<sup>7</sup> Goodall, ii. 300.

<sup>8</sup> Fénelon, i. 208.

<sup>9</sup> Hosack, i. 480-499; For. Cal. Eliz., 1569, ix. 131-138.

<sup>10</sup> Anderson, iii. 35-39.

<sup>11</sup> Labanoff, ii. 295.

<sup>12</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 28.

<sup>13</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 44; Fénelon, i. 343.

<sup>14</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 45, 46.

<sup>15</sup> Diurnal, p. 142; For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 46, 47.

<sup>16</sup> Herries to Elizabeth, July 5, For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 93; Diurnal, p. 45.

- <sup>17</sup> Anderson, iii. 36-39. <sup>18</sup> Labanoff, ii. 339-341.
- <sup>19</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 73. The terms suggested for the arrangement are in For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 74.
- <sup>20</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 84. <sup>21</sup> Labanoff, ii. 368.
- <sup>22</sup> Haynes, Burleigh Papers, p. 520. <sup>23</sup> Anderson, iii. 70.
- <sup>24</sup> Bain, ii. 661. <sup>25</sup> Bain, Calendar, ii. 663, 664, 666.
- <sup>26</sup> Anderson, iii. 70, 71. <sup>27</sup> Privy Council Register, ii. 1-9.
- <sup>28</sup> Hunsdon to Cecil, Berwick, August 5, Bain, ii. 666, 667.
- <sup>29</sup> Lennox MSS.; Hosack, i. 250, 251; Schiern's Bothwell.
- <sup>30</sup> Bain, ii. 697, 698.
- <sup>31</sup> Declarations of Paris, Laing, ii. 270-290. <sup>32</sup> Bain, ii. 668.
- <sup>33</sup> Diurnal, 147, 148; Hunsdon to Cecil, September 8, Bain, ii. 674.
- <sup>34</sup> Bain, ii. 691. <sup>35</sup> Bain, ii. 677.
- <sup>36</sup> Chalmers, ii. 486, 487, Note A. <sup>37</sup> Haynes, p. 522.
- <sup>38</sup> Haynes, p. 525. <sup>39</sup> Murray to Cecil, October 29, 1569; Bain, ii. 698.
- <sup>40</sup> Bain, ii. 699, 700. <sup>41</sup> Bannatyne's Journal, p. 481.
- <sup>42</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 152. <sup>43</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 155.
- <sup>44</sup> Diurnal, p. 154.
- <sup>45</sup> Anderson, iii. 84; Fénelon, iv. 6-9 (?); Labanoff, iii. 16.
- <sup>46</sup> Froude, iii. 165, 1866. <sup>47</sup> Spanish Calendar, i. 665.
- <sup>48</sup> Froude, iii. 1866, 200, 201; Goodall, ii. 90.
- <sup>49</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 185, 186. <sup>50</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 177, 178.
- <sup>51</sup> Haynes, pp. 576, 577. <sup>52</sup> Knox, vi. 569, 570. <sup>53</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 188.
- <sup>54</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 176, 177. <sup>55</sup> Diurnal, p. 158.
- <sup>56</sup> Diurnal, pp. 160, 161. <sup>57</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 196.
- <sup>58</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 226. <sup>59</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 230.
- <sup>60</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 230, 231. <sup>61</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 233, 234.
- <sup>62</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 252. <sup>63</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 269.
- <sup>64</sup> Strype, Annals, ii. Appendix ix. <sup>65</sup> Tytler, 332-334, July 29, 1570.
- <sup>66</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 343. <sup>67</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 338, September 16.
- <sup>68</sup> Randolph to Cecil, October 2; For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 348.
- <sup>69</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 351; Haynes, p. 608. The terms proposed by Cecil to Mary, October 5.
- <sup>70</sup> Sussex to Cecil, October 9. For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 352.
- <sup>71</sup> Randolph to Cecil, October 15; For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 354, 355. Archibald Douglas to Mary, April 1583 (?); Laing, ii. 331-336. Compare, in a form probably exaggerated, Claude Nau (Stevenson), pp. 35, 243.
- <sup>72</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 356. <sup>73</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 359.
- <sup>74</sup> Span. Cal., ii. 282. <sup>75</sup> La Mothe Fénelon, iii. 358. November 9, 1570.
- <sup>76</sup> Diurnal, pp. 194, 195. <sup>77</sup> Bannatyne, pp. 67-89.
- <sup>78</sup> Fénelon, iii. 403. December 18, 1570. <sup>79</sup> Diurnal, p. 196.
- <sup>80</sup> Labanoff, iii. 174-176.
- <sup>81</sup> Mary to Lesley, February 8, 1571; Labanoff, iii. 180-187.
- <sup>82</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 392.
- <sup>83</sup> Froude, iv. 145; Hosack, ii. 38; Fénelon, iv. 20, 21.
- <sup>84</sup> Fénelon, iv. 1-20. <sup>85</sup> Labanoff, iii. 222 et seq.
- <sup>86</sup> Labanoff, ut supra, p. 231. <sup>87</sup> Labanoff, iii. 260.
- <sup>88</sup> Diurnal, pp. 204, 205; Bannatyne, p. 121.
- <sup>89</sup> Compare Buchanan, fol. 215 and fol. 243. In the 'Detection' and 'Book of Articles' (1568) Buchanan does not accuse Hamilton: the plan then was to represent only Bothwell and Mary as guilty.

- <sup>90</sup> James Melville, Diary, p. 22.
- <sup>91</sup> Diurnal, pp. 214-217; For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 447.
- <sup>92</sup> May 20, Drury to Privy Council, For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 448; Bannatyne, 156 et seq.
- <sup>93</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 451. May 23.      <sup>94</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 460.
- <sup>95</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 526. Kirkcaldy and Lethington to Drury, September 6. Also p. 532.
- <sup>96</sup> Privy Council Register, ii. 79, 80, 114, 115.
- <sup>97</sup> Book of the Universal Kirk, pp. 120-128, 250, 257, 285.
- <sup>98</sup> Lesley's Diary, Bannatyne Miscellany, iii. 117-156; Murdin, pp. 1-150; Froude, iii. 210-299. 1866.
- <sup>99</sup> Murdin, p. 57. November 8, 1571.
- <sup>100</sup> La Mothe, vii. 275, iv. 301 et seq.      <sup>101</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., ix. 555.
- <sup>102</sup> Bannatyne, p. 292.      <sup>103</sup> Bannatyne, p. 323.
- <sup>104</sup> Privy Council Register, ii. 171.
- <sup>105</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., x. 61, 76, 94, 99, 110, 119, 124. For Archibald Douglas, cf. pp. 52, 56, 83, 89, 91, 100, 106.
- <sup>106</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., x. 127, 147.
- <sup>107</sup> Murdin, pp. 224, 225.      <sup>108</sup> Tytler, vii. 384.
- <sup>109</sup> The best account of these intrigues is in Tytler, vii. ch. iv. and Appendix xi. with letters. The 'Foreign Calendar' of Elizabeth (x.) is singularly inadequate at this point.
- <sup>110</sup> For. Cal. Eliz., x. 195.      <sup>111</sup> Bannatyne, pp. 406-411.

CHAPTER X.

REGENCY OF MORTON.

1572-1577-1581.

THE death of the Regent Mar was naturally followed by the Regency of Morton. Few stranger souls than Morton existed even in the Scotland of the Reformation. The open licentiousness of his private life is, comparatively speaking, a high light on the darkness of his character, and proves that, in hypocrisy, he was not absolutely consistent. Double murderer as he was, he talked the speech of the godly with skill and freedom. His avarice may have been overstated: he needed money for the king's government: he really had a care for the public weal, and his fall was partly due, like the unpopularity of Murray, to his salutary severities. He had the merit of detesting the interference of preachers with politics. Attached to his family, the Douglasses, he appointed nonentities, murderers, and forgers of the name to bishoprics, minor livings, and seats on the bench of justice. He robbed rich and poor with equal ruthlessness. But he had the virtue of personal courage and steadfast resolution. No man did more to keep the preachers within bounds. By a system of fines he discouraged disorder. When the end came, and he followed others among Darnley's murderers to the scaffold, the ministers were sincerely sorry, for he was as stout a Protestant as Bothwell himself.

The Regency of Morton meant the ruin of the Castilians and of Mary's cause in Scotland. He let Elizabeth know, in short, that she must make up her mind. She must aid him with money, a pension, and artillery, or he would look elsewhere for assistance.

On the day after Morton's election Knox expired (November 24, 1572). He had asked Morton if he had any knowledge of Darnley's murder, and Morton had lied.

Of Knox we may cite two contemporary opinions. The first is that of his secretary, Bannatyne: "This man of God, the light of Scotland, the comfort of the Kirk within the same, the mirror of godliness and pattern and example to all true ministers, in purity of life, soundness in doctrine, and in boldness in reprovng of wickedness, and one that cared not the favour of men (how great soever they were) to reprove their abuses and sins."<sup>1</sup> The other verdict is from the hand of the author of the 'Diurnal of Occurrents': "John Knox, minister, deceased in Edinburgh, who had, as was alleged, the most part of the blame of all the sorrows of Scotland, since the slaughter of the late Cardinal" (Beaton).<sup>2</sup> The most severe of modern verdicts on Knox is that of Mr Froude: "In purity, in uprightness, in courage, truth, and stainless honour, the Regent Murray and our English Latimer were perhaps his equals." As to Murray and purity, Knox had none of Murray's avarice: he betrayed no man: he took money from none, to none did he truckle. He even urged clemency on Murray, after Langside fight, and the Regent spared his future murderer Bothwellhaugh. But, as Lethington said, Knox "was a man subject unto vanity." As a historian, he is, necessarily, a partisan, and is credulous of evil about his adversaries, and apt to boast, as the heathen Odysseus declines to do, over dead men and women. As a Christian, Knox's fault was to confine his view too much to the fighting parts of Scripture, and to the denunciations of the prophets. The "sweet reasonableness" of the Gospel was to him less attractive. He laid on men burdens too heavy to be borne, and tried to substitute for sacerdotalism the sway of preachers but dubiously inspired. His horror of political murder was confined to the murders perpetrated by his opponents. His intellect, once convinced of certain dogmas, remained stereotyped in a narrow mould. How little his theology affected, morally, the leaders of his party, every page in this portion of history tells. He was the greatest force working in the direction of resistance to constituted authority,—itself then usually corrupt, but sometimes better than anarchy tempered by political sermons. His efforts in favour of education, and of a proper provision for the clergy and the poor, were too far in advance of his age to be entirely successful. He bequeathed to Scotland a new and terrible war between the Kirk and the State. He was a wonderful force, but the force was rather that of Judaism than of the Gospel.

The new year, 1573, was marked by the tragedy of the castle, and the fall of Mary's party as a party in arms. In August 1572 Lethington had written to Mary in a tone almost of despair.<sup>3</sup> Without money and aid from France, the castle must fall. The town was in the hands of the enemy, and Morton poisoned the wells near the castle. Sir James Balfour turned his coat, gaining a pardon from Morton (January 9, 1573). He was thought to be the deepest in the secret iniquity of Darnley's murder: later his knowledge was used to ruin Morton.<sup>4</sup> Balfour, apparently, betrayed the Castilians just before their approaching fall. Like Knox, he had joined the assassins of Beaton, and with Knox had rowed in the galleys. He next alternately betrayed Mary of Guise and the Lords of the Congregation. As Clerk Registrar he is supposed to have prepared the band for Darnley's murder, and he betrayed the castle to Morton. In a meeting at Perth on February 23, 1573, he procured the pacification of most of Mary's party who deserted Kirkcaldy; he had refused to desert them; the Gordons and Hamiltons abandoned her, and the affair of Darnley's death was to be slurred over for the moment.<sup>5</sup> Balfour passed on to other treacheries: already, at a meeting of the Kirk and commissioners from the Three Estates, Episcopacy had been established, the beginning of countless evils.<sup>6</sup>

The Castilians alone, since the pacification of Perth, and the surrender of Huntly and the Hamiltons, now supported Mary. James Kirkcaldy, with a large sum in French gold, had succeeded in landing at Blackness; but thence he could not move. The castle garrison suffered from want of water. Lethington could not endure the vibration of the gun-fire, and was laid "in the low vault of David's Tower." Surrender he dared not; the gibbet awaited him; Morton would never have let him go. Lethington knew too much. He persistently hoped that, from parsimony and fear of France, Elizabeth would never aid Morton with men and artillery. But Killigrew kept urging this course on her, and English engineers from Berwick sketched the fortifications, arranged and organised the attack, and justly estimated that it would occupy but a short time. James Kirkcaldy was captured by Morton, it is said, through the treachery of his wife; his gold was seized. A treaty had been arranged by Ruthven with Drury on April 17 to the following effect. The Crown property in the castle was to be retained for the king. Grange, Lethington, Lord Home, Sir Robert Melville, and Logan of Restalrig, if captured, were to be "justified" by Scottish law, "wherein her majesty's advice shall be used." It was not used in Grange's case; Restalrig, Hume, and Melville were more fortunate.<sup>7</sup> An English force, with abundant artillery, now entered Edinburgh on April 25 under Drury. Trenches and mounds were dug and erected at close quarters. By May 17 thirty heavy guns were in position. The castle guns were in part silenced, and on May 26 the assault was given at The Spur, an outwork looking down the High Street. The Spur was taken, and a parley was called. Kirkcaldy and Robert Melville came out and had an interview with Drury. On May 28 Mary's flag was struck; the castle surrendered. In losing The Spur they lost their last poor supply of water; the garrison was exhausted and mutinous.

Among the captives were Lord Home, Lethington, Kirkcaldy, their wives, Lady Argyll, and Robert Melville.<sup>8</sup> Morton would admit the chief prisoners (the whole garrison was but 200 men) to no terms; the Queen of England must decide their fate. They were carried to Drury's quarters as Elizabeth's prisoners. Morton, says Killigrew, "thinks them now fitter for God than for this world, for sundry considerations." They knew too much about Morton.<sup>9</sup> Elizabeth (June 9) asked for information about their offences; Kirkcaldy and Lethington were in vain appealing to their old ally, Cecil, saying, "Forget not your own good natural." Happily for himself, Lethington died, doubtless of "his natural sickness." His body lay unburied, some atrocities were intended against it; but his wife, Mary Fleming, successfully appealed to Cecil, supported by Atholl and Drury himself. Morton hanged Kirkcaldy on August 3. A hundred gentlemen of Scotland offered their services under "man-rent" to the House of Douglas, if Morton would be merciful; nay, even offered £2000 yearly, and £20,000 worth of Mary's jewels. The preachers, he thought, clamoured for blood, and blood they must have. The prestige of the dead Knox would have been shaken if Kirkcaldy, for whom he prophesied hanging, had not died.<sup>10</sup>

In a more fortunate age Kirkcaldy might have been as honest as he was valiant. Indeed, if we may trust Sir James Melville, who certainly was much behind the scenes of diplomacy, Kirkcaldy's whole conduct while in the castle was that of a Bayard. Murray could trust him, though he could not trust Murray. When Morton first became Regent, Kirkcaldy might have made his peace on the best terms ; but Morton would not in that case admit Huntly, the Hamiltons, and the rest of the queen's party to terms. Kirkcaldy, knowing this, preferred to be betrayed rather than to betray. He was free, we are told, from avarice and ambition. There can be no doubt that, to Melville, Kirkcaldy seemed a very perfect gentle knight.

In any age Lethington would have been pre-eminent as a politician. It is almost impossible to conjecture why he made the fatal error of entering into the plot of murdering Darnley. That unhappy prince was then no longer dangerous ; and Lethington naturally, and for private reasons, detested Bothwell, from whom he had far more to dread than from Darnley. It has been guessed that he expected Bothwell to rush to ruin, and so himself to escape from two enemies by one murder. But Lethington's acquiescence in the deed of Kirk-o'-Field was his own bane ; it drove him fatally into Mary's fated party, and the castle was so gallantly held from no romantic attachment to the queen (of which we hardly find a trace in the history of the Scots of the day), but merely because for Lethington there was no safety beyond its walls. Outside the circle of Mary's personal attendants, her ladies, and such men as Arthur Erskine and George and Willie Douglas, with possibly Herries, and, as far as he dared, Robert Melville, romance in Scotland had no effect upon politics, though in England it was otherwise. Men acted as their personal interests, or seeming interests, inspired them ; and loving loyalty to the queen is a refraction from the Jacobite sentiment of a later time.

Lethington's brother, John, and Robert Melville were spared when Kirkcaldy died, Robert owing his safety to Elizabeth. He was for many months held a prisoner at Lethington Castle and elsewhere, continuing to intrigue for Mary after his release. His examination was taken on October 19 before the Commendator of Dunfermline and others, the questions asked covering the period since October 1568. We have quoted this document several times, in relation to the intrigues at York. If Melville spoke truth, Lesley in his examination before Cecil did not. Melville was closely examined as to Mary's jewels in the Castle, and Mary declared that Morton hanged Mossman, the goldsmith, to prevent her from learning where her jewels were. She acquitted the late Regent Murray of dishonest dealing as to these valuable objects, of which three great rubies, three great diamonds, and the diamond-set jewel known as "the H" remained in the hands of the widow of Murray, who married Colin, the brother and successor of Argyll. Morton, in the course of the next years, actually outlawed Argyll for not restoring the jewels, which Lady Argyll professed to retain in pledge for money expended by Murray in the public service. The dispute was finally pacified by Elizabeth, Argyll restoring "the great H" and other diamonds to Morton.<sup>11</sup>

History, if closely interrogated, is rich in details about such personal matters as these, but about the economic conditions of a people is apt to be silent. We might suppose that "the Douglas wars," now ended, had reduced the country to distress and destitution. Edinburgh had for years been bereft of her richer citizens: many of their houses were burned: the timber-work of others had supplied the Castilians with fuel. Glasgow, not then commercially important, had been threatened and distressed by the Lennox-Hamilton raids. "Gauntlets" (Thomas Crawford) had despoiled the Hamilton tenantry: in the North, Huntly's brother, Adam Gordon, had conquered the Forbeses and ruled Huntly's country at his will. The Borders, where public robbery was the rule, not the exception, had not only been devastated by Sussex and by Homes and Kers, but by the raids which Elliots and Armstrongs, Bells, Croziers, and Nixons, had been known to push as far as Biggar. Of the Highlands we know that the new Earl of Argyll (the Earl of the Darnley murder died about this time) hanged over 180 caterans in one raid of justice.

Yet, despite war, anarchy, and plunder, Scotland had increased in wealth and population. Just after Mar's death on November 11, 1572, Killigrew wrote to Cecil, "Methinks I see the noblemen's great credit decay in the country, and the barons, boroughs, and suchlike take more upon them, the ministry and religion increaseth, and the desire in them to prevent the practice of the Papists: the number of able men, both for horse and foot, very great and well furnished; their navy so augmented as it is a thing almost incredible." Yet Drury found Berwick flooded with Scots silver, valued at fifteen pence, but worth only ninepence. "A Scotch merchant declared that £100 English put into the mint would yield £1000 Scots."<sup>12</sup>

It is probable that the prosperity noted by Killigrew, both now and later, was confined to the Lothians, Stirlingshire, and Fife. As we have seen, the preachers had been obliged to submit to a form of Episcopacy, and their liberties were more or less trammelled by Morton, who also robbed them of their livelihood. But these things, after all, were the rebukes of a friend. Whatever else Morton might be, he was decidedly anti-papal; wherefore many sins were forgiven him by the preachers. He is reported to have said that they were meddlesome knaves who would be none the worse of a hanging. This tradition is more or less borne out by a report on the state of Scotland sent in 1594 to Pope Clement VIII. by the Jesuits in the country. They say that "Morton was a man of prudence, and exceedingly anxious that everything should be done for the public good of the kingdom. He did not persecute the Catholics, . . . but even showed them a certain amount of favour. As for the ministers of his own religion, he treated them as men of no character or consideration. He was in the habit of continually repeating that there was no room for comparing the most wealthy of the ministers with the poorest of the priests whom he had ever seen: that in the priest there was more fidelity, more politeness, more gravity, more hospitality, than in the whole herd of the others."

The writer goes on to say that Morton was "asked to give four parishes to each minister," obviously that the preacher might become "a bloated pluralist." He himself "was anxious that these useless beings should be reduced to the fewest possible." So he gave them four churches apiece, but kept the revenues of three.<sup>13</sup>

This is not an impartial view: the ministers, on the other hand, were anxious to "plant" new kirks, as the records of the General Assembly prove, and were concerned about the ruinous condition of the buildings, some of which were used as sheepfolds. The preachers were so poor that they were allowed to keep taps, or alehouses. There must have been wealthier men in their ranks, or it would have been needless to forbid them to wear "silk hats," and garments remarked for "superfluous and vain cutting out," and "variant hues in clothing, as red, blue, yellow, and the like, which declares the lightness of the mind." "Costly gilding of knives or whingers" was also forbidden to the clergy, who, to be sure, needed whingers, for they, and their parishioners, were often prevented from attending church because they were involved in deadly feuds.<sup>14</sup> Learning was not on a high level. Archibald Douglas declined to adventure himself in the Greek Testament when examined for the parsonship of Glasgow; and a gifted preacher might be elected though ignorant of Latin. There were, indeed, men of learning and foreign education, like Rutherford, Ramsay, Syme, Henryson, and Smeton, with Davidson, of St Leonard's (author of the play on Kirkcaldy's hanging), who wrote a poem against pluralists, calling Rutherford a goose :—

“Had gude John Knox not yit bene deid,
It had not come unto this heid ;
Had they myntit till sic ane steir,
He had maid hevin and eirth to heir.”

Davidson was banished by Morton : his poem shows the distaste of many of the preachers to the innovations of the Regent.<sup>15</sup>

“This new ordour that is tane
Wes nocht maid be the Court allane ;
The Kirk's Commissionars wes thare,
And did aggrie to less and mair,” says the courtier, in Davidson's Dialogue.

“They sall be first that sall repent it,” says the clerk, and the Kirk in 1575, and onwards, did repent of their concessions to Morton. As a result of his manoeuvres, the worthier clergy were starved and overworked, while scores of young men of family, intruded on parishes, exceeded in silk hats and gilded whingers, neglecting and dilapidating their cures. Out of twenty-seven summoned to render account of their conduct, only three appeared. Among these three was not the vicar of Carstairs, “who hath slain the Laird of Corston.”<sup>16</sup> Patrick Adamson of Paisley, later Archbishop of St Andrews, “waited not on his cure.” The new bishops aimed at being independent of the censures of the General Assembly, and at avoiding the care of any particular flock. They were in simoniacal dependence on the great nobles, and were accused of private immorality.

Under Morton, in fact, the Kirk was being reduced to the same condition as the Church before the Reformation. Ignorance, profligacy, secular robbery, under a thin disguise, of ecclesiastical revenues, were all returning : ministers sold their livings. The bishops had none of the sacerdotal and mystic character which attaches to them in the Catholic faith, and even to some extent in the Anglican community. As rulers and organisers they had little or no authority. Morton's personal attitude, considering what the Jesuits say of him, is hard to understand. Politically, he was anti-Catholic, and struggled hard at this time to secure a defensive league with England and assistance in money against France and Mary's party. This Elizabeth, though urged by Killi-grew to assent, declined to provide. She finally deserted Morton, like her other Protestant allies in Scotland, France, and Holland. Mere need of money, doubtless, was one of Morton's motives in his dealings with the Kirk. He also foresaw their turbulent interference with the State. But possibly, despite the cant which he knew how to use, he was really averse by taste from the rugged austerity of Presbyterianism.

The Kirk, and the country, whose character needed the severity and righteousness of the Calvinistic dispensation, were thus in hard straits. The Presbyterian establishment was on the point of becoming the tool of profligate politicians.

A glance at the proceedings of General Assemblies will serve to show the ecclesiastical perils of Scotland at this moment of transition. In August 1573 the Assembly met at Edinburgh, earls, lords, barons, bishops, superintendents, commissioners, and preachers being present. A recent Assembly of 1572, as we saw, had been shunned by the nobles, who, perhaps, were not minded to forfeit, banish, and slay all the Catholics of the country. Severe measures, however, were taken. On May 4, 1574, "a priest was hanged in Glasgow for saying of mass."<sup>17</sup> This was probably the priest who accused Archbishop Hamilton of Darnley's murder, on the strength, as he averred, of something revealed to him under seal of confession. Thousands of Catholics were driven abroad—some of them men of learning; more were swordsmen, who took foreign service in France and Sweden.

To return to the Assembly: its proceedings usually began by "trial of superintendents and bishops." The democratic Assembly delighted to rake up episcopal misdeeds. Douglas, the "tulchan" Archbishop of St Andrews, and the Bishop of Dunkeld were "de-lated": the former for acts of negligence; the latter on suspicion of simony, perjury, and want of due severity against idolaters like the Earl of Atholl. Strong measures were to be taken against all who harboured excommunicated persons. The Bishop of Galloway, a most undesirable prelate in all respects, was accused of being of the Queen's party; of praying for Mary; of giving thanks for the slaying of Lennox; of comparing himself to Moses and David, and was ordered to do penance in sackcloth. Morton set forth a godly preamble as to his intention about due payment of ministers. Inquisition into the crime of witchcraft was ordained; with other matters.

In the Assembly of March 1574 the Archbishop of St Andrews was "put at" again,—for being a pluralist, for nepotism, for not preaching, and other misdemeanours. The Bishop of Dunkeld had not yet excommunicated Atholl, and had allowed a corpse with a super-cloth over it to be carried into a church "in popish manner." The Bishop of Moray was delated of an amorous intrigue with a young widow. Censorship of literature was attempted; the process lasted for some years. It was decided that the powers of bishops in their dioceses should not exceed those of the superintendents, and that they should continue to be subject to the discipline of the General Assembly. Morton, as we saw, had induced the Kirk to yield to him their thirds of the benefices; he would take care that the stipends to each minister should be duly paid within each parish. As soon as the preachers permitted this course, Morton simplified matters by assigning several kirks to each minister, and keeping the stipends himself. The Assembly remonstrated, but to no purpose. It continued to be troubled about the morals of the Bishop of Moray; about the singular reluctance of the Bishop of Dunkeld to excommunicate his most powerful neighbour; about the introduction of heretical books "by Poles, crammers" (keepers of stalls, or crammes), "and others"; and about the destruction of "monuments of idolatry." Many kirks were found to be ruinous throughout the country.

The assent of the Kirk to the arrangement made at Leith in 1572 had only been provisional, and subject to parliamentary alteration. At this juncture, 1575, a new Knox arose in the person of Andrew Melville, and the great question of Episcopacy became prominent, with all its consequences of civil war waiting to be developed. The quarrel is one which tempts to partisanship. It has been shown that Morton's new mongrel kind of Church government was of the most profligate and ruinous kind. The Scriptural and apostolic character of Episcopacy, with all the arguments from the New Testament and from ecclesiastical tradition, cannot here be discussed. Morton's kind of Episcopacy, at all events, was unscriptural, untraditional, and intolerable. Here is an example of the working of the system. Morton's children were all bastards, and were provided for thus. "Pension by William, Bishop of Aberdeen, of £500 to Archibald Douglas, son natural of the Regent." "Pension by Henry, Commendator of Dunkeld, to James Douglas, son natural of the Regent." "Pension by Robert, Bishop of Caithness, of £500 to George Douglas, son natural of the Regent."<sup>18</sup> On the other side, the conduct of Andrew Melville and other opponents of Prelacy was marked by courage rather than by amenity and sweet reasonableness. The men were fighting for the Revolution of 1560, and as time went on, and James became king in earnest, they were fighting against foreign and Catholic intrigue. Melville was a warrior: he could wear corslet and carry spear like any old martial bishop of mediæval times. The rudeness of his manners repels sympathy, and the theocratic pretensions of the Kirk, which revived under his influence, were incompatible with the legitimate freedom of the individual citizen, and with the political supremacy of the laity in the State. The questions at issue could only be settled in a struggle for existence, which practically lasted for a hundred years. Out of the clash of these two forces, both fierce and intolerant, a modus vivendi was evolved after the fall of the Stuarts, whose tyranny, subduing the wild "high-flying" temper of the Kirkmen, made compromise possible.

The leader but for whom the Kirk might have sunk into a listless tool of the State, or rather of the party in power, must be described. Andrew Melville, son of a Fifeshire laird slain at Pinkie (1547), was born at Baldovy in 1545. At Montrose he learned Greek under Marsillier, and in 1559 proceeded to the University of St Andrews. Here he alone, in the university, read, not in Latin translations but in Greek, the Ethics of Aristotle, "which are the best." He appears to have known George Buchanan, and at twenty was the subject of Latin Elegiacs by a wandering Italian scholar, Pietro Bizzari. His "honeyed words" are praised: they were not his most notable characteristic. Proceeding to Paris, he read under Turnebus, and the revolutionary logician, Ramus. Edmund Hay, a Jesuit who was in Scotland at the time of Darnley's murder, and who had no illusions about Queen Mary, was organising the College of Clermont, and put Melville on his mettle. In 1568 Melville was at Poitiers during the siege, whence he went to Geneva, and was associated with Beza. He pursued his Greek and oriental studies, returning to Scotland, an accomplished scholar and ardent Calvinist, in July 1574. He was offered the place of tutor to Morton's children, but preferred the Principalship of Glasgow University, for which he secured new endowments, reorganising the studies, and establishing discipline. Spottiswoode's story about his desire to destroy the cathedral is not corroborated by records, though it has a strong hold on tradition. A man of extraordinary energy, wedded to his own opinions, and better fitted to support them by scholarly argument than any other in Scotland, Melville in 1575, as a member of the General Assembly, and a member of the committee which met Morton's commissioners, "stirred up John Drury . . . to propound a question touching the lawfulness of the episcopal function, and the authority of chapters in their election."<sup>19</sup> Melville advanced the usual arguments about the episcopos and the presbyter. The chief result of the discussion was to allow for the present the name, and to curtail the authority, of bishops, who must each take charge of a particular "flock" and kirk within their dioceses. This Boyd, Archbishop of Glasgow, declined to do. There being a vacancy at St Andrews, Morton had Patrick Adamson, a man of some learning, and of an unhappy future, elected: the Assembly found that he refused their conditions, and meanwhile suspended him. Matters remained unsettled till the Assembly at Dundee (July 1580), for new troubles were vexing the State.

It is now necessary to glance back at the secular affairs since 1574. They are of an incidental sort, with little bearing on the main tendency of things. Killigrew in 1574-75 made no speed in "the great matter" of handing over Cecil's "bosom-serpent," the Queen of Scots, to execution in her own country. Elizabeth was coquetting with the Alençon marriage: her attention was distracted by the death of Charles IX., and in April 1575 Walsingham feared that Morton, neglected by England, was favouring the Hamiltons and looking towards France.<sup>20</sup> Killigrew and Davison, the secretary, later so unhappily connected with the execution of Mary, were on their way to Scotland when the Border peace was broken on July 7 by the raid of the Reidswire.<sup>21</sup>

At a Warden court, Sir John Forster and Sir John Carmichael presiding, a brawl arose among their followers; the Scots had the worse, but were reinforced from Jedburgh; Sir John Heron was slain, and the English Warden, with many gentlemen and some 300 followers, was captured. Sir John Forster behaved with tact and good sense, refusing to make a national quarrel out of a chance onset, but Elizabeth ordered Morton to meet Huntingdon in England. This Morton refused to do, and Elizabeth compromised for a meeting at the "Bond Rode" on the frontier, near Berwick.<sup>22</sup> Huntingdon, like Foster, was pacific, and sensible.<sup>23</sup> The affair, he said, was but "a brauble." Nobody was certain whether the Jedburgh people first called "A Jeddart! a Jeddart!" or whether the Tynedale men began to shout and shoot. Elizabeth's fiery messages were not delivered to Morton, who patched the quarrel up with Huntingdon on August 16-19.

Killigrew had entered on his embassy, and sent in a long report of Scottish affairs.<sup>24</sup> There was a kind of renewal of the king's and queen's parties. The laird of Lochleven, William Douglas, who sold the Earl of Northumberland, had laid an ambush for the Hamiltons, to avenge Murray on Bothwellhaugh; and Arbroath, son of Châtelherault, was in fear of his own responsibility for Murray's murder. He therefore aimed at marrying the widow of Buccleuch, a sister of Morton's nephew, the Earl of Angus, and at thus allying the Hamiltons with the Regent. This placed Argyll and Atholl, Buchan and Mar, in opposition to Morton and the Hamiltons, while old Châtelherault died, after a long and varied career of good-humoured and fickle incapacity. Arran was still confined in Draffen Castle as a lunatic; meanwhile Morton temporised as to the Hamilton-Angus marriage. Sir James Balfour was still tolerated by Morton, after his countless treacheries, and was used when the Regent "would contrary the ministers" or the citizens of Edinburgh. Morton, though not popular, was fearless, and went shooting or enjoying the contemplative recreation of angling almost unattended. The Esk at Dalkeith was not yet poisoned, and the Regent must have found it an ideal stream for trout and sea-trout. Because he "contraried" the burgesses, Morton, naturally, was popular with the working classes, whom Killigrew reckoned much more important. Morton's enemies admitted that "they could not find his like" as a ruler. Bothwell, in Denmark, was now reported to be "greatly swollen" and near his death. He had still a stroke at Morton in him, if his dying confession be authentic, and, if not, it was still useful. The country was peaceful and prosperous, and it is almost a comfort to learn that, in days when river-pollution was unknown, and Tweed poachers less skilled than in our day, "the fishing of salmon is this year utterly failed in Scotland, and at Berwick also." Corn was never so plentiful, so the want of rain cannot have been the cause of this dispensation, though a dry autumn may have prevented fish from running up. Our comfort lies in thinking that, as bad fishing seasons of old were followed by good, so it may be again, "who live to see it."

Killigrew found Morton apparently strong and prosperous. But the affair of the Hamilton marriage already indicated the chance of an Argyll and Atholl opposition. Spottiswoode also tells us that the Regent's cruelties were disliked. One of the queen's Maries, Mary Livingstone, had married John Semple of Beltrees. Morton tried to wring from him some lands given by Mary to his wife, and Semple had said something perilous. It was suspected that the Hamiltons had instigated him and his nephew, Whitford of Milnton, to shoot Morton. Threatened with torture, Semple, not a brave man, confessed; but Milnton, even under torture, denied the charge, and had public opinion on his side.<sup>25</sup> Whatever truth there may be in this anecdote, we observe after the Reformation the increased employment of torture to extract evidence. In the earlier part of Scottish history we seldom hear of this cruel and detestable practice, at least as exercised on gentlemen.

We now find Morton conscious that his position was imperilled. As early as November 1574 he was reported by the Spanish Ambassador to intend to marry Queen Mary.<sup>26</sup> He now looked in the same direction. On April 15, 1577, Lord Ogilvy wrote to Archbishop Beaton, Mary's ambassador in France, a letter unknown to Mr Tytler and earlier historians. It contained matter already touched on in July 1576 by Beaton of Balfour. Morton, in short, was anxious to deal with, or pretended to be anxious to deal with, Mary and France. When James should come to power Morton had reason for anxiety. He knew what befell the Boyds when the young James III. came to his own. He knew that his enemies would put at him, and use as their instrument his connection with Darnley's murder. Sir James Balfour, with Beaton, was intriguing for the queen, and as to Darnley's murder, Balfour knew everything. "Ane schamful bruit" as to Morton's guilt prevailed among the populace. Therefore Morton in 1577 spoke "reverently" of Mary, desiring her restoration, if James died. He would rather serve her and her race than any of the world, as God was his judge. Granted an amnesty, he would work for a restoration of the queen. Sir James Balfour was as friendly as Morton. Both only wanted assurances from Mary. The queen put no more confidence in Morton's professions than did her descendant, the King over the Water, in those of Robert Walpole when that Minister's power decayed. She feared a trap. But the advances of Morton prove that he knew the dangers of his position.<sup>27</sup>

We have already seen indications of a coalition between Atholl, Argyll, and Mar against the Regent, to whom Argyll was hostile because of the forced surrender of Mary's jewels. Atholl, too, could not well be content, as he was threatened with excommunication for idolatry. Mar, a very young peer, had not been intrusted with the guardianship of James, who was in the hands of his father's brother, Alexander Erskine. But for a while Argyll and Atholl were quarrelling, and attacking each other's countries, Argyll about the same time being at feud with Clan Donald. In this affair Argyll incurred Morton's displeasure, so he and Atholl again drew together.<sup>28</sup> Alexander Erskine also began to distrust Morton's intentions as to seizing James. He induced Argyll and Atholl to visit him at Stirling, where Argyll appealed directly to the boy king against the tyranny of Morton, and asked for an assembly of the nobles. Atholl urged the same advice: troubles were brewing, and Elizabeth, through Bowes and Randolph, attempted to reconcile all parties (January 30, 1578). In March Lady Lennox, the mother of Darnley, died in England, to all appearance reconciled with Mary, and a believer in her innocence. To Elizabeth Lady Lennox concealed this change of mind, if a change there was, but that she would have done in any case. We are left to conjecture as to whether the reconciliation was sincere, or whether Lady Lennox feigned cordiality for the sake of advantages to be drawn from Mary.<sup>29</sup> In any case, she had given Mary written assurances of belief in her innocence. The death of this lady opened the path for Stewart d'Aubigny in France, whom James later created Duke of Lennox. Meanwhile, in England, her granddaughter, Arabella Stewart, child of Charles, younger brother of Darnley, was to inherit the sorrows of the line. The Lennox estates in England remained for many years the desire of James's heart.

On March 4, 1578, the intrigues of the nobles against Morton came to a head. They had of their party the king's tutor, George Buchanan, who had quarrelled with Morton, says Sir James Melville, about a favourite horse, which the Regent seized. On March 4, Argyll at Stirling, backed no doubt by Buchanan, requested James to call a convention of nobles. Alexander Erskine, who held Stirling Castle, was of the same mind, with Atholl, Montrose, Livingstone, Lindsay, Ruthven, Ogilvy, the Chancellor (Glamis), the comptroller (Tullibardine), and the secretary, the lay Abbot of Dunfermline. Morton sent Angus, Herries, and Ruthven: he announced his readiness to resign the Regency. His offer was accepted, he received a discharge, and resigned the Castle of Edinburgh, where a skirmish occurred. On the same day Glamis, at Stirling, was shot in a scuffle between his followers and those of Crawford. Alexander Erskine was to be keeper of Edinburgh Castle, held for James in the meantime by Drumquhassel and Seton of Touch. Atholl succeeded Glamis as Chancellor. The death of Huntly (sudden, and followed by hauntings of his castle, described by Knox's secretary) removed another of the chief conspirators against Darnley. Bothwell, Lethington, Argyll, were also dead, but vengeance still hung over Morton. He submitted to his fall with singular patience: he had his plan in reserve, and Randolph knew it. A council of nobles, the successful revolutionists, was appointed for James; and a Parliament proclaimed for July 10.<sup>30</sup>

Things were not to move peacefully: "all the devils in hell are stirring," wrote Randolph, to whom, as to Elizabeth, a Scotland quiet under Morton's heel was an ideal Scotland. From her English prison Mary was making a new party in Scotland. On April 26, 1578, the young Earl of Mar, jealous of his uncle, James's Governor, Alexander Erskine, came with armed men into Stirling Castle. Blows were dealt in the early morning, and Erskine's son was crushed to death in the mellay, where his father plied a halbert. Argyll pacified the tumult, James endured the first of his many terrors in his own palace, Alexander Erskine fell ill from grief and chagrin, and young Mar was master of Stirling Castle and of James, being backed by the laird of Lochleven, Angus, and the secret influence of Morton. In short, it was a Douglas coup d'état of the old kind.

A compromise was effected. Mar was retained in his father's office of governor of James and commander of Stirling Castle, and James really seems to have liked and trusted all the Erskines. Argyll, Atholl, and Morton met at the ex-Regent's house of Dalkeith, where they dined and slept. But at breakfast Morton was missing: he had ridden secretly to Stirling, joined Mar, and was as powerful as ever (May 28, 1578). On June 18 Morton at Stirling secured the appointment of a new Council, himself holding the foremost place. He desired the Parliament of July to be held at Stirling; his adversaries declared for Edinburgh, and sent Lindsay and Ruthven to Stirling to protest against the Parliament held there. There were disturbances ; the anti-Mortonites raised the townfolk of Edinburgh. In brief, the two hostile parties armed, and the anti-Morton faction advanced with a large army, Lowland and Highland, to Falkirk. But Bowes, Elizabeth's ambassador, negotiated a peace, while Morton's foes were arrayed at Bannockburn. A reconciliation was made ; Argyll, Lindsay, and Ruthven were placed on the Privy Council, and after August 13 the hostile forces dispersed, and at the end of October a friendly dinner left the disputants in good humour.<sup>31</sup>

In these turbid waters Mary and Lesley, who was now abroad, had been fishing, and intriguing with the Guises. Her trust was that, by Atholl's aid, the Guises might secure the person of her son, whereas she suspected Morton of meaning to intrust him to Elizabeth. She had hopes from the Hamiltons, and, strangely, from Drumquassel, who, as a retainer of Lennox, had in 1567-70 been her bitter enemy. Now she dreamed that he might put Dumbarton again into the hands of her friends. She was especially anxious that Stewart d'Aubigny, a nephew of the late Regent Lennox, brought up in France, should not be employed by the Guises in the scheme of carrying James off to France. She did not trust him, and to employ him would be to alienate the faction of Arabella Stewart, Darnley's niece. She remembered that d'Aubigny's uncle, Lennox (Darnley's father), had been sent from France when she herself was a baby, and had revolted to England, carrying off the French gold intended for the party of Cardinal Beaton. Drumquassel was to manage all the intrigue as to handing over James to the Guises. Mary was sending a symbolic token, in enamelled gold, to James, by the emissary of the Guises, who must not be d'Aubigny, and must deal with Drumquassel and Alexander Erskine. She apparently regarded Atholl and Argyll as at her obedience, her bitterest hatred being reserved for Morton. All this Mary wrote to her ambassador in France, Archbishop Beaton, from Chatsworth, on September 15, 1578.<sup>32</sup>

Dreams, hopes, jewelled tokens, helpless intrigues of exiles and captives ! The letters of Mary, like the letters of James VIII. and Prince Charles, revolve in the same sad circle of impossible desires and frustrated designs. For years, in one form or other, Mary and her foreign and Catholic allies or well-wishers were to strain to win James to the French alliance and the Catholic faith. For this was blood to be shed, against this were myriads of sermons to be preached, till the young king, often a prisoner, always insulted by the preachers, took that prelati- cal and despotic bent which was the ruin of his son and of his House, and the cause of the civil war. The letters of Mary and of Lesley were interrupted and deciphered. Elizabeth and Cecil always knew exactly the budding and blossoming times of the plots, and they held by Morton as their best security. Their confidence in Morton was not misplaced. Probably the most dangerous of his opponents was the Earl of Atholl. He had taken no part in, and had no knowledge of, the conspiracy to murder Darnley, which, save for Huntly, was an entirely Protestant arrangement, whereas Atholl was a Catholic. (While remembering this, we must not forget that the Catholic party wanted the lives of Murray, Argyll, Lethington, and Morton.)

On November 8, 1578, Bruce, a treacherous agent of Archbishop Beaton, describes Atholl as most loyal to Mary, and as keeping Argyll constant to her cause. But Lady Argyll appears to have been fickle. Bruce represents her as encouraging James in the love of his imprisoned mother; but James "is already very arrogant, and a great dissembler, and likely to resemble his father (Darnley) and grandfather (Lennox) in cruelty and want of judgment." Lady Argyll's own loyalty to Mary was suspected.<sup>33</sup> Atholl being thus the mainspring of Mary's plans, died suddenly (April 25, 1579) after a banquet given by Morton at Stirling to unite the assembled nobles. Accusations of poison always were bandied after a "natural" death: in Atholl's case there seem to have been some grounds for suspicion, his death being so extremely opportune for Morton. One Provend, or "Weirdy," was said to have bought the poison, and one Jerdan to have administered it. Weirdy fled to France.<sup>34</sup> On the other hand, dangerous surfeits after political dinners were common enough. In August 1580 both Morton and Lennox were "grievously troubled with the flux by surfeit lately taken at the Lord Lindsay's house." Atholl may have died of haggis, friar's partens, sheep-head, and cockie-leekie.<sup>35</sup>

The new Earl of Atholl, aged eighteen, and Montrose called for justice; but Morton and Angus, seizing the occasion of Atholl's death, marched against the Hamiltons (Lord Claude and the Lord of Arbroath), took Hamilton Castle, and hanged the garrison. The Pacification of Perth, as we saw (February 1573), left the charge of Darnley's murder still hanging over the Hamiltons. Now "that two-handed engine" was dragged out to smite Morton's foes: a little while, and it smote himself. The Lochleven Douglas, Mar, and Buchan were avenging the Regent Murray, and would gladly have extirpated all Hamiltons. They took Draffen Castle, but Lord Claude and Arbroath had fled the country. The people about James had inflamed his anger against the Hamiltons, a thing easy to do, as they were his nearest heirs. Captain Arrington, whom Elizabeth sent to Stirling, "could not find in the king other than fervent hatred against them, and as it were a fear he had of them . . . to be dangerous to his person." George Buchanan had taught him that the Hamiltons, the Archbishop, and Lord Claude were the murderers of his father, as the House certainly was guilty of Murray's death, and Lord Claude was implicated in Lennox's destruction. A boy of thirteen is apt to dread men whom he believes to have killed his grandfather, uncle, and father. Elizabeth laboured and entreated for Lord Claude and Arbroath, but her remonstrances were not well received. With the Hamiltons was banished Sir James Balfour, who instantly began a correspondence with Mary through Archbishop Beaton, and presently had the satisfaction of bringing Morton to the block.

The ecclesiastical events of the summer of 1579 were important, but it seems better to introduce an account of them later, and at present to follow the course of political intrigue. In May Mary was anxious to communicate with her son, and hoped that Archbishop Beaton would be allowed to visit him (May 31).<sup>36</sup> On June 7 she wrote to Robert Bowes, Elizabeth's ambassador in Scotland, whose dry letters make us regret the lively Randolph. She announced the arrival of her secretary, Claude Nau, in Edinburgh. Elizabeth had given permission for his visit; but his packet of letters and the symbolic jewel for James were not accepted, because Mary could not bring herself to address her son as king. Thus it never was possible to bring about an understanding between Mary and James. Nau and others assured Mary that she was dear to her son, though "the poor child does not show it in the captivity he is, fearing therethrough, as there is great appearance, the hazard of his life" (July 4). Morton alone prevented the Council from permitting James to receive Nau's parcel.

In September Esmé Stuart d'Aubigny landed in Scotland. He was the son of Lennox's brother, Darnley's uncle, John; was a man accomplished, attractive, false, and instantly became a great favourite of James. He came to Stirling on September 15, and at once grew intimate with the captain of the guard, James Stewart, a son of Lord Ochiltree, and brother-in-law of John Knox, a brave adventurer, soon to be the most powerful man in Scotland. On September 30 James at last visited Edinburgh: "he was ane great delyt to the beholderis," whose trade had long suffered from the absence of the Court.<sup>37</sup> James was welcomed in various ways by his loyal lieges, and attended a Parliament held on November 11 and 12. Here the Hamiltons, Lord Claude and the Lord of Arbroath, were forfeited, and that in despite of Elizabeth's wishes conveyed through Captain Arrington. On October 20 the captain had informed Cecil that d'Aubigny would probably receive the earldom of Lennox, with grants out of the lands of the ruined Hamiltons. The prophecy was fulfilled; d'Aubigny, now to be known as Lennox, obtained the rich Priory of Arbroath, and the custody of Dumbarton Castle, the old gate of France into Scotland. The captaincy nominally remained in the hands of Drumquhassel, once the foe, now the friend, of Mary. Naturally the preachers were alarmed,—“they cried out continually against atheists and papists, that would turn to his majesty's ruin, and the hurt of the trew professors.”<sup>38</sup>

The professors were in an undesirable position. They had to choose between Lennox, presumed to be an atheist or a papist, and Morton, whose private and public character gave opportunities to the ungodly. At that time the Press was beginning to exist in the shape of pamphlets, and of “placards,” a kind of leading articles, set up in public places. Calderwood, a rather soured divine, but an astonishingly industrious and learned historian, who lived into the age of Charles I., has preserved for us one of these placards directed against Morton, and fixed on the cross of Edinburgh. The public was invited to consider whether Morton “had ever, or yet hath, any regard to the glory of God,” and history must acknowledge that this was not his ruling motive. It was true, the placard admitted, that Morton had ruined the Hamiltons, a thing pious in itself, but it was done for private reasons; on the other hand, he had spared Buccleuch, who was with the Hamiltons at the death of the Regent Lennox, and had looked through his fingers at Ferniehirst, suspected of being art and part in Darnley's murder. The country, said the journalist, “ought first to pursue the king's cruel murder against the Earl of Morton.” Sir James Balfour, if he had been permitted, would have showed the band for Darnley's death, “as he will do yet, God willing, when time and place may serve.”

With all his faults, Morton was now, as a sound anti-papist, the darling of the Kirk which he had robbed. It was therefore necessary that Lennox should conciliate the Kirk. He professed to bring an open mind to the consideration of their tenets. His "little master," young James, was already a theologian, and it was a touching sight to see the young Josiah striving to win his elder kinsman from Baal and the Scarlet Woman. He lent Lennox books of controversy, and accompanied him to the sermons. On April 11, 1580, Arrington reported to Bowes a suspected plot of Morton's to seize the king at Stirling. On the 16th Bowes wrote to Walsingham with the news of a counterplot of Lennox and Argyll to carry James to Dumbarton, whence he might easily be taken to France. Thence Sir James Balfour was expected to arrive, with the eternal band that was to ruin Morton—a paper that either did no longer exist or was deemed by Balfour too dangerous to produce. Elizabeth sent Bowes to undermine Lennox: she was ready even to pay pensions to the lords—the only really efficacious argument.<sup>39</sup> Bowes on his arrival found that one class of men were not venal, the ministers. A single "reader" in James's household took a present, the tutor, Mr Peter Young, and the rest refused money. This is a crucial proof that the Reformation, which only added hypocrisy to the vices of the nobles, was really "working for righteousness." Of yore one man, Buccleuch, had spurned with curses the offers of Henry VIII.; now the real leaders of the people, the preachers, were of like mind.<sup>40</sup>

The mission of Bowes opened with intercession for the banished Hamiltons. Lord Claude had defended himself against the various charges of murder in a letter to Elizabeth (January 29, 1580).<sup>41</sup> Bowes touched on a scheme of Lennox's for placing near the king George Douglas, who organised Mary's escape from Lochleven, and was her trusted servant. There had also been a scheme to imprison Morton, and use against him his robbery of the Kirk. The revolution of the Court was to have been effected at Doune Castle, and James himself told Bowes some of the details. He feared the affair would end in a fight, and returned to Stirling. This was the intrigue at which Mary had been working: it was defeated, but James obviously disliked Morton.

It was more important that Lennox, and his retainer Henry Ker, "are now so earnest Protestants as they begin to creep into credit even with the ministers at Edinburgh, that have written in their commendations to the king's ministers" (May 10, 1580).<sup>42</sup> If the godly accepted Lennox, Morton would indeed be in danger. James, in July, happened to be with Morton and Lennox in the New Inn, or Novum Hospitium, of St Andrews. As they looked from the gallery at a pageant, a lunatic seaman, Skipper Lindsay, began an amateur sermon in the open air. Morton was standing "gnapping upon his staff," when the crazed fellow "warned the earl not obscurely that his judgment was drawing near, and his doom in dressing."<sup>43</sup> But Morton, we shall see, was then in treaty with Lennox.

When the General Assembly met at Dundee in mid-July, Lennox wrote to inform the Brethren that he had now "been called to a knowledge of his salvation," and had already "made open declaration of his calling" in kirk at Edinburgh, and at Stirling. Mr Henry Ker had also "long lain in blindness," but now had seen a great light. Both gentlemen earnestly desired the services of a Huguenot preacher to confirm them in the truth.<sup>44</sup> A difficulty with Lennox was to get Dumbarton Castle into his own hands, for Bowes had now bought Drumquassel, the actual captain of the place, with a bribe.<sup>45</sup> Morton, too, was won over to execute a plot to get possession of James, as usual, in Elizabeth's interest, if she would plainly state her terms.<sup>46</sup> In short, through the summer of 1580 there was an English conspiracy flattered by Elizabeth, and a Marian conspiracy worked by Lennox, Archbishop Beaton, and Lesley, who was hanging about Dieppe in readiness to return. James met with an awkward accident in July: his horse fell on him, his attendants drew their swords to kill the beast, but both steed and monarch escaped unhurt.<sup>47</sup> In politics Morton was unable to move. Elizabeth would not show her hand, and Lennox and he were making overtures for amity, as Archibald Douglas, employed as go-between, reported to Bowes. This private negotiation prevented violent doings at St Andrews at the time when Skipper Lindsay prophesied to Morton.<sup>48</sup> A surfeit from overfeeding, which attacked both Lennox and Morton, delayed, sine die, their reconciliation.

The chief aim of Lennox, and of the Marian conspirators, had been to convey Dumbarton Castle into Lennox's own hands. This seemed to have been secured when Drumquassel, a Lennoxian, got the captaincy. But Bowes, as we saw, had purchased Drumquassel. Lennox was not defeated. On August 25 he caused the gates of Edinburgh to be closed, netted Drumquassel, who was in the town, excluded Morton, who lay at Dalkeith, and compelled Drumquassel to give up the keys.<sup>49</sup> Bowes sent intelligence to Walsingham, who on August 31 commissioned him, first to remonstrate strongly with James, seeing that Lennox was "a professed enemy of the Gospel," and then, if remonstrance failed, to try murder. Elizabeth bade him conspire with Morton to "lay violent hands on the said" enemy of the Gospel.<sup>50</sup> Elizabeth would give all assistance. This was on August 31; on September 1 Elizabeth again sent contradictory injunctions. Force was not to be used, no assistance was to be promised till further notice. Walsingham deplored "our unthankfulness towards God," in thus withdrawing from a work so acceptable as murder. Godliness has its remorse.<sup>51</sup> Bowes was now merely to threaten James with loss of the heirship of England, and to accuse Lennox before the Council, in the absence of the accused, that being, as in Mary's own case, Elizabeth's idea of justice. It was not that of the Council. Bowes continued to plot, Morton to waver. The clergy denounced "Papists with great ruffs and wide bellies," Lennox and his company. Ruthven, with Robert Melville and Lethington's brother, John Maitland (who probably represented Lethington on the scene of Darnley's murder), were won over to Lennox's faction. Both Morton and Lennox rebuked the preachers, Morton speaking severely of the turbulent John Durie. By a letter of October 7 Bowes was recalled, to the consternation of Morton: Elizabeth had deserted him. A guard of thirty gentlemen was appointed for the king, including Mary's friend, George Douglas, and Captain James Stewart of Ochiltree, brother-in-law of Knox, a soldier of fortune who had been in France, Sweden, and Russia, and was to become practical Governor of Scotland.<sup>52</sup>

The recall of Bowes was Morton's death-warrant. His intrigues with Bowes, and the plot to kill Lennox (which Bowes had kept working at), were probably known. A man who dealt, as Morton did, through Archibald Douglas, was certain to be betrayed. That Archibald was the traitor may be inferred from his character, and, moreover, from the circumstance that Morton, on the last day of his life, openly declared that his cousin and retainer, Archibald, had been present at Darnley's murder. He informed against no other man, dead or alive. Aware of Morton's danger, Elizabeth in November instructed Lord Hunsdon to go to James, threaten him, bribe, form a new party, and rescue her accomplice. She then withdrew her instructions, and left the Earl, as was her wont, to his fate.<sup>53</sup>

Morton was to have been arrested on December 26. On that day James, either because "his better nature prevailed" (as Mr Froude conjectures) or with the Judas-like dissimulation which he later showed to Somerset, went out hunting with Morton, and treated him with special kindness. Lord Robert Stewart, Mary's brother, now Earl of Orkney, gave to Morton, as he had given to Darnley in Kirk-o'-Field, warning to fly. Morton would not be advised. Perhaps he did not know that throughout the year Sir James Balfour, in France, had been entertaining Mary with tales of his possession of the Darnley murder-band, implicating Morton. Mary had no confidence in Balfour's professions, but she kept him in hand, and now Balfour had secretly landed in Scotland, arriving on December 27. The probability is that his absence caused James to defer the arrest intended for December 26.<sup>54</sup> On the last night of December 1580 Morton was accused in presence of the Council.<sup>55</sup>

The scene was a repetition of that in which Crawford accused Lethington. Captain James Stewart of the Guards entered the council chamber, fell on his knees, and charged Morton with fore-knowledge of Darnley's death.<sup>56</sup> Morton rose disdainfully, protesting his innocence, and his past diligence in pursuing the murderers. "For that," said Stewart, still kneeling, "why did he prefer Mr Archibald Douglas, his cousin, to the place of a Senator of the College of Justice, who was known to have been an actor in that murder, if he himself had no part in it?"<sup>57</sup> Stewart sprang to his feet, both men laid hand to hilt, the burly Lindsay and Cathcart sundered them and took them forth from the chamber. Morton returned, Stewart again rushed in, a new ruffle began, and was again put down. Morton was locked up in a room of the palace, while Angus and Lennox declined to vote on the matter, and Eglintoun suggested that the king's Advocate should be consulted. He advised committal and trial, and on Monday, January 2, 1581, Morton was warded in Edinburgh Castle. Craig in his Sunday sermon inveighed against "false accusations." The accusation was perfectly true, but then Morton was a "professor," and that was enough. Stewart drew his dagger, and warned Craig that the pulpit should not protect one who slandered him.<sup>58</sup>

Meanwhile Archibald Douglas had been warned and had fled to Berwick, where he arrived on January 6. He professed his readiness to justify himself, if examined without torture. His absence delayed Morton's case, and for once we may regret that Archibald was not treated with the boot, which must have extracted valuable historical information. On Monday, as we saw, Morton was committed to Edinburgh Castle. As he went he was cursed by a woman whose husband he had hanged for making a ballad. Many a man whom Morton had injured was glad, but professors regretted the fall of one who "had done so much for establishing of religion."<sup>59</sup> He had many private foes, however, and, even among the godly, Lord Ruthven was then at feud with him. On January 18, 1581, Morton was carried to Dumbarton Castle for greater security. On the next day Randolph arrived in Edinburgh: Elizabeth was moving in Morton's interest. She would try diplomacy through Randolph; she moved a force, under Hunsdon, to the Border, and Randolph in Edinburgh, Bowes at Berwick, intrigued with Angus and the Douglasses in favour of a plot to seize James and lay violent hands on Lennox. The go-between was Douglas of Whittingham, brother of Archibald, and, like him, a judge. Bowes's letters are full of expectations of a "strange masque at Holyrood," a new affair of Riccio.

But all was vain. Randolph (January 25) tried the effect of producing two intercepted letters of Archbishop Beaton to prove that Lennox was an agent of France and of the Jesuits. James told Randolph that the letters seemed to be forged, or written by Beaton, a partisan of the Hamiltons, to discredit a Lennox Stewart. The Estates assembled on February 20, and Randolph harangued them on the 24th. He produced no effect, the Estates voted supplies in case of an English invasion. Holyrood was guarded closely by James Stewart. On March 8 the king agreed to settle English disputes by a meeting of commissioners on the Border. Meanwhile a scheme had been contrived to enter James's rooms by false keys, kill Lennox, Argyll, and Montrose, and carry James to England. This appears to have been a plot of Angus; Randolph professed his disbelief in it when it was discovered. The conspiracy was brought to light through the arrest of Whittingham, Affleck, Jerdan, and other agents of Morton and Angus. Though not "offered the boots" (torture in the boot), Whittingham revealed the whole affair, and accused his ingenuous brother, Archibald, of forging the letters which Randolph employed to discredit Lennox. Bowes protested that when he forwarded the letters to London from Berwick, where Archibald was residing, he believed them to be genuine. This was not the opinion of four of the Edinburgh preachers, who attested Whittingham's confession. "The ministers have seen it, and in their sermons give God great thanks therefor," writes Randolph to Hunsdon on March 20. If the very preachers admitted that Lennox was falsely accused, the case looks black for Archibald and the letters attributed to Archbishop Beaton, which he intercepted, and handed to Bowes. The confessions of Whittingham made Randolph's position perilous. A placard asked why he came from Elizabeth to complain of James's liberality to his kinsman, Lennox. Had Elizabeth not been liberal to Leicester and Sir Christopher Hatton? Elizabeth was now asking for the expulsion of Sir James Balfour. Why had she never objected to him through the years when he was Morton's chief adviser? Why did Elizabeth shelter Archibald Douglas, one of Darnley's assassins, while her conscience so suddenly stirred her against Sir James? If Elizabeth's Protestantism was alarmed by Catholics near the king, why was she treating for marriage herself with a Catholic, the brother of the King of France? Did Randolph take pleasure in the society of owls and nightingales? was that why he had nocturnal meetings with Angus and Mar?

These questions, in which we may guess the hand of Lethington's brother John, were fixed on Randolph's door on March 13. Affleck had confessed on March 12; so, probably, had Whittingham.<sup>60</sup> The astute Randolph had met his match at last. Some less ingenious disputant fired a shot through his window in his absence: he took the hint and retired to Berwick. Angus had been banished to Inverness: his castles were occupied, the people of Dalkeith were disarmed; there was left no force on Morton's side to co-operate with Hunsdon's men on the Border. Elizabeth disbanded them, and Morton's doom was sealed.

Lennox and James Stewart had managed their concerns with resolution and skill.<sup>61</sup> Captain James Stewart was rewarded with the tutorship of the mad Earl of Arran, and presently with his earldom. Morton was brought from Dumbarton at the end of May, and put to trial on June 1. It was deemed quickest to accuse him of Darnley's murder alone, out of nineteen charges. We have no full record of the trial, but a letter of Sir John Foster's to Walsingham shows that Morton's meeting with Bothwell and Lethington at Whittingham about January 19, 1567, was known to the judges.<sup>62</sup> On that occasion he was made privy to Darnley's murder, but (he said in his confession) refused to sign the band without a written warrant from Mary, which he never obtained. We may reasonably conjecture that this evidence was extracted from Douglas of Whittingham, at whose house the plot was discussed. Whatever other testimony may have been produced (one part was the queen's accusation of Morton at Carberry), Morton was found guilty of "art and part of concealing of the king's father's murder." "Art and part! God knows the contrary!" Morton is said to have exclaimed. But in his confession to two preachers, Durie and Balcanquhal, he admitted enough to satisfy them of the justice of his sentence. He told the story of the Whittingham conference. "If I had gotten the queen's handwrite, and so had known her mind, I was purposed to have turned my back on Scotland." Yet he calmly assumed that he did know Mary's mind, and that it was murderous, though he had just said that he did not. He admitted that, knowing Archibald Douglas, by his own confession, to have taken active part in the crime, he continued to employ him, raising him to the bench. The preachers candidly remarked that he "confessed the foreknowledge and concealing of the king's murder," and so "could not justly complain of his sentence." To whom could he reveal it? he replied; "To the queen: she was the doer of it." Yet he confessedly did not "know her mind." Morton added, regretfully, that "he expressed not the fruits of his profession in his life and conversation." To his "profession" he returned, in a manner edifying, and perhaps sincere. One Binning, a servant of Archibald Douglas, who confessed that Archibald lost one of his velvet "mules," or slippers, in hurrying from Kirk-o'-Field, was also put to death. Morton died bravely: his head was spiked on a gable of the Tolbooth.

So ended the last of Darnley's murderers who died by the law, and of the men who, being guilty of the crime, accused their queen. Morton had one virtue—personal courage; and one political merit, a strong hand. His errors were conspicuous.<sup>63</sup> His title of Earl of Morton was held for a few years by the turbulent Lord Maxwell.

- <sup>47</sup> Bowes, p. 84. <sup>48</sup> Bowes, pp. 92, 93.
<sup>49</sup> Bowes, p. 106. <sup>50</sup> Bowes, pp. 109, 111.
<sup>51</sup> Bowes, pp. 111, 112. <sup>52</sup> Bowes, pp. 155, 156.
<sup>53</sup> Thorpe, i. 415.
<sup>54</sup> Balfour to Mary, January 31, 1581; Laing, ii. 314, 318; Froude, xi. 19, 382, note 1.
<sup>55</sup> So Moysie, Calderwood, and others. Bowes, January 1, 1581, says that the arrest took place in Morton's own chamber. Probably Moysie and the others mean to place the accusation in the Council-room, the arrest, following, in Morton's own room. But see Bowes, pp. 157-161. <sup>57</sup> Spottiswoode, ii. 271.
<sup>56</sup> Calderwood, iii. 481. <sup>59</sup> Calderwood, iii. 482, 483.
<sup>58</sup> Bowes, pp. 158, 160.
<sup>60</sup> Calderwood, iii. 506-510.
<sup>61</sup> The letters and other sources are in Bowes, Calderwood, and the Appendix to Tytler, viii. 416-431.
<sup>62</sup> Tytler, viii. 429, 430.
<sup>63</sup> Cf. The Mystery of Mary Stuart, pp. 382, 385, and Calderwood, iii. 557-576.

CHAPTER XI.

KING AND KIRK.

1581-1584.

THE death of Morton was followed by that long struggle between the Crown and the Kirk which filled the reign of James VI. The Protestant party had never looked on their hold of the country as secure. In the historical perspective we see that their constant trepidations were really baseless, but it was impossible for men engaged in the strife to estimate correctly the chances of the old and the new faiths. The preachers justly resented the avarice of the lay holders of Church property, without perceiving that the lay abbots and parsons would never consent to imperil their wealth by a restoration of the ancient creed, and a redistribution of the Church lands. The very thoroughness of the robbery was the protection of the Kirk. England, that bulwark of Protestantism, had, in fact, little to fear from the disunited Catholic Powers. While Spain and France neutralised each other, and while England was anti-Catholic, the Kirk was safe. Neither distracted France nor Spain could seriously take hold of Scotland.

Perhaps that which favoured most the slender chances of a Catholic restoration north of Tweed was the extreme zeal of preachers who, not satisfied to live apart from Rome, were intent on building up a theocracy like that of Geneva. The king, though so young, was a precocious theologian, and could only be driven to tamper with Rome by the excessive severities of the Scottish Calvinists. It was not the interest of James to change his creed; he desired nothing less than subordination to his Catholic mother, or Catholic kinsmen of the House of Guise. By intellect, by education, and by conviction he was Protestant. Yet the suspicion with which he was regarded by his own clergy, the sternness of their discipline, the outrages which he had to endure from them and the nobles of their party, forced him to think of seeking assistance from Catholic Powers, and perhaps would have made him change his creed, if anything could have produced that effect. Thus the real danger of Protestantism in Scotland, if danger there was, arose from the magnitude of the pretensions of the preachers. They occasionally drove the king into dealings with the Guises, with France, and with Rome,—traffickings which were contrary to his natural bent, and to those interests of his in England which he already understood very well. He filled the Presbyterians with fears; but Catholics of sagacity soon ceased to entertain hopes based on the letters and demeanour of this crafty and calculating young prince. As our latest historian remarks, "The absolutism of James was forced upon him in large degree by the excessive claims of the Presbyterian clergy," while "the special circumstances in which Andrew Melville found the country" offer "the explanation of those extreme claims which he and his fellow-ministers put forward in regard to the mutual relations of Church and State." By open policy and secret intrigue James appeared to be steadily working for the overthrow of the existing religious establishment. Thus the extreme claims of the ministers forced absolutism on the king, and the absolutism of the king explains "the extreme claims" of the ministers.<sup>1</sup> In brief, two mutually exclusive, intolerant, and intolerable theories of Church and State were in open collision.

But Morton, we must remember, though never suspected of Catholic tendencies, had, when Regent, been at least as high-handed towards the Kirk as the young king himself. Morton had resisted the right of the preachers to "convocate the lieges."<sup>2</sup> When requested to come to the General Assembly and "further the cause of God," he not only refused, but threatened some of the most zealous with hanging, alleging that otherwise "there could be no peace nor order in the country," a theory later acted on by Charles II.<sup>3</sup> The editor of Calderwood tells a story of Morton's short way with preachers. A certain Captain Cullen had been with Mary of Guise during her mortal illness at Edinburgh Castle, whence he corresponded with her brother, the Cardinal of Lorraine. After the siege of Leith he entered the Danish service, and after Riccio's murder was a captain in Mary's guard of arquebus-men. He was said to have advised the strangling of Darnley at Kirk-o'-

Field, as he had observed that the effects of explosions were capricious. He was captured by the lords, but it was not deemed wise to publish his revelations: he was allowed to escape, forfeiting his recognisances.<sup>4</sup> He later took service under Kirkcaldy when that knight held the castle for Mary. The captain, after a skirmish, was found hiding ingloriously in a meat-safe. He had a very pretty wife, so Morton hanged him and lived with his widow. For this Morton was rebuked by Andrew Douglas, minister of Dunglas. His reply, it is said by Calderwood's editor, was first to torture Douglas in the boot, and then hang him,—a story not easily credible.

Nevertheless, from 1576 onwards the ministers laboured, first to oppose the bishops, and next to "collect out of the Book of God a form of discipline and policy ecclesiastical; to propose it to the prince; and to crave it to be confirmed as a law proceeding from God" (1578).<sup>5</sup> This was the 'Book of the Polecie of the Kirk,' and confirmed it never was. In 1580 "the office of bishops was damned." Episcopacy, the Brethren declared, was "brought in by the folly of men's invention"; all bishops were discharged from all functions, and could not sit as simple ministers till admitted de novo by the General Assembly, under penalty of excommunication, which meant universal boycotting. We find Andrew Melville explaining to Beza in 1578 that the nobles maintain "that the sentence of excommunication shall not be held valid until it has been approved by the king's Council after taking cognisance of the cause." He adds that "civil penalties, according to the laws and customs of our country, accompany the sentence of excommunication."<sup>6</sup> This puts the case of the Kirk in a nutshell. They claimed the right to inflict the severest civil penalties independent of the civil power. The Brethren, the professors, were to be able, through their pulpiteers, to deprive the king's servants of their civil rights and to drive them from society.

It happened in 1581 that James's Ministers or rulers, Arran and Lennox, were either profligate or disloyal to the established religion of their country. But the claim of the Kirk to inflict civil destruction, contrary to the will of the State, was a thing utterly intolerable; and, as Morton said, there never was peace or order in Scotland "until some of the most zealous were hanged," and the rest after 1688 were content to abate their unendurable pretensions. Meanwhile several, at least, of the bishops of 1572-82 were certainly knaves, corrupt and simoniacal, and justly opposed by the Brethren. It is a quarrel in which neither side can wholly merit our sympathy; the Court favourites and their bishops were as odious as the exaggerated desires of the Kirk to rule the State. A phrase of the Second Book of Discipline runs thus: "The ministers exercise not the civil jurisdiction, but teach the magistrate how it should be exercised according to the Word." The magistrate is to "submit himself to the discipline of the Kirk, if he transgress in matters of conscience and religion."<sup>7</sup> Now the preachers could persuade themselves that any part of State policy—say, a French or Spanish Alliance or marriage, or the supporting of Episcopacy—was "matter of conscience." Consequently they could and did interfere, scolding and libelling from the pulpit, excommunicating at their own wills, and yet pretending to restrict themselves to spiritual affairs.

Thus the dragon's teeth were sown which sprang up as armed men in the civil wars. On the other hand, thus the intrigues of Lennox for handing over James to a foreign land and a foreign faith were checked; while James, like Mary, was goaded by sermons into a hatred of the Kirk which produced its own baneful effects. It was a deadlock. Yet it is highly improbable that James, left to himself, would ever have returned to his mother's creed; for by training, by interest, and by vanity about his own gifts as a theologian he was Protestant.

To the political intrigues which followed Morton's death, and to their ecclesiastical embroilments, we now return. Just before Morton's head fell, Mary wrote to Archbishop Beaton about her hopes. James had sent her letters and a "token." She trusted that he would come into her devotion, and be a king indeed, for the Continent had never acknowledged him as king. Weary and outworn by thirteen years of prison, she only wanted to be at peace. Yet she was trying to establish relations between James and Spain, contrary, it seems, to the wishes of her ambassador at the Court of France.<sup>8</sup>

Presently (September 18, 1581) Mary resolved on the scheme of the "Association" (a shared royalty) between her and James. She had never acknowledged him as king. If she did so now, by the "Association," the effect would be, so the preachers and the Brethren thought when the plan reached their ears, to annul the acts of James's reign up to that moment. "The approbation of religion,<sup>9</sup> and all other things done since his coronation, should be accounted null; such as had been the king's friends should be counted traitors, and his adversaries good servants," says Calderwood, speaking of the events of January and February in the following year.<sup>10</sup>

Meanwhile in Scotland, since Morton's death, Arran (James Stewart) and Lennox had not been on the best terms. Arran was playing for the support of the Kirk. He had, indeed, seduced the wife of Lord March—that is, of James's great-uncle, his grandfather Lennox's brother, who had been transferred to the Earldom of March, in the new Lennox's interest. The lady got a scandalous divorce and was married to Arran. But then the pair submitted to the censures of the Kirk, and, like Burns in later days, occupied the place of penitence. Lennox, of course, was intriguing against the Kirk: however, he and Arran were reconciled. James took pleasure in the society of the new Lady Arran, which cannot have been improving to his morals. At a Parliament in October, Angus, Archibald Douglas, and many others of the name were forfeited. The king, however, would not gratify Lennox by receiving Sir James Balfour, one of his father's murderers. Later, James was less scrupulous. Elizabeth sent Errington to Scotland, as usual to counterplot Lennox; but Errington was not allowed to cross the Border. Elizabeth, when she learned this, was heard murmuring her rage against "that false scoundrel of Scotland," who had called Morton "father" when he meant to have Morton's head. She fell back on an attempt to set Mary against her son, and to restore the exiled Hamiltons. Her interest in them was caused by their value as a counterpoise to Lennox and the Stewarts. But Mary was not to be entrapped. The wiles of a prisoner are de bonne guerre, and historians waste indignation on the duplicity of Elizabeth's victim.

Mary's plan was to deny to Elizabeth that she had any special relations with Spain, or expected any aid thence, while she was really treating for assistance with Mendoza, the Spanish Ambassador in England.<sup>11</sup> The queen, as usual, had "too many irons in the fire." She was regarding Mendoza and Spain as her chief hopes, but her affairs and those of Scotland became hopelessly embroiled through the enthusiastic efforts of Jesuit traffickers to sweep Guise, France, the English Catholics, and the Pope into an impossible alliance with Spain. On the English Catholics Mendoza himself was working (September 1581). To them he pointed out that France would always prevent Spain from succouring them, out of jealousy, while Scotland was the true point d'appui. Six Catholic English lords, therefore, met secretly, and sent a priest on a mission to Scotland—or perhaps two were sent.<sup>12</sup> The envoy of the lords was to see Lennox, and tell him that if James turned Catholic many of the English nobles and people would declare him heir to the English crown, and would release Mary. If James declined conversion, they would oppose him and favour another candidate. These English lords “are all Spanish and Catholic at heart,” and desire nothing from France. If James came into their views, they would send their sons as hostages to him, and raise the North in arms, restore the Church, and release Mary. Mendoza actually “thought the business well founded.” Presently two of the six lords were in prison.

Though the subject is rather obscure, it seems that an emissary of the six English lords was taking their striking proposals into Scotland, while Father Parsons, or Persons, the famous Jesuit, was simultaneously, but independently, plotting there, first through Father Watts, and then through Father Hoit. Parsons had apparently despatched Watts and fled to France before the six lords sent their man. The Catholics at this moment were being furiously persecuted in England; it was the time of the martyrdom of Campian; they could not keep in touch with each other's plans, they blundered into each other's plots, and no business could be less “well founded” than that in which Mendoza placed his hopes. Watts met Seton, and had a secret interview with the young king, to what result he does not say. He had hopes of Lennox, Huntly, Eglinton, Caithness, Seton, Ogilvy, and Ferniehurst. But all of those were conspicuously broken reeds: they would not even pay the expenses of Catholic missionaries, if Parsons sent them!<sup>13</sup> The person sent by the English lords met the same noblemen in Scotland, who, unanimously and with enthusiasm, declined to be at any expense for the salvation of their souls. If somebody else would pay the Catholic missionaries, they would get them a secret hearing from the king. This envoy had little to do with Lennox, whom he found French, not Spanish, and “avowedly schismatic.” So Mendoza wrote on October 20, and it is really difficult to determine whether he is not speaking of Watts after all. In any case, Father Parsons, and Allen, later cardinal, in France, heard of the results, which, we see, came to no more than this, that if the Jesuits would send missionaries to Scotland at their own expense, Seton and Ferniehirst and the rest would see what they could do. That was a very different thing from converting James by way of a coup de main and the offer of the English succession.<sup>14</sup>

Meanwhile Mary was keeping her faithful Beaton, her ambassador in France, in the dark, and was trafficking through Allen. Parsons now sent Father Holt into Scotland with the priest who had been the envoy of the English lords (two of whom were already in prison). On February 9, 1582, Mendoza reported to Philip a message brought by Holt from Scotland. He had met Lennox, Huntly, Argyll, and others, who suggested the following hopeful plan: (1) To convert James by disputations between Presbyterians and Catholics. (2) If he will not be converted by fair means, to get Mary's leave to convert him by force. (3) To carry him out of the country, if Mary approves. (4) Or to depose him till Mary arrives. For those purposes they need the aid of 2000 men in Spanish service. The puerile absurdity of these proposals is conspicuous. Even Mendoza knew that not only the preachers, but Arran, "a terrible heretic," were opposed to the Church; the idea, therefore, was to murder Arran.<sup>15</sup> Later it was the English who desired to murder him.

Mendoza sent Holt back to Scotland, approving of the proposals, and now (February-March, 1582) Holt was joined in Scotland by the Scottish Jesuit, Father Creighton. He had conferred with Guise on the way, thus beginning to bring in the French influence, and to tangle the threads which Mendoza wished to keep in his own hands. He was hidden in Holyrood for several days, and Lennox wrote to Mary. He had learned from Creighton that he himself was to head a papal and Spanish army for her relief, an army of 15,000 men. He therefore proposed to go over to France to make arrangements. The plot was already burlesque. Who was to give 15,000 men to be led by Lennox? Already, too, Walsingham and Leicester had an English counterplot with Angus to seize James, and they expected to purchase Arran (March 19, 1582).<sup>16</sup> Meanwhile Mary and Mendoza knew that Lennox's 15,000 men were men in buckram. "It is the first," writes Mary to Mendoza, "that I have heard of such a thing." She desired the whole affair to be concealed from de Tassis, the Spanish Ambassador in France, and she laughed at the absurd desire of the intriguing Jesuits, that Mendoza should leave London to meet them at Rouen (April 6, 1582).<sup>17</sup> Mary, in short, declined to be mixed up with the Jesuits. Mendoza told Philip that Father Creighton "has changed my mode of procedure" by inventing airy armies, and giving the baton of command to Lennox.<sup>18</sup>

Both Mary and Mendoza opposed Lennox's desire to leave for France. France was the very country they wished to keep in the dark, as any large Spanish force leaving for Scotland would bring the French, from jealousy, to the aid of England. Mendoza entreated Creighton and Holt to confine themselves to the saving of souls,—it was a pity that the clergy should interfere in military matters. They continued to interfere. At the end of April Mendoza was asking Beaton in Paris what grounds Creighton could have for his high-flown promises of an army to Lennox, while Elizabeth (he says, probably exaggerating) was sending money and jewels to Scotland to bribe the party out of power to seize the king.<sup>19</sup> Mary was still most anxious (May 15) that the affair should be kept secret from de Tassis, the Spanish Ambassador at Paris. But the Jesuits, in the Scots familiar phrase, "let the pigs run through the job." Creighton and Holt, disobeying Mendoza, had gone to Paris, had met Beaton and Guise, Parsons and Allen. They reported dreams of Lennox: with Spanish forces he would convert Scotland and James, and rouse the North, and restore England to Rome. Guise offered to invade Sussex as soon as the Spaniards landed in Scotland; Parsons was to carry letters from Lennox to Philip; Creighton to the Pope. Lennox's demands were now immense, 20,000 men for Scotland, large sums of money, a guarantee for the value of his own estates. Yet Creighton reported that James was still a heretic, though in constant danger of his life from the plots of Elizabeth.<sup>20</sup> Mendoza "expressed a wish, as a Christian," that the Catholic schemers "might succeed." They met Guise at the house of de Tassis, whom Mary wished to keep out of the affair, which Guise wished to be subsidised by the Pope alone, so de Tassis wrote to Philip (May 29). Philip saw that too many people knew, and asked de Tassis to detain Parsons (June 11). In fact he stamped out the plot.

While the Jesuits were taking all into their own hands with boyish eagerness, the preachers in Scotland knew that mischief was on hand. By January 1582 the preachers had found out the scheme of the Association. On January 24, 1582, Durie informed his Edinburgh congregation that James was to traffic with France, the Duc de Guise, and his mother: Durie had wormed it out of George Douglas, Mary's agent.<sup>21</sup> At that time sermons were naturally popular. They contained the latest news, foreign and domestic, with a violent harangue. A National Covenant or band against the Roman pravity had already been sworn to and subscribed (March 1581), specially directed against Catholics who falsely, and for political reasons, pretended to be adherents of the truth. James himself was a covenanter; so was Lennox, but that did no longer protect him: Durie was on him; and henceforth attacked him from the pulpit. Lennox had got the gift of the archbishopric of Glasgow, and had appointed a minister named Montgomery as tulchan archbishop. Montgomery was paid to be a filter through which the money would reach Lennox. Simony could not be carried further. The preachers persecuted Montgomery, and terrified him into submission by threats of excommunication, but he took heart again, and tried to occupy his pulpit in the cathedral.

It is not easy for us to know what kind of men the mass of the ministers were at this period. In 1577 Morton had sent a long list of questions to the General Assembly. Some of them were conceived in a spirit of mockery, such as, "Whether a man may be both a minister and a reader, or an officer of arms, or a lord's or laird's steward, grieve, pantry-man, or porter?" Ministers might keep public-houses, and it is probable enough that some of them, in the deficiency of endowments, resided with lairds as chaplains, assisting also in keeping the accounts of the estate. Many of the ministers, certainly, were men of learning, such as Melville, Smeaton, Pont (who was skilled in the law), Davidson (who wrote the humorous poem against Morton); and one of their charges against Lennox's archbishop, Montgomery, was that he spoke disrespectfully of the learned languages. "He went about, so far as he could, to bring the original languages, Greek and Hebrew, in contempt." He also begged the preachers "to leave off to put on crowns and off crowns," and he daringly denied that the majority of mankind go to hell.<sup>22</sup> This, at least, is asserted by his enemies.

In April the Glasgow ministers were summoned to meet James at Stirling, and to accept Montgomery. Accompanied by many of the Brethren, they refused to acknowledge the Royal power in the matter, and Durie threatened to excommunicate the archbishop elect.<sup>23</sup> Not long after, in May, a present of horses arrived for James from the Duc de Guise. The man who brought them had been employed to carry the head of Coligny as a token of the success of the Bartholomew massacre, and nothing could have been better calculated than his arrival to arouse the anger of the Protestants. Durie went to Kinneill, where James was staying with Lennox, and rebuked the king. On May 23 he preached against Lennox and Arran. This was on a Wednesday, for Wednesdays and Fridays were days of preaching. Next week he was summoned to Dalkeith, and insulted by Lennox's kitchen valet. James ordered him to leave Edinburgh. He was backed by his presbytery, but was compelled to go. On June 9 the presbytery decided to excommunicate Montgomery, and the poet Davidson "did the curse" in the kirk of Liberton. He proposed to renew at Perth the armed rising which began the Reformation.<sup>24</sup> Lennox was censured for entertaining the excommunicated Montgomery; and a list of complaints was sent to James, including his relations with the bloody persecutor Guise. On July 6, at Perth, Arran asked Andrew Melville who dared subscribe these articles? "We dare, and will subscribe them, and render our lives in the cause," said Andrew, and all signed. Lennox and Arran perceived that the preachers had some lay support.

On June 27 Andrew Melville (now Principal of St Mary's College in St Andrews) denounced the "bloody gully" of absolute power before the General Assembly. Of all people, Sir James Balfour was present as an elder! The "secret assistance" which the Kirk expected took the usual shape of a band "against Dobany" (D'Aubigny, Lennox) among the discontented lords, such as the Earl of Gowrie (Ruthven, who had aided his father in Riccio's murder), Angus, Mar, Glencairn, Argyll, Lindsay, Rothes, and others. Elizabeth supplied Angus with money, and Lennox dreaded assassination.<sup>25</sup> Mendoza represents him as personally timid in an acute degree. Montgomery, as an excommunicated man, was driven out of Edinburgh by the mob in circumstances so ludicrous that James, hearing of the matter, lay down on the soil of the Inch of Perth, where he rolled about in helpless laughter.<sup>26</sup> Though the king's sense of humour was strong, he seems to have been aware that a plot against him had been arranged, and defeated, in July. Bowes (August 15) had warned Glencairn, Mar, Boyd, Lindsay, and others that Lennox meant to arrest them for this conspiracy.<sup>27</sup> There was strife between the artisans and burgesses of Edinburgh, the craftsmen insisting on being represented in the town council. In this dispute Lennox and Arran took opposite sides. Lennox meant to have occupied Edinburgh with Borderers on August 27; but the discontented lords, Gowrie and his faction, though the scheme of their band was incomplete, anticipated Lennox's movement against them, and seized the person of James, who was unaccompanied by Arran and Lennox, in the coup d'état known as the Raid of Ruthven.

It was on August 22 that Gowrie (Ruthven), Mar, the Master of Glamis, Lindsay, and others took and held James at Ruthven Castle, near Perth, a seat of Gowrie, where he had been hunting. Neither Arran nor Lennox was with him,—he was fairly trapped. The plot had been managed by Angus, with the collusion of England, which desired the deaths both of Lennox and Arran. Spottiswoode narrates that, as James tried to leave the room where the conspirators were, the Master of Glamis stepped to the door and stopped him. The king burst into tears. "Better bairns weep than bearded men," quoth the Master.<sup>28</sup> Calderwood makes Stirling the scene, the time August 31, and makes the Master of Glamis insult James by thrusting his leg before him. Mendoza gives another account of this insult, making Gowrie interfere, and dating the event on October 13. Mendoza, as translated by Major Martin Hume, says nothing about Gowrie's insulting leg. As rendered by Mr Froude he does, and asks someone to bring the king "a rocking-horse"—"a poney" in Major Hume's rendering.<sup>29</sup> Mr Froude adds that James "swore he would make Gowrie pay for the insult with his life"; Major Hume, "that he would reward him for it some day."

In spite of these confusions of evidence, James was probably insulted, and certainly regarded himself as a captive and dishonoured. This "bairn" bided his time, and made "bearded men weep" when it came. Meanwhile he was powerless. Arran at once rode to him with one or two grooms: his brother was waylaid and wounded: Arran himself was made prisoner. Next day the captors laid their grievances before James. He governed, it was said, not through his Council, but through Lennox, who was known to intrigue with Bishop Lesley and Archbishop Beaton. The "ministers of the blessed Evangel, and the true professors," had taken the liberty to emancipate James from such advisers.<sup>30</sup> James was brought to Perth, and, like his mother when seized by Bothwell, had to proclaim that he was no captive. Lennox, with Herries, Maxwell, Home, Seton, and Ferniehurst, repaired to Edinburgh, but took no energetic measures.<sup>31</sup> The new Bothwell, Francis Stewart, recently brought back by the king from Italy, son of a sister of Bothwell's by a bastard of James V., was with the Gowrie party, so was holy Ker of Faldonside. Elizabeth (August 30) sent Sir George Carey to James, complaining of Lennox.<sup>32</sup> Bowes was also sent, and the veteran Randolph was most anxious to go. He had sown the seeds, as Archibald Douglas told him, when trying to do a bargain with him in horse-flesh, for now Archibald hoped to ride home.<sup>33</sup> Archibald says that Arran was offering to accuse Lennox of treason, and it is very probable.<sup>34</sup> However, Archibald was to sell himself frequently before he crossed the Border.

From Edinburgh Lennox sent envoys to James, who assured them that he was a captive. The young king was sorely tried. The Lennox plot had been to convert him by force, and carry him abroad, if necessary. The Ruthven raiders held him a prisoner, and his life was in danger. James was like his grandfather when Sir George Douglas told him that they would tear him in two if the adverse party took hold of him. The foreigners and Lennox pulled one way, England and the Ruthven raiders tugged in the opposite direction. But James was fond of Lennox; his Ruthven captors he detested, except Mar. Historians maintain that James was ready to barter his creed for political advantages.<sup>35</sup> This was not his mother's opinion. "As his mother remarks," wrote Mendoza, "preaching will be of no avail to convert the king; he and the country must be dealt with by main force"<sup>36</sup> (August 30). The day after Mendoza wrote thus, he learned that Elizabeth had heard of the success of her plot with Angus—the Raid of Ruthven. Mendoza also heard, and this is notable, that the English trafficker with Angus was the Earl of Huntingdon, and that his party were muttering that it would be well to poison both James and Mary, "whereby Leicester and his party of heretics think they can assure the claim of Huntingdon." This was probably true; for, later, Gowrie confessed that he had known an English plot to cut off both James and Mary, and had refused to carry it out.<sup>37</sup> Gowrie told the same story to the Master of Gray. Thus assassination plots were not confined to the Catholic party, nor to the Scots.

The Ruthven raiders held power for but ten months. The letters of Bowes, the English Ambassador, then in Scotland, prove that the party was never solid: they all suspected each other; even Gowrie was under suspicion, Glencairn was doubtful, and Bowes could only trust Mar and the Master of Glamis, as a rule. The aim of the party was to get Lennox, who had taken refuge in Dumbarton, out of Scotland. Bowes was usually convinced that James was with him and the raiders in this desire; later he misdoubted that "the young cock" had beguiled him. After many delays and intrigues, Lennox obtained leave to go to France through England. But he had first appeared at Blackness, awaiting the result of a rather ingenious plan for seizing James. The conspirators were to conceal themselves in the dark gallery over the Royal Chapel, and thence, when the nobles had left the king after supper, were to enter the palace by a little entry, of which James's porter, Boig, had given them the keys. They would "persuade the king to be contented, and send for Lennox," and would then kill Mar, John Colville, a busy man on the raiders' side, and others: all this on the night of Lennox's hasty arrival at Blackness (November 28).<sup>38</sup> Lennox, when he arrived in England, acquainted Mendoza with this plot and its divulgence by "the king's houndsman."<sup>39</sup>

To what extent was James himself a consenting party to this new seizure of his person, and how far, on the whole, did he go with Lennox in his designs for a restoration of the Church? The answer depends on another question, How far was James aware of Lennox's designs for an alteration of religion? Lennox, we must remember, had signed the National Covenant, and it may be doubted whether he had ever revealed to James his intention of converting him by force, or carrying him abroad to be converted. James was personally fond of Lennox, and he regarded himself as a captive, and an insulted captive, of the raiders. His position was this: he had promised Elizabeth that Lennox should go to France, and he tried to send him thither. So far he was not deceiving Bowes. But, already a casuist, he reckoned that he had never promised that Lennox should not return. While Lennox was in Scotland the life of James was not safe from the raiders. They knew the peril of their own position, and Bowes knew it. They held a wolf by the ears. Elizabeth would not pay them—would not pay the guard they had set over the king: probably she would desert them. One day James would escape and revenge himself. If they listened to their English allies they would kill James; but to kill James meant a Hamilton as king, or a civil war. They were thus anxious merely to get Lennox out of the country, and the king knew that this measure was for his own safety. Whether he would willingly have gone with Lennox, had the attempt from Blackness succeeded, we cannot tell. But, knowing now of the attempt, James had arranged to recall Lennox from France, and a plan had been sketched for trapping the Ruthven lords in Edinburgh Castle and freeing the king—so Lennox informed Mendoza.<sup>40</sup> Meanwhile, publicly, James had been forced to acquiesce in the situation. He did not dismiss Boig, the porter.

