ[213] chāpy Analām api | tās tu kanyās tataḥ prītaḥ Kaśyapaḥ punar abravīt | 13. Putrāṁs trailokya-bhartṛīn vai janayishyatha mat-samān | Aditis tan-mānāḥ Rāma Ditiścha Danūr eva cha | 14. Kālakā cha mahābāho śeshās tv amanaso[214] 'bhavan | Adityāṁ jajnire devās trayastriṁśad arindama | 15. Ādityā Vasavo Rudrā Aśvinau cha parantapa | . . . . 29. Manur manushyān janayat Kāśyapasya mahātmanaḥ | brāhmaṇān kshattriyān vaiśyān śūdrāṅś cha manujarshabha | 30. Mukhato brāhmaṇā jātāḥ urasaḥ kshattriyās tathā | ūrubhyāṁ jajnire vaiśyāḥ padbhyāṁ śūdrā iti śrutiḥ | 31. Sarvān puṇya-phalān vṛikshān Analā 'pi vyajāyata |

"5. Having heard the words of Rāma, the bird (Jaṭāyus) made known to him his own race, and himself, and the origin of all beings. 6. 'Listen while I declare to you from the commencement all the Prajāpatis (lords of creatures) who came into existence in the earliest time. 7. Kardama was the first, then Vikṛita, Śesha, Samśraya, the energetic Bahuputra, (8) Sthāṇu, Marīchi, Atri, the strong Kratu, Pulastya, Angiras, Prachetas, Pulaha, (9) Daksha, then Vivasvat, Arishṭanemi, and the glorious Kaśyapa, who was the last. 10. The Prajāpati Daksha is famed to have had sixty daughters. 11. Of these Kaśyapa took in marriage eight elegant maidens, Aditi, Diti, Danū, Kālakā, (12) Tāmrā, Krodhavaśā, Manu,[215] and Analā. Kaśyapa, pleased, then said to these maids, (13) 'ye shall bring forth sons like to me, preservers of the three worlds.' Aditi, Diti, Danū, (14) and Kālakā assented; but the others did not agree. Thirty-three gods were borne by Aditi, the Ādityas, Vasus, Rudras, and the two Aśvins." [The following verses 15–28 detail the offspring of Diti, Danū, Kālakā, Tāmrā, Krodhavaśā, as well as of Kraunchī, Bhāsī, Śyenī, Dhṛitarāshṭrī, and Śukī the daughters of Kālakā, and of the daughters of Krodhavaśā. (Compare the Mahābharata, i. 2620–2635; and Wilson's Vishṇu Purāṇa, vol. ii. pp. 72 f.) After this we come upon Manu and the creation of mankind.] "29. Manu, (wife) of Kaśyapa,[216] produced men, Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and Śūdras. 30. 'Brāhmans were born from the mouth, Kshattriyas from the breast, Vāiśyas from the thighs, and Śūdras from the feet,' so says the Veda. 31. Analā gave birth to all trees with pure fruits."

[213] Balām Atibalām api.—Gorr. [214] Manoratha-hīnāḥ.—Comm.

[215] I should have doubted whether Manu could have been the right reading here, but that it occurs again in verse 29, where it is in like manner followed in verse 31 by Analā, so that it would certainly seem that the name Manu is intended to stand for a female, the daughter of Daksha. The Gauḍa recension, followed by Signor Gorresio (iii. 20, 12), adopts an entirely different reading at the end of the line, viz. Balām Atibalām api, "Balā and Atibalā," instead of Manu and Analā. I see that Professor Roth s.v. adduces the authority of the Amara Kosha and of the Commentator on Pāṇini for stating that the word sometimes means "the wife of Manu." In the following text of the Mahābhārata i. 2553, also, Manu appears to be the name of a female: Anavadyām Manuṁ Vaṁśām Asurām Mārgaṇapriyām | Anūpām Subhagām Bhāsīm iti Prādhā vyajāyata | "Prādhā (daughter of Daksha) bore Anavadyā, Manu, Vaṁśā, Asurā, Mārgaṇapriyā, Anūpā, Subhagā, and Bhāsī.

It is singular to observe that in this passage, after having represented men of all castes as sprung from Manu, the writer next adds a verse to state, on the authority of the Veda, that the different castes were produced from the different parts of the body out of which they issued. Unless Manu's body be here meant, there is a contradiction between the two statements. If Manu's body is meant, the assertion conflicts with the common account. And if the Manu here mentioned is, as appears from the context, a woman, we should naturally conclude that her offspring was born in the ordinary way; especially as she is said to have been one of the wives of Kaśyapa.

The next passage from the Uttara Kāṇḍa of the Rāmāyaṇa, 74, 8 f., describes the condition of men in the Kṛita age, and the subsequent introduction of the caste system in the Tretā. The description purports to have been occasioned by an incident which had occurred just before. A Brāhman had come to the door of Rāma's palace in Ayodhyā, carrying the body of his dead son,[217] and bewailing his loss, the blame [216] The text reads Kāśyapa, "a descendant of Kāśyapa," who, according to Rām. ii. 110, 6, ought to be Vivasvat. But as it is stated in the preceding part of this passage iii. 14, 11 f. that Manu was one of Kāśyapa's eight wives, we must here read Kāśyapa. The Gauḍa recension reads (iii. 20, 30) Manur manushyāṁś cha tathā janayāmāsa Rāghava, instead of the corresponding line in the Bombay edition.

[217] The boy is said, in 73, 5, to have been aprāpta-yauvanam bālam pancha-varsha-sahasrakam | "a boy of five thousand years who had not attained to puberty!" The Commentator says that varsha here means not a year, but a day (varsha-śabdo 'tra of which (as he was himself unconscious of any fault) he attributed to some misconduct on the part of the king. Rāma in consequence convoked his councillors, when the divine sage Nārada spoke as follows:

8. Śṛiṇu rājan yathā 'kāle prāpto bālasya sankshayaḥ | śrutvā karttavyatāṁ rājan kurushva Raghunandana | 9. purā kṛita-yuge rājan brāhmaṇā vai tapasvinaḥ | 10. Abrāhmaṇas tadā rājan na tapasvī kathanchana | tasmin yuge prajvalite brahmabhūte tv anāvṛite | 11. Amṛityavas tadā sarve jajnire dīrgha-darśinaḥ | tatas tretā-yugaṁ nāma mānavānāṁ vapushmatām | 12. Kshattriyā yatra jāyante pūrveṇa tapasā 'nvitāḥ | vīryyeṇa tapasā chaiva te 'dhikāḥ pūrva-janmani | mānavā ye mahātmānas tatra tretā-yuge yuge | 13. Brahma kshattraṁ cha tat sarvaṁ yat pūrvam avaraṁ cha yat | yugayor ubhayor asīt sama-vīryya-samanvitam | 14. Apaśyantas tu te sarve viśesham adhikaṁ tataḥ | sthāpanaṁ chakrire tatra chāturvarṇyasya sammatam | 15. Tasmin yuge prajvalite dharmabhūte hy anāvṛite | adharmaḥ pādam ekaṁ tu pātayat pṛithivītale | . . . . 19. Pātite tv anṛite tasminn adharmeṇa mahītale | śubhāny evācharal lokaḥ satya-dharma-parāyaṇaḥ | 20. Tretā-yuge cha varttante brāhmaṇāḥ kshattriyāś cha ye | tapo 'tapyanta te sarve śuśrūshām apare janāḥ | 21. Sva-dharmaḥ paramas teshāṁ vaiśya-śūdraṁ tadā "gamat | pūjāṁ cha sarva-varṇānāṁ śūdrāś chakrur viśeshataḥ | . . . . . 23. Tataḥ pādam adharmasya dvitīyam avātārayat | tato dvāpara-sankhyā sā yugasya samajāyata | 24. Tasmin dvāparā-sankhye tu varttamāne yuga-kshaye | adharmaś chānritaṁ chaiva vavṛidhe purusharshabha | 25. Asmin dvāpara-sankhyāte tapo vaiśyān samāviśat | tribhyo yugebhyas trīn varṇān kramād vai tapa āviśat | 26. Tribhyo yugebhyas trīn varṇān dharmaścha parinishṭhitaḥ | na śūdro labhate dharmaṁ yugatas tu nararshabha | 27. Hīna-varṇo nṛipa-śreshṭha tapyate sumahat tapaḥ | bhavishyachchhūdrayonyāṁ hi tapaś-charyā kalau yuge | 28. adharmaḥ paramo rājan dvāpare śūdra-janmanaḥ | sa vai vishaya-paryante tava rājan mahātapāḥ | 29. Adya tapyati durbuddhis tena bāla-badho hy ayam |

Nārada speaks: 8. "Hear, o king, how the boy's untimely death occurred: and having heard the truth regarding what ought to be dinaparaḥ),—just as it does in the ritual prescription that a man should perform a sacrifice lasting a thousand years ("sahasra-saṁvatsaraṁ satram upāsīta" iti vat),—and that thus some interpreters made out the boy's age to be sixteen, and others under fourteen. But this would be a most unusual mode of reckoning age.

done, do it. 9. Formerly, in the Kṛita age, Brāhmans alone practised austere fervour (tapas). 10. None who was not a Brāhman did so in that enlightened age, instinct with divine knowledge (or, with Brahma), unclouded (by darkness). 11. At that period all were born immortal, and far-sighted. Then (came) the Tretā age, the era of embodied men, (12) in which the Kshattriyas were born, distinguished still by their former austere fervour; although those men who were great in the Tretā age had been greater, both in energy and austere fervour, in the former birth. 13. All the Brāhmaṇs and Kshattriyas, both the former and the later, were of equal energy in both Yugas.[218] 14. But not perceiving any more distinction (between the then existing men) they all[219] next established the approved system of the four castes. 15. Yet in that enlightened age, instinct with righteousness, unclouded (by darkness), unrighteousness planted one foot upon the earth." [After some other remarks (verses 16–18), which are in parts obscure, the writer proceeds:] 19. "But, although this falsehood had been planted upon the earth by unrighteousness, the people, devoted to true righteousness, practised salutary observances. 20. Those Brāhmans and Kshattriyas who lived in the Tretā practised austere fervour, and the rest of mankind obedience. 21. (The principle that) their own duty was the chief thing pervaded the Vaiśyas and Śūdras among them: and the Śūdras especially paid honour to all the (other) classes. . . . . 23. Next the second foot of unrighteousness was planted on the earth, and the number of the Dvāpara (the third yuga) was produced. 24. When this deterioration of the age numbered as the Dvāpara, had come into existence, [218] The Commentator says, this means that in the Kṛita age the Brāhmans were superior, and the Kshattriyas inferior (as the latter had not then the prerogative of practising tapas), but that in the Tretā both classes were equal (ubhayor yugayor madhye kṛita-yuge brahma pūrvam tapo-vīryābhyām utkṛishṭam kshattraṁ chāvaraṁ cha tābhyāṁ tapo-vīryābhyāṁ nyūnam āsīt | tat sarvam brahma-kshattra-rūpam ubhayam tretāyām sama-vīrya-samanvitam āsīt | kṛite kshattriyānām tapasy anadhikārāt tadyugīyebhyo brāhmaṇebhyas teshām nyūnatā | tretāyām tu ubhayo rapi tapo-'dhikārād ubhāv api tapo-vīryābhyām samau | But in the previous verse (12) it is said that the Kshattriyas were born in the Tretā distinguished by their former tapas. But perhaps they were formerly Brahmans, according to verses 9, 10, and 12.

[219] Manu and other legislators of that age, according to the Commentator (Manvādayaḥ sarve tātkālikāḥ dharma-pravarttanādhikṛitāḥ). He adds that in the Kṛita age all the castes were spontaneously devoted to their several duties, although no fixed system had been prescribed (kṛite tu vinaiva sthāpanam svayam eva 'sarve varṇāḥ sva-sva-dharma-ratāḥ).

unrighteousness and falsehood increased. 25. In this age, numbered as the Dvāpara, austere fervour entered into the Vaiśyas. Thus in the course of three ages it entered into three castes; (26) and in the three ages righteousness (dharma) was established in three castes. But the Śūdra does not attain to righteousness through the (lapse of these three) ages. 27. A man of low caste performs a great act of austere fervour. Such observance will belong to the future race of Śūdras in the Kali age, (28) but is unrighteous in the extreme if practised by that caste in the Dvāpara. On the outskirts of thy territory such a foolish person, of intense fervour, is practising austerity. Hence this slaughter of the boy."

Here then was a clue to the mystery of the young Brāhman's death. A presumptuous Śūdra, paying no regard to the fact that in the age[220] in which he lived the prerogative of practising self-mortification had not yet descended to the humble class to which he belonged, had been guilty of seeking to secure a store of religious merit by its exercise. Rāma mounts his car Pushpaka, makes search in different regions, and at length comes upon a person who was engaged in the manner alleged. The Śūdra, on being questioned, avows his caste, and his desire to conquer for himself the rank of a god by the self-mortification he was undergoing. Rāma instantly cuts off the offender's head. The gods applaud the deed, and a shower of flowers descends from the sky upon the vindicator of righteousness. Having been invited to solicit a boon from the gods, he asks that the Brāhman boy may be resuscitated, and is informed that he was restored to life at the same moment when the Śūdra was slain. (Sections 75 and 76.)[221]

The following curious account of the creation of mankind, among whom it states that no distinction of class (or colour) originally existed, is given in the Uttara Kānda, xxx. 19 ff., where Brahmā says to Indra:

Amarendra mayā buddhyā prajāḥ sṛishṭās tathā prabho | eka-varṇāḥ sama-bhāshā eka-rūpāś cha sarvaśaḥ | 20. Tāsāṁ nāsti viśesho hi darśane lakshaṇe 'pi vā | tato 'ham ekāgramanās tāḥ prajāḥ samachintayam | 21. So 'ham tāsāṁ viśeshārtham striyam ekām vinirmame | yad yat prajānām pratyangam viśishṭaṁ tat tad uddhṛitam | 22. Tato mayā

[220] The Tretā, according to the Commentator.

[221] See the Rev. Professor Banerjea's Dialogues on the Hindu philosophy, pp. 44 ff., where attention had previously been drawn to the story.

rūpa-guṇair ahalyā strī vinirmitā | halam nāmeha vairūpyaṁ halyaṁ tat-prabhavam bhavet | 23. Yasyā na vidyate halyam tenāhalyeti viśrutā | Ahalyety eva cha mayā tasyā nāma prakīrttitam | 24. Nirmitāyāṁ cha devendra tasyām nāryāṁ surarshabha | bhavishyatīti kasyaishā mama chintā tato 'bhavat | 25. Tvaṁ tu Śakra tadā nārīṁ jānīshe manasā prabho | sthānādhikatayā patnī mamaisheti purandara | 26. Sa mayā nyāsa-bhūtā tu Gautamasya mahātmanaḥ | nyastā bahūni varshāṇi tena niryātitā cha ha | 27. Tatas tasya parijnāya mahāsthairyam mahāmuneḥ | jnātvā tapasi siddhiṁ cha patny-arthaṁ sparśitā tadā | 28. Sa tayā saha dharmātmā ramate sma mahāmuniḥ | āsan nirāśā devās tu Gautame dattayā tayā | 29. Tvaṁ kruddhas tv iha kāmātmā gatvā tasyāśramam muneḥ | dṛishṭavāṁś cha tadā tām strīṁ dīptām agniśikhām iva | 30. Sā tvayā dharshitā Śakra kāmārttena samanyunā | dṛishṭas tvaṁ cha tadā tena āśrame paramarshiṇā | 31. Tataḥ kruddhena tenāsi śaptaḥ paramatejasā | gato 'si yena devendra daśā-bhāga-viparyayam |

"19. O chief of the immortals (Indra) all creatures were formed by my will of one class (or colour), with the same speech, and uniform in every respect. 20. There was no distinction between them in appearance, or in characteristic marks. I then intently reflected on these creatures. 21. To distinguish between them I fashioned one woman. Whatever was most excellent in the several members of different creatures was taken from them, (22) and with this (aggregate) I formed a female, faultless in beauty and in all her qualities. Hala means 'ugliness,' and halya, 'what is produced from ugliness.' 23. The woman in whom there is no halya, is called Ahalyā. And this was her name to which I gave currency. 24. When this female had been fashioned, I anxiously considered to whom she should belong. 25. Thou, Indra, didst, from the eminence of thy rank, determine in thy mind, 'She must be my spouse.' 26. I, however, gave her in trust to the great Gautama; and after having retained her in charge for many years, he restored her. 27. Knowing then the great steadfastness of that distinguished Muni, and the perfection of his austere fervour, I, in due form, gave her to him for his wife. 28. The holy sage lived with her in the enjoyment of connubial love. But the gods were filled with despair when she had been given away to Gautama. 29. And thou, Indra, angry, as well as inflamed with lust, wentest to the Muni's hermitage, and didst behold that female brilliant as the flame of fire. 30. She was then corrupted by thee who wert tormented by lust, as well as heated by anger.[222] But thou wert then seen by the eminent rishi in the hermitage, (31) and cursed by that glorious being in his indignation. Thou didst in consequence fall into a reverse of condition and fortune," etc., etc.

SECT. XI.—Extracts from the Mahābhārata on the same subjects.

The first passage which I shall adduce is from the Ādi Parvan, or first book, verses 2517 ff.:

Vaiśampāyana uvācha | hanta te kathayishyāmi namaskṛitya Svayambhuve | surādīnām ahaṁ samyak lokānām prabhavāpyayam | Brahmaṇo mānasāḥ putrāḥ viditāḥ shaṇ-maharshayaḥ | Marīchir Atry-angirasau Pulastyaḥ Pulahaḥ Kratuḥ | Marīcheḥ Kaśyapaḥ putraḥ Kaśyapāt tu prajā imāḥ | prajajnire mahābhāgā Daksha-kanyās trayodaśa | 2520. Aditir Ditir Danuḥ Kālā Danāyuḥ Siṁhikā tathā | Krodhā Pradhā eha Viśvā cha Vinatā Kapilā Muniḥ | Kadrūś cha manujavyāghra Daksha-kanyaiva Bhārata | etāsāṁ vīrya-sampannam putra-pautram anantakam |

"Vaiśampayana said: I shall, after making obeisance to Svayambhū, relate to thee exactly the production and destruction of the gods and other beings. Six[223] great rishis are known as the mind-born sons

[222] In regard to this story of Indra and Ahalyā, as well as to that of Brahmā and his daughter, above referred to, see the explanation given by Kumārila Bhatta, as quoted by Professor Max Müller in his Hist. of Anc. Sansk. Lit. p. 529 f. The name of Ahalyā is there allegorically interpreted of the night, to which this name is said to have been given because it is absorbed in the day (ahani līyamānatayā). Indra is the sun.

[223] Another passage (S'ānti-p. 7569 ff.) raises the number of Brahmā's sons to seven by adding Vasishṭha: Ekaḥ Svayambhūr bhagavān ādyo Brahmā sanātanaḥ | Brahmaṇaḥ sapta vai putrā mahātmānaḥ Svayambhuvaḥ | Marīchir Atry-Angirasau Pulastyaḥ Pulahaḥ Kratuḥ | Vaśishṭhaś'cha mahābhāgaḥ sadṛiśo vai Svayambhuvā | sapta Brahmāṇa ity ete purāṇe niśchayaṁ gatāḥ | "There is one primeval eternal lord, Brahmā Svayambhū; who had seven great sons, Marīchi, Atri, Angiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, and Vasishṭha, who was like Svayambhū. These are the seven Brahmās who have been ascertained in the Puranic records." In another part of the same S'āntiparvan, verses 12685 ff., however, the Prajāpatis are increased to twenty-one: Brahmā Sthāṇur Manur Daksho Bhṛigur Dharmas tathā Yamaḥ | Marīchir Angirā 'triścha Pulastyaḥ Pulahaḥ Kratuḥ | Vaśishṭhaḥ Parameshṭhī cha Vivasvān Soma eva cha | Kardamaś chāpi yaḥ proktaḥ Krodho Vikṛīta eva cha | ekaviṁśatir utpannās te prajāpatayaḥ smṛitāḥ | "There are reputed to have been twenty-one Prajāpatis produced, viz. Brahmā, Sthāṇu, Manu, Daksha, Bhṛigu, Dharma, Yama, Marīchi, of Brahmā, viz., Marīchi, Atri, Angiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, and Kratu. Kaśyapa was the son of Marīchi; and from Kaśyapa sprang these creatures. There were born to Daksha thirteen daughters of eminent rank, (2520) Aditi, Diti, Danu, Kālā, Danāyu, Simhikā, Krodhā, Pradhā, Viśvā, Vinatā, Kapilā, and Muni.[224] Kadrū also was of the number. These daughters had valorous sons and grandsons innumerable."

Daksha, however, had other daughters, as we learn further on in verses 2574 ff., where the manner of his own birth also is related:

Dakshas tv ajāyatāngushṭhād dakshiṇād bhagavān ṛishiḥ | Brahmaṇaḥ pṛithivīpāla śāntātmā sumahātapāḥ | vāmād ajāyatāngushṭhād bhāryā tasya mahātmanaḥ | tasyām panchāśatam kanyāḥ sa evājanayad muniḥ | . . . . 2577. Dadau cha daśa Dharmāya saptaviṁśatim Indave | divyena vidhina rājan Kaśyapāya trayodaśa | . . . . . 2581. Paitāmahaḥ Manur devas tāsya putraḥ prajāpatiḥ | tasyāshṭau Vasavaḥ putrās teshām vakshyāmi vistaram | . . . . . 2595. Stanaṁ tu dakshiṇam bhitvā Brahmaṇo nara-vigrahaḥ | nissṛito bhagavān Dharmaḥ sarva-loka-sukhāvahaḥ | trayas tasya varāḥ putrāḥ sarva-bhūta-manoharāḥ | S'amaḥ Kāmaś cha Harshaś cha tejasā loka-dhāriṇaḥ | . . . . . 2610. Ārushī to Manoḥ kanyā tasya patnī manīshiṇaḥ | . . . . . 2614. Dvau putrau Brahmaṇas tv anyau yayos tishṭhati lakshaṇam | loke Dhātā Vidhātā cha yau sthitau Manunā saha | tayor eva svasā devī Lakshmī padma-gṛihā śubhā | tasyās tu mānasāḥ putrās turagāḥ vyoma-chāriṇaḥ | . . . . . 2617. Prajānām annakāmānām anyonya-paribhakshaṇāt | Adharmas tatra sanjātaḥ sarva-bhūta-vināśakaḥ | tasyāpi Nirṛitir bhāryā nairṛitā yena Rākshasāḥ | ghorās tasyās trayaḥ putrāḥ pāpa-karma-ratāḥ sadā | Bhayo Mahābhayas chaiva Mṛityur bhūtāntakas tathā | na tasya bhāryā putro vā kaśchid asty antako hi saḥ |

Angiras, Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, Vasishṭha, Parameshṭhin, Vivasvat, Soma, the person called Kardama, Krodha, and Vikrīta." (Here, however, only twenty names are specified including Brahmā himself.) Compare this list with those quoted above, p. 116, from the Rāmāyaṇa, iii. 14, 7 ff., from Manu in p. 36, and from the Vishṇu P. in p. 65.

[224] That Muni is a name, and not an epithet, is shown (1) by the fact that we have otherwise only twelve names; and (2) by her descendants, both gods and gandharvas, being afterwards enumerated in verses 2550 ff. (ity ete deva-gandharvā Mauneyāḥ parikīrttitāḥ). Kapilā, another of the thirteen daughters of Daksha is said to have been the mother of Ambrosia, Brāhmans, kine, Gandharvas and Apsarasas (amṛitam brāhmaṇā gāvo gandharvāpsarasas tathā | apatyam kapilāyās tu purāṇe parikīrtitam |).

"2574. Daksha, the glorious rishi, tranquil in spirit, and great in austere fervour, sprang from the right thumb of Brahmā.[225] From the left thumb sprang that great Muni's wife, on whom he begot fifty[226] daughters. Of these he gave ten to Dharma, twenty-seven to Indu (Soma),[227] and according to the celestial system, thirteen to Kaśyapa." I proceed with some other details given in the verses I have extracted: 2581. "Pitāmaha's descendant, Manu, the god and the lord of creatures, was his (it does not clearly appear whose) son. The eight Vasus, whom I shall detail, were his sons. . . . . 2595. Dividing the right breast of Brahmā, the glorious Dharma (Righteousness), issued in a human form, bringing happiness to all people. He had three eminent sons, Sama, Kāma, and Harsha (Tranquillity, Love, and Joy), who are the delight of all creatures, and by their might support the world. . . . . 2610. Arushī, the daughter of Manu, was the wife of that sage (Chyavana, son of Bhrigu). . . . . 2614. There are two other sons of Brahmā, whose mark remains in the world, Dhātṛi,[228] and Vidhātṛi, who remained with Manu. Their sister was the beautiful goddess Lakshmī,[229] whose home is in the lotus. Her mind-born sons are the steeds who move in the sky. . . . . 2617. When the creatures who were desirous of food, had devoured one another, Adharma (Unrighteousness) was produced, the destroyer of all beings. His wife was Nirṛiti, and hence the Rākshasas are called Nairṛitas, or the offspring of Nirṛiti. She had three dreadful sons, continually addicted to evil deeds, Bhaya Mahābhaya (Fear and Terror) and Mṛityu (Death) the ender of beings. He has neither wife, nor any son, for he is the ender."[230]

The next passage gives a different account of the origin of Daksha; and describes the descent of mankind from Manu:

Adip. 3128. Tejobhir uditāḥ sarve maharshi-sama-tejasaḥ | daśa Pra-

[225] See above, p. 72 f. The Matsya P. also states that Daksha sprang from Brahmā's right thumb, Dharma from his nipple, Kāma from his heart, etc.

[226] The passage of the Rāmāyaṇa, quoted above, p. 116, affirms that they were sixty in number. Compare Wilson's Vishṇu P. vol. i. pp. 109 ff., and vol. ii. pp. 19 ff.

[227] The Taitt. Sanhitā, ii. 3, 5, 1, says Prajāpati had thirty-three daughters, whom he gave to King Soma (Prajāpates trayastriṁśad duhitara āsan | tāḥ Somāya rājne 'dadāt).

[228] Dhātṛi had been previously mentioned, in verse 2523, as one of the sons of Aditi. See also Wilson's Vishṇu P. ii. 152.

[229] See Wilson's Vishṇu P. i. pp. 109, 118 ff., 144 ff. and 152.

[230] The Vishṇu P. (Wilson, i. 112) says he had five children.

chetasaḥ putrāḥ santaḥ punya-janāḥ smṛitāḥ | mukhajenāgninā yais te pūrvaṁ dagdhā mahaujasaḥ | tebhyaḥ Prāchetaso jajne Daksho Dakshād imāḥ prajāḥ | sambhūtāḥ purusha-vyāghra sa hi loka-pitāmahaḥ | Vīriṇyā saha sangamya Dakshaḥ Prāchetaso muniḥ | ātma-tulyān ajanayat sahasraṁ śaṁsita-vratān | sahasra-sankhyān sambhūtān Daksha-putrāṁś cha Nāradaḥ | moksham adhyāpayāmāsa sānkhya-jnānam anuttamam | tataḥ panchāśataṁ kanyāḥ putrikāḥ abhisandadhe | Prajāpatiḥ prajāḥ Dakshaḥ sisṛikshur Janamejaya | dadau cha daśa Dharmāya Kaśyapāya trayodaśa | kālasya nayane yuktāḥ saptaviṁśatim Indave | 3135. Trayodaśānām patnīnām yā tu Dākshāyaṇī varā | Mārīchaḥ Kaśyapas tasyām Ādityān samajījanat | Indrādīn vīryya-sampannān Vivasvantam athāpi cha | Vivasvataḥ suto jajne Yamo Vaivasvataḥ prabhuḥ | Mārtaṇḍasya Manur dhīmān ajāyata sutaḥ prabhuḥ | Yamaś chāpi suto jajne khyātas tasyānujaḥ prabhuḥ | dharmātmā sa Manur dhīmān yatra vaṁśaḥ pratishṭhitaḥ | Manor vaṁśo mānavānām tato 'yam prathito 'bhavat | brahma-kshatrādayas tasmād Manor jātās tu mānavāḥ | tato 'bhavad mahārāja brahma kshattreṇa sangatam | 3140. Brāhmaṇā mānavās teshām sāngam vedam adhārayan | Venam Dhṛishṇuṁ Narishyantam Nābhāgekshvākum eva cha | Kārūsham atha Śāryatiṁ tathā chaivāshṭamīm Ilām | Pṛishadhraṁ navamam prāhuḥ kshattra-dharma-parāyaṇam | Nābhāgāriśhṭa-daśamān Manoḥ putrān prachakshate | pañchāśat tu Manoḥ putrās tathaivānye 'bhavan kshitau | anyonya-bhedāt te sarve vineśur iti naḥ śrutam | Purūravas tato vidvān Ilāyaṁ samapadyata | sā vai tasyābhavad mātā pitā chaiveti naḥ śrutam |

"3128. Born all with splendour, like that of great rishis, the ten sons of Prachetas are reputed to have been virtuous and holy; and by them the glorious beings[231] were formerly burnt up by fire springing from their mouths. From them was born Daksha Prāchetasa;[232] and from Daksha, the Parent of the world (were produced), these creatures. Cohabiting with Vīriṇī, the Muni Daksha begot a thousand sons like himself, famous for their religious observances, to whom Nārada taught the doctrine of final liberation, the unequalled knowledge of the Sānkhya. Desirous of creating offspring, the Prajāpati Daksha next formed fifty daughters, of whom he gave ten to Dharma, thirteen to Kaśyapa, and twenty-seven, devoted to the regulation of time,[233] to Indu (Soma). . . . . 3135. On Dākshāyanī,[234] the most excellent of his thirteen wives, Kaśyapa, the son of Marīchi, begot the Ādityas, headed by Indra and distinguished by their energy, and also Vivasvat.[235] To Vivasvat was born a son, the mighty Yama Vaivasvata. To Mārtaṇḍa (i.e. Vivasvat, the Sun) was born the wise and mighty Manu, and also the renowned Yama, his (Manu's) younger brother. Righteous was this wise Manu, on whom a race was founded. Hence this (family) of men became known as the race of Manu. Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, and other men sprang from this Manu. From him, o king, came the Brāhman conjoined with the Kshattriya. 3140. Among them the Brāhmans, children of Manu, held the Veda with the Vedāngas. The children of Manu are said to have been Vena, Dhṛishṇu, Narishyanta, Nābhāga, Ikshvāku, Kārusha, Śaryāti, Ilā the eight, Pṛishadra the ninth, who was addicted to the duties of a Kshattriya, and Nābhāgārishṭa the tenth. Manu had also fifty other sons; but they all, as we have heard, perished in consequence of mutual dissensions. Subsequently the wise Purūravas was born of Ilā, who, we heard, was both his mother and his father."

[231] "Trees and plants," according to the Commentator (mahāprabhāvā vṛikshaushadhayāḥ). Compare Wilson's Vishṇu P. ii. p. 1.

[232] The same account of Daksha's birth is given in the Śāntip. 7573: Daśānāṁ tanayas tv eko Daksho nāma prajāpatiḥ | tasya dve nāmanī loke Dakshaḥ Ka iti chochyate | "These ten Prachetases had one son called Daksha, the lord of creatures. He is commonly called by two names, Daksha and Ka." (Compare vol. iv. of this work, p. 13, note 30, and p. 24; and the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, vii. 4, 1, 19, and ii. 4, 4, 1, there quoted.) The following verse 7574 tells us that Kaśyapa also had two names, the other being Arishṭanemi. See Rām. iii. 14, 9, quoted above.

The tradition, followed in this passage, which assigns to all the castes one common ancestor, removed by several stages from the creator, is, of course, in conflict with the account which assigns to them a fourfold descent from the body of Brahmā himself.

The Śāntiparvan, verses 2749 ff., contains an account of the origin of castes which has evidently proceeded from an extreme assertor of the dignity of the Brahmanical order. The description given of the prerogatives of the priestly class is precisely in the style, and partly in almost the identical words, of the most extravagant declarations of [233] This phrase kālasya nayane yuktāḥ had previously occurred in verse 2580, where it is followed by the words sarvā nakshatra-yoginyo loka-yātrā-vidhānataḥ | "all identified with the lunar asterisms, and appointed to regulate the life of men." See also Vishṇu P. i. 15, 56, and Professor Wilson's translation ii. p. 10, note 1, and p. 28, note 1.

[234] i.e. Aditi. See verses 2520, 2522, and 2600 of this same book.

[235] The account in the Rāmāyaṇa, ii. 110, 5 ff., agrees with this in making Kaśyapa son of Marīchi, and father of Vivasvat.

Manu (i. 99 f.) on the same subject. In other places, however, the Mahābhārata contains explanations of a very different character regarding the origin of the distinctions, social and professional, which prevailed at the period of its composition. A comparison of these various passages will afford an illustration of the fact already intimated in p. 6,[236] that this gigantic poem is made up of heterogeneous elements, the products of different ages, and representing widely different dogmatical tendencies, the later portions having been introduced by successive editors of the work to support their own particular views, without any regard to their inconsistency with its earlier contents. In fact, a work so vast, the unaided compilation of which would have taxed all the powers of a Didymus Chalkenterus, could scarcely have been created in any other way than that of gradual accretion. And some supposition of this kind is certainly necessary in order to explain such discrepancies as will be found between the passages I have to quote, of which the three first are the productions of believers (real or pretended) in the existence of a natural distinction between their own Brahmanical order and the other classes of the community, while the two by which these three are followed have emanated from fair and moderate writers who had rational views of the essential unity of mankind, and of the superiority of moral and religious character to any factitious divisions of a social description.

In the first passage, Bhīshma, the great uncle of the Pāndus, when describing to Yudhishthira the duties of kings, introduces one of those ancient stories which are so frequently appealed to in the Mahābhārata. Without a minute study of the poem it would be difficult to say whether these are ever based on old traditions, or are anything more than mere vehicles invented to convey the individual views of the writers who narrate them. Bhīshma says, Śāntiparvan, 2749 :

Ya eva tu sato rakshed asataś cha nivarttayet | sa eva rājnā karttavyo rājan rāja-purohitaḥ | 2750. Atrāpy udāharantīmam itihāsam purātanam | Purūravasa Ailasya saṁvādam Mātariśvanaḥ | Purūravā uvācha | Kutaḥ svid brāhmaṇo jāta varṇāś chāpi kutas trayaḥ | kasmāchcha bhavati śreshṭhas tan me vyākhyātum arhasi | Mātariśvovācha | Brahmaṇo mukhataḥ sṛishṭo brāhmaṇo rāja-sattama | bāhubhyāṁ kshattriyaḥ sṛishṭa ūrubhyāṁ vaiśya eva cha | varṇānām parichāryyārtham trayāṇām Bha-

[236] See also the fourth volume of this work, pp. 141 ff. and 152.

ratarshabha | varṇaś chaturthaḥ sambhūtaḥ padbhyām śūdro vinirmitaḥ | brāhmaṇo jāyamāno hi pṛithivyām anujāyate[237] | īśvaraḥ sarva-bhūtānām dharma-koshasya guptaye | 2755. Ataḥ pṛithivyā yantāram kshattriyaṁ daṇḍa-dhāraṇe | dvitīyam Daṇḍam akarot prajānām anutṛiptaye | vaiśyas tu dhana-dhānyena trīn varṇān bibhṛiyād imān | śūdro hy etān parichared iti Brahmānuśāsanam | Aila uvācha | dvijasya kshattrabandhor vā kasyeyam pṛithivī bhavet | dharmataḥ saha vittena samyag Vāyo prachakshva me | Vāyur uvācha | viprasya sarvam evaitad yat kinchij jagatīgatam | jyeshṭhenābhijaneneha tad dharma-kuśalā viduḥ | svam eva brāhmaṇo bhunkte svam vaste svaṁ dadāti cha | gurur hi sarva-varṇānāṁ jyeshṭhaḥ śreshṭhaś cha vai dvijaḥ | 2760. Paty-abhāve yathaiva strī devaram kurute patim | esha te prathamaḥ kalpaḥ āpady anyo bhaved ataḥ |

"2749. The king should appoint to be his royal priest[238] a man who will protect the good, and restrain the wicked. 2750. On this subject they relate this following ancient story of a conversation between Purūravas the son of Ilā, and Mātariśvan (Vāyu, the Wind-god). Purūravas said: You must explain to me whence the Brāhman, and whence the (other) three castes were produced, and whence the superiority (of the first) arises. Mātariśvan answered: The Brāhman was created from Brahmā's mouth, the Kshattriya from his arms, the Vaiśya from his thighs, while for the purpose of serving these three castes was produced the fourth class, the Śūdra, fashioned from his feet. The Brāhman, as soon as born, becomes the lord of all beings upon the earth, for the purpose of protecting the treasure of righteousness. 2755. Then (the creator) constituted the Kshattriya the controuler of the earth, a second Yama to bear the rod, for the satisfaction of the people. And it was Brahmā's ordinance that the Vaiśya should sustain these three classes with money and grain, and that the Śūdra should serve them. The son of Ilā then enquired: Tell me, Vāyu, to whom the earth, with its wealth, rightfully belongs, to the Brāhman or the Kshattriya? Vāyu replied: All this, whatever exists in the world, is the Brāhman's property[239] by right of primogeniture: this is known to those who are skilled in the laws of duty. It is his own which the Brāhman eats, puts on, and bestows. He is the chief of all the castes, the first-born and the most excellent. Just as a woman when she has lost her (first) husband, takes her brother in law for a second; so the Brāhman is thy first resource in calamity; afterwards another may arise."

[237] Manu, i. 99, has adhi jāyate.

[238] Rāja-purohitaḥ. The king's priest (rāja-purohitaḥ) is here represented as one who should be a confidential and virtuous minister of state. Such is not, however, the character always assigned to this class of persons. In Manu xii. 46, quoted above (p. 41f.), the purohita is placed in a lower class than other Brāhmans. And in the following verse (4527) of the Anuśāsanaparvan, taken from a story in which the Rishis utter maledictions against anyone who should have stolen certain lotus roots, part of the curse spoken by Viśvāmitra is as follows: varshācharo 'stu bhṛitako rājnaś chāstu purohitaḥ | ayājyasya bhavatv ṛitvig visa-stainyaṁ karoti yaḥ | "Let the man who steals lotus roots be a hireling trafficker in rain incantations (?) and the domestic priest of a king, and the priest of one for whom no Brāhman should officiate." Again, in verse 4579, the same person says: karotu bhṛitako 'varshāṁ rājnaś chāstu purohitaḥ | ṛitvig astu hy ayājyasya yas te harati pushkaram | "Let him who steals thy lotus perform as a hireling incantations to cause drought, and be a king's domestic priest, and the priest of one for whom no Brāhman should officiate." I have had partly to guess at the sense of the words varshācharaḥ and avarshām. The Commentator does not explain the former; and interprets the latter (for which the Edinburgh MS. reads avarshāḥ) by vṛishti-nibandham, "causing drought." He adds, papishṭhāḥ eva avarshāḥ, "those who cause drought are most wicked."

A great deal is shortly afterwards added about the advantages of concord between Brāhmans and Kshattriyas. Such verses as the following (2802): "From the dissensions of Brāhmans and Kshattriyas the people incur intolerable suffering" (mitho bhedād brāhmaṇa-kshattriyāṇām prajā duḥkhaṁ dussahaṁ chāviśanti) afford tolerably clear evidence that the interests of these two classes must frequently have clashed.

In the same strain as the preceding passage is the following:

Vanaparvan, 13436. Nādhyāpanād yājanād vā anyasmād vā pratigrahāt | dosho bhavati viprāṇāṁ jvalitāgni-samā dvijāḥ | durvedā vā suvedā vā prākṛitāḥ saṁskṛitās tathā | brāhmaṇā nāvamantavyā bhasmachannā ivāgnayaḥ | yathā śmaśāne dīptavjāḥ pāvako naiva dushyati | evaṁ vidvān avidvān vā brāhmaṇo daivatam mahat | prākāraiś cha puradvāraiḥ prāsādaiś cha pṛithag-vidhaiḥ | nagarāṇi na śobhante hīnāni brāhmaṇottamaiḥ | vedādhyā vṛitta-sampannā jnānavantas tapasvinaḥ | yatra tishṭhanti vai viprās tan-nāma nagaraṁ nṛipa | vraje vā py athavā

[239] Kullūka, the Commentator on Manu (i. 100), is obliged to admit that this is only spoken in a panegyrical or hyperbolical way, and that property is here used in a figurative sense, since theft is afterwards predicated by Manu of Brāhmans as well as others ("svam" iti stutyā uchyate | svam iva svaṁ na tu svam eva | brāhmaṇasyāpi Manunā steyasya vakshyamāṇatvāt).

'ranye yatra santi bahu-śrutāḥ | tat tad nagaram ity āhuḥ pārtha tīrthaṁ cha tad bhavet |

"No blame accrues to Brāhmans from teaching or sacrificing, or from receiving money in any other way: Brāhmans are like flaming fire. Whether ill or well versed in the Veda, whether untrained or accomplished, Brāhmans must never be despised, like fires covered by ashes. Just as fire does not lose its purity by blazing even in a cemetery, so too, whether learned or unlearned, a Brāhman is a great deity. Cities are not rendered magnificent by ramparts, gates, or palaces of various kinds, if they are destitute of excellent Brāhmans. 13440. The place where Brāhmans, rich in the Veda, perfect in their conduct, and austerely fervid, reside, is (really) a city (nagara). Wherever there are men abounding in Vedic lore, whether it be a cattle-pen, or a forest, that is called a city, and that will be a sacred locality."

The following verses from the Anuśāsanap. 2160 ff. are even more extreme in their character, and are, in fact, perfectly sublime in their insolence:

Brāhmaṇānām paribhavād asurāḥ salile śayāḥ | brāhmaṇānām prasādāch cha devāḥ svarga-nivāsinaḥ | aśakyaṁ srashṭum ākāśam achālyo himavān giriḥ | adhāryyā setunā Gangā durjayā brāhmaṇā bhuvi | na brāhmaṇa-virodhena sakyā śāstuṁ vasundharā | brāhmaṇā hi mahātmāno devānām api devatāḥ | tān pūjayasva satatam dānena paricharyyayā | yadīchhasi mahīm bhoktum imām sāgara-mekhalām |

"Through the prowess of the Brāhmans the Asuras were prostrated on the waters; by the favour of the Brāhmans the gods inhabit heaven. The ether cannot be created; the mountain Himavat cannot be shaken; the Gangā cannot be stemmed by a dam; the Brāhmans cannot be conquered by any one upon earth. The world cannot be ruled in opposition to the Brāhmans; for the mighty Brāhmans are the deities even of the gods. If thou desire to possess the sea-girt earth, honour them continually with gifts and with service."

The next passage seems to be self-contradictory, as it appears to set out with the supposition that the distinction of castes arose after the creation; while it goes on to assert the separate origin of the four classes:

Śāntiparvan, 10861. Janaka uvācha | varṇo viśesha-varṇānām maharshe kena jāyate | etad ichhāmy ahaṁ jnātum tad brūhi vadatāṁ vara | yad etaj jāyate 'patyaṁ sa evāyam iti śrutiḥ | katham brāhmaṇato jāto

viśeshe grahaṇaṁ gataḥ | Parāśara uvācha | Evam etad mahārāja yena jātaḥ sa eva saḥ | tapasas tv apakarsheṇa jātigrahaṇatāṁ gataḥ | sukshetrāchcha suvījāch cha puṇyo bhavati sambhavaḥ | ato 'nyatarato hīnād avaro nāma jāyate | 10865. Vaktrād bhujābhyām ūrubhyām padbhyāṁ chaivātha jajnire | sṛijataḥ Prajāpater lokān iti dharmavido viduḥ | mukhajā brāhmaṇās tāta bāhujāḥ kshattriyāḥ smṛitāḥ | ūrujāḥ dhanino rājan pādajāḥ parichārakāḥ | chaturṇām eva varṇānām āgamaḥ purusharshabha | ato 'nye vyatiriktā ye te vai sankarajāḥ smṛitāḥ | . . . . . 10870. Janaka uvācha | Brahmaṇaikena jātānām nānātvaṁ gotrataḥ katham | bahūnīha hi loke vai gotrāṇi muni sattama | yatra tatra kathaṁ jātāḥ svayonim (? suyonim) munayo gatāḥ | śuddha-yonau samutpannā viyonau cha tathā 'pare | Parāśara uvācha | rājan naitad bhaved grāhyam apakṛishṭena janmanā | matātmanāṁ samutpattis tapasā bhāvitatmanām | utpādya putrān munayo nṛipate yatra tatra ha | svenaiva tapasā teshām ṛishitvam pradadhuḥ punaḥ | . . . . 10876. Ete svām prakṛitim prāptā Vaideha tapasośrayāt | pratishṭhitā veda-vido damena tapasaiva hi |

"Janaka asks: 10861. How, o great rishi, does the caste of the separate classes arise? Tell me, as I desire to know. According to the Veda, the offspring which is born (to any one) is the very man himself. How does offspring born of a Brāhman fall into distinct classes? Parāśara replied: It is just as you say, o great king. A son is the very same as he by whom he was begotten; but from decline of austere fervour, (men) have become included under different classes. And from good soil and good seed a pure production arises, whilst from those which are different and faulty springs an inferior production. Those acquainted with duty know that men were born from the mouth, arms, thighs, and feet of Prajāpati when he was creating the worlds. The Brāhmans sprang from his mouth, the Kshattriyas from his arms, the merchants from his thighs, and the servants from his feet. The scriptural tradition speaks only of four classes. The men not included in these are declared to have sprung from a mixture (of the four). . . . . 10870. Janaka asked: How is there a difference in race between men sprung from one and the same Brahmā? for there are now many races in the world. How have Munis born anywhere (indiscriminately) entered into a good family; some of them having sprung from a pure source and others from an inferior stock? Parāśara replied: It would not be credible that noble-minded men, whose souls had been perfected by austere fervour, should have been the offspring of a degraded birth. Munis who had begotten sons in an indiscriminate way conferred on them the position of rishis by their own austere fervour." The speaker then names a number of sages (10876) "famed for their acquaintance with the Veda, and for their self-command and austere fervour," as "having all attained to their respective conditions by practising the latter observance."

In the latter verses the speaker appears to admit, at the very moment that he denies, the degraded origin of some of the renowned saints of Indian antiquity. What else is the meaning of the verse, "Munis who had begotten sons in an indiscriminate way conferred on them the position of rishis by their own austere fervour?" No doubt it is intended to represent those as exceptional times: but while we refuse to admit this assumption, we may find some reason to suppose that the irregularities, as they were afterwards considered to be, which this assumption was intended to explain away, were really samples of the state of things which commonly prevailed in earlier ages.

The next extract declares that there is a natural distinction between the Brāhmans and the other castes; and appears to intimate that the barrier so constituted can only be overpassed when the soul re-appears in another body in another birth:

Anuśāsana-parva, 6570. Deva uvācha | Brāhmaṇyaṁ devi dushprāpyaṁ nisargād brāhmaṇaḥ śubhe | kshattriyo vaiśyaśūdrau vā nisargād iti me matiḥ | karmaṇā dushkṛiteneha sthānād bhraśyati vai dvijaḥ | jyeshṭham varṇam anuprāpya tasmād raksheta vai dvijaḥ | sthito brāhmaṇa-dharmeṇa brāhmaṇyam upajīvati | kshattriyo vā 'tha vaiśyo vā brahmabhūyam sa gachhati | yas tu brahmatvam utsṛijya kshāttraṁ dharmaṁ nishevate | brāhmaṇyāt sa paribhrashṭaḥ kshattra-yonau prajāyate | vaiśya-karma cha yo vipro lobha-moha-vyapāśrayaḥ | brāhmaṇyaṁ durlabham prāpya karoty alpa-matiḥ sadā | sa dvijo vaiśyatām eti vaiśyo vā śūdratām iyat | sva-dharmāt prachyuto vipras tataḥ śūdratvam āpnute | . . . . 6590. Ebhis tu karmabhir devi śubhair ācharitais tathā | śūdro brāhmaṇatām yāti vaiśyaḥ kshattriyatāṁ vrajet | śūdra-karmāṇi sarvāṇi yathānyāyam yathāvidhi | śuśrūshām paricharyyāṁ cha jyeshṭhe varṇe prayatnataḥ | kuryād ityādi |

Mahādeva says: 6570. "Brāhmanhood, o fair goddess, is difficult to

be attained. A man, whether he be a Brāhman, Kshattriya, Vaiśya, or Śūdra, is such by nature; this is my opinion. By evil deeds a twice-born man falls from his position. Then let a twice-born man who has attained to the highest caste, keep it. The Kshattriya, or Vaiśya, who lives in the condition of a Brāhman, by practising the duties of one, attains to Brāhmanhood. But he who abandons the state of a Brāhman and practises the duty of a Kshattriya, falls from Brāhmanhood and is born in a Kshattriya womb. And the foolish Brāhman, who, having attained that Brāhmanhood which is so hard to get, follows the profession of a Vaiśya, under the influence of cupidity and delusion, falls into the condition of a Vaiśya. (In like manner) a Vaiśya may sink into the state of a Śūdra. A Brāhman who falls away from his own duty becomes afterwards a Śūdra. . . . . 6590. But by practising the following good works, o goddess, a Śūdra becomes a Brāhman, and a Vaiśya becomes a Kshattriya: Let him actively perform all the functions of a Śūdra according to propriety and rule, i.e. obedience and service to the highest caste," etc.

The next passage is the first of those which I have already noted, as in spirit and tenor very different from the preceding. The conversation which it records arose as follows: Yudhishthira found his brother Bhīmasena caught in the coils of a serpent, which, it turned out, was no other than the famous king Nahusha, who by his sacrifices, austerities, etc., had formerly raised himself to the sovereignty of the three worlds; but had been reduced to the condition in which he was now seen, as a punishment for his pride and contempt of the Brāhmans. He promises to let Bhīmaseva go, if Yudhishthira will answer certain questions. Yudhishthira agrees, and remarks that the serpent was acquainted with whatever a Brāhman ought to know. Whereupon the Serpent proceeds:

Vana-parva, verses 12469 ff: Sarpa uvācha | brāhmaṇaḥ ko bhaved rājan vedyaṁ kiṁ cha Yudhishṭhira | 12470. Bravīhy atimatim tvāṁ hi vākyair anumimīmahe | Yudhishṭhira uvācha | satyaṁ dānam kshamā śīlam ānṛiśaṁsyaṁ tapo ghṛiṇā | dṛiśyante yatra nāgendra sa brāhmaṇaḥ iti smṛitiḥ | vedyaṁ sarpa param Brahma nirduḥkham asukham cha yat | yatra gatvā na śochanti bhavataḥ kiṁ vivakshitam | Sarpa uvācha | chāturvarṇyam pramāṇaṁ cha satyaṁ cha brahma chaiva hi | Śūdreshv api cha satyaṁ cha dānam akrodha eva cha | ānṛiśamsyam ahiṁsā cha ghṛiṇā chaiva Yudhishṭhira | vedyāṁ yach chātra nirduḥkham asukhaṁ cha na-

rādhipa | tābhyāṁ hīnam padaṁ chānyad na tad astīti lakshaye | Yudhishthira uvācha | 12475. Śūdre tu yad bhavel lakshma dvije tach cha na vidyate | na vai śūdro bhavech chhūdro brāhmaṇo na cha brāhmaṇaḥ | yatraital lakshyate sarpa vṛittam sa brāhmaṇaḥ smṛitaḥ | yatraitad na bhavet sarpa tam śūdram iti nirddiśet | yat punar bhavatā proktam na vedyaṁ vidyatīti cha | tābhyāṁ hīnam ato 'nyatra padaṁ nāstīti ched api | evam etad matam sarpa tābhyāṁ hīnaṁ na vidyate | yathā śītoshṇayor madhye bhaved noshṇaṁ na śītatā | evam vai sukha-duḥkhābhyām hīnaṁ nāsti padaṁ kvachit | eshā ṇama matiḥ sarpa yathā vā manyate bhavān | Sarpa uvācha | 12480. Yadi te vṛittato rājan brāhmaṇaḥ prasamīkshitaḥ | vṛithā jātis tadā "yushman kṛitir yāvad na vidyate | Yudhishṭhira uvācha | jātir atra mahāsarpa manushyatve mahāmate | sankarāt sarva-varṇānāṁ dushparīkshyeti me matiḥ | sarve sarvāsv apatyāni janayanti sadā narāḥ | vāṅ maithunam atho janma maraṇaṁ cha samam nṛiṇām | idam ārsham pramāṇaṁ cha "ye yajāmahe" ity api | tasmāch chhīlam pradhāneshṭaṁ vidur ye tattvadarśinaḥ | "prāṅ nābhi-varddhanāt puṁso jāta-karma vidhīyate" | 12485. "tadā 'sya mātā sāvitrī pitā tv āchāryya uchyate" | "Tāvach chhūdra-samo hy esha yāvad vede na jāyate" | tasminn evam mati-dvaidhe Manuḥ Svāyambhuvo 'bravīt | kṛita-kṛityāḥ punar varṇā yadi vṛittaṁ na vidyate | sankaras tatra nāgendra balavān prasamīkshitaḥ | yatredānīm mahāsarpa samskṛitaṁ vṛittam iskyate | tam brāhmanam aham pūrvam uktavān bhujagottama |

"12469. The Serpent said: Who may be a Brāhman, and what is the thing to be known, o Yudhishthira;—tell me, since by thy words I infer thee to be a person of extreme intelligence. Yudhishthira replied: 12470. The Smṛiti declares, o chief of Serpents, that he is a Brāhman, in whom truth, liberality, patience, virtue, innocence, austere fervour, and compassion are seen. And the thing to be known is the supreme Brahma, free from pain, as well as from pleasure,—to whom, when men have attained, they no longer sorrow. What is your opinion? The Serpent replied: The Veda (brahma) is beneficial to all the four castes and is authoritative and true.[240] And so we find in

[240] Such is the sense assigned by the Commentator to this line, the drift of which is not very clear. The comment runs thus: Sarpas tu brāhmaṇa-padena jāti-mātram vivakshitvā śūdre tal lakshaṇaṁ vyabhichārayati "chāturvarṇyam" iti sārddhena | chaturṇāṁ varṇānaṁ hitam | satyam pramānaṁ cha dharma-vyapasthāpakam brahma vedaḥ | śūdrāchāra-smṛiter api veda-mūlakatvāt sarvo 'py āchārādiḥ śruti-mūlakaḥ

Śūdras also truth, liberality, calmness, innocence, harmlessness, and compassion. And as for the thing to be known, which is free from pain and pleasure, I perceive that there is no other thing free from these two influences. Yudhishthira rejoined: 12475. The qualities characteristic of a Śūdra do not exist in a Brāhman (nor vice versâ). (Were it otherwise) the Śūdra would not be a Śūdra, nor the Brāhman a Brāhman.[241] The person in whom this regulated practice is perceived is declared to be a Brāhman; and the man, in whom it is absent, should be designated as a Śūdra. And as to what you say further, that there is nothing other than this (Brahma) to be known, which is free from the susceptibilities in question; this is also (my own) opinion, that there is nothing free from them. Just as between cold and heat there can be neither heat nor cold, so there is nothing free from the feeling of pleasure and pain. Such is my view; or how do you consider? The Serpent remarked: 12480. If a man is regarded by you as being a Brāhman only in consequence of his conduct, then birth is vain until action is shown. Yudhishthira replied: O most sapient Serpent, birth is difficult to be discriminated in the present condition

ity arthaḥ | evaṁ cha satyādikaṁ yadi śūdre 'py asti tarhi so 'pi brāhmaṇa eva syād iti āha "śūdreshv api" iti | "The serpent, however, understanding by the term Brāhman mere birth, shows in a śloka and a half that Yudhishthira's definition fails by being applicable also to a Śūdra. Chāturvarṇya means 'beneficial to the four castes.' (Such is the Veda), which is also 'true' and 'authoritative,' as establishing what is duty. Inasmuch as the Smṛiti which prescribes a Śūdra's conduct is itself founded on the Veda; all conduct, etc., is based on the Veda. And so if (the characters of) truth, etc., are found also in a Śūdra, he too must be a Brāhman—such is his argument in the words 'In Śūdras also.'" According to this explanation the connection between the first line and the second and third may be as follows: The Veda is beneficial to all the castes, and therefore Śūdras also, having the advantage of its guidance, although at second hand, may practise all the virtues you enumerate; but would you therefore call them Brāhmans?

[241] This verse is not very lucid; but the sense may be that which I have assigned. The Commentator says: Itaras tu brāhmaṇa-padena brahma-vidaṁ vivakshitvā śūdrāder api brāhmaṇatvam abhyupagamya pariharati "Śūdre tv" iti | Śūdra-lakshya-kāmādikaṁ na brāhmaṇe 'sti na brāhmaṇa-lakshya-śamādikaṁ śūdre 'sti ity arthaḥ | śūdre 'pi śamādy-upeto brāhmaṇaḥ | brāhmaṇo 'pi kāmādy-upetaḥ śūdra eva ity arthaḥ | "The other (Yudhishthira), however, understanding by the word Brāhmaṇa one who knows the Veda (or, Brahma), and conceding the fact of a Śūdra's Brāhmanhood, obviates by the words 'but in a Śūdra,' etc. (the objection thence drawn). The qualities, lust, etc., distinctive of a Śūdra, do not exist in a Brāhman, nor do the qualities tranquillity, etc., characteristic of a Brāhman exist in a Śūdra. A Śūdra distinguished by the latter is a Brāhman; while a Brāhman characterized by lust, etc., is a Śūdra."

of humanity, on account of the confusion of all castes.[242] All (sorts of)

[242] In the tenth vol. of his Indische Studien, p. 83, Professor Weber adduces some curious evidence of the little confidence entertained in ancient times by the Indians in the chastity of their women. He refers to the following passages: (1) Nidāna Sutra, iii. 8. Uchchāvacha-charaṇāḥ striyo bhavanti | saha deva-sākshye cha manushya-sākshye cha yeshām putro vakshye teshām putro bhavishyāmi | yāṁścha putrāṇ vakshye te me putrāḥ bhavishyanti | "Women are irregular in their conduct. Of whatsoever men, I, taking gods and men to witness, shall declare myself to be the son, I shall be their son; and they whom I shall name as my sons shall be so." (2) S'atapatha Brāhmaṇa, iii. 2, 1, 40. Atha yad "brāhmaṇaḥ" ityāha | anaddhā iva vai asya ataḥ purā jānam bhavati | idaṁ hy āhuḥ "rakshāṁsi yoshitam anusachante tad uta rakshāṁsy eva reta ādadhati iti | atha atra addhā jāyate yo brāhmaṇo yo yajnāj jāyate | tasmād api rājanyaṁ vā vaiśyaṁ vā "brāhmaṇaḥ" ity eva brūyāt | brāhmaṇo hi jāyate yo yajnāj jāyate | tasmād āhuḥ "na savana-kṛitaṁ hanyad enasvī ha eva savana-kṛitā" iti | "Now as regards what he says '(this) Brāhman (has been consecrated):' before this his birth is uncertain. For they say this that 'Rakshases follow after women, and therefore that it is Rakshases who inject seed into them.'" (Compare what it said of the Gandharvas in Atharva V. iv. 37, 116, and Journ. Roy. As. Soc. for 1865, p. 301.) So then he is certainly born who is born from sacred science (brahma) and from sacrifice. Wherefore also let him address a Rājanya or a Vaiśya as 'Brāhman,' for he is born from sacred science (brāhma, and consequently a Brāhman) who is born from sacrifice. Hence they say 'let no one slay an offerer of a libation, for he incurs (the) sin (of Brahmanicide?) by so doing." (3) On the next passage of the S'. P. Br. ii. 5, 2, 20, Professor Weber remarks that it is assumed that the wife of the person offering the Varuṇa praghāsa must have one or more paramours: Atha pratipras'hātā pratiparaiti | sa patnīm udāneshyan pṛichhati 'kena (jāreṇa Comm.) charasi' iti | Varuṇyaṁ vai etat strī karoti yad anyasya saty anyena charati | atho "na id me 'ntaḥ-śalpā juhuvad" iti tasmāt pṛichhati | niruktaṁ vai enaḥ kanīyo bhavati | satyaṁ hi bhavati | tasmād vā iva pṛichhati | sā yad na pratijānīta jnātibhyo ha asyai tad ahitaṁ syāt | "The pratiprasthātṛi (one of the priests) returns. Being about to bring forward the wife, he asks her, 'with what (paramour) dost thou keep company?' For it is an offence incurring punishment from Varuṇa that being the wife of one man she keeps company with another. He enquires 'in order that she may not sacrifice with me while she feels an inward pang.' For a sin when declared becomes less: for it is not attended with falsehood. Therefore he enquires. If she does not confess, it will be ill for her relations." (This passage is explained in Kātyāyana's S'rauta Sūtras, v. 5, 6–11.) (4) S'. P. Br. i. 3, 2, 21. Tad u ha uvācha Yājnavalkyo "yathādishṭam patnyāḥ astu | kas tad ādriyeta yat parapuṁsā vā patnī syāt" | "Yājnavalkya said this (in opposition to the doctrine of some other teachers): 'let the prescribed rule be followed regarding a wife. Who would mind his wife consorting with other men?'" The last clause has reference to the consequence which the other teachers said would follow from adopting the course they disapproved, viz., that the wife of the man who did so would become an adulteress. (5) Taitt. S. v. 6, 8, 3. Na agniṁ chitvā rāmām upeyād "ayonau reto dhasyāmi" iti | na dvitīyaṁ chitvā 'nyasya strīyam upeyāt | na tṛitīyaṁ chitvā kānchana upeyāt | reto vai etad nidhatte yad agniṁ chinute | yad upeyād retasā vyṛidhyeta | "Let not a man, after preparing the altar for the sacred fire, approach a woman (a S'ūdra-woman, according to the Commentator), (considering) that in doing so, he would be discharging seed into an improper place. Let no man, after a second time preparing the firemen are continually begetting children on all (sorts of) women. The speech, the mode of propagation, the birth, the death of all mankind are alike. The text which follows is Vedic and authoritative: 'We who (are called upon) we recite the text.'[243] Hence those men who have an insight into truth know that virtuous character is the thing chiefly to be desired. 'The natal rites of a male are enjoined to be performed before the section of the umbilical cord (Manu, ii. 29). Then Sāvitrī (the Gāyatrī, Manu ii. 77) becomes his mother and his altar, approach another man's wife. Let no man, after a third time preparing the fire-altar, approach any woman: for in preparing the fire-altar he is discharging seed. Should he approach (a woman in these forbidden cases) he will miscarry with his seed." This prohibition of adultery in a certain case, seems to prove that it was no uncommon occurrence, and is calculated, as Professor Weber remarks, to throw great doubt on the purity of blood in the old Indian families.

[243] To explain the last elliptical expression I will quote part of the Commentator's remarks on the beginning of Yudhishthira's reply: Vāgādīnām iva maithunasyāpi sādhāraṇyāj jātir durjneyā | tathā chā śrutiḥ "na chaitad vidmo brāhmaṇāḥ smo vayam abrāhmaṇā vā" iti brāhmaṇya-samśayaṁ upanyasyati | nanu jāty-aniśchaye katham "brāhmaṇo 'ham" ityādy abhimāna-purassaram yāgādau pravartteta ity āśankyāha "idam ārsham" iti | atra "ye yajāmahe" ity anena cha ye vayaṁ smo brāhmaṇāḥ anye vā te vayam yajāmahe iti brāhmaṇye 'navadhāraṇaṁ darśitam | mantra-lingam api "ya evāsmi sa san yaje" iti | . . . . Tasmād āchāra eva brāhmaṇya-niśchayahetur veda-prāmāṇyād ity upasaṁharati | "As the mode of propagation is common to all the castes, just as speech, etc. are, birth is difficult to be determined. And accordingly, by the words: 'We know not this, whether we are Brāhmans or no Brāhmans,' the Veda signifies a doubt as to Brāhmanhood. Then, having raised the difficulty 'how, if birth is undetermined, can a man engage in sacrifice, etc., with the previous consciousness that he is a Brāhman, etc.?' the author answers in the words 'this text is Vedic, etc.' It is both shewn by the words 'we who . . . . recite,' (which mean) 'we, whoever we are,—Brāhmans or others,—we recite,' that the fact of Brāhmanhood is unascertained; and this is also a characteristic of the formula, 'whosoever I am, being he who I am, I recite.'" The comment concludes: "Hence he briefly infers from the authoritative character of the Veda, that conduct is the cause of certainty in regard to Brāhmanhood." Prof. Aufrecht has pointed out to me that the words ye yajāmahe occur in S'. P. Br. i. 5, 2, 16, and in Taitt. S. i. 16, 11, 1. The Commentator on the last-named passage refers in explanation of them to As'valāyana's S'rauta Sūtras, i. 5, 4 f., where it is said that these two words constitute the formula called āguḥ, which comes in at the beginning of all the yājyās which are unaccompanied by any anuyāja. The Commentator interprets the two words thus: sarve "ye" vayaṁ hotāro 'dhvaryuṇā "yaja" iti preshitās te vayam "yajāmahe" yājyām paṭhāmaḥ | "All we hotri priests who are called upon by the adhvaryu by the word 'recite,' we recite, i.e. repeat the yājyā." (See Haug's Ait. Br. ii. p. 133, and note 11.) Prof. Aufrecht thinks the words in the Commentator's note ya evāsmi sa san yaje may be a free adaptation of Atharva V. vi. 123, 3, 4. It does not appear from what source the words na chaitad vidmaḥ etc. are derived.

religious teacher his father (Manu, ii. 170, 225). 12485. Until he is born in the Veda, he is on a level with a Śūdra' (Manu, ii. 172);—so, in this diversity of opinions did Manu Svāyambhuva declare. The castes (though they have done nothing) will have done all they need do,[244] if no fixed rules of conduct are observed. In such a case there is considered to be a gross confusion of castes. I have already declared that he is a Brāhman in whom purity of conduct is recognized."

The next passage from the Śāntiparvan, verses 6930 ff., is even more explicit than the last in denying any natural distinction between the people of the different castes:

Bhṛigur uvācha | Asṛijad brāhmaṇān evam pūrvam Brahmā prajāpatīn | ātma-tejo'bhinirvṛittān bhāskarāgni-sama-prabhān | tataḥ satyaṁ cha dharmaṁ cha tapo brahma cha śāśvatam | āchāram chaiva śauchaṁ cha svargāya vidadhe prabhuḥ | deva-dānava-gandharvā daityāsura-mahoragāḥ | yaksha-rākshasa-nāgāś cha piśāchā manujās tathā | brāhmaṇāḥ kshattriyā vaiśyāḥ śūdrāś cha dvija-sattama | ye chānye bhūta-sanghānāṁ varṇās tāṁs chāpi nirmame | brāhmaṇānāṁ sito varṇaḥ kshattriyāṇaṁ cha lohitaḥ | vaiśyānām pītako varṇaḥ śūdrāṇām asitas tatha | 6935. Bharadvāja uvācha | Chāturvarṇyasya varṇena yadi varṇo vibhidyate | sarveshāṁ khalu varṇāṇāṁ dṛiśyate varṇa-sankaraḥ | kāmaḥ krodho bhayaṁ lobhaḥ śokaś chintā kshudhā śramaḥ | sarveshāṁ naḥ[245] prabhavati kasmād varṇo vibhidyate | sveda-mūtra-purīshāṇi śleshmā pittaṁ sa-śoṇitam | tanuḥ ksharati sarveshāṁ kasmād varṇo vibhajyate | jangamānām asaṁkhyeyāḥ sthāvarāṇāṁ cha jātayaḥ | teshāṁ vividha-varṇānāṁ kuto varṇa-viniśchayaḥ | Bhṛigur uvācha | Na viśesho 'sti varṇānāṁ sarvam brāhmam idaṁ jagat | Brahmaṇā pūrva sṛishṭaṁ hi karmabhir varṇatāṁ gatam | 6940. Kāma-bhoga-priyās tīkshṇāḥ krodhanāḥ priya-sāhasāḥ |

[244] The Commentator thus explains the word kṛita-kṛitya : Kṛita-kṛityāḥ śūdra-tulyāḥ | tathā cha smṛitiḥ "na śūdre pātakaṁ kinchid na cha saṁskāram arhati" iti teshāṁ saṁskārānarhatva-nishpāpatvābhidānat kṛita-kṛityatvam darśayati | tadvat traivarṇikā api syur ity arthaḥ | "Kṛita kṛityāḥ (lit. having done what was to be done) means, like S'ūdras; so the Smṛiti (when it says), 'No sin exists in a S'ūdra, nor is he fit for purificatory rites,' shews, by declaring the unfitness of this class for such rites, and its freedom from sin, that it has the character of kṛita-kṛityatvatva, i.e. of having done all it had to do. And such (in the event supposed) would be the case with men of the three (upper) classes also."

[245] The Calcutta edition reads na, "not," which cannot be right. The MS. in the Library of the Edinburgh University has naḥ, "of us."

tyakta-svadharmā raktāngās te dvijāḥ kshattratāṁ gatāḥ | gobhyo vṛittiṁ samāsthāya pītāḥ kṛishy-upajīvinaḥ | sva-dharmān nānutishṭhanti te dvijā vaiśyatāṁ gatāḥ | hiṁsānṛita-priyā lubdhāḥ sarva-karmopajīvinaḥ | kṛishṇāḥ śaucha-paribhrashṭās te dvijāḥ śūdratāṁ gatāḥ | ity etaiḥ karmabhir vyastā dvijā varṇāntaraṁ gātāḥ | dharmo yajña-kriyā teshāṁ nityaṁ na pratishidhyate | ity ete chaturo varṇā yeshām brāhmī sarasvatī | vihitā Brahmaṇā pūrvaṁ lobhāt tv ajnānatāṁ gātāḥ | 6945. Brāhmaṇā brahma-tantra-sthās[246] tapas teshāṁ na naśyati | brahma dhārayatāṁ nityaṁ vratāni niyamāṁs tathā | brahma chaiva paraṁ sṛishṭaṁ ye na jānanti te 'dvijāḥ | teshām bahuvidhāś tv anyās tatra tatra hi jātayaḥ | piśāchā rākshasāḥ pretā vividhā mlechha-jātayaḥ | prāṇashṭa-jnāna-vijnānāḥ svachhandāchāra-cheshṭitāḥ | prajā brāhmaṇa-saṁskārāḥ sva-karma-kṛita-niśchayāḥ | ṛishibhiḥ svena tapasā sṛijyante chāpare paraiḥ | ādi-deva-samudbhūtā brahma-mūlā 'kshayā 'vyayā | sā sṛishṭir mānasī nāma dharma-tantra-parāyaṇā | 6950. Bharadvāja uvācha | Brāhmaṇaḥ kena bhavati kshattriyo vā dvijottama | vaiśyaḥ śūdraś cha viprarshe tad brūhi vadatāṁ vara | Bhṛigur uvācha | Jata-karmādibhir yas tu saṁskāraiḥ saṁskṛitaḥ śuchih | vedādhyayana-sampannaḥ shaṭsu karmasv avasthitaḥ | śauchāchāra-sthitaḥ samyag vighasāśī guru-priyaḥ | nitya-vratī satyaparaḥ sa vai brāhmaṇa uchyate | satyaṁ dānam athādroha ānṛiśaṁsyaṁ trapā ghṛiṇā | tapaś cha dṛiśyate yatra sa brāhmaṇa iti smṛitaḥ | kshattra-jaṁ sevate karma vedādhyayana-sangataḥ | dānādāna-ratir yas tu sa vai kshattriya uchyate | 6955. Viśaty āśu paśubhyaś cha kṛishy-ādāna-ratiḥ śuchih | vedādhyayana-sampannaḥ sa vaiśyaḥ iti sanjnitāḥ | sarva-bhakshya-ratir nityaṁ sarva-karma-karo 'śuchih | tyakta-vedas tv anāchāraḥ sa vai śūdraḥ iti smṛitaḥ | śūdre chaitad bhavel lakshyaṁ dvije tach cha na vidyate | sa vai śūdro bhavech chhūdro brāhmaṇo brāhmaṇo na cha |

"Bhṛigu replied: 6930. 'Brahmā thus formerly created the Prajāpatis, Brahmanic,[247] penetrated by his own energy, and in splendour equalling the sun and fire. The lord then formed truth, righteousness, austere fervour, and the eternal veda (or sacred science), virtuous practice, and purity for (the attainment of) heaven. He also formed the gods, Dānavas, Gandharvas, Daityas, Asuras, Mahoragas, Yakshas,

[246] Brahma-tantram = vedoktānushṭhānam | Comm.

[247] Brāhmaṇān, "Brāhmans," is the word employed. It may mean here "sons of Brahmā."

Rākshasas, Nāgas, Piśāchas, and men, Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and Śūdras, as well as all other classes (varṇāḥ) of beings. The colour (varṇa) of the Brāhmans was white; that of the Kshattriyas red; that of the Vaiśyas yellow, and that of the Śūdras black.'[248] 6935. Bharadvāja here rejoins: 'If the caste (varṇa) of the four classes is distinguished by their colour (varṇa), then a confusion of all the castes is observable. Desire, anger, fear, cupidity, grief, apprehension, hunger, fatigue, prevail over us all: by what, then, is caste discriminated? Sweat, urine, excrement, phlegm, bile, and blood (are common to all); the bodies of all decay: by what then is caste discriminated? There are innumerable kinds of things moving and stationary: how is the class (varṇa) of these various objects to be determined?' Bhṛigu replies: 'There is no difference of castes:[249] this world, having been at first created by Brahmā entirely Brahmanic,[250]

[248] It is somewhat strange, as Professor Weber remarks in a note to p. 215 of his German translation of the Vajra Sūchī, that in the passage of the Kāṭhaka Brāhmaṇa xi. 6, which he there quotes, a white colour is ascribed to the Vaiśya and a dark hue to the Rājanya. The words are these: Yach chhuklānām (brihīnām) ādityebhyo nirvapati tasmāch chhukla iva vaiśyo jāyate | yat kṛishṇānām vāruṇām tasmād dhūmra iva rājanyaḥ | "Since the Vaiśya offers an oblation of white (rice) to the Ādityas, he is born as it were white; and as the Vāruṇa oblation is of black (rice) the Rājanya is as it were dusky."

[249] Compare with this the words attributed in Śāntiparvan, verses 2819 ff., to King Muchukunda, who had been reproached by the god Kuvera with trusting for victory to the aid of his domestic priest instead of to his own prowess: Muchukundas tataḥ kruddhaḥ pratyuvācha Dhaneśvaram | nyāya-pūrvam asaṁrabdham asambhrāntam idaṁ vachaḥ | brahma kshattram idaṁ sṛishṭam eka-yoni svayambhuvā | pṛithag-balavidhānaṁ tanna lokam paripālayet | tapo-mantra-balam nityam brāhmaṇeshu pratishṭhitam | astra-bālu-balam nityaṁ kshattriyeshu pratishṭhitam | tābhyāṁ sambhūya karttavyam prajānām paripālanam | "Muchukunda then, incensed, addressed to the Lord of riches these reasonable words, which did not partake of his anger or excitement: 'Brāhmans and Kshattriyas were created by Brahmā from the same womb (or source) with different forces appointed to them: this cannot (neither of these separate forces can?) protect the world. The force of austere fervour and of sacred texts abides constantly in the Brāhmans; and that of weapons and their own arms in the Kshattriyas. By these two forces combined the people must be protected."

[250] Brāhmam is the word employed. That it is to be understood in the sense of "Brāhmanical" appears from the following lines in which the word dvijāḥ must be taken in the special signification of Brāhmans and not of "twice-born men" (who may be either Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, or Vaiśyas) in general. The Brāhman is considered to have been formed of the essence of Brahmā, and to represent the original type of perfect humanity as it existed at the creation. The Commentator takes the word brāhmam as = brāhmaṇa-jātimat, "having the caste of Brāhmans;" and he explains the different colours mentioned in the next verses as follows: red (rakta)

became (afterwards) separated into castes in consequence of works. 6940. Those Brāhmans (lit. twice-born men), who were fond of sensual pleasure, fiery, irascible, prone to violence, who had forsaken their duty, and were red-limbed, fell into the condition of Kshattriyas. Those Brāhmans, who derived their livelihood from kine, who were yellow, who subsisted by agriculture, and who neglected to practise their duties, entered into the state of Vaiśyas. Those Brāhmans, who were addicted to mischief and falsehood, who were covetous, who lived by all kinds of work, who were black and had fallen from purity, sank into the condition of Śūdras. Being separated from each other by these works, the Brāhmans became divided into different castes. Duty and the rites of sacrifice have not been always forbidden to (any of) them. Such are the four classes for whom the Brahmanic[251] Sarasvatī was at first designed by Brahmā, but who through their cupidity fell into ignorance. 6945. Brāhmans live agreeably to the prescriptions of the Veda; while they continually hold fast the Veda, and observances, and ceremonies, their austere fervour (tapas) does not perish. And sacred science was created the highest thing: they who are ignorant of it are no twice-born men. Of these there are various other classes in different places, Piśāchas, Rākshasas, Pretas, various tribes of Mlechhas, who have lost all knowledge sacred and profane, and practise whatever observances they please. And different sorts of creatures with the purificatory rites of Brāhmans, and discerning their own duties, are created by different rishis through their own austere fervour. This creation, sprung from the primal god, having its root in Brahma, undecaying, imperishable, is called the mind-born creation, and is devoted to the prescriptions of duty.' 6950. Bharadvāya again enquires: 'What is that in virtue of which a man is a Brāhman, a Kshattriya, means "formed of the quality of passion" (rajo-guṇa-maya); yellow (pīta) "formed of the qualities of passion and darkness" (rajas-tamo-maya), and black (krishṇa or asita) "formed of darkness only" (kevala-tamomaya).

[251] Brāhmī. This word is thus interpreted by the Commentator: vedamayī | chaturṇām api varṇānām Brahmaṇā pūrvam vihitā | lobha-doshena tu ajnānatāṁ tamobhāvaṁ gatāḥ śūdrāḥ anadhikāriṇo vede jātāḥ | "Sarasvatī, consisting of the Veda, was formerly designed by Brahmā for all the four castes: but the Śūdras having through cupidity fallen into 'ignorance,' i.e. a condition of darkness, lost their right to the Veda." See Indische Studien, ii. 194, note, where Professor Weber understands this passage to import that in ancient times the Śūdras spoke the language of the Āryas.

a Vaiśya, or a Śūdra; tell me, o most eloquent Brahman rishi.' Bhrigu replies: 'He who is pure, consecrated by the natal and other ceremonies, who has completely studied the Veda, lives in the practice of the six ceremonies, performs perfectly the rites of purification, who eats the remains of oblations, is attached to his religious teacher, is constant in religious observances, and devoted to truth,—is called a Brāhman. 6953. He in whom are seen truth, liberality, inoffensiveness, harmlessness, modesty, compassion, and austere fervour,—is declared to be a Brāhman. He who practises the duty arising out of the kingly office, who is addicted to the study of the Veda, and who delights in giving and receiving,[253]—is called a Kshattriya. 6955. He who readily occupies himself with cattle,[253] who is devoted to agriculture and acquisition, who is pure, and is perfect in the study of the Veda,—is denominated a Vaiśya. 6956. He who is habitually addicted to all kinds of food, performs all kinds of work, who is unclean, who has abandoned the Veda, and does not practise pure observances,—is traditionally called a Śūdra. And this (which I have stated) is the mark of a Śūdra, and it is not found in a Brāhman: (such) a Śūdra will remain a Śūdra, while the Brāhman (who so acts) will be no Brāhman.''[254]

The passage next to be quoted recognizes, indeed, the existence of castes in the Kṛita age, but represents the members of them all as having been perfect in their character and condition, and as not differing from one another in any essential respects.

It is related in the Vanaparvan that Bhīmasena, one of the Pāndus, [252] Dānam viprebhyaḥ | ādānam prajabhyaḥ, "Giving to Brāhmans, receiving from his subjects."—Comm.

[253] Paśūn vāṇijyāya upayoginaḥ upalabdhvā viśati pratishṭhām labhate | "Who perceiving cattle to be useful for trade, 'enters,' obtains a basis (for his operations)."—Comm. As we have seen above p. 97, these etymologies are frequently far-fetched and absurd.

[254] On this verse the Commentator annotates as follows: etat satyādi-saptakam dvije traivarṇike | dharma eva varṇa-vibhāge kāraṇaṁ na jātir ity arthaḥ | "These seven virtues, beginning with truth (mentioned in verse 6953), exist in the twice-born man of the first three classes. The sense is that righteousness, and not birth, is the cause of the division into classes." This explanation is not very lucid. But the sense seems to be that the seven good qualities referred to are the proper characteristics of the three upper castes, while the defects specified in verse 6956 are the proper distinctive marks of the Śūdras. Thus the Śūdra who has the four defects will remain a Śūdra, but a Brāhman who has them will be no Brāhman.

in the course of a conversation with his brother[255] Hanūmat the monkey chief, had requested information on the subject of the Yugas and their characteristics. Hanūmat's reply is given in verses 11234 ff.:

Kṛitaṁ nāma yugaṁ tāta yatra dharmaḥ sanātanaḥ | kṛitam eva na karttavyaṁ tasmin kāle yugottame | na tatra dharmāḥ sīdanti kshīyante na cha vai prajāḥ | tataḥ kṛita-yugam nāma kālena guṇatāṁ gatam | deva-dānava-gandharva-yaksha-rākshasa-pannagāḥ | nāsan kṛita-yuge tāta tadā na kraya-vikrayaḥ[256] | na sāma-ṛig-yajur-varṇāḥ[257] kriyā nāsīch cha mānavī | abhidhyāya phalaṁ tatra dharmaḥ sannyāsa eva cha | na tasmin yuga-saṁsarge vyādhayo nendriya-kshayaḥ | nāsūyā nāpi ruditam na darpo nāpi vaikṛitaṁ[258] | na vigrahaḥ[259] kutas tandrī na dvesho na cha paiśunam | 11240. Na bhayaṁ nāpi santāpo na chershyā na cha matsaraḥ | tataḥ paramakam Brahma sā gatir yoginām parā | ātmā cha sarva-bhūtānāṁ śuklo Nārāyaṇas tadā | brāhmaṇāḥ kshattriyāḥ vaiśyāḥ śūdrāścha kṛita-lakshaṇāḥ | kṛite yuge samabhavan sva-karma-niratāḥ prajāḥ | samāśrayaṁ samāchāraṁ sama-jnānaṁ cha kevalam | tadā hi sāmakarmāṇo varṇā dharmān avāpnuvan | eka-deva-sadā-yuktāḥ eka-mantra-vidhi-kriyāḥ | pṛithagdharmās tv eka-vedā dharmam ekam anuvratāḥ | chāturaśramya-yuktena karmaṇā kāla-yoginā | 11245. Akāma-phala-saṁyogāt prāpnuvanti parām gatim | ātma-yoga-samāyukto dharmo 'yaṁ kṛita-lakshaṇaḥ | kṛite yuge chatushpādāś chāturvarṇyasya śāśvataḥ | etat kṛita-yugaṁ nāma traiguṇya-parivarjjitam | tretām api nibodha tvaṁ tasmin sattram pravarttate | pādena hrasate dharmo raktatām yāti chāchyutaḥ | satya-pravṛittāś cha narāḥ kriyā-dharma-parāyaṇāḥ | tato yajnāḥ pravarttante dharmāścha vividhāḥ kriyāḥ | tretāyām bhāva-sankalpāḥ kriyā-dāna-phalopagāḥ | prachalanti na vai dharmāt tapo-dāna-parāyaṇāḥ | 11250. Sva-dharma-sthāḥ kriyāvanto narās tretā-yuge 'bhavan | dvāpare tu yuge dharmo dvibhāgonaḥ pravarttate | Vishnur vai pītatāṁ yāti chaturdhā veda eva cha | tato 'nye cha chatur-vedās trivedāś cha tathā pare | dvi-vedāś chaika-vedāś chāpy anṛichaś cha tathā pare | evaṁ śāstreshu bhinneshu bahudhā nīyate kriyā | tapo-dāna-pravṛittā cha rājasī bhavati prajā | eka-vedasya chājnānād vedās te bahavaḥ

[255] Both were sons of Vāyu. See verses 11134, 11169 f. and 11176 f. of this same book. The Rāmāyaṇa is mentioned in verse 11177.

[256] The MS. in the Edinburgh University Library reads as the last pāda: dānādhyayana-viśramāḥ.

[257] The Edinburgh MS. reads vedāḥ instead varṇāḥ.

[258] Kapaṭam—Comm. [259] Vairam—Comm.

kṛitāḥ | sattvasya cheha vibhraṁśāt satye[260] kaśchid avasthitaḥ | sattvāt prachyavamānānāṁ vyādhayo bahavo 'bhavan | 11255. Kāmāś chopadravāśchaiva tadā vai daiva-kāritāḥ | yair ardyamānāḥ subhṛiśam tapas tapyanti mānavāḥ | kāma-kāmāḥ svarga-kāmā yajnāṁs tanvanti chāpare | evaṁ dvāparam āsādya prajāḥ kshīyanty adharmataḥ | pādenaikena Kaunteya dharmaḥ kali-yuge sthitaḥ | tāmasaṁ yugam āsādya kṛishṇo bhavati Keśavaḥ | vedāchārāḥ praśāmyanti dharma-yajna-kriyās tathā | ītayo vyādhayas trandrī doshāḥ krodhādayās tathā | upadravāś cha varttante ādhayah kshud bhayam tathā | yugeshv āvarttamāneshu dharmo vyāvarttate punaḥ | dharme vyāvarttamāne tu loko vyāvarttate punaḥ | loke kshīṇe kshayaṁ yānti bhāvā loka-pravarttakāḥ | yuga-kshaya-kṛitā dharmāḥ prārthanāni vikurvate | etat kaliyugaṁ nāma achirād yat pravarttate | yugānuvarttanaṁ tv etat kurvanti chirajīvinaḥ |

"11234. The Kṛita is that age in which righteousness is eternal. In the time of that most excellent of Yugas (everything) had been done (kṛita), and nothing (remained) to be done. Duties did not then languish, nor did the people decline. Afterwards, through (the influence of) time, this yuga fell into a state of inferiority.[261] In that age there were neither Gods,[262] Dānavas, Gandharvas, Yakshas, Rākshasas, nor Pannagas; no buying or selling went on; the Vedas were not classed[263] as Sāman, Ṛich, and Yajush; no efforts were made by men:[264] the fruit (of the earth was obtained) by their mere wish: righteousness and abandonment of the world (prevailed).

[260] The Edinburgh MS. reads sattve instead of satye.

[261] In thus rendering, I follow the Commentator, whose gloss is this: Mukhyam apy amukhyatām gatam | "although the chief, it fell into inferiority." In Böhtlingk and Roth's Lexicon this line is quoted under the word guṇatā, to which the sense of "superiority, excellence," is assigned.

[262] Compare with this the verses of the Vāyu Purāṇa quoted in p. 90, which state that in the Kṛita age there were neither plants nor animals; which are the products of unrighteousness.

[263] I do not venture to translate "there was then no [division of the Veda into] Sāman, Ṛich, and Yajush, nor any castes," (1) because the Edinburgh MS. reads vedāḥ instead of varṇāḥ, and the Commentator does not allude to the word varṇāḥ; and (2) castes (varṇāḥ) are referred to below (verses 11242 f.) as existing, though without much distinction of character. The Commentator explains: trayī-dharmasya chitta-śuddhy-arthatvāt tasyāś cha tadānīṁ svabhāvatvāt na sāmādīny āsan | "As the object of the triple veda is purity of heart, and as that existed naturally at that period, there were no (divisions of) Sāman, etc."

[264] I follow the Commentator whose gloss is: "Mānavī kriyā" kṛishy-ādy-ārambha-bhūta | kintu "abhidhyāya phalam," sankalpād eva sarvam sampadyate |

No disease or decline of the organs of sense arose through the influence of the age; there was no malice, weeping, pride, or deceit; no contention, and how could there be any lassitude? no hatred, cruelty, (11240) fear, affliction, jealousy, or envy. Hence the supreme Brahma was the transcendent resort of those Yogins. Then Nārāyaṇa, the soul of all beings, was white.[265] Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and Śūdras possessed the characteristics of the Kṛita.[266] In that age were born creatures devoted to their duties. They were alike in the object of their trust, in observances and in their knowledge. At that period the castes, alike in their functions, fulfilled their duties, were unceasingly devoted to one deity, and used one formula (mantra), one rule, and one rite. Though they had separate duties, they had but one Veda, and practised one duty.[267] By works connected with the four orders, and dependent on conjunctures of time,[268] (11245) but unaffected by desire, or (hope of) reward, they attained to supreme felicity. This complete and eternal righteousness of the four castes during the Kṛita was marked by the character of that age and sought after union with the supreme soul. The Kṛita age was free from the three qualities.[269] Understand now the Tretā, in which sacrifice commenced,[270] righteousness decreased by a fourth, Vishnu became red;

[265] In verse 12981 of this same Vanaparvan the god says of himself: śvetaḥ kṛita-yuge varṇaḥ pītas tretāyuge mama | rakto dvāparam āsādya kṛishṇaḥ kali-yuge tathā | "My colour in the Kṛita age is white, in the Tretā yellow, when I reach the Dvāpara it is red, and in the Kali black."

[266] The Commentator's gloss is: kṛitāni svataḥ siddhāni lakshaṇāni śamo damas tapa ity-ādīni yeshāṁ te | "They were men whose characteristics, tranquillity, etc, were effected, spontaneously accomplished." On verse 11245 he explains the same term kṛita-lakshaṇaḥ by kṛita-yuga-sūchakaḥ, "indicative of the Kṛita age."

[267] The different clauses of this line can only be reconciled on the supposition that the general principle of duty, and the details of the duties are distinguished. Dharma is the word used in both parts of the verse for "duty."

[268] Kāla-yoginā. The Commentator explains: kālo darśādiḥ | tad-yuktena | "connected with time, i.e. the appearance of the new moon, etc."

[269] And yet we are told in the Vāyu P. that the creation itself proceeded from the influence of the quality of passion (see above, p. 75), and that the four castes when originally produced were characterized in different ways by the three qualities, pp. 62 and 89.

[270] Compare S'ānti-parva, 13088. Idam kṛita-yugaṁ nāma kālaḥ śreshṭhaḥ pravarttitaḥ | ahiṁsyā yajna-paśavo yuge'smin na tad anyathā | chatushpāt sakalo dharmo bhavishyaty atra vai surāḥ | tatas tretā-yugaṁ nāma trayī yatra bhavishyati | prokshitā yatra paśavo badham prāpsyanti vai makhe | "This Kṛita age is the most excellent of periods: then victims are not allowed to be slaughtered; complete and

and men adhered to truth, and were devoted to a righteousness dependent on ceremonies. Then sacrifices prevailed, with holy acts and a variety of rites. In the Tretā men acted with an object in view, seeking after reward for their rites and their gifts, and no longer disposed to austerities and to liberality from (a simple feeling of) duty. 11250. In this age, however, they were devoted to their own duties, and to religious ceremonies. In the Dvāpara age righteousness was diminished by two quarters, Vishṇu became yellow, and the Veda fourfold. Some studied four Vedas, others three, others two, others one, and some none at all.[271] The scriptures being thus divided, ceremonies were celebrated in a great variety of ways; and the people being occupied with austerity and the bestowal of gifts, became full of passion (rājasī). Owing to ignorance of the one Veda, Vedas were multiplied. And now from the decline of goodness (sattva) few only adhered to truth. When men had fallen away from goodness, many diseases, (11255) desires and calamities, caused by destiny, assailed them, by which they were severely afflicted, and driven to practice austerities. Others desiring enjoyments and heavenly bliss, offered sacrifices. Thus, when they had reached the Dvāpara, men declined through unrighteousness. In the Kali righteousness remained to the extent of one-fourth only. Arrived in that age of darkness, Vishṇu became black: practices enjoined by the Vedas, works of righteousness, and rites of sacrifice, ceased. Calamities, diseases, fatigue, faults, such as anger, etc., distresses, anxiety, hunger, fear, prevailed. As the ages revolve, righteousness again declines. When this takes place, the people also decline. When they decay, the impulses which actuate them also decay. The practices generated by this declension of the Yugas frustrate men's aims. Such is the Kali Yuga which has existed for a short time. Those who are long-lived act in conformity with the character of the age."

The next passage from the same book (the Vana-parvan) does not make any allusion to the Yugas, but depicts the primeval perfection of mankind with some traits peculiar to itself, and then goes on to describe their decline. Mārkandeya is the speaker.

perfect righteousness will prevail. Next is the Tretā in which the triple veda will come into existence; and animals will be slain in sacrifice." See note 65, page 39, above.

[271] The Commentator explains anṛichas ("without the Rig-veda") by kṛita-kṛityāḥ. On the sense of the latter word see above.

12619. Nirmalāni śarīrāṇi viśuddhāni śarīriṇām | sasarja dharmatantrāṇi pūrvotpannaḥ Prajāpatiḥ | amogha-phala-sankalpāḥ suvratāḥ satyavādinaḥ | brahma-bhūtā narāḥ puṇyāḥ purāṇāḥ kuru-sattama | sarve devaiḥ samāḥ yānti svachhandena nabhas-talam | tataś cha punar āyānti sarve svachhanda-chāriṇaḥ | svachhanda-maraṇāś chāsan narāḥ svachhanda-chāriṇaḥ | alpa-bādhā nirātankāḥ siddhārthā nirupadravāḥ | drashṭāro deva-sanghānām ṛishīṇāṁ cha mahātmanām | pratyakshāḥ sarva-dharmāṇām dāntā vigata-matsarāḥ | āsan varsha-sahasrīyās tathā putra-sahasriṇaḥ | 12625. Tataḥ kālāntare 'nyasmin pṛithivī-tala-chāriṇaḥ | kāma-krodhādhibhūtās te māyā-vyājopajīviṇaḥ | lobha-mohābhibhūtās te saktā dehais tato narāḥ | aśubhaiḥ karmabhiḥ pāpās tiryañ-niraya-gāminaḥ |

"The first-born Prajāpati formed the bodies of corporeal creatures pure, spotless, and obedient to duty. The holy men of old were not frustrated in the results at which they aimed; they were religious, truth-speaking, and partook of Brahma's nature. Being all like gods they ascended to the sky and returned at will. They died too when they desired, suffered few annoyances, were free from disease, accomplished all their objects, and endured no oppression. Self-subdued and free from envy, they beheld the gods[272] and the mighty rishis, and had an intuitive perception of all duties.[273] They lived for a thousand years, and had each a thousand sons. Then at a later period of time, the inhabitants of the earth became subject to desire and anger, and subsisted by deceit and fraud. Governed by cupidity and delusion, devoted to carnal pursuits, sinful men by their evil deeds walked in crooked paths leading to hell," etc., etc.

[272] See the passage from S'ankara's Commentary on the Brahma Sūtras i. 3, 32, in the 3rd vol. of this work, pp. 49 f., and note 49 in p. 95; and S'atapatha Brāhmaṇa, ii. 3, 4, 4, ubhaye ha vai idam agre saha āsur devāś cha manushyās cha | tad yad ha sma manushyāṇāṁ na bhavati tad ha devān yāchante "idaṁ vai no nāsti idaṁ no 'stv" iti | te tasyai eva yāchnyāyai dveshena devās tirobhūtā "na id hinasāni na id dveshyo 'sāni" iti | "Gods and men, together, were both originally (component parts of) this world. Whatever men had not they asked from the gods, saying, 'We have not this; let us have it.' From dislike of this solicitation the gods disappeared, (saying each of them) 'let me not hurt (them), let me not be hateful.'" Compare also the passage of the S'. P. Br. iii. 6, 2, 26, referred to by Professor Weber in Indische Studien, x. 158: Te ha sma ete ubhaye deva-manushyāḥ pitaraḥ sampibante | sā eshā sampā | te ha sma dṛiśyamānā eva purā sampibante uta etarhy adṛiśyamānāḥ | "Both gods, men, and fathers drink together. This is their symposium. Formerly they drank together visibly: now they do so unseen." Compare also Plato, Philebus, 18: Καὶ δὴ μὲν παλαιοί, κρείττονες ἡμῶν καὶ ἐγγυτέρω θεῶν οἰκοῦντες, ταυτην φημην παρέδοσαν, "And the ancients who were better than ourselves, and dwelt nearer to the gods, have handed down this tradition."

[273] Compare the passage of the Nirukta, i. 20, beginning, sākshāt-kṛita-dharmāṇa ṛishayo babhūvuḥ, quoted in the 2nd vol. of this work, p. 174.

At the end of the chapter of the Bhīshmaparvan, entitled Jambū-khaṇḍa-nirmāṇa, there is a paragraph in which Sanjaya gives an account of the four yugas in Bhāratavarsha (Hindustan), and of the condition of mankind during each of those periods. After stating the names and order of the yugas, the speaker proceeds:

389. Chatvāri tu sahasrāṇi varshāṇāṁ Kuru-sattama | āyuḥ-sankhyā kṛita-yuge sankhyātā rāja-sattama | tathā trīṇi sahasrāṇi tretāyāṁ manujādhipa | dve sahasre dvāpare cha bhuvi tishṭhanti sāmpratam | na pramāṇa-sthitir hy asti tishye 'smin Bharatarshabha | garbha-sthāś cha mriyante cha tathā jātā mriyanti cha | mahābalā mahāsattvāḥ prajñā-guṇa-samanvitāḥ | prajāyante cha jātāś cha śataśo 'tha sahasraśaḥ | jātāḥ kṛita-yuge rājan dhaninaḥ priya-darśinaḥ | prajāyante cha jātāś cha munayo vai tapodhanāḥ | mahotsāhāḥ mahātmāno dhārmikāḥ satya-vādinaḥ | priyadarśanā vapushmanto mahāvīryā dhanurdharāḥ | varārhā yudhi jāyante kshattriyāḥ śūra-sattamāḥ | tretāyāṁ kshattriyā rājan sarve vai chakravarttinaḥ | āyushmanto mahāvīrā dhanurdhara-varā yudhi | jāyante kshattriyā vīrās tretāyāṁ vaśa-varttinaḥ | sarve varṇā mahārāja jāyante dvāpare sati | mahotsāhā vīryavantaḥ paraspara-jayaishiṇaḥ | tejasā 'lpena saṁyuktāḥ krodhanāḥ purushā nṛipa | lubdhā anṛitakāś chaiva tishye jāyanti Bhārata | īrshā mānas tathā krodho māyā 'sūyā tathaiva cha | tishye bhavati bhūtānāṁ rāgo lobhaś cha Bhārata | sankshepo vartā rājan dvāpare 'smin narādhipa |

"389. Four thousand years are specified as the duration of life in the Kṛita age,[274] three thousand in the Tretā, and two thousand form the period at present established on earth in the Dvāpara. There is no fixed measure in the Tishya (Kali): embryos die in the womb, as well as children after their birth. Men of great strength, goodness, wisdom, and virtue were born, and born too in hundreds and thousands. In the Kṛita age men were produced opulent and beautiful, as well as munis rich in austere fervour. Energetic, mighty, righteous, veracious, beautiful, well-formed, valorous, bow-carrying, (395) heroic Kshattriyas, distinguished in battle, were born.[275] In the Tretā all sovereigns were Kshattriyas. Heroic Kshattriyas were born in the Tretā, long-lived, great warriors, carrying bows in the fight, and living subject to authority. During the Dvāpara all castes are produced, energetic, valorous, striving for victory over one another. In the Tishya age are born men of little vigour, irascible, covetous, and mendacious. During that period, envy, pride, anger, delusion, ill-will, desire, and cupidity prevail among all beings. During this Dvāpara age there is some restriction."

[274] See above, p. 91, note 174.

As it is here stated that men of all castes were born in the Dvāpara, while Brāhmans and Kshattriyas only are spoken of as previously existing, it is to be presumed that the writer intends to intimate that no Vaiśyas or Śūdras existed during the Kṛita and Tretā ages. This accords with the account given in the passage quoted above from the Uttara Kānda of the Rāmāyaṇa, chapter 74, as well as with other texts which will be quoted below.

The following verses might be taken for a rationalistic explanation of the traditions regarding the yugas; but may be intended as nothing more than a hyperbolical expression of the good or bad effects of a king's more or less active discharge of his duties:

Śānti-parva, 2674. Kālo vā kāraṇaṁ rājṇo rājā vā kāla-kāraṇam | iti te saṁśayo mā bhūd rājā kālasya kāraṇam | daṇḍa-nītyāṁ yadā rājā samyak kārtsnyena varttate | tadā kṛita-yugam nāma kāla-sṛishṭam pravarttate | . . . . 2682. Daṇḍa-nītyāṁ yadā rājā trīn aṁśān anuvarttate | chaturtham aṁśam utsṛijya tadā tretā pravarttate | . . . . 2684. Arddhaṁ tyaktvā yadā rājā nīty-artham anuvarttate | tatas tu dvāparaṁ nāma sa kālaḥ sampravarttate | . . . . 2686. Daṇḍa-nītim parityajya yadā kārttsnyena bhūmipaḥ | prajāḥ kliśnāty ayogena pravartteta tadā kaliḥ | . . . . 2693. Rājā kṛita-yuga-srashṭā tretāyā dvāparasya cha | yugasya cha chaturthasya rājā bhavati kāraṇam |

"2674. The time is either the cause of the king, or the king is the cause of the time. Do not doubt (which of these alternatives is true): the king is the cause of the time. When a king occupies himself fully in criminal justice, then the Kṛita age, brought into existence by time, prevails." [Then follows a description of the results of such good government: righteousness alone is practised; prosperity reigns; the seasons are pleasant and salubrious; longevity is universal; no widows are seen; and the earth yields her increase without cultivation.] "2682. When the king practises criminal justice only to the extent of three parts, abandoning the fourth, then the Tretā prevails." [Then evil is introduced to the extent of a fourth, and the earth has to be tilled.] "2684. When the king administers justice with the omission of a half, then the period called the Dvāpara prevails." [Then evil is increased to a half, and the earth even when tilled yields only half her produce.] "2686. When, relinquishing criminal law altogether, the king actively oppresses his subjects, then the Kali age prevails." [Then the state of things, which existed in the Kṛita age, is nearly reversed.] "2693. The king is the creator of the Kṛita, Tretā, and Dvāpara ages, and the cause also of the fourth yuga."

[275] It does not appear clearly whether we are to suppose them to have been produced in the Kṛita, or in the Tretā, as in the passage of the Rāmāyaṇa, quoted in page 119.

The next extract is on the same subject of the duties of a king, and on the yugas as forms of his action (see Manu, ix. 301, quoted above, p. 49):

Sānti-parvan, 3406. Karma śūdre kṛishir vaiśye daṇḍa-nītiś cha rājani | brahmacharyyaṁ tapo mantrāḥ satyaṁ chāpi dvijātishu | teshāṁ yaḥ kshattriyo veda vastrāṇām iva śodhanam[276] | śīla-doshān vinirharttum sa pitā sa prajāpatiḥ | kṛitaṁ tretā dvāparaṁ cha kaliś Bharatarshabha | rāja-vṛittāni sarvāṇi rājaiva yugam uchyate | chāturvarṇyaṁ tathā vedāś chāturāśramyam eva cha | sarvam pramuhyate hy etad yadā rājā pramādyati |

"3406. Labour (should be found) in a Śūdra, agriculture in a Vaiśya, criminal justice in a King, continence, austere fervour, and the use of sacred texts in a Brāhman. The Kshattriya, who knows how to separate their good and bad qualities, (as (a washerman) understands the cleansing of clothes), is a father and lord of his subjects. The Kṛita, Tretā, Dvāpara, and Kali, are all modes of a King's action. It is a King who is called by the name of Yuga. The four castes, the Vedas, and the four orders, are all thrown into disorder when the king is regardless."

[276] This comparison is more fully expressed in a preceding verse (3404): Yo na jānāti nirharttuṁ vastrāṇāṁ rajako malam | raktānāṁ vā śodhayituṁ yathā nāsti tathaiva saḥ |

In two of the preceding passages different colours are represented as characteristic either of particular castes (Sānti-p. verses 6934 ff.), or of particular yugas (Vana-p. verses 11241 ff.). Colours (though not ranked in the same order of goodness) are similarly connected with moral and physical conditions in verses 10058 ff. of the Sāntiparvan, of which I shall offer a few specimens:

Shaḍ jīva-varṇāḥ paramam pramāṇaṁ kṛishṇo dhūmro nīlam athāsya madhyam | raktam punaḥ sahyataraṁ sukhaṁ tu hāridra-varṇam susukhaṁ cha śuklam | parantu śuklam vimalaṁ viśokaṁ gata-klamaṁ siddhyati dānavendra | gatvā tu yoni-prabhavāṇi daitya sahasraśaḥ siddhim upaiti jīvaḥ | 10060. . . . . Gatiḥ punar varṇa-kṛitā prajānāṁ varṇas tathā kāla-kṛito 'surendra | . . . . 10062. Kṛishṇasya varṇasya gatir nikṛishṭā sa sajate narake pachyamānaḥ |

"10058. Six colours of living creatures are of principal importance, black, dusky, and blue which lies between them; then red is more tolerable, yellow is happiness, and white is extreme happiness. White is perfect, being exempted from stain, sorrow, and exhaustion; (possessed of it) a being going through (various) births, arrives at perfection in a thousand forms. 10060. . . . . Thus destination is caused by colour, and colour is caused by time. . . . . 10062. The destination of the black colour is bad. When it has produced its results, it clings to hell."

The next passage, from the Harivanśa, assigns to each of the four castes a separate origin, but at the same time gives an explanation of their diversity which differs from any that we have yet encountered: unless, indeed, any one is prepared to maintain that the four principles, out of which the castes are here represented to have arisen, are respectively identical with the mouth, arms, thighs, and feet of Brahmā! This passage, however, corresponds with one of those already quoted in associating different colours with the several castes. The question with which the passage opens refers to an account which had been given in the preceding section (verses 11799 ff.) of the creation of Bhṛigu and Angiras, to both of whom the epithet "progenitor of Brāhmans" (brahma-vaṁśa-kara) is applied. No mention is made there of Kshattriyas or any other castes. M. Langlois, the French translator of the Harivanśa, remarks that the distinction between the age of the Brāhmans and that of the Kshattriyas is an unusual one, and receives no explanation in the context. But in two of the passages which have been quoted above (1) from the Uttara Kāṇḍa of the Rāmāyaṇa, chapter 74 (p. 119), and (2) from the Bhīshma-parva of the Mahābhārata, verses 393 ff. (p. 149), I think we find indications that the Kṛita Yuga was regarded as an age in which Brāhmans alone existed, nd that Kshattriyas only began to be born in the Tretā.

Harivaṁśa, 11808. Janameya uvācha | Śrutam brahma-yugam brahman yugānām prathamaṁ yugam | kshattrasyāpi yugam brahman śrotum ichchhāmi tattvataḥ | sasaṁkshepaṁ savistaraṁ niyamaiḥ bahubhiś chitam | upāya-jnaiś cha kathitaṁ kratubhiś chopaśobhitam | Vaiśampāyana uvācha | 11810. Etat te kathayishyāmi yajna-karmabhir architam | dāna-dharmaiś cha vividhaiḥ prajābhir upaśobhitam | te 'ngushṭha-mātrā munayaḥ ādattāḥ sūrya-raśmibhiḥ | moksha-prāptena vidhinā nirābādhena karmaṇā | pravritte chāpravritte cha nityam Brahma-parāyaṇāḥ | parāyaṇasya sangamya Brahmaṇas tu mahīpate | śrī-vrittāḥ pāvanāś chaiva brāhmaṇāś cha mahīpate | chārita-brahmacharyyāś cha brahmajnānena bodhitāḥ | pūrṇe yuga-sahasrānte prabhāve pralayāṁ gatāḥ | brāhmaṇā vritta-sampannā jnāna-siddhāḥ samāhitāḥ | 11815. Vyatiriktendriyo Vishṇur yogātmā brahma-sambhavah | Dakshaḥ prajāpatir bhūtvā sṛijate vipulāḥ prajāḥ | aksharād brāhmaṇāḥ saumyāḥ ksharāt kshattriya-bāndhavāḥ | vaiśyā vikārataś chaiva śūdrāḥ dhūma-vikārataḥ | śveta-lohitakair varṇaiḥ pītair nīlaiś cha brāhmaṇāḥ | abhinirvarttitāḥ varṇāṁś chintayānena Vishṇunā | tato varṇatvam āpannāḥ prajā loke chaturvidhāḥ | brāhmaṇāḥ kshattriyā vaiśyāḥ śūdrāś chaiva mahīpate | ekalingāḥ pṛithag-dharmā dvipādāḥ paramādbhutāḥ | yātanayā 'bhisampannā gati-jnāḥ sarva-karmasu | trayāṇāṁ varṇa-jātānāṁ veda-proktāḥ kriyāḥ smṛitāḥ | tena brāhmaṇa-yogena vaishṇavena mahīpate | prajnayā tejasā yogāt tasmāt Prāchetasaḥ prabhuḥ | Vishṇur eva mahāyogī karmaṇām antaraṁ gataḥ | tato nirvāṇa-sambhūtāḥ śūdrāḥ karma-vivarjitāḥ | tasmād nārhanti saṁskāram na hy atra brahma vidyate | yathā 'gnau dhūma-sanghāto hy araṇyā mathyamānayā | prādurbhūto visarpan vai nopayujyati karmaṇi | evaṁ śūdrā visarpanto bhuvi kārtsnyena janmanā | na saṁskṛitena[277] dharmeṇa veda-proktena karmaṇā |

"Janamejaya says: 11808. I have heard, o Brāhman, the (description of the) Brahma Yuga, the first of the ages. I desire also to be accurately informed, both summarily and in detail, about the age of the [277] The printed text reads nāsaṁskṛitena; but na saṁskṛitena seems necessary.

Kshattriyas, with its numerous observances, illustrated as it was by sacrifices, and described as it has been by men skilled in the art of narration. Vaiśampāyana replied: 11810. I shall describe to you that age revered for its sacrifices and distinguished for its various works of liberality, as well as for its people. Those Munis of the size of a thumb had been absorbed by the sun's rays. Following a rule of life leading to final emancipation, practising unobstructed ceremonies, both in action and in abstinence from action constantly intent upon Brahma, united to Brahma as the highest object,—Brāhmans glorious and sanctified in their conduct, leading a life of continence, disciplined by the knowledge of Brahma,—Brāhmans complete in their observances, perfect in knowledge, and contemplative,—when at the end of a thousand yugas, their majesty was full, these Munis became involved in the dissolution of the world. 11815. Then Vishṇu sprung from Brahma, removed beyond the sphere of sense, absorbed in contemplation, became the Prajāpati Daksha, and formed numerous creatures. The Brāhmans, beautiful (or, dear to Soma),[278] were formed from an imperishable (akshara), the Kshattriyas from a perishable (kshara), element, the Vaiśyas from alteration, the Śūdras from a modification of smoke. While Vishṇu was thinking upon the castes (varṇān), Brāhmans were formed with white, red, yellow, and blue colours (varṇaiḥ).[279] Hence in the world men have become divided into castes, being of four descriptions, Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and Śūdras, one in form, distinct in their duties, two-footed, very wonderful, full of energy(?), skilled in expedients in all their occupations. 11820. Rites are declared to be prescribed by the Vedas for the three (highest) castes. By that contemplation practised by the being sprung from Brahma (see v. 11815) —by that practised in his character as Vishṇu,—the Lord Prāchetasa (Daksha), i.e. Vishṇu the great contemplator (yogin), passed through his wisdom and energy from that state of meditation into the sphere of works.[280] Next the Śūdras, produced from extinction, are destitute of rites. Hence they are not entitled to be admitted to the purificatory ceremonies, nor does sacred science belong to them. Just as the cloud of smoke which rises from the fire on the friction of the fuel, and is dissipated, is of no service in the sacrificial rite, so too the Śūdras wandering over the earth, are altogether (useless for purposes of sacrifice) owing to their birth, their mode of life devoid of purity and their want of the observances prescribed in the Veda."

[278] In verse 11802, we read abhishichya tu Somaṁ cha yauvarājye Pitāmahaḥ | brāhmaṇānāṁ cha rājānaṁ śāśvataṁ rajanī-charam | "Brahmā also inaugurated Soma as the heir to the kingdom, as the king of the Brāhmans who walks eternally through the night."

[279] This play upon the two senses of the word varṇa will be noticed.

[280] I do not profess to be certain that I have succeeded in discovering the proper meaning of this last sentence.

The next extract gives an account at variance with all that precedes, as it does not assign to all the Brāhmans themselves the same origin, but describes the various kinds of officiating priests as having been formed from different members of Vishṇu's body :

Harivaṁśa, 11355. Evam ekārṇave bhūte śete loke mahādyutiḥ | prachhādya salilaṁ sarvaṁ Harir Nārāyaṇaḥ prabhuḥ | mahato rajaso madhye mahārṇava-samasya vai | virajasko mahābāhur aksharam brāhmaṇā viduḥ | ātma-rūpa-prakāśena tapasā saṁvṛitaḥ prabhuḥ | trikam āchhādya kālaṁ tu tataḥ sushvāpa sas tadā | purusho yajna ity evaṁ yat param parikīrttitam | yach chānyat purushākhyaṁ tu tat sarvam purushottamaḥ | ye cha yajnaparā viprā ṛitvijā iti sanjnitāḥ | ātma-dehāt purā bhūtā yajnebhyaḥ śrūyatāṁ tadā | 11360. Brahmāṇam paramaṁ vaktrād udgātāraṁ cha sāma-gāṁ | hotāraṁ atha chādhvaryyuṁ bāhubhyām asṛijat prabhuḥ | brāhmāṇo brāhmaṇatvāch cha prastotāraṁ cha sarvaśaḥ | tam maitrāvaruṇam sṛishṭvā pratishṭhātāram eva cha | udarāt pratiharttāram potāraṁ chaiva Bhārata | achhāvākam athorubhyām neshṭāraṁ chaiva Bhārata | pāṇibhyām athachāgnīdhram brahmaṇyaṁ chaiva yajñiyam | grāvāṇam atha bāhubhyām unnetāraṁ cha yājnikam | evam evaisha bhagavān shoḍaśaitān jagatpatiḥ | pravaktṛīn sarva-yajnānām ṛitvijo 'sṛijad uttamān | tad esha vai yajnamayaḥ purusho veda-saṁjnitaḥ | vedāś cha tanmayāḥ sarve sāngopanishada-kriyāḥ |

Vaisampāyana said: 1135. "Thus the glorious Lord Hari Nārāyaṇa, covering the entire waters, slept on (the world) which had become one sea, in the midst of the vast expanse of fluid[281] (rajas), resembling a mighty ocean, himself free from passion (virajaskaḥ), with mighty arms:—Brāhmans know him as the undecaying. Invested through austere fervour with the light of his own form, and clothed with triple time (past, present, and future), the Lord then slept. Purushottama

[281] Rajas is said in two places of the Nirukta, iv. 19, and x. 44, to have the sense of "water."

(Vishṇu) is whatever is declared to be the highest, Purusha the sacrifice, and everything else which is known by the name of Purusha. Hear how the Brāhmans devoted to sacrifice, and called ṛitvijes, were formerly produced by him from his own body for offering sacrifices. 11360. The Lord created from his mouth the brāhman, who is the chief, and the udgātṛi, who chaunts the Sāman; from his arms the hotṛi and the adhvaryu. He then . . . .[282] created the prastotṛi, the maitrāvaruṇa, and the pratishṭhātṛi; from his belly the pratiharttṛi and the potṛi, from his thighs the achhāvāka and the neshṭṛi, from his hands the agnīdhra and the sacrificial brahmaṇya, from his arms the grāvan and the sacrificial unnetṛi. Thus did the divine Lord of the world create these sixteen excellent ṛitvijes, the utterers of all sacrifices. Therefore this Purusha is formed of sacrifice and is called the Veda; and all the Vedas with the Vedāngas, Upanishads, and ceremonies, are formed of his essence."

Sect. XII.—Extracts from the Bhāgavata Purāṇa on the same subject.

I will conclude my quotations from the Purāṇas on the subject of the origin of mankind and of castes with a few passages from the Bhāgavata Purāṇa. The first extract reproduces some of the ideas of the Purusha Sūkta[283] more closely than any of the Puranic accounts yet given.

ii. 5, 34. Varsha-pūga-sahasrānte tad aṇḍam udake śayam | kālakarma-svabhāva-stho jīvo 'jīvam ajīvayat | 35. Sa eva Purushas tasmād aṇḍam nirbhedya nirgatah | sahasrorv-anghri-bāhv-akshah sahasrānanaśīrshavān | 36. Yasyehāvayavair lokān kalpayanti manīshiṇah | kaṭy-

[282] I am unable to make a proper sense out of the words brahmaṇo brāhmaṇatvāch cha, which, however, as I learn from Dr. FitzEdward Hall, are found (with only a difference of long and short vowels) in the best MSS. to which he has access, as well as in the Bombay edition. One of the sixteen priests, the Brāhmanāchhaṁsin, is not found in the enumeration, and his name may therefore have stood at the beginning of the line. Instead of the inept reading sarvaśah, at the end, the author may perhaps have written vakshasah, "from his chest," as, indeed, one MS. reads in the next line. The Bombay edition reads pṛishṭhāt, "from the back," instead of sṛishṭvā.

[283] M. Burnouf remarks in the Preface to the first vol. of his edition of the Bhāgavata, pp. cxxii. ff., on the manner in which its author has gone back to Vedic sources for his materials. The same thing is noticed by Professor Weber, Indische Studien, i. 286, note.

ādibhir adhaḥ sapta saptordhvaṁ jaghanādibhiḥ | 37. Purushasya mukham brahma kshatram etasya bāhavaḥ | ūrvor vaiśyo bhagavataḥ padbhyāṁ śūdro vyajāyata | 38. Bhūrlokaḥ kalpitaḥ padbhyām bhuvarloko 'sya nābhitaḥ | hṛidā svarloka uraśā maharloko mahātmanaḥ |

"34. At the end of many thousand years the living soul which resides in time, action, and natural quality gave life to that lifeless egg floating on the water. 35. Purusha then having burst the egg, issued from it with a thousand thighs, feet, arms, eyes, faces, and heads. 36. With his members the sages fashion the worlds, the seven lower worlds with his loins, etc., and the seven upper worlds with his groin, etc. 37. The Brāhman (was) the mouth of Purusha, the Kshattriya his arms, the Vaiśya was born from the thighs, the Śūdra from the feet of the divine being. The earth was formed from his feet, the air from his navel; the heaven by the heart, and the maharloka by the breast of the mighty one."

In the following verse the figurative character of the representation is manifest:

ii. 1, 37. Brahmānanaṁ kshattra-bhujo mahātmā viḍ-ūrur anghri-śrita-kṛishṇa-varṇaḥ |

"The Brāhman is his mouth; he is Kshattriya-armed, that great One, Vaiśya-thighed, and has the black caste abiding in his feet."

The next passage is more in accord with the ordinary representation, though here, too, the mystical view is introduced at the close:

iii. 22, 2. Brahmā 'sṛijat sva-mukhato yushmān ātma-parīpsayā | chhandomayas tapo-vidyā-yoga-yuktān alampaṭān | 3. Tat-trāṇāyā-sṛijach chāsmān doḥ-sahasrāt sahasra-pāt | hṛidayaṁ tasya hi brahma kshattram angam prachakshate |

"Brahmā, who is formed of the Veda (chhandas), with a view to the recognition of himself, created you (the Brāhmans) who are characterized by austere fervour, science, devotion and chastity, from his mouth. For their protection he, the thousand-footed, created us (the Kshattriyas) from his thousand arms: for they declare the Brāhman to be his heart, and the Kshattriya his body."

iii. 6, 29 ff. contains another reference to the production of the castes:

29. Mukhato 'varttata brahma Purushasya Kurūdvaha | yastūn-mukhatvād varṇānām mukhyo 'bhūd brāhmaṇo guruḥ | 30. Bāhubhyo 'varttata kshattraṁ kshattriyas tad-anuvrataḥ | yo jātas trāyate varṇān

paurushaḥ kaṇṭaka-kshatāt | 31. Viśo 'varttanta tasyorvor loka-vṛitti-karīr vibhoḥ | vaiśyas tad-udbhavo vārttāṁ nṛiṇāṁ yaḥ samavarttayat | 32. Padbhyām bhagavato jajne śuśrūshā dharma-siddhaye | tasyāṁ jātaḥ purā śūdro yad-vṛittyā tushyate Hariḥ | 33. Ete varṇāḥ sva-dharmeṇa yajanti sva-guruṁ Harim | śraddhayā "tma-viśuddhyarthaṁ yaj jātāḥ saha vṛittibhiḥ |

"29. From the mouth of Purusha, o descendant of Kuru, issued divine knowledge (brahma), and the Brāhman, who through his production from the mouth became the chief of the castes and the preceptor. 30. From his arms issued kingly power (kshattra), and the Kshattriya devoted to that function, who, springing from Purusha, as soon as born defends the castes from the injury of enemies. 31. From the thighs of the Lord issued the arts,[284] affording subsistence to the world; and from them was produced the Vaiśya who provided the maintenance of mankind. 32. From the feet of the divine Being sprang service for the fulfilment of duty. In it the Śūdra was formerly born, with whose function Hari is well satisfied. By fulfilling their own duties, with faith, for the purification of their souls, these castes worship Hari their parent, from whom they have sprung together with their functions."

In viii. 5, 41, we find the following:

Vipro mukhād brahma cha yasya guhyaṁ rājanya āsīd bhujayor balaṁ cha | ūrvor viḍ ojo 'nghrir aveda-śūdrau prasīdatāṁ naḥ sa mahā-vibhūtiḥ |

"May that Being of great glory be gracious to us, from whose mouth sprang the Brāhman and the mysterious Veda, from whose arms came the Rājanya and force, from whose thighs issued the Viś and energy, and whose foot is no-veda (aveda) and the Śūdra."

The same work gives the following very brief account of the Arvāk-srotas creation, which is described with somewhat more detail in the passages extracted above from the Vishṇu and Vāyu Purāṇas:

iii. 20, 25. Arvāk-srotas tu navamaḥ kshattar eka-vidho nṛiṇām | rajo 'dhikāḥ karma-parāḥ duḥkhe cha sukha-māninaḥ |

[284] The word so rendered is viśaḥ, which in the hymns of the Rig-veda has always the sense of "people." Here, however, it seems to have the sense assigned in the text, if one may judge from the analogy of the following verse, in which the Śūdra is said to be produced from his special function, śuśrūshā, "service." The Commentator explains viśaḥ = kṛishy-ādi-vyavasāyāḥ, "the professions of agriculture," etc.

"The Arvaksrotas creation was of one description,[285] viz., of men, in whom the quality of passion abounded, who were addicted to works, and imagined that in pain they experienced pleasure."

In vi. 6, 40, a new account is given of the origin of mankind. We are there told:

Aryamṇo Mātṛikā patnī tayoś Charshaṇayaḥ sutāḥ | yatra vai mānushī jātir Brahmaṇā chopakalpitā |

"The wife of Aryaman (the son of Aditi) was Mātṛikā. The Charshaṇis were the sons of this pair, and among them the race of men was formed by Brahmā." The word charshaṇi signifies "men," or "people" in the Veda.

In the following verse (which forms part of the legend of Purūravas, quoted in the 3rd vol. of this work, pp. 27 ff.) it is declared that in the Kṛita age there was only one caste:

ix. 14, 48. Eka eva purā vedaḥ praṇavaḥ sarva-vāṅmayaḥ | devo Nārāyaṇo nānya eko 'gnir varṇa eva cha | Purūravasa evāsīt trayī tretā-mukhe nṛipa |

"There was formerly but one Veda, the praṇava (the monosyllable Om), the essence of all speech; only one god, Nārāyaṇa, one Agni, and (one) caste. From Purūravas came the triple Veda, in the beginning of the Tretā."

Some of the Commentator's remarks on this text will be found in vol. iii. p. 29. He says the one caste was called "Hansa" (varṇaś cha eka eva haṁso nāma), and concludes his note by remarking: "The meaning is this: In the Kṛita age when the quality of goodness predominated in men, they were almost all absorbed in meditation; but in the Tretā, when passion prevailed, the method of works was manifested by the division of the Vedas, etc."

[285] The Sānkhya Kārikā, 53, says: ashṭa-vikalpo daivas tairyagyonyaś cha panchadhā bhavati mānushyaś chaika-vidhaḥ samāsato bhautikaḥ sargaḥ; which is thus translated by Mr. Colebrooke (in Wilson's Sānkhya Kārikā, p. 164): "The divine kind is of eight sorts; the grovelling is five-fold; mankind is single in its class. This, briefly, is the world of living beings." The Commentator Gaudapāda shortly explains the words mānushyaś chaikavidhaḥ by mānushayonir ekaiva, "the source of production of mankind is one only." Vijnāna Bhikshu, the Commentator on the Sānkhya Pravachana, iii. 46, paraphrases the same words thus, mānushya-sargaś chaika-prakāraḥ, "the human creation is of one sort."

Sect. XIII.—Results of this Chapter.

The details which I have supplied in the course of this chapter must have rendered it abundantly evident that the sacred books of the Hindus contain no uniform or consistent account of the origin of castes; but, on the contrary, present the greatest varieties of speculation on this subject. Explanations mystical, mythical, and rationalistic, are all offered in turn; and the freest scope is given by the individual writers to fanciful and arbitrary conjecture.

First: we have the set of accounts in which the four castes are said to have sprung from progenitors who were separately created; but in regard to the manner of their creation we find the greatest diversity of statement. The most common story is that the castes issued from the mouth, arms, thighs, and feet of Purusha, or Brahmā. The oldest extant passage in which this idea occurs, and from which all the later myths of a similar tenor have no doubt been borrowed, is, as we have seen, to be found in the Purusha Sūkta; but it is doubtful whether, in the form in which it is there presented, this representation is anything more than an allegory. In some of the texts which I have quoted from the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, traces of the same allegorical character may be perceived; but in Manu and the Puranas the mystical import of the Vedic text disappears, and the figurative narration is hardened into a literal statement of fact. In other passages, where a separate origin is assigned to the castes, they are variously said to have sprung from the words Bhūḥ, Bhuvah, Svah; from different Vedas; from different sets of prayers; from the gods, and the asuras; from nonentity (pp. 17–21), and from the imperishable, the perishable, and other principles (Harivaṁśa, 11816). In the chapters of the Vishṇu, Vāyu, and Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇas, where castes are described as coeval with the creation, and as having been naturally distinguished by different guṇas, or qualities, involving varieties of moral character, we are nevertheless allowed to infer that those qualities exerted no influence on the classes in whom they were inherent, as the condition of the whole race during the Kṛita age is described as one of uniform perfection and happiness; while the actual separation into castes did not take place, according to the Vāyu Purāṇa, until men had become deteriorated in the Tretā age.

Second: in various passages from the Brāhmanas, Epic poems, and Puranas, the creation of mankind is, as we have seen, described without the least allusion to any separate production of the progenitors of the four castes (pp. 23–27, and elsewhere). And whilst in the chapters where they relate the distinct formation of the castes, the Puranas, as has been observed, assign different natural dispositions to each class, they elsewhere represent all mankind as being at the creation uniformly distinguished by the quality of passion. In one of the texts I have quoted (p. 26 f.) men are said to be the offspring of Vivasvat; in another his son Manu is said to be their progenitor; whilst in a third they are said to be descended from a female of the same name. The passage which declares Manu to have been the father of the human race explicitly affirms that men of all the four castes were descended from him. In another remarkable text the Mahābhārata categorically asserts that originally there was no distinction of classes, the existing distribution having arisen out of differences of character and occupation. Similarly, the Bhāgavata Purāṇa in one place informs us that in the Kṛita age there was but one caste; and this view appears also to be taken in some passages which I have adduced from the Epic poems.

In these circumstances we may fairly conclude that the separate origination of the four castes was far from being an article of belief universally received by Indian antiquity.

I shall now proceed to enquire what opinion the writers of the older Vedic hymns appear to have entertained in regard to the origin of the race to which they themselves belonged.

CHAPTER II.

TRADITION OF THE DESCENT OF THE INDIAN RACE FROM MANU.[1]

It appears from the considerations urged in the preceding chapter that in all probability the Purusha Sūkta belongs to the most recent portion of the Rig-veda Sanhitā, and that it is at least doubtful whether the verse in which it connects the four castes with the different members of the creator's body is not allegorical. And we have seen that even if that representation is to be taken as a literal account of the creation of the different classes, it cannot, in the face of many other statements of a different tenor, and of great antiquity, be regarded as expressing the fixed belief of the writers of the period immediately succeeding the collection of the hymns in regard to the origin of the social divisions which prevailed in their own time. But the notions entertained of the origin of caste at the date of the Purusha Sūkta, whatever they may have been, will afford no criterion of the state of opinion on the same subject in an earlier age; and it therefore remains to enquire whether those hymns of the Rig-veda, which appear to be the most ancient, contain either (1) any tradition regarding the origin of mankind, or of the Indian tribes; or (2) any allusion to the existence, in the community contemporary with their composition, of separate classes corresponding to those afterwards known as Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and S'ūdras; and if they embrace any reference of the latter kind, whether they afford any explanation of the manner in which these orders of men came to occupy their respective positions in society. We shall find on examination that the hymns supply some information on both these branches of enquiry.

[1] On the subjects treated in this chapter compare my article in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, vol. xx. for 1863, pp. 406 ff., where a reference is made to the other writers who had previously treated of them, such as M. Nève, Mythe des Ribhavas, etc.

Numerous references are undoubtedly to be found in all parts of the hymn-collection to a variety of ranks, classes, and professions; of which an account will be given in the next chapter; but no hint is anywhere discoverable, except in the single text of the Purusha Sūkta, of those classes being distinguished from each other by any original difference of race. If, however, the early Vedic Indians had all along believed in the quadruple production of their nation from the different members of Purusha, one might naturally have expected to find allusions to such a variety of birth running through the hymns. But nothing, I repeat, of this kind is to be traced. On the contrary it appears from a considerable number of passages that at least the superior ranks of the community were regarded as being of one stock, the Aryan, and as having one common ancestor. This chapter will therefore embrace, First, the texts which are found in the hymns regarding the origin of the Indian tribes, and the history of their progenitor, and Secondly those passages which occur in the Brāhmaṇas, and other later works in which the statements of the early Vedic poets on these subjects are re-echoed or developed.

Sect. I.—Manu as the progenitor of the Āryan Indians and the institutor of religious rites according to the Hymns of the Rig-veda.

In this section I shall first quote the texts which allude to Manu as father (which must of course be understood to designate him as the actual human progenitor of the authors of the hymns, and of the bulk of the people to whom they addressed themselves); and then adduce those which speak of him as the institutor of religious rites, or as the object of divine protection.

(1) The following texts are of the first class:

i. 80, 16. Yām Atharvā Manush pitā Dadhyañ dhiyam atnata | tasmin brahmāṇi pūrvathā Indre ukthā samagmata |

"Prayers and hymns were formerly congregated in that Indra, in the ceremony which Atharvan, father Manu, and Dadhyanch celebrated."[2]

[2] This verse is quoted in the Nirukta, xii. 34, where the words Manush pitā,

i. 114, 2. Yat śaṁ cha yoś cha Manur āyeje pitā tad aśyāma tava Rudra praṇītishu |

"Whatever prosperity or succour father Manu obtained by sacrifice, may we gain all that under thy guidance, O Rudra."

ii. 33, 13. Yā vo bheshajā Marutaḥ śuchīni yā śantamā vṛishaṇo yā mayobhū | yāni Manur avṛiṇīta pitā naḥ tā śaṁ cha yoś cha Rudrasya vaśmi |

"Those pure remedies of yours, O Maruts, those which are most auspicious, ye vigorous gods, those which are beneficent, those which our[3] father Manu chose, those, and the blessing and succour of Rudra, I desire."

viii. 52, 1 (Sāma-veda, i. 355). Sa pūrvyo mahānām veno kratubhir ānaje | yasya dvārā Manush pitā deveshu dhiyaḥ ānaje |

"That ancient friend hath been equipped with the powers of the mighty (gods). Father Manu has prepared hymns to him, as portals of access to the gods."[4]

"father Manu," are explained as meaning Manuścha pitā mānavānām, "Manu the father of men." Sāyana, the Commentator on the Rig-veda, interprets them as meaning sarvāsām prajānām pitṛibhūto Manuścha, "Manu the father of all creatures." In R.V., x. 82, 3, the words "our father and generator" (yo naḥ pitā janitā), are applied to Vis'vakarman, the creator of the universe. The word "father" in the R.V. is often applied to Dyaus, the Sky, and "mother" to the Earth, as in vi. 51 5. (Compare Journ. Roy. As. Soc. for 1864, pp. 55 ff.) But in these passages it is not neeessary to suppose that the words are employed in any other than a figurative sense; although in a hymn to the Earth in the Atharva-veda, xii. 1, we find the following verse (the 15th): Tvaj-jātas tvayi charanti martyās tvam bibharshi dvipadas tvaṁ chatushpadaḥ | taveme pṛithivi pancha-mānavāḥ yebhyo jyotir amṛitam martyebhyaḥ udyan sūryo raśmibhir ātanoti | "Mortals born of thee live on thee: thou supportest both bipeds and quadrupeds. Thine, o Earth, are these five races of men, these mortals on whom the sun rising, sheds undying light with his rays;"—where it might almost appear as if the poet meant to represent mankind as actually generated by the earth. Brihaspati (iv. 50, 6; vi. 73, 1) and the other gods, as Indra, are called "father," or compared to fathers (vii. 52, 3); as are Rudra, vi. 49, 10; and the Rishi, R.V., x. 81, 1; x. 82, 1, 3, 4. S'. P. Br., i. 5, 3, 2, has Prajāpatau pitari; and Taitt. Br. iii. 9, 22, 1, Prajāpatim pitaram. In both the last places Prajāpati is referred to as the father of the gods.

[3] It is to be observed that while in the two preceeding passages Manu is styled merely "father Manu," he is here called "our father Manu" (Manuḥ pitā naḥ).

[4] I am indebted to Professor Aufrecht for the above translation of this, to me, obscure verse. Sāyaṇa explains it thus: Sa pūrvyo mukhyo mahānām pūjyānām yajamānānām kratubhiḥ karmabhir nimittabhūtair venaḥ kāntas teshām haviḥ kāmayamānaḥ ānaje āgachhati | yasyendrasya dvārā dvārāṇi prāptyupāyāni dhiyaḥ karmaṇi deveshv eteshu madhye pitā sarveshām pālako Manur ānaje prāpa | ānajiḥ prāpti-

The sense of the next text is less clear, but it appears at least to allude to the common designation of Manu as a father:

x. 100, 5. Yajno Manuḥ pramatir naḥ pitā hi kam |

"Sacrifice is Manu, our protecting father."

The following verse, according to the Commentator at least, speaks of the paternal or ancestral path of Manu. Professor Aufrecht thinks it need not mean more than the ancestral human path:

viii. 30. 3. Te nas trādhvam te avata te u no adhi vochata | mā naḥ pathaḥ pitryād mānavād adhi dūram naishṭa parāvatah |

"Do ye (gods) deliver, protect, and intercede for us; do not lead us far away from the paternal path of Manu.[5]

As in the preceding passages Manu is spoken of as the progenitor of the worshippers, so in the following the same persons may perhaps be spoken of as his descendants, although it is also true that the phrases employed may be merely equivalent to "children of men."

i. 68, 4. Hotā nishatto Manor apatye sa chit nu āsām patiḥ rayīnām |

"He (Agni) who abides among the offspring of Manu as the invoker (of the gods), is even the lord of these riches."[6]

karmā | "This chief one, in consequence of the rites of the venerable sacrificers, desiring their oblation, comes,—he (Indra) as means of attaining whom Manu the preserver of all has obtained rites among these gods." Professor Benfey renders the verse, where it occurs in the Sāma-veda, thus: "He is the chief of the rich, through works the dear one enlightens him, whose doors father Manu has, and illuminates observances towards the gods." From Prof. Benfey's note to the passage (p. 230) it appears that the Commentator on the Sāma-veda explains ānaje by vyaktīkaroti ātmānam, "makes himself distinct" (herein differing from Sāyana), Manu by jnātā sarvasya = Indraḥ, "the knower of all, Indra," and ānaje, where it occurs the second time, by āgamayati, "causes to come." Such are the differences of opinion regarding the interpretation of some parts of the hymns.

[5] On this verse Sāyana comments thus: Sarveshām Manuḥ pitā tataḥ āgatāt | parāvatah | pitā Manur dūram mārgam chakre | tasmāt patho mārgāt no asmān mā naishṭa mā nayata | apanayanam mā kuruta ity arthaḥ | sarvadā brahmacharyyāgnihotrādi-karmāṇi yena mārgeṇa bhavanti tam eva asmān nayata | kintu dūram ya etad-vyatirikto viprakṛishṭo mārgo 'sti tasmād adhi adhikam ity arthaḥ asmān apanayata | "'Of Manu' means, come from Manu who is the father of all. 'Distant:' Father Manu journeyed along a distant path. Do not lead us away from that path. Lead us along that path in which continence, the agnihotra sacrifice, and other duties have always been practised. But lead us away from the distant path which is different from that."

[6] The Commentator here explains "the offspring of Manu" as offspring or creatures in the form of worshippers (yajamāna-svarūpāyām prajāyām); and adds that according to a Brāhmaṇa "creatures are sprung from Manu" ("Mānavyo hi prajāḥ"

iii. 3, 6. Agnir devebhir manushaścha jantubhis tanvāno yajnam purupeśasam dhiyā |

"Agni, together with the gods, and the children (jantubhih) of Manush, celebrating a multiform sacrifice with hymns," etc.

In the following texts reference is made to the people of Manu, the word for "people" being viś, from which vaiśya, "a man of the people," is derived:

iv. 37, 1. Upa no Vājāḥ adhvaram Ṛibhukshāḥ devāḥ yāta pathībhir devayānaiḥ | yathā yajnam manusho vikshu āsu dadhidve raṇvāḥ sudineshu ahnām |

"Ye gods, Vājas, and Ribhukshans, come to our sacrifice by the path travelled by the gods, that ye, pleasing deities, may institute a sacrifice among these people of Manush (Manusho vikshu) on auspicious days."

vi. 14, 2. Agnim hotāram īḷate yajneshu manusho viśaḥ |

"The people of Manush praise in the sacrifices Agni the invoker."

viii. 23, 13. Yad vai ū viśpatiḥ śitaḥ suprīto manusho viśi | viśvā id Agniḥ prati rakshāṁsi sedhati |

"Whenever Agni, lord of the people,[7] kindled, abides gratified among the people of Manush, he repels all Rakshases."

(2.) From the preceding texts it appears that the authors of the hymns regarded Manu as the progenitor of their race. But (as is clear from many other passages) they also looked upon him as the first person by whom the sacrificial fire had been kindled, and as the institutor of the ceremonial of worship; though the tradition is not always consistent on this subject. In one of the verses already quoted (i. 80, 16) Manu is mentioned in this way, along with Atharvan and iti hi brāhmaṇam). Yāska (Nir. iii. 7) gives the following derivations of the word manushya, "man:" Manushyāḥ kasmāt | matvā karmāṇi sīvyanti | manasyamānena sṛishṭāḥ . . . . | Manor apatyam Manusho vā | "From what are men (named)? Because after reflection they sew together works; (or) because they were created by one who reflected (or, according to Durga, "rejoiced") . . . . (or) because they are the offspring of Manu, or Manush."

[7] Viśpati. Compare vi. 48, 8, where it is said: viśvāsām gṛihapatir viśām asi tvam Agne mānushīnam | "Agni, thou art the master of the house of all human people (or, people sprung from Manush);" and x. 80, 6, Agnim viśaḥ īlate mānushīr yāḥ Agnim Manusho Nahusho vi jātāḥ | "Human people (or, people descended from Manush) praise Agni: (people) sprung from Manush, from Nahush, (praise) Agni." Or if manushaḥ be the nom. plur. the last clause will run thus: "men sprung from Nahush (praise) Agni."

Dadhyanch, as having celebrated religious rites in ancient times. The following further passages refer to him as a kindler of fire, and offerer of oblations:

i. 36, 19. Ni tvām Agne Manur dadhe jyotir janāya śaśvate |

"Manu has placed (or ordained) thee, Agni, a light to all the people."

i. 76, 5. Yathā viprasya Manusho havirbhir devān ayajaḥ kavibhiḥ kaviḥ san | eva hotaḥ satyatara tvam adya Agne mandrayā juhvā yajasva |

"As thou, thyself a sage, didst, with the sages, worship the gods with the oblations of the wise Manush, so to-day, Agni, most true invoker, worship them with a cheerful flame."

v. 45, 6. Ā ita dhiyam kṛiṇavāma sakhāyah . . . . yayā Manur Viśiśipram jigāya . . . .

"Come, friends, let us perform the prayer . . . . whereby Manu conquered Viśiśipra . . . .

viii. 10. 2. Yad vā yajnam Manave sammimikshathur eva it Kāṇvasya bodhatam |

"Or if ye (Aśvins) sprinkled the sacrifice for Manu, think in like manner of the descendant of Kanva."

ix. 96, 11. Tvayā hi naḥ pitarah Soma pūrve karmāṇi chakruḥ pavamāna dhīrāḥ | . . . . 12. Yathā apavathāḥ Manave vayodhāh amitrahā varivovid havishmān | eva pavasva . . . .

"For through thee, O pure Soma, our early fathers, who were wise, performed their rites . . . 12. As thou didst flow clear for Manu, thou upholder of life, destroyer of foes, possessor of wealth, rich in oblations, so (now) flow clear." . . . .

x. 63, 7. Yebhyo hotrām prathamām āyeje Manuḥ samiddhāgnir manasā sapta hotṛibhiḥ | tā Ādityā abhayam śarma yachhata . . . .

"O ye Ādityas, to whom Manu, when he had kindled fire, presented along with seven hotṛi priests the first oblation with a prayer, bestow on us secure protection."

x. 69, 3. "Yat te Manur yad anīkam Sumitrah samīdhe Agne tad idam navīyaḥ"[8] |

[8] The S'atapatha Brāhmaṇa (i. 4, 2, 5) thus explains the words deveddho Manviddhah:—Manviddhaḥ iti | Manur hy etam agre aindhha | tasmād āha "Manviddhaḥ" iti | "The gods formerly kindled it (fire): hence it is called 'god-kindled.' Manu formerly kindled it: and hence it is called 'kindled by Manu.'" The Aitareya Brāhmaṇa (ii. 34), however, explains the word Manv-iddhah from the fact that "men kindle it" (imam hi manushyā indhate).

"That lustre of thine which Manu, which Sumitra, kindled is this same which is now renewed."

In conformity with the preceding texts, the following may be understood as declaring that the sacrificial fire had been first kindled by Manu:

i. 13, 4 (= S.V. ii. 700). Agne sukhatame rathe devān īḷitaḥ ā vaha | asi hotā Manurhitaḥ |

"O Agni, lauded, bring the gods hither in a most pleasant chariot. Thou art the invoker (of the gods) placed by Manush." [9]

i. 14, 11. Tvam hotā Manurhito 'gne yajneshu sīdasi | saḥ imam no adhvaram yaja |

"Thou, Agni, the invoker placed by Manush, art present at the sacrifices: do thou present this our oblation." (See also R.V. iii. 2, 15.)

vi. 16, 9. Tvam hotā Manurhitaḥ . . . .

"Thou art the invoker placed by Manush . . . ."

viii. 19, 21. Īḷe girā Manurhitam yam devā dūtam aratim ni erire | yajishṭham havya-vāhanam |

"With a hymn I laud that adorable bearer of oblations placed by Manush,[10] whom the gods have sent as a ministering messenger."

[9] The compound word which I have here rendered "placed by Manush" is in the original Manur-hita. Professor Aufrecht would render it "given to man," and quotes i. 36, 10, in support of this view. The sense I have given is supported by i. 36, 19, where the same root, dhā, from which hita (originally dhita) comes, is used, joined with the particle ni. The same participle hita is used in vi. 16, 1, where it is said: Tvam Agne yajnānām hotā sarveshām hitaḥ | devebhir mānushe jane | "Thou, Agni, hast been placed, or ordained, among the race of Manush by the gods as the invoker at all sacrifices." The fact that Agni is here said to have been placed by the gods among the race of Manush does not forbid us to suppose that there are other passages in which, either inconsistently, or from a different point of view, Agni may have been said to be placed by Manu. The compound manur-hita occurs also in the following texts, where, however, it has probably the sense of "good for man," viz.: i. 106, 5. Bṛihaspate sadam id naḥ sugaṁ kṛidhi śaṁ yor yat te manur-hitam tad īmahe | "Brihaspati, do us always good: we desire that blessing and protection of thine which is good for man." (Sāyana says that here manur-hitam means either "placed in thee by Manu, i.e., Brahmā," or, "favourable to man." Benfey, in loco, renders "destined for man.") vi. 70, 2. Rājantī asya bhuvanasya rodasī asme retaḥ sinchataṁ yad manur-hitam | "Heaven and earth, ruling over this world, drop on us that seed which is good for man." x. 26, 5. Ṛishiḥ sa yo manur-hitaḥ | "He (Pūshan) who is a rishi kind to man," etc. Professor Roth s.v. gives only the latter sense.

[10] Though the word manur-hita is here interpreted by Sāyana as meaning "placed by Manu Prajāpati who sacrificed," it might also signify "friendly to men," as Agni is also said to have been sent by the gods.

viii. 34, 8. Ā tvā hotā Manurhito devatrā vakshad īḍyaḥ |

"May the adorable invoker placed by Manu bring thee (Indra) hither among the gods," etc.

There is also a class of passages in which the example of Manush may be referred to by the phrase manush-vat, "like Manush," or, "as in the case of Manush."[11] Thus in i. 44, 11, it is said:

Ni tvā yajnasya sādhanam Agne hotāram ṛitvijam manushvad deva dhīmahi . . . . |

"Divine Agni, we, like Manush, place thee, the accomplisher of the sacrifice, the invoker, the priest," etc.

v. 21, 1. Manushvat tvā ni dhīmahi Manushvat sam idhīmahi | Agne Manushvad Angiro devān devayate yaja |

"Agni, we place thee like Manush, we kindle thee like Manush. Agni, Angiras, worship the gods like Manush, for him who adores them."

vii. 2, 3. Manushvad Agnim Manunā samiddham sam adhvarāya sadam in mahema |

"Let us, like Manush, continually invoke to the sacrifice Agni who was kindled by Manu."

viii. 27, 7. Suta-somāso Varuṇa havāmahe Manushvad iddhāgnayaḥ |

"We invoke thee, Varuṇa, having poured out soma, and having kindled fire, like Manush."

viii. 43, 13. Uta tvā Bhṛiguvat śuche Manushvad Agne āhuta | Angirasvad havāmahe | . . . . 27. Yam tvā janāsa indhate Manushvad Angirastama | Agne sa bodhi me vachaḥ |

"Like Bhṛigu, like Manush, like Angiras, we invoke thee, bright Agni, who hast been invoked. . . . . 27. Agni, most like to Angiras, whom men kindle like Manush, attend to my words."

The Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, i. 5, 1, 7, explains thus the word Manushvat:[12]—Manur ha vai agre yajnena īje | tad anukṛitya imāḥ prajāḥ ya-

[11] I should observe that Prof. Aufrecht thinks the phrase—except perhaps with the single exception of viii. 43, 13—means "amongst men." Prof. Roth gives only the sense "like men," "as among, or for, men."

[12] The same work in the same passage thus explains the phrase Bharata-vat. "He bears (bharati) the oblation to the gods; wherefore men say, Bharata (or 'the bearer') is Agni. Or, he is called Bharata (the 'sustainer') because, being breath, he sustains these creatures." This phrase may, however, refer to the example of King Bharata. See Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, xiii. 5, 4, 14.

jante | tasmād āha "Manush-vad" iti | "Manor yajnaḥ" iti u vai āhuḥ | tasmād vā iva āhur "Manushvad" iti | "Manu formerly sacrificed with a sacrifice. Imitating this, these creatures sacrifice. He therefore says, Manushvat, 'like Manu.' Or, they say 'like Manu,' because men speak of the sacrifice as being Manu's."

It must, however, be admitted that Manu is not always spoken of in the hymns of the first, or only, kindler of fire or celebrator of religious rites. In i. 80, 16, already quoted, Atharvan and Dadhyanch are specified along with him as having offered sacrifice in early times.

In the following verses Atharvan is mentioned as having generated fire:

vi. 16, 13. Imam tu tyam Atharva-vad Agnim mathanti vedhasaḥ |

"The wise draw forth this Agni, as Atharvan did."

vi. 16, 13 (= S. V. i. 9; Vāj. Sanh. xi. 32). Tvām Agne pushkarād adhy Atharvā nir amanthata . . . . | 14. Tam u tvā Dadhyañ ṛishiḥ putraḥ īdhe Atharvaṇaḥ |

"Agni, Atharvan drew thee forth from the lotus leaf," etc. 14. "Thee the rishi Dadhyanch, son of Atharvan, kindled," etc.

[In the Vājasaneyi Sanhitā, the first of these verses is immediately preceded by the following words (xi. 32): Atharvā tvā prathamo nir amanthad Agne | "Atharvan was the first who drew thee forth, Agni."]

Again it is said in the Rig-veda, x. 21, 5. Agnir jāto Atharvaṇā vidad viśvāni kāvyā | bhuvad dūto Vivasvataḥ | "Agni, produced by Atharvan, knows all wisdom, and has become the messenger of Vivaswat."

In i. 83, 5, Atharvan is mentioned as the earliest institutor of sacrifice: Yajnair Atharvā prathamaḥ pathas tate tataḥ sūryo vratapāḥ venaḥ ājani | "Atharvan was the first who by sacrifices opened up paths; then the friendly Sun, the upholder of ordinances, was produced," etc.: so too in x. 92, 10. Yajnair Atharvā prathamo vi dhārayad devā dakshair Bhṛigavaḥ sam chikitrire | "Atharvan, the first, established (all things) with sacrifices. The divine Bhṛigus co-operated with their powers." [13]

[13] These two texts might, though not very probably, be understood to mean not that Atharvan was the first to employ sacrifice, but to use it for the purpose referred to in the context.

The next texts speak of the Bhṛigus as the institutors of sacrifice by fire:

i. 58, 6. Dadhus tvā Bhṛigavo mānusheshv ā rayim na chārum suhavam janebhyaḥ | hotāram Agne |

"The Bhṛigus have placed thee, o Agni, among men, as an invoker, like a beautiful treasure, and easily invoked for men," etc.

ii. 4, 2. Imam vidhanto apām sadasthe dvitā adadhur Bhṛigavo vikshu Āyoḥ |

"Worshipping him (Agni) in the receptacle of waters, the Bhṛigus placed him among the people of Āyu."

x. 46, 2. Imam vidhanto apām sadasthe paśum na nashṭam padair anu gman | guhā chatantam uśijo namobhir ichhanto dhīrā Bhṛigavo avindan |

"Worshipping him in the receptacle of waters, and desiring him with prostrations, the wise and longing Bhṛigus followed him with their steps, like a beast who had been lost, and found him lurking in concealment"[14] (i. 65, 1).

In other places, the gods, as well as different sages, are mentioned as introducing or practising worship by fire, or as bringing down the sacred flame from heaven:

i. 36, 10. Yam tvā devāso manave dadhur iha yajishṭham havyavāhana | yam Kaṉvo Medhyātithir dhanaspṛitam yam Vṛishā yam Ūpastutaḥ |

"Thou, o bearer of oblations, whom the gods placed here as an object of adoration to man (or Manu); whom Kaṉva, whom Medhyātithi, whom Vṛishan, whom Upastuta (have placed) a bringer of wealth," etc. Compare vi. 16, 1, quoted above, p. 167, note 9.

iii. 5, 10. Yadī Bhṛigubhyaḥ pari Mātariśvā guhā santaṁ havyavāham samīdhe |

"When Mātariśwan kindled for the Bhṛigus Agni, the bearer of oblations, who was in concealment."

x. 46, 9. Dyāvā yam Agnim pṛithivī janishṭām āpas Tvashṭā Bhṛigavo yam sahobhiḥ | īḷenyam prathamam Mātariśvā devās tatakshur manave yajatram |

"Mātariśwan and the gods have made, as the first adorable object of worship to man (or Manu), that Agni whom heaven and earth, whom [14] In the following passages also the Bhṛigus are mentioned as connected with the worship of Agni: i. 71, 4; i. 127, 7; i. 143, 4; iii. 2, 4; iv. 7, 1; vi. 15, 2; viii. 43, 13; viii. 91, 4; x. 122, 5.

the waters, whom Tvashṭṛi, whom the Bhṛigus, have generated by their powers."

In the 8th verse the Āyus, and in the 10th the gods, as well as men, are said to have placed Agni.

In i. 60, 1; i. 93, 6; i. 148, 1; iii. 2, 13; iii. 5, 10; iii. 9, 5; vi. 8, 4, Mātariśvan is again spoken of as the bringer or generator of fire. (Compare note 1, in p. 416, of my article "On Manu the progenitor of the Āryan Indians," in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, vol. xx. for 1863.)

But to return to Manu. Although the distinction of having been the first to kindle fire is thus, in various passages, ascribed to Atharvan or the Bhṛigus, this does not disprove the fact that in other places, it is, somewhat inconsistently, assigned to Manu; and none of these other personages is ever brought forward as disputing with Manu the honour of having been the progenitor of the Aryan race. In this respect the Vedic tradition exhibits no variation, except that Yama also seems in some places to be represented as the first man. (See my article in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, for 1865, pp. 287 ff., and especially the words of the Atharva-veda, xviii. 3, 14. Yo mamāra prathamo marttyānām | "Who (Yama) died first of men.")

(III.) The following passages describe Manu as being the object of special favour or intervention on the part of some of the gods:

i. 112, 16. Yābhir narā Śayave yābhir Atraye yābhiḥ purā Manave gātum īshathuḥ | yābhiḥ śārīr ājatam Śyūmaraśmaye tābhir u shu ūtibhir Aśvinā gatam | 18. . . . . Yabhir Manum śūram ishā samāvatam |

"Come, Aświns, with those succours, whereby, o heroes, ye effected deliverance for Śayu, for Atri, and formerly for Manu, whereby ye shot arrows for Śyūmaraśmi. 18. . . . . whereby ye preserved the hero Manu with food."[15]

viii. 15, 5. Yena jyotīṁshi Āyave Manave cha viveditha | mandāno asya barhisho vi rājasi |

"Exulting in this (exhilaration), wherewith thou didst make known the luminaries to Āyu, and to Manu, thou art lord of the sacrificial grass."

[15] This passage, as far as it concerns Manu, is thus explained by Sāyaṇa: "And with those succours, whereby ye made a path, a road which was the cause of escape from poverty, by sowing barley and other kinds of grain, etc., for Manu, the royal rishi of that name; according to another text" (i. 117, 21).

When compared with the preceding verse it seems not improbable that the following text may refer to the same tradition, and that instead of Vāyave we should read Āyave:

vii. 91, 1. Kuvid anga namasā ye vṛidhāsaḥ purā devā anavadyāsaḥ āsan | te Vāyave (Āyave ?) Manave bādhitāya avāsayan Ushasam Sūryena |

"Certainly those gods who were magnified by worship were of old faultless. They displayed the dawn with the sun to Vāyu (Āyu ?), to Manu when distressed.

There is also a reference to the sky being displayed to Manu in the following verse, unless the word (manu) is to be there taken as an epithet of Purūravas, which does not seem a probable supposition:

i. 31, 4. Tvam Agne Manave dyām avāśayaḥ Purūravase sukṛite sukṛittaraḥ |

"Thou, Agni, didst display the sky to Manu, to the beneficent Purūravas, (thyself) more beneficent."

If Manu be taken for a proper name in vii. 91, 1, it may reasonably be understood in the same way in vi. 49, 13, where the person referred is similarly spoken of as distressed:

vi. 49, 13. Yo rajāṁśi vimame pārthivāni triś chid Vishṇur Manave bādhitāya |

"Vishṇu who thrice measured the terrestrial regions for Manu when distressed."

And in that case the word Manu may perhaps also be taken to denote a person in vii. 100, 4, Vichakrame pṛithivīm esha etām kshetrāya Vishṇur Manave daśasyan | "This Vishṇu strode over this earth, bestowing it on Manu for an abode." Although here the general sense of "man" would make an equally good sense.

I may introduce here another text in which, from its conjunction with other proper names, it must be held that the word Manu denotes a person.

i. 139, 9. Dadhyañ ha me janusham pūrvo Angirāḥ Priyamedhaḥ Kaṇvo Atrir Manur vidus te me pūrve Manur viduḥ |

"Dadhyanch, the ancient Angiras, Priyamedha, Kaṇva, Atri, Manu, know my (Paruchhepa's?) birth; they, my predecessors, Manu, know it.'

There are, as we have seen, some passages in the hymns in which it is doubtful whether the words manu and manush denote an individual, or stand for man in general; and there are also texts in which the latter sense is clearly the only one that can be assigned. Such are the following:

(1.) Manu in the singular:

i. 130, 5. . . . . Dhenur iva manave viśvadohaso janāya viśvadohasaḥ |

"All-productive as a cow to man, all-productive to a person."

v. 2, 12. Barhishmate manave śarma yaṁsad havishmate manave śarma yaṁsat |

"That he may bestow protection on the man who sacrifices, on the man who offers oblations."

viii. 47, 4. Manor viśvasya gha id ime Ādityāḥ rāya īśate . . . . |

"These Ādityas are lords of every man's riches" . . . .

(2.) Manu in the plural:

viii. 18, 22. Ye chid hi mṛityubandhavaḥ Ādityāḥ manavaḥ smasi | pra su naḥ āyur jīvase tiretana |

"O ye Ādityas, prolong the days of us who are men who are of kin to death, that we may live."

x. 91, 9. Yad devayanto dadhati prayāṁsi te havishmanto manavo vṛikta-barhishaḥ |

"When these pious men sacrificing, and spreading the sacrificial grass, offer thee oblations."

(3.) Manush in the singular:

i. 167, 7. Guhā charantī manusho na yoshā |

"Like the wife of a man moving secretly."

vii. 70, 2. . . . atāpi gharmo manusho duroṇe |

"Fire has been kindled in the man's abode."

The same phrase manusho duroṇe occurs also in viii. 76, 2; x. 40, 13; x. 104, 4; x. 110, 1. In x. 99, 7, we find the words druhvaṇe manushe, "against the injurious man."

(4.) Manush in the plural:

iv. 6, 11. Hotāram Agnim manusho nishedur namasyanta uśijaḥ śaṁsam āyoḥ |

"Men offering worship, and eager, attend upon Agni the invoker, the object of man's (or Āyu's) praises."

In the following passages, if the word Manu is not to be understood as denoting a person, the progenitor of men, it seems, at all events, to designate his descendants, the favoured race to which the authors of the hymns believed themselves to belong, and appears to be in some cases at least nearly synonymous with Ārya, the name by which they called men of their own stock and religion, in contradistinction to the Dasyus, a term by which we are either to understand hostile demons, or the rude aboriginal tribes:

i. 130, 8. Indraḥ samatsu yajamānam āryam prāvad viśveshu śatamūtir ājishu . . . . | manave śāsad avratān tvacham kṛishṇām arandhayat | [16]

"Indra who bestows a hundred succours in all conflicts . . . . has preserved the Ārya in the fights. Chastising the lawless, he has subjected the black skin to the man (manave)."

Compare i. 117, 21, where instead of manu, or manush, the word manusha is employed:

Yavaṁ vṛikeṇa Aśvinā vapantā isham duhantā manushāya dasrā | abhi dasyum bakureṇa dhamantā uru jyotiś chakrathur āryāya |

"Sowing barley with the wolf, ye, o potent Aśvins, milking out food for man (manusha), blowing away the Dasyu with the thunderbolt(?), have made a broad light for the Ārya." [17]

i. 175, 3. Tvam hi śūraḥ sanitā chodayo manusho ratham | sahāvān dasyum avratam oshaḥ pātram na śochishā |

"Thou, a hero, a benefactor, hast impelled the chariot of man: victorious, thou hast burnt up the rite-less Dasyu, as a vessel is consumed by a blaze."

ii. 20, 6. Sa ha śruta Indro nāma deva ūrddhvo bhuvad manushe dasmatamaḥ | ava priyam arśasānasya sahvān śiro bharad dāsasya svadhāvān | 7. Sa vṛittrahā Indraḥ kṛishṇayonīḥ purandaro dāsīr airayad vi | ajanayad manave kshām apaścha satrā śaṁsam yajamānasya tūtot |

"The god renowned as Indra hath arisen most mighty for the sake of man. Violent, self-reliant, he has smitten down the dear head of the destructive Dāsa. 7. Indra, the slayer of Vṛittra, the destroyer of cities, has scattered the Dasyu (hosts) sprung from a black womb. He has produced for man the earth[18] and the waters; he has perfectly fulfilled the aspiration of his worshipper."

[16] A similar opposition between the word āyu, "man," and dasyu is to be noted in the following passage, vi. 14, 3: nānā hi Agne avase spardhante rāyo aryaḥ | tūrvanto dasyum āyavo vrataiḥ sīkshanto avratam | "In various ways, o Agni, the riches of the enemy emulously hasten to the help (of thy worshippers). The men destroy the Dasyu, and seek by rites to overcome the riteless."

[17] See Prof. Roth's explanation of this passage as given in a note to the article on Manu the progenitor of the Aryan Indians, Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, vol. xx. p. 418.

vi. 21, 11. Nu me ā vācham upa yāhi vidvān viśvebhiḥ sūno sahaso yajatraiḥ | ye agnijihvāḥ ṛitasāpaḥ āsur ye manum chakrur uparam dasāya |

"Do thou, o wise god, son of strength, approach my hymn with all the adorable (deities), who were fire-tongued, rite-frequenting, and made man superior to the Dāsa."

viii. 87, 5. Abhi hi satya somapāḥ ubhe babhūtha rodasī | Indrāsi sunvato vṛidhaḥ patir divaḥ ¦ 6. Tvam hi śaśvatīnām Indra dartā purām asi | hantā dasyor manor vṛidhaḥ patir divaḥ |

"5. For thou, o true soma-drinker, hast overcome both worlds. Indra, thou art the prosperer of him who makes libations, the lord of the sky. 6. Thou, Indra, art the destroyer of all the cities, the slayer of the Dasyu, the prosperer of man, the lord of the sky."

ix. 92, 5. Tan nu satyam pavamānasya astu yatra viśve kāravaḥ saṁnasanta | jyotir yad ahne akṛiṇod u lokam prāvad manum dasyave kar abhīkam |

"Let this be the true (abode) of the pure god (Soma) where all the sages have assembled; since he has made light and space for the day, has protected man, and repelled the Dasyu."

x. 49, 7. Yad mā sāvo manushaḥ āha nirṇije ṛidhak kṛishe dāsaṁ kṛitvyam hathaiḥ |

"When the libation of man calls me to splendour, I tear in pieces (?) with blows the vigorous Dāsa."

x. 73, 7. Tvam jaghantha Namuchim makhasyum dāsam kṛiṇvānaḥ ṛishaye vimāyam | tvam chakartha manavè syonān patho devatrā anjasā iva yānān |

"Thou hast slain the lusty Namuchi, making the Dāsa bereft of magic against the rishi: thou made for man beautiful paths leading as it were straightway to the gods."

It is to be observed that in none of these passages is the Brahmanical, or any other, caste singled out as having been the special object of divine protection. Men, or Āryas, are the favourites of the gods. And even in such hymns as R.V. i. 112; i. 116; i. 117; i. 119, etc., where the Aśvins are celebrated as having interposed for the deliverance of many of their worshippers, whose names are there specified, we are nowhere informed that any of these were Brāhmans, although reference is often made to their being rishis.[19]

[18] In iv. 26, 7, Indra says: "Aham bhūmim adadām āryāya aham vṛishṭim dāśushe martyāya | "I gave the earth to the Ārya; I gave rain to the sacrificing mortal."

There is one other text of considerable interest and importance, R.V. iii. 34, 9, which, although it is unconnected with Manu, may be here cited, as it connects the word ārya with the term varṇa, "colour," which in later times came to signify "caste," as applied to the Brāhmans and other classes. It is this:

Sasānātyān uta sūryaṁ sasāna Indraḥ sasāna purubhojasaṁ gām | hiraṇyayam uta bhogaṁ sasāna hatvī dasyūn pra āryaṁ varṇam āvat |

"Indra bestowed horses, he bestowed the sun, he bestowed the many-nourishing cow, he bestowed golden wealth: having slain the Dasyu, he protected the Āryan colour."

It is to be observed that here the word varṇa is used in the singular. Thus all the persons coming under the designation of Ārya, are included under one class or colour, not several.[20]

We shall see in the next chapter that, irrespective of the verse of the Purusha Sūkta, there are in the Rig-veda Sanhitā a few texts in which the Brāhmans are mentioned alone of all the four castes, without any distinct reference being found anywhere to the second class as Rājanyas, or Kshattriyas, or to the third and fourth as Vaiśyas and Sūdras.

In the mean time I shall advert to some other phrases which are employed in the hymns, either to denote mankind in general, or to signify certain national or tribal divisions. The most important of these is that of the "five tribes," who are frequently referred to under the appellations of pancha-kṛishṭayaḥ, pancha-kshitayaḥ, pancha-kshitayo mānushyyaḥ (vii. 97, 1), pancha-charshaṇayaḥ, pancha-janāḥ, pānchajanyā viś (viii. 52, 7), pancha bhūma (vii. 69, 2), pancha jātā (vi. 61, 12).[21]

[19] See Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society for 1866, pp. 7 ff.

[20] Sāyaṇa, indeed, interprets the word āryam varṇam by uttamam varṇaṁ traivarṇikam | "the most excellent class consisting of the three upper castes;" but he of course explains according to the ideas of his own age. In the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, Kāṇva Śākhā (Adhvara Kāṇḍa, i. 6) it is stated that the upper three castes only were Āryas and fit to offer sacrifice (ārya eva brāhmaṇo vā kshattriyo vā vaiśyo vā te hi yajniyāḥ) see Journ. Roy. As. Soc. for 1866, p. 281.

[21] In iii. 49, 1, mention is made not of the five tribes, but of all the tribes: Śaṁsa

Some of these terms are occasionally used of the gods, as in x. 53, 4: ūrjāda uta yajniyāsaḥ panchajanā mama hotraṁ jushadhvam | "Ye five tribes who eat (sacrificial) food, and are worthy of adoration, receive my oblation with favour."[22]

On this verse Yāska remarks, Nirukta, iii. 8: "Gandharvāḥ pitaro devā asurā rakshāṁsi" ity eke | "chatvāro varṇā nishādaḥ panchamaḥ" ity Aupamanyavaḥ | "Some say the word denotes the Gandharvas, fathers, gods, asuras, and rakshases. Aupamanyava says it denotes the four castes and the Nishādas."[23]

If Aupamayava was right, the Nishādas also were admissible to the worship of the gods in the Vedic age, as the "five classes" are represented in various texts as votaries of Agni. Such are the following:

vi. 11, 4. Āyuṁ na yaṁ namasā rātahavyāḥ anjanti suprayasam pancha janāḥ |

"Agni, whom, abounding in oblations, the five tribes, bringing offerings, honour with prostrations, as if he were a man."

Sāyaṇa here defines the five tribes as "priests and offerers of sacrifices" (ritvig-yajamāna-lakshanāḥ).

ix. 65, 22. Ye somāsaḥ . . sunvire . . | 23. Ye vā janeshu panchasu |

mahām Indraṁ yasmin viśvā ā kṛishṭayaḥ somapāḥ kāmam avyan | "Praise the great Indra, in whom all the tribes drinking soma have obtained their desire."

[22] Compare x. 60, 4. "In whose worship Ikshvāku prospers, wealthy and foe-destroying, like the five tribes in the sky (divīva pancha kṛishṭayaḥ). Sāyaṇa, however, renders "His five tribes (the four castes and the Nishādas) are as (happy as) if in heaven." Prof. Müller, Journ. Roy. As. Soc. for 1866, p. 462, renders, "as the five tribes in heaven."

[23] In his note on this passage in his "Illustrations of the Nirukta," p. 28, Prof. Roth remarks: "The conception of the five races which originally comprehended all mankind . . . is here transferred to the totality of the divine beings. Hence also arises the diversity of understanding, when the number has to be indicated." Prof. Roth then quotes part of Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, iii. 31, which I give a little more fully from Dr. Haug's edition: Pānchajanyaṁ vai etad ukthaṁ yad vaiśvadevam | sarveshāṁ vai etat panchajanānām ukthaṁ deva-manushyāṇāṁ gandharvāpsarasāṁ sarpāṇāṁ cha pitṛīṇāṁ cha | eteshāṁ vai etat panchajanānām uktham | sarve enam panchajanā viduḥ | ā enam panchinyai janatāyai havino gachhanti ya evaṁ veda | "This Vaiśvadeva uktha belongs to the five classes of beings. It belongs to all the five classes of gods, men, gandharvas and apsarases, serpents, and fathers. To these five classes belongs this uktha. All these five classes know him (who uses it). Those of this five-fold set of beings who are skilled in invocation come to the man who knows this." See Dr. Haug's Ait. Br. ii. 214, where it is said that Gandharvas and Apsarases are counted as one class.

"Or those soma-libations which have been poured out . . (23) among the five tribes."

x. 45, 6. Vīḷuṁ chid adrim abhinat parāyan janāḥ yad agnim ayajanta pancha |

"He (Agni), travelling afar, clove even the strong mountain, when the five tribes worshipped Agni."

vii. 15, 2. Yaḥ pancha charshaṇīr abhi nishasāda dame dame | kavir gṛihapatir yuvā |

"The wise and youthful master of the house (Agni) who has taken up his abode among the five tribes in every house."

In vi. 61, 12, Sarasvatī is spoken of as "augmenting or prospering the five tribes" (pancha jātā vardhayantī).

In viii. 52, 7, it is said: Yat pānchajanyayā viśā Indre ghoshāḥ asṛikshata | "When shouts were uttered to Indra by the people of the five tribes," etc.

In R.V. i. 117, 3, Atri is styled ṛishim pāñchajanyam, "a rishi belonging to the five tribes." In v. 32, 11, the epithet satpatiḥ pāñchajanyaḥ, "the good lord of the five tribes," is applied to Indra. And in ix. 66, 20, Agni is called the purified rishi, the priest of the five tribes (pāñchajayaḥ purohitaḥ).[24]

In other passages, however, it is far from clear that the "five races" are intended to be identified with the Aryas, or people of honourable race, to whom the authors of the hymns belonged. Such, perhaps, is the case in the following verse: ii. 2, 10. Asmākaṁ dyumnam adhi pancha kṛishṭishu uchchā svar na śuśuchīta dushṭaram | "May our glory shine aloft among the five tribes, like the heaven unsurpassable." See also vi. 46, 7, to be quoted below.

On the same subject, Professor Roth remarks as follows in his Lexicon under the word kṛishṭi: "The phrase five races is a designation of all nations, not merely of the Aryyan tribes. It is an ancient enumeration, of the origin of which we find no express explanation in the Vedic texts. We may compare the fact that the cosmical spaces or points of the compass are frequently enumerated as five, especially in [24] See Mahābhārata, iii. 14160, as referred to by Roth under jana, where the birth of a being of five colours, apparently a form of Agni, is described, who was generated by five rishis, and who was known as the god of the five tribes (pānchajanya) and the producer of five races.

the following text of the A.V. iii. 24, 2: imā yāḥ pancha pradiśo mānavīḥ pancha kṛishṭayaḥ | 'these five regions; the five tribes sprung from Manu'; among which (regions) we should have here to reckon as the fifth the one lying in the middle (dhruvā dik, A.V. iv. 14, 8; xviii. 3, 34), that is, to regard the Aryyas as the central point, and round about them the nations of the four regions of the world. . . . . According to the Vedic usage, five cannot be considered as designating an indefinite number."

We cannot therefore regard the use of the term "five races" as affording any evidence of the existence of a rigidly defined caste-system at the period when it was in frequent use. The frequent reference to such a division, which fell into disuse in later times, rather proves the contrary. The caste-system was always a quadruple, not a quintuple, one; and although the Nishādas are added by Aupamanyava as a fifth division of the population, this class was esteemed too degraded to allow us to suppose that they could ever have formed part of a universally recognized five-fold division, of which all the parts appear to be regarded as standing on an equal, or nearly equal, footing.

It is supposed by Dr. Kuhn[25] that the "five tribes" are to be identified with the clans whose names are mentioned in the following verse: i. 108, 8. Yad Indrāgnī Yadushu Turvaśeshu yad Druhyushv Anushu Pūrushu sthaḥ | ataḥ pari vṛishaṇāv ā hi yātam athā somasya pibataṁ sutasya |

"If, o Indra and Agni, ye are abiding among the Yadus, Turvaśas, Druhyus, Anus, Pūrus,—come hither, vigorous heroes, from all quarters, and drink the Soma which has been poured out."

Although, however, these tribes are often mentioned separately in the Rig-veda, this is either the only, or almost the only, text in which they are all connected with one another. Their identity with the "five classes" is therefore doubtful.

There is another word employed in the Rig-veda to designate a race well known to the authors of the hymns, viz., nahush. We have already met with this term in a verse (x. 80, 6) I have quoted above, where it appears clearly to denote a tribe distinct from the descendants of Manush; and the adjective derived from it occurs in vi. 46, 7 (=

[25] See Weber's Indische Studien, i. 202, where Dr. Kuhn's paper in the Hall. Allg. Lit. Z. for 1846, p. 1086, is referred to.

S.V. i. 262), where also the tribes of Nahush appear to be discriminated from the five tribes, whoever these may be supposed to be. The words are these: Yad Indra nāhushīshv ā ojo nṛimṇaṁ cha kṛishṭishu | yad vā pancha kshitīnāṁ dyumnam ā bhara satrā viśvāni pauṁsyā | "Indra, whatever force or vigour exists in the tribes of Nahush, or whatever glory belongs to the five races, bring it (for us); yea all manly energies together."

Professor Roth (see his Lexicon, s. v.) regards the people designated by the word nahush as denoting men generally, but with the special sense of stranger, or neighbour, in opposition to members of the speaker's own community; and he explains the words of x. 80, 6, twice referred to above, as signifying "the sons of our own people, and of those who surround us."

These descendants of Nahush, whoever they may have been, are, however, distinctly spoken of in x. 80, 6 (the passage just adverted to), as worshippers of Agni, and can scarcely, therefore, have been regarded by the Aryas as altogether aliens from their race and worship.

Setting aside, as before, the Purusha Sūkta, there are few distinct references in the hymns of the Rig-veda to the creation of men, and none at all to the separate creation of castes. The following text ascribes the generation of mankind to Agni, R.V. i. 96, 2: Sa pūrvayā nividā kavyatā āyor imāḥ prajāḥ ajanayad manūnām | vivasvatā chakshasā dyām apaś cha devā Agniṁ dhārayan draviṇodām | "By the first nivid, by the wisdom of Āyu, he (Agni) created these children of men; by his gleaming light the earth and the waters: the gods sustained Agni the giver of riches."[26]

The Aitareya Brāhmaṇa introduces this verse by the following passage: Prajāpatir vai idam eka eva agre āsa | so 'kāmayata "prajāyeya bhūyān syām" iti | sa tapo 'tapyata | sa vācham ayachhat | sa saṁvatsarasya parastād vyāharad dvādaśa kṛitvaḥ | dvādaśapadā vai eshā nivit | etām vāva tām nividaṁ vyāharat | tāṁ sarvāṇi bhūtāny anvasṛijyanta | tad etad ṛishiḥ paśyann abhyanūvacha "sa pūrvayā" ityādinā | "Prajāpati alone was formerly this universe. He desired 'may I be propagated, and multiplied.' He practised austere fervour. He suppressed his voice. After a year he spoke twelve times. This nivid consists of twelve words. This nivid he uttered. After it all beings were created. Beholding this the rishi uttered this verse, 'by the first nivid,'" etc.

[26] See Dr. Haug's translation in his Ait. Br. ii. 143; and Benfey's German version in his Orient und Occident, ii. 512.

The generation of "creatures" (prajāḥ) is ascribed in various texts to different gods, in iii. 55, 19[27] to Tvashṭṛi Savitṛi; in ix. 86, 28 to Soma; in viii. 85, 6 (ya imā jajāna viśvā jātāni) to Indra. In x. 54, 3 Indra is said to have "generated the father and mother (heaven and earth) from his own body" (yan mātaraṁ cha pitaraṁ cha sākam ajanayathās tanvaḥ svāyāḥ); while Viśvakarman, who in x. 81, 2, 3 is said to have generated heaven and earth, is also in x. 82, 3 called "our father and generator" (yo naḥ pitā janitā). All these passages are, however, too vague to afford us any insight into the ideas of their authors regarding the creation of the human race.

SECT. II.—Legends and Notices regarding Manu from the Śatapatha, Aitareya, and Taittirīya Brāhmaṇas, the Taittirīya Sanhitā, and the Chhāndogya Upanishad.

The first passage which I adduce contains the very important legend of the deluge, which has already been quoted in the 2nd vol. of this work, pp. 324 ff., and which has also been rendered into English by Professor Max Müller (Anc. Sansk. Lit. pp. 425 ff.) and by Professor M. Williams (Ind. Epic Poetry, p. 34), as well as into German by its earliest translator, Professor Weber, in the year 1849 (Ind. Studien, i. 163 f.).

Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, i. 8, 1, 1. Manave ha vai prātar avanegyam udakam ājahrur yathā idam pāṇibhyām avanejanāya āharanti | evaṁ tasya avanenijānasya matsyaḥ pāṇī āpede | 2. Sa ha asmai vācham uvāda "bibhṛihi mā pārayishyāmi tvā" iti | "kasmād mā pārayishyasi" iti | "aughaḥ imāḥ sarvāḥ prajāḥ nirvoḍhā tatas tvā pārayitāsmi" iti | "Katham te bhṛitir" iti | 3. Sa ha uvācha "yāvad vai kshullakāḥ bhavāmo bahvī vai nas tāvad nāshṭrā bhavaty uta matsya eva matsyam gilati | kumbhyāṁ mā agre bibharāsi | sa yadā tām ativarahā atha karshūm khātvā tasyāṁ mā bibharāsi | sa yadā tām ativardhā atha mā samudram abhyavaharāsi | tarhi vai atināshṭro bhavitāsmi" iti | 4. Śaśvad[28] ha

[27] Perhaps, however, we are to understand Tvashṭṛi's function of aiding in procreation to be here referred to.

[28] Śaśvat-śabdo 'tra sāmarthyāt kshipra-vachanaḥ.—Comm.

jhasha[29] āsa sa hi jyeshṭham[30] vardhate | "atha itithīm samām tad aughaḥ āgantā tad mā nāvam upakalpya upāsāsai | sa aughe utthite nāvam āpadyāsai tatas tvā pārayitāsmi" iti | 5. Tam evam bhṛitvā samudram abhyavajahāra | sa yatithīm tat samām paridideśa tatithīm samām nāvam upakalpya upāsānchakre | sa aughe utthite nāvam āpede | tam sa matsyaḥ upanyāpupluve | tasya śṛinge nāvaḥ pāśaṁ pratimumocha | tena etam uttaram girim[31] atidudrāva[32] | 6. Sa ha uvācha "apīparam vai tvā vṛikshe nāvam pratibadhnīshva | taṁ tu tvā mā girau santam udakam antaśchhaitsīd yāvad yāvad udakaṁ samavāyāt tāvat tāvad anvavasarpāsi" iti | Sa ha tāvat tāvad eva anvavasasarpa | tad api etad uttarasya girer "Manor avasarpaṇam" iti | augho ha tāḥ sarvāḥ prajāḥ niruvāha atha iha Manur eva ekaḥ pariśiśishe | 7. Saḥ archan śrāmyaṁś chachāra prajākāmaḥ | tatra api pāka-yajnena īje | sa ghṛitam dadhi mastv āmikshām ity apsu juhuvānchakāra | tataḥ saṁvatsare yoshit sambabhūva | sā ha pibdamānā[33] iva udeyāya | tasyai ha sma ghṛitaṁ pade santishṭhate | tayā Mitrā-Varuṇau sanjagmāte | 8. Tāṁ ha ūchatuḥ "kā asi" iti | "Manor duhitā" iti | "āvayor brūshva" iti | "na" iti ha uvācha "yaḥ eva mām ajījanata tasya eva aham asmi" iti | tasyām apitvam[34] īshāte | tad vā jajnau tad vā na jajnāv[35] ati tu eva iyāya | sā Manum ājagāma | 9. Tām ha Manur uvācha "kā asi" iti | "tava duhitā" iti | "katham bhagavati mama duhitā" iti | "yāḥ amūr apsu āhutīr ahaushīr ghṛitaṁ dadhi mastv āmikshāṁ tato mām ajījanathāḥ | sā āśīr asmi tām mā yajne avakalpaya | yajne ched vai mā avakalpayishyasi bahuḥ prajayā paśubhir bhavishyasi yām u mayā kāncha āśisham āśāsishyase sā te sarvā samardhishyate" iti | tām etad madhye yajnasya avākalpayat | madhyaṁ hi etad yajnasya yad antarā prayājānuyājān | 10. Tayā archan śrāmyaṁs chachāra prajākāmaḥ | tayā imām prajātim prajajne yā iyam Manoḥ prajātiḥ | yām u enayā kāncha āśisham āśāsta sā asmai sarvā samārdhyata | sā eshā nidānena yad Iḍā | sa yo ha evam vidvān Iḍayā charati etām ha eva prajātim prajāyate yām Manuḥ prājāyata | yām u enayā kāncha āśisham āśāste sā asmai sarvā samṛidhyate |

"1. In the morning they brought to Manu water for washing, as [29] Jhasho mahā-matsyaḥ.—Comm. [30] Jyeshṭham vriddhatamam.—Comm.

[31] Uttaram girim Himavantam.—Comm. [32] Some MSS. read adhidudrāva.
[33] Pibdamānā . . . ghṛita-prabhavatvāt ghṛitam sravantī susnighdhā udakād utthitā.—Comm.
[34] Apitvam bhāgaḥ | tam prārthitavantau.—Comm.
[35] Pratijnātavatī cha na cha pratijnātavatī.—Comm.

men are in the habit of bringing it to wash with the hands. As he was thus washing, a fish[36] came into his hands, (2) (which spake to him) 'preserve me; I shall save thee.' (Manu enquired) 'From what wilt thou save me?' (The fish replied) 'A flood shall sweep away all these creatures;[37] from it I will rescue thee.' (Manu asked) 'How (shall) thy preservation (be effected)?' 3. The fish said: 'So long as we are small, we are in great peril, for fish devours fish; thou shalt preserve me first in a jar. When I grow too large for the jar, then thou shalt dig a trench, and preserve me in that. When I grow too large for the trench, then thou shalt carry me away to the ocean. I shall then be beyond the reach of danger.' 4. Straightway he became a large fish; for he waxes to the utmost. (He said) 'Now in such and such a year, then the flood will come; thou shalt, therefore, construct a ship, and resort to me; thou shalt embark in the ship when the flood rises, and I shall deliver thee from it.' 5. Having thus preserved the fish, Manu carried him away to the sea. Then in the same year which the fish had enjoined, he constructed a ship and resorted to him. When the flood rose, Manu embarked in the ship. The fish swam towards him. He fastened the cable of the ship to the fish's horn. By this means he passed over[38] this northern mountain.[39] 6. The fish said, 'I have delivered thee; fasten the ship to a tree. But lest the water should cut thee off whilst thou art on the mountain, as much as the water subsides, so much shalt thou descend after it.' He accordingly descended after it as much (as it subsided). Wherefore also this, viz., 'Manu's descent' is (the name) of the northern mountain. Now the flood had swept away all these creatures; so Manu alone was left here. 7. Desirous of offspring, he lived worshipping and toiling in arduous religious rites. Among these he also sacrificed with the pāka offering. He cast clarified butter, thickened milk, whey and curds, as an oblation into the waters. Thence in a year a woman was produced. She rose

[36] Bhāvino 'rthasya siddhyarthaṁ devatā eva matsya-rūpeṇa ājagāma | "To accomplish what was to follow, it was a deity which came in the form of a fish."—Comm.

[37] Aughaḥ udaka-sanghātaḥ | sa imāḥ Bharatavarsha-nivāsinīḥ prajāḥ niḥśeshaṁ vodhā | deśāntaram prāpayitā | "The flood will entirely carry these creatures abiding in Bharatavarsha;—will convey them to another country."—Comm.—I do not see why the verb nirvoḍhā should have the sense here assigned to it: at all events we are afterwards told that Manu alone was left after the flood.

[38] Or, if adhidudrāva be the true reading, "he hastened to."

[39] The Himavat or Himālaya, according to the Commentator.

up as it were unctuous.[40] Clarified butter adheres to her steps. Mitra and Varuṇa met her. They said to her, 'Who art thou?' 'Manu's daughter,' (she replied). 'Say (thou art) ours,' (they rejoined). 'No,' she said, 'I am his who begot me.' They desired a share in her. She promised that, or she did not promise that; but passed onward. She came to Manu. 9. Manu said to her, 'Who art thou?' 'Thy daughter,' she replied. 'How, glorious one,' asked Manu, '(art thou) my daughter?' 'Thou hast generated me,' she said, 'from those oblations, butter, thick milk, whey and curds, which thou didst cast into the waters. I am a benediction. Apply me in the sacrifice. If thou wilt employ me in the sacrifice, thou shalt abound in offspring and cattle. Whatever benediction thou wilt ask through me, shall accrue to thee.' He (accordingly) introduced her (as) that (which comes in) the middle of the sacrifice; for that is the middle of the sacrifice which (comes) between the introductory and concluding forms. 10. With her he lived worshipping and toiling in arduous religious rites, desirous of offspring. With her he begot[41] this offspring which is this offspring of Manu.[42] Whatever benediction he asked with her, was all vouchsafed to him. This is essentially that which is Iḍā. Whosoever, knowing this, lives with Iḍā, begets this offspring which Manu begot. Whatever benediction he asks with her, is all vouchsafed to him."

[40] Such is the rendering of pibdamānā given by the Commentator, who is followed by Professors Weber and Müller. Professor Roth in his Lexicon, s. v., explains it by "firm," i.e. "the woman arose solid out of the fluid mass."

[41] I should observe that the same verb (prajaṇe) by which the generative act of Manu is here described, is in other passages of the same Brāhmaṇa (ii. 2, 4, 1; ii. 5, 1, 1; vi. 1, 1, 8; vi. 1, 3, 1; vii. 5, 2, 6; xi. 5, 8, 1) applied in another tense to the god Prajāpati, of whom it is said that he considered how he should beget progeny (sa aikshata 'katham nu prajāyeya). (Compare xi. 1, 6, 1.) In other parts of the same work, however, it is said that Prajāpati created (asṛijata) the waters (vi. 1, 1, 9), or creatures (prajāḥ asṛijata, vii. 4, 3, 5; x. 2, 2, 1); and the fact of the word "beget" being applied to Prajāpati, either in a figurative, or anthropomorphic sense, does not authorize us to suppose that the author of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, in the passage before us (the legend of the deluge), intended to represent Manu as the creator of the human race, and not as their progenitor in the natural sense. (In R.V. ii. 33, 1; vi. 70, 3, we find the phrase prajāyemahi prajābhiḥ | pra prajābhir jāyate | "let us beget children," "he begets children.")

[42] Compare Taitt. Sanhitā, v. 1, 5, 6. "Śivo bhava prajābhyām" ity āha prajābhya eva enam śamayati | "mānushībhyas tvām angiraḥ" ity āha mānavyo hi prajāḥ | "He says, 'be auspicious to the twain offspring;' for he pacifies him from (injuring) the offspring. He says, '(We pacify) thee from (injuring) the human offspring, o Angiras.' For creatures are descended from Manu."

From this interesting legend we learn that, according to its author's belief, Manu was not the creator of mankind, as some later accounts considered him to have been, but himself belonged to an earlier race of living beings, which was entirely destroyed by the deluge which is described. The legend regards him as a representative of his generation, who, for some reason, perhaps his superior wisdom, or sanctity, or position, was selected out of the crowd of ordinary mortals to be rescued from the impending destruction. That he was regarded as a mere man, and not as a being of a superior order, is shown by the fact of his requiring the aid of a higher power to preserve him. A supernatural fish, apparently some divine person, conceived as taking the form of a creature which would be perfectly secure and at home in the midst of the raging waters, undertook to deliver him, and guided the ship on which he was directed to embark, through all dangers to its destined haven. No one but Manu took refuge in the ship, for he alone, the story expressly records, was preserved, while all the other living beings were overwhelmed. Finding himself the sole surviver when the waters subsided, he became desirous of progeny; and with intense devotion performed certain religious rites in the hope of realizing his wish through their efficacy. As a result of his oblations, a woman arose from the waters into which they had been cast. A male and a female now existed, the destined parents of a new race of men who sprang from their union, — a union the fruitfulness of which was assured by their assiduous practice of sacred ceremonies. From Manu and Iḍā, we are expressly told, the race known as that of Manu, i.e. the race of men, was produced. The legend says nothing whatever of this race being originally characterized by any distinction of castes, or about four sons, the ancestors of Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and Śūdras being born to Manu and Iḍā. We must therefore suppose that the author of the legend intends to represent the early race of mankind, or at least the first inhabitants of Bharatavarsha, as descended from one common progenitor without any original varieties of caste, however different the professions and social position of their descendants afterwards became. We are consequently entitled to regard this legend of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa as at variance with the common fable regarding the separate origin of the Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and Śūdras.

The following are some other passages in which Manu and Iḍā are both referred to:

Taitt. S. ii. 6, 7, 1. Manuḥ pṛithivyāḥ yajniyam aichhat | sa ghṛitaṁ nishiktam avindat | so 'bravīt "ko 'sya īśvaro yajne 'pi karttor" iti | tāv abrūtām Mitrā-Varuṇau "gor eva āvām īśvarau karttoḥ svaḥ" iti | tau tato gāṁ śamairayatām | sā yatra yatra nyakrāmat tato ghṛitam apīḍyata | tasmād ghṛitapadī uchyate | tad asyai janma | . . . . 3. Iḍām upahvayate | paśavo vai Iḍā | paśūn eva upahvayate | chatur upahvayate | chatushpādo hi paśavaḥ | "Mānavī" ity āha | Manur hy etām agre 'paśyat | "ghṛitapadī" ity āha | yad eva asyai padād ghṛitam apīḍyata tasmād evam āha | "Maitrāvaruṇī" ity āha | Mitrāvaruṇau hy enām samairayatām |

"Manu sought whatever upon earth was fit for sacrifice. He found butter poured out. He said, 'Who has power to employ this in sacrifice also?' Mitra and Varuṇa replied, 'We two have power to employ the cow.' They then sent forth the cow. Wherever she went forth, butter was pressed out. Hence she is called the 'butter-footed.' This is her birth . . . . 3. He calls upon Iḍā. Animals are Iḍā. He calls upon animals. He calls upon them four times. For animals are four-footed. He says 'Mānavī.' For Manu first saw her. He says 'Butter-footed.' He says so, because butter was pressed from her foot. He says 'Maitrāvaruṇī.' For Mitra and Varuṇa sent her forth." (Comp. Taitt. Br. iii. 7, 5, 6.)

Taitt. Br. i. 1, 4, 4. Iḍā vai Mānavī yajñānukāśiny[43] āsīt | sā 'śriṇod "Asurā agnim adadhate" iti . . . . | 6. Sā 'bravīd Iḍā Manum "tathā vai aham tava agnim ādhāsyāmi yathā pra prajayā paśubhir mithunair janishyase praty asmin loke sthāsyasi abhi suvargaṁ lokaṁ jeshyasi" iti | gārhapatyam agre ādadhāt | . . . . gārhapatyena eva asmai prajām paśūn prājanayat |

"Iḍā, the daughter of Manu, was a revealer of sacrifice. She heard, 'the Asuras are placing fire.' . . . . 6. Iḍā said to Manu, 'I shall so place thy fire that thou shalt increase in offspring, cattle, and twins; thou shalt be firmly established in this world, and shalt conquer the heavenly world.'[44]. She first placed the gārhapatya fire. It was [43] Yajna-tattva-prakāśana-samarthā.—Comm.

[44] Compare the Kāṭhaka Br. viii. 4, quoted in Weber's Indische Studien, iii. 463, where Iḍā is said to have promised to Manu: tathā te Agnim ādhāsyāmi yathā ma- through the gārhapatya that she produced for him offspring and cattle."

Taitt. S. i. 7. 1, 3. Sarveṇa vai yajnena devāḥ suvargaṁ lokam āyan | pākayajnena Manur aśrāmyat | sā Iḍā Manum upāvarttata | tām devāsurāḥ vyahvayanta pratīchīm devāḥ parāchīm Asurāḥ | sā devān upāvarttata |

"The gods arrived at the heavenly world by the whole sacrifice. Manu worshipped with the pākayajna. That Iḍā came to Manu. The gods and asuras called her away in different directions, the gods in front, the asuras behind. She came to the gods."

The following texts refer to Manu alone, as a celebrator of religious ceremonies:

Taitt. S. ii. 5, 9, 1. "Agne mahāṅ asi" ity āha | mahān hy esha yad Agniḥ | "brāhmaṇa" ity āha | brāhmaṇo hy esha | "bhārata" ity āha | esha hi devebhyo havyam bharati | "deveddha" ity āha | devāḥ hy etam aindhata | "Manviddha" ity āha | Manur hy etam uttaro devebhyaḥ aindha |

"He says, 'Agni, thou art great.' For this Agni is great. He says, 'o Brāhman.' For he is a Brāhmam. He says, 'o Bhārata.' For he bears the oblation to the gods. He says, 'kindled by the gods.' For the gods kindled him. He says, 'kindled by Manu.' For Manu kindled him after the gods.'

Taitt. S. vi. 2, 5, 2 f. Trivrato vai Manur asīd dvivratā asurā ekavratā devāḥ | prātar madhyandine sāyaṁ tad Manor vratam āsīt pākayajnasya rūpam pushṭyai | prātaścha sāyāncha asurāṇāṁ nirmadhyam kshūdho rūpam | tatas te parābhavan | madhyandine madhyarāttre devānām tatas te 'bhavan suvargaṁ lokam āyan |

"Manu performed three rites; the asuras two; the gods one. Manu's rite was in the morning, at noon, and in the evening, the form of a pākayajna for nourishment. That of the asuras was in the morning and evening, without any midday rite, a form of hunger. Hence they perished. That of the gods was at midday and midnight. Hence they prospered, and arrived at the heavenly world."

Taitt. S. vii. 5, 15, 3. Etayā (i.e. abhijityā) vai Indram devāḥ ayājayan | tasmād "Indrasavaḥ" | etayā Manum manushyāḥ | tasmād "Manu-savaḥ" |

nushyā devān upaprajanishyante | "I will so place Agni for thee, than men shall be born among the gods."

yathā Indro devānām yathā Manur manushyāṇām eva bhavati yaḥ evaṁ vidvān etayā ishṭyā yajate |

"With this (abhijiti) the gods sacrificed for Indra. Hence it is called 'Indra-sava.' Men sacrificed with it for Manu. Hence it is called 'Manu-sava.' As Indra is among gods, and Manu among men, so he becomes who thus knowing sacrifices with this oblation."

In Taitt. S. ii. 2, 10, 2, we find nearly the words which Kullūka quotes on Manu's Institutes, i. 1: Yad vai kincha Manur avadat tad bheshajam | "Whatever Manu said was a remedy."

In Śatapatha Br. vi. 6, 1, 19, Manu is called a Prajāpati: "Prajāpataye Manave svāhā" iti | Prajāpatir vai Manuḥ | sa hi idam sarvam amanuta | Prajāpatir vai etad agre karma akarot | "Svāhā to Manu the lord of creatures. Manu is a lord of creatures (prajā-pati) for he thought (amanuta) all this. The lord of creatures (prajā-pati) formerly did all this work."

The following story in its different versions also connects Manu with religious observances and represents him as very devout:

Ś. P. Br. i. 1, 4, 14 ff. Manor ha vai ṛishabhah āsa | tasminn asura-ghnī sapatna-ghnī vāk pravishṭā āsa | tasya ha sma śvasathād ravathād asura-rākshasāni mṛidyamānāni yanti | te ha asurāh samūdire "pāpaṁ vata no 'yam ṛishabhaḥ sachate kathaṁ nv imaṁ dābhnuyāma" iti | "Kilātākulī" iti ha asura-brahmāv āsatuḥ | tau ha ūchatuḥ "śraddhā-devo vai Manuḥ | āvăm nu vedāva" iti | tau ha āgatya ūchatur "Mano yājayāva tvā" iti | "kena" iti | "anena ṛishabheṇa" iti | "tathā" iti | tasya ālabdhasya sā vāg apachakrāma | sā Manor eva jāyām Mānāvīm praviveśa | tasyai ha sma yatra vadantyai śṛiṇvanti tato ha sma eva asura-rākshasāni mṛidyamānāni yanti | te ha asurāh samūdire "ito vai naḥ pāpīyaḥ sachate bhūyo hi mānushī vāg vadati" iti | Kilātākulī ha eva ūchatuḥ "śraddhā-devo vai Manur āvăm nv eva vedāva" iti | tau ha āgatya ūchatur "Mano yājayāva tvā" iti | "kena" iti | "enayā eva jāyayā" iti | "tathā" iti | tasyai ālabdhāyai sā vāg apachakrāma sā yajnam eva yajna-pātrāṇi praviveśa | tato ha enāṁ na śekatur nirhantum | sā eshā asura-ghnī vāg udvadati | sa yasya ha evaṁ vidushaḥ etām atra vācham pratyudvādayanti pāpīyāṁso ha eva asya sapatnāḥ bhavanti |

"Manu had a bull. Into it an Asura-slaying, enemy-slaying voice had entered. In consequence of this (bull's) snorting and bellowing, Asuras and Rakshasas were continually destroyed. Then the Asuras said: 'This bull, alas, does us mischief; how shall we overcome him?' Now there were two priests of the Asuras called Kilāta and Akuli. They said: 'Manu is a devout believer: let us make trial of him.' They went and said to him, 'let us sacrifice for thee.' 'With what (victim)?' he asked. 'With this bull,' they replied. 'Be it so,' he answered. When it had been slaughtered, the voice departed out of it, and entered into Manu's wife Manāvī. Wherever they hear her speaking, the Asuras and Rākshasas continue to be destroyed in consequence of her voice. The Asuras said: 'She does us yet more mischief; for the human voice speaks more.' Kilāta and Akuli said, 'Manu is a devout believer: let us make trial of him.' They came and said to him, 'Manu, let us sacrifice for thee.' 'With what (victim)?" he asked. 'With this (thy) wife,' they replied. 'Be it so,' he answered. When she had been slaughtered the voice departed out of her and entered into the sacrifice and the sacrificial vessels. Thence they were unable to expel it. This is the Asura-slaying voice which speaks out (when the two stones are struck with the śamyā, as a part of the ceremonial). Wretched become the enemies of that man for whom, when he knows this, they cause this voice here to reverberate."

Taitt. Br. iii. 2, 5, 9. Manoḥ śraddhā-devasya yajamānasya asura-ghnī vāg yajnāyudheshu pravishṭā āsīt | te 'surāḥ yāvanto yajnāyudhānām udvadatām upāśṛiṇvans te parābhavan |

"An asura-slaying voice had entered into the sacrificial implements of the devout believer and sacrificer Manu. The Asuras, as many as heard the sacrificial implements sounding, were overcome."

Kāṭhaka Br. ii. 30, 1.[45] Manor vai kapālāny āsan | taiṙ yāvato yāvato 'surān abhyupādadhāt te parābhavan | atha tarhi Ṭṙishṭhā-varūtrī[46] āstām asura-brahmau | tā asurāḥ abruvann "imāni shaṭ kapālāni yāchetham" iti | tau prataritvānā abhiprāpadyetām "Vāyave Agne Vāyave Indra" iti | "kiṁkāmau sthaḥ" ity abravīt | "imāni nau kapālāni dehi" iti | tāny ābhyām adadāt | tāny araṇyām parāhṛitya samapiṁshṭām | tad Manor gāvo 'bhivyatishṭhanta | tāni ṛishabhaḥ samaleṭ | tasya ruvato yāvanto 'surāḥ upāśṛiṇvaṁs te parābhavan |

[45] Extracted from Weber's Indische Studien, iii. 461 f. A translation of this, as well as of the next passage, is given by Prof. Weber in the Journal of the German Oriental Society, vol. xviii. 284 ff.

[46] Roth in his Lexicon s. v. reads Ṭṙishṇāvarūtrī.

tau prātaritvānā abhiprāpadyetām "Vāyave Agne Vāyave Indra" iti | "kiṁkāmau sthaḥ" ity abravīt | "anena tvā ṛishabheṇa yājayāva" iti | tat patnīm yajur vadantīm pratyapadyata | tasyāḥ dyām vāg ātishṭhat | tasyāḥ vadantyāḥ yāvanto 'surāḥ upāśriṇvaṁs te parābhavan | tasmād naktaṁ strī chandrataraṁ vadati | tau prātaritvānā abhiprāpadyetām "Vāyave Agne Vāyave Indra" iti | "kiṁkāmau sthaḥ" ity abravīt | "anayā tvā patnyā yājayava" iti | sā paryagnikṛitā āsīt | atha Indro 'chāyad "Manvam śraddhādevam Trishṭhāvarūtrī asura-brahmau jāyayā vyardhayatam" iti | sa āgachhat | so 'bravīd "ābhyāṁ tvā yājayāni" iti | "na" ity abravīd "na vai aham anayor īśe" iti | atithipatir vāva atither īśe" ity abravīt | tā asmai prāyaśchhat | sa prativeśo vediṁ kurvann āsta | tā apṛiśchhatām "ko 'si" iti | "brāhmaṇaḥ" iti | "katamo brāhmaṇaḥ" iti | "kim brāhmaṇasya pitaram kim u pṛichhasi mātaram | śrutaṁ ched asmin vedyam sa pitā sa pitāmahaḥ" iti | tā avittām "Indro vai" iti | tau prāpatatām | tayor yāḥ prokshaṇīr āpaḥ āsaṁs tābhir anuvisṛijya śīrshe aśchhinat | tau vṛishaś cha yavāshaś cha abhavatām | tasmāt tau varsheshu śushyataḥ | adbhir hi hatau | tām paryagnikṛitām udāsṛijat | tayā "rdhnot | tāḥ imāḥ Mānavyaḥ prajāḥ | yat paryagni-kṛitam pātnīvatam utsṛijati yām eva Manur ṛiddhim ārdhnot tām ṛidhnoti |

"Manu had platters. All the Asuras, against whom he laid out the sacrifice with these were destroyed. Now Tṛishṭha and Varūtri were at that time the priests of the Asuras. The Asuras said to them, 'ask for these six platters.' These two arrived as morning guests, repeating the formula, 'To Vāyu, o Agni, to Vāyu, o Indra.' 'What do you desire?' asked Manu. 'Give us these platters,' they replied. He gave them to them. Taking them they smashed them in the forest. Then Manu's cattle were standing round. The bull licked the platters. As many Asuras as heard him bellowing were destroyed. The two Asura priests came as morning guests, repeating the formula, 'To Vāyu, o Agni, to Vāyu, o Indra.' 'What do you desire?' enquired Manu. 'Let us sacrifice for thee with this bull,' they answered. He then came to his wife who was uttering a yajush. Her voice reached to the sky. As many Asuras as heard her speaking were destroyed. Hence a woman speaks more pleasantly by night. The two Asura priests arrived as morning guests, repeating the formula, 'To Vāyu, o Agni, to Vāyu, o Indra.' 'What do you desire?' asked Manu. 'Let us sacrifice for thee with this thy wife (as the victim),' they replied. The fire was carried round her. Then Indra perceived, 'Tṛishṭha and Varūtri, the two Asura priests are depriving the devout believer Manu of his wife.' He came and said (to Manu), 'Let me sacrifice for thee with these two Asura priests (for victims).' 'No,' answered Manu, 'I am not their master.' 'The host is master of the guest,' rejoined Indra. Manu then gave them to him. (Standing) near them he was making an altar. They asked 'Who art thou?' 'A Brāhman,' he replied. 'What (class of) Brāhman,' they enquired. He rejoined (with a verse), 'Why askest thou the father or the mother of a Brāhman? If Vedic tradition is to be discovered in him, that is his father, that his grandfather.' They knew, 'this is Indra.' They fled. He threw after them the water which was there for consecration, and therewith cut off their heads. They became, (the one) a vrisha, (the other) a yavāsha plant. Hence these (two plants) wither in the rains, because they were killed with water. He released her (Manu's wife) after the fire had been carried round her. By her he prospered. These are the creatures sprung from Manu. Whenever a man releases the victim offered to Agni Pātnīvata, after fire has been carried round it, he prospers with the same prosperity with which Manu prospered."

Compare with this a passage of the Taitt. Sanh. vi. 6, 6, 1. Indraḥ patniyā Manum ayājayat | tām paryagnikṛitām udasṛijat | tayā Manur ārdhnot | yat paryagnikṛitam pātnīvatam utsṛijati yām eva Manur ṛiddhim ārdhnot tām eva yajamāna ṛidhnoti |

"Indra was sacrificing for Manu with his wife (as the victim). He released her after the fire had been carried round her. By her Manu prospered. Whenever the worshipper releases the victim offered to Agni Pātnīvata after fire has been carried round it, he prospers with the same prosperity with which Manu prospered."

I quote the following passages also from the interest which they possess as relating to a personage so ancient and venerable as Manu is reputed to be:

Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, v. 14. Nābhānedishṭhaṁ vai Mānavam brahmacharyyaṁ vasantam bhrātaro nirabhajan | so 'bravīd etya "kim mahyam abhākta" iti | "etam eva nishṭhāvam avavaditāram" ity abruvan | tasmād ha apy etarhi pitaram putrāḥ "nishṭhāvo 'vavaditā" ity eva ācha-kshate | sa pitaram etya abravīt "tvām ha vāva mahyaṁ tata abhākshur"

iti | tam pitā 'bravīd "mā putraka tad ādṛithāḥ | Angiraso vai ime svargāya lokāya satram āsate | te shashṭham shashṭham eva ahar āgatya muhyanti | tān ete sūkte shashṭhe 'hani śaṁsaya | teshāṁ yat sahasraṁ satra-pariveshaṇaṁ tat te svar yanto dāsyanti" iti | "tathā" iti | tān upait "pratigṛibhṇīta Mānavam sumedhasaḥ" iti | tam abruvan "kiṁ-kāmo vadasi" iti | "idam eva vaḥ shashṭham ahaḥ prajnāpayāni" ity abravīd "atha yad vai etat sahasraṁ satra-pariveshaṇam tad me svar yanto datta" iti | "tathā" iti | tān ete sūkte shashṭhe 'hany aśaṁsayat | tato vai te pra yajnam ajānan pra svargaṁ lokam | tad yad ete sūkte shashṭhe 'hani śaṁsati yajnasya prajnātyai svargasya lokasya anukhyātyai | taṁ svar yanto 'bruvann "etat te brāhmaṇa sahasram" iti | tad enaṁ samākurvāṇam purushaḥ kṛishṇaśa-vāsy uttarataḥ upotthāya abravīd "mama vai idam mama vai vāstuham" iti | so 'bravīd "mahyaṁ vai idam adur" iti | tam abravīt "tad vai nau tava eva pitari praśnaḥ" iti | sa pitaram ait | tam pitā 'bravīd "nanu te putraka adur" iti | "adur eva me" ity abravīt "tat tu me purushaḥ kṛishṇaśa-vāsy uttarataḥ upodatishṭhat 'mama vai idaṁ mama vai vāstuham' iti ādita" iti | tam pitā 'bravīt "tasya eva putraka | tat tubhyaṁ sa dāsyati" iti | sa punar etya abravīt "tava ha vāva kila bhagavaḥ idam iti me pitā āha" iti | so 'bravīt "tad aham tubhyam eva dadāmi yaḥ eva satyam avādīr" iti | tasmād evaṁ vidushā satyam eva vaditavyam | sa esha sahasra-sanir mantro yad nābhānedishṭham | upa enam sahasraṁ namati pra shashṭhena ahnā svargaṁ lokam jānāti yaḥ evaṁ veda | [47]

"The brothers of Nābhānedishṭha disinherited him whilst he was living in the state of a Brahmachārin. Coming (to them) he said: 'What share have you given to me?' They replied, '(we have given thee) this judge and divider (as thy share).' In consequence sons even now speak of their father as the 'judge and divider.' He came to his father and said, 'Father, they have given thee to me as my share.' His father answered, 'Do not, my son, care about that. These Angirases are performing a sacrifice in order to (secure) the heavenly world; but as often as they come to the sixth day (of the ceremony) they become perplexed. Make them recite these two hymns (R.V. x. 61 and 62) on the sixth day; and when they are going to heaven, they will give [47] This passage has been already translated into German by Prof. R. Roth, Journal of the German Oriental Society, vi. 244, and into English by Prof. Max Müller in his Anc. Sansk. Lit. p. 423 f., and by Dr. M. Haug in his Ait. Br. vol. ii. p. 341 f.

thee that provision of a thousand[48] which has been made for the sacrifice.' He said, 'So be it.' He approached them, saying, 'Receive me, the son of Manu, ye sages.' They replied, 'With what object dost thou speak?' He said, 'Let me make known to you this sixth day; and then you shall give me this sacrificial provision of a thousand, when ye are going to heaven.' 'Let it be so,' they answered. He made them repeat these two hymns on the sixth day. They then knew the sacrifice, and the heavenly world. Hence when any one repeats these two hymns on the sixth day, it is with a view to a knowledge of the sacrifice, and to the revelation of the heavenly world. When they were going to the heavenly world, they said to him, 'This thousand, o Brāhman,[49] is thine.' As he was collecting (the thousand) a man in dark clothing rose up before him from the north, and said, 'This is mine; what remains on the spot is mine.' Nābhānedishṭha replied: 'But they have given it to me.' (The man) rejoined: 'It belongs to (one of) us; let thy father be asked.' He went to his father, who enquired: 'Have they not given thee (the thousand), my son?' 'They did give it to me,' he replied, 'but a man in dark clothes rose up before me from the north, and took it from me, saying, "This is mine; what remains on the spot is mine."' His father said: 'It is his; but he will give it to thee.' He returned, and said (to the man): 'This is thine, reverend sir, so my father says.' (The man) replied: 'I will give it to thee, who hast spoken the truth.' Wherefore one who has this knowledge should speak only truth. That is a hymn which bestows a thoussnd, that Nābhānedishṭha hymn. A thousand falls to his lot, he knows the heavenly world on the sixth day—the man who knows this."

Taittirīya Sanhitā, iii. 1, 9, 4. Manuḥ putrebhyo dāyaṁ vyabhajat | sa Nābhānedishṭham brahmacharryaṁ vasantaṁ nirabhajat | sa āgachhat | so 'bravīt "kathā mā nirabhāg" iti | "na tvā nirabhāksham" ity abravīd "Angirasaḥ ime satram āsate te suvargam lokam na prajānanti | tebhyaḥ idam brāhmaṇam brūhi | te suvargam lokam yanto ye eshām paśavas tāṁs te dāsyanti" iti | tad ebhyo 'bravīt | te suvargam

[48] See R.V. x. 62, 7.

[49] The application of this title to Nābhānedishṭha is to be remarked, as his father Manu is recorded in the Puranic legends as ancestor of the solar race of kings. See the passage from the M. Bh. i. 3135 ff., quoted above, p. 126.

lokam yanto ye eshām paśavaḥ āsaṁs tān asmai adaduḥ | tam paśubhiś charantam yajna-vāstau Rudraḥ āgachhat | so 'bravīt "mama vai ime paśavaḥ" iti | "adur vai mahyam imān" ity abravīt | "na vai tasya te īśate" ity abravīt | "yad yajnavāstau hīyate mama vai tad" iti | tasmād yājnavāstu na abhyavetyam | so 'bravīt | "yajne mā bhaja atha te paśūn na abhimaṁsye" iti | tasmai etam manthinaḥ saṁsrāvam ajuhot | tato vai tasya Rudro paśūn na abhyamanyata | yatra etam eva vidvān manthinaḥ saṁsrāvam juhoti na tatra Rudraḥ paśūn abhimanyate |

"Manu divided his property among his sons. He disinherited his son Nābhānedishṭha who was living as a Brahmachārin. He came and said, 'How hast thou disinherited me?' 'I have not disinherited thee,' replied (his father); 'these Angirases are celebrating a sacrifice; they do not know the heavenly world; declare to them this Brāhmana; and when they are going to heaven, they will give thee the cattle they have.' He declared the Brāhmaṇa to them, and when they were going to heaven they gave him the cattle they had. Rudra came to him as he was on the place of sacrifice employed with the cattle and said: 'These are my cattle.' 'But,' replied Nābhānedishṭha, 'they have given them to me.' 'They have not power to do so; that which is left on the place of sacrifice is mine,' answered Rudra. Hence the place of sacrifice must not be approached. (Rudra further) said: 'Give me a share in the sacrifice, and I shall not injure thy cattle.' He offered him this libation of soma and flour. Then Rudra did not injure his cattle. Whenever any one knows this libation of soma and flour and offers it up, Rudra does not injure his cattle."[50]

A passage, quoted above, p. 26 f., from the Taittirīya Sanhitā, vi. 5, [50] The reader who knows German, and wishes to see an able discussion of the question, whether the legend of Nābhānedishṭha, as given in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, has any real connection with the two hymns of the Rig-veda (x. 61 and 62) which are referred to in it, and whether it contains any reminiscence, or symbolical representation, of ancient historical events, may consult Prof. Roth's paper on the subject, in the 6th vol. of the Journal of the German Oriental Society, pp. 243 ff. The learned writer settles both questions in the negative, maintaining that the legend is manufactured out of certain misinterpreted allusions in the hymns, with the view of asserting the superiority of priestly knowledge to earthly power and worldly wealth, and that there never existed either a Nābhānedishṭha or a Manu. The object which I have in view in the collection of these texts does not require that I should express any opinion on these points. I only seek to ascertain what were the traditions received by the most ancient Indian writers themselves regarding the origin of their race, and not what was the historical value of those traditions.

6, 1 ff., may perhaps also be considered as affirming the descent of men from Manu when it declares them to be the offspring of Vivasvat; since the latter is regarded as the father of Manu.

In the Chhāndogya Upanishad, iii. 11, 4 (p. 178 of Bibliotheca Indica, vol. iii.) the following reference to Manu occurs:

Tad ha etad Brahmā Prajāpataye Prajāpatir Manave Manuḥ prajābhyaḥ | tad ha etad Uddālakāya Āruṇaye putrāya jyeshṭhāya pitā brahma provācha |

"This (doctrine) Brahmā declared to Prajāpati, Prajāpati to Manu, Manu to (his) offspring. This sacred truth was declared to his eldest son Uddālaka Aruṇi by his father."

The first half of this passage is repeated in viii. 15, 1, of the same work (p. 625).

In his commentary on the former of the two passages, Śankara Āchāryya gives this explanation:

Brahmā Hiraṇyagarbho Virāje Prajāpataye uvācha | so 'pi Manave | Manur Ikshvāku-ādibhyaḥ prajābhyaḥ provācha |

"Brahmā Hiraṇyagarbha declared it to the Prajāpati Virāj; he to Manu; and Manu declared it to his descendants Ikshvāku and the rest."

In his note on the second passage, viii. 15, 1, he varies somewhat in his explanation of the personages by whom the doctrine was transmitted:

Brahmā Hiraṇyagarbhaḥ Parameśvaro vā tad-dvāreṇa Prajāpataye Kaśyapāya uvācha | asāv api Manave sva-putrāya | Manuḥ prajābhyaḥ |

"Brahmā Hiraṇyagarbha, or the supreme Lord (Parameśvara) through his instrumentality, declared it to the Prajāpati Kaśyapa; he to his son Manu; Manu to his descendants."

In these two passages of the Chhāndogya Upanishad Brahmā is distinguished from Prajāpati, and Prajāpati from Manu, who again is said to have handed down the doctrine, not to any one person in particular, but "to the offspring," or "descendants" (prajābhyaḥ), apparently his own descendants. This Upanishad therefore seems to coincide in the doctrine of the hymns, and of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, that Manu was the progenitor of mankind. The Commentator, it will have been noticed, in one place delares that Prajāpati is identifiable with Virāj, and again that Kaśyapa is to be understood under that appellation. Virāj and Kaśyapa are not, however, generally regarded as the same.

Nor is Kaśyapa commonly considered to be Manu's father. In the passages from the Rāmāyaṇa, ii. 110, and Mahābhārata, quoted above, pp. 115 and 126, Kaśyapa is said to be the father of Vivasvat, and he again of Manu.

However this may be, as Manu is said to have handed down the sacred tradition to his descendants, we must suppose that those descendants included the whole of the progenitors of the Aryan Indians who were worthy of being made the depositaries of such a tradition; and must therefore conclude that the Chhāndogya Upanishad agrees with the passage quoted above, p. 126, from the Mahābhārata, in recognizing Manu as the progenitor of the Brāhmans, as well as the other castes.

Sect. III.—Extracts from the Mahābhārata regarding Manu.

I have already adduced in the preceding chapter, page 126, an important passage of the Mahābhārata, Ādiparvan verses 3128 ff., in which Manu Vaivasvata is expressly declared to have been the progenitor of mankind including the four castes. A legend of the deluge, corresponding to the one which has been adduced from the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, in the last section, is also to be found in the Vana-parvan of the Mahābhārata, and although it does not represent Manu as the parent from whom the human race was reproduced, but as the creator by whom the world was renewed, after the flood, I shall extract the entire text. Its style of narration is tedious, when compared with the quaint brevity of the Brāhmaṇa; but I shall condense it as much as possible in the translation. It begins thus, verse 12747:

Mārkaṇḍeya uvācha | Vivasvataḥ suto rājan maharshiḥ suprātāpavān | babhūva nara-śārdūla Prajāpati-sama-dyutiḥ | ojasā tejasā lakshmyā tapasā cha viśeshataḥ | atichakrāma pitaram Manuḥ svaṁ cha pitāmaham | ūrddhva-bāhur viśālāyām Badaryām sa narādhipaḥ | eka-pāda-sthitas tīvram chachāra sumahat tapaḥ | 12750. Avāk-śirās tathā chāpi netrair animishair dṛiḍham | so 'tapyata tapo ghoraṁ varshāṇām ayutaṁ tadā | taṁ kadāchit tapasyantam ārdrachīraṁ jaṭā-dharam | Chīriṇī-tīram āgamya matsyo vachanam abravīt | "bhagavan kshudra-matsyo 'smi bala-vadbhyo bhayam mama | matsyebhyo hi tato māṁ tvam trātum arhasi suvrata | durbalam balavanto hi matsyam matsyā viśeshataḥ | āsvadanti sadā vṛittir vihitā naḥ sanātanī | tasmād bhayaughād mahato majjantam māṁ viśeshataḥ | trātum arhasi karttāsmi kṛite pratikṛitaṁ tava" | 12755.

Sa matsya-vachanaṁ śrutvā kṛipayā 'bhipariplutaḥ | Manur Vaivasvato 'gṛihṇāt tam matsyaṁ pāṇinā svayam | udakāntam upānīya matsyaṁ Vaivasvato Manuḥ | alinjire prākshipat tam chandrāṁśu-sadṛiśa-prabhe | sa tatra vavṛidhe rājan matsyaḥ parama-satkṛitaḥ | putravat svīkarot tasmai Manur bhāvam viśeshataḥ | atha kālena mahatā sa matsyaḥ sumahān abhūt | alinjire yathā chaiva nāsau samabhavat kila | atha matsyo Manuṁ dṛishṭvā punar evābhyabhāshata | "bhagavan sādhu me 'dyānyat sthānaṁ sampratipādaya" | 12760. Uddhṛityālinjirāt tasmāt tataḥ sa bhagavān Manuḥ | tam matsyam anayad vāpīm mahatīṁ sa Manus tadā | tatra tam prākshipach chāpi Manuḥ para-puranjaya | athāvarddhata matsyaḥ sa punar varsha-gaṇān bahūn | dvi-yojanāyatā vāpī vistṛitā chāpi yojanam | tasyāṁ nāsau samabhavat matsyo rājīva-lochanaḥ | vicheshṭituṁ cha Kaunteya matsyo vāpyāṁ viśāmpate | Manuṁ matsyas tato dṛishṭvā punar evābhyabhāshata | "naya mām bhagavan sādho samudra-mahishīm priyām | Gangāṁ tatra nivatsyāmi yathā vā tāta mānyase | 12765. Nideśe hi mayā tubhyaṁ sthātavyam anasūyatā | vṛiddhir hi paramā prāptā tvat-kṛite hi mayā 'nagha" | evam ukto Manur matsyam anayad bhagavān vaśī | nadīṁ Gangāṁ tatra chainam svayam prākshipad achyutaḥ | sa tatra vavṛidhe matsyaḥ kanchit kālam arindama | tataḥ punar Manuṁ dṛishṭvā matsyo vachanam abravīt | "Gangāyāṁ na hi śaknomi bṛihatvāch cheshṭitum prabho | samudraṁ naya mām āśu prasīda bhagavann" iti | uddhṛitya Gangā-salilāt tato matsyam Manuḥ svayam | samudram anayat pārtha tatra chainam avāsṛijat | 12770. Sumahān api matsyas tu sa Manor nayatas tadā | āsīd yatheshṭa-hāryyaścha sparśa-gandha-sukhaścha vai | yadā samudre prakshiptaḥ sa matsyo Manunā tadā | tata enam idaṁ vākyaṁ smayamāna ivābravīt | "bhagavan hi kṛitā rakshā tvayā sarvā viśeshataḥ | prāpta-kālaṁ tu yat kāryyaṁ tvayā tach chhrūyatām mama | achirād bhagavan bhaumam idaṁ sthāvara-jangamam | sarvam eva mahābhāga pralayaṁ vai gamishyati | samprakshālana-kālo 'yaṁ lokānāṁ samupasthitaḥ | tasmāt tvām bodhayāmy adya yat te hitam anuttamam | trasānāṁ sthāvarāṇāṁ cha yach chengaṁ yach cha nengati | tasya sarvasya samprāptaḥ kālaḥ parama-dāruṇaḥ | nauś cha kārayitavyā te dṛiḍhā yukta-vaṭārakā | tatra saptarshibhiḥ sārddham āruhethā mahāmune | vījāni chaiva sarvāṇi yathoktāni dvijaiḥ purā | tasyām ārohayer nāvi susanguptāni bhāgaśaḥ | nau-sthaś cha mām pratīkshethās tato muni-jana-priya | āgamishyāmy ahaṁ śṛingī vijne-

yas tena tāpasa | evam etat tvayā kāryam āpṛishṭo 'si vrajāmy aham | tā na śakyā mahatyo vai āpas tarttum mayā vinā | 12780. Nābhiśankyam idaṁ chāpi vachanam me tvayā vibho" | "evaṁ karishye" iti taṁ sa matsyam pratyabhāshata | jagmatuś cha yathākāmam anujnāpya parasparam | tato Manur mahārāja yathoktam matsyakena ha | vījāny ādāya sarvāṇi sāgaram pupluve tadā | naukayā śubhayā vīra mahormiṇam arindama | chintayāmāsa cha Manus tam matsyam prithivīpate | sa cha tach-chintitaṁ jnātvā matsyaḥ parapuranjaya | śṛingī tatrājagāmāśu tadā Bharata-sattama | taṁ dṛishṭvā manuja-vyāghra Manur matsyaṁ jalārṇave | 12785. Śṛingiṇaṁ taṁ yathoktena rūpeṇādrim ivochchhritam | vaṭārakamayam pāśam atha matsyasya mūrdhani | Manur manuja-śārdūla tasmin śṛinge nyaveśayat | saṁyatas tena pāśena matsyaḥ para-puranjaya | vegena mahatā nāvam prākarshal lavaṇāmbhasi | sa cha tāṁs tārayan nāvā samudram manujeśvara | nṛityamānam ivormībhir garjamānam ivāmbhasā | kshobhyamāṇā mahāvātaiḥ sā naus tasmin mahodadhau | ghūrṇate chapaleva strī mattā para-puranjaya | naiva bhūmir na cha diśaḥ pradiśo vā chakāśire | 12790. Sarvam āmbhasam evāsīt khaṁ dyauś cha narapungava | evambhūte tadā loke sankule Bharatarshabha | adṛiśyanta saptarshayaḥ Manur matsyas tathaiva cha | evam bahūn varsha-gaṇān tāṁ nāvam so 'tha matsyakaḥ | chakarshātandrito rājan tasmin salila-sanchaye | tato Himavataḥ śṛingaṁ yat param Bharatarshabha | tatrākarshat tato nāvaṁ sa matsyaḥ Kurunandana | athābravīt tadā matsyas tān ṛishīn prahasan śanaiḥ | "asmin Himavataḥ śṛinge nāvaṁ badhnīta māchiram" | sā baddhā tatra tais tūrṇam ṛishibhir Bharatarshabha | 12795. Naur matsyasya vachaḥ śrutvā śṛinge Himavatas tadā | tach cha Naubandhanaṁ nāma śṛingam Himavataḥ param | khyātam adyāpi Kaunteya tad viddhi Bharatarshabha | athābravīd anismishas tān ṛishīn sa hitas tadā | "aham Prajāpatir Brahmā yat-paraṁ nādhigamyate | matsya-rūpeṇa yūyaṁ cha mayā 'smād mokshitā bhayāt | Manunā cha prajāḥ sarvāḥ sa-devāsura-mānushāḥ | srashṭavyāḥ sarva-lokāś cha yach chengaṁ yach cha nengati | tapasā chāpi tīvreṇa pratibhā 'sya bhavishyati | mat-prasādāt prajā-sarge na cha mohaṁ gamishyati" | 12800. Ity uktvā vachanam matsyaḥ kshaṇenādarśanaṁ gataḥ | srashṭu-kāmaḥ prajāś chāpi Manur Vaivasvataḥ svayam | pramūḍho 'bhūt prajā-sarge tapas tepe mahat tataḥ | tapasā mahatā yuktaḥ so 'tha srashṭum prachakrame | sarvāḥ prajā Manuḥ sākshād yathāvad Bharatarshabha | ity etad mātsyakam nāma purāṇam parikīrttitam |

"12747. Mārkaṇḍeya said: There was a great rishi Manu, son of Vivasvat, majestic, in lustre equal to Prajāpati. In energy, fiery vigour, prosperity, and austere fervour he surpassed both his father and his grandfather. Standing with uplifted arm, on one foot, on the spacious Badari, he practised intense austere fervour. 12750. This direful exercise he performed, with his head downwards,[51] and with unwinking eyes, for 10,000 years. Once, when, clad in dripping rags, with matted hair, he was so engaged, a fish came to him on the banks of the Chīriṇī, and spake: 'Lord, I am a small fish; I dread the stronger ones, and from them you must save me. For the stronger fish devour the weaker; this has been immemorially ordained as our means of subsistence. Deliver me from this flood of apprehension in which I am sinking, and I will requite the deed.' 12755. Hearing this, Manu, filled with compassion, took the fish in his hand, and bringing him to the water threw him into a jar bright as a moon-beam. In it the fish, being excellently tended, grew; for Manu treated him like a son. After a long time he became very large, and could not be contained in the jar. Then, seeing Manu, he said again: 'In order that I may thrive, remove me elsewhere.' 12760. Manu then took him out of the jar, brought him to a large pond, and threw him in. There he continued to grow for very many years. Although the pond was two yojanas long, and one yojana broad, the lotus-eyed fish found in it no room to move; and again said to Manu: 'Take me to Gangā, the dear queen of the ocean-monarch; in her I shall dwell; or do as thou thinkest best, (12765) for I must contentedly submit to thy authority, as through thee I have exceedingly increased.' Manu accordingly took the fish and threw him into the river Gangā. There he waxed for some time, when he again said to Manu: 'From my great bulk I cannot move in the Gangā; be gracious and remove me quickly to the ocean.' Manu took him out of the Gangā; and cast him into the sea. 12770. Although so huge, the fish was easily borne, and pleasant to touch and smell, as Manu carried him. When he had been thrown into the ocean he said to Manu: 'Great lord, thou hast in every way preserved me: now hear from me what thou must do when the time arrives. Soon shall all these terrestrial objects, both fixed and moving, be dissolved. The time for the purification of the worlds has now arrived. I therefore inform thee what is for thy greatest good. 12775. The period dreadful for the universe, moving and fixed, has come. Make for thyself a strong ship, with a cable attached; embark in it with the seven rishis, and stow in it, carefully preserved and assorted, all the seeds which have been described of old by Brāhmans.[52] When embarked in the ship, look out for me: I shall come recognizable by my horn. So shalt thou do; I greet thee and depart. These great waters cannot be crossed over without me. 12780. Distrust not my word.' Manu replied, 'I shall do as thou hast said.' After taking mutual leave they departed each on his own way. Manu then, as enjoined, taking with him the seeds, floated on the billowy ocean in the beautiful ship. He then thought on the fish, which, knowing his desire, arrived with all speed, distinguished by a horn. When Manu saw the horned leviathan, lofty as a mountain, he fastened the ship's cable to the horn. Being thus attached, the fish dragged the ship with great rapidity, transporting it across the briny ocean which seemed to dance with its waves and thunder with its waters. Tossed by the tempests, the ship whirled like a reeling and intoxicated woman. Neither the earth, nor the quarters of the world appeared; (12790) there was nothing but water, air, and sky. In the world thus confounded, the seven rishis, Manu, and the fish were beheld. So, for very many years, the fish, unwearied, drew the ship over the waters; and brought it at length to the highest peak of Himavat. He then, smiling gently, said to the rishis, 'Bind the ship without delay to this peak.' They did so accordingly. 12795. And that highest peak of Himavat is still known by the name of Naubandhana ('the Binding of the Ship'). The friendly fish (or god, animisha) then said to the rishis, 'I am the Prajāpati Brahmā, than whom nothing higher can be reached. In the form of a fish I have delivered you from this great danger. Manu shall create all living beings, gods, asuras, MEN, with all worlds, and all things moving and fixed. By my favour and through severe austere fervour, he shall attain perfect insight into his creative work, and shall not be-

[51] He could not have stood on one foot and with his head downwards (if this means standing on his head) at one and the same time. The text may mean that these attitudes were successively adopted.

[52] The S'atapatha Brāhmaṇa is silent as to these seeds, as well as to the seven rishis; but it is possible that the reference here made to them may have been borrowed from some other ancient source.

come bewildered.' 12800. Having thus spoken, the fish in an instant disappeared. Manu, desirous to call creatures into existence and bewildered in his work, performed a great act of austere fervour; and then began visibly to create all living beings. This which I have narrated is known as the Mātsyaka Purāṇa (or 'Legend of the Fish').'

It will be observed that towards the close of this narrative it is stated that Manu (not Brahmā himself) was the creator of Men, as well of gods and asuras; and that no reference is made to the formation of separate castes.

The commentators seem disinclined to take this legend in its literal sense. We shall see below what reason the scholiast on the Bhāgavata Purāṇa assigns for this procedure. The following are some of the remarks of the Commentator Nīlakaṇṭha on the above passage of the Mahābhārata:

"Manoḥ" manute ity abhimānātmako 'hankāro Manuḥ | viśeshena vaste āchhādayati chit-prakāśam iti viveka-jnānam tad-vān vivasvān māyāvī īśvaraḥ "māyinaṁ tu maheśvaram" iti śruteḥ | tasya Vaivasvatasya charitam sancharaṇam | "avidyā-nāśe saty āvidyako 'hankāraḥ kathaṁ sancharati | nahi tantu-dāhe paṭas tishṭhati" ity ākshepaḥ | . . . . atra para-brahmaṇa eva rūpāntaram matsyākhyo jīvaḥ | so 'hankāreṇa Manunā uttarottara-śreshṭheshu alinjirādi-rūpeshu sthūla-deheshu tapo-balād nipātyate | sa cha samudrākhye vairāje dehe nipātitaś cha kalpānte avidyānāśa-rūpe saty api dādha- (dagdha?) -paṭa-nyāyena anuvarttamānam ahaṇkāraṁ saptarshi-sanjnakaiḥ prāṇādibhiḥ vīja-sanjnaiḥ prārabdha-karmabhiś cha sahitaṁ charama-deha-nāvy ārūḍham vāsanā-varatrayā jīva-matsyena pralaya-kāle 'py ūhyamānam meru-śṛinga same 'chale bhavato (Himavad-?) rūpe sadvāsanayā labdhāspadaṁ vilīnam anulakshya jīva-matsyo 'darśanam prāptaḥ | ati-vilīne hy ahankāre jīvatvam naśyati | sa punar nirasta-jīva-bhāvo 'hankāro brahma-rūpatām āpanno yathā pūrvaṁ vāsanayā jagat sṛijati | nashṭe 'py avidyākhye kāraṇe saṁsāra-bhāna-lakshaṇaṁ kāryaṁ chakra-bhramam iva kanchit kālam anuvarttate ity adhyāya-tātparyam | aksharārthas tv ityādi |

"'Manu,' that which imagines, denotes the consciousness of self (ahankāra), consisting in the idea that objects refer to one's self (abhimāna).[53] 'Vivasvat' is he who possesses the discriminating knowledge that (such and such a thing) obscures the light of the mind, i.e.

[53] See Colebrooke's Misc. Essays, vol. i. 242.

he is the Illuder, Īśvara, for the Veda[54] speaks of 'Maheśvara the Illuder.' It is the 'history,' the action, of this son of Vivasvat, that is related. It is objected, 'how can Ahankāra, which arises from ignorance, operate when ignorance is destroyed?' for when the threads are burnt the cloth no longer remains' . . . . Here the embodied soul, called in this passage a 'Fish,' is only another form of the supreme Brahma. This 'Fish' is thrown by 'Manu,' who is Ahankāra, through the power of austere fervour, into gross bodies, here represented by 'a jar,' 'a pond,' etc., which gradually rise in excellence. Being at last cast into the body of Virāj, called 'the ocean,' although 'the close of the Kalpa' means the destruction of ignorance, still the embodied soul denoted by the 'Fish,' contemplating Ahankāra still remaining like the ashes of burnt cloth, then entering, along with the breath and other vital airs named 'the seven rishis,' and the works of a former birth designated as 'seeds,' into the ship which signifies its last body, and then borne along even in the period of dissolution by the embodied soul itself symbolized as a 'Fish,' by means of the 'rope' of the remaining consciousness of past perceptions (vāsanā), obtaining at length through a consciousness of former perceptions, which were pure (sad-vāsanā), a resting-place on a mountain like the peak of Meru, represented by the Himavat (?), and finally dissolved;—the embodied soul under the figure of a 'Fish' having contemplated all this,—vanishes. For when Ahankāra has become entirely dissolved, the state of the embodied soul ceases. Then Ahankāra, after the state of the embodied soul has been dispelled, obtains the condition of Brahma; but by its consciousness of past perceptions creates the world as before. Even when the cause called ignorance has been destroyed, the effect in the shape of the semblance of the world continues for some time, like the revolution of a wheel. Such is signification of the section."

According to this allegorial interpretation "Vivasvat," father of Manu, represents Īśvara, the Illuder. "Manu" is Ahankāra, or self-consciousness. The "Fish" is the embodied soul, which fancies itself to be, but is not, distinct from the Supreme spirit. Ahankāra, denoted by 'Manu,' places the embodied soul, symbolized by the "Fish," in a variety of bodies gradually increasing in excellence, which are signified by the "jar," "pond," "Gangā," and "ocean." Although the end of the Kalpa means the removal of ignorance, still Ahankāra continues for a time; and along with the "seven rishis," who stand for the vital airs, and the "seeds," which are former works, embarks on the "ship," which is its last body, and is drawn over the ocean by the embodied soul by means of a "rope," which signifies the consciousness of former perceptions. Ahankāra at length finds a resting-place, denoted by Mount Himavat; and when it has been destroyed, the embodied soul vanishes. Ahankāra, however, passes into the form of Brahma, and, through the operation of the cause explained by the Commentator, creates the world anew.

[54] The words are taken from one of the Upanishads, to which, at the time of correcting this sheet, I am unable to give the necessary reference.

It is scarcely necessary to remark that the narrator of the legend himself appears to have had no idea of making it the vehicle of any Vedantic allegory such as is here propounded.

The following is another version of the same legend from the Matsya Purāṇa:

i. 12.[55] Purā rājā Manur nāma chīrṇavān vipulaṁ tapaḥ | putre rājyaṁ samāropya kshamāvān Ravi-nandanaḥ | 13. Malayasyaika-deśe tu sarvātmāguṇa-saṁyutaḥ | sama-duḥkha-sukho vīraḥ prāptavān yogam uttamam | 14. Vachanaṁ[56] varadaś chāsya varshāyuta-śate gate | "varaṁ vṛiṇīshva" provācha prītātmā Kamalāsanaḥ | 15. Evam ukto 'bravīd rājā praṇamya sa Pitāmaham | "ekam evāham ichhāmi tvatto varam anuttamam | 16. Bhūta-grāmasya sarvasya sthāvarasya charasya cha | bhaveyaṁ rakshaṇāyālam pralaye samupasthite" | 17. "Evam astv" iti viśvātmā tatraivāntaradhīyata | pushpa-vṛishṭiś cha mahatī khāt papāta surārpitā | 18. Kadāchid āśrame tasya kurvataḥ pitṛi-tarpaṇam | papāta pāṇyor upari śapharī jala-saṁyutā | 19. Dṛishṭvā tach-chhapharī-rūpaṁ sa dayālur mahīpatiḥ | rakshaṇāyākarod yatnaṁ sa tasmin ka_rakodare | 20. Ahorātreṇa chaikena shoḍaśāṅgula-vistṛitaḥ | so 'bhavad matsya-rūpeṇa "pāhi pāhīti" chābravīt | 21. Sa tam ādāya maṇike prākshipaj jala-chāriṇam | tatrāpi chaikarātreṇa hasta-trayam avarddhata | 22. Punaḥ prāhārttanādena Sahasrakiraṇātmajam | sa matsyaḥ "pāhi pāhīti" "tvām ahaṁ śaraṇaṁ gataḥ" | 23. Tataḥ sa kūpe tam matsyam prāhiṇoḍ Ravi-nandanaḥ | yadā na māti tatrapi kūpe matsyaḥ

[55] This passage is extracted in Professor Aufrecht's Catalogue of the Bodleian Sanskrit MSS. p. 347.

[56] The Taylor MS. reads babhūva, instead of vachanam.

sarovare | 24. Kshiptaḥ sa pṛithutām āgāt punar yojana-sammitām | tatrāpy āha punar dīnaḥ "pāhi pāhi nṛipottama" | 25. Tataḥ sa Manunā kshipto Gangāyām apy avarddhata | yadā tadā samudre tam prākshipad medinīpatiḥ | 26. Yadā samudram akhilaṁ vyāpyāsau samavasthitaḥ | tadā prāha Manur bhītaḥ "ko 'pi tvam asuretaraḥ | 27. Athavā Vāsudevas tvam anya īdṛik katham bhavet | yojanāyuta-viṁśatyā kasya tulyam bhaved vapuḥ | 28. Jnātas tvam matsya-rūpeṇa māṁ khedayasi Keśava | Hṛishīkeśa jagannātha jagad-dhāma namo 'stu te" | 29. Evam uktaḥ sa bhagavān matsya-rūpī Janārdanaḥ | "sādhu sādhv" iti chovācha "samyag jnātaṁ tvayā 'nagha | 30. Achireṇaiva kālena medinī medinīpate | bhavishyati jale magnā sā-śaila-vana-kānanā | 31. Naur iyaṁ sarva-devānāṁ nikāyena vinirmitā | mahā-jīva-nikāyasya rakshaṇārtham mahīpate | 32. Svedāṇḍajodbhijā jīvā ye cha jīvā jarāyujāḥ | asyaṁ nidhāya sarvāṁs tān anarthāt[57] pāhi suvrata | 33. Yugānta-vātābhihatā yadā chalati naur nṛipa | śṛinge 'smin mama rājendra tademāṁ saṁyamishyasi | 34. Tato layānte sarvasya sthāvarasya charasya cha | prajāpatis tvam bhavitā jagataḥ pṛithivī-pate | 35. Evaṁ kṛite mahārāja[58] sarvajno dhṛitimān ṛishiḥ | manvantarādhipaś chāpi deva-pūjyo bhavishyasi | 36. Adhyāya ii. Sūta uvācha | 1. Evam ukto Manus tena paprachhāsura-sūdanam | varshair kiyadbhir bhagavan bhavishyaty antara-kshayaḥ | 2. Sattvāni cha kathaṁ nātha rakshishye Madhusūdana | tvayā saha punar yogaḥ kathaṁ vā bhavitā mama | 3. Śrī-matsya uvācha | adya-prabhṛity anāvṛishṭir bhavishyati mahītale | yāvad varsha-śataṁ sāgraṁ durbhikshaṁ narakāvaham | 4. Tato 'lpa-sattva-kshayadā raśmayaḥ sapta dāruṇāḥ | sapta-sapter bhavishyanti prataptāngāra-varshiṇaḥ | 5. Aurvānalo 'pi vikṛitiṁ gamishyati yuga-kshaye | vishāgniś chāpi pātālāt sankarshaṇa-mukha-chyutaḥ | 6. Bhavasyāpi lalāṭotthas tṛitīya-nayanānalaḥ | jagad dagdhaṁ tathā kshobhaṁ gamishyati mahāmate | 7. Evaṁ dagdhā mahī sarvā yadā syād bhasma-sannibhā[59] | ākāśam ushmaṇā taptam bhavishyati parantapa | 8. Tataḥ sa-deva-nakshatraṁ jagad yāsyati sankshayam | saṁvartto bhīmanādaś cha droṇaś chaṇḍo[60] balāhakaḥ | 9. Vidyutpatākaḥ śoṇāmbuḥ saptaite laya-vāridāḥ | agni-prasveda-sambhūtāḥ plāvayishyanti medinīm | 10. Samudrāḥ kshobham āgatya

[57] Instead of anarthāt the Taylor MS. reads anāthān.

[58] The Taylor MS. reads here evaṁ kṛita-yugasyādau.

[59] Kūrma-sannibhā | Taylor MS.

[60] The Taylor and Gaikowar MSS. have chandro.

chaikatvena vyavasthitāḥ | etad ekārṇavaṁ sarvam karishyanti jagat-trayam | 11. Divyāṁ nāvam[61] imāṁ gṛihya sarva-vījāni sarvaśaḥ | āropya rajjvā yogena mat-prayuktena suvrata | 12. Saṁyamya nāvam machchhṛinge mat-prabhāvābhirakshitaḥ | ekaḥ sthāsyasi deveshu dagdheshv api parantapa | 13. Soma-sūryāv aham Brahmā chatur-loka-samanvitaḥ | Narmadā cha nadī puṇyā Mārkaṇḍeyo mahān ṛishiḥ | 14. Bhavo vedāḥ purāṇaṁ cha vidyābhiḥ sarvato vṛitam | tvayā sārddham idaṁ sarvaṁ sthāsyaty antara-sankshaye | 15. Evam ekārṇave jāte Chākshushāntara-sankshaye | vedān pravarttayishyāmi tvat-sargādau mahīpate | 16. Sūta uvācha | Evam uktvā sa bhagavāṁs tatraivāntaradhīyata | Manur apy āsthito yogaṁ Vāsudeva-prasādajam | 17. Athābhūch cha tathā-bhūtaḥ samplavaḥ pūrva-sūchitaḥ | kāle yathokte sanjāte Vāsudeva-mukhodyate | 18. Śṛingī prādurbabhūvātha matsya-rūpī Janārdanaḥ | Ananto rajju-rūpeṇa Manoḥ pārśvam upāgamat | 19. Bhūta-sangān samākṛishya yogenāropya dharmavit | bhujanga-rajjvā matsyasya śṛinge nāvam ayojayat | 20. Uparyy upasthitas tasyāḥ praṇipatya Janārdanam | ābhūta-samplave tasminn atīte yoga-śāyinā | 21. Pṛishṭena Manunā proktam purāṇam matsyarūpiṇā | tad idānīm pravakshyāmi śṛiṇudhvam ṛishi-sattamāḥ |

"12. Formerly a heroic king called Manu, the patient son of the Sun, endowed with all good qualities, indifferent to pain and pleasure, after investing his son with the royal authority, practised intense austere fervour, (13) in a certain region of Malaya (Malabar), and attained to transcendent union with the Deity (yoga). 14. When a million years had elapsed, Brahmā became pleased and disposed to bestow a boon, which he desired Manu to choose. 15. Bowing before the father of the world the monarch said, 'I desire of thee this one incomparable boon, that when the dissolution of the universe arrives I may have power to preserve all existing things, whether moving or stationary.' 17. 'So be it,' said the Soul of all things, and vanished on the spot; when a great shower of flowers, thrown down by the gods, fell from the sky. 18. Once as, in his hermitage, Manu offered the oblation to the Manes, there fell, upon his hands, along with some water, a Śapharī fish (a carp), (19) which the kind-hearted king perceiving, strove to preserve in his water-jar. 20. In one day and night the fish grew to the size of sixteen fingers, and cried, 'preserve me, preserve me.' 21. Manu then took and threw him into a large pitcher, where in one night he increased three cubits, (22) and again cried, with the voice of one distressed, to the son of Vivasvat, 'preserve me, preserve me, I have sought refuge with thee.' 23. Manu next put him into a well, and when he could not be contained even in that, (24) he was thrown into a lake, where he attained to the size of a yojana; but still cried in humble tones, 'preserve me, preserve me.' 25. When, after being flung into the Gangā he increased there also, the king threw him into the ocean. 26. When he filled the entire ocean, Manu said, in terror, 'Thou art some god, (27) or thou art Vāsudeva; how can any one else be like this? Whose body could equal 200,000 yojanas? 28. Thou art recognised under this form of a fish, and thou tormentest me, Keśava; reverence be to thee, Hrishīkeśa, lord of the world, abode of the universe!' 29. Thus addressed, the divine Janārdana, in the form of a fish, replied: 'Thou hast well spoken, and hast rightly known me. 30. In a short time the earth with its mountains, groves, and forests, shall be submerged in the waters. 31. This ship has been constructed by the company of all the gods[62] for the preservation of the vast host of living creatures. 32. Embarking in it all living creatures, both those engendered from moisture and from eggs, as well as the viviparous, and plants, preserve them from calamity. 33. When driven by the blasts at the end of the yuga, the ship is swept along, thou shalt bind it to this horn of mine. 34. Then at the close of the dissolution thou shalt be the Prajāpati (lord of creatures) of this world, fixed and moving. 35. When this shall have been done,[63] thou, the omniscient, patient rishi, and lord of the Manvantara, shalt be an object of worship to the gods."

[61] The Taylor MS. reads veda-nāvam, "the ship of the Vedas."

2nd Adhyāya: "1. Sūta said: Being thus addressed, Manu asked the slayer of the Asura, 'In how many years shall the (existing) Manvantara come to an end? 2. And how shall I preserve the living creatures? or how shall I meet again with thee?' The fish answered: 'From this day forward a drought shall visit the earth for a hundred years and more, with a tormenting famine. 4. Then the seven direful rays of the son, of little power, destructive, shall rain burning charcoal. 5. At the close of the yuga the submarine fire shall burst forth, [62] The reading of the Taylor MS. here is partially erased; but it may have been sarva-vedānām, "of all the Vedas." Compare the various reading in verse 11 of the next adhyāya.

[63] According to the reading of the Taylor MS. we should have to substitute the words, "Thus at the beginning of the Kṛita age, thou" etc.

while the poisonous flame issuing from the mouth of Sankarshaṇa (shall blaze) from Pātāla, and the fire from Mahādeva's third eye shall issue from his forehead. Thus kindled the world shall become confounded. 7. When, consumed in this manner, the earth shall become like ashes, the æther too shall be scorched with heat. 8. Then the world, together with the gods and planets, shall be destroyed. The seven clouds of the period of dissolution, called Saṁvartta, Bhīmanāda, Droṇa, Chaṇḍa, Balāhaka, (9) Vidyutpatāka, and Soṇāmbu, produced from the steam of the fire, shall inundate the earth. 10. The seas agitated, and joined together, shall reduce these entire three worlds to one ocean. 11. Taking this celestial ship, embarking on it all the seeds, and through contemplation fixed on me fastening it by a rope (12) to my horn, thou alone shalt remain, protected by my power, when even the gods are burnt up. 13. The sun and moon, I Brahmā with the four worlds, the holy river Narmadā,[64] the great rishi Mārkaṇḍeya, (14) Mahādeva, the Vedas, the Purāṇa with the sciences,—these shall remain with thee at the close of the Manvantara. 15. The world having thus become one ocean at the end of the Chākshusha manvantara, I shall give currency to the Vedas at the commencement of thy creation.' 16. Sūta continued: Having thus spoken, the divine Being vanished on the spot; while Manu fell into a state of contemplation (yoga) induced by the favour of Vāsudeva. 17. When the time announced by Vāsudeva had arrived, the predicted deluge took place in that very manner. Then Janārdana appeared in the form of a horned fish; (the serpent) Ananta came to Manu in the shape of a rope. 19. Then he who was skilled in duty (i.e. Manu) drew towards himself all creatures by contemplation (yoga) and stowed them in the ship, which he then attached to the fish's horn by the serpent-rope, (20) as he stood upon the ship, and after he had made obeisance to Janārdana. 21. I shall now declare the Purāṇa which, in answer to an enquiry from Manu, was uttered by the deity in the form of the fish, as he lay in a sleep of contemplation till the end of the universal inundation: Listen." The Matsya Purāṇa gives us no further information here about the progress and results of the deluge; and this narrative does not appear to be ever afterwards resumed.

[64] In the opinion of this writer, therefore, the Narmadā (Nerbudda) must have been a holier stream than the Gangā: otherwise we should have expected him to select the latter as the river to be preserved at the dissolution.

The Bhāgavata P. viii. 24, 7, gives the same story with variations as follows:

Āsīd atīta-kalpānte brāhmo naimittiko layaḥ | samudropaplutās tatra lokā bhūr-ādayo nṛipa | 8. Kālenāgata-nidrasya Dhātuḥ śiśayishor balī | mukhato nissṛitān vedān Hayagrīvo 'ntike 'harat | 9. Jnātvā tad dānavendrasya Hayagrīvasya cheshṭitam | dadhāra śapharī-rūpam bhagavān Harir īśvaraḥ | 10. Tatra rāja-ṛishiḥ kaśchid nāmnā Satyavrato mahān | Nārāyaṇa-paro 'tapyat tapaḥ sa salilāśanaḥ | 11. Yo 'sāv asmin mahākalpe tanayaḥ sa Vivasvataḥ | Śrāddhadeva iti khyāto manutve Hariṇā 'rpitaḥ | 12. Ekadhā Kṛitamālāyāṁ kurvato jala-tarpaṇam | tasyāñjalyudake kāchich chhaphary ekā 'bhyapadyata | 13. Satyavrato 'njali-gatām saha toyena Bhārata | utsasarja nadī-toye śapharīṁ Draviḍeśvaraḥ | tam āha sātikaruṇam mahākāruṇikāṁ nṛipam | yādobhyo jnāti-ghātibhyo dīnām māṁ dīnavatsala | kathaṁ visṛijase rājan bhītām asmin sarij-jale | . . . . . 32. Saptame 'dyatanād ūrddhvam ahany etad arindama | nimankshyaty apyayāmbhodhau trailokyam bhūr-bhuvādikam | 33. Trilokyāṁ līyamānāyāṁ saṁvarttāmbhasi vai tadā | upasthāsyati nauḥ kāchid viśālā tvām mayeritā | 34. Tvaṁ tāvad oshadhīḥ sarvā vījāny uchchāvachāni cha | saptarshibhih parivṛitaḥ sarva-sattvopavṛiṁhitaḥ | 45. Āruhya vṛihatīṁ nāvaṁ vicharishyasy aviklavaḥ | ekārṇave nirāloke ṛishīṇām eva varchasā | 36. Dodhūyamānāṁ tām nāvaṁ samīreṇa balīyasā | upasthitasya me śṛinge nibadhnīhi mahāhinā | 37. Ahaṁ tvām ṛishibhiḥ sākaṁ sahanāvam udanvati | vikarshan vicharishyāmi yāvad Brāhmī niśā prabho | . . . . 41. Tataḥ samudraḥ udvelaḥ sarvataḥ plāvayan mahīm | vardhamāno mahāmeghair varshadbhiḥ samadṛiśyata | 42. Dhyāyan bhagavad-ādeśaṁ dadṛiśe nāvam āgatām | tām āruroha viprendrair ādāyaushadhi-vīrudhaḥ | 43. Tam ūchur munayaḥ prītā rājan dhyāyasva Keśavam | sa vai naḥ sankaṭād asmād avitā śaṁ vidhāsyati | 44. So 'nudhyātas tato rājnā prādurāsīd mahārṇave | eka-śṛingadharo matsyo haimo niyuta-yojanaḥ | 45. Nibadhya nāvaṁ tach-chhṛinge yathokto Hariṇā purā | varatreṇāhinā tushṭas tushṭāva Madhusūdanam | . . . . . 54. Ity uktavantaṁ nṛipatim bhagavān Ādipūrushaḥ | matsyarūpī mahāmbhodhau viharaṁs tattvam abravīt | 55. Purāṇa-saṁhitām divyāṁ Sānkhya-Yoga-kriyāvatīm | Satyavratasya rājarsher ātma-guhyam aśeshataḥ | 56. Aśraushīd ṛishibhiḥ sākam ātma-tattvam asaṁśayam | nāvy āsīno bhagavatā proktam brahma sanātanam | 57. Atītapralayāpāye utthitāya sa Vedhase | hatvāśuraṁ Hayagrīvaṁ vedān prat-

yāharad Hariḥ | 58. Sa tu Satyavrato rājā jñāna-vijñāna-saṁyutaḥ | Vishṇoḥ prasādāt kalpe 'smin āsīd Vaivasvato Manuḥ |

"7. At the close of the past Kalpa there occurred an occasional[65] dissolution of the universe arising from Brahmā's nocturnal repose; in which the Bhūrloka and other worlds were submerged in the ocean. 8. When the creator, desirous of rest, had under the influence of time been overcome by sleep, the strong Hayagrīva coming near, carried off the Vedas which had issued from his mouth. 9. Discovering this deed of the prince of the Dānavas, the divine Hari, the Lord, took the form of a Śapharī fish. 10. At that time a certain great royal rishi, called Satyavrata, who was devoted to Nārāyaṇa, practised austere fervour, subsisting on water. 11. He was the same who in the present great Kalpa is the son of Visvasvat, called Śrāddhadeva,[66] and was appointed by Hari to the office of Manu. 12. Once, as in the river Kṛitamālā he was offering the oblation of water to the Pitris, a Śapharī fish came into the water in the hollow of his hands. 13. The lord of Draviḍa, Satyavrata, cast the fish in his hands with the water into the river. 14. The fish very piteously cried to the merciful king, 'Why dost thou abandon me poor and terrified to the monsters who destroy their kindred in this river?'" [Satyavrata then took the fish from the river, placed it in his waterpot, and as it grew larger and larger, threw it successively into a larger vessel, a pond, various lakes, and at length into the sea. The fish objects to be left there on the plea that it would be devoured; but Manu replies that it can be no real fish, but Vishṇu himself; and with various expressions of devotion enquires why he had assumed this disguise, verses 15–31.] The god replies: 32. "On the seventh day after this the three worlds Bhūrloka, etc., shall sink beneath the ocean of the dissolution. 33. When the universe is dissolved in that ocean, a large ship, sent by me, shall come to thee. 34. Taking with thee the plants and various seeds, surrounded by the seven rishis, and attended by all existences, (35) thou shalt embark on the great ship, and shalt without alarm move over the one dark ocean, by the sole light of the rishis. When the ship shall be vehemently shaken by the tempestuous wind, fasten it by the great serpent to my horn—for I shall come near. 37. So long as the night of Brahmā lasts, I shall draw thee with the rishis and the ship over the ocean." [The god then disappears after promising that Satyavrata shall practically know his greatness and experience his kindness, and Satyavrata awaits the predicted events, verses 38–40.] 41. "Then the sea, augmenting as the great clouds poured down their waters, was seen overflowing its shores and everywhere inundating the earth. 42. Meditating on the injunctions of the deity, Satyavrata beheld the arrival of the ship, on which he embarked with the Brāhmans, taking along with him the various kinds of plants. 43. Delighted, the Munis said to him, 'meditate on Keśava; he will deliver us from this danger, and grant us prosperity.' 44. Accordingly when the king had meditated on him, there appeared on the ocean a golden fish, with one horn, a million yojanas long. 45. Binding the ship to his horn with the serpent for a rope, as he had been before commanded by Hari, Satyavrata lauded Madhusūdana." [Verses 46–53 contain the hymn.] 54. When the king had thus spoken, the divine primeval Male, in the form of a fish, moving on the vast ocean declared to him the truth; (55) the celestial collection of Puranas, with the Sānkhya, Yoga, the ceremonial, and the mystery of the soul. 56. Seated on the ship with the rishis, Satyavrata heard the true doctrine of the soul, of the eternal Brahmā, declared by the god. 57. When Brahmā arose at the end of the past dissolution, Hari restored to him the Vedas, after slaying Hayagrīva. 58. And King Satyavrata, master of all knowledge, sacred and profane, became, by the favour of Vishṇu, the son of Vivasvat, the Manu in this Kalpa."

[65] Naimittika. See above p. 45.

[66] Manu is called Śrāddhadeva in the Mahābhārata also, Śāntip. 4507. In the Brāhmaṇas, however, he receives the appellation, or epithet, not of Śrāddhădeva, but of Srăddhadeva. See above, p. 188 ff.

Before adducing the remarks of the commentator Śrīdhara Svāmin on the passage last cited from the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, I shall quote one more version of the same legend from the Agni Purāṇa.[67] It is not of any great consequence, as, though more condensed, it coincides in purport with that in the Bhāgavata Purāṇa: which of the two has borrowed from the other, or whether both are derived from a common source, I am unable to say.

[67] This has been copied by Professor Aufrecht from a MS. of the Agni Purāṇa, belonging to the Royal Asiatic Society of London. I am informed by Prof. Aufrecht that the East India Office Library has two MSS. of the Vahni Purāṇa, which (although Vahni is, in later Sanskrit, synonymous with Agni) differ entirely in their contents from the Agni Purāṇa.

Vasishṭha uvācha | 1. Matsyādi-rūpiṇaṁ Vishṇum brūhi sargādi-kāranam | purāṇam brahma chāgneyaṁ yathā Vishṇoḥ purā śrutam | Agnir uvācha | 2. Matsyāvatāraṁ vakshye 'haṁ Vasishṭha śṛiṇu vai Hareḥ | avatāra-kriyāṁ dushṭa-nashṭyai sat-pālanāya hi | 3. Āsīd atīta-kalpānte brāhmo naimittiko layaḥ | sanudropaplutās tatra lokā bhūrādikā mune | 4. Manur Vaivasvatas tepe tapo vai bhukti-muktaye | ekadā Kṛitalmālāyāṁ kurvato jala-tarpaṇam | 5. Tasyānjaly-udake matsyaḥ svalpa eko 'bhyapadyata | ksheptu-kāmaṁ jale prāha "na māṁ kshipa narottama | 6. Grahādibhyo bhayam me 'tra" tach chhrutvā kalaśe 'kshipat | Manuṁ vṛiddhaḥ punar matsyaḥ prāha taṁ "dehi me vṛihat" | 7. Tasya tad vachanaṁ śrutvā rājā 'tha vandane 'kshipat | tatra vṛiddho 'bravīd bhūpam "pṛithu dehi padam mama" | 8. Sarovare punaḥ kshipto vavṛidhe tat-pramāṇavān | uche "dehi vṛihat sthānam" prākshipach chāmbudhau tataḥ | 9. Laksha-yojana-vistīrṇaḥ kshaṇa-mātreṇa so 'bhavat | matsyaṁ tam adbhutaṁ dṛishṭvā vismitaḥ prābravīd Manuḥ | 10. "Ko bhavān nanu vai Vishṇur Nārāyaṇa namo'stu te | māyayā mohayasi māṁ kimarthaṁ cha Janārdana" | 11. Manur-ukto[68] 'bravīd matsyo Manuṁ vai pālane ratam | avatīrṇo bhavāyāsya jagato dushṭa-nashṭaye | 12. "Saptame divase tv abdhiḥ plāvayishyati vai jagat | upasthitāyāṁ nāvi tvaṁ vījadīni vidhāya cha | 13. Saptarshibhiḥ parivṛito niśām brāhmīṁ charishyasi | upasthitasya me śṛinge nibadhnīhi mahāhina" | 14. Ity uktvā 'ntardādhe matsyo Manuḥ kāla-pratīkshakaḥ | stitaḥ samudra udvele nāvam āruruhe tadā | 15. Eka-śṛinga-dharo matsyo haimo niyuta-yojanaḥ | nāvam babandha tach-chhṛinge matsyākhyaṁ cha purāṇakam | 16. Śuśrāva matsyāt pāpa-ghnaṁ sa-śrutam śrutibhiḥ śrutam (?) | brahma-veda-praharttāraṁ Hayagrīvaṁ cha dānavam | 17. Avadhīd veda-mantrādyān pālayāmāsa Keśavaḥ |

"Vasishṭha said: 1. Declare to me Vishṇu, the cause of the creation, in the form of a Fish and his other incarnations; and the Puranic revelation of Agni, as it was originally heard from Vishṇu. Agni replied: 2. Hear, o Vasishṭha, I shall relate to thee the Fish-incarnation of Vishṇu, and his acts when so incarnate for the destruction of the wicked, and protection of the good. 3. At the close of the past Kalpa there occurred an occasional dissolution of the universe caused by Brahmā's sleep, when the Bhūrloka and other worlds were inundated by the ocean. 4. Manu, the son of Vivasvat, practised austere fervour for the sake of worldly enjoyment as well as final liberation. Once, when he was offering the libation of water to the Pitṛis in the river Kṛitamālā, (5) a small fish came into the water in the hollow of his hands, and said to him when he sought to cast it into the stream, 'Do not throw me in, (6) for I am afraid of alligators and other monsters which are here.' On hearing this Manu threw it into a jar. Again, when grown, the Fish said to him, 'Provide me a large place.' 7. Manu then cast it into a larger vessel (?). When it increased there, it said to the king, 'Give me a wide space.' 8. When, after being thrown into a pond, it became as large as its receptacle, and cried out for greater room, he flung it into the sea. 9. In a moment it became a hundred thousand yojanas in bulk. Beholding the wonderful Fish, Manu said in astonishment: (10) 'Who art thou? Art thou Vishṇu? Adoration be paid to thee, o Nārāyaṇa. Why, o Janārdana, dost thou bewilder me by thy illusion?' 11. The Fish, which had become incarnate for the welfare of this world and the destruction of the wicked, when so addressed, replied to Manu, who had been intent upon its preservation: (12) 'Seven days after this the ocean shall inundate the world. A ship shall come to thee, in which thou shalt place the seeds, (13) and accompanied by the rishis shalt sail during the night of Brahmā. Bind it with the great serpent to my horn, when I arrive. 14. Having thus spoken the Fish vanished. Manu awaited the promised period, and embarked on the ship when the sea overflowed its shores. 15. (There appeared) a golden Fish, a million yojanas long, with one horn, to which Manu attached the ship, (16) and heard from the Fish the Matsya Purāṇa, which takes away sin, together with the Veda. Keśava then slew the Dānava Hayagrīva who had snatched away the Vedas, and preserved its mantras and other portions."

[68] Professor Aufrecht's transcript has this reading Manur-ukto; which I have retained, although I was not aware that Manus was commonly used for Manu, except in the Vedic period.

The following is Śrīdhara's comment, before referred to, on the legend of the deluge, as told in the Bhāgavata Purāṇa. These remarks have been well translated and explained in the preface to the 3rd volume of his edition of this Purāṇa (pp. xxxviii ff.) by M. Burnouf, whose elaborate discussion of the legend extends from p. xxiii to p. liv.

Atra idaṁ chintyaṁ "kim ayam mahāpralayo dainandino vā" iti | tatra tāvad "brāhmo layaḥ" (v. 7) iti "yo 'sāv asmin mahā-kalpe" (v. 11) iti cha ukter "mahāpralayaḥ" iti prāptaṁ "na" iti brūmaḥ | mahāpralaye pṛithivy-ādīnām avaśeshāsambhavād "yāvad brāhmī niśā" (v. 37) ity-ādy-ukti- virodhāch cha | ato "dainandana" iti yuktam | na cha etad api sangachhate | saṁvarttakair anāvṛishṭy-ādibhir vinā akasmād eva "saptame 'hani trailokyaṁ nimankshyati" (v. 32) iti matsyokter anupapatteḥ | yathoktam prathama-skandhe "rūpam" (i. 3, 15) ity ādi tad api tadā durghaṭam | na hi pralaya-dvaye 'pi "mahīmayyāṁ nāvy" ārohaḥ sambhavati na cha Chākshusha-manvantare pralayo 'sti | tathā cha sati saptamo Manur Vaivasvataḥ ity api durghaṭaṁ syāt | "tvaṁ tāvad oshadhīḥ sarvāḥ" (viii. 24, 34) ity-ādi-nirdeśo 'pi na sangachhate | na hi tadā oshadhy-ādīnāṁ sattvānāṁ cha avaśeshaḥ sambhavati | tasmād anyathā varṇyate | naivāyaṁ vāstavaḥ ko 'pi pralayaḥ | kintu Satyavrata-tasya jñānopadeśaya āvirbhūto bhagavān vairāgyārtham akasmāt pralayam iva darśayāmāsa yathā 'sminn eva Vaivasvata-manvantare Mārkaṇḍeyāya darśitavān | tad-apekshayā eva cha "mahā-kalpe 'sminn" iti viśeshaṇaṁ sangachhate | tathā cha "tataḥ samudraḥ udvelaḥ sarvataḥ samadṛiśyata" (v. 41) iti tasyaiva yathā darśanam uktam ity eshā dik |

"Here we have to consider whether this was a great dissolution of the universe, or one of those which occur at the close of each day of Brahmā. If it be supposed from the expressions 'a dissolution proceeding from Brahmā' (v. 7), and 'he is the same who in this Mahā-kalpa' (v. 11), that it was a great dissolution, we reply,—no; because in a great dissolution the earth and other worlds cannot possibly remain in existence, and because this would be opposed to the words 'so long as the night of Brahmā lasts' (v. 37). Hence it might appear that it must be one of the dissolutions which occur at the end of a day of Brahmā. But this also is impossible, because it would be at variance with the Fish's words that 'the three worlds should be submerged on the seventh day,' (v. 32) suddenly, without the drought and other calamities which precede a dissolution. What is stated in the first book (iii. 15), 'at the deluge, in the Chākshusha Manvantara, he took the form of a Fish, and preserved Manu Vaivasvata, whom he placed in a ship formed of the earth,'[69] would also in that case be inconceivable; for

[69] Bhāgavata Purāṇa, i. 3. 15. Rupaṁ sa jagṛihe mātsyaṁ Chākshushodadhi-samplave | nāvy āropya mahīmayyām apād Vaivasvatam Manum | On this passage also

(1.) in neither of the two dissolutions could any one be placed 'in a ship in the form of the earth' (as the earth is submerged in the one case and altogether destroyed in the other); (2.) there is no dissolution of the world in the Chākshusha Manvantara; (3.) in the case supposed the existence of a seventh Manu, the son of Vivasvat would be impossible (for the fourteen Manus succeed each other in one Kalpa without the intervention of any dissolution). And in that case, the command to take 'all the plants into the ship' (viii. 24, 34), would be inconceivable, since no plants or other such substances are left at such a period. Such being the fact, the narrative must be otherwise explained. It was in fact no real dissolution which is here related. But the deity, who appeared to teach Satyavrata knowledge, shewed him suddenly the semblance of a dissolution to instil into him dispassion, just as in the Vaivasvata Manvantara he shewed to Mārkandeya. And if referred to this, the words 'in this Māhakalpa' will be conceivable. And consequently the words 'Then the sea was beheld overflowing its shores on every side' are spoken with reference to what Satyavrata saw (in the vision). Such is an indication of the purport of the Section."

Śrīdhara Svāmin here reasons only upon the data supplied by the particular version of the story which he found before him in the Bhāgavata, and does not seem to have extended his researches so far as to ascertain whether the legend might not exhibit some variations as narrated in other Puranas. If he had turned to the Matsya Purāṇa he would have found that one of his objections, viz., that drawn from the absence of any reference to the calamities supposed to precede a dissolution, did not apply to the account there given; since that narrative expressly asserts that these premonitory signs were manifested. Others of his objections apply no doubt to the other narratives as well as to that in the Bhāgavata. According to the ordinary Puranic theory (see above, pp. 43 ff.) fourteen Manus exist in each Kalpa, and one succeeds another without the intervention of any pralaya or dissolution. It is obviously inconsistent with this theory to represent such a dissolution

Śrīdhara remarks: Yadyapi manvantarāvasāne pralayo nāsti tathāpi kenachit kautukena Satyavratāya māyā pradarśitā | yathā "akāṇḍe Mārkaṇḍeyāya" iti drashṭavyam | "Although there is no dissolution at the end of a Manvantara, yet, through a certain sport an illusion was shown to Satyavrata, as in the other passage where it is said 'Suddenly to Mārkaṇḍeya,' etc."

as taking place either during the life of any of the Manus, or after his disappearance. It is even doubtful, or more than doubtful (Wilson's Vish. P. i. p. 50 f. and p. 44, above) whether one Manu can exist contemporaneously with another, and yet, according to the Matsya and Agni Purāṇas (see above, pp. 205 ff., 211 f.) Manu Vaivasvata is said to have lived during his predecessor's period, although the Bhāgavata avoids this difficulty by making Satyavrata the hero of the story and by representing him as being born again as Manu Vaivasvata at the beginning of the next Manvantara. (M. Burnouf's Preface above referred to may be consulted for further remarks on this subject.) The authors of the Mahābhārata and the Purāṇas do not, however, appear to have been so sensitively alive to inconsistencies of this description as Śrīdhara. Perhaps the system of Kalpas and Manvantaras may not have been so clearly defined, or so generally current, when the older parts, at least of the Mahābhārata, were composed, as at a later period.[70] And even the Puranic writers may not have cared very much to preserve a strict congruity in all that they wrote. In fact they may have had no great faith in the authority of speculations so arbitrary and artificial as those relating to the great mundane periods to which I refer,—speculations which were derived from no higher source than previous writers of their own class. The case, however, was different with the Commentators, who lived at a later period, and who seem to have regarded the established doctrine regarding Kalpas and Manvantaras as an article of faith.

There is, however, no doubt that, for the reasons above assigned, this legend of a Flood, such as is described in the Mahābhārata and the Purāṇas, does not fit into the system of Kalpas and Manvantaras. But what is the inference which we ought to draw from this circumstance? M. Burnouf believes (1.) that the theory of great mundane periods and periodical dissolutions of the universe was received in India from very early times (Bhāg. P. iii. Pref. p. xliii.) and (2) that it was older than the legend of a deluge, as, although the latter may have been derived from ancient tradition, the style in which it is related in the Mahābhārata and the Purāṇas has nothing of the archaic colouring of the Itihāsas contained in the Brāhmaṇas, and it had not, so far as he knew, been found in any work of the class last named(p. xxvii.), and was not, he anticipated, likely to be discovered there (lii.). The conclusion which he deduces from these premises, and from the absence of any tradition of any great local inundation (pp. xlviii. and li.), is that, although, as related in the Mahābhārata and the Purāṇas, the legend of the deluge has received in some respects an Indian character (xxxi. ff.; xlv. ff.), it is not in its origin Indian, (li.), but was most probably imported into Hindustan from a Semitic source, whether Hebrew or Assyrian (lii.–liv.). The first of M. Burnouf's premises, regarding the great antiquity of the system of Kalpas, Manvantaras, and mundane dissolutions, is not borne out by the Vedic hymns, or anything that has yet been found in the Brāhmaṇas (see above, pp. 45 ff.). And his anticipation that no reference to a deluge would be discovered in any of the older Indian records has proved incorrect, as is shewn by the legend of Manu quoted above (p. 181 ff.) from the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa.

[70] The Svāyambhuva Manvantara is mentioned in the Śāntip. verse 12658, but no details are given (kṛite yuge mahārāja pura Svāyambhuve 'ntare).

Professor Weber, by whom attention was first drawn (in his Indische Studien, i. 160 ff.) to this passage, shows how materially it interferes with Burnouf's results. If there is no proof of the great antiquity of the cosmical theory which that great scholar supposes to be inconsistent with the early existence in India of any tradition of a deluge, whilst on the other hand there is distinct evidence that that tradition was actually current there at a much earlier period than he imagined, it is clear that his supposition of its having been introduced into that country from an exclusively Semitic source loses much of its probability.

The explanation by which Śrīdhara endeavours to maintain the consistency of the Puranic narratives and theories seems to be altogether unfounded. There is no appearance of the authors either of the Bhāgavata, or Matsya, or Agni Purāṇas having intended to represent the deluge as a mere vision. They evidently meant this narrative to be taken literally, just as much as anything else that they describe.

I shall now compare the versions of the legend given in the Mahābhārata and Purāṇas with each other, and with that quoted above from the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa.

I. The following are the peculiarities of the narrative in the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa:

(1.) It makes no reference to any great mundane periods, such as Kalpas or Manvantaras.

(2.) It does not speak of a dissolution of the world (pralaya), but of a flood (augha) which swept away all living creatures except Manu.

(3.) It does not fix the number of days or years after which the flood should come.

(4.) It speaks of Manu simply, without assigning to him any patronymic, such as Vaivasvata.[71]

(5.) It contains no allusion to the locality in which he was when the fish came to him.

(6.) It makes no mention of the fish being thrown into any river.

(7.) It is silent as to Manu being accompanied by any rishis when he embarked on the ship, and as to his taking any seeds along with him.

(8.) It speaks of the ship as having rested on the "Northern mountain," and of a place called "Manu's Descent."

(9.) It does not say anything of any deity being incarnate in the fish.

(10.) It represents Iḍā as produced from Manu's oblation, and as the mother of his offspring, begotten apparently in the natural way.

It is manifest from this abstract, when compared with what follows, that the flood described in the Brāhmaṇa is distinguishable in various respects from the dissolution, or pralaya, of the later works.

II. The legend as told in the Mahābhārata agrees with that of the Ś. P. Br. in some, and differs from it in other particulars:

(1.) It does not specify any Kalpa or Manvantara.

(2.) It speaks of a dissolution of the universe (pralaya), and of the time of its purification by water (samprakshālana-kālaḥ) having arrived.

(3.) It makes the fish declare that this event should take place speedily (achirāt), and alludes to no antecedent calamities.

[71] Manu Vaivasvata is however mentioned in Ś. P. Br. xiii. 4, 3, 3. "Manur Vaivasvato rājā" ity āha | tasya manushyā viśaḥ | "He says 'Manu Vaivasvata king.' Men are his subjects." Further on, xiii. 4, 3, 6, Yama Vaivasvata is spoken of as King of the Pitṛis. Compare R.V. x. 14, 1; 17, 1. In the Vālakhilya hymns attached to the R.V. iv. 1, Indra is mentioned as drinking Soma in the house of Manu Vivasvat (not Vaivasvata). In the Atharva-veda, viii. 10, 24, Manu Vaivasvata is spoken of as the calf of the cow Virāj (tasyā Manur Vaivasvato vatsaḥ). Yama is similarly spoken of in the preceding verse. In Vālakhilya, iii. 1, Indra is said to have drunk Soma in Manu Sāmvaraṇi's house. The connection of the words Sāvarṇya and Sāvarṇi with the word manu, "man," in R.V. x. 68, 8 f. and 11, no doubt gave rise to the idea of a Manu Sāvarṇi. See Wilson's Vishṇu P. 4to. ed. pp. 266 ff., and Roth's remark in Journal Germ. Or. Soc. vi. 245 f., and R.V. x. 17, 2.

(4.) It assigns to Manu the patronymic of Vaivasvata, but mentions no other Manu.

(5.) It represents the fish as coming to him when on the banks of the Chiriṇī river.

(6.) It describes the fish as thrown into the Ganges before it was taken to the sea.

(7.) It speaks of Manu as embarking on the ship with the seven rishis, and as taking with him all the seeds described by the Brāhmans.

(8.) It declares that the ship rested on the highest peak of the Himālaya, which was thence called Naubandhana.

(9.) It makes the fish reveal himself as Brahmā Prajāpati.

(10.) It describes Manu not as begetting offspring but as creating all sorts of living beings including MEN.

III. The Matsya Purāṇa agrees in some points, and differs in others from the above details.

(1.) It states that Manu, whom it styles the son of the Sun (Sahasrakiraṇātmaja, and Ravi-nandana), i.e. Manu Vaivasvata, practised austerity after making over his kingdom to his son (v. 12). One might have supposed that he could only have done this in his own Manvantara; but it is said further on (v. 34 f.) that he was informed by the fish that when the dissolution should come to an end, he should become a Prajāpati and lord of the Manvantara; and he receives a promise that he should be preserved during the dissolution (ii. 12), which, as appears from v. 15, was to take place at the end of the Chākshusha Manvantara. After this he was to create the world anew. We must therefore suppose the writer to have regarded Manu Vaivasvata as existing during the period of his predecessor, but as then occupying the inferior position of a king. This difficulty is, as I have already remarked, avoided in the Bhāgavata, which makes King Satyavrata the hero of the story.

(2) This Purāṇa speaks of a dissolution (pralaya) and yet (i. 15 ff.) represents Manu as asking and receiving from Brahmā as a boon that when that dissolution should arrive, he should be the preserver of all things stationary and moving.

(3.) It states that a hundred years and more would elapse before the dissolution, which was to be preceded by famine and various terrific phenomena.

(4.) It represents Manu as the son of the Sun. See under head (1.).

(5.) It mentions Malaya (Malabar) as the scene of Manu's austerity, and of the apparition of the fish.

(6.) It agrees with the Mahābhārata in describing the fish as thrown into the Ganges, though at so great a distance from Malabar.

(7.) It is silent as to the seven rishis embarking on the ship, but speaks of Manu taking with him all sorts of creatures (living apparently) as well as seeds (chap. ii. v. 11).

(8.) It does not bring the narrative to a conclusion (see above, p. 207), and thus has no opportunity of saying anything of the place where the ship rested.

(9.) It speaks of Janārdana (Vishṇu) as the god who was manifested in the Fish.

(10.) It refers to Manu as about to effect a creation (ii. 15), but also as preserving the existing animals and plants (ch. i. 15 ff., 31 f.; ii. 2, 19).

IV. According to the Bhāgavata Purāṇa:

(1.) The event described was an "occasional dissolution" (naimittiko layaḥ, see above, p. 45) at the end of a Kalpa (viii. 24, 7); and yet in contradiction with this it had previously been alluded to (i. 3, 15) as occurring at the close of the Chākshusha Manvantara.

(2.) See head (1.).

(3.) The dissolution was to take place after seven days (viii. 24, 32); and no premonitory calamities are referred to.

(4.) The hero of the story is Satyavrata, king of Draviḍa, who was born again in the present mahākalpa as the son of Vivasvat (vv. 10, 11, 58).

(5.) The scene of the incidents, with which the narrative begins, was the river Kṛitamālā, in the country of Draviḍa.

(6.) The fish is not thrown into any river after it had been once taken out of the Kṛitamālā, and had grown large.

(7.) Satyavrata is commanded to take with him into the ship the seven rishis, as well as plants, seeds, and all beings (sarva-sattvopavrīmhitaḥ).

(8.) Nothing is said of the place where the ship rested.

(9.) Vishṇu is the deity who took the form of a fish with the view of recovering the Vedas carried away by the Dānava Hayagrīva (vv. 9, 57).

(10.) No mention is made in this chapter of any creation effected by Manu; but in ix. i. an account is given of his descendants.

V. The narrative in the Agni Purāṇa agrees with that in the Bhāgavata, except in its much greater conciseness, and in making Manu Vaivasvata, and not Satyavrata, the hero of the story.

SECT. IV.—Legendary Accounts of the Origin of Castes among the Descendants of Manu and Atri, according to the Purāṇas.

We have already seen that it is distinctly affirmed in a passage quoted above (p. 126) from the Ādiparvan of the Mahābhārata, verses 3138 ff., that men of all classes, Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and Śūdras were descended from Manu, a statement which is clearly at variance with the notion of their having been separately created from different members of Brahmā. This tallies with the account of the origin of castes which is found in those parts of the Purāṇas which profess to record the history of the two royal races, the solar and the lunar, which are said to have sprung from Manu Vaivasvata and Atri.

The Vishṇu Purāṇa (which is here written in prose) makes the following statement regarding Manu's descendants:

iv. 1. 4. Sakala-jagatām anādir ādibhūtaḥ ṛig-yajuḥ-sāmādimaya-bhagavad-Vishṇumayasya Brahmaṇo mūrttirūpam Hiraṇyagarbho brahmāṇḍato bhagavān Brahmā prāg babhūva | Brahmaṇaś cha dakshiṇāṅgushṭhajanmā Dakshaḥ prajāpatiḥ | Dakshasyāpy Aditiḥ | Aditer Vivasvān | Vivasvato Manuḥ | Manor Ikshvāku-Nṛiga-Dhṛishṭa-Śaryāti-Narishyanta-Prāṁśu-Nābhāganedishṭa-Kārūsha-Pṛishadhrākhyāḥ putrāḥ babhūvuḥ | 6. Ishṭiṁ cha Mitrā-Varuṇayor Manuḥ putra-kāmaś chakāra | 7. Tatrāpahute hotur apachārād Ilā nāma kanyā babhūva | 8. Saiva Mitra-Varuṇa-prasādāt Sudyumno nāma Manoḥ putro Maitreyāsīt | punaś cha Īsvara-kopāt strī satī Soma-sūnor Budhasya āśrama-samīpe babhrāma | 9. Sānurāgaś cha tasyām Budhaḥ Purūravasam ātmajam utpādayāmāsa | 10. Jāte cha tasminn amita-tejobhiḥ paramarshibhir ishṭimayaḥ ṛiṅmayo yajurmayaḥ sāmamayo 'tharvamayaḥ sarvamayo manomayo jñānamayo 'kinchinmayo bhagavān yajna-purusha-svarūpī Sudyumnasya puṁstvam abhilashadbhir yathāvad ishṭaḥ | tatprasādād Ilā punar api Sudyumno 'bhavat |

"Before the mundane egg existed the divine Brahmā Hiraṇyagarbha, the eternal originator of all worlds, who was the form and essence of Brahmă, who consists of the divine Vishṇu, who again is identical with the Ṛik, Yajush, Sāman and Atharva-Vedas. From Brahmā's right thumb[72] was born the Prajāpati Daksha; Daksha had a daughter Aditi; from her was born Vivasvat; and from him sprang Manu. Manu had sons called Ikshvāku, Nṛiga, Dhṛishṭa, Śaryāti, Narishyanta, Prāṁśu, Nābhāganedishṭa, Karūsha, and Pṛishadhra.[73] Desirous of a son, Manu sacrificed to Mitra and Varuṇa; but in consequence of a wrong invocation through an irregularity of the hotṛi-priest, a daughter called Ilā was born. Then through the favour of Mitra and Varuṇa she became to Manu a son called Sudyumna. But being again changed into a female through the wrath of Īśvara (Mahādeva) she wandered near the hermitage of Budha the son of Soma (the Moon); who becoming enamoured of her had by her a son called Purūravas. After his birth, the god who is formed of sacrifice, of the Rik, Yajush, Sāman, and Atharva Vedas, of all things, of mind, of nothing,[74] he who is in the form of the sacrificial Male, was worshipped by the rishis of infinite splendour who desired that Sudyumna should recover his manhood. Through the favour of this god Ilā became again Sudyumna."

Regarding the different sons of Manu the Purāṇas supply the following particulars:

(1.) Prishadhra.—The Vishṇu Purāṇa says:

Pṛishadhras tu guru-go-badhāch chhūdratvam āgamat |

"Pṛishadhra became a Śūdra in consequence of his having killed his religious preceptor's cow."

On the same subject the Harivaṁśa tells us, verse 659:

Pṛishadhro hiṁsayitvā tu guror gām Janamejaya | śāpāch chhūdratvam āpannaḥ |

"Pṛishadhra having killed his Guru's cow, became a Śūdra in consequence of his curse."

This story is variously amplified in the Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa, section cxii., and in the Bhāgavata Purāṇa ix. 2, 3–14. See Professor Wilson's note, Vishṇu Purāṇa, 4to. edit. p. 351, where the author remarks that [72] See above, p. 72 f.

[73] Compare with this the list of Manu's sons given in the passage from the M. Bh. Ādip. quoted above, p. 126. Nābhānedishṭa (not Nābhāganedishṭa) is mentioned in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, and Taittirīya Saṁhitā (see above, p. 191), and Śaryāta in the Śat. P. Br. iv. 1, 5, 1. See Journ. Roy. As. Soc. for 1866, p. 11 ff. The Mārk. P. cxi. 3 ff., and the Bhāg. P. ix. 1, 11 ff. treat also of Manu's sons and of the birth of Ilā. See Wilson's Vishṇu P. 4to. ed. pp. 348–58, and Burnouf's Bhāg. P. vol. iii. pref. lxx. ff.

[74] Akinchinmayaḥ, "not consisting of anything."

"the obvious purport of this legend, and of some that follow, is to account for the origin of the different castes from one common ancestor."

(2.) Karūsha.—The Vishṇu Purāṇa says, iv. 1, 13:

Karūshāt Kārūshā mahābalāḥ Kshattriyā babhūvuḥ |

"From Kārūsha the Kārūshas, Kshattriyas of great power, were descended."

The Bhāgavata Purāṇa, ix. 2, says:

Kārūshād Mānavād āsan Kārūshāḥ Kshaṭṭra-jātayaḥ | uttarāpatha-goptāro brahmaṇyā dharma-vatsalāḥ |

"From Karūsha, son of Manu, came the Kārūshas of the Kshattriya caste, protectors of the northern region, devout, and lovers of duty."

(3.) Nābhāga.—The Vishṇu Purāṇa says:

Nābhāgo Nedishṭa-putras tu vaiśyatām agamat |

"Nābhāga, the son of Nedishṭa, became a Vaiśya."

The Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa says he was the son of Dishṭa, and relates how he became a Vaiśya, by marrying the daughter of a man of that class (section cxiii. and Wilson, p. 352, note). The Bhāgavata Purāṇa, ix. 2, 23, says he became a Vaiśya in consequence of his works (Nābhāgo Dishṭa-putro 'nyaḥ karmabhir vaiśyatām gataḥ). And yet a long list of his descendants is given, and among them occurs Marutta who was a Chakravarttin, or universal monarch (Vishṇu P. iv. 1. 15–17; Bhāg. P. ix. 2, 23–28; Mārk. P. cxxviii.–cxxxii.). He had a grandson called Dama, of whom the Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa relates that at a Svayamvara he was chosen by the daughter of the King of Daśārṇa for her husband (cxxxiv. 8), and that when the bride had been seized by three of his rejected rivals (verse 16) she was rescued by him after he had slain one of them and vanquished another (verse 53); that subsequently that same vanquished rival in revenge killed Dama's father, who had retired into the wilderness as an ascetic (cxxxv. 18). The Purāṇa in one of its recensions ends with the following curious particulars:

Tataś chakāra tātasya raktenaivodaka-kriyām | ānṛiṇyam prāpya sa pituḥ punaḥ prāyāt sva-mandiram | Vapushmataś cha māṁsena piṇḍa-dānaṁ chakāra ha | brāhmaṇān bhojāyāmāsa rakshaḥ-kula-samudbhavān | evaṁvidhā hi rājāno babhūvuḥ sūrya-vaṁśa-jāḥ | anye 'pi sudhiyaḥ śūrā yajvānaḥ śāstra-kovidāḥ | vedāntam paṭhamānāṁs tān na sankhyātum ihotsahe |

"Dama then (after tearing out the heart of Vapushmat) performed with blood the rites to the manes of his father; and having thus discharged his debt to his parent, he returned home. With the flesh of Vapushmat he formed the oblation which he offered, and fed the Brāhmans who were of Rākshasa descent. Of such character were the kings of the Solar race. There were also others who were wise, brave, priests, and skilled in the scriptures. I am unable here to enumerate those of them who studied the Vedānta." [75]

The Harivaṁśa (section xi. verse 658) tells us that "two sons of Nābhāgārishṭa, who were Vaiśyas, became Brāhmans" (Nābhāgārishṭaputrau dvau vaiśyau brāhmaṇatāṁ gatau).

(4.) Dhṛishṭa.—Of him the Vishṇu Purāṇa relates, iv. 2, 2:

Dhṛishṭasyāpi Dhārshṭakam Kshattraṁ samabhavat |

"From Dhṛishṭa sprang the Dhārshṭaka Kshattriyas."

The Bhāgavata Purāṇa says, ix. 2, 17:

Dhṛishṭād Dhārshṭam abhūt Kshattram brahma-bhūyam gatam kshitau |

"From Dṛishṭa were descended the Dhārshṭa Kshattriyas, who obtained Brāhmanhood [76] on earth."

(5.) The last-named Purāṇa enumerates in verses 19 ff. of the same section the descendants of Narishyanta, among whom was Agniveśya, verse 21:

Tato 'gniveśyo bhagavān Agniḥ svayam abhūt sutaḥ | Kānīna iti vikhyāto Jātūkarṇyo mahān ṛishiḥ | tato brahma-kulaṁ jātam Āgniveśyāyanaṁ nṛipa | Narishyantānvayaḥ proktaḥ |

"From him (Devadatta) sprang a son Agniveśya, who was the lord Agni himself, and who was also called Kānīna and Jātūkarṇya the great rishi. From him was descended the Agniveśyāyana race of Brāhmans. The offspring of Narishyanta has been declared." That of Dishṭa is next taken up.

[75] This quotation, which will be partly found in Prof. Wilson's note 22, p. 353, is taken from the section given separately by Prof. Banerjea at the end of his edition of this Purāṇa from a Maithila MS. which differs from that followed in his text (see his Preface, p. 30). In verses 6 f. of section cxxxvi. however, of Prof. Banerjea's text, Dama threatens to do something of the same sort as in the other recension he is described to have actually done: 6. Yad aham tasya raktena dehotthena Vapushmataḥ | na karomi guros tṛiptiṁ tat pravekshye hutāśanam | 7. Tachchhoṇitenodaka-karma tasya tātasya saṅkhye vinipātitasya | māṁsena samyag dvija-bhojanaṁ cha na chet pravekshyāmi hutāśanaṁ tat | "6. If I do not satiate my father with the blood from Vapushmat's body, then I shall enter the fire. 7. If I do not celebrate with his blood the obsequial rites of my father prostrated in the fray, and feed the Brāhmans with (his) flesh, I shall enter the fire."

[76] The Commentator explains brahma-bhūyam by brāhmaṇatvam, "the state of Brāhmans."

Some of the names of Manu's sons are repeated in the subsequent narrative. Thus we find a second Prānśu named among the descendants of Nābhāga (Wilson, 352). And in the Vishṇu Purāṇa, iv. 2, 2, a second Nābhāga is mentioned as follows:

Nābhāgasyātmajo Nābhāgas tasya Ambarīshaḥ | Ambarīshasyāpi Virūpo 'bhavat Virūpāt Pṛishadaśvo jajne tataś cha Rathītaraḥ | tatrāyaṁ ślokaḥ | "ete kshattra-prasūtā vai punaś chāṅgirasaḥ smṛitāḥ | Rathītarāṇām pravarāḥ kshattropetā dvijātayaḥ" |

"The son of Nābhāga was Nābhāga; his son was Ambarīsha. From him sprang Virūpa; from him Pṛishadaśva; and from him Rathītara; regarding whom this verse is current: 'These persons sprung from a Kshattriya, and afterwards called Angirases, were the chief of the Rathītaras, twice-born men (Brāhmans) of Kshattriya race." [77]

The Bhāgavata thus explains the circumstance, ix. 6, 2:

Rathītarasyāprajasya bhāryāyāṁ tantave 'rthitaḥ | Angirā janayāmāsa brahmavarchasinaḥ sutān | ete kshetre prasūtā vai punas tv Āṅgirasāḥ smṛitāḥ | Rathītarāṇām pravarāḥ kshattropetā dvijātayaḥ |

"Angiras being solicited for progeny, begot sons possessing Brahmanical glory on the wife of Rathītara who was childless. These persons being born of a (Kshattriya's) wife, but afterwards called descendants of Angiras, were the chief of the Rathītaras, twice-born men (Brāhmans) of Kshattriya lineage."

It will be observed that in this last verse the Bhāgavata reads kshettre prasūtāḥ "born of the wife (of a Kshattriya)," instead of kshattra-prasūtāḥ, "sprung from a Kshattriya," and thus brings this verse into a closer conformity with the one preceding it. Professor Wilson (p. 359, note) considers that the form given to the legend in the Bhāgavata "is an afterthought, not warranted by the memorial verse cited in our text." It is difficult to determine whether or not this may be the case without knowing which of the two readings in that verse is the original one.

(6.) The Vishṇu Purāṇa next proceeds to enumerate the descendants of Ikshvāku son of Manu. The representative of his line in the twenty-first generation was Harita, of whom it is said, iv. 3, 5:

[77] See Prof. Wilson's note in p. 359 on this passage.

Ambarīshasya Māndhātus tanayasya Yuvanāśvaḥ putro 'bhūt | tasmād Harito yato 'ngiraso Hāritāḥ |

"The son of Ambarīsha[78] son of Māndhātṛi was Yuvanāśva. From him sprang Harita, from whom the Hārita Angirases were descended."

These words are thus paraphrased by the Commentator: "from him sprang the Hārita Angirases, Brāhmans, chief of the family of Harita" (tasmād Hāritā Angiraso dvijāḥ Harita-gotra-pravarāḥ).

The Linga Purāṇa, quoted by Prof. Wilson, states the same thing:

Harito Yuvanāśvasya Hāritā yata ātmajāḥ | ete hy Angirasaḥ pakshe kshattropetā dvijātayaḥ |

"The son of Yuvanāśva was Harita, of whom the Hāritas were sons. They were on the side of Angiras, twice-born men (Brāhmans) of Kshattriya lineage."

And the Vāyu Purāṇa tells us with some variation:

Harito Yuvanāśvasya Hārītā bhūrayaḥ smṛitāḥ | ete hy Angirasaḥ putrāḥ kshattropetā dvijātayaḥ |

"Harita was the son of Yuvanāśva: (after whom) many persons were called Hārītas. These were the sons of Angiras, twice-born men (Brāhmans) of Kshattriya race."

This may mean that they were begotten by Angiras, as is said by the Bhāgavata (see above) to have been the case with Rathītara's sons. In that case, however, as Nābhāga and Ikshvāku were brothers and Rathītara was only the fifth in descent from Nābhāga, whilst Harita was the twenty-first after Ikshvāku,—Angiras (if we suppose one and the same person be meant in both cases) must have lived for sixteen generations!

Such are the remarkable notices given in the Purāṇas of the rise of different castes among the descendants of some of the sons of Manu Vaivasvata the legendary head of the solar line of kings. I shall now add some similar particulars connected with the lunar dynasty.

According to the Vishṇu Purāṇa (iv. 6, 2 ff.) Atri was the son of Brahmā, and the father of Soma (the moon), whom Brahmā installed as the sovereign of plants, Brāhmans and stars[79] (aśeshaushadhi-dvija-nakshtrāṇām ādhipatye 'bhyasechayat). After celebrating the rājasūya sacrifice, Soma became intoxicated with pride, and carried off Tārā [78] We have already had a person of this name the son of Nābhāga. See above.

[79] See Journ. Roy. As. Soc. for 1865, p. 135 ff.

(Star), the wife of Bṛihaspati the preceptor of the gods, whom, although admonished and entreated by Brahmā, the gods, and rishis, he refused to restore. Soma's part was taken by Uśanas; and Rudra, who had studied under Angiras, aided Bṛihaspati (Angirasaścha sakāśopalabdhavidyo bhagavān Rudro Bṛihaspateḥ sāhāyyam akarot).[80] A fierce conflict ensued between the two sides, supported respectively by the gods and the Daityas, etc. Brahmā interposed, and compelled Soma to restore Tāra to her husband. She had, however, in the mean time become pregnant, and bore a son Budha (the planet Mercury), of whom, when strongly urged, she acknowledged Soma to be the father. Purūravas, as has been already mentioned, was the son of this Budha by Ilā, the daughter of Manu. The loves of Purūravas and the Apsaras Urvaśī are related in the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, xi. 5, 1, 1;[81] in the Vishṇu Purāṇa, iv. 6, 19 ff.; in the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, ix. 14;[82] and in the Harivaṁśa, section 26. The Mahābhārata, Ādip. sect. 75, alludes to Purūravas as having been engaged in a contest with the Brāhmans. This passage will be quoted hereafter. According to the Vishṇu Puraṇa, iv. 7, 1, Purūravas had six sons, of whom the eldest was Āyus. Āyus had five sons: Nahusha, Kshattravṛiddha, Rambha, Raji, and Anenas. The narrative proceeds (iv. 8, 1):

Kshattravṛiddhāt Sunahotraḥ[83] putro 'bhavat | Kāśa-Leśa-Gṛitsamadās trayo 'syābhavan | Gṛitsamadasya Śaunakaś chāturvarṇya-pravarttayitā 'bhūt | Kāśasya Kāśirājas tato Dīrghatamāḥ putro 'bhavat | Dhanvantaris Dīrghatamaso 'bhūt |

"Kshattravṛiddha had a son Sunahotra, who had three sons, Kāśa, Leśa, and Gṛitsamada. From the last sprang Śaunaka, who originated the system of four castes.[84] Kāśa had a son Kāśirāja, of whom again Dīrghatamas was the son, as Dhanvantari was of Dīrghatamas."

[80] This is the only mention I have ever happened to encounter of the great Mahādeva having been at school!

[81] This passage is translated by Professor Müller in the Oxford Essays for 1856, pp. 62 f.; and the legend has been formed on the basis of the obscure hymn in the R.V. x. 95, in which the two names of Purūravas and Urvaśī occur as those of the interlocutors in a dialogue.

[82] A short quotation has been already made from this narrative. See above, p. 158.

[83] Both my MSS. read Sunahotra. Professor Wilson has Suhotra.

[84] The Commentator explains the words chāturvarṇya-pravarttayitā by saying that the four castes were produced among his descendants (tad-vaṁśe chatvāro varṇā abhavan). This explanation agrees with the statement of the Vāyu Purāṇa given in the text.

The Vayu Puraṇa, as quoted by Professor Wilson (V. P. 4to. ed. p. 406), expresses the matter differently, thus:

Putro Gṛitsamadasya cha Śunako yasya Saunakaḥ | brāhmaṇāḥ kshattriyāś chaiva vaiśyāḥ śūdrās tathaiva cha | etasya vaṁśe samudbhūtā vichitraiḥ karmabhir dvijāḥ |

"The son of Gṛitsamada was Śunaka, from whom sprang Śaunaka. In his family were born Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and Śūdras, twice-born men with various functions." [85]

In like manner the Harivaṁśa states in section 29, verse 1520:

Putro Gṛitsamadasyāpi Śunako yasya Saunakāḥ | brāhmaṇāḥ kshattriyāś chaiva vaiśyāḥ śūdrās tathaiva cha |

"The son of Gṛitsamada was Śunaka, from whom sprang the Śaunakas, Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and Śūdras."

Something similar is said of Gṛitsamati (who was the son of a Suhotra, although not the grandson of Kshattravṛiddha) in a following section, the 32nd of the same work, verse 1732:

Sa chāpi Vitathaḥ putrān janayāmāsa pancha vai | Suhotraṁ cha Suhotāram Gayaṁ Gargaṁ tathaiva cha | Kapilaṁ cha mahātmānam Suhotrasya suta-dvayam | Kāśakaś cha mahāsattvas tathā Gṛitsamatir nripaḥ | tathā Gṛitsamateḥ putrā brāhmaṇāḥ kshattriyāḥ viśaḥ |

"Vitatha was the father of five sons, Suhotra, Suhotṛi, Gaya, Garga, and the great Kapila. Suhotra had two sons, the exalted Kāśaka, and King Gṛitsamati. The sons of the latter were Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, and Vaiśyas."

The Bhagavata Puraṇa, ix. 17, 2 f., has the following notice of Kshattravṛiddha's descendants:

Kshattravṛiddha-sutasyāsan Suhotrasyāmajās trayaḥ | Kāśyaḥ Kuśo Gṛitsamadaḥ iti Gṛitsamadād abhūt | Śunako Śaunako yasya bahvṛichaḥ pravaro muniḥ |

"Suhotra, son of Kshattravṛiddha, had three sons, Kāśya, Kuśa, and Gṛitsamada. From the last sprang Śunaka, and from him Śaunaka, the eminent Muni, versed in the Rig-veda."

[85] On this Professor Wilson remarks, note, p. 406: "The existence of but one caste in the age of purity, however incompatible with the legend which ascribes the origin of the four tribes to Brahmā, is everywhere admitted. Their separation is assigned to different individuals, whether accurately to any one may be doubted; but the notion indicates that the distinction was of a social or political character."

It is to be observed that this Gṛitsamada, who is here described as belonging to the regal lineage of Purūravas, is the reputed rishi of many hymns in the second Maṇḍala of the Rig-veda. Regarding him the Commentator Sāyaṇa has the following remarks in his introduction to that Maṇḍala:

Maṇḍala-drashṭā Gṛitsamadaḥ ṛishiḥ | sa cha pūrvam Āṅgirasa-kule Śunahotrasya putraḥ san yajna-kāle 'surair gṛihītaḥ Indreṇa mochitaḥ | paśchāt tad-vachanenaiva Bhṛigu-kule Śunaka-putro Gṛitsamada-nāmā 'bhūt | tathā chānukramaṇikā "Yaḥ Āṅgirasaḥ Śaunahotro bhūtvā Bhārgavaḥ Śaunako 'bhavat sa Gṛitsamado dvitīyam maṇḍalam apaśyad" iti | tathā tasyaiva Śaunakasya vachanam ṛishy-anukramaṇe "tvam Agne" iti | "Gṛitsamadaḥ Śaunako Bhṛigutāṁ gataḥ | Śaunohotro prakṛityā tu yaḥ Āṅgirasa uchyate" iti | tasmād maṇḍala-drashṭā Śaunako Gṛitsamadaḥ ṛishiḥ |

"The seer (i.e. he who received the revelation) of this Maṇḍala was the rishi Gṛitsamada. He, being formerly the son of Śunahotra in the family of the Āṅgirasas, was seized by the Asuras at the time of sacrifice and rescued by Indra. Afterwards, by the command of that god, he became the person named Gṛitsamada, son of Śunaka, in the family of Bhṛigu. Thus the Anukramaṇikā (Index to the Rig-veda) says of him: 'That Gṛitsamada, who, having been an Āṅgirasa, and son of Śunahotra, became a Bhārgava and son of Śunaka, saw the second Maṇḍala.' So, too, the same Śaunaka says in his Ṛishi-anukramaṇa regarding the Maṇḍala beginning with 'Thou, o Agni':—'Gṛitsamada son of Śunaka who is declared to have been naturally an Āṅgirasa, and the son of Śunahotra, became a Bhṛigu.' Hence the seer of the Maṇḍala is the rishi Gṛitsamada son of Śunaka."

It will be noticed that (unless we are to suppose a different Gṛitsamada to be intended in each case) there is a discrepancy between the Puraṇas on the one hand, and Sāyaṇa and the Anukramaṇikā on the other; as the Purāṇas make Gṛitsamada the son of Śunahotra or Suhotra, and the father of Śunaka; whilst the Anukramaṇikā, followed by Sāyaṇa, represents the same personage as having been, indeed, originally the son of Śunahotra of the race of Angiras, but as having afterwards become, by what process does not appear, the son of Śunaka of the race of Bhṛigu.

In his translation of the Rig-veda (ii. 207 f.) Professor Wilson refers to a legend about King Vītahavya in the Anuśāsana-parvan of the Mahābhārata (verses 1944–2006) which gives a different account of Gṛitsamada's parentage. It begins: Śṛiṇu rājān yathā rājā Vītahavyo mahāyaśāḥ | rājarshir durlabham prāpto brāhmaṇyaṁ loka-satkṛitam | "Hear, o king, how the renowned Vītahavya, the royal rishi, attained the condition of Brāhmanhood venerated by mankind, and so difficult to be acquired." It happened that Divodāsa, King of Kāśī (Benares) was attacked by the sons of Vītahavya, and all his family slain by them in battle. The afflicted monarch thereupon resorted to the sage Bhărădvāja, who performed for him a sacrifice in consequence of which a son named Pratardana was born to him. Pratardana, becoming an accomplished warrior, was sent by his father to take vengeance on the Vītahavyas. They rained upon him showers of arrows and other missiles, "as clouds pour down upon the Himālaya"[86] (abhyavarshanta rājānam himavantam ivāmbudāḥ); but he destroyed them all, and "they lay with their bodies besmeared with blood, like kinsuka-trees[87] cut down" (apatan rudhirārdrāngā nikṛittā iva kiṁśukāḥ). Vītahavya himself had now to fly to another sage, Bhṛigu, who promised him protection. The avenger Pratardana, however, followed and demanded that the refugee should be delivered up:

Asyedānīm badhād adya bhavishyāmy anriṇaḥ pituḥ | tam uvācha kṛipāvishṭo Bhṛigur dharma-bhṛitāṁ varaḥ | "nehāsti kshattriyaḥ kaśchit sarve hīme dvijātayaḥ" | etat tu vachanaṁ śrutvā Bhṛigos tathyam Pratardanaḥ | pādāv upaspṛiśya śanaiḥ prahṛishṭo vākyam abravīt | evam apy asmi bhagavan kṛitakṛityo na saṁśayaḥ | . . . . . tyājito hi mayā jātim esha rājā Bhṛigūdvaha | tatas tenābhyanujnāto yayau rājā Pratardanaḥ | yathā-gatam mahārāja muktvā visham ivoragaḥ | Bhṛigor vachana-mātreṇa sa cha brahmarshitāṁ gataḥ | Vītahavyo mahārāja brahmavāditvam eva cha | tasya Gṛitsamadaḥ putro rūpeṇendra ivāparaḥ | "Śakras tvam" iti yo daityair nigṛihītaḥ kilābhavat | ṛigvede varttate chāgryā śrutir yasya mahātmanaḥ | yatra Gṛitsamado "brahman" brāhmaṇaiḥ sa mahīyate | sa brahmachārī viprarshiḥ śrīmān Gṛitsamado 'bhavat |

"Pratardana says: 'By the slaughter of this (Vītahavya) I shall [86] This simile seems to indicate a familiarity with the manner in which the clouds collect, and discharge their contents on the outer range of the Himālaya.

[87] The Kinśuka is a tree bearing a red blossom (Butea frondosa).

now, to-day, be acquitted of my debt to my father.' Bhṛigu, the most eminent of religious men, filled with compassion, answered: 'There is no Kshattriya here: all these are Brāhmans.' Hearing this true assertion of Bhṛigu, Pratardana was glad, and gently touching the sage's feet, rejoined: 'Even thus, o glorious saint, I have gained my object . . . . for I have compelled this King (i.e. Rājanya) to relinquish his caste.' King Pratardana then, after receiving the sage's salutations, departed, as he came, like a serpent which has discharged its poison: while Vītahavya by the mere word of Bhṛigu became a Brāhman-rishi, and an utterer of the Veda. Gṛitsamada, in form like a second Indra, was his son; he was seized by the Daityas, who said to him, 'Thou art Sakra' (Indra). In the Rig-veda the texts (śruti) of this great rishi stand first.[88] There Gṛitsamada is honoured by the Brāhmans (with the title of) 'Brāhmaṇ.' This illustrious personage was a Brahmachārin, and a Brāhman-rishi."

According to the enumeration of Gṛitsamada's family, which follows here, Sunaka was his descendant in the twelfth generation, and Saunaka in the thirteenth. The story concludes with these words:

Evaṁ vipratvam agamad Vītahavyo narādhipaḥ | Bhṛigoḥ prasādād rājendra kshattriyaḥ kshattriyarshabha |

"Thus did King Vītahavya, a Kshattriya, enter into the condition of Brāhmanhood by the favour of Bhṛigu."

In the next chapter we shall again notice Vītahavya among the Kshattriyas who are declared by tradition to have been the authors of Vedic hymns.

King Divodāsa was the sixth in descent from Kāśa brother of Gṛitsamada. Of him the Harivaṁśa states, section 32, verse 789 f.:

Divodāsasya dāyādo brahmarshir Mitrāyur nṛipaḥ | Maitrāyaṇas tataḥ Somo Maitreyās tu tataḥ smṛitāḥ | ete vai saṁśritāḥ paksham kshattropetās tu Bhārgavāḥ |

"The son of Divodāsa was the King Mitrāyu a Brāhman-rishi. From him sprang Soma Maitrāyaṇa, from whom the Maitreyas received their name. They, being of Kshattriya lineage, adhered as Bhārgavas to the side (of the latter)."

[88] If I have correctly interpreted this verse, and if by "first" we are to understand first in order, it does not accurately represent the state of the case: as the hymns of Gṛitsamada only appear in the second Maṇḍala.

The twentieth in descent from the same Kāśa, brother of Gṛitsamada, was Bhārgabhūmi, of whom the Vishṇu Purāṇa says, iv. 8, 9:

Bhārgasya Bhārgabhūmiḥ | tataś chāturvarṇya-pravṛittiḥ | ity ete Kāśayo bhūpatayaḥ kathitāḥ |

"The son of Bhārga was Bhārgabhūmi, from whom the four castes originated. Thus have the kings called Kāśis been declared."

In two passages of the Harivaṁśa, names identical, or nearly so, are found, but with a different progenitor in each case, in reference to which a similar statement is made. The first is in section 29, verse 1596:

Veṇuhotra-sutaś chāpi Bhargo nāma prajeśvaraḥ | Vatsasya Vatsabhūmis tu Bhṛigubhūmis tu Bhārgavāt | ete hy Angirasaḥ putrā jātā vaṁśe 'tha Bhārgave | brāhmaṇāḥ kshattriyā vaiśyās trayaḥ putrāḥ[89] sahasraśaḥ |

"The son of Veṇuhotra was King Bharga. From Vatsa sprang Vatsabhūmi, and Bhṛigubhūmi from Bhārgava. These descendants of Angiras were then born in the family of Bhṛigu, Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, and Vaiśyas three (classes of) descendants in thousands."

The second passage is in the 32nd section, verse 1752:

Sukumārasya putras tu Satyaketur mahārathaḥ | suto 'bhavad mahātejā rājā parama-dhārmikaḥ | Vatsasya Vatsabhūmis tu Bhārgabhūmis tu Bhārgavāt | ete hy Angirasaḥ putrā jātā vaṁśe 'tha Bhārgave | brāhmaṇāḥ kshattriyā vaiśyāḥ śūdrāś cha Bharatarshabha |

"The warrior Satyaketu was the son of Sukumāra, and a prince of great lustre and virtue. From Vatsa sprang Vatsabhūmi, and Bhārgabhūmi from Bhārgava. These descendants of Angiras were then born in the family of Bhṛigu, Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas and Śūdras."

The parallel passage in the Vāyu Purāṇa, as quoted by Professor Wilson, p. 409, has names which are mostly different:

Veṇuhotra-sutaś chāpi Gārgyo vai nāma viśrutaḥ | Gārgyasya Gārgabhūmis tu Vatso Vatsasya dhīmataḥ | brāhmaṇāḥ kshattriyāś chaiva tayoḥ putrāḥ sudhārmikāḥ |

"The son of Veṇuhotra was the renowned Gārgya. Gargabhūmi was the son of Gārgya; and Vatsa of the wise Vatsa. Brāhmans and Kshattriyas were the virtuous sons of these two."[90]

[89] Professor Wilson, p. 410, note, gives tejoyuktāḥ, "glorious," instead of trayaḥ putrāḥ, as the reading either of the Brāhma Purāṇa, or of the Harivaṁśa, or both.

[90] In regard to these passages the reader may consult the remarks of Professor

Another son of Āyus (son of Purūravas) was Rambha, of whom the Bhāgavata Purāṇa says, ix. 17, 10:

Rambhasya Rabhasaḥ putro Gabhīraś chākriyas tataḥ | tasya kshettre brahma jajne śṛiṇu vaṁśam Anenasaḥ |

"The son of Rambha was Rabhasa, from whom sprang Gabhīra and Akriya. From his wife Brāhmans were born: here now the race of Anenas" (another son of Āyus).

Of the same Rambha the Vishṇu Purāṇa says (iv. 9, 8), Rambhas tv anapatyo 'bhavat | "Rambha was childless."

Another son of Āyus, as we have seen, Vishṇu Purāṇa, iv. 8, 1, was Nahusha. He had six sons (V. P. iv. 10, 1), of whom one was Yayāti. The sons of the latter were Yadu, Turvasu, Druhyu, Anu, and Pūru (Ibid. iv. 10, 2).[91] One of these five, Anu, had, as we are told, in the twelfth generation a son called Bali, of whom the Vishṇu Purāṇa, iv. 18, 1, relates:

Hemāt Sutapās tasmād Balir yasya kshettre Dīrghatamasā Anga-Banga-Kalinga-Suhma-Puṇḍrākhyam Bāleyaṁ kshattram ajanyata |

"From Hema sprang Sutapas; and from him Bali, on whose wife[92] Bāleya Kshattriyas (i.e. Kshattriyas of the race of Bali), called Anga, Banga, Kalinga, Suhma, and Puṇḍra were begotten by Dīrghatamas."

Professor Wilson (p. 445, note 12) quotes from the Vāyu Purāṇa a statement regarding the same person that he had "sons who founded the four castes" (putrān chāturvarṇya-karān); and refers to a passage in the Matsya Purāṇa, in which Bali is said to have obtained from

Wilson, p. 409, note 16, where a commentator (on the Brāhma Purāṇa, or the Harivaṁśa) is quoted, who says that in the passage from these works "another son of Vatsa the father of Alarka is specified, viz., Vatsabhūmi; while Bhārgava is the brother of Vatsa; and that (the persons referred to were) Angirases because Gālava belonged to that family, and (were born in the family) of Bhṛigu, because Viśvāmitra belonged to it" (Vatsasya Alarka-pituḥ putrāntaram āha "Vatsabhūmir" iti | "Bhārgavād" Vatsa-bhrātuḥ | "Angiraso" Gālavasya Angirasatvāt | "Bhārgave" Viśvāmitrasya Bhārgavatvāt). The Vishṇu Purana, iv. 8, 6, says that Vatsa was one of the names of Pratardana, son of Divodāsa, a descendant of Kāśa, and a remote ancestor of Bhārgabhūmi. See however Professor Wilson's note 13, p. 408. It is possible that the resemblance of the word Bhārga to Bhārgava may have occasioned the descendants of the former to be connected with the family of Bhṛigu.

[91] These five names occur together in the plural in a verse of the Rig-veda, i. 109, quoted above, p. 179.

[92] Kshettre bhāryāyāṁ jātatvād Bāleyāḥ | "They were called descendants of Bali because they were born of his wife."

Brahmā the boon that he should "establish the four fixed castes" (chaturo niyatān varṇāṁs tvaṁ sthāpayeti).

The Harivaṁśa gives the following account of Bali, in the course of which the same thing is stated; section 31, verses 1682 ff.:

Phenāt tu Sutapā jajne sutaḥ Sutapaso Baliḥ | jāto mānusha-yonau tu sa rājā kānchaneshudhiḥ | mahāyogī sa tu Balir babhūva nṛipatiḥ purā | putrān utpādayāmāsa pancha vaṁśa-karān bhuvi | Angaḥ prathamato jajne Vangaḥ Suhmas tathaiva cha | Puṇḍraḥ Kalingaś cha tathā Bāleyaṁ kshattram uchyate | Bāleyā brāhmaṇāś chaiva tasya vaṁśakarā bhuvi | Bales tu Brahmaṇā datto varaḥ prītena Bhārata | mahāyogitvam āyuś cha kalpasya parimāṇataḥ | sangrāme chāpy ajeyatvaṁ dharme chaiva pradhānatā | trailokya-darśanaṁ chāpi prādhānyam prasave tathā | bale chāpratimatvaṁ vai dharma-tattvārtha-darśanam | chaturo niyatān varṇāṁs tvaṁ cha sthāpayiteti cha | ity ukto vibhunā rājā Baliḥ śāntim parāṁ yayau | tasyaite tanayāḥ sarve kshettrajā muni-pungavāt | sambhūtā Dīrghatapasaḥ Sudeshṇāyām mahaujausaḥ |

"From Phena sprang Sutapas; and the son of Sutapas was Bali. He was born of a human mother, this prince with the golden quiver; but King Bali was of old a great yogin. He begot five sons, who were the heads of races upon the earth. Anga was first born, then Vanga, Suhma, Puṇḍra and Kalinga; such are the names of the Kshattriyas descended from Bali (Bāleyāḥ). There were also Bāleya Brāhmans, founders of his race upon the earth. By Brahmā, who was pleased, the boon was granted to Bali that he should be a great yogin, should live the entire length of a Kalpa, should be invincible in battle, should have pre-eminence in virtue, should have the power of beholding the whole three worlds, should have a superiority in begetting progeny, should be unequalled in strength, and should comprehend the essential principles of duty. And being thus addressed by the Lord in these words, 'Thou shalt establish the four regulated castes,' King Bali attained supreme tranquillity. All these sons, the offspring of his wife, were begotten on Sudeshṇā by the glorious muni Dīrghatapas."[93] [93] M. Langlois must have found in his MS. a different reading of the last line, as he renders it otherwise. Professor Wilson remarks (V.P. pp. 444, note 12): "The Matsya calls Bali the son of Virochana, and āyu-kalpa-pramāṇikaḥ, 'existing for a whole Kalpa;' identifying him, therefore, only in a different period and form, with the Bali of the Vāmana Avatāra" (Dwarf-incarnation). (See Wilson's Vishṇu P. p. 265, note, and the Bhāgavata P. ix. sects. 15–23, and other works quoted in the 4th vol. of this work, pp. 116 ff.

Apratiratha is recorded as being a descendant of Pūru (another of Yayāti's sons), in the thirteenth generation (Wilson, p. 448). Of him it is related, Vishṇu Purāṇa, iv. 19, 2:

Ṛiteyoḥ Rantināraḥ putro 'bhūt | Taṁsum Apratirathaṁ Dhruvaṁ cha Rantināraḥ putrān avāpa | Apratirathāt Kaṇvaḥ | tasyāpi Medhātithiḥ | yataḥ Kaṇvāyanā dvijā babhūbhuḥ | Taṁsor Anilas tato Dushyantādyāś chatvāraḥ putrā babhūvuḥ | Dushyantāch chakravarttī Bharato 'bhavat |

"Ṛiteyu had a son Rantināra, who had Tansu, Apratiratha and Dhruva for his sons. From Apratiratha sprang Kaṇva. His son was Medhātithi; from whom the Kāṇvāyana Brāhmans were descended. From Tansu sprang Anila, who had four sons, Dushyanta, and others. From Dushyanta sprang the emperor Bharata."

With some variations the Bhāgavata Purāṇa says, ix. 20, 1:

Pūror vaṁśam pravakshyāmi yatra jāto 'si Bhārata | yatra rājarshayo vaṁsyā brahma-vaṁśyaś cha jajnire | . . . . 6. Ṛiteyoḥ Rantibhāro 'bhūt trayas tasyātmajā nṛipa | Sumatir Dhruvo 'pratirathaḥ Kaṇvo 'pratirathāmajaḥ | tasya Medhātitithis tasmāt Praskaṇvādyā dvijātayaḥ | putro 'bhūt Sumater Raibhyo Dushyantas tat-suto mataḥ |

"I shall declare the race of Pūru from which thou hast sprung, o Bhārata; and in which there have been born royal rishis, and men of Brahmanical family . . . . 6. From Ṛiteyu sprang Rantibhāra; who had three sons, Sumati, Dhruva, and Apratiratha. Kaṇva was the son of the last; and the son of Kaṇva was Medhātithi, from whom the Praskaṇvas and other Brāhmans were descended."

A little further on, in the chapter of the Vishṇu Purāṇa just quoted (iv. 19, 10), Kaṇva and Medhātithi are mentioned as having had a different parentage from that before assigned, viz., as being the son and grandson of Ajamīḍha, who was a descendant in the ninth generation of Tansu, the brother of Apratiratha:

Ajamīḍhāt Kaṇvaḥ | Kaṇvād Medhātithir yataḥ Kāṇvāyanā dvijāḥ | Ajamīḍhasyānyaḥ putro Bṛihadishuḥ |

"From Ajamīḍha sprang Kaṇva: from Kaṇva Medhātithi, from whom were descended the Kāṇvayana Brāhmans. Ajamīḍha had another son Bṛihadishu."[94]

[94] On this the Commentator remarks: Ajamīḍhasya Kaṇvādir eko vaṁśo Bṛihadishv-ādir aparo vaṁśo Nīlādir aparaḥ Ṛikshādiś chāparaḥ | "Ajamīḍha had one set of descendants, consisting of Kanva, etc., a second consisting of Bṛihadishu, etc.,

On this last passage Professor Wilson observes, p. 452, note: "The copies agree in this reading, yet it can scarcely be correct. Kaṇva has already been noticed as the son of Apratiratha." But the compiler of the Purāṇa may here be merely repeating the discordant accounts which he found in the older authorities which he had before him.

Regarding Ajamīḍha the Bhāgavata says, ix. 21, 21:

Ajamīḍhasya vaṁśyāḥ syuḥ Priyamedhādayo dvijāḥ | Ajamīḍhād Bṛihadishuḥ |

"Priyamedha and other Brāhmans were descendants of Ajamīḍha. From Ajamīḍha sprang Bṛihadishu."

The Vishṇu Purāṇa (iv. 19, 16) gives the following account of Mudgala, a descendant of Ajamīḍha in the seventh generation:

Mudgalāch cha Maudgalyāḥ kshattropetā dvijātayo babhūvuḥ | Mudgalād Bahvaśvo Bahvaśvād Divodāso 'halyā cha mithunam abhūt | Saradvato 'halyāyāṁ Śatānando 'bhavat |

"From Mudgala were descended the Maudgalya Brāhmans of Kshattriya stock. From Mudgala sprang Bahvaśva; from him again twins, Divodāsa and Ahalyā. Śatānanda was born to Śaradvat[95] by Ahalyā."

Similarly the Bhāgavata Purāṇa says, iv. 21, 33 f.:

Mudgalād brahma nirvṛittaṁ gotram Maudgalya-sanjnitam | mithunam Mudgalād Bhārmyād Divodāsaḥ pumān abhūt | Ahalyā kanyakā yasyāṁ Śatānandas tu Gautamāt |

"From Mudgala sprang Brāhmans, the family called Maudgalyas. To the same father, who was son of Bharmyaśva, were born twins, Divodāsa, a male, and Ahalyā, a female child, who bore Śatānanda to Gautama."

The words of the Matsya Purāṇa on the same subject, as quoted by Professor Wilson, p. 454, note 50, are:

Mudgalasyāpi Maudgalyāḥ kshattropetā dvijatāyaḥ | ete hy Angirasaḥ pakshe saṁsthitāḥ Kaṇva-Mudgalāḥ |

"From Mudgala sprang the Maudgalyas, Brāhmans of Kshattriya stock. These Kaṇva and Mudgalas stood on the side of Angiras."

a third consisting of Nīla, etc., and a fourth consisting of Ṛiksha, etc." The last two sons of Ajamīḍha are mentioned further on, Nīla in v. 15, and Ṛiksha in v. 18, of the same chapter of the V. P.

[95] The Commentator says this is a name of Gautama. Regarding Ahalyā and Gautama see the story extracted above, p. 121, from the Rāmāyaṇa.

The Harivaṁśa, section 32, verse 1781, thus notices the same family:

Mudgalasya tu dāyādo Maudgalyaḥ sumahāyaśāḥ | ete sarve mahātmāno kshattropetā dvijātayaḥ | ete hy Angirasaḥ pakshaṁ saṁśritāḥ Kāṇva-Mudgalāḥ | Maudgalyasya suto jyeshṭho brahmarshiḥ sumahāyasāḥ |

"The renowned Maudgalya was the son of Mudgala. All these great personages were Brāhmans of Kshattriya descent. These Kāṇvas and Mudgalas adhered to the side of Angiras. Maudgalya's eldest son was a celebrated Brahman-rishi."

Regarding Kshemaka, a future descendant of Ajamīḍha in the 31st generation, the Vishṇu Purāṇa says, iv. 21, 4:

Tato Niramitras tasmāch cha Kshemakaḥ | tatrāyaṁ slokaḥ | "brahma-kshattrasya yo yonir[96] vaṁśo rājarshi-satkṛitaḥ | Kshemakam prāpya rājānaṁ sa saṁsthām prāpsyate kalau |

"From him (Khaṇḍapāṇi) shall spring Niramitra; and from him Kshemaka; regarding whom this verse (is current): 'The race, consecrated by royal rishis, which gave birth to Brāhmans and Kshattriyas, shall terminate in the Kali age, after reaching King Kshemaka.'"

The corresponding verse quoted by Professor Wilson (p. 462, note 24) from the Matsya and Vāyu Purāṇas substitutes devarshi, "divine rishis," or "gods and rishis," for the rājarshi, "royal rishis," of the Vishṇu Purāṇa. The verse in question is there described as anuvaṁśa-śloko 'yaṁ gīto vipraiḥ purātanaiḥ, "a genealogical verse sung by ancient Brāhmans."

According to the details given from the Purāṇas in this section several persons, Gṛitsamada, Kaṇva, Medhātithi, and Priyamedha, to whom hymns of the Rig-veda are ascribed by Indian tradition as their rishis, were of Kshattriya descent.

In the line of the same Tansu, brother of Apratiratha, we find in the sixth generation a person named Garga, of whom the Vishṇu Purāṇa relates, iv. 19, 9:

Gargāt Śiniḥ | tato Gārgyāḥ Śainyāḥ kshattropetā dvijātayo babhūvuḥ |

"From Garga sprang Śini; from them were descended the Gārgyas and Śainyas, Brāhmans of Kshattriya race."[97]

[96] On this words the Commentator has this note: Brahmaṇaḥ brāhmaṇasya Kshattrasya kshattriyasya cha yoniḥ kāraṇam pūrvaṁ yathoktatvāt | "'Brahma' and 'Kshattra' stand for Brāhman and Kshattriya. This race is the 'source,' cause (of these), as has been declared above."

[97] On this the Commentator only remarks: Tatas tābhyāṁ Gārgyāḥ Śainyāś cha

Similarly the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, ix. 21, 19, says:

Gargāt S'inis tato Gārgyaḥ kshattrād brahma hy avarttata |

"From Garga sprang S'ini; from them Gārgya, who from a Kshattriya became a Brāhman." [98]

The Vishṇu Purāṇa records a similar circumstance regarding the family of Mahāvīryya, the brother of Garga (iv. 19, 10):

Mahāvīryyād Urukshayo nāma putro 'bhūt | tasya Trayyaruṇa-Pushkariṇau Kapiś cha putra-trayam abhūt | tach cha tritayam api paśchād vipratām upajagāma |

"Mahāvīryya had a son named Urukshaya; who again had three sons, Trayyaruṇa, Puskarin, and Kapi; and these three [99] afterwards entered into the state of Brāhmans (i.e. became such)."

The Bhāgavata states, ix. 21, 19 f.:

Duritakshayo Mahāvīryyāt tasya Trayyāruṇiḥ Kaviḥ | Pushkarāruṇir ity atra ye brāhmaṇa-gatiṁ gatāḥ |

"From Mahāvīryya sprang Duritakshaya. From him were descended Trayyaruṇi, Kavi, and Puskarāruṇi, who attained to the destination of Brāhmans." [100]

According to the Matsya Purāṇa also, as quoted by Professor Wilson (451, note 22), "all these sons of Uruksha (sic) attained the state of Brāhmans" (Urukshataḥ sutā hy ete sarve brāhmaṇatāṁ gatāḥ); and in another verse of the same Purāṇa, cited in the same note, it is added: Kāvyānāṁ tu varā hy ete trayaḥ proktā maharshayaḥ | Gargāḥ Sankṛitayaḥ Kāvyā kshattropetā dvijātayaḥ | "These three classes of great rishis, viz. the Gargas, Sankṛitis, and Kāvyas, Brāhmans of Kshattriya race, are declared to be the most eminent of the Kāvyas, or descendants of Kavi." The original Garga was, as we have seen, the brother of Mahavīryya, the father of Kavi, or Kapi; while, according to the Garga-vaṁśyatvāt S'ini-vaṁśyatvāch cha samākhyātaḥ | kshattriyā eva kenachit kāraṇena brāhmaṇāś cha babhūvuḥ | "They were called Gārgyas and S'ainyas because they were of the race of Gārga and S'ini. Being indeed Kshattriyas they became Brāhmans from some cause or other."

[98] The Commentator does not say how this happened.

[99] Unless Professor Wilson's MSS. had a different reading from mine, it must have been by an oversight that he has translated here, "The last of whom became a Brāhman."

[100] On this the Commentator annotates: Ye atra kshattra-vaṁśe brāhmaṇa-gatim brāhmaṇa-rūpatāṁ gatās te | "Who in this Kshattriya race attained the destination of Brāhmans,—the form of Brāhmans."

Vishṇu Purāṇa (iv. 19, 9), and Bhāgavata Purāṇa (ix. 21, 1), Sankṛiti was the son of Nara, another brother of Mahavīryya.

The series of passages just quoted is amply sufficient to prove that according to the traditions received by the compilers of the ancient legendary history of India (traditions so general and undisputed as to prevail over even their strong hierarchical prepossessions), Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, and even Vaiśyas and Sūdras, were, at least in many cases, originally descended from one and the same stock. The European critic can have no difficulty in receiving these obscure accounts as true in their literal sense; though the absence of precise historical data may leave him without any other guide than speculation to assist him in determining the process by which a community originally composed for the most part of one uniform element, was broken up into different classes and professions, separated from each other by impassable barriers. On the other hand, the possibility of this common origin of the different castes, though firmly based on tradition, appeared in later times so incredible, or so unpalatable, to some of the compilers of the Purāṇas, that we find them occasionally attempting to explain away the facts which they record, by statements such as we have encountered in the case of the Kings Rathītara and Bāli, that their progeny was begotten upon their wives by the sages Angiras and Dīrghatamas, or Dīrghatapas; or by the introduction of a miraculous element into the story, as we have already seen in one of the legends regarding Gṛitsamada, and as we shall have occasion to notice in a future chapter in the account of Viśvāmitra.

CHAPTER III.

ON THE MUTUAL RELATIONS OF THE DIFFERENT CLASSES OF INDIAN SOCIETY ACCORDING TO THE HYMNS OF THE RIG- AND ATHARVA-VEDAS.

In the last chapter I have attempted to shew that in general the authors of the hymns of the Rig-veda regarded the whole of the Aryan people, embracing not only the priests and chiefs, but the middle classes also of the population, as descended from one common father, or ancestor, whom they designate by the name of Manu. This reference to a common progenitor excludes, of course, the supposition that the writers by whom it is made could have had any belief in the myth which became afterwards current among their countrymen, that their nation consisted of four castes, differing naturally in dignity, and separately created by Brahmā.

In that chapter I proposed to leave for further consideration any specific notices which the Rig-veda might contain regarding the different classes of which the society contemporary with its composition was made up. On this consideration I now enter. As that great collection of hymns embodies numerous references, both to the authors themselves and to the other agents in the celebration of divine worship, it may be expected to supply, incidentally or indirectly, at least, some information respecting the opinion which these ministers of religion entertained of themselves, and of the ecclesiastical and civil relations in which they stood to the other sections of the community. I shall now endeavour to shew how far this expectation is justified by an examination of the Rig-veda.

It will be understood, from what I have already (pp. 7 and 11 ff.) written on the subject of that one hymn of the Rig-veda in which the four castes are distinctly specified, i.e. the Purusha Sūkta, that in the enquiry, which I am now about to undertake, I confine myself in the first instance to those hymns which for any reason (see p. 4, above) appear to be the most ancient, leaving out of account until afterwards, all those compositions which, like the one just mentioned, are presumably of a later age.

It will, I think, be found on investigation that not only the older hymns, but the great bulk of the hymns, supply no distinct evidence of the existence of a well defined and developed caste-system at the time when they were composed.

Sect. I.—On the signification of the words brăhmăn, brāhmaṇa, etc., in the Rig-veda.

As the Rig-veda Sanhitā is made up almost entirely of hymns in praise of the gods, it was not to be anticipated that it should furnish any systematic or detailed explanations on the points which form the object of our enquiry. But as was natural in compositions of the early and simple age to which these hymns belong, they do not always confine themselves to matters strictly connected with their principal subject, but indulge in occasional references to the names, families, personal merits, qualifications, relations, circumstances, and fortunes of the poets by whom they were produced, or of their patrons or other contemporaries, or of their predecessors.

I have, in another volume of this work,[1] enquired into the views which the authors of the hymns appear to have held on the subject of their own authorship. The conclusion at which I arrived was, that they did not in general look upon their compositions as divinely inspired, since they frequently speak of them as the productions of their own minds (vol. iii. pp. 128–140). But although this is most commonly the case (and especially, as we may conjecture, in regard to the older hymns), there is no doubt that they also attached a high value to these productions, which they describe as being acceptable to the gods (R.V. v. 45, 4; v. 85, 1; vii. 26, 1, 2; x. 23, 6; x. 54, 6; x. 105,

[1] Original Sanskrit Texts, vol. iii. pp. 116–164.

8), whose activity they stimulated (iii. 34, 1; vii. 19, 11), and whose blessing they drew down. In some of the hymns a supernatural character or insight is claimed for the rishis (i. 179, 2; vii. 76, 4; iii. 53, 9; vii. 33, 11 ff.; vii. 87, 4; vii. 88, 3 ff.; x. 14, 15; x. 62, 4, 5), and a mysterious efficacy is ascribed to their compositions (vol. iii. pp. 173 f.) The rishis called their hymns by various names, as arka, uktha, ṛich, gir, dhī, nītha, nivid, mantra, mati, sūkta, stoma, vāch, vachas, etc. etc.; and the also applied to them the appellation of brahma in numerous passages.[2] That in the passages in question brahma has generally the sense of hymn or prayer is clear from the context of some of them (as in i. 37, 4; viii. 32, 27, where the word is joined with the verb gāyata, "sing," and in vi. 69, 7, where the gods are supplicated to hear the brahma), as well as from the fact that the poets are said (in i. 62, 13; v. 73, 10; vii. 22, 9; vii. 31, 11; x. 80, 7) to have fashioned or generated the prayer, in the same way as they are said to have fashioned or generated hymns in other texts (as i. 109, 1; v. 2, 11; vii. 15, 4; viii. 77, 4; x. 23, 6; x. 39, 14), where the sense is indisputable; while in other places (iv. 16, 21; v. 29, 15; vi. 17, 13; vi. 50, 6; vii. 61, 6; x. 89, 3) new productions of the poets are spoken of under the appellation of brahma.

That brahma has the sense of hymn or prayer is also shown by the two following passages. In vii. 26, 1, it is said: Na somaḥ Indram asuto mamāda na abrahmāṇo maghavānaṁ sutāsaḥ | tasmai ukthaṁ janaye yaj jujoshad nṛivad navīyaḥ śṛiṇavad yathā naḥ | 2. Ukthe ukthe somaḥ Indram mamāda nītthe nītthe maghavānaṁ sutāsaḥ | yad īṁ sabādhaḥ pitaraṁ na putrāḥ samāna-dakshāḥ avase havante | "Soma unless poured out does not exhilarate Indra; nor do libations without hymns (abrahmāṇaḥ). I generate for him a hymn (uktha) which he will love, so that like a man he may hear our new (production). 2. At each hymn (uktha) the soma exhilarates Indra, at each psalm (nītha) the libations (exhilarate) Maghavat, when the worshippers united, with one effort, invoke him for help, as sons do a father."[3] Again in x. 105, 8, it is

[2] For a list of these texts and other details which are here omitted, I refer to my article "On the relations of the priests to the other classes of Indian Society in the Vedic age," in the Journal of the Roy. As. Soc. for 1866 (from which this section is mostly borrowed).

[3] It is clear from the context of this passage that abrahmāṇaḥ means "unattended by hymns," and not "without a priest." After saying that soma-libations without said: Ava no vṛijinā śiśīhi ṛichā vanema anṛichaḥ | na abrahmā yajnaḥ ṛidhag joshati tve | "Drive away our calamities. With a hymn (ṛichā) may we slay the men who are hymnless (anṛichaḥ). A sacrifice without prayer (abrahmā) does not please thee well."

I have said that great virtue is occasionally attributed by the poets to their hymns and prayers; and this is true of those sacred texts when called by the name of brahma, as well as when they receive other appellations, such as mantra. Thus it is said, iii. 53, 12, Viśvāmitrasya rakshati brahma idam Bhāratañ janam | "This prayer (brahma) of Viśvāmitra protects the tribe of Bharata;" v. 40, 6, Gūḷham sūryañ tamasā apavratena turīyeṇa brahmaṇā avindad Atriḥ | "Atri with the fourth prayer (brahmaṇā) discovered the sun concealed by unholy darkness;" vi. 75, 19, Brahma varma mamā antaram | "Prayer (brahma) is my protecting armour;" vii. 33, 3, Eva id nu kam dāśarājñe Sudāsam prāvad Indro brahmaṇā vo Vasishṭhāḥ | "Indra preserved Sudās in the battle of the ten kings through your prayer, o Vasishṭhas." In ii. 23, 1, Brahmaṇaspati is said to be the "great king of prayers" (jyeshṭharājam brahmaṇām) (compare vii. 97, 3), and in verse 2, to be the "generator of prayers" (janitā brahmaṇām); whilst in x. 61, 7, prayer is declared to have been generated by the gods (svādhyo ajanayan brahma devāḥ). Compare vii. 35, 7.

Brăhmăn in the masculine is no doubt derived from the same root as brăhmăn neuter, and though differing from it in accent[4] as well as gender, must be presumed to be closely connected with it in signification, just as the English "prayer" in the sense of a petition would be with "prayer," a petitioner, if the word were used in the latter sense. As, then, brăhmăn in the neuter means a hymn or prayer, brăhmăn in the masculine must naturally be taken to denote the person who composes or repeats a hymn or prayer. We do not, however, find that the composers of the hymns are in general designated by the word hymns are unacceptable to Indra, the poet does not add that he is himself a priest, or that he is attended by one, but that he generates a hymn; and the same sense is required by what follows in the second verse. Accordingly we find that Sāyaṇa explains abrahmāṇaḥ by stotra-hīnāḥ, "destitute of hymns." The same sense is equally appropriate in the next passage cited, x. 105, 8. On iv. 16, 9, where abrahmā is an epithet of dasyu, "demon," Sāyaṇa understands it to mean "without a priest," but it may mean equally well or better, "without devotion, or prayer."

[4] In brăhmăn neuter the accent is on the first syllable; in brăhmăn masculine on the last.

brāhmăn, the name most commonly applied to them being ṛishi, though they are also called vipra, vedhas, kavi, etc. (see vol. iii. of this work, pp. 116 ff.). There are, however, a few texts, such as i. 80, 1; i. 164, 35; ii. 12, 6; ii. 39, 1; v. 31, 4; v. 40, 8; ix. 113, 6, etc., in which the brāhmăn may or must be understood as referred to in the capacity of author of the hymn he utters. So, too, in ii. 20, 4, and vi. 21, 8, a new composer of hymns seems to be spoken of under the appellation of nutānasya brāhmăn̲yataḥ; and in ii. 19, 8, the Gṛitsamadas are referred to both as the fabricators of a new hymn (manma navīyaḥ) and as (brāhmăn̲yăntaḥ) performing devotion.[5] In three passages, vii. 28, 2; vii. 70, 5, and x. 89, 16, the brāhmă and brāhmān̲i, "prayer" and "prayers," or "hymn" and "hymns," of the rishis are spoken of; and in vii. 22, 9, it is said, "that both the ancient and the recent rishis have generated prayers" (ye cha pūrve ṛishayo ye cha nūtnāḥ Indra brahmān̲i janayanta viprāḥ). In i. 177, 5, we find brahmān̲i kāroḥ, "the prayers of the poet." The fact that in various hymns the authors speak of themselves as having received valuable gifts from the princes their patrons, and that they do not there allude to any class of officiating priests as separate from themselves, would also seem to indicate an identity of the poet and priest at that early period.

The term brahman must therefore, as we may conclude, have been originally applied (1) to the same persons who are spoken of elsewhere in the hymns as rishi, kavi, etc., and have denoted devout worshippers and contemplative sages who composed prayers and hymns which they themselves recited in praise of the gods. Afterwards when the ceremonial gradually became more complicated, and a division of sacred functions took place, the word was more ordinarily employed (2) for a minister of public worship, and at length came to signify (3) one particular kind of priest with special duties. I subjoin a translation of the different passages in which the word occurs in the Rig-veda, and I have attempted to classify them according as it seems to bear, in each case, the first, second, or third of the senses just indicated. This, however, is not always an easy task, as in many of these texts there is nothing to fix the meaning of the term with precision, and one signification easily runs into another, and the same person may be at once the author and the reciter of the hymn.

[5] In another place (x. 96, 5) Indra is said to have been lauded by former worshippers, pūrvebhir yăjvăbhiḥ, a term usually confined (as brāhmăn was frequently applied) in after times to the offerers of sacrifice.

I. Passages in which brăhmăn may signify "contemplator, sage, or poet."

(In all these texts I shall leave the word untranslated.)

i. 80, 1. Itthā hi some id made brahmā chakāra varddhanam |

"Thus in his exhilaration from soma juice the brăhmăn has made (or uttered) a magnifying[6] (hymn)."

i. 164, 34. Pṛichhāmi tvā param antam pṛithivyāḥ pṛichhāmi yatra bhuvanasya nābhiḥ | pṛichhāmi tvā vṛishṇo aśvasya retaḥ pṛichhāmi vāchaḥ pāramaṁ vyoma | 35. Iyaṁ vediḥ paro antaḥ pṛithivyāḥ ayaṁ yajño bhuvanasya nābhiḥ ayaṁ somo vṛishṇo aśvasya reto brahmā ayam vāchaḥ paramaṁ vyoma |

"I ask thee (what is) the remotest end of the earth; I ask where is the central point of the world; I ask thee (what is) the seed of the vigorous horse; I ask (what is) the highest heaven[7] of speech. 35. This altar is the remotest end of the earth; this sacrifice is the central point of the world; this soma is the seed of the vigorous horse; this brăhmăn is the highest heaven of speech.[8]

ii. 12, 6. Yo radhrasya choditā yaḥ kṛiśasya yo brahmaṇo nādhamānasya kīreḥ |

"He (Indra) who is the quickener of the sluggish, of the emaciated, of the suppliant brăhmăn who praises him," etc.

vi. 45, 7. Brahmāṇam brahma-vāhasaṁ gīrbhiḥ sakhāyam ṛigmiyam | gāṁ na dohase huve |

"With hymns I call Indra, the brăhmăn,—the carrier of prayers (brăhmă-vāhasam), the friend who is worthy of praise,—as men do a cow which is to be milked."

vii. 33, 11. Uta asi Maitrāvaruṇo Vasishṭha Urvaśyāḥ brahman manaso 'dhi jātaḥ | drapsaṁ skannam brahmaṇā daivyena viśve devāḥ pushkare tvā 'dadanta |

"And thou, o Vasishṭha, art a son of Mitra and Varuṇa (or a Maitrāvaruṇa-priest), born, o brăhmăn, from the soul of Urvaśī. All the [6] Varddhanam = vṛiddhi-karaṁ stotram (Sāyaṇa).

[7] Compare R.V. iii. 32, 10; x. 109, 4, below, and the words, the highest heaven of invention."

[8] Compare R.V. x. 71 and x. 125.

gods placed in the vessel thee, the drop which had fallen through divine contemplation."

viii. 16, 7. Indro brahmā Indraḥ ṛishir Indraḥ puru puruhūtaḥ | mahān mahībhiḥ śachībhiḥ |

"Indra is a brāhmăn, Indra is a rishi,[9] Indra is much and often invoked, great through his mighty powers."

x. 71, 11. (See the translation of the entire hymn below. The sense of brāhmăn in verse 11 will depend on the meaning assigned to jāta-vidyā.)

x. 77, 1. (In this passage, the sense of which is not very clear, the word brāhmăn appears to be an epithet of the host of Maruts.)

x. 85, 3. Somam manyate papivān yat sampiṁshanti oshadhim | somaṁ yam brahmāṇo vidur na tasya aśnāti kaśchana | 16. Dve te chakre Sūrye brahmāṇo ṛituthā viduḥ | atha ekaṁ chakraṁ yad guhā tad addhātayaḥ id viduḥ | 34. . . . . Sūryāṁ yo brahmā vidyāt sa id vādhūyam arhati |

"A man thinks he has drunk soma when they crush the plant (so called). But no one tastes of that which the brāhmăns know to be soma (the moon). 16. The brāhmăns rightly know, Sūryā, that thou hast two wheels; but it is sages (addhātayaḥ) alone who know the one wheel which is hidden. 34. The brāhmăn who knows Sūryā deserves the bride's garment." [10]

x. 107, 6. Tam eva ṛishiṁ tam u brahmāṇam āhur yajnanyaṁ sāma-gām uktha-śāsam | sa śukrasya tanvo veda tisraḥ yaḥ prathamo dakshiṇayā rarādha |

"They call him a rishi, him a brāhmăn, reverend, a chanter of Sāma verses (sāma-gām), and reciter of ukthas,—he knows the three forms of the brilliant (Agni)—the man who first worshipped with a largess."

Even in later times a man belonging to the Kshattriya and Vaiśya castes may perform all the Vedic rites. Any such person, therefore, and consequently a person not a Brāhman might, according to this verse, have been called, though, no doubt, figuratively, a priest (brahmā).

[9] Different deities are called ṛishi, kavi, etc., in the following texts: v. 29, 1; vi. 14, 2; viii. 6, 41; ix. 96, 18; ix. 107, 7; x. 27, 22; x. 112, 9.

[10] See Dr. Haug's Ait. Br. vol. i. Introduction, p. 20.

x. 117, 7. . . . Vadan brahmā avadato vanīyān pṛiṇann āpir apṛiṇantam abhi syāt |

"A brāhmăn[11] who speaks is more acceptable than one who does not speak: a friend who is liberal excels one who is illiberal."[12]

x. 125, 5. Yaṁ kāmaye taṁ tam ugraṁ kṛiṇomi tam brahmāṇaṁ tam ṛishiṁ taṁ sumedhām |

"I (says Vāch) make him whom I love formidable, him a brāhman, him a rishi, him a sage."

This would seem to prove that sometimes, at least, the brāhmăn was such not by birth or nature, but by special favour and inspiration of the goddess. In this passage, therefore, the word cannot denote the member of a caste, who would not be dependent on the good will of Vāch for his position.

II. In the passages which follow the word brāhmăn does not seem to signify so much a "sage or poet," as a "worshipper or priest."

i. 10, 1. Gāyanti tvā gāyatriṇo archanti arkam arkiṇaḥ | brahmāṇas tvā Śatakrato ud vaṁśam iva yemire |

"The singers sing thee, the hymners recite a hymn, the brāhmăns, o Śatakratu, have raised thee up like a pole."[13]

i. 33, 9. Amanyamānān abhi manyamānair nir brahmabhir adhamo dasyum Indra |

"Thou, Indra, with the believers, didst blow against the unbelievers, with the brāhmăns thou didst blow away the Dasyu."[14]

i. 101, 5. Yo viśvasya jagataḥ prāṇatas patir yo brahmaṇe prathamo gāḥ avindat | Indro yo dasyūn adharān avātirat . . .

"Indra, who is lord of all that moves and breathes, who first found the cows for the brāhmăn, who hurled down the Dasyu."

i. 108, 7. Yad Indrāgnī madathaḥ sve durone yad brahmaṇi rājani vā yajatrā | ataḥ pari vṛishaṇāv ā hi yātam athā somasya pibataṁ sutasya |

"When, o adorable Indra and Agni, ye are exhilarated in your own [11] The word here seems clearly to indicate an order or profession, as the silent priest is still a priest.

[12] See Dr. Haug's remark on this verse, Ait. Br. Introd. p. 20. The contexts of the two last passages are given in my article "Miscellaneous Hymns from the R. and A. Vedas," pp. 32 f.

[13] Compare i. 5, 8; i. 7, 1; viii. 16, 9. See Dr. Haug's remark on this verse, Ait. Br. Introd. p 20.

[14] See on this verse the remarks of M. Bréal, Hercule et Cacus, etc. p. 152.

abode, or with a brāhmăn or a rājan,[15] come thence, ye vigorous (deities), and then drink of the poured out soma." [16]

i. 158, 6. Dīrghatamāḥ Māmateyo jujurvān daśame yuge | apām arthaṁ yatīnām brahmā bhavati sārathiḥ |

"Dīrghatamas, son of Mamatā, being decrepit in his tenth lustre, (though) a brāhmăn, becomes the charioteer of (or is borne upon) the waters which are hastening to their goal."

(Professor Aufrecht understands this to mean that Dīrghatamas is verging towards his end, and thinks there is a play on the word "charioteer" as an employment not befitting a priest.)

ii. 39, 1. . . . Gṛidhrā iva vṛikshaṁ nidhimantam acha | brahmāṇā iva vidathe ukthaśāsā . . . |

"Ye (Aśvins) (cry) like two vultures on a tree which contains their nest; like two brāhmăns singing a hymn at a sacrifice."

iv. 50, 7. Sa id rājā pratijanyāni viśvā śushmeṇa tasthāv abhi vīryeṇa | Bṛihaspatiṁ yaḥ subhṛitam bibhartti valgūyati vandate pūrva-bhājam | 8. Sa it ksheti sudhitaḥ okasi sve tasmai iḷā pinvate viśvadānīm | tasmai viśaḥ svayam eva namante yasmin brahmā rājani pūrvaḥ eti | 9. Apratīto jayati saṁ dhanāni pratijanyāni uta yā sajanyā | avasyave yo varivaḥ kṛiṇoti brahmaṇe rājā tam avanti devāḥ |

"That king overcomes all hostile powers in force and valour who maintains Bṛihaspati in abundance, who praises and magnifies him as (a deity) enjoying the first distinction. 8. He dwells prosperous in his own palace, to him the earth always yields her increase,[17] to him the people bow down of themselves,—that king in whose house a brăhmăn walks first.[18] 9. Unrivalled, he conquers the riches both of his enemies and his kinsmen—the gods preserve the king who bestows wealth on the brăhmăn who asks his assistance."[19]

[15] A distinction of orders or professions appears to be here recognised. But in v. 54, 7, a rishi and a rājan are distinguished much in the same way as a brāhmăn and rājan are in i. 108, 7: Sa na jīyate Maruto na hanyate na sredhati na vyathate na rishyati | na asya rāyaḥ upa dasyanti na ūtayaḥ ṛishim vā yaṁ rājānaṁ vā sushūdatha | "That man, whether rishi or prince, whom ye, o Maruts, support, is neither conquered nor killed, he neither decays nor is distressed, nor is injured; his riches do not decline, nor his supports." Compare v. 14, where it is said: Yūgaṁ rayim marutaḥ spārha-vīraṁ yūyam ṛishim avatha sāma-vipram | yūyam arvantam Bharatāya vājaṁ yūyaṁ dhattha rājanaṁ śrushṭimantam | "Ye, o Maruts, give riches with desirable men, ye protect a rishi who is skilled in hymns; ye give a horse and food to Bharata, ye make a king prosperous." In iii. 43, 5, reference is found to Viśvāmitra, or the author, being made by Indra both a prince and a rishi (kuvid mā gopāṁ karase janasya kuvid rājānam maghavann ṛijīshin | kuvid mā ṛishim papivāṁsaṁ sutasya).

[16] See on this verse Prof. Benfey's note, Orient und Occident, 3, 142.

[17] Compare R.V. v. 37, 4 f.: Na sa rājā vyathate yasminn Indras tīvram somam pivati go-sakhāyam | "That king suffers no distress in whose house Indra drinks the pungent soma mixed with milk," etc.

iv. 58, 2. Vayaṁ nāma pra bravāma ghṛitasya asmin yajne dhārayāma namobhiḥ | upa brahmā śṛinavat śasyamānaṁ chatuḥ-śṛingo avamīd gauraḥ etat |

"Let us proclaim the name of butter; let us at this sacrifice hold it (in mind) with prostrations. May the brăhmăn (Agni?) hear the praise which is chanted. The four-horned bright-coloured (god) has sent this forth."

v. 29, 3. Uta brahmāṇo Maruto me asya Indraḥ somasya sushutasya peyāḥ |

"And, ye Maruts, brăhmăns, may Indra drink of this my soma which has been poured out," etc.

v. 31, 4. Anavas te ratham aśvāya takshaṇ Tvashṭā vajram puruhūta dyumantam | brahmāṇaḥ Indram mahayanto arkair avarddhayann Ahaye hantavai u |

"The men[20] have fashioned a car for thy (Indra's) horse, and Tvashṭṛi a gleaming thunderbolt, o god greatly invoked. The brăhmăns, magnifying Indra, have strengthened him for the slaughter of Ahi."

v. 32, 12. Evā hi tvām ṛituthā yātayantam maghā viprebhyo dadataṁ śṛiṇomi | kiṁ te brahmāṇo gṛihate sakhāyo ye tvāyāḥ nidadhuḥ kāmam Indra |

"I hear of thee thus rightly prospering, and bestowing wealth on, the sages (viprebhyaḥ). What, o Indra, do the brăhmăns, thy friends, who have reposed their wishes on thee, obtain?"

v. 40, 8. Grāvṇo brahmā yuyujānaḥ saparyan kīriṇā devān namasā upaśikshan | Atriḥ sūryasya divi chakshur ā adhāt Svarbhānor apa māyāḥ aghukshat |

"Applying the stones (for pressing soma), performing worship, honouring the gods with praise and obeisance, the brăhmăn Atri placed

[18] Compare viii. 69, 4; x. 39, 11; x. 107, 5; and the word purohita, used of a ministering priest as one placed in front. Prof. Aufrecht, however, would translate the last words, "under whose rule the priest receives the first or principal portion."

[19] See on this passage Roth's article, "On Brahma and the Brāhmans," Journ. Germ. Or. Soc. i. 77 ff. See also Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, viii. 26.

[20] Are the Ṛibhus intended?

the eye of the sun in the sky, and swept away the magical arts of Svarbhānu."

vii. 7, 5. Asādi vṛito vahnir ājaganvān Agnir brahmā nṛi-shadane vidharttā |

"The chosen bearer (of oblations), Agni, the brāhmăn, having arrived, has sat down in a mortal's abode, the upholder."

vii. 42, 1. Pra brahmāṇo Angiraso nakshanta |

"The brāhmăns, the Angirases, have arrived," etc.

viii. 7, 20. Kva nūnaṁ sudānavo madatha vṛikta-barhishaḥ | brahmā ko vaḥ saparyati |

"Where now, bountiful (Maruts), are ye exhilarated, with the sacrificial grass spread beneath you? What brāhmăn is serving you?"

viii. 17, 2. Ā tvā brahma-yujā harī vahatām Indra keśinā | upa brahmāṇi naḥ śṛiṇu | 3. Brahmāṇas tvā vayaṁ yujā somapām Indra sominaḥ | sutāvanto havāmahe |

"Thy tawny steeds with flowing manes, yoked by prayer (brahma-yujā),[21] bring thee hither, Indra; listen to our prayers (brāhmāṇi). 3. We brāhmăns, offerers of soma, bringing oblations, continually invoke the drinker of soma."

viii. 31, 1. Yo yajāti yajāte it sunavach cha pachāti cha | brahmā id Indrasya chākanat |

"That brāhmăn is beloved of Indra who worships, sacrifices, pours out libations, and cooks offerings."

viii. 32, 16. Na nūnam brahmaṇām ṛiṇam prāśūnām asti sunvatām | na somo apratā pape |

"There is not now any debt due by the active brāhmăns who pour out libations. Soma has not been drunk without an equivalent."

viii. 33, 19. Adhaḥ paśyasva mā upari santaram pādakau hara | mā te kaśa-plakau dṛiśan strī hi brahmā babhūvitha |

"Look downward, not upward; keep thy feet close together; let them not see those parts which should be covered; thou, a brāhmăn, hast become a woman."

viii. 45, 39. Ā te etā vacho-yujā harī gṛibhṇe sumadrathā | yad īm brahmabhyaḥ id dadaḥ |

[21] Compare viii. 45, 39, below: brahma-yuj occurs also in i. 177, 2; iii. 35, 4; viii. 1, 24; viii. 2, 27.

"I seize these thy tawny steeds, yoked by our hymn (vacho-yujā)[22] to a splendid chariot, since thou didst give (wealth) to the brāhmāns.

viii. 53, 7. Kva sya vṛishabho yuvā tuvi-grīvo anānataḥ | brahmā kas taṁ saparyati |

"Where is that vigorous, youthful, large-necked, unconquered (Indra)? What brāhmān serves him?

viii. 66, 5. Abhi Gandharvam atṛiṇad abudhneshu rajassu ā | Indro brahmabhyaḥ id vṛidhe |

"Indra clove the Gandharva in the bottomless mists, for the prosperity of the brāhmāns."

viii. 81, 30. Mo su brahmā iva tandrayur bhuvo vājānām pate | matsva sutasya gomataḥ |

"Be not, o lord of riches (Indra), sluggish like a brāhmān.[23] Be exhilarated by the libation mixed with milk."

viii. 85, 5. Ā yad vajram bāhvor Indra dhatse mada-chyutam Ahave hantavai u | pra parvatāḥ anavanta pra brahmāṇo abhinakshanta Indram |

"When, Indra, thou seizest in thine arms the thunderbolt which brings down pride, in order to slay Ahi, the (aerial) hills and the cows utter their voice, and the brāhmāns draw near to thee."

ix. 96, 6. Brahmā devānām padavīḥ kavīnām ṛishir viprāṇām mahisho mṛigānām | śyeno gṛidhrāṇāṁ svadhitir vanānāṁ somaḥ pavitram ati eti rebhan |

"Soma, resounding, overflows the filter, he who is a brāhmān among the gods, a leader among poets, a rishi among the wise, a buffalo among wild beasts, a falcon among kites, an axe among the woods."

ix. 112, 1. Nānānāṁ vai u no dhiyo vi vratāni janānām | takshā rishṭaṁ rutam bhishag brahmā sunvantam ichhati.

"Various are the thoughts and endeavours of us different men. The carpenter seeks something broken, the doctor a patient, the brāhmān some one to offer libations."[24]

[22] Compare viii. 87, 9, yunjanti harī ishirasya gāthayā urau rathe uruyuge | Indra-vāhā vachoyujā; i. 7, 2, vachoyujā; i. 14, 6, manoyujā; vi. 49, 5, ratho . . . . manasā yujānaḥ.

[23] Dr. Haug (Introd. to Ait. Br. p. 20) refers to Ait. Br. v. 34, as illustrating this reproach. See p. 376 of his translation. This verse clearly shows that the priests formed a professional body.

[24] This verse also distinctly proves that the priesthood already formed a profession. Verse 3 of the same hymn is as follows: "I am a poet, my father a physician, my

ix. 113, 6. Yatra brahmā pavamāna chhandasyāṁ vāchaṁ vadan | grāvṇā some mahīyate somena ānandaṁ janayann Indrāya Indo pari srava |

"O pure Soma, in the place where the brāhmăn, uttering a metrical hymn, is exalted at the soma sacrifice through (the sound of) the crushing-stone, producing pleasure with soma, o Indu (Soma) flow for Indra."

x. 28, 11. Tebhyo godhā ayathaṁ karshad etad ye brahmaṇaḥ pratipīyanti annaiḥ | sime ukshṇaḥ avasṛishṭān adanti svayam balāni tanvaḥ śṛiṇānāḥ | (The word brahmaṇaḥ occurs in this verse, but I am unable to offer any translation, as the sense is not clear.)

x. 71, 11. (See translation of this verse below, where the entire hymn is given.)

x. 85, 29. Parā dehi śāmulyam brahmābhyo vi bhaja vasu | . . . 35. Sūryāyāḥ paśya rūpāṇi tāni brahmā tu śundhati |

"Put away that which requires expiation (?). Distribute money to the brāhmăns. . . . 35. Behold the forms of Sūryā. But the brāhmăn purifies them."

x. 141, 3. Somaṁ rājānam avase Agniṁ gīrbhir havāmahe | Ādityān Vishṇuṁ Sūryam brahmāṇaṁ cha Bṛihaspatim |

"With hymns we invoke to our aid king Soma, Agni, the Ādityas, Vishṇu, Sūrya, and Bṛihaspati, the brāhmăn.

III. In the following passages the word brāhmăn appears to designate the special class of priest so called, in contradistinction to hotṛi, udgātṛi, and adhvaryu.

ii. 1, 2 (= x. 91, 10). Tava Agne hotraṁ tava potram ṛitviyaṁ tava neshṭraṁ tvam id agnid ṛitāyataḥ | tava praśāstraṁ tvam adhvarīyasi brahmā cha asi gṛihapatiś cha no dame | 2. Tvam Agne Indro vṛishabhaḥ satām asi tvaṁ Vishṇur urugāyo namasyaḥ | tvam brahmā rayivid Brahmaṇaspate tvaṁ vidharttaḥ sachase purandhyā |

"Thine, Agni, is the office of hotṛi, thine the regulated function of potṛi, thine the office of neshṭṛi, thou art the agnidh of the pious man, thine is the function of praśāstṛi, thou actest as adhvaryu, thou art the brāhmăn, and the lord of the house in our abode. 2. Thou, Agni, art Indra, the chief of the holy, thou art Vishṇu, the wide-stepping, the mother a grinder of corn" (kārur ahaṁ tato bhishag upala-prakshiṇī nānā). Unfortunately there is nothing further said which could throw light on the relations in which the different professions and classes of society stood to each other.

adorable, thou, o Brahmaṇaspati, art the brāhmăn, the possessor of wealth, thou, o sustainer, art associated with the ceremonial."

iv. 9, 3. Sa sadma pari nīyate hotā mandro divishṭishu | uta potā ni shīdati | 4. Uta gnā Agnir adhvare uta gṛihapatir dame | uta brahmā ni shīdati |

"He (Agni) is led round the house, a joyous hotṛi at the ceremonies, and sits a potṛi. 4. And Agni is a wife (i.e. a mistress of the house) at the sacrifice, and the master of the house in our abode, and he sits a brāhmăn."

x. 52, 2. Ahaṁ hotā ni asīdaṁ yajīyān viśve devāḥ maruto mā junanti | ahar ahar Aśvinā ādhvaryavaṁ vām brahmā samid bhavati sā ahutir vām |

(Agni says) "I have sat down an adorable hotṛi; all the gods, the Maruts, stimulate me. Day by day, ye Aśvins, I have acted as your adhvaryu; the brāhmăn is he who kindles the fire: this is your invocation."

I shall now bring forward the whole of the texts in which the word brāhmăṇa, which, no doubt, originally meant a son, or descendant, of a brāhmăn, occurs in the Rig-veda.[25] They are the following:

i. 164, 45. Chatvāri vāk parimitā padāni tāni vidur brāhmaṇāḥ ye manīshiṇaḥ | guhā trīṇi nihitā na ingayanti turīyam vācho manushyāḥ vadanti |

"Speech consists of four defined grades. These are known by those brāhmans who are wise. They do not reveal the three which are esoteric. Men speak the fourth grade of speech."

This text is quoted and commented upon in Nirukta xiii. 9.

vi. 75, 10. Brāhmaṇāsaḥ pitaraḥ somyāsaḥ śive no dyāvā-pṛithivī anehasā | Pūshā naḥ pātu duritād ṛitāvridhaḥ . . . . |

"May the brāhman fathers, drinkers of soma, may the auspicious, the sinless, heaven and earth, may Pūshan, preserve us, who prosper by righteousness, from evil, etc."

[25] There are two more texts in which the word brāhmaṇa is found, viz. i. 15, 5, and ii. 36, 5, on which see the following note. The word brahmaputra (compare Aśv. S'. S. ii. 18, 13) "son of a brahman," is found in ii. 43, 2: Udgātā iva śakune sāma gāyasi brāhmă-putraḥ iva savaneshu śaṁsasi | "Thou, o bird, singest a sāma verse like an udgātṛi; thou singest praises like the son of a brāhmăn at the libations." (Ind. Stud. ix. 342 ff.) Vipra, used in later Sanskrit as synonymous with Brāhman, has in the R.V. the sense of "wise," "sage" assigned by Nigh. 3, 15 (=medhāvi-nāma), and in Nir. 10, 19,=medhāvinaḥ. It is often applied as an epithet to the gods.

vii. 103, 1 (= Nirukta 9, 6). Saṁvatsaraṁ śaśayānāḥ brāhmaṇāḥ vrata-chāriṇaḥ | vācham Parjanya-jinvitām pra maṇḍūkāḥ avādishuḥ . . . . | 7. Brāhmaṇāso atirātre na some saro na pūrṇam abhito vadantaḥ | saṁvatsarasya tad ahaḥ pari shṭha yad maṇḍūkāḥ prāvṛishīṇam babhūva | 8. Brāhmaṇāsaḥ somino vācham akrata brahma kṛiṇvantaḥ parivatsarīṇam | adhvaryavo gharmiṇaḥ sishvidānāḥ āvir bhavanti guhyā na ke chit |

"After lying quiet for a year, those rite-fulfilling brāhmans[26] the frogs have (now) uttered their voice, which has been inspired by Parjanya . . . . 7. Like brāhmans at the Atirātra soma rite, like (those brāhmans) speaking round about the full pond (or soma-bowl[27]), you, frogs, surround (the pond) on this day of the year, which is that of the autumnal rains. 8. These soma-offering brāhmans (the frogs) have uttered their voice, performing their annual devotion (brahma); these adhvaryu priests sweating with their boiled oblations (or in the hot season) come forth from their retreats like persons who have been concealed."

x. 16, 6. Yat te kṛishṇaḥ śakunaḥ ātutoda pipīlaḥ sarpaḥ uta vā śvāpadaḥ | Agnis tad viśvād agadaṁ karotu Somaś cha yo brāhmaṇān āviveśa |

"Whatever part of thee any black bird, or ant, or serpent, or wild beast has mutilated, may Agni cure thee of all that, and Soma who has entered into the brāhmans."[28]

[26] In the Nighantus, iii. 13, these words brāhmaṇāḥ vrata-chāriṇaḥ are referred to as conveying the sense of a simile, though they are unaccompanied by a particle of similitude. In his Illustrations of the Nirukta, p. 126, Roth thus remarks on this passage: "This is the only place in the first nine mandalas of the R.V. in which the word Brāhmaṇa is found with its later sense, whilst the tenth mandala offers a number of instances. This is one of the proofs that many of the hymns in this book were composed considerably later (than the rest of the R.V.). The word brāhmaṇa has another signification in i. 15, 5; ii. 36, 5; and vi. 75, 10." (In the first of these texts, Roth assigns to the word the sense of the Brāhman's soma-vessel. See his Lexicon, s.v. It does not appear what meaning he would give to the word in vi. 75, 10. He has in this passage overlooked R.V. i. 164, 45, which, however, is duly adduced in his Lexicon). See Wilson's translation of the hymn; as also Müller's, in his Anc. Sansk. Lit. p. 494 f.

[27] Saras. See R.V. viii. 66, 4, quoted in Nirukta, v. 11, where Yāska says, "The ritualists inform us that at the mid-day oblation there are thirty uktha platters destined for one deity, which are then drunk at one draught. These are here called saras." (Compare Roth's Illustrations on the passage. See also R.V. vi. 17, 11, and viii. 7, 10, with Sāyaṇa's explanations of all three passages).

[28] Compare A.V. vii. 115, 1 f.; xii. 5, 6.

x. 71, 1.[29] Bṛihaspate prathamam vāco agraṁ yat prairata nāmadheyaṁ dadhānāḥ | yad eshāṁ śreshṭhaṁ yad aripram asīt preṇā tad eshāṁ nihitaṁ guhā āviḥ | 2. (= Nirukta iv. 10) Saktum iva titaünā punanto yatra dhīrāḥ manasā vācham akrata | atra sakhāyaḥ sakhyāni jānate bhadrā eshāṁ lakshmīr nihitā adhi vāchi | 3. Yajnena vāchaḥ padavīyam āyan tām anv avindann ṛishishu pravishṭām | tām ābhṛitya vi adadhuḥ purutrā tāṁ sapta rebhāḥ abhi saṁ navante | 4. (= Nir. i. 19) Uta tvaḥ paśyan na dadarśa vācham uta tvaḥ śṛiṇvan na śṛiṇoti enām | uto tvasmai tanvaṁ vi sasre jāyā iva patye uśatī suvāsāḥ | 5. (= Nir. i. 20) Uta tvaṁ sakhye sthirapītam āhur na enaṁ hinvanty api vājineshu | adhenvā charati māyayā esha vācham śuśruvān aphalām apushpām | 6. Yas tityāja sachi-vidaṁ sakhāyaṁ na tasya vāchi api bhāgo asti | yad īṁ śṛiṇoti alakaṁ śṛiṇoti na hi praveda sukṛitasya panthāṁ | 7. Akshaṇvantaḥ karṇavantaḥ sakhāyo manojaveshu asamāḥ babhūvuḥ | ādaghnāsaḥ upakakshāsaḥ u tve hradāḥ iva snātvāḥ u tve dadṛiśre | 8. (= Nir. xiii. 13) Hṛidā tashṭeshu manaso javeshu yad brāhmaṇāḥ saṁyajante sakhāyaḥ | atra aha tvaṁ vi jahur vedyābhir ohabrahmāṇo vi charanti u tve | 9. Ime ye na arvāṅ na paraś charanti na brāhmaṇāso na sute-karāsaḥ | te ete vācham abhipadya pāpayā sirīs tantraṁ tanvate aprajajnayaḥ | 10. Sarve nandanti yaśasā āgatena sabhā-sahena sakhyā sakhāyaḥ | kilbisha-spṛit pitu-shaṇir hi eshām araṁ hito bhavati vājināya | 11. (= Nir. i. 8) Ṛichām tvaḥ posham āste pupushvān gāyatraṁ tvo gāyati śakvarīshu | brahmā tvo vadati jāta-vidyāṁ yajnasya mātrāṁ vi mimīte u tvaḥ |

"When, o Bṛihaspati, men first sent forth the earliest utterance of speech, giving a name (to things), then all that was treasured within them, most excellent and pure, was disclosed through love. 2. Wherever the wise,—as if cleansing meal with a sieve,—have uttered speech with intelligence, there friends recognize acts of friendliness; good fortune dwells in their speech.[30] 3. Through sacrifice they came upon [29] I cannot pretend that I am satisfied with some parts of the translation I have attempted of this very difficult hymn; but I give it such as it is, as the interpretation of the Vedic poems is still to a certain extent tentative. Verses 4 and 5 are explained in Sāyaṇa's Introduction to the Rig-veda, pp. 30 f. of Müller's edition. I am indebted here, as elsewhere, to Prof. Aufrecht for his suggestions.

[30] I quote here, as somewhat akin to this hymn, another from the A.V. vi. 108, being a prayer for wisdom or intelligence: 1. Tvaṁ no medhe prathamā gobhir aśvebhir ā gahi | tvaṁ sūryasya raśmibhis tvaṁ no asi yajniyā | 2. Medhām aham prathamām

the track of speech, and found her entered into the rishis. Taking, they divided her into many parts:[31] the seven poets celebrate her in concert. 4. And one man, seeing, sees not speech, and another, hearing, hears her not;[32] while to a third she discloses her form, as a loving well-dressed wife does to her husband. 5. They say that one man has a sure defence in (her[33]) friendship; he is not overcome even in the conflicts (of discussion). But that person consorts with a barren delusion who has listened to speech without fruit or flower. 6. He who abandons a friend who appreciates friendship, has no portion whatever in speech. All that he hears, he hears in vain, for he knows not the path of righteousness. 7. Friends gifted both with eyes and ears have proved unequal in mental efforts. Some have been (as waters) reaching to the face or armpit, while others have been seen like ponds in which one might bathe. 8. When brāhmans who are friends strive (?) together in efforts of the mind produced by the heart,[34] they leave one man behind through their acquirements, whilst others walk about boasting to be brāhmăns. (This is the sense Professor Aufrecht suggests for the word ohabrāhmānaḥ. Professor Roth s.v. thinks it may mean "real priests." The author of Nirukta xiii. 13, explains it as meaning "reasoning priests," or "those of whom reasoning is the sacred science.") 9. The men who range neither near nor far, who are neither (reflecting) brāhmans nor yet pious worshippers at libations,—these, having acquired speech, frame their web imperfectly, (like) female brahmaṇvatīm brahma-jūtām ṛishishṭutām | prapītām brahmachāribhir devānām avase huve | 3. Yām medhām Ṛibhavo vidur yām medhām asurāḥ viduḥ | ṛishayo bhadrām medhāṁ yāṁ vidus tām mayy ā veśayāmasi | 4. Yām ṛishayo bhūta-kṛito medhām medhāvino viduḥ | tayā mām adya medhayā Agne medhāvinaṁ kṛiṇu | 5. Medhāṁ sāyam medhām prātar medhām madhyandinam pari | medhāṁ sūryasya raśmibhir vachasā" veśayāmahe 1. "Come to us, wisdom, the first, with cows and horses; (come) thou with the rays of the sun; thou art to us an object of worship. 2. To (obtain) the succour of the gods, I invoke wisdom the first, full of prayer, inspired by prayer, praised by rishis, imbibed by Brahmachārins. 3. We introduce within me that wisdom which Ṛibhus know, that wisdom which divine beings (asurāḥ) know, that excellent wisdom which rishis know. 4. Make me, o Agni, wise to-day with that wisdom which the wise rishis — the makers of things existing — know. 5. We introduce wisdom in the evening, wisdom in the morning, wisdom at noon, wisdom with the rays of the sun, and with speech" (vachasā). Regarding the ṛishayo bhūtakṛitaḥ see above, p. 37, note.

[31] Compare x. 125, 3; i. 164, 45; (x. 90, 11); and A.V. xii. 1, 45.

[32] Compare Isaiah vi. 9, 10; and St. Matthew xiii. 14, 15.

[33] Vāk-sakhye, Yāska.

[34] Compare i. 171, 2; ii. 35, 2; vi. 16, 47.

weavers,[35] being destitute of skill. 10. All friends rejoice at the arrival of a renowned friend who rules the assembly; for such a one, repelling evil, and bestowing nourishment upon them, is thoroughly prepared for the conflict (of discussion). 11. One man possesses a store of verses (ṛichām); a second sings a hymn (gāyatra) during (the chanting of) the śakvarīs; one who is a brāhmăn declares the science of being (jāta-vidyām), whilst another prescribes the order of the ceremonial." [36]

R.V. x. 88, 19 (= Nir. vii. 31). Yāvan-mātram ushaso na pratīkaṁ suparṇyo vasate Mātariśvaḥ | tāvad dadhāti upa yajnam āyan brāhmaṇo hotur avaro nishīdan |

"As long as the fair-winged Dawns do not array themselves in light, o Mātariśvan, so long the brāhman coming to the sacrifice, keeps (the fire), sitting below the hotṛi-priest."

(See Professor Roth's translation of this verse in his Illustrations of the Nirukta, p. 113).

x. 90, 11 (= A.V. xix. 5, 6; Vaj. S. xxxi.). See above, pp. 8–15.

x. 97, 22. Oshadhayaḥ saṁvadante Somena saha rājnā | yasmai kṛiṇoti brāhmaṇas taṁ rājan parayāmasi |

"The plants converse with king Soma,[37] (and say), for whomsoever a brāhman acts (kṛiṇoti, officiates), him, o king, we deliver."

x. 109, 1. Te 'vadan prathamāḥ brahma-kilbishe akūpāraḥ salilo Mātariśvā | vīḷuharās tapa ugro mayobhūr āpo devīr prathamajāḥ ṛitena | Soma rājā prathamo brahma-jāyām punaḥ prāyachhad ahṛiṇīyamānaḥ | anvartitā Varuṇo Mitraḥ āsīd Agnir hotā hastagṛihya ninīya | 3. Hastena eva grāhyaḥ ādhir asyāḥ "brahma-jāyā iyam" iti cha id avochan | na dūtāya prahye tasthe eshā tathā rāshṭraṁ gupitaṁ kshattriyasya | 4. Devāḥ etasyām avadanta pūrve sapta ṛishayas tapase ye nisheduḥ | bhīmā jāyā brāhmaṇasya upanītā durdhāṁ dadhāti parame vyoman |

[35] Such is the sense which Prof. Aufrecht thinks may, with probability, be assigned to sirīs, a word which occurs only here.

[36] According to Yāska (Nir. i. 8), these four persons are respectively the hotṛi, udgātṛi, brahman, and adhvaryu priests. The brahman, he says, being possessed of all science, ought to know everything; and gives utterance to his knowledge as occasion arises for it (jāte jāte). See Dr. Haug's remarks on this verse, Ait. Br. Introd. p. 20.

[37] Compare oshadhīḥ Soma-rājnīḥ, "the plants whose king is Soma," in verses 18 and 19 of this hymn.

5. Brahmachārī charati vevishad vishaḥ sa devānām bhavati ekam angam | tena jāyām anv avindad Bṛihaspatiḥ Somena nītām juhvam̃ na devāḥ | 6. Punar vai devāḥ adaduḥ punar manushyāḥ uta | rājānaḥ satyam̃ kṛiṇvānāḥ brahma-jāyām punar daduḥ | 7. Punardāya brahma-jāyām kṛitvī devair nikilbisham | ūrjam pṛithivyāḥ bhaktvāya urugāyam upāsate |

"These (deities), the boundless, liquid Mātariśvan (Air), the fiercely-flaming, ardently-burning, beneficent (Fire), and the divine primeval Waters, first through righteousness exclaimed against the outrage on a brāhmăn. 2. King Soma,[38] unenvious, first gave back the brāhmăn's wife; Varuṇa and Mitra were the inviters; Agni, the invoker, brought her, taking her hand. 3. When restored, she had to be received back by the hand, and they then proclaimed aloud, 'This is the brāhmăn's wife;' she was not committed to a messenger to be sent:—in this way it is that the kingdom of a ruler (or Kshattriya) remains secured to him.[39] 4. Those ancient deities, the Rishis, who sat down to perform austerities, spoke thus of her, 'Terrible is the wife of the brāhmăn; when approached, she plants confusion in the highest heaven.[40] 5. The Brahmachārin[41] (religious student) continues to perform observances. He becomes one member[42] of the gods. Through him Bṛihaspati obtained his wife, as the gods obtained the ladle which was brought by Soma. 6. The gods gave her back, and men gave her back; kings, performing righteousness, gave back the brāhmăn's wife. 7. Giving back the brāhmăn's wife, delivering themselves from sin against the gods, (these kings) enjoy the abundance of the earth, and possess a free range of movement."

[38] Compare R.V. x. 85, 39 ff. (=A.V. xiv. 2, 2 ff.) Punaḥ patnīm Agnir adād āyushā saha varchasā | dīrghāyur asyāḥ yaḥ patir jīvāti śaradaḥ śatam | 40. Somāḥ prathamo vivide Gandharvo vivide uttaraḥ (the A.V. reads: Somasya jāyā prathamam̃ Gandharvas te 'paraḥ patiḥ) | tṛitīyo Agnish ṭe patis turīyas te manushyajāḥ | Somo dadad Gandharvāya Gandharvo dadad Agnaye | rayim̃ cha putrām̃s chādād Agnir mahyam atho imām | "Agni gave back the wife with life and splendour: may he who is her husband live to an old age of 100 years! Soma was thy first, the Gandharva was thy second, Agni thy third, husband; thy fourth is one of human birth. Soma gave her to the Gandharva, the Gandharva to Agni, Agni gave me wealth and sons, and then this woman." The idea contained in this passage may possibly be referred to in the verse before us (x. 109, 2).

[39] I am indebted to Prof. Aufrecht for this explanation of the verse.

[40] See R.V. i. 164, 34, 35, above.

[41] See my paper on the Progress of the Vedic Religion, in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society for 1865, pp. 374 ff.

[42] See A.V. x. 7, 1 ff.; 9, 26.

This hymn is repeated in the Atharva-veda with the addition of ten more verses which I shall quote in the next section.

I shall here state summarily the remarks suggested by a perusal of the texts which I have quoted, and the conclusions which they appear to authorize regarding the relation of the Vedic poets and priests to the other classes of the Indian community at the time when the earlier hymns of the Rig-veda were composed.

First: Except in the Purusha Sūkta (translated above in pp. 9 ff.) there is no distinct reference in the hymns to any recognised system of four castes.

Second: In one text (iii. 34, 9, see p. 176) where mention is made of the Āryan "colour," or "race," all the upper classes of the Indian community are comprehended under one designation, as the Kshattriyas and Vaiśyas as well as the Brāhmans were always in after-times regarded as Āryas (see above, p. 176.)

Third: The term brāhmaṇa occurs only in eight hymns of the Rig-veda, besides the Purusha Sūkta, whilst brāhmăn occurs in forty-six. The former of these words could not therefore have been in common use at the time when the greater part of the hymns were composed. The term rājanya is found only in the Purusha Sūkta; and kshattriya in the sense of a person belonging to a royal family, a noble, occurs only in a few places, such as x. 109, 3.[43] The terms Vaiśya and Śūdra are only found in the Purusha Sūkta, although viś, from which the former is derived, is of frequent occurrence in the sense of "people" (see p. 14, above).

Fourth: The word brāhmăn, as we have seen, appears to have had at first the sense of "sage," "poet;" next, that of "officiating priest;" and ultimately that of a "special description of priest."

Fifth: In some of the texts which have been quoted (particularly i. 108, 7; iv. 50, 8 f.; viii. 7, 20; viii. 45, 39; viii. 53, 7; viii. 81, 30; ix. 112, 1; x. 85, 29) brāhmăn seems to designate a "priest by profession."

Sixth: In other places the word seems rather to imply something peculiar to the individual, and to denote a person distinguished for genius or virtue (x. 107, 6), or elected by special divine favour to receive the gift of inspiration (x. 125, 5).

[43] This text is quoted above. In viii. 104, 13, Kshattriya is perhaps a neuter substantive: Na vai u Somo vṛijinam hinoti na kshattriyam mithuyā dhārayantam | "Soma does not prosper the sinner, nor the man who wields royal power deceitfully."

Seventh: Brāhmāṇa appears to be equivalent to brāhmă-putra, "the son of a brāhmăn" (which, as we have seen, occurs in ii. 43, 2), and the employment of such a term seems necessarily to presuppose that, at the time when it began to become current, the function of a brāhmăn, the priesthood, had already become a profession.

The Rig-veda Sanhitā contains a considerable number of texts in which the large gifts of different kinds bestowed by different princes on the authors of the hymns are specified, and these instances of bounty are eulogized.

Of these passages R.V. i. 125; i. 126; v. 27; v. 30, 12 ff.; v. 61, 10; vi. 27, 8; vi. 45, 31 ff.; vi. 47, 22 ff. may be consulted in Prof. Wilson's translation; and a version of R.V. x. 107, which contains a general encomium on liberality will be found in the article entitled "Miscellaneous Hymns from the Rig- and Atharva-vedas," in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society for 1866, p. 32 f. The following further texts, which describe the presents given by different princes to the rishis, viz. vii. 18, 22 ff.; viii. 3, 21 ff.; viii. 4, 19 ff.; viii. 5, 37 ff.; viii. 6, 46 ff.; viii. 19, 36 f.; viii. 21, 17 f.; viii. 24, 29 f.; viii. 46, 21 ff.; viii. 54, 10 ff.; viii. 57, 14 ff.; x. 33, 4 ff.; x. 62, 6 ff.; x. 93, 14 f. are translated in the article "On the relations of the priests to the other classes of Indian Society in the Vedic age" in the same Journal for 1866, pp. 272 ff., to which I refer.

On the other hand the hymns of the Rig-veda contain numerous references to persons who, if not hostile, were at least indifferent and inattentive to the system of worship which the rishis professed and inculcated; and niggardly in their offerings to the gods and their gifts to the priests. The article to which I have just referred contains (pp. 286 ff.) a long list of such passages, from which I extract the following:

i. 84, 7. Yaḥ ekaḥ id vidayate vasu marttāya dāśushe | īśāno apratishkutaḥ Indro anga | 8. Kadā martyam arādhasam padā kshumpam iva sphurat | kadā naḥ śuśruvad giraḥ Indro anga |

"Indra, who alone distributes riches to the sacrificing mortal, is lord and irresistible. 8. When will Indra crush the illiberal man like a bush with his foot? when will he hear our hymns?"

i. 101, 4. . . . vīḷoś chid Indro yo asunvato vadhaḥ . . . |

"Indra, who is the slayer of him, however strong, who offers no libations."

i. 122, 9. Jano yo Mitrā-varuṇāv abhidhrug apo na vāṁ sunoti akshṇayādhruk | svayaṁ sa yakshmaṁ hṛidaye ni dhatte āpa yad īṁ hotrābhir ṛitāvā |

"The hostile man, the malicious enemy, who pours out no libations to you, o Mitra and Varuṇa, plants fever in his own heart, when the pious man has by his offerings obtained (your blessing)."

i. 125, 7. Mā priṇanto duritam enaḥ ā aran mā jārishuḥ sūrayaḥ suvratāsaḥ | anyas teshām paridhir astu kaś chid apriṇantam abhi saṁ yantu śokāḥ |

"Let not the liberal suffer evil or calamity; let not devout sages decay; let them have some further term; let griefs befall the illiberal (apriṇantam).

i. 182, 3. Kim atra dasrā kṛiṇuthaḥ kim āsāthe jano yaḥ kaśchid ahavir mahīyate | ati kramishṭam juratam paṇer asum jyotir viprāya kṛiṇutaṁ vachasyave |

"What do ye here, o powerful (Aśvins)? why do ye sit (in the house of) a man who offers no oblation, and (yet) is honoured? Assail, wear away the breath of the niggard, and create light for the sage who desires to extol you."

ii. 23, 4. Sunītibhir nayasi trāyase janaṁ yas tubhyaṁ dāśad na tam aṁho aśnavat | brahma-dvishas tapano manyumīr asi Bṛihaspate mahi tat te mahitvanam |

"By thy wise leadings thou guidest and protectest the man who worships thee; no calamity can assail him. Thou art the vexer of him who hates devotion (brahma-dvishaḥ), and the queller of his wrath: this, o Bṛihaspati, is thy great glory."

iv. 25, 6. . . . na asushver āpir na sakhā na jāmir dushprāvyo avahantā id avāchaḥ | 7. Na revatā paṇinā sakhyam Indro asunvatā sutapāḥ saṁ gṛiṇīte | ā asya vedaḥ khidati hanti nagnaṁ vi sushvaye paktaye kevalo 'bhūt |

"Indra is not the relation or friend or kinsman of the man who offers no libations; he is the destroyer of the prostrate irreligious man. 7. Indra, the soma-drinker, accepts not friendship with the wealthy niggard who makes no soma-libations; but robs him of his riches, and slays him when stripped bare, whilst he is the exclusive patron of the man who pours out soma and cooks oblations."

vi. 44, 11. . . . jahi asushvīn pra vṛiha apriṇataḥ |

"Slay (o Indra) those who offer no libations; root out the illiberal.'

viii. 53, 1. Út tvā mandantu stomāḥ kṛiṇushva rādho adrivaḥ | ava brahma-dvisho jahi | pādā paṇīn arādhaso ni badhasva mahān asi | na hi tvā kaśchana prati |

"Let our hymns gladden thee; give us wealth, o thunderer. Slay the haters of devotion. 2. Crush with thy foot the niggards who bestow nothing. Thou art great; no one is comparable to thee."

It seems evident, then, from these texts (and there are many more of the same tenor), that the irreligious man, the parcus deorum cultor et infrequens, was by no means a rare character among the Āryas of the Vedic age, and that the priests often found no little difficulty in drawing forth the liberality of their contemporaries towards themselves and in enforcing a due regard to the ceremonials of devotion. And if we consider, on the other hand, that the encomiums on the liberality of different princes to the poets and priests which are contained in the passages to which I before adverted, are the production of the class whose pretensions they represent, and whose dignity they exalt, we shall, no doubt, see reason to conclude that the value of the presents bestowed has been enormously exaggerated, and make some deduction from the impression which these texts are calculated to convey of the estimation in which the priests were held at the time when they were composed. But after every allowance has been made for such considerations, and for the state of feeling indicated by the complaints of irreligion and illiberality of which I have cited specimens, it will remain certain that the brāhmăn, whether we look upon him as a sage and poet, or as an officiating priest, or in both capacities, was regarded with respect and reverence, and even that his presence had begun to be considered as an important condition of the efficacy of the ceremonial. Thus, as we have already seen, in i. 164, 35, the brāhmăn is described as the highest heaven of "speech;" in x. 107, 6, a liberal patron is called a rishi and a brāhmăn, as epithets expressive of the most distinguished eulogy; in x. 125, 5, the goddess Vāch is said to make the man who is the object of her special affection a brāhmăn and a rishi; in vi. 45 7; vii. 7, 5; viii. 16, 7; and ix. 96, 6, the term brāhmăn is applied honorifically to the gods Indra, Agni, and Soma; in iv. 50, 8, 9, great prosperity is declared to attend the prince by whom a brăhmăn is employed, honoured, and succoured; and in iii. 53, 9, 12; v. 2, 6; vii. 33, 2, 3, 5; and vii. 83, 4, the highest efficacy is ascribed to the intervention and intercession of this class of functionaries.

Again, whatever exaggeration we may suppose in the texts which eulogize the liberality of princely patrons, in regard to the value of the presents bestowed, there is no reason to doubt that the ministers of public worship, who possessed the gift of expression and of poetry, who were the depositaries of all sacred science, and who were regarded as the channels of access to the gods, would be largely rewarded and honoured.[44]

[44] It is to be observed that, in these eulogies of liberality, mention is nowhere made of Brāhmans as the recipients of the gifts. In two places, viii. 4, 20, and x. 33, 4, a rishi is mentioned as the receiver. In later works, such as the S'atapatha Brāhmaṇa, on the contrary, the presents are distinctly connected with Brāhmans. Thus it is said in that work, ii. 2, 2, 6: Dvayāḥ vai devāḥ devāḥ aha eva devāḥ atha ye brāhmaṇāḥ śuśruvāṁso 'nūchānās te manushya-devāḥ | teshāṁ dvedhā vibhaktaḥ eva yajnaḥ āhutayaḥ eva devānāṁ dakshiṇāḥ manushya-devānām brāhmaṇānām śuśruvushām anūchānānām | āhutibhir eva devān prīṇāti dakshiṇābhir manushya-devān brāhmaṇān śuśruvusho 'nūchānān | te enam ubhaye devāḥ prītāḥ sudhāyāṁ dadhati | "Two kinds of gods are gods, viz. the gods (proper), whilst those Brāhmans who have the Vedic tradition, and are learned, are the human gods. The worship (yajna) of these is divided into two kinds. Oblations constitute the worship offered to the gods, and presents (dakshiṇā) that offered to the human gods, the Brāhmans, who possess the Vedic tradition and are learned. It is with oblations that a man gratifies the gods, and with presents that he gratifies the human gods, the Brāhmans, who possess the Vedic tradition, and are learned. Both these two kinds of gods, when gratified, place him in a state of happiness" (sudhāyām); (or "convey him to the heavenly world," as the expression is varied in the parallel passage of the same work, iv. 3, 4, 4). It is similarly said in the Taitt. Sanh. i. 7, 3, 1: Parokshaṁ vai anye devāḥ ijyante pratyaksham anye | yad yajate ye eva devāḥ paroksham ijyante tān eva tad yajati | yad anvāhāryam āharaty ete vai devāḥ pratyaksham yad brāhmaṇās tān eva tena prīṇāti | atho dakshiṇā eva asya eshā | atho yajnasya eva chhidram apidadhāti yad vai yajnasya krūram yad vilishṭam tad anvāhāryeṇa anvāharati | tad anvāhāryasya anvāhāryatvam | devadūtāḥ vai ete yad ṛitvijo yad anvāhāryam āharati devadūtān eva prīṇāti | "Some gods are worshipped in their absence, and others in their presence. It is to those gods who are worshipped in their absence that the sacrificer offers the oblation which he presents. And it is these gods who are visible, i.e. the Brāhmans, whom he gratifies with the anvāhārya (present of cooked rice) which he afterwards brings. Now this anvāhārya is the present (dakshiṇā) connected with it (the sacrifice). Then he covers over the faults of the sacrifice. Whatever in it is excessive or defective, that he removes by means of the anvāhārya. In this consists the nature of that offering. These officiating priests are the messengers of the gods; and it is the messengers of the gods whom the sacrificer gratifies with this anvāhārya gift which he presents."

It is further clear, from some of the texts quoted above (ii. 1, 2; iv. 9, 3; x. 52, 2), as well as i. 162, 5, and from the contents of hymns ii. 36; ii. 37; ii. 43; and x. 124, 1,[45] that in the later part of the Vedic era, to which these productions are probably to be assigned, the ceremonial of worship had become highly developed and complicated, and that different classes of priests were required for its proper celebration.[46] It is manifest that considerable skill must have been required for the due performance of these several functions; and as such skill could only be acquired by early instruction and by practice, there can be little doubt that the priesthood must at that period have become a regular profession.[47] The distinction of king or noble and priest appears to be recognized in i. 108, 7, as well as in iv. 50, 8, 9; whilst in v. 47, 7, 14, a similar distinction is made between king and rishi; and it is noticeable that the verse, in other respects nearly identical, with which the 36th and 37th hymns of the eight maṇḍala respectively conclude, ends in the one hymn with the words, "Thou alone, Indra, didst deliver Trasadasyu in the conflict of men, magnifying prayers" (brahmāṇi vardhayan); whilst in the other the last words are, "magnifying (royal) powers" (kshattrāṇi vardhayan), as if the former contained a reference to the functions of the priest, and the latter to those of the prince. (Compare viii. 35, 16, 17.)

While, however, there thus appears to be every reason for supposing that towards the close of the Vedic period the priesthood had become a profession, the texts which have been quoted, with the exception of the verse in the Purusha Sūkta (x. 90, 12), do not contain anything which necessarily implies that the priests formed an exclusive caste, or, at least, a caste separated from all others by insurmountable barriers, as in later times. There is a wide difference between a profession, or even a hereditary order, and a caste in the fully developed Brahmanical sense.

[45] See also i. 94, 6, where it is said: "Thou (Agni) art an adhvaryu, and the earliest hotṛi, a praśāstṛi, a potṛi, and by nature a purohita. Knowing all the priestly functions (ārtvijyā) wise, thou nourishest us," etc. (tvam adhvaryur uta hotā 'si pūrvyaḥ praśāstā potā janushā purohitaḥ | viśvā vidvān ārtijyā dhīra pushyasy Agne ity ādi).

[46] See Prof. Müller's remarks on this subject, Anc. Sansk. Lit. pp. 485 ff.; and Dr. Haug's somewhat different view of the same matter in his Introd. to Ait. Br. pp. 11 ff.

[47] In regard to the great importance and influence of the priests, see Müller's Anc. Sansk. Lit. pp. 485 ff.

Even in countries where the dignity and exclusive prerogatives of the priesthood are most fully recognized (as in Roman Catholic Europe), the clergy form only a profession, and their ranks may be recruited from all sections of the community. So, too, is it in most countries, even with a hereditary nobility. Plebeians may be ennobled at the will of the sovereign. There is, therefore, no difficulty in supposing that in the Vedic era the Indian priesthood—even if we suppose its members to have been for the most part sprung from priestly families—may have often admitted aspirants to the sacerdotal character from other classes of their countrymen. Even the employment of the word brāhmaṇa in the Rig-veda does not disprove this. This term, derived from brahman, "priest," need not, as already intimated, signify anything further than the son or descendant of a priest (the word brahmaputra, "son of a priest," is, as we have seen, actually used in one text),—just as the rājanya means nothing more than the descendant of a king or chief (rājan), a member of the royal family, or of the nobility.

The paucity of the texts (and those, too, probably of a date comparatively recent) in which the word brāhmaṇa occurs, when contrasted with the large number of those in which brăhmăn is found, seems, as I have already observed, to prove conclusively that the former word was but little employed in the earlier part of the Vedic era, and only came into common use towards its close. In some of these passages (as in vii. 103, 1, 7, 8; x. 88, 19) there is nothing to shew that the Brāhman is alluded to as anything more than a professional priest, and in vii. 103, the comparison of frogs to Brāhmans may seem even to imply a want of respect for the latter and their office.[48] In other places (i. 164, 45, and x. 71, 8, 9) a distinction appears to be drawn between intelligent and unintelligent Brāhmans, between such as were thoughtful and others who were mere mechanical instruments in carrying on the ceremonial of worship,[49] which, certainly points to the existence of a sacerdotal class. In another passage (x. 97, 22) the importance of a Brāhman to the proper performance of religious rites appears to be clearly expressed. In x. 109, where the words brăhmăn (passim) and brāh-

[48] See Müller's remarks on this hymn in his Anc. Sansk. Lit. p. 494.

[49] In R.V. viii. 50, 9, it is said: "Whether an unwise or a wise man, o Indra, has offered to thee a hymn, he has gladdened (thee) through his devotion to thee (avipro vā yad avidhad vipro vā Indra te vachaḥ | sa pra mamandat tvāyā ity ādi)."

maṇa (in verse 4) seem to be used interchangeably—the inviolability of Brāhman's wives, the peril of interfering with them, and the blessing attendant on reparation for any outrage committed against them, are referred to in such a way as to shew at once the loftiness of the claim set up by the Brāhmans on their own behalf, and to prove that these pretensions were frequently disregarded by the nobles. In x. 16, 6, the Brāhmans are spoken of as inspired by Soma, and in vi. 75, 10, the manes of earlier Brāhmans are reckoned among those divine beings who have power to protect the suppliant. But in none of these texts is any clear reference made to the Brāhmans as constituting an exclusive caste or race, and nothing whatever is said about their being descended from an ancestor distinct from those of the other classes of their countrymen.

SECT. II.—Quotations from the Rig-veda, the Nirukta, the Mahābhārata, and other works, to shew that according to ancient Indian tradition, persons not of priestly families were authors of Vedic hymns, and exercised priestly functions.

But in addition to the negative evidence adduced in the preceding section, that during the age to which the greater part of the hymns of the Rig-veda are referable, the system of castes had, to say the least, not yet attained its full development, we find also a considerable amount of proof in the hymns themselves, or in later works, or from a comparison of both, that many of the hymns either were, or from a remote antiquity were believed to be, the productions of authors not of sacerdotal descent; and that some of these persons also acted as priests. The most signal instance of this kind is that of Viśvāmitra; but from the abundance of the materials which exist for its illustration I shall reserve it for the next chapter, where I shall treat of the contests between the Brāhmans and the Kshattriyas.

In later times, when none but Brāhman priests were known, it seemed to be an unaccountable, and—as contradicting the exclusive sacerdotal pretensions of the Brāhmans—an inconvenient circumstance, that priestly functions should have been recorded as exercised by persons whom tradition represented as Rājanyas; and it therefore became necessary to explain away the historical facts, by inventing miraculous legends to make it appear that these men of the royal order had been in reality transformed into Brāhmans, as the reward of their superhuman merits and austerities—an idea of which we shall meet with various illustrations in the sequel. The very existence, however, of such a word as rājarshi, or "royal rishi," proves that Indian tradition recognized as rishis or authors of Vedic hymns persons who were considered to belong to Rājanya families. A number of such are named (though without the epithet of rājarshi) in the Anukramaṇikā or index to the Rig-veda; but Sāyaṇa, who quotes that old document, gives them this title. Thus, in the introduction to hymn i. 100, he says: Atra anukramyate "sa yo vṛishā 'ekonā Vārshāgirāḥ Ṛijrāśvāmbarīsha-Sahadeva-Bhayamāna-Surādhasaḥ" iti | Vṛishāgiro mahārājasya putrabhūtāḥ Ṛijrāśvādayaḥ pancha rājarshayaḥ sadehaṁ sūktaṁ dadṛiśuḥ | atas te asya sūktasya ṛishayaḥ | uktaṁ hy ārshānukramaṇyām "sūktaṁ sa yo vṛishety etat pancha Vārshāgirāḥ viduḥ | niyuktāḥ nāmadheyaiḥ svair api 'chaitat tyad' iti ṛichi" iti | "It is said in the Anukramaṇikā, 'Of this hymn (the rishis) are Ṛijrāśva, Ambarīsha, Sahadeva, Bhayamāna, and Surādhas, sons of Vṛishāgir.' Ṛijrāśva and others, sons of King Vṛishāgir, in all five rājarshis, saw this hymn in a bodily form. Hence they are its rishis (or seers). For it is declared in the Ārsha Anukramaṇī: 'The five sons of Vṛishāgir, who are mentioned by name in the verse beginning "this praise" (the 17th), know this hymn.'" The 17th verse is as follows: Etat tyat te Indra vṛishṇe ukthaṁ Vārshagirāḥ abhi gṛiṇanti rādhaḥ | Ṛijrāśvaḥ prashṭibhir Ambarīshaḥ Sahadevo Bhayamānaḥ Surādhāḥ | "This hymn the Vārshāgiras, Ṛijrāśva, with his attendants, and Ambarīsha, Sahadeva, Bhayamāna, and Surādhas, utter to thee, the vigorous, o Indra, as their homage;" on which Sāyaṇa repeats the remark that these persons were rājarshis (etad ukthaṁ stotraṁ rādhaḥ saṁrādhakaṁ tvat-priti-hetuṁ Vārshāgirāḥ Vṛishāgiro rājnaḥ putrāḥ Ṛijrāśvādayo 'bhi gṛiṇanti ābhimukhyena vadanti | .... Ṛijrāśvaḥ etat-sanjno rājarshiḥ prashṭibhiḥ pārśva-sthair anyair ṛishibhiḥ saha Indram astaut | ke te pārśva-sthāḥ | Ambarīshādayaś chatvāro rājarshayaḥ). Ambarīsha is also said to be the rishi of ix. 98. Again, "Trasadasyu, son of Purukutsa, a Rājarshi," is said by Sāyaṇa on R.V. iv. 42, to be the rishi of that hymn (Purukutsasya putras Trasadasyuḥ rājarshiḥ | .... atrānukramaṇikā 'mama dvitā' daśa Trasadasyuḥ Paurukutsyaḥ). In the 8th and 9th verses Trasadasyu is thus mentioned: Asmākam atra pitaras te āsan sapta ṛishayo Daurgahe badhyamāne | te ā

ayajanta Trasadasyum asyāḥ Indraṁ na vṛittraturam arddhadevam | 9. Purukutsānī hi vām adāśad havyebhir Indrā-varuṇā namobhiḥ | atha rājānaṁ Trasadasyum asyāḥ vṛittrahaṇaṁ dadathur arddhadevam | 8. "These seven rishis were our fathers. When the son of Durgaha was bound they gained by sacrifice for her (Purukutsānī) a son Trasadasyu, a slayer of foes, like Indra, a demigod. 9. Purukutsānī worshipped you, o Indra and Varuṇa, with salutations and obeisances; then ye gave her king Trasadasyu, a slayer of enemies, a demigod." I give Sāyaṇa's note on these verses: "Purukutsasya mahishī Daurgahe bandhana-sthite | patyāv arājakaṁ dṛishṭvā rāshṭram putrasya lipsayā | yadṛichchhayā samāyātān saptarshīn paryapūjayat | te cha prītāḥ punaḥ prochur 'yajendrā-varuṇau bhṛiśam' | sā chendra-varuṇāv ishṭvā Trasadasyum ajījanat | itihāsam imaṁ jānann ṛishir brūte ṛichāv iha" | atha asmākam atra asminn arājake deśe asyām pṛithivyāṁ vā pitaraḥ pālayitāraḥ utpādakās te āsann abhavan | ete saptarshayaḥ prasiddhāḥ Daurgahe Durgahasya putre Purukutse badhyamāne dṛiḍham pāśair yasmād asyāḥ asyai Purukutsānyai Trasadasyum āyajanta prādur Indrā-Varuṇayor anugrahāt | "'The queen of Purukutsa, when her husband, the son of Durgaha, was imprisoned, seeing the kingdom to be destitute of a ruler, and desirous of a son, of her own accord paid honour to the seven rishis who had arrived. And they, again, being pleased told her to sacrifice to Indra and Varuṇa. Having done so she bore Trasadasyu. Knowing this story, the rishi utters these two verses;'" which Sāyaṇa then explains. Similarly Sāyaṇa says on v. 27: "Tryaruṇa son of Trivṛishṇa, Trasadasyu son of Purukutsa, and Aśvamedha son of Bharata, these three kings conjoined, are the rishis of this hymn; or Atri is the rishi" (Atrānukramaṇikā | "Anasvantā shaṭ Traivṛishṇa-paurukutsyau dvau Tryaruṇa-Trasadasyū rājānau Bhārataś cha Aśvamedhaḥ | . . . . 'na ātmā ātmane dadyād' iti sarvāsv Atriṁ kechit" . . . Trivṛishṇasya putras Tryaruṇaḥ Purukutsasya putras Trasadasyur Bharatasya putro 'śvamedhaḥ ete trayo 'pi rājānaḥ sambhūya asya sūktasya ṛishayaḥ | yadvā Atrir eva ṛishiḥ). The Anukramaṇikā, however, adds that according to some, as "no one would give gifts to himself, none of the princes mentioned as donors could be the author; but Atri must be the rishi." As the hymn is spoken by a fourth person, in praise of the liberality of these kings, it is clear they cannot well be its authors. And a similar remark applies to iv. 42, 8 f. However, the Hindu tradition, being such as it is, is good proof that kings could, in conformity with ancient opinion, be rishis. Trasadasyu and Trayaruṇa are also mentioned as the rishis of ix. 110.[50] The rishis of iv. 43 and iv. 44 are declared by Sāyaṇa, and by the Anukramaṇikā, to be Purumīḷha, and Ajamīḷha, sons or descendants of Suhotra (iv. 43, Atrānukramaṇikā 'kaḥ u śaśvat' sapta Purumīḷhājamīḷhau Sauhotrau tv Āśvinaṁ hi | iv. 44, Purumīḷhājamīḷhāv eva ṛishī). Though these persons are not said by either of these authorities to be kings, yet in the Vishṇu and Bhāgavata Purāṇas the latter is mentioned as being of royal race, and a tribe of Brāhmans is said to have been descended from him (see above p. 227). In the sixth verse of iv. 44, the descendants of Ajamīḷha are said to have come to the worship of the Aśvins (naro yad vām Aśvinā stomam āvan sadhastutim Ajamīḷhāso agman). The following hymns, also, are said by tradition to have had the undermentioned kings for their rishis, viz.: vi. 15, Vītahavya (or Bharadvāja); x. 9, Sindhudvīpa, son of Ambarīsha (or Triśiras, son of Tvashṭṛi); x. 75, Sindhukshit, son of Priyamedha; x. 133, Sudās, son of Pijavana; x. 134, Māndhātṛi, son of Yuvanāśva (see above, p. 225); x. 179, Śibi, son of Uśīnara, Pratardana, son of Divodāsa and king of Kāśī (see above, p. 229), and Vasumanas, son of Rohidaśva; and x. 148 is declared to have had Pṛithī Vainya[51] as its rishi. In the fifth verse of that hymn it is said: Śrudhi havam Indra śūra Pṛithyāḥ uta stavase Venyasya arkaiḥ | "Hear, o heroic Indra, the invocation of Pṛithī; and thou art praised by the hymn of Venya." In viii. 9, 10, also, Pṛithī Vainya is mentioned at the same time with three rishis: Yad vāṁ Kakshīvān uta yad Vyaśvaḥ ṛishir yad vāṁ Dīrghatamāḥ juhāva | Pṛithī yad vāṁ Vainyaḥ sadaneshu eva id ato Aśvinā chetayethām | "Whatever oblation (or invocation) Kakshīvat has made to you, or the rishi Vyaśva, or Dīrghatamas, or Pṛithī, son of Vena, in the places of [50] In the Vishṇu Purāṇa, as we have seen above, p. 237, Trayyāruṇa, Pushkariṇ, and Kapi are said to have been sons of Urukshaya, and all of them to have become Brāhmans; and in the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, Trayyaruṇi, Pushkarāruṇi, and Kapi are said to have all become Brāhmans.

[51] The S'. P. Br. v. 3, 5, 4, refers to Pṛithī as "first of men who was installed as a king" (Pṛithī ha vai Vainyo manushyāṇām prathamo 'bhishishiche). I extract from Dr. Hall's edition of Prof. Wilson's Vishṇu Purāṇa, vol. iii. the following verse, adduced by the editor from the Vāyu Purāṇa about royal rishis: Mānave Vainave (?) vaṁśe Aiḍe vaṁśe cha ye nṛipāḥ | Aiḍā Aikshvākū Nābhāgā jneyā rājarshayas tu te | "Kings in the race of Manu, Vena (?), and Iḍa, the descendants of Iḍa, Ikshvāku, and Nabhāga are to be known as having been rājarshis."

sacrifice, take notice of that, o Aśvins." Here Sāyaṇa refers to Pṛithī as "the royal rishi of that name."

From the details I have supplied it is clear that in many cases the evidence is against the supposition that the princes to whom the hymns are ascribed were in reality their authors. The only instances in which the authorship seems to be established by the tenor of the hymns themselves are those of the Vārshagiras, or, at all events, that of Pṛithī. But, as has been already remarked, the fact that ancient Hindu tradition recognizes royal rishis as the authors of hymns is sufficient to prove that such cases were not unknown. Even if we were to suppose that flattery had any share in the creation of these traditions, it no doubt proceeded upon the belief of those who put them into circulation, that in earlier times the distinction between the priests and other classes was not so sharply defined as in their own day.

I proceed, however, to the case of Devāpi, in which the materials for forming a judgment are more adequate and satisfactory, and prove that he was not merely a rishi but an officiating priest.

In the Anukramaṇikā, R.V. x. 98 is ascribed to him as its author; and Yāska states as follows in the Nirukta, ii. 10:

Tatra itihāsam āchakshate | Devāpiś cha Ārshṭishenaḥ S'antanuś cha Kauravyau bhrātarau babhūvatuḥ | sa S'antanuḥ kanīyān abhishechayānchakre | Devāpis tapaḥ pratipede | tataḥ S'antanoḥ rājye dvādaśa varshāṇi devo na vavarsha | tam ūchur brāhmaṇāḥ "adharmas tvayā charito jyeshṭham bhrātaram antaritya abhishechitam | tasmāt te devo na varshati" iti | sa S'antanur Devāpiṁ śiśiksha rājyena | tam uvācha Devāpiḥ "purohitas te 'sāni yājayāni cha tvā" iti | tasya etad varsha-kāma-sūktam | tasya eshā bhavati |

"Here they relate a story. Devāpi son of Ṛishṭisheṇa, and S'antanu, belonged to the race of Kuru and were brothers. S'antanu, who was the younger, caused himself to be installed as king, whilst Devāpi betook himself to austere fervour. Then the god did not rain for twelve years of S'antanu's reign. The Brāhmans said to him: 'Thou hast practised unrighteousness in that, passing by thy elder brother, thou hast caused thyself to be installed as king. It is for this reason that the god does not rain.' S'antanu then sought to invest Devāpi with the sovereignty; but the latter said to him: 'Let me be thy purohita and perform sacrifice for thee.' This hymn, expressing a desire of rain, is his. The following verse is part of it."

Yāska then quotes a verse of R.V. x. 98, the whole of which is as follows:

Bṛihaspate prati me devatām ihi Mitro vā yad Varuṇo vā asi Pūshā | Ādityair vā yad Vasubhir Marutvān sa Parjanyaṁ S'antanave vṛishāya | 2. Ā devo dūto ajiraś chikitvān tvad Devāpe abhi mām āgachhat | pratīchīnaḥ prati mām ā vavṛitsva dadhāmi te dyumatīṁ vācham āsan | 3. Asme dhehi dyumatīṁ vācham āsan Bṛihaspate anamīvām ishirām | yayā vrishṭiṁ S'antanave vanāva divo drapso madhumān ā viveśa | 4. Ā no drapsāḥ madhumanto višantu Indra dehi adhirathaṁ sahasram | ni shīda hotram[52] ṛituthā yajasva devān Devāpe havishā saparya | 5. Ārshṭisheṇo hotram ṛishir nishīdan Devāpir deva-sumatiṁ chikitvān | sa uttarasmād adharaṁ samudram apo divyaḥ asṛijad varshyāḥ abhi | 6. Asmin samudre adhi uttarasmin āpo devebhir nivṛitāḥ atishṭhan | tāḥ adravann Ārshṭisheṇena sṛishṭāḥ Devāpinā preshitāḥ mṛikshiṇīshu | 7. Yad Devāpiḥ S'antanave purohito hotrāya vṛitaḥ kṛipayann adīdhet | deva-śrutaṁ vrishṭi-vaniṁ rarāṇo Bṛihaspatir vācham asmai ayachhat | 8. Yaṁ tvā Devāpiḥ śuśuchāno Agne Ārshṭisheṇo manushyaḥ samīdhe | višvebhir devair anumadyamānaḥ pra Parjanyam īraya vrishṭimantam | 9. Tvām pūrve ṛishayo gīrbhir āyan tvām adhvareshu puruhūta višve | sahasrāṇi adhirathāni asme ā no yajnaṁ rohidaśva upa yāhi | 10. Etāni Agni navatir nava tve āhutāni adhirathā sahasrā | tebhir vardhasva tanvaḥ śūra pūrvīr divo no vrishṭim ishito rirīhi | 11. Etāni Agne navatiṁ sahasrā sam pra yachha vrishṇe Indrāya bhāgam | vidvān pathaḥ ṛituśo devayānān apy aulānaṁ divi deveshu dhehi | 12. Agne bādhasva vi mṛidho vi durgahā apa amīvām apa rakshāṁsi sedha | asmāt samudrād bṛihato divo no apām bhūmānam upa naḥ sṛija iha |

"Approach, Bṛihaspati,[53] to my worship of the gods, whether thou art Mitra, Varuṇa, Pūshan, or art attended by the Ādityas, Vasus, or Maruts: cause Parjanya to rain for S'antanu. 2. The god, a rapid messenger, has become aware, and has come from thee, o Devāpi, to me, (saying) 'approach towards me; I will place a brilliant hymn in thy mouth.' 3. Place in our mouth, o Bṛihaspati, a brilliant hymn, powerful, and spirited, whereby we two may solicit rain for Śantanu. The drop full of sweetness has descended on us from the sky. 4. May the drops full of sweetness come down upon us: give us, o Indra, a thousand waggon-loads (of them?). Perform the function of a hotṛi, sacrifice in due form, worship the gods with an oblation, o Devāpi. 5. The rishi Devāpi, son of Ṛishṭisheṇa, performing the function of a hotṛi, knowing (how to gain) the goodwill of the gods, has discharged from the upper to the lower ocean those waters of the sky which fall in rain. 6. The waters remained shut up by the gods in this upper ocean: they rushed forth when released by the son of Ṛishṭisheṇa, when discharged by Devāpi into the torrents.[54] 7. When Devāpi, placed in front of Śantanu (as his purohita), chosen for the office of hotṛi, fulfilling his function, kindled (the fire),—then, granting the prayer for rain which was heard by the gods, Bṛihaspati gave him a hymn. 8. Do thou, o Agni, whom the man[55] Devāpi the son of Ṛishṭisheṇa has inflamed and kindled,—do thou, delighted, with all the the gods, send hither the rain-bearing Parjanya. 9. Former rishis have approached thee with their hymns; and all (approach) thee, o god, much-invoked, in their sacrifices: give us thousands of waggon-loads: come, thou who art borne by red horses,[56] to our sacrifice. 10. These ninety-nine thousands of waggon-loads (of wood and butter?) have been thrown into thee, o Agni, as oblations. Through them grow, hero, to (the bulk of) thy former bodies;[57] and stimulated, grant us rain from the sky. 11. (Of) these ninety thousands give, o Agni, a share to the vigorous Indra. Knowing the paths which rightly lead to the gods, convey the oblation (?) to the deities in the sky. 12. Overcome, o Agni, our enemies, our calamities; drive away sickness, and rakshasés. From this great ocean of the sky discharge upon us an abundance of waters."

[52] Compare R.V. ii. 1, 2.

[53] It looks as if Agni were here to be understood by Bṛihaspati, see verses 9–12. In R.V. ii. 1, 4 ff. Agni is identified with Varuṇa, Mitra, Aryaman, Aṁśa, Tvashṭṛi, Rudra, Pūshan, Savitṛi, Bhaga.

The fact of Devāpi being reputed as the author of this hymn, and as the purohita and hotṛi of his brother, seems to have led the legendary writers to invent the story of his becoming a Brāhman, which (as men-

[54] So the word mṛikshiṇī is explained in Böhtlingk and Roth's Lexicon.

[55] Or, "descendant of Manush" (manushya).

[56] This is a common epithet of Agni.

[57] This means, I suppose, "burst forth into vast flames."

tioned by Professor Weber, Indische Studien, i. p. 203) is recorded in the Śalya-parvan of the Mahābhārata, verses 2281 ff. where he is there said to have attained this distinction at a certain place of pilgrimage called Pṛithūdaka; where Sindhudvīpa and Viśvāmitra also were received into the higher caste:

Tatrārshṭisheṇaḥ Kauravya brāhmaṇyaṁ saṁśita-vrataḥ | tapasā mahatā rājan prāptavān ṛishi-sattamaḥ | Sindhudvīpaś cha rājarshir Devāpiś cha mahātapāḥ | brāhmaṇyaṁ labdhavān yatra Viśvāmitras tathā muniḥ | mahātapasvī bhagavān ugra-tejāḥ mahātapāḥ | . . . . 2287. Purā kṛita-yuge rajann Ārshṭisheṇo dvijottamaḥ | vasan guru-kule nityaṁ nityam adhyayane rataḥ | tasya rājan guru-kule vasato nityam eva cha | samāptiṁ nāgamad vidyā nāpi vedāḥ viśāmpate | sa nirviṇṇas tato rājaṁs tapas tepe mahātapāḥ | tato vai tapasā tena prāpya vedān anuttamanān | sa vidvān veda-yuktaś cha siddhaś chāpy ṛishi-sattamaḥ | . . . . | evam siddhaḥ sa bhagavān Ārshṭisheṇaḥ pratāpavān | tasminn eva tadā tīrthe Sindhudvīpaḥ pratāpavān | Devāpiś cha mahārāja brāhmaṇyam prāpatur mahat |

2281. "There the most excellent rishi Ārshṭisheṇa, constant in his observances, obtained Brāhmanhood by great austere fervour; as did also the royal rishi Sindhudvīpa,[58] and Devāpi great in austere fervour, and the glorious muni Viśvamitra, of great austere fervour and fiery vigour." Some other particulars of Arshṭisheṇa are given further on: 2287. "Formerly in the Kṛita age the most excellent Brāhman Ārshṭisheṇa dwelt constantly in his preceptor's family, devoted to incessant study; but could not complete his mastery of science or of the vedas.[59] Being in consequence discouraged, he betook himself to intense austere fervour. By this means he acquired the incomparable Vedas, and became learned and perfect. . . . . At the same place of pilgrimage the majestic Sindhudvīpa and Devāpi obtained the great distinction of Brāhmanhood."

It will be observed that here Ārshṭisheṇa is, in opposition to the authority of the Nirukta, made a distinct person from Devāpi.

[58] This prince also, as we have seen above, is mentioned among those Rājanyas who composed Vedic hymns.

[59] The Vedas are here spoken of in the plural, although Ārshtisheṇa is said to have lived in the Kṛita age. But the M. Bh. itself says elsewhere (see above, p. 145) that there was then but one Veda.

In a note to his (French) translation of the Rig-veda, M. Langlois (vol. iv. 502) supposes that the hymn above translated (x. 98), like the Purusha Sūkta, is very much posterior in date to the other hymns in the collection. The names of Devāpi and Sāntanu indicate, he thinks, as the date of its composition, a period not far preceding that of the great war of the Mahābhārata. Professor Weber, on the other hand, considers (Indische Studien, i. 203) that the Sāntanu and Devāpi mentioned in that work (Ādi-parvan, 3750 f.) cannot be the same as the persons alluded to in the Rigveda, because their father was Pratīpa, not Ṛishṭisheṇa; and because he thinks it doubtful whether a prince who preceded the Pāṇḍavas by only two generations could have been named in the Rig-veda, and appear there as an author of hymns.

The verses of the Ādi-parvan just referred to are as follows:

Pratīpasya trayaḥ putrāḥ jajnire Bharatarshabha | Devāpiḥ S'āntanuś chaiva Vāhlīkaś mahārathaḥ | Devāpiś cha pravavrāja teshāṁ dharmahitepsayā | S'āntanuś cha mahīṁ lebhe Vāhlīkaś cha mahārathaḥ |

"Three sons were born to Pratīpa, viz. Devāpi, Sāntanu, and Vāhlīka the charioteer. Of these Devāpi, desiring the benefits of religious excellence, became an ascetic; whilst Sāntanu and Vāhlīka obtained (the rule of) the earth."

The Harivaṁśa gives a different story about the same Devāpi, verse 1819:

Pratīpo Bhīmasenāt tu Pratīpasya tu S'āntanuḥ | Devāpir Vāhlikaś chaiva trayaḥ eva mahārathāḥ | . . . . 1822. Upādhyāyas tu devānāṁ Devāpir abhavad muniḥ | Chyavanasya kṛitaḥ putraḥ ishṭaś chāsīd mahātmanaḥ |

"Prātīpa sprang from Bhīmasena; and Sāntanu, Devāpi, and Vāhlika were the three chariot-driving sons of Pratīpa. . . . . 1822. Devāpi became a muni, and preceptor of the gods, being the adopted son of Chyavana, by whom he was beloved."

The Vishṇu Purāṇa (iv. 20, 7 ff.) concurs with the preceding authorities in making Devāpi and Sāntanu to be sons of Pratīpa, and descendants of Kuru, and his son Jahnu. It repeats the legend given in the Nirukta of the country of Sāntanu being visited by a drought of twelve years duration, in consequence of his having assumed the royal authority while his elder brother lived. And although, as will be seen, the sequel of the story is widely different from that recorded by the Nirukta, the earlier incidents in the two narratives are so similar, that it would appear to have been the intention of the Puranic writer to identify the Devāpi and Sāntanu whose history he relates with the persons of the same names, although of different parentage, mentioned in Yāska's work. He may, however, possibly have transferred an older legend to more recent personages. The passage of the Vishṇu Purāṇa is as follows:

Ṛikshād Bhīmasenas tatas cha Dilīpaḥ | Dilīpāt Pratīpas tasyāpi Devāpi Sāntanu-Vāhlīka-sanjñās trayaḥ putrāḥ babhūvuḥ | Devāpir bālaḥ eva araṇyaṁ viveśa | S'āntanūr avanīpatir abhavat | ayaṁ cha tasya ślokaḥ pṛithivyāṁ gīyate "yaṁ yaṁ karābhyāṁ spṛiśati jīrṇaṁ yauvanam eti saḥ | śāntiṁ chāpnoti yenāgryāṁ karmaṇā tena S'āntanuḥ" | tasya S'āntanoḥ rāshṭre dvādaśa varshāṇi devo na vavarsha | tataścha aśesha-rāshṭra-vināśam avekshya asau rājā brāhmaṇān aprichhad "bhoḥ kasmād asmin rāshṭre devo na varshati | ko mama aparādhaḥ" iti | te tam ūchur "agrajasya te 'rhā iyam avanis tvayā bhujyate parivettā tvam" | ity uktaḥ sa punas tān aprichhat "kim mayā vidheyam" iti | tena tam ūchur "yāvad Devāpir na patanādibhir doshair abhibhūyate tāvat tasya arhaṁ rājyam | tad alam etena tasmai dīyatām" | ity ukte tasya mantri-pravareṇa Aśmasāriṇā tatra araṇye tapasvino veda-vāda-virodha-vaktāraḥ prayojitāḥ | tair ati-ṛiju-mater mahīpati-putrasya buddhir veda-virodha-mārgānusāriny akriyata | rājā cha S'āntanur dvija-vachanotpanna-parivedana-śokas tān brāhmaṇān agraṇīkṛitya agraja-rājya-pradānāya araṇyaṁ jagāma | tad-āśramam upagatāś cha tam avanīpati-putraṁ Devāpim upatasthuḥ | te brāhmaṇāḥ veda-vādānurūpiddhāni vachāṁsi "rājyam agrajena karttavyam" ity arthavanti tam ūchuḥ | asāv api veda-vāda-virodha-yukti-dūshitam aneka-prakāram tān āha | tatas te brāhmaṇāḥ S'āntanum ūchur "āgachha bho rājann alam atra ati-nirbandhena | praśāntaḥ eva asāv anāvṛishṭi-doshaḥ | patito 'yam anādi-kāla-mahita-veda-vachana-dūshaṇochchāraṇāt | patite cha agraje naiva pārivettryam bhavati" | ity uktaḥ S'āntanuḥ sva-puram āgatya rājyam akarot | veda-vāda-virodhi-vachanochchāraṇa-dūshite cha jyeshṭhe 'smin bhrātari tishṭhaty api Devāpāv akhila-sasya-nishpattaye vavarsha bhagavān Parjanyaḥ |

"From Riksha sprang Bhīmasena; from him Dilīpa; from him Pratīpa, who again had three sons called Devāpi, Sāntanu, and Vāhlīka. Devāpi while yet a boy retired to the forest; and S'āntanu became king. Regarding him this verse is current in the world: 'Every decrepit man whom he touches with his hands becomes young. He is called Sāntanu from that work whereby he obtains supreme tranquility (śānti).' The god did not rain on the country of this Sāntanu for twelve years. Beholding then the ruin of his entire realm, the king enquired of the Brāhmans: 'Why does not the god rain on this country; what is my offence?' The Brāhmans replied: 'This earth, which is the right of thy elder brother, is now enjoyed by thee; thou art a parivettṛi (one married before his elder brother).'[60] Receiving this reply, he again asked them: 'What must I do?' They then answered: 'So long as Devāpi does not succumb to declension from orthodoxy and other offences, the royal authority is his by right; to him therefore let it be given without further question.' When they had so said, the king's principal minister Aśmasārin employed certain ascetics propounding doctrines contrary to the declarations of the Vedas to proceed into the forest, by whom the understanding of the very simple-minded prince (Devāpi) was led to adopt a system at variance with those sacred books. King Sāntanu being distressed for his offence in consequence of what the Brāhmans had said to him, went, preceded by those Brāhmans, to the forest in order to deliver over the kingdom to his elder brother. Arriving at the hermitage, they came to prince Devāpi. The Brāhmans addressed to him statements founded on the declarations of the Veda, to the effect that the royal authority should be exercised by the elder brother. He, on his part, expressed to them many things that were vitiated by reasonings contrary to the tenor of the Veda. The Brāhmans then said to Sāntanu, 'Come hither, o king: there is no occasion for any excessive hesitation in this affair: the offence which led to the drought is now removed. Your brother has fallen by uttering a contradiction of the words of the Veda which have been revered from time without beginning; and when the elder brother has fallen, the younger is no longer chargeable with the offence of pārivettrya (i.e. of marrying before his elder brother).' When he had been so addressed, Sāntanu returned to his capital, and exercised the royal authority. And although his eldest brother Devāpi continued to be degraded by having uttered words opposed to the doctrines of the Veda, the god Parjanya rained in order to produce a harvest of all sorts of grain."

[60] This is illustrated by Manu iii, 171 f.: Dārāgnihotra-saṁyogaṁ kurute yo 'grajе sthite | parivettā sa vijneyaḥ parivittis tu pūrvajaḥ | 172. Parivittiḥ parivettā yayā cha parividyate | sarve te narakaṁ yānti dātṛi-yājaka-panchamāḥ | "171. He who, while his elder brother is unwedded, marries a wife with the nuptial fires, is to be known as a parivettṛi, and his elder brother as a parivitti. 172. The parivitti, the parivettṛi, the female by whom the offence is committed, he who gives her away, and fifthly the officiating priest, all go to hell." The Indian writers regard the relation of a king to his realm as analogous to that of a husband to his wife. The earth is the king's bride.

Can the compiler of the Purāṇa have deviated from the conclusion of this history as found in the Nirukta, and given it a new turn, in order to escape from the conclusion that a Rājanya could officiate as a purohita?

The same story is briefly told in the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, ix. 22, 14–17.

In the Udyogaparvan of the Mahābhārata, on the other hand, Devāpi's virtues and orthodoxy are extolled in the highest terms, and his exclusion from the throne is ascribed solely to his being a leper, v. 5054:

Devāpis tu mahātejās tvag-doshī rāja-sattamaḥ | dhārmikaḥ satya-vādī cha pituḥ śuśrūshaṇe rataḥ | paura-jānapadānāṁ cha sammataḥ sādhu-satkṛitaḥ | sarveshām bāla-vṛiddhānāṁ Devāpir hṛidayangamaḥ | vadānyaḥ satyasandhaś cha sarva-bhūta-hite rataḥ | varttamānaḥ pituḥ śāstre brāhmaṇānāṁ tathaiva cha | . . . . . | tam brāhmaṇāś cha vṛiddhāś cha paura-jānapadaiḥ saha | sarve nivārayāmāsur Devāper abhisechanam | sa tach chhrutvā tu nṛipatir abhisheka-nivāraṇam | aśru-kaṇṭho 'bhavad rājā paryaśochata chātmajam | evaṁ vadānyo dharmajnaḥ satyasandhaś cha so 'bhavat | priyaḥ prajānām api sa tvag-doshena pradūshitaḥ | "hīnāngam pṛithivīpālaṁ nābhinandanti devatāḥ" | iti kṛitvā nṛipa-śreshṭham pratyashedhan dvijarshabhāḥ | . . . . | nivāritaṁ nṛipaṁ dṛishṭvā Devāpiḥ saṁśrito vanam |

"But the glorious Devāpi, a most excellent prince, righteous, veracious, and obedient to his father, was a leper. He was esteemed by the inhabitants both of town and country, honoured by the good, beloved by all, both young and old, eloquent, true to his engagements, devoted to the welfare of all creatures, and conformed to the commands of his father, and of the Brāhmans." [The king his father grew old and was making preparations for the investiture of his successor; but public opinion was opposed to the devolution of the royal authority on a leper, however virtuous]. "The Brahmans and aged men, together with the dwellers both in town and country, all restrained him from the investiture of Devāpi. The king, learning their opposition, was choked with tears, and bewailed his son's fate. Thus Devāpi was eloquent, acquainted with duty, true to his promise, and beloved by the people, but vitiated by leprosy. The Brāhmans forbade the king (to make Devāpi his successor), saying, 'the gods do not approve a king who labours under any corporeal defect.' . . . . Perceiving that the king (his father) was hindered (from carrying out his wishes) Devāpi retired to the forest."

On the same subject, the Matsya Purāṇa, 49, v. 39 f., states as follows:

Dilīpasya Pratīpastu tasya putrās trayaḥ smṛitāḥ | Devāpiḥ Śāntanuś chaiva Bāhlīkaś chaiva te trayaḥ | Bāhlīkasya tu dāyādāḥ sapta Bāhlīśvarāḥ nṛipāḥ | Devāpis tu apadhvastaḥ prajābhir abhavad muniḥ | ṛishayaḥ ūchhuḥ | prajābhis tu kimarthaṁ vai apadhvasto janeśvaraḥ | ke doshāḥ rājaputrasya prajābhiḥ samudāhṛitāḥ | Sūta uvācha | kilāsīd rājaputras tu kushṭī taṁ nābhyapūjayan | ko 'rthān vai atra (? vetty atra) devānāṁ kshattram prati dvijottamāḥ |

"The son of Dilīpa was Pratīpa, of whom three sons are recorded, Devāpi, Śāntanu, and Bāhlīka. The sons of the last were the seven Bāhlīśvara kings. But the Muni Devāpi was rejected by the people. The rishis enquired: 'why was that prince rejected by the people? what faults were alleged against him?' Sūta replied: 'the prince was leprous, and they paid him no respect. Who knows the designs of the gods towards the Kshattriya race?'"

No more is said of Devāpi in this passage.[61] The Vishṇu Purāṇa has the following further curious particulars regarding him, iv. 24, 44 ff.:

Devāpiḥ Pauravo rājā Maruś chekshvāku-vaṁśajaḥ | mahāyoga-balopetau Kalāpa-grāma-saṁśrayau | kṛite yuge ihāgatya kshattra-prāvarttakau hi tau | bhavishyato Manor vaṁśe vīja-bhūtau vyavasthitau | etena krama-yogena Manu-putrair vasundharā | kṛita-tretādi-sanjñāni yugāni trīṇi bhujyate | Kalau tu vīja-bhūtās te kechit tishṭhanti bhūtale | yathaiva Devāpi-Marū sāmprataṁ samavasthitau |

"King Devāpi of the race of Puru,[62] and Maru of the family of [61] See Prof. Wilson's note, 4to. ed. p. 458.

[62] In the twentieth chapter, as we have seen, he is said to be of the race of Kuru.

Ikshvāku, filled with the power of intense contemplation (mahāyoga) are abiding in the village of Kalāpa, continuing to exist as seeds in the family of Manu; they shall come hither in the (next) Kṛita age, and re-establish the Kshattriya race. According to this order the earth is enjoyed by the sons of Manu throughout the three ages called Kṛita, Tretā, and Dvāpara. But during the Kali certain persons remain upon earth as seeds (of a future race), as Devāpi and Maru now exist."

According to the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, ix. 22, 17, it is the lunar race, which had perished in the Kali age, that Devāpi is to restore in the future Kṛita (soma-vaṁśe kalau nashṭe kṛitādau sthāpayishyati).

I shall quote here from the 132nd section of the Matsya Puraṇa, entitled Manvantara-varṇanam (a description of the Manvantaras) some of the particulars about the rishis with which it concludes:

98. Bhṛiguḥ Kāśyaḥ Prachetāś cha Dadhīcho hy Atmavān api | 99. Aurvo 'tha Jamadagniś cha Kṛipaḥ Śāradvatas tathā | Ārshṭisheṇo Yudhājich cha Vitahavya-Suvarchasau | 100. Vaiṇaḥ Pṛithur Divodāso Brahmāśvo Gṛitsa-Śaunakau | ekonaviṁśatir hy ete Bhṛigavo mantra-kṛittamāḥ | 101. Angirāḥ Vedhasaś chaiva Bharadvājo Bhalandanaḥ | Ṛitabādhas tato Gargaḥ Sitiḥ Sankṛitir eva cha | 102. Gurudhīraś cha Māndhātā Ambarīshas tathaiva cha | Yuvanāśvaḥ Puruḥ Kutsaḥ Pradyumnaḥ Śravanasya chá | 103. Ajamīḍho 'tha Haryaśvas Takshapaḥ Kavir eva cha | Pṛishadaśvo Virūpaś cha Kaṇvaś chaivātha Mudgalaḥ | 104. Utathyaś cha Śaradvāṁś cha tathā Vājaśravā iti | Apaśyo 'tha Suvittaś cha Vāmadevas tathaiva cha | 105. Ajito Bṛihadukthaś cha ṛishir Dīrghatamā api | Kakshīvāṁś cha trayastriṁśat smṛitā hy Angiraso varāḥ | 106. Ete mantra-kṛitaḥ sarve Kāśyapāṁs tu nibodhata | . . . | 111. Viśvāmitraś cha Gādheyo Devarājas tathā Balaḥ | tathā vidvān Madhuchchhandāḥ Ṛishabhaś chāghamarshaṇaḥ | 112. Ashṭako Lohitaś chaiva Bhṛitakīlaś cha tāv ubhau | Vedāśravāḥ Devarātaḥ Purāṇāśvo Dhananjayaḥ | 113. Mithīlaś cha mahātejāḥ Sālankāyana eva cha | trayodaśaite vijneyāḥ brahmishṭhāḥ Kauśikāḥ varāḥ | . . . . | 115. Manur Vaivasvataś chaiva Iḍo rājā Purūravāḥ | Kshattriyāṇāṁ varāḥ hy ete vijneyāḥ mantra-vādinaḥ | 116. Bhalandaś chaiva Vandyaś cha Sankīrttiś[63] chaiva te trayaḥ | ete mantra-kṛito jneyāḥ Vaiśyānām pravarāḥ sadā | 117. Ity eka-navatiḥ proktāḥ mantrāḥ yaiś cha bahiḥ kṛitaḥ |

[63] Various readings—Bhalandakaś cha Vāsāś cha Sankālaś cha.

brāhmaṇāḥ kshattriyāḥ vaiśyāḥ ṛishiputrān nibodhata | 118. Ṛishīkāṇāṁ sutāḥ hy ete rishi-putrāḥ śrutarshayaḥ |[64]

"98. Bhṛigu, Kāśya, Prachetas, Dadhīcha, Ātmavat, (99) Aurva, Jamadagni, Kṛipa, S'āradvata, Ārshṭishena, Yudhājit, Vītahavya, Suvarchas, (100) Vaiṇa, Pṛithu, Divodāsa, Brahmāśva, Gṛitsa, S'aunaka, these are the nineteen[65] Bhṛigus, composers of hymns. 101. Angiras, Vedhasa, Bharadvāja, Bhalandana,[66] Ṛitabādha, Garga, Siti, Sankṛiti, Gurudhīra,[67] Māndhātṛi, Ambarīsha, Yuvanāśva, Purukutsa,[68] Pradyumna, S'ravaṇasya,[69] Ajamīḍha, Haryaśva, Takshapa, Kavi, Pṛishadaśva, Virūpa, Kaṇva, Mudgala, Utathya, S'aradvat, Vājaśravas, Apaśya, Suvitta, Vāmadeva, Ajita, Bṛihaduktha, Dīrghatamas, Kakshīvat, are recorded as the thirty-three eminent Angirases. These were all composers of hymns. Now learn the Kāśyapas. . . . . 111. Viśvāmitra, son of Gādhi, Devarāja, Bala, the wise Madhuchhandas, Ṛishabha, Aghamarshaṇa, (112) Ashṭaka, Lohita, Bhṛitakīla, Vedaśravas, Devarāta, Purāṇāśva, Dhanañjaya, the glorious (113) Mithila, Sālankayana, these are to be known as the thirteen devout and eminent Kuśikas.[70] . . . . . 115. Manu Vaivasvata, Iḍa, king Purūravas, these are to be known as the eminent utterers of hymns among the Kshattriyas. 116. Bhalanda, Vandya, and Sankīrtti,[71] these are always to be known as the three eminent persons among the Vaiśyas who were composers of hymns. 117. Thus ninety-one[72] persons have been declared, by whom hymns have been given forth, Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, and Vaiśyas. Learn the sons of the rishis. 118. These are the offspring of the ṛishīkas, sons of rishis, secondary rishis (śrutarshis)."

The section ends here.

[64] I am indebted for an additional copy of this section of the Matsya Purāṇa (of which some account is given by Prof. Aufrecht in his Catalogue, p. 41), to the kindness of Mr. Griffith, Principal of Queen's College, Benares, who, at my request, has caused it to be collated with various other MSS. existing in Benares. I have not thought it necessary to exhibit all the various readings in the part I have quoted.

[65] The number of nineteen is only obtained by making Vaiṇa and Pṛithu two persons.

[66] Instead of this word, one Benares MS. has Lakshmaṇa.

[67] Two MSS. have Turavīta.

[68] This word is divided into two in the MS.

[69] Two MSS. have, instead, Svaśravas and Tamasyavat.

[70] Unless some of the words I have taken as names are really epithets, fifteen persons are enumerated here.

[71] Some MSS. have Bhalandaka, Vandha or Vāsas, and Sankāla or Sankīrna.

[72] This is the total of several lists, some of which I have omitted.

It will be observed from a comparison of this extract with the details previously given, that some of the rājarshis, or rishis of royal blood, such as Ārshṭisheṇa, Vītahavya, Pṛithu (the same as Pṛithī) are spoken of as belonging to the family of Bhṛigu, while others of the same class, such as Māndhātṛi, Ambarīsha, Yuvanāśva, Purukutsa, are reckoned among the Angirases. Viśvāmitra and his descendants are merely designated as Kuśikas without any specific allusion to their Rājanya descent; but Manu, Iḍa, and Purūravas, are distinctly recognized as being as once authors of hymns and Kshattriyas; and, what is more remarkable, three Vaiśyas are also declared to have been sacred poets. These traditions of an earlier age, though scanty in amount, are yet sufficient to show that in the Vedic times the capacity for poetical composition, and the prerogative of officiating at the service of the gods, was not regarded as entirely confined to men of priestly families.

Sect. III.—Texts from the Atharva-veda illustrating the progress of Brāhmanical pretensions.

I have already quoted (in pp. 21 and 22) three short passages from the Atharva-veda regarding the origin of the Brāhman and Kshattriya castes. I shall now bring forward some other texts from the same collection which show a much greater development of the pretensions of the priests to a sacred and inviolable character than we meet in any part of the Rig-veda, if the 109th hymn of the tenth book (cited above) be excepted.

I shall first adduce the 17th hymn of the fifth book, to which I have already alluded, as an expansion of R.V. x. 109.

Atharva-veda v. 17. (Verses 1–3 correspond with little variation to verses 1–3 of R.V. x. 109). 4. Yām āhus "tārakā eshā vikeśī" iti duchchhunām̐ grāmam avapadyamānām | sā brahma-jāyā vi dunoti rāshṭraṁ yatra prāpādi śaśaḥ ulkushīmān | (verses 5 and 6 = verses 5 and 4 of R.V. x. 109). 7. Ye garbhāḥ avapadyante jagad yach chāpalupyate | virāḥ ye tṛihyante mitho brahma-jāyā hinasti tān | 8. Uta yat patayo daśa striyāḥ pūrve abrāhmaṇāḥ | brahmā ched hastam agrahīt sa eva patir ekadhā | 9. Brāhmaṇaḥ eva patir na rājanyo na vaiśyaḥ | tat sūryaḥ prabruvann eti panchabhyo mānavebhyaḥ | (Verses 10 and 11 = verses 6 and 7 of R.V. x. 109). 12. Nāsya jāyā śatavāhī kalyāṇī talpam

ā śaye | yasmin rāshtre nirudhyate brahma-jāyā achittyā | 13. Na vikarṇaḥ pṛithuśirās tasmin veśmani jāyate | yasminn ityādi | 14. Nāsya kshattā nishka-grīvaḥ sūnānām eti agrataḥ | yasminn ityādi | 15. Nāsya śvetaḥ kṛishṇa-karṇo dhuri yukto mahīyate | yasminn ityādi | 16. Nāsya kehettre pushkaraṇī nāṇḍīkaṁ jāyate visam | yasminn ityādi | 17. Nāsmai pṛiśniṁ vi duhanti ye 'syāḥ doham upāsate | yasminn ityādi | 18. Nāsya dhenuḥ kalyāṇī nānaḍvān sahate yugam | vijānir yatra brāhmaṇo rātriṁ vasati pāpayā |

" . . . . . 4. That calamity which falls upon the village, of which they say, 'this is a star with dishevelled hair,' is in truth the brāhmaṇ's wife, who ruins the kingdom; (and the same is the case) wherever (a country) is visited by a hare attended with meteors. . . . . 7. Whenever any miscarriages take place, or any moving things are destroyed, whenever men slay each other, it is the brāhmaṇ's wife who kills them. 8. And when a woman has had ten former husbands not brāhmans, if a brāhmaṇ take her hand (i.e. marry her), it is he alone who is her husband. 9. It is a Brāhman only that is a husband, and not a Rājanya or a Vaiśya. That (truth) the Sun goes forward proclaiming to the five classes of men (panchabhyo mānavebhyaḥ), ... 12. His (the king's) wife does not repose opulent (śatavāhī) and handsome upon her bed in that kingdom where a brāhmaṇ's wife is foolishly shut up. 13. A son with large ears (vikarṇaḥ) and broad head is not born in the house in that kingdom, etc. 14. A charioteer with golden neckchain does not march before the king's hosts[73] in that kingdom, etc. 15. A white horse with black ears does not make a show yoked to his (the king's) chariot in that kingdom, etc. 16. There is no pond with blossoming lotuses[74] in his (the king's) grounds in that kingdom where, etc. 17. His (the king's) brindled cow is not milked by his milkmen in that kingdom, etc. 18. His (the king's) milch cow does not thrive, nor does his ox endure the yoke, in that country where a Brāhman passes the night wretchedly without his wife."

This hymn appears to show that, however extravagant the pretensions of the Brāhmans were in other respects, they had, even at the comparatively late period when it was composed, but little regard to [73] The word here in the original is sūnānām, with which it is difficult to make any sense. Should we not read senānām?

[74] Compare R.V. x. 107, 10.

the purity of the sacerdotal blood, as they not only intermarried with women of their own order, or even with women who had previously lived single, but were in the habit of forming unions with the widows of Rājanyas or Vaiśyas,[75] if they did not even take possession of the wives of such men while they were alive.[76] Even if we suppose these women to have belonged to priestly families, this would only show that it was no uncommon thing for females of that class to be married to Rājanyas or Vaiśyas—a fact which would, of course, imply that the caste system was either laxly observed, or only beginning to be introduced among the Indians of the earlier Vedic age. That, agreeably to ancient tradition, Brāhmans intermarried with Rājanya women at the period in question, is also distinctly shewn

[75] That the remarriage of women was customary among the Hindus of those days is also shewn by A.V. ix. 5, 27 f., quoted in my paper on Yama, Jour. R. A. S. for 1865, p. 299.

[76] This latter supposition derives a certain support from the emphasis with which the two verses in question (A. V. v. 17, 8, 9) assert that the Brāhman was the only true husband. Whence, it may be asked, the necessity for this strong and repeated asseveration, if the Rājanya and Vaiśya husbands were not still alive, and prepared to claim the restoration of their wives? The verses are, however, explicable without this supposition.

It is to be observed, however, that no mention is here made of Śūdras as a class with which Brāhmans intermarried. Śūdras were not Āryas, like the three upper classes. This distinction is recognised in the following verse of the A.V. xix. 62, 1: "Make me dear to gods, dear to princes, dear to every one who beholds me, both to Śūdra and to Ārya." (Unless we are to suppose that both here and in xix. 32, 8, ārya = a Vaiśya, and not ārya, is the word). In Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, Kāṇva Śākhā (Adhvara Kāṇḍa, i. 6), the same thing is clearly stated in these words (already partially quoted above, p. 176), for a copy of which I am indebted to Prof. Müller: Tan na sarva eva prapadyeta na hi devāḥ sarveṇaiva saṅgachhante | ārya eva brāhmaṇo vā kshattriyo vā vaiśyo vā te hi yajniyāḥ | no eva sarveṇaiva saṁvadeta na hi devāḥ sarveṇaiva saṁvadante āryeṇaiva brāhmaṇena vā kshattriyeṇa vā vaiśyena vā te hi yajniyāḥ | yady enam śūdreṇa saṁvādo vindet "ittham enam nichakshva" ity anyam brūyād esha dīkshitasyopachāraḥ. "Every one cannot obtain this (for the gods do not associate with every man), but only an Ārya, a Brāhman, or a Kshattriya, or a Vaiśya, for these can sacrifice. Nor should one talk with everybody (for the gods do not talk with every body), but only with an Ārya, a Brāhman, or a Kshattriya, or a Vaiśya, for these can sacrifice. If any one have occasion to speak to a Śūdra, let him say to another person, 'Tell this man so and so.' This is the rule for an initiated man."