While Lennox tarried at Dumbarton the lords had put forth an enormously long indictment of him, which, from the style, seems to have been composed by the preachers, or by John Colville, who had been a preacher, and was their man of tongue and pen. Lennox replied, and asked to be heard before Parliament; but it was not the way to permit accused persons to defend themselves, as we know from the case of Queen Mary. Craig scolded James in public.<sup>41</sup> Angus was admitted to the king's peace. On October 19, 1582, a Parliament, or Convention, met at Holyrood. Its proceedings, in the recorded Acts of Parliament, are deleted,—crossed out,—and, so marked, look oddly in the printed Acts (vol. iii. pp. 326-328). The deleted proceedings announce that holy religion and his majesty's royal person were in peril, wherefore Gowrie and the rest were compelled to commit the Raid of Ruthven, which is decreed to be "good, sincere, thankful, and necessary service." Arran is to be warded by Gowrie at Ruthven. James, on the first opportunity, scored out this paper security for the Ruthven lords.

A General Assembly, meeting in October, had ratified the Ruthven conspiracy with their spiritual approval, which was, apparently, infallible. This action James never forgave, though he had been consulted by the preachers, and had given them his sanction. Bowes meanwhile was making efforts to extract the casket and casket letters for Elizabeth from Gowrie, but failed. After Gowrie's death the letters entirely vanished. A casket at Hamilton Palace is not the original coffer.<sup>42</sup> Mary had been declaring the letters forgeries, and menacing their holders. Bowes said that Elizabeth needed them "for the secrecy and benefit of the cause," a phrase which will be diversely interpreted by Mary's friends and enemies.

The end of the complicated intrigues of this year was that Lennox at last went to London, on his way to Paris; that Angus was seemingly received into favour by James; that James felt, or pretended, great devotion to Elizabeth. But from Bowes's long and tedious letters it is plain that the Ruthven conspirators were uneasy and at odds among themselves; that Arran was likely to be liberated; and that Elizabeth would not take the only way to attach to herself the Ruthven lords—would not buy them.

History, it is said, does not repeat itself. At this time in Scotland history was a series of repetitions. There was a formula, the old play was played, with occasional changes in the actors. The English and Protestant lords, backed by the Kirk, seized the king, relying on the aid of Elizabeth. She was too thrifty to pay them adequately; their party dwindled; the French or Spanish, or anti-Kirk party, got the king; Catholic plots were woven; they were discovered; the webs were rent; and the English party of the lords had another chance. The quarrel about Episcopacy broke forth, was quieted, and broke forth again. Elizabeth played the game of cat and mouse with Mary, and set Mary against James, James against his mother, till the axe fell at Fotheringay. The result was that James, a nervous creature, perpetually in danger of his life, captured, preached at, bullied, became one of the falsest and most selfish of dissemblers, longing for freedom and revenge, and, in appearance at least, wavering in religion.

When Lennox left Scotland with shattered health, two French ambassadors arrived: first La Mothe Fénelon, accompanied by Davison as a spy; later came Mainville. Lennox and La Mothe met on the road and had a brief conversation, to which Davison listened, as far as the wind and rain permitted. James was, or pretended to be, anxious to get rid of La Mothe.

La Mothe delivered an address on the Old Alliance, the desirableness of constitutional action, his king's anxiety for James's freedom, his hope that James would let bygones be bygones, and so forth.<sup>43</sup> The ministers correctly suspected deeper designs, and sent a deputation about the dangers to religion. Mainville wore the cross of an order—this was a badge of antichrist. He desired a private mass, a thing not to be endured. He washed the feet of thirteen poor men on Maundy Thursday—nothing could be more detestable. When the magistrates, by James's order, gave La Mothe a dinner, the preachers proclaimed a fast, and three sermons were preached in five hours. La Mothe retired; he had brought gold with him, and may have bought a few lords. Mainville stayed longer, waiting to see how affairs would turn.

In London Lennox had seen Elizabeth, and announced himself a Protestant, while through his secretary he assured Mendoza that he was a Catholic, and would land again in Scotland with a Catholic army under Guise. In Paris, however, he would play the Huguenot to blind his enemies. Once arrived in Paris, he either betrayed Mary's and Guise's plans, and a scheme for carrying James to France, or he used these revelations as a blind for Walsingham, or he stood to win on either chance. In any case, he died in May of a flux to which he seems to have been subject: he and Morton had both been very ill after gorging themselves at a dinner of Lindsay's. In his last letter, recommending his children to James (who befriended them), Lennox professed himself a Protestant, which probably means that he thought James resolute in that faith. He had said as much to Mauvissière, the French Ambassador in London, and Mauvissière told one Fowler, a spy of Walsingham's, who was employed in seducing Archibald Douglas, a prisoner, from Mary's cause. Fowler also learned that Gowrie was weary of his charge of James. He needed guards, could not pay them, and Bowes could not wring the money from Elizabeth.<sup>44</sup> At this time the Scots captured the Jesuit Holt, and Elizabeth urged the use of the boot. To torture was her peculiar joy, but James managed to let Holt escape. English pirates, as cruel as their queen, caught and tortured the captain and crew of a Scottish ship, The Grace of God, so that "some lost their thumbs and fingers, and some their sight and hearing." Yet the English have always blustered about the cruelty of the Spaniards!<sup>45</sup>

In April two envoys were sent from Scotland to Elizabeth: one, Colville, later ruined, and a spy, had taken a great part in the Raid of Ruthven; the other, Colonel Stewart, had acted as agent between Mary and the late Lady Lennox after their reconciliation, and at heart was Mary's man. Stewart was to consult Elizabeth as to James's marriage and affairs in general; was to pray that she would resign to him the Lennox lands in England; to ask for £10,000 in gold and £5000 a-year; to assent to the ratification of the endless treaty between Mary and the English queen, and to inquire about James's right of succession to the English throne (April-May 1583).<sup>46</sup> Redress for the piracies was also mentioned. Most desired was money to pay James's guards: Bowes was asked by Walsingham to lend it; Walsingham would give security for repayment.<sup>47</sup> By the end of May Fowler could report his success in purchasing Archibald Douglas, who "was skilled in deciphering." Archibald is probably the person mentioned by Bowes from Edinburgh on April 7. If so, he was associated with Glencairn, an untrusty ally of Gowrie; and the plan was to bring Archibald back to Scotland as a supposed agent of Lennox (named in cipher "870"), which would enable him to be trusted by, and to betray, Mainville, Huntly, Glencairn, and Montrose. There were difficulties, as Archibald would perhaps be accused of Darnley's murder, though he declared that Morton's confession, implicating him, "was not worth five shillings." The scheme was deferred by Bowes's advice.<sup>48</sup> On May 29 Colville and Stewart left London in disgust, and the expense of James's guards fell on Walsingham. Bowes, in Edinburgh, foresaw trouble: James, if his requests were denied, would revolt to Huntly, Atholl, and other non-English nobles.<sup>49</sup>

Elizabeth in April had been in one act of her treaties with Mary: endless, and never meant to end. She communicated Mary's offers through Bowes to James. The prince remarked that, seeing Elizabeth and himself were coming to terms, his mother tried to throw this "bone to stick in their teeth." In any "association" he "doubted some prejudice might come to him"; the association was "tickle to his crown." In brief, James suspected that Mary wished to share or even monopolise his power, and so held off from the association.<sup>50</sup> Elizabeth probably reckoned that she held James through his own selfishness, and therefore declined to yield the Lennox estates or advance money for the guardsmen, without whom she might at any moment lose him. Her highest offer was a pension of £2500. Colville and Colonel Stewart came home in anger, and Elizabeth renewed her dealings with Mary. But these Elizabeth never would conclude, and, whatever Mary's crime as to Darnley, this eternal game of cat and mouse excites pity and indignation. Meanwhile James's dealings with Elizabeth, and his Protestantism, diverted Guise from his scheme of invading Scotland. To land an army in England seemed more feasible. Nothing was feasible: all had to be managed by messengers, whom Elizabeth was certain to trap and torture. The aspect of politics was altered again when, after the failure of the mission to Elizabeth, James freed himself from Gowrie, who was heartily sick of his charge.

The escape was managed thus: Patrick Adamson, Archbishop of St Andrews, was of course much suspected and detested by the preachers and the Brethren. But Patrick had a house of sufficient strength, the Castle of St Andrews, which Archbishop Hamilton had rebuilt after its ruin by the French guns that avenged the Cardinal. Here since the General Assembly of April 1582 Patrick had "lain like a tod [fox] in a hole, diseased of a great feditie, as he called his disease." Patrick, not being a godly man, had protected, and later given up, a poor woman accused of witchcraft: she was said to have transferred his malady to a white pony, and the historian of the Kirk relates with glee that she was afterwards burned at Edinburgh.<sup>51</sup> It was to Patrick's "hole," the Castle of St Andrews, that James now fled. Sir James Melville was concerned in the escape. James appointed, he tells us, a convention at St Andrews, inviting Huntly (not the partner in Darnley's murder, who was long dead), Montrose, Argyll, Crawford, Rothes, March, and Gowrie, who is represented as having come round to James's cause. He was certainly thought a waverer by Angus and others of his party, was weary of politics, and was building and decorating "a fair gallery" at Gowrie House in Perth, a gallery destined to be fatal to his line. The king sent Colonel Stewart to call in Sir James Melville, who was tired of Courts, but visited James at Falkland (June 27). Sir James argued that the king was now practically free and had better let bygones be bygones. This he promised to do, but he must first be free indeed. He therefore rode to his great-uncle, the Earl of March, who was living in St Andrews, and met him, with other gentlemen, at Dairsie on the Eden. At St Andrews James lodged in the Novum Hospitium, where the old gateway stands. The place was very insecure, the mob was not to be trusted, and Melville induced the king to move into the Bishop's castle, which he did in the more haste as armed men were waiting to seize him in the abbey gardens. Next day James was again in peril, as the lords of the English party arrived in arms. However, the Provost mustered a force, aided by the loyal lairds and Gowrie.

On the morrow James was master of the castle, and a bitter day must that have been for Andrew Melville, the Principal of St Andrews. The king proclaimed an amnesty, went to Ruthven, dined with Gowrie, and was apparently reconciled to him. But Arran (the Colonel Stewart who dragged down Morton) returned presently to power and favour. This boded evil.<sup>52</sup> The preachers met James at Falkland; one or two behaved with tact, another threatened: "there was never one yet in this realm, in chief authority, that ever prospered after the ministers began to threaten them."<sup>53</sup> James smiled; he was to prove an exception to the rule.

His intentions, as publicly proclaimed, were to be "an universal king"—that is, to reconcile parties, and to be subject to no clique of nobles. When a captive, he had been compelled to express acquiescence in the Raid of Ruthven, but his proclamations now declared that the parties to the conspiracy must seek "remissions" for their deed. Such a paper remission Gowrie sought and obtained, thereby disgusting his late allies. The king spoke much of "clemency," which was doubly distrusted. Many intrigues were being woven which were only in part known even to the preachers. Young Seton (a son of Mary's staunch friend, Lord Seton, and to be recognised as a brother of Catherine Seton in Scott's 'Abbot') was at Paris in July, dealing not with Guise, but with de Tassis, the Spanish Ambassador, and hoping to secure religious tolerance.<sup>54</sup> Immediately after the affair at St Andrews, de Tassis heard, from an unnamed Scots lord, that Sir Robert Melville,<sup>55</sup> a strong Marian, had organised the business, and that James's Council, pending the arrival of Arran, were Argyll, Montrose, Rothes, Marischal (Keith, founder of Marischal College), and Gowrie, "by whose advice he is influenced." James wanted Mainville to return, and wanted money from Henri III.<sup>56</sup> But Henri III. had no money to give, and was on ill terms with Guise, who needed a foreign war, and was working on Philip to lend men and ships, and with the Pope to give money, for the release of Mary and for the restoration of Catholicism in England. It was known to the preachers that the young laird of Fintrie, a Catholic, later martyred, and a relation of Archbishop Beaton, was in Scotland, and probably Fintrie carried a curious letter from James himself to Guise, of which a copy was forwarded to Philip.

This letter, from Falkland, August 19, would have shown the ministers that their distrust of James's relations with Guise, "the bloody persecutor of the saints," was more than justified. The king thanked God for preserving the life of Guise, who had aided Mary and James in their utmost need. If James possesses the splendid qualities attributed to him by Mainville (and he does not disclaim them), he owes it to his Guise blood. He hopes to follow in the footsteps of the House of Lorraine. He has achieved his freedom, "as it were in sport," so adroit is he, "and is ever ready to avenge himself when the opportunity occurs." That was precisely the opinion entertained by the enterprisers of the Raid of Ruthven. He approves of Guise's project. Acting on Mainville's advice, he has, for love of Guise, allowed the Jesuit, Holt, to escape, a circumstance which, in treating with Elizabeth and the preachers, he discreetly veiled. People were always escaping, he said; there was nothing "uncouth" in that. But James did not profess any inclination to join the Roman Church, without which Philip would do nothing for him. He had mentioned all this only to Morton (Maxwell) and to Gowrie! Now, if Gowrie was not Protestant, who was? He ran too many double courses.<sup>57</sup>

James now issued a proclamation expressing his mind as to the Raid of Ruthven, and calling Durie with other preachers to St Andrews he asked them what they thought of it. They answered ambiguously: he had better consult the General Assembly.<sup>58</sup> At the end of the month Mar and the Master of Glamis—he of the impertinently obtruded leg—were placed in ward. Early in September Walsingham, much against his will, was sent down by Elizabeth. He could do nothing with James, and advised Elizabeth to slip at him the Hamiltons, then exiles in England. He also left a plot against James, to explode when he had returned to England; but the plot was dropped.<sup>59</sup> Arran had discovered it, and reinforced the guards. Walsingham remonstrated about Holt's escape. James replied that he would have extradited Holt, an English subject, if Elizabeth had handed over Archibald Douglas, "who is known to be guilty of my father's murder." (James's filial feelings did not prevent him from accepting, soon after, the services of Archibald, and his father's murderer was employed to destroy his mother.)<sup>60</sup> He denied to Walsingham what he had professed to Guise, his connivance at Holt's escape. Such had education and environment made James at the age of seventeen.

The General Assembly met in October. They grumbled about the reception of young Fintrie, about favour shown to David Chalmers, who, says Buchanan, had abetted the amours of Bothwell and Mary. The Assembly held him suspected of Darnley's murder, in which, apparently, a large part of the population had been engaged. The Assembly growled at the scarcity of witch-burnings, and made other more legitimate complaints. James was later to do their will on witches, and to do it with a zest. The best part of James's reply dealt with the pretensions of the preachers to dictate his choice of ministers, and to oppose his friendly relations with foreign Powers, "from which no princes or commonwealth in the world abstaineth, although being diverse in religion." The Assembly now "delated" Aristotle and other classical authors of heterodox opinions, to the number of twenty. Tutors at the universities must "evince their errors, and admonish the youth to eschew the same."<sup>61</sup>

On November 13 Lennox's son, a boy, arrived from France and was taken into favour, rising to ducal rank. A convention at Edinburgh, of December 7, stamped as traitors such Ruthven plotters as would not repent. Now the old Act approving of the Raid was deleted.<sup>62</sup> Angus was banished beyond Spey; Mar and the Master of Glamis thought of retreating to Ireland, others to France; Gowrie remained at Court. He had failed to arrange a revolutionary plot with Mar and Bowes, or had refused. James knew of a plot to kidnap him while hunting, planned by Angus (December 29).<sup>63</sup> "The matter is dissembled for the present."

The new Bothwell, Francis, son of a sister of the wicked earl, was beginning his career of storms by quarrelling with Arran. The turbulent John Durie, however, was subdued: threats of setting his head on a spike produced a recantation from him in the pulpit.<sup>64</sup> Mary's influence, Bowes believed, wholly governed James.<sup>65</sup> But at this time was captured Francis Throckmorton, an agent in Guise's great doomed project of an invasion of England; and that enterprise was to bring ruin, through Throckmorton's extorted confession, on many of its devisers. The rack, as usual, extracted from the unhappy Throckmorton all that he knew, and his account of an intended invasion alarmed the advisers of Elizabeth. They were really in no great danger: Philip required much more urging before he would move, and the Pope was stingy. Events were to prove that England could guard her own. But it seemed desirable to win over James. That worthy messenger, Archibald Douglas, was to be sent to Scotland to tell James that Elizabeth would recognise him (January 23, 1584).<sup>66</sup> But on the very next day Bowes, from Berwick, informed Walsingham of a new plot of the lords of Mary's party, while the laird of Applegarth accused Angus of a conspiracy, already known to James, to seize him in the old way. Two English emissaries from Mary were working in Scotland; Bowes could not identify, and failed to kidnap them. A month later (February 19, 1584) James took the extraordinary step of writing to the Pope as well as to Guise. Arran, "that terrible heretic," was at this time the young king's chief adviser, and we are inclined to suspect that James, alarmed by the plots and rumours of plots, wrote without Arran's knowledge. He speaks of his gratitude to the Pope as the friend of his mother, and of his own danger from evil subjects leagued with Elizabeth, "with the object of utterly ruining me." Unless aided by the Pope, James will be forced "to second the design of my greatest enemies and yours." "I hope to be able to satisfy your Holiness on all other points."<sup>67</sup>

James must have been terrified by the plot of the English party, Angus and the rest, organised by Colville (the man of the Raid of Ruthven and of the mission to Elizabeth), who was now in exile at Berwick, working with Bowes. Some bishop, perhaps Patrick Adamson, who had carried his "feditie" to England on a mission, stood in the way, and Colville (March 23) thought that he should be "removed." Up to mid-April "the news was good," said Colville, and on April 19 Bowes was waiting to hear of the success of the plot. Rothes, Angus, Mar, and others were to meet in Lothian. Gowrie was loitering at Dundee, ready to join the rebels if they succeeded, to sail away if they failed. He appears to have been trimming. Certainly he was in touch with Angus through Hume of Godscroft. He professed to James his intention of sailing abroad, but he lingered, watching events, and equally distrusted by both parties. Elizabeth was being pressed to support the party which she had so often deserted, when instead of joyous news of the success of the blow to be dealt on April 18, Bowes received evil intelligence. Arran knew everything, and had only waited till the head of the tortoise peered forth from the shell. Gowrie was taken, after resistance, at Dundee, by Colonel Stewart. The head had peered out; Mar, Angus, and the Master of Glamis had slipped back to Scotland. After Gowrie's arrest they seized Stirling Castle. Within two days James and Arran were marching against them at the head of 12,000 men. The leaders ran away and crossed the Border. Bowes confessed that he had blundered, and ought to be dismissed from service. A correspondent of Davison, who was on a mission to James, "had thought better of Randolph and Bowes," so that old Randolph seems to have had a finger in the fiasco. Angus and Mar were told by Walsingham that Elizabeth would do her best for them. It was the old story of a rising fostered and betrayed by Elizabeth. The preachers fled with the rest. Mr Andrew Hay, Mr James Lawson, Mr Walter Balcanquhal, with Mr John Davidson, that satiric poet, went to join Mr Andrew Melville across the Tweed. Elizabeth had recently hanged a considerable number of priests, and Arran was very capable of doing what Morton said needed to be done to preachers.

It does not seem that the Brethren fled before the execution of Gowrie. On May 27 Davison from Berwick wrote to Walsingham an account of the infamous trick by which Arran brought Gowrie to the block. The story is a partisan statement; it is told by Calderwood, but it is much in harmony with a manuscript account of the trial.<sup>68</sup> Mr Tytler accepts the narrative sent by Davison to Walsingham on May 27. It is to the effect that Arran and Sir Robert Melville visited Gowrie, and Arran cajoled him into writing a letter of confession to James, so as to secure an interview. Arran promised that this letter, "his own dittay," or indictment, as he said, should not be used against him. It was used, and Gowrie was executed, behaving with great resolution. If the story from the same sources—that Sir Robert Melville stood as Gowrie's friend at the block, and with Stewart of Traquair saw to his burial—is true, Melville can scarcely have been deeply involved in the treachery of Arran, if treachery there was, though Melville could play a double game in diplomacy. At the time of Mary's capture at Carberry (June 1567) he certainly dealt both for the lords, his employers, and for Mary, to whom he was devoted. But we have no reason to think that he would betray a friend like Gowrie, or that, if he did, Gowrie would treat him as a friend on the scaffold.

Gowrie had been in the Riccio murder. He had helped Lindsay to extort Mary's abdication at Lochleven. According to Nau, he had insulted her by his lust in the same castle. Throckmorton reported at the moment (July 14, 1567) that Ruthven was removed from the charge of the queen, "as he began to show great favour to her and gave her intelligence."<sup>69</sup> Mary revealed his conduct, and showed a letter of his to Lady Douglas of Lochleven, says Nau, so the laird of Lochleven had him recalled. The evidence of Throckmorton and Nau tends to the same point. Gowrie had imprisoned his prince once, had been pardoned, had been trusted even as to the king's dealings with Guise, and yet had been engaged in this latest plot. But the method by which his conviction was secured was deemed "Machiavellian," and revenge may have been the motive of his son's conspiracy in 1600.

We have perhaps no right to connect Andrew Melville with the conspiracy now crushed by the death of Gowrie. It was earlier, on February 15, 1584, that Melville was summoned before the Privy Council. He was accused of seditious sermons and prayers, and explained that his words had been misunderstood. He claimed to be tried, in the first instance, before a court of the Kirk. This would, of course, mean an acquittal, and a secular court might fear to quash the verdict of the spiritual judges. He also protested that his accuser, one Stewart, was a private enemy. After giving in his "declinature" he brandished a Hebrew Bible, and asked if any one could condemn him out of that. He was practically found guilty of contempt of court, and ordered to go to prison in Blackness. "He made as if he intended to obey the sentence," says his biographer, Dr M'Crie, but he fled to Berwick—not without breach of parole, as some may conceive. Probably he cannot fairly be charged with refusing, as an ordained minister, to submit to a secular court in the case of a charge of seditious language. His plea rather was that he should be heard, in the first instance, by spiritual judges.<sup>70</sup> But then they would give a verdict in his favour, and how could a secular court reverse the doom of the prophets?

As for the other preachers in exile, some, it seems, had withdrawn after Melville's flight, weeks before the attack on Stirling. The others looked only for "bloodie butcherie."<sup>71</sup> In these distressing circumstances a General Assembly, which was asked to reprobate the Raid of Ruthven, broke up without doing business. It was when Mar held Stirling, and he wrote a letter to the Brethren, but the occasion was awkward, and the Brethren did not commit themselves, "awaiting a better opportunity."<sup>72</sup>

In this condition of the Kirk Patrick Adamson returned from England. He had bestowed his "feditie" on Mendoza, before that ambassador was dismissed after Throckmorton's confessions. "He haunted also Mr Archibald Douglas his companie, and sindrie other suspect places." He bilked a tailor of £7. He borrowed a gown from the Bishop of London, but did not send it back to that prelate. He did something even more remarkable, for which he was batoned by the porter at the palace.<sup>73</sup> According to Calderwood, Adamson must have acted like a less decorous Archbishop Sharp.

The proceedings of James and Arran, on Adamson's return, indicated what proved to be the permanent bent of the young king. France, in reply to Lord Seton, had advised James to proceed "by the gentle way" in resettling his realm.<sup>74</sup> The advice, though disappointing, seemed excellent, but how was it practicable? To pardon all the lords conspirators would only breed new conspiracies. To permit the unbridled licence of the pulpit was no way of bringing peace. Moreover, Arran wanted the spoils of Gowrie, the Douglases, and the Hamiltons, who had been hanging about the Border waiting for the success of the Raid of Stirling. James showed, in these circumstances, his despotic tendency, his zeal for Episcopacy, his determination to be the head of the Kirk as well as of the State. Without dominating the Kirk, indeed, his headship of the State, and even the State itself, were futile. The time was not ripe for public opinion to take its due share in the commonwealth, by parliamentary representation and the open discussion of the platform and the press. The press was represented by clandestine pamphlets and placards; the modern House of Commons had its parallel in the General Assembly, but that, with the pulpit, was one-sided, and rested on the survival of spiritual privileges and pretensions, and on texts from ancient Hebrew Scriptures. The public opinion of the puritan middle classes found voice in sermons, but these perpetually trenched on sedition. Each change of Government was the result of armed conspiracy, and implied executions and forfeitures.

The course which James took for reinforcing the State was arbitrary, unconstitutional, and (in the eyes of the preachers and the Brethren) blasphemous. But what course was he to take? On the return of Adamson a Parliament was held at Edinburgh on May 18-22.<sup>75</sup> Naturally, and as usual, the Opposition did not attend. The Lords of the Articles were sworn to secrecy. The preachers were not represented. In four days the Parliament unmade much of the Reformation which in 1560 a convention had made as rapidly, and with as little discussion. Lawson and Balcanquhal, from their refuge in Berwick, complained of the revolutionary speed; but it was the usual method in Scottish parliamentary proceedings (June 2).<sup>76</sup> The Rev. David Lindsay, sent by the brethren to inquire and remonstrate, was hurried to Blackness.

The Ruthven Raid was again declared treason. James and the Council, by the "Black Acts" as they were called, were to be judges in all causes, or to approve of the judges; and declinature of jurisdiction (as by Andrew Melville) was to be held treason. There was to be no more meddling with State affairs in sermons under penalty of treason, no General Assemblies without James's express licence. Episcopacy was established. The posterity of Gowrie was disinherited. The excommunication of Montgomery was annulled.<sup>77</sup> Angus, Mar, Glamis, and others were forfeited. Colonel William Stewart was made Captain of the Guard. Davison was in Edinburgh and reported these proceedings to Walsingham (May 23-27). James had now got what he really wanted, if he could keep it, and consequently he was at once independent of Guise, Spain, and the Pope, and had shown them, by establishing his supremacy in a Church after his own heart, that they could not hope for his conversion.

Having put his foot on the neck of the Kirk, James could no longer be expected even to promise to be converted to the Church. He was in the desirable position of being his own pontiff, like Elizabeth, after the Parliament of May, and this would bring him closer to England. For his mother's freedom he had no desire, far otherwise. James had only needed his mother's aid, as he had needed that of the Pope. The more noted preachers fled, and "flyted" from Berwick against Patrick Adamson. Both sides put in hits, and we learn from Adamson that the General Assemblies were called "Mackintosh's Courts," which we may conceive to have been unruly.<sup>78</sup> Ministers were compelled to subscribe a submission to their ordinary or withdraw. Lawson and Balcanquhal replied at vast length. What, had God not given to the preachers "the keys of binding and losing," and was a mere Parliament to take possession of these instruments, "and overpass Uzziah in usurping the office of the priests"?<sup>79</sup> "New presbyter," we see, "is but old priest writ large," and this pretension, at the root of a century of war and broil, needed to be put down.

The ladies joined the bicker. Mrs Janet Lawson (née Guthrie) and Mrs Margaret Balcanquhal (née Marjoribanks) rushed into the fray with a long letter. They quoted Latin, they cited Chaucer, they called Adamson's style metallic ("hard iron style"). They said, "You lie in your throat!" They called Episcopacy "your new-devised Popedom." They denied that the Kirk had threatened to excommunicate the king.<sup>80</sup>

These were remarkable ladies, if their logic, their Latin, and their manners were all their own. But we are now entered on that deadlock between Kirk and State which never ended till, wearied and worn, the Kirk practically surrendered to the Prince of Orange. Later, Craig told the bullying Arran that he "should be cast down from his high horse of pride." That was an easy prediction, but Calderwood thinks it was fulfilled "when James Douglas of Parkhead thrust Arran off his horse with a spear and slew him."<sup>81</sup> Mr Froude spares a compliment to the "second-sight" of the preachers. Indeed their "subliminal premonitions" were ever part of their power with the populace.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER XI.

<sup>1</sup> Hume Brown, ii. 169, 186.

<sup>2</sup> Calderwood, iii. 306, 307.

<sup>3</sup> Calderwood, iii. 385, 393.

<sup>4</sup> Privy Council Register, i. 640.

<sup>5</sup> Calderwood, iii. 415; Act. Parl. Scot., iii. 105, 138.

<sup>6</sup> M'Crie's Andrew Melville, i. 202.

<sup>7</sup> Calderwood, iii. 531, 532.

<sup>8</sup> Labanoff, v. 231, 237.

<sup>9</sup> For example, in the Parliament of November 1581, specially confirming the Act of Mary's last Parliament of April 1567 (Act. Parl. Scot., iii. 210).

<sup>10</sup> Calderwood, iii. 594, 595.

<sup>11</sup> Mary to Mendoza, January 14, 1582, Spanish State Papers, iii. 205, 206.

<sup>12</sup> Watts, apparently, was sent "before September" 1581, while on September 7 Mendoza writes to Philip that the six lords will "send a person of understanding who was brought up in Scotland" ('Edinburgh Review,' vol. 187, p. 324; Spanish State Papers, iii. 170). Apparently Father Persons sent Watts, the six lords sent some one else.

<sup>13</sup> Edinburgh Review, vol. 187, p. 326.

<sup>14</sup> Spanish State Papers, iii. 194, 195.

<sup>15</sup> Spanish State Papers, iii. 285-288.

<sup>16</sup> Spanish State Papers, iii. 320.

<sup>17</sup> Spanish State Papers, iii. 330, 331.

<sup>18</sup> Spanish State Papers, iii. 349, 350.

<sup>19</sup> Spanish State Papers, iii. 351.

<sup>20</sup> Spanish State Papers, iii. 371.

<sup>22</sup> Calderwood, iii. 579, 580.

<sup>24</sup> Calderwood, iii. 623.

<sup>26</sup> Calderwood, iii. 663, 664.

<sup>21</sup> Calderwood, v. 594.

<sup>23</sup> Calderwood, iii. 597.

<sup>25</sup> Tytler, iv. 47. 1864.

<sup>27</sup> Bowes, pp. 176-178.

- <sup>28</sup> See Calderwood, iii. 643, for another version. Cf. Spottiswoode, ii. 290.
- <sup>29</sup> Spanish State Papers, iii. 407; Froude, xi. 283. 1875.
- <sup>30</sup> Calderwood, iii. 637-640. <sup>31</sup> Bowes, p. 181.
- <sup>32</sup> Calderwood, iii. 644. <sup>32</sup> Thorpe, i. 426.
- <sup>34</sup> Also Bowes to Cecil; Bowes, p. 182.
- <sup>35</sup> Hume Brown, ii. 192. <sup>36</sup> Spanish State Papers, iii. 399.
- <sup>37</sup> Mary to Chateaufort, December 8, 1585; Labanoff, vi. 239; Spanish Calendar, iii. 400; Spottiswoode, ii. 311, 312.
- <sup>38</sup> Bowes, pp. 267, 268. <sup>39</sup> Spanish State Papers, iii. 438.
- <sup>40</sup> Spanish State Papers, iii. 438, 439. <sup>41</sup> Calderwood, iii. 674.
- <sup>42</sup> Bowes, pp. 236, 240, 253, 265. <sup>43</sup> Teulet, ii. 538-546.
- <sup>44</sup> Thorpe, pp. 437, 439. March-April 1583.
- <sup>45</sup> James to Elizabeth, April 1; Thorpe, i. 438. <sup>45</sup> Thorpe, i. 440.
- <sup>47</sup> Thorpe, i. 443. <sup>48</sup> Bowes, pp. 404-406; Thorpe, i. 446.
- <sup>49</sup> Thorpe, i. 445. <sup>50</sup> Bowes, pp. 425-431.
- <sup>51</sup> Calderwood, iii. 716. <sup>52</sup> M'Crie's Melville, i. 284-291.
- <sup>53</sup> Calderwood, iii. 718.
- <sup>54</sup> Teulet, iii. 352-355; Spanish State Papers, iii. 487, 488.
- <sup>55</sup> See a letter from St Andrews to Mainville, July 13, Spanish State Papers, iii. 488-491.
- <sup>56</sup> Teulet, iii. 355-361.
- <sup>57</sup> Teulet, iii. 362-365; Spanish State Papers, iii. 502, 503.
- <sup>58</sup> Calderwood, iii. 722, 723. <sup>59</sup> Thorpe, i. 458, 459.
- <sup>60</sup> Spottiswoode, ii. 303. <sup>61</sup> Calderwood, iii. 731-747.
- <sup>62</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., iii. 330, 331.
- <sup>63</sup> Bowes to Walsingham; Thorpe, i. 464.
- <sup>64</sup> Thorpe, i. 464. <sup>65</sup> Thorpe, i. 465.
- <sup>66</sup> Thorpe, i. 466. <sup>67</sup> Spanish State Papers, iii. 518, 519.
- <sup>68</sup> Caligula, C viii. fol. 29. The references for the plot and its failure are in the documents calendared by Thorpe, i. 466-470. The Bannatyne Miscellany, i. 91-107; Spottiswoode, ii. 309-314. Papers relating to William, Earl of Gowrie.
- <sup>69</sup> Bain, ii. 350; Nau, p. 59.
- <sup>70</sup> There is a disquisition on the point in M'Crie's 'Andrew Melville,' i. 286-310 (1819).
- <sup>71</sup> Calderwood, iv. 44. <sup>72</sup> Calderwood, iv. 37.
- <sup>73</sup> Calderwood, iv. 49-62. <sup>74</sup> Teulet, ii. 659.
- <sup>75</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., iii. 290 et seq. <sup>76</sup> Calderwood, iv. 73.
- <sup>77</sup> Spottiswoode, ii. 314, 315; Calderwood, iv. 62-64; Act. Parl. Scot., iii. 296.
- <sup>78</sup> Calderwood, iv. 87. <sup>79</sup> Calderwood, iv. 99.
- <sup>80</sup> Calderwood, iv. 126-141. <sup>81</sup> Calderwood, iv. 199.

CHAPTER XII.

THE END OF MARY STUART. THE TRUTH ABOUT THE MASTER OF GRAY.

1584-1587.

THE result of the execution of Gowrie; of the exile of Angus, Mar, and the Master of Glamis; of the flight to England of the more extreme of the preachers, and of the restoration of royal authority with that of Episcopacy, was to leave James in his favourite position of "free king" (May 1584). The freedom, however, was merely subjection to his favourite Minister, Arran, with his avaricious wife, who ran a career of rapine unlikely long to endure. James, having attained what he wanted in the way of religion—namely, control over the Kirk—was no longer tempted to dally with Guise and the Pope, who could only do great things for him at the price of his change of creed. There was probably no moment when James really contemplated return to the ancient faith, and he had a dread of foreign aid, as dangerous to his own independence. He knew his subjects too well, and was too proud of the via media discovered by his own theological acumen, to adopt Catholicism. At the same moment the Catholic Powers, from Philip of Spain to Guise, slackened in their eagerness to assist him, and the discovery of Throckmorton's plot to kill Elizabeth, with his execution later, depressed the English Catholics, on whom James began to see that he could not depend as the means of securing for him the English succession. All these considerations inclined him to break off the long-contemplated association with his mother, to leave her to her fate, and to rely on Elizabeth. This part of James's reign, the space of about a year and a half in which Arran held power, was of very evil omen. It was really a kind of reign of terror. Ministers were persecuted merely because they prayed for their exiled brethren. Hume of Argathy and his brother were executed for communicating with one of the exiles on a matter of private business.<sup>1</sup> Rewards were offered to informers, and Douglas of Mains and Stewart of Drumquassel were later executed (1585) on a charge of conspiracy, which was believed to be derived from an informer in collusion with the Government, while Edmonstone of Duntreath was to confess, falsely, to being concerned in the plot, and was to be pardoned. Though many of these misdeeds may have been due to Arran's initiative, the king was no longer a child. His persecution of the preachers took forms which he was to renew, deliberately, in his maturity. Already he was playing the tyrant as opportunity served, and unendurable as spiritual tyranny is, it was matched in odiousness, or excelled by the conduct of the king.

While he waged a war of pamphlets and letters with the banished preachers, especially with James Melville, who was with the exiled lords at Newcastle, he was turning towards a league, or an exchange of good services, with England. The Spanish diplomatists believed that James was still running their course, and Philip sent him 6000 ducats.<sup>2</sup> What James and Arran desired above everything was the extradition of Angus, Mar, and the rest, or at least their expulsion from England. While they dwelt on the frontier, and paraded Berwick in armed companies, now encouraged, now depressed by the caprices of Elizabeth, neither Arran nor James had an hour of security. The English Ambassador to Holyrood, Davison, was intriguing and conspiring with these busy exiles. He was especially fomenting a plot to seize Edinburgh Castle, then under the command of Alexander Erskine, of the Mar family. This appears from Davison's letters to Walsingham of July 4, July 14, and other despatches.<sup>3</sup> But while Walsingham was backing Davison in this treachery, and inclined to release Mary (who was expected to plead for the exiled lords), Cecil was running a "bye-course." His idea was to send Lord Hunsdon on a private mission to meet Arran at Faulden Kirk, on the Border. The two might arrange a modus vivendi with James, which would leave Mary deserted. Hunsdon had an interest of his own, a marriage between James and a lady of his family. Arran hoped to gain from Elizabeth the expulsion or extradition of the exiled lords, and security against the sermons of the exiled preachers. In return he could offer the abandonment of Mary by her son, and a complete revelation of the Catholic conspiracies against Elizabeth. These would be betrayed by the Master of Gray, a young man of great beauty, a favourite of James, a Catholic, and lately a trusted agent of Mary's at Paris. In the March of 1584 the Master had sheltered in his house at Edinburgh Father Holt, the captured Jesuit whom James had favoured, conversed with, and secretly released.<sup>4</sup> At that time the Master had recently returned from Paris, where he dealt with the Duc de Guise in Mary's and James's interests. From Paris he had earlier conveyed "great store of chalices, copes, and other things belonging to the mass, to spread abroad in Scotland."<sup>5</sup> But the events which left James a free king, and the delays of Philip and Guise, had turned the Master into a new course. He would betray Mary, ally himself with Arran, and, when his hour came, would betray Arran in turn and attain power.

While Cecil and Hunsdon were thus working behind the backs of Walsingham and Davison, while Davison was conspiring against the king to whom he was accredited, while Arran was designing to abandon Mary, and Gray was preparing to betray both of them, an agent of Mary's was in Scotland, Fontaine, or Fontenay, the brother of her French secretary, Claude Nau. His mission was to speed the execution of Mary's old enemy, Lord Lindsay, then a prisoner, and to complete the "association" between mother and son.<sup>6</sup>

Fontaine at Holyrood was in an unenviable position. He and his brother Claude Nau, Mary's secretary, were disliked and distrusted by the Duc de Guise, and by Mary's ambassador in France, Archbishop Beaton. They were no less detested by the Master of Gray. This astute young man had obviously discovered the vanity of the Catholic plottings in which he had been initiated. They were mere cobwebs spun by priests to whom the foreign statesmen never seriously trusted. Cecil had spies everywhere, and on the rack the captured intriguers told all they knew, and more. Gray found Arran and the king turning to Elizabeth: he turned with them. James, to be sure, accepted a sword sent by Mary and declared himself her knight. The axe, she hoped, would soon be red with the blood of her old enemy, the Lindsay of Carberry Hill, of Lochleven, one of the envoys who exposed the casket letters. But James's words were only part of his genial dissimulation: he was never so affectionate as when he was treacherous; he never betrayed but with a kiss. Moreover, Gray had taught him distrust of Archbishop Beaton, and of the Jesuits. The Master told Fontaine that Father Holt, his confessor, had refused him absolution unless he revealed all that he knew of Mary's affairs, and that ever since he had "hated Jesuits like the devil." The dislike was mutual. There was a Father Edmund Hay (he who with others advised Mary to exterminate Murray, Lethington, Argyll, and others, just before Darnley's murder), and about Father Edmund, Gray later wrote thus to Archibald Douglas: "Of late, being in Stirling with his majesty, a gentleman, to you well enough known, brought to me a man who confessed that Mr Edmund Hay, the Jesuit, had dealt with him to take my life. I offered him 20 angels to get trial of it, and after I had gotten trial, 500 marks. He received the angels, and brought me a letter, whereof receive copy." Three schemes had been laid to shoot Gray. We hear no more of what was probably a mere plan by the informant to get the angels.<sup>7</sup>

Meanwhile Gray, said Fontaine, had been bought by England: Fontaine saw the gold, angels and rose nobles to the value of 5000 crowns. To Nau, Fontaine was even more explicit than to Mary. James was very clever, he said, but immeasurably conceited, timid, rustic and mannerless in dress, bearing, and in the society of ladies. Bodily he was weak, but not unhealthy. Hunting and favourites were his delight; in business he was indolent, though capable of bursts of energy. "Like a horse with a turn of speed, but no staying power," is a modern rendering of James's own description of himself. He could never be still in one place, but wandered vaguely up and down the room—the James of 'The Fortunes of Nigel.'<sup>8</sup>

The treachery of James towards his mother might answer Macnamara's question to Prince Charles (1753), "What has your House done, sir, that Heaven should pursue them with a curse?" The callous dissimulation and perfidy of James may furnish the reply. He was now eighteen: his whole life had been passed under terrorism; he had again and again been captured, his existence threatened; menaces against him had rained from the pulpits. He could trust nobody: the ambassadors of his cousin and god-mother, Elizabeth, had been, and still were, his dangerous foes. Even Mary he could not confide in: his natural selfishness was whetted by the prize of the English succession: his high notions of prerogative were inflamed by his own condition of slavery. From infancy he had resorted to dissimulation, the weapon of the weak. Hunsdon, later, wrote, as to James and Arran, that they might be trusted "yf they be nott worse than dyvelis."

James, under his wretched circumstances and training, had become what he was. An orphan, for all that he knew orphaned by his mother's hand; a king, who wept when alone with a kind of gamekeeper, because, for all that he knew, he was the son of an Italian fiddler; no prince was ever so unhappily born, bred, and trained.<sup>9</sup> Thus it may be that, on occasion, James was "worse than devils," in Hunsdon's words. But while Arran and Gray were about betraying Mary to Elizabeth, Davison, dining with James, observed "the poor young prince, who is so distracted and wearied with their importunities, as it pitied me to see it, and, if I be not abused, groweth full of their fashions and behaviours, which he will sometimes discourse of in broad language, as he that is not ignorant how they use him."<sup>10</sup>

From June onwards the double intrigue (of Davison and the partisans of the exiles to seize the castle; of Cecil, Arran, Gray, and Hunsdon to sell Mary) went forwards, enlivened by a noisy scene of insults between Arran and Craig, a recalcitrant preacher. James had issued a letter against the fugitive divines which he would have their brethren to subscribe. Craig at this time refused (July 4).<sup>11</sup> Towards the end of the year he and most of the ministers took this test, with a qualification. On July 12 one of the recalcitrants, Howeson, was examined before James at Falkland. He had preached on the favourite text, "Whether it be right in the sight of God to obey you rather than God, judge ye." The suppressed premise on all these occasions was that the preachers were the only judges of what God commanded, and somehow His commandments were almost always opposed to those of the State. "In case they preach treason in the pulpit," they said, "the king, the Assembly, and they to be judge what they preach, and whether it be treason or not." The preachers were to have the casting vote as to the treasonable nature of their own sermons.<sup>12</sup> In James, and in such men as he was likely to have for counsellors, the State was poorly represented. But no human community could endure to be governed by sermons, and the strife was not decided till after more than a century of broils and bloodshed.

While these unseemly religious skirmishes were going on, James (July 10) appointed Arran to treat with Hunsdon, to the disgust of Walsingham, who was deep in the plot for holding the castle against the king.<sup>13</sup> The news of the murder of the Prince of Orange, which reached Edinburgh at this time, is said not to have been ungrateful to James, but it naturally increased the alarm of Protestants everywhere. The castle plot was presently detected, just as Arran was about to ride to meet Hunsdon. Arran from Falkland (August 5) announced apparently another, and probably false, plot to Hunsdon in the language of contemporary piety: we give the substance of the epistle below.*<sup>14</sup> Calderwood, the Protestant historian, tells us that Arran "made a fashion of apprehending" Drummond of Blair, who confessed to this conspiracy. But the castle scheme, judging from the letters of Davison and Walsingham, was genuine.<sup>15</sup> The exiled lords denied their complicity. Alexander Erskine was removed from the command of the castle, which was put into Arran's hands, while Erskine (whom Elizabeth was about to supply with money) fled into England.<sup>16</sup> On August 14 Hunsdon reported his meeting with Arran at Faulden Kirk.<sup>17</sup> Arran was accompanied by nearly 5000 horse, but the English and Scottish soldiers were arrayed at a distance of two miles from each other, some forty gentlemen of each side attending the chief negotiators. Arran's vows of goodwill were such as Hunsdon thought could be trusted, "unless he be worse than a divell." The more important parts of Hunsdon's commission dealt with James's harbouring of Jesuits, such as Father Holt; his intended "association" with Mary, and his intrigues with the Pope, France, and Spain. As to Jesuits, Arran replied that Elizabeth entertained James's rebels. There was no truth, he said, in the story of the association with Mary. James had never sent any message to the Pope, or dealt with Spain or France. This was a deliberate lie, as James's extant letters to these Powers demonstrate. Arran promised to betray Catholic dealings with James to the prejudice of Elizabeth. Hunsdon then asked that the exiled lords might not be forfeited by the approaching Parliament. Arran had an easy task in proving the treason of these exiles, and the aid lent to them by Bowes, Elizabeth's ambassador. Only a fortnight ago their latest conspiracy had been revealed. Hunsdon remarks that, but for the share of Erskine in the castle plot, he might have procured the pardon of Mar, but that James was irreconcilable to Angus and the Douglasses, who held him in deadly feud for the sake of the Regent Morton.

*<sup>14</sup> "MY VERIE GOOD LORD,— . . . But the same daie and in the verie artickell of tyme of this my form<sup>r</sup> conclusion, God Almightye, the god onlie of all truth moved the hart of a wicked conspirato<sup>r</sup> to utter a plat of Treason concluded betwixt them his Mat<sup>e</sup> Reabells, and some their faverours amongst us wth all their conclusions of their divelishe execution against his moste innocent Matie, and other worthie nobellmen of his Councell, uppon the wch sens that same tyme I have bene contyneuallie occupied in examynations and triall taking and in apprhending some knowne giltie. In eande (all praise to God) so farr have I pffited that their same psons have confessed the whole purpose, and subscribed their deposicions themselves, as I hope by Gods Grace to lett yo<sup>r</sup> L. see shortlie face to face. . . .—Yo<sup>r</sup> L. moste loving &c. ARRANE."—State Papers, MS. Scot., Eliz., vol. xxxvi. No. 12, i.

James, indeed, as regards the Douglasses, was situated much as James V. had been when Henry VIII. harboured an earlier Angus and Sir George Douglas. The Douglasses had done their best to slay him when a babe unborn; Douglasses had taken part in his father's murder; Morton had been his mother's bitter foe, and had dominated himself, and to this brood of rebels the arms of England were always open. The present Angus was a Puritan devotee, and allied with James's enemies, the preachers. "A harde matter to doe any thinge for them,"—the Douglasses,—Hunsdon confesses. After nearly five hours of talk, Arran presented to Hunsdon the Master of Gray, for whom James asked a safe-conduct to Elizabeth. But three weeks earlier James had promised his mother to send one of his gentlemen to demand her release,<sup>18</sup> and now he was despatching the young and beautiful Gray for her undoing. Arran then professed that James (or he himself, the sentence is obscure) "never saw Jesuit in his life, and did assure me that if there were any in Scotland, they should not do so much harm in Scotland as their ministers will do in England, if they preach such doctrine as they did in Scotland." Elizabeth, who had her own Puritans, "a sect of perilous consequence" to deal with, presently silenced the exiled Scottish preachers.

On the same day (August 14) Hunsdon also wrote to Burleigh insisting on Arran's good faith, and practical kingship of Scotland, a point not to be forgotten in judging the unhappy James. "They do not stick to say that the king beareth the name, but he [Arran] beareth the sway." "He seems to be very well learned. . . . Latin is rife with him and sometimes Greek." "Avec du Grec on ne peut gâter rien!" Hunsdon complained that the pious exiles vapoured about Berwick with pistols, and were continually crossing into Scotland. They ought to be removed inland, a thing which Elizabeth did not grant till about Christmas. Hunsdon was explicit about Gray, he was to "discover the practices" against Elizabeth. "He is very young, but wise and secret. . . . He is no doubt very inward with the Scottish queen and all her affairs, both in England and France, yea, and with the Pope."<sup>19</sup> Perhaps because Hunsdon's wishes and ambitions prompted him, he was fairly won over by Arran, while Cecil's nephew, Sir Edward Hoby, wrote letters in the same sense. There was in Arran an air of splendid mastery. Hoby regarded him as practically king de facto. While all the rest of the company wore secret armour, Hoby believed that Arran and the Master of Gray wore none, though Arran did not conceal his knowledge that many of his retinue would gladly cut his throat.<sup>20</sup> He placed his king and himself at the feet of Cecil, Mary's most persistent enemy.

On Arran's return to Edinburgh he was welcomed by the guns of the castle, a novel honour, and Parliament, which presently met, ran its course. In Edinburgh Davison, chagrined by Arran's success, describes to Walsingham the forfeitures which fed the avarice of the favourite's wife. The brutal treatment of Lady Gowrie by Arran is especially insisted upon. He pushed her down in the street when she wished to present a petition (August 24). Her genealogy has been doubted, but she was a Stewart of the line of Methven, third husband of Margaret Tudor, and a woman of high ambitions. This August Parliament was busy with confirming the forfeitures of the exiles, and of the heirs of Gowrie. An Act was passed by which all "beneficed persons," preachers and teachers, were compelled to sign approval of the ordinances of the Parliament in May, with promise of submission to bishops. The penalty for refusal was loss of benefice.<sup>21</sup> Many preachers presently did subscribe, with a qualifying clause.

Meanwhile from Berwick Hunsdon reported to Cecil the usefulness of the Master of Gray, who knows, and will reveal, all the plans of Mary. "The king here, nor the Earl of Arran, know nothing of those practices but by him, and so the Earl swore to me" (August 29).<sup>22</sup>

From Edinburgh James went to Falkland. Hither, if we are to believe a Border ruffian, Jock Grahame of Peartree, that rogue was brought, and was bribed by James himself to shoot Angus. But Jock, though he cherished a feud with Angus, had none with Mar. His conscience was easy as to slaying Angus; Mar he would not meddle with. The bribe was never paid, and there was no shooting, while the whole anecdote rests only on Jock's deposition, taken by Lord Scrope (November 25). The deposition was recorded by Calderwood, and, given Jock's character, is hardly good evidence.<sup>23</sup> That he made the statement, however, is certain.

Meanwhile the embassy of the Master of Gray was delayed, and Elizabeth was doubtful of him, while as to Arran's mendacity regarding James and the Jesuits she was in no doubt. The capture of Father Creighton at sea, and the discovery of his papers about the old Guise plot, increased her suspicions. She thought of allowing the exiled lords to reside at Holy Island, within a short hour's ride of the Border, and on October 6 she informed them that she was mediating for them with James. But by October 19 Gray received his credentials. Davison had informed Walsingham that James "disliked the change"—that is, the betrayal of his mother. His scruples may have delayed the mission of the traitor, which, as regards Mary, Arran may have arranged unknown to the king.<sup>24</sup>

But Mary, in a letter to Gray of October 1, denounced Gray's pretence, made to her, that he was to announce to Elizabeth a merely apparent discord between herself and her son. She said that Elizabeth's sole policy was to feed James and herself with false hopes, so as to withdraw them from their Catholic allies. And, indeed, this was Elizabeth's purpose. Mary had often taken the bait. If she and Elizabeth appeared to be approaching an agreement, Mary was at once dropped by the Catholic princes, and then there was no reason why Elizabeth should allow the treaty to go farther. When Mary, consequently, turned to France, Spain, or the Pope, then the measures in which she became involved were necessarily acts of hostility to Elizabeth; so the unhappy captive queen was more severely treated, and, at last, was executed. There was no escape from the weary round, of which the end was approaching. As late as September 7 Mary had been expecting much from a visit of Sadleir, who had seen her naked in her cradle. She was now (after August 25) at Wingfield; Shrewsbury no longer had her in charge, after certain false and odious tales circulated by his wife. Mary's secretary, Nau, was to visit the English Ministers, and Elizabeth was professing that Mary must be allowed to return to Scotland. . Mary was expressing gratitude to Archibald Douglas, and hopes of seeing the Master of Gray. But by October 1 she knew that Gray was playing a double game, and she had warnings from Fontaine in Scotland. She told Gray that she was apprised of his betrayal, by rumour, urged him to be loyal, and warned him against Archibald Douglas, of whom she must recently have learned something. Walsingham having bought the secretary of the French Ambassador, who deciphered this letter for the Master of Gray, knew all that Mary had said of Archibald and of Elizabeth. Gray presently wrote to Mary a letter of the most dastardly insolence, and it was clear, though Elizabeth hesitated till near Christmas-time, that Mary was lost.<sup>25</sup> Elizabeth continued to hesitate and Mary to hope. An Italian Jesuit, Martelli, warned her that she "had too many irons in the fire." She is accused of having written to a supporter in Spain, saying that she had no expectations from her treaty with Elizabeth, and that the Pope and Spain should speed on an invasion of England.<sup>26</sup> Dangerous work; but, unless the Catholic Powers were active on her side, she well knew that Elizabeth would only play with her like a cat with a mouse.

In October-November the English association was formed for the protection of Elizabeth, and the slaying of any person by whom, or for whom, an attack was made on her life. This shaft was aimed at Mary, guilty or innocent. Gray's negotiations dragged on; Mauvissière, the French Ambassador, said that James was abandoning his mother.<sup>27</sup> Nau came from Wingfield to London to speed the treaty for Mary's liberation. Mary was ready to consent to any conditions. She bade the Guises abandon the expedition which they never meant to make. But the Pope, of course, by the old seesaw, now reproached Mary for a treaty with a heretic. The natural results followed. No longer in fear of the Catholic Powers, Elizabeth extracted from Gray such secrets as he had to sell; in return she removed the exiled Scottish lords to the south, and sent Mary to the dismal and pestilent prison of Tutbury. Here she was so guarded that she could not conspire: Paulet, her gaoler, saw to that. Gray seems to have carried his point and sold his queen about December 22,<sup>28</sup> and Fontaine, as an enemy of the successful Master, was banished from Scotland. By January 24 the Master was back at Holyrood, and could report that James's association with his mother was cancelled. A scoundrel always has an excuse; Gray's was that Mary had behaved ill to himself, in listening to Fontaine and Nau.<sup>29</sup> While in England Gray had laid the foundations of a plot for the ruin of Arran, of whom he was jealous, and it may be suggested that this plot, rather than any revelations as to Mary which he could make, was the basis of his success. Gray's beauty and charm won for him, while in England, the friendship of Sir Philip Sidney, which Gray, who was human, though a Scottish politician of the period, returned with sincere affection.

Elizabeth knew that Arran was not to be trusted, and wished him out of the way. In April 1585, after the Holy League of Guise to exclude Henry of Navarre from the French throne took shape, Sir Edward Wotton received his instructions as ambassador to James, with vague promises of a pension, and actual gifts of horses and hounds. Wotton's business was to secure, against the Holy League, a league between England and Scotland; but, as usual, the chief affair of Elizabeth's ambassador was to dabble in plots against James and his chief advisers. He found Gray, Morton (Maxwell), and others bent on violence against Arran, but he gave to Gray a letter from Elizabeth in which she discountenanced such measures. It would be wiser merely to drive Arran from Court. James approved of a league with Elizabeth, and the terms were reduced to writing. Meanwhile Mary, in the wretched captivity of Tutbury, had been inclined to threaten James with her maternal curse. She hoped to see and work on his Justice-Clerk, Bellenden, who was on a mission to London. Mary attributed James's filial impiety to the influence of Gray, but it was on James that she would invoke the Erinnyes of a mother's malison. Her rights she would bequeath to her son's worst enemy, and she repeated her suspicions of Archibald Douglas.<sup>30</sup> While Mary's despair deepened, and was apt to drive her into perilous courses, at Edinburgh the English Ambassador was dealing with his allies, the conspirators against Arran.

Bellenden proposed a useful assassin, and that person, a Douglas naturally, had an interview with Elizabeth's envoy. On the whole, Wotton discouraged the Scottish love of dirk or gun; but his affair of the league between James and Elizabeth was prospering, when on July 29 he had to announce the slaying of Sir Francis Russell and the capture of Sir John Forster in a Border brawl. The slaughter was, possibly, in revenge for a recent English foray, but it was perpetrated on a day of truce. Mendoza heard that the affair rose out of an Englishman's refusing to pay for a pair of spurs bought from a pedlar. A Scot remonstrated, the Englishman struck him, a brawl began, and Russell, coming out to quiet it, was slain. So Mendoza wrote from Paris.<sup>31</sup> The king wept at the ill news, and the chance was seized to throw suspicion on Arran as instigator of the deed. Arran was therefore warded in St Andrews Castle, but later consigned to his own house. Wotton advised Elizabeth to take great offence at Russell's death (which seems to have been caused in chance mellay), and to make it a handle against Arran.<sup>32</sup> The occurrence of a plague in the chief towns raised "the common clamour of the people against the earl and his lady," says Calderwood, while the wet weather was also laid to his guilt, atmospheric effects having political causes. Arran, however, bribed the Master of Gray to procure his release from St Andrews Castle; or perhaps Arran extorted this favour by using his knowledge of the Master's conspiracy against his own life. This appears more probable (though Wotton speaks of bribery), as the Master (August 14) wrote to consult Archibald Douglas on his new dilemma. Elizabeth he had offended by releasing Arran: Arran had him in the hollow of his hand; so Gray saw his only hope in the return of the very exiles whose removal from the Borders he had himself accomplished. Gray had cut himself off from Mary, from the Catholic Powers, from England, though he was "very penitent," and from Arran. The exiles were his only resource.<sup>33</sup>

On August 25 Wotton, being on a hunting expedition with James, wrote to Walsingham.<sup>34</sup> Gray had just told him that it was vain to hope to alter James's affection for Arran (though he was at the moment removed from Court), and that while James was in this mind the exiles could not be restored by fair means. The league with England would be frustrated, Gray would be in peril, and Arran might carry the king into France. Elizabeth, therefore, should make a grievance of Russell's death, decline to negotiate for the league, and "let slip" the exiles, provided with money; Gray would communicate with them through "a special friend of his" in England (Archibald Douglas probably). Wotton added that Morton (Maxwell), then at feud with Arran, was thought to be in alliance with that earl, who supplied him with gold sent from France; possibly Morton would seize James and take him to that country. Wotton ends, "If this plot" (Gray's) "take place I hope I am not such an abject but I shall be revoked before." He made no other demur, though James was negotiating a league with England, and though the conspirators intended to seize the king (September 1, Wotton to Walsingham). The adventurers included Morton (who was in disgrace because of a Maxwell and Johnstone feud), Mar, Angus, and the Hamiltons. But Arran had reverted to the French faction, he encouraged Holt and Dury, the Jesuits, and received money through Robert Bruce (not the celebrated preacher of that name), who was apt to play the part of a double spy.

Early in September the news of the enterprise of the exiles was rumoured abroad, reaching Arran and James, who wrote to Hunsdon. Arran being on the alert, and still, though not at Court, in secret favour with James, Wotton knew that his own life, after all his treacheries, was hardly worth a week's purchase. In his letters he proves himself far from courageous, and incessantly asks to be recalled, as the Scots "have no sense of honour."

These people have honour eternally in their mouths, even when an ambassador is doing his best to let loose on a king his worst enemies, and the exiled ministers, for these devoted men were praying, and preaching, and conspiring with the best. By September 18 Gray announces a probable pardon for Archibald Douglas: "the old fox" was likely to be a valuable tool. By September 22 Arran was mustering his forces to support the king. James meant to proceed in arms against Morton, and this was a fair pretext for a large levy of men. Elizabeth made an excuse out of the affair of the death of Russell for recalling Wotton, who, to his extreme relief, was safe in Berwick on October 15.

Only by hard spurring did he escape the hands of James; for the king had learned of the arrival of the exiles on the Border, where they were met by an army of friends. The Douglasses marched north by Peebles, the Hamiltons joined hands with the Maxwells, under Morton, at Dumfries, and they all trysted to meet at Falkirk, 8000 men strong, on the last day of October. Meanwhile Gray was raising men in Fifeshire, nominally to march with James against Morton, really to surprise Perth. That all these movements of men should have been accomplished so secretly as to find James utterly unprepared, seems surprising to modern readers, familiar with the rapid conveyance of news. But we may reflect that England was now favourable to the exiles; that mounted couriers could easily be stopped on the way as they rode north with tidings; that the Border was populated by enemies of Arran; that the godly everywhere were partisans of Angus; that the Maxwells controlled the western Marches; that James, impatient of business, was given up to sport,—“scarcely for hunting do we either eat or sleep,” wrote the Master of Gray; and, above all, that Arran was “discouraged,” was at Kinneil, and could not defend his master.

No sooner did Arran hear of Wotton’s flight and of the exiles crossing the Border than he rushed to Court, at Stirling, denounced Gray, and bade James command that traitor to his presence. Gray was summoned, and with equal courage and astuteness obeyed the call, and by his grace and craft persuaded James of his innocence. Arran determined to slay him in the royal presence; but news arrived that the exiles were within a mile of Stirling. Arran himself, with Montrose, kept watch on the town walls through the night of November 1. But next day he galloped off with one follower over the bridge of Forth, while the courtiers retired into Stirling Castle. The exiles raised their banners against it, James sent the Master of Gray to parley with them; they offered security to their king, but would give no promises as to Arran. The castle was not victualled for a siege; James surrendered; Montrose, Crawford, Rothes, Colonel Stewart, and others were taken, and Arran was proclaimed a traitor. Henceforth he skulked and intrigued till Douglas of Parkhead, many years later, avenged Morton by spearing his denouncer at Catslack; still later, Douglas was himself slain by a Stewart at the cross of Edinburgh. The strong places were handed over to the Hamiltons, Humes, Douglasses, and Mar, while the Master of Glamis received the command of the Guard.<sup>35</sup>

It was a bloodless revolution. The king and the bishops were once more likely to be laid at the feet of the preachers, as after the Raid of Ruthven. Yet Catholics or crypto-Catholics, like Morton (Maxwell) and the Hamiltons, and a desperado like Bothwell, with such an ideal traitor as the Master, were unseemly instruments in the restoration of our Zion. With his engrained dissimulation James affected to rejoice in the changes, and uttered a boastful Protestant speech in a Parliament held at Linlithgow. There was to be a league with England, a league of all Christian princes against idolatry. Yet “the king likes hunting better than church,” wrote Knollys, the new English ambassador, to Walsingham.<sup>36</sup> In February 1586 the veteran Randolph succeeded to the English embassy. He did not find that the golden age had returned. The godly had already been sorely disappointed. They had expected that, as usual, the General Assembly would meet before Parliament met, and direct the course of that erring lay meeting by prayers and petitions. They fixed on Dunfermline as the seat of their gathering, but Halket of Pitfirrane, the Provost, would not allow them to enter the town. Some years afterwards he fell by accident, or was cast by spirits, out of the third-floor window of the old House of Pitfirrane,—an obvious judgment on his wickedness in maintaining the law, “the Black Acts” of 1584, so Calderwood reports. The Brethren met in Linlithgow, where James Melville, returned from exile, found them but heavy-hearted. Angus was the only one of the lately banished peers who gave them any kind of support. The others, having attained their carnal desires, were indifferent to the welfare of the Kirk. A pestilence that had been raging ceased miraculously when the godly entered Stirling. Heaven, at least, was favourable.

On December 1 a Parliament was held at Edinburgh, practically to undo the work of the Parliaments of May and August 1584. The forfeitures were revoked, the Gowries were restored to their lands and dignities, the expelled ministers were reinstated in their benefices.<sup>37</sup>

There remained strife between the preachers who had subscribed, like the venerable Craig, the Black Acts of 1584, and those who had refused. Craig even preached against these recusants. Andrew Melville, however, took the opportunity of being “plain with the king.” Some papers of controversy passed, James loving polemics next to hunting. He trusted, he said, that “the whole ministers of Scotland shall amend their manners” as to railing sermons. He quoted some Latin, and a little Greek (December 7, 1585).<sup>38</sup> The preachers, as James Melville said, “threatened, denounced, and cursed” the lords with evangelical ferocity. The lords took it sedately; but James scolded the Rev. Mr Balcanqual from his gallery in St Giles’s. It appears to have been the theory of the preachers that whatever they said from the pulpit was inspired by “the Spirit of God.” Thus (December 21) James wrangled with Mr Gibson, minister of Pencaitland—

King. “What moved you to take that text?”

Minister. “The Spirit of God, sir.”

King. “The Spirit of God!” (repeating thrice over tauntingly).

Minister. “Yes, sir, the Spirit of God, that teacheth all men, chiefly at extraordinary times, putteth that text in their heart that serveth best for the time.”<sup>39</sup>

We shall meet another example of this claim, which placed the preachers on the footing of inspired prophets whose political harangues must be allowed entire licence. They claimed "the liberty of the Word," which meant a freedom of speech and of interference not endurable in a State ruled by the laity. But, on the other hand, Morton (Maxwell) now "set up the mass," for which he was imprisoned, and Claude Hamilton reverted to the French and Marian faction, corresponding with Philip of Spain.

On February 17, 1586, a modus vivendi between the king and the preachers was arranged. The king was to present bishops to the General Assembly, from which the bishop "received his admission." The prelate was to serve the cure of a special kirk, the "flock" having leave to oppose. A presbytery from within his bounds, or diocese, was to oversee his proceedings: he was to be rather a "moderator" than a bishop in the usual sense. For his private conduct he was to be responsible to the Assembly. There were other restrictions, and the Kirk retained the arm of excommunication, or "boycotting," that fatal "rag of Rome." Montgomery, the excommunicated bishop, was to "purge his offence" and be reconciled to the Kirk. A Mr Watson was to apologise in the pulpit for a trenchant historical parallel drawn by him between James and Jeroboam, in which James was represented as rather the worse of the pair,— "an odious comparison." It is to be presumed that on this occasion Mr Watson was not inspired. But in Fife James Melville and his adherents attacked their old enemy, Archbishop Adamson, as a person "envenomed by the dragon." On April 13 the Provincial Assembly of Fife excommunicated the Archbishop, but sent several preachers and a laird to reason with him. After some dispute the Assembly excommunicated the Archbishop, and he in turn excommunicated Andrew and James Melville. Their friends were said to be anxious to hang him: he is accused of acute poltroonery, and as a hare ran from South Street to the castle before him, "the people called it the bishop's witch."<sup>40</sup>

The Kirk, and the charge of witchcraft, proved in the end too heavy for the Archbishop. Dr M'Crie, the sympathetic biographer of Andrew Melville, regards the procedure of the Fife synod as "precipitant and irregular." The General Assembly, not the synod under Adamson's enemies, was the proper place for his arraignment. Though Calderwood denies that there was a conspiracy against Adamson, Dr M'Crie quotes a contemporary diary (April 10) to the effect that he "was stricken by the Master of Lindsay, and Thomas Scott of Abbotshall." In May Adamson made a form of submission to the General Assembly, disclaiming superiority over his synod and right to judge ministers; so he was reinstated. The modus vivendi of February was brought before the Assembly in May, and was somewhat watered down, presbyteries being re-established. James could not yet erect bishops who were bishops indeed, but "the horns of the mitre" and the hated name of bishop were not removed from the fold. Andrew Melville (May 26) was sent north of Tay, to convert any Jesuits he might find in these benighted parts, and to give the town and University of St Andrews a little peace. But James had a master of the hawks who, again, had a friend who was a tenant of Andrew Melville's "New College" (St Mary's Hall), and James, for the consideration of a low rent to the friend of his falconer, restored Andrew Melville to his place.<sup>41</sup> James did nothing without an element of the grotesque.

During this unsettlement in ecclesiastical affairs Randolph was busy at Holyrood (February 26, 1586). His chief aim was to settle the league with England, and to procure the pardon and return of Archibald Douglas. As a traitor to Mary, Archibald was her foe, and his influence with James would be pernicious to the Scottish queen. That unhappy lady had been removed in January from Tutbury to Chartley. At Tutbury Amyas Paulet had excluded her from all news of the world, and, so far, her life was safe, for she could not conspire. At Chartley, however, Walsingham set his trap for her; arranged, with a Catholic spy named Gifford, a means of communication between her and her friends; opened, deciphered, copied, and then forwarded her letters to her abettors. Meanwhile Mary supposed that her faithful agent, Morgan, in the Bastille, had found the way by which she was communicating with Mendoza in Paris.<sup>42</sup> She informed him (May 20) that if James remained heretical, she had made Philip her heir. Walsingham thus acted as an agent provocateur, with the natural results. Mary might have been—she long had been—kept harmless perforce. Now she was committing herself, not only to the Catholic plan of invasion, but probably to Babington's murder plot, all of which was known to Elizabeth and Walsingham.

It is unnecessary to explore the intricacies of Walsingham's conspiracy. The advocates of Mary argue that she was not concerned in, or at least was not convicted of a part in, the assassination plot. The evidence, for lack of certain original papers, may not have been technically complete. Mr Tytler, an impartial author, argues that forged additions were made to Mary's letters, and it may have been so, though the argument is not convincing. Mendoza wrote to Philip, "I am of opinion that the Queen of Scotland must be well acquainted with the whole affair, to judge from the contents of a letter which she has written to me, which letter I do not enclose herewith, as it is not ciphered, but will send it with my next" (September 10). No such letter appears in the Spanish correspondence. Mary herself denied that she was concerned in the murder plot, in a letter to Mendoza (November 23).<sup>43</sup> But if she schemed Elizabeth's death as a means of her own liberation, Mary acted in accordance with the principles of an age when kings, priests, and preachers delighted in the dagger. Elizabeth had been conscious of the plot against Riccio, and against Mary's own existence. Later, Elizabeth urged Amyas Paulet to play against Mary the part now assigned to Ballard and Savage against herself. Mary had pensioned the assassin of her brother, Murray, and now she was maddened by many years of cruel imprisonment and by unnumbered wrongs. Common prudence ought to have kept her aloof from Babington, but it would have been a moral miracle had any ethical considerations given her pause.

Meanwhile Randolph (April 1) secured James's signature to the league with England, and sent at the same time orally by bearer news of a Scottish conspiracy against Elizabeth.<sup>44</sup>

The Scottish conspiracy was connected with Lord Claude Hamilton, Morton (Maxwell), and Huntly, who offered to Guise, through Robert Bruce, to restore Catholicism, and hand over Scottish seaports to Spain.<sup>45</sup> On May 20 Mary wrote of Lord Claude as worthy to be Regent of Scotland, and to be declared heir to the crown if James had no issue, while James was to be seized and handed over to Spain.<sup>46</sup> The letter containing this plan, with Mary's intention to disinherit James in favour of Philip II., was of course detected and deciphered for Walsingham. When James learned the facts, his inclination to the league with England, and to the abandonment of his mother, was naturally increased. But he had already received and conversed with his father's murderer, Archibald Douglas. On May 6, from Randolph's lodgings in Edinburgh, Archibald Douglas wrote a very long letter to Walsingham.<sup>47</sup> He had met James in Gray's rooms on May 3. He presented a letter from Elizabeth in his favour.

James, after reading it, professed himself Archibald's friend, the friend of his father's murderer and his mother's betrayer, and envoy of the queen who was weaving her nets round Mary! The king acquitted Archibald, as to Darnley's murder, of all but that foreknowledge which every politician of the time had possessed, "so perilous to be revealed, in respect of all the actors in that tragedy, that no man without extreme danger could utter any speech thereof, because they did see it, and could not amend it." This was glaring hypocrisy. The confessions of Hepburn of Bowton, Morton, and Binning left no doubt as to the actual guilt of James's new friend. Meanwhile the Secretary and Archibald might arrange his trial (which they did by help of a packed jury, containing Archibald's friend, the famous Logan of Restalrig, and two other Logans; by suppression of evidence, and by the royal countenance). James then sought to find out how he stood with Elizabeth, and went so far as to hint at sending a Scottish contingent to aid her in the Low Countries. There Sir Philip Sidney was engaged, and the Master of Gray, for love of Sidney, had nearly ruined himself in levying a band of soldiers of fortune, whom he intended to lead to Flanders.

James was soon summoned back to his lords, and Archibald Douglas had a conversation with Maitland, the Secretary. He gathered that the league with England was unpopular with the nobles, as was the idea of an expedition under Gray to the Low Countries, involving as it did peril from Spain. The Court was full of jealous confederacies. Randolph, however, carried his point as to the league. After considerable delay it was confirmed at Berwick (July 5). The contracting parties were to maintain the Reformed religion, which was bearing such remarkable fruits of virtue: neither was to aid a foreign Power in any attack upon the other: each was to assist the other with armed forces, in case either was invaded. Rebels were to be delivered up or expelled. James received little satisfaction as to the succession, and his pension (£4000) could scarcely be extorted from the harpy-like clutches of Elizabeth.

As far as promises and parchment could go, Elizabeth was now secure against a Catholic invading force landed in Scotland, and James was utterly wrested from his mother's cause. July was employed in allowing Mary to involve herself, in appearance at least, with Babington and the murder plot; and on August 3 she was taken when on a hunting ride and carried to Tixall. Her papers and her secretaries, Nau and Curle, were seized; Nau and Curle were cajoled into confessions. As early as July 22 Elizabeth had found the Master of Gray's stay in Scotland "necessary for her service," in consequence of reports now rife as to the enterprise by Lord Claude Hamilton, Morton, and Huntly. Gray and Archibald were to act as detectives for the English queen. It may be hoped that Gray, who had intended to join Sidney in the Low Countries and had spent freely in raising men, desired to escape from the necessity of more and meaner treasons towards Mary. By September 8 Gray reported to Archibald Douglas, now James's ambassador to England, the delight of the king at the discovery of his mother's conspiracy. "But his opinion is that it cannot stand with his honour that he be a consenter to take his mother's life, but he is content how strictly she be kept, and all her old knavish servants hanged." Gray added that the needs of all honest men "require that she were out of the way."<sup>48</sup> Walsingham requested Gray not to allow James to interfere. Mary's "trial" at Fotheringay had been arranged for, and was likely to be short. Presents of horses were made to James by advice of Archibald Douglas.

Mary was heard in her defence, without counsel or witnesses, at Fotheringay: at Westminster (October 25) the witnesses were examined without the presence of the accused. On November 22 the sentence of death was communicated to the Queen of Scotland, who received it as became her. But Elizabeth must still play cat and mouse. She had various selfish reasons for hesitation: it was not by any means certain that Mary's death would make her own life more secure; she did not love to set a precedent for laying hands on an anointed queen; possibly she may not have been unvisited by compunction. After making a sacred promise, symbolised by the gift of a ring with a diamond cut in likeness of a rock, she had imprisoned her guest, exposed her shame, devastated her country, turned the natural love between parent and child into hatred, and, finally, she had practically been agent provocateur of the plot for which her guest was to die. Her natural indecision was fostered by all these causes, but her Parliament and her Ministers were resolute.

As regards Scottish history, the only question of interest is, How did the king, and how did the country, behave in the shameful prospect of seeing the royal head touched by a foreign hangman?

The news of the conspiracy in which Mary was implicated had reached James's advisers early, before the conspirators themselves knew that they had been discovered. Mary was writing her fatal letters to Babington (fatal whether they are wholly genuine or not) on July 25 and 27. On August 1 (probably Old Style) the Master of Gray wrote to Archibald Douglas, who had set out to London as James's ambassador. The laird of Fintry (in France a Catholic ally of Gray's) had been with him; "it seemed to me his errand was for to know what conspiracy this was that of late had been discovered in England. I pretended I knew nothing of it as yet. He was very inquisitive, so I let him see that I thought his mistress" (Mary) "should be touched. He said that was an Allemanique quarrel" (querelle d'Allemagne) "to be quit of her."<sup>49</sup> By September 8 James was fully informed, and was congratulating Elizabeth, as we saw. His idea was (and probably remained) that his mother should be kept in such close confinement that further action on her part would be impossible. This had already been the case at Tutbury, and this course James recommended to Archibald Douglas (September 10). In an accompanying letter in "white ink" the Master told Douglas that though James desired his mother to live, "I pray you beware in that matter, for she were well out of the way." He suggested that Douglas should get money for him from Elizabeth, as he was much dipped by the expenses for his intended Flemish expedition.<sup>50</sup> On October 1 Gray informs Douglas that "the king is very instant for his mother," and intends to send Gray as his envoy to plead for her with Elizabeth. James must therefore have been hoodwinked by the Master, who himself then wished Mary "out of the way." On October 4 de Preau, calling himself Courcelles, and representing France at Holyrood, reports James's attitude. Lord John Hamilton and the faithful George Douglas of the Lochleven adventure had been warning him of his dishonour if Elizabeth "put her hands in Mary's blood." James, in reply, spoke of his mother's injuries to himself. He must consider his own interests, and he did not believe that Elizabeth would touch his mother without warning him. He adhered to his plan of strict confinement.<sup>51</sup>

Bothwell (Francis Stewart, nephew of Queen Mary's Bothwell) bluntly told James that if he allowed Elizabeth to slay Mary he deserved himself to be hanged next day. James "laughed, and said he would provide for that." But his nobles were higher of heart. They left him no peace (October 31) till he decided to send an envoy, William Keith, a young man, and a pensioner of Elizabeth.<sup>52</sup> Gray foresaw that he himself would later be sent, and that the mission would be his "wrack"—as it was (October 25). James wished him at this inopportune juncture to press the question of his own succession, all that he really cared for, and Gray must "crab" (he says) either Elizabeth or his master. He never was in such a strait, and thought of escaping to Flanders, if Douglas could make Elizabeth advise James to that effect. If not, if he is obliged to go to England, "I must be a Scottish man. . . . I protest before God I shall discharge myself so of my duty, if I be employed, that whether it frame well or evil, the king my master shall not justly blame me." Thus good and bad even now warred in the heart of the Master, yet, of all his perils, he most dreaded—sea-sickness on the voyage to the Low Countries! "I will not for ten thousand pounds endure the sea this season." On the whole, among his confusions, it was plain to Gray that if Mary, after all, was to escape, it was best for him that it should be by his means.

It was a real grief to Gray that at this hour his friend Sir Philip Sidney was killed at Zutphen. We find the noble Fulke Greville bewailing his loss to Archibald Douglas. "Divide me not from him" (Sir Philip), "but love his memory and me in it." A strange shrine was the heart of the Douglas traitor for that heroic friendship! On November 6 the Master also laments the peerless knight, whose fall made his scheme of retiring to join Sidney in Flanders impossible. "He and I had that friendship, I must confess the truth, that moved me to desire so much my voyage of the Low Countries." The Master's love for Sidney came near to redeeming him, and perhaps linking his renown with that of Astrophel. The thought of Sidney seems to have inspired the Master, and he appeals to Archibald, as "a good fellow," to work in the interests of the men of the sword who were to have fought with him in Flanders, "that they be well used, and not made slaves of, as they are." "Would to God I could get again bygones!" he exclaims. It is the tragedy of a soul not yet lost.

Meanwhile every noble of heart was engaging in Scotland for Mary's behoof; but this, again, brought the Catholics to the front, which aroused the jealousy of the preachers.<sup>53</sup> Yet all Presbyterians were not so bitter, and Angus, the Abdiel among the nobles, desired to tell James, if he might see him, "that the nobles will not endure that the Queen of England shall put her hands in his mother's blood, who could not be blamed if she had caused the Queen of England's throat to be cut, for detaining her so unjustly prisoner." <sup>54</sup> Angus struck the right note for Mary's defence, not that she was innocent, but that she was blameless. Even James remarked "that his mother's case was the strangest that ever was heard of, the like not to be found in any story of the world," and asked Courcelles "if he had ever read of a sovereign prince that had been detained prisoner so long time, without cause, by king or prince her neighbour, that in the end would put her to death." It had been James's wish to send Bothwell with the Master of Gray: a passport for Bothwell was refused by Elizabeth, Courcelles attributed the refusal to Archibald Douglas and Gray (December 31). <sup>55</sup> Courcelles represented James's attitude as more becoming when he wrote to Henri III. than when he wrote to d'Esnaval. From his letters to d'Esnaval we gather that James held by his idea of solitary confinement.

To Walsingham Gray described his mission as "modest, not menacing." James had sent a stern letter to Elizabeth by Keith, but for this Keith and Archibald Douglas apologised to Cecil: "it hath proceeded by a necessity to which the king is forced by the exclamation of his subjects" (December 6). This apology was offered by Archibald Douglas's advice. <sup>56</sup> He, if not Keith, had been betraying Mary's interests. They were clearly Elizabeth's pensioners, wrote de Vega to Philip from London. <sup>57</sup> Gray also apologised from Stamford on Christmas Day, as he rode south with Robert Melville. For the rest, as to Gray, historians denounce him for the betrayer of Mary to the scaffold, and as the wretch who, while pretending to plead for her, secretly urged Elizabeth to seal her doom. But the friend of Sidney did not sink so low. Gray, it will be made certain, discharged his duty like "a Scottis man." Earlier, before his embassy, he had wished Mary "out of the way." But now he took a nobler course, a course more worthy of his Astrophel, and the common story of his infamy appears to rest on a confusion between his attitude in August 1586 and his conduct during his embassy.

On January 6-16, 1587, Melville, Gray, and Keith had an audience from Elizabeth. Like Napoleon on such occasions, she bullied, saying that if she had such a servant as Robert Melville she would cut his head off. Melville replied that he was ever ready to stake his life rather than advise his master ill, and that James had not one faithful servant who would counsel him to let his mother perish. Three or four days later (January 9-19) the envoys again saw Elizabeth and made proposals. They did not, like Charles II. when Prince of Wales, offer Elizabeth carte blanche for a parent's life. They gave the surety of James and all the lords. If Elizabeth would hand Mary over to them, they promised to make her resign, in favour of James, all pretence to the English crown, with the guarantee of the King of France. Elizabeth said suddenly, "That would be putting two weapons in the hand of my enemy in place of one,"—an obvious reflection.<sup>58</sup> She withdrew the word "enemy," and asked Melville if he could invent any security for her own life, if Mary were spared? Melville's arguments were good, she said, and she promised another audience.

Mr Froude's account of this interview is curious and most misleading. He writes: "Melville spoke at length, but vaguely; and, knowing that James was at heart only anxious for his own interest, Elizabeth suggested maliciously that, if she pardoned his mother, he should renounce his own pretensions in the event of any future conspiracy. If he would do this, the Lords and Commons might perhaps be satisfied and allow her to live. Neither Scotland nor James were [sic] prepared to sacrifice what they had set their hearts on with so much passion. The queen told the ambassadors that their request could not otherwise be granted. They made a formal protest, and withdrew."<sup>59</sup>

This did not happen. Elizabeth dismissed the envoys, after finding Melville's reasoning "good." The next audience was deferred for five or six days, and in this interval a gentleman unnamed was sent to Gray with the proposal which Mr Froude tells us that Elizabeth made to Melville, Gray, and Keith. Gray rejecta fort loing ceste ouverture, asking the gentleman if he was commissioned to make the hypothetical proposal, "which the other excused, as merely put forth by way of talk."<sup>60</sup>

It is thus, at least, that Mr Froude's authority, a "Mémoire" from Châteauneuf the French Ambassador to Elizabeth, describes the circumstances. Melville did not speak "vaguely," Elizabeth did not "maliciously" make this absurd suggestion attributed to her, to Melville, Keith, and Gray. Scotland and James knew nothing of the matter. The notion was mooted, some days later, to Gray alone, by an unnamed gentleman, who professed to speak without authority, merely in a way of talk. In a later interview, according to the French account, Elizabeth announced her determination to put her hands in Mary's blood. The Scots delivered a protest, and said that James would summon the Estates and appeal to all Christian princes. Elizabeth declared that she would send an envoy to James, as she disbelieved his representatives. They averred that James would receive none of her envoys till their own return, and they sent to their king to demand leave to quit England. This they obtained "in five or six days." Elizabeth said that she would despatch her man, and they begged that Mary might live till his return. This grace Elizabeth refused. The Scots reported all to Châteauneuf, and went home. They had been accused of designs against Elizabeth, because one of their suite, Ogilvie of Pourie (later a double-dealer, and spy of Cecil), was found carrying unloaded pistols, as a present from Gray to an English friend.

Such is the French account, and it leaves no stain on the envoys of Scotland. The story that Gray "whispered in Elizabeth's ear, The dead don't bite," is found in Camden and Calderwood, and everywhere, but where is the authority? When had Gray an opportunity of whispering in Elizabeth's ear? Another version is that Gray used the phrase mortui non mordent in a letter to Elizabeth after he left London. Spottiswoode says that when Gray was tried in May 1587 he confessed "that when he perceived her inclining to take away the Queen of Scots' life, he advised her rather to take her away in some private way than to do it by form of justice," and, if this were true, Elizabeth certainly tried to follow the advice. (It is true of Gray before his embassy, but during his embassy he changed his note and was a true Scot.) But Paulet would not be her bravo.<sup>61</sup> Nobody impeaches Melville's loyalty, but he on January 26, 1586, declared to James that Gray "has behaved himself very uprightly and discreetly in this charge, and [is] evil taken with by divers in these parts who were of before his friends."<sup>62</sup> Melville also avers that "letters come from Scotland" represent James as indifferent to his mother's fate. We do not know what party was guilty of these letters.

Now we happen to be able to corroborate Melville's statement as to Gray in an unexpected way. The Master really did his best for Mary during his embassy, and really incurred the enmity of his former friends at Elizabeth's Court. The proof comes in a letter of March 3, 1586, from Edinburgh to Walsingham. The writer signs himself "876 tt." He was, in fact, Logan of Restalrig, so famous after his death for his alleged connection with the Gowrie Conspiracy. We can identify him, because, writing to Walsingham, he asks that letters for the Master of Gray from England may be sent to him, (to "876 tt."); and Gray himself, writing to Archibald Douglas, requests him to send letters, not direct to him, but to Logan of Restalrig. Thus Logan of Restalrig and "876 tt" are one and the same person. The letters are not in his own but in an Italian or "Roman" handwriting. By this means, after his return to Scotland, the Master concealed his correspondence with England.<sup>63</sup> Logan is therefore Gray's intermediary with Walsingham and Archibald Douglas. He also offers, being Gray's cousin and very intimate with him, to betray all his designs to Walsingham, like a good old Scottish gentleman. (Logan's mother was sister of Gray's father, Patrick, Lord Gray.)

The point, however, is that Logan corroborates Robert Melville's account of Gray's behaviour as ambassador. Standing up for Mary, he incurred the deadly hatred of Leicester, previously his friend. Gray himself, says Logan, is "greatly altered of his former goodwill professed to England." He has told the reason of the change to Logan. In autumn 1586, before his embassy, Gray had written to Leicester, "And that in matters of State and great importance which are not necessary to be rehearsed at this present . . . the matter itself was so odious." That is to say, before his embassy Gray had written to Leicester advising the death of Mary: even Restalrig thought this "odious." But, Gray warmly taking Mary's part in London, Leicester sent his earlier and odious letters to James by Sir Alexander Stewart. Leicester "did what in him lay to imperil the Master's life, standing, honour, and reputation for ever," says Logan, and Elizabeth orally gave Sir Alexander Stewart similar directions. Apparently Stewart thought it wiser to hand the letters back to Gray himself: Logan has just read them, and Gray is now hostile to Leicester and Elizabeth. Logan, however, will keep Walsingham advised of any anti-English movements of Gray. Thus Gray's advice that Mary should die is advice given prior to the death of his Astrophel, and to his own sudden (and short-lived) conversion. At his trial (May 15, 1587) Gray confessed that in August 1586, before Sidney's death and long before his own embassy, he had written thus to England: "If the Queen of England could not preserve her own security without taking his majesty's mother's life, because mortui non mordent, yet it were no ways meet that the same were done openly, but rather by some quieter means."<sup>64</sup>

Thus, under criticism, the famous tale of Gray, with his mortui non mordent, dropped like poison into Elizabeth's ear, seems to vanish. The "whispering" during the embassy is replaced by writing before the embassy. We shall see that the offences which caused the fall of Gray had no concern with treachery during his embassy. We have also seen that (though an enemy of Mary), when once he was charged with her cause, to win her life was, in his own opinion, his true interest. This brought him ill-will, as Robert Melville and Logan wrote, among his English friends.

On Gray's return to Edinburgh Courcelles wrote to France (but appears not to have sent the message) that Gray had "behaved very honestly in England," and being now "malcontented for some secret cause with England," offered his service to France. Now Gray, before setting out on his embassy, had threatened that he would be avenged on Elizabeth if he failed. "If that queen do no better in things to the king than I see her minded, by God she will deceive herself. And, for myself, if I find such usage as hitherto I have received, the devil learn her!"<sup>65</sup> As to Mary's life, Gray "would rather win the thanks for it than otherwise." On the whole, then, it seems that Gray did not commit the crowning treason for which his name reeks in tradition. It is one thing to say, at the first news of the Babington conspiracy, that if Mary must die, it had better be "quietly," and quite another thing to use the office of a suppliant ambassador for the destruction of Mary's life. The Gray who was mourning for Sidney did not sink to that extreme of guilt, but quitted himself "like a Scottis man." His fall was the result of intrigues concerned with religion.

Meanwhile the preachers took the opportunity of Mary's approaching end to show their charity. On February 1, 1587, an Act of Council moved the clergy to pray for the unhappy princess, that God would illumine her soul with the light of His only Verity and preserve her body from an apparent peril.<sup>66</sup> The preachers, says Courcelles on February 28, "were so seditious as to refuse." Dr M'Crie, on the other hand (probably not without good grounds; see note 67), says, "None of the ministers refused to pray for the queen." Calderwood writes, "They refused to do it in the manner he would have it be done," as directly or indirectly condemning Elizabeth, or suggesting Mary's innocence. The words in the Act of Council do neither one nor the other. Probably they objected to any request for prayer, for, of course, that was not direct inspiration by "the Spirit of God"; also, it was an act of royal interference. James later, says Spottiswoode, explained that the prayer was only for Mary's "enlightenment in the truth" (which is in John Knox) and pardon. That is precisely the meaning of the Act of Council. However, Mr Cowper was in the pulpit at St Giles's, and James bade him pray for the queen. Spottiswoode reports that Cowper said "he would do as the Spirit of God should direct him." As James very well knew what that always meant, he made Cowper come out, and the bishop (Adamson) went into the pulpit, to the disgust of the brethren (February 3). Cowper was warded in Blackness, but soon released. Spottiswoode avers that the bishop produced a favourable effect on his audience. Gray had written, before his embassy, that he never saw the people so united as in the cause of Mary's deliverance. On the day of Cowper's performance James interdicted Andrew Melville from preaching.<sup>67</sup> On February 8 Archbishop Adamson "compeared" before the kirk-session of St Andrews, with the king's verbal request that the minister would pray for his mother's "conversion and amendment of life, and if it be God's pleasure to preserve her from this personal danger wherein she is now, that she may hereafter be a profitable member in Christ's Kirk,"—that of Scotland.

The kirk-session graciously acceded to his majesty's desire. But Mary was in danger no more. On that very day was consummated one of the few crimes that have not been blunders. The only prison which her enemies could trust to hold the queen had closed on her :

"To-night she doth inherit
The vasty halls of Death."

May God have had more mercy than man on this predestined victim of uncounted treasons, of unnumbered wrongs: wrongs that warped, maddened, and bewildered her noble nature, but never quenched her courage, never deadened her gratitude to a servant, never shook her loyalty to a friend.