In the corresponding passage of the Mādhyandina Śākhā (p. 224 of Weber's edition) this passage is differently worded.

From Manu (ix. 149–157; x. 7 ff.) it is clear that Brāhmans intermarried with Śūdra women, though the offspring of those marriages was degraded.

by the story of the rishi Chyavana and Sukanyā, daughter of king Saryāta, narrated in the Satapatha Brāhmana, and quoted in my paper entitled "Contributions to a Knowledge of Vedic Mythology," No. ii., in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society for 1866, pp. 11 ff. See also the stories of the rishi Syāvāśva, who married the daughter of king Rathavīti, as told by the commentator on Rig-veda, v. 61, and given in Professor Wilson's translation, vol. iii. p. 344.

The next hymn, from the same work, sets forth with great liveliness and vigour the advantages accruing to princes from the employment of a domestic priest.

Atharva-veda, iii. 19, 1. Saṁśitam me idam brahma saṁśitam vīryam balam | saṁśitam kshattram ajaram astu jishṇur (? jishṇu) yeshām asmi purohitaḥ | 2. Sam aham eshām rāshṭraṁ syāmi sam ojo vīryam balam | vṛiśchāmi śatrūṇām bāhūn anena havishā aham | 3. Nīchaiḥ padyantam adhare bhavantu ye naḥ sūrim maghavānam pṛitanyān | kshiṇāmi brahmaṇā 'mitrān unnayāmi svān aham | 4. Tīkshnīyāṁsaḥ paraśor agnes tīkshṇatarāḥ uta | Indrasya vajrāt tīkshṇīyāṁso yeshām asmi purohitaḥ | 5. Eshām aham āyudhā saṁ syāmi eshāṁ rāshṭraṁ suvīraṁ vardhayāmi | eshāṁ kshattram ajaram astu jishṇu eshāṁ chittaṁ visve avantu devāḥ | 6. Uddharshantām Maghavan vājināni ud vīrāṇāṁ jayatām etu ghoshaḥ | pṛithagghoshāḥ ululayaḥ 'ketumantaḥ udīratām | devāḥ Indra-jyeshṭhāḥ Maruto yantu senayā | 7. Preta jayata naraḥ ugrāḥ vaḥ santu bāhavaḥ | tīkshṇeshavo abala-dhanvāno hata ugrāyudhāḥ abalān ugra-bāhavaḥ | 8. Avasṛishṭā parā pata śaravye brahma-saṁśite | jayāmitrān pra padyasva jahy eshām varaṁ-varam mā 'mīshām mochi kaśchana |

"1. May this prayer of mine be successful; may the vigour and strength be complete, may the power be perfect, undecaying, and victorious of those of whom I am the priest (purohita). 2. I fortify their kingdom, and augment their energy, valour, and force. I break the arms of their enemies with this oblation. 3. May all those who fight against our wise and prosperous (prince) sink downward, and be prostrated. With my prayer I destroy his enemies and raise up his friends. 4. May those of whom I am the priest be sharper than an axe, sharper than fire, sharper than Indra's thunderbolt. 5. I strengthen their weapons; I prosper their kingdom rich in heroes. May their power be undecaying and victorious. May all the gods foster their designs.

6. May their valorous deeds, o Maghavat, burst forth; may the noise of the conquering heroes arise; may their distinct shouts, their clear yells, go up; may the gods, the Maruts, with Indra as their chief, march forward with their host. 7. Go, conquer, ye warriors; may your arms be impetuous. Ye with the sharp arrows, smite those whose bows are powerless; ye whose weapons and arms are terrible (smite) the feeble. 8. When discharged, fly forth, o arrow, sped by prayer. Vanquish the foes, assail, slay all the choicest of them; let not one escape."

The two following hymns from the same collection declare the guilt, the peril, and disastrous consequences of oppressing Brāhmans, and robbing them of their property. The threats and imprecations of haughty sacerdotal insolence could scarcely be expressed more energetically.

Atharva-veda, v. 18. 1. Naitāṁ te devāḥ adadus tubhyaṁ nṛipate attave | mā brāhmaṇasya rājanya gāṁ jighatso anādyām | 2. Akshadrugdho rājanyo pāpaḥ ātma-parājitaḥ | sa brāhmaṇasya gām adyād "adya jīvāni mā śvaḥ" | 3. Āvishṭitā agha-vishā pṛidākūr iva charmaṇā | mā brāhmaṇasya rājanya ṭrishṭā eshā gaur anādyā | 4. Nir vai kshattraṁ nayati hanti varcho agnir ārabdho vi dunoti sarvam | yo brāhmaṇam manyate annam eva sa vishasya pibati taimātasya | 5. Yaḥ enaṁ hanti mṛidum manyamāno deva-pīyur dhana-kāmo na chittāt | saṁ tasya Indro hṛidaye agnim indhe ubhe enaṁ dvishṭo nabhasī charantaṁ | 6. Na brāhmaṇo hiṁsitavyo agniḥ priyatanor iva | Somo hi asya dāyādaḥ Indro asyābhiśastipāḥ | 7. Śatāpāshṭhām ni girati tāṁ na śaknoti niḳkhidam | annaṁ yo brāhmaṇām malvaḥ svādu admīti manyate | 8. Jihvā jyā bhavati kulmalaṁ vāṅ nāḍīkāḥ dantās tapasā 'bhidagdhāḥ | tebhir brahmā vidhyati deva-pīyūn hṛid-balair dhanurbhir deva-jūtaiḥ | 9. Tīkshṇeshavo brāhmaṇāḥ hetimanto yām asyanti śaravyāṁ na sā mṛishā | anuhāya tapasā manyunā cha uta dūrād ava bhindanti enam | 10. Ye sahasram arājann āsan daśa-śatā uta | te brāhmaṇasya gāṁ jagdhvā Vaitahavyāḥ parābhavan | 11. Gaur eva tān hanyamānā Vaitahavyān avātirat | ye Kesaraprābandhāyāś charamājām apechiran | 12. Eka-śataṁ tāḥ janatāḥ yāḥ bhūmir vyadhūnuta | prajāṁ hiṁsitvā brāhmaṇīm asambhavyam parābhavan | 13. Deva-pīyuś charati marttyeshu gara-gīrṇo bhavati asthi-bhūyān | yo brāhmaṇaṁ deva-bandhuṁ hinasti na sa pitṛiyāṇam apyeti lokam | 14. Agnir vai naḥ padavāyaḥ Somo dāyāda uchyate |

hantābhiśastā Indras tathā tad vedhaso viduḥ | 15. Ishur iva digdhā nṛipate pṛidākūr iva gopate | sā brāhmaṇasya ishur ghorā tayā vidhyati pīyataḥ |

"1. King, the gods have not given thee (this cow) to eat. Do not, o Rājanya (man of royal descent), seek to devour the Brāhman's cow, which is not to be eaten. 2. The wretched Rājanya, unlucky in play, and self-destroyed, will eat the Brāhman's cow, saying, 'Let me live to-day, (if I can) not (live) to-morrow.' 3. This cow, clothed with a skin, contains deadly poison, like a snake. Beware, Rājanya, of this Brāhman's (cow); she is ill-flavoured, and must not be eaten. 4. She takes away his regal power, destroys his splendour, consumes him entire like a fire which has been kindled. The man who looks upon the Brāhman as mere food to be eaten up, drinks serpent's poison. 5. Indra kindles a fire in the heart of that contemner of the gods who smites the Brāhman, esteeming him to be inoffensive, and foolishly covets his property. Heaven and earth abhor the man who (so) acts. 6. A Brāhman is not to be wronged, as fire (must not be touched) by a man who cherishes his own body. Soma is his (the Brāhman's) kinsman, and Indra shields him from imprecations. 7. The wicked (?) man who thinks the priests' food is sweet while he is eating it, swallows (the cow) bristling with a hundred sharp points, but cannot digest her. 8. The priest's tongue is a bow-string, his voice is a barb, and his windpipe is arrow-points smeared with fire. With these god-directed, and heart-subduing bows, the priest pierces the scorners of the gods. 9. Brāhmans bearing sharp arrows, armed with missiles, never miss their mark when they discharge a shaft. Shooting with fiery energy and with anger, they pierce (the enemy) from afar. 10. The descendants of Vītahavya, who ruled over a thousand men, and were ten hundred in number, were overwhelmed after they had eaten a Brāhman's cow.[77] 11. The cow herself, when she was slaughtered, destroyed them,—those men who cooked the last she-goat of Kesaraprābandhā. 12. Those hundred persons whom the earth shook off, after they had wronged the priestly race, were overwhelmed in an inconceivable manner. 13. He lives among mortals a hater of the gods; infected with poison he becomes reduced to a skeleton; he who wrongs a Brāhman the kinsman of the deities, fails to attain to the heaven of the Forefathers. 14. Agni is called our leader; Soma our kinsman. Indra neutralizes imprecations (directed against us); this the wise understand. 15. Like a poisoned arrow, o king, like a serpent, o lord of cows,—such is the dreadful shaft of the Brāhman, with which he pierces his enemies."

[77] I am not aware whether any traces of this story are discoverable in the Purāṇas or Mahābhārata. See the first verse of the hymn next to be quoted.

Atharva-veda, v. 19, 1. Atimātram avardhanta nod iva divam aspṛiśan | Bhṛiguṁ hiṁsitvā Sṛinjayāḥ Vaitahavyāḥ parābhavan | 2. Bṛihatsāmānam Āngirasam ārpayan brāhmaṇaṁ janāḥ | petvas teshām ubhayādam avis tokāny āvayat | 3. Ye brāhmaṇam pratyashṭhīvan ye vā 'smin śuklam īshire | asnas te madhye kulyāyāḥ keśān khādanta āsate | 4. Brahmagavī pachyamānā yāvat sā 'bhi vijangahe | tejo rāshṭrasya nirhanti na vīro jāyate vṛishā | 5. Krūram asyāḥ āśasanaṁ tṛishṭam piśitam asyate | kshīraṁ yad asyāḥ pīyate tad vai pitṛishu kilbisham | 6. Ugro rājā manyamāno brāhmaṇaṁ yaj jighatsati | parā tat sichyate rāshṭram brāhmaṇo yatra jīyate | 7. Ashṭāpadī chaturakshī chatuḥ-śrotrā chaturhanuḥ | dvyāsyā dvijihvā bhūtvā sā rāshṭram avadhūnute brahmajyasya | 8. Tad vai rāshṭram āsravati nāvam bhinnām ivodakam | brāhmāṇaṁ yatra hiṁsanti tad rāshṭraṁ hanti duchchhunā | 9. Taṁ vṛikshāḥ apa sedhanti "chhāyāṁ no mopa gāḥ" iti | yo brāhmaṇasya saddhanam abhi Nārada manyate | 10. Visham etad deva-kṛitaṁ rājā Varuṇo abravīt | na brāhmaṇasya gāṁ jagdhvā rāshṭre jāgāra kaśchana | 11. Navaiva tāḥ navatayo yāḥ bhūmir vyadhūnuta | prajāṁ hiṁsitvā brāhmaṇīm asambhavyam parābhavan | 12. Yām mṛitāyānubadhnanti kūdyam padayopanīm | tad vai brahmajya te devāḥ upastaraṇam abruvan | 13. Aśrūṇi kṛipamāṇasya yāni jītasya vāvṛituḥ | taṁ vai brahmajya te devāḥ apām bhāgam adhārayan | 14. Yena mṛitaṁ snapayanti śmaśrūṇi yena undate | taṁ vai brahmajya te devāḥ apām bhāgam adhārayan | 15. Na varshaṁ Maitrāvaruṇam brahmajyam abhi varshati | nāsmai samitiḥ kalpate na mitraṁ nayate vaśam |

"1. The Sṛinjayas, descendants of Vītahavya, waxed exceedingly; they almost touched the sky; but after they had injured Bhrigu, they were overwhelmed. 2. When men pierced Brihatsāman, a Brāhman descended from Angiras, a ram with two rows of teeth swallowed their children. 3. Those who spit, or throw filth (?) upon a Brāhman, sit eating hair in the midst of a stream of blood. 4. So long as this Brāhman's cow is cut up (?) and cooked, she destroys the glory of the kingdom; no vigorous hero is born there. 5. It is cruel to slaughter her; her ill-flavoured flesh is thrown away. When her milk is drunk, that is esteemed a sin among the Forefathers. 6. Whenever a king, fancying himself mighty, seeks to devour a Brāhman, that kingdom is broken up, in which a Brāhman is oppressed. Becoming eight-footed, four-eyed, four-eared, four-jawed, two-faced, two-tongued, she (the cow) shatters the kingdom of the oppressor of Brāhmans. 8. (Ruin) overflows that kingdom, as water swamps a leaky boat: calamity smites that country in which a priest is wronged. 9. Even trees, o Nārada, repel, and refuse their shade to, the man who claims a right to the property of a Brāhman. This (property), as king Varuṇa hath said, has been turned into a poison by the gods. No one who has eaten a Brāhman's cow continues to watch (i.e. to rule) over a country. 11. Those nine nineties (of persons) whom the earth shook off, when they had wronged the priestly race, were overwhelmed in an inconceivable manner (see verse 12 of the preceding hymn). 12. The gods have declared that the cloth wherewith a dead man's feet are bound shall be thy pall, thou oppressor of priests. 13. The tears which flow from a persecuted man as he laments,—such is the portion of water which the gods have assigned to thee, thou oppressor of priests. 14. The gods have allotted to thee that portion of water wherewith men wash the dead, and moisten beards. 15. The rain of Mitra and Varuṇa does not descend on the oppressor of priests. For him the battle has never a successful issue; nor does he bring his friend into subjection."

The attention of the reader is directed to the intensity of contempt and abhorrence which is sought to be conveyed by the coarse imagery contained in verses 3, and 12–14, of this last hymn.

There is another section of the same Veda, xii. 5, in which curses similar to those in the last two hymns are fulminated against the oppressors of Brāhmans. The following are specimens:

Atharva-veda, xii. 5, 4. Brahma padavāyam brāhmaṇo 'dhipatiḥ | 5. Tām ādadānasya brahma-gavīm̃ jinato brāhmaṇān kshattriyasya | 6. Apa krāmati sūnṛitā vīryam puṇyā lakshmīḥ | 7. Ojaścha tejaś cha sahaś cha balam̃ cha vāk cha indriyam̃ cha śrīś cha dharmaś cha | 8. Brahma cha kshattram̃ cha rāshṭram̃ cha viśaś cha tvishiś cha yaśaś cha varchaś cha draviṇam̃ cha | 9. Āyuś cha rūpam̃ cha nāma cha kīrttiś cha prāṇaś cha apānaś cha chakshuś cha śrotram̃ cha | 10. Payaś cha rasaś

cha annaṁ cha annādyaṁ cha ṛitaṁ cha satyaṁ cha ishṭaṁ cha pūrttaṁ cha prajā cha paśavaś cha | 11. Tāni sarvāṇi apa krāmanti brahma-gavīm ādadānasya jinato brāhmaṇaṁ kshattriyasya | 12. Sā eshā bhīmā brahma-gavī agha-vishā . . . . . | 13. Sarvāṇy asyāṁ ghorāṇi sarve cha mṛityavaḥ | 14. Sarvāṇy asyāṁ krūrāṇi sarve purusha-vadhāḥ | 15. Sā brahma-jyaṁ deva-pīyum brahmagavī ādīyamānā mṛityoḥ paḍbīśe ā dyati |

"4. Prayer (brāhmăn) is the chief (thing); the Brāhman is the lord (adhipatī). 5. From the Kshattriya who seizes the priest's cow, and oppresses the Brāhman, (6) there depart piety, valour, good fortune, (7) force, keenness, vigour, strength, speech, energy, prosperity, virtue, (8) prayer (brāhmăn), royalty, kingdom, subjects, splendour, renown, lustre, wealth, (9) life, beauty, name, fame, inspiration and expiration, sight, hearing, (10) milk, sap, food, eating, righteousness, truth, oblation, sacrifice, offspring, and cattle;—(11) all these things depart from the Kshattriya who seizes the priest's cow. 12. Terrible is the Brāhman's cow, filled with deadly poison. . . . 13. In her reside all dreadful things, and all forms of death, (14) all cruel things, and all forms of homicide. 15. When seized, she binds in the fetters of death the oppressor of priests and despiser of the gods."

A great deal more follows to the same effect, which it would be tiresome to quote.

I subjoin some further texts, in which reference is made to brāhmăns.

In xix. 22, 21 (= xix. 23, 30) it is said:

Brahma-jyeshṭhā sambhṛitā vīryāṇi brahmāgre jyeshṭhaṁ divam ātatāna | bhūtānām brahmā prathamo ha jajne tenārhati brahmaṇā sparddhituṁ kaḥ |

"Powers are collected, of which prayer (or sacred science, brāhmăn) is the chief. Prayer, the chief, in the beginning stretched out the sky. The priest (brāhmăn) was born the first of beings. Who, then, ought to vie with the brāhmăn.

A superhuman power appears to be ascribed to the brāhmăn in the following passages,—unless by brāhmăn we are to understand Bṛihaspati:—

xix. 9, 12. Brahmā Prajāpatir Dhātā lokāḥ vedāḥ sapta-ṛishayo 'gnayaḥ | tair me kṛitaṁ svastyayanam Indro me śarma yachhatu brahmā me śarma yachhatu |

"May a prosperous journey be granted to me by prayer, Prajāpati, Dhātṛi, the worlds, the Vedas, the seven rishis, the fires; may Indra grant me felicity, may the brāhmăn grant me felicity."

xix. 43, 8. Yatra brahma-vido yānti dīkshayā tapasā saha | brahmā mā tatra nayatu brahmā brahma dadhātu me | brahmaṇe svāhā.

"May the brāhmăn conduct me to the place whither the knowers of prayer (or of sacred science) go by initiation with austerity. May the brāhmăn impart to me sacred science. Svāhā to the brāhmăn."

The wonderful powers of the Brahmachārin, or student of sacred science, are described in a hymn (A.V. xi. 5), parts of which are translated in my paper on the progress of the Vedic Religion, pp. 374 ff.

And yet with all this sacredness of his character the priest must be devoted to destruction, if, in the interest of an enemy, he is seeking by his ceremonies to effect the ruin of the worshipper.

v. 8, 5. Yam amī puro dadhire brahmāṇam apabhūtaye | Indra sa me adhaspadaṁ tam pratyasyāmi mṛityave |

"May the brāhmăn whom these men have placed in their front (as a purohita) for our injury, fall under my feet, o Indra; I hurl him away, to death (compare A.V. vii. 70, 1 ff.).

Sect. IV.—Opinions of Professor R. Roth and Dr. M. Haug regarding the origin of caste among the Hindus.

I shall in this section give some account of the speculations of Prof. R. Roth and Dr. M. Haug on the process by which they conceive the system of castes to have grown up among the Indians.

The remarks which I shall quote from Prof. Roth are partly drawn from his third "Dissertation on the Literature and History of the Veda," p. 117, and partly from his paper on "Brahma and the Brāhmans," in the first volume of the Journal of the German Oriental Society.[78] He says in the latter essay: "The religious development of India is attached through the course of three thousand years to the word brāhmă. This conception might be taken as the standard for estimating the progress of thought directed to divine things, as at every step taken by the latter, it has gained a new form, while at the same time it has always embraced in itself the highest spiritual acquisition of the nation. . . . . The original signification of the word brăhmă, as we easily discover it in the Vedic hymns, is that of prayer; not praise or thanksgiving, but that invocation which, with the force of the will directed to God, seeks to draw him to itself, and to receive satisfaction from him. . . . . From this oldest sense and form of brăhmă (neuter) was formed the masculine noun brahmā, which was the designation of those who pronounced the prayers, or performed the sacred ceremonies; and in nearly all the passages of the Rig-veda in which it was thought that this word must refer to the Brahmanical caste, this more extended sense must be substituted for the other more limited one. . . . . From this sense of the word brahmā, nothing was more natural than to convert this offerer of prayer into a particular description of sacrificial priest: so soon as the ritual began to be fixed, the functions which were before united in a single person, who both prayed to the gods and sacrificed to them, became separated, and a priesthood interposed itself between man and God." [79]

[78] The reader who is unacquainted with German will find a fuller account of this article in the Benares Magazine for October 1851, pp. 823 ff.

Then further on, after quoting R.V. iv. 50, 4 ff. (see above, p. 247), Prof. Roth continues: "In this manner here and in many places of the liturgical and legal books, the promise of every blessing is attached to the maintenance of a priest by the king. Inasmuch as he supports and honours the priest, the latter ensures to him the favour of the gods. So it was that the caste of the Brāhmans arose and attained to power and consideration: first, they were only the single domestic priests of the kings; then the dignity became hereditary in certain families; finally a union, occasioned by similarity of interests, of these families in one larger community was effected; and all this in reciprocal action with the progress made in other respects by theological doctrine and religious worship. Still the extension of the power which fell into the hands of this priestly caste would not be perfectly comprehensible from this explanation alone. The relation of spiritual superiority in which the priests came to stand to the kings was aided by other historical movements."

[79] In his third Dissertation on the Literature and History of the Veda, Prof. Roth remarks: "In the Vedic age, access to the gods by prayer and sacrifice was open to all classes of the community; and it was only the power of expressing devotion in a manner presumed to be acceptable to the deities, or a readiness in poetical diction, that distinguished any individual or family from the mass, and led to their being employed to conduct the worship of others. The name given to such persons was purohita, one 'put forward;' one through whose mediation the gods would receive the offering presented. But these priests had as yet no especial sanctity or exclusive prerogative which would render their employment imperative."

Professor Roth then proceeds: "When—at a period more recent than the majority of the hymns of the Rig-veda—the Vedic people, driven by some political shock, advanced from their abodes in the Punjab further and further to the south, drove the aborigines into the hills, and took possession of the broad tract of country lying between the Ganges, the Jumna, and the Vindhya range; the time had arrived when the distribution of power, the relation of king and priest, could become transformed in the most rapid and comprehensive manner. Principalities separated in such various ways, such a division into tribes as had existed in the Punjab, were no longer possible here, where nature had created a wide and continuous tract with scarcely any natural boundaries to dissever one part from another. Most of those petty princes who had descended from the north with their tribes must here of necessity disappear, their tribes become dissolved, and contests arise for the supreme dominion. This era is perhaps portrayed to us in the principal subject of the Mahābhārata, the contest between the descendants of Pāṇḍu and Kuru. In this stage of disturbance and complication, power naturally fell into the hands of those who did not directly possess any authority, the priestly races and their leaders, who had hitherto stood rather in the position of followers of the kings, but now rose to a higher rank. It may easily be supposed that they and their families, already honoured as the confidential followers of the princes, would frequently be able to strike a decisive stroke to which the king would owe his success. If we take further into account the intellectual and moral influence which this class possessed in virtue of the prerogative conceded to, or usurped by, them, and the religious feeling of the people, it is not difficult to comprehend how in such a period of transition powerful communities should arise among the domestic priests of petty kings and their families, should attain to the highest importance in every department of life, and should grow into a caste which, like the ecclesiastical order in the middle ages of Christianity, began to look upon secular authority as an effluence from the fulness of their power, to be conferred at their will; and how, on the other hand, the numerous royal families should sink down into a nobility which possessed, indeed, the sole right to the kingly dignity, but at the same time, when elected by the people, required inauguration in order to their recognition by the priesthood, and were enjoined above all things to employ only Brāhmans as their counsellors."

In order to render the probability of this theory still more apparent, Professor Roth goes on to indicate the relations of the other castes to the Brāhmans. The position which the three superior classes occupied in the developed Brahmanical system was one of gradation, as they differed only in the extent of their religious and civil prerogatives, the Kshattriya being in some respects less favoured than the Brāhman, and the Vaiśya than the Kshattriya. With the Śūdras, on the other hand, the case was quite different. They were not admitted to sacrifice, to the study of the Vedas, or to investiture with the sacred cord. From this Professor Roth concludes that the three highest castes stood in a closer connection with each other, whether of descent, or of culture, than any of them did to the fourth. The Indian body politic, moreover, was complete without the Śūdras. The Brāhman and Kshattriya were the rulers, while the Vaiśyas formed the mass of the people. The fact of the latter not being originally a separate community is confirmed by the employment assigned to them, as well as by their name Vaiśya, derived from the word Viś, a word which in the Veda designates the general community, especially considered as the possessor of the pure Aryan worship and culture, in contradistinction to all barbarian races. Out of this community the priesthood arose in the manner above described, while the Kshattriyas were the nobility, descended in the main from the kings of the earlier ages. The fourth caste, the Śūdras, consisted, according to Prof. Roth, of a race subdued by the Brahmanical conquerors, whether that race may have been a branch of the Arian stock which immigrated at an earlier period into India, or an autochthonous Indian tribe.

In his tract on the origin of Brāhmanism, from which I have already quoted (see above, pp. 11 and 14), Dr. Haug thus states his views on this question: "It has been of late asserted that the original parts of the Vedas do not know the system of caste. But this conclusion was prematurely arrived at without sufficiently weighing the evidence. It is true the caste system is not to be found in such a developed state; the duties enjoined to the several castes are not so clearly defined as in the Law Books and Purāṇas. But nevertheless the system is already known in the earlier parts of the Vedas, or rather presupposed. The barriers only were not so insurmountable as in later times." (p. 6). This view he supports by a reference to the Zend Avesta, in which he finds evidence of a division of the followers of Ahura Mazda into the three classes of Atharvas, Rathaesthas, and Vaśtrya fshuyans, which he regards as corresponding exactly to the Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, and Vaiśyas of India. The Atharvas, or priests, in particular formed a class or even a caste; they had secrets which they were prohibited from divulging; they were the spiritual guides of their nation, and none but the son of a priest could become a priest—a rule which the Parsīs still maintain. From these facts, Dr. Haug deduces the conclusion that the nation of which both the Indo-Arians and the Perso-Arians originally formed a part had been divided into three classes even before the separation of the Indians from the Iranians; and he adds (p. 7): "From all we know, the real origin of caste appears to go back to a time anterior to the composition of the Vedic hymns, though its development into a regular system with insurmountable barriers can be referred only to the latest period of the Vedic times."

I shall furnish a short analysis of some other parts of Dr. Haug's interesting tract. He derives (p. 7) the word brāhmaṇa from brăhmăn (neuter), which originally meant "a sacred song, prayer," as an effusion of devotional feeling. Brăhmă was the "sacred element" in the sacrifice, and signified "the soul of nature, the productive power." The Brahmanic sacrifices had production as their object, and embraced some rites which were intended to furnish the sacrificer with a new spiritual body wherewith he might ascend to heaven, and others calculated to provide him with cattle and offspring (p. 8). The symbol of this brăhmă, or productive power, which must always be present at the sacrifice, was a bunch of kuśa grass, generally called Veda (a word alternating with brăhmă), which, at the sacrifice, was passed from one priest to another, and given to the sacrificer and his wife. The corresponding symbol of twigs used by the Parsīs was called in Zend băresma, which Dr. Haug considers to have been originally the same as brăhmă (p. 9). As it was essential to the success of these sacrifices that every portion of the complicated ceremonial should be accurately performed, and as mistakes could not be avoided, it became necessary to obviate by an atonement (prāyaśchitti) the mischief which would otherwise have ensued; and the priest appointed to guard against or expiate such mistakes, when committed by the other priests—the hotṛi, adhvaryu, and udgātṛi—was called, "from the most ancient times," the brăhmăn (masculine), who was a functionary pre-eminently supplied with brăhmă (neuter) or sacred knowledge, and thereby connected "with the soul of nature, the cause of all growth, the last cause of all sacrificial rites" (p. 10). The office of brăhmăn was not one to which mere birth gave a claim, but had to be attained by ability and study. The descendants of these brăhmăn priests were the Brāhmans, and the speculations of the most eminent brăhmăn priests on divine things, and especially on sacrificial rites, are contained in the works called Brāhmaṇas (p. 12). Dr. Haug considers that no such a class as that of the brăhmăn priests existed at the early period when the ancestors of the Hindus separated from those of the Parsīs in consequence of religious differences. The few rites preserved by the Parsīs as relics of the remotest antiquity closely resemble those of the Brāhmans. Dr. Haug finds that in the Homa ritual of the former (corresponding to the Soma ceremony of the latter) only two priests, called Zota and Raspi or Rathwi, are required, whom he recognises as corresponding to the Hotṛi and Adhvaryu of the latter. So long as the rites were simple, no brăhmăn priest was wanted; but when they became complicated and multiform, the necessity for such a functionary arose. And it was only then that the sons of the brăhmăns, i.e. the Brāhmans, could rise through the possession of sacred knowledge, derived from their fathers, to great power, and form themselves into a regular caste. The development of these ceremonies out of their primitive simplicity into the complexity and multiformity which they ultimately assumed must, Dr. Haug thinks, have been the work of many centuries. This transformation must have taken place in the region bordering on the Sarasvatī, where the expansion of the Brahmanical system, and the elevation of the Brāhmans to full spiritual supremacy, is to be sought, before the Indo-Arians advanced southeastwards into Hindostan proper (p. 14). The ascendancy of the Brāhmans was not however attained without opposition on the part of the kings (p. 18). Dr. Haug concludes by relating the reception of Viśvāmitra into the order of Brāhmans, and by giving some account of the rishis and the several classes into which they were divided.

As the question is generally stated by Dr. Haug in pages 6 and 12 ff., the difference between him and other European scholars is one of age and not of principle, for neither party admits any distinction of race or congenital diversity between the three superior castes or classes.

CHAPTER IV.

EARLY CONTESTS BETWEEN THE BRAHMANS AND KSHATTRIYAS.

I proceed to give some legendary illustrations of the struggle which no doubt occurred in the early ages of Hindu history between the Brāhmans and the Kshattriyas, after the former had begun to constitute a fraternity exercising the sacerdotal profession, but before the respective provinces of the two classes had been accurately defined by custom, and when the members of each were ready to encroach on the prerogatives claimed as their own exclusive birthright by the other.

SECT. I.—Manu's Summary of refractory and submissive monarchs.

I shall begin with the following passage, which we find in the Institutes of Manu, vii. 38 ff., regarding the impious resistance, as the lawgiver considered it, of certain monarchs to the legitimate claims of the priests, and the dutiful behaviour of others.

38. Vṛiddhāṁś cha nityaṁ seveta viprān veda-vidaḥ śuchīn | vṛiddha-sevī hi satataṁ rakshobhir api pūjyate | 39. Tebhyo 'dhigachhed vinayaṁ vinītātmā 'pi nityaśaḥ | vinītātmā hi nṛipatir na vinaśyati karhichit | 40. Bahavo 'vinayād nashṭāḥ rājānaḥ sa-parichhadāḥ | vanasthāḥ api rājyāni vinayāt pratipedire | 41. Veṇo vinaṣhṭo 'vinayād Nahushaś chaiva pārthivaḥ | Sudāḥ Paijavanaś[80] chaiva Sumukho Nimir eva cha | 42. Pṛithus tu vinayād rājyam prāptavān Manur eva cha | Kuveraś cha dhanaiśvaryyam brāhmaṇyaṁ chaiva Gādhijaḥ |

"Let the king constantly reverence ancient Brāhmans skilled in the Vedas, and pure in conduct; for he who always respects the aged is honoured even by the Rākshāses. 39. Let him, even though humble-minded, be continually learning submissiveness from them: for a submissive monarch never perishes. 40. Through want of this character many kings have been destroyed with all their possessions; whilst by humility even hermits have obtained kingdoms. 41. Veṇa perished through want of submissiveness, and king Nahusha, and Sūdas the son of Pijavana, and Sumukha, and Nimi. 42. But through submissiveness Pṛithu and Manu attained kingly power, Kuvera the lordship of wealth, and the son of Gādhi (Viśvāmitra) Brāhmanhood."[81]

[80] In support of this reading, see M. Loiseleur Deslongchamps's and Sir G. C. Haughton's notes on the passage.

Veṇa is again referred to in Manu ix. 66 f.: Ayaṁ dvijair hi vidvadbhiḥ paśudharmo nigarhitaḥ | manushyāṇām api prokto Veṇe rājyam praśāsati | 67. Sa mahīm akhilām bhunjan rājarshi-pravaraḥ purā | varṇānāṁ sankaraṁ chakre kāmopahata-chetanaḥ |

"This custom (of raising up seed to a deceased brother or kinsman by his widow) fit only for cattle, was declared to be (law) for men also, when Veṇa held sway. This eminent royal rishi, who in former times ruled over the whole earth, having his reason destroyed by lust, occasioned a confusion of castes."

The legendary history of nearly all the kings thus stigmatized or celebrated can be traced in the Purāṇas and other parts of Indian literature. I shall supply such particulars of the refractory monarchs as I can find.

It will be observed that Manu is spoken of as an ordinary prince; and that even Kuvera, the god of wealth, is said to have attained his dignity by the same species of merit as the other persons whom the writer eulogizes. I am not aware whether any legends exist to the same effect. Something of a contrary tendency is found with regard to the deity in question in the passage of the Mahābhārata, of which an extract is given above, in p. 140, note 249.

[81] Kullūka remarks on this passage: Gādhi-putro Viśvamitras' cha kshattriyaḥ saṁs tenaiva dehena brāhmaṇyam prāptavān | rājya-lābhāvasare brāhmaṇya-prāptir aprastutā 'pi vinayotkarshārtham uktā | īdṛiśo 'yaṁ śāstrānushṭhāna-nishiddha-varjana-rūpa-vinayodayena kshattriyo 'pi durlabham brāhmaṇyam lebhe | "Viśvāmitra, the son of Gādhi, being a Kshattriya, obtained Brāhmanhood in the same body (i.e. without being again born in another body). The attainment of Brahmanhood by one who at the time held kingly authority, although an unusual occurrence, is mentioned to show the excellence of submissiveness. Through that quality, as exhibited in the observance of scriptural injunctions, and in abstinence from things forbidden, he, being a Kshattriya, obtained Brahmanhood, so difficult to acquire."

I have not met with any story of Sumukha's contest with the Brāhmans. Some MSS. read Suratha instead of Sumukha.

The name of Sudās, the son of Pijavana, occurs in several parts of the Rig-veda. I shall return to him in relating the contest between Vasishṭha and Viśvāmitra. I begin with the story of Veṉa.

Sect. II.—Legend of Veṉa.

According to the Vishṉu Purāṉa, i. 13, Veṉa was the son of Anga, and the descendant in the ninth generation of the first Manu, Svāyambhuva; the line of ancestors from the latter downwards being as follows: Uttānapāda, Dhruva, Slishti, Ṛipu, Chākshusha, the sixth Manu called Chākshusha, Uru, Anga (see Wilson's Vishṉu P. vol. i.). Veṉa thus belongs to a mythical age preceding by an enormous interval that of the descendants of Manu Vaivasvata mentioned in the preceding chapter of this volume; five Manvantaras, or periods of 308,571 years each, having intervened in the present Kalpa between the close of the Svāyambhuva, and the beginning of the existing, or Vaivasvata, Manvantara.

Vishṉu Purāṉa, i. 13, 7: Parāśara uvācha | Sunīthā nāma yā kanyā Mṛityoḥ prathama-jā 'bhavat | Angasya bhāryyā sa dattā tasyāṁ Veṉas tv ajāyata | 8. Sa mātāmaha-doshaṉa tena Mṛityoḥ sutātmajaḥ | nisargād iva Maitreya dushṭaḥ eva vyajāyata | 9. Abhishikto yadā rājye sa Veṉaḥ paramarshibhiḥ | ghoshayāmāsa sa tadā pṛithivyām pṛithivīpatiḥ | "na yashṭavyaṁ na dātavyaṁ hotavyaṁ na kadāchana | bhoktā yajnasya kas tv anyo hy ahaṁ yajna-patiḥ sadā | 10. Tatas tam ṛishayaḥ sarve sampūjya pṛithivīpatim | ūchuḥ sāmakalaṁ saṁyaṁ Maitreya samupasthitāḥ | ṛishayaḥ ūchuḥ | 11. " Bho bho rājan śṛiṉushva tvaṁ yad vadāmas tava prabho | rājya-dehopakāre yaḥ prajānāṁ cha hitam param | 12. Dīrgha-sattreṉa deveśaṁ sarva-yajneśvaraṁ Harim | pūjayishyāmo bhadraṁ te tatrāṁśas te bhavishyati | 13. Yajnena yajna-purusho Vishṉuḥ samprīṉito vibhuḥ | asmābhir bhavataḥ kāmān sarvān eva pradāsyati | yajnair yajneśvaro yeshāṁ rāshṭre sampūjyate Hariḥ | teshāṁ sarvepsitāvāptiṁ dadāti nṛipa bhūbhujām" | Veṉaḥ uvācha | "mattaḥ ko 'bhyadhiko 'nyo 'sti kaś chārādhyo mamāparaḥ | ko 'yaṁ Harir iti khyāto yo vo yajneśvaro mataḥ | Brahmā Janārdano Rudraḥ Indro Vāyur Yamo Raviḥ |

Hutabhug Varuṇo Dhātā Pūshā Bhūmir Niśākaraḥ | ete chānye cha ye devāḥ śāpānugraha-kāriṇaḥ | nṛipasya te śarīra-sthāḥ sarva-devamayo nṛipaḥ | etaj jñātvā mayā "jnaptaṁ yad yathā kriyatāṁ tathā | na dātavyaṁ na hotavyaṁ na yashṭavyaṁ cha vo dvijāḥ | 14. Bharttuḥ śuśrūshaṇam dharmo yathā strīṇām paro matah | mamājnā-pālanaṁ dharmo bhavatāṁ cha tathā dvijāḥ" | ṛishayaḥ ūchuḥ | "dehy anujnām mahārāja mā dharmo yātu sankshayam | havishām pariṇāmo 'yaṁ yad etad akhilaṁ jagat | 15. Dharme cha sankshayaṁ yāte kshīyate chākhilaṁ jagat" | Parāśaraḥ uvācha | iti vijnāpyamāno 'pi sa Veṇaḥ paramarshibhiḥ | yadā dadāti nānujnām proktaḥ proktaḥ punah punaḥ | tatas te munayaḥ sarve kopāmarsha-samanvitāḥ | "hanyataṁ hanyatām pāpaḥ" ity ūchus te parasparam | 16. "Yo yajna-purushaṁ devam anādi-nidhanam prabhum | vinindaty adhamāchāro na sa yogyo bhuvaḥ patih" | ity uktvā mantra-pūtais te kuśair muni-gaṇāḥ nṛipam | nirjaghnur nihatam pūrvam bhagavan-nindanādinā | tataś cha munayo reṇuṁ dadṛiśuḥ sarvato dvija | "kim etad" iti chāsannam paprachhus te janaṁ tada | 17. Ākhyātaṁ cha janais teshām "chaurībhūtair arājake | rāshṭre tu lokair ārabdham para-svādānaṁ āturaiḥ | 18. Teshām udīrṇa-vegānāṁ chaurāṇāṁ muni-sattamāḥ | sumahān dṛiśyate reṇuḥ para-vittāpahāriṇām" | tataḥ sammantrya te sarve munayas tasya bhūbhṛitaḥ | mamanthur ūrum putrārtham anapatyasya yatnataḥ | mathyataś cha samutthau tasyoroḥ purushaḥ kila | dagdha-sthūṇāpratīkāśah kharvāṭāsyo 'tihrasvakaḥ | 19. Kiṁ karomīti tān sarvān viprān āha sa chāturaḥ | nishīdeti tam ūchus te nishādas tena so 'bhavat | 20. Tatas tat-sambhavāḥ jātāḥ Vindhya-śaila-nivāsinaḥ | nishādāḥ muni-śārdūla pāpa-karmopalakshaṇāḥ | 21. Tena dvāreṇa nishkrāntam tat pāpaṁ tasya bhūpateḥ | nishādās te tathā jātāḥ Veṇa-kalmasha-sambhavāḥ | 22. Tato 'sya dakshiṇaṁ hastam mamanthus te tadā dvijāḥ | mathyamāne cha tatrābhūt Pṛithur Vainyaḥ pratāpavān | dīpyamānaḥ sva-vapushā sākshād Agnir ivejjvalan | 23. Ādyam ājagavaṁ nāma khāt papāta tato dhanuḥ | śarāś cha divyāḥ nabhasaḥ kavachaṁ cha papāta ha | tasmin jāte tu bhūtāni samprahṛishṭāni sarvaśah | satputreṇa cha jātena Veṇo 'pi tridivaṁ yayau | pun-nāmno narakāt trātaḥ sa tena sumahātmanā |

"7. The maiden named Sunīthā, who was the first-born of Mṛityu (Death)[82] was given as wife to Anga; and of her Veṇa was born. 8. This son of Mṛityu's daughter, infected with the taint of his maternal grandfather, was born corrupt, as if by nature. 9. When Veṇa was inaugurated as king by the eminent rishis, he caused this proclamation to be made on the earth: 'Men must not sacrifice, or give gifts, or present oblations. Who else but myself is the enjoyer of sacrifices? I am for ever the lord of offerings.' 10. Then all the rishis approaching the king with respectful salutations, said to him in a gentle and conciliatory tone: 11. 'Hear, o king, what we have to say: 12. We shall worship Hari, the monarch of the gods, and the lord of all sacrifices, with a Dīrghasattra (prolonged sacrifice), from which the highest benefits will accrue to your kingdom, your person, and your subjects. May blessings rest upon you! You shall have a share in the ceremony. 13. Vishṇu the lord, the sacrificial Male, being propitiated by us with this rite, will grant all the objects of your desire. Hari, the lord of sacrifices, bestows on those kings in whose country he is honoured with oblations, everything that they wish.' Veṇa replied: 'What other being is superior to me? who else but I should be adored? who is this person called Hari, whom you regard as the lord of sacrifice? Brahmā, Janārdana, Rudra, Indra, Vāyu, Yama, Ravi (the Sun), Agni, Varuṇa, Dhātṛi, Pūshan, Earth, the Moon,—these and the other gods who curse and bless are all present in a king's person: for he is composed of all the gods.[83] Knowing this, ye must

[82] See above, p. 124, and note 230.

[83] The orthodox doctrine, as stated by Manu, vii. 3 ff., coincides very nearly with Veṇa's estimate of himself, although the legislator does not deduce from it the same conclusions: 3. Rakshārtham asya sarvasya rājānam asṛijat prabhuḥ | 4. Indrānila-yamārkāṇām Agneś cha Varuṇasya cha | Chandra-Vitteśayoś chaiva mātrāḥ nirhṛitya śāśvatīḥ | 5. Yasmād eshām surendrāṇām mātrābhyo nirmito nṛipaḥ | tasmād abhibhavaty esha sarva-bhūtāni tejasā | 6. Tapaty āditya-vach chaisha chakshūṃshi cha manāṃsi cha | na chainam bhuvi śaknoti kaśchid apy abhivīkshitum | 7. So 'gnir bhavati Vāyuś cha so 'rkaḥ Somaḥ sa Dharmarāṭ | sa Kuveraḥ sa Varuṇaḥ sa Mahendraḥ prabhāvataḥ | 8. Bālo 'pi nāvamantavyo "manushyaḥ" iti bhūmipaḥ | mahatī devatā hy eshā nara-rūpeṇa tishṭhati | "3. The lord created the king for the preservation of this entire world, (4) extracting the eternal essential particles of Indra, Vāyu, Yama, Sūrya, Agni, Varuṇa, Chandra, and Kuvera. 5. Inasmuch as the king is formed of the particles of all these gods, he surpasses all beings in brilliancy. 6. Like the Sun, he distresses both men's eyes and minds; and no one on earth can ever gaze upon him. 7. He is Agni, Vāyu, Sūrya, Soma, Yama, Kuvera, Varuṇa, and Indra, in majesty. 8. Even when a child a king is not to be despised under the idea that he is a mere man; for he is a great deity in human form."

In another passage, ix. 303, this is qualified by saying that the king should imitate the functions of the different gods: Indrasyārkasya Vāyoścha Yamasya Varuṇasya cha | Chandrasyāgneḥ Pṛithivyāś cha tejo vrittaṃ nripas' charet | This expanded in the next verses.

act in conformity with my commands. Brāhmans, ye must neither give gifts, nor present oblations nor sacrifices. 14. As obedience to their husbands is esteemed the highest duty of women, so is the observance of my orders incumbent upon you.' The rishis answered: 'Give permission, great king: let not religion perish: this whole world is but a modified form of oblations. 15. When religion perishes the whole world is destroyed with it.' When Veṇa, although thus admonished and repeatedly addressed by the eminent rishis, did not give his permission, then all the munis, filled with wrath and indignation, cried out to one another, 'Slay, slay the sinner. 16. This man of degraded life, who blasphemes the sacrificial Male, the god, the lord without beginning or end, is not fit to be lord of the earth.' So saying the munis smote with blades of kuśa grass consecrated by texts this king who had been already smitten by his blasphemy of the divine Being and his other offences. The munis afterwards beheld dust all round, and asked the people who were standing near what that was. 17. They were informed: 'In this country which has no king, the people, being distressed, have become robbers, and have begun to seize the property of others. 18. It is from these robbers rushing impetuously, and plundering other men's goods, that this great dust is seen? Then all the munis, consulting together, rubbed with force the thigh of the king, who was childless, in order to produce a son. From his thigh when rubbed there was produced a man like a charred log, with flat face, and extremely short. 19. 'What shall I do?' cried the man, in distress, to the Brāhmans. They said to him, 'Sit down' (nishīda); and from this he became a Nishāda. 20. From him sprang the Nishādas dwelling in the Vindhya mountains, distinguished by their wicked deeds. 21. By this means the sin of the king departed out of him; and so were the Nishādas produced, the offspring of the wickedness of Veṇa. 22. The Brāhmans then rubbed his right hand; and from it, when rubbed, sprang the majestic Pṛithu, Veṇa's son, resplendent in body, glowing like the manifested Agni. 23. Then the primeval bow called Ājagava fell from the sky, with celestial arrows, and a coat of mail. At Pṛithu's birth all creatures rejoiced. And through the birth of this virtuous son, Veṇa, delivered from the hell called Put[84] by this eminent person, ascended to heaven."

[84] This alludes to the fanciful derivation of puttra, "son," from put + tra.

The Harivaṁśa (sect. 5) relates the same story thus, with little variation from the Vishṇu Purāṇa:

Vaiśampāyanaḥ uvācha | Āsīd dharmasya goptā vai pūrvam Atri-samaḥ prabhuḥ | Atri-vaṁśa-samutpannas tv Ango nāma prajāpatiḥ | tasya putro 'bhavad Veno nātyarthaṁ dharma-kovidaḥ | jāto Mṛityu-sutāyāṁ vai Sunīthāyām prajāpatiḥ | sa mātāmaha-doshena tena kālātmajātmajaḥ | sva-dharmān prishṭhataḥ kṛitvā kāmāl lobheshv avarttata | maryādāṁ sthāpayāmāsa dharmāpetāṁ sa pārthivaḥ | veda-dharmān atikramya so 'dharma-nirato 'bhavat | niḥ-svādhyāya-vashaṭkārās tasmin rājani śāsati | prāvarttan na papuḥ somaṁ hutaṁ yajneshu devatāḥ | "na yashṭavyaṁ na hotavyaṁ" iti tasya prajāpateḥ | āsīt pratijnā krūreyaṁ vināśe samupasthite | aham ijyaś cha yashṭā cha yajnaś cheti kurūdvaha | "mayi yajnāḥ vidhātavyāḥ mayi hotavyam" ity api | tam atikrānta-maryādam ādadānam asāmpratam | ūchur maharshayaḥ sarve Marīchi-pramukhās tadā | "vayaṁ dīkshāṁ pravekshyāmaḥ saṁvatsara-ganān bahūn | adharmaṁ kuru mā Vena naisha dharmaḥ sanātanaḥ | anvaye 'treḥ prasūtas tvam prajāpatir asaṁśayam | 'prajāś cha pālayishye 'ham' iti te samayaḥ kṛitaḥ" | tāṁs tathā bruvataḥ sarvān maharshīn abravīt tadā | Venaḥ prahasya durbuddhir imam artham anartha-vit | Venaḥ uvācha | "srashṭā dharmasya kaś chānyaḥ śrotavyaṁ kasya vā mayā | śruta-vīrya-tapaḥ-satyair mayā vā kaḥ samo bhuvi | prabhavaṁ sarva-bhūtānāṁ dharmāṇāṁ cha viśeshataḥ | sammūḍhāḥ na vidur nūnam bhavanto mām achetasaḥ | ichhan daheyam pṛithivīm plāvayeyaṁ jalais tathā | dyām bhuvaṁ chaiva rundheyaṁ nātra kāryā vichāranā" | yadā na śakyate mohād avalepāch cha pārthivaḥ | anunetum tadā Venas tataḥ kruddhāḥ maharshayaḥ | nigṛihya tam mahātmāno visphurantam mahā-balam | tato 'sya savyam ūrum te mamanthur jāta-manyavaḥ | tasmiṁs tu mathyamāne vai rājnaḥ ūrau vijajnivān | hrasvo 'timātraḥ purushaḥ kṛishnaś chāpi babhūva ha | sa bhītaḥ prānjalir bhūtvā sthitavān Janamejaya | tam Atrir vihvalaṁ dṛishṭvā nishīdety abravīt tadā | nishāda-vaṁśa-karttā 'sau babhūva vadatāṁ vara | dhīvarān asṛijach chāpi Vena-kalmasha-sambhavān | ye chānye Vindhya-nilayās Tukhārās Tumburās tathā | adharma-ruchayas tāta viddhi tān Vena-sambhavān | tataḥ punar mahātmānaḥ pāniṁ Venasya dakshinam | araṇīm iva saṁrabdhāḥ mamanthur jāta-manyavaḥ | Pṛithus tasmāt samuttasthau karāj jvalana-sannibhaḥ | dīpyamanaḥ sva-vapushā sākshād Agnir iva jvalan |

"There was formerly a Prajāpati (lord of creatures), a protector of righteousness, called Anga, of the race of Atri, and resembling him in power. His son was the Prajāpati Vena, who was but indifferently skilled in duty, and was born of Sunīthā, the daughter of Mṛityu. This son of the daughter of Kāla (Death), owing to the taint derived from his maternal grandfather, threw his duties behind his back, and lived in covetousness under the influence of desire. This king established an irreligious system of conduct: transgressing the ordinances of the Veda, he was devoted to lawlessness. In his reign men lived without study of the sacred books and without the vashaṭkāra, and the gods had no Soma-libations to drink at sacrifices. 'No sacrifice or oblation shall be offered,'—such was the ruthless determination of that Prajāpati, as the time of his destruction approached. 'I,' he declared, 'am the object, and the performer of sacrifice, and the sacrifice itself: it is to me that sacrifice should be presented, and oblations offered.' This transgressor of the rules of duty, who arrogated to himself what was not his due, was then addressed by all the great rishis, headed by Marīchi: 'We are about to consecrate ourselves for a ceremony which shall last for many years: practise not unrighteousness, o Vena: this is not the eternal rule of duty. Thou art in very deed a Prajāpati of Atri's race, and thou hast engaged to protect thy subjects.' The foolish Vena, ignorant of what was right, laughingly answered those great rishis who had so addressed him: 'Who but myself is the ordainer of duty? or whom ought I to obey? Who on earth equals me in sacred knowledge, in prowess, in austere fervour, in truth? Ye who are deluded and senseless know not that I am the source of all beings and duties. Hesitate not to believe that I, if I willed, could burn up the earth, or deluge it with water, or close up heaven and earth.' When owing to his delusion and arrogance Vena could not be governed, then the mighty rishis becoming incensed, seized the vigorous and struggling king, and rubbed his left thigh. From this thigh, so rubbed, was produced a black man, very short in stature, who, being alarmed, stood with joined hands. Seeing that he was agitated, Atri said to him 'Sit down' (nishīda). He became the founder of the race of the Nishādas, and also progenitor of the Dhīvaras (fishermen), who sprang from the corruption of Vena. So too were produced from him the other inhabitants of the Vindhya range, the Tukhāras, and Tumburas, who are prone to lawlessness. Then the mighty sages, excited and incensed, again rubbed the right hand of Vena, as men do the araṇi wood, and from it arose Pṛithu, resplendent in body, glowing like the manifested Agni."

Although the Harivaṁśa declares Vena to be a descendant of Atri, yet as the Prajāpati Atri is said in a previous section to have adopted Uttānapāda, Vena's ancestor, for his son (Hariv. sect. 2, verse 60, Uttānapādaṁ jagrāha putram Atriḥ prajāpatiḥ) there is no contradiction between the genealogy given here and in the Vishṇu Purāṇa.

The story of Vena is told in the same way, but more briefly, in the Mahābhārata, Śāntip. sect. 59. After narrating the birth of Pṛithu, the writer proceeds, verse 2221:

Tatas tu prāñjalir Vainyo maharshīṁs tān uvācha ha | "susūkshmā me samutpannā buddhir dharmārtha-darśinī | anayā kim mayā kāryyaṁ tad me tattvena śaṁsata | yad mām bhavanto vakshyanti kāryam artha-samanvitam | tad ahaṁ vai karishyāmi nātra kāryā vichāraṇā" | tam ūchus tattra devās te te chaiva paramarshayaḥ | "niyato yattra dharmo vai tvam aśankaḥ samāchara | priyāpriye parityajya samaḥ sarveshu jantushu | kāma-krodhau cha lobhaṁ cha mānaṁ chotsṛijya dūrataḥ | yaś cha dharmāt parichalel loke kaśchana mānavaḥ | nigrāhyās te sva-bāhubhyāṁ śaśvad dharmam avekshatā | pratijñāṁ chādhirohasva manasā karmaṇā girā | 'pālayishyāmy aham bhaumam brahma' ity eva chāsakṛit | . . . . adaṇḍyāḥ me dvijāś cheti pratijānīhi he vibho | lokaṁ cha sankarāt kṛitsnaṁ trātāsmīti parantapa" | Vainyas tatas tān uvācha devān ṛishi-purogamān | "brāhmaṇāḥ me mahābhāgāḥ namasyāḥ purusharshabhāḥ" | "evam astv" iti Vainyas tu tair ukto brahmavādibhiḥ | purodhāś chābhavat tasya Śukro brahmamayo nidhiḥ | mantriṇo Bālakhilyāś cha Sārasvatyo gaṇas tathā | maharshir bhagavān Gargas tasya sāṁvatsaro 'bhavat |

"The son of Vena (Pṛithu) then, with joined hands, addressed the great rishis: 'A very slender understanding for perceiving the principles of duty has been given to me by nature: tell me truly how I must employ it. Doubt not that I shall perform whatever you shall declare to me as my duty, and its object.' Then those gods and great rishis said to him: 'Whatever duty is enjoined perform it without hesitation, disregarding what thou mayest like or dislike, looking on all creatures with an equal eye, putting far from thee lust, anger, cupidity, and pride. Restrain by the strength of thine arm all those men who swerve from righteousness, having a constant regard to duty. And in thought, act, and word take upon thyself, and continually renew, the engagement to protect the terrestrial Brăhmăn (Veda, or Brāhmans?) .... And promise that thou wilt exempt the Brāhmans from punishment, and preserve society from the confusion of castes.' The son of Vena then replied to the gods, headed by the rishis: 'The great Brāhmans, the chief of men, shall be reverenced by me.' 'So be it,' rejoined those declarers of the Veda. Śukra, the depository of divine knowledge, became his purohita; the Bālakhilyas and Sārasvatyas his ministers; and the venerable Garga, the great rishi, his astrologer."

The character and conduct of Pṛithu, as pourtrayed in the last passage presents a strong, and when regarded from a Brahmanical point of view, an edifying, contrast to the contempt of priestly authority and disregard of Vedic observances which his predecessor had shewn.

In legends like that of Vena we see, I think, a reflection of the questions which were agitating the religious world of India at the period when the Purāṇas in which they appear were compiled, viz., those which were then at issue between the adherents of the Veda, and the various classes of their opponents, Bauddha, Jaina, Chārvāka, etc. These stories were no doubt written with a purpose. They were intended to deter the monarchs contemporary with the authors from tampering with those heresies which had gained, or were gaining, circulation and popularity, by the example of the punishment which, it was pretended, had overtaken the princes who had dared to deviate from orthodoxy in earlier times. Compare the account given of the rise of heretical doctrines in the Vishṇu Purāṇa (pp. 209 ff. vol. iii. of Dr. Hall's edition of Professor Wilson's translation), which the writer no doubt intended to have something more than a merely historical interest.

The legend of Vena is told at greater length, but with no material variation in substance, in the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, iv. sections 13–15. See also Professor Wilson's note in his Vishṇu Purāṇa, vol. i. in loco.

In ascribing to Vena an irreligious character and a contempt for the priests, the Purāṇas contradict a verse in the Rig-veda x. 93, 14, in which (unless we suppose a different individual to be there meant) Vena is celebrated along with Duḥsīma, Pṛithavāna, and Rāma for his conspicuous liberality to the author of the hymn (pra tad Duḥsīme Pṛithavāne Vene pra Rāme vocham asure maghavatsu | ye yuktvāya pancha śatā asmayu pathā viśrāvi eshām). The two other passages, viii. 9, 10, and x. 148, 5, in which he is alluded to as the father of Pṛithu have been quoted above, p. 268.

I observe that a Vena, called Bhārgava (or a descendant of Bhṛigu), is mentioned in the list of traditional authors of hymns, given at the end of Professor Aufrecht's Rig-veda, vol. ii., as the rishi of R.V. ix. 85, and x. 123.

Sect. III.—Legend of Purūravas.

Purūravas has been already alluded to (in pp. 158, 221, 226, 268, and 279 f.) as the son of Iḍa (or Iḍā), and the grandson of Manu Vaivasvata; as the author of the triple division of the sacred fire; and as a royal rishi. We have also seen (p. 172) that in Rig-veda i. 31, 4, he is referred to as sukṛite, a "beneficent," or "pious," prince. Rig-veda x. 95 is considered to contain a dialogue between him and the Apsaras Urvaśī (see above, p. 226). In verse 7 of that hymn the gods are alluded to as having strengthened Purūravas for a great conflict for the slaughter of the Dasyus (mahe yat tvā Purūravo raṇāya avarddhayan dasyu-hatyāya devāḥ); and in the 18th verse he is thus addressed by his patronymic: Iti tvā devāḥ ime āhur Aila yathā īm etad bhavasi mṛityubandhuḥ | prajā te devān havishā yajāti svarge u tvam api mādayāse | "Thus say these gods to thee, o son of Iḷa, that thou art indeed nothing more than a kinsman of death: (yet) let thy offspring worship the gods with an oblation, and thou also shalt rejoice in heaven."

It thus appears that in the Vedic hymns and elsewhere Purūravas is regarded as a pious prince, and Manu does not include him in his list of those who resisted the Brāhmans. But the M. Bh., Ādiparvan 3143 speaks of him as follows:

Purūravās tato vidvān Ilāyāṁ samapadyata | sā vai tasyābhavad mātā pitā chaiveti naḥ śrutam | trayodaśa samudrasya dvīpān aśnan Purūravāḥ | amānushair vṛitaḥ sarvair mānushaḥ san mahāyaśāḥ | vipraiḥ sa vigrahaṁ chakre vīryyonmattaḥ Purūravāḥ | jahāra cha sa viprāṇām ratnāny utkrośatām api | Sanatkumāras taṁ rājan Brahma-lokād upetya ha | anudarśaṁ tataś chakre pratyagṛihṇād na chāpy asau | tato maharshibhiḥ kruddhaiḥ sadyaḥ śapto vyanaśyata | lobhānvito bala-madād nashṭa-sanjno narādhipaḥ | sa hi gandharva-loka-sthān Urvaśyā sahito virāṭ | āninīya kriyārthe 'gnīn yathāvad vihitāṁs tridhā |

"Subsequently the wise Purūravas was born of Ilā, who, as we have heard, was both his father and his mother. Ruling over thirteen islands of the ocean, and surrounded by beings who were all superhuman, himself a man of great renown, Purūravas, intoxicated by his prowess, engaged in a conflict with the Brāhmans, and robbed them of their jewels, although they loudly remonstrated. Sānatkumāra came from Brahmā's heaven, and addressed to him an admonition, which, however, he did not regard. Being then straightway cursed by the incensed rishis, he perished, this covetous monarch, who, through pride of power, had lost his understanding. This glorious being (virāṭ), accompanied by Urvaśī, brought down for the performance of sacred rites the fires which existed in the heaven of the Gandharvas, properly distributed into three." (See Wilson's Vishṇu Purāṇa, 4to. ed. pp. 350 and 394 ff. with note p. 397.)

I cite from the Harivaṁśa another passage regarding Purūravas, although no distinct mention is made in it of his contest with the Brāhmans:

Harivaṁśa 8811. Pitā Budhasyottama-vīrya-karmā Purūravāḥ yasya suto nṛi-devaḥ | prāṇāgnir īḍyo 'gniṁ ajījanad yo nashṭaṁ śamī-garbha-bhavam bhavātmā | tathaiva paśchāch chakame mahātmā purorvaśīm apsarasāṁ varishṭhām | pītaḥ purā yo 'mṛita-sarva-deho muni-pravīrair vara-gātri-ghoraiḥ | nṛipaḥ kuśāgraiḥ punar eva yaś cha dhīmān kṛito 'gnir divi pūjyate cha |

"He (the Moon) was the father of Budha (Mercury), whose son was Purūravas, a god among men, of distinguished heroic deeds, the vital fire, worthy of adoration, the generator, who begot the lost fire which sprang from the heart of the śamī-wood, the great personage, who, placed to the west, loved Urvaśī, the paragon of Apsarases, who was placed to the east. This king with his entire immortal body was formerly swallowed up with the points of Kuśa grass by the munis terrible with their resplendent forms; but was again made wise, and is worshipped in heaven as fire."

Sect. IV.—Story of Nahusha.

The legend of Nahusha,[85] grandson of Purūravas (see above, p. 226), [85] The name of Nahush occurs in the Rig-veda as that of the progenitor of a race.

the second prince described by Manu as having come into hostile collision with the Brāhmans is narrated with more or less detail in different parts of the Mahābhārata, as well as in the Purāṇas. The following passage is from the former work, Ādip. 3151:

Āyusho Nahushaḥ putro dhīmān satya-parākramaḥ | rājyaṁ śaśāsa sumahad dharmeṇa pṛithivīpate | pitṛīn devān ṛishīn viprān gandharvoraga-rākshasān | Nahushaḥ pālayāmāsa brahma kshattram atho viśaḥ | sa hatvā dasyu-sanghātān ṛishīn karam adāpayat | paśuvach chaiva tān pṛishṭhe vāhayāmāsa vīryyavān | kārayāmāsa chendratvam abhibhūya divaukasaḥ | tejasā tapasā chaiva vikrameṇaujasā tathā |

"Nahusha the son of Āyus, wise, and of genuine prowess, ruled with justice a mighty empire. He protected the pitṛis, gods, rishis, wise men, gandharvas, serpents (uraga), and rākshasas, as well as Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, and Vaiśyas. This energetic prince, after slaying the hosts of the Dasyus, compelled the rishis to pay tribute, and made them carry him like beasts upon their backs. After subduing the celestials he conquered for himself the rank of Indra, through his vigour, austere fervour, valour and fire."

The story is thus introduced in another part of the same work, the Vanaparvan, section 180. Yudhishṭhira found his brother Bhīmasena seized by a serpent in a forest (see above, p. 133). This serpent, it appears, was no other than king Nahusha, who on being questioned thus relates his own history:

Nahusho nāma rājā 'ham āsam pūrvas tavānagha | prathitaḥ panchamaḥ Somād Āyoḥ putro narādhipa | kratubhis tapasā chaiva svādhyāyena damena cha | trailokyaiśvaryam avyagram prāpto 'haṁ vikrameṇa cha | tad aiśvaryyaṁ samāsādya darpo mām agamat tadā | sahasraṁ hi dvijātīnām uvāha śivikām mama | aiśvaryya-mada-matto 'ham avamanya tato dvijān | imām Agastyena daśām ānītaḥ pṛithivīpate | . . . . ahaṁ hi divi divyena vimānena charan purā | abhimānena mattaḥ san kanchid nānyam achintayam | brahmarshi-deva-gandharva-yaksha-rākshasa-pannagāḥ | karān mama prayachhanti sarve trailokya-vāsinaḥ | chakshushā yam prapaśyāmi prāṇinam prithivīpate | tasya tejo harāmy āśu tad hi dṛishṭer balam mama | maharshīṇām sahasraṁ hi uvāha śivikām mama |

See above, p. 165, note 7, and pp. 179 f. Nahusha Mānava is the traditional rishi of Rig-veda ix. 101, verses 7–9, and Yayāti Nāhusha of verses 4–6 of the same hymn. See list of rishis in Professor Aufrecht's Rig-veda ii. 464 ff.

sa mām apanayo rājan bhramśayāmāsa vai śriyaḥ | tatra hy Agastyaḥ pādena vahan sprishṭo mayā muniḥ | Agastyena tato 'smy ukto dhvaṁsa sarpeti vai rushā | tatas tasmād vimānāgryāt prachyutaś chyuta-lakshaṇaḥ | prapatan bubudhe "tmānaṁ vyālībhūtam adhomukham | ayācham tam ahaṁ vipraṁ "śāpasyānto bhaved" iti | "pramādāt sampramūḍhasya bhagavan kshantum arhasi" | tataḥ sa mām uvāchedam prapatantaṁ kṛipānvitaḥ | "Yudhishṭhiro dharma-rājaḥ śāpāt tvām mochayishyati" | . . . . ity uktvā "jagaraṁ deham muktvā na Nahusho nṛipaḥ | divyaṁ vapuḥ samāsthāya gatas tridivam eva cha |

"I was a king called Nahusha, more ancient than thou, known as the son of Āyus, and fifth in descent from Soma. By my sacrifices, austere fervour, sacred study, self-restraint, and valour, I acquired the undisturbed sovereignty of the three worlds. When I had attained that dominion, pride took possession of my soul: a thousand Brāhmans bore my vehicle. Becoming intoxicated by the conceit of my lordly power, and contemning the Brāhmans, I was reduced to this condition by Agastya." The serpent then promises to let Bhīmasena go, if Yudhishṭhira will answer certain questions (above referred to in p. 133 ff.). Yudhishṭhira afterwards enquires how delusion had happened to take possession of so wise a person as their conversation shewed Nahusha to be. The latter replies that he had been perverted by the pride of power, and proceeds: "Formerly, as I moved through the sky on a celestial car, intoxicated with self-conceit, I regarded no one but myself. All the inhabitants of the three worlds, brāhmanical rishis, gods, gandharvas, yakshas, rākshasas, pannagas, paid me tribute. Such was the power of my gaze that on what creature soever I fixed my eyes, I straightway robbed him of his energy. A thousand of the great sages bore my vehicle. That misconduct it was, o king, which hurled me from my high estate. For I then touched with my foot the muni Agastya who was carrying me. Agastya in his wrath cried out to me 'Fall, thou serpent.' Hurled therefore from that magnificent car, and fallen from my prosperity, as I descended headlong, I felt that I had become a serpent. I entreated the Brāhman (Agastya), 'Let there be a termination of the curse: thou, o reverend rishi, shouldest forgive one who has been deluded through his inconsideration.' He then compassionately replied to me as I fell, 'Yudhishṭhira, the king of righteousness, will free thee from the curse.'" And at the close of the conversation between Yudhishṭhira and the serpent, we are told that "King Nahusha, throwing of his huge reptile form, became clothed in a celestial body, and ascended to heaven."

The same story is related in greater detail in the Udyogaparvan, sections 10–16, as follows:

After his slaughter of the demon Vṛittra, Indra became alarmed at the idea of having taken the life of a Brāhman (for Vṛittra was regarded as such), and hid himself in the waters. In consequence of the disappearance of the king of the gods, all affairs, celestial as well as terrestrial, fell into confusion. The rishis and gods then applied to Nahusha to be their king. After at first excusing himself on the plea of want of power, Nahusha at length, in compliance with their solicitations, accepted the high function. Up to the period of his elevation he had led a virtuous life, but he now became addicted to amusement and sensual pleasure; and even aspired to the possession of Indrāṇī, Indra's wife, whom he had happened to see. The queen resorted to the Angiras Vṛihaspati, the preceptor of the gods, who engaged to protect her. Nahusha was greatly incensed on hearing of this interference; but the gods endeavoured to pacify him, and pointed out the immorality of appropriating another person's wife. Nahusha, however, would listen to no remonstrance, and insisted that in his adulterous designs he was no worse than Indra himself: 373. Ahalyā dharshitā pūrvam ṛishi-patnī yaśasvinī | jīvato bharttur Indreṇa sa vaḥ kiṁ na nivāritaḥ | 374. Bahūni cha nṛiśaṁsāni kṛitānīndreṇa vai purā | vaidharmyāṇy upadāś chaiva sa vaḥ kiṁ na nivāritaḥ | "373. The renowned Ahalyā, a rishi's wife, was formerly corrupted by Indra in her husband's lifetime (see p. 121 f.): Why was he not prevented by you? 374. And many barbarous acts, and unrighteous deeds, and frauds, were perpetrated of old by Indra: Why was he not prevented by you?" The gods, urged by Nahusha, then went to bring Indrāṇī; but Vṛihaspati would not give her up. At his recommendation, however, she solicited Nahusha for some delay, till she should ascertain what had become of her husband. This request was granted. The gods next applied to Vishṇu on behalf of Indra; and Vishṇu promised that if Indra would sacrifice to him, he should be purged from his guilt, and recover his dominion, while Nahusha would be destroyed. Indra sacrificed accordingly; and the result is thus told: 419. Vibhajya brahma-hatyām tu vṛiksheshu cha nadīshu cha | parvateshu pṛithivyāṁ cha strīshu chaiva Yudhishṭhira | sa vibhajya cha bhūteshu visṛijya cha sureśvaraḥ | vijvaro dhuta-pāpmā cha Vāsavo 'bhavad ātmavān | "Having divided the guilt of brahmanicide among trees, rivers, mountains, the earth, women, and the elements, Vāsava (Indra), lord of the gods, became freed from suffering and sin, and self-governed." Nahusha was by this means shaken from his place. But (unless this is said by way of prolepsis, or there is some confusion in the narrative) he must have speedily regained his position, as we are told that Indra was again ruined, and became invisible. Indrāṇī now went in search of her husband; and by the help of Upaśruti (the goddess of night and revealer of secrets) discovered him existing in a very subtile form in the stem of a lotus growing in a lake situated in a continent within an ocean north of the Himālaya. She made known to him the wicked intentions of Nahusha, and entreated him to exert his power, rescue her from danger, and resume his dominion. Indra declined any immediate interposition on the plea of Nahusha's superior strength; but suggested to his wife a device by which the usurper might be hurled from his position. She was recommended to say to Nahusha that "if he would visit her on a celestial vehicle borne by rishis, she would with pleasure submit herself to him" (449. Ṛishi-yānena divyena mām upaihi jagatpate | evaṁ tava vaśe prītā bhavishyāmīti taṁ vada). The queen of the gods accordingly went to Nahusha, by whom she was graciously received, and made this proposal: 457. Ichhāmy aham athāpūrvaṁ vāhanaṁ te surādhipa | yad na Vishṇor na Rudrasya nāsurāṇām na rākshāsām | vahantu tvām mahābhāgāḥ ṛishayaḥ sangatāḥ vibho | sarve śivikayā rājann etad hi mama rochate | "I desire for thee, king of the gods, a vehicle hitherto unknown, such as neither Vishṇu, nor Rudra, nor the asuras, nor the rakshases employ. Let the eminent rishis, all united, bear thee, lord, in a car: this idea pleases me." Nahusha receives favourably this appeal to his vanity, and in the course of his reply thus gives utterance to his self-congratulation: 463. Na hy alpa-vīryo bhavati yo vāhān kurute munīn | ahaṁ tapasvī balavān bhūta-bhavya-bhavat-prabhuḥ | mayi kruddhe jagad na syād mayi sarvam pratishṭhitam | . . . . tasmāt te vachanaṁ devi karishyāmi na saṁśayaḥ | saptarshayo māṁ vakshyanti sarve brahmarshayas tathā | paśya māhātmyam asmākaṁ ṛiddhiṁ cha varavarṇini | . . . . 468. Vimāne yojayitvā sa ṛishīn niyamam āsthitān | abrahmaṇyo

balopeto matto mada-balena cha | kāma-vṛittaḥ sa dushṭātmā vāhayāmāsa tān ṛishīn | "He is a personage of no mean prowess who makes the munis his bearers. I am a fervid devotee of great might, lord of the past, the future, and the present. If I were angry the world would no longer stand; on me everything depends. . . . . Wherefore, o goddess, I shall, without doubt, carry out what you propose. The seven rishis, and all the brāhman-rishis, shall carry me. Behold, beautiful goddess, my majesty and my prosperity." The narrative goes on: "Accordingly this wicked being, irreligious, violent, intoxicated by the force of conceit, and arbitrary in his conduct, attached to his car the rishis, who submitted to his commands, and compelled them to bear him." Indrāṇī then again resorts to Vṛihaspati, who assures her that vengeance will soon overtake Nahusha for his presumption; and promises that he will himself perform a sacrifice with a view to the destruction of the oppressor, and the discovery of Indra's lurking place. Agni is then sent to discover and bring Indra to Vṛihaspati; and the latter, on Indra's arrival, informs him of all that had occured during his absence. While Indra, with Kuvera, Yama, Soma, and Varuṇa, was devising means for the destruction of Nahusha, the sage Agastya came up, congratulated Indra on the fall of his rival, and proceeded to relate how it had occurred: 527. Śramārttāścha vahantas tam Nahusham pāpakāriṇam | devarshayo mahābhāgas tathā brahmarshayo 'malāḥ | paprachchhur Nahusham devam saṁśayaṁ jayatāṁ vara | ye ime brāhmaṇāḥ proktāḥ mantrāḥ vai prokshaṇe gavām | ete pramāṇam bhavataḥ utāho neti Vāsava | Nahusho neti tān āha tamasā mūḍha-chetanaḥ | ṛishayaḥ ūchuḥ | adharme sampravṛittas tvaṁ dharmaṁ na pratipadyase | pramāṇam etad asmākam pūrvam proktam maharshibhiḥ | Agastyaḥ uvācha | Tato vivadamānaḥ sa munibhiḥ saha Vāsava | atha mām aspṛiśad mūrdhni pādenādharma-yojitaḥ | tenābhūd hata-tejāś cha niḥśrīkaś cha mahīpatiḥ | tatas taṁ sahasā vignam avocham bhaya-pīḍitam | "yasmāt pūrvaiḥ kṛitam brahma brahmarshibhir anushṭhitam | adushṭaṁ dūshayasi vai yach cha mūrdhny aspṛiśaḥ padā | yach chāpi tvam ṛishīn mūḍha brahma-kalpān durāsadān | vāhān kṛitvā vāhayasi tena svargād hata-prabhaḥ | dhvaṁsa pāpa paribhrashṭaḥ kshīṇa-puṇyo mahītalam | daśa-varsha-sahasrāṇi sarpa-rūpa-dharo mahān | vicharishyasi pūrṇeshu punaḥ svargam avāpsyasi" | evam bhrashṭo durātmā sa deva-rājyād arindama | dishṭyā varddhāmahe śakra hato brāhmaṇa-kaṇ-

ṭakaḥ | tripishṭapam prapadyasva pāhi lokān śachīpate | jetendriyo jitāmitraḥ stūyamāno maharshibhiḥ | "Wearied with carrying the sinner Nahusha, the eminent divine-rishis, and the spotless brāhman-rishis, asked that divine personage Nahusha [to solve] a difficulty: 'Dost thou, o Vāsava, most excellent of conquerors, regard as authoritative or not those Brāhmaṇa texts which are recited at the immolation of kine?' 'No,' replied Nahusha, whose understanding was enveloped in darkness. The rishis rejoined: 'Engaged in unrighteousness, thou attainest not unto righteousness: these texts, which were formerly uttered by great rishis, are regarded by us as authoritative.' Then (proceeds Agastya) disputing with the munis, Nahusha, impelled by unrighteousness, touched me on the head with his foot. In consequence of this the king's glory was smitten and his prosperity departed. When he had instantly become agitated and oppressed with fear, I said to him, 'Since thou, o fool, contemnest that sacred text, always held in honour, which has been composed by former sages, and employed by brāhman-rishis, and hast touched my head with thy foot, and employest the Brahmā-like and irresistible rishis as bearers to carry thee,—therefore, shorn of thy lustre, and all thy merit exhausted, sink down, sinner, degraded from heaven to earth. For ten thousand years thou shalt crawl in the form of a huge serpent. When that period is completed, thou shalt again ascend to heaven.' So fell that wicked wretch from the sovereignty of the gods. Happily, o Indra, we shall now prosper, for the enemy of the Brāhmans has been smitten. Take possession of the three worlds, and protect their inhabitants, o husband of Śachī (Indrāṇī), subduing thy senses, overcoming thine enemies, and celebrated by the great rishis." [86]

Indra, as we have seen above, was noted for his dissolute character. The epithet "subduing thy senses," assigned to him in the last sentence by Agastya, is at variance with this indifferent reputation. Is it to be regarded as a piece of flattery, or as a delicate hint that the god would do well to practise a purer morality in future?

This legend appears, like some others, to have been a favourite with the compilers of the Mahābhārata; for we find it once more related, though with some variety of detail, (which may justify its repetition in a condensed form), in the Anuśāsanaparvan, verses 4745–4810. We are there told that Nahusha, in recompense for his good deeds, was exalted to heaven; where he continued to perform all divine and human ceremonies, and to worship the gods as before. At length he became puffed up with pride at the idea that he was Indra, and all his good works in consequence were neutralized. For a great length of time he compelled the rishis to carry him about. At last it came to Agastya's turn to perform the servile office. Bhṛigu then came and said to Agastya, 'Why do we submit to the insults of this wicked king of the gods?' Agastya answered that none of the rishis had ventured to curse Nahusha, because he had obtained the power of subduing to his service everyone upon whom he fixed his eyes; and that he had amṛita (nectar) for his beverage. However, Agastya said he was prepared to do anything that Bhṛigu might suggest. Bhṛigu said he had been sent by Brahmā to take vengeance on Nahusha, who was that day about to attach Agastya to his car, and would spurn him with his foot; and that he himself (Bhṛigu), "incensed at this insult, would by a curse condemn the transgressor and hater of Brāhmans to become a serpent" (vyutkrānta-dharmaṁ tam ahaṁ dharshaṇāmarshito bhṛiśam | ahir bhavasveti rushā śapsye pāpaṁ dvija-druham). All this accordingly happened as follows:

[86] Further on, in verse 556, Nahusha is called "the depraved, the hater of brahman, the sinful-minded (durāchāraś cha Nahusho brahma-dviṭ pāpachetanaḥ).

Athāgastyam ṛishi-śreshṭham vāhanāyājuhāva ha | drutaṁ Sarasvatī-kūlāt smayann iva mahābalaḥ | tato Bhṛigur mahātejāḥ Maitrāvaruṇim abravīt | "nimīlayasva nayane jaṭāṁ yāvad viśāmi te" | sthāṇubhūtasya tasyātha jaṭām prāviśad achyutaḥ | Bhṛiguḥ sa sumahātejāḥ pātanāya nṛipasya cha | tataḥ sa deva-rāṭ prāptas tam ṛishiṁ vāhanāya vai | tato 'gastyaḥ surapatiṁ vākyam āha viśāmpate | "yojayasveti māṁ kshipraṁ kaṁ cha deśaṁ vahāmi te | yattra vakshyasi tattra tvāṁ nayishyāmi surādhipa" | ity ukto Nahushas tena yojayāmāsa tam munim | Bhṛigus tasya jaṭāntaḥ-stho babhūva hṛishito bhṛiśam | na chāpi darśanaṁ tasya chakāra sa Bhṛigus tadā | vara-dāna-prabhāva-jño Nahushasya mahātmanaḥ | na chukopa tadā 'gastyo yukto 'pi Nahushena vai | taṁ tu rāja pratodena chodayāmāsa Bhārata | na chukopa sa dharmātmā tataḥ pādena deva-rāṭ | Agastyasya tadā kruddho vāmenābhyahanach chhiraḥ | tasmin śirasy abhihate sa jaṭāntargato Bhṛiguḥ | śaśāpa balavat kruddho Nahusham pāpachetasam | "yasmāt padā 'hanaḥ krodhāt śirasīmam mahāmunim | tasmād āśu mahīṁ gachha sarpo bhūtvā sudurmate" | ity uktaḥ sa tadā tena

sarpo bhūtvā papāta ha | adṛishṭenātha Bhṛiguṇā bhūtale Bharatarshabha | Bhṛiguṁ hi yadi so 'drakshyad Nahushaḥ pṛithivīpate | sa na śakto 'bhavishyad vai pātane tasya tejasā |

"The mighty Nahusha, as it were smiling, straightway summoned the eminent rishi Agastya from the banks of the Sarasvatī to carry him. The glorious Bhṛigu then said to Maitrāvaruṇi (Agastya), 'Close thy eyes whilst I enter into the knot of thy hair.' With the view of overthrowing the king, Bhṛigu then entered into the hair of Agastya who stood motionless as a stock. Nahusha then came to be carried by Agastya, who desired to be attached to the vehicle and agreed to carry the king of the gods whithersoever he pleased. Nahusha in consequence attached him. Bhṛigu, who was lodged in the knot of Agastya's hair, was greatly delighted, but did not venture to look at Nahusha, as he knew the potency of the boon which had been accorded to him (of subduing to his will everyone on whom he fixed his eyes). Agastya did not lose his temper when attached to the vehicle, and even when urged by a goad the holy man remained unmoved. The king of the gods, incensed, next struck the rishi's head with his left foot, when Bhṛigu, invisible within the knot of hair, became enraged, and violently cursed the wicked Nahusha: 'Since, fool, thou hast in thine anger smitten this great muni on the head with thy foot, therefore become a serpent, and fall down swiftly to the earth.' Being thus addressed, Nahusha became a serpent, and fell to the earth, through the agency of Bhṛigu, who remained invisible. For if he had been seen by Nahusha, the saint would have been unable, in consequence of the power possessed by the oppressor, to hurl him to the ground."

Bhṛigu, on Nahusha's solicitation, and the intercession of Agastya, placed a period to the effects of the curse, which, as in the other version of the legend, Yudhishṭhira was to be the instrument of terminating.

From several phrases which I have quoted from the version of this legend given in the Udyogaparvan, as well as the tenor of the whole, it appears to be the intention of the writers to hold up the case of Nahusha as an example of the nemesis awaiting not merely any gross display of presumption, but all resistance to the pretensions of the priesthood, and contempt of their persons or authority.

Sect. V.—Story of Nimi.

Nimi (one of Ikshvāku's sons) is another of the princes who are stigmatized by Manu, in the passage above quoted, for their want of deference to the Brāhmans. The Vishṇu P. (Wilson, 4to. ed. p. 388) relates the story as follows: Nimi had requested the Brāhman-rishi Vaśishṭha to officiate at a sacrifice, which was to last a thousand years. Vaśishṭha in reply pleaded a pre-engagement to Indra for five hundred years, but promised to return at the end of that period. The king made no remark, and Vaśishṭha went away, supposing that he had assented to this arrangement. On his return, however, the priest discovered that Nimi had retained Gautama (who was, equally with Vaśishṭha, a Brāhman-rishi) and others to perform the sacrifice; and being incensed at the neglect to give him notice of what was intended, he cursed the king, who was then asleep, to lose his corporeal form. When Nimi awoke and learnt that he had been cursed without any previous warning, he retorted, by uttering a similar curse on Vaśishṭha, and then died. "In consequence of this curse" (proceeds the Vishṇu Purāṇa, iv. 5, 6) "the vigour of Vaśishṭha entered into the vigour of Mitra and Varuṇa. Vaśishṭha, however, received from them another body when their seed had fallen from them at the sight of Urvaśī" (tach-chhāpāch cha Mitrā-varuṇayos tejasi Vaśishṭha-tejaḥ pravishṭam | Urvaśī-darśanād udbhūta-vīryya-prapātayoḥ sakāśād Vaśishṭho deham aparaṁ lehhe).[87] Nimi's body was embalmed. At the close of the sacrifice which he had begun, the gods were willing, on the intercession of the priests, to restore him to life, but he declined the offer; and was placed by the deities, according to his desire, in the eyes of all living creatures. It is in consequence of this that they are always opening and shutting (nimisha means "the twinkling of the eye").

The story is similarly related in the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, ix. 13, 1–13. A portion of the passage is as follows:

3. Nimiś chalam idaṁ vidvān sattram ārabhatātmavān | ṛitvigbhir aparais tāvad nāgamad yāvatā guruḥ | śishya-vyatikramaṁ vīkshya nirvarttya gurur āgataḥ | aśapat "patatād deho Nimeḥ paṇḍita-māninaḥ" | Nimiḥ pratidadau śāpaṁ guruve 'dharma-varttine | "tavāpi patatād deho

[87] This story will be further illustrated in the next section.

lobhād dharmam ajānataḥ" | ity utsasarjja svaṁ dehaṁ Nimir adhyātma-kovidaḥ | Mitrā-varuṇayor jajne Urvaśyām prapitāmahaḥ |

"Nimi, who was self-controlled, knowing the world to be fleeting, commenced the sacrifice with other priests until his own spiritual instructor should come back. The latter, on his return, discovering the transgression of his disciple, cursed him thus: 'Let the body of Nimi, who fancies himself learned, fall from him.' Nimi retorted the curse on his preceptor, who was acting unrighteously: 'Let thy body also fall from thee, since thou, through coveteousness, art ignorant of duty.' Having so spoken, Nimi, who knew the supreme spirit, abandoned his body: and the patriarch (Vaśishṭha) was born of Urvaśī to Mitra and Varuṇa."[88]

The offence of Nimi, as declared in these passages, is not that of contemning the sacerdotal order in general, or of usurping their functions; but merely of presuming to consult his own convenience by proceeding to celebrate a sacrifice with the assistance of another Brāhman (for Gautama also was a man of priestly descent) when his own spiritual preceptor was otherwise engaged, without giving the latter any notice of his intention. The Bhāgavata, as we have seen, awards blame impartially to both parties, and relates (as does also the Vishṇu Purāṇa) that the king's curse took effect on the Brāhman, as well as the Brāhman's on the king.

Sect. VI.—Vasishṭha.

One of the most remarkable and renowned of the struggles between Brāhmans and Kshattriyas which occur in the legendary history of India is that which is said to have taken place between Vasishṭha and Viśvāmitra. I propose to furnish full details of this conflict with its fabulous accompaniments from the Rāmāyaṇa, which dwells upon it at considerable length, as well as from the Mahābhārata, where it is repeatedly introduced; but before doing so, I shall quote the passages of the Rig-veda which appear to throw a faint light on the real history of the two rivals. It is clear from what has been said in the Introduction to this volume, pp. 1–6, as well as from the remarks I have made in pp. 139 f., that the Vedic hymns, being far more ancient than the Epic and Puranic compilations, must be more trustworthy guides to a knowledge of the remotest Indian antiquity. While the Epic poems and Puranas no doubt embody numerous ancient traditions, yet these have been freely altered according to the caprice or dogmatic views of later writers, and have received many purely fictitious additions. The Vedic hymns, on the contrary, have been preserved unchanged from a very remote period, and exhibit a faithful reflection of the social, religious, and ecclesiastical condition of the age in which they were composed, and of the feelings which were awakened by contemporary occurrences. As yet there was no conscious perversion or colouring of facts for dogmatic or sectarian purposes; and much of the information which we derive from these naïve compositions is the more trustworthy that it is deduced from hints and allusions, and from the comparison of isolated particulars, and not from direct and connected statements or descriptions. It is here therefore, if anywhere, that we may look for some light on the real relations between Vasishṭha and Viśvāmitra. After quoting the hymns regarding these two personages, I shall adduce from the Brāhmaṇas, or other later works, any particulars regarding their birth and history which I have discovered. The conflict between Vasishṭha and Viśvāmitra has been already discussed at length in the third of Dr. Rudolf Roth's "Dissertations on the literature and history of the Veda,"[89] where the most important parts of the hymns bearing upon the subject are translated. The first hymn which I shall adduce is intended for the glorification of Vasishṭha and his family. The latter part relates the birth of the sage, while the earlier verses refer to his connection with king Sudās. Much of this hymn is very obscure.

[88] On the last verse the commentator S'rīdhara has the following note: Urvaśī-darś'anāt sk'annaṁ retas tābhyāṁ kumbhe nishiktam | tasmāt prapitāmaho Vaśishṭho jajne | tathā cha śrutiḥ "kumbhe retaḥ sishichituḥ samānam" iti | "Seed fell from them at the sight of Urvas'ī and was shed into a jar: from it the patriarch, Vas'ishṭha, was born. And so says the s'ruti" (R.V. vii. 33, 13, which will be quoted in the next section).

R.V. vii. 33, 1. Śvityancho mā dakshiṇatas-kapardāḥ dhiyaṁjinvāso abhi hi pramanduḥ | uttishṭhan voce pari barhisho nṛīn na me dūrād avitave Vasishṭhāḥ | 2. Dūrād Indram anayann ā sutena tiro vaiśantam ati pāntam ugram | Pāśadyumnasya Vāyatasya somāt sutād Indro avṛiṇīta Vasishṭhān | 3. Eva in nu kaṁ sindhum ebhis tatāra eva in nu kam [89] Zur Litteratur und Geshichte des Weda. Stuttgart. 1846.

Bhedam ebhir jaghāna | eva in nu kaṁ dāśarājne Sudāsam prāvad Indro brahmaṇā vo Vasishṭhāḥ | 4. Jushṭī naro brahmaṇā vaḥ pitṝṇām aksham avyayaṁ na kila rishātha | yat śakvarīshu bṛihatā raveṇa Indre śushmam adadhāta Vasishṭhāḥ | 5. Ud dyām iva it tṛishṇajo nāthitāso adīdhayur dāśarājne vṛitāsaḥ | Vasishṭhasya stuvataḥ Indro aśrod uruṁ Tṛitsubhyo akṛiṇod u lokam | 6. Daṇḍā iva goajanāsaḥ āsan parichhinnāḥ Bharatāḥ arbhakāsaḥ | abhavach cha pura-etā Vasishṭhaḥ ād it Tṛitsūnāṁ viśo aprathanta | 7. Trayaḥ kṛiṇvanti bhuvaneshu retas tisraḥ prajāḥ āryāḥ jyotir-agrāḥ | trayo gharmāsaḥ ushasaṁ sachante sarvān it tān anu vidur Vasishṭhāḥ | 8. Sūryasya iva vakshatho jyotir eshām samudrasya iva mahimā gabhīraḥ | vātasya iva prajavo na anyena stomo Vasishṭhāḥ anu etave vaḥ | 9. Te in niṇyaṁ hṛidayasya praketaiḥ sahasra-valśam abhi saṁ charanti | yamena tatam paridhiṁ vayanto apsarasaḥ upa sedur Vasishṭhāḥ | 10. Vidyuto jyotiḥ pari saṁ jihānam Mitrā-varuṇā yad apaśyatāṁ tvā | tat te janma uta ekaṁ Vasishṭha Agastyo yat tvā viśaḥ ājabhāra | 11. Uta asi Maitrāvaruṇo Vasishṭha Urvaśyāḥ brahman manaso 'dhi jātaḥ | drapsaṁ skannam brahmaṇā daivyena viśve devāḥ pushkare tvā 'dadanta | 12. Sa praketaḥ ubhayasya pravidvān sahasradānaḥ uta vā sadānaḥ | yamena tatam paridhiṁ vayishyann apsarasaḥ pari jajne Vasishṭhaḥ | 13. Sattre ha jātāv ishitā namobhiḥ kumbhe retaḥ sishichatuḥ samānam | tato ha Mānaḥ 'ud iyāya madhyāt tato jātam ṛishim āhur Vasishṭham |

"1. The white-robed (priests) with hair-knots on the right, stimulating to devotion, have filled me with delight. Rising from the sacrificial grass, I call to the men, 'Let not the Vasishṭhas (stand too) far off to succour [or gladden] me.[90] 2. By their libation they brought Indra hither from afar across the Vaiśanta away from the powerful draught.[91] Indra preferred the Vasishṭhas to the soma offered by Pāśadyumna,[92] the son of Vayata. 3. So too with them he crossed the river; so too with them he slew Bheda; so too in the battle of the ten kings[93] Indra delivered Sudās through your prayer, o Vasishṭhas.

[90] Sāyaṇa thinks that Vasishṭha is the speaker, and refers here to his own sons. Professor Roth (under the word av) regards Indra as the speaker. May it not be Sudās?

[91] This is the interpretation of this clause suggested by Professor Aufrecht, who thinks Vaiśanta is probably the name of a river.

[92] According to Sāyaṇa, another king who was sacrificing at the same time as Sudās.

[93] See verses 6–8 of R.V. vii. 83, to be next quoted.

4. Through gratification caused by the prayer of your fathers, o men, ye do not obstruct the undecaying axle (?), since at (the recitation of the) Śakvarī verses[94] with a loud voice ye have infused energy into Indra, o Vasishṭhas. 5. Distressed, when surrounded in the fight of the ten kings, they looked up, like thirsty men, to the sky. Indra heard Vasishṭha when he uttered praise, and opened up a wide space for the Ṭṛitsus.[95] 6. Like staves for driving cattle, the contemptible Bharatas were lopped all round. Vasishṭha marched in front, and then the tribes of the Ṭṛitsus were deployed. 7. Three deities create a fertilizing fluid in the worlds. Three are the noble creatures whom light precedes. Three fires attend the dawn.[96] All these the Vasishṭhas know. 8. Their lustre is like the full radiance of the sun; their greatness is like the depth of the ocean; like the swiftness of the wind, your hymn, o Vasishṭhas, can be followed by no one else. 9. By the intuitions of their heart they seek out the mystery with a thousand branches. Weaving the envelopment stretched out by Yama, the Vasishṭhas sat down by the Apsaras. 10. When Mitra and Varuṇa saw thee quitting the flame of the lightning, that was thy birth; and thou hadst one (other birth), o Vasishṭha, when Agastya brought thee to the people. 11. And thou art also a son of Mitra and Varuṇa, o Vasishṭha, born, o priest, from the soul of Urvaśī. All the gods placed thee —a drop which fell through divine contemplation—in the vessel. 12. He, the intelligent, knowing both (worlds?), with a thousand gifts, or with gifts — he who was to weave the envelopment stretched out by Yama — he, Vasishṭha, was born of the Apsaras. 13. They, two (Mitra and Varuṇa?), born at the sacrifice, and impelled by adorations, dropped into the jar the same amount of seed. From the [94] See R.V. x. 71, 11, above, p. 256.

[95] This is evidently the name of the tribe which the Vasishṭhas favoured, and to which they themselves must have belonged. See vii. 83, 4. The Bharatas in the next verse appear to be the hostile tribe.

[96] In explanation of this Sāyaṇa quotes a passage from the Śāṭyāyana Brāhmaṇa, as follows: "Trayaḥ kṛiṇvanti bhuvaneshu retaḥ" ity Agniḥ pṛithivyām retaḥ kṛiṇoti Vāyur antarikshe Āditya divi | "tisraḥ prajāḥ āryyāḥ jyotir-agrāḥ" iti Vasavo Rudrāḥ Ādityās tāsaṁ jyotir yad asāv Ādityaḥ | "trayo gharmāsaḥ ushasaṁ sachante" ity Agnir Ushasaṁ sachate Vāyur Ushasaṁ sachate Adityaḥ Ushasaṁ sachate | (1) "Agni produces a fertilizing fluid on the earth, Vāyu in the air, the Sun in the sky. (2) The 'three noble creatures' are the Vasus, Rudras, and Adityas. The Sun is their light. (3) Agni, Vāyu, and the Sun each attend the Dawn."

midst of that arose Māna (Agastya ?); and from that they say that the rishi Vasishṭha sprang." [97]

There is another hymn (R.V. vii. 18) which relates to the connection between Vasishṭha and Sudās (verses 4, 5, 21–25) and the conflict between the latter and the Tṛitsus with their enemies (verses 6–18); but as it is long and obscure I shall content myself with quoting a few verses.[98]

R.V. vii. 18, 4. Dhenuṁ na tvā suyavase dudhukshann upa brahmāṇi sasṛije Vasishṭhaḥ | tvām id me gopatiṁ viśvaḥ āha ā naḥ Indraḥ sumatiṁ gantu achha | 5. Arṇāṁsi chit paprathānā Sudāse Indro gādhāni

[97] Whatever may be the sense of verses 11 and 13, the Nirukta states plainly enough v. 13; Tasyāḥ darśanād Mitrā-varuṇayoḥ retaś chaskanda | tad-abhivādiny eshā ṛig bhavati | "On seeing her (Urvaśī) the seed of Mitra and Varuṇa fell from them. To this the following verse (R.V. vii.33, 11) refers." And Sāyaṇa on the same verse quotes a passage from the Bṛihaddevatā: Tayor ādityayoḥ sattre dṛishṭvā 'psarasam Urvaśīm | retaś chaskanda tat kumbhe nyapatad vāsatīvare | tenaiva tu muhūrttena vīryavantau tapasvinau | Agastyaś cha Vasishṭhaś cha tatrarshī sambabhūvatuḥ | bahudhā patitaṁ retaḥ kalaśe cha jale sthale | sthale Vasishṭhas tu muniḥ samabhūvārshi-sattamaḥ | kumbhe tv Agastyaḥ sambhūto jale matsyo mahādyutiḥ | udiyāya tato 'gastyo śamyā-mātro mahātapāḥ | mānena sammito yasmāt tasmād Mānyaḥ ihochyate | yadvā kumbhād ṛishir jātaḥ kumbhenāpi hi mīyate | kumbhaḥ ity abhidhānaṁ cha parimāṇasya lakshyate | tato 'psu gṛihyamāṇāsu Vasishṭhaḥ pushkare sthitaḥ | sarvataḥ pushkare taṁ hi viśve devāḥ adhārayan | "When these two Adityas (Mitra and Varuṇa) beheld the Apsaras Urvaśī at a sacrifice their seed fell from them into the sacrificial jar called vāsatīvara. At that very moment the two energetic and austere rishis Agastya and Vasishṭha were produced there. The seed fell on many places, into the jar, into water, and on the ground. The muni Vasishṭha, most excellent of rishis, was produced on the ground; while Agastya was born in the jar, a fish of great lustre. The austere Agastya sprang thence of the size of a śamyā (i.e. the pin of a yoke; see Wilson, s.v., and Professor Roth, s.v. māna). Since he was measured by a certain standard (māna) he is called the 'measurable' (mānya). Or, the rishi, having sprung from a jar (kumbha), is also measured by a jar, as the word kumbha is also designated as the name of a measure. Then when the waters were taken, Vasishṭha remained in the vessel (pushkara); for all the gods held him in it on all sides." In his Illustrations of the Nirukta, p. 64, Prof. Roth speaks of the verses of the hymn which relate to Vasishṭha's origin as being a more modern addition to an older composition, and as describing the miraculous birth of the sage in the taste and style of the Epic mythology. Professor Max Müller (Oxford Essays for 1856, pp. 61 f.) says that Vasishṭha is a name of the Sun; and that the ancient poet is also "called the son of Mitra and Varuṇa, night and day, an expression which has a meaning only in regard to Vasishṭha, the sun; and as the sun is frequently called the offspring of the dawn, Vasishṭha, the poet, is said to owe his birth to Urvaśī" (whom Müller identifies with Ushas). For M. Langlois's view of the passage, see his French version of the R.V. vol. iii. pp. 79 f. and his note, p. 234.

[98] See Roth's Litt. u. Gesch. des Weda, pp. 87 ff. where it is translated into German.

akṛiṇot supārā | . . . . . 21. Pra ye gṛihād amamadus tvāyā Parāśaraḥ Śatayātur Vasishṭhaḥ | na te bhojasya sakhyam mṛishanta adha sūribhyaḥ sudinā vi uchhān | 22. Dve naptur Devavataḥ śate gor dvā rathā vadhūmantā Sudāsaḥ | arhann Agne Paijavanasya dānam hoteva sadma pari emi rebhan | 23. Chatvāro mā Paijavanasya dānāḥ smaddishṭayaḥ kṛiśanino nireke | ṛijrāso mā pṛithivishṭhāḥ Sudāsas tokaṁ tokāya śravase vahanti | 24. Yasya śravo rodasī antar urvī śīrshṇe śīrshṇe vibabhāja vibhaktā | sapta id Indraṁ na sravato gṛiṇanti ni Yudhyāmadhim aśiśād abhīke | imaṁ naro Marutaḥ saśchatānu Divodāsaṁ na pitaraṁ Sudāsaḥ | avishṭana Paijavanasya ketaṁ dūṇāśaṁ kshattram ajaraṁ duvoyu |

"4. Seeking to milk thee (Indra), like a cow in a rich meadow, Vasishṭha sent forth his prayers to thee; for every one tells me that thou art a lord of cows; may Indra come to our hymn. 5. However the waters swelled, Indra made them shallow and fordable to Sudās. . . . . 21. Parāśara,[99] Śatayātu, and Vasishṭha, devoted to thee, who from indifference have left their home, have not forgotten the friendship of thee the bountiful;—therefore let prosperous days dawn for these sages. 22. Earning two hundred cows and two chariots with mares, the gift of Sudās the son of Pijavana, and grandson of Devavat,[100] I walk round the house, o Agni, uttering praises, like a hotṛi priest. 23. The four brown steeds, bestowed by Sudās the son of Pijavana, vigorous, decked with pearls, standing on the ground, carry me on securely to renown from generation to generation. 24. That donor, whose fame pervades both worlds, has distributed gifts to every person. They praise him as the seven rivers[101] praise Indra; he has slain Yudhyāmadhi in battle. 25. Befriend him (Sudās), ye heroic Maruts, as

[99] Parāśara is said in Nir. vi. 30, which refers to this passage, to have been a son of Vasishṭha born in his old age (Parāśaraḥ parāśīrṇasya Vasishṭhasya sthavirasya jajne); or he was a son of Śakti and grandson of Vasishṭha (Roth s.v.)

[100] Devavat is said by Sāyana to be a proper name. He may be the same as Divodāsa in verse 25. Or Divodāsa may be the father, and Pijavana and Devavat among the forefathers of Sudās. In the Vishṇu Purāṇa Sarvakāma is said to have been the father and Ṛituparna the grandfather of Sudāsa, Wilson's V.P. 4to. ed. p. 380. At p. 454 f. a Sudāsa is mentioned who was son of Chyavana, grandson of Mitrayu and great-grandson of Divodāsa.

[101] Professor Roth (Litt. u. Gesch. des Weda, p. 100) compares R.V. i. 102, 2, asya śravo nadyaḥ sapta bibhrati, "the seven rivers exalt his (Indra's) renown." These rivers are, as Roth explains, the streams freed by Indra from Vṛittra's power.

ye did Divodāsa the (fore)father of Sudās; fulfil the desire of the son of Pijavana (by granting him) imperishable, undecaying power, worthy of reverence (?)."

Although the Vasishṭhas are not named in the next hymn, it must refer to the same persons and circumstances as are alluded to in the first portion of R.V. vii. 33, quoted above.

R.V. vii. 83, 1. Yuvāṁ narā paśyamānāsaḥ āpyam prāchā gavyantaḥ pṛithu-parśavo yayuḥ | dāsā cha vṛittrā hatam āryāṇi cha Sudāsam Indrā-varuṇā 'vasā 'vatam | 2. Yatra naraḥ samayante kṛita-dhvajo yasminn ājā bhavati kinchana priyam | yatra bhayante bhuvanā svar-dṛiśas tatra naḥ Indrā-varuṇā 'dhi vochatam | 3. Sam bhūmyāḥ antāḥ dhvasirāḥ adṛikshata Indrā-varuṇā divi ghoshaḥ āruhat | asthur janānām upa mām arātayo arvāg avasā havana-śrutā āgatam | 4. Indrā-varuṇā vadhanābhir aprati Bhedaṁ vanvantā pra Sudāsam āvatam | brahmāṇi eshāṁ śṛiṇutaṁ havīmani satyā Tṛitsūnām abhavat purohitiḥ | 5. Indrā-varuṇāv abhi ā tapanti mā aghāni aryo vanushām arātayaḥ | yuvāṁ hi vasvaḥ ubhayasya rājatho adha sma no avatam pārye divi | 6. Yuvāṁ havante ubhayāsaḥ ājishu Indraṁ cha vasvo Varuṇaṁ cha sātaye | yatra rājabhir daśabhir nibādhitam pra Sudāsam āvataṁ Tṛitsubhiḥ saha | 7. Daśa rājānaḥ samitāḥ ayajyavaḥ Sudāsam Indrā-varuṇā na yuyudhuḥ | satyā nṛiṇām adma-sadām upastutir dēvāḥ eshām abhavan deva-hūtishu | 8. Dāśarājne pariyattāya viśvataḥ Sudāse Indra-varuṇāv aśikshatam | śvityancho yatra namasā kaparddino dhiyā dhīvanto asapanta Tṛitsavaḥ |

"Looking to you, o heroes, to your friendship, the men with broad axes advanced to fight. Slay our Dāsa and our Arya enemies, and deliver Sudās by your succour, o Indra and Varuṇa. 2. In the battle where men clash with elevated banners, where something which we desire[102] is to be found, where all beings and creatures tremble, there, o Indra and Varuṇa, take our part. 3. The ends of the earth were seen to be darkened, o Indra and Varuṇa, a shout ascended to the sky; the foes of my warriors came close up to me; come hither with your help, ye hearers of our invocations. 4. Indra and Varuṇa, unequalled with your weapons, ye have slain Bheda, and delivered Sudās; ye heard the prayers of these men in their invocation; the priestly agency of the Tṛitsus[103] was efficacious. 5. O Indra and Varuṇa, the injurious acts of the enemy, the hostilities of the murderous, afflict me on every side. Ye are lords of the resources of both worlds: protect us therefore (where ye live) in the remotest heavens. 6. Both parties[104] invoke you, both Indra and Varuṇa, in the battles, in order that ye may bestow riches. (They did so in the fight) in which ye delivered Sudās —when harassed by the ten kings—together with the Tṛitsus. 7. The ten kings, who were no sacrificers, united, did not vanquish Sudās, o Indra and Varuṇa. The praises of the men who officiated at the sacrifice were effectual; the gods were present at their invocations. 8. Ye, o Indra and Varuṇa, granted succour to Sudās, hemmed in on every side in the battle of the ten kings,[105] where the white-robed Tṛitsus,[106] with hair-knots, reverentially praying, adored you with a hymn."

[102] Sāyaṇa divides the kinchana of the Pada-text into kincha na, which gives the sense "where nothing is desired, but everything is difficult."

From these hymns it appears that Vasishṭha, or a Vasishṭha and his family were the priests of king Sudās (vii. 18, 4 f., 21 ff.; vii. 33, 3 f.); that, in their own opinion, these priests were the objects of Indra's preference (vii. 33, 2), and had by the efficacy of their intercessions been the instruments of the victory gained by Sudās over his enemies in the battle of the ten kings. It seems also to result from some of the verses (vii. 33, 6; vii. 83, 4, 6; and vii. 33, 1, compared with vii. 83, 8) that both the king and the priests belonged to the tribe of the Tṛitsus.[107] Professor Roth remarks that in none of the hymns which

[103] Compare verses 7 and 8. Sāyaṇa, however, translates the clause differently: "The act of the Tṛitsus for whom I sacrificed, and who put me forward as their priest, was effectual: my priestly function on their behalf was successful" (Tṛitsūnām etat-sanjnānām mama yājyānām purohitir mama purodhānam satyā satya-phalam abhavat | teshu yad mama paurohityaṁ tat saphalaṁ jātam |

[104] According to Sāyaṇa the two parties were Sudās and the Tṛitsus his allies (ubhaya-vidhāḥ Sudāḥ-sanjno rājā tat-sahāya-bhūtās Tṛitsavaś cha evaṁ dvi-prakārāḥ janāḥ). It might have been supposed that one of the parties meant was the hostile kings; but they are said in the next verse to be ayajyavaḥ, "persons who did not sacrifice to the gods."

[105] Dāśarājne. This word is explained by Sāyaṇa in his note on vii. 33, 3, daśabhī rājabhiḥ saha yuddhe pravritte, "battle having been joined with ten kings." In the verse before us he says "the lengthening of the first syllable is a Vedic peculiarity, and that the case-ending is altered, and that the word merely means 'by the ten kings'" (daśa-śabdasya chhāndaso dīrghaḥ | vibhakti-vyatyayaḥ | daśabhī rājabhiḥ . . . . pariveshṭitāya).

[106] Here Sāyaṇa says the Tṛitsus are "the priests so called who were Vasishṭha's disciples" (Tṛitsavo Vasishṭha-śishyāḥ etat-sanjnāḥ ṛitvijaḥ).

[107] See Roth, Litt. u. Gesch. des Weda, p. 120.

he quotes is any allusion made to the Vasishṭhas being members of any particular caste; but that their connection with Sudās is ascribed to their knowledge of the gods, and their unequalled power of invocation (vii. 33, 7 f.)

In the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, viii. 21, we have another testimony to the connection of Vasishṭha with Sudās, as he is there stated to have "consecrated Sudās son of Pijavana by a great inauguration similar to Indra's;[108] in consequence of which Sudās went round the earth in every direction conquering, and performed an aśvamedha sacrifice" (etena ha vai aindreṇa mahābhishekeṇa Vasishṭhaḥ Sudāsam Paijavanam abhishishecha | tasmād u Sudāḥ Paijavanaḥ samantaṁ sarvataḥ pṛithivīṁ jayan parīyāya aśvena cha medhyena īje).

The following passages refer to Vasishṭha having received a revelation from the god Varuṇa, or to his being the object of that god's special favour:

vii. 87, 4. Uvācha me Varuṇo medhirāya triḥ sapta nāma aghnyā bibhartti | vidvān padasya guhyā na vochad yugāya vipraḥ upāraya śikshan |

"Varuṇa has declared to me[109] who am intelligent, 'The Cow[110] possesses thrice seven names. The wise god, though he knows them, has not revealed the mysteries of (her) place, which he desires to grant to a future generation."

R.V. vii. 88, 3. Ā yad ruhāva Varuṇaś cha nāvam pra yat samudram īrayāva madhyam | adhi yad apāṁ snubhiś charāva pra pra īnkhe īnkhayāvahai śubhe kam | 4. Vasishṭhaṁ ha Varuṇo nāvi ā adhād ṛishiṁ chakāra svapāḥ mahobhiḥ | stotāraṁ viprāḥ sudinatve ahnāṁ yād nu dyāvas tatanan yād ushasaḥ | 5. Kva tyāni nau sakhyā babhūvuḥ sachāvahe yad

[108] Colebrooke's Misc. Essays, i. 40.

[109] Vasishṭha is not named in this hymn, but he is its traditional author.

[110] Sāyaṇa says that either (1) Vāch is here meant under the figure of a cow having the names of 21 metres, the Gāyatrī, etc., attached to her breast, throat, and head, or (2) that Vāch in the form of the Veda holds the names of 21 sacrifices; but that (3) another authority says the earth is meant, which (in the Nighaṇṭu, i. 1) has 21 names, go, gmā, jmā, etc. (Vāg atra gaur uchyate | sā cha urasi kaṇṭhe śirasi cha baddhāni gāyatry-ādīni sapta chhandasāṁ nāmāni bibhartti | yadvā vedātmikā vāg ekaviṁśati-saṁsthānāṁ yajnānāṁ nāmāni bibhartti | dhārayati | aparaḥ āha "gauḥ pṛithivī | tasyāś cha 'gaur gmā jmā' iti paṭhitāny ekaviṁsati-nāmāni" iti). I have, in translating the second clause of the verse, followed for the most part a rendering suggested by Professor Aufrecht.

avṛikam purā chit | bṛihantam mānam Varuṇa svadhāvaḥ sahasra-dvāraṁ jagama gṛihaṁ te | 6. Yaḥ āpīr nityo Varuṇa priyaḥ san tvām āgāṁsi kṛiṇavat sakhā te | mā te enasvanto yakshin bhujema yandhi sma vipraḥ stuvate varūtham |

"When Varuṇa and I embark on the boat, when we propel it into the midst of the ocean, when we advance over the surface of the waters, may we rock upon the undulating element till we become brilliant. 4. Varuṇa took Vasishṭha into the boat; by his mighty acts working skilfully he (Varuṇa) has made him a rishi; the wise (god has made) him an utterer of praises in an auspicious time, that his days and dawns may be prolonged.[111] 5. Where are (now) our friendships, the tranquility which we enjoyed of old? We have come, o self-sustaining Varuṇa, to thy vast abode, to thy house with a thousand gates. 6. Whatever friend of thine, being a kinsman constant and beloved, may commit offences against thee;—may we not, though sinful, suffer (punishment), o adorable being; do thou, o wise god, grant us protection."

R.V. vii. 86 is a sort of penitential hymn in which Vasishṭha refers to the anger of Varuṇa against his old friend (verse 4) and entreats forgiveness of his offences. This hymn, which appears to be an earnest and genuine effusion of natural feeling, is translated in Professor Müller's Anc. Sansk. Lit. p. 540.

The passage which follows is part of a long hymn, consisting chiefly of imprecations directed against Rākshăses and Yātudhānas, and said in the Bṛihaddevatā (as quoted by Sāyaṇa in his introductory remarks) to have "been 'seen' by the rishi (Vasishṭha) when he was overwhelmed with grief and anger for the loss of his hundred sons who had been slain by the sons of Sudās" (ṛishir dadarśa raksho-ghnam puttra-śoka-pariplutāḥ | hate puttra-śate kruddhaḥ Saudāsair duḥkhitas tadā). I shall cite only the verses in which Vasishṭha repels the imputation (by whomsoever it may have been made) that he was a demon (Rakshas or Yātudhana).

R.V. vii. 104, 12. Suvijñānaṁ chikitushe janāya sach cha asach cha vachasī paspṛidhāte | tayor yat satyaṁ yatarad ṛijīyas tad it Somo avati hanti asat | 13. Na vai u Somo vṛijinaṁ hinoti na kshattriyam mithuyā

[111] Professor Aufrecht renders the last clause, "As long as days and dawns shall continue."

dhārayantam | hanti raksho hanti asad vadantam ubhāv Indrasya prasitau śayāte | 14. Yadi vā aham anṛita-devaḥ āsa moghaṁ vā devān api ūhe Agne | kim asmabhyaṁ Jātavedo hṛiṇīshe droghavāchas te nirṛithaṁ sachantām | 15. Adya murīya yadi yātudhāno asmi yadi vā āyus tatapa pūrushasya | adha sa vīrair daśabhir vi yuyāḥ yo mā moghaṁ "Yātudhāna" ity āha | 16. Yo mā ayātuṁ "yātudhāna" ity āha yo vā rakshāḥ "śuchir asmi" ity āha | Indras taṁ hantu mahatā vadhena viśvasya jantor adhamas padīshṭa |

"The intelligent man is well able to discriminate (when) true and false words contend together. Soma favours that one of them which is true and right, and annihilates falsehood. 13. Soma does not prosper the wicked, nor the man who wields power unjustly. He slays the Rakshas; he slays the liar: they both lie (bound) in the fetters of Indra. 14. If I were either a follower of false gods, or if I erroneously conceived of the gods, o Agni:—Why, o Jātavedas, art thou incensed against us? Let injurious speakers fall into thy destruction. 15. May I die this very day, if I be a Yātudhāna, or if I have destroyed any man's life. May he be severed from his ten sons who falsely says to me, 'o Yātudhāna.' 16. He who says to me, who am no Yātu, 'o Yātudhāna,' or who (being himself) a Rakshas, says, 'I am pure,'—may Indra smite him with his great weapon; may he sink down the lowest of all creatures.

In elucidation of this passage Sāyaṇa quotes the following lines: Hatvā puttra-śatam pūrvaṁ Vasishṭhasya mahātmanaḥ | Vasishṭhaṁ "rākshaso 'si tvaṁ" Vāsishṭhaṁ rūpam āsthitaḥ | "aham Vasishṭhaḥ" ity evaṁ jighāṁsuḥ rākshaso 'bravīt | atrottarāḥ ṛicho dṛishṭāḥ Vasishṭheneti naḥ śrutam |

"Having slain the hundred sons of the great Vasishṭha, a murderous Rākshasa, assuming the form of that rishi, formerly said to him, 'Thou art a Rākshasa, and I am Vasishṭha.' In allusion to this the latter verses were seen by Vasishṭha, as we have heard."

We may, however, safely dismiss this explanation resting on fabulous grounds.

The verses may, as Professor Max Müller supposes,[112] have arisen out [112] "Vasishṭha himself, the very type of the Arian Brahman, when in feud with Viśvāmitra, is called not only an enemy, but a 'Yātudhāna,' and other names which in common parlance are only bestowed on barbarian savages and evil spirits. We of Vasishṭha's contest with Viśvāmitra, and it may have been the latter personage who brought these charges of heresy, and of murderous and demoniacal character against his rival.[113]

Allusion is made both in the Taittirīya Sanhitā and in the Kaushītakī Brāhmaṇa to the slaughter of a son of Vasishṭha by the sons or descendants of Sudās. The former work states, Ashṭaka vii. (p. 47 of the India Office MS. No. 1702):

Vasishṭho hataputro 'kāmayata "vindeya prajām abhi Saudāsān bhaveyam" iti | sa etam ekasmānnapanchāśam apaśyat tam āharat tenāyajata | tato vai so 'vindata prajām abhi Saudāsān abhavat |

"Vasishṭha, when his son had been slain, desired, 'May I obtain offspring; may I overcome the Saudāsas.' He beheld this ekasmānnapanchāśa (?), he took it, and sacrificed with it. In consequence he obtained offspring, and overcame the Saudāsas."

The passage of the Kaushītakī Brāhmaṇa, 4th adhyāya, as quoted by Professor Weber (Ind. St. ii. 299) is very similar:

Vasishṭho 'kāmayata hata-putraḥ "prajāyeya prajayā paśubhir abhi Saudāsān bhaveyam" iti | sa etaṁ yajna-kratum apaśyad Vasishṭhayajnam . . . . tena ishṭvā . . . . abhi Saudāsān abhavat |

"Vasishṭha, when his son had been slain, desired, 'May I be fruitful in offspring and cattle, and overcome the Saudāsas.' He beheld this form of offering, the Vasishṭha-sacrifice; and having performed it, he overcame the Saudāsas."

In his introduction to Rig-veda, vii. 32, Sāyaṇa has the following notice from the Anukramanikā:

"Saudāsair agnau prakshipyamāṇaḥ Ś'aktir antyam pragātham ālebhe so 'rdharche ukte 'dahyata | tam putroktaṁ Vasishṭhaḥ samāpayata" iti Sāṭyāyanakam | "Vasishṭhasya eva hata-putrasya ārsham" iti Tāṇḍakam |

"The Sāṭyayana Brāhmaṇa says that 'Śakti (son of Vasishṭha), when being thrown into the fire by the Saudāsas, received (by inspiration) the concluding pragātha of the hymn. He was burnt after he had spoken half a ṛich; and Vasishṭha completed what his son was have still the very hymn in which Vasishṭha deprecates such charges with powerful indignation." Prof. Müller then quotes verses 14–16 of the hymn before us ("Last Results of the Turanian Researches," in Bunsen's "Outlines of the Philosophy of Univ. History," i. 344.

[113] See my article "On the relations of the priests to the other classes of Indian society in the Vedic age," in the Journal Roy. As. Soc. for 1866, pp. 295 ff.

uttering. The Tāṇḍaka says that 'it was Vasishṭha himself who spoke the whole when his son was slain.'"

The words supposed to have been spoken by Śakti, viz. "O Indra, grant to us strength as a father to his sons" (Indra kratuṁ naḥ ā bhara pitā putrebhyo yathā) do not seem to be appropriate to the situation in which he is said to have been placed; and nothing in the hymn appears to allude to any circumstances of the kind imagined in the two Brāhmaṇas.

Manu says of Vasishṭha (viii. 110): Maharshibhiś cha devaiś cha kāryyārthaṁ śapathāḥ kṛitāḥ | Vasishṭhaś chāpi śapathaṁ śepe Paiyavane nṛipe | "Great rishis and gods too have taken oaths for particular objects. Vasishṭha also swore an oath to king Paiyavana." The occasion on which this was done is stated by the Commentator Kullūka: Vasishṭho 'py anena puttra-śatam bhakshitam iti Viśvāmitreṇa ākrushṭo sva-pariśuddhaye Piyavanāpatye Sudāmni rājani śapathaṁ chakāra | "Vasishṭha being angrily accused by Viśvāmitra of having eaten (his) hundred sons, took an oath before king Sudāman (Sudās, no doubt, is meant) the son of Piyavana in order to clear himself." This seems to refer to the same story which is alluded to in the passage quoted by the Commentator on Rig-veda vii. 104, 12.

In the Rāmāyaṇa, i. 55, 5 f., a hundred sons of Viśvāmitra are said to have been burnt up by the blast of Vasishṭha's mouth when they rushed upon him armed with various weapons (Viśvāmitra-sutānāṁ tu śataṁ nānā-vidhāyudham | abhyadhāvat susankruddhaṁ Vasishṭham japatāṁ varam | hunkareṇaiva tān sarvān nirdadāha mahān ṛishiḥ).

Vasishṭha is also mentioned in Rig-veda, i. 112, 9, as having received succour from the Aśvins (—Vasishṭhaṁ yābhir ajarāv ajinvatam).

Vasishṭha, or the Vasishṭhas, are also referred to by name in the following verses of the seventh Mandala of the Rig-veda: 7, 7; 9, 6; 12, 3; 23, 1, 6; 26, 5; 37, 4; 39, 7; 42, 6; 59, 3; 70, 6; 73, 3; 76, 6, 7; 77, 6; 80, 1; 90, 7; 95, 6; 96, 1, 3; but as no information is derivable from these texts, except that the persons alluded to were the authors or reciters of the hymns, it is needless to quote them.[114]

[114] Another verse of a hymn in which the author is not referred to (vii. 72, 2) is as follows: Ā no devebhir upa yātam arvāk sajoshashā nāsatyā rathena | yuvor hi naḥ sakhyā pitryāṇi samāno bandhur uta tasya vittam | "Come near to us, Aśvins, on the same car with the gods: for we have ancestral friendships with you, a common relation; do ye recognize it." Although this has probably no mythological

In the Atharva-veda, iv. 29, 3 and 5, Vasishṭha and Viśvāmitra are mentioned among other personages, Angiras, Agasti, Jamadagni, Atri, Kaśyapa, Bharadvāja, Gavishṭhira, and Kutsa, as being succoured by Mitra and Varuṇa (. . . . yāv Angirasam avatho yāv Agastim Mitrā-Varuṇā Jamadagnim Atrim | yau Kaśyapam avatho yau Vasishṭham . . . . yau Bharadvājam avatho yau Gavishṭhiraṁ Viśvāmitraṁ Varuṇa Mitra Kutsam). And in the same Veda, xviii. 3, 15 f., they are invoked as deliverers: Viśvāmitro 'yaṁ Jamadagnir Atrir avantu naḥ Kaśyapo Vāmadevaḥ | Viśvāmitra Jamadagne Vasishṭha Bharadvāja Gotama Vāmadeva . . . | "15. May this Viśvāmitra, may Jamadagni, Atri, Kaśyapa, Vāmadeva preserve us. 16. O Viśvāmitra, o Jamadagni, o Vasishṭha, o Bharādvaja, o Gotama, o Vāsmadeva." The second passage at least must be a good deal more recent than the most of the hymns of the Rig-veda.

Sudās is mentioned in other parts of the Rig-veda without any reference either to Vasishṭha or to Visvāmitra. In some cases his name is coupled with that of other kings or sages, which appears to shew that in some of these passages at least a person, and not a mere epithet, "the liberal man," is denoted by the word Sudās.

R.V. i. 47, 6. (The traditional rishi is Praskaṇva.) Sudāse dasrā vasu bibhratā rathe pṛiksho vuhatam Aśvinā | rayiṁ samudrād uta vā divas pari asme dhattam puru-spṛiham |

"O impetuous Aśvins, possessing wealth in your car, bring sustenance to Sudās. Send to us from the (aerial) ocean, or the sky, the riches which are much coveted."

Sāyaṇa says the person here meant is "king Sudās, son of Pijavana" (Sudāse . . . . rājne Pijavana-puttrāya).

i. 63, 7. (The rishi is Nodhas, of the family of Gotama.) Tvaṁ ha tyad Indra sapta yudhyan puro vajrin Purukutsāya dardaḥ | barhir na yat Sudāse vṛithā varg anho rājan varivaḥ Pūrave kaḥ |

"Thou didst then, o thundering Indra, war against, and shatter, the seven cities for Purukutsa, when thou, o king, didst without effort hurl reference, Sāyaṇa explains it as follows: Vivasvān Varuṇaś cha ubhāv api Kaśyapād Aditer jātau | Vivasvān Aśvinor janako Varuṇo Vasishṭhasya ity evam samāna-bandhutvam | "Vivasvat and Varuṇa were both sons of Kaśyapa and Aditi. Vivasvat was the father of the Aśvins and Varuṇa of Vasishṭha; such is the affinity." Sāyaṇa then quotes the Bṛihaddevatā to prove the descent of the Aśvins from Vivasvat. Compare R.V. x. 17, 1, 2, and Nirukta, xii. 10, 11.

away distress from Sudās like a bunch of grass, and bestow wealth on Pūru.[115]

i. 112, 19. (The rishi is Kutsa.) . . . . yābhir Sudāse ūhathuḥ sudevyaṁ tābhir u shu ūtibhir Aśvinā gatam |

"Come, o Aśvins, with those succours whereby ye brought glorious power to Sudās" ['son of Pijavana'—Sāyaṇa].[116]

The further texts which follow are all from the seventh Mandala, of which the rishis, with scarcely any exception, are said to be Vasishṭha and his descendants:

vii. 19, 3. Tvaṁ dhṛishṇo dhṛishatā vītahavyam prāvo viśvābhir ūtibhiḥ Sudāsam | pra Paurukutsiṁ Trasadasyum āvaḥ kshettrasātā vṛittrahatyeshu Pūrum |

"Thou, o fierce Indra, hast impetuously protected Sudās, who offered oblations, with every kind of succour. Thou hast preserved Trasadasyu the son of Purukutsa, and Pūru in his conquest of land and in his slaughter of enemies."

vii. 20, 2. Hantā Vṛittram Indraḥ śuśuvānaḥ prāvīd nu vīro jaritāram utī | karttā Sudāse aha vai u lokaṁ dātā vasu muhur u dāśushe bhūt |

"Indra growing in force slays Vṛitra; the hero protects him who praises him; he makes room for Sudās [or the liberal sacrificer—kalyāṇa-dānāya yajamānāya. Sāyaṇa]; he gives riches repeatedly to his worshipper."

vii. 25, 3. Śatam te śiprinn ūtayaḥ Sudāse sahasraṁ saṁsāḥ uta rātir astu | jahi vadhar vanusho marttyasya asme dyumnam adhi ratnaṁ cha dhehi |

"Let a hundred succours come to Sudās, a thousand desirable (gifts) and prosperity. Destroy the weapon of the murderous. Confer renown and wealth on us."

(Sāyaṇa takes sudās here and in all the following citations to signify a "liberal man.")

[115] Professor Roth renders this passage differently in his Litt. u. Gesch. des Weda, p. 132; as does also Prof. Benfey, Orient und Occident, i. p. 590.

[116] In R.V. i. 185, 9, we find the word sudās in the comparative degree sudāstara, where it must have the sense of "very liberal": bhūri chid aryaḥ sudāstarāya | "(give the wealth) of my enemy, though it be abundant to (me who am) most liberal." In v. 53, 2, the term sudās appears to be an adjective: ā etān ratheshu tasthushaḥ kaḥ śuśrāva kathā yayuḥ | kasmai sasruḥ sudāse anu āpayaḥ ilābhir vṛishṭayaḥ saha | "Who has heard them (the Maruts) mounted on their cars, how they have gone? To what liberal man have they resorted as friends, (in the form of) showers with blessings?"

vii. 32. 10. Nakiḥ Sudāso ratham pari āsa na rīramat | Indro yasya avitā yasya Maruto gamat sa gomati vraje |

"No one can oppose or stop the chariot of Sudās. He whom Indra, whom the Maruts, protect, walks in a pasture filled with cattle."

vii. 53, 3: Uto hi vaṁ ratnadheyāni santi purūṇi dyāvā-pṛithivī Sudāse |

"And ye, o Heaven and Earth, have many gifts of wealth for Sudās [or the liberal man]."

vii. 60, 8. Yad gopāvad Aditiḥ śarma bhadram Mitro yachhanti Varuṇaḥ Sudāse | tasminn ā tokaṁ tanayaṁ dadhānāḥ mā karma devaheḷanaṁ turāsaḥ | 9. . . . . pari dveshobhir Aryamā vṛiṇaktu uruṁ Sudāse vṛishaṇau u lokam |

"Since Aditi, Mitra, and Varuṇa afford secure protection to Sūdas (or the liberal man), bestowing on him offspring;—may we not, o mighty deities, commit any offence against the gods. 9. . . . . May Aryaman rid us of our enemies. (Grant) ye vigorous gods, a wide space to Sudās."

There is another passage, vii. 64, 3 (bravad yathā naḥ ād ariḥ Sudāse), to which I find it difficult to assign the proper sense.

Vasishṭha is referred to in the following passages of the Brāhmaṇas:

Kāṭhaka 37, 17.[117] Ṛishayo vai Indram pratyakshaṁ na apaśyaṁs taṁ Vasishṭhaḥ eva pratyasham apaśyat | so 'bibhed "itarebhyo mā ṛishibhyaḥ pravakshyati" iti[118] | so 'bravīd "brāhmaṇaṁ te vakshyāmi yathā tvat-purohitāḥ prajāḥ prajanishyante | atha mā itarebhyaḥ ṛishibhyo mā pravochaḥ" iti | tasmai etān stoma-bhāgān abravīt tato Vasishṭha-purohitāḥ prajāḥ prājāyanta |

"The rishis did not behold Indra face to face; it was only Vasishṭha who so beheld him. He (Indra) was afraid lest Vasishṭha should reveal him to the other rishis; and said to him, 'I shall declare to thee a Brāhmaṇa in order that men may be born who shall take thee for their purohita. Do not reveal me to the other rishis.' Accordingly he declared to him these parts of the hymn. In consequence men were born who took Vasishṭha for their purohita."

[117] Quoted by Professor Weber, Indische Studien, iii. 478.

[118] The words from so 'bibhet down to iti are omitted in the Taitt. Sanhitā, iii. 5, 2, 2, where this passage is also found. Weber refers in Ind. St. ii. to another part of the Kāṭhaka, ii. 9, where Vasishṭha is alluded to as having "seen" a text beginning with the word purovāta during a time of drought ("Purovāta" iti vṛishṭy-apete bhūta-grāme Vasishṭho dadarśa).

Professor Weber refers in the same place to a passage of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa relating to the former superiority of Vasishṭha's family in sacred knowledge and priestly functions:

xii. 6, 1, 38. Vasishṭho ha virājam vidānchakāra tāṁ ha Indro 'bhidadhyau | sa ha uvācha "ṛishe virājam ha vai vettha tām me brūhi" iti | sa ha uvācha "kim mama tataḥ syād" iti | "sarvasya cha te yajnasya prāyaśchittim brūyāṁ rūpaṁ cha tvā darśayeya" iti | sa ha uvācha "yad nu me sarvasya yajnasya prāyaśchittim brūyāḥ kim u sa syād yaṁ tvaṁ rūpaṁ darśayethāḥ" iti | jīva-svarga eva asmāl lokāt preyād" iti | tato ha etām ṛishir Indrāya virājam uvācha "iyaṁ vai virāḍ" iti | tasmād yo 'syai bhūyishṭhaṁ labhate sa eva śreshṭho bhavati | atha ha etām Indraḥ ṛishaye prāyaśchittim uvācha agnihotrād agre ā mahataḥ ukthāt | tāḥ ha sma etāḥ purā vyāhṛitīr Vasishṭhāḥ eva viduḥ | tasmād ha sma purā Vāsishṭhaḥ eva brahmā bhavati |

"Vasishṭha was acquainted with the Virāj (a particular Vedic metre). Indra desired it; and said, 'O rishi, thou knowest the Virāj: declare it to me.' Vasishṭha asked: 'What (advantage) will result to me from doing so?' (Indra replied) 'I shall both explain to thee the forms for rectifying anything amiss (prāyaśchitti)[119] in the entire sacrifice, and show thee its form.' Vasishṭha further enquired, 'If thou declarest to me the remedial rites for the entire sacrifice, what shall he become to whom thou wilt show the form?' (Indra answered) 'He shall ascend from this world to the heaven of life.' The rishi then declared this Virāj to Indra, saying, 'this is the Virāj.' Wherefore it is he who obtains the most of this (Virāj) that becomes the most eminent. Then Indra explained to the rishi this remedial formula from the agnihotra to the great uktha. Formerly the Vasishṭhas alone knew these sacred syllables (vyāhṛiti). Hence in former times a Vasishṭha only was a (priest of the kind called) brāhmaṇ."

Professor Weber quotes also the following from the Kāṭhaka 32, 2. Yām abrāhmaṇaḥ prāśnāti sā skannā āhutis tasyā vai Vasishṭhaḥ eva prāyaśchittaṁ vidānchakāra | "The oblation of which a person not a brāhman partakes is vitiated. Vasishṭha alone knew the remedial rite for such a case."

[119] See above, p. 294.

In the Shaḍviṁśa Brāhmaṇa of the Sāma-veda, quoted by the same writer (Ibid. i. 39, and described p. 37, as possessing a distinctly formed Brahmanical character indicating a not very early date), we have the following passage:

i. 5. Indro ha Viśvāmitrāya uktham uvācha Vasishṭhāya brahma vāg uktham ity eva Viśvāmitrāya mano brahma Vasishṭhāya | tad vai etad Vāsishṭham brahma | api ha evaṁvidhaṁ vā Vāsishṭhaṁ vā brahmāṇaṁ kurvīta |

"Indra declared the uktha (hymn) to Viśvāmitra, and the brāhmăn (devotion) to Vasishṭha. The uktha is expression (vāk); that (he made known) to Viśvāmitra; and the brāhmăn is the soul; that (he made known) to Vasishṭha. Hence this brāhmăn (devotional power) belongs to the Vasishṭhas. Moreover, let either a person of this description, or a man of the family of Vasishṭha, be appointed a brāhmăn-priest."

Here the superiority of Vasishṭha over Viśvāmitra is clearly asserted.[120]

Vasishṭha is mentioned in the Mahābhārata, Śantip. verses 11221 ff., as having communicated divine knowledge to king Janaka, and as referring (see verses 11232, 11347, 11409, 11418, 11461, etc.) to the Sānkhya and Yoga systems. The sage is thus characterized:

11221. Vasishṭhaṁ śreshṭham āsīnam ṛishīṇām bhāskara-dyutim | paprachha Janako rājā jñānaṁ naiśśreyasam param | param adhyātma-kuśalam adhātma-gati-niśchayam | Maitrāvaruṇim āsīnam abhivādya kṛitāñjaliḥ |

"King Janaka with joined hands saluted Vasishṭha the son of Mitra and Varuṇa, the highest and most excellent of rishis, resplendent as the sun, who was acquainted with the Supreme Spirit, who had ascertained the means of attaining to the Supreme Spirit; and asked him after that highest knowledge which leads to final beatitude."

The doctrine which the saint imparts to the king he professes to have derived from the eternal Hiraṇyagarbha, i.e. Brahmā (avāptam etad hi mayā sanātanād Hiraṇyagarbhād gadato narādhipa).

I have already in former parts of this volume quoted passages from Manu, the Vishṇu Purāṇa, and the Mahābhārata, regarding the creation [120] Professor Weber mentions (Ind. St. i. 53) that in the commentary of Rāmakṛishṇa on the Pāraskara Gṛihya Sūtras allusion is made to the "Chhandogas who follow the Sūtras of the Vasishṭha family" (Vāsishṭha-sūtrānuchāriṇaś chhandogāḥ).

of Vasishṭha. The first-named work (see above, p. 36) makes him one of ten Maharshis created by Manu Svāyambhuva in the first (or Svāyambhuva) Manvantara. The Vishṇu Purāṇa (p. 65) declares him to have been one of nine mind-born sons or Brahmās created by Brahmā in the Manvantara just mentioned. The same Purāṇa, however, iii. 1, 14, makes him also one of the seven rishis of the existing or Vaivasvata Manvantara, of which the son of Vivasvat, Śrāddhadeva,[121] is the Manu (Vivasvataḥ suto vipra Śrāddhadevo mahādyutiḥ | Manuḥ saṁvarttate dhīmān sāmpratañ saptame 'ntare . . . . Vasishṭhaḥ Kāśyapo 'thātrir Jamadagniḥ sa-Gautamaḥ | Viśvāmitra-Bharadvājau sapta saptarshayo 'bhavan). The Mahābhārata (see p. 122) varies in its accounts, as in one place it does not include Vasishṭha among Brahmā's six mind-born sons, whilst in a second passage it adds him to the number which is there raised to seven,[122] and in a third text describes him as one of twenty-one Prajāpatis.

According to the Vishṇu Purāṇa, i. 10, 10, "Vasishṭha had by his wife Ūrjjā" (one of the daughters of Daksha, and an allegorical personage, see V. P. i. 7, 18), seven sons called Rajas, Gātra, Ūrddhvabāhu, Savana, Anagha, Sutapas, and Sukra, who were all spotless rishis" (Ūrjjāyāñ cha Vasishṭhasya saptājāyanta vai sutāḥ | Rajo-Gātrordhhvabāhuścha Savanaś chānaghas tathā' | Sutapāḥ Śukraḥ ity ete sarve saptarshayo 'malāḥ). This must be understood as referring to the Svāyambhuva Manvantara. The Commentator says these sons were the seven rishis in the third Manvantara (saptarshayas tṛitīya-manvantare). In the description of that period the V. P. merely says, without naming them (iii. 1, 9) that "the seven sons of Vasishṭha were the seven rishis" (Vasishṭha-tanayās tatra sapta saptarshayo 'bhavan).[123] The Bhāgavata Purāṇa (iv. 1, 40 f.) gives the names of Vasishṭha's sons differently; and also specifies Śaktṛi and others as the offspring of a different marriage. (Compare Professor Wilson's notes on these passages of the Vishṇu Purāṇa.)

[121] See above p. 209, note 66, and pp. 188 ff.

[122] In another verse also (Ādip. 6638, which will be quoted below in a future section) he is said to be a mind-born son of Brahmā.

[123] Ūrjja, who in the Vishṇu P. iii. 1, 6, is stated to be one of the rishis of the second or Svārochisha Manvantara, is said in the Vāyu P. to be a son of Vasishṭha. See Professor Wilson's note (vol. iii. p. 3) on Vishṇu P. iii. 1, 6. The Vāyu P. also declares that one of the rishis in each of the fourth and fifth Manvantaras was a son of Vasishṭha. (See Prof. Wilson's notes (vol. iii. pp. 8 and 11) on Vishṇu P. iii. 1.)

In Manu, ix. 22 f., it is said that "a wife acquires the qualities of the husband with whom she is duly united, as a river does when blended with the ocean. 23. Akshamālā, though of the lowest origin, became honourable through her union with Vasishṭha, as did also Sārangī through her marriage with Mandapāla" (Yādṛig-guṇena bhartṛā strī saṁyujyate yathāvidhi | tādṛig-guṇā sā bhavati samudreṇeva nimnagā | 23. Akshamālā Vasishṭheṇa saṁyuktā 'dhama-yoni-jā | Sārangī Mandāpalena jagāmābhyarhaṇīyatām).

Vasishṭha's wife receives the same name (Vasishṭhas chākshamālayā) in a verse of the Mahābhārata (Udyogaparvan, v. 3970);[124] but in two other passages of the same work, which will be adduced further on, she is called Arundhatī.[125]

According to the Vishṇu Purāṇa (ii. 10, 8) Vasishṭha is one of the superintendents who in the month of Āshāḍha abide in the Sun's chariot, the others being Varuṇa, Rambhā, Sahajanyā, Huhu, Budha, and Rathachitra (Vasishṭho Varuṇo Rambhā Sahajanyā Huhur Budhaḥ | Rathachitras tathā Sūkre vasanty Āshaḍha-sanjnite); whilst in the month of Phalguna (ibid. v. 16) the rival sage Viśvāmitra exercises the same function along with Vishṇu, Aśvatara, Rambhā, Sūryavarchas, Satyajit, and the Rākshasa Yajnāpeta (śrūyatāṁ chāpare sūrye phālgune nivasanti ye | Vishṇur Aśvataro Rambhā Sūryavarchāś cha Satyajit | Viśvāmitras tathā raksho Yajnāpeto mahātmanaḥ).

At the commencement of the Vāyu Purāṇa Vaśishṭha is characterized as being the most excellent of the rishis (ṛishīṇāṁ cha varishṭhāya Vasishṭhāya mahātmane).

It is stated in the Vishṇu Purāṇa, iii. 3, 9, that the Vedas have been already divided twenty-eight times in the course of the present or Vaivasvata Manvantara; and that this division has always taken place in the Dvāpara age of each system of four yugas. In the first Dvāpara Brahmā Svayambhū himself divided them; in the sixth Mṛityu (Death, or Yama); whilst in the eighth Dvāpara it was Vasishṭha who was the Vyāsa or divider (Ashṭāviṁśatikṛitvo vai vedāḥ vyastāḥ maharshibhiḥ | Vaivasvate 'ntare tasmin dvāpareshu punaḥ punaḥ | . . . . 10. Dvāpare prathame vyastāḥ svayaṁ vedāḥ Svayambhuvā | . . . . 11. . . . Mṛityuḥ shashṭhe smṛitaḥ prabhuḥ | . . . . Vasishṭhaś chāshṭame smritaḥ).

[124] Two lines below Haimavatī is mentioned as the wife of Viśvāmitra (Haimavatyā cha Kauśikaḥ).

[125] In the St. Petersburg Lexicon akshamālā is taken for an epithet of Arundhatī.

Vasishṭha was, as we have seen above, the family-priest of Nimi, son of Ikshvāku, who was the son of Manu Vaivasvata, and the first prince of the solar race of kings; and in a passage of the Mahābhārata, Ādip. (6643 f.), which will be quoted in a future section, he is stated to have been the purohita of all the kings of that family. He is accordingly mentioned in Vishṇu Purāṇa, iv. 3, 18, as the religious teacher of Sagara, the thirty-seventh in descent from Ikshvāku (tat-kula-guruṁ Vasishṭham śaraṇaṁ jagmuḥ); and as conducting a sacrifice for Saudāsa or Mitrasaha, a descendant in the fiftieth generation of the same prince (Vishṇu P. iv. 4, 25, Kālena gachhatā sa Saudāso yajnam ayajat | parinishṭhita-yajne cha āchāryye Vasishṭhe nishkrānte ityādi).

Vasishṭha is also spoken of in the Rāmāyaṇa, ii. 110, 1 (see above, p. 115), and elsewhere (ii. 111, 1, etc.), as the priest of Rāma, who appears from the Vishṇu Purāṇa, (iv. 4, 40, and the preceding narrative), to have been a descendant of Ikshvāku in the sixty-first generation.[126]

Vasishṭha, according to all these accounts, must have been possessed of a vitality altogether superhuman; for it does not appear that any of the accounts to which I have referred intend under the name of Vasishṭha to denote merely a person belonging to the family so called, but to represent the founder of the family himself as taking part in the transactions of many successive ages.

It is clear that Vasishṭha, although, as we shall see, he is frequently designated in post-vedic writings as a Brāhman, was, according to some other authorities I have quoted, not really such in any proper sense of the word, as in the accounts which are there given of his birth he is declared to have been either a mind-born son of Brahmā, or the son of Mitra, Varuṇa, and the Apsaras Urvaśī, or to have had some other supernatural origin.

Sect. VII.—Viśvāmitra.

Viśvāmitra is stated in the Anukramaṇikā, as quoted by Sāyaṇa at the commencement of the third Maṇḍala of the Rig-veda, to be the rishi, or "seer," of that book of the collection: Asya maṇḍala-drashṭā

[126] Rāma's genealogy is also given in the Rāmāyaṇa, i. 70, and ii. 110, 6 ff., where, however, he is said to be only the thirty-third or thirty-fourth from Ikshvāku.

Viśvāmitraḥ ṛishiḥ | "The rishi of this (the first hymn) was Viśvāmitra, the 'seer' of the Maṇḍala." This, however, is to be understood with some exceptions, as other persons, almost exclusively his descendants, are said to be the rishis of some of the hymns.

I shall quote such passages as refer, or are traditionally declared to refer, to Viśvāmitra or his family.

In reference to the thirty-third hymn the Nirukta states as follows:

ii. 24. Tatra itihāsam āchakshate | Viśvāmitraḥ ṛishiḥ Sudāsaḥ Paijavanasya purohito babhūvā . . . . | sa vittaṁ gṛihītva Vipāṭ-chhutudryoḥ sambhedam āyayau | anuyayur itare | sa Viśvāmitro nadīs tushṭāva "gādhāḥ bhavata" iti |

"They there relate a story. The rishi Viśvāmitra was the purohita of Sudās, the son of Pijavana. (Here the etymologies of the names Viśvāmitra, Sudās, and Pijavana are given.) Taking his property, he came to the confluence of the Vipāś and Śutudrī (Sutlej); others followed. Viśvāmitra lauded the rivers (praying them to) become fordable."

Sāyaṇa expands the legend a little as follows:

Purā kila Viśvāmitraḥ Paijavanasya Sudāso rājñaḥ purohito babhūva | sa cha paurohityena labdha-dhanaḥ sarvam dhanam ādāya Vipāṭ-chhutudryoḥ sambhedam āyayāu | anuyayur itare | athottitīrshur Viśvāmitro 'gādha-jale te nadyau dṛishṭvā uttaraṇārtham ādyābhis tisṛibhis tushṭāva |

"Formerly Viśvāmitra was the purohita of king Sudās, the son of Pijavana. He, having obtained wealth by means of his office as purohita, took the whole of it, and came to the confluence of the Vipāś and the Śutudrī. Others followed. Being then desirous to cross, but perceiving that the waters of the rivers were not fordable, Viśvāmitra, with the view of getting across lauded them with the first three verses of the hymn."

The hymn makes no allusion whatever to Sudās, but mentions the son of Kuśika (Viśvāmitra) and the Bharatas. It is not devoid of poetical beauty, and is as follows:

R.V. iii. 33, 1 (= Nirukta, ix. 39). Pra parvatānām uśatī upasthād aśve iva vishite hāsamāne | gāveva śubhre mātarā rihāṇe Vipāṭ Chhutudrī payasā javete | 2. Indreshite prasavam bhikshamāṇe achha samudraṁ rathyā iva yāthaḥ | samārāṇe ūrmibhiḥ pinvamāne anyā vām anyām api eti śubhre | 3. Achha sindhum mātṛitamām ayāsam Vipāśam ūrvīṁ

subhagām aganma | vatsam iva mātarā saṁrihāṇe samānaṁ yonim anu sancharantī | 4. Enā vayam payasā pinvamānā anu yoniṁ deva-kṛitaṁ charantīḥ | na varttave prasavaḥ sarga-taktaḥ kiṁyur vipro nadyo johavīti | 5 (= Nirukta, ii. 25). Ramadhvam me vachase somyāya ṛitāvarīr upa muhūrttam evaiḥ | pra sindhum achha bṛihatī manīshā avasyur ahve Kuśikasya sūnuḥ | 6 (= Nir. ii. 26). Indro asmān aradat vajra-bāhur apāhan Vṛittram paridhiṁ nadīnām | devo 'nayat Savitā supāṇis tasya vayam prasave yāmaḥ ūrvīḥ | 7. Pravāchyaṁ śaśvadhā vīryaṁ tad Indrasya karma yad Ahiṁ vivriśchat | vi vajreṇa parishado jaghāna āyann āpo ayanam ichhamānāḥ | 8. Etad vacho jaritar mā 'pi mṛishṭāḥ ā yat te ghoshān uttarā yugāni | uktheshu kāro prati no jushasva mā no ni kaḥ purushatra namas te | 9. O su svasāraḥ kārave śṛiṇota yayau yo dūrād anasā rathena | ni su namadhvaṁ bhavata supārā adhoakshaḥ sindhavaḥ srotyābhiḥ | 10 (= Nir. ii. 27). Ā te 'kāro śṛiṇavāma vachāṁsi yayātha durād anasā rathena | ni te naṁsai pīpyānā iva yoshā maryāya iva kanyā śaśvachai te | 11. Yad anga tvā Bharatāḥ santareyur gavyan grāmaḥ ishitaḥ Indra-jūtaḥ | arshād aha prasavaḥ sarga-taktaḥ ā vo vṛiṇe sumatiṁ yajniyānām | 12. Atārishur Bharatāḥ gavyavaḥ sam abhakta vipraḥ sumatiṁ nadīnām | pra pinvadhvam ishayantīḥ surādhāḥ ā vakshaṇāḥ priṇadhvaṁ yāta śībham |

"1. (Viśvāmitra speaks): Hastening eagerly from the heart of the mountains, contending like two mares let loose, like two bright mother-cows licking[127] (each her calf), the Vipāś and Śutudrī rush onward with their waters. 2. Impelled by Indra, seeking a rapid course, ye move towards the ocean, as if mounted on a car. Running together, as ye do, swelling with your waves, the one of you joins the other, ye bright streams. 3. I have come to the most motherly stream; we have arrived at the broad and beautiful Vipāś; proceeding, both of them, like two mother(-cows) licking each her calf, to a common receptacle. 4. (The rivers reply): Here swelling with our waters we move forward to the receptacle fashioned by the gods (the ocean); our headlong course cannot be arrested. What does the sage desire that he invokes the rivers? 5. (Viśvāmitra says): Stay your course for a moment, ye pure streams, (yielding) to my pleasant words.[128] With a powerful prayer, I, the son [127] Prof. Roth (Illustr. of Nirukta, p. 133) refers to vii. 2. 5 (pūrvī śiśuṁ na mātarā rihāṇe) as a parallel passage.

[128] Prof. Roth (Litt. u. Gesch. des Weda, p. 103) renders: "Listen joyfully for a of Kuśika,[129] desiring succour, invoke the river. 6. (The rivers answer): Indra, the wielder of the thunderbolt, has hollowed out our channels; he has smitten Ahi who hemmed in the streams. Savitṛi the skilful-handed has led us hither; by his impulse we flow on in our breadth. 7. For ever to be celebrated is the heroic deed of Indra, that he has split Vṛittra in sunder. He smote the obstructions with his thunderbolt; and the waters desiring an outlet went on their way. 8. Do not, o utterer of praises, forget this word, which future ages will re-echo to thee. In hymns, o bard, show us thy devotion; do not humble us before men; reverence be paid to thee. 9. (Viśvāmitra says): Listen, o sisters, to the bard who has come to you from afar with waggon and chariot. Sink down; become fordable; reach not up to our chariot-axles with your streams. 10. (The rivers answer): We shall listen to thy words, o bard; thou hast come from far with waggon and chariot. I will bow down to thee like a woman with full breast[130] (suckling her child); as a maid to a man will I throw myself open to thee. 11. (Viśvāmitra says): When the Bharatas,[131] that war-loving tribe, sent forward, impelled by Indra, have crossed thee, then thy headlong current shall hold on its course. I seek the favour of you the adorable. 12. The war-loving Bharatas have crossed; the Sage has obtained the favour of the rivers. Swell on impetuous, and fertilizing; fill your channels; roll rapidly."

The next quotation is from the fifty-third hymn of the same third Maṇḍala, verses 6 ff.:

6. Apāḥ somam astam Indra pra yāhi kalyāṉīr jāyā suraṇaṁ gṛihe moment to my amiable speech, ye streams rich in water; stay your progress;" and adds in a note: "I do not connect the particle upa with ramadhvam, as the Nirukta and Sāyaṇa do; the fact that upa stands in another Pāda (quarter of the verse) requires a different explanation. The most of those interpretations of the Commentator which destroy the sense have their ultimate ground in the circumstance that he combines the words of different divisions of the verse; and any one may easily convince himself that every Pāda has commonly a separate sense, and is far more independent of the others than is the case in the śloka of later times." In his Lexicon Roth renders ṛitāvarī in this passage by "regular," "equably flowing."

[129] "Kuśika was a king" (Kuśiko rājā babhūva. Nir. ii. 25). Sāyaṇa calls him a royal rishi.

[130] This is the sense assigned by Prof. Roth, s.v. pī to pīpyānā. Sāyaṇa, following Yāska, ii. 27, gives the sense "suckling her child." Prof. Aufrecht considers that the word means "pregnant." In the next clause śaśvachai is rendered in the manner suggested by Prof. A., who compares R.V. x. 18, 11, 12.

[131] "The men of the family of Bharata, my people" (Bharata-kula-jāḥ madīyāḥ sarve." Sāyaṇa).

te | yatra rathasya bṛihato nidhānaṁ vimochanaṁ vājino dakshiṇāvat | 7. Ime bhojāḥ angiraso virūpāḥ divas putrāso asurasya vīrāḥ | Viśvāmitrāya dadato maghāni sahasra-sāve pratirante āyuḥ | 8. Rūpaṁ rūpam maghavā bobhavīti māyāḥ kṛiṇvānas tanvam pari svām | trir yad divaḥ pari muhūrttam āgāt svair mantrair anṛitupāḥ ṛitāvā | 9. Mahān ṛishir deva-jāḥ deva-jūto astabhnāt sindhum arṇavaṁ nṛichakshāḥ | Viśvāmitro yad avahat Sudāsam apriyāyata Kuśikebhir Indraḥ | 10. Haṁsāḥ iva kṛiṇutha ślokam adribhir madanto gīrbhir adhvare sute sachā | devebhir viprāḥ ṛishayo nṛichakshaso vi pibadhvaṁ Kuśikāḥ somyam madhu | 11. Upa preta Kuśikāś chetayadhvam aśvaṁ rāye pra munchata Sudāsaḥ | rājā vṛittraṁ janghanat prāg apāg udag atha yajāte vare ā pṛithivyāḥ | 12. Yaḥ ime rodasī ubhe aham Indram atushṭavam | Viśvāmitrasya rakshati brahma idam Bhāratajaṁ janam | 13. Viśvāmitrāḥ arāsata brahma Indrāya vajriṇe | karad in naḥ surādhasaḥ | 14 (=Nir. vi. 32). Kiṁ te kurvanti Kīkaṭeshu gāvo nāśiraṁ duhre na tapanti gharmam | ā no bhara Pramagandasya vedo Naichāśakham maghavan randhaya naḥ | 15. Sasarparīr amatim bādhamānā bṛihad mimāya Jamadagnidattā | ā Sūryasya duhitā tatāna śravo deveshu amṛitam ajuryam | 16. Sasarparīr abharat tūyam ebhyo adhi śravaḥ panchajanyāsu kṛishṭishu | sā pakshyā navyam āyur dadhānā yām me palastī-jamadagnayo daduḥ | . . . . . 21. Indra ūtibhir bahulābhir no adya 'yāchchhreshṭhābhir maghavan śūra jinva | yo no dveshṭi adharaḥ sas padīshṭa yam u dvishmas tam u prāṇo jahātu | 22. paraśuṁ chid vi tapati śimbalaṁ chid vi vṛiśchati | ukhā chid Indra yeshanti prayastā phenam asyati. 23. Na sāyakasya chikite janāso lodhaṁ nayanti paśu manyamānāḥ | nāvājinaṁ vājināḥ hāsayanti na gardabham puro aśvān nayanti | 24. Ime Indra Bharatasya putrāḥ apapitvaṁ chikitur na prapitvam | hinvanti aśvam araṇaṁ na nityaṁ jyāvājam pari nayanti ājau |

"6. Thou hast drunk soma; depart, Indra, to thy abode: thou hast a handsome wife and pleasure in thy house. In whatever place thy great chariot rests, it is proper that the steed should be unyoked. 7. These bountiful Virūpas of the race of Angiras,[132] heroic sons of the divine [132] Sāyaṇa says that the liberal men are the Kshattriyas, sons of Sudās, that virūpāḥ means their different priests of the race of Angiras, Medhātithi, and others, and that the sons of the sky are the Maruts, the sons of Rudra (Ime yāgaṁ kurvāṇāḥ bhojāḥ Saudāsāḥ kshattriyāḥ teshāṁ yājakāḥ virūpāḥ nānārūpāḥ Medhātithi-prabhṛitayo 'ngirasaś cha divo 'surasya devebhyo 'pi balavato Rudrasya putrāso . . . . Marutaḥ). The Virūpas are connected with Angiras in R.V. x. 62, 5; and a Virūpa is mentioned in i. 45, 3; and viii. 64, 6.

Dyaus (sky), bestowing wealth upon Viśvāmitra at the sacrifice with a thousand libations, prolong their lives. 8. The opulent god (Indra) constantly assumes various forms, exhibiting with his body illusive appearances; since he came from the sky thrice in a moment, drinking (soma) according to his own will, at other than the stated seasons, and yet observing the ceremonial. 9.[133] The great rishi, god-born, god-impelled, leader of men, stayed the watery current; when Viśvāmitra conducted Sudās, Indra was propitiated through the Kuśikas. 10. Like swans, ye make a sound with the (soma-crushing) stones, exulting with your hymns when the libation is poured forth; ye Kuśikas, sage rishis, leaders of men, drink the honied soma with the gods.[134] 11. Approach, ye Kuśikas, be alert; let loose the horse of Sudās to (conquer) riches; let the king smite strongly his enemy in the east, the west, and the north; and then let him sacrifice on the most excellent (spot) of the earth.[135] 12. I Viśvāmitra have caused both heaven and earth to sing the praises of Indra;[136] and my prayer protects the race of Bharata. 13. The Viśvāmitras have offered up prayer to Indra the thunderer. May he render us prosperous! 14. What are thy cows doing among the Kīkaṭas,[137] who neither draw from them the milk (which is to be mixed with soma), nor heat the sacrificial kettle. Bring to us the wealth of Pramagaṇda; subdue to us to the son of Nīchaśākha. 15. Moving swiftly, removing poverty, brought by the Jamadagnis, she has mightily uttered her voice: this daughter of the sun has conveyed (our) renown, eternal and undecaying, (even) to the gods. 16. Moving swiftly she has speedily brought down (our) renown from them to the five races of men; this winged[138] goddess whom the aged Jamadagnis brought to us, has conferred on us new life." Omitting verses [133] Verses 9–13 are translated by Prof. Roth, Litt. u. Gesch. des Weda, p. 106 f.

[134] Comp. M. Bh. Ādip. v. 6695. Apibach cha tataḥ somam Indreṇa saha Kauśikaḥ| "And then the Kauśika drank soma with Indra."

[135] Compare R.V. iii. 23, 4, which will be quoted below.

[136] Compare R.V. iv. 17, 1.

[137] Kīkaṭāḥ nāma deśo'nāryya-nivāsaḥ | "Kīkaṭa is a country inhabited by people who are not Āryas." See the second vol. of this work, p. 362, and Journ. Royal As. Soc. for 1866, p. 340.

[138] Pakshyā. This word is rendered by Sāyaṇa "the daughter of the sun who causes the light and dark periods of the moon, etc." (Pakshasya pakshādi-nirvāhakasya Sūryasya duhitā). Prof. Roth s.v. thinks the word may mean "she who changes according to the (light and dark) fortnights."

17–20 we have the following: "21. Prosper us to-day, o opulent Indra, by numerous and most excellent succours. May he who hates us fall down low; and may breath abandon him whom we hate." This is succeeded by three obscure verses, of which a translation will be attempted further on.

Sāyaṇa prefaces verses 15 and 16 by a quotation from Shaḍguru-śishya's Commentary on the Anukramaṇikā, which is given with an addition in Weber's Indische Studien i. 119 f. as follows: Sasarparīdv-ṛiche prāhur itihāsam purāvidaḥ | Saudāsa-nṛipater yajne Vasishṭhātmaja-Śaktinā | Viśvāmitrasyābhibhūtam balañ vāk cha samantataḥ | Vāsishṭhenābhibhūtaḥ sa hy avāsīdach cha Gādhi-jaḥ | tasmai Brāhmīñ tu Saurīñ vā nāmnā vāchañ Sasarparīm | Sūrya-veśmana āhṛitya dadur vai Jamadagnayaḥ | Kuśikānāñ tataḥ sā vāñ manāk chintām athānudat | upapreteti Kuśikān Viśvāmitro 'nvachodayat | labdhvā vāchañ cha hṛishṭātmā Jamadagnīn apūjayat | "Sasarparīr" iti dvābhyāñ ṛigbhyāñ Vācham stuvam svayam | "Regarding the two verses beginning "Sasarparīḥ" those acquainted with antiquity tell a story. At a sacrifice of king Saudāsa[139] the power and speech of Viśvāmitra were completely vanquished by Śakti, son of Vasishṭha; and the son of Gādhi (Viśvāmitra) being so overcome, became dejected. The Jamadagnis drew from the abode of the Sun a Voice called "Sasarparī," the daughter of Brahmā, or of the Sun, and gave her to him. Then that voice somewhat dispelled the disquiet of the Jamadagnis [or, according to the reading of this line given by Sāyaṇa (Kuśikānām matiḥ sā vāg amatiñ tām apānudat) "that Voice, being intelligence, dispelled the unintelligence of the Kuśikas."]. Viśvāmitra then incited the Kuśikas with the words upapreta 'approach' (see verse 11). And being gladdened by receiving the Voice, he paid homage to the Jamadagnis; praising them with the two verses beginning 'Sasarparīḥ.'"

In regard to the verses 21-24 Sāyaṇa has the following remarks: "Indra ūtibhir ity ādyāś chatasro Vasishṭha-dveshiṇyaḥ | purā khalu Viśvāmitra-śishyaḥ Sudāḥ nāma rājarshir āsīt | sa cha kenachit kāraṇena Vasishṭha-dveshyo 'bhūt | Viśvāmitras tu śishyasya rakshārtham ābhir ṛigbhir Vasishṭham aśapat | imāḥ abhiśāpa-rūpāḥ | tāḥ ṛicho Vasishṭhāḥ na śṛiṇvanti | "The four verses beginning 'o Indra, with succours' express hatred to Vasishṭha. There was formerly a royal rishi called [139] The Bṛihaddevatā, which has some lines nearly to the same effect as these I have quoted (see Ind. Stud. i. 119), gives Sudās instead of Saudāsa.

Sudās, a disciple of Viśvāmitra; who for some reason had incurred the ill-will of Vasishṭha. For his disciple's protection Viśvāmitra cursed Vasishṭha in these verses. They thus consist of curses, and the Vasishṭhas do not listen to them."

In reference to the same passage the Bṛihaddevatā iv. 23 f., as quoted in Indische Studien, i. 120, has the following lines: Parāś chatasro yās tattra Vasishṭha-dveshiṇīr viduḥ | Viśvāmitreṇa tāḥ proktāḥ abhiśāpāḥ iti smṛitāḥ | dvesha-dveshās tu tāḥ proktāḥ vidyāch chaivābhichārikāḥ | Vasishṭhās tu na śṛiṇvanti tad āchārryaka-sammatam | kīrttanāch chhravaṇād vā 'pi mahān doshaḥ prajāyate | śatadhā bhidyate mūrdhā kīrttitena śrutena vā | teshām bālāḥ pramīyante tasmāt tās tu na kīrttayet | "The other four verses of that hymn, which are regarded as expressing hatred to Vasishṭha, were uttered by Viśvāmitra, and are traditionally reported to contain imprecations. They are said to express hatred in return for (?) hatred, and should also be considered as incantations. The descendants of Vasishṭha do not listen to them, as this is the will of their preceptor. Great guilt is incurred by repeating or hearing them. The heads of those who do so are split into a hundred fragments; and their children die. Wherefore let no one recite them."

Dûrga, the commentator on the Nirukta,[140] in accordance with this injunction and warning, says in reference to verse 23: Yasmin nigame esha śabdaḥ (lodhaḥ) sā Vasishṭha-dveshiṇī ṛik | ahaṁ cha Kāpishṭhalo Vāsishṭhaḥ | atas tāṁ na nirbravīmi | "The text in which this word (lodha) occurs is a verse expressing hatred of Vasishṭha. But I am a Kāpishṭhala of the family of Vasishṭha; and therefore do not interpret it."

The following text also may have reference to the personal history of Viśvāmitra: R.V. iii. 43, 4. Ā cha tvām etā vrishaṇā vahāto harī sakhāyā sudhurā svangā | dhānāvad Indraḥ savanaṁ jushānaḥ sakhā sakhyuḥ śṛiṇavad vandanāni | 5. Kuvid mā gopaṁ karase janasya kuvid rājānam maghavann ṛijīshin | kuvid mā ṛishim papivāṁsaṁ sutasya kuvid me vasvo amṛitasya śikshāḥ | "4. May these two vigorous brown steeds, friendly, well-yoked, stout-limbed, convey thee hither. May Indra gratified by our libation mingled with grain, hear (like) a friend, the praises of a friend. 5. Wilt thou make me a ruler of the people? wilt thou make me a king, o impetuous lord of riches? wilt thou make me a rishi a drinker of soma? wilt thou endow me with imperishable wealth?"

[140] As quoted both by Prof. Roth, Litt. u. Gesch. des Weda, p. 108, note, and by Prof. Müller, Pref. to Rig-veda, vol. ii. p. lvi.

The next passage refers to Devaśravas and Devavāta, of the race of Bharata, who are called in the Anukramanikā, quoted by Sāyaṇa, "sons of Bharata" (Bharatasya putrau); but one of whom at least is elsewhere, as we shall see, said to be a son of Viśvāmitra: R.V. iii. 23, 2. Amanthishṭām Bhāratā revad Agnim Devaśravāḥ Devavātaḥ sudaksham | Agne vi paśya bṛihatā 'bhi rāyā ishāṁ no netā bhavatād anu dyūn | 3. Daśa kshipaḥ pūrvyaṁ sīm ajījanan sujātam mātṛishu priyam | Agniṁ stuhi Daivavātaṁ Devaśravo yo janānām asad vaśī | 4. Ni tvā dadhe vare ā pṛithivyāḥ iḷāyās pade sudinatve ahnām | Dṛishadvatyām mānushe Āpayāyāṁ Sarasvatyāṁ revad Agne didīhi | "2. The two Bhāratas Devaśravas and Devavāta have brilliantly created by friction the powerful Agni. Look upon us, o Agni, manifesting thyself with much wealth; be a bringer of nourishment to us every day. 3. The ten fingers (of Devavāta) have generated the ancient god, happily born and dear to his mothers. Praise, o Devaśravas, Agni, the offspring of Devavāta, who has become the lord of men. 4. I placed (or he placed) thee on the most excellent spot of earth on the place of worship,[141] at an auspicious time. Shine, o Agni, brilliantly on the (banks of the) Dṛishadvatī, on (a site) auspicious for men, on (the banks of) the Āpayā, of the Sarasvatī."

Viśvāmitra is mentioned along with Jamadagni in the fourth verse of the 167th hymn of the tenth Maṇḍala, which is ascribed to these two sages as its authors: Prasūto bhaksham akaram charāv api stomaṁ chemam prathamaḥ sūrir un mṛije | sute sātena yadi āgamaṁ vām prati Viśvāmitra-Jamadagnī dame | "Impelled, I have quaffed this draught of soma when the oblation of boiled rice was presented; and I, the first bard, prepare this hymn, whilst I have come to you, o Viśvāmitra and Jamadagni in the house, with that which has been offered as a libation."

The family of the Viśvāmitras has, as we have seen, been already mentioned in R.V. iii. 53, 13. They are also named in the following passages:

iii. 1, 21. Janman janman nihito Jātavedāḥ Viśvāmitrebhir idhyate ajasraḥ |

[141] Compare R.V. iii. 29, 3, 4.

"The undecaying Jātavedas (Agni) placed (on the hearth) is in every generation kindled by the Viśvāmitras."

iii. 18, 4. Uch chhochishā sahasas putraḥ stuto bṛihad vayaḥ śaśamāneshu dhehi | revad Agne Viśvāmitreshu śaṁ yor marmṛijma te tanvam bhūrī kṛitvaḥ |

"Son of strength, when lauded, do thou with thy upward flame inspire vigorous life into thy worshippers; (grant) o Agni, brilliant good fortune and prosperity to the Viśvāmitras; many a time have we given lustre to thy body."

x. 89, 17. Eva te vayam Indra bhunjatīnāṁ vidyāma sumatīnām navānām | vidyāma vastor avasā gṛiṇanto Viśvāmitrāḥ uta te Indra nūnam |

"Thus may we obtain from thee new favours to delight us: and may we, Viśvāmitras, who praise thee, now obtain riches through thy help, o Indra."

This hymn is ascribed in the Anukramaṇī to Reṇu, the son or descendant of Viśvāmitra; and the 18th verse is identical with the 22nd of the 30th hymn of the third Maṇḍala, which is said to be Viśvāmitra's production.

In a verse already quoted (R.V. iii. 33, 11) Viśvāmitra is spoken of as the son of Kuśika; at least the Nirukta regards that passage as referring to him; and the Kuśikas, who no doubt belonged to the same family as Viśvāmitra, are mentioned in another hymn which I have cited (iii. 53, 9, 10). They are also alluded to in the following texts:

R.V. iii. 26, 1. Vaiśvānaram manasā 'gniṁ nichāyya havishmanto anushatyaṁ svarvidam | sudānuṁ devaṁ rathiraṁ vasūyavo gīrbhiḥ raṇvaṁ Kuśikāso havāmahe | . . . . . 3. Aśvo na krandan janibhiḥ sam idhyate Vaiśvānaraḥ Kuśikebhir yuge yuge | sa no Agniḥ suvīryaṁ svaśvyaṁ dadhātu ratnam amṛiteshu jāgṛiviḥ |

"We, the Kuśikas, presenting oblations, and desiring riches, revering in our souls, as is meet,[142] the divine Agni Vaiśvānara, the heavenly, the bountiful, the charioteer, the pleasant, invoke him with hymns. . . . . 3. Vaiśvanara, who (crackles) like a neighing horse, is kindled by the Kuśikas with the mothers (i.e. their fingers) in every age. May [142] This is the sense of anushatyam according to Prof. Aufrecht. Sāyaṇa makes it one of the epithets of Agni "he who is true to his promise in granting rewards according to works" (satyenānugataṁ karmānurūpa-phala-pradāne satya-pratijñam).

this Agni, who is ever alive among the immortals, bestow on us wealth, with vigour and with horses."

iii. 29, 15. Amitrāyudho Marutām iva prayāḥ prathamajāḥ brahmaṇo viśvam id viduḥ | dyumnavad brahma Kuśikāsaḥ ā īrire ekaḥ eko dame Agniṁ sam īdhire |

"Combating their enemies like the hosts of the Maruts, (the sages) the first-born of prayer[143] know everything; the Kuśikas have sent forth an enthusiastic prayer; they have kindled Agni, each in his own house."

iii. 30, 20. Imaṁ kāmam mandaya gobhir aśvaiś chandrāvatā rādhasā paprathaś cha | svaryavo matibhis tubhyam viprāḥ Indrāya vāhaḥ Kuśikāso akran |

"Gratify this (our) desire with kine and horses; and prosper us with brilliant wealth. The wise Kuśikas, desiring heaven, have with their minds composed for thee a hymn."

iii. 42, 9. Tvāṁ sutasya pītaye pratnam Indra havāmahe | Kuśikāso avasyavaḥ |

"We, the Kuśikas, desiring succour, summon thee the ancient Indra to drink the soma libation."

It will be seen from these passages that the Viśvāmitras and the Kuśikas assert themselves to have been ancient worshippers of Agni, and to be the composers of hymns, and the possessors of all divine knowledge.

In the eleventh verse of the tenth hymn of the first Maṇḍala of the R.V., of which the traditional author is Madhuchhandas of the family of Viśvāmitra, the epithet Kauśika is applied to Indra: Ā tu naḥ Indra Kauśika mandasānaḥ sutam piba | navyam āyuḥ pra sutira kṛidhi sahasra-sām ṛishim | "Come, Indra, Kauśika, drink our oblation with delight. Grant me new and prolonged life; make the rishi the possessor of a thousand boons."

Sāyaṇa explains the epithet in question as follows: Kauśika Kuśikasya putra . . . yadyapi Viśvāmitro Kuśikasya putras tathāpi tadrūpeṇa Indrasya eva utpannatvāt Kuśika-putratvam aviruddham | ayaṁ vṛittānto 'nukramaṇikāyām uktaḥ | "Kuśikas tv Aishīrathir Indra-

[143] Compare with this the epithet of devajāḥ, "god-born," applied to Viśvāmitra in iii. 53, 9 (above p. 342); and the claim of knowledge made for the Vasishṭhas in vii. 33, 7 (above p. 320).

tulyam putram ichhan brahmacharyaṁ chachāra | tasya Indraḥ eva Gāthī putro jajne" iti | "Kauśika means the son of Kuśika . . . Although Viśvāmitra was the son of Kuśika, yet, as it was Indra who was born in his form, there is nothing to hinder Indra being the son of Kuśika. This story is thus told in the Anukramaṇikā: 'Kuśika, the son of Ishīratha desiring a son like Indra, lived in the state of a Brahmachārin. It was Indra who was born to him as his son Gāthin.'" To this the Anukramaṇī (as quoted by Prof. Müller, Rig-veda, vol. ii. pref. p. xl.) adds the words: Gāthino Viśvāmitraḥ | sa tṛitīyam maṇḍalam apaśyat | "The son of Gāthin was Viśvāmitra, who saw the third Maṇḍala." In quoting this passage Professor Müller remarks: "According to Shaḍguruśishya this preamble was meant to vindicate the Rishitva of the family of Viśvāmitra:[144] Saty apavāde svayam ṛishitvam anubhavato Viśvāmitra-gotrasya vivakshayā itihāsaṁ āha" | "Wishing to declare the rishihood of the family of Viśvāmitra which was controverted, although they were themselves aware of it, he tells a story."

Professor Roth in his Lexicon (s.v. Kauśika) thinks that this term as originally applied to Indra meant merely that the god "belonged, was devoted to," the Kuśikas; and Professor Benfey, in a note to his translation of R.V. i. 10, 11,[145] remarks that "by this family-name Indra is designated as the sole or principal god of this tribe."

[144] Prof. Müller states that "Sāyaṇa passes over what Kātyāyana (the author of the Anukramaṇī) says about the race of Viśvāmitra;" and adds "This (the fact of the preamble being 'meant to vindicate the Rishitva of the family of Viśvāmitra') was probably the reason why Sāyaṇa left it out." It is true that Sāyaṇa does not quote the words of the Anukramaṇī in his introductory remarks to the third Maṇḍala; but as we have seen he had previously adduced the greater part of them in his note on i. 10, 11.

[145] Orient und Occident, vol. i. p. 18, note 50. We have seen above, p. 345, that in R.V. iii. 23, 3, another god, Agni, is called Daivavāta, after the rishi Devavāta, by whom he had been kindled. Compare also the expression Daivodāso Agniḥ in R.V. viii. 92, 2, which Sāyaṇa explains as = Divodāsena āhūyamāno 'gniḥ, "Agni invoked by Divodāsa;" while Prof. Roth s.v. understands it to mean "Agni who stands in relation to Divodāsa." In R.V. vi. 16, 19, Agni is called Divodāsasya satpatiḥ, "the good lord of Divodāsa." Agni is also called Bhārata in R.V. ii. 7, 1, 5; iv. 25, 4; vi. 16, 19. On the first text (ii. 7, 1) Sāyaṇa says Bharatāḥ ṛitvijaḥ | teshāṁ sambandhī Bhārataḥ, "Bharatas are priests. Bhārata is he who is connected with them." On ii. 7, 5 he explains the word by ṛitvijām putra-sthānīya, "Thou who art in the place of a son to the priests." On the second text (iv. 25, 4) tasmai Agnir Bhārataḥ śarma yaṁsat, "may Agni Bhārata give him protection") Sāyaṇa takes Bhārata to mean "the bearer of the oblation" (havisho bharttā); but also refers to the S'.P.Br. i. 4, 2, 2, where it is said, "or Agni is called 'Bhārata,' because, becoming breath, he sustains all creatures"

According to the Vishṇu Purāṇa (pp. 398–400, Wilson, 4to. ed.) Viśvāmitra was the twelfth in descent from Purūravas, the persons intermediate being (1) Amāvasu, (2) Bhīma, (3) Kānchana, (4) Suhotra, (5) Jahnu, (6) Sumantu, (7) Ajaka, (8) Valākāśva, (9) Kuśa, (10) Kuśāmba, and (11) Gādhi. The birth of Viśvāmitra's father is thus described, V.P. iv. 7, 4: Teshāṁ Kuśāmbaḥ "śakra-tulyo me putro bhaved" iti tapaś chachāra | taṁ cha ugra-tapasam avalokya "mā bhavatv anyo 'smat-tulya-vīryyaḥ" ity ātmanā eva asya Indraḥ putratvam agachhat | Gādhir nāma sa Kauśiko 'bhavat | "Kuśāmba (one of Kuśa's four sons) practised austere fervour with the view of obtaining a son equal to Indra. Perceiving him to be very ardent in his austere fervour, Indra, fearing lest another person should be born his own equal in vigour, became himself the son of Kuśāmba, with the name of Gādhi the Kauśika." Regarding the birth of Viśvāmitra himself, the Vishṇu Purāṇa relates the following story: Gādhi's daughter Satyavatī had been given in marriage to an old Brāhman called Ṛichīka, of the family of Bhṛigu. In order that his wife might bear a son with the qualities of a Brāhman, Ṛichīka had prepared for her a dish of charu (rice, barley, and pulse, with butter and milk) for her to eat; and a similar mess for her mother, calculated to make her conceive a son with the character of a warrior. Satyavatī's mother, however, persuaded her to exchange messes. She was blamed by her husband on her return home for what she had done. I quote the words of the original:

V.P. iv. 7, 14. "Ati pāpe kim idam akāryyam bhavatyā kṛitam | atiraudraṁ te vapur ālakshyate | nūnaṁ tvayā tvan-mātṛi-satkṛitaś charur upayuktaḥ (? upabhuktaḥ) | na yuktam etat | 15. Mayā hi tattra charau sakalā eva śauryya-vīryya-bala-sampad āropitā tvadīye charāv apy akhila-śānti-jnāna-titikshādikā brāhmaṇa-sampat | etach cha vipa- (esha u vai imāḥ prajāḥ prāṇo bhūtvā bibhartti tasmād vā iva āha "Bhārata" iti). Another explanation had previously been given that the word Bhārata means "he who bears oblations to the gods." On the third text (vi. 16, 19) Sāyaṇa interprets the term in the same way. Roth, s.v., thinks it may mean "warlike." In R.V. vii. 8, 4, (V.S. 12, 34) we find the words pra pra ayam Agnir Bharatasya śriṇve, "this Agni (the son?) of Bharata has been greatly renowned." Sāyaṇa makes bharatasya = yajamānasya, "the worshipper," and pra pra śriṇve = prathito bhavati, "is renowned." The Comm. on the Vāj. S. translates "Agni hears the invocation of the worshipper" (śriṇve śriṇute āhvānam). The S'. P. Br. vi. 8, 1, 14, quotes the verse, and explains Bharata as meaning "Prajāpati, the supporter of the universe" (Prajāpatir vai Bharataḥ sa hi idaṁ sarvam bibhartti).

rītaṁ kurvatyās tava atiraudrāstra-dhāraṇa-māraṇa-nishṭha-kshattriyāchāraḥ puttro bhavishyaty asyāś cha upaśama-ruchir brāhmaṇāchāraḥ" | ity ākarṇya eva sā tasya pādau jagrāha praṇipatya cha enam āha "bhagavan mayā etad ajnānād anushṭhitam | prasādaṁ me kuru | mā evaṁvidaḥ putro bhavatu | kāmam evaṁvidhaḥ pautro bhavatu" | ity ukto munir apy āha "evam astv" iti | 16. Anantaraṁ cha sā Jamadagnim ajījanat tan-mātā cha Viśvāmitraṁ janayāmāsa | Satyavatī cha Kauśikī nāma nady abhavat | Jamadagnir Ikshvāku-vaṁśodbhavasya Reṇos tanayāṁ Reṇukām upayeme tasyāṁ cha aśesha-kshattra-vaṁśa-hantāram Paraśurāma-sanjnam bhagavataḥ sakala-loka-guror Nārāyaṇasya aṁśaṁ Jamadagnir ajījanat | Viśvāmitra-putras tu Bhārgavaḥ eva Śunaḥśepo nāma devair dattaḥ | tataś cha Devarāta-nāmā 'bhavat | tataś cha anye Madhuchchhanda-Jayakṛita-Devadeva-Ashṭaka-Kachchhapa-Hārītakākhyāḥ Viśvāmitra-putrāḥ babhūvuḥ | 17. Teshāṁ cha bahūni Kauśika-gotrāṇi ṛishyantareshu vaivāhyāni bhavanti |

"'Sinful woman, what improper deed is this that thou hast done? I behold thy body of a very terrible appearance. Thou hast certainly eaten the charu prepared for thy mother. This was wrong. For into that charu I had infused all the endowments of heroism, vigour, and force, whilst into thine I had introduced all those qualities of quietude, knowledge, and patience which constitute the perfection of a Brāhman. Since thou hast acted in contravention of my design a son shall be born to thee who shall live the dreadful, martial, and murderous life of a Kshattriya; and thy mother's offspring shall exhibit the peaceful disposition and conduct of a Brāhman.' As soon as she had heard this, Satyavatī fell down and seized her husband's feet, and said, 'My lord, I have acted from ignorance; show kindness to me; let me not have a son of the sort thou hast described; if thou pleasest, let me have a grandson of that description.' Hearing this the muni replied, 'Be it so.' Subsequently she bore Jamadagni, and her mother gave birth to Viśvāmitra. Satyavatī became the river called Kauśikī. Jamadagni wedded Reṇukā, the daughter of Reṇu, of the family of Ikshvāku; and on her he begot a son called Paraśurāma, the slayer of the entire race of Kshattriyas, who was a portion of the divine Nārāyaṇa, the lord of the universe.[146] To Viśvāmitra a son called Śunaśśepa, of the race of

[146] According to the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, i. 3, 20, Paraśurāma was the sixteenth incarnation of Vishṇu: Avatāre shoḍaśame paśyan brahma-druho nṛipān | trissapta-

Bhṛigu, was given by the gods, who in consequence received the name of Devarāta ("god-given"). And then other sons, Madhuchhandas, Jayakṛita, Devadeva, Ashṭaka, Kachhapa, Hārītaka, etc., were born to Viśvāmitra. From them sprang many families of Kauśikas, which intermarried with those of other rishis."

The Harivaṁśa, verses 1425 ff., gives a similar account, but makes Kuśika, not Kuśāmba, the grandfather of Viśvāmitra:

Kuśa-putrāḥ babhūvur hi chatvāro deva-varchasaḥ | Kuśikaḥ Kuśanābhaś cha Kuśāmbo Mūrtimāṁs tathā | Pahlavaiḥ saha saṁvṛiddho rājā vana-charais tadā | Kuśikas tu tapas tepe puttram Indra-samaṁ vibhuḥ | labheyam iti taṁ Śakras trāsād abhyetya jajnivān | pūrṇe varsha-sahasre vai taṁ tu Śakro hy apaśyata | aty ugra-tapasaṁ dṛishṭvā sahasrākshaḥ purandaraḥ | samarthaḥ putra-janane svam evāṁśam avāsayat | putratve kalpayāmāsa sa devendraḥ surottamaḥ | sa Gādhir abhavad rājā Maghavān Kauśikaḥ svayam | Paurukutsy abhavad bhāryyā Gādhis tasyām ajāyata |

"Kuśa had four sons, equal in lustre to the gods, Kuśika, Kuśanābha, Kuśāmba, and Mūrttimat. Growing up among the Pahlavas, who dwelt in the woods, the glorious king Kuśika practised austere fervour, with the view of obtaining a son equal to Indra; and Indra from apprehension came and was born. When a thousand years had elapsed Śakra (Indra) beheld him. Perceiving the intensity of his austere fervour, the thousand-eyed, city-destroying, god of gods, highest of the deities, powerful to procreate offspring, introduced a portion of himself, and caused it to take the form of a son; and thus Maghavat himself became Gādhi, the son of Kuśika. Paurukutsī was the wife (of the latter), and of her Gādhi was born."

The Harivaṁśa then relates a story similar to that just extracted from the Vishṇu Purāṇa regarding the births of Jamadagni and Viśvāmitra, and then proceeds, verse 1456:

Aurvasyaivam Ṛichīkasya Satyavatyām mahāyaśāḥ | Jamadagnis tapovīryyāj jajne brahma-vidāṁ varaḥ | madhyamaś cha Śunaśśephaḥ Śunaḥpuchhaḥ kanishṭhakaḥ | Viśvāmitraṁ tu dāyādam Gādhiḥ Kuśika-nandanaḥ | janayāmāsa putraṁ tu tapo-vidyā-śamātmakam | prāpya brah-

kṛitvaḥ kupito nikshattrām akarod mahīm | "In his sixteenth incarnation, perceiving that kings were oppressors of Brāhmans, he, incensed, made the earth destitute of Kshattriyas one and twenty times."

marshi-samatāṁ yo 'yam saptarshitāṁ gataḥ | Viśvāmitras tu dharmātmā nāmnā Viśvarathaḥ smṛitaḥ | jajne Bhṛigu-prasādena Kauśikād vaṁśa-varddhanaḥ | Viśvāmitrasya cha sutāḥ Devarātādayaḥ smṛitāḥ | vikhyātās trishu lokeshu teshāṁ nāmāni vai śṛiṇu | Devaśravāḥ Katiś chaiva yasmāt Kātyāyanāḥ smṛitāḥ | S'ālāvatyāṁ Hiraṇyāksho Reṇor jajne 'tha Reṇumān | Sāṅkṛitir Gālavaś chaiva Mudgalaś cheti viśrutāḥ | Madhuchchando Jayaś chaiva Devalaś cha tathā 'shṭakaḥ | Kachchapo Hāritaś chaiva Viśvāmitrasya te sutāḥ | teshāṁ khyātāni gotrāṇi Kauśikānām mahātmanām | Pāṇino Babhravaś chaiva Dhyānajapyās tathaiva cha | Pārthivāḥ Devarātāś cha S'ālankāyana-Vāskalāḥ | Lohitāḥ Yāmadūtāś cha tathā Kārīshayaḥ smṛitāḥ | Sauśrutāḥ Kauśikāḥ rājaṁs tathā 'nye Saindhavāyanāḥ | Devalāḥ Reṇavaś chaiva Yājnavalkyāghamarshaṇāḥ | Audumbarāḥ hy Abhishṇātās Tārakāyaṇa-chuṁchulāḥ | S'ālāvatyāḥ Hiraṇyākshāḥ Sāṅkṛityāḥ Gālavās tathā | Nārāyaṇir Naraś chānyo Viśvāmitrasya dhīmataḥ | ṛishy-antara-vivāhyāś cha Kauśikāḥ bahavaḥ smṛitāḥ | Pauravasya mahārāja brahmarsheḥ Kauśikasya cha | sambandho 'py asya vaṁśe 'smin brahma-kshattrasya viśrutaḥ |

"Thus was the renowned Jamadagni, the most excellent of those possessed of sacred knowledge, born by the power of austere fervour to Ṛichīka, the son of Ūrva, by Satyavatī. Their second son was S'unaśśepha [147] and the youngest S'unaḥpuchha. And Gādhi, son of Kuśika, begot as his son and inheritor Viśvāmitra, distinguished for austere fervour, science, and quietude; who attained an equality with Brahman-rishis, and became one of the seven rishis. The righteous Viśvāmitra, who was known by name as Viśvaratha,[148] was by the favour of a Bhṛigu born to the son of Kuśika, an augmenter (of the glory) of his race. The sons of Viśvāmitra are related to have been Devarāta and the rest, renowned in the three worlds. Hear their names: Devaśravas, Kati (from whom the Kātyāyanas had their name); Hiraṇyāksha, born of S'ālāvatī, and Reṇumat of Reṇu; Sāṅkṛiti, Gālava, Mudgala, Madhuchhanda, Jaya, Devala, Ashṭaka, Kachhapa, Hārita — these were the sons of Viśvāmitra. From them the families of the great Kauśikas are said to have sprung: the Pāṇins, Babhrus, Dhānajapyas, Pārthivas, Devarātas, Sālankāyanas, Vāskalas, Lohitas, Yāmadūtas, Kārīshis, Sauśrutas, Kauśikas, Saindhavāyanas, Devalas, Reṇus, Yājnavalkyas, Aghamarshaṇas, Audumbaras, Abhishṇātas, Tārakayaṇas, Chunchulas, Sālāvatyas, Hiraṇyākshas, Sānkṛityas, and Gālavas.[149] Nārāyaṇi and Nara were also (descendants) of the wise Viśvāmitra. Many Kauśikas are recorded who intermarried with the families of other rishis. In this race of the Paurava and Kauśika Brahman-rishi, there is well known to have been a connection of the Brāhmans and Kshattriyas. Śunaśśepha, who was a descendant of Bhṛigu, and obtained the position of a Kauśika, is recorded to have been the eldest of Viśvāmitra's sons."

[147] The Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, as we shall shortly see, makes 'S'unaśśepa' a son of Ajīgartta. The Mahābhārata Anuśāsanap. verse 186, coincides with the Harivaṁśa.

[148] In another passage of the Harivaṁśa (verses 1764 ff.), which repeats the particulars given in this passage, it appears to be differently stated, verse 1766, that besides a daughter Satyavatī, and his son Viśvāmitra, Gādhi had three other sons, Viśvaratha, Viśvakṛit, and Vis'vajit (Vi'vāmitras tu Gādheyo rājā Viśvarathas tadā | Viśvakṛid Vis'vajich chaiva tathā Satyavatī nṛipa).

It will be observed that in this passage, Devaśravas is given as one of Viśvāmitra's sons. A Devaśravas, as we have already seen, is mentioned in R.V. iii. 23, 2, as a Bhārata, along with Devavāta. Here however in the Harivaṁśa we have no Devavāta, but a Devarāta, who is identified with Śunaśśepha. This, as we shall find, is also the case in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa.

In the genealogy given in both of the preceding passages, from the Vishṇu Purāṇa, and the 27th chapter of the Harivaṁśa respectively, Viśvāmitra is declared to be the descendant of Amāvasu the third son of Purūravas. In the 32nd chapter of the Harivaṁśa, however, we find a different account. Viśvāmitra's lineage is there traced up to a Jahnu, as in the former case; but Jahnu is no longer represented as a descendant of Amāvasu, the third son of Purūravas; but (as appears from the preceding narrative) of Āyus, the eldest son of that prince, and of Puru, the great-grandson of Āyus. Professor Wilson (Vishṇu Purāṇa, 4to. ed. p. 451, note 23) is of opinion that this confusion originated in the recurrence of the name of Suhotra in different genealogical lists, and in the ascription to one king of this name of descendants who were really sprung from another. It is not, however, clear that the genealogy of Viśvāmitra given in the Vishṇu Purāṇa is the right one. For in the Rig-veda, as we have seen, he is connected with the Bharatas, and in the passage about to be quoted from the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, he is called a Bharata and his sons Kuśikas; and Bharata is said both in the Vishṇu Purāṇa (Wilson's V.P. 4to. ed. p. 449) and in the Harivaṁśa (sect. 32, v. 1723, and preceding narrative) to be a descendant of Āyus and of Puru. Accordingly we have seen that the Harivaṁśa styles Viśvāmitra at once a Paurava and a Kauśika.

[149] Professor Wilson (V.P. 4to. ed. p. 405, note) gives these names, and remarks that the authorities add "an infinity of others, multiplied by intermarriages with other tribes, and who, according to the Vāyu, were originally of the regal caste like Viśvāmitra; but like him obtained Brahmanhood through devotion. Now these gotras, or some of them at least, no doubt existed, partaking more of the character of schools of doctrine, but in which teachers and scholars were very likely to have become of one family by intermarrying; and the whole, as well as their original founder, imply the interference of the Kshattriya caste with the Brahmanical monopoly of religious instruction and composition."

A similar genealogy to that in the 32nd section of the Harivaṁśa is given in the Mahābhārata, Anuśāsanaparvan, verses 201 ff., where it is said that in the line of Bharata there was a king called Ajamīḍha who was also a priest (Bharatasyānvaye chaivājamīḍho nāma pārthivaḥ | babhūva Bharata-śreshṭha yajvā dharma-bhṛitāṁ varaḥ), from whom Viśvāmitra was descended through (1) Jahnu, (2) Sindhudvīpa, (3) Balākaśva, (4) Kuśika, (5) Gādhi.

One of the names applied to Viśvāmitra and his race, as I have just noticed, is Bharata.[150] The last of the four verses at the close of the 53rd hymn of the third Maṇḍala of the Rig-veda, which are supposed to contain a malediction directed by Viśvāmitra against Vaśishṭha (see above) is as follows: iii. 53, 24. Ime Indra Bharatasya putrāḥ apapitvaṁ chikitur na prapitvam | "These sons of Bharata, o Indra, desire to avoid (the Vasishṭhas), not to approach them." These words are thus explained by Sāyaṇa: Bharatasya putrāḥ Bharata-vaṁśyāḥ ime Viśvāmitrāḥ apapitvam apagamanaṁ Vasishṭhebhyaś chikitur na prapitvam | [Va]sishṭaiḥ saha teshāṁ sangatir nāsti | brāhmaṇāḥ eva ity arthaḥ | "These sons of Bharata, persons of his race, know departure from, and not approach to, the Vasishṭhas. They do not associate with the Vasishṭhas. This means they are Brāhmans."

The persons who accompanied Viśvāmitra when he wished to cross the Vipāś and the Śutudrī are, as we have seen above, called Bhărătas; and Devaśravas and Devavāta are designated in R.V. iii. 23, 2, as Bhārătas. On the other hand in one of the hymns ascribed to Vasishṭha (R.V. vii. 33, 6) the Bhărătas are alluded to as a tribe hostile to the Tṛitsus, the race to which Vasishṭha belonged.

[150] See Roth's Lexicon, s.v. Bharata, (7) "the name of a hero, the forefather of a tribe. His sons are called Viśvāmitras and the members of his family Bharatas."

In the legend of Sunaśśepa, told in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, vii. 13–18,[151] Viśvāmitra is alluded to as being the hotṛi-priest of king Hariśchandra, and as belonging to the tribe of the Bharatas. He is also addressed as rājaputra, and his sons are called Kuśikas. The outlines of the story are as follows: King Hariśchandra of the family of Ikshvāku having no son, promised to Varuṇa, by the advice of Nārada, that if a son should be born to him he would sacrifice him to that god. A son was accordingly born to the king, who received the name of Rohita; but Hariśchandra, though called upon by Varuṇa, put off from time to time, on various pleas, the fulfilment of his promise. When the father at length consented, the youth himself refused to be sacrificed and went into the forest. After passing six years there he met a poor Brāhman rishi called Ajīgartta who had three sons, the second of whom, Sunaśśepa, he sold for a hundred cows to Rohita, who brought the young Brāhman to be sacrificed instead of himself. Varuṇa accepted the vicarious victim, and arrangements were made accordingly, "Viśvāmitra being the hotṛi-priest, Jamadagni the adhvaryu, Vasishṭha the brāhmăn, and Ayāsya the udgātṛi (tasya ha Viśvāmitro hotā āsīj Jamadagnir adhvaryur Vasishṭho brahmā Ayāsyaḥ udgātā)." The sacrifice was not, however, completed, although the father received a hundred more cows for binding his son to the sacrificial post, and a third hundred for agreeing to slaughter him. By reciting verses in honour of different deities in succession Sunaśśepa was delivered; and at the request of the priests took part in the ceremonial of the day. I shall quote the remainder of the story at length:

17. Atha ha Sunaḥśepo Viśvāmitrasyānkam āsasāda | sa ha uvācha Ajīgarttaḥ Sauyavasir "ṛishe punar me puttraṁ dehi" iti | "Na" iti ha uvācha Viśvāmitro "devāḥ vai imam mahyam arāsata" iti | sa ha Devarāto Vaiśvāmitraḥ āsa | tasya ete Kāpileya-Bābhravāḥ | sa ha uvācha Ajīgarttaḥ Sauyavasis "tvaṁ vehi vihvayāvahai" iti | sa ha uvācha Ajīgarttaḥ Sauyavasir "Āngiraso janmanā 'sy Ājīgarttiḥ śrutaḥ kaviḥ | ṛishe paitāmahāt tantor mā 'pagāḥ punar ehi mām" iti | sa

[151] This legend is translated into German by Prof. Roth in Weber's Ind. Stud. i. 457 ff., into English by Prof. Wilson, Journ. Roy. As. Soc. vol. xiii. for 1851, pp. 96 ff., by Dr. Haug in his Ait. Brāhmaṇa, vol. ii. 460 ff., by Prof. Müller in his Anc. Sansk. Lit. pp. 408 ff., and into Latin by Dr. Streiter in his "Diss. de Sunaḥsepo."

ha uvācha Śunaḥśepaḥ "adarśus tvā śāsa-hastaṁ na yach chhūdreshv alapsata | gavāṁ trīṇi śatāni tvam avriṇīthāḥ mad Angiraḥ" iti | sa ha uvācha Ajīgarttaḥ Sauyavasis "tad vai mā tāta tapati pāpaṁ karma mayā kṛitam | tad ahaṁ nihnave tubhyam pratiyantu śatā gavām" iti | sa ha uvācha Śunaḥśepaḥ "yaḥ sakṛit pāpakaṁ kuryāt kuryād enat tato 'param | nāpāgāḥ śaudrānyāyād asandheyaṁ tvayā kṛitam" iti | "asandheyam" iti ha Viśvāmitraḥ upapapāda | sa ha uvācha Viśvāmitraḥ "Bhīmaḥ eva Sauyavasiḥ śāsena viśiśāsishuḥ | asthād maitasya putro bhūr mamaivopehi putratām" iti | sa ha uvācha Śunaḥśepaḥ "sa vai yathā no jñāpāyā rājaputra tathā vada | yathaivāṅgirasaḥ sann upeyāṁ tava putratām" iti | sa ha uvācha Viśvāmitro "Jyeshṭho me tvam putrāṇāṁ syās tava śreshthā prajā syāt | upeyāḥ daivam me dāyaṁ tena vai tvopamantraye" iti | sa ha uvācha Śunaḥśepaḥ "sanjnānāneshu vai brūyāt sauhārdyāya me śriyai | yathā 'ham Bharata-ṛishabha upeyāṁ tava putratām" iti | atha ha Viśvāmitraḥ putrān āmantrayāmāsa "Madhuchhandāḥ śriṇotana Ṛishabho Reṇur Ashṭakaḥ | ye ke cha bhrātaraḥ sthana asmai jyaishṭhyāya kalpadhvam" iti | 18. Tasya ha Viśvāmitrasya eka-śatam putrāḥ āsuḥ panchāśad eva jyāyāṁso Madhuchhandasaḥ panchāśat kanīyāṁsaḥ | tad ye jyāyāṁso na te kuśalam menire | tān anuvyājahāra "antān vaḥ prajā bhakshīshṭa" iti | te ete 'ndhrāḥ Puṇḍrāḥ Śabarāḥ Pulindāḥ Mūtibāḥ ity udantyāḥ bahavo bhavanti | Vaiśvāmitrāḥ Dasyūnām bhūyishṭhāḥ | sa ha uvācha Madhuchhandāḥ panchāśatā sardham "yad naḥ pitā sanjānīte tasmiṁs tishṭhāmahe vayam | puras tvā sarve kurmahe tvām anvancho vayaṁ smasi" iti | atha ha Viśvāmitraḥ pratītaḥ putrāṁs tushṭāva "te vai putrāḥ paśumanto vīravanto bhavishyatha | ye mānam me 'nugṛihṇanto vīravantam akartta mā | pura-etrā vīravanto Devarātena Gāthināḥ | sarve rādhyāḥ stha putrāḥ esha vaḥ sadvivāchanam | esha vaḥ Kuśikāḥ vīro Devarātas tam anvita | yushmāṁs dāyam me upetā vidyāṁ yām u cha vidmasi | te samyancho Vaiśvāmitrāḥ sarve sākaṁ sarātayaḥ | Devarātāya tasthire dhṛityai śraishṭhyāya Gāthināḥ | adhīyata Devarāto rikthayor ubhyayor ṛishiḥ | Jahnūnāṁ chādhipatye daive vede cha Gāthinām |

"Śunaśśepa came to the side of Viśvāmitra. Ajīgartta, the son of Suyavasa, said, 'Rishi, give me back my son.' 'No,' said Viśvāmitra, 'the gods have given him to me' (devāḥ arāśata); hence he became Devarāta the son of Viśvāmitra. The Kāpileyas and Bābhravas are his descendants. Ajīgartta said to Viśvāmitra, 'Come; let us both call

(him) to us.'[152] He (again) said (to his son), 'Thou art an Āngirasa, the son of Ajīgartta, reputed a sage; do not, o rishi, depart from the line of thy ancestors; come back to me.' Śunaśśepa replied, 'They have seen thee with the sacrificial knife in thy hand—a thing which men have not found even among the Śūdras; thou didst prefer three hundred cows to me, o Angiras.' Ajīgartta rejoined, 'That sinful deed which I have done distresses me, my son; I abjure it to thee. Let the [three] hundreds of cows revert (to him who gave them).'[153] Śunaśśepa answered, 'He who once does a sinful deed, will add to it another; thou hast not freed thyself from that iniquity, fit only for a Śūdra. Thou hast done what cannot be rectified.' 'What cannot be rectified,' interposed Viśvāmitra; who continued, 'Terrible was the son of Suyavasa as he stood about to immolate (thee) with the knife: continue not to be his son; become mine.' Śunaśśepa replied, 'Speak, o king's son (rājaputra), whatever thou hast to explain to us, in order that I, though an Āngirasa, may become thy son.' Viśvāmitra rejoined, 'Thou shalt be the eldest of my sons, and thy offspring shall be the most eminent. Thou shalt receive my divine inheritance; with this (invitation) I address thee.' Śunaśśepa answered, 'If (thy sons) agree, then for my welfare enjoin on them to be friendly, that so, o chief of the Bharatas, I may enter on thy sonship.' Viśvāmitra then addressed his sons, 'Do ye, Madhuchhandas, Ṛishabha, Reṇu, Ashṭaka, and all ye who are brothers, listen to me, and concede to him the seniority.' 18. Now Viśvāmitra had a hundred sons, fifty of whom were older than Madhuchhandas and fifty younger. Then those who were older did not approve (their father's proposal). Against them he pronounced (this [152] I follow here the tenor of the interpretation (which is that of the Commentator on the Śānkhāyana Brāhmaṇa) given by Prof. Weber in his review of Dr. Haug's Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, in Indische Studien, ix. 316. Prof. Weber remarks that in the Brāhmaṇas the root hu + vi is employed to denote the opposing invitations of two persons who are seeking to bring over a third person to their own side; in proof of which he quotes Taitt. S. 6, 1, 6, 6, and Ś. P. Br. 3, 2, 4, 4, and 22. Profs. Roth, Wilson, and Müller, as well as Dr. Haug, understand the words to be addressed to Śunaśśepa by his father, and to signify "we, too (I and thy mother), call, or will call (thee to return to us)." But it does not appear that Śunaśśepa's mother was present. And it is to be observed that the next words uttered by Ajīgartta, which are addressed to Śunaśśepa, are preceded by the usual formula sa ha uvācha Ajīgarttaḥ Sauyavasiḥ, "Ajīgartta the son of S. said," which perhaps would not have been the case if both sentences had been addressed to the same person.

[153] Here too I follow Weber, Ind. St. ix. p. 317.

doom), 'Let your progeny possess the furthest ends (of the country).' These are the numerous border-tribes, the Andhras, Puṇḍras, Śabaras, Pulindas, Mūtibas. Most of the Dasyus are sprung from Viśvāmitra.[154] Madhuchhandas with the (other) fifty said, 'Whatever our father determines, by that we abide. We all place thee in our front, and follow after thee.' Then Viśvāmitra was pleased, and said to his sons, 'Ye, my children who, shewing deference to me, have conferred upon me a (new) son, shall abound in cattle and in sons. Ye, my sons, the offspring of Gāthin, who possess in Devarāta a man who shall go before you, are all destined to be prosperous; he is your wise instructor. This Devarāta, o Kuśikas, is your chief; follow him. He will receive you as my inheritance, and obtain all the knowledge which we possess.' All these sons of Viśvāmitra, descendants of Gāthin, submitted together in harmony and with good will to Devarāta's control and superiority. The rishi Devarāta was invested with both possessions, with the lordly authority of the Jahnus, and with the divine Veda of the Gāthins." [155]

On this legend Professor Müller (Anc. Sansk. Lit. pp. 415 f.) remarks, amongst other things, as follows: "So revolting, indeed, is the description given of Ajīgartta's behaviour in the Brāhmaṇa, that we should rather recognize in him a specimen of the un-Āryan population of India. Such a supposition, however, would be in contradiction with several of the most essential points of the legend, particularly in what regards the adoption of S'unaḥśepha by Viśvāmitra. Viśvāmitra, though arrived at the dignity of a Brāhman, clearly considers the adoption of S'unaḥśepha Devarāta, of the famous Brahmanic family of the Āngirasas, as an advantage for himself and his descendants; and the Devarātas are indeed mentioned as a famous branch of the Viśvāmitras (V.P. p. 405, 23). S'unaḥśepha is made his eldest son, and the leader of his brothers, evidently as the defender and voucher of their Brahmahood, which must have been then of very recent date, because Viśvāmitra himself is still addressed by S'unaḥśepha as Rāja-putra and Bharata-ṛishabha." It must, however, be recollected that the story, as told in the Brāhmaṇa, can scarcely be regarded as historical, and that it is not unreasonable to suppose that the incidents related, even if founded on fact, may have been coloured by the Brahmanical prepossessions of the narrator. But if so, the legend can give us no true idea of the light in which Viśvāmitra's exercise of priestly functions was looked upon either by himself or by his contemporaries.

[154] See Weber, Ind. St. ix. p. 317 f., and Roth in his Lexicon, s.vv. anta and udantya.

[155] This legend is perhaps alluded to in the Kāṭhaka Brāhmaṇa, 19, 11, quoted by Prof. Weber, Ind. St. iii. 478: Śunaśśepo vai etām Ājīgarttir Varuṇa-gṛihīto'paśyat | tayā sa vai Varuṇa-pāśād amuchyata | "Śunaśśepa the son of Ajīgartta, when seized by Varuṇa, saw this (verse); and by it he was released from the bonds of Varuṇa." Manu also mentions the story, x. 105: Ajīgarttaḥ sutaṁ hantum upāsarpad bubhukshitaḥ | na chālipyata pāpena khut-pratīkāram ācharan | "Ajīgartta, when famished, approached to slay his son; and (by so doing) was not contaminated by sin, as he was seeking the means of escape from hunger." On this Kullūka annotates: Ṛishir Ajīgarttākhyo bubhukshitaḥ san puttraṁ Śunaśśepa-nāmānaṁ svayaṁ vikrītavān yajne go-śata-lābhāya yajna-yūpe baddhvā viśasitā bhūtvā hantum prachakrame | na cha khut-pratīkārārthaṁ tathā kurvan pāpena liptaḥ | etach cha Bahvṛicha-brāhmaṇe Śunaśśephākhyāneshu vyaktam uktam | "A rishi called Ajīgartta, having, when famished, himself sold his son called Śunaśśepa, in order to obtain a hundred cows at a sacrifice, bound him to the sacrificial stake, and in the capacity of immolator was about to slay him. By doing so, as a means of escape from hunger, he did not incur sin. This is distinctly recorded in the Bahvṛicha (Aitareya) Brāhmaṇa in the legend of Śunaśśepa." The speakers in the Brāhmaṇa, however, do not take by any means so lenient a view of Ajīgartta's conduct as Manu. (See Müller's Anc. Sansk. Lit. p. 415.) The compiler of the latter work lived in an age when it was perhaps thought that a rishi could do no wrong. The Bhāgavata Purāṇa, ix. sect. 7, and sect. 16, verses 30–37 follows the Ait. Br. in the version it gives of the story; but, as we shall see in a subsequent section, the Rāmāyaṇa relates some of the circumstances quite differently.

In Indische Studien, ii. 112–123, this story forms the subject of an interesting dissertation by Professor Roth, who arrives at the following conclusions:

"(i.) The oldest legend about S'unaḥśepa (alluded to in R.V. i. 24, 11–13,[156] and R.V. v. 2, 7) knows only of his miraculous deliverance by divine help from the peril of death.

"(ii.) This story becomes expanded in the sequel into a narrative of S'unaḥśepa's threatened slaughter as a sacrificial victim, and of his deliverance through Viśvāmitra.

"(iii.) This immolation-legend becomes severed into two essentially distinct versions, the oldest forms of which are respectively represented by the stories in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, and the Rāmāyaṇa.

"(iv.) The latter becomes eventually the predominant one; but its proper central-point is no longer the deliverance from immolation, but the incorporation of Sunaḥśepa, or (with a change of persons) of Ṛichīka, into the family of the Kuśikas. It thus becomes in the end a family-legend of the race of Viśvāmitra.

[156] Compare also Rosen's remarks on the hymns ascribed to S'unas'śepa; Rig-veda Sanhita, Annotationes, p. lv. He thinks they contain nothing which would lead to the belief that they have any connection with the legend in the Rāmāyaṇa and Ait. Br.

"There is thus no historical, perhaps not even a genealogical, result to be gained here. On the other hand the story obtains an important place in the circle of those narratives in which the sacerdotal literature expressed its views regarding the character and agency of Viśvāmitra."

In a passage of the Mahābhārata, Ādip. verses 3694 ff.,[157] where the descendants of Pūru are recorded, we find among them Bharata the son of Dushyanta (verse 3709) from whom (1) Bhumanyu, (2) Suhotra, (3) Ajamīḍha, and (4) Jahnu are said to have sprung in succession (verses 3712–3722); and the last-named king and his brothers Vrajana and Rūpin are said to have been the ancestors of the Kuśikas (verse 3723: anvayāḥ Kuśikāḥ rājan Jahnor amita-tejasaḥ | Vrajana-Rūpiṇoḥ), who were therefore, according to this passage also, descended from Bharata (see above, p. 354). The Mahābhārata then goes on to relate that during the reign of Samvaraṇa, son of Jahnu's eldest brother Ṛiksha, the country over which he ruled was desolated by various calamities (verses 3725 f.). The narrative proceeds, verse 3727:

Abhyaghnan Bhāratāṁś chaiva sapatnānām balāni cha | chālayan vasudhāṁ chemām balena chaturangiṇā | abhyayāt taṁ cha Pānchālyo vijitya tarasā mahīm | akshauhiṇībhir daśabhiḥ sa enaṁ samare 'jayat | tataḥ sa-dāraḥ sāmātyaḥ sa-puttraḥ sa-suhṛijjanaḥ | rājā Saṁvaraṇas tasmāt palāyata mahābhayāt | 3730. Sindhor nadasya mahato nikunje nyavasat tadā | nadī-vishaya-paryyante parvatasya samīpataḥ | tattrā-vasan bahūn kālān Bhāratāḥ durgam aśritāḥ | teshāṁ nivasatāṁ tattra sahasram parivatsarān | athābhyagachhad Bhāratan Vaśishṭho bhagavān ṛishiḥ | tam āgatam prayatnena pratyudgamyābhivādya cha | arghyam abhyāharaṁs tasmai te sarve Bhāratās tadā | nivedya sarvam ṛishaye satkāreṇa suvarchchase | tam āsane chopavishṭaṁ rājā vavre svayaṁ tadā | "purohito bhavān no 'stu rājyāya prayatemahi" | 3735. "Om" ity evaṁ Vaśishṭho 'pi Bhāratān pratyapadyata | athābhyasinchat sāmrājye sarva-kshattrasya Pauravam | vishāṇa-bhūtaṁ sarvasyām pṛithivyām iti naḥ śrutam | Bharatādhyushitam pūrvaṁ so 'dhyatishṭhat purottamam | punar balibhṛitaś chaiva chakre sarva-mahīkshitaḥ |

[157] Referred to by Roth, Litt. u. Gesch. des Weda, pp. 142 ff., and Wilson, Rig-veda, iii. p. 86.

"3727. And the hosts of their enemies also smote the Bhāratas. Shaking the earth with an army of four kinds of forces, the Pānchālya chief assailed him, having rapidly conquered the earth, and vanquished him with ten complete hosts. Then king Samvaraṇa with his wives, ministers, sons, and friends, fled from that great cause of alarm; (3730) and dwelt in the thickets of the great river Sindhu (Indus), in the country bordering on the stream, and near a mountain. There the Bhāratas abode for a long time, taking refuge in a fortress. As they were dwelling there, for a thousand years, the venerable rishi Vasishṭha came to them. Going out to meet him on his arrival, and making obeisance, the Bhāratas all presented him with the arghya offering, shewing every honour to the glorious rishi. When he was seated the king himself solicited him, 'Be thou our priest; let us strive to regain my kingdom.' 3735. Vasishṭha consented to attach himself to the Bhāratas, and, as we have heard, invested the descendant of Pūru with the sovereignty of the entire Kshattriya race, to be a horn (to have mastery) over the whole earth. He occupied the splendid city formerly inhabited by Bhărata, and made all kings again tributary to himself."

It is remarkable that in this passage the Bhāratas, who, as we have seen, are elsewhere represented as being so closely connected with Viśvāmitra, and are in one text of the Rig-veda (vii. 33, 6) alluded to as the enemies of Vasishṭha's friends, should be here declared to have adopted the latter rishi as their priest. The account, however, need not be received as historical, or even based on any ancient tradition; and the part referring to Vasishṭha in particular may have been invented for the glorification of that rishi, or for the honour of the Bhāratas.

The 11th and 12th khandas of the second adhyāya of the Sarvasāra Upanishad (as we learn from Professor Weber's analysis in Ind. St. i. 390) relate that Viśvāmitra was instructed on the identity of breath (prāṇa) with Indra, by the god himself, who had been celebrated by the sage on the occasion of a sacrifice, at which he officiated as hotṛi-priest, in a thousand Bṛihatī verses, and was in consequence favourably disposed towards him.

It is abundantly clear, from the details supplied in this section, that Viśvāmitra, who was a rājanya of the Bhārata and Kuśika families (Ait. Br. vii. 17 and 18), is represented by ancient Indian tradition as the author of numerous Vedic hymns, as the domestic priest (purohita) of king Sudās (Nir. ii. 24), and as officiating as a hotṛi at a sacrifice of king Hariśchandra (Ait. Br. vii. 16). The Rāmāyaṇa also, as we shall see in a future section, connects him with Triśanku, the father of Hariśchandra, and makes him also contemporary with Ambarīsha; and in the first book of the same poem he is said to have visited king Daśaratha, the father of Rāma (Bālakanda, i. 20, 1 ff.). As these kings were separated from each other by very long intervals, Triśanku being a descendant of Ikshvāku in the 28th, Ambarīsha in the 44th,[158] Sudās in the 49th, and Daśaratha in the 60th generation (see Wilson's Vishṇu Purāṇa, vol. iii. pp. 284, 303, 304, 313), it is manifest that the authors of these legends either intentionally or through oversight represented Viśvāmitra, like Vasishṭha (see above), as a personage of miraculous longevity; and on either supposition a great deal that is related of him must be purely fabulous. All the authorities describe him as the son of Gāthin or Gādhi, the Anukramaṇī, the Vishṇu Purāṇa, and the Harivaṁśa declaring also that Gāthin was an incarnation of Indra, and thus asserting Viśvāmitra to be of divine descent. It is not clear whether this fable is referred to in R.V. iii. 53, 9, where Viśvāmitra is styled deva-jāḥ, "born of a god," or whether this verse may not have led to the invention of the story. In either case the verse can scarcely have emanated from the rishi himself; but it is more likely to be the production of one of his descendants.[159]

[158] According to the Rāmāyaṇa, i. 70, 41; ii. 110, 32, Ambarīsha was only 28th from Ikshvāku. Compare Prof. Wilson's note on these genealogies, V.P. iii. 313 ff.

[159] The word devajāḥ, which, following Roth, s.v., I have translated "god-born," is taken by Sāyaṇa as = dyotamānānāṁ tejasāṁ janayitā, "generator of shining lights," and appears to be regarded by him as referring to the creation of constellations by Viśvāmitra, mentioned in the Rāmāyaṇa, i. 60, 21. Prof. Wilson renders the phrase by "generator of the gods;" and remarks that "the compound is not devajā, 'god-born,' nor was Viśvāmitra of divine parentage" (R.V. iii. p. 85, note 4). This last remark overlooks the fact above alluded to of his father Gādhi being represented as an incarnation of Indra, and the circumstance that Prof. Wilson himself (following Sāyaṇa) had shortly before translated the words prathama-jāḥ brahmaṇaḥ in R.V. iii. 29, 15, as applied to the Kuśikas, by "the first-born of Brahmā," although from the accent brahman here must be neuter, and the phrase seems to mean, as I have rendered above, "the first-born of prayer." The word jā is given in the Nighaṇṭu as one of the synonymes of apatya, "offspring;" and in R.V. i. 164, 15, where it is coupled with ṛishayaḥ, the compound devajāḥ is explained by Sāyaṇa as "born of the god," i.e. the sun, and by Prof. Wilson as "born of the gods." See

This verse (R.V. iii. 53, 9) which claims a superhuman origin for Viśvāmitra, and the following verses 11–13 of the same hymn, which assert the efficacy of his prayers, form a sort of parallel to the contents of R.V. vii. 33, where the supernatural birth of Vasishṭha (vv. 10 ff.), the potency of his intercession (vv. 2–5), and the sacred knowledge of his descendants (vv. 7 and 8), are celebrated.

As the hymns of Viśvāmitra and his descendants occupy so prominent a place in the Rig-veda Sanhitā, and as he is the alleged author of the text reputed the holiest in the entire Veda (iii. 62, 10), the Gāyatrī par excellence, there is no reason to doubt that, although he was a rājanya, he was unreservedly acknowledged by his contemporaries to be both a rishi and a priest. Nothing less than the uniform recognition and employment of the hymns handed down under his name as the productions of a genuine "seer," could have sufficed to gain for them a place in the sacred canon.[160] It is true we possess little authentic information regarding the process by which the hymns of different families were admitted to this honour; but at least there is no tradition, so far as I am aware, that those of Viśvāmitra and his family were ever treated as antilegomena. And if we find that later works consider it necessary to represent his priestly character as a purely exceptional one, explicable only on the ground of supernatural merit acquired by ardent devotion, we must recollect that the course of ages had brought about a most material change in Indian society, that the sacerdotal function had at length become confined to the members of an exclusive caste, and that the exercise of such an office in ancient times by persons of the regal or mercantile classes had ceased to be intelligible, except upon the supposition of such extraordinary sanctity as was alleged in the case of Viśvāmitra.

It is worthy of remark that although the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa (see above) declares that Śunaśśepa, as belonging to a priestly family, was called on to exercise the sacerdotal office immediately after his release, yet the anterior possession of divine knowledge is also ascribed to Viśvāmitra and the Gāthins, and that Śunaśśepa is represented as suc-also R.V. ix. 93, 1 = S.V. i. 538. (Compare Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, for 1866, p. 387 ff.)

[160] That many at least of these compositions were really the work of Viśvāmitra, or his descendants, is proved, as we have seen, by the fact that their names are mentioned in them.

ceeding to this sacred lore, as well as to the regal dignity of the race on which he became engrafted.

The fact of Viśvāmitra having been both a rishi and an officiating priest, is thus, as we have seen, and if ancient tradition is to be believed, undoubted. In fact, if we look to the number of Vedic hymns ascribed to him and to his family, to the long devotion to sacerdotal functions which this fact implies, and to the apparent improbability that a person who had himself stood in the position of a king should afterwards have become a professional priest, we may find it difficult to believe that although (as he certainly was) a scion of a royal stock, he had ever himself exercised regal functions. Professor Roth remarks (Litt. u. Gesch. p. 125) that there is nothing either in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, or in the hymns of the Rig-veda to shew that he had ever been a king.[161] But on the other hand, as the same writer observes (p. 126), and as we shall hereafter see, there are numerous passages in the later authorities in which the fact of his being a king is distinctly, but perhaps untruly, recorded.

It is so well known, that I need scarcely adduce any proof of the fact, that in later ages Rājanyas and Vaiśyas, though entitled to sacrifice and to study the Vedas, were no longer considered to have any right to officiate as priests on behalf of others. I may, however, cite a few texts on this subject. Manu says, i. 88:

Adhyāpanam adhyayanaṁ yăjanaṁ yājanaṁ tathā | dānam pratigrahaṁ chaiva Brāhmaṇānām akalpayat | 89. Prajānāṁ rakshaṇaṁ dānam ijyā'dhyayanam eva cha | vishayeshv aprasaktiṁ cha kshattriyasya samāsataḥ | 90. Paśūnāṁ rakshaṇaṁ dānam ijyā'dhyayanam eva cha | vaṇikpathaṁ kusīdaṁ cha Vaiśyasya kṛishim eva cha | 91. Ekam eva tu Śūdrasya prabhuḥ karma samādiśat | eteshām eva varṇānāṁ śuśrūshām anasūyayā | 88. He (Brahmā) ordained teaching, study, sacrificing, officiating for others at sacrifices, and the giving and receiving of gifts, to be the functions of Brāhmans. 89. Protection of the people, the giving of gifts, sacrifice, study, and non-addiction to objects of sense he assigned as the duties of the Kshattriya. 90. The tending of cattle, giving of gifts, sacrifice, study, commerce, the taking of usury, and agriculture he appointed to be the occupations of the Vaiśya. 91. But the lord assigned only one duty to the Śūdra, that of serving these other three classes without grudging."

[161] May not R.V. iii. 43, 5 (quoted above), however, be understood to point to something of this kind?

Similarly it is said in the second of the Yajna-paribhāshā Sūtras, translated by Professor M. Müller (at the end of the ninth volume of the Journal of the German Oriental Society, p. xliii.), "that sacrifice is proper to the three classes, the Brāhman, Rājanya, and also the Vaiśya."[162] Prof. Müller also refers to Kātyāyana's Śrauta Sūtras, of which i. 1, 5 and 6 are as follows:

5. Angahīnāśrotriya-shaṇḍa-śūdra-varjam | 6. Brāhmaṇa-rājanya-vaiśyānāṁ śruteḥ | "Men,[163] with the exception of those whose members

[162] Prof. Müller does not give the original text.

[163] In one of these Sutras of Kātyāyana (i. 1, 4) and its commentary a curious question (one of those which the Indian authors often think it necessary to raise and to settle, in order that their treatment of a subject may be complete and exhaustive) is argued, viz. whether the lower animals and the gods have any share in the practice of Vedic observances; or whether it is confined to men. The conclusion is that the gods cannot practise these rites, as they are themselves the objects of them, and as they have already obtained heaven and the other objects of desire with a view to which they are practised (tatra devānāṁ devatāntarābhāvād anadhikāraḥ | na hy ātmānam uddiśya tyāgaḥ sambhavati | kincha | devāś cha prāpta-svargādi-kāmāḥ | na cha teshāṁ kinchid avāptavyam asti yad-arthaṁ karmāṇi kurvate |). As regards the right of the lower animals to sacrifice, although the point is decided against them on the ground of their only "looking to what is near at hand, and not to the rewards of a future world" (te hy āsannam eva chetayante no pāralaukikam phalam); still it is considered necessary seriously to obviate a presumption in their favour that they seek to enjoy pleasure and avoid pain, and even appear to indicate their desire for the happiness of another world by seeming to observe some of the Vedic prescriptions: "Nanu uktaṁ śunaś chaturdaśyām upavāsa-darśanāt śyenasya cha ashṭamyām upavāsa-darśanāch cha te 'pi pāralaukikaṁ jānanti" iti | tat katham avagamyate "te dharmārtham upavasanti" iti | ye hi veda-smṛiti-purāṇādikam paṭhanti te eva jānanti yad "anena karmaṇā idam phalam amutra prāpsyate" iti | na cha ete vedādikam paṭhanti nāpy anyebhyaḥ āgamayanti | tena śāstrārtham avidvāṁsaḥ phalam āmushmikam akāmayantaḥ kathaṁ tat-sādhanaṁ karma kuryuḥ | tasmād na dharmārtham upavasanti iti | kimarthaṁ tarhy eteshām upavāsaḥ | uchyate | rogād aruchir eshām | tarhi niyata-kāle kathaṁ rogaḥ | uchyate | niyata-kālāḥ api rogāḥ bhavanti yathā tṛitīyaka-chāturthikādi-jvarāḥ | adhanāś cha ete | "But do not some say that 'from a dog having been noticed to fast on the fourteenth day of the month, and a hawk on the eighth, they also have a knowledge of matters connected with a future life?' But how is it known that these dogs and hawks fast from religious motives? For it is only those who read the Vedas, Smṛitis, Purāṇas, etc., who are aware that by means of such and such observances, such and such rewards will be obtained in another world. But these animals neither read the sacred books for themselves, nor ascertain their contents from others. How then, ignorant as they are of the contents of the scriptures, and devoid of any desire for future rewards, can they perform those rites which are the means of attaining them? It is therefore to be concluded that they do not fast from religious motives. But why, then, do they fast? We reply, because from sickness they have a disinclination for food. But how do they happen to be sick on certain fixed days? We answer, there are also certain diseases which occur on fixed days, as tertian and quartan agues. Another reason why the lower animals cannot sacrifice is that they are destitute of wealth (and so unable to provide the necessary materials)."

are defective, those who have not read the Veda, eunuchs, and S'ūdras, have a right to sacrifice. 6. It is Brāhmans, Rājanyas, and Vaiśyas (only who) according to the Veda (possess this privilege)." [164]

[164] "And yet," Prof. Müller remarks (ibid), "concessions were made (to other and lower classes) at an early period. One of the best known cases is that of the Rathakāra. Then the Nishādasthapati, though a Nishāda chief and not belonging to the three highest classes was admitted to great sacrifices, e.g. to the gāvedhukacharu." The S'atap. Br. i. 1, 4, 12, has the following words: Tāni vai etāni chatvāri vāchaḥ "ehi" iti brāhmaṇasya "āgahi" "ādrava" vaiśyasya cha rājanyabandhoś cha "ādhāva" iti śūdrasya | "[In the formula, havishkṛid ehi, 'come, o oblation-maker,' referred to in the previous paragraph, and its modifications] these four (different) words are employed to express 'come:' ehi, 'come,' in the case of a Brāhman; āgahi, 'come hither,' in the case of a Vaiśya; ādrava, 'hasten hither,' in the case of a Rājanyabandhu, and ādhāva, 'run hither,' in the case of a S'ūdra." On this Prof. Weber remarks, in a note on his translation of the first adhyāya of the first book of the S'. P. Br. (Journ. Germ. Or. Soc. iv. p. 301): "The entire passage is of great importance, as it shews (in opposition to what Roth says in the first vol. of this Journal, p. 83) that the S'ūdras were then admitted to the holy sacrifices of the Arians, and understood their speech, even if they did not speak it. The latter point cannot certainly be assumed as a necessary consequence, but it is highly probable; and I consequently incline to the view of those who regard the S'ūdras as an Arian tribe which immigrated into India before the others." See above, p. 141, note 251, and Ind. Stud. ii. 194, note, where Prof. Weber refers to the Mahābhārata, S'āntip. verses 2304 ff. which are as follows: Svāhākāra-vashaṭkārau mantraḥ śūdre na vidyate | tasmāch chhūdraḥ pākayajnair yajetāvratavān svayam | pūrṇapātramayīm āhuḥ pākayajnasya dakshiṇām | śūdraḥ Paijavano nāma sahasrāṇāṁ śataṁ dadau | Aindrāgnyena vidhānena dakshiṇām iti naḥ śrutam | "The svāhākāra, and the vashaṭkāra, and the mantras do not belong to a S'ūdra. Wherefore let a man of this class sacrifice with pākayajnas, being incapacitated for (Vedic) rites (śrauta-vratopāya-hīnaḥ | Comm.). They say that the gift (dakshiṇā) proper for a pākayajna consists of a full dish (pūrṇapātramayī). A S'ūdra called Paijavana gave as a present a hundred thousand (of these pūrṇapātras) after the Aindrāgnya rule." Here, says Prof. Weber, "the remarkable tradition is recorded that Paijavana, i.e. Sudās, who was so famous for his sacrifices, and who is celebrated in the Rig-veda as the patron of Viśvāmitra and enemy of Vasishṭha, was a S'ūdra." In the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, vii. 11, 24, the duties of a S'ūdra are described to be "submissiveness, purity, honest service to his master, sacrifice without mantras, abstinence from theft, truth, and the protection of cows and Brāhmans" (śūdrasya sannatiḥ śauchaṁ sevā svāminy amāyayā | amantrayajno hy asteyaṁ satyaṁ go-vipra-rakshaṇam |). The Commentator defines amantrayajnaḥ thus: namaskāreṇaiva pancha-yajnānushṭhānam, "the practice of the five sacrifices with obeisance," and quotes Yājnavalkya. See also Wilson's Vishṇu Purāṇa, vol. iii. p. 87, and notes; Müller's Anc. Sansk. Lit. p. 203; the same author's Essay, at the end of the ninth vol. of the Journ. Germ. Or. Soc. p. lxxiii.; and Bohtlingk and Roth's Lexicon, s.v. pākayajna.

According to the Ait. Br. vii. 19, "the Brāhman alone of the four castes has the right of consuming things offered in sacrifice" (etāḥ vai prajāḥ hutādo yad brāhmaṇāḥ | atha etāḥ ahutādo yad rājanyo vaiśyaḥ śūdraḥ). And yet, as Prof. Müller observes, it is said in the Śatap. Br. v. 5, 4, 9: Chatvāro vai varṇāḥ brāhmaṇo rājanyo vaiśyaḥ śūdro na ha eteshāṁ ekaśchana bhavati yaḥ somaṁ vamati | sa yad ha eteshām ekaśchit syāt syād ha eva prāyaśchittiḥ | "There are four classes, the Brāhman, Rājanya, Vaiśya, and Śūdra. There is no one of these who vomits (i.e., I suppose, dislikes) the soma. If anyone of them however should do so, let there be an atonement."

Professor Weber, by whom also these words are quoted (Ind. St. x. 12), remarks that "they leave open the possibility of Rājanyas, Vaiśyas, and even Śūdras partaking of the soma, the only consequence being that they must as an expiation perform the Sautramaṇī rite."

In the twenty-first of the Yajna-paribhāshā Sūtras, translated by Müller, p. xlvii., it is declared that the priestly dignity belongs to the Brāhmans; and it is laid down by the Indian authorities that even when the sacrifice is of a kind intended exclusively for Kshattriyas, the priest must still be a Brāhman and not a Kshattriya, the reason being that men of the former class only can eat the remains of the sacrifice (see Kātyāyana's Śr. Sūtras, i. 2, 8): Brāhmaṇāḥ ṛitvijo bhaksha-pratishedhād itarayoḥ, "the Brāhmans only are priests, because the other two castes are forbidden to eat (the remains of the sacrifice"). See also Weber, Ind. St. x. pp. 17 and 31, and the passages of the Ait. Br. viii. 24 and 27, referred to in pages 30 and 31: 24. Na ha vai apurohitasya rājno devāḥ annam adanti | tasmād rājā 'yakshamāṇo brāhmaṇam puro dadhīta | "The gods do not eat the food offered by a king who has no purohita. Wherefore (even) when not about to sacrifice, the king should put forward a Brāhman (as his domestic priest)." 27. Yo ha vai trīn purohitāṁs trīn purodhātṛīn veda sa brāhmaṇaḥ purohitāḥ | sa vadeta purodhāyai | Agnir vāva purohitaḥ pṛithivī purodhātā vāyur vāva purohito 'ntariksham purodhātā ādityo vāva purohito dyauḥ purodhātā | esha ha vai purohito yaḥ evaṁ veda atha sa tirohito yaḥ evaṁ na veda | tasya rājā mitraṁ bhavati dvishantam apabādhate | yasyaivaṁ vidvān brāhmaṇo rāshṭra-gopaḥ purohitaḥ | kshattreṇa kshattraṁ jayati balena balam aśnute | yasyaivaṁ vidvān brāhmaṇo rāshṭra-gopaḥ purohitaḥ | tasmai viśaḥ sanjānate sammukhāḥ ekamanasaḥ | yasyaivaṁ vidvān brāhmaṇo

rāshṭra-gopaḥ purohitaḥ | "The Brāhman who knows the three purohitas, and their three appointers, is a (proper) purohita, and should be nominated to this office. Agni is one purohita, and the earth appoints him; Vāyu another, and the air appoints him; the Sun is a third, and the sky appoints him. He who knows this is a (proper) purohita; and he who does not know this is to be rejected. (Another) king becomes the friend of the prince who has a Brāhman possessing such knowledge for his purohita and the protector of his realm; and he vanquishes his enemy. He who has a Brāhman possessing etc. (as above) conquers (another's) regal power by (his own) regal power, and acquires another's force by (his own) force. With him who has a Brāhman etc. (as above) the people are openly united and in harmony."

I add another passage from the same Brāhmaṇa, which might also have been properly introduced in an earlier chapter of this work (chapt. i. sect. iii.) as it relates to the creation of the four castes:

Ait. Br. vii. 19. Prajāpatir yajnam asṛijata | yajnaṁ sṛishṭam anu brahma-kshattre asṛijyetām | brahma-kshattre anu dvayyaḥ prajāḥ asṛijyanta hutādaś cha ahutādaś cha brahma eva anu hutādaḥ kshattram anv ahutādaḥ | etāḥ vai prajāḥ hutādo yad brāhmaṇāḥ | atha etāḥ ahutādo yad rājanyo vaiśyaḥ śūdraḥ | tābhyo yajnaḥ udakrāmat | tam brahma-kshattre anvaitāṁ yāny eva brahmaṇaḥ āyudhāni tair brahma anvait yāni kshattrasya taṁ (? taiḥ) kshattram | etāni vai brahmaṇaḥ āyudhāni yad yajnāyudhāni | atha etāni kshattrasya āyudhani yad aśva-rathaḥ kavachaḥ ishu-dhanva | taṁ kshattram ananvāpya nyavarttata | āyudhebhyo ha sma asya vijamānaḥ parāṇ eva eti | atha enam brahma anvait | tam āpnot | tam āptvā parastād nirudhya atishṭhat | sa āptaḥ parastād niruddhas tishṭhan jnātvā svāny āyudhāni brahma upāvarttata | tasmād ha apy etarhi yajno brahmany eva brāhmaṇeshu pratishṭhitaḥ | atha enat kshattram anvāgachhat tad abravīd "upa mā asmin yajne hvayasva" iti | tat "tathā" ity abravīt "tad vai nidhāya svāny āyudhāni brahmaṇaḥ eva āyudhair brahmaṇo rūpeṇa brahma bhūtvā yajnam upavārttasva" iti | "tathā" iti tat kshattraṁ nidhāya svāny āyudhāni brahmaṇaḥ eva āyudhair brahmaṇo rūpeṇa brahma bhūtvā yajnam upāvarttata | tasmād ha apy etarhi kshattriyo yajamāno nidhāya eva svāny āyudhāni brahmaṇaḥ eva āyudhair brahmaṇo rūpeṇa brahma bhūtvā yajnam upāvarttate |

"Prajāpati created sacrifice. After sacrifice, Brăhmăn (sacred knowledge) and Kshăttra (regal power)[165] were created. After these, two kinds of creatures were formed, viz. those who eat, and those who do not eat, oblations. After Brăhmăn came the eaters of oblations, and after Kshăttra those who do not eat them. These are the eaters of oblations, viz. the Brāhmans. Those who do not eat them are the Rājanyâ, the Vaiśya, and the Śūdra. From these creatures sacrifice departed. Brăhmăn and Kshăttra followed it, Brăhmăn with the implements proper to itself, and Kshăttra with those which are proper to itself. The implements of Brăhmăn are the same as those of sacrifice, while those of Kshăttra are a horse-chariot,[166] armour, and a bow and arrows. Kshăttra turned back, not having found the sacrifice; which turns aside, afraid of the implements of Kshăttra. Brăhmăn followed after it, and reached it; and having done so, stood beyond, and intercepting it. Being thus found and intercepted, sacrifice, standing still and recognizing its own implements, approached to Brăhmăn. Wherefore now also sacrifice depends upon Brăhmăn, upon the Brāhmans. Kshăttra then followed Brăhmăn, and said, 'invite me[167] (too to participate) in this sacrifice.' Brăhmăn replied, 'so be it: then laying aside thy own implements, approach the sacrifice with the implements of Brăhmăn, in the form of Brăhmăn, and having become Brăhmăn.[168]

[165] The two principles or functions represented by the Brāhmans and Kshattriyas respectively.

[166] See Weber, Indische Studien, ix. p. 318.

[167] See Weber, in the same page as last quoted.

[168] This idea may be further illustrated by a reference to several passages adduced by Professor Weber, Ind. St. x. 17, who remarks: "Hence every Rājanya and Vaiśya becomes through the consecration for sacrifice (dīkshā) a Brāhman during its continuance, and is to be addressed as such in the formula employed," and cites Ś. P. Br. iii. 2, 1, 39 f., part of which has been already quoted above, in p. 136, note; and also Ait. Br. vii. 23: Sa ha dīkshamāṇaḥ eva brāhmaṇatām abhyupaiti | "He a king, when consecrated, enters into the condition of a Brāhman." See the rest of the section and sections 24, 25, and 31 in Dr. Haug's translation. The Ś. P. Br. xiii. 4, 1, 3, says, in opposition to the opinion of some, that an aśvamedha, which is a sacrifice proper to Rājanyas, should be begun in summer, which is their season: tad vai vasante eva abhyārabheta | vasanto vai brāhmaṇasya ṛituḥ | yaḥ u vai kaś cha yajate brāhmaṇī-bhūya iva eva yajate | "Let him commence in spring, which is the Brāhman's season. Whosoever sacrifices does so after having as it were become a Brāhman." So too Kātyāyana says in his Śrauta Sūtras vii. 4, 12: "Brāhmaṇa" ity eva vaiśya-rājanyayor api | "The word Brāhmaṇa is to be addressed to a Vaiśya and a Rājanya also." On which the Commentator annotates: Vaiśya-rājanyayor api yajne "dīkshito 'yam brāhmaṇaḥ" ity eva vaktavyam | na "dīkshito 'yaṁ kshattriyo vaiśyo vā" iti | "The formula 'This Brāhman has been consecrated' is to be used at the sacrifice of a Vaiśya Kshăttra rejoined, 'Be it so,' and, laying aside its own implements, approached the sacrifice with those of Brăhmăn, in the form of Brăhmăn, and having become Brăhmăn. Wherefore now also a Kshattriya when sacrificing, laying aside his own implements, approaches the sacrifice with those of Brăhmăn, in the form of Brăhmăn, and having become Brăhmăn."

The Mahābhārata, S'āntip. verses 2280 f. distinctly defines the duty of a Kshattriya in reference to sacrifice and sacred study: Kshattriyasyāpi yo dharmas tam̃ te vakshyāmi Bhārata | dadyād rājan na yācheta yajeta na cha yājayet | nādhyāpayed adhīyīta prajāś cha paripālayet | "I will tell thee also the duties of a Kshattriya. Let him give, and not ask (gifts); let him sacrifice, but not officiate for others at sacrifices; let him not teach, but study; and let him protect the people."

It is clear that these passages which restrict the right of officiating ministerially at sacrifices to the members of the Brahmanical order,[169] represent a very different state of opinion and practice from that which prevailed in the earlier Vedic age, when Viśvāmitra, a Rājanya, and his relatives, were highly esteemed as the authors of sacred poetry, and were considered as perfectly authorized to exercise sacerdotal functions.

The result of the conflict between the opposing interests represented by Vasishṭha and Viśvāmitra respectively, is thus described by Professor and a Rājanya also; and not the words 'this Rājanya, or this Vais'ya, has been consecrated.'"

[169] It appears from Arrian that the Greeks were correctly informed of this prerogative of the Brāhmans. He says, Indica, ch. xi.: Καὶ ὅστις δὲ ἰδίᾳ θύει, ἐξηγητὴς αὐτῷ τῆς θυσίης τῶν τις σοφιστῶν τούτων γίνεται, ὡς οὐκ ἂν ἄλλως κεχαρισμένα τοῖς θεοῖς θύσαντας. "And whosoever sacrifices in private has one of these sophists" (so the highest of the classes, here said to be seven in number, is designated) "as director of the ceremony, since sacrifice could not otherwise be offered acceptably to the gods." Arrian makes another assertion (ibid. xii.) which, if applied to the time when he wrote (in the second Christian century), is not equally correct. After observing that the several classes were not allowed to intermarry, nor to practice two professions, nor to pass from one class into another, he adds: Μοῦνον σφίσιν ἀνεῖται σοφιστὴν ἐκ παντὸς γένεος γενέσθαι· ὅτι οὐ μαλθακὰ τοῖσι σοφιστῇσιν εἰσὶ τὰ πρήγματα, ἀλλὰ πάντων ταλαιπωρότατα. "Only it is permitted to a person of any class among them to become a sophist; for the life of that class is not luxurious, but the most toilsome of all." However indubitably true the first part of this sentence may have been in the age of Vis'vāmitra, it cannot be correctly predicated of the age of Arrian, or even of the period when India was invaded by Alexander the Great. The mistake may have arisen from confounding the Buddhists with the Brāhmans, or from supposing that all the Brahmanical Indians, who adopted an ascetic life, were regarded as "sophists."

Roth at the close of his work on the literature and history of the Veda, which has been so often quoted, p. 141: "Vasishṭha, in whom the future position of the Brahmans is principally foreshadowed, occupies also a far higher place in the recollections of the succeeding centuries than his martial rival; and the latter succumbs in the conflict out of which the holy race of Brahmāvartta was to emerge. Vasishṭha is the sacerdotal hero of the new order of things. In Viśvāmitra the ancient condition of military shepherd-life in the Punjab is thrown back for ever into the distance. This is the general historical signification of the contest between the two Vedic families, of which the literature of all the succeeding periods has preserved the recollection."

Sect. VII.—Do the details in the last two sections enable us to decide in what relation Vasishṭha and Viśvāmitra stood to each other as priests of Sudās?

It appears from the data supplied in the two preceding sections that both Vasishṭha and Viśvāmitra are represented as priests of a king called Sudās. This is shewn, as regards the former rishi (see pp. 319 ff., above), by R.V. vii. 18, 4, 5, and 21–25; and vii. 33, 1–6, where he is said to have interceded with Indra for Sudās, who, as appears from verse 25 of the second of these hymns, was the son of Pijavana. A similar relation is shewn by R.V. iii. 53, 9–13 to have subsisted between Viśvāmitra and Sudās (see above, p. 342); and although Sudās is not in that passage identified with the king who was Vasishṭha's patron, by the addition of his patronymic, we are told in the Nirukta, ii. 24, that he was the same person, the son of Pijavana. There is therefore no doubt that, according to ancient tradition, the two rishis were both priests of the same prince. It further appears that the Bharatas, with whom, as we have seen, Viśvāmitra was connected, are in R.V. vii. 33, 6 referred to as in hostility with Sudās and his priest. Are we then to conclude that the one set of facts excludes the other—that the two rishis could not both have been the family-priests of Sudās?

There is no reason to arrive at such an inference. Vasishṭha and Viśvāmitra could not, indeed, have been the domestic priests of Sudās at one and the same period. But they may have been so at different times; and the one may have supplanted the other. It is, however, very difficult to derive from the imperfect materials supplied in the passages to which I have referred any clear conception of the shape and course which the contest between these two rivals took, or to fix the periods at which they respectively enjoyed their patron's favour. Prof. Roth thinks[170] that some light is thrown on this obscure subject by the different parts of the 53rd hymn of the third mandala of the Rig-veda. This composition, as it stands, contains, as he considers, fragments of hymns by Viśvāmitra or his descendants, of different dates; and the verses (9–13), in which that rishi represents himself and the Kauśikas as being the priests of Sudās, are, in his opinion, earlier than the concluding verses (21–24),[171] which consist of imprecations directed against Vasishṭha. These last verses, he remarks, contain an expression of wounded pride, and threaten vengeance against an enemy who had come into possession of some power or dignity which Viśvāmitra himself had previously enjoyed. And as we find from one of his hymns (the 53rd) that he and his adherents had at one time led Sudās to victory, and enjoyed a corresponding consideration;—while from Vasishṭha's hymns it is clear that he and his family had also been elevated in consequence of similar claims to a like position;—it would seem to result that Viśvāmitra had cursed Vasishṭha for this very reason that he had been supplanted by him. The former with his Kuśikas had through the growing influence of his rival been driven away by Sudās to the Bharatas the enemies of that prince and of the Tṛitsus; and then [170] See Litt. und Gesch. des Weda, pp. 121 ff.

[171] I have (above, p. 343) characterized these verses as obscure and have left them untranslated. The portions of the following version which are printed in italics are doubtful: verse 22. "He (or, it) vexes (turns the edge of) even an axe; and breaks even a sword. A seething cauldron, even, o Indra, when over-heated, casts out foam. 23. O men, no notice is taken of the arrow. They lead away the intelligent (lodha) looking upon him as a beast. Men do not, however, pit a hack to run against a racer; they do not lead an ass before horses. 24. These sons of Bharata, o Indra, desire separation, not vicinity. They constantly urge the horse as if to a distance; they carry about the bow in the battle." The reader may consult Prof. Wilson's translation R.V. vol. iii. p. 89 f., as well as Roth's Litt. u. Gesch. des Weda, p. 109 f. In his Illustrations of the Nirukta, p. 42, Roth conjectures that both lodha and paśu, in verse 23, may denote animals of different natures, and that the clause may mean something to the same effect as "they look on the wolf as if it were a hare." In his Lexicon, s.v. paśu, he takes that word to denote a head of cattle (ein Stück Vieh) as a term of contempt. He takes jyāvāja, in verse 24, to mean "having the impulsive force (?) (Schnell-Kraft) of a bow-string."

vowed vengeance against their enemies. Roth remarks that if this conjecture appears too bold, which he does not allow, there is no alternative but to regard verses 9–11 of R.V. iii. 53, as interpolated, and to hold that Viśvāmitra had always been allied with the Bharatas. But, as he urges, in a period such as that which the hymns of the Veda represent to us—a time of feud and foray among the small neighbouring tribes, when the power of the leaders of families and petty chiefs was unlimited, when we observe that the ten kings were allied against Sudās—in a period of subdivided dominion like this it would be far more surprising to find a family so favoured by the gods as that of Viśvāmitra or Vasishṭha in continued and undisturbed possession of influence over any one of these chieftains, than to see mutual aggression, hostility, and vindictiveness, prevailing even among families and clans united to one another by community of language and manners. It is further evident from later tradition, as Roth remarks, that Vasishṭha and his family had not always been the objects of Sudās's favour; but had, on the contrary, been at some time or other sufferers from his enmity or that of his house; and in proof of this he refers to the passage which has been cited above (p. 328) from Sāyaṇa's note on R.V. vii. 32, and the Śāṭyāyana and Tāṇḍya Brāhmaṇas, as there quoted; and also to the 176th adhyāya of the Ādiparvan of the Mahābhārata, verses 6696 ff., which will be adduced in a future section.

According to Roth's view (p. 124) the alienation between Sudās and Vasishṭha fomented by Viśvāmitra was only of temporary duration, and we must, therefore, understand that according to his view, the former rishi and his family remained eventually victors in the contest for influence between themselves and their rivals.

Professor Weber, in a note appended to an article by Dr. A. Kuhn in page 120 of the first volume of his Indische Studien, expresses a different opinion. "The testimonies," he says, "adduced by Roth, pp. 122 ff., according to which Sudās appears in the Epic age as hostile to Brahmanical interests, stand in opposition to his assertion that Vasishṭha's family finally banished Viśvāmitra and the Kuśikas from the court of that prince. The enmity between the latter and Vasishṭha, the prototype of Brahmanhood, is thus by no means of temporary duration (Roth, p. 124), but the very contrary." The passages cited by Roth, which Weber here claims as supporting his own view, are Manu, vii. 41 (see above, p. 296), the Anukramaṇī with the Śāṭyāyana and Tāṇḍya Brāhmaṇas quoted in p. 328, and the 126th and following sections of the Ādip. of the M. Bh. which will be adduced hereafter. To these may be added the text from the Kaushītakī Brāhmaṇa, cited in p. 328. If Sudās became ultimately reconciled to Vasishṭha, and re-instated him and his relatives in their position of court priests, to the exclusion of the rival family of Viśvāmitra, it seems hard to understand, according to Professor Weber's argument, how that prince's name should have been handed down by tradition as one of the most prominent examples of impiety displayed in resistance to Brahmanical pretensions. It is, however, to be observed that, except in the text of Manu, it is the descendants of Sudās, and not the king himself, who are charged with the outrages committed against Vasishṭha's family; and that in the passage of the M. Bh. above referred to (Ādip. vv. 7669 ff.) the son of Sudās is represented as becoming ultimately reconciled to Vasishṭha.[172] And if the passages, which have been cited above from the Rig-veda (pp. 330 f.) in allusion to Sudās's deliverance by the gods, refer to a real person, and to the [172] It is also worthy of remark that the Anuś'āsanap. of the M.Bh. contains a conversation between Vasishṭha und Saudāsa (the son, or one of the descendants of, Sudās) about the pre-eminent purity and excellence of cows, verse 3732: Etasminn eva kāle tu Vaśishṭham ṛishi-sattamam | Ikshvāku-vaṁśajo rājā Saudāso vadatāṁ varaḥ | sarva-loka-charaṁ siddham brahma-kośaṁ sanātanam | purohitam abhiprashṭum abhivādyopachakrame | Saudāsa uvācha | trailokye bhagavan kiṁsvit pavitraṁ kathyate 'nagha | yat kīrttayan sadā marttyaḥ prāpnuyāt puṇyam uttamam | "At this time the eloquent king Saudāsa, sprung from the race of Ikshvāku, proceeded, after salutation, to make an enquiry of his family-priest Vaśishṭha, the eternal saint, the most excellent of rishis, who was able to traverse all the world, and was a treasure of sacred knowledge: 'What, O venerable and sinless man, is declared to be the purest thing in the three worlds, by constantly celebrating which one may acquire the highest merit?'" Vaśishṭha in reply expatiates at great length on the merit resulting from bestowing cows, and ascribes to these animals some wonderful properties, as that they are the "support of all beings" (pratishṭhā bhūtānām, verse 3736), "the present and the future" (gāvo bhūtaṁ cha bhavyaṁ cha, 3737), and describes the cow as "pervading the universe, mother of the past and future" (yayā sarvam idaṁ vyāptaṁ jagat sthāvara-jangamam | tām dhenuṁ śirasā vande bhūta-bhavyasya mātaram, 3799). The sequel is thus told in verse 3801: Varam idam iti bhūmido (bhūmipo?) vichintya pravaram ṛisher vachanaṁ tato mahātmā | vyasṛijata niyatātmavān dvijebhyo subahu cha go-dhanam āptavāṁs lokān | "The great, self-subduing king, considering that these words of the rishi were most excellent, lavished on the Brāhmans very great wealth in the shape of cows, and obtained the worlds."—So here we find the son of Saudāsa extolled as a saint.

same individual with whom we are at present concerned, they are difficult to reconcile with these traditions in the Brāhmaṇas, Mahābhārata, and Purāṇas; inasmuch as they are not said to be the productions of Viśvāmitra or his descendants, and as they necessarily imply that Sudās was a pious prince who worshipped the popular deities in the way prescribed by the rishis by whom he was commemorated, since the latter would not otherwise have celebrated him in their hymns as a conspicuous object of divine favour. Tradition, too, as we have seen (p. 268) represents Sudās to have been the author of a Vedic hymn. The verses of the 104th hymn of the seventh book which I have quoted (above, p. 327) do not appear to contribute any further aid towards the solution of the question under consideration. Assuming that they contain a curse aimed at Viśvāmitra we have no means of ascertaining when they were uttered; whether the charge preferred against Vasishṭha preceded or followed the ascendancy of his rival.

We seem, therefore, to possess no sufficient data for settling the question of the relations in which Vasishṭha and Viśvāmitra respectively stood to king Sudās, further than that they both appear, from the hymns of the Rig-veda, to have been, at one period or another, his family priests; but which of the two was the first, and which the last, to enjoy the king's favour, must, according to all appearance, remain a mystery.

Sect. VIII.—Story of Triśanku.

I shall now proceed to adduce the different legends in the Purāṇas, the Rāmāyaṇa, and the Mahābhārata, in which Vaśishṭha and Viśvāmitra are represented as coming into conflict.

In the third chapter of the fourth book of the Vishṇu Purāṇa (Wilson, vol. iii. pp. 284 ff.) we find a story about a king Satyavrata, called also Triśanku, the 26th in descent from Ikshvāku, who had become degraded to the condition of a Chaṇḍāla, about whom it is briefly related, iv. 3, 13: Dvādaśa-vārshikyām anāvṛishṭyāṁ Viśvāmitra-kalatrāpatya-poshaṇārthaṁ chaṇḍāla-pratigraha-pariharaṇāya cha Jāhnavī-tīra-nyagrodhe mṛiga-māṁsam anudinam babandha | 14. Paritushṭena cha Viśvāmitreṇa sa-śarīraḥ svargam āropitaḥ | "During a twelve years' drought he daily suspended deer's flesh for the support of Viśvāmitra's wife and children on a nyagrodha-tree on the banks of the Ganges, intending by this means to spare them the (humiliation of) receiving a gift from a Chaṇḍāla; and was in consequence raised bodily to heaven by Viśvāmitra, who was gratified (with his conduct)." [173]

This story is told at greater length in the Harivaṁśa (sections 12 and 13) where Vasishṭha also is introduced. I have already (p. 337) remarked on the super-human longevity ascribed to this sage, who is represented as contemporary both with Ikshvāku, and with his descendants down to the sixty-first generation. But Indian mythology, with its boundless resources in supernatural machinery, and in the doctrine of transmigration, can reconcile all discrepancies, and explain away all anachronisms, making any sage re-appear at any juncture when his presence may be required, another and yet the same.

The Harivaṁśa states that Satyavrata (Triśanku) had been expelled from his home by his father for the offence of carrying off the young wife of one of the citizens under the influence of a criminal passion (verse 718. Yena bhāryyā hṛitā pūrvaṁ kṛitodvāhā parasya vai | 720. Jahāra kāmāt kanyāṁ sa kasyachit puravāsinaḥ); and that Vasishṭha did not interfere to prevent his banishment. His father retired to the woods to live as a hermit. In consequence of the wickedness which had been committed, Indra did not rain for a period of twelve years. At that time Viśvāmitra had left his wife and children and gone to practice austerities on the sea-shore. His wife, driven to extremity by want, was on the point of selling her second son for a hundred cows, in order to support the others; but this arrangement was stopped by the intervention of Satyavrata, who liberated the son when bound,[174] and

[173] In the Mahābh. S'āntip. verses 5330 ff. (referred to by Weber, Ind. St. i. 475, note) there is a story of Viśvāmitra determining to eat dog's flesh in a period of famine between the end of the the Tretā-age and the beginning of the Dvāpara; and holding a conversation on this subject with a Chaṇḍāla. The circumstance is referred to in Manu, x. 108: Kshudhārttaś chāttum abhyāgād Viśvāmitraḥ śva-jāghanīm | chaṇḍāla-hastād ādāya dharmādharma-vichakshaṇaḥ | "And Viśvāmitra, who knew right and wrong, resolved to eat a dog's thigh, taking it from the hand of a Chaṇḍāla."

[174] See in Ind. Stud. ii. 121 ff. Professor Roth's remarks on the peculiar relation in which he regards this story as standing to that of S'unaśśepa, as given in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa. The various incidents in the one present in many respects a curious parallel to those of the other, which he considers can hardly be accidental; and he thinks this version of the legend of Triśanku may have arisen out of a transformation and distortion of that of S'unaśśepa.

maintained the family by providing them with the flesh of wild animals: and according to his father's injunction, consecrated himself for the performance of a silent penance for twelve years (verse 732. Upāṁśa-vratam āsthāya dīkshāṁ dvādaśa-vārshikīm | pitur niyogād avahat tasmin vana-gate nṛipe). The story proceeds thus:

Verse 733. Ayodhyāṁ chaiva rāshṭraṁ cha tathaivāntaḥpuram muniḥ | yājyopādhyāya-sambandhād Vaśishṭhaḥ paryarakshata | Satyavratas tu bālyād vai bhāvino 'rthasya vā balāt | Vaśishṭhe 'bhyadhikam manyuṁ dhārayāmāsa nityadā | 735. Pitrā hi taṁ tadā rājyāt tyajyamānaṁ svam ātmajam | na vārayāmāsa munir Vaśishṭhaḥ kāraṇena ha | pāṇigrahaṇa-mantrāṇām nishṭhā syāt saptame pade | na cha Satyavratas tasmād dhṛitavān saptame pade | jānan dharmān Vaśishṭhas tu na māṁ trātīti Bhārata | Satyavratas tadā roshaṁ Vaśishṭhe manasā 'karot | guṇa-buddhyā tu bhagavān Vaśishṭhaḥ kṛitavāṁs tadā | na cha Satyavratas tasya tam upāṁśum abudhyata | . . . . 740. Tena tv idānīṁ vahatā dīkshāṁ tāṁ durvahām bhuvi | "kulasya nishkṛitis tāta kṛitā sā vai bhaved" iti | na taṁ Vaśishṭho bhagavān pitrā tyaktaṁ nyavārayat | abhishekshyāmy aham putram asyety evam matir muneḥ | sa tu dvādaśa-varshāṇi tāṁ dīkshām udvahan balī | avidyamāne māṁse tu Vaśishṭhasya mahātmanaḥ | sarva-kāma-dughāṁ dogdhrīṁ dadarśa sa nṛipātmajaḥ | tāṁ vai krodhāch cha mohāch cha śramāch chaiva kshudhārditaḥ | daśadharma-gato rājā jaghāna Janamejaya | . . . . 745. Tach cha māṁsaṁ svayaṁ chaiva Viśvāmitrasya chātmajān | bhojayāmāsa tach chhrutvā Vaśishṭho 'py asya chukrudhe | . . . . 750. Viśvāmitras tu dārāṇām āgato bharaṇe kṛite | sa tu tasmai varam prādād muniḥ prītas Triśaṅkave | chhandyamāno vareṇātha varaṁ vavre nṛipātmajaḥ | saśarīro vraje svargam ity evaṁ yāchito varaḥ | anāvṛishṭi-bhaye tasmin gate dvādaśa-vārshike | pitrye 'bhishichya rājye tu yājayāmāsa tam muniḥ | mishatāṁ devatānāṁ cha Vaśishṭhasya cha Kauśikaḥ | saśarīraṁ tadā taṁ tu divam āropayat prabhuḥ |

733. "Meanwhile Vaśishṭha, from the relation subsisting between the king (Satyavrata's father) and himself, as disciple[175] and spiritual preceptor, governed the city of Ayodhyā, the country, and the interior apartments of the royal palace. But Satyavrata, whether through folly or the force of destiny, cherished constantly an increased indignation against Vaśishṭha, who for a (proper) reason had not interposed to prevent his exclusion from the royal power by his father. 'The formulas of the marriage ceremonial are only binding,' said Satyavrata, 'when the seventh step has been taken,[176] and this had not been done when I seized the damsel: still Vaśishṭha, who knows the precepts of the law, does not come to my aid.' Thus Satyavrata was incensed in his mind against Vaśishṭha, who, however, had acted from a sense of what was right. Nor did Satyavrata understand (the propriety of) that silent penance imposed upon him by his father. . . . . 740. When he had supported this arduous rite, (he supposed that) he had redeemed his family position. The venerable muni Vaśishṭha did not, however, (as has been said) prevent his father from setting him aside, but resolved to install his son as king. When the powerful prince Satyavrata had endured the penance for twelve years, he beheld, when he was without flesh to eat, the milch cow of Vaśishṭha which yielded all objects of desire; and under the influence of anger, delusion, and exhaustion, distressed by hunger, and failing in the ten duties [the opposites of which are then enumerated] he slew her . . . . (745) and both partook of her flesh himself, and gave it to Viśvāmitra's sons to eat. Vaśishṭha hearing of this, became incensed against him," and imposed on him the name of Triśanku as he had committed three sins (verses 747–749). "750. On his return home, Viśvāmitra was gratified by the support which his wife had received, and offered Triśanku the choice of a boon. When this proposal was made, Triśanku chose the boon of ascending bodily to heaven. All apprehension from the twelve years' drought being now at an end, the muni (Viśvāmitra) installed Triśanku in his father's kingdom, and offered sacrifice on his behalf. The mighty Kauśika then, in spite of the resistance of the gods and of Vaśishṭha, exalted the king alive to heaven."

[175] Literally "the person in whose behalf sacrifice was to be performed."

The legend of Triśanku is also related, though differently, in the Bālakāṇḍa of the Rāmāyaṇa; but as it is there introduced as a portion of the history of Viśvāmitra's various contests with Vaśishṭha recorded in the 51st to 65th sections of that book, I shall reserve it till I take up that narrative.

[176] "The next ceremony is the bride's stepping seven steps. It is the most material of all the nuptial rites; for the marriage is complete and irrevocable so soon as she has taken the seventh step, and no sooner." Colebrooke's Misc. Ess. i. 218, where further details will be found.

Sect. IX.—Legend of Hariśchandra.

The son of Triśanku, the subject of the preceding story, was Hariśchandra, whose name is mentioned in the Vishṇu P., but without any allusion to the events of his life. According to the Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa,[177] however, he gave up his whole country, and sold his wife and son, and finally himself, in satisfaction of Viśvāmitra's demands for money. The following is a summary of the story as there told, book i. sections 7–9. We may perhaps regard it as having in part a polemical import, and as intended to represent Viśvāmitra, the Kshattriya rival of the Brāhmans, in the most unfavourable colours. The sufferings of Hariśchandra, his wife, and son, are very pathetically depicted, and the effect of the various incidents is heightened with great artistic skill. The story, in fact, appears to me one of the most touching to be found in Indian literature. Hariśchandra, the Purāṇa tells us, was a royal rishi (rājarshi) who lived in the Tretā age, and was renowned for his virtues, and the universal prosperity, moral and physical, which prevailed during his reign. On one occasion, when hunting, the king heard a sound of female lamentation which proceeded, it appears, from the Sciences who were becoming mastered by the austerely-fervid sage Viśvāmitra, in a way they had never been before by anyone else; and were consequently crying out in alarm at his superiority. In fulfilment of his duty as a Kshattriya to defend the weak, and inspired by the god Ganeśa, who had entered into him, Hariśchandra exclaimed (i. 7, 12) "'What sinner is this who is binding fire in the hem of his garment, while I, his lord, am present, resplendent with force and fiery vigour?' He shall to-day enter on his long sleep, pierced in all his limbs by arrows, which, by their discharge from my bow, illuminate all the quarters of the firmament" (12. Ko 'yam badhnāti vastrānte pāvakam pāpa-kṛin naraḥ | baloshṇa-tejasā dīpte mayi patyāv upasthite | 13. So 'dya mat-kārmukākshepa-vidīpita-digantaraiḥ | śarair vibhinna-sarvāngo dīrghanidrām pravekshyati |). Viśvāmitra was provoked by this address. In consequence of his wrath the Sciences instantly perished, and Hariśchandra, trembling like the leaf of an aśvattha tree, submissively represented that he had merely done his duty as a king, which he defined as consisting in the bestowal of gifts on eminent Brāhmans and other persons of slender means, the protection of the timid, and war against enemies. Viśvāmitra hereupon demands a gift as a Brāhman intent upon receiving one. The king offers him whatever he may ask: Gold, his own son, wife, body, life, kingdom, good fortune (hiraṇyaṁ vā suvarṇaṁ vā putraḥ patnī kalevaram | prāṇāḥ rājyam puraṁ lakshmīr yad abhipretam ātmanaḥ |). The saint first requires the present for the Rājasūya sacrifice. On this being promised, and still more offered, he asks for the empire of the whole earth, including everything but Hariśchandra himself, his wife and son, and his virtue which follows its possessor wherever he goes[178] (i. 7, 28. Vinā bhāryyāṁ cha putraṁ cha śarīraṁ cha tavānagha | 29. Dharmaṁ cha sarva-dharma-jna yo yāntam anugachhati). Hariśchandra joyfully agrees. Viśvāmitra then requires him to strip off all his ornaments, to clothe himself in the bark of trees, and to quit the kingdom with his wife Śaivyā and his son. When he is departing the sage stops him and demands payment of his yet unpaid sacrificial fee. The king replies that he has only the persons of his wife, his son, and himself left. Viśvāmitra insists that he must nevertheless pay; and that "unfulfilled promises of gifts to Brāhmans bring destruction" (i. 7. 35. Viśeshato brāhmaṇānāṁ hanty adattam pratiśrutam). The unfortunate prince, after being threatened with a curse, engages to make the payment in a month; and commences his journey with a wife unused to such fatigues, amid the universal lamentations of his subjects. While he lingers, listening to their affectionate remonstrances against his desertion of his kingdom, Viśvāmitra comes up, and being [178] Compare Manu's very striking verses, viii. 17, and iv. 239 ff., which may be freely rendered as follows:

[177] The same story is told in the Padma Purāṇa also. See Wilson's V.P. vol. iii. p. 287, and note. The glory of Hariśchandra is described in the M.Bh. Sabhāp. verses 489 ff.

"Our virtue is the only friend that follows us in death;
All other ties and friendships end with our departing breath.
Nor father, mother, wife, nor son beside us then can stay,
Nor kinsfolk:—virtue is the one companion of our way.
Alone each creature sees the light, alone the world he leaves;
Alone of actions, wrong or right, the recompence receives.
Like log or clod, beneath the sod their lifeless kinsman laid,
His friends turn round and quit the ground; but virtue tends the dead.
Be then a hoard of virtue stored, to help in day of doom;
By virtue led, we cross the dread, immeasurable gloom."

See the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, vol. xix. for 1862, p. 303 f.

incensed at the delay and the king's apparent hesitation, strikes the queen with his staff, as she is dragged on by her husband. All this Hariśchandra endures with patience, uttering no complaint. Then the five Viśvedevas, merciful gods, exclaimed, "'To what worlds shall this sinner Viśvāmitra go, who has thrust down this most excellent of sacrificers from the royal dignity? Whose faith shall now sanctify the soma-juice poured out with recitation of texts at the great sacrifice, that we may drink it, and become exhilarated'" (i. 7, 62. Atha viśve tadā devāḥ pancha prāhuḥ kṛipālavaḥ | Viśvāmitraḥ supāpo 'yaṁ lokān kān samavāpsyati | 63. Yenāyaṁ yajvanāṁ śreshṭhaḥ sva-rājyād avaropitaḥ | kasya vā śraddhayā pūtaṁ sutaṁ somam mahādhvare | pītvā vayam prayāsyāmo mudam mantra-purassaram |). Viśvāmitra heard what they said, and by a curse doomed them to become men; he relented, however, so far as to exempt them from having offspring, and from other family ties and human weaknesses, and promised that they should eventually be restored to their pristine position as gods. They in consequence became partially incarnate as the five Pāṇḍus, the sons of Draupadī. Resuming the story of Hariśchandra, the writer tells us that he then proceeded with his wife and little son to Benares, imagining that this divine city, as the special property of Śiva, could not be possessed by any mortal. Here he found the relentless Viśvāmitra waiting for him, and ready to press his demand for the payment of his sacrificial gift, even before the expiration of the full period of grace. In this extremity Śaivyā the queen suggests with a sobbing voice that her husband should sell her. On hearing this proposal Hariśchandra swoons, then recovers, utters lamentations, and swoons again, and his wife, seeing his sad condition, swoons also. While they are in a state of unconsciousness, their famished child exclaims in distress, "O father, father, give me bread; O mother, mother, give me food: hunger overpowers me; and my tongue is parched" (i. 8, 35. Tāta tāta dadasvānnam ambāmba bhojanaṁ dada | kshud me balavatī jātā jihvāgraṁ śushyate tathā). At this moment Viśvāmitra returns, and after recalling Hariśchandra to consciousness by sprinkling water over him, again urges payment of the present. The king again swoons, and is again restored. The sage threatens to curse him if his engagement is not fulfilled by sunset. Being now pressed by his wife, the king agrees to sell her, adding, however, "If my voice can utter such a wicked word, I do what the most inhuman wretches cannot perpetrate" (i. 8, 48 f. Nṛi-śaṁsair api yat karttuṁ na śakyaṁ tat karomy aham | yadi me śakyate vāṉī vaktum īdṛik sudurvachaḥ). He then goes into the city, and in self-accusing language offers his queen for sale as a slave. A rich old Brāhman offers to buy her at a price corresponding to her value, to do his household work. Hariśchandra's heart was torn, and he could make no reply. The Brāhman paid down the money, and was dragging away the queen by the hair of her head, when her little son Rohitāśva, seeing his mother about to be taken away from him, began to cry, and laid hold of her skirts. The mother then exclaims: i. 8, 59, "Munchāryya muncha māṁ tāvad yāvat pāśyāmy ahaṁ śiśum | durlabhaṁ darśanaṁ tāta punar asya bhavishyati | 60. Paśyaiḥi vatsa mām evam mātaraṁ dāsyatāṁ gatām | mām mā sprākshīḥ rāja-puttra aspṛiśyā 'haṁ tavādhunā" | 61. Tataḥ sa bālaḥ sahasā dṛishṭvā kṛishṭāṁ tu mātaram | samabhyadhāvad ambeti rudan sāsrāvilekshaṇaḥ | 62. Tam āgataṁ dvijaḥ kretā bālam abhyāhanat padā | vadaṁs tathāpi so 'mbeti naivāmunchata mātaram | 63. Rājapatny uvācha | "prasādaṁ kuru me nātha krīṇīshvemaṁ cha bālakam | krītā 'pi nāham bhavato vinainaṁ kāryya-sādhikā | 64. Ittham mamālpa-bhāgyāyāḥ prasāda-sumukho bhava | māṁ saṁyojaya bālena vatseneva payasvinīm" | 65. Brāhmaṇaḥ uvācha | "gṛihyatām vittam etat te dīyatām bālako maṁa" | "'Let me go, let me go, venerable sir, till I look upon my son. I shall hardly ever behold him again. Come, my darling, see thy mother now become a slave. Touch me not, young prince; I may no longer be handled by thee.' Seeing his mother dragged away, the child ran after her, his eyes dimmed with tears, and crying 'mother.' The Brāhman purchaser kicked him when he came up; but he would not let his mother go, and continued crying 'mother, mother.' The queen then said to the Brāhman, 'Be so kind, my master, as to buy also this child, as without him I shall prove to thee but a useless purchase. 64. Be thus merciful to me in my wretchedness; unite me with my son, like a cow to her calf.'[179] The Brāhman agrees: 'Take this money and give me the boy.'" When his wife and son were being carried away, Hariśchandra broke out into lamentations: i. 8, 68. Yāṁ na vāyur na chādityo nendur na cha pṛithag-janaḥ | dṛishṭavantaḥ purā patnīṁ seyaṁ dāsītvam āgatā | 69. Sūrya-vaṁśa-prasūto 'yaṁ sukumāra-karāṅgulīḥ | samprāpto vikrayam

[179] The whole of this reads like a scene from "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

bālo dhiñ mām astu sudurmatim | "'She, my spouse, whom neither air, nor sun, nor moon, nor stranger had beheld, is now gone into slavery. This my son, a scion of the solar race, with his delicate hands and fingers, has been sold. Woe to me, wicked wretch that I am.'" After the Brāhman had gone out of sight with his purchases, Viśvāmitra again appeared and renewed his demands; and when the afflicted Hariśchandra offered him the small sum he had obtained by the sale of his wife and son, he angrily replied, i. 8, 74: Kshattrabandho mamemāñ tvañ sadṛiśīñ yajna-dakshiṇām | manyase yadi tat kshipram paśya tvam me balam param | 75. Tapaso 'ttra sutaptasya brāhmaṇyasyāmalasya cha | mat-prabhāvasya chograsya śuddhasyādhyayanasya cha | "'If, miserable Kshattriya, thou thinkest this a sacrificial gift befitting my deserts, thou shalt soon behold the transcendent power of my ardent austere-fervour, of my spotless Brāhmanhood, of my terrible majesty, and of my holy study.'" Hariśchandra promises an additional gift, and Viśvāmitra allows him the remaining quarter of the day for its liquidation. On the terrified and afflicted prince offering himself for sale, in order to gain the means of meeting this cruel demand, Dharma (Righteousness) appears in the form of a hideous and offensive Chaṇḍāla, and agrees to buy him at his own price, large or small. Hariśchandra declines such a degrading servitude, and declares that he would rather be consumed by the fire of his persecutor's curse than submit to such a fate. Viśvāmitra however again comes on the scene, asks why he does not accept the large sum offered by the Chaṇḍāla; and, when he pleads in excuse his descent from the solar race, threatens to fulminate a curse against him if he does not accept that method of meeting his liability. Hariśchandra, implores that he may be spared this extreme of degradation, and offers to become Viśvāmitra's slave in payment of the residue of his debt; whereupon the sage rejoins, "If thou art my slave, then I sell thee as such to the Chaṇḍāla for a hundred millions of money" (i. 8, 95. Yadi preshyo mama bhavān chaṇḍālāya tato mayā | dāsa-bhāvam anuprāpto datto vittārbudena vai |). The Chaṇḍāla, delighted, pays down the money, and carries off Hariśchandra, bound, beaten, confused, and afflicted, to his own place of abode. Morning, noon, and evening the unfortunate prince repeats these words: i. 8, 99. Bālā dīna-mukhī dṛishṭvā bālañ dīna-mukham puraḥ | māñ smaraty asukhāvishṭā "mochayishyati nau nṛipaḥ | 100. Upātta-vitto

viprāya dattvā vittam ato 'dhikam" | na sā mām mṛiga-śāvākshī vetti pāpataraṁ kṛitam | 101. Rājya-nāśaḥ suhṛit-tyāgo bhāryyā-tanaya-vikrayaḥ | prāptā chaṇḍālatā cheyam aho duḥkha-paramparā | "My tender wife, dejected, looking upon my dejected boy, calls me to mind while she says, 'The king will ransom us (100) after he has gained money, and paid the Brāhman a larger sum than he gave for us.' But my fawn-eyed spouse is ignorant that I have become yet more wretched than before. 101. Loss of my kingdom, abandonment of friends, sale of my wife and son, and this fall into the condition of a Chaṇḍāla,—what a succession of miseries!" Hariśchandra is sent by the Chaṇḍāla to steal grave-clothes in a cemetery (which is described at tedious length, with all its horrors and repulsive features), and is told that he will receive two-sixths of the value for his hire; three-sixths going to his master, and one-sixth to the king. In this horrid spot, and in this degrading occupation, he spent, in great misery, twelve months, which seemed to him like a hundred years (i. 8, 127. Evaṁ dvādaśa-māsās tu nītāḥ śata-samopamāḥ). He then falls asleep and has a series of dreams suggested by the life he had been leading (śmaśānābhyāsa-yogena, verse 129). After he awoke, his wife came to the cemetery to perform the obsequies of their son, who had died from the bite of a serpent (verses 171 ff.). At first the husband and wife did not recognize each other, from the change in appearance which had been wrought upon them both by their miseries. Hariśchandra, however, soon discovers from the tenor of her lamentations that it is his wife, and falls into a swoon; as the queen does also when she recognizes her husband. When consciousness returns, they both break out into lamentations, the father bewailing in a touching strain the loss of his son, and the wife the degradation of the king. She then falls on his neck, embraces him, and asks "whether all this is a dream, or a reality, as she is utterly bewildered;" and adds, that "if it be a reality, then righteousness is unavailing to those who practise it" (verse 210. Rājan svapno 'tha tathyaṁ vā yad etad manyate bhavān | tat kathyatām mahābhāga mano vai muhyate mama | 211. Yady etad evaṁ dharmajna nāsti dharmę sahāyatā |). After hesitating to devote himself to death on his son's funeral pyre without receiving his master's leave, (as such an act of insubordination might send him to hell) (verses 215 ff.), Hariśchandra resolves to do so, braving all the consequences, and consoling himself with the hopeful anticipation: verse 224. Yadi dattaṁ yadi hutaṁ guravo yadi toshitāḥ | paratra sangamo bhūyāt puttreṇa saha cha tvayā | "If I have given gifts, and offered sacrifices, and gratified my religious teachers, then may I be reunited with my son and with thee (my wife) in another world."[180] The queen determines to die in the same manner. When Hariśchandra, after placing his son's body on the funeral pile, is meditating on the lord Hari Nārāyaṇa Kṛishṇa, the supreme spirit, all the gods arrive, headed by Dharma (Righteousness), and accompanied by Viśvāmitra.[181] Dharma entreats the king to desist from his rash in-

[180] In the following verses of the Atharva-veda a hope is expressed that families may be re-united in the next world: vi. 120, 3. Yattra suhārddaḥ suhṛido madanti vihāya rogaṁ tanvaḥ svāyāḥ | aśloṇāḥ angair ahrutāḥ svarge tattra paśyema pitarau cha putrān | "In heaven, where our friends, and intimates live in blessedness, having left behind them the infirmities of their bodies, free from lameness or distortion of limb,—may we behold our parents and our children." ix. 5, 27. Yā pūrvam patiṁ vittvā athānyaṁ vindate 'param | panchaudanaṁ cha tāv ajaṁ dadāto na vi yoshataḥ | 28. Samānaloko bhavati punarbhuvā 'paraḥ patiḥ | yo 'jam panchaudanaṁ dakshiṇājyotishaṁ dadāti | "When a woman has had one husband before, and takes another, if they present the aja panchaudana offering they shall not be separated. 28. A second husband dwells in the same (future) world with his re-wedded wife, if he offers the aja panchaudana, illuminated by presents." xii. 3, 17. Svargaṁ lokam abhi no nayāsi saṁ jāyayā saha puttraiḥ syāma | "Mayest thou conduct us to heaven; may we be with our wives and children." xviii. 3, 23. Svān gachhatu te mano adha pitṝn upa drava | "May thy soul go to its own (its kindred) and hasten to the fathers." From the texts cited by Mr. Colebrooke "on the duties of a faithful Hindu widow," (Misc. Ess. 115 ff.) it appears that the widow who becomes a satī (i.e. burns herself with her husband's corpse, or, in certain cases, afterwards) has the promise of rejoining her lord in another life, and enjoying celestial felicity in his society. In order to ensure such a result in all cases it was necessary either that both husband and wife should have by their lives merited equal rewards in another existence, or that the heroism of the wife, in sacrificing herself on her husband's funeral-pile should have the vicarious effect of expiating his offences, and raising him to the same heavenly region with herself. And it is indeed the doctrine of the authorities cited by Mr. Colebrooke that the self-immolation of the wife had this atoning effect. But in other cases where the different members of a family had by their actions during life merited different kinds of retribution, they might, according to the doctrine of the transmigration of souls current in later ages, be re-born in the shape of different animals, and so rendered incapable of any mutual communication after death. In regard to the absence of any traces of the tenet of metempsychosis from the earliest Indian writings, see Professor Weber's remarks in the Journ. of the Germ. Or. Soc. ix. 327 ff. and the abstract of them given in Journ. Roy. As. Soc. for 1865, pp. 305 ff.

[181] An attempt is here made, verses 234 f., to give the etymology of Viśvāmitra: Viśva-trayeṇa yo mitram karttuṁ na śakitāḥ purā | Viśvāmitras tu te māittrīm ishṭaṁ chāharttum ichhati | "That Viśvāmitra, whom the three Viśvas formerly could not induce to be their friend, wishes to offer thee his friendship, and whatsoever thou desirest."

tention; and Indra announces to him that he, his wife, and son have conquered heaven by their good works. Ambrosia, the antidote of death, and flowers, are rained by the god from the sky; and the king's son is restored to life and the bloom of youth. The king, adorned with celestial clothing and garlands, and the queen, embrace their son. Harischandra, however, declares that he cannot go to heaven till he has received his master the Chaṇḍāla's permission, and has paid him a ransom. Dharma then reveals to the king that it was he himself who had miraculously assumed the form of a Chaṇḍāla. The king next objects that he cannot depart unless his faithful subjects, who are sharers in his merits, are allowed to accompany him to heaven, at least for one day. This request is granted by Indra; and after Visvāmitra has inaugurated Rohitāśva the king's son to be his successor, Hariśchandra, his friends and followers, all ascend in company to heaven. Even after this great consummation, however, Vaśishṭha, the family-priest of Harischandra, hearing, at the end of a twelve years' abode in the waters of the Ganges, an account of all that has occurred, becomes vehemently incensed at the humiliation inflicted on the excellent monarch, whose virtues and devotion to the gods and Brāhmans he celebrates, declares that his indignation had not been so greatly roused even when his own hundred sons had been slain by Viśvāmitra, and in the following words dooms the latter to be transformed into a crane: i. 9, 9. Tasmād durātmā brahma-dviṭ prājnānām avaropitaḥ | mach-chhāpopahato mūḍhaḥ sa vakatvam avāpsyati | "Wherefore that wicked man, enemy of the Brāhmans, smitten by my curse, shall be expelled from the society of intelligent beings, and losing his understanding shall be transformed into a Vaka." Visvāmitra reciprocates the curse, and changes Vasishṭha into a bird of the species called Āṛi. In their new shapes the two have a furious fight,[182] the Āṛi being of the portentous height of two thousand yojanas (= 18000 miles), and the Vaka of 3090 yojanas. They first assail each other with their wings; then the Vaka smites his antagonist in the same manner, while the Āṛi strikes with his talons. Falling mountains, overturned by the blasts of wind raised by the [182] On the subject of this fight the Bhāgavata Purāna has the following verse: ix. 7, 6. Traiśankavo Hariśchandro Viśvāmitra-Vaśishṭhayoḥ | yan-nimittam abhūd yuddham pakshiṇor bahu-vārshikam | "The son of Triśanku was Hariśchandra, on whose account Visvāmitra and Vaśishṭha in the form of birds had a battle of many flapping of their wings, shake the whole earth, the waters of the ocean overflow, the earth itself, thrown off its perpendicular, slopes downwards towards Pātāla, the lower regions. Many creatures perish by these various convulsions. Attracted by the dire disorder, Brahmā arrives, attended by all the gods, on the spot, and commands the combatants to desist from their fray. They were too fiercely infuriated to regard this injunction: but Brahmā put an end to the conflict by restoring them to their natural forms, and counselling them to be reconciled: i. 9, 28. Na chāpi Kauśika-śreshṭhas tasya rājno 'parādhyate | svarga-prāptikaro brahmann upakāra-pade sthitaḥ | 29. Tapo-vighnasya karttārau kāma-krodha-vaśaṁ gatau | parityajata bhadraṁ no brahma hi prachuram balam | 'The son of Kuśika has not inflicted any wrong on Hariśchandra: inasmuch as he has caused the king's elevation to heaven he stands in the position of a benefactor. 29. Since ye have yielded to the influence of desire and anger ye have obstructed your austere fervour; leave off, bless you; the Brahmanical power is transcendent.' The sages were accordingly pacified, and embraced each other."

This interesting legend may be held to have had a double object, viz. first to portray in lively colours the heroic fortitude and sense of duty exhibited by Hariśchandra and his wife in enduring the long series of severe trials to which they were subjected; and secondly, to represent Viśvāmitra in an unamiable light, as an oppressive assertor of those sacerdotal prerogatives, which he had conquered for himself by his austerities,[183] to place him in striking contrast with the genuine Brāhman Vaśishṭha who expresses strong indignation at the harsh procedure of his rival, and to recall the memory of those conflicts between years duration." On this the Commentator remarks: Viśvāmitro rājasūya-dakshiṇā-chhalena Hariśchandrasya sarva-svam apahṛitya yātayāmāsa | tach chhrutvā kupito Vaśishṭho 'pi Viśvāmitraṁ "tvam āṛī bhava" iti śaśāpa | so 'pi "tvaṁ vako bhava" iti Vaśishṭham śaśāpa | tayos cha yuddham abhūd iti prasiddam | "Viśvāmitra under pretence of taking a present for a rajasūya sacrifice, stripped Hariśchandra of all his property, and afflicted him. Vaśishṭha hearing of this, became incensed, and by an imprecation turned him into an Āṛī. Viśvāmitra retorted the curse and changed Vaśishṭha into a Vāka. And then a battle took place between them, as is well known." Here it will be seen that the Commentator changes the birds into which the rishis were transformed, making Viśvāmitra the Āṛī and Vasishṭha the Vāka.

[183] It is true that the Brāhman rishi Durvāsas also is represented as a very irascible personage. See vol. iv. of this work, pp. 165, 169, 208, 407; and Weber's Ind. St. iii. 398.

the Brāhmans and Kshattriyas, which were exemplified in the persons of these two sages, of whom the one is said to have been made the "lord of Brāhmans" (Vaśishṭham īśaṁ viprāṇām, M.Bh. Sāntip. v. 4499), and the other is declared in the story before us to have been the "enemy of the priests."

Sect. X.—Contest of Vaśishṭha and Viśvāmitra according to the Mahābhārata.

In the Ādiparvan of the Mahābhārata, verses 6638 ff., we find another legend, in the Brahmanical interest, regarding the same two great personages, which begins with a panegyric on Vaśishṭha, at the expense of the rival rishi:

6638. Brahmaṇo mānasaḥ putro Vaśishṭho 'rundhatī-patiḥ | tāpasā nirjitau śaśvad ajeyāv amarair api | kāma-krodhāv ubhau yasya charaṇau saṁvavāhatuḥ | yas tu nochchhedanaṁ chakre Kuśikānām udāra-dhīḥ | Viśvāmitrāparādhena dhārayan manyum uttamam | 6640. Putra-vyasana-santaptaḥ śaktimān apy aśakta-vat | Viśvāmitra-vināśāya na chakre karma dāruṇam | mṛitāṁś cha punar āharttum yaḥ sa putrān Yama-kshayāt | kṛitāntaṁ nātichakrāma velām iva mahodadhiḥ | yam prāpya vijitātmānam mahātmānaṁ narādhipāḥ | Ikshvākavo mahīpālāḥ lebhire pṛithivīm imām | purohitam imam prāpya Vaśishṭham ṛishi-sattamam | ījire kratubhiś chaiva nṛipās te Kuru-nandana | sa hi tān yājayāmāsa sarvān nṛipati-sattamān | brahmarshiḥ Pāṇḍava-śreshṭha Vṛihaspatir ivāmarān | 6645. Tasmād dharma-pradhānātmā veda-dharma-vid īpsitaḥ | brāhmaṇo guṇavān kaśchit purodhāḥ paridṛiśyatām | kshattriyeṇābhijātena pṛithivīṁ jetum ichhatā | pūrvam purohitaḥ kāryyaḥ pārtha rājyābhisiddhaye | mahīm jigīshatā rājñā brahma kāryam purassaram | . . . 6666. Kshattriyo 'ham bhavān vipras tapaḥ-svādhyāya-sādhanaḥ | brāhmaṇeshu kuto vīryyam praśānteshu dhṛitātmasu | arbudena gavāṁ yas tvaṁ na dadāsi mamepsitam | sva-dharmaṁ na prahāsyāmi neshyāmi cha balena gām | . . . . 6679. "Sthīyatām" iti tach chhrutvā Vaśishṭhasya payasvinī | ūrddhvānchita-śiro-grīvā prababhau raudra-darśanā | 6680. Krodha-raktekshaṇā sā gaur hambhā-rava-ghana-svanā | Viśvāmitrasya tat sainyaṁ vyadrāvayata sarvaśaḥ | kaśāgra-daṇḍābhihatā kālyamānā tatastataḥ | krodha-raktekshaṇā krodham bhūya eva samādadhe | āditya iva madhyāhne krodha-dīpta-vapur babhau | angāra-varsham munchantī muhur bāladhito

mahat | asṛijat Pahlavān puchhāt prasravād Drāviḍān Śakān | yonideśāch cha Yavanān śakṛitaḥ Śavarān bahūn | . . . . 6691. Dṛishṭvā tad mahad āścharyam brahma-tejo-bhavam tadā | Viśvāmitraḥ kshattra-bhāvād nirviṇṇo vākyam abravīt | "dhig balaṁ kshattriya-balam brahma-tejo-balam balam | balābalaṁ viniśchitya tapaḥ eva param balam" | sa rājyaṁ sphītam utsṛijya tāṁ cha dīptāṁ nṛipa-śriyam | bhogāṁś cha pṛishṭhataḥ kṛitvā tapasy eva mano dadhe | sa gatvā tapasā siddhiṁ lokān vishṭabhya tejasā | 6695. Tatāpa sarvān dīptaujāḥ brāhmaṇatvam avāptavān | apibach cha tataḥ somam Indreṇa saha Kauśikaḥ |

6638. "Vaśishṭha," a Gandharva informs Arjuna, "was the mind-born son of Brahmā and husband of Arundhatī.[184] By his austere fervour, lust and anger, invincible even by the immortals, were constantly vanquished and embraced his feet. Restraining his indignation at the wrong done by Viśvāmitra, he magnanimously abstained from exterminating the Kuśikas.[185] 6640. Distressed by the loss of his sons, he acted, although powerful, like one who was powerless, and took no

[184] Arundhatī is again mentioned as the wife of Vasishṭha, in the following lines of the M. Bh. Ādip. 7351 f. addressed to Draupadī: Yathendrāṇī Harihaye Svāhā chaiva Vibhāvasau | Rohiṇī cha yathā Some Damayantī yathā Nale | yathā Vaiśravaṇe Bhadrā Vaśishṭhe chāpy Arundhatī | yathā Nārāyaṇe Lakshmīs tathā tvam bhava bharttṛishu | "What Indrāṇī is to Indra, Svāhā to the Sun, Rohiṇī to the Moon, Damayantī to Nala, Bhadrā to Kuvera, Arundhatī to Vaśishṭha, and Lakshmī to Nārāyaṇa, that be thou to thy husbands." She is again noticed in verses 8455 ff.: Suvratā chāpi kalyāṇī sarva-bhūteshu viśrutā | Arundhatī mahātmānaṁ Vaśishṭham paryaśankata | viśuddha-bhāvam atyantaṁ sadā priya-hite ratam | saptarshi-madhya-gaṁ vīram avamene cha tam munim | apadhyānena sā tena dhūmāruṇa-sama-prabhā | lakshyā 'lakshyā nābhirūpā nimittam iva paśyati | "The faithful and beautiful Arundhatī, renowned among all creatures, was suspicious about the great Vaśishṭha, whose nature was eminently pure, who was devoted to the welfare of those he loved, who was one of the seven rishis, and heroic; and she despised the muni. In consequence of these evil surmises, becoming of the dusky colour of smoke, both to be seen and not to be seen, devoid of beauty, she looks like a (bad) omen." This version of the last line is suggested by Prof. Aufrecht. The Commentator explains it thus: "Nimittam" bharttur lakshmaṇām "iva paśyati" kapaṭena | ataḥ eva "nābhirūpā prachhanna-veshā | tena hetunā "lakshyā 'lakshyā cha" | "'She regards as it were' i.e. by guile 'the omen' afforded by her husband's (bodily) marks, hence she assumed a disguise, and was 'both to be seen and not to be seen.'"

[185] As regards the magnanimous character here assigned to Vasishṭha, I quote a passage from the Vishṇu Purāṇa, i. 9, 15 ff., where the irascible Durvāsas (to whom I lately referred, and who is said, in verse 2, to be a partial incarnation of Śiva, Śankarasyāṁśaḥ), addressing Indra, who, he conceived, had insulted him, thus speaks of that sage's amiable temper, as contrasted with his own fierce and revengeful disposition: 15. Nāhaṁ kṛipālu-hṛidayo na cha mām bhajate kshamā | anye te mun- dreadful measures for the destruction of Viśvāmitra. To recover those sons from the abode of Yama, he would not overstep fate, as the ocean respects its shores. Having gained this great self-mastering personage, the kings of Ikshvāku's race acquired (the dominion of) this earth. Obtaining this most excellent of rishis for their family-priest, they offered sacrifices. This Brāhman-rishi officiated as priest for all those monarchs, as Vṛihaspati does for the gods. 6645. Wherefore let some desirable, virtuous Brāhman, with whom righteousness is the chief thing, and skilled in Vedic observances, be selected for this office. Let a well-born Kshattriya, who wishes to subdue the earth, first of all appoint a family-priest in order that he may augment his dominion. Let a king, who desires to conquer the earth, give precedence to the Brahmanical power." The Gandharva then, at Arjuna's request, goes on (verses 6650 ff.) to relate the "ancient story of Vaśishṭha" (vāśishṭham ākhyānam purāṇam) and to describe the cause of enmity between that rishi and Viśvāmitra. It happened that the latter, who was son of Gādhi, king of Kānyakubja (Kanouj), and grandson of Kuśika, when out hunting, came to the hermitage of Vaśishṭha, where he was received with all honour, entertained together with his attendants with delicious food and drink, and presented with precious jewels and dresses obtained by the sage from his wonder-working cow, the fulfiller of all his desires. The cupidity of Viśvāmitra is aroused by the sight of this beautiful animal (all of whose fine points are enumerated in the legend), and he offers Vaśishṭha a hundred million cows, or his kingdom, in exchange for her. Vaśishṭha, however, replies that he is unable to part with her even in return for the kingdom. Viśvāmitra then tells him that he will enforce the law of the stronger: 6665. "I am a Kshattriya, thou art a Brāhman, whose functions are austere fervour, and sacred study. How can there be any vigour in Brāhmans who are calm and self-restrained? Since thou doest not give up to me, in exchange for a ayaḥ S'akra Durvāsasam avehi mām | Gautamādibhir anyais tvaṁ garvam āpādito mudhā | akshānti-sāra-sarvasvaṁ Durvāsasam avehi mām | 17. Vasishṭhādyair dayā-sāraiḥ stotraṁ kurvadbhir uchchakaiḥ | garvaṁ gato 'si yenaivam mām athādyāva-manyase | 15. "I am not tender-hearted: patience lodges not in me. Those munis are different: know me to be Durvāsas. 16. In vain hast thou been rendered proud by Gautama and others: know me to be Durvāsas, whose nature and whose entire substance is irascibility. 17. Thou hast become proud through the loud praises of Vasishṭha and other merciful saints, since thou thus contemnest me to-day."

hundred million of cows, that which I desire, I shall not abandon my own class-characteristic; I will carry away the cow by force." Vaśishṭha, confident, no doubt, of his own superior power, tells him to do as he proposes without loss of time. Viśvāmitra accordingly seizes the wonder-working cow; but she will not move from the hermitage, though beaten with whip and stick, and pushed hither and thither. Witnessing this, Vaśishṭha asks her what he, a patient Brāhman, can do? She demands of him why he overlooks the violence to which she is subjected. Vaśishṭha replies: "Force is the strength of Kshattriyas, patience that of Brāhmans. As patience possesses me, go, if thou pleasest" (6676. Kshattriyāṇām balaṁ tejo brāhmaṇānāṁ kshamā balam | kshamā mām bhajate yasmāt gamyatāṁ yadi rochate). The cow enquires if he means to abandon her; as, unless he forsakes her, she can never be carried off by force. She is assured by Vaśishṭha that he does not forsake her, and that she should remain if she could. "Hearing these words of her master, the cow tosses her head aloft, assumes a terrific aspect, (6680) her eyes become red with rage, she utters a deep bellowing sound, and puts to flight the entire army of Viśvāmitra. Being (again) beaten with whip and stick, and pushed hither and thither, she becomes more incensed, her eyes are red with anger, her whole body, kindled by her indignation, glows like the noonday sun, she discharges showers of firebrands from her tail, creates Pahlavas from the same member, Drāviḍas and Śakas, Yavanas, Śabaras," Kāñchis, Śarabhas, Pauṇḍras, Kirātas, Sinhalas, Vaśas, and other tribes of armed warriors from her sweat, urine, excrement, etc., who assail Viśvāmitra's army, and put it to a complete rout. 6692. "Beholding this great miracle, the product of Brahmanical might, Viśvāmitra was humbled at (the impotence of) a Kshattriya's nature, and exclaimed, 'Shame on a Kshattriya's force; it is the force of a Brāhman's might that is force indeed.' Examining what was and was not force, and (ascertaining) that austere fervour is the supreme force, he abandoned his prosperous kingdom and all its brilliant regal splendour; and casting all enjoyments behind its back, he devoted himself to austerity. Having by this means attained perfection, and Brāhmanhood, he arrested the worlds by his fiery vigour, and disturbed them all by the blaze of his glory; and at length the Kauśika drank soma with Indra." [186]

[186] See above, p. 342, and note 134.

The same legend is repeated in the Śalyaparvan, verses 2295 ff.:

Tathā cha Kauśikas tāta tapo-nityo jitendriyaḥ | tapasā vai sutaptena brāhmaṇatvam avāptavān | Gādhir nāma mahān āsīt kshattriyaḥ prathito bhuvi | tasya puttro 'bhavad rājan Viśvāmitraḥ pratāpavān | sa rājā Kauśikas tāta mahāyogy abhavat kila | sa puttram abhishichyātha Viśvāmitram mahātapāḥ | deha-nyāse manaś chakre tam ūchuḥ praṇatāḥ prajāḥ | "na gantavyam mahāprājna trāhi chāsmān mahābhayāt" | evam uktaḥ pratyuvācha tato Gādhiḥ prajās tataḥ | "viśvasya jagato goptā bhavishyati suto mama" | 2300. Ity uktvā tu tato Gādhir Viśvāmitraṁ niveśya cha | jagāma tridivaṁ rājan Viśvāmitro 'bhavad nṛipaḥ | na sa śaknoti pṛithivīṁ yatnavān api rakshitum | tataḥ śuśrāva rājā sa rākshasebhyo mahābhayam | niryayau nagarāch chāpi chatur-anga-balānvitaḥ | sa yātvā dūram adhvānam Vaśishṭhāśramam abhyagāt | tasya te sainikāḥ rājaṁs chakrus tattrālayān bahūn | tatas tu bhagavān vipro Vaśishṭho Brahmaṇaḥ sutaḥ | dadṛiśe 'tha tataḥ sarvam bhajyamānam mahāvanam | tasya kruddho mahārāja Vaśishṭho muni-sattamaḥ | 2305. "Sṛijasva Savarān ghorān" iti svāṁ gām uvācha ha | tathoktā sā 'sṛijad dhenuḥ purushān ghora-darśanān | te cha tad balam āsādya babhanjuḥ sarvato diśam | tach chhrutvā vidrutaṁ sainyaṁ Viśvāmitras tu Gādhijaḥ | tapaḥ param manyamānas tapasy eva mano dadhe | so 'smiṁs tīrtha-vare rājan Sarasvatyāḥ samāhitaḥ | niyamaiś chopavāsaiś cha karshayan deham ātmanaḥ | jalāhāro vāyubhakshaḥ parṇāhāraś cha so 'bhavat | tathā sthaṇḍila-śāyī cha ye chānye niyamāḥ pṛithak | asakṛit tasya devās tu vratavighnam prachakrire | 2310. Na chāsya niyamād buddhir apayāti mahātmanaḥ | tataḥ pareṇa yatnena taptvā bahu-vidhaṁ tapaḥ | tejasā bhāskarākāro Gādhijaḥ samapadyata | tapasā tu tathā yuktaṁ Viśvāmitram Pitāmahaḥ | amanyata mahātejāḥ vara-do varam asya tat | sa tu vavre varaṁ rājan "syām aham brāhmaṇas tv" iti | tatheti chābravīd Brahmā sarva-loka-pitāmahaḥ | sa labdhvā tapasogreṇa brāhmaṇatvam mahāyaśāḥ | vichachāra malīṁ kṛitsnāṁ kṛitakāmaḥ suropamaḥ |

"2295. So too the Kauśika, constant in austerities, and subduing his senses, acquired Brāhmanhood by the severity of his exercises. There was a great Kshattriya named Gādhi, renowned in the world, whose son was the powerful Viśvāmitra. This Kauśika prince (Gādhi) was greatly addicted to contemplation (mahāyogī): and after having installed his son as king, he resolved to abandon his corporeal existence. His subjects, however, submissively said to him, 'Do not go, o great sage, but deliver us from our great alarm.' He replied, 'My son shall become the protector of the whole world.' 2300. Having accordingly installed Viśvāmitra, Gādhi went to heaven, and his son became king. Viśvāmitra, however, though energetic, was unable to protect the earth. He then heard that there was great cause of apprehension from the Rākshasas, and issued forth from the city, with an army consisting of four kinds of forces. Having performed a long journey, he arrived at the hermitage of Vaśishṭha. There his soldiers constructed many dwellings. In consequence the divine Brāhman Vaśishṭha, son of Brahmā, beheld the whole forest being cut up; and becoming enraged, he said to his cow, (2305) 'Create terrible Savaras.' The cow, so addressed, created men of dreadful aspect, who broke and scattered in all directions the army of Viśvāmitra. Hearing of this rout of his army, the son of Gādhi devoted himself to austerities, which he regarded as the highest (resource). In this sacred spot on the Sarasvatī he macerated his body with acts of self-restraint and fastings, absorbed in contemplation, and living on water, air, and leaves, sleeping on the sacrificial ground, and practising all the other rites. Several times the gods threw impediments in his way; (2310) but his attention was never distracted from his observances. Having thus with strenuous effort undergone manifold austerities, the son of Gādhi became luminous as the sun; and Brahmā regarded his achievements as most eminent. The boon which Viśvāmitra chose was to become a Brāhman; and Brahmā replied, 'So be it.' Having attained Brāhmanhood, the object of his desire, by his severe austerities, the renowned sage traversed the whole earth, like a god."

We have already seen how the power of austere fervour (tapas) is exemplified in the legend of Nahusha (above, pp. 308 ff.). In regard to the sense of this word tapas, and the potency of the exercise which it denotes, I may refer to my articles in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society for 1865, p. 348 f., and for 1864, p. 63, as well as to the fourth volume of this work, pp. 20 ff. and 288; and to pp. 23 and 28 of the present volume. In further illustration of the same subject I quote the following panegyric upon tapas from Manu, xi. 234 ff. where, however, the word cannot have the same sense in all the verses:

Tapo-mūlam idaṁ sarvaṁ daiva-mānushakaṁ sukham | tapo-madhyam budhaiḥ proktaṁ tapo 'ntaṁ veda-darśibhiḥ | 235. Brāhmaṇasya tapo jñānaṁ tapaḥ kshattrasya rakshaṇam | vaiśyasya tu tapo vārttā tapaḥ śūdra-

sya sevanam | 236. Ṛishayaḥ saṁyatātmānaḥ phala-mūlānilāśanāḥ | tapasaiva prapaśyanti trailokyaṁ sa-charācharam | 237. Aushadhāny agado vidyā daivī cha vividhā sthitiḥ | tapasaiva prasiddhyanti tapas teshāṁ hi sādhanam | 238. Yad dustaraṁ yad durāpaṁ yad durgaṁ yach cha dushkaram | sarvaṁ tu tapasā sādhyaṁ tapo hi duratikramam | 239. Mahāpātakinaś chaiva śeshāś chākāryya-kāriṇaḥ | tapasaiva sutaptena muchyante kilvishāt tataḥ | 240. Kīṭāś chāhi-patangāś cha paśavaś cha vayāṁsi cha | sthāvarāṇi cha bhūtāni divaṁ yānti tapo-balāt | 241. Yat kinchid enaḥ kurvanti mano-vāṅ-mūrttibhir janāḥ | tat sarvaṁ nirdahanty āśu tapasaiva tapodhanāḥ | 242. Tapasaiva viśuddhasya brāhmaṇasya divaukasaḥ | ijyāś cha pratigṛihṇanti kāmān saṁvarddhayanti cha | 243. Prajāpatir idaṁ śāstraṁ tapasaivāsṛijat prabhuḥ | tathaiva vedān ṛishayas tapasā pratipedire | 244. Ity etat tapaso devāḥ mahābhāgyam prachakshate | sarvasyāsya prapaśyantas tapasaḥ puṇyam uttamam |

"234. All the enjoyment, whether of gods or men, has its root, its centre, and its end in tapas; so it is declared by the wise who have studied the Veda. 235. Knowledge is a Brāhman's tapas; protection that of a Kshattriya; traffic that of Vaiśya; and service that of a Śūdra. 236. It is by tapas that rishis of subdued souls, subsisting on fruits, roots, and air obtain a vision of the three worlds with all things moving and stationary. 237. Medicines, health, science, and the various divine conditions are attained by tapas alone as their instrument of acquisition. 238. Whatever is hard to be traversed, or obtained, or reached, or effected, is all to be accomplished through tapas, of which the potency is irresistible. 239. Both those who are guilty of the great sins, and all other transgressors, are freed from sin by fervid tapas. 240. Worms, serpents, insects, beasts, birds, and beings without motion attain to heaven through the force of tapas. 241. Whatever sin men commit by thought, word, or bodily acts, by tapas they speedily consume it all, when they become rich in devotion. 242. The gods both accept the sacrifices and augment the enjoyments of the Brāhman who has been purified by tapas. 243. It was by tapas that Prajāpati the lord created this scripture; and through it that the rishis obtained the Vedas. 244. Such is the great dignity which the gods ascribe to tapas, beholding its transcendent merit."

I return for a moment to the story of Vasishṭha and his cow.

Lassen remarks (Ind. Alt. 2nd ed. i. 631, note) that Atharvan is given in the Lexicons as a name of Vasishṭha (see Wilson's Dictionry, s.v.). Weber (Ind. St. i. 289) quotes from Mallinātha's Commentary on the the Kirātārjunīya the following words: Atharvaṇas tu mantroddhāro Vaśishṭhena kṛitaḥ ity āgamaḥ | "There is a passage of scripture to the effect that the mantras of the Atharvan were selected by Vasishṭha." In Böhtlingk and Roth's Lexicon, s.v. Atharvan, it is noticed that the eleventh hymn of the fifth book of the Atharva-veda contains a conversation between Atharvan and Varuṇa about the possession of a wonderful cow bestowed by the latter on the former; and it is remarked that this circumstance may explain the subsequent identification of Atharvan with Vasishṭha. Prof. Roth, however (Diss. on the A.V., Tübingen, 1865, p. 9), thinks the two sages are distinct. The cow is spoken of in A.V. vii. 104, as the "brindled cow given by Varuṇa to Atharvan which never lacked a calf" (pṛiśniṁ dhenuṁ Varuṇena dattām Atharvaṇe nitya-vatsām). The following is the curious hymn referred to:

A.V. v. 11, 1. Katham mahe asurāya abravīr iha katham pitre haraye tvesha-nṛimraḥ | pṛiśniṁ Varuṇa dakshiṇāṁ dadāvān punarmaghatvam[187] manasā 'chikitsīḥ | 2. Na kāmena punarmagho bhavāmi saṁ chakshe kam pṛiśnim etām upāje | kena nu tvam Atharvan kāvyena kena jātena asi jāta-vedāḥ | 3. Satyam ahaṁ gabhīraḥ kāvyena satyaṁ jātena asmi jāta-vedāḥ | na me dāso na āryyo mahitvā vratam mīmāya yad ahaṁ dharishye | 4. Na tvad anyaḥ kavitaro na medhayā dhīrataro Varuṇa svadhāvan | tvaṁ tā viśvā bhuvanāni vettha sa chid nu tvaj jano māyī bibhāya | 5. Tvaṁ hi anga Varuṇa svadhāvan viśvā vettha janimā suprayīte | kiṁ rajasaḥ enā paro anyad asti enā kim pareṇa avaram amūra | 6. Ekaṁ rajasaḥ enā paro anyad asti enā paraḥ ekena durṇaśaṁ chid arvāk | tat te vidvān Varuṇa pra bravīmi adhovarchasaḥ paṇayo bhavantu | nīchair dāsāḥ upa sarpantu bhūmim | 7. Tvaṁ hi anga Varuṇa bravīshi punarmagheshu avadyāni bhūri | mo shu paṇīr abhi etāvato bhūr mā tvā vochann arādhasaṁ janāsaḥ | 8. Mā mā vochann arādhasaṁ janāsaḥ punas te pṛiśniṁ jaritar dadāmi | stotram me viśvam ā yāhi śachībhir antar viśvāsu mānushīshu vikshu | 9. Ā te stotrāṇi udyatāni yantu antar viśvāsu mānushīshu vikshu | dehi nu me yad me ādatto asi yujyo me sapta-padaḥ sakhā 'si | 10. Samāno bandhur Varuṇa samā jā vedāhaṁ tad yad nāv eshā samā jā | dadāmi tad yat te ādatto asmi yujyas

[187] This is the reading proposed by Professor Aufrecht instead of punarmagha tvam, which is found in Roth and Whitney's edition of the A.V.

te sapta-padaḥ sakhā 'smi | 11. Devo devāya gṛṇate vayodāḥ vipro viprāya stuvate sumedhāḥ | ajījano hi Varuṇa svadhāvann Atharvāṇam pitaraṁ deva-bandhum | tasmai u rādhaḥ kṛṇuhi suprāśastaṁ sakhā no asi paramaś cha bandhuḥ |

1. (Atharvan speaks) "How hast thou, who art mighty in energy, declared before the great deity, how before the shining father (that the cow was mine)? [188] Having bestowed a brindled cow (on me) as a sacrificial gift, thou hast resolved in thy mind to take her back. 2. (Varuṇa replies) It is not through desire that I revoke the gift; I drive hither this brindled cow that I may contemplate her. But by what wisdom, o Atharvan, in virtue of what nature, doest thou know the nature of beings? 3. (Atharvan answers) In truth I am profound in wisdom; in truth by my nature I know the nature of beings. Neither Dāsa nor Āryya can hinder the design which I shall undertake. 4. There is none other wiser or sager in understanding than thou, o self-dependent Varuṇa. Thou knowest all creatures; even the man of deep devices is afraid of thee. 5. Thou, o self-dependent Varuṇa, o wise director, knowest all creatures. What other thing is beyond this atmosphere? and what is nearer than that remotest thing, o thou unerring? 6. (Varuṇa replies) There is one thing beyond this atmosphere; and on this side of that one there is that which is near though inaccessible. Knowing that thing I declare it to thee. Let the glory of the niggards be cast down; let the Dāsas sink downward into the earth. 7. (Atharvan rejoins) Thou, o Varuṇa, sayest many evil things of those who revoke their gifts. Be not thou numbered among so many niggards; let not men call thee illiberal. 8. (Varuṇa replies) Let not men call me illiberal; I restore to thee, o worshipper, the brindled cow. Attend with all thy powers at every hymn in my honour among all the tribes of men. 9. (Atharvan answers) Let hymns ascend to thee among all the tribes of men. Give me that which thou hast taken from me; thou art to me an intimate friend of seven-fold value. 10. We two have a common bond, o Varuṇa, a common descent. I know what this common descent of ours is. (Varuṇa answers) I give thee that which I have taken from thee. I am thy intimate friend of seven-fold value, who, myself a god, confer life on thee a god [or priest, devāya] who praisest me, an intelligent sage on thee a sage. (The poet says) Thou, o self-dependent Varuṇa, hast begotten our father Atharvan, a kinsman of the gods. Grant to him most excellent wealth; thou art our friend and most eminent kinsman."

[188] Professor Aufrecht thinks that Dyaus, 'the Heaven,' is denoted by mahe asurāya, and that pitre haraye, if the correct reading, can only mean the Sun, the word hari being several times applied to that great luminary. I am otherwise indebted to Prof. A. for the correct sense of this line, and for other suggestions.

Sect. XI.—The same, and other legends, according to the Rāmāyaṇa.

The story told in the preceding section is related at greater length in chapters 51–65[189] of the Bālakāṇḍa, or first book, of the Rāmāyaṇa, of which I shall furnish an outline, noting any important variations from, or aditions to, the account in the Mahābhārata, and at the same time giving an abstract of the other legends which are interwoven with the narrative. There was formerly, we are told, a king called Kuśa, son of Prajāpati, who had a son called Kuśanābha, who was father of Gādhi, the father of Viśvāmitra. The latter ruled the earth for many thousand years. On one occasion, when he was making a circuit of the earth, he came to Vaśishṭha's hermitage, the pleasant abode of many saints, sages, and holy devotees (chapter 51, verses 11–29), where, after at first declining, he allowed himself to be hospitably entertained with his followers by the son of Brahmā (ch. 52). Viśvāmitra (ch. 53), however, coveting the wondrous cow, which had supplied all the dainties of the feast, first of all asked that she should be given to him in exchange for a hundred thousand common cows, adding that "she was a gem, that gems were the property of the king, and that, therefore, the cow was his by right" (53, 9. Ratnaṁ hi bhagavann etad ratna-hārī cha pārthivaḥ | 10. Tasmād me śabalāṁ dehi mamaishā dharmato dvija). On this price being refused, the king advances immensely in his offers, but all without effect. He then proceeds (ch. 54)—very ungratefully and tyrannically, it must be allowed—to have the cow removed by force, but she breaks away from his attendants, and rushes back to her master, complaining that he was deserting her. He replies that he was not deserting her, but that the king was much more powerful than he. She answers, 54, 14: Na balam kshattriyasyāhur brāhmaṇāḥ balavattarāḥ | brahman brahma-balaṁ divyaṁ kshāttrāch cha balabattaram | aprameyam balaṁ tubhyaṁ na tvayā balavattaraḥ | Viśvāmitro mahāvīryo tejas tava durāsadam | niyunkshva mām mahātejas tvam brahma-bala-sambhṛitām | tasya darpam balam yatnaṁ nāśayāmi durātmanaḥ | "Men do not ascribe strength to a Kshattriya: the Brāhmans are stronger. The strength of Brāhmans is divine, and superior to that of Kshattriyas. 15. Thy strength is immeasurable. Viśvāmitra, though of great vigour, is not more powerful than thou. Thy energy is invincible. Commission me, who have been acquired by thy Brahmanical power, and I will destroy the pride, and force, and attempt of this wicked prince."[190] She accordingly by her bellowing creates hundreds of Pahlavas, who destroy the entire host (nāśayanti balaṁ sarvam, verse 19) of Viśvāmitra, but are slain by him in their turn. Sakas and Yavanas, of great power and valour, and well armed, were then produced, who consumed the king's soldiers,[191] but were routed by him. The cow then (ch. 55) calls into existence by her bellowing, and from different parts of her body, other warriors of various tribes, who again destroyed Viśvāmitra's entire army, foot soldiers, elephants, horses, chariots, and all. A hundred of the monarch's sons, armed with various weapons, then rushed in great fury on Vaśishṭha, but were all reduced to ashes in a moment by the blast of that sage's mouth.[192] Viśvāmitra, being thus utterly vanquished and humbled, appointed one of his sons to be regent, and travelled to the Himālaya, where he betook himself to austerities, and thereby obtained a vision of Mahādeva, who at his desire revealed to him the science of arms in all its branches, and gave him celestial weapons with which, elated and full of pride, he consumed the hermitage of Vaśishṭha, and put its inhabitants to flight. Vaśishṭha then threatens Viśvāmitra and

[189] These are the sections of Schlegel's and the Bombay editions, which correspond to sections 52–67 of Gorresio's edition.

[190] Compare Manu, xi. 32: Sva-vīryād rāja-vīryāch cha sva-vīryam balavattaram | tasmāt svenaiva vīryeṇa nigṛihṇīyād arīn dvijaḥ | "Of the two, his own, and a king's might, let a Brāhman know that his own is superior. By his own might alone, therefore, let him restrain his enemies."

[191] We had been before told that they had been killed, so that this looks like a slaying of the slain, as no resuscitation of the army is alluded to.

[192] On this the Commentator remarks that "though these princes were Kshattriyas, they were not actual kings, and had acted tyrannically; so that a very slight expiation was required for killing them" (kshattriyatve 'pi pṛithivī-patitvābhāvāt tad-badhe alpa-prāyaśchittam ātatāyitvāch cha |).

uplifts his Brahmanical mace. Viśvāmitra, too, raises his fiery weapon and calls out to his adversary to stand. Vaśishṭha bids him to show his strength, and boasts that he will soon humble his pride. He asks: (56, 4) Kva cha te kshattriya-balam kva cha brahma-balam mahat | paśya brahma-balaṁ divyam mama kshattriya-pāṁśana | tasyāstram Gādhiputrasya ghoram āgneyam udyatam | brahma-daṇḍena tach chhāntam agner vegaḥ ivāmbhasā | "'What comparison is there between a Kshattriya's might, and the great might of a Brāhman? Behold, thou contemptible Kshattriya, my divine Brahmanical power.' The dreadful fiery weapon uplifted by the son of Gādhi was then quenched by the rod of the Brāhman, as fire is by water." Many and various other celestial missiles, as the nooses of Brahmā, Kāla (Time), and Varuṇa, the discus of Vishṇu, and the trident of Śiva, were hurled by Viśvāmitra at his antagonist, but the son of Brahmā swallowed them up in his all-devouring mace. Finally, to the intense consternation of all the gods, the warrior shot off the terrific weapon of Brāhmā (brāhmāstra); but this was equally ineffectual against the Brahmanical sage. Vaśishṭha had now assumed a direful appearance: (58, 18) Roma-kūpeshu sarveshu Vaśishṭhasya mahātmanaḥ | marīchyaḥ iva nishpetur agner dhūmākulārchishaḥ | prājvalad brahma-daṇḍaś cha Vaśishṭhasya karodyataḥ | vidhūmaḥ iva kālāgnir Yama-daṇḍaḥ ivāparaḥ | "Jets of fire mingled with smoke darted from the pores of his body; (19) the Brahmanical mace blazed in his hand like a smokeless[193] mundane conflagration, or a second sceptre of Yāma." Being appeased, however, by the munis, who proclaimed his superiority to his rival, the sage stayed his vengeance; and Viśvāmitra exclaimed with a groan: (56, 23) Dhig balam kshattriya-balam brahma-tejo-balam balam | ekena brahma-daṇḍena sarvāstrāṇi hatāni me | "'Shame on a Kshattriya's strength: the strength of a Brahman's might alone is strength: by the single Brahmanical mace all my weapons have been destroyed.'" No alternative now remains to the humiliated monarch, but either to acquiesce in this helpless inferiority, or to work out his own elevation to the Brahmanical order. He embraces the latter alternative: (56, 24) Tad etat prasamīkshyāham prasannendriya-mānasaḥ | tapo mahat samāsthāsye yad vai brahmatva-kāraṇam | "Having pondered well this defeat, I shall betake myself, with composed senses and mind,

[193] The Bombay edition has vidhūmaḥ. Schlegel's and Gorresio's editions have sadhūmaḥ, "enveloped in smoke."

to strenuous austere fervour, which shall exalt me to the rank of a Brāhman." Intensely vexed and mortified, groaning and full of hatred against his enemy, he travelled with his queen to the south, and carried his resolution into effect; (ch. 57) and we are first of all told that three sons Havishyanda, Madhusyanda, and Dṛiḍhanetra were born to him. At the end of a thousand years Brahmā appeared, and announced that he had conquered the heaven of royal sages (rājārshis); and, in consequence of his austere fervour, he was recognised as having attained that rank. Viśvāmitra, however, was ashamed, grieved, and incensed at the offer of so very inadequate a reward, and exclaimed: "'I have practised intense austerity, and the gods and ṛishis regard me only as a rājarshi![194] Austerities, it appears, are altogether fruitless'" (57, 5. Jitāḥ rājarshi-lokās te tapasā Kuśikātmaja | 6. Anena tapasā tvaṁ hi rājarshir iti vidmahe | . . . . 7. Viśvāmitro 'pi tach chhrutvā hriyā kiṁchid avāṅ-mukhaḥ | duḥkhena mahatā "vishṭaḥ samanyur idam abravīt | tapaś cha sumahat taptaṁ rājarshir iti māṁ viduḥ | devāḥ sarshi-guṇāḥ sarve nāsti manye tapaḥ-phalam |). Notwithstanding this disappointment, he had ascended one grade, and forthwith recommenced his work of mortification.

[194] The Vishṇu Purāṇa, iii. 6, 21, says: "There are three kinds of rishis: Brăhmărshis, after them Dēvarshis, and after them Rājarshis" (jneyāḥ brahmarshayaḥ pūrvaṁ tebhyo devarshayaḥ punaḥ | rājarshayaḥ punas tebhyaḥ ṛishi-prakṛitayas trayaḥ |). Böhtlingk and Roth, s.v. ṛishi, mention also (on the authority of the vocabulary called Trikāṇḍaśesha) the words măharshi (great rishi), părămarshi (most eminent rishi), śrutarshi (secondary rishi), and kāṇḍarshi, who is explained s.v. to be a teacher of a particular portion (kāṇḍa) of the Veda. Devarshis are explained by Professor Wilson (V.P. iii. p. 68, paraphrasing the text of the Vishṇu Purāṇa), to be "sages who are demi-gods also;" Brăhmărshis to be "sages who are sons of Brahmā or Brahmans;" and Rājarshis to be "princes who have adopted a life of devotion." In a note he adds: "A similar enumeration is given in the Vāyu, with some additions: Rishi is derived from ṛish, 'to go to,' or 'approach;' the Brahmarshis, it is said, are descendants of the five patriarchs, who were the founders of races or gotras of Brahmans, or Kaśyapa, Vaśishṭha, Aṅgiras, Atri, and Bhṛigu; the Devarshis are Nara and Nārāyaṇa, the sons of Dharma; the Bālakhilyas, who sprang from Kratu; Kardama, the son of Pulaha; Kuvēra, the son of Pulastya; Achala, the son of Pratyūsha; Nārada and Parvata, the sons of Kaśyapa. Rājarshis are Ikshvāku and other princes. The Brahmarshis dwell in the sphere of Brahmā; the Devarshis in the region of the gods; and the Rājarshis in the heaven of Indra." Brahmarshis are evidently rishis who were priests; and Rājarshis, rishis of kingly extraction. If so, a Devarshi, having a divine character, should be something higher than either. Professor Roth, following apparently the Trikaṇḍaśesha, defines them as "rishis dwelling among the gods." I am not aware how far back this classification of rishis goes in Indian literature. Roth, s.vv. ṛishi, brahmarshi and devarshi does not give any references to these words as occurring in the Brāhmaṇas; and they are not found in the hymns of the R.V. where, however, the "seven rishis" are mentioned. Regarding rājarshis see pp. 266 ff. above.

At this point of time his austerities were interrupted by the following occurrences: King Triśanku, one of Ikshvāku's descendants, had conceived the design of celebrating a sacrifice by virtue of which he should ascend bodily to heaven. As Vaśishṭha, on being summoned, declared that the thing was impossible (aśakyam), Triśanku travelled to the south, where the sage's hundred sons were engaged in austerities, and applied to them to do what their father had declined. Though he addressed them with the greatest reverence and humility, and added that "the Ikshvākus regarded their family-priests as their highest resource in difficulties, and that, after their father, he himself looked to them as his tutelary deities" (57, 22. Ikshvākūṇāṁ hi sarveshām purodhaḥ paramā gatiḥ | tasmād anantaram sarve bhavanto daivatam mama), he received from the haughty priests the following rebuke for his presumption: (58, 2) Pratyākhyāto 'si durbuddhe guruṇā satyavādinā | taṁ kathaṁ samatikramya śākhāntaram upeyivān | 3. Ikshvākūṇām hi sarveshām purodhāḥ paramā gatiḥ | na chātikramituṁ śakyaṁ vachanaṁ satyavādinaḥ | 4. "Aśakyam" iti chovācha Vaśishṭho bhagavān ṛishiḥ | taṁ vayaṁ vai samāharttum kratuṁ śaktāḥ kathaṁ tava | 5. Bāliśas tvaṁ nara-śreshṭha gamyatāṁ sva-puram punaḥ | yājane bhagavān śaktas trailokyasyāpi pārthiva | avamānaṁ kathaṁ kartuṁ tasya śakshyāmahe vayam | "Fool, thou hast been refused by thy truth-speaking preceptor. How is it that, disregarding his authority, thou hast resorted to another school (śākhā)?[195] 3. The family-priest is the highest oracle of all the Ikshvākus; and the command of that veracious personage cannot be transgressed. 4. Vaśishṭha, the divine ṛishi, has declared that 'the thing cannot be;' and how can we undertake thy sacrifice? 5. Thou art foolish, king; return to thy capital. The divine (Vaśishṭha) is competent to act as priest of the three worlds; how can we shew him disrespect?" Triśanku then gave them to understand, that as his preceptor and "his preceptor's sons had declined compliance with his requests, he should think of some other expedient." In consequence of his venturing to express this presumptuous intention, they condemned him by their imprecation to become a Chaṇḍāla (58, 7. "Pratyākhyāto bhagavatā guruputraıs tathaiva cha | anyāṁ gatim gamishyāmi svasti vo 'stu tapodhanāḥ" | ṛishi-putrās tu tach chhrutvā vākyaṁ ghorābhisaṁhitam | śepuḥ parama-sankruddhāś "chāṇḍālatvaṁ gamishyasi" |). As this curse soon took effect, and the unhappy king's form was changed into that of a degraded outcast, he resorted to Viśvāmitra (who, as we have seen, was also dwelling at this period in the south), enlarging on his own virtues and piety, and bewailing his fate. Viśvāmitra commiserated his condition (ch. 59), and promised to sacrifice on his behalf, and exalt him to heaven in the same Chaṇḍāla-form to which he had been condemned by his preceptors' curse. "Heaven is now as good as in thy possession, since thou hast resorted to the son of Kuśika" (59, 4. Guru-śāpa-kṛitaṁ rūpaṁ yad idaṁ tvayi varttate | anena saha rūpeṇa saśarīro gamishyasi | hasta-prāptam aham manye svargaṁ tava narādhipa | yas tvaṁ Kauśikam āgamya śaraṇyaḥ śaraṇaṁ gataḥ |). He then directed that preparations should be made for the sacrifice, and that all the rishis, including the family of Vaśishṭha, should be invited to the ceremony. The disciples of Viśvāmitra, who had conveyed his message, reported the result on their return in these words: (59, 11) Śrutvā te vachanaṁ sarve samāyānti dvijātayaḥ | sarva-deśeshu chāgachhan varjayitvā Mahodayam | Vāśishṭhaṁ tach chhataṁ sarvaṁ krodha-paryākulākṣharam | yad uvācha vacho ghoraṁ śriṇu tvaṁ muni-pungava | "kshattriyo yājako yasya chaṇḍālasya viśeshataḥ | kathaṁ sadasi bhoktāro havis tasya surarshayaḥ | brāhmaṇāḥ vā mahātmāno bhuktvā chaṇḍāla-bhojanam | kathaṁ svargaṁ gamishyanti Viśvāmitreṇa pālitāḥ" | etad vachana-naishṭhuryyam ūchuḥ saṁrakta-lochanāḥ | Vaśishṭhāḥ muni-śārdūla sarve saha-mahodayāḥ | "Having heard your message, all the Brāhmans are assembling in all the countries, and have arrived, excepting Mahodaya (Vaśishṭha?). Hear what dreadful words those hundred Vaśishṭhas, their voices quivering with rage, have uttered: 'How can the gods and rishis[196] con-

[195] It does not appear how Triśanku, in asking the aid of Vaśishṭha's sons after applying in vain to their father, could be charged with resorting to another śākhā (school), in the ordinary sense of that word: as it is not conceivable that the sons should have been of another Śākhā from the father, whose cause they espouse with so much warmth. The Commentator in the Bombay edition explains the word śākhāntaram as = yājanādinā rakshakāntaram, "one who by sacrificing for thee, etc., will be another protector." Gorresio's Gauḍa text, which may often be used as a commentary on the older one, has the following paraphrase of the words in question, ch. 60, 3 Mūlam utsṛijya kasmāt tvaṁ śākhāsv ichhasi lambitum | "Why, forsaking the root, dost thou desire to hang upon the branches."

[196] The rishis as priests (ṛitvik) would be entitled to eat the remains of the sacrifice, according to the Commentator.

sume the oblation at the sacrifice of that man, especially if he be a Chaṇḍāla, for whom a Kshattriya is officiating-priest? How can illustrious Brāhmans ascend to heaven, after eating the food of a Chaṇḍāla, and being entertained by Viśvāmitra?' These ruthless words all the Vaśishṭhas, together with Mahodaya, uttered, their eyes inflamed with anger." Viśvāmitra, who was greatly incensed on receiving this message, by a curse doomed the sons of Vaśishṭha to be reduced to ashes, and reborn as degraded outcasts (mṛitapāḥ) for seven hundred births, and Mahodaya to become a Nishāda. Knowing that this curse had taken effect (ch. 60), Viśvāmitra then, after eulogizing Triśanku, proposed to the assembled rishis that the sacrifice should be celebrated. To this they assented, being actuated by fear of the terrible sage's wrath. Viśvāmitra himself officiated at the sacrifice as yājăka;[197] and the other rishis as priests (ṛitvijaḥ) (with other functions) performed all the ceremonies. Viśvāmitra next invited the gods to partake of the oblations: (60, 11) Nābhyagaman yadā tattra bhāgārthaṁ sarva-devatāḥ | tataḥ kopa-samāvishṭo Viśvāmitro mahāmuniḥ | sruvam udyamya sakrodhas Triśankum idam abravīt | "paśya me tapaso vīryaṁ svārjitasya nareśvara | esha tvām svaśarīreṇa nayāmi svargam ojasā | dushprāpyaṁ svaśarīreṇa svargaṁ gachchha nareśvara | svārjitaṁ kinchid apy asti mayā hi tapasaḥ phalam | "When, however, the deities did not come to receive their portions, Viśvāmitra became full of wrath, and raising aloft the sacrificial ladle, thus addressed Triśanku: 'Behold, o monarch, the power of austere fervour acquired by my own efforts. I myself, by my own energy, will conduct thee to heaven. Ascend to that celestial region which is so arduous to attain in an earthly body. I have surely earned some reward of my austerity.'" Triśanku ascended instantly to heaven in the sight of the munis. Indra, however, ordered him to be gone, as a person who, having incurred the curse of his spiritual preceptors, was unfit for the abode of the celestials;—and to fall down headlong to earth (60, 17. Triśanko gachha bhūyas tvaṁ nāsi svargakṛitālayaḥ | guru-śāpa-hato mūḍha pata bhūmim avāk-śirāḥ |). He accordingly began to descend, invoking loudly, as he fell, the help of his spiritual patron. Viśvāmitra, greatly incensed, called out to him to stop: (60, 20) Tato brahma-tapo-yogāt Prajāpatir ivāparaḥ | sasarjja dakshiṇe bhāge saptarshīn aparān punaḥ | dakshiṇāṁ diśam āsthāya

[197] This means as adhvaryu according to the Commentator.

ṛishi-madhye mahāyaśāḥ | nakshattra-mālām aparām asṛijat krodha-mūrchhitaḥ | anyam Indraṁ karishyāmi loko vā syād anindrakaḥ | daivatāny api sa krodhāt srashṭuṁ samupachakrame |[198] "Then by the power of his divine knowledge and austere fervour he created, like another Prajāpati, other Seven Rishis (a constellation so called) in the southern part of the sky. Having proceeded to this quarter of the heavens, the renowned sage, in the midst of the rishis, formed another garland of stars, being overcome with fury. Exclaiming, 'I will create another Indra, or the world shall have no Indra at all,' he began, in his rage, to call gods also into being." The rishis, gods (Suras), and Asuras now became seriously alarmed and said to Viśvāmitra, in a conciliatory tone, that Triśanku, "as he had been cursed by his preceptors, should not be admitted bodily into heaven, until he had undergone some lustration" (60, 24. Ayaṁ rājā mahābhāga guru-śāpa-parikshataḥ | saśarīro divaṁ yātuṁ nārhaty akṛita-pāvanaḥ |).[199] The sage replied that he had given a promise to Triśanku, and appealed to the gods to permit his protegé to remain bodily in heaven, and the newly created stars to retain their places in perpetuity. The gods agreed that "these numerous stars should remain, but beyond the sun's path, and that Triśanku, like an immortal, with his head downwards, should shine among them, and be followed by them," adding "that his object would be thus attained, and his renown secured, and he would be like a dweller in heaven" (60, 29. Evam bhavatu bhadraṁ te tishṭhantv etāni sarvaśaḥ | gagane tāny anekāni vaiśvānara-pathād vahiḥ | nakshattrāṇi muni-śreshṭha teshu jyottishshu jājvalan | avāk-śirās Triśankuś cha tishthatv amara-sannibhaḥ | anuyāsyanti chaitāni jyotīṁshi nṛipa-sattamam | kṛitārthaṁ kīrtimantaṁ cha svarga-loka-gataṁ yathā |). Thus was this great dispute adjusted by a compromise, which Viśvāmitra accepted.

This story of Triśanku, it will have been observed, differs materially from the one quoted above (p. 375 ff.) from the Harivaṁśa; but brings out more distinctly the character of the conflict between Vaśishṭha and Viśvāmitra.

When all the gods and rishis had departed at the conclusion of the [198] I follow Schlegel's text, which differs verbally, though not in substance, both from the Bombay edition and from Gorresio's.

[199] The last compound word akṛitapāvanaḥ, "without lustration," is given by Schlegel and Gorresio. The Bombay edition has instead of it eva tapodhana, "o sage rich in austerity."

sacrifice, Viśvāmitra said to his attendant devotees: (61, 2) Mahān vighnaḥ pravṛitto 'yaṁ dakshiṇām āsthito diśam | diśam anyām prapatsyāmas tattra tapsyāmahe tapaḥ | "This has been a great interruption [to our austerities] which has occurred in the southern region: we must proceed in another direction to continue our penances." He accordingly went to a forest in the west, and began his austerities anew. Here the narrative is again interrupted by the introduction of another story, that of king Ambarīsha, king of Ayodhyā, who was, according to the Rāmāyaṇa, the twenty-eighth in descent from Ikshvāku, and the twenty-second from Triśanku. (Compare the genealogy in the Rāmāyaṇa, i. 70, and ii. 110, 6 ff., with that in Wilson's Vishṇu Purāṇa, vol. iii. pp. 260 ff. 280, 284 ff. and 303; which is different.) Viśvāmitra is nevertheless represented as flourishing contemporaneously with both of these princes. The story relates that Ambarīsha was engaged in performing a sacrifice, when Indra carried away the victim. The priest said that this ill-omened event had occurred owing to the king's bad administration; and would call for a great expiation, unless a human victim could be produced (61, 8. Prāyaśchittam mahad hy etad naraṁ vā purusharshabha | ānayasva pāśuṁ śīghraṁ yāvat karma pravarttate|). After a long search the royal-rishi (Ambarīsha) came upon the Brāhman-rishi Ṛichīka, a descendant of Bhṛigu, and asked him to sell one of his sons for a victim, at the price of a hundred thousand cows. Richīka answered that he would not sell his eldest son; and his wife added that she would not sell the youngest: "eldest sons," she observed, "being generally the favourites of their fathers, and youngest sons of their mothers" (61, 18. Prāyeṇa hi nara-śreshṭha jyeshṭhāḥ pitṛishu vallabhāḥ | mātṛīṇāṁ cha kanīyāṁsas tasmād rakshe kanīyasam |). The second son, Sunaśśepa, then said that in that case he regarded himself as the one who was to be sold, and desired the king to remove him. The hundred thousand cows, with ten millions of gold-pieces and heaps of jewels, were paid down, and Sunaśśepa carried away. As they were passing through Pushkara (ch. 62) Sunaśśepa beheld his maternal uncle Viśvāmitra (see Rāmāyaṇa, i. 34, 7,[200] and p. 352 above) who was engaged in austerities there with other rishis, threw himself into his arms,

[200] Pūrvajā bhaginī chāpi mama Rāghava suvratā | nāmnā Satyavatī nāma Ṛichīke pratipāditā | "And I have a religious sister older than myself called Satyavatī, who was given in marriage to Ṛichīka."

and implored his assistance, urging his orphan, friendless, and helpless state, as claims on the sage's benevolence (62, 4. Na me 'sti mātā na pitā jnātayo bāndhavāḥ kutaḥ | trātum arhasi māṁ saumya dharmeṇa muni-pungava | . . . . 7. Na me nātho hy anāthasya bhava bhavyena chetasā |). Viśvāmitra soothed him; and pressed his own sons to offer themselves as victims in the room of Sunaśśepa. This proposition met with no favour from Madhushyanda[201] and the other sons of the royal hermit, who answered with haughtiness and derision: (62, 14) Kathaṁ ātma-sutān hitvā trāyase 'nya-sutān vibho | akāryyam iva paśyāmaḥ svamāṁsam iva bhojane | "How is it that thou sacrificest thine own sons, and seekest to rescue those of others? We look upon this as wrong, and like the eating of one's own flesh."[202] The sage was exceedingly wroth at this disregard of his injunction, and doomed his sons to be born in the most degraded classes, like Vaśishṭha's sons, and to eat dog's flesh,[203] for a thousand years. He then said to Sunaśśepa: (62, 19) Pavitrapāśair ābaddho rakta-mālyānulepanaḥ | Vaishṇavaṁ yūpam āsādya vāgbhir Agniṁ udāhara | ime cha gāthe dve divye gāyethāḥ muni-puttraka | Ambarīshasya yajne 'smiṁs tataḥ siddhim avāpsyasi | "When thou art bound with hallowed cords, decked with a red garland, and anointed with unguents, and fastened to the sacrificial post of Vishṇu, then address thyself to Agni, and sing these two divine verses (gāthās), at the sacrifice of Ambarīsha; then shalt thou attain the fulfilment [of thy desire]." Being furnished with the two gāthās, Sunaśśepa proposed at once to king Ambarīsha that they should set out for their destination. When bound at the stake to be immolated, dressed in a red garment, "he celebrated the two gods, Indra and his younger brother (Vishṇu), with the excellent verses. The Thousand-eyed (Indra) was pleased with the secret hymn, and bestowed long life on Sunaśśepa" (62, 25. Sa baddho vāgbhir agryābhir abhitushṭāva vai surau | Indram Indrānujaṁ chaiva yathāvad muni-puttrakaḥ | tasmai prītaḥ sahasrāksho

[201] The word is written thus in Schlegel's and Gorresio's editions. The Bombay edition reads Madhuchhanda.

[202] Schlegel and Gorresio read svamāṁsam, "one's own flesh," which seems much more appropriate than śva-māṁsam, "dog's flesh," the reading of the Bombay edition.

[203] Gorresio's edition alone reads sva-māṁsa-vṛittayaḥ, "subsisting on your own flesh," and makes this to be allusion to what the sons had just said and a punishment for their impertinence (64, 16. Yasmāt sva-māṁsam uddishṭaṁ yushmābhir avamanya mām).

rahasya-stuti-toshitaḥ | dīrgham āyus tadā prādāch Chhunaśśephāya Vāsavaḥ |).[204] King Ambarīsha also received great benefits from this sacrifice. Viśvāmitra meanwhile proceeded with his austerities, which he prolonged for a thousand years.

At the end of this time (ch. 63) the gods came to allot his reward; and Brahmā announced that he had attained the rank of a rishi, thus apparently advancing an additional step. Dissatisfied, as it would seem, with this, the sage commenced his task of penance anew. After a length of time he beheld the nymph (Apsăras) Menăkā, who had come to bathe in the lake of Pushkara. She flashed on his view, unequalled in her radiant beauty, like lightning in a cloud (63, 5. Rūpeṇāpratimāṁ tattra vidyutaṁ jalade yathā). He was smitten by her charms, invited her to be his companion in his hermitage, and for ten years remained a slave to her witchery, to the great prejudice of his austerities.[205] At length he became ashamed of this ignoble subjection, and full of indignation at what he believed to be a device of the gods to disturb his devotion; and, dismissing the nymph with gentle accents, he departed for the northern mountains, where he practised severe austerities for a thousand years on the banks of the Kauśikī river. The gods became alarmed at the progress he was making, and decided that he should be dignified with the appellation of great rishi (măhărshi); and Brahmā, giving effect to the general opinion of the deities, announced that he had conferred that rank upon him. Joining his hands and bowing his head, Viśvāmitra replied that he should consider himself to have indeed completely subdued his senses, if the incomparable title of Brāhman-rishi were conferred upon him (63, 31. Brahmarshi-śabdam atulaṁ svārjitaiḥ karmabhiḥ śubhaiḥ | yadi me bhagavān āha tato 'haṁ vijitendriyaḥ |). Brahmā informed him in answer, that he had not yet acquired the power of perfectly controlling his senses; but should make further efforts with that view. The sage then began to put himself through a yet more rigorous course of austerities, standing with his arms erect, without support, feeding on air, in summer exposed to five fires (i.e. one on each of four sides, and the sun overhead), in the rainy season remaining unsheltered from the wet, and in [204] I have alluded above, p. 358, note, to the differences which exist between this legend of S'unaśśepa and the older one in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa.

[205] Compare Mr. Leckie's History of Rationalism, vol. i. p. 86.

winter lying on a watery couch night and day. This he continued for a thousand years. At last Indra and the other deities became greatly distressed at the idea of the merit he was storing up, and the power which he was thereby acquiring; and the chief of the celestials desired (ch. 64) the nymph Rămbhā to go and bewitch him by her blandishments. She expressed great reluctance to expose herself to the wrath of the formidable muni, but obeyed the repeated injunction of Indra, who promised that he and Kandarpa (the god of love) should stand by her, and assumed her most attractive aspect with the view of overcoming the sage's impassibility. He, however, suspected this design, and becoming greatly incensed, he doomed the nymph by a curse to be turned into stone and to continue in that state for a thousand years.[206] The curse took effect, and Kandarpa and Indra slunk away. In this way, though he resisted the allurements of sensual love,[207] he lost the whole fruit of his austerities by yielding to anger; and had to begin his work over again. He resolved to check his irascibility, to remain silent, not even to breathe for hundreds of years; to dry up his body; and to fast and stop his breath till he had obtained the coveted character of a Brāhman. He then (ch. 65) left the Himālăya and travelled to the east, where he underwent a dreadful exercise, unequalled in the whole history of austerities, maintaining silence, according to a vow, for a thousand years. At the end of this time he had attained to perfection, and although thwarted by many obstacles, he remained unmoved by anger. On the expiration of this course of austerity, he prepared some food to eat; which Indra, coming in the form of a Brāhman, begged that he would give him. Viśvāmitra did so, and though he had none left for himself, and was obliged to remain fasting, he said nothing to the Brāhman, on account of his vow of silence. 65, 8. Tasyānuchchhvasamānasya mūrdhni dhūmo vyajāyata | 9. Trailokyaṁ yena sambhrāntam ātāpitam ivābhavat | . . . . 11. "Bahubhiḥ kāraṇair deva Viśvāmitro mahāmuniḥ | lobhitaḥ krodhitaś chaiva tapasā chābhivardhate | . . . . 12. Na dīyate yadi tv asya manasā yad abhīpsitam | 13. Vināśayati trailokyaṁ tapasā sa-charācharam | vyākulāś

[206] On this the Commentator remarks that this incident shews that anger is more difficult to conquer than even lust (etena kāmād api krodho durjeyaḥ iti sūchitam).

[207] The Commentator, however, suggests that the sudden sight of Rambhā may at first have excited in him some feelings of this kind (āpātato Rambhā-darśana-pravṛittyā kāmenāpi tapaḥ-kshayaḥ).

cha diśaḥ sarvāḥ na cha kinchit prakāśate | 14. Sāgaraḥ kshubhitāḥ sarve viśīryante cha parvatāḥ | prakampate cha vasudhā vāyur vātīha sankulaḥ | 15. Brahman na pratijānīmo nāstiko jāyate janaḥ | . . . . 16. Buddhiṁ na kurute yāvad nāśe deva mahāmuniḥ | 17. Tāvat prasādyo bhagavān agnirūpo mahādyutiḥ" | . . . . 19. Brahmarshe svāgataṁ te 'stu tapasā smaḥ sutoshitāḥ | 20. Brāhmaṇyaṁ tapasogreṇa prāptavān asi Kauśika | dīrgham āyuś che te brahman dadāmi sa-marud-gaṇaḥ | 21. . . . . svasti prāpnuhi bhadraṁ te gachha saumya yathāsukham | . . . 22. . . . brāhmaṇyaṁ yadi me prāptaṁ dīrgham āyus tathaiva cha | 23. Oṁkāro 'tha vashaṭkāro vedāś cha varayantu mām | kshattra-veda-vidāṁ śreshṭho brahma-veda-vidām api | 24. Brahma-putro Vaśishṭho mām evaṁ vadatu devatāḥ | . . . . 25. Tataḥ prasādito devair Vaśishṭho japatāṁ varaḥ | sakhyaṁ chakāra brahmarshir "evam astv" iti chābravīt | 26. "Brahmarshitvaṁ na sandehaḥ sarvam sampadyate tava" | . . . . 27. Viśvāmitro 'pi dharmātmā labdhvā brāhmaṇyam uttamam | pūjayāmāsa brahmarshiṁ Vaśishṭhaṁ japatāṁ varam | "As he continued to suspend his breath, smoke issued from his head, to the great consternation and distress of the three worlds." The gods, rishis, etc., then addressed Brahmā: "The great muni Viśvāmitra has been allured and provoked in various ways, but still advances in his sanctity. If his wish is not conceded, he will destroy the three worlds by the force of his austerity. All the regions of the universe are confounded, no light anywhere shines; all the oceans are tossed, and the mountains crumble, the earth quakes, and the wind blows confusedly. 15. We cannot, o Brahmā, guarantee that mankind shall not become atheistic. . . . . 16. Before the great and glorious sage of fiery form resolves to destroy (everything) let him be propitiated." . . . . The gods, headed by Brahmā, then addressed Viśvāmitra: "'Hail Brāhman rishi, we are gratified by thy austerities; o Kauśika, thou hast, through their intensity, attained to Brāhmanhood. I, o Brāhman, associated with the Maruts, confer on thee long life. May every blessing attend thee; depart wherever thou wilt.' The sage, delighted, made his obeisance to the gods, and said: 'If I have obtained Brāhmanhood, and long life, then let the mystic monosyllable (oṁkāra) and the sacrificial formula (vāshaṭkāra) and the Vedas recognise me in that capacity. And let Vaśishṭha, the son of Brahmā, the most eminent of those who are skilled in the Kshattra-veda, and the Brāhma-veda (the knowledge of the Kshattriya and the Brahmanical disciplines), address me similarly.' . . . . Accordingly Vaśishṭha, being propitiated by the gods, became reconciled to Viśvāmitra, and recognised his claim to all the prerogatives of a Brāhman rishi. . . . . Viśvāmitra, too, having attained the Brahmanical rank, paid all honour to Vaśishṭha." Such was the grand result achieved by Viśvāmitra, at the cost of many thousand years of intense mortification of the body, and discipline of the soul. During the course of the struggle he had manifested, as the story tells us, a power little, if at all, inferior to that of Indra, the king of the gods; and as in a former legend we have seen King Nahusha actually occupying the throne of that deity, we cannot doubt that—according to the recognised principles of Indian mythology—Viśvāmitra had only to recommence his career of self-mortification in order to raise himself yet higher than he had yet risen, to the rank of a devarshi, or divine rishi (if this be, indeed, a superior grade to that of brahmarshi), or to any other elevation he might desire. But, as far as the account in the Rāmāyaṇa informs us, he was content with his success. He stood on a footing of perfect equality with his rival Vaśishṭha, and became indifferent to further honours. In fact, it was not necessary for the purpose of the inventors of the legend to carry him any higher. They only wished to account for his exercising the prerogatives of a Brāhman; and this had been already accomplished to their satisfaction.

In the story of Śakuntalā, however, as narrated in the Mahābhārata, Ādiparvan, sixty-ninth and following sections, we are informed that, to the great alarm of Indra, Viśvāmitra renewed his austerities, even long after he had attained the position of a Brāhman, verse 2914: Tapyamānaḥ kila purā Viśvāmitro mahat tapaḥ | subhriśaṁ tāpayāmāsa Śakraṁ sura-gaṇeśvaram | tapasā dīpta-vīryyo'yaṁ sthānād māṁ chyāvayed iti | "Formerly Viśvāmitra, who was practising intense austere-fervour, occasioned great distress to Śakra (Indra), the lord of the deities, lest by the fiery energy so acquired by the saint he himself should be cast down from his place." Indra accordingly resorted to the usual device of sending one of the Apsarases, Menakā, to seduce the sage by the display of her charms, and the exercise of all her allurements, "by beauty, youth, sweetness, gestures, smiles, and words" (verse 2920, Rūpa-yauvana-mādhuryya-cheshṭita-smita-bhāshitaiḥ), into the indulgence of sensual love; and thus put an end to his efforts after increased sanctity. Menakā urges the dangers of the mission arising from the great power and irascibility of the sage, of whom, she remarked, even Indra himself was afraid, as a reason for excusing her from undertaking it; and refers to some incidents in Viśvāmitra's history, verse 2923: Mahābhāgaṁ Vaśishṭhaṁ yaḥ putrair ishṭair vyayojayat | kshattra-jātaś cha yaḥ pūrvam abhavad brāhmaṇo balāt | śauchārthaṁ yo nadīṁ chakre durgamām bahubhir jalaiḥ | yāṁ tām puṇyatamāṁ loke Kauśikīti vidur janāḥ | 2925. Babhāra yatrāsya purā kāle durge mahātmanaḥ | dārān Matango dharmātmā rājarshir vyādhatāṁ gataḥ | atīta-kāle durbhikshe abhyetya punar āśramam | muniḥ Pāreti nadyāḥ vai nāma chakre tadā prabhuḥ | Mātangam yājayānchakre yatra prīta-manāḥ svayam | tvaṁ cha somam bhayād yasya gataḥ pātuṁ sureśvara | chakārānyaṁ cha lokaṁ vai kruddho nakshattra-sampadā | pratiśravaṇa-pūrvāṇi nakshattrāṇi chakāra yaḥ | guru-śāpa-hatasyāpi Triśankoḥ śaraṇaṁ dadau | "2923. He deprived the great Vaśishṭha of his beloved sons; and though born a Kshattriya, he formerly became a Brāhman by force. For the purpose of purification he rendered the holy river, known in the world as the Kauśikī, unfordable from the mass of water. 2925. His wife was once maintained there in a time of distress by the righteous rājarshi Matanga, who had become a huntsman; and when the famine was past, the muni returned to his hermitage, gave to the river the name of Pārā, and being gratified, sacrificed for Matanga on its banks; and then thou thyself, Indra, from fear of him wentest to drink his soma. He created, too, when incensed, another world, with a garland of stars, formed agreeably to his promise, and gave his protection to Triśanku, even when smitten by his preceptor's curse." Menakā, however, ends by saying that she cannot decline the commission which has been imposed upon her; but begs that she may receive such succours as may ensure her success. She accordingly shows herself in the neighbourhood of Viśvāmitra's hermitage. The saint yields to the influence of love, invites her to become his companion, and as a result of their intercourse Śakuntalā is born. The Apsaras then returns to Indra's paradise.

Sect. XII.—Other accounts, from the Mahābhārata, of the way in which Viśvāmitra became a Brāhman.

In the Udyogaparvan of the Mahābhārata, sections 105–118, a story is told regarding Viśvāmitra and his pupil Gālava, in which a different account is given of the manner in which Viśvāmitra attained the rank of a Brāhman; viz. by the gift of Dharma, or Righteousness, appearing in the form of his rival. M. Bh. Udyogap. 3721: Viśvāmitraṁ tapasyantam Dharmo jijñāsayā purā | abhyāgachhat svayam bhūtvā Vaśishṭho bhagavān ṛishiḥ | . . . . 3728. Atha varsha-śate pūrṇe Dharmaḥ punar upāgamat | Vāśishṭhaṁ veśam āsthāya Kauśikam bhojanepsayā | sa dṛishṭvā śirasā bhaktaṁ dhriyamāṇam maharshiṇā | tishṭhatā vāyubhakshaṇa Viśvāmitreṇa dhīmatā | pratigṛihya tato Dharmas tathaivoshṇaṁ tathā navam | bhuktvā "prīto 'smi viprarshe" tam uktvā sa munir gataḥ | kshattra-bhāvād apagato brāhmaṇatvam upāgataḥ | Dharmasya vachanāt prīto Viśvāmitras tathā 'bhavat | "Dharma, assuming the personality of the sage Vaśishṭha, once came to prove Viśvāmitra, when he was living a life of austerity;" and after consuming some food, given him by other devotees, desired Viśvāmitra, who brought him some freshly cooked charu, quite hot, to stand still for the present. Viśvāmitra accordingly stood still, nourished only by air, with the boiled rice on his head. "The same personage, Dharma, in the same disguise, reappeared after a hundred years, desiring food, and consumed the rice (still quite hot and fresh), which he saw supported upon the hermit's head, while he himself remained motionless, feeding on air. Dharma then said to him, 'I am pleased with thee, o Brāhman rishi;' and went away. Viśvāmitra, having become thus transformed from a Kshattriya into a Brāhman by the word of Dharma, was delighted."

In the Anuśāsanaparvan of the Mahābhārata, we have another reference to the story of Viśvāmitra. King Yudhishṭhira enquires of Bhīshma (verse 181) how, if Brāhmanhood is so difficult to be attained by men of the other three castes, it happened that the great Kshattriya acquired that dignity. The prince then recapitulates the chief exploits of Viśvāmitra: 183. Tena hy amita-vīryeṇa Vaśishṭhasya mahātmanaḥ | hatam putra-śataṁ sadyas tapasā 'pi pitāmaha | yātudhānāś cha bahavo rākshasās tigma-tejasaḥ | manyunā "vishṭa-dehena sṛishṭāḥ kālāntakopamāḥ | 185. Mahān Kuśika-vaṁśaś cha brahmarshi-śata-sankulaḥ | sthāpito nara-loke 'smin vidvān brāhmaṇa-saṁyutaḥ | Ṛichīkasyātmajaś chaiva Śunaḥśepho mahātapāḥ | vimokshito mahāsattrāt paśutām apy upāgataḥ | Hariśchandra-kratau devāṁs toshayitvā "tma-tejasā | putratām anusamprāpto Viśvāmitrasya dhīmataḥ | nābhivādayato jyeshṭhaṁ Devarātaṁ narā-

dhipa | puttrāḥ panchāśad evāpi śaptāḥ śvapachatāṁ gatāḥ | Triśankur bandhubhir muktaḥ Aikshvākuḥ prīti-pūrvakam | avāk-śirāḥ divaṁ nīto dakshiṇām āśrito diśam | . . . . tato vighnakarī chaiva Panchachūḍā susammatā | Rambhā nāmāpsarāḥ śāpād yasya śailatvam āgatā | tathaivāsya bhayād baddhvā Vaśishṭhaḥ salile purā | ātmānam majjayan śrīmān vipāśaḥ punar utthitaḥ | "For he destroyed Vaśishṭha's hundred sons by the power of austere-fervour; when possessed by anger, he created many demons, fierce and destructive as death; he (185) established the great and wise family of the Kuśikas, which was full of Brāhmans and hundreds of Brāhman rishis; he delivered Sunaśśepha, son of Ṛichīka, who was on the point of being slaughtered as a victim, and who became his son, after he had, at Hariśchandra's sacrifice, through his own power, propitiated the gods; he cursed his fifty sons who would not do homage to Devarāta, (adopted as) the eldest, so that they became outcastes; through affection he elevated Triśanku, when forsaken by his relations, to heaven, where he remained fixed with his head downwards in the southern heavens; (191) . . . . he changed the troublesome nymph Rambhā, known as Panchachūḍā, by his curse into a form of stone; he occasioned Vaśishṭha through fear to bind and throw himself into the river, though he emerged thence unbound;" and performed other deeds calculated to excite astonishment. Yudhishṭhira ends by enquiring, "how this Kshattriya became a Brāhman without transmigrating into another body" (197. Dehāntaram anāsādya kathaṁ sa brāhmaṇo 'bhavat |). In answer to this question, Bhīshma (verses 200 ff.) deduces the descent of Viśvāmitra from Ajamīḍha, of the race of Bharata, who was a pious priest, or sacrificer (yajvā dharma-bhṛitāṁ varaḥ), the father of Jahnu, who again was the progenitor of Kuśika, the father of Gādhi; and narrates the same legend of the birth of Viśvāmitra, which has been already extracted from the Vishṇu Purāṇa (see above, pp. 349 f.). The conclusion of the story as here given is, that the wife of Ṛichīka bore Jamadagni, while "the wife of Gādhi, by the grace of the rishi, gave birth to Viśvāmitra, who was a Brāhman rishi, and an utterer of the Veda; who, though a Kshattriya, attained to Brāhmanhood, and became afterwards also the founder of a Brāhman race" (246. Viśvāmitraṁ chājanayad Gādhi-bhāryyā yaśasvinī | ṛisheḥ prasādād rājendra brahmarshim brahmavādinam | tato brāhmaṇatāṁ yāto Viśvāmitro mahātapaḥ | kshattriyaḥ so 'py atha tathā brahma-vaṁśasya kārakaḥ |).

of which the members are detailed,[208] including the great rishi Kapila. In regard to the mode in which Viśvāmitra was transformed from a Kshattriya into a Brāhman, we are only told that he belonged to the former class, and that "Ṛichīka infused into him this exalted Brāhmanhood" (259. Tathaiva kshattriyo rājan Viśvāmitro mahātapāḥ | Ṛichīkenāhitam brahma param etad Yudhishṭhira |).

This version of the story is different from all those preceding ones which enter into any detail, as it makes no mention of Viśvāmitra having extorted the Brahmanical rank from the gods by force of his austerities; and ascribes his transformation to a virtue communicated by the sage Ṛichīka.

I have above (p. 296 f.) quoted a passage from Manu on the subject of submissive and refractory monarchs, in which reference is made to Viśvāmitra's elevation to the Brahmanical order. Nothing is there said of his conflict with Vaśishṭha, or of his arduous penances, endured with the view of conquering for himself an equality with his rival. On the contrary, it is to his submissiveness, i.e. to his dutiful recognition of the superiority of the Brāhmans, that his admission into their class is ascribed. Kullūka, indeed, explains the word submissiveness (vinăya) to mean virtue in general; but the contrast which is drawn between Pṛithu, Manu, and Viśvāmitra, on the one hand, and Vena, Nahusha, Sudās, and Nimi, the resisters of Brāhmanical prerogatives (as all the legends declare them to have been), on the other, makes it tolerably evident that the merit which Manu means to ascribe to Viśvāmitra is that of implicit submission to the spiritual authority of the Brāhmans.

Sect. XIII.—Legend of Saudāsa.

In the reign of Mitrasaha, also called Saudāsa, and Kalmāshapāda, the son of Sudāsa, and the descendant of Triśanku in the twenty-second generation (see p. 337, above), we still find Vaśishṭha figuring in the legend, as the priest of that monarch, and causing him, by an imprecation, to become a cannibal, because he had, under the influence of a delusion, offered the priest human flesh to eat. I shall not extract the version of the story given in the Vishṇu Purāṇa in detail (Wilson, V.P. vol. iii. pp. 304 ff.), as it does not in any way illustrate the rivalry of Vasishṭha and Viśvāmitra.

[208] The names in this list differ considerably from those given above, p. 352, from the Harivaṁśa.

The Mahābhārata gives the following variation of the history (Ādi-parvan, sect. 176): "Kalmāshapāda was a king of the race of Ikshvāku. Viśvāmitra wished to be employed by him as his officiating priest; but the king preferred Vaśishṭha" (verse 6699. Akāmayat taṁ yājyārthe Viśvāmitraḥ pratāpavān | sa tu rājā mahātmānaṁ Vaśishṭham ṛishi-sattamam |). It happened, however, that the king went out to hunt, and after having killed a large quantity of game, he became very much fatigued, as well as hungry and thirsty. Meeting Śaktri, the eldest of Vaśishṭha's hundred sons, on the road, he ordered him to get out of his way. The priest civilly replied (verse 6703): Mama panthāḥ mahārāja dharmaḥ esha sanātanaḥ | rājnā sarveshu dharmeshu deyaḥ panthāḥ dvijātaye | "The path is mine, o king; this is the immemorial law; in all observances the king must cede the way to the Brāhman." Neither party would yield, and the dispute waxing warmer, the king struck the muni with his whip. The muni, resorting to the usual expedient of offended sages, by a curse doomed the king to become a man-eater. "It happened that at that time enmity existed between Viśvāmitra and Vaśishṭha on account of their respective claims to be priest to Kalmāshapāda" (verse 6710. Tato yājya-nimittaṁ tu Viśvāmitra-Vaśishṭhayoḥ | vairam āsīt tadā taṁ tu Viśvāmitro 'nvapadyata |). Viśvāmitra had followed the king; and approached while he was disputing with Śaktri. Perceiving, however, the son of his rival Vaśishṭha, Viśvāmitra made himself invisible, and passed them, watching his opportunity. The king began to implore Śaktri's clemency: but Viśvāmitra wishing to prevent their reconciliation, commanded a Rākshasa (a man-devouring demon) to enter into the king. Owing to the conjoint influence of the Brāhman-rishi's curse, and Viśvāmitra's command, the demon obeyed the injunction. Perceiving that his object was gained, Viśvāmitra left things to take their course, and absented himself from the country. The king having happened to meet a hungry Brāhman, and sent him, by the hand of his cook (who could procure nothing else), some human flesh to eat, was cursed by him also to the same effect as by Śaktri. The curse, being now augmented in force, took effect, and Śaktri himself was the first victim, being eaten up by the king. The same fate

befell all the other sons of Vaśishṭha at the instigation of Viśvāmitra: 6736. S'aktrim tam tu mṛitam dṛishṭvā Viśvāmitraḥ punaḥ punaḥ | Vaśishṭhasyaiva putreshu tad rakshaḥ sandideśa ha | sa tān S'aktry-avarān putrān Vaśishṭhasya mahātmanaḥ | bhakshayāmāsa sankruddhaḥ siṁhaḥ kshudra-mṛigān iva | Vaśishṭho ghātitān śrutvā Viśvāmitreṇa tān sutān | dhārayāmāsa taṁ śokam mahādrir iva medinīm | chakre chātma-vināśāya buddhiṁ sa muni-sattamaḥ | na tv eva Kauśikochchedam mene matimatāṁ varaḥ | 6740. Sa Meru-kūṭād ātmānam mumocha bhagavān ṛishiḥ | gires tasya śilāyāṁ tu tūla-rāśāv ivāpatat | na mamāra cha pātena sa yadā tena Pāṇḍava | tadā 'gnim iddham bhagavān saṁviveśa mahāvane | taṁ tadā susamiddho 'pi na dadāha hutāśanaḥ | dīpyamāno 'py amitra-ghna śīto 'gnir abhavat tataḥ | sa samudram abhiprekshya śokāvishṭo mahāmuniḥ | baddhvā kaṇṭhe śilāṁ gurvīṁ nipapāta tadā 'mbhasi | sa samudror-mi-vegena sthale nyasto mahāmuniḥ | jagāma sa tataḥ khinnaḥ punar evāśramam prati | 6745. Tato dṛishṭvā "śrama-padaṁ rahitaṁ taiḥ sutair muniḥ | nirjagāma suduḥkhārttaḥ punar apy āśramāt tataḥ | so 'paśyat saritam pūrṇām prāvṛit-kāle navāmbhasā | vṛikshān bahuvidhān pārtha harantīṁ tīra-jān bahūn | atha chintāṁ samāpede punaḥ kaurava-nandana | "ambhasy asyāṁ nimajjeyam" iti duḥkha-samanvitaḥ | tataḥ pāśais tadā "tmānam gāḍham baddhvā mahāmuniḥ | tasyāḥ jale mahānadyāḥ nimamajja suduḥkhitaḥ | atha chhittvā nadī pāśāṁs tasyāri-bala-sūdana | sthala-sthaṁ tam ṛishim kṛitvā vipāśaṁ samavāsṛijat | 6750. Uttatāra tataḥ pāśair vimuktaḥ sa mahān ṛishiḥ | Vipāśeti cha nāmāsyāḥ nadyāś chakre mahān ṛishiḥ | . . . . 6752. Dṛishṭvā sa punar evarshir nadīṁ haimavatīṁ tadā | chandragrāhavatīm bhīmāṁ tasyāḥ srotasy apātayat | sā tam agni-samaṁ vipram anuchintya sarid varā | śatadhā vidrutā yasmāch śatadrur iti viśrutā | . . . . 6774. Saudāso 'ham mahābhāga yājyas te muni-sattama | asmin kāle yad iṣhṭaṁ te brūhi kiṁ karavāṇi te | Vaśishṭha uvācha | vṛittam etad yathā-kālaṁ gachha rājyam praśādhi vai | brāhmaṇāṁs tu manushyendra mā 'vamaṁsthāḥ kadāchana | rājā uvācha | nāvamaṁsye mahābhāga kadāchid brāhmaṇarshabhān | tvan-nideśe sthitaḥ samyak pūjayishyāmy ahaṁ dvijān | Ikshvākūṇāṁ cha yenāham anṛiṇaḥ syāṁ dvijottama | tat tvattaḥ prāptum ichchhāmi sarva-veda-vidāṁ vara | apatyam īpsitam mahyaṁ dātum arhasi sattama | "Perceiving S'aktri to be dead, Viśvāmitra again and again incited the Rākshasa against the sons of Vaśishṭha; and accordingly the furious demon devoured those of his sons who were younger than S'aktri, as a lion eats up the small beasts of the forest.[209] On hearing of the destruction of his sons by Viśvāmitra, Vaśishṭha supported his affliction, as the great mountain sustains the earth. He meditated his own destruction, but never thought of exterminating the Kauśikas. 6740. This divine sage hurled himself from the summit of Meru, but fell upon the rocks as if on a heap of cotton. Escaping alive from his fall, he entered a glowing fire in the forest; but the fire, though fiercely blazing, not only failed to burn him, but seemed perfectly cool. He next threw himself into the sea with a heavy stone attached to his neck; but was cast up by the waves on the dry land. He then went home to his hermitage; (6745) but seeing it empty and desolate, he was again overcome by grief and went out; and seeing the river Vipāśā which was swollen by the recent rains, and sweeping along many trees torn from its banks, he conceived the design of drowning himself into its waters: he acccordingly tied himself firmly with cords, and threw himself in; but the river severing his bonds, deposited him unbound (vipāśa) on dry land; whence the name of the stream, as imposed by the sage.[210] 6752. He afterwards saw and threw himself into the dreadful Śatadru (Sutlej), which was full of alligators, etc., and derived its name from rushing away in a hundred directions on seeing the Brāhman brilliant as fire. In consequence of this he was once more stranded; and seeing he could not kill himself, he went back to his hermitage. After roaming about over many mountains and countries, he was followed home by his daughter-in-law Adṛiśyantī, Śaktri's widow, from whose womb he heard a sound of the recitation of the Vedas, as she was pregnant with a child, which, when born, received the name of Parāśara, verse 6794. Learning from her that there was [209] See above (pp. 327 ff.), the passages quoted from the Brāhmaṇas, about the slaughter of Vasishṭha's sons. In the Panchaviṁśa Br. (cited by Prof. Weber, Ind St. i. 32) Vasishṭha is spoken of as puttra-hataḥ.

[210] The Nirukta, ix. 26, after giving other etymologies of the word Vipāś, adds a verse: Pāśāḥ asyāṁ vyapāśyanta Vasishṭhasya mumūrshataḥ | tasmād Vipāḍ uchyate pūrvam āsīd Urunjirā | "In it the bonds of Vasishṭha were loosed, when he was on the point of death: hence it is called Vipāś. It formerly bore the name of Urunjirā." It does not appear whether or not this verse is older than the Mahābhārata. On this text of the Nirukta, Durga (as quoted by Prof. Müller, Rig-veda, ii. Pref. p. liv.) annotates: Vasishṭhaḥ kila nimamajja asyām mumūrshuḥ puttra-maraṇa-śokārttaḥ pāśair ātmānam baddhvā | tasya kila te pāśāḥ asyāṁ vyapāśyanta vyamuchyanta udakena | "Vasishṭha plunged into it, after binding himself with bonds, wishing to die when grieved at the death of his sons. In it (the river) his bonds were loosed by the water."

thus a hope of his line being continued, he abstained from further attempts on his own life. King Kalmāshapāda, however, whom they encountered in the forest, was about to devour them both, when Vaśishṭha stopped him by a blast from his mouth; and sprinkling him with water consecrated by a holy text, he delivered him from the curse by which he had been affected for twelve years. The king then addressed Vaśishṭha thus: "'Most excellent sage, I am Saudāsa, whose priest thou art: what can I do that would be pleasing to thee?' Vaśishṭha answered: 'This which has happened has been owing to the force of destiny: go, and rule thy kingdom; but, o monarch, never contemn the Brāhmans.' The king replied: 'Never shall I despise the most excellent Brāhmans; but submitting to thy commands I shall pay them all honour. And I must obtain from thee the means of discharging my debt to the Ikshvākus. Thou must give me the offspring which I desire.'" Vaśishṭha promised to comply with his request. They then returned to Ayodhyā. And Vaśishṭha having been solicited by the king to beget an heir to the throne[211] (verse 6787. Rājnas tasyājnayā devī Vaśishṭham upachakrame | maharshiḥ saṁvidaṁ kritvā sambabhūva tayā saha | devyā divyena vidhinā Vaśishṭho bhagavān ṛishiḥ), the queen became pregnant by him, and brought forth a son at the end of twelve years. This extraordinary proceeding, so contrary to all the recognized rules of morality, is afterwards (verses 6888–6912) explained to have been necessitated by the curse of a Brāhmaṇī, whose husband Kalmāshapāda had devoured when in the forest, and who had doomed him to die if he should attempt to become a father, and had foretold that Vaśishṭha should be the instrument of propagating his race (verse 6906: Patnīm ṛitāv anuprāpya sadyas tyakshyasi jīvitam | yasya charsher Vaśishṭhasya tvayā putrāḥ vināśitāḥ | tena sangamya te bhāryyā tanayaṁ janayishyati).[212]

[211] The same story is told in the Vishṇu Pur. iv., 4, 38 (Wilson, vol. 3, p. 310).

[212] This incident is alluded to in the Ādip., section 122. It is there stated that in the olden time women were subject to no restraint, and incurred no blame for abandoning their husbands and cohabiting with anyone they pleased (verse 4719. Anāvṛitāḥ kila purā striyaḥ āsan varānane | kāma-chāra-vihāriṇyaḥ svatantrāś chāru-hāsini | tāsāṁ vyuchcharamāṇānāṁ kaumārāt subhage patīn | nādharmo 'bhūd varārohe sa hi dharmaḥ purā 'bhavat, compare verse 4729). A stop was, however, put to this practice by Uddālaka S'vetaketu, whose indignation was on one occasion aroused by a Brāhman taking his mother by the hand, and inviting her to go away with him, although his father, in whose presence this occurred, informed him that

The Mahābhārata has a further legend, regarding Viśvāmitra's jealousy of Vaśishṭha, which again exhibits the former in a very odious light, and as destitute of the moral dispositions befitting a saint, while Vaśishṭha is represented as manifesting a noble spirit of disinterestedness and generosity.

Śalyap. 2360. Viśvāmitrasya viprarsher Vaśishṭhasya cha Bhārata | bhṛiśaṁ vairam abhūd rājaṁs tapaḥ-sparddhā-kṛitam mahat | āśramo vai Vaśishṭhasya sthāṇu-tīrthe 'bhavad mahān | pūrvataḥ pārśvataś chāsīd Viśvāmitrasya dhīmataḥ | . . . . 2366. Viśvāmitra-Vaśishṭhau tāv ahany ahani Bhārata | sparddhāṁ tapaḥ-kṛitāṁ tīvrām chakratus tau tapo-dhanau | tattrāpy adhika-santapto Viśvāmitro mahāmuniḥ | dṛishṭvā tejo Vaśishṭhasya chintām ati jagāma ha | tasya buddhir iyaṁ hy āsīd dharma-nityasya Bhārata | iyaṁ Sarasvatī tūrṇam mat-samīpaṁ tapo-dhanam | ānayishyati vegena Vaśishṭhaṁ japatāṁ varam | ihāgataṁ dvija-śreshṭhaṁ hanishyāmi na saṁśayaḥ | 2370. Evaṁ niśchitya bhagavān Viśvāmitro mahāmuniḥ | sasmāra saritaṁ śreshṭhāṁ krodha-saṁrakta-lochanaḥ | sā dhyātā muninā tena vyākulatvaṁ jagāma ha | jajne chainam mahāvīryyam mahākopaṁ cha bhāvinī | tataḥ enaṁ vepamānā vivarṇā prāñjalis tadā | upatasthe muni-varaṁ Viśvāmitraṁ Sarasvatī | hata-vīrā yathā nārī sā 'bhavad duḥkhitā bhṛiśam | brūhi kiṁ karavāṇīti provācha muni-sattamam | tām uvācha muniḥ kruddho "Vaśishṭhaṁ śīghram ānaya | yāvad enaṁ nihanmy adya" tach chhrutvā vyathitā nadī | 2375. Prāñjaliṁ tu tataḥ kṛitvā puṇḍarīka-nibhekshaṇā |

there was no reason for his displeasure, as the custom was one which had prevailed from time immemorial (verse 4726. S'vetaketoḥ kila purā samaksham mātaram pituḥ | jagrāha brāhmaṇaḥ pāṇau "gachchhāva" iti chābravīt | ṛishis-puttras tataḥ kopaṁ chakārāmarsha-choditaḥ | mātaraṁ tāṁ tathā dṛishṭvā nīyamānām balād iva | kruddhaṁ taṁ tu pitā dṛishṭvā S'vetaketum uvāchha ha | "mā tāta kopaṁ kārshīs tvam esha dharmaḥ sanātanaḥ | "). But S'vetaketu could not tolerate the practice, and introduced the existing rule (verse 4730. *Ṛishi-puttro 'tha taṁ dharmaṁ S'vetaketur na chakshame | chakāra chaiva maryādām imāṁ strī-puṁsayor bhuvi | *). A wife and a husband indulging in promiscuous intercourse were therefore thenceforward guilty of sin. But a wife, when appointed by her husband to raise up seed to him (by having intercourse with another man), is in like manner guilty if she refuse (4734. *Patyā niyuktā yā chaiva patnī puttrārtham eva cha | na karishyati tasyāś cha bhavishyati tad eva hi | iti tena purā bhīru maryādā sthāpitā balāt | *). Pāṇḍu, the speaker, then proceeds to give an instance of the latter procedure in the case of Madayantī, the wife of Saudāsa, who, by her husband's command, visited Vaśishṭha for the purpose in question (4736. *Saudāsena cha rambhoru niyuktā puttra-janmani | Madayantī jagāmarshiṁ Vaśishṭham iti naḥ śrutam | *). Compare what is said above, p. 224, of Angiras, and in pp. 232 and 233 of Dīrgatamas or Dīrghatapas; and see p. 423, below.

prākampata bhṛiśam bhītā vāyunevāhatā latā | ... 2377. Sā tasya vachanaṁ śrutvā jñātvā pāpa-chikīrshitam | Vaśishṭhasya prabhāvaṁ cha jānanty apratimam bhuvi | sā 'dhigamya Vaśishṭhaṁ cha imam artham achodayat | yad uktā saritām śreshṭhā Viśvāmitreṇa dhīmatā | ubhayoḥ śāpayor bhītā vepamānā punaḥ punaḥ | ... 2380. Tāṁ kṛiśāṁ cha vivarṇāṁ cha dṛishṭvā chintā-samanvitām | uvācha rājan dharmātmā Vaśishṭho dvipadāṁ varaḥ | Vaśishṭhaḥ uvācha | "pāhy ātmānaṁ sarich-chhreṣṭhe vaha māṁ śīghra-gāmini | Viśvāmitraḥ śaped hi tvām mā kṛithās tvaṁ vichāraṇam" | tasya tad vachanaṁ śrutvā kṛipā-śīlasya sā sarit | chintayāmāsa Kauravya kiṁ kṛitvā sukṛitam bhavet | tasyāś chintā samutpannā "Vaśishṭho mayy atīva hi | kṛitavān hi dayāṁ nityam tasya kāryyaṁ hitam mayā" | atha kūle svake rājan japantam ṛishi-sattamam | juhvānaṁ Kauśikam prekshya sarasvaty abhyachintayat | 2385. "Idam antaram" ity eva tataḥ sā saritām varā | kūlāpahāram akarot svena vegena sā sarit | tena kūlāpahāreṇa Maitrāvaruṇir auhyata | ūhyamānaḥ sa tushṭāva tadā rājan Sarasvatīm | Pitāmahasya sarasaḥ pravṛittā 'si Sarasvati | vyāptaṁ chedaṁ jagat sarvaṁ tavaivambhobhir uttamaiḥ | tvam evākāśa-gā devi megheshūtsṛijase payaḥ | sarvāś chāpas tvam eveti tvatto vayam adhīmahi | pushṭir dyutis tathā kīrttiḥ siddhir buddhir umā tathā | tvam eva vāṇī svāhā tvaṁ tavāyattam idaṁ jagat | 2390. Tvam eva sarva-bhūteshu vasasīha chaturvidhā | .... 2392. Tam ānītaṁ Sarasvatyā dṛishṭvā kopa-samanvitāḥ | athānveshat praharaṇaṁ Vaśishṭhānta-karaṁ tadā | taṁ tu kruddham abhiprekshya brahma-badhyā-bhayād nadī | apovāha Vaśishthaṁ tu prāchīṁ diśam atandritā | ubhayoḥ kurvatī vākyaṁ vanchayitvā cha Gādhijam tato 'pavāhitaṁ dṛishṭvā Vaśishṭham ṛishi-sattamam | 2395. Abravīd duḥkha-sankruddho Viśvāmitro hy amarshaṇaḥ | "yasmād māṁ tvaṁ sarick-chhreshṭhe vanchayitvā punargatā | soṇitaṁ vaha kalyāṇi raksho-'gra-maṇi-sammatam" | tataḥ Sarasvatī śaptā Viśvāmitreṇa dhīmatā | avahach chhoṇitonmiśraṁ toyaṁ saṁvatsāraṁ tadā | .... 2401. Athājagmus tato rājan rākshasās tattra Bhārata | tattra te śoṇitaṁ sarve pivantaḥ sukham āsate | .... 2402. Nṛityantaś cha hasantaś cha yathā svarga-jitas tathā | .... 2407. tān dṛishṭvā rākshasān rājan munayaḥ saṁśita-vratāḥ | paritrāṇe Sarasvatyāḥ paraṁ yatnam prachakrire |

"2360. There existed a great enmity, arising from rivalry in their austerities, between Viśvāmitra and the Brāhman rishi Vaśishṭha. Vaśishṭha had an extensive hermitage in Sthāṇutīrtha, to the east of which was Viśvāmitra's . . . . 2366. These two great ascetics were every day exhibiting intense emulation in regard to their respective austerities. But Viśvāmitra, beholding the might of Vaśishṭha, was the most chagrined; and fell into deep thought. The idea of this sage, constant in duty (!), was the following: 'This river Sarasvatī will speedily bring to me on her current the austere Vaśishṭha, the most eminent of all mutterers of prayers. When that most excellent Brāhman has come, I shall most assuredly kill him.' 2370. Having thus determined, the divine sage Viśvāmitra, his eyes reddened by anger, called to mind the chief of rivers. She being thus the subject of his thoughts, became very anxious, as she knew him to be very powerful and very irascible. Then trembling, pallid, and with joined hands, the Sarasvatī stood before the chief of munis. Like a woman whose husband has been slain, she was greatly distressed; and said to him, 'What shall I do?' The incensed muni replied, 'Bring Vaśishṭha hither speedily, that I may slay him.' 2375. The lotus-eyed goddess, joining her hands, trembled in great fear, like a creeping plant agitated by the wind." . . . . Viśvāmitra, however, although he saw her condition, repeated his command. 2377. "The Sarasvatī, who knew how sinful was his design, and that the might of Vaśishṭha was unequalled, went trembling, and in great dread of being cursed by both the sages, to Vaśishṭha, and told him what his rival had said. 2380. Vaśishṭha seeing her emaciated, pale, and anxious, spoke thus: 'Deliver thyself, o chief of rivers; carry me unhesitatingly to Viśvāmitra, lest he curse thee.' Hearing these words of the merciful sage, the Sarasvatī considered how she could act most wisely. She reflected, 'Vaśishṭha has always shown me great kindness; I must seek his welfare.' Then observing the Kauśika sage [so in the text, but does not the sense require Vaśishṭha?] praying and sacrificing on her brink, she regarded (2385) that as a good opportunity, and swept away the bank by the force of her current. In this way the son of Mitra and Varuṇa (Vaśishṭha)[213] was carried down; and while he was being borne along, he thus celebrated the river: 'Thou, o Sarasvatī, issuest from the lake of Brahmā, and pervadest the whole world with thy excellent streams. Residing in the sky, thou dischargest water into the clouds. Thou alone art all waters. By thee we study.' [Here the river Sarasvatī is identified with Sarasvatī the goddess of speech.][214] 'Thou art nourishment, radiance, fame, perfection, intellect, light. Thou art speech; thou art Svāhā; this world is subject to thee. 2390. Thou, in fourfold form, dwellest in all creatures.' . . . . 2392. Beholding Vaśishṭha brought near by the Sarasvatī, Viśvāmitra searched for a weapon with which to make an end of him. Perceiving his anger, and dreading lest Brahmanicide should ensue, the river promptly carried away Vaśishṭha in an easterly direction; thus fulfilling the commands of both sages, but eluding Viśvāmitra. Seeing Vaśishṭha so carried away, (2395) Viśvāmitra, impatient, and enraged by vexation, said to her: 'Since thou, o chief of rivers, hast eluded me, and hast receded, roll in waves of blood acceptable to the chief of demons," [which are fabled to gloat on blood]. "The Sarasvatī, being thus cursed, flowed for a year in a stream mingled with blood. . . . 2401. Rākshasas came to the place of pilgrimage, where Vaśishṭha had been swept away, and revelled in drinking to satiety the bloody stream in security, dancing and laughing, as if they had conquered heaven." Some rishis who arrived at the spot some time after were horrified to see the blood-stained water, and the Rākshasas quaffing it, and (2407) "made the most strenuous efforts to rescue the Sarasvatī." After learning from her the cause of the pollution of her waters, they propitiated Mahādeva by the most various austerities, and thus obtained the restoration of the river to her pristine purity (2413 ff.).

[213] See above, pp. 316 and 320 f.

We have another reference to the connection of the families of Sudās and Vaśishṭha in the legend of Paraśurāma,[215] the destroyer of the Kshattriyas, in the 49th section of the Śāntiparvan of the Mahābhārata. Sarvakarman, a descendant of Sudās, is there mentioned as one of those [214] See the remarks on Sarasvatī in my "Contributions to a knowledge of the Vedic Theogony and Mythology No. II.," in the Journ. R. A. S., for 1866, pp. 18 ff.

[215] Paraśurāma was the son of Jamadagnī, regarding whose birth, as well as that of Viśvāmitra and the incarnation of Indra in the person of his father Gādhi, the same legend as has been already given above, p, 349 ff, is repeated at the commencement of the story referred to in the text. In discoursing with his wife Satyavatī about the exchange of her own and her mother's messes, Ṛichīka tells her, verse 1741: Brahmabhūtaṁ hi sakalam pitus tava kulam bhavet | "All the family of thy father (Gādhi) shall be Brahmanical;" and Vāsudeva, the narrator of the the legend, says, verse 1745: Viśvāmitraṁ cha dāyādaṁ Gādhiḥ Kuśikanandanaḥ | yam prāpa brahmasammitaṁ viśvair brahmaguṇair yutam | "And Gādhi begot a son, Viśvāmitra, whom he obtained equal to a Brāhman, and possessed of all Brahmanical qualities."

Kshattriyas who had been preserved from the general massacre by Parāśara, grandson of Vaśishṭha: verse 1792. Tathā 'nukampamānena yajvanā 'mita-tejasā | Parāśareṇa dāyādaḥ Saudāsasyābhirakshitaḥ | sarva-karmāṇi kurute śūdra-vat tasya vai dvijaḥ | Sarvakarmety abhikhyātaḥ sa māṁ rakshatu pārthivaḥ | "Sarvakarman, the son of Saudāsa, was preserved by the tender-hearted priest Paraśara, who performed, though a Brāhman, all menial offices for him, like a Śūdra; whence the prince's name;—may this king protect me (the earth)." The same book of the Mahābhārata, when recording a number of good deeds done to Brāhmans, has also the following allusion to Mitrasaha and Vaśishṭha: verse 8604. Rājā Mitrasahaś chāpi Vaśishṭhāya mahātmane | Damayantīm priyām dattvā tayā saha divaṁ gataḥ | "King Mitrasaha, having bestowed his dear Damayantī on Vaśishṭha, ascended to heaven along with her."[216]

The same passage has two further allusions to Vaśishṭha, which, though unconnected with our present subject, may be introduced here. In verse 8591 it is said: Rantidevaś cha Sāṅkṛityo Vaśishṭhāya mahātmane | apaḥ pradāya śītoshṇāḥ nāka-pṛishṭhe mahīyate | "Rantideva, son of Sankṛiti, who gave Vaśishṭha tepid water, is exalted to the heavenly regions." (See the Bhāg. Pur. ix. 21, 2–18, where the various acts of self-sacrifice practised by this prince are celebrated:) It is said of Vaśishṭha in verse 8601: Avarshati cha Parjanye sarva-bhūtāni bhūta-kṛit | Vaśishṭho jīvayāmāsa prajāpatir ivāparaḥ | "When Parjanya failed to send rain, the creative Vaśishṭha, like Brahmā, gave life to all beings."

Vaśishṭha, in short, is continually reappearing in the Mahābhārata. I will here adduce but one other passage. In the Śāntiparvan, verses 10,118 ff., it is said: Tasya Vṛittrārdditasyātha mohaḥ āsīch chhatakratoḥ | rathantareṇa taṁ tattra Vaśishṭhaḥ samabodhayat | Vaśishṭhaḥ uvācha | deva-śreshṭho 'si devendra daityāsura-nibarhaṇa | trailokya-bala-

[216] This appears to refer to the story told above, p. 418 ff., of Kalmāshapāda (who was the same as Mitrasaha), allowing Vasishṭha to be the agent in propagating the royal race; for both there (v. 6910) and in the Vishṇu Pur. (Wilson, vol. iii., pp. 308 and 310), the name of the queen is said to have been Madayantī, which is probably the right reading here also, the first two letters only having been transposed. If so, however, it is to be observed that a quite different turn is given to the story here, where it is represented as a meritorious act on the king's part, and as a favour to Vaśishṭha, that the queen was given up to him; whilst, according to the other account, the king's sole object in what he did was to get progeny.

saṁyuktaḥ kasmāch chhakra nishīdasi | esha Brahmā cha Vishṇuś cha S'ivaś chaiva jagat-patiḥ | Somaś cha bhagavān devaḥ sarve cha paramarshayaḥ | mā kārshīḥ kaśmalaṁ S'akra kaśchid evetaro yathā | āryyāṁ yuddhe matiṁ kṛitvā jahi śatrūn surādhipa | "By reciting the Rathantāra, Vaśishṭha encouraged Indra, when he had become bewildered and distressed in his conflict with Vrittra, saying to him, 'Thou art the chief of the gods, o slayer of the Daityas and Asuras, possessing all the strength of the three worlds: wherefore, Indra, dost thou despond? There are here present Brahmā, Vishṇu, S'iva, the divine Soma, and all the chief rishis. Faint not, o Indra, like an ordinary being. Assume a heroic spirit for the fight, and slay thine enemies, etc.'" Strength was thus infused into Indra.

In a later work, the Rāja Taranginī, Book IV. verses 619–655 (pp. 188 ff. and note, pp. 521 and 522, of Troyer's edition, vol. i. and vol. ii. 189, 469, note), a curious echo of these old legends is found still reverberating. A story is there told of a king Jayāpīḍa who oppressed his people, and persecuted the Brāhmans, and was eventually destroyed by them in a miraculous manner. He is compared to Saudāsa in verse 625: Sa Saudāsaḥ ivāneka-loka-prāṇāpahārakṛit | astutya-kṛitya-sauhityaṁ svapne 'pi na samāyayau | "Like Saudāsa, depriving many persons of their lives, he was not satiated with wicked deeds even in his dreams." One of the Brāhmans stood up on behalf of the rest to remonstrate: Āha sma "Viśvāmitro vā Vaśishṭho vā taponidhiḥ | tvam Agastyo 'thavā kiṁ stha" iti darpeṇa taṁ nṛipaḥ | . . . . bhavān yatra Hariśchandras Triśaṅkur Nahusho 'pi vā | Viśvāmitra-mukhebhyo 'haṁ tattraiko bhavituṁ kshamaḥ | vihasyovācha taṁ rājā "Viśvāmitrādikopataḥ | Hariśchandrāyo nashṭās tvayi kruddhe tu kim bhavet" | pāṇinā tāḍayann ūrviṁ tataḥ kruddho 'bhyadhād dvijaḥ | "mayi kruddhe kshaṇād eva brahma-daṇḍaḥ pated na kim" | tach chhrutvā vihasan rājā kopād brāhmaṇam abravīt | "patatu brahma-daṇḍo 'sau kim adyāpi vilambate" | nanv ayam patito jālmety atha vipreṇa bhāshite | rājñaḥ kanaka-daṇḍo 'nge vitāna-skhalito 'patat | "The king haughtily asked him: 'Art thou Viśvāmitra, or Vaśishṭha, so rich in devotion? or Agastya? or what art thou?' . . . . The Brāhman answered, swelling with indignation: 'Just as thou art a Hariśchandra, a Triśanku, or a Nahusha, so too have I power to be a Viśvāmitra, or one of those other rishis.' The king answered with a smile of contempt: 'Hariśchandra and the rest perished by the wrath of Viśvāmitra and the other sages: but what will come of thy wrath?' The Brāhman angrily replied, smiting the ground with his hand, 'When I am incensed, shall not the Brahmanical bolt instantly descend?' The king retorted with an angry laugh: 'Let it descend; why does it not come down at once?' 'Has it not fallen, tyrant?' said the Brāhman; and he had no sooner spoken, than a golden beam fell from the canopy and smote the king," so that he became tortured by worms, and shortly after died; and went, as the story concludes, to hell.

Professor Lassen, who quotes the stories regarding Vasishṭha and Viśvāmitra (Ind. Alt. 2nd ed. i. 718 f.), makes the following remarks on their import:

"The legend of the struggle between Vaśishṭha and Viśvāmitra embraces two distinct points: one is the contest between the priests and warriors for the highest rank; the other is the temporary alienation of the Ikshvākus from their family priests. Vaśishṭha is represented as the exemplar of such a priest; and the story of Kalmāshapāda is related for the express purpose of showing by an example that the Ikshvākus, after they had retained him, were victorious, and fulfilled perfectly the duties of sacrifice (see above, p. 390): in his capacity of priest he continues to live on, and is the representative of his whole race. We may conclude from the legend that his descendants had acquired the position of family priests to the Ikshvākus, though neither he himself nor his son Śaktri belonged to their number. Triśanku is the first prince who forsook them, and had recourse to Viśvāmitra. His successor Ambarīsha received support from that personage, as well as from Ṛichīka, one of the Bhṛigus;—a family whose connection with the Kuśikas appears also in the story of Paraśurāma. The hostility between the Ikshvākus and the family of Vaśishṭha continued down to Kalmāshapāda. Viśvāmitra is represented as having intentionally fostered the alienation; while Vaśishṭha is described as forbearing (though he had the power) to annihilate his rival.

"The conflict between the two rivals with its motives and machinery is described in the forms peculiar to the fully developed epos. To this style of poetry is to be referred the wonder-working cow, which supplies all objects of desire. There is no ground for believing in any actual war with weapons between the contending parties, or in any participation of degraded Kshattriyas, or aboriginal tribes, in the contest; for all these things are mere poetical creations. Besides, the proper victory of Vasishṭha was not gained by arms, but by his rod. The legend represents the superiority of the Brāhmans as complete, since Viśvāmitra is forced to acknowledge the insufficiency of a warrior's power; and acquires his position as a Brāhman by purely Brahmanical methods.

"From Viśvāmitra are derived many of the sacerdotal families, which bear the common name of Kauśika, and to which many rishis famous in tradition belong. As there were also kings in this family, we have here an example of the fact that one of the old Vedic races became divided, and in later times belonged to both of the two higher castes. It appears impossible that any of the aboriginal tribes should have been among the descendants of Viśvāmitra's sons, as the legend represents; and the meaning of this account may therefore be that some of his sons and their descendants accepted the position of priests among these tribes, and are in consequence described as accursed."[217]

Sect. XIV.—Story from the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa about king Janaka becoming a Brāhman.

The Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa has the following account of a discussion between Janaka, king of Videha, and some Brāhmans:[218]

xi. 6, 2, 1. Janako ha vai Vaideho brāhmaṇair dhāvayadbhir samājagāma Śvetaketunā Āruṇeyena Somaśushmeṇa Sātyayajninā Yājnavalkyena | tān ha uvācha "kathaṁ katham agnihotram juhutha" iti | 2. Sa ha uvācha Śvetaketur Āruṇeyo "gharmāv eva samrāḍ aham ajasrau yaśasā visyandamanāv anyo 'nyasmin juhomi" iti | "kathaṁ tad" iti | ādityo vai gharmas taṁ sāyam agnau juhomi agnir vai gharmas tam pratar āditye juhomi" iti | "kiṁ sa bhavati yaḥ evaṁ juhoti" | "ajasraḥ eva śriyā yaśasā bhavaty etayoś cha devatayoḥ sāyujyaṁ salokatāṁ jayati" iti | 3. Atha ha uvācha Somaśushmaḥ Sātyayajniḥ "tejaḥ eva samrāḍ ahaṁ tejasi juhomi" iti | "kathaṁ tad" iti | "Ādityo vai tejas taṁ sāyam agnau juhomi | agnir vai tejas tam prātar āditye juhomi"

[217] See also Prof. Müller's Anc. Sansk. Lit., pp. 80 f., 383 f., 408, 413 ff., 485 f.

[218] This passage is referred to and translated by Prof. Müller, Anc. Sansk. Lit. pp. 421 ff.

iti | "kiṁ sa bhavati yaḥ evaṁ juhoti" iti | "tejasvī yaśasvy annādo bhavaty etayoś chaiva devatayoḥ sāyujyaṁ salokatāṁ jayati" iti | 4. Atha ha uvācha Yājnavalkyaḥ "yad aham agnim uddharāmy agnihotram eva tad udyachhāmi | ādityaṁ vai astaṁ yantam sarve devāḥ anuyanti | te me etam agnim uddhṛitaṁ dṛishṭvā upāvarttante atha aham pātrāṇi nir_ṇijya upavāpya āgnihotrīṁ dohayitvā paśyan paśyatas tarpayāmi" iti | tvaṁ nedishṭhaṁ yājnavalkya agnihotrasya amīmāṁsishṭhāḥ | dhenuśataṁ dadāmi" iti ha uvācha "na tv eva enayos tvam utkrāntiṁ na gatiṁ na pratishṭhāṁ na tṛiptiṁ na punarāvṛittiṁ na lokaṁ pratyuthāyinam" | ity uktvā ratham āsthāya pradhāvayān chakāra | 5. Te ha ūchur "ati vai no 'yaṁ rājanyabandhur avādīd hanta enam brahmodyam āhvayāmahai" iti | sa ha uvācha Yājnavalkyo "brāhmaṇāḥ vai vayaṁ smo rājanyabandhur asau yady amuṁ vayaṁ jayema kam ajaishma iti brūyāma atha yady asāv asmān jayed brāhmaṇān rājanyabandhur ajaishīd iti no brūyuḥ | mā idam ādṛiḍhvam" iti | tad ha asya jajnuḥ | atha ha Yājnavalkyo ratham āsthāya pradhāvayānchakāra taṁ ha anvājagāma | sa ha uvācha "agnihotraṁ Yājnavalkya veditum" iti | "agnihotraṁ samrāḍ" iti | 6. "Te vai ete āhutī hute utkrāmatas te antariksham āviśatas te antariksham eva āhavanīyaṁ kurvāte vāyuṁ samidham marīchīr eva śukrāṁ āhutiṁ te antarikshaṁ tarpayatas te tataḥ utkrāmataḥ | 7. Te divam āviśatas te divam eva āhavanīyaṁ kurvāte ādityaṁ samidhaṁ chandramasam eva śukrām āhutiṁ te divaṁ tarpayatas te tataḥ āvarttete | 8. Te imām āviśatas te imām eva āhavanīyaṁ kurvāte agniṁ samidham oshadhīr eva śukrām āhutiṁ te imāṁ tarpayatas te tataḥ utkrāmataḥ | 9. Te purusham āviśatas tasya mukham eva āhavanīyaṁ kurvāte jihvāṁ samidham annam eva śukrām āhutiṁ te purushaṁ tarpayataḥ | sa yaḥ evaṁ vidvān aśnāty agnihotram eva asya hutam bhavati | te tataḥ utkrāmataḥ | 10. Te striyam āviśatas tasyāḥ upastham eva āhavanīyaṁ kurvāte dhārakāṁ samidham (dhārakā ha vai nāma eshā | etayā ha vai Prajāpatiḥ prajāḥ dhārayānchakāra) retaḥ eva śukrām āhutiṁ te striyaṁ tarpayataḥ | sa yaḥ evaṁ vidvān mithunam upaity agnihotram eva asya hutam bhavati yas tataḥ putro jāyate sa lokaḥ pratyutthāyī | etad agnihotraṁ Yājnavalkya na ataḥ param asti" iti ha uvācha | tasmai Yājnavalkyo varaṁ dadau | sa ha uvācha "kāmapraśnaḥ eva me tvayi Yājnavalkya asad" iti | tato brahmā Janakaḥ āsa |

"Janaka of Videha met with some travelling Brāhmans, Śvetaketu

Aruṇeya, Somaśushma Sātyayajni, and Yājnavalkya, and said to them, 'How do ye respectively offer the agnihotra oblation?' 2. Śvetaketu replied, 'I, o monarch, in sacrificing, throw the one of the two eternal heats which pervade the world with their splendour into the other.' 'How is that done,' asked the king. (Ś. replied), 'Āditya (the sun) is one heat; in the evening I throw him into Agni (Fire). Agni is the other heat; in the morning I throw him into Āditya.' 'What' (enquired the king) 'does he become who thus sacrifices?' 'He acquires' (replied Ś.) 'perpetual prosperity and renown; conquers for himself an union with these two deities, and dwells in the same region as they.' 3. Then Somaśushma answered, 'I, o monarch, in sacrificing, throw light into light.' 'How is that done,' asked the king. 'The Sun" (answered S.) 'is light; in the evening I throw him into Fire: and Fire is light; in the morning I throw him into the Sun.' 'What' (enquired the king) 'does he become who thus sacrifices?' 'He becomes' (rejoined S.) 'luminous, and renowned, an eater of food, and conquers for himself an union with these two deities, and dwells in the same region as they.' 4. Then Yājnavalkya said, 'When I take up the fire I lift the agnihotra. All the gods follow the Sun when he sets; and when they see me take up the Fire, they come back to me. Then, after washing and putting down the vessels, and having the Agnihotra Cow milked, beholding them as they behold me, I satisfy them (with sacrificial food).' The king answered, 'Thou hast approached very close to a solution of the Agnihotra, o Yājnavalkya; I give thee a hundred milch-cows: but thou hast not discovered the ascent of these two (oblations), nor the course, nor the resting-place, nor the satisfaction, nor the return, nor the world where they reappear(?).' Having so spoken, Janaka mounted his car and drove away. 5. The Brāhmans then said amongst themselves, 'This Rājanya has surpassed us in speaking; come, let us invite him to a theological discussion.' Yājnavalkya, however, interposed, 'We are Brāhmans, and he a Rājanya; if we overcome him, we shall ask ourselves, whom have we overcome? but if he overcome us, men will say to us, a Rājanya has overcome Brāhmans. Do not follow this course.' They assented to his advice. Then Yājnavalkya mounted his car, and drove after the king; and came up to him. Janaka asked, 'is it to learn the agnihotra (that thou hast come), Yājnavalkya?' 'The agnihotra, o monarch,' said Y. 6. The king rejoined, 'These two oblations, when offered, ascend; they enter the air, they make the air their āhavanīya fire, the wind their fuel, the rays their bright oblation, they satisfy the air, and thence ascend. 7. They enter the sky, they make the sky their āhavanīya fire, the sun their fuel, the moon their bright oblation; they satisfy the sky, they return thence. 8. They enter this earth, they make this earth their āhavanīya fire, Agni their fuel, the plants their bright oblation; they satisfy the earth, they ascend thence. They enter man, they make his mouth their āhavanīya fire, his tongue their fuel, food their bright oblation; they satisfy man. (He who, thus knowing, eats, truly offers the agnihotra). 9. They ascend from him, they enter into woman [the details which follow are better left untranslated], they satisfy her. The man who, thus knowing, approaches his wife, truly offers the agnihotra. The son who is then born is the world of re-appearance. This is the agnihotra, o Yājnavalkya; there is nothing beyond this.' Y. offered the king the choice of a boon. He replied, 'Let me enquire of thee whatever I desire, o Yājnavalkya.' Henceforward Janaka was a Brāhmăn." [219]

By Brāhmăn in the last sentence we have, I presume, to understand a Brāhman. Even if it were taken to dignify a priest of the kind called Brāhmăn, the conclusion would be the same; as at the time when the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa was written, none but Brāhmans could officiate as priests.[220]

Janaka's name occurs frequently in the Mahābhārata. In the Vana-parvan of that poem (8089) he is called a rājarshi. In the Śānti-parvan, verse 6640, it is said: Atrāpy udāharantīmam itihāsam purātanam | gītaṁ Videha-rājena Janakena praśāmyatā | "anantaṁ vata me vittaṁ yasya me nāsti kinchana | Mithilāyām pradīptāyāṁ na me dahyati kinchana" | "They here relate an ancient story,—the words recited by Janaka the tranquil-minded king of Videha:

> 'Though worldly pelf I own no more,
> Of wealth I have a boundless store:
> While Mithilā the flames devour,
> My goods can all defy their power.'"

[219] The Commentator explains brahmā by brahmishṭhaḥ, "Most full of divine knowledge."

[220] Prof. Müller remarks in his article on Caste (Chips from a German Workshop, ii. 338): "That king Janaka of Videha possessed superior knowledge is acknowledged by one of the most learned among the Brahmans, by Yājnavalkya himself; and in the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, which is believed to have been the work of Yājnavalkya, it is said that king Janaka became a Brahman."

The same sentiment is ascribed to the same royal rishi in verse 7891 : Api cha bhavati Maithilena gītañ nagaram upāhitam agninā 'bhivīkshya | "na khalu mama hi dahyate 'ttra kinchit" svayam idam āha sma bhūmipālaḥ | "And these words were repeated by the king of Mithilā when he beheld the city enveloped in fire, 'nothing of mine is burnt here;' —so said the king himself."

Another "ancient story" of Janaka is related in verses 7882–7983 of the same book. It is there stated that this king was constantly engaged in thinking on matters connected with a future life; and that he had a hundred religious teachers to instruct him on different points of duty (verse 7884). He was, however, visited by the rishi Panchaśikha[221] (verses 7886, 7888), a pupil of Āsuri (verse 7890), who so confounded the king's hundred instructors by his reasoning, that they were abandoned by their pupil, who followed this new teacher (7898. Upetya śatam āchāryān mohayāmāsa hetubhiḥ | 7899. Janakas tv abhisañraktaḥ Kāpileyānudarśanāt | utsṛijya śatam āchāryyān pṛishṭhato 'nujagāma tam). Panchaśikha appears also, at verse 11839, as his instructor. At verse 10699 Janaka is again brought forward as receiving religious information from Parāśara; in verses 11545–11836 as being taught by the rishi Yājnavalkya the principles of the Yoga and Sānkhya philosophies; and in verses 11854–12043 as holding a conversation with a travelling female mendicant (bhikshukī), named Sulabhā, who sought to prove him, and to whom he declares himself to be a pupil of Panchaśikha (here said to belong to the family of Parāśara, verse 11875), and an adept in the systems just mentioned; and from whom, in answer to some reproaches he had addressed to her regarding her procedure, he learns that she belongs to the Rājanya class, like himself, of the family of the rājarshi Pradhāna, that she had obtained no suitable husband, and wandered about, following an ascetic life, and seeking final emancipation (verses 12033 ff.).

A further story in illustration of Janaka's indifference to worldly objects is told in the Āśvamedhikaparvan, verses 887 ff.

[221] See Prof. Wilson's Sānkhya-kārikā, p. 190; and Dr. Hall's Preface to his edition of the Sānkhya-pravachana-bhāshya, pp. 9 ff.

SECT. XV.—Other instances in which Brāhmans are said to have been instructed in divine knowledge by Kshattriyas.

Two other cases in which Brāhmans are recorded to have received instruction from Kshattriyas are thus stated by Professor Müller:[222]

"For a Kshattriya to teach the law was a crime (sva-dharmātikrama), and it is only by a most artificial line of argument that the dogmatic philosophers of the Mīmaṁsā school tried to explain this away. The Brāhmans seem to have forgotten that, according to their own Upanishads, Ajātaśatru, the king of Kāśi, possessed more knowledge than Gārgya, the son of Balāka, who was renowned as a reader of the Veda, and that Gārgya desired to become his pupil, though it was not right, as the king himself remarked, that a Kshatriya should initiate a Brāhman. They must have forgotten that Pravāhaṇa Jaivali, king of the Panchālas, silenced Śvetaketu Āruṇeya and his father, and then communicated to them doctrines which Kshatriyas only, but no Brāhmans, had ever known before." I subjoin two separate versions of each of these stories. The first is that of Ajātaśatru:

Kaushītakī Brāhmaṇa Upanishad, iv. 1. Atha ha vai Gārgyo Bālākir anūchānaḥ saṁspashṭaḥ āsa | so 'vasad Uśīnareshu savasan Matsyeshu Kuru-panchāleshu Kāśi-videheshv iti | sa ha Ajātaśatruṁ Kāśyam āvrajya uvācha "brahma te bravāṇi" iti | taṁ ha uvācha Ajātaśatruḥ "sahasraṁ dadmaḥ" iti "etasyāṁ vāchi | 'Janako Janakaḥ' iti vai u janāḥ dhāvanti" iti | . . . . 19. Tataḥ u ha Bālākis tūshṇīm āsa | taṁ ha uvācha Ajātaśatrur "etāvad nu Bālāke" iti | "etāvad" iti ha uvācha Bālākiḥ" | tam ha uvācha Ajātaśatrur "mṛishā vai khalu mā saṁvādayishṭhāḥ "brahma te bravāṇi" iti | yo vai Bālāke eteshām purushāṇāṁ karttā yasya vai tat karma sa vai veditavyaḥ" iti | tataḥ u ha Bālākiḥ samit-pāṇiḥ pratichakrame "upāyāni" iti | taṁ ha uvācha Ajātaśatruḥ "pratiloma-rūpam eva tad manye yat kshattriyo brāhmaṇam upanayeta ehi vy eva tvā jnapayishyāmi" iti | taṁ ha pāṇāv abhipadya pravavrāja |

"Now Gārgya Bālāki was renowned as a man well read in the Veda. He dwelt among the Uśīnaras, Matsyas, Kurus, Panchālas, Kāśis, and Videhas, travelling from place to place. He came to [222] Chips from a German Workshop, vol. ii. p. 338.

Ajātaśatru, the Kāśya, and said, 'Let me declare to thee divine knowledge.' Ajātaśatru said, 'We bestow on thee a thousand (cows) for this word.' Men run to us crying, 'Janaka, Janaka.'" The learned man accordingly addresses Ajātaśatru in a series of statements regarding the object of his own worship, but is silenced by the king's display of superior knowledge on every topic.[223] The story ends thus: 19. "Then the son of Balāka remained silent. Ajātaśatru said to him, 'Dost (thou know only) so much, o Bālāki.' 'Only so much,' he answered. The king rejoined, 'Thou hast vainly proposed to me, let me teach thee divine knowledge.' He, son of Balāka, who is the maker of these souls, whose work that is, — he is the object of knowledge.' Then the son of Balāka approached the king with fuel in his hand, and said, 'Let me attend thee (as thy pupil).' The king replied, 'I regard it as an inversion of the proper rule that a Kshattriya should initiate a Brāhman. (But) come, I will instruct thee. Then, having taken him by the hand, he departed."

Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, xiv. 5, 1, 1 (= Bṛihadāraṇyaka Upanishad, ii. 1, 1, p. 334 of Cal. edit.). Dṛiptabālākir ha anūchāno Gārgyaḥ āsa | sa ha uvācha Ajātaśatruṁ Kāśyam "brahma te bravāṇi" iti | sa uvācha Ajātaśatruḥ "sahasram etasyāṁ vāchi dadmaḥ 'Janako Janakaḥ' iti vai janāḥ dhāvanti" iti | . . . . 12. Sa ha tūshṇīm āsa Gārgyaḥ | 13. Sa ha uvācha Ajātaśatrur "etavad nu" iti | "etāvad hi" iti | "na etāvatā viditaṁ bhavati" iti | sa ha uvācha Gārgyaḥ "upa tvā ayāni" iti | 14. Sa ha uvācha Ajātaśatruḥ "pratilomaṁ vai tad yad brāhmaṇaḥ kshattriyam upeyād 'brahma me vakshyati' iti | vy eva tvā jñāpayishyāmi" iti | tam pāṇāv ādāya uttasthau |

"Dṛiptabālāki Gārgyya was well read in the Veda. He said to Ajātaśatru, the Kāśya, 'Let me declare to thee divine knowledge.' Ajātaśatra replied, 'We give thee a thousand (cows) for this word. Men run to me calling out, "Janaka, Janaka."' At the end of their conversation we are told: 12. "Gārgya remained silent. 13. Then Ajātaśatru asked him, '(Dost thou know) so much only?' 'Only so much,' he replied. 'But this,' rejoined Ajātaśatru, 'does not comprehend the whole of knowlege.' Then said Gārgya, 'Let me come to thee (as thy disciple).' Ajātasatru answered, 'This is an inversion of the proper rule, that a Brāhman should attend a Kshattriya with the view of being instructed in divine knowledge. (But) I will teach thee.' He took him by the hand, and rose."

[223] See Prof. Cowell's Translation of the Upanishad, pp. 167 ff.

The second story is that of Pravāhaṇa Jaivali:

Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, xiv. 9, 1, 1 (= Bṛihadāraṇyaka Upanishad, vi. 2, 1, p. 1030 of Cal. edit.). Śvetaketur ha vai Āruṇeyaḥ Panchālānām parishadam ājagāma | sa ājagāma Pravāhaṇaṁ Jaivalim parichārayamāṇam | tam udīkshya abhyuvāda "kumāra" iti | sa "bhoḥ" iti pratiśuśrāva | "anuśishṭo nv asi pitrā" | "om" iti ha uvācha | 2. "Vettha yathā imāḥ prajāḥ prayatyo vipratipadyante" iti | "na" iti ha uvācha | "vettha yāthā imaṁ lokam punar āpadyante" iti | "na" iti ha eva uvācha | "vettha yathā 'sau lokaḥ evam bahubhiḥ punaḥ punaḥ prayadbhir na sampūryyate" iti | "na" iti ha eva uvācha | 3. "Vettha yatithyām āhutyāṁ hutāyām āpaḥ „purusha-vācho bhūtvā samutthāya vadanti" iti | "na" iti ha eva uvācha | "vettha u devayānasya vā pathaḥ pratipadam pitṛiyāṇasya vā yat kṛitvā devayānaṁ vā panthānam pratipadyate pitṛiyāṇaṁ vā | 4. Api hi naḥ ṛisher vachaḥ śrutam (R. V. x. 88, 15 = Vāj. S. 19, 47) 'dve sṛitī aśṛiṇavam pitṛīṇām ahaṁ devānām uta marttyānām | tābhyām idaṁ viśvam ejat sameti yad antarā pitaram mātaraṁ cha'" iti | "na aham ataḥ ekanchana veda" iti ha uvācha | 5. Atha ha enaṁ vasatyā upamantṛayānchakre | anādṛitya vasatiṁ kumāraḥ pradadrāva | sa ājagāma pitaram | taṁ ha uvācha "iti vāva kila no bhavān purā 'nuśishṭān avochaḥ"[224] iti | "kathaṁ sumedhaḥ" iti | "pancha mā praśnān rājanyabandhur aprākshīt tato na ekanchana veda" iti ha uvācha | "katame te" iti | "ime" iti ha pratīkāny udājahāra | 6. Sa ha uvācha | "tathā nas tvaṁ tāta jānīthāḥ yathā yad ahaṁ kincha veda sarvam ahaṁ tat tubhyam avocham | prehi tu tattra pratītya brahmacharyyaṁ vatsyāva" iti | bhavān eva gachhatv" iti | 7. Sa ājagāma Gautamo yatra Pravāhaṇasya Jaivaler āsa | tasmai āsanam āhāryya[225] udakam āhārayānchakāra | atha ha asmai arghaṁ[226] chākara | 8. Sa ha uvācha "varam bhavate Gautamāya dadmaḥ" iti | sa ha uvācha "pratijñāto me esha varaḥ | yāṁ tu kumārasya ante vācham abhāshathās tām me brūhi" iti | 9. Sa ha uvācha "daiveshu vai Gautama tad vareshu | mānushāṇām brūhi" iti | 10. Sa ha uvācha "vijñāyate ha asti hiraṇyasya apāttaṁ go-aśvānāṁ dāsīnām pravarāṇām paridhānānām | mā no bhavān bahor anantasya

[224] The text of the Bṛihadāraṇyaka Up. reads avochat.

[225] The Bṛih. Ār. reads āhṛitya.

[226] The Bṛih. Ār. reads arghyam.

aparyantasya abhy avadānyo bhūd" iti | "sa vai Gautama tīrthena ichhāsai" iti | "upaimy aham bhavantam" iti "vāchā ha sma eva pūrve upayanti" | 11. Sa ha upāyana-kīrttā[227] uvācha | "tathā nas tvaṁ Gautama mā 'parādhās tava cha pitāmahāḥ yathā | iyaṁ vidyā itaḥ pūrvaṁ na kasmiṁschana brāhmaṇe uvāsa | tāṁ tv ahaṁ tubhyaṁ vakshyāmi | ko hi tvā evam bruvantam arhati pratyākhyātum" iti |

"Śvetaketu Āruṇeya came to the assembly of the Panchālas. He came to Pravāhaṇa Jaivali, who was receiving service from his attendants. Seeing Śvetaketu, the king said, 'o youth.' 'Sire,' he answered. (King) 'Hast thou been instructed by thy father?' (Śvetaketu) 'I have.' 2. (K.) 'Dost thou know how these creatures, when departing, proceed in different directions?' (Ś.) 'No.' (K.) 'Dost thou know how they return to this world?' (Ś.) 'No.' (K.) 'Dost thou know how it is that the other world is not filled with those numerous beings who are thus constantly departing?' (Ś.) 'No.' 3. (K.) 'Dost thou know after the offering of what oblation the waters, acquiring human voices, rise and speak?' (Ś.) 'No.' (K.) 'Dost thou know the means of attaining the path which leads to the gods, or that which leads to the Pitṛis; by what act the one or the other is gained? 4. And we have heard the words of the rishi: (R.V. x. 88, 15 = Vaj. S. 19, 47) "I have heard of two paths for mortals, one to the pitṛis, another to the gods. By these proceeds every moving thing that exists between the father and the mother (i.e. between Dyaus and Pṛithivī, heaven and earth)."' 'I know none of all these things,' answered Śvetaketu. 5. The king then invited him to stay. The youth, however, did not accept this invitation, but hastened away, and came to his father, to whom he said, 'Thou didst formerly declare me to be instructed.' 'How now (my) intelligent (son)?' asked his father. 'The Rājanya,' replied the son, 'asked me five questions, of which I know not even one.' 'What were the questions?' 'They were these,' and he told him the initial words of each of them. 6. The father then said, 'Be assured, my son, that I told thee all that I myself know. But come, let us proceed thither, and become (his) pupils.' 'Do thou thyself go,' rejoined the son. 7. Gantama accordingly arrived (at the abode) of Pravāhaṇa Jaivali, who caused a seat to be brought, and water and the madhuparka mess to be presented: 8. and said, 'We offer thee a boon, Gautama.' Gautama replied, 'Thou hast promised me this boon: explain to me the questions which thou hast proposed to the youth.' 9. The king replied, 'That is one of the divine boons; ask one of those that are human.' 10. Gautama rejoined, 'Thou knowest that I have received gold, cows, horses, female slaves, attendants, raiment; be not illiberal towards us in respect to that which is immense, infinite, boundless.' 'This, o Gautama,' said the king, 'thou rightly desirest.' 'I approach thee (as thy) disciple,' answered Gautama. The men of old used to approach (their teachers) with words (merely). He (accordingly) attended him by merely intimating his intention to do so.[228] 'Do not,' then said the king, 'attach any blame to me, as your ancestors (did not). This knowledge has never heretofore dwelt in any Brāhman; but I shall declare it to thee. For who should refuse thee when thou so speakest?'"

[227] The text of the Bṛih. Ār. Up. reads kīrttyā uvāsa.

Chhāndogya Upanishad, v. 3, 1. Śvetaketur ha Āruṇeyaḥ Panchālānāṁ samitim eyāya | taṁ ha Pravāhaṇo Jaivalir uvācha "kumāra anu tvā 'śishat pitā" iti | "anu hi bhagavaḥ" iti | 2. "Vettha yad ito 'dhi prajāḥ prayanti" iti | "na bhagavaḥ" iti | "vettha yathā punar āvarttante" iti | "na bhagavaḥ" iti | "vettha pathor deva-yānasya pitṛiyāṇasya cha vyāvarttane" iti | "na bhagavaḥ" iti | 3. "Vettha yathā 'sau loko na sampūryyate" | "na bhagavaḥ" iti | "vettha yathā pañchamyām āhutāv āpaḥ purusha-vachaso bhavanti" iti | "naiva bhagavaḥ" iti | 4. "Atha nu kim anuśishṭo 'vochathāḥ | yo hi imāni na vidyāt kathaṁ so 'nuśishṭo bravīta" iti | sa ha āyastaḥ pitur arddham eyāya | taṁ ha uvācha "ananuśishya vāva kila mā bhagavān abravīd 'anu tvā 'śisham'" iti | 5. "Pancha mā ɾājanyabandhuḥ praśnān aprākshīt teshāṁ na ekanchana aśakaṁ vivaktum" iti | sa ha uvācha "yathā mā tvaṁ tadā etān avado yathā 'ham eshāṁ na ekanchana veda yady aham imān avedishyaṁ kathaṁ te na avakshyam" iti | 6. Sa ha Gautamo rājno 'rddham eyāya | tasmai ha prāptāya arhāṁ chakāra | sa ha prātaḥ sabhāgaḥ udeyāya | taṁ ha uvācha "mānushasya bhagavan Gautama vittasya varaṁ vṛiṇīthāḥ" iti | sa ha uvācha "tava eva rājan mānushaṁ vittam | yām eva kumārasya ante vācham abhāshathās tām eva me brūhi" iti | 7. Sa ha kṛichchhrī babhūva | taṁ ha "chiraṁ vasa" ity ājnāpayān-

[228] Or, "by merely intimating, not performing, the respectful mode of approach by touching his feet," according to the Commentator.

chakāra | taṁ ha uvācha "yathā mā tvaṁ Gautama avado yathā iyaṁ na prāk tvattaḥ purā brāhmaṇān gachhati tasmād u sarveshu lokeshu kshattrasya eva praśāsanam abhūd" iti | tasmai ha uvācha |

"1. Śvetaketu Āruṇeya came to the assembly of the Panchālas. Pravāhaṇa Jaivali asked him, 'Young man, has thy father instructed thee?' 'He has, sire,' replied Śvetaketu. 2. 'Dost thou know,' asked the king, 'whither living creatures proceed when they go hence?' (Ś.) 'No, sire.' (King) 'Dost thou know how they return?' (Ś.) 'No, sire.' (K.) 'Dost thou know the divergences of the two paths whereof one leads to the gods, and the other to the pitṛis?' (Ś.) 'No, sire.' 3. (K.) 'Dost thou know how it is that the other world is not filled?' (Ś.) 'No, sire.' (K.) 'Dost thou know how at the fifth oblation the waters acquire human voices?' (Ś.) 'I do not, sire.' 4. (K.) 'And hast thou then said "I have been instructed?" for how can he who does not know these things allege that he has been so?' The young man, mortified, went to his father, and said, 'Thou didst tell me, I have instructed thee, when thou hadst not done so. 5. That Rājanya proposed to me five questions, of which I could not solve even one.' The father replied, 'As thou didst then say to me regarding these five questions, I know not one of them,—(so I ask thee whether) if I had known them, I would not have told them to thee?' 6. Gautama went to the king, who received him with honour. In the morning, having received his share (of attention), he presented himself before the king, who said to him, 'Ask, o reverend Gautama, a present of human riches.' He replied, 'To thee, o king, belongs wealth of that description. Declare to me the questions which thou proposedst to the youth.' 7. The king was perplexed and desired him to make a long stay: and said to him, 'As thou hast declared to me, o Gautama, that this knowledge has not formerly reached the Brāhmans (who lived) before thee, it has therefore been among all peoples a discipline inculcated by the Kshattriya class alone.' He then declared it to him."

Sect. XVI.—Story of King Viśvantara and the Śyāparṇa Brāhmans.

Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, vii. 27. Viśvantaro ha Saushadmanaḥ Śyāparnān parichakshāṇo viśyāparṇaṁ yajnam ājahre | tad ha anubudhya Śyāparṇās taṁ yajnam ājagmuḥ | te ha tad-antarvedy āsānchakrire | tān ha dṛishṭvā

uvācha "pāpasya vai ime karmaṇaḥ karttāraḥ āsate apūtāyai vācho vaditāro yach chhyāparṇāḥ imān utthāpayata ime me 'ntarvedim āsishata" iti | "tathā" iti tān utthāpayānchakruḥ | te ha utthāpyamānāḥ ruruvire "ye tebhyo Bhūtavīrebhyaḥ Asitamṛigāḥ Kaśyapānāṁ somapītham abhijigyuḥ Pārikshitasya Janamejayasya vikaśyape yajne tais te tattra vīravantaḥ āsuḥ | kaḥ svit so 'smāka asti vīro yaḥ imaṁ somapītham abhijeshyati" iti | "ayam aham asmi vo vīraḥ" iti ha uvācha Rāmo Mārgaveyaḥ | Rāmo ha āsa Mārgaveyo 'nūchānaḥ Śyāparṇīyaḥ | teshāṁ ha uttishṭhatām uvācha "api nu rājann itthaṁvidaṁ veder utthāpayanti" iti | "yas tvaṁ kathaṁ vettha brahmabandho" iti | 28. "Yattra Indraṁ devatāḥ paryavṛinjan Viśvarūpaṁ Tvāshṭram abhyamaṁsta Vṛittram astṛita yatīn sālāvṛikebhyaḥ prādād Arurmaghān avadhīd Bṛihaspateḥ pratyavadhīd" iti | "tattra Indrah somapīthena vyārdhyata | Indrasya anu vyṛiddhiṁ kshattram somapīthena vyārdhyata | api Indraḥ somapīthe 'bhavat Tvashtur āmushya somam | tad vyṛiddham eva adyāpi kshattraṁ somapīthena | sa yas tam bhakshaṁ vidyād yaḥ kshattrasya somapīthena vyṛiddhasya yena kshattraṁ samṛidhyate kathaṁ taṁ veder utthāpayanti" iti | "vettha brāhmaṇa tvaṁ tam bhaksham" | "veda hi" iti | "taṁ vai no brāhmaṇa brūhi" iti | "tasmai vai te rājann" iti ha uvācha | 29. Trayāṇām bhakshāṇām ekam āharishyanti somaṁ vā dadhi vā apo vā | sa yadi somam brāhmaṇānāṁ sa bhakshaḥ | brāhmaṇāṁs tena bhakshena jinvishyasi | brāhmaṇa-kalpas te prajāyām ājanishyate ādāyī āpāyī āvasāyī yathā-kāma-prayāpyaḥ | yadā vai kshattriyāya pāpam bhavati brāhmaṇa-kalpo 'sya prājāyām ājāyate īśvaro ha asmād dvitīyo vā tṛitīyo vā brāhmaṇatām abhyupaitoḥ sa brahmabandhavena jijyūshataḥ | atha yadi dadhi vaiśyānāṁ sa bhakshaḥ | vaiśyāṁs tena bhakshena jinvishyasi | vaiśya-kalpas te prajāyām ājanishyate 'nyasya bali-kṛid anyasya ādyo yathā-kāma-jyeyaḥ | yadā vai kshattriyāya pāpam bhavati vaiśya-kalpo 'sya prajāyām ājāyate īśvaro ha asmād dvitīyo vā tṛitīyo vā vaiśyatām abhyupaitoḥ sa vaiśyatayā jijyūshitaḥ | atha yady apaḥ śūdrāṇāṁ sa bhakshaḥ | śūdrāṁs tena bhakshena jinvishyasi | śūdra-kalpas te prajāyām ājanishyate 'nyasya preshyaḥ kāmotthāpyo yathākāma-vadhyaḥ | yadā vai kshattriyāya pāpam bhavati śūdra-kalpo 'sya prajāyām ājāyate | īśvaro ha asmād dvitīyo vā tṛitīyo vā śūdratām abhyupaitoḥ | sa śūdratayā jijyūshitaḥ | 30. Ete vai te trayo bhakshāḥ rājann" iti ha uvācha "yeshām āśāṁ na iyāt kshattriyo yajamānaḥ atha asya esha svo 'bhakshaḥ" ityādi |

"Viśvantara, the son of Sushadman, setting aside the Śyāparṇas, was performing a sacrifice without their aid. Hearing of this the Śyāparṇas came to the ceremony, and sat down within the sacrificial enclosure. Observing them, the king said, 'Remove these Śyāparṇas, doers of evil deeds, and speakers of impure language,[229] who have sat down within my sacrificial enclosure.' Saying, 'So be it,' they removed them. When they were being removed, they exclaimed, 'The Kaśyapas found champions in the Asitamṛigas who conquered for them from the Bhūtavīras the soma-draught at the sacrifice which Janamejaya, the son of Parikshit, was performing without their (the Kaśyapas') aid. Who is the champion who will conquer for us this soma-draught?' 'I am your champion,' cried Rāma Mārgaveya. This Rāma was a learned man, belonging to the Śyāparṇa race. When the Śyāparṇas were moving away, he said, 'Do they, o king, remove from the sacrificial enclosure a man who possesses such knowledge [as I]?' 'How dost thou possess it, Brāhman?' asked the king. 28. (Rāma answered) "When the deities rejected Indra, who had killed Tvāshṭra,[230] prostrated Vṛittra, given over the Yatis to the wolves, slain the Arurmaghas, and contradicted Bṛihaspati, then he (Indra) forfeited the soma-draught. In consequence of his forfeiture, the Kshăttra (Kshattriya) class lost it

[229] Prof. Weber (Ind. St. i., 215) thinks the words "doers of evil deeds" appear to refer to some variety of ceremonial peculiar to the Śyāparṇas, and the words "speakers of impure language" to a difference in their dialect; and he is inclined to derive the patronymic of Rāma, Mārgavēya, from the impure caste of Mārgavas mentioned in Manu, x. 34; by which supposition, he thinks, a ground would be discovered for the reproaches which Viśvantara addresses to the Śyāparṇa family. In reference to the story of Janamejaya, alluded to in this passage, Weber remarks (Ind. Stud. i. 204): "The same work (the Aitareya Brahmana, vii., 27) makes mention of a dispute which this king had with the sacerdotal family of the Bhūtavīras, a branch of the Kaśyapas; and which was adjusted by the intervention of the Asitamṛigas, who belonged to the same race." A Śyāparṇa is alluded to in Ś. P. Br. x., 4, 1, 10 (quoted by Prof. Weber, Ind. St. i., 215): Etad ha sma vai tad vidvān Śyāparṇaḥ Sāyakāyanaḥ āha "yad vai me idaṁ karma samāpsyata mama eva prajā Salvānaṁ rājño 'bhavishyan mama brāhmaṇāḥ mama vaiśyāḥ | yat tu me etāvat karmaṇaḥ samāpi tena me ubhayathā Salvān prajā 'tirekshyate" iti | "Knowing this Sāyakāyana, the Śyāparṇa, said, 'If this my rite had been completed, my offspring would have become the kings of the Salvas, mine their Brāhmans, mine their Vaiśyas. But as (only) so much of the rite has been completed, my offspring shall, in both respects, excel the Salvas.'" See also Ind. St. x. 18.

[230] See Dr. Haug's note, p. 487, where he states why he cannot follow Sāyaṇa in rendering abhyamaṁsta by "killed." Prof. Weber (Ind. St. ix. 326) defends Sāyaṇa's interpretation.

also. (But Indra recovered a share in the soma-draught, having stolen Tvashṭṛi's soma.) Hence at present also the Kshattriyas are excluded from the soma-draught. Why do they remove from the sacrificial enclosure a man who knows that (other) draught which (properly belongs) to the Kshattriyas who are excluded from the soma-draught, and by which they are rendered prosperous?' 'Dost thou, o Brāhman, know that draught?' asked the king. 'I know it,' answered Rāma. 'Declare it then to us,' rejoined the prince. 'I declare it to thee, o king, said the other. 29. 'Of the three draughts they shall bring one, either soma, or curds, or water. If he (the priest, bring) the soma, that is the draught of the Brāhmans, and with it thou shalt satisfy the Brāhmans. One like a Brāhman shall be born in thy line, a receiver of gifts, a drinker (of soma), a seeker of food,[231] a rover at will.' Whenever the offence (of drinking the Brāhman's draught)[232] is chargeable to a Kshattriya, one like a Brāhman is born in his line, who in the second or third generation from him has the power of becoming a Brāhman, and likes to live as a Brāhman. Next, if (the priest bring) curds, that is the Vaiśya's draught; with it thou shalt satisfy the Vaiśyas. One like a Vaiśya shall be born in thy line, one who is tributary to another, who is to be used (lit. eaten) by another, and who may be oppressed at will. Whenever the offence (of consuming the Vaiśya's portion) is chargeable to a Kshattriya, one like a Vaiśya is born in his line, who in the second or third generation from him has the power of becoming a Vaiśya, and is desirous of living as a Vaiśya. Next, if (the priest bring) water, that is the Śūdra's draught; with it thou shalt satify the Śūdras. One like a Śūdra shall be born in thy line, the servant of another, who may be expelled and slain at pleasure. When the offence (of drinking the Śūdra's draught) is chargeable against a Kshattriya, one like a Śūdra is born in his line, who in the second or third generation from him has the power of becoming a Śūdra, and desires to live like a Śūdra. 30. 'These, o king, are the three draughts, which the Kshattriya when sacrificing should not desire. His own proper draught is as follows: Let him squeeze the descending branches of the nyagrodha (Indian fig) tree, with the fruits of the udumbara, the aśvattha, and the plaksha trees, and drink these juices. This is his own proper draught."

[231] Prof. Weber (Ind. Stud. ix. 326) would prefer to translate āvasayī (überall-) wohnend, "dwelling everywhere."

[232] Dr. Haug translates "when there is any fault on the Kshattriya (who, when sacrificing, eats the Brāhmana portion)," etc. See the beginning of par. 30 below.

The continuation may be read in Dr. Haug's translation, pp. 486 ff. After the priest has given the king a deal of further information the result is told in par. 34, as follows:

Tam evam etam bhaksham provācha Rāmo Mārgaveyo Viśvantarāya Saushadmanāya | tasmin ha uvācha prokte "sahasram u ha brāhmaṇa tubhyaṁ dadmaḥ | saśyāparṇaḥ u me yajnaḥ" iti |

"This draught did Rāma Mārgaveya declare to Viśvantara the son of Sushadman. When it had been declared the king said, 'Brāhman, we give thee a thousand (cows): and my sacrifice (shall be performed) with (the aid of the) Śyāparṇas.'"

Sect. XVII.—Story of Matanga who tried in vain to raise himself to the position of a Brāhman.

The legend of Matanga, which is narrated in the Anuśāsana-parvan of the Mahābhārata, verses 1872 ff., is introduced by a question which Yudhishṭhira addresses to Bhīshma, verse 1867: Kshattriyo yadi vā vaiśyaḥ śūdro vā rājasattama | brāhmaṇyam prāpnuyād yena tad me vyākhyātum arhasi | tapasā vā sumahatā karmaṇā vā śrutena vā | brāhmaṇyaṁ atha ched ichhet tad me brūhi samāsataḥ | Bhīshmaḥ uvācha | 1870. Brāhmaṇyaṁ tāta dushprāpyaṁ varṇaiḥ kshattrādibhis tribhiḥ | paraṁ hi sarva-bhūtānāṁ sthānam etad Yudhishṭhira | bahvīs tu saṁsaran yonīr jāyamānaḥ punaḥ punaḥ | paryāye tāta kasmiṁśchid brāhmaṇo nāma jāyate | "Explain to me the means—whether it be intense austere-fervour, or ceremonies, or Vedic learning—whereby a Kshattriya, a Vaiśya, or a Śūdra, if he desire it, can attain to the state of a Brāhman. Bhīshma replies (1870), The state of a Brāhman is hard to be acquired by men of the other three classes, the Kshattriyas, etc.; for this Brāhmanhood is the highest rank among all living creatures. It is only after passing through numerous wombs, and being born again and again, that such a man, in some revolution of being, becomes a Brāhman." Bhīshma proceeds to illustrate this principle by the case of Matanga, who was apparently the son of a Brāhman, was distinguished for his good qualities, and was esteemed to be himself of the same class as his father (verse 1873: dvijāteḥ kasyachit tāta tulya-varṇaḥ sutas tv abhūt | Mataṅgo nāma nāmnā vai sarvaiḥ samudito guṇaiḥ |) He was, however, discovered to be of spurious birth in the following manner: He happened to be sent somewhere by his father to perform sacrifice, and was travelling in a car drawn by asses. On his way he repeatedly pierced on its nose with the goad the colt which was conveying him along with its mother. Feeling for the wound thus inflicted on her offspring, the she-ass said: "Be not distressed, my son, it is a Chaṇḍāla who is on the car. There is nothing dreadful in a Brāhman; he is declared to be kindly, a teacher who instructs all creatures: how then can he smite any one? This man of wicked disposition shows no pity to a tender colt, and thereby indicates his origin; for it is birth which determines the character" (verse 1876. Uvācha mā śuchaḥ puttra chaṇḍālas tv adhitishṭhati | brāhmaṇe dārunaṁ nāsti maitro brāhmaṇa uchyate | āchāryaḥ sarva-bhūtānāṁ śāstā kim praharishyati | ayaṁ tu pāpa-prakṛitir bāle na kurute dayām | sva-yonim mānayaty esha bhāvo bhāvaṁ niyachhati |). Overhearing this colloquy, Matanga instantly got down from the car and besought the she-ass, whom he honoured with the epithet of "most intelligent," to tell him how she knew him to be a Chaṇḍāla and how his mother had been corrupted. The she-ass informs him that his mother when intoxicated had received the embraces of a low-born barber, and that he was the offspring of this connection and consequently no Brāhman (verse 1882. Brāhmaṇyāṁ vṛishalena tvam mattāyāṁ nāpitena ha | jātas tvam asi chaṇḍālo brāhmaṇyaṁ tena te 'naśat |). On receiving this unwelcome revelation, Matanga returned home, and being questioned by his reputed father about the cause of his speedy reappearance, he told him what he had heard; and expressed his determination to enter on a course of austerities. He does so accordingly with such effect that he alarms the gods, and receives the offer of a boon from Indra. He asks for Brāhmanhood; but Indra tells him that he must perish if he continues to make that request, as the high position he seeks cannot be obtained by one born as a Chaṇḍāla (verse 1895). Matanga, however, continues his exercises for a hundred years, when Indra repeats his former determination, and supports it by reasons, explaining (1901 ff.) that a Chaṇḍāla can only become a Śūdra in a thousand births, a Śūdra a Vaiśya after a period thirty times as long, a Vaiśya a Rājanya after a period sixty times the length, a Rājanya a Brāhman after a period of sixty times the duration, and so on, a Brāhman only becoming a Kāṇḍaprishṭha, a Kāṇḍaprishṭha a Japa, a Japa a Śrotriya, after immense intervals. Indra therefore advises Matanga to choose some other boon. But the devotee is still dissatisfied with the god's decision, and renews his austerities for a thousand years. At the end of that period he receives still the same answer, and the same advice. But though distressed he did not yet despair; but proceeded to balance himself on his great toe; which, although reduced to skin and bone, he succeeded in doing for a hundred years without falling. At length, when he was on the point of tumbling, Indra ran up and supported him; but continued inexorably to refuse his request; and though further importuned, would only consent to give him the power of moving about like a bird, and changing his shape at will, and of being honoured and renowned (verses 1934 ff.).

The assertion here made of the impossibility of a Kshattriya becoming a Brāhman until he has passed through a long series of births is of course in flagrant contradiction with the stories of Viśvāmitra, Vītahavya, and others.

Matanga (or a Matanga) is mentioned in a passage already quoted in p. 411 as a rājarshi who supported Viśvāmitra's family and for whom that sage sacrificed. He is also named in the Sabhā-parvan, verse 340, as sitting in Yama's assembly along with Agastya, Kāla, and Mṛityu, etc., etc.; in the Vana-parvan, 8079, as a great rishi (maharshi); and in the Śānti-parvan, 10875, as one of certain sages who had acquired their position by austerities (see above, p. 132). His disciples, he himself, and his forest are mentioned in the Rāmāyaṇa, iii. 73, 23, 29, 30.

Sect. XVIII.—Legend of the Brāhman Paraśurāma, the exterminator of the Kshattriyas.

As Paraśurāma belonged to the race of the Bhṛigus, it may be advisable to premise some particulars regarding that family.

In his Lexicon, s.v., Professor Roth tells us that the Bhṛigus were a class of mythical beings, who, according to the Nirukta, xi. 19, belonged to the middle or aërial class of gods ("mādhyamiko deva-gaṇaḥ" iti Nairuktāḥ). They were the discoverers of fire and brought it to men

(R.V. x. 46, 2, etc.)[233] He adds, however, that this race has also a connection with history, as one of the chief Brahmanical families bears this name, and allusions are made to this fact even in the hymns of the Rig-veda (vii. 18, 6; viii. 3, 9, 16; viii. 6, 18; viii. 91, 4). Bhṛigu is also, as Prof. Roth observes, the name of a rishi representing a family, who is mentioned in Atharva-veda, v. 19, 1, as suffering injury at the hands of the Sṛinjayas (see above, p. 286). As regards his birth, it is said in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, iii. 34, that first the Sun, and then Bhṛigu arose out of the seed which had issued from Prajāpati,[234] that Bhṛigu was adopted by Varuṇa, and was consequently called Vāruṇi, etc. (Tasya yad retasaḥ prathamam udadīpyata tad asāv ādityo 'bhavat | yad dvitīyam āsīt tad Bhṛigur abhavat | taṁ Varuṇo nyagṛihṇīta | tasmāt sa Bhṛigur Vāruṇiḥ). He is accordingly called by this name in the Ś. P. Br. xi. 6, 1, 1, where he is said to have conceived himself to be superior in knowledge to his father Varuṇa (Bhṛigur ha vai Vāruṇir Varuṇam pitaram vidyayā 'timene); and also in the Taittirīya Upanishad (Bibl. Ind. p. 123: Bhṛigur vai Vāruṇir Varuṇaṁ pitaram upasasāra).[235] The preceding story of Bhṛigu's birth is developed and modified in the Anuśāsana-parvan of the Mahābhārata, verse 4104 ff.: Vaśishṭhaḥ uvācha | api chedam purā Rāma śrutam me Brahma-darśanam | Pitāmahasya yad vṛittam Brahmaṇaḥ paramātmanaḥ | devasya mahatas tāta Vāruṇīm bibhratas tanum | aiśvaryye vāruṇe Rāma Rudrasyeśasya vai prabhoḥ | "Vaśishṭha said, 4104: I have also heard, o Rāma (i.e. Paraśurāma), of this vision of Brahmā, of that which occurred regarding Pitāmaha, Brahma, the supreme spirit, the great god (i.e. Mahādeva), Rudra, Īśa, the lord, assuming the body of Varuṇa, and invested with the dominion of Varuṇa." After this singular description of Mahādeva as identified with Brahmā, Brahma the supreme spirit, and Varuṇa, the speaker goes on to tell us that the munis, the gods headed by Agni, the embodied portions of the sacrifice, and the Vedas, etc., assembled on the occasion referred to, and then proceeds, verse 4112: Esha Brahmā Śivo Rudro Varuṇo 'gniḥ Prajāpatiḥ | kīrttyate bhagavān devaḥ sarva-bhūta-patiḥ śivaḥ | tasya yajñaḥ

[233] See my article on "Manu, the progenitor of the Āryyan Indians" in Journ. R. A. S. for 1863, p. 415 f.; and above, pp. 168 and 170.

[234] The commencement of the story, of which this is part of the sequel, is given above, p. 107 f.

[235] See Ind. Stud. ii. 231, and Journ. of the German Or. Soc. ix. 240.

Paśupates tapaḥ kratava eva cha | dīkshā dīpta-vratā devī diśaś cha sadigīśvarāḥ | deva-patnyaś cha kanyāś cha devānāṁ chaiva mātaraḥ | ājagmuḥ sahitās tattra tadā Bhṛigu-kulodvaha | 4115. Yajnam Paśupateḥ prītāḥ Varuṇasya mahātmanaḥ | Svayambhuvas tu tāḥ dṛishṭvā retaḥ samapatad bhuvi | tasya śukrasya visyandāt pāṁśūn sangṛihya bhūmitaḥ | prāsyat Pūshā karābhyāṁ vai tasminn eva hutāśane | tatas tasmin sampravṛitte sattre jvalita-pāvake | Brahmaṇo juhvatas tattra prādurbhāvo babhūva ha | skanna-mātraṁ cha tach chhukram śruveṇa parigṛihya saḥ | ājya-vad mantrataś chāpi so 'juhod Bhṛigu-nandana | tatas tu janayāmāsa bhūta-grāmaṁ cha vīryyavān | . . . . 4121. S'ukre hute 'gnau tasmiṁs tu prādurāsaṁs trayaḥ prabho | purushāḥ vapushā yuktāḥ svaiḥ svaiḥ prasava-jair-guṇaiḥ | "bhṛig" ity eva Bhṛiguḥ pūrvam angārebhyo 'ngirā 'bhavat | angāra-saṁśrayāch chaivo Kavir ity aparo 'bhavat | saha jvālābhir utpanno Bhṛigus tasmād Bhṛiguḥ smṛitaḥ | . . . . 4140. "Varuṇaś cheśvaro devo labhatāṁ kāmam īpsitam" | nisargād Brahmaṇaś chāpi Varuṇo yādasāmpatiḥ | jagrāha vai Bhṛigum pūrvam apatyaṁ sūrya-varchasam | Īśvaro 'ngirasaṁ chāgner apatyārtham akalpayat | Pitāmahas tv apatyaṁ vai Kaviṁ jagrāha tattva-vit | tadā sa Vāruṇaḥ khyāto Bhṛiguḥ prasava-karma-kṛit | Āgneyas tv Angirāḥ śrīmān Kavir Brāhmo mahāyaśāḥ | Bhārgavāngirasau loke loka-santāna-lakshaṇau | ete hi prasavāḥ sarve prajāṇām patayas trayaḥ | sarvam santānam eteshām idam ity upadhāraya | Bhṛigos tu puttrāḥ saptāsan sarve tulyāḥ Bhṛigor guṇaiḥ | Chyavano Vajraśīrshaś cha S'uchir Aurvas tathaiva cha | S'ukro Vareṇyaś cha Vibhuḥ Savanaś cheti sapta te | Bhārgavāḥ Vāruṇāḥ sarve yeshāṁ vaṁśo bhavān api |

"4112. This adorable and gracious god, lord of all creatures, is known as Brahmā, Śiva, Rudra, Varuṇa, Agni, Prajāpati. This Paśupati (had) a sacrifice.[236] Austere-fervour, Oblations, Consecration, (Dīkshā) that goddess with brilliant rites, the Points of the compass, their regents, the wives, daughters and mothers of the gods came all together with joy (4115) to this sacrifice of Paśupati the great Varuṇa. When Svayambhū (Brahmā) saw these goddesses his seed fell to the ground. Pūshan in consequence collected the particles of dust which were thus moistened, and threw them into the fire. When the sacrifice with its blazing fires had begun, there was seen an apparition of Brahmā offering an oblation. Collecting with the sacrificial ladle that which had fallen, [236] Such seems to be the construction of this line.

he cast it, like butter, with sacred texts, into the fire. And thence the powerful god generated all beings. . . . . 4121. When the seed had been cast into the fire, there arose three men endowed with bodies, and with their own respective qualities derived from their generation. Bhṛigu sprang first from bhṛik (the blazing of the fire), Angiras from the cinders, and Kavi [237] from a heap of cinders. Bhṛigu was so named because he was produced together with flames." The god, called Mahādeva, Varuṇa, and Pavana, claimed these three men as his own, and the fruit of his sacrifice (verse 4133 f.). Agni and Brahmā also claimed them (4135 f.). The other gods, however, entreated Brahmā to accede to the wishes of Agni and Varuṇa: "4140. 'And let Varuṇa, the lord, the god, also receive the object of his desire.' By the gift of Brahmā, Varuṇa, lord of sea-monsters, first received for his offspring Bhṛigu brilliant as the sun. And Īśvara (Mahādeva) appointed Angiras to be Agni's son. And Pitāmaha, who knows the reality of things took Kavi as his offspring, Then Bhṛigu, the progenitor of creatures, was named the son of Varuṇa, Angiras the son of Agni, and the glorious Kavi the son of Brahmā. The Bhārgava and the Āngirasa are distinguished in the world as the propagators of mankind. For all these three lords of creatures were propagators. Know the whole of this world to be their offspring. Bhṛigu had seven sons, all equal to their father in good qualities, Chyavana, Vajraśīrsha, Śuchi, Aurva, Śukra, Vareṇya, Vibhu, and Savana. These were all Bhārgavas, and Vāruṇas, to whose race you (Paraśurāma) yourself also belong."

In another passage of the M. Bh. Ādip. 869, it is similarly said: Bhṛigur maharshir bhagavān Brahmaṇā vai Svayambhuvā | Varuṇasya kratau jātaḥ pāvakād iti naḥ śrutam | "We have heard that the great and venerable rishi Bhṛigu was produced by Brahmā from fire at the sacrifice of Varuṇa."

The Nirukta, iii. 17, has the following etymology of Bhṛigu: Archishi Bhṛiguḥ sambabhūva | Bhṛigur bhṛijyamāno na dehe | "Bhṛigu was produced in the flame; though roasted, he was not consumed."

The Taitt. Br. i. 8, 2, 5, has a different account: Indrasya sushuvāṇasya tredhā indryaṁ vīryyam parāpatat | Bhṛigus tṛitīyam abhavat |

[237] In the M. Bh. Ādip. v. 2606, Kavi is said to be Bhrigu's son (Bhṛigoḥ puttrah Kavir vidvān Śukrah). On the other hand he, or another person of the same name, is said in the Anuśasana-p. 4150, to be, along with Kavi, a son of Kavi.

"While Indra was continuing to pour out Soma, his manly vigour fell in three portions. The third became Bhṛigu."