"She was a bad woman, disguised in the livery of a martyr, and, if in any sense at all she was suffering for her religion, it was because she had shown herself capable of those detestable crimes which in the sixteenth century appeared to be the proper fruits of it." So Mr Froude, as if the professors of the fire-new gospel of Protestantism disdained the English design to murder Mary and James, or the swords that shed the blood of Beaton, or the daggers that clashed in the brain and breast of Riccio.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER XII.

- <sup>1</sup> Spottiswoode, ii. 321.                      <sup>2</sup> Spanish State Papers, iii. 525-529
- <sup>3</sup> Thorpe's Calendar, i. 478, 482.
- <sup>4</sup> Forbes-Leith, Narratives of Scottish Catholics, p. 192.
- <sup>5</sup> Stafford to Burleigh, October 30, 1583; Hatfield Calendar, iii. 15.
- <sup>6</sup> His letters to Nau and Mary have been published in part by Mr Froude, but are fully printed in the 'Hatfield Calendar,' iii. 47, 117, 206. Probably they were seized later, at Chartley, with the rest of Mary's papers.
- <sup>7</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iii. 172, 173.
- <sup>8</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iii. 47-62.
- <sup>9</sup> Papers of the Master of Gray, p. 16. "It is given out that he is not the king's son, but Davy's, . . . which he told Cuddy Armourer, with water in his eyes, being but they two alone." Armourer was a servant and emissary of Hunsdon.
- <sup>10</sup> Davison to Walsingham, Edinburgh, August 24, 1584; Papers relating to the Master of Gray, pp. 5, 6.
- <sup>11</sup> Davison to Walsingham, July 4; Thorpe's Calendar, i. 477.
- <sup>12</sup> Calderwood, iv. 147.                      <sup>13</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, i. 479.
- <sup>14</sup> See p. 308, footnote.
- <sup>15</sup> Calderwood, iv. 169; Confession of Drummond of Blair.
- <sup>16</sup> Davison to Walsingham, August 8; Thorpe, Calendar, i. 482.
- <sup>17</sup> State Papers, MS. Scot., Eliz., vol. xxxvi. No. 17.
- <sup>18</sup> July 23, James to Mary; Murdin, p. 434.
- <sup>19</sup> State Papers, MS. Scot., Eliz., vol. xxxvi. No. 24.
- <sup>20</sup> State Papers, MS. Scot., Eliz., vol. xxxvi. No. 29.
- <sup>21</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., iii. 347; Calderwood, iv. 197, 198.
- <sup>22</sup> State Papers, MS. Scot., Eliz., vol. xxxvi. Nos. 50 and 91.
- <sup>23</sup> Calderwood, iv. 239, 240.
- <sup>24</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, i. 488, 489; Papers of the Master of Gray, pp. 9, 10—Commission to the Master, October 14, 1584.
- <sup>25</sup> Labanoff, vi. 16-27; Papers of the Master of Gray, pp. 30-37.
- <sup>26</sup> Froude, vi. 39. 1870.                      <sup>27</sup> Teulet, iii. 326, November 25.
- <sup>28</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, i. 490, 491.
- <sup>29</sup> Papers of the Master of Gray, pp. 41-43.
- <sup>30</sup> March 12; Labanoff, vi. 123-127.                      <sup>31</sup> Spanish State Papers, iii. 545.
- <sup>32</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, i. 502.                      <sup>33</sup> Brit. Mus., Caligula, C viii. fol. 222.
- <sup>34</sup> State Papers, MS. Scot., Eliz., vol. xxxviii. No. 33.
- <sup>35</sup> Papers of the Master of Gray, pp. 58-61.                      <sup>36</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, i. 513.

- <sup>37</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., iii. 373-422.      <sup>38</sup> Calderwood, iv. 448-465.
- <sup>39</sup> Calderwood, iv. 485.      <sup>40</sup> Calderwood, iv. 401-503.
- <sup>41</sup> M'Crie, Life of Andrew Melville, pp. 125-130 (1856); i. 362 (1819).
- <sup>42</sup> Spanish State Papers, iii. 581.      <sup>43</sup> Spanish State Papers, iii. 663.
- <sup>44</sup> State Papers, MS. Scot., Eliz., April 1, 2.
- <sup>45</sup> Spanish State Papers, iii. 590.
- <sup>46</sup> Labanoff, vi. 312, 322; Mary to Charles Paget.
- <sup>47</sup> State Papers, MS. Scot., vol. xxxix. No. 66.
- <sup>48</sup> Papers of the Master of Gray, pp. 106, 107.
- <sup>49</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iii. 157.      <sup>50</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iii. 173, 174.
- <sup>51</sup> Courcelles' Negotiations, Bannatyne Club, p. 7.
- <sup>52</sup> Courcelles, p. 11. In 'Hatfield Calendar,' iii. 185, Keith is printed "Heath."
- <sup>53</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iii. 190-193.      <sup>54</sup> Courcelles, p. 13; October 31.
- <sup>55</sup> Courcelles, p. 22.      <sup>56</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, i. 538.
- <sup>57</sup> Spanish State Papers, iii. 676.
- <sup>58</sup> The Master of Gray gives practically the same version, but makes himself the spokesman, and says nothing of Melville (Papers of the Master of Gray, pp. 129, 130).
- <sup>59</sup> Froude, vi. 307 (1870).
- <sup>60</sup> Teulet, Relations Politiques, iv. 166, 167; Mémoire pour les Affaires du Roy. Mr Froude cites "Advis pour M. de Villeroy," which is a different document.
- <sup>61</sup> Spottiswoode, ii. 373.      <sup>62</sup> Papers of the Master of Gray, p. 133.
- <sup>63</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iii. 230; Papers of the Master of Gray, p. 139.
- <sup>64</sup> Privy Council Register, iv. 168.
- <sup>65</sup> Courcelles, pp. 37, 38; Hatfield Calendar, iii. 192.
- <sup>66</sup> Privy Council Register, iv. 140.
- <sup>67</sup> Calderwood, iv. 606, 607; Spottiswoode, ii. 356; M'Crie, 'Life of Andrew Melville,' pp. 131, 132; i. 363-366 (1819). Dr M'Crie quotes Courcelles as saying that "even those who refused at first" (to pray for Mary) "yielded." Courcelles writes, "Some of the ministers agreed to pray, . . . but others there are that stand still fast, . . . but they are fain to yield as well as others." If they did, Dr M'Crie is right.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE KING OF MANY ENEMIES.

1587-1593.

THE news of Mary's death aroused in Scotland a futile storm of indignation. A Catholic informant of Cecil's, Ogilvie of Pourie (already mentioned as a spy and double-dealer), declared that James was "desperate of his mother's life" (probably the news of her death was unconfirmed); that the country was eager to arm; that the Hamiltons offered to burn Newcastle with 5000 men.<sup>1</sup>* Had James been a prince of heart and spirit he would long ere this have summoned his subjects to meet him, "boden in effeir of war"; would have slipped the Hamiltons on Newcastle; Bothwell and Buccleuch, with all Liddell, Esk, and Teviotdale, on Carlisle; would himself have mounted and ridden, while all the blue bonnets were over the border. Through Angus he might have kept the preachers in hand, or might have cast them into Blackness, and thus he might have risked a second Flodden, losing all but honour. Honour, on the other hand, was all that he lost. Calderwood says that he "could not conceal his inward joy," and that Maitland had to put the crowd of courtiers out of the room.<sup>2</sup> Courcelles gives a different account. James told him that he had done all that could be done, and had only received a note from Elizabeth with a promise to send Carey, who was at Berwick. James vowed that, if Mary were dead, he "would not accord with the price of his mother's blood." He denied the story that he had written to Elizabeth, putting Mary's head at her disposal. It is certain, however, that letters from Scotland, and obscure dealings of Alexander Stewart, did enable Elizabeth to harden her heart; so the Master of Gray wrote to the king.<sup>3</sup> The Council turned towards France, where Archbishop Beaton was still to be ambassador for Scotland, to the horror of the preachers, who feared that Henri III. would insist on toleration, if he aided James to avenge Mary. On March 5 James still pretended not to believe in Mary's death, and awaited the return of his messenger to Carey, his old tutor, Mr Peter Young. Meanwhile he assured Courcelles that he wished to desert the English league for the Auld Alliance.

* This young Ogilvie of Pourie was in London with the Master of Gray, in the Embassy. He sold himself to Cecil, as Logan, also a Catholic, to Walsingham. Ogilvie's later intrigues, nominally for the Catholics and James with Rome and Spain, were more or less devices controlled by Cecil.

The envoy to Berwick brought back the certainty of what had befallen, and news that Elizabeth had put her unhappy scapegoat, Davison, in the Tower. She added what Mr Froude calls "an abject and ignominious"—we may say a lying and perjured—letter to James. Nobody was deceived. Archibald Douglas announced that George Douglas was to be sent on a mission to France: Courcelles declares that James now suspected and desired to arrest the Master of Gray, but by April 3 he deemed that James would work for peace. On March 4 Walsingham wrote to Maitland, to be shown to James, a long pacific memoir.<sup>4</sup> French and Spanish aid, he said, was "in the air": it always was. The strength of Scotland was utterly inadequate for the war. James, if he fought, would lose, perhaps his life, certainly all prospect of the English crown. The ambition of Philip, the condition of France under the League, made help from either Power out of the question.

The true nature of the chances of the Scottish Catholics from Spain or France may be gathered from the Spanish State Papers. The English priests, Allen and Parsons, were dependent on Spain, and on Philip, who was determined to advance his own claims to the English crown, James being barred as a hopeless heretic. Meanwhile Robert Bruce, the spy, was intriguing for Claude Hamilton, Huntly, and Morton (Maxwell) both with Guise and with Philip, and the Duke of Parma, commanding the Spanish forces in the Low Countries. Ready to take aid from any quarter, Philip did send 10,000 crowns by Bruce for the Catholic Earls, and Bruce arranged with Parma a feasible plot for bringing over Spanish troops in grain vessels. But it was the belief of Philip, and of most of his advisers, that James would remain a resolute heretic. The Spanish aid to the Scottish Catholics would only be the means towards a Scottish diversion in case of a Spanish invasion of England. Bruce did see James himself, and found him in manner genial, but an obdurate Protestant, under Maitland, "a heretic and an atheist." Overcharged with expenses, Philip did not back the Catholic earls, time was wasted, the plot of the grain ships was delayed till too late in the season, and though Morton (Maxwell) went to Spain, offering to hold Kirkcudbright open for the Armada, though Huntly promised to secure Leith, though an advance on England by way of Scotland was probably the wisest plan, the Scottish Catholics were left, detached, poor, and powerless, while England was the aim of the Armada. Yet for many years, till 1603, the Scottish Catholics continued to traffic with Spain, and to hope for troops and money from Spain, while usually disbelieving that James would be converted. James, says Parma to Philip, "becomes more and more confirmed in his heresy" (1588).<sup>5</sup>

All this futility of Spanish promises Walsingham clearly discerned. He added that James might change his creed: he would but be the more distrusted. The world must acknowledge that James had done all that man might do—revenge was unchristian, true honour was not outraged, success was wholly impossible, if war was attempted.

All this was very true—nay, extremely obvious. But it did not follow that James need continue to take money from hands dipped in his mother's blood. Of money, however, from whatever quarter, James thought non olet. Meanwhile (March 1587) Elizabeth carried out the cruel farce of trying and ruining Davison, her scapegoat; and Cecil, in instructions to Carey, was obliged to sink to Elizabeth's level of meanness (April 3).<sup>6</sup> James had Elizabeth at an avail. If she was innocent, if Davison and others were guilty, then, he said, let them be given up to him. At present her honour was not cleared. Elizabeth was in the same position as Mary had been in the commissions at York and Westminster (1568) as to her guilt of Darnley's death. Like Mary, she finally said that, as a crowned queen, she was answerable only to God. Several drafts of her shifting replies exist; at last she screwed up her courage to be firm. Clearly she did not share Walsingham's assurance that James was powerless, and that France and Spain would not move. Yet nothing could be more manifest.

In Scotland matters were in suspense till the assembling of the Estates. Arran had been trying to fish in the troubled waters, accusing, in a letter to Claude Hamilton, several of James's Council of accession to Mary's death, and of a design to hand him over to England. Among the accused we only know the name of Angus, who was arrested: he, at least, cannot have been of those who conspired against Mary's life. Orders were issued that Arran should be brought forward to justify his accusations.<sup>7</sup> The matter troubled James, who, in fact, was vainly trying to get Elizabeth to bribe him by the Lennox estates in England.<sup>8</sup> On May 10 Sir William Stewart, Arran's brother, accused the Master of Gray of his betrayal of Mary (concerning which we have already spoken) and of divers other offences. He had, it was alleged, taken a secret part in the Raid of Stirling (1585), which we know to be true from the Master's own description of that revolution. He had also dealt with France in the interest of "liberty of conscience," a charge the most damning that could be brought against any man in reformed Scotland. He had devised the death of Maitland, and other advisers of James, by aid of Arran and Morton. There were other charges. Gray and his denouncer had probably been in a conspiracy together to oust Maitland, and the lords who returned from exile at the Raid of Stirling, and it is likely that Gray had been dealing with the Hamiltons and the Catholics. He admitted that he had worked for liberty of conscience, and generally to revolutionary ends; while his answer as to the charge of betraying Mary has been already given. The Estates prayed that the king would spare the Master's life and lands. Gray was certainly betrayed by Stewart, who was to have gone as ambassador to France for the renewal of the alliance.<sup>9</sup> But Richard Douglas of Whittingham, nephew of Archibald and his intelligencer from Scotland, writes (May 22) a different story. Gray's attempt to obtain liberty of conscience by aid of France was really his principal offence, "suppose that he confessed somewhat also that, before his last being in England, he had written into that country against our sovereign's mother's life." James was being much urged to war with England, but, "so long as he may with honour, his majesty is willing to abstain."<sup>10</sup>

The Parliament opened on July 8 at Edinburgh, and was prorogued to July 23. The king's arrival at his majority was declared. The liberties of the Kirk were ratified. Death was decreed against Jesuits and seminary priests; in only one case, much later, was this threat fulfilled. Even hearers of mass, or distributors of Catholic books, were menaced with entire confiscation. The temporalities of benefices were annexed to the Crown, with certain reserves of vested interests. This meant the downfall of bishops, their exclusion from Parliament. Six members of each Estate were formed into a commission to deal with the necessary taxation for the king's marriage. There was the usual revocation of grants made during the royal minority. Quarrelling for precedence of vote or place in Parliament was denounced, and a commission was appointed to consider claims. The minor barons, to be elected by forty-shilling freeholders, were called to Parliament, as under the law of James I. Persons accused of treason were permitted to employ counsel.<sup>11</sup> As a matter of fact, in such trials the accused could only hope for acquittal when their friends were in power, as at the trial of Archibald Douglas, or of Bothwell for witchcraft. Game laws were re-enacted, and measures, often vainly renewed, were taken to diminish the number of fraudulent notaries. For five years no new notaries were to be admitted; in future they must know Latin "reasonably," must have served seven years with Writers to the Signet or other responsible lawyers, and, generally, were to be under inspection. Forgery was a rampant crime, of which we shall see a notable instance later. Theft by landed men (as when Logan of Restalrig committed burglary in the house of Nesbit of Newton) and murder under trust were declared to be treason. Interest on money was limited to ten per cent yearly. With fiscal and others of the usual good resolutions (Acts of Parliament were little more) appeared one in favour of "universal concord." Other good resolutions were concerned, to no avail, with maintenance of law and order in the Highlands and Borders.<sup>12</sup>

The Parliament ended, though nothing is said about it in the official record, with a dramatic scene in which the lords besought James to lead them against England. This is reported by Courcelles and others,<sup>13</sup> and is doubtless true. James thanked his kneeling Estates, but said that he must wait his opportunity. Another dramatic scene, with elements of the grotesque, was the public reconciliation and banquet of all the lords in Edinburgh, so admirably described by James in 'The Fortunes of Nigel.' An order for the expulsion of the Jesuits was made, and the Protestants were pleased, while Philip was not sorry. James, his rival, was now too manifestly a hopeless heretic. Archibald Douglas was kept as ambassador to England (on a semi-official unrecognised footing), and his favour varied with James's hopes or fears as to his success in obtaining for the king a written acknowledgment of his right to the English crown, with a gift of lands in the north of England. James was now very Protestant, since Philip of Spain was intent on securing the rights bequeathed to him by Mary, and as, despite Morton's (Maxwell's) intrigues in Spain, whither he had sailed, there was clearly no chance of disinterested help, thence or from France. The Scottish ambassadors had gone to Denmark; but du Bartas, the poet and scholar, arrived in Scotland, was feasted by the king, was present at his friendly controversy with Andrew Melville in St Andrews, and was thought to be proposing for James the hand of the Princess of Navarre.

The summer was marked by Border raids into England. These were caused, according to the letters of Richard Douglas, Archibald's nephew, not by revenge for Queen Mary, but by "plain necessity"; the Liddesdale men would not starve while there were beeves in Cumberland. Thus, though the Scottish Catholic lords were as usual intriguing abroad, James remained true to his interests in England.

The "Premier," in modern language, was now Lethington's brother and successor as Secretary, Sir John Maitland of Thirlstane, "the Chancellor." He held the office, with interruptions, till 1595. He had the family wit and the family craft, and was devoid of scruples based on sentiment—devoid, in fact, of any scruples (he had represented Lethington at the scene of Darnley's murder); but he was a fairly good Protestant, and adhered to the English alliance. James, like his predecessors, was much vexed by feuds: on a large scale in the Border and the Highlands, while in St Andrews, Edinburgh, and other towns, quiet citizens were apt to be attacked by armed men—a professor on his way to lecture, a Writer to the Signet on his way to kirk.

As an illustration of daily life we may take the case of Habakkuk Bisset, W.S. This gentleman is said to have received his Christian, or rather Hebrew, name in a singular way. His father was Queen Mary's caterer, and requested her to name the child. She was just going to chapel, and chose the first name at which the Bible opened. It was Habakkuk. Arrived at years of discretion, Habakkuk had the misfortune to be engaged as agent for the brother of the laird of Cockpen against two young Hamiltons of Prestoun. They conceived that ce coquin d'Habakkuk est capable de tout, and vowed revenge. One afternoon they found poor Habakkuk "going in peaceable and quiet manner" to evening prayers, for Scottish kirks in that age were still open "on lawful days," a relic of idolatry which has been abolished. The young wretches set on Habakkuk in church, like a new St Thomas of Canterbury; they broke his head with the pommels of their swords, they chased him out by the west porch, and they cut off two fingers of his left hand. The two Hamiltons were denounced as rebels.<sup>14</sup>

Such were the accidents of everyday life in an age when the Town attacked St Mary's College at St Andrews, and the Gown, under Andrew Melville, defended the position with gallantry and success. "Spuilzies," or high-handed robberies, were frequent, so were cattle-houghings; and skirmishes with loss of life, and a blood-feud to follow, were not uncommon. As to the political situation of the country, we have a careful memoir drawn up by Archibald Douglas (November 14, 1587). The situation showed "a prince grieved in mind, and a number of nobility almost equally divided anent their religion into Protestant and Papist, with a number of indifferent religion." The Indifferents had joined the Catholics to urge revenge for Mary's death, and alliance with Spain or France, their demand being religious toleration. The king was trimming between these factions. But few nobles were Protestants: the Kirk relied on "the meanest sort of gentlemen, called lairds, whose second sons and brethren are for the most part merchants and travellers by sea," while all the burgesses were Protestant. The Protestant nobles were calm, believing that James would never change his religion. The lairds and tradesmen were galled by "the infinite number of piracies" committed by the English, of which the State Papers contain countless records. Piracy was a flourishing English profession at this time, Drake being the most notorious of the sea-thieves who preyed on the commerce of the world. All Anstruther set forth after an English pirate, ran him to shore in Suffolk, took his ship and six prisoners, and hanged two at Anstruther, four at St Andrews. Douglas adds that, as there are rumours of landings of aliens (probably in Galloway, whither Morton had returned from Spain), England could expect but cold support from his injured countrymen.

Archibald's motive, of course, was to alarm Elizabeth, and induce her, at least privately, to acknowledge James as her successor; or promise, at least, not to prejudice his case, nor to give Arabella Stuart in marriage without his consent. She ought also to make amends for the piracies of her subjects.<sup>15</sup> James was discontented with Elizabeth's answer to this appeal, and refused her proffer of £4000 for his assistance. He had less reason to dread rebellion than Elizabeth had, he said, and was on friendly terms with all foreign princes except herself. The nobles had no grudge against him, except for his slackness in avenging his mother. Hunsdon at Berwick was working for amity, but as he distrusted Archibald Douglas, the two were likely to interfere with each other, so Richard Douglas reported (December 27, 1587).<sup>16</sup>

The opening of the year 1588 found Scotland troubled by the expected advent of the Invincible Armada. The Kirk (February 6, 1588) held a special Assembly, denouncing Huntly, Herries, and others, with a number of Jesuits. James had amused himself in the winter by writing a commentary on the Apocalypse, "and in setting out of sermons thereupon against the Papists and Spaniards."<sup>17</sup> Throughout February and March Huntly, Herries, Glencairn, and others were now obscurely and timidly conspiring with Parma and Philip, through Colonel Sempill, whose life is a romance, now urging James to dismiss Maitland and others of his advisers. Herries raided and spoiled the lands of Drumlanrig and of Douglas, Provost of Lincluden.<sup>18</sup> Hunsdon denounced Archibald Douglas as no ambassador; he had been discharged—and Hunsdon had seen the documents under James's hand—ever since the Master of Gray was in London. "If he come into Scotland, the king will take his life." Yet Richard Douglas had always been dealing with Archibald for James, as if the "old fox" were duly commissioned, and Archibald had constantly negotiated with Cecil, and, in personal interviews, with Elizabeth. James had apparently made arrangements for disavowing and betraying the traitor, if that course proved convenient.<sup>19</sup> The vast preparations for Philip's invasion were going forward, and the question was, Which party would James espouse? In spite of Hunsdon's allegations, he was writing with his own hand to Archibald Douglas, and, according to Richard Douglas, would take the English side (April 28).<sup>20</sup> On May 7 James ordered the country to arm, but the cautious terms of this proclamation show that he committed himself to no more than armed neutrality.<sup>21</sup>

At this juncture Huntly, in the Catholic interest, was bidding for Archibald Douglas; he "sought you so earnestly, and offered me so fair," says Richard Douglas, who was to manage the sale. But Huntly's heart failed him, and whatever plot he meant to concoct with Archibald fell to the ground. Richard Douglas returned from his secret journey to Huntly, and, after an interview with James, gave Archibald some cause to feel more secure. "He would be served by you, . . . seeing you knew sufficiently the end whereat he shot," the crown of England (May 26).<sup>22</sup> At this time James attacked Morton (Maxwell), the most dangerous of the southern Catholics, the man who might have opened the south-western ports to Spain. Morton, newly home from Spain and France, showed his hand too soon: his allies, Huntly, Herries, and Claude Hamilton, left him to take his chance. The king took Lochmaben Castle, hanged some of the garrison, and captured Morton himself.<sup>23</sup> Angus, the faithful of the Kirk, was made Warden on the west Marches,—clearly James was decided on the Protestant side,—and Sir William Stewart, Arran's brother and the denouncer of the Master, was in high renown. Within a few weeks both of those men were dead. On July 10 Stewart and Bothwell gave each other the lie, in James's presence. Stewart added an insult common among street-boys of the lewder sort. On the 30th of July the enemies met in the High Street. Stewart stabbed one of Bothwell's men, lost his sword, and fled. Bothwell followed and wounded him with his rapier. "Sir William fleeth to a hollow cellar, where they stabbed him with whingers while he was despatched."

So perished one brother-in-law of John Knox, a man daring and perfidious. The death of Angus was believed to have been caused by witchcraft. Pious to the last, he refused all help by counter-witchcraft, an interesting experiment still practised in rural England. The witches used the old scheme, an image of wax melted before a fire, or, at least, this was rumoured.<sup>24</sup> This is the version of Calderwood, but a very different story was later told by Bothwell. That adventurer, himself under a charge of treasonable sorcery, confessed that he had, indeed, dealt with a wizard, Richard Graham, but solely in the interests of Angus. It was Lady Angus who besought Bothwell to bring the wizard to heal her bewitched husband: Bothwell had no other dealings with the servant of Satan. This ingenious defence, whereby the pious Angus shielded Bothwell's character, was apparently the invention of John Colville.<sup>25</sup>

Angus the Presbyterian was succeeded by Douglas of Glenberrie, who, dying soon, was followed by his son, a Catholic. The Maxwell Earl of Morton lost that title, which fell to the betrayer of Northumberland, Douglas of Lochleven. The evidences of James's Protestant spirit, especially his action against Morton, who might have opened the ports of the Stewartry to Spain, encouraged Elizabeth. She sent Ashby to Holyrood with golden promises. He found James at his devotion, and his letter was written (August 6) during the agony of the Armada. Presbyterian Scotland had been greatly alarmed.

"Terrible was the fear, piercing were the preachings, earnest, zealous, and fervent were the prayers, sounding were the sighs and sobs, and abounding were the tears" of the Brethren; so James Melville writes. The end was the arrival of a battered ship and a starving crew of Spaniards on the Anstruther beach. James Melville told the captain that, though enemies of the Pope, yet the Scots were men, and moved by human compassion. So kail, porridge, fish, and trenchant remarks on popish errors were supplied to the hungry mariners, one of whom was Gomez de Medina, a gentleman not ungrateful.<sup>26</sup> The coasts of the isles of the west were strewn with wrecks of "that great fleet invincible"; the danger was past and over, whether of a Spanish landing in the Stewartry or of a Catholic rising. James had taken his part "against all foreign enemies of this island," and was thought, "by not the unwisest, too sudden to declare himself before being assured of that he craved"; so Richard Douglas wrote (August 5). Elizabeth, in her alarm, had offered that, on assurance under the Great Seal, Mary's death should not prejudice James's claims: he was also to have a duchy in England, a pension, £5000 in ready money, and a guard of fifty gentlemen. But in a week, the peril from Spain being ended, "it seems they would go back from these offers."<sup>27</sup>

James, in fact, as the Master of Gray said, "got but fiddler's wages," like all who trusted the falsest and meanest of women. He was furious, he was enraged against Archibald Douglas; the Catholic lords grew stronger, they intrigued with Spain, they expected the king to combine with them, and Richard Douglas proposed that Archibald should come to terms with Huntly. The death of Leicester, with whom James was friendly, complicated affairs, and James proceeded to pay court to Walsingham. In November Elizabeth sent Thomas Fowler to deal with James. He found matters going ill; the Spanish faction was in credit, the king (Ashton reported, December 13) was running to his own destruction, the murder of the Duc de Guise was apt to cause Philip of Spain to come to terms with Scotland.<sup>28</sup> Huntly had dallied with the Kirk (partly that he might be allowed to wed the sister of Lennox); but he was not long to continue, even in a shadowy way, a Presbyterian. The preachers held a thanksgiving for the murder of Guise; for both religions impartially rejoiced in the judicious use of the dagger (December 30).<sup>29</sup> James Melville revels in "a maist remarkable work of God's justice, making King Hendrie to cause his Guard stick the Duc de Guise under trust, . . . and syne a Jacobin friar maist treasonably to stick the king. . . Thus God glorified His name most remarkably." The Deity, it is to be understood, conducted political enterprises after the fashion of Philip of Spain, Elizabeth, or any other contemporary prince.

The Kirk throughout all this period was in a nervous condition, and the preachers were usually very well informed, doubtless through the English embassy. In January 1589 "the most vigilant ministers" convened in Edinburgh, and warned the king of his danger from Papists. He was begged not to interfere between the Kirk and the Catholics whom it might be molesting: Jesuits ought to be hunted for; some of the ministers and the laity ought to be given an inquisitorial commission to explore what nobles and others "profess religion." James's own sincerity in the truth being doubted, he is asked to expel all officials who may be suspected of Catholic tendencies. These petitions were granted.<sup>30</sup>

In February it appeared that the preachers were no "drytting prophets" (as Lethington said of Knox); there was really a Catholic plot. Cecil had laid hands on one Pringle, agent of Colonel Sempill, and seized letters from Huntly and Errol to the Duke of Parma and the King of Spain. Huntly and Errol were with James when the letters were handed to him. This Pringle had been examined in England on February 15: he was a soldier of fortune who had served on both sides in the Low Countries. He had dealt for Robert Bruce (Huntly's agent with Philip, a singularly perfidious double spy and trafficker) with Huntly, Bothwell, Crawford, and Lord Claude. With the letters Elizabeth sent a note of remonstrance. James, she said, seemed to hold such traitors "dear and near, with a parentage of near alliance," referring to Huntly's recent marriage with a sister of the young Duke of Lennox. "Good Lord, methinks I do dream; no king a week could bear this!" The letter by Huntly was of January 24; James received it on February 27. Huntly in his epistle regretted that the Armada had not touched at Scotland, where it would have found countless allies. He gave advice for a better conducted enterprise. He lamented his recent verbal adherence to the Kirk. Bruce in his letter frankly confessed that what the Catholic lords wanted was gold "for some pretended occasions which will never fall out as they promise." Huntly had tried to get at the money, but Bruce had defeated him. Bruce's character was execrable, but his inferences as to Huntly were probably judicious. All this was pleasant hearing for Huntly, if he was present, as Calderwood says, when the letters were given to James; and it must have been agreeable to Maxwell to hear it averred that a Jesuit secured his release from prison. Errol had to listen to the tale of his conversion by Father Edmund Hay; Crawford to the narrative of his theological debts to Father Creighton. It seems hardly credible that their own letters were rehearsed before any of these peccant noblemen; if they were, the scene must have been of the highest comedy. As a matter of fact, Bruce was right in saying that what the Catholic noblemen of Scotland wanted, in the first place, was doubloons, pistoles, and pieces of eight. All parties were pensioners: James and the Protestant lords and lairds, of England; the opposite faction, of Spain or France.

Huntly was now warded in the castle, where James and Maitland dined with him next day. He was presently released, riding off at the head of 200 Gordons, and Claude Hamilton was imprisoned. By March 14 Huntly was inviting James to dinner, Errol was with them; but as a rising of the town was feared, Huntly rode north: he is said to have asked James to accompany him.<sup>31</sup> James had one of his tender fondnesses for Huntly; he also suspected that the letters attributed to him and other Catholics had been forged in England. Ashby and Fowler now reported James's condition as one of melancholy. His life was made a torment by the intrigues and feuds of his nobles. To Huntly he was sincerely attached: Bothwell he considered, so he had told Courcelles, as a feather-head; but Bothwell had a native love of mischief, and was powerful in the disorderly region of Liddesdale, and among the Humes, Douglasses, and Logans of Berwickshire and East Lothian. He was also dear to all ladies. Errol regarded Maitland, the Chancellor, as his private enemy. Writing to Mr Bruce (the eminent preacher, not the intriguer with whom he has been confused), Errol professed that Maitland had accused him "behind his back." He was ready "to be tried by the Kirk's self" (March 22, 1589).<sup>32</sup> But Fowler reported Errol as not likely to surrender (March 20), and James as "weary of life."<sup>33</sup> He was still making excuses for Huntly; and Bothwell, like Errol, was at feud with Maitland. In fact, to get rid of that powerful minister, not a man of their own rank, but indispensable to the State, was the motive that united Protestants like Bothwell (if he was a Protestant) and Catholics like Huntly. The old story of Lauder Bridge and the hanging of the low-born advisers of James III. was ever the ideal of the nobles: not that Maitland was low-born, his house was old and good, but he was not of the greatest noblesse, and he had intellect, which was intolerable.

Errol was "put to the horn"—denounced outlaw—the day after he wrote to Bruce. These plots of the nobles recur in a stereotyped and tedious fashion. A rebellion for the actual deposition of the king was practically impossible. It was said of James that he was like a monkey. "If I have Jocko in my hands, I can make him bite you; if you have Jocko, you can make him bite me." The constant purpose of malcontents, therefore, was to get James into their hands, and out of those of whoever held him, Morton, Gowrie, Arran, or in this case Maitland. At present the idea was that Bothwell, probably with Montrose, should seize the king and "discourt" or slay Maitland, while Huntly and Errol should descend from the North with the Gordons and the Hays. James was at Halton, where the capture should have been made. He got news of the scheme and rode to Edinburgh, whence (April 7) he summoned his loyal subjects of Fife and the South to repair to him, "boden" with hackbuts and spears. On the 10th of April a summons was issued against the armed and banded malcontents; they must surrender their fortalices. There were several Kers, Lindsay of Halton (where James had been in peril), Bothwell, Crawford, Montrose, Fintry (an active Catholic dealer with France), Errol, Gardyne of Gardyne, many Gordons, including Gordon of Gight, and a score of Lindsays.<sup>34</sup> The confederates, therefore, were of the lawless Border, and of Perthshire, Aberdeenshire, and the county of Angus.

The Earl of Angus<sup>35</sup> and Lord Hamilton commanded the royal forces under James. The confederates captured the Master of Glamis in his house: James moved out from Linlithgow with his levies on April 11. The rebels were assembled at Perth, whence they retreated by Dundee and Brechin. Now James showed a spark of his mother's spirit when she drove Murray from hold to hold into England. Many men deserted the royal banner, but he pushed on, and with a force reckoned only at 1000 met Huntly with 3000 at Brig o' Dee. Errol would have fought, but Huntly's men dispersed: they had been told that Huntly possessed a royal commission, but, seeing James in arms against him, their hearts failed them. Defeat meant forfeiture. James reached Aberdeen on April 20. "Bands" were taken from many of the northern chiefs and barons for the defence of the king and the religion. Forbeses, Rosses, Grants, Gordons, Mackintoshes, Hays, Dunbars, and Mackenzies were obliged to sign with Cheynes and Keiths. Huntly and Crawford were taken and warded in courteous durance: Bothwell was handed to the captain of the Guard.<sup>36</sup>

It is probable that the tradition about James's personal timidity is greatly exaggerated. He is said to have been unable to look on a drawn sword. In this rebellion he led his men where he was likely to see plenty of cold steel. Spottiswoode declares that on the eve of expected battle he addressed his little force with grace—"I desire you to stand no longer than ye see me stand": Colville gives a similar report to Ashby, as does Fowler (April 18, April 23), and it is clear that James had shaken off his irresolute melancholy and played his part very well.

The worst of these successes was that they could be turned to no real advantage. Despite the feuds and jealousies of the nobles, they were all at one on a single point, their own right to commit high treason with practical impunity. The victors knew that in a month, by a turn of the wheel, they might be the vanquished. They all keenly objected to forfeitures and capital punishments. James V. had done his best against the Douglasses, to what end? Merely to give England the most powerful, dangerous, and perfidious of allies. By betraying Scotland to the disaster of Solway Moss, Sir George Douglas practically slew James V. The house flourished again under Morton, that scourge of the Crown. Morton was overthrown, but his blood-feud raised up the Presbyterian Angus to capture and dominate James, and to procure the fall of Arran. Murray and Mary had once before overthrown and ruined the House of Huntly: in three or four years the Gordons were as powerful as ever, and the Huntly of the Brig o' Dee remained a thorn in the side of the State long after his head and shoulders would have parted company had he been a subject of Elizabeth. But no sooner was he captured than James's war leader, Lord Hamilton, Huntly's kinsman, was found to be opposed to his execution.<sup>37</sup> Besides, James was personally attached to Huntly, and yet again, in a country where the pretensions of the preachers were really the most threatening danger to the Crown, Huntly, a Catholic, could be relied on against the preachers. The maintenance by James of a perilous equilibrium between Protestant theocrats and greedy Catholic nobles, and the feudal and personal jealousies of the lords indifferent in religion, at home; and between Elizabeth and the Catholic Powers abroad, make up all this chapter of our history. Original kinds of events are few, but occurrences follow each other rapidly on to the boards, round behind the scenes, and on again, like a stage army. Huntly and the other rebels were to have their exits and their entrances for many a year after 1589.

The criminals were examined on May 24.<sup>38</sup> Huntly's examination was a little garden-party: the prisoner, James, and four or five of the Council met in the pleasance behind the council house. He "came in the king's will": was warded in Borthwick Castle; Bothwell, under Angus, at Tantallon; Crawford at St Andrews. They were all soon at liberty again.<sup>39</sup> "The ministers cry for justice," Fowler reports; but if every head that the ministers asked for had fallen, Scotland would have been a shambles. By May 27 the Master of Gray was at Berwick on his homeward course: "so it was seen that his banishment was only for the fashion," says Calderwood. He appears to have been restored by means of Maitland, the Chancellor, and is at once (June 4) found sending intelligence to Cecil, for whom, and for Rome, he continued to play the double spy. The rebels, it seems, had practically been induced to surrender by promises of lenient usage, guaranteed by Hamilton, Angus, Mar, Morton, Home, the Earl Marischal, and the Master of Glamis.<sup>40</sup> Gray had reconciled himself in England with Cecil, and one part of his business was to aid Fowler in preventing James from wedding the daughter of Denmark, the Princess Anne.

It was the nature of Elizabeth to interfere against all marriages: her pretext now was her desire that James should marry the Princess of Navarre. But he had heard that she was old and crooked, and much preferred a young lady of fifteen, recommended by his old tutor, Peter Young, lately his ambassador to Denmark. Elizabeth had sent to James some money during his recent troubles, and he humorously employed it to fit out, in opposition to the wishes of the English queen, the Earl Marischal, a man of taste and learning, on his mission to ask for "the sea-king's daughter from over the sea." The lady had been bred a Lutheran, and no one could guess that she would return to the old faith, as she did.<sup>41</sup> Gray's own credit at Court was now slight: he sighed for his old abbacy (lay) of Dunfermline, to which, whichever creed he professed, he was devoutly attached.

The Earl Marischal did sail for Denmark (June 18), and the proxy marriage with Anne was celebrated on August 20. Meanwhile, as the star of Gray rose again, that of Archibald Douglas set. He laments "a disposition to pick quarrels with him," and, apart from his own unamiable qualities, he probably had taken part with England against the Danish marriage. James neglected him; he begged from Elizabeth. Maitland also opposed the Danish wedding, but James was determined to marry to please himself. He therefore showed more and more favour to possible supporters, the recent rebels. Errol made his submission in August: on August 12 the rest were set at liberty. This amnesty was in honour of the Royal bride; but the September storms drove her little fleet hither and thither: her own vessel was missing for three days in the Northern Sea: she had to return home, and on October 22 James placed his royal person at adventure and boldly sailed to join his bride in Denmark. He took Maitland with him; for many reasons it was not safe to leave Maitland at home. During the king's long absence the country was quietly governed by nobles—Hamilton, Angus, Lennox, and Bothwell—while Robert Bruce represented the preachers. All, being trusted, were wonderfully on their good behaviour, whereas had Maitland stayed at home his throat would certainly have been cut. There were, indeed, germs of feuds in the North, later to blossom into clan warfare,—the hatred between Huntly and "the bonny Earl Moray,"—and Bothwell's relations with Elizabeth suggest that she regarded him as a card which might be serviceable some day in her hand. But James's absence from October to April caused no disturbances, perhaps rather prevented them.

For some reason the king in this year showed amazing energy in the fields of Mars and Venus. Fontaine had found him a laggard in love, and in all courtly graces a grobian. He despised dandies, and especially detested ear-rings, which his unhappy son wore even on the scaffold at Whitehall. The youth of James had been continent; alone of the Stewarts he left, as far as our knowledge goes, no scions of amorous adventure. Modern historians accuse him of "precocity in vice." Where are the proofs?—even calumny, up to this date, puts in but one filthy word in a scandalous lampoon. We hear of no young ladies about his Court, and his coldness caused anxiety among his subjects. Grotesque always, James on leaving Scotland set forth such an address to the country as only he could frame.<sup>42</sup> He would have men to know that he was not "a barren stock." He had formed at Craigmillar, all alone, his resolution to set sail, and had put aside the objections of the Chancellor, and indeed he had kept his own counsel as to voyaging personally till all preparations were made. He firmly objected to being written down "an irresolute ass." He describes his amusements in Denmark as "drinking and driving ower," but he also conversed with the learned. It is not known that he obtained any evidence as to the disputed testament of Bothwell, declaring the innocence of Queen Mary. He returned and was received at Leith on May 20, 1590, with all the tedious forms of pageantry usual at the period.

The preachers, true to themselves, objected to the anointment of the queen at her coronation as a Jewish ceremony, or if not Jewish, then popish. James threatened to call in a bishop. Anything was better than a bishop, so Mr Robert Bruce did the anointing.<sup>43</sup>

The Kirk at this time was in a highly sensitive condition. Dr Bancroft in England had preached against the Puritans (February 9, 1588), and his tone had been unworthy of a Christian and a gentleman. He rather appeared to imitate on the Episcopal side the style of Knox's denunciations of "bloudie bishops," and Knox is a bad model. What Bancroft said of the Scottish preachers (as summarised by Dr M'Crie) was that they "took it upon them to alter the laws of the land without the consent of the king and Estates, threatened them with excommunication, filled the pulpits with seditious and treasonable doctrine, utterly disclaimed the king's authority, trod upon his sceptre, laboured to establish an ecclesiastical tyranny of an infinite jurisdiction, such as neither the law of God nor man could tolerate," and so forth. Bancroft would appear to have been "intoxicated by the exuberance of his own verbosity," but it is not difficult to understand his drift; and if the preachers did not aim at "infinite jurisdiction," what did they aim at?

In reply Davidson, the poet and preacher, wrote a letter to Elizabeth, but it was not despatched. Complaint was made of a tract of Archbishop Adamson's in which he gave his views about Presbyterian eloquence. The General Assembly ordered prayers for "the afflicted brethren in England," the Puritans. Mr James Melville, in place of being warned by the bad example of Bancroft, denounced before the General Assembly "these Amaziahs, the belly-god bishops in England, by all means and money seeking conformity of our Kirk with theirs, as did Achaz and Uriah with the altar at Damascus." <sup>44</sup> These excesses, as regards a "neighbour Kirk," we must regret and condemn. Melville implored the Brethren to ratify the old Fife excommunication against Archbishop Adamson. It would do Adamson so much good, he said, "if he be of the number of the elect," which, as a "vennemens enemie of Christ's kingdome," Adamson probably was not. If, on the other hand, he was of the elect, it does not seem that excommunication could harm a person in that desirable position. Mr Melville's advice was "approved by all," and yet there seems to be a want of sweet reasonableness in his method. One thing was clear, the long war of Scottish Presbyterians and English Puritans against the "belly-god bishops" had begun, and the English Puritans and Scottish Presbyterians were in alliance. Bancroft preluded to Laud, Melville to Cargill and Cameron, Blair and Rutherford. The Reformation brought not peace but a sword that was to rage through the next century. These beginnings of trouble, these violences of parson and presbyter, these furies of the rival pulpit-eers, are more important than the feuds and follies of the noblesse. In the excitement about forms of religious discipline nobody seems to have bethought him that the religion was that of Christ, or to have remembered the spirit of the Master.

The Scottish preachers continued to pray for their afflicted brethren, the imprisoned Puritans in England. They had been unwilling to seem to hint a censure of Elizabeth when the axe was sharpened for Queen Mary, but when the Puritan brethren were touched they knew no such reluctance. Elizabeth on July 6 wrote James a stringent letter on the subject. "There has arisen, both in your realm and mine, a sect of perilous consequence, such as would have no kings but a presbytery; and take our place, while they enjoy our privilege, with a shade of God's Word, which none is judged to follow right, without by their censure they be so deemed." This means that the preachers desired the State to be ruled by God's Word, of which they were the infallible interpreters.

Here really was the storm-centre of the situation. The preachers might be, and indeed were, much better men morally than the statesmen, and were free from personal self-seeking. But their claim to infallibility (a claim implied, if not explicitly uttered), their appeal to inspiration, in "the preaching place," meant nothing less than that the State was to be governed by the pulpit. No pretensions could be more dangerous; and kings were really engaged for a century in a contest for human freedom, freedom from the political interference of inspired and irresponsible pulpit orators. The royal methods alienate our sympathies; their actual aim is lost sight of in our disgust with their measures—imprisonment, exile, dragoonings, and the imposition of Episcopacy upon a nation which detested "the horns of the mitre." But in these rude and unseemly ways the warfare was waged till, after the Revolution of 1688, the power of "new presbyter" was broken, as the power of "old priest" had already been overthrown.

James, as a victor in the bloodless war of Brig o' Dee, and as a married man, began to take himself seriously. He had a project for establishing peace and unity among Protestant Powers: he even sent two ambassadors through Germany. He would expel Jesuits, reconcile feuds, and make the royal presence more sacred and less easy of access. By the last idea he managed to offend Lord Hamilton: the other schemes of reform remained unfulfilled, like all the Acts of similar tendency which crowd our records. The confederates of the Brig o' Dee continued to intrigue at home and abroad. A feud broke out between Huntly and "the bonny Earl Moray," which had fatal consequences. The Earl did not inherit by direct descent the old Moray-Huntly blood-feud of 1562. He was a Stewart who had married the daughter of the Regent Murray, and his neighbourhood to Huntly would have provoked a quarrel in any case, a quarrel involving Gordons, Campbells, Forbeses, Stewarts, and the adjacent Celtic-speaking clans. The causes and complexities of the feud must be explained later.

James also busied himself much in examining and persecuting witches and warlocks who had raised inconvenient storms, or intrigued to ascertain his future, or to slay by art magic himself (as Bothwell was accused of trying to do) and his Ministers. The usual plan was that of "sympathetic magic"; an image of the victim, in clay or wax, was melted in water or fire. The idea is familiar to most savages, and was current in ancient Greece. It is possible enough that when the victims knew that the rite was being performed they fell ill by dint of "suggestion" or "imagination." Montaigne at this time was giving proofs of the power of "suggestion" upon the fancy, and so upon the body. Reginald Scot had recently published his large and entertaining work on the folly of current beliefs, 'The Discovery of Witchcraft.' In Scotland not much is heard of punishment for witchcraft before the Reformation, when Knox, the preachers, and the Regent Murray conceived it to be their duty to denounce and burn witches.* There can be little doubt that many witches were in intention malevolent enough. They believed in their own powers, and probably dealt in poison on occasion, very clumsily, as in Bothwell's attempt on the king. At the least, their pretensions inspired terror and the physical maladies which terror can cause. But James's action, his earnest pedantic curiosity, and the unspeakable tortures which he caused to be inflicted, strengthened in this unhappy matter the hands of the preachers, and reinforced a superstition which Reginald Scot and others attempted to laugh away. For more than a hundred years the poorest and most pitiable of mankind, destitute old women, were at the mercy of every prying preacher, every hysterical child, every unfriendly neighbour. In the next century we have a melancholy narrative by a minister. A woman was accused, the parishioners were violently inflamed against her, the laird was anxious to save her. The examinations by the minister yielded no grounds of suspicion, but not to condemn her was to offend the populace, alternately the tyrants and slaves of the preachers. Happily the minister, after leaving her in her cell, returned and listened at the door. His eavesdropping was rewarded. He heard the old woman mumbling to herself, and he could nearly swear that he heard another voice replying. That voice must be the devil's. So the woman was burned, and the minister retained his popularity. The disturbances, noises, knockings, movements of objects, which are still common enough in newspaper reports, were always associated with a hysterical boy or girl who used to "see" the witch.

Possibly the child had been alarmed by the witch, and herself caused the unexplained disturbances. But the so-called "spectral evidence" was good enough: the witch was arrested and tortured. She implicated others: she told fables of the Sabbat, the league with Satan, and other fragments of folk-lore, tales about Fairyland, mortals enchanted there, and the fairy queen. The parish fell under a reign of terror: even matrons of noble family were not safe. The cruel absurdity raged in England as in Scotland, under Episcopacy as under Presbyterianism. Much of the fault lies at the door of James, who could not, indeed, have controlled the preachers, but who went out of his way to encourage beliefs that ensanguine the courts of African kings and the camps of wandering Australian tribes.<sup>45</sup> Bothwell was most unfortunately involved in alleged dealings with witches, and was actually imprisoned in April 1591, though some thought that the preachers had him incarcerated for a flirtation with one of the daughters of the late Earl of Gowrie. He was confronted with Graham the wizard, who confessed to a scheme for poisoning the king in a magical manner. A fast was held on this important occasion.<sup>46</sup> Bothwell broke prison and betook himself to his Border fastness (June 21). He was not taken: he now was, and remained, a wandering torment and a probable source of revolution.<sup>47</sup> He had carried off a witness from the Tolbooth in January while the king was in session there, and only a few days before his majesty is said to have fled and hidden in a skinner's shop during a street brawl between Lennox and the "wanton laird of Logie."

* This is insisted on in the record of the Regent's Parliament of December 1567 (Act. Parl. Scot., iii. 44).

While he was accused of favouring Jesuits, and of suppressing a book written by John Davidson against Bancroft's celebrated sermon, he was also assuring the General Assembly that the Kirk was the purest of Kirks. "The Kirk of Geneva keepeth Pasche and Yule" (Easter and Christmas), "what have they for them? They have no institution. As for our neighbour Kirk in England, it is an evil-said mass in English, wanting nothing but the liftings" (Elevation of the Host).<sup>48</sup> From this opinion James was to advance very far. The Assembly was greatly delighted by James's adherence to the Kirk.

In April 1591 shame fell upon the unhappy Archbishop of St Andrews. The preachers gave James no rest about the most hated of their enemies. We mainly know Adamson from his mortal foes, who added witchcraft to the charges which they heaped upon him. Though a scholar, he appears to have been a time-server. We have no reason to suppose that he was the martyr of an earnest belief in the order of bishops, or apostolic succession, but rather the kind of man out of whom tulchans were made. He had served his king rather than his Kirk, and his king found it at this time convenient to desert him. Maitland was hostile to him, and that proved fatal.

He was reduced to lying in the Castle of St Andrews "like a fox in a hole," and is accused of inducing Henry Hamilton, M.A., to attack Professor Welwood on his way to a lecture in St Mary's. The rector deprived Hamilton of his master's degree, the judges "gave out compulsitors to" the rector's decision; Hamilton was presented with the freedom of the city. Professor Welwood was going to lecture, a book in one hand and an hour-glass in the other, when Hamilton attacked him with his sword. Town and Gown flew to arms, Adamson's brother-in-law was slain in a duel at rapier and dagger: in the end the town secured the exile of two of the Welwood faction. All this went down to the discredit of the Archbishop.<sup>49</sup> In 1591 he offered a general recantation of his offences. He had subjected the Kirk men to the king's ordinances, and (proh pudor!) had taught that presbyteries were "a foolish invention," though really they are "an ordinance of Christ." He had intrigued with bishops of the Church of England. Divers other offences he had committed, he was dying in poverty, and, crowning humiliation, he owed his daily bread to his old enemy, Andrew Melville.

The central question between James and the preachers was that of jurisdiction. James told them that he thought he "had sovereign judgment on all things within this realm." The reply, by Mr Robert Pont, was typical. "There is a judgment above yours, and that is God's, put in the hand of the ministers; for we shall judge the angels, saith the apostle." The king replied that the judgment in the text "pertained to every shoemaker and tailor, as well as to the Kirk." Mr Pont answered, "Christ sayeth, 'Ye shall sit upon twelve thrones and judge,' which is chiefly referred to the apostles" (indeed, given only twelve thrones, there were no seats for more), "and consequently to ministers." There is the claim, frankly stated, and supported by what reasoning! "A sect of perilous consequence, such as would have no kings but a presbytery"! The preachers, how selected we have seen, pretend, in fact, to apostolical succession without using that phrase, and claim for themselves on earth the privileges of the apostles in heaven.

Thus there was civil and ecclesiastical anarchy. The preachers besought James to reinforce law and order, but James was helpless. As he said, jurisdictions were often inherited, and the officers regarded only their private and family interests. He could not take Bothwell, though Bothwell aimed at his life. Bothwell was here and there, always in mischief. On December 27, 1591, he and his retainers broke into Holyrood, he tried to burn down the door of the king's chamber, and beat with hammers on the queen's. He had entered through Lennox's stables, and Lennox was not free from suspicion. The town turned out, rescued James, and captured a few assailants of no note, who were hanged. The names of the ruffians prove them of the Border: Hepburns, Douglasses, Humes, Ormiston, Leirmonth (mainly of Ercildoune, the Rhymer's family), Pringles, and, what looks ill for Lennox, Stewarts. John Colville, with Douglas of Spot, of Morton's brood, also thought it for his interest to take part with Bothwell.<sup>50</sup> Craig, the preacher, publicly informed James that, to punish his laxity, "God had made a noise of crying and forehammers come to his own doors."<sup>51</sup> Presently the character of the king himself was blemished by a deed which for years influenced the politics of Scotland. This was the murder, by Huntly and his retainers, of the bonny Earl Moray, commemorated in the familiar ballad. Before describing the circumstances and consequences of this deed, it is necessary to explore its causes, which were remote and complicated.

Colin, sixth Earl of Argyll, died in September 1584. His heir and eldest son, Archibald, was then a child of eight years of age. His mother was left with a council of six Campbells, including Campbell of Glenurchy, Campbell of Calder, Campbell of Ardkinglas (an estate on the southern side of Lochfyne, opposite Inverary), and Campbell of Lochnell. Of these Lochnell was, as the Lochnell of to-day still is, the first cadet of the House of Argyll, while the heir-presumptive is, maternally, of the House of Ardkinglas. In 1584 Ardkinglas received the wardship and marriage of the child earl, and he, with Calder and the Bishop of Argyll, had most power in the clan council of six. Lochnell, as first cadet and next in succession, failing the issue of the sixth Earl of Argyll, was jealous of Ardkinglas, and was backed by Glenurchy. Ardkinglas died (1591), and his son was practically subordinated to Calder. A partisan of Calder's was the bonny Earl Moray, a Stewart by family, who had married the daughter and heiress of the Regent Murray, the foe, and for a while the destroyer (1562), of the House of Huntly. In the feuds about the earldom of Moray, once held by the Huntlys, the Argylls had supported the House of Moray. In 1590 Huntly had reasons for wishing to deprive the bonny Earl of the support of Calder. Huntly allied himself with Lochiel, Moray with Atholl, Calder, and Lovat. Huntly also made approaches to Calder's intertribal foes, Lochnell and Glenurchy. They all formed a "band" for the destruction of the young Argyll, his brother, Calder, and the bonny Earl Moray. Parties to this "band" were Maclean of Duart, whose ancestor, as we saw in a previous volume, had been slain by Calder's grandfather; Stewart of Appin; Macdougall of Dunolly, near Oban,—and Maitland, the Chancellor! While the Earl of Moray, Calder, and Argyll, and his brother, were to be done to death, Lochnell (who would succeed to the earldom of Argyll) was to reward Maitland with lands in Stirlingshire, and Glenurchy with those of Lochowe, the ancient patrimony of the Campbells. Ardkinglas, it seems, knew nothing of "the great band"; but he hated Calder, and was induced to have him shot by a man named Mackellar. So far so good; one victim of "the great band," one enemy of Huntly, had perished.<sup>52</sup> He next aimed at the bonny Earl of Moray, who was now within striking distance of Edinburgh—very probably for the purpose of assisting Bothwell in his enterprises against James (December 27, 1591). That he was suspected of a part in this treasonable conspiracy is certain.

On December 31, 1591, Hudson wrote to Cecil that there were fears of James's being surprised by the Earl of Moray,<sup>53</sup> "suspected to be a favourer of Bothwell." His arrival at Donibristle, on the northern side of the Queensferry, is said to have been caused by a desire to be reconciled to Huntly by the good services of Ochiltree; and these services, again, may have been part of a plot by Maitland, a member of the great band, to bring Moray within reach. James would be told that Moray was a Bothwellian: to Huntly he was a feudal foe,—Maitland wanted part of his spoil. The story about Maitland and Ochiltree is the version of the author of 'The Historie of King James the Sext,' a work of 1582-97, probably in part by John Colville, and is attested by Roger Aston, writing at the moment. On the other hand, five weeks before Moray's slaying, as we saw, Hudson had reported suspicions that he intended with others to seize the person of James. Bothwell's attempt was of December 27, the suspicions were expressed on December 31, and it may have been supposed that Moray, had Bothwell succeeded, would have carried the king north to his remote earldom.

The story of the murder is best given in the words of Aston, an English "intelligencer," writing to Bowes from Edinburgh on February 8: * words printed below.

It is usually said that when Moray's house was fired, his long streaming locks caught fire, and led the murderers to his hiding-place. Huntly, it is averred, gashed his brow with a dagger. "You have spoiled a better face than your own," said the dying Earl, whose beauty, the ballad avers, had won the favour of the queen. According to Calderwood, Ochiltree swore that he had brought Moray to Donibristle, with the knowledge only of James, Huntly, and Maitland, for the purpose of a reconciliation. But Moray cannot have been far off when, weeks earlier, he was suspected of a design to capture James; and he was even said to have been with Bothwell

* This long tyme past the yerle of Murre has sought to be reconciled with Huntle and for that caues has employd sundry of his frendes to travel with the King wich was nere all apoyntt be my L. Occoltryes means whoo both delt with the King and the yerle Huntle, and for that caues the yerle Murre came to his howes of Donnebrissel whithin ij myle of the quenes ferry Where the Lord Occoltry was to have mett on mondaye the vii of this enstand and for that purpose came to the ferry and wold have gone over, butt commanment was come thether as they sayd frum the King, thatt no botes should pas. Where uppon the sed lord returned thinkeing there had bene sum enterpryes to have bene done be the King thatt daye. The King was att hunting and Huntle gave it outt he was going to the King and so came forthe acompened with xl horse of his servantes. Thatt morning Huntle tould the King he had a porpose of Mr Jhon Colvel and some othes thatt were withe the yerle Bodwel, and for that caues he was to pas over the water. Yett the King fering the unconvenyenes tatt mought ensew be reson of the yerle of Murrey being on the other syd, discharged him to ryd, wich he promest to obe, butt sorttly after the King was gone furthe, he past forwartt to the sed yerle of Mures howes, and being but two howses, and not abel to be keptt, they thatt were wthin came forthe sondry tymes, and discharged there pestoles and slew sume of Honttlees men as Capten Gordon and dyvers othes. There uppon they toke the corne stakes and led to the howes so thatt the extremety of the fier forced theme that was within to come forth. The yerle him self, after he was so brent as he was not abel to howld a wepon in one of his handes, came throw them al with his sord in his hand, and lyke a lyon forsd them al to geve plase, and so gott thorow them all, and with sped of fott out ren, but sowch was his fourteen, after he had esecaped them, lit in the handes of some of the watchers, whoo sett uppon him, and thirst him to the water, wher he was be them crewelly slen. The Serreff of Morre was slene and one othere of his servantes, many hurt of both sides, the ould lady, his sesters, and cheldren, were al sauet. This fackett is counted very odywos be al men, the King takes it very hevily. What ponesment there wil be for it I know nott. Huntle is past norwartt, the King and counsellors are at this hour setting uppon the matter, the pepel cryes outt of the crewelty of the ded. We loke for nothing but mischef." —State Papers, Scot., Eliz., vol. xlvi. No 12, i.

in the attack of December 27. Perhaps the king knew nothing, perhaps his attitude was that attributed to him in the ballad—

“Oh, wae worth ye, Huntley,
And wherefore did ye sae?
I bade you bring him to me,
But forbade you him to slay.”

Taking all the evidence together, it would appear that the bonny Earl had long been marked down for death by the Lochnell party in Clan Diarmaid, by Huntly, and by Maitland. As Huntly is said to have procured a commission against Moray, signed by Maitland and Sir Robert Melville, that was probably extracted from James under his terror of Moray as an ally of Bothwell. Of “the great band” nothing was yet known, but it came to light after the conspiracy had been nearly fatal to Argyll, and serious consequences followed. On the day after Moray’s death a decree of Council deprived Huntly of all his commissions of lieutenantancy.<sup>54</sup> James summoned an army to meet at Perth on March 10 and pursue the Earl, but he offered to “underlie trial,” and entered himself a prisoner at Blackness.<sup>55</sup> He was allowed to slip away, as usual, in spite of the tumults of the populace and the indignation of the preachers. They wished, as successors of the apostles, to excommunicate the slayer of the bonny Earl; but James “grudged that the besetters of the abbey,” Bothwell and the others, escaped the censure of the Kirk. He seems to have forgotten that Bothwell was, or feigned to be, a Protestant and had only attacked a king.<sup>56</sup> The preachers were very slow to censure any offender against their sovereign. Whoever was guilty as to Moray, Maitland was the sufferer. “The queen and others that favoured Bothwell” caused him to be removed from power, and he retired to Lethington (March 30, 1592).

Mar and the new Earl of Morton (not Maxwell, but William Douglas of Lochleven) succeeded to office. Bothwell made interest with “his loving brethren the ministers and elders of Edinburgh.” He gave “their godly wisdoms” a curious account of his own recent proceedings. As to his dealing with Spain against our Zion, the facts were these: In the Parliament after Mary’s death Maitland induced Bothwell and the other nobles to swear to avenge the queen. Spanish agents took the occasion to insinuate themselves in the favour of Bothwell and the other patriots.

Maitland took the same course till he saw that Huntly, not he, was to have the handling of the Spanish gold (which Bruce kept out of Huntly's clutches), and so Maitland turned good Protestant and friend to England. This is all very probable, considering the morals of the statesmen concerned. Next, as to Bothwell's conspiring against James with witches, the evidence is that of "poor beggars." Maitland would have had James proceed summarily against Bothwell, just as he and his "friends" (that is, Lethington) would long ago have had the Regent Murray take off Queen Mary (after her capture at Carberry Hill in June 1567). Bothwell thus repeats what Randolph frankly told Lethington, that he "had advised to take presently the life from her," Mary having, as she said, evidence that would hang Lethington. Bothwell then accused Maitland, himself a partaker in Darnley's murder, with having helped Sir James Balfour, who supplied the powder, to draw out the indictment against Morton. All this was true enough. Bothwell, taking the old line of the noblesse, averred that Maitland was worse than Cochran, hanged at the bridge of Lauder, under James III. Maitland is "the puddockstool [fungus] of a night," Bothwell is "an ancient cedar." The apology breaks off here, but it enables us to understand the feelings of the nobles generally towards a counsellor who, though of family more ancient than Bothwell's own, was not of high rank.<sup>57</sup>

Maitland must have seen that, with a past like his, and with the nobles against him, he must seek the support of the Kirk. James, too, was exceedingly unpopular, both with the preachers and the populace, for the matter of Moray's death, and he went in daily fear of Bothwell. Adamson he had already thrown to the wolves: now he cast to them the whole fabric of Episcopacy.

The Parliament of April-June 1592 was intended to forfeit Bothwell. But it secured, as James Melville says, "the Ratification of the Liberty of the Trew Kirk," and the abrogation of the Black Acts of 1584. Melville attributes James's concessions to fear of Bothwell, of popular hatred stimulated by ballads on the bonny Earl Moray, and of "public threatening of God's judgments thereupon from pulpits."<sup>58</sup> "The charter of the liberties of the Church" was passed; and the Kirk flourished with all her powers of jurisdiction, discipline, inquisition, and excommunication. If these powers were exercised in their full sense, and as the extreme Protestants had always desired to use them, persecution must ensue. The laws against Catholics, involving imprisonment, confiscation, exile, and, in the last resort, death, would be enforced. The nobles had hitherto always restrained the desire of the extreme party to extirpate idolaters, and at this hour some thirteen of the great nobles were Catholics, while other men of their rank stood by their order. Thus what the preachers were likely to demand was what the king dared not, and did not desire to grant.

The settlement of June 1592 is regarded by Dr M'Crie, the learned biographer of Andrew Melville, as "not without its defects." Nearly all that the Second Book of Discipline had demanded was granted. But the General Assembly was not permitted to choose the time and place of its own meetings, which would seem to imply that it could not hold special meetings whenever it seemed opportune to exercise political pressure. "The liberties of the people were fettered by the continuance of lay patronage."

The ideal of the Kirk was that ministers should be selected "by the judgment of the elders, and consent of the congregation," in each instance. No minister was to be "intruded" on a congregation without "lawful election, and the consent of the people."<sup>59</sup> Sometimes, it seems, "the votes of the congregation at large" elected the minister, or they chose electors, or they referred the matter to the presbytery. Once duly elected, by popular choice or consent, the minister appears (at least according to many opinions, of which some are cited) to have been regarded as a supreme judge, and successor to the privileges of the apostles. Nominally, this applied only to matters spiritual, but these in practice included politics. These must be conducted according to "the Word of God," and the preachers were the inspired interpreters of the Word of God. On this point we must keep insisting. Democratic election, by congregations, supplied a theocratic Government, imperium in imperio; and this was the real cause of the coming civil wars and persecutions. James and his son chose to resist the encroachments on the power of the State by "intruding" Episcopacy on a recalcitrant people, which fought and suffered for "liberty of conscience." The strife only ended by the gradual resigning of claims to inspired interference—a resignation caused in part by the drastic measures of Claverhouse and Lauderdale, in part by the general decadence of the old original spirit of the Calvinistic Reformation.

The Parliament that set up Presbyterianism forfeited Bothwell,* who riposted with an attempt to capture James at Falkland (June 27). A warning was posted on the palace gate: the wife of Halkett of Pitfirrane and the wife of the Master of Gray were accused. The Master himself (July 14) calmly informed Cecil that not only he and Bothwell but the whole body of the nobility "were united for the maintenance of God's cause, the reformation of Church matters, the preservation of their king's honour, and such settled dealings with England that their country may not be made the footstool of foreigners."<sup>60</sup> Both the Master and Bothwell were welcomed in England, and Bruce, the preacher, declared to James that the claim of the Bothwell raiders was to secure justice for the death of Moray. He requested James "to humble himself upon his knees." The king was so far from humbling himself upon his knees that "he stood to his own purgation." "The raiders," he said, "pretended no such matter as to seek justice for the last murder." A young woman, the daughter of a saddler in Aberdeen, was also moved to come and admonish James. She handed to him a paper: "after he had read a little of it he fell a laughing that he could scarce stand on his feet."<sup>61</sup>

While James was fleeing up and down the country before Bothwell, a mobile foe, a pretty romantic event occurred. The young laird of Logie, in one version, had brought Bothwell quietly into Dalkeith Castle, where James lay. Logie was arrested and handed over to the Guard. But Logie was on affectionate terms with Margaret Vinstar, a maid of honour of the queen. She therefore went to the captain of the Guard when James was asleep, and said that the king wished to see Logie. The soldiers brought him to James's chamber door, he entered with his lady-love, the guardsmen remained outside, and Margaret let Logie out of the King's window. The fancy of the novelist could not invent a neater escape. The queen stood up for the maid of honour, James probably laughed—at all events he pardoned Logie, who married his Margaret.<sup>62</sup>

While anarchy prevailed, while Atholl and Mackintosh ravaged Huntly's lands, while the Master of Gray came back into James's favour, while the guerilla, Bothwell, subsidised by Spain, was harboured in Edinburgh, and flashed like a meteor through Scotland, Mr Walter Row, a famous preacher, showed the real mark at which he and his brethren shot. "Upon the Lord's day, the 19th November, Mr Walter Row, in his sermon, said that the king might be excommunicated, in case of contumacy, and disobedience to the will of God."<sup>63</sup> Now the preachers were the expositors of the "will of God," and it follows that whenever they disapproved of the king's proceedings they could practically proclaim him an outlaw.

* In the list of his supporters are the names of all the other Bothwell's "Lambs." We find Ormiston, Hepburns, Douglasses (illegitimate scions of the Regent Morton and others), Pringles, Leirmonths, and Ninian Chirnside, the dealer with the wizard, later noted as a friend of Logan of Restalrig (Act. Parl. Scot., iii. 528).

Thus threatened and put at on every side (for the Catholic nobles were entering into intrigues with Spain), James took the desperate step of calling Arran to Court. Arran he was no longer—the real bearer of the title, Queen Mary's old wooer, was still alive, a maniac. But the name of Arran may still mark the intrepid Stewart, of the Ochiltree House, who dragged down Morton, and fell after the success of the Raid of Stirling. The godly remonstrated with James; James replied that Bruce, the preacher, had harboured Bothwell, a prodigal of whom the Kirk was tender. So preacher and king were brawling, as they were at all seasons. Next Sunday the Edinburgh pulpits were thumped to the tune of Arran's misdeeds, though two of the ministers, by James's desire, also inveighed against Bothwell. Arran met some of the preachers, but he could not move them, and he "came not to Court again." James was aware of a danger which he failed to parry. He bade Lady Gowrie, widow of the leader of the Raid of Ruthven, leave her house in Holyrood (August 1592). She returned to that nest of conspiracy, and succeeded in trapping the king.<sup>64</sup>

The attempt at Arran's restoration proves the desperate estate of James. The reader must naturally have wondered how Elizabeth was behaving towards a kinsman so begirdled by perils, and so destitute of comfort. She had Bowes as her representative at Holyrood,—Bowes, the constant ally of the enemies of the king. He wrote again and again to ask what part he ought to take as regarded Bothwell. His questions were unanswered. Bothwell was entertained on the English Marches by Musgrave, the captain of Bewcastle. Elizabeth held him as a card to be played at the fitting moment, just as she had held Murray, Morton, Angus, and the other foes of Mary and of James. Meanwhile the Northern and Catholic party in Scotland—Huntly, Errol, and Angus—knew what was to be expected from the restored Kirk. James had taken nothing by his surrender to the preachers; they still threatened, still insulted, and, if they did not openly back Bothwell, they regarded him as "a sanctified plague" for James's behoof, and they did nothing in the way of excommunicating a noble who addressed "their godly wisdoms" in terms so flattering. They had lost "the ministers' king," the pious Angus, cut off by witchcraft. His successor in the earldom, the Angus of 1592, was a Catholic. He was implicated in the great Catholic conspiracy, which now, being detected, filled Scotland with rage and horror, the affair of the Spanish Blanks.

After the execution of Queen Mary, the Catholic Powers, especially Spain and the Pope, found, as we have seen, that the English and Scottish Catholics were divided in policy. Cardinal Allen and Father Parsons, with other English managers, were in favour of a Spanish invasion of England (hence the Armada), while Father Creighton and other Scots held that

"He who would England win Must with Scotland first begin," and credulously believed that James would be converted. On the failure of the Armada the neglected Scottish Catholics, as we have seen, began to ask Philip to come their way (February 1589). We have described the capture of Pringle with letters to Spain from Huntly, Morton (Maxwell), and Lord Claude, and the scene when these letters were read aloud before their authors. The affair of Brig o' Dee followed, but the conspiracy smouldered on, and it is probable that James knew of and tampered with it. In the early part of 1592 it was known to the English Government (probably through Pourie himself) that Ogilvie, the younger of Pourie, was to be sent on this business to Spain. Pourie, of whom more hereafter, went not; but on December 27 one of the Border Kers, George, brother of Mark, Lord Newbottle, was seized in the Cumbrae Isles by the Paisley minister, Andrew Knox, an energetic man, backed by students of Glasgow University. Ker was trying to carry to Spain letters from Huntly, Angus, Errol, Fintry (an honest Catholic, then in prison, and a friend of Queen Mary), and others of the party. There were also "blanks," unwritten sheets of paper, signed by the chief plotters, and to be filled up by Father Creighton. He was to insert above the signatures the terms of a treaty which he was to arrange with Philip for an invasion by the Spanish. Letters from Father Gordon (Huntly's uncle) to Father Creighton, and a number of letters to exiles, were also seized.

Angus, on this discovery, was put in ward, but James was mainly moved by the English patronage of Bothwell and the non-arrival of his English pension. Ker was tortured in the boot; he confessed that a Spanish descent on Scotland was desired. Later he was allowed to escape.<sup>65</sup> The private letters in the packet reveal the condition of the country. "Universally, in all shires, many deadly feuds, with great and most odious slaughter, without punishment, reif and oppression through all the country. God wait [?] if the Highlanders lie idle. The Macfarlanes are worse than the Clan Gregor. Alas! the great hership [plundering] of the poor, by these, in all parts where there are any goods." It was easy for the preachers to blame the king as regards these excesses; but James was destitute: police he had none, magistrates were parties to the crimes; the royal Guard was imbecile, and it was found impossible to keep Bothwell out of the precincts of the royal residences. The country was practically in collusion with the marauder, who was distinctly patronised, or at least all uncensured, by the preachers.

On the discovery of the Blanks James was summoned to Edinburgh early in January 1593. There were suspicions that he would favour the conspirators of the Blanks, who were not much less loyal to him than the other factions among his people. To be sure, they proposed to capture him and hold him at the disposal of Philip, to deal with him as his majesty orders.<sup>66</sup> A deputation was sent to the king: it included Andrew Ker of Faldonside, with Bruce, Andrew Melville, and other preachers. James rebuked them for having held a convention without his knowledge, but promised to try the conspirators. James Melville (January 14) preached against the king's grandfather and mother. At last, January 15, it was agreed that James should be allowed to have a guard of 200 men. To keep him without a guard of any force was the usual economy, as every one knew that his own party might at any moment wish to invade the royal person. James (January 19) mingled his grievance against England for fostering Bothwell with promises of severe measures against the Catholics. He himself would march against Huntly.<sup>67</sup> While the host was summoned to proceed against Huntly on February 25, while Fintry (who lay in prison) was ordered to execution, refusing to save himself by turning Protestant,<sup>68</sup> Elizabeth was sending Lord Burgh as an envoy to James. On February 13 Angus escaped, probably by collusion, from Edinburgh Castle. On February 17 James started on his march to Aberdeen, and Bothwell had an address to the preachers placarded at the cross.<sup>69</sup>

The Catholic leaders, as usual, ran away, on this occasion as far as Caithness. But James was suspected by Burgh of favouring the rebels, and it was plain that he did not intend to ruin them by confiscation. That policy never prospered, in fact was very seldom permitted. Mary was not allowed to forfeit Murray and Morton: the great families, though in separate factions, were too near kin to let any of them be ruined. Bothwell by this time was in friendly communication with Cecil, and Elizabeth was sending Mr Locke to announce her acceptance of Bothwell's offers.<sup>70</sup> James roundly informed Burgh that if Elizabeth persisted in supporting Bothwell, "not only our amity is at an end, but I shall be enforced to join in friendship with her greatest enemies for my own safety."<sup>71</sup> James was, of course, bitterly censured for his leniency to the Catholic lords. But, apart from his want of power, they were his last resort against the endless treacheries of Elizabeth, who systematically aided his dangerous and insolent personal foes. Through her ally, Bothwell, she was to win another triumph of insult over the son of her victim, Mary.

It was once more the turn of the General Assembly (April 24) to increase the perplexities of James. They demanded "that all Papists within the realm may be punished according to the laws of God and this realm."<sup>72</sup> The laws of God, as far as they are published in Holy Scripture, do not, indeed, denounce fine, imprisonment, exile, and death against Catholics. But penalties are denounced against idolaters in certain parts of the Old Testament, and the preachers (who alone could interpret the Word of God) identified Catholics with idolaters. If, again, any one asked why the preachers were infallible interpreters of the divine will (as Ninian Winzet asked Knox), the answer would seem to be that parish congregations are inspired in their popular elections of preachers, a dogma which, no doubt, could be supported by judiciously "waled" texts. But James could not, and would not, carry out to the full the extirpation of his Catholic subjects. In May and June intrigues went on for the restoration either of Arran or of Maitland. Every kind of violent act, abduction, and murder was frequent in Edinburgh. The queen, for some personal reason, was opposed to Maitland's return to power, and Bowes tried, but vainly, to prevent the despatch of Robert Melville as an envoy to Elizabeth. At the English Court Archibald Douglas had almost dropped out of sight; but he was still residing in London, in a "semi-official" way. As far back as June 1592 a sympathetic correspondent in Scotland told him that "the ministers is sorry for Bothwell," who, if at liberty, "would put all the papists out of the country."<sup>73</sup> It is a humorous fact that Father Creighton, at this very time, reckoned Bothwell in a list of Scottish Catholics, probably with reason. Bothwell gulled the Kirk (Jesuit Archives).

It was alleged in England that James, too, was mixed up in the intrigue with Spain, and apparently that his advice to Spain was seized with the papers of George Ker, but suppressed in the interest of the king. We have seen that at the time when the Spanish Blanks were seized the Kirk suspected James at least of partiality to the Catholics who signed them. Calderwood writes: "Mr John Davidson, in his Diary, recordeth on the 26th of May (1593) that among the letters of the traffickers intercepted were [sic] found one to the Prince of Parma, which touched the king with knowledge and approbation of the trafficking, and promise of assistance, &c., but that it was not thought expedient to publish it. Mr John was acquaint with the discovery, and all the intercepted letters."<sup>74</sup>

Now it seems certain that there actually was a manuscript of James's among the papers found with George Ker. It is printed in the 'Hatfield Calendar' (iv. 214). The piece is really a balancing, after the manner used by Cecil and Robinson Crusoe, of the pros and cons of accepting Spanish assistance. It may be of March-June 1592. James gives first the reasons which may be put forward in favour of instant action by Spain. On the other side is the unreadiness of Scotland. "Since I can scarce keep myself from some of their invasions, much less can I make them invade other countries." He would prefer the attempt to die down, as too many are in the secret. If anything is to be done, he would prefer to do it himself, with some small help of foreign men and money. But he knew that he could not do it, and a successful invasion by Philip was not in his interest. He threw cold water on the whole plot. If once he had Scotland settled, and was in the mind, he might forewarn Spain, and "attain to our purpose." The paper is indorsed, "Copy of the Scotch King's instructions to Spain, which should have been sent by Pourie Oge" (Ogilvie of Pourie), "but thereafter were concredit to Mr John Ker, and withdrawn" (not published) "at his taking for safety of his Majesty's honour" (1593).

Any one who reads the whole document will find that James has no heart for the project, that he is merely "driving time," balancing arguments, and feebly dreaming of what great things he might do "when I like, hereafter." No mortal would send such a paper as "Instructions to Spain," if he wanted to keep Spain friendly to his purpose. Only prejudice could style the paper "Instructions to Spain." Still less is the document, as Calderwood quotes Davidson, "a letter to the Prince of Parma." James wanted "fewer strange princes in the secret of it." The paper may have been meant for Father Creighton, to quiet that bustling priest, or it may have been a secret memorandum which fell into Pourie's hands, Pourie being an impudent rogue and double spy. The memorandum was written many months before Ker's intended start to Spain with the Blanks; but, on the other hand, the business for which the Blanks were wanted had been arranged by Creighton before James's memorandum was written, as Ker confessed under torture. We can only say that the memorandum, if really known to the preachers, must have inflamed their habitual suspicion of James. But he never was on the side of Huntly and the other Catholic peers. They knew and said as much in reports to Philip.<sup>75</sup>

He sent Robert Melville to London, and Melville there found Archibald Douglas still in touch with the English Court, and supported at the expense of Elizabeth.<sup>76</sup> Elizabeth in July saw Melville, and wrote one of her unintelligible pieces of euphuism to James, avoiding details as to her support of Bothwell.<sup>77</sup> At about the same time (June 22) Maitland at last returned to Court, attended by Hamilton, Montrose, Seton, Glencairn, Eglinton, and others. Lennox, on the other side, who shared the hatred against Maitland of the queen, Bothwell, and most of the nobles, had Mar, Morton, Home, and the Master of Glamis among his backers. Arran was not far off, passions were inflamed by various feuds, Maitland withdrew to Lethington (June 28).<sup>78</sup> In these stormy days Parliament met, and Bothwell was forfeited, but the Catholic earls remained untouched. For this leniency the king's Advocate, Makgill, gave reasons in law, but the preachers were infuriated. Davidson (July 22) imprecated "sanctified plagues" for James's behoof. As that "sanctified plague," Bothwell, surprised and seized James on July 24, by that very trap, Lady Gowrie's house, which James had tried to render harmless, Mr Davidson's prayer was instantly effectual: he was a prophet as well as a poet. The ungodly might even suggest that Davidson knew what was impending, and that his inspiration had no source more divine or remote than the English Embassy. Elizabeth had sent Mr Locke to Scotland, and he, with Colville, a veteran intriguer, and Bothwell, had secretly met in Edinburgh and organised their plot.

Some years had passed since the king's last capture. It is to be noted that such attempts continued to be made almost till the year when he attained the crown of England. In many instances these assaults had the support, or at least the sympathy, of the preachers. It is improbable that the king, and Scotland, could ever have escaped the sufferings consequent on such anarchic methods except by the turn of events which placed James on the throne of a more powerful and more law-abiding country than his ancestor's kingdom. The combinations of lawless nobles and powerful preachers must, but for the English succession, have been fatal to Scottish civilisation.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER XIII.

- <sup>1</sup> Thorpe, i. 542. <sup>2</sup> Calderwood, iv. 611.
<sup>3</sup> Illustrations of Scottish History, Miss Warrender, p. 27.
<sup>4</sup> Spottiswoode, ii. 365-371.
<sup>5</sup> Spanish State Papers, iv. 45, 51, 100, 138, 145, 308, as to the obduracy of James. Also pp. 179, 204, 227, 320, 427, 429, as to the Catholic traffickers.
<sup>6</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, i. 543, 544.
<sup>7</sup> Privy Council Register, iv. 157, 158.
<sup>8</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iii. 243; Murdin, pp. 587, 588.
<sup>9</sup> The report of the case is derived from the Register of the Privy Council (iv. 166-168).
<sup>10</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iii. 258, 259. May 22, Richard to Archibald Douglas.
<sup>11</sup> Gowrie had no counsel, Norfolk had none; Archibald Douglas, in his collusive trial, had pleaded his own case, as he was well qualified to do. He vowed that he "trusted to his innocence, and desired no prolocutor." The Earl of Orkney had prolocutors (1615). In 1600, in the Gowrie case, the accused were dead, and their representatives dared not appear.
<sup>12</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., iii. 427-521. <sup>13</sup> Spanish State Papers, iv. 141.
<sup>14</sup> Privy Council Register, iv. 204, 205.

- <sup>15</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iii. 295, 296.      <sup>16</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iii. 299-301.
<sup>17</sup> Autobiography of James Melville, p. 260.
<sup>18</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iii. 307, 317; Calderwood, iv. 677.
<sup>19</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iii. 313, 326; March 18, 1588.
<sup>20</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iii. 322.
<sup>21</sup> Privy Council Register, iv. 277.
<sup>22</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iii. 326.
<sup>23</sup> Calderwood, iv. 678, 679; Privy Council Register, iv. 286-293.
<sup>24</sup> Calderwood, iv. 679, 680.
<sup>25</sup> Border Calendar, ii. 487.
<sup>26</sup> Melville (the Rev.), pp. 262-264.
<sup>27</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iii. 349, 350.
<sup>28</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, i. 551, 552.
<sup>29</sup> Ashton to Hunsdon, Thorpe, Calendar, i. 552.      <sup>30</sup> Calderwood, v. 1-3.
<sup>31</sup> Calderwood, v. 14-37; Thorpe, Calendar, i. 555, 556.
<sup>32</sup> Calderwood, v. 53, 54.
<sup>33</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, i. 557.
<sup>34</sup> Privy Council Register, iv. 371-373.
<sup>35</sup> This Angus, successor to the good Presbyterian Earl, was Douglas of Glenberrie. He died soon afterwards, and his son, the new Angus, was a Catholic. He was served heir to his father in November 1591.
<sup>36</sup> Privy Council Register, iv. 371-381; Calderwood, v. 54-56; Spottiswoode, ii. 395; Thorpe, Calendar, i. 559.
<sup>37</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, i. 560.
<sup>38</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 563.
<sup>39</sup> Calderwood, ii. 57, 58.
<sup>40</sup> Papers of the Master of Gray, p. 157.
<sup>41</sup> Papers of the Master of Gray, pp. 161-164.
<sup>42</sup> Spottiswoode, ii. 400-404.
<sup>43</sup> Spottiswoode, ii. 408. Compare Calderwood, v. 95, 96, who says nothing of the king's threat.
<sup>44</sup> Calderwood, v. 100-104.
<sup>45</sup> For "Witchcraft" see Mr Gurnly, in 'Phantasms of the Living.'
<sup>46</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 591; Border Calendar, i. 379, No. 709.
<sup>47</sup> Calderwood, v. 132.
<sup>48</sup> Calderwood, v. 106, 112.
<sup>49</sup> James Melville, pp. 272-276.
<sup>50</sup> Calderwood, v. 140, 141; Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 600.
<sup>51</sup> Calderwood, v. 142, 143.
<sup>52</sup> Gregory, History of the Western Highlands and Isles, pp. 245-253.
<sup>53</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 600.
<sup>54</sup> Privy Council Register, iv. 725.      <sup>55</sup> Privy Council Register, iv. 733.
<sup>56</sup> Calderwood, v. 148.      <sup>57</sup> Calderwood, v. 150-156.
<sup>58</sup> Melville, p. 294.      <sup>59</sup> Second Book of Discipline, iii. 12.
<sup>60</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 609.      <sup>61</sup> Calderwood, v. 169.
<sup>62</sup> Bowes to Burghley, August 15, Thorpe, Calendar, p. 611; Calderwood, v. 173, 174. See also, in 'Border Minstrelsy,' the ballad of "The Laird of Logie," and in Child's 'English and Scottish Ballads.'
<sup>63</sup> Calderwood, v. 179.
<sup>64</sup> Calderwood, v. 186-190. Bowes to Burghley, December 4, Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 618. For Lady Gowrie, cf. Thorpe, ii. 611, No. 6.

<sup>65</sup> The letters are in Calderwood, v. 192-214. See also Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 618-623. Also 'A Discoverie of the unnatural and traitorous Conspiracie of Scottish Papists,' published by the king's command. John Norton, London. 1593. For the Spanish view, Spanish State Papers, iv. 603-606.

<sup>66</sup> Spanish State Papers, iv. 606.

<sup>67</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 622.

<sup>68</sup> Forbes-Leith, Narratives of Scottish Catholics, pp. 220, 221. Quoting Father Tyrie's report, State Papers, Elizabeth, MS., vol. 1. No. 4. Apparently not Calendared.

<sup>69</sup> Calderwood, v. 231.

<sup>70</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, v. 624-626.

<sup>71</sup> Tytler, ix. 89, citing Warrender MSS. These, for long supposed to have perished by fire, have recently been rediscovered, and are of importance.

<sup>72</sup> Calderwood, v. 241.

<sup>73</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iv. 206. Francis Tennant, a bourgeois spy, later hanged, to Archibald Douglas, June 4, 1592.

<sup>74</sup> Calderwood, v. 251.

<sup>75</sup> Spanish State Papers, iv. 588-592, 603-607. Mr Hume Brown (ii. 216) says that James had a secret understanding with the Catholic earls, and cites 'Spanish State Papers,' iv. 603. But compare the same series, iv. 606 and 617, and Major Martin Hume's 'Treason and Plot' with Mr T. G. Law in 'Miscellany of the Scottish History Society,' vol. i. I venture to think that James did little worse than avoid the last extremities with the Catholic earls, keeping in touch with their schemes as an ultimate resource. Cf. p. 388, note.

<sup>76</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iv. 334.

<sup>77</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iv. 344.

<sup>78</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 629, 630.

CHAPTER XIV.

INTRIGUES OF SPAIN, ENGLAND, AND BOTHWELL.

1593-1595.

BOTHWELL'S new enterprise was at once the most grotesque and the most picturesque of those to which James fell a victim. A Stewart and a Hepburn, Bothwell was aided by the clan of which his king was the chief. Lennox, and Ochiltree, and Atholl, all in the plot, were all Stewarts (the existing House of Atholl are Murrays of Tullibardine in the male line and Stewarts by female descent). The Countess of Atholl was a daughter of Lady Gowrie, whose revenge for her husband's execution in 1584, and for the insults and injuries inflicted on herself by Arran, had never yet been sated. The House of Gowrie had been restored in 1585, on Arran's fall, to its lands and dignities; its head, John, Earl of Gowrie, was at this time a youth of sixteen or seventeen, who had been studying in the University of Edinburgh under the celebrated minister, Mr Rollock. Probably he was now at work on his thesis for his Master's degree, which he took in August. He was then an ardent Protestant, and we shall presently find him already engaged in a revolutionary conspiracy against the king. We are not informed, however, that he was present or took any part in Bothwell's new enterprise, though it had for its base the town house of the Gowrie family—the house which James had held in suspicion (p. 362).

The house of the Gowries was behind and adjacent to the Palace of Holyrood, and thither on the night of July 23 Bothwell, with the basely adventurous John Colville, was secretly conveyed. Between the Gowrie mansion and the palace was a covered passage patent at all times. Coming through this passage, from the palace, Lady Atholl led back Bothwell and Colville into James's ante-chamber, hid them behind the arras, and locked the door of the queen's chamber. Here, it seems probable, they waited while the gentlemen of the clan of Stewart took possession of the outer and inner courts of Holyrood in the grey of the July dawn. James, early astir, was "private in a retiring-room," his majesty's clothes were loose, and "the points of his hose not knitted up," when Colville and Bothwell appeared before him with drawn swords in their hands. Bothwell said to the king, "Lo, my good bairn, you that have given out that I sought your life, it is now in this hand!" So Bothwell later told the Dean of Durham.<sup>1</sup> James, with a cry of treason, fled as well as he could to the queen's chamber. The door was locked. He turned and called the intruders false traitors, bidding them strike if they durst. Bothwell and Colville knelt down, Atholl and Ochiltree arrived and interceded for the impudent suppliants. James derided their pretence of asking for forgiveness and offering to "thole an assize" on the old charge of witchcraft. He would not live a prisoner and dishonoured. Bothwell, still kneeling, kissed the hilt of his sword and offered it to James, lowering his head and tossing aside his long love-locks. James rose and took Bothwell apart into the embrasure of a window. News had now reached the citizens, "the bells were rung backward"; the burgesses, however, gathered but slowly. They may have heard Davidson's sermon; was it for them to interfere between the king and "sanctified plagues"? Hume of North Berwick, with a few other gentlemen, came under the king's windows, offering to rescue him or lose their lives. Sir James Melville was with Hume, and "cried up at the window of his majesty's chamber, asking how he did? He came to the window, and said all would be well enough,—he had agreed with them on certain conditions, 'which are presently to be put into writing. Therefore,' said he, 'cause so many of the town as are come to my relief to stay in the abbey kirkyard till I send them further word, and return again within half an hour yourself.'" But few of the town had gathered, and these now retired, "so great was their discontent for the time that many desired a change." Melville then went to the rooms of the Danish ambassadors, who sent him back to make anxious inquiries. James appeared at the window with the queen and said that all was well. Melville was later admitted to see James, quoted Plutarch, and prosed in the manner of Polonius. Later James met the ambassadors, but could not tell them whether he was captive or not. Captive he was; a new guard was appointed, under Ochiltree, one of the conspirators.<sup>2</sup> There was something obscure and unfathomable in this plot. Bothwell, we shall see, met the Dean of Durham, who on August 15 favoured Burghley with a second account of his interview with Bothwell, fuller than that of August 5. The Queen of Scotland, the Dean said, was "not unacquainted with his greatest affairs," and the Dean seems to hint that she was better for England to deal with than the king. Moreover, she was jealous of Morton's "fayre daughter." A letter had been written as to the succession to the Scottish throne, intercepted, and brought to Bothwell. The Dean ends by strenuously recommending Bothwell to Elizabeth as "likeliest to do her faithfulest service in that country." It is useless to guess at the intrigue as to the Scottish throne: it is not credible that the young Gowrie was thought of, on the strength of his fabled Tudor descent.<sup>3</sup>

Whatever Bothwell's secret purposes and his relations with James's queen may have been, the conditions which he accepted from James were these: Full remission of all offences for himself and his accomplices, to be ratified in the Parliament of November 1593. Home, Maitland, the Master of Glamis, and Sir George Hume to be dismissed from office; Bothwell and the rest meanwhile to retire "where they thought good." Lennox, Atholl, the Master of Gray, the Provost, the bailies, and six preachers signed this treaty;<sup>4</sup> "the ministers of the Kirk showed themselves highly gratified at Bothwell's return," says Bowes.