Bhṛigu is declared in the Vishṇu P. (see above, p. 65) to have been one of the nine Brahmās, mental sons of Brahmā. The Bhāg. P. iii. 12, 23, says he sprang from the skin of the creator (Bhṛigus tvachi). The M. Bh. Ādip. 2605, on the contrary declares: Brahmaṇo hṛidayam bhittvā nissṛito bhagavān Bhṛiguḥ | "The venerable Bhṛigu, having split Brahmā's heart, issued forth" (Weber, Ind. St. ii. 231). So, too, the Vāyu P. i. 9, 100: Bhṛigus tu hṛidayāj jajne ṛishiḥ Salilajanmanaḥ | "Bhṛigu was produced from the heart of the Water-born (Brahmā);" and adds, verse 103: Ity ete mānasāḥ puttrāḥ vijneyāḥ Brahmaṇaḥ sutāḥ | Bhṛigv-ādayas tu ye sṛishṭāḥ navaite brahma-vādinaḥ | 104. Gṛihamedhinaḥ purāṇas dharmas taiḥ prāk pravarttitaḥ | "These were the mind-born sons of Brahmā. Bhṛigu, and the others, nine in all, who were created, were declarers of sacred knowledge and ancient householders; by them was duty of old established." Manu mentions Bhṛigu (i. 35, see above, p. 36) as one of his own ten sons. He also speaks of him (i. 59, 60, above, p. 38) as commissioned by himself (Mánu) to promulgate his code. In Manu, v. 1. however, the sage is said to have sprung from fire (idam ūchur mahātmānam anala-prabhavam Bhṛigum). As, however, he had been previously declared to be one of Manu's ten sons, and is so called also in the third verse of book v. and the second of book vii., where he is styled Mānavo Bhṛiguḥ, Kullūka thinks it necessary to explain this other alleged descent from fire by saying that that had been the sage's origin in a previous mundane era (Kalpa): Yadyapi prathamādhyāye daśa-prajāpati-madhye "Bhṛiguṁ Nāradam eva cha" iti Bhṛigu-sṛishṭir api Manutaḥ eva uktā tathāpi kalpa-bhedena agni-prabhavatvam uchyate | tathā cha śrutiḥ "tasya yad retasaḥ prathamaṁ dedīpyate tad asāv ādityo 'bhavat | yad dvitīyam āsīd Bhṛigur" iti | ataḥ eva bhrashṭād retasaḥ utpannatvād Bhṛiguḥ | "Though the creation of Bhṛigu, as one of the ten Prājāpátis, is declared, in the 35th verse of the first book, to have proceeded from Manu, still he is here said to have been produced from fire, from the difference in the manner of his birth in the different Kalpas. And so the Veda says (in the passage quoted above from the Ait. Br.). Hence he is called Bhṛigu, because he sprang from the seed which fell (bhrashṭāt).[238]

[238] See Prof. Wilson's note, Vishṇu Purāṇa, vol. i. p. 100 ff., in the course of

Professor Roth (Lit. and History of the Veda, p. 135) says: "The Bhṛigus are one of the most important Vedic families, to which Jamadagni, Chyavana, Aurva, Apnavāna, and other rishis are assigned. Many conjectures might be formed in connection with the part which these several Bhṛigus play in the later legends; but it seems to me unsafe to draw any conclusions till we are in possession of the intermediate links, and especially till we have learnt more precisely from the Vedic hymns themselves the relations of these families to each other. Nevertheless I will remark that Sunahśepha, the adopted son of Viśvāmitra, is, according to the Purānas, a Bhṛigu; and consequently the Bhṛigus appear in intimate connection with the enemy of Vasishṭha; and further, that Sagara, who was reared by the Bhṛigu Aurva, is restrained by Vasishṭha in his war of extermination against the Śakas and other barbarous tribes. His enemies, when hard pressed, had resorted to Vasishṭha as an intercessor." (See above, p. 337, and Wilson's Vishṇu Purāṇa, vol. iii. p. 291.)

The story of Paraśurāma and the Kshattriyas is briefly mentioned in the second section of the Ādiparvan of the Mahābhārata (verses 272–280), where the events referred to are said to have occurred in the interval between the Tretā and Dvāpara ages (Tretā-dvāparayoḥ sandhau Rāmaḥ śastra-bhritāṁ varaḥ | asakṛit pārthivaṁ kshattraṁ jaghānāmarsha-choditaḥ | sa sarvaṁ kshattram utsādya sva-vīryyeṇānala-dyutiḥ |). The history is more fully told in other parts of the Mahābhārata. In the 178th–180th sections of the Ādiparvan there is a legend in which no mention is made of Paraśurāma, or the slaughter of the Kshattriyas; but in which we have the following particulars: Parāśara was son of Śaktri, and grandson of Vaśishṭha, as we have seen above, p. 417. When he heard of the way in which his father had met his death, he determined to execute a general slaughter of all creatures (v. 6800);[239] but his grandfather restrained him by narrating the history of the which he says, "The Vāyu has also another account of their (the Prajāpatis) origin, and states them to have sprung from the fires of a sacrifice offered by Brahmā; an allegorical mode of expressing their probable original—considering them to be in some degree real persons—from the Brahmanical ritual, of which they were the first institutors and observers."

[239] Reference is made in the commencement of the Vishṇu Purāṇa to the same circumstance (Wilson's Vishṇu Purāṇa, vol. i. pp. 7 ff.) Parāśara is the narrator of the Vishṇu Purāṇa (ibid. p. 11).

Bhṛigus and Kshattriyas, as follows: There was a king named Kṛitavīryya, by whose liberality the Bhṛigus, learned in the Vedas, who officiated as his priests, had been greatly enriched with corn and money (verse 6802. Yājyo veda-vidāṁ loke Bhrigūṇām pārthivarshabhaḥ | sa tān agra-bhujas tāta dhānyena cha dhanena cha | somānte tarpayāmāsa vipulena viśāmpate |). After he had gone to heaven, his descendants were in want of money, and came to beg for a supply from the Bhṛigus, of whose wealth they were aware. Some of the latter hid their money under ground, others bestowed it on Brāhmans, being afraid of the Kshattriyas, while others again gave these last what they wanted. It happened, however, that a Kshattriya, while digging the ground, discovered some money buried in the house of a Bhṛigu. The Kshattriyas then assembled and saw this treasure, and, being incensed, slew in consequence all the Bhṛigus, whom they regarded with contempt, down to the children in the womb (verse 6809. Avamanya tataḥ krodhād Bhṛigūṁs tān śaraṇāgatān | nijaghnuḥ parameshvāsāḥ sarvāṁs tān niśitaiḥ śaraiḥ | ā-garbhād avakṛintantaś cheruḥ sarvāṁ vasundharām |). The widows, however, fled to the Himālăya mountains. One of them concealed her unborn child in her thigh. The Kshattriyas, hearing of its existence from a Brāhmaṇī informant, sought to kill it; but it issued forth from its mother's thigh with lustre, and blinded the persecutors. After wandering about bewildered among the mountains for a time, they humbly supplicated the mother of the child for the restoration of their sight; but she referred them to her wonderful infant Aurva into whom the whole Veda, with its six Vedāngas, had entered (verse 6823. Shaḍ-angaś chākhilo vedaḥ imaṁ garbhastham eva ha | viveśa Bhṛigu-vaṁśasya bhūyaḥ priya-chikīrshayā |), as the person who (in retaliation of the slaughter of his relatives) had robbed them of their eyesight, and who alone could restore it. They accordingly had recourse to him, and their eyesight was restored. Aurva, however, meditated the destruction of all living creatures, in revenge for the slaughter of the Bhṛigus, and entered on a course of austerities which alarmed both gods, asuras, and men; but his progenitors (Pitṛis) themselves appeared, and sought to turn him from his purpose by saying that they had no desire to be revenged on the Kshattriyas: 6834. Nānīśair hi tadā tāta Bhṛigubhir bhāvitātmabhiḥ | badho hy upekshitaḥ sarvaiḥ kshattriyāṇāṁ vihiṁsatām | āyushā viprakṛishṭena yadā naḥ kheda āviśat | tadā 'smābhir badhas tāta kshattriyair īpsitaḥ svayam | nikhātaṁ yach cha vai vittaṁ kenachid Bhṛigu-veśmani | vairāyaiva tadā nyastaṁ kshattriyān kopayishṇubhiḥ | kiṁ hi vittena naḥ kāryyaṁ svargepsūnāṁ dvijottama | . . . . 6841. Mā badhīḥ kshattriyāṁs tāta na lokān sapta puttraka | dūshayantaṁ tapas-tejaḥ krodham utpatitaṁ jahi | "6834. It was not from weakness that the devout Bhṛigus overlooked the massacre perpetrated by the murderous Kshattriyas. When we became distressed by old age, we ourselves desired to be slaughtered by them. The money which was buried by some one in a Bhṛigu's house was placed there for the purpose of exciting hatred, by those who wished to provoke the Kshattriyas. For what had we, who were desiring heaven, to do with money?" They add that they hit upon this device because they did not wish to be guilty of suicide, and concluded by calling upon Aurva to restrain his wrath; and abstain from the sin he was meditating, verse 6841: "Destroy not the Kshattriyas, o son, nor the seven worlds. Suppress thy kindled anger which nullifies the power of austere-fervour." Aurva, however, replies that he cannot allow his threat to remain unexecuted. His anger, unless wreaked upon some other object, will, he says, consume himself. And he argues on grounds of justice, expediency, and duty, against the clemency which his progenitors recommend. He is, however, persuaded by the Pitṛis to throw the fire of his anger into the sea, where they say it will find exercise in assailing the watery element, and in this way his threat will be fulfilled. "It accordingly became the great Hayaśiras, known to those who are acquainted with the Veda, which vomits forth that fire and drinks up the waters" (Mahad Hayaśiro bhūtvā yat tad veda-vido viduḥ | tam agnim udgirad vaktrāt pibaty āpo mahodadhau). It is worthy of remark that in a legend, one object of which, at least, would seem to be to hold up to abhorrence the impiety of the Kshattriyas in oppressing the Brāhmans, we should thus find a palliation of the conduct of the oppressors, coming from the other world. But here the principle of the nothingness of mundane existence asserts itself; and the final superiority of the Brāhmans is vindicated, while their magnanimity is exemplified.

The next version of this legend, which I shall quote, is that given in the 115th–117th sections of the Vanaparvan. Arjuna, son of Kṛiṭavīrya, and king of the Haihăyas, had, we are told, a thousand arms.

He obtained from Dattātreya an aërial car of gold, the march of which was irresistible. He thus trod down gods, Yākshas, rishis, and oppressed all creatures (10137. Avyāhata-gatiś chaiva rathas tasya mahātmanaḥ | rathena tena tu tadā vara-dānena vīryyavān | mamardda devān yakshāṁś cha ṛishīṁś chaiva samantataḥ | bhūtāṁś chaiva sa sarvāṁs tu pīḍayāmāsa sarvataḥ |). The gods and rishis applied to Vishṇu, and he along with Indra, who had been insulted by Arjuna, devised the means of destroying the latter. At this time, the story goes on, there lived a king of Kānyakubja, called Gādhi, who had a daughter named Satyavatī. The marriage of this princess to the rishi Ṛichīka, and the birth of Jamadagni, are then told in nearly the same way as above narrated in page 350. Jamadagni and Satyavatī had five sons, the youngest of whom was the redoubtable Paraśurāma. By his father's command he kills his mother (who, by the indulgence of impure desire, had fallen from her previous sanctity), after the four elder sons had refused this matricidal office, and had in consequence been deprived of reason by their father's curse. At Paraśurama's desire, however, his mother is restored by his father to life, and his brothers to reason; and he himself is absolved from all the guilt of murder; and obtains the boon of invincibility and long life from his father. His history now begins to be connected with that of king Arjuna (or Kārtavīrya). The latter had come to Jamadagni's hermitage, and had been respectfully received by his wife; but he had requited this honour by carrying away by force the calf of the sage's sacrificial cow, and breaking down his lofty trees. On being informed of this violence, Paraśurāma was filled with indignation, attacked Arjuna, cut off his thousand arms, and slew him. Arjuna's sons, in return, slew the peaceful sage Jamadagni, in the absence of Paraśurāma. The narrative thus proceeds:

10201. Dadāha pitaraṁ chāgnau Rāmaḥ para-puranjayaḥ | pratijajne badhaṁ chāpi sarva-kshattrasya Bhārata | sa kruddho 'tibalaḥ sankhye śastraṁ ādāya vīryyavān | jaghnivān Kārttavīryyasya sutān eko 'ntakopamaḥ | Teshāṁ chānugatāḥ ye cha kshattriyāḥ kshattriyarshabha | tāṁś cha sarvān avāmṛidhnād Rāmaḥ praharatāṁ varaḥ | trissaptakṛitvaḥ pṛithivīṁ kṛitvā niḥkshattriyām prabhuḥ | samantapanchake pancha chakāra raudhirān hradān | 10205. Sa teshu tarpayāmāsa Bhṛigūn Bhṛigu-kulodvahaḥ | sākshād dadarśa charchīkaṁ sa cha Rāmaṁ

nyavedayat | tato yajnena mahatā Jāmadagnyaḥ pratāpavān | tarpayāmāsa devendram ṛitvigbhyaḥ pradadau mahīm | vedīñ chāpy adadād haimīñ Kaśyapāya mahātmane | daśa-vyāmāyatāñ kṛitvā navotsedhāñ viśāmpate | tāñ Kaśyapasyānumater brāhmanāḥ khaṇḍaśas tadā | vyabhajañs te tadā rājan prakhyātāḥ Khāṇḍavāyanāḥ | sa pradāya mahīm tasmai Kaśyapāya mahātmane | asmin mahendre śailendre vasaty amitavikramaḥ | evañ vairam abhūt tasya kshattriyair loka-vāsibhiḥ | pṛithivī chāpi vijitā Rāmeṇāmita-tejasā |

"Rāma, after performing, on his return, his father's funeral obsequies, vowed to destroy the whole Kshattriya race; and executed his threat by killing first Arjuna's sons and their followers. Twenty-one times did he sweep away all the Kshattriyas from the earth, and formed five lakes of blood in Samantapanchaka; (10,205) in which he satiated the manes of the Bhṛigus, and beheld face to face (his grandfather) Ṛichīka, who addressed himself to Rāma. The latter gratified Indra by offering to him a grand sacrifice, and gave the earth to the officiating priests. He bestowed also a golden altar, ten fathoms long and nine high, on the mighty Kaśyapa. This, by his permission, the Brāhmans divided among themselves, deriving thence the name of Khāṇḍavāyanas. Having given away the earth to Kaśyapa, Paraśurāma himself dwells on the mountain Mahendra. Thus did enmity arise between him and the Kshattriyas, and thus was the earth conquered by Rāma of boundless might."

The means by which the Kshattriya race was restored are described in the following passage from the Ādiparvan, verses 2459 ff.:

Trissapta-kṛitvaḥ pṛithivīñ kṛitvā niḥkshattriyām purā | Jāmadagnyas tapas tepe Mahendre parvatottame | 2460. Tadā niḥkshattriye loke Bhārgaveṇa kṛite sati | brāhmaṇān kshattriyāḥ rājan sutārthinyo 'bhichakramuḥ | tābhiḥ saha samāpetur brāhmaṇāḥ śamsita-vratāḥ | ṛitāv ṛitau nara-vyāghra na kāmād nānṛitau tathā | tebhyaś cha lebhire garbhañ kshattriyās taḥ sahasraśaḥ | tataḥ sushuvire rājan kshattriyān vīryyavattarān | kumārañś cha kumārīś cha punaḥ kshattrābhivṛiddhyaye | evañ tad brāhmaṇaiḥ kshattram kshattriyāsu tapasvibhiḥ | jātañ vṛiddhañ cha dharmeṇa sudīrghenāyushānvitam | chatvāro 'pi tato varṇāḥ babhūvur brāhmaṇottarāḥ |

"2459. Having one and twenty times swept away all the Kshattriyas from the earth, the son of Jamadagni engaged in austerities on Mahendra the most excellent of mountains. 2460. After he had cleared the world of Kshattriyas, their widows came to the Brāhmans, praying for offspring. The religious Brāhmans, free from any impulse of lust, cohabited at the proper seasons with these women, who in consequence became pregnant, and brought forth valiant Kshattriya boys and girls, to continue the Kshattriya stock. Thus was the Kshattriya race virtuously begotten by Brāhmans on Kshattriya women, and became multiplied and long-lived. Thence there arose four castes inferior to the Brāhmans."

This restoration of the Kshattriyas and their rule is said to have been followed by a state of great virtue, happiness, and prosperity. As one exemplification of the religious perfection which prevailed, it is said that "the Brāhmans did not sell their sacred lore, nor recite the Vedas in the vicinity of Śūdras" (verse 2474. Na cha vikrīṇate brahma brāhmaṇāś cha tadā nṛipa | na cha śūdra-samābhyāse vedān uchchārayanty uta |).

Another version of this legend is given in the Śāntiparvan, section 49. The birth of Jamadagni as the son of Ṛichīka and Satyavatī is related very much as in the Vishṇu Purāṇa (see above, p. 349 f.); but Ṛichīka tells his wife that the whole of her father's race shall become Brāhmanical (verse 1741. Brahma-bhūtaṁ hi sakalam pitus tava kulam bhavet); and of Viśvāmitra, the son of Gādhi, we are told that he "had the character of a Brāhman, and was possessed of all Brahmanical qualities" (1745. Viśvāmitraṁ cha dāyādaṁ Gādhiḥ Kuśika-nandanaḥ | yam prāpa brahma-samitaṁ viśvair brahma-guṇair yutam |). Jamadagni was father of the dreadful Paraśurāma, "who became perfect in science, thoroughly versed in archery, and the slayer of the Kshattriyas, himself violent as flaming fire. By propitiating Mahādeva he obtained, among other weapons, the irresistible axe (paraśu)" (1747. Sarva-vidyānta-gaṁ śreshṭhaṁ dhanur-vedasya pāragam | Rāmaṁ kshattriya-hantāram pradīptam iva pāvakam | toshayitvā Mahādevam parvate Gandhamādane | astrāṇi varayāmāsa paraśum chātitejasam |), from which his name is derived. Arjuna, son of Kṛitavīrya, king of the Haihayas, is here also represented as having a thousand arms, but in opposition to the previous account he is described as a "dutiful and religious monarch, who at an aśvamedha (horse-sacrifice) bestowed on the Brāhmans the earth with its seven continents and mountains, which he had conquered by his arms and weapons" (verse 1751. Chakravarttī mahātejā viprāṇām āśvamedhike | dadau sa pṛithivīṁ sarvāṁ sapta-dvīpāṁ sa-parvatām | svabāhv-astra-balenājau jitvā parama-dharma-vit |). He had, however, at the solicitation of Agni permitted that voracious deity to consume his towns, villages, forests, etc.; and as the hermitage of Āpava (Vaśishṭha) had been destroyed in the conflagration, Arjuna was doomed by the sage's curse to have his arms cut off by Paraśurāma. The story proceeds:

Verse 1769. Arjunas tu mahātejā balī nityaṁ śamātmekaḥ | brahmaṇyaś cha śaraṇyaś dātā śūraś cha Bhārata | 1760. Nāchintayat tadā śāpaṁ tena dattam mahātmanā | tasya putrās tu balinaḥ śāpenāsur pitur badhe | nimittād avaliptāḥ vai nṛiśaṁsāś chaiva sarvadā | Jamadagni-dhenvās te vatsam āninyur Bharatarshabha | ajnātaṁ Kārttavīryeṇa Haihayendreṇa dhīmatā | tannimittam abhūd yuddhaṁ Jāmadagner mahātmanaḥ | tato 'rjunasya bāhuṁs tān chhittvā Rāmo rushā 'nvitaḥ | . . . . 1766. Tataḥ pitṛi-badhāmarshād Rāmaḥ parama-manyumān | niḥkshattriyām pratiśrutya mahīṁ śastram agṛihṇata | tataḥ sa Bhṛigu-śārdūlaḥ Kārttavīryasya vīryavān | vikramya vijaghānāśu puttrān pauttrāṁś cha sarvaśaḥ | sa Haihaya-sahasrāṇi hatvā parama-manyumān | chakāra Bhārgavo rājan mahīṁ śoṇita-kardamām | sa tathā "śu mahātejāḥ kṛitvā niḥkshattriyām mahīm | 1770. Kṛipayā parayā "vishṭo vanam eva jagāma ha | tato varsha-sahasreshu samatīteshu keshuchit | kshepam samprāptavāṁs tattra prakṛityā kopanaḥ prabhuḥ | Viśvāmitrasya pauttras tu Raibhya-puttro mahātapāḥ | Parāvasur mahārāja kshiptāha (kshiptvā "ha?) jana-saṁsadi | " ye te Yayāti-patane yajne santaḥ samāgatāḥ | Pratarddana-prabhṛitayo Rāma kiṁ kshattriyāḥ na te | mithyā-pratijno Rāma tvaṁ katthase jana-saṁsadi | bhayāt kshattriya-vīrāṇām parvataṁ samupāśritaḥ | sā punaḥ kshattriya-śataiḥ pṛithivī sarvatas tṛitā" | 1775. Parāvasor vachaḥ śrutvā śastraṁ jagrāha Bhārgavaḥ | tato ye Kshattriyāḥ rājan śataśas tena varjjitāḥ | te vivriddhāḥ mahāvīryyāḥ pṛithivīpatayo 'bhavan | sa punas tān jaghānāśu bālān api narādhipa | garbhasthais tu mahī vyāptā punar evābhavat tadā | jātaṁ jātaṁ sa garbhaṁ tu punar eva jaghāna ha | arakshaṁs tu sutān kāṁśchit tadā kshattriyayoshitaḥ | trissapta-kṛitvaḥ pṛithivīm kṛitvā niḥkshattriyām prabhuḥ | dakshiṇām aśvamedhānte Kaśyapāyādadāt tadā | sa kshattriyāṇāṁ śeshārthaṁ kareṇoddiśya Kaśyapaḥ | 1780. Sruk-pragrahavatā rājaṁs tato vākyam athābravīt | " gachha tīraṁ samudrasya dakshiṇasya mahāmune | na te mad-vishaye Rāma vastavyam iha karhichit" | tataḥ

S'ūrpārakaṁ deśaṁ sāgaras tasya nirmame | sahasā Jāmadagnyasya so 'parānta-mahītalam | Kaśyapas tām mahārāja pratigṛihya vasundharām | kṛitvā brāhmaṇa-saṁsthāṁ vai pravishṭaḥ sumahāvanam | tataḥ śūdrāś cha vaiśyāś cha yathā-svaira-prachāriṇaḥ | avarttanta dvijāgryāṇāṁ dāreshu Bharatarshabha | arājake jīva-loke durbalāḥ balavattaraiḥ | 1785. Pīḍyante na hi vitteshu prabhutvaṁ kasyachit tadā | tataḥ kālena pṛithivī pīḍyamānā durātmabhiḥ | viparyayeṇa tenāśu praviveśa rasātalam | arakshyamāṇā vidhivat kshattriyair dharma-rakshibhiḥ | tāṁ dṛishṭvā dravatīṁ tattra santrāsāt sa mahāmanāḥ | ūruṇā dhārayāmāsa Kaśyapaḥ pṛithivīṁ tataḥ | dhṛitā tenoruṇa yena tenorvīti mahī smṛitā | rakshaṇārthaṁ samuddiśya yayāche pṛithivī tadā | prasādya Kaśyapaṁ devī varayāmāsa bhūmipam | pṛithivy uvācha | 1790. "Santi brahman mayā guptāḥ strīshu kshattriya-pungavāḥ | Haihayānām kule jātās te saṁrakshantu mām mune | asti Paurava-dāyādo Vidūratha-sutaḥ prabho | ṛikshaiḥ saṁvardhito vipra ṛikshavaty atha parvate | tathā 'nukampamānena yajvanā 'py amitaujasā | Parāśareṇa dāyādaḥ Saudāsasyābhirakshitaḥ | sarva-karmāṇi kurute śūdra-vat tasya sa dvijaḥ | Sarvakarmety abhikhyātaḥ sa mām rakshatu pārthivaḥ | . . . . 1799. Ete kshattriya-dāyādās tattra tattra pariśritāḥ | dyokāra-hema-kārādi-jātiṁ nityaṁ samāśritāḥ | 1800. Yadi mām abhirakshanti tadā sthāsyāmi niśchalā | eteshām pitaraś chaiva tathaiva cha pitāmahāḥ | mad-arthaṁ nihatāḥ yuddhe Rāmeṇāklishṭa-karmaṇā | teshām apachitiś chaiva mayā kāryyā mahāmune | na hy ahaṁ kāmaye nityam atikrāntena rakshaṇam | varttamānena vartteyaṁ tat kshipraṁ saṁvidhīyatām" | tataḥ pṛithivyā nirdishṭāṁs tān samānīya Kaśyapaḥ | abhyashinchad mahīpālān kshattriyān vīrya-sammatān |

"Being of a meek, pious, kind, and charitable turn of mind, the valiant Arjuna thought nothing of the curse; but his sons, who were of an arrogant and barbarous disposition, became the cause of its resulting in his death. Without their father's knowledge they took away Jamadagni's calf; and in consequence Paraśurāma attacked Arjuna and cut off his arms." His sons retaliated by killing Jamadagni. 1766. Paraśurāma incensed at the slaughter of his father, having vowed in consequence to sweep away all Kshattriyas from the earth, seized his weapons; and slaying all the sons and grandsons of Arjuna, with thousands of the Haihayas, he turned the earth into a mass of ensanguined mud. 1770. Having thus cleared the earth of Kshattriyas, he became penetrated by deep compassion and retired to the forest. After some thousands of years had elapsed, the hero, naturally irascible, was taunted by Parāvasu, the son of Raibhya and grandson of Viśvāmitra, in a public assembly in these words: 'Are not these virtuous men, Pratardana and the others, who are assembled at the sacrifice in the city of Yayāti,—are they not Kshattriyas? Thou hast failed to excecute thy threat, and vainly boastest in the assembly. Thou hast withdrawn to the mountain from fear of those valiant Kshattriyas, while the earth has again become overrun by hundreds of their race.' Hearing these words, Rāma seized his weapons. The hundreds of Kshattriyas who had before been spared had now grown powerful kings. These, however, Paraśurāma now slew with their children, and all the numerous infants then unborn as they came into the world. Some, however, were preserved by their mothers. Having twenty-one times cleared the earth of Kshattriyas, Rāma gave her as a sacrificial fee to Kaśyapa at the conclusion of an aśvamedha. 1780. Making a signal with his hand, in which he held the sacrificial ladle, Kaśyapa, in order that the remaining Kshattriyas should be spared, said to Paraśurāma, 'Go, great muni, to the shore of the southern ocean. Thou must not dwell in my territory.' Sāgara (the ocean) created for him a country called Śūrpāraka on the remotest verge of the earth. Having received dominion over the earth, Kaśyapa made it an abode of Brāhmans, and himself withdrew to the forest. Śūdras and Vaiśyas then began to act lawlessly towards the wives of the Brāhmans; and, in consequence of there being no government, the weak (1785) were oppressed by the strong, and no one was master of any property. The Earth, being distressed by the wicked, in consequence of that disorder, and unprotected according to rule by the Kshattriyas, the guardians of justice, descended to the lower regions. Perceiving her moving from place to place in terror, Kaśyapa upheld her with his thigh (ūru). From this circumstance she derives her name of urvī.[240] The goddess Earth then propitiated Kaśyapa, and supplicated him for protection, and for a king. 'I have,' she said, 'preserved among females many Kshattriyas who have been born in the race of the Haihayas; let them be my protectors. There is the heir of the Pauravas, the son of Vidūratha, who has been brought up by bears on the mountain Rikshavat: let him protect me. So, too, the heir of Saudāsa has been preserved by the tender-hearted and glorious priest, Parāśara, who has performed, though a Brāhman, all menial offices (sarvakarmāṇi) for him, like a Śūdra;—whence the prince's name Sarvakarman." After enumerating other kings who had been rescued, the Earth proceeds: "All these Kshattriyas' descendants have been preserved in different places, abiding continually among the classes of dyokāras and goldsmiths. If they protect me, I shall continue unshaken. Their fathers and grandfathers were slain on my account by Rāma, energetic in action. It is incumbent on me to avenge their cause. For I do not desire to be always protected by an extraordinary person [such as Kaśyapa]; but I will be content with an ordinary ruler. Let this be speedily fulfilled.' Kaśyapa then sent for these Kshattriyas who had been pointed out by the Earth, and installed them in the kingly office."

[240] Urvī really means "the broad," signifying the same as pṛthivī.

This reference to the bestowal of the Earth upon Kaśyapa is founded on an older story which occurs both in the Aitareya and the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇas. The passage in the first-named work is as follows, viii. 21. Etena ha vai Aindreṇa mahābhishekeṇa Kaśyapo Viśvakarmāṇam Bhauvanam abhishishecha | tasmād u Viśvākarmā Bhauvanaḥ samantaṁ sarvataḥ pṛithivīṁ jayan parīyāya aśvena cha medhyena īje | bhūmir ha jagāv ity udāharanti "na mā marttyaḥ kaśchana dātum arhati Viśvakarman Bhauvana māṁ didāsitha | nimankshye 'haṁ salilasya madhye moghas te esha Kaśyapāyāsa sangaraḥ" iti | "With this great inauguration like that of Indra did Kaśyapa consecrate Viśvakarman Bhauvana, who in consequence went round the Earth in all directions, conquering it; and offered an aśvamedha sacrifice. They relate that the Earth then recited this verse:

> "Me may no mortal give away; but thou, oh king, dost so essay; > Deep will I plunge beneath the main; thy pledge to Kaśyapa is vain."

The Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, xiii. 7, 1. 15, says: Taṁ ha Kaśyapo yājayānchakāra | tad apī bhūmiḥ ślokaṁ jagau "na mā marttyaḥ kaśchana dātum arhati Viśvakarman Bhauvana mandaḥ āsitha | upamankshyati syā salilasya madhye mṛishaisha te sangaraḥ Kaśyapāya" iti | "Kaśyapa officiated for him at this sacrifice. Wherefore also the Earth recited this verse: 'No mortal may give me away. Viśvakarman, son of Bhauvana, thou wast foolish (in offering to do so). She will sink into the midst of the waters. Thy promise to Kaśyapa is vain.'"[241]

The story is also related in the Bhāgavata Purāṇa in a similar way. I note the chief points and variations. When Gādhi's daughter was demanded in marriage by the rishi Ṛichīka, the king considered that the suitor was not a fit husband for a daughter of his noble race; and said, "Give me a thousand horses white as the moon, each with one black ear, as a marriage gift for the maiden; for we are Kuśikas" (ix. 15, 5. Varaṁ visadṛiśam matvā Gādhir Bhārgavam abravīt | 6. Ekataḥ śyāma-karṇānāṁ hayānāṁ chandra-varchasām | sahasraṁ dīyatāṁ śulkaṁ kanyāyāḥ Kuśikāḥ vayam |). The youngest offspring of their union was, we are told, "Paraśurāma, who is declared to have been a portion of Vāsudeva (Vishṇu in the form of Krishṇa),[242] and who exterminated the Haihaya race. Thrice seven times he swept away from this earth all the Kshattriyas, that depraved and impious race, full of passion and darkness, with which she was burthened. He destroyed them, though the offence which they had committed was but insignificant (v. 14. Yam āhur Vāsudevāṁśaṁ Haihayānaṁ kulāntakam | trissaptakṛitvo yaḥ imāṁ chakre niḥkshattriyām mahīm | dushṭaṁ kshattram bhuvo bhāram abrahmaṇyam anīnaśat | rajas-tamo-vṛitam ahan phalguny, apī kṛite 'ṁhasi |). King Arjuna, who had been endowed with miraculous powers, took Rāvana prisoner, then released him, and afterwards carried away by force Jamadagni's cow and calf. Paraśurāma, in revenge, after a terrible battle, and the defeat of the king's army, cut off Arjuna's arms and head, and recovered the cow and calf. When his father was informed of the king's death, he said to Paraśurāma: "Rāma, Rāma, thou hast committed sin, in that thou hast causelessly slain the lord of men, who is composed of all the deities.[243] It is by longsuffering that we, the Brāhmans, have acquired respect; the same means whereby the deity, the instructor of all worlds, attained the highest rank of godhead. By [241] It will be observed that there are some varieties of reading in the verse, as given in the two Brāhmaṇas. Manda āsītha in the S'. P. Br. looks like a corruption of the mām didāsītha of the Aitareya. The story of Arjuna, Paras'urāma, and the Kshattriyas is briefly told again in the Āś'vamedhika-parvan, but without any new circumstances of particular interest.

[242] See above, p. 350, and note 146. None of the passages I have quoted from the Mahābhārata allude to Paras'urāma being an incarnation of Vishṇu.

[243] Compare the passages quoted above in p. 300 from the Vishṇu Purāṇa, and from Manu.

patience the fortune of Brahmā shines like the splendour of the Sun. Hari, the lord, is speedily pleased with those who are patient. The murder of a king who has been formally inaugurated is worse than that of a Brāhman. Go and expiate thy sin by visiting holy places, with thy mind intent upon Achyuta (Vishṇu)" (ix. 15, 38. Rāma Rāma mahābhāga bhavān pāpam akārashīt[244] | abadhīd nara-devaṁ yat sarva-devamayaṁ vṛithā | vayaṁ hi brāhmaṇās tāta kshamayā 'rhaṇatāṁ gatāḥ | yayā loka-gurur devaḥ pārameshṭhyam ayāt padam | kshamayā rochate lakshmīr Brāhmī saurī yathā prabhā | kshamiṇām āśu bhagavāṁs tushyate Harir īśvaraḥ | rājno mūrdhābhishiktasya badho brahma-badhād guruḥ | tīrtha-saṁsevayā chāṁho jahy angāchyuta-chetanaḥ |). On his return from this pilgrimage Rāma was desired by his father to kill his mother (on grounds similar to those stated in the account quoted above, p. 450, from the Mahābhārata), as well as his brothers, and executed the order; but at his intercession they were all restored to life. During his absence in the forest, his father Jamadagni was slain, and his head cut off, notwithstanding the entreaties of his wife, by the sons of Arjuna, in revenge for the loss of their own father. Paraśurāma, hearing his mother's outcries, hastened back to the hermitage, and laying hold of his axe, proceeded to avenge this outrage: ix. 16, 17. Gatvā Māhishmatīṁ Rāpo brahma-ghna-vihata-śriyam | teshāṁ sa śīrshabhiḥ rājan madhye chakre mahāgirim | 18. Tad-raktena nadīṁ ghorām abrahmaṇya-bhayāvahām | hetuṁ kṛitvā pitṛi-badhaṁ kshattre 'mangala-kāriṇi | . . . . 20. Pituḥ kāyena sandhāya śiraḥ ādāya barhishi | sarva-devamayaṁ devam ātmānam ayajad makhaiḥ | 21. Dadau prāchīṁ diśaṁ hotre brahmaṇe dakshiṇāṁ diśam | adhvaryave pratīchīṁ vai udgātre uttarāṁ diśam | 22. Anyebhyo 'vāntara-diśaḥ Kaśyapāya cha madhyataḥ | āryāvarttam upadrashṭre sadasyebhyas tataḥ param | 23. Tataś chāvabhṛitha-snāna-vidhūtāśesha-kilvishaḥ | Sarasvatyām brahma-nadyāṁ reje vyabhraḥ ivāṁśumān | . . . . 26. Āste 'dyāpi Mahendrādrau nyasta-daṇḍaḥ praśāntadhīḥ | upagīyamāna-charitaḥ siddha-gandharva-chāraṇaiḥ | 27. Evam Bhṛigushu viśvātmā bhagavān Harir īśvaraḥ | avatīrya param bhāram bhuvo 'han bahuśo nṛipān | "17. He went to the city of Māhishmatī, which had been robbed of its glory by those Brāhman-slayers, and raised in the midst of it a great mountain composed of their heads. With their blood he formed a dreadful river, which struck fear into the impious; justifying his action against the oppressive Kshattriyas by their murder of his father. . . . . 20. He then united his father's head to his body, laying it on the sacred grass; and offered a sacrifice to the divine Spirit, who is formed of all the deities. On this occasion he gave the eastern region of the earth to the hotṛi priest, the south to the brahman, the west to the adhvaryu, and the north to the udgātṛi. To others he gavè the intermediate regions (south-east, south-west, etc.), to Kaśyapa the central; on the upadrashṭṛi he bestowed Āryāvartta, and on the Sadasyas what was beyond. Having then cleansed all his impurity by the avabhṛitha ablution in the Sarasvatī, the river of Brahmā, he shone like the sun unobscured by clouds. . . . 26. Having laid aside his weapons, he sits to this day in tranquillity of mind on the mountain Mahendra, whilst his exploits are celebrated by the Siddhas, Gandharvas, and Chāranas. Thus did the universal Spirit, the divine lord, Hari, become incarnate in the Bhṛigus, and destroy numerous kings who were a burden to the earth." It is singular that sin requiring expiation should be, as it is in this narrative, imputed to Paraśurāma, while he is at the same time declared to have been a portion of Vishṇu, the supreme Spirit.

[244] So in the Bombay edition. Burnouf's text has the usual form akārshīt.

The story of Paraśurāma is also told in the Droṇaparvan of the Mahābhārata, verses 2427 ff., after those of many other kings and warriors, to illustrate the truth that death must sooner or later overtake even the most pious and distinguished personages. The earlier incidents are briefly narrated; but some of the details, as the slaughter of the Kshattriyas, are dwelt on at greater length than in the other accounts. Some of the victims of the hero's vengeance are described as "haters of Brāhmans" (brahma-dvishām, verse 2431). The Kshattriyas who were slain are described as of various provinces, viz. Kāśmīras, Daradas, Kuntis, Kshudrakas, Mālavas, Angas, Vangas, Kalingas, Videhas, Tāmraliptakas, Rakshovāhas, Vītihotras, Trigarttas, Mārttikāvatas, Śivis, and other Rājanyas (Śivīn anyāṁś cha rājanyān, verse 2437). At verse 2443 the narrative proceeds: Nirdasyum pṛithivīṁ kṛitvā śishṭeshṭa-jana-sankulām | Kaśyapāya dadau Rāmo haya-medhe mahāmakhe | trisapta-vārān pṛithivīm kṛitvā niḥkshatriyām prabhuḥ | ishṭvā kratu-śatair vīro brāhmaṇebhyo hy amanyata | sapta-dvīpāṁ vasumatīm Mārīcho 'gṛihṇata dvijaḥ | Rāmam provācha "nirgachha vasudhāto mamājnayā | sa Kaśyapasya

vachanāt protsārya saritāmpatim | ishupātair yudhāṁ śreshṭhaḥ kurvan brāhmaṇa-sāsanam | adhyāvasad giri-śreshṭham Mahendram parvatottamam | "2443. Having freed the earth from Dasyus (or robbers), and filled her with respectable and desirable inhabitants, he gave her to Kaśyapa at an aśvamedha. Having twenty-one times cleared the earth of Kshattriyas, and offered hundreds of sacrifices, he destined the earth for the Brāhmans. The Brāhman, the son of Marīchi (i.e. Kaśyapa), received the earth, and then said to Rāma, 'Depart out of her by my command.' Having repelled the ocean by his arrows, and established the rule of the Brāhmans, Rāma dwelt on the mountain Mahendra."

The Anuśāsanaparvan of the same poem has another "ancient story" about Paraśurāma, which, like the preceding passage from the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, adverts to the pollution incurred by that warrior from his numerous deeds of blood. It begins as follows: verse 3960. Jāmadagnyena Rāmeṇa tīvra-roshānvitena vai | trissapta-kṛitvaḥ pṛithivī kṛitā nikshattriyā purā | tato jitvā mahīṁ kṛitsnāṁ Rāmo rājīva-lochanaḥ | ājahāra kratuṁ vīro brahma-kshattreṇa pūjitam | vāji-medham mahārāja sarva-kāma-samanvitam | pāvanaṁ sarva-bhūtānāṁ tejo-dyuti-vivarddhanam | vipāpmā sa cha tejasvī tena kratu-phalena cha | naivātmano 'tha laghutāṁ Jāmadagnyo 'dhyagachhata | sa tu kratu-vareṇeshṭvā mahātmā dakshiṇāvatā | 3965. Paprachhāgama-sampannān ṛishīn devāṁś cha Bhārgavaḥ | "pāvanaṁ yat param nṛīṇām ugre karmaṇi varttatām | tad uchyatām mahābhāgāḥ" iti jāta-ghṛiṇo 'bravīt | ity uktāḥ veda-śāstra-jñās tam ūchus te maharshayaḥ | "Rāma viprāḥ satkriyantāṁ veda-prāmāṇya-darśanāt | bhūyaścha viprarshi-gaṇāḥ prashṭavyāḥ pāvanam prati | te yad brūyur mahāprājñās tach chaiva samudāchara | "3960. Rāma, son of Jamadagni, having thrice seven times cleared the world of Kshattriyas, and conquered the whole earth, performed the horse-sacrifice, venerated by Brāhmans and Kshattriyas, which confers all objects of desire, which cleanses all creatures, and augments power and lustre; and became thereby sinless and glorious. He did not, however, feel relieved in his mind, but after offering the most excellent of sacrifices, at which presents were bestowed, he (3965) enquired of the rishis skilled in the scriptures, and of the gods, what was that which most perfectly cleansed those men who had committed deeds of violence; for he felt compunction for what he had done. The rishis skilled in the Vedas and Śāstras replied, 'Let the Brāhmans be the objects of your liberality, as the authority of the Vedas requires; let the Brāhman-rishis be further consulted in regard to the means of lustration; and do whatever these wise men may enjoin.'" Paraśurāma accordingly consulted Vaśishṭha, Agastya, and Kaśyapa. They replied that a sinner was cleansed by bestowing cows, land, and other property, and especially gold, the purifying power of which was very great. "Those who bestow it, bestow the gods," a proposition which is thus compendiously proved: "for Agni comprehends all the gods; and gold is of the essence of Agni" (verse 3987. Devatās te prayachhanti ye suvarṇaṁ dadaty atha | Agnir hi devatāḥ sarvāḥ suvarṇaṁ cha tadātmakam). In regard to the origin of this precious metal, Vasishṭha tells a very long story, which he had heard Prajāpati relate, how it was born by the goddess Gangā to Agni, by whom she had been impregnated, and was thus the son of that god. "Thus was gold born the offspring of Jātavedas (Agni). That which is produced in Jambūnada is the best, and a fit ornament even for the gods. It is called the chief of gems and of ornaments, the most pure of all pure things, the most auspicious of all auspicious objects; and one with the divine Agni, the lord Prajāpati" (verse 4099. Evaṁ suvarṇam utpannam apatyaṁ Jātavedasaḥ | tatra Jāmbūnadaṁ śreshṭhaṁ devānām api bhūshaṇam | 4001. Ratnānām uttamaṁ ratnaṃ bhūshaṇānāṁ tathottamam | pavitraṁ cha pavitrāṇām mangalānāṁ cha mangalam | yat suvarṇaṁ sa bhagavān Agnir īśaḥ prajāpatiḥ |). It must be highly consolatory for those who are disposed to be liberal to the Brāhman, to be assured that the gold which they bestow has such a high mystical, as well as current, exchangeable value. "Paraśurāma," the story concludes, "after being thus addressed by Vaśishṭha, gave gold to the Brāhmans, and was freed from sin" (verse 4183. Ity uktaḥ sa Vaśishṭhena Jāmadagnyaḥ pratāpavān | dadau suvarṇaṁ viprebhyo vyamuchyata cha kilvishāt).

It is interesting to remark how the different distinctive principles of Indian religion and sentiment severally assert themselves in turn, and thus, occasionally, come into conflict with each other, as in the story of Paraśurāma. The primary object of this legend is no doubt to illustrate the vengeance which inevitably overtakes all those who violate the sacredness of the Brāhmanical prerogative, and the meritorious character of those who act as its defenders. No sooner, however, is this end accomplished, and the impious foes of the priesthood swept away again and again from the face of the earth, than a revulsion of feeling takes place, and the higher principles of the sacredness of life, and of the blessedness of mercy, come forward to claim recognition; and a deep sense of the pollution of bloodshed calls aloud for atonement. In the Bhāgavata, as we have seen, Jamadagni imputes it as a crime to the avenger of the Brāhmans that he had slain a king; and even goes the length of declaring that in doing so he had incurred greater guilt than if he had murdered a Brāhman.

In the same book of the Mahābhārata, verses 7163 ff., an extravagant description is given of the prerogatives and powers of the Brāhmans; and Arjuna is again brought forward, in verses 7187 ff., as at first scouting their pretensions, but as ultimately conceding their unapproachable superiority: "The magnificent and mighty Kārttavīrya (Arjuna), possessing a thousand arms, was lord of this whole world, living in Māhishmatī. This Haihaya of unquestioned valour ruled over the whole sea-girt earth, with its oceans and continents" (verse 7187. Sahasra-bhuja-bhṛit śrīmān Kārttavīryo 'bhavat prabhuḥ | asya lokasya sarvasya Māhishmatyām mahābalaḥ | sa tu ratnākaravatīṁ sadvīpāṁ sāgarāmbarām | śaśāsa pṛithivīṁ sarvāṁ Haihayaḥ satya-vikramaḥ). He obtained boons from the muni Dattātreya, a thousand arms whenever he should go into battle, power to make the conquest of the whole earth, a disposition to rule it with justice, and the promise of instruction from the virtuous in the event of his going astray. 7196. Tataḥ sa ratham āsthāya jvalanārka-samadyutim | abravīd vīryyasammohāt "ko nv asti sadṛiśo mama | dhairyye vīryye yaśaḥ-śauryye vikrameṇaujasā 'pi vā" | tad-vākyānte 'ntarīkshe vai vāg uvāchāśarīriṇī | "ná tvam mūḍha vijānīshe brāhmaṇaṁ kshattriyād varam | sahito brāhmaṇeneha kshattriyaḥ śāsti vai prajāḥ" | Arjuna uvācha | kuryām bhūtāni tushṭo 'haṁ kruddho nāśaṁ tathā naye | karmaṇā manasā vāchā na matto 'sti varo dvijaḥ | 7200. Pūrvo brahmottaro vādo dvitīyaḥ kshattriyottaraḥ | tvayoktau hetuyuktau tau viśeshas tattra dṛiśyate | brāhmaṇāḥ saṁśritāḥ kshattraṁ na kshattram brāhmaṇāśritam | śritāḥ brahmopadhāḥ viprāḥ khādanti kshattriyān bhuvi | kshattriyeshv āśrito dharmaḥ prajānām paripālanam | kshattrād vṛittir brāhmaṇānāṁ taiḥ katham brāhmaṇo varaḥ | sarva-bhūpradhānāṁs tān bhaiksha-vṛittīn ahaṁ sadā | ātma-sambhāvitān viprān

sthāpayāmy ātmano vaśe | kathitaṁ hy anayā satyam gāyatryā kanyayā divi | vijeshyāmy avaśān sarvān brāhmaṇāṁś charma-vāsasaḥ | 7205. Na cha māṁ chāvayed rāshṭrāt trishu lokeshu kaśchana | devo vā mānusho vā 'pi tasmāj jyeshṭho dvijād aham | atha brahmottaraṁ lokaṁ karishye kshattriyottaram | na hi me saṁyuge kaśchit soḍhum utsahate balam | Arjunasya vachaḥ śrutvā vitrastā 'bhūd niśācharī | athainam antarikshasthas tato Vāyur abhāshata | "tyajainaṁ kalusham bhāvam brāhmaṇebhyo namaskuru | eteshāṁ kurvataḥ pāpaṁ rāshṭra-kshobho bhavishyati | atha vā tvām mahīpāla śamayishyanti vai dvijāḥ | nirasishyanti te rāshṭrād hatotsāham mahābalāḥ" | 7210. Taṁ rājā "kas tvam" ity āha tatas tam prāha Mārutaḥ | "Vāyur vai deva-dūto 'smi hitaṁ tvām prabravīmy aham" | Arjunaḥ uvācha | "aho tvayā 'dya vipreshu bhaktirāgaḥ pradarśitaḥ | yādṛiśam pṛithivī-bhūtaṁ tādṛiśam brūhi vai dvijam | vāyor vā sadṛiśam kinchid brūhi tvam bvāhmaṇottamam | apāṁ vai sadṛiśo vahniḥ sūryyasya nabhaso 'pi vā | "Then ascending his chariot glorious as the resplendent sun, he exclaimed in the intoxication of his prowess, 'Who is like me in fortitude, courage, fame, heroism, energy, and vigour?' At the end of this speech a bodiless voice in the sky addressed him: 'Thou knowest not, o fool, that a Brāhman is better than a Kshattriya. It is with the help of the Brāhman that the Kshattriya rules his subjects.' Arjuna answers: 'If I am pleased, I can create, or, if displeased, annihilate, living beings; and no Brāhman is superior to me in act, thought, or word. The first proposition is that the Brāhmans are superior; the second that the Kshattriyas are superior; both of these thou hast stated with their grounds, but there is a difference between them (in point of force). The Brāhmans are dependant on the Kshattriyas, and not the Kshattriyas on the Brāhmans; and the Kshattriyas are eaten up by the Brāhmans, who wait upon them, and only make the Vedas a pretence. Justice, the protection of the people, has its seat in the Kshattriyas. From them the Brāhmans derive their livelihood: how then can the latter be superior? I always keep in subjection to myself those Brāhmans, the chief of all beings, who subsist on alms, and who have a high opinion of themselves. For truth was spoken by that female the Gāyatrī in the sky. I shall subdue all those unruly Brāhmans clad in hides. 7200. No one in the three worlds, god or man, can hurl me from my royal authority; wherefore I am superior to any Brāhman. Now shall I turn the world in which Brāhmans have the upper hand into a place where Kshattriyas shall have the upper hand: for no one dares to encounter my force in battle.' Hearing this speech of Arjuna, the female roving in the night became alarmed. Then Vāyu, hovering in the air, said to Arjuna: 'Abandon this sinful disposition, and do obeisance to the Brāhmans. If thou shalt do them wrong, thy kingdom shall be convulsed. They will subdue thee: those powerful men will humble thee, and expel thee from thy country.' The king asks him, 'Who art thou?' Vāyu replies, 'I am Vāyu, the messenger of the gods, and tell thee what is for thy benefit.' Arjuna rejoins, 'Oh, thou displayest to-day a great warmth of devotion to the Brāhmans. But say that a Brāhman is like (any other) earth-born creature. Or say that this most excellent Brāhman is something like the wind. But fire is like the waters, or the sun, or the sky.'"[245] Vāyu, however, goes on to answer this spirited banter by adducing various instances in which the superiority or terrible power of the Brāhmans had been manifested: 7124. Tyaktvā mahītvam bhūmis tu sparddhayā 'nga-nṛipasya ha | nāśaṁ jagāma tāṁ vipro vyashṭambhayata Kāśyapaḥ | "The earth, being offended with king Anga, had abandoned her form and become destroyed: but the Brāhman Kaśyapa supported her." This is afterwards told more at length, verse 7232: Imām bhūmiṁ dvijātibhyo ditsur vai dakshiṇām purā | Ango nāma nṛipo rājaṁs tataś chintām mahī yayau | "dhāraṇīṁ sarva-bhūtānām ayam prāpya varo nṛipaḥ | katham ichhati māṁ dātuṁ dvijebhyo Brahmaṇaḥ sutām | sā 'haṁ tyaktvā gamishyāmi bhūmitvam Brahmaṇaḥ padam | ayaṁ sa-rāshṭro nṛipatir mā bhūd" iti tato 'gamat | 7235. Tatas tām Kaśyapo dṛishṭvā vrajantīm pṛithivīṁ tadā | praviveśa mahīṁ sadyo muktvā "tmāhaṁ samāhitaḥ | ṛiddhā sā sarvato jajne triṇaushadhi-samanvitā | . . . . 7238. Athāgamya mahārāja namaskṛitya cha Kaśyapam | pṛithivī Kāśyapī jajne sutā tasya mahātmanaḥ | esha rājann īdṛiśo vai brāhmaṇaḥ Kaśyapo 'bhavat | anyam prabrūhi vā tvaṁ cha Kaśyapāt kshattriyaṁ varam | "King Anga wished to bestow this earth on the Brāhmans as a sacrificial fee. The earth then reflected, 'How does this excellent king, after having obtained me, the daughter of Brahmā, and the supporter of all creatures, desire to give me to the Brāhmans? I shall abandon my earthly form, and depart to the world of Brahmā. Let this king be without any realm.' Accordingly she departed. 7235. Beholding her going away, Kaśyapa, sunk in contemplation, entered into her, leaving his own body. She then became replenished, and covered with grass and plants, etc., etc. . . . . 7238. She afterwards came and did obeisance to Kaśyapa, and became his daughter. Such was the Brāhman Kaśyapa: Declare, on your part, any Kshattriya who has been superior to him."

[245] The drift of the last line is not very clear, unless it be a reply by anticipation to line 225, which will be found a little further on.

Further illustrations of the tremendous power of the Brāhmans are the following:

7215. Apibat tejasā hy āpaḥ svayam evāngirāḥ purā | sa tāḥ piban kshīram iva nātṛipyata mahāmanāḥ | apūrayad mahaughena mahīṁ sarvāṁ cha pārthiva | tasminn ahaṁ cha kruddhe vai jagat tyaktvā tato gataḥ | vyatishṭham agnihotre cha chiram Angiraso bhayāt | atha śaptaś cha bhagavān Gautamena Purandaraḥ | Ahalyāṁ kāmayāno vai dharmārthaṁ cha na hiṁsitaḥ | yathā samudro nṛipate pūrṇo mṛishṭaś cha vāriṇā | brāhmaṇair abhiśaptaḥ san babhūva lavaṇodakaḥ | . . . . 7223. Daṇḍakānām mahad rājyam brāhmaṇena vināśitam | Tālajangham mahākshattram Aurveṇaikena nāśitam | . . . . 7225. Agniṁ tvaṁ yajase nityaṁ kasmād brāhmaṇam Arjuna | sa hi sarvasya lokasya havya-vāṭ kiṁ na vetsi tam | . . . . 7241. Bhadrā Somasya duhitā rūpeṇa paramā matā | yasyās tulyam patiṁ Somaḥ Utathyaṁ samapaśyata | sā cha tīvraṁ tapas tepe mahābhāgā yaśasvinī | Utathyārthe tu chārvāngī paraṁ niyamam āsthitā | tataḥ āhūya ṣotathyaṁ dadāv Atrir yaśasvinīm | bhāryyārthe sa tu jagrāha vidhivad bhūri-dakshiṇaḥ | tāṁ tv akāmayata śrīmān Varuṇaḥ pūrvam eva ha | sa chāgamya vanaprasthaṁ Yamunāyāṁ jahāra tām | 7245. Jaleśvaras tu hṛitvā tām anayat svapuram prati | paramādbhuta-saṅkāśam shat-sahasra-śataṁ hradam | na hi ramyataraṁ kinchit tasmād anyat purottamam | prāsādair apsarobhiś cha divyaiḥ kāmaiś cha śobhitam | tatra devas tayā sārddhaṁ reme rājan jaleśvaraḥ | athākhyātam Utathyāya tataḥ patny-avamarddanam | tach chhrutvā Nāradāt sarvam Utathyo Nāradaṁ tadā | provācha "gachha brūhi tvaṁ Varuṇam parushaṁ vachaḥ | madvākyād muncha me bhāryyām kasmāt tāṁ hṛitavān asi | lokapālo 'si lokānāṁ na lokasya vilumpakaḥ | Somena dattā me bhāryyā tvayā chāpahṛitā 'dya vai" | . . . . 7251. Iti śrutvā vachas tasya tatas taṁ Varuṇo 'bravīt | "mamaishā supriyā bhīrur nainām utsrashṭum utsahe" | ity ukto Varuṇenātha Nā-

radaḥ prāpya vai munim | Utathyam abravīd vākyaṁ nātihṛishta-manāḥ iva | "gale gṛihītvā kshipto 'smi Varuṇena mahāmune | na prayachhati te bhāryyāṁ yat te kāryyaṁ kurushva tat" | Nāradasya vachaḥ śrutvā kruddhaḥ prājvalad Angirāḥ | 7255. Apibat tejasā vāri vishtabhya sa mahātapāḥ | pīyamāne tu sarvasmiṁs toye vai salileśvaraḥ | suhṛidbhiḥ kshobhyamāṇo vai naivāmunchata tāṁ tadā | tataḥ kruddho 'bravīd bhūmim Utathyo brāhmaṇottamāḥ | darśayasva chhalam bhadre shaṭ-sahasra-śataṁ hradam | tatas tad īriṇaṁ jātaṁ samudraś chāvasarpitaḥ | tasmād deśān nadīṁ chaiva provāchāsau dvijottamaḥ | "adṛiśyā gachha bhīru tvaṁ Sarasvati marūn prati | apuṇyaḥ esha bhavatu deśas tyaktas tvayā śubhe" | tasmin saṁśoshite deśe Bhadrām ādāya vāripaḥ | 7260. Adadāt śaraṇaṁ gatvā bhāryyām Āngirasāya vai | pratigṛihya tu tām bhāryyām Utathyaḥ sumanā 'bhavat | mumocha cha jagad duḥkhād Varuṇaṁ chaiva Haihaya | . . . . 7262. Mamaishā tapasā prāptā krośatas te jalādhipa | 7263. . . . . esha rājann īdṛiśo vai Utathyo brāhmaṇottamaḥ | bravīmy aham brūhi vā tvam Utathyāt kshattriyam varam |

"Angiras, too, himself formerly drank up the waters by his own might. Drinking them up like milk he was not satisfied: and filled the whole earth with a great flood. When he was thus wroth, I abandoned the world and departed, and dwelt for a long time in the agnihotra. The divine Purandara (Indra), who had a passion for Ahalyā, was cursed by (her husband) Gautama; but, from motives of religion, he was not injured.[246] The sea, which is filled and purified by water, being cursed by the Brāhmans, became salt." 7223. The great king-

[246] See above pp. 121 and 310; and also pp. 107–113. In this same Anuśāsana Parva, verses 2262 ff., there is found another story (told to illustrate the frailty of the female sex) of Indra being enamoured of Ruchi, the wife of the rishi Devaśarman, and of the method which that sage's disciple, Vipula, (to whose care his preceptor's wife had been entrusted during her husband's absence,) devised to preserve his charge from being corrupted by the licentious immortal who was in the habit of assuming manifold Protean disguises in order to carry out his unworthy designs, and to save the female from being "licked up by the king of the gods, as a mischievous dog licks up the butter deposited at the sacrifice" (Yathā Ruchiṁ nāvalihed devendro Bhṛigu-sattama | kratāv upahite nyastaṁ haviḥ śveva durātmavān), a respectful comparison, truly, to be applied to the chief of the Indian pantheon! The plan which Vipula adopted to save the virtue of his master's wife against her will was to take possession of her body with his own spirit, and to restrain her movements by the force of Yoga, and compel her to say the contrary of what she desired. The story ends by his re-entering his own body, reproaching Indra with his disgraceful behaviour, and compelling him to retire abashed.

dom of the Daṇḍakas was overthrown by a Brāhman; and the great Kshattriya family of the Tālajanghas was destroyed by Aurva alone. 7225. And why dost thou, o Arjuna, worship Agni (who is) a Brāhman? for knowest thou not that he bears the oblations of the whole world?" The story of Utathya, of the race of Angiras, is afterwards told: "7241. Bhadrā was the daughter of Soma, and considered to be a a person of great beauty. Soma regarded Utathya as a fitting husband for her. She practised severe austerities in order to gain him. Atri (the father of Soma, according to the Vishṇu Purāṇa, Wilson, 1st ed. p. 392) then sent for Utathya, and gave her to him, and he married her in due form, presenting large gifts. 7245. The god Varuṇa, however, who had formerly been enamoured of her, came and carried her off from the abode of the hermit, who was living on the banks of the Yamunā, and took her to his own city, to a very wonderful lake of six hundred thousand (yojanas). No city was more delightful than that, adorned as it was by palaces and apsarases, and rich in celestial objects of enjoyment. There the god enjoyed her society. His wife's dishonour being made known to Utathya by Nārada, he requested the latter to go and deliver a severe message to Varuṇa: 'I command thee to let my wife go, who was given to me by Soma; wherefore hast thou carried her away? Thou art a guardian of the world, not a robber.'. . . . 7251. Varuṇa answered, 'She is my beloved; I cannot bear to give her up.' Nārada, in no very gratified humour, reported this answer to Utathya, and said, 'Varuṇa took me by the throat, and cast me out. He will not give up thy wife. Take whatever measures thou esteemest proper.' Utathya was greatly incensed (7255), and stopped up and drank all the sea. Still Varuṇa, though urged by his friends, would not give up the female. Utathya then desired the earth to try some other stratagem; and the lake above described was turned into a salt wilderness, and the ocean swept away. The saint then addressed himself to the countries and to the river: 'Sarasvatī, disappear into the deserts; and let this land, deserted by thee, become impure.' After the country had become dried up, Varuṇa submitted himself to Utathya, and brought back Bhadrā. The sage was pleased to get his wife, and released both the world and Varuṇa from their sufferings. . . . . He said to the latter (7262) 'This, my wife, was gained by my austerities in spite of thy remonstrances.' 7263. . . . . 'Such, o king, I say, was the Brāhman Utathya; tell me of any Kshattriya superior to him.'"

A story is next told (verses 7265 ff.) of the gods being conquered by the Asuras or Dānavas, deprived of all oblations, and stripped of their dignity, and of their coming to earth, where they saw the sage Agastya, and applied to him for protection. The succour they implored was granted to them by the sage, who scorched the Dānavas, expelled them from heaven and earth, and made them fly to the south. Thus were the gods reinstated in their dominion.

We have then, verses 7280–7290, the following legend of Vaśishṭha: The Ādityas were performing a sacrifice, bearing Vaśishṭha in their remembrance, when they were attacked by the Dānavas, called Khalins, who came in tens of thousands to slay them:

Verse 7284. Tatas tair arddiṭāḥ devāḥ śaraṇaṁ Vāsavaṁ yayuḥ | sa cha tair vyathitaḥ Śakro Vaśishṭhaṁ śaraṇaṁ yayau | tato 'bhayaṁ dadau tebhyo Vaśishṭho bhagavān ṛishiḥ | tadā tān duḥkhitān jñātvā ānṛiśaṁsya-paro muniḥ | ayatnenādahat sarvān Khalinaḥ svena tejasā | . . . . 7289. Evaṁ sendrāḥ Vaśishṭhena rakshitās tridivaukasaḥ | Brahma-datta-varāś chaiva hatāḥ daityāḥ mahātmanā | etat karma Vaśishṭhasya kathitaṁ hi mayā 'nagha | bravīmy aham brūhi vā tvam Vaśishṭhāt kshattriyaṁ varam |

"The gods being distressed by them, resorted to Indra; and he too, being harassed by them, went to Vaśishṭha for help. This reverend and benevolent sage gave them all his protection; and being aware of their distress, without any exertion, burnt up all the Dānavas . . . . 7289. Thus were the gods, including Indra, preserved by Vaśishṭha, and the Daityas, even although they had obtained a boon from Brahmā, were slain. Such was the exploit of Vaśishṭha: can you tell me of any Kshattriya who was superior to him?"

A further tale is told of the prowess of the sage Atri, who interposed to deliver the gods and restore light to the celestial luminaries:

Verse 7292. Ghore tamasy ayudhyanta sahitāḥ deva-dānavāḥ | avidhyata śarais tattra Svarbhānuḥ Soma-bhāskarau | atha te tamasā grastāḥ vihanyante sma dānavaiḥ | devāḥ nṛipati-śārdūla sahaiva Balibhis tadā | asurair badhyamānās te kshīṇa-prāṇāḥ divaukasaḥ | apaśyanta tapasyantam Atriṁ vipraṁ tapodhanam | . . . . 7297. Te 'bruvaṁś "chandramāḥ bhava | timira-ghnaś cha savitā dasyu-hantā cha no bhava" | evam uktas tadā 'trir vai tamo-nud abhavat śaśī | apaśyat saumya-bhāvāch cha soma-

vat-priya-darśanaḥ | dṛishṭvā nātiprabhaṁ somaṁ tathā sūryaṁ cha pārthiva | prakāśam akarod Atris tapasā svena saṁyuge | 7300. Jagad vitimiraṁ chāpi prakāśam akarot tadā | vyajayat śatru-samghāṁś cha devānāṁ svena tejasā | . . . . 7303. Dvijenāgni-dvitīyena japatā charma-vāsasā | phala-bhakṣheṇa rājarshe paśya karmāttriṇā kṛitam | . . . . 7304. . . . . brūhi vā tvam Atritaḥ kshattriyaṁ varam |

"The gods and Dānavas fought together in dreadful darkness; when Svarbhānu pierced with his arrows the sun and moon. Enveloped in gloom the gods were slaughtered by the Dānavas, together with the Balis. Being thus slain and exhausted, the celestials beheld the Brāhman Atri employed in austerities;" and invoked his aid in their extremity. He asked what he should do. They reply, verse 2297: "'Become the moon, and the gloom-dispelling sun, the slayer of the Dasyus.' Atri then became the gloom-dispelling moon, and in his character as such looked beautiful as Soma. Perceiving the sun and moon to be shorn of their brightness, Atri threw light upon the conflict, (7300) freed the world from darkness, by the power of his austere-fervour, and vanquished the enemies of the gods. . . . . 7303. Behold the deed done by Atri, the Brāhman, attended by Agni, the mutterer of prayers, clad in a skin, and living upon fruits. . . . . 7304. 'Tell me of any Kshattriya superior to Atri.'"

This story is founded on some verses of the Rig-veda, v. 40, 5: Yat tvā sūryya Svarbhānus tamasā 'vidhyad āsuraḥ | akshetra-vid yathā mudgho bhuvanāni adīdhayuḥ | 6. Svarbhānor adha yad Indra māyāḥ avo divo varttamānāḥ avāhan | gūḷhaṁ sūryyaṁ tamasā 'pavratena turīyeṇa brahmaṇā 'vindad Atriḥ | 8. Grāvṇo brahmā yujujānaḥ saparyyan kīriṇā devān namasopaśikshan | Atriḥ sūryasya divi chakshur ādhāt Svarbhānor apa māyāḥ aghukshat | 9. Yaṁ vai sūryyaṁ Svarbhānus tamasā 'vidhyad āsuraḥ | Atrayas tam anv avindan nahi anye aśaknuvan |

"When Svarbhānu of the Asura race pierced thee, o Sun, with darkness, all worlds appeared like a man who is bewildered in a region which he does not know. 6. When, Indra, thou didst sweep away the magical arts of Svarbhānu, which were operating beneath the sky, Atri discovered by the fourth text the Sun, which had been hidden by the hostile darkness. 8. Applying the (soma-crushing) stones, performing worship, serving the gods with reverence and praise, the priest Atri placed the eye of the Sun in the sky, and dispelled the illusions of Svarbhānu. 9. The Atris discovered the Sun which Svarbhānu had pierced with darkness. No others could."

We have next a curious legend about the sage Chyavana, of the race of Bhṛigu:

7306. Aśvinoḥ pratisaṁśrutya Chyavanaḥ Pākaśāsanam | provācha sahito devaiḥ "somapāv Aśvinau kuru" | Indraḥ uvācha | "asmābhir ninditāv etau bhavetāṁ somapau katham | devair na sammitāv etau tasmād maivaṁ vadasva naḥ | Aśvibhyāṁ saha nechhāmaḥ somam pātum mahāvrata | yad anyad vakshyase vipra tat karishyāma te vachaḥ" | Chyavanaḥ uvācha | "pibetām Aśvinau somam bhavadbhiḥ sahitāv ubhau | ubhāv etāv api surau sūryya-puttrau sureśvara | 7310. Kriyatām mad-vacho devāḥ yathā vai samudāhṛitam | etad vaḥ kurvatāṁ śreyo bhaved naitad akurvatām" | Indraḥ uvācha | "Aśvibhyāṁ saha somaṁ vai na pāsyāmi dvijottama | pibantv anye yathākāmaṁ nāham pātum ihotsahe" | Chyavanaḥ uvācha | "na chet karishyasi vacho mayoktam bala-sūdana | mayā pramathitaḥ sadyaḥ somam pāsyasi vai makhe" | tataḥ karma samārabdhaṁ hitāya sahasā 'śvinoḥ | Chyavanena tato mantrair abhibhūtāḥ surā 'bhavan | tat tu karma samārabdhaṁ dṛishṭvendraḥ krodha-mūrchhitaḥ | udyamya vipulaṁ śailaṁ Chyavanaṁ samupādravat | 7315. Tathā vajreṇa bhagavān amarshākula-lochanaḥ | tam āpatantaṁ dṛishṭvaiva Chyavanas tapasā 'nvitaḥ | adbhiḥ siktvā 'stambhayat taṁ sa-vajraṁ saha-parvatam | athendrasya mahāghoraṁ so 'sṛijat śatrum eva hi | Mayaṁ nāmāhutimayaṁ vyāditāsyam mahāmuniḥ | . . . . 7319. Jihvā-mūlāsthitās tasya sarve devāḥ sa-vāsavāḥ | timer āsyam anupraptāḥ yathā matsyāḥ mahārṇave | te sammantrya tato deva Madasyāsya samīpagāḥ | abruvan sahitāḥ S'akram praṇamāsmai dvijātaye | Aśvibhyāṁ saha somaṁ cha pibāma 'vigata-jvarāḥ | tataḥ sa praṇataḥ S'akraś chakāra Chyavanasya tat | Chyavanaḥ kṛitavān etāv Aśvinau soma-pāyinau | tataḥ pratyāharat karma Madaṁ cha vyabhajad muniḥ |

"Having given a promise to that effect, Chyavana applied, along with the other gods, to Indra, to allow the Aśvins to partake in the soma juice. Indra answered, 'How can they become drinkers of the soma, seeing they are reviled by us, and are not on an equality with the gods? We do not wish to drink soma in their company; but we shall accede to your wishes in any other respect.' Chyavana repeats his request, and urges that the Aśvins also are gods, and the offspring of the Sun. 7310. He adds that it will be well for the gods if they accede to this demand, and ill if they do not. Indra rejoins that the other gods may drink with the Aśvins if they please, but he cannot bring himself to do it. Chyavana retorts that if he does not, he shall be chastised by the sage, and made to drink soma (with them) at the sacrifice. A ceremony was then instantly begun by Chyavana for the benefit of the Aśvins; and the gods were vanquished by sacred texts. Indra, seeing this rite commenced, became incensed, uplifted a vast mountain (7315), and rushed with his thunderbolt, and with angry eyes, on Chyavana. The sage, however, sprinkling him with water, arrested him with his mountain and thunderbolt. Chyavana then created a fearful open-mouthed monster, called Mada, formed of the substance of the oblation," who is further described as having teeth and grinders of portentous length, and jaws, one of which enclosed the earth and the other the sky: and the gods, including Indra, are said (7319), "to have been at the root of his tongue [ready to be devoured] like fishes in the mouth of a sea monster. Finding themselves int his predicament, the gods took counsel and said to Indra, 'Make salutation to Chyavana, and let us drink soma along with the Aśvins, and so escape from our sufferings.' Indra then, making obeisence, granted the demand of Chyavana, who was thus the cause of the Aśvins becoming drinkers of the soma. He then performed the ceremony, and clove Mada to pieces."

Does this legend mean that this rishi of the Bhṛigu family was the first to introduce the Aśvins within the circle of the Arian worship?

Compare the passages from the Śatapatha Brāhmana iv. 1, 5, 1 ff., and from the Vanaparvan of the M. Bh. verses 10316 ff. quoted in my "Contributions to a knowledge of the Vedic theogony and mythology," No. II., in the Journ. R. A. S., for 1866, pp 11 ff.; Ind. St. i. 188, and the Āśvamedhika-parvan of the M. Bh., verses 249 ff., there referred to. The Aśvins are, in different passages of the Rig-veda, as iii. 58, 7, 9; viii. 8, 5; viii. 35, 7–10, invited to drink the soma-juice.

Vāyu relates to Arjuna yet one more instance of the irresistible power of the Brāhmans:

7327. Madasyāsyam anuprāptāḥ yadā sendrāḥ divaukasaḥ | tadaiva Chyavaneneha hṛitā teshāṁ vasundharā | ubhau lokau hṛitau matvā te devāḥ duḥkhitāḥ bhṛiśam | śokārttāś cha mahātmāno Brahmāṇaṁ śaraṇaṁ yayuḥ | devāḥ ūchuḥ | Madāsya-vyatisiktānām asmākaṁ loka-pūjita | Chyavanena hṛitā bhūmiḥ Kapaiś chaiva divam prabho | Brahmā uvācha |

7330. Gachhadhvaṁ śaraṇaṁ viprān āśu sendrāḥ divaukasaḥ | prasādya tān ubhau lokāv avāpsyatha yathā purā | te yayuḥ śaraṇaṁ viprān ūchus te "kān jayāmahe" | ity uktās te dvijān prāhur "jayateha Kapān" iti | "bhūgatān hi vijetāro vayam" ity abruvan "dvijāḥ" | tataḥ karma samārabdham brāhmaṇaiḥ Kapa-nāśanam | tat śrutvā preshito dūto brāhmaṇebhyo Dhanī Kapaiḥ | bhū-gatān brāhmaṇān āha Dhanī Kapa-vacho yathā | "bhavadbhiḥ sadṛiśāḥ sarve Kapāḥ kim iha varttate | sarve vedavidaḥ prājnāḥ sarve cha kratu-yājinaḥ | 7335. Sarve satyavratāś chaiva sarve tulyāḥ maharshibhiḥ | śrīś chaiva ramataiteshu dhārayanti śriyaṁ cha te | . . . . 7339. Etaiś chānyaiś cha bahubhir guṇair yuktān kathaṁ Kapān | 7340. Vijeshyatha nivarttadhvaṁ nivṛittānāṁ śubhaṁ hi vaḥ" | Brāhmaṇāḥ ūchuḥ | Kapān vayaṁ vijeshyāmo ye devās te vayaṁ smṛitāḥ | tasmād badhyāḥ Kapā 'smākam Dhanin yāhi yathāgatam | Dhanī gatvā Kapān āha "na no viprāḥ priyaṅkarāḥ | gṛihītvā 'straṇy atho viprān Kapāḥ sarve samādravan | samudagra-dhvajān dṛishṭvā Kapān sarve dvijātayaḥ | vyasṛijan jvalitān agnīn Kapānām prāṇa-nāśanān | brahmasṛishṭāḥ havyabhujaḥ Kapān hatvā sanātanāḥ | nabhasīva yathā 'bhrāṇi vyarājanta narādhipa | Hatvā vai dānavān devāḥ sarve sambhūya saṁyuge | tenābhyajānan hi tadā brāhmaṇair nihatān Kapān | athāgamya mahātejāḥ Nārado 'kathayad vibho | yathā hatāḥ mahābhāgais tejasā brāhmaṇaiḥ Kapāḥ | Nāradasya vachaḥ śrutvā prītāḥ sarve divaukasaḥ | praśaśaṁsuḥ dvijāṁś chāpi brāhmaṇāṁś cha yaśasvinaḥ |

"When the gods, including Indra, were enclosed within the mouth of Mada, the earth was taken from them by Chyavana. The gods then considering that they had lost both worlds, in their distress resorted to Brahmā, and said, 'Since we have been swallowed up in the mouth of Mada, the earth has been taken from us by Chyavana, and the heaven by the Kapas.' Brahmā answered, 'Go speedily, ye gods, with Indra, to the Brāhmans for help. After propitiating them ye shall regain both worlds.' They did so, and the Brāhmans, after ascertaining that the gods would themselves deal with those of their enemies who were on earth, began a ceremony for the destruction of the Kapas. The Kapas upon this sent a messenger to the Brāhmans, to say that they themselves were all, like them, skilled in the Vedas, learned, and offerers of sacrifice, all pure in their observances, and all resembling great rishis, etc., etc. How then should the Brāhmans be able to conquer them? It would be more for their interest to desist from the attempt. The Brāhmans, however, would not be persuaded; and when, in consequence, the Kapas assailed them, they hurled forth fires by which the Kapas were destroyed. The gods themselves conquered the Dānavas, and learning from Nārada what the illustrious Brāhmans had effected, they sang their praises."[247]

Hearing of all these testimonies to the terrible might of the Brāhmans, Arjuna at length gives in, saying:

7350. Jīvāmy aham brāhmaṇārthaṁ sarvathā satatam prabho | brahmaṇyo brāhmaṇebhyaś cha praṇamāmi cha nityaśaḥ | Dattātttreya-prasādāch cha mayā prāptam idam balam | loke cha paramā kīrttir dharmaś cha charito mahān | aho brāhmaṇa-karmāṇi mayā Māruta tattvataḥ | tvayā proktāni kārtsnyena śrutāni prayatena cha | Vāyur uvācha | brāhmaṇān kshāttra-dharmeṇa pālayasvendriyāṇi cha | Bhṛigubhyas te bhayaṁ ghoraṁ tat tu kālād bhavishyati |

"I live altogether and always for the sake of the Brāhmans. I am devoted to the Brāhmans, and do obeisance to them continually. And it is through the favour of Dattāttreya (a Brāhman) that I have obtained all this power and high renown, and that I have practised righteousness. Thou hast declared to me truly all the acts of the Brāhmans, and I have listened intently." Vāyu then says to him: "Protect the Brāhmans, fulfilling a Kshattriya's function; and restrain your senses. A dreadful cause of apprehension impends over you from the Bhṛigus, but it will only take effect after some time." This last remark may have been introduced to bring this story into harmony with the other legend about the destruction of Arjuna and the Kshattriyas.

The narrative, which has just been quoted, is, as I have already stated, preceded by a panegyric of some length pronounced by Bhīshma on the Brāhmans (verses 7163–7184), of which the following are specimens:

7163. Brāhmaṇānām paribhavaḥ sādayed api devatāḥ | 7164. Te hi lokān imān sarvān dhārayanti manīshiṇaḥ | 7175. Chandane mala-panke cha bhojane 'bhojane samāḥ | vāso yeshāṁ dukūlaṁ cha śāna-kshaumājināni cha | 7177. Adaivaṁ daivataṁ kuryur daivataṁ vā 'py adaivatam | lokān anyān sṛijeyus te lokapālāṁś cha kopitāḥ | 7179. Devānām api ye devāḥ kāraṇaṁ kāraṇasya cha | 7181. Avidvān brāhmaṇo devaḥ . . . . | vidvān bhūyas tato devaḥ pūrṇa-sāgara-sannibhaḥ |

"The prowess of the Brāhmans can destroy even the gods. 7164.

[247] This translation is a good deal condensed.

Those wise beings uphold all these worlds. 7175. To them it is indifferent whether they are perfumed with sandal wood or deformed with mire, whether they eat or fast, whether they are clad in silk, or in sackcloth or skins. 7177. They can turn what is not divine into what is divine, and the converse; and can in their anger create other worlds with their guardians. 7179. They are the gods of the gods; and the cause of the cause. 7181. An ignorant Brāhman is a god, whilst a learned Brāhman is yet more a god, like the full ocean." (Compare the similar eulogies in p. 130, above.)

In the Anuśāsanaparvan, sections 52 ff., we have the story of Paraśurāma, in connection with that of Viśvāmitra, yet once more handled. Yudhishṭhira says he is very curious to know something more about these two personages:

2718. Katham esha samutpanno Rāmaḥ satya-parākramaḥ | katham brahmarshi-vaṁśo 'yaṁ kshattra-dharmā vyajāyata | tad asya sambhavaṁ rājan nikhilenānukīrttaya | Kauśikāch cha kathaṁ vaṁśāt kshattrād vai brāhmaṇo 'bhavat | aho prabhāvaḥ sumahān āsīd vai sumahātmanaḥ | Rāmasya cha nara-vyāghra Viśvāmitrasya chaiva hi | katham putrān atikramya teshāṁ naptṛishv athābhavat | esha doshaḥ sutān hitvā tat tvaṁ vyākhyātum arhasi |

"How was this valiant Rāma, descended from the family of a Brāhman-rishi, born with the qualities of a Kshattriya? Tell me the whole story: and how did a Brāhman spring from the Kshattriya race of Kuśika? Great was the might of Rāma, and of Viśvāmitra. How did it happen that, passing over the sons [of Ṛichīka and Kuśika], this defect showed itself in their grandsons?"

Then there follows a long dialogue related by Bhīshma as having taken place between king Kuśika and the sage Chyavana. The latter, it seems, "foreseeing that this disgrace was about to befall his race [from connection with the Kuśikas], and entertaining, in consequence, after he had weighed all the good and evil, and the strength and weakness (on either side), the desire of burning up that whole family" (verse 2723. Etaṁ dosham purā dṛishṭvā Bhārgavaś Chyavanas tadā | āgāminam mahābuddhiḥ sva-vaṁśe muni-sattamaḥ | niśchitya manasā sarvaṁ guṇa-dosham balābalam | dagdhu-kāmaḥ kulaṁ sarvaṁ Kuśikānāṁ tapodhanaḥ |), came to Kuśika. Chyavana is welcomed and treated with great attention, and receives from Kuśika the offer of all his kingdom, etc. The saint, however, does not requite this honour with corresponding kindness, but makes the king and his wife perform many menial offices, rub his feet, attend while he sleeps, bring him food, and draw him in a chariot, while he lacerates their backs with a goad. All this is submitted to so patiently, that the sage is propitiated, addresses them in kindly tones, and touches their wounded bodies with his godlike hands. After creating a magical golden palace, with all the accompaniments of pleasure (2826 ff.), in order to give them a conception of heaven, (2892 ff.) the sage offers to bestow any boon the king may choose; and to solve any of his doubts. Kuśika asks the reason of the sage's unaccountable procedure. Chyavana answers that he had heard from Brahmā that there would be "a confusion of families in consequence of the hostility of Brāhmans and Kshattriyas, and that a grandson of great glory and heroism would be born to Kuśika" (verse 2878. Brahma-kshattra-virodhena bhavitā kula-sankaraḥ | pautras te bhavitā rājaṁs tejo-vīryya-samanvitaḥ |); that he had intended in consequence to burn up the race of the Kuśikas, but that the king had come so well out of the severe ordeal to which he had been subjected, that the sage had become thoroughly pacified, and would grant the boon which Kuśika desired:

2897. Bhavishyaty esha te kāmas Kauśikāt Ḳauśiko dvijaḥ | tṛitīyam purushaṁ tubhyam brāhmaṇatvaṁ gamishyati | vaṁśas te pārthiva-śreshṭha Bhṛigūṇām eva tejasā | pautras te bhavitā vipras tapasvī pāvana-dyutiḥ | yaḥ sa-deva-manushyāṇām bhayam utpādayishyati |

"This thy desire shall be fulfilled; from a Kauśika a Kauśika Brāhman shall arise: in the third generation thy race shall attain to Brāhmanhood by the might of the Bhṛigus. Thy son's son shall become a Brāhman, a devotee, splendid as fire, who shall alarm both gods and men." Kuśika being anxious to know how all this was to be brought to pass, Chyavana informs him:

2995. Bhṛigūṇāṁ kshattriyāḥ yājyāḥ nityam etaj janādhipa | te cha bhedaṁ gamishyanti daiva-yuktena hetunā | kshattriyāś cha Bhṛigūn sarvān badhishyanti narādhipa | āgarbhād anukṛintanto daiva-daṇḍa nipīḍitāḥ | tataḥ utpatsyate 'smākaṁ kula-gotra-vivardhanaḥ | Ūrvo nāma mahātejā jvalanārka-sama-dyutiḥ | sa trailokya-vināśāya kopāgniṁ janayishyati | mahīṁ sa-parvata-vanāṁ yaḥ karishyati bhasmasāt | kanchit kālaṁ tu vahniṁ cha sa eva śamayishyati | samudre vaḍavā-vaktre prak-

shipya muni-sattamaḥ | 2910. Puttraṁ tasya mahārāja Ṛichīkam Bhṛigu-nandanam | sākshāt kṛitsno dhanur-vedaḥ samupasthāsyate 'nagha | kshattriyāṇām abhāvāya daiva-yuktena hetunā | sa tu tam pratigṛihyaiva puttraṁ sankrāmayishyati | Jamadagnau mahābhāge tapasā bhāvitātmani | sa chāpi Bhṛigu-śārdūlas taṁ vedaṁ dhārayishyati | kulāt tu tava dharmātman kanyāṁ so 'dhigamishyati | udbhāvanārtham bhavato vaṁśasya Bharatarshabha | Gādher duhitaram prāpya pauttrīṁ tava mahātapāḥ | brāhmaṇaṁ kshattra-dharmāṇam puttram utpādayishyati | 2915. Kshattriyaṁ vipra-karmāṇam Vṛihaspatim ivaujasā | Viśvāmitraṁ tava kule Gādheḥ puttraṁ sudhārmikam | tapasā mahatā yuktam pradāsyati mahādyute | striyau tu kāraṇaṁ tattra parivartte bhavishyataḥ | Pitāmaha-niyogād vai nānyathaitad bhavishyati | tṛitīye purushe tubhyam brāhmaṇatvam upaishyati | bhavitā tvaṁ cha sambandhī Bhṛigūṇām bhāvitātmanām | . . . . 2923. Etat te kathitaṁ sarvam aśeshena mayā nṛipa | Bhṛigūṇaṁ Kuśikānāṁ cha abhisambandha-kāraṇam | yathoktam ṛishiṇā chāpi tadā tad abhavad nṛipa | janma Rāmasya cha muner Viśvāmitrasya chaiva hi |

"The Bhṛigus have always been the priests of the Kshattriyas; but these will become hostile to each other for a fated reason. The Kshattriyas shall slay all the Bhṛigus, even to children in the womb, being oppressed by a divine nemesis. Then shall arise the glorious Ūrva,[248] like the sun in splendour, who shall augment the glory of our race. He shall create a fire of wrath for the destruction of the three worlds, which shall reduce the earth with its mountains and forests to ashes. After a time he will extinguish the fire, throwing it into the ocean into the mouth of Vaḍavā (the submarine fire). Into his son Ṛichīka shall enter the entire embodied Dhanur-veda (science of archery), for the destined destruction of the Kshattriyas. This science he shall transmit to his great son Jamadagni, whose mind shall be spiritualized by devotion, and who shall possess that Veda. He (Ṛichīka) shall obtain [for his wife] a maiden of thy family, to prolong thy race. This great devotee, wedding thy grand-daughter, the daughter of Gādhi, shall beget a Brāhman (i.e. Paraśurāma), fulfilling the functions of a Kshattriya; (2915) and shall bestow on thy family a Kshattriya who shall perform the functions of a Brāhman, Viśvāmitra, the son of Gādhi, an austere devotee, and glorious as Vṛihaspati. The two wives shall be the cause of this interchange of characters. According to the decree of Brahmā all this shall so happen. Brāhmanhood shall come to thee in the third generation, and thou shalt become connected with the spiritual-minded Bhṛigus." 2923. "Thus (concludes Bhīshma) have I told thee at length the cause of the connection between the Bhṛigus and the Kuśikas. All this was accordingly fulfilled in the births of Paraśurāma and Viśvāmitra."

[248] Ūrva is here said (verse 2907) to belong to the race of Chyavana, but whether as a near or remote descendant is not stated. In verse 2910 Ṛichīka is said to be the son of Ūrva. In the Ādiparvan, verses 2610 ff., the matter is somewhat differently stated: Ārushī tu Manoḥ kanyā tasya patnī yaśasvinī | Aurvas tasyāṁ samabhavad ūrum bhittvā mahāyaśāḥ | mahātejāḥ mahāvīryyo bālaḥ eva guṇair yutaḥ | Ṛichīkas tasya puttras tu Jamadagnis tato 'bhavat | "Ārushī, the daughter of Manu, was the wife of the sage (Chyavana); of her was the illustrious Aurva born, having split his mother's thigh. He was great in glory and might, and from his childhood endowed with eminent qualities. Ṛichīka was his son, and Ṛichīka's was Jamadagni." Here Aurva is said to derive his name from having divided his mother's thigh (ūru); and no allusion is made to Ūrva, though the same person appears to be meant. In the passage of the Anuśāsana-parvan, however, we have an Ūrva, the father of Ṛichīka, whose patronymic will thus be Aurva; as it is, in fact, in the Vishṇu Purāṇa, as quoted above in p. 352.

Is this legend intended to account for a real fact? Was Paraśurāma of a sacerdotal tribe, and yet by profession a warrior, just as Viśvāmitra was conversely of royal extraction, and yet a priest by profession?

According to the Vishṇu Purāṇa, iv. 11, 3 (Wilson, 4to. ed. pp. 416, 417), Arjuna was of the race of Yadu, and the ninth in descent from Haihaya, the great-grandson of that prince. It is there said of him:

Kṛitavīryyād Arjunaḥ sapta-dvīpapatir bāhu-sahasrī jajne yo 'sau bhagavad-aṁśam Atri-kula-prasūtaṁ Dattāttreyākhyam ārādhya bāhu-sahasram adharma-sevā-nivāraṇaṁ dharmeṇa pṛithivījayaṁ dharmataś chānupālanam arātibhyo 'parājayam akhila-jagat-prakhyāta-purushāch cha mṛityum ity etān varān abhilashitavān lebhe cha | tena iyam aśesha-dvīpavatī pṛithvī samyak paripālitā | daśa-yajna-sahasrāṇy asāv ayajat | tasya cha śloko 'dyāpi gīyate "na nūnaṁ kārttavīryyasya gatiṁ yāsyanti pārthivāḥ | yajnair dānair tapobhir vā praśrayeṇa damena cha" | anashṭa-dravyatā tasya rājye 'bhavat | 4. Evam panchāśīti-sahasrāṇy abdān avyāhatārogya-śrī-bala-parākramo rājyam akarot | Māhishmatyām dig-vijayābhyāgato Narmadā-jalāvagāhana-krīḍā-nipāna-madākulena ayatnenaiva tena aśesha-deva-daitya-gandharveśa-jayodbhūta-madāvalepo 'pi Rāvaṇaḥ paśur iva baddhaḥ svanagaraikānte sthāpitaḥ | 5. Yaḥ panchāśīti-varsha-sahasropalakshaṇa-kālāvasāne bhagavan-nārāyaṇāṁśena Paraśurāmeṇa upasaṁhṛitaḥ |

"From Kṛitavīrya sprang Arjuna, who was lord of the seven dvīpas [circular and concentric continents of which the earth is composed], and had a thousand arms. Having worshipped a portion of the divine Being, called Dattāttreya, sprung from the race of Atri, he sought and obtained these boons, viz. a thousand arms, the power of restraining wrong by justice, the conquest of the earth, and the disposition to rule it righteously, invincibility by enemies, and death at the hands of a man renowned over the whole world. By him this earth, with all its dvīpas, was perfectly governed. He offered ten thousand sacrifices. To this day this verse is repeated respecting him: 'No other king shall ever equal Kārtavīrya in regard to sacrifices, liberality, austerities, courtesy, and self-restraint.' In his reign no property was ever lost. 4. Thus he ruled for eighty-five thousand years with unbroken health, prosperity, strength, and valour. When he was excited by sporting in the Narmadā and by drinking wine, he had no difficulty in binding like a beast Rāvaṇa, who had arrived in Māhishmatī in his career of conquest, and who was filled with arrogance, arising from the pride of victory over all the gods, daityas, and gandharva chiefs, and imprisoning him in a secret place in his capital. At the end of his reign of eighty-five thousand years Arjuṇa was destroyed by Paraśurāma, who was a portion of the divine Nārāyana."

The Bhāgavata Purāṇa, ix. 23, 20–27, assigns to him the same descent, and relates of him nearly the same particulars. Verse 23 says: Arjunaḥ Kṛitavīryyasya sapta-dvīpeśvaro 'bhavat | Dattāttreyād Harer aṁśāt prāpta-yoga-mahāguṇaḥ | "Arjuna was the son of Kṛitavīrya, and ruler of the seven dvīpas. He obtained the great attribute of Yoga (supernatural powers arising from devotion) from Dattāttreya, who was a portion of Hari," etc.

The legend of Paraśurāma, as related, is of course fabulous. Not to speak of the miraculous powers which are ascribed to this hero, and the incredible number of the exterminations which he is said to have executed, we cannot even suppose it probable that the Brāhmans should in general have been sufficiently powerful and warlike to overcome the Kshattriyas by force of arms. But the legend may have had some small foundation in fact. Before the provinces of the sacerdotal and military classes were accurately defined, there may have been cases in which ambitious men of the former successfully aspired to kingly dominion, just as scions of royal races became distinguished as priests and sages. But even without this assumption, the existence of such legends is sufficiently explained by the position which the Brāhmans eventually occupied. With the view of maintaining their own ascendancy over the minds of the chiefs on whose good will they were dependent, and of securing for themselves honour and profit, they would have an interest in working upon the superstitious feelings of their contemporaries by fabricating stories of supernatural punishments inflicted by their own forefathers on their royal oppressors, as well as by painting in lively colours the prosperity of those princes who were submissive to the spiritual order.

CHAPTER V.

RELATION OF THE BRAHMANICAL INDIANS TO THE NEIGHBOURING TRIBES, ACCORDING TO MANU AND THE PURANAS.

I now propose to enquire what account the Indian writers give of the origin of those tribes which were not comprehended in their own polity, but with which, as dwelling within, or adjacent to, the boundaries of Hindustan, their countrymen were, in ancient times, brought into continual and familiar contact.

It appears to have been the opinion of Manu, the great authority in all matters regarding the Hindu religion and institutions in their full development, that there was no original race of men except the four castes of Brāhmans, Kṣhattriyas, Vaiśyas, and Sūdras; and that all other nations were derived from these. His own words (x. 4) are these: Brāhmaṇaḥ kshattriyo vaiśyas trayo varṇāḥ dvijātayaḥ | chaturthaḥ ekajātis tu śūdro nāsti tu panchamaḥ | "Three castes, the Brāhman, the Kshattriya, and the Vaiśya, are twice-born; the fourth, the Sūdra, is once-born; and there is no fifth." On the last clause of this verse Kullūka Bhaṭṭa annotates thus: Panchamaḥ punar varṇo nāsti sankīrṇa-jātīnāṁ tv aśvatarā-vad mātā-pitṛi-jāti-vyatirikta-jāty-antaratvād na varṇatvam | ayaṁ cha jāty-antaropadeśaḥ śāstre saṁvyavaharaṇārthaḥ | "There is no fifth caste; for caste cannot be predicated of the mixed tribes, from the fact that, like mules, they belong to another species, distinct from that of their father and mother. And this reference, which is made in the Sāstras to castes other than the four, is merely for the sake of convenience and conformity to common usage."

Accordingly, in the following description which Manu gives in the same chapter of the rise of the inferior castes, they are all, even the very lowest, such as Nishādas and Chaṇḍālas, derived from the mixture the four so-called original castes. Thus, in verse 8: Brāhmaṇād vaiśya-kanyāyām ambashṭho nāma jāyate | nishādaḥ śūdra-kanyāyāṁ yaḥ parāśava uchyate | "From a Brāhman father and a Vaiśya mother springs an Ambashṭha: from a Brāhman father and a Śūdra mother is born a Nishāda, called also Parāśava."[1] Again, in verse 12. Śūdrād āyogavaḥ kshattā chāṇḍālaś chādhamo nṛiṇām | vaiśya-rājanya-viprāsu jāyante varṇa-sankarāḥ | "From a Śūdra, by women of the Vaiśya, Kshattriya, and Brāhman castes are born those mixed classes, the Āyogava, the Kshattṛi, and the Chaṇḍāla, lowest of men." Again, in verse 20: Dvijātayaḥ savarṇāsu janayanty avratāṁs tu yān | tān sāvitrī-paribhrashṭān vrātyāḥ iti vinirdiśet | "Persons whom the twice-born beget on women of their own classes, but who omit the prescribed rites, and have abandoned the gāyatrī, are to be designated as Vrātyas."[2] In the next three verses the inferior tribes, which spring from the Brāhman Vrātya, the Kshattriya Vrātya, and the Vaiśya Vrātya respectively, are enumerated.

In verses 43 and 44 it is stated: Śanakais tu kriyā-lopād imāḥ

[1] It does not appear how the account of the origin of the Nishāda race from king Vena, given above in pp. 301 and 303, can be reconciled with this theory of Manu; unless recourse be had to the explanation that that story relates to the Svāyambhuva Manvantara. But Manu's narrative seems to refer to the same period. See above, p. 39. If the Vedic expressions panchajanāḥ and the other corresponding phrases signifying "the five tribes" be rightly interpreted of the "four castes, and the Nishādas," we might understand this as intimating that the Nishādas had at one time been regarded as a distinct race. But the phrase is variously understood by the old Vedic commentators; as has been shewn above, p. 177.

[2] Manu says, ii. 38 f.: Ā-shoḍasād brāhmaṇasya sāvitrī nātivarttate | ā-dvāviṁśāt kshattrabhandhor ā-chaturviṁśater viśaḥ | ataḥ ūrddhaṁ trayo'py ete yathā-kālam asaṁskṛitāḥ | sāvitrī-patitāḥ vrātyāḥ bhavanty āryya-nigarhitāḥ | "The gāyatrī should not, in the case of a Brāhman, be deferred beyond the sixteenth year; nor in the case of a Kshattriya beyond the twenty-second; nor in that of a Vaiśya beyond the twenty-fourth. After these periods youths of the three classes, who have not been invested, become fallen from the gāyatrī, Vrātyas, contemned by respectable men (Āryyas)." In the following verse of the Mahābhārata, Anuśāsanaparvan, line 2621, a different origin is ascribed to the Vrātyas: Chāṇḍālo vrātya-vaidyau cha brāhmaṇyāṁ kshattriyāsu cha | vaiśyāyāṁ chaiva śūdrasya lakshyante'pasadās trayaḥ | "The three outcaste classes are the Chāṇḍāla, the Vrātya, and the Vaidya, begotten by a Śūdra on females of the Brāhman, Kshattriya, and Vaiśya castes respectively." A Vrātya, therefore, according to this account, is the son of a Śūdra man and a Kshattriya woman. On the Vrātyas, see Weber's Indische Studien, i. 33, 52, 138, 139, 445, 446, etc.

kshattriya-jātayaḥ | vṛishalatvaṁ gatāḥ loke brāhmaṇādarśanena cha | Pauṇḍrakāś chodra-draviḍāḥ Kāmbojāḥ Yavanāḥ Śakāḥ | Pāradāḥ Pahlavāś Chīnāḥ Kirātāḥ Daradāḥ Khaśāḥ | "The following tribes of Kshattriyas have gradually sunk into the state of Vṛishalas (outcasts), from the extinction of sacred rites, and from having no communication with Brāhmans; viz. Pauṇḍrakas, Oḍras, Draviḍas, Kāmbojas, Yavanas, Śakas, Pāradas, Pahlavas, Chīnas, Kirātas, Daradas, and Khaśas."

The same thing is affirmed in the Mahābhārata, Anuśāsanaparvan, verses 2103 f.: Śakāḥ Yavana-kāmbojās tās tāḥ kshattriya-jātayaḥ | vṛishalatvam parigatāḥ brāhmaṇānām adarśanāt | Drāviḍāś cha Kalindāś cha Pulindāś chāpy Uśīnarāḥ | Kolisarpāḥ Māhishakās tās tāḥ kshattriya-jātayaḥ ityādi | "These tribes of Kshattriyas, viz. Śakas, Yavanas, Kāmbojas, Drāviḍas, Kalindas, Pulindas, Uśīnaras, Kolisarpas, and Māhishakas, have become Vṛishalas from seeing no Brāhmans." This is repeated in verses 2158–9, where the following additional tribes are named: Mekálas, Lāṭas, Konvaśiras, Śauṇḍīkas, Darvas, Chauras, Śavaras, Barbaras, and Kirātas, and the cause of degradation is, as in verse 2103, restricted to the absence of Brāhmans. (Then follow the lines (2160 ff.) in glorification of the Brāhmans, already quoted in p. 130.)

The Yavanas are said in the Mahābhārata, Ādiparvan, section 85, verse 3533, "to be descended from Turvasu, the Vaibhojas from Druhyu, and the Mlechha tribes from Anu" (Yados tu Yādavāḥ jātās Turvasor Yavanāḥ smṛitāḥ | Druhyoḥ sutās tu Vaibhojāḥ Anos tu mlechha-jātayaḥ |). Is it meant by this that the Yavanas are not to be reckoned among the Mlechhas? Their descent from Turvasu is not however, necessarily in conflict with the assertion of the authorities above quoted, that they are degraded Kshattriyas.

I shall not attempt to determine who the Yavanas, and other tribes mentioned in the text, were.

The verse which succeeds that last quoted from Manu is the following: 45. Mukha-bāhūru-paj-jānām yāḥ loke jātayo vahiḥ | mlechhavāchaś chāryya-vāchaḥ sarve te dasyavaḥ smṛitaḥ | "Those tribes which are outside of the classes produced from the mouth, arms, thighs, and feet, [of Brahmā, i.e. Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and Śūdras,] whether they speak the language of the Mlechhas or of the Āryas, are called Dasyus." The interpretation to be given to this verse turns upon the sense which we assign to "outside" (vāhiḥ). Does it mean that the Dasyus were of a stock originally distinct from that of the four primeval castes, and therefore altogether separate from those tribes which sprang from the intermixture of those four castes, or which, by the neglect of sacred rites, apostatized from their communion? Or does it merely mean that the Dasyus became eventually excluded from the fellowship of the four castes? If the latter sense be adopted, then Dasyu will be little else than a general term embracing all the tribes enumerated in verses 43 and 44. The commentator Kullūka understands the word in the latter sense. His words are: Brāhmaṇa-kshattriya-vaiśya-śūdrāṇāṁ kriyā-lopādinā yāḥ jātayo vāhyāḥ jātāḥ mlechha-bhāshā-yuktāḥ āryya-bhāshopetāḥ vā te dasyavaḥ sarve smṛitāḥ | "All the tribes, which by loss of sacred rites, and so forth, have become outcasts from the pale of the four castes, Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and Śūdras; whether they speak the language of the Mlechhas or of the Āryas, are called Dasyus." His view is confirmed by a short passage in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, quoted above (p. 358), where Viśvāmitra, speaking to his sons, says: "Let your descendants possess the furthest ends (of the country)," and the author of the Brāhmaṇa adds: "These are the numerous border-tribes, the Andhras, Puṇḍras, Śabaras, Pulindas, Mūtibas. Most of the Dasyus are sprung from Viśvāmitra." Here the writer of this ancient Brāhmaṇa connects together certain tribes named either in Manu, or in the Mahābhārata, as degraded Kshattriyas, with the appellation Dāsyu, thus intimating that the latter was a general name embracing all the former. This view is further confirmed by the following lines of the Mahābhārata, book ii. verses 1031–2: Daradān saha Kāmbojair ajayat Pākaśāsaniḥ | prāgut-tarāṁ diśaṁ ye cha vasanty āśritya Dasyavaḥ | "The son of Indra conquered the Daradas with the Kāmbojas, and the Dasyus who dwell in the north-east region;" and still more by the annexed verses from the Droṇaparvan, of the same epic poem, 4747: Kāmbojānāṁ sahasraiścha Śakānāṁ cha viśāmpate | Śavarāṇāṁ Kirātānāṁ Varvaraṇāṁ tathaiva cha | agamya-rūpām pṛithivīm māṁsa-śoṇita-karddamām | kṛitavāṁs tattra Śaineyaḥ kshapayaṁs tāvakam balam | Dasyūnāṁ sa-śirastrāṇaiḥ śrobhir lūna-mūrddhajaiḥ | dīrgha-kūrchair mahī kīrṇā vivarhair aṇḍa-jair iva | "Śaineya, destroying thy host, converted the beautiful earth into a mass of mud with the flesh and blood of thousands of Kāmbojas, Śakas, Śabaras, Kirātas, and Varvaras. The ground was covered with the shorn and hairless but long-bearded heads of the Dasyus, and their helmets, as if with birds bereft of their plumes." Here the word Dasyu is evidently a general term for the tribes named just before. Some of these same tribes had previously been called Mlechhas in verses 4716, 4723, and 4745. See also Sabhāp. 1198 f.

There is a passage in the Śāntiparvan, section 65, lines 2429 ff., which is worth quoting, as it shows that the Brāhmans of that age regarded the Dasyus as owing allegiance to Brahmanical institutions. King Māṉdhātṛi had performed a sacrifice in the hope of obtaining a vision of Vishṉu; who accordingly appeared to him in the form of Indra (verse 2399). The following is a part of their conversation. Māndhātṛi asks:

2429. Yavanāḥ Kirātāḥ Gāndhārāś Chīnāḥ Śavara-varvarāḥ | Śakās Tushārāḥ Kankāś cha Pahlavāś chāndhra-madrakāḥ | 2430. Pauṉḍrāḥ Pulindāḥ Ramaṭhāḥ Kāmbojāś chaiva sarvaśaḥ | brahma-kshattra-prasūtāś cha vaiśyāḥ śūdrāś cha mānavāḥ | kathaṁ dharmāṁś charishyanti sarve vishaya-vāsinaḥ | mad-vidhaiś cha kathaṁ sthāpyāḥ sarve vai dasyu-jīvinaḥ | etad ichhāmy ahaṁ śrotum bhagavaṁs tad bravīhi me | tvam bandhu-bhūto hy asmākaṁ kshattriyāṉāṁ sureśvara | Indraḥ uvācha | mātā-pitror hi śuśrūshā karttavyā sarva-dasyubhiḥ | āchāryya-guru-śuśrūshā tathaivāśrama-vāsināṁ | bhūmipānāṁ cha śuśrūshā karttavyā sarva-dasyubhiḥ | veda-dharma-kriyāś chaiva teshāṁ dharmo vidhīyate | 2435. Pitṛi-yajñāś tathā kūpāḥ prapāś cha śayanāni cha | dānāni cha yathā-kālaṁ dvijebhyo visṛijet sadā | ahiṁsā satyam akrodho vṛitti-dāyānupālanam | bharaṉam puttra-dārāṉāṁ śaucham adroha eva cha | dakshiṉā sarva-yajñānāṁ dātavyā bhūtim ichhatā | pākayajñāḥ mahārhāś cha dātavyāḥ sarva-dasyubhiḥ | etāny evamprakārāṉi vihitāni purā 'nagha | sarva-lokasya karmāṉi karttavyāṉīha pārthiva | Mandhātā uvācha | dṛiśyante mānushe loke sarva-varṉeshu Dasyavaḥ | lingāntare varttamānāḥ āśrameshu chaturshv api | Indraḥ uvācha | 2440. Vinashṭāyāṁ daṇḍa-nītyāṁ rāja-dharme nirākṛite | sampramuhyanti bhūtāni rāja-daurātmyato 'nagha | asankhyātāḥ bhavishyanti bhikshavo linginas tathā | aśramāṉāṁ vikalpāś cha nivṛitte'smin kṛite yuge | aśriṇvantaḥ purāṉānāṁ dharmā-ṉām paramāḥ gatīḥ | utpatham pratipatsyante kāma-manyu-samīritāḥ |

"'The Yavanas, Kirātas, Gāndhāras, Chīnas, Śavaras, Varvaras, Śakas, Tushāras, Kaṉkas, Pahlavas, Andhras, Madras, Pauṉḍras, Pu-

lindas, Ramaṭhas, Kāmbojas, men sprung from Brāhmans, and from Kshattriyas, persons of the Vaiśya and Śūdra castes—how shall all these people of different countries practise duty, and what rules shall kings like me prescribe for those who are living as Dasyus? Instruct me on these points; for thou art the friend of our Kshattriya race.' Indra answers: 'All the Dasyus should obey their parents, their spiritual directors, persons practising the rules of the four orders, and kings. It is also their duty to perform the ceremonies ordained in the Vedas. They should sacrifice to the Pitṛis, construct wells, buildings for the distribution of water, and resting places for travellers, and should on proper occasions bestow gifts on the Brāhmans. They should practise innocence, veracity, meekness, purity, and inoffensiveness; should maintain their wives and families; and make a just division of their property. Gifts should be distributed at all sacrifices by those who desire to prosper. All the Dasyus should offer costly pāka oblations. Such duties as these, which have been ordained of old, ought to be observed by all people.' Māndhātṛi observes: 'In this world of men, Dasyus are to be seen in all castes, living, under other garbs, even among men of the four orders (āśramas).' Indra replies: 'When criminal justice has perished, and the duties of government are disregarded, mankind become bewildered through the wickedness of their kings. When this Kṛita age has come to a close, innumerable mendicants and hypocrites shall arise, and the four orders become disorganized. Disregarding the excellent paths of ancient duty, and impelled by passion and by anger, men shall fall into wickedness,'" etc. In these last lines it is implied that the Brahmanical polity of castes and orders was fully developed in the Kṛita [or golden] age. This idea, however, is opposed to the representations which we find in some though not in all other passages. See above, the various texts adduced in the first chapter.

In the Vishṇu Purāṇa, Bhāratavarsha (India) is said to "have its eastern border occupied by the Kirātas; and the western by the Yavanas; while the middle is inhabited by Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and Śūdras, engaged in their several fixed occupations of sacrifice, war, trade, etc." (Vishṇu Purāṇa, ii. 3, 7. Pūrve Kirātāḥ yasyānte paśchime Yavanāḥ sthitāḥ | brāhmaṇāḥ kshattriyāḥ vaiśyāḥ madhye śūdrāś cha bhāgaśaḥ | ijyā-yuddha-vaṇijyādyair varttayanto vyavasthithāḥ |).

Manu's account of the origin of the Yavanas, Sakas, Kāmbojas, etc., corresponds with the tenor of the following story, which we find in the fourth book of the Vishṇu Purāṇa, sect. 3. Bāhu, the seventh king in descent from Hariśchandra (see above, p. 379) was overcome by the Haihăyas and Tālajanghas,[3] and compelled to fly with his queens to the forests, where he died. After his death one of his wives gave birth to a son, who received the name of Sagara. When he had grown up, the youth learnt from his mother all that had befallen his father.

Para. 18. Tataḥ pitṛi-rājya-haraṇāmarshito Haihaya-Tālajanghādi-badhāya pratijnām akarot prāyaśaścha Haihayān jaghāna | Śaka-Yavana-Kāmboja-Pārada-Pahlavāḥ hanyamānās tat-kula-guruṁ Vaśishṭham śaraṇaṁ yayuḥ | 19. Atha etān Vaśishtho jīvan-mṛitakān kṛitvā Sagaram āha "vatsa vatsa alam ebhir ati-jīvan-mṛitakair anusṛitaiḥ | 20. Ete cha mayā eva tvat-pratijnā-paripālanāya nija-dharma-dvija-sanga-parityāgaṁ kāritāḥ" | 21. Sa "tathā" iti tad guru-vachanam abhinandya teshāṁ veshānyatvam akārayat | Yavanān apamuṇḍita-śiraśo 'rddha-muṇḍān Śakān pralamba-keśān Pāradān Pahlavāṁs cha śmaśru-dharān niḥ-svādhyāya-vāshaṭkārān etān anyāṁś cha kshattriyān chakāra | te cha nija-dharma-parityāgād brāhmaṇaiś parityaktāḥ mlechhatāṁ yayuḥ |

"Being vexed at the loss of his paternal kingdom, he vowed to exterminate the Haihăyas and other enemies who had conquered it. Accordingly he destroyed nearly all the Haihăyas. When the Śakas, Yavanas, Kāmbojas, Pāradas, and Pahlavas were about to undergo a similar fate, they had recourse to Vaśishṭha, the king's family-priest, who interposed in their behalf in these words addressed to Sagara, representing them as virtually dead: 'You have done enough, my son, in the way of pursuing these men, who are as good as dead. In order that your vow might be fulfilled, I have compelled them to abandon the duties of their caste, and all association with the twice-born.' Agreeing to his spiritual guide's proposal, Sagara compelled these tribes to alter their costume. He made the Yavanas shave their heads, the Śakas shave half their heads, the Pāradas wear long hair, and the Pahlavas beards. These and other Kshatriyas he deprived of the study of the Vedas, and the vashaṭkāra. In consequence of their abandonment of their proper duties, and of thei rdesertion by the Brāhmans, they became Mlechhas."

[3] See Wilson's Vishṇu Purāṇa, 4to. edit., p. 416 and 418 note. In the note to p. 418 the Āvantyas are mentioned, on the authority of the Vāyu Purāṇa, as being a branch of the Haihăyas. In Manu, x. 21, the Āvantyas are said to be descended from Brāhman Vrātyas.

This story is also related in the Harivaṁśa, from which I extract the concluding part of the narrative:

773. Aurvas tu jātakarmādi tasya kṛitvā mahātmanaḥ | adhyāpya vedān akhilān tato 'stram pratyapādayat | āgneyaṁ tu mahābāhur amarair api dussaham | sa tenāstra-balenājau balena cha samanvitaḥ | Haihayān nijaghānāśu kruddho Rudraḥ paśūn iva | ājahāra cha lokeshu kīrttiṁ kīrttimatāṁ varaḥ | tataḥ Sakān sa-yavanān Kāmbojān Pāradāṁs tathā | Pahlavāṁś chaiva niśśeshān karttuṁ vyavasitaḥ kila | te badhyamānāḥ vīreṇa Sagareṇa mahātmanā | Vaśishṭhaṁ śaraṇaṁ gatvā praṇipetur manīshiṇam | Vaśishṭhas tv atha tān dṛishṭvā samayena mahādyutiḥ | Sagaraṁ vārayāmāsa teshāṁ dattvā 'bhyaṁ taḍā | Sagaraḥ svām pratijñāṁ cha guror vākyaṁ niśamya cha | dharmaṁ jaghāna teshāṁ vai veśānyatvaṁ chakāra ha | arddhaṁ Sakānāṁ śiraso muṇḍayitvā vyasarjayat | Yavanānāṁ śiraḥ sarvaṁ Kāmbojānāṁ tathaiva cha | Pāradāḥ mukta-keśāścha Pahlavāḥ śmaśru-dhāriṇaḥ | nissvādhyāya-vashaṭkārāḥ kṛitās tena mahātmanā | Sakāḥ Yavana-kāmbojāḥ Pāradāḥ Pahlavās tathā | Kolisarpāḥ sa-Mahishāḥ Dārvas Cholāḥ sa-Keralāḥ | sarve te kshattriyās tāta teshāṁ dharmo nirākṛitaḥ | Vaśishṭha-vachanāḍ rājan Sagareṇa mahātmanā |

"Aurva having performed Sagara's natal and other rites, and taught him all the Vedas, then provided him with a fiery missile, such as even the gods could not withstand. By the power of this weapon, and accompanied by an army, Sagara, incensed, speedily slew the Haihayas, as Rudra slaughters beasts; and acquired great renown throughout the world. He then set himself to exterminate the Sakas, Yavanas, Kāmbojas, Pāradas, and Pahlavas. But they, when on the point of being slaughtered by Sagara, had recourse to the sage Vasiśhṭha, and fell down before him. Vasiśhṭha beholding them, by a sign restrained Sagara, giving them assurance of protection. Sagara, after considering his own vow, and listening to what his teacher had to say, destroyed their caste (dharma), and made them change their costumes. He released the Sakas, after causing the half of their heads to be shaven;—and the Yavanas and Kāmbojas, after having had their heads entirely shaved. The Pāradas were made to wear long hair, and the Pahlavas to wear beards. They were all excluded from the study of the Vedas, and from the vashaṭkāra. The Śakas, Yavanas, Kāmbojas, Pāradas, Pahlavas, Kolisarpas, Mahishas, Dārvas, Cholas, and Keralas had all been Kshattriyas; but were deprived of their social and religious position by the great Sagara, according to the advice of Vaśishṭha." Other tribes are mentioned in the following line who seem to have undergone the same treatment.

It would appear from this legend, as well as from the quotations which preceded it, that the Epic and Puranic writers believed all the surrounding tribes to belong to the same original stock with themselves; though they, at the same time, erroneously imagined that these tribes had fallen away from the Brahmanical institutions; thus assigning to their own polity an antiquity to which it could in reality lay no claim. Any further explanations on these points, however, must be sought in the second volume of this work.

In the passages quoted above, pp. 391, 393, and 398 from the Mahābhārata and Rāmāyaṇa, it is stated that Śakas, Yavanas, Pahlavas, etc., were created by Vaśishṭha's wonder-working cow, in order to repel the aggression of Viśvāmitra. It does not, however, appear that it is the object of that legend to represent this miraculous creation as the origin of those tribes. The narrators, if they had any distinct meaning, may not have intended anything more than that the cow called into existence large armies, of the same stock with particular tribes previously existing.

It is not very easy to say whether it is only the inhabitants of Bhāratavarsha (viz. that portion of Jambudvīpa which answers to India) whom the Puranic writers intend to represent as deriving their origin from the four primeval Indian castes. Perhaps the writers themselves had no very clear ideas. At all events the conditions of life are different in the two cases. The accounts which these writers give us of the other divisions of Jambudvīpa, and of the other Dvīpas, or continents, of which they imagined the earth to be composed, and their respective inhabitants, will be considered in the next chapter.

CHAPTER VI.

PURANIC ACCOUNTS OF THE PARTS OF THE EARTH EXTERIOR TO BHĀRATAVARSHA, OR INDIA.

It will clearly appear from the contents of the present chapter that the authors or compilers of the Purāṇas in reality knew nothing of any part of the world except that immediately around them. Whenever they wander away beyond their own neighbourhood, they at once lose themselves in a misty region of fiction, and give the most unbridled scope to their fantastic imaginations.

The following is the account given in the Vishṇu Purāṇa regarding the divisions of the earth, and their inhabitants. Priyavrata, son of Svāyambhuva, or the first Manu (see above, pp. 65 and 72) who is separated from the present time by an enormous interval (see pp. 43 ff. and 298, above), "distributed the seven dvīpas,[1] of which the earth is composed, among seven of his sons" (ii. 1, 7. Priyavrato dadau teshāṁ saptānām muni-sattama | vibhajya sapta dvīpāni Maitreya sumahātmanām).

The Bhāgavata Purāṇa gives us the following account, v. 1. 30. Tad anabhinandan sama-javena rathena jyotirmayena rajanīm api dinaṁ karishyāmi iti saptakṛitvas taraṇim anuparyyakrāmad dvitīyaḥ iva patangaḥ | [evaṁ kurvāṇam Priyavratam āgatya Chaturānanas "tavādhikāro 'yaṁ na bhavati" iti nivārayāmāsa] (The words in brackets are not in the Bombay edition, but are taken from Burnouf's.) 31. Ye vai u ha tad-ratha-charaṇa-nemi-kṛita-parikhātās te sapta sindhavaḥ āsan yataḥ eva kṛitāḥ sapta bhuvo dvīpāḥ |[2] "Priyavrata, being dissatisfied that only

[1] The original division of the earth into seven continents is assigned to Nārāyaṇa in the form of Brahmā; see above, pp. 51 and 76.

[2] In this passage we find the particles vai, u, ha, occurring all together as they do in the Vedic hymns and Brāhmaṇas. This circumstance might seem to suggest the half the earth was illuminated at one time by the solar rays, "followed the sun seven times round the earth in his own flaming car of equal velocity, like another celestial orb, resolved to turn night into day. [Brahmā, however, came and stopped him, saying this was not his province.] The ruts which were formed by the motion of his chariot wheels were the seven oceans. In this way the seven continents of the earth were made."

The same circumstance is alluded to at the commencement of the 16th section of the same book, where the king says to the rishi: verse 2. Tattrāpi Priyavrata-ratha-charaṇa-parikhātaiḥ saptabhiḥ sapta sindhavaḥ upaklṛiptāḥ | yataḥ etasyāḥ sapta-dvīpa-viśesha-vikalpas tvayā bhagavan khalu sūchitaḥ | "The seven oceans were formed by the seven ruts of the wheels of Priyavrata's chariot; hence, as you have indicated, the earth has become divided into seven different continents."

It is clear that this account given by the Bhāgavata Purāṇa of the manner in which the seven oceans and continents were formed does not agree with the description in the Vishṇu Purāṇa, as quoted above in p. 51.

These seven continents are called "Jambu dvīpa, Plaksha dvīpa, Śālpossibility of the passage, or its substance, being derived from some of the Brāhmaṇas (to which, as we have seen, p. 155 note, the compiler of this Purāṇa was in the habit of resorting for his materials); but the style has otherwise nothing of an archaic caste, and I am not aware that the dvīpas are mentioned in any of the Brāhmaṇas. It is also remarkable that the words sapta sindhavaḥ are here used for "seven oceans." This phrase occurs several times in the Vedas. For instance, it is to be found in the Vājasanēyi Sanhitā (of the Yajur-veda), 38, 26, yāvatī dyāvā-prithivī yāvach cha sapta sindhavo vitasthire | "As wide as are the earth and sky, and as far as the seven oceans extend." The commentator Mahīdhara understands the latter in the Puranic sense, as the oceans of milk, etc. (sapta sindhavaḥ sapta samudrāḥ kshīrādyāḥ). The hemistich I have quoted from the Vāj. Sanhitā occurs somewhat modified, and in a different connexion, in the Atharva-veda, iv. 6, 2. The same phrase, sapta sindhavaḥ, is to be found also in several places in the first Book of the Rig-veda. (See Benfey's Glossary to Sāma-veda, sub voce saptan.) In Rig-veda i. 32, 12, it is said to Indra avāsṛijaḥ sarttave sapta sindhūn | "Thou hast let loose the seven rivers to flow." Sāyaṇa understands this of the Ganges and other rivers, seven in number, mentioned in the Rig Veda, x. 75, 5: imam me Gange Yamune Sarasvati Śutudri stomaṁ sachatā Parushṇya | "Receive this my hymn with favour, o Gāngā, Yamunā, Sarasvatī, Śutudrī, with the Parushṇī, etc.;" but in this distich ten rivers in all are mentioned. (See Wilson's note to Rig-veda, i. 32, 12, vol. i. p. 88, of his translation). See also hymns 34, 8; 35, 8; 71, 7; and 102, 2, of the first, and 58, 12, and 85, 1, of the eighth Books of the Rig-veda. The "seven rivers" of the Veda are, according to Professor Müller (Chips from a German Workshop, vol. i. p. 63), "the Indus, the five rivers of the Penjāb and the Sarasvatī."

mali dvīpa, Kuśa dvīpa, Krauncha dvīpa, Śāka dvīpa, and Pushkara dvīpa. They are surrounded severally by seven great seas, of salt water, sugar-cane juice, wine, clarified butter, curds, milk, and fresh water" (V.P. ii. 2, 4. Jambū-plakshāhvayau dvīpau Śālmaliś chāparo dvija | Kuśaḥ Krauncha tathā Śākaḥ Pushkaraś chaiva saptamaḥ | 5. Ete dvīpāḥ samudrais tu sapta saptabhir āvṛitāḥ | lavaṇekshu-surā-sarpir-dadhi-dugdha-jalaiḥ samam |). Jambu dvīpa is in the centre of all these continents (Wilson, vol. ii. p. 110). It fell to the lot of Agnīdhra, son of Priyavrata, who again divided it among his nine sons (Wilson, ii. 101). In the centre of Jambu dvīpa is the golden mountain Meru, 84,000 yojanas high, and crowned by the great city of Brahmā (ibid. p. 118). There are in this continent six cross-ranges of boundary-mountains, those of Himavat (= Himādri, or Himālaya), Hemakūṭa, and Nishadha lying south of Meru; and those of Nīla, Śveta, and Śṛingin, situated to the northward. Of these, Nishadha and Nīla are the nearest to Meru, while Himavat and Śṛingin are at the south and north extremities. The nine Varshas or divisions of Jambu dvīpa, separated by these and other ranges, are Bhārata (India), south of the Himavat mountains, and the southernmost of all; then (2) Kimpurusha, (3) Harivarsha, (4) Ilāvṛita, (5) Ramyaka, (6) Hiraṇmaya, and (7) Uttara Kuru, each to the north of the last; while (8) Bhadrāsva and (9) Ketumāla lie respectively to the east and west of Ilāvṛita, the central region. Bhārata Varsha, and Uttara Kuru, as well as Bhadrāśva and Ketumāla,[3] are situated on the exterior of the mountain ranges. (Wilson, ii. pp. 114–116, and 123.) The eight Varshas to the north of Bhārata Varsha (or India) are thus described:

V.P. ii. 1, 11. Yāni Kimpurushādīni varshāṇy ashtau mahāmune | teshāṁ svābhāvikī siddhiḥ sukha-prāyā hy ayatnataḥ | 12. Viparyyayo

[3] The Mahābhārata tells us, Bhīshmaparvan, verses 227-8, in regard to the Varsha of Ketumāla: āyur daśa sahasrāṇi varshāṇāṁ tattra Bhārata | suvarṇa-varṇāś cha narāḥ striyaś chāpsarasopamāḥ | anāmayāḥ vīta-śokāḥ nityam mudita-mānasāḥ | jāyante mānavās tattra nishṭapta-kanaka-prabhāḥ | "The people there live ten thousand years. The men are of the colour of gold, and the women fair as celestial nymphs. Men are born there of the colour of burnished gold, live free from sickness and sorrow, and enjoy perpetual happiness." The men by the side of the mountain Gandhamādana, west of Meru, are said (v. 231) "to be black, of great strength and vigour, while the women are of the colour of blue lotuses, and very beautiful" (tattra kṛishṇāḥ narāḥ rājaṁs tejo-yuktāḥ mahābalāḥ | striyaś chotpala-varṇābhāḥ sarvāḥ supriya-darśanāḥ).

na tattrāsti jarā-mṛityu-bhayaṁ na cha | dharmādharmau na teshv āstāṁ nottamādhama-madhyamāḥ | na teshv asti yugāvasthā kshettreshv ashṭasu sarvadā |

"In the eight Varshas, called Kimpurusha and the rest (i.e. in all except Bhārata Varsha) the inhabitants enjoy a natural perfection attended with complete happiness obtained without exertion. There is there no vicissitude, nor decrepitude, nor death, nor fear; no distinction of virtue and vice, none of the inequalities denoted by the words best, worst, and intermediate, nor any change resulting from the succession of the four yugas." And again:

ii. 2, 35. Yāni Kiṁpurushādyāni varshāṇy ashṭau mahāmune | na teshu śoko nāyāso nodvega-kshud-bhayādikam | susthāḥ prajāḥ nirātaṅkāḥ sarva-duḥkha-vivarjjitāḥ | 36. Daśa-dvādaśa-varshāṇāṁ sahasrāṇi sthirāyushaḥ | na teshu varshate devo bhaumyāny ambhāṁsi teshu vai | 37. Kṛita-tretādikā naiva teshu sthāneshu kalpanā |

"In those eight Varshas there is neither grief, nor weariness, nor anxiety, nor hunger, nor fear. The people live in perfect health, free from every suffering, for ten or twelve thousand years. Indra does not rain on those Varshas, for they have abundance of springs. There is there no division of time into the Kṛita, Tretā, and other ages."

The Uttara Kurus, it should be remarked, may have been a real people, as they are mentioned in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, viii. 14:[4]

Atha enam udīchyāṁ diśi viśve devāḥ shaḍbhiś chaiva panchaviṁśair ahobhir abhyashinchann etena cha tṛichena etena cha yajushā etābhiś cha vyāhṛitibhir vairājyāya | tasmād etasyām udīchyāṁ diśi ye ke cha pareṇa Himavantaṁ janapadāḥ "Uttara-Kuravaḥ Uttara-Madrāḥ" iti vairājyāya eva te 'bhishichyante |

"Then in the northern region during six days on which the Panchaviṁśa stoma was recited, the Viśve-devas inaugurated him (Indra) for glorious dominion with these three ṛik-verses, this yajush-verse, and these mystic monosyllables. Wherefore the several nations who dwell in this northern quarter, beyond the Himavat, the Uttara Kurus and the Uttara Madras, are consecrated to glorious dominion (vairājya), and people term them the glorious (virāj)." See Colebrooke's Misc. Essays, i. 38–43; Dr. Haug's translation of the Ait. Brāhmaṇa; and Prof. Weber's review of this translation in Ind. Studien, ix. pp. 341 f.

[4] Quoted by Weber in Ind. St. i. 218.

In another passage of the same work,[5] however, the Uttara Kurus are treated as belonging to the domain of mythology:

Ait. Br. viii. 23. Etaṁ ha vai aindram mahābhishekam Vāsishṭhaḥ Sātahavyo 'tyarātaye Jānantapaye provācha | tasmād u Atyarātir Jānantapir arājā san vidyayā samantaṁ sarvataḥ pṛithivīṁ jayan parīyāya | sa ha uvācha Vāsishṭhaḥ Sātyahavyaḥ "ajaishīr vai samantaṁ sarvataḥ pṛithivīm mahad mā gamaya" iti | sa ha uvācha Atyarātir Jānantapir "yadā brāhmaṇa uttara-kurūn jayeyaṁ tvam u ha eva pṛithivyai rājā syāḥ senāpatir eva te 'haṁ syām" iti | sa ha uvācha Vāsishṭhaḥ Sātyahavyo "deva-kshettraṁ vai tad na vai tud marttyo jetum arhaty adruksho me ā 'taḥ idaṁ dade" iti | tato ha Atyarātim Jānantapim ātta-vīryyam niśśukram amitra-tapanaḥ Śushmiṇaḥ Śaivyo rājā jaghāna | tasmād evaṁ-vidushe brāhmaṇāya evaṁ-chakrushe kshattriyo na druhyed na id rāshṭrād avapadyeyad (?) na id vāma-prāṇo jahad iti |

"Sātyahavya of the family of Vasishṭha declared this great inauguration similar to Indra's to Atyarāti, son of Janantapa; and in consequence Atyarāti, though not a king, by his knowledge, went round the earth on every side to its ends, reducing it to subjection. Sātyahavya then said to him, 'Thou hast subdued the earth in all directions to its limits; exalt me now to greatness.' Atyarāti replied, 'When, o Brāhman, I conquer the Uttara Kurus, thou shalt be king of the earth, and I will be only thy general.' Sātyahavya rejoined, 'That is the realm of the gods; no mortal may make the conquest of it: Thou hast wronged me; therefore I take all this away from thee.' In consequence Śushmina, king of the Śivis, vexer of his foes, slew Atyarāti son of Janantapa who had been bereft of his valour and energy. Wherefore let no Kshattriya wrong a Brāhman who possesses such knowledge and has so acted, lest he should be expelled from his kingdom, be short-lived, and perish."

The Uttara Kurus are also mentioned in the description of the northern region in the Kishkindhā Kāṇḍa of the Rāmāyaṇa, 43, 38, 'Uttarāḥ Kuravas tatra krita-puṇya-pratiśrāyaḥ | "There are the Uttara Kurus, the abodes of those who have performed works of merit." In v. 57 it is said: na kathanchana gantavyaṁ kurūṇām uttareṇa vaḥ | anyeshām api bhūtānām nānukrāmati vai gatiḥ | "You must not go to the north of the Kurus: other beings also may not proceed further."

[5] See Colebrooke's Essays, i. 43; Dr. Haug's translation; and Ind. Stud. ix. 346.

In the same way when Arjuna, in his career of conquest, arrives at the country of the Uttara Kurus in Harivarsha, he is thus addressed by the guards at the gate of the city, M. Bh. Sabhāparvan, 1045 :

Pārtha nedaṁ tvayā śakyam puraṁ jetuṁ kathanchana | upāvarttasva kalyāṇa paryāptam idam Achyuta | idam puraṁ yaḥ praviśed dhruvaṁ na sa bhaved naraḥ | . . . . na chāttra kinchij jetavyam Arjunāttra pradṛiśyate | Uttarāḥ Kuravo hy ete nāttra yuddham pravarttate | pravishṭo 'pi hi Kaunteya neha drakshyasi kinchana | na hi mānusha-dehena śakyam attrābhivīkshitum |

"Thou canst not, son of Pṛithā, subdue this city. Refrain, fortunate man, for it is completely secure. He who shall enter this city must be certainly more than man. . . . . Nor is there anything to be seen here which thou canst conquer. Here are the Uttara Kurus, whom no one attempts to assail. And even if thou shouldst enter, thou couldst behold nothing. For no one can perceive anything here with human senses."[6]

In the Anuśāsanaparvan, line 2841, Kuśika says, on seeing a magic palace formed by Chyavana (see above, p. 475):

Aho saha śarīreṇa prāpto 'smi paramāṁ gatim | Uttarān vā Kurūn puṇyān athavā 'py Amarāvatīm |

"I have attained, even in my embodied condition, to the heavenly state; or to the holy Northern Kurus, or to Amarāvatī [the city of Indra]!"

"The country to the north of the ocean, and to the south of the Himādri (or snowy range), is Bhārata Varsha, where the descendants of Bharata dwell" (V.P. ii. 3, 1. Uttaraṁ yad samudrasya Himādreś chaiva dakshiṇam | varshaṁ tad Bhāratam nāma Bhāratī yattra santatiḥ). It is divided into nine parts (bhedāḥ), Indradvīpa, Kaśerumat, Tāmravarṇa, Gābhastimāt, Nāgadvīpa, Saumya, Gāndharva, Vāruṇa; and "this ninth dvīpa," which is not named, is said to be "surrounded by the ocean" ayaṁ tu navamas teshāṁ dvīpaḥ sāgara-saṁvṛitaḥ), and to be a thousand yojanas long from north to south. "On the east side of it are the Kirātas, on the west the Yavanas, and in the centre are the Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and Śūdras, following their respective occupations of sacrifice, arms, trade, etc." (The text of this passage, V.P. ii. 3, 7, has been already quoted in p. 485).

[6] See the second vol. of this work, pp. 332-337, and vol. iv., p. 375.

The Vishṇu Purāṇa contains a very short list of the tribes inhabiting Bhārata Varsha. (See Wilson, vol. ii. pp. 132 f.) It specifies, as the principal, only the Kurus, Pānchālas, the people of Kāmarūpa, the Puṇḍras, Kalingas, Magadhas, Saurāshṭras, Śūras, Bhīras, Arbudas, Kārūshas, Mālavas, Sauvīras, Saindhavas, Hūṇas, Śālvas, Śākalas, Madras, Rāmas, Ambashṭhas, and Pāraśikas.[7] These tribes seem to be all confined to India and its vicinity.

The praises of Bhārata Varsha are celebrated as follows:

V.P. ii. 3, 11. Chatvāri Bhārate varshe yugāny attra mahāmune | kṛitaṁ tretā dvāparaś cha kaliś chānyatra na kvachit | 12. Tapas tapyanti yatayo juhvate chāttra yajvinaḥ | dānāni chāttra dīyante paralokārtham ādarāt | purushair yajña-purusho Jambu-dvīpe sadejyate | yajñair yajña-mayo Vishṇur anya-dvīpeshu chānyathā | 13. Attrāpi Bhārataṁ śreshṭhaṁ Jambu-dvīpe mahāmune | yato hi karma-bhūr eshā ato 'nyāḥ bhoga-bhūmayaḥ | attra janma-sahasrāṇāṁ sahasrair api sattamam | kadachil labhate jantur mānushyam puṇya-sanchayam | gāyanti devāḥ kila gītakāni "dhanyās tu ye Bhārata-bhūmi-bhāge | svargāpavargasya dahe tu bhūte bhavanti bhūyaḥ purushāḥ suratvāt | 14. Karmāṇy asankalpita-tat-phalāni sannyasya Vishṇau paramātma-rūpe | avāpya tāṁ karma-mahīm anante tasmin layaṁ ye tv amalāḥ prayānti | 15. Jānīma naitat kva vayaṁ vilīne svarga-prade karmaṇi deha-bandham | pṛāpsyāma dhanyāḥ khalu te manushyāḥ ye Bhārate nendriya-viprahīṇāḥ" |

"In Bhārata Varsha, and nowhere else, do the four Yugas, Kṛita, Tretā, Dvāpara, and Kali exist. 12. Here devotees perform austerities, and priests sacrifice; here gifts are bestowed, to testify honour, for the sake of the future world. In Jambudvīpa Vishṇu, the sacrificial Man, whose essence is sacrifice, is continually worshipped by men with sacrifices; and in other ways in the other dvīpas.[8] 13. In this respect Bhārata is the most excellent division of Jambudvīpa; for this is the land of works, while the others are places of enjoyment. Perhaps in a thousand thousand births, a living being obtains here that most excellent condition, humanity, the receptacle of virtue. The gods sing, 'Happy are those beings, who, when the rewards of their merits have been exhausted in heaven, are, after being gods, again born as men in Bhārata Varsha; (14) who, when born in that land of works, resign to the supreme and eternal Vishṇu their works, without regard to their fruits, and attain by purity to absorption in him. 15. We know not where we shall next attain a corporeal condition, when the merit of our works shall have become exhausted; but happy are those men who exist in Bhārata Varsha with perfect senses.' "

[7] The list in the Mahābhārata (Bhīshmaparvan, 346 ff.), is much longer. See Wilson's Vishṇu Purāṇa, vol. ii. pp. 132 f., and 156 ff.

[8] "'In other ways,' i.e. in the form of Soma, Vāyu, Sūryya, etc." (Anyathā Soma-vāyu-sūryyādi-rūpaḥ |). Commentator.

To the same effect the Bhāgavata Purāṇa says, v. 17, 11:

Tattrāpi Bhāratam eva varshaṁ karma-kshettram anyāny aṣṭa-varshāṇi svargiṇām puṇya-śeshopabhoga-sthānāni bhaumāni svarga-padāni vyapadiśanti | 12. Eshu purushāṇām ayuta-purushāyur-varshāṇaṁ deva-kalpānāṁ nāgāyuta-prāṇānāṁ vajra-saṁhanana-vayo-moda-pramudita-mahāsaurata-mithuna-vyavāyāpavarga-varsha-dhṛitaika-garbha-kalatrāṇāṁ tretā-yuga-samaḥ kālo varttate |

"Of these, Bhāratavarsha alone is the land of works: the other eight Varshas are places where the celestials enjoy the remaining rewards of their works; they are called terrestrial paradises. 12. In them men pass an existence equal to that of the Tretā age, living for the space of ten thousand ordinary lives, on an equality with gods, having the vitality of ten thousand elephants, and possessed of wives who bear one child after a year's conception following upon sexual intercourse attended by all the gratification arising from adamantine bodies and from vigorous youth."

The commentator remarks on verse 11: Divya-bhauma-bila-bhedāt trividhaḥ svargaḥ | tattra bhauma-svargasya padāni sthānāni vyapadiśanti | "Heaven is of three kinds, in the sky, on earth, and in the abyss. Here the other Varshas are called terrestrial heavens."

It is curious to remark that in the panegyric on Bhārata Varsha it is mentioned as one of the distinguishing advantages of that division of Jambudvīpa that sacrifice is performed there, though, a little further on, it is said to be practised in Śālmali dvīpa also.

It would at first sight appear from the preceding passage (ii. 3, 11) of the Vishṇu Purāṇa (as well as from others which we shall encounter below), to be the intention of the writer to represent the inhabitants of Bhārata Varsha as a different race, or, at least as living under quite different conditions, from the inhabitants of the other dvīpas, and even of the other divisions (varshas) of Jambu dvīpa itself. From the use of the word mānushya (humanity) here applied to the inhabitants of Bhārata Varsha, viewed in reference to the context, it would seem to be a natural inference that all the people exterior to it were beings of a different race. Yet in the descriptions of Kuśa dvīpa and Pushkara dvīpa (see below) the words manujāḥ and mānavāḥ "descendants of Manu," or "men," are applied to the dwellers in those continents. In the passage of the Jātimālā, moreover, translated by Mr. Colebrooke (Misc. Essays, ii. 179), we are told that "a chief of the twice-born tribe was brought by Vishṇu's eagle from Śāka dvīpa; thus have Śāka dvīpa Brāhmans become known in Jambu dvīpa." According to this verse, too, there should be an affinity of race between the people of these two dvīpas. It is also to be noted that the descendants of Priyavrata became kings of all the dvīpas, as well as of all the varshas of Jambu dvīpa (see above, pp. 489, 491). And in the passage quoted above, p. 478, from the Vishṇu Purāṇa, iv. 11, 3, it is said of Arjuna, son of Kṛitavīrya, that he was "lord of the seven dvīpas," "that he ruled over the earth with all its dvīpas."[9] If, however, the kings were of the human race, it is natural to infer the same of the people.

But, in a subject of this sort, where the writers were following the suggestions of imagination only, it is to be expected that we should find inconsistencies.

Jambu dvīpa is surrounded by a sea of salt water (Wilson, V.P. ii. 109); and that sea again is bounded on its outer side by the dvīpa or continent of Plaksha running all round it. (V.P. ii. 4, 1. Kshārodena yathā dvīpo Jambu-sanjno 'bhiveshṭitaḥ | saṁveshṭya kshāram udadhim Plaksha-dvīpas tathā sthitaḥ). According to this scheme the several continents and seas form concentric circles, Jambu dvipa being a circular island occupying the centre of the system.

Plaksha dvīpa is of twice the extent of Jambu dvīpa. The character and condition of its inhabitants are described as follows:

V. P. ii. 4, 5. Na chaivāsti yugāvasthā teshu sthāneshu saptasu | 6. Tretā-yuga-samaḥ kālaḥ sarvadaiva mahāmate | Plaksha-dvīpādishu brahman Śākadvīpāntākeshu vai | 7. Pancha-varsha-sahasrāṇi janāḥ jīvanty anāmayāḥ | dharmāḥ panchasv athaiteshu varṇāśrama-vibhāga-jāḥ |

[9] Purūravas is said to have possessed thirteen islands (dvīpas) of the ocean (above p. 307).

varṇās tattrāpi chatvāras tān nibodha gadāmi te | Aryyakāḥ Kuravaś chaiva Vivāśāh Bhāvinaś cha ye | vipra-kshattriya-vaiśyās te śūdrāś cha muni-sattama |

"In those seven provinces [which compose Plaksha dvīpa] the division of time into Yugas does not exist: but the character of existence is always that of the Tretā age. In the [five] dvīpas, beginning with Plaksha and ending with Śāka, the people live 5000 years, free from sickness. In those five dvīpas duties arise from the divisions of castes and orders. There are there also four castes, Āryyakas, Kurus, Vivāśas, and Bhāvins, who are the Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and Śūdras," and whose worship is thus described:

9. Ijyate tattra bhagavāns tair varṇair Aryyakādibhiḥ | soma-rūpī jagat-srashṭā sarvaḥ sarveśvaro Hariḥ | "Hari who is All, and the lord of all, and the creator of the world, is adored in the form of Soma by these classes, the Āryyakas, etc."

The inhabitants of this dvīpa receive different names in the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, being there called (v. 20, 4) "Hansas, Patangas, Ūrdhvāyanas, and Satyāngas, four castes, who, purified from passion and darkness by the touch of the waters of these rivers, live a thousand years, resemble the gods in their appearance and in their manner of procreation, and worship with the triple Veda the divine Soul, the Sun, who is the gate of heaven, and who is co-essential with the Vedas" (Yāsāṁ jalopasparśana-vidhūta-rajas-tamaso Haṁsa-patangorddhvāyana-satyānga-sanjñāś chatvāro varṇāḥ sahasrāyusho vibudhopama-sandarśana-prajananāḥ svarga-dvāraṁ trayyā vidyayā bhagavantaṁ trayīmayaṁ sūryam ātmānaṁ yajante).

In regard to Plaksha and the other four following dvīpas, the Bhāgavata Purāṇa says, ibid. para. 6, that "their men are all alike in respect of natural perfection as shewn in length of life, senses, vigour, force, strength, intelligence, and courage" (Plakshādishu panchasu purushāṇām āyur intriyam ojaḥ saho balaṁ buddhir vikramaḥ iti cha sarveshām autpattikī siddhir aviśeshena varttate |).

Plaksha dvīpa is surrounded by a sea of sugar-cane juice of the same compass as itself. ii. 4, 9, Plaksha-dvīpa-pramāṇena Plaksha-dvīpaḥ samāvṛitaḥ | tathaivekshu-rasodena pariveśānukāriṇā | Round the outer margin of this sea, and twice as extensive, runs Śālmala dvīpa (verse 11. Śālmalena samudro 'sau dvīpenekshu-rasodakaḥ | vistara- dviguṇenātha sarvataḥ. saṁvṛitaḥ sthitaḥ |). It is divided into seven Varshas, or divisions. Of their inhabitants it is said:

V. P. ii. 4, 12. Saptaitāni tu varshāṇi chāturvarṇya-yutāni cha | S'ālmale ye tu varṇāś cha vasanti te mahāmune | kapilāś chāruṇāḥ pītāḥ kṛishṇāś chaiva pṛithak pṛithak | brāhmaṇāḥ kshattriyāḥ vaiśyāḥ śūdrāś chaiva yajanti te | bhagavantaṁ samastasya Vishṇum ātmānam avyayam | Vāyubhūtam makha-śreshṭhair yajvino yajna-saṁsthitam | 13. Devānām attra sānnidhyam atīva sumanoharam |

"These seven Varshas have a system of four castes. The castes which dwell there are severally the Kapilas, Aruṇas, Pītas, and Kṛishṇas (or the Tawny, the Purple, the Yellow, and the Black). These, the Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and S'ūdras, worship with excellent sacrifices Vishṇu, the divine and imperishable Soul of all things, in the form of Vāyu, and abiding in sacrifice. Here the vicinity of the gods is very delightful to the soul."

The Bhāgavata Purāṇa says of this dvīpa, v. 20, 11.: Tad-varsha-purushāḥ S'rutadhara-vīryyadhara-vasundhareshundhara-sanjnāḥ bhagavantaṁ vedamayaṁ somam ātmānaṁ vedena yajante | "The men of the different divisions of this dvīpa, called S'rutadharas, Vīryadharas, Vasundharas, and Ishundharas, worship with the Veda the divine Soul Soma, who is co-essential with the Veda."

This dvīpa is surrounded by a sea of wine of the same compass as itself (v. 13. Esha dvīpaḥ samudreṇa surodena samāvṛitaḥ | vistārāch chhālmalasyaiva samena tu samantataḥ). The exterior shore of this sea is encompassed by Kuśa dvīpa, which is twice as extensive as S'ālmala dvīpa (v. 13. Surodakaḥ parivṛitaḥ Kuśadvīpena sarvataḥ | S'ālmalasya tu vistārād dviguṇena samantataḥ). The inhabitants of Kuśa dvīpa are thus described, V.P. ii 4, 14:

Tasyāṁ vasanti manujāḥ saha Daiteya-dānavaiḥ | tathaiva deva-gandharva-yaksha-kimpurushādayaḥ | varṇās tattrāpi chatvāro nijānushṭhāna-tatparāḥ | Damināḥ S'ushmiṇaḥ Snehāḥ Mandehāś cha mahāmune | brāhmaṇāḥ kshattriyāḥ vaiśyāḥ śūdrāś chānukramoditāḥ | 15. Yathoktakarma-karttṛitvāt svādhikāra-kshayāya te | tattra te tu Kuśa-dvīpe Brahma-rūpaṁ Janārddanam | yajantaḥ kshapayanty ugram adhikāram phalapradam |

"In this set of Varshas (of Kuśa dvipa) dwell men with Daityas, Dānavas, Devas, Gandharvas, Yakshas, Kimpurushas, and other beings.

There, too, there are four castes, pursuing their proper observances, Damins, S'ushmins, Snehas, and Mandehas, who in the order specified are Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and S'ūdras. In order to destroy their right [to reward] derived from the performance of these works, they worship Janārdana in the form of Brahma, and so neutralize this direful merit which brings rewards."

Of Kuśa dvīpa the Mahābhārata tells us, Bhīshmaparvan, verses 455–7: Eteshu deva-gandharvāḥ prajāścha jagatīśvara | viharante ramante cha na teshu mriyate janaḥ | na teshu dasyavaḥ santi mlechha-jātyo 'pi vā nṛipa | gaura-prāyo janaḥ sarvaḥ sukumāras cha pārthiva | "In these (Varshas of Kuśa dvīpa), gods, Gandharvas, and living creatures, amuse and enjoy themselves. No one dies there. There are no Dasyus or Mlechhas there. The people are fair, and of very delicate forms." The Bhāgavata Purāṇa, v. 20, 16, says, "The people of this dvīpa are called Kuśalas, Kovidas, Abhiyuktas, and Kulakas" (Kuśa-dvīpaukasaḥ Kuśala-kovidābhiyukta-kulaka-sanjnāḥ |).

Kuśa dvīpa is surrounded by a sea of clarified butter, of the same circumference as itself.

Around this sea runs Krauncha dvīpa which is twice as large as Kuśa dvīpa. The V. P. says, ii. 4, 19: Sarveshv eteshu ramyeshu varsha-śaila-vareshu cha | nivasanti nirātankāḥ saha deva-gaṇaiḥ prajāḥ | Pushkarāḥ Pushkalāḥ Dhanyās Tishmāś chāttra mahāmune | brāhmaṇāḥ kshattriyāḥ vaiśyāḥ śūdrāś chānukramoditāḥ | "In all these pleasant division-mountains of this dvīpa the people dwell, free from fear, in the society of the gods. [These people are] the Pushkaras, Pushkalas, Dhanyas, and Tishmas, who, as enumerated in order, are the Brāhmans, Kshattriyas, Vaiśyas, and S'ūdras." The inhabitants of this dvīpa are called in the Bhāgavata Purāna, v. 20, 22, " . . . . Purushas, Ṛishabhas, Draviṇas, and Devakas" (Purusharshabha-draviṇa-devaka-sanjnāḥ). This dvīpa is encompassed by the sea of curds, which is of the same circumference as itself. The sea again, on its exterior edge, is surrounded by S'āka dvīpa,[10] a continent twice the size of Krauncha dvīpa.

Of S'āka dvīpa it is said in the Vishṇu Purāṇa, ii. 4, 23 ff.:

Tattra puṇyāḥ janapadāś chāturvarnya-samanvitāḥ | nadyaś chāttra mahāpuṇyāḥ sarva-pāpa-bhayāpahāḥ | . . . . tāḥ pibanti mudā yuktāḥ Jaladādishu ye sthitāḥ | varsheshu te janapadāḥ svargād abhyetya me-

[10] In the M. Bh. (Bhīshmap. v. 408 ff.) S'ākadvīpa comes next after Jambudvīpa.

dinīm | 24. Dharma-hānir na teshv asti na sangharshaḥ parasparam | maryādā-vyutkramo nāpi teshu deśeshu saptasu | 25. Magāś cha Māgadhāś chaiva Mānasāḥ Mandagāś tathā | Magāḥ brāhmaṇa-bhūyishṭhāḥ Māgadhāḥ kshattriyās tu te | Vaiśyās tu Mānasāḥ jneyāḥ śūdrās teshāṁ tu Mandagāḥ | 26. S'ākadvīpe tu tair Vishṇuḥ sūrya-rūpa-dharo mune | yathoktair ijyate samyak karmabhir niyatātmabhiḥ |

"There there are holy countries, peopled by persons belonging to the four castes; and holy rivers which remove all sin and fear. . . . The people who dwell in these divisions, Jalada, etc. [of S'āka dvīpa], drink these rivers with pleasure, even when they have come to earth from Svarga. There is among them no defect of virtue; nor any mutual rivalry; nor any transgression of rectitude in those seven countries. [There dwell] Magas, Māgadhas, Mānasas, and Mandagas, of whom the first are principally Brāhmans; the second are Kshattriyas; the third are Vaiśyas, and the fourth are S'ūdras. By them Vishṇu, in the form of the Sun, is worshipped with the prescribed ceremonies, and with intent minds."

Of this dvīpa the Mahābhārata tells us, Bhīshmaparvan, verse 410, that the "people there are holy, and no one dies" (tattra puṇyāḥ janapadāḥ na tattra mriyate naraḥ). One of the mountains there is called S'yāma (black), "whence men have got this black colour" (verse 420. Tataḥ śyāmatvam āpannāḥ janāḥ janapadeśvara). Dhṛitarāshṭra then says to his informant Sanjaya that he has great doubts as to "how living creatures have become black." Sanjaya promises in the following lines, the sense of which is not very clear, to explain the mystery: 422. Sarveshv eva mahārāja dvīpeshu Kuru-nandana | gauraḥ kṛishṇaś cha pātango yato varṇāntare dvijāḥ | śyāmo yasmāt pravṛitto vai tat te vakshyāmi Bhārata | But as he proceeds no further, we lose the benefit of his solution of this interesting physiological problem. The Bhāgavata Purāṇa, v. 20, 28, gives the four classes of men in this dvīpa the names of Ṛitavratas, Satyavratas, Dānavratas, and Anuvratas (tadvarsha-purushāḥ Ṛitavrata-Satyavrata-Dānavratānuvrata-nāmānaḥ).

This S'āka dvīpa is surrounded by the ocean of milk as by an armlet. This ocean again is encompassed on its outer side by Pushkara dvīpa, which is twice as extensive as S'āka dvīpa.

Of Pushkara dvīpa it is said, Vishṇu Purāṇa, ii. 4, 28 ff.:

Daśa-varsha-sahasrāṇi tattra jīvanti mānavāḥ | nirāmayāḥ viśokāścha

rāga-dvesha-vivarijjitāḥ | adhamottamau na teshv āstāṁ na badhya-badhakau dvija | nershyā 'sūyā bhayaṁ rosho dosho lobhādiko na cha | . . . . 29. Satyānṛite na tattrāstāṁ dvīpe Pushkara-sanjnite | . . . . 30. Tulya-veśāś tu manujāḥ devais tattraika-rūpiṇaḥ | 31. Varṇāśramāchārahīnam dharmācharaṇa-varjjitam | trayī-vārttā-daṇḍanīti-śuśrūshārahitaṁ cha yat | 32. Varsha-dvayaṁ tu maittreya bhauma-svargo 'yam uttamaḥ | sarvasya sukha-daḥ kālo jarā-rogādi-varjjitaḥ |

"In this dvīpa men live ten thousand years, free from sickness and sorrow, from affection and hatred. There is no distinction among them of highest and lowest, of killer and slain; there is no envy, nor ill-will, nor fear, nor anger, nor defect, nor covetousness, nor other fault; there is there neither truth nor falsehood. Men there are all of the same appearance, of one form with the gods. The two divisions of this dvīpa have no rules of caste or orders, nor any observances of duty; the three Vedas, the Purāṇas (or, trade), the rules of criminal law and service do not exist. This [dvīpa] is a most excellent terrestrial heaven; where time brings happiness to all, and is exempt from decay, sickness, and all other evils." [11]

Of all the dvīpas together, the Mahābhārata says, Bhīshmaparvan, verses 468 ff.:

Evaṁ dvīpeshu sarveshu prajānāṁ Kuru-nandana | brahmacharyyeṇa satyena prajānāṁ hi dameṇa cha | ārogyāyuḥpramāṇābhyāṁ dviguṇaṁ dviguṇaṁ tataḥ | eko janapado rājan dvīpeshv eteshu Bhārata | uktāḥ

[11] In the same way as Pushkara, the remotest dvīpa, is here described to be the scene of the greatest perfection, we find Homer placing the Elysian plains on the furthest verge of the earth:

ἀλλά σ' ἐς Ἠλύσιον πεδίον καὶ πείρατα γαίης ἀθάνατοι πέμψουσιν, ὅθι ξανθὸς Ῥαδάμανθυς, τῇπερ ῥηΐστη βιοτὴ πέλει ἀνθρώποισίν.
οὐ νιφετὸς, οὔτ' ἄρ χειμὼν πολὺς οὔτε ποτ' ὄμβρος, ἀλλ' αἰεὶ Ζεφύροιο λιγὺ πνείοντας ἀήτας Ὠκεανὸς ἀνίησιν ἀναψύχειν ἀνθρώπους. Odyssey Δ. 563-568.

"Thee, favoured man, to earth's remotest end,
The Elysian plain, the immortal gods shall send,—
That realm which fair-haired Rhadamanthys sways,
Where, free from toil, men pass their tranquil days.
No tempests vex that land, no rain, nor snow;
But ceaseless Zephyrs from the ocean blow,
Which sweetly breathe and gently stir the air,
And to the dwellers grateful coolness bear."

janapadāḥ yeshu karma chaikam pradṛiśyate | īśvaro daṇḍam udyamya svayam eva Prajāpatiḥ | dvīpānāṁ tu mahārāja rakshaṁs tishṭhati nityadā | sa rājā sa śivo rājan sa pitā prapitāmahaiḥ | gopāyati nara-śreshṭha prajāḥ sa-jaḍa-paṇḍitāḥ | bhojanaṁ chāttra Kauravya prajāḥ svayam upasthitam | siddham eva mahābāho tad hi bhunjanti nityadā |

"Thus in all these dvīpas each country doubly exceeds the former one in the abstinence, veracity, and self-restraint, in the health and the length of life of its inhabitants. In these dvīpas the people is one, and one sort of action is perceivable. Prajāpati, the lord, wielding his sceptre, himself governs these dvīpas. He, the king, the auspicious one (śiva), the father, along with the patriarchs, protects all creatures, ignorant as well as learned." (So there are differences of intellectual condition in these dvīpas after all!) "All these people eat prepared food, which comes to them of itself."

Pushkara is surrounded by a sea of fresh water equal to itself in compass. What is beyond is afterwards described:

V.P. ii. 4, 37. Svādūdakasya parato dṛiśyate loka-saṁsthitiḥ | dviguṇā kāñchanī bhūmiḥ sarva-jantu-vivarjjitā | 38. Lokālokas tataḥ śailo yojanāyuta-vistṛitaḥ | uchchhrāyeṇāpi tāvanti sahasrāṇy achalo hi saḥ | tatas tamaḥ samāvṛitya taṁ śailaṁ sarvataḥ sthitam | tamaś chāṇḍa-kaṭāhena samantāt parisveshṭitam |

"On the other side of the sea is beheld a golden land of twice its extent, but without inhabitants. Beyond that is the Lokāloka mountain, which is ten thousand yojanas in breadth, and as many thousands in height. It is on all sides invested with darkness. This darkness is encompassed by the shell of the mundane egg." [12]

In a following chapter, however, (the seventh) of this same book, the [12] See Manu, i. verses 9 and 12, quoted above, p. 35. The thirteenth verse is as follows: Tābhyāṁ sa śakalābhyāṁ cha divam bhūmiṁ cha nirmame | madhye vyoma diśaś chāshṭāv apāṁ sthānaṁ cha śāśvatam | "From these two halves of the shell he fashioned the heaven and the earth, and in the middle (he formed) the sky, and the eight quarters, and the eternal abode of the waters." In regard to the darkness (tamas) with which the mountain Lokāloka is said to be enveloped, compare Manu iv. 242, where the spirits of the departed are said to pass by their righteousness through the darkness which is hard to be traversed (dharmeṇa hi sahāyena tamas tarati dustaram); and Atharva-veda, ix. 5, 1, "Crossing the darkness, in many directions immense, let the unborn ascend to the third heaven" (tīrtvā tamāṁsi bahudhā mahānti ajo nākam ā kramatāṁ tṛitīyam). See Journal Royal Asiatic Society for 1865, pp. 298, note 2, and p. 304.

shell of the mundane egg is said to be outside of the seven spheres of which this system is composed:

V.P. ii. 7, 19. Ete sapta mayā lokāḥ Maitreya kathitās tava | pātālāni cha saptaiva brahmāṇḍasyaisha vistaraḥ | etad aṇḍa-kaṭāhena tiryak chorddhvam adhas tathā | kapitthasya yathā vījaṁ sarvato vai samāvṛitam |

"These seven spheres have been described by me; and there are also seven Pātālas: this is the extent of Brahmā's egg. The whole is surrounded by the shell of the egg at the sides, above, and below, just as the seed of the wood-apple (is covered by the rind)."

This system, however, it appears, is but a very small part of the whole of the universe:

Ibid. verse 24. Aṇḍānāṁ tu sahasrāṇāṁ sahasrāṇy ayutāni cha | īdṛiśānāṁ tathā tattra koṭi-koṭi-śatāni cha |

"There are thousands and ten thousands of thousands of such mundane eggs; nay hundreds of millions of millions."

Indian mythology, when striving after sublimity, and seeking to excite astonishment, often displays an extravagant and puerile facility in the fabrication of large numbers. But, in the sentence last quoted, its conjectures are substantially in unison with the discoveries of modern astronomy; or rather, they are inadequate representations of the simple truth, as no figures can express the contents of infinite space.

APPENDIX.

Page 6, line 24.

Professor Wilson's analyses of the Agni, Brahma-vaivartta, Vishṇu and Vāyu Purāṇas, were originally published, not in the "Gleanings in Science," but in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, vol. i.; and are reprinted in the 3rd vol. of Wilson's Collected Works, edited by Dr. R. Rost.

Page 37, line 1.

"Abodes of gods." Böhtlingk and Roth in their Sanskrit Lexicon, s.v. nikāya, shew that in other passages, if not here also, the compound word deva-nikāya should be rendered "classes, or assemblages, of gods."

Page 50, line 25.

Compare the passage, quoted below, in the note on p. 115, from the Śāntiparvan of the M. Bh., verses 6130 ff.

Pages 90 ff.

The representations of the Kṛita yuga are not always consistent. In the Droṇaparvan, verses 2023 ff. a story is told of King Akampana, who lived in that age, and who was yet so far from enjoying the tranquillity generally predicated of that happy time that he was overcome by his enemies in a battle, in which he lost his son, and suffered in consequence severe affliction.

Page 97, note 190.

It is similarly said in the Droṇaparvan, verse 2395: Kshatād nas trāyate sarvān ity evaṁ kshattriyo 'bhavat | "He (Pṛithu) became a Kshattriya by delivering us all from injuries." See also Śāntiparvan, verse 1031.

Page 115, line 13.

The S'āntiparvan of the M. Bh., verses 6130 ff., gives a similar description of the original state of all things, and of the birth of Brahmā. Bhīshma is the speaker: Salilaikārṇavaṁ tāta purā sarvam abhūd idam | nishprakampam anākāśam anirdeśya-mahītalam | tamasā vṛitam asparśam api gambhīra-darśanam | niśśabdaṁ vā 'prameyaṁ cha tattra jajne Pitāmahaḥ | so 'sṛijad vātam agniṁ cha bhāskaraṁ chāpi vīryyavān | ākāśam asṛijach chorddhvam adho bhūmiṁ cha nairṛitīm | nabhaḥ sa-chandra-tāraṁ cha nakshattrāṇi grahāṁs tathā | saṁvatsarān ṛitūn māsān pakshān atha lavān kshaṇan | tataḥ śarīraṁ loka-sthaṁ sthāpayitvā Pitāmahaḥ | janayāmāsa bhagavān puttrān uttama-tejasaḥ | 6135. Marīchim ṛishim Attriṁ cha Pulastyam Pulahaṁ Kratum | Vaśishṭhāngirasau chobhau Rudraṁ cha prabhum īśvaram | Prachetasas tathā Dakshaḥ kanyāḥ shashṭim ajījanat | tāḥ vai brahmarshayaḥ sarvāḥ prajārtham pratipedire | tābhyo viśvāni bhūtāni devāḥ pitṛi-gaṇās tatha | gandharvāpsarasaś chaiva rakshāṁsi vividhāni cha | . . . . 6149. Jajne tāta jagat sarvaṁ tathā sthāvara-jangamam | 6150. Bhūta-sargam imaṁ kṛitvā sarva-loka-pitāmahaḥ | śāśvataṁ veda-paṭhitaṁ dharmam prayuyuje tataḥ | tasmin dharme sthitāḥ devāḥ sahāchāryya-purohitāḥ | ādityāḥ vasavo rudrāḥ sa-sādhyāḥ marud-aśvinaḥ | "This entire universe was formerly one expanse of water, motionless, without æther, without any distinguishable earth, enveloped in darkness, imperceptible to touch, with an appearance of (vast) depth, silent, and measureless. There Pitāmaha (Brahmā) was born. That mighty god created wind, fire, and the sun, the æther[1] above, and under it the earth belonging to Nirṛiti, the sky, with the moon, stars, constellations, and planets, the years, seasons, months, half-months, and the minute sub-divisions of time. Having established the frame of the universe, the divine Pitāmaha begot sons of eminent splendour, (6135) Marīchi, the rishi Attri, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, Vaśishṭha, Angiras, and the mighty lord Rudra. Daksha, the son of Prachetas, also begot sixty daughters, all of whom were taken by the Brahmarshis[2] for the purpose of propagating offspring. From these females, all beings, gods, pitṛis, gandharvas, apsarases, and various kinds of rākshases, ... (6149) this entire world, moving and stationary, was produced. 6150. Having formed this creation of living beings, the parent of all worlds established the eternal rule of duty as read in the Veda. To this rule of duty the gods, with their teachers and domestic priests, the Ādityas, Vasus, Rudras, Sādhyas, Maruts, and Aśvins conformed."

[1] And yet it is elsewhere said (Anuśāsanap. 2161, quoted above in p. 130) that the æther (ākāśa) cannot be created.

[2] Here this word must mean "rishis, sons of Brahmā."

Another account of the creation is given in the same book of the M. Bh., verses 7518 ff., where it is ascribed to Vishṇu in the form of Govinda, or Keśava (Kṛishṇa), who is identified with the supreme and universal Purusha. Resting on the waters (7527) he created by his thought Sankarshaṇa, the first-born of all beings. Then (7529) a lotus sprang from his (either Sankarshaṇa's or Vishṇu's) navel, from which again (7530) Brahmā was produced. Brahmā afterwards created his seven mind-born sons, Marīchi, Attri, Angiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, and Daksha (7534).

Compare Bhīshmaparvan, verses 3017 ff.

Page 122, note 223.

Compare the passage quoted in the last note from the Śāntiparvan, verse 6135.

Page 128, line 20.

The Śāntiparvan, verses 7548 ff. ascribes the creation of the four castes to Kṛishṇa: Tataḥ Kṛishṇo mahābhāgaḥ punar eva Yudhishṭhira | brāhmaṇānāṁ śataṁ śreshṭham mukhād evāsṛijat prabhuḥ | bāhubhyāṁ kshattriya-śataṁ vaiśyānām ūrutaḥ śataṁ | padbhyāṁ śūdra-śataṁ chaiva Keśavo Bharatarshabha | "Then again the great Kṛishṇa created a hundred Brāhmans, the most excellent (class), from his mouth, a hundred Kshattriyas from his arms, a hundred Vaiśyas from his thighs, and a hundred Śūdras from his feet."

Compare Bhīshmaparvan, verse 3029.

Page 128, note 238.

In another place also, verses 6208 f., the Anuśāsanaparvan ranks purohitas with Śūdras: Śūdra-karma tu yaḥ kuryād avahāya sva-karma cha | sa vijneyo yathā śūdro na cha bhojyaḥ kathanchana | chikitsakaḥ kāṇḍaprishṭhaḥ purādhyakshaḥ purohitaḥ | sāṁvatsaro vṛithādhyāyī sarve te śūdra-sammitāḥ | "He, who, abandoning his own work, does the work of a Śūdra, is to be regarded as a Śūdra, and not to be invided to a feast. A physician, a kāṇḍaprishṭha (see above, p. 442), a city governor, a purohita, an astrologer, one who studies to no purpose, —all these are on a level with Śūdras."

Pages 144 ff.

See above, note on pp. 90 ff.

Page 150, line 4.

Compare Droṇaparvan, verse 2397.

Page 220, line 14.

I am indebted to Professor Max Müller for pointing out to me two passages in Indian commentators in which Manu is spoken of as a Kshattriya. The first is from Madhusūdana Sarasvatī's Commentary on the Bhagavad-gītā, iv. 1. The words of the text are these: Śrī-Bhagavān uvācha | imaṁ Vivasvate yogaṁ proktavān aham avyayam | Vivasvān Manave prāha Manur Ikshvākave 'bravīt | evam paramparā-prāptam imaṁ rājarshayo viduḥ | sa kāleneha mahatā yogo nashṭaḥ parantapa | sa evāyam mayā te 'dya yogaḥ proktaḥ purātanaḥ | bhakto 'si me sakhā cheti rahasyam etad uttamam | "The divine Being (Kṛishṇa) said: I declared to Vivasvat (the Sun) this imperishable Yoga-doctrine. Vivasvat told it to (his son) Manu; and Manu to (his son) Ikshvāku. Thus do royal rishis know it as handed down by tradition. Through lapse of time however it was lost. I have to day therefore revealed to thee (anew) this ancient system, this most excellent mystery; for thou art devoted to me and my friend."

On this Madhusūdana remarks: "Vivasvate" sarva-kshattriya-vaṁśa-vīja-bhūtāya Ādityāya proktavān | "'I declared it to Vivasvat' i.e. to Āditya (the Sun) who was the source of the whole Kshattriya race."

The second passage is from Someśvara's ṭīkā on Kumārila Bhaṭṭa's Mīmānsa-vārttika. I must, however, first adduce a portion of the text of the latter work which forms the subject of Someśvara's annotation. For a copy of this passage, which is otherwise of interest, I am indebted to Professor Goldstücker, who has been kind enough to copy it for me.[2] The first extract refers to Jaimini's Sūtra, i. 3, 3; where the question under discussion is, in what circumstances authority can be assigned to the Smṛiti when the Śruti, or Veda, is silent. After some other remarks Kumārila proceeds: Śākyādi-vachanāni tu katipaya-dama-dānādi vachana-varjjaṁ sarvāṇy eva samasta-chaturdaśa-vidyā-sthāna-viruddhāni trayī-mārga-vyutthita-viruddhācharaṇaiś cha Buddhādidhiḥ praṇītāni trāyī-bāhyebhyaś chaturtha-varṇa-niravasita-prāyebhyo vyāmūḍhebhyaḥ samarthitāni iti na veda-mūlatvena sambhāvyante | svadharmātikrameṇa cha yena kshattriyeṇa satā pravaktṛitva-pratigrahau pratipannau sa dharmaṁ aviplutam upadekshyati iti kaḥ samāśvāsaḥ | uktaṁ cha "paraloka-viruddhāni kurvāṇaṁ dūratas tyajet | ātmānaṁ yo visaṁdhatte so 'nyasmai syāt kathaṁ hitaḥ" iti | Buddhādeḥ punar ayam evātikramo 'lankāra-buddhau sthito yena evam āha "kali-kalusha-kṛitāni yāni loke mayi nipatantu | vimuchyatāṁ tu lokaḥ" iti | sa kila loka-hitārtha-kshattriya-dharmam atikramya brāhmaṇa-vṛittiṁ pravaktṛitvam pratipadya pratishedhātikramāsamarthair brāhmaṇair ananuśishṭaṁ dharmam bāhyajanān anuśāsad dharma-pīḍām apy ātmano 'ngīkṛitya parānugrahaṁ kṛitavān ity evaṁvidhair eva guṇaiḥ stūyate | tad-anuśishṭānusāriṇaś cha sarve eva śruti-smṛiti-vihita-dharmātikrameṇa vyavaharanto viruddhāchāratvena jnāyante | tena pratyakshayā śrūtyā virodhe grantha-kāriṇāṁ grahītrācharitṛīṇāṁ grantha-prāmāṇya-bādhanam | na hy eshām pūrvoktena nyāyena śruti-pratibaddhānāṁ sva-mūla-śruty-anumāna-sāmarthyam asti | "But the precepts of Śakya and others, with the exception of a few enjoining dispassion, liberality, etc., are all contrary to the fourteen classes of scientific treatises, and composed by Buddha and others whose practice was opposed to the law of the three Vedas, as well as calculated for men belonging mostly to the fourth caste who are excluded from the Vedas, debarred from pure observances, and deluded:—consequently they cannot be presumed to be founded on the Veda. And what confidence can we have that one (i.e. Buddha) who being a Kshattriya,[3] transgressed the obligations of his own order, and assumed the function of teachingand the right to receive presents, would inculcate a pure system of duty? For it has been said: 'Let everyone avoid a man who practises acts destructive to future happiness. How can he who ruins himself be of any benefit to others?' And yet this very transgression of Buddha and his followers is conceived as being a feather in his cap; since he spoke thus, 'Let all the evils resulting from the sin of the Kali age fall upon me; and let the world be redeemed.' Thus, abandoning the duties of a Kshattriya, which are beneficial to the world, assuming the function of a teacher which belongs only to the Brāhmans, and instructing men who were out of the pale in duty which was not taught by the Brāhmans who could not transgress the prohibition (to give such instruction), he sought to do a kindness to others, while consenting to violate his own obligations; and for such merits as these he is praised! And all who follow his instructions, acting in contravention of the prescriptions of the Śruti and Smṛiti, are notorious for their erroneous practices. Hence from the opposition in which the authors of these books, as well as those who receive and act according to them, stand to manifest injunctions of the Veda, the authority of these works is destroyed.[4] For since they are by the above reasoning opposed by the Veda, the inference that they rest upon independent Vedic authority of their own possesses no force."

[2] See Professor Müller's Anc. Sansk. Lit. pp. 79 f. where this passage is partly extracted and translated. See also the same author's Chips from a German Workshop, vol. ii. pp. 338 ff.

[3] Compare Colebrooke's Misc. Essays, i. 312.

The next passage is from Kumārila's Vārttika on Jaimini's Sūtra, i. 3, 7: Vedenaivābhyānujnātā yeshām eva pravaktṛitā | nityānām abhidheyānām manvantara-yugādishu | teshāṁ viparivartteshu kurvatāṁ dharma-saṁhitāḥ | vachanāni pramāṇāni nānyeshām iti niśchayaḥ | tathā cha Manor ṛichaḥ sāmidhenyo bhavanti ity asya vidher vākya-śeshe śrūyate "Manur vai yat kinchid avadat tad bheshajam bheshajatāyai"[5] iti prāyaśchittādy-upadeśa-vachanam pāpa-vyādher bheshajam | "It is certain that the precepts of those persons only whose right to expound the eternal meanings of scripture in the different manvantaras and yugas has been recognized by the Veda, are to be regarded as authoritative, when in the revolutions (of those great mundane periods) they compose codes of law. Accordingly by way of complement to the Vedic passage containing the precept (vidhi) beginning 'there are these sāmidheni verses of Manu' it is declared, 'whatever Manu said is a healing remedy;' i.e. his prescriptions in regard to expiatory rites, etc., are remedies for the malady of sin."

[4] The Nyāya-mālā-vistara, i. 3, 4, quotes Kumārila as raising the question whether the practice of innocence, which S'ākya (Buddha) inculcated, was, or was not, a duty from its conformity to the Veda, and as solving it in the negative, since cow's milk put into a dogskin cannot be pure (S'ākyoktāhiṁsanaṁ dharmo na vā dharmaḥ śrutatvataḥ | na dharmo na hi pūtaṁ syād go-kshīraṁ śva-dṛitau dhṛitam).

[5] These words are quoted by Böthlingk and Roth, s.v. bheshajatā, as taken from the Panchaviṁśa Brāhmaṇa, 23, 16, 7. A similar passage occurs in the Taitt. Sanh. ii. 2, 10, 2.

From Someśvara's elaborate comment on the former of these two passages I need only extract the following sentences: Etad abhiyuktavachanena dṛaḍhayati "uktaṁ cha" | Manos tu kshattriyasyāpi pravakṛitvam "yad vai kinchid Manur avadat tad bheshajam" iti vedānujnātatvād aviruddham ity āśayaḥ | "This he confirms by the words of a learned man which he introduces by the phrase 'for it has been said.' But although Manu was a Kshattriya, his assumption of the office of teacher was not opposed to the Veda, because it is sanctioned by the Vedic text 'whatever Manu said was a remedy:' Such is the purport."

Page 254, line 12.

Yas tityāja sachi-vidam, etc. This verse is quoted in the Taittirīya Āraṇyaka (pp. 159 f. of Cal. edit.), which, however, reads sakhi-vidam instead of sachi-vidam. An explanation of the passage is there given by the Commentator.

Page 264, line 14.

Professor Weber considers (Indische Studien, i. 52) that "the yaudhāḥ and the arhantah were the forerunners of the Rājanyas and the Brāhmans." See the whole passage below in the note on p. 366.

Page 268, note 51.

Compare Āśvalāyana's Śrauta-Sūtras, i. 3, 3 and 4, and commentary (p. 22 of Cal. edit.). Pṛithī Vainya is, as I find from Böhtlingk and Roth's Lexicon, s.v., referred to also in the Atharva-veda, viii. 10, 24. The words are these: Sā udakrāmat sā manushyān āgachhat | tām manushyāḥ upāhvayanta "irāvaty ehi" iti | tasyāḥ Manur Vaivasvato vatsaḥ āśīt pṛithivī pātram | tām Pṛithī Vainyo 'dhok tāṁ kṛishiṁ cha sasyaṁ cha adhok | te kṛishiṁ cha sasyaṁ cha manushyāḥ upajīvanti ityādi | "She (i.e. Virāj) ascended: she came to men. Men called her to them, saying, 'Come, Irāvatī.' Manu Vaivasvata was her calf, and the earth her vessel. Pṛithī Vainya milked her; he milked from her agriculture and grain. Men subsist on agriculture and grain."

See Wilson's Vishṇu Purāṇa, vol. i. pp. 183 ff., where Pṛithu's (this is the Puranic form of the word) reign is described. It is there stated that this king, "taking the lord Manu Svāyambhuva for his calf, milked from the earth into his own hand all kinds of grain from a desire to benefit his subjects" (V.P. i. 13, 54. Sa kalpayitvā vatsaṁ tu Manuṁ Svāyambhuvam prabhum | sve pānau pṛithivī-nātho dudoha pṛithivīm Pṛithuḥ | 55. Sasya-jātāni sarvāṇi prajānāṁ hita-kāmyayā). See also the passage quoted from the Bhāgavata Purāṇa by the editor Dr. Hall in pp. 189 ff. The original germ of these accounts is evidently to be found in the passage of the Atharva-veda, from which the short text I have cited is taken.

Pṛithu's reign is also described in the Droṇaparvan, 2394 ff., and Śāntiparvan, 1030 ff.

Page 286, line 8 from the foot.

The Sṛinjayas are mentioned in the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, xii. 9, 3, 1 ff. and 13 (see Weber's Indische Studien, i. 207), as opposing without effect the celebration of a sacrifice which was proposed to be offered for the restoration of Dushṭarītu Paunsāyana to his ancestral kingdom.

Page 345, line 24.

Professor Aufrecht has pointed out to me a short passage in the Taittirīya Sanhitā, iii. 1, 7, 2, in which Viśvāmitra and Jamadagni are mentioned together as contending with Vasishṭha: Viśvāmitra-Jamadagnī Vasishṭhena asparddhetām | sa etaj Jamadagnir vihavyam apaśyat | tena vai sa Vasishṭhasya indriyaṁ vīryyam avṛinkta | yad vihavyaṁ śasyate indriyam eva tad vīryyaṁ yajamāno bhrātṛivyasya vṛinkte | yasya bhūyāṁso yajna-kratavaḥ ity āhuḥ sa devatāḥ vṛinkte | "Viśvāmitra and Jamadagni were contending with Vasishṭha. Jamadagni beheld this vihavya text, and with it he destroyed the vigour and energy of Vasishṭha. When the vihavya is recited, then the sacrificer destroys the vigour and energy of his enemy. He whose oblations and all attendant ceremonies are superior destroys the gods (of his opponent)."

Page 366, note 164.

In a notice of Lāṭyāyana's Sūtras, in Indische Studien, i. 50, Professor Weber observes: "At the same time I remark here that the presence of Śūdras at the ceremonies, although on the outside of the sacrificial ground, was permitted—a point which results from the fact that during the dīkshā they were not to be addressed (iii. 3). Here and there a Śūdra appears as acting, although in a degraded position. Compare iv. 3, 5: āryo (i.e. vaiśyaḥ, according to the commentator Agnisvāmin) antarvedi . . . . bahirvedi śūdraḥ | āryābhāve yaḥ kaś cha āryyo varṇaḥ (brāhmaṇo vā kshattriyo vā, Agnisvāmin). Thus their position, like that of the Nishādas, was not so wretched as it became afterwards. Toleration was still necessary; indeed the strict Brahmanical principle was not yet generally recognized among the nearest Arian races. This is shown by the following fact. Before entering on the Vrātya-stomas, Lāṭyāyana treats, viii. 5, of an imprecatory rite called Śyena (the falcon), which is not taught in the Panchaviṁśa, but in the Shaḍviṁśa (iv. 2). The tribes mentioned by Pāṇini, v. 3, 112 ff., are there described: Vrātīnānāṁ[6] yaudhānām puttrān anūchānān ṛitvijo vṛiṇīta śyenasya | "arhatām eva" iti Śāṇḍilyaḥ[7] | ("Let the learned sons of warriors, who live by the profession of Vrātas, be chosen as priests for the Śyena. 'The sons of arhats only' [should be chosen] says Śāṇḍilya"). "Whilst," proceeds Prof. W., "in the beginning of the Sūtra nine things are required for a ṛitvij (priest), viz. that he should be (1) ārsheyaḥ (ā dasamāt purushād avyavachhinnam ārsham yasya, 'able to trace his unbroken descent for ten generations in the family of a rishi'); (2) anūchānaḥ (śishyebhyo vidyā-sampradānaṁ yaḥ kṛitavān, "one who has imparted knowledge to pupils'); (3) sādhucharaṇaḥ (shaṭsu brāhmaṇa-karmasv avasthitaḥ praśasta-karmā, 'one who has practised the six duties of a Brāhman, a man of approved conduct'); (4) vāgmī (eloquent); (5) anyūnāṅgaḥ (without deficiency in his members); (6) anatiriktāṅgaḥ (without superfluous members); (7) dvesataḥ (equal in length above and below the navel); (8) anatikṛishṇaḥ; (9) anatiśvetaḥ (na atibālo na ativṛiddhaḥ, 'neither too young nor too old'),—Lāṭyāyana here contents himself with putting forward one only of these requirements, the second (i.e. that the priest should be 'learned'), as essential. The title Arhat for teacher, which was at a later period used exclusively by the Buddhists, is found in the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, (iii. 4, 3, 6) and the Taittirīya Araṇyaka,[8] and

[6] Nānā-jātīyāḥ aniyata-vṛittayaḥ utsedha-jīvinaḥ sanghāḥ vrātāḥ | (Patānjali, quoted by Weber) "Vrātas are the various classes of people who have no fixed profession, and live by violence." Vrātena śarīrāyāsena jīvati vrātīnaḥ (Comm. on Pāṇini, v. 2, 21) "He who lives by bodily labour is a vrātīna." The word means "he who lives by the labour usual among Vrātas," according to another comment cited by Weber.

[7] Arhatām eva varaṇam karttavyam iti Śāṇḍilyaḥ | "Arhats only are to be chosen, says Śāṇḍilya" (Agnisvāmin, quoted by Weber).

[8] It also occurs in Ait. Br. i. 15 (see Böthlingk and Roth, s.v.). To his translation of this passage Dr. Haug appends the following note: "The term is arhat, a word is known in the Gaṇa Brāhmaṇa (Pāṇini, v. 1, 124). The Yaudhāḥ and Arhantaḥ are the forerunners of the Rājanyas and the Brāhmans.' According to Professor Weber, Ind. St. i. 207, note, a Sthapati "means, according to Kātyāyana's Śrauta Sūtras, xxii. 11, 11, a Vaiśya, or any other person (according to Kātyāyana, i. 1, 12, he may even be a Nishāda) who has celebrated the Gosava sacrifice, after being chosen by his subjects to be their ruler."

Page 378, lines 1–3.

Compare Droṇaparvan, verse 2149 : nanv eshāṁ niśchitā nishṭhā nishṭhā saptapadī smṛitā |

Page 400, line 9 from bottom.

If further proof of this sense of brahmarshi be wanted, it may be found in the words viprarshi and dvijarshi, which must be regarded as its synonymes, and which can only mean "Brāhman-rishi."

Page 423, line 12, and foot-note.

The same verse with some variations is repeated in the Anuśāsanaparvan, verse 6262: Rājā Mitrasahaś chaiva Vaśishṭhāya mahātmane | Madayantīm priyām bhāryyāṁ datvā cha tridivaṁ gataḥ | "And king Mitrasaha, having bestowed his dear wife Madayantī on the great Vaśishṭha, went to heaven." Here, it will be observed, the name Madayantī is correctly given.

Page 423, line 17.

This stanza is repeated in Anuśāsanaparvan, verse 6250, with the following variation in the second line: arghyam pradāya vidhival lebhe lokān anuttamān |

Page 436, line 5 from the foot.

I find that two other instances of Brāhmans receiving instruction from Rājanyas are alluded to by Professor Weber, Ind. Stud. x. 117.

well known, chiefly to the students of Buddhism. Sāyaṇa explains it by "a great Brāhman, or a Brāhman (in general)." In reference to another part of the sentence in which this word occurs, Dr. Haug adds: "That cows were killed at the time of receiving a most distinguished guest is stated in the Smṛitis. But as Sāyaṇa observes (which entirely agrees with opinions held now-a-days), this custom belongs to former yugas (periods of the world). Thence the word goghna, i.e. 'cowkiller.' means in the more ancient Sanskrit books 'a guest' (see the commentators on Paṇini, 3, 4, 73) for the reception of a high guest was the death of the cow of the house."

The first is recorded in the Satapatha Brāhmaṇa, x. 6, 1, 2 ff.; where it is stated that six Brāhmans, who were at issue with one another regarding Vaiśvānara (Agni), and were aware that king Aśvapati the Kaikeya was well informed on the subject, repaired to him for instruction and requested that he would treat them as his pupils. He first asked them 'if they were not themselves learned in the Veda as well as the sons of learned men, and how they could in that case come to consult him' ("Yan nu bhagavanto 'nūchānāḥ anūchāna-putrāḥ | kim idam" iti). They, however, persisted in their request, when he asked them severally what they considered Vaiśvānara to be, expressed his concurrence in their replies, though all different, as partial solutions of the question, and ended by giving them some further insight into the subject of their enquiry. The second instance is taken from the Chhāndogya Upanishad, v. 8, 1, which commences thus: Trayo ha udgīthe kuśalāh babhūvaḥ Śilakaḥ Śālāvatyaś Chaikitāyano Dālbhyaḥ Pravāhaṇo Jaivalir iti | te ha ūchur "udgīthe kathāṁ vadāma" iti | 2. "Tathā" iti ha samupaviviśuḥ | sa ha Pravāhaṇo Jaivalir uvācha "bhagavantāv agre vadatām | brāhmaṇayor vadator vāchaṁ śroshyāmi" iti | "Three men were skilled in the Udgītha, Śilaka Śālāvatya, Chaikitāyana Dālbhya, and Pravāhaṇa Jaivali. They said, 'We are skilled in the Udgītha; come let us discuss it.' (Saying) 'so be it,' they sat down. Pravāhaṇa Jaivali said, 'Let your reverences speak first; I will listen to the discourse of Brāhmans discussing the question.'" Śilaka Śālāvatya then asked Chaikitāyana Dālbhya a series of questions; but was dissatisfied with his final reply. Being interrogated in his turn by Chaikitāyana, Śilaka answered; but his answer was disapproved by Pravāhaṇa Jaivali, who finally proceeded to supply the proper solution.

In two other passages the same Upanishad, as quoted above in p. 195, and explained by the commentator, recognizes the fact of sacred science being possessed, and handed down, by Kshattriyas. See also the note on p. 220, above, p. 508. The doctrines held by Rājanyas are not, however, always treated with such respect. In the Satapatha Brāhmaṇa, viii. 1, 4, 10, an opinion in regard to breath (prāṇa) is attributed to Svarijit Nāgnajita, or Nagnajit the Gāndhāra, of which the writer contemptuously remarks that "he said this like a Rājanya" (Yat sa tad uvācha rājanyabandhur iva tv eva tad uvācha); and he then proceeds to refute it (see Weber's Indische Studien, i. 218). It appears that the Smṛiti recognizes the possibility of a Brāhman becoming in certain circumstances the pupil of a Rājanya or a Vaiśya. Thus Manu says, ii. 241: Abrāhmaṇād adhyayanam āpat-kāle vidhīyate | anuvrajyā cha śuśrūshā yāvad adhyayanaṁ guroḥ | 242. Nābrāhmaṇe gurau śishyo vāsam ātyantikaṁ vaset | brāhmaṇe chānanūchāne kānkshan gatim anuttamām | 241. "In a time of calamity it is permitted to receive instruction from one who is not a Brāhman; and to wait upon and obey such a teacher during the period of study. 242. But let not a pupil, who aims at the highest future destiny, reside for an excessive period with such a teacher who is not a Brāhman, or with a Brāhman who is not learned in the Veda." Kullūka explains this to mean that when a Brāhman instructor cannot be had a Kshattriya may be resorted to, and in the absence of a Kshattriya, a Vaiśya.

Page 457, note 241.

When I wrote this note, I did not advert to the difficulty presented by the word didāsithă, which has at once the form of a desiderative verb, and of the second person of the perfect tense. Böhtlingk and Roth, s.v. dā, on a comparison of the two parallel passages, suppose that the present reading of the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa is corrupt as regards this word, which, as they quote it, is didāsithā. May not the correct reading be dădāsithă from the root dās?

Page 461, line 14.

The Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa, ii. 2, 4, 4 f., says of Prajāpati: So 'surān asṛijata | tad asya apriyam āsīt | 5. Tad durvarṇaṁ hiraṇyam abhavat | tad durvarṇasya hiraṇyasya janma | . . . . sa devān asṛijata tad asya priyam āsīt | tat suvarṇasya hiraṇyasya janma | "He created Asuras. That was displeasing to him. 5. That became the precious metal with the bad colour (silver). This was the origin of silver. . . . . He created gods. That was pleasing to him. That became the precious metal with the good colour (gold). That was the origin of gold."

INDEX OF PRINCIPAL NAMES AND MATTERS.

A

Abhimāna, 201
Abhishnātas, 353
Abhiyuktas, 500
Achala, 400
Achhāvāka, 155
Adhipurusha, 111
Adharma, 124
Adhvaryu, 41, 155, 251, 263, 294, 459
Aditi, 18, 26, 72, 116, 122, 221
Ādityas, 19 f., 26, 52, 117, 126, 157, 270
Adriśyantī, 417
Agastya, or Agasti, 309 ff., 321, 330, 442, 461
Aghamarshana, 279
Aghamarshanas, 353
Agni, 10, 16, 20 f., 33, 52, 71, 75, 165, 177 f., 180, 270 —— one of the triad of deities, 75
Agnidh, 251
Agnīdhra, 155
Agnīdhra (king), 491
Agnihotra, 21, 428
Agni Purāna, 210
Agnisvāmin, 512
Agniveśya, 223
Agniveśyāyana, 223
Ahalyā, 235, 310, 466
—— the first woman, 121
Ahankāra, 201
Ahavanīya fire, 428
Ahi, 250, 340
Ahura Mazda, 293
Aindra-bārhaspatya oblation, 22
Aitareya Brāhmana, 5 quoted—
ii. 33,—180
— 34,—166
iii. 31,—177
— 34,—443
v. 14,—191
vii. 15,— 48
— 17,—355
— 19,—367 f.
— 27,—436
viii. 14,—492
— 21,—325, 456
— 23,—369, 493
— 24, 27,—367
— 33,—107
Ājagava, 301
Ajaka, 349
Ajamīḍha, 234, 267, 279, 360, 413
Ajātaśatru, 431
Ajīgartta, 355 ff., 360
Ajita, 279
Akampana, 505
Ākāśa, 115, 130, 506
Akriya, 232
Akshamālā, 336
Akuli, 139
Akūti, 65, 73
Alarka, 232
Amarāvatī, 494
Amāvasu, 349
Ambarīsha, 224, 266, 279, 362, 405
Ambashṭha, 481, 495
Ambhāmsi, 23, 58, 79, 80
Amśa, 27
Anagha, 335
Analā, 116
Ananta, 207
Anantā, 114
Anavadyā, 116
Andhras, 358, 483 f.
Anenas, 226
Anga, 232, 298, 464
Angas, 459
Angiras, 36, 65, 116, 122 f., 151, 168, 172, 184, 224 f., 226, 279, 286, 330, 341, 445, 466
Angirases, 192, 194, 224
Anila, 234
Anu, 232, 482
Anus, 179
Anugraha-sarga, 58
Anukramanikā, 228, 266, 328, 348
Anūpā, 116
Anushtubh, 16
Anuvratas, 500
Apasya, 279
Āpastamba, 2
Āpava, 453
Āpayā, 345
Apnavāna, 447
Apratiratha, 234
Apsarases, 33, 37, 177, 320, 419, etc.
Āranyakas, 2, 5, 32
Arhat, 511, 513
Arishṭanemi, 116, 125
Arjuna, 449 ff., 497
Arjuna (the Pāṇḍu), 494
Arka, 241
Arrian, quoted, 370
Arshṭishena, 272, 279
Ārtavas, 18
Aruṇas, 32, 449
Arundhatī, 336, 389
Arurmaghas, 438
Arushī, 124, 476
Arvāksrotas, 57, 61, 65, 157

Ārya, 18
Aryaman, 27, 158
Āryyas, 174 ff., 396, 481
—— their language, 141, 482 Āryakas, 498
Asat, 46
Asitamṛigas, 438
Ashṭaka, 279, 352, 357
Aśmasārin, 275
Āśramas, 98
Asurā, 116
Asuras, 23, 24, 29, 33, 37, 58, 79, 130, 139, 177, 187, 228, 469, etc., etc.
—— their priests, 189 f.
Āsuri, 430
Āśvalāyanas's Śrauta Sūtras, 137, 511
Aśvamedha (proper name), 267
Aśvatara, 336
Aśvins, 166, 470, etc.
Atharvan (the sage), 162, 169
—— his cow, 395
Atharvas, 293
Atharva-veda, 2
quoted—
iii. 19, 1,—283
— 24, 2,—179
iv. 6, 1,—21
— 6, 2,—490
— 14, 4,—179
— 29, 3, 5,—330
v. 8, 5,—289
— 11, 1-11,—395
— 17, 1-18,—280
— 18, 1-15,—284
— 19, 1-15,—286
vi. 120, 3,—385
— 123, 3 f.—137
vii. 104,—395
viii. 2, 21,—46
— 10, 24,—217, 511
— 108, 1-5,—254
ix. 5, 1,—503
— 5, 27,—282, 385
x. 8, 7,—9
xi. 10, 2,—32
xii. 1, 15,—163
— 3, 17,—385
— 5, 4-15,—287
xiii. 3, 14,—171
— 4, 29,—9
xv. 8, 1,—22
— 9, 1,—22
Atharva-veda continued—
xviii. 3, 15,—330
— 3, 23,—385
— 3, 34,—179
xix. 6, 1 ff.,—8, 9
— 6, 6,— 10
— 9, 12,—288
— 22, 21,—288
— 23, 30,—288
— 43, 8,—289
— 62, 1,—282
Atibalā, 116
Ātmavat, 279
Atri, 36, 61, 116, 122 f., 171 f., 178, 225, 242, 248, 267, 303, 330, 468
Atyarāti, 493
Audumbaras, 353
Aufrecht, Professor, his Catalogue of Bodleian Sanskrit MSS. referred to, 203 —— information or suggestions from him, 14, 19, 20, 29, 93, 137, 163 f., 210, 247 f., 254 ff., 319, 325 f., 340, 346, 389, 395, 512
Augha, 217
Aupamanyava, 177
Aurva, 279, 445, 447, 448 f., 476
Āvantyas, 486
Avyakta, 41
Ayāsya, 355
Ayodhyā, 115
Āyu, 170, 171 f., 174, 180
Āyus, 170
Āyus (king), 226, 308, 353

B

Bābhravas, 353
Babhrus, 353
Badarī, 199
Bāhu, 486
Bahuputra, 116
Bahvaśva, 235
Bala, 279
Balā, 116
Balāhaka, 207
Balākāśva, 353
Bālakhilyas, 32, 305, 400
Bāleya, 232
Bali, 232
Balis, 469
Banerjea, Rev. Prof., his Dialogues on Hindu Philosophy referred to, 120 —— his edition of the Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa referred to, 223 Banga, 232
Barbaras, 482
Baresma, 293
Bauddhas, 305
Benfey, Prof., his translation of the Sāma-veda quoted, 164
—— his glossary to ditto, 490
—— his translation of the Rig-veda quoted or referred to, 167, 180, 247, 331, 348
Bhagavadgītā quoted, 508
Bhadrā, 389, 467
Bhadraśva (a division of Jambudvīpa), 491
Bhaga, 27
Bhāgavata Purāṇa—
i. 3, 15,—213
— 3, 20,—350
ii. 1, 37,—156
— 5, 34,—155
iii. 6, 29,—156
—12, 20,—108
—20, 25,—157
—22, 2,—156
iv. 1, 40,—335
v. 1, 30,—489
—16, 2,— 490
—17, 11,—496
—20, 4, 6,—498
—20, 11,—499
—20, 16, 22,—500
—20, 28,—501
vi. 6, 40,—158
vii. 11, 24,—366
viii. 5, 41,—157
— 24, 7,—208
ix. 2, 16,—222
— 2, 17,—223
— 2, 21,—223
— 2, 23 ff.,—222
— 6, 2,—224
— 7,—358
— 7, 6,—386
— 13, 3,—316
— 14, 48,—158
— 15, 5,—457
— 16, 17,—458
— 16, 30,—358

Bhāgavata Purāṇa continued—
ix. 17, 2,—227
— 17, 10,—232
— 20, 1,—234
— 21, 19,—237
— 21, 21,—235
— 21, 33,—235
— 22, 14,—275
x. 33, 27,—113
Bhalandana, and Bhalanda a Vaiśya mantra-kṛit, 279
Bhayamāna, 266
Bharadvāja, 141, 279, 330
Bharata, 168, 234, 242, 354, 360, 413
Bhārata, 187, 348
Bharatas, 320, 338, 340, 354
Bhāratas, 344
Bhāratavarsha, 491, 494 ff.
Bhāratī, 112
Bharga, or Bhārga, 231
Bhārgabhūmi, 231
Bhārgava, 228
Bharmyaśva, 235
Bhāsī, 116
Bhāvins, 498
Bheda, 319, 323
Bhīma, 133, 142, 308, 349
Bhīmanāda, 207
Bhīmasena, 273
Bhīras, 495
Bhīshma, 127
Bhṛigu, 36, 65, 67, 122, 139, 151, 168, 228 f., 279, 286, 314, 443 ff.
Bhṛigu Vāruṇi, 443
Bhṛigubhūmi, 231
Bhṛigus, 169 f., 228, 442 ff.
Bhṛitakīla, 279
Bhumanyu, 360
Bhūrloka, 51, 209, 211
Bhūtakṛitas, 37, 42, 255
Bhūtānāmpati, 16
Bhūtapati, 108
Bhūtas, 59
Bhūtavīras, 438
Boar incarnation, 51 ff., 54, 76
Böhtlingk and Roth's Lexicon referred to, 47, 108, 144, 178, 180, 184, 253, 340, 348, 395, 400, 442, 505, 511
Brahma Svovasyava, 30
Brahmachārin, 289
Brāhmăn (masculine, a priest), 155, 242 ff., 459
Brāhmăn (masculine, the god), 35, 36, 75, etc.
—— his passion for his daughter, 107 Brāhmăn (neuter, prayer, 241
Brahman (neuter, the universal soul), 20
Brāhmaṇa, son of a Brāhmăn, 252, 264
Brāhmaṇāchhaṁsin, 155
Brāhmaṇas (the theological works), 2, 4 f.
Brahmaṇaspati, 16
Brāhmāṇī, 110
Brāhmans, 7, and passim
—— origin of the word, 252, 259, 264
—— their intermarriage with women of other castes, 282, 481 —— their prerogatives and powers, 128, 130, etc.
Brahmanya, 155
Brahmaputra, 252, 259, 264
Brahmarshi, or Brāhman rishi, 400, 407, 410
Brahmās, the nine, 65, 445
Brahmāśva, 279
Brahmaudana, 26, 27
Brahma-yuga, 152
Bréal, M. Michel, his Hercule et Cacus, 246
Bride's seven steps, 378, 514
Bṛihaddevatā, 321, 326, 344
Bṛihadishu, 234
Bṛihaduktha, 279
Bṛihaspati, 16, 22, 163, 167, 226, 270, 438
Bṛihat, 160
Bṛihat-sāman, 286
Buddha, 509
Buddhists, 513
Budha, 221, 226, 307, 336
Bunsen, Baron, his Philosophy of Universal History referred to, 8 Burnouf, M. Eugène, his Bhāgavata Purāṇa referred to, 8, 155, 211, 489, etc.
—— his views about the Deluge, 215

C

Chākshusha, 298
Chākshusha Manvantara, 207, 213
Chaṇḍa, 207
Chaṇḍāla, 402, 481
Caste, mythical accounts of its origin, 7 ff.
—— Variety and inconsistency of these accounts, 34, 66, 102, 159
Castes, their future abodes, 63, 98
—— their respective colours, 140, 151, 153
—— no natural distinction between, 140 —— manner of their rise according to Prof. Roth, 289 —— time of their rise according to Dr. Haug, 292
Chāturvarṇya, 135
Charshaṇis, 158
Chauras, 482
Chārvākas, 305
Chhandas, 4
Chhandogas, 334
Chhāndogya Brāhmaṇa, 5
—— Upanishad, iii. 11, 4,—195, 514
—— iv. 1, 4,—49
—— v. 3, 1,—435
—— viii. 15, 1,—195
Chīnas, 482, 484
Chīrinī, a river, 199
Cholas, 488
Chunchulus, 353
Chyavana, 124, 273, 283, 445, 470, 474
Colebrooke's Miscellaneous Essays quoted or referred to, 8, 13 f., 25, 52, 325, 378, 385, 492, 497 Cowell's, Professor E. B., translation of Kaushītakī Brāhmaṇa Upanishad, 10, 432
—— Preface to, quoted, 32
Creation of man, mythical accounts of, 7 ff.
—— their mutual inconsistency, 34, 65, 102
—— how explained by Indian commentators, 66
Creations, similarity of successive, 60, 89

D

Dadhīcha, 279
Dadhyanch, 162, 169, 172
Daityas, 41, 139, 499
Daivavāta, 348
Daivodāsa, 348
Daksha, 9, 65, 72, 116, 122, 124 ff., 153, 221, 335
Dākshāyaṇī, Aditi, 126
Dama, 222
Damayantī, 389
Damayantī, see Madayantī
Damins, 500
Dānavas, 139, 144, 209, 468 f., 499
Dānavratas, 501
Danāyū, 123
Daṇḍakas, 467
Danu, 116, 123
Daradas, 459, 482
Darvas, or Dārvas, 482, 488
Dāsa, 174, 323, 396
Dasahotṛi, 29
Daśaratha, 362
Daśārṇa, 222
Dasyus, 174 ff., 358, 460, 469, 482, 500
Dattātreya, 450, 473, 478
Day of Brahmā, 43, 48, 213
—— gods, 43
Deities, triad of, produced from the three Guṇas, 75
Deluge, legend of, 183, 199, 203, 209, 211
—— was the tradition of it indigenous or not, 215
—— comparison of different Indian accounts of, 216 Devaḍeva, 351
Devakas, 500
Devala, 352
Devalas, 353
Devāpi, 269
Devarāja, 279
Devarāta, 279, 351 f., 356, 413
Devarātas, 353
Devarshi, 400
Devas, 79, 499
Devaśarman, 466
Devaśravas, 344, 352 f.
Devavat, 322
Devavāta, 344
Dhānajapyas, 353
Dhananjaya, 279
Dhanur-veda, 477
Dhanvantari, 226
Dhanyas, 500
Dharma, 20, 122, 124, 385, 400, 412
Dhārshṭakas, 223
Dhātṛi, 18, 27, 124
Dhī, 241
Dhṛishṇu, 126
Dhṛishṭa, 221, 223
Dhṛitarāshṭrī, 117
Dhruva, 234, 298
Dīrghatamas, 226, 232, 247, 268, 279
Dīrghatapas, 233
Dīrghasattra, 300
Dishṭa, 222
Diti, 116, 123
Divodāsa, 229 f., 235, 268, 279, 322, 348
Dogs, whether they fast from religious motives, 365
Draupadī, 381, 389
Draviḍa, 209
Draviḍas, or Drāviḍas, 482
Draviṇas, 500
Dṛiḍhanetra, 400
Driptabālāki Gārgya, 432
Dṛishadvatī, 344
Dropa, 207
Druhyu, 232, 482
Druhyus, 179
Duḥsīma, 305
Durga, commentator on the Nirukta, quoted, 344, 417
Durgaha, 267
Duritakshaya, 237
Durvāsas, 387, 389
Dushyanta, 234, 360
Dvāpara, 39, 43 ff., 119, 146, 149 f., 447
Dvīpas, 51, 489 ff.
Dwarf incarnation, 52, 54, 233
Dyaus (the sky), feminine, 108
—— masculine, 163, 396, 434

E

Earth, the goddess, 51, 163
Earth fashioned, 51 ff., 76
—— milked, 96
Egg, the mundane, 35, 74, 156, 503
Ekadāśinī, 69
Ekaviṁśa, 16
Elysian fields, 502
Emūsha, 53

F

Families, hope of their reunion in a future life, 385
Fathers, see Piṭris
Fish incarnation, 50, 54, 111, 183, 199, 205, 209, 211
Flood, see Deluge

G

Gabhastimat, 494
Gabhīra, 232
Gādhi, 343, 349, and passim
Gālava, 232, 352, 411
Gālavas, 353
Gandhamādana, 491
Gāndhāras, 484
Gāndharva, 494
Gandharvas, 33, 37, 59, 139, 144, 177, 250, 257, 499
—— their heaven, 63, 98, 307
Gangā, 130, 199, 206, 461, 490
Garga, 227, 236, 279, 305
Gārgya Bālāki, 431
Gārgyas, 236
Gārhapatya-fire, 186
Gāthin, 348, 358
Gāthins, 358, 363
Gātra, 335
Gautama, 121, 235, 316, 434, 466
Gavishṭhira, 330
Gaya, 227
Gāyatrī, 16, 110, 114, 137
Genesis, i. 2,—52
Gifts to priests, 259
Gir, 241
Gods, intercourse of men with, in early ages, 147
—— whether they can practise Vedic rites, 365
Goldstücker, Professor, aid received from, 508

Gopatha Brāhmaṇa, 5
Gorresio, his edition of the Rāmāyaṇa referred to, 397, 399, etc.
Gotama, 330
Grāvan, 155
Griffith, Principal, MS. obtained through him, 279
Gṛihya Sūtras, 5
Gṛitsa, 279
Gṛitsamada, 226
Gṛitsamati, 227
Gubernatis, Signor A. de, quoted, xii.
Guṇas, 66, 75, 145
Gurudhīra, 279

H

Haihaya, 477
Haihayas, 449, 486
Haimavatī, 336
Hala, 121
Hall's, Dr. Fitzedward, edition of Wilson's Vishṇu Purāṇa, 24, 268, 512 and passim —— information given by, 155
—— Preface to his edition of the Sānkhya-pravachana-bhāshya referred to, 430
Hansa, 158
Hansas, 498
Hanūmat, 143
Hari, 51, 62
Harita, 224
Hārita, 352
Hāritas, 225
Hārītaka, 351
Hariśchandra, 355, 379 ff., 413, 486
Harivaṁśa quoted—
292,—302
652,—223
659,—221
718,—376
773,—487
789,—230
1425,—351
1456,—351
1520,—227
1596,—231
1682,—233
1732,—227
1752,—231
1766,—352
Harivaṁśa continued—
1781,—236
1819,—273
8811,—307
11355,—154
11802,—153
11808,—152
Harivarsha, 491, 494
Harsha, 124
Haryaśva, 279
Haug's, Dr. Martin, Aitareya Brāhmaṇa quoted or referred to, 4, 5, 48, 107, 127, 177, 180, 192, 246, 250, 256, 263, 355, 369, 438 f., 492 f., 513
—— Origin of Brāhmanism quoted, 11, 14, 292 Haughton, Sir G. C., his note on Manu, vii. 41,—296
Hayagrīva, 207, 212
Havishyanda, 400
Hayaśiras, 449
Hema, 232
Hemakūṭa, 491
Himavat, or Himālaya, 130, 183, 200, 229, 311, 491
Hiraṇmaya, 491
Hiraṇyagarbha, 195, 220
Hiraṇyāksha, 352
Hiraṇyākshas, 353
Homer's Odyssey quoted, 502
Hostility to Vedic worship, 259
Hotṛi, 155, 251, 263, 271, 294, 459
Houses, origin of, 93
Hṛishīkeśa, 206
Huhu, 336
Human sacrifices, 11 f.
Hūṇas, 495
Hymns of the Rig-veda, 4, 318
—— whether they allude to castes as already existing, 161 ff.

I

Iḍa, 268, 279, 306
Iḍā, daughter of Manu, 184 ff., see Ilā
Ikshvāku, 115, 126, 177, 195, 221, 224, 268, 337, 355, 362, 401, 405, 508
Ikshvākus, 401, 418
Ilā, 126, 221, 306, see Iḍā
Ilāvṛita, 491
Indra, 3, 10, 18, 20, 33, 44, 163, 168, 171, 191, 438
Indra's heaven, 63, 98
—— wife, 341
—— his adulteries, 121, 310, 466
Indra-dvīpa, 494
Indrāṇī, 310, 389
Indu (Soma), 124
Instrumental cause, 51
Isaiah vi. 9, 10,—255
Īśāna, 20
Ishīratha, 348
Ishundharas, 499
Īśvara, 75, 221
Itihāsas, 3, 5, 215

J

Jābāli, 115
Jahnu, 273, 349, 353, 360, 413
Jahnus, 358
Jaimini's Sūtras, 508
Jainas, 305
Jamadagni, 279, 330, 345, 350, 355, 413, 422, 447, 450 ff.
Jamadagnis, 342
Jambudvīpa, 488, 490 ff.
Jambūnada, 461
Janaka, 130, 334, 426 ff.
Janaloka, 44, 51, 88, 95, 99
Janamejaya, 152, 438
Janantapa, 493
Janārdana, 206
Japa, 442
Jaṭāyus, 116
Jātimālā, 497
Jātukarṇya, 223
Jaya, 352
Jayakṛita, 351
Jayāpīḍa, 424
Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society quoted, 3, 6, and passim
Jyotsnā, 59

K

Ka, 125
Kachhapa, 351 f.

Kadrū, 123
Kakshīvat, 268, 279
Kāla, 62
Kālā, 123
Kālakā, 116
Kalāpa, 277
Kali, 39, 43 ff., 120, 146, 150, 495
Kalindas, 482
Kalinga, 232
Kalingas, 459, 495
Kalmāshapāda, 414, 423
Kalpas, 43 ff.
Kāma, 112, 124
Kāmarūpa, 495
Kāmbojas, 482 f., 485 ff.
Kānchana, 349
Kānchis, 391
Kāṇḍaprishṭha, 442, 507
Kandarpa, 408
Kāṇḍarshi, 400
Kānīna, 223
Kankas, 484
Kānyakubja, 390
Kaṇva, 166, 170, 172, 234, 279
Kāṇvāyana, 234
Kapas, 472
Kapi, 237
Kapila, 227, 414
Kapilā, 123
Kapilas, 499
Kāpileyas, 356
Kapishṭhala, 344
Kardama, 116, 123, 400
Kārīshis, 353
Karmadevas, 46
Kārtavīrya, 450, 478
Kārūsha, 221 f.
Kārūsha, 126
Kārūshas, 495
Kāśa, or Kāśaka, 226 f.
Kaśerumat, 494
Kāśirāja, 226
Kāśis, 431
Kāśmīras, 459
Kāśya, 227, 279
Kaśyapa, 37, 54, 115 f., 123 f., 126, 195, 330, 400, 451, 455 f., 459
Kaśyapas, 438
Kāṭhaka Brāhmaṇa quoted, 140, 186, 189, 332 f., 358
Kati, 352
Kātyāyanas, 352
Kātyāyana's Śrauta Sūtras, 19, 136, 365 ff., 369, 514
Kaumāra-sarga, 58
Kaushītakī Brāhmaṇa quoted, 328
—— Upanishad, 10, 431
Kauśika, 342, 349
Kauśika (epithet of Indra), 347
Kauśikas, 353, etc.
Kauśikī, 350, 411
Kavi, 243, 279, 445
Keralas, 488
Kesaraprābandhā, 285
Ketumāla, 491
Ketus, 32
Khalins, 468
Khaṇḍapāni, 235
Khāṇḍavāyanas, 451
Khaśas, 482
Khyāti, 67
Kīkatas, 342
Kilāta, 189
Kimpurusha, 461 f.
Kimpurushas, 499
Kināśa, 97
Kinnaras, 37
Kiṃśuka, 229
Kirātas, 391, 482, 484 f.
Kolisarpas, 482, 488
Konvaśiras, 482
Kovidas, 500
Kratu, 36, 65, 116, 122 f., 400
Kraufcha-dvīpa, 491, 500
Kraunchī, 117
Kṛipa, 279
Kṛishṇa, 113
Kṛishṇas, 499
Kṛishṭi, 178
Kṛita, 39, 43 ff., 88, 90 ff., 119, 144, 148 f., 158, 492, 495, 505
Kṛitamālā, 209, 212
Kṛitavīrya, 449 ff., 478
Krodha, 123
Krodhavaśā, 116
Kshattravṛiddha, 226
Kshattṛi, 481
Kshattriyas, 7, and passim
—— etymology of the word, 97, 504
—— how their race was restored, 452
Kshemaka, 235
Kshudrakas, 459
Kuhn, Dr. A., quoted, 179
Kulakas, 500
Kullūka quoted, 36, 47, 129, 279, 480, 483
Kumārila Bhaṭṭa referred to or quoted, 122, 509
Kuntis, 459
Kūrma avatāra, see Tortoise incarnation
Kurus, 5, 269, 431, 495
Kurus, 498
Kuśa, 227, 349, 351, 397
Kuśa-dvīpa, 491, 497, 499
Kuśalas, 500
Kuśāmba, 349, 351
Kuśanābha, 351, 397
Kuśika, 338, 340, 346, 400, 474
Kuśikas, 342 f., 346, 355, etc.
Kusumāyudha (a name of Kāma), 112
Kutsa, 330 f.
Kuvera, 140, 279, 400

L

Lakshmī, 124
Lalita-vistara, 32
Langlois, M., translator of the Harivaṁśa, 151
—— of the Rig-veda, 273, 321
Lassen's Indian Antiquities quoted, 394, 425
Lātas, 482
Lātyāyana's Sūtras, 512
Lecky, Mr., his History of Rationalism, 407
Leśa, 226
Life of Brahmā, 49
Linga Purāṇa quoted, 225
Lohita, 279
Lohitas, 353
Loiseleur Deslongchamps, M., his note on Manu, vii. 41,—296
Lokāloka mountain, 503
Lunar race, 220, 225

M

Mada, 471 f.
Madayantī, 419, 514
Madhuchhandas, or Madhusyanda, 279, 347, 351 f., 357, 400, 406
Madhusūdana Sarasvatī, his Commentary on the Bhagavad Gītā quoted, 508

Madras, 484, 495
Magadhas, 495
Māgadhas, 501
Magas, 501
Mahābhārata, 5 f.
quoted—
Ādi-parvan—
272,—447
869,—445
2253,—116
2459,—451
2517,—122
2550, 2574,—123
2606,—445
2610,—476
2620–2635,—117
2914,—410
3128,—124
3143,—306
3151,—308
3533,—482
3727,—360
3750,—273
4719,—418
6638,—388
6695,—342
6699,—415
6802,—448
7351,—389
8455,—389
Sabhā-parvan—
489,—379
1031,—483
1045,—494
Vana-parvan—
10137, 10201—450
11234,—143
11248,— 40
12460,—308
12469,—133
12619,—147
12747,—196
12826,— 48
12952,— 35
12962,— 10
12981,—145
13090,— 40
13436,—129
14160,—178
Udyoga-parvan—
373,—310
3721,—412
3970,—336
5054,—276
Bhīshma-parvan—
227,—491
346,—495
389,—148
Mahābhārata continued—
Bhīshma-parvan—
410,—501
455,—500
468,—502
Droṇa-parvan—
2149,—414
2395,—505
2443,—459
4747,—483
S'alya-parvan—
2295,—392
2281,—272
2360,—419
S'ānti-parvan—
774,— 32
1741, 1792,—423, 452
2221,—304
2247,— 97
2280,—370
2304,—366
2429,—484
2674,—49, 149
2682 ff.,—49
2749,—127
2819,—140
3404, 3406,—150
3408,— 49
4499,—388
4507,—209
5330,—376
6130,—506
6640,—429
6930,—138
7523,—125
7548,—507
7569,—122
7573,—125
7882,—430
8550,— 60
8591, 8604,—423
10058,—151
10699,—430
10118,—423
10861,—130
11221,—334
11545, 11854,—430
12658,—215
12685,—122
13088,—145
13090,— 40
Anus'āsana-parvan—
183,—412
186,—352
201,—354
1867,—440
1944,—229
2103,—482
Mahābhārata continued—
Anus'āsana-parvan—
2158,—482
2160,—130
2262,—466
2718,—474
2841,—494
3732,—374
3960,—460
4104,—443
4527,—128
4579,—128
4745,—314
6208,—507
6262,—514
6250,—514
6570,—132
7187,—462
As'vamedikha-parvan—
1038,—57
Mahābhaya, 124
Mahādeva, 75, 207
—— taught by Angiras, 226
Mahākalpa, 213
Maharloka, 156
Maharshi, 400
Mahat, 41, 75, 114
Mahāvīrya, 237
Mahendra, 451
Mahes'vara, 74
Mahīdhara, 490
Mashishas, or Māhishakas, 482, 488
Māhishmatī, 462, 478
Mahodaya, 402
Mahoragas, 139
Maitrāvaruṇa, 155, 244
Maitrāvaruṇī, 186
Maitrāyaṇa, 230
Maitreya, 56, 58
Maitreyas, 230
Mālavas, 459, 495
Malaya, 205
Mallināṭha quoted, 395
Mamatā, 247
Māna (Agastya?), 321
Mānava-dharma-s'āstra (or Institutes of Manu)— Quotations from—
i. 8 ff.—35
— 22, 25,—38
— 30,—60
— 31 ff.,—35, 446
— 58 ff.,—38, 446
— 66 f.,—43
— 69 ff.,—47
— 79 f., 86,—39

Mānava-dharma-s'āstra continued—
i. 87, 93, 97,—40
— 88 ff.,—364
— 100,—129
ii. 29,—137
— 38 f.,—481
— 170,—138
— 225,—138
— 241,—515
iii. 171,—275
iv. 239 ff.,—380
v. 1, 3,—446
vii. 2,—446
— 3 ff.,—300
— 38 ff.,—296
viii. 17,—380
— 110,—329
ix. 22,—336
— 66 f.—297
— 149 ff.—282
— 301 f.—49
— 303,—300
x. 4,—480
— 7 ff.,—282
— 8,—481
— 12,—481
— 20,—481
— 43 f.,—481
— 45,—482
— 105,—358
— 108,—377
xi. 234 ff.,—393
— 32,—398
xii. 39 ff.,—40
Mānāvī, 186
Mānavī, 189
Mānasas, 501
Mandagas, 501
Mandapāla, 336
Mandehas, 500
Māndhātṛi, 225, 268, 279, 484
Mantra, 2, 4 f.
Manu, progenitor of the Āryan Indians, 161 ff., 183 ff.
—— his bull, 188 ff.
Manu, 119, 122, 297
—— Auttami, 38, 111
—— Chākshusha, 38, 298
—— Raivata, 38
—— Saṁvaraṇi, 217
—— Sāvarṇi, 217
—— Svārochisha, 38, 111
—— Svāyambhuva, 25, 38 f., 44, 65, 72, 106, 111, 114, 298, 489, 511
Manu Tāmasa, 38
—— Vaivasvata, 37 ff., 44, 111, 115, 126, 196, 213, 217, 221, 279, 298, 306, 508, 510
—— Vivasvat, 217
Manu (a female), 116
Manu (=mind), 23
Manu's Descent, 183, 217
Manush (=Manu), 165 ff.
Manvantaras, 43 ff.
Mārgaṇapriyā, 116
Marīchi, 36 f., 65, 114 ff., 122 f., 126
Mārkaṇḍeya, 48, 199, 207
Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa quoted, 75, 81 ff., 221 ff., 379
Mārttaṇḍa, 126
Mārttikāvatas, 459
Maru, 277
Maruts, 20, 71
—— their heaven, 63, 98
Marutta, 222
Matanga, 411, 440
Mātariśvan, 128, 170, 256
Mati, 241
Mātṛikā, 158
Matsya-avatāra, see Fish-incarnation
Matsyas, 431
Matsya Purāṇa, 1, 12—203 49, 39,—277 132, 98,—278 3, 32 ff.,—108
Matthew, Gospel of St. xiii. 14 f.,—255
Maudgalya, 235
Medhātithi on Manu, 47
Medhātithi, 234
Medhyātithi, 170
Mekalas, 482
Men, Five races of, 163, 176
—— their original condition, 62, 117, 145, 147
Menakā, 407, 410
Meru, 417, 491
Metempsychosis, 385
Mīmāusa-vārttika quoted, 508
Mithilā, 279, 430
Mitra, 27, 184, 186, 221, etc.
Mitrasaha, 337, 414, 423, 514
Mitrayu, 230, 322
Mlechhas, 41 f., 141, 482, 484
Mṛikshiṇī, 271
Mṛityu, 20, 124, 299, 303
Muchukunda, 140
Mudgala, 235, 279, 352
Mukhya-sarga, 57
Müller's, Professor Max, Ancient Sanskrit Literature quoted or referred to, 2, 4, 5, 8, 13, 48, 122, 181, 192, 253, 263, 326, 355, 358, 366, 426, 508
—— Art. in Journ. Germ. Or. Soc., 365
—— Art. in Journ. Roy. As. Soc., 115, 177
—— Art. in Oxford Essays, now reprinted in "Chips from a German Workshop," 226, 231 —— Chips from a German Workshop, 429, 431, 490
—— Preface to Rig-veda, 348, 417
—— Results of Turanian Researches, 327
Muṇḍaka Upanishad, i. 2, 1, quoted, 3, 39
Muni (a female), 123
Munis, 153
Mūtibas, 358, 483

N

Nābhāga, 224, 268
Nābhāga, 126, 224
Nābhāgārishṭa, 126, 223
Nābhānedishṭha, 221
Nābhāganedishṭha, 192 ff., 221
Nāgas, 37, 140
Nagnajit Gāndhāra, 515
Nahush, 165, 179, 307
Nahusha, 133, 226, 232, 297, 307 ff., 393, 410
Naigeya sākhā of Sāma-Sanhitā, 14
Naimittika-laya, 45, 209, 219
Naubandhana, 200
Nairṛitas, 124
Namuchi, 175
Nara, 35, 76, 353, 400
Nārada, 36, 119, 126, 400
Nārāyaṇa, 35, 50, 54, 76, 154, 400
—— assumes different colours in different yugas, 145

Nārāyaṇi, 353
Narishyanta, 126, 221, 223
Narmadā, 207, 478
Neshṭṛi, 155, 251
Nève, M., Mythe des Ribhavas referred to, 161
Nīchaśākha, 342
Nidāna-Sūtras, 136
Niggards, 259
Night of Brahmā, 43, 209
Nīla, a mountain, 491
Nīla, 235
Nīlakantha on M.Bh., 201
Nimi, 297, 316, 337
Niramitra, 235
Nirṛiti, 124
Nirukta, 5
—— quoted or referred to, 3
i. 8.—256
— 20,—147
ii. 10,—269
— 24,—338
— 25,—340
iii. 4,— 26
— 7,—165
— 8,—177
— 17,—445
iv. 19,—154
v. 11,—253
— 13,—321
vi. 30,—322
— 32,—342
ix. 6,—253
— 26,—417
x. 44,—154
xi. 19,—442
— 23,— 9
xii. 10 f., — 34,—162
xiii. 9,—252
Nishādas, 177, 481, 153 f.
Nishāda, birth of, 301, 303, 403, 481
Nishāda-sthapati, 366
Nishadha, 491
Nītha, 241
Nivid, 241
Nodhas, 330
Nṛiga, 221
Nyāya-mālā-vistara quoted, 510

O

Oḍras, 482
Oha-brahman, 255

P

Pādma-kalpa, 44, 50
Padma Purāṇa, 379
Pahlavas, 351, 391, 398, 482, 484, 486
Paijavana, 366
Pāka-yajna, 187
Pakshyā, 342
Panchachūḍā, 413
Panchadaśa, 16
Panchajanāḥ and other parallel terms, 176
Panchālas or Pānchālas, 431, 434, 495
Panchaśikā, 430
Panchaviṁśa Brāhmaṇa, 5
—— quoted, 417
Panchaviṁśa stoma, 492
Pāṇḍus, 5, 127, 381
Pāṇini, 3
—— referred to, 513
Pāṇins, 353
Pannagas, 144
Para, 44
Pāradas, 482, 486
Paramarshi, 400
Parameshṭhin, 123
Parārdha, 44
Parāśara, 56, 58, 130, 322, 417, 430, 447
Parāśava, 481
Pāraśikas, 495
Paraśurāma, 350, 422, 442, 447 ff., 474
Parāvasu, 455
Parikshit, 438
Parivettṛi, 275
Parivitti, 275
Parjanya, 20, 270
Parsīs, 293
Pārthivas, 353
Paruchhepa, 172
Parushṇi, 490
Parvaṇa, 400
Pāśadyumna, 319
Passion, 51, see Rājās
Paśupati, 108, 444
Pātālas, 504
Patangas, 498
Pātnīvata (Agni), 191
Paundras, or Paundrakas, 391, 482, 484
Paurava, 353
Paurukutsī, 351
Phena, 233
Pijavana, 268, 297, 322, 338
Piśāchas, 33, 37, 140
Pītas, 499
Pitṛis, 23, 37, 46, 58, 79, 88, 434
Plaksha-dvīpa, 490, 497
Plants, origin of, 59, 90, 95
Plato quoted, 147
Potṛi, 155, 251, 263
Prachetas, 36, 116, 125, 279
Prāchetasa, 125
Prachetases, 72
Pradhā, 123
Pradhāna, 51, 74
Pradyumna, 279
Prajāpati, 16 ff., 23 f., 29 ff., 52 ff., 68 ff., 180, 184, 444, and passim
—— born on a lotus-leaf, 32
—— his exhaustion, 68
—— his heaven, 63, 98
Prajāpati Parameshṭhin, 19
Prakāśa, 58
Prākṛita-sarga, 58
Prakṛiti, 74 f.
Pralaya, 214, 217
Pramaganda, 342
Prāmśu, 221
Praṇava, 158
Praśāstri, 251, 263
Praskaṇva, 330
Praskaṇvas, 234
Prastotṛi, 41, 155
Prasūti, 65
Pratardana, 229, 268, 455
Pratihartṛi, 41, 155
Pratīpa, 273
Pratiprasthātṛi, 136
Pratisanchara, 44
Pratisarga, 49
Pratishṭhātri, 155
Pratyūsha, 400
Pravāhaṇa Jaivali, 433, 515
Prāyaśchitti, 294
Pretas, 141
Pṛishadaśva, 224, 279
Pṛishadhra, 126, 221
Pṛithā, 494
Pṛithavāna, 305
Pṛithī, or Pṛithu, 263, 279, 301, 304, 511
Pṛithivī, 434
Pṛithūdaka, 272
Priyamedha, 172, 235, 268
Priyavrata, 65, 72, 106, 114, 489, 491, 497

Pulaha, 36, 65, 116, 122 f., 400
Pulastya, 36, 65, 116, 122 f., 400
Pulindas, 358, 482 ff.
Puṇḍra, 232
Puṇḍras, 358, 483, 495
Purāṇas, 3, 5 f.
Purāṇas'va, 279
Purohitas, 41, 128, 507
Pūru, 232, 277, 331, 360
Pūrus, 179
Purukutsa, 266, 279, 331
Purukutsānī, 267
Purumīḷha, 267
Purūravas, 126, 128, 158, 172, 221, 226, 279, 306, 349, 497
Purusha, 9 ff., 25, 32, 34 ff., 75 f., 106, 155
Purusha-sūkta, translated and discussed, 7 ff., 34, 155 f., 159, 161
Purushas, 500
Purushottama, 51
Pūshan, 19 f., 33, 71, 270
Pushkalas, 500
Pushkara, 405
Pushkara-dvīpa, 491, 501
Pushkaras, 500
Pushkarin, 237
Pushpaka (Rama's car), 120

R

Rabhasa, 232
Raibhya, 455
Rājanya, 10, 258, 264, etc.
Rājarshi, 266, 400
Rajas (the Guṇa) 41, 58, 62, 66, 75, 79, 89, 92, 141, 154
Rajas (masculine) 335
Rājasūya sacrifice, 20, 225
Rājataraṅginī quoted, 424
Raji, 226
Rākshasas, 59, 140, 144, etc.
Rākshases, 33, 37, 59, 136, 177
Rakshovāhas, 459
Rāma, 5, 112, 115, 120, 305, 337
Rāma Margaveya, 438
Rāmas, 495
Ramaṭhas, 485
Rāmāyaṇa, 5 f.
—— quoted—
i. 37, 4,—405
— 51–65,—397
— 55, 5,—329
— 70,—337
— 70, 41,—362
ii. 110, 1-7,—115
— 110, 2,—36
— 110, 3,—54
— 110, 6,—337, 400
— 111, 1,—337
iii. 14, 5–15, 29–31, —115
iv. 43, 38,—493
v. 82, 13,—59
vii. (or Uttara-kāṇḍa) 30, 19 ff.,—120
74, 8 ff.,—117
Rambhā, 226, 232
Rambhā, 336, 408, 413
Ramyaka, 491
Rantibhāra and Rantināra, 234
Rantideva, 423
Rasollāsa, 62
Raspi, 292
Rathachitra, 336
Rathakara, 336
Rathaesthas, 293
Rathaṁtara, 16
Rathavīti, 283
Rathītara, 224
Rathwī, 292
Rati, 106, 114
Rauhiṇāyana, 72
Rāvaṇa, 21, 478
Re-marriage of Indian women in early times, 282
Reṇu, 346, 350, 357
Reṇukā, 350
Reṇumat, 352
Ribhukshans, 165
Ribhus, 255
Richīka, 349, 405, 413, 450, 453, 476
Rig-veda, 2
Texts of, translated[1]—
First Mandala—
10, 1,—246
10, 11,—347
13, 4,—167
Rig-veda continued—
First Mandala—
14, 11,—167
15, 5,—253
31, 4,—172
32, 12,—490
33, 9,—246
36, 10,—167, 170
— 19,—166, 167
44, 11,—168
45, 3,—341
47, 6,—330
58, 6,—170
63, 7,—330
65, 1,—170
68, 4,—164
76, 5,—166
80, 1,—244
— 16,—162
83, 5,—169
84, 7,—259
92, 11,—45
94, 6,—263
96, 5,—243
101, 4,—260
—— 5,—246
102, 2,—322
106. 5,—167
108, 7,—246
—— 8,—179
112, 16,—171
—— 19,—331
114, 2,—163
117, 3,—178
—— 21,—171, 174
122, 9,—260
124, 2,—45
125, 7,—260
130, 5,—173
—— 8,—174
139, 9,—172
144. 4,—45
158, 6,—46, 247
162, 5–7, 11, 15, 16, 163, 3,—12 [—12
164, 15,—362
—— 34, 35,—244
—— 45,—252
—— 50,—11
167, 7,—173
175, 3,—174
177, 5,—183
182, 3,—260
185, 9,—331

[1] A large number of texts are referred to in pp. 45, 163, 170, 171, 241, 243, 245, 259, 329, etc., but as they have not been translated they are not included in this list.

Rig-veda continued—
Second Mandala—1, 2, 3,—251
— 4 ff.—270
2, 10,—178
4, 2,—170
7, 1, 5,—348
12, 6,—244
19, 8,—243
20, 4,—243
— 6,—174
23, 1, 2,—242
—— 4,—260
27, 1,—72
33, 1,—184
— 13,—163
36, 5,—253
39, 1,—247
43, 2,—252
Third Mandala—
1, 21,—345
3, 6,—165
5, 10,—170
18, 4,—346
23, 2-4,—345, 348
26, 1,—346
29, 15,—347, 362
30, 20,—347
32, 10,—244
33, 1-12,—339
34, 9,—176, 258
42, 9,—347
43, 4, 5,—344
— 5,—247
49, 1,—176
53, 6-16, 21, 24,—340, 354, 372
— 9,—362
— 12,—242
55, 19,—181
Fourth Mandala—
6, 11,—173
9, 3, 4,—252
16, 9,—242
25, 4,—348
— 6, 7,—260
26, 7,—175
37, 1,—165
42, 8, 9.—266
44. 6.—268
50, 7-9—247
58, 2,—248
Fifth Mandala—
2, 12,—173
21, 1,—168
29, 3,—248
31, 4,—248
32, 11,—178
Rig-veda continued—
Fifth Mandala—
— 12,—248
37, 4,—247
40, 5 ff., 6,—242, 469
— 8,—248
45, 6,—166
53, 2,—331
54, 7, 14,—247
Sixth Mandala—
11, 4,—177
14, 2,—165
— 3,—174
16, 1,—167
— 9,—167
— 13, 14,—169
— 19,—349
21, 8,—243
— 11,—175
44, 11,—261
45, 7,—244
46, 7,—179
48, 8,—165
49, 13,—172
51, 5,—163
61, 12,—176, 178
70, 2,—167
75, 10,—252, 253
— 19,—242
Seventh Mandala—
2, 3,—168
— 5,—339
7, 5,—249
8, 4,—349
15, 2,—178
18, 4, 5, 21-24,—321
19, 3,—331
20, 2,—331
22, 9,—243
25, 3,—331
26, 1, 2,—241
28, 2,—243
32, 10,—332
— 26,—329
33, 1-13,—318
— 3,—242
— 11,—244
35, 7,—242
42, 1,—249
53, 3,—332
60, 8,—332
64, 3,—332
69, 2,—176
70, 2,—173
— 3,—184
— 5,—213
72, 2,—329
83, 1-8,—323
Rig-veda continued—
Seventh Mandala—
87, 4,—325
88, 3-6,—325
91, 1,—172
97, 1,—176
— 3,—242
100, 4,—172
103, 1, 7, 8,—253
104, 13,—258
—— 12-16,—326
Eighth Mandala—
2, 21,—46
4, 20,—262
7, 20,—249
9, 10,—268
10, 2,—166
15, 5,—171
16, 7,—245
17, 2,—249
18, 22,—173
19, 21,—167
23, 13,—165
27, 7,—168
30, 3,—164
31, 1,—249
32, 16,—249
33, 19,—249
34, 8,—168
36, 7,—263
37, 7,—263
43, 13, 27,—168
45, 39,—249
50, 9,—264
52, 1,—163
— 7,—176, 178
53, 1,—261
— 7,—250
64, 6,—341
66, 5,—250
— 8,—253
81, 30,—250
85, 5,—250
— 6,—181
87, 5,—175
— 9,—250
91, 1,—172
92, 2,—348
Ninth Mandala—
65, 22, 23—177
66, 20,—178
86, 28,—181
92, 5,—175
96, 6,—250 — 11,—166
112, 1, 3,—250
113, 6,—251

Rig-veda continued—
Tenth Maṇḍala—
14, 1,—217
16, 6,—253
17, 1, 2,—217
21, 5,—169
26, 5,—167
28, 11,—251
33, 4,—262
45, 6,—178
46, 2, 9,—170
49, 7,—175
52, 2,—252
53, 4,—177
54, 3,—181
60, 4,—177
61, 7,—242
62, 5,—341
— 7,—193
63, 7,—166
68, 3, 4, 5,—72
— 8, 11,—217
69, 3,—166
71 and 72,—13
71, 1–11,—254
— 11,—245
72, 2,—46
— 4, 5,—72
— 5,—9 73, 7,—175
75, 5,—490
77, 1,—245
80, 6,—165
81 and 82,—13
81, 2, 3,—181
82, 3,—163, 181
85, 3, 16, 34,—245
— 29,—251
— 39, 40,—257
88, 19,—256
89, 16,—243
— 17,—346
90, 1,—32
— 1–16,—9
91, 9,—173
92, 10,—169
95, 7,—306
97, 1,—46
97, 17, 19, 22,—256
98, 1–12,—270
99, 7,—173
100, 5,—164
105, 8,—241, 242
107, 6,—245
109, 1–7,—256
— 4,—244
117, 7,—246
121,—13

Rig-veda continued—
Tenth Maṇḍala—
125, 5,—246
129,—13
— 4,—32
141, 3,—251
148, 5,—268
161, 4,—13
167, 4,—345
Rijrās'va, 266
Rikṣha, 235, 274, 360
Rikshavat, 456
Ripu, 298
Rishabha, 279, 357
Rishabhas, 500
Rishi, 243
Rishis, 36, 44, 88, etc.
Rishṭishena, 269
Ritabādha, 279
Ritayu, 234
Ritavratas, 501
Rituparṇa, 322
Roer, Dr. E., his translations of the Upanishads referred to, 25
Rohidas'va, 268
Rohiṇī, 389
Rohita, 355
Rohitās'va, 382
Roth, Dr. R., his Literature and History of the Veda referred to, 289, 318, 324, 331, 339, 342, 360, 364, 372 —— articles in Journ. of Germ. Or. Society, 8, 192, 194, 217, 248, 289 —— article in Indische Studien, 48, 355, 376
—— Dissertation on the Atharva-veda, 395
—— Illustrations of Nirukta, 177, 253, 256, 321, 339
Rosen, Dr. F., remarks on the story of S'unass'epa, 359
Ruchi (masc.), 65
Ruchi (fem.), 466
Rudra, 3, 20, 65, 163, 194, 225
Rudras, 19 f., 52, 117
Rūpin, 360

S

S'abaras, or S'avaras, 391, 393, 483 f.

Sacrifices of no avail to the depraved, 98
Sadasyas, 459
Sādhyas, 10 f., 26 f., 38, 41
Sagara, 337, 486
Sahadeva, 266
Sahajanyā, 336
Saindhavas, 495
Saindhavāyanas, 353
S'aineyā, 483
S'ainyas, 236
S'aivyā, wife of Hariśchandra, 380 f.
S'ākadvīpa, 491, 500
S'ākalas, 495
S'ākhā, 401
S'akas, 391, 398, 482, 484, 486
S'akti, or S'aktri, 315, 322, 328, 342
S'akuntalā, 410
S'akvarīs, 255, 320
S'ākya (Buddha) 509
Sālankāyana, 279
Sālankāyanas, 353
S'ālāvatī, 352
S'ālāvatyas, 353
S'ālmali-dvīpa, 490, 498
Salvas, 438
S'ālvas, 495
S'ama, 124
Samantapanchaka, 451
Sāma-veda, 2
—— quoted—
i. 262,—180
— 355,—163
Samprakshālana-kāla, 217
Saṁśraya, 116
Saṁvaraṇa, 360
Saṁvartta, 207
Sanaka, 51
Sanandana, 51, 65
Sanatkumāra, 114, 307
S'āṇḍilya, 513
Sanhitā, 2, 4
Sanjaya, 148
S'ankara on the Brahma-Sūtras, 147
—— Chhāndogya Upanishad, 195
Sankarshaṇa, 207, 507
S'ānkhāyana Brāhmaṇ 91,
Sānkhya, 126, 210, 3[illegible], 430
—— Kārikā, 158
—— Pravachana, 158
Sankīrtti, a Vais'ya author of Vedic hymns, 279

Sankṛiti, 237
Sānkṛiti, 352
Sānkṛityas, 353
S'antanu, 269
S'apharī (fish), 205, 209
Saptadas'a, 16
Sapta sindhavaḥ, 489 ff.
S'arabhas, 391
S'aradvat, 279
S'āradvata, 279
S'ārangī, 336
Sarasvatī, 71, 110, 141, 178, 315, 344, 421, 490
Sārasvatyas, 305
Sarga, 49
Sarvakāma, 322
Sarvakarman, 422, 456
Sarvasāra Upanishad, 361
S'aryāta, 221
S'aryāti, 126, 221
Sasarparī, 343
Sāt, 46
S'atadru, 417
Satānanda, 235
S'atapatha Brāhmaṇa, 5
—— Kāṇva S'ākhā, i. 6, —167, 382
—— Mādhyandina S ākhā, Texts from, translated or referred to—
i. 1, 4, 12,—366
— 1, 4, 14,—188
— 3, 2, 21,—136
— 4, 2, 2,—348
— 4, 2, 5,—166
— 5, 1, 7,—168
— 5, 2, 16,—137
— 5, 3, 2,—163
— 7, 4, 1,—35, 107
— 8, 1, 1,—181
ii. 1, 4, 11,—17
— 2, 2, 6,—262
— 3, 4, 4,—147
— 4, 2, 1,—96
— 4, 4, 1,—125
— 5, 1, 1,—69
— 5, 2, 20,—136
iii. 2, 1, 39,—369
— 2, 1, 40,—136
— 3, 6,—513
— 6, 2, 26,—147
— 9, 1, 1,—68
iv. 1, 5, 1,—221
— 3, 4, 4,—262
— 5, 4, 1,—9
v. 3, 5, 4,—268
— 5, 4, 9,—367
vi. 1, 2, 11,—30
S'atapatha Brāhmaṇa continued— Mādhyandina S'ākhā—
vi. 6, 1, 19,—188
— 8, 1, 14,—349
vii. 4, 1, 19,—125
— 5, 1, 5,—54
— 5, 2, 6,—24
viii. 1, 4, 10,—515
— 4, 2, 11,—19
— 4, 3, 1,—19
x. 4, 1, 10,—438
— 4, 2, 2,—69
— 4, 4, 1,—69
xi. 1, 3, 1,—31
— 1, 6, 1,—35
— 1, 6, 7,—30
— 1, 6, 8,—29
— 5, 1, 1,—226
— 6, 1, 1,—443
— 6, 2, 1,—426
xii. 1, 6, 38,—333
xiii. 4, 1, 3,—369
— 4, 3, 3,—217
— 5, 4, 14,—168
— 6, 1, 1,—9
— 7, 1, 15,—456
xiv. 1, 2, 11,—53
— 4, 2, 1,—24, 36
— 4, 2, 23,—19
— 5, 1, 1,—432
— 7, 1, 33,—46
— 9, 1, 1,—433
S'atarūpā, 25, 65, 72, 103, 110, 114
S'atayātu, 322
S'atendriyā, 114
Sattva, 41, 62, 66, 75 f., 79, 89, 92
Sāttvika, 42
Sāttyahavya, 493
Satyaketu, 231
Satyāngas, 498
Satyavatī, 349, 405, 450, 453
Satyavrata, 207, 375
Satyavratas, 501
S'ātyāyana Brāhmaṇa quoted, 320, 328
Saudāsa, 343, 414
Saudāsas, 328, 337
Saumya, 494
S'aunaka, 226, 279
S'aunḍīkas, 482
Saurāshṭras, 495
Sauvīras, 495
Sausrutas, 353
Savana, 335, 445
Sāvarṇya and Sāvarṇi, 217
Savitṛi, 71, 181
Sāvitrī, 110
Sāyakāyana, 438
Sāyaṇa quoted, 2, 164 and passim
S'ayu, 171
Schlegel, A. W. von, his edition of the Rāmāyaṇa referred to, 397, 399, etc.
Semitic source, was the Indian legend of the deluge derived from a, 216
S'esha, 44, 116
Seven rishis, 200, 400, 404
Seven seas surrounding the continents of the earth, 491
Sexes, their primitive relations, 418
Shadgurus'ishya quoted, 343
Shadviṁs'a Brāhmaṇa quoted or referred to, 334, 513
Siṁhikā, 123
Sindhudvīpa, 268, 272, 353
Sindhukshit, 268
Sinhalas, 391
S'ini, 326
S'iva, 389
S'ivis, 459, 493
S'ishṭi, 298
Smṛiti, 5, 139
Snehas, 500
Solar race, 220
Soma, 10, 19 f., 30, 71 f., 124, 153, 166, 175, 181, 221, 225, 467, 469
Soma Maitrāyaṇa, 230
Somas'ushma Sātyayajni, 428
Someśvara quoted, 511
Sons, may be begotten by third parties, 418
S'oṇāmbu, 207
S'rāddhādeva, 207
S'rāddhādeva, 207, 335
S'rauta-sūtras, 5
S'ravaṇasya, 279
S'rī, 67
S'rīdhara, Commentator or Bhāgavata Purāṇa, quoted, 210 f., 317
S'ringin, 491
S'rinjayas, 283, 512

S'rotriya, 442
S'rutadharas, 499
S'rutarshis, 279, 400
Sthāṇu, 116, 122
Sthāṇutīrtha, 420
Sthapati, 514
Stoma, 241
Streiter, Dr., his Dissertatio de Sunaḥsepho, 48, 355
Subhagā, 116
S'uchi, 445
Sudās, 242, 268, 297, 319, 321 ff., 338, 366, 371 ff.
Sudāsa, Sudeshṇā, 233,
S'ūdras, 7 and passim
—— etymology of the word, 97
Sudyumna, 221
Suhma, 232
Suhotra, 227, 267, 349, 353, 360
Suhotṛi, 227
Sukanyā, 283
S'ukī, 117
S'ukra, 305, 335, 445
Sūkta, 241
Sukumāra, 231
Sulabhā, 430
Sumantu, 349
Sumati, 234
Sumeru, 96
Sumitra, 167
Sumukha, 297
Sunahotra, or S'unahotra, 226, 228
S'unas'śepa, 350, 353 355 ff., 376, 405, 413
Sunīthā, 299, 303
S'unahpuchha, 352
Suṛādhas, 266
S'ūras, 495
S'ūrṛīraka, 455
Sūrya, 245, 251
Sūryavarchas, 336
S'ushmins, 500
S'ushmiṇa, 493
Sūta, 207
Sutapas, 232, 235
Sūtras, 5
S'utudrī, 338, 490
Sushadman, 438
Suvarchas, 279
Suvitta, 279
Suyavasa, 355
Svāhā, 389
Svarbhānu, 249, 469
Svarjit Nāgnajita, 515
Svayambhū, 33
Svayambhū, 96, 111, 122
S'veta, 491
S'vetaketu Aruṇeya, 428, 434
S'yāparnas, 438
S'yāvās'va, 283
S'yena, 513
S'yūmaras'mi, 171

T

Taittirīya-āraṇyaka quoted, 31 Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa, 5
—— quoted—
i. 1, 2, 6,—68
— 1, 3, 5,—53
— 1, 4, 4,—186
— 1, 9, 10,—26
— 1, 10, 1,—68
— 2, 6, 1,—68
— 2, 6, 7,—21
— 6, 2, 1,—70
— 6, 4, 1,—71
— 8, 8, 1,—26
— 8, 2, 5,—445
ii. 2, 1, 1,—72
— 2, 4, 4,—515
— 2, 9, 1,—27
— 3, 6, 1,—68
— 3, 8, 1,—23
— 7, 9, 1,—71
iii. 2, 3, 9,—21
— 2, 5, 9,—189
— 3, 3, 1,—25
— 3, 3, 5,—25
— 3, 10, 4,—26
— 4, 1, 16,—49
— 8, 18, 1,—24
— 9, 22, 1,—43, 46,
— 10, 9, 1,—71 [163
— 12, 9, 2, 6-41
Taittirīya Sanhitā, 2
—— quoted—
i. 5, 4, 1,--29
— 7, 1, 8,—187
— 7, 3, 1,—262
— 8, 16, 1,—20 — 16, 11, 1,—137
ii. 2, 10, 2,—188, 510
— 3, 5, 1,—124,
— 4, 13, 1,—21
— 5, 9, 1,—187
— 6, 7, 1,—186
iii. 1, 7, 2,—512
Taittirīya Sanhitā continued—
iii. 1, 9, 4,—193
— 5, 2, 2,—332
iv. 3, 10, 1,—16
v. 1, 5, 6,—184
— 6, 8, 3,—136
vi. 2, 5, 2,—187
— 3, 10, 4,—32
— 5, 6, 1,—26
— 6, 6, 1,—191
— 6, 8, 2,—26
— 6, 10, 3,—26
vii. 1, 1, 4,—15
— 1, 5, 1,—52
— 5, 15, 3,—187
— p. 47 of MS., 328
—— Commentator on, quoted, 3
Taittirīya Upanishad quoted, 443
Taittirīya Yajurveda, 12
Takshapa, 279
Tālajanghas, 467, 486
Tamas, 41, 57, 58, 62, 66, 75, 80, 89, 92, 141
Tāmasa, 42
Tāmrā, 116
Tāmraliptakas, 459
Tāmravarṇa, 494
Tāṇḍya Brāhmaṇa, 5, 329
Tansu, 234
Tapas, 119, 141
—— its great power, 394, 410
Tapoloka, 88
Tārā, 225
Tārakāyaṇas, 353
Tiryak-srotas, 57
Tishmas, 500
Tishya (=Kali) age, 148
Tortoise incarnation, 51, 54
Trasadasyu, 263, 266, 331
Trayyaruṇa, 237, 267
Tretā, 39, 43 ff., 92 ff., 119, 145, 149 f., 158, 447, 495 f.
Triad of deities, see Deities Trigarttas, 459
Tris'anku, 362, 375, 412, 413
Tṛishṭha, 190
Tṛishṭubh, 16
Tris'iras, 268
Trivṛishṇa, 267
Trivṛit, 16
Tṛitsus, 320, 324

Troyer, Captain, his edition of the Rājatarangiṇī, 424
Tukhāras, 303
Tumburas, 303
Turvaśas, 179
Turvasu, 232, 482
Tushāras, 484
Tvāshṭra, 438
Tvashṭṛi, 181

U

Uddālaka Āruṇi, 195
—— Śvetaketu, 419
Udgātṛi, 41, 155, 251, 294
Unnetṛi, 155
Upadrashṭṛi, 4, 459
Upanishads, 2, 5
Upaśruti (a goddess), 311
Upastuta, 170
Uru, 298
Ūrddhvabāhu, 335
Ūrddhvasrotas, 57
Ūrjja, 335
Ūrjjā, 335
Urukshaya, 237
Urunjirā, 417
Ūrva, 351, 476
Urvaśī, 226, 244, 306, 316, 320, 337
Uśanas, 226
Ushas, 108
Uśīnara, 268
Uśīnaras, 431, 482
Utathya, 279, 467
Uttānapad, 72
Uttānapāda, 65, 72, 106, 114, 298
Uttara Kurus, 491 ff.
Uttara Madras, 492

V

Vāch, 241, 246, 325
Vachas, 241
Vāhlīka, 273
Vaibhojas, 482
Vaidya, 481
Vaikhānasas, 32
Vaikṛita-sarga, 58
Vaina, Vainya, 268, 279
Vairāja, 16, 111
Vairūpa, 16
Vaiśampāyana, 122, 153 f.
Vaiśanta, 319
Vaiśasa, 97
Vaiśyas, 7, and passim
—— etymology of the word, 97
Vaivasvata Manvantara, 112, 214
Vājas, 165
Vājasaneyi Sanhitā quoted or referred to—
xi. 32,—169
xii. 34,—349
xiv. 28,—16
xxx. 18,—49
xxxi. 1,—9 — 1–16,—8
— 13,—10
xxxviii. 26,—490
Vājaśravas,
Vajrasīrsha, 445
Valākāśva, 349
Vālakhilya, iii. 1,—217
———— iv. 1,—217
Valmīki, 5
Vāmadeva, 114, 279, 330
Vāmana-avatāra, see Dwarf incarnation
Vandya, a Vaiśya composer of Vedic hymns, 279
Vanga, 233, see Banga
Vangas, 459
Vansā, 116
Vapushmat, 222
Varāha-avatāra, 53, see Boar incarnation
Vārāha-kalpa, 44, 50, 67
Varenya, 445
Varṇa (colour or caste), 140, 153, 176
Vārshagiras, 266
Varuṇa, 18, 20, 27, 71, 136, 168, etc.
—— his adultery, 467
Vāruṇa, 494
Varuṇa-praghāsa, 136
Varūtrī, 190
Varvaras, 484
Vaśas, 391
Vashaṭkāra, 487
Vāshkalas, 353
Vasishtha, or Vaśishṭha, 36, 65, 110, 115, 122, 211, 244, 316 ff., 468, 486
—— begets a son to king Kalmashapāda, 418
Vasishṭhas, 242, 319 ff., 402
Vaśtrya fshuyans 293
Vāsudeva, 206
Vasumanas, 268
Vasundharas, 499
Vasus, 19 f., 52, 117, 124, 184, 186, 221, 444
Vātaraśanas, 32
Vatsa, 231
Vatsabhūmi, 231
Vayata, 319
Vāyu, 10, 19, 33, 76, 128, 172, 464
Vāyu Purāṇa quoted, 225, 227, 232
i. 5, 11 ff.,—74
— 6, 1 ff.,—75
— 7, 22 ff.,—81
— 9, 1 ff.,—77
— 9, 100,—446
Vedāngas, 5, 126
Vedānta. 223
Vedas, 63
—— antiquity of, 2
—— undivided in the Kṛita age, 144
Vedaśravas, 279
Vedhas, 65
Vedhas, a sage, 243
Vedhasa, 279
Vena, 126
Vena, 297 ff., 481
Venuhotra, 231
Venya, 268
Vibhu, 445
Videha, 426
Videhas, 431, 459
Vidhātṛi, 124
Vidūratha, 455
Vidyutpatāka, 207
Vijnāna Bhikshu, 158
Vikṛita, 123
Vinatā, 123
Vipāś, or Vipāśā, 338, 417
Vipra, 243
Vipula, 466
Virāj (masc.), 9, 36 f., 106, 111, 195
—— (fem.), 217, 333, 511
Viranchi, 112
Viriṇī, 125
Virochana, 233
Virūpa, 224
Virūpas, 341
Vīryadharas, 499
Vis, 157
Vishṇu, 3, 10, 51, 54, 62, 67, 75, 153, 172, 211, 495, etc.
—— assumes different colours in different yugas, 145

Vishṇu Purāṇa quoted—
Book i.—
3, 10 ff., and 14 f.,—43
3, 16 ff.,—44
5, 1 ff.,—55
6, 1 ff.,—60
7, 1 ff.,—64
8, 12,—66
9, 15,—389
10, 19,—335
13, 7,—298
13, 54,—511
15, 52,—72
Book ii.—
4, 1, and 5 ff.,—497
4, 9,—498
4, 12 ff.,—499
4, 19 ff.,—500
4, 23 ff.,—500
4, 28 ff.,—501
4, 37 f.,—503
7, 19, 24,—504
10, 8,—336
Book iii.—
1, 3,—44
1, 6, and 9,—335
1, 14,—335
3, 9,—336
6, 21,—400
Book iv.—
1, 4,—220
1, 5,—72
1, 12,—221
1, 13, 14,—222
2, 2,—223
3, 5,—224
3, 13,—375
3, 18,—337
4, 25,—337
6, 2,—225
6, 19,—226
7, 1,—226
7, 4, and 14 ff.,—349
8, 6,—232
10, 12,—232
18, 1,—232
19, 9,—236
19, 10,—234
19, 16,—235
21, 4,—236
24, 44,—277
Book vi.—
1, 4,—43
Viśiśipra, 166
Viśvajit, 352
Viśvakarman, 52, 76, 173, 181
—— Bhauvana, 456
Viśvakṛit, 352
Viśvāmitra, 128, 232, 242, 247, 265, 272, 279, 329 ff., 337 ff., 474, 483
Viśvāmitras, 342, 345 f.
Viśvantara, 433
Viśvaratha, 352
Viśvasṛijaḥ, 37
Viśvedevas, 16, 20, 71, 380
Vitahavya, 228, 268, 279, 286, 297
Vitatha, 227
Vītihotras, 459
Vivāsas, 498
Vivasvat, 26 f., 37, 115 f., 122, 126, 169, 195, 199, 201
Vrajana, 360
Vrātya, 22, 481
Vrātya-stomas, 513
Vṛihaspati, 310, see Bṛihaspati
Vṛishāgir, 266
Vṛishala, 482
Vṛishan, 170
Vṛittra, 174, 310
Vyāsa, 6
Vyaśva, 268

W

Weber's Indische Literaturgeschichte referred to, 2, 5
—— Indische Studien quoted or referred to, 8, 9, 14, 32, 39, 48, 49, 108, 136, 141, 147, 155, 181, 186, 189, 216, 252, 272 f., 332 ff., 357, 367, 369, 373, 395, 438 f., 443, 446, 492 f., 511 f.
—— articles in Journal Germ. Or. Soc., 189, 366, 385, 443 —— his opinion on the origin of the Indian tradition of the Deluge, 216
—— Vajra-sūchī, 140
Williams's, Prof. Monier, Indian Epic poetry referred to, 6, 34
Wilson's, Prof. H. H., Analyses of the Vishnu, Vāyu, and other Purāṇas, 6, 505 —— translation of the Rig-veda referred to, 360, 372, 490
Wilson's Sānkhya-Kārikā referred to, 430
—— Vishṇu Purāṇa referred to, 6, 49, 353, 446, and passim
—— article on Human Sacrifices in India in Journ. R. As. Soc., 355 Women, estimation in which the ancient Indians held them, 26, 136

Y

Yādavas, 112
Yadu, 232, 477
Yadus, 179
Yajna-paribhāshā-sūtras, 2, 365, 367
Yajnāpeta, 336
Yājnavalkya, 25, 136, 428
Yājnavalkyas, 353
Yajur-veda, 2
Yakshas, 37, 139, 144, 499
Yama, 20, 122, 126, 129, 171, 217, 320
Yāmadūtas, 353
Yamunā, 467
Yāska, 3, 5, see Nirukta
Yātudhānas, 326 f.
Yaudhāḥ (warriors), 511, 514
Yavanas, 391, 398, 482, 485 ff.
Yayāti, 232, 455
Year of Brahmā, 44
Year of gods, 43
Yoga 210, 334, 466, 478
—— philosophy, 430, 508
Yogin, 153
Yudhājit, 279
Yudhishṭhira, 127, 133, 309
Yudhyāmadhi, 322
Yugas, 39, 43 ff.
—— system of, not mentioned in the hymns of the Rig-veda, 45
—— their several characteristics, 39, 90 ff., 144
Yuga of the Kshattriyas, 152
Yuvanāśva, 225, 268, 279

Z

Zendavesta, 293
Zota, 294

STEPHEN AUSTIN, PRINTER, HERTFORD.

NOTICE: Return or renew all Library Materials! The Minimum Fee for each Lost Book is $50.00.

The person charging this material is responsible for its return to the library from which it was withdrawn on or before the Latest Date stamped below.

Theft, mutilation, and underlining of books are reasons for disciplinary action and may result in dismissal from the University.
To renew call Telephone Center, 333-8400

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS LIBRARY AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN

UNDERGRADUATE LIBRARY

L161—O-1096

BOUND BY

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS-URBANA
294.1M8901868 C001 V001
ORIGINAL SANSKRIT TEXTS ON THE ORIGIN AN 3 0112 014311655

LIBRARY OF THE UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS
294.1
M89o
1868
v.2

The person charging this material is responsible for its return to the library from which it was withdrawn on or before the Latest Date stamped below.

Theft, mutilation, and underlining of books are reasons for disciplinary action and may result in dismissal from the University.

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS LIBRARY AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN

AUG 9 1975

JUL 24 1975

APR 26 1976

APR 26 1976

MAR 14 1977

APR 7 1977

JUL 16 1990

L161—O-1096

ORIGINAL SANSKRIT TEXTS.

ORIGINAL SANSKRIT TEXTS

ON THE

ORIGIN AND HISTORY

OF

THE PEOPLE OF INDIA,

THEIR RELIGION AND INSTITUTIONS.

COLLECTED, TRANSLATED, AND ILLUSTRATED,

BY

J. MUIR, D.C.L., LL.D., PH.D.,

CORRESPONDING MEMBER OF THE ROYAL PRUSSIAN ACADEMY OF SCIENCES, AND OF THE AMERICAN ORIENTAL SOCIETY, HONORARY MEMBER OF THE GERMAN ORIENTAL SOCIETY, AND FOREIGN MEMBER OF THE LEYDEN LITERARY SOCIETY.

VOLUME SECOND.

INQUIRY WHETHER THE HINDUS ARE OF TRANS-HIMALAYAN ORIGIN, AND AKIN TO THE WESTERN BRANCHES OF THE INDO-EUROPEAN RACE.

SECOND EDITION, REVISED

LONDON:
TRÜBNER & CO., 8 AND 60, PATERNOSTER

1871.

(All rights reserved.)

HERTFORD:
PRINTED BY STEPHEN AUSTIN AND SONS.

294.1
M89s
1868
v.2

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION.[1]

My primary object in this volume, as in its predecessor, has been to produce a work which may assist the researches of those Hindus who desire to investigate critically the origin and history of their nation, and of their national literature, religion, and institutions; and may facilitate the operations of those European teachers whose business it is to communicate to the Hindus the results of modern inquiry on the various subjects here examined.[2] The book (as will at once be apparent to the Oriental scholar) is, for the most part, either a compilation, or, at the least, founded on the labours of others; but while my principal aim has been to furnish the reader with a summary of the results of preceding inquiries, my plan has, at the same time, rendered it necessary for me occasionally to institute fresh researches in different directions for the further elucidation of particular points which were touched upon in the course of my argument. In this way I may have succeeded in contributing a small proportion of original matter to the discussion of some of the interesting topics which have come under review.

[1] [This Preface is now reprinted with hardly any alteration, excepting such as has been rendered necessary by the difference in the numbers of the pages in which the several topics are treated, and by some additions and omissions.]

[2] This peculiarity in the object of the treatise will account to the European scholar for the introduction of many details which would otherwise have been quite superfluous.

The obligations under which I lie to the different authors, whose labours have furnished the chief materials of the volume, have been, in most instances, so fully acknowledged in detail in the following pages, that it is not necessary for me to allude to them here more particularly. I must, however, refer to the assistance which I have derived from the French version of the Rigveda by M. Langlois, which, with his index, has directed my attention to various important passages in the later books, which I was then enabled to study in the original.

Though a small portion only of the present volume consists of "Sanskrit texts," which in some parts are altogether wanting, and in others but thinly scattered, (apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto) I have not considered it necessary to abandon the old title, but it has been slightly modified.

Although some idea of the object and contents of the volume may be gained from a perusal of the introductory statement of its plan (in pp. 1—3), and from the table at the close of this Preface, it may conduce to the convenience of those readers who, before entering on a perusal of the work, desire to obtain a more precise conception of the course of the discussion, and of the process by which I have sought to establish my conclusions, if I subjoin here a brief concatenated summary of the principal topics in order.

The general object of the present Part is to prove that the Hindus were not indigenous in India, but have immigrated into that country from Central Asia, where their ancestors at one time formed one community with the progenitors of the Persians, Greeks, Romans, Germans, etc.[3] In order to establish this result, I have sought to show that Sanskrit, the original language of the Hindus, exhibits undeniable marks of close affinity to the ancient languages of the other races just mentioned; and that the earliest religion, and mythology also, of India are connected with those of Persia by various points of contact and resemblance. Having adduced evidence on both these heads, and argued that these facts imply a common origin of the nations in question, and their subsequent dispersion from one common centre towards the different regions in which they ultimately settled; I endeavour to fortify the conclusions to which we are thus conducted by demonstrating that, in the earliest ages of their history, the ancestors of the Hindus appear to have occupied only the north-western corner of Hindustan; and that, while they were connected on the one hand by affinities of language and religion with the nations of the west, they were on the other hand distinguished, both by language and by institutions, from certain other tribes with whom they came into collision as they advanced across the north of India, and afterwards diffused themselves to the south of the peninsula: for if we find that the Hindus originally possessed only the Panjāb, the presumption (derived from other considerations) that they immigrated from the north-west, becomes strengthened; and if, again, on their advance to the south-east, they encountered tribes with a different language and religion, already in occupation of those tracts, the probability that they did not grow up in India, alongside of these alien tribes, acquires additional force.

[3] [This proposition has been so far modified in the second edition that I now only insist on at least one of the elements in the ancestry of the Hindus having belonged to the Indo-European stock.]

In order to obtain a basis for carrying out the philological portion of this argument, viz., for comparing the original language of the Hindus with those of the Persians, Greeks, and Latins, it became necessary for me to prove that the Sanskrit, which is now a learned language only, was at one time spoken by the ancestors of the Hindus. This I have attempted to do in the First Chapter (pp. 4—214), by showing in detail that the original Sanskrit idiom has undergone a long series of gradual mutations, of which we now see the ultimate result in the modern vernacular dialects of the north of India. The method which I have adopted to exhibit this has been to begin (Section i., pp. 4—11) with the existing spoken dialects, Urdu, Hindī, Mahrattī, etc., and to show what the elements are of which they are composed, viz., (1) pure Sanskrit, (2) modified Sanskrit, (3) Deśya or aboriginal non-Sanskrit words, and (4) words derived from Arabic and Persian. The fourth element is the latest which they have acquired, and dates only from the Mahomedan invasion; while the second and third (in a more or less different form) are common to them with the Prākrits, or older vernacular dialects, out of which they grew.

In the succeeding sections (ii.—vii., pp. 11—128) an account is given of these earlier vernaculars, viz. (1) the Prākṛits, of which specimens are to be found in the different Hindu dramas, and which seem to have existed as spoken dialects, at least from the commencement of the Christian era, until they became merged in the modern vernaculars; (2) the Pāli, or sacred language of the Buddhist books of Ceylon and Burmah, which appears to represent one of the provincial dialects of northern India existing at the time when Buddhism began to be propagated in the sixth century B.C., and exhibits to us the popular speech of that region at a somewhat earlier stage than the dramatic Prākṛits; (3) the dialects (nearly contemporaneous with the Pāli) which are employed in the rock and pillar inscriptions of Aśoka; and (4) the singular dialect or jargon employed in the Gāthās or metrical portions of the Buddhist chronicles of northern India. In this portion of the work some comparative tables are introduced, which exhibit (a) the relations (i.e. the points of resemblance and of difference) between the modern vernaculars, Hindī, and Mahrattī, and the dramatic Prākṛits, and show how the two former have been formed by a modification of all the various elements of the latter, just as they (the older Prākṛits) in their turn have sprung up (if we except a small non-Sanskritic residuum) from the gradual decomposition of the Sanskrit; (b) the forms which are common to the dramatic Prākṛits, and the Pāli, as well as those points in which they vary, and which demonstrate that the Pāli diverges considerably less from the Sanskrit than the Prākṛits do, and must consequently be more ancient than they; and (c) the were composed can have been no other than the vernacular speech which was employed by the rishis and their contemporaries, as it is quite inconceivable that in that early age, when the refinements of grammar were unknown, there could have existed any learned language distinct from the ordinary dialect of the people.

Having thus shown cause for believing that Sanskrit, the original speech of the early Hindus (or Indo-Arians), was at one time a spoken language, and consequently liable, like all other spoken languages, to continual mutations in its earliest ages, and having by this means paved the way for proving that it is descended from one common mother with the ancient languages of the other Indo-European races, to which it exhibits the most striking family resemblance;—I proceed, in the Second Chapter (pp. 215—357), to produce the evidence which comparative philology furnishes of this resemblance, and to argue from the affinity of languages a community of origin between the different nations by which they were spoken. I then go on to bring forward the further grounds, supplied by comparative mythology and by other considerations, for supposing that the ancestors of the Hindus[4] belonged to the same great family as the Persians, Greeks, Romans, etc., which had its original seats in Central Asia, and that, on the dispersion, in various directions, of the different branches of that ancient family, the Indo-Arians immigrated into Hindustan from the north-west. The following are some of the details of this process of proof: In Section i. (pp. 217—228), a few simple remarks on comparative philology are premised, in which it is shown how, by a comparison of their roots and structure, languages can be distributed into different families, of which the several members have a more or less close affinity to each other, while they have little or no resemblance to the members of any other family. This is illustrated by a comparative table, in which it is shown that while Sanskrit has in many of its words a strong similarity to Persian, it has scarcely any to Arabic; and by some other particulars. Section ii. (pp. 228—267) supplies detailed evidence of the affinities of Sanskrit with the Zend, Greek, and Latin, consisting, first, of comparative lists of words belonging to those languages which correspond with each other both in sound and sense; and secondly, of illustrations of the resemblances between those languages in their modes of inflection, as well as in the formation of words. As, however, the mutual differences which these languages also exhibit, might be urged as disproving the inference of their derivation from a common source, it is shown how, in the course of time, different branches of the same original tongue have an inevitable tendency to diverge more and more from the primitive type, both by modifying their old elements, and by assimilating new: and it is further pointed out that it is precisely those parts of a language which are the most primitive and essential in which the different Indo-European tongues coincide, while those in which they differ are such as would grow up after the nations which spoke them had been separated, and had become exposed to the action of diverse influences, physical, intellectual, and moral. But as, admitting the resemblances between these languages, a Hindu might feel disposed to draw the conclusion that Sanskrit is the source of all the other kindred tongues, instead of being derived together with them from an older language, the common parent of them all,—to obviate this erroneous inference, it is next shown that the whole grammatical character of Greek and Latin is that of independent languages; that in this respect they differ entirely from the Indian Prākrits (which have evidently resulted from the decomposition of Sanskrit), and that they even contain various forms which are older than those of the Sanskrit; while the greater part of their vocabulary is different. The same considerations apply, though not so strongly, to Zend. In Section iii. (pp. 267—278) the inference is drawn that affinity in language implies affinity in race;[5] and that, therefore, the ancestors of the Hindus must at one time have lived in the same country, as a part of one and the same community, with the forefathers of the Persians, Greeks, and Romans. In such a case as is here supposed, those branches of the original nation which separated earliest from the others, would in after-times exhibit the fewest points of resemblance in language and institutions to the rest, while those which remained longest together would show in all respects the closest mutual affinities. In Section iv. (pp. 279—286) it is argued that there is no objection[6] arising from physiological considerations, i.e. from colour or bodily structure, to classing the Hindus among the Indo-European races. Section v. (pp. 287—300) exhibits the grounds which exist for supposing that the ancestors of the Indians and Iranians (or Persians) continued to form one community after the other kindred tribes had separated from them, and departed to distant regions. These grounds are, first, the closer affinity which subsists between Zend, the language of the ancient Persians, and Sanskrit (of which some illustrations are furnished); secondly, the fact that both nations in former times applied to themselves the appellation of Ārya; and, thirdly, the nearer and more numerous coincidences which are discoverable between the early mythologies of the two peoples, of which some details are adduced. From this more intimate affinity between the Indians and Persians, independent as both are of each other in their origin and development (see also pp. 312—317), a strong confirmation is derived to the general conclusion (deduced mainly from language) of the common origin of all the nations called Indo-European. In Section vi. (pp. 301—306) the theory of Mr. Curzon, that India was the original country of the Indo-European races, from which they issued to conquer, occupy, and civilize the countries lying to the north-west, is stated, together with some of the arguments by which he supports it. The remarks of Mr. Elphinstone, who leaves it undecided whether the Hindus were autochthonous or immigrant, are also quoted. In Section vii. (pp. 306—322) I cite the opinions of Schlegel, Lassen, Benfey, Müller, Weber, Spiegel, Renan, and Pictet, who concur in the conclusion that the cradle of the Indo-European race must be sought, not in India, but, as Schlegel, Lassen, and Pictet argue, in some central tract, from which the different branches of this great family could most easily have diffused themselves towards the widely-separated countries which they eventually occupied; a condition which would not be fulfilled by supposing a remote and southerly region, such as Hindustan, to be the point of departure. Some of these writers draw the same inference from the relation in which the Indo-Arians stood to the aboriginal tribes whom they encountered in India. In opposition to Mr. Curzon, who represents the language and religion of India as the sources from which those of all the other kindred races issued, Professor Spiegel maintains that the Iranian language and mythology, though owning a common origin with, are in their development perfectly independent of those of the Indians. In the same section it is further urged that as neither the languages nor the mythology of the Greeks and Romans are derived from those of the Indo-Arians, there is no ground for supposing that the former nations emigrated from India at any period whatever. Section viii. (pp. 322—329) contains the few passages I have been able to discover in the Indian authors which may be supposed to embody any reference (in no case, it must be confessed, other than a very obscure one) to the trans-Himalayan origin of their ancestors. The chief of these are the interesting paragraph of the Śatapatha-brāhmaṇa, which contains the legend of the Deluge in the oldest form in which it occurs in any Sanskrit work,[7] and some texts relating to the northerly region of Uttara Kuru, the Ottorocorras of Ptolemy. In Section ix. (pp. 329—334) I have quoted, according to the versions of Spiegel and Haug, the first chapter of the Vendidad, which contains the oldest tradition of the Persians relative to Airyana-vaejo, the supposed primeval abode of their forefathers. Section x. (pp. 335-341) discusses the route by which the Āryas immigrated into India.[8] Schlegel and Lassen are of opinion that they must have penetrated into India from the west by the route of Kabul and across the Indus. Roth and Weber also regard the Panjāb as the earliest seat of the Indo-Arians in Hindustan. In Section xi. (pp. 341—357) I have endeavoured to show by quotations from the Vedas, that at the period when the hymns were composed, the Indians, though not unacquainted with the central provinces of northern India, were most familiar with the countries bordering on, or beyond, the Indus, and the north-western parts of Hindustan generally. From this fact, and from the testimony of later writers to their intercourse with tribes, apparently Arian in descent and language, residing in the Panjāb and on the other side of the Indus, I derive a confirmation of the view that the Hindus entered India from the north-west.

[4] [See note 3, p. ix.]

[5] [In this second edition, this proposition is modified. I only affirm now that affinity in language affords some presumption of affinity in race.]

[6] [This assertion is in the 2nd edition changed into an inquiry whether there is any objection.]

In the Third Chapter, (pp. 358—444) I have sought

[7] [This passage has been omitted in the present edition for the reasons stated in note 96, p. 323.]

[8] [A sentence referring to an opinion of Professor Benfey subsequently altered, is here omitted.]

to adduce further arguments in support of the same conclusion, (1) from the distinction drawn by the authors of the Vedic hymns between their own kinsmen, the Āryas, and the tribes differing from them in complexion, customs, and religion, whom they designate as Dasyus; (2) from the accounts occurring in the Brāhmaṇas and post-Vedic writings, of the gradual advance of the Āryas from the north-west of India to the east and south; and (3) from the well-established fact that the south-Indian languages are fundamentally different from the Sanskrit, and imply a non-Arian origin in the people by whom they were originally spoken. Section i. (pp. 359—369) contains a selection of passages from the Rigveda, in which the Āryas and the Dasyus are distinguished from one another, and reference is made to the enmity existing between the two. In most (or at least some) of these passages, it appears, human enemies and not demons must be intended under the appellation of Dasyus, as I infer both from the tenor of the texts themselves, and because in later writings, the Aitareya-brāhmaṇa, the Institutes of Manu, etc., this word is always applied to barbarous tribes. Section ii. (pp. 369—396) supplies a further collection of Vedic texts bearing upon the relations of the Āryas and Dasyus, and the characteristics of the latter as degraded, dark-complexioned, irreligious, neglecters of sacrifice, etc. There are, indeed, other texts, in which these Dasyus are regarded as demons, and this creates a difficulty. An attempt is made at the close of the section to explain, (1) from the original position of the Āryas, as an invading tribe in a country covered by forests, and from the savage character of the aborigines, as well as (2) from the lengthened period during which the hymns continued to be composed,—how the same appellations and epithets might come to be applied to different classes of beings, human, ethereal, and demoniacal, indiscriminately. In Section iii. (pp. 397—405) I quote the well-known passage from Manu's Institutes, which adverts to the superior sanctity of the country on the banks of the Sarasvatī (which is in consequence presumed to have been for some time the seat of the most distinguished Indian sages, and the locality where the Hindu institutions were chiefly developed), and defines the limits of the several provinces of Brahmanical India, as then recognized. I next adduce a highly interesting legend from the Śatapatha-brāhmaṇa, which narrates how the sacred fire (typifying, of course, the sacrificial rites of the Brāhmans) travelled from the neighbourhood of the Sarasvatī eastward, across the river Sadānīrā into Videha, or north-Behar. Section iv. (pp. 405—421) presents a selection of passages from the great epic poem, the Rāmāyaṇa, descriptive of the Rākshasas or gigantic demons by whom the Brāhman settlers in southern India were oppressed and their rites obstructed, and whose monarch Rāvaṇa was vanquished and slain by the Indian hero Rāma, with the aid of an army of monkeys. In these poetic and hyperbolical descriptions, it is supposed (by some that) we can discern the indistinct outlines of a great movement of the Āryas from the Doab southward across the Vindhya range, and their conflicts with the aboriginal tribes of the Dekhan, the enemies of the Brāhmans and their institutions. The epithets applied to the Rākshasas in the Rāmāyaṇa correspond in many respects, it is observed, with those employed in the Rigveda to characterize the Dasyus, Rākshasas, and Yātudhānas. Section v. (pp. 422—423) contains some Hindu traditions regarding the tribes in the south of the peninsula, which, however, are not considered to throw any light on their real origin. Section vi. (pp. 423—438) supplies a variety of details, derived from Mr. A. D. Campbell's Telugu Grammar (including the important note by Mr. F. W. Ellis), and Dr. Caldwell's Comparative Grammar of the Dravidian languages, by which it is clearly shown that the Tamil, Telugu, Malayālim, and Canarese tongues (which are spoken by thirty-one millions of people), though, at different periods since the occupation of southern India by the Brāhmans, they have received a large infusion of Sanskrit words, are, nevertheless, originally and fundamentally quite distinct from, and independent of, that language, and that Tamil composition in particular is regarded by the native authors as pure and classical in proportion to its freedom from Sanskrit words. In the viith, and concluding Section (pp. 438—444), the results of the preceding sections are summed up. From the fact (established both by philological considerations, and by the testimony of the south-Indian grammarians) that the Dravidian languages are essentially distinct from Sanskrit, it is argued that the people by whom the former class of languages were spoken originally (i.e. before the Brahmanical invasion of the Dekhan) must have belonged to a race which had no affinity to the Sanskrit-speaking Āryas; and could not, therefore, as Manu asserts, have been degraded Kshatriyas. I then endeavour to show how the results obtained in this Chapter, viz., (1) that the Āryas, when living in the Panjāb, came into conflict with an alien race called Dasyus; (2) that the Āryas can be shown from their own books to have at first occupied only the north-west of India and then to have advanced gradually to the east and south, and last of all to have crossed the Vindhya range into the Dekhan; and (3) that the original languages of the south of the peninsula are distinct from Sanskrit,—how, I say, these results harmonize with, or corroborate, the theory that the Hindus, or Indo-Arians, are not autochthonous, but immigrated into Hindustan from the north-west.[9]

The Appendix[10] (pp. 445—488), and the "Additions and Corrections" contain some further illustrations of the subjects discussed in the body of the work, and in a few cases supply some modifications of the text which closer research has rendered necessary.

In the notes towards the close of the Volume, and in the Appendices, the Sanskrit passages have been printed in the Italic character.[11] The system I have followed is nearly that of Sir W. Jones. The distinctions between some similar letters have not always been very carefully indicated; but the Sanskrit scholar will have no difficulty in determining the words which are intended.

[9] [See note 3, p. ix.]

[10] [Portions of the Appendix and additions have now been incorporated in the earlier part of the volume.]

[11] [In the first edition the Sanskrit was printed in the Nāgarī character throughout the greater part of the volume.]

Nearly all the Sanskrit texts in this Volume have been taken from printed editions. The quotations from those parts of the Rigveda which have not yet appeared in Professor Müller's edition, have been copied from the MS. copy in my possession, alluded to in the Preface to the First Volume. The quotations from Durgāchārya, in pp. 166 f. and 173, have been derived from a MS. belonging to the East India House. That in p. 204 was, I believe, extracted from a MS. in the Library of the Asiatic Society in Calcutta. The two passages from Bhāskara Acharya, pp. 161 and 178, were obtained from Pandit Bapu Deva of the Benares College.

I owe it to the kindness of Professor Goldstücker that I am able to adduce the extracts from the Nyāya mālā vistara, in pp. 53 and 179.

The work of M. Vivien de Saint-Martin, entitled: "Etude sur la Géographie et les Populations Primitives du Nordouest de l'Inde d'après les Hymnes Védiques" (which discusses many of the subjects handled in the present volume), has only now come into my hands, as the last sheet, containing part of the Appendix and the "Additions and Corrections," is passing through the press.

The results at which this author has arrived in his valuable and ingenious dissertation, in regard to the origin of the Āryas, their immigration into India, and the direction of their movements within that country, correspond precisely with those which I myself had reached. His views on some points of detail on which I had adopted a different opinion, tell even more strongly than my own in favour of the general conclusions in which we both coincide.[12]

[12] I allude to his conclusion that the Sarayu referred to in the Veda was a river in the Pañjāb (in support of which he refers to Burnouf's Bhāg. Pur. folio ed. p. ii. 455); and that the country of the Kīkaṭas must, most probably, have been in Kos'ala or Audh, and not in Magadha, or South Behar.

I am happy to learn from M. de Saint-Martin's work that he intends to prosecute further his researches into the ethnography of India.

[EDINBURGH, 1860.]

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION.

In preparing this edition for the press, I am reminded how much this volume is indebted to the labours of the different authors whose works are quoted in it, viz., Burnouf, Lassen, Cowell, Campbell, Ellis, Caldwell, Clough, Turnour, Fausböll, Rajendralal Mitra, H. H. Wilson, Weber, Müller, Goldstücker, Roth, Benfey, Bopp, Kuhn, A. W. Schlegel, Pictet, Spiegel, Haug, Whitney, Windischmann, Langlois, Renan, Curzon, and Elphinstone.

To these names I have now to add those of Messrs. Beames, Childers, D'Alwis, Aufrecht, Curtius, Vullers, Schleicher, Fick, Crawfurd, Huxley, and G. Rawlinson, from whose writings or communications I have derived valuable assistance in augmenting my materials, or revising different portions of the work. My obligations to these scholars are acknowledged in the text.

The improvements which have been introduced in this edition are principally the following: the Comparative Tables of Words in pp. 15, ff.; 76, ff.; 221, ff.; 230, ff.; and 287, ff.; as well as the statements of Gāthā and Vedic forms in pp. 117, ff., and 205, ff.; have been greatly enlarged.

My conclusions regarding the value of affinity in language as a proof of affinity in race, and the effects of climate upon colour, have been so far modified that I no longer venture to pronounce positively that the Brahmanical Indians are of pure Indo-European descent; but leave it an open question whether the blood of their Arian ancestors may not on their immigration into India have been commingled with that of darker tribes previously in occupation of the country.

In the Appendix, Note B, pp. 446, ff., reference is made to a recent paper by Prof. Kern, in which he alleges the insufficiency of the proofs heretofore adduced of the posteriority of the Atharvaveda to the Rigveda; and more detailed grounds in support of that opinion are adduced. Some remarks are also made in pp. 454, ff. on the views recently expressed by the same writer, and by Prof. Haug, on the antiquity of the caste-system.

The Appendix and the Additional Notes contain further illustrations, or corrections, of various statements in the text.

The volume has, further, been revised throughout; but, with the exception of the alterations which have been just specified, it remains essentially the same as before.

J. M.

Edinburgh, 1871.

CONTENTS.

PAGES.
vii—xxv.	PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION.
xxvii.—xxviii.	PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION.
xxix—xxxii.	CONTENTS.
xxxii.	ERRATA ET CORRIGENDA.
1—3.	PLAN OF THE PRESENT VOLUME.
4—214.	CHAPTER I. THE LANGUAGES OF NORTHERN INDIA: THEIR HISTORY AND RELATIONS.
4— 11.	Sect. I. The North-Indian dialects, ancient and modern.
11— 33.	Sect. II. The Prākṛit dialects employed in the dramas.
34— 43.	Sect. III. On the origin and vernacular use of the scenic dialects.
43— 53.	Sect. IV. Views of the Indian grammarians on the relation of the Prākṛits to Sanskrit, and on the other elements in their composition.
53—103.	Sect. V. The Pāli, and its relations to Sanskṛit and Prākṛit.
104—114.	Sect. VI. The dialects of the rock and pillar inscriptions of Aśoka.
115—128.	Sect. VII. The dialect of the Buddhist Gāthās, and its relation to the Pāli: Summary of the results of this and the preceding section.
128—144.	Sect. VIII. On the original use of Sanskrit as a vernacular tongue; on the manner in which the Prākṛits arose out of it, and on the period of their formation: views of Professors Weber, Aufrecht, Lassen, and Benfey.
144—160.	Sect. IX. Reasons for supposing that the Sanskrit was originally a spoken language.

161—214. Sect. X. Various stages of Sanskrit literature, and the different forms in which they exhibit the Sanskrit language: the later Vedic commentators: earlier expounders: the Nirukta: the Brāhmaṇas: the Vedic hymns: imperfect comprehension of them in later times from changes in the language: the hymns composed in the vernacular idiom of their age.

215—357. CHAPTER II. Affinities of the Indians with the Persians, Greeks and Romans, and Derivation of all these nations from Central Asia.

217—228. Sect. I. Introductory remarks on comparative philology: affinities of the Sanskrit and Persian with each other.

228—267. Sect. II. Detailed illustrations of the affinities of Sanskrit with the Zend, Greek, and Latin languages: the last three languages not derived from Sanskrit.

267—278. Sect. III. That affinity in language affords some presumption of affinity in race: modes in which a greater or less diversity of language and institutions would arise in different branches of the same stock: Central Asia the birth-place of the Āryas.

279—286. Sect. IV. Whether there is any objection, arising from physiological considerations, to classing the Indians among the Indo-European races.

287—300. Sect. V. Reasons for supposing the Indians and Persians in particular to have had a common origin.

301—306. Sect. VI. Was India the primitive country of the Āryas and Indo-European races?

306—322. Sect. VII. Central Asia the cradle of the Arians: opinions of Schlegel, Lassen, Benfey, Müller, Spiegel, Renan, and Pictet.

322—329. Sect. VIII. On the national traditions of the Indians regarding their own original country.

329—334. Sect. IX. Whether any tradition regarding the earliest abodes of the Arian race is contained in the First Fargard of the Vendidad.

335—341. Sect. X. What was the route by which the Āryas penetrated into India?

341—357. Sect. XI. The immigration of the Indo-Arians from the north-west rendered probable by the tenor of the Vedic hymns.

358—444. CHAPTER III. The Arians in India: their Advance to the East and South.

359—369. Sect. I. Distinction drawn between the Āryas and Dasyus in the Rigveda.

369—396. Sect. II. Additional Vedic texts bearing on the relations of the Āryas and Dasyus.

397—405. Sect. III. The Arians on the Sarasvatī, and their diffusion eastward and southward from that point.

405—421. Sect. IV. Advance of the Arians from the Doab across the Vindhya mountains; and their conflicts with the aboriginal tribes of the Dekhan.

422—423. Sect. V. Indian traditions regarding the tribes in the south of the peninsula.

423—438. Sect. VI. Languages of the south of India, and their fundamental difference from Sanskrit.

438—444. Sect. VII. Results deducible from the preceding sections.

445—488. APPENDIX.

445 Note A. On the phrase "Trayī Vidyā."

446—466. Note B. Further grounds in support of the position that the Atharvaveda is more recent than the Rigveda; with some considerations in answer to the theory of Professors Kern and Haug, that the caste-system is more ancient than the Rigveda.

466—467. Note C. Quotation from Schlegel's Essai de l'origine des Hindous.

467—468. Note D. Quotation from the Rev. G. C. Geldart's paper "Language no Test of Race."

468—469. Note D*. Spiegel on the old Iranian Dialects.

469 Note E. Quotation from Rigveda, ix. 113.

469—476. Note F. Quotation from Windischmann's Essay, Ueber den Somacultus der Arier.
476—477. Note G. Prof. Cowell's note in his edition of Elphinstone's History of India on that author's views regarding the origin of the Hindus.
477—478. Note H. Quotation from Spiegel on the question of the separation of the Iranians and Indians.
478—479. Note I. Quotation from Spiegel on the grounds of the separation.
479 Note J. Quotation from Ptolemy.
480—481. Note K. On the earliest abodes of the Arians.
482—484. Note L. Quotations from the Mahābhārata and Rājataranginī regarding the tribes of the Panjāb.
484 Note M. Quotations from Lassen and Wilson.
485 Note N. Quotation from the Satapatha Brāhmaṇa, xiii. 8, 1, 5.
485—488. Note O. Stevenson and Caldwell on the different elements of the Indian population.
489—493. Additional Notes.
494—499. Metrical Translations.
501—512. Index.

ERRATA ET CORRIGENDA.

Page 17, line 15, for "daliddāe" read "daliddadāe."
„ 76, line 12, for "Saptaśalaka" read "Saptaśataka."
„ 94, line 17, for "baliddo" read "baladdo."
„ 192, 4 lines from the bottom, for "Panigins" read "Paingins."
„ 259, last line, for "Mahābbāshya" read "Mahābhāshya."
„ 332, note 109, line 2, for "Hyrcania" read "Hyrcania."
„ 360, note 3, line 5, for "viii. 226," read "viii. 22, 6."
„ 361, 7 lines from foot, for "Vṛihad" read "Bṛihad."
„ 368, line 29, for "xviii. 8, 22," read "xviii. 2, 28."
„ 370, note 30, line 3, for "Vālākhilya" read "Vālakhilya."
„ 385, line 17, and note 63, line 1, for "Arjuni" read "Arjuna."
„ „ note 3, line 5, for "i. 103, 3," read "i. 104, 3."

Note.—Page 89, note, line 3, Prof. Weber suggests that "kadraṇo" in the works quoted is no doubt a misprint for "kaiṇo."

ORIGINAL SANSKRIT TEXTS.

VOLUME SECOND.

PLAN OF THE PRESENT VOLUME.

In the first volume of this work I have sought to collect, translate, and illustrate (1) the mythical accounts of the creation of man and of the origin of castes which are to be found in the Vedic hymns, in the Brāhmaṇas and their appendages, in the Rāmāyaṇa, the Mahābhārata and the Purāṇas; (2) the texts of the Veda, and Brāhmaṇas, which speak of Manu as the progenitor of the Āryan Indians; (3) the passages of the Rig and Atharva Vedas which throw light upon the mutual relations of the several classes of Indian society at the time when those works were composed; (4) the portions of the Brāhmaṇas, or of later books which relate the struggles for pre-eminence which appear to have occurred between the Brāhmans and Kshattriyas in the early ages of Indian history; (5) the opinions of Manu and the authors of the Mahābhārata and Purāṇas regarding the origin of the alien tribes dwelling within, or adjacent to, the boundaries of Hindustan; and (6) the Purānic descriptions of the parts of the earth exterior to Bhāratavarsha or India: and as a result of the whole inquiry I found that the sacred books of the Hindus contain no uniform or consistent account of the origin of castes; and that in consequence of this discrepancy the theory commonly received by that people of the original distinctness of the four classes, in virtue of their derivation from different portions of the Creator's body, is not established as the doctrine of Hinduism, even by a literal interpretation of its more popular writings.

It will now be my endeavour to show by a series of proofs of a different description, derived from comparative philology, and from an examination of the earliest Hindu writings, the Vedas, that the people of India who belong to the principal pure and mixed classes were not originally divided into castes, or indigenous in India, but may, with the greatest probability, be regarded as forming a branch (not, however, perhaps, free from the intermixture of foreign elements,) of the great Indo-European family, of which the Persians, Greeks, Romans, and Germanic tribes were, or are, also members; and that while other branches of this great family (which seems to have had its primeval abode in some distant country to the north-west of India) separated themselves from the main stock and migrated to the westward, the progenitors of the Hindus travelled towards Hindustan, where they perhaps intermarried with some of the tribes which were previously in occupation of the country, and where their original religious ideas were gradually modified, and the system of castes and other institutions and tenets of Brahmanism were slowly developed.

The process of reasoning by which I hope to establish these conclusions is the following. First, I propose to show, by an examination of the languages and literature of India, that the Sanskrit is not (as the Hindus appear to conceive) an immutable form of speech of divine origin, but is different now from what it was when their ancestors first came into India. This will be made apparent by a comparison of the archaic diction of the Vedic hymns with the more modern language of the Itihāsas and Purāṇas; and that this difference is the result of gradual development will be proved by a reference to the natural laws of speech, and to the analogous process which the tongues of other nations have undergone; by arguments drawn from the composition of such books as the Nighaṇṭu, and Nirukta, explanatory of obsolete words and phrases in the hymns, and from the existence of such liturgical commentaries as the Brāhmaṇas, and such speculative treatises as the Upanishads, which presuppose as already antiquated, or at least antecedent, the hymns which they quote, and the sense of which they explain and develope. The difference in age between the various Indian Sāstras will be further briefly adverted to, and established by pointing out the great discrepancy between the religious ideas, forms of worship,[1] and state of manners which they severally represent; the Vedic hymns being shown by all these various lines of proof to be the earliest of all the Indian books, and the others to follow from them by a natural course of growth and expansion. While the mutability and the actual mutations of the Sanskrit language are demonstrated by this historical outline of Sanskrit literature, I shall show in some introductory sections, how, through the action of the same phonetic changes as are found to have transformed most of the ancient languages of Europe into their several modern representatives, the older Sanskrit became gradually modified[2] into the Pāli and Prākṛits, of byegone centuries, till, in combination with other elements,—not traceable in its classical literature, but forming, either an original part of the spoken dialect of the Āryan Indians, or a portion of it borrowed from alien sources,—it was ultimately broken down into the modern vernacular dialects of Northern India.

[1] The detailed treatment of this portion of the subject is deferred to a later volume of this work, the Fourth.

Having thus shown the mutations which the Sanskrit has undergone since its introduction into India, I propose, secondly, to prove, by a comparison of that venerable language with the Zend, Persian, Greek, Latin, and other western tongues, that these forms of speech are all closely related to each other, both in respect of roots and forms of inflection; and this in such a manner as to show them to be sister-dialects, derived, by gradual modification, from some more ancient, and now extinct, parent-language. From these facts, and others derived from Zend and Greek mythology and literature, I shall procced to argue the probability of a common origin of the different nations,—generally called the Āryan, Indo-Germanic, or Indo-European nations,—by which the above-mentioned languages have been spoken; as well as to evince the strong probability that the progenitors of the Hindus immigrated from the north or north-west into India.

I shall then endeavour to fortify the latter of these conclusions by referring to the indications which are discoverable of a collision between the Indo-Āryans, after their arrival in India, and certain barbarous tribes, speaking a different language, and belonging to a different race, who occupied that country before their immigration, and by sketching a history of their advance to the south and east. These subjects will be illustrated from the data to be found in the Vedic hymns, the most ancient monuments of Indian antiquity, as well as in the other Śāstras of later date.

[2] The objections which have been raised to this statement of the origin of the Pāli, etc., will be considered further on.

CHAPTER I.

THE LANGUAGES OF NORTHERN INDIA: THEIR HISTORY AND RELATIONS.

SECT. I.—The North-Indian Dialects, Ancient and Modern.

A SURVEY of the languages of Northern India reveals to us the following facts. We find, first, a polished and complicated language, the Sanskrit, popularly regarded as sacred, and in reality of very high antiquity; which is now, however, understood only by a few learned men, and spoken in their schools as the vehicle of discussions on grammar, theology, and philosophy, while it is totally unintelligible to the mass of the people. We find, secondly, a variety of provincial dialects which are employed both by the learned and the unlearned, viz., Bengalī, Hindī, Mahrattī, Guzaratī, etc., all bearing a close resemblance to each other, and all composed, in a great measure, of the same roots.

The words of which these vernacular dialects are formed may be divided into four classes. First, such as are pure Sanskrit, as for example īśvara (god), devatā (deity), svarga (heaven), strī (woman), purusha (man), jana (person); secondly, words which, though modified from their original form, are easily recognizable as Sanskrit, such as log from loka (people), istrī from strī (woman), muṇh from mukha (mouth), bhāī from bhrātṛi (brother), bhatījā from bhrātṛija (brother's son), bāhin from bhāgĭnī (sister), biyāh from vivāha (marriage), bhūiṉ from bhūmi (earth), and innumerable others in Hindī; thirdly, words which have no resemblance to any vocables discoverable in Sanskrit books, and which we must therefore either suppose to have an origin independent of that language, or to have formed part of the colloquial, though not of the written, Āryan speech,[1] such as in Hindī, bāp (father), bēṭā (son), pēṛ (a tree), chaukī (a chair), chūk (a blunder), khiṛkī (a window), jhāgṛā (a dispute), bakheṛā (the same), āṭā (flour), chaṭāī (a mat), and a multitude of other instances. Fourthly, words derived from Arabic, Persian, or some other foreign language, as ādmī (a man), 'aurat (a woman), hākim (a ruler), hākīm (a physician), durust (right), roz (day), dariyā (a river), roshanī (light), etc., etc.

Let us now see what is the history of these vernacular dialects. It is clear, for various reasons, that they cannot have existed for ever in their present form. When therefore, and how have they been created? What do history and the books of Indian grammarians tell us on the subject?

If we begin with the Arabic and Persian words which the North-Indian dialects, such as Bengalī and Hindī, contain, we shall find it to be universally admitted that words of this kind have only been introduced into those languages since the time when the Musulmans began to invade India. Now it is well known that Mahmūd of Ghazni made his first inroad into Hindustan between eight and nine hundred years ago. Before that time, and in fact till long afterwards, when the Mahomedans had penetrated from the north-west far into India, and taken possession of that country, there could have been scarcely any intermixture of Arabic or Persian words in the Indian dialects.[2]

[1] This latter alternative supposition was suggested to me by Prof. Aufrecht. The same remark had been previously made by Mr. J. Beames, as will appear from a quotation which I shall make further on from his "Notes on the Bhojpurī dialect of Hindī," in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society for 1868, p. 499.

[2] We learn, indeed, from the works of the ancient astronomer, Varāha Mihira, that a few astronomical and astrological terms of Greek or Arabic origin had been borrowed from the Arabian astronomers, and introduced into Sanskrit books. I allude to such words as hōrā, ḍṛikāṇa, liptā, anaphā, sunaphā, āpoklima, riṣpha, which are of Greek origin, and mukāriṇā, mukāvilā, tasdī, taslī, etc., which are derived from the Arabic. (Colebrooke's Misc. Essays, II., 525 ff., and Weber's Indische Literaturgeschichte, p. 227, and Indische Studien, II., pp. 254 and 263.) The following verse of Varāha Mihira proves clearly how much the Indian astronomers were indebted to the Greeks:—

mlechhāḥ hi yavanās teshu samyak śāstram idaṁ sthitam |
ṛishi-vat te 'pi pūjyante kim punar daivavid dvijaḥ |

"For the Yavanas are Mlechhas; yet among them this science is thoroughly cultivated;

In the preface to the popular Urdu book, the Bāgh o Bahār, we have the following account by the author, Mīr Amman, of Dehli (who states that his forefathers had served all the kings of Hindustan, from Humayūn downwards), of the origin of the Urdu language, which I copy in the Roman character:—

"Ḥaqīqat Urdu kī zabān kī buzurgoṉ ke muṉh se yūṉ sunī hai kih Dillī shahr Hinduoṉ ke nazdīk chaujugī haị. Uṉheṉ ke rājā parjā qadīm se rahte the, aur apnī bhākhā bolte thé. Hazār baras se Musulmānoṉ kā 'amal hūā. Sulṭān Mahmūd Ghaznavī āyā. Phir Ghorī aur Lodī bādshāh hūe. Is āmad o raft ke bā'iṣ kuchh zabānoṉ ne Hindū Musulmān kī āmezish pāī. Ākhir Amīr Taimur ne. . . . Hindūstān ko liyā. Unke āne aur rahne se lashkar kā bāzār shahr meṉ dākhil hūā. Is wāste shahr kā bāzār Urdū kahlāyā. . . . Jab Akbar bādshāh takht par baiṭhe, tab chāron ṭaraf ke mulkoṉ se sab qaum qadrdānī aur faiẓrasānī us khāndān lāṣānī kī sunkar ḥuzūr meṉ ākar jama'a hūe. Lekin har ek kī gōyāī aur bolī judī judī thī. Ikaṭṭhe hone se āpas meṉ len den saudā, sulf suwāl jawāb karte ek zabān Urdū kī muqarrar hūī. . . . Nidāṉ zabān Urdū kī manjte manjte aisī manjī kih kisū shahr kī bolī us se ṭakkar nahīṉ khātī."

"I have heard from the lips of my ancestors the following account of the Urdu language:—The City of Delhi in the opinion of the Hindus has existed during the four Yugas. It was inhabited of old by their kings with their subjects, who spoke their own bhākhā (dialect). A thousand years ago the rule of the Musulmans began. Sultān Mahmūd, of Ghaznī, came. Then the Ghorī and Lodī dynasties held sway. In consequence of this intercourse, a certain mixture of the languages of the Hindus and Musulmans took place. At length Amīr Taimūr . . . conquered Hindustān. In consequence of his arrival and residence, the bāzār of the army was introduced into the city, and the bāzār of the city came in consequence to be called Urdū. . . . When king Akbar ascended the throne, all races, learning the liberality of that unequalled family and its patronage of merit, and even they are revered like Ṛishis: how much more a Brāhman skilled in astrology!" (Colebrooke's Essays, II., 410.) This trifling exception, however, does not invalidate the assertion made in the text, that it was only after the settlement of the Musulmans in India that Arabic and Persian words came to be used in the dialects of India.

gathered round his court from all the surrounding countries; but the language of all these people was different. From their being collected, however, trafficking together, and talking with each other, a camp (Urdū) language became established. . . . At length, the Urdū language, being gradually polished, attained such a degree of refinement that the speech of no city can vie with it."

But it is only in the Urdu dialect, which is used by the Mahomedans and by those Hindus in the north-western provinces of India who have learnt the Persian language, that Persian and Arabic words are extensively employed. The words derived from those sources which exist in the Bengalī, Hindī, Mahrattī, Guzaratī, and other North-Indian dialects, in the form in which they are generally spoken by the Hindus, are considerably fewer in number. By far the larger portion of words in those tongues are (as has been already said) either (1) pure Sanskrit, or (2) corrupt Sanskrit, or (3) words which can neither be traced in Sanskrit books nor yet are derived from Persian or Arabic, and which may therefore be regarded either as indigenous (i.e. derived from non-Āryan tribes), or colloquial vocables of Āryan origin.

Several interesting questions arise here; as First, how far back can we trace the existing vernacular dialects, Bengalī, Hindī, Mahrattī, Guzaratī, etc., in the form in which they are now spoken? Secondly, what has been the process of their formation? and, Thirdly, from what source have they derived those words which are not discoverable in Sanskrit, as it has been preserved to us in written records?

The question regarding the antiquity of the existing vernaculars is one which I am not prepared to answer with any precision. Professor Lassen (Institutiones Linguæ Pracriticæ, pp. 59 f.) thinks they have existed since, at least, 1000 A.D. I translate his remarks on the two classes of dialects derived from Sanskrit: "To close this disquisition, I therefore remark that there are two families of corrupted Sanskrit, one more ancient, and not completely broken down, to which belong the Pali and the dramatic dialects; and a second, of more recent origin, and diffused in our own day over the provinces of India, which differs more widely from its parent. The former set are genuine daughters of the Sanskrit; the latter grand-daughters, although it is to some extent doubtful whether these are the daughters of the former, or of their sister dialects. As regards antiquity, the former family are proved by the history of Buddhism, and of the Indian drama, to have come into existence prior to our era; and it may be shown by probable proofs that the latter arose before 1000 A.D. The discussion of the latter question is, however, foreign to our purpose."

Mr. Beames claims for the modern vernacular dialects a high antiquity, and regards them as springing from an ancient Āryan language, which included elements not discoverable in the classical Sanskrit. His observations are as follows:

"I would here further observe that the written Sanskrit has unfortunately attracted the attention of scholars too exclusively. No one who lives long in India can escape having the conviction forced on him that the written language is quite inadequate to account for many forms and facts observable in the modern dialects. These dialects assert for themselves a high antiquity, and are derived, one cannot doubt, from an ancient Aryan speech, which is as imperfectly represented in Sanskrit as the speech of the Italian peasantry of their day was represented by Cicero or Virgil. The process of selection which led the polished Roman to use only stately and euphonious words—a process which is abundantly exemplified in the pages of modern English writers—was doubtless at work among the ancient Brahmins; and the fact that the cognate Indo-Germanic languages preserve words not found in Sanskrit, but which can be matched from the stores of humble and obscure Hindī or Bengalī dialects, is another proof of this fact. The line taken by Professor Lassen, in his valuable Prakrit Grammar, of treating all Prakrit words as necessarily modifications of Sanskrit words, is one which he has borrowed whole from Vararuchi and Hemachandra, and, however excusable in those ancient commentators, seems unworthy of an age of critical research."

It is not, however, necessary for my purpose that I should decide, even approximately, the question of the antiquity of the modern vernaculars. It will be sufficient if I can show that they have been derived by a gradual process of change from other provincial dialects which preceded them; and which, in their turn, have sprung from the Sanskrit, at some stage of its development.

There is no difficulty in conceiving that the Indian vernacular dialects should have undergone great modifications in a long course of ages. The mere fact above adverted to, which every one recognizes, of their having at a particular assignable date admitted into their vocabulary a large influx of Persian and Arabic words, is sufficient to render it probable that they may have formerly experienced other mutations of various kinds.

The circumstance, too, that the people who inhabit the different provinces of northern India make use of different, but kindred, provincial dialects, Bengalī, Hindī, Mahrattī, etc., which must, for the most part, at a period more or less remote, have sprung from some common source,[3] is a proof of the tendency to change which is inherent in all spoken language. For as the inhabitants of all these provinces profess, with some modifications, the same creed, receive the same religious books, and are divided into the same or similar castes, and for these and other reasons appear to be descended, though perhaps not exclusively, from one common stock, it is highly probable that their common ancestors must, at one time, have employed one and the same language: and that that language has in process of time undergone various provincial modifications, out of which the several modern vernaculars have been gradually formed.

We shall also see, a little further on, that the differences between the North-Indian dialects (the old Mahārāshṭrī, Saurasenī, etc.) which preceded the modern vernacular tongues, were few and unimportant; whereas the modern vernacular tongues, Bengalī, Hindī, Mahrattī, and Guzaratī, differ widely from each other in their forms of inflection and conjugation. This greater divergence between the modern than we find to have existed between the earlier dialects, evinces clearly the tendency to continual alteration, which I have remarked as a characteristic of language in general.

[3] Mr. Beames says (Jour. Roy. As. Soc. for 1868, p. 498): "It is, however, clear that each dialect of Hindī has had an independent existence for centuries, and I think an independent origin." This, however, can of course apply only to forms, not to the words which the dialects, whether Hindī or other, have in common; and which in many cases are diversely modified from the Sanskrit original. And although some of the grammatical forms may be original or invented, and not modified from those of any pre-existing Āryan language, there must be other forms which are merely modifications or developments.

I shall first of all state briefly the facts by which it is proved that the modern vernaculars are not, comparatively speaking, of any high antiquity, but have arisen out of earlier provincial dialects: and then proceed to establish these facts more in detail.

First. In extant Buddhist histories, such as the Lalita Vistara composed in Sanskrit, numerous verses, styled Gāthās, are interspersed, the language of which differs from pure Sanskrit, by the forms of inflection being varied or mutilated. This popularized Sanskrit, or something akin to it, appears to have been at one time the spoken language of India; or, at least, this Gāthā dialect exhibits some specimens of that ancient spoken language, and exemplifies the process by which the ancient Sanskrit, itself at one time a spoken language, became gradually corrupted.

Second. It has been discovered that many inscriptions are extant, engraven on rocks in different parts of India, bearing date apparently between two and three hundred years anterior to the Christian era, in which a language differing both from Sanskrit and the modern vernaculars is used.

Third. There are extant in other countries, such as Ceylon and Burmah, very ancient Buddhist books written in a language called Pālī or Māgadhī, which also is different from the modern vernaculars, as well as from Sanskrit, while it closely resembles the language of the rock inscriptions just alluded to.

Fourth. In ancient Indian dramas such as the Mṛichhakaṭī, Śakuntalā, etc., while kings and Brāhmans are made to speak Sanskrit, various forms of speech called Prākṛit and Apabhraṅśa are employed for the inferior castes and for women, which in like manner, differ both from Sanskrit and from the existing vernacular tongues.

The four foregoing classes of language have a more or less close affinity to each other; and from the use made of the last three in particular, viz., that used in the rock inscriptions, that found in the Pālī Buddhistical writings, and those employed in the dramas, it is impossible to doubt that either they, or forms of speech closely connected with them, were formerly current, during a long course of centuries, as the actual vernaculars of the periods when they were employed for literary, political, and religious purposes.

But while we thus discover that Pālī and different forms of Prākṛit, such as have been described, were employed in former times, we can find no traces of the modern vernacular dialects, Hindī, Bengālī, or Mahrattī, etc., in their present shape, in the ancient records of that same period; and we must therefore of necessity conclude that these modern vernaculars did not at that time exist, but have been subsequently developed out of the above-mentioned Prākṛit languages or other pre-existent forms of speech; in other words, that the former vernaculars (or Prākṛits) have been gradually altered until they have assumed the form of the modern Hindī, Bengālī, Mahrattī, etc.

As regards the second question started in p. 7, the process by which the modern vernaculars arose out of the earlier modifications of Sanskṛit, viz., the manner in which the grammatical forms of the latter, i.e. the Prākṛits, were broken down into those of the former, it is not necessary that I should enter into any detailed investigation, although some insight into the process will be afforded by the Comparative Tables which will be given further on. It is sufficient to know that by a particular operation of the general laws of linguistic change, the more recent forms of speech have naturally grown out of the older.

I shall now proceed to supply a more detailed account of those forms of vernacular speech already alluded to, which appear to have preceded the existing varieties, and which are now obsolete. In carrying out this design, it will be advisable to begin with those dialects which seem to be the most recently formed and employed of the four Indian classes of speech which have been before alluded to, viz., first, that found in the Buddhist Gāthās; secondly, that used in the rock inscriptions; thirdly, the Pālī; and fourthly, the dramatic Prākṛits. The last-named class appearing to be the most recent, I shall first subject it to examination, and then proceed to the others.

Sect. II.—The Prākṛit Dialects employed in the Dramas.

With the view of ascertaining the relation in which the Prākṛit languages stand to the modern vernaculars of northern India, I have gone cursorily over several of the dramas in which they are employed, such as the Mṛichhakaṭī, attributed to King Śūdraka, and the Vikramorvasī attributed to Kālidāsa, (both of which, though their precise age be disputed, appear to have been respectively composed, at the latest, about sixteen and fourteen hundred years ago,[4]) together with several others. I have also referred to the examples given in the Prākṛit Grammar of Vararuchi, which is considered by Lassen to have been composed about eighteen hundred years ago,[5] or rather in its commentary. An examination of the Prākṛits which are found in these several works shows that the languages of India were then in a state of transition, and formed an intermediate link between the Sanskṛit and the modern vernacular dialects. For whatever opinion we may entertain on the question whether the dramatic Prākṛits were identical with any contemporaneous or earlier vernacular dialects,[6] it is difficult to imagine that they had not a considerable resemblance to some of these. Even if some of the forms of the dramatic Prākṛits were purely literary and unknown in any of the spoken languages, they could scarcely have failed to bear some analogy to those of the latter; as, first, the inventors of those forms could hardly have had the ingenuity to devise entirely novel modifications of speech, or secondly, if they had, their compositions would have been thereby rendered unintelligible. The Prākṛit forms of inflection and declension approach more to the Sanskṛit than to the modern vernaculars; but yet exhibit a great [4] Professor Wilson, reasoning from a variety of considerations, considers the Mṛichhakaṭī to have been probably composed in the interval between 100 B C. and the end of the second century A.D. (Introduction to the play, pp. 5–9.) The same writer thinks that the Vikramorvasī, which is regarded as the work of Kālidāsa, is more recent than the Mṛichhakaṭī, but does not assign any probable date (Introd. to drama, pp. 185, 186). Lassen holds that the Mṛichhakaṭī was composed towards the end of the first century A.D., while the Vikramorvasī and the S'akuntalā (which last is also assigned to Kālidāsa) were composed in the second half of the second century A.D. (Ind. Alt. ii. p. 1160). Weber, on the other hand, in his latest notice of the subject in the Introduction to his Mālavikā and Agnimitra, pp. xxxiii, x], places the age of Kālidāsa, the author of Vikramorvasī and S'akuntalā, at the close of the third century A.D. The Mṛichhakaṭī is held by the same author to be not earlier than the second century A.D. (Ind. Stud. ii. 148).

[5] Ind. Alterth., vol. ii. p. 1160.

[6] It is quite conceivable that the Prākṛits employed in the earlier dramas may have continued to be the conventional forms in use in later works of the same kind, even after the provincial vernaculars to which they were most akin had been modified or superseded,—just as Latin, Sanskrit and Pālī continued to be used for literary purposes after they had ceased to be spoken tongues.

breaking down and modification of the former. I will give some instances of this which will make my meaning clearer than any general statements. I do not think it necessary to distinguish here the different kinds of Prākṛit, which will be specified further on.

Sanskrit.	Prākṛit.	Hindī.	English.
Bhavāmi	Homi	Hūṇ	I am.
Bhavasi	Hosi	Hai	Thou art.
Bhavati	Hodi	Hai	He is.
Bhavanti	Hohti	Haiṇ	They are.
Uttishṭha	Uṭṭhahi	Uṭh	Rise.
Prāpnomi	Pāvimi	Pātā-hūṇ	I obtain.
S'ṛiṇomi	S'uṇāmi	Suntā-hūṇ	I hear.
S'ṛiṇu	Suṇu, or Suṇāhi	Sun	Hear (imper.).
Kathaya	Kahēhi	Kah	Tell.
Dadāmi	Dēmi	Detā-huṇ	I give.
Dadāti	Dēdi	Detā-hai	He gives.
Dattam	Diṇṇam	Diyā, Dīn	Given.
Nṛityati	Năchchai	Nāchtā	He dances.
Rakshāmi	Rakkhāmi	Rakhtā-hūṇ	I keep.
Dhāva	Dhovehi	Dhǫ	Wash.
Brūmaḥ	Bollāmo	Bolte	We speak.
Patāmi	Paṛemi	Paṛtā	I fall.
Nishkāśaya	Nikkālēhi	Nikāl	Expel.
Ghṛitam	Ghiā	Ghī	Ghee.
Mukha	Muha	Muṇh	Mouth.
Kāryyam	Kajjam	Kāj	Work.
Karma	Kamma	Kām	Work.
Karṇa	Kaṇṇa	Kān	Ear.
Twam	Tumam	Tum	Thou or you.
Tubhyam	Tujh	Tujh	To thee.
Yushmākam	Tumhāṇam	Tumhārā	Of you.
Asti	Atthi, or Achchhi	Āchchhe (Beng.)	He is.
Santi	Achchhanti	Āchchhen (ditto.)	They are.

It is manifest that in these instances we see the intermediate forms which the words took in Prākṛit before they assumed the shapes in which we now find them in Hindī or Bengalī, e.g., karma and kāryya became in Prākṛit respectively kamma and kajja, and finally in Hindī kām and kāj. The Sanskrit form rakshāmi (I keep) re-appears in the Prākṛit rakkhāmi, with the compound consonant ksh changed into kkh, but with āmi the final affix of the first person singular unchanged. In the modern vernacular the former change remains, but the word has undergone a farther modification, the peculiar affix of the first person singular āmi having disappeared in the Hindī rakhtā, which does not differ from the second and third persons. A fuller exemplification of the points in which the Prākṛits coincide with and diverge from the Sanskrit, on the one hand, and approximate to the modern vernaculars on the other, will be found in the tabular statement subjoined.

The books to which reference has been made in this statement are the following:—Mr. Cowell's Prākṛita Prakāśa of Vararuchi; Lassen's Institutiones Linguæ Pracriticæ; Delius's Radices Pracriticæ; the Mṛichhakaṭī, Stenzler's edition; the Śakuntalā, Böhtlingk's edition; the Prabodha Chandrodaya, Brockhaus's edition; Mālavikā Agnimitra, Tullberg's edition; and the Vikramorvaśī, Calcutta edition.[7]

[7] Since the first edition of this work appeared, two dramas, the Prasannarāghava of Jayadeva, and the Bālarāmāyaṇa of Rājaśekhara, have been printed by Pandit Govinda Deva S'āstrī, in the Journal called "The Pandit," published at Benares, and separate copies of each have been struck off, bearing the dates of 1868 and 1869. Professor Weber has also published, in 1866, a Dissertation on the language of the Jaina work called "Bhagavatī," which is a species of Prākṛit; and in 1870 the text, with a German translation, of the "Saptaśataka of Hâla," as a "contribution to the knowledge of Prâkṛit."

TABLE No. I.

COMPARATIVE STATEMENT OF THE SANSKRIT, PRĀKṚIT, AND MODERN INDIAN LANGUAGES.[8]

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	PRĀKṚIT.	HINDĪ.	MAHRATTĪ.	ENGLISH.
Mṛichh. 3. 126	ghṛitam	ghiam	ghī	ghī	ghee.
Mṛichh. 3 Var. v. 25	dadhi	dahīm, dahiṁ	dahī	dahīm	curds.
Var. ii. 27 . .	mukha	muhaṁ	muṅh	mukh	mouth.
Var. ii. 27 . .	badhira	vahira	bahirā	bahirā	deaf.
Var. ii. 27 . .	megha	meho	meṅh	megh, dhag	cloud.
Var. v. 19 . .	vadhū	vahū	bahū	bāyako, baīl	wife.
Mṛichh. 164. 168. . .	sādhu	sāhū, śāhū	sāhū	sāhū, sāvakār	good: banker.
Var. iii. 3. 17.	kārya, karma	kajja, kammo	kāj, kām	kāj, kām	work.
Var. iii. 17. Var. ix. 17.	ārye	ajje	. . .	. . .	respectable.
Var. ii. 10. .	garbhiṇī	gabbhiṇ	gabbhin	gābhaṇ	pregnant.
Var. iii. 2. 50.	yogyam	joggam	jog	jogā	proper.
Var. iii. 2. . .	rājya	rajja	rāj	. . .	kingdom.
Var. iii. 27. Mṛichh. 31.	adya	ajja	āj	āj	to-day.
Vikr. 78. 79.	vādyamānaih	vajjantehiṁ	bajānā	bajāwiṇeṁ	to sound.
Var. iii. 3. . .	ardham	addhaṁ	ādhā	ādhā	half.
Var. iii. 3. 50.	karṇaḥ	kaṇṇo	kāṇ	kān	ear.
Śak. 25. . . .	kharjūraiḥ	khajjūrehiṁ	khajūr	khajūr	date tree.
Mṛichh. 104.	charmmakāraḥ	chaṇmārao	chamār	chamhār	Chumar.
Var. iv. 1. . .	kumbhakāraḥ	kumbhāro	kuṃhār	kumbhār	potter.
Var. iii. 3. . .	sarvam	sabbam, śabbam	sab	. . .	all.
Mṛichh. 124.	suvarṇa	śovaṇa	sonā	soneṁ	gold.
Var. iii. 27. .	satyam	sachcham	sach	sāch	true.
Var. iii. 4. Mṛichh. 44.	chandraḥ	chando	chānd	chānd	moon.
Vikr. 23. . . .	chandreṇa	chāndaeṇa	. . .	. . .	by the moon.
Var. iii. 28. .	madhyaḥ	majjho	manjhalā, majholā	māj	middle.
Var. iii. 12. .	hastaḥ	hattho	hāth	hāt	hand.
Mṛichh. 7. 120	vṛiddha	vuḍḍha	buḍhā	. . .	old.
Vikr. 107. . .	vṛiddhām	vuḍḍiṁ	buḍhiyā	. . .	old woman.
Vikr. 121. . .	jyeshṭha	jeṭṭha	jeṭhā	. . .	eldest.
Var. iii. 1. 50	mushṭi	muṭṭhi	muṭṭhi	mūṭh	fist: handful.
Var. iii. 1. 51 Mṛich. 28. 142	śreshṭhi	seṭṭhi	seṭh	seṭ	superior, banker.
Mṛichh. 18. 30	kāshṭhena	kaṭṭheṇa	kāṭh	kāṭhī	wood, a pole
Mṛichh. 18. 21	śushka	sukkha, śukkha	sūkhā	sukhā, sukā	dry.
Mṛichh. 53. .	sākshin	sakkhi	sākhī	. . .	witness.

[8] This table (except as regards the transliteration of the Indian words), is reprinted nearly as it stands in the first edition, and without a renewed verification of the references in col. 1, the labour of which, I thought, would hardly have been repaid by correction of a few possible inaccuracies.

REFERENCES.	SANSKṚIT.	PRĀKṚIT.	HINDĪ.	MAHRATTĪ.	ENGLISH.
Var. i. 20. and iii. 12. . . .	pustakam	pothao	pothī	pothī	book.
Var. iii. 29. Mṛichh. 54.	pushkaraḥ	pokkharo	pokharā	pokhar	pond.
Mṛichh. 99. Var. iii. 29.	dakshiṇe	dakkhiṇe	dakhin	. . .	south.[9]
Lassen, 363. Mṛichh. 97. 117. . . .	dakshiṇam	dāhiṇam	dāhinā	. . .	on the right hand.[9]
Var. iii. 40. Mṛichh. 99.	paśchimaḥ	pachchhimo	pachchhim	. . .	west.
Var. iii. 1. . .	bhaktam	bhattaṁ	bhāt	bhāt	boiled rice, rice in husk.
Mṛichh. 104.	granthi	ganṭhi	gāṇṭh	gāṇṭh	joint.
Var. i. 12. . .	pishṭam	piṭṭham	pīṭnā	piṭaṇeṁ	to pound.
Mṛichh. 105.	pṛishṭhataḥ	piṭṭhido	pīṭh	. . .	at the back.
Var. i. 36. . .	chaitraḥ	cha'itto	chait	. . .	name of a month.
Mṛichh. 120 Var. iii. 29.	kshetra	khetta	khet	śet	field.
Mṛichh. 94. 95	mṛittikā	maṭṭiā	maṭṭī	mātī	earth.
Var. iii. 40. Mṛich. 71. 150	paśchāt	pachhādo, pachhā	pāchhe	. . .	after.
Var. iii. 2. . .	nagnaḥ	naggo	nangā	nangā	naked.
Var. iii. 40. .	vatsa	vachha[10]	bachā	bachā	child, etc.
Var. iv. 9. 26 Vikr. 36. .	vidyut	vijjū, vijjulī	bijlī	wīj	lightning.
Var. i. 32. iii. 31	vṛikshaḥ	vuchho[11]	brichh	vṛiksha	tree.
Mṛichh. 73. 79	rūkshaḥ[12]	rukkha, lukkha	rūkh	. . .	tree.
Var. i. 30. iii. 30	ṛikshaḥ	richchho	rīchh	. . .	a bear.
Mṛichh. 72. Var. v. 35.	bhrātā	bhādā, bhāā	bhāī	bhāū	brother.
Mṛichh. 72. .	ashṭamam	aṭṭhamam	āṭhwāñ	āṭhwā	eighth.
Mṛichh. 71. .	saptamam	sattamam	sātwāñ	sātwā	seventh.
Var. iii. 35. Mṛichh. 93.	pushpam	puppham	puhap	. . .	flower.
Var. i. 8. . .	mayūra	moro	mor	mor	peacock.
Var. i. 7. . .	lavaṇam	loṇam	lon	loṇ	salt.
Mṛichh. 11. 94. and 113. 138	bhaginīm	bahiṇim	bahīn	bahīṇ	sister.
Mṛichh. 117.	śūkaraḥ	śuale[13]	sūar	. . .	hog.
Var. i. 28. xi. 17 Mṛichh. 11.	śṛigālī	śiālī, sialī	siyāl	. . .	she jackall.
Mṛichh. 120.	vīja	vīa	bīā	bīj, bī	seed.
Mṛichh. 77.	vaṇik	bāṇio[14]	baniyā	wāṇī	merchant.

[9] Here it deserves to be specially noted that the Sanskrit word undergoes the same changes in Prākṛit and Hindī according to its two different meanings.

[10] The Persian has the same form, with a b instead of the v.

[11] Vararuchi gives the form vachchho, not vuchchha, which I find in the Mṛichh., p. 73.

[12] Rūksha is given in Wilson's dictionary as one of the Sanskrit words for a tree; but it may have crept in from Prākṛit. Compare Böhtlingk and Roth, s.v.

[13] This word is from the Śakārikā, one of the Apabhraṁśa dialects. In ordinary Prākṛit it would perhaps be sūaro or śūaro.

[14] Vāṇio Mṛichh., 28 and 50.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	PRĀKṚIT.	HINDĪ.	MAHRATTĪ.	ENGLISH.
Mṛichh. 78. .	kāyasthaḥ	kāatthao	kāyath	kāyat	Kāyasth.
Lass. p 172. 218. Mṛich. 29. 30. 151. Var. iv. 2.	devālayaḥ, devakulam	deulu, devalam	deoḷal	dewaḷ, deūḷ	temple.
Var. iv. 1. . .	rājakulam	rāa'ulam, rāulam	rāwal (a priest.)	rāūḷ (a palace.)	royal family.
Mṛichh. 30. 38. 39. . .	dyūtakaraḥ	jūdiaro, jūdiaṛu, jūdialo	juārī	jugārī	gambler.
Var. viii. 25.	sthāna	ṭhāna	thāṅw	thāṉ	place.
Var. iii. 33. .	snāna	ṇhāṇa	nahān	nahāṉ, nhāṉ	bathing.
Var. iii. 33. 61.	krishṇaḥ	kaṇho	kanhaiyā, kānh[15]	kanhaiyā, kānhobā	Kṛishṇa.
Var. iii. 3. . Mṛichh. 13.	grāma	gāma	gāṅw	gāṅw	village.
Mṛichh. 97. Var. iv. 25.	grāmyāḥ	gāmeluā[16]	gāṅwālā	. . .	villager.
Mṛichh. 69. 96 Lass. 172. 425	balīvardāḥ	ba'illā	bail	bail	oxen.
Mṛichh. 6. .	daridratayā	daliddāe	dalidratā	. . .	poverty.
Mṛich. 12. 44. 164. Var. xii. 22. Vikr. 30.	striyam, striyā	isthiyam,[17] itthiāe	istrī	. . .	woman.
Mṛichh. 18. 23. 58. . . .	śyāla	sālaa, sālo	sālā	sālā	brother-in-law.
Var. iii. 14. 50. & Mṛichh. 40	stambhaḥ	khambho	khaṁbhā	khāmb	pillar.
Var. iii. 29. .	skandhaḥ	khandho	kandhā	. . .	shoulder.
Mṛichh. 43. Mṛichh. 50.	vahis, vāhya	vāhilā, vāhira	bāhir	bāher	outside.
Mṛichh. 126.	vṛiddhe, vṛihati	vaḍḍhake, vaḍḍhakāhiṁ	baḍā	. . .	great.
Mṛichh. 131. Var. iii. 39.	kārshāpaṇam	kahāvaṇam, kahāvaṇo	kahāṅban, kāhan	. . .	16 paṇas of cowries.
Var. iii. 58. . Mṛich. 73. 134	dīrghikā	digghiā, dīhiā	dighī	. . .	oblong pond.
Var. v. 24. .	haridrā	haladdā, haladdī	haldī	. . .	turmeric.
Var. ii. 31. .	yaśas	jaso	jas	jas	glory.
Var. iii. 29. Mṛichh. 150.	kshemam	kkhemam	khem	khem	welfare.
Mṛichh. 175. Var. iii. 26.	gardabhaḥ	gaddaho, gaḍḍaho	gaḍahā	gāḍhawa	ass.
Var. iii. 28, 56	sandhyā	sanjhā[18]	sāṅjh	sāṅjh	evening.
Var. iv. 25. .	etāvat	ettiam	itnā	. . .	so much.
Mṛichh. 44.	andhakārasya	andhaārassa	andhiyārā	andhār	darkness.

[15] Kānhpur (city of Kānh, or Kṛishṇa) is the proper name of Cawnpore. When Kṛishṇa means black, it becomes Kasaṇo in Prākṛit, according to Var. iii. 61. The Bālarāmāyaṇa has kisaṇa, p. 141, and kaṇṇa in p. 244, in the same sense.

[16] See Lassen, p. 425, who says gāmeluā = quasi grāmālayukāḥ.

[17] This word is in the S'akārikā dialect.

[18] In this and other instances, the rules and examples given would, of course, account, by analogy, for the existence of many other modern vernacular words, of which the earlier

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	PRĀKṚIT.	HINDĪ.	MAHRATTĪ.	ENGLISH.
Vikr. 49. and Lass. 249.[19]	upādhyā-yasya	uajjhāassa, ojhāo	ojhā[20]	. . .	religious teacher.
Var. iii. 18. & Vikr. 9.	āścharyam	achcheram, achcharīam	acharaj	. . .	wonderful.
Var. xii. 6. Vikr. 103.	gṛidhreṇa	giddheṇa	gidh	gīdh	vulture.
Vikr. 112. . .	mātaram	mādaram,[21] mām	mā	āī, māī[22]	mother.
Var. v. 32. . .	mātā	māā
Vikr. 112. Vikr. 116.	pitaram pituḥ	pidaram,[23] piaram, piduṇo	pitā, bāp	pitā, bāp	father.
Mṛichh. 14. 95.116.141 Var. iv. 32.	gṛiham	ghalam, gharam, giham, haraam	ghar	ghar	house.
Var. ii. 2. . .	jīvam	jīam	jī	. . .	life.
Var. ii. 2. . .	sūchī	sūī	sūī	suī	needle.
Var. ii. 2. iii. 50	mārgaḥ	maggo	. . .	. . .	path.
Var. iii. 48. .	ātmanaḥ	āpaṇo,[24] appaṇo	apṇā	. . .	self; own.
Mṛichh. 12. 78. 103. 104 S'ak. 105. .	ātmā ātmānam	āpā, appā appāṇam, āpāṇam	āp . . .	āpan . . .	self; great-souled.
Prabodhach 12. 28. 37. 46. 63. 68.	mahātmā-nam	mahāppā-ṇāṇam, mahāppā-ṇam	. . .	. . .
Prab. 63. . . Var. iii. 1. .	sthale	thale	thal	. . .	dry land.
Var. iv. 15. S'ak. 21. . .	aśru	aṁsū, assu	āñsū	asūṁ, āsu	tear.
Var. iii. 2. v. 14. vi. 60. .	agnim	aggim	āg	āg	fire.
Var. iii. 60. Lassen, 284.	kriyā	kiriā	kiṙiyā	. . .	ceremony.
Var. iii. 8. . .	brāhmaṇo	vamhaṇo	bāmhan	bāmaṇ	Brahman.
Var. iii. 25. .	garttaḥ	gaḍḍo	gaḍhā	. . .	cavity.
Var. i. 18. ii. 27	gabhīram	gahiram	gahirā	gahirā	deep.

Prākṛit form may not now be discoverable in any extant work. Thus the Hindī and Mahrattī word bānjh, a barren woman, is formed from the Sanskrit bandhyā, in the same way as sānjh comes from sandhyā; and as in the latter case we find the earlier Prākṛit form to have been sanjhā, so we may suppose the older Prākṛit form of bānjh to have been banjhā, or vanjhā. And the same must have been the case in numerous other instances. [In fact, since the above was written, I have actually found the word vanjhā, a barren woman, in Clough's Pali Grammar, p. 37. See also vanjhjhībhūdā, Bālarām., p. 225.]

[19] Campbell's Telugu Grammar, note to Introduction, p. 13.

[20] Ōjhā is the designation of a particular tribe of Brahmans. In the Bālarāmāyaṇa, 85 ff., the word has the form uvajjhāa.

[21] In Persian mādar. [22] Mahrattī of Nagpur. [23] In Persian padar.

[24] See Lassen, Inst. Pracr., p. 315. Burnouf (Lotus de la Bonne Loi, p. 660) observes that the form āptano or ātpano, which occurs in the rock inscription of Girnar, is the intermediate step by which ātman was transformed into appā, appano, etc.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	PRĀKṚIT.	HINDĪ.	MAHRATTĪ.	ENGLISH.
Var. iv. 31.	malinam	ma,ilam	mailā	. . .	dirty.
Var. i. 9.	chaturthī,	cha,utthī, chotthī	chauthī	chauthā	fourth.
	chaturdaśī	cha'uddahī, choddahī	chaudahwīñ	chaudā	fourteenth, fourteen.
Var. iii. 44.	panchadaśaḥ	pannāraho	pandarahwāñ	pandharā	fifteenth, fifteen.
Var. ii. 41. Mṛichh. 70.	shashṭhī	chhaṭṭhī	chhaṭhī	. . .	sixth.
Var. ii. 14. 44.	ekādaśa,	eāraha,	igārah,	. . .	eleven,
	dvādaśa,	vāraha,	bārah,		twelve,
	trayodaśa	teraha[25]	terah		thirteen.
Lass. 271. 318 Var. vi. 59.	dvayoḥ	donham, donnam	donoñ	. . .	of two.
Lassen, 318 Mṛichh. 101 Var. vi. 54.	dvau, dvābhyām, dvayoḥ	due, do, dohiñ, dosu	do	don	two.
Lassen, 319. Var. vi. 56.	trīṇi	tiṇṇi	tīn	tīn	three.
Lassen, 319.	shaṭ	chha	chha	. . .	six.
Lassen, 320.	viñśati	vīsa,i	bīs	wīs	twenty.
Lassen, 320.	triñśat	tīsaa	tīs	tīs	thirty.
Var. iii. 30. 31.	kshaṇam	chhaṇam	chhan	. . .	moment.
	kshamā	chhamā	chhamā	. . .	patience.
	makshikā	machhiā	makkhī	. . .	a fly.
Var. iii. 52. iv. 1	srotas	sotto	sotā	. . .	stream.
Var. i. 12.	nidrā	niddā	nīnd	nīd	sleep.
Lassen, 246. Var. iii. 53.	tāmram	tamvaṇ	tāmbā	tāmb (iron rust.)	copper.
Var. iv. 33. Lass. 172. n.	duhitā, dhīdā	dhīā	dhiyā, dhī	. . .	maiden, daughter.
Var. iv. 25.	dhanavān	dhaṇālo	dhanwālā	. . .	rich.
Var. i. 10. iii. 12, Mṛich. 71	prastāraḥ, prastaraḥ	pattharo, patthāro	patthar (a stone.)	patthar	a bed : a stone.
Var. i. 20. iii. 1	muktā	mottā	motī	motīñ	pearl.
Var. iii. 3. 58 Mṛichh. 93.	rātri	rattī	rāt	rāt	night.
Var. ii. 32.	yashṭi	laṭṭhī	lāṭhī	laṭṭh	staff, club.
Var. i. 15. 28. iii. 41. Mṛichh. ?	vṛiśchikaḥ	vichchuo, vinchhuo	bichū, bichī	vinchū	scorpion.
Var. iii. 17. 19	sūryaḥ	sujjo, sūro	sūraj	. . .	the sun.
Var. i. 29. Lass. 293. Vikr. 45.	prāvṛish	pāus	. . .	pāus	the rainy season.
Var. iii. 35. 38. Lass. 209	vāshpaḥ	vāppho, vappho	bhāph	. . .	vapour.
Var. iii. 22.	nartakaḥ	naṭṭao	naṭ	naṭ	a dancer.
Var. iii. 24.	vārtā	vattā	bāt	. . .	word.
Lassen, 250. Var. iii. 21.	paryanka	pallanka	palang[26]	palang	bed.
Bāl. 132.	palyankaḥ	pallanko	. . .	. . .	do.
Lassen, 264. Var. iii. 1. 12	ekastha	ekattha	ikaṭṭhā	. . .	collected.

[25] See Prof. Cowell's note on Var. ii. 44.

[26] This word palang means in Persian also, a bed, as well as a tiger.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	PRĀKṚIT.	HINDĪ.	MAHRATTĪ.	ENGLISH.
Var. iii. 12.	mastaka	matthaka	māthā	māthā	head.
Mṛichh. 18.	. . .	matthaam
Lassen, 272.	mavisya[27]	machchha	machchh,	. . .	fish.
Var. iii. 40.			machchhlī
Var. x. 10.	kanyā	kaṇṇā, haṇjā	. . .	. . .	girl.
Lassen, 379.
App. 53.
	aham	aham, ham,	maiñ, ham	mīm̃	I.
		hagge, haṅi
	vayam	amhe, vaam	ham	amhī	we.
	mama	maha, majjha	mujh	mājhā	mine.
Vikr. 81. 82	asmākam	amhāṇam	hamārā	amhālā	of us, [us, by
Var. vi. 25–				amhāna	us, Mahr.]
53.	tvam, tvām	tumam,	tum	tūm̃	thou.
Cowell, Int.		tumam
p. xxviii.[28]	tubhyam	tujjha	tujh	tuj	to thee.
	tava	tuha, tujjha	tujh	tujhā	thine.
		tujjhaha
	yūyam	tumhe, tujjhe	tum	tumhī	you.
	yushmākam	tumhāṇa	tumhāra	tumhāla,	of you, [you,
				tumhāna	by you, Mah.]
Mṛichh. 38.	kasya	kāha	kāhe	. . .	whose?
Var. vi. 6.	kasyāḥ	kissā	kis	. . .	of what woman?
Cowell, Int. xxvii.	yaḥ	jo	jo	jo	who.
Var. iv. 16.	tasmin	tahiñ	. . .	. . .	in this.
Mṛichh. 93. 96.	yatra, tatra	jahiñ, tahiñ	jahāṇ, tahāṇ, tahīṇ	jetheṁ, tetheṁ	where, there.
Var. iv. 25.	kiyat, yāvat	kettia, jettia	kitnā, jitnā	kitīm̃	how much, as much.
Mṛichh. 74.	kutra	kahiñ	kahāṇ	koṭheṁ	where?
Mṛichh. 4. 51.	uttishṭha	uṭṭhehi	uṭhnā	uṭhneṁ	rise, to rise.
		utthehi
Var. viii. 15. 61	gṛihṇāti	geṇha, i	gahnā	gheneṁ	to take.
Mṛichh. 4.	pṛichchha	puchchha	. . .	. . .	to ask.
27. & pas. Cf.	pṛishṭā	puchchhidā	pūchhnā	pusaneṁ
Delius, p. 41	pṛishṭvā	puchchhia	. . .	. . .
Kram., in	prakshyāmi	puchchhissam	. . .	. . .
ditto, p. 10.	pṛichhati	puchchhadi	. . .	. . .
Var. viii. 12.	mriyate	mara, i	marnā	maraneṁ	to die.
Var. viii. 18.	smarāmi	sumarāmi	sumaranā	. . .	to remember.
xii. 17. Mṛic.	smarasi	sumaresi
66. 103. 134.	smṛitvā	sumaria
pas. Vikr. 14
Mṛichh. 21. 24	samarpayasi	sanappesi	sompnā	sompaneṁ	to entrust.
Mṛichh. 14.	prāpitā	pābidā	pāyā	pāvaneṁ	to obtain.
131, Vikr.	prāptaḥ	pābide, patto
57. 97. 101		pāviya
Del. p. 62 .	prāpnomi	pāvimi	pāwtā
	prāpsyasi	pāvihi	pāwahi
Var. iii 3. . .	prabhavati	pabhava'i	. . .	. . .	he prevails.

[27] Machcha also is, however, given in Wilson's dictionary as a Sanskrit form.

[28] [See also Mṛichhakaṭi and Vikramorvasī, etc., passim.]

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	PRĀKṚIT.	HINDĪ.	MAHRATTĪ.	ENGLISH.
Var. vii. 20. 21. viii. 1. Mṛich. 105. .38. 39. 72. 163. . .	bhavāmi	homi[29]	hūñ	. . . .	I become, or am.
	bhavasi	hosi	hai	. . .	thou becomest, etc.
	bhavati	bhodi, hodi[30] hojja, hojja'i	hai	. . .	he becomes, etc.
	bhavanti	honti	haiñ		they become, etc.
Prab. p. 44.	anubhavanti	aṇuhavanti	. . .	. . .	they feel.
Mṛichh. 141.	anubhavitum	aṇubhavidum	. . .	. . .	to feel.
Mṛichh. 21. 24	bhavishyati	huvissadi, huvissadi	hōihi[31]	. . .	he will be.
Var. vii. 12. 13. 14. 15. Lassen, 268.	bhavishyāmi	hossāmi,[32] hossam, hohāmi, hohimi	hūñgā	hoīn	I will be.
	bhavishyāmaḥ	hossāmo, hohāmo, hohimo, hohissā, hohitthā	hoñge	. . .	we will be.
Var. vii. 20. 21. . .	bhavishyati	hojja, hojjā hojjahii, hojjāhi	hogā	hōīl	he will be.
	bhavatu	hojja, u, hojjāu	hūylye, hūjiyo	. . .	let him be; be (imper.).
Var. vii. 23. 24. . .	abhavat, abhūt	huvīa, hohīā	bhayā, huā, hatā, thā	hotā	he was.
Var. viii. 2. .	bhūtam	huam (hūam ?)	hūā	. . .	been.
Mṛichh. 25. .	jvālaya	jālehi	jalānā	. . .	to burn.
Var. viii. 13 Vikr. 112. Mṛich. 16. 31	karomi	karomi, kalemi, karemi	kartā	karitoñ	I do.
Mṛichh. 132.	kṛitam	kaḍe	karā, kiyā	kela, kelā	done.
Mṛichh. 31. Vikr. 18. .	kṛitaḥ	kulu, kao[33]
Delius, pp. 27–29. . .	kurvan	karanto, kalento, karento, kubbāṇo	kartā	karit	doing.
Delius, pp. 27–29. . .	nirākṛitya	ṇirākariya	kŏriyā (Bengalī.)	. . .	having undone [done].
Delius, p. 17 Mṛichh. 105	dadāmi	demi	detā	. . .	I give.
Mṛichh. 66.	dadāti	dedi		. . .	he gives.
Var. viii. 62. Mṛich. 95. 37.	dattam	diṇṇam	diyā, dīn	. . .	given.
Mṛichh. 127.	dadatī	dentī	detī	. . .	giving (fem.).
Mṛichh. 32. 163. . . .	mārgayati	maggadi[34] maggedi	māngnā	māganeñ	to ask.

[29] From havāmi, etc.; see Lassen, p. 176.
[30] Hoi, Mṛichh. 38. 102.
[31] Hōihi, provincial for hogā.
[32] Burnouf, Lotus, 687.
[33] Delius seems to think kulu may be the Prākṛit imperative.
[34] Comp. maggo from mārgaḥ, antè, p. 18, Var. ii. 2. iii. 50.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	PRĀKṚIT.	HINDĪ.	MAHRATTĪ.	ENGLISH.
Mṛichh. 79. 82. 88. . .	mārgayitum	maggidum	. . .	. . .	to ask.
Mṛichh. 136	marga-nā-ṇa-ya	maggamā-ṇena	. . .	. . .
Mṛichh. 95. .	mārgayataḥ	maggantassa	. . .	. . .
Mṛichh. 12. .	kalpayata	kappedha	. . .	kāpaṇeṁ	to cut.
Mṛichh. 51. .	kalpayitvā	kappia
Var. viii. 23. Mṛichh. 36. Del. 15. 16.	jñātvā	jāṇia	jāniyā (Bengalī.)	. . .	having known
Var. viii. 56. Delius, p. 24. Mṛichh. 37. .	śṛiṇomi	śuṇāmi	sunnā (Hindī)	. . .	to hear.
	śrutvā	śuṇia	śuniyā (Bengalī.)
Mṛi. 104. 105.	śṛiṇu	suṇu, suṇāhi	sun	. . .	hear.
Mṛich. 45. 70	dhāv, dhāvati	dhovehi, dhoadi	dhonā	dhuṇeṁ	to wash.
Mṛichh. 46. .	svapimaḥ	subemha	soṇā	. . .	to sleep.
Prasan. 65. .	supta	sutta	soā	. . .	asleep.
Bāl. 178. . .	svapsyāmi	suwissam	so, ūnga	. . .	I shall sleep.
Mṛich. 59. 122 Var. viii. 25	sthāpayitvā	ṭhābia, thābia	thāmnā	thāmbaṇeṁ	to hold, stop.
Mṛichh. 97. Delius, 19. .	sthāpayāmi	thābemi	. . .	. . .
Mṛichh. 57. .	rakshāmi	rakkhāmi	rakhnā	rākhaṇeṁ	to keep.
Var. viii. 47. Mṛichh. 70. 71. Del. 50.	nṛityati, nṛityate, nṛityan	ṇachhai, ṇachchīadi, ṇachchanto	nāchnā	nāchaneṁ	to dance.
Mṛichh. 71. .	śikshayantaḥ	sikkhantā	sikhānā	. . .	to teach.
Mṛichh. 72. .	upavishṭaḥ	ubaviṭṭhā	baiṭhā (?)	. . .	seated.
Cowell, App. A. p. 99. .	kathayati	kahai	kahnā	kathaṇeṁ	to tell.
Śak. 45. 34. Mṛich. 4. 80.	kathaya	kahehi, kadhehi	. . .	. . .
Mṛichh. 80.	kathayishyāmi	kahissam	. . .	. . .
Mṛichh. 36. .	kathayitum	kahidā	kahā	. . .
Mṛichh. 103.	kathyate	kahijjadi	. . .	. . .
Delius, 86. . Vikr. 2. . .	asti	atti, achchi[35]	āchhe (Bengalī.)	āhe	he is.
Mṛichh. 99. .	stha	achchhadha	āchho (Beng.)		ye are.
Lassen, 346. Cowell, 184.	santi	achchanti	āchhen (Beng)		they are.
Sūtra 24. in App. A. . Cowell, 99.	vadati	vollai volai	bolnā	bolaṇeṁ	to speak.
Mṛichh. 105.	brūmaḥ	bollāmo[36]
Delius, 67. . Mṛichh. 169.	labhante	lahanti	lahate, lete	. . .	they receive.

[35] Mr. Childers thinks the forms achchi, etc., cannot be referred to the Sanskrit root as. Asti, he says, became atthi in Pāli, but the Pāli achchhati is, he considers, beyond doubt the present tense of ās, and points to an anomalous form atsati.

[36] This alteration of brūmaḥ into bollāmo may perhaps be conceived to have proceeded by the following steps: barūmaḥ, balūmaḥ, bollāmo. Or it is possible that bol may be an indigenous non-Sanskrit form, or a vernacular root retained in Prākṛit.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	PRĀKṚIT.	HINDĪ.	MAHRATTĪ.	ENGLISH.
Mṛichh. 115.	kshipatu (phel, to go)	pheladu[37]	phelite(Beng.)	. . .	to throw.
Mṛichh. 139.	dūrīkarishyāmi	phelaïssam	. . .	. . .	I shall remove.
Mṛichh. 112.	jāgṛita	jaggetha	jāgnā	jāganeṁ	to wake.
Var. vii. 7.	gataḥ	ga'o	gayā	. . .	gone.
Var. vii. 1. and ii. 24.	paṭhati	paḍhaï	paḍhnā	paḍhaṇeṁ	to read.
Mṛichh. 121. Var. viii. 51.	paṭāmi	paḍemi / paḍāmi	paḍnā	paḍaneṁ	to fall.
Delius, 51.	patitaḥ	paḍido	paḍā	. . .	fallen.
Mṛichh. 120. Delius, p. 22.	uḍḍayaṇte[38]	uḍḍenti / uḍḍa'enti	uḍnā		to fly.
Mṛichh. 124.	paridhāsye	pahiliïssam	paharnā	pāndharaneṁ	to put on (clothing).
Mṛichh. 71.	pibanti	pianti	pīnā	piṇeṁ	to drink.
Delius, 77.	jīvāmi	jīāmi	jīnā	. . .	to live.
Mṛichh. 170.	jīvantam	jīantam	. . .
Mṛichh. 165.	nishkāśaya	ṇikkālehi	nikāsnā / nikālnā	. . .	to put out.
Var. viii. 44 Vik. 11. Del. 60. Kram. 10	varddhate, varddhatām	vaḍḍhadi / vaḍḍhadu	baḍhnā	wāḍhaṇeṁ	to increase.
Vikr. 44.	tvarayasva	turavāvehi	turant (quickly.)	. . .	hasten.
Var. viii. 4.	tvarate	tuvara'i	. . .	. . .	he hastens.
S'ak. 43. 168 Vikr. 91. Delius, 79. Hemachandra, Cowell. 173. note.	paśyāmi / dṛiśyāmi[39]	dekkhāmi[40]	dekhnā	dekhaṇeṁ	to see.
	darśaya	dekhāvahi	dikhānā	dākhaviṇeṁ	to cause to see.
Var. viii. 48.	yudhyate	jujjhaï	jūjhnā	junjhaṇeṁ	to fight: be killed.
Var. viii. 48.	budhyate	bujjhaï	būjhnā	bujhaṇeṁ	to understand.
Var. viii. 25. 26, Mṛich. 73	dhyai	jhā, sanjhāadi	samajhnā (?)	samajaṇeṁ	to meditate, understand.
Kram. 28. in Delius, p. 10.	krudh	kujjh	. . .	. . .	to be angry.
Var. viii. 46.	rushyati	rūsa'i	risiyānā	. . .	to be angry.
Var. viii. 50.	mṛidnāti	mala'i[41]	malnā	. . .	to grind, rub.

[37] Perhaps derived from prer, to impel. Comp. pellaṇeṇa and vellaṇeṇa, rendered by preraṇena, in the Bālar., p. 203. Both roots are given in the lexicons.

[38] Prof. Aufrecht draws my attention to the fact that, in the Vedas, the root signifying "to fly" is not ḍī, but dī. See also the intensive form of the verb in dedīyitavai, S'atapatha Brahmaṇa, v. 3, 2, 6, quoted by Böhtlingk and Roth, s.v.

[39] This form may at one time have been in use.

[40] This word occurs on the Lāt of Firoz Shah in the forms dekhati and dekhiye, and in the form dekhāmi in the inscription at Dhauli. See Burnouf, Lotus de la bonne Loi, pp. 666, 669, 671, 676, who supposes dekhati may come from an old form driśyati, he sees. Mr. Childers thinks, however, it must come from the Sanskrit future drakshyate.

[41] See also Kramadīśvara, 39, in Delius, p. 11, where the root mṛid is said to become maṇ in Prākṛit. In Persian also the verb mālīdan means to rub.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	PRĀKṚIT.	HINDĪ.	MAHRATTĪ.	ENGLISH.
Var. viii. 531	sphuṭ	phuṭṭaï, phuḍaï	phūṭnā	phuṭaṇeñ	to split.
Mṛich. 70. 7. Delius, 59.	badḍhyante	bajjhaṅti	bajhnā	. . .	to be bound or caught.
Var. viii. 27.	khād	khā	khānā	khāṇeñ	to eat.
Delius, 29. . Mālavikā, 54.	pārayāmi	pāremi	pārite (Bengalī.)	. . .	to be able Prasaṅna-rāghava, 45	prāghuṇasya prāhuṇasya	pāhuṇassa[42]	pāhun pāhunā	. . .	a guest.
Bālarāmāyaṇa 203.	pakshiṇaḥ	pakkhiṇo	pakherū panchhī	. . .	birds.
Bāl. 290.	kshīra	khīra	khīr		milk.
Bāl. 231. 235.	lahshāḥ	lakkhā	lākh		hundred thousand.
Bāl. 45. 307.	akshi	achchhi akkhi	ānkh		eye
Bāl. 246.	kaksha	kakkha			side.
Bāl. 53. 69. 98	gotra	gotta	got		family, clan.
Bāl. 267.	sūtra	sutta	sūt		thread.
Bāl. 165. 167. 297.	putra, putrī	putta, puttī	put		son, daughter
Bāl. 221.	kārpāsa	kappāsa	kapās		cotton.
Bāl. 142. 178.	karpūra	kappūra	kapūr		camphor.
Bāl. 269. 298.	dharma	dhamma			virtue
Bāl. 294.	darpaṇam	dappaṇam			a mirror.
Bal. 267.	ṇirvāṇa	ṇivvāṇa			extinction.
Bāl. 76. 194.	dugdha	dudḍha	dūdh		milk.
Bāl. 266.	mugdha snigdha	mudhdha siṇidhdha			infatuated. affectionate.
Bāl. 236.	pippala	pīpala	pīpal		pīpal tree.
Bāl. 178. Prasannarāgh.	mishṭā mishṭā	miṭṭhā miṭṭhī	mīṭṭhā		sweet.
Bāl. 270. 278.	oshṭha	uṭhṭha, oṭhṭha	hoṅth		lip.
Bāl. 156. 303.	śvaśureṇa	sasureṇa	sasur		father-in-law
Bāl. 153.	śvaśrū	sāsue	sās		mother-in-law.
Bāl. 158.	śvaśrūṇām	sāsūṇam	sās		Do. gen. pl.
Bāl. 182.	bhrū	bhū	bhauṅ		eyebrow.
Bāl. 168. 176.	snushā	suṇā, susā			daughter-in-law.
Bāl. 34. 179. 234. 245. 364.	śabdaḥ	saddo			sound.
Bāl. 245. 251.	mudgara	mogāra	mogra, mudgar		a mallet.
Bāl. 235.	dhūma	dhūśa	dhūāṅ		smoke.
Bāl. 238.	pādayoḥ	pāesu	pāṅw		at the feet.

[42] The word is translated by atitheḥ in Pandit Govinda Deva's edition. But I find the word prāghuṇa in Wilson's Dictionary in the sense of guest; and Böhtlingk and Roth give both that and another form prāhuṇa. As, however, they do not cite from any very ancient author any passage in which the word is found, and as it is of rare occurrence as compared with atithi, it may perhaps have been imported into Sanskrit from Prākṛit. Pāhuṇa, in the sense of "guest," is, Mr. Childers informs me, a good Pāli word.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	PRĀKṚIT.	HINDĪ.	MAHRATTĪ.	ENGLISH.
Bāl. 142. 292.	pakva	pikka	pakkā		mature.
Pras. 48.	mūrkha	murukha	mūrakh		fool.
Bāl. 49. 93. 270	jhaṭiti	jhatti	jhaṭ		quickly.
Bāl. 246. 270.	śirasā	sireṇa	sir		head.
Bāl. 77.	katham	kīsa	kaisā		how?
Prasan. 36. 44.	katham	kahaṁ
Prasan. 26.	vyāghrasya	vaghghassa	bāgh		a tiger.
Prasan. 84.	stana	tthaṇa, thaṇa	than		female breast, udder.
Bāl. 76. 238.
Bāl. 168.	jihvā	jīhā	jībh		tongue.
Bāl. 276.	kāṁsya	kaṁsa	kāṅs		bell metal.
Var. viii. 6.	ghūrṇat	gholanta	gholnā (to mix with a liquid.)		rolling.
Bāl. 76.
Bāl. 238.	ghūrṇanti	gholanti			roll, move.
Bāl. 246.	ghūrṇati	ghuṇṇadi			turns round.
Bāl. 143.	chūrṇitam	ghullalidam			pounded, crushed.
Mṛichh. 3.	āhūya	saddābia [43]	. . .	. . .	having called, summoned.
Mṛichh. 50.	āhvayāmi	saddābemi	. . .	. . .	I call.
Mṛichh. 54.	āhvaya	saddābehi	. . .	. . .	call (imper.).
Mṛichh. 54. 141.	ājnāpayati	saddābedi	. . .	. . .	he commands, calls.
	āhvayati
Mṛichh. 60.	ākārayishyāmi	saddābaïśśam	. . .	. . .	I shall summon.
Mṛichh. 150.	āhūyate	saddābīadi			he is called.
Mṛich. 6.	spṛishṭvā	chhibia [44]	chhūnā (?) (to touch)	. . .	having touched.
Mṛichh. 35.	ves'yā	gosāmiā [45]			a harlot.

[N.B.—In this and the following list, it will be seen that I have generally given the Hindī and Mahrattī verbs in the infinitive, without reference to the mood or tense of the corresponding word in Prākṛit. The verbs in the Sanskrit column, on the contrary, are always exact renderings of the Prākṛit ones, in tense, number, person, etc.]

[43] This word is, no doubt, as Mr. Childers suggests, from the Sanskrit śabdāpay (see above the alteration of śabda into sadda). The word śabdāpayet occurs in the Rāmāyaṇa, ii. 57, 9, Schlegel's ed., and in ii. 59, 3, of the Bombay ed., where the commentary explains the word by ākārayet, "summon." In Gorresio's ed., ii. 59, 6, the verb āhvayet, having the same sense, is substituted. Forms like śabdāpay are, as Prof. Aufrecht informs me, very common in the later Sanskrit.

[44] A various reading is bibia. Mr. Childers thinks chhibia comes from the Sanskrit chhup, "to touch." This root is given, he tells me, in Clough's list of Pāli verbs in the sense of "to touch;" and the word occurs in the Dhammapada, p. 156, line 1.

[45] This word is, no doubt, derived from gosvāminī, the wife of a Gosvāmin, or Goshain; and I am told by a well-informed friend that the word has got the sense of harlot from the indifferent character of some of these female devotees.

It is thus clear from an examination of the Indian dramas, and of the examples furnished by the grammarians who treat of the dramatic dialects (as illustrated in the preceding comparative table), that the words which we find in Prākṛit are in great part identical with those of Sanskrit, but more or less modified in their forms, and that these modifications are, in numerous instances, intermediate between the original Sanskrit words and the still more corrupted forms which we discover in the languages descended from the Prākṛits, I mean, in the modern vernacular dialects.

But, while the great majority of Prākṛit words can, by the application of proper methods, be traced back to a Sanskrit source, there are some others which refuse to yield to the action of even the most powerful tests which criticism can employ, and successfully assert their claim to an origin independent of classical Sanskrit, and which we must therefore conclude either to belong to the vernacular Āryan speech, or to be of non-Āryan derivation.

Another fact then which is made clear by the examination of the dramatic poems and the Prākṛit grammarians is, that the Prākṛit dialects contain a certain number of words which are not discoverable in classical Sanskrit, but which we also find in the modern vernaculars, such as the roots ḍub, to sink, tharhar (in Hindī tharthar), to tremble, ḍhakk, to cover or shut, and the nouns goṛ, leg, bappa, father, etc.[46] The greater portion of the words of this class, which I have discovered, will be found in the subjoined table. [In the present edition I have added, at the foot of the table, a number of new words, some of which, however, I find, may be derived from Sanskrit, but few of which are discoverable in the modern vernaculars.]

[46] See the Rev. H. Ballantine's paper "On the relation of the Mahrattī to the Sanskrit," in the Journal of the American Oriental Society, vol. iii. p. 369–385. Some of the words considered by Mr. Ballantine to be Mahrattī are, however, Persian or Arabic, such as meḳh, baghal, manzila; others, as khāne, to eat, are Sanskrit. I add the following remarks from Dr. J. Wilson's "Notes on the Constituent Elements," etc., of the Marāthī language (prefixed to Molesworth's Marāthī Dictionary, 2nd edition), p. xxii. [The Marāthī language] "has two distinct lingual elements, the Scythian (or Turanian) and the Sanskrit." . . . "The Scythian element . . is obviously the more ancient of the two, as far as its present locality is concerned. It is still a good deal in use, especially among the lower orders of the people, and in the business of common life. It claims almost all the words beginning with the cerebral letters, which, as initials, were probably not originally in use in the Sanskrit; almost all the words beginning with the letter jh; and a great majority of the words formed from imitative particles, both simple and reduplicated, which are often very expressive, and are not now of an arbitrary character, whatever they might have been before they got established in the Table No. II.

List of Prākṛit words, chiefly from the Mṛichhakaṭī and the grammarians, which are not found in classical Sanskrit, or are of doubtful origin, with their modern vernacular equivalents, when ascertained.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	PRĀKṚIT.	HINDĪ.	MAHRATTĪ.	ENGLISH.
Mṛichh. 119.	pitṛisambandhi	bappa-kelake[47]	bāp ke / bāp karke	bāp	father.
Mṛich. 80. 108	pōdam	goḍam	goḍ	. . .	foot, leg.
Mṛich. 72. 112	udara	poṭa, poṭṭa	peṭ, poṭa	poṭ[48]	belly.
Mṛichh. 35.	puṁśchalī	chhiṇāliā	chhināl	chhināl, sindal	harlot.
Mṛichh. 40.	stambha	khuṇṭa	khoṇṭā	khuṇṭā	peg.
Mṛichh. 31. 36. 167.	manushyaḥ	goho	. . .	goho	man.
Mṛichh. 123. & n., 299.	rasaḥ	lakhaliā	. . .	lakerī[49]	a slight taste.
Mṛichh. 175.	kukkuraḥ	huḍe	. . .	. . .	dog.
Vikr. p. 79.	paśya	ua	. . .	. . .	look.
Mṛichh. 100.	rakshata	johaha[50]	johnā	. . .	to watch : look out for.
Mṛichh. 141.	prakampate	thartaredi[51]	thartharānā	thartharaṇeṁ	to tremble.
Var. viii. 68. & Kram. in Delius, 11.	majjati	vuṭṭāi, vuttaï, khuppaï	būḍna	buḍaṇeṁ	to sink.
Mṛich. 162. 317	majjantam	ḍubbantam	ḍūbnā	ḍūbaṇeṁ
Mṛichh. 36. 79. 164. Prab. 58.	pidhehi / pidhatta / pihitam	ḍhakkehi[52], ḍhakkēḍha / ḍhakkide	ḍhaknā	ḍhānkaṇ (a lid or cover) / jhānkaṇeṁ (to cover)	to cover or shut.

usus loquendi of the people by whom they were originally formed." . . . "The Sanskrit element is that which predominates in the Marāthī, as the inspection of the Dictionary at once shows." . . "Colebrooke expresses it as his opinion that 'nine-tenths of the Hindī dialect may be traced back to the Sanskrit;' and perhaps a similar observation may be justly made as to the proportion of Sanskrit words in the Marāthī, when both primitive and modified forms are taken into the account."

[47] About the affix, kelake or kerake, see Lassen, p. 118.

[48] In Molesworth's Mahrattī Dictionary, this word is set down as derived from the Sanskrit peṭa; but the only sense assigned to this word in Wilson's Sanskrit Dictionary is that of basket.

[49] Stenzler's Mṛichhakaṭī, p. 299.

[50] In Wilson's Sanskrit Dictionary the word jongaṭa is given as a noun, with the sense of "longing for;" which may possibly be connected with this word.

[51] Prof. Benfey, in his review of the first edition of this volume, in the "Gött. Gel. Anzeigen" for January 23rd, 1861, p. 132, considers this root to be connected with the Sanskrit tarala, "trembling," and the participle tarturāṇa (from the root tur), which occurs in Rig Veda, ix. 95, 3, where it has, according to Böhtlingk and Roth's Lexicon, the sense of "rushing forward."

[52] Wilson and Böhtlingk and Roth give a root dhakk, with the signification to

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	PRĀKṚIT.	HINDĪ.	MAHRATTĪ.	ENGLISH.
Mṛich. 118. 95.	kārayishyā-mi / kāraya	ghaḍāba-iśśam / ghaḍābehi [53]	ghaḍnā	ghaḍaṇeṁ	to fabricate.
Mṛichh. 122.	karshāmi	vaḍḍhāmi	. . .	oḍhaṇeṁ	to draw. (Stenz. 298.)
Kramad. in Delius;	nishad	numajj [54]	. . .	. . .	to sit.
	piv	ghoṭṭ	ghūnṭnā	ghoṭaṇeṁ	to drink, gulp
	khip	vijj	. . .	. . .	to throw.
Var. viii. 64.	krudh	jur [55]	. . .	. . .	to be angry.
Var. viii. 66.	trasyati	vajjaï	. . .	. . .	to be afraid.
Var. viii. 28. Delius, p. 6.	gras	vis, ghis [56]	. . .	. . .	to eat.
Var. viii. 20.	ghrā	pā	. . .	. . .	to smell.
Var. viii. 67.	mṛij	lubh, sup	. . .	. . .	to cleanse.
Var. viii. 69.	dṛiś	pulaa	. . .	. . .	to see.
Prasanna-rāghava, 11.13.113. 115.	vilokayan	pulovanto	. . .	. . .	seeing.
	vilokaya	pulovehi	. . .	. . .	see.
Var. viii. 70.	śak	tar, vaa, tīr	. . .	. . .	to be able.
Mṛichh. 21.	sphoṭayish-yāmi	maḍamaḍā-iśśam			I shall split. [57]

"destroy;" but the dh is the dental, not the cerebral, letter. I have withdrawn from the table the word kāṇelī, as it is found in Sanskrit as well as Prākṛit sentences in the Mṛichhakaṭī.

[53] This may come from the Sanskrit root ghaṭ, "to act."

[54] Delius, p. 12, thinks that these roots may have been disused in Sanskrit.

[55] Prof. Benfey, in the review above quoted, regards this word as connected with the Sanskrit root jvar, and the adjective jvara, "excited," "in a passion."

[56] See Mr. Cowell's note 5, on p. 73, where he supposes that Delius's reading ghis is probably incorrect. In his Index, p. 262, however, Mr. Cowell places a mark of interrogation after visaï.

[57] While this table is passing through the press, I have been favoured with the following remarks on some of the words by Mr. R. C. Childers. "Bappa, Báp—In Siṁhalese Appá is 'father,' and Báppá 'uncle.' The latter word is a corruption of bála-appá, as is shown by the corresponding Bálamma, 'aunt.'—Poṭa, Peṭ—I think this may well be the Sanskrit Peṭa, compare the various meanings of Koshṭha. The Italian for a man's head is testa, properly an earthen pot. It is singular that the Siṁhalese for 'belly' is Baḍa, which, however, cannot be peṭa; it would rather represent bhaṇḍa, but I am very doubtful about its etymology.—Chhiṇáliá—Clough, in the Siṁhalese dictionary, gives under Chhinna, the meaning 'harlot.' Could náli be the Sanskrit náṛí?—Ua, 'look,'—I do not know how this word is used, but might it not be simply an interjection?—Ḍhakkhehi,—The Sanskrit root 'Stag' is Thak in Páli (thaketi 'he covers,' thakanaṁ, 'a covering'). But Clough gives 'concealment' as one of the meanings of ḍhakka.—Ghaḍábaiśśam—This must be a causative of 'ghaṭ': Ghaṭápeti, 'he fabricates,' occurs in Páli (see D'Alwis Intr. p. 35).—Vaḍḍhámi, 'to draw,'—Compare Turnour's Mahávaṁsa, p. 160, line 1 and erratum, Kuntaṁ vaḍḍhetha bho, 'pull up the lance,' which seems to have been stuck in the ground (see previous page).—Vijj, 'to throw,'—Could this be 'vyadh'? The present tense in Páli is vijjhati.—Vajjai, 'to fear,'—Could this be 'vṛij' (Páli vajjati), in the sense of 'to shrink from'?—Pul, 'to see'—This must be the Siṁhalese bala-navá 'to see,' the etymology of which I have not succeeded in tracing."

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	PRĀKṚIT.	HINDĪ.	MAHRATTĪ.	ENGLISH.
Mṛichh. 17.	bhakta	chhalli[58]			boiled rice.
Mṛichh. 43.	śasya-lampaṭa	śaśśa-palakka			a rioter in grain (spoken of an ox).
Mṛichh. 101. 159.	chintāparaḥ chintāyuktaḥ	tattilo (or tantilo), tattilā			anxious.
Mṛichh. 127.	bāle	vāśū	. . .	. . .	O young female!
Mṛichh. 134.	kshālayiṣhyāmi,	gīlāśśam[59]	. . .	. . .	I shall wash.
Bāl. 65f. 74 240.	kānti	riṅcholī	. . .	. . .	brilliante.
Bāl. 194.	pankti	rʼcholī	. . .	. . .	a row.
Bāl. 86.	gaja	doghaṭṭa	. . .	. . .	an elephant.
Bāl. 195. 264.	śukti	sīppi	sīp, sīpī	. . .	a shell.
Bāl. 249.	trasta	chamakanta[60]	chamaknā (to glitter, start)	. . .	alarmed.
Bāl. 240.	miśrita	kallabida	. . .	. . .	mixed.
Bāl. 264.	patita	paloṭṭa	. . .	. . .	fallen.
Bāl. 198.	samūhāḥ	kaḍappā	. . .	. . .	assemblages.
Bāl. 203.	śreshṭha	garilla[61]	. . .	. . .	most excellent.
Bāl. 243.	nartakī	taraṭhṭhī	. . .	. . .	a dancing girl.
Bāl. 251.	chūrṇita	chuspania	. . .	. . .	pounded.
Bāl. 276.	miśram	vidurillam	. . .	. . .	mingled.
Bāl. 246.	sparśaiḥ	jhaḍappehiṁ	. . .	. . .	contacts.
Bāl. 246.	ḍutkāraiḥ ḍutkurutaḥ	ḍukkarehim ḍukkanti	ṭhokaron se ṭhonkte?	. . .	they beat with blows?
Bāl. 259.	lalāṭa	niḍola[62]	. . .	. . .	forehead.
Bāl. 198.	śobhita	changoṭhṭhia	. . .	. . .	beautified.

[N.B.—See other non-Sanskrit roots, or roots of doubtful origin, used in Prākṛit, in Vararuchi, viii. 18, 21, 23, 34, 35, 39, 40.]

[58] Wilson gives challi, with the sense of "rind," "bark."

[59] Here the ksh of the Sanskrit may be changed into g. The Pāli form, Mr. Childers tells me, is khālayissāmi, which he thinks may supply a link between the two words in the Table. But the Bālarāmāyaṇa, p. 48, has pakkhālaṇa for the Sanskrit prakshālana and the Prasannarāghava, p. 124, has chchhālaa for the Sanskrit kshālaya.

[60] The word also occurs in p. 243 of the same drama, in the forms chamakkanta and chamakkidą, where it is explained in the commentary by chamakṛita, "astonished."

[61] This may possibly be a mistake of the copyist for gariṭhṭha (garishṭha), which occurs in page 224.

[62] Mr. Childers suggests that niḍola is probably only an altered form of lalāṭa, as in Pāli naḷāta is a more common form than lalāṭa, while metathesis would account for the most important remaining variation.

[63] The Sanskrit lexicons have changa in the sense of beautiful; but from what the latter part of the word is derived, I do not see.

It is true that these vernacular words, occurring in the dramas, are few in number; that many vocables, very unlike the Sanskrit, which seem, on a hasty inspection, to be of a different origin, are discovered, on a more careful examination, to be derived from that language by successive steps proceeding according to certain recognized rules of mutation; and that the words, not deducible from the written Sanskrit, which remain, do not bear so large a proportion to those which are of Sanskrit origin, as is the case in the modern vernaculars.[64] This paucity of such words in the dramas is, perhaps, to be accounted for by the fact that they are polished compositions containing many poetical passages, and were written by Pandits, men familiar with Sanskrit, who would be likely, when they could, to avoid vulgar words and phrases, and to employ vocables of Sanskrit derivation, wherever it was found possible: just as we see the pedantic Pandits of our own time are in the habit of doing.[65] And there can be no doubt that in the provincial dialects, as spoken by the lower classes and by unlearned persons in general at the time when the dramas were composed, many more non-Sanskrit words would be current than we meet with in the dramas. In the same way we find in modern times several modifications of language in use among different sections of the community in the same provinces of Hindustan. The Hindu Pandits, for instance, use a dialect which is full of Sanskrit words; the villagers use fewer Sanskrit and more indigenous words; the lower Mahomedans use a language approaching to that of the Hindu villagers, but with more Persian and Arabic words; while educated Mahomedans introduce into their discourse a large number of Arabic and Persian words and phrases. But the existence of even a small proportion of such non-Sanskrit words

[64] Lassen remarks, p. 286: "The roots of the Prākṛits must be looked for in Sanskrit; and the few words which appear to be of extraneous origin can, for the most part, be traced to Sanskrit, if the investigation is pursued on right principles. At the same time I would not entirely deny that some vocables may have passed from the indigenous languages of India into the Sanskrit as well as the Prākṛit; but such words are certainly not numerous." Lassen may not underrate here the number of purely indigenous words in the Prākṛits, as they are exhibited in the dramas, but his remarks are not certainly correct if applied to the modern vernaculars, in which words not derived from Sanskrit, and which must have come down to them from the vernacular Prākṛits, are very numerous.

[65] Compare the case of English, like that of Dr. Samuel Johnson, full of Latin and Greek derivatives, with other compositions in which Anglo-Saxon predominates.

in the dramas, when taken in conjunction with the corrupted form,—akin to that of the modern vernaculars,—in which we find Sanskrit words employed there, appears sufficient to show that the Prākṛits, such as we see them in the dramas, were, in a more or less modified form, the spoken dialects of their day; and were consequently the precursors of the modern vernacular tongues. As we find in these latter a considerable proportion of words which cannot be traced back to classical Sanskṛit, we are led to conclude that these words must have existed in the older vernacular dialects, and have been transmitted from them to the later. The only alternative is that we suppose these non-Sanskṛit words to have been invented in modern times, a supposition which is destitute of all probability.[66]

The question, already proposed in p. 7, now recurs, Whence came these words which are met with in the Prākṛit dialects and the still larger number discoverable in the modern vernacular tongues, which are not found in classical Sanskrit? In answer to this question two suppositions have been already made. It has been suggested, p. 7, that these words are either (1) colloquial vocables of Āryan origin (a view which is adopted by Mr. Beames in the passage quoted in p. 8), or (2) that they have been borrowed from the language of non-Āryan tribes with which the Āryans came into contact. For I must here anticipate an assertion which I hope further on to prove more in detail, viz., that there are in India very manifest traces of a variety of races of men differing widely in their origin.

It appears that the ancestors of the higher classes of northern Hindus, who originally spoke Sanskrit and called themselves Āryas, must have had their origin in countries to the north or west of India, and immigrated into Hindustan at an early period. When they arrived there, they found the country already occupied by a race of men called in the Veda and Mahābharata, Dasyus, who spoke a different language from themselves, and with whom they became engaged in continual [66] Even if it were to be admitted that the Pāli and the scenic dialects were never identical with the spoken vernaculars, this would not neutralize my argument. For the Prākṛits must have been used on the stage, and must therefore have been understood. They could not, however, have been intelligible, if they had not approached closely to some form of spoken language. And the existence of the Pāli, as well as of the Prākṛits, shows both the general tendency of men to break down and modify their languages, and the actual process by which they proceeded in northern India.

warfare. These Dasyus appear to have been partly driven away by the Āryas to the east and south and north, where they took refuge in the forests and mountains, and partly to have been subdued and to have become incorporated in the Āryan communities as their slaves or dependents. Though these earlier inhabitants of India also had, in all probability, immigrated into that country at some period anterior to the invasion of the Āryas, I shall, for the sake of ready distinction, style them the aborigines. These aboriginal tribes may not have been all of one race, and may have arrived in India at different times, but their history is very obscure, and can only be conjectured. So much is clear, that their languages are not all alike. In the south of India we find still existing a set of spoken languages called Tamil, Telugu, Canarese, Malayalim, etc., which differ very widely from the vernacular tongues of northern India, viz., the Mahrattī, Hindī, Bengalī, etc. Though the southern languages have now a certain intermixture of Sanskrit words, yet it is clear that this intermixture is only of comparatively recent date, as those languages differ entirely both in structure and in the great bulk of the words of which they are composed from the Sanskrit, and all its derivative languages. The dialects of northern and central India, on the other hand, viz., the Mahrattī, Hindī, Bengalī, etc., are, as we have already seen, mainly derived from classical Sanskrit, though they contain a considerable proportion of words which are evidently of a different origin. These words of non-Sanskrit origin, which we first discover, to a certain extent, in the ancient Prākṛits, and which descended from them to the northern vernaculars, must (1) either have formed a part of the colloquial speech of the Āryas, which did not pass into their literary language; or (2) they have been derived from the language spoken by the aborigines, who had occupied the south as well as north of India before the Sanskrit-speaking race of the Āryas arrived; or (3) they most probably came partly from the one and partly from the other of these sources. Assuming that they spring in part, at least, from a non-Āryan source, we may suppose some such linguistic process as the following to have taken place. After the northern aborigines had been reduced to dependence by the Āryas, and both classes, Āryan and non-Āryan, had coalesced in one community (of which the former composed the upper, and the latter the lower ranks), the languages of both classes (which had previously been different) would begin to become assimilated and amalgamated; the Sanskrit-speaking Āryas would soon adopt many words belonging to the speech of the aborigines, while the aboriginal race would begin to borrow many words from the Sanskrit, the language of their masters. This process, however, would naturally lead to a great corruption and alteration of the Sanskrit. Many of the compound consonantal sounds in Sanskrit words, such as those in strī, rakta, kshatriya, seem to have been found such as the lower orders of people found it difficult to pronounce, and these compound sounds became accordingly broken up or simplified, or in some way modified. Thus strī became istrī, rakta became ratta or rakat, and kshatriya became khatriya, khattia, or chhatriya. In this manner both languages would become gradually changed, according to processes which are seen in operation in all countries. Caprice, alteration of physical circumstances, differences of education, and those varieties in the organs of speech which are peculiar to different races,—are all found to produce progressive modifications in language. Various forms of Prākṛit would spring up by degrees in different provinces, in which Sanskrit and aboriginal words and forms would be combined, though the more cultivated element, the Sanskrit, has, in either a pure or a modified shape, remained predominant. At the same time the Sanskrit language gradually ceased to be spoken in its then existing form, and becoming the language of books, and of the learned class exclusively, was more and more polished and settled by grammarians; and being exempted from the ordinary causes of alteration, continued thenceforward unchanged: just as was the case with the Latin language. It seems, at the same time, to be very probable that many words of indigenous origin, as well as words which, though of Sanskrit origin, had been modified in the Prākṛits, were incorporated in the Sanskrit; and that in this way the modern vocabulary of that language includes many words and roots which were unknown to it at an earlier period.[67]

[67] Dr. Stevenson says, in the Journal of the Bombay Branch Royal As. Society, for January, 1859: "The Brahmans scattered through all the different provinces of Hindusthan no doubt adopted many of the words of the languages of the tribes among whom they resided, and introduced them into the sacred tongue." Professor Benfey has drawn attention to the introduction into Sanskrit of words which had become modified in the Prākṛits. See Lassen, Ind. Alt. ii. 1149, note 2; and

SECT. III.—On the origin and vernacular use of the Scenic Dialects.

It has been doubted, however, whether the dramatic dialects were ever spoken languages. This view is thrown out as the most likely by Prof. H. H. Wilson in the introduction to his "Select Specimens of the Theatre of the Hindus," pp. lxv, lxvi.

"There is one question of some interest attaching to our construction of the Prakrit, which merits a fuller inquiry than has been yet given to it, and on which this is not the place to dilate. Does it represent a dialect that was ever spoken, or is it an artificial modification of the Sanskrit language, devised to adapt the latter to peculiar branches of literature? The latter seems to be the most likely; for there would be no difficulty in the present day in writing it, although it is no longer spoken, and highly finished specimens are to be found in plays which are modern productions. The Vidagdha Mādhava, for instance, consists more than half of high Prakrit, and it was written less than three centuries ago. On the other hand, many of the modifications are to be found in the spoken dialects of Hindusthan, and the rules of Prakrit grammar account for changes which, without such aid, it is difficult to comprehend. The simplification of the grammatical construction by the disuse of the dual number, and the reduced number of verbal conjugations, looks also like the spontaneous substitution of practical to theoretic perfection in actual speech, and may tempt us to think the Prakrit was once a spoken tongue. The subject

Benfey, article "Indien" (in Ersch and Gruber's Encycl.), p. 248. A paper on "The Dravidian elements in Sanskrit," by Dr. H. Gundert, has lately appeared in the Journal of the German Oriental Society for 1869, pp. 517 ff. The author remarks: "It was to be expected à priori that a number of Dravidian words must have found their way into Sanskrit. How, further, could the Aryan people have spread itself over the whole of India, without adopting very much from the aboriginal population which they found there, and which has submitted to them partly in a peaceable manner, and partly under compulsion, and yet even to this day only imperfectly?" And in opposition to the Brahmanical grammarians who would derive such words from Aryan roots, or declare Dravidian roots to be Sanskrit, the writer appeals to the nature of the case, and urges that: "where peoples speaking different languages live in constant mutual intercourse, traffic or fight with one another, suffer and enjoy together, they take over much from each other without examination or scrutiny; and this process must have gone on in the earliest times, when their mutual relations were still of a naïf character. We thus expect à priori that as the Aryans penetrated southwards, they would become acquainted with new objects under Dravidian appellations, and with them adopt their names."

is interesting, not only in a philological, but in a historical view; for the sacred dialects of the Bauddhas and the Jainas are nothing else than Prakrit, and the period and circumstances of its transfer to Ceylon and to Nepal are connected with the rise and progress of that religion which is professed by the principal nations to the north and east of Hindusthan."

Mr. Beames expresses himself still more strongly in the same sense: "In fact, there is much that requires clearing up in the relation between the Saurasenî, Braj, and the Modern Hindî dialects, and until we know more of the colloquial forms of early Prakrit, the mist cannot be dispelled. The Prakrit of the poets is clearly not a dialect that ever was spoken. How far it represents the characteristics of any spoken dialect is a question."—(Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society for 1868, p. 498.)

To support the view which has been already expressed of the relation of the modern vernaculars to certain pre-existing Prākṛit, i.e. vernacular dialects, it is not necessary to assume that the dramatic Prākṛits are identical with the spoken Prākṛits which existed at or anterior to the periods when the former were used for poetical purposes. In fact, it is clear from what Prof. Wilson says of the composition of dramas within the last few centuries, when the older Prākṛits had been superseded by the existing vernaculars, that the Prākṛits of the dramas have continued to be employed as the traditional dramatic language for females and for the lower classes long after these Prākṛits have, on any supposition, become obsolete. But it is possible that when they were originally so used they may have been identical with some contemporaneous vernaculars. It is, however, sufficient for my purpose to assume that the dramatic dialects were at one period closely akin to some contemporaneous vernaculars. This appears to be sufficiently established by the lists of words which I have given above, and which show that the modern vernaculars have naturally sprung out of forms of speech either identical with or akin to the dramatic Prākṛits. The same point is also proved by the relation in which, as we shall see, the latter stand to the Pāli.

I shall now introduce a quotation from Professor Lassen, who, in his Institutiones Linguæ Pracriticæ, pp. 39, ff., adopts the opposite side of the question from Prof. Wilson and Mr. Beames. His remarks will also be found to illustrate the process by which the Prākṛits arose out of Sanskrit.

"If the question regarding the origin of these dialects merely refer to the source whence they are derived, it admits of a very easy answer: for, as has been already stated, all the scenic dialects are drawn entirely from the Sanskrit.[68] If, however, the question means by what process these dialects have been drawn from the Sanskrit, it will be more difficult to answer. The difficulty does not consist in these languages containing any forms or words of which the Sanskrit archetypes are undiscoverable: for, on the contrary, both forms and words are deduced from that ancient source by undergoing certain mutations which all languages follow as they become altered and corrupted in the course of time; as, for example, has been the case with all the Germanic and Romanic dialects which have sprung from the Gothic and the Latin.

"The difficulty, however, consists in this, that these dramatic dialects, sprung from the Sanskrit, and bearing the names of different provinces, are different from the provincial languages which have the same name and origin; e.g. the principal Prakrit (which appears to have been called Mahārāshṭrī) differs from the modern Mahrattī, and the Saurasenī from the Brajbhākhā. Hence a doubt has been suggested whether the dramatic dialects were formerly the spoken tongues of the people of the several provinces, who at present use a form of speech which, though cognate, is yet different; or whether these dramatic dialects are anything more than artificial adaptations, either of Sanskrit, or of the provincial tongues, to dramatic purposes. The latter opinion has appeared to Wilson the most probable, for this reason, that the modern dialects of the Mahratta country, of Mathurā, and Behar, are different from those which were employed on the stage under the same names. He assigns another reason, viz., that these dramatic dialects can be composed even now. But is not the case precisely the same with the Sanskṛit or the Latin? both of which can in our day be written by men who are skilled in them, though they have long ceased to be used in daily life, or to be spoken, except by a few scholars. Wilson's first reason is equally inconclusive: for, to use what I may call an argumentum ad hominem, the learned Professor would scarcely succeed in making himself understood, if he were to address his countrymen in the Anglo-Saxon tongue. His argument would, indeed, be sound, if it could be proved that in the age when the dramatic dialects were first brought upon the stage, the Mahārāshṭrī, or any other form of contemporaneous speech, was different from the dialect introduced into the dramas under the same name. For it must be recollected that succeeding dramatic poets, following the example of their predecessors, did not change the dramatic varieties of speech, but retained them in their original forms; whilst, on the other hand, the popular dialects continued to undergo great alterations, as is the fate of all languages which are subjected to the wear and tear of constant use. These scenic dialects can be taught even now by grammatical tuition, just as the Sanskrit can, though neither the one nor the other can be learned by the Indians from a nurse. All change in the scenic dialects was guarded against (just as in the case of the Sanskrit) from the period when their forms and laws had been fixed by grammarians; and, consequently, the argument drawn from the diversity of the dramatic and modern provincial dialects is of no force, unless it can be shown that the provincial dialects also have remained unchanged, from the commencement to the present day. This, however, can neither be shown, nor was it possible. On the other hand, the existing condition of the provincial dialects cannot be explained unless we suppose them to have had another form, more ancient than the present, and more conformable to the Sanskrit.

[68] See, however, what has been said on this subject above, in pp. 26, ff.

"Since, then, it cannot be proved that the provincial dialects were originally different from the scenic, I shall add some arguments by which it will be made probable that the latter (the scenic) were actually current in the provinces from which they derived their names. And, first, I shall make use of the names themselves as an argument: for the names Mahārāshṭrī, Śaurasenī, would be absurd if they were not referred to provincial dialects; seeing that the names cannot be deduced from any orders of men so called, nor from any peculiarities in those dialects. The same may be said of the Māgadhī, for though I am aware that the word Māgadha denotes an order of bards, still the Māgadhī dialect is employed on the stage by other classes of men, and the bards themselves derive their appellation from the province which gave its name to the dialect.

"In the next place, I argue that the nature of dramatic poetry renders it scarcely credible that dramas composed in a language different from that of common life should have been exhibited on the stage. This, however, is a different matter from the supposition that the dramatic dialects have subsequently ceased to be spoken, and have become obsolete, while yet they maintained their place on the stage. The same thing holds good of the employment of Sanskrit itself in dramas written in a comparatively modern period.

"If these considerations be duly weighed, it appears to follow that the use of different dialects on the stage was the result of a peculiar condition of Indian life, at the time when the laws of dramatic art were first fixed by the Indian poets.

"To these arguments it must be added that there is so close an affinity between the primary dramatic dialect and the Pali, as to leave scarcely any doubt of their being originally identical. So much is undoubted that the sacred language of the Jains is not different from the primary Prakrit. This language would certainly not have been adopted by the adherents of a sect which is strongly opposed to the Brahmans and their opinions, if the dramatic dialect had had no other foundation than the fertile and subtle genius of the Brahmans. The Jains could, however, have no difficulty in appropriating it to their own uses, if it was the language of daily life. How it happened that the Mahārāshṭrī dialect in particular came to be selected both by the dramatic poets and by the Jains, is a point to be explained from the history of the Indian stage, and of the Buddhist religion, out of which the sect of the Jains sprang. To attempt this here would be out of place.

"The primary argument, however, is to be drawn from the structure of the languages themselves. This structure is the same, as regards principles and general rules, in all the provincial languages of Sanskrit origin, while it is different (though very similar), if the individual forms and the elements of these be regarded. I shall therefore do sufficient justice to the plan I have in view, if I examine more minutely some of these languages, and show what their grammatical character is. In doing so, however, I am prevented by the limits of my book from exhibiting their entire grammar, nor would it better serve the end I have in view if I were to do so. I propose, therefore, to inquire into the scheme of declensions peculiar to these languages, which follows the same analogy as the laws of conjugation. I pass over the permutations of sounds, which are too various to be treated here; nor, if I did treat them, would it conduce to my object, which is so to describe the structure of the provincial dialects as to exhibit the differences between them and the dramatic languages. For the changes in their elements undergone by the Sanskrit words which have been received into the modern dialects, follow two very different laws, which, if not carefully distinguished, might be used to demonstrate contrary conclusions. One sort of mutation prevails in those words which had been received into the provincial dialects which were anciently formed, or rather corrupted, from the Sanskrit; such as the Brajbhākhā 'pōthī,' a book, which in Prakrit is 'pōthaō,' and in Sanskrit 'pustaka,' and numerous others, which would lead us to conclude that the same changes in the elements of words have taken place in the modern vernaculars as in the dramatic dialects; and that the forms of words in the former are derived from, and find their explanation in, the latter. This I by no means deny. But there is another kind of words to be found in the modern dialects, which come nearer to the original Sanskrit words than do the forms used in the dramatic Prakrits. The following are some examples from the Brajbhākhā, Panjābī, Mahrattī, and Bengālī:

	Brajbhākhā.	Panjābī.	Mahrattī.	Bengālī.
	Putra,[69] Putrī	Prakās	Kartā, Pruthuwī	Dīp, Pṛithivī.
Prakrit	Putta, Puttī	Pakāsa	Kattā, Puhavī	Dība, Puhavī.
Sanskrit	Putra, Putrī	Prakāśa	Kartā, Pṛithivī	Dīpa, Pṛithivī.

"To these might be added numerous other instances. And if such words alone were regarded, it would not be absurd to conclude that the modern dialects retain a greater number of Sanskrit words in their genuine form than the Prakrits do. But this would be an unsound conclusion; for the modern vernaculars, especially when spoken by men who are learned in Sanskrit, and as they are seen in books written by such persons (from which the manuals, grammars, and lexicons of such dialects which we use, have been derived), are continually recurring to their sacred and ancient source (the Sanskrit), not only when they want words expressive of recondite ideas, and required for elegance of diction, but also when the vernacular form of the word is more corrupt than learned men would wish to introduce into their writings. Hence it happens that twofold forms of the same Sanskrit words are found in the same provincial language, one more Sanskrit, the other Prakrit; for the parent Sanskrit has never ceased to exercise an influence on the vernacular dialects of India, just as the Latin does on the Romanic tongues; while, on the other hand, the Sanskrit has exercised no influence on the forms of the dramatic dialects from the period when the dramatic poets, and the grammarians following their guidance, had assigned to these dialects certain fixed forms. It has hence resulted that these dramatic dialects have undergone no change whatever, and are just the same in dramas composed within the last three centuries as in the far more ancient Mṛichḥakaṭī. For the language of the stage is continually borrowing Sanskrit words, but alters and inflects them according to rules peculiar to itself; the vernacular dialects, on the other hand, continue similarly to borrow words from the Sanskrit, but leave them unaltered,[70] while those words which they had long ago adopted had been altered according to natural laws common to them with the Prakrits. In this way the occurrence of pure Sanskrit words in the vernaculars, such as, e.g. tīkshṇa, tiraskṛita, in the Bengalī, is to be explained."—Pp. 39-45.

[69 Put, son, is, however, also used in this dialect, as in the phrase, bāp put, father and son.—J.M.]

Professor Lassen then proceeds to examine the forms of declension employed in some of the modern vernaculars. He then goes on to remark as follows:—

[In the modern vernaculars] "we find the structure of the Sanskrit and Prakit declension quite destroyed, the same inflexions applied to the singular and the plural, and a new difference introduced in certain declensions between the direct and the oblique cases. This proves that the provincial declensions are of a later date than those of the dialects used in the dramas, which are derived from the Sanskrit by certain fixed rules, and involve only a few innovations. In the provincial inflections there remain, indeed, some traces, partly distinct, partly somewhat obscured, of Sanskrit and Prakrit declension; but in other points there are great innovations which reveal to us a total dissolution of the old grammatical structure, and its reconstruction by means of new instruments.

[70] It is also to be observed, that many of the Sanskrit words which have been borrowed and modified in the Pāli and Prākṛit are, in the modern dialects, replaced, as far as the common people are concerned, by words of aboriginal, or, at least, colloquial, origin; such as beṭā, instead of putra, for son; while words like the latter are used chiefly by Brahmans, and other high-caste persons.—J.M.]

"As this state of things is perceptible in the whole grammar of the provincial dialects which owe their origin to the Sanskrit, I conclude that they are of later origin than the scenic dialects. Between the Sanskrit language and its existing daughters [the modern vernaculars], there is so great a diversity of grammatical structure as to make it certain that the pristine language cannot have sunk by one fall, so to speak, into that condition in which we find the provincial dialects. It follows of necessity that there must have been an intermediate condition between the pristine and the modern speech. This intermediate condition was no doubt very various, and approached at first more nearly to the Sanskrit, and subsequently to the provincial tongues.

"If we except the Pali [and, I would add, the Gāthā dialect in the Buddhist books, J.M.], the earliest form of the Sanskrit after it began to degenerate and to alter its character is that which we find in the dramas; from which dramatic dialect, therefore, we are to suppose that the first mutation of the Sanskrit, which eventually gave rise to the modern vernaculars, was not very different. I contend that, though not identical, this earliest corruption of Sanskrit was very similar to that which we find in the dramas. If this opinion be correct, there is nothing to prevent our believing that the scenic dialects were formerly the current speech of the different provinces. The names which these scenic dialects have received from the grammarians, and the conditions of dramatic poetry, lead us to the same conclusion.

"Here, however, I conceive I must stop, for I could not adduce detailed arguments to prove this opinion without examining the whole field, both of the scenic and the provincial dialects. I think, however, that I ought distinctly to add that I should not be disposed to dissent from any one who should assert that the scenic dialects were not exactly the pure forms of speech which were contemporaneously current in the different provinces, but were a little modified, so as better to harmonise with the character of the persons who were to employ them. The principal argument for this conclusion is that two forms are sometimes found to occur in the dramatic dialects, one having a close resemblance to the provincial language, and another which is softer and, so to speak, more feminine.

"To bring this disquisition to a close: there are two families of degenerate Sanskrit extant; the first more ancient, and not much corrupted, to which class the Pali and the scenic dialects belong; the second of more recent origin, and dispersed at the present day over the [northern] provinces of India, which is more diverse from the parent language. The members of the former family are daughters of the Sanskrit; those of the latter are its granddaughters, though it is in some degree doubtful whether they are daughters of the first family or granddaughters descended from sisters. As regards the age of these two classes, it is proved by the history of the Buddhist religion, and of the Indian stage, that the former arose prior to the commencement of the Christian era; while it can be made out with considerable probability that the latter (i.e. the modern provincial vernaculars) were formed before the year 1000 of the Christian era." —Pp. 57–60.

I subjoin some further remarks on the distinction between the older Prākṛits and the modern vernaculars, from the Indische Alterthumskunde of the same author, Vol. ii. pp. 1149, 1150.

"We must draw a distinct line of demarcation between the Indian languages of the middle age (under which denomination we may fittingly class the Pali, the languages of the dramas, and those employed in the oldest inscriptions) and the new Indian, or existing vernacular dialects. The former had not, so to speak, crossed the Rubicon, nor entirely renounced obedience to the laws of their mother-language. They conform, it is true, but little to the ancient phonetic laws, and are regulated for the most part by such as are of a later date; but their grammatical forms, though corrupted and stunted, are inherited immediately from their parent. The modern dialects of India, on the other hand, have almost entirely ceased to obey the phonetic rules of the Sanskrit. They conform in part to the phonetic laws of the Prakrit dialects, but in addition to these the modern dialects have peculiar phonetic laws of their own, and their words, when not borrowed immediately from the Sanskrit to enlarge their vocabulary, often manifest more extreme contractions, and greater deviations from the original words, than do the corresponding words in the Prakrit. The grammatical forms of the modern dialects are, with rare exceptions, newly constructed; for the case-terminations are chiefly indicated by post-positions, the old personal terminations have, for the most part, entirely disappeared, and the tenses are marked in quite a different manner than in the Prakrit dialects, the past tenses being commonly shown by participles, with the three personal pronouns in the instrumental case. Even the lowest of the dramatic Prakrits, the Apabhraṅśa, has not transgressed this line of demarcation, and stands much nearer to the Sanskrit than the modern vernaculars do."

SECT. IV.—Views of the Indian Grammarians on the relation of the Prākṛits to Sanskrit, and on the other elements in their composition.

Vararuchi,[71] the oldest extant grammarian who treats of the Prākṛit forms of speech, and his commentator Bhāmaha (in his Manoramā), distinctly assert their derivation, mediate or immediate, from Sanskrit. The former describes in his "Prākṛita-prakāśa" four dialects of this description, viz.: 1st, Mahārāshṭrī, or Prākṛit generally so called; 2nd, Paiśāchī; 3rdly, Māgadhī; and 4thly, Śaurasenī.[72] After having in the first nine chapters laid down the rules for the formation of the Prākṛit, properly so called, from Sanskrit, he proceeds to the others; and at the commencement of Chapter X. he lays it down that "the root of the Paiśāchī is the Śaurasenī." Paiśāchī | prakṛitiḥ Śaurasenī| On which the commentator Bhāmaha remarks that Paiśāchī is the language of the Piśāchas.[73] The Māgadhī also is delared by Vararuchi in Chapter XI. "to be derived from the same Śaurasenī." Māgadhī | prakṛitiḥ Śaurasenī |[74] The Śaurasenī dialect itself is spoken of at the [71] See on his age, Lassen, Instit. Pracr. 4. 5; Addenda, p. 65; and Indische Alterthumskunde, ii. p. 1160, where he is declared to have flourished about the middle of the first century A.D.

[72] See Lassen, Instit. Pracr. 7 f.; and Cowell, Prākṛita-prakāśa, p. xvii.

[73] Piśāchānām bhāshā Paiśāchī | asyāḥ Paiśāchyāḥ prakṛitiḥ Śaurasenī | Cowell, p. 86, and Lassen, Instit. Pracr. 7. 439.

[74] Cowell, p. 89, and Lassen, pp. 8. 391.

commencement of Chapter XII. as derived immediately from the Sanskrit. Śauraseni | prakritiḥ Sanskritam | [75] At the end of the Chapter on the Śaurasenī, it is stated that "in other points" (which have not been specifically touched upon) "it is like the Mahārāshṭrī dialect." Śesham mahārāshṭrīvat | [76] From this and from some other quotations which will be found below, it appears that the ancient Mahārāshṭrī, and the dialect called by way of eminence "the Prākṛit," are the same.[77] In another work called the "Shaḍbhāshā Chandrikā," by Lakshmīdhara, it is stated that the "Prākṛita dialect had its origin in Mahārāshṭra." Prākṛitam Mahārāshṭrodbhavam | [78] As the Śaurasenī is said to be derived from the Sanskrit, the same must a fortiori be true of the Mahārāshṭrī, or principal Prākṛit, as the greater part of Vararuchi's work is devoted to showing how it is formed by modifications of the Sanskrit. And, in fact, at the close of Vararuchi's ninth section on this dialect we have it thus stated in the following Sūtra, the 18th: "The rest is [to be learned] from the Sanskrit:" śeshaḥ Śaṁskṛitāt || [79] On which the commentator remarks, "The rest means all that has not been already referred to. The remaining rules for affixes, compounds, taddhitas, genders, etc., must be learned from the Sanskrit." uktād anyaḥ śeshaḥ | pratyaya-samāsa-taddhita-linga-varṇakādi-vidhiḥ śeshaḥ saṁskṛitād avagantavyaḥ | The derivation of Prākṛit from Sanskrit is here implied, and, in fact, as has already been intimated, the same thing results from the whole series of rules for forming Prākṛit words, which are nothing but explanations of the manner in which the Sanskrit forms are modified in Prākṛit. The same origin is ascribed to Prākṛit by Hemachandra, who says, Prakṛitiḥ saṁskṛitam | tatra-bhavaṁ tataḥ āgataṁ vā Prākṛitam | [80] "It has its origin in Sanskrit. Prākṛit is that which springs, or comes, from Sanskrit." Of the Prākṛits handled by Vararuchi we thus see that three derive their names from three provinces of India, viz., Mahārāshṭra, Magadha, and the country of the Śūrasenas, the region round

[75] Cowell, p. 93, and Lassen, pp. 8 and 49 of Appendix.

[76] Cowell, p. 96, and Lassen, pp. 8 and 50 of Appendix.

[77] That the Mahārāshṭrī of that period was not the same as the modern Mahrattī appears (I need scarcely say) from the character of the former, as shown in the dramatic works in which the Prākṛits are employed.

[78] Lassen, p. 12.

[79] Cowell, pp. 85 and 176.

[80] Cowell, p. xvii.; Lassen, p. 26.

Mathurā. This, as we have already seen above, p. 37, is considered by Lassen as a strong proof that they were spoken dialects.

Four kinds of Prākṛit only, as we have thus seen, are mentioned by Vararuchi, the oldest authority on Prākṛit Grammar, viz., Mahārāshṭrī (or the principal Prākṛit), Śaurasenī, Māgadhī, and Paiśāchī. Though many other dialectic varieties are referred to by later grammarians, it is not necessary for my purpose to give a detailed account of any of these.

Vararuchi devotes nine chapters, containing in all 424 aphorisms, to the Mahārāshṭrī; one chapter containing 32 aphorisms to the peculiarities of the Śaurasenī; another chapter containing 17 aphorisms to the Māgadhī; and a third chapter containing 14 aphorisms to the Paiśāchī.

It is clear from this mode of treatment alone, that the points in which these four dialects, and especially the Mahārāshṭrī and the Śaurasenī, agree with each other, must be much more numerous than those in which they differ; and this conclusion is confirmed by a comparison of the specimens of the several dialects which are extant in the dramas. Accordingly, Professor Lassen remarks (Instit. Prac. p. 377), that "the principal dialect, and the Śaurasenī, coincide in most respects." The technical distinction made between these two dialects by the grammarians is, that the one (the Śaurasenī) is the language used in prose, while the Mahārāshṭrī is appropriated to verse (Lassen, p. 384). The same author remarks of the Māgadhī, that it does not depart much further from the Sanskrit than the principal Prākṛit does (p. 387); and that the Indian grammarians are wrong in deriving the Māgadhī from the Śaurasenī, as the former is as directly descended from the Sanskrit as the latter; and that the two derivatives coincide with each other in most respects (p. 437). The Paiśāchī (a dialect employed by barbarous hill tribes) Lassen supposes, in like manner, to have been derived directly from the Sanskrit, but by a process peculiar to itself (p. 447).

In regard to these Prākṛit dialects generally, Lassen remarks (p. 386) as follows: "that the Sanskritic languages of Hindusthan proper were formerly less different from each other than they now are, is to be inferred from the fact, that at that earlier period they had not departed so far from their common fountain."

The following passage, quoted by Lassen, Instit. Linguæ Pracrit., p. 17, from a work called Prākṛitadīpikā, by Chandīdeva, seems also to show that Prākṛit was a language in current use, as well as employed in the dramas: etad api lokānusārād nāṭakadau mahākaviprayoga-darśanāt Prākṛitam mahārāshṭradeśīyam prakṛishṭa-bhāshanam | tathā cha Daṇḍī "mahārāshṭrāśrayām bhāshām prakṛishṭam Prākṛitaṁ viduṛ" iti | "This Prākṛit of the Mahārāshṭra country [so called], from its conformity to popular usage, and from its being employed by great poets in dramas and other poems, is the most excellent form of speech. Thus Daṇḍī says, 'The Prākṛit which prevails in Mahārāshṭra is considered the best.'" Rāma Tarkavagīśa, in his Prākṛitakalpataru, declares "the Mahārāshṭrī dialect to be the root of the others;" sarvāsu bhāshāsv iha hetubhūtām bhāshām mahārāshṭra-bhavām purastāt | nirudayishyāmi (sic) yathopadeśaṁ srī-Rāmaśarmā 'ham imām prayatnāt |[81] and affirms that "the Saurasenī is derived from it." Virachyate samprati S'aurasenī pūrvaiva bhāshā prakṛitiḥ kilāsyāḥ |[82] The Māgadhī is said to be derived from these two: Atha iha Māgadhy anuśishyate . . . asyāḥ mahārāshṭraka-S'aurasena-bhāshe pravīnaiḥ prakṛitī nirukte |[83] These languages, together with the Ardhamāgadhī and the Dākshiṇātya, are called bhāshās. The author then refers to the second class, called vibhāshas, the dialects called Śakārī or Chaṇḍālikā, Śābarī, Abhīrikā, Drāviḍā, and Utkalī, which, he says, "though characterized by rusticity (apabhraṅśatā), are yet not to be ranked in the class of apabhraṅśas if they are employed in dramas." S'akkārakoḍra-draviḍādi-vācho 'pabhraṁśatāṁ yadyapi saṁśrayanti | syād nāṭakādau yadi samprayogo naitāsv apabhraṁśatayā tathaishaḥ |[84] On the other hand, the forms of those vibhāshas which are not used in the dramas are reckoned by the author among the apabhraṅśa dialects, under which name he understands the provincial languages, such as the Bengalī, Guzarātī, etc.[85] A third class of languages is called by this author the Paiśāchī.

[81] Prākṛitakalpataru, quoted by Lassen, p. 20.
[82] Ibid., 2nd S'ākhā, 1st Stavaka.
[83] Ibid., 2nd Stavaka.
[84] Ibid., 3rd Stavaka (Lassen, p. 21).
[85] Lassen, p. 22.

The Kāvyachandrikā, a work on poetry, has the following remarks on language:

Tad eva vāṅmayaṁ vidyāt saṁskṛitam prākṛitaṁ tathā | apabhraṁśaś cha miśraś cha tasya bhedāś chaturvidhāḥ | saṁskṛitaṁ devatā-vaṇī kathitā muni-pungavaiḥ | tadbhavaṁ tatsamaṁ deśīty anekam prākṛitaṁ viduḥ |

"In regard to language, let it be understood that there are four kinds, viz., Sanskṛit, Prākṛit, Apabhraṁśa, and mixed. The Munis call Sanskrit the language of the gods; and consider that there are several kinds of Prākṛit, viz. (Tadbhava), that which is derived from, and (Tatsama) that which corresponds with, Sanskrit, and (Deśi) the provincial."[86] On this passage the scholiast remarks:

"Tadbhavaḥ" saṁskṛita-bhavaḥ khaggādi-śabdaḥ | "tatsamaḥ" saṁskṛita-prākṛitayoḥ samaḥ hiṇḍīra-haṇḍe ityādi-śabdaḥ | "deśi" iti mahārāshṭrīyādi | "apabhraṁśas" tv Abhīrādi-vākyam | "miśrakam" nāṭakādikam |

"The word tadbhava means 'derived from Sanskrit,' like the word khagga, etc., for khadga. Tatsama means the words which are 'alike in Sanskrit and Prākṛit,' like hiṇḍīra, haṇḍe, etc.[87] Deśi means the Mahārāshṭrī, etc. Apabhraṁśa is the speech of the Abhīras, etc. The mixed dialect is that of the dramas, etc."[88] Here it is to be remarked that though the Mahārāshṭri is generally recognized as the principal Prākṛit, it is in this passage called Deśi, or provincial, by the scholiast. To the same effect is the following passage from the Kavyādarśa of Daṇḍī:

Tad eva vāṅmayam bhūyaḥ saṁskṛitam prākṛitaṁ tathā | apabhraṁśaṁ cha miśraṁ chety āhur āptāś chaturvidham | saṁskṛitaṁ nāma daivī vāg anvākhyātā maharshibhiḥ | tatsamaḥ tadbhavo deśīty anekaḥ prākṛitaḥ kramaḥ | mahārāshṭrāśrayām bhāshām prakṛishṭam prākṛitaṁ viduḥ | sāgaraḥ śukti-ratnānāṁ Setubandhādi-yanmayam (?) | Śauraseni cha nāṭī cha Gauḍī chānyā cha tādriśī | yāti prākṛitam ity eshu vyavahāreshu[89] saṁvidhim | Abhīrādi-giraḥ kāvyeshv "apabhraṁśaḥ" iti sthitiḥ | śāstreshu saṁskṛitād anyad apabhraṁśatayoditam |

[86] Kāvyachandrikā, quoted by Lassen, p. 32.

[87] See Prof. Benfey's review of the 1st edit. of this volume in the Gött. Gel. Anzeigen for 23rd January, 1861, p. 132.

[88] Scholiast on the same passage, ibid.

[89] Tattaddeśīya-vyavahāreshu naṭakādishu, marginal gloss, quoted by Lassen.

"Writers of authority say that there are four kinds of language: Sanskrit, Prākṛit, Apabhranśa, and mixed. Great Ṛishis denominate Sanskrit the language of the gods. There are several orders of Prākṛit, viz., (tadbhava) that which is derived from, and (tatsama) that which corresponds with, Sanskrit, and the provincial (deśi). The language of Mahārāshṭra is called the principal Prākṛit, and it is an ocean of pearls and gems, such as the Setubandha, etc. [This line is corrupt; and the above sense is assigned as a conjecture. The allusion appears to be to the ancient Prākṛit poem called 'Setubandha,'[90] though there may also be a reference to the reef of Setubandha, a line of rocks between India and Ceylon, in the vicinity of the Ceylonese pearl fisheries.] The Saurasenī, the Nāṭī (dramatic?), the Gauḍī, and such like dialects, follow the law of the Prākṛit according to their several provincial usages. The speech of the Ābhīras, and other such tribes, when occurring in poems, is called Apabhranśa. In books on grammar, whatever differs from Sanskrit is called Apabhranśa."[91]

In his note to the introduction to Campbell's Telugu Grammar, p. 15, Mr. F. W. Ellis remarks as follows on the Shaḍbhāshā Chandrika of Lakshmīdhara, above referred to (p. 54): "The work here noticed is confined to these dialects [the Maḥārāshṭrī, Saurasenī, Māgadhī, Paiśāchi, Chulikā-paiśāchī, and Apabhranśa], as they now exist in the Nāṭakas [dramas], and treats therefore only of Tatsamam and Tadbhavam terms of Sanskrit origin; it is expressly stated, however, that each possessed its proper Deśyam, or native, terms; and it is probable, as many of these dialects prevailed in countries far distant from each other, that each was connected with Deśyam words of various derivations, in conjunction with which they produced spoken languages, differing considerably from each other. This in fact is declared to be the case with respect to Paiśāchi in the following passage:" Piśāchadeśa-niyatam Piśāchī-dvitayaṁ viduḥ | Piśācha-desās tu vriddhāir uktāḥ | Pāṇḍya-Kekaya-Vāhlīka-Śahya-Nepāla-Kuntalāḥ | Sudhesha-Bhota-Gāndhāra-Haiva-Kanojanās tathā | ete Paiśācha-deśāḥ syus taddeśyas tad-guṇo bhavet | [i. e. Two kinds of Paiśāchī are recognized, which depend on the different Piśācha countries. These are declared by the ancients to be the following, Paṇḍya, Kekaya, Vāhlīka, Sahya, [90] See note, p. x. and note 2, p. 26, in Cowell's Prākṛita-prakāśa.

[91] From the Karyādarśa of Daṇḍī, as quoted by Lassen, pp. 32, 33.

Nepāla, Kuntala, Sudhesha, Bhota, Gāndhāra, Haiva, and Kanojana. These are the Paiśācha countries; and the native of each country has his own particular qualities.] "The two Paiśāchī dialects are said to prevail in all the countries here mentioned, commencing with Pāṇḍyam at the southern extremity of India, and extending to Canoj (Canojana) in the north, . . . and it is added, These are the Paiśāchī countries, and the Deśyam terms of each have their own particular quality."[91] The concluding phrase is more vague in the original than Mr. Ellis has rendered it; but as language is the subject which the author is treating, it is to be presumed that he here alludes to the peculiar character of the different provinces in respect of their varieties of speech.

It is irrelevant to my present purpose to inquire particularly whether the various distinctions adopted by Vararuchi and his successors, of the mediate or immediate derivation of the Prākṛits from Sanskrit, and their classifications of Prākṛit, into that which is properly so called, and Apabhraṅśa, and Paiśāchī, are merely arbitrary and factitious, or are founded on any rational principles. It is enough that I find the following facts, which are important to the conclusions I am seeking to establish, admitted by the native authorities I have just cited; viz., first, that the Prākṛits are derived from Sanskrit as their source; secondly, that they are composed of a threefold element: Tatsamam, pure Sanskrit; Tadbhavam, derived from Sanskrit; and Deśi, local. As this third element, Deśi, is distinguished both from pure Sanskrit and from words derived from Sanskrit but modified, it would appear, thirdly, that it denotes words which were regarded as having an origin different from Sanskrit. Such, at least, is indubitably the sense in which the word Deśi is used by Telugu writers.[92]

[92] See Campbell's Telugu Grammar (3rd edit., Madras, 1849), p. 37, where it is said:—"The words of the Teloogoo language . . . . are classed by Sanskrit grammarians under four distinct heads. 1st Déshyumoo, or, as it is more emphatically termed, Utsu Déshyumoo, the pure language of the land; 2nd Tutsumunoo, Sanskrit words assuming Teloogoo terminations; 3rd Tudbhavumoo, Teloogoo corruptions of Sanskrit words, formed by the substitution, the elision, or addition of letters; 4th, Grāmyumoo, provincial terms, or words peculiar to the vulgar. To these we may also add Unyu Déshyumoo, or words from other countries, sometimes given as a subdivision of the first class, and comprising, according to the definition of ancient writers, words adopted from the dialects current in the Canarese, Mahratta, Guzerat, and Dravida provinces only, but now also including several of Persian, Hindoostanee, and English origin."

To give an idea of the artificial manner in which the Indian critics classify the different Prākṛit dialects, and of the different classes of people to whom they conceive the dramatic writers ought to assign them, I quote a passage from the Sāhitya Darpaṇa :—

Purushāṇām anīchānāṁ saṁskṛitaṁ saṁskṛitātmanām | Śaurasenī prayoktavyā tādṛiśīnāṁ cha yoshitām | āsām eva tu gāthāsu Māhārāshṭrīm prayojayet | atroktā māgadhī bhāshā rājantaḥpura-chāriṇām | ceṭīnāṁ rājaputrāṇāṁ śreshṭhināṁ chārḍḍamāgaḍhī | prāchyā vidūshakādīnām dhūrtānāṁ syād Avantikā | yodḍha-nāgarikādīnām dākshiṇātyā hi dīyatām | Śakarāṇāṁ Śakādīnāṁ śākāriṁ samprayojayet | Vāhlīka-bhāshā divyānām drāviḍī Draviḍādishu | Ābhīreshu tathā "bhīrī chāṇḍālī Pukkasādishu | Ābhīrī Śāvarī chāpi kāshṭha-patropajīvishu | tathaivāṅgārakārādau Paiśāchī syāt Piśācha-vāk | ceṭīnām apy anīchānām api syāt Śaurasenikā | bālānāṁ shaṇḍakānāṁ cha nīcha-grahavichāriṇām | unmattānām āturāṇāṁ saiva syāt saṁskṛitaṁ kvachit | aiśvaryeṇa pramattasya dāridryopaskṛitasya cha | bhikshu-bandhadharādīnām prākṛitaṁ samprayojayet | saṁskṛitaṁ samprayoktavyaṁ linginīshūttamāsu cha | devīmantriśutā-veśyāsv api kaiśchit tathoditam | yaddeśaṁ nīcha-pātraṁ tu taddeśaṁ tesya bhāshitam | kāryataś chottamādīnāṁ kāryo bhāshā-viparyayaḥ | Yoshit-sakhī-bāla-veśyā-kitavāpsarasām tathā | vaidagdhyārtham pradātavyaṁ saṁskṛitaṁ chāntarāntarā |

"Let men of respectable rank and cultivated minds speak Sanskrit; and let women of the same description use Śaurasenī, except in the metrical parts, where they should talk Mahārāshṭrī. Persons living in kings' palaces should employ Māgadhī, and servants, kings' sons, and magistrates Ardhamāgadhī. The eastern dialect (which the scholiast says is Gauḍī, or Bengalī) should be spoken by buffoons; and the Avantī by crafty persons. Let Dākshiṇatyā (the language of Vidarbha, according to the scholiast) be employed by soldiers and citizens; and Śākārī by Śakārds, Śakas, and others. The Vāhlīka dialect is the one proper for celestial (?) personages, Drāviḍī for Draviḍas, etc., Ābhīrī for Ābhīras, Chāṇḍāli for Pukkasas, etc., the Ābhīrī and Śāvarī for those who live by cutting wood and gathering leaves, and Paiśāchī, the speech of Piśāchas, for charcoal-burners. Śaurasenī may be used also for female servants of the more respectable sort, for children, eunuchs, and low astrologers; the same, and occasionally Sanskrit, for madmen and sick persons. Prākṛit should be employed by those who are intoxicated by authority or affected by poverty, by mendicants and prisoners, etc. Sanskrit should be assigned to the better sort of female mendicants, and also, as some say, to queens, ministers' daughters, and harlots. A dialect belonging to the country from which each character of low origin comes should be assigned to him; and the language employed by the superior personages should vary according to their function. Sanskrit should be occasionally assigned to women, female friends, children, harlots, gamblers, and celestial nymphs, with the view of [showing their] cleverness."[93]

The rules here given are quite artificial, as it would be absurd to suppose that different classes of persons living in the same locality, as most at least of the dramatis personæ would do, could each speak different dialects, and that, too, the dialects of other and perhaps distant provinces.

I shall conclude this section by adding the substance of what Professor Lassen says about the Prākṛit dialects in the earlier portion of his work (pp. 22, 25–29).

"The word prākṛita comes from prakṛiti (procreatrix), 'nature,' and means 'derived;' the several Prākṛit dialects being regarded as derivatives of Sanskrit either directly or mediately. The original language from which any other springs is called its prakṛiti, or source. Thus Hemachandra says, 'Prakrit has its origin in Sanskrit; that which is derived, or comes from the latter, is called prākṛita.'[94] The expressions Sanskrit and Prakrit are opposed to each other in another sense, when the former word denotes men of cultivated minds, and the latter those who are uncultivated. The term Prakrit is therefore also applied to vulgar and provincial forms of speech.

"The grammarians concur in considering Mahārāshṭrī as in the strictest sense of the word Prakṛit, the principal form or type of Prakrit. The Śaurasenī and the Māgadhī approach most nearly to the Mahārāshṭrī, and both derive their appellations from the names of provinces. By these three provincial designations, Mahārāshṭrī, Śaurasenī, and Māgadhī, the Indian grammarians appear to have understood the local varieties of language employed in those three several provinces, as well as the dramatic dialects severally so called. Vararuchi specifies only one inferior dialect, the Paiśāchī, and understands by it the form of speech employed by the lowest classes of men. This is to be distinguished from the speech of Piśāchas (goblins), which, when introduced on the stage, are said to use a gibberish totally ungrammatical. The word is to be understood as figuratively used to denote the contempt in which the lowest classes were held. Hemachandra mentions a variety of this dialect, the Chūlikā-paiśāchī, which denotes a form of speech lower than even the former. In fact two varieties of Paiśāchī appear to be distinguished by the grammarians,[95] both of them spoken by barbarous tribes, of which the one seems to belong to northern, the other to southern, India. Rāma Tarkavāgīśa also mentions two sorts of Paiśāchī, signifying by this name a rude mixture of language drawn from different idioms.

[93] Sāhitya Darpaṇa in Bibliotheca Indica, No. 53, pp. 172, 173. (See also Lassen, Instit. Linguæ Pracr., pp. 35, 36.)

[94] Hemachandra, viii. 1, Lassen, p. 26; quoted above, p. 44.

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS LIBRARY

"The term apabhraṅśa is applied by the grammarians to those dialects which are the furthest removed from the pure Sanskrit original, and have undergone the greatest corruption. Hemachandra specifies two kinds, of which one has most affinity with the principal Prakrit, and the other with the Śaurasenī. The older writers assign this dialect to the people who dwell on the shores of the western ocean, especially the Ābhīras. Rāma Tarkavāgīśa, departing from the view of the earlier writers, ascribes the varieties of the local and provincial dialects to the apabhraṅśa, as their source. The same author seems also (when he uses (iii. 1) the words nāgādikramāt, "according to the manner of those who speak like Nāgas, or serpents, etc."), to assign a mythological name to the provincial dialects in the same way as the older writers talk of certain barbarous tribes as Piśāchas. This designation appears to have proceeded from the writers on rhetoric, who assign Sanskrit to the gods: Prakrit is then left for men; while those whom the Brahmans consider to be scarcely deserving of the name of men, Chaṇḍālas, Ābhīras, and such like, are only fit to utter the speech of goblins, or serpents.

"The Prakrit dialects employed in the dramas are rightly asserted by the grammarians to be of Sanskrit origin; for both the grammatical forms and the words, with very few exceptions, as well as the entire structure of the Prakrits, and the character of their syntax, are derived from the Sanskrit. When, however, the more recent grammarians assert the same of the Canarese and other South-Indian dialects, they are in error, as, although these languages contain words formed from Sanskrit according to certain rules, their grammatical forms and primary words cannot by any possibility have been drawn from that source."

[95] See the passage quoted in p. 48.

I will hereafter show (when I come to refer more particularly to the South-Indian languages) that the Indian grammarians of the south claim for the Teḷugu, and no doubt for the Tamul, Canarese, and Malayalim, also, an origin quite independent of the Sanskrit.[96]

Sect. V.—The Pāli, and its Relations to Sanskrit and Prākṛit.

The above tabular comparison of the Prākṛits with the modern vernaculars, will have abundantly shown, that the latter are derived from the former, or from some kindred sources, and that both are derived in great part from the Sanskrit, at some period of its history, the one mediately, the other more immediately. Although, however, it be sufficiently clear, both from the authority of the native grammarians and by a comparison of the Sanskrit and the Prākṛits, that the latter are derived from the former, yet the later Prākṛits do not represent the derivative form of speech which stands nearest to the Sanskrit; and we are in a position to point out a dialect which approaches yet more closely to the latter than the Prākṛits do. I mean the Pāli, or sacred language of the Buddhists; a language which is extinct in India, but in which numerous canonical books of the Bauddha religion, still extant in Burmah and Ceylon, are written.[97]

Though, however, this language has had the singular fate of having now disappeared from its native soil, to become a sacred language in foreign countries, it is yet nothing more than one of the ancient [96] See Dr. Caldwell's Comp. Grammar of the Dravidian languages, pp. 30, 31; the Introduction to Campbell's Telugu Grammar, 3rd edit., Madras, 1849, pp. xv. ff.; and the Note, in the same work, by Mr. Ellis, to Mr. Campbell's Introduction, pp. 11–22.

[97] If any Brahmanical reader should think of studying these pages, I hope that the connexion of the Pāli language with the Buddhist religion will not deprive it of all interest in his eyes, much less induce him, with the author of the Nyāya mūlā vistara, I. 3, 4, to regard it, though of pure Sanskrit original, as polluted, like cow's milk in a dog's skin (nahi pūtaṁ syād gokshīram śva-dṛitau dhṛitam), by the unholy contact of these heretics.

vernacular dialects of Northern India. Māgadhī is the appellation which the Buddhists of Ceylon themselves give to it. It is, indeed, true, as we are informed by Mr. Turnour, that the "Buddhists are impressed with the conviction that their sacred and classical language, the Māgadhi or Pāli, is of greater antiquity than the Sanskrit; and that it had attained also a higher state of refinement than its rival tongue had acquired. In support of this belief they adduce various arguments, which in their judgment are quite conclusive. They observe that the very word 'Pāli' signifies original, text, regularity; and there is scarcely a Buddhist Pāli scholar in Ceylon who, in the discussion of this question, will not quote, with an air of triumph, their favourite verse, sā Māgadhī mūla-bhāsā narā yāy'ādikappikā | brahmāno ch'assutālāpā Sambuddhā chāpi bhāsare. 'There is a language which is the root (of all languages); men and Brahmans at the commencement of the creation, who had never before heard or uttered a human accent, and even the supreme Buddhos spoke it: it is Māgadhi.'[98] This verse[99] is a quotation from Kachchāyano's Grammar, the oldest referred to in the Pāli literature of Ceylon. The original is not extant in this island."[100] Mr. Turnour, however, is inclined to "entertain an opinion adverse to the claims of the Buddhists on this particular point [the priority of Pāli to Sanskrit]. The general results of the researches hitherto made by Europeans, both historical and philosophical, unquestionably converge," he thinks,

[98] Mahāwanso, Introduction, p. xxii; see also p. xxvii. Mr. Childers translates thus: "The Māgadhī is the original language in which men of former Kalpas, and Brahmas by whom speech has not been heard, and supreme Buddhas speak." The "Brahmas" are, he thinks, the inhabitants of the upper Brahma worlds. The idea entertained by the Buddhists of the superiority of the Pāli to Sanskrit may also be learnt from the following passage of the commentary on the Grammar called Rūpasiddhi, describing the result of the composition of Kachchāyano's Grammar: ewañ sati nānādesa-bhāsā-sankkatādi-khalita-wachanam anākāraṁ jetwā Tathāgatena wuttāya subhāwa niruttiyā sukhena Buddha-wachanam uggaṇhissanti | "This being done, men, overcoming the confusion and incorrectness of diction, arising from the mixture of Sanskrit and other dialects of various countries, will, by conformity to the rules of grammar propounded by the Tathâgata (Buddha), easily acquire the doctrine of Buddho."—Mahāwanso, Introd., pp. xxvi, xxvii.

[99] Preserved in the grammar called Payogasiddhi. Turnour, p. xxvii. Mr. Childers tells me that the verse does not occur in Kachchāyana.

[100] This grammar is now in the hands of scholars, and parts of it have been published by Mr. D'Alwis and Dr. Kuhn. Mr. Childers says that it is in the hands of every native scholar, and must have been so in Mr. Turnour's time.

"to prove the greater antiquity of the Sanskrit. Even in this island," he proceeds, "all works on astronomy, medicine, and (such as they are) on chemistry and mathematics, are exclusively written in Sanskrit: while the works on Buddhism, the histories subsequent to the advent of Gōtamo Buddho, and certain philological works alone, are composed in the Pāli language" (Mahāwanso, Introd. pp. xxii, xxiii). There is no question that Mr. Turnour is right, and that the priests of Ceylon, who are no philologists, are wrong. The Pāli bears as distinct traces of derivation from Sanskrit, in an early stage of its development, as any of the other northern dialects. Before, however, adducing the proofs of this, I must give some account of the manner in which the Pāli was introduced into Ceylon.

The appearance of Buddha as a religious reformer in Northern Hindustan seems to have taken place in the earlier part of the sixth century before Christ. He is said to have entered on his mission in the year 588, and to have died in 543 B.C. (Turnour, Introd. to Mahāw., p. xxix).[101] In strong contrast to the Brahmans, he and his followers strove to disseminate their new doctrines in a popular shape among all classes of society; and for this purpose employed, where necessary, the current vernacular dialects of their age and country, though, at the same time, they may have used both Sanskrit and Māgadhī in the composition of their sacred works (Lassen, Ind. Alt. ii. 492, f.; 1147, f; Burnouf, Lotus de la Bonne Loi, p. 862).[102] Three Buddhist synods were held at different periods within 300 years after [101] The grounds for preferring the Cingalese date of Buddha's death, 543 or 544 B.C., to that of the Northern Buddhists, are set forth by Lassen, Ind. Alt., vol. ii., pp. 51–61. See especially pp. 60, 61. The historical value of the Buddhist records is, according to Mr. Turnour (Introd., p. xxviii), assured in the following way:—"The age in which we now live is the Buddhōtpādo of Gotamo [the interval between the manifestation of one Buddho and the epoch when his religion becomes extinct]. His religion was destined to endure 5,000 years; of which 2,380 have now passed away (A.D. 1837) since his death, and 2,620 are yet to come. . . . By this fortunate fiction, a limitation has been prescribed to the mystification in which the Buddhistical creed has involved all the historical data contained in its literature anterior to the advent of Gotama. . . . The mystification of the Buddhistical data ceased a century at least prior to B.C. 588, when Prince Siddhattho attained Buddhohood, in the character of Gotamo Buddho."

[102] Benfey has expressed a different opinion on one point. He says (Indien, p. 194), the Buddhist books of Nepal composed in Sanskrit are, "as we shall hereafter show to be probable, merely translations from the Buddhist sources, which were originally composed in Pali."

Buddha's death, for the collection and arrangement of the sacred works which expounded the doctrines and discipline of his religion; for the correction of errors and abuses; and for the purpose of propagating the new faith in foreign countries. The revelations of Buddha are stated by his followers "to have been orally pronounced in Pali, and orally perpetuated for upwards of four centuries, till the close of the Buddhistical age of inspiration." They consist of the Pitakattaya [in Sanskrit Piṭakatraya], or the three piṭakas, which now form the Buddhistical Scriptures, divided into the Vinaya, Abhidharma, and Sūtra pitakas. A schism having arisen after Buddha's death, the first Buddhist council was held in 543, when the authenticity of this Pāli collection was established, and commentaries upon it, called Aṭṭhakatha, were promulgated. At the second council, in 443 B.C., the authority of the Pitakattaya was again vindicated, and the Aṭṭhakatha delivered on that occasion completed the history of Buddhism for the interval subsequent to the previous council. In the year 309 B.C., the third council was held in the reign of King Aśoka, who was a zealous promoter of Buddhism [Turnour, p. xxix]. Various missions were consequently undertaken.[103] Mahendra, the son of King Aśoka, was sent on a mission to Ceylon, for the conversion of that island.

The following account of his proceedings is given by the native authorities, as abstracted by Professor Lassen (Ind. Alt. ii. pp. 247–253):—Mahendra arrived in Ceylon in the year 245 B.C., was hospitably received by the king of the island, and began by his preaching to convert the inhabitants to the religion of Buddha. The king himself embraced the new doctrine. Relics of Buddha were transported to the island from Northern India, and the Bodhi tree, under which Buddha had attained the most perfect knowledge, was transplanted thither from Behar, and, according to the belief of the Buddhists, continues to flourish to the present time. Many miracles attended these transactions. The conversions to Buddhism continued; and many male and female devotees were consecrated to the Buddhist priesthood. Buddhism, thus introduced, has ever since remained the creed of Ceylon; and that island, the head-quarters of Southern Buddhism, and the seed-plot from which it was propagated into Burmah and other parts of Transgangetic India, is regarded in those countries as a holy land. In Ceylon there exists, as has been already mentioned, an extensive Buddhistic literature, which fills up an important blank in that of the Brahmans. This literature is, as has been stated, in Pali. At first, however, the principal sacred records of the Buddhists are said to have been handed down by oral tradition. Mr. Turnour (p. xxix) gives the following statement on this subject from the native authorities: The Pitakattaya, together with the Aṭṭhakatha, completed to the era of the third Council, were orally promulgated in Ceylon by Mahendra, the Pitakattaya in Pali, and the Aṭṭhakatha in Cingalese, with a further Aṭṭhakatha of his own. These works were, it is said, propounded orally by his inspired disciples and successors till the close of the period of inspiration, which occurred in Ceylon between 104 and 76 B.C. They were then committed to writing, the text (Pitakattaya) in Pali (in which it had before been handed down orally), and its commentaries in Cingalese. This event is thus celebrated in the Mahāwanso, chap 33, p. 207. Pittaka-ttaya-pāliṁ cha tassā aṭṭhakathaṁ cha tam | mukha-pāṭhena ānesuṁ pubbe bhikkhū mahāmati | hāniṁ diswāna sattānaṁ tadā bhikkhū samāgatā | chiraṭṭhitattham dhammassa potthakesu likhāpayuṁ | "The wise Bhikkhus of earlier times had handed down orally both the text (Pali) of the three pitakas, and their aṭṭhakatha. But at that period, perceiving the injury which would otherwise be sustained by the people, the Bhikkhus assembled and caused them to be written down in books for the more lasting stability of the faith." About 500 years later, in the period between 410 and 432 A.D., Buddhaghosa transferred the Cingalese Aṭṭhakatha into Pāli, as related in the 37th Chapter of the Mahāwanso. These Pāli versions of the Buddhist scriptures and their commentaries are those now extant in Ceylon, and they are identically the same with the Siamese and Burmese versions.

[103] See Lassen, Ind. Alt., ii., pp. 79, 86, 229, ff., and 234–240.

Such are the Buddhist traditions regarding the oral transmission of their sacred books, viz., the scriptures themselves in Pāli, and the commentaries, etc., in Cingalese, and their subsequent consignment to writing. It is to be remarked, however, that so much of this narrative, as records the oral transmission of these works, is distinctly rejected by Mr. Turnour, who says, p. lvii., "although there can be no doubt as to the belief entertained by Buddhists here, that these scriptures were perpetuated orally for 453 years before they were reduced to writing, being founded on superstitious imposture, originating perhaps in the priesthood denying to all but their own order access to their scriptures, yet there is no reasonable ground for questioning the authority of the history thus obtained of the origin, recognition, and revisions of these Pali scriptures."

Regarding the introduction of Pāli into Ceylon, different views have been taken. In his "Institutiones Linguæ Pracriticæ," Professor Lassen remarks as follows (pp. 60, 61):—

"It is clear that the Pali is the sacred language of the Southern Buddhists, i.e. of those who departing, for the most part, from the shores of Kalinga, towards the south, carried with them, first of all, the doctrines of Buddhism into Ceylon, and eventually propagated them them in India beyond the Ganges."

And again:—

"While the Pali is connected with the emigration of Buddhism to the south, it was itself, without doubt, produced in India. It is by no means clear whether the Buddhists, when they travelled southwards, made use of the Pali language from the first or not; but indeed, as the commencement of the emigration to Ceylon can scarcely be placed earlier than from 628–543 before Christ, the application of the Pali dialect as a vehicle for communicating the Buddhist doctrines can hardly have taken place earlier than that period. How much more recent it may be, I leave to those who may be endeavouring to trace the history of this sect to discover."

In his later work, however, the "Indian Antiquities" (vol. ii., pp. 488–490), Lassen proposes the following theory on the subject, which I translate, with slight abridgements:—

"The Pali language is called by the Buddhists of Ceylon Māgadhī, and it ought consequently to have had its birthplace in Magadha. This, however, cannot have been the case, as, like the majority of the dramatic dialects, it does not possess the peculiarities of the Māgadhī. The Buddhists are also wrong when they declare the Pali to be the root of the Sanskrit, and assert that Kātyāyana restored it to its original perfection by purifying it from all intermixture of Sanskrit and the provincial dialects. We shall therefore have to seek for the birthplace of the Pali elsewhere than in Magadha. We must necessarily assume it to have been once a vernacular dialect, as it is otherwise impossible to perceive why it should have been selected as the language of the sacred writings. There is, besides, nothing in its character which is opposed to the supposition that it was once a spoken tongue. If we compare it with the language of the Western inscriptions, we find that, generally speaking, they stand both equally removed from the Sanskrit; for if the one presents some forms which are older, the other again has other forms which are more ancient.[104] The western inscriptions have, in addition to other differences, also the peculiar phonetic rule of changing tvā into ptā (e.g. dasayitvā [Sanskrit darśayitvā] into dasayiptā), which is unknown to the Pali, as well as to the dramatic dialects. These discrepancies render it impossible to identify the Pali with the language of the western inscriptions. It is besides to be observed, that Buddhism had not its principal seat on the western coast, where the dialect in question was vernacular."

Thus, according to Lassen, the Pāli is neither identifiable with the Māgadhī, the language of Eastern Hindustan, nor with the dialects of Western India, as made known by the western inscriptions.

"In the absence of any other circumstance to indicate the birthplace of the Pali (Professor Lassen proceeds), I propose the following conjecture on the subject. I assume that Kātyāyana selected the speech of the country in which he was engaged in propagating Buddhism, i.e. of Malwa. Of the Prakrits employed in the dramas, the Saurasenī is the one most frequently employed, and is the variety used in the prose passages. Vararuchi derives it immediately from the Sanskrit, and from it the other dramatic dialects. He must therefore have considered it as the oldest, though he (as well as his successors), regards the dialect called Mahārāshṭrī as the principal. These two dialects stand the nearest to the Pali, though it is decidedly older than they are. I conjecture, therefore, that we may regard it as the oldest form [104] Thus the language of the inscriptions preserves the s before t and th, as in asti, in sesthe, and in usthāna; and the r in sarvva, where the Pāli has tth, ṭṭh, and vv. The inscriptions, too, preserve the Sanskrit dative, for which the genitive is used in Pāli, though the grammarians recognize the existence of the dative. In Pāli the ablative in smā, as well as mhā, and the locative in smin as well as mhi, are found, though they are rarely used in composition. In the inscriptions, on the other hand, the locative has the form mhi, while the ablative of words in a is ā, so that the pronominal declination of this case has not yet been transferred to the noun.

which has been preserved of the vernacular language of Western India between the Jumna river and the Vindhya range, a tract which includes Malwa. The Saurasenī would consequently present a later form of this language. From Ujjayani a knowledge of Kātyāyana's work was probably diffused over the Dekhan; and the Cingalese derived their acquaintance with the dialect of which it treated from the country of the Ḍamilas, i.e. the Tamilians, or the Cholas. In that country, Dīpankara, surnamed Buddhapriya, composed his new arrangement of that work, the oldest Pali grammar now extant.[105] As the canonical writings in Ceylon were not translated into this sacred dialect till the beginning of the fifth century A.D.,[106] the knowledge of it appears to have been only very slowly diffused towards the south. The grammar just referred to appears to be more ancient than that translation. A more accurate conclusion regarding this portion of the history of the languages of India will perhaps result from a complete investigation of the writings of the Southern Buddhists."

These remarks of Lassen afford, perhaps, scarcely sufficient grounds for denying that the Pāli was introduced into Ceylon from Magadha. The peculiarities which are enumerated by Vararuchi as the characteristics of the Māgadhī, as it existed in his day, such as the substitution of ś for sh, and s, y for j, sk for kṣh, l for r, are, after all, of no great consequence, and would perhaps be regarded by learned persons, even

[105] "The oldest version of the compilation from Kachchāyano's Grammar," says, Mr. Turnour (Introd. to Mahāw. p. xxv.), "is acknowledged to be the Rūpasiddhi. I quote three passages . . . . The first of these extracts [from the conclusion of the Rūpasiddhi] . . . . proves the work to be of very considerable antiquity, from its having been composed in the Daksina, while Buddhism prevailed there as the religion of the state." This quotation is as follows:—wikhyātānanda-therawhaya-waragurūnañ Tambapaṇṇi-ddhajānañ sisso Dīpankarākhyo Damila-wasumati dīpaladdha-ppakāso Bālādichchādi-wāsa-ddwitayam adhiwasan sāsanañ jotayī yo soyam Buddha-piyyawho yatī imam ujukañ Rūpasiddhim akāsi | which, with the aid of Mr. Turnour's version, I translate as follows:—"The celebrated teacher Anāndo, who was a rallying point like a standard to Tambapaṇṇi (Ceylon), had a disciple called Dīpankaro. The latter, who had obtained renown in the land of Damila, and was the superintendent of two religious houses, called Bālādichcha, etc., illustrated the religion of Buddha. He was the devotee who bore the appellation of Buddhapiyo, and composed this perfect Rūpasiddhi."

[106] This statement of Lassen disagrees with the account given by Mr. Turnour, on native authority (quoted above, p. 57), that the Pitakattaya had been handed down in Pāli from the first. See also the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal for 1837, pp. 503, ff.

in Magadha itself, rather as vulgar provincialisms, than essential characteristics of their language. If so, such varieties would naturally be discarded by educated men acquainted with Sanskrit, when they came to form for themselves a literary language.

The early Buddhist teachers appear to have been in the habit of travelling over the whole of the central parts of Northern India, and must have been acquainted with the languages of its different provinces. When, therefore, they set themselves to compose works which were intended for circulation in all these different regions, they would naturally adopt the most correct and approved forms of speech which were current anywhere within those limits. The case is quite different in regard to the dramatic compositions of India, which would preserve the most salient points of every provincial patois, as works of this class derive a considerable part of their attraction from depicting, or even exaggerating local peculiarities.

I find it also difficult to concur in Lassen's opinion as to the period at which the Pāli, or Māgadhī, was introduced into Ceylon. Mahendra and his followers, who were no doubt numerous, must necessarily have carried with them the language of their native country; and not only so, but they may have been the bearers of numerous works written in that language. For it is not easy to receive literally the account given by the Ceylonese writers (which, as we have seen, p. 54, Mr. Turnour also rejects,) of the time at which their religious works were first committed to writing, or to suppose that the foreign propagators of Buddhism, who would at first be ignorant of Cingalese, should, at the period of their arrival, have had no records in their own language of the new religion which they were introducing, or that these records should not have been safely handed down to their successors.

M. Eugène Burnouf, in the course of a comparison which he is instituting between a paragraph extracted from a Pāli work, one of the books of the Buddhist canon, the Dīgha Nikāya, and a parallel passage from a Nepalese Sanskrit work, makes the following observation on the language in which the former is composed, from which it will be observed, that he does not controvert the derivation of the Pāli language from the dialect of Magadha:—

"It is quite possible that these two versions may have been nearly contemporaneous in India, and have been current there from the earliest period of Buddhism, before the events occurred which transported them to Ceylon. The Pali version would be popular among the inferior castes and the bulk of the people of Magadha and Oude, while the Sanskrit version was used by the Brahmans. Still, we should not be justified in supposing that we possessed in the Pali text the authentic version of this passage in its true Māgadhī form, since a comparison of the Indian inscriptions of Aśoka, and of the Pali of Ceylon, reveals to us certain differences between the forms of these two dialects. Still, while we allow for the degree of artificial regularity which the cultivation of the Pali in Ceylon may have introduced, we must hold that the Pali version of this passage approaches very closely to the form which it must have had in Māgadhī."—(Lotus de la Bonne Loi. App., p. 862.)

Professor Weber (in the course of a detailed notice of the Lotus de la Bonne Loi, in his Indische Studien, iii., 176, ff.) remarks as follows on this passage:—"This last explanation [that the Pali was elaborated in Ceylon] does not appear to me satisfactory, because a language carried by a few persons along with them into a foreign country ordinarily retains its ancient character unchanged. It is further very questionable whether the cultivation of the Pali commenced in Ceylon, and probability speaks rather in favour of the supposition that the grammar of the language was fixed in the country which was its home." Weber proceeds to observe, that the Cingalese tradition ascribes the origin of their grammar to India; and thinks it may be doubtful whether Pāli was used at all in Ceylon before the arrival there of Buddhaghosa in 420 A.D. For though a translation of the Sūtras is said to have been made into the Cingalese sixty years earlier (which seems to prove that the Pāli was understood all along), yet it is improbable, he conceives, that, if it had been earnestly studied before Buddhaghosa, the translation of the work called Aṭṭhakatha would have been so long deferred. At any rate, he thinks the arrival of this teacher appears to have given a new impulse to the study of Pāli, as is attested by the composition of the Mahāvansa in that language, fifty years later. It is clear, however, that Weber maintains the essential identity of Pāli with the vernacular dialect of Magadha, in the sixth century B.C., as he explains the more archaic character of the language of the Pāli books, the Aṭṭhakatha and Tripitaka, as compared with the language of the Indian inscriptions of Aśoka, by supposing that (while the popular dialect had undergone great alterations in the 300 years which intervened between Buddha's death and the date of the inscriptions) the followers of Buddha may have made it a rule to retain, as far as possible, the dialect in which Buddha himself spoke, as the language of all the discourses which actually emanated from him, or were ascribed to him, as well as of all the narratives of which he formed the subject.

I quote two other authorities on the subject of the early introduction of Pāli into Ceylon. The first is Professor Spiegel, who remarks as follows, in the Preface to the Kammavākya (a short Buddhist work edited by him, and translated into Latin):—"It appears reasonable to believe that the Pali was introduced by the Buddhists into Ceylon, and carried thence into Transgangetic India. An extensive intercourse existed between the continent of India and Ceylon from the earliest period, and the mention of this island in the Rāmāyana is well known. Six Brahmanical kings are enumerated in the Mahāvansa, who, as they lived before the age of Aśoka, must no doubt have employed another language. That this was the case is proved by the multitude of words which have been transferred from Sanskrit, not from Pali, into the Cingalese language, and which appear to have been introduced in consequence of that previous intercourse to which reference has been made. Thus we find in Cingalese, karṇa, not kaṇṇa, ear, vaira, not vera, enmity, the use of the visarga, which has nearly disappeared from Pali, as well as the vowels ṛi, ṛī, ḷṛi, ḷṛī." Spiegel proceeds:—"We find from the Cingalese books, that the Buddhists arrived in Ceylon, bringing with them the Pali language, in the time of Devānampiyatissa, the contemporary of Aśoka, who reigned from 260–219 B.C. It is probable that the Pali was called Māgadhī in consequence of the mission of Aśoka's son Mahendra to introduce Buddhism into Ceylon. In fact, a comparison of the Pali with the language of the inscriptions which have descended to our own time, leaves no doubt that the two forms of speech are most closely connected. Both are but comparatively little removed from the Sanskrit, since in neither of them is elision of letters practised, nor, with few exceptions, are aspirated letters commuted into h, as in the Prakrit."

The other authority I shall quote is Professor Benfey, who thus writes in his article on India (in Ersch and Gruber's German Encyclopædia, p. 194) :—

"The place exterior to India, where Buddhism became first established as a state religion (about 240 years before Christ) under the especial auspices of Aśoka, Emperor of India, was Ceylon. It is therefore to be assumed that at that period all which was of importance on the subject of Buddhism, was brought to Ceylon in the form in which it then existed. Besides, so close a connexion existed between Ceylon and the head-quarters of the Indian empire, viz., the regions lying on the Bay of Bengal (Bengal itself and the adjoining provinces), that the Ceylonese took at least a passive share in the development of Buddhism. Hence their books appear to me to be authorities of the greatest consequence. It is further to be observed that these works are composed in Pali, which is the sacred language of the Buddhist in Ceylon, and in the countries converted to Buddhism by the Ceylonese, and which was the predominating popular dialect of central India."

I quote another passage, to a similar effect, from p. 250 of the same work; and although there, at the close, the author speaks doubtfully of the derivation of Pāli from the province of Magadha, and of the introduction of Buddhism into Ceylon from the shores of the Bay of Bengal, he is not to be understood as throwing any uncertainty on the connexion of Pāli or of Buddhism with Northern India in general.

He characterizes the Pāli as "the sacred language of the Buddhist writings found in Ceylon and Transgangetic India, . . . which is shown both by internal and external indications to have been the vernacular dialect of central India, and which was diffused along with the Buddhist religion in the countries above named, where it soon acquired the same sacredness in the eyes of the Buddhists, which Sanskrit possessed, and still possesses, for the Brahmans. This language," he continues, "(though distinct proof cannot yet be adduced of the assertion), is one of the very oldest of the Indian vernaculars, and was already in popular use at the period of the rise of Buddhism. It was probably the dialect of a considerable, I mean the western, portion of Bengal. It was from this point, from Banga or Kalinga, that, according to the Ceylonese account, Buddhism was introduced into Ceylon: and yet again this conjecture becomes uncertain, owing to the fact that the language of Magadha, which was spoken only a little to the north of the Bay of Bengal, and which (as Aśoka's inscription in Cuttack seems to have been composed in it) appears also to have extended towards the south, varies essentially from the Pali in several particulars." Again, in p. 246, Benfey speaks of "the Pali, as varying in many particulars from the language of Magadha, and approximating to the principal Prakrit or Mahārāshṭrī, dialect."

But it matters little in what particular province we suppose the Pāli to have originated, whether in Magadha, or in some country further to the westward; as the fact remains in any case indubitable that, perhaps with some modifications, it represents one of the oldest Prākṛitic dialects of northern India.

The Buddhist writers assert, as we have already seen, that the Pāli is not derived from the Sanskrit; but that, on the contrary, it is the primitive language from which all others are descended. These Buddhist grammarians were no doubt led away by their prejudice in favour of the dialect which they or their predecessors had adopted as the depositary of their sacred literature; and by a prejudice against the Sanskrit, which was venerated by their rivals, the Brahmans. Even Mr. Clough says (Pāli Grammar, Advertisement, p. iii.), without determining the question, "it has long been a contested point whether the Pali or Sanskrit be the more ancient language of India;" and contents himself with the remark that, "it is certain that Pali was the popular dialect of the native country of Buddho, namely, Magadha, before the powerful sect, founded by him, was expelled from the continent of India, an event prior to the Christian era."