Such was the plot, directed from England by the Ministers of Elizabeth, and worked by the Stewarts and Ruthvens of Gowrie. It demonstrates the utter helplessness of James, who, denounced by his clergy, lost the services of his father's murderer, Maitland; and, betrayed by his own clan, was thrown on the mercy of his most insolent rebel. If, in such circumstances as these, James was unwilling to extirpate his Catholic subjects, and tempted to look abroad for the assistance denied him by his kinswoman, Elizabeth, by his clan, and by his clergy, perhaps he cannot be very severely blamed. His Catholic earls, the Spanish party in Scotland, did blame him for keeping them in hand while he had no intention of joining them.<sup>5</sup>

Bothwell now rode to Berwick, met John Carey (son of Lord Hunsdon), professed his gratitude to Elizabeth, and announced his hope of being made "Lord Lieutenant of the whole country." The ambition of his accomplice, John Colville, was to be Secretary of State! Bothwell then rode to Durham, on his southward way, quartered himself on Toby Matthew, Dean of Durham, already mentioned, and regaled the horrified dignity of a respectable Church by a lively account of his performances.<sup>6</sup> He had not betrayed Elizabeth to James, he said; and he had told the king that he might forget the death of Mary, as James had forgiven it. He advised that a plan of Elizabeth's for uniting the Catholic and Protestant parties in Scotland should be deferred, "lest the multitude of the one may in time, and that soon, wreck the other, being fewer in number, and so become rulers of the king." Hence it would appear that the Catholics were still a numerical majority, which is unexpected. Bothwell then wrote a letter to Elizabeth, "Most Renowned Empress," kissing "her heavenly hands." Had he been an English subject, Bothwell would have rivalled Essex—he wrote in the style that Gloriana loved. He picked up on the Borders some hounds and horses for James, and was "cleansed" of witchcraft at his assize on August 10. Being in power, he was acquitted, but a letter to him from John Colville, later, makes it very probable that Bothwell had really tried an experiment in poisoning James, by aid of Richard Graham, the wizard. He had only dealt with the wizard Graham, he said, in the interests of the dying Angus.<sup>7</sup>

From that day it is almost impossible to paint the maelstrom of eddies, waves, and cross-currents of tides upon which James swam like a cork, now submerged, now visible to the anxious eye. He owed his life, probably, to the circumstance that he had no successor in whose interest it was worth while to kill the king. Hamilton had a better claim than Lennox, among the Stewarts Bothwell was of an illegitimate branch, Atholl and Ochiltree were much too remote, Gowrie can hardly have been thought of, and, in any case, all, though banded together by the blood-feud for the bonny Earl Moray, were too jealous of each other to attempt a change of dynasty. James's queen was a Bothwellian: chiefly because she hated Maitland, partly because she always opposed her husband, partly, perhaps, because Bothwell was "a gay gallant" and an amusing companion.

On the night of the day after Bothwell's acquittal on the charge of witchcraft James had arranged an escape. The Humes were at feud with the Hepburns,—the whole tangle is a mass of family feuds,—and Home was a Catholic. The idea was that Huntly should be ready with his Gordons, Home with his Humes, and, as James had an unwonted tendresse for the daughter of Morton (that is, Douglas of Lochleven), Morton also was in the affair. Three Erskines about the king's person were of the king's party, and two of his gentlemen, Lesley and Ogilvy, were reckoned trustworthy. James gave out that he was to ride to Falkland, but a speedy nag was intended to bear him to Morton's house, Lochleven, while Home was to attack the hostile faction in Edinburgh. But in the grey dawn of August 11 Lesley was detected as he stole through the palace grounds with James's ring and a letter for Home.<sup>8</sup> So wakeful a guerilla soldier as Bothwell was not to be caught asleep: the Erskines, Thomas and James, Ogilvy, and Lesley were handed over to Ochiltree's guardsmen, and a quarrel broke out between Bothwell and James. He would not leave the king, or let him out of his power, till he was formally restored by Parliament and had avenged the bonny Earl Moray. Bowes was called for, and protested, with an innocent air, against the enterprises of Bothwell. The preachers and burgesses arranged a modus vivendi, being, "after a sort," guarantors of the king's promises. Bothwell on one side, Maitland, Home, and the Master of Glamis on the other, were to avoid the Court till Parliament met in November. So Bruce, the preacher, wrote to the presbytery of Dunfermline (August 15).<sup>9</sup>

On September 9 a convention assembled at Stirling. A strange cross-current arose from the intrigues of Elizabeth and of Cecil's son, Sir Robert, who now was chief English manager of Scottish affairs. We have seen that Bothwell, immediately after the success at Holyrood, entertained the Dean of Durham with Elizabeth's plan for uniting Scottish Protestants and Catholics. How she expected fire and water to become bosom friends it is hard to understand, and Bowes (September 6) wrote to express his bewilderment. The arrangement could not be concealed from "£86£6"—that is, the preachers. As Huntly and the Catholics were certain to demand religious toleration, the preachers would be purely frantic. Like Lord Hamilton, when James ventured to hint at toleration, they would exclaim, "Then are we all gone, then are we all gone, then are we all gone! If there were no more to withstand, I will withstand."<sup>10</sup>

The desperate intrigue, however, certainly went on till Elizabeth presently shook off Huntly and the Catholics, with whom she was certainly intriguing as late as September 6. Elizabeth, indeed, had apparently thrown over Bothwell, in a letter of August 23, bidding James "kingly and resolutely make his unsound subjects know his power," and expressing her doubt whether the news of his arrangement with his rebel was not an auditory hallucination of her own.<sup>11</sup> On September 6 Bowes wrote that "Huntly and his friends will go forward agreeable to their offers to her majesty,"<sup>12</sup> though he also expressed, as we saw, his perplexity about the arrangement. At Linlithgow (September 11) Bothwell was apprised that he must not come near James, though he would be formally restored by Parliament in November; after which he must quit the realm till he had licence to return.<sup>13</sup> James, in fact, had recovered his liberty, and he left Stirling with Lennox. Why Lennox had deserted Bothwell is uncertain, but he may have heard of his ambitious design to become Lieutenant-General of the whole kingdom. Mar and Morton accompanied James to Lochleven, and there he was joined by Home and the gentlemen of his name, with the Master of Glamis. All these, by the original compact with Bothwell, had been debarred the Court. Maitland with the Kers of Cessford also came to James, and it was clear that the Stewart-Ruthven-Bothwell combination against their chief was broken up, while on September 22, by public proclamation at Edinburgh Cross, Bothwell was forbidden to approach the king under pain of treason.<sup>14</sup> Ochiltree ceased to be captain of the Guard; the post was given to Home, a Catholic: to be sure the Guard never interfered with any gentleman who had a fancy for kidnapping his monarch.

Elizabeth remarked (October 7) that, inured as she was to Scottish revolutions, "I should never leave wondering at such strange and uncouth actions. . . . One while I receive a writ of oblivion and forgiveness, then a revocation with new additions of later consideration." "Sometimes, some you call traitors with proclaim" (meaning Huntly, Angus, and Errol), "and anon there must be no proof allowed, though never so apparent against them." Elizabeth had abandoned her intrigue with Huntly, hence these tears. "And for Bothwell! Jesus! Did ever any muse more than I that you could so quietly put up so temerarious indigne a fact. . . . I refer me to my own letters what doom I gave thereof." Elizabeth had a disinterested passion for lying: James, of course, knew perfectly well that Bothwell's shaft came out of her quiver.<sup>15</sup> Probably Elizabeth's letter was written after Carey (September 29) had given Cecil alarming news from Berwick. The king had nobody to whom he could intrust his personal safety except the Catholics. "There is nothing but peace, and seeking to link all the nobility together, which I hope will never be."<sup>16</sup>

The preachers were as little in love with peace as Carey. Tolerance in religion has become so much a commonplace to recent generations that we can scarcely understand the ferocity which the ministers of the Kirk were to display at this and other critical moments. But their behaviour is intelligible, if we accept the statements, already cited, of Archibald Douglas and of Bothwell. The Catholics may still have been—according to Bothwell, they were—the numerical majority in Scotland. There, as in England, they were denied the exercise of their faith by an organised revolutionary minority. The Indifferents, it is probable (or to the preachers it seemed probable), would openly desert the Kirk as soon as toleration was proclaimed. The Church is infinitely more agreeable than the Kirk to the natural man. Not to speak of the charms of her service, of her music and other ecclesiastical arts, the Church had thrown her sanction over holidays and harmless sports, over all the innocent traditional recreations and mummeries which Stubbes was reviling in 'The Anatomy of Abuses.' Relics of paganism, of agricultural magic, these May-day, or Easter, or Christmas amusements may have been, but all the offence had been purged from them: their original significance was lost, though now in many cases recovered by the researches of Mannhardt and Mr Frazer. To these things, if once toleration was granted, the populace would eagerly revert. They would gladly be emancipated, too, from the inquisitorial tyranny of kirk-sessions, the prurient prying into the details of private morals or absence of morals, a subject to which we shall return. It is the boast of writers who take the traditional view of the Reformation in Scotland, that it raised the moral tone of the country. To do this was the object of the Presbyterian clergy, but their own manifestos constantly bear testimony to their failure. Profanity, adultery, simple fornication, incest, murder, and robbery were rife, and this condition of morals was not peculiar to parishes inadequately served by ministers, or not "planted" with ministers at all.

Thanks to the ministers, education was relatively prosperous, and the University of St Andrews, under a scholar and Latin poet like Andrew Melville and his "Regents," was perhaps not inferior, in elegance and range of learning, to the same university to-day. But the education, for one reason or another, bore but scanty fruit in literature. In the June of the year with which we are concerned (1593) Christopher Marlowe died in London, a great poet in a throng of great poets. To compare with these what had Scotland to show? Of her poetry in that age, what remains in common knowledge except such ballads as "The Queen's Marie" and "The Bonny Earl Moray"?

Meanwhile the intolerance of the Kirk must have bred the ugly vice of religious hypocrisy. The crypto-Catholics and Indifferents were compelled to a hypocritical compliance with the Kirk. Writers like Mr Froude have applauded the honesty of the Reformers, men who would not pretend to believe in what they deemed to be a lie. But the pretence of this belief was enforced on reluctant Catholics. The coolest and darkest intriguer of the age, Logan of Restalrig, would end a treasonable letter with "Christ have you in His holy keeping." As to the public morals of the age, a whole generation after the Reformation, every page of this book testifies to their unspeakable iniquity. One thing was obvious to the preachers—admit toleration, and, as Hamilton said, "then are we all gone." The country would veer round to the ancient faith: Presbyterian excommunication, that cruel weapon, that "gully of absolute power," would become a jest. The ancient Church would return, and where would the holders of Church lands be? When we look at the patriotism of the persecuted English Catholics, in face of the Armada, we ask why these men were forbidden the exercise of a religion which left them true to their country? It might rather appear that tolerance would remove all temptation to treasonable dealings with France or Spain. The Scottish Catholics could only hope to escape a grinding persecution by aid of foreign Powers. It is impossible to pretend that the Protestants were ethically better men than the Catholics. But the preachers knew their own business. Grant toleration, "and then are we all gone," the Kirk and the lay holders of Church lands in Scotland would be swamped and lost in the reaction, and what the preachers believed to be "the Truth" would perish among men. They were as convinced, and as despotic, as St Dominic.

The king was known to be capable of tolerance, like his mother. In 1584 Father Holt had written, "He has evidently made up his mind to grant full liberty of worship, provided he can do so consistently with his own personal safety, and the peace of the country."<sup>17</sup> He had especially no wish to alarm the Catholics of England by proving himself a persecutor. Thus, for the preachers, the most drastic measures were a matter of life and death.

Fife, where the two Melvilles ruled, was foremost in the agitation. The Provincial Assembly met at St Andrews on September 25, 1593. Davidson was present—the most irreconcilable of the Brethren. The danger, he said, proceeded from “the defection of the king,” who had shaken off Bothwell, that sanctified plague. It was proposed to excommunicate the Catholic earls, who, when undergraduates at St Andrews, must have signed the Confession of Faith. James Melville pronounced the sentence, and delivered them to Satan. All who harboured them were placed under the same anathema. The sentence of these shepherds of the East Neuk was to be intimated in every kirk in the kingdom. A fast was declared to atone for many sins, and the persecution of the English Puritans, and the commercial intercourse with Spain. Three preachers were sent to scold Morton for dealing with idolaters. Home was given into the hands of Satan.

While the preachers thus employed the spiritual weapon, a new and very dangerous conspiracy against the king was rising in the North. Bothwell kept all the country south of Forth in agitation: he was now approached by a group of Northern lords. Atholl on October 8 wrote to him from Dunkeld, addressing him as “My Lord and Loving Brother.” He feared that the “Spanish factionaries,” Huntly, Errol, and Angus, were likely to win over the king, “to the imminent peril of religion,” and to the endangerment of relations with Elizabeth, “that most gracious and benign queen.” He therefore advised Bothwell to listen to Henry Locke, the man whom Cecil used in his darkest enterprises. Bothwell was to deal through Locke with Elizabeth, who had in that very week been expressing to James her horror of Bothwell! Atholl added that he would aid Bothwell against James, and that his allies were the Earls of Gowrie and Murray, the Masters of Montrose and Gray, and the Forbeses.<sup>18</sup>

James was not unaware of the machinations of Atholl and Gowrie. They were holding a convention at the Castle of Doune when James made a descent on them. Atholl had warning and fled: Montrose and Gowrie awaited the king's arrival, "and wer hardlie persevit be the king's companie, and in perrele to have been slayne," had not Lord Hamilton rescued them.<sup>19</sup> Spottiswoode says that Bothwell had trusted with Atholl at Stirling for an effort against the king for October 1; that Atholl arrived, but found that James had gone to Linlithgow, where were Hamilton and other nobles. Bothwell, knowing this, did not "keep tryst" with Atholl, who pretended that he had mustered his men at Doune Castle (the house of the Earl of Moray) merely to hold a court. James did not accept this excuse,—what court needed the presence of Atholl, Gowrie, Montrose, and Moray? Home was sent to reconnoitre, and then took Montrose (and Gowrie, as Moysie adds).<sup>20</sup> (It was at this time, October 8, that Atholl wrote to Bothwell as to dealing with England through Cecil's agent, Locke.) Montrose explained that he was merely a messenger from Atholl to explain to James that they were all engaged in holding a court of justice.

He was dismissed, and the affair passed over at the time; but the intrigues between the Atholl confederacy, Bothwell, and the agents of England endured. Young Gowrie, now an Edinburgh student of sixteen or seventeen, was in 1600 to become famous for the mystery of his death, and his alleged conspiracy. He is already seen as a partner in what might have proved a new Raid of Ruthven. This conspiracy, though it never came to a head, pervaded politics till the summer of 1594, and attempted to place itself under the ægis of the Kirk, to which Gowrie, as became his father's son, was at this time enthusiastically devoted. In part the fear of the Catholics, in part hatred of Maitland, had united the Kirk, England, the adventurous Bothwell, the godly Gowrie, Atholl, and the dark Master of Gray against the king. These combined forces and strong measures caused Huntly, Angus, and Errol to approach the king. They desired to stand trial as to their conduct in the matter of the Spanish Blanks (October 9).<sup>21</sup> They met James, and knelt to him, between Soutra and Fala.<sup>22</sup> If guilty, they would suffer; if acquitted, would satisfy the Kirk or go abroad. They were only accused (as regards the purpose of their signatures to the blank sheets of paper) by one witness, George Ker, under the boot. They explained that the matter which Father Creighton was to have inserted above their signatures only concerned money owed to them by foreign princes for the subsistence of the Jesuits whom they confessed to having harboured. So Angus and Errol declared. Huntly's signature, he said, referred to the necessity of allowing his uncle, Father Gordon, to leave the country; and he had Father Gordon's attested statement that his blanks bore no other sense. George Ker, under torture, had declared that the blanks were to be filled up with the conditions on which Philip of Spain would invade Scotland, and Fintry appears to have corroborated.<sup>23</sup> James gave to Elizabeth the account of the blanks put forward by Angus, Atholl, and Errol (December 7).<sup>24</sup> This did not satisfy her. Yet, as late as October 11, Angus, Huntly, and Errol wrote to her thanking her for "her gracious acceptance of their suits," and begging her to "continue her princely favour."

So far the proposals of the earls had an appearance of candour. They would stand trial, as Bothwell had recently done. But, according to the custom of Scotland, trial in such affairs was a mere trial of forces. Knox, Murray, Lethington, and Bothwell, we know, when engaged in such circumstances, appeared attended by large levies of armed supporters, and justice was overawed. If the earls were tried at Perth, as was their wish, they would be backed by all the Hays, Gordons, and perhaps Douglasses, who could mount a horse and wield a spear. By October 18 they had mustered their men.<sup>25</sup> James told the Protestants that he would be answerable for order on the day of law: "such as came undesired should not be welcome."<sup>26</sup> The preachers, however, summoned their own supporters, "bodin in feare of warre"—that is, fully armed. All were to meet at Perth on October 24. The fiery cross (metaphorically speaking, for the actual symbol is idolatrous) was sent round to all the kirks. A Committee of Kirk Safety, twelve preachers, sat at Edinburgh. James refused to acknowledge conventions held without his orders. The assemblage of such armed bodies of partisans was one of his main grievances against the Kirk. The earls' forces were meeting at Perth, where Atholl and young Gowrie, a true chip of the old Ruthven block, were inclined to keep them out. There was every prospect of a battle royal at Perth, which would have been the focus of all feuds and an Armageddon of the Kirk. Humes would have met Hepburns; Kers, Hays, Gordons, Forbeses, Stewarts, Grahams, Ruthvens, Campbells, Mackintoshes, with burgesses and lairds under Andrew Melville, would have been let loose at each other's throats. We may almost regret that James, as it were, threw down his baton and cleared the lists. In the same way the Regent Murray had deferred the trial of Lethington when the forces were gathered at Edinburgh for the fray. The king forbade the trial. He may have heard of a plot to kidnap him, described by Carey to Cecil.<sup>27</sup> The godly of Edinburgh, armed with muskets and pretending to act as a Royal Guard, were to hand James over to Bothwell, who acted with "the Kirk, barons, and boroughs." The Catholic earls, unattended but unmolested, must therefore wait at Perth, and be examined later before a commission of nobles, burghs, and the Kirk. The preachers had demanded their imprisonment, "according to the lovable laws of Scotland." But who was to imprison them? The attempt would only have entailed the battle royal, which was not to be.

Meanwhile (October 22) the Catholic earls, through Archibald Douglas, were still in the treaty with Elizabeth, and had written a letter of thanks to her.<sup>28</sup> Our old friend, Lesley, Bishop of Ross, had suggested that religious tolerance should be proposed in the Scottish Parliament, so Archibald Douglas writes; but (October 29) Elizabeth was threatening James for his tardiness in punishing the earls,—she had declined to intercede for them, and was working through Locke on Atholl, Bothwell, and Gowrie. Meanwhile James "drove time," or procrastinated, and assemblages of partisans in Edinburgh during the convention appointed for November 12 were forbidden. The meeting was scantily attended, the ministers were not encouraged.

On November 26 a compromise as to the Catholic earls was attempted, and an "Act of Abolition" was promulgated. By February 1, 1594, all subjects were to profess themselves Presbyterians. Those who could not do so "in conscience" (a dangerous term, the thin end of the wedge) were to depart abroad, retaining their estates, and were not to be outlawed. The story of the Spanish Blanks was to be dropped, unless the accused relapsed into treasonable dealings abroad. The Catholics were to have preachers planted in their households to convert them, and were to send away the Jesuits, under heavy pecuniary guarantees. Acceptance of the arrangement must be made before January 1, 1594. The preachers denounced this sinful attempt. What! were idolaters to be allowed to worship Baal abroad and yet retain their property? In the privileged Canaan of Scotland (December 6) the Maxwells and Johnstones had a great clan battle on Dryfe sands, and Lord

Maxwell was slain. From the pulpit Bruce threatened James: "his reign should be troublesome, and short," if he did not abolish his Act of Abolition.<sup>29</sup>

We know what such prophecies meant: they had a way of securing their own fulfilment. Elizabeth wrote an angry reply to James's letter about the pleas of the earls. Had he not permitted George Ker, their messenger, and the witness against them, to escape? James had, in fact, just hanged one Smeatoun through whose aid the escape was effected. Elizabeth now sent Lord Zouche to Edinburgh (January 15, 1594), and Zouche instantly began to intrigue with Bothwell's ally, the Master of Gray. Zouche's purpose appears to have been to unite the Northern conspirators, Gowrie, Atholl, the Masters of Gray and of Montrose, with Ochiltree, Bothwell, the Johnstones, fresh from victory over the Catholic Maxwells, and with the Kirk. This powerful combination would seize the king as usual, oust Maitland and Home, drive the Catholic earls to ruin, and avenge the bonny Earl. The scruples or the avarice of Elizabeth stifled the plot.<sup>30</sup> Meanwhile she would not incite such proceedings, but would protect the enterprisers. Yet (January 4, 1594) she had written to deny that Bothwell was harboured in England by her permission.

The Act of Abolition, so odious to the godly, was now withdrawn; the Catholic earls had declined the terms, on the plea of being unable to find sureties. While Elizabeth's envoy, Zouche, was arranging a civil war on a great scale for Scotland, in which the Stewarts and Ruthvens, under Atholl and Gowrie, should combine with the sanguinary Johnstones of the Western Border, and Bothwell, Ochiltree, and Montrose, to attack Home, Maitland, and the Catholics, Prince Henry was born at Stirling (February 19, 1594). The event was welcome to loyalists, and, to use a phrase current at that period, it "was nuts" to the Brethren. They had long felt it as a heavy cross that there was nobody except James to kidnap,—no feasible successor who could be set up against him. But now there was the baby, who might be captured and used to James's prejudice, like the Prince against James III., and James himself, as an infant, against his mother. The proposal was at once made to the English envoys of Elizabeth, but Elizabeth discouraged it in a letter from Robert Cecil to Locke, her agent with the godly (March 4).<sup>31</sup> Zouche was told that he had shown trop de zèle. Locke was warned not to carry any compromising papers about nim. "The proposal to follow the king into the Castle of Stirling" (where the royal infant was in the charge of Mar), "and to besiege the castle, makes her majesty a little careful to prevent so dishonourable and so unjustifiable a course, mean they ever so dutifully."<sup>32</sup> "They" are probably the Atholl and Gowrie gang, as Stirling was well within their reach. Elizabeth, in fact, would not part with her money.<sup>33</sup>

It had, however, been arranged that Bothwell should muster men, English and Scots, and invade the country on two pretexts. "The one was, with help of the kinsmen and ministrie, to banish the Catholic lords from the realm of Scotland." The other pretext was to avenge the bonny Earl. The author of 'The Historie of King James the Sext' (John Colville, as is supposed) acknowledges that England was aiding Bothwell, and that James arrested one of Zouche's suite, who, by that ambassador's command, had dealt with Bothwell. To check his advance, Home, Cessford, and Buccleuch were stationed at Kelso, and a general levy was proclaimed.

The preachers, in daily sermons, did what they could to hamper the king in his peril by preaching against him, and prophesying evil. When he asked how he could leave Edinburgh defenceless by marching against the Northern Catholics, they offered to pray for him! For some reason Kelso was evacuated by Buccleuch, and occupied by Bothwell on April 1. Next day he reached Dalkeith, and was in Leith on the 3rd of April. To conciliate the preachers, James promised, in church, to march against Huntly when he had settled Bothwell. A few nobles, and the town, a disorderly array, then went out against that hero, who moved southward, slowly and in good order, lest his line of retreat should be cut. The royal levies thought that he had fled, but their patrols were driven in when they attempted to occupy a hill near Woolmet: Bothwell then charged, and drove the Royal Guard in rout, the infantry flying to Craigmillar. Within half a mile of James's position on the Borough Moor Bothwell's trumpets sounded the retreat, and he lay that night at Dalkeith. Probably he could have entered Edinburgh, but the castle he could not have taken, and there was no sign of a popular rising in his favour. He certainly bore off the honours of the day, with many prisoners, whom he released. He issued proclamations gratifying to the godly, and awaited another opportunity.<sup>34</sup> courageously and reverently" Bothwell and Ochiltree had behaved. They did not press their victory, out of respect to James's person. He makes it pretty clear that Bothwell was disappointed of the aid of the Atholl-Gowrie contingent. "They have been tardy and slothful who have promised"; he thinks that perhaps the "letters of advertisement" to them were intercepted. Carey writes that Atholl was expected with 2000 men. Colville puts himself at Elizabeth's disposal "as her born subject."<sup>35</sup> There is an undated address of Gowrie, Bothwell, Atholl, Ochiltree, and Murray to "the Reverend Pastors of the Kirk presently assembled at Dunbar," to announce their rising in arms against the Spanish faction, and requesting the preachers to take record of their proceedings.<sup>36</sup> It is even said, in 'The Chronicles of the Families of Atholl and Tullibardine' (i. 51), that Atholl was present at the Raid of Leith (April 3) with Bothwell. He was denounced rebel (April 26) for not appearing to answer concerning his dealings with Bothwell.<sup>37</sup> Hunsdon, who knew about the plot, could not learn that Atholl "or any other of his confederates" had appeared in arms (April 7).<sup>38</sup> From a letter of John Colville to Locke (April 28) it appears that Atholl and his party deemed that their success and Bothwell's was impossible, if James really meant (as he had promised) to "pursue the papists." Cecil had advised the Atholl-Bothwell party to await events, and they would not act violently "unless Atholl be pursued."<sup>39</sup> On May 3 Colville complained that both England and the Kirk had advised delay, to them and to Atholl, till James's intentions as to the Catholic earls were thoroughly known. Many of Bothwell's horses had died; his party meant to assemble at Hexham.<sup>40</sup>

John Colville at once (April 6) wrote to Cecil, telling "how

By July Atholl had been appointed one of James's lieutenants to pursue Huntly with fire and sword, and by August his brother-in-law, Gowrie, had retired to Padua, there to prosecute his studies. Thus the Atholl-Gowrie branch of the Bothwell-Ochiltree confederacy was broken off: its existence was due partly to Elizabeth and Robert Cecil, partly to family feud against Huntly, partly to hatred of Maitland, and in part to Protestant excitement. Had the Northern lords warmly backed Bothwell at the Raid of Leith he would probably have triumphed. The Kirk had temporised, but now one of its members gave James some trouble.

There was a preacher at Perth, named John Ross, who dealt very plainly with James. He said that there were many traitors, but the king was the chief. "We never got good of the Guisian blood, for Queen Mary, his mother, was an open oppressor of the saints of God." When examined on this historical statement, he admitted that he remembered no persecutions by Queen Mary; doubtless he had thought it a safe remark to make, on general principles. James was "a reprobate king," and (which was true) "a dissembling hypocrite." How the ministers looked on Ross's performance is not very clear. The author of 'The Historie of King James the Sext' says that Ross was examined before certain select ministers and the king's commissioners. "The whole number of the Assembly" (including the king's commissioners?) "approves his whole doctrine,"—as to his threats of judgment and rebukes,—"except in such heads as seem to be most offensive."<sup>41</sup> The author sympathises with Ross. But he has only made an excerpt from the judgment of the Assembly which "admonished" Ross because the occasion of his sermon might have made it appear that the Kirk sided with Bothwell; because he produced a sentence against the House of Guise, de futuro, and because he was harder on the king than his own years and experience warranted. Ross was therefore warned to speak at all times reverently of his majesty. This was the decision of the General Assembly, and Ross's reluctant and guarded apology was the result. But there had been an earlier inquiry, on May 1, in Mr Robert Bruce's garden. Here, too, Ross was admonished; "some of the brethren thought it hard to say that the king should die in blood for sparing the shedding of blood, yet others justified it, that 'it was agreeable to the Word and common experience.'"<sup>42</sup> Apparently James was not satisfied, for 'The Historie of King James the Sext' adds that "as he could not be avenged on Ross by any ecclesiastical law of theirs, or municipal law of his own," he, by advice of his Council, banished Ross from the realm. This Ross was a kinsman of Bothwell on the Hepburn side. He avowed a desire to see all papists hanged.

If we consider the state of affairs when Ross preached, and the dangers from the Atholl-Bothwell confederacy, his sermon has much the air of a provocative to assassination. There were preachers who justified his words about James "dying in blood." Though the general sense of the Assembly did not carry it to the length of approving of Ross, he was certainly let off very lightly, without even a sentence of temporary suspension. Dr M'Crie states the matter thus: "They censured a preacher of the name of Ross, who had been guilty of this offence"—that is, of "rash or irreverent speeches against the king or his Council."

We have given fuller details, and dwelt more than may seem needful on these performances of the ministers of religion, because they show the nature of the relations between Kirk and State. Were they endurable relations? Could the king oblige Mr Ross by hanging perhaps the majority of his subjects? Had he more power than his ancestors possessed in the way of forfeiting some of his most potent and least accessible nobles? Was it feasible for him to capture men who, if defeated, had the roadless retreats of the Highlands behind them; and was this action specially possible when Bothwell was threatening the capital? It was in such circumstances that the clergy, when consulted, so mildly "admonished" the preacher of a sermon which was, at the least, bitterly insulting, and in some places provocative of those murders of kings familiar "to the Word and common experience." As James's reign was the prelude to a terrible civil war, provoked in great part by royal retaliation on the ministers, it appears desirable to leave no doubt as to the conduct, the ideals, and the aspirations of the Brethren. It may be said, on their side, that they merely represented "his majesty's Opposition"; that, in the absence of the press (which, however, dealt in scurrilous pamphlets and ballads), the pulpit was the only place where freedom of speech was possible. But neither a parliamentary Opposition nor an advanced Liberal press pretends to be inspired by "the Spreit of God," and finds its claims accepted by its party. This pretence the preachers did make, therefore they were dangerous to an intolerable degree, and the perils caused by their pretensions were the direct source of James's equally unjust repressions.

Turning from his clergy to the eternal disturber of his country, Elizabeth, James was able to answer her letters in her own style. She had been surprised, wondered whether she dreamed or not. James also asked whether there were visions about. Bothwell had not only been harboured in England, but had received English gold, and had raised English soldiers, proclaiming his rate of pay at English parish churches. He had appeared at Edinburgh, and had led his troops back, with banners displayed, to English ground. Where were Elizabeth's many promises not to receive Bothwell? In what had James deserved her anger? His one offence was that he had not dealt with certain of his own subjects in such form and at such time as Elizabeth, in his place, might have deemed fitting.

He had sent Zouche back with scant courtesy, reckoning him rather a herald with a challenge than a friendly ambassador.<sup>43</sup>

The General Assembly met in May, made their usual complaints, and produced a pleasant piece of folk-lore, "the horrible superstition in not labouring a parcell of ground dedicated to the Devil, under the name of 'The Goodman's Croft.'" We may conjecture that, the devil being addicted to sowing tares, it was thought well to leave him a "poffle or pendicle" of ground where he could exercise his industry. On May 30 Parliament forfeited Angus, Errol, and Huntly, but Mr Davidson gave "a free rebooke of all estats." He accused the preachers of greed, and of "winking at the profaning of the Sabbath day" (Sunday). He drew a parallel between James and Charles IX. of France, the man of the Bartholomew Massacre: the parallel was rather in favour of Charles. Charles had been kind to Coligny and the Huguenots, kinder and more promising than James was to his Protestant subjects. Yet Charles had massacred the Huguenots on a large scale, and therefore it was well to keep a watchful eye on James.<sup>44</sup>

We must remember that the Brethren lived in constant fear of a popish plot and a massacre. This appears curious, for we are apt to suppose that Edinburgh was entirely Protestant. Davidson declared, however, that he "feared the multitude of Edinburgh . . . more than I fear the Court." This looks as if, while the richer citizens were orthodox, the Reformation had not really touched Knox's old allies in mischief, "the rascal multitude."

Though forfeited, the Catholic earls were passing their time "in great jollity," and Huntly continued to make new buildings at Strathbogie. Bothwell was in poverty in Liddesdale, and already it was rumoured that he would join the Catholic earls. A ship from Spain arrived at Aberdeen (a report in the 'Spanish State Papers' says that it contained a papal subsidy of gold for the king). The barque was taken by the citizens, whom Huntly terrified into surrendering the passengers by threats of fire and sword, while he seized the money meant for his sovereign! This is alleged in a strange legendary report sent by an anonymous writer to Spain, but the document is full of wild myths and romances (July).<sup>45</sup> *

* It seems to me very improbable that the money "from Pope Clement VIII. to the King" was really destined for James with his knowledge. The authority cited by Mr Hume Brown (ii. 217, note 2) is 'Spanish State Papers,' iv. 590. That document is not only anonymous, but is sheer mythology. In my opinion

Meanwhile James prepared for war in the North, and granted a commission of lieutenancy to Argyll and Atholl, who, according to Colville, was as much a traitor as ever.<sup>46</sup> In the defect of a police force, or of a regular army, it was the practice, when one noble or chief was contumacious, to give another noble "letters of fire and sword" against him, and Huntly is said to have had some such commission against the bonny Earl Moray. The preachers and burgesses of Edinburgh were now asked to raise "waged men" for the Northern raid, which they did with some reluctance. War was delayed till the infant prince had been baptised at Stirling (August 30), where Sussex represented Elizabeth. The festivities included the usual fantastic pageantries, and James vexed "good men" by wearing his French order of the Saint Esprit.

James and Elizabeth were now on the best terms. Bothwell was bidden to leave England. On July 30 he had let Cecil know, through Colville, that the Catholic lords had been soliciting him. They offered 25,000 crowns if he would come over to them, and bring the Atholl-Gowrie party with him, and abandon Colville. He waited to know Elizabeth's mind: as for the money (Spanish, no doubt), if he did not take it, Home would. He proposed, if Elizabeth agreed, that he should accept the 25,000, and then use it "for pursuit of the said papists" who gave it, while Elizabeth might pay back the papists. Bothwell wished Colville to put this remarkable proposal to Cecil as an abstract question in casuistry, "an A B case" of conscience: "May A, to whom B (a papist) offers money for his alliance, take the money and use it against B?" Colville asked Cecil to answer in the abstract form, that Bothwell might think Colville had so stated it. Colville added that James rather thought Prince Henry to be the son of one of his courtiers, probably of Lennox. A Darnley and Mary quarrel, he said, was at hand.

This Colville, at whose wedding John Knox was present, is a Father Gordon, Huntly's uncle, had persuaded himself that he might persuade the Pope that James, if supplied with gold, would be converted, and later, persuaded himself that Huntly was a worthy recipient of the ducats. Major Martin Hume's 'Treason and Plot' (1901) may be recommended to readers curious in these intrigues. I am not as convinced as Major Hume that James was deeply concerned in them; and, if he was, he only sought preservation from the disgraceful intrigues of Elizabeth, and of the factions whom she suborned in Scotland. The King, naturally, wished to protect his powerful Catholic subjects from persecution, and to escape from Elizabeth's spadassins, Bothwell and his adherents. He also needed to know what his Catholic earls really intended.

fairly representative scoundrel of the period: his later fortunes were such as he deserved, but the interesting point is the use of such abominable tools by England.<sup>47</sup> In September Colville had to report that "unhappy Bothwell" was not running a straight course with Elizabeth, but was off to meet Huntly. This deeply grieved a professor so earnest as Colville, who could only hope that "the Lord would send light out of darkness." So sincere a Protestant as Colville could no longer be a partner with one who had joined himself unto idols. He went to Edinburgh on September 12 and wrote a letter of farewell to his old master. The Earl had openly said that Colville meant to betray him (which he probably did intend), and Colville was hurt. But he had got Bothwell cleared of "the odious imputation of witchcraft," he said: and who but he had given tone to Bothwell's enterprises in general? Colville had often hazarded his body for this ungrateful patrician, "but God only knows how far I hazarded my conscience in making black white and darkness light for your sake." That was what Colville felt most bitterly. He therefore proposed to seek James's pardon, "spending the rest of my days quietly in the fear of that gracious and omnipotent Lord," with other canting phrases.<sup>48</sup> To James next did Colville write, likening himself to a dead dog, and addressing the king as "Oh, Glory of Albion!" He quoted Ovid and the Bible, and rather impiously likened James to the Founder of Christianity. He simply wallowed in remorse and abject apology.<sup>49</sup> He reported to Cecil the shameful backsliding of Bothwell. But a few months ago, to quote Moysie, "all the ministry favoured the Erle Bothwell, thinking him most meit to be chiftaine for the professoris," and now he had joined the idolaters.<sup>50</sup>

We know what Bothwell had been doing. He had met the Catholic lords in Angus; his messenger, one Orme, was caught, and a proclamation of September 30 disclosed his iniquitous intentions. He was to make a raid on Holyrood, seize James, shut him up in the Keep of Blackness, raise the Borderers, and capture the Northern castles.<sup>51</sup> Home, Cessford, and Buccleuch had taken his lands, and would make the Border too hot to hold him.* Colville wrote thus on September 16. On August 20, three weeks earlier, he had informed Cecil that Bothwell was offering Lennox 1000 crowns to pay men to seize James, and that Lennox had induced Mar to join the plot. The other plan was to allure James away from his retinue, "when he hunts his bucks in Falkland." "The captain of that house has promised us, any morning we please, to draw him out with the huntsmen only to any part of the wood we please to hide ourselves into."<sup>52</sup> This plot is much akin to that of the Gowrie Conspiracy (1600), by which James was to have been allured away from the chase in the woods of Falkland. Probably Lennox, an honourable man on the whole, declined to take part in these proceedings. We have to note, however, that Robert Cecil was hardened in such iniquities. It was when he failed with the Protestant or Indifferent Lennox that Bothwell threw himself into the arms of idolaters, to the consternation of the godly Colville, and with them he was still hunting the king. As Bothwell was now a lost sheep, Elizabeth abandoned him, and Colville was bidden to seek a pardon from James. This he obtained: we have seen in what terms he asked for it (September 30), and he assures Cecil that now he will be a more useful spy than ever! He did not say what he had offered "for his peace," but Ochiltree had offered to catch Angus. What Mr Colville offered will presently appear: it was the blood of Bothwell's brother.<sup>53</sup>

* The man who had led Bothwell to this course was "Mr Thomas Cranstoun." A person called "Mr Thomas Cranstoun" came home with Gowrie from France in 1600, and was hanged for the Gowrie Conspiracy of that year. He, however, "lest suspision be taken from his name," averred that he had been abroad since 1589. The Cranstouns at this time were usually of the Kirk party.

As for Bothwell, he tried to propitiate the Kirk; he explained that though now leagued with papists, it was only in his temporal interests.<sup>54</sup> On October 3 the forces of Argyll, going in advance of the royal army, encountered those of Huntly at Glenrines, in Glenavon. Argyll, a lad of nineteen, had the slaying of the Bonny Earl to avenge. His force of 6000 men was, in part, a light armed Highland levy, and he had neither cavalry nor guns. "The Highland men are naked men," says a much later ballad: they were no better equipped with defensive armour now than at Harlaw or Killiecrankie. Mackintosh was with Argyll, and all Clan Gilzean. That day one of the chiefs of the Macleans "undoubtedly played the man," says a letter quoted by Calderwood. The Macleans were the Spartans of the North; down to Drummossie day it was their motto and practice never to turn their backs, but conquer, or die with their faces to the foe. Such was their ancient and honourable tradition, which many a time left them a weakened people. Clan Chattan was divided; the Macphersons held Ruthven Castle for Huntly; Clan Gillivray and the Mackintoshes were with Argyll. Huntly, like Mar at Harlaw, had a force far inferior in numbers, but well armed, well mounted, and provided with six guns—weapons of which the Celts stood in some awe, as being unfamiliar. Argyll, wisely, was anxious to await the arrival of the more regular forces, cavalry, and artillery of James. Huntly, however, sent out a cavalry patrol, which cut up the skirmishers of Argyll and reconnoitred the position of his main body. With Argyll naturally was the first cadet of his house, Lochnell. He, it will be remembered, was a partner of Huntly in “the great band” for the murder of Campbell of Calder, of the bonny Earl of Moray, and of Argyll himself. Moray and Calder had been slain in February 1592. Now was Lochnell’s chance to betray Argyll to the same fate.

Lochnell, if we may believe a letter cited by Calderwood, had expected to lead the van. He therefore arranged with Huntly that he should direct his whole artillery on the yellow flag of the clan, under which Argyll himself would be stationed. Lochnell would then take to flight, which would lead to the flight of his vanguard, and the ruin, probably the death, of Argyll. But Argyll, instead of letting Lochnell lead the vanguard, kept him beside his own person, under the yellow standard, which had formed no part of his ingenious scheme. Either by the artillery-fire, or in Huntly’s charge on the yellow standard, Lochnell was slain, and a great number of the Campbells turned and fled; but the main body occupied a hill-top, beneath which lay a morass, while the sun blazed in the eyes of Huntly’s and Errol’s cavalry. Errol turned to avoid the marsh and outflank the enemy, but Auchendown, making a frontal attack, saw his men mowed down by the arrows and musket-balls of Clan Gilzean, covered as they were by a coppice. Nevertheless Gordon of Auchendown pressed on, charging up-hill; but he was shot, and the Celts cut off his head. Huntly’s force was now enclosed between the Macleans and the Campbells, but he led a desperate charge to extricate his vanguard. Now Maclean, plying a Danish battle-axe and wearing heavy armour, cut his way to Huntly’s standard, which he captured, slaying the man who bore it. Errol was wounded by a bullet and an arrow, Gordon of Gight was slain, Huntly was unhorsed, but remounted, and led a fresh charge. On this the Campbells who had stood fled, while Argyll wept for the dishonour of his name. The victory, after heavy loss, remained with Huntly: the Macleans retired in good order, but Argyll’s camp fell into the enemy's hands. In a report to Spain Huntly has only thirty-seven men, who kill 500 of Argyll's force, losing only one man wounded—a miracle.<sup>55</sup>

It was on the day after this gallantly fought affair that James rode out of Edinburgh, Morton being left in command of the town. The Melvilles, by James's desire, accompanied him, "because the people were jealous of him." Nor was James Melville satisfied. Huntly's force, sorely shaken by their losses at Glenrinnnes, dispersed, and James occupied Aberdeen. But money was needed for the forces, and James Melville was sent to Edinburgh to procure supplies. He was to announce that James would burn the castles of his foes, yet "moyen was maid" that they should be spared. However, the arguments of Andrew Melville prevailed, Strathbogie and other seats, Errol's, and the houses of some Gordons and Ogilvies, were demolished.<sup>56</sup> This was not enough for James Melville. The royal raid ended for lack of supplies, and, says Melville, "when all was done, little sound meaning and small effect further was produced." The king returned to Edinburgh, Lennox remained at Aberdeen in command, and many barons and chiefs, the Earl Marischal, Lovat, Grant, Mackintosh, and others came under oaths of loyalty.

Though the Catholic earls and their new associate, Bothwell, were practically broken, the state of the country and of political factions was purely chaotic. While the earls were gathering head again, and it was found necessary to reinforce Lennox in the North, Argyll was mustering his forces anew (December 12).<sup>57</sup> Smarting from the shame of his defeat at Glenrinnnes, he had discovered the whole secret of the great band, the complicity of Ardkinglas, and the treachery of Lochnell, which fate had so strangely avenged. He would take further vengeance himself upon Huntly's country and his own faithless clansmen and allies. In many districts there was "much blood shed, and many horrible murders were committed; the son slaying the father, one brother the other, and brothers' sons killing each other, thieves spoiling and oppressing, and men daily ravishing" (probably abducting is meant) "women; but no execution of justice, either by the king or the inferior magistrates," says Calderwood.

It was not possible for James to execute justice, if he had been so inclined, for want of force, and the cause of want of force was want of money. At any time Elizabeth could have secured a peaceful Scotland, at great advantage to her own revenues, by a subsidy of some £20,000 annually. But she preferred to pension traitors, and James, having done her work in the North, was now refused £2000 which had been promised to him. He was naturally annoyed, and sent Colonel Stewart on a fruitless search for assistance in the Low Countries (December 12).<sup>58</sup> In her habitual avarice Elizabeth fostered the many troubles of Scotland. Money she would supply to James's rebels: to himself she grudged or denied it, thereby doing her best to throw him on the side of Spain, and to cause the very dangers which it was essential to her to prevent. Nevertheless James arrested Argyll in the midst of his enterprises of vengeance and spoliation, warding him for a time in Edinburgh Castle. Calderwood, who grumbles at the defect of justice, also grumbles at the detention of Argyll as a mere pretence for extorting money.<sup>59</sup> James (January 29, 1595) summoned a convention of nobles and endeavoured to alleviate the condition of the people. His "waged men" had disbanded for want of pay, and he was almost as helpless as usual.<sup>60</sup> Atholl as well as Argyll was "warded."

Moved by the king, however, the preachers at last agreed to excommunicate Bothwell (February 18, 1595). He had shown his true colours by leaguings with papists, hoc nocuit. We must not regard all of the Kirk as official allies of Bothwell. James Melville openly denied that he had ever dealt with him. Others sympathised with him, and he had skill in flattering the Brethren. Regarding him as a "sanctified plague," they had done little or nothing to check his popularity or impair his successes, for he used the pretext of avenging the Bonny Earl, and of earnest Protestantism. The noted intriguer, John Colville, the agent of the exiled earls after the death of Gowrie, now betrayed Bothwell's natural brother, Hercules Stewart, who was hanged (February 18).<sup>61</sup> In brief, Bothwell's meteor course was run, and after skulking about the country, and attempting to imitate the piratical career of his uncle, Queen Mary's Bothwell, in the Orkneys, he fled to France. A man of courage, enterprise, wit, and many accomplishments, he had all the Hepburn ambition, with all the charm of recklessness. His ambition was boundless, but crossed by a madcap vein which frustrated his desires. From the queen to the lowest of the people he was popular, and, among so many ruffians, he alone had a touch of what is genial, sympathetic, and boyish. He, at least, would gladly have avenged Queen Mary, donning armour as the most suitable mourning. From the Continent he kept vexing the king with fears of change, and before August 1600 was urging Philip to invade Scotland.

Huntly still lingered in the North, but his plans were ruined (March 25) by the arrest of a Jesuit, Father Morton, who had landed at Leith, from Spain. He brought no money, but rather rebukes for the ill use to which previous supplies had been devoted. James treated Father Morton with a gentleness which Father Creighton later applauded. Morton gave a jewel, representing the crucifixion, to the king: James is said to have remarked that, on account of the minute scale of the work, he could not kiss the crucifix without kissing the thieves and the soldiers. It is said that the preachers desired to have Morton tortured. Calderwood does not mention this: Father Creighton praises the king's humanity.<sup>62</sup> In the ruin of the Catholic cause, Errol, Huntly, and his uncle, the excellent Father Gordon, now took ship for the Continent. Probably James kept on terms with them, and their retreat was an arranged affair, as their party informed the Spanish Court.

A domestic trouble was next added to the confusions of the State. The queen had for long been the enemy of Maitland: the cause was said to be a dispute about the ownership of lands at Musselburgh, but there were probably other causes of resentment. Maitland, however, had lately paid court to the queen, and had backed, or inspired, her wish to remove the child prince from the governance of Mar, whose ancestor had kept good watch over James himself when a child. Allied with the queen and Maitland were Buccleuch and Cessford, great chiefs of the reckless border spears. They had expected Bothwell's lands, and, says Colville, had been disappointed.<sup>63</sup> It was believed that they entertained the somewhat conventional design of kidnapping the little Duke of Rothesay for their own political purposes: Maitland, we know, was capable of anything; and Cessford and Buccleuch were disappointed men. The murder of one of Mar's men, on account of a love affair, led to a great demonstration by Mar, and it was expected that Buccleuch and Cessford would give him a meeting.<sup>64</sup> The quarrel about the prince lasted from April into August, James siding with Mar and opposing Maitland. The queen was again about to be a mother, and was in a fretful, perhaps hysterical, frame of mind. At the end of July she was ill, and Nicholson, the English resident at Edinburgh, tells us that James suspected her of feigning a malady, and of merely desiring to bring him to her from Stirling for some evil purpose. Melville, however, found that the queen's ladies believed her to be really ill, and James hurried from Stirling. He found her majesty with Buccleuch and Cessford! James had his room carefully guarded, and sent for Robert Bruce and other preachers as advisers. Meanwhile the queen was suspected of trying to keep James by her that he might be kidnapped in the usual way. Buccleuch, the bauld Buccleuch of the Kinmont Willie ballad, was thought to favour this course.<sup>65</sup> But Maitland, now nearing his end, ill and old, lost nerve: James rode back safely: Mr Galloway admonished the queen in a sermon, and the royal pair were reconciled (August 15).<sup>66</sup>

On August 25 Maitland's illness was serious: Buccleuch and Cessford had him at their mercy, they knew so much of his designs: and his malady was thought to be diplomatic. He died on October 3, much concerned, and with good cause, about his soul. Calderwood takes rather a favourable view of his spiritual estate, though "his practices, at his first entry to Court, were very pernicious and offensive to the godly many years after. . . . He granted, at his death, that he had greatly offended that man of God, Mr Knox," perhaps on the subject of the amusing skit on Knox, Murray, Wood, and other brethren, a shaft which certainly came out of the quiver of the witty House of Lethington. This jest does not seem so much matter for contrition as Maitland's alleged share in Darnley's death, and alleged partnership in "the great band" for the murder of Calder, Argyll, and the Bonny Earl. What his latest design, in company with Buccleuch, may precisely have been is not certain, but doubtless it was on the old lines. None the less, and despite his confederacy with Huntly, Maitland had been a Protestant, and no enemy of England. James is said not to have regretted the loss of his old adviser.

Maitland founded the House of Lauderdale, which later gave Scotland a famous statesman. At this very time we first meet Archibald Primrose, an intriguer with John Colville and Elizabeth's Ministers. Here first appears in affairs the ancestor of the House of Rosebery. While new men arose, Atholl died (September 22). By the end of the year the strife between Mar and Buccleuch and Cessford was appeased, and Buccleuch was received at Court. The Scottish queen later threw all the blame of the quarrel about her child on the dead Maitland, insisting that she had warned James, and preserved him from an attack on his person.<sup>67</sup> The queen's biographer, Miss Strickland, takes a less favourable view of her conduct. In origin the affair was a nursery cabal which politicians used for their own purposes. But James came better out of the contest than his unfortunate and exiled descendant, James, eighth of the name, was to emerge from a similar affair (1726). Anne was already suspected, we learn, of idolatrous tendencies, fostered probably by Lady Huntly and others of her intimates.

The autumn had been notable for the Irish rising of Tyrone, who was to have been backed by several thousand warriors from the West Highlands and the Isles. Maclean of Duart, who wielded the battle-axe at Glenrinn, had the address to capture large numbers of the Highland auxiliaries under Clanranald, and with the aid of Argyll relieved England from a considerable danger. He found it much more difficult to extract from the avarice of Elizabeth a trifle of 2000 crowns for his expenses. An incident of local interest was a heroic "barring out" at the High School of Edinburgh in September. "The little boys began to shoot and stab." Docked of half their holidays, a poor fortnight, the boys held the school, the old building on the site of the Blackfriars, near Kirk-o'-Field. An impetuous bailie, Macmorran, led a charge against the doors with an improvised battering-ram, and was shot by William Sinclair, son of the Chancellor of Caithness. The main interest to us is that Sir Walter Scott as a boy may have known "the bailie's window," whence the shot was fired.

In August of the year there had been trouble with a preacher presently to become more notorious. This was Mr David Black, of St Andrews. He was accused of speaking ill of Queen Mary, and an effort was made to convict him before a mixed and informal commission. Andrew Melville interfered in his usual masterful way, but James Melville smoothed the matter over. He alleged at St Andrews, in a sermon, that Mr Black "had commended his majesty's mother for many great and rare gifts, and excellent virtues." If Black did this, it is unfortunate that his sermon has not been preserved. He "very sparingly and soberly had touched the truth of the judgment of God which had come on her for resisting the wholesome admonition of the Word of God." Everything considered, common decency should have warned Black against raking up the history of his king's mother, or of any living man's mother, and the Brethren seem, provisionally, to have come into this opinion.<sup>68</sup>

The ministers were still very sensitive about the Catholic earls. Their wives were practically left in possession of their property: movements of Catholics, involving feuds, were common in the North, and a new Spanish invasion was apprehended in November. The exiled earls were in the same position as the Hamiltons and the Ruthven raiders had been when banished: it was certain that they would come back sooner or later.

James in November 1595 was playing the part of Protestant Hero, and ordering a universal "wapinschawing," or review of the whole armed forces of the country, all for "the defence of the kingdom against the detestable conspiracy against Christ and his Evangel presently in readiness."<sup>69</sup> The wapinschaw, when it did occur, exhibited a mournful array of "Guse Gibbies."

The death of Maitland left James free to manifest his own powers and policy. He denounced the carrying of pistols: he demanded a list of all "horners" (outlaws), which he never got: "he will let them know that he will be obeyed and revered as a king," and will suffer no more blood-feuds to run their sanguinary course.<sup>70</sup> He might as well have tried, like Canute, to make the waves "reverence and obey" him. He was backed by no force of men or money. A generous gift of a purse of gold from the queen on New Year's Day 1596 much astonished James. Whence came that rare metal? he asked, and her majesty praised her household financiers, Alexander Seton, the President; Lindsay, Elphinstone, and Thomas Hamilton. James resolved to employ them in Treasury matters: Seton throve to be the great Chancellor, Dunfermline; Elphinstone, as Balmerino, had a remarkable career of favour, with a mournful end; and Hamilton, popularly styled Tam o' the Cowgate, flourished as King's Advocate, was created Lord Binning, then Earl of Melrose, and founded the existing House of Haddington. The anecdote of the New Year's purse of gold is related by John Colville.<sup>71</sup>

NOTES TO CHAPTER XIV.

- <sup>1</sup> Border Calendar, i. 490; August 15, 1593.
- <sup>2</sup> Sir James Melville, pp. 414-417; Calderwood, v. 256, 257; Spottiswoode, ii. 433, 434; Border Calendar, i. 481-484.
- <sup>3</sup> Border Calendar, i. 491. Calderwood, v. 257, 258.
- <sup>5</sup> Spanish Papers, iv. 588, 613, 614. <sup>6</sup> Border Calendar, i. 490 et seq.
- <sup>7</sup> Border Calendar, i. 486-488. An account of the trial.
- <sup>8</sup> Border Calendar, i. 488, 489.
- <sup>9</sup> Calderwood, v. 259; Border Calendar, i. 493.
- <sup>10</sup> Calderwood, v. 269. <sup>11</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iv. 363.
- <sup>12</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 634. <sup>13</sup> Border Calendar, i. 497, 498.
- <sup>14</sup> Calderwood, v. 259-261; Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 635.
- <sup>15</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iv. 383, 384. <sup>16</sup> Border Calendar, i. 502.
- <sup>17</sup> Forbes-Leith, Narratives of Scottish Catholics, p. 191.
- <sup>18</sup> Letters of John Colville, pp. 258, 259; Bannatyne Club, 1858.
- <sup>19</sup> Moysie, Memoirs, p. 105. <sup>20</sup> Spottiswoode, ii. 437.
- <sup>21</sup> Bowes to Cecil, Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 636.
- <sup>22</sup> Calderwood, v. 270; Border Calendar, i. 506, 507.
- <sup>23</sup> Calderwood, v. 225. <sup>24</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iv. 430.
- <sup>25</sup> Bowes to Cecil; Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 637.
- <sup>26</sup> Calderwood, v. 273, 274. <sup>27</sup> Border Calendar, i. 510. October 31.
- <sup>28</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 638. <sup>29</sup> Calderwood, v. 289, 290.
- <sup>30</sup> Tytler, ix. 146. I have been unable to find the letter, quoted by Mr Tytler at the Record Office.
- <sup>31</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 646. <sup>32</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 646.
- <sup>33</sup> Cecil to Zouche, March 12, Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 647.
- <sup>34</sup> Historie of King James the Sext, pp. 306-314.
- <sup>35</sup> Letters of John Colville, pp. 259, 260; Border Calendar, i. 525-528.
- <sup>36</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 650; Historie of King James the Sext, pp. 312-314.
- <sup>37</sup> Bowes to Burghley, April 30, Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 650.
- <sup>38</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iv. 504.
- <sup>39</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iv. 517, 518. <sup>40</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iv. 523, 524.
- <sup>41</sup> Historie of King James the Sext, pp. 324, 325.
- <sup>42</sup> Calderwood, v. 299, 321, 323.
- <sup>43</sup> Tytler, ix. 151-154, citing a Warrender MS.; Hatfield Calendar, iv. 509, 510, April 13, 1594.
- <sup>44</sup> Calderwood, v. 337, 338.
- <sup>45</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, v. 654, 655; Spanish State Papers, iv. 590.
- <sup>46</sup> Letters of John Colville, p. 106.
- <sup>47</sup> Colville to Cecil, July 30, Letters of John Colville, pp. 113-115.
- <sup>48</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iv. 629, 630. <sup>49</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iv. 630-632.
- <sup>50</sup> Moysie, Memoirs, p. 104. <sup>51</sup> Privy Council Register, v. 173.
- <sup>52</sup> Hatfield Calendar, iv. 583.
- <sup>53</sup> John Colville's Letters, pp. 123-131.
- <sup>54</sup> Miss Warrender's Illustrations of Scottish History, pp. 45-51, Bothwell to the ministers.
- <sup>55</sup> Spanish State Papers, iv. 590, 591.

<sup>56</sup> James Melville, pp. 318, 319; Privy Council Register, Aberdeen, October 19, v. 182.

<sup>57</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 668.

<sup>58</sup> Cockburne to Bowes, Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 668.

<sup>59</sup> Calderwood, v. 361, 362.

<sup>60</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 670, 671; Border Calendar, ii. 17.

<sup>61</sup> Calderwood, v. 364, 365. Colville writes that he was present at the taking of Hercules, but interceded for his life (Letters, p. 139).

<sup>62</sup> Calderwood, v. 366; Creighton, An Apologie, Miscellany of the Scottish History Society, i. 53.

<sup>63</sup> Letters of John Colville, p. 146.

<sup>64</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 679, 680.

<sup>65</sup> State Papers, Scot., MS. Eliz., vol. lvi., No. 62.

<sup>66</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 689-692.

<sup>67</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 705, February 24.

<sup>68</sup> Calderwood, v. 380.

<sup>69</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 699; Privy Council Register, v. 235, 236.

<sup>70</sup> Privy Council Register, v. 246 et seq.

<sup>71</sup> Letters of John Colville, p. 190.

CHAPTER XV.

THE KING CONQUERS THE PREACHERS.

1596-1597.

THE year 1596 was one of the most remarkable in the history of Scotland. The empty exchequer caused the king to adopt one, if not two, unusual measures. The first was the appointment of a board of eight men to control finance and expenditure: these "Octavians," as they were called, became practically a ruling Cabinet, but their authority did not outlive the year. The king's second expedient, if we may believe statements which contain suspicious elements, was the endeavour to raise money from Spain and the Pope, accompanying his petitions with promises of change of creed. The history of the relations of Church and State in this year was rich in variety. As Calderwood writes, "The Kirk of Scotland was now come to her perfection, and the greatest puritie that ever she atteaned unto, both in doctrine and discipline, so that her beautie was admirable to forraine Kirks." But before the carols of Christmas-tide were sung (these were among the left-hand fallings off which good men deplored) all was changed, and there began "that doolefull decay and declynning of this Kirk, which has continued to this houre, proceeding from worse to worse," for Calderwood wrote before the glorious revival of the Kirk in the Great Rebellion. The return of the Catholic earls, involving the decay of the Kirk, and the famous affair of Kinmont Willie, also marked the year 1596.

The Octavians, appointed as auditors of the Exchequer for life, for the collection and administration of public and royal revenue and expenditure, were a body who sat daily without salary. James was personally reckless in expenditure and lavish in giving, while funds were collected with difficulty, and official salaries were always in arrears. The Octavians were expected to take order in these affairs, but the suspicion of idolatry that was attached to some of them mortally offended good men; while bad men, the Cubiculars or courtiers, resented their economies. The end, at the close of the year, was a revolutionary scene, and the Octavians fell in the crash of Kirk, State, and Court. The Octavians themselves appear to have been wisely selected. First comes the President of the Court of Session, Alexander Seton, called Lord Urquhart, the third son of George, seventh Lord Seton, the famous Catholic friend of Mary Stuart. Every one knows his sister, Catherine Seton, the charming fictitious heroine of 'The Abbot.' The son of such a father as Lord Seton, this Octavian could not but be suspected of leanings to idolatry, and he was to be especially odious for his share in reintroducing the banished Catholic earls. William Stewart, lay Prior of Blantyre, was also a judge, and rose to be Treasurer. Carnegie of Colluthie had long been an active member of the Privy Council, and belonged to a shire of dubious Protestantism. John Lindsay, a member of the House of Crawford, was one of the judges, a man of affairs, who had worked hard at a scheme for the proper endowment of the Kirk. Ecclesiastical finance, owing to the change of faith and the depredations of laymen, was in a state of chaos, and it is asserted that four hundred parishes were unsupplied with regular ministers. Lindsay drew up what was called "The Constant Plat," or scheme, for Church endowment. The experienced Alexander Hay, Clerk of Register, held that no such scheme could be invented, or, if invented, carried into practice; Lindsay constructed the system, but died in Hay's belief that it was impracticable.<sup>1</sup> The details of the plan are too complicated for such a work as this, but Lindsay acknowledges that there is no means at present to augment the stipends of poor ministers, nor to plant new ministers, "albeit the most part of all the parish kirks of Scotland are altogether destitute of all exercise of religion."

Every reader must have remarked that vice and wickedness, if they did not increase after the Reformation, at all events did not diminish, and we might infer that Calvinism, whatever its merits, bore no better moral fruits than plain idolatry had borne. But it ought not to be forgotten that, thanks to the greed of the nobles and gentry of the Congregation of the Lord, many parts of Scotland were as destitute of religious teaching as the Solomon Islands, or at best the pious had to climb by ladders into the upper rooms, where skulking Jesuit missionaries officiated.<sup>2</sup> The financial scheme of this Octavian, Lindsay, for re-endowment, was therefore grateful to the preachers, though they not unjustly held that the Court used the "plat" as a mere sop to conciliate the Brethren.<sup>3</sup>

Another Octavian, Elphinstone of Innernaughty, was one of the judges, but was suspected of Catholicism, as was Hamilton of Drumcairn, "Tam o' the Cowgate," so called from his palace in that street of palaces. Skene of Curriehill, also a judge, was one of the most eminent of Scottish legists, a classical scholar, and well acquainted with the Teutonic languages,—“a good, true, stout man, like a Dutchman.” Finally we have Mr Peter Young, James's old tutor and librarian, whom he employed on diplomatic missions. He, at least, was a good Protestant. It may seem that James could have made no better selection of officials, all men of learning in law or in fine scholarship. If they lay under suspicion of Catholic tendencies, that merely proves the slender hold of Calvinism on the higher intelligences of the country, despite the adherence of St Andrews with its distinguished scholars.<sup>4</sup>

The year opened, politically, with the return of Bowes as Elizabeth's ambassador. Elizabeth complained of want of money: James lamented her broken promises. She hinted that there were rumours of his dealing with Spain: he replied that Spain was liberal, but that he would not be entangled in the threatened plan of invasion. How far we may think him honest depends on our sense of an intrigue at Rome and Madrid, then being conducted by a person who bore alleged letters of credit from James.<sup>5</sup> That negotiator, Ogilvie of Pourie, concerning whom more is to be said later, had since June 1595 been dealing with Spaniards in the Low Countries. He left Scotland when Huntly was exiled, and a letter of a Catholic sympathiser at Campveire (February 24) speaks of “the King of Scots man” (Pourie) as “a false knave,” adding, “his credit is lost with Huntly and Errol.”<sup>6</sup> Was Pourie actually “the King of Scots man,” was he an accredited envoy to Spain and the Pope; if so, were all his papers and promises genuine? He was at once James's spy on Huntly, Cecil's spy on James, and an adventurer intriguing “for his own hand.” James was perhaps trying to get papal and Spanish gold, and to induce Philip to regard him as successor to the English crown, at which Philip, with the assent of a party of the English Catholics, was aiming himself. James was perfactly capable of deceiving Elizabeth, Spain, and the Pope; but, on the other hand, Pourie was "a false knave," and the truth about this intrigue (which the Kirk shrewdly suspected to be in progress) is hard to ascertain. Bowes, at all events (March 10), sent an unwontedly favourable report of James's loyalty, and efforts in the cause of religion, justice, peace, and sound finance.<sup>7</sup> But Lady Huntly (sister of Lennox, and a friend of the queen) was at Court, and a source of anxiety to good men.

On March 24 the General Assembly met in Edinburgh. There was a great outpouring of grace. The irreconcilable Mr Davidson handed in the ideas of the presbytery of Haddington, now, in a new sense, The Lamp of the Lothians. The Assembly ought first to deplore the national off-fallings, beginning with a catalogue of the backslidings of the ministers themselves. "Let the priests, the ministers of the Lord, weep between the porch and the altar" (Joel ii. 17). There was no altar, and sometimes no porch. Next, the more congenial theme of the sins of princes was to be faithfully exposed and lamented. It was acknowledged that the king swore terribly: indeed James's colloquial eloquence was florid both in the matters of profanity and indecency. Lastly, the offences of the general public were enumerated in "a catalogue over easy to be made."

On March 25 James made a speech to the Assembly. He wanted money for national defence; but as to his own sins he requested that he might be admonished privately. That, we conceive, was his right, and the right of the humblest of his subjects, according to the First Book of Discipline. Queen Mary had, we saw, drawn Knox's attention to this point, but he replied evasively. James declared that "his chamber door should be patent to the meanest minister in Scotland," but the preachers much preferred "to do it in public," to castigate him from the pulpit. Regarding money for national defence, Andrew Melville proposed to take it from the property of the Catholic exiles. This was a natural suggestion, but the earls had only gone abroad on a compromise arranged by Huntly's brother-in-law, Lennox. Their wives and families were not left destitute, but enjoyed their estates. Melville denounced this arrangement, which was part of the detested policy of not extirpating and ruining Catholics. Doubtless, according to the law of the land and his own promises, James ought to have extirpated all idolaters. But however desirable that policy may be ideally, reasons of State, and of family affection, perhaps even of the old Adam, our fallen nature, prevented

James and the ruling classes from making real the ideal of the Kirk. In Knox's time the same slackness had been displayed. Technically, the ministers were right, and could charge James with hypocrisy and falsehood; but in a world of compromise practical politicians may incline to palliate his offence.

In reply to Davidson, who followed Melville on the same side, James said that he would not refuse to be judged by the Assembly, or any minister, "providing it be done privately." Davidson, turning to his brethren, answered that as to whether private admonition for "open, and manifest continuing therein" (in sin), was in accordance with the Word of God, "ye are to judge." The Book of Discipline recommends private admonition first, then public denunciation if the sinner persists. But what is "sin"? Of that the preachers, "the prophets," were to be judges, and their inspiration usually led them to denounce James's policy, or "sin," from the pulpit. James's policy (if Pourie was his envoy) was sinful enough. But the old claim to deliver inspired denunciations of the political tendencies of rulers is not compatible with the existence of the State. The preachers erected an imperium in imperio. Within a few months James dealt a heavy blow at the interfering system of the Kirk.

The Assembly then passed to its functions as the War Office of the period. Parochial Captains and county Colonels were to be selected; there were to be monthly drillings, or at least musters; corslets, muskets, and pikes were to be prepared. Later in the year the Kirk, or some of its representatives, were engaged in a scheme which would have turned these musters and muskets against the king. The financial supplies, the Assembly insisted, must be raised from the estates of the Catholic exiles. It was decided to keep a day of humiliation, Mr Davidson presiding. The enormities of the ministers were next dwelt upon: they mainly arose from the system of patronage, which probably introduced ministers "in gorgeous and light apparel," given to dancing, card-playing, and hazard, while others kept taverns, were factors or traders. It is unlikely that these joyous or commercial spirits entered the Kirk by any other door than that of patronage. Probably they did not assiduously attend the General Assemblies, where we hear little or nothing of votes given in the Court interest. The day of humiliation was March 30. With sighing and moaning "the Kirk resounded, so that it might worthily have been called Bochim."

Before leaving Bochim the Assembly held up their hands, "to testify their entering in a new league with God"; and only one person "despised that exercise"—namely, Mr Thomas Buchanan, who went not unpunished, for in the end he was killed by a fall from his horse. The renewal of the Covenant was recommended to the Kirk at large.

These impressive scenes displayed the sincere belief of the Assembly that they directly represented the people of Israel. Scotland was their Promised Land, to extirpate Amalekites was their bounden duty. The more popular preachers were prophets, like Samuel and Elijah: the king was usually cast for the part of Saul, Ahab, or Jeroboam, according to circumstances. The queen was, more or less, like the daughter of Herodias: three ministers were sent to point out that she and her ladies were too fond of dancing. As to the general public, family prayers were either neglected or directed by "cooks, stewards, jackmen, and suchlike." There were still holidays, bonfires, pilgrimages, and singing of carols at Christmas-tide. The Sabbath was not devoutly kept: profane swearing was too much exercised; there was "a flood of bloodshed and deadly feuds"; sexual morality was at a low ebb; and rents were much too high, while there was "extreme thralldom in services"—that is, labour-rents. Pipers and fiddlers and sturdy beggars were numerous. Justice was corrupt, and lay abbots, priors, and "dumb bishops" were allowed to vote as the spiritual estate in Parliament. The Court of Session was amenable to bribery.

Such is a sketch of the condition of Scotland in the year 1596, when the Kirk was now come to her perfection. "And here," says Calderwood in despair, "end all the sincere Assemblies General of the Kirk of Scotland, enjoying the liberty of the Gospel under the free government of Christ!" "Too soon despairer!" The Kirk was again to be terrible as an army with banners, till Oliver Cromwell sent an officer of hussars to turn the General Assembly into the street. (Calderwood, v. 394-411.)

While James was making as fair weather as might be with the Brethren, he had an envoy, Fowlis, at the Court of Elizabeth. But negotiations were clouded by Buccleuch's rescue of Kinmont Willie from bonds in Carlisle Castle. This joyous feat of arms is best described in the famous ballad, however much or however little it may owe to the touch of Sir Walter Scott. Kinmont Willie, to be brief, had been captured by a large force of Englishmen as he rode to his Liddesdale home on the evening of a Warden court. A truce existed, by Border law, till sunrise of the day after the meeting; but "the false Salkeld," Lord Scrope's deputy, had seized Willie contrary to law and custom. This must have been in March 1596, for Buccleuch's remonstrances are mentioned by a correspondent of Bowes on April 1.<sup>8</sup> Remonstrance with Scrope was in vain, Willie was destined to be hanged at Hairibee; but Buccleuch had taken his measures. The Castle of Carlisle was strong, the town populous, the position girdled by Esk and Eden. But Buccleuch determined on entering, by a night camisade, a fortress which had repelled the war-leaders of the Bruce. His kinsmen dwelt hard by his house of Branxholm on Teviot, four miles from Hawick. Not a mile farther down the river stands the fortalice of Goldielands; two miles across the hill behind Branxholm, on a cliff above a burn that flows into Borthwick Water, is the keep of Wat Scott of Harden. From Teviotdale, Borthwick, and Slitrig waters the Warden called in two hundred riders of his clan and of the Armstrongs. From Liddesdale, as they rode south, the Border pricklers came in, bearing scaling-ladders, crowbars, hammers, and axes. Apparently they rested at Langholm, and started thence on the following night. The Grahams of the Debatable Land were in the plot. The night was mirk with torrents of rain, but, starting from Langholm, they knew every foot of the way, splashed through Esk, swam their horses over Eden,—“The water was great, and mickle o' spate.”

“He's either himsel' a devil frae hell,
Or else his mother a witch maun be.
I wadna hae ridden that wan water
For a' the gowd o' Christentie!”

says Lord Scrope in the ballad.

At Caday burn Buccleuch dismounted most of his men and led them to the castle wall. The ladders were short, but they found an entrance, seized the sentinels, forced open a postern, and while Buccleuch kept watch in the court a band broke into the Kinmont's chamber, bore him off, ironed as he was, and the trumpets of Buccleuch sounded “Rise for Branxholm readily.” Scrope, knowing nothing as to the numbers of the assailing force, preferred the better part of valour; Willie roared his good night to the Warden, and at the first smith's bothy on the Scottish side was liberated from his "heavy spurs." Elizabeth of course was enraged, and demanded that Buccleuch, the most popular man in Scotland, should be surrendered to her. It is usually said that he was, and that he had an interview with her majesty, but, after a brief period of courteous warding in St Andrews Castle, James released the gallant captor of Carlisle (November 10).<sup>9</sup> Buccleuch was needed on the Border,* and he had only righted by the strong hand a wrong which the strong hand had done. By way of raising a counter-grievance, James complained that he and his mother had been insulted in Spenser's "Faery Queen," but Edmund Spenser escaped trial and punishment.<sup>10</sup>

At this time our old acquaintance, Archibald Douglas, was in trouble on a charge of trafficking with Bothwell. All his craft had not availed to keep him in that singular diplomatic situation of a semi-official envoy of Scotland, paid by England.<sup>11</sup> We hear little more of this versatile and unredeemed miscreant, who dwindles into a spy of the Cecils.

With the warm weather of early summer the Catholic exiles and their friends began to bestir themselves. Lady Huntly was at Court, and, no doubt, was working privately on the king and queen. From Augsburg a Mr Anderson sent a warning letter to the preachers (April 27, 1596). "The storm was imminent," intriguers were busy at Rome, Walter Lindsay had been sent to Spain. But the Spaniards objected that, after sending large sums in gold, they had not received their money's worth from Huntly and his allies. They blamed Bruce, who, as we saw, declared that Huntly could not be trusted with the gold, and Bruce was now under a cloud. In fact none of them, nor any Scot of any party, could be trusted with money. Bruce himself was a double spy, as occasion ministered opportunity. One of the Lethingtons (author of the MS. Apology for his father, the great Secretary) was travelling in Italy on treasonable business, which he had already worked from the house of his father-in-law, Lord Herries, dealing especially with Cecil, an English priest.<sup>12</sup>

This Cecil, a secular priest, and a spy of his namesakes, the statesmen Cecils, was, in fact, accompanying and counter-working Ogilvie of Pourie. In September 1594 Pourie had been denounced as a papist and rebel.<sup>13</sup> Yet in the years 1595-96 he appears in the Low Countries and Italy calling himself accredited envoy of James to the Pope, Spain, and idolaters in general. To the Pope he presented what he called James's petitions: James asked for 2000 gold crowns a-month that he might put down his rebels, and 4000 a-month after he had professed Catholicism. Father Tyrie plainly said that James's promises in the way of religion were all "invention and deceit." Another paper was designed to show, by James's past conduct, that he was no enemy of Catholics. In fact the paper justified all the suspicions which the preachers entertained about the king. But the statements themselves have a very suspicious air. James must have known, for instance, that his father was not "Earl of Lennox," and was not murdered by order of Elizabeth! Yet Pourie makes James talk thus in his Letter of Credit. Indeed Pourie made so many absurd and contradictory proposals that he was not trusted at Rome, nor in Spain. He was accompanied by the secular priest, named Cecil, already mentioned as a spy of his namesakes in England, and Cecil wrote a tract against Pourie's statements in favour of James. Pourie was imprisoned at Barcelona, and the Catholics of the English and Spanish faction had a bitter controversy among themselves over the whole set of transactions. Cecil (the priest-spy) maintained that Pourie's letter of credit from James was either forged or obtained by fraud. Pourie declared later that he had no commission, and erred only from trop de zèle. Both Pourie and Cecil became spies of the Cecils, and in May the Ministers of Elizabeth seem to have received the papers of both intriguers. On July 13 Bowes enclosed copies to Cecil, with a letter from the Spanish Ambassador at Rome to the King of Spain.<sup>14</sup> It is not easy to determine the amount, if any, of James's share in these futile plots, but if, in despair of Elizabeth, he was promising to Spain and the Pope his conversion to their creed, he was certainly deceiving these Powers.* Probably Pourie had forged his letters of credit, or had amplified something of milder character.<sup>15</sup> The documents, as any reader must see, are impudent impostures as they stand.

* He was later warded in Berwick for other reasons. Still later he had an interview with Elizabeth on his way to fight in the Low Countries.

In any case, the elder Cecil's suspicions were aroused. In a letter to his son, Sir Robert (July 10), he speaks of the Octavians as "hollow papists," and advises that Bowes should ferret out things concerning them by aid of the preachers.<sup>16</sup> This was written after Cecil had got wind of the proceedings of Pourie, which were communicated to James. (By October Pourie appears to have been in alliance with Cecil.) The king, of course, denied that he had any share in Pourie's enterprise (August 3), and declared that, to his knowledge, Huntly had not returned to Scotland. Lady Huntly, however, was making suit for her husband.<sup>17</sup> By August 10 Bowes announced Huntly's arrival: the Kirk was greatly dissatisfied. Robert Cecil advised Bowes that, if Huntly was likely to come into the king's peace, he had better invite Elizabeth to mediate for him (August 27). The ministers began to preach against Huntly, who, by returning without licence, had certainly broken the compact; though it was whispered that James had licensed both him and Angus.<sup>18</sup> The excitement of the ministers on the reappearance of an idolater, the murderer of the Bonny Earl, may be imagined. On October 19 Lady Huntly proposed certain conditions to the synod of Moray. Her lord offered himself for trial, and, if convicted, would "underly the censures of your wisdoms, king, and Council." He would give security for his behaviour; would banish from his presence all Jesuits and notorious papists; would listen to the arguments of the preachers, and be converted, if he could; would keep "an ordinar minister" in his house; and he begged for a reasonable time wherein to be conscientiously converted.

* See a letter of Pourie to James, written in 1601, at end of chapter xviii., p. 496.

On October 20 the Commissioners of the General Assembly and the synods met at Edinburgh, and sent a circular to all the presbyteries. The most dangerous and threatening fact had been a decision of Council at Falkland on August 12.<sup>19</sup> It had been decided that Huntly should not receive licence for his return. But James, in the exercise of his clemency, would draw up conditions: if Huntly accepted these the country would be free from the dangers incident on the exile and discontent of the Catholic earls. Seton, the President, pleaded in favour of this plan: Andrew Melville burst in uncalled, and charged everybody with "high treason both against Christ and the king." James turned Andrew out, and won over James Melville and the other brethren present. "The Estates conclude that, the king and Kirk being satisfied, it were best to call them" (the exiles) "home, and that his majesty should hear their offers for that effect."<sup>20</sup> Early in October the Melvilles and the others again approached James. The younger Melville spoke temperately, but the irascible Andrew "doucht nocht abyd it"— could not endure it. He seized James by the sleeve, "he laid his hands on an anointed king," and called his sovereign "God's silly vassal." There were in Scotland, Mr Melville observed with much vehemence, two kings, Christ and James. Now the preachers were the deputies of the former and superior monarch, and James must attend to them, and not to his "devilish and most pernicious" lay advisers.

James had not much nerve when confronted by this kind of violence, as Fontaine had observed ten years earlier. He ought to have called the Guard (if he had any) to remove Mr Melville, but he truckled. A king should not permit himself to be practically collared in his own house by a furious college don. But his majesty, according to James Melville, promised that the exiles should not be heard till they left the country, and should not come into his peace till they satisfied the Kirk.<sup>21</sup>

It was in consequence of all these proceedings that the Commissioners of the General Assembly met in Edinburgh on October 20. They recited the circumstances, warned the country, ordered a day of public humiliation in the first week of December; decided that the excommunication of the earls should be published; and established a permanent Committee of Public Safety in Edinburgh. They also had what to modern minds seems the extravagant insolence to summon the President, Seton, Lord Urquhart, before the synod of Lothian.<sup>22</sup> Whether these things were, or were not, within the powers of the Kirk, ecclesiastical lawyers may decide. But the proceedings, legally justifiable or not, were absolutely unendurable, and how Cromwell would have dealt with the officers of the General Assembly we can readily guess. James was not Oliver. He sent Seton and others to treat with some of the preachers, in place of warding them in Blackness. He offered to show the exiles no favour till they had satisfied the Kirk. This offer the Commissioners of the Kirk graciously accepted. Next he humbly inquired whether, if the exiles did satisfy the Kirk, he might be allowed to extend to them his favour? The Commissioners answered, No, he might not. The law of God and Parliament had adjudged the exiles to death. But the bosom of the Kirk would he open to the repentant. Apparently, if repentant, the exiles might die, free from excommunication. Mr Tytler takes this sense of the decision.<sup>23</sup> If he is right, the Kirk was, in modern phrase, "rather above herself."

James also was in an exalted frame of mind. There was at this time a St Andrews minister named Black, who is said to have caused a moral reformation in a city which sadly needed it. On November 1 Bowes reported to Cecil that Mr Black had used in a sermon offensive phrases about Queen Elizabeth. The preachers and the English embassy were usually close allies, but Mr Black's words could not be passed over. The event at once irritated James, and afforded him a handle against the Brethren. His annoyance was freely expressed, and on November 9 four preachers were sent for to converse with him.<sup>24</sup> The preachers remonstrated: James's "common talk was inventions against the ministers and their doctrine." Whether this meant that James invented stories, or believed the inventions of others, the phrase was uncivil. They also complained of his favour to the exiles, and to Lady Huntly, who had been invited to the baptism of the queen's daughter, Elizabeth, later the beautiful unhappy Queen of Bohemia. Further, the child's governess was to be Lady Livingstone, a Catholic, whom the Kirk meant to excommunicate.

James replied. There could be no peace between him and the Kirk "till the marches of their jurisdiction were rade" or defined. They must not preach on affairs of State. The General Assembly must not be convoked except by his authority. This appears to have been the actual state of the laws since 1592. It was lawful for the Kirk every year, and oftener as occasion arose, to hold General Assemblies, provided that the king or his Commissioners with them, before each Assembly dissolved, "nominate time and place, when and where the next General Assembly shall be holden."<sup>25</sup> Thus the preachers could not legally spring an Assembly on James, and perhaps raise levies of armed men. Thirdly, James required that Acts of the Assembly, as of Parliament, must receive his ratification. Fourthly, the Kirk must not meddle with cases which fell under the civil or criminal law of the country. He granted nothing as to the grievances about the earls and the ladies. The preachers replied, and sent some of their number to study the legislation affecting the Kirk. That day (November 11) the preachers learned that Mr Black of St Andrews was called before the king and Council for "infamous speeches" in his sermons during October. As Aston reported to Bowes, Black had styled Elizabeth an atheist; Bowes had remonstrated, and Black was summoned.<sup>26</sup> He had called all kings "devil's bairns," insulted the queen, and so forth. If correctly reported, Black had certainly gone to great lengths. On November 12 "the whole Brethren of the Council" (the sixteen members, apparently, of the Kirk's Committee of Public Safety) summoned Lady Huntly, bade the presbytery of Stirling excommunicate Lady Livingstone, and decided that Black should decline the jurisdiction of the king and Council. Probably the Brethren were within their legal rights on the first two points, considering the penal laws against Catholics. By November 16 they had reduced James to promise "to purge the land from all papists and papistrie, and to suffer none, in whatsoever degree, to be of another religion that he was of," whatever that may have been. As to Black, James "thought not much of that matter"; only let Mr Black "compeare" and prove his innocence, satisfying the English Ambassador. "But take heed, sirs," said James, "that ye decline not my jurisdiction; for if ye do so, it will be worse." The Brethren, then (November 17), wrote out Black's declinature of jurisdiction, and signed it, all of them.

Whether the Brethren were now technically within their legal rights, as at that hour existing, is a question for legists. Dr M'Crie, whose sympathies were on the side of the Kirk, has discussed the problem in reference to an earlier declinature, practical if not explicit, by Andrew Melville (1584). Others, Dr M'Crie remarks, had declined, in secular matters, the jurisdiction of the Council, and appealed to that of the Lords of Session. The case is not parallel, of course, to the old claim of criminal clerks to be tried by courts spiritual, say, on charges of murder or theft. Black only appealed to trial by his brethren, as a court of first instance.<sup>27</sup> Dr M'Crie did not uphold the theory that a preacher, if acquitted by his brethren of treasonable phrases in a sermon, was free from trial thereafter by the civil magistrate on the same count. Such a claim, says the learned author, would have "deserved to be resisted and reprobated." The question, however, ought first to have been heard before an ecclesiastical tribunal. If they, through the influence of undue partiality, should justify the accused "erroneously, it was still competent for the civil magistrate to proceed against him."<sup>28</sup> "Such was the full amount of the claim made by the Church at this time."

This is vastly well, but who was to determine whether the ecclesiastical court, in acquitting a preacher accused of treasonable or libellous remarks in his sermons, decided "erroneously" or not?

To judge by the language used in Mr Black's declinature, and indorsed by the signatures of many leading preachers, the ecclesiastical court in such cases was incapable of judging "erroneously." Dr M'Crie knew that "undue partiality" was possible in a tribunal of ministers, and was aware that presbyteries and Assemblies (like General Councils, in the Anglican theory) "may err, and have erred." The civil courts, in Dr M'Crie's view, might (in such instances) revise the judgment and correct the error, and he appears to hold that the Kirk of 1596 was of the same opinion. Now it is true that Mr Black declined the jurisdiction of the Council, "at least in the first instance."<sup>29</sup> It seems to be, at least, arguable that Black had a right to decline secular judges "in the first instance."<sup>30</sup> But if we read on, we shall find the words "in the first instance" are a mere technicality or "hedge," for the language of the declinature indicates the opinion that there could be no "second instance," that nobody could pretend that the decision of the ecclesiastical court might be "erroneous," and that, if dissatisfied by the decision of the Kirk, the Government had no appeal. Black and his allies maintained that he was the "ambassador" of our blessed Lord; that "the Word" contained his "only instructions"; that, when preaching, he "cannot fall in the reverence of any civil law of man, but in so far as I shall be found to have passed the compass of my instructions." Now, this question "cannot be judged . . . but by the prophets"—that is, the other ministers. Therefore "of necessity the prophets" (in this case the Fife presbytery) "must first declare whether I have kepted the bounds of my directions before I come to be judged by your majesty's laws for my offence."<sup>31</sup>

It is plain that if the prophets are the first judges in such a case as Black's (and this he asserts), there is no court that can revise the prophets' verdict. Neither the Council nor the Lords of Session were inspired; in fact, part of the charge against Black was that he had denounced both courts as corrupt, and as cormorants. His conduct "cannot be judged except by the prophets." The words as to "the first instance" are therefore meaningless, if the presbytery acquits the accused. In this essential respect the claims of the preachers in 1596 differ from the opinion of Dr M'Crie in 1819. Dr M'Crie admits the possibility of error in the verdict, say, of the Fife presbytery. Mr Black and his allies do not admit the possibility of error. The prophets (the presbytery) are inspired, and (in this matter) are infallible representatives of the apostles, and inherit directly the apostolic privilege of judgment.

For our present historical purposes it does not matter whether the charges against Black were well bottomed on evidence or not. It does not matter whether the state of the law as it stood justified his declinature or not. Nor are we concerned with the fact that Black would have had no more chance of a fair trial before the Council than the king would have received unbiassed justice from the prophets. Historically we only try to show what the claims of the Brethren actually were. In such cases as Black's they would be judged by the prophets in the first instance, and, by the nature of their contention, there could be no second instance. Therefore the Kirk was the ruler of the State. That James and his Council placed themselves legally in the wrong during these proceedings is highly probable, or certain. But our object is to explain the precise attitude towards civil jurisdiction assumed by the preachers. Black's declinature was given in on November 18. Cessford and the bold Buccleuch, men of this world, were among the Council. The minutes of the day record that Black "alleged that none should be judges of matters delivered in the pulpit but the preachers and ministers of the Word," and therefore desired to be remitted to his judge ordinary—namely, his presbytery—to which James must come as a Christian, not as a king. He admitted that James might judge in matters of treason, but the Church must judge in the first instance.<sup>32</sup>

The Brethren now (November 20) sent the declinature to all the presbyteries, with a letter inviting the other prophets to sign it. This irritated James, and the Committee of Presbyterian Public Safety appointed a General Assembly to be held in January (November 24). This they did without the presence of the king or his Commissioner, contrary to the law of 1592, or so it seems to the present writer. They also sent four of their number to ask James to leave off "pursuing" Black till after this General Assembly.<sup>33</sup> On the same day the Privy Council declared the Committee of Public Safety (the permanent session of the sixteen Commissioners of the General Assembly) to be illegal. They meant, by sending round the declinature for signature, to "raise trouble, sedition, and insurrection." The Commissioners must therefore return to their neglected flocks within twenty-four hours. They must desist from calling unlawful convocations of barons and others.<sup>34</sup> The Commissioners refused to obey this order. James weakly permitted them to remain and split straws of legal delicacy. They would defer the declinature if James would postpone pursuit of Black till after the meeting of the Assembly. On November 30 the king and Council unanimously voted themselves lawful judges in the case of Black. But on the same day Black was again summoned, the summons being "slanderous, blasphemous, and malicious," says Calderwood.

The "convocations" assembled by the preachers without royal licence were pronounced seditious. The Committee of Public Safety (the sixteen Commissioners of the Kirk) were bidden to leave Edinburgh in twenty-four hours. In reply they ordered the preachers to "deal mightily by the Word" against the king's proclamation. The preachers are "answerable" to Christ alone, "and not to be controlled or discharged by any other." Here is a plain proof that their verdicts could not be revised by any lay court.<sup>35</sup> On November 29 the Sixteen had drawn up articles to be presented to James. Their general purpose was to remit the matters under consideration to the General Assembly. On November 30 Black put in a second declinature, full of Scriptural texts. James once more tried to escape the battle by a feeble personal compromise, which the Commissioners refused. He would pardon Black, if Black would come and "resolve his majesty of the truth of all the points libelled, by the declaration of his own conscience."<sup>36</sup> In fact James had practically truckled, and renounced his cause, when some of his advisers put a little heart into him, and he sent to Black bidding him come and confess "an offence done to the queen at least, and so receive pardon." Black appealed to testimonials which he had received from the city and University of St Andrews, and would "confess no fault, how light soever."<sup>37</sup> On December 2 the Council found Black guilty in his absence, left the penalty to the king, and meanwhile ordered him to pass "be north the North Water," on pain of outlawry if he disobeyed.<sup>38</sup>

Even after this "truces" and negotiations went on, James trying to have peace with a shred of honour, which he could not keep if he did not punish Black in the terms of the decision of December 2. The President, Seton, was blamed for enlightening James on the rather obvious point that his jurisdiction over the Kirk was not secured unless Black was put to some penalty.<sup>39</sup> All this while fasts were being kept, and the people were being excited by sermons; "the doctrine sounded powerfully;" in fact there was organised agitation (Sunday, December 12). On December 13 James announced his intention to cut off the supplies of the preachers, by refusing their stipends to such as would not sign a "band" which was to be submitted to them.<sup>40</sup> The Sixteen were desiring the presbytery of Edinburgh to excommunicate "such persons of highest rank as are known, or may be found, to be malicious enemies against the ministry and cause of Jesus Christ."<sup>41</sup> This was a strong measure. The presbytery might choose to think the king and Council malicious enemies, and might deliver them, and all who harboured them, over to Satan. But now the sixteen Commissioners were officially summoned to leave Edinburgh within twenty-four hours. They obeyed, leaving a manifesto behind them. James once more tried to negotiate, but the Edinburgh preachers would not parley till the Commissioners were publicly recalled.

James at this time appears to have been a mere shuttlecock. When in presence of the Commissioners he looked on all sides for an evasion. When surrounded by his Council he adopted vigorous measures which next day he tried to water down. But on December 17 events occurred which at once forced his hand and gave him an opportunity. For three weeks the pulpits had rung with "the doctrine," the populace was at once puzzled and irritated—the Presbyterian populace, for we learn nothing about the Catholic populace, which Davidson dreaded worse than the Court. Probably "the rascal multitude" (earnest professors apart) had no very fixed theological tenets, but was merely "against the Government." If the king had the upper hand, they would be against him. If the preachers "ruled the roast," as the saying was, and interfered with markets and holidays, the multitude would be against the preachers. On this occasion the populace was on the side of the "prophets." It has been said that the "Cubiculars," gentlemen of the Household, hated the Octavians for their economical measures. But they naturally did not love the precise. They therefore circulated rumours—on one hand, that the lives of the Octavians were in danger from the citizens; on the other, that the Octavians were the causes of the ill-treatment of the Kirk. Twenty-four substantial burgesses, the story went, were to be expelled from the good town. News of a private intrigue, by a "macer" for banishing a bookseller, reached Balcanquhel, or Balcalquall, the preacher, who preached a sermon on the subject. Bruce next held what is now styled "an indignation meeting," in the "Little Kirk," where he had an audience of barons and other gentlemen.

This meeting was a "convention," not a congregation. Balcanquhel "showed that he had a warrant from the Kirk to convene them," and such conventions, gathered by warrants from the Kirk, for political purposes and without royal authority, the king reckoned illegal. Bruce directed the Assembly "to hold up their hands, vow and swear to defend the present state of religion against all opponents whomsoever."<sup>42</sup> Among those present, Bowes writes, was the great Maclean, he of the hauberk and the battle-axe, the hero of Glenrinnes. The meeting deputed the fierce Lord Lindsay and others to visit James, who was sitting with the judges in the Tolbooth. During their absence Cranstoun, a preacher, read to the angry crowd the story of Haman and Mordecai, "and such other places of Scripture." The king received the deputation with courtesy, he declares; but they went back to their allies discontented, and, according to Spottiswoode, numbers of people were at this time thronging unmannerly into the king's presence. The multitude was great, armed, perplexed, and unruly. How dense was the throng we may gather from the proceedings of Maclean of Duart. "Hearing the tumult kindling in the streets, he sought access to the king for the defence of his person, which he could not attain," says Bowes (December 21). Lachlan was no weakling, but he could not force a way through the rioters. He was not timid, but he deemed the situation so grave that he rode post-haste to Argyll in Stirling, apparently thinking that Clan Gilzean and Clan Diarmaid were needed for the royal rescue. These facts, neglected by our historians, prove that there was a veritable appearance of danger, which the Presbyterian writers endeavour to deny.<sup>43</sup>

Spottiswoode, later no Presbyterian, describes a scene of uproar: "some cried to arm, others to bring out Haman"; and the tumult was only stilled by a man Wat, who with a guard of craftsmen kept the mob from assaulting the door of the Tolbooth. Sir Alexander Home, too, the Provost, rose from a bed of sickness, and his eloquence had the pacifying effect of a vir pietate gravis. Calderwood admits that "two or three" came to the Tolbooth yelling for Octavians to be delivered to them. He also says that the nobles and gentlemen in the Kirk went out in armour, which was not usually worn in church. The armour may have been donned by the town, as James Melville says, after a cry of a popish massacre was raised; for there was a report that Errol was approaching in force, and other wild rumours.<sup>44</sup> Mar went to the churchyard, where he and Lindsay wrangled. It is certain that there was a hubbub, and that the godly were in arms, with Lindsay at their head. The immediate cause was the sermon of Balcanquhail and the action of Bruce. Less than all this was enough to alarm and irritate James. He bade the discontented nobles send in their grievances in writing, and, the uproar being ended, went to Holyrood with the city magistrates. About five o'clock a deputation came to Holyrood, coolly bidding James dismiss his Ministers, but got no answer. The king, "being misinformed that the ministers had stirred up the town to that tumult, was in a great rage that night against them and the town." This is not very surprising; "the doctrine had been sounded mightily" for weeks, and sermons less numerous had caused tumults much more dangerous in times past.<sup>45</sup>

Next morning (December 18) the noisy townfolk learned that the Court had withdrawn to the Palace of Linlithgow. James met Maclean and Argyll on his way as they returned from Stirling. A royal proclamation, delivered at the cross, damped the civic ardour. James announced that a treasonable sermon had been preached at St Giles's; an assembly of nobles, barons, and others convoked; that the ministers and gentlemen had broken in on the king with violent and seditious discourses; that most of the burgesses, "hounded out" by the preachers, had treasonably armed themselves, and endangered the lives of his peaceful majesty and others. The Court of Session and the Court were therefore removed from Edinburgh; he bade strangers in the town depart in six hours, and prohibited them from convocating anywhere by persuasion of the preachers or others.<sup>46</sup> This measure terrified the burgesses with fear of loss of business, caused by the withdrawal of the courtiers, and of all who sought the town on legal affairs. The intrepid Mr Robert Bruce, as indomitable as his royal namesake, did not despair of the Kirk. We have seen that for some time the practical head of the almost Royal House of Hamilton, a house which had long wavered between Church and Kirk, was a true blue Presbyterian. He it was who had thrice ingeminated "Then are we all gone," when James had whispered that there might be such a thing as religious toleration. To Lord Hamilton Mr Bruce instantly applied himself (December 18). He wrote that, after many wrongs, the retention of stipends, the expulsion of the Sixteen, the warding of Black, the similar threats against the preachers and "a great number of our flock," the populace had taken up arms. The commotion had been pacified by the preachers (though really the Provost seems to have deserved the credit). The godly barons and others "have convened themselves, and taken upon them the patrocine and mediation of the Kirk and her cause." Bruce did not add that the godly barons had convened in arms. "They lack a chief nobleman to countenance the matter against these councillors, and with one consent have thought it meet that I should write unto your lordship." Hamilton was therefore prayed to come, employ his credit, "and so to receive the honour that God calls unto you." Four preachers signed the request. If Hamilton had complied he would have disobeyed the royal proclamation against assemblages convened by the ministers.

As the letter was on its way (if we believe Spottiswoode and the 'Register of the Privy Council,' for Calderwood does not mention the circumstance) Mr John Welsh preached in St Giles's. This celebrated saint, the husband of Knox's daughter, Elizabeth, and an ancestor of Mrs Thomas Carlyle, "did rail pitifully against the king, saying that he was possessed with a devil." He used the favourite commonplace of the Scottish Liberals: the king was like an insane father of a family, whom his sons might dutifully disarm and tie hand and foot. Mr Welsh in early youth had been a Border reiver, and was of a high temper. According to Spottiswoode (iii. 34), Hamilton received the bearer of Bruce's letter well, and returned the original by the bearer. This, as we shall later see<sup>47</sup> in the case of Gowrie and Logan of Restalrig, was the usual precaution in cases of treasonable conspiracy. Had Hamilton been daring and ambitious, he might probably have overpowered James at Linlithgow, though Bruce suggested no such measure. But, on the other hand, he had a copy made of the letter, a copy "vitiating and adulterated." In this copy the rioters were said to have been "animated, no doubt, by the Word and motion of God's Spirit." The phrase of Bruce was, "the people, animated as effeirs, partly by the Word" (the preaching?) "and violence of the course" (the king's proceedings), "took arms." Where Bruce wrote that Hamilton was wanted "to countenance the matter against these councillors," the copy omitted "these councillors." The clause "employ your credit" was also omitted. Bruce's averment that the preachers had quelled the tumult (as they did, according to Melville) was also left out. As all these changes intensified the nature of the invitation, they can hardly be attributed to mere haste and inadvertence in the copyist employed by Hamilton. Later (December 27), Bruce wrote a letter of remonstrance to Hamilton. "I am assured that your sister's son, the Earl of Huntly, would not have done the like that ye have done, and if I failed in anything in that letter, I failed only in this, in framing my pen over far to your lordship's humour, which I knew to be ambitious." Knowing this, Bruce had called in Hamilton, and had said that God called him! And then Bruce, having knowingly invited an ambitious man, and attributed the invitation to the Deity; having summoned a prince who, failing James and his issue, was nearest the crown, expressed surprise that "the king takes it, as I hear, as if I had pressed to set you in a chair foreanent him. Surely it came never in my mind; and of all fools I had been the worst, if so I had done."<sup>48</sup>

Mr Bruce's excuses are inconsistent: we shall see other examples of his logic and his conduct, in the affair of the Gowrie conspiracy. It did not need much intelligence to see that, in summoning as a leader a man notoriously ambitious, and by birth so near the throne, Bruce laid himself open to the king's construction of his action. It was the natural, and probably the correct construction, and, as Bruce saw, was replete with "inconveniences" to himself "and the good cause." Spottiswoode cites, but not quite verbally, Hamilton's copy of Bruce's letter. But the sense of that letter itself is sufficiently patent.<sup>49</sup> Spottiswoode may be condemned, as he is by Dr M'Crie, for disloyalty as a historian, and for displaying Presbyterian zeal during the troubles in December, and turning his coat in January.<sup>50</sup> All the accounts of the tumult are naturally coloured by the partisanship of the narrators. Spottiswoode did not invent Welsh's seditious sermon, of which Calderwood says nothing (Sunday, December 19), though he cites at length Bruce's sermon. Dr M'Crie also omits the inconvenient eloquence of Mr Welsh, though it is embalmed in the 'Register of the Privy Council.' "I am heartily sorry," said Bruce, later, "that our holy and gracious cause should be so obscured by this late tumult," which, according to Dr M'Crie, "scarcely deserves the name of a riot." "I had rather," Bruce said, "have been banished Scotland for ever, ere one drop of their blood had been shed that day." Bruce insisted now on the virtue of patience: he was careful to discriminate between James and his advisers: he mourned the defection of many preachers and others, whence we may gather that the Brethren had not been unanimous during the troubles of the last two months.

All this was very well, but it came after the reading to an excited populace of the story of Haman, and it came after Bruce's invitation to Hamilton. If the ministers were all for peace and patience, why did one of them read inflammatory scriptures about hanging a statesman and massacring malignants? Was the leadership of the godly by an ambitious prince such as Hamilton likely to lead to public tranquillity? Bruce's pacific sermon came two days too late, and was not reinforced by the sermon of Welsh on a devil-possessed king, who ought to be tied hand and foot. The tumult was caused by the exciting sermons, the "indignation meeting," the inflammatory lessons from the Book of Esther, the exaggerated rumours, and the panic (whether wilfully stirred or not) of a popish massacre. The armed townsmen, like the mob of Ephesus, knew not wherefore they were come together. Some were intent on rescuing the king, others on hanging a few Octavians. Last came the preachers' dealing with Hamilton, which wore an ill face. James was first alarmed, then angry, finally he saw his chance, and the tumult, a confused brawl, gave him his opportunity. On the 20th four ministers, including Bruce, were ordered into Edinburgh Castle, then held by Mar; these men, with Cranstoun, were to appear at Linlithgow on December 25. Among them was Andrew Hart, the publisher, described as "bookbinder." Bruce and Balcanquhel fled to England, James Melville concealed the other prophets in Fife.<sup>51</sup> The town heard with terror tales that the Borderers were to sack the town. "They offered to put all in the king's will, both concerning Kirk and policy, to save their goods."<sup>52</sup> On January 1, 1597, the Provost, Hume of North Berwick, who pacified the riot, and the bailies made proffers "to appoint neither magistrates nor ministers in future without the king's approval," disavowing the tumult as provoked by the preachers.<sup>53</sup> The king entered his capital on January 1, 1597. He forbade assemblies of the Kirk in Edinburgh. He forbade the ministers to live together as they had done, "in the circuit of a close." He asserted the power to make ministers preach, or desist, whenever he thought fit.<sup>54</sup> Threats hung over the town: the meeting of the judges was summoned to Perth. Welsh, whose sermon of December 18 Calderwood does not notice, was denounced a rebel:

it is clear that Spottiswoode took the words of the sermon from the 'Privy Council Register' (v. 359).

James had grasped his nettle, and it had crumpled harmless in his hand. All the proud preachers and prophets, the bold barons and burgesses, who had so long threatened and controlled him, they to whom he had truckled, "an irresolute ass," had ceased to be terrible. And thus was avenged the old Hammer of the Preachers, the bane of Morton, the discouraged Arran. He did not live to see the day of triumph. In the height of the war of the Kirk (November 1596) he appears to have ridden to offer James his services. Returning to Kyle, he was warned to shun the feud of Douglas of Parkhead, nephew of Morton. Arran said that he would not leave his way for him nor for all of the name of Douglas! Parkhead armed a company and mounted: he overtook Arran at a glen called Catslack (there is a Catslack burn on Yarrow) and ran the famous Chancellor through the body with a spear (December 1, 1596).<sup>55</sup>

So in the notable year '96 perished Arran, "Captain James Stewart," the stately, the brave, the kinglike, the accomplished, but avaricious, cruel, and untrustworthy glory of the House of Ochiltree. He "died in his enemy's day," and did not behold the triumph which would have gladdened his heart, perhaps restored his power.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER XV.

<sup>1</sup> Calderwood, v. 420, 421.

<sup>2</sup> Forbes-Leith, Narratives of Scottish Catholics, pp. 226-229.

<sup>3</sup> See the scheme in Calderwood, v. 421-433.

<sup>4</sup> See 'Register of Privy Council,' v., Dr Masson's Introduction.

<sup>5</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 711; Tytler, ix. 212. Major Hume in 'Treason and Plot' may be consulted.

<sup>6</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 706.

<sup>7</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 706, 707.

<sup>8</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 708.

<sup>9</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 720-723.

<sup>10</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 723, 724.

<sup>11</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 710.

<sup>12</sup> M'Crie, Life of Andrew Melville, pp. 483-485; ii. 524-528 (1819).

<sup>13</sup> Privy Council Register, v. 172.

<sup>14</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 715, 716.

<sup>15</sup> See Mr T. G. Law's essay, with copies of the documents, in 'Miscellany of the Scottish History Society,' vol. i. No. 2.

<sup>16</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 715.

<sup>17</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 718.

<sup>18</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 720-723.

<sup>19</sup> Privy Council Register, v. 310, 311.

<sup>20</sup> James Melville, pp. 368, 369.

<sup>21</sup> Melville, pp. 370, 371.

- <sup>22</sup> Calderwood, v. 443-448. <sup>23</sup> Tytler, ix. 231.
<sup>24</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 723; Calderwood, v. 450-453.
<sup>25</sup> Calderwood, v. 163. <sup>26</sup> Thorpe, Calendar, ii. 723.
<sup>27</sup> See Dr M'Crie's 'Andrew Melville,' i. 295-302 (1819).
<sup>28</sup> Life of Andrew Melville, i. 295-298. <sup>29</sup> Calderwood, v. 458.
<sup>30</sup> M'Crie, Andrew Melville, loc cit. <sup>31</sup> Calderwood, v. 458.
<sup>32</sup> Privy Council Register, v. 326. <sup>33</sup> Calderwood, v. 463.
<sup>34</sup> Privy Council Register, v. 332-334, 336.
<sup>35</sup> Calderwood, v. 469. <sup>36</sup> Calderwood, v. 482.
<sup>37</sup> Calderwood, v. 486. <sup>38</sup> Privy Council Register, v. 340-342.
<sup>39</sup> Calderwood, v. 496, note. <sup>40</sup> Privy Council Register, v. 348.
<sup>41</sup> Calderwood, v. 501. <sup>42</sup> Calderwood, v. 512.
<sup>43</sup> Nicolson to R. Cecil, December 21, State Papers, Scot., Eliz., MS., vol. lix. No. 90. Bowes to Robert Cecil, December 21, 1596, State Papers, Scot., Eliz., MS., vol. lix. No. 88. For James's version see 'Privy Council Register,' v. 362, 363.
<sup>44</sup> Melville, p. 517.
<sup>45</sup> Calderwood, v. 510-514; Spottiswoode, iii. 27-32.
<sup>46</sup> Privy Council Register, v. 349-352.
<sup>47</sup> See Appendix B., "Logan of Restalrig and the Gowrie Conspiracy."
<sup>48</sup> Calderwood, v. 515, 534, 535.
<sup>49</sup> Mr Tytler, ix. 250, 251, also cites this copy from a Warrender manuscript.
<sup>50</sup> M'Crie's Andrew Melville, pp. 194, 195, and notes; ii. 94, 95 notes (1819).
<sup>51</sup> Calderwood, v. 520, 521; Privy Council Register, v. 353.
<sup>52</sup> Calderwood, v. 531. <sup>53</sup> Privy Council Register, v. 356.
<sup>54</sup> Privy Council Register, v. 357; Act. Parl. Scot., iv. 107.
<sup>55</sup> Privy Council Register, v. 360, 361, and note 1.

CHAPTER XVI.

JAMES ON ILL TERMS WITH ENGLAND.

1597-1600.

THE preachers never recovered their supremacy in James's lifetime, but they never were thoroughly subdued. There survived a remnant, holding tenaciously to the old, impossible, theocratic ideals; and in a later generation they too had their hour of triumph. To us who see the past in a perspective unattainable in the sixteenth century, it is plain enough that two ideas were destined to prevail—toleration in religion, and democracy in politics. But under James the democratic idea, and the idea of toleration, occupied opposite camps. The preachers, and their representatives in the universities, at least in St Andrews, taught the Radical opinions of George Buchanan. They also upheld (except when an opposite theory suited their purposes) that the ministers should be chosen by their flocks,—a process which, following their line of argument, put the supreme power of the State into the hands of inspired persons elected by the votes of popular constituencies. A theocratic democracy was thus arranged for, but we should greatly misjudge the Brethren if we thought that they were mere believers in majorities. As against the greater number of votes, the votes of "the best" ought to prevail, and "the best" were the minority who would go all lengths with the preachers. This rather confused theologico-political theory and practice obtained its opportunity from the absence of a really representative and constitutional Parliament in Scotland. In place of such a body, the Kirk had her kirk-sessions, presbyteries, synods, and General Assemblies. Their power was enormous, and touched on military affairs as well as on politics and jurisdiction. But the power reposed on the belief in "prophets," and in direct inspiration.

Moreover, as must always have been suspected, and as will soon be seen, the ruling assemblies of the Kirk had not represented the full array of presbyteries and Presbyterians. Power had lain in the hands chiefly of the preachers of Edinburgh and the Lothians, of Fife and Ayrshire, always the centres of the Covenanting forces in later days. In these regions the preachers were the most learned, the most resolute, and the most pugnacious. They, and their lay associates, lairds and burgesses, had throughout been the power behind and above the throne, the imperium in imperio. But these regions probably had not a majority of the ministers, though, living near the capital, they could soon be on the spot when politics called for their presence. The ministers of remoter parishes, men much less zealous, were neither so rich nor, in the conditions of travelling, was it nearly so easy for them to concentrate south of Forth. Such was the theocratic democracy: it did not rest on a mere majority of the votes of members of the Kirk.

The doctrine most vigorously held by this theocratic and, in its way, democratic party, was the doctrine of religious intolerance. The leaders, being inspired interpreters of the Word, gave out that, according to the Word, idolaters must be extirpated. The theory, of course, was not peculiar to the Kirk: the old Church, when in power, had lit her fires and issued her censures. But a secular Government could not easily acquiesce in the idea of extirpation. Priests or preachers might have their way now and again, but the Crown was never whole-hearted in persecution, nor were the nobles. On this point the inspired certainties of the Brethren always encountered the opposition of the State: had James been a whole-hearted bloody persecutor, he might have had comparatively little trouble with the Kirk. They chiefly quarrelled over his policy towards the Catholic earls and Catholic States, over his failure to exterminate Jesuits and other emissaries of Rome.

Thus the two tendencies which had the future on their side—toleration (of a kind) and democracy (of a sort)—were at open war, entailing the war of Kirk and King. The conflict was inevitable. Perhaps human wisdom could not have found a compromise, a modus vivendi, between the inspired prophets on one hand and the existence of a free secular State on the other. The country had to be governed either by the Crown or by the pulpit. No modern observer can applaud the method by which James, for his day, gradually secured the supremacy of the Crown. His opponents were morally much superior to himself and to many of his lay advisers. But their unhappy belief in their own inspiration made them irreconcilable. James was obliged to gain his end (and freedom from clerical dictation is a respectable end) by employing the low means of working on popular representatives by what, in the style of democracy, is termed "lobbying," "wire-pulling," and so forth. To "lobby" and "wire-pull" among prophets, such was his policy. It could not but follow that the least scrupulous of the prophets were the most easily to be secured by such methods. The others, the precise, the men of the old rock, held aloof from the preachers whom James selected, and branded them as apostates. The day of the Remnant came at last, and they triumphed over Spottiswoode as they had triumphed over Adamson. But these things "lay on the knees of the gods."

James himself, when the preachers became but weak allies of discontented nobles, was able to put forth his cherished theory of royal absolutism, which was encouraged by the higher clergy of England and the despotic tradition of the Tudors. Thus all the elements necessary for the explosion of the Covenant and the Great Rebellion were being accumulated. Forces were gathering which, in the long shock and collision of a century, destroyed each other, leaving the State open to the advance of democracy, no longer theocratic, and of toleration. It is hard for us to see how, in the conditions of Scotland after the Reformation, these things could have been ordered otherwise. The pretensions of preachers and kings were alike intolerable and intolerant: they were compelled to clash, to break each other and be broken. Modern sympathies are apt to be with the force which on each occasion has the worse in the encounter. No sooner are the prophets down than their sufferings and their courage appeal to us; no sooner has the Kirk recovered her tyranny than the cause of human freedom claims our regard. Not easily to-day can the observer of the past be either Cavalier or Covenanter, Kirk's man or king's man. Either cause is victa causa: both ideals perished in the century of strife: it is but a sentiment that makes a few cherish the White Rose or the Blue Banner.

As far as internal politics were concerned, the year 1597 was passed by James, first in securing a hold over the Brethren, next in reconciling the Catholic earls with the Kirk. His method as regards the former object was first to terrify by threats,—all Edinburgh was to be put to the horn, her ministers were to be treated as rebels,—and then to allow the town to return into his favour, and to relax his measures against the town preachers. He next summoned a convention of the Kirk and the Estates to meet at Perth on the last day of February. The northern ministers found Perth far more accessible than Edinburgh; indeed, in fairness to them, Perth was the most suitable, as the most central, place of meeting. James next circulated a paper of fifty-five questions, to which the assembled divines were to reply. The queries bore on Church government, and the Synod of Fife raised a legal objection. No presbytery had the right to send commissioners to discuss the conclusions already sanctioned by a General Assembly, any more than a burgh could legally call in controversy an Act of Parliament. James's practical reply was to induce the Brethren at Perth to recognise themselves as an authentic General Assembly, a thing not accepted by the more precise. The Fife synod insisted that Church government can only be regulated by the Word, and that only the pastors and doctors of the Kirk can show what God's will, in the Word, really is. Now they had established that point already, once for all. Their motto was, "Nolumus leges Ecclesiæ Scoticanæ mutari"; but, like all other laws, those of the Kirk proved to be mutable.<sup>1</sup> The questions are said to have been drawn up by Lindsay the Octavian. To give them at full length is not possible. To the first, "May not the matters of the external government of the Kirk be discussed without injury to faith and religion?" the Fife synod said "No." As to whether the king alone, or the Kirk alone, or both, have power to modify the external government of the Church, the synod declared that the pastors and doctors were the ordinary, and prophets the extraordinary, authorities, whose decisions kings must ratify and sanction. This naturally raises the question, How are we to know a prophet when we see one? The only answer is, that God endows a prophet with extraordinary gifts, which are not specified. The gift of preaching is obviously one, and probably the faculty of premonition (in a layman "second-sight," and punishable as witchcraft) is another "extraordinary gift" and note of a genuine prophet. Wishart, Knox, Peden, and a number of others had this note of the prophet.

"The principles then laid down" by the Fife synod "were incompatible with the existence of civil government," says Mr Tytler. The right of public denunciation of individuals from the pulpit was also claimed. The king had no right to annul an unjust sentence of excommunication. An interesting question was, "Is not the consent of the majority of the flock, and also of the patron, necessary in the election of a pastor?" The election, we learn from the reply, should be made by pastors and doctors, and the congregation and patron "should give their consent and protection." The selected candidate, if unpopular, was apt to need all the protection he could get.<sup>2</sup>

The commissioners from the presbyteries met at Perth, and James Melville gives a lively account of what he witnessed there. The ministers of the North were gathered in unwonted numbers, "and every one greater courtiers than another." Flocks of preachers were passing in and out of the king's palace, "finding fault with the ministers of the South, and the Popery of Edinburgh." James Melville had a friend, a fellow-soldier of the Kirk, who was his bedfellow. The king "captured" this evangelist, detained him from Melville's couch, and converted him in the midnight hours, which were probably not uncheered with the wines of Southern France. Next day Melville's bedfellow opposed him in the discussions of the meeting, and he quietly withdrew himself from the town. His noisy brother, Andrew, was detained at St Andrews by a rectorial election. The end of all was, after some demur, that the Assembly voted itself a genuine Assembly, and that the king carried his points. He might, it was agreed, propose modifications in Church government; no unusual conventions were to be called without his permission; the Acts of Parliament or of Privy Council were not to be preached about; no ministers in the great towns were to be appointed without the consent of the king and the flock; and nobody, as a rule, was to be personally attacked from the pulpit.<sup>3</sup> The Catholic earls were to discuss with chosen ministers and be converted, or leave the country.

While the process of conversion was going on, Barclay of Ladyland (who, with Balcarres, had been intriguing in Spain and Italy) tried to seize Ailsa Craig, off Ballantrae in Ayrshire, and use it as a place of arms for Spain. Being discovered by Mr Andrew Knox, and in danger of capture, he drowned himself. Bowes had for months given warnings of "plottings with Spain,"<sup>4</sup> Ladyland had returned thence in February. By July 4 he had lost his life, and Huntly and Errol, reconciled to the Kirk, had been absolved from excommunication.<sup>5</sup> The Kirk had done her best to make the conversion genuine. Preachers had been appointed as members of the households of the proselytes, "to read and interpret Scripture ordinarily at their tables," and to catechise their families. Mr Hill Burton regarded these intrusions as a severe process of torture, and "permanent tormentors were to be put on a permanent establishment at the expense of their victims." We know how Father Gordon, Huntly's uncle, regarded the matter. He landed in the North while the process of conversion was going forward, and found Huntly a sore altered man. The Catholics everywhere were flocking into the Kirk. Huntly could not arrest (as was his legal duty) his uncle and old friend, who was put under the boycott of excommunication. A thousand pieces of gold were offered for his head; but Huntly obtained a remission, promising to send Gordon out of the country. He left Aberdeen, after holding a friendly discussion with the local ministers. In 1599 he returned, and had some interesting adventures. On the whole, the submission of Huntly and Errol did much to break down the Catholicism of the north-east of Scotland.<sup>6</sup>

The Old Kirk of Aberdeen on June 26 was the scene of the reconciliation. The decisions of Perth had been ratified by a General Assembly at Dundee in May, after an uproarious scene between the king and Andrew Melville. They shouted at each other, "they heckled on till all the house and close both heard, mickle of a large hour." The king was the first to recover his temper.<sup>7</sup> Fourteen king's commissioners, a kind of clerical Lords of the Articles, were selected; they removed Black and another preacher from St Andrews, and Andrew Melville, deprived of the rectorship, was made Dean of the Faculty of Theology.<sup>8</sup> The new board of commissioners, "both in General Assemblies and without, rule all," says Melville. But the Edinburgh preachers were restored to their flocks, "with a new imposition of hands," in the case of the preacher Robert Bruce, a ceremony not favoured by the earliest Reformers. An earthquake in the North was reckoned a judgment on the king, a new Uzziah; but it never came near him, nor was he smitten with leprosy, like his Jewish prototype. Later (February 25, 1598), an eclipse of the sun caused the deaths of four notable lights of the Kirk of Scotland,—at least James Melville mentions these as "notable effects of this eclipse." Melville knew the cause of eclipses as well as we do; about the effects he was much more fully informed.<sup>9</sup> Yet there was difference of opinion. Among the extinguished lights was Thomas Buchanan. Now he was killed, as Calderwood has told us, by being dragged along the road, after a fall from his horse, for which the eclipse was not responsible. It is interesting to note that the old and very natural superstitious beliefs (natural while the real causes of the phenomenon were unknown) survived among men of learning, perfectly acquainted with the science of the subject.

The politics of 1597, ecclesiastical matters apart, were relatively tranquil. The Octavians resigned their thankless office, and the royal finances presently fell into the usual chaos (January 11, 1597).<sup>10</sup> Border affairs were unquiet: Elizabeth kept demanding the surrender of Cessford and Buccleuch, and for a brief while (October 1597–February 1598) Buccleuch did “render himself” across the Marches.<sup>11</sup> Sir William Bowes succeeded the veteran Bowes as English Ambassador, old Bowes dying in November, after a career of mischievous treacheries against the Court to which he was accredited. In July James had the pleasure of burning a number of witches at St Andrews.<sup>12</sup> One St Andrews witch, of a rather earlier date (ob. 1588), seems to have been merely a dealer in folk-medicine. She doctored Archbishop Adamson with “ewe-milk and claret wine,” though a satirist, Sempill, describes her as “Ane carling of the Quene of Phareis,” a comrade of “the faery queen, Proserpina.” The witches burned in July 1597 were from Pittenweem. The preachers had sense enough to deprecate the carrying of a witch about the country to detect other witches by bodily marks to her known. This method later led to horrible cruelties, and the witch-finder was herself convicted of fraud. James was acting precisely in the fashion of T’chaka and other Zulu kings. Later, in England, Bishop Jewel fell in with James’s notions about witchcraft. Bancroft, on the other hand, he who dealt so hardly with Scottish Presbyterian eloquence, treated witches and witch-finders with equal disdain, “such as could start a devil in a lane as soon as a hare in Waltham forest.” The witnesses were “gidddy, idle, lunatick, illuminate, holy spectators of both sexes, and specially a sisternity of nimps, mops, and idle holy women, that did grace the devil with their idle holy presence.” Thus were bishops divided, the most anti-Puritan being the most averse to witch-hunting.

A historian of the Kirk, Principal Lee, has made the odd suggestion that James’s zeal against witches, like his love of Episcopacy, “was assumed for the purpose of ingratiating himself with the English nation, where a passion for the wonderful has always been much stronger than in this northern climate,” where second-sight is still common, and fairies are both seen and heard unto this day. The truth is, that James would have ingratiated himself with Elizabeth on many an occasion by being a devout Presbyterian. In England he would, possibly enough, have ingratiated himself best by at least favouring the Puritans. He wanted bishops merely to keep the preachers in their place, and witchcraft appealed to his acute and inquiring but ill-balanced mind. Even John Wesley held that disbelief in witches was the thin end of the wedge of infidelity. What went under the name of witchcraft was a web of fraud, folk-medicine, fairy tale, hysteria, and hypnotic suggestion, including physical and psychological phenomena still unclassified. The Bible undeniably regarded some of these phenomena as the result of “possession” by intelligent discarnate entities. To disbelieve the Bible was flat atheism, so James and the preachers agreed in holding. In France in 1850-1854 some men of science, and several ecclesiastics, fell back on James’s theory when confronted with talking-tables and clairvoyants.<sup>13</sup>

On the other hand were laughing and humane sceptics, like Reginald Scot. James took the line which the religion of the age and his constitutional bias made him select, the line of Richard Baxter, Glanvil, and Cotton Mather. His performances, so far, were such as the Kirk recommended. If, like Saul, he resisted the prophets, like Saul he persecuted witches. A hideous example of the manners of the age has been published by Mr Hay Fleming. In 1598 the laird of Lathocker, near St Andrews, was in trouble about a murder. At the same date, or shortly afterwards, the minister of Crail, by order of the presbytery, captured a woman suspected of witchcraft, “whom the laird of Lathocker took from him, and carried her to his place of Lathocker, and there tortured her, whereby she is now impotent, and may not labour for her living as she was wont.”<sup>14</sup> In this folly of witch-burning, neither the Church of Rome, the Church of England, nor the Church of Scotland can throw the first stone at sister sinners. In Scotland, however, witch persecution became infinitely more frequent and stringent after the Reformation, as part of inquisitorial discipline in general. Just after James’s witch-burnings at St Andrews in July 1597, the Privy Council discharged the commissions of justiciary against witches, “understanding by the complaints of divers his Highness’s lieges that great danger may ensue to honest and famous” (reputable) “persons” under the powers of these commissioners.<sup>15</sup> Spottiswoode explains this discharge by the case of Margaret Atkin, who, under torture, confessed to witchcraft, and put herself forward as a “smeller out of witches,” in the Zulu phrase. She knew them by a mark in the eye; but when women whom she had detected were brought before her in disguise, so that she failed to recognise them, she acquitted them. Especially at Glasgow innocent women were put to death “through the credulity of the minister, Mr John Cowper.” Brought back to Fife, Margaret Atkin confessed that her previous confession, and her detections, were all equally false, and she was executed. But this did not put a stop to the witch-trials and witch-burnings, an epidemic more permanent than that which devastated Salem in America a century later.<sup>16</sup>

In November and December James himself visited the Borders and hanged a number of reivers.<sup>17</sup> In December a Parliament met, during a feud between Hamilton and Lennox, to whom the Castle of Dumbarton, the old strength of his House, previously in Hamilton’s hands, was now intrusted. James delivered an oration about his mother’s wrongs and his own. It needed some lack of shame to grumble that the slayer of the mother did not pay the pension of the son. A grant of 200,000 marks was voted by the Estates.<sup>18</sup>

The great affair was the covert reintroduction of Episcopacy. The king’s commissioners of the General Assembly, fourteen in number, petitioned that ministers might vote in Parliament. Consequently holders of prelatie titles (preachers so promoted by the king) were permitted to sit and vote with the Estates.<sup>19</sup> A General Assembly was proclaimed for March 1598. James reconciled himself with the Edinburgh preachers, who in future were to have each his separate flock, which did not suit their collective policy. In the same way they had already been turned out of their “close,” where they used to live conveniently assembled. James explained that he did not mean to introduce “papistical or Anglican bishoping,” but merely to admit the best ministers, chosen by the General Assembly, to represent the Kirk in the national council. Andrew Melville had not been allowed to take part in the Assembly, and the northern preachers outvoted the Brethren of Fife and the Lothians only by a majority of ten.<sup>20</sup> Thus were the “horns of the mitre,” allowed to peep forth; thus, as the godly said, was the Trojan horse of Episcopacy brought within the walls of our Zion.

The new ecclesiastical members of Parliament were to be fifty-one in number, partly chosen by the king, partly by the General Assembly. Later (March 1600) the king was to choose each bishop out of a list of six, selected by the Kirk. Each was to attend to his own "flock"; they were to exercise no ecclesiastical discipline, and were to be amenable to the jurisdiction of presbyteries and General Assemblies. To avoid prejudice, they were only styled "commissioners." Meanwhile, in 1598, at Dundee, the godly had one safe victim, the witch. It was reported that civil magistrates discharged persons convicted of witchcraft. "Therefore the Assembly ordains that, in all time coming, the presbytery proceed in all severity with their censures" (excommunication?) "against such magistrates as shall set at liberty any person or persons convicted of witchcraft hereafter." The common-sense and humanity of the laity was not to override the cruel fanaticism of the preachers. They objected, indeed, to setting a witch to catch a witch, because that was using Satan against himself, a disreputable king's evidence enough. They also tried to check commercial intercourse with Spain, an idolatrous country.<sup>21</sup> But, too clearly, the great days of the Kirk were over for a while.

James had complained grievously of Elizabeth in the Parliament of December 1597. The relations between the two Crowns continued to be uneasy. They were complicated by the vexed affairs of the Western Isles and Highlands. For long Elizabeth had been trying to engage the brave and accomplished Maclean of Duart, the hero of Glenrines fight, to aid her against her Irish rebel, Tyrone. But Elizabeth would promise and not pay. Maclean muttered that he would take his men where they would be welcomed, probably by the Irish and their Spanish allies. All the Macdonald and Macleod country was embroiled in the private wars and treacherous diplomacies of the chiefs. One of these, James Macdonald of Dunluce, was a man of the world at Holyrood, a determined and traitorous ruffian in the heather. He had been aiding Elizabeth's Irish rebels (who knew him as "Macсорley"), and Robert Cecil bade William Bowes to remonstrate with the king for admitting Dunluce to his presence, also for secret dealing with Tyrone (January 4, 1598).<sup>22</sup> He had a claim, a baseless one, on Kintyre and Isla, held by Angus Macdonald, his father. The king made the handsome freebooter a knight ; he might be useful some day.

At this time, and in the Parliament of December 1597, Highland affairs had been taken in hand. The natives did not pay their crown-rents, and the chiefs were bidden to exhibit their title-deeds on May 15, 1598, and to give security for law and order. Disobedience was to entail forfeiture : obedience was difficult or impossible. "Sheepskin titles" were rare among the Celts. The Court probably hoped to reap forfeitures, but the claymore was apt (as James found) to engross charters on the bodies of Lowland claimants. The Lewes and other Macleod lands were granted to a kind of chartered company which had occasion to rue its bargain. Meanwhile, in a series of feuds, Macallester of Loupe killed his guardian, and was backed by Dunluce, who burned a house in which Loupe's foes were, and also his own father, Macdonald of Dunyveg. He imprisoned Dunyveg, and was put at by James, but made his peace. Such was the Macsorley (Dunluce) whom Elizabeth thought an ill companion for James. She was also vexed by his words in Parliament, and he was irritated by Doleman's (that is, Father Parsons') book in favour of a Spanish successor to the crown of England. He excused himself on all counts of Elizabeth's indictment (February 1, 1598). He engaged, however, an Irishman, Quin or Gwyn, to write in favour of his title, and also to scourge the author of the peccant 'Faery Queen.'<sup>23</sup> Mr Bruce, the preacher, at this time much out of James's favour, offered to reveal "certain dangerous practices" to Robert Cecil, who guaranteed a recompense. (This appears to be the Protestant Bruce, not the Catholic double spy of the same name.) Probably the "practices" were a notion of reverting to Spanish relations, and dealings with Elizabeth's Irish rebels (March 1598).<sup>24</sup> Bruce might thus avenge himself on James for the loss of his pulpit. James was naturally wroth that Robert Cecil had met Bothwell at Rouen, and a play in which Scotland was ridiculed offended the Court and country.<sup>25</sup> Elizabeth wrote haughtily to James (April 25), and if Cecil could have made mischief by aid of Bothwell, he would doubtless have pursued the usual policy of the Tudors. Elizabeth did present James with £3000, such were his "fiddler's wages."

Meanwhile there was grumbling at the expenditure of public money on banquets to the Duke of Holstein. To make matters worse, in May a scoundrel called Valentine Thomas gave out that

James had employed him to murder Elizabeth, and James was all the more indignant, as Elizabeth had received Bothwell's ally, the unwearied intriguer, John Colville. Elizabeth sent Bowes to soothe James by protesting that she was not "of so viperous a nature" as to believe the allegations of Valentine Thomas (July 1). Meanwhile Maclean was more and more impatient for his pay, and Glenorchy, a secret correspondent of Cecil, was the chief restraint on Highlanders who wished to join the Irish rebels. On August 7 Glenorchy reported the death of Maclean in a clan battle. It is a melancholy circumstance that the authors of clan histories cannot be relied on for that impartiality without which history becomes fiction. It is agreed that the great Maclean fell in Isla, where he and his nephew (Dunluce) had met to attempt an arrangement of their differences. But while the Maclean chroniclers assert that their chief arrived at the tryst in the garb of peace, a silken suit, armed only with the long rapier of Tybald or Mercutio (this is Mr Tytler's version), the learned Gregory maintains that Maclean was killed in a regular pitched battle. The evidence of Nicholson, writing to Robert Cecil (August 16), supports the theory of the Macleans. Duart was invited to a friendly meeting, he was accompanied by only 200 of his men, and was dressed in silk, doubtless in the embroidered doublet and puffed breeches of a Court gentleman. His rapier was a present from Argyll, whose own portrait, in the costume described, is at Inverary Castle. At the close of the meeting Dunluce's party attacked the Macleans, and a hidden force of armed men assailed them. Maclean slew three with his rapier, and sent his son away to live and avenge him. The bowmen of Clan Gilzean fled when they saw their great chief go down.<sup>26</sup> When a young son of Maclean's knelt to the king for justice James remarked that "it was well fought on both sides," but his intelligences denied that Maclean was attacked "under trust."

However, Gregory gives quite a different account. There was an open battle. Maclean was worsted and slain in a regular set fight. The tactics of Dunluce were ingenious. The key of the position was a certain hill-top. Dunluce, in the opening of the fight, caused his vanguard to make a feigned retreat. They then gained the desired eminence by a detour, and charging downhill, broke the Macleans. The son of the chief with difficulty escaped.<sup>27</sup> As is natural, Calderwood takes the Maclean view, and accuses the king of "hounding out" Dunluce. He had never forgiven Maclean, says Calderwood, for his behaviour in the Edinburgh riot of December 17, 1596. What that behaviour was we have explained. On August 30 Dunluce presented James with a gun, so they must have been on good terms.<sup>28</sup> It was the king's intention to proceed to the Isles and suppress the disorders. Calderwood represents this purpose as a mere farce.<sup>29</sup>

At this time (August 1598) the preachers were much vexed by the restoration of Archbishop Beaton, Mary's old ambassador, to his temporalities. Mr Patrick Simpson preached against the king at Stirling, and James, who had a passion for "brawling" in church, arose and bade him cease to meddle in these matters.<sup>30</sup> The churchgoers of this age enjoyed many exciting scenes of mere secular interest. In fact Sunday was the day, and church was the scene, of the most animated political debates. James's book, 'The True Law of Free Monarchies,' was published in September, and supplied much matter of discussion. By a "free monarchy" James meant a monarchy in which the king, and nobody else, is free. Like the preachers, he based his absurd and ruinous pretensions on detached texts of the Old Testament. But here the ministers had the better of the argument. The monarchies of Israel and Judah were tempered by prophets, of whom the ministers were the representatives. James overlooked that side of the question. The preachers were also offended by the Christmas revels of the Court, and in January 1599 James informed the Edinburgh ministers that, "if ye speak against me, my crown or my estate, hanging shall be the pain of the first fault."<sup>31</sup> The arrival of Huntly and Home gave umbrage to the Brethren, and James himself was accused of writing to the Pope (October 3, 1598).<sup>32</sup>

As in the case of his memorandum, captured with the Spanish Blanks, and of the mission of Ogilvie of Pourie, it is difficult to ascertain how far James was really tampering with the Catholic Powers. There was enough to justify suspicion. James (October) is said to have had a dream that Elizabeth would outlive him, wherefore he bequeathed his wisdom to his son, Prince Henry, in the book 'Basilikon Doron,' which procured for him trouble enough.<sup>33</sup> In November Father James Gordon, Huntly's uncle, boldly returned to Scotland, and walked straight into Holyrood. His object was to hold a public controversy with the preachers. He was taken to the castle and well treated, though the preachers clamoured for his death. The Council decided merely to banish Gordon, and execute him if he returned. By James's desire he went to stay with Lord Seton, the preachers threatened Seton with excommunication, and there were all the materials for a quarrel. But Gordon, finding that the ministers would not meet him in argument, withdrew from the country in May 1599.<sup>34</sup> All these affairs, with others, made the relations between James and the Kirk unpleasant in the opening of 1599. If Elizabeth had at last frankly expressed her disbelief in Valentine Thomas's charges against the king, she was vexed that he had sent envoys to ask the aid of Protestant Powers, if ever he had to assert his claim to the English crown. Elizabeth justly censured this conduct as "indelicate," but had sent £3000 (December 31).<sup>35</sup> But James remained dissatisfied with Elizabeth's treatment of the affair of Valentine Thomas, which trailed on for years.

The discontent of James with the preachers found in February 1599 an outlet. In earlier days, when Bruce the preacher was a favourite, James had given him a pension out of the rich lands of the Abbey of Arbroath, once held by Cardinal Beaton. This pension James withdrew in an arbitrary manner. Bruce brought an action for recovery, and the king tried to intimidate the judges. When it came to a vote, he asked who dared to vote against him. Several rose and said that they must do their duty. The President, Sir Alexander Seton, later Chancellor Dunfermline, was particularly resolute. All honest men, he said, would vote according to their consciences or resign. The king was defeated. The interesting point is that the judges braved the king in defence of one of the preachers, though certain preachers had slandered them from the pulpit. Seton in particular had often been attacked as an idolater, especially when he was one of the Octavians. The Court of Session for very many years after this event was certainly believed to be much swayed by kinship, if not by bribes. The behaviour of the judges on this occasion is a rare example of honesty and courage on one side, on the other of James's disastrous theories of royal prerogative (March 16).<sup>36</sup>

These shine in his book, the 'Basilikon Doron,' a legacy of advice to his son. We hear of it in the autumn of 1598. On February 17, 1599, Nicholson, the English agent in Edinburgh, writes that he has obtained a copy.<sup>37</sup> At first only seven copies were printed, or at least were privately distributed. One of them, or extracts from it, fell into the hands of a St Andrews preacher through Andrew Melville. Dykes, the preacher (September 1599), laid them, without explicitly stating the authorship, before the Synod of Fife, who humorously forwarded them to James as works of a malignant but anonymous author. Dykes had to fly, but the synod distinctly scored a trick off the king. He had said in his book that "the rewing of the Kirk weill is na small part of the king's office." "Ministers should not mell [meddle] with matters of State in pulpit." "No man is more to be hated of a king than a proud Puritan." "The Ministers sought to establish a democracy in this land, and to become tribuni plebis themselves." For these evils Episcopacy was the only remedy.<sup>38</sup> In 1603 James published his book, with a few alterations. It is easy to sympathise with his hatred of inspired tribunes of the people. But he saw no alternative except the covert, and we may say fraudulent and illegal, introduction of Episcopacy on one hand, and an attempt to erect a despotism on the other. These ideas proved fatal to his House and ruinous to public peace. But we may still ask, What course ought James to have taken? The problem of Church and State has only drifted into an illogical modus vivendi by efflux of years, and by weariness of warfare.

In spring and summer the State verged on bankruptcy. The Master of Elphinstone (Balmerino) at last took the Treasury (April 20), and the company of Lowland lairds attempted to get money by colonising the Isle of Lewes. It were too long to tell the story of their disasters and defeat by the Celts. In June the English Ambassador, William Bowes, coolly kidnapped an English gentleman named Ashfield. The victim, rather bemused with drugged wine, was beguiled into Bowes's carriage and driven off to Berwick.<sup>39</sup> This was managed by Sir John Guevara, cousin of Willoughby, who commanded at Berwick. Willoughby, to aid the plotters, had a swift yacht lying off Leith. The adventure has a resemblance in outline to the probable aim of the Gowrie conspiracy later. The arrival of an ambassador from France increased Bowes's and Robert Cecil's belief in the king's trafficking with Catholic Powers.<sup>40</sup> Sempill of Beltrees was sent to Elizabeth's Court to patch up peace about the outrage on Ashfield and other matters. Robert Cecil suspected that Scotland was taking the Catholic course, and unluckily the treasurer, Elphinstone, with or without James's connivance, implicated him in dealings with the Pope. Elphinstone's own account, given years later, was that Archbishop Beaton moved him to open communications with Rome. He approached James, who only refused to call the Pope Pater and Beatissime. The object was to get Chisholme, a Scot, Bishop of Vaizon, made a cardinal. The scruple about the Pope's titles (like that of an earlier Pope about King Robert Bruce's title) caused a difficulty. Elphinstone therefore had a Latin letter drawn up in proper form (Pater Beatissime, and all) begging for the Bishop's promotion. As Cardinal he might disprove the calumnies against James as a persecutor of Catholics, calumnies which stood between him and the Catholics of England. This letter James was induced to sign, unread, among a heap of other documents. Such, as we shall see, was the account given later by Elphinstone (Balmerino).<sup>41</sup> This intrigue was probably unknown at the time to the watchful preachers; indeed, according to Elphinstone's confession, it was unknown to James, who signed the compromising letter unwittingly. The Pope's answer to the letter is extant: he regrets that James does not even remotely hint at a chance of his conversion. The story reached the world in consequence of a later controversy between James and Cardinal Bellarmine. But if the King of Scotland did not know that he had approached the Beast, and corresponded with anti-christ, the Queen of England did know. In the August of the following year (1600) the Master of Gray wrote to Cardinal Borghese: "All that was done for our king in Rome last winter is as well known to the Queen of England as to the intriguers themselves, though perhaps they are not aware of it. Therefore I do not see how what was promised in the king's name can be granted, nor that what was said can be true, especially as to his religious opinions. I suppose he may favour the Catholics so far as they have not yet attempted anything against his will." The Master of Gray had not quite recovered favour with James, and was now a spy of Cecil's. He was also in communication with Borghese, and what he learned from Borghese of secret dealings at Rome he doubtless reported to Cecil in England.<sup>42</sup> Gray added, what was true, that the preachers had still a great deal of influence in Scotland, and that the king resisted them "in a fashion, and as far as he can, not for religion, but in defence of his own royal authority" ("pro læsa sua majestate et autoritate").

This was the correct view. Doctrinally James and the preachers were at one. The struggle was for the freedom of the secular authority. Meanwhile (1599) the preachers found matter for sermons in the permission accorded to the French Ambassador (a Sully of Bethune) to hear a private mass. Their next grievance was the appearance of Fletcher and Martin's troop of English actors in Edinburgh. They took (by James's warrant) a house in Blackfriars' Wynd. The four town sessions forbade the public to attend the performances. The preachers were summoned before the Council. They excused themselves by saying that James had granted the players the use of a house, but not licence to act plays. This insolent evasion, put forth by Mr Bruce, did not pass. The magistrates were obliged, says Nicholson, to withdraw the prohibition on the players, and there was a quarrel with "the bellows-blowers" (as Nicholson invidiously styles the preachers) on the point of their intimating James's proclamation from the pulpit.<sup>43</sup> The Kirk continued for centuries to be hostile to the drama.

In November James's constant anxiety about the English succession inspired the formation of a "band" wherein his subjects promised to maintain his rights. This was known in England. The weakness of the country was proved at a convention in December, where James did not shine as a financier, his suggestions for increased taxation being shelved.<sup>44</sup> In November Kirk affairs had occupied a convention at Holyrood. The discussions concerned the beginnings of the introduction of Episcopacy, and turned on disputed texts in the Greek Testament. The Brethren argued that all the caveats, to secure the Kirk from bishops, would be broken if preachers with prelatie titles sat in Parliament. Andrew Melville and others reasoned the cause of the Brethren: the conference was preparatory to a discussion in the General Assembly of 1600.

In December the beginning of the year was fixed on January 1, 1600, not on March 25, as had been the usage, in itself apt to provoke chronological confusion in historical writing.

NOTES TO CHAPTER XVI.

- <sup>1</sup> James Melville, pp. 388, 389.      <sup>2</sup> James Melville, pp. 390-403.
<sup>3</sup> Spottiswoode, iii. 53, 54.      <sup>4</sup> Thorpe, ii. 731.
<sup>5</sup> Thorpe, ii. 739.      <sup>6</sup> Forbes-Leith, Narratives, pp. 232-242.
<sup>7</sup> James Melville, p. 416.      <sup>8</sup> James Melville, p. 418.
<sup>9</sup> James Melville, p. 438.      <sup>10</sup> Thorpe, ii. 729.
<sup>11</sup> Spottiswoode, iii. 67.      <sup>12</sup> Thorpe, ii. 739.
<sup>13</sup> Mirville, Des Esprits. Paris, 1855.
<sup>14</sup> Hay Fleming, St Andrews Kirk-Session Register, ii. 882 and note 2. See also Introduction, lxxviii, lxxxi, whence other anecdotes are cited.
<sup>15</sup> Privy Council Register, v. 409, 410.
<sup>16</sup> Spottiswoode, iii. 66, 67.      <sup>17</sup> Thorpe, ii. 745.
<sup>18</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., iv. 142-146.
<sup>19</sup> Calderwood, v. 668, 670; Act. Parl. Scot., iv. 130.
<sup>20</sup> Calderwood, v. 695.      <sup>21</sup> Calderwood, v. 707-709.
<sup>22</sup> Thorpe, ii. 746.      <sup>23</sup> Thorpe, ii. 747.
<sup>24</sup> Thorpe, ii. 748.      <sup>25</sup> Thorpe, ii. 749.
<sup>26</sup> Nicholson to R. Cecil, August 16. State Papers, Scot., Eliz., MS., vol. lxii. No. 67.
<sup>27</sup> Gregory, pp. 284, 285; Tytler, ix. 285; Calderwood, v. 726.
<sup>28</sup> Thorpe, ii. 755.
<sup>29</sup> Calderwood, v. 726, Nicholson to Robert Cecil, September 2; Thorpe, ii. 755.
<sup>30</sup> Calderwood, v. 727.      <sup>31</sup> Calderwood, v. 731.
<sup>32</sup> Thorpe, ii. 757.      <sup>33</sup> Thorpe, ii. 759.
<sup>34</sup> Forbes-Leith, Narratives of Scottish Catholics, pp. 243-261; Privy Council Register, v. 503, 504.
<sup>35</sup> Thorpe, ii. 762, 763.      <sup>36</sup> Thorpe, ii. 767, Nicholson to Robert Cecil.
<sup>37</sup> Thorpe, ii. 766.      <sup>38</sup> James Melville, pp. 444, 446.
<sup>39</sup> Border Calendar, ii. 607, 608.      <sup>40</sup> Thorpe, ii. 771-773.
<sup>41</sup> Calderwood, v. 740-744.      <sup>42</sup> Papers, Master of Gray, p. 187.
<sup>43</sup> Calderwood, v. 765, 767; Thorpe, ii. 777, 778, Nicholson to Robert Cecil November 12.
<sup>44</sup> Thorpe, ii. 779.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE GOWRIE CONSPIRACY.

1600.

THE year 1600 is marked in Scottish history by that mysterious event called "The Gowrie Conspiracy." The political effects of this affair, in which the son and successor of the Gowrie of the Raid of Ruthven and his brother were slain by the king's servants, were considerable. England lost, in young Gowrie, an ally perhaps too devoted, and the Kirk was deprived of a leader, that is, if Gowrie was not a Catholic playing a double game. Making his advantage of the subsequent conduct of some of the preachers, James reduced their already enfeebled power, and took steps towards their more complete abasement. But his own character was blotted by the belief that he planned deliberately the slaughter of the Ruthvens, Gowrie and his brother, a point on which historians are still divided. The affair seemed to come like a bolt from a serene sky, but attention to preceding occurrences proves that, in the usual course of Scottish affairs, a plot to capture James and reinstate the party of the Kirk was due, and might have been expected. The relations of James and Elizabeth were highly unsatisfactory. As she neared her death she became even more sensitive on the question of her successor. James's secret relations with Essex, who was meditating a coup d'état in his interests, were suspected, if not clearly known, by Cecil. James complained that his meagre annuity was unpaid, and pressed on the publication of new books defending his rightful claim (January 12).<sup>1</sup> The English priest spy, Dr Cecil, had put out a tract nominally against the Scottish Jesuit, Father Crichton, but really most injurious to the character and rights of James. The book, whereof only a single copy is known, was finished in the August of 1599.<sup>2</sup> Dr Cecil's whole object was to discredit James among the English Catholics. It is actually averred by him that James in 1586 wrote to Elizabeth a letter urging the death of his mother, with the celebrated words, Mortui non mordent. "How little would be the gain to Catholics were he to become king of three such kingdoms as England, Ireland, and Scotland." Such, as early as 1596, were the opinions of Dr Cecil. Thus among James's anxieties was the possible opposition of perhaps a majority of the English—namely, the Catholics—to his claim. He was also fretted by a proposed marriage for Arabella Stuart, the daughter of his father's younger brother. She, not being like himself an alien, might have her own faction in England, and might offer a sounder legal claim to the succession.

While these were the relations of England and the king, on April 3 the young Earl of Gowrie returned from the Continent to England. He had quitted Scotland, as we saw, when aged about seventeen, in August 1594. From October 1593 to April 1594, or later, Gowrie with Atholl had been engaged in a confederacy with Bothwell, and they had informed Cecil that they regarded themselves as subjects, or servants, of Elizabeth. The Bothwell-Gowrie-Atholl combination failed, and young Gowrie in August 1594 went abroad, and studied in the legal faculty of the University of Padua. Here he and his tutor, Mr Rhynd, were scholars, as the archives of the University show. All that is known of the young man at this period is that in 1595 he answered in a friendly manner a friendly letter of the king's, while to the minister of Perth he expressed fanatically Protestant sentiments, and a hope of remedying on his return whatever in Scotland was amiss through his absence.<sup>3</sup> Padua had in Scotland a name for magical studies, and after his death Gowrie was accused of having talked about the cabala, and worn a talisman, a practice then common enough on the Continent. In what year he left Padua we do not know, but the author of an unpublished vindication of his conduct says that he suffered at Rome for the truth of his religion.<sup>4</sup> On the other hand, Nicholson, the English resident at Holyrood, in December 1598, writes from Edinburgh that Gowrie "has turned Papist."<sup>5</sup> After Gowrie's death the royal chaplain, Galloway, insisted on this point: Gowrie had been trying to induce the king to negotiate with Rome. The king was his authority for this statement, uttered in the royal presence. Bothwell, in writing to the Spanish Court, reckons Gowrie and Logan of Restalrig among Catholics (Spanish State Papers, iv. 680). It is conceivable that Gowrie, in the interest of England, had been trying, under a pretence of sympathy, to find out the truth as to the incessant charges against James of tampering with the Pope.

On August 21, 1599, John Colville told Cecil that the party of the Kirk intended to bring home Gowrie.<sup>6</sup> Whether they sent for him or not he turned homewards, passing three months, says Calderwood, in the hotbed of Calvinism, with Beza at Geneva. He was in Paris in February and March 1599, and thither Robert Bruce, the preacher, went to call him home, as we learn from a MS. dictated by him in old age. There, too, was Lord Home, who paid a visit to Bothwell at Brussels, and came back to Scotland in April 18, incurring James's displeasure for "trysting with Bothwell."<sup>7</sup> In Paris also was the desperate intriguer, John Colville. To Neville, the English Ambassador at Paris, Gowrie seemed a

GOWRIE'S RELIGION.

On page 444, line 5 from the foot of the page, is quoted Nicholson's report that John, Earl of Gowrie, had turned Catholic. The author is informed that, in an unpublished letter at Hatfield, the story is contradicted by John Colville the spy.

Rome (wildly exaggerated by Bothwell's ally, the spy Colville), Elizabeth in May seized at Hull a consignment of muskets intended for the Scottish king.<sup>9</sup> On April 20, Gowrie being then in England, Nicholson reported from Holyrood the king's dissatisfaction with the peace between England and Spain, and rumours of a conspiracy by Douglas of Spot, Colville, and Archibald Douglas.<sup>10</sup> James was especially "discontented" with Nicholson himself, and his great desire was that a convention should grant him money for warlike preparations,<sup>11</sup> perhaps to demonstrate in favour of Essex's contemplated conspiracy.

Towards the middle of May Gowrie had returned to Scotland amid great rejoicings of welcome. It is an obvious conjecture that known, was finished in the August of 1599.<sup>2</sup> Dr Cecil's whole object was to discredit James among the English Catholics. It is actually averred by him that James in 1586 wrote to Elizabeth a letter urging the death of his mother, with the celebrated words, Mortui non mordent. "How little would be the gain to Catholics were he to become king of three such kingdoms as England, Ireland, and Scotland." Such, as early as 1596, were the opinions of Dr Cecil. Thus among James's anxieties was the possible opposition of perhaps a majority of the English—namely, the Catholics—to his claim. He was also fretted by a proposed marriage for Arabella Stuart, the daughter of his father's younger brother. She, not being like himself an alien, might have her own faction in England, and might offer a sounder legal claim to the succession.

While these were the relations of England and the king, on April 3 the young Earl of Gowrie returned from the Continent to had in Scotland a name for magical studies, and after his death Gowrie was accused of having talked about the cabala, and worn a talisman, a practice then common enough on the Continent. In what year he left Padua we do not know, but the author of an unpublished vindication of his conduct says that he suffered at Rome for the truth of his religion.<sup>4</sup> On the other hand, Nicholson, the English resident at Holyrood, in December 1598, writes from Edinburgh that Gowrie "has turned Papist."<sup>5</sup> After Gowrie's death the royal chaplain, Galloway, insisted on this point: Gowrie had been trying to induce the king to negotiate with Rome. The king was his authority for this statement, uttered in the royal presence. Bothwell, in writing to the Spanish Court, reckons Gowrie and Logan of Restalrig among Catholics (Spanish State Papers, iv. 680). It is conceivable that Gowrie, in the interest of England, had been trying, under a pretence of sympathy, to find out the truth as to the incessant charges against James of tampering with the Pope.

On August 21, 1599, John Colville told Cecil that the party of the Kirk intended to bring home Gowrie.<sup>6</sup> Whether they sent for him or not he turned homewards, passing three months, says Calderwood, in the hotbed of Calvinism, with Beza at Geneva. He was in Paris in February and March 1599, and thither Robert Bruce, the preacher, went to call him home, as we learn from a MS. dictated by him in old age. There, too, was Lord Home, who paid a visit to Bothwell at Brussels, and came back to Scotland in April 18, incurring James's displeasure for "trusting with Bothwell."<sup>7</sup> In Paris also was the desperate intriguer, John Colville. To Neville, the English Ambassador at Paris, Gowrie seemed a useful agent for Elizabeth (February 27, 1600). "He was well affected to religion and her majesty"; he was to be received with honour and favour. "You will find him to be a man of whom there may be exceeding good use made."<sup>8</sup> Now, a very useful Scot, in Cecil's and Elizabeth's opinion, was most undeniably a Scot who would capture James's person.

By April Gowrie was in London. At the English court he resided for over a month (April–May 1600) on the friendliest terms with Elizabeth, and treated like a prince of the blood, says tradition. He made the acquaintance of Lord Willoughby, governor of Berwick.

Angry with James as to the succession, suspecting his intrigue with Essex, aware of the dim traffickings between Scotland and Rome (wildly exaggerated by Bothwell's ally, the spy Colville), Elizabeth in May seized at Hull a consignment of muskets intended for the Scottish king.<sup>9</sup> On April 20, Gowrie being then in England, Nicholson reported from Holyrood the king's dissatisfaction with the peace between England and Spain, and rumours of a conspiracy by Douglas of Spot, Colville, and Archibald Douglas.<sup>10</sup> James was especially "discontented" with Nicholson himself, and his great desire was that a convention should grant him money for warlike preparations,<sup>11</sup> perhaps to demonstrate in favour of Essex's contemplated conspiracy.

Towards the middle of May Gowrie had returned to Scotland amid great rejoicings of welcome. It is an obvious conjecture that Robert Cecil, Elizabeth, and Willoughby, in England, with any malcontents of the Scottish Kirk party, may, or rather must, have pointed out to Gowrie the path already indicated to him by religious prepossession, ambition, and revenge. True religion required the aid of an enemy of idolatry, like Gowrie, against a king who was trafficking with the Scarlet Woman that sitteth on the Seven Hills, and "stramping" on the Kirk. We know that the name of Ruthven and its allies were still hankering to avenge the death of "Greysteil" that Gowrie executed in 1584; at least, Colonel Stewart, who had taken part in his fall, showed a sudden desire to be employed by Elizabeth in Ireland as soon as young Gowrie came home. But the Earl seemed to be on the friendliest terms with James, who liked learned talk with a young scholar home from Italy.

We think of the king and his discourse, in Latin, with "Glenvarlochides," Nigel Oliphant, in the "Fortunes of Nigel." But Gowrie had been rather too well received by Elizabeth, with whom James was so enraged. According to Carey, writing to Cecil (May 29), the king gave Gowrie "many jests and pretty taunts" about "the great conference held with the queen's majesty, and that he had been offered some gold." The Earl said that he owed her kindness to her affection for James, and that he "had gold enough for himself." He had not; for James owed him money for his father's outlay when governor of Scotland, and Gowrie was pressed by creditors. James gave him a year's grace as to his father's creditors, and promised one day to pay him.<sup>12</sup> In banter "the king marvelled that the ministers met him not" when he entered Edinburgh; and Calderwood reports other taunting or tactless speeches—for example, as to Riccio's murder.<sup>13</sup>

The sisters of Gowrie were maids of honour to the queen, and Alexander Ruthven, his brother, made suit to be a gentleman of the bedchamber, but his suit was not accepted. Tattle alleged alternately that the queen was in love with the young Ruthven or with Gowrie. It is needless to dwell on such idle gossip. By the end of May Gowrie retired to his town house at Perth, a chateau with a garden sloping to the Tay. Nicholson, reporting this fact, announced impending storms which Gowrie might intend to avoid (May 27).<sup>14</sup>

A convention was to have been held in June, but the murder of the Border Warden, Sir John Carmichael, by the Armstrongs, caused it to be postponed for some days.<sup>15</sup> On June 29 Nicholson reported the meeting of the convention, and the speech in which the king demanded money, with a view to securing his succession and "honourable entering to the crown of England after the death of the queen." Nothing could have been more cruelly tactless, more apt to anger Elizabeth; and an arrangement with Essex was probably in the mind of the king. The Lord President, Seton, lately one of the Octavians, a man of upright and resolute character, skilled in finance, opposed the king's demands. It was insane for a small, poor country like Scotland to hope to win by arms what could only be gained by consent of the English people. This was true; but it also seems that if, on the death of Elizabeth, Protestant England was for James, Catholic England for the Infanta, James ought to be in a position to help his own faction. But the Scots never would endure taxation for military purposes. They reckoned their feudal levies potent enough, and while the king had no money and no "waged men" they were always masters of the king. This policy had caused many disasters in war, and many sanguinary revolutions. Mary herself only acquired a small guard of musketeers in consequence of the murder of Riccio and the danger to her person.

James, as we saw, had lately admitted the barons, or lairds, to Parliament. They and the burgess members were now as recalcitrant about taxation as if they had been English knights of the shires. They offered James their swords when they were needed, and, on condition that he should never tax them again, about £4000, at most (£40,000 Scots). James refused, and demanded 100,000 crowns to be paid by 1000 persons. Gowrie replied in a speech reported by Nicholson. James was dishonouring himself by his demands, and his people by laying bare their poverty. James angrily replied he could call a Parliament and disenfranchise the lairds as easily as he had enfranchised them—a pretty example of the constitutional value of a Scottish Parliament. The laird of Easter Wemyss retorted that they had paid for their seats, and would have the seats conferred on them in 1587. The convention broke up, and Robert Cecil learned, from a cyphered and anonymous despatch, that James "intends not to tarry upon her majesty's death, but take time so soon as without peril he can." This message was probably a piece of mere mischief-making.

The Government was bitterly in need of money. Nicholson again and again refers to the poverty prevailing. The islands were (as is shown later, in an account of Highland affairs) unusually turbulent. The king had intended to conduct an expedition himself to take order with Kintyre and Isla; "but," writes Nicholson, "the 'rode' to the isles is deferred on account of the great scarcity in the country" (July 22). At the same time James was gratified by the recantation of his old enemy, John Colville, the spy and ally of Bothwell. This man had either written a book against James's legitimacy, or such a book had certainly been attributed to him. For years he had been a spy half out of employment; Cecil would not pay. After 1598 he was abandoned by Essex. An exile in France, this once earnest professor was now converted to Catholicism. He wrote a recantation of the book attributed to him against the king's legitimacy, and was reconciled to Archbishop Beaton in Paris. The recantation pleased the king; but Colville continued to spy for the English Ambassador in France, spied his way to Rome, and begged of the Pope. He died, in deserved poverty, not long afterwards.<sup>16</sup>

As we approach the Gowrie mystery, it may be observed that Colville and other agents of his kind perpetually flattered Cecil and the English ministers with promises to kidnap the king of Scotland. Such hopes are a regular element in their letters.

As to Colville, this needy, vindictive, and desperate man, writing to Essex from Scotland on April 29, 1598, makes the following strange promise: "And for the service I mind to do, if matters go to the worst, it shall be such, God willing,—if I lose not my life in doing thereof,—as no other can do with a million of gold, and yet I shall not exceed the bounds of humanity. But for conscience' sake and worldly honesty I must first be absolved of my natural allegiance."<sup>17</sup> Colville has just been speaking evil of James, and now he promises to do a desperate and treasonable deed, "within the bounds of humanity" (that is, not involving murder), a deed which only he can do. This means kidnapping the king. He elsewhere drops a similar hint (October 20, 1598).<sup>18</sup>

We now draw near that fifth of August which James ever afterwards kept as a public holiday in memory of his escape from the Gowrie conspirators. Gowrie himself, with his brother, the Master, was hunting in Atholl during the latter part of July. His mother, Lady Gowrie, was apparently at the town house of the family in Perth.<sup>19</sup> At the beginning of August the court moved from Holyrood to Falkland, a charming palace of the modern French château order, unfortified, save for the strong round towers and the gateways. In spite of time and restoration, Falkland is still, perhaps, the best example of grace and comfort in a Scottish royal residence of great age. The park and woods were well suited for sport, and in these woods, as we saw, Bothwell had once hoped to trap the king along with his huntsmen.

It appears from the treasurer's accounts that, late in July, letters were sent from the court, then at Edinburgh, to the Earls of Atholl and Gowrie, and from Falkland to the Master of Ruthven, and to Drummond, lay Abbot of Inchaffray. We know nothing of the contents of these letters, which have been conjectured about by writers on the mystery of the Gowrie conspiracy. We learn, however, from an unpublished MS. that James had been trying to induce Gowrie to resign the lands of Scone (of which James had presented him with the rents for life) to his younger brother.<sup>20</sup> To this matter the letters may have referred; nothing is known. On one of the last days of July a kinsman of Gowrie, Alexander Ruthven (the ancestor, in the female line, of the present house of Ruthven), rode from Dunkeld to Gowrie's hunting lodge in Atholl (Strabane). On Friday, August 1, Gowrie sent Captain Ruthven from Atholl to tell his mother that "he was to come," and the confused language of his servant, Craigengelt, who deponed to this, makes it probable that Lady Gowrie was then at Perth. If so, she left at once for Gowrie's Castle of Dirleton, now a beautiful ruin near the sea hard by North Berwick.<sup>21</sup> To Dirleton—according to the contemporary Vindication in MS., to Calderwood, and to Carey (writing to Cecil from Berwick on August 11)—Gowrie himself intended to go on August 5. Most of his men and all his provisions were there already, says Carey; but Gowrie never saw Dirleton again.<sup>22</sup>

We now reach August 5, the day of the Gowrie tragedy. Something must first be said as to the evidence. It is vitiated, on the king's side, by his theory that murder was intended against him by the Ruthvens, whereas the plot, if plot there was, must have been merely one out of scores of schemes for kidnapping the royal person, and working a revolution in favour of England, the Kirk, or Rome. Nothing was reckoned more constitutional. The evidence, again, in the nature of the case, is mainly that of the king, and of a mysterious personage, corroborated in part by James's retinue, and by citizens of Perth and others, who were present. The opponents of James, contemporary or modern, discount this evidence, as a rule, where it does not suit them. But the most important witnesses declined, on the most essential points, to say things quite necessary to the success of their cause, or even to stretch a point, where the temptation was great and obvious. Again, the discrepancies between the versions of the king, and of the other most important witnesses, are so manifest, being publicly acknowledged by James himself, that, on the theory of collusion, they could not have occurred. The stories, if collusive, would have been brought into harmony before they were laid before the world and a court of justice. Of course, had this been done, opponents would have called the very harmony suspicious. No two men can give absolutely identical accounts of the same sudden, confused, and startling occurrence, as daily experience proves.

Our earliest testimony as to the events of August 5 is Nicholson's account of the letter written for the king to the chancellor and others on the night of August 5. The substance of this letter was orally narrated by the secretary to Nicholson at Edinburgh on the morning of August 6. In such circumstances, where we have, first a hasty letter, then an oral repetition of its tenor, and then that tenor redescribed, absolute accuracy is impossible. But the account is, essentially, that which James always gave.

We now turn to James's official version, a pamphlet sent by Nicholson to Robert Cecil as early as September 3, 1600. This version we can check by the depositions of witnesses. His majesty says that he went out to hunt, in beautiful weather, between six and seven in the morning. He and his suite were clad in green—the king, as we know to have been his custom, wearing a hunting-horn, and no sword. The Master of Ruthven accosted him before he mounted. Why was Ruthven at Falkland so early? That he was there the lay Abbot of Inchaffray, Drummond, with many others, declared; the abbot asked him to breakfast, but Ruthven declined. To James, apart, Ruthven told how, the night before, he had caught a fellow with a pot of gold, and, unknown even to Gowrie, had shut him up in a private room,* “and locked many doors behind him.” James, after saying that he had no claim to the gold, was induced to suspect that it was foreign gold (as Ruthven implied) brought in for seditious purposes. He, therefore, said that he would send a warrant to Gowrie and the bailies of Perth to examine the fellow, and take care of the money. Ruthven replied that the money, in that case, would be ill counted, and insisted that James should follow him at once. The king characteristically preferred to hunt first, and discuss afterwards. James rode after the hounds; Ruthven remained, and despatched one Andrew Henderson, a retainer of his family, who was with him, to tell Gowrie that James could not be expected for three hours at least. This James tells from report; he saw no companions with Ruthven. Now the Abbot of Inchaffray saw only Andrew Ruthven with Alexander Ruthven after James rode away from Alexander. We do not find, in fact, that any witness deponed to seeing Andrew Henderson at Falkland.

* The word used is “house,” often equivalent to “room” in Scots, and so employed elsewhere by James.

Here we must, for a moment, desert the king's narrative. The point—Did young Ruthven send Henderson from Falkland to Lord Gowrie at Perth with the message that the king was coming?—is of central importance. If Henderson, leaving Falkland about seven, reached Gowrie about ten, then the visit of the king did not take Gowrie by surprise. He had time to order luncheon. This he did not do; he appeared later to be surprised by the king's arrival. If he really was surprised, then he had not laid a plot to bring James to his house. But if Henderson did ride about half-past seven from Falkland with the news of James's coming, as he swore, and if he reached Gowrie about ten o'clock, then Gowrie's failure to prepare for a royal guest, who came at one o'clock, was meant as part of his pretence that James had arrived uninvited. The inference must be that Gowrie was engaged in some disloyal enterprise. And there was good evidence from gentlemen of honour that Henderson did reach the Earl about ten o'clock, and the modern defenders of the Ruthvens have to allege that Henderson had not been at Falkland at all, but had only ridden two or three miles out of Perth on some trivial errand, and returned. But the contemporary MS. Vindication of the Ruthvens alleges that Henderson really was at Falkland with Ruthven, and did carry the message about the king's arrival. Why, then, did he arrive, not at ten, but after noon? This the contemporary apologist answers by omitting the king's long hunting of some four hours—seven to eleven—and making Henderson arrive in Perth about half-past twelve. The evidence that he came to Gowrie about ten is excellent; and the contemporary apologist of the Ruthvens had no scruples whatever in admitting his presence at Falkland.

The whole question is, Had James summoned Ruthven to Falkland before seven in the morning, and then pretended that Ruthven had invited him to Perth? Or, did Ruthven invite James to Perth, and warn Gowrie, by Henderson, of his success? while Gowrie pretended not to have received any such news from Henderson. The Ruthven apologist (1600), by admitting that Henderson brought the news, while falsifying the hour of his arrival, raises a very strong surmise in favour of the second alternative—Gowrie was bringing the king to Perth for no good, and no avowable purpose.

Returning to the king's narrative, he goes on to say that, during a check, he sent some one to find Ruthven. To Ruthven he announced his intention to ride to Gowrie's house when the hunt was over. James was thrown out by this delay, but followed, and they killed about eleven o'clock. Ruthven would not let him stay to see the deer broken up (la curée), or wait for a second horse, which was brought after him at a gallop, or even to put on his sword. Lennox and Mar did wait for their second mounts (the hunt ended close to the stables), and followed, though Ruthven wished James to prevent them. His action made James think Ruthven but dubiously sane; and he whispered his doubts to Lennox, who, at the trial, corroborated the king's statement. Lennox "did not like" the story of the pot of gold, and James bade him keep near his person whenever he went alone with Ruthven. But Ruthven now insisted, says James, that the king should be alone with him at the first view of the gold. James rode on, much bewildered "between trust and distrust," he says. Ruthven then sent Andrew Ruthven to warn Gowrie, and himself quitted the king at a mile from Perth, and rode forward to see his brother. Gowrie left his dinner when Ruthven arrived, and met James with some sixty men (his apologist says, with two only) on the Inch. The king had to wait long for his dinner, the cook having to beg for grouse here, and mutton there, and eke out with pastry.

Gowrie, as we saw, had given out before that he was going to Dirleton that evening, and had sent his "provisions" thither. This, of course, confirmed Ruthven's story that Gowrie knew nothing of his ride to bring the king, and was wholly unprepared. James was impatient for a view of the gold, but Ruthven begged him to say nothing in Gowrie's presence. During the delay one of the retinue, Sir Thomas Erskine, sent his servant to the town to buy him a pair of green silk hose to dine in comfortably.<sup>23</sup> At last James dined, Gowrie standing in attendance with Ruthven, in a room off the hall, and often leaving the chamber. In the hall the suite were met, dropping in at intervals. At first they were thirteen in all. Their dinner came later than James's, and Gowrie entered the hall, bidding them drink "the king's scoll," or pledge. They all then rose, and expected James; but Gowrie said, "His majesty was gone up quietly some quiet errand,"—so Lennox, Mar, and others averred. As soon as Gowrie left the inner room for the hall, James bade Ruthven bring Sir Thomas Erskine, but Ruthven implored James to come alone with him. The pair walked through the end of the hall, and this was the last that his suite saw of the king till James, very red, bellowed "treason" and "murder" out of a turret window.

Meanwhile, just after James and Ruthven passed across the hall, Gowrie led Lennox and others, but not Mar, who visited the room where the king dined, into the garden beside the Tay. Here they ate cherries, while Ruthven took James upstairs through three or four rooms en suite, locking each door behind them. Later, we only hear of resistance from one locked door, though two, at least, were locked—one from the gallery into the chamber, one from the chamber into the turret. That a man so nervous as James permitted this may be explained by the circumstance that he had dined. The Rev. Patrick Galloway averred that the doors "checkit to" with some kind of spring lock (sermon of August 11).<sup>24</sup> At all events locked one door was, for the king's retinue, later, could not force a way in, though they broke a hole in the door. No critic questions that fact. If it is hard to see why James let Ruthven lock the doors, it is impossible to believe that he locked himself in alone with Ruthven, or that the porter, or James's page, Ramsay, had been bribed to do it, as has been suggested. But locked the doors were.

Finally, the pair reached the turret, off a chamber off the gallery. This turret had a door which Ruthven locked. If the long gallery had a door, that was not locked, but locked was the door between the gallery and this chamber, and locked now was the door between the chamber and the turret. Therein was nothing but a man (namely, Andrew Henderson, as was later proved), said by James to have worn a dagger, secret coat-of-mail, and "plate-sleeves." Ruthven now put on his hat, drew the man's dagger, held the point to the king, and "avowed that the king behaved to be at his will, and do as he list."

James, according to his tale, behaved with great coolness (as when Bothwell captured him in Holyrood), bade Ruthven uncover, and promised to be absolutely secret about the whole affair if it went no further. Ruthven was now in a dilemma. There was no use in killing James, and, with a witness present who certainly would not help him to bind James, what could he do? According to the system of secrecy (which Gowrie is said to have applauded, shortly before, in talk with the Rev. Mr Cowper, who told Spottiswoode), Henderson had not been prepared for his part. A healthy Highlander or Borderer, of the Gowrie clientage, would either have aided Ruthven (in which case James would have been trussed like a chicken), or would have boldly taken the king's part. Henderson merely trembled and murmured. Ruthven now lost his head. He made James swear that he would not cry out or open the window, and he left the turret, locking the door behind him. He said that he would consult Gowrie, but that he found to be impossible probably; Henderson thought he lurked outside the door.

Gowrie, we saw, when James went upstairs, took Lennox and others into the garden. While they were there, and while James was upstairs, one Mr Thomas Cranstoun, a retainer of Gowrie, approached them, saying that James had mounted, and was riding through the Inch.

Cranstoun (who was tortured, tried, and hanged) admitted that he did bring this "report and bruit,"<sup>25</sup> but in good faith. From that moment Gowrie was fully occupied and surrounded by people. Ruthven either found this out when he left James locked up in the turret, or, more probably, suspected that he could not consult Gowrie, and merely loitered about, confused and irresolute. James, meanwhile, finding that the armed man, by his confession, knew not wherefore he was there, bade him open the turret window, which he had promised not to do with his own hand. The man, as James told him, opened the wrong window, not the window giving on the gateway. Gowrie, in the garden, on hearing Cranstoun's message that the king had ridden off, called for his horse, which, as Cranstoun told him, was at Scone, two miles away.

The arrangement is obvious. It was to be said that the king had ridden homeward, his suite would follow, and be out of the way, Gowrie would not be able to accompany them (as was his duty), because his horse, unluckily, was at Scone, across the Tay, about two miles off to the east. This was well planned; but here the system of secrecy again proved fatal. The porter, Christie, not trained in his part, denied that James could have ridden out, he himself had the key of the back gate in his pocket, or at his girdle. Gowrie give the porter the lie, and said that he would ascertain the truth.

Now, at this point Gowrie's conduct is wholly incompatible with innocence. We give the facts in the words of Lennox: "I am sure," said Gowrie, "that the king is forth; nevertheless, stay, my Lord Duke, and I shall go up and get your lordship the verity and truth thereof." And the said Earl of Gowrie passed up, and incontinent came down again into the close, and he affirmed to the deponent "that the king was forth at the back gate, and away."<sup>26</sup> Inchaffray and Moncrief corroborated. Nicholson's letter of August 6 tells the same tale. It is impossible to doubt the fact. Gowrie went up the great staircase, and returned once more, assuring the gentlemen that the king had ridden away. Whether he met the Master (which is improbable), or not, Gowrie deliberately lied. Except on a theory of wholesale perjury by Lennox and others, it is certain that Gowrie, after pretending to go and inquire, falsely alleged that James had left his house. For this he could have only one motive, to get the royal suite to ride off and leave James alone to his fate. The lords then went to the front gate, and thence into the street, awaiting their horses, and talking over the matter. Had Gowrie not led to their arrival on that side of the house, the cries which James presently raised would not have been heard by his retinue.

While these things were happening downstairs young Ruthven had again rushed into the turret; probably he had not seen his brother; probably he had been deliberating on his desperate situation. He declared that James must die; but, instead of stabbing him, tried to bind his hands with a garter later found on the floor of the room. James snatched away his left hand and leaped free, making for the turret window. Ruthven seized and tried to gag him with his hand, but the window was pushed up, and the gentlemen outside heard the king yell "Treason!" and saw his face very red, and a hand at his mouth. Lennox, Mar, and others at once ran into the house by the main front entry, and up the chief staircase, but could not force the door which the Master had locked.

Soon, as they battered at the door, they heard a noise of fighting within.

The cause was this : while Ruthven and James fought and wrestled in and out of the turret and adjoining chamber, young John Ramsay, a page, hearing James's cries as he stood about the stable door, ran up a small narrow winding stair, not noticed by the others, which led into the chamber giving on the turret, and was nearer him than the main door and great staircase. Either Henderson opened or unlocked the door, or Ramsay drove open the door, and caught a glimpse of a figure (Henderson) by the door, but took no heed of it, as he found Ruthven and the king struggling. Ruthven was still trying to gag James with his hand ; James had "got Ruthven's head in chancery." James shouted, "Strike low, he has a secret mail doublet," and set his foot on the hawk's leash ; Ramsay cast loose the king's hawk, which was on his wrist, and struck high at Ruthven's face and neck. James later admitted that he might have bidden Ramsay spare Ruthven, but, as he said, "Man, I had neither God nor devil before my eyes, but my own defence." He thrust the wounded Ruthven down the steep cork-screw staircase, while Ramsay, from the turret window, bade Sir Thomas Erskine come up. Erskine, like the others, had heard the king's cry from the window, he ran towards the house, and meeting Gowrie outside, some distance from the front door, called him "traitor," and tried to seize him. "What is the matter?" asked Gowrie. A crowd of his retainers separated Erskine from him, and then Erskine heard Ramsay's call from the turret window. Dr Hugh Harries (a man lame from a club-foot), and another man, Wilson, ran with Erskine up the narrow stair, stabbing young Ruthven to death as they passed. They found James safe ; but Gowrie, with some of his men, including Cranstoun, was close on their heels. There were now in the larger chamber, which had a door opening into the turret, the king, Ramsay, Harries, Erskine, and a servant named Wilson. As James had no sword, his friends locked him into the turret and stood on guard. Calderwood says that only Gowrie and Cranstoun fought against the king's four men ; on the other side, the king's party averred that at least seven other men were with Gowrie. Several witnesses later saw some of them bleeding ; they fled and would not appear when summoned. They were two Ruthvens, two Moncriefs, and one Eviot.

The position of James was now alarming. Only the door of the turret separated him from the chamber where his four friends fought six or eight of the Gowrie party, while the locked door between this room and the gallery rang with hammer-strokes, dealt by whom? That this really was James's situation, alone, locked up, a crowd hammering at one door, an unequal fight swaying to and fro in the chamber from which but a door separated him, is absolutely certain. Was James the man to put himself in such a perilous place on the off chance that his friends might have the better of Gowrie's? The friends of this hypothesis also maintain, inconsistently, that James was an abject coward.

The hammers rang, the swords clashed in the chamber next the turret where the king stood alone. In the melée several men were wounded on both sides, but Ramsay at last ran Gowrie through the body. Most writers aver that Gowrie, hearing an opponent cry, "You have slain the king," dropped his points (he had twin swords in one scabbard), and that Ramsay then lunged at him.<sup>27</sup> Gowrie fell dead, his retainers fled; Ramsay and the others let James out of his turret, and with a hammer passed by the Lennox party through a broken panel opened the locked door, at which Mar and Lennox with their men had vainly battered. Even now, according to Lennox, some of the Gowrie faction struck under the door (from the staircase) with halberts, and wounded one of the Murrays who was with Lennox and the king. On hearing Lennox's voice these assailants ran, and the king with his party, kneeling on the bloody floor where the dead Gowrie lay, offered their thanks to Heaven.

To suppose that James wilfully put himself within reach of these perils as part of a plot to murder the Gowries, is to show extreme credulity. How things were probably planned is plain enough. Henderson should have helped Ruthven to master and gag James; the royal suite should have ridden off after their king, said to have made for Falkland, then James would have been carried, perhaps on horseback, down the north side of Tay to Dundee, or across Fife to Elie, and shipped for Dirleton. When the courtiers, not finding trace of the king, rode back to Perth, the Ruthvens (with his majesty) would be on their way, nominally to Dirleton, really perhaps to Fastcastle. That so many men attended the king was what Ruthven, according to James, had tried to prevent. Gowrie's nervous anxiety, while he was with James alone in the small inner dining-room, is easily explained; the king was too well attended. But the Master of Ruthven persevered, he could not desist, for he could not explain away his story of the pot of gold. Henderson failed him, the rest was despair and action without a plan. Thus construed, the whole affair is intelligible; otherwise it is not.

To the townsfolk one fact only was clear: their young provost and his brother were slain. The town bells rang, rumours flew about, the people gathered: men and women, shaking their fists at the windows of the house, cried, "Come down, green coats, ye have committed murder," and clamoured for revenge. James spoke from the window, he called in the bailies, he showed the dead and told the tale, the people were persuaded to return to their houses, but the sun had fallen before James could ride through the lingering rainy twilight back to Falkland. Next day, as we saw, news from James arrived in Edinburgh. There were some who said that Nicholson, the English resident, had been seen at Leith, in the dawn of August 6, awaiting news from beyond the Firth of Forth, a rumour which he indignantly denies. In Edinburgh the preachers found that they could not conscientiously preach, as desired, against treason, "seeing the king made no mention of treason in his bill," and the reports of courtiers varied among themselves. David Lindsay, a preacher, arrived from Falkland, the preaching was entrusted to him; he harangued at the Cross, and the guns were fired.

The brothers of the Ruthvens fled from Edinburgh to Dirleton, and thence to Berwick. They were young boys, but James, who raged against all that dangerous house, had sent to apprehend them. At court, where Beatrix Ruthven was dear to the queen, there had been lamenting, and the name of Anne of Denmark was mingled in the suspicions and tattle of the gossips, with talk about a magical amulet of Gowrie's which, probably, as we have said, he was foolish enough to wear in a kind of "medicine-bag." Such things are worn by gamblers unto this day. Lord Hailes proves that the practice was very common, abroad, in Gowrie's time.

Meanwhile at Falkland efforts were being made to clear up the plot. The unhappy Mr Cranstoun, Gowrie's equerry, a brother of Cranstoun of Cranstoun, was wounded and could not fly. He had been in France for more than ten years, and had returned with Gowrie. On August 6 he was examined, no doubt under torture. He had not seen Gowrie or Ruthven, he said, to interchange six words with them, for a fortnight. They had been in Atholl, and the mention of a fortnight looks as if they had gone thither about July 20. Nothing could be got out of Cranstoun. On August 16, Craingelt, Gowrie's caterer or under-steward, was examined. Nothing could be extracted from him as to a conspiracy. But he had been unaware of Ruthven's early ride to Falkirk. Meeting the Master, booted, on the stairs, when he returned, Craingelt asked him "where he had been?" who answered, "An errand not far off." This answer, obviously, was intended to disguise Ruthven's long ride to bring James from Falkland to Perth. Craingelt asked why the king had come? Ruthven replied, "Robert Abercromby, that false knave, had brought the king there, to cause his majesty take order for his debt." Ruthven, in this story, had only met the king casually, when himself returning from "an errand not far off." As to Robert Abercromby, it has been suggested that he was a creditor of Gowrie for sums disbursed for the king, by the first Earl, executed in 1584. We have seen that James, in June, had given Gowrie a year's exemption from pursuit of creditors. Moreover, he appears to have himself satisfied this Robert Abercromby, who was his saddler. Under the treasurership of the first Earl of Gowrie, and of his successor Sir Robert Melville, James, up to 1594, had owed Abercromby more than £5000 Scots. But, in 1587, James had promised Abercromby twelve monks' "portions" of the abbacy of Cowper, these including the "portions" of dean and sub-prior. This gift or payment (part payment probably) was ratified in the Parliament of 1594.<sup>28</sup> If any of Gowrie's father's debt, really the king's debt, to Abercromby, was unliquidated in 1600, still, Gowrie had an exemption, and it was an impossible story of Ruthven's that the king was acting as debt-collector. It seems of a piece with Ruthven's "errand not far off." Craingelt had been in arms during the tumult. He, Cranstoun, and one Barron, also seen in arms, were hanged. On August 20, Gowrie's tutor, Mr Rhynd, was tortured. He spoke of Gowrie's talisman; his other evidence was not important, but he said that Andrew Ruthven told him, in Gowrie's presence, that he, Henderson, and the Master, had been at Falkland. He had previously told the minister of Perth, Cowper, that Gowrie was wont to argue on the necessity of secrecy in "high and dangerous purposes." To Cowper, Gowrie had recently said the same thing, à propos of a passage in a book, not identified, which Cowper found him reading.