The following is the conclusion at which Mr. James D'Alwis arrives after a long investigation of the subject in his introduction to Kachchāyana's Grammar (published at Colombo, in 1863), p. cxxxii:—

"When, therefore, we consider the high state of refinement to which the Pali had in very early times attained as a language,—its copiousness, elegance and harmony, combined with its high antiquity, and its comparative simplicity, both verbally and grammatically,—its relationship to the oldest language of the Brahmans, from which their present dialect has been Sanskritized,—its claims to be considered the Vyavahārika-vāk of the Brahmans to which the Rig Veda refers,—its concurrence with some of the Indo-European languages in some forms which differ from the Sanskrit,—its identification with the only original Prākrita dialect, which was 'similar to the Sanskrit,'—the absence of any statement in old Brahman writers to the effect that that Prākrita dialect was a derivative of the Sanskrit,—the great improbability of a derivative being denominated the [Prakriti] Prākrita,—the palpable inaccuracy of the definition by which in modern times it is called the 'derived, the vulgar, or the ungrammatical,'—the absence in it of many a peculiarity which distinguishes derivative tongues,—and the probability that it had issued from the same ancient seat (Bactria or Punjab) from whence the Sanskrit itself had taken an easterly direction,—I believe it may be concluded that the Pali and the Sanskrit are, at least, two dialects of high antiquity, contemporaneously derived from a source of which few, if any, traces can be discovered at the present day."

In a review of Mr. D'Alwis's work in the Journal of the German Oriental Society for 1865, vol. xix., pp. 658, ff., Prof. Weber notices thus the remarks of that writer:—

"The long investigation which the author then institutes (pp. lxxiii–cxxxii) regarding the antiquity of the Pāli and its relation to the Sanskrit conducts him rightly to the conclusion that both dialects were 'contemporaneously' evolved from one source (viz., the Vedic language). He here shows himself to be a warm, patriotic admirer of the Pāli, but allows himself here and there to be carried away by this feeling beyond the proper limits into a depreciation of the Sanskrit, and specifically to assumptions respecting its purely arbitrary formation, which must appear to the European reader highly peculiar," etc. "Nevertheless, we owe even to this part of his labour the acknowledgment that he has striven to the best of his power to arrange and sketch the results and views both of native and European scholars, and that he has in general succeeded well in doing so. It can now in fact no longer be denied that it is better to understand the name Prākṛita in the sense of 'natural,' 'original,' 'normal,' 'common,' 'general,' and in the signification perhaps secondarily deduced therefrom, of 'common,' 'low,' than in the sense of 'derived' (saṁskṛitam prakṛitir yasya) assigned to the word by the grammarians.[107] And yet [107] In order to make this clause more intelligible, I quote Mr. D'Alwis's interpretation of the word Prākṛita from an earlier page of his introduction, p. xcii, where he writes thus: "Prakriti is therefore that which is natural, or the nature itself of a the assumption that the Pāli, and so the Prākṛit, are derived from the Sanskrit, deserves the preference over the converse view to which D'Alwis appears here and there to be not indisposed, viz., that the Pāli, as being the most ancient Prākṛit which has been handed down to us, stands higher in point of originality and independence than the Sanskrit. For it is clear that the Sanskrit, both in its phonetic system and flexions, stands much closer to the common mother of it and the Pāli than the latter does,[108] and has consequently a far superior right than it to be regarded as the representative of that parent language. A perplexing circumstance connected with this question, and one which leads to many sorts of mistakes, is that we have unfortunately no proper name for that stage of the language which lies at the foundation of both the 'sister dialects,' the Pāli (and Prākṛit) and the Sanskrit, i.e. for the Vedic vulgar speech; for the names bhāshā and vyāvahārikī are not sufficiently pregnant; and one is consequently thing—that which is pre-eminent—that which is the natural or quiescent state of anything—'not made.' Hence it is clear that the correct and primary sense of the word Prākṛita,—indeed that which was originally assigned to it, despite the so-called 'common acceptation,'—was 'original,' 'root,' 'natural.' By the Prākrit was therefore at first meant the original Indian language, as distinguished from the apabhransa, 'the ungrammatical,' and the Sanskrit, signifying [from sam 'altogether', or 'together,' and kṛita 'done' = 'altogether,' or 'completely made, done, or formed'] that 'which has been composed or formed by art, adorned, embellished, purified, highly cultivated or polished,' and regularly inflected as a language." See in opposition to this view of the sense of the word prākṛita, Hemachandra's interpretation of it given above in p. 44, and Lassen's explanation, quoted in p. 51. In a review of Prof. Weber's Ind. Literaturgeschichte, in the Journal of the German Oriental Society for 1853, p. 605, Prof. Roth thus expresses himself on this question: "Prākṛit (according to the derivation which seems to me the correct one) signifies that which has its foundation in another thing, 'the derived,' or the 'to be derived.' The expression is one formed by grammarians, and has a grammatical sense. The grammarians say e.g. saṁhitā pada-prākṛitis; the Sanhitā texts have for their foundation the words, i.e. that form of speaking and writing the texts in which the end and beginning of the words which follow one another in a sentence are brought into harmony with the general phonetic laws of Sanskrit has for its foundation the single words conceived in their original form. The Sanhitā text is thus prākṛitā in relation to the word-text, the pada-pāṭha: it is a derived text made for a scientific purpose. I would understand the word prākṛita in the same sense, when it is applied to the dialects." In Böhtlingk and Roth's Sanskrit Lexicon the sense "customary," "common," is assigned to the word prākṛita when generally used, while of the dialect so called it is said: "The 'common' speech is that spoken by the people, which the grammarians derive from Sanskrit."

[108] This, however, can afford us no reason to deny that the Pāli has actually preserved older forms than the Sanskrit. [Note of Prof. Weber.]

at a loss how to designate it. Benfey's excellent remarks at p. 245 of his article Indien (which unfortunately has not yet been re-written), regarding the dying out of the Sanskrit as a vernacular language in the sixth century B.C. labour under this disadvantage, that they apply the name Sanskrit for a period for which it is in no way applicable."

The views of Burnouf and Lassen on the relation of the Pāli to Sanskrit are thus stated in their Essai sur le Pali, pp. 138, ff:

"The Pali is derived from the Sanskrit, according to certain rules, for the most part euphonic, which do not allow the derivative language to admit certain sounds and combinations of consonants, common in the parent tongue. These modifications apply equally to the substantive portions of the words and to their terminations and inflections. It hence results that there is no grammatical form to be found in Pali of which the origin may not be discovered in Sanskrit; and that there is no occasion to call in the influence of any foreign idiom to explain the modifications to which the Pali has subjected the Sanskrit.

"When the Pali, as a derivative from Sanskrit, is compared with other dialects having the same origin, it is found to approach far more closely than any of those others to that common source. It stands, so to speak, on the first step of the ladder of departure from Sanskrit, and is the first of the series of dialects which break up that rich and fertile language. But it appears that the Pali, which contained in itself the germs of alteration already greatly developed, was arrested in its progress all at once, and fixed in the condition in which we now find it, i.e., in a state of almost immediate connexion with the language from which it proceeded. In fact the greater part of the words which form the basis of the one, are found without modification in the other; those which are modified can all be traced to their Sanskrit root; in short, no words of foreign origin are to be found in Pali."

Again:—

"We shall not enter into new details regarding the manner in which the Pali has been derived from the Sanskrit. The laws which have guided the formation of that language are the same which we find at work in other idioms in different ages and countries; these laws are general, because they are necessary. Whether we compare the languages which are derived from Latin with the Latin itself, or the later Teutonic dialects with the ancient languages of the same stock, or the modern with the ancient Greek, or the numerous popular dialects of India with the Sanskrit, we shall see the same principles developed, the same laws applied. The organic inflections of the parent languages are seen to exist in part, but in a state of evident alteration. More commonly they will be found to have disappeared, and to have been replaced, the case-terminations by particles, and the tenses by auxiliary verbs. The processes vary in different languages, but the principle is the same; it is always analytic, whether the reason of this be that a synthetic language happens all at once to become the speech of barbarians who do not understand its structure, and therefore suppress its inflections, and replace them by other signs; or whether it be that when abandoned to its natural course, and as a necessity of its cultivation, it tends to decompose and to subdivide the representative signs of ideas and relations, just as it unceasingly decomposes and subdivides the ideas and the relations themselves. The Pali appears to have undergone this last sort of alteration; it is Sanskrit, not such as it would be spoken by a strange population, to whom it would be new; but pure Sanskrit, becoming altered and modified in proportion as it becomes popular. In this manner it still preserves its declension, instead of replacing it by particles, as the modern dialects of India do. One form only, the ablative in to might pass for the commencement of the analytic declension; but it is already found in the parent language. A great number of Pali forms might be cited to prove that the modifications, which it has made in the Sanskrit, are of the same kind as those which the Italian, among other tongues, has made in the Latin. Thus the assimilation of consonants, which in Italian makes letto from lectus, and scritto for scriptus, is one of the principles of Pali."

The Pāli, in the precise form in which we find it in the Ceylonese books, could scarcely have been a vernacular language. At least, it exhibits a variety of refinements which could hardly have been employed in common speech; but seem likely to have been confined to the language of composition, or introduced after the Pāli had ceased to be the spoken tongue of the followers of Buddha, and had become consecrated to the service of religion and literature: just as the grammar of the Sanskrit itself became regulated by more fixed and rigid rules, after it had been removed from the deteriorating influences of vernacular use. Such a peculiarity is the use of interpolated, or the retention of otherwise disused, consonants to obviate the inharmonious sounds which would arise from the collision of vowels. No less than nine letters, y, v, m, d, n, t, r, l, and g, are employed for this purpose, as is shown in the following examples, viz.:

1.	y — na	+ imassa	becomes		na*y*imassa.
2.	v — ti	+ angikam	„		ti*v*angikam.
3.	m — lahu	+ essati	„		lahu*m*essati.
4.	d — atta	+ attham	„		atta*d*attham.
5.	n — ito	+ āyati	„		ito*n*āyati.
6.	t — tasmā	+ iha	„		tasmā*t*iha.
7.	r — sabbhi	+ eva	„		sabbhi*r*eva.
8.	l — cha	+ abhiṇṇa	„		cha*l*abhiṇṇa.
9.	g — putha	+ eva	„		putha*g*eva.[109]

This peculiarity of attention to euphony is common to the Pāli with the Sanskrit; and though the means they use are for the most part [109] Clough's Pāli Grammar, p. 11. On this subject I translate the following remarks made by Dr. Kuhn in a review of the first edition of this volume, in his Beiträge zur Vergleichenden Sprachforschung u.s.w. vol. iii. p. 241, f.; "As regards the interpolation of euphonic letters treated of in p. 82, I cannot entirely agree with the author when he claims them for the written language alone: the greater part of them show that they are by no means what are called interpolations, but the old auslaut" (i.e. concluding consonant) "which the preceding words had in an earlier stage of the language. I have briefly treated of them in the first volume of these Beiträge, p. 126, and here only repeat that I now regard only the y and the v in na-y-imassa, and ti-v-angikam as real euphonic interpolations; and that I look upon the latter as having proceeded from y." I subjoin a translation of the remarks referred to by the writer as having been previously made by him in the 1st vol. of the Beiträge, p. 126:—"A comparison with the Sanskrit shows that only a few of those apparently interpolated consonants are due to an actual interpolation, as the others are remains of an earlier condition of the language. The Pali has almost entirely rejected the final mutes, and the few cases in which such are found are to be regarded as exceptions. When for instance etad eva is found in place of the ordinary etam eva, this is an archaism which Lassen rightly explains by the close juxtaposition of the following eva to the preceding etad. In the same way we are to explain tasmāt iha from the Sanskrit tasmād iha, sabbhir eva from sadbhir eva, chhalabhiññā from shalabhijñās, which as a technical designation preserved the old form (see Turnour, Mahavānso, p. 31, 1, and elsewhere), puthageva from pṛithag eva, prageva from prāg eva. Of the remaining instances nayimassa, tivangikam, and itonayati are indeed to be regarded as cases of consonantal interpolation, whilst lahum essati and attadattham may still remain doubtful. Clough further states, in p. 14, that m̃ is sometimes introduced as an augment before both vowels and consonants; that thus chakkhuṁ anichchaṁ (Sanskrit chakshur anityam) stands for chakkhu anichcham, avaṁsiro for ava siro; but in the first case, as in that of lahum essati, perhaps another different, yet in neither case could the refinements employed in writing have been practised in the language of ordinary life. The Pāli has other characteristics (borrowed from the Sanskrit) which could scarcely have been very common in the vernacular dialects of Northern India, supposed to have been contemporary with it; such as the use of desiderative, and nominal verbs; like jighachchhati, he wishes to eat; pabbatāyati, he resembles a mountain; puttiyati, he treats like a son.[110]

Fausböll observes in his introduction to the Dhammapada (p. vi.) that the antiquity of that work is proved by the character of its language, which approaches closely to the Sanskrit, even in some of its oldest forms, and differs widely from the diction of the prose Sūtras, explanation is possible, whilst in the second case, the assumption of an interpolation appears decidedly wrong, as the final mute of the Sanskrit was probably nasalized. Nevertheless, Clough's rule appears to be correct, since at least Turnour's text shows some other examples of this interpolation. Thus in p. 50, line 14, ewañ te-m attaṇo nāmañ katwā janapadañ bahuñ, unless perhaps te-m is here mutilated (verstümmelt) from the Sanskrit te īme; and in p. 52, line 4, yatra-m-ichchasi tam aññatra yakkhehi wijite mama, where, however, certainly the metre declares itself (spricht) not only against the interpolation of m, but also in favour of the elision of the final a of yatra." It is to be observed that the same interpolation (if I am right in so calling it) of more than one letter (as in yatha-r-iva for yathā-iva), is to be found in the language of the Gāthās in the Lalita vistara, which will be treated of further on. This shows that the process did not begin in Ceylon.

The following are instances collected from the Lalita vistara of the euphonic insertion of consonants between vowels which may be compared with the cases of a similar character which have been adduced in the text as occurring in Pāli.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.
Lalita vistara, 428.	vartishye 'sya	vartishyam asya
,, 63.	yathā eva	yatha+r+iva
,, 195.	tvayā iha	tvam iha
,, 154.	avamānam, akhilāḥ	avamānu,+r+akhilā
	sa upagataḥ	cha rūpagatu
,, 220.	śabdānubhāvena	śabda+r+anubhāva
,, 215.	śrutvā idam	śrutva+m+idam
,, 355.	muchye itaḥ	muchye+m+itaḥ
,, 239.	lābhā ehi	lābhī+m+ehi
,, 370.	svake ātmani	svaki+m+ātmani
,, 398.	tatra asi	tatra+m+asi
,, 471.	tava upaimi	tava+m+upemu
,, 430.	dṛishṭvā imām	dṛishṭvā+n+imām
,, 3.	sva ushṇīsha	sa+v+ushṇīsha

[110] Some desiderative verbs and nouns must, however, have been in ordinary use in the Prākṛits; as we find in the modern vernaculars some words which have their origin in desideratives. Thus the Hindī bhūkh, hunger, must come from bubhukkhā, a Prākṛit corruption of bubhukshā. The Hindī piyās, thirst, too, is probably derived from pipāsā, though it may also have been compounded of p.'+ās'ā, a desire to drink.

and of the commentary of Buddhoghosa. Thus we find in the Dhammapada such forms as these, viz., the nominative of the present participle in am, as gaṉayam, rodam (instead of gaṉayanto, etc.); the third person plural of the present middle in ăre as sochare, upapajjare; and the dative form of the infinitive, as netave, pahātave, which is usually found only in the Vedas, etc. It is clear from this that the Pāli appears in various phases of greater or less antiquity.

Professor Aufrecht has favoured me with the following notices of Vedic forms which occur in Pāli:—"Besides the infinitive in tave, used after verbs, expressing wish or desire, as well as tum, the Pāli uses, in agreement with the Prākṛit and Mahratta an indeclinable participle in tvāna, and contracted, tūna. Katvāna or kātūna gachchhati =kṛitvā gachchhati. ["Having done he goes."][111] These forms agree with ancient forms which are mentioned by Pāṉini as Vaidic, namely pītvānam=pītvā, ishṭvīnaṁ devān=ishṭvā devān, Pāṉini vii. 1, 48. Yāska Nirukta vi. 7, assumes that asme can stand for all cases of vayam. The Pāli declines amhe=asme in all cases. Nom. amhe, acc. amhe or amhākam (=asmākam), instr. amhebhi or amhehi, gen. amhākam.

"Further, the Pāli has preserved the instrumental in ebhis. It says buddhebhi or buddhehi = buddhaiḥ; bhi or hi in all declensions; for the declension of go, it has in the gen. pl. gavaṁ or guṉṉaṁ or goṉāṁ, the last form being the Vaidic gonāṁ. Neuters in a, i, u, like phala, aṭṭhi (asthi), madhu, have either the regular plur. nom. acc. phalāni, aṭṭhīni, madhūni or phalā, aṭṭhī, madhū, just as in the Vedas.

"There is one more modern form that is found in the Veda. The Pāli has assa (asya) or imassa (imasya), so also the Prākṛit imassa, etc. Now we find in Rig Veda, viii. 13, 21, imasya pāhi andhasaḥ for asya. This is more curious than to find in the Matsyapurāṉa imair vidvāṁsaiḥ for ebhir vidvadbhiḥ."

Notwithstanding the introduction of various refinements into the Pāli, after it became the sacred language of the Buddhist religion, there can be no doubt, as Burnouf considers (Lotus, App. 862), that it substantially represents to us the language which was in vernacular use in Behar, and in all the central parts of Northern India, at the era when Buddhism was first introduced, i.e., in the third, fourth, and fifth centuries B.C. Such being the case, we should naturally expect to find that it bears a strong resemblance to the Prākṛit dialects; which, as we have already seen (in the preceding section) were either spoken, or closely resembled dialects which were spoken, in the same provinces in the first centuries of the Christian era. That such was actually the case, is put beyond a doubt by a comparison of these dialects with the Pāli. I shall immediately proceed to prove, by some comparative lists of nouns, pronouns, verbs, and particles, first, that an extensive class of Sanskrit words undergoes precisely the same modifications in the Pāli as in the Prākṛit; and secondly, that in some respects the modification of Sanskrit words and forms of inflection had not proceeded so far in Pāli as it afterwards did in Prākṛit. From this comparison it will result that the Pāli stands nearer to the Sanskrit, and represents a more ancient phase of the vernacular speech of Northern India than is exhibited in the Prākṛit.

[111] Some further specimens of this form will be given in the Tables which follow.

The following is a comparative scheme of the declension corresponding to the Sanskrit one in á, in which it will be seen that the Pāli is somewhat nearer than the Prākṛit to the Sanskrit forms. (Clough, p. 19; Cowell, p. xxiv.)

Singular.		Plural.
PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.
1. Buddhō.	Buddho.	1. Buddhā.	Buddhā.
2. Buddham.	Buddham.	2. Buddhe.	Buddhe. Buddhā.
3. Buddhena.	Buddhena.	3. Buddhehi. Buddhebhi.	Buddhehi.
4. Buddhāya. Buddhassa.	Same as 6th case.	4. Buddhānam.	Same as 6th case.
5. Buddhasmā. Buddhā. Buddhamhā.	Buddhādō. Buddhā. Buddhāhi.	5. Buddhehi. Buddhebhi.	Buddhāhinto. Buddhāsunto.
6. Buddhassa.	Buddhassa.	6. Buddhānam.	Buddhāṇam.
7. Buddhasmiṇ. Buddhe. Buddhamhi.	Buddhe. Buddhammi.	7. Buddhesu.	Buddhesu.

The first personal pronoun in the two languages is as follows: (Clough, p. 61; Cowell, p. xxviii.).—In most cases the Pāli is nearest to the Sanskrit.

Singular.		Plural.
PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.
1. aham.	aham.	1. mayam. amhe.	vaam. amhe.
2. mam. mamam.	mam. mamam.	2. amhākam. amhe.	no. amhe.
3. mayā.	me. maë.	3. amhebhi. amhehi.	amhehiṉ.
4. mamʃa. 6. mayham. amham. mamam.	me. mama. majjh. maha.	4.) 6.) amhākam.	amhāṉam.
5. mayā.	matto.	5. amhebhi. amhehi.	amhāhinto. amhāsunto.
7. mayi.	mayi. mamammi.	7. amhesu.	amhesu.

The second personal pronoun, as it appears in both dialects will be given in a following Table.

The Pāli verb seems to be far more complete than the Pākṛit. The following are some of its principal tenses, as compared with those of the latter: (Clough, p. 100, ff.; Cowell, p. xxix.)

PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.
Parasmai-pada, or active mood.		Ātmane-pada, or middle-mood.
Singular.	Singular.	Singular.	Singular.
1. pachāmi.	1. pachāmi. pachami.	1. ṇache.	(wanting.)
2. pachasi.	2. pachasi.	2. pachase.	2. pachase.
3. pachati.	3. pachadi. pachaï.	3. pachate.	3. pachade. pachae.
Plural.	Plural.	Plural.	Plural.
1. pachāma.	1. pachāmo. pachimo, etc.	1. pachāmhe.	(wanting.)
2. pachatha.	2. pachaha. pachitthā.	2. pachavhe.	ditto.
3. pachanti.	3. pachanti.	3. pachante.	ditto.

The Pāli has also, like the Sanskrit, a potential mood, and three past tenses, which in the parasmai-pada or active mood, are as follows:

Singular.	Plural.	Singular.	Plural.
I. Potential.		II. Reduplicated perfect.
1. pacheyyāmi.	1. pacheyyāma.	1. papacha.	1. papachimha.
2. pacheyyāsi.	2. pacheyyātha.	2. papache.	2. papachittha.
3. pache. pacheyya.	3. pacheyyum.	3. papacha.	3. papachu.
III. Imperfect.		IV. Third preterite.
1. apacha.	1. apachamhā.	1. apachim.	1. apachimhā.
2. apacho.	2. apachattha.	2. apacho.	2. apachittha.
3. apachā.	3. apachū.	3. apachi.	3. apachum. apachimsu.

In Prākṛit, on the other hand, few traces appear to remain of any past tenses at all. Mr. Cowell says, p. xxix, "The only tenses of the active voice which remain seem to be the present, the second future, and the imperative." In the 23rd, 24th, and 25th aphorisms of Chapter VII., and in the 17th aphorism of Chapter VIII. of Vararuchi, however (Cowell, pp. 162, 163), mention is made of a past tense, of which the instances, huvīa, hohīa, āsi,[112] 'he was,' hasīa, 'he laughed,' kāhīa, 'he did,' are given. Few instances of the past tense in Prākṛit, however, seem to occur in the dramas; but it is inconceivable that in the Prākṛit dialects which were currently spoken in the long interval between the disuse of the Pāli and the rise of the modern vernaculars (in both of which we find past tenses), there should have been no grammatical forms in daily use for expressing past time. It is not, however, necessary to pursue this subject further: as the details and explanations which I have already furnished, together with the tables which follow, are amply sufficient to show the place which the Pāli and the Prākṛit dialects respectively occupied in the history of North-Indian speech.[113]

[112] The form āsa, "was," occurs in Hāla's Saptaśataka 128, p. 114, of Weber's edition.

[113] The following note in p. 107 of the first edition should have been placed in p. 55 of the present edition, as an addition to note 101.

[Professor Müller considers the data—derived from Buddhist sources—on which the death of Buddha is placed in 543 B.C., and on which the occurrence of any Buddhist synods before the one in Aśoka's time, is asserted, to be fictitious and unsatisfactory. Though he does not try to bring down Buddha's death below 477 B.C., he regards all the Buddhist dates before Chandragupta as merely hypothetical. See his "Ancient Sanskrit Literature," received while this Section was in the press, pp. 260–300.]

Table No. III.

Containing a List of words which are identical, or nearly so, in Pāli and Prākṛit.

[The authorities for the Pāli words in these Lists are the Dhammapada, a Pāli work edited by Fausböll, the Pāli Grammar of the Rev. B. Clough (Ceylon, 1824), Burnouf and Lassen's Essai sur le Pali, Spiegel's Kammavākya, and Anecdota Palica, containing the Rāsavāhinī, etc., and Turnour's Mahāwanso (Ceylon, 1837). The authorities for the Prākṛit words are partly given in the previous List, No. I., p. 15, ff. In the present edition the lists have been greatly enlarged, and parallel words from the Gāthā dialect in the Lalita Vistara (Lv.) are occasionally introduced. The Pāli column has had the advantage of being revised by Mr. Childers, and the additional Prākṛit words are taken from the Bālarāmāyaṇa (Br.) the Prasannarāghava (Pr.), and the Saptaśalaka (Śś.) A good many Prākṛit words, for which no Pāli equivalents have been found, are left in the list; as they will at least show the mutations which the Sanskrit undergoes in the former dialect.]

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Dham. 43. Clough, 15. Mrichh. 44. Var. xii. 22.	strī	istri, istrī, istriya, istrikā	itthī itthi	itthī, itthiyā	a woman.
Clough 39. Var. iii. 10.	dṛishṭi		diṭṭhi	diṭṭhi	sight.
Bālarāmāyaṇa, 215.	dṛishṭa		diṭṭha	diḍa	seen.
Br. 210. Clough, 39.	vṛishṭi		vuṭṭhi	viṭṭhi	rain.
Br. 73.	sṛishṭi		saṭṭhi	sishṭhī	discharge.
Br. 238, 245, 248, 267, 287. Pr. 44.	prishṭha		piṭṭhi piṭṭha	puṭhṭhi, puṭhṭha, piṭhṭha, vaṭhṭha, vaṭṭa, veṭha	the back.
Br. 175. Pr. 41.	mishṭā			miṭhṭhā, miṭṭhī	sweet (fem.)
Dham. 5.	śreshṭha		seṭṭha	seṭṭha	best.
Br. 79, 113, 144. Cl. 37.	jyeshṭha		jeṭṭha	jeṭṭha, jeṭhṭha	eldest.
Br. 113, 223, 225.	kanishṭha		kaniṭṭha	kaniṭṭa, kaniṭṭha, kaniṭhṭha	youngest.
Br. 6, 122, 225.	varishṭha			variṭhṭha	best.
Clough, 39. Var. iii. 10.	tushṭi		tuṭṭhi	tuṭṭhi	satisfaction.
Br. 224.	garishṭha			gariṭhṭha	heaviest.
Clough, 27.	mushṭi		muṭṭhi	muṭṭhi	the fist.
Br. 56, 194, f.	dushṭa		duṭṭha	duṭhṭha	wicked.
Br. 270.	dashṭa		daṭṭha	daṭhṭha	bitten.
Br. 34.	nivishṭa		niviṭṭha	niviṭhṭha	entered, placed.
B. & Las. 166. Br. 6. Pr. 20.	śishṭaḥ dishṭyā pravishṭa		siṭṭho diṭṭhā paviṭṭha	siṭṭho diṭhṭhiā paviṭhṭha	instructed. by good luck. entered.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Br. 86.	sushṭha		suṭṭhu	suṭhṭhu	woll.
Br. 203, 270.	nishṭhura		niṭṭhura	niṭhṭhura	severe.
Br. 179, 242, 294.	goshṭhī			goṭhṭhī	assembly.
Br. 270, 278. Clough, 2.	oshṭha		oṭṭha	oṭhṭha	lip.
Br. 259, 270.	daṁshṭrā		dāṭhā	dāḍhā	tusk.
Mrich. 18, 30.	kāshṭha		kaṭṭha	kaṭṭha	wood.
Dham. 3. 50.	vṛiksham		rukkham	rukkham, ukkham	tree.
Pr. 84. Br. 155, 219.	vṛittānta		vuttanta	vuttanta	intelligence.
Pr. 114 f, 125. Br. 216.	vṛittānta			uttanta	intelligence.
Pr. 84, Br. 53, 56.	saṁvṛitta		saṁvaṭṭa	saṁvutta	happened.
Pr. 303.	nivṛitta		nivatta	nivutta	ceased.
Pr. 44.	vṛishabha		usabha	vusaha	bull.
Pr. 91.	tṛina		tiṇa	tuṇa	grass.
Mrichh. 3, 126.	ghṛita		ghata	ghia	ghee.
Pr. 19.	prakshyāmi		pucchissāmi	putsissam	I shall ask.
Var. i. 29. Lass. 293. Vikr. 45. Ss. ind. 244.	prāvṛish		pāvusā	pāusa	rainy season.
Br. 157, 163. Var. i. 27.	vṛiddha		vuddha, vuḍḍha, buḍḍha	buḍḍha, viddha, vaddha	old.
Dham. 52. Var. i. 27.	smṛiti		sati	. . .	recollection.
Mrich. 94 f.	mṛittikā		nattikā	maṭṭiā	earth.
Br. 131.	ṛitu		utu	ridu	season.
Br. 199.	kṛitānta			kayanta	fate.
Mrich. 14, 95, 116, 141, Var. iv. 32. Br. 178, 164 f.	gṛiha		gaha, ghara	ghala, ghara, giha, haraa	house.
Pr. 303.	gṛihiṇī		gharaṇī	gharinī	wife.
Pr. 33, 35, 38, 41.	gṛihiṇītva			gharinittaṇa	state of a wife.
Dham. 13.	gṛihī		gihī	giha (house)	householder.
Dham 46.	artham		attham	attham	meaning.
Dham. 47.	sarva		sabba	sabba, savva	all.
Dham. 1.	pūrva		pubba	pubba, puvva	first.
Br. 169, 231, 238.	śīrsha		sīsa	sīsa	head.
Br. 168, 235, 262, 270.	dīrgha		dīgha	dīha	long.
Br. 126, 198, 267, 293.	mārga		magga	magga	road.
Br. 7, 36, 70.	sarga, nisarga		sagga, nissagga	sagga, nisagga	section. nature.
Dham. 23.	svarga		sagga	sagga	heaven.
Br. 10. Cl. 2.	varga		vagga	vagga	class.
Br. 199.	durga		dugga	dugga	inaccessible.
Br. 293.	nirgama		niggama	niggama	going out (noun).

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Br. 55, 76, 178, 276. Pr. 134.	garbha		gabbha	gabbha, gabhbha	womb.
Pr. 34.	nirghosha		nigghosa	nighghosa	sound.
Pr. 33. Br. 69, 87, 198. 288.	ardha		addha, aḍḍha	addha	half.
Pr. 48. Br. 267, 298. Bur. and Lass. 166.	dharma		dhamma	dhamma	righteousness
Br. 94.	karma		kamma	kamma	work.
Dham. 43.	karmakāra, charmakāra		kammakāra, kammāra, chammakāra	chammūra	blacksmith; leather cutter
Br. 64, 72, 94.	nirmāṇa		nimmāna	nimmāṇa	construction.
Br. 7.	charmachakshuḥ			chammachakkhū	leather-eyed.
Br. 246.	kūrma		kumma	kumma	tortoise.
Pr. 126.	avatīrṇa		otiṇṇa	avatiṇṇa	descended.
Br. 200.	uttīrṇa		uttiṇṇa	uttīṇa	crossed.
Pr. 46, 48.	tarkayāmi		takkemi	takkemi	I reason.
Pr. 12, 48. Br. 228, 245.	karṇa		kaṇṇa	kaṇṇa	ear.
Br. 200.	sampūrṇa		sampuṇṇa	sampuṇṇa	full.
Br. 298.	parṇa		paṇṇa	paṇṇa	feather.
Br. 264.	Tāmraparṇi		Tambapaṇṇi	Tambavaṇṇī	Ceylon.
Br. 142, 198. Bur. & Ls. 166.	varṇa		vaṇṇa	vaṇṇa	colour.
Br. 291.	suvarṇa		suvaṇṇa, soṇṇa	suvaṇṇa	gold.
Br.	udgīrṇa			udgiṇṇa	vomited.
Br. 240, 243.	kīrṇa		kiṇṇa	kiṇṇa	crowded.
Br. 147, 200, 278.	chūrṇa		chuṇṇa	chuṇṇa	crushed.
Br. 267.	nirvāṇa		nibbāna	nivvāṇa	extinction.
Br. 209, 289, 307.	kīrtti		kitti	kitti	renown.
Br. 198, 278.	marttaṇḍa			mattaṇḍa	the sun.
Br. 129, 198, 287.	nirvighna		nibbigga	nivviggha, nivvighgha, nivvigghgha	without obstacles.
Br. 241.	nirjhara		nijjhara	nijjhara	a cascade.
Br. 154.	nirvāhana		nibbāhana	nivvāhaṇa	effecting.
Br. 153 ff.	duryaśaḥ			dujjasa	bad repute.
Br. 86, 179.	darpa		dappa	dappa	pride.
Br. 216.	upasarpāmaḥ		upasappāma	uvasappamha	we approach.
Br. 5, 179.	kandarpa			kandappa	the god of love.
Br. 129, 194.	darpaṇa		dappana	dappaṇa	a mirror.
Br. 142, 178.	karpūra		kappūra	kappūra	camphor.
Br. 221.	kārpāsa		kappāsa	kappāsa	cotton.
Br. 218.	paraspara			paroppara	mutual.
Br. 239.	kūrpara		kappara	kuppara	elbow, knee.
Br. 236.	karkara			kakkara	limestone.
Br. 239.	śarkarā		sakkhara	sakkara	gravel.
S'ak. 25.	kharjūra		khajjūrī	khajjūra	date tree.
Br. 240.	kardama		kaddama	kaddama	mud.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Br. 243. Br. 203.	paryasta nirlūṇa		pallattha	pallattha ṇillūṇa	thrown down cut.
Pr.144. Br.52.	durlabha		dullabha	dullaha	difficult to obtain.
Pr. 16, 48. Dham. 56.	samarpita		samappita	samappida	entrusted.
Br. 178.	muhūrta		muhutta	muhutta	moment.
Br. 136, 215.	vārtā		vāttā	vattā	intelligence.
Br. 242, 266, 147.	sārtha		sattha	sattha	a band of travellers.
Br. 198.	tīrtha		tittha	tittha	place of pilgrimage.
Br. 234.	sammarda			sammadda	friction.
Br. 265, 267.	vimarda			vimadda
Br. 181, 194.	parvata		pabbata	pavvada	mountain.
Br. 179.	Pārvatī		Pabbatī	Pabbadī	Pārvatī.
Br. 113, Pr. 114, 137.	ārya		ariya, ayya	ajja	respectable person.
Br. 94.	sammārjita		sammajjita	samajjida	cleansed.
Br. 209.	garjita		gajjita	gajjida	thundered.
Cl. 19. Br. 73.	chandra		chanda	chanda	moon.
Br.36,130 f, 148, 299. Clough, 27.	granthi		ganṭhi	ganṭhi	a knot.
Br. 113, 144, 223. Mrichh. 72. Var. v. 35.	bhrātā, bhrātuḥ		bhātā	bhāda, bhāā, bhāduṇo	brother (nom. and gen.).
Br. 238.	graha		gaha	gāha	taking.
Br. 308.	śighra		sīgha	siggha	quickly.
Br. 149.	yātrā		yātrā	jattā	journey.
Br. 34, 52.	chitra		chitta, chitra	chitta	variegated.
Br. 8, 53, 69, 86, 98, 267.	gotra		gotta	gotta	family, clan.
Br. 86.	kshuraprā		khurappā	khurappā	a kind of arrow.
Pr. 122.	bhadra		bhadda, bhadra	bhadda	good.
Br. 145, 198.	tatkāla		takkāla	takkāla	that time.
Br. 86, 98. Pr. 10, 21.	sahasra		sahassa	sahassa	a thousand.
Br. 121.	vaktra		vatta	vakka	mouth.
Pr. 140.	vakra		vaṅka	vakka	crooked.
Pr. 14.	chakra		chakka	chakka	wheel.
Br. 20, 120, 198, 245. Pr. 16.	chakravartti		cakkavatti	chakkavaṭṭi chakkavatti	emperor.
Br. 198. Dham. 59.	srotas		sota	sota, sotta	stream.
Br. 5, 71, 293. Cl. 52. Bur. & Las. 165.	patra pātra		patta	patta	leaf, vessel.
Br. 132.	sāmagrī		sāmaggī	sāmagg	implements.
Br. 87, 243. B. & Las. 85.	rātra, rātri		ratta, ratti	ratta, ranti	night.
Br. 67, 75.	netra		netta	ṇetta	eye.
B. & Las. 91. Br. 24, 247.	mitra		mitta	miṭṭa	friend.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GATHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Br. 35, 65; 75.	mātra		matta	metta	measure.
Br. 270.	bhrukuṭī			bhiuḍī	frown.
Br. 71, 182.	bhrū		bhū	bhū	eyebrow.
Br. 209.	mantra		manta	manta	advice.
Br. 221.	yantra		yanta	yantra	an engine.
Br. 20.	abhra		abbha	abhbha	cloud.
Br. 221, 267.	sūtra		sutta	sutta	thread.
Pr.21. Br.165, 167, 174, 297.	putra		putta	putta	son.
Pr. 65.	jāgrat		jāgaṭam	jagganta	waking.
Pr. 45.	prāghuṇasya		pāhuṇassa	pāhuṇassa	guest (gen.
Br. 156, 279.	aśru		assu	asu	a tear. [sing.)
Br. 26. Cl. 51.	vyāghrasya		vyagghassa	vaghghassa	tiger (gen. s.)
Br. 267.	krodha		kodhą	kodha	anger.
Br. 113, 126.	vikrama		vikkama	vikkama	valour.
Br. 67,88,113.	parākrama		parakkama	parakkamma, parakkama	valour.
Br. 55, 113.	vibhrama		vibbhama	vibbhama	flurry.
B. & Las. 166.	nigraha		niggaha	niggaha	control.
Br. 64.	pariśrama		parissama	parissama	toil.
Br.21,113,276	miśra		missa	missa	mixed.
Br. 278.	viśrāma		vissama	vissāma	rest.
Br. 94.	grāma		gāma	gāma	village.
Br.279.Dh.44.	prāṇa		pāṇa	pāṇa	life.
Br. 294.	adri		addi	addi	a mountain.
Br. 189, 202, 237, 290.	samudra		samudda	samudda	the ocean.
Br. 220, 223, 267.	nidrā		niddā	ṇiddā	sleep.
Br. 165.	daridra		dalidda	daridda, dalidda	poor.
Br. 297.	Rudra		Rudda	Rudda	Rudra.
Br. 142.	mudrā		muddā	muddā	a seal.
Dham 24. Var. iii. 3.	priyam		piyam		dear.
Br. 48. Pr. 13, 46, 119. Clough, 26.	agni		aggi, aggini, gini	aggi	fire.
Br. 218.	budhna			buddha	bottom.
Dham. 25. Var. iii. 2.	nagna		nagga	ṇagga	naked.
Br.82,126,130	bhagna		bhagga	bhagga	broken.
Br. 137.	vijnāna		viññāṇa	viṇṇāṇa	knowledge.
Br. 293.	jnāna		ñāṇa	jāṇa
Br. 227.	ājnā		āṇā, aññā	aṇṇā	command.
Br.168,176. Ss. ind. 255.	snushā		sunisā, suṇhā	suṇā, susā, soṇhā	daughter-in-law.
Br. 281.	patnīnām		patānīnam	padiṇam	of wives.
B. & Las. 166.	jnātam		ñātam	ṇātam	known.
Br. 35,80,145.	kārya		kāriya	kajja	work.
Bur. 58, 157. Pr. 46.	rājya		rajja	rajja	kingdom.
Dh. 44, Cl. 10. Br. 86, 202.	vidyā, avidyā		vijjā, avijjā	vijjā, avijjā	knowledge. ignorance.
Dham. 62.	madhya		majjha	majjha	middle.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Dham. 33.	dhyānam		jhānam	jhānam	contemplation
Br. 262, 264. Pr. 137.	vidyādhara			vijjāhara	a sort of deity.
Mahāv. 182. Br. 50. Lv. 204.	vidyut	vidyu	vijju, vijjutā	vijju, vijjulī	lightning.
Br. 136. Br. 131, 269.	vaidyatva		vejjatta	vejjattaṇa	profession of a physician.
Pr. 32, 55, 114, 134, 144 Dham. 58.	adya		ajja	ajja	to-day.
Br. 125. Pr. 32.	udyāna		uyyāna	ujjāna	a garden.
Br. 147, 262.	niravadya		niravajja	ṇiravajja	blameless.
Br. 147.	vādyat		vajjamāna	vajjanta	sounding.
	vādyamāna
	udbhidyamāna		ubbhijjamāna	ubbhijjanta	being split.
	nibadhyamāna		nibajjhamāna	ṇivajjhanta	being stopped
Br. 58, 169, 181, 198.	Vindhya		Viñjha	Vinjha	Vindhya mountains.
Clough, 37.	bandhyā		vañjhā	vanjhā[114]	barren woman.
Br. 226.	bandhyībhūta			vanjhjhībhūda	become barren.
Br. 245.	adhyavasya			ajhjhavasia	having striven
Br. 144. 150.	Ayodhyā			Aojjhā	Ayodhyā.
Br. 135.	sandhyā		sanjhā	sanjhā	evening.
Kam. 3. Var. ii. viii. 25, etc. Br. 185 ff.	upādhyāya		upajjhāya upajjha	uvajjhāa uajjhāa, ojhāa	religious teacher.
Br. 69.	nidhyāyantī			ṇijjhāantī	meditating.
Br. 121.	aparādhyati		aparajjhati	aparajjhaï	he offends.
Br. 20, 105.	sādhvasa			sajjhasa	fear.
Br. 168, 180, 216 f.	yuddha		yujjha	jujjha	battle.
Br. 105.	yujyate		yujjati	jujjadi	it is proper.
Br.	pratyūsha		pachchūsa	pachchūsa	morning.
Br. 71.	pāṇḍitya		paṇḍichcha	paṇḍichcha	learning.
Dham. 3, 24. Var. iii. 27.	pretya		pechcha		after death.
Br. 20, 100, 182	satya		sachcha	sachcha	true.
B. & Las. 167.	kṛitya		kichcha	kichcha	duty.
Br. 181, 198, 278, 291.	nitya		nichcha	nichcha	continual.
Br. 98, 147.	rathyā		rachchhā	rachchhā, ratthā	road.
Var. i. 15, 28. iii. 41.	vṛiśchika		vichchhika	vichchua, vinchua	scorpion.
Dham. 55, 74. Br. 6, 22.	paśchāt		pachchhā	pachchhā	after.
Br. 287.	paśchima		pachchima	pachchhima	west.
Br. 6, 53. Var. iii. 18.	āścharya		achchhera	achchhera, achcharia	wonderful.
Br. 242. Vikr. 9.	āścharya		achchhariya	achcharīa, achchharia	wonderful.

[114] See above, p. 17, note 18.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Br. 87.	niśchita		nichchhita	nichchhida	ascertained.
Br. 218.	apsarasaḥ		achchharā	achchharāūm̃	nymphs.
Br. 202.	apsarobhiḥ		achchharāhi	achchharāhim̃	by nymphs.
Br. 43, 64, 144. Pr. 47, 113.	asti, astu		atthi, atthu	atthi, atthu	is; let there be.
Pr. 20, 47.	nāsti		n'atthi	n̤atthi	is not.
Br. 122.	vastuni		vatthuni	vatthuṇi	thing (loc.).
Br. 154.	avastambha			avaṭṭhamha	stoppage.
Br. 154, 191.	vistareṇa		vitthārena	vitthareṇa	diffusion (instr.).
Br. 238, 243.	vistaranti		vittharonti	vittharanti	they spread.
Pr. 19.	mastakāni		matthakānī	matthaāiṁ	heads.
Br. 76, 238. Pr. 84.	stana		thana	thaṇa	breast.
Br. 49, 76.	stanita		thanita	thaṇida	sounded.
Dham. 65. Br. 158. Pr. 26, 30, 110.	hasta		hattha	hattha	hand.
Clough, 29. Br. 266.	hasti		hatthi	hatthi	elephant.
Pr. 12. Pr. 278.	sthala		thala	thala	ground.
Dham. 55. Br. 71, 56, 278, 294.	sthāna		ṭhāna	ṭhāṇa	place.
Br. 164.	susthāna			suṭṭāna	a good place.
Br. 131.	sthānastha		ṭhānaṭṭha	thānattha	standing in the place.
Br. 220.	adhishṭhāna		adhiṭṭhāna	ahiṭhṭhāna	support
Br. 164, 178. 220.	sthita		ṭhita	ṭhida, thida, ṭida	standing.
Br. 157.	prasthita		paṭṭhita	patthida	proceeded.
Br. 238.	prasthāna		paṭṭhāna	ppaṭhṭhāṇa	departure.
Br. 97.	anushṭhita		anuṭṭhita	aṇuṭhṭhida	practised.
Br. 209, 263.	adhishṭhita		adhiṭṭhita	ahiṭṭia adhiṭhida	governed.
Br. 199.	upasthita		upaṭṭhita	uvaṭhṭhida	arrived.
Dham. 27. Var. iii. 11.	asthi		aṭṭhi	aṭṭhi	a bone.
Br. 220.	avasthā		avaṭṭhā	avatthā	condition.
Br. 293.	sthira		thira	thira	firm.
Br. 154.	susthita		suṭṭhita	sutthida	well placed.
Br. 217, 218.	saṁsthita		saṇṭhita	saṇṭhia	placed.
	utthita		uṭṭhita	uḍida	risen.
Br. 198, 268, 296.	Agastya			Agatthi	name of a rishi.
Br. 52.	Pulastya			Pulattha	a proper name.
Var. i. 20. jij. 20.	pustaka		potthaka	potthaa	book.
Br. 236.	prastara			patthara	a stone.
Dham. 9. Var. iii. 27. Br. 96.	mṛityu		machchu	machcha (mortal)	death.
Br. 112, 150, 153, 310. Pr. 35. Dham. 50.	vatsa		vachchha	vachchha	a child.
Sś. 249 (index)	vatsala			vachchhala	affectionate.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Pr. 35.	vātsalya			vachchhattaṇa	affection.
Dh.28.Br.195.	matsya[115]		machchha	machchha	a fish.
Br. 228.	udgāraiḥ		uggārehi	uggārehiṁ	vomitings.
Br. 182.	udghāṭana		ugghaṭana	ugghaṭṭaṇa	opening.
Br. 125. Ss. 236.	grīshma		gimha	gimha	hot season.
Dham. 41.	tushṇīm		tuṇhī	tuṇhīm	silent.
Br. 48. Bur. & Las. 166.	ushmā		umhā,[116] usmā, usumā	umhā	heat.
Dham. 59, 61.	tṛishṇā		taṇhā, tasinā	taṇhā	thirst.
Br. 125, 135. Ss. 233.	ushṇa, anushṇa		uṇha	uṇha, uṇṇa aṇunha	hot. not hot.
Dham. 16. Br. 141.	kṛishṇa		kaṇha	kaṇha,[117] kisaṇa kasaṇa	black.
Br. 67, 125.	pakshmala		pakhuma, pamha (eyelash).	pamhala	with long eyelashes, or filaments.
Pr. 137.	vismaya		vimhaya	vimhaa	astonishment.
Pr. 47, 124. Ss. 238.	jyotsnā jyautsnā		juṇhā	joṇhā jauṇha	light. lustrous.
Br. 231, 245.	khaḍga		khagga	khagga	sword.
Pr. 33, 37, 46.	jalpa		jappa	jappa	chatter.
Br. 265, 278.	kalpa		kappa	kappa	wish.
Br. 265.	analpa		anappa	aṇappa	not little.
Br. 158, 167.	valkala		vakkhala	vakkala	bark.
Var. iii. 29. Mṛi. 54. Dh.71	pushkara		pokkhara	pokkhara	pond.
Br. 234.	pushkala			pukkala	excellent, much.
Mṛich. 18, 21.	śushka		sukkha	sukkha, śukkha	dry.
Br. 54, 80.	dushkara		dukkara	dukkara	difficult.
Br. 202.	anugraha		anuggaha	aṇuggaha	kindness.
Br. 34, 82.	pāṇigrahaṇa		pāṇiggahaṇa	paṇiggahaṇa	hand-taking, marriage.
Br. 246.	hastagrāha		hatthaggāha	hatthaggaha	hand-taking.
Br. 36.	nāmagrahaṇa		nāmaggahaṇa	ṇāmaggahaṇa	name-taking.
Br. 20.	S'ankarapra-sāda			Sankarappa-sāda	S'ankaras' favour.
Br. 198.	prabhā-prasara			pabhāppasara	diffusion of splendour.
Br. 10.	pārśvapra-sara			pāsappapsara	diffusion of, or from, the side.
Dham. 29. Var. iii. 32.[118]	aśmanmayam		amhamayam	. . .	stony.
Br. 279.	nishkaruṇa		nikkaruṇa	ṇikkaruṇa	merciless.

[115] The form machchha is also given as correct Sanskrit in Wilson's Dictionary, as well as by Böhtlingk and Roth; but it may have been introduced from Prākṛit.

[116] Mr. Childers regards umhā as a doubtful Pāli form.

[117] See p. 15, note 17, above. Kaṇha means in Prākṛit the God Krishṇa.

[118] The rule here quoted strictly applies only to the mutation of shma and sma, and does not mention śma.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Br. 156, 281. Var. iii. 35,38. Lassen, 209.	vāshpa		bappa	vāppha, vappha, ṭāha	moisture.
Var. iii. 35. Br. 293. Dham. 10.	pushpa		puppha	puppha	flower.
Br. 285.	nṛitya			naṭṭa	dancing.
Br. 247. Ra. 27.	nṛitya		nachchā	nachcha	dancing.
Br. 147.	nṛityat		nachchaṁ, nachchanto	nachchanta	dancing (part.).
Br. 248.	nartitum		nachchitum	nachchidum	to dance.
Br. 242. Pr. 12, 38.	sphurat		phuraṁ, phuranta	phuranta	throbbing.
Br. 209.	visphurita			vipphuria	quivered.
Br. 235.	visphuranti			vipphuranti	quiver.
Br. 235. Pr. 13.	sphulinga		phulinga	pphulinga	a spark.
Br. 242.	saṁsphuṭita			sampphudida	blossomed.
Br. 204.	sphāra			phāra	quivering.
Br. 218.	āsphālya			ăpphălia	having touched.
Br. 202.	sparśa, parisparśa		phassa	phaṁsa, paripphaṁsa	touch. [ed. touch.
Br. 310.	parisyanda			paripphanda	dropping.
Br. 245.	utprerita			uppherida	sent up.
Br. 262.	parisphuranti			paripphuranti	they quiver.
Pr. 10.	sphaṭika		phaḷika	phaḍia	crystal.
Br. 195, 268.	skandha		khandha	khandha	shoulder.
Var. iii. 14, 50. Mṛich. 40.	stambha		thaṁbha	khambha	a post.
Br. 153. Śś. 254.	śvaśrū		sassu	sāsue, sāsū	mother-in-law.
Br. 158.	śvaśrūṇām		sassūnam	sāsūṇăm	of mothers-in-law.
Br. 156, 163, 303.	śvaśurā		sasura	sasura	father-in-law
Br. 142, 209, 292.	pakva		pakka	pakka, pikka	mature.
Br. 143, 263.	jvālā		jālā	jālā	flame.
Br. 235.	prajvalanti		pajjalanti	pajjalanti	they burn.
Pr. 119.	prajvālaya		pajjālehi	pajjālehi	burn (causal imperative).
Br. 48.	jvālāli			jālāli	?
Br. 213. 215.	svāminī		sāminī	sāmiṇī	mistress.
Br. 216.	tvarita		turita	turia	quick.
Pr. 48.	tattva			tatta	truth.
Br. 238.	aśva		assa	assa	horse.
Br. 147.	svachha			sachchha	clear.
Br. 6.	dvidhā		dvidhā, dvedhā	dudhā	in two ways.
Br. 168.	jihvā		jivhā	jīhā	tongue.
Br. 203.	mālya		mālya	malla	garland.
Pr. 48.	puṇya		puñña	puṇṇa	merit.
Br. 200. Pr. 45.	śūnya		suñña	suṇa, sunna	empty.
Bur. & Lass. 166.	aranya		arañña	araṇṇa	forest.
Clough, 36. Var. x. 10.	kanyā		kañña	kañjā	a girl.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Br. 247.	svādīkṛita		sādīkata	saddīkada	sweetened.
Br. 230, 244.	divya		dibba	divva	divine.
Br. 22, 64, 144, 162.	yogya		yogga	jogga	fit.
Br. 72, 85, 100, 105.	śishya		sissa	sissa	disciple.
Br. 100, 120, 139, 229.	anya, anyathā anyataḥ		aññā aññathā	anna, annadhā, annado	other, otherwise, etc.
Br. 276.	kāṁsya		kaṁsa	kaṁsa	bell metal.
Br. 132. Rasav. 17.	palyanka paryanka		pallanka pariyanka	pallanka	bed.
Br. 155.	śalya		salla	salla	dart.
Br. 68,76,246.	tiryak		tiriyaṁ	tirichchha	oblique.
Pr.65.Dham. 6, 56.	supta, gupta		sutta, gutta	sutta, gutta	asleep, protected.
Pr. 21, 46, 114.	prāpta		patta	patta	obtained.
Br. 279.	vidhvaṁsana		viddhaṁsana	vidhdhaṁsana	destruction.
Br. 198, 259.	vilupta		vilutta	vilutta	disappeared.
Br. 240.	vilipta		vilitta	vilidda	smeared.
Dham. 54.	tapta		tatta	tatta	burnt.
Br. 218, 245.	kshipta		khitta	khitta	thrown.
Clough, 39.	tṛipti		titti	titti	satisfaction.
Br. 76, 154, 198	samutpatti utpanna		samuppatti uppanna	samuppatti uppanna	birth. born.
Br. 243.	samutposhita		samupposita	samupposida	cherished.
Br. 217.	utkshipya		ukkhippa	ujjhia	having thrown upwards.
Br. 228.	janma			jamma	birth.
Br. 236.	pippala		pipphala	pīpala	ficus Indica.
Br. 198.	sikta		sitta	sitta	sprinkled.
Br. 227.	vaktukāma		vattukāma	vattukāma	wishing to speak.
Br. 113, 120.	punarukti		punarutti	punarutti	repetition.
Dham. 54.	bhukta		bhutta	bhutta	eaten.
Var. iii. 1.	bhakta		bhatta	bhatta	rice boiled or in husk.
Br. 195, 227, 264, 298.	muktā mauktika		muttā	motā, muttā mottia	pearl.
Clough, 39. Var. iii. 1.	yukti mukti		yutti mutti	jutti mutti	propriety. redemption.
Pr. 35, 91. Br. 10, 24, 168, 170, 195, 231.	mukta		mutta	mukka	freed.
Br. 35, 98, 141.	yukta		yutta	jutta	fit.
Br. 67, 204.	rakta		ratta	ratta	red, blood.
Br. 75.	sakta		satta	satta	attached.
Mṛichh. 120. Var. iii. 29.	kshetra		khetta	khetta	field.
Br. 87.	abhiyoktum		abhiyuñjitum	abhijujjidum	to accuse.
Br. 76, 238, 242, 259, 294. Pr. 45.	akshi		achchhi, akkhi	achchhi	eye.
Br. 307.	akshi			akkhi	eye.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Br. 238, 244, 259.	vakshaḥsthala			vachchha-tthala	breast.
Br. 199, 134, 294. Pr. 11, 41	Lakshmī		Lakkhī	Lachhī, Lachchhī	goddess of fortune.
Br. 113.	yashṭi		yaṭṭhi, laṭṭhi	lachchhi	a club.
Br. 76, 243.	vikshobha		vikkhobha	vichchhoha	agitation.
Br. 49, 93. Pr. 10, 35.	prekshasva		pekkhassa, pekkha	pekkha	look (thou).
Br. 68, Pr. 21.	prekshasva			pechchha	look (thou).
Br. 220.	prekshya		pekkhiya	pekkhia	having looked
Br. 48, 198, 226.	prakshālana		pakkhālana	pakkhālaṇa	washing.
Pr. 35, 124.	prakshālitam		pakkhāliṭam	pachchāliam	washed.
Br. 139.	avakshipāmi		okkhipāmi	avakkhivāmi	I distract.
Br. 202, 221, 250.	ṛiksha		ikka, achchha	rikkha	a bear.
Pr. 19.	nikshipyante		nikhipīyanti	nikhkhipyanti	are thrown
Br. 92.	lakshya			lakkha	a mark. [out.
Br. 67, 77, 86 Cl. 51. Pr. 46	kshatriya		khattiya	khattia	a kshatriya.
Br. 199.	laksha		lakkha	lakkha	100,000.
Br. 48, 69, 71. Pr. 84.	khaṇa		khaṇa, chhaṇa	khaṇa	a moment, festival.
Clough. 38.	kshamā		khamā	khamā	pardon.
Bur. & Lass. 166. Br. 112.	lakshaṇa		lakkhaṇa	lakkhaṇa	a mark.
Br. 180.	kshīṇa		khīṇa	khīṇa	decayed.
Br. 86, 141, 266.	paksha		pakkha	pakkha	side, wing.
Br. 20, 52. Pr. 19.	rākshasa		rakkhasa	rakkhasa	a Rākshasa.
Br. 52.	rakshā		rakkhā	rakkhā	deliverance.
Pr. 19.	rakshitvā		rakkhitvā	rakkhia	having delivered.
Pr. 12, 84.	dakshiṇa		dakkhiṇa	dakkhiṇa	south.
Br. 249.	dakshiṇa		dakkhiṇa	dāhiṇa	right (side).
Br. 193.	sākshin		sakkhī	sakkhi	witness.
Br. 290.	kshīra		khīra	khīra	milk.
Br. 221.	kshauma		khoma	khoma	of linen.
Br. 121.	akshara		akkhara	akkhara	letter.
Br. 246, 248.	kaksha		kaccha	kakkha	side.
Br. 215.	chakshushaḥ		chakkhuno	chakkhuṇo	of the eye.
Br. 103, 166 f.	śikshita		sikkhita	sikkhida	learnt.
Br. 75.	vikshepa		vikkhepa	vikkheva	perplexity.
Bur. & Lass. 167.	moksha		mokkha	mokkha	deliverance.
Dham. 46.	kshema		khema	khema	prosperity.
Dham. 23.	antarikshe		antalikkhe		atmosphere.
Br. 7, 179, 234 245. Pr. 34, 90	śabda		sadda	sadda	sound.
Br. 66, 121, 266. Pr. 10, 35, 41.	mugdha		muddha	muddha	bewildered.
Br. 76, 194. Pr. 10, 41.	dugdha		duddha	duddha	milk.
Br. 290.	dugdha		duddha	duda	milk.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Pr. 10. Br. 72, 266.	snigdha		siniddha	siṇiddha	affectionate.
Pr. 36.	vidagdha			vidaddha	clever.
Br. 20.	labdha		laddha	laddha	obtained.
Br. 131.	lubdha		luddha	luddha	covetous.
Br. 67, 226, 278, 287. Pr. 134.	paryanta		pariyanta	peranta	limit.
Br. 176.	prānta		pānta	peranta	vicinity.
Var. i. 8.	mayūra		mayūra, mora	maūra, mora	peacock.
Var. i. 7.	lavaṇa		lavaṇa, loṇa	loṇa	salt.
Mṛichh. 120.	vīja		bīja	vīa	seed.
Mṛichh. 77.	vaṇik		vāṇija	bāṇia, vāṇia	merchant.
Mṛichh. 78.	kāyastha		kāyaṭṭha	kāathaa	kāyasth.
Mṛich. 296, 151. Lass. 172, 218.	devālaya devakula		devālaya	devala	temple.
Var. iv. 1.	rājakula		rājakula	rāaüla, rāula	royal race.
Mṛichh. 30, 38 f.	dyūtakara		jūtakara	jūdiara jūdiaru jūdiala	gambler.
Var. iii. 33. Br. 289.	snāna		nahāna sināna	ṇhāna	bathing.
	vahni			vaṇhi	fire.
	Vishṇu			Viṇhu	Vishṇu.
	ślakshṇa		saṇha	saṁha	gentle.
	tīkshṇa		tikhiṇa, tiṇha	tikkha, tiṁha	sharp.
Mṛichh. 6.	daridratā		daliddatā	daliddadā	poverty.
Var. v. 24.	haridrā		haliddā	haladdā, haladdī	turmeric.
Var. iii. 25.	gartta			gaḍḍa	hole
Var. iv. 31.	malina		malina	maliṇa, maïla	dirty.
Var. iii. 30.	makshikā		makkhikā	machchhiā	a fly.
Var iv. 33.	duhitā dhīdā		duhitā dhītā	dhūdā dhīā	daughter. maiden.
Var. iv. 25.	dhanavat śabdavat mālāvat		dhanavā	dhaṇāla saddāla mālāilla	wealthy. sounding. having a garland.
Var. iii. 17,19. Clough, 19.	sūrya		suriya	sujja, sūra	sun.
Var. iii. 12. Mṛichh. 18.	mastaka[119] samasta stuti		matthaka samattha thuti	matthaa samattha thuï	head. all. praise.
Br. 195, 264.	śukti		sutti, sippī	sippi	shell.
Br. 259, 270,	lalāṭa		lalāṭa, nalāṭa (fem.)	lalāḍa, ṇiḍola	forehead.
Br. 66.	Dravida		Ḍamila	Damida	the Dravida country.
Br. 242. Lv. 372.	kamalinī pushkariṇī	paḍinī[120]	puṇḍarīkinī	puḍaïṇī	lotus-pond.

[119] This word has been repeated by mistake. See p. 82.

[120] According to another reading, pushkariṇī.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Br. 245.	(peśalā / (vyaktā?[121])		vyattā	veaṭṭī	clever.
Lalitavista. 355 f., and n. 2, p. 405.	ŕdambhī, anāśchāryavān vā	achchhambhī	achchhambhī [122]		without arrogance, or without wonder [according to the commentary.] Undaunted. [In Pāli].
B. & Las. 99.	purushaḥ		puriso	puriso	man.
B. & Las. 86.	avakāśaḥ		okāso	okāso	leisure.
B. & Las. 166.	manushyaḥ		manusso	manusso	man.
Lv. 153.	avalambhate	olambate	olambatī		he hangs.
Lv. 245.	ālambayata, avalambayata?	olambayātha			hang.
Lv. 272.	ābhāsitā, avabhāsitā?	obhāsitā	obhāsitā		illuminated.
Lv. 270.	prasvāpitāḥ avasvāpitāḥ?	osvāpitā			put to sleep.
Lv. 292.	prasvāpanam avasvāpanam?	osvāpanam			putting to sleep.
Lv. 292, 456.	praṇamantaḥ avanamantaḥ?	onamanta	onamanto		bowing down.
Lv. 360, 338.	avaruhya	oruhitvā oruhyā	oruhitvā oruyha		having descended.
Pr.	sambhāvayāmi		sambhāvemi	sambhāvemi	I conjecture.
Br. 58.	sampādayāmaḥ		sampādema	sampādemha	we fulfil.
Pr. 44.	āropayasi		āropesi	ārovesi	thou stretchest.
Pr. 34.	nirūpayāmaḥ			nirūvemha	we fix.
Pr. 126.	ālingayāmi		ālińgayāma, ālingema	ālingemi	I embrace.
Br. 221.	sajjayata, ānayata		sajjetha ānetha	sajjeha ānedha	prepare ye. bring ye.
Br. 112.	dhārayasi		dhārayasi dhāresi	dhāresi	thou holdest.
Lv. 324.	dhārayanti	dhārenti	dhārayanti dhārenti	dharenti	they hold.
Br. 20, 88.	mantrayathaḥ		mantetha	mantedha	ye advise.
Br. 121. Lv. 157.	niyamanti vineshyati	vinenti	vinenti	ṇinenti	they restrain. he, they, lead, or will lead.
Br. 221.	uttambhayata			uttambheha	support ye.
Lv. 352.	darśayanti	darśenti	dassenti		they show.
Br. 36.	śithilayāmi			siḍhilemi	I slacken.
Lv. 148.	nivartayati	nivarteti	nivatteti		he stops.
Lv. 84, 157, 180, 204.	āyānti upayanti	enti upenti	enti upenti		they come. they approach.
Lv. 14, 186, 189	chodayanti	chodenti	chodenti		they impel.
Lv. 214.	sthāpaya	sthape, sthapehi	ṭhapehi		place thou.

[121] One of the senses assigned in Wilson's Dictionary to vyakta is "wise, learned."

[122] Mr. Childers thinks this word is the equivalent of the Sanskrit astambhin, "not paralyzed with fear." The word "achambhā is well known in Hindī, where it means "astonishment."

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Lv. 223.	pūraya	pūrehi	pūrehi		fill thou.
Lv. 90.	yashṭidhārakān	ishṭikān			mace-bearers.
Lv. 158, 181.	na api	năpi	nāpi		not even.
Lv. 231, 288.	tathā'pi	tathăpi	tathāpi		nevertheless.
Lv. 421.	punar api	punopi	puna pi puno pi		again, so.
Pr. 19, 39. Pr. 89. Br. 94.	kim api		kim pi	kiṁ pi, kim vi kimpi	anything.
Pr. 19, 151.	kim iti		kin ti	kiṁ ti	what, so,
Pr. 84.	kasminn api		kasmim pi	kassiṁ pi	in any.
Pr. 47. Lv. 227, 304.	tvam api	tuṭhyampi vayampi	tvam pi	tumaṁ vi	thou, we, so.
Pr. ? Lv.387.	ayam iti	ahaṁ ti	aham pi	imotti	this, I, so,
Br. 198.	mitratva			mitrattaṇa	friendship.
Br. 79.	bālatva			bālattaṇa	childhood.
Lv. 231, 302.	vidvadbhiḥ	vidubhiḥ	vidūhi		by learned men.
Br. 87.	manasā		manasā, manena	maṇeṇa	with the mind
Br. 246, 270.	śirasā		sirasā, sirena	sireṇa	with the head
Lv. 148, 204.	nabhasi	nabhe	nabhasi, nabhe		in the heaven

NOTE.—For the greater part of the words in Table II. pp. 27–29 above, Mr. Childers knows no Pāli equivalents, nor for the following additional words which I have noted in the Bālarāmāyana and Prasannarāghava, viz., kadraṇo "monkeys" (Br. 238), nilukkana "abode," nilukkanta "issued forth" (Br. 266 f.), vellira "moving" (Br. 203), halahavallāvā "whispers" (Br. 150), visaṭṭa, vissaṭṭanta, visaṭṭanti "clear," "blown," or "blowing (as a flower)," and "they issue forth," (Br.). I find in the Br. 221, a verb ḍhoeha, rendered in the comm. by vahatā, "carry ye," = the Hindī ḍhonā, "to carry a load," and in the Lalita Vistara 261, a noun osa, dew, = Hindī os, which has the same sense. These two words belong to Table II. p. 27, ff.

Table No. IV.

The following Table of ordinals and numerals will show that in some cases the Pāli and Prākṛit words are identical; but that in most cases the Pāli words are nearer to the Sanskrit than the corresponding Prākṛit words are.

In the cases where the Prākṛit words are omitted, I have been unable to supply them.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Dham. 4. Mṛichh. 98. Lassen, 209.	prathamaḥ	paṭhamo	paṭhumo, paḍhamo	first.
Dham. 6. Mṛichh. 69.	dvitīyaḥ	dutiyo	dudio	second.
Dham. 8. Mṛichh. 69.	tṛitīyaḥ	tatiyo	taïo	third.
Dham. 35, Bur. & Las. 90. Var. vi. 58.	chatvāraḥ	chattāro	chattāro	four.
Dham. 11. Var. i. 9. Mṛich. 69.	chaturthaḥ	chatuttho	cha,utṭho, cha,uṭṭho	fourth.
Dham. 14. Mṛich. 70.	panchamaḥ	panchamo	panchamo	fifth.
Bur. & Las. 87. Las. 320. Dham. 16. Mṛi. 70.	shaṭ	cha	chhā	six.
	shashṭhaḥ	chhaṭṭho	chhaṭṭho	sixth.
Dham. 18. Mṛichh. 71.	saptamaḥ	sattamo	sattamo	seventh.
Dham. 21. Mṛichh. 72.	ashṭamaḥ	aṭṭhamo	aṭṭhamo	eighth.
Dham. 23. Mṛich. 100	navamaḥ	navamo	ṇavamo	ninth.
Dham. 26. Lass. 320.	daśamaḥ	dasamo	dasamo	tenth.
Dham. 28. Var. ii. 14.	ekādaśan	ekādasa	eāraha	eleven.
Dham. 30. Var. ii. 14.	dvādaśan	dvādasa, bārasa	vāraha	twelve.
Dham. 32. Var. ii. 14.	trayodaśan	terasa, telasa	teraha	thirteen.
Dham. 76. Var. i. 9, and ii. 14.	chaturdaśan	chatuddasa, chuddasa, choddasa	cha,uddaha	fourteen.
Dham. 38. Var iii. 44.	panchadaśan	pañcadasa, pannarasa	paṇṇaraho	fifteen.
Dham. 39. Lass. 320.	shoḍaśan	soḷasa	solaha (?)	sixteen.
Dham. 42. Lass. 320.	saptadaśan	sattarasa	sattaraha (?)	seventeen.
Dham. 45. Lass. 320.	ashṭādasan	aṭṭhārasa	aṭṭhāraha	eighteen.
Dham. 48.	ūnaviṁśati	ekūnavīsati	. . .	nineteen.
Dham. 51. Lass. 320.	viṁśati	vīsati	vīsa,i	twenty.
Dham. 54, 76.	ekaviṁśati	ekavīsati	. . .	twenty-one.
Dham. 56, 76.	dvāviṁsati	dvāvīsati, bāvīsati, dvāvīsaṁ	. . .	twenty-two.
Dham. 59, 76.	trayoviṁśati	tevīsati, tevīsā	. . .	twenty-three.
Dham. 64.	chaturviṁśati	chatuvīsati	. . .	twenty-four.
Dham. 68.	panchaviṁśati	pañchavīsati	. . .	twenty-five.
Dham. 75.	shadviṁśati	chhabbīsati	. . .	twenty-six.
Dham. 76.	chatvāriṁśat	chattāḷisaṁ	. . .	forty.

Table No. V.

Comparative list of particles and pronouns, etc., in Pāli and Prākṛit, with a few corresponding words in the Gāthā dialect.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Br. 20, 149.	atha		atha	aha	now.
Cl. 74, Br. 282.	athavā		athavā	adhavā	or.
Br. 48, ff. Cl. 68.	itaḥ		ito, ato	ido	hence.
Br. 20. Cl. 69.	iha		iha, idha	idha	here.
Br. 35, 92, 121, 139, 157, 169, 178. Cl. 69. Pr. 43.	atra		ettha	ettha	here.
Pr. 35.	atra			etta	here.
Pr. 113, Cl. 68 f.	atra		atra, attha	attha	here.
Pr. 19.	atra			atto	here.
Br. 156. Pr. 119. Clough 69.	yatra		yatra, yattha	jattha	where.
Br. 96, 149, 238.	tatra		tatra, tattha	tattha	there.
Br. 98, 149. Lv. 153, 191 f. Cl. 69.	tatra	tahi	tahiṁ, taham	tahiṁ	there.
Br. 246.	tadā			tahiṁ	then.
Br. 180, 213, 145, 148, 200, 210, 235. Lv. 56, 61, 464.	yathā	jihmi, jihma, jaha	yathā	jahā, jahă, jahaṁ, jadhā	as.
Br. 150.	yat		yaṁ	jadhā	that.
Br. 181, 210, 223.	tathā		tathā	tahă	so.
Br. 148, 278.	tathā			tadhā	so.
Br. 86, 122.	yataḥ		yato	jado	whence.
Br. 297.	yataḥ			jatto	whence.
Pr. 47.	tataḥ		tato	tado	thence.
Br. 88, 148. Pr. 20.	yadi		yadi	jadi	if.
Br. 70, 229. Pr. 17, 47.	yadi			jaï	if.
Br. 189.	yadi			jahiṁ	if.
Br. 77.	yathechchham		[yathicchitaṁ	jahijjam	as desired.
Br. 238.	yathechchham		is used.]	jahichchham	as desired.
Br. 34, 97. Pr. 20, 34.	katham		kathaṁ	kahaṁ	how?
Br. 92, 154, 163, 167.	katham			kadham	how?
Br. 77.	katham			kīsa	how?
Br. 139, 169. Pr. 112.	kva	kahiṁ (Lv. 262, 283.)	kuhiṁ, kuham	kahiṁ	where?
Pr. 40. Cl. 69.	kva		kva, kutra, kuttha	kaha	where?
Br. 86.	kutaḥ		kuto	kudo	whence?
Br. 88.	kim		kiṁ	kī	why?
Br. 295. Cl. 52.	katara		katara	kadara	which?
Br. 20.	kati		kati	kadi	how many?
Br. 5, 181.	tat		taṁ	tam	that.
Br. 34. 36, 65, 73 f, 113, 276, Pr. 19.	tat		taṁ	tā	that, therefore.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Pr. 19, 47.	tarhi		tadá (tarahi)	tā	then.
Br. 35, 79, 182.	yat		yaṁ	jam	what.
Cowell, xxviii. Br. 70. Pr. 44. 122. Lv. 190, 196.	tvăm[123]	tuma	tvam, tuvam	tumam	thou.
Pr. 41.	tvām		tam, tavam, tvam, tuvam	tumam	thee.
Pr. 38.	tubhyam		tava, tuyham, tumhaṁ	tuha	to thee.
Br. 120, 181. Br. 35, 113.	tava / te (tava)	ti	tava, tuyhaṁ, tumham	tuha, tumma, tumha, tujjha, te, de	of thee.
Br. 56, 181, 224, 145, 165, 170, 177, 153.	tvayā		tvayā / tayā	tue, tumaë, tăë, tume, te, de, tīe	by thee.
Pr. ? Pr. 124.	tvayi		tayi	tumammi, tumhi, taï	in thee.
Pr. 40. Lv. 173, 396.	yūyam	yushme, yushmi	tumhe	tumhe, tujhe	you.
Cowell, xxviii.	yushmān		tumhākam, tumhe	tujjhe, tumhe, vo	you (accus.)
	yushmābhiḥ		tumhebhi, tumhehi	tujjhehiṁ, tumhehiṁ, tummehiṁ	by you.
	yushmat		tumhebhi, tumhehi	tumhāhinto tumhāsunto	from you.
	yushmākam		tumhākam	vo, bhe, tujjhāṇaṁ, tumhāṇaṁ	of you.
	yushmāsu		tumhesu	tujjhesu, tumhesu	in you.
Br. 283. Pr. 41, 138.	tasyāḥ		tissāya, tissā, tassā, tāya	tissă, tīe, tāë	of her.
Pr. 134.	tayā		tāya	tāë	by her.
Pr. 45, 47.	ayam		ayam	imo	this (masc.)
Pr. 26, 47, 120, 125. Br. 36, 55, 66, 72, 100. Lv. 396.	asya, imasya (vedic)	imasya	assa, imassa	imassa, se	of this (masc.)
Pr. 120. Br. 35. Lv. 454.	anena	ena	anena, iminā	iminā	by this (masc.)
Pr. 38.	anayā		imāya	imāë	by this (fem.)
Br. 65, 67, 70.	asmin		asmiṁ, imasmiṁ, imamhi	imassiṁ	in this (masc)
Pr. 13.	eshām		esaṁ, esānaṁ, imesaṁ, imesānaṁ	imāṇam	of these.
Pr. 36.	ebhiḥ		ebhi, imebhi, ehi, imehi	imehiṁ	by these.
Pr. 134.	kasyāḥ			kīe	of whom ? (f.)

[123] A comparative statement of the first personal pronoun will be found further on in the text.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Br. 35.	idam		idam, imam	iṇam	'this (neuter).
Br. 5.	etat		etam, etad	edam	this.
Br. 50.	ete		ete	ede	these (masc.)
Br. 44 f.	etāḥ		etā, etāyo	edāo	these (fem.)
Br. 57.	te		ne, te	de	they.
Br. 35.	etāvat		inst. ettāvatā, "so far"	edaha	so much.
Br. 213.	etāvat		etto and ettako (adj.) "so much"	ettia	so much.
Pr. 19.	iyanti			ettiāïṁ	so much (pl. neuter).
Br. 29, 293.	yena		yena	jeṇa	by which or whom,
Br. 8.	yasmin		yasmiṁ, yamhi	jassiṁ	in which or whom.
Br. 87.	yeshām		yesaṁ	jāṇam	of whom.
Br. 56.	teshām		tesam, tesānam, nesam, nesānam	tāṇam	of them.
Br. 55.	sadṛiśa		sadisa, sādisa	sadisa	like.
Br. 35, 113, 289. Pr. 12, 16, 44.	sadṛiśa		sārisa	sarisa	like.
Br. 65, 76, 80, 292. Pr. 41.	sadṛiksha		sādikkha, sarikkha	sarichchha	like.
Br. 35.	īdṛiśa		īdisa	īdisa	like this.
Pr. 43, 46.	īdṛiśa		īrisa	īrĭsa	like this.
Pr. 16, 19, 48.	īdṛiśa		edisa, erisa	erĭsa	like this.
Br. 53, 57, 164, 218.	kīdṛiśa		kīdisa	kīdĭsa	like what.
Br. 88. Pr. 113.	kīdṛiśa		kīrisa	kīrisa, kerisa	like what?
Pr. 91.	tādṛiśa		tādisa, tārisa	tārisa	like that.
Pr. 112.	anyādṛiśa			aṇṇārisa	like another.
Br. 299.	asmādṛiśam		amhādisa	amhārisa	like us.
Br. 120. Clough, 70.	idānim		dāni, idāni, etarahi	eṇhiṁ	now.
Br. 77, 138. Pr. 25. Dham. 29.	ātmānam ātmānam		attānam, ātumānaṁ	attāṇam appāṇam	himself.
Karpūramanjarī, in Bālar. p. 5. Br. 122.	ātmā māhātmya		attā	appā māhappa	greatness.

Table No. VI.

The following Table exhibits a list of Pāli words, some of which retain unaltered the Sanskrit form, while others are modified, but sometimes less than in Prākṛit.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Dham. 31, 55, 58. Clough, 21. Var. v. 36.	rājā		rājā	rāā	king.
Dham. 12. and Var. i. 17.	jihvā		jivhā	jīhā	tongue.
Clough, 39. and Var. ii. 32.	yashti		yaṭṭhi, laṭṭhi	laṭṭhi	staff.
Dham. 40. Var. ii. 27. & Mṛich.	sādhum		sādhum, sāhum	sāhūm	good.
Dham. 51. and Var. v. 35.	pitā		pitā	piā	father (nom.)
Dham. 52. and Var. v. 34.	pitaram		pitaram	piaram	father (accus.)
Rasa. 15.	pitrā		pitarā	piduṃā	father (instr.)
Dham. 26, 52, 71. & Var. iii. 8.	brāhmaṇaḥ		brāhmaṇo	vamhaṇo	Brahman.
Dham. 72. & Var. i. 18.	gambhīra		gambhīra, gabhīra	gahira	deep.
Dham. 20, 24. & Var. iv. 5.	jīvitam		jīvitam	jīvam, jīam	life.
Dham. 27. Br. 242, 251.	andhakāreṇa		aṇdhakārena	andhaāreṇa	darkness.
Dham. 28. Mṛichh. 43, 69.	balīvardaḥ		balivaddo	baliddo, ba,illo	ox.
Dham. 34. & Var. iii. 39.	kārshāpaṇaḥ		kahāpaṇa	kahāvaṇo	16 paṇas of cowries.
Dham. 44.	samādhim		samādhim[124]	. . .	meditation.
Dham. 46. and Var. iv. 15.	yāvatā		yāvatā	jāva, jā	as much.
	tāvatā		tāvatā	tāo, tā	so much.
Dham. 22, 68. Mṛichh. 11. Var. iv. 12.	bhadram		bhadram, bhaddam	bhaddam	good.
Clough, 40.	śūkarī		sūkarī	sūarī	a sow.
Br. 234, 267.	śūkara		sūkara	sūyara, sūara	a boar.
Clough, 7. Var. ii. 27. v. 25, 27.	madhu		madhu	mahu	honey.
Dham. 36. Prabodha. 58. Pr. 38, 40.	sukham		sukham	suham	happiness.
Clough. 37. Var. ii. 27. Br. 156.	sabhā		sabhā	sahā	an assembly.
	gāthā		gāthā	gāhā	a verse.
Clough, 42. and Var. v. 32.	mātā		mātā	māā	mother (nom.)
	mātaram		mātaram	māam	mother (acc.)
Rasa. 22. Clou. 45. Var. ii. 27.	mukham		mukham	muham	face.

[124] I cannot say whether the Prākṛit form of this word is samādhi or samāhi, or any third form different from either.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Burn. & Lass. Var. ii. 2.	lokaḥ		loko	loo	world.
	gajaḥ		gajo	gao	elephant.
	rajatam		rajatam	raadam	silver.
Ditto, Var. i. 27.	kṛitam		katam	kaam	done.
Ditto, Var. iii. 58.	trailokyam		telokkam	telloam	the three worlds.
Ditto, Var. ii. 2.	jīvam		jīvam	jīam	life.
	vachanam		vachanam	vaaṇam	word.
Do., Var. ii. 2, 46.	divasaḥ		divaso	divaho, diaho	day.
Ditto, Var. i. 41.	yauvanam		yobbanam	jovvanam	youth.
Mahāvanso, p. xxvi. Mṛich. 44.	samskṛitam		sakkatam	sakkadam	Sanskrit.
Mahāvanso, 207 Var. i. 20.	pustakam		potthakam	potthao	book.
Rasa. 40. Pr. 97. Br. 143.	bhaginī		bhaginī	vahiṇī / bahiṇī, bhaiṇī	sister.
Mahāv. 250. Var iii. 26.	gardabhaḥ		gadrabho	gaḍḍaho	ass.
Rasa. 32. Var. i. 20.	muktā		muttā	mottā	pearl.
Rasa. 33. Mṛich. 16, 43, 44, 50. Br. 35, 221.	dvāra		dvāra	duāraa / dŭvāra, dŭvāra	door.
Br. 130, 284.	śākhī		sākhī	sāhī	a tree.
Br. 70.	rekhā		rekhā	rehā	a line.
Br. 113.	sakhī		sakhī	sahī	female friend
Br. 48, 76, 156, Pr. 36.	śikhā		sikhā	sihā	crest.
Br. 93, Pr. 10, 12.	śikhara		sikhara	sihara	summit.
Br. 73, 96, 156. Pr. 38.	śekhara		sekhara	sehara	crest.
Br. 52. Pr. 35, 38.	śikhaṇḍa		sikhaṇḍa	sihaṇḍa	peacock's tail
Pr. 12, 41.	lekhā		lekhā	lehā	a writing.
Pr. 36.	nakha		nakha	ṇaha	nail.
Pr. 36, Br. 6, 10, 92.	likhita		likhita	lihida	written.
Br. 221, 278.	parikhā		parikhā	parihā	ditch.
Br. 287.	mekhalā		mekhalā	mehalā	girdle.
Br. 215, 225.	megha		megha	meha	cloud.
Br. 50.	saṅgha		saṅgha	saṁha	assemblage.
Dham. 7, 66. Var. iii. 65. Mṛichh. 107.	laghu		lahu	lahu	light.
Br. 71, 199. Pr. 14.	ratha		ratha	raha	chariot.
Pr. 36.	athavā		athavā	ahavā	or.
Pr. 137, Br. 242, 297.	mithuna		mithuna	mihuṇa	pair.
Br. 308.	Mithilā		Mithilā	Mihilā	name of city.
Br. 298.	atithi		atithi	adihi	guest.
Br. 238.	adhara		adhara	ahara	lower lip.
Pr. 39, Br. 158. Br. 151, 153.	vadhū		vadhū	vahū, vadhū	wife.
Pr. 34, 39, Br. 70.	madhura		madhura	mahura	sweet.
Br. 244, Cl. 7, 51.	madhu		madhu	mahu	sweet.
Br. 10.	vibudha		vibudha	vibuha	wise man.
Br. 278.	panchavidha		panchavidha	panchaviha	fivefold.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Br. 198, 221, 243.	vividha		vividha	viviha	various.
Br. 238.	vidhura		vidhura	vihura	agitated.
Br. 199.	jaladhi		jaladhi	jalahi	sea.
Br. 86, 203 f.	rudhira		rudhira	ruhira	blood.
Br. 250.	dadhi		dadhi	dahi	curds.
Br. 228.	vadhira		badhira	bahira	deaf.
Br. 239.	mahīdhara		mahīdhara	mahīhara	mountain.
Br. 167.	ārādhana		ārādhana	ārāhaṇa	worship.
Br. 72, 292. Clough 7, 24.	phala, saphala		phala, saphala	ṁala, sahala	fruit, fruitful.
Pr. 137.	rabhasa			ṙuhasa	speed.
Pr. 11.	śobhante		sobhanti	sohanti	they shine.
Pr. 36.	abhilashanti			ahilasanti	they desire.
Br. 123.	labhate		labhati	lahai	he receives.
Br. 79, 156, 242, 259.	vallabha		vallabha	vallaha	beloved.
Br. 219.	upalabdham			ualahium	to understand.
Br. 73, 93, 297.	vṛishabha		usabha	vusaha	bull.
Br. 202, 218.	kshobha		khobha	khoha	shaking.
Br. 224.	vibhinna		vibhinna	vihiṇṇa	divided.
Br. 238.	surabhi		surabhi	surahi	fragrant.
Br. 276.	dundabhi		dundubhi	dunduhi	drum.
Br. 198.	nābhi		nābhi	ṇāhi	navel.
Br. 237.	śaila		sela	sella	mountain.
Br. 86, 145.	vairi		veri	veri	enemy.
Br. 221, 240.	taila		tela	tella	oil.
Br. 264.	dāha		dāha, ḍāha	ḍāha	burning.
Pr. 104.	sūchī		sūchi	sūī	needle.
Br. 243.	sūchita		sūchita	sūida	indicated.
Br. 217 f.	chhurikā		chhurikā	chhuriā	knife.
Br. 150, 155.	hṛidaya		hadaya	hiaa	heart.
Br. 238.	pādayoḥ		pādesu	pāesu	at the feet.
Br. 235.	dhūma		dhūma	dhūsa	smoke.
Br. 199.	padātikasya			pāikassa	footman (gen.)
Br. 245, 251.	mudgara		muggara	mogāra	mallet.
Pr. 44.	kubja		khujja	khujja	bent.
Br. 125.	śosha		sosa	sosa	drying up.
Br. 50.	ghosha		ghosa	ghosa	noise.
Var. iii. 62. Lv. 228.	mlāna, glāna	gilāna	milāta, gilāna	milāṇa	withered, wearied.
Var. iii. 62. Lv. 269.	klānta	kilānta	kilanta	kilānta	wearied.
Var. iii, 62. Lv. 51, 60 f, 188.	kleśa	kileśa	kilesa	kilesa	trouble.
Dh. 50. Pr. 41. Br. 36, 122, 273.	sneha		sneha, sineha	siṇeha	affection.
Cl. 39. Pr. 12. Br. 129, 175 f.	śrī	siri	sirī	sirī	splendour.
Dham. 44.	hrī	hiri	hirī	hirī	shame.
Pr. 12. Var. iii. 62.	harsha			harasa, hŭrisa	joy.
Pr. 113, 114, 238. Lalitavistara, 65, 235, 239, 399.	svapna	supina	supina, soppa	siviṇa	sleep.
Pr. 44, 48.	mūrkha			murukha	fool.
Pr. 35.	vismṛita			visumarida	forgotten.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Br. 163, 278.	smaraṇa smṛitvā		sumariya	sumaṇa sumaria	recollection. having recollected.
Br. 198.	utkarsha		ukkaṁsa	ukkarisa	eminence.
Br. 246.	karshanti		kaḍḍhanti	karisanti	they draw.
Br. 20, 126, 276.	varsha		vassa	varisa	rain.
Br. 210.	varshitum		vassituṁ	varisidum	to rain.
Br. 296.	varshartuḥ			vāsāratto	rainy season.
Br. 144. Lv. 198.	bhāryā, nāryaḥ	nārīyā	bhariyā nāriya	bhārīā	wife, of a woman.
Br. 310.	S'atrughna			Sattuhaṇa	proper name.
Cl. 8. Lv. 56, 92,132,181,188 Clough, 45, 51. Lv. 157.	ratna	ratana	ratana		gem.
	padma	paduma	paduma		lotus.
Mṛichh. 30.	gṛihāṇa		gaṇha	geṇha	take thou.
Pr. 37, 87. Br. 236.	parihṛitya		pariharitvā	pariharia	having removed.
Pr. 134.	angīkṛitya			angīkaria	having assented.
Pr. 64.	militvā			milia	having met.
Br. 216. Pr. 84.	samuttīrya uttīrya	uttaritvă	samuttaritvā uttaritvā	samottīria uttaria	having crossed.
Lv. 438.	parāhatya	parāhania			having smitten.
Br. 87.	chintayitvā	chintiyā	cintetvā, cintiya	chintia	having reflected.
Br. 87.	anusandhāya			aṇusandhia	having ascertained.
Br. 235.	avamatya		avamāetvā avamāniya (causal)	avamāṇia	having despised.
Br. 7, 261.	atikramya		atikkamitvā atikkamma	adikkamia	having attacked.
Br. 241.	utpāṭya		uppāṭetvā	uppāḍia	having rooted up.
Br. 96.	uchyate		uchchate vuchchati	uchchadi	it is said.
Br. 9.	varṇyate		vaṇṇīyati	vaṇṇīadi	it is related.
Br. 6.	paṭhyate		paṭhīyati	paḍhīadi	it is read.
Br. 229.	uttīryate vibodhyate nimajyate		uttarīyati	uttarīaï	it is crossed. it is understood. it is sunk.
Br. 113.	sandhīyate		saṁdhīyati	sandhijjaï	it is joined
Br. 120.	vijñāpyate		viññāpiyati	vinnavīadi	it is informed.
Br. 35.	vistāryate		vitthāriyati	vittharaï	it is extended.
Pr. 44.	bhajyate			bhaṇjīadi	it is broken.
Br. 259.	niveśyantām		nivesiyantu	nivesīantu	let them be placed.
Br. 22, 36, 121.	vijñāpayāmi vijñāpayati		viññāpemi viññāpeti	vinnavemi vinnavedi	I inform. he informs.
Br. 263.	pūryamāṇa		pūramāna	pūrijjamāna	being filled.
Br. 241, 263.	dahyamāna		dayhamāna	dahijjanta	being burned
Br. 135.	ramaṇīya		ramaṇīya, ramaṇiyya	ramaṇijja	pleasant.

Table No. VII.

The following Table contains a list of verbs and participles, in which it will be observed that the Pāli forms generally depart less from the Sanskrit than the Prākṛit ones do.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
B. & Las. 125. Del. 24. Br.101	śṛiṇumaḥ		suṇoma	suṇamha, suṇimo	we hear.
B. & Las. 125.	śṛiṇoshi		suṇāsi, suṇosi	. . .	thou hearest.
Cl. 109. Del. 24.	śṛiṇoti		suṇoti	śunādi	he hears.
B. & Las. 125. Delius, 24.	śṛiṇotu		suṇātu, suṇotu	suṇādu	let him hear.
B. & Lass. 121. Var. vii. 16, 17. Cowell, xxx. Dekus, 24.	śroshyāmi, śroshyati	śruṇishyi, śuṇishyati	sossāmi	sochchham, sochchhissam, suṇissam	I, he, will hear.
B. & Lass. 131. Delius, 24.	śrutaḥ		suto	sudo	heard.
Dham. 15, 19. Rasa. 29. Del. 4. Var. iv. 23. Lv. 65 f. &c.	śrutvā	śrutvă, śrutya, śuṇitya, śuṇitvā, śruṇitvă, śruṇitvā	sutvā, sutvāna, suṇitvā	suṇia, sō, ūn	having heard.
Rasa.17. Del.24.	śrotum		sotum	suṇidum	to hear.
Pr. 14, 28. Br. 200, 234, 284, 287.	śrūyate	śṛiṇute	sūyati	suṇīadi, suṇīaï	he is heard.
	śrūyante	śravanti	sūyanti	suṇijjanti	they are heard
Br. 122.	śrūyantām		sūyantu	suṇīadu	let them be heard.
Br. 179.	śrūyate			ṇisuṇi	he is heard.
Br. 202.	śrūyamāṇa		suyamāna	sunijjanta	being heard.
Br. 163.	śrūyamānā			suvantī	being heard (fem.)
Br. 280.	śrāvayatu		sāvetu	suṇāvedu	let him cause to hear.
Br. 166.	śuśrūshaṇa		sussūsā	sussūsaṇa	obedience.
B. & Las. 125. Delius, 17.	dadāmi	dadămi, dadāmī	dadāmi, demi, dajjāmi	demi	I give.
Dham. 44. Cl. 134,135. Del.17	dadāti		dadāti, deti, dajjati	dedi, deï	he gives.
B. & Las. 127.	adāt		adāsi, adā	. . .	he gave.
B. & Lass. 121. Var. vii. 16. Del. 17.	dāsyāmi		dassāmi	dāham, da,issam	I will give.
Cl.25. Del. 17.	dadat		dadam, dadanto, dento	dento	giving.
Dh. 43. Br. 179.	dadataḥ		dadato	dentassa	of one giving.
Dham. 44. Var. viii. 62.	dattam		dinnam	dinnam	given.
Br. 22, 153, 218, 277. Lv. 89, 108, 215. 270.	dehi	dehi, dadahi, dadahī, dadāhi	dehi	dehi, dejja	give thou.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Br. 67, 75, 137.	dīyatām,	dīyatu	dīyatu, diyyatu	dijjadu	let it be given dīyantām		dīyantu, diyyantu	dijjantu	let them be given.
Delius, 17.	datvā	detī, dadia, dadiya	datvā	daŭa, deïa, daūna	having given
Rasa. 34.	bhavitum		bhavitum, hotum	bhavidum	to be.
Lv. 293. Dh. 42. B. & Las. 122. Del. 26.	bhava	bhohi	bhava, hohi	hohi, hoï	be (thou).
B. & Las. 161.	bhavatu		hotu, bhavatu	bhodu, hodu	let him be.
Dham. 44, 67. Cl., 8, 102. Var. viii. 3.	bhavati	bhoti, bhavi	bhavati, hoti	bhodi, hodi, hoï, pabhava, i (he overcomes).	he becomes.
Dham. 54, 61. B. & Las. 86.	bhavanti	bhonti	bhavanti, honti	bhonti, honti	they are.
Rasa. 22.	prabhavāmi	prabhāmi	pabhavāmi, pahomi	pabhavami pabhavāmi	I overcome.
Clough, 103.	bhūyatām		bhūyatām	. . .	let it be (passive.)
B. & Lass. 130.	bhavan		honto, bhavam bhavanto	. . .	being.
Dh. 11, 32. Del. 26. Var. viii. 2.	bhūtaḥ		bhūto	bhūdo, hua	been.
Rasa. 15. Del. 26.	bhūtvā	bhavia, bhavitvā	hutvā	bhavia	having been.
Cl. 15. Var. vii. 23	abhavat		abhavi	huvīa	he was.
B. & Las. 127. Var. vii. 24. Lv. 187.	abhūt	abhūshi	ahosi, ahu	hohīa	he was.
B. & Lass. 127.	abhūvan	ababhūvan	ahosum	. . .	they were.
	asthāt		aṭṭhāsi	. . .	he stood.
B. & Lass. 129.	sthātum		ṭhātum	. . .	to stand.
Dh. 60. Cl. 25. Del. 19. B. & L. 125. Var. vi. 63.	tishṭhanti		tiṭṭhanti	tiṭṭhanti, chiṭṭhanti	they stand.
Br. 219. Lv. 261.	bhavishyāmi	bheshyi	bhavissāmi	bhavissam	I shall be.
Br. 149, 179. Pr. 140, 142. Lv. 62, 127, 238	bhavishyati	bheshyati bhavi	bhavissati hessati	bhavissudi havissadi	he shall be.
Br. 20.	paribhava			parihava	excel thou.
Pr. 83, 140.	paribhūta		paribhūta	parihūda	excelled.
Br. 86, 269.	prabhūta		pahūta	pabhūda	strong.
	anubhūta			anubhūda	perceived.
Br. 169. Lv. 291.	uttishṭha	utthi	uṭṭhaha	uṭhṭhehi	rise thou.
Lv. 396, 406.	utthāya	utthi, utthihitvā	uṭṭhāya uṭṭhahitvā		having risen.
Lv. 355.	uttishṭhet	utthihet	uṭṭhaheyya		he may rise.
Lv. 298.	sthitvā	sthihiya	ṭhatvā		having stood.
Dham. 31. Mṛi. 80. Var. viii. 69.	paśyati		passati, dichchhati	passadi, dekhadi, pulaï, etc.	he sees.
Dham. 6. 101.	prāpnoti		pappoti, pāpuṇāti	pāvidi	he obtains.
Rasa. 22.	prāpnuvanti		papponti, pāpuṇanti	. . .	they obtain.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKRIT.	ENGLISH.
Dham. 24, 75. Del. 62.	prāpto 'si		papto'si, patto	pābido, patto	obtained.
Rasa. 15, 23, 40 Delius, 62.	prāpya		patvā, pāpuṇitvā	samāpia	having obtained: finished.
Dham. 12. Del. 15	vijānāti		vijānāti	jaṇādi, jāṇadi, viāṇādi	knows.
Dham. 3, 50. B. & Las. 129.	jnātvā		ñatvā, jānitvā	jāṇia	having known.
Br. (?)	jnātum		jānitiṁ, ñātuṁ	jāṇidum	to know.
	jnāyamāna		ñāyamāna	jānijjanta	being known
Dham. 6, 11, 41. Delius, 29.	jāgrataḥ		jāgaṛato	jaggantassa	waking (genitive.)
Dham. 40. Del. 70. Var. xii. 10.	gatvā	gachchhitvă	gantvā	āgachhia, gadia, gadua	having gone.
Br. 58, 250, 218.	gataḥ		gata	gado, gaũm	gone.
Dh. 27, 60. Ma. 1. Del. 79, Br. 245.	dṛishṭvā		disvā, disvāna, passitva	daṭṭhūna	having seen.
Br. 243, 287,	dṛiśyante		dissanti	dīsanti	they are seen.
305. Pr. 13, 35.	dṛiśyate		dissati	dīsadi	he is seen.
Br. 150.	dṛiśyamāna		dissamāna	dīsamāṇa	being seen.
Br. 65.	darśana		dassana	daṁsana	sight.
Br. 6.	darśayishyati		dassayissati	daṁsaïssadi	he will show.
Delius, 79.	mṛitvā		maritvā	mariũṇa	having died.
Br. 297.	uḍḍīya			uḍḍiũṇa	having flown
Dh. 52. Del. 62.	hatvā	hanitvā	hantvā, hanitvā	āhaṇia, etc.	having killed
Rasa. 22. Del. 18.	pītvā	pitvā	piḅitvā, pītvā vivitvā	pibia, pāũṇa	having drunk
Dh. 17. Lv. 284.	hitvā	jahitvā	hitvā, jahitvā	. . .	having left.
Dham. 32.	jitvā		jetvā, jinitvā	. . .	having conquered.
Dh. 50. Del. 55.	chhitvā	chhinitvā	chhetvā	parichhidia	having cut.
Dham. 8, 9. Var. viii. 55.	viditvā		viditvā	vettūna	having known.
Rasa. 30. Del. 59.	baddhvā	baddhiṭvā	bandhitvā	bandhia	having bound.
Dham. 58. Del. 26	abhibhūya		abhibhuyya		having overcome.
Dham. 58.	vihāya, prahāya	vijahitvā, vijahya	pahāya, pajahitvā	. . .	having left.
Dham. 24, 67. Del. 67. Br. 123.	labhate		labhate, labhati	lahade, lahadi, lahaï	he receives.
Dham. 63. B. & Las. 137.	asmi		asmi, amhi	mhi	I am.
Dham. 51. Del. 86.	santi		santi	santi, achchhanti	they are.
Dham. 60. Var. viii. 51.	patanti		patanti	paḍanti	they fall.
Dham. 71. Cow. App. Sūtra 24. p. 99.	bravīmi		brūmi	bollāmi (?)	I speak.
B. & Las. 86. Delius, 53.	kathayishyāmi		kathessāmi	kadhaïssam, kahissam	I will say.
Br. 113.	kathayāmi		kathemi	kadhemi	I say.
Br. 117.	kathayati iva		katheti	kahaïva	he says as it were.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Br. 53, 164, 218. Pr. 123.	kathaya		kathehi	kadhesu, kahesu, kahehi	say thou.
Pr. 124.	kathayishyati		kathessati	kahissadi	he will say.
Br. 213.	kathayatām			kahīadu	let it be said.
Ras. 22. Del. 53.	kathayitum		kathetum	kadhedum	to say.
Dh. 36. Del. 77.	jīvāmaḥ		jīvāma	jīāma, jīvāma	we live.
Clough, 142.	prichhanti, prichhyate		puchchhanti	puchhanti, puchchhīadi	they ask; it is asked.
Dham. 43. Var. viii. 27.	khādati		khāyati, khādati	khāï	he eats
Cl. 9. Var. vii. 25.	āsīt		āsi	āsi	he was.
Br. 289.	āsan		āsuṁ	āsi	they were.
Dham. 43, 67.	asti		atthi	atti, achchhi	he is.
Dham. 15.	syāt		siyā, assa	. . .	he may be.
Dham. 5.	rakshati		rakkhati	rakkhadi	he keeps.
Dham. 51, 52, 53. Var. viii. 48.	budhyate		bujjhati	bujjhaï	he understands.
Dham. 40. & Var.	krudhyet		kujjheya	kujjh (root)	let him be angry.
Dham. 40.	dadyāt		dajjā	. . .	let him give.
Dham. 101. Cl. 145. Del. 32.	smarati		sumarati, sarati	sumaredi	he recollects.
Pr. 12, 35. Br. 57, 86, 92.	varte		vattāmi	vaṭṭāmi	I am.
	vartate		vattati	vaṭṭadi	he is.
Br. 5, 247.	vardhamāna		vaḍḍhamāna	vaḍḍhanta	increasing.
	vardhita		vaḍḍhita	baḍḍhida	increased.
Dham. 13. Var. viii. 44.	varddhate		vaḍḍhati	vaḍḍhaï	he increases.
Pr. 133.	jayatu		jayatu, jetu	jedu	let him conquer.
Dh. 64. Del. 21.	jayati		jināti, jeti	jaadi, jiṇādi	he conquers.
Clough, 5, 110. Dham. 54. Del. 27, 28.	karomi	kurumi	karomi	karomi, karemi, kalemi	I do.
Dham. 1, 7, 63. Cl. 100. Del. 28.	karoti, kriṇoti (vedic)		karoti	karedi, karei, kuṇaï	he does.
Dham. 9. Cl. 110	kurute		kurute	. . .
Cl. 110. Br. 195.	kurvanti, kriṇvanti (vedic)	karonti	karonti, kubbanti	karenti, kuṇanti	they do.
B. & Las. 182.	kurmaḥ	karoma, karomo	karoma	karemha, karamha	we do.
B. & Las. 127. Clough, 110. Var. viii. 17.	akārshīt		akāsi	kāhīa	he did.
Clough, 110.	akārshuḥ		akāsuṁ	. . .	they did.
Delius, 28.	karishyati		karissati, kāhati	karissadi kāhii	he will do.
Var. viii. 17. Dh. 28, 322.	karishyasi		kāhasi, karissasi	. . .	thou wilt do.
Var. vii. 16.	karishyāmi		karissāmi	kāham	I will do.
Dham. 10, 12, 23, 39. Cl. 25. Delius, 28.	kurvan, kurvataḥ, kurvantam, kurvantaḥ		kubbaṁ, kubbato, kubbānaṁ, karontā	karanto karento	doing (different cases and numbers of) (pres. part.)

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Dh. 42. Del. 28.	kuru	kurvahi	karohi, kuru	karehi, kalehi	do (imper.)
Br. 69.	kuru, kṛiṇu (vedic)			kuṇa	do thou.
Pr. 84.	kurushva iti			karesutti	"do thou," thus.
Br. 200, 168.	kuruta, kṛiṇuta (vedic)			kuṇaha, kuṇadha	do ye.
Br. 20.	kartum		kattuṁ, kātuṁ	kādum	to do.
Br. 142, 200.	kartavya		kattabba, kātabba	kādavva, kāavva	to be done.
Br. 72, 149 f.	kṛita		kata	kida, kira	done.
Br. 228.	kriyate		karīyati, kayyati	kīraï	it is done.
Br. 7, 224.	kriyatām			karīadu, kīraü	let it be done
Br. 221.	pratikuruta, samīkuruta		paṭikarotha . . .	paḍikareha, samīkareha	oppose ye. lend ye.
Br. 86, 236. Pr. 47 f. Clough, 3.	gṛihīta		gahita, gahīta	gahia, gahida	taken.
Pr. 46.	grahītum		gaṇhituṁ	gahīdum	to take.
Br. 75.	grāhya		gayha	geṷṷha	to be taken.
Clough, 16.	akurma		akaramhase	. . .	we have done.
Dh. 24. Del. 28. Var. xii. 10, iv. 23.	kṛitvā	karitya, kariyā, karitvā	katvā, karitvā	kādua, kadua kāūṇa	having done.
Dham. 28.	adhyagāt (?)		ajjhagā	. . .	arrived.
Dham. 39. Del. 90.	pratigṛihṇanti		paṭiganhanti	paḍigeṇhanti	they receive.
Dh. 420. (com.)	kalpayan		kappento	kappento (?)	cutting.
Dham. 101.	śaknoti	śakkitam	sakkuṇāti, sakkoti	. . .	he can; possible.
Rasa. 22. Cow. 171, n. Del. 36.	śaknomi		sakkomi, sakkuṇomi	sakkaṇomi	I can.
Clough, 129. Var. viii. 50.	mṛidnāti		maddati	maladi	he treads.
Ras. 22. Del. 20.	snātum		nahāyituṁ	ṇahādum	to bathe.
Dham. 50. Vikr. 116.	ārādhayet		ārādhaye	arāhaṇa	let him reverence: reverencing (noun).
Pr. 10, 12.	rājate			rehadi	he shines.
Br. 22.	sandadhāsi		sandadhāsi, sandahisi	sandhihisi	thou appliest
Br. 178.	paṭhishyāmi		paṭhissāmi	paḍhissam	I shall read.
Br. 35, 52, 157, 179.	manye		maññe	manne	I think.
	manyadhvām		maññatha	mannadha	think ye.
Br. 178.	svapsyāmi		supinissāmi	suvissam	I shall sleep.
Br. 122.	stumaḥ			thuṇimo	we praise.
Br. 246.	ghnanti		hananti	haṇanti	they strike.
Br. 27.	pratighnantu		paṭihanantu	paḍihaṇantu	may they avert.
Pr. 11 ff, 41, 113, 115.	vilokayan,		vilokayaṁ	pulovanto,	looking.
	vilokaya,		vilokaya, vilokehi	pulovehi, puloesu,	look (impera).
Br. 76.	vilokayāmaḥ		vilokayāma, vilokema	puloamha,	we look.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GĀTHĀ.	PĀLI.	PRĀKṚIT.	ENGLISH.
Pr. 11 ff, 41, 113, 115. Br. 76.	anālokayantī vilokayishye		anālokentī vilokayissaṁ	apuloantī pulovaïssam	not looking. I shall look.
Br. 113, 179. 199, 202, 216, 245, 261.	kṛishṭa, ākṛishṭa		kaḍḍhita ākaḍḍhita	kaṭṭhia, kaṭṭia, ūkaṭṭhia, ākaṭṭhida	drawn.
	kṛishyamāṇa			kaṭṭhijjanta	being drawn.
	karshaṇa		kaḍḍhana	kaḍḍhaṇa	drawing.
Br. 49. Pr. 17.	apasarati[135] apasaranti		osaranti (ava-)	osaradi, osaranti	he departs. they depart.
Br. 10, 50, 127.	avatarantī, avatāra, avatīrya		otaranti otāra, avatāra	odaranti, odāra, otchharia?	they descend. descent. having descended.
Br. 174.	hāryase			hīrasi	thou art snatched away
Br. 176.	kīrtyate			kīradi	he is celebrated.
Br. 7, 178.	pratyakshīkṛita		pachchakkhīkata	pachchakkhīkida	manifested.
Br. 473.	parityaja		parichchajassu parichchaja	parittaasu	abandon thou.

[125] In pp. 38, 39, 126, 146, of the Prasannarāghava, and in pp. 76 and 162 of the Bālarāmāyaṇa, however, we find the forms avagadamhi (avagatā 'smi), avasara, avatiṇṇa (avatīrṇa), avataraï (avatarati), and avadārassa (avatārasya).

SECT. VI.—The Dialects of the Rock and Pillar Inscriptions of Aśoka.

Our knowledge of the vernacular languages of India in the centuries immediately preceding the Christian era is not, however, exclusively derived from the Pāli books of Ceylon. Certain inscriptions, dating from the second or third century B.C., containing edicts of king Priyadarsī or Aśoka[126] (whose name has been already mentioned above, p. 63, f.), and written in a corrupt Sanskrit, apparently the vernacular speech of that period, are still extant engraved on pillars and rocks in different parts of India.

I borrow the following particulars regarding them from the summary given by Lassen (Ind. Alt., ii. 215, ff.).[127] The inscriptions are engraved partly upon pillars, partly on rocks. The pillars are at Dehli, Allahabad, Mathiah, and Radhia. The inscriptions on these four pillars are partly uniform, while those of Dehli and Allahabad have additions peculiar to themselves. The rock inscriptions are: 1stly, those at Girnār, in Guzerat, divided into fourteen compartments; 2ndly, those at Dhauli, in Orissa, which for the most part agree in purport with those at Girnār, though the dialect is different; and 3rdly, those at Kapur di Giri, near Peshawar, which coincide in purport, though they often differ in expression, and in their greater or less diffuseness, from the Girnār inscriptions. Besides these, Aśoka appears to have caused other similar edicts to be promulgated in the same way. Accordingly another inscription has been discovered at Bhabra, not far from Jaypur, which contains a fragment of an address to the Buddhist synod in Magadha.

These inscriptions were mostly discovered about thirty years ago, and the great merit of having first (in 1837 and 1838) deciphered and translated by far the larger portion of them belongs to the late Mr. James Prinsep. His translations were subsequently revised by Prof. H. H. Wilson, in an article in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic [126] Professor Wilson thinks it extremely uncertain whether Piyadasi can be identified with Aśoka, and inclines to the conclusion that the date of the inscriptions is some period subsequent to 205 B.C. (Journ. Royal As. Soc., vol. xii. pp. 243–251; vol. xvi. p. 357.) Professor Müller, in his "Ancient Sanskrit Literature," p. 520, speaks incidentally, but without any hesitation, of the inscriptions as being those of Aśoka, and as dating from the third century B.C. See also the other authorities cited in the text a little further on.

[127] See also Prinsep's Indian Antiquities, by E. Thomas, i. 233, ii. 14.

Society for 1849 (vol. xii., part i., pp. 153–251): and a portion of them were a third time examined by M. Burnouf in the Appendix to his translation of the Lotus de la Bonne Loi, pp. 652–781.[128] Prof. Wilson has concluded his notice of the subject in a further paper on the Bhabra inscription, in the Journ. Royal As. Soc., vol. xvi., part ii., pp. 357–367. The importance of these inscriptions, as throwing light on the languages of India in the third century B.C., is also expressly recognized by Prof. Lassen (Ind. Alterthumsk., vol. ii.) in passages which will be quoted below; by Weber in his review of the Lotus de la Bonne Loi (Ind. Stud., iii. pp. 166–173), in the Preface to his Malavikā and Agnimitra, p. xxxii., and in his Indische Literaturgeschichte, p. 170; and by Benfey, in his Article Indien, in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopædia, pp. 194 and 250.

To give the reader an idea of the nature of these edicts, as well as of the language in which they are composed, I shall quote the eleventh, which is short and tolerably clear, according to the Girnār version, together with the translation (rendered into English) of M. Burnouf (Lotus, App., x. p. 736; Wilson, p. 212): devānaṁ piyo Piyadasi rājā evam āha nāsti etārisaṁ dānaṁ yārisam dhamma-dānam dhamma-saṁstavo vā dhamma-saṁvibhāgo vā dhamma-sambandho vā | tata idam bhavati dāsa-bhatakamhi samnipati-patī mātari pitari sādhu sususā mitā-sastuta-ñātikānaṁ bāhmaṇa-samaṇānaṁ sādhu dānaṁ pāṇānam anārambho sādhu etaṁ vatavyam pitā va putena va bhātā va mita-sastuta-ñātikena va āva paṭivesiyehi idaṁ sādhu idaṁ katavyam | so tāthā kuru i[ha] loka cha saārādho hoti parata cha anantam puṁñam bhavati tena dhammadānena |

"Piyadasi, king beloved by the gods, speaks thus: There is no gift equal to the gift of the law, or to the praise of the law, or to the distribution of the law, or to union in the law. This gift is thus exhibited: Good will to slaves and hired servants, and obedience to one's father and mother are good things: liberality to friends, acquaintances, and relations, Brahmans and Samaṇas, is a good thing: respect for the life of creatures is a good thing; this is what ought to be said by a father, by a son, by a brother, by a friend, by an acquaintance, by a relation, and even by simple neighbours: this is good; this is to be done. He who acts thus is honoured in this world; and for the world to come an infinite merit results from the gift of the law."

[128] In an obituary notice (probably contributed by Professor Wilson) on M. Burnouf, in the Annual Report of the Royal Asiatic Society for 1853, p. xiii. (published in part i. vol. xv. of the Society's Journal), the following remarks are made on this dissertation: "Bringing to the inquiry a knowledge of Pāli and of Buddhism, the superiority of which his predecessors would be the first to acknowledge, and having the advantage of their previous speculations, the value of which M. Burnouf, with his never-failing candour, recognizes, we may look upon his researches as conclusive, and feel satisfied that they have eliminated from these remains of antiquity all the information they are capable of affording." Prof. Weber also in his review of the Lotus de la Bonne Loi (in the Ind. Stud.), speaks in highly laudatory terms of the same dissertation.

From the age to which these inscriptions appear to belong, we might expect that their language, as it is not pure Sanskrit, would coincide in a great degree with the Pāli, which, as we have already seen, represents what we may suppose to have been the spoken language of some province of northern India about the same period. And such proves on comparison to be to a considerable degree the case. In proof of this point I shall first proceed to quote the general observations made by Professors Wilson, Lassen, and others, on the subject of the languages in which the inscriptions are composed; and then supply a comparative table, by which some opinion may be formed of the degree in which they coincide with, and diverge from, the Pāli.[129]

The following are the remarks made by Professor Wilson (Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, vol. xii., pp. 236, ff.) on the language of the edicts:

"The language itself is a kind of Pali, offering, for the greatest portion of the words, forms analogous to those which are modelled by the rules of the Pali grammar still in use. There are, however, many differences, some of which arise from a closer adherence to Sanskrit, others from possible local peculiarities, indicating a yet unsettled state of the language. It is observed by Mr. Prinsep, when speaking of the Lāt inscriptions, 'The language differs from every existing written idiom, and is as it were intermediate between the Sanskrit and the Pali.' The nouns and particles in general follow

[129] I might have been in a position to treat this subject in a more satisfactory manner than I can now hope to do from my own cursory investigations, had I been able to consult the Pāli Grammar, with appendices on the dialects of Dhauli and Girnār, formerly advertised for publication, but never published, by Professor Spiegel. (See the cover of his Anecdota Palica, published at Leipzig, in 1845.)

the Pali structure; the verbs are more frequently nearer to the Sanskrit forms; but in neither, any more than in grammatical Pali, is there any great dissimilarity from Sanskrit. It is curious that the Kapur di Giri inscription departs less from the Sanskrit than the others, retaining some compound consonants, as pr in prĭya, instead of piya; and having the representatives of the three sibilants of the Devanagari alphabet, while the others, as in Pali, have but but one sibilant: [130] on the other hand, the Kapur di Giri inscription omits the vowels to a much greater extent, and rarely distinguishes between the long and short vowels, peculiarities perhaps not unconnected with the Semitic character of its alphabet.

"The exact determination of the differences and agreements of the inscriptions with the Pali on the one hand, and Sanskrit on the other, would require a laborious analysis of the whole, and would be scarcely worth the pains, as the differences from either would, no doubt, prove to be comparatively few and unimportant, and we may be content to consider the language as Pali, not yet perfected in its grammatical structure, and deviating in no important respect from Sanskrit.

"Pali is the language of the writings of the Buddhists of Ava, Siam and Ceylon; therefore it is concluded it was the language of the Buddhists of Upper India, when the inscriptions were engraved, and consequently they are of Buddhist origin. This, however, admits of question; for although the Buddhist authorities assert that Sâkya Sinha and his successors taught in Pali, and that a Pali grammar was compiled in his day; yet, on the other hand, they affirm, that the doctrines of Buddha were long taught orally only, and were not committed to writing till four centuries after his death, or until B.C. 153, a date, no doubt, subsequent to that of the inscriptions." [131] . . .

"It is by no means established, therefore, that Pali was the sacred language of the Buddhists at the period of the inscriptions, and its use constitutes no conclusive proof of their Buddhist origin.[132] It seems more likely that it was adopted as being the spoken language of that part of India where Piyadasi resided, and was selected for his edicts that they might be intelligible to the people." . . . .

[130] Weber also remarks (Ind. Stud. iii. 180): "The greater purity of pronunciation maintained in the popular dialect of the north-west in comparison with the east, is shown by the inscription of Kapur di Giri, in which, according to Wilson's remark (The Rock Inscriptions of Kapur di Giri, etc.), not only the three sibilants of the Sanskrit, but also a number of compound consonants, containing an r (such as priya, tatra, prati, yatra, putra, savatra, krama, śuśrūsha, śramana, bramana, bhratu), and some others, such as st, str, have been preserved."

[131] See, however, the remarks in the preceding section, p. 57.

"We may, therefore, recognize it as an actually existing form of speech in some part of India, and might admit the testimony of its origin given by the Buddhists themselves, by whom it is always identified with the language of Magadha or Behār, the scene of Sākya Sinha's first teaching; but that there are several differences between it and the Māgadhi, as laid down in Prakrit grammars, and as it occurs in Jain writings. It is, as Messrs. Burnouf and Lassen remark, still nearer to Sanskrit, and may have prevailed more to the north than Behar, or in the upper part of the Doab, and in the Punjab, being more analogous to the Saurasenī dialect, the language of Mathura and Dehli, although not differing from the dialect of Behar to such an extent as not to be intelligible to those to whom Sākya and his successors addressed themselves. The language of the inscriptions, then, although necessarily that of their date, and probably that in which the first propagators of Buddhism expounded their doctrines, seems to have been rather the spoken language of the people in Upper India, than a form of speech peculiar to a class of religionists, or a sacred language, and its use in the edicts of Piyadasi, although not incompatible with their Buddhist origin, cannot be accepted as a conclusive proof that they originated from any peculiar form of religious belief."

Some observations of Prof. Lassen regarding these dialects, and their relative antiquity as compared with the Pāli, have been already quoted in the last section (p. 59). He remarks in another place (Ind. Alt., ii., 221, 222): "These inscriptions are of the greatest value for the history of the Indian languages, because they exhibit to us in an authentic shape the most ancient forms assumed by the popular dialects, and furnish us with a secure basis for the comparative grammar of the great Sanskritic family of languages, which became so variously developed."

[132] Professor Wilson has since, however, from an examination of the Bhabra inscription, arrived at the conviction, that there is in it "enough sufficiently indisputable to establish the fact that Priyadarsī, whoever he may have been, was a follower of Buddha."—(Journ. R. A. S., vol. xv., p. 357.)

"In these inscriptions we possess specimens of three vernacular dialects, one from the border country to the north-west, a second from western, and a third from eastern Hindustan. The inscriptions on the pillars of Dehli, Allahabad, etc., differ only in particular forms from the Dhauli (Cuttak) inscription, while they possess in the main the same character, and may be classed with the Māgadhī of the grammarians. As this dialect is used even on the Dehli column, which is situated beyond the bounds of Magadha, Aśoka appears to have had a partiality for the vernacular language of his principal province; and from the predominating employment of this particular derivative of the Sanskrit, we may perhaps explain the fact that, among the Cingalese, who received the Buddhist religion from that country, their sacred language should have obtained this appellation."

At p. 486, again, Lassen says: "It is only the rock inscriptions which can be admitted as authentic evidence of the local dialects, while the columnar inscriptions everywhere exhibit the same dialect, which consequently cannot have been spoken in every quarter where such pillars have been discovered. This remark is especially true of the Dehli column. When we consider that, between Cabul, Guzerat, and Magadha (which latter province was the native country of the dialect employed in the pillar inscriptions), a wide region intervenes, inhabited by different branches of the Sanskrit-speaking race, we are driven to the conclusion that many other dialects must have been current there, of which we find no specimens in any of the inscriptions."

The following list of words, from the Dehli and Allahabad columns, and the Bhabra stone, borrowed from M. Burnouf's Lotus de la Bonne Loi (App. x., pp. 665, 724, and 741), will show the correctness of Lassen's remark, that the dialect of the pillar inscriptions resembles the Māgadhī of Dhauli, as exhibited in the comparative list which I shall immediately adduce. Thus on these columns we have dhamme, dāne, sache, anugahe, kate, piye, kayāne and pāpe, for dhammo, dānam, sacham, anugaho, kato, piyo, kayānam and pāpam; lājā, vālichalesu, vihālatam, chīla, Aliya, pulisa and abhihāle, for rājā, vāricharesu, vihāratam, chira, Ariya, purisa and abhihāro; Budhasi, dhammasi and sanghasi, for Budhamhi, dhammamhi and sanghamhi.

The list of words, which I shall immediately adduce, borrowed from the article of Prof. H. H. Wilson, above alluded to, in Vol. XII. of the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, and from the Appendix, No. X., to M. Burnouf's Lotus de la Bonne Loi, when compared with the Pāli equivalents which have been added, will suffice to show the points in which the languages of the inscriptions agree with the last-named dialect, as well as the respects in which they differ from one another. I must, however, frankly state that I do not pretend to have made these inscriptions, or the character in which they are written, the object of particular study; and I therefore take it for granted that the words have been correctly deciphered by the eminent scholars from whom I quote.

In comparing the dialect of the inscriptions with other kindred forms of language, presumed to be of about equal antiquity with them, which have come down to us in books, we should recollect that the latter may have been retouched from time to time, to render them more intelligible to the readers by whom they were studied in successive generations, whereas the inscriptions have descended to us unaltered, except by the defacing action which ages have exercised on the rocks on which they are engraved. On this subject I quote the following judicious observations of Mr. Turnour, in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, for December, 1837, p. 1049:—

"When we consider that these inscriptions were recorded upwards of two thousand years ago, and that the several columns on which they are engraven have been exposed to atmospheric influences for the whole of that period, apparently wholly neglected; when we consider, also, that almost all the inflections of the language in which these inscriptions are composed, occur in the ultimate and penultimate syllables, and that these inflections are chiefly formed by minute vowel symbols, or a small anuswāra dot; and when we further find that the Pāli orthography of that period, as shown by these inscriptions, was very imperfectly defined—using single for double, and promiscuously, aspirated and unaspirated, consonants; and also without discrimination as to the class each belonged, the four descriptions of n,—the surprise which every reasonable investigator of this subject must feel will be occasioned rather by the extent of the agreement than of the disagreement between our respective readings of these ancient records."

The following is the comparative list (the Pāli column of which owes its completeness to Mr. Childers) which I proposed to adduce:—

Table No. VIII.

Comparative list of words from the rock inscriptions at Girnār, Dhauli, and Kapur di Giri, with their equivalents in Pāli.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GIRNĀR.	DHAULI.	KAPUR DI GIRI.	PĀLI.	ENGLISH.
Wilson, 157.	devānām	devānam	devānam	devānam	devānam	of the gods.
Wilson, 158.	priyasya	piyasa	piyasa	priyasa	piyassa	of the beloved.
Wilson, 165, 175, 177, 198. Burn. 731.	rājā,	rājā, rājă	lājā, lāja	ră̆jă, raya	rājā	king (nom.)
	rājnaḥ	rāño, răño	lājine	raño	rājino; rañño	king (gen.)
Wilson, 165.	rājānaḥ	rājano	lājāne	rajaya	rājāno	kings (nom.)
	vijite	vijitamhi	. . . .	vijite	vijitamhi	conquered (loc.case.)
Wilson, 166.	vṛikshāḥ	vachchhā	lukhani	. . . .	rukkhā	trees.
	paribhogāya	paribhogāya	paṭibhogăya	pratibhogăyă	paribhogāya	enjoyment (dat.)
Wilson, 190.	prativedanā	paṭivedanā	paṭivedanā	paṭivedana	. . . .	representation.
	dvādaśan	dvādasa	duvādasa	. . . .	dvādasa	twelve.
Wilson, 170.	panchasu	panchasu	panchasu	pachasu	panchasu	five (loc.)
	varshāḥ	vāsā	vasa	vasha	vassā	years (nom.)
	varsheshu	vāsesu	vasesu	vasheshu	vassesu	years (loc.)
Wilson, 171, 213.	mātari, pitari	mātari, pitari	. . . .	matapitushu	mātari, pitari	mother, father (loc.)
Wilson, 171.	mitra	mitā	. . . .	mitra	mitta	friend.
Bur. 731. Wilson, 175, 213.	śuśrūshā	sususā	susūsā	suśrusha	sussūsā	obedience.
Bur. 730. Wilson, 171, 174, 175.	brāhmaṇa	bāhmaṇa, bāmhana	bambhana, bābhana	bramaṇa	brāhmaṇa	Brahman.
Wilson, 171, 174.	śramaṇānām	samaṇānam	sumanehi	śramaṇa	samaṇānaṁ	S'ramanas (gen. and loc., or instr. ?).
Wilson, 174.	prāṇārambhaḥ	pānārambho	pānālambhe	prănărambho	pāṇārambho	injury to life.
Wils. 174, 182, 199.	antaram	antaram	antalam	antaram	antaram	interval.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GIRNÁR.	DHAULI.	KAPUR DI GIRI.	PÁLI.	ENGLISH.
Wilson, 175.	divyāni	divyani	diviyāni	divāni	dibbā, dibbāni	divine. [pl.]
	rūp̣āṇi	rŭpāni	lūpānam	. . . .	rūpā, rūpāni	forms (nom. & gen.
	pūrve	puve	puluve	pŭrve	pubbe	before.
Wilson, 190.	sarva	sava	sava	sava	sabba	all.
	sarvatra	savata	savata	savatra	sabbattha	everywhere.
Wilson, 176.	putrāḥ, pautrāḥ,	putā, potā	putā	putrā, . . .	puttā	sons. [grandsons.
	prapautrāḥ	papotā	nati	pranatikā	paputtā	grandsons, great-dharme, śīle	dhammamhi	dhammasi	. . . .	dhammamhi	virtue, goodness
		sīlamhi	sīlasi	. . . .	sīlamhi	(loc.)
	asmin, arthe	imamhi, athamhi	imasa, athasa	. . . .	imamhi,atthamhi	this object, (loc. and Wilson, 182.	dushkaram	dukaram	dukalam	. . . .	dukkaram	difficult. [gen.)
	apatyam	apacham	apitaye	apacha	apachcham	progeny.
Wilson, 183.	dharmādhish-ṭhānāya	dhammadhi-sṭānāya	dhammādhi-thānye	. . . .	dhammādhi-ṭṭhānāya	supervision of religion (dat.)
Wilson, 184, 200.	sthavirāṇām	thairānam	vadhānam	. . . .	therānam	elders: religious teachers (gen.)
Wilson, 184.	bhikshāhārishu	bhikaresu	bhīkala	bhikati	. . . .	livers on alms.
	sarveshu	. . . .	savesu	savesu	sabbesu	all (loc. pl.)
	nagareshu	. . . .	nagalesu	nagareshu	nagaresu	cities (loc. pl.)
Wilson, 190.	avarodhaneshu	. . . .	olodhanesu	orodhaneshu	orodhañesu	fortresses (loc. pl.)
Wilson, 184.	avarodhane	orodhanamhi	olodhanasi	orodhanasi	orodhanamhi	palace (loc. sing.)
	bhaginīnām	. . . .	bhaghininam	. . . .	bhaginīnam	sisters (gen.)
Wilson, 190.	garbhāgāre	gabhagāramhi	gabhatapasi	gabhagarasi	gabbhāgāramhi	inner apartments.
	garbha-grihe (?)					(loc.)
	vachasi	vachamhi	. . . .	vachasi	vachasi,vachamhi	word (loc.)
	vinīte	vinītamhi	vinītasi	vinatasi	vinītamhi	polite (loc.) [(loc.)
Wilson, 203.	pravāse	pavāsammhi	pavāsasi	pavasa	pavāsamhi	departure from home
Wilson, 191, 194.	uṭṭhāne	ustānamhi	. . . .	. . . .	uṭṭhānamhi	elevation (loc.)
Wilson, 192, 195.	utthānam	ustānam	suṭhāna	. . . .	uṭṭhāna	elevation.
Wilson, 192.	aham	ahaṁ	hakaṁ	. . . .	aham	I.
Wils. 192, 195, 205.	svargam	svagam	svaga	saga	saggam	heaven.
Wilson, 192.	etasmai, arthāya	etāya, athāya	etāye, . . .	etaya, athaye	imassa, atthāya, atthassa	this object (dat.)
	chiram	chiraṁ	chila	. . . .	chiram	long.

Burn. 731.	śreshṭham	seṭṭe	. . . .	. . . .	seṭṭham	best.
Wilson, 193.	parākrameṇa	parākamena	palākamena	parakamena	parakkamena	valour (instr.)
Wilson, 198.	rāgaḥ	rāgo	lāgā	rago	rāgo	passion.
	kṛitajnatā	kataṁñatā	. . . .	kaṭañatā	kataññutā	gratitude.
Burn, 755. Wils. 198.	dṛiḍhabhaktitā	daḍhabhatitā	. . . .	daḍhabhatitā	daḷhabhattitā	firmness of devotion.
Wilson, 198.	nitya	nichā	niche	nicha	nichcha	constant.
Wilson, 199.	etādṛisāni	etārisāni	edisāni	edisāni	etādisāni	such (neuter pl.)
Wilson, 200.	yātrā	yātā	. . . .	yatra	yātrā	journey.
	paripṛichchhā	paripuchhā	. . . .	pariprutachhu(?)	paripuchchhā	question.
Wils. 204. Burn. 736.	bhrātrā	bhātā	bhatinā	bhata	bhātarā	brother (instr.)
Wils. 215. Burn. 761.	gṛihasthāni	gharastāni	. . . .	. . . .	(ghara) gahaṭṭhāni (Dh. 72.)	domestic (nom. pl. neuter.)
Wilson, 215.	vividhayā	vividhāya	. . . .	. . . .	vividhāyā	various (instr. fem.)
	pūjayā	pūjāya	. . . .	. . . .	pūjāya	honour (instr. fem.)
	vṛiddhi	vaḍhī	. . . .	. . . .	vaḍḍhi, vuddhi	increase.
Wilson, 215. Burn. 761, 765.	ātmā, ātmanaḥ	ātpa, ātpano	. . . .	. . . .	attā, attano	self: of self.
Burn. 761.	garhā	garahā	. . . .	. . . .	garahā	reviling.
Wilson, 225.	chatvāraḥ	chaptārā (?) chattāro (?)	. . . .	. . . .	chattāro	four.
Wilson, 158, 233.	asti	asti	. . . .	asti	atthi	is.
Wilson, 165, 191, 198, 212.	nāsti	nāsti	natthi, nathi, nathā	năsti, nāsti	natthi (B. 649)	is not.
Wilson, 166.	ropitāni	ropāpitāni	lopāptānt	. . . .	ropāpitāni	planted.
Wilson, 191.	āropitam	aropitam	alopite	. . . .	āropitam	intrusted.
Wilson, 205.	apavāditavyam	ovāditavyam	. . . .	. . . .	ovāditabbam	to be blamed.
Wils. 170, 182, 203.	āha	āha	āhā, kaha (?)	ahati[133]	āha	says.
Wilson, 176.	tishṭhantaḥ	tiṣṭanto	. . . .	. . . .	tiṭṭhanto	standing (nom. pl.)
Wils. 176, 191, 200.	bhavati	bhavati, hoti	hoti	bhoti, hoti	bhavati, hoti	is
Wilson, 182, 190.	bhūta	bhūta	hūtā	bhuta	bhūta	been.
Wilson, 182, 203.	karoti	karoti	kaleti	karāti	karoti	does.
Wilson, 191.	karomi	karomi	kalāmi	karomi	karomi	I do.
Wilson, 190.	kṛitam	katam	kaṭe	kiṭa	katam	done.
Wilson, 184.	nisṇṭhitaḥ	niṣṭito	nisita	nisṭisita	niṭṭhito	placed.
Wilson, 192.	kartavyam	katavya	kaṭaviya	. . . .	kātabbaṁ, kattabbaṁ	to be done.

[133] The ancient form of āha according to Wilson, p. 171.

REFERENCES.	SANSKRIT.	GIRNÂR.	DHAULI.	KAPUR DI GIRI.	PÂLI.	ENGLISH.
Wilson, 192, 195.	parâkramâmi	parâkamâmi	palakamâva	parakamama	parakkamâmi	I have power.
Wilson, 209.	paṣâkramati	parâkamate	palâkamati	parakramati	parakkamati	he has power.
Wilson, 192, 195.	tishṭhet	tiṣṭeya	ṭhiti, hotu	ṭhitikâ, bhotu	tiṭṭheyya	let it endure.
Wilson, 199.	abhûvan	ahuṁsu	. . . .	abhavasu	ahesuṁ	they were.
	san	santo	. . . .	santu	santo	being (nom. sing. [part.)
Wilson, 216.	kshaṇoti	chhanoti	. . . .	. . . .	. . . .	hurts.
	garhate	garahati	. . . .	. . . .	garahati	reviles.
Burn. 666, 669.	paśyati, dṛiśyati (?)	. . . .	dekhati (on Dehli pillar.)	. . . .	passati, dichchhati (dekhadi Prâk.)	he sees.
Wilson, 223.	labdheshu	laddhesu	. . . .	. . . .	laddhesu	obtained (loc. pl. past part.)
Burn. 761.	varddhayati	vaḍhayati	. . . .	. . . .	vaḍḍheti	he increases.
Burn. 731.	darśayitvâ	dasayitpâ	. . . .	. . . .	dassetvâ	having shown.
	tishṭhati	tiṭhati	. . . .	. . . .	tiṭṭhati	stands.
Burn. 757, 758.	ajnâsuḥ	ñeyâsu, ñayisu (?)	. . . .	. . . .	aññâsuṁ	they knew.
Burn. 759.	iyâya	ayâya (?)	. . . .	. . . .	. . . .	he went.
Burn. 659, 654, Lass. Ind. Alt. ii. 227, note 4.	parityajya	parichajitpâ	. . . .	. . . .	parichchajitvâ	having left.

From an examination of this list, it will be seen that, as Professors Wilson and Weber remark (above, p. 107), the Kapur di Giri inscription departs less from the Sanskrit in the particulars which they specify than the others do; that the language of the Girnâr inscription coincides most of the three with the Pâli; while in the use of l for r, and e for o, the Dhauli inscription bears the well-known characters of the Mâgadhî.[134] In general the whole language of these inscriptions is so well characterized by Professor Wilson in the passage I have already extracted (p. 106, ff.), as to render any further remarks upon them superfluous.

[134] It is worthy of remark that in a passage of the S'atapatha Brâhmaṇa, 3, 2, 1, 23 (p. 235), the Asuras, who, perhaps, represent some barbarous tribe, are introduced as using the Mâgadhî form alavaḥ instead of arayaḥ, enemies. Te asurâḥ âttavachaso "he alavo he alavaḥ" iti vadanto parâbabhûvuḥ | "The Asuras, marred in their utterance, and crying out 'O enemies, O enemies,' were defeated." This passage is quoted, with some variety of reading, in the Mahâbhâshya, pp. 18 and 64.

SECT. VII.—The Dialect of the Buddhist Gāthās, and its relation to the Pāli: Summary of the results of this and the preceding Section.

I now come to the last of the varieties of corrupted Sanskrit to which I referred in p. 10, viz., the language which we find in the Gāthās, or metrical portions occurring in such works as the Lalita Vistara, descriptive of the life and discourses of Gotama Buddha. An account of the peculiarities of this dialect, as it is convenient to call it, has been given by Bābu Rājendralāl Mitra, in No. 6 of the Journal As. Soc., Bengal, 1854. Of the Lalita Vistara, from which the specimens given by this writer, and those which will be adduced by myself, are drawn, Professor Müller remarks, that though "on account of its style and language," it "had been referred by Oriental scholars to a much more modern period of Indian literature," it "can now safely be ascribed to an ante-Christian era, if, as we are told by Chinese scholars, it was translated from Sanskrit into Chinese, as one of the canonical books of Buddhism, as early as the year 76 A.D."[135]

I proceed to give the substance of Bābu Rājendralāl's dissertation in his own words, omitting only those portions which appear to be of the least importance; making occasional abridgments; and adding, in some places, to the number of the specimens he has given of the Gāthā forms.

"Of the dialects which have proceeded from the Sanskrit, the Pāli and the Māgadhi have hitherto been supposed to bear the closest resemblance to their parent, but the discovery of the Sanskrit Buddhist literature of Nepal has brought to our knowledge a new dialect, bearing a still closer affinity to the classic language of the East, than either of the former. Nepalese chroniclers have named it Gāthā (ballad),[136] probably, from its having been principally used by the scalds and bards[136*] of mediæval India. For nearly a similar reason the [135] Buddhist Pilgrims, in "Chips," (1st ed.) vol. i., p. 258.

[136] [The antiquity of certain compositions, called Gāthās, is proved by the fact that the expression munigāthā, the gāthās or verses of the Muni, or Munis, occurs in the ancient inscription of Piyadasi at Bhabra. Burnouf, App. x. to Lotus, pp. 724, 725, 729; Wilson, Jour. R. A. S., vol. xvi., pp. 359, 363, 367. Bābu Rājendralāl also refers to the Mahāwanso, p. 252, where gāthās are mentioned.—J.M.]

[136*] On this Prof. Benfey remarks, Gött. Gel. Anz. for 1861, p. 134: "On the other hand, Bābu Rājendralāl's views on the origin of these Gāthās have very much to recommend them: they require only a slight modification, the substitution of inspired believers,—such as most of the older Buddhists were,—sprung from the lower classes of the people,—in the place of professional bards."

Balenese style the language of their poets, the Kāwi or poetical, and the language of their Vedas is called Chhandas (metrical), whence, by a well-known euphonic law, we have the Zend of the old Persians.

"M. Burnouf, the only European scholar who has noticed the existence of this dialect, describes it to be 'a barbarous Sanskrit, in which the forms of all ages, Sanskrit, Pāli, and Prākṛit, appear to be confounded.'[137] It differs from the Sanskrit more in its neglect of the grammatical rules of the latter than from any inherent peculiarity of its own. The niceties of the Sanskrit forms of declension and conjugation find but a very indifferent attention from the Gāthā versifier; he uses or rejects the usual case-affixes according to the exigencies of his metre with as much veneration for the rules of Pāṇini as the West Indian Negro has for those of Lindley Murray; indeed, the best illustration that can be given of the relation which exists between the Sanskrit, the Gāthā, and the Pāli, would be extracts from the literature of the Negroes.

"The Gāthā exists only in a versified form, and is to be met with in that class of Buddhist writings called the Mahāvaipulya or the 'highly developed' sūtras. It occurs generally at the end and often in the middle, but never at the commencement of a chapter, and contains a poetical abstract of the subject described in the prose portion of the works. The latter is written in pure Sanskrit, and comprises a highly amplified version of the subject-matter, and often adverts to circumstances unnoticed in the former.

"The Gāthā is written in a variety of metres, from the facile octo-syllabic anushṭup, to the most complicated śārdūlavikrīḍita. Its peculiarities are those of a language in a state of transition; it professes to be Sanskrit, and yet does not conform to its rules. In it we find the old forms of the Sanskrit grammar gradually losing their expressive power, and prepositions and periphrastic expressions supplying their places, and time-hallowed verbs and conjugations juxtaposed to vulgar slangs and uncouth provincialisms. At one place, orthography is sacrificed for the sake of prosody and a word of a single short syllable is inflated into one of three syllables, while at another the latter yields to the former and a molossus supplies the place of a pyrrhic or a tribrach. A spirit of economy pervades the whole, and syllables and words are retrenched and modified with an unsparing hand. In the Lalita Vistara instances of these peculiarities occur in great profusion, and they may be generally referred to (A) exigencies of metre, (B) provincialisms, and (C) errors of syntax and prosody.

[137] L'Histoire du Buddhisme, p. 104.

"A.—Of the changes which may be attributed to the exigencies of metre, prolongation, contraction and elision of vowels, elision of consonants, and the segregation of compound consonants and long vowels into their simple elements, appear to be the most frequent. We shall quote a few instances:

1st. "Of the prolongation of vowels the following may be taken as examples.[138]

"Nā cha for na cha; ṣa cha for sa cha; prayāto for prayataḥ; rodamāna for rudamāna.

2nd. "Of contractions of vowels, instances occur almost in every śloka. They are generally effected by the use of short for long vowels, and the substitution of i and u for e, ai, o, and au: for example, yāmi for yāme; dharenti for dhārayanti;[139] drumavara for drumavarāḥ; māya for māyā; ghaṇṭa for ghaṇṭā; pujam etām for pūjām etām; yatha for yathā; tatha for tathā; sada for sadā.

3rd. "Elisions of vowels and consonants are also very frequent; they are effected principally with a view to economy and euphony. Final ses are invariably elided. Take for instance: nabhe for nabhasi; apsarāḥ for apsarasaḥ;[140] sadārchiskandhi for sadārchishi skandhe; ima dṛishṭa vasthām for imāṁ dṛishṭvā avasthām; niścharī for niśchachāra; praṇidhenti for praṇidhyāyanti; manā for manasaḥ; ena for etena.

4th. "Of the division of long vowels and compound consonants into their short and simple elements, the following are instances of constant occurrence:

"Rāttiye for rātryāḥ, or rātryām; turiyebhi for turyebhyaḥ; gilāno

[138] Quoted from the edition of the Lalita Vistara, in the Bibliotheca Indica.

[[139] Other instances of the same abbreviation (common also in the Pāli and Prākṛits) are enti for āyānti; upenti for upayanti; janenti for janayanti; janehi for janaya; moehehi for moehaya; bodhehi for bodhaya; pūrehi for pūraya; darśenti for darśayanti, and numerous others.—J.M.]

[140] On this Professor Benfey remarks in the Gött. Gel. Anz. for January, 1861, p. 134: "Such forms, as, for instance, apsarā for apsaras, appear already in abundance in the Vedas, and arise, not from the exigencies of the metre, but from the fact of terminations in as passing into terminations in a." He then goes on to refer to the great importance of this Gāthā language; and expresses the hope of being able to exhibit this in a grammar of this form of speech, which he had then already prepared, but which has not yet been published.

for glāno; istri for strī; turiya for tūryya; akilāntaka for aklāntaka; kileśa for kleśa; hiri for hrī; śiri for śrī; śiriyā for śriyā; śirīye for śriye; deviye for devyāḥ; pūjārāham for pūjārham; padumāni for padmāni; dānacharīyā for dānacharyā; supina for svapnam.[141]

"This tendency to segregation of aspirated consonants forms a principal characteristic of mediæval and modern Indian phonology. The Pāli and the Prākṛit owe their origin entirely to this cause. The Hindi and the Marhatti indulge in it to a large extent, and the Bengāli is not exempt from its influence.

"B.—The provincialisms of the Gāthā include neglect of gender, number, and case, abbreviations and omissions of declensions, corruption of pronouns, and new forms of conjugation.

(1.) "Of the neglect of gender, number, and case, the following may be taken as examples: viśuddhanirmalam for viśuddhanirmalān (singular for plural); buddhakshetram for buddhakshetrāṇi (singular for plural); āsaninā for āsanāt (instrumental for ablative); bodhisuvaṭa far bodhisuvaṭāt (objective for ablative); ūrddha hastā for ūrddhau hastau (plural for dual); kechid ekapāde for kechid ekapādena (locative for instrumental); trilokam for trilokī (neuter for feminine); kāraṇaṁ for kāraṇāni (singular feminine for plural neuter); nakshatrāḥ for nakshatrāṇi (masculine for neuter); pṛithu for prithavaḥ; ime karma for imāni karmāṇi.

(2.) "Under the head of abbreviations and omissions of declension, the most remarkable peculiarity appears to be the use of u in the room of all flectional affixes," as ratanu for ratnam; ahu for aham. U is also merely put for the inherent a, as in two of the following cases: kshayusaṁskṛitu for kshayasaṁskṛita; nishkrāntu for nishkrānta; parivāritu for parivāritaḥ. The next are instances in which the case terminations are omitted: laukika for laukikāḥ; chitrakarma for chitrakarmāṇaḥ; and such instances are of continual occurrence.

(3.) "The following are the corruptions of pronouns that are frequently met with in the Lalita Vistara. They apparently lead the way to the formation of pronouns in the modern vernaculars:—

[141 Other cases are viyūha for vyūha; ratana for ratna; śākiyānām for śākyānām; nāriyā for nāryāḥ; vajirikāya for vajrakāya; śakkitam for śaktam; śukula for śukla; nyasiya for nyasya; ābhujiya for ābhujya; akampiyo for akampyaḥ, etc.—J.M.]

"Mahya for mama and mattaḥ; tubhya for tvăyă (sic) tvāṁ, and tava;[142] ayu for eshaḥ; te for tā; kahiṁ for kutra and kena.

(4.) "The new forms of conjugation observable in the Gāthā are attributable exclusively to corrupt pronunciation; they follow no fixed rule, and are the result of that natural tendency to abbreviation which in the English originates "wont" from "will not," and "shant" from "shall not." The following are a few examples:

"Dadami and demi for dadāmi; bhosi for bhavasi; bhoti for bhavati; bhonti for bhavanti; ramishyasi for ramsyase; āruhi for ārohat; raṇī or raṇi for arat; utthi for uttishṭha; dada for dadasva; śuṇohi and śuṇa for śriṇu; munchamī for amuncha; bheshyi for bhavishyāmi-v-m-ti-taḥ-anti-si-thaḥ-tha;[143] parikatha for parikathaya; nyasī for nidadhuḥ; śaṇuvantī for śriṇvanti; śuṇitvā, śruṇitvā, śuṇitya and śrutya for śrutvā; śuṇishyati for śroshyāti; śūnya for śrāvyān; oruhitvā for avaruhya; glapayisu for glāpayāmāsuḥ; jahitvā for hitvā; buddhitvā for buddhvā.

"It may be remarked that the corruptions above quoted are, in many instances, the precursors of forms adopted in other affiliated dialects. In Sanskrit the third person singular of the verb to be is bhavati, which in the Gāthā changes to bhoti by the conversion of the v into o and the elision of the a before and after it (bhonti in the plural, and bhosi in the second person singular), and thence we have hoti, hosi, and honti in the Māgadhi. Śuṇitvā for śrutvā is the first step to the formation of suniā in Bengāli, while śuṇohi passes into suno with nothing but the elision of an inflection.

"C.—In the collocation of words and phrases the Gāthā strictly follows the rules of Sanskrit syntax, but in the formation of compound terms it admits of many licences highly offensive to the canons of Pāṇini and Vopadeva. They seem, however, to be the consequence of haste and inattention, and are not referrible to any dialectic peculiarity."

There are, however, some other forms discoverable in the Gāthā

[142] [I have noted also mi for mahyam and mayā; ti for tvayā (Lv. pp. 256, 358, 380, 399); tasā for tasya (p. 125); anabhiḥ for ebhiḥ (p. 304).—J.M.]

[143] [I find the following additional irregular forms of the verb bhū, "to be," viz., bhavīti for bhavati, abhūshi for abhūt, abhūshīḥ for abhūḥ (?), ababhūvan for abhūvan, bhavi for bhavishyasi and bhavāni, bhaviya and bhaveyā (resembling a Pāli form of the same tense) for bhavet, bhohi for bhava, bhaviyā and bhaviaḥ for bhūtvā, anubhaviyā for anubhūya, prabhāmi and prabhāma for prabhavāmi and prabhavāmaḥ. The forms asmaḥ for smaḥ, and āsi for asti, or ṛsīt, also occur.—J.M.]

dialect, which have been either passed over, or but briefly noticed by Bābu Rājendralāl, and which yet present some points of remarkable interest. Thus the plural instrumental in ebhiḥ, which is so general in the Vedas, is in constant use in the Gāthās also, as in the instances śākiyebhiḥ, sattvebhiḥ, guṇebhiḥ, siṁhāsanebhiḥ, dārakebhiḥ, cheṭakebhiḥ, employed instead of the form, śākyaiḥ, sattvaiḥ, etc., which is alone current in modern Sanskrit. It is from this older form in ebhiḥ that the Pāli form of the same case in ebhi, or ehi, is derived, as in the word buddhebhi, or buddhehi (Clough, Pāli, Gram., p. 19). Again, we find in the Gāthās various other cases besides those above noticed in which the case-terminations of the declension in a are substituted, in the case of words ending in consonants, for those proper to the latter form of declension. Thus, for jagataḥ and jagati (the gen. and loc. of jagat), we have jagasya and jage; for nāmnā (instr. of nāman), we have nāmena; for mahātmānam we have mahātmam; for anantayaśasam we have anantayaśam; for karmaṇaḥ (gen. of karman) we have karmasya; and for duhitaram, accusative of the word duhitṛi (ending in ṛi), we have duhitām, the accusative of feminine nouns ending in ā. This change is one to which the Pāli inclines (as in the form Brahmassa, as one of the genitives of Brahman), and to which a still more decided tendency is observable in the Prākṛit. (See Cowell's Prākṛit Gram. Introd., p. xxiii., xxiv.) On the other hand, we find also in the Gāthās instances of the quite different change of e into i in the locative, as loki, gehi, udari, for the proper form loke, gehe, udare. The particle api (also) is contracted to pi, as in Prākṛit; thus we have ahampi for aham api, tubhyampi, for tubhyam api, vayampi for vayam api, napi for nāpi, tathāpi for tathāpi, punopi for punar api: so also iti is contracted to ti, as in ahanti for aham iti. Again, we have the peculiar forms jihmi, jihma, and jaha for yathā; yathariva for yathaiva[144] (precisely as in Pāli; Clough's Gram., p. 11); sīti for smṛiti; paṭhe for patheshu, and ishṭikān for yashṭidhārakān (macebearers).

Many of the changes in the Gāthā verbs are in part the same which we find in Pāli. Thus, for the correct Sanskrit forms chodayanti, tarpayishyanti, nivarttayati and dhārayantī, we have chodenti, tarpesh- [144] See the further instances of interpolation of letters already adduced above, p. 70, and note.

yati, nivartteti and dharentī, which, in Pāli, would be chodenti, tappessati, nivaṭṭeti, and dharentī. Again, for avalambate we have olambate, which would take the same form in Pāli. The modifications avachi for avochat, munchi for amunchat, gachchhi for agachchhat, dhyāyi for adhyāyat, correspond in some measure to such Pāli forms as akāsi for akārshīt, ahāsi for ahārshīt, adāsi for adāt, ahosi for abhūt, aṭṭhāsi for asthāt, abadhi for abadhīt, etc.: and snapinsuṁ for snāpayāmasuḥ or asisnapan, is nearly the same as the Pāli form apachinsu, the third person plural of the third preterite. The Gāthā forms darśishyasi for drakshyasi, suṇishyati for śroshyati, kshipishyati for kshepsyati, and spṛiśishyati for sparkshyati or spṛakshyati, are analogous to the Pāli forms vedissāmi for vetsyāmi, bhuṇjissāmi for bhokshyāmi, and dessissāmi for dekshyāmi. The Gāthā past indeclinable particles also, such as bhavitvā, ramitvā, hanitvā, labhitvā, stuvitvā, manitvā, vijihitvā, śuṇitvā, spṛiśitvā for bhūtvā, mantvā, hatvā, labdhvā, stutvā, matvā, vi+hitvā, śrutvā, and spṛishṭvā, are formed on the same principle as the similar Pāli ones, pavisitvā, jānitvā, bhuṇjitvā, for pra + veshṭvā, jñātvā, and bhuktvā. Of the forms karitya and kariyāna for kṛitvā, the latter coincides in its termination with such Pāli forms as sutvāna and disvāna for śrutvā and dṛishṭvā. Again, we have the forms kampayantō, vārayanto, vinishkramanto, vīryavanto (part. nom. sing.), for kampayan, etc., which coincides with the Pāli and Prākṛit. The same may be said of pekshasi for prekshase; tāva for tāvat; smarāhi, kurvahi, bhaṇāhi, vasāhi, for smara, kuru, bhaṇa and vasa respectively; deviye and devīye for devyāḥ; tapasmi for tapasi; talasmin for tale; arhantebhiḥ for arhadbhiḥ; prabhāyā for prabhāyā, vāchāyā for vāchā. For tyaktvā I find the word chhorayitvā, which does not seem to be much used in Sanskrit, though Wilson, in his Dictionary, gives chhoraṇa in the sense of "leaving." I quote the following additional anomalous forms, viz., pithitā for pishṭā, pithitāni for prathitāni, visnapī for vyasnāpayan, snapit for snāpayitvā, kshipiṇsu for kshipantī, bhaviya for bhavet, pratishṭhihitvā for pratishṭhāya, datti for dadati, deti for dadāti, dāsmi for dāsyami, dīyatu for diyatām, dārthi for dadataḥ, daditu for dātum, detī, dadia and dadiya for dattvā; kurumi for karomi, karonti for kurvanti, or karishyanti; karoma for karishyāmaḥ; kareya for kuryuḥ; karitya, kariye, and kariyā for kṛitvā; prakarohi for prakuru; gṛihītya, grahiya for gṛihītvā; bhinanmi for bhinadmi; vademi for vadāmi; vyus- thāya for vyutthāya; sthihiya for sthitvā; utthihitvā for utthāya; āruhitya for āruhya, parāhaniya for parāhatya; utthihet for uttishṭhet; charoti for charati; miṇitvā for matvā; śakkitam and śaktitam for śaktam; uchchhrepaya for utkshepaya; miyati for mriyate; pūrima for pūrva; vidu for vidvān; vidubhiḥ for vidvadbhiḥ; lābhase for lābhāya; saṁskṛitāttaḥ for saṁskṛitāt, or saṁskṛitataḥ; jānamī for jānāmi; bhāsī for bhāshate; vinenti for vineshyati; janeshi or janaishī, for janayishyati; adṛiśuḥ for adrākshuḥ; paśyeta for driśyate; adhyeshṭu for adhyetum; chintayā for chintayitvā; vademi for vadāmi; vandima for vandāmahe; atikrametum for atikramitum. (In all these cases, I should observe, the Sanskrit equivalents are given according to the notes in the printed edition of the Lalita Vistara.) Nouns and participles are frequently lengthened by the addition of the syllable ka, as rodantako, gachchhamānake, bhāshamāṇikāḥ, dadantikāḥ, roditavyakaḥ, āgatikāḥ, dāsinikāḥ for rudan (or rather rodanto), gachchhamāne, bhāshamāṇāḥ, dadatyaḥ, roditṛvyaḥ, āgatāḥ, dāsikāḥ. This insertion of ka is also to be noticed in the following verses of the Vājasaneyi sanhitā, xxiii. 22, f.; where yakā and asakau, yakaḥ and asakau, stand for yā, yaḥ, and asau.

Very peculiar is the use of the a privative in ajanehi for mā janaya, "do not cause."

The use of abbreviated, or otherwise irregular, forms, such as labhi for lapsyase, or labdhaḥ, gachchi for agachhat, chali for chalitā, munchi for amunchat, avachi for avochat, niveśayi for niveśitāḥ, chhādayi for chhādayati, parichari for paryacharaḥ and parichāriṇī, varichari for varāchaṇam, tyaji for tyaktā, tyaktvā, and tyaktavān, smari for smṛitam and smaraṇam, varshi for varshitvā, vraji for avrajat, sparśi for sprashṭum, utthi for uttishṭha and utthāya, is extremely common, and, as will be seen from the equivalents following each word, these forms are very variously interpreted by the commentator, and supposed to stand for verbs in the present, past, and future tense, and in the imperative mood, and for participles active and passive, as well as for nouns. The penultimate syllable of verbs is very often lengthened, as in the Vedic leṭ form, as in mochayāti, dharshayāti, sahāti, labhāti, dṛiśāsi, vrajāsi, for mochayăti, etc., for which the commentator generally substitutes the present tense, but sometimes the past, and sometimes the future. This form is even found with the augment in adṛiśāsi, rendered by the commentator paśyati or adrākshīt.

I proceed with the quotations from Bābu Rājendralāl's Essay.

"Of the origin of the Gāthā nothing appears to be known for certain. M. Burnouf is inclined to attribute it to ignorance; he says:—'This fact (the difference of language of the different parts of the Vaipulya Sūtras) indicates in the clearest manner that there was another digest (of the Buddhist literature prepared, besides those of the three convocations), and it agrees with the development of the poetical pieces in which these impurities occur, in showing that those pieces do not proceed from the same hand to which the simple Sūtras owe their origin. There is nothing in the books characterized by this difference of language, which throws the smallest light on its origin. Are we to look on this as the use of a popular style which may have developed itself subsequent to the preaching of Sākya, and which would thus be intermediate between the regular Sanskrit and the Pāli,—a dialect entirely derived from, and manifestly posterior to the Sanskrit? or should we rather regard it as the crude composition of writers to whom the Sanskrit was no longer familiar, and who endeavoured to write in the learned language, which they ill understood, with the freedom which is imparted by the habitual use of a popular but imperfectly determined dialect? It will be for history to decide which of these two solutions is correct; to my mind the second appears to be the more probable one, but direct evidence being wanting, we are reduced to the inductions furnished by the very few facts as yet known. Now, these facts are not all to be found in the Nepalese collection; it is indispensably necessary, in order to understand the question in all its bearings, to consult for an instant the Singalese collection and the traditions of the Buddhists of the South. What we thence learn is, that the sacred texts are there written in Pāli; that is to say, in a dialect derived immediately from the learned idiom of the Brahmans, and which differs very little from the dialect which is found on the most ancient Buddhist monuments in India. Is it in this dialect that the poetical portions of the great Sūtras are composed? By no means; the style of these portions is an indescribable melange, in which incorrect Sanskrit bristles with forms of which some are entirely Pāli, and others popular in the most general sense of the term. There is no geographical name to bestow upon a language of this kind; but it is at the same time intelligible how such a jargon may have been produced in places where the Sanskrit was not studied systematically, and in the midst of populations which had never spoken it, or had known only the dialects derived more or less remotely from the primitive source. I incline then to the belief that this part of the great Sūtras must have been written out of India, or, to express myself more precisely, in countries situated on the western side of the Indus, or in Cashmir, for example; countries where the learned language of Brahmanism and Buddhism would be cultivated with less success than in Central India. It appears to me almost impossible that the jargon of these poems could have been produced in an epoch when Buddhism flourished in Hindusthan. Then, in fact, the priests had no other choice but between these two idioms; either the Sanskrit, i.e. the language which prevails in the compositions collected at Nepal, or the Pāli, that is, the dialect which is found on the ancient Buddhist inscriptions of India, and which has been adopted by the Buddhists of Ceylon.' [145]

"This opinion," continues Bābu Rājendralāl, "we venture to think, is founded on a mistaken estimate of Sanskrit style. The poetry of the Gāthā has much artistic elegance which at once indicates that it is not the composition of men who were ignorant of the first principles of grammar. Its authors display a great deal of learning, and discuss the subtlest questions of logic and metaphysics with much tact and ability; and it is difficult to conceive that men who were perfectly familiar with the most intricate forms of Sanskrit logic, who have expressed the most abstruse metaphysical ideas in precise and often in beautiful language, who composed with ease and elegance in Ārya, Toṭaka, and other difficult measures, were unacquainted with the rudiments of the language in which they wrote, and even unable to conjugate the verb to be, in all its forms. This difficulty is greatly enhanced, when we bear in mind that the prose portion of the Vaipulya Sūtras is written in perfectly pure Sanskrit, and has no trace whatever of the provincialisms and popular forms so abundant in the poetry. If these Sūtras be the productions of men beyond the Indus imperfectly acquainted with the Sanskrit, how happens one portion of them to be so perfect in every respect, while the other is so impure? What could have been the object of writing the same subject twice over in the same work, once in pure prose and then in incorrect poetry?

[145] L'Histoire du Buddhisme Indien, p. 105. [I have introduced a very few verbal alterations into this translation from Burnouf. Lassen, Ind. Alt., ii. p. 9, concurs in these views of Burnouf:—"The Mahāyāna Sūtras (of the Buddhists) are composed in a prose made up of a mixture of irregular Sanskrit, of Pali, and of forms borrowed from the vulgar dialects; and the narrative is repeated in verse. Such a medley of forms could only, as it appears, have arisen in a country where the learned language was no longer maintained in its purity; and, consequently, the writings in question were probably composed in the countries bordering on the Indus, and most likely in Kashmir, which plays an important part in the later history of Buddhism." (See also pp. 491, 492, and p. 1153 of the same volume.)—J.M.]

"It might be supposed,—what is most likely the case—that the prose and the poetry are the productions of two different ages; but the question would then arise, how came they to be associated together? What could have induced the authors of the prose portions to insert in their works the incorrect productions of Trans-Indus origin? Nothing but a sense of the truthfulness and authenticity of those narratives could have led to their adoption. But how is it likely to be supposed that the most authentic account of Sākya, within three hundred years after his death, was to be had only in countries hundreds of miles away from the place of his birth, and the field of his preachings? The great Sūtras are supposed to have been compiled about the time of the third convocation (309 B.C.), when it is not at all likely that the sages of central India would have gone to Cashmere in search of data, which could be best gathered at their own threshold.

"The more reasonable conjecture appears to be that the Gāthā is the production of bards, who were contemporaries or immediate successors of Sākya, who recounted to the devout congregations of the prophet of Magadha the sayings and doings of their great teacher, in popular and easy flowing verses, which in course of time came to be regarded as the most authentic source of all information connected with the founder of Buddhism. The high estimation in which the ballads and improvisations of bards are held in India and particularly in the Buddhist writings, favours this supposition; and the circumstance that the poetical portions are generally introduced in corroboration of the narrative of the prose, with the words: Tatredam uchyate, 'Thereof this may be said,' affords a strong presumptive evidence."

In a review of Burnouf's "Lotus de la Bonne Loi," Professor Weber (in the Indische Studien, iii. pp. 139, 140) remarks as follows on the views expressed by Burnouf in the preceding passage in regard to the language of the Gāthās:—

"The last reason (viz. that Sanskrit was cultivated with less success in Kashmir than in Central India) is an incorrect one; since, on the contrary, it is precisely in the north-west of India that the proper seat of Indian grammatical learning appears to have existed. As regards the fact itself, Burnouf may be right, and the jargon of those poetical portions may have actually been at one time the local dialect of Kashmir, which would preserve a far more exact resemblance to the ancient form of speech, than did the Pāli and Prakrit dialects which were developed in India proper under the influence of the aborigines, who spoke differently. But as Burnouf urges elsewhere, that the more recent a Buddhistic work is, the purer and more correct is its language, it appears to me more natural to assume that these poetical portions are fragments of older traditions; because, if they were more recent than the rest of the text, there is no good ground on which to account for their deviating from them in point of language; or if there were a difference, one would expect that the poetical parts would be more correct than the prose. This is in fact the view taken in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal for 1851, p. 283, where the Lalita Vistara is said to have been 'compiled in Sanskrit about the end of the sixth century from ballads in an obsolete patois of that language, composed evidently by bards at a much earlier period.'"

In regard to the point on which Bābu Rājendralāl is at issue with the views of M. Burnouf, I will not venture to express any opinion. The peculiarities of the Gāthā dialect are so anomalous that it is very difficult to explain them. In any case, it is clear that, if not a spoken language, it was at least a written language in a remote age: and it therefore exemplifies to us some portion of the process by which the Sanskrit was broken down and corrupted into the derivative dialects which sprang out of it.

I subjoin the concluding passage of Bābu Rājendralāl's dissertation, in which he states his opinion in regard to the periods at which the successive modifications of Sanskrit were spoken in India.

"The language of the Gāthā is believed, by M. Burnouf, to be intermediate between the Pāli and the pure Sanskrit. Now, as the Pāli was the vernacular language of India from Cuttack to Kapurdagiri within three hundred years after the death of Śākya, it would not be unreasonable to suppose that the Gāthā which preceded it was the dialect of the million at the time of Śākya's advent. If our conjecture in this respect be right, it would follow that the Sanskrit passed into the Gāthā six hundred years before the Christian era; that three hundred years subsequently it changed into the Pāli; and that thence, in two hundred years more, proceeded the Prākṛit and its sister dialects the Śaurasenī, the Drāviḍi,[146] and the Panchāli, which in their turn formed the present vernacular dialects of India."

I have thus (as I originally proposed in Section I.) passed in review the various phases through which the vernacular speech of Northern India has gone since it began to deviate from the forms of its parent Sanskrit. Commencing with the provincial dialects of our own day, the Hindī, Mahrattī, Bengalī, etc., which diverge the most widely from the original tongue, I have attempted to ascend, successively, from the more recent to the more ancient mediæval vernaculars, and to trace backwards their gradual approach in form and structure to the language of the Vedas. In Section I. the modern vernaculars are considered. In Sections II.—IV. the dialects entitled Prākṛit are described; and it has there been proved that they were either themselves the spoken tongues, or at least closely akin to the spoken tongues, of northern India before the modern vernaculars came into existence, and shown, by a variety of illustrations, that the former approach much more closely to the Sanskrit than the latter. In Section V. an account has been given of the Pāli; and it has been demonstrated at length that it, in its turn, is more ancient in its grammatical forms than the Prākṛits are, and departs less widely than they do from the Sanskrit. In Section VI. I have supplied some description of the language employed in the rock inscriptions of Piyadasi; by which it is put beyond a doubt that different dialects resembling the Pāli were in vernacular use in northern India in the third century B.C. And finally, in Section VII., I have described a form of corrupt Sanskrit occurring in the Gāthās or narrative poems in which the actions of Buddha were recounted at a period apparently preceding the Christian era.

[146] [If by the Drāvidi is meant the Telugu, or any of its cognate languages, it is a mistake to class it with the northern Prākṛits.—J.M.]

It is not necessary that I should be able to point out the exact relative antiquity of the Pāli, of the language of the inscriptions, and of the language of the Gāthās. We have seen (p. 59) that the Pāli has some grammatical forms which are older than those of the inscriptions; and vice versâ. It is sufficient to say that all these three different dialects exhibit a form of Indian speech which is of greater antiquity than the Prākṛits of the dramatic poems; and that they illustrate to us some of the earliest stages of the process by which the original spoken language of India, i.e. the early Sanskrit, was disintegrated and corrupted.

SECT. VIII.—On the original use of Sanskrit as a vernacular tongue; on the manner in which the Prākṛits arose out of it, and on the period of their formation: views of Professors Weber, Aufrecht, Lassen, and Benfey.

From the above review of the spoken dialects of India, commencing with the modern vernaculars, and going back to the Prākṛits and the Pāli, we discover, as has been repeatedly stated, that the older these dialects are, the more closely do they resemble the Sanskrit, in the forms of the words themselves, as well as in the modes of their declension and conjugation. Judging by the great differences which we find between the modern Indian languages and the oldest forms of the vernacular dialects, and by the gradual changes through which the latter have at length passed into the former, we can have no difficulty in concluding that the very oldest known forms of the Prākṛits also had, in earlier ages, undergone similar mutations, and had at one time been different in some respects from the languages which have been handed down to us: and that the further back these dialects went, the fewer and smaller were their deviations from the oldest forms of Sanskrit, till they at length merged altogether in that parent language, and were, in fact, identical with it. And as there is no doubt that these Prākṛit dialects, in the oldest forms in which we can trace them, were spoken languages, so we are further entitled to conclude that the Sanskrit itself was at one time, i.e., at the period before the Prākṛits broke off from it, a vernacularly spoken language.

Before, however, proceeding to the particular proof of this, I shall first of all present some general speculations of Professors Weber, Lassen, Benfey, and Aufrecht, on the anterior elements out of which the Prākṛits (under which term I include all the old vernacular languages derived from Sanskrit) were developed, and the process by which their formation was effected.

The following is Professor Weber's account of the way in which he conceives the Prākṛits to have arisen:— [147]

"I take this opportunity of once more declaring myself decidedly against a commonly received error. It has been concluded (as by Spiegel against Röth) from the existence (in inscriptions) of Prakrit dialects in the centuries immediately preceding our era, that the Sanskrit language had died out before these dialects were formed; whereas we must, on the contrary, regard the development of both the Sanskrit and the Prakrit dialects from one common source, viz. the Indo-Arian speech, as entirely contemporaneous. . . . . For a fuller statement of this view I refer to my 'Vājasaneyi-Sanhitæ Specimen,' ii., 204–6; and, in proof of what I have urged there, I adduce here the fact that the principal laws of Prakrit speech, viz. assimilation, hiatus, and a fondness for cerebrals and aspirates, are prominent in the Vedas, of which the following are examples: *kuṭa=kṛita, R. V., i. 46, 4; kāṭa=karta (above, p. 30): geha=gṛiha (above, p. 40); guggulu=gungulu, Kātyāy., 5, 4, 17; viviṭṭyai=vivishṭyai, Taitt. Arany., x. 58 (Drāv.); yāvatsaḥ=yāvatyaḥ, Śatap. Br. ii. 2, 3, 4 (yāvachaḥ Cod. Mill., according to the second hand, and in Sāyaṇa); kṛikalāsa, Vṛih. Ār. Mā., i. 3, 22=kṛikadāśu, Rik., i. 29, 7; purodāśa=purolāśa (comp. daśru=lacryma); paḍbhiḥ=padbhiḥ; kshullaka=kshudraka; bhallāksha=bhadrāksha, Chhāndogya, 6, 1 (gloss); vikiriḍa=vikiridra (above, p. 31); gabhasti=grabhasti, or garbhasti; nighaṇṭu=nigranthu; ghas=gras; bhanj=bhranj (or branj); bhuj=bhruj; bhand=blandus; bhas=bras. In the latter cases an r has dropped out, after it had aspirated the preceding consonants. . . . .

[147] Indische Studien, ii. p. 87, note.

Comparative philology exhibits similar phonetic prakritizings within the circle of the Indo-Germanic languages as compared the one with the other." The same writer says in his Vājas. Sanh. Specimen, ii. 203, ff.:[148] "I incline to the opinion of those who deny that the Sanskrit Bhāshā, properly so called, was ever the common spoken language of the whole Arian people, and assign it to the learned alone. Just as our modern high-German, arising out of the ancient dialects of the Germans, reduced what was common to all to universal rules and laws, and by the power of analogy obliterated all recollection of varieties; and just as, on the other hand, these dialects, while they gradually degenerated, often preserved at the same time fuller and more ancient forms; so also the Vedic dialects became partly combined in one stream, in which their individual existence was lost, and so formed the regular Sanskrit Bhāshā, and partly flowed on individually in their own original (Prākṛita) irregular force, and continued to be the idioms of different provinces, in the corruption of which they participated. The Sanskrit language and the Prakrit dialects had, therefore, a common and simultaneous origin: the latter did not spring out of the former, but rather, being connected by a natural bond with the ancient language, have often a more antique fashion than the Sanskrit, which, being shaped and circumscribed by the rules of grammarians, has sacrificed the truth of analogy for the sake of regularity. The Prakrit tongues are nothing else than ancient Vedic dialects in a state of degeneracy; while the Sanskrit (or Epic) bhāshā is the sum of the Vedic dialects constructed by the labour and zeal of grammarians, and polished by the skill of learned men. In this way we obtain an explanation of two facts: 1st, That the very same exceptions which are conceded by grammarians to the Vedic language (chhandas) are often found in the Prakrit dialects, being in fact nothing but original forms; and 2nd, That in the Vedic writings, forms and words occur which are more irregular than any Sanskrit word could ever be; for as yet no fixed rules of euphony, orthography, or formation existed,—rules which were eventually deduced in part from those very irregularities. All the irregular forms which prevail in the Prakrit tongues are to be found throughout the Vedas. In the latter, the faculty which creates language is seen exuberant in its early power, [148] Reprinted in Indische Studien, ii. pp. 110, 111.

while in the former (the Prakrits) it is seen in the degeneracy of full-blown licence, luxuriating wantonness, and at last of senile weakness. Assimilation, the hiatus, and a fondness for cerebrals and aspirates, play an important part in the Vedas, not so much in those portions which are peculiar to the Yajur-veda (which, as forming a transition from the Vedic to the Epic period, or rather itself initiating the Epic period, has also a style of language of a more modern cast, and adapted to grammatical rules), as in the older forms and words of the Rigveda; many of which were difficult to understand in the age of the Aitareya and Śatapatha Brāhmaṇas (parokṣavṛittayaḥ: comp. Roth, p. li. Nighaṇṭavaḥ). There occur moreover in the Epic poems many words which, however corrupted, have been received into the Sanskrit sometimes with no change, sometimes with very little, from the Prakrit languages in use among the greater part of the people. Of this the word govinda is a clear example, which, according to the ingenious conjecture of Gildemeister, is nothing but gobinda derived from gopendra."

Professor Aufrecht has favoured me with the following remarks on the preceding passages:—"I consider that in his account of the origin of the Prākṛit dialects, Professor Weber goes much too far in stating them to be contemporaneous with the Veda dialect. The examples which he gives are, I conceive, partly erroneous, partly collected from late books, and consequently unsuited to establish his assertion. I incline to the opinion that the language of the Rigveda was at one time universally spoken, not through the whole of India, but the Punjab, that is in the original seats of the Arians. The dialects sprang from it, on the one hand, because the greater part of the population were non-Arians, and naturally corrupted a language which was forced upon them. On the other part, it is likely that the conquerors were forced to marry Śūdra women (hence the warning against such marriages in Manu), who introduced the vulgar tongue into the family. In the last instance, I believe that, by a political revolution, the original tribes recovered the government, and that then the language of the masses began to prevail. I agree with Professor Weber in believing that Sanskrit proper, that is, the language of the Epic poems, the law books, nay even that of the Brāhmaṇas, was never actually spoken, except in schools or by the learned."

This theory of Professor Weber, even if it were correct, would not be inconsistent with the conclusion which I hope ultimately to establish, viz., that the language out of which the Prākṛits grew had itself been subject to mutation prior to their evolution out of it. It would only imply that no one such language as Sanskrit existed during the Vedic era, but was then represented by a number of what (to distinguish them from the Prākṛits) I may call Sanskritic dialects, which, by the continued action of a modifying process all along at work in them, were, on the one hand, gradually formed into the dialects which received the name of Prākṛit, while, on the other hand, by a reverse process of aggregation and construction, another language of a different character, and previously non-existent, became developed out of them, under the appellation of Sanskrit.

Weber's theory, however, taken in its full extent, appears to me to be disproved by the fact that, in its forms, the Vedic Sanskrit is (excepting some archaisms) nearly identical with the Epic, while it is very different from even the oldest type of Prākṛit. It is no answer to this that some old Vedic forms, such as the instrumental in ebhis, reappear in the Prākṛits; for it need not be asserted that, at the earliest period when the Prākṛits began to be formed, the Sanskrit did not still retain many of its Vedic forms.

I will now adduce two quotations of considerable length from Lassen's Indian Antiquities, vol. ii., pp. 1147–1149, and 1151–1153, on the history of the languages of Northern India, in the course of which he replies to the preceding observations of Weber.

"The inscription of the Sinha Prince Rudradāman, which dates from the year 85 B.C., is written in Sanskrit prose, of an artificial character, with long compound words. From this fact we may infer that Sanskrit was no longer spoken by the common people, but only by the Brahmans and other persons in the higher classes."

"It has been already shown (p. 486) that in Aśoka's time the common people spoke dialects derived from the sacred language, and that, at that time, there were at least three such dialects; of which one prevailed in Eastern India, the second in Guzerat, and the third in Eastern Cabul. The existence of a fourth, of which the seat was perhaps in Upper Rajasthan, is attested by the inscription of Meghavāhana. It is highly probable that the popular Indian dialects existed at a still earlier period than this [the age of Aśoka was

263–226 B.C., and that of Meghavāhana 110 A.D.[149]]; for the accounts of Buddha's sayings and doings appear to have existed in a double form, i.e. both in the vernacular tongues and in Sanskrit. I do not venture to assume that the vernacular tongues originated much earlier. It is indeed true that we find in the Vedic hymns some individual traces of those corruptions which in Prākrit have become the rule and characteristic feature of the language. But we must assume a long period to have intervened between these isolated appearances and their full-blown development, as exhibited in particular local dialects. I do not, therefore, believe in a contemporaneous development, side by side, of the Sanskrit and the Prakrit tongues out of the one common source of the Indo-Arian language; but I assume that it was not till long after the immigration of the Indo-Arians that the Prakrits were

[149] Lassen, App. pp. x. xxiii. I add another passage on the subject of the mutations of the Sanskrit, and the period at which they may be supposed to have arisen, from Lassen's work, p. 592, f., 2nd ed.: "The fact now established, that in Aśoka's time Sanskrit was no longer the general vernacular language, is of the greatest importance for judging of the older literature. As Aśoka promulgated his ordinances, which were intended for the entire people, not in Sanskrit, but in three vernacular dialects differing more or less from one another, it follows that the old mother-tongue had already become limited to a smaller circle of the population. But such a corruption of language is not the work of a few years; the Sanskrit must have begun centuries before to be resolved into the popular dialects; we will not here take into account the tradition that the Buddhists from the commencement announced their new doctrine in Prākrit. The Epic poems nowhere allude to the different classes of auditors being unable to understand each other: nor have I yet found any reference to a diversity of speech among the Āryans. The Epic language now is manifestly the product of speech still fresh, flexible, and living in the mouth of the people; we can point out the first beginnings of the Epic style and versification in the Upanishads and in the hymns of the Veda, and can thus establish the high antiquity of this style. In the Sanskrit literature subsequent to Aśoka's time, even in the oldest inscriptions, we find the artificial language of later ages; and the same is the case in the dramas, which belong to this later period, in which we also meet with vernacular dialects for the lower orders. Although the Epic style is still maintained in this later age, it is easily seen, as in the Purānas, that a living stream of speech does not flow here; just as in the case of Apollonius and Callimachus, we perceive that they had not learnt the Homeric dialect from their nurses; the language is a learned, though often very clever, imitation. These considerations convince me that the Epic style was completely formed before the time of Aśoka, and even much earlier, and that we have it before us in its original genuineness. Hence I believe also that on the score of language no valid objection can be alleged against the position that after the critical separation of later elements, we possess in the Epic poems a rich and genuine store of ancient and genuine tradition."

formed in the several provinces of India. I further regard it as improbable that the Prakrits arose out of one particular dialect of the Sanskrit; for no dialects of the Sanskrit have yet been pointed out. An account is to be found, it is true, in an ancient record, according to which the Sanskrit had been preserved in greater purity in the northern countries than elsewhere, and Kashmir and Badari, at the source of the Ganges, are specified by the commentator as such regions. This, however, is not sufficient to prove that in the different provinces of India there were then fundamental differences in the sacred language.

"No conclusion in regard to the existence of dialectic varieties in the Sanskrit can be drawn from the fact that the Prakrit dialects have all preserved the form of the instrumental plural in hi (derived from bhis), in words ending in a, while the modern Sanskrit has lost this form; for the ancient form in ebhis is not peculiar to any particular Vedic writings. The preservation of this form only proves that the Prakrit dialects began to be formed at an early period, when the termination in question was in frequent use. The early adoption, too, into Sanskrit of words which had become modified according to the laws of the Prakrit dialects, testifies, not so much to the early creation of popular dialects widely different from each other, as to the mere beginnings of such. We have to regard the causes of the varieties in the Indian dialects as twofold. The first is that general one, which has operated also in other languages, and which is indeed the principal, viz., those peculiarities connected with the abodes and the character of the tribes into which a people becomes divided. The reason why they have so operated, as they actually have, is in individual instances often difficult, nay, impossible, to assign. In this way, five principal modern languages, the Provençal, French, Portuguese, Spanish, and Italian, have arisen out of the Latin. Of these languages, the second, the fourth, and the fifth are rich in dialects. The second cause is (as has been already noticed) a special one,—I mean the influence exercised on the Prakrit dialects by the languages of the aboriginal tribes adopted into the Indian political system, who discarded their own form of speech and adopted the Indo-Arian language of the province in which they dwelt. These aboriginal tribes contributed, in some instances, to introduce peculiar varieties into the Prakrit dialects. When these aborigines were particularly savage and uncultivated, it could scarcely fail to happen that they occasioned very great corruptions of sound and form in the Indo-Arian languages."

The second passage is as follows:—

"It is in the period with which we are now occupied (i.e. that between Vikramāditya and the later Gupta kings) that the appellations Sanskrit for the classical language, and Prakrit for the forms of speech springing from it, must have arisen; because it was now that the distinction between the classical language (which was no longer employed as a spoken tongue except by the Brahmans and highest classes) and the popular dialects became decidedly marked. It has been maintained that Sanskrit was never the common popular dialect of the Arian Indians, but owed its origin only to the learned; and that the Vedic dialects coalesced, on the one hand, in a single language, and so created the regular Sanskrit, in which they were lost; and on the other hand, in virtue of their inherent character, became corrupted and irregular, and in this corrupt form continued to exist as the vernacular dialects of particular provinces. I must dissent from this view on the following grounds: First, it has not yet been proved (as I have already, p. 1148, observed) that there were any different dialects in the Vedic language. To prove that there were, it must be shown that in contemporaneous Vedic writings there are found variations of such an essential character as to justify us in assuming a variety of dialects: varieties observable in writings belonging to different ages only show that there was a progressive departure from an earlier condition of the language. Secondly, it is necessary that we be agreed as to what we mean by language. If thereby we mean the style of expression, then it may be asserted of many languages which have attained a higher degree of perfection by being employed in literature or in public assemblies, that they were not popular languages. The Athenians and Romans certainly did not, in their ordinary life, express themselves in the same style in which their orators spoke; and we Germans permit ourselves to make use of many turns of expression which we deny ourselves in books. So too we may suppose that the Indians of the earliest age did not ordinarily speak the same language which their poets employed. If, on the other hand, by language we mean grammatical forms, I cannot see why the Indians should not in the earliest ages have made use of the same as the contemporary poets employed. This certainly was the case also in the succeeding periods. To this it must be added that Pāṇini, the oldest of the three grammarians who are styled saints, uses the word bhāshā (speech) to designate the ordinary language in contradistinction to the Vedic, and employs as synonymous with bhāshāyām the word loke, i.e. in the world. The language which the Sanskrit-speaking Indians then spoke cannot, therefore, have been different from this bhāshā, or current form of speech. Its fate in contrast to that of its daughters has been a peculiar one. Whilst among the Greeks the Attic dialect became the general language of prose composition, ... and the other dialects became less and less prominent, ... and whilst in Germany the new high-German, from its use in literature and education, has more and more superseded the popular dialects, the sacred speech of the Brahmans, on the contrary, continued to lose ground, not so much in local extension, as in its employment by the different classes of the population in the same countries. It may be assumed that in the time of Aśoka the greater part of the people in the countries inhabited by Arian Indians spoke the local dialects, and that only the Brahmans and the principal persons spoke Sanskrit. On this circumstance the distribution of the dialects in the dramas rests. As the kings who were inclined to the Buddhist religion permitted only the popular dialects to be used in their inscriptions and coins, it becomes probable that they did the same thing in their decrees, and for other purposes."

The following remarks relating to the early extension and vernacular employment of Sanskrit, to its subsequent disuse as a spoken language, and to its ultimate resuscitation in a somewhat modified form, as a refined and sacred dialect, are translated, with occasional abridgment, from Prof. Benfey's article on India (above referred to), p. 245, ff. :—

"The language which we now call Sanskrit was once, as both the ancient and modern dialects which have issued from it distinctly show, the prevalent popular speech in the greatest part of India. Alongside of it there existed in the remotest times several dialects of one or more languages, not related to it, of the aborigines of India; which languages had at first a wider, and in later times a continually decreasing, extension. The period when Sanskrit began to spread itself over India cannot be decided any more than the era of the immigration of the people who spoke it. We can only determine the following points: First, in regard to extension; (1) the Sanskrit once prevailed over a considerable tract west of the Indus, as is shown both by many geographical names in those regions, by the accounts of Chinese travellers, and by the languages which are now found existing there; (2) to the north, the Sanskrit or its dialects prevailed as far as the Himālaya and the Indian Caucasus; (3) to the east, in the time of Aśoka, as far as the region of the Brahmaputra, though this region was not entirely Sanskritized; (4) to the south, Sanskrit exercised nearly its full sway as far as the southern frontiers of Mahārāshṭra: this is proved by the fact that one of the dialects which are most decidedly of Sanskrit origin, namely, the Prakrit pre-eminently so named, is also called the language of Mahārāshṭra, and is manifestly the parent of the modern Mahratti; (5) Sanskrit penetrated still further to the south, where it formed the language of educated people: but this occurred at a time when the Sanskrit-speaking race had not sufficient power entirely to expel the indigenous language, as they were able to do in Northern India with a very few isolated exceptions.

"Second, as to the time when Sanskrit was the language of the people we can determine as follows: We find in Aśoka's time two vernacular dialects, one in Guzerat, and the other in Magadha, which, as their entire structure shows, could not have existed alongside of, i.e. contemporaneously with, the Sanskrit, but must have become further developed in those provinces after the Sanskrit had previously prevailed there: consequently the Sanskrit must have died out before Aśoka, who lived in the third century B.C., and therefore about three centuries after the period to which the rise of Buddhism may with great probability be assigned. Now it is related to us of the first Buddhists, that they composed their books not in Sanskrit, but in the vernacular dialects. The sacred language of Buddhism is the Pali, which, though varying in many particulars from the language of Magadha, and approximating to the principal Prakrit (the Mahārāshtrī), stands yet in a similar relation to the Sanskrit as the latter, and the two dialects of Aśoka's inscriptions. It becomes, therefore, highly probable that at the period when Buddhism arose, i.e. about the sixth century B.C., Sanskrit was no longer the speech of the people. The entire character of Sanskrit shows that, at the time of its acme, it was fixed by means of something resembling a literature, and it is only on this supposition that we can comprehend how it appears in regions so far apart as the north and north-west of India and the Mahratta country, as a perfectly uniform basis of the dialects which sprang out it. But a speech which becomes fixed in such a manner does not soon die out. If we assume about three centuries for the time of its gradual extinction, the period when Sanskrit was the ordinary language of the people is thrown back to about the ninth century before Christ. During this and the immediately preceding period there existed, as we have already conjectured, a political union which embraced the entire Indian empire; and as we now know that Sanskrit must have been the actual speech of the people in the Mahratta country also at this period, we may conceive this political union to have extended from the Himālaya to the south of the Mahratta country. After this political unity had become severed (till the period of its restoration under Chandragupta), the various elements of Indian life became separately developed in the different provinces; and this was the case with the Sanskrit, too, which up to that time had been common to all. Out of this variety of local developments which the Sanskrit underwent, its different derivative languages arose, the earliest forms of which bore about the same relation to Sanskrit as the Romanic dialects to Latin.

"But while the Sanskrit was being thus developed and modified by popular use into new vernacular dialects, the literature which had been created in Sanskrit while it was yet a living tongue was still preserved in the schools[150] of the Brahmans, and along with it the Sanskrit itself as the sacred language of culture and science. When aroused to new energy by the attack made upon their system by the Buddhists, the Brahmans came forward with certain writings composed in this sacred language, and declared to be of primeval antiquity: one of the earliest of these was the Institutes of Manu; and then followed

[150] "Though we have no distinct external evidence that there were any such schools at this early period, we may yet appeal to the whole intellectual development of Indian life, in the form which it must have taken even before the rise of Buddhism, as evidence of their existence."

the Rāmāyana. But external grounds, as well as the mention which they make of the Yavanas (Greeks), prove these works to have been composed at a much later period than that to which they are alleged to belong. In like manner the treatment of the language in these books, and still more in the Sanskrit literature which follows, and is connected with them, demonstrates that they cannot possibly have proceeded from a popular dialect, but, on the contrary, are the products of a learned, or rather a sacred language, which, having died out among the mass of the people, had been preserved in the circle of the educated priesthood as the medium of intercourse with the gods, and of communicating the sacred sciences, and was cultivated with the liveliest zeal and devotion. Out of this circle again Sanskrit passed over to those persons who stood in connexion with the priests as members of the same administrative caste. When the Brahmans recovered their predominance, Sanskrit became for a time the language of the educated classes, of the court, and the administration [151] generally: and even the Buddhists could not abstain from employing so valuable an instrument of cultivation. We have only to recollect the manner in which the Latin, though long a dead language, remained in use throughout the middle ages, and even in our own time, in order to perceive clearly how the Sanskrit also, though it had died out as a vernacular tongue between the ninth and sixth centuries B.C., should yet have held its ground in the highest circles, and continued in use there to such an extent that it can even now be employed as an instrument for the expression of thought on the highest subjects. The Sanskrit had, however, here an important advantage over the Latin in this respect, that wherever Brahmanism prevailed it was regarded as a sacred language, as all the most sacred books of that religion were composed in it. In consequence of this opinion, it was considered a religious merit to be even acquainted with it; and a Sanskrit grammar, or other work which contributed to a knowledge of this language, was and is looked upon as a sacred book. In the same way a knowledge of Hebrew was long preserved among the

[151] [We have another instance of a language not vernacular in India being used as the language of administration, in the Persian, which, though unintelligible to the mass of the people, was used by the Mahomedans, and after them, for many years (until about thirty years ago), by the English, as the language of the law courts and the revenue offices.—J.M.]

Jews; and even so late as, perhaps, sixty years ago, no one among them could lay claim to the character of a learned man unless he had learnt the 'sacred language.'" . . . .

"At the period when the dramatic literature assumed its fixed form (a period which cannot yet be determined, but which may be conjecturally placed in the sixth or seventh century A.D.), the knowledge of Sanskrit must have extended, on the one hand, to all who laid claim to the character of educated men, for otherwise the dramatic poets could not have composed in Sanskrit the leading parts in plays designed for representation before the entire public; and on the other hand it must have been constantly used as the language of public documents, of religion, and of learned men, for otherwise it could scarcely have been put into the mouth of gods, kings, and priests. Whether Sanskrit was at that time the proper court-language, I cannot determine; but I scarcely think it was, as the officers of the state, if not Brahmans, do not use it."

Professor Benfey then proceeds to specify the differences between the ancient form of the Sanskrit when it was still a vernacular language, and the later form which it took after its regeneration as a sacred and learned form of speech, so far as he considered himself in a position to do so at a period (1840) when he had before him but a small portion of the Vedas, which furnish us with almost the only means we can have of judging what the earlier language was.[152] He remarks: "The late Sanskrit is distinguished from the Vedic by the use of extravagantly long compounds. Even if the specimens of the Vedas and the Upanishads which are known to me had not shown that in this respect there is an essential difference in the use of the Sanskrit at the two periods to which I refer, it might have been concluded with certainty, from the character and length of these compounds, that such monstrosities could not have been created at a time when the language was in vernacular use. Such compounds might occasionally have been used with effect; but a living language would have energetically rejected such an abuse of these forms as we find in the late Sanskrit writings, which renders all easy comprehension impossible. On the other hand, the effort to employ such compounds was quite suitable to a learned language, and to a learned poetry, which was far removed from the real life of the people. In like manner the laws of Sandhi, as practised in its widest extent in later Sanskrit, must have been equally foreign to the ancient vernacular Sanskrit. In late Sanskrit all the words of a sentence are combined in one immense whole by the assimilation, or other connexion, of their final and initial letters. This rule does not, in general, prevail in the Vedas; and although it is well known that in actual discourse the final and initial letters of words exercise a certain modifying influence upon each other, every one who has considered the limited extent to which a vernacular dialect, and even a literary work composed in such a dialect, can obey this law, and who, at the same time, knows to what extremes the modern Sanskrit pushes the application of this rule, will be convinced that the excessive employment of Sandhi cannot have sprung out of any popular use, but must have resulted from carrying out to an absurd extent a grammatical canon which is correct in itself.

[152] Had these observations been written now, Professor Benfey would probably have seen no cause to modify his main conclusions, though he would have been in a position to express himself with greater confidence and precision. [Note in first edition, 1860.] In his review of the first edition of this work in the Gött. Gel. Anzeigen, already referred to, p. 135, Prof. Benfey writes as follows: "I would, now that the differences between the Vedic language and the Sanskrit, which was formed by a process of regeneration, are more exactly known, say Vedic or old[-Sanskrit instead of Sanskrit]." See Weber's remark above, p. 68.

"Further, when the later Sanskrit is accurately examined, it is found to be affected in a most important degree by the influence of the popular dialects derived from the more ancient Sanskrit. The Indians, with their genius for grammar, or philology generally, were in general well aware of the modifications which the ancient language had received from the dialects which had been developed out of it: they had investigated the phonetic laws by which these dialects had been derived from their parent, and could, as it were, transport the former back to the latter. This facility threw them off their guard; and it consequently becomes possible for us to demonstrate that the Sanskrit of the whole Indian literature subsequent to Manu's Institutes, cannot be in all respects the ancient language of the people, with a degree of distinctness which none of the Sanskrit authors, convinced as they were that they were writing correct ancient Sanskrit, could have imagined. I must confine myself here to exhibiting the principal elements of this proof. It is divisible into two parts; as we must

(1) maintain that the new Sanskrit has lost[153] much which the older Sanskrit had, and which it could only lose from the circumstance that it had died out in the intermediate period, and had now to be revived in a form which might be as intelligible as possible. To this head belong a number of roots and inflected forms which the grammarians recognize and adduce partly as current, and partly as obsolete, but of which the later Sanskrit makes next to no use. The reason of this is that these roots, as well as these inflected forms, were either entirely lost in the vernacular dialects which existed at the time when the new Sanskrit was created, or had become so disfigured that their Sanskrit form could not have been easily discovered or understood. (2) The new Sanskrit contains in it much that the old Sanskrit could not have had. To this head belong a number of forms of roots which had become modified according to the laws of some one vernacular dialect, and which have been employed in the new Sanskrit in this modified shape, which the grammarians either hesitated to refer to its proper Sanskrit form, or did not comprehend. Every single example of this which might be adduced would, however, require detailed development and proof, which would demand too much space to be here attempted.

"I will, therefore, content myself with repeating the main results of the investigations which have been here merely indicated, and in great part yet remain to be carried out. These results are: That from the period when the Sanskrit-speaking race immigrated into India down to perhaps the ninth century B.C., Sanskrit became diffused as the prevailing vernacular dialect over the whole of Hindustan, as far as the southern borders of the Mahratta country. It penetrated no further south as a vernacular tongue, but only as the language of education, and apparently at a later period. From the ninth century B.C. the Sanskrit began to die out: derivative dialects became developed from it; and in the sixth century B.C. it had become extinct as a vernacular language. On the other hand, it maintained its ground in the schools of the Brahmans. About the third century B.C., in consequence of the regeneration of Brahmanism in Kanouj, it was brought back into public life as a sacred language, and gained a gradually increasing importance as the organ of all the higher intellectual development. About the fifth century A.D., it had become diffused in this character over the whole of India. So long as the empire of the Hindus lasted, it continued to increase in estimation; and even long after the Mahomedans had settled in India, it was almost the sole instrument for the expression of the highest intellectual efforts."

[153] "The Sanskrit has lost a great many verbal roots, and has frequently modified the original meaning of those still in existence."—Aufrecht, Uṇādisūtras, pref. p. viii. "In the course of time some branches of literature disappeared, a number of words became antiquated, and the tradition as to their meaning was either entirely lost or corrupted. When commentators arose to explain the Uṇādisūtras," —supposed by Professor Aufrecht (p. ix.) to be considerably older than Pāṇini,— "they found the greater part of the words contained in them still employed in the literature of their age, or recorded in older dictionaries. But an unknown residuum remained, and to these, whenever tradition failed them, they were bold enough to assign quite arbitrary significations."—Ibid. pp. vi. xii.

I conclude this section by quoting from an article by Mr. Beames in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society for 1870, vol. v., new series, pp. 149, f., the following remarks on the relation of the Prākṛits to the "Old-Āryan" language:—

"In assuming that the languages of the first period" (the Prākṛits and Pāli) "are later than Sanskrit, I do not lose sight of the fact that historically they were contemporaneous with it. But I call them 'neo-Āryan,' because the majority of their forms exhibit a decadence from some more perfect condition. It is true that, not only in classical, but even in Vedic, Sanskrit forms are found which exhibit a perfect Prākrit type; but this does not prevent the general run of Prākrit from showing unmistakable signs of having degenerated from a purer and stronger ancient language, which we cannot call Sanskrit, because it is older still than even the language of the Vedas, and which therefore may, when necessary, be called 'Old Āryan.'

"It is a highly probable theory that the 'Old Āryan,' like all other languages, began to be modified in the mouths of the people as early as the Vedic period, and that the Brahmans, at a subsequent date, in order to prevent the further degeneration of their language, polished, elaborated, and stiffened it into the classical Sanskrit. We cannot, however, suppose that they brought any new material into the language, but simply that they reduced to rule what was till then vague and irregular, that they extended to the whole of the language euphonic laws which had been till then only of partial application, and so forth; all the while, however, only working upon already existing materials. It will, therefore, not militate against the established contemporaneous existence of learned Sanskrit and popular Prākrit, to consider the former as in general the representative of the original Old Āryan, and, consequently, as so far older than the Prākrit; because, ex hypothesi, in Sanskrit most of what existed in Old Āryan has not only been preserved, but worked up and expanded, while in the Prākrit, on the contrary, not only has much been absolutely lost, but that which remains has been corrupted and debased. Besides, as nothing whatever of the Old Āryan has been preserved, or is likely to be discovered (although much may be, and has been, guessed at from analogy), we are driven, whether we like it or no, to look to Sanskrit for the oldest extant forms; and we do, undoubtedly, find them there, as contrasted with Prākrit and Pāli."[154]

Sect. IX.—Reasons for supposing that the Sanskrit was originally a spoken language.

It appears from the passages cited from the works of Professors Lassen and Benfey, that these distinguished scholars assume that the Sanskrit (by which, no doubt, must be understood a language in some respects different from the later Sanskrit, and more akin to the Vedic dialect) was once a spoken tongue, regarding this as a fact which admits of no question: while Professor Weber is of opinon that the only Indo-Ārian speech which existed at the early period to which I refer had not yet been developed into Sanskrit, but was still a vernacular tongue.[155] As, however, what seems so clear to the European scholar,—viz., that Sanskrit in its earlier form was a spoken language,—may not be so plain to the Indian reader, it becomes necessary for me to adduce the most distinct evidence of the fact which I am able to discover.

[154] With reference to a question already discussed, see pp. 31, ff., I add the following sentences from Mr. Beames's article, p. 150:—"With regard to the languages of the second period, it must be explained that I do not intend to touch on the obscure question of how far non-Āryan elements enter into their composition. Much there is which is still doubtful, but this is admitted on all hands, that a very large proportion of their constituent parts is of Āryan origin."

[155] Indische Literaturgeschichte, p. 1. His words, as translated, are these:—"In its earliest period the Indo-âryan speech had not yet become Sanskrit, i.e. the language of cultivated men, but remained still a vernacular tongue, whilst in its second period, the people spoke not Sanskrit but Prakritic dialects, which had been developed out of the ancient Indo-âryan vernacular contemporaneously with the Sanskrit."

First:—Even though we assume, as we must do, that there were, from the earliest times, other forms of spoken language current in India besides the Sanskrit; yet these would be the dialects of the Dasyus, or non-Ārian tribes; while the upper classes of the population of the Ārian race, the same order of persons who in after times spoke Prākṛit, must have been in the habit of speaking Sanskṛit (by which must be understood the then current form or forms of the Old Ārian speech) a few ages previously; for, in fact, no other Ārian language then existed in India which they could have used. If languages with such a complicated structure as the Pāli and the Prākṛits were employed in common conversation, there is no difficulty in supposing that Sanskrit too, which was not much more complex, should have been spoken by ordinary persons. We must not, of course (as Professor Benfey has well remarked above, p. 140, f.), imagine that all the refined rules for the permutation of letters which were used in later Sanskrit composition were then employed in daily discourse, though some few of them might have been; for the use of these rules is by no means essential to the intelligible or grammatical employment of the language; and at the time to which I refer, they had not been developed or systematized. Many, too, of the more complicated inflections of Sanskrit verbs would be then little used in conversation; as, in fact, they are now comparatively little used in most literary compositions.[156]

[156] The remark in this last sentence probably rests on a misapprehension of the character of the language vernacularly employed by men in the earlier stages of society. But I leave it as it stood, in order to make the following remarks on it by Professor Benfey, in the review above referred to, more easily intelligible. He writes, p. 135: "Here, nevertheless, I should like to see much otherwise understood. Thus it is said in p. 154—'Many, too, of the more complicated inflections of Sanskrit verbs would be then [at the time when the Sanskrit existed as a spoken language] little used in conversation;' which, as appears to me, leads to an erroneous understanding. It is precisely the deficiency of so many forms in the regenerated Sanskrit, as, for example, the want of a conjunctive generally, of the moods for the different tenses, the unfrequent employment of the aorists as compared with the Vedic Sanskrit, the disuse of so many double forms, as e.g. the substitution of the single form of ais for ais and ebhis, as the ending of instrumental cases of nouns in a, the limitation of the strong case-forms, which in the Vedas are used very irregularly, the regulation of the reduplication and many other differences of this description between the Vedic, or ancient, and the regenerated Sanskrit,—it is just these points which determine us to explain the latter (the modern Sanskrit) principally through the predominance of the vernacular dialects: those persons who wrote the regenerated Sanskrit were too much accustomed to these vernaculars to do more in general than to turn the speech

It is true that we cannot point out the exact forms of all the Sanskrit words in use at the latest period at which it was so employed as a spoken tongue; especially as the language of conversation always differs to some extent from the language of formal composition or of books, and the vernacular Sanskrit was no doubt undergoing a perpetual alteration till it merged into Prākṛit.

Second:—The case which I have supposed here of Sanskrit having been once a spoken language, and having at length ceased to be employed in ordinary discourse, while the provincial dialects which sprang out of it, and gradually diverged more and more from it and from each other, have taken its place as the popular vehicles of conversation,—is by no means a singular occurrence, unprecedented in the history of language; on the contrary, the manner in which the Italian, French, and Spanish languages (to which Burnouf and Lassen refer in a passage cited above, p. 69) have been formed out of Latin, presents a very close parallel to the mode in which the various mediæval Indian Prākṛit bhāshās (which in their turn have given birth to the modern Bengalī, Hindī, Mahrattī, etc.) grew out of Sanskrit. During the existence of the Roman empire, Latin, as is quite well known, was the spoken language of Italy, and other western portions of Europe. It is now in nearly all those countries a dead language, and is only known to the learned who study the works of the Latin philosophers, historians, and poets; just as it is only the Pandits of India and other scholars who can understand the Sanskrit Śāstras. But while Latin has itself ceased to be a spoken language for eight hundred or a thousand years, various vernacular dialects have (as I have said) sprung out of it, such as Italian and the other modern tongues already specified; the Latin words which compose the greater part of their vocabulary being variously modified, and the ancient Latin inflections being either corrupted, or dropped, and replaced by particles and auxiliary verbs. Of these derivative dialects, the Italian, which is with which they were familiar into Sanskrit according to the reflex rules (Reflexgesetze) which were known to them. It was only a constantly deeper study of the old remains of the genuine vernacular Sanskrit and the compositions which were more closely connected with it that brought back many of its at first neglected peculiarities into the regenerated Sanskrit, a point which can be proved by the express testimony of Pāṇini himself in reference to the participles of the reduplicated perfect. (Compare Pān. iii, 2. 108; and my complete Sanskrit Grammar, p. 413, note 13, and shorter Grammar, § 361, 369.)" spoken in Italy, has retained the closest resemblance to its mother-language. Many of the changes which Latin words have undergone in Italian, resemble very closely the modifications which Sanskrit words have undergone in Pāli and Prākṛit, as has been already remarked in the passage quoted, in p. 69, from Burnouf and Lassen's Essay on the Pāli.

To exhibit the wonderful similarity (amounting in some cases to identity) of the processes by which these two ancient languages, the Sanskrit and the Latin, are modified in their modern derivatives, I shall place in juxtaposition a few of the most remarkable instances of it which occur to me.[157]

I.—Phonetic Changes.

(1). Words in which the c or k is dropped from a compound letter ct, nct, or kt, while the t is doubled.

Latin forms, as modified in Italian.			Sanskrit forms, modified in Pali and Prakrit.
Latin.		Italian.	Sanskrit.		Pali and Prakrit.
perfectus	becomes	perfetto.	muktas	becomes	mutto
dictus	,,	detto.	yuktas	,,	jutto.
junctus[158]	,,	giunto.[159]	bhaktas	,,	bhatto.
fructus	,,	frutto.	sikthaka	,,	sitthao.
pactum	,,	patto.	parityaktas	,,	parichchatto.
tractus	,,	tratto.	bhuktas	,,	bhutto.
factus	,,	fatto.	saktas	,,	satto.
actus	,,	atto.
octo	,,	otte.
doctus	,,	dotto.

(2). Words in which the p of pt is dropped, and the t doubled.

ruptus	becomes	rotto.	uptas	becomes	utto.
aptus	,,	atto.	suptas	,,	sutto.
inceptus	,,	incetto.	guptas	,,	gutto.
septem	,,	sette.	luptas	,,	lutto.
captivus	,,	cattivo.	tṛiptis	,,	titti.
assumptus	,,	assunto.	taptas	,,	tatto.
subtus	,,	sotto.	saptamas	,,	sattamo.
(With many others).			naptā	,,	nattā.
			prāptas	,,	patto.
			paryāptas	,,	pajjatto.
			kshiptas	,,	khitto.
			liptas	,,	litto.
			dīptas	,,	dītto.

[157] Since the first edition of this volume was published, this subject has been handled in a pamphlet of 68 pages published in 1869, entitled Vergleichung des Prakrit mit den Romanischen Sprachen, von Friederich Haag. In a review of this book in the Lit. Centralblatt for May 14, 1870, p. 594, f. reference is made to its being accompanied by Tables, which, however, I do not find in my copy.

[158] The Latin c is sounded k in Sanskrit.

[159] giu, in Italian, is sounded as ju in Sanskrit.

(3). Words in which the l of a compound letter, pl or kl, is dropped.[160]

Latin forms, as modified in Italian.			Sanskrit forms, modified in Pali and Prakrit.
Latin.		Italian.	Sanskrit.		Pali and Prakrit.
plańctus	becomes	pianto.	viklavas	becomes	vikkavo.
planus	„	piano.

(4). Words in which the b of the compound letter bj is dropped.

subjectus	becomes	soggetto.	kubjas	becomes	khujjo.[161]
objectus	„	oggetto.[162]	abjas	„	ajjo.

(5). Words in which the letters rejected, or changed, are not the same in the Italian and Prākṛit, but in which both languages show the same tendency to simplification.

absorptus	becomes	assorto.	utpalam	becomes	uppalam.
absurdus	„	assurdo.	skandhas	„	khandho.
externus	„	esterno.	dharmas	„	dhammo.
mixtus	„	misto.	dushkaras	„	dukkaro.
sextus	„	sesto.	kshamā	„	khamā.
textus	„	testo.	mugdhas	„	muddho.
saxum	„	sasso.	mudgas	„	muggo.
somnus	„	sonno.	labdhas	„	laddho.
damnum	„	danno.	śabdas	„	saddo.
autumnus	„	autunno.	nimnas	„	nimmo.[163]
domina	„	donna.	āmnāyas	„	āmmāyo.
			pradyumnas	„	pajjummo.
			janman	„	jammo.
			rājñā	„	rañña.

A large portion of the simplifications in Pāli and Prākṛit arise from the rejection of r before or after another consonant, as in the words kaṇṇa for karṇa, savva for sarvva, mitta for mitra, putta for putra, etc. This elision of r is not usual in Italian.

II.—I give an instance or two to show the manner in which the Latin case-terminations have been dropped in Italian. In Latin the word annus, a year, is thus declined.

Singular.		Plural.
Nom. - - - -	annus.	Nom. - - - -	anni.
Gen. - - - -	anni.	Gen. - - - -	annorum.
Dat. and Abl. - -	anno.	Dat. and Abl. - -	annis.
Accus. - - - -	annum.	Accus. - - - -	annos.

In Italian, on the contrary, there is only one form in the singular, [160] In Prākṛit, however, a compound letter, of which l is the final portion, is generally dissolved into two syllables, as glāna becomes gilāna.

[161] Var. II. 34. [162] Pronounced as if written in English, sojjetto, ojjetto.

[163] I can only infer, from the rule in Vararuchi, III. 2, that the n is thrown out and the m doubled in this and the two following words, as I have not met them anywhere.

anno; and one in the plural, anni; the case-terminations being supplied by prepositions with or without the article, as follows:

Singular.		Plural.
Nom. and Accus.	l' anno.	Nom. and Accus.	gli anni.
Gen.	dell' anno.	Gen.	degli anni.
Dat.	all' anno.	Dat.	agli anni.
Abl.	dall' anno.	Abl.	dagli anni.

III.—In Italian verbs, the Latin forms of the active voice are preserved in a modified shape, as the following example will show:—

Present Tense.		Imperfect Tense.
Latin.	Italian.	Latin.	Italian.
1. vendo.	vendo.	1. vendebam.	vendeva.
2. vendis.	vendi.	2. vendebas.	vendevi.
3. vendit.	vende.	3. vendebat.	vendeva.
4. vendimus.	vendiamo.	4. vendebamus.	vendevamo.
5. venditis.	vendete.	5. vendebatis.	vendevate.
6. vendunt.	vendono.	6. vendebant.	vendevano.

Perfect Tense.		Pluperfect Tense.
1. vendidi.	vendei.	1. vendidissem.	vendessi.
2. vendidisti.	vendesti.	2. vendidisses.	vendessi.
3. vendidit.	vendè.	3. vendidisset.	vendesse.
4. vendidimus.	vendemmo.	4. vendidissemus.	vendessimo.
5. vendiditis.	vendeste.	5. vendidissetis.	vendeste.
6. vendiderunt.	venderono.	6. vendidissent.	vendessero.

But (IV.) in the passive voice the Italian language has entirely lost the Latin forms of conjugation. Thus instead of the Latin forms ego laudor, "I am praised;" ego laudabar, "I was praised;" ego laudarer, "I should be praised," etc., the Italians employ in all tenses (as the Latin had already done in a few), the substantive verb with the past participle, and say Io sono lodato, Io era lodato, Io sarei lodato, "I am," "I was," "I should be, praised."

These few instances will suffice to show the Indian reader how the Latin words and inflections are modified in Italian.

It is thus manifest from the history of Italy in ancient and modern times that the people of that country once spoke Latin, and now speak Italian, a vernacular dialect derived from Latin, and differing from it in many respects, as the Indian Prākṛits do from Sanskrit, while Latin equally with Sanskrit is in most of the countries where it was formerly current a dead language, known only from ancient books, or from its use in the public worship of the Roman Catholic Church, or from its occasional employment by modern scholars in their writings, or in scholastic discussions, in Italy and other countries. But if it be true that a language like Latin, with its numerous and varied inflections, was once the common speech of the whole Roman people, there can be no difficulty in supposing that while the modern Hindus (excepting a few Pandits) can only speak Bengalī, Hindī, Mahrattī, etc., and while their ancestors spoke different Prākṛit dialects, which are the immediate parents of the modern vernaculars, the Hindus of a still earlier period should have spoken Sanskrit, i.e. the old Ārian language, itself, from which there is no doubt that the older forms of Prākṛit were immediately derived. If even in our own day Pandits can talk Sanskrit, why should not the vernacular use of it, in a simple and natural style, have, in former ages, been common, not only among Brāhmans, but also among other persons in all the different classes of society? The complex structure of a language, i.e. the multitude of its forms of inflection and conjugation, which, to those who are accustomed to a simpler form of speech, may appear to afford grounds for doubting that a language of the former description could ever have been vernacularly spoken, is, in fact, rather an argument in favour of that supposition; for such complexity of structure appears to be a characteristic of language as it exists in the earlier stages of society, whilst the dialects formed out of these earlier tongues, on their decay, are observed to become simpler in their forms. This is exemplified in the case of the Latin and its derivatives.

Third:—The fact that the dramatic authors put Sanskrit into the mouth of Brāhmans and other persons of the higher ranks, affords an argument of considerable force that Sanskrit was once spoken by the whole community, and by the upper classes down to a much later period (see above, p. 140): and even the common employment of the same language by learned Indians in their schools and disputations down to the present day, may go some way to prove its more general currency as a vernacular at an earlier date. For if Brāhmans did not at one time employ it in their ordinary discourse, how did they ever get into the habit of speaking it with so much ease and fluency? But if Sanskrit was at one time ordinarily spoken by Brāhmans, the use of it would easily be propagated from one generation of learned men to another.

Fourth:—Manu mentions a difference of speech in ancient India among the Dasyus, or non-Ārian tribes, some classes of them speaking the language of the Āryas, and others the language of the Mlechhas.[164] The language of the Āryas to which he alludes must have been derived from Sanskrit, or old-Sanskrit itself: whether it was the one or the other must depend on the age in which we suppose this particular text of Manu's Institutes to have been composed. This passage, at any rate, leaves the impression that there was a broad distinction between the Ārian language and the indigenous dialects with which it was contrasted; and that the varieties, if any, recognized as existing in the former, were regarded as comparatively insignificant.

Fifth:—In some of the oldest Indian grammarians, such as Yāska and Pāṇini, we find the obsolete language of the Vedas distinguished from the ordinary Sanskrit of the day. The former is alluded to or designated by the terms anvadhyāyam (in the Veda), chhandas (metre), or ārsha (the speech of the ṛishis), etc.; while the contemporary Sanskrit is referred to as bhāshā (the spoken language). Thus Yāska, the ancient author of the Nirukta, in the introductory part of his work, I. 4, speaking of particles (nipātāḥ), says: teshām ete chatvāraḥ upamārthe bhavanti iti | "iva" iti bhāshāyāṁ cha anvadhyāyaṁ cha "Agnir iva" "Indraḥ iva" iti | "na" iti | pratishedhārthīyo bhāshāyām ubhayaṃ anvadhyāyam | "na Indraṁ devam amaṁsata" iti pratishedhārthīyaḥ ityādi | "Of them these four are particles of comparison. 'Iva' has this sense both in the common language (bhāshā) and in the Veda (anvadhyāyam): thus Agnir iva, Indra iva, 'like Agni,' 'like Indra.' 'Na' has in the bhāshā a negative sense. In the Veda, it has the sense both of a negative and also of a comparative particle. Thus in the text na Indram devam amaṁsata, 'they did not regard Indra as a god,' it has a negative sense," etc. Again, in the next section (I. 5), he says similarly: "nūnam" iti vichikitsārthīyo bhāshāyām | ubhayam anvadhyāyāṁ vichikitsārthīyaḥ padapūraṇaś cha | "The particle 'nūnam' is used in the bhāshā to signify uncertainty; in the Veda, too, it has that signification, and is also a mere expletive." Again, Yāska says, Nir. II. 2: athāpi bhāshikebhyo dhātubhyo naigamāḥ kṛito bhāshyante "damūnāḥ" "kshetrasādhāḥ" iti | athāpi naigamebhyo bhāshikāḥ "ushṇam" "ghṛitam" iti | athāpi prakṛitayaḥ eva ekeshu bhāshyante vikṛitayaḥ ekeshu | "śavatir" gati-karmā kambojeshv eva bhāshyate | vikāram asya āryeshu bhāshante "śavaḥ" iti | "dātir" lavanārthe prāchyeshu dātram udīchyeshu | "Again, there are Vedic (naigama) nouns (as damūnāḥ and kṣetrasādhāḥ) which are derived from roots found in the bhāshā; and also formations in the bhāshā, such as ushṇam, ghṛitam, which come from Vedic roots. Further, the roots only are employed in the speech of some; the derived forms [or nouns] in that of others. Śavati, as a verb for 'going,' is used in the language of the Kambojas only: its derivative, śava ('a corpse'), is in use in the language of the Āryas. The verb dāti is employed in the sense of 'cutting' by the people of the East: while the noun dātram ('a sickle') only is known to those of the North." Here it will be observed that pure Sanskrit words are referred to as being used in the speech not only of the Āryas, but also of the Kambojas, a people living to the north-west, who are distinguished from the Āryas.

[164] Manu, x. 45. The verse is quoted and translated in Vol. I. of this work, p. 482; but I repeat it here for facility of reference. Mukha-bāhūru-paj-jānāṁ yāḥ loke jātayo vahiḥ | mlechchhavāchas' chārya-vāchaḥ sarve te Dasyavaḥ smritāḥ | "Those tribes which are outside of the classes produced from the mouth, arms, thighs, and feet [of Brahmā, i.e. Brāhmanas, Kshatriyas, Vaiśyas, and S'ūdras], whether they speak the language of the Mlechhas or of the Āryas, are called Dasyus."

In the Sūtras of Pāṇini the Vedic dialect is referred to as follows: 1, 2, 36, vibhāshā chhandasi | "in the chhandas (Veda) there is an option:" 1, 4, 20, ayasmayādīni chhandasi | "In the chhandas we have the forms ayasmaya [instead of ayōmaya]," etc.; and so in numerous other aphorisms. The word mantra is put for Veda in the following Sūtras, 2, 4, 80; 6, 1, 151; 6, 1, 210; 6, 3, 131; 6, 4, 53; 6, 4, 141. The word nigama is similarly used in 6, 3, 113; 6, 4, 9; 7, 2, 64; 7, 4, 74:—and the expressions ṛishau ('in a ṛishi'), and ṛichi ('in a Vedic verse'), are employed in the same way, 4, 4, 96; 6, 3, 130; and 6, 3, 133. In contradistinction to the Vedic dialect, on the other hand, the current Sanskrit is designated by Pāṇini as bhāshā in the following Sūtras, 3, 2, 108: bhāshāyām sadavasaśruvaḥ | "in the current language the roots sad, vas, and śru, take kvasu;" 6, 3, 20: sthe chā bhāshāyām | "and in the case of stha in the current language." The same use of the word will be found in Sūtras, 6, 1, 181; 7, 2, 88; 8, 2, 98.[165]

[165] Compare Weber's Indische Literaturgeschichte, pp. 56, 139, and 167, with note 2, and Ind. Studien, iv. 76. Dr. F. Hall writes, pref. to his edition of the Vāsava-

Scholars are not agreed as to the periods when Yāska and Pāṇini respectively lived, or even as to which of the two was the more ancient. Professor Müller considers Yāska to have lived in the fifth century B.C. ("Chips," 1st ed., p. 74, published in 1867),[166]—and, as a passage in his History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature, pp. 163, f. (published in 1859), is understood by Professor Goldstücker (Pāṇini, p. 221, published in 1861),—places him after Pāṇini. Professor Lassen, in his Indian Antiquities (vol. i., first edition, p. 739, and pp. 864 and 866 of the second edition; and vol. ii., p. 476), thinks that as Yāska shows himself unacquainted with the highly artificial terminology of Pāṇini, and was named by him, he must be older, and that the difference of their grammatical methods is so great that an interval of fifty years will scarcely suffice to explain it. Professor Goldstücker (Pāṇini, p. 221) agrees with Lassen that Pāṇini is more recent than Yāska, but regards the former as having, in all probability, lived before Buddha (Pāṇini, p. 227), whose death he seems to concur with Lassen in placing in 543 B.C. Lassen, however, does not agree with Goldstücker dattā, p. 24, note: "The word bhâshâ signifies 'classical Sanskrit,' as contrasted either with the archaism of the Veda, or with the various Prākṛits." The following account of this bhāshā by Professor Weber is in consonance with the views which have already been quoted from him (above p. 129, ff.). "After the immigration into India of the several Indo-aryan tribes, a greater unity had in course of time been restored in their different dialects by their association and intermixture in their new abodes and their aggregation into larger communities, while on the other hand, the grammatical study which was gradually becoming necessary for the explanation of the ancient texts, and was growing up in connexion therewith, had the effect of fixing the linguistic usage (usus loquendi), so that a generally recognized language known as the bhāshā had arisen, in which the Brāhmaṇas and Sūtras are composed."—Ind. Lit. p. 167.

On the subject of this same term I quote some remarks of Professor Roth from his review of Weber's History of Ind. Lit. in the Journal of the German Oriental Society for 1853, p. 605:—"Contradistinguished from these Prākṛit dialects, stands the proper and therefore originally nameless speech, bhāshā, the later name of which, Sanskṛita, we must regard as one formed with reference to the Prākṛita, and answering to it. Too much meaning therefore appears to be introduced into the word, when it is explained as the cultivated language, as Weber also does. The use of the word elsewhere does not justify the explanation, which at the same time aims at an incorrect contrast. I believe that we shall come nearer to the truth if we merely assign to this somewhat arbitrarily chosen collection of roots which are also contained in Prākṛit the value (signification?) of the already existing speech, to which another form of speech is referred."

[165] In the same Essay, printed under the title of the "Last Results of the Sanskrit Researches," in Bunsen's Outline of the Phil. of Un. Hist. i. 137 (published in 1854), Prof. Müller had placed Yāska in the fourth century B.C.

in regarding Pāṇini as anterior to Buddha (Ind. Ant., vol. i., second edition, p. 864). Professor Weber also (Ind. Stud. v. 136, ff.) rejects the opinion that Pāṇini was prior to Buddha.[167] If we accept the view of Böhtlingk and Lassen that Pāṇini flourished about 330 years B.C. (Lassen, vol. i., second edition, p. 864), and that Yāska was more than fifty years earlier, the latter may be placed about 400 B.C. If, further, we adopt the opinion expressed by Prof. Benfey (see last section, pp. 138, 143) that Sanskrit had ceased to be vernacular in the time of Buddha, i.e. in the sixth century B.C., the colloquial use of that language must have died out some centuries before the age of Yāska; and a somewhat longer period before the time of Pāṇini. In this case, these authors could not employ the word bhāshā, when referred to Sanskrit, in the sense of a universally spoken contemporaneous language; for the language then actually in general use must have been a species of Pāli or some of the earlier forms of Prākṛit. But still the spoken language of that day had not departed so far from the Saṇskrit but that its close relation to the latter as its parent, or rather as its standard, would be evident to every scholar; and thus Sanskrit would still be called the bhāshā, or language par excellence. We have consequently, in the continued use of this word, an argument of considerable force to show that the Sanskrit had at one time been a spoken tongue.

Again, in the Mahābhāshya (pp. 22 and 63 of Dr. Ballantyne's edition) we find the following passage :—

Bhūyāṁso 'paśabdāḥ alpīyāṁsaḥ śabdāḥ | ekaikasya hi śabdasya bahavo 'pabhraṁśāḥ | tad yathā "gaur" ity asya śabdasya "gāvī" "goṇī" "gotā" "gopotalikā" ity-evam-ādayo bahavo 'pabhraṁsāḥ |

"Incorrect words are the most numerous, and [correct] words are the fewest; for of each word there are many corruptions (apabhraṁśāḥ). Thus there are numerous corruptions of the word goḥ (cow); such as the following, viz., gāvī, goṇī, gotā, gopotalikā, etc." This reference to incorrect forms, such as those of the word go, which seem to be Prākṛit,[168] indicates that Sanskrit, even if not still spoken by a considerable class of persons, was at least regarded as the standard of all spoken language; and that all deviations from it were looked upon as mere [167] Compare the same writer's remarks on this question in his review of Mr. D'Alwis's Kāchchāyana in the Journal of the Germ. Or. Society, xix. 653.

[168] In the Mṛichhakaṭi, pp. 98, 99, the word goṇā occurs in the sense of oxen.

vulgarisms: for there would have been no ground for such a mode of comparison between words which were regarded as belonging to different languages; nor would the Prākṛit synonyms of go have been wrong because of their variety of form.