None of these men knew of any plot. The great object at Falkland was to find the man in the turret. Where was he? and who was he? Ramsay, entering the turret, caught only a glimpse of a man behind the king. After he wounded Ruthven the man had vanished like a ghost. And where was Andrew Henderson? Calderwood (who is not invariably correct) tells us that the turret man was first advertised for as "a black grim man," a Mr Robert Oliphant, M.A. But Oliphant had an alibi; it is necessary to keep an eye on this gentleman. Two or three other persons were suspected: one was slain when trying to hide, and Calderwood says that Galloway showed James the corpse, and said that there lay the man of the turret.<sup>29</sup> The turret man had vanished, and Henderson had disappeared. He had been seen returned to Gowrie House, booted, from a ride, by two gentlemen named Hay, and by Mr John Moncrief, who were with Gowrie on the morning of August 5. To a question of Moncrief's, Henderson had replied that he "had been a mile or two above the town." Hitherto no man had any later knowledge of Henderson. He was not seen in the brawl at the house, or among the townfolk. The Ruthven apologist declares that he waited on the lords who dined in the hall; Calderwood, that he was seen eating an egg in the kitchen, and Perth tradition avers that he was at Scone all day, and only heard of the tragedy as he crossed the bridge on the way home to Perth. Meanwhile, though Henderson had vanished like the man in the turret, nobody knew why he had fled. He had done no harm. Even if he had ridden to Falkland and back with the Master (which nobody could prove) there was no harm in that. Andrew Ruthven had made the same journeys, and there is no sign that he was molested. But Henderson had fled, as had five gentlemen, friends or cousins of the Ruthvens, who had been with Gowrie in the fight in the chamber, and, later, had been conspicuous in the riot. On August 12 these men and Henderson were denounced for not appearing to give evidence when summoned.<sup>30</sup> The others had reasons for absconding, because they had been at sword strokes with the king's friends, but what reason had Henderson? Now, as two men had disappeared, he of the turret who had good reason to be afraid, and Henderson who had none, it was an obvious inference that Henderson and the turret man were one and the same.

This fact became apparent even before Henderson was denounced on August 12. On Sunday, August 11, James had entered Edinburgh in state, and, seated on a carpet at the Town Cross, had heard his chaplain, Galloway, tell the story of the tragedy to the people. Galloway gave the king's version, and ended by producing a letter sent by Henderson from his place of hiding. Henderson was factor, or chamberlain, of the lands of Scone, Galloway had been minister of Perth, and knew Henderson well. The preacher produced the letter, any one who knew Henderson's hand might examine it. The extract read was to the effect that, early on August 5, Gowrie sent Henderson to ride to Falkland with the Master, and to bring his message. On Henderson's return Gowrie bade him put on his secret coat of mail, and his plate sleeves, and to wait for the Master, and do as the Master ordered him. Later, the Master locked Henderson up in the turret. He now suspected treason and betook himself to prayer. The Master led the king into the turret, and, said Galloway, "the rest differs almost nothing from what you have heard," that is from the king's narrative.<sup>31</sup>

Between August 12 and August 20, Henderson delivered himself up as a kind of king's evidence. On August 20 he was examined at Falkland by the Council, James not being present. He adhered to his tale about being locked up, armed, in the turret, and corroborated James for the rest; except that he said he wrested the dagger from Ruthven's hand. He also declared that Ruthven asked James to make a "promise," the nature of which Gowrie would explain. It has been fancied that this promise referred to Gowrie's debts. But it is not to be supposed that the Ruthvens would attempt to extort such a promise by secluding the king in a closet with an armed man. They would be guilty of treason to no purpose, for no such extorted promise could be binding. Possibly the word "promise" got into Henderson's memory from the parallel passage in the king's narrative, where "promise of life" to James is mentioned.<sup>32</sup> Henderson, in fact, tried to disguise his own poltroonery. James added his deposition to his own narrative, printed at the end of August, with the warning that, if Henderson's contained discrepancies, "they were uttered in his own behoof for obtaining of his majesty's princely grace and favour."<sup>33</sup>

Before the trial, held by the Parliament in Edinburgh, in November, for the forfeiture of the Ruthvens, Henderson was examined before the Lords of the Articles. His evidence was much to the same effect as before, but he omitted his wresting of the dagger from Ruthven, and there were variations about opening the window.<sup>34</sup>

On these points Hudson, who interrogated both the king and Henderson, wrote sensibly to Cecil from Edinburgh, on October 19: <sup>35</sup>—

. . . I have had conference of this last acsyon, first wth the king, at length, and then wth Henderson, but my speache was first wth Henderson befoar the king came over the watter, betwixt whoame I fynde no difference but y<sup>t</sup> boath alegethe takinge the dager frome Alexander Ruthven, w<sup>ch</sup> stryf, on the one part, maie seame to agment honor, & on the other to move mersy by moar merit: it is plaen y<sup>t</sup> the king only by God's help defendid his owin lyff wel & that a longetyme, or els he had lost it: it is not trew that Mr Alex. spok wth his brother when he went out, nor that Henderson unlokt the door, but haste & neglect of Mr Alex. left it opin, wherat Sr Jhon Ramsay entrid, and after hime Sr Tho. Ereskyn, Sr Hew Haris & Wilsons. That it is not generally trustid is of mallice, & preoccupassyon of mens myndys by the minesters defidence at the first, for this people are apt to beleve the worst & loath to depart frome y<sup>e</sup> fayth.

The other witnesses, Mar, Lennox, many of James's retinue, friends of Gowrie, and burgesses of Perth, gave, before the Lords of the Articles in November, testimony to all that they had observed.

Parliament condemned the Ruthvens, their dead bodies were mutilated, their lands were forfeited, and shared among those who had been with the king. Henderson was allowed to retain his factorship, and received a pension.

Now Henderson's tale was not easily credible. How could the Gowries expect a man, armed, but unapprized of what was expected, to aid in seizing the royal person? The world thought either that Henderson was suborned to tell his tale, there having been no man in the turret at all; or that the king somehow had him locked up in the turret, or that he had really been initiated into the plot, but had lost courage when confronted with his task. The first suggestion is impossible. James would not, on the evening of the occurrences, make his narrative turn on a non-existent man in the turret, and then take the chance of finding a person ready to swear to be that man. The second idea, that James could suborn a factor of Gowrie to be locked up, armed, in a turret of Gowrie's own house, and that unknown to the Earl and his brother, is absurd. But the third theory, that Henderson had been initiated into the plot, had been unable to reveal it or refuse to join it, and had played the weakling at the crisis, is not improbable in itself. Henderson, if approached by Gowrie, would not dare to refuse to join his master, still less would he risk torture by revealing a conspiracy which he could not prove.

Here comes in Calderwood's Mr Robert Oliphant, who was originally suspected of having been the man in the turret, but proved an alibi. Though no historian has remarked the fact, Oliphant let out that, both in Paris and in Scotland, Gowrie had asked him to play the part of the man in the turret. Oliphant was a gentleman, brother of Oliphant of Baughiltoun. He tried to dissuade Gowrie from the enterprise, but, failing here, withdrew from Perth before the fatal day. This talk, held by Oliphant in a house in the Canongate at the end of November or beginning of December, leaked out, and came to the knowledge of the Privy Council, so Oliphant "fled again." This we learn from Nicholson, writing on December 5, 1600.<sup>36</sup>

On the same day the affair appears in the Acts of Caution (in the Privy Council Register). Much later, in 1608, Oliphant was arrested in England, and was in prison for nine months, but his captor, a Captain Patrick Heron, did not appear against him, and he was released.<sup>37</sup> If Oliphant spoke truth, and is correctly reported, it follows that Gowrie had the plot in his mind before his return from France, and it is probable that Henderson had been taken into the conspiracy, but had "fainted" (as Oliphant said) at the critical moment. He then made his peace by his revelations. The defenders of the Ruthvens do not explain why Henderson ran away and hid if he had no part in the transaction.

The sceptics at the time, including Mr Robert Bruce, said that they would believe Henderson's tale if he were hanged and adhered to it on the scaffold. Had this occurred they would still have disbelieved, and would have declared that Henderson was bribed by promises of benefit to his wife and family. As a matter of fact, Mr Bruce, after first cross-examining the king, believed that he was innocent of any plot against the Ruthvens, but guilty of passion in bidding Ramsay strike the Master, so Calderwood says (vi. 156).

For the reasons already given, the writer believes that Gowrie, a very young man,—familiar, probably, with romantic incidents of Italian conspiracy,—had really contrived a plot against the king. If so, the nature of his intentions after securing James remains obscure. The idea clearly was to bring the king, with only three or four servants, to Gowrie House early in the day, when the people were in church. His seclusion and capture would not then be very difficult if Gowrie's retainers preferred the Earl to their king.

James heard of an English ship that hung off the coast, not communicating with the land, but intending, the king thought, to aid Gowrie. He spoke of this to Nicholson (September 3).<sup>38</sup> Conjecture is vain, but the author's suspicions point towards Roger Aston (who drops out of the correspondence for a year), and to Sir John Guevara, Willoughby's cousin at Berwick, the kidnapper of Ashfield, as allies of Gowrie. The link between Guevara and Gowrie may have been that genial traitor, burglar, and pirate, Logan of Restalrig, whose impregnable keep, Fastcastle, is perched on a perpendicular sea-cliff between Berwick and Dirleton. On this point the reader is referred to the new disclosures to be found in Appendix B. The subject is too complex for discussion here, and we conclude that the theory of an accidental brawl is untenable (for James was locked in, and Gowrie deliberately lied as to his departure), while James could not have arranged for Gowrie to lie and so bring his retinue to the place where his cries for aid were heard. Accident is impossible; a plot by James is impossible; and we conclude that two very young men devised a scheme on romantic lines, but blundered over the enterprise. This is made more probable by the extraordinary tissue of falsehoods contained in the hitherto unknown Vindication of the Ruthvens in MS. It is throughout impudently mendacious, but was all the case that its author could offer to Cecil through Carey.

Now began the trouble with the Edinburgh preachers, especially Mr Robert Bruce. The arguments of James with these men, and Bruce's replies, fill many pages of the friendly Calderwood. The other preachers were suspended. Bruce was banished at the end of October. It is curious that he passed a night or two at Restalrig, Logan's house, before he set sail. "Mr Robert returned to Restalrig upon Thursday, at night, the penult of October," says Calderwood. Mr Robert was in very bad company, if Logan (accused of being in the plot) was at home.

Another kind of suspiciousness was rife; England was thought to have been Gowrie's ally, and the tone of Elizabeth, in her congratulatory letter to James on his escape, is extremely tart. (August 21.) She says that she hears "her funerals have been prepared." "Think not but how wilily soever things be carried, they are so well known that they may do more harm to others than to me. . . . The memory of a prince's end" (that is, apparently, reflection on James's narrow escape) "made me call to mind such usage, which too many courtiers talk of, and I cannot stop my ears from . . .” She also spoke of a rumour that James meant to hand Prince Henry over to Catholic teachers. James warmly denied these imputations which hint at a plot of his own against Elizabeth’s life. She had never satisfied him about Valentine Thomas, and probably suspected him of dealings with Essex, whose enterprise had brought him to the Tower.<sup>39</sup> Elizabeth softened her expressions, but the mist of suspicions grew, and we find Bothwell’s old ally, Locke, writing to Cecil about “a party” whom Cecil has conferred with, and who is to do something secret, and be rewarded after performance. He was Ogilvie of Pourie.<sup>40</sup>

James and his queen were at odds about the Gowries. Nicholson’s gossip on the topic need not be accepted, though it blew widely abroad, and, if accepted, it proves nothing. The queen was fond of Beatrix Ruthven, and, womanlike, believed what she chose to believe.

Bishops were introduced and voted at the November Parliament which forfeited the Ruthvens; they were Lindsay, Gledstanes, Douglas, and Blackburn.<sup>41</sup> The stubborn incredulity of the preachers as to the Gowrie conspiracy, and their natural reluctance to preach on a given subject and to a given effect, had lent James his opportunity. From the point of view of the ministers, to yield here was to yield all. “The Spreit of God” inspired them with what they were to utter in their sermons. Now, if their minds were not absolutely convinced of the Gowrie treason, the Spirit, of course, would not permit them to denounce it. We really cannot blame them here, for the innocent heirs of Gowrie had not yet (before December 15) been forfeited. Thus, as we look at things, James was actually commanding the preachers to go into their pulpits and be guilty of contempt of court. To his mind, however, and he was not wrong, the preachers were throwing doubt on his personal word of honour. They would not believe that things had passed as he said, and swore that they did pass, and (Henderson apart) the king’s, in the nature of the case, was the only evidence. Thus James fought for his royal and personal honour—if he was a liar he was also a murderer—while the preachers fought for their consciences and their inspiration.

On October 14, at Holyrood, there was a meeting of the fourteen Royal Commissioners of the General Assembly with the Privy Council at Holyrood. James had ousted five Edinburgh preachers, and their places had to be filled up. He sent James Melville and two others of the Commissioners to consult on a delicate point with the "outed" preachers, and, in the absence of the three, got the remaining divines in to nominate three of the bishops already mentioned. Their sees were Aberdeen, Ross, and Caithness, because in these sees alone could a handful of the temporal wealth of the old Church be recovered.<sup>42</sup> The king, however, had not yet wedged "the horns of the mitre" securely into the fabric of the Kirk, and the situation of his three new bishops contained the seeds of long wars that were to be. It might be disputed whether the Commissioners who accepted the bishops had power to act for the Kirk; their concession needed ratification by a General Assembly. Mr Gardiner looks on the bishops as holding rank derived only by a civil appointment from the Crown, by prerogative and Act of Parliament. They were inevitably led to interfere with the affairs of the Kirk, which this odd kind of bishops had no legal right to do, being hampered by "caveats." They would be opposed by the preachers "whose cause was the true cause of all spiritual and moral progress in Scotland, who in the highest sense were in the right, even when they were formally in the wrong." This is the usual judgment of historians. The precise ministers represented "progress spiritual and moral." Unlike the king, nobles, and bishops, the preachers did not follow "the uncertain guide of temporary expediency."<sup>43</sup>

We are compelled to see matters in a different light. The preachers who sympathised with the anarchism of Bothwell, or sheltered with Logan of Restalrig,<sup>44</sup> or approved of raids upon the royal person, followed expediency just as other politicians did. They were often the agents, sometimes the spies, of a foreign and unfriendly country—England. They were less often formally in the wrong than the king was. They were highly moral men, despite their festive free lances like Bothwell and Logan. But their morals did not prevent Bruce from calling for the death of Henderson merely as an experiment in evidence. Two despotisms, two claims to absolute power, were in conflict,—the claim of inspired prophets, the claims of an anointed king. "Progress" was equally impossible under either claim. The two irreconcilable forces, each of them incompatible with the freedom of the State and of the individual, were obliged to destroy each other. Meanwhile James had bishops voting in Parliament. But the impossibility of endowing the sees, and the attempts of the Crown to do so out of the alienated Church lands, combined with the horror of anything that looked like the services of the old faith, were to produce the Civil War.

During the stress of these affairs Charles I. was born at Falkland, on November 19. His mother had just passed through agitations only second to those of Mary before the birth of James VI. An old anecdote avers that the child's nurse once found a spectral cloaked man rocking the cradle: this, of course, was the enemy of mankind, and James drew the darkest omens from the phenomenon.

The year 1600 ended, leaving James "a free king" as regarded the resistance of the Kirk, but still plagued by deadly feuds among the nobles. Huntly and Argyll were not yet reconciled; the Maxwells and Johnstones, the Ogilvies and Lindsays, the Clan Gregor and the rest of the world carried on their ancient vendettas, and in Ayrshire began the series of crimes connected with Mure of Auchendrane. Scotland was still anarchic.*

* Persons curious as to the Gowrie conspiracy will find the case against the king stated in Mr Louis Barbé's interesting volume, "The Tragedy of Gowrie House" (Gardiner, Paisley, 1887). The author has considered Mr Barbé's arguments carefully, but remains of the opinion that the plot was a Ruthven, not a royal conspiracy. He has made a full study of the case, and of the fresh manuscript materials in "James VI. and the Gowrie Mystery" (Longmans, 1902).

---

In writing this and the preceding chapter, I had not before me Major Martin Hume's interesting "Treason and Plot," based partly on uncalendared papers at Hatfield. Major Hume thinks that James at this period was deep in plot with Rome and Spain. He speaks of "the many letters now before us in which James does pretend his desire for reconciliation with Rome" (p. 419, note i. p. 420). I have no knowledge of any such letters later than the one of 1584. From the Pope's answer to the disputed letter sent by Elphinstone in 1598, it is clear that James, if he wrote this epistle, made no pretension of a desire to change his creed—his Holiness regrets the circumstance. "Lord Hume was sent to Paris and to Italy . . . to beg for recognition" (May 1599), says Major Hume (p. 380). Lord Hume went to Paris and to Brussels to meet Bothwell—much to James's annoyance—to Italy he did not go. The "advertisements" of John Colville, a starving spy in exile (1599), are "sensational" rumours not worthy of consideration. His myths are recorded by Major Hume (p. 380), and long ago by Tytler (ix. 313, 314). If the wild tales were true, James rejected the Papal offers of 100,000 crowns down, and 2,000,000 to follow! That James had received abundance of Spanish or Roman gold is impossible. We know, from Nicholson, and from the reports of the financial Convention of June 29, 1600, that he was desperately needy. Compare Major Hume, "the encouragement and money he was getting from the Catholic powers . . ." (p. 395). It was Colville's business to send in what is now called "scare news," and he did so, but was so easily detected by his English employers that he turned Catholic "for a morsel of bread." For these and other reasons, I must venture to dissent from the conclusions of Major Hume, till evidence of a more satisfactory sort is produced. At most, I think, James wished to pose as a tolerant prince, despite his persecution of his Catholic subjects.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER XVII.

- <sup>1</sup> Nicholson to Robert Cecil, January 12, 1600; Thorpe, ii. 780.
- <sup>2</sup> Reprinted by Mr T. G. Law, Miscellany of the Scottish History Society, vol. i.
- <sup>3</sup> Pitcairn, ii. 330.
- <sup>4</sup> State Papers Scotland, MS. Elizabeth, vol. lxvi., No. 52.
- <sup>5</sup> Thorpe, ii. 762.
- <sup>6</sup> Hatfield Calendar.
- <sup>7</sup> Winwood Memorials, pp. 37, 146; Border Calendar, ii. 645. For Bruce's mission to a person whom in 1624 he calls "The Master of Gowrie," see Wodrow's "Life of Bruce," p. 10, 1842.
- <sup>8</sup> Winwood Memorials, p. 156.
- <sup>9</sup> Thorpe, ii. 782.
- <sup>10</sup> Nicholson to Robert Cecil, April 20, 1600.
- <sup>11</sup> Thorpe, ii. 782, 783.
- <sup>12</sup> Arnot's "Criminal Trials," p. 373.
- <sup>13</sup> Border Calendar, ii. 659.
- <sup>14</sup> Thorpe, ii. 782.
- <sup>15</sup> Thorpe, ii. 783.
- <sup>16</sup> Colville's life is traced in the preface to "Letters of John Colville," Bannatyne Club.
- <sup>17</sup> Hatfield Calendar, viii. 147.
- <sup>18</sup> Hatfield Calendar, viii. 399.
- <sup>19</sup> This appears to be the sense of Craingelt's statement in Pitcairn, ii. 157.
- <sup>20</sup> State Papers, Scotland, Eliz., vol. lxvi., No. 50, published for the Roxburghe Club in "Gowrie Conspiracy, Confessions of George Sprot" by myself.
- <sup>21</sup> Pitcairn, ii. 157.
- <sup>22</sup> Border Calendar, ii. 677.
- <sup>23</sup> Evidence of Henry Balnaves: "Was in the lodging before the tumult. Past forth, at the request of Sir Thomas Erskine, to buy him a pair green silken shanks."—Pitcairn, ii. 199.
- <sup>24</sup> Pitcairn, ii. 249.
- <sup>25</sup> Pitcairn, ii. 156.
- <sup>26</sup> Pitcairn, ii. 173.
- <sup>27</sup> Spottiswoode gives this version, as does: "The True Discourse of the Late Treason," State Papers, Scotland, Eliz. vol. lvi. No. 50, MS.
- <sup>28</sup> Act Parl. Scot., iv. 83, 84.
- <sup>29</sup> Calderwood, vi. 73, 74.
- <sup>30</sup> Privy Council Register, vi. 149, 150.

- <sup>31</sup> Pitcairn, ii. 250, 251.
- <sup>32</sup> Pitcairn, ii. 215, 222.
- <sup>33</sup> Pitcairn, ii. 218.
- <sup>34</sup> Pitcairn, ii. 174-179.
- <sup>35</sup> State Papers Scot., Eliz., MS. vol. lxvi., No. 78.
- <sup>36</sup> S. P. Scot., Eliz., MS. vol. lxvi., No. 107.
- <sup>37</sup> Privy Council Register, 1600, 1608, 1609, s.v. Robert Oliphant.
- <sup>38</sup> S. P. Scot., MS. vol. lxvi., No. 66.
- <sup>39</sup> Tytler, ix. 365, 367; Letters of Elizabeth and James (1849), pp. 132, 133.
- <sup>40</sup> Thorpe, ii. 788 (83).
- <sup>41</sup> Calderwood, vi. 99, 100.
- <sup>42</sup> James Melville, p. 489; Register Privy Council, vi. 164, 166, and Note.
- <sup>43</sup> Gardiner, i. 522, 523.
- <sup>44</sup> Had Bruce stayed not in Logan's house, but in the village of Restalrig, Calderwood would probably have written "Restalrig toun."

CHAPTER XVIII.

JAMES SUCCEEDS TO ELIZABETH.

1601-1610.

THE new year (1601) was marked by the despatch of ambassadors to sound England and Elizabeth, and by almost unusually dark and hostile intrigues of Cecil. Before the end of the year, however, he had abandoned these efforts in favour of a secret understanding with James. The court was rife with quarrels and intrigues, and James Melville kept alive the "grievances" of the Kirk, with the vehemence of his brother, while the king summoned the General Assembly in secular fashion by proclamations at market crosses. The ambassadors who set out for London in February 1601 were the Earl of Mar and the lay Abbot of Kinloss. They left Scotland in the middle of February, and made their way to town at the pace of a funeral procession. In a sense it was a funeral procession. Essex lay in prison for his famed "one day's rebellion," an attempt, in the Scottish manner, at a raid on the person of Elizabeth. Essex, before he was taken, managed to burn most of his papers, especially one which he wore in a bag about his neck, and which only contained six or seven lines. Now, about Yuletide 1600, Essex, Southampton and others had attempted to establish a cryptic correspondence with James. They worked through Norton, the publisher, whose office was in St. Paul's Churchyard, but who had a branch establishment in Edinburgh. He carried Essex's document, recommending that Mar should be sent as ambassador to London by February 1, 1601. James was to reply by a letter "in disguised words of three books," whether a book cypher, or by using book-titles as cant names of the plotters. James's answer may have been the tiny paper which Essex wore in a bag, and burned when his enterprise failed. Essex was searched, naked, for this bag on February 18, 1601, but he had destroyed it.<sup>1</sup> Essex had even prepared instructions for Mar on his arrival as ambassador. Their general purport was to warn him that Cecil would thwart James's succession in favour of the Infanta of Spain. This was a wild theory, but Essex added, with truth, that Cecil had done James many ill offices. That was well known to the king, who told his two ambassadors that Cecil and the English ministry would certainly refuse all their requests, "to force me to appear in my true colours, as they call it."<sup>2</sup> Essex's instructions for Mar were revealed by his secretary, Cuffe, to Cecil, and were not likely to secure a gracious welcome for Mar and Kinloss.<sup>3</sup>

Earlier dealings between Essex and James, the request that James would make a military demonstration on the border, James's ambiguous reply, were known to Elizabeth. The king, in February 1601, was bidding his ambassadors ask her for a plain statement, engrossed in the national records, that he had never conspired against her. This he demanded as a check to any effort to defraud him of the succession on the score of such attempts. But Elizabeth, as if he referred only to the affair of Valentine Thomas's charges, declined to revive old scandals by meeting James's wishes.

While Essex, after these attempts at intrigue with James, lay in prison, expecting death, it was inconvenient that Mar and Kinloss should arrive in London. They therefore delayed, and came after his execution. The king commanded them to study the situation between Elizabeth and her people, to find out whether they were dissatisfied with her personally, or with her ministers only, to urge his claims, not merely to the crown, but to the Lennox estates in England, to ask for money, to try to secure the interest of the city, of the Lieutenant of the Tower, and of the fleet. They were plainly to warn Cecil and his followers that James, when king, would use them as they should now use him. It is not certain whether Mar and Kinloss bluntly told Cecil what James was threatening. Cecil himself was, in fact, working against James after the accustomed Tudor policy. Since Henry VII., every English king had sent his agents to spy, to disturb, to enlist rebels and traitors, to encourage the discontents of the godly, and the enterprises of the nobles, north of Tweed. In 1601 Cecil was playing the old game. He was employing Ogilvie of Pourie, James's self-styled envoy to the Catholic powers, and a new spy, Thomas Douglas, as thorns in the side of the king. Ralph Gray, residing at Chillingham, not far from Flodden, and the Master of Gray himself,—(he had returned from France just after the Gowrie affair),—harbouring at Chillingham, were also Cecil's agents in mischief. "Lord Willoughby" (at Berwick) "has many errands in Scotland"; he had repudiated any share in the Gowrie conspiracy, in fact, he was not at Berwick when that affair occurred.* Cecil was also engaged in a very obscure intrigue with a Scot named Francis Mowbray, who, in January 1603, died of hurts received in an attempt to escape from Edinburgh Castle, where he lay on a charge of conspiring against James's life. In 1602 Cecil seems to have been treating with this Mowbray for the purpose of fully discovering his plot, and communicating it to James.<sup>4</sup> But, in the spring of 1601, Cecil's dealings with Mowbray are dark.<sup>5</sup>

Whether Mar and Kinloss plainly delivered James's threat to the English intriguer or not, Cecil came to terms with them. They met in the office of the Duchy of Lancaster in the Strand. It was arranged that James should not publicly pester Elizabeth with his claims, and that Cecil's commerce with James should be kept a secret. Lord Henry Howard was to write to Kinloss for Cecil, and he acted as an intermediary so verbose, and, in addressing James, so crawlingly abject and hyperbolically fulsome, that his secret correspondence is most distasteful reading. The rudeness of the preachers is not so repulsive as the exaggerated and slavish oriental flattery of the peers and divines of England, with whom James henceforth had to do. In the preface to our Bibles we have a fair or rather a moderate specimen of the style which was to confirm James in his fatal theory of prerogative and Divine right. Language heightened by an age of servility to Gloriana, was yet higher spiced for the unaccustomed but greedy ears of the king of Scotland, in the secret despatches which Howard wrote for Cecil. "The correspondence," says Mr Bruce, the editor of the letters not already published by Lord Hailes in 1766, "began between March and June 1601." The later date is the more probable. Mr Bruce, an opponent of James, admits that Cecil had other strings to his bow (the Master of Gray for one), and "occasionally found it difficult to repress the disposition to make assurance doubly sure," on the side of James.

* The execution of an auctioneer for hanging up the king's portrait on the gibbet seems cruel (Nicholson to Cecil, April 26, 1601). But the man obviously meant to taunt James as the murderer of Gowrie. He "is to be challenged for the filthy act" (May 20, Thomas Douglas to Cecil).

In his first letter to Cecil James denied that he had ever been in treasonable relations with Essex, and promised to keep Elizabeth's minister on in his old situation. He keeps addressing Cecil as "My dearest 10" (the cypher name), and, after October 1601, James was fairly safe from the chance of finding Bothwell in his bedroom or Restalrig under his bed, at least as far as Cecil could control and direct such enthusiasts. His domestic peace was less secure. His queen was still sore about the deaths of the Ruthvens, and the dismissal of Mistress Beatrix. Howard and Cecil especially distrusted Anne, James's wife; they must never be well spoken of, they said, in her presence. She passed the year, as she usually did, in quarrels with James's ministers and favourites, such as Sir George Home and Sir Thomas Erskine. Whatever her husband did was wrong, apparently, in this lady's opinion, and so Howard and Cecil had reasons for distrusting her. The political year ended with James's offers to aid Elizabeth in Ireland. From the intrigues of Cecil, now rallying to the Rising Sun, he was safe. Ogilvie of Pourie, too, gave trouble, trying to extort blackmail from the king, probably, but he was reduced to denying that ever he was commissioned to do James's errands of secrecy in Flanders, France, and Spain—a pretence which, as we saw, caused great scandal.<sup>6</sup>

In ecclesiastical matters the year was comparatively peaceful. James Melville was in bad health, and could only send letters to the brethren, while Davidson, who also expressed himself in a letter, was at first "warded," but, later, set at liberty. A General Assembly, at Burntisland in May, did little beyond deciding that the country was about to run either into papistrie or atheism, considerable defections from the standards of the Kirk. It was decided that the converted Catholic peers ought to be more visited by ministers, and that the "planting" of preachers in desolate parishes was desirable. The Edinburgh preachers who had doubted James's account of the Gowrie plot were to be transported to other districts. It was a grievance that James made August 5, the day of his deliverance from the Gowries, a holiday with preachings. He took this festival to England with him, and some of the sermons which the English prelates preached on Gowrie Plot day are remarkably false and fulsome. A Scottish preacher named Blythe emitted a sermon against pardon granted by James for manslayings, "and worse." "Worse" was a supposed pardon to Ogilvie of Pourie, who, after being captured on the English border, had come north, partly to do what he could for himself with James, partly in the service of Cecil.

In the spring of 1602 that resolute disbeliever in the king's word, Robert Bruce, who had an interview with Mar and Kinloss in England during their embassy, was allowed to come home, and met the king. A kind of "dour" tactlessness was displayed by Bruce. The king asked him if he was "resolved,"—that is, if his doubts as to the Gowrie matter were removed. Bruce said "Yes." "How?" asked the king. Bruce said by Mar's oath. Now James, in earlier interviews, had given Bruce both word and oath, perhaps too many oaths. The man, therefore, was calmly telling James that he accepted Mar's oath, but not the king's. James observed that Mar neither heard nor saw anything of the chief events. "How then could he swear?" Mr Bruce did not know. He was still unsatisfied about the real matter at issue, "the part which concerned your majesty and the Master of Gowrie," young Ruthven. "Doubt you of that?" said the king, "then you could not but count me a murderer?" Bruce's answer was amazing. "It followeth not, if it please you, sir, for you might have some secret cause."

That "secret cause" could only be what rumour averred, an amour between young Ruthven, or Gowrie, and the queen. To have Ruthven stabbed in his brother's house for that or any other secret cause would have been murder, as James had said. Mr Bruce's morality was as peculiar as his manners. "The king heard him gently . . . which Mr Robert admired." He might well "admire," as, but for Mr Bruce's cloth, any man would have been justified in kicking him downstairs. He would sign a profession of belief, but would not utter it in the pulpit, because it was "a doubtful matter." "I give it a doubtful trust." This odd moralist would sign an expression of belief in what he did not believe. Mr Bruce was internally praying all the time, which exercise appears to have confused his mind.<sup>7</sup> But Mr Bruce was at last convinced, as we have already said, that James was guiltless of any plot when he left Falkland on the morning of August 5, 1600. It is not an enemy who reports these things, but the sympathetic Calderwood. He later offered to be plain in the pulpit "as I shall find myself to be moved by God's Spirit"—the old intolerable pretence of direct inspiration. At the risk of tedious repetition it must again be said that this claim of direct, not to say miraculous illumination by the Deity was the real stone of stumbling on which the Kirk tripped. In Covenanting days, nearly a century later, a certain Euphan M'Cullan, of Kilconquhar, in Fife, was fervent in prayer. She prayed for the life of a preacher named Carmichael who was in bad health. "The Lord left me not a mouse's likeness, and said, 'Beast that thou art . . . he'" (Mr Carmichael) "'was but a reed that I spoke through, and I will provide another reed to speak through.'" Mr Henry Rollock was provided, but, Euphan thought, was an inferior reed. Her words are cited from "The Memorials of Mr John Livingstone" by Lord Hailes.<sup>8</sup> Not only preachers, but prayerful men were apt to be directly inspired by God, as some of the slayers of Archbishop Sharp were, according to their own account. There is no way of dealing with men like Bruce and all who held his views. He might have said frankly, "I cannot subscribe, as a man of veracity, a statement in which I do not believe." But he was ready to sign. In the pulpit it was otherwise, there he was "a reed" breathed through by Omnipotence. He did sign his resolution, not as convinced, but as following the law, "till God gave him further light." In July Andrew Melville was "gated" for a short time within his own college.

The new year, 1602, opened prosperously, with a victory of Elizabeth's forces, in Ireland, over Tyrone, "forced to retire to the woods, and play Robin Hood there," wrote Nicholson. Ker of Cessford was raised to the peerage as Roxburghe, and strict measures were taken in his border region against Grahams, Armstrongs, and other moss-troopers. The Master of Gray was received into favour, probably because, as a kinsman of the Ruthvens, he had mollified the queen's anger about their fall, and reconciled her to Sir Thomas Erskine, Sir George Hume, and other courtiers. James pacified the ancient feuds of Moray, Huntly, and Argyll.<sup>9</sup> He communicated to Elizabeth certain overtures from France, and removed her suspicions (July). "She thinks that King James will have none of any league if she be not one in it."<sup>10</sup>

The General Assembly met at Holyrood, in November—though it had been, in the last meeting, appointed for July, at St Andrews. The king's preacher, Patrick Galloway (he who induced Henderson to confess about his doings in Gowrie House), was appointed Moderator. James Melville gave in a protest against the postponement of the Assembly and the meeting in Holyrood Palace. Whatsoever should be done contrary to the constitutions of the Kirk would be null, he said, and of no effect. The preachers who had visited the converted earls, found that only Errol was at all satisfactory. Huntly could not go to his parish kirk, the parishioners were such mean men! This denoted a lack of enthusiasm. Angus could not be got at, but was reported to entertain professed enemies to religion. The faithful of Fife complained that the land had been "defiled" by the saying of mass for the French ambassador. The General Assemblies, too, it was urged, were now unconstitutionally kept. They were told that the law of 1592, as to keeping of Assemblies, had been duly observed; so we understand the reply. The bishops were not objected to, at least under that name, but the "caveats" had not, it was complained, been inspected or discussed. "Let the 'caveats' be looked to," was the answer. The endless affair of Mr Robert Bruce came up. On June 25 of this year (1602), at Perth, he had signed a statement of his belief in James's innocence and the guilt of the Ruthvens, and offered to divert "as far as lies in me, the people from their lewd opinion and uncharitable constructions. . . ." This was Bruce's plain duty, for the resolute scepticism of so notable a man of God naturally confirmed the people in their certainly "lewd opinion" that the king was a deliberate murderer, liar, and robber. The Assembly was asked,—If Mr Bruce thinks the king innocent, and is ready, as he avers, to do his best to persuade the people to that belief, ought he not to express it from the pulpit? The Assembly, "after voting, thought this not only reasonable, but also concluded that the said Mr Robert ought to do the same."

Mr Robert now—and this is very curious—retired, of all places, to Restalrig. This ought to answer such cavillers as John Carey, who, in 1598, spoke of the pious Logan of Restalrig as "a principal man of the Papist faction," merely because Logan had harboured George Ker, the bearer of the Spanish blanks, when on a secret mission.<sup>11</sup> Mr Bruce was apparently a friend of Logan (under grave but then unawakened suspicion as to the plot), to whose house of Restalrig (unless we are to suppose that "Restalrig toun" is meant) he betook himself on occasions demanding meditation and prayer. His difficulty now was, that he would not preach in favour of James's innocence (though he said that he believed in it) "by injunctions." So the endless war of words and of distinctions as to injunctions went on ceaselessly. We cannot pry into the intricate delicacies of a good man's conscience. Mr Bruce thought that James yielded to passion when he bade Ramsay to strike Ruthven. The next Assembly was fixed for July, in Aberdeen, 1604.

On January 5, 1603, Elizabeth wrote her last letter to James, ending "Your loving and friendly Sister." In March her health absolutely broke down. The horrors of her latest days are no part of our subject. She died at Richmond in the earliest morning of Thursday, April 1, and by Saturday night Robert Carey rode into the gates of Holyrood with the news. On the fourth day thereafter came the tidings that James had been proclaimed in London.

James left Edinburgh on April 5, and, after a festal progress, with stops at the houses of the nobles, entered London on May 6. After hundreds of years of war the two portions of the island were united under one king. It is natural to pause for a moment, and reflect on the nature and fortunes of the man whom events had made the link between the ancient enemies. James is a personage so grotesque, in many of his habits so repulsive; so treacherous, so wedded to ideas of absolute royal power—based on a reading of Scripture as fallacious as that of his great adversaries, the preachers—that we are apt to overlook his qualities. Qualities he must have possessed. He had a strong sense of the ludicrous. Thrown as a yearling child into the perfidy and anarchy of Scotland, his person a mere symbol of authority, like the great seal, at which any adventurer might clutch; imperilled by the plots of any party that was backed by the wealth and the intrigues of England; James had, in some way, survived every peril, and had floated over all the billows and cross-tides into the haven of the English monarchy. He had not tact; he had often endangered his claims by rudely and inopportunately pressing them. He had seldom application; most of his time was given to sport and to study. Of economy he was ignorant and careless. Yet the man who, while he rode so much, could read so much, who while apparently always in the saddle, had learning so considerable, must have possessed a certain rapidity of genius. As he said of himself, he had a turn of speed. Though devoted to favourites he could recognise loyalty, as in Mar, whom he trusted, he said, "like a brother," and he could defend Mar resolutely and successfully against the intrigues of the queen, which were peculiarly active at the very hour of the departure for England. While nothing is more odious in James than his acceptance of money from the hands of the slayer of his mother, yet, undoubtedly, a war of revenge would have been ruinous to Scotland, pernicious to England, and an endless cause of disunion.

A more sympathetic prince would have taken up arms ; wisdom dictated peace. James, fond of favourites as he was, continued to repose on the sagacity of Cecil, despite his countless personal reasons for hating that statesman. Though of a petulant temper he was capable of self-restraint. He had contrived to dominate the two strongest opposing currents, the lawlessness of the nobles and the pretensions of the preachers. When he left Scotland there was no noble who dared to play the part of a Murray, a Morton, or of either Bothwell. He had reconciled the greater feuds, as of Argyll and Huntly ; the smaller feuds and private wars died out slowly under the influence of contact with England. It cannot have been mere luck that brought James home after the perils of nearly forty years. His chief danger had ever been the Tudor policy of maintaining divisions and anarchy in Scotland, with the inevitable result of encouraging the tendency to turn to the Catholic powers of the Continent. From these perils the country henceforth was free. James's dim traffickings with Spain and the Pope had always been reluctant ; they were forced on him by Elizabeth. Often warned that a few thousand pounds would make Scotland friendly and pacific, Elizabeth had preferred the dangers and ultimate expenses of hostile intrigue. This policy was ended. The Borders, that focus of war, ceased technically to be the Borders.

On the question of religion James was fated to sow the wind. His own private opinion is given in one of his secret letters to Cecil, containing "the inward temper of his mind," as Sir Robert said. James had complained of the increased confidence of the English Catholics, who boasted, "that none shall enter to be king there but by their permission." Cecil replied that, as to the Catholic priests, "I shrink to see them die by dozens, when, at the last gasp, they come so near loyalty." He had only voted for the penal laws because he regarded the priests as "persuaders to rebellion." But he had no mercy for Jesuits. James had wished to see the latest edict against Catholic priests put in force : the king explains, "I will never allow in my conscience that the blood of any man shall be shed for diversity of opinions in religion," but the temporal results, in rebellion, "the arch-priest with his twelve apostles, keeping their terms in London, and judging all questions as well civil as spiritual amongst all Catholics," these things he could not endure. "I am so far from any intention of persecution, as I protest to God I reverence their Church as our mother Church, although clogged with many infirmities and corruptions, besides that I did ever hold persecution as one of the infallible notes of a false church." He wished, not the deaths of priests, but their expulsion.<sup>12</sup> In England, as in Scotland, James had to bear ecclesiastical meddling with temporal affairs. His own personal attitude towards belief was modern; but he had to do with another condition of affairs, in which all political questions were made religious questions. When he became king of England, persecution of Catholics, for secular reasons, was to cause the Gunpowder Plot. In Scotland, practically in the interests of the freedom of the secular State, James was to intrigue and break the law to keep down the preachers; and the pursuance of this policy, trenching on convictions narrow but sincere, was to be one of the causes of the great Civil War. That war we may deem inevitable: irreconcilable forces, impossible claims by either party, caused the strife. The real history of Scotland henceforth is more than ever ecclesiastical.

When he crossed the border James left behind him a number of the Privy Council to rule Scotland. They were the working administration directed by his majesty's letters. He governed Scotland, he said, by the pen. There was this disadvantage that, remote from the scene, he did not know, and was not often told, the temper of the country. When at home every day occurrences, usually uncomfortable, kept him informed. Safe, at a distance, out of hearing, he ventured on measures which, had he lived among his subjects, he would not have dared to attempt. One useful reform he made (August 11)—he established a small force of mounted constabulary. A body of forty horse was raised to deal with disorder, to hunt down "horners," that is, proclaimed outlaws.<sup>13</sup> Scotland had hitherto been practically destitute of police. In the matter of deadly feuds it had been usual for the parties engaged merely to put forward "cautioners,"—guarantors that they would keep the peace, which they were already required by law to do. Persons engaged in feuds were henceforth to be imprisoned and heavily fined. There were also proclamations against needy Scots who flocked into England without license, and made their country to stink in the nostrils of the Southrons. James took measures, too, for settling a scheme of the complete union of "Great Britain," as he called it, but the time was not ripe, and the negotiations dragged on for years to no purpose.

The chiefs of the Scottish Government were, first, that notable octavian of 1596, Alexander Seton, the President of the Court of Session, created Lord Fyvie, and, later, Lord Dunfermline. Sir George Hume was presently created Earl of Dunbar, and was an active and unscrupulous minister. The Secretary was Elphinstone, now Balmerino, who soon fell under the consequences of the feeble and obscure traffickings with Rome, while still James was king of Scotland only. Sir Thomas Hamilton (later Earl of Haddington), known as Tam of the Cowgate, remained King's Advocate. He was accomplished and learned, a notable antiquary, and collector of the manuscript materials of history. He, too (as we see in the account of the trials of Sprot and Logan),<sup>14</sup> was not the most immaculate of legal officials. Straiton of Lauriston became undesirably notable for his dealings, as Royal Commissioner, with the Kirk and the General Assembly. Gledstanes, Archbishop of St Andrews, and Spottiswoode, the historian, who had succeeded Mary's old ambassador in France, the aged Beaton, as Archbishop of Glasgow, with other bishops, were also of the Privy Council.<sup>15</sup> There were many other members, especially among the nobles, including Mar, but the most active and prominent have been named. They took their orders from James, and executed them to the best of their power.

The affairs of the Kirk continued to be of most importance. In England James had to take up the tangled ecclesiastical problems bequeathed by Elizabeth. While the instincts of England remained attached to such relics of vestments, order, and ritual as the Reformation had spared,—the cap, the surplice, kneeling at the Holy Communion, the use of the cross in baptism, of the ring in marriage,—the preciser sort regarded all these things as rags and remnants of Rome. Men have fought and will brawl about such trifles as these, and the temper of Christianity has been and will be wasted over matters hardly apt to breed a quarrel in a nursery. "Greatly to find quarrel in a straw" of this kind, however, was, on both sides, a matter of conscience and a point of honour. "They fight for great causes, but on small occasions," says Aristotle, and the Hampton Court Conference of January 1604 showed what part James was to take in the struggle. In every corporate body there must be some rulers. Perhaps human wisdom might have reconciled Puritans to the surplice and the ring, or induced Anglicans to tolerate the absence on occasion of these objects. To the Puritans preaching was the one thing supremely needful, and being, as a rule, the more intelligent of the clergy, they were apt to have the larger congregations. James had no objection to good preaching which did not interfere with secular affairs. But he fired up at some reference to "the bishop and his presbyters," and broke into language highly unworthy of his blood and of the occasion. The Nonconformists should conform, he said, otherwise he "would harry them out of the land, or else do worse." He was said to have "spoken by inspiration of the Spirit." Sir John Harington, who was present, said "the Spirit was rather foul-mouthed." James bade the Puritan divines "away with their snivelling." "He wished that those who would take away the surplice might want linen for their own breech."<sup>16</sup> No question, however essentially trivial, which involved the consciences of men could be handled in this temper. Large numbers of Nonconformist divines were ejected from their livings. The House of Commons was justly offended. James was sowing the wind with both hands, and his measures against the Catholic priests brought on the Gunpowder Plot.

The Synod of Fife had been active, as usual, in Scotland, and sent representatives to Aberdeen, for a meeting of the General Assembly (July 1604), though James had prorogued that Assembly, as it clashed with a meeting of the Commissioners to consider the Union of the two countries. The parliament of July listened to a letter from the king about the Union, and restored some forfeited Bothwellites, Douglas of Spot and Thomas Cranstoun.<sup>17</sup> On September 27, James issued an order forbidding the preachers to gather conventions without the Royal assent.<sup>18</sup> In July 1605 James again put off the Assembly. Having heard that the ministers meant to meet, he forbade this action (June 20, 1605). The royal commissioner, Straiton of Lauriston, went to the northern town and attempted to dissuade the gathered preachers, nineteen in all, from disobeying the king. However, they were resolute, though the Moderator of the last Assembly was not present to hand on the golden chain of continuity. They had elected a moderator and a clerk, when Straiton, the royal commissioner, interrupted their proceedings. They asserted themselves to be a lawful Assembly, which Straiton denied. He bade them quit the Assembly, under pain of horning, and they obeyed, adjourning to a day not appointed by James. Straiton asserted, the friends of the preachers deny, that he had forbidden the Assembly, by proclamation at the Cross, before it was constituted. Much legal argument turned on the truth or falseness of this averment. About ten more ministers came on July 5, and threw their lot in with the other nineteen brethren. Among these was Mr Welsh, in early youth a Border thief, next a highly unpopular minister at Selkirk. Ayr was now his charge, and he had married a daughter of John Knox. He was an uncommonly resolute man, and a descendant of his was a famous Covenanting minister. Few persons did more, in the pulpit, in prison, or in exile, than Mr Welsh to hand on the old Presbyterian claims and principles.

What James ought to have done in this pass is not very clear. The Assembly at Aberdeen had been held, so to speak, in order to keep the right of way open. The Kirk, by the law of 1592, had a distinct right to a yearly General Assembly, but the conditions of royal acquiescence and appointment of day and place might be diversely interpreted by lawyers, nor dare we venture on so thorny a subject. The preachers had good reason to fear that James was about to withdraw the right of meeting. They represent themselves as meeting legally, dispersing obediently, and treat Straiton's assertion that he had proclaimed the Assembly unlawful, before it was constituted, as "a false and deadly lie."<sup>19</sup> Very probably the king's best plan would have been to let the thing pass and avoid making martyrs. However, on July 19, 1605, he wrote to the Council, denouncing the preachers as seditious, and avowing his intention to oppose the beginnings of treason. The ministers had spoken of obeying "as far as might stand with the Word of God and the testimony of their conscience," that is, just as far as they pleased. Their prorogation till September was without the king's assent requested or granted; on this point James asked for legal opinion, as he meant to use the rigour of the law.<sup>20</sup> This was James's blunder: the Privy Council, left to themselves, would not have prosecuted in a cause so doubtful and perilous. James believed, probably correctly, that the stauncher preachers had passed the year in forming a strong party and securing votes. He found that the northern Presbyterians were no longer to be trusted to "go solid" for him. Among the nineteen preachers who met, and the ten who adhered to them, were representatives from Nig, near Tain; from Hawick, on the Border; from Fife, and from Ayr in the south-west Lowlands. The length and breadth of Presbyterian Scotland were engaged, "from north and south, and east and west, they summoned their array," though the numbers actually present at Aberdeen were small. Their motive, as we said, was to keep the right of way open; for this purpose, before dispersing, they fixed a date for an Assembly in late September.

It is dangerous to deal with the law of the case, but, probably, James might have out-manœuvred the godly. "That golden Act," as Calderwood styles it, the fifth Act of the twelfth Parliament of James VI. (June 5, 1592), regulated thus the meetings of the General Assembly: "And thus ratifies and approves the General Assemblies appointed by the said Kirk, and declares, that it shall be lawful to the Kirk and ministers, every year at the least, and oftener, pro re nata (as occasion and necessity shall require), to hold and keep General Assemblies, providing that the King's Majesty and his Commissioners with them, to be appointed by his Highness, be present at the General Assembly before the dissolving thereof; nominate and appoint time and place when and where the next General Assembly of the Kirk shall be kept and holden."<sup>21</sup> Now the king and his commissioners were not present at Aberdeen. Straiton, the commissioner, was in the town, and wandered feebly in and out of the little gathering. But neither he nor James appointed time and place for the next Assembly. The preachers themselves did so, and thereby broke, we think, the golden Act. James need have taken no official notice of them. He might have appointed a date for an Assembly, not the preachers' date. It is almost certain that the majority of the representatives would have attended the King's Assembly, not the apparently illegal Assembly convoked for September by the nineteen. These zealous men would have been obliged either to hold their own September Assembly in opposition to the king's, or, by coming to his Assembly, to confess, practically, the illegality of their own. Possibly two Assemblies would have met and mutually excommunicated each other. The Kirk would have been broken up into two factions, as it was, much later, by the Protesters and Remonstrants, and by the Indulged and the refusers of the Indulgence. But this easy stratagem, so congenial both to James and to the lawyer minds of the Kirk, did not occur to the angry monarch. He entered on a system of prosecution which irritated men's tempers, made martyrs, and could not be carried through save by bullying and cajoling and disreputable influences. James had no great cause for anxiety. He was safe in England. It is improbable that the great nobles would have backed the Kirk: the king they could not seize on the old plan of the old French ballade: il n'y a rien tel que d'enlever. However, James insisted on prosecutions, and the Council reluctantly obeyed.

They called before them Forbes, the Moderator at Aberdeen, and Welsh of Ayr. These men they warded in Blackness, and summoned the others for August 1. The four commissioners of the Synod of Fife were ordered to join Forbes and Welsh, wherefore God sent a plague, and the Chancellor's son died. Sir George Hume, of the house of Manderstoun, now Earl of Dunbar, was none the less made Great Commissioner, "to govern all Scotland, Kirk, and commonweal." Certain ministers wrote to him, warning him against the "new and young bishops." They themselves "will give place to no bishops"; "in this opinion we will die; and so, we are assured, will the best, yea, even the greatest part of the ministry of the Kirk of Scotland." They will stand for a bishopless Kirk as the poorest subject would "for a cot and a kailyard." This was the real ground of quarrel, for this the Assembly of Aberdeen had been held. The Kirk fought against the insidious introduction of bishops having authority; men "created," as one of them said, by the king, and, being his creatures, whom he made and could unmake, certain to obey him in everything. The two irreconcilable and intolerable forces, the absolutisms of preachers and of prince, are henceforth at war. In the end the king lost his unendurable prerogative; the Kirk kept out bishops, but had to abandon its insufferable pretensions. As for the letter of the law, it went where it must go in revolutions—each faction accusing the other of its infringement.

On July 25 the Assembly for September was proclaimed illegal, as it apparently was. The offenders of Aberdeen were summoned before the Council for October. The Synod of Fife voted for postponing the September Assembly to May 1606, and thought of trying to gain the consent of the king, but abandoned that idea. They appointed a solemn fast, a favourite form of agitation. James Melville wrote an apology. The law of 1592, that golden Act, not being, perhaps, quite to his purpose, he averred that Christ "gave the keys of the kingdom of heaven" to pastors, doctors, and elders. The nineteen, then, who assembled at Aberdeen, "had the warrant and power of Jesus Christ so to do," an argument of the force of which, when Cromwell came, we may say solvitur ambulando. James did now fix a General Assembly for the last Tuesday of July, meaning, doubtless, of the year following (1606), but by accident or design the year was not specified. The prisoned brethren were summoned for October 24 to hear themselves charged with seditious assembling. They declined the jurisdiction, as Black had done in 1596. They were remitted to their prisons, while a Papist was merely banished the country, a thing "very evil taken by all good men." The Gunpowder Plot, occurring on November 5, caused the afflicted to think that James would cease to pursue Puritans and preachers. But the king is said to have remarked that, while the Papists sought his life, the preachers sought his crown.

Early in 1606 Mar and Dunbar were sent down to try the prisoners, a task which Dunbar sought to escape from by working privately with the accused, through a minister. "Never so light a confession" of error would satisfy James. They were not to be moved. Next day they were told, before the Council, that if they would "pass from" the Assembly and declinature, "for the time and place," resuming their case again when they pleased, they might go free. They asked leave to consult the Presbyteries; this was not granted. The prisoners were indicted of treason. They had counsel; Mr Thomas Hope acquitted himself well. They argued that to decline the Council's jurisdiction was not treason; Mar and two others alone upheld them in this distinction. The King's Advocate, Hamilton, according to James Melville, threatened the jury; and Mr Forbes "horribly threatened" the Council and nobles present. He also dwelt on Joshua and the Gibeonites, and on Saul, whose sons were hanged, "the quhilk he applyit to the king." This was not, perhaps, very tactful. Under these spiritual and temporal threats the jury, worked on by the Council (who said that capital punishment was not intended), found the prisoners guilty by a majority of nine to six (or of seven to six). They were taken back to prison, their sentence being deferred.<sup>22</sup>

There is a point in this trial usually omitted by modern historians (who side with the Kirk), but frankly put forward by James Melville. The King's Advocate threatened the jury, all men of family and land, that, if they acquitted the accused, "he would protest against them for error wilfully committed, and so their life, lands, and goods to fall into the king's hands." Hamilton's argument, according to Melville, ran that it was proved treason to decline the jurisdiction; the jury had only to decide whether the accused had declined it

If Hamilton really urged that to decline the jurisdiction was, legally, treason, the Council soon gave the lie to his statement. But, while we detest the threats to the jury, modern historians usually ignore the counter threats of Mr Forbes. He was a preacher, therefore one of those to whom Christ had given "the keys of the kingdom of heaven . . . and power of retaining and remitting sins."<sup>23</sup> Melville believed this, Forbes believed it, probably many of the jury believed in this wild claim to the keys of St Peter. On the strength of this doctrine, so absurd that it is practically overlooked by historians, Mr. Forbes "threitneing most terribill, maide all the heireris astonischit, and their hairis to stand."<sup>24</sup> Manifestly, here was undue influence used by the party of the preachers just as much as by the party of the Crown, and expressly directed, in part, against the king. The jury were assured, by Mr Forbes, that if they condemned him and his friends, they were God's perjurers, and broke the solemn Covenant with the Almighty. What they had to decide was merely a question of fact. But James was entangled in the meshes of the Covenant which he had subscribed, and caused all to subscribe. This Covenant, a fancied arrangement between man and Omnipotence—a spiritual bargain—was to overshadow Scotland till the Prince of Orange refused to have any concern with it. So long did the spiritual power overrule, or try to overrule the State, by the sanction of "horrible threatenings" which caused the hair of all who heard them to stand on end with terror.

Dr M'Crie says, "of what avail are innocence and eloquence against the arts of corruption and terror." Both parties used "the arts of terror." To glide over all this, and all that it implied, as an amiable error of pleasing enthusiasts, is to misread history. These claims had to be put down. The ministers must be driven, and finally were driven out of this position, or at least out of the practice of using it against the freedom of the State and the individual. Only six preachers were at this time condemned under the law, whether rightly or wrongly interpreted.

On January 22 James wrote to the Council. He had to answer what was to be done with the condemned six, what with their fourteen associates. The six were to be kept au secret in the closest solitary confinement, as in the Bastille. A declaration was to be published expressing James's ideas. He was always ready to grant a General Assembly; he had just appointed one for July.

What he objected to was unlawful conventicles. The matter in hand was a riot, and nothing "spiritual." The other brethren, the king said, must be tried as the six had been. The Council in Scotland stood aghast. They had done their best. They had now a precedent, "never befor decernit"—never settled—for making declinature of jurisdiction rank as treason. But they had provoked, as they knew, the discontent of the subjects of all degrees—noble, gentle, and simple; Mar had expressed his disgust. They wished that James was in Scotland, then he would understand the thoroughly mutinous temper of the country. The Council, many of them at least, would not attend at a new trial. Some had already passed beyond their bounds as judges, it was confessed, to secure the late success. The jury were become objects of hatred, and would not serve again, "as a company of led men." A new jury would not be bound to agree with the old, so the precedent did not count for much. The Council had been in despair of securing a conviction in the former case. A fire had been kindled that was running over the whole country. There was danger that "the greatest power of every estate" would be drawn to the party of the preachers. "We have in rigour (the like whereof was never before done), convicted of treason the principal workers of this business." Some of the Council would personally explain to James in London the nature of the imperilled situation.<sup>25</sup>

James acquiesced, and did not push his Cadmeian victory further. His method, an extreme stretch of the very doubtful letter of the law, had aroused every Scot from the noble to the cottar. He had created the sentiment which, under his ill-fated son, united every class and rank for a while under the banner of the Covenant. The great nobles were suspicious of the bishops, both of their political influence and of their chance of regaining alienated ecclesiastical lands. The Scottish administration, especially Dunfermline, loved the bishops no better. Archbishop Spottiswoode is said not only to have complained to James of Dunfermline's enmity to the Episcopal order, but to have accused him of encouraging Forbes before the Assembly at Aberdeen.<sup>26</sup> James bade the Council investigate these charges (February-June 1606), and examine Forbes as to his alleged encouragement by Dunfermline. Forbes was very cautious in his evidence as to Dunfermline, who himself took a high line of denial, and James finally let the matter pass.<sup>27</sup> Spottiswoode congratulated himself that Dunfermline was induced, by his recent danger, to be more favourable to the endowment of the bishops. James's prelates, not yet full-fledged or even ordained, had already accumulated all the materials of the bishops' wars. In October the six ministers were banished, under pain of death if they returned, and with threats of death against any who followed their example. Their companions were exiled to remote isles. It is almost surprising that no mutiny occurred in the country.

James for eight years (1602-1610) kept proroguing the General Assembly, which had a clear legal right to meet annually. He was threatening death for a refusal of jurisdiction which the ingenuity of lawyers could scarcely twist into treason. He proceeded to cut down by imprisonment and exile on the flimsiest pretexts, and by the most craven methods, the remaining leaders of the Kirk. He also trafficked with the ecclesiastical constitution in new and unprincipled ways, and, if he did not actually succeed in bribing some of the ministers, he sent money for that purpose. The leading idea of the ministers was the result of uncritical study of Scripture, and was inconsistent with a free State. But the men themselves were of courage dauntless, in morality unimpeachable, wedded to an honourable poverty, often refined classical scholars, in adversity cheerful, and, if often tactless and overbearing, they were now the victims of a power as absolute as that which they claimed, and moreover, mean, arrogant, and unscrupulous. In contrast with the preachers the bishops were shamefully pliant, and, though really far from rich, the splendours of their attire in riding to Parliament seemed to contradict their complaints of poverty. None of them resisted James as did Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, when the king tried to practise violence on his conscience in the disgraceful "Nullity" case of Essex. In private life bishops like Spottiswoode may have been excellent men, and his final sufferings deserve our pity. But the prelates were instruments of royal caprice, they were courtiers, their whole situation was deplorable, and it is no marvel that Scotland remained, quite apart from the right or wrongs of the abstract question between Prelacy and Presbyterians, determined to endure no more bishops.

In July the Red Parliament, so styled from the colours of the robes of the nobles, met at Perth under the presidency of Dunbar. The Assembly appointed for July was prorogued to May 1507, and other prorogations followed. James's excuse was that he had summoned certain leading ministers, including the two Melvilles, to meet him in England. The Red Parliament passed an Act declaring the king's supremacy "over all estates, persons, and causes." The Act of Annexation of the temporalities of the bishops (1589) was rescinded. The bishops were now ten, including the warlike Andrew Knox, who took George Ker with the Spanish blanks. The ministers protested against the episcopate, but the commissioners of the General Assembly refused to review the "caveats" which limited the bishops in every direction. Andrew Melville made his way into the Parliament and spoke with his wonted freedom. The jealousies between the bishops and the nobles, owners of their temporal estates, were prominent.<sup>28</sup> Little of a constitution as Scotland had ever possessed, in this Parliament it dwindled. It may be remembered that in the angry talk between Ruthven and Mary Stuart, while the blood of Riccio yet reeked on the palace floor, Ruthven charged Mary with having herself nominated the Lords of the Articles, the Supreme Committee of all Estates, for the Parliament that was to forfeit Murray. In the Red Parliament James nominated the Lords of the Articles by letter, and his list was quietly accepted.<sup>29</sup> The strife between the bishops and the nobles required, so the Council informed James, very earnest and delicate handling. The nobles were bought to consent to the restoration of the ancient bishoprics by "seventeen new creations of spiritual prelaties in temporal lordships," says James Melville, which Mr Gardiner interprets as the carving out of the Crown property of "no less than seventeen temporal lordships for the nobility."<sup>30</sup>

James's next move was to summon the two Melvilles and six other brethren of Fife and Lothian, to London, where they arrived at the end of August 1606. James's conduct as regards these men was inept, inquisitorial, and violent. He harassed the ministers with questions as to their views of the Aberdeen affair, which Andrew Melville practically remitted to the General Assembly. Unluckily Melville was a man of ungoverned temper, and he addressed Sir Thomas Hamilton, the King's Advocate, as "the accuser of the brethren" (κατήγορος τῶν ἀδελφῶν) that is, the devil. "Be God, it is the develis name in the Revelatioune!" cried the king, as the source of the Greek flashed upon his memory. James Melville does not cite the Greek, Spottiswoode does. Melville was carried into his indiscretion while inveighing against Hamilton for favouring Catholics. It is needless to dwell on the sufferings of the ministers whose "brains were stuffed full of wine and music" on one occasion, without more solid food. They had to listen to tedious anti-presbyterian sermons from bishops, and now should have known what Huntly, Errol, and Angus endured from the sermons of the brethren inflicted on them. The humourless cruelty of that age must ever be admired. Many such torments were invented to "drive time," and keep the brethren away from a new device of the king's, a clerical convention at Linlithgow.

The kidnapped preachers were told they were to be "warded" in bishops' houses, as if they had committed some offence. They had been taken into the king's chapel, and the spectacle of unlighted candles, closed books, and empty chalices on the altar moved Andrew Melville to make a Latin epigram. He asked if the Church of England was imitating the Purple Harlot (otherwise Scarlet Woman) of Rome, with other rhetorical questions of a rather offensive character. To such effusions a man may be driven by sermons, and Melville did not publish the verses. But they reached James, and he seized his opportunity. Melville was summoned to Whitehall, and "being spoken to by the Archbishop of Canterbury," says James Melville, "took occasion plainly in the face, before all the Council, to tell him all his mind."<sup>31</sup> It was not "a piece of his mind," but all of it, that Andrew bestowed upon the startled prelate. The sight of two books, two chalices, and two candles had goaded him to an extreme indignation. The Archbishop, he vociferated, was guilty of all sorts of enormities, such as "setting up antichristian hierarchy" and Sabbath breaking. He then seized Bancroft by the sleeves and "shook them" (and perhaps the Archbishop), "in his manner, freely and roundly"; he had once laid hands on the king "in his manner." He went on to call the sleeves "the Beast's mark," and to declare himself Bancroft's enemy "to the effusion of the last drop of all the blood in his body," that is, if Bancroft was really the author of a certain antipresbyterian pamphlet. These proceedings were rather in the style of the Laird's Jock, or Kinmont Willie, than of a reverend professor of St Andrews. Andrew was entrusted by the Council to the Dean of St Paul's, with him to remain till the king's pleasure was known. He was later transferred to the Tower, and, after four years of captivity, was banished. He obtained a chair in the University of Sedan, where he died. James Melville was relegated to Newcastle.

Melville had displayed the vehemence of his character, and the intolerance with which he regarded all forms of Christianity except his own. But he was imprisoned in and banished from a country of which he was not a citizen by an inexcusable abuse of arbitrary power. The motive was to keep him and his nephew James out of Scotland, where the king was attempting new manœuvres. Between the end of 1606 and 1610 he entirely succeeded in getting for his bishops Episcopal authority. In 1607, as we learn from Calderwood, a bishop dared not exercise authority, because his presbyters might turn again and excommunicate him, like Adamson and Montgomery. It may seem strange that James did not, through Parliament, deprive the brethren of this dangerous weapon, excommunication, or at least deprive it of all civil sanction. Perhaps he thought that it might prove useful against Catholics.

The measures which he adopted may be briefly enumerated. He had already cut down or broken under foot some thirty of the taller thistles in the Kirk's kail-yard. The most eminent and recalcitrant preachers were in exile, or far away in the Highlands and islands, or confined, under supervision, to their own parishes. In their enforced absence James summoned to Linlithgow, in December 1606, a convention of preachers. It was not called as a General Assembly, nor known under that name, till it had done its work. Then James styled it by the solemn name of a General Assembly: his opponents did not. The brethren were told that they were to give "advice," not votes. The king had discovered that, to put the brethren in good humour, there was nothing like Catholic-baiting. The necessity and difficulty of smelling out and denouncing Catholics and Jesuits was dwelt upon. Then it was suggested that a permanent clerical "agent" for these purposes should exist in each Presbytery, or group of associated kirks. The labourer is worthy of his hire, and the "agent" was to receive, as such, £100 (Scots) annually. Next, this agent might also be perpetual or constant moderator of his Presbytery—taking the place of a series of shifting moderators elected on each occasion. In their own Presbyteries the bishops, or acting subordinates paid by them, should be constant moderators.

This device threw most of the administrators of the Kirk into the king's pay and power. About one hundred and thirty ministers were present at this convention, and more than thirty nobles, including Montrose, and the astute manager, Dunbar. Of these, Calderwood informs us, one hundred and twenty-five were "corrupted" with hope, fear, honour, or money, for many places of £100 apiece were going. Thus by an unanimous, or all but unanimous vote, permanent moderators, who also served as anti-catholic "agents," were nominated for every Presbytery.<sup>32</sup> A number of unsummoned ministers were present, and occasion was thereby taken to style the Linlithgow convention a General Assembly. No formal recorded Act of the meeting could be obtained and read for many months later, and, when it did appear, it was looked on as forged and contaminated, like Sprot's confessions in the Gowrie affair. Montrose and the other managers were delighted by their success; even the preachers "who came of set purpose to oppose" were brought into the general harmony. The meeting, and all the lords, heartily petitioned James to allow Mr Bruce to leave Inverness and return to Kinnaird for his health, but James was unmoved.<sup>33</sup> On January 3, 1607, James issued a letter enforcing the decision of the Linlithgow convention. Too many of the Presbyteries, he said, were "addicted to anarchy," and were apt to "refuse such a constant moderator as has been concluded upon in the General Assembly." The use of these terms was mere pettifogging. However, a Presbytery that refused a constant moderator, or a moderator who declined to be constant, must be "put to the horn" as rebellious.<sup>34</sup>

Throughout the year 1607 the attempt was made to thrust these constant moderators not only on the Presbyteries, but on the Synods, or Provincial Councils of the Kirk. Wild scenes followed, as at Perth, where Lord Scone (who had succeeded to much of the Gowrie possessions) tried to force the Synod to his will, sat in the moderator's chair, and locked the Synod out of the church. They met in the open air, and the faithful of Fife met on the sea sands in a day of heavy rain.<sup>35</sup> Many other Synods were as contumacious; nothing had been decided at Linlithgow, it was said, as to Synodal moderators. Wherever there was a bishop, the king declared, he was to be, ex officio, constant moderator of his Synod. Men asked for a view of the Act of Linlithgow sanctioning these novelties. On August 18, 1607, the Synods were presented at last with the Act. In the Synod of Lothian the brethren who had been at Linlithgow said that nothing had been arranged as to Synodal moderators.<sup>36</sup> The General Assembly, to have met at Dundee, was prorogued to April 1608. James occupied the interval in lopping the taller heads of the stubborn thistles. A Stirlingshire minister, for "wandering about" and "general Presbyterian restlessness" (as Dr Masson says), was confined to his own parish. Four other opponents of constant moderators, were shut up in Blackness. Calderwood himself, the erudite historian, then a young minister at Crailing, was confined to his very pleasant parish; Sir Gideon Murray of Elibank looked after the contumacious of the Jedburgh Presbytery.<sup>37</sup>

At last there was a General Assembly at Linlithgow at the end of July 1608. Dunbar was in Scotland on this business, when Sprot was tried and hanged for the Gowrie affair. The time of the Assembly was cleverly filled up by the delightful process of excommunicating Huntly, who had never really been an earnest professor, "despite all the sermons that were inflicted on him." Other measures against Catholics were taken, but the dispute of the king and the Kirk was deferred to a more convenient season, mixed commissions being appointed to consider matters. Dunbar is said to have brought £14,000 in gold with him to this Assembly, whether it found its way into clerical pockets may well be doubted. In May 1610, when another General Assembly was coming on in June, the king certainly sent 10,000 marks to Dunbar for distribution among useful people.<sup>38</sup> This Assembly was packed, especially with ministers from the extreme north (who, to be sure, had a right to be present). Spottiswoode was Moderator, and Episcopacy was at last established. The king's prerogative was acknowledged; the disputed Assembly of Aberdeen was condemned; sentences of excommunication were invalid unless ratified by the bishop of the diocese, who was also to preside in trials for the deposition of ministers, and was to inquire into the conduct of those in his see. Ministers, when inducted, had to take an oath to the king and do homage for their livings. The bishops, however, were still subject to the censure of General Assemblies (as this odd kind of bishop from the days of Morton downwards had ever been), and they still needed consecration by Episcopal hands, a rite implying the doctrine of apostolical succession. James had nearly completed his edifice, soon he crowned it, a building that did not endure for a generation. He had asserted the freedom of the State (as represented by himself), by what measures, how petty, how illegal, how cunning, and how arbitrary, we have shown.<sup>39</sup> This house was founded on the sand;

the institution of these bishops was a mere trick of state-craft, and was contrary to the conscience and the rooted ideas of every sincere man in Scotland, Catholic or Presbyterian. But James had not yet interfered with the order of worship, the prayers were still extemporary, or strings of formulæ adhering to the memory of the minister. There was no service-book, and the communion was received sitting, in the old fashion of Knox. No particular change irritated the ordinary parishioner; nothing was "read," a thing inexpressibly odious to the Scot; there were no responses, no vestments, none of the provocations which had such strange power to excite the fury of the multitude.

The position of conscientious Presbyterians, like Calderwood, was far from enviable at this period. They might preach and pray, but it was dangerous to pray and preach on the politics of the hour: he who did so was "in danger of the Council." The royal decree controlled the operations of the Spirit; the royal hand was impiously laid on the ark. Presbyteries were far, indeed, from what they had been, and General Assemblies were no longer free and open Parliaments. On the other side the position of the Catholics was practically desperate. Our historians never say much on that head: the imprisonments of Errol and Huntly, the self-exile of Angus, who died abroad, are briefly touched upon, but we hear nothing of the distresses of the conscientious Catholics in general. Scotland owed her all but universal Protestantism to persecution; and, in Father Forbes Leith's "Narratives of Scottish Catholics," we learn how the persecution was conducted. Father Abercromby, writing on July 1, 1602, says, "All are now compelled with tears to submit to the king, and to the law passed by his authority, the alternative being for the rich either exile or the loss of all their goods, which for the sake of their wives and children they will not risk; and for the poor, if they refuse obedience, to be turned adrift by their lords from the lands they cultivate."<sup>40</sup> . . . We have seen, in an earlier part of this volume, that Mary of Guise deplored the insecure and brief tenures of the small farmers; both she and Queen Mary tried, by their personal influence, to protect poor tenants. Now they were evicted merely for their religion if they were Catholics, but all these persecutions are glided over noiselessly by historians.

The queen, Anne of Denmark, had been converted, secretly, to the old faith, writes Father MacQuhirrie, S.J., in 1601; the conversion, it seems, was of 1598. In 1605, Father James Seton describes the Earl of Dunfermline, the practical governor of Scotland, as a secret Catholic, though publicly professing Presbyterianism. Otherwise he was an upright man, as the times permitted, and we have seen that he successfully resisted an injustice of the king towards Mr Robert Bruce. He signed the Confession of Faith, though he came to Catholic confession and communion. John Colville, the old agent of the Lords of the Ruthven Raid, and the ally of Bothwell, and the spy of Cecil, having fallen into poverty, became a Catholic, went to Rome, saw the Pope, and took money from him. Probably he changed his creed, as Dunfermline concealed his own, merely for worldly reasons. In 1605 Father Creighton regretted that, in Scotland, Catholics could not, as in England, escape from going to Protestant churches on condition of paying fines. "The power of the heretical ministers is so great that they can compel every one to subscribe their false confession of faith, attend their sermons, and take the profane supper of the Calvinist rite, or else lose all his goods, and go into banishment." The process was that the constant moderator nosed out a Catholic, cited him to conform, had him excommunicated if he refused, and, forty days later, charged with treason, confiscated, and banished.<sup>41</sup> The new mounted police arrested Catholics, as they arrested Border reivers. One Catholic noble, unnamed, evaded the Kirk by pretending to have broken his leg by a fall from horseback, in presence of a surgeon and a notary! By cultivating a limp he evaded excommunication for a whole year. Balmerino, like Dunfermline, escaped by feigning Presbyterianism. There were but three or four priests left in Scotland, and by this drastic, unrelenting persecution, unhasting and unrelenting, the country was drilled into almost uniform conformity and systematic hypocrisy. All Catholics had to choose between loss of lands and goods and native country, or loss of conscience and honour. Perhaps no persecution was ever so successful. No showy martyrdoms, with one exception, occurred, but there was an unceasing strain on conscience and belief.

We have here dwelt mainly on ecclesiastical affairs as these affected the whole course of history. But Parliament, in 1606-08, was busy with the affairs of the lawless Earl of Orkney, the equally lawless Lord Maxwell, with the condition of the Borders, and with the trial and forfeiture of Logan of Restalrig (died July 1606), for his alleged share in the Gowrie conspiracy. Concerning the Orkneys, the Highlands, the Borders, and Maxwell, an account is given later, in a separate chapter, while the complex business of Restalrig is discussed in Appendix B.

LETTER OF OGILVIE OF POURIE TO THE KING, 1601.

(Hatfield MS. 90, vol. cxxxvi. fol. 136.)

Endorsed: Pury Ogleby 1601.

It will plear<sup>s</sup> yo<sup>r</sup> M. Vnderstand

That cuming out of Dumfermling to Edinbrū to home satisfeit yo<sup>r</sup> M. desyr and finding my self persewit & forst by y<sup>r</sup> Magistratis and vth<sup>r</sup>is in yo<sup>r</sup> M. name I culd do no les then escheu the first furie and appeale with y<sup>r</sup> Macedonian suldart A Phillippo male consulto et (sic) Philippum bene consultum Therof I craue yo<sup>r</sup> M. pardon, thus absenting my self for no offence that ever I committed ayne<sup>t</sup> yo<sup>r</sup> M. in or without the cuntrey bot for safetie of my Lyffe as ane beast but reason wold do. I am most sorrie for yo<sup>r</sup> M. reputacionis cause that vther princes sould heer of yo<sup>r</sup> M. creuell Dealing aganest me hawing ment so weill at yo<sup>r</sup> M. handis therof they can beare me witnes, for so sall yo<sup>r</sup> M. be thocht of, conforme as yo<sup>r</sup> enemies head informit, at least ane ongrate prince, and I ane manifest liar quha hes informit thame so weill of yo<sup>r</sup> M. I hoip that yo<sup>r</sup> M. will wse my pour wyffe and bairnes according to yo<sup>r</sup> wonted clemencie. And for my self iff I can not liue in the cuntrey, I will accept of the croce that god layis on me for my sinis agnest his heavenlie M. And cum cristo fugere ex vna civitate in aliam it is that god sufferis pipell to be scurged inderectlie & thairof castis y<sup>r</sup> trew scorge in the fyre. Take hearte ser and begine anes to think weill of thame quha luffis yo<sup>r</sup> M. honor & standing. And sence God hes beine so manie tymes so mercifull to zow, Be not cruell w<sup>t</sup> yo<sup>r</sup> M. Debtoris iff zou wold not be cossin wi<sup>t</sup> that ewell (?) Debtor of the evangell in perpetuall prison. As for that yo<sup>r</sup> M. wold lay agaynest me I nevir had on vse ony commission of yo<sup>r</sup> Ma<sup>t</sup>is to ony forrant prince in my Lyffe, nather in Flaunders France nor Spaine, Not wistanding all yo<sup>r</sup> M. Intelligenrs in the contrar q<sup>l</sup>ks ar fals & cunterfeit as I salbe aible to prove. I have delt and beine delt with indeid, but always in matteris that consernit yo<sup>r</sup> M. standing and the weill of yo<sup>r</sup> M. cuntrey Zet for satisfaction of yo<sup>r</sup> Majestie hawinge suretie of my lyffe and heritage I am content to enter in Vard, and say q<sup>t</sup>sumever yo<sup>r</sup> M. sall co<sup>m</sup>and me Or vtherwayes to go presentlie out of the cuntrey, for if my Lord Simple past to Spaine w<sup>t</sup> zo<sup>r</sup> M. commission, his Instructions bearing the same headis q<sup>r</sup>of I wes thocht to haue delt q<sup>t</sup> satisfaction, can my Varding be to Ingland q<sup>a</sup> incistis in no wayis agenest me, finding me Innocent of all such calunnies Layd agnest me at my being in London, and iff zour M. suld mislyke more of my cuming throgh Ingland then dealing in Spaine, as sum curious pipell dois imagen, sens zo<sup>r</sup> M. was of oppinions that I suld have bene tane by my owne advyss zo<sup>r</sup> M., giff I durst say it, dois me Wrong for I beare the guide will and culd do yo<sup>r</sup> M. better service there then mony subiectis yo<sup>r</sup> M. hes And iff vthers be reveilit vpon conisoun<sup>n</sup> accussit of the same thingis And more suspect by Ingland nor I, q<sup>t</sup> can it harme zo<sup>r</sup> M. or offend Ingland to grant me the lyke benefeit. And iff it be bot my Lyffe as appearis socht Inderectlie, Prestat sapore alieno exempto, Nathur can yo<sup>r</sup> M. justlie blame to be als diligent in saiffing my lyffe as vthers ar cunning and subteill in crawling my sackless bluid. As for geer I haue non And Lyttill Land yet the hous is so myne And so many honest men cwme of it that I traist that zo<sup>r</sup> M. will not sie it perish alto<sup>r</sup> all the foresaidis I am becwme throw my trwbles & gryte travell so ill at eas and debilitat that only Warding war sufficient to make my pwre unprovydit barnes fatherles, if non of thar may mowe yo<sup>r</sup> M. to Justice and petie I must remit my cause to God and seik to so serve sum vther prince as I mynd to die rather a confessor nor a martire. One thing may I justlie say with the freir that was put in the gallies for saing of thre or fowr messes everie day that I am punished per auer facto troppo ben. Speik zo<sup>r</sup> M. q<sup>t</sup> eveill zou pleas of me I will always think & speik weill of zo<sup>r</sup> M. Although by this reason as Plutark tellis the teale I must neids be a knaiff Aither becaus zo<sup>r</sup> M. quha is good speikis evill of me or than iff zo<sup>r</sup> M. be not giude becaus I speik giude of a<sup>n</sup>e evill man Bot sir kaik is no scheiris (?) I luike for better of zo<sup>r</sup> M. And kissing zo<sup>r</sup> M. princie handis with all deutifull humilitie I pray the eternall God to preserwe zo<sup>r</sup> M. and oppine zo<sup>r</sup> eis or they my breist that yo<sup>r</sup> M. may sie as Simoniüs desyrit The Invard cogitacionis of my trewe hart. Raptim 1601.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER XVIII.

<sup>1</sup> Bruce, Correspondence of James VI. Camden Society, 1861, xxv., xxviii. 80, 81.

<sup>2</sup> Hailes, Secret Correspondence of Cecil, 1766.

<sup>3</sup> Bruce, 81, 84.

<sup>4</sup> Pitcairn, ii. 408, 409.

<sup>5</sup> Thorpe, ii. 796, 798.

<sup>6</sup> Thorpe, ii. 799. See a singular letter from Pourie to James at the end of this chapter. It is from the Cecil Papers, Hatfield MSS.

<sup>7</sup> Calderwood, vi. 146-148, 153-156.

<sup>8</sup> Remarks on the History of Scotland, pp. 254-264 ; 1773.

<sup>9</sup> Thorpe, ii. 815.

<sup>10</sup> Thorpe, ii. 814.

<sup>11</sup> Border Papers, ii. 523.

<sup>12</sup> Bruce, Correspondence of James VI. and Cecil, pp. 30-38.

<sup>13</sup> Privy Council Register, vi. 581, 582.

<sup>14</sup> Restalrig and the Gowrie Conspiracy. Appendix B.

<sup>15</sup> Privy Council Register, vii. xiii. xxi.

<sup>16</sup> Nugæ Antiquæ, i. 181, 182.

<sup>17</sup> Act Parl. Scot., iv. 262-276.

<sup>18</sup> Privy Council Register, vii. 13, 14.

<sup>19</sup> James Melville, 574.

<sup>20</sup> Privy Council Register, vii. 474, 475.

<sup>21</sup> Act Parl. Scot., iii. 541.

<sup>22</sup> James Melville, 570-626 ; Register, Privy Council, vii. 478 486.

<sup>23</sup> Melville, p. 596.

<sup>24</sup> Melville, p. 625.

<sup>25</sup> Register, Privy Council, vii. 480-486.

- <sup>26</sup> Forbes's Records touching the Estate of the Kirk, 501, 502, note (Wodrow Society); Spottiswoode, iii. 174, 175.
- <sup>27</sup> Register, Privy Council, vii. 492, 497, and notes; Forbes, 546, 551.
- <sup>28</sup> Calderwood, vi. 485-495.
- <sup>29</sup> Melros Papers, Lords of Council to James, i. p. 15; Act Parl. Scot., iv. 280.
- <sup>30</sup> Gardiner, i. 316 (1900); Melville, p. 640.
- <sup>31</sup> Melville, 679.
- <sup>32</sup> Calderwood, vi. 608.
- <sup>33</sup> Original Letters, edited by Mr Botfield, Bannatyne Club, vol. i. pp. 70-71.
- <sup>34</sup> Privy Council Register, vii. 299-302.
- <sup>35</sup> Privy Council Register, vii. 347-349.
- <sup>36</sup> Privy Council Register, vii. 432, note.
- <sup>37</sup> Privy Council Register, viii. 20, 508-510.
- <sup>38</sup> Privy Council Register, viii. 844.
- <sup>39</sup> Privy Council Register, viii. 473-475, notes; Calderwood, vii. 94-103; Spottiswoode, iii. 205-208.
- <sup>40</sup> Forbes Leith, 269, note I.
- <sup>41</sup> Forbes Leith, 284, 285.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE LAST YEARS OF JAMES VI.

1603-1624.

IF the nations are happy which have no constitutional history, then Scotland was fortunate between the establishment of Episcopacy, in 1610, and James's later interferences with the old Presbyterian forms of public worship. There were, of course, feuds, as we have just shown, and there were Highland disturbances, but the affairs of the Celtic part of the kingdom must be treated of in a separate chapter. There were also occasional troubles with a recalcitrant preacher, such as our historian, Calderwood himself. But the centre of affairs was now London, where there was much irritation against James's Scottish followers, and where a Scottish favourite, Ker, Earl of Somerset, involved him in circumstances still obscure, but, to an unascertained extent, discreditable. This perplexed matter, however, is of merely personal interest, and forms no part of the history of Scotland. James's desire for a regular, thorough, incorporating union of the countries, such as Major had longed for before the Reformation, such as Henderson dreamed of after the fall of Cardinal Beaton (see Chapter II.), was creditable to the king, and to Bacon who supported him. But the proposal broke down against the jealousies, commercial, ecclesiastical, and social, of the two nations. The Union of 1707 was almost equally unpopular with Highland and Lowland Jacobites, and with Whig or Hanoverian Scottish earls, in 1745, after forty years of experience of the measure. We may guess, then, how little chance an Act of Union had in passing, when James was a new king in England, and when ballads against the Scottish followers were sung in London streets. James had recommended the Union to Parliament in March 1604, when he had not sat for a year on the English throne. Bodies of commissioners for each nation were appointed in the summer of the year, and met in October, at Westminster, while James, of his own will and fantasy, crowned himself with the title of "King of Great Britain." "This some of both kingdoms took ill," says Spottiswoode, nor did the Borderers like to have the name of "the Borders" abolished, with all the old Border laws (they were printed, after the Forty-Five, by a bishop of Carlisle). The garrisons of Berwick and Carlisle were dismissed, orders were given to destroy the Border keeps, and turn their iron gates into ploughshares.<sup>1</sup> The orders cannot have been carried out, to judge by the numerous keeps and fortalices still standing on either side of the Marches.

Meanwhile Bacon and the famed Tam o' the Cowgate, the King's Advocate and founder of the Haddington family, drew up a report for the Union Commissioners. The articles are given by Spottiswoode.<sup>2</sup> In the rules for free-trade between the two countries, the staples of England—wool, hides, sheep, cattle, leather, and linen yarn—were excepted, and the rights of sea-fishing were to remain restricted as of yore. Persons in each country born after James's accession were to be entitled to equal privileges of all kinds on either side of the Border. These were the Post-nati; but as to the Ante-nati, persons born before the Union of the Crowns, great difficulties arose, as the Scots who followed the king were only too likely, by the kindly Scottish usage, to be thrust into the best English posts and dignities. James, by prerogative, could naturalise any one, and even give him office under the Crown. He declared, however, that he would not put any Scot (not yet naturalised) into a Crown office, nor any Englishman into a Scottish Crown office. But he would not allow his power of doing so by prerogative to be restricted by a clause in the Act. The English House of Commons was as sceptical about the king's promise as Mr Robert Bruce had been about his statements in the Gowrie case, and James's promises, when at home, had been punctually broken. In November 21, 1606, and later, strong commercial opposition to the scheme of Union broke forth, and Bacon's eloquence in favour of the Bill was "in the right, but too soon." Order was transgressed by indignant and sarcastic English orators, and the Scottish Privy Council, when they heard of the insults, protested that they, for their part, were in no hurry to be blended with a country which disdained them.<sup>3</sup> Finally, nothing but the "abolition of all memory of hostility, and the repression of occasions of disorder," was recorded. Border prisoners, usually taken on charges of raiding and violence, were to be tried in their own countries. The case of the Post-nati was at last settled by a suit, in 1608, raised in the name of Richard Colvin, a child born in Scotland the third year of James's tenure of the English Crown. Bacon argued that, to prove the child an alien, and incapable of holding land, say, in Shoreditch, it was necessary to prove that he owned allegiance to a foreign prince. It was decided that Colvin and all Post-nati were natural-born subjects of the king of England, and "enabled to purchase and have freehold and inheritance of lands in England, and to bring real actions for the same in England." The case fills nearly four hundred columns in the State Trials.<sup>4</sup> The Chancellor and twelve judges decided this matter by a majority of eleven to two votes.

A topic of keen interest to the politicians of the day, but of little moment in national history, was the affair of Balmerino. This gentleman, originally known as James Elphinstone of Innernaughty, and after 1604 as Lord Balmerino, had become a judge in 1587, and was one of the Board of Treasury Control styled "the Octavians" in the agitated year 1596. In 1598 he was made Secretary, holding the important post so long possessed by Maitland of Lethington. In 1598 and 1599, as we have already seen, there were some tentative traffickings between James and Rome, and a letter signed by James, and addressing the Pope as "Father," "blessed," and so on, arrived at the hands of his Holiness. In September 1608 a summons to England reached Balmerino, and this presaged the close of his career in disgrace. The cause was this—James, ever since 1604, had been, reluctantly or not, a persecutor of Puritans, Presbyterians, and Catholics. Nobody was to dwell in his realm, as he had previously said, who was not of his own religion or religions—Anglican in England, and, in Scotland, the Presbyterianism of an auto-pope, if the term may be allowed. James was not content with edicts. In 1607 he produced an anti-papal work, "Triplici Nodo, Triplex Cuneus," defending the oaths of allegiance to himself against Paul V. and Cardinal Bellarmine. The Cardinal, writing as "Matthæus Tortus," replied in 1608. James was rebuked for his religious veerings, and especially for having long ago written a polite letter to the Pope, Clement VIII., and another to Cardinal Bellarmine, asking that a hat might be given to his subject, Chisholme, Bishop of Vaison. At that time (1598-99) the existence of a Scottish cardinal, to reply to the attacks of English Catholic supporters of the Infanta, would have been useful to James. He was never a true-blue Protestant. He did not think that the Pope was the Beast; and he revered as his mother Church the Church of Rome. He did not regard her as the Scarlet Woman sitting on the Seven Hills, "as if ane," quoth Andrew Fairservice, "was na braid enough for her auld hurdies." But, since 1605, the Gunpowder Plot, and the need of some victim to throw to the preachers, had modified the very proper and historically correct sentiments of the king. Now Cardinal Bellarmine recalled the polite letter of James to the Pope, in his book replying to the "Triplex Cuneus." Balmerino, then Elphinstone, had been Secretary in 1598, and Balmerino was called to court to explain how the polite letter, signed by James, had been sent to the pontiff.

Balmerino met James, Archbishop Spottiswoode, Dunbar, and other important Scottish officials, at Royston. There is no doubt that Spottiswoode was intriguing against the secular influence of Balmerino. That statesman, after his disgrace, left a private memoir with his own account of the whole affair. The gist may be given in his own words, "A plot is secretly contrived that I shall be brought to a confession [oral] of it," (that is, of fraudulently inducing James to sign a letter to the Pope written by Elphinston) "his majesty to disallow it . . . and consequently, my undoing."<sup>5</sup> Balmerino denied that, in this letter, James had promised either to turn Catholic (as the report went) or, when King of England, to tolerate Catholics. Here he told the truth, as the Pope's reply to the letter attributed to James suffices to prove. But Balmerino confessed the part as to procuring a cardinal's hat for a Scottish subject. Sir Alexander Hay (who had been appointed his adjunct in the Scottish secretaryship) induced him to confess this much, "the simple truth." Balmerino admitted that he himself had written, or caused Sir Edward Drummond to write, the ordinary forms of address, Pater, and so forth, into the letter which, in 1598, James had signed. Sir Alexander Hay was a witness of a repetition of this confession. Balmerino was then ordered under arrest, though he was unaware of it, and was told to make his confession in writing. He now realised that his ruin was intended—he had thought that his previous oral admissions were only for the king's private satisfaction. He asked for delay, and for time to procure the evidence of Sir Edward Drummond, who had been with him in 1598. Balmerino was next examined before the English Privy Council, just as Andrew Melville had been. He extracted from them the admission that they could not judge him, that he must be tried before "his ordinary judge." They could not entangle him, he says, and Lord Balfour of Burleigh was sent to him to advise a confession entirely exculpating the king, with assurance that his life and estate should not be imperilled. Balmerino tried, meanwhile, to make terms with Dunbar. "If he desired Restalrig, he should have it for the price I bought it." In fact, Balmerino had bought Restalrig from the impoverished Logan in 1605; and, when Logan died in July 1606, Balmerino still owed eighteen thousand marks of the price, as appears from Logan's will. Dunbar himself also owed to Logan's estate fifteen thousand marks of the purchase money of the property of Flemington, which he escaped paying, through the forfeiture of Logan's heir in 1609.<sup>6</sup> Dunbar was apparently pleased by Balmerino's offers, and Balmerino thought that his life and lands were now secure if he exonerated James from the letter to the Pope. Consequently he "put himself in James's will," that is, would not defend himself. He declared that the Latin letter to the Pope was placed, among others, before James, that the king signed the heap, and that Drummond wrote in terms of address to the Pope as Pater, and the rest, at the beginning and end of the epistle. Balmerino also confessed that, to the ambassador of Elizabeth, he had denied all the facts, and had made Drummond corroborate his denial. Elizabeth had probably learned the truth through the Master of Gray, who corresponded both with Cecil and with the Roman court, as we have already shown (p. 440).