Sixth:—In the 164th hymn of the 1st book of the Rigveda, the following verse (the 45th) occurs: Chatvāri vāk parimitā padāni tāni vidur brāhmanāḥ ye manīshiṇaḥ | guhā trīṇi nihitā nengayanti turīyaṁ vācho manushyāḥ vadanti | "There are four measured grades of language: with these intelligent Brāhmans are acquainted. Three hidden in secret indicate nothing. The fourth grade of speech is uttered by men." I quote part of the comment on this verse, which is given in the Pariśishṭa, or Supplement to the Nirukta, i. 9:—

Katamāni tāni chatvāri padāni | "oṁkāro vyāhṛitayaś cha" ity ārsham | "nāmākhyāte cha upasarga-nipātāś cha" iti vaiyākaraṇāḥ | "mantraḥ kalpo brāhmaṇaṁ chaturthī vyāvakārikī" iti yājnikāḥ | "richo yajūṁshi sāmāni chaturthī vyāvahārikī" iti nairuktāḥ | "sarpāṇāṁ, vāg vayasāṁ kshudrasya sarīsṛipasya chaturthī vyāvahārikī" ity eke | "paśushu tūṇaveshu mṛigeshu ātmani cha" ity ātmapravādāḥ | athāpi brāhmaṇam bhavati "sā vai vāk sṛishṭā chaturdhā vyabhavad | eshv eva lokeshu trīṇi paśushu turīyam | yā pṛithivyāṁ sā Agnau sā rathantare | yā antarikshe sā Vāyau sā vāmadevye | yā divi sā āditye sā bṛihati sā stanayitnāv atha paśushu | tato yā vāg atyarichyata tām brāhmaṇeshv adadhuḥ | tasmād brāhmaṇāḥ ubhayīṁ vadanti yā cha devānāṁ yā cha manushyāṇām" iti |

"What are these four grades? The explanation of the ṛishis is, that 'they are the four mystic words, om, bhūḥ, bhuvaḥ, and svar.' The grammarians[169] say 'they are the four kinds of words, nouns, verbs, prepositions, and particles.' The ceremonialists declare them to be '(1st) the mantras; (2nd) the kalpas (liturgical precepts); (3rd) the brāhmaṇas; and (4th) the current language.'[170] The commentators (nairuktāḥ) explain them as being '(1st) the ṛich; (2nd) the yajush; (3rd) the sāman texts; and (4th) the current language.' Others think they denote the speech '(1st) of serpents; (2nd) of birds; (3rd) of [169] See the Mahābhāshya, pp. 28, 29.

[170] See Sāyaṇa's commentary on R.V. i. 164, 45. He there defines thus the words vyāvahārikī vāk: Bhoga-vishayā "gām anaya" ityādi-rūpā vyāvahārikī | "The common language is that which refers to objects of enjoyment, such as gām ānaya, 'bring the cow.'" These words are of course Sanskrit.

small reptiles; and (4th) the current language.' The philosophical school explains the four grades as having reference to 'cattle, musical instruments, wild animals, and soul.' On this point we have also the following text in a Brāhmaṇa: 'Speech, when created, became divided into four parts, of which three abide in these three worlds (earth, the atmosphere, and the sky), and the fourth among the beasts. Terrestrial speech abides in fire and in the Rathantara texts; atmospheric speech abides in the wind, and in the Vāmadevya prayers; celestial speech abides in the sun, in the Bṛihat metre, and in thunder. The [fourth portion of speech was] in the beasts. The speech which was most excellent[171] was placed in the Brāhmans: hence the Brāhmans speak two sorts of language; both that of gods and that of men.'"

The Pariśishṭa appended to the Nirukta is more modern than the time of Yāska, though it is regarded as a part of his work by Durga, the commentator, who refers to the Nirukta as consisting of 14 parts. (See his comment on Nir. i., 20, which is quoted below, pp. 166, ff.) But though itself subsequent in date to the Nirukta, the preceding passage refers to the opinions of various ancient writers, and may, therefore, be held to carry us back to a remoter period. Three of the ancient schools which are quoted assert the current language (vyāvahārikī vāk) to be the fourth kind of speech alluded to in the Vedic text as being spoken by men. By this we are perhaps to understand old Sanskrit. It is true that in the Brāhmaṇa which the author of the Pariśishṭa cites a remark is made (connected with what precedes) that the Brāhmans speak two languages, that of the gods and that of men; and this might seem to prove that, as in later times (see above, p. 47), a distinction was drawn, at the time when the Brāhmaṇa was composed, between Sanskrit, the language of the gods, and Prākṛit, the language of men. But the reference may be to the Vedic and the ordinary Sanskrit; or to cultivated and rustic speech, or perhaps to some piece of mysticism.[172] And, in any case, as we are ignorant of the date of the Brāhmaṇa from which the citation is made, no conclusion can be drawn from the passage adverse to the vernacular use of Sanskrit in the Vedic age.

[171] Benfey, Gött. Gel. Anz. for 1861, p. 134, would render "was the first."

[172] In the Gopatha Brāhmaṇa, i. 1, 1, and in the S'atap. Br. xiv. 6, 11, 2, it is said, paroksha-priyāḥ iva hi devāḥ pratyaksha-dvishaḥ, "for the gods love, as it were, what is mysterious, and hate what is manifest." The first part of this formula is of frequent occurrence in the Brāhmaṇas. The commentator on the Taitt. Br. i. 5, 9, 2, where it occurs, remarks, "Hence also in common life teachers avoid such names as Devadatta, and like to be honoured by such appellations as 'upādhyāya,'

Seventh:—In the Rāmāyana several passages occur in which the colloquial use of Sanskrit is mentioned. These are the following[173]:—

Hanuman, the monkey general, is represented as having found his way into the palace of Rāvaṇa, the Rākshasa king, and as reflecting how he is to address Sītā, who is there confined. He says (Sundara Kāṇḍa, xxx. 17, Bombay edition): ahaṁ hy atitanuś chaiva vānaraś cha viśeshataḥ | vāchaṁ chodāharishyāmi mānushīm iha saṁskṛitām[174] | 18 | yadi vācham pradāsyāmi dvijātir iva saṁskṛitām | Rāvaṇam manyamānā māṁ Sītā bhītā bhavishyati | 19 | avaśyam eva vaktavyam mānushaṁ vākyam arthavat | mayā sāntvayituṁ śakyā nānyatheyam aninditā | "For I am very small, and above all a monkey; I shall now utter polished (saṁskṛitām) human speech. If I utter polished speech like a Brāhman, Sītā will think I am Rāvaṇa, and will be frightened. I must certainly speak human and significant language; for thus only can I comfort the blameless lady."

The reading in Gorresio's edition of the Sundara Kāṇḍa, xxix. 16, is somewhat different from the above, and is as follows: anenāśvāsayishyāmi śokenāpahitendriyām | ahaṁ hy aviditaś chaiva vānaraś cha viśeshataḥ | 17 | yadi vāchaṁ vadishyāmi dvijātir iva saṁskṛitām | seyam ālakshya rūpaṁ cha Jānakī bhāshitaṁ cha me | Rāvaṇam manyamānā mām punas trāsam gamishyati | tato jāta-paritrāsā śabdaṁ kuryād

'Miśra,' and so forth," (ataḥ eva loke 'pi devadattādi-nāma parityajya āchāryāḥ upādhyāyāḥ miśrāḥ ityādi-nāmabhiḥ pūjyāḥ paritushyanti). It is well known that, according to Indian custom, Pandits are not named by their pupils, but are referred to as my Guru, etc.

In the Iliad, ii., 813, f., mention is made of an eminence called by men Batieia, and by the gods the tomb of Myrine; on which Faesi remarks in his note that the former was the common, the latter the older, but more distinctive and significant name. (Comp. Iliad i. 403; xiv. 291; xx. 74.) On Iliad ii. 813, Prof. Blackie remarks (Homer, vol. iv. 114), "With regard to the double name—the human and the divine—by which this place was known, I have little doubt that Lobeck (Aglao. p. 858), Nitzsch (Od. x. 305), and Göttling (Hes. intro. xxx.) are right in saying that by the language of men in such cases is understood the popular or vulgar name; by the language of the gods, the sacerdotal, oracular, or poetical designation."

[173] For the references to most of the texts here quoted I am indebted to Weber, Zeitschr. der Deutschen Morgenl. Gesellschaft, for 1854, p. 851, note.

[174] These words are thus explained by the commentator: mānushīm manushya-śarīra-sādhyām | "saṁskṛitām" vyākaraṇa-saṁskāravatīm |

manasvinī | "I shall console her, whose senses are overwhelmed with this grief. But I am both unknown, and above all a monkey. If I were to speak in polished language, like a twice-born man, Jānakī (Sītā), perceiving my appearance, and [hearing] my words, would think that I was Rāvaṇa, and would again become terrified; and would scream in consequence of her fright." Considering that this would lead to a discovery, he concludes as follows (verses 33 and 34 of the same section): Rāmam aklishṭakarmāṇaṁ nimittair anukīrtayan | tasmād vakshyāmy ahaṁ vākyaṁ mānushyaḥ iva saṁskṛitam | nainām udvejayishyāmi tad-buddhi-gata-mānasām | "Announcing by signs the undaunted Rāma, I shall address to her such polished language as a man would. [Thus] I shall not occasion her any alarm, as her mind will be fixed on the thoughts of her husband."

As the reason assigned in these passages for not addressing Sītā in Sanskrit such as a Brāhman would use, is not that she would not understand it, but that it would alarm her, and be unsuitable to the speaker, we may take them as indicating that Sanskrit, if not spoken by women of the upper classes at the time when the Rāmāyana was written (whenever that may have been[175]), was at least understood by them,[176] and was commonly spoken by men of the priestly class, and other educated persons. By the Saṁskrit proper to an [ordinary] man, alluded to in the second passage, may perhaps be understood not a language in which words different from those of Brahmanical Sanskrit were used, but the employment of diction correct, but neither formal and elaborate, nor familiar and vulgar. It would be comparatively easy, even for persons who could not speak correct Sanskrit, to understand it when spoken, at the early period here in question, when the contemporary vernacular, if different from Sanskrit, deviated from it so very much less than the modern Indian vernaculars do.

[175] Lassen, Ind. Alt., vol. i., pp. 484, ff., does not determine its date.

[176] In the Mṛichhakaṭī, however, written probably at a later period (see above, p. 12, note 4), a woman's pronunciation, when reading or repeating Sanskrit is spoken of as something laughable (p. 44, Stenzler's ed.):—mama dāva duvehiṁ jjeva hassaṁ jāadi itthiāe sakkadam paḍhantīe maṇussena a kāaliṁ gāantena | itthiā dāva sakkadam paḍhantī diṇṇavaṇassā via giṭṭhī adhiam susuāadi, which is thus translated by Professor Wilson (Theatre of the Hindus, i. 60):—"Now, to me, there are two things at which I cannot choose but laugh, a woman reading Sanskrit, and a man singing a song; the woman snuffles like a young cow, when the rope is first passed through her nostrils."

Again, an expression occurs in the Araṇya Kāṇḍa, xi. 56, from which it seems as if the use of Sanskrit was a characteristic of Brāhmans; and no doubt they were the persons who chiefly spoke it (Bombay edition): dhārayan brāhmaṇaṁ rūpam Ilvalaḥ saṁskṛitaṁ vadan | āmantrayati viprān sa śrāddham uddiśya nirghṛiṇaḥ | [177] "Assuming the form of a Brāhman, and speaking Sanskrit, the ruthless Rākshasa Ilvala invited the Brāhmans to a funeral ceremony."

In the Sundara Kāṇḍa, lxxxii. 3 (Gorresio's edition), the discourse of Prahasta, one of the Rākshasas, is characterized as saṁskṛitaṁ hetu-sampannam arthavach cha | "polished (saṁskṛitam), supported by reasons, and judicious in its purport;" and in the Yuddha Kāṇḍa, (civ. 2) the god Brahmā is said to have addressed to Rāma a discourse which was saṁskṛitam madhuraṁ ślakshṇam arthavad dharma-saṁhitam | "polished, sweet, gentle, profitable, and consonant with virtue." But in neither of these two passages does there appear to be any reference to the special meaning of the word saṁskṛita.

In the subjoined lines (Sundara Kāṇḍa, xviii. 18, f.), the word saṁskāra is employed, if not in a technical signification, corresponding to that of saṁskṛita, at all events in a manner which enables us (as Weber observes) to perceive how that technical sense of the word arose: duḥkhena bubudhe chainām Hanumān Marutātmajaḥ | saṁskāreṇa yathā hīnām vāchaṁ arthāntaraṁ gatām [178] | tishṭhantīm analankārām dīpyamānāṁ sva-tejasā | "Hanumān, Son of the Wind, recognized Sītā with difficulty, standing, as she was, unadorned, radiant only with her own brilliancy: just as a word is not readily understood, when its sense is changed by the want of its correct grammatical form."

[177] The commentator explains the first line thus: "brāhmaṇa-rūpaṁ" brāhmaṇa-sadṛiśa-veshaṁ | "saṁskṛitaṁ vadan" brāhmaṇa-vad iti śeshaḥ |

[178] The reading of this line is identical in the Bombay edition, xv. 39; and the commentator there has the following note: Snānānulepanādir anga-saṁskāraḥ | vācho vyākaraṇa-jñānādi-jaḥ saṁskāraḥ | devyāḥ arthāntara-gatatvaṁ deśāntara-gatatvam | vāchas tu vivakshitārthād anyārtha-bodhakhatvam | vācho 'rtho yathā vyākaraṇādy-abhyāsa-duḥkhena vyutpattiṁ sampādya budhyate tad-vat Sītāṁ kashṭena bubudhe | "Bathing, anointing, etc., are the decoration (saṁskāra) of the body. The decoration (or correctness, saṁskāra) of speech is derived from a knowledge of grammar, etc. The phrase arthāntaragatatva, when applied to Sītā, signifies her having gone to a foreign country; but when applied to speech, it signifies the denoting of another meaning than the one intended. As the sense of speech is understood after proficiency has been attained with difficulty by the study of grammar, so he (Hanuman) recognized Sītā by hard effort." Professor Aufrecht has furnished

Eighth:—From the researches of Professors Kuhn[179] and Benfey[180] it appears that many words, which in modern Sanskrit are only of one, two, or three, etc., syllables, have, in the Veda, to be read as of two, three, or four, etc., syllables, i.e., as of one syllable longer, in order to make up the full length of the lines required by the metre employed by the Vedic poets. Thus tvam has to be read as tuam; vyushṭau as viushṭau; turyam as turiyam; martyāya as martiāya; vareṇyam as vareṇiam; amātyam as amātiam; svadhvaram as suadhvaram; and svastibhiḥ as suastibhiḥ. Now as this mode of lengthening words is common in Prākṛit, it would appear that the Prākṛit pronunciation agrees in this respect with that of the old Sanskrit in contradistinction to the more recent. But as the Prākṛit pronunciation must have been borrowed from a previously existing popular pronunciation, which was at the same time that employed by the Vedic poets, we find here another reason for concluding that the old spoken language of India and the Sanskrit of the Vedas were at one time identical.[181]

me with the following text on the subject of Sanskrit being at one time spoken. He informs me: "The Sarasvatīkaṇṭhābharaṇa speaks, in the beginning of the second chapter, of the use of the vulgar tongue in poetry, and says in śloka 16: ke 'bhūvann ādya-rājasya rājye prākṛita-bhāshiṇaḥ | kāle śrī-Sāhasāṅkasya ke na saṁskṛita-vādinaḥ | According to the author, Sanskrit was universally spoken in the time of Sāhasāṅka, whom we know as the founder of an era. This is an individual view, but it is curious as coming from a Hindu, who lived, say, 1,050 years after Christ." The sense of the verse quoted by Professor Aufrecht is as follows: "During the reign of the first king, who spoke Prākṛit? In the time of Sāhasāṅka (Vikramāditya), who did not speak Sanskrit?"

[179] Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes, iii. 80.

[180] Sāma-veda, Introduction, p. liii., ff. See also the articles of Dr. Bollensen in Orient und Occident, ii. 457, ff., and in the Zeitsch. der Deut. Morg. Gesellschaft, xxii. 569, ff., and Prof. Müller's translation of the R.V., vol. i., pref. pp. lxxviii, ff.

[181] I quote some remarks of Benfey, Sāma-veda, Introd. p. liii.:—"The necessity for frequently changing the liquids y and v into the correspondent vowels i and u, had been remarked by the Indian writers on prosody, who teach that, wherever the metre requires it, iy and uv should be read instead of y and v. In many words the former mode of writing appears to have prevailed; as is rendered probable by the differences of reading between the Sāma-veda and the Rig-veda, the former, for instance, reading tugriya, subhuvah, sudruvam, where the latter reads tugrya, subhvah, sudrvam; and the latter, on the contrary, reading samudriya, where the former reads samudrya. . . . . But the necessity of making the change in order to obtain a reading conformable to the metre, is of such ordinary occurrence that we are soon led to conclude that, at the time when the Vedas were composed, the liquids (y and v), which appear in the Saṅhitās as we now have them, had not yet, for the most part,

SECT. X.—Various stages of Sanskrit literature, and the different forms in which they exhibit the Sanskrit language: the later Vedic commentators: earlier expounders: the Nirukta: the Brāhmaṇas: the Vedic hymns: imperfect comprehension of them in later times from changes in the language: the hymns composed in the vernacular idiom of their age.[182]

As I have shown in the preceding section that Sanskrit was once a spoken language, it must, in that its earlier stage, have been exposed to the mutations to which all spoken languages are subject from their very nature. Sanskrit must, in the course of ages, have become very different from what it originally was.[183] And, in fact, we find from the records of Indian literature, that the Sanskrit, as it is brought before us in the different Śāstras, has gone through different phases. The most modern is that in which we find it in the Itihāsas, Purāṇas, and Smṛitis. The Itihāsas and Purāṇas are undoubtedly not to be ranked with the oldest Sanskrit writings, for they all imply that there begun to be pronounced, but that, in their stead, the corresponding vowels i and u were employed." On the other hand, y and v must sometimes be read instead of iy and uv (p. lvi.). The fifteen verses of the Purusha Sūkta (cited in the first volume of this work, pp. 8, f.), which are composed in the Anushṭup metre, will be generally found to have the proper number of feet, if not in other respects to scan correctly,—if the preceding remarks be attended to. Thus in the first verse, line second, the words vṛitvā and atyatishṭhat must be read apart, and not united by sandhi. Bhāvyam (in the first line of the second verse) must be lengthened to bhāviyam; vyakrāmat (second line, fourth verse) to viakrāmat; sādhyā (second line, seventh verse) to sādhiyā; ājyam (first line, eighth verse, though not in second line, sixth verse) to ājiam; grāmyāścha (second line, eighth verse) to grāmiāścha; vyadadhuḥ and vyakalpayan (first line, eleventh verse) to viadadhuḥ and viakalpayan; and rājanyaḥ (first line, twelfth verse) to rājaniaḥ.

[182] In revising this section (composed originally in 1858) for the press, I have had the assistance of Professor Müller's work on Ancient Sanskrit Literature, which has enabled me to make a few additions, and to modify some of my previous statements. [Note to first edition.]

[183] I fear that the text of Patanjali (Mabābhāshya, p. 104) may be cited against me here:—nityāś cha śabdāḥ | nityeshu cha śabdeshu kūṭasthair avichālibhir varṇair bhavitavyam anapāyopajana-vikāribhiḥ | "Words are eternal; and in the case of eternal words we must have immutable and immovable letters, free from diminution, or increase, or alteration." But the words which Bhāskara Acharyya applied to astronomy are equally applicable to grammar:—atra gaṇita-skandhe upapattimān eva āgamaḥ pramāṇam | "In this astronomical department scripture is authoritative only when it is supported by demonstration." This is true, also, of all other matters, which, like Grammar, come within the sphere of science.

were many older records of Hindu antiquity existing when they were compiled, and often quote various ancient verses.[184] The Mahābhārata frequently introduces old legends with the following formula, which, however, may often mean nothing: atrāpy udāharantīmam itihāsam purātanam | "Here they adduce this ancient narrative." (See vol. i., p. 127.) In all these different classes of works, which, in their present form, are comparatively recent parts of Indian literature, the Sanskrit language is substantially the same. At the time when even the oldest of these works were reduced into their present form, we must suppose that the Sanskrit had nearly ceased to be a spoken tongue, and had become gradually stereotyped as a polished and learned language, by the precepts of those grammarians who preceded Pāṇini, as well as of that scholar himself and his successors.[185] As the language which had thus been polished, improved, and fixed by precise grammatical rules, ceased to be popularly spoken, it was preserved from any future changes. In this way the Sanskrit language has remained almost unaltered for more than two thousand years, till it has acquired the appearance of immutability; while its antiquity, and the perfection of form which it eventually acquired, and has so long retained, have caused it to be regarded as of divine origin; just as every science which has descended from a remote age, or even from a period comparatively recent, is

[184] That they are not all of one age is held by an enlightened Indian Pandit, Īśvara Chandra Vidyāsāgar, in the Bengalī preface to his Ṛijupāṭha, or Sanskrit selections, as follows:—sŏkŏl purāṇ ŏṛekhyā Vishṇupurāṇer rŏchŏnā prāchīn bōdh hŏy | yābŏtīyŏ purāṇ Vedŏbyāsproṇīt boliyā prŏsiddhi āchhe | kintu purāṇ sŏkŏler rŏchŏnā pŏrŏspŏr etŏ bibhinn je ek byŏktir rŏchit bŏliyā bōdh hŏy nā | Vishṇupurāṇ Bhāgŏbŏt ō Brŏhmŏbaibŏrttŏpurāṇer ekek ŏṁś pāṭh kŏrile ei tin grŏnth ek lekhŏnīr mukhhŏite vinirgŏt bŏliyā prŏtīti hŏŏyā dushkŏr | Vishṇupurāṇ prŏbhṛitir sŏhit Mŏhābhārŏter rŏchŏnār etŏ bibhinnŏtā je jini Vishṇupurāṇ kimbā Bhāgŏbŏt ŏthŏbā Brŏhmŏbaibŏrttŏpurāṇ rŏchŏnā kŏriyāchhen tāṁhār rŏchit bōdh hŏy nā |

"The composition of the Vishṇu-purāṇa appears to have preceded that of all the other Purāṇas. It is commonly said that all the Purāṇas were composed by Vedavyāsa. But the style of the different Purāṇas is so various that they cannot be conceived to be the work of one person. After reading a portion of the Vishnu-purāṇa, another of the Bhāgavata, and a third of the Brahmavaivartta-purāṇa, it is difficult to believe them all to have proceeded from one pen. . . . So, too, there is such a discrepancy between the style of the Mahābhārata and that of the Vishnu-purāṇa, and the other works mentioned above, that it cannot be imagined to be the composition of the same person by whom they were written.

[185] See, however, the distinction made by Lassen between the Epic poems (Itihāsas) and the Purāṇas, in the passage cited above, p. 133, note.

regarded by the people of India as supernatural.[186] Prior to this era, however, and as long as it had continued to be commonly spoken by the lower or upper classes, the Sanskrit had been liable to constant fluctuations in the forms of its inflections. Accordingly, in the works which are more ancient than the Smṛitis and Itihāsas, we find various differences of grammatical form, and a style altogether more antique. This is to some extent the case in the Brāhmaṇas and Upanishads, where we encounter a simplicity of syntax and a tautology of style, together with many particles, and some modes of construction and forms, which are foreign to the later works.[187] The Brāhmaṇas, however, are only to be regarded as a middle stage between the Vedic hymns (mantras) and the more modern Sanskrit. It is to the hymns of the Rigveda, most of which are separated by an interval of several centuries, even from the Brāhmaṇas, that we must resort if we would discover how wide are the differences between the Sanskrit in its oldest known form and its most modern shape. In these hymns we find various forms of inflection and conjugation which are not to be traced in more modern writings, and numerous words which either disappear altogether in later authors, or are used by them in a different sense. These hymns are, in fact, by far the oldest parts of Indian literature. That this is the case, is proved by the whole nature and contents of the other portions of that literature which is connected with those hymns. The hymns are the essential part of the Veda; all the other writings which bear the name of Veda are dependent on the hymns, and subservient to their explanation or liturgical use. In the commentary called the Vedārtha-prakāśa, on the Taittirīya Sanhitā, p. 9, it is said: Yadyapi Mantra-brāhmaṇātmako Vedas tathāpi Brāhmaṇasya mantra-vyākhyāna-rūpatvād mantrāḥ eva ādau samāmnātāḥ | "Al-

[186] The philosophers Rāmānuja and Mādhvāchāryya are called incarnations of S'esha and Vāyu (Wilson's Hindu Sects, pp. 24 and 87), and S'ankara Āchārya is celebrated in the Vṛihad Dharma-purāṇa as an incarnation of Vishṇu.—Colebrooke's Essays, i. 103, 104.

[187] Thus, e.g. any one who is familiar with modern Sanskrit will recognize in the passage cited from the Kaushītakī-brāhmaṇa in the first volume of this work (p. 328), a dissimilarity of style. The separation of the particle abhi from the verb abhavat, in the phrase abhi Saudāsān abhavat | "He became superior to the Saudāsas," is a remnant of the Vedic usage. In modern Sanskrit the preposition would not be thus severed from the verb. In the S'atapatha Brāhmaṇa, xi. 5, 1, 10, and 12, the following ancient forms occur, tāt for tasmāt, "from that," vṛiṇāsai, "Do thou choose," or "thou shalt choose."

though the Veda consists of Mantra and Brāhmaṇa, yet, as the Brāhmaṇas have the character of explanations of the Mantras, [it follows that] the latter were the first recorded." And in a verse referred to by Śaṅkara Āchārya in his commentary on the Bṛihad Āraṇyaka Upanishad (Bib. Ind. ii. 855, ff.) it is said: Brāhmaṇa-prabhavāḥ mantrāḥ | "The mantras are the sources of the Brāhmaṇas." This may be made clearer by beginning with the most recent parts of the literature connected with the Vedas, and going gradually back to the oldest parts.

First:—Two of the most recent commentators on the Vedas are Sāyaṇa Āchārya, who lived in the fourteenth century A.D.,[188] and wrote a detailed commentary called Vedārthaprakāśa, on the whole of the Rigveda; and Mahīdhara, who compiled a commentary entitled Vedadīpa on the Vājasaneyī Sanhitā of the Yajur-veda.

Second: In such works as these we find reference made to earlier writers on the Vedas, such as Śaunaka, the author of the Bṛihaddevatā, Yāska, the author of the Nirukta, and many others, with quotations from their works.

Professor Müller[189] divides the Vedic literature, properly so called, into four periods, which, in the inverse order of their antiquity, are the Sūtra period, the Brāhmaṇa period, the Mantra period, and the Chhandas period. The Chhandas period, during which the oldest hymns preserved in the Ṛigveda collection were written, he supposes to have lasted from 1200 to 1000 B.C. Then followed the Mantra period, from 1000 to 800 B.C., in the course of which the more recent of the Vedic hymns were composed, and the whole were gathered together into one Sanhitā (or collection). Next in order was the Brāhmaṇa period, from 800 to 600 B.C., during which the chief theological and liturgical tracts bearing this title were composed and collected.[190] And, lastly, we have the Sūtra period, extending from 600

[188] Professor Wilson's Rigveda Sanhitā, Vol. I. Introduc. p. xlviii. Müller, "Chips," (1st ed.) p. 24. Roth, Introd. to Nirukta, p. liii. refers Mahīdhara (if not Sāyaṇa also) to the sixteenth century.

[189] See his "History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature," pp. 70, 244, 249, 313, 445, 497, 572.

[190] Professor Haug thinks all these works are older. In the Introduction to his Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, vol. i. p. 47, he writes: "We do not hesitate therefore to assign the composition of the bulk of the Brāhmaṇas to the years 1400–1200 B.C.;

to 200 B.C., in which the ceremonial precepts of the earlier tradition were reduced (by men who, however, were no longer, like their predecessors, regarded as inspired) into a more tangible, precise, and systematic form than they had previously possessed. The works of this period were not all composed in the concise form of Sūtras, but some were in verse and others in prose.

Among the latter is the work of Yāska, who (as we have seen, p. 153) is supposed by Professor Müller ("Chips," p. 74) to have lived in the fifth century B.C. Yāska found an earlier work entitled the Nighaṇṭus, made up of classified lists of Vedic, and partly obsolete, words, existing in his day; to which he alludes in the following passage, at the very commencement of his work (i. 1): samāmnāyaḥ samāmnātaḥ | sa vyākhātavyaḥ | tam imaṁ samāmnāyaṁ "Nighaṇṭavaḥ" ity ācakshate | "A sacred record (samāmnāya) has been compiled, which is to be expounded. This is called the Nighaṇṭus."[191]

And again (in i. 20): sākshātkṛita-dharmāṇaḥ ṛishayo babhūvuḥ | te 'varebhyo 'sākshātkṛita-dharmabhyaḥ upadeśena mantrān samprāduḥ | upadesāya glāyanto 'vare bilma-grahaṇāya[192] imaṁ granthaṁ samāmnāsishur vedaṁ cha vedāngāni cha | [bilmam bhilmam bhāsanam iti vā].[193]

"The ṛishis had an intuitive insight into duty. They, by tuition, handed down the mantras to subsequent preceptors, who were destitute of this intuitive perception. These later teachers, declining in the power of communicating instruction, for facility of comprehension through the division of the subject-matter, arranged this book (the Nighaṇṭus), the Veda, and the Vedāngas. [Bilma means bhilma, for the Saṁhitā we require a period of at least 500–600 years, with an interval of about 200 years between the end of the proper Brāhmaṇa period. Thus we obtain for the bulk of the Saṁhitā the space from 1400–2000; the oldest hymns and sacrificial formulas may be a few hundred years more ancient still, so that we would fix the very commencement of Vedic Literature between 2400–2000 B.C." See the first volume of this work, 2nd ed., p. 2, ff.

[191] On this the commentator Durgācharya annotates as follows: sa cha [samāmnāyaḥ] ṛishibhir Mantrārtha-parijñānāya udāharaṇabhūtaḥ panchādhyāyī śāstrasangraha-bhāvena ekasminn āmnāye granthīkṛitaḥ ity arthaḥ. "The sense is, that 'This sacred record which had been set forth by ṛishis as a specimen of the mode of explaining the sense of the mantras, has been formed into one collection in five chapters.'"

[192] "Das splitterweise Fassen," B. and R.

[193] The words in brackets are regarded by Prof. Roth as spurious (Illust. of Nirukta, p. 14, f.). I quote them, however, as they are commented on by Durga.

division, or bhāsana, illustration.]" This passage proves at once the priority of the Nighaṇṭus to the Nirukta, and also the still greater antiquity of the hymns which form the subject of explanation in both.[194]

The following are the remarks of Durgāchārya, the commentator, on this passage (Nir. i. 20):—

Śākshātkṛito yair dharmaḥ sākshād dṛishṭo prativiśishṭena tapasā te imē "sākshātkṛita-dharmāṇaḥ" | ke punas te iti | uchyate | "ṛishayaḥ" ṛishanti amushmāt karmaṇaḥ evam-arthavatā mantrēṇa saṁyuktād amunā prakāreṇa evaṁ-lakshaṇa-phala-viparīnāmo bhavati iti ṛishayaḥ | "ṛishir darśanād" iti vakshyati | tad etat karmaṇaḥ phala-viparihāma-darśanam aupachārikyā vṛittyā uktaṁ "sākshātkṛita-dharmāṇaḥ" iti | na hi dharmasya darśanam asti | atyantāpūrvo hi dharmaḥ | āha | kiṁ teshām iti | uchyate | "te 'varebhyo 'sākshātkṛita-dharmabhyaḥ upadeśena mantrān samprāduḥ" | te ye sākshātkṛita-dharmāṇas te 'varebhyo 'vara-kālīnebhyaḥ śakti-hīnebhyaḥ śrutarshibhyaḥ | teshāṁ hi śrutvā tataḥ paśchād ṛishitvam upajāyate na yathā pūrveshāṁ sākshātkṛitadharmāṇāṁ śravaṇam antarā eva | āha | kiṁ tebhyaḥ iti | te 'varebhyaḥ "upadeśena" śishyopādhyāyikayā vṛittyā mantrān granthato 'rthataś cha "samprāduḥ" samprattavantaḥ | te 'pi cha upadeśena eva jagṛihuḥ | atha te 'py "upadeśāya glāyantaḥ avare bilma-grahaṇāya imaṁ granthaṁ samāmnāsishur vedaṁ cha vedāngāni cha" iti | "upadeśāya" upadeśārtham | kathaṁ nāma upadiśyamānam ete śaknuyur gṛihītum ity evam artham adhikṛitya glāyantaḥ khidyamānāḥ teshv [?] agṛihṇatsu tad-anukampayā teshām āyushaḥ

[194] Professor Roth, in his Introduction to the Nirukta, p. xiii, remarks thus on this passage:—"Here Yāska ascribes the compilation of the small collections of words and names which forms the basis of his explanation, in an undefined way to an ancient tradition, not indeed dating from the earliest period, when faith and doctrine flourished without artificial aids, but from the generations next to that era, which strove by arrangement and writing to preserve the treasures which they had inherited. He further puts the Naighaṇṭuka in one class with the Vedas and Vedāngas. By the composition of the Vedas, which Yāska here places in the second period of Indian history, he cannot mean the production of the hymns transmitted by the ṛishis, which were always esteemed in India as the essential part of the Vedas, and were regarded in the same light by Yāska in the passage before us. All, therefore, that could be done by later generations was to arrange these hymns, and commit them to writing. We find here a recollection of a comparatively late reduction into writing of the mental productions of early ages, an event which has not yet attracted sufficient notice in its bearing upon the history of Indian literature."

sankocham avekshya kālānurūpāṁ cha grahaṇa-śaktim "bilmagrahaṇāya imaṁ grantham" gavādi-devapatny-antaṁ samāmnātavantaḥ | kim matam etena iti | uchyate | "vedaṁ cha vedāngāni cha" itarāṇi iti | katham punaḥ samāmnāsishur iti | āha | śṛiṇu | vedaṁ tāvad ekaṁ santam atimahattvād duradhyeyam aneka-śākhā-bhedena samāmnāsishuḥ sukhagrahaṇāya vyāsena samāmnātavantaḥ | te ekaviṁśatidhā bāhvṛichyam ekaśatadhā ādhvaryavaṁ sahasradhā sāmavedaṁ navadhā āthaṛvaṇam | vedāngāny api | tad yathā | vyākaraṇam ashṭadhā niruktaṁ chaturdaśadhā ityevam-ādi | evaṁ, samāmnāsishur bhedena grahaṇārtham | katham nāma | bhinnāny etāni śākhāntarāṇi laghūni sukhaṁ gṛihṇīyur ete śaktihīnāḥ alpāyusho manushyāḥ ity evam-artham samāmnāsishuḥ | bilma-śabdam bhāshya-vākya-prasaktaṁ nirbravīti | yad etad bilmam ity uktam etad bhilmam vedānām bhedanam | bhedo vyāsaḥ ity arthaḥ | "bhāsanam iti vā" | athavā bhāsanam evam bilma-śabdena uchyate | vedānga-vijnāṅena bhāsate prakāśate vedārthaḥ iti | ataḥ idam uktam bilmam iti | evam bhider bhāsater vā bilma-śabdaḥ | evam idam ṛishibhyo niruktaśāstram āyātam itarāṇi cha angāni iti pariśodhitaḥ āgamaḥ |

"They to whose minds duty was clearly present, i.e., by whom through eminent devotion it was intuitively seen, were the persons described by the term sākshāt-kṛita-dharmāṇas. Again, who were they? The ṛishis,[195] who are called so because they flow (ṛishanti); because from a particular ceremony accompanied by a mantra of such and such import, in a certain way, such and such a reward results. And the author will afterwards declare that the word 'ṛishi' comes from 'seeing' (darśanāt). Here 'those who have an intuitive perception of duty' are spoken of in a metaphorical way, as 'seeing' that a reward results from a ceremony; for duty cannot be seen, being something entirely invisible. He proceeds. But what of these ṛishis? He tells us: 'They handed down the mantras by oral tuition to subsequent men, who had not the same intuitive perception of duty,' i.e. those ṛishis who had an intuitive perception of duty handed down the mantras to subsequent men, i.e. to those who were ṛishis by audition (śrutarshis), of a later age, and destitute of power; 'ṛishis,' whose [195] About the different kinds and races of ṛishis, see vol. i. of this work, p. 400, note, and Prof. Aufrecht's Catalogue, p. 41, col. 2; as well as the 3rd vol. of this work, passim; see the index.

ṛishihood arose from what they had heard from others, and not without hearing, as was the case with those earlier ṛishis who had an intuitive perception of duty. He proceeds. What did the earliest ṛishis do to these later ones? They handed down the mantras by tuition (viz., by the function of instructing their pupils) according to their text and meaning;[196] and the pupils received them through tuition. Then 'these later men, being grieved,[197] with the view of affording instruction, arranged this book and the Veda, and the Vedāngas, in portions, for facility of comprehension.' 'For the purpose of instruction:' 'grieved,' afflicted by the apprehension that their pupils would not comprehend what was taught them; and when they did not understand, being actuated by compassion towards them, and having regard to the greater shortness of their lives, and to the diminution in their power of comprehension, which was occasioned by the influence of the times, they compiled this book [the Nighaṇṭu], beginning with 'gau,' and ending with 'devapatnyas,' in parts, for facility of comprehension by division of the subject-matter. He next tells us what is meant by this: the Vedas, and the other Vedāngas. But how did they compile these works? He tells us, listen: By separation, they arranged the Veda (which being up to that period one, was difficult to study, from its extreme magnitude) in a number of different Śākhās, for the purpose of easier comprehension. The Rigveda was arranged in 21 śākhās, the Yajush in 101, the Sāma in 1,000, the Ātharvaṇa in 9: and similarly the Vedāngas; grammar in 8 books, the Nirukta in 14, and so on, in order that they might be apprehended in a divided state; i.e. that powerless and shortlived men might easily be able to understand these several Śākhās, when divided and of limited extent. He now explains the word 'bilma.' . . . . Bilma = bhilma, means the division of the Vedas, and division stands for separate arrangement. Or it means bhāsanam, elucidation; i.e. the sense of the Vedas becomes clear from a knowledge of the vedāngas, or supplements to the Veda. Thus bilma is from the root bhid, or the root bhās. In this way this [196] So Müller (Anc. Sansk. Lit. p. 522) renders granthato arthataścha, denying to the word "grantha" the sense of written book. This rendering is approved by Prof. Goldstücker (Pāṇini, p. 32), though he holds that "grantha" properly means a written book (ibid. p. 27).

[197] It will be seen that in p. 165, I have understood the word glāyantaḥ in the sense of "declining."

Nirukta Śāstra, and the other Vedāngas have descended from the ṛishis. Thus the scripture has been elucidated."

The Nighaṇṭus, the lists of words which form the subject of the preceding remarks, were prefixed by Yāska to his own work, the Nirukta, in which, by commenting on them, he endeavours to throw light on the obscurities of the Veda.[198] When this work of Yāska was written, and even at a much earlier period, it is evident that the sense of many of the Vedic words had been commonly forgotten. This appears from the very fact of such works as the Nighaṇṭus and Nirukta being composed at all. For what occasion was there for compiling vocabularies of Vedic words, if the sense of these words had continued all along familiar to the students of the Vedas? The necessity for works like his own is argued by Yāska in the following passage (Nir. i. 15):

Athāpi idam antareṇa mantreshv artha-pratyayo na vidyate | artham apratiyato nātyantaṁ svara-saṁskāroddeśaḥ | tad idaṁ vidyā-sthānaṁ vyākaraṇasya kārtsnyaṁ svārtha-sādhakaṁ cha |

"Now without this work the meaning of the hymns cannot be understood; but he who does not comprehend their meaning cannot thoroughly know their accentuation and grammatical forms. Therefore, this department of science is the complement of grammar, and an instrument for gaining one's own object."[199]

The same thing is also clear from many passages in his work, in which he attempts to explain Vedic words by their etymologies[200]

[198] "The Naighaṇṭuka," says Professor Roth (Introd. to Nirukta, p. lii.), "especially the second portion of it, was a collection of difficult and obsolete words, which formed a basis for instruction in the mode of expounding the Veda, such as was usually given in the schools of the Brahmans. At that period no need was felt of continuous commentaries; and in fact learning had not then become separated into so many branches. A memorandum of the terms denoting the ideas of most frequent occurrence in the Veda, and of the principal passages which required elucidation; a simple list of the gods and the objects of worship, such as we find in the Naighaṇṭuka, sufficed as a manual for oral instruction. At a later era this manual became the subject of formal and written explanation. To this period belongs the Nirukta."

[199] This passage is translated by Roth, Nirukta, Erläuterungen, p. 11. And Sāyaṇa says in the Introd. to his Commentary on the Rigveda, vol. i. p. 39, tasmād vedārthāvabodhāya upayuktaṁ niruktam | "Hence the Nirukta is serviceable for the understanding of the meaning of the Veda."

[200] See Roth's Erläuterungen to Nirukta, p. 219, ff. "Vedic interpretation could impose on itself no greater obstruction than to imagine that the Indian commentators were infallible, or that they had inherited traditions which were of any value. Even a superficial examination shows that their plan of interpretation is the very opposite

(a process, often tentative, which would have been unnecessary if their meanings had been perfectly known), or in which he cites the opinions of different classes of interpreters who had preceded him, and who had severally propounded different explanations. This further shows that in Yāska's time the signification of the hymns had formed the subject of investigation by learned men of different schools for many ages preceding. The following passage will illustrate this, as well as afford some insight into the subjects and manner of discussion at the period when he lived. "In the Nirukta, i. 15, 16, he thus (in continuation of the passage last cited) alludes to the opinion entertained by one of his predecessors, Kautsa,[201] regarding the value of traditional, that it is in reality a grammatical and etymological one, which only agrees with the former method in the erroneous system of explaining every verse, every line, every word by itself, without inquiring if the results so obtained harmonize with those derived from other quarters. If the fact that none of the commentators are in possession of anything more than a very simple set of conceptions regarding, e.g., the functions of a particular god, or even the entire contents of the hymns, which they are continually intruding into their interpretations, be regarded as a proof of their having inherited a tradition, it will at least be admitted that this poverty of ideas is not a thing which we have any reason to covet. In this set of conceptions are included those scholastic ideas which were introduced at an early period indeed, but not until the hymns had already become the subject of learned study, and the religious views and social circumstances on which they are based had lost all living reality. . . . "What is true of Sāyaṇa, or any of the other later commentators, applies essentially to Yāska also. He, too, is a learned interpreter, who works with the materials which his predecessors had collected, but he possesses an incalculable advantage, in point of time, over those compilers of detailed and continuous commentaries, and belongs to a quite different literary period; viz., to that when Sanskrit was still undergoing a process of natural growth." Compare Benfey's remarks on the Vedic scholiasts, in the Introduction to his Sāmaveda, pp. lxv, f., where he observes: "How high soever may be the antiquity assigned to the oldest grammatical and hermeneutical treatises on the Vedas, a long period appears to have intervened between these and the composition of the greater portion of the hymns, during which very much that was peculiar to the Vedas was forgotten. Their interpretations rest essentially (as is shown not merely by the commentaries which have been alluded to, but also by Yāska's Nirukta) on etymology, on conclusions drawn from the context, and the comparison of similar passages. The oldest attempts at interpretation seem to be contained in Brāhmaṇas, in collections of passages (nigama), in collections of words (nighaṇṭu) and in explanations (nirukta), of which last, two are mentioned by Sāyaṇa (R.V. vol. i. p. 45, lines 16 and 18), viz., one by Śākapūṇi and another by Sthaulāshṭhīvi, in addition to that of Yāska."

[201] See Roth, Zur Litteratur und Geschichte des Weda, p. 21, f. where he writes: "The rationalistic Kautsa could regard the Veda as devoid of meaning, and the Brāhmaṇas as false interpretations."

of the Vedic interpretation:

"Yadi mantrārtha-pratyayāya anarthakam bhavati" iti Kautsaḥ | "anarthakāḥ hi mantrāḥ | tad etena upekshitavyam | niyata-vācho yuktayo niyatānupūrvyāḥ bhavanti | athāpi brāhmaṇena rūpa-sampannāḥ vidhīyante | 'uru prathasva' iti prathayati | 'prohāṇi' iti prohati | athāpi aṇupapannārthāḥ bhavanti | 'oshadhe trāyasva enam' | 'svadhite mā enaṁ himsīr' [Taitt. S., i. 2, 1] ity āha himsan | athāpi pratishiddhārthāḥ bhavanti | 'ekaḥ eva Rudro 'vatasthe na dvitīyaḥ' | 'asaṁkhyātā sahasrāṇi ye Rudrāḥ adhi bhūmyām' | 'aśatrur Indra jajnishe' | 'śataṁ senāḥ ajayat sākam Indraḥ' | iti | athāpi jānantam sampreshyati 'Agnaye samidhyamānāya anubrūhi' iti | athāpy āha 'Aditiḥ sarvam' iti 'Aditir dyaur Aditir antarikshaṁ' iti" | tad uparishṭhād vyākhyāsyāmaḥ | "athāpy avispashṭhārthāḥ bhavanti | 'amyak' | 'yādṛiśmin' | 'jārayāyi' | 'kāṇukā' iti" | arthavantaḥ śabda-sāmānyāt | "etad vai yajnasya samṛiddham yad rūpa-samṛiddham yat karma kriyamāṇam ṛig yajur vā 'bhivadati" (Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, i. 4) iti cha brāhmaṇam | "krīlantau putrair naptṛibhir" iti | yatho etad "niyatavācho yuktayo niyatanupūrvyāḥ bhavanti" iti laukikeshv apy etad yathā "Indrāgnī" "pitāputrāv" iti | yatho etad "brāhmaṇena rūpa-sampannāḥ vidhīyante" ity uditānuvādaḥ sa bhavati | yatho etaj "anupapannārthāḥ bhavanti" ity āmnāyavachanād ahiṁsā pratīyeta | yatho etad "vipratishiddhārthāḥ bhavanti" iti | laukikeshv apy etad yathā "asapatno 'yam brāhmaṇaḥ" "anamitro 'yaṁ rājā" iti | yatho etaj "jānantaṁ sampreshyati" iti jānantam abhivādayate jānate madhuparkam prāha iti | yatho etad "Aditiḥ sarvam" iti laukikeshv apy etad yathā "sarvarasāḥ anuprāptāḥ pānīyam" iti | yatho etad "avispashṭhārthāḥ bhavanti" iti | na esha sthāṇor aparādho yad enam andho na paśyati purushāparādhaḥ sa bhavati | yathā jānapadīshu vidyātaḥ purusha-viśesho bhavati | pārovarya-vitsu tu khalu veditṛishu bhūyo-vidyaḥ praśasto bhavati |

I will, in my translation, place the answers of Yāska opposite to the objections of Kautsa (though they are separated in the text), and thus economize space, as well as make the discussion clearer.[202]

[202] See Dr. Roth's translation of this passage in the first of his Abhandlungen, p. 21, and in his Erläuterungen to the Nirukta, pp. 11–13. There are, however, some parts of the passage of which I do not clearly understand the bearing.

Kautsa objects.	Yāska replies.
1. "If the science of interpretation is intended to make the sense of the mantras clear, it is useless, for the mantras have no sense. This is to be seen as follows."	1. "The mantras have a sense, for their words are the same (as those in the ordinary language). A Brāhmaṇa (the Aitareya, i. 4) says, 'What is appropriate in its form, is successful in the sacrifice; that is to say, when the verse [ṛich or yajush] which is recited refers to the ceremony which is being performed.'[203] An example of the identity of the Vedic language with the ordinary speech is this, 'kṛīlantau,' etc. ('sporting with sons and grandsons')."
2. "The propositions [in the hymns and texts] have certain fixed words, and a certain fixed arrangement;" [and so require no interpretation?]	2. "This is the case in ordinary language also, e.g. Indrāgnī, pitāputrau ('Indra and Agni,' father and son')."
3. "The mantras have the ritual forms to which they refer fixed and enjoined by the Brāhmaṇas [and, therefore, need no further explanation]: thus 'Spread thyself widely out,' [Vāj. S., i. 22] and so he spreads; 'Let me pour out,' and so he pours."	3. "This is a mere repetition of what had been already said [and consequently calls for no further answer?]."
4. "They prescribe what is impracticable: thus, 'deliver him, O plant:' 'Axe, do not injure him,' thus he speaks while striking." [Taitt. Saṅh., i. 2, 1; see also Vāj. S., iv. 1; vi. 15.]	4. "According to the sacred tradition it must be understood that no injury is to be inflicted."
5. "Their contents are at variance with each other: thus, 'There exists but one Rudra, and no second;' and again, 'There are innumerable thousands of Rudras over the earth' [Vāj. S., xvi. 54]; and, 'Indra, thou hast been born without a foe' [R. V., x. 133, 2]; and again, 'Indra vanquished a hundred armies at once.'" [R. V., x. 103, 1.]	5. "The same thing occurs in ordinary language: thus, 'This Brāhman is without a rival;' 'The king has no enemies.'"

[203] This version is borrowed from Prof. Haug's translation, p. 11. The words quoted in the Nirukta occur in Ait. Br. i. 4, with the exception of "yajur vā."

6. "A person is enjoined to do an act with which he is already acquainted: thus, 'Address the hymn to the fire which is being kindled' [Śatap. Br., i. 3, 5, 2. This is said by the adhvaryu priest to the hotṛi. Roth.]"[204]

7. "Again it is said: 'Aditi is everything;' 'Aditi is the sky; Aditi is the atmosphere;'" [R. V., i. 89, 10].

8. "The signification of the mantras is indistinct, as in the case of such words as amīvak [R. V., i. 169, 3], yādṛiśmin [R. V., v. 44, 8], jārayāyi [R. V., vi. 12, 4], kāṉukā." [R. V., viii. 66, 4].[205]

6. "In the same way people are saluted by their names, though they already know them; and the madhuparka (a dish of curds, ghee and honey) is mentioned to those who are well acquainted with the custom."

7. "This will be explained further on [see Nir., iv. 23]. The same thing is said in common language: thus, 'All fluids (or flavours) reside in water.'"[205]

8. "It is not the fault of the post, that the blind man does not see it. It is the man's fault. Just as in respect of local usages men are distinguished by superior knowledge; so too, among those learned men who are skilled in tradition, he who knows most is worthy of approbation."

Durga, the commentator, does not enter on a detailed explanation of this passage. He merely refers as follows to its general scope:—

Athāpi idam antareṉa pada-vibhāgo na vidyate | śāstrārambha-prayojanādhikāre varttamāne atha idam antareṉa mantreshv arthāvadhāraṇaṁ nāsti ity ukte yadi mantretyādinā ānarthakya-hetubhir bahubhir ānarthakye upapādite nirukta-śāstrasya Kautsena mantrāṉām arthavattaṁ sthāpayitvā para-paksha-hetavaḥ pratyuktāḥ | teshu sthitam arthavatvam mantrāṉām | teshām arthanirvachanāya idam ārabhyamāṇam arthavad ity upapannam arthavattvaṁ nirukta-śāstrasya | tad etat sarvam api chodaka-śāstrakāra-vyājena prasaktānuprasaktam uktam prajnāyāḥ vivriddhaye śishyasya | kathaṁ nāma asāv avivriddha-prajnaḥ śabdārtha-nyāya-sankaṭeshu hetu-samayānabhijnaḥ paraiḥ pratibadhyamāno 'pi padārthān vākyārthāṁś cha asammohenā nirbrūyād iti.

"The student being supposed to have an occasion and a right to [204] See Müller, History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature, p. 472, note 1.

[205] Compare Raghuvansa, x. 16, rasāntarāṉy ekarasaṁ yathā divyam payo 'śnute| "As rain water, which has but one flavour, [when it has fallen] imbibes other flavours," etc.

[206] See my article on the interpretation of the Veda in the Journal of the Roy. As. Society, vol. ii. new series, p. 329, 334, 337; and Böhtlingk and Roth, s. vv. myaksh, yādṛiśa, (3) jar, and kāṉukā; as well as Roth's dissertation on the Atharva-veda, p. 21.

enter on the study of this Śāstra, and the proposition having been laid down that, without the Nirukta, the sense of the mantras cannot be understood, Kautsa, in the words, "if the science," etc., adduces many reasons for declaring the mantras to have no meaning, and on these he grounds an assertion that the Nirukta is useless. Yāska in reply states the reasons on the other side in support of the mantras having a meaning, which point he accordingly establishes. And as this work (the Nirukta), which is being commenced, is useful for the explanation of their meaning, its utility is demonstrated. Thus, under the guise of an objector[207] [who is answered by] the author of the treatise, an opportunity is taken of stating the arguments on both sides, with the view of increasing the student's intelligence. For how is that student, of immature understanding, ignorant too of reasons and conclusions, when he encounters difficulties connected with the proper explication of words, and is even hindered by other persons, to explain without perplexity the meaning of words and sentences?"

It would seem from this that Durgācharya looked upon Kautsa as being merely a man of straw, into whose mouth objections against the significance of the Vedas were put by Yāska, in order that he might himself refute them. It does not, however, appear why Kautsa, whose name appears in the old genealogical lists of teachers in one of the Brāhmaṇas (Müller, Ancient Sansk. Lit., pp. 181, 442), should be viewed in the light of a fictitious "Devadatta," any more than any other of the numerous earlier writers referred to in the Nirukta. There seems to be no other reason than this, that Durga did not, perhaps, wish his contemporaries to believe that there had been in early times any old grammarian who either rejected the authority of the Vedas, or differed from the customary methods of treating and interpreting them.

In Nirukta ii. 16, Yāska refers to the opinions of various former schools regarding the meaning of the word Vṛitra:—

Tat ko Vṛittraḥ | "meghaḥ" iti nairuktāḥ | "Tvāshṭro 'suraḥ" ity aitihāsikāḥ | apāṁ cha jyotishaś cha miśrībhāva-karmaṇo varsha-karma jāyate | tatra upamārthena yuddha-varṇāḥ bhavanti | ahi-vat tu khalu [207] I am indebted to the late Dr. Ballantyne and Professor Cowell for a correction of the sense I formerly assigned to the word chodaka.

mantra-varṇāḥ brāhmaṇa-vādāś cha | vivṛiddhyā śarīrasya srotāṁsi nivārayānchakāra | tasmin hate prasasyandire āpaḥ |

"Who was Vṛitra? 'A cloud,' says the Nairuktas (etymologists): 'an Asura, son of Tvashṭṛi,' say the Aitihāsikas (story-tellers). The fall of rain arises from the mingling of the waters and of light. This is figuratively depicted as a conflict. The hymns and Brāhmaṇas describe Vṛitra as a serpent. By the expansion of his body, he blocked up the streams. When he was destroyed, the waters flowed forth."

In Nir. iii. 8, he alludes to the views of older writers regarding the Vedic word panchajana:—"Panchajanāḥ mama hotraṁ jushadhvam" | (R.V., x. 53, 4). "Gandharvāḥ pitaro devāḥ asurāḥ rakshāṁsi" ity eke | "chatvāro varṇāḥ nishādaḥ panchamaḥ" ity Aupamanyavaḥ | "'Ye five' classes of beings, frequent my sacrifice.' These five classes of beings are the 'Gandharvas, Pitṛis, Devas, Asuras, and Rakshases,' say some: They are 'the four castes with the Nishādas for a fifth,' says Aupamanyava."

In Nir. viii. 21, f., Yāska thus speculates on the feelings which had led some of his predecessors to regard the introductory and concluding portions of the ritual of sacrifice, styled prayāja and anuyāja, as addressed to other deities than Agni:—

"Atha kiṁ-devatāḥ prayājānuyājāḥ | āgneyāḥ" ity eke | . . "Agneyāḥ vai prayājāḥ āgneyāḥ anuyājāḥ" iti cha brāhmaṇam | "chhando-devatāḥ" ity aparam | "chhandāṁsi vai prayājāś chhandāṁsy anuyājāḥ" iti cha brāhmaṇam | "ṛitu-devatāḥ" ity aparam | "ṛitavo vai prayājāḥ ṛitavo 'nuyājāḥ" iti cha brāhmaṇam | "paśu-devatāḥ" ity aparam | "paśavo vai prayājāḥ paśavo 'nuyājāḥ" iti cha brāhmaṇam | "prāṇa-devatāḥ" ity aparam | "prāṇāḥ vai prayājāḥ prāṇāḥ vai anuyājāḥ" iti cha brāhmaṇam | "ātma-devatāḥ" ity aparam | "ātmā vai prayājāḥ atmā vai anuyājāḥ" iti cha brāhmaṇam | āgneyāḥ iti tu sthitiḥ | bhakti-mātram itarat | kimartham punar iti | uchyate | yasyai devatāyai havir gṛihītaṁ syāt tām manasā dhyāyed vashaṭkarishyann iti ha vijnāyate |

"Now, who is the god to whom the prayājas and the anuyājas (introductory and concluding sacrificial acts) are addressed? 'Agni,' say some. For a Brāhmaṇa says, 'the prayājas and anuyājas belong to Agni.' Another opinion is that they have chhandas (metre) for their deity. For a Brāhmaṇa says, 'the prayājas and anuyājas are metres.' A third view is that they have the seasons for their deities.

For a Brāhmaṇa says, 'the prayājas and anuyājas are seasons.' A fourth view is that they have sacrificial victims for their deities. For a Brāhmaṇa says, 'the prayājas and anuyājas are victims?' A fifth view is that they have the vital airs for their deities. For a Brāhmaṇa says, 'the prayājas and anuyājas are the vital airs.' A sixth view is that they have soul for their deity. For a Brāhmaṇa says, 'the prayājas and anuyājas are soul.' I maintain the opinion that the hymns have Agni for their deity. The other views arise from mere devotion [to particular gods]. But why are these various views put forward? Because it is well known to be a precept that the person who is about to offer an oblation should meditate on the particular deity for whom it is intended."

In Nirukta xii. 1, he states the different views which had been put forward regarding the gods called Aśvins:—Aśvair aśvināv·ity Aurṇavabhaḥ | tat kāv aśvinau | "dyāvā-pṛithivyāv" ity eke | "ahorātrāv" ity eke | "sūrya-chandramasāv" ity eke | "rājānāu puṇyakṛitāv" ity aitihāsikāḥ | "'The Aśvins are so called from their horses (aśvais),' says Aurṇavābha. But who are the Aśvins? 'Heaven and earth,' say some; 'day and night,' say others: while others again say, 'the sun and moon.' 'They were virtuous kings,' say the Aitihāsikas." [208]

In Nirukta xii. 19, he states the various expositions given of a passage regarding Vishṇu:—Yad idaṁ kincha tad vichakrame Vishṇuḥ | tridhā nidhatte padaṁ tredhābhāvāya pṛithivyām antarikshe divi iti

[208] See Roth's Erläut. pp. 220-221, for some remarks on these old interpreters of the Veda. "Older expounders of the Vedas in general are," he says, "called by Yāska simply Nairuktas; and when he notices any difference in the conception of the Vedic gods, those interpreters who take the euhemeristic view are called Aitihāsikas. In addition to the exposition of the Veda in the stricter sense, there existed also liturgical interpretations of numerous passages, such as we find in the Brāhmaṇas and other kindred treatises, in which it was attempted to bring the letter of the received text into harmony with the existing ceremonial. Such liturgical interpretations are called by Yāska those of the Yājnikas, or 'persons skilled in sacrificial rites.' Akin to theirs appears to have been the mode of interpretation adopted by the Naidānas. . . . Under this head we must probably understand that method of explanation which, differing from the grammatical etymologies, referred the origin of the words and conceptions to occasions which were in a certain sense historical. The Brāhmaṇas and Upanishads abound in such historical or mythological etymologies, which are to be found in all ages and among all nations; etymologies which their own inventors do not regard as serious, but which, from their connexion with other ideas, obtain a certain importance in the religious system."

Śākapūṇiḥ | samārohaṇe vishṇupade gayaśirasi ity Aurṇavābhaḥ | "Vishṇu strode over all this universe: thrice he plants his foot. This he does in order to his threefold existence, 'on earth, in the atmosphere, and in the sky,' says Śākapūṇi: 'At his rising, in the zenith, and at his setting,' says Aurṇavābha."

In Nir. xii. 41, we have another reference to the Brāhmaṇas:—Agninā Agnim ayajanta devāḥ | "Agniḥ paśur āsīt | tam ālabhanta tena ayajanta" iti cha brāhmaṇam | "The gods sacrificed Agni (fire), with fire. 'Agni was the victim; him they immolated, with him they sacrificed;' so says a Brāhmaṇa."

We thus see that in various passages of his work Yāska refers also to the Brāhmaṇas; they must therefore have been older than his time.

The following is a list of the writers whom Yāska quotes as having preceded him in the interpretation of the Vedas:—Agrāyaṇa, Audumbarāyaṇa, Aurṇavābha, Kāṭthakya, Kautsa, Kraushṭuki, Gārgya, Gālava, Charmaśirās, Taiṭīki, Vārshyāyaṇi, Śatabalāksha the Maudgalya, Śākaṭāyana, Śākapūṇi, Śākalya, and Sthaulāshṭhīvi.[209]

The subjoined passage from the twelfth section of the first Pariśishṭa or supplement to the Nirukta (considered by Professor Roth, Nir. ii. p. 208, to be the work of some author subsequent to Yāska), relating to the antiquity of the Mantras, and the qualifications necessary for expounding them, is of considerable interest:—

Ayam mantrārtha-chintābhyūho abhyūḍho 'pi śrutito 'pi tarkataḥ | na tu pṛithaktvena mantrāḥ nirvaktavyāḥ prakaraṇaśaḥ eva nirvaktavyāḥ | na hy eshu pratyaksham asty anṛisheḥ atapaso vā | "pārovarya-vitsu tu khalu veditṛishu bhūyo-vidyaḥ praśasyo bhavati," ity uktam purastāt | manushyāḥ vai ṛishishu utkrāmatsu devān abruvan "ko nah ṛishir bhavishyati," iti | tebhyaḥ etaṁ tarkam ṛishim prāyachhan mantrārtha-chintābhyūham abhyūḍham | tasmād yad eva kincha anūchāno 'bhyūhaty ārshaṁ tad bhavati |

"This reflective deduction of the sense of the hymns is effected by the help of sacred tradition and reasoning. The texts are not to be interpreted as isolated, but according to their context. For a person who is not a ṛishi or a devotee has no intuitive insight[210] into their meaning. We have said before that 'among those men who are versed in tradition, he who is most learned deserves especial commendation.' When the ṛishis were ascending [from the earth], men inquired of the gods, 'Who shall be our ṛishi?' The gods gave them for a ṛishi this science of reasoning, this art of deducing by reflection the sense of the hymns. Therefore, whatever meaning any learned man deduces by reasoning, that possesses authority equal to a ṛishi's."

[209] Roth, Erläuter., pp. 221, 222.

[210] See the passage above quoted (p. 165) from Nirukta i. 20; and the third volume of this work, pp. 125, ff., 183.

Here there is to be remarked a recognition of the necessity of reason as a co-factor, in the ascertainment of religious truth, or the definition of ceremonial practice. With this may be compared the whole tendency of the Sānkhya doctrine, which is virtually, if not avowedly, founded on reasoning; and the assertion of Bhāskara (see above, p. 161, note 182), that in the mathematical sciences, scripture, if unsupported by demonstration, is of no authority.

The same confidence in the inherent force of the human intellect is exhibited by Bhāskara in another place, in these memorable words:—Yadā punar mahatā kālena mahad antaram bhavishyati tadā matimanto Brahmaguptādināṁ samāna-dharmiṇaḥ eva utpatsyante | ye tad-upalabdhy-anusāriṇīṁ gatim ururīkṛitya śāstrāṇi vyākarishyanti | ataḥ eva gaṇita-skandho mahāmatimadbhir dhṛitaḥ sann anādy-anante 'pi kāle khiṭatvaṁ na yāti | "When, again, after a long period, there shall be a great distance [observable in the position of the stars], then intelligent men of like character with Brahmagupta and other mathematicians will arise, who, admitting a movement in consonance with observation, will compose treatises accordingly. Hence the science of astronomy, being maintained by men of great ability, shall never fail in time, though it has no beginning nor end." See Colebrooke's Misc. Essays, ii. 381.

In the first volume of this work some passages have been already adduced from Yāska regarding the origin of particular Vedic hymns of which he explains verses. One of these texts relates to the Ṛishi Viśvāmitra, and another to the Ṛishi Devāpi. See vol. i., pp. 269, and 338.

Third:—I now proceed to the Brāhmaṇas, to which we have been led back through the ascending series of more recent works, as the oldest expository writings on the Vedic hymns. They are consequently later than the hymns, the most ancient portion of Indian literature. But while the other explanatory and prescriptive books connected with the Vedas, such as the grammatical and ceremonial Sūtras, etc., are not regarded as having any independent divine authority, the Brāhmaṇas, on the contrary, are considered as a part of the Veda itself. This will appear from the following passages from Sāyaṇa's commentary on the Rigveda: Mantra-brāhmaṇātmakaṁ tāvad adushṭaṁ lakshaṇam | ataḥ eva Āpastambo yajna-paribhāshāyām eva āha "mantra-brāhmaṇayor veda-nāmadheyam" iti | [211] "The definition of the Veda, as consisting of Mantra and Brāhmaṇa, is unobjectionable. Hence Āpastamba says, in the Yajna paribhāshā, 'Veda is the name applied to Mantra and Brāhmaṇa.'" Again: Mantra-brāhmaṇa-rūpau dvāv eva veda-bhāgāv ity āṅgīkārād mantra-lakshaṇasya pūrvam abhihitatvād avaśishṭo veda-bhāgo brāhmaṇam ity etal lakshaṇam bhavishyati | [212] "It being admitted that there are two parts of the Veda, viz., Mantra and Brāhmaṇa, as the Mantra has been already defined, the definition of Brāhmaṇa will be, that it is the remaining portion of the Veda."

In regard to the Sūtras and Smṛitis, the author of the Nyāyamālā-vistara says, i. 3, 24:—

Baudhāyanāpastambāśvalāyaṇa-kātyāyanādi-nāmānkitāḥ kalpa-sūtrādigranthāḥ nigama-nirukta-shaḍaṅga-granthāḥ Manv-ādi-smṛitayaś cha apaurusheyāḥ dharma-buddhi-janakatvād veda-vat | na cha mūla-pramāṇa-sāpekshatvena veda-vaishamyam iti śaṅkanīyam | utpannāyāḥ buddheḥ svataḥ prāmāṇyāṅgīkāreṇa nirapekshatvāt | mā evam | uktānumānasya kālatyayāpadishṭatvāt | Baudhāyana-sūtram Āpastamba-sūtram ity evam purusha-nāmnā te granthāḥ uchyante | na cha Kāṭhakādi-samākhyā-vat pravachana-nimittatvaṁ yuktaṁ tad-grantha-nirmāṇa-kāle tadānīntanaiḥ kaiśchid upalabdhatvāt | tach cha avichhinna-pāramparyeṇa anuvarttate | tataḥ Kālidāsādi-grantha-vat paurusheyāḥ | tathāpi veda-mūlatvāt pramāṇam | . . . . maivam | kalpasya vedatvaṁ na adyāpi siddham | kintu prayatnena sādhanīyam | na cha tat sādhayituṁ śakyam paurusheyatvasya samākhyayā tat-kartur upalambhena cha sādhitatvāt |

"Some persons have asserted that the Kalpa-sūtras and other works designated by the names of Baudhāyana, Āpastamba, Āśvalāyana, Kātyāyana, etc., and the Nigama, Nirukta, and six Vedāngas, together with the Smṛitis of Manu and others, are superhuman, because they impart to men a comprehension of duty, like the Vedas; and that they are not to be suspected of dissimilarity to the Vedas, from the fact of their appealing to the authority of the original text; for the knowledge of duty which they impart is independent, because it is admitted to be self-evidencing. But this view is incorrect; for the inference in question proceeds upon an erroneous generalization.[213] These works are called by the names of men; as, 'the Sūtras of Baudhāyana,' 'the Sūtras of Āpastamba,' etc.; and these designations cannot properly be derived from the fact that these works were studied by those whose names they bear, as is actually the case in regard to the Kāṭhaka and other parts of the Veda; for it was known to some of their contemporaries at the time of the composition of these Sūtras and Smṛitis, etc., that they were then being composed: and this knowledge has come down by unbroken tradition. Hence, like the works of Kālidāsa and others, the books in question are of human origin. Nevertheless, from being founded on the Veda, they are authoritative." . . . And again: "It is not yet proved that the Kalpa-sūtras are part of the Veda; and it would require great labour to prove it; and, in fact, it is impossible to prove it. For the human origin of this book is established by its name, and by its being observed to have had an author."[214]

[211] Rigveda, Müller's edition, vol. i. p. 4.
[212] Rigveda, Müller's edition, vol. i. p. 22.

The Brāhmaṇas, however, as I have said, notwithstanding their antiquity, and the authority which is ascribed to them as a constituent part of the Veda, are far from being so old as the hymns. On the subject of these works Professor Roth makes some remarks in his Introduction to the Nirukta, p. xxiv. ff.; which I translate with some abridgments.[215]

"The difference in contents between the Brāhmaṇas and the Kalpa-books, if judged according to detached passages, might appear to be very small and indeterminate, though even at first sight it is undeniable that the two classes of writings are easily distinguishable as regards their position and estimation in the whole body of religious [213] See the third volume of this work, pp. 84, note 89, 179, f., 290, and 312.

[214] On the difference in authority between the Brāhmaṇas and the Sūtras, etc., see Müller's "Ancient Sanskrit Literature," pp. 75-107.

[215] I refer for further information to Prof. Müller's section on the Brāhmaṇas in his "Ancient Sanskrit Literature," particularly to pp. 342, ff., 389, 428, 429, 431–435.

literature. In fact, the difference between them is most essential. Though both treat of divine worship in its widest extent, yet in the Brāhmaṇa it is the subject of description in quite a different sense from what it is in the Kalpa-śāstra. The object of the latter is to represent the whole course of the sacred rites which have a place in any particular department of worship, e.g. it defines exactly which of the priests present at a ceremony has to perform a part at each point of the sacred rite. This is a very essential matter in Indian sacrifices. . . . It is further prescribed in these works what hymns and invocations are to be uttered, and how. As a rule, however, the strophes are indicated only by the initial words, and pre-suppose other collections in which they must have been put together according to the order of their employment in worship. . . . Finally, these works prescribe the time, the place, the forms, of the rites of worship, with all the preceding and following practices. In short, the Kalpa-books are complete systems of ritual prescription, which have no other object than to designate the entire course of the sacred ceremonial with all that accuracy which is demanded for acts done in the presence of the gods, and to their honour.

"The aim of a Brāhmaṇa is something very different. As its name indicates, its subject is the 'brahma,' the sacred element in the rite, not the rite itself. Something holy, the conception of the divine, lies veiled beneath the ceremony. It has now obtained a sensible form, which must, however, remain a mystery for those to whom that conception is unknown. He only who knows the divinity, its manifestation and its relation to men, can explain the signification of the symbol. Such an explanation the Brāhmaṇa aims at giving; it proposes to unfold the essence of theological wisdom, which is hidden under the mode of worship inherited from ancient times. From this cause arises the mysterious, concise, often dark, style of the language which we find in these books. They are, indeed, the oldest prose which is preserved to us in Indian literature.

"An example of these symbolical explanations is subjoined, from the beginning of the Aitareya-brāhmaṇa:—At the commencement of certain sacrifices, clarified butter is offered to Agni and Vishṇu in eleven platters. This is done by preference to these two deities, the Brāhmaṇa explains, because they embrace the whole pantheon, Agni as the lowest of the gods (the fire of the hearth and altar), and Vishṇu as the highest (the sun in the zenith); and thus sacrifice is offered to all the gods in the persons of these two. Eleven platters are presented, though there are only two gods; eight of the platters are claimed by Agni, because the gāyatrī, the metre sacred to him, has eight syllables; three platters belong to Vishṇu, because he traverses the heavens in three strides (the three stations of his rising, his culmination, and his setting).

"Such explanations may as frequently be the mere inventions of a religious philosophy (encountered by us here in its oldest form), which delights in bold parallels, and a pretentious exegesis, as actual recollections of the beginnings of the liturgy, in which, among a people like the Indians, we may reasonably expect to find delicate and thoughtful references. These books will always continue to be to us the most valuable sources for tracing the beginnings of thought on divine things; and, at the same time, sources from which we may draw the most varied information regarding the conceptions on which the entire system of worship, as well as the social and hierarchical order, of India, are founded. In proof of this, I will only refer to the lights which may be derived from the seventh and eighth books of the Aitareya-brāhmaṇa on the position of the castes, and on the regal and sacerdotal dignities. The Brāhmaṇas are the dogmatical books of the Brāhmans; not a scientifically marshalled system of tenets, but a collection of dogmas, as they result from religious practice. They were not written as a complete exposition of the principles of belief; but they are necessary towards such an exposition, because they were meant to explain and establish the whole customary ceremonial of worship.

"It is impossible not to perceive that the Brāhmaṇas are based upon a pre-existing, widely-ramified, and highly-developed system of worship. The further the practice of sacred institutions has advanced, the less distinctly are those who practise them conscious of their meaning. Gradually, around the central portion of the ceremony, which in its origin was perfectly transparent and intelligible, there grows up a mass of subordinate observances, which in proportion as they are developed in detail, become more loosely connected with the fundamental thought. The form, becoming more independent, loses its symbolical purport. The Indian worship had already reached such a stage, when the religious reflection exhibited in the Brāhmaṇas began to work upon it. Here, as in all the other religious systems of antiquity, the observation is verified that it is not religious dogmas, and reflection upon these, that give birth to forms of worship, but that it is religious worship, which (itself the product of religious feeling, inspired by, and become subservient to, a conception of the divine) becomes, in its turn, the parent of a more developed and firmly defined theology. Such was the relation of the Brāhmaṇas to the current worship. The Brāhmaṇa does not appeal to the dicta of the sacred hymns as its own first and most immediate source, but rather rests upon the customary ceremonial, and upon the earlier conceptions of that ceremonial. The Aitareya-brāhmaṇa, for instance, from which I borrow details, appeals not only to authorities (to whom written compositions are never ascribed), such as the Ṛishi Śrauta (vii. 1); Saujāta, son of Arāḷha (vii. 22); Rāma, son of Mṛigū (vii. 34); Maitreya, son of Kushāru (viii. 38), etc., or to preceding sacrificial ceremonials of the same kind; but further, the whole form of its representation is based upon the tradition of earlier custom. Its customary formula for this, which is continually recurring at the head of a new passage, is tadā "hus, 'it is further said,' or atho khalv āhus, 'it is moreover said;' and frequent reference is made to difference of opinions; 'so do or say the one set of persons, and the others otherwise.' But I have never met with a citation of an older writing.

"Taking all this into consideration, we may conclude that the Brāhmaṇas belong to a stage in the religious development of India when the Brahmanical faith was full-blown. Those religious conceptions and sacred usages, which, even in the hymns of the Rigveda, we can see advancing from a simple and unconnected form to compact and multiform shapes, have now spread themselves over the entire life of the people, and in the hands of the priests have become a power predominant over everything else."

It thus appears that the Brāhmaṇas, though they have come to be regarded as parts of the Veda, are yet in time far posterior to the hymns, from which, further, they differ entirely in character, and to a great extent in language, but which they constantly presuppose, and to which they allude in every page. Thus in the Brāhmaṇas we have such expressions continually recurring as, "Thus did the ṛishi say."[216] "Hence this has been declared by the ṛishi."[217] "Ṛishis of the Rigveda have uttered this hymn of fifteen verses."[218] And in Sāyaṇa's Introduction to the Rigveda it is stated as follows (Comment. on R.V., vol. i. p. 2):—Tathā cha sarva-veda-gatāni brāhmaṇāni svābhihite 'rthe viśvāsa-dāḍhyāya "tad etad ṛichā 'bhyanūktam" iti ṛicham eva udāharanti | "And so the Brāhmaṇas connected with all the Vedas, in order to strengthen belief in their assertions, refer to the Rigveda, saying, 'This is declared by the Ṛich.'"

The Śatapatha-brāhmaṇa, in a passage at p. 1052 of Weber's edition (corresponding with the Bṛihadāraṇyaka-upanishad, p. 213), refers as follows to a hymn of Vāmadeva in the fourth maṇḍala of the Rigveda:—Tad ha etat paśyann ṛishir Vāmadevaḥ pratipede "aham Manur abhavaṁ sūryaś cha" iti | "Wherefore the ṛishi Vāmadeva in vision obtained this text, 'I was Manu and the sun.'" Again, the Taittirīya Sanhitā, and the Kaushītakī, Śāṭyāyana, and Tāṇḍaka Brāhmaṇas refer to Vasishṭha, in passages already quoted in the first volume of this work, p. 328. Now, as Vasishṭha was a Vedic ṛishi, the author of numerous hymns, these Brāhmaṇas must have been later than those hymns.

To illustrate the manner in which the hymns are quoted in the Brāhmaṇas, I will only cite further a portion of the passage from the Aitareya-brāhmaṇa, vii. 13–18, relating the story of Śunaśśepa, which was first given in original in the Appendix to Professor Müller's Ancient Sanskrit Literature, pp. 581, 582, and afterwards appeared in Prof. Haug's edition of that Brāhmaṇa:—Atha ha Śunaśśepaḥ ikshāṅchakre "amānusham iva vai mā viśasishyanti | hanta aham devatāḥ upadhāvāmi" iti | sa Prajāpatim eva prathamaṁ devatānām upasasāra "kasya nūnaṁ katamasya amṛitānām" ity etayā ṛichā | tam Prajāpatir uvācha "Agnir vai devānāṁ nedishṭhaḥ | tam eva upadhāva" iti | so 'gnim upasasāra "Agner vayam prathamasya amṛitānām" ity etayā ṛichā | [When he saw the preparations made for his immolation], "Śunaśśepa reflected, 'They are about to slay me, as if I were not a man. I shall resort to the gods.' He accordingly addressed him-

[216] Iti ha sma āha ṛishiḥ |

[217] Śatap.-br. xiii., 5, 4, 5:—Tasmād etad ṛishiṇā abhyanūktam |

[218] Weber's Hist. of Ind. Lit., p. 118. Böht. and Roth's Dict., sub voce Ṛishi, Tad etad bahvṛichaḥ panchadaśarcham prāhuḥ |

self to Prajāpati, the first of the gods, with this 'ṛich' (Rigveda, i. 24, 1), 'Of whom now, of which of all the immortals,' etc. Prajāpati said to him, 'Agni is the nearest of the gods, resort to him.' He addressed himself to Agni with this 'ṛich' (Rigveda i. 24, 2), 'Of Agni, the first of the immortals,' etc." In the same way he is represented as addressing to various deities in succession the verses composing the remainder of the 24th, and the whole of the 25th, 26th and 27th hymns of the first book of the Rigveda, ending with the last verse of the 27th sūkta; "Salutation to the great! Salutation to the little!" addressed to the Viśve-devāḥ.[219]

That the Brāhmaṇas were separated from the hymns by a considerable interval of time is manifest from the various considerations which are urged in the passage just quoted (pp. 180, ff.) from Professor Roth; who informs us, for instance, that the Brāhmaṇas, besides alluding to texts in the hymns, appeal on the subject of the ritual to various preceding unwritten authorities; and states his opinion, that the "Brāhmaṇas belong to a stage in the religious development of India, when the Brahmanical faith was full-blown;" and that "those religious conceptions and sacred usages, which, even in the hymns of the Rigveda, can be seen advancing from a simple and unconnected form to compact and manifold shapes, have now [in the Brāhmaṇas] extended themselves over the entire life of the people." This process was no doubt one which required several centuries for its accomplishment.

And Professor Müller says (Anc. Sansk. Lit. pp. 432, 434), "There is throughout the Brāhmaṇas such a complete misunderstanding of the original intention of the Vedic hymns, that we can hardly understand how such an estrangement could have taken place, unless there had been at some time or other a sudden and violent break in the chain of tradition." And again: "Every page of the Brāhmaṇas contains the clearest proof that the spirit of the ancient Vedic poetry, and the purport of the original Vedic sacrifices were both beyond the comprehension of the authors of the Brāhmaṇas. . . . . We thus perceive the wide chasm between the Brāhmaṇa period and that period by which it is preceded." The Brāhmaṇa period, we have already seen (p. 164 above), is placed by him in the 200 years following the second Vedic period, that of the Mantras.

[219] Namo mahadbhyo namo arbhakebhyaḥ| See Müller's Anc. Sansk. Lit. pp. 413, ff.; Prof. Roth's article in Weber's Ind. Stud. i. 461; Prof. Wilson's article in Jour. R. A. S. vol. xiii., p. 100, and translation of the Rigveda, i. pp. 59–71; Prof. Haug's translation of the Ait. Br. pp. 460, ff.; Dr. Streiter's Diss. de Sunahsepo; and the first volume of this work, pp. 355, ff.

As time still passed on, and a further development of language and institutions took place, the Vedic hymns became less and less intelligible; and owing to the growth of formal and scrupulous ceremonial prescriptions, the application of the sacred texts to public worship became more and more difficult. As a natural consequence, the literature connected with the explanation of the Mantras, their pronunciation and their ritual uses, continued to augment. Then the different grammatical Prātiśākhya aphorisms, the Śrauta and Gṛihya ritual Sūtras, the Nighaṇṭus and Nirukta were composed. These works, as we have already seen, were the growth of several successive ages subsequent to the date of the oldest Brāhmaṇas.[220]

[220] On this subject Professor Roth remarks (Introd. to Nirukta, p. lii.) as follows:—"In Greece a similar state of things prevailed. There, with the exception of Hesiod (who never rose to the same degree of consideration), Homer was the only source of the highest knowledge, and preeminently the book of the schools; the book which gave the first occasion to grammatical, and almost every other sort of science to develope itself. In India the Veda occupies the place of Homer. It was to the Veda that the Brahmanical people looked as the sole repository of intellectual culture. As a sacred book it was the more naturally a subject of research to the learned man, as he was at the same time a priest, and it became the first problem to be solved by grammar,—a science which was far more commonly studied, and at an earlier period attained a far higher stage, in India than in Greece. At the same time, the Veda, both as regards its language and its subject-matter, stood far further removed from the Indian of the two centuries immediately preceding Buddha (700 and 600 B.C.)—in which the sacerdotal system reached its climax—than Homer did from the Greek of the Periclean era. At that period, or even earlier, were formed the collection of Homeric words which had become obsolete,—the γλωσσαι; while in India, the 'nighaṇṭavas' (a word which I conceive to be identical in meaning with γλωσσαι) had been compiled to illustrate the Veda. In both cases the collections had the same origin; but in the short interval from Pericles to the end of the Alexandrian era, the Greeks had done more for the explanation of Homer than the Indians could accomplish for the comprehension of the Veda, in the long series of ages down to the times of Sāyaṇa and Mahīdhara, in the sixteenth century A.D. The task of the Indians was, in truth, by far the more difficult; and besides, Indian scholarship lay under an incapacity of unfettered movement. It was necessary for orthodoxy to deny the facts of history, and to discover only the circumstances of the present in the monuments of antiquity; for the present was both unable and unwilling to rest on any other foundation than the traditions of an earlier age, Fourth:—When at length we ascend above the oldest of the Brāhmaṇas, and arrive at the still more ancient collections ("Sanhitās," as they are called in Sanskrit) of the Vedic hymns themselves, we shall find even here distinct proofs of a difference of age not only between the several collections viewed as aggregates, but also between different component parts of the same compilations. Of the four Vedic Sanhitās, the Ṛik, Yajush, Sāman, and Atharvan, the Ṛigveda is by far the most complete and important collection. Before, however, proceeding to give some account of its contents, I must premise a few words about the other Sanhitās.

(i.) Although the Vedas were sometimes considered to be only three in number, and the Atharvan was not always denominated a Veda, yet many of the hymns or incantations of which it is made up appear to be of great antiquity.[221]

That the title of the Atharvan to be reckoned as one of the Vedas is not so incontestable as that of the three others, will appear from the following considerations. The knowledge of the Indian Scriptures is frequently designated as the triple science trayī vidyā,[221*] a phrase which is thus explained in Messrs. Böhtlingk and Roth's Lexicon: "The threefold science was originally the knowledge of the sacred word in its triple form of hymn, sacrificial formula, and song: out of this sense subsequently arose another, viz., the knowledge of the three Vedas, which represent that threefold form." In illustration of this the writers proceed to quote or refer to the following and other texts from the Śatapatha and Aitareya Brāhmaṇas, etc. Śatap. Br. iv. 6, 7, 1: Trayī vai vidyā ṛicho yajūṁshi sāmāni iyam eva | "The Ṛich-, Yajush-, and Sāman-verses are the threefold science." Śatap. Br. vi. 3, 1, 10; x. 4, 2, 21; surrounded as these were with a halo of glory, and only half understood. The priesthood supplied the required authentic explanation, without which the reader of those ancient books would never have found in them that which he so easily discovered with that assistance. The spirit of the nation, which had been so injuriously treated, became accustomed to the yoke, and henceforward walked onwards in the track which had been marked out for it; men's feeling for history became irrecoverably lost, and they consoled themselves with the harmless enjoyment, which was still allowed them, of solving grammatical questions. We can therefore, at least, boast, by way of compensation, on behalf of the Indians, that they have far outstripped the Greeks in the department of grammar."

221 See, on the subject of this Veda, Müller's Anc. Sans. Lit., pp. 38, 446, ff., Weber's Hist. of Ind. Lit. p. 10., and Mr. Whitney's papers in the Journal of the American Oriental Society, iii. 305, ff., and iv. 254, ff. 221* See Appendix, note A.

xi. 5, 4, 18; Ait. Br. v. 32: Tebhyo 'bhitaptebhyo trayo vedāḥ ajāyanta ṛigvedaḥ eva Agner ajāyata yajurvedo Vāyoḥ sāmavedaḥ ādityāt | tān vedān abhyatapat | tebhyo 'bhitaptebhyas trīṇi śukrāṇy ajāyanta bhūr ity eva ṛigvedād ajāyata bhuvaḥ iti yajurvedāt svar iti sāmavedāt | . . . Sa Prajāpatir yajnam atanuta | tam āharat tena ayajata | sa ṛichā eva hotram akarod yajushā ādhvaryavaṁ sāmnā udgītham | yad etat trayyai vidyāyai śukraṁ tena brahmatvam akarot | "From these (lights), when heated, the three Vedas arose, the Ṛigveda from Agni, the Yajurveda from Vāyu, and the Sāmaveda from Āditya (the sun). He infused warmth into these Vedas. From them, when so heated, three essences arose. 'Bhūr,' from the Rigveda, 'Bhuvaḥ' from the Yajurveda, 'Svar,' from the Sāmaveda. . . . . This Prajāpati prepared sacrifice. He took it and worshipped with it. With the Ṛich he performed the function of the hotṛi priest, with the Yajush that of the adhvaryu, with the Sāman that of the udgātṛi, and with the essence of this triple science he executed the brāhmaṇ's function." In the same way three Vedas only are mentioned in the following passage from the Chhāndogya Upanishad[222] (iv. 17, 1), etc.:—Prajāpatir lokān abhyatapat | teshāṁ tapyamānānāṁ rasān prābṛihad Agnim pṛithivyāḥ Vāyum antarikshād Ādityaṁ divaḥ | Sa etās tisro devatāḥ abhyatapat | tāsāṁ tapyamānānāṁ rasān prābṛihad Agner ṛicho vāyor yajūṁshi Sāma Ādityāt | sa etāṁ trayīṁ vidyām abhyatapat | tasyās tapyamānāyāḥ rasān prābṛihad bhūr ity ṛigbhyo bhuvar iti yajurbhyaḥ svar iti sāmabhyaḥ | "Prajāpati infused warmth into the worlds; and from them, so heated, he drew forth their essences, Agni from the earth, Vāyu from the atmosphere, and Āditya from the sky. He infused warmth into these three deities; and from them, so heated, he drew forth their essences: Rik-texts from Agni, Yajush-texts from Vāyu, and Sāma-texts from Āditya. He infused warmth into this triplé science; and from it, so heated, he drew forth its essences, the particle Bhūr from the Rik-texts, Bhuvaḥ from the Yajush-texts, and Svar from the Sāma-texts."

In the following verse (i. 23), Manu repeats the account given in the Brāhmaṇas and the Chhāndogya Upanishad: Agni-vāyu-ravibhyas [222] See Biblioth. Ind. vol. iii. (1850) p. 288. This passage is also quoted in the third volume of this work, p. 5. See also the passage from the S'atap. Br. xi. 5, 8, 1, ff., quoted in pp. 14, f. of the same volume, where, in like manner, only three Vedas are mentioned.

tu trayam brahma sanātanam | dudoha yajna-siddhy-artham ṛig-yajuḥ-sāma-lakshaṇam | "From Agni, Vāyu, and the Sun (Ravi), he drew forth (milked) for the accomplishment of sacrifice the eternal triple Veda, distinguished as Rik, Yajush, and Sāman."

The Atharvaveda may, however, be referred to under the appellation of "chhandas," in the following passages, according to the indication of the St. Petersburg Lexicon, where the second sense of the word chhandas is thus defined: "A sacred hymn, and according to the first three texts about to be quoted, especially that sort which is neither Ṛich, Sāman, nor Yajush: hence, perhaps, originally, an incantation." The texts referred to are A.V. xi. 7, 24: Ṛichaḥ sāmāni chhandāṁsi purāṇaṁ yajushā saha | uchchhishṭāj jajnire | "The Ṛich-, Sāman-, and Chhandas-, verses, and the Purāṇa with the Yajush, sprang from the Uchchishṭa (remnant of the sacrifice)." R.V. x. 90, 9: Tasmād yajnāt sarvahutaḥ richaḥ sāmāni jajnire | chandāṁsi jajnire tasmād yajus tasmād ajāyata | "From that universal sacrifice sprang the Ṛich-, Sāman-, and Chhandas-, verses: from it sprang the Yajush." The third text is from the Harivaṁśa v. 9491: Ṛicho yajūṁshi sāmāni chhandāṁsy Ātharvaṇāni cha | chatvāro sakhilāḥ vedāḥ sarahasyāḥ savistarāḥ | "(May) the Ṛich-, Yajush-, and Sāman-, verses, and the texts of the Atharvan, the four Vedas with their Khilas (later appendages), their esoteric doctrines, and their details (preserve me)."

In the Atharvaveda itself, x. 7, 20, it is thus alluded to as one of the Vedas under the title of the Atharvans and Angirases: Yasmād richo apātakshan yajur yasmād apākashan | sāmāni yasyo lomāni Atharvāngiraso mukham | Skambhaṁ tam brūhi katamaḥ svid eva saḥ | "Tell us who is that Skambha from whom they cut off the Ṛich-verses, from whom they scraped off the Yajush-verses, of whom the Sāman-verses are the hairs, and of whom the Atharvans and Angirases form the mouth." [223]

The Atharvan is similarly mentioned in the Śatapatha-brāhmaṇa, xiii. 4, 3, 7, Tān upadiśati "Atharvāṇo vedaḥ so 'yam" iti. . . . |8| "Angiraso vedaḥ so 'yam" iti | "He teaches them thus, 'The Atharvans are a veda; it is this.' . . . (8) The Angirases are a veda; it is this." [224] Madhusūdana Sarasvatī, author of the Prasthāna-bheda, [223] In verse 14 of the same hymn, however, the other three Vedas only are named.

[224] See Muller's Anc. Sansk. Lit. p. 38.

while he calls it a Veda, notices at the same time its difference in character from the other three:—Sa cha (vedaḥ) prayoga-trayeṇa yajna-nirvāhārthaṁ rig-yajuḥ-sāma-bhedena bhinnaḥ | . . . . Atharva-vedas tu yajnānupayuktaḥ śānti-paushṭikābhichārādi-karma-pratipādakatvena atyanta-vilakshaṇaḥ eva | "The Veda is divided into Ṛik, Yajush, and Sāman, for the purpose of carrying out the sacrifice under its three different forms. . . . The Atharvaveda, on the contrary, is totally different. It is not suitable for the sacrifice, but only teaches how to appease, to bless, to curse, etc." (Müller, Sansk. Lit. p. 445). In regard to this Veda, Mr. Whitney remarks: "The Atharva is, like the Ṛik, a historical and not a liturgical collection." It was, he thinks, originally composed of only eighteen books. A sixth of the matter of which these books consist is not metrical. "Of the remainder, or metrical portion, about one-sixth is also found among the hymns of the Ṛik, and mostly in the tenth book of the latter; the rest is peculiar to the Atharva. . . . The greater portion of them are plainly shown, both by their language and internal character, to be of much later date than the general contents of the other historic Veda, and even than its tenth book, with which they yet stand nearly connected in import and origin. The condition of the text also in those passages found likewise in the Ṛik, points as distinctly to a more recent period as that of their collection. This, however, would not necessarily imply that the main body of the Atharva hymns were not already in existence when the compilation of the Ṛik took place. Their character would be ground enough for their rejection and exclusion from the canon, until other and less scrupulous hands were found to undertake their separate gathering into an independent collection. The nineteenth book is . . . made up of matter of a like nature which had either been left out when they were compiled, or had been since produced." (Journal of the American Oriental Society, iv. 253, 255.) The priority of the Rigveda to the Atharva may also be argued from the fact that the ṛishis of the hymns in the Rigveda are referred to in the Atharvaveda as men of an earlier period; in proof of which I may refer to the passages quoted in the first volume of this work, p. 330. It is true that the same thing is noticeable to some degree in the Rigveda itself, in some later hymns of which the ṛishis of earlier hymns are referred to by name. In the Atharvaveda, however, the names so specified are chiefly those of the more recent ṛishis, while many of the personages referred to in the Rigveda appear to belong to a more primitive age. (See Roth's Litt. und Gesch. des Weda, p. 13.) In the former Veda, too, the Indian institutions appear in a somewhat more developed state than in the Rigveda. There is one point at least in which this development seems to be visible, viz. in the caste system, see the first volume of this work, pp. 280-289. The following extract from Weber's History of Indian Literature, p. 10, will exhibit his opinion of the general difference which exists between the Rigveda and the Atharvaveda: "The origin of the Atharva-sanhitā falls within the period when Brahmanism had become dominant. . . . . Many of the hymns which it contains are to be found also in the Rik-sanhitā, but there they are recent interpolations originating in the period when its compilation took place; while in the Atharva collection they are the just and proper expression of the present. The spirit of the two collections is entirely different. In the Rik there breathes a lively natural feeling, a warm love for nature; while in the Atharva, on the contrary, there predominates an anxious apprehension of evil spirits and their magical powers. In the Rik we see the people in the exercise of perfect freedom and voluntary activity; while in the Atharva we observe them bound in the fetters of the hierarchy and of superstition."[224*]

(ii.) The Sāmaveda is a collection of separate texts to be chanted at particular parts of the sacrifice;[225] which, with the exception of a few, are all to be found in different parts of the Rigveda, especially the 8th and 9th maṇḍalas. In the Rigveda we find the entire hymns: in the first part of the Sāmaveda we find only isolated verses of those hymns, dislocated from their natural connexion; though in the second part the extracts are connected, and of greater length. It is not, however, quite clear whether the Sāma collection or the Rik collection may have been first made. Weber remarks (Hist. of Ind. Lit., pp. 9, 62), that the texts of the Sāmaveda frequently exhibit more ancient grammatical forms than those of the Rigveda, and suggests that as the former contains no extracts from any of the later hymns of the latter, it may have been compiled before these later pieces had been composed; but adds that this point has not been yet investigated.[226] Whitney also leaves the question undecided (Journ. Am. Or. Society, iv. 253, 254).

[224*] See Appendix, Note B.

[225] See Muller, pp. 472-3.

Müller, on the other hand, says (Anc. Sansk. Lit., p. 457):—"The other two Saṁhitās were more likely the production of the Brāhmaṇa period. These two Vedas, the Yajurveda and the Sāmaveda, were, in truth, what they are called in the Kaushītakī-brāhmaṇa, the attendants of the Rigveda."[227] He supposes that the hymns found in the three Vedas were not "collected at three times by three independent collectors. If so, their differences would have been greater than they are." Their actual differences are rather those of Śākhās or branches, he thinks, than of independent Saṁhitās or collections.

(iii.) Both the Saṁhitās of the Yajurveda are collections of sacrificial formulas in prose, as well as of verses which are partly extracted

[226] In his Ind. Stud. i. 63, f. the same author writes as follows:—"As regards the relation of the Sāmaveda to the Rigveda, we must clearly represent to ourselves the manner in which in general these hymns arose, how they were then carried to a distance by the tribes when they migrated further, and were then regarded as sacred; whilst in the country where they were produced, they either, as living in the immediate popular consciousness, underwent alterations, or made way for new hymns, and were thus displaced and fell into oblivion. It is only a foreign country which surrounds what was produced at home with a sacred enchantment. The emigrants remain at the old stage, preserving what is ancient with painful exactness; whilst at home life opens out for itself new paths. New emigrants follow the first from their home, join those already settled in the new seats; and now the old and the new songs and rites are blended together, and exactly, but uncritically, learned by travelling scholars from different masters, and then inculcated (on this point several stories of the Bṛihad Āranyaka are especially instructive), so that a varied intermixture arises. Others again, more learned, endeavour to introduce arrangement, to bring together things which are related, to separate what is diverse; and thus a theological intolerance is generated, without which the fixation of a text or a canon is impossible. We should not overlook the influence of courts in this process, e.g. of Janaka, King of Videha, who had found in Yājnavalkya his Homer. Neither the Purāṇas nor the Charanavyūha afford us the means of arriving at an approximately clear insight into the mutual relations of the different schools, which could only be attained by a comparison of the different teachers named in the Brāhmaṇas and Sūtras with one another, as well as with the text of Pāṇini and the Gaṇapāṭha and Scholium thereto belonging. . . . Further, the relation between the Rigveda and the Sāmaveda presents a certain analogy to that between the white and the black Yajush; and as we frequently see the teachers who represent the latter abused in the Brāhmaṇa of the former, it cannot surprise us if the Panigins and Kaushītakins [teachers connected with the Rigveda] are similarly treated in the Sāmaveda Brāhmaṇa."

[227] Tat-paricharaṇāv itarau vedau | vi. 11.

from the Rigveda. There is, however, this difference between the white (or Vājasaneyi) and black (or Taittirīya) Yajurveda Sanhitās, that the latter has partly the character of a Brāhmaṇa, although there is also a separate Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa. Many parts of the Yajurveda exhibit a more advanced development of religious institutions and observances than the Rigveda. Professor Weber, the editor of this Veda,[228] considers (Hist. of Ind. Lit. p. 10), that it "belongs to a period when the Brahmanical element had already become predominant, though it was still exposed to strenuous opposition; and when, at all events, the Brahmanical hierarchy and the system of castes had been completely formed." The same writer tells us (pp. 106, 107), that "the 30th book of the Vājasaneyi-sanhitā of the Yajurveda, in enumerating the different classes of men who are to be consecrated at the Purushamedha, or Human sacrifice, refers to the names of most of the Indian mixed castes, so that we may thence conclude that a complete consolidation of the Brahmanical system had taken place." The Vājasaneyi-sanhitā is divided into forty Adhyāyas or sections, of which Weber thinks (Hist. of Ind. Lit. pp. 103, 104), that those from the 19th to the 25th may be later than the first eighteen; while there is, he remarks, no doubt that the last fifteen adhyāyas are later, and perhaps much later, than the rest of the collection. This is proved by this portion of the Sanhitā being called a Khila, or supplement, both in the anukramaṇī or index, which is ascribed to Kātyāyana, and also in Mahīdhara's Commentary on the Veda.[229] A further proof of the posteriority in date of the last parts of the Vājasaneyi-sanhitā is, Weber [228] In his Hist. of Ind. Lit. p. 140, Weber tells us that "in the Anukramaṇī of Kātyāyana to the Vājasaneyi-sanhitā of the Yajurveda, the authors (rishis) assigned to the particular verses (ṛich) usually coincide with the authors assigned to the same verses in the Anukramaṇī of the Rigveda; but that there are many exceptions to this remark. In particular (as happens also in the Rig-anukramaṇī) the name of the author appears often to be borrowed from some word occurring in the verse. And in the case (a very frequent one) of a verse being repeated in another part of the Vāj.-san., it is often assigned to an author different from the one to whom it had previously been ascribed. Many of the ṛishis here referred to do not occur among those of the Rigveda, and belong to a later stage than the latter; and among these ṛishis peculiar to the Vājasaneyi-sanhitā there are several who are named in the S'atapatha-brāhmaṇa as teachers."

[229] The words of Mahīdhara at the commencement of the 26th adhyāya are as follows: Idānīm khilāny uchyante | "The Khilas are now to be explained." See also Müller's Sansk. Lit., p. 358.

observes, derived from the fact that they are not found in the Sanhitá of the Black Yajurveda, but only in its Brâhmaṇa or in its Âraṇyaka parts, which by their very character are in date subsequent to the Sanhitá (p. 104). Weber is further of opinion (pp. 44, 105 and 106), that the names (Îśâna and Mahâdeva) assigned to the god Rudra in adhyâya 39, in addition to those by which he is designated in adhyâya 16 (where he is regarded as the divinity of fire, though addressed by many of the epithets which were subsequently applied to the god Śiva), indicate a more advanced stage in the worship of the deity in question at the time when adhyâya 39 was composed, than at the period when adhyâya 16 was written. Professor Müller thinks that "there is nothing to prove that the hymn book of the Vâjasaneyins [the Vâjasaneyi-sanhitá] existed previous to their Brâhmaṇa" [the Śatapatha]. Sansk. Lit. p. 360.

(iv.) We come now to the Rigveda-sanhitá, which contains the most extensive collection of the most ancient Vedic hymns in their complete form. It is divided into ten maṇḍalas, and contains in all 1017 hymns (Müller, p. 497). "The Vedas," says Mr. Whitney (Journ. Am. Or. Soc., iii. 295), "contain the songs in which the first ancestors of the Hindû people, at the very dawn of their existence as a separate nation, while they were still only on the threshold of the great country which they were afterwards to fill with their civilization, praised the gods, extolled heroic deeds, and sang of other matters which kindled their poetical fervour.[230] . . . The mass, as it lies before us, is almost exclusively of a religious character; this may have had its ground partly in the end for which the collections were afterwards made, but it is probably in a far higher degree due to the character of the people itself, which thus shows itself to have been at the beginning what it continued to be throughout its whole history, an essentially religious one. . . . Hymns of a very different character are not entirely wanting, and this might be taken as an indication that, had they been more numerous, more would have been preserved to us."[231]

[230] See also, for an account of the contents of the hymns, Professor Wilson's Introduction to his translation of the Rigveda, p. xxiv. ff.; and for numerous specimens, the other volumes of this work, passim.

[231] See my art. "Miscellaneous Hymns from the Rig and Atharva Vedas," in the Journal of the Royal As. Soc., vol. ii. (new series) pp. 26, ff. and the fifth volume

These hymns are said, by later Indian writers, to have been "seen" by the ancient ṛishis or bards. Thus the Nirukta says (ii. 11): Ṛishir darśanāt | "stomān dadarśa" ity Aupamanyavaḥ | tad yad enāṁs "tapasyamānān Brahma svayambhv abhy-ānarshat te ṛishayo 'bhavan | tad ṛishīṇām ṛishitvam" iti vijnāyate | "'A rishi is so called from seeing. He saw the hymns:'—This is Aupamanyava's explanation. They became ṛishis, because Brahma, the self-existent, manifested himself to them when they were sunk in devotion. From this, as is generally understood, they acquired their character of ṛishis." There is, however, no doubt that the ṛishis were themselves the authors of these ancient songs, which they addressed to the gods when they were solicitous to obtain any blessing; or composed on other occasions. The scope of these hymns or mantras is well summed up in the following passage from the Anukramaṇī (index) to the Rigveda, quoted by Colebrooke (Misc. Essays, i. p. 26):—Arthepsavaḥ ṛishayo devatāś chhandobhir abhyadhāvan | "The ṛishis, desiring [various] objects, hastened to the gods with metrical prayers." It is also said in the Nirukta, vii. 1:—Yat-kāmaḥ ṛishir yasyāṁ devatāyām arthapatyam ichhan stutim prayunkte tad-devataḥ sa mantro bhavati | "The hymn has for its deity the particular god to whom the ṛishi, seeking to obtain any particular object which he longs for, addresses his praises." The compositions of one of the ṛishis, Paruchhepa,[232] are distinguished by the repetition of some of the preceding words at the close of the lines. This peculiarity is thus noticed in the Nirukta, x. 42:—Abhyāse bhūyāṁsam artham manyante yathā, "aho darśanīya, aho darśanīya." Tat Paruchhepasya śīlam: Paruchhepaḥ ṛishiḥ. "Some consider that greater force is added to a sentiment by repetition, as in the expression, 'O beautiful, O beautiful.' This was Paruchhepa's turn of mind. He was a ṛishi." Here Yāska, the author of the Nirukta, speaks of a particular mode of composition as peculiar to Paruchhepa, one of the Vedic ṛishis. But if the form of the composition was the result of the ṛishi's own particular genius (śīlam), he must have done more than "see" the hymn; he must himself of this work, pp. 421, ff. Professor Aufrecht remarks (Ind. Studien, iv. 8), that "possibly only a small portion of the Vedic poems may have been preserved to us in the Ṛik-sanhitā."

[232] See the third volume of this work, p. 212.

have determined its particular form. The hymn could not therefore have existed eternally,[233] expressed in its present words. Yāska, therefore, appears to be inconsistent with himself, when he states this doctrine in other passages, as x. 10, 46, where he says, ṛisher dṛishṭārthasya prītir ākhyāna-saṁyuktā: "Here the ṛishi, after he had beheld the contents [of a hymn], expresses his pleasure in narration." If, indeed, we are to understand by the word artha, "contents," that the matter of the hymn only, without the words, was revealed, there will be no inconsistency. See, in addition to the passages quoted here, those adduced in the third volume of this work, pp. 211, f.

For many ages the successive generations of these ancient ṛishis continued to make new contributions to the stock of hymns, while they carefully preserved those which had been handed down to them by their forefathers.[234] The fact of this successive composition of the [233] See the third volume of this work, pp. 71, ff., 91, f., and 208.

[234] "The Indian Āryas were disposed to piety, both by their natural character and by the institutions of Manu. They were sustained in these sentiments by the chiefs of certain families in which their religious traditions had been more especially preserved. In those primitive ages the political system was precisely the same as that which Homer depicts;—kings the veritable shepherds of their people; cultivators or herdsmen united around their chiefs, and prepared, whenever necessity arose, to transform themselves into warriors; numerous flocks and a profusion of rural wealth; towns which were only large villages. Some of these villages served as retreats to renowned sages, who, while their dependents were tending their fields and flocks, were themselves engaged in the cultivation of sacred science, in the company of their sons, or their pupils, and fulfilled the functions of a Calchas or a Tiresias to some Indian Agamemnon or Œdipus in their neighbourhood. Invited by the chiefs to perform sacrifice, they arrived with their sacred retinue; they ascended the mountain where an inclosure of lattice-work had been constructed; for temples were then unknown. There, beneath the vault of heaven, they recited their hereditary songs, or a newly-composed hymn; they invoked the grand agents in nature to grant success to the labours of the field, increase to the flocks, and a succession of brave and virtuous descendants. They implored, they threatened their gods; and when the sacred rites had been scrupulously performed, they retired loaded with gifts, carrying away cows, horses, and cars filled with provisions, gold, and precious stuffs. We see thus by what fortune these hymns have been preserved, forming as they did, a patrimony to certain families, a species of productive capital, which it was their interest to turn to the very best account. Composed on certain recognized and venerable themes, and sometimes retouched and renovated by the imagination of a new bard, they grew old, as they were transmitted from age to age, bearing on them, sometimes, the date of their composition, which was indicated by the name of the inspired author, or of some generous prince." Langlois, French translation of Rigveda, vol. i., pref. pp. x, xi. See also Mr. Whitney's remarks in the Journal of the Am. Or. Soc., iv. 249.

hymns is evident from the ancient index (anukramaṇī) to the Rigveda, as continually quoted in the commentary of Sāyaṇa, which shows that these compositions are ascribed to different generations of the same families, as their "seers." For example, some of the hymns of the 3rd maṇḍala are assigned to Gāthin, the father of Viśvāmitra, others to Viśvāmitra himself, others to Ṛishabha, his son, others again to Kaṭa, his descendant, and others to Utkila, of the race of Kaṭa. Here we have the "seers" of hymns extending over five generations or more. The same fact, viz. that a long interval elapsed between the composition of the different hymns, is manifest from various passages in these compositions themselves.[235] Thus the second verse of the first hymn of the 1st maṇḍala of the Rigveda is to the following effect: Agniḥ pūrvebhir ṛishibhir īḍyo nūtanair uta | sa devān ā iha vakshati | "Let Agni, who is to be worshipped by the former ṛishis, and by the recent ones, bring hither the gods."[236] There are many other verses alluding to a difference of antiquity in the hymns and their authors. Such are the following (R.V. i. 48, 14):—Ye chid hi tvām ṛishayaḥ pūrve ūtaye juhūre | "The former ṛishis who invoked thee for succour," etc. (R.V. i. 62, 13) Sanāyate Gotamaḥ Indra navyam atakshad brahma hari-yojanāya | "Nodhas, a Gotama, has fabricated this new prayer to thee, O Indra, who art from of old, that thou mayest yoke thy coursers," etc.[237] (R.V. iii. 32, 13) Yaḥ stomebhir vavṛidhe pūrvyebhir yo madhyamebhir uta nūtanebhiḥ | "Who [Indra] has grown through praises, ancient, middle, and modern."[238] (R.V. vi. 44, 13) Yaḥ [235] This subject is more fully treated in the third volume of this work, pp. 217, ff.

[236] The comment of Yāska on this passage (Nirukta vii. 16) is as follows: Agnir yaḥ pūrvair ṛishibhir īlitavyo vanditavyaḥ asmābhiś navataraiḥ sa devān iha āvahatv iti | "Let Agni, who is to be worshipped, reverenced, by the former ṛishis, and by us the more modern ones, bring the gods hither." Sāyaṇa annotates thus on the passage: Ayam Agniḥ "pūrvebhiḥ" purātanair Bhṛigv-angiraḥ-prabhṛitibhir "īḍyaḥ" stutyo "nūtanair uta" idānīntanair asmābhir api stutyaḥ | "This Agni, who is to be worshipped, i.e. celebrated, by the former, i.e. the ancient ṛishis, Bhṛigu, Angiras, and the rest, and by the recent, i.e. the present [ṛishis], ourselves also," etc.

[237] "Navyam" nūtanam "brahma" etat sūkta-rūpaṁ stotraṁ "no" asmad-artham "atakshad" akarot | Sāyaṇa. "Fabricated, i.e. made for us this new brahma, i.e. praise in the form of this sūkta." The same verb taksh is also applied to the composition of hymns in R.V. i. 109, 1; ii. 19, 8; and vi. 32, 1.

[238] Purātanaiḥ | madhye bhavaiḥ | asmābhiḥ kriyamānair adhunātanaiḥ stotraiḥ | "Praises ancient, intermediate, and formed by us at present." This verse is referred to by Müller, p. 482.

pūrvyābhir uta nūtanābhir gīrbhir vavṛidhe gṛiṇatām ṛishīṇām | "He [Indra] who has grown by the ancient and modern hymns of the ṛishis who praised him." (R.V. vii. 22, 9) Ye cha pūrve ṛishayo ye cha nūtnāḥ Indra brahmāṇi janayanta viprāḥ | "O Indra, the wise ṛishis, both ancient and modern, have generated prayers." (R.V. x. 23, 6) Stomaṁ te Indra Vimadāḥ ajīījanan apūrvyam purutamaṁ sudānave | "The Vimadas have generated,[239] O Indra, for thee, the beneficent, a copious hymn, before unheard."

In the Vājasaneyi-sanhitā of the Yajurveda (xviii. 52), we meet with the following text: Imau tu pakshāv ajarau patatriṇau yābhyāṁ rakshāṁsi apahaṁsi Agne | tābhyām patema sukṛitām u lokaṁ yatra ṛishayo jagmuḥ prathamajāḥ purāṇāḥ | "But these undecaying feathered pinions, with which, O Agni, thou slayest the Rakshases,—with them let us ascend to the world of the righteous, whither the earliest-born ancient ṛishis have gone."[240] The writer of this verse was himself a ṛishi, and it is clear, according to his statement, that long before his time other ṛishis had gone to the regions of the blessed.

And in the Rigveda we find reference made in numerous hymns to earlier ṛishis (who themselves are yet declared by later writers to have been authors of hymns included in the same Veda) having been delivered by the gods in ancient times. Thus Atri, the author of several Vedic hymns (37, 38, 39, 40, 43, 85, and 86, of the 5th maṇḍala), Kaṇva, the author of hymns 37–43 of the 1st maṇḍala, and Vasishṭha, the author of the greater part of the 7th maṇḍala, are spoken of in several other hymns, e.g. in maṇḍala i. 112, 7, 9, 16; i. 117, 3, 8; i. 118, 7, as if they belonged to an earlier age.

The descendants of the most celebrated ṛishis would, no doubt, form complete collections of the hymns which had been composed by their respective ancestors. After being thus handed down, with little alteration, in the families of the original authors for several centuries, during which many of them were continually applied to the purposes

[239] The verb ajīījanan, "generated," as applied to hymns, also occurs in R.V. viii. 77, 4, and viii. 84, 5. See also Sāmaveda, ii. 108, 109, and 1059, with Benfey's translation and note, p. 245.

[240] On the last words the commentator on v. 58 annotates: "Prathamajāḥ" pūrvotpannāḥ | "purāṇāḥ" purā 'pi navāḥ ajarāmarāḥ ṛishayo yatra loke jagmuḥ | "The world whither the ṛishis, first-born, i.e. earliest-produced, ancient, i.e. in former times, also, young, imperishable, and immortal, have gone."

of religious worship, these hymns, which had been gathering an accumulated sanctity throughout all this period, were at length collected in one great body of sacred literature, styled the Sanhitā of the Rigveda—a work which in the Purāṇas is assigned to Vedavyāsa, and one of his pupils.[241]

As the process of hymn composition continued thus to go on for many centuries, it was likely that the collection, when finally completed, would contain many comparatively new hymns, written just before the canon was closed. Even after this latter event took place, we find that some hymns were composed which must have had some pretensions to a sacred character, as, though not admitted into the canon of the Rigveda, they are found copied as Khilas or later additions, at the end of some of the sections in the manuscripts of that work; and some passages from them are, as Professor Müller informs me, inserted in the other three Vedas, and are enjoined by Āśvalāyana to be employed on particular occasions, in the ceremonial of sacrifice. Whether or not these Khilas are the oldest extant compositions after those included in the Vedic collections (and their style shows them not to be all so), they must at least, from the position which they have gained of the Vedic apocrypha, be regarded as a link connecting the Vedic hymns with the later parts of Indian literature.

The hymns in the Rik-sanhitā which bear the most modern character, and which from their age stand chronologically nearest to the Khilas just alluded to, are (according to Professor Müller, p. 484) those in which reference is made to a complicated ceremonial, to a great variety of priests with different functions and appellations, or in which the liberality of royal patrons to the sacerdotal class is the theme of celebration. One composition, of which the modern character is acknowledged by most critics,[242] is the so-called Purusha Sūkta, the 90th hymn of the 10th mandala (quoted in pp. 6–11 of the first volume of this work), which Mr. Colebrooke[243] characterizes in the following terms:—

[241] "I suppose that at different and unknown epochs, on the invitation of some prince, learned and pious persons must have been charged to collect the hymns composed for the use of the several sacerdotal families, and to arrange them in a certain order consistent with the maintenance of the texts. When we observe the spirit which has directed these collectors, we can comprehend how there should be so many repetitions both in the ideas and the words. The ancient bards had borrowed from each other many thoughts which the compilers of different eras have scrupulously reproduced." Langlois, French translation of Rigveda, vol. i., pref. p. xiii.

[242] Prof. Haug is an exception. See the first volume of this work, p. 11.

"That remarkable hymn is in language, metre, and style, very different from the rest of the prayers with which it is associated. It has a decidedly more modern tone; and must have been composed after the Sanskrit language had been refined, and its grammar and rhythm perfected. The internal evidence which it furnishes, serves to demonstrate the important fact that the compilation of the Vedas, in their present arrangement, took place after the Sanskrit tongue had advanced from the rustic and irregular dialect in which the multitude of hymns and prayers of the Vedas was composed, to the polished and sonorous language in which the mythological poems, sacred and profane (purāṇas and cāvyas), have been written." (See also the remarks made on this hymn by Prof. Müller, Anc. Sansk. Lit. p. 571.) The last-named author thinks it is a mistake to regard any hymn as modern, merely from the presence in it of philosophical ideas. But I must refer to his own work, pp. 556, ff., for a statement of his views on this point.

The sketch which I have now given of Sanskrit literature shows that we can trace it back, by a series of almost continuous links up to the period of its rise.[244] If the Vedic hymns cannot be connected immediately with the literature which follows next after them, they are at least separated from it by no very distant interval; and they are evidently the natural product of the same fertile Indian mind which afterwards gave birth to the Brāhmaṇas, the Upanishads, the Darśanas, and the different epic and mythological poems.

In the Rigveda we possess, as has been already remarked, a collection of hymns which were composed during many successive generations, but its most ancient portions constitute the earliest of all the extant remains of Indian authorship, and not only display to us the Sanskrit language in the oldest phase in which we can ever see it [243] Misc. Ess., i. 309, note.

[244] It may, perhaps, be thought that this subject has been treated at a length disproportioned to the purpose which I have immediately in view, viz., to trace the mutations of the Sanskrit language. But a full exhibition of the character and antiquity of the Vedic hymns, and of the relation in which they stand to the other parts of Indian literature, will be found to form a necessary basis for various other discussions which will appear in the sequel of this work, and I have deemed the present a convenient opportunity for its introduction.

exhibited, but also afford us some of the most authentic materials which we can ever obtain for our researches into the earliest history, religious and political, of the Indian people, and into their pre-historical relations with the other branches of the Indo-European family.

Fifth:—If any further proof be wanted of the greater antiquity of the Vedic hymns, as compared with the other books esteemed more or less sacred by the Hindus, as, for instance, the epic poems and the Purāṇas, it may be found in the great difference between the mythological systems which are discoverable in these two classes of works respectively. As I return to this subject in another volume of this work (the fourth), I may content myself with a very summary notice of it at present. The following extracts from Professor H. H. Wilson's introduction to the first volume of his translation of the Rigveda, pp. xxiv, xxvii, will give some idea of the difference to which I allude:—

"The next question is, who are the gods to whom the praises and prayers [in the Rigveda] are addressed? And here we find also a striking difference between the mythology of the Rigveda and that of the heroic poems and Purāṇas. The divinities worshipped are not unknown to later systems, but they there perform very subordinate parts, whilst those deities who are the great gods—the Dii majores—of the subsequent period, are either wholly unnamed in the Veda, or are noticed in an inferior and different capacity. The names of Śiva, of Mahādeva, of Durgā, of Kālī, of Rāma, of Kṛishṇa, never occur, as far as we are yet aware; we have a Rudra, who, in after times, is identified with Śiva, but who, even in the Purāṇas, is of very doubtful origin and identification, whilst in the Veda he is described as the father of the winds, and is evidently a form of either Agni or Indra; the epithet Kaparddin,[245] which is applied to him, appears, indeed, to have some relation to a characteristic attribute of Śiva,—the wearing of his hair in a peculiar braid; but the term has probably in the Veda a different signification — one now forgotten,—although it may have suggested in aftertime the appearance of Śiva in such a head-dress, as identified with Agni; for instance, Kaparddin may intimate his head being surrounded by radiating flame, or the word may be an interpolation; at any rate, no other epithet applicable to Śiva occurs, and there is not the slightest allusion to the form in which, for the last ten centuries at least, he seems to have been almost exclusively worshipped in India—that of the Linga or Phallus; neither is there the slightest hint of another important feature of later Hinduism, the Trimūrtti, or Tri-une combination of Brahmā, Vishṇu, and Śiva, as typified by the mystical syllable Om, although, according to high authority on the religions of antiquity, the Trimūrtti was the first element in the faith of the Hindus, and the second was the Lingam. —Creuzer, 'Religions de l'Antiquité,' book i. chap. i. p. 140."

[245] [This epithet occurs in the following passage, verse i. of Sūkta 114, Maṇḍala 1st:—Imāh Rudrāya tavase kapardine kshayadvīrāya prabharāmahe matīḥ | yathā śam asad dvipade chatushpade viśvam pushṭaṁ grāme asminn anāturam | i.e. "We offer these praises to the strong Rudra, with the braided hair, the destroyer of heroes, in order that health may be enjoyed by bipeds and quadrupeds, and that all beings in this village may be well nourished, and exempt from disease." The same epithet kapardin is also applied to Pūshan in R.V. vi. 55, 2, and ix. 67, 11. See the fifth volume of this work, pp. 177 and 462.—J.M]

Even so late as the time when the Śatapatha-brāhmaṇa was composed, the names afterwards appropriated to Mahādeva were applied to Agni, as appears from the following passage, i. 7, 3, 8, p. 70 :—Agnir vai devaḥ | tasya etāni nāmāni "S'arvaḥ" iti yathā Prāchyāḥ ākhakshate "Bhavaḥ" iti yathā Bāhīkāḥ "Paśūnām patiḥ" "Rudraḥ" "Agnir" iti | tāny asya aśāntāny eva itarāṇi nāmāni | "Agnir" ity eva śāntatamaṃ | "Agni is a god. These are his names, viz., 'Sarva,' as the eastern people call him; 'Bhava,' as the Bāhīkas; 'Paśūnām pati,' 'the lord of animals'; 'Rudra;' and 'Agni.' These others are his ill-omened names. Agni is his mildest appellation." (See Weber's Indische Studien, i. 189, ii. 19-22, 37, 302; the Śatapatha-brāhmaṇa, vi. 1, 3, 10-17, ix. 1, 1, 1, 2, quoted in pp. 283, ff. and 289, f., of the fourth volume of this work; and Jour. Am. Or. Soc. iii. 319.)[246]

[246] I add here some passages not adduced in my fourth volume. The Taittirīya Sanhitā, i. 5, 1, 1, has the following "ākhyāyikā" (little story): Devāsurāḥ saṁyattāḥ āsan | te devāḥ vijayam upayanto 'gnau vāmaṁ vasu sannyadadhata "idam u no bhavishyati yadi no jeshyanti" iti | tad Agnir nyakāmayata | tena apākrāmat | tad devāḥ vijitya avarurutsamānāḥ anvāyan | tad asya sahasā āditsanta | so 'rodīt | yad arodīt tad Rudrasya rudratvam | "The Gods and Asuras contended. The Gods, on the eve of gaining a victory, deposited their desirable property with Agni, in order that, as they said, they might retain it in case their enemies should vanquish them. Agni coveted this property, and absconded with it. Then the gods, having conquered their enemies, desired to recover their property, followed Agni, and sought to take it from him by force. He wept. From the fact that 'he wept' (arodīt, from the root rud), he derives his name and character of 'Rudra.'" In the same Sanhitā, book v., p. 466 of India Office MS., we find the words: Rudro vai esha

Again, in p. xxxiv. of his Introduction, Professor Wilson says, in regard to Vishṇu:—"There is no separate hymn to Vishṇu, but he is mentioned as Trivikrama, or he who took three steps or paces, which Colebrooke thought might have formed the groundwork of the Paurāṇik legend of the dwarf Avatār. It may have been suggestive of the fiction; but no allusion to the notion of Avatārs occurs in the Veda, and there can be little doubt that the three steps here referred to are the three periods of the sun's course—his rise, culmination, and setting."[247] The passage here alluded to by Professor Wilson is as follows: Rigveda i. 22, 16-21:—(16) Ato devāḥ avantu no yato Vishṇur vichakrame | pṛithivyāḥ sapta dhāmabhiḥ[248] | (17) Idaṁ Vishṇur vichakrame tredhā nidadhe padam | samūḷham asya pāṁsure | (18) Trīṇi padā vichakrame Vishṇur gopāḥ adābhyaḥ | ato dharmāṇi dhārayan | (19) Vishṇoḥ karmāṇi paśyata yato vratāni paśpase | Indrasya yujyaḥ sakhā | (20) Tad Vishṇoḥ paramam padaṁ sadā paśyanti sūrayaḥ | divīva chakshur ātatam | (21) Tad viprāso vipanyavo jāgṛivāṁsaḥ samindhate | Vishṇor yat paramam padam |

"(16) May the gods preserve us from that (place) whence Vishṇu strode across the seven regions of the earth [or, according to the Sāmaveda, over the surface of the earth]. (17) Vishṇu traversed this (universe): in three places he planted his foot, and [the world] was enveloped in his dust. (18) Vishṇu, the preserver, the uninjurable, stepped three steps, upholding thereby fixed ordinances. (19) Behold the deeds of Vishṇu, through which this intimate friend of Indra has perceived the established laws. (20) The wise ever contemplate that supreme station of Vishṇu, placed like an eye in the sky. (21) The wise, ever vigilant and offering praise, kindle that which is the supreme station of Vishṇu."—(See Wilson's translation, pp. 53, 54; Benfey's translation of the Sāmaveda, pp. 223 and 287; his Glossary, p. 191, under the word sapta, and his translation of the yad Agniḥ | "This Agni is Rudra." And in v. 5, 7, 3: Rudro vai esha yad Agniḥ | sa yathā vyāghraḥ kruddhas tishṭhaty eva vai esha | tarhi sachitam etair upatishṭhate namaskārair eva taṁ śamayati | "This Agni is Rudra. He stands enraged like a tiger. Then he approaches him when kindled, and quiets him with these prostrations."

[247] "It is expressly so stated by Durgāchārya, in his commentary on the Nirukta. See Burnouf, Introduction to the third volume of the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, p. xxii."

[248] Instead of sapta dhāmabhis, the Sāmaveda, ii. 1024, reads adhi sānavi, "over the surface."

R.V. in Orient und Occident, p. 30: see, also, the fourth volume of this work, pp. 54, ff.)[249]

The remarks of Yāska on this passage have been already quoted above (p. 176). The following is the note of the commentator, Durgāchārya, on Yāska's explanation of the above passage of the Ṛigveda (see above, note 247, p. 203):—Vishṇur ādityaḥ | katham iti | yataḥ āha "tredhā nidadhe padam" nidhatte padaṁ nidhānam padaiḥ[?] | Kva tatra tāvat | "pṛithivyām antarikshe divi" iti Śākapūṇiḥ | pārthivo 'gnir bhūtvā "pṛithivyāṁ" yat kiṁchid asti tad vikramate tad adhitishṭhati "antarikshe" vaidyutātmanā "divi" sūryātmanā | yad uktam "tam ū akṛiṇvan tredhā bhuve kam" (R.V. x. 88, 10) | "Samārohaṇe udayagirāv udyan padam ekaṁ nidhatte vishṇupade madhyaṁdine antarikshe gayaśirasy astangirāv" ity Aurṇavābhaḥ āchāryo manyate |

"Vishṇu is the Sun. How? Because he says, 'thrice he planted his foot.' Where did he do so? 'On the earth, in the firmament, and in the heaven,' says Śākapūṇi. Becoming terrestrial fire, he paces or resides a little upon the earth, in the shape of lightning in the firmament, and in the form of the sun in heaven. As it is said, 'they made him to exist in a threefold form' (R.V. x. 88, 10). Aurṇavābha Āchārya thinks the meaning is, 'He plants one step on the 'Samārohaṇa' (point of ascension), when rising over the eastern mountain, (another) at noon on the Vishṇupada, the meridian sky, (a third) on Gayaśiras, when setting beneath the western hill.'"

Any one who has the slightest acquaintance with the later Hindu mythology will perceive at once how different these Vedic representations are from the Puranic accounts of Śiva and Vishṇu.[250] Such changes as these, in the conception of the gods, must have been the work of time. Here, therefore, we have another proof of the antiquity of the Vedic hymns as compared with the other portions of Indian literature.

[249] Under the word dharman, Böhtlingk and Roth quote Vālakhilya iv. 3, where it is said, Yasmai Vishṇus trīṇi padā vichakrame upa mitrasya dharmabhiḥ | "For whom (for Indra) Vishṇu strode three paces in the quality of a friend, or according to the custom of a friend." The explanation of the last words of the line are from B. and R.

[250] The modifications which have taken place in the conceptions of these two deities are fully exhibited in the fourth volume of this work, to which I refer for further particulars.

Sixth: Another proof of the greater antiquity of the Vedic hymns as compared with the later Sāstras may be found in the fact that the former represent to us a considerable difference in the religious institutions of the Indian people at the time when they were composed as compared with the usages of later periods. For information on this subject I may refer to the first volume of this work, passim.

Seventh: How different the Sanskrit of the Vedic age was in many of its forms from those which the later Sanskrit assumed, and still retains, may be seen from the subjoined specimens taken from the Rigveda:

Rigveda, i. 2, 1, with modern Sanskrit interpretation underneath:

Vedic Text.	Vāyav āyāhi darśata ime somāḥ aran-kṛitāḥ | teshām pāhi śrudhi havam |	"Come, O Vāyu, these somas are prepared.[251] Drink of them; hear our invocation."
Mod. Sans.	Vāyav āyāhi darśanīya ime somāḥ alan-kṛitāḥ | teshām piba śṛiṇu havam |

Here it will be observed that four Vedic words, darśata, arankṛitāḥ, pāhi, śrudhi, differ from the modern Sanskrit forms.

Rigveda, i. 3, 7:

Vedic Text.	Omāsaś charshaṇīdhṛito viśve devāsaḥ āgata | dāśvāṁso daśushaḥ sutam |	"O Viśve devas, preservers of men, bestowers [of rewards], come to the libation of him who gives you [oblations].
Mod. Sans.	Omāḥ [rakshakāḥ] charshaṇidhṛito viśvedevāḥ āgachchhata | dātāro dātuḥ sutam |

Here the Vedic forms omāsaḥ, devāsaḥ, and āgata, stand for omāḥ, devāḥ, and āgachchhata.

Rigveda, vii. 33, 5:

Vedic Text.	Vasishṭhasya stuvataḥ Indro aśrod urum̃ tṛitsubhyo akṛiṇod u lokam |	"Indra heard Vasishṭha when he uttered praise, and opened up a wide space to the Tṛitsus." (See vol. i. p. 320.)
Mod. Sans.	Vasishṭhasya stuvataḥ Indro aśriṇod urum tṛitsubhyo akarod u lokam |

Here we have the Vedic forms aśrot and akṛinot, for the modern aśriṇot and akarot.

[251] Prof. Aufrecht suggests that the word alankṛita has not the sense of "prepared" in later Sanskrit; that the construction teshām piba would be improper there; and that charshaṇidhṛit would not be understood in modern times.

This fact of the frequent diversity between the Vedic and ordinary Sanskrit is recognized in every page of his work by the great grammarian Pāṇini. I will quote one of the Sūtras, in which he refers to some instances of this, together with the illustrations given in the Vārttika (vii. 2, 64):—Babhūtha ātatantha jagṛibhma vavartha iti nigame || ity etāni vede nipātyante | bhū | "hotā prathamo babhūtha" | "babhūvitha" iti loke | tanu | "yena antarikṣham uru ātatantha" | "ātenitha" iti loke | graha | "jagṛibhma te dakshiṇam Indra hastam" | "jagṛihiṣma" iti loke | vṛiñ | "vavartha tvañ hi jyotishā" | "vavaritha" iti loke| "The exceptional forms babhūtha, ātatantha, jagṛibhma and vavartha are employed in the Veda instead of the ordinary forms, babhūvitha, ātenitha, jagṛihima, and vavaritha; as in the texts, 'thou wast the first priest,' 'whereby thou didst stretch out the wide firmament,' 'we have seized, O Indra, thy right hand,' 'thou didst envelope with light.'"

In Sutra vi. 4, 102, other instances are alluded to of grammatical forms which are peculiar to the Veda, viz., the imperatives śrudhi for śriṇu, 'hear'; kṛidhi for kuru, 'do'; vṛidhi for vṛiṇu, 'cover'; pūrdhi for pṛiṇīhi, 'fill.'

In the Vivaraṇa of Nāgesa Bhaṭṭa on the Mahābhāshya, the following reference is made to certain forms which are employed in the Veda only: Evañ cha veda-mātrāntargata-"karṇebhir-devāso-gṛibhṇāmi"-ity-ādy-atirikta-paratā laukika-śabdasya tais tad-vyavahārādarśanāt | "The term 'secular' (laukika) refers to words different from such as karṇebhiḥ (for karṇaiḥ), devāsaḥ (for devāḥ), and gṛibhṇāmi (for gṛihṇāmi), which are to be found in the Veda alone, for we never see them employed by secular people."

Neuter plurals in ī and ā are also of frequent occurrence in the Vedic hymns, as trī and pūrṇā for trīṇi and pūrṇāni. So too the final i in nouns ending in n, is often left out in the locative, as in ajman, adhvan, karman, charman, janman, dhanvan, śarman, vyoman, for ajmani, adhvani, etc. So also ā is substituted for au in the nom. and accus. dual, as in yā surathā for yau surathau, etc.

In nouns in i the instrumental singular is often formed by ī, instead of yā, as śaktī for śaktyā, and the locative by ā instead of au, as nābhā for nābhau. Nouns in u frequently form the instrumental case in vā instead of unā, as kratvā, madhvā, śarvā, for kratunā, etc.; the dative in ve, instead of ave, as kratve, śiśve, for kratave, etc.; the genitive in vaḥ for oḥ or unaḥ, as paśvaḥ for paśoḥ, madhvaḥ and vasvaḥ for madhunaḥ, etc.; and the locative in avi instead of au, as anavi, trasadasyavi, dasyavi, druhyavi, sānavi, for anau, etc. Words in ī make in the nominative singular īḥ instead of ī, as adurmangulīḥ, kṛishṇīḥ, gāndharvīḥ, kalyāṇīḥ, for adurmangalī, etc. In adjectives the form yas is frequently substituted for īyas, as in ahanyas, navyas, rabhyas, vasyas, sahyas, for ahanīyas, etc. The second personal pronoun sometimes takes in the instr. sing. the form tvā instead of tvayā, and in the loc. tve for tvayi. According to Yāska (Nir. vi. 7), the plural form asme of the first personal pronoun can be used in all the seven cases. The dem. pronoun idam makes in the instr. sing. m. and n. enā, f. ayā, for anena and anayā, and along with kim we find also kad. The two words, nākis, "never," "no one," and mākis, "let not," and "let no one," are peculiar to the hymns, as are also the adverbs kuha,[252] "where?" kathā, "how?" "whence?" and the preposition sadha for saha, "with," in the words sadhastha, sadhamā, sadhamāda, and sadhastuti. The form tman for ātman, "self," is found almost exclusively in the hymns. Na in the hymns has frequently the sense of "as," as well as of "not" (see Nir. i. 4, quoted above, p. 151).

To the conjugational forms specified above as found in the Vedic hymns, but not in later Sanskrit, may be added the following, viz., smasi, imasi, gṛiṇīmasi, bharāmasi, vadāmasi, uśmaśi, nāśayāmasi, etc., for smaḥ or smas, etc. The past participle in tvā takes also the forms tvī, and tvāya, as in hatvī, pītvī; kṛitvī, kṛitvāya; gatvī, gatvāya; dṛishṭvāya, etc. In the infinitive, besides the form in tum, we frequently meet with the forms tave, tavai, toḥ (or tos), and adhyai, as etave, etavai, etoḥ; kartave, kartavai, kartoḥ; gantave, gantavai, gamadhyai; dhātave and dhiyadhyai; bhartave, apabhartavai, bharadhyai (R.V. vi. 66, 3); hantavai, jīvitavai, pṛiṇadhyai, paritaṁsayadhyai; and an infinitive form āyai, "to come," is found in R.V. ii. 18, 3. So also jīvase[253] and chakshase are used in the sense of the infinitive, as are also dṛiśe and vishkabhe (R.V. viii. 89, 12), and vidmane (R.V. i. 164, 6).

[252] As we have seen above, p. 91, kuhiṁ and kuhaṁ are employed in Pāli, and kahiṁ in the Gāthā dialect, and in Prākṛit, for "where?"

[253] This word is also used in the same way in the Mahābhārata, i. 732, as quoted in B. and R's. Lexicon, s.v.

So too the hymns have some moods called by grammarians leṭ, which, according to Prof. Wilson (Grammar, 2nd ed., p. 463), have all the significations of the potential and imperative, as well as of the conditional and impersonal. Such are the forms, patāti, "may it fall," āvahāsi, "mayest thou bring," jīvāti, vardhān, yajāti, pachāti, vanāti, bravāma; asat, "it must be," bhuvat, sunavat, dṛiśat, śṛiṇavat, śravat, nindāt, niṅitsāt, yajātai, pṛiṇaithe. In some verbs, the syllable na is added to the second person plural imperative, as pipartana, vivaktana, tiretana, didiśhṭana, etc. The pass. fut. participle in tavya appears in some verbs in the form tva, as in kartva, jantva, and sotva (R.V. x. 160, 2).

The following are some of the variations exhibited in the conjugation of different verbs of common occurrence; av makes aviḍḍhi instead of ava in the imperative; kṛi, "to make," takes in the present karshi, karási, and kṛiṇoshi, for karoshi; akar, akaraḥ, and akṛiṇoḥ for akaroḥ; akran and akṛiṇvan for akurvan; akṛinuta and akṛinotana for akuruta; kṛidhi, kara, kṛiṇu and kṛiṇuhi for kuru, etc.; gam, "to go," takes the forms gamati, ganti, jaganti, in place of gachhati; gameyam, and jagamyām, for gachcheyam; āgamyāt for āgachhet; āgatha for āgachhatha; agan and gan for agachhat; aganma for agachhāma; agman and gman for agachhan; āgahi and āgantu for āgachha and āgachhatu; ganta and gantana for gachhata. In the reduplicated perfect the root tyaj becomes tityāja, instead of tatyāja; in the aorist tan makes atān for atānīt. Dṛiś makes adrāk for adrākshīt, and has dṛiśeyam where later Sanskrit has paśyeyam; adṛiśran for apaśyan; dadṛiśre for dadṛiśire, etc. The root tar frequently becomes tir when prepositions are prefixed, as in ātirat, pratira, vitiranti. Duh makes aduhra, instead of aduhata, "they milked." Dhā, "to hold," makes dhita, instead of hita (though an instance of the same archaic form in the Harivaṁśa 7799 is cited by B. and R., as is also dhitvā in the Śatap. Br.). Dah, "to burn," makes in the aorist adhāk and dhāk, instead of adhākshīt. Dā, "to give," makes dāti and dātu for dadāti and dadātu, and daddhi for dehi. The root bhū has in the imperative bhūtu for bhavatu; and bhṛi, to "nourish," or "carry," makes in the reduplicated perfect jabhāra, instead of babhāra. Much, "to free," makes mumugdhi and mumoktu, instead of muncha and munchatu. Yam, "to hold," "to give," makes yamati, yaṁsi, yandhi, yanta, for yachhati, yachhasi, yachha, yachhata. Vṛit takes the forms avart + ā = āvart, etc., instead of āvarttata (R.V. vii. 59, 4), āvavarttati for the intensive (R.V. viii. 77, 4). Vid makes vidre (R.V. vii. 56, 2) for viduḥ (?), and vividḍhi for viddhi (?). S'ru, "to hear," makes in the imperative (besides śrudhi, the form given above) śriṇuhi, śriṇudhi, for śriṇu; and śriṇota and śrota (R.V. v. 87, 8) for śriṇuta. Spardh, "to vie," makes paspṛidhre for paspṛidhire. Hu, "to invoke," makes juhūre for juhvire. In R.V. x. 125, 4, a form śraddhivam "deserving belief," is found, which appears to be peculiar to the R.V. (In the Atharvaveda iv. 30, 4, śraddheyam is substituted for it.) In future participles the R.V. frequently substitutes enya for anīya, as in īḍenya, kīrtenya, dṛiśenya, yudhenya, vareṇya, for īḍanīya, etc. Other forms peculiar to the Veda are gṛibhāyati (as well as gṛibhṇāti), dabhāyati, mathāyati, mushāyati, stabhāyati, for gṛihṇāti, etc.; and so also are such forms derived from the perfect tense, as jakshīyāt from ghas, papatyāt, papīyāt, mamanyāt; and the curtailed forms of the first person of the imperative, as nirayā (R.V., iv. 18, 2), pracharā (viii. 47, 6), and prabravā (x. 39, 5), for nirayāni, etc.

Other Vedic peculiarities are (a) the manner in which adjectives are employed, like the verbs with which they are connected, to govern an accusative, as in the cases yaṁ yajnam paribhūr asi, "the sacrifice which thou encompassest" (R.V., i. 1, 4): vīḷu chid ārujatnubhiḥ, "who break down even what is firm" (i. 6, 5); tā somaṁ somapātamā | "they are great drinkers of soma" (i. 21, 1); chakrir yo viśvā | "who made all things" (iii. 16, 4); babhrir vajram papiḥ somaṁ dadir gāḥ | "who holds the thunderbolt, drinks soma, and gives cows" (vi. 23, 4); dadiḥ rekṇas tanve dadir vasu, "giving property, giving wealth to the poor" (viii. 46, 15; ii. 14, 1; vi. 72, 3): (b) compounds formed with present participles, as ābharad-vasu, ṛidhad-ri, dhārayat-kavi, kshayad-vīra, śravayat-sakhā: and (c) the separation of prepositions from verbs, which so frequently occurs, as in the cases upa tvā emasi | "we approach thee" (i. 1, 7); gamad vājebhir ā sa naḥ | "let him come to us with riches" (i. 5, 3); ā tvā viśantu āśavaḥ somāsaḥ | "may the quickly-flowing soma-juices enter thee" (i. 5, 7); ā tvā vahantu, "let them bring thee" (i. 16, 3); ni cha dhīmahi, "we put down" (i. 17, 6).

It must not, however, be supposed, from these differences in form which we discover to exist between the Vedic and the later Sanskrit, that the two languages are not essentially alike. A great portion of the substance, and much of the form of the language, was the same at both periods: a part of the Vedic roots and nouns only have in later times fallen into disuse; and the peculiar Vedic varieties of form are merely the ancient modes of inflection which were in common currency at the time when the hymns were composed, and which gradually became obsolete in the course of ages.[254] Some of them, however, continued for a long time in popular use, as we find in the case of the form of the instr. pl. ebhis for ais, which we meet with unchanged in the Gāthās of the Lalita-vistara (see the instances given above, in p. 120), and somewhat modified in the Pāli forms ebhi and ehi.

A further proof of the antiquity of the Vedic hymns is to be found in the fact, already alluded to, p. 169, f., that many words in use in the Veda afterwards became obsolete, as they do not occur in the later Sanskrit literature. The meaning of these words is often extremely difficult to ascertain, as no tradition of their signification seems to have been preserved, and even the oldest interpreters, as Yāska, are obliged to have recourse to etymology in order to arrive at their sense. (See on this subject my article "On the Interpretation of the Veda," in the Journal of the Royal As. Soc., vol. ii., new series, pp. 303, ff.)

As the hymns of the Veda were the compositions of the ancient

[254] The following is Professor Whitney's account of the differences between the Vedic and the modern Sanskrit:—

"The language of the Vedas is an older dialect, varying very considerably, both in its grammatical and lexical character, from the classical Sanskrit. Its grammatical peculiarities run through all departments: euphonic rules, word-formation and composition, declension, conjugation, syntax. . . . . [These peculiarities] are partly such as characterize an older language, consisting in a greater originality of forms, and the like, and partly such as characterize a language which is still in the bloom and vigour of life, its freedom untrammelled by other rules than those of common usage, and which has not, like the Sanskrit, passed into oblivion as a native spoken dialect, become merely a conventional medium of communication among the learned, being forced, as, it were, into a mould of regularity by long and exhausting grammatical treatment. . . . The dissimilarity existing between the two, in respect of the stock of words of which each is made up, is, to say the least, not less marked. Not single words alone, but whole classes of derivations and roots, with the families that are formed from them, which the Veda exhibits in frequent and familiar use, are wholly wanting, or have left but faint traces, in the classical dialect; and this to such an extent as seems to demand, if the two be actually related to one another directly as mother and daughter, a longer interval between them than we should be inclined to assume, from the character and degree of the grammatical, and more especially the phonetic, differences."—Journ. of the Amer. Orient. Soc. iii. 296, 297.

Indian ṛishis or bards, who, as we have seen above (p. 197, f.), frequently speak of having "made," "fashioned," or "generated"[255] them, they could not possibly have been composed in any other language than that which these ṛishis and their contemporaries were in the habit of using for every-day conversation.

There are, no doubt, in the hymns some apparent traces of an idea that the authors were inspired;[256] as in the following texts: R.V., i. 37, 4: devattam brahma gāyata | "Sing the god-given prayer." In R.V. x. 71, 3, it is said of the goddess Vāch: Yajnena Vāchaḥ padavīyam āyan tām anvavindann ṛishishu pravishṭām | "By sacrifice they followed the track of Vāch: they found her residing in the ṛishis."

In R.V. x. 125, 5, again, Vāch[257] is made to say: Yaṁ kāmaye taṁ tam ugraṁ kṛiṇomi tam brahmāṇam tam ṛishiṁ taṁ sumedhām | "Every man whom I love, I make him terrible; [I make] him a priest; [I make] him a ṛishi; [I make] him intelligent."[258]

In a Vālakhilya (or apocryphal hymn), which, with others, is to be found inserted between the 48th and 49th hymns of the 8th maṇḍala of the Rigveda, the following verse occurs, xi. 6:

Indrā-Varuṇā yad ṛishibhyo manīshāṁ vācho matiṁ śrutam adattam agre | yāni sthānāny asṛijanta dhīrāḥ yajnaṁ tanvānās tapasā 'bhyapaśyam |

For the complete text of this verse I was first indebted to Professor Müller, who supplied also the following version of it: "Indra and Varuṇa, I have seen through devotion that which, after it was heard [255] See numerous passages to this effect adduced in the third volume of this work, p. 232, ff.

[256] This subject is treated more at length in the third volume of this work, p. 245, ff. In his illustrations of the Nirukta, p. 85, Roth observes in regard to the fifth hymn of the fourth book of the R.V.: "The author of the hymn, Vāmadeva, himself professes to make known a mysterious and recondite wisdom, which had been revealed to him by Agni (verses 3 and 6)." The third verse is as follows: Sāma dvibarhāḥ mahi tigmabhṛishṭiḥ sahasraretāḥ vṛishabhas tuvishmān | Padam na gor apagūḷham vividvān Agnir mahyam predu vochad manīshām || "Agni, the transcently strong, the fierce-flaming, the prolific, the showerer of benefits, the powerful, who knows the venerable hymn, mysterious as the track of a [missing] cow, hath declared to me its knowledge."

[257] See, however, note 27, p. 258, of the third volume of this work.

[258] Vāch thus appears partly, though not entirely, in the character of a Muse. Compare what Homer says of Demodocus, Odyssey viii. 63, 64:

Τὸν πέρι Μοῦσ' ἐφίλησε, δίδου δ' ἀγαθόν τε κακόν τε, 'οφθαλμῶν μὲν ἄμερσε, δίδου δ' ἡδεῖαν ἀοιδήν.

in the beginning, you gave to the poets—wisdom, understanding of speech; and I have seen the (sacred) places which the sages created in performing the sacrifice."[259]

Though, however, some traces of an idea that the ṛishis were inspired by the gods, by Vāch, or Indra and Agni, or Indra and Varuṇa (but not, in any of the passages which I have here quoted, by Brahma, who in later times was regarded as the source of inspiration: see above, p. 195), may thus be detected in the Ṛigveda, there is no doubt, on the other hand, that these ancient bards often or generally speak of the hymns as the creation of their own minds; and there is no reason to suppose that they were anything else. But as even an inspired composition, to be generally intelligible, must be delivered in the language current among the people to whom it is first promulgated, there is no pretence for supposing that the Sanskrit of the Vedas was not the vernacular language of the age in which they were first recited.

At that early period there was no language current among the Āryas but the Vedic Sanskrit. A learned language, different from the spoken tongue, was a thing then unknown; and the refinements of grammar had no existence. This accords with the purport of the following curious passage of an ancient Brāhmaṇa,[260] referred to by Sāyaṇa in the introduction to his commentary on the Ṛigveda, p. 35: Vyākaraṇam api prakṛiti-pratyayādy-upadeśena pāda-svarūpa-tad-artha-niśchayāya upayujyate | Tathā cha Aindra-vāyava-graha-brāhmaṇe samāmnāyate | "Vāg vai parāchī avyākṛitā 'bhavat | te devāḥ Indram abruvann 'imāṁ no Vāchaṁ vyākuru' iti | so 'bravīd 'varaṁ vṛiṇai | mahyaṁ cha eva esha Vāyave cha saha gṛihyātai' iti | tasmād Aindravāyavaḥ saha pragṛihyate[261] | tām Indro madhyato 'vakramya vyākarot | tasmād iyaṁ vyākṛitā vāg udyate" iti | "Agnim īḷe purohitam" ityādi-vāk pūrvasmin kāle parāchī samudrādi-dhvani-vad ekātmikā satī avyākṛitā prakṛitiḥ pratyayaḥ padaṁ vākyam, ityādi-vibhāga-kāri-grantha-rahitā āsīt |

[259] In the third volume of this work, p. 263, the verse is translated thus: "Indra and Varuṇa, I have seen through austere fervour that which ye formerly gave to the ṛishis, wisdom, understanding of speech, sacred lore, and all the places which the sages created, when performing sacrifice."

[260] This passage is found in the Taitt. S. vi. 4, 7, 3, in the very same words, with the addition after "udyate" of the following: tasmāt sakṛid Indrāya madhyato gṛihyate dvir Vāyave dvau hi sa varāv avṛiṇīta |

[261] "Pra" omitted in Taitt. S.

tadānīm devaiḥ prārthitaḥ Indraḥ ekasminn eva pātre Vāyoḥ svasya cha soma-rasasya grahaṇa-rūpeṇa vareṇa tushṭas tām akhaṇḍāṁ Vācham madhye vichhidya prakṛiti-pratyayādi-bhāgaṁ sarvatra akarot | tasmād iyaṁ vāg idānīm api Pāṇinyādi-maharshibhir vyākṛitā sarvaiḥ paṭhyate ity arthaḥ | "Grammar, also, by indicating the crude forms and the affixes, is useful for determining the character of words, and their signification. And accordingly it is thus related in the Aindra-Vāyava-graha-brāhmaṇa (a section, so called, either of the Taittirīya Sanhitā, or of some Brāhmaṇa): 'Vāch (Speech) spoke confusedly, and without articulation. The gods said to Indra, Make this Vāch to become articulate to us. Indra replied, Let me choose a boon; let the soma be given to me and Vāyu together. Hence the soma of Indra and Vāyu is taken together. Indra then, dividing Speech in sunder in the middle, rendered her articulate. Hence she is spoken articulately.' The sense of this quotation, says Sāyaṇa, is this: Speech, such as in the verse Agnim īḷe purohitam, etc. (the first verse of the Rigveda), was originally confused, i.e. unvaried like the roar of the sea, etc., and undistinguished, i.e. without articulation to denote crude forms, inflections, words, and sentences, etc. Then Indra, being solicited by the gods, and gratified by the permission to take the soma-juice in the same vessel with Vāyu, divided in the middle Speech, which had previously been without division, and introduced everywhere the distinction of crude forms, inflections, etc. In consequence, this Speech, being now distinguished in its parts by Pāṇini and other great sages, is pronounced by all men."

It may be asked, however, If the Vedic Sanskrit was once the spoken language of India, how did it ever cease to be spoken? To this I reply as follows:—

By the time when the collections of the Vedic hymns were formed, the Sanskrit, the vernacular speech of the ṛishis and their descendants, had undergone a considerable alteration, which had gradually resulted, as we have already seen (compare pp. 36, 68, ff.), both from the general laws of change to which all language is subject (as exemplified in various other ancient tongues), and also from the action of local causes, such as the intercourse of the Āryas, or Sanskrit-speaking race, with the Dasyus, or Mlechhas, who spoke a quite different tongue. In this way, words which had formerly been commonly employed in Sanskrit became obsolete, or acquired new meanings, while other new words, borrowed from the dialects of the Mlechhas, were introduced into currency; and forms of inflection which were once current got gradually into disuse, and made way for other novel forms. Thus a twofold alteration was produced in the ancient Indian language (the Sanskrit of the Vedas). First, the Pāli and the Prākṛit, or vernacular dialects, were formed out of it in the manner which has already been described (pp. 33, 68, f., 134, 146); and secondly, a learned language, based upon the Sanskrit of the Vedas, but variously modified (see pp. 138, f.), and polished, was gradually constructed by grammarians, which being removed from the corrupting influences of popular use, has thenceforward continued unchanged (p. 162).

When the process of change had been going on for many generations, the Vedic hymns became exceedingly difficult to understand. The obstacles to comprehension, arising from these intermediate changes of language, were greatly augmented by the obscure and elliptical style in which the hymns were originally composed, which rendered it hard for the men of subsequent ages to understand the brief allusions to ancient ideas, practices, and events with which they abound.

These considerations will sufficiently account for the difficulty which was experienced in the comprehension of the Vedic hymns in later ages, without there being the least necessity for our supposing that they were composed in a language at all different from that which was ordinarily current in India, among the common people of the Āryan race, at the time of their composition.

CHAPTER II.

AFFINITIES OF THE INDIANS WITH THE PERSIANS, GREEKS, AND ROMANS, AND DERIVATION OF ALL THESE NATIONS FROM CENTRAL ASIA.

From the preceding review it is clear that the Sanskrit language has been undergoing a continual change, from the very earliest times up to which we can follow its course. But if this be the case, it would be contrary to all analogy to suppose that that language had remained unaltered in those yet earlier ages before the Vedas were composed. It must, therefore, now become my object to inquire, whether we can discover any means of following it back to its origin. We are not, it must be confessed, in a position to do this in any other way than that of reasoning and inference; for, in the absence of any Sanskrit writings anterior to the Vedas, we possess no direct means of tracing the history of the Sanskrit language and its mutations any further back than the date of the composition of those hymns. There is, however, another way in which we can arrive at some conception of that history. From facts which are established and evident, we must reason to the unapparent causes which they presuppose, and out of which they have arisen.[1]

Learned men have remarked, that there is a great resemblance between the Sanskrit and other languages, some of which, like it, are now no longer spoken, but were formerly the current and popular speech of ancient nations, and are preserved in written records which have descended to us from a remote antiquity. These are 1st, the Zend and other varieties of the ancient Persic; 2nd, the Greek; and 3rd, the Latin.[2] The Zend language is preserved in the Zend Avesta, a collection of writings connected with the ancient religion of Persia. The poems of Homer, which form the oldest relic of the extensive literature of ancient Greece, are supposed to have been written about 2,700 years ago. And there are many Latin books which are 2,000 years old. From the great similarity which exists between these languages and the Sanskrit, of which proofs and instances will be presently adduced, learned men have inferred: 1st, That these forms of speech have all one common origin, i.e., that Sanskrit, Zend, Greek, and Latin are all, as it were, sisters,[3] the daughters (some perhaps older and some younger, but still all daughters) of one mother who died in giving them birth, or, to speak without a figure, that they are derivatives from, and the surviving representatives of, one older language, which now no longer exists;[4] and 2ndly, That the races of men who spoke these several languages are also all descended from one stock, and that their ancestors at a very early period all lived together in some country (situated out of Hindustan), speaking one language; but afterwards separated, to travel away from their primeval abodes, at different times and in different directions; the forefathers of the [2] It is not necessary for my purpose to insist much on the affinities of the Sanskrit to any other languages besides those I have named.

[1] Ὡς ἐγὼ συμβάλλομαι, τοῖσι ἐμφανέσι τὰ μὴ γινωσκόμενα τεκμαιρόμενος, "As I conjecture, inferring things unknown from things that are manifest," says Herodotus, ii. 33. Compare Euripides, fragment 5 of the Phœnix, τἀφανῆ τεκμηρίοισιν εἰκότως ἁλίσκεται, "A probable conclusion regarding things unapparent is reached by proofs."

[3] Facies non omnibus una, nec diversa tamen, qualem decet esse sororum.

[4] From a comparison of the various forms which words of identical signification have assumed in the different derivative tongues, and of the laws which in each case must have governed the mutations which they have undergone, it becomes possible to ascertain, in many cases with certainty, or with high probability, the form which the words had at first in the mother-language, the original Indo-European speech. In the work of the late August Schleicher, entitled "Compendium der vergleichenden Grammatik der Indogermanischen Sprachen" (i.e. "Compendium of the Comparative Grammar of the Indo-Germanic Languages") 3rd ed., 1871, the letters of the mother-language which continue unaltered in the derivative tongues, and those which have been replaced by others, are specified, and the original forms of inflection and conjugation, as well as of numerous words, are stated. And in August Fick's "Vergleichendes Wörterbuch der Indogermanischen Sprachen," (i.e. "Comparative Grammar of the Indo-Germanic Languages"), 2nd ed., 1870, the words of the original language are given according to the author's conception of their form. These writers, however, though generally, are not always, at one as to the original forms. Thus Schleicher thinks the word for "five" was kankan, whilst Fick makes it pankan. The former takes svastars to have been at first the word for "sister," whilst the latter makes it svasar.

Hindus southward or south-eastward to India; the ancestors of the Persians to the south; and those of the Greeks and Romans to the west.[5] The languages of those branches of this great Indo-European stock which remained longest together in their earliest home, viz., the Persians and the Indians, continued to bear the closest resemblance to each other; while the tongues of those offshoots which separated earliest from the parent stock exhibit in later times the least amount of resemblance, the divergencies of dialect becoming wider and wider in proportion to the length of time which had elapsed since the separation.[6]

Sect. I.—Introductory Remarks on Comparative Philology: affinities of the Sanskrit and Persian with each other.

I shall proceed to establish these assertions as to the resemblance of the Sanskrit to the Zend, Greek and Latin; after first premising a few simple remarks on comparative philology in general.

A comparison of the various languages which are spoken in different countries of Europe and Asia, has brought to light the fact that they belong to different families or classes; and that the different members of the same family, while they exhibit a more or less close resemblance to each other, have either no resemblance, or a very remote one, to those belonging to any of the other families. It will be sufficient for the purpose of illustration, if I refer to the two great families of speech, universally recognized as distinct, the Semitic and the Indo-European.

[5] For an account of the Greeks and Romans, I refer the Indian student to any of the ordinary historical manuals.

[6] "A comparison of the grammatical structure of the Sanskrit, especially in its oldest form as represented in the Veda, with the Celtic, Greek, Latin, German, Letto-Slavonian, and Persian, etc., teaches us that all these languages have a common basis, or in other words that they are derived from one common original speech; and the gradation of sounds and forms points to the Sanskrit as the language which in general still preserves the most original form, and has departed least from the original tongue, This existence of one common original language necessarily leads us to conclude that at the period when it was still a living and spoken tongue, the people also which employed it formed one nation; and it results that the individual nations as well as their languages were formed by a gradual separation from the Indo-European people, and its language. And, moreover, the greater or less similarity of the several languages among each other, and particularly in reference to the Sanskrit, enables us to conclude whether the separation from the original stock took place in each case at an earlier or a later period."—Weber, Indian Sketches, p. 7.

The languages which belong to the Semitic branch are the Arabic, Hebrew, Syriac, etc. Now all who have studied these languages are well aware that they closely resemble each other in respect of their roots and general character; while they have scarcely any affinity at all in any respect with the languages of the Indo-European stock, in which are included Sanskrit, Zend, the later forms of pure Persian, Greek, Latin, and the Teutonic and Sclavonic languages. Any person who knows both Arabic and Sanskrit is perfectly aware that they have little resemblance to each other either in verbal roots, or nouns, and none in the forms of conjugation and declension.[7]

Now, here we discover the very remarkable fact that two languages,

[7] The question of the difference between the Semitic and Indo-European languages, in point of structure, with their partial correspondence in respect of roots, is ably treated by Renan, "Histoire des Langues Sémitiques," 2nd ed. p. 434, ff. He observes that the criterion of the distinctness of families in languages is to be found in the impossibility of deriving one from another. Thus, he says, it is quite intelligible how, notwithstanding their differences, all the Indo-European tongues may be related to the same type, and have sprung from the same primitive idiom; while it is impossible to explain how, by any series of corruptions, the Zend or the Sanskrit could have become Hebrew, or how the Hebrew could have become changed to Sanskrit or Chinese (p. 434). It is generally recognized that there is a wide distinction between the grammatical system of the Semitic languages and that of the Indo-European tongues, and that the one system could not be derived from the other by any procedure known to comparative philology. If we except the principles common to all, or to most, languages (which are nothing else than an expression of the laws of the human mind), there is scarcely any grammatical mechanism of importance which is common to the two families (p. 444). But in the classification of languages, grammatical are much more important than lexicographical considerations [i.e. the inflections of a language are of much more consequence than the words of which it is composed]. Many languages could be quoted which have enriched or renewed their vocabulary, but very few which have corrected their grammar. Grammar is, therefore, the essential form of language, that which constitutes its individuality (pp. 447, 448). On the other hand, M. Renan admits that the Semitic and Indo-European languages have a considerable number of roots which are common to both, independently of such as they have borrowed from each other within the historical period. But he doubts whether this circumstance is sufficient to prove the primitive unity of the two families, and scarcely ventures to hope that a demonstrative result will ever be attained on this point. The greater part of the roots common to the two families owe their similarity, he considers, to natural causes, as they belong to the class of biliteral and mônosyllabic onomatopœias, which reappear in the triliteral radicals actually existing, and in which original sensations appear to have left their traces. Is it at all strange, he asks, that in order to express outward action, the primitive man, still sympathizing so closely with nature, and scarcely separated from her, should have sought to imitate her, and that the same objects should have been universally imitated by the same sounds? (pp. 449, 450.) M. Renan illustrates these remarks by a number of instances, but admits that, both very perfect and polished in their forms and structure, and both of which are spoken by learned men, of the Hindu and Mahomedan religions respectively, living together, side by side, in the same cities of India, are totally different from each other in almost every respect in which one elaborate and complicated language can be distinguished from another language of the same character. And what is the explanation of this, at first sight, so startling phenomenon? It is, of course, that Arabic is (as its name implies) the language of the Arabs, a Semitic tribe; and was introduced into India by the Mahomedan invaders of that country, who, though not Arabians by descent, have yet, as their designation imports, been converted to the faith of the Arabian conqueror Mahomed, and have learned the language in which their sacred volume, the Koran, is written: while Sanskrit, on the other hand, is the language of the Brāhmans, who are descended, more or less purely, from a race which has no affinity (unless it be a primordial one) with the Semitic, viz., the Arian. It is not, therefore, wonderful that the Sanskrit and Arabic languages, which, though they meet in India, have been introduced into that country from quarters so perfectly distinct, should be totally different from each other.

But the Musulmans of India are not only acquainted with the Arabic tongue, but with the Persian also, which is the living dialect of Persia, one of the countries which lie intermediate between Arabia and India. The Persian language, which the Persians now speak, and which the learned Musulmans of India write, is a composite form of speech, i.e. one chiefly made up of a mixture of Arabic with the ancient Persic, which was originally devoid of Arabic words. Now in that portion of the modern Persian language which has not been borrowed from Arabic, but inherited from the ancient Persic, we find many words among the roots which appear to be common to the Semitic and the Indo-European languages, there are a certain number in which the reason of the onomatopœia is more difficult to seize (p. 452). He concludes that in the present state of philological science, a sound method of theorizing requires us to regard the Semitic and Indo-European families of language as distinct (p. 457); while at the same time he remarks that nothing which he has adduced invalidates the hypothesis of a primordial affinity between the races by whom the Semitic and the Indo-European languages respectively were spoken (p. 451). For details I must refer to his work itself. Much has been written on the same subject by other scholars, which it is unnecessary to specify. I refer only to Dr. Nöldeke's paper in Benfey's Orient. und Occident, vol. ii., p. 375, ff.

which are manifestly of the same origin as the Sanskrit nouns or verbs of the same signification.

The following list of words may suffice to prove the assertion just made, that the Persian language has, in its purely Persic element, an affinity with Sanskrit, while Arabic has no such affinity:—

TABLE No. IX.

Comparative Table of Sanskrit, Persian, and Arabic Words.

SANSKRIT.	PERSIAN.	ARABIC.	ENGLISH.
pitar	padar[8]	ăbū	father.
mātar	mādar	ămm	mother.
duhitar	dukhtar	bint	daughter.
jāmātar	dāmād	hāfid	son-in-law.
yuvăn	jawān	shābb	young man.
năra	nar	zhākăr	male.
gharma	garm	hārr	heat.
ăśva	ăsp	fărăs	horse.
ăp	āb	mā	water.
nāman	nām	ism	name.
śushka	khushk	yābis	dry.
pāda	pā	qădăm	foot.
bāhu	bāhū, bāzū	sā'id	arm.
năvă	nau	jădīd	new.
eka	yak	ăḥăd	one.
dvi	do	ithnăn	two.
chătur	chăhār	ărbă'a	four.
păncheăn	păng	khams	five.
shăṭ	shăsh	sătt[9]	six.
săptăn	hăft	saba'a	seven.
ăshṭăn	hăsht	thămăniyat	eight.
navan	nuh	tasa'a	nine.
dăśăn	dăh	'ashar	ten.
viṁśati	bist	'ashrūn	twenty.
śatam	ṣad, sad	māyat	hundred.
sahasra	hāzār	alaf	thousand.

I subjoin many additional instances of affinity between Persian and Sanskrit words, adding the equivalents in the Zend, one of the earliest forms of the Iranian language, but omitting all reference to the Arabic.[10]

[8] See p. 18, note 23.

[9] In this case the Arabic word does resemble the Sanskrit.

[10] In the preparation of these lists I have had the advantage of drawing from the Etymological Persian and Latin Lexicon of Dr. J. A. Vullers, including the supplement containing the Persian roots illustrated by reference to the older Persic dialects, the Sanskrit, etc.; the Persian Grammar of the same author (1st edition, 1840, 2nd edition, 1870); and Dr. Justi's Zend Dictionary. Dr. Vullers's Grammar, in which the Persian is compared with the ancient Persic dialects and with Sanskrit, might, if translated from Latin into English, form a useful handbook for Indian students desirous of learning the history and affinities of the Persian language.

I. VERBS AND PARTICIPLES.

SANSKRIT.	ZEND.	PERSIAN.	ENGLISH.
dar	. . .	darīdan	to tear.
kar	kar	kardan	to do.
kṛiṇu (imperat. vedic)	. . .	kun	do thou.
dā	dā	dādan	to give.
grabh (vedic)[11]	garew, garefsh	giriftan	to take.
bhar	bar	burdan	to bear.
bandh	baṇd	bastan, bandad (3rd pers. sing. pres.)	to bind.
āp	ap, āf	yāftan	to obtain.
śru (śṛiṇoti)	śru	shanūdan	to hear.
sthā	śtā	istādan	to stand.
jīv	ji, jish, jīv	zīstan	to live.
mar	mar	murdan	to die.
svap	qap, qafś	khuftan	to sleep.
svapna	qafna	khwāb	sleep.
char	char	charīdan	to wander, graze.
dhāv	. . .	davīdan	to run.
pach	pach	pukhtan	to cook.
duh	. . .	dokhtan, doshīdan	to milk.
jnā	zā	dānistan	to know.
jānāti	. . .	[mī] dānad	he knows.
jānāmi	. . .	[mī] dānam	I know.
sṛij	. . .	sirishtan	to create.
sṛishṭi	. . .	sirisht	creation, nature.
han	jan	zadan (zanad 3rd pers. sing.)	to strike.
tras	tareś	tarsīdan	to fear.
trāsa	tarsti	tars	fear, trembling.
mih	miz	mekhtan	to make water.
jaj, janj	. . .	jangīdan	to fight.
tapas	tafnu	tap, tāb	heat, fever.
ruh	rud	rustan, royīdan	to grow.
prachh (prichhati)	pareś	pursīdan	to ask.
ve, vabh[12]	. . .	bāftan	to weave.
khan	. . .	kandan	to dig.
karsh	karesh, kash	kashīdan	to draw.
krī	. . .	kharīdan	to buy.
dham	dam	damīdan	to blow (as wind or breath).
jan	zan	zādan	be born, beget.
jāta	zāta	zādah	born.
tan (tanoti)	tan	tanīdan, tanūdan	to extend.
śuch	śuch	sokhtan	to shine, burn.
varsh, vār, vāri (water)	vār	bārīdan	to rain.
ni+dhā	ni+dā	nihādan	to place.

[11] The later form grah is one of the early instances of the same process by which in Prākṛit h was substituted for kh, gh, th, dh, ph, and bh.

[12] The existence of this root may be inferred from the presence of a derivative from it in the word ūrṇavābhi, "spider."

SANSKRIT.	ZEND.	PERSIAN.	ENGLISH.
gam	. . .	chamīdan	to go, walk.
jam	. . .	zamīdan	to eat.
chi	. . .	chīdan	to collect.
pra+sthā	fra+stā	feristādan	to send, go forward.
nam	nam	namīdan	to bend, be disposed pat	paṭ	uftādan, fitādan	to fall. [to.
dhi (vedic)	dī	dīdan	to perceive, see.
bhū	bū	būdan	to be.
bhavāmi	. . .	[mī] buvam	I am.
bhavati	. . .	[mī] buvad	he is.
abhūvam	. . .	būdam	I was.
abhūt	. . .	būd	he was.
abhūvan	. . .	būdand	they were.
asmi	ahmi	am, hastam	I am.
asti	aśti	hast, ast	he is.
santi	heñti	and	they are.
stu	śtu	sitūdan	to praise.
śudh	śud	shustan	to cleanse, wash.
mard	mared	mālīdan [13]	to grind, rub, etc.
nard	. . .	nālīdan	to sound, lament.
dhăr	dăr	dāshtan (imperat. dār)	to hold.
karsh	karesh	kāshtan (imperat. kār)	to cultivate.
tap	tap	tapīdan, tāftan (imperat. tāb)	to be hot, to heat.
vah	vaz	wazīdan	to carry, blow (as bhraj	. . .	birishtan	to roast. [wind).
kshar	khshar	shārīdan	to flow.
chhid	śkeñd, śchiñd	shikastan	to cut, break.
svan	qan	khwāndan	to sound, call, read.
śak (śaktum, infin.)	śach (to give, learn)	sākhtan (imperat. sāz)	to be able, make.
kush (to tear, tear out)	. . .	kushtan	to kill.

II. NOUNS, ADJECTIVES, PRONOUNS, PARTICLES, ETC. [14]

bhrātar	brātar	birādar	brother.
svasar	qañhar	khwāhar	sister.
putra	puthra	pisar, pusar	son.
śvasura	qaśura	khusr	father-in-law.
śvaśrū	. . .	khusrū, or khusrah	mother-in-law.
vidhavā	. . .	bewah	widow.
jani, gnā	jēni, ghěna	zan	woman, wife.
martya	marĕta	mard	mortal, man.
vatsa	. . .	bachah [15]	child.
jīva, jīvita	jīti, jīsti	zī, zīst, zindagī	life.

[13] See p. 23 above, note 41, and the line to which it refers.

[14] It is possible that in some of the instances of similarity here adduced, the Persian word may have been borrowed at a comparatively recent period from the Sanskrit, or vice versâ; but this cannot well be the case when an ancient Zend equivalent also is forthcoming.

[15] See page 16, note 10.

SANSKRIT.	ZEND.	PERSIAN.	ENGLISH.
tanu	tanu, tanus	tan	body.
majjā	mazga	maghz	brain.
śiras	śara	sar	head.
asthi	aśti, aśta	astah, ustukhān	bone.
pārshṇi	pāshna	pāshnah	heel.
chakshu	chashman	chashm	eye.
aśru	aśru	ars	tear.
dant	daṅtan	dandān	tooth.
jihvā	hizva	zabān	tongue.
dos	. . .	dosh	shoulder.
aratni	. . .	āranj	elbow.
hasta[16]	zaśta	dast	hand.
mushṭi	muśti	musht	fist, handful.
angushṭha	añgusta	angusht	thumb, finger.
nakha	. . .	nākhūn	nail.
rom	. . .	roman	hair.
stana	fstāna	pastān	female breast.
yakṛit	. . .	jigar	liver.
jānu	zhnu	zānu	knee.
pād	pādha	pā	foot.
keśa	. . .	ges, geso	hair, ringlet.
pṛishṭha	parsti	pusht	back.
ushṭra	ustra	ushtar, shutr	camel.
kapi	. . .	kabī, kapī	ape.
go	gāo	gāo	ox, or cow.
śūkara	hu	khūk	boar.
khara	khara	khar	ass, or wild ass.
aśvatara	. . .	astar	mule.
mesha	maēsha	mesh	sheep, ram.
mūsha	. . .	mūsh	mouse.
parṇa	parĕna	par	feather, wing.
parṇin	perenin	parindah	winged, a bird.
chanchu	. . .	chang	beak of a bird.
kapota	. . .	kabūtar	pigeon.
gṛidhra	. . .	gīd	a vulture.
śṛigāla	. . .	shaghāl	jackal.
kurankara	. . .	ḳulang	crane.
makshikā	makshi	magas	fly.
kṛimi	kerema	kirm	worm.
kaśyapa / kachhapa	kaśyapa	kashaf	tortoise.
karka	. . .	kark, kharchang	crab.
gūtha	. . .	gūh	excrement.
matsya	maśya	māhī	fish.
kshīra	kshīra	shīr	milk.
hiraṇya	zaranya	zar	gold.
ayas	ayañh	āhan	iron.
charman	. . .	charm	skin.
āhāra	. . .	āḥār	food.
nirāhāra, anāhāra	. . .	nāhār	fasting.
kṛishi (kṛishṭa)	karsti	kisht	cultivation, ploughed field.
vrīhi	berejya[17]	birinj	rice.

[16] Could the original form of this word have been dhasta?

[17] See Vullers's Persian Grammar, 2nd edition, pp. 50, 56. In Justi's Lexicon berejya is said to be the name of a deity who protects crops.

SANSKRIT.	ZEND.	PERSIAN.	ENGLISH.
godhūma	. . .	gandum	wheat.
yava	yava	jau	barley.
dhānya	dāna	dānah	grain.
jangala	. . .	jangal	thicket.
kshupa	. . .	chob	a bush, wood.
dāru	dāuru	darod	wood.
śākhā	. . .	shākh, shākhchah	branch.
ārā	. . .	ărăh	saw.
yuga	. . .	jugh	yoke.
jāla	. . .	jāl	net.
bhāra	. . .	bār	weight.
yāra	. . .	bār	time.
ekavāra	. . .	yakbār	once.
dvāra	dvără	dar	door.
panjara	. . .	pinjarah, panjarah	cage.
dāman	. . .	dām	net, bond.
chakra	chakhra	charkh	wheel.
deva	daēva	dev	god, demon.
áśman	aśman	āsmān	stone, heaven.
jagat	. . .	jahān	the world.
bhūmi	būmi	būm	ground, earth.
jmā, gmā	zem	zamīn	earth.
svar, sūrya	hvare	khūr	heaven, sun.
mitra, mihira[18]	mithra	mihr	name of a god, sun, friend, friendship.
vasishṭha	aŵhu vahista	behisht	best, paradise.
mās	māoñh	māh	moon, month.
stăr (vedic)	ştăre	sitārah	star.
abhra	awra	abr	cloud.
megha	maegha	mégh	cloud.
kshapā	kshap	shab	night.
gharma	garĕma	garmā	heat, summer.
hima	zima	zam	winter, cold.
vāta	vāta	bād	wind.
chhāyā	. . .	sāyah	shade.
chhatra	. . .	chatar	umbrella.
ranga	. . .	rang	colour.
gandha	gaiñti	gand	smell, bad smell.
karpūra	. . .	kāfur	camphor.
soma	haoma	hom	soma plant.
atharvan	ātharvan	āturbān	priest, fire-priest, saint.
namas	nĕmañh	namāz	adoration, prayers.
manas	manañh	mansh	mind, disposition.
guṇa	gaona	gūnah	quality, colour.
drugdha	draogha	darogh	injury, lie.
tṛishṇā	tarshna	tishnagī	thirst.
tṛishita, tṛishṇaj	. . .	tishnah	thirsty.
śoka	. . .	sog	grief.
bhī, bhīma	. . .	bīm	fear, terrible.
kāma	. . .	kām	wish, desire.
rahas	. . .	rāz	secret.
kārya	kāra	kār	work.

[18] Mihira is mentioned by Böhtlingk and Roth as occurring in the Mahābhārata iii. 191, as a name of the sun. Mitra occurs in the same sense in the same line.

SANSKRIT.	ZEND.	PERSIAN.	ENGLISH.
bhishaj	bhaēshaza	bĕchashk, bijishk	physician.
kulāla	. . .	kulāl	potter.
ishṭikā (?)	istya	khisht	brick.
yātu	yātu	jādū	sorcerer, sorcery.
gola	. . .	golah	a ball.
tāra	. . .	tār	wire, chord, musical note.
jyā	. . .	zih, zĕh	a bowstring.
tīra	. . .	tīr	arrow.
vistara	. . .	bistar	bed.
paryanka, palyanka	. . .	palang[19]	bed.
rathyā	raithya	rāh	road.
kumbha	. . .	khumb	jar.
sthūṇā	. . .	sitūn	pillar.
sthāna	śtāna	āstān	place, threshold.
dāha	dăgha	dāgh	burning, a mark from burning.
ārāma	rāman	ārām	rest, pleasure, garden.
kunja	. . .	kunj	corner, arbour.
drapsa	drafsha	dirafsh	drop, spark, banner, lightning.
tokman	taokhman	tukhm	a blade of grain, seed.
sangama	hañjamana	anjuman	an assemblage.
pratāpa	. . .	parto	lustre.
śakuna	. . .	shagūn	bird, omen.
chaturanga	. . .	shatrang	chess.
dūra	dūra	dūr	far.
nedishṭha	nazda	nizd	near.
mahat	maz, mazañt	mih	great.
mahattara	. . .	mihtar	greater, chief.
guru, garīyas	. . .	girāñ	heavy.
tanu	. . .	tanuk	slender.
sama	. . .	hamah	all.
sam	. . .	hum	together.
sarva	haurva	har	all.
nema	naēma	nīm	half.
śukra (bright)	śukhra	surkh	red.
śubha	. . .	khūb	fair.
savya	havya	chap	left.
rajishṭha (vedic)	razista	rāst	straight.
śveta	śpaēta	saped, safed	white.
śyāma, śyāva	śyāva	siyāh	black, brown.
pūrṇa	pĕrĕna	pur	full.
tigma, tīkshṇa, tejas, tij (to sharpen)	tighra, tizhin	tej	sharp, sharpness.
dīrgha	darĕgha	darāz	long.
rāma	rāma	rām	pleasant, pleasantness, happy.
nashṭa	. . .	nashat	destroyed.
sthāvara	śtawra	ustuwār	firm
matta	. . .	mast	intoxicated.

[19] See p. 19, note 26.

SANSKRIT.	ZEND.	PERSIAN.	ENGLISH.
durnāman	. . .	dushnām	bad name, abuse.
durmanas	. . .	dujmanish, dushman	hostile, disturbed in mind.
kva, kutra, kuha (vedic)	kuthra	ku[jā]	where?
na	na	nah	not.
tvam	tūm	tū	thou.
yushmat	. . .	shumā	you.
sva	qa, hava, hva,	khūd	you, own, self.
katama	. . .	kadām	who?
tara	tara	tar	sign of comp. degree.
antar	añtare	andar	within.
upari	upairi	bar	above.
paśchāt, paścha	paśkāt, paścha	pas	after.
idānīm	. . .	īdūn	now.
viṁśati	vīśaiti	bīst	twenty.
panchāśat	. . .	panjāh	fifty.
shashṭi	khshasti	shast	sixty.
saptati	haptāiti	haftād	seventy.
aśīti	aśtāiti	hashtād	eighty.
navati	navaiti	navad	ninety.
śata	śata	ṣad	a hundred.
sahasra	hazañra	hazār	a thousand.
durvāra	. . .	dushwār[20]	difficult to stop, difficult.

NOTE.—On the other hand, I may specify the instance of āfat (Ar.) and āpad (Sans.), in which a word of similar sound has the same sense of "calamity" in Arabic and Sanskrit.

Now the old language of Bactria or Persia, from which the words in the above list, still forming part of the modern Persian, must be derived, was a language closely connected with the Sanskrit. That language, in one of its branches, and at a certain stage of its progress, was the Zend, which we find employed in the Zendavesta, or sacred volume of the Zoroastrians, or Parsīs, a work which still exists, and is studied with increasing success by European scholars.

In the same way, if we compare Sanskrit with the language of the ancient Greeks (who lived to the north-west of Persia, on the eastern and western shores of the Ægean Sea), and with that of the Romans, who inhabited Italy, we shall find a close resemblance, and frequently an almost perfect identity in very many words, both as regards the roots and the inflection.

[20] Wār is a Persian suffix, perhaps unconnected with the Sanskrit vāra; but there is no doubt of the identity of the Persian particle dush and the Sanskrit dus.

The resemblances between languages may be twofold. First, as regards the roots of the words. For instance, in Sanskrit we have the word nāman, "name," and we find the same word nām in the same sense both in Persian and Hindī. The second resemblance is in the mode of inflection. Here we do not find any resemblance in regard to the way in which this word nāman is declined between the Sanskrit and the Persian and Hindī languages. The Sanskrit has three numbers, singular, dual, and plural, and seven cases (besides the vocative) in each number, whereas the Persian and Hindī have only two numbers, singular and plural, and the cases are formed in quite a different way from those of the Sanskrit. To prove this it will be sufficient to give the different cases of the singular number of this word in each of the languages.

SANSKRIT.		PERSIAN.	HINDĪ.
Nom.	nāma	nām	nām
Acc.	nāma	nāmrā	nāmko
Inst.	nāmnā	wanting, and supplied by prepositions.	nām se, nām karke
Dat.	nāmne		nāmko
Abl.	nāmnas		nām se
Gen.	nāmnas		nāmkā
Loc.	nāmni		nām meñ
Voc.	nāma	nām	nām

If now we compare the Latin word for "name" with the Sanskrit, we shall find not only that the root is the same, but also that the mode of inflection is very similar: thus,—

Singular.

SAKSKRIT.		LATIN.
Nom.	nāma (from crude form nāman)	nomen
Acc.	nāma	nomen
Inst.	nāmnā	nomine
Dat.	nāmne	nomini
Abl.	nāmnas	nomine
Gen.	nāmnas	nominis
Loc.	nāmni	nomine
Voc.	nāma	nomen

Plural.

SANSKRIT.		LATIN.
Nom.	nāmāni	nomina
Acc.	nāmāni	nomina
Inst.	nāmabhis	nominibus
Dat.	nāmabhyas	nominibus
Abl.	nāmabhyas	nominibus
Gen.	nāmnām	nominum
Loc.	nāmāsu	nominibus
Voc.	nāmāni	nomina

The Latin language has no dual.

We see here that while the same root expressing the word "name" is common to all these languages, the Persian and Hindī have lost the ancient forms of inflection, while the Sanskrit and Latin have preserved them. There thus exists a double resemblance, viz.; first of roots, and second of inflections, between the Latin and the Sanskrit, and the same remark is equally true of the Greek and the Zend.

Now, when we find that a multitude of roots coincide in any two languages, of which the one does not derive them from the other, we may be sure (even though the one may have no complex system of inflections, while the other has), that those two languages have a common origin, especially if we can show that the one which is deficient in inflections has gradually lost them by a particular process of alteration which can still be traced. But if any two languages resemble one another both in roots and inflections, the proof of their affinity is then greatly strengthened.

SECT. II.—Detailed illustrations of the affinities of Sanskrit with the Zend, Greek, and Latin languages.

I proceed now to furnish, first, some specimens of words which as roots correspond to each other in Sanskrit, Zend, Greek, and Latin; and I shall afterwards exhibit the mutual resemblances of these four languages in point of inflection also.

The following is a list of words (derived from the publications of Bopp, Benfey, Aufrecht, Curtius, Fick, Justi, and others) which correspond both in sound and sense in Sanskrit, Zend, Greek, and Latin.

In many of these words the resemblance is so close that no doubt can be entertained of their affinity, that they are all the representatives (more or less changed) of some one particular word in the original language from which they have all been derived. In other cases where the resemblance is not so apparent, the affinity can nevertheless be satisfactorily proved by observation of the fact that one or more of the letters of words having the same signification in the different languages always or generally vary from one another in a uniform manner in the different languages. It will be necessary to illustrate this point in detail.

I should first remark that the original forms of the cognate words in question, as they existed in their assumed mother-language, cannot in all cases be determined with certainty, but in most instances they can be fixed with an approach to precision. Thus, from a comparison of the Sanskrit ahi with the Greek ekhis, and the Latin anguis, we may gather with probability that the original form was aghi, or anghi. Similarly the Sanskrit duhitar and the Greek thugatēr seem to come from dughatar or dhughatar; aśva and equus from akva; śvan and kuon from kvan; jānu and gonu from gānu; jnā, gignosko and nosco (cognosco) from gnā, etc. Some of the consonants found in Sanskrit do not appear to have existed in the original Indo-European tongue, such as cha, chha, ja, jha, which are considered to have been developed out of k and g. From a comparison of the different cognate words, it results that certain consonants of the original language remain uniform in all the derivative tongues, whilst others vary in one or more of the latter. This is shown in the following table, abridged from that given in Schleicher's Compendium der vergl. Grammatik (3rd ed.), p. 328.

Indo-European.	Sanskrit (or old Indian).	Zend (or old Bactrian).	Greek.	Latin.
k	k (kh), ch ś, ṗ	k (x̌), ch ś, p	k (κ), g (γ) p (π), t (τ)	c, qv
g	g, j	g (gh), j ž, z	g (γ), b (b)	g, gv, v.
gh	gh, h	g, gh, ž, z	kh (χ)	g, gv, v, h, f.
t	t, th	t (th, ṭ)	t (τ)	t
d	d	d (dh)	d (δ)	d, l.
dh	dh	d (dh)	th (θ)	d, f, b.
p	p, ph	p (f)	p (π)	p.
b [21]	b	b [17]	b (β)	b.
bh	bh	b (w)	ph (φ)	b, f.
n	n	n	n (ν)	n.
m	m	m	m (μ)	m.
r	r, l, (r, ṛ, & l as vowels)	r	r (ρ), l (λ)	r, l.
y	y	y	i (ι), ĕ (ε), ds (ζ), h (῾)	j, i.
s	s, sh	s, sh, ś, h, ńh, n'h, qh	s (σ), h (῾)	s, r.
v	v	v, (w), p, b	u (υ) F	v, u.
sk	chh	. . .	. . .	. . .
sv	. . .	qh	. . .	. . .

In Sanskrit the dental letters (t, th, d, dh, s) sometimes become linguals (or cerebrals ṭ, ḍ, etc.), and the nasals n and m become ṅ, ń, and ñ, in consequence of certain phonetic laws. In Greek ky, khy, ty, thy = ss; dy, gy = ζ (ds).

These laws and variations are exemplified in such words as the following:—

(a) where k remains common to Sanskrit, Greek, and Latin—as in aksha, axon(=aksōn); axis(=aksis) or dakshina, dexios (=deksios), dexter (=dekster); or kshura = xuron (=kshuron).

(b) where k in Greek and c (=k) in Latin are represented by ś (श) in [21] Schleicher places a mark of interrogation (?) after the b, and in the Zend column omits the b and puts only a mark of interrogation.

Sanskrit—as in deka, decem = daśan; ekaton, centum = śatam; kuōn, canis = śvan; derk = darś. According to Bopp, (Comp. Gram., 2nd ed.) sec. 21*a*, the Sanskrit ś is almost always the corruption of an original k. Schleicher (p. 165) says it was originally a k, and ought perhaps properly to be pronounced as the German ch, which is in sound not unlike the Persian and Arabic khe (خ).

(c) G in Greek and Latin is in Sanskrit frequently represented by j, as in ago, ago = ajāmi; in gignosko, nosco = jānāmi; gennao, gigno = jajanmi; agros, ager = ajra.

(d) Kh (χ) in Greek is represented by gh, and h in Sanskrit, and by h and g in Latin, as in elakhus = laghus, ekhis = ahi and anguis, kheima = hima and hiems.

(e) Th (θ) in Greek is represented by dh in Sanskrit, and by f or d in Latin, as in tithēmi = dadhāmi; měthu = madhu; thumos = dhūma, fumus.

(f) Ph (φ) in Greek is represented in Sanskrit by bh, and in Latin by f and b, as in phuo = bhavāmi and fui; ophrus = bhrū; phero = bharāmi and fero; phratria = bhratār, frater.

(g) G in Sanskrit is sometimes represented by b in Greek and Latin, as in go = būs, bos.

Numerous other illustrations will be found in the tables which follow.

Table No. X.

I. NOUNS AND ADJECTIVES.

SANSKRIT.	ZEND.	GREEK.	LATIN.	ENGLISH.
pitar	patar	patēr	pater	father.
mātar	mātar	mētēr	mater	mother.
tāta	. . .	tetta	tata	father.
nānā	. . .	ηanna	. . .	mother, aunt.
bhrātar	brātar	phratria (a clan)	frater	brother.
svasar	qañhar	. . .	soror	sister.
duhitar	dughdhar	thugatēr	. . .	daughter.
naptar, napāt	napa	anepsios	nepos	grandson, cousin naptrī	napti	. . .	neptis	grand-daughter.
devar, devara	. . .	daer	. . .	husband's brother.
snushā	. . .	nuos	nurus	daughter-in-law.
jāmātar	zāmātar	gambros	gener	son-in-law.
śvaśura	qaśura	hekuros	socer	father-in-law.
śvaśrū	. . .	hekura	socrus	mother-in-law.
pitṛivya	. . .	patrōs	patruus	father's brother.
sūnu	hunu	huios	. . .	son.
vidhavā	. . .	. . .	vidua	widow.

SANSKRIT.	ZEND.	GREEK.	LATIN.	ENGLISH.
nara	nara	anēr	. . .	man.
jani, gnā	jēni	gunē	. . .	woman.
vīra	. . .	hērōs ?	vir	hero, man.
vīratā	. . .	. . .	virtus	valour.
śūra	śūra	. . .	kurios	strong, hero, lord.
rājan	. . .	. . .	rex	king.
rājnī	. . .	. . .	regina	queen.
jaras	zaurva	gēras	. . .	old age.
jaran	zaorura	gĕron	. . .	old man.
yuvan	yavan	. . .	juvenis	young man.
pati	paiti	posis	potis, potens	lord, husband, able.
patnī	. . .	pŏtnia	. . .	mistress, honourable.
ātman	. . .	atmos, aütmēn	. . .	breath, soul, vapour.
an (to breathe)	. . .	anemos	animus	wind, mind.
kṛip (to make)	kerefs (nom.)	. . .	corpus	body.
hṛidaya	zaredhaya	kardia	cor	heart.
śiras	śara	kara	cerebrum	head, brain.
kapāla	. . .	kephale	caput	head.
akshi	ashi	ōps, ŏkŏs, ŏkkŏs	oculus	eye.
nās, nāsā, nāsikā	nāoṅha	. . .	nāsus, nāres	nose.
bhrū	brvaṭ	ophrus	. . .	eyebrow.
ās, āsya	āoṅh	. . .	ōs	face.
dat, dantam (acc.)	dañtan	odonta (acc.)	dentem (acc.)	tooth.
hănu	. . .	genus	gena	jaw, chin, cheek.
nakha	. . .	onux, onukhos (gen.)	unguis	nail.
jambha	. . .	gomphos	. . .	tooth.
gir	. . .	gērus	. . .	speech.
bāhu	bāzu	pēkhus	. . .	arm.
asthi	aśti	osteon	ŏs	bone.
kravya, kravis	. . .	krĕas	caro	raw flesh, flesh.
pād, pāda	pādha	pūs pŭdŏs (gen.)	pēs pĕdis (gen.)	foot.
padāti	. . .	pezos	pedes (peditis)	footman.
pāda	. . .	pĕdon	. . .	field.
jānu	zhnu	gŏnu	genu	knee.
udara	udara	. . .	uterus	belly.
jaṭhara	. . .	gastĕr	. . .	belly.
antra	. . .	entĕron	venter ?	entrails, belly.
yakrit	. . .	hēpar	jecur	liver.
nābhi	. . .	omphalos	umbilicus	navel.
śrōni	śraoni	klonis	clūnis	hip, end of spine.
kukshi	. . .	kokhōnē	cox	belly, hipbone, etc.
plīhan	. . .	splēn	lien	spleen.
keśa, kesa, keśara, kesara	. . .	. . .	cæsaries	hair of the head.
ūdhas	. . .	ūthar [gen.]	über	udder.
sakṛit	. . .	skōr (skatos,	stercus	dung.
āyus	. . .	aiōn	ævum	life.
toka, takman	. . .	tĕkos, tĕknon	. . .	child.
paśu	paśu	pōu ?	pecu	cattle.
go	gāo	būs	bōs	ox.
sthūra	staora	tauros	taurus	bull, etc.
aśva	aśpa	hippos	equus	horse.
avi	. . .	ois	ovis	sheep.
aja	. . .	aiz	. . .	goat.

SANSKRIT.	ZEND.	GREEK.	LATIN.	ENGLISH.
śvan	śpā, śūni	kuōn	cănis	dog.
śvānam (acc.)	śpāněm	kuna	canem	dog (nom.)
'ūkara, sūkara	hu	sus, hus	sus	hog.
vṛika	vehrka	lukos	lupus	wolf.
ṛiksha	. . .	arkos	ursus	bear.
lopāśaka	. . .	alōpēx	. . .	jackall, fox.
mūsh, mūsha	. . .	mūs	mus	mouse.
vi	vi	oiōnos	avis	bird.
vartikā	. . .	ortux	. . .	quail.
haṁsa	. . .	khēn	anser	goose.
kuhūka, kokila	. . .	kokkux	cuculus	cuckoo.
kārava	. . .	corax	corvus	crow.
ulūka	. . .	. . .	ulula	owl.
tittiri	. . .	tetrix	. . .	partridge.
pika	. . .	. . .	pīca	Indian cuckoo, magpie.
udra, urdra	. . .	hudros, enudris	. . .	otter, water serahi	azhi	ĕkhis	anguis	serpent. [pent.
karka	. . .	karkinos	cancer	crab.
śarabha	. . .	karabos	. . .	locust, beetle.
puluka	. . .	psulla, psullos	pūlex	insect, flea.
makshikā	makshi	muïa	musca	fly.
Varuṇa	. . .	Uranos	. . .	Varuna, Heaven.
Dyaus	. . .	Zeus	. . .	The Sky, Zeus.
divyá	. . .	dīos	dīvus	celestial, divine.
Dyaus pitar	. . .	Zeus pătēr	Diespiter, Jupiter	Dyaus the father, etc.
deva	daeva	theos ?	deus	god [in Zend, demon].
divasa, divā	. . .	. . .	dies	day, by day.
naktam, naktā	. . .	nukta (acc.)	noctem (acc.)	night.
ushas	usha	ēōs, auōs	aurora	dawn.
agni	. . .	. . .	ignis	fire.
mās, māsa	māoñh	mēn, mēnē	mensis	moon, month.
stăr (vedic), tāra	śtāre	astēr, astron	astrum	star.
śaru	. . .	keraunos	. . .	thunderbolt.
nabhas	. . .	nĕphos	nubes	sky, cloud.
abhra	awra	ombros, aphros	imber	cloud, rain, foam.
uda, udaka	. . .	hudor	unda	water, wave.
ap, āpas (nom.pl.)	ap	. . .	aqua	water.
śankha	. . .	konkhos	concha	shell, cockle.
hima	zima	khion, kheimon	hiems	winter, snow.
chhāyā	. . .	skia	. . .	shadow.
go, gmā	. . .	gē, gaia	. . .	the earth.
kshmā	zem	khamai	. . .	earth, on the ground.
kshoṇi	. . .	kthōn	. . .	the earth.
kakud, kakudmat	. . .	. . .	cacumen	peak, mountain.
ajra (vedic)	. . .	agros	ager	field.
dru, druma	dru	dru, drumos	. . .	tree, wood.
dāru	dāuru	doru	. . .	wood, spear.
madhu	madhu	methu	. . .	honey, wine.
yava	yava	zĕa	. . .	barley, etc.
andhas	. . .	anthos	. . .	plant, flower.
ayas	. . .	. . .	aes	iron, copper.
rajata	erezăta	arguros	argentum	silver.
apas	. . .	. . .	opus	work.

SANSKRIT.	ZEND.	GREEK.	LATIN.	ENGLISH.
apnas	. . .	aphenos	opes	wealth.
pur, purī	. . .	pŏlis	. . .	city.
dama	demāna	domos	domus	house.
veśa (okas ?)	. . .	Foikos	vicus	house, village.
dvār	. . .	thura	fores	door.
rai	. . .	. . .	rēs	thing, possession.
svapna (svap, to sleep)	gafna	hupnos	sopor, somnus	sleep.
aśman	aśman	akmōn	. . .	stone, anvil, thunderbolt.
śarkarā, karkara	. . .	. . .	calx	limestone.
nau	. . .	naus	navis	ship.
aritra	. . .	eretmos	. . .	oar.
aritar	. . .	eretēs	. . .	rower.
aksha	. . .	axōn	axis	axle.
kshura	. . .	xuron	. . .	razor.
paraśu	. . .	pĕlĕkus	. . .	axe.
asi	. . [dom)	. . .	ensis	sword.
kratu (vedic)	khratu (wis-	kratos	. . .	strength.
vanas, van, (to love)	van	. . .	venus, venustas	beauty, Venus.
pathin	pathan	patos	. . .	road.
āgas	. . .	agos	. . .	sin, guilt.
dhūma	. . .	thumos	fumus	smoke, spirit.
budhna	buna	puthmēn	fundus	bottom.
chakra	chakhra	kuklos	circus	wheel, circle, etc.
dhūpa	. . .	tuphos	. . .	incense, smoke.
kalama	. . .	kalamos	calamus	reed.
sthūnā, sthūla (thick)	śtūna	stulos	. . .	pillar.
kumbha	. . .	kumdē, kumbos	. . .	vessel, jar.
svara	. . .	surinx	susurrus	sound, pipe, whisper.
marmara	. . .	mormuro (to murmur)	murmur	murmur.
khalīna, khalina	. . .	khalīnos	. . .	bridle, etc.
aṁhas	azaṅh	ankhō (to strangle)	ango (to afflict)	straits. [sion.
ūrjā, ūrjas	. . .	orgē	. . .	sap, power, pasojas	. . .	augē	. . .	brilliance.
makha	. . .	makhē (battle), makhaira (sword, knife)	mactare (to kill)	sacrifice.
sana	hana	henos	senex	old.
manḍa	. . .	. . .	mundus	ornament, world.
koṇa	. . .	gōnia	. . .	corner.
rasa	. . .	drosos	ros	liquid, dew.
kūpa	. . .	kupē, gupe	. . .	hole, well.
stūpa	. . .	tumbos	tumulus	mound.
phulla	. . .	phullon	folium	flower, leaf.
arjana	. . .	ergon	. . .	earning, work.
puru, pulu (vedic)	. . .	pŏlus	plus	much, more.
uru, pṛithu	. . .	eurus, platus	. . .	broad.
gurū	. . .	barus	gravis	heavy.
garīyas	. . .	. . .	gravius	heavier.
garishṭha	. . .	. . .	gravissimus	heaviest.

SANSKRIT.	ZEND.	GREEK.	LATIN.	ENGLISH.
varishṭha	. . .	aristos?	. . .	best.
laghu	. . .	elakhus	levis	light, small.
laghishṭha	. . .	elakhistos	levissimus	lightest.
mahān	. . .	megas	magnus	great.
mahīyān	. . .	meizōn	major	greater.
mañhishṭha (vedic)	. . .	megistos	maximus	greatest, venerable.
bahu	. . .	pakhus	. . .	great, thick.
āśu	. . .	ōkus	ocior	swift, swifter.
mṛidu	. . .	bradus	. . .	soft, slow.
tanu	. . .	. . .	tenuis	slender.
ṣudhira	. . .	eruthros	ruber	blood, red.
gharma	. . .	thermos	formus	heat, hot.
śushka	hisku, huska	. . .	siccus	dry.
pūrṇa	. . .	pleos	plenus	full.
dīrgha	. . .	dolikhos	. . .	long.
barbara, varbara	. . .	barbaros	barbarus	barbarous.
sama	hama	homos	similis	like.
sthira	. . .	stereos	. . .	firm.
bala (strong, strength)	. . .	. . .	validus (valeo, to be strong)	strong.
dakshiṇa	dashina	dexios	dexter	right (side).
nava	nava	neos	novus	new.
sāmi	. . .	hēmi	sēmi	half.
madhya	maidhya	mesos	medius	middle.
ekatara	. . .	hekateros	. . .	one of two.
satya	. . .	eteos	. . .	true.
svādu	. . .	hēdus	svavis	sweet.
āma	. . .	ōmos	. . .	raw.
uttara	. . .	hustĕros	. . .	subsequent.
pīvan, pīna	. . .	piōn	. . .	fat.
dhrishṭa	. . .	thrasus	. . .	bold, rash.
ārdra	. . .	ardō	. . .	moist, to moisten.
priśni	. . .	perknos	. . .	speckled. [ful.
kalya, kalyāṇa	. . .	kălos	. . .	agreeable, beauti-palita	. . .	polios	pallidus	hoary, pale.
mala (dirt), malina	. . .	mĕlas	mălus	dirty, black, bad.
kāṭa	. . .	kelainos	caligo (darkness)	black.
tumula, tumala	. . .	. . .	tumultus (tumult)	noisy.

II. PREPOSITIONS, PARTICLES, AND PRONOUNS.

sam	ham	sun	con	with.
pari	pairi	peri	per	round.
upari	upairi	huper	super	above.
upa	. . .	hupo	sub	near, under.
prati	paiti	pros, próti	. . .	towards.
pra	fra	prŏ	prō	before.
antar	añtare	entos	inter, intus	within.
apa	apa	apo	ab	away.
api	avi	ĕpi	. . .	towards, on.
abhi	aibi, aiwi	amphi	. . .	towards, round.
samū, samayā	. . .	hama	. . .	together.
păram, pāra	pāra	perā	. . .	other side, beyond.

SANSKRIT.	ZEND.	GREEK.	LATIN.	ENGLISH.
parā	. . .	para	. . .	past.
puras, purā	parō	paros	. . .	before.
tar (to cross), tiras	tarō	terma (limit)	trans	across.
su	hu	eu	. . .	well.
dus	dush	dus	. . .	ill.
sumanas	humanañh	eumenēs	. . .	kindly-minded.
durmanas	dusmaṇañh	dusmenēs	. . .	evil-minded.
nūnam	nū	nūn	nunc	now.
a, an	a, an	a, an	in	privative particle.
na	na	nē	nĕ (fas), non	negative.
nanu	. . .		nonne	is not?
kas, kis	ko, chis	tis	quis	who?
nakis, mākis	mā+chis	ūtis mētis	nemo nequis	no one, let no one.
kim, kad	kaṭ	ti	quid	what?
kataras	katāro	poteros	uter	which of two?
itaras	. . .	hĕtĕros	alter	other.
ubha	uba	ampho	ambo	both.
anya	anya	enioi	. . .	other, some.
kva, kuha, kutra	kva, katha, kuthra	pū, kū (Ionic)	quo	where?
kutaḥ	. . .	pŏthĕn	. . .	whence.
kati	chaiti, chvañṭ	pŏsoi, kosoi (Ionic)	quot, quotus, quantus	how many?
tati	. . .	tosoi	tot	so many.
kadā	kadha	pŏtĕ, kŏtĕ (Ionic)	quando	when?
tadā	tadha	tote	. . .	then yadā	yadā	hote	. . .	when tatas	. . .	tothĕn	. . .	thence.
yatas	. . .	hothen	. . .	whence.
ittham, itthā (vedic)	uiti, avatha	. . .	item, ita	thus paśchāt, paścha	paśkāt, paśnē	opisthen	post	after.
makshu	. . .	. . .	mox	quickly.
anti	. . .	anti	ante	opposite, near, before.
ati	. . .	eti	. . .	beyond, further.
mithas	. . .	meta	. . .	mutual, with.
cha	cha	kai	que	and.

III. NUMERALS.

dvi	dva	duo	duo	two.
trayas	thrāyō	treis	tres	three.
tisras (fem.)	tishăro (fem.)
chatvāras	chathwāro	tessares	quatuor	four.
panchan	pañchan	pente	quinque	five.
shaṭ	khshvas	hex	sex	six.
saptan	hăptan	hepta	septem	seven.
ashṭan	astan	oktō	octo	eight.
navan	navan	hennea	novem	nine.
daśan	daśan	deka	decem	ten.
viṁśati	vīśaiti	eikosi	viginti	twenty.
śatam	śatĕm	hekaton	centum	hundred.
prathamas	frătemo	prōtos	primus	first.

SANSKRIT.	ZEND.	GREEK.	LATIN.	ENGLISH.
dvitīyas	daibityo, bityo	deuteros	secundus	second.
tṛitīyas	thrityo	tritos	tertius	third.
chaturthas, turyas	tūiryo	tetartos	quartus	fourth.
panchathas (vedic), panchamas	pankhdho	pemptos	quintus	fifth.
shashṭhas	khstvo	hektos	sextus	sixth.
saptamas	haptatho	hebdomos	septimus	seventh.
ashṭamas	astémo	ogdoos	octavus	eighth.
navamas	naomo, nāumo	hennatos	nonus	ninth.
daśamas	daśémo	dekatos	decimus	tenth.
dvis	bizhvaṭ, bis	dis	bis	twice.
tris	thrizhvaṭ, thris	tris	ter	thrice.
dvidhā	. . .	dikha	. . .	in two ways.
tridhā	. . .	trikha	. . .	in three ways.
chaturdhā	. . .	tetrakha	. . .	in four ways.
panchadhā	. . .	pentakha	. . .	in five ways.
parut	. . .	perusi	. . .	last year.
parutna	. . .	perusinos	. . .	of last year.
hyas	. . .	khés	heri	yesterday.
hyastana	. . .	. . .	hesternus	of yesterday.

IV. VERBS AND PARTICIPLES.

dar	dar	derō	. . .	to tear, flay.
dā, dadāmi	dadhāmi	didōmi	do	to give.
dātar	dātar	dotēr	dator	giver (masc.)
dātrī	. . .	doteira	datrix	giver (fem.)
dāna	dāta, dāthra	dōron	donum	gift.
dhā, dadhāmi	. . .	tithēmi	. . .	to place.
sthā, tishṭhāmi	śtā, histāmi	histēmi	sto	to stand, place.
asthām	. . .	estōn	. . .	I stood.
sthāman	. . .	. . .	stamen	strength, thread.
miśrayāmi, mikshāmi	. . .	mignumi	misceo	to mix.
star, striṇōmi	śtar	stornumi, strōnnumi	sterno	to spread.
stariman	śtarema	strōma	stramen	bed, litter, carpet.
bhar	bar	pherō	fero	to bear.
bhāra	. . .	phoros, phortion	. . .	load.
bhū	bū	phuō	fui	to be, I was.
lih, lehmi	. . .	likhō	lingo	to lick.
tan, tanōmi	thañj	tanuō, teinō	tendo	to stretch.
tatāna	. . .	. . .	tetendi	I stretched.
jan, jajanmi	zan	gennao	gigno	to beget.
janitar	zāthar	genetōr	genitor	father.
janitrī	. . .	genetira	genetrix	mother.
jāta	zāta	. . .	gnatus	born, son.
janus	gaona	genos	genus	birth, kind.
prajā, prajāti	. . .	. . .	progenies	progeny.
jnā, jānāmi	zā	gignōscō	gnosco	to know.
jnāta	. . .	gnōtos	(g)notus	known.
ajnāta	. . .	agnōtos	ignotus	unknown.
nāman (jnāman)	nāman	onoma	(g)nomen, cognomen	name, surname.

SANSKRIT.	ZEND.	GREEK.	LATIN.	ENGLISH.
tudāmi	. . .	. . .	tundo	to wound, to beat.
tutōda	. . .	. . .	tutudi	I have beaten.
sēv, sap[22]	. . .	sebŏmai	. . .	to reverence.
lubhyati	. . .	liptomai (to long for)	lubet	he desires (S.) it pleases. (L.)
tup	. . .	tuptō	. . .	to hurt, beat.
ad	ad	edō	edo	to eat.
adana, anna	. . .	edānos / edētus	. . . / . . .	eatable, food.
vah, vahāmi	vaz, vazāmi	ocheomai	veho	to carry.
avākshīt	. . .	. . .	vexit	he carried.
skand	. . .	. . .	scando	to go, ascend.
lip, limpāmi	. . .	aleiphō	. . .	to anoint.
sarp	. . .	hĕrpō	serpo	to creep.
sarpa	. . .	hĕrpĕton	serpens	serpent.
vāstu / vas (to dwell)	. . .	Fastu	. . .	habitation, city.
vas	vañh	hĕnnumi	vestio	to clothe.
vastra	vaśtra	hesthēs	vestis	clothing, garment.
vā	vā	aō, aēmi	. . .	to blow.
vāta	vāta	. . .	ventus	wind.
pat, patāmi	. . .	petomai	peto	to fall, fly, seek.
apaptam	. . .	epipton	. . .	I fell.
apaptat	. . .	epipte	. . .	he fell.
patatri	. . .	peteinos	. . .	winged.
śad	śad	. . .	cado	to fall.
sad, sīdāmi	had	hezŏmai	sedeo	to sink, sit.
sadas	. . .	hĕdos	sedes	seat.
chhid, chhinadmi	. . .	schizō	scindo	to cut.
chhindanti	. . .	. . .	scindunt	they cut.
bhid, bhinadmi	. . .	. . .	findo	to cleave.
bhindanti	. . .	. . .	findunt	they cleave.
tarp	. . .	terpō	. . .	to be satisfied, please.
dam	. . .	damaō, damnēmi	domo	to subdue.
arindama	. . .	ippodamos	. . .	subduer, of foes (S), horses (G.).
labh	. . .	lambanō	. . .	to take.
lapsye	. . .	lēpsomai	. . .	I will take.
anj	añj	. . .	ungo	to anoint.
anktum	. . .	. . .	unctum	to anoint.
plu	. . .	pleō	fluo, pluo	to swim, sail, flow, rain.
man, manye / mnā, manāmi	. . .	mnaomai	memini	I think, remember.
manas	manañh	mĕnos	mens	mind, spirit.
hu, juhōmi	. . .	kheō	. . .	to pour out.
huta	. . .	khutos	. . .	poured out, offered
daś	daś	daknō	. . .	to bite.
dashṭa	. . .	dĕktos	. . .	bitten.
kar, karōmi	kar	krainō	creo	to do, fulfil, create.
ās, āse	āh	hēmai	. . .	to sit.
āste	. . .	hēstai	. . .	he sits.
vam	vam	emeō	vomo	to vomit.

[22] See Benfey's Glossary to S.V.; and asapanta in R.V. vii. 83, 8; and Curtius, pp. 474 and 519.

SANSKRIT.	ZEND.	GREEK.	LATIN.	ENGLISH.
pard	. . .	perdomai	pedo	ventris crepitum edere.
svid	. . .	hidroō	sudo	to sweat.
sveda	. . .	hidrōs	sudor	sweat.
ard	. . .	. . .	ardeo	to afflict, be on fire.
svan	. . .	. . .	sono	to sound.
stan	. . .	stenō	tono	groan, sound, thunder.
stanayitnu	. . .	. . .	tonitru	thunder.
lu	. . .	luō	luo	to cut, loose, pay.
vart	. . .	. . .	verto	to be, turn.
vartatē	. . .	. . .	vertit	he is, turns.
mih	miz	omikheō	mingo	to make water.
ēmi (from i)	. . .	eimi	eo	I go.
mar	mar	. . .	morior	to die.
mṛityu	měrěthyu	. . .	mors	death.
mṛita	[ava] měrěta	. . .	mortuus	dead.
martya	mărěta	brŏtŏs	mortalis	mortal.
amṛita	amahrka	ambrŏtŏs	immortalis	immortal.
amṛitam	. . .	ambrŏsia	ambrosia	food of the gods.
darś	. . .	derkomai	. . .	to see.
vid, vēdmi	vid	Feido	video	to know, see.
vēda	. . .	Foida	. . .	I know.
vidma	. . .	Fidmen	vidimus	we know, see.
vettha	. . .	oistha	. . .	thou knowest.
chi, chiketi	. . .	. . .	scio	to perceive, know.
pū, punāmi	. . .	. . .	puto, pūrus (pure)	to cleanse.
tap	tafś	. . .	tepeo	to be hot.
prachh, pṛichhāmi	parěś	. . .	precor	to ask, pray.
spaś	śpaś	skeptomai	specio	to see, observe.
tras	tareś	trěō	terreo	to fear, frighten.
naś	. . .	nekus (a dead body)	necare, nex (death)	to perish, kill.
sparś	. . .	. . .	spargo	to touch, scatter.
masj, majjāmi	. . .	. . .	mergo	to sink.
lag	. . .	legō	lego	to touch, lay, gather.
pṛich (parch)	. . .	plekō	plecto	to touch, twine.
pṛikta	. . .	plektos	plexus	touched, twined.
arh	arej	arkhō	. . .	to be worthy, rule.
lōch, lōk	. . .	leusso	. . .	to look.
āloka	. . .	leukos (white)	lux	light.
ruch	ruch	leukos (white)	luceo, lux (light)	to shine.
vach, vachmi	vach	. . .	voco	to speak, call.
vāch	vāch	ops	vox	voice.
taksh[23]	tash	tiktō, teukho	texo	to fabricate, beget.
takshan	. . .	tektōn	textor	carpenter, weaver.
budh	. . .	punthanomai	puto	to think, ascertain.
vap[24]	vap	huphaino	. . .	to weave.

[23] Compare the words tōka, takman, teknon, in the list of nouns.

[24] Prof. Aufrecht finds in the word ūrṇavābhi the trace of an old root vabh, "to weave," which is still closer to the Greek form. See Böhtlingk and Roth's Dictionary, sub voce ūrṇavābhi.

SANSKRIT.	ZEND.	GREEK.	LATIN.	ENGLISH.
vṛish, varsha	vār	hersē, ersē	. . .	rain, dew.
bhanj, bhanajmi	. . .	Fagnumi	frango	to break.
bhuj	. . .	. . .	fruor?	to enjoy.
bhukta	. . .	. . .	fructus	enjoyed, fruit.
kṛip, kalp	. . .	. . .	carpo	to cut, pluck.
bhaj, bhaksh	. . .	phagō	. . .	to obtain, eat.
kup	. . .	. . .	cupio	to be excited, angry, desirous.
śru, śṛiṇōmi	śru	kluō	cluo	to hear.
jīv[25]	jīv	bioō	vivo	to live.
van[26]	van	. . .	venero	to love, worship.
kshan	. . .	kteinō,[27] ktinnūmi	. . .	to kill.
kshi	. . .	eu-kti-menos, peri-kti-ones	. . .	to dwell, well-built, dwellers around.
guh, gudh, gūḍha (hidden)	. . .	keuthō	. . .	to hide.
kir	. . .	krinō	cerno	I scatter, separate.
pā, pibāmi	pā	pinō	bibo, potare	I drink.
papau	. . .	pepōka	. . .	I have drunk.
pātum (to drink)	. . .	pōtos	potus	drunk.
gar, jāgarmi	. . .	eger, egeiro	. . .	I wake, rouse.
ajīgar	. . .	egrēgora	. . .	he awoke, I am awake.
pish, pinashmi	. . .	. . .	pinso	I pound.
pishṭa	. . .	. . .	pistus	pounded.
kamp(to tremble)	. . .	kamptō?	. . .	to bend.
(ni)dhana	. . .	thanatos	. . .	death.
bhaṇāmi	. . .	phōneō	. . .	I speak.
siv, sīvyāmi	. . .	(kas)suō	suo	I sew, patch.
syūta	. . .	. . .	sutus	sewn.
nah	. . .	. . .	necto	I bind.
drāmi	. . .	(apo) drānai, didraskō	. . .	I run.
adrāmām	. . .	edramon	. . .	I went, ran.
apādrān	. . .	apedran	. . .	they ran.
diś	diś	deiknumi	dico	I show, tell.
adiksham	. . .	edeixa	dixi	I showed, told.
adikshata	. . .	edeixate	dixistis	ye showed.
mā, māmi, mimē	mā	metreō	metior	I measure.
mātra	. . .	metron	metrum	a measure.
trap[28]	. . .	trepō[28]	. . .	I am ashamed, I turn.
trup, truph, trump	. . .	thruptō	. . .	to hurt, break.
yat	. . .	zētō	. . .	to strive, seek.
mard	. . .	. . .	mordeo	to rub, crush, bite.

[25] The original root is supposed to have been gīv, afterwards enlarged to gvīv, whence the Greek bios, bioo, etc., and the Latin vivo were derived by dropping the initial g. See Curtius, p. 418.

[26] See vanas and venus above, p. 233.

[27] Compare takshan and tektōn, in which also the Sanskrit ksh is equivalent to the Greek kt, p. 238 above.

[28] These two roots differ in sense; and perhaps have no affinity.

SANSKRIT.	ZEND.	GREEK.	LATIN.	ENGLISH.
mamarda	. . .	. . .	momordi	I rubbed, crushed, bit.
medh	. . .	medomai	. . .	to understand, think on.
nij	. . .	nizo	. . .	to cleanse.
āp	ăp	haptō	(ad)ipiciscor	to obtain, touch.
āpta	. . .	. . .	aptus	fit.
bandh	bañd	. . .	. . .	bind (root).
yuj, yunajmi	yuj	zeugnumi	jungo	to yoke, join.
yuktas	yukhto	zeuktos	junctus	joined.
yuga	. . .	zugon	jugam	yoke.
lup, lumpāmi	. . .	. . .	rumpo	to cut, break.
luptas	. . .	. . .	ruptus	dissolved, broken.
sach	. . .	hepomai	sequor	to follow.
bhrāj	. . .	phlego	fulgeo	to shine, burn.
bhṛijj	. . .	phrugō	frigo	to roast.
dhāv	. . .	theō	. . .	to run.
pach	pach	pepto	coquo	to cook.
pakva	. . .	pĕpōn, peptos	coctus	cooked.
lămb, ramb	. . .	. . .	lābor	to fall.
yaj	yaz	hazŏmai	. . .	to venerate.
yājya	. . .	hagios	. . .	venerable, holy.
sru, sravāmi	. . .	reo	. . .	to flow.
snu, snaumi	. . .	neo, nao	. . .	to flow, swim.
stambh	. . .	stembo	. . .	to prop, shake.
stambh	. . .	etaphon	. . .	to be stupefied, confounded.
stambha	. . .	thambos	. . .	stupefaction, astonishment.
trā, trai	. . .	tēreo	traho	to deliver, keep, draw.
mi, mināmi, minomi	. . .	minutho	minus	to destroy, diminish.
lap	. . .	lakeo	loqui	to speak.
śraddhā	. . .	. . .	crēdo	to believe.
śi, śete	śī, śāiti, śaētē	keitai	. . .	he lies.
śank	. . .	. . .	cunctor	to doubt, delay.
anch, anka	añku	ankulos	uncus	to bend, crooked, hook.
piś	. . .	poikillo	pingo	to paint.
gunj	. . .	gonguzo	. . .	to murmur.
aj	az	ago	ago	to lead, drive.
mṛij, (marj)	marez	omorgnumi	. . .	to wipe.
vṛij, (varj)	. . .	eirgo	. . .	to exclude.
sthag	. . .	stego	tego	to cover.
spṛih, (sparh)	. . .	sperkhomai	. . .	to haste, desire.
hary	. . .	khairo	. . .	to rejoice.
naś	naś	. . .	nanciscor (nactus, obtained)	to obtain.
ghar, gharāmi, jigharmi	. . .	khrio	. . .	anoint.
tij	tij	stizo	(di)stinguo	to be sharp, pierce, distinguish.
tigma	. . .	stigmē	. . .	sharp, point.
trish, (tarsh)	taresh	tersomai	torreo	to thirst, be dry, roast.
dā, dyāmi	. . .	deo, didēmi	. . .	to bind.

SANSKRIT.	ZEND.	GREEK.	LATIN.	ENGLISH.
dāman	. . .	desmos	. . .	bond.
dī	. . .	diemai, diomai	. . .	to fly, haste, chase.
skhad, skhand	. . .	skedannumi	. . .	to shed, spill, scatter.
par, piparmi	par	perao	. . .	to cross.
par, piparmi	par	pimplēmi	(im)pleo	to fill.
pū	pū	putho	puteo	to be putrid.
bhā	. . .	phaino	. . .	to appear.
bhās	. . .	phaos	. . .	light
bhī, bibhēmi	. . .	phebomai	. . .	to fear.
idh	. . .	aitho	. . .	to burn. [ful.
smar	mared	. . .	memor	to recollect, mind-
sphalāmi, sphulāmi	. . .	sphallo	fallo	to hesitate, deceive vaksh	vaksh	auxo	augeo	to increase.
gā, jigāmi	gā	baino	. . .	to go.
agām	. . .	ebēn	. . .	I went.
raksh	. . .	alexo	. . .	to protect.
kvaṇ	. . .	kanazo	cano	to sound, sing.
much, munchāmi	. . .	apo (musso)	mungo	to remove, free, wipe.
stigh	. . .	steikho	. . .	to ascend, walk.
hlād	. . .	kekhlāda	. . .	to rejoice, be wanton.
sphar, sphur	. . .	aspairo, spairo	. . .	to quiver.
mṛi, mṛiṇāmi	. . .	marnamai	. . .	to kill, fight.
ṛiṇomi	ar	ornumi	oriri	to go, rise, excite.
ārta	. . .	ōrto	ortus (risen)	he rose.
śinj	. . .	sizo	. . .	to hiss.
sphurj, sphūrj	. . .	spharagee	. . .	to thunder, crack.
kṛit	karet	kertomeos	. . .	to cut, cutting (as language).
nid	. . .	oneidizo	. . .	to reproach.
rad	. . .	. . .	rādere, rodere	to scratch, split, gnaw.
manyu	. . .	mainomai	. . .	anger, to rage.
śam, śram	. . .	kamno	. . .	to be tired.
dāy	dā	daio	. . .	to divide.
bharv	. . .	pherbo	. . .	to eat.

When the Zend word has been omitted in the proper column of the preceding list, I have not found it readily accessible. It will be gathered from the list that in many cases where the Greek language furnishes words equivalent both in sound and sense to certain Sanskrit words, the Latin, as preserved to us, has no words of corresponding form; and that, vice versâ, the Latin has often forms corresponding to the Sanskrit, where the Greek has none. In all the instances I have adduced, the affinity is, of course, not equally certain. Doubtful cases I have generally indicated by a mark of interrogation.

I now proceed, secondly, to exhibit the resemblances which exist between Sanskrit, Zend, Greek, and Latin, in respect of their modes of declension and conjugation, as well as generally in the formation of words from nominal and verbal roots.

I shall first of all adduce as an instance of this similarity, the first and second personal pronouns.

PERSONAL PRONOUNS.

SINGULAR.

	Sanskrit.	Zend.	Greek.	Latin.	English.
Nom.	ăhăm	azem	ĕgō	ego	I.
Acc.	mām	mâm, mā	mĕ	me	me
Inst.	măyā	. . .	. . .	. . .	by me.
Dat.	măhyăm, mē	maibyō mê, môi	ĕmoi, moi	mihi	to me
Abl.	măt	. . .	. . .	. . .	from me.
Gen.	mămă, mē	mana,me,môi	ĕmou, mou	mei	of me.
Loc.	măyi	. . .	emoi, moi	me	in me.

PLURAL.