Having secured these formal confessions from Balmerino, Salisbury (Robert Cecil) made them the basis of a charge of high treason, also of forgery of James's handwriting. Balmerino was wheedled into signing this document charging him with treason on the understanding that it was merely for the king's personal satisfaction. Being arraigned before, and scolded by the Council, he was again persuaded not to defend himself. James is said to have been skulking behind the arras, or in some Ear of Dionysius, while his English sycophants railed at his Scottish minister. Balmerino was removed from the Council and "warded" at Falkland. He was then tried and convicted, merely on his own confession, at St Andrews, still abstaining from self-defence, in the king's interest, and in the belief that his life and lands were secure. But he was kept in close captivity, through the treachery of Dunbar and Sir Alexander Hay, "As for others of our nation who have little regard wherefore I suffer at Englishmen's hands, God forgive them!" His country, he says, is "miserable, coming in a vile servitude, the foresight whereof is all my wrack." Thus, in Balmerino's opinion, he was put at by Spottiswoode and Dunbar, because he was too good a "Scottisman," and opposed the "servitude" of his country. Balmerino died in 1612.<sup>7</sup>

Sir Alexander Hay, the blackest of traitors except Dunbar, if we accept Balmerino's view, was now left alone in the Scottish secretaryship. For a considerable time there is nothing of interest to record in domestic affairs, setting aside the reduction of the Borders and the Highlands. There were official changes and experiments in the control of finance, and Mr Archibald Primrose, writer, with his son James, now clerk of the Council, became men of official importance.<sup>8</sup> The death of Dunbar (January 29, 1611) caused many shiftings in State offices, and Calderwood fires the salute of a most unseemly scandal over the dead statesman's grave. Dunbar was, perhaps, rather more unscrupulous than most public men of his age, but he was a person of great energy and of conciliatory manners. It seems certain that he much disliked the policy towards the Kirk with which he was entrusted. Cranstoun, now Lord Cranstoun, succeeded him in his Border lieutenancy; the treasurership was practically placed in the hands of a commission of eight, "the New Octavians," with Dunfermline for chief, and Lord Advocate Hamilton for one of the members. Cranstoun was succeeded in the Border lieutenancy by Ker of Ancrum: the new favourite of James—(Ker, later Rochester, later Somerset), being supposed to have influenced the royal choice. After a series of changes the King's Advocate became Secretary of State, and Sir Alexander Hay, Clerk Register. The only great noble of position in James's administration was the young Marquis of Hamilton, of the third generation from the Duke of Châtelherault of Queen Mary's reign.<sup>9</sup>

It was in 1610 that James crowned his prelatial edifice by having Spottiswoode and two bishops consecrated by three English bishops (York and Canterbury being excluded). The consecrated three could now pass on any apostolical virtue which Anglican bishops are able to confer to their brethren in Scotland. These were no longer mere parliamentary officials, but bishops with as much mystical quality as Scotland could desire or dislike. Occasionally a minister who preached in a semblance of the old tone was put at; but between banishments, imprisonments, and other inflictions, the watchmen of the Kirk were practically reduced to silence—the hearts of such as Calderwood burning within them.

In the matter of public order James took a lesson from England, and, in 1610, appointed a number of Commissioners or Justices of the Peace,—“godly, wise, and virtuous gentlemen, of good quality, estate, and repute.”<sup>10</sup> Their duties were much what they so long continued to be, they were county magistrates having constables under them. The Selkirkshire justices complain of the unruliness of the town, the want of money, the depression in sheep-farming, the numbers of sturdy men who will not work, and of willing workers for whom there is no employment. They suggest the making of public roads.<sup>11</sup> The system, though opposed now by the towns, now by the recalcitrant gentry, struck root, though the constabulary was scanty and probably as inefficient as that of Dogberry. Meanwhile the settlement of Ulster by Scottish immigrants was being worked out, though the enterprisers were obviously, from their names and ranks, but a feeble folk, with more speculative tendency than capital. In 1611 the lists of enterprisers contain nobler names. The house of Ochiltree (the house of the daring captain who overthrew Morton, and of the bride of Knox), with the Abercorn Hamiltons, emigrated to Ulster. Among other noted names of adventurers whose families did not emigrate are those of Lennox, Balfour of Burleigh, Stewart of Minto, and Murray of Broughton, while Andrew Knox, that warlike preacher and prelate, became Bishop of Raphoe. As the settlers brought over hosts of their workmen and dependants, Ulster rapidly became sufficiently Scotticised.

The year 1612 was clearly marked by nature as portentous. “A cow brought forth fourteen great dog whelps instead of calves,” a circumstance inexplicable to the naturalist. Another cow expired in giving birth to a human infant, which did not survive, and a third cow’s calf had two heads.<sup>12</sup> These things do not occur without some mysterious reason, but nothing very remarkable happened till the Parliament in October, which ratified the Acts of the Episcopalian General Assembly of 1610, without retaining the subjection of bishops to General Assemblies. The old "caveats" dropped out of view, and it may be taken as the orthodox Presbyterian theory that the bishops never had a really legal existence.<sup>13</sup> They remained, it will be found, subject to excommunication by a General Assembly, as soon as the political condition of the country gave a General Assembly freedom of action. The death of the heir to the throne, Prince Henry, on November 6, was the heaviest stroke in that kind since the death of the Maid of Norway. Like all young and handsome princes who perish in their bloom, he was reckoned of great promise. That promise may have been illusive, but, from what is known of him, it seems that he would not, at least, have entered the path of his unhappy brother, the Prince Charles. The marriage of the hardly more fortunate Princess Elizabeth was celebrated on February 14, 1613. This year, with those which followed, was remarkable for turbulence in the islands, and in the Orkneys, but is more noted in the home districts for persecution of Catholics. For three years, as Dr Masson says, "there was a kind of frenzied run upon persecution." If the object was to please the Presbyterians of the old school the measures were unsuccessful; in the violence of the bishops they only saw Satan divided against himself. It is to be noted that the Kirk Episcopal was given the reins more freely than the Kirk Presbyterian as to persecution, and yet was deemed infinitely too lenient by good Presbyterians like Calderwood.

As instances of Catholic sufferers we find, first, a Logan of Restalrig. Robert Logan of Restalrig, that genial ruffian, and suspected Gowrie conspirator, seems to have had leanings both towards Rome and Geneva. The truth apparently was that whether a Kirkman or a Catholic was engaged in any desperate or lawless act, whether godly Mr Bruce, or Bothwell, or George Ker was in a strait, Logan was equally ready to lend them the shelter of Fastcastle, or offer them the "fine hattit kits" of Restalrig. It may have been a son of his who, in the year of the Logan forfeiture for the Gowrie Plot (1609), appears as John Logan, portioner of Restalrig, accused of attending mass celebrated by John Burd, priest. He was tried for this offence in 1613, and was fined £1000 Scots, though he had repented and become an elder of the Kirk.<sup>14</sup> Even the old Countess of Sutherland, the wife of the famous Bothwell of Queen Mary, was harried for her religious opinions, and shut up with Mr Robert Bruce in Inverness. The most celebrated victim in these persecutions was Father Ogilvie, S.J. His case proves that the high Presbyterians' theory of Church and State came perilously near to that of their most detested opponents of the old faith. Ogilvie entered Scotland, disguised as a soldier, in 1613. He had two companions: one, Father Moffat, gained a rich harvest of souls in St Andrews; the other, Father Campbell, laboured in Edinburgh, whither Father Ogilvie later came. He ministered to the spiritual needs of Sir James Macdonald (Macsorley, cf. p. 435), who was still a prisoner in the Castle. In August 1614 Ogilvie ventured to Glasgow, the seat of Archbishop Spottiswoode. About October 5 he was arrested, being betrayed by a false convert, rich, and of good family. Spottiswoode, after the arrest, struck the prisoner; the standers-by fell on Ogilvie, beat him, and stripped him. This fact is given by Father Forbes Leith as part of Ogilvie's own narrative.<sup>15</sup>

The abominable story of Spottiswoode's blow is corroborated by Calderwood: "the bishop buffeted him."<sup>16</sup> Against a priest and a prisoner the prelate was more fierce than Andrew Melville against a king. Spottiswoode himself does not mention the circumstance. But he did write to James recommending that Ogilvie should be tortured by the boots, and asking for the half of any fines that might be inflicted.<sup>17</sup> Spottiswoode wrote thus on October 5, and an inquest as to Ogilvie was held on the same day. Spottiswoode expressed his irritation against the negligence of the ministers which favoured Popery, and he anticipated, or affected to anticipate, a plot against the life of the king. He still (November 12, 1614) insisted on the need of torture.<sup>18</sup> Yet the enthusiastic Calderwood regards the dealings against Catholics as "counterfeit." Some fourteen Glasgow people were tried in December for hearing mass, and the report ran that they were to be executed, "but they were in no danger." In modern controversy some Presbyterian writers argue that the Episcopalians were the real persecutors. They were bad enough, but they could not satisfy Calderwood and people of his stamp.

In December Ogilvie was taken to Spottiswoode's house in Edinburgh. "Mud, snow, and curses" were hurled at him as he rode, and a woman cursed his ugly face. "The blessing of Christ on your bonny face!" replied the gallant Jesuit, whereon the woman apologized. At Spottiswoode's house he was threatened with the boots and cross-examined on many matters. He would not give up the names of his friends or converts. As even James did not approve of ordinary torture, these cruel parsons kept the good father awake for eight days and nine consecutive nights, as they were wont to do with witches. They pinched him, and ran pins and needles into his flesh. Calderwood says that "his brains became lightsome." He himself declares that he scarce knew what he said or did, or in what city he was. Nothing could be extracted from him (the official account says that he gave up some names) either by cruelty or offer of reward. Moffat, another Jesuit, was tempted with "the Abbey of Coldingham, which . . . still retains its leaden roof." As a rule that last poor plunder of a ruined church had been stripped off and sold long ago.

Just before Christmas, 1614, Ogilvie was taken back to Glasgow, and fettered to an iron pole. Spottiswoode and others received a commission to ask Ogilvie questions about the royal supremacy and the Pope's claims to jurisdiction. He maintained (says the official account) that the Pope was supreme over the king in spiritual matters, and has power to excommunicate the king, just as (according to some authorities) the General Assembly had. As to whether the Pope could depose the king, Ogilvie refused to answer, nor would he say whether it was lawful to slay an excommunicated prince. He was tried, on these replies, before the provost, bailies, Spottiswoode, and some nobles, on February 28, 1615. The charge was, not that of saying mass, nor anything that could "touch him in conscience properly," but "for declining his majesty's authority." He refused to acknowledge the jurisdiction, or to admit that his opinions were treasonable. He bearded the court: his ideas, he said, as regards royal supremacy in spiritual matters were those "of the best ministers of the land, and if they be wise, they will continue so." The Jesuit agreed with those enemies of the Kirk who called it Jesuitical. A council of the Church, he said, had not determined the point as to whether excommunicated princes might be killed. On this point Knox and other preachers, had shown a hankering after some privileged Jehu, to slay tyrannical princes. Ogilvie was convicted—there was no help for it—and was hanged. The official account does not say what Father James Brown, S.J., does say, that a preacher was commissioned to offer Ogilvie, aloud and publicly, life, the hand of Miss Spottiswoode, and a very rich prebend, if he would turn Presbyterian (Douay, February 23, 1672). Father Brown was rector of Douay in 1688. He must have told this legend on the strength of tradition derived from his father, who, it seems, like Crito in the case of Socrates, had tried to induce Ogilvie to break prison. A public offer of the hand of the Archbishop's daughter could scarcely have been omitted by Calderwood, who must have seen the archiepiscopal absurdity. The anecdote is cited by Father Forbes Leith.<sup>19</sup>

An effort was made to prove that Ogilvie did not die for his religion, but for his politics. In fact, had an atheist, or a Presbyterian, or an Anglican, gone about teaching, and declined to say whether or not the king might, in any circumstances whatever, be lawfully slain, he would have been hanged. Knox, with his prayers for a Phineas, was exactly in Ogilvie's position. Religion had caused too many murders of eminent victims; too many hot heads were ready to act on the doctrine which Father Ogilvie refused to disclaim. Apparently he might, without dishonour, have disclaimed it, as no council had pronounced on the subject. He deserves our sympathy, like other brave men of all creeds, but his ideas could not be endured. Calderwood says that some took the hanging of Ogilvie as done "to be a terror to the sincerer sort of ministers not to decline the king's authority in any cause whatsoever." He was the second priest or Jesuit that was executed since the bastard Archbishop of Glasgow was hanged,<sup>20</sup> for Buchanan speaks of a priest who was hanged for his religion—the very priest who, on evidence received under seal of confession, accused Archbishop Hamilton of Darnley's murder.<sup>21</sup>

It must, in fairness, be said for the ruling classes of Protestant Scotland, that they, in opposition to the preachers, laboriously avoided carrying religious persecution to the death penalty. It was the error of James that in ecclesiastical matters he could not obey the proverb, "Let sleeping dogs lie." He was determined that nobody should live in the realm who was not of the same religion as himself, and his majesty's religion was a thing of rapid development. He now reached a stage of fairly high Anglicanism of an ornate kind. This he began to force upon his Scottish subjects, who liked their religion bald and bleak. Preachings thrice a week (Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Sundays), very rare communion services, not much music, and no works of art in church except the heraldic decorations of the lairds' pews, recommended themselves to the Scots. The communion was taken sitting, as in the first institution of the Lord's Supper, and the bread, apparently, was broken by the communicants as they passed it from each to each. The purpose was to preserve the original aspect of a common though sacred meal. Kneeling was deemed to imply adoration of the sacred elements, and the Scottish communion avoided the sacred seasons of the old faith, such as Easter and Christmas.

It seemed easy for James to leave these things as they were. What he had a right to secure, if he could, was immunity from clerical interference with the State, and freedom from the insults of the pulpit. In these respects he had now no ground of complaint. His two "Courts of High Commission" (the name being of evil association in England) had been set up in 1610, had enforced ecclesiastical and moral discipline, and in 1615 had been consolidated into one court. In the same year, in June, the death of Archbishop Gledstones left St Andrews and the primacy of Scotland open to Spottiswoode, who preached himself in on August 5 and 6. Law succeeded him in Glasgow; Graham, of Dunblane, took the Orkneys; and Bannatyne, once a foul-mouthed opponent of bishops, obtained the see of Dunblane.<sup>22</sup> In August 1616 a General Assembly was held at Aberdeen. This was thought to be for the conveniency of the northern and less precise preachers, but we have already seen that the north could boast her precisians at Nig and elsewhere. They were much offended by the novelty of the D.D. degree conferred at St Andrews on the Principals of St Leonard's, St Salvator's, and St Mary's, with other ministers; this prejudice against the degree has long been obsolete.<sup>23</sup>

The Assembly was directed by the king to take strong measures against Popery, a step which never did conciliate the remnant of the old leaven, who thought Episcopal persecutions of Catholics a mere farce. Spottiswoode was moderator, not by free election, and neither the ministers nor the nobles, "with silks and satins," were regarded as having "lawful commission to vote." Time was protracted in treating of penalties against Papists to weary the faithful from the south. Such Assemblies were not regarded by the Presbyterians of the old stamp as legal and binding. Family prayers were imposed on all, "and that the minister of every parish haunt their houses to see the same observed," so that Scottish Episcopacy by no means meant an end of clerical espionnage. The name "Presbytery" was not abolished: it occurs in an article against schoolmistresses. Justices of the Peace were to apprehend people who made pilgrimages to the holy wells, but the practice is not extinct yet in the Highlands, or even in the Lowlands. Ministers were to detect and expose minor poets, "songsters, and minstrels"; they, too, have survived these severities, like Scott's hero:—

The bigots of the iron time
Had called his harmless art a crime.

There was some dealing with Huntly, who, after a recent excommunication by the Kirk, had been absolved in England by the Archbishop of Canterbury—a bad precedent. “He did it of brotherly affection, and not as claiming any superiority over the Kirk of Scotland.” A new Confession, less rigid than “the King’s Confession,” was submitted to the Assembly. Finally, a number of the southern precisians being wearied out, royal instructions as to the discipline and policy of the Kirk were rapidly passed in a thin house. The rigid declared that they could not speak or vote freely, “having the king’s guard standing behind our backs.” A Catechism called “God and the King” was ordered to be used in schools.<sup>24</sup> Worse, a Liturgy was to be read in common prayer, though the minister was still allowed to “conceive his own prayer” afterwards. The communion was to be celebrated quarterly, “and one of the times to be Easter,” a festival of man’s invention, and having no certain warranty in Holy Writ. In the Confession it is averred that “the body and blood of Jesus Christ are truly present in the holy supper,” but that “we participate in them only spiritually and by faith, not carnally or corporally,” a rather delicate distinction. In October a new outrage occurred. “The organs which were to be set up in the chapel royal were brought to Leith.” The Abbey kirk at Holyrood and the chapel royal were also repaired and redecorated against the coming of the king.<sup>25</sup>

The Acts of the Assembly, except one ordaining the confirmation of the young by bishops, were, his majesty said, “a mere hotch-potch”—“hotch-potch” being the name of an excellent broth of promiscuous elements. He wished that—(1) the communicants should kneel, not sit; (2) that the communion might be administered to the dying at home; (3) that baptism should be administered on the first Sunday after birth, and, if necessary, at home (this was the common practice in Presbyterian families down to very recent times); (4) that the chief anniversaries, such as Christmas, Easter, Pentecost, should be observed; (5) confirmation and instruction were insisted upon. Spottiswoode remonstrated: it would be difficult to get these articles admitted.

James, therefore, deferred them till his own visit to his native country. His “salmon-like instinct,” he said, had long made him wish to see his own country. There his loyal subjects supposed that he had pardoned Somerset for the murder of Overbury, because Somerset had been privy to the poisoning of Prince Henry! This is reported by Calderwood: it is only one example of the charity of Scottish opinion.<sup>26</sup> A man who would have gilded figures of the apostles set up in the royal chapel (and that was James's intention) was capable of anything. First, an organ; then images; then murder, then the mass! The images were the substance of remonstrance by the bishops, whom James answered angrily (March 13, 1617). He did not erect the figures, but merely because there was not time enough to have the work well done. The bishops' ignorance amazed James. They did not object to figures of "lions, dragons, and devils," only to those of patriarchs and apostles.<sup>27</sup>

The visit of James, with the preparations of every kind for a retinue of 5000 persons, perturbed Scotland. Beggars were to be driven out of Edinburgh, game was to be preserved, ruins were to be pulled down, new dwellings erected, and all this would have been good for business if tradesmen could have cherished a confident hope of being paid. On this point they were gravely sceptical.

The king crossed the Tweed on May 13, 1617. Space does not serve for a minute account of the royal progress.<sup>28</sup> Bacon came, and Lennox, Arundel, and Shakespeare's Southampton, William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, and the young favourite, Villiers, Earl of Buckingham, and, among other divines, Dr William Laud, like the evil fairy at the christening, like Discord at the banquet of the Olympians. On Friday, May 16, James entered Edinburgh. The pageants and pedantries were of the usual kind. James made for Falkland and Dundee, and his old hunting grounds, and every palace spoke to him of raids by Bothwell or Gowrie, of imprisonment and escape. At Holyrood he may have slept in a bed of gold and silver work, wrought by his mother's hand: he must have held court in the rooms that had reeked with the blood of Riccio. After a stately visit to Morton at Dalkeith, Parliament was "ridden" on June 17, and the holding of Parliament in a prison (the Tolbooth) may have surprised the English visitors.

The most important fact in James's visit to Scotland was his dealing with the Kirk. He had promised to make no alterations; publicly he had promised, privately he had told Spottiswoode that he would clarify the hotch-potch of the Assembly of Aberdeen in 1616. He began by making the Council kneel at the sacrament in the royal chapel. Laud wore a surplice at the burial of one of the Guards—that harmless-looking surplice which has an effect so maddening on many minds. In the Parliament discontent was shown. James's list of Lords of the Articles was not accepted. The very first article ran, "That whatsoever conclusion was taken by his majesty with advice of the archbishops and bishops in matters of external police, the same should have the power and strength of an ecclesiastical law." The very bishops themselves said that "advice and consent of presbyters" were necessary, so "a competent number of the ministry" was added in a new clause. The preachers began to agitate. One Struthers prayed God to save Scotland from Anglican rites. On June 27 fifty-five preachers signed a protest against the practical abolition of the powers of the General Assembly. The signatures did not come to James's hands, but the protest did. His Majesty, hearing a dispute outside his dressing-room door, rushed forth, in an unaffected costume, and found Spottiswoode squabbling with Hewat, who had the copy of the protest. The leaders, repenting, had asked Spottiswoode not to let it reach James, but Hewat was for presenting it. James looked at the paper, asked where the signatures were, and then in Parliament caused the article protested against to be dropped.<sup>29</sup> But that night James summoned the most noted preachers to meet him, on July 13, in the castle chapel of St Andrews, now scarcely traceable among the ruins. Spottiswoode gives the king's speech on this occasion. He asked why his five points, as to kneeling at the communion and the rest, had not been accepted by last year's Assembly at Aberdeen. Again, they had "mutinously" protested against the first article in the June Parliament at Edinburgh. What, he demanded, were their scruples, what their reasons? The preachers asked leave to withdraw and discuss, which they did in the Town Kirk in South Street. They then asked that a General Assembly might first consider the king's new articles. Patrick Galloway is said, by Spottiswoode, to have offered his assurance that the Assembly would be obedient, and an Assembly was fixed for November 25 at St Andrews.<sup>30</sup>

The High Commission also sat, and Calderwood, the historian, was called before it. He was now a man of forty-two, and he played the part of Andrew Melville and his other heroes. The charge was that he kept the protest of the ministers drawn up in June with all the signatures. He said that he had given the roll to Andrew Simpson, another preacher, then warded in Edinburgh Castle. He was next accused of attending the "mutinous" meeting of the protesters. The dispute raged between James and Calderwood as to the power of the Assembly "to make canons and constitutions of all rites and orders belonging to Kirk polity." There was much wrangling on minute technical points, personal to Calderwood's own position, for he had been under a kind of ecclesiastical arrest. There was a confused scene, several people speaking at once, and some pushing Calderwood about. Apparently there was some misunderstanding on technical points, Calderwood misapprehending James's meaning, and James misconceiving Calderwood's. In the end, probably by the influence of the bishops, Calderwood was exiled.<sup>31</sup> He did not at once leave the country, but remained till after the king's Five Articles had been accepted by the Assembly of Perth, in August 1618. Then Calderwood produced a tract against the innovations and the legality of the Assembly which accepted them. The Assembly at St Andrews, in November 1617, had been thinly attended, and had merely trifled with the subject. James was indignant. In letters not without coarse humour, he rebuked Spottiswoode and the bishops; they, at least, should keep Christmas with sermons and ceremonies. He would cut off the stipends of all recalcitrant ministers, and stop the "Constant Plat" or commission for the better endowment of the Kirk. The bishops were themselves most reluctant to force the king's Five Articles on the country.

James had outraged Scottish feelings where they were most tender, by a proclamation licensing sports in Lancashire on Sunday. The populace, he said, had but one free day in the week, and on that day, for lack of amusements, they tumbled in alehouses. Let them go to church first, and play at any harmless games in the afternoon. James had, now and then, a dangerous knack of being in advance of his age. The prohibition of amusements on Sunday was, in fact, a mere invention of Presbyterians. There was a Biblical command not to work on the seventh day; the Kirk had made it of all rules the most sacred not to play on the first day of the week. When Mr Black, who was the occasion of the Edinburgh riot of 1596, was asked to set down a list of precepts, "he placed in the forefront that order be taken for keeping of the Saboth day," though why Sunday should be styled Sabbath has always perplexed the ungodly.<sup>32</sup> and done with, penance, pilgrimage, and so forth. In this sort the Kirk had only "the Sabbath": you could definitely abstain from golf or football on Sunday, whatever you might do in the rest of the week. Perhaps this was the cause of the increasing strictness of the Scot about Sunday, and that sentiment James ruthlessly offended. His articles, the Articles of Perth, were voted in the Assembly of August 1618. It was easily proved to be an illegal Assembly, pamphlets concerning it flew about, especially that of Calderwood was notorious. People fled the churches where kneeling was enforced, or did not kneel. Men of all ranks were recalcitrant. The Earls of Roxburgh and Linlithgow made ingenious excuses for evading the practice, as did the Provost of Edinburgh and Sir James Skene. The archbishops who disliked the Articles, or rather the trouble about the Articles, as much as any one, were perpetually arguing with non-conforming preachers. The great old name of William Kirkcaldy of Grange reappears; its new bearer wrote a pamphlet against the Articles of Perth. Mr Robert Bruce was again in trouble for contumacy. Sentences of banishment and fines were frequent.

The ancient faith offered a number of things that could be done,

The Easter of 1621 could not be reckoned a success. In the Little Kirk, on Good Friday, there were about sixty men and twelve women. The fair sex were, in religion, the more tenacious; Catholic ladies got their easy husbands into trouble, as did Covenanting ladies under Charles II. Wives and mothers now kept the less resolute sex from conformity, and the ladies are said to have filled Mr Calderwood's purse well before he went abroad, while Lady Cranstoun had especially sheltered him, though not as Dainty Davy was later concealed at Cherrytrees. The communion in the Old Kirk was peculiar. "The Chancellor distributed the bread to four or five, but Mr Patrick gave it to them all over again, to make sure work." All the women present did not kneel, they resolutely sat. The University did not communicate at all. The general public communicated sitting, at Dalkeith, Duddingston, and Prestonpans. The profaner sort, in May, went to May revels at Roslin, while English and Dutch artisans set up a Maypole at St Paul's Works. This we know to have been a heathen abomination denounced by the prophets of old. (For the Assembly of Perth, see Calderwood, vii. 304-339.)

Parliament was appointed for the first of June 1621. "The best affected professors" began to agitate, and wished the Town Council to petition against the Articles of Perth. The Provost was afraid to receive and present the address. Some ministers did send in a supplication to no purpose. On July 22, Parliament having been put off, a preacher dealt with the king in the fearless old fashion, and publicly insulted the bishops to their faces. He was warded in Dumbarton. The preachers had gathered from all quarters and were expelled from the town; they had been canvassing for votes as to the Articles. They published long protestations and admonitions against "usurped government and damned hierarchy."<sup>33</sup> These tracts influenced the voters, but were counterworked by the Marquis of Hamilton, the king's commissioner, and by Tam o' the Cowgate, now Earl of Melrose. The first business was financial: James's expenses for his daughter Elizabeth, the wandering Queen of Hearts and of Bohemia, being very heavy. The Lords of the Articles were selected thus: the bishops chose eight peers, they chose eight bishops, and the sixteen chose eight barons, or lairds, and eight burgesses. The officers of State voted with the Lords of the Articles. A considerable amount of taxation was imposed, including an income tax for three years on investments. The Lords of the Articles carried, by a large majority, the Articles of Perth. On the last day of the Parliament, as the Lords were riding to the Tolbooth, an omen occurred. A swan flew over their heads, "muttering her natural song." Calderwood is as fond of omens as Homer or Livy; the people deemed the portent evil; but we are not told whether the bird flew from left or right: δεξιός or ἀριστερός ὄρνις. The amount of pagan superstition among the brethren is amazing.

The protest of the preachers was not accepted. The Articles were offered en bloc, no debate was permitted; votes were given as "agree," "disagree," and Calderwood asserts that "disagrees" were recorded as "agrees." Proxy votes, which had recently come in, were allowed. The Articles were carried by a considerable majority. "God appeared angry at the concluding of the Articles," observes Calderwood: the month being August, there was a thunderstorm. The day was called "Black Saturday." The ungodly had the impudence to aver that the Articles, like the law of Moses, were confirmed by fire from heaven, which Calderwood regards as "a horrible blasphemy." Thus heaven and the swan were moved by what clearly was a despotic, unconstitutional, and hasty proceeding. But as arguments in debate do not affect votes, the house might have discussed the Articles for a month without arriving at any other decision. "The ayes have it." The Articles of Perth were as important as injudicious, and filled the mouths of men. The learned editor of the "Privy Council Register" doubts whether many of the Presbyterian clergy of Scotland to-day could tell what the Five Articles of Perth were.<sup>34</sup> If he is right, the education of the Presbyterian clergy, as regards the history of their own Church, must be neglected.

The affairs of the Kirk now continued to be one long course of compulsion and resistance. Bruce was sent back to Inverness: the Easter and Christmas communions were deserted, or were scenes of disorder. The entry of conformist ministers to parishes was opposed. On June 16, 1622, died the great Chancellor Dunfermline, James's chief minister in Scotland, the upright Octavian of old days. Even Calderwood has a good word for him, though he was "popishly inclined." "He was a good justicier, courteous and humane both to strangers and to his own country people, but no good friend to the bishops." A Catholic himself, Dunfermline would have governed Scotland well: neither he nor any other statesman, lay or clerical, approved of James's despotism about the Articles of Perth. Dunfermline was succeeded in the chancellorship by Sir George Hay, Clerk of the Register. The king now bade all preachers take example by the English Book of Homilies, "a pattern and a boundary, as it were, for the preaching ministers." Nobody was to touch on "the deep points of predestination, reprobation, or grace," things to be left to bishops and deans. Faith and good life were alone to be the topics. Puritans and Papists were not to be attacked from the pulpit.

Here was a drying up of the wells! No politics and no predestination were permitted in the preaching place, "a blash o' cauld morality" alone was left to the brethren. Tyranny, it might seem, could go no farther.<sup>35</sup> But tyranny could go farther. In the New College at St Andrews the English Liturgy was actually used in chapel (Jan. 15, 1623). On June 20 a portrait of the king, at Linlithgow, fell from the wall. As a king of France did not survive a similar omen for more than six weeks, it was reckoned that James's time might be short. It was not to be long, but Lennox died first, and suddenly, on February 16, 1624. He was kind and popular, and never meddled in Kirk matters. The opposition to the Articles waxed so strong in Edinburgh that a proclamation was issued against conventicles (June 10, 1624). James actually threatened to remove the Courts of Justice from Edinburgh—the old threat after the December riot of 1596—if the citizens would not go to communion on Christmas day. But on December 15, 1624, the Council proclaimed that on November 26 James had agreed to defer his threats, as in the proclamation, till Easter. He died on March 27, 1625: “the Lord removed him out of the way fourteen days before the Easter communion.” So says Calderwood, who mentions the reports that James was poisoned by the mother of Buckingham. It would have been just as easy for Episcopalians to say that he was poisoned by an agent of the Presbyterians.

The king passed away in the midst of the tempest which he had raised, which his son would raise to a higher power, but which only years could lull, pulveris exigui jactu. Not only justice and fairness, but the most ordinary common-sense, should have warned James against this final and fatal meddling with the consciences of the majority of his people. Conscience in these days went for very little. James had burned two Unitarians in London without provoking remonstrance, but then the Unitarians were a little flock. The consciences of Catholics were wronged every day: they were driven into impious temples, and compelled to sit at a sacrilegious feast. But if numerous, they were weak and without leaders; the world was against them. To force, as James did, the consciences of the Presbyterian majority, who were soon to have leaders enough, and who had arms and resources, was not more cruel and wicked than to burn Unitarians, and drive Catholics, by fines and banishment, to eat and drink their own damnation. But that infamous policy, as against Catholics, being approved of by the majority, was successful. To constrain the conscience of the learned, the rich, the many, even of the nobles in several cases, was not more wicked, but was impolitic to the verge of insanity.

Even Spottiswoode was heard to say that the king was determined to be his own Pope. His theology had advanced rapidly since the day when he told the General Assembly that the Church of England dealt in “a mass without the liftings” (the elevation of the host), and that Christmas and Easter were human inventions. Though James is said, not on the best authority, to have foreseen the mischief inherent in the character of Laud, no one could tell where he would stop. He might become a Catholic after the manner of Henry VIII., and enforce a popeless Catholicism. The Articles of Perth seem very trifling matters to us: to the Scots they implied acceptance of every doctrine that they disbelieved in and detested. The king, by an autocratic violence, was forcing them to forswear their creed and imperil their immortal souls. They were being constrained to be idolaters. "The Spreit of God" was banished from their congregations. The Divine afflatus was checked by

De par le Roi ; defense à Dieu De faire miracle dans ce lieu.

It was thus that the conduct of the king appeared to the minds of the Presbyterians. They had brought it on themselves. Their irreconcilable way, their taunts and insults, their intolerable claim to political interference, based on their inspiration, had never been forgotten or forgiven by James. Not content to break their power, in its pretensions as absurd, in its consequence as insufferable as his own, he had given his son Charles to a woman of the idolaters. Who knew but that, like Argyll, he might become an idolater himself? He died before discontent broke into flame, felix opportunitate mortis.

On James himself the final word was spoken when he was called "the Wisest Fool in Christendom." Despite his ungainly and disgusting ways, his grotesque eccentricities, his pedantries, his shameful favourites, and evil example of tolerating vices, some of which he did not practise, James was probably the ablest man of his house since the death of James I. of Scotland. That he should have succeeded as he did, despite his personal disadvantages; that he should have floated through the ceaseless turmoils of his reign in Scotland, and escaped the intrigues of England,—aimed at his liberty, but involving danger to his life,—these things proved remarkable qualities. Once safe in England he had really nothing to fear from the Kirk, the danger came from his own intolerable despotism. While he was in Scotland the Kirk could agitate till a sufficient number of nobles was ready to seize the royal person. That was the danger which his accession to the English Crown annihilated. A wise man would have taken the opportunity to be tolerant of the preachers. But James only showed his cleverness in wrangles with them, his folly by goading them to resistance.

Having the opportunity, for the first time in history, to quiet the Borders, he took it, and he was not wholly unsuccessful with the Highlands. No man could put down the feuds of the nobles and the gentry, but he considerably discouraged them. His ineffable conceit and relentless egotism (not unaccompanied by good nature where he was unopposed), and the dissimulation bred by a youth of fear, in an atmosphere of universal falsehood and treachery, were his worst moral qualities as a man. Though a pedant he was learned, probably the most learned man who ever occupied a British throne, though in literary qualities he was far behind the royal poet who was slain in the Dominican monastery of Perth; while in wit he could not compare with Charles II. To regard James as a mere grotesque figure, "gentle King Jamie," is an error: he could be terrible. As a rule, when he was in the right (as in the matter of the Union, and in his toleration when politics were not concerned) he was in the right too soon; while in the matter of witchcraft he was in the wrong too late. Too late, also, he was in his almost unavoidable acceptance, as doctrine, of the Tudor practice of despotism. No king of Scotland was encouraged by such fulsome flatteries as, in England, continued from the courtly abasement of Elizabeth's reign.

James took for realities the formulæ of adulation which survived from the court of a woman and a Tudor. Parliament could not remove the fond illusions on which his son was to make shipwreck. Of James's six immediate ancestors, five had died a violent death, as his unhappy son was to die. Charles I. was the only Stuart king since Robert III. who did not begin his reign with a long minority. That which had been so constant a curse to his house might, in this one case, have been a blessing. To James alone, the least desirable, the most distasteful of his line, did Heaven give good fortune. How he abused the gift has been made manifest.

The period covered by our volume ends with James's death. But we must return, in the following chapter, to the remoter and more lawless portions of his realms.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER XIX.

<sup>1</sup> Spottiswoode, iii. 156.

<sup>2</sup> Spottiswoode, iii. 148-155, December 1604.

<sup>3</sup> Register Privy Council, vii. 512-513, 517-518.

<sup>4</sup> State Trials, vol. ii. pp. 561-695.

<sup>5</sup> Pitcairn, ii. 584.

<sup>6</sup> Spottiswoode, iii. 289, note by Mr Mark Napier, apparently.

<sup>7</sup> To what extent James was consciously implicated in this affair of the letter to the Pope, or in Ogilvie of Pourie's mission to Rome and Spain in 1595, is a very obscure question. As to the letter which caused the ruin of Balmerino, Mr Hume Brown says, "There can be little doubt that James wrote it" (Hume Brown, ii. 237, note 2). Mr Gardiner disbelieves this, and speaks of the king's "transparent ingenuousness" (Gardiner, ii. p. 33). The author inclines to agree with Mr Gardiner, that Balmerino's confession contains the truth (Pitcairn, ii. 568 et seq.). As for Ogilvie of Pourie, in 1601 he wrote to the king, "I never had or used any commission of your majesty to any foreign prince in my life, neither in Flanders, France, nor Spain," which is probably true, though it is Pourie who says so (Hatfield MSS. 90, vol. cxxxvi.). Cf. p. 496 supra.

<sup>8</sup> Privy Council Register, ix. ix.

<sup>9</sup> Privy Council Register, ix. xiii. xv.

<sup>10</sup> Privy Council Register, ix. 75.

<sup>11</sup> Privy Council Register, ix. 714, 715.

<sup>12</sup> Calderwood, vii. 164.

<sup>13</sup> Calderwood, vii. 173.

<sup>14</sup> Pitcairn, iii. 254, 257.

<sup>15</sup> Relatio Incarcerationis et Martyrii P. Joannis Ogilbei . . . descripta ad verbum ex autographo ipsius (Duaci, 1615).

<sup>16</sup> Calderwood, vii. 193.

<sup>17</sup> Botfield, Original Letters (1852), ii. 385, 387.

<sup>18</sup> Botfield, Original Letters, ii. 399-401.

<sup>19</sup> Narratives of Scottish Catholics, pp. 311, 312.

<sup>20</sup> Calderwood, vii. p. 196.

<sup>21</sup> See Chapter IX. of this volume.

<sup>22</sup> Calderwood, vii. 203.

<sup>23</sup> Calderwood, vii. 222.

<sup>24</sup> On this work see Dr Masson, Privy Council Register, x. cviii. cix.

<sup>25</sup> Calderwood, vii. 220-242 ; Spottiswoode, iii. 230-238.

<sup>26</sup> Calderwood, vii. 243.

<sup>27</sup> Original Letters, ii. 496-499.

<sup>28</sup> See Privy Council Register, vol. xi.

<sup>29</sup> Spottiswoode, iii. 241, 245.

<sup>30</sup> Spottiswoode, iii. 246, 247.

<sup>31</sup> Calderwood, vii. 261, 271.

<sup>32</sup> Hay Fleming, St Andrews' Kirk-Session Register, ii. lxxiii.

<sup>33</sup> Calderwood, vii. 472-488.

<sup>34</sup> Privy Council Register, xii. p. lxxxv.

<sup>35</sup> Calderwood, vii. pp. 560-562.

CHAPTER XX.

HIGHLANDS AND BORDERS.

1603-1610.

A NECESSARY result of James's accession to the English throne was the pacification of the Borders. For several centuries the Marches of the two countries had been in a social condition much like that of the tribes on the Afghan frontier of India. A warlike population, existing in the clan system, had no particular morality or loyalty, except fidelity to the laird, to "the name," and to outlaws and banished men. "On no condition was extradition" allowed on the Border. Property consisted chiefly of cattle and horses, and, by endless raids, was kept in lively circulation. There was, of course, a standing feud between the clans on either side of the burn or glen which constituted "the Border" in each district. But the feud between English and Scots, as such, was relatively mild, and even humorous,—a kind of game with rules of "hot trod," and "cold trod," and so forth, of its own; these laws regulated raids and the recovery of cattle stolen in raids. The wardens, also,—it might be Buccleuch and Scrope, with their deputies, such as Scott of the Haining, and Salkeld of Corby,—had peaceful days of meeting, when the riders of both sides met and discussed their feats of robbery and fire-raising, and their duels, much as men might discuss a football match. Now it is the Captain of Bewcastle who has harried Jamie Telfer of the Dodhead; now it is Jamie Telfer who has "warned the water speedily," and brought all the Scotts of Upper Teviotdale down on the Captain of Bewcastle.

Rough "riding ballads" were sung about these feats, which now and then entailed a vendetta, but, on the whole, did not cause much bad blood. In fact, one of the peculiarities of the Border was that certain clans, as the Netherby Grahams, the Elliots, Crosbies, Nixons, and Robsons, were of dubious nationality: they might take either national side, as opportunity served and temptation arose. Probably Buccleuch contrived the rescue of Kinmont Willie with the aid and connivance of the Grahams who lay between Langholm and Carlisle. On both sides of the line the adjacent clans had a common interest in preserving their lawless freedom. Justice only took the shape of sporadic hangings of "pretty men," who were respected and regretted, and left friends and sons to carry on the old sportive military existence. Private feuds between clans and neighbours were more cruel and violent than the skirmishes of an international character. Kers and Scotts and Elliots, in the east and centre, Maxwells and Johnstons in the west, and in Dumfries and Galloway, fought like fiends, for centuries, over some old quarrel of which the origin might be lost, but which produced new bloodshed and new revenges in every generation. The Criminal Trials are full of "spuilzies," maiming of cattle, burnings, shootings "with hagbuts and pistolets," slayings of men. The existence of this animated kind of society was inevitable while the two countries were separate.

But when James became King of England, the Borders, as he said, became the "heart of his royal empire." The shires of Berwick, Selkirk, Roxburgh, Peebles, Dumfries, and the Stewartries of Dumfries and Annandale must be brought to order, and five gentlemen were appointed commissioners for that purpose. They had powers to hold courts, and were granted immunity for "any mischance or inconvenient," such as hanging the wrong man. For Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmorland commissioners were also appointed. Extradition was now to be the order of the day. The incorrigible were to be, rather vaguely, "removed to some other place," where "change of air" might "make in them a change of manners." Of the English commissioners, the name of Sir Wilfrid Lawson is most familiar to modern ears; of the Scots, Gideon Murray of Elibank on Tweed. All dubious characters were to be disarmed, especially of hagbuts and pistols, before May 20, 1605; and a kind of census of the natives was to be taken. No gaols existed, so new gaols were to be built in the burghs, and as the prisoners could not maintain themselves in prison, and the burgesses would not, "justice is to be administered to them as soon as possible." Hence our proverb, "Jeddart justice: hang a man first, and try him afterwards." So the commissioners, not without misgivings and questions, began to hang persons like "Jock of the Shiels, ane lymnar of auld." They doubted about poor Jock, but the Lords said "Hang him." Tom Armstrong, "a proper young man," against whom there was no evidence at all, the Lords ordered to be hanged, merely pour encourager les autres. A horse had been stolen, its owner went to Peebles to testify that Tom was innocent, yet the gallows got him. In April 1606 we find some forty proper men hanged—surely the worst use to make of them; and about fifteen others, including a bastard of Kinmont Willie, were hanged in November. Scores of freebooters were fugitive in the hills and morasses, pursued by "lugg dogges." Cranstoun got an indemnity for executions done without trial; and the active Earl of Dunbar was placed on the Border Commission. In 1607 a number of small Border lairds—Rutherfords, Elliots, Kers, and Scotts—were removed from the Border, and warded in northern or inland towns; and the same policy, in 1608, was exercised on a crowd of gentry of the house of Maxwell; all were sent north of Tay. By July 1609 the doers of the work could congratulate themselves that the Borders were tranquil.<sup>1</sup>

One noble victim perished in the persistent massacres of rough justice. This was Lord Maxwell, who was a Bothwell for reckless mischief. He was the son of the sixth Lord Maxwell, who, after Morton's execution in 1581, for a while bore the title and brooked the lands of Morton. In 1585 Morton's attainder was reversed, Maxwell lost his prize, and took to intriguing with Spain. He was taken prisoner, and Johnston succeeded to his wardenship of the West Marches. Though the wardenship was restored to Maxwell, his clan and that of the Johnstons entered on a feud: and in a great battle (Dec. 7, 1593), on the Dryfe Sands, Maxwell was defeated and slain. Some 2000 men fought on either side; and the phrase, "a Lockerby lick," is said to be derived from the ghastly wounds inflicted on the fugitives in the streets of Lockerby. Maxwell's son inherited the feud, and, at a meeting for reconciliation, shot Sir James Johnston through the back (April 6, 1608). He was warded in Edinburgh Castle, but made a dexterous escape, wounding several of the warders. In 1612, being in the north of Scotland, he was betrayed by his kinsman, the Earl of Caithness, and, on May 21, 1613, he was beheaded at Edinburgh. This execution was procured by the Laird of Johnston's friends, specially by Sir Robert Ker, Earl of Rochester (Somerset the favourite), "the chief guider of the court at that time," says Calderwood. There was a great deal of sympathy with Maxwell though he was a Catholic. He certainly had the charm of recklessness, and though he had treacherously murdered a man under trust, the man had been his feudal foe.<sup>2</sup>

At this distance of time (with all respect to the name of Maxwell), we feel more pity for poor Tom Armstrong, who was hanged merely for being suspected of knowing too much about the stealing of a nag. The execution of the Mures of Auchendrane, in 1611, for a series of cold-blooded murders, later to be described, proceeding from a murder-band or contract of the usual sort, proved that, in Scotland, the law was beginning to be a terror to evil-doers, even when of good county families. It may be remarked that fifty years of an open Bible, and of the Truth constantly preached, seem in no way to have mollified the ferocity of the Scottish people, but rather, if anything, to have increased their bloodthirsty dispositions. A few mounted police and the expense of some miles of rope were infinitely more efficacious. The reduction of the Highlands was undertaken simultaneously with the settlement of the Borders, but was a task much more difficult, and, by the Stuart kings, never fully accomplished.

THE HIGHLANDS.

In various parts of the Highlands Presbyterianism is still called the Religion of the Yellow Stick. There is a legend that a chief caned all his tenants into kirk, where or at what date is unknown. The great Lauchlan Maclean of Dowart, as we have seen, was a Presbyterian, and took the Covenant in "the Little Kirk" on the day of the Edinburgh riot of December 17, 1596. Mackintosh also spoke generously of planting kirks, and James Melville was convinced that the Celts would make good Presbyterians. But the West Highlands and the Isles, like Nithsdale and Galloway, were not yet "planted" with ministers, and the West was little visited by the few wandering and skulking Catholic missionaries. These regions, therefore, like Galloway and Annandale, were especially turbulent. Macleods, Mackenzies, Macgregors, Macdonalds, and Macfarlanes lived in a state of open war, or, in the case of the two latter clans adjacent to civilisation, of brigandage.

It was necessary to try to bring the Celts into order, a task in which the Crown never succeeded for want of money, of a standing army, and of police. The difficulties, when a royal expedition was attempted, were of a kind not unfamiliar. The castles of the island chiefs were of a strength impregnable to the weak artillery of the assailants. To burn the cots and destroy the crops of the clansmen might irritate but could not subdue the hardy recalcitrants. Swift-footed and mobile, they succeeded in night surprises of camps, and, if hard pressed, easily escaped by boats to other islands. A common ruse was to attack a camp, and then fall back among their unmapped hills and glens, alluring the pursuers into ambushes for which every wood and corry afforded shelter. Driven far from their base, the royal forces were now attacked by overwhelming numbers; now returned to find that their camp had been fired, and that their supplies were in the hands of the enemy.<sup>3</sup>

On July 9, 1599, the Privy Council tried what could be done by a vigorous proclamation. The Celts were persecuting what may be called the Chartered Company of the Lewes, which was an association of Fifeshire and other gentlemen to exploit and establish towns, agriculture, and fisheries in that island. A commission was given to Lennox and Huntly to quiet the Lewes and collect the royal rents. The two lieutenants were to be assisted by a council of nobles and gentlemen.<sup>4</sup> Negotiations were entered into in the September of the same year for reducing the southern isles and promontories of the West coast. The focus of trouble was the Castle of Dunnyveg in Isla, the old royal seat of the sons of Somerled. For sway in Isla, and the long, narrow, but fertile peninsula of Kintyre, Macdonalds had been cutting each other's throats, while Macleans took part in the fray, and Campbells waited for their opportunity, which was soon to come. Probably the rightful holder of Dunnyveg was the truculent old Angus Macdonald, whom his son, Sir James, once burned out of his house. In 1599, in September, negotiations were begun with Sir James Macdonald. He was to evacuate Kintyre in favour of new settlers; was to place the Castle of Dunnyveg, in Isla, in the king's hands; and was to receive, as royal tenant, the lands of Isla, and make provision for his father, Angus, whom he had once nearly burned to death.<sup>5</sup> No good came of all this, for which Sir James and his friends blamed Argyll and Campbell of Calder. Sir James was a polished ruffian, but the Campbells usually bear the weight of all turmoils which turned to their own advantage.

In October 1599, fortified by hopes from Lennox and Huntly, the Lowland settlers, with an armed force, set off to "plant" the Lewes. Unsheltered in the wild weather, they sickened and died. Leirmont of Balcomy was taken at sea and held prisoner by Murdoch Macleod; the curse of Andrew Melville, with whom he had quarrelled in St Andrews, was thought to pursue "this jolly gentleman," who died in the Orkneys. But Murdoch was given up to the adventurers by his brother Neil Macleod, who allied himself with the Lowlanders. Murdoch was executed at St Andrews, and the Lord of Kintail, a Mackenzie and a foe of the settlers, was imprisoned. He escaped, and continued to oppose the "planters."

James, in 1600, thought of visiting the Isles with a large array, but ships, money, men, and perhaps inclination, were deficient. The Highland historian, Dr Gregory (one of the Gregarach), accuses James of cowardice, but we know how destitute he was of money in 1600. Nicholson (July 9) writes to Cecil about the king's poverty; the Convention in which Gowrie spoke refused supplies; and (July 22) Nicholson says that the expedition to the Isles was abandoned "on account of the great scarcity in the country."<sup>6</sup> In June 1601 increased powers were given to Lennox and Huntly, but these powers were not used. In Skye, Macdonald of Sleat and Macleod were at feud; they were brothers-in-law, and Macdonald had repudiated Macleod's sister with insult, divorced her, and wedded a sister of Mackenzie of Kintail. Then began expeditions of murder and rapine through Skye, Harris, and the Long Island; the natives were driven to eat their horses and cats. Government interfered; Macdonald was to surrender to Argyll, Macleod to Huntly, and the clans were reconciled. The Lewes settlers now quarrelled with Neil Macleod, and had the worse of the strife; while Mackenzie of Kintail slipped on the settlers a chief who was the nephew of Neil, and had been a prisoner. Round this young Tormod the Celts rallied as the representative of the true Macleod dynasty, and they reduced the Lowland settlers to a capitulation. They kept two hostages, turned the other Lowlanders out, and secured a pardon, but the settlers did not observe the conditions, and the war was renewed, or rather was deferred, till 1603.

The Glengarry Macdonalds now went to war with the Mackenzies, and young Glengarry was slain in a night surprise of his galley. By burning a church full of Mackenzies the Macdonalds avenged this disaster, Glengarry's piper strutting round the edifice playing a pibroch. The singular point is that there was any church to burn. But it is fair to add that Dr Gregory could find "no public notice taken of such an enormity," so we may trust that the story (so unfavourable to Glengarry) is a Mackenzie myth.* The Celtic excesses in West Ross and the Isles were nearly as remote, in effect, as now is a rising in Fiji. But the Macgregors, in the Lennox, were much nearer home. This unlucky clan seems to date its misfortunes from Bruce's forfeiture of the Macdougals. They were harried from one reservation to another, a fleeting race, the Children of the Mist. As Argyll "gave them wood and water" down to the days of Rob Roy, he was responsible for their behaviour. But just as a much later Argyll, "Red Ian of the Battles," found Rob Roy a useful spy and secret ally in 1715, so the Argyll of 1603 is accused of "hounding out" the Gregarach against Colquhoun of Luss. The Macgregors invaded the Lennox, it is said, by virtue of a commission from the king. The great fight, or slaughter, of Glenfruin occurred on February 7 or 8, 1603. On January 20, 1604, Macgregor of Glenstra was tried for his feat of arms. His idea, it is alleged, was to extirpate the Colquhouns and Buchanans, and he was aided by the Camerons, the Clananverich (not Clan Vourich, the Macphersons?), and "other broken men and sorners." The Glencoe Macdonalds appear to have been in the fray.<sup>7</sup> The invaders wore coats of mail, and had muskets, bows, two-handed swords, and pole-axes. They entered Glenfruin, in Luss's territory, and slew, among others, "Tobias Smollet, bailie of Dumbarton," and bearer of the name made immortal by the author of "Peregrine Pickle." About a hundred and forty persons were slain, many of them as disarmed prisoners. The house of Luss was burned, and a very large creagh was driven. Nothing is said in the indictment about the massacre of a number of students or schoolboys who had made a trip to see the sport.<sup>8</sup>

While most writers accuse Argyll of "hounding out" the Macgregors, Calderwood says that Lady Lennox was believed to have instigated the raid. The Macgregors, one might conceive, needed little hounding out by lord or lady. In October 1603 Ardkinglas invited the chief of the Macgregors to dinner, seized him, and was taking him by boat to Argyll, when Macgregor leaped overboard and escaped. Argyll then betrayed Macgregor, under promise of sending him to England, to the king. He did carry the chief to Berwick, that is, into England, and then brought him back to

Edinburgh, where the chief was tried and executed on January 20, 1604.<sup>9</sup>

Poor Macgregor left a statement, written in the hand of James Primrose, Clerk of Council. Argyll, he said, had been his ruin. First he hounded the Macleans and Camerons on to the Macgregor lands in Rannoch. Then, these Macgregors being destitute, Argyll urged them to attack the Buchanans and the Colquhouns of Luss. Next this Macchiavelli suborned Ardkinglas to betray Macgregor, and Macgregor to slay Ardkinglas. How much truth there is in all this we have no method of discovering. It is certain that the very name of Macgregor was abolished by an Act of April 3, 1603.<sup>10</sup> The results were that many of the clan, changing their name, became sober and distinguished citizens, like the family of Gregory, which, for several generations, produced men of learning if not of genius. On the other side the body of the clan became Ishmaelites, their hands against every man's hand.

In 1608 considerable preparations were made for the subjection of the islands, and a guard of 500 was allotted to the new lieutenant, Lord Ochiltree. He was assisted by a council, with the Bishop of the Isles at its head, the warlike preacher, Andrew Knox. In August, when a handful of 200 rather useless Scottish soldiers had been sent to aid in subduing an Irish rebellion, a force of English soldiers from Ireland joined the royal levies at Isla. The Irish rebels and the islanders were apt to work into each other's hands, hence the junction of Scots with recruits from the English army in Ireland to guard against their combinations. O'Dogherty's rebellion in Ulster having been put down, English forces in Ireland were free to deal with the insular Celts.<sup>11</sup> Meanwhile the king and Council were occupied with plans for the "plantation of Ulster" with English and Scottish settlers, each in his peel or tower, and holding lands from which the Irish had been evicted. On the island side, the castle of Dunyveg in Isla, a hold of the Macdonalds, was surrendered and garrisoned for the Crown, as (August 17) was the Maclean fortress of Dowart in Mull. Ochiltree held a durbar of the chiefs, at Aros in Mull, and received them into the king's peace, or pretended to do so. Next, inviting them to dinner on board his vessel, he carried them off, and the Council warded them in Dumbarton, Blackness, and Stirling, much as the Maxwells had already been treated. The Macleods of Harris and the Lewes were not captured. The imprisoned chiefs capitulated, and in February 1609 a large body of commissioners was appointed to deal with the island affairs.<sup>12</sup> By way of striking terror, that old prisoner, Sir James Macdonald, son of Angus of Dunyveg, and slayer of the valiant Maclean of Dowart, was tried for the burning of the house in which he nearly roasted his father, and for his attempted escape from the Castle, when he was taken, and Lord Maxwell got free. James, we know, had of old rather favoured this chief, who produced, but withdrew, a royal warrant for the capture of his father. He was convicted, and sentenced to death and forfeiture, but was not executed. Six years later he succeeded in escaping. Possibly it was not thought well to push him to extremities, as he had some more or less compromising old document of the king's.

Meanwhile the Bishop of the Isles had been surveying these territories and negotiating with the natives. In July he met the released chiefs and others at Iona or Icolmkill, and in August the Statutes or Band of Icolmkill were ratified. The great chiefs, mainly Macdonalds and Macleans, professed the true religion, and obedience to the king and the laws of the realm. They vowed that they would respect and pay the stipends of ministers already planted or to be planted, repair the churches, and abandon the custom of handfasting, or temporary marriages. Next they denounced the custom of sorning, or forced hospitality, and ordained that inns or hostelries should be established. Each chief bound himself to harbour and entertain only a small fixed number of gentlemen. Once more they denounced "the extraordinary drinking of strong wines and aqua vitæ," and the traffic in these comforts. But everybody might distil his own whisky, so that the cause of temperance took little advantage. Every gentleman owning sixty cows must educate his eldest child in the Lowlands. Unlike their ancestors in the time of Henry VIII., the chiefs at Icolmkill were themselves able to read and write. The law against using firearms was accepted. Bards and other vagabonds were to be put in the stocks, or expelled.<sup>13</sup>

From these statutes the historian, Dr Gregory, dates the loyalty of the Celts, as displayed under Charles I., and onwards, we may add, to the last Jacobite rising. But perhaps the natural attachment of the Celts to the lost cause, with the chances of authorised raids on the Lowlands, and loyalty to "the Kirk malignant," that of Prelacy or of Rome, were not without influence on the later Highlanders. Even now the river Sheil and Loch Sheil are the frontiers of Presbyterianism, farther north is a large Catholic district, while in Glencoe, and Appin, and Lochaber there are Celtic adherents of James's Church, the Scottish Episcopal. Where the modern Celt does not adhere to these faiths he shows a strong tendency to beliefs and usages like those of the austere Presbyterians with whom James VI. was always at war.

Despite the submission of many chiefs the affairs of the Lewes remained unsettled. New managers and adventurers—Balmerino, Sir George Hay, and Spens of Wormiston—had undertaken to settle the Lewes in 1608. But Balmerino was disgraced and imprisoned on the old affair of the letter to the Pope, and Hay and Spens were thwarted and driven out of the island by the arms of Neil Macleod, and the intrigues of Mackenzie of Kintail. They disposed of their useless concessions to this chief, who drove out or reduced the Macleods of the Lewes. These appearances of quiet and order were, of course, delusive. Many great chiefs made solemn promises. The Bishop of the Isles (Andrew Knox) received the much contested Castle Perilous, Dunyveg in Isla, and became Stewart and Justice for the Isles, while Lochiel and Clanranald were joined with Argyll in the ferocious efforts to exterminate the Macgregors, a task for which the other clans had no heart.

Disturbances arose from a discovery casually made by Argyll in his muniment room. As far back as the reign of James V. the third Earl of Argyll had procured, through Campbell of Calder, what Calder had acquired from Maclean of Lochbuy in Mull, title-deeds to certain superiorities over the lands of Lochiel, Duror, and Glencoe. It was about 1527 that Calder, having purchased these rights from Lochbuy, and having discovered that the Camerons, Appin Stewarts, and Macdonalds or MacIans were hard to deal with, transferred the title-deeds to his brother Colin, third Earl of Argyll. The claim seems to have been forgotten for some eighty years, when Argyll happened to find the old documents, and got a new charter from the king. The man who was astonished was Lochiel, but he consented to come under Argyll's superiority. History was to prove, in the Civil War, and in 1715, and 1745, that the Argyll suzerainty was but the shadow of a name. Huntly, who had regarded Lochiel as his man, took umbrage, and seduced away from Lochiel the Camerons of Erracht and Glen Nevis, the beautiful valley which runs up the south-east side of Ben Nevis. Even after the Forty-Five we still find the Glen Nevis Camerons (really MacSorlies) engaged against Lochiel and Fassifern, in intrigues so dark that blushing History averts her eyes, and leaves the gloomy Celtic secret in the Duke of Cumberland's MSS. Huntly's Cameron friends were put by him into lands which Allan Cameron of Lochiel held either from Huntly or Argyll. Lochiel tried to negotiate peacefully with the intruders, who gave a verbal, but refused a written promise, and asked Allan to come with them to meet Huntly. Allan mildly put the motion by; he knew what Huntly was capable of, and he rode to Edinburgh to take legal advice.

In Edinburgh he learned that "his friends" (kinsmen) were laying a plot against the life of their chief. He heard where they were to meet, hurried back to Lochaber, gathered six score fellows of the right sort, and placed them within half a mile of the scene of the hostile gathering. He set them in ambush in a wood, which lay convenient, and then, with six boys of the belt, strolled towards "his friends," asking them to meet him with other six. He had first instructed his ambushed men to lie still if all went well, if he were attacked he would fly past the wood. He went forward, was ill received, and fled under a shower of arrows. When the pursuers reached the wood, Lochiel's hundred and twenty arose from the cover of birch, and rock, and bracken; Allan turned and stood at bay, his men fell on his pursuers from the rear, slew twenty, took eight alive, and, writes James Primrose, Clerk of Council, "learned a lesson to the rest of his kin who are alive in what form they shall carry themselves to their chief hereafter." But the "form" of the Glen Nevis Camerons continued to be deplorable, though one of them "died the death of fame" at Culloden.<sup>14</sup>

James Primrose tells the tale, though a peaceful man, with spirit and sympathy. However, in December 1613 the Privy Council most unfeelingly outlawed the brave Lochiel, and gave Huntly a commission of fire and sword against him. He had slain, in fair fight, "the Bodach" John Cameron, also Allaster of Glen Nevis, for which who can blame him? <sup>15</sup> But it is a far cry to Loch Arkaig, and Huntly made little use of his letters of fire and sword.

A disturbance among the Macneils of Barra and the Macleans was characteristic. Old Barra had a family by a Maclean lady, to whom he was only handfasted, and another family by a sister of Clanranald, to whom he was legally married. The oldest of the senior family (Macleans on the spindle side) was arrested by Clanranald for piracy against a ship from Bordeaux. He was helping himself to the claret. He died before his trial, and his brothers, with Maclean of Dowart, seized one of the legitimate family, who happened also to have been engaged in robbing the liquors of Bordeaux. He was sent to Edinburgh to be tried, but was acquitted, thanks to Clanranald. The brethren of the elder (Maclean) but illegitimate family of old Barra now seized that chief, their father, and put him in irons. The Council therefore gave Clanranald letters of fire and sword against these "lymmars" in their island. The result was the succession of one of the legal branch, Clanranald's nephew, to old Barra, who did not long survive his severe imprisonment by his sons.<sup>16</sup>

Old Angus of Dunyveg, father of the now imprisoned Sir James Macdonald, died, and Sir Ranald, Sir James's brother, succeeded in Isla. He must have been an ill-advised man, for he tried to introduce "the Irish laws," the Brehon laws and customs of land tenure, probably.<sup>17</sup> It is not surprising to hear that the Bishop of the Isles was not long permitted to retain Dunyveg Castle, which was but slenderly garrisoned. Old Angus had left a bastard, Ranald Oig, who suddenly seized the fortress early in 1614. Thereon Angus Oig, a younger brother of the imprisoned Sir James, set about recovering the castle "for the king." His kinsman Left-handed Coll (Coll Keitache, "Colkitto") succeeded in taking the place. Ranald Oig escaped by sea, and Angus retained the castle, offering to restore it to the Bishop of the Isles on conditions. The Council bade him surrender under pain of rebellion, and told the warlike prelate to seize the place. The bishop preferred to negotiate, then approached in force, but was deserted by his Celtic levies, and had to see his boats destroyed by Angus Oig. With Angus the bishop had to make terms, he would endeavour to get for him a lease of the Crown land, held in Isla by Sir Ranald, and he left, as hostages, his son Thomas, and his nephew John Knox. His letters reached the Council on October 1, 1614.<sup>18</sup> The Council was heartlessly indifferent to the fate of John and Thomas. They gave a commission to Campbell of Calder to subdue Isla; for which, when he had reduced it, he was to pay a rent. But Argyll, if we can believe the bishop, had been encouraging Angus to hold out.<sup>19</sup> It may be remarked that, whenever the Macgregors or Macdonalds did anything especially lawless, they always said "Argyll told us to do it." If so, they ought, of course, to have found out this policy of the house of Argyll. But "these unhallowed people with that unchristian tongue" (so Sir Alexander Hay calls them in 1615) were either innocent as doves, so that Argyll could always take them with the same chaff, or they were not remarkably veracious.

Meanwhile Angus Oig made life a burden to John and Thomas Knox, and the bishop was much annoyed and distressed. Why put in the Campbells, he asked, a clan hardly less "pestiferous" than the Macdonalds themselves? Presently Angus relieved Thomas and John, understanding that he should be allowed to keep Dunyveg Castle. Royal forces from Ireland, however, arrived to demand its surrender. In January 1615 Calder joined the Irish contingent, and artillery began its work. A number of the garrison were hanged. Left-handed Coll escaped, Angus Oig was taken to Edinburgh. They had scarcely arrived, or had not yet arrived, when that old prisoner, Sir James of Dunluce, who slew the great Lachlan Maclean of Dowart, escaped from the Castle (May 24). Keppoch, the young Clanranald, and Dougal Macallester (who was in a writer's office) managed the escape; Sir James made for the Firth of Forth, crossed, and got clean away. He was nearly taken, in Atholl, by Tullibardine's men, but fled by speed of foot. He wrote interesting letters to Lord Crauford and others, protesting that he had only broken ward because he heard that Calder had a warrant for his death, and asking that his books might be returned to him. They were seized with his baggage in Atholl. One book was "The Three Conversions of England," and a manuscript "Great Chronicle." Once arrived in Keppoch's country books were scarce, but liberty was secured. Sir James sailed to Eig, and was welcomed by Coll the left-handed, with a strong force of Macdonalds, who fired their muskets to honour the chief. They next sailed to Isla and took Dunyveg. First they ambushed till the captain with a small party came out, then attacked them, killing some, but the captain escaped into the castle. This they besieged, and soon compelled a surrender, "all the Campbells in Scotland, without his majesty's power, shall not recover it as long as they live" (July 3).<sup>20</sup> Sir James now intended to reduce Kintyre and Jura to his subjection.

Sir James, in brief, was rehearsing, on a small scale, Napoleon's escape from Elba, and recovering the dominions of his house which the Campbells had annexed. All this while Argyll was away from home in fear of his creditors. But in August Argyll came down; he was amply supplied with "waged men" and ammunition by the Government. Attacking the slender peninsula of Kintyre, where Sir James was, on both sides from the sea, Argyll drove the Macdonalds out, and followed Sir James to Isla, where he had two new fortresses. He drove the Macdonald strategist out to an island on the Irish coast; Left-handed Coll surrendered in Isla, he betrayed a number of his allies; the other Celts began to follow his example. Argyll now returned to Kintyre, and reduced the remnant of the Macdonalds there, while Sir James fled from Ireland to Spain; in fact, most of the leaders remained at large. Argyll very patriotically kept the waged men for six weeks at his own expense, and he had now put down for ever the Macdonald revolt in the south-western Highlands, Isla, and Kintyre. He left "ragged ends" of the task to be trimmed, but his Scottish creditors were pressing him hard, and he returned to his English and Catholic wife, who presently converted him from the errors of the Kirk, so that he was obliged to go into exile on the Continent.

His son was the celebrated Gillespie Grumach, "gleyed-eyed Argyll," who burned the Bonnie House o' Airlie, was the foe of the great Montrose, and lost his head at the Restoration. This distinguished Presbyterian leader appears, from his portrait, to have been by no means so grumach or "gleyed" as tradition avers. Sir James dwelt abroad for ten years, and ended his days among his beloved books in England.

The chiefs of the old Icolmkill statutes now renewed their declaration against imported wines and in favour of education. On the whole the result was the relative tranquillity of Kintyre and Isla, and the increase of the Campbell power (which henceforth was Whig), at the expense of the Macdonalds.

These movements in the tiny outlying Celtic principalities were not really unimportant. More than once in later national history the preponderance of the Campbells over the Macdonalds and Macleans turned the delicately poised scales of fortune in favour of the Kirk or of the house of Hanover as against the Stuart dynasty. The measures taken for quieting the Highlands and Isles included a system of bands among the Inchcolme chiefs, as they may be called, guaranteeing the good behaviour of their clans. The chiefs themselves (including Clanranald, and the MacLean representatives) were to make an appearance annually before the Council in Edinburgh, and were also to "exhibit" some of the most potent cadets of their houses. The old rules against "sorners," men living at free quarters, were enforced. Probably these were muscular idlers, of course of good family, who were supported by their hosts, now as useful fighters, now as kinsmen, now from timidity, while the ancient Celtic custom which entitled chiefs, tanists, bards, and others to free entertainment gave a kind of sanction to the usage. The chiefs were bidden to reside permanently at different residences of theirs, and to cultivate home farms—partly to give their idle hands something other than mischief to do, partly as an example of industry.

The Celt is naturally, or then was, rather in the pastoral than the agricultural stage of civilisation. To keep the kye, hunt the deer, and watch the eternal and beautiful passage of light and shade on the hills, the lochs, and the sea, was more congenial than to dig and plough an ungrateful soil. To counteract these sympathetic tendencies of children of nature, the chiefs promised to take home farms, or "mains," into their own hands. ("Mains" is common in Lowland place-names, as "Branxholme Mains," the "toun" or farm on the hillside above Branxholme Tower.) An attempt was made (1616) to enforce fixed rents in place of all the many forms of service, in agriculture and in war, which of old had existed in England and the Lowlands, as well as in the Highlands. But the ancient system continued to flourish, especially in Knoydart and Moydart, till the great epoch of change after 1745. The rules as to education and importation of foreign wines were re-enacted. The practice of taking "calps," or heriots, "the best beast," after the death of a tenant was denounced. They who have the power—church, chief, or democracy—usually think that the death of a man, which impoverishes his family, gives a happy opportunity to add to their distress by taxation.

The affairs of Lochiel, still an outlaw for the lesson he read to the Glen Nevis Camerons, were complicated by a dispute with the Mackintoshes about certain lands. This matter provided a good running feud, in which occurred that slaughter of the Mackintosh branch of Clan Chattan which caused the saying, "Cat-skins are cheap to-day." Lochiel, at considerable cost, reconciled himself to Huntly by a cession of the superiority over certain estates, but, as late as 1720, the exiled James VIII. had to settle a feud between the Gordons and Camerons which grew up out of this arrangement.

The outlawed Keppoch, for his part, joined Sir James Macdonald in Spain, whither (1618) the now Catholic Argyll had also wandered. In his absence the chiefship of the Campbells was put in commission—Lundy, Lochnell, Ardkinglas, Kilberry, and others being the managers. Among them was Macdonald of Largie, in Kintyre, one of the few Macdonalds whose representative still retains the ancient property in Kintyre. Argyll having been perverted, Sir James Macdonald and Keppoch were recalled from Spain by the king; Sir James died in London (1626), Keppoch was permitted to go home. The MacIans of Ardnamurchan, hard pressed by the Campbells, took to piracy, but were put down by that son of Argyll, Lord Lorne, who was afterwards the famous Presbyterian Argyll, Gillespie Grumach (1625).

At the time of the death of James VI., when our volume closes, the northern and island branches of the House of Somerled, the Macdonalds of Sleat, Glengarry, and Clanranald, with the Campbells, were the most powerful Highland clans, while the Mackintoshes held more sway than the elder Clan Vourich (Macphersons) over the septs of Clan Chattan. The troubles of the reign of Charles I. and the Restoration alternately elevated or depressed the Campbells and the Macdonalds.

A most disturbed district of the realm lay in the remote domains of the Earl of Orkney. The Earl was a son of that Lord Robert Stewart, commendator of Holyrood, who had vainly warned Darnley to fly from Kirk o' Field, vainly admonished Morton to escape his impending doom. This Lord Robert was a natural son of James V., a natural brother of Queen Mary, so that his son, the Earl of Orkney, was no distant cousin of the king. He seemed to derive his genius from a far more distant collateral, the famous Wolf of Badenoch. He dwelt in great pomp at Kirkwall, with a regular guard of musketeers, which his sovereign might have envied; he had a fleet, and his oppressions are said to have been exercised "under a shadow of the Danish law." The bishop expected to keep him in order was Law, who, in his day, had trouble with the impetuous and learned Calderwood, the preacher and historian. By 1608 the Earl had been "put to the horn," for which he cared very little, on account of his oppressions. James rebuked the Council for not being energetic in the matter in 1608.<sup>21</sup> They replied that, as James knew, "they had no forces to send to Orkney" to make the said Earl conformable. He was only at the horn for a civil cause.

James made it criminal in case the Earl did not appear before them in March 1609. The Earl did appear, and was warded in Edinburgh Castle, July 1609.<sup>22</sup> But he had left kinsmen in Orkney as unruly as himself, while only less trouble was given by his neighbour and feudal enemy, the Earl of Caithness. In January 1610, Law, as bishop, had received a commission like that of Bishop Knox in the Western Isles. The Earl made plausible offers, which were rejected; his brother James and other kinsmen were apprehended. Things did not improve; to cut the Earl off from communications with his people he was confined to his chamber in the Castle, and was very destitute. In May 1611 the Danish laws in Orkney were abrogated by proclamation, and the Earl's deputies were dismissed. At the end of August he was allowed to dwell, under heavy caution, within four miles of Edinburgh. Meanwhile Bishop Law had been doing his best in Orkney, but Robert Stewart, bastard of the Earl, had proclaimed his own authority as soon as the bishop's back was turned.

On December 6, 1611, the Privy Council considered the grievances of the Orcadians. They were, it seems, forbidden to help shipwrecked vessels,—no great hardship to wreckers,—to carry law cases beyond the island courts, to cross ferries without a passport, and were subject to capricious confiscations. These ill customs were to be abrogated.<sup>23</sup> In February 1612 the Earl was removed to Dumbarton Castle, and in October Parliament annexed the lands of Orkney to the Crown. Law was appointed administrator. In January 1613 Robert Stewart, the Earl's bastard, promised never to return to Orkney. By May 1614 he had broken parole, and was setting the heather on fire in the islands. In August the Earl of Caithness was empowered to restore order, and appeared with ships and guns before Kirkwall. The siege lasted till the end of September, when the place surrendered; the walls were strong, the cannon balls of the besiegers "were broken like golf balls, and cloven in two halves," writes Caithness. Robert Stewart was removed to Edinburgh. He was tall, handsome, and only twenty-two, so he had public sympathy at his trial (January 5, 1615).

Some of the retainers of Caithness were on the jury; many of the others were burgesses of Edinburgh. They unanimously found Stewart and his associates guilty, and the men were hanged. A month later the Earl was tried for collusion with his son, convicted, and beheaded. The names of the associates of Robert Stewart are Low-land, unless Halcro be Scandinavian. The destroyer of the Earl, Caithness (a Sinclair) had himself betrayed his kinsman, the Lord Maxwell who murdered the Laird of Johnston under trust, and was a notorious ruffian. He later tried to drive the Forbeses out of Caithness by destroying their crops, and was a kind of land pirate. He lost the sheriffship of Caithness, and a warrant to pursue him was granted to his own son. Calderwood seems to grudge at the execution of the Earl of Orkney, who, he says, did not even know the Lord's Prayer. But Calderwood never, perhaps, approved of any measure of James, and public sentiment, in all classes, was averse to capital punishment when it was richly deserved by a noble. The plan was now to revile James for not punishing violence, now to rail at him when he did. There can be no doubt that "Earl Pate" was an ambitious tyrant, with dreams, perhaps, of a separate principality. The Orcadians were a peaceful people, probably they were as much wronged by Caithness as by their Earl, but they disliked "foreigners" —officials brought in by the central Government. Their old Scandinavian tenures and habits of wrecking were disturbed, and we receive the impression that the Claud Halcros were for the Earl, and that the complainers against his rule may have been the Yellowlees (to cite examples from "The Pirate") of the period. But perhaps older Lowland settlers, who called themselves "The Gentlemen of Orkney," had become fond of Scandinavian institutions. They are Douglases, Grays, Sinclairs, Mowats, Gordons, with only Halcro, who was pardoned, to represent a Norse element. But, of 200 who signed the Band with Robert Stewart, only seventeen names, including initials, are given.<sup>24</sup> Whatever the rights and wrongs of the natives, the question of Orkney was settled. Later the Orcadians gave very weak support to the great Montrose in his final fight and defeat.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER XX.

<sup>1</sup> Privy Council Register, vol. vii. viii.

<sup>2</sup> Pitcairn, iii. 28-52, the Trials of Maxwell. The details are in the "Tales of a Grandfather."

<sup>3</sup> Pitcairn, iii. pp. 4, 5.

<sup>4</sup> Privy Council Register, vi. pp. 8-10.

- <sup>5</sup> Privy Council Register, vi. pp. 24, 25.
- <sup>6</sup> Thorpe, ii. 784.
- <sup>7</sup> Pitcairn, ii. pp. 431, 432.
- <sup>8</sup> In the Privy Council Register, viii. p. 219, is a note of January 5, 1609, charging MacIan of Glencoe with the murder at Glenfruin of forty poor persons "with his own hand." This is cited by Pitcairn, ii. p. 431.
- <sup>9</sup> Pitcairn, ii. 434, citing Erskine, Birrel's Diary, and Calderwood. Birrel calls this a "a Hielandman's promise."
- <sup>10</sup> Privy Council Register, vi. 558, note.
- <sup>11</sup> Privy Council Register, viii. lxxviii. lxxix.
- <sup>12</sup> Privy Council Register, viii. 742 et seq.
- <sup>13</sup> Privy Council Register, ix. 26-30. •
- <sup>14</sup> Privy Council Register, x. (1613), 819, 820.
- <sup>15</sup> Privy Council Register, x. 186-191.
- <sup>16</sup> James Primrose, ut supra; Gregory, pp. 346, 347.
- <sup>17</sup> James Primrose, ut supra.
- <sup>18</sup> Privy Council Register, x. 715.
- <sup>19</sup> Gregory, p. 354.
- <sup>20</sup> Pitcairn, iii. 17, 18.
- <sup>21</sup> Privy Council Register, viii. 529, 531.
- <sup>22</sup> Privy Council Register, viii. p. 312.
- <sup>23</sup> Privy Council Register, ix. 297.
- <sup>24</sup> Pitcairn, iii. 293, 294.

CHAPTER XXI.

SOCIAL CONDITIONS.

SOME idea of the social condition of Scotland may have been gathered from the pages of its general history. It could not be called happy, if compared with that of England. From the Orkneys to the Oykel, one set of feuds was raging; others were active from the Lewes to Kintyre; others from the Borders to Peebles, Hawick, and Biggar. Where there happened to be no great feud, involving every family of the gentry, the minor lairds were fighting among themselves. There were constant sieges and burnings of houses, from the great castle to the little peel tower. Gentlemen who could not easily come at each other in the country, where every man of note rode with a company of steel-clad horsemen, would meet in Edinburgh, in silks and satins, and fight it out with swords and pistols, or simply assassinate each other without warning. Long after Douglas of Parkhead speared Captain James Stewart in the lonely vale of Catslack, he was himself stabbed in the back, near the Cross of Edinburgh, by a Stewart of Arran's kin (July 1608). This was a scene in the long vendetta of Lord Ochiltree against the house of Torthorwald, Parkhead having married an heiress of the Carlyles, and so obtained the Torthorwald title.

In the volume of the "Privy Council Register" for 1613, ten years after James ascended the throne of England, we have a list of running feuds. There are forty-two feuds, exclusive of the Highlands and Islands, and these are not feuds of the sweeping character of Huntly versus Argyll, or Stewart versus Hamilton. For example, we have a feud between Ker of Yair, on Tweed below Elibank, and the small but warlike burgh of Selkirk. From Selkirk to the pleasant house of Yair is about three miles across the hills, and the common land of the burgh "marches" with Yair (the author conceives) on the Linglee. The provost and burgesses yearly "rode their marches" in a festive manner, as they still do, but Andrew Ker, thinking that they trespassed on his heather, planned to lie in wait for the citizens, "where upon some inconvenients will not fail to fall out," as the Privy Council observed (1613). The Council tried to smooth matters down, vainly. The people of Selkirk had, and probably have a common herdsman to look after the kye of the burgesses on the common, as the citizens of Glasgow also used at this period. This herdsman, and several citizens, vi et armis took 300 cattle, and pastured them on the lands of Yair. The usual repartee was to hough the cattle, but Ker of Yair does not seem to have adopted this course.

The provost of Selkirk was not a man of mild measures. In August 1613 he was Scott of Haining, the estate lying just outside the town. He was "kinsman of the bold Buccleuch," and his deputy on the Border at the time of Kinmont Willie. This gentleman arrested a woman and her son, from Leith, on suspicion of stealing cheese, and tortured them with cords, "for moving of them to confess the truth." Haining was let off for this outrage on paying a small fine. The burghs at this time preferred to elect country gentlemen as their provosts, to secure leadership in private war, and the backing of a clan. The Yair and Selkirk feud was a branch of the old Scott and Ker feud, and thus things were so arranged that simple burgesses had their share of the universal fighting, beyond what they could get by merely "whin-gering" each other in the market-place, as in the case of Provost Dickson of Peebles. We even find a "sometime minister" entering a house in full armour, and beginning to shoot with pistol and musket. There were feuds within clans, as of Ker of Grange and Ker of Ancrum. In Galloway matters passed busily, Gordon of Lochinvar having a feud with Kennedy of Bargany and Vaus of Longcastle. Even in civilised Fife, the focus of godliness, Lundie of Lundie was at war with Wood of Largo.

A feud which was remarked on, even at that time, as exemplary, was the Auchendrane affair. In 1597 John Mure of Auchendrane, in Ayrshire, was a gentleman much looked up to in the district for the fairness and sagacity of his judicial decisions as bailie of Carrick. He had married a daughter of Kennedy of Bargany, who was on ill terms with Kennedy of Colzean. Auchendrane was also dissatisfied with Colzean, and so was the Master of Kennedy, brother of Lord Cassilis, the head of the Kennedys. Auchendrane, the Master, and the Laird of Dunduff, therefore, made up their minds to have the blood of Colzean. We need not enter into the merits of the quarrel. On New Year's day, 1597, Colzean was to dine, in the town of Maybole, with Sir Thomas Nisbet, and was to sleep in his own lodgings. Knowing this, Auchendrane with a party of friends hid among the trees in Nisbet's garden, and, when Colzean was walking through to his rooms, they fired a volley at him, missed him, hunted him vainly, and attacked his lodgings. Colzean, therefore, took proceedings against Auchendrane with such vigour that he was alarmed, made peace, and married his eldest son to Colzean's daughter. Before this, however, Colzean had wrecked Auchendrane's house and garden, which, it is to be feared, rankled in his mind.

In May 1602 Colzean was going to Edinburgh on legal business. Anxious to oblige, he sent a retainer to Auchendrane, asking the laird to meet him, if he had any affairs which Colzean could transact for him in the capital. If so, the laird would find him next day at Duppie, near Ayr. The servant missed the laird, who was absent from home. He therefore asked Mr Robert Mure, the schoolmaster at Maybole, to write the message in a letter to the laird. Mure complied, and sent the letter by a schoolboy, William Dalrymple. The laird was found with Mure of Cloncaird, and on reading the letter he bade the boy carry it back and say that he had not found Auchendrane at his house. He and Cloncaird then summoned a few friends of the right sort, lay in wait where Colzean was to pass (as he had informed Auchendrane), and found him riding with only one servant. They slew Colzean with swords and pistols, and took 1000 merks in gold, his gold buttons, and the rings which he wore.

This incident was only part of a very flourishing feud, in which Auchendrane induced young Kennedy of Bargany to try to destroy the house of Cassilis, of which he was the senior cadet. Bargany, consequently, had ridden past Cassilis's gate without making a call. The Earl, "resolving to die rather than digest that public indignity," assembled two or three hundred of his friends in arms. Bargany also raised a force, and attacked Cassilis, whose men lay in cover, their front protected by ditches. In attempting a charge, poor young Bargany was shot, and Auchendrane, advancing with great intrepidity, was severely wounded. It is believed that his failure after this to shoot the Earl of Cassilis irritated him, and induced him to murder Colzean, as has already been narrated. His retainers, who took part in that exploit, were outlawed, but the laird boldly offered himself for trial. Evidence was lacking, and Auchendrane's offer of trial by combat was not taken up by any of the kinsmen of Colzean. But a dangerous witness was Dalrymple, the schoolboy who had carried Colzean's letter informing Auchendrane that he was to be at the place where the laird murdered and robbed him. Young Colzean was known to be interrogating this lad, whom Auchendrane therefore first immured, and then sent to Arran, afterwards packing him off to fight under Buccleuch's colours in the Low Countries. Six years later "the eye of God conveyed Dalrymple back to Ayr." The laird then bade one Bannatyne bring Dalrymple to him, at night, on the sands of Girvan, where young Auchendrane strangled the lad, and tried to bury him in the sands. The water frustrating this purpose they threw the corpse into the sea, whence, a few days later, it was cast up on shore and recognised.

As this darkling and cruel murder, if brought home to the Auchendranes, was of a type reckoned discreditable, the Auchendranes were advised by friends to commit some ordinary crime, and fly the country on the strength of that misdeed. "It was fitter they should kill Hew Kennedy of Garrishorn" (a retainer of Cassilis), "for divers probable quarrels which they had against him." This was the advice of a cousin, and Auchendrane recognised that it was both kindly meant and, in effect, judicious. Any trouble caused by the murder of Hew was such as their kindred could sympathise with, openly abetting and sheltering them. The Auchendranes, therefore, armed themselves with sword and pistol, and, finding Hew alone, attacked him. However, Hew nearly cut off young Auchendrane's hand, and was victor in the engagement. The wisdom of the king now gave Lord Abercorn a commission to apprehend old Auchendrane, who shipped Bannatyne, the witness to the Dalrymple murder, off to Ireland. He then went boldly to his trial, but failed under examination. James now ordered torture to be applied to young Auchendrane, who, with extraordinary fortitude, was silent. Public opinion, naturally, was now favourable to young Auchendrane. After all, on the worst view, he had done nothing, it was said, to harm "the person or estate of the king." He ought to be released on heavy bail. But, though the Privy Council pled for this, Dunfermline, backed by the king, was firm, and kept the accused in prison by sheer use of the royal prerogative. The king "may retain in ward any of his subjects, who in his conscience he knows deserves the same."

Meanwhile Abercorn in Ireland caught Bannatyne, the witness in the Dalrymple case, but, on a point of honour, let him go. But Bannatyne knew that old Auchendrane had been trying to get him murdered in Ireland, so he came in and confessed. Both Auchendranes, confronted with Bannatyne, maintained their innocence. A trial was now resolved on, and the general public maintained that Bannatyne ought first to be tried alone. If convicted, and if he confessed and clave to his confession on the scaffold, "that might put them in some opinion of Auchendrane's guiltiness." For similar exquisite reasons Mr Bruce, the famous preacher, wished James to hang Henderson, the witness in the Gowrie case. But this logic was faulty; on the scaffold George Sprot maintained his confession as to the Gowrie conspiracy, without converting a single sceptic. On July 17, 1611, the three "panels" were tried, convicted, and executed. They were undeniably guilty, but, setting Bannatyne aside, the evidence (the depositions are lost) was circumstantial, and the long detention and torture of young Auchendrane, with some informalities in the trial, increased public sympathy for these typical old Scottish malefactors.

It is never easy to be certain as to the rights and wrongs in family bickerings, like these discords among the Mures and Kennedys. No doubt there was something to be said on both sides in a quarrel which goes as far back as the roasting alive of the Commendator of Crossraguel by an Earl of Cassilis, soon after the Reformation.* The Earl had, before Colzean's murder, been on bad terms with his brother, who was a friend of the murderer Auchendrane. In September 1602, however, the noble brothers were reconciled on the following basis:—The Earl was to give his kinsman and his accomplices a yearly pension of 1200 marks, "good and thankful payment," as soon as he takes Auchendrane's life, "beginning the first payment immediately after their committing of the said deed. . . . And hereto we oblige us, upon our honour."<sup>1</sup>

These things were done in a region which, from the dawn of the Reformation, had been peculiarly enlightened, having profited by the ministrations of the martyr, George Wishart. The clergy, however, appear to have been on the side of Auchendrane. In February 1604 Lady Colzean, widow of Auchendrane's victim, "pursued the Presbytery of Ayr for not observing the order kept by themselves, and all other Presbyteries against notorious malefactors." The Presbytery made an exception in favour of her husband's murderers, "against whom they have neither used censures nor admonitions, but refuses to do the same." The Council ordered the Presbytery to excommunicate the murderers, a sensible outrage on the freedom of the Kirk.<sup>2</sup> This Lady Colzean had been the divorced wife of Logan of Restalrig, the laird connected with the Gowrie conspiracy: she did not find the west of Scotland a more peaceful and friendly place than the east.

* See Appendix, "Gowrie and Restalrig."

Among the most usual causes and consequences of feuds was the destruction of the crops and the houghing of the cattle of persons occupying lands to which other persons had, or pretended, a claim. A laird or yeoman would collect his friends in arms, make a raid on a neighbouring estate, injure the cattle, thrash out the corn, or trample down the growing crops, and drag the women about by the hair of the head, pistolling or stabbing all who made resistance. Cases of this kind occur in scores. Home of Rentoun was mixed up in the affairs of Logan of Restalrig, and appears to have been one of those who acquired forged documents from Sprot, the Eyemouth notary, implicating Logan in the Gowrie affair. These were to be used to terrorise Logan's executors after the laird's death in 1606. The children of Logan, though his heirs were forfeited in 1609, seem to have pretended some rights over "the tithe sheaves and other tithes of Horndene," which, after the forfeiture of Logan's heirs (1609), had been granted by the Crown to Alexander Home of Rentoun, a cousin of the Earl of Dunbar.<sup>3</sup> Consequently, in August and September 1616, Alexander Logan, son of the late Restalrig, "armed with sword and dagger, and two pistols on his person, and a hagbut" (musket) "in his hand, went to the barnyard of Horndene, violently caused a large quantity of corn to be threshed which had been lawfully arrested by the plaintiff, and placed there till the sums due to the plaintiff had been paid, and caused the said corn to be carried by night to Norham, and other places in England, to be disposed of there at his pleasure." Moreover, Alexander Logan was backed by one of the Chirnsides, old allies of the wicked laird, by a retainer of the Earl of Home (his uncle), and others, to the number of forty. "All armed with swords, gauntlets, forks, lances, etc., and carrying pistols and hagbuts, they went to the lands of Horndene, and violently collected the teind sheaves thereof." The plaintiff, Rentoun, sent William Lindsay (an official messenger), and his own retainer, William Home, to execute a legal summons against Alexander Logan, but he crossed the Tweed into England, and sent back Chirside and another to search for and slay William Home. The defenders did not appear, and were ordered to enter themselves at the prison of the Tolbooth. Probably they did not accept this invitation, and the tradition of the Logan family is that their ancestor settled in England till these affairs were forgotten.<sup>4</sup>

This typical instance of what was always going on may be interesting as an example of hereditary lawlessness. Alexander Logan chassa de race. But even preachers were not exempt from human frailties. On the page of the "Register of the Privy Council," which tells of the feats of Alexander Logan, we read that the Reverend Mr Thomas Moir, minister of Morebattle, invaded the lands of Toft, armed with a pitchfork, and attacked Andrew Ker and George Pott. He wounded Pott in the face, and cast a cartload of corn into the river. Ker was the son of Sir John Ker, and Mr Moir challenged him to single combat, which Ker refused, "not through fear, but through reverence of the law," and no doubt of the cloth. Mr Moir then took to him other devils, worse than himself, including a William Logan, to the number of twenty, all armed; they went to the barn of Cowbog, stole corn, and nearly killed Wattie Pott, who attempted to resist them. This was the plaintiff's version, but Mr Moir said that the case was the reverse, several persons, under Andrew Ker, invaded him, threw him down, and jumped on him. This was on September 3, 1616, the day before Mr Moir's alleged raid of Cowbog. The lords appear to have let both parties off, and one gathers that there were faults on both sides. On the whole, neither the preaching of the word nor the king's forty mounted police had made Scotland a peaceable, orderly country. Violence was the rule rather than the exception, to judge by the number of cases recorded even in counties like Ayrshire, Berwick, and Roxburgh.

The craftsmen, in towns, occasionally mutinied against the magistrates. In Stirling (1616) the bailies described the craftsmen as "seditious, restless busybodies, bound in a factious and mutinous society." They usually held "indignation meetings" every Monday, and set down acts and statutes of their own, tampering with the lawful weight of bread, and banding together to refuse to pay the stipends of the minister and the schoolmaster. Education and religion they regarded as luxuries for which they declined to be taxed. No decision of the Town Council was accepted by the Monday meetings upon the hills; a man was a man for a' that, and why should he obey the bailies? They actually proposed to carry the king's standard at the wapinschaw instead of their own; they rioted in arms, opened the gaol and let loose the prisoners, and generally proved that the democratic doctrines of the Scots are not (as has been vainly alleged) an invention of Robert Burns.<sup>5</sup>

In the matter of private morals the Kirk, where she was strong, as in Fife, did her best. The Kirk-Session of St Andrews has bequeathed to the ages a Register, edited by Dr Hay Fleming. Hence we gather that some stubborn souls would persistently make merry at Christmas, "keeping great Yules," as was the habit of the truly unregenerate Laird of Restalrig. On Trinity Sunday, too, the populace danced and piped, at least at Raderny. They were cut off from baptism, and holy communion, and marriage till they made satisfaction; but marriage was a "benefit of the Kirk," which too many parishioners were more than content to do without. They were more easily tamed by being shut up in the kirk steeple, where witches were often incarcerated. "Sins of uncleanness," says Dr Hay Fleming, "were still fearfully prevalent." The unclean used to be let off with a 40s. fine, but Mr Black (famous as the occasion of the Edinburgh riot of 1596) was much more severe. The swain, for his first offence, had to pay £40 (Scots) to the poor, "or eight days." For the second, his fine was much increased, and his head was shaved, rendering him "not one to be desired" by the sex. For the third he was still more heavily fined, ducked thrice (the sea being convenient), and banished. An offender against the seventh commandment was pilloried, the students and populace, stern moralists, pelted him with rotten eggs, and he was well ducked. He had also to do penance at the kirk door, barefooted and in sackcloth, and go to catechism, "till the Kirk be satisfied." During the next three years only five adulterers offended, or were caught, at all events. During Mr Black's last year there was not a single case of lawless love "before the Session." But, by 1599, the brethren found that "the syn of fornicatioun and huredom did grytlie increse." Indeed, the staple of the Register is lawless affection and Sabbath-breaking. Nobody was allowed to be seen out of kirk "in tyme of sermone," and the thirsty had to walk to Leuchars (three or four miles) and tipple there. The popular idea of a holiday is to go and get drunk somewhere else. Mr Black, be it observed, was rather an extreme disciplinarian, and publicly remarked that "a great part" of the ministers "was worthie to be hangit." After his removal Calderwood said (about 1613) that he himself saw more people skating, curling, and sliding, at all events "amusing themselves on the ice," than in church on a Sunday. Dr Hay Fleming shows that Calderwood must have been unfortunate.

In 1746 the Chevalier Johnstone found that the seed sown by the exemplary Mr Black had borne fruits of righteousness. The chevalier was escaping from Culloden, but could not induce any one to let him hire a horse on Sunday. They say grace before they take a pinch of snuff, he says, and he regards St Andrews as a great deal worse than Sodom and Gomorrah, being a nest of sanctimonious hypocrites. The chevalier was a Jacobite, and much depends upon the point of view. According to Dr Hay Fleming, and we cannot have a better guide, the Kirk-Sessions did not wait, in cases of ungodly speaking, kissing and wrestling in the streets, cards and dice, manslaughter, witchcraft, and so on, till a public slander arose. Literally "from pitch and toss to manslaughter" the Sessions dealt with all enormities. "Not only was it the duty of the elders and deacons to report transgressions, but special steps were taken to ferret out gross sins that they might be repressed." The elders would seem to have been Peeping Toms.

Of witchcraft we have elsewhere spoken. The fear of witches seems to have been a curious epidemic, raging now here, now there for a time, and then abating. Geneva exceeded in witch-burning before the Reformation, but the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries were the most furious in this absurdity. In Scotland we hear very little of witch-burning before the Reformation, indeed, before the time of Regent Murray. In England the Puritans encouraged and Bancroft mocked at these practices, which were much stimulated by the precept and example of James VI. As a rule, charges of witchcraft rested on the belief in the evil eye, and on the assertions of young people suffering from hysterical disorders. But the witches probably believed in their own powers, and practised folk-medicine aided by popular charms in rhyme, derived from the old faith. They also worked by "sympathetic magic," they told fortunes, dealt in curses, and, under torture, repeated, in Germany as in Scotland, folk-tales about fairy-land and the Fairy Queen, or about the devil. Hysterical diseases are still inexplicable enough, the belief in the evil eye still flourishes, folk-medicine and charms are still in use, isolated cases of second sight occur, and all the elements of witchcraft live on in Scotland as in England. Only the law, fortunately, has been altered, much to the regret of John Wesley at the time. The old law applied to Bothwell (Francis Stewart) was the occasion of his extraordinary career of rebellion; and it lent colour, or was intended to lend colour, to the charges against the young Earl of Gowrie. He carried a written talisman which came into the hands of that Lord Cromarty who was still alive in 1713. Similar talismans, found in an old house, have lately been exhibited to the author. Belief in the efficacy of such things was very common on the Continent as well as in Scotland, as common as among the Greeks settled in Egypt, with their magical papyri.

While everything joyous that could be called a rag of Popery was put down, it is curious to find that the observance of Lent, as far as abstinence from flesh is concerned, was enforced. This was not for religious, but for supposed sanitary reasons. "Seeing that, in the spring, all kinds of flesh decays and grows out of season, and that it is convenient for the commonwealth that they be spared during that time, to the end that they be more plenteous and cheaper during the rest of the year," butchers and others were forbidden to slaughter in Lent. This was a standing Order of Council, and was intended not only for the benefit of the "bestial," but to encourage the fishing trade. Perhaps Lent originally arose before Christianity, in the opinion that meat is out of season in spring, and was merely adopted and sanctified by the early Church, like many of her other feasts and fasts. We have not observed that the preachers raised their voices against Lent as a survival of Popery. That sanitary conditions were not good may be inferred from the edicts against keeping swine in the basements of houses in Edinburgh, and against piling up dunghills and heaps of refuse in the streets. Dunbar, long before, and Smollett long afterwards, satirised the abundant filthiness of Edinburgh. When plague appeared, as it often did, infected families in the capital were obliged to go and camp on the Burgh Moor. "Every one," says a contemporary, "is become so detestable to every other, and specially the poor in the sight of the rich, as if they were not equal with them, touching their creation." In 1584 the plague appeared in Perth; in May it reached Edinburgh; the king flying from it to what had been Gowrie's Castle of Dirleton, near North Berwick, then possessed by that Arran (Captain James Stewart) who was the instrument of the death and forfeiture of Gowrie. All fled who could; some 1400 died, says the diarist, Birrel. There is a blank in the St Andrews Register for nearly a year, "all gude ordour ceasit in this citee." The evil was attributed to the banishment of the Presbyterian leaders, with the Lords of the Raid of Ruthven, and it ceased as soon as they returned, in November 1585, at the raid of Stirling. Winter weather perhaps depressed the plague germs, and Presbyterianism triumphant may not have been the cause of the improvement. The returned nobles rode through a town almost untenanted; then Border ruffians robbed the very pest houses, but were no whit the worse. Returning from banishment with the Ruthven Lords, James Melville breakfasted at Restalrig (Logan being a Gowrie man, and hospitable), and entered Edinburgh. Riding in at the Water Gate, through the High Street, and out at the West Port, "in all that way we saw not three persons, so that I miskenned Edinburgh, and almost forgot that I had ever seen such a town." The survivors had fled to lonely country places; like Bessy Bell and Marion Gray in the ballad—

*They biggit a bower on yon burn-side,
And theikit it ower wi' rashes.*

The absence of statistics makes it impossible to conjecture the extent of the injury done by the plague or pest, by other epidemic diseases, and by the perpetual murders and manslaughters, to the population of the country. It was an age of large families; the losses of pest and war were soon recovered. Scotland had more population than means of employing her children. They bore arms for most of the European powers, the Continent was crowded with our Dalgettys. Not content "To fecht the foreign loons in their ain countrie," they also fought each other on alien shores. In the Gowrie tragedy we find mention of a Captain Ruthven, who carried to Lady Gowrie, from the Earl's hunting quarters in Atholl, the news that he "was to come." Captain Ruthven is mentioned only on this one occasion in the proceedings, but, on June 20, 1600, seven weeks before the slaughter of the Ruthvens, we find that he had been brawling abroad with his own countrymen. One William Little described to the Privy Council a skirmish which he had viewed at Dantzic, "the sun shining on a fair day." Two Scots, Greir and Bain, were "playing at the cables" near the harbour, when Bain gave the lie to Greir, and Greir "gave Bain a cuff." Captain Ruthven took the side of Bain, and Captain Maxwell avowed himself the partisan of Greir, whom Bain stabbed from behind. Ruthven declared that the stroke was fair (though that was not the opinion of William Little), and he would "defend his opinion as a soldier." Captain Maxwell thereon borrowed a sword from one Cunningham, and approached Ruthven, saying "thou shalt have one." Ruthven lunged thrice at Maxwell, and said, "Thou hast enough." Maxwell answered, "Not so much as you think"; the point, perhaps, had merely grazed his ribs. Ruthven struck again, Maxwell riposted, and Ruthven, who was wearing "mules," or thin shoes, fell. Maxwell made as if to strike him where he lay, when "a little Highlandman," Duff, smote Maxwell from behind, crying to Ruthven, "Rise up, master, for he has enough." This combat was at "the Douglas Port," which seems to imply that there was a Scottish quarter in Dantzic. The end was that a corporal, Wallace, came with a halbert and protected Maxwell. The other witnesses were all burgesses of Edinburgh, except Crawford, servant to a famous rich burges named Macmorran. Except Greir, nobody is said to have been killed, nor do we find that any measures were taken against Ruthven, who seems to have returned to Scotland, and appears, for a moment, in connection with the Gowrie tragedy.<sup>6</sup>

The religious persecutions drove a Puritan, like Andrew Melville, to Sedan, and many Catholics to the foreign universities. The trading Scots formed communities of their own as far off as Poland, keeping up their religion, and organising themselves under their own bye-laws. They were not more popular in Poland than the Jews. We hear little of wider range of adventure to "the Indies" or America. Logan of Restalrig, after the Gowrie collapse, took a share, with Lord Willoughby, in a ship that was to sail to "the Indies," with the laird as skipper, but he never set out, and we do not know how the venture fared: the death of Lord Willoughby (1601) may have put an end to the project.<sup>7</sup> At home the prices of articles of utility were regulated by the magistrates or the Privy Council. Boots and shoes were declared to be far too dear, and the price was lowered. The Lothian coal-owners held a meeting and raised the price of coal; the Council put it down again. The exportation of coal was usually prohibited, but the king would grant a privilege of exportation to a favourite. The bonnet-makers of Edinburgh and the Canongate quarrelled over their respective rights, but foreigners who could teach improvements in cloth-making were entertained at the expense of the country. Foreigners, also, took the lead in silver- and lead-mining. There was gold-mining in Meggatdale, in the Glengaber Burn, which flows into Meggat Water on the left hand. Gold is still found in that burn, but not in remunerative quantities. The author has reason to believe that gold is not the only mineral treasure of Glengaber. Hilderston, in Linlithgowshire, was a centre of silver-mining, and Thomas Foulis was busy with processes for converting lead ore into litharge, white and red lead, and ceruse. He was a goldsmith, which usually involved being a banker, in Edinburgh. The export of eggs was denounced as "most unlawful and pernicious," and the invention of curing red herring led to a good deal of litigation. The sale of tobacco was prohibited, "a weed so infective as all young and idle persons are in a manner bewitched therewith, the taking whereof being a special motive to their often meetings in taverns and alehouses" (May 22, 1616). But this prohibition merely led to a monopoly granted to a Captain Murray.

As to coinage, fraudulent "hard heads" were a standing grievance. Huntly offered James £40,000 for the privilege of coining 10,000 stone of copper, but this kind of and amount of "Wood's half-pence" was judged to be too colossal an experiment. Foreign gold coin was decried and ordered to be brought into the mint (1613). Among foreign coins in circulation were "the auld Rose noble, the Harry noble, the Portugal ducat, and the French Harry ducat"; of native coin we hear about "the queen's portrait with the naked craig" (Mary Stuart in a low dress), and "his majestie's ducat with the bair heade." The relative value of the money of the age to the money of to-day is a topic too minute and difficult. Dr Masson concludes that a sum of Scots money can be brought to the contemporary English level if divided by twelve. The Earl of Orkney, in prison, had an allowance of £4 Scots per diem; in England this would have been six shillings and eightpence. Logan of Restalrig gave Sprot £12 as an instalment of hush money. That was £1 English, and Logan said that it would buy two "bolls" of corn.<sup>8</sup> Dr Masson thinks that any sum then could purchase at least four times as much in commodities as at present. Huntly's rental, in money, was £3000 Scots, equivalent, in purchasing power, to £1000 sterling at present on this calculation.<sup>9</sup> His "ferm victual" was about 4000 bolls, two bolls being, on Restalrig's theory, worth £1 English, and if the pound had four times the present purchasing value, Huntly's rents in kind greatly exceeded his rental in specie, while he got 3231 "kane hens," and vast quantities of other produce. In 1602 he was able to build a magnificent new house at Strathbogie.<sup>10</sup>

With all their comparative wealth in produce the nobles were very poor in money, hence the facility with which they were bought and bribed on every hand, and hence their greed for monopolies and English places. Hence, too, from the lack of bullion, arose the system of commercial taboos intended "to keep money in the country." "To import a commodity, unless by exchange for some native commodity" (such as red herrings), "meant to export gold and silver for purchase of the import, and, as wealth consisted in the possession of gold and silver, this was always a damage to the commonwealth." On the other hand, the exportation of native commodities—coal, corn, pig-iron, and so forth—was often under taboo, and an economic authority informs the world that "pig-iron is the test of a nation's progress." If you may not export your staple commodities (for that raises their price at home), nor purchase imports with bullion (for that sends money out of the country), it seems as if you could scarcely have any commerce at all, and as if trade must have been pure smuggling. The preachers added a taboo of their own against dealing with idolaters, like the Spaniards, but the trading classes disregarded the pious restriction.

The leather trade (which Mr Robert Louis Stevenson describes as peculiarly precarious) passed through a crisis in 1617-1622. The shoemakers complained of the execrable quality of Scottish leather, and the tanners admitted that their leather, in truth, was very bad. A committee decided that "the country was very far abused in the barking of their hides," but the Town Council of Edinburgh urged that the Privy Council had no right to bring in alien tanners to teach Scotland how to tan. That was matter for the king and Parliament. However, eight tanners were fetched, and Lord Erskine, son of the Earl of Mar, obtained a patent in the leather trade, and furnished the capital. Naturally the English tutors in tanning (seventeen in number) did not lead happy lives, and now the boot and shoemakers resisted the very reform for which they had clamoured. They raised the prices of boots and shoes inordinately, which is perhaps the reason why the less opulent classes only wore shoes on Sundays. Such was the crisis in the leather trade.<sup>11</sup>

It will surprise no one to hear that what soap was used in Scotland was foreign soap, and that bad, probably adulterated, so that foreigners "cannot abide the smell of the napery and linen clothes washed with this filthy soap." A Mr Udward obtained a patent for soap-making, to the prejudice of the Flemish article. The king is also said to have put a prohibitive tariff on Dutch golf-balls, greatly to the benefit of the native manufacturer. If the author may hazard a conjecture, it is that the golf-balls of the period (like those used at the jeu de mail) were made of wood. Lord Caithness describes the cannon-balls at the siege of Kirkwall as breaking in two, "like golf-balls." Now a feather golf-ball, such as was used in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, cannot break into two fragments, as a gutta-percha or a wooden golf-ball does. Hence we may infer that the golf-balls of King James's reign were wooden. Glass-making and sugar-refining, as well as cloth-making, tanning, and soap-boiling, were all improved, and were subjects of careful attention to the king and Council. A machine for transporting coal from the pit-mouth was invented, a kind of tram perhaps. English beer was introduced (and adulterated), and native beer improved, to lessen the demand for foreign wines. The local single ale cost a penny (English) the pint (the Scots pint), containing about three English pints or more. The best native double ale was the "tippenny," or two shillings Scots, and one of the grievances of the saints in the Bass, under Charles II., was that they had "to pay at a sixpenny rate for a pint o' the tippenny yill." The Celts, of course, already got drunk on whisky and eau de vie.

Imports, naturally, were "nearly ten times as numerous as exports." Arrows, baskets, beads, beer, bows, bricks, brushes, carpets, caviare, chairs, chessmen, chests, cloth, combs, dolls, drugs, ivory, furs, garters, gloves, glue, groceries, jew's-harps, muskets, pistols, silk, spectacles, surgical instruments, swords, tin, tobacco, thimbles, vinegar, viols, virginals, and wines (French, Rhenish, Levantine, and Spanish), were among the imports. How they were paid for is a mystery of political economy; for the most part, perhaps, in red herrings. There was not always and universally a taboo on exporting coal, corn, and other commodities. Salmon was a staple; and, in short, though we can scarcely tell how, Scotland obtained her imports. Probably the laws were defied or evaded. At this period, judging by the case of Stirling and of Perth, where the town sent out 800 men to resist depredations by Lord Scone, and by various accounts of the troubles in Edinburgh, the craftsmen were numerous, well-to-do, and turbulent on occasion. The tillers of the ground not only suffered from the raids and feuds, but, as a rule, were subject to summary eviction, and held their crofts for brief periods on precarious tenure. We have elsewhere given examples to prove this, and the preachers constantly insisted on the merciless oppressions of the lairds.

The class of farmers called "kindly" or "native" tenants had tenures less uncertain, and enjoyed recognised rights which they could sometimes be persuaded to part with for various considerations. After the Gowrie affair, when Logan of Restalrig took to selling his lands (to avoid forfeiture, as was believed), he "came to Edinburgh for redemption of the lands of Flemington from the goodwife of Peilwalls." Lady Restalrig (Logan's wife) said, "This is but vain labour, for I am sure if it were in the laird's hands it would not bide long unsold." "And Bower" (alleged to have been Logan's go-between with Gowrie) "said to the laird, as we thought by way of pretence, 'It were better, sir, that you should let the honest folk brook their land, and take the old offer that they offered you long ago, than to wreck them and remove them, for they are native tenants.'" This is a statement of Sprot, the fraudulent notary, who forged the plot-letters of Logan: the passage is in the Haddington MSS. The goodwife of Peilwalls, as a kindly or native tenant, had a tenant right over part of the lands of Flemington, which Logan wished to clear off before selling the estate. According to Sprot, he made that ingenious man forge a document to further his purpose. The facts illustrate the relatively secure position of tenants, kindly or "native," who, of course, were no longer the nativi, or serfs, of our earlier history.

How rich ladies lived we learn from a curious and then popular play, "Philotus" (1603). One publisher, dying at about this time (1600-1610), had 500 copies of "Philotus" in stock. The piece turns on the desire of a rich old man to wed a pretty girl. He sends a woman to point out the advantages of the match. Every day shall be comfortable.

Your fire shall first be burning clear,
 Your maidens then shall have your gear
 Put in good order and effeir,
 Each morning ere you rise.

And say, lo, Mistress, here your mules,
 Put on your petticoat or it cools,
 Lo, here one of your velvet stools
 Whereon you shall sit down.

Then two shall come to comb your hair,
 Put on your headgear soft and fair,
 Take there your glass, see all be clear,
 And so goes on your gown.

Then take to staunch the morning drouth,
 A cup of Malmsey for your mouth,
 For fume cast sugar in at fouth,
 Together with a toast.

Three garden gulps take of the air,
 And bid your page in haste prepare
 For your disjune some dainty fair,
 And care not for no cost.

A pair of plovers piping het,
 A partridge and a quaily get,
 A cup of sack, sweet and well set,
 May for a breakfast gain.

Your cater he may care for syne
 Some delicate against ye dine,
 Your cook to season all so fine,
 Then does employ his pain.

So the day goes on, with eating, drinking, dressing, music, and for exercise, walking up and down a green alley: the last collation is taken with Rhenish wine,

For it is cold and clean.

Velvet hats, gold embroideries, hoods of state, are dwelt on, and

Your mask when ye shall gang to gait
 From sun and wind, early and late,
 To keep that face so fair, a precaution common even in the eighteenth century. Chains of Paris work, carcanets, velvet, silk, satin, damascene, are all offered, velvet shoon, silken stockings, "all your fingers full of rings, with pearls and precious stones."

Sweet heart, what further would you have?

The lady very briefly replies in the spirit of the song,

What should a young lassie do wi' an auld man?

Beyond this point her remarks are too candid and explicit for reproduction by a writer of the opposite sex.<sup>12</sup> The play has little merit beyond that of nimble rhyme, and is founded on a novel by Barnaby Rich.

What did people read in these days? We have the reply to this question in the wills of several Edinburgh printers and publishers. These documents contain lists of the persons who were in debt to their booksellers. They are chiefly college men and ministers. We find both Andrew and James Melville, Mr Peter Hewat and Mr Charles Lumsden (who heard Sprot's confessions as to the forged Logan letters); we find Lady Gowrie, who owed £16 : 4 : 8 to Edward Cathkin, in 1601; and we find her future son-in-law, young Tullibardine, whom she detested because he was in Perth on the fatal fifth of August, when her sons were slain. Scarcely any lairds appear to have been book-buyers, no nobles are in the lists, and, except Lady Gowrie, only one lady, Helen Rutherford. The king, however, is on the lists, and perhaps the gentry usually paid ready money; if not, they were not book-buyers, though tradesmen and the clergy patronised literature. Two curious facts are demonstrated, "the very large impressions of books then printed," and "the way in which these copies have almost wholly disappeared." Setting aside Bibles and psalm books and school books, we find that Bassandyne had 510 copies of Sir David Lindsay's poems, while the romance of "Grey Steil" existed in large numbers. Among the most popular books were Sir David Lindsay's Poems, Blind Harry's "Wallace," Henryson's "Testament of Cressid," Rollock's Sermons, "Valentine and Orson," "Guy of Warrick," "The Palace of Pleasure," Sir Thomas Elyot's "Governour," "Gargantua," Sir John Mandeville, "Squire Meldrum," "Bevis of Hampton," "Winter Nights"; the rest are, for the most part, theological books and editions of the Latin classics. "Philotus" appears to be the only contemporary work in verse which had a considerable sale. One does not observe a "Faery Queen," or any of the books of the great Elizabethan poets. On the whole, though considerable numbers of books were bought, literature in Scotland must have been a starveling trade early in the seventeenth century. The Greek classics, too, scarcely appear in the booksellers' lists.

To give a complete account of the universities is not possible in this place. The King's College of Edinburgh made up the number to four—St Andrews, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Edinburgh. There were frequent visitations of St Andrews by royal commissions. The place, freely robbed at the Reformation, and unsettled by many years of turmoil, could not be in a satisfactory condition. The University had but three colleges, St Salvator's, St Leonard's, and St Mary's, of which Andrew Melville was Principal, assisted by his nephew James. The commissioners of April 1588 were addressed in this colloquial style of royal impatience, "It is most difficult in this confused time, when all folks are looking to the weltering of the world, to effectuate any good common work . . . and specially where ye are not certainly instructed, and has no great hope of thanks for your travail; however, seeing things are so far proceeded, do something, for God's sake! . . . I have mair writing concerning thir materis of the Collegis nor I wald get red my self this XV dayes, albeit I had little other thing ado," goes on King James. It is not the author's intention to inflict on himself or the reader the information which was too much for King James. Knowing St Andrews fairly well, the king says to his commissioners, "Forbid thair quarrelling . . . Albeit it is not forbid that they flyte (scold) yet forbid fechtung, or bearing of daggis (pistols) or swerdis, sending of cartels, or setting up of pasquils."

The commissioners found that the bursar of the New College "hes maid na compt," and that all the finance was disorderly. Of five Masters of Arts who should have lectured, only three were busy, the other two, not receiving any salaries, "refused to come." Andrew Melville lectured daily on the Psalms in Hebrew, from five to six in the morning, Mr John Robertson dealt with the New Testament in Greek. Patrick Melville lectured in Ecclesiastes. A Mr Robert Hamilton had dilapidated (or embezzled) the scholarship founded by the Laird of Moncrief. (The Scots name is "bursarship," not scholarship, and a bursar is not a bursar in the Oxford sense, but a scholar.) At St Salvator's the Provost treated the finances with a free hand, and gave in no accounts. The Provost affirmed that he lectured; the ministers declared that he did not lecture once a month. Mr Wellwood averred that he lectured, the Provost said that he lied. The plague had scattered Mr Cranstoun's class, so he taught grammar to the Earl of Cassilis, he who made the murderband against Mure of Auchendrane. The physics of Aristotle were lectured on daily in Greek; the first class read Isocrates, Aristotle, and Homer. At St Leonard's abundance of Aristotle, including the Ethics, was read, in Greek, one hopes. The lecturers disliked teaching grammar; everywhere they wished to begin with a form, or class, and conduct it through the whole course, whereas the law insisted on yearly change of masters.

Further examination at St Mary's, or "the New College," proved that the bursar had a receipt for his accounts, which he was said not to have presented. It was signed by James Melville and another, Andrew being absent through troubles with the king. But as to the receipt, James Melville said that "they were forced to give it, or otherwise the house would have been skailit," or dispersed. At St Salvator's some of the financial documents were lost, and others were buried "in ane kist under the erth, and lang thairefter found be chance, bot that the evidentis" (the documents) "was altogidder consumed thairin." The number and complexity of quarrels in St Salvator's (where the Provost declined to recognise the lecturers in law and mathematics) were beyond belief. Scholars were elected without examination. The Provost averred that the College had no common goods, except eighteen silver spoons, of recent make. The late Mr William Cranstoun had embezzled £10,000 of common property. A quarter of the cloisters and the great hall were ruinous. In short, the University, except for the Melvilles and one or two others, was a den of thieves, and college meetings must have been lively.

In 1597 a new commission "put at" Andrew Melville—unjustly, say James Melville and Dr M'Crie. Spottiswoode takes the opposite view, and so does the Blue Book of the period, recorded in the third volume of the "Commission on Scottish Universities" of 1837 (p. 197). "Mr Andrew Melville found by voting that he has not performed the office of a rector in the administration thereof, to the ruling and ordering of the University." He had not conformed to Act of Parliament and the reformed constitution. A new constitution was proclaimed. Robert Rollock and the useful Patrick Galloway, with Lennox and some local lairds and others, were in the commission. In 1597 Andrew Melville was not likely to get fair play. He was deprived of the rectorship. Mr Wellwood, a Melvillite, was also ejected. At that time, as in Glasgow still, there were examinations upon the "black stone." A seat with a stone in it still exists at Glasgow, a black capping stone at St Andrews. Is this a relic of fetishism? James made presents of books, and it was thought desirable to have a library to put them in. St Mary's was in ruins, and the men lived in lodgings in the town. On the whole the University of St Andrews, though frequented by members of the noblest families, was disorderly, ruinous, impoverished, and rent by quarrels theological, political, and personal. This was not for want of learning. His worst enemies did not contest the erudition of Andrew Melville, and gentle King Jamie himself had more Greek and Latin than all the later occupants of the British throne could muster among them.

But the nature of the times did not permit the quiet necessary for academic life. Melville had to be fighting the battle of freedom in every direction. The University, like the State, was devoured by feuds political, religious, and personal. In an age of plunder it is clear that several of the authorities robbed the University, a practice which survived deep into the nineteenth century. The marvel is that, in these distracting circumstances, classical learning was so infinitely more abundant in Scotland than it is at the present day. If Arran, a soldier of fortune, had not only Latin but Greek in plenty, it is no marvel that men of less tumultuous lives were well read in the classics.

In poetry the Latin muse attracted the Scots much more than the muse of the vernacular. Melville was a considerable poet in Latin, so were Sir Thomas Craig, Sir Robert Ayton (a pleasing writer of English verse), Jonston, Hercules Rollock (an imposing name!), and Hume of Godscroft, the historian of the house of Douglas, a Protestant dealer in politics, an uncritical historian, but a very pleasant character. It is astonishing that Godscroft, living so near the time of the events, should believe, for example, that after Riccio's murder Morton returned from English exile before the birth of James VI. No reliance can be placed on Godscroft where "a Douglas or a Douglas's man" is concerned. But how amiably and with what fairness he writes on Mary Stuart:—"Concerning that princess, my heart inclineth more to pity. I see good qualities in her, and love them; I see errors, and pity them; I see gentleness, courtesy, humility, beauty, wisdom, liberality—who can but affect these? If they be carried to inconvenience who can but lament it? In that sex, in that place, in that education, in that company; a woman, a princess, accustomed to pleasure, to have their will, by religion, by sight, by example, by instigation, by soothing, and approbation! Happy, yea, thrice happy are they who are guided through these rocks without touch, nay, without shipwreck." What more can history say about the unhappy queen? Darnley's murder is "that fact so lamentable, which I can never remember without affliction."

There were, doubtless, many gentlemen like Godscroft, humane, learned, and gentle; but they do not often appear among the political leaders or the infamous secondary characters of the political drama. Of the Archibald Douglasses, John Colvilles, and Logans, of the spies, and traitors, and high-handed ruffians we know much, but little of those who, in an age of perfidy and violence, were eminent for benevolence and virtue. How the distracted Scotland, torn by family feuds, ungoverned, unpoliced, could ever have reached a milder civilisation, except by way of the union of the Crowns and English influence, does not appear.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER XXI.

- <sup>1</sup> Pitcairn, iii. p. 622.
- <sup>2</sup> Privy Council Register, vi. 603.
- <sup>3</sup> Spottiswoode, iii. 289, citing Register of the Privy Seal, lxxviii. 1609, 1610.
- <sup>4</sup> Register of Privy Council, x. pp. 642, 643.
- <sup>5</sup> Privy Council Register, x. pp. 630-633.
- <sup>6</sup> Privy Council Register, vol. vi. pp. 856, 857.
- <sup>7</sup> Haddington MSS.
- <sup>8</sup> Haddington MSS.
- <sup>9</sup> Register Privy Council, vol. x. Introduction, p. lxxxvi.
- <sup>10</sup> Gordon Papers. Spalding Club Miscellany.
- <sup>11</sup> Register Privy Council, xii., pp. v.-xiii.
- <sup>12</sup> Philotus, 1603, Charteris, Edinburgh, and Bannatyne Club, 1835.

APPENDIX A.

THE CASKET LETTERS.

THE letters which Mary is said to have written to Bothwell, before Darnley's murder, and before her own abduction, were the only direct proof which her brother and (if she really was guilty) her accomplices could bring against her. When Mary surrendered at Carberry (June 15, 1567), and when the Lords had shut her up in Loch Leven Castle, utterly immured from the world, they needed something to justify their conduct in the eyes of Christian princes. What they needed they got with almost miraculous promptitude. On June 19 a servant of Bothwell's, named George Dalgleish, was sent by his master from Dunbar to Edinburgh Castle. Bothwell had stored his title-deeds and other objects of value in the castle, and had entrusted the command of the fortress to his creature and accomplice, Sir James Balfour, an elder of the Kirk, and, of old (1547), a fellow-captive of Knox in France. But, even before Carberry, Balfour had been won over from the cause of Bothwell and Mary by Lethington, who deserted Mary's cause just after she had saved his life from Bothwell. On the arrival of Dalgleish to remove Bothwell's property from the castle, information was sent to Morton, who was at dinner with Lethington. Then, according to Morton's sworn declaration, search was made for Dalgleish; he was found, was examined, and, on threat of torture, gave up a small silver-gilt coffer or casket, bearing the crown and cypher (F, in the new "Italian" hand) of Francis, Mary's first husband. On June 21 the box was broken open in the presence of Morton, Lethington, and various members of the Privy Council. A messenger, George Douglas, one of Riccio's murderers, was at once sent to carry a letter of Lethington's to Cecil, and a verbal narrative to Robert Melville, then representing both Mary and her opponents, at the Court of Elizabeth.

It is impossible to doubt that the verbal message was a report on the contents of the silver casket, which, on June 21, had been inspected by the persons who opened it. No reference is made to the subject in the minutes of the Privy Council of June 21, and no inventory of the contents of the casket was made, or, at all events, was produced. We have only Morton's word for the nature and number of the papers found, and for the fact that he preserved them without adding or taking away any article. At a later date, Randolph (October 15, 1570) avers that Lethington and Balfour opened a small coffer, "covered with green" (cloth or velvet) in the castle, and removed the band for Darnley's murder, and Drury mentions (in October 28, 1567) the same abstraction. This was done, if Randolph is right, in the castle, before the casket reached the hands of Morton, supposing it to be the same casket. The contents, as described by Morton, and as exhibited to the English Commissioners at York and Westminster in 1568, were eight unsigned and undated and unaddressed letters, averred to be from Mary to Bothwell, two marriage contracts between them, and a sequence of love poems, more or less in the form of the sonnet. The Spanish ambassador in London, de Silva, heard from the French ambassador that, in June–July 1567, copies of the papers were given to du Croc (the French envoy with Mary) to take to France. Of these, no more is known; they have not been found in French archives, nor are they cited in French despatches. When versions of some of the letters were published abroad with Buchanan's 'Detection' (1571–1573) we never hear that the French Government made any allusion to the copies carried in July 1567 by du Croc. This must be remembered when it is suggested that, in 1568, a letter may have been shown, which differed from a letter alleged to have existed in 1567.

In July 1567, Throckmorton, then in Scotland, was informed by the Lords that they had evidence of Mary's guilt in her own handwriting. Again, de Silva, the Spanish ambassador, in July 1567, elicited from Elizabeth the statement that she did not believe in the letters, and that, in her opinion, "Lethington had behaved badly in that matter." I suspect that Robert Melville, who was much attached to Mary (though he was acting for the Lords), may have suggested these ideas to Elizabeth, on the first receipt of the news about the casket. It is plain that the Lords had really discovered the casket and some papers. The only apparent opportunity for tampering with them in any way, before they were seen by Morton on June 21, was that enjoyed by Sir James Balfour and Lethington, while the casket was still in the castle. Afterwards, of course, the Lords could do as they pleased, till May–June 1568, when Murray sent John Wood, with Scots translations of the letters, to Elizabeth. Whether she and Cecil, or others, saw these translations does not appear to be certain. If Cecil and Elizabeth did see these Scots translations, in the summer of 1568, and if these versions varied from those later produced, the reader must estimate for himself the chances that the English Queen and her minister would draw attention to the differences. In December 1567 the Scottish Parliament was informed that the Lords possessed guilty letters of Mary's "written and subscribed with her own hand." As the extant copies of the letters are not "subscribed" or signed, much has been built on this point by Mary's defenders. In the Act of Parliament the phrase "signed" or "subscribed" is withdrawn. The point is not worth wrangling about; the former statement, that the letters are "subscribed," is probably a mere misdescription. There was no difficulty in forging Mary's signature, had that been thought advisable by her accusers. It is not absolutely clear that the letters were inspected in this Parliament. We might gather that this was done from a later protest of the Lords of Mary's party (September 12, 1568). They speak of "her Majesty's writing produced in Parliament," and then go on to say that no "plain mention" of Darnley's murder is made in the letters, even if written by Mary's hand, which they are not. Moreover, "some principal and substantial clauses" have been garbled by the accusers. This is very obscure. The letters are not in Mary's hand, yet, if only some clauses are garbled, the substance, though not in the Queen's hand, is apparently admitted to be of her composition. The argument seems to be that the accusers, possessing genuine letters of Mary's, have had the substance copied in imitation of her writing, with additions and alterations. The Lords, it seems, could only assert all this, if they had seen and read the letters, in Parliament. If they did, and if, when the letters were published in 1571–1573, they varied from the letters read in Parliament, we might expect Mary's friends to point to the variations as a proof of dishonest usage. We do not find that this was done. But it is conceivable that the protest of Mary's Lords, in September 1568, was worded by Lesley, Bishop of Ross.

Mary had denied the authorship of the letters, and asserted that there were men and women in Scotland, "and principally such as are in company with themselves," who could counterfeit her hand.<sup>1</sup> Her Lords may have put forth their plea without having inspected the letters closely, but the letters were certainly produced in Parliament, whether studied there or not. And there is no later trace of any hint, on Mary's side, that either the copies given to du Croc, or those produced in Parliament, were not identical with the letters afterwards printed and published. Lesley, or any other pamphleteer on Mary's side, if in possession of copies of the letters as produced in Parliament in 1567 (which he may not have been), ought to have insisted on any changes in the letters as later published. That this was never done is a powerful though perhaps not necessarily a conclusive argument against a theory now to be mentioned. There are traces of the existence, in 1567 and 1568, of a letter attributed to Mary by her enemies, at that time, but never produced by them.

This curious matter stands thus: Murray was in France at the time of the discovery of the casket—June 20-21, 1567. On July 8, 1567, Robert Melville, who had returned to Scotland, sent one John a Forret to Cecil. John is to go on to Murray, and a packet of letters for Murray is to be forwarded "with the greatest diligence that may be." It once occurred to me that John a Forret might be John Wood, a great ally of Murray, but more probably he was Forret of Forret in Fifeshire. Murray arrived from France into England on July 23. He saw de Silva, the Spanish ambassador, who on August 2 wrote to Philip of Spain.<sup>2</sup> De Silva says that Murray told him something that he had not told even "this Queen" (Elizabeth). Mary, he said, was certainly cognisant of Darnley's murder. Murray then cited what, he declared, he had heard about a letter of Mary's "from a man who had read it." Here we have only de Silva's report of Murray's oral version of an oral account of a letter of Mary, as given by a man who "had read it." One might suppose that in the packet of letters sent to Murray from Scotland,<sup>3</sup> on July 9, would be transcripts of the Casket Letters opened on June 21. To send to Murray a mere oral report in a messenger's memory seems a strange proceeding. However, de Silva's account of Murray's repetition of the other unnamed man's version of a letter which he "had read" exactly answers, in essentials, to Lennox's account, written in 1568, of the same letter.

It is not likely to be denied that Lennox, in 1568 (say July or August), and Murray, in July 1567, have a common source for their description of a letter never produced against Mary. In that source, Mary is represented as arranging the explosion at Kirk o' Field for the night of Bastian's marriage. She is made to urge the "dispatch" of Bothwell's wife, by poison, or divorce. In both versions, there is danger that Darnley's "fair words" will make her relent. Murray does, and Lennox does not, speak of a design to poison Darnley at a house between Glasgow and Edinburgh. Lennox does, and Murray does not, make Mary say that she wishes Bothwell "in her arms," a phrase which occurs in Casket Letter ii. The other items quoted occur in no Casket Letter. Whence did these items come? Possibly Murray, in July 1567, told to Lennox—but more copiously—what he had told to de Silva, that is to say, a report, from memory, of an oral report, from memory, by a man who, having read Casket Letter ii., made divers fanciful and exaggerated additions. That is conceivable, strange as it may seem that the Lords, when writing to Murray, on July 9, 1567, did not send transcripts of the Casket Letters, but trusted to the memory of a messenger. In that case, Lennox, in July 1567, may have at once written down what Murray told him, and copied it out in a document of a year later. Lennox's document of seven folio pages is undated. I put it about July or August 1568, partly because it purports to be an indictment of Mary's conduct towards Darnley. It is in English, with corrections in Lennox's own hand, it is not in Scots. It is the first of a series of similar documents, of which the last was read by Lennox to the English Commissioners at Westminster in December 1568. It may be urged that the document, like a large memorial picture of Darnley's murder, painted for Lennox in the beginning of 1568, is a mere record, which he might write for English readers at any time earlier than July-August 1568; and on no better evidence as to the letter than Murray's oral report.

The reply to this is that Lennox's long document contains divers strange "sayings and speeches" of Mary to her closest personal attendants. Now, as late as June 1568, Lennox was writing to ask his friends to collect "the sayings of her servants and their reports." When he wrote the long paper in which he cites the letters attributed to Mary, he had got the "sayings and speeches" for which he was writing, from Chiswick, on June 11, 1568. Some delay must have occurred before he received these reports from Scotland, because the letter of June 11, in which he asks for them, was intercepted by Mary's party, and now occurs among the manuscripts of the house of Hamilton. It follows that the vast paper in which Lennox cites the letter attributed to Mary by Murray, but never produced, cannot be earlier than July 1568. Still, it may be said, Lennox may be only quoting Murray's verbal communication of July 1567. It may be so, but, even by June 11, 1568, Lennox was in company with, and was working with, Murray's agent, John Wood, who had in his keeping Scots translations of the Casket Letters. In writing to Scotland, on June 11, 1568, Lennox employed Wood, or his secretary, as his amanuensis. This is clear, for, on June 12, Wood wrote letters to Scotland from Greenwich, and those letters are in the same hand as Lennox's epistles of the previous day.<sup>3</sup> Thus we see that, before Lennox wrote his paper of seven pages, against Mary, in which he cites a letter attributed to Mary, but never produced against her, he was in close contact and collaboration with Wood, who had the Scots translations of the Casket Letters, as they then stood, in his possession. Is it likely that he did not communicate their contents to his ally, Lennox, the father of Darnley? If he did, Lennox quotes a letter then officially attributed to Mary, a letter which, though of essential value to the prosecutors, was later dropped by them. It was either too bold a forgery, or implicated some of the guilty men who became Mary's accusers.

That a letter attributed to Mary, and containing matter not to be found in any of the Casket Letters, really did exist, may be inferred, not only from the citations of Murray and Lennox, but from the 'Book of Articles.' This is the long indictment of Mary, whereof the manuscript is now in the British Museum: it was published by Mr Hosack. We have seen, in the text, that no endorsement nor authentication proves this document to contain the "articles" produced against Mary at Westminster, in December 1568. It is an arraignment of Mary; it is in an official Scottish hand of the period, recognised by Mr Bain as that of Alexander Hay, clerk of the Privy Council. If this be not the official and final indictment of Mary, no other is known to exist (except a draft in the Cambridge MS.). To reject the Book of Articles as dubious and unofficial is, perhaps, to show a scepticism not wholly unbiassed. In any case the document avers that Mary, "from Glasgow, by her letters and otherwise, held Bothwell continually in remembrance of the said house," namely, Kirk o' Field. Now, in the Casket Letters, Kirk o' Field is never once mentioned. The writer says that she is bringing Darnley to Craigmillar, "if I hear no other matter of you" (Letter i. English translation). "He is to take physic at Craigmillar" (Letter ii. English translation). The only hint that might be regarded as pointing to Kirk o' Field is "of the ludging in Edinburgh," one item in a list which is found in the Scots but not in the English version of Letter ii. On the other hand, the letter described by Murray and Lennox does allude to "the house where the explosion was arranged," to "finishing the place and everything as they had desired." Now the writer of the "Articles" had Letter ii. before him, yet, like Lennox in his long paper of seven pages, he insists that Mary's letter kept harping on "the house in Edinburgh," which, in the Casket Letters, she does not, though, in the Murray-Lennox version, she does. Therefore the writer of the "Articles" had seen a Casket Letter, never produced, a forgery.

This matter of a letter, cited by Murray and Lennox, and clearly present to the mind of the writer of the Book of Articles (whether that be final and official or not), is an example of the delicately balanced problems in the case. Did Murray and Lennox cite a forged letter? Did they merely repeat, at a long interval, the same confused and exaggerated oral report about a letter? In questions like these, disputants will vote according to their prepossessions, or will reserve their judgment. The letters may be genuine throughout, but nobody who has watched the conduct of Mary's opponents will be apt to deny that they were capable of forging, garbling, and suppressing documents. Some topics, causes of much ingenious writing, may be brushed aside. The letters produced as Mary's were certainly in French, and not in the French of the versions later published in France, these being translations from the Scots versions, or from the Latin versions of the Scots versions. This is proved by extant copies of the original French at Hatfield, and in the Record Office.

Again, as to the dates: The chronology of Letter ii. cannot be made to fit with the list of dates and events in the paper called "Cecil's Diary." But it is always a possible, though a rather desperate argument, that "Cecil's Diary," or 'Journal,' is not official; that the prosecutors had a better scheme of chronology—which has vanished like their hypothetical better Book of Articles. Moreover, I have elsewhere worked out a plausible system of dates for Mary's movements, into which the Glasgow letters (i., ii.) easily fit. Again, the internal chronology of Letter ii., written on two nights, is dislocated. But this, as I have shown, may be easily explained if we suppose Mary, on the second night, to have written by accident on the clean side of a piece of paper, whereof the verso contained some lines written on the previous night, but left standing by the translators.<sup>4</sup>

There remains the difficulty about Crawford. He was in attendance on Darnley during Mary's visit to Glasgow. On December 9, 1568, he put in, before the Commissioners at Westminster, a deposition, done into English out of a version written by him in Scots. It contained, first, a report of a conversation between Crawford himself and the Queen, as she was about to enter Glasgow; next, a report of a private talk between Mary and Darnley. This talk Darnley repeated to Crawford at the time, and Crawford swore that he then, at the moment, wrote it out for Lennox. On June 11, 1568, Lennox wrote to ask Crawford for the first part of this deposition (made on Dec. 9, 1568), namely, as to the talk between himself and Mary. This part Crawford in January 1567 did not write, but told to Lennox, if he communicated the fact at all. For the second part, the conversation between Mary and Darnley, Lennox did not ask. The inference is that Lennox already possessed the document which Crawford swears to having made "immediately at the time," that is, about January 25, 1567. Now Crawford's accounts of the two conversations are so verbally identical with these which Mary is made to give to Bothwell in Casket Letter ii. that Crawford's and Mary's versions must have one common source. Either Crawford borrowed his facts and phrases from Letter ii., or Letter ii. is, so far, a forgery based on what Crawford wrote for Lennox in January 1567, and on what he wrote in answer to Lennox's inquiries of June 11, 1568. What he then wrote, in 1568, having probably told it orally to Lennox in 1567, tallies verbally with the corresponding passage at the opening of Letter ii. Therefore it seems that all this portion of Letter ii. is forged on the model of Crawford's statements. If Crawford did not deliberately perjure himself, if he really did write an account of the conversation between Darnley and Mary in January 1567, if he gave it to Lennox, for whom it was written, and if Lennox kept it (we have seen that he asked for nothing of this kind when collecting information in June 1568), then Letter ii. contains elements of forgery. The two Glasgow letters are much the most important. What difficulties obscure our view of them we have made apparent.

Of the other letters, one (iii.) implicates Mary in an alleged but very dim attempt to embroil Darnley with her brother Robert. Another (iv.) concerns a maid about her person, who, if not carefully treated, may reveal something. Letters v., vi., vii. were written, or we are to suppose that they were written, in April 21-23, 1567, and bear on Bothwell's abduction of Mary. Of these, vi. is suspiciously like a mere précis of a long excuse of Mary's conduct, written in Scots, probably by Lethington, and sent to the Bishop of Dunblane, then in Paris, in May 1567.<sup>5</sup> Letter viii. fits into no known moment in Bothwell's relations with Mary, and is written in an affected or alembicated style, not customary, perhaps unexampled, in her epistles. On the side of the authenticity of parts, at least, of the letters, is the tone of humility and dependence which Mary later adopted, in her letters to Norfolk, when he and she intended to marry. The expressions of remorse and loathing of her task, in Letter ii., also seem almost beyond the power of a forger to conceive, but many critics are of an opposite opinion. Our impressions are merely subjective. As to the sonnets, it is not easy to guess when, if genuine, they were written. To an English reader their passion appears overpoweringly natural and unfeigned, and their inartificial laxity and roughness may be the result of rapid and excited composition. On the other hand, a French critic, Monsieur de Wyzeva, avers that, to a French ear, the "tone" is not French, and that both sonnets and letters are the work of a person who thinks in English (or Scots); also that this "tone" is not that of Mary's genuine writings in the French language. These are impressions which a foreigner cannot criticise.<sup>6</sup> As to the question of the possibility of forging, without detection, the handwriting of the Queen, the letters were never submitted to experts—merely to a throng of English Lords in the course of a short winter day. In the case of the Logan-Gowrie letters (Appendix, pp. 569-575), we find such an extraordinary example of skilled forgery, by a rural practitioner in a small way of business, that a successful imitation of Mary's large Italian hand seems well within the resources of the art. Examples which, probably, would deceive any modern critic, were designed by Mr F. Compton Price, and are published in the author's "Mystery of Mary Stuart." It seems possible that even if the original Casket Letters were to be discovered, and compared with Mary's authentic handwriting, we might come no nearer to a solution of the problem; though, in the Logan case, the forgery is detected.

Here we must leave this much debated question, on which conviction can hardly, perhaps, be attained by a perfectly fair and unbiassed student. As the evidence stands, the letters could not be founded on by a jury; and the author himself, while unable to reject the testimony of all the circumstances to Mary's guilty foreknowledge of, and acquiescence in, the crime of her husband's murder, cannot entertain any certain opinion as to the entire or partial authenticity of the Casket Letters. Mary was never allowed to see the originals. Her denials were persistent. Yet, if guilty, there was no reason why she should not deny much more openly, loudly, and pertinaciously, above all, after the death of Paris, the alleged bearer of the missives (August 1569). He was gone; he could not be heard; and his confessions were not produced against the Queen, but were deliberately suppressed by Cecil. In 1582 Mary was declaring the letters to be forgeries, and was anxious to procure them. Bowes, too, the English ambassador, was attempting to obtain the letters for Elizabeth, "for the secrecy and benefit of the cause." Why "secrecy"? The letters were in the hands of the Earl of Gowrie: he would not give them up; he was executed for treason in 1584, and we hear no more of the letters and the casket.<sup>7</sup> "Secrecy," so desirable, may, of course, here mean secrecy from friends of Mary who were anxious to destroy the letters. But it may also mean that the more they were known, the less would they injure Mary or benefit Elizabeth. Thus, to every inference there is always a counter inference, and the business of the historian is to state each, and rely on neither of the alternatives.

<sup>1</sup> Goodall, ii. 342, 343, 388, 389.

<sup>2</sup> Spanish Calendar, i. p. 665.

<sup>3</sup> See abstracts of all these letters in Maitland Club Miscellany, vol. iv. p. 119.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. Mystery of Mary Stuart, chap. xiv.

<sup>5</sup> Labanoff, ii. pp. 32-44.

<sup>6</sup> Revue des Deux Mondes, 1902.

<sup>7</sup> Bowes' "Correspondence," pp. 236-265.

---

APPENDIX B.

LOGAN OF RESTALRIG AND THE GOWRIE CONSPIRACY.

ON or about April 19, in the year 1608, a notary of Eyemouth, named George Sprot, was arrested. Of the circumstances we only hear vaguely, from Calderwood and Dr Abbot, later Archbishop of Canterbury, that Sprot had been babbling about his knowledge of the Gowrie Conspiracy. We have no official mention of Sprot till July 5, 1608. On that day he wrote a letter of confession to the Earl of Dunbar (Sir George Hume), who was in Scotland on the business of the Kirk. This letter, with the whole of the documents in Sprot's case between July 5 and August 12, the day of his execution, are in the muniment room of the Earl of Haddington, and have remained unknown to our historians.<sup>1</sup> The ancestor of Lord Haddington, in 1608, was Sir Thomas Hamilton, King's Advocate, one of the Octavians of 1596, an eminent historical scholar and collector of MSS. As to what befell the imprisoned Sprot between April 13 and August 5, we know from the Haddington MSS. that he had lain in the "laigh house" or dungeon on the basement of the Tolbooth, "a loathsome hole," that he had often been examined, and that he had declared Logan of Restalrig innocent of writing certain reasonable letters, apparently in his hand, which were found on Sprot's person, among his papers, or were given up by Ninian Chirnside of Whitsumlaws. On July 5, in his letter to Lord Dunbar, Sprot maintains that Restalrig was in the Gowrie Conspiracy, that he himself had a guilty knowledge of it, but that he forged the Logan letters as to the plot—that is to say, the letters then in the possession of the Government. Sprot, as we learn from Calderwood, had, at first, admitted the genuineness of the letters, and later, under torture, had declared them to be forged.<sup>2</sup>

The peculiarity of this passage in Calderwood is that it has its basis in a manuscript, of unknown authorship, now in the Wodrow MSS. in the Advocates' Library in Edinburgh (vol. ix. Rob. iii. 2, 9). The later historian and collector, the Reverend Mr Wodrow, who lived under William III., Anne, and George I., has marked this as "MS. History of the Church of Scotland from 1581-1641, I know not by whom." It is not in Calderwood's handwriting, but in another hand of the period, and is a kind of diary of events. The passage referring to Sprot is correctly printed in Pitcairn, ii. 275, but is incorrectly described as "a curious fragment." "It is evidently written," says Mr Pitcairn, "by some one who entertained ideas unfavourable to the reality of the Gowrie Conspiracy." On comparing the excerpt (not "fragment") in Pitcairn with the passage in Calderwood (vi. pp. 778, 780), it becomes certain that Calderwood's source was the anonymous manuscript now in the Advocates' Library. He takes whole passages out of it, with a few verbal changes and transpositions of sentences, all this without acknowledgment. But when he arrives at the description of the hanging of Sprot, he not only deserts but contradicts his authority, introducing new matter of his own, without giving his sources for that. Thus, his MS. source, the MS. in the Wodrow MSS., declares that, on the scaffold, Sprot "maist plainlie confessit, that he had nather promise of lyf, nather rewaird to his wyf and bairnis efter his deceas. . . ." Calderwood (who must have read this in the MS.) writes, "Notwithstanding Sprot's confessions, so many as did not believe before were never a whit the more persuaded, partly because he was a false notary, and could counterfeit so finely men's hand writs, for which cause he was worthy of death; partly because benefit was promised to his wife and children by the Earl of Dunbar, and had suffered both death and torments as a false notary."

Calderwood appears to myself to be stating these circumstances, not as facts, but as the arguments advanced by the sceptics who had to excuse their disbelief in a dying confession. After the Gowrie tragedy, Mr Robert Bruce had professed himself ready to believe the King's account, if Henderson were hanged, and adhered to his statements on the scaffold. Now Sprot did adhere to his, but, not wishing to believe them, resolute Presbyterians appear to have alleged (1) that Sprot really suffered as a forger of an every-day kind; (2) that he was induced, by promise of reward to his wife and family, and as he had to die in any case, to make a false confession, on the scaffold, of the Gowrie Conspiracy. Calderwood therefore suppresses the statement of his MS. authority that Sprot denied this promise of reward, on the scaffold. This denial is not elsewhere stated in the official descriptions. But the earlier part of the account in Calderwood's MS. authority is also absent from the official versions. That part Calderwood accepts, and reproduces as his own; what does not suit him, in the same MS. authority, Calderwood burkes and contradicts. Moreover, not a word, in the Haddington MSS. (which are private and candid), hints that Sprot was arrested for, or examined on, or condemned for, general crimes of forgery. He was arrested with pseudo-Logan papers actually in his "pocquet," and his examinations turned on no other point. So much for Calderwood. Mr Barbé, in his "Tragedy of Gowrie House" (125-131), accepts both the MS. in the Advocates' Library and Calderwood's account of "promise of benefit" to Sprot's family, without observing that Calderwood cites the MS. where it suits him, and ignores and contradicts it—always without quoting his sources—where it does not suit him. The official statements about Sprot's evidence are falsified and garbled, but Calderwood's version, when analysed, is not irreproachable. But, of course, he is not to be censured severely. It was then unusual to cite authorities, and he may have thought that his information was better than that of his author. At last, on July 5, and in subsequent examinations, Sprot averred that the letters in possession of the Council were impostures, but that Logan's share in the plot, and his own guilty foreknowledge, were actual facts.

The only letters in the case hitherto known to history are five; the originals were found by Mr Pitcairn, in the Warrants of Parliament, and were published by him in the second volume of his 'Criminal Trials in Scotland.' They were also copied into the record of the proceedings of the Scottish Parliament of November 1609. Of these five letters, dating from between July 18 and the last of July 1600, Nos. i., iii., and v. are, to one or more unknown persons, addressed as "Right Honourable Sir." One (ii.) is to James or "Laird" Bower, a retainer of Logan. One (iv.), dated July 29, 1600, is to the Earl of Gowrie. These letters indicate frankly that Logan and his correspondents are engaged in high treason. Failure means death, forfeiture, and extirpation of the names of the associates. The scheme, whatever its details, is based (according to the letters) on an incident which occurred, or a romance which was in circulation, at Padua, where Gowrie had been a scholar (1595-1598?). These five letters have been accepted as authentic beyond doubt by Mr Hill Burton and Mr Tytler, though Mr Mark Napier and others proved that they were in the highest degree suspicious. The confessions of Sprot, in the Haddington MSS., allege that Letters ii., iii., and v. are forgeries, while i. is doubtful, and only iv. (Logan to Gowrie, July 29, 1600) is admitted by him as genuine, and as his model for the fraudulent imitations. That even one letter was admitted to be genuine, Calderwood did not know. If accepted, Letter iv. suffices to establish the guilt both of Gowrie and Logan, but, as we have it, letter iv. is a forgery, whether the substance be copied from a real letter by Logan or not.

The reason why Sprot forged the three certainly fraudulent letters, and a number of others never publicly produced, was a purpose of extortion. After 1600, Logan of Restalrig sold all his estates, although the records of "hornings" for debt, in the "Register of the Privy Council," never show that he was pressed by creditors. Already, in 1596, he had sold his estate of Lower Gogar. This haste to get rid of landed property after 1600 must have aroused the suspicion that Logan feared forfeiture, in consequence of some treasonable enterprise; and that, probably, the Gowrie affair. Logan was of ancient family; he was of royal descent; his lands were Restalrig, near Leith, Flemingtoun (with a house, Gunnisgreen, near Eyemouth), and Fastcastle, a fortress of great strength, on a perpendicular cliff of the Berwickshire coast, above the northern sea. The possession of this impregnable fortalice, in a region still roadless, made Logan a useful ally in a conspiracy. His life had been passed in conspiracies. A half-brother of Lord Hume, a cousin of the Master of Gray, and of the Ogilvys and Sinclairs, a friend of the family of Gowrie's Mr Thomas Cranstoun, Logan belonged to the clique of Archibald Douglas, and the other Whittingham Douglasses, the Laird of Spot, John Colville, Ninian Chirnside, and all the southern partisans of the adventurous Francis Stewart, Earl of Bothwell. In 1586 Logan was one of the packed jury which shamefully acquitted Archibald Douglas of a part in Darnley's murder. In 1592-1594, when Bothwell was chasing the King like a partridge on the mountains, Logan was his abettor, probably harboured him at Fastcastle, and was denounced rebel for his pains. When Bothwell joined the Catholics, and deserted the Kirk, Logan did not abandon the renegade, but associated with and harboured George Ker (of the Spanish Blanks), and the Jesuit, Father Andrew Clerk. In 1599 he was charged not to yield Fastcastle to the King's rebels or enemies, and in 1599 Cecil was inquiring of Lord Willoughby, at Berwick, as to his character and position. Logan had been a pirate; a Queen's man in the castle during the last agony of Mary's party; an associate of Gowrie's after the raid of Ruthven; a spy of Walsingham's (1586-1587); an accomplice of all the perfidious Douglasses of Spot and Whittingham, and Mowbrays of Barnbogle; and, as we saw, an ally of Bothwell when Bothwell was an ally of Atholl, and of the Gowrie of the Gowrie tragedy. He was also liè with Lord Willoughby and Sir John Guevara at Berwick, the kidnapers of Richard Ashfield (1599).

With this record, it may be judged whether Logan was an unlikely man to be a conspirator. He was a neighbour to Gowrie's castle at Dirleton, close to the sea, near North Berwick, and within a short sail of Fastcastle. The lands of Dirleton (according to Sprot) were to be Logan's if the conspiracy succeeded. When we remember that, in April 1600, Nicholson had announced to Cecil that a plot by Archibald Douglas, the Laird of Spot, and John Colville was in hand; when we add that Colville and Gowrie were both in Paris in the early spring of 1600, while Bothwell was reported to have arrived secretly and to be skulking in Scotland, it may be granted that Logan was apt to be concerned in whatever enterprises of a treasonable nature were on foot. The Gowrie conspiracy failed; Logan sold his lands (this is certain), and went partners with Lord Willoughby in a ship, wherein, Sprot says, he meant to sail to "the Indies." By 1605 Logan had sold all and was a landless man. Lord Balmerino and Lord Dunbar, the purchasers of his estates, owed him 33,000 marks on the price. In September 1605 Logan went to London to try to get his money, in which he failed. He then visited France, returned in 1606, to find Bower, his trusted old servant, dead; and he died himself in Edinburgh in July 1606. His elder children, by his first and second marriages, refused to "give up the inventory" of his estate. His heir was a girl, of about four or five years of age, born of his last marriage, and the main part of her property was the money owed to her by Dunbar and by Balmerino, who, in 1608, fell from power, and was a dying prisoner.

In these circumstances, the propriety of robbing the orphan was conspicuous to all. Sprot not only destroyed the acknowledgments of debt to Logan's heiress by one Heddilstone and by Ninian Chirnside (Logan's most intimate friend, and a trusted retainer of Bothwell), but he forged the Logan plot letters, ii., iii., v., and perhaps i., and a number of other compromising papers and letters, in an imitation of Logan's hand. These forgeries Sprot sold to Heddilstone, Ninian Chirnside, the Goodman of Rentoun (Home), and others. They were to exhibit the forged documents as genuine to Logan's executors, and so terrify them into forgiving the debts owed by Logan's surviving friends to his daughter. The whole of the dead Logan's possessions would be forfeited if his connection with the Gowrie plot came to light, and thus the forged papers were much coveted by Logan's friends and debtors, and were a source of revenue to Sprot. This branch of the notary's business was, of course, destroyed by his arrest in April 1608. In July, Dunbar, says Calderwood, following his MS. authority, came to Scotland, "and caused take the said George Sprot out of ward, and cure his legs, bruised with the boots." Sprot now, on July 5 and later, confessed that the plot was a genuine plot, that Logan was engaged in it, that he himself had guilty foreknowledge, announced that he knew he must die, and deserved to die, but maintained that the plot-letters and other compromising papers, then before the Privy Council, were all forgeries. His own words are, "I confess to my own shame and God's glory, I formed and framed them all to the true meaning and purpose of the letter that Bower let me see" (Gowrie's first letter, merely asking for an interview with Logan), "to make the matter the more clear by these arguments and circumstances, for the cause I shewed to the Lords," that is, for purposes of extortion. The letter of Gowrie had been shown by Bower to Sprot "with a direction that he got from the Laird to come to him in haste for to ride in his commission to the Earl of Gowrie concerning the lands of Dirleton" (Logan's reward), "which direction to Bower is among the rest of the letters produced." Thus, on July 5, Sprot confessed that Gowrie's harmless first letter to Logan was his source, but he obviously includes what he says he knew of Logan's hope of getting the lands of Dirleton.

The letter about them (ii.) Sprot almost certainly forged, on oral information from Bower. But, as certainly, Sprot, in the recorded confessions, never mentions Letter iv., from Logan to Gowrie, till August 10. Under examination, Sprot cited the first letter of Gowrie to Logan (July 6, 1600), in which Gowrie says that Logan understands his purposes, and asks for an interview. Sprot cited various witnesses to corroborate some of his statements, but they all, very naturally, refused to corroborate, and Chirnside, with others, was long "warded" in prison. So far, the Privy Council had no valid evidence before it; only rumour, Sprot's word, contested and often demonstrably false, and the letters and papers which were confessed forgeries. On August 9 Sprot was told that he must die, and that he should see the faces of the Lords no more. He repeated that his confessions, since July 5, were true, and, in his own hand, subscribed the record of his confession "in the presence of God and his messengers, auditors hereof." The messengers of God were the Bishop of Ross, with the King's preacher, Mr Galloway, and Messrs Hall and Hewat, ministers of Edinburgh. Sprot was to see the Lords no more, but he must have sent to let them know that he had more to divulge. On the 10th of August the Lords and ministers visited him again, and, after a prayer made by Mr Galloway, he was asked, "Where is that letter which Restalrig wrote to the Earl of Gowrie, whereupon the said George Sprot wrote and formed the missives produced?" This must refer to some unrecorded statement just made by Sprot, for this letter, the now confessed model of Sprot's forgeries, has never hitherto been mentioned. In his written confession of July 5, he said that he forged the papers "to the true meaning and purpose of the letter that Bower let me see," meaning either Gowrie's first and not compromising letter, or Logan's letter to Bower, or both (No. ii.). Never before August 10 has Sprot mentioned a letter of Logan to Gowrie, as known to him, or as his model. That letter is a new feature in the case, and, on August 10, was not in possession of the Council.

Sprot was asked point-blank, after Mr Galloway's prayer, where the letter was now. He first gave an account of how he found it, unfinished, behind a bench and the wall, at Fastcastle. He must have meant Gunnisgreen, for the letter bears that date, unless, as Logan (in Letter iv.) says that he wrote it "on two sundry idle days," he began it at Fastcastle, and finished it, and, at the end, dated it, from Gunnisgreen. But Gunnisgreen was quite close to Eyemouth, where Sprot lived, and he is unlikely to have been at Fastcastle. Sprot went on to say that, months after the conspiracy, Logan bade Bower, who kept all his papers, find and bring him this letter, which had been returned by Gowrie, through Bower, according to their method of correspondence. Bower, who could not read, asked Sprot to help him to find the letter. Sprot found it, told Bower that he could not find it, and carried it off till on this Letter iv., as a model, he forged all the rest. Now this is so far true: any reader of Letters iii., v., and a torn letter in the Haddington MSS. must see that they are all mere copies of Letter iv. Except in what personally applies to Gowrie, Letters iii., v., and the torn letter say nothing that is not in Letter iv. The case of Letter i. is dubious, for reasons too minute to be discussed here. Sprot now quoted Letter iv. (Logan to Gowrie), from memory, recognisably, but not correctly. Asked if he was at last speaking the truth, as a man under the very shadow of death, Sprot vowed to God that he was. Again required to say where the letter now was, he said that "he believes it is in his kist" (chest), sealed ("closed"), "and folded in a piece of paper." Search must have been instantly made at Eyemouth for this letter, which was probably in a secret compartment of Sprot's "kist." On August 11, at a certain hour, the Council had neither the letter nor a copy of it, for Sprot now recollected, almost correctly, a passage which he thought was in a postscript. This he would not have done had the letter, or a copy of it, been accessible, for really, the passage is in the body of the Letter iv. Sprot was to die, and did die on August 12. At a certain hour on August 11 the letter had not yet arrived, for, by racking his memory, he recovered, though incorrectly, more of its contents. But before he was hanged, Sprot endorsed, in his own ordinary hand, a copy in his "course" or current hand, of Letter iv., and another of Letter i. Now Lord Cromarty, writing in 1713, at the age of eighty-three, tells us that the Sheriff-depute was instructed to search for this letter (iv.), that he found it, and that he gave it to Sir Thomas Hamilton. The copy, endorsed by Sprot, a copy not before the Council at a certain hour of August 11, was doubtless found with the alleged original (in Logan's hand or an imitation of it) of Letter iv. This endorsed copy is still in the papers left by Sir Thomas Hamilton.

Thus Letter iv., unlike the rest, is alleged by Sprot to be genuine, and the model (as it undeniably is) of his forgeries. In my opinion, Letter iv. is, at least in substance, genuine, and it suffices to prove Logan's acquiescence in Gowrie's plot. The reader who is in doubt may read the letters and form his own opinion. It does not follow, if the substance of Letter iv. be genuine, that the handwriting is Logan's. It is certainly not Logan's, but the hand of Sprot, counterfeiting that of the Laird of Restalrig. Sprot's confession of August 10 is that, after surreptitiously reading the first part of Logan's unfinished letter to Gowrie, and after, later, seeing Gowrie's first harmless letter, he put two and two together, and conceived suspicions. He later stole Logan's letter to Gowrie (iv.), "which letter he retained till he framed three new letters upon it." He may have then returned the genuine Letter iv. to Bower, as if he had found it in a new search among the papers, after he had copied it, in a forgery of Logan's hand. That copy may be our Letter iv., genuine in substance, but not in handwriting. This theory would account for the firmness of the writing, the slip in spelling "protection," and so on. The substance of the letter, from internal evidence, I believe to be Logan's, but this is a matter of opinion.

On August 12 Sprot was hanged, after confessing his guilt from every corner of the scaffold, and singing a psalm. This dying confession of his own, of Logan's, and of Gowrie's guilt (in which nothing about the letters is reported) was trying to Presbyterian sceptics. They were wont to say that they would believe in a dying confession. But it did not suit them to believe in Sprot's, and Calderwood treated the case in the way we have explained.

But Archbishop Spottiswoode, who was present at Sprot's public trial on August 12, and at his death, believed him to be an hysterical self-accuser.<sup>3</sup> The man never showed the letter, says Spottiswoode. He did, but Spottiswoode was kept in the dark. Government, in the indictment of Sprot, and in a tract officially published (both are in Pitcairn), said not a word about any letters being produced. They garbled and falsified the facts, they cited Gowrie's first letter (never found at all), and Logan's letter to Gowrie (iv.), as quoted by Sprot from memory.

In June 1609, the dead body of Logan was tried, before the Lords of the Articles, for treason. The Lords, who were sceptical at first, convicted the dead man. They were converted to a belief in his guilt, when the prosecution produced the Five Letters, of which Sprot had confessed that three, or perhaps four, were forgeries, Letter iv. alone being genuine. Seven honourable witnesses, who knew Logan well, produced real letters of his, and compared them with the Five Letters, in which no difference of handwriting or of spelling could be detected. The case is precisely similar to the Hampton Court comparison of Queen Mary's letters with the Casket Letters. By virtue of this conviction Logan's heirs lost all their inheritance, and Lord Dunbar was not obliged to pay the 18,000 marks which he owed to Logan's estate. All the documents of the trials, as officially published, are in Pitcairn, vol. ii. pp. 256-293. On these transactions, so long concealed, it is needless to offer any commentary.

As to the guilt of Logan with Gowrie, the evidence of Sprot is tainted, and not fit, in daily life, to go to a jury. After July 5 he lied variously to conceal his possession of our Letter iv. He confessed to it when death was absolutely certain. Yet that long-concealed letter, as it stands, is pronounced by experts to be as much a forgery as the others. How is the conduct of Sprot to be explained? He confessed to the plot, and to his guilty knowledge, which carried his doom. Government was sure to hang him, not so much for the crime, as to present a dying confession to the godly sceptics. But why did Sprot admit that he had forged the letters? If he had any faint hope of life, his chance lay in giving the Government documentary evidence. This he refused. And why did he keep back Letter iv. till death was absolutely certain? Why did he then give it up, and aver that it was genuine, whereas modern experts condemn it with the rest? A study of the Haddington MSS. leads me to the opinion that Logan was really in the plot, and the internal evidence, the contents of Letter iv., confirm that belief. But all this is opinion, not knowledge.

<sup>1</sup> A brief abstract is given in Sir William Frazer's Memorials of the Earls of Haddington, vol. i. 1889.

<sup>2</sup> Calderwood, vi. p. 779, bis (779 is printed twice by error).

<sup>3</sup> Spottiswoode, iii. pp. 199-200.

PRINTED BY WILLIAM BLACKWOOD AND SONS.

DA
760
L25
v.2

Lang, Andrew
A history of Scotland

PLEASE DO NOT REMOVE
CARDS OR SLIPS FROM THIS POCKET

---

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO LIBRARY

---

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

3 1761 01370959 7

A HISTORY OF SCOTLAND

Capt. J. J. Waddington.

Montrose (after Honthorst)

1
E. J. J. J.

A HISTORY OF SCOTLAND

FROM

THE ROMAN OCCUPATION

BY

ANDREW LANG

VOL. III.

WITH A FRONTISPIECE

63558
10 | 11 | 24

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD AND SONS
EDINBURGH AND LONDON
MCMIV

All Rights reserved

MICROFORMED BY PRESERVATION
SERVICES
DATE MAY 01 1990

DA
760
L25
v. 3

CONTENTS OF THE THIRD VOLUME.

CHAPTER I.

CHARLES I. THE BEGINNING OF EVILS. 1625-1633.

	PAGE		PAGE
The Protestant Disruption (1625) . . . . .	2	Church property (1627) . . . . .	13
Case of Leighton (1630) . . . . .	3	Selling the tithes (1627) . . . . .	14
The King's impossible task . . . . .	4	The Revocation and the rebellion . . . . .	15
"Popery and wooden shoes" (1626) . . . . .	5	Trouble about kneeling (1626-1630) . . . . .	16
Scotland quiet (1625) . . . . .	6	"Arminian" bishops (1630) . . . . .	17
The Revocation (1625) . . . . .	7	The Liturgy (1616-1630) . . . . .	18
Judges and Privy Councillors (1625) . . . . .	8	Charles in Scotland (1633) . . . . .	19
Melrose ceases to be Secretary (1625) . . . . .	9	Parliament (1633) . . . . .	20
Teinds or tithes (1626) . . . . .	10	Unconstitutional conduct of Charles (1633) . . . . .	21
Want of money (1626) . . . . .	11	The Fire of Frendraght (1630) . . . . .	22
Scottish levies (1626) . . . . .	12

CHAPTER II.

THE LITURGY AND THE COVENANT, 1633-1638.

Despotic introduction of Liturgy (1636-1637) . . . . .	25	A General Assembly (1638) . . . . .	38
The riot in St Giles's (1637) . . . . .	26	Objections to its constitution (1638)	39
General resistance (1637) . . . . .	27	Disputable conduct of Hamilton (1638) . . . . .	40
A Committee of Public Safety (1637)	28	Hamilton leaves the Assembly (1638) . . . . .	41
The war of Protestations (1638) . . . . .	29	The bishops attacked (1638) . . . . .	42
Montrose for the Covenant (1638) . . . . .	30	Scruples of Baillie (1638) . . . . .	43
"Defence of the king's person" . . . . .	31	Censorship of the Press (1638) . . . . .	44
Legality of the Covenant? (1638) . . . . .	32	Montrose and Argyll (1638) . . . . .	45
Laud and the king (1637) . . . . .	33	Roths and Hamilton (1638) . . . . .	46
The Covenant forced on men (1638)	34	The Marquis of Argyll (1638) . . . . .	47
Hamilton's mission (1638) . . . . .	35	The great Montrose (1638) . . . . .	48
Temper of the nobles (1638) . . . . .	36	Montrose . . . . .	49
Hamilton drives time (1638) . . . . .	37

CHAPTER III.

THE BISHOPS' WAR, 1639.

The royal plan (1639) . . . . .	53	Meaning of the treaty disputed (1639)	66
Operations in the north (1639) . . . . .	54	Montrose meets the king (1639) . . . . .	67
Surrender of Huntly (1639) . . . . .	55	Charles and the Assembly (1639) . . . . .	68
Montrose's disputable conduct (1639) . . . . .	56	The Lords of the Articles (1639) . . . . .	69
Hamilton disappoints the Gordons (1639) . . . . .	57	Parliament adjourned (1639) . . . . .	70
Montrose at Bridge of Dee (1639) . . . . .	58	Covenanters intrigue with France (1639-1640) . . . . .	71
Leslie in the south (1640) . . . . .	59	Preparations for war (1640) . . . . .	72
Perilous position of the Covenanters (1639) . . . . .	60	Parliament defies prorogation (1640)	73
The king negotiates (1639) . . . . .	61	Montrose opposes the Convention (1640) . . . . .	74
The terms of capitulation (1639) . . . . .	62	The "Bonnie House o' Airlie" burned (1640) . . . . .	75
Activity of Waristoun (1639) . . . . .	63	Savile's forgery (1640) . . . . .	76
The futile truce (1639) . . . . .	64	Montrose thwarts Argyll (1640) . . . . .	77
Folly of the king's surrender (1639)	65	Montrose crosses Tweed (1640) . . . . .	78

CHAPTER IV.

THE SCOTS INVASION OF ENGLAND, 1640.

Montrose's letter to the king (1640)	81	Irish Rebellion (1641) . . . . .	100
Charles returns to Scotland (1640) . . . . .	82	General confusion (1641-1642) . . . . .	101
Montrose for the king (1641) . . . . .	83	State of the country (1642) . . . . .	102
Preachers against conventicles (1639-1640) . . . . .	84	Presbyterian morals (1642) . . . . .	103
The professionally godly (1641) . . . . .	85	Assembly and Parliament (1642) . . . . .	104
Montrose prophesies of Cromwell (1640-1641) . . . . .	86	Tyranny of preachers (1642) . . . . .	105
Montrose accuses Argyll (1641) . . . . .	87	Montrose disregarded (1643) . . . . .	106
The Dromedary and Elephant (1641)	88	A Convention (1643) . . . . .	107
Montrose and Napier imprisoned (1641) . . . . .	89	Terrors of the godly (1643) . . . . .	108
Charles in Scotland (1641) . . . . .	90	Solemn League and Covenant (1643)	109
Danger of Montrose (1641) . . . . .	91	Montrose's venture (1643) . . . . .	110
Mystery of "The Incident" (1641) . . . . .	92	Hamilton a prisoner (1643) . . . . .	111
Crawford's evidence (1641) . . . . .	96	Leven besieges Newcastle (1644) . . . . .	112
Murray's evidence (1641) . . . . .	97	Turner on Leven (1644) . . . . .	113
"The Incident" never unriddled . . . . .	98	Montrose disappointed (1644) . . . . .	114
William Murray suspected (1641) . . . . .	99	Huntly's bustling (1644) . . . . .	115
		Montrose takes Morpeth (1644) . . . . .	116
		Montrose contra mundum . . . . .	117

CHAPTER V.

THE YEAR OF MONTROSE, 1644-1645.

The man with the fiery cross (1644)	120	Murder of Kilpont . . . . .	123
Montrose raises the standard (1644)	121	Victory of Aberdeen (1644) . . . . .	126
Victory of Tippermuir (1644) . . . . .	122	Alleged cruelties to women (1644) . . . . .	127

Montrose baffles Argyll (1644) . . .	128	The victory of Auldearn (1645) . . .	143
Argyll retreats (1644) . . .	129	Manœuvres of Montrose (1645) . . .	145
Montrose drives Argyll from In- veraray (1644) . . .	130	Alford fight (1645) . . .	147
Argyll "overtakes the rogues" (1645)	132	Victory of Alford (1645) . . .	149
The trumpets at dawn . . .	133	Charles fails to join Montrose (1645)	150
Victory of Inverlochry (1645) . . .	134	Covenanters butcher women (1645)	151
The preachers' cry for blood (1645)	135	Baillie thwarted by Argyll (1645) . . .	153
The Kirk upbraids the king (1645)	136	Victory of Kilsyth (1645) . . .	155
Montrose takes Dundee (1645) . . .	137	Montrose deserted (1645) . . .	156
Montrose's remarkable retreat (1645)	138	Defeat at Philiphaugh (1645) . . .	157
Presbyterian Easter feast (1645) . . .	140	Perfidy and massacre . . .	158
The eve of Auldearn (1645) . . .	141	Escape of Montrose (1645) . . .	159

CHAPTER VI.

THE REVENGE OF THE COVENANTERS, 1645.

The theology of Anahuac . . .	162	What was his statesmanship worth? (1646) . . .	178
Murders of women (1646) . . .	163	"The unwilling slave of the Kirk"	179
Scottish Commissioners turn to France (1645) . . .	164	Preachers bar Charles out of Scot- land (1646) . . .	180
The Scots and the king (1645) . . .	165	The king is sold (1647) . . .	181
Montereul and Charles (1646) . . .	166	The Scots "worse than Jews" (1647)	182
The king's scruples (1646) . . .	167	The massacre of Dunavertie (1647)	183
Scottish "unblushing effrontery" (1646) . . .	168	More massacres (1647) . . .	184
"A ghost of assurances" (1646) . . .	169	"The Engagement" (1647) . . .	185
England rejects tyranny of Presby- ters (1646) . . .	170	A stroke for the king (1648) . . .	186
The king's honour (1646) . . .	171	The preachers thunder (1648) . . .	187
The king believes he has assurance (1646) . . .	172	Argyll's duel (1648) . . .	188
Punica fides (1646) . . .	173	Kirk versus State (1648) . . .	189
The king goes to the Scots (1646) . . .	174	Preachers curse the army (1648) . . .	190
The king "barbarously used" (1646)	175	Scots invade. Cromwell meets them (1648) . . .	191
"Barbarously baited" (1646) . . .	176	Utter ruin of the Scots (1648) . . .	192
Conduct of Argyll (1646) . . .	177	Triumph of the Kirk (1648) . . .	193

CHAPTER VII.

KIRK'S TRIUMPH. NATIONAL RUIN. 1648-1650.

Whiggamore raid (1648) . . .	196	Scotland's gains from the Covenant	203
Argyll embraces Cromwell (1648) . . .	197	General demoralisation (1650) . . .	204
Parliament of 1649 . . .	198	Infamous cruelties to women (1652)	205
Hopeless dilemma of Argyll (1649) . . .	199	Charles II., Covenanters, and Mon- trose (1649) . . .	206
Argyll and Lauderdale against Montrose (1649) . . .	200	The preachers beggar their brethren (1649) . . .	207
Ruinous "Act of Classes" (1649) . . .	201	Mr Blair as Athos (1649) . . .	208
The royal martyr (1649) . . .	202

Charles listens to Montrose (1649) . . . . .	209	Assynt surrenders Montrose (1649) . . . . .	216
Montrose and the Queen of Hearts (1649) . . . . .	210	The passion of Montrose (1649) . . . . .	218
Charles sends Montrose to death (1649) . . . . .	211	"Let me die in peace!" (1649) . . . . .	219
Montrose will "search his death" (1649) . . . . .	212	Death of Montrose (1649) . . . . .	220
Charles II. deserts Montrose (1649) . . . . .	213	Montrose and Jeanne d'Arc . . . . .	221
Strachan routs Montrose (1649) . . . . .	214	Charles II. and Montrose . . . . .	222
		New evidence . . . . .	224
		Another letter reported . . . . .	225
		Conjectures . . . . .	226

CHAPTER VIII.

CROMWELL AND SCOTLAND, 1650-1651.

Scots Commissioners and Charles (1650) . . . . .	229	Cromwell exposes their pretensions (1650) . . . . .	244
The corruption of Charles (1650) . . . . .	230	Charles will pay his father's blood price (1650) . . . . .	245
War with England (1650) . . . . .	231	"The Start" (1650) . . . . .	246
The preachers purge the army (1650) Cromwell's letter to the preachers (1650) . . . . .	232	The Kirk is rent in twain (1650) . . . . .	247
Charles compelled to dishonour his father . . . . .	233	"The Remonstrance" (1650) . . . . .	248
Cromwell forced to retreat (1650) . . . . .	234	"The Resolutioners" (1650) . . . . .	249
Leslie's counsels confused (1650) . . . . .	235	Lady Anne Campbell (1650) . . . . .	250
"The clergy's counsel prevailed" (1650) . . . . .	237	The Estates meet (1651) . . . . .	251
Cromwell's watchful night (1650) . . . . .	238	The St Andrews Assembly (1651) . . . . .	252
Surprise and counter surprise . . . . .	239	A Royalist defeat (1651) . . . . .	253
The rout of Dunbar (1650) . . . . .	241	"Another for Hector" (1651) . . . . .	254
Preachers prove they are never wrong (1650) . . . . .	242	The unpatriotic "Protesters" (1651) Charles invades England (1651) . . . . .	255
	243	Charles's march (1651) . . . . .	256
		Worcester fight (1651) . . . . .	257

CHAPTER IX.

FROM WORCESTER TO THE RESTORATION, 1651-1660.

The Regalia saved (1652) . . . . .	261	Royalist quarrels (1654) . . . . .	271
Attempted union (1652) . . . . .	262	Monk's administration (1654) . . . . .	272
"Bloody Presbyterian Government" (1652) . . . . .	263	Battle of Lochgarry (1654) . . . . .	273
"The night is near gone" (1652) . . . . .	264	The Highlands pacified (1655-1658) Sorrows of Argyll (1652-1659) . . . . .	274
The Assembly turned out (1653) . . . . .	265	Rise of Quakers . . . . .	275
Rising in the Highlands (1652) . . . . .	266	Death of Cromwell (1658) . . . . .	276
Ruin of Argyll (1653) . . . . .	267	Monk's march south (1660) . . . . .	277
Argyll gives information (1653) . . . . .	268	Study of a Covenanting laird . . . . .	278
Wogan's raid (1653) . . . . .	269	Brodie of Brodie . . . . .	279
Middleton for Scotland (1654) . . . . .	270		280

CHAPTER X.

THE RESTORATION, 1660-1666.

Career of James Sharp . . . . .	284	Executions of Argyll and Guthrie (1661) . . . . .	298
Sharp in 1660 . . . . .	285	Restoration of Episcopacy (1661) . . . . .	299
Breda and London (1660) . . . . .	286	Bishops back again (1662) . . . . .	300
Argyll arrested (1660) . . . . .	287	Plots against Lauderdale (1662-1663) . . . . .	301
Conduct of Sharp (1660) . . . . .	288	Coming of "the curates" (1663) . . . . .	302
Arrest of Mr Guthrie (1660) . . . . .	289	The ousted ministers (1663) . . . . .	303
Promises to Presbyterians (1660) . . . . .	290	Persecuting Parliament (1663) . . . . .	304
Psychology of Sharp (1660-1665) . . . . .	291	Energy of Sir James Turner (1664) . . . . .	305
Sharp is won over (1661) . . . . .	292	Conventicles (1665) . . . . .	306
Scottish Parliament (1661) . . . . .	293	Covenanters intrigue with the Dutch (1666) . . . . .	307
Funeral of Montrose (1661) . . . . .	294	The rising at Dalry (1666) . . . . .	308
Trial of Argyll (1661) . . . . .	295	Battle of Rullion Green (1666) . . . . .	309
Fatal letters of Argyll (1661) . . . . .	296
Monk's revenge on Argyll (1661) . . . . .	297

CHAPTER XI.

THE STRIFE WITH THE COVENANTERS, 1667-1679.

Punishment of rebels (1667) . . . . .	312	Curate rabbling (1671-1672) . . . . .	324
Sharp disgraced (1667) . . . . .	313	The new Indulgence (1672) . . . . .	325
Proposals for peace (1667) . . . . .	314	Parliamentary opposition (1673) . . . . .	326
Turner cashiered (1668) . . . . .	315	"Humble resentments" (1674) . . . . .	327
Leighton's policy (1668) . . . . .	316	Resignation of Leighton (1674) . . . . .	328
Mitchell shoots at Sharp (1668) . . . . .	317	Disorders (1675) . . . . .	329
The Black Indulgence (1669) . . . . .	318	Sharp and Mitchell (1674-1678) . . . . .	330
The Indulgence illegal (1669) . . . . .	319	Execution of Mitchell (1678) . . . . .	332
Lauderdale Royal Commissioner (1669) . . . . .	320	The Highland host (1678) . . . . .	333
Leighton archbishop (1669) . . . . .	321	Claverhouse (1678) . . . . .	334
Armed conventicles (1670) . . . . .	322	The Kirk rent asunder (1679) . . . . .	335
Repression and negotiation (1670) . . . . .	323	Active conventiclers (1679) . . . . .	336

CHAPTER XII.

BOTHWELL BRIDGE, 1679-1680.

The Covenanting temper . . . . .	340	Drumclog fight (1679) . . . . .	346
Legend of Sharp (1679) . . . . .	341	Pistoling prisoners (1679) . . . . .	347
Murderous plottings (1679) . . . . .	342	Quarrels of the Covenanters (1679) . . . . .	348
Sharp hacked to pieces (1679) . . . . .	343	Welshites and Hamiltonians (1679) . . . . .	349
The murderers (1679) . . . . .	344	Monmouth's arrival (1679) . . . . .	350
They ride west (1679) . . . . .	345	Deputation to Monmouth (1679) . . . . .	351

"All ran away" (1679) . . . . .	352	Cameron's prophecies (1679) . . . . .	357
"The Bluidie Banner" (1679) . . . . .	353	Airs Moss (1680) . . . . .	358
After the battle (1679) . . . . .	354	The sweet singers . . . . .	359
Punishment of the rebels (1679) . . . . .	355	Meikle John Gibb (1681) . . . . .	360
Cameron and the Duke of York (1679) . . . . .	356

CHAPTER XIII.

THE KILLING TIME, 1680-1685.

Death of Cargill (1681) . . . . .	364	The case of Carstairs (1684) . . . . .	378
Position of Argyll (1681) . . . . .	365	Execution of Jarviswoode (1684) . . . . .	379
The Duke of York and Parliament (1681) . . . . .	366	Argyll and the Rye House Plot . . . . .	380
The inconsistent test (1681) . . . . .	367	The mingled plots (1684) . . . . .	381
Argyll's escape (1681) . . . . .	368	Renwick's apogetical declaration (1684) . . . . .	382
Aberdeen and Queensberry (1682) . . . . .	369	The abjuration (1684) . . . . .	383
Claverhouse in Galloway (1682) . . . . .	370	Ferocities of both parties (1685) . . . . .	384
Policy of Claverhouse (1682) . . . . .	371	Death of Charles II. (1685) . . . . .	385
Success of Claverhouse (1682) . . . . .	372	John Brown and Margaret Wilson (1685) . . . . .	386
Claverhouse and the Dalrymples (1682-1683) . . . . .	373	The Wigtown martyrs (1685) . . . . .	387
Increased severities (1683) . . . . .	374	Various versions . . . . .	388
A medley of plots (1683) . . . . .	375	The Renwickites (1685) . . . . .	389
Wedding of Claverhouse (1684) . . . . .	376	Parliament of April 1685 . . . . .	390
Humanity of Claverhouse (1684) . . . . .	377	Note on John Brown . . . . .	392

CHAPTER XIV.

ARGYLL'S RISING, 1685.

Argyll and Polwarth (1685) . . . . .	398	Execution of Renwick (1688) . . . . .	411
Various versions of Argyll and Polwarth . . . . .	399	Birth of the Prince of Wales (1688) . . . . .	412
The leaders thwart each other (1685) . . . . .	400	Dutch invasion (1688) . . . . .	413
Argyll's party divided (1685) . . . . .	401	James and Claverhouse (1688) . . . . .	414
Cross marchings . . . . .	402	Behaviour of the bishops . . . . .	415
Contradictions of evidence . . . . .	403	William and the bishops (1689) . . . . .	416
Argyll taken (1685) . . . . .	404	Holyrood sacked (1688) . . . . .	417
Argyll's confessions . . . . .	405	The excesses of the remnant (1688) . . . . .	418
Death of Argyll (1685) . . . . .	406	Convention of 1689 . . . . .	419
Cruel orders of Council (1685) . . . . .	407	Jacobite plans . . . . .	420
Toleration for Catholics (1686) . . . . .	408	Dundee rides north (1689) . . . . .	421
Exercise of prerogative (1686) . . . . .	409	William made king (1689) . . . . .	422
New Indulgences (1687) . . . . .	410	Regifugium . . . . .	423

LIST OF MAPS.

---

	PAGE
CAMPAIGN OF TIPPERMUIR AND ABERDEEN . . . . .	124
THE BATTLE OF ABERDEEN . . . . .	125
CAMPAIGN OF INVERLOCHY . . . . .	131
CAMPAIGN OF DUNDEE AND AULDEARN . . . . .	139
THE BATTLE OF AULDEARN . . . . .	142
CAMPAIGN OF ALFORD . . . . .	146
THE BATTLE OF ALFORD . . . . .	148
CAMPAIGN OF KILSYTH . . . . .	152
THE BATTLE OF KILSYTH . . . . .	154
THE NORTH OF SCOTLAND . . . . .	215
BATTLE OF CARBISDALE . . . . .	217
CROMWELL'S OPERATIONS ROUND EDINBURGH . . . . .	236
BATTLE OF DUNBAR . . . . .	240

---

The portrait of Montrose is reproduced by permission from Honthorst's painting in the possession of the Earl of Dalhousie.

A HISTORY OF SCOTLAND FROM THE ROMAN OCCUPATION.

---

CHAPTER I.

CHARLES I. THE BEGINNING OF EVILS.

1625-1633.

SIR THOMAS MALORY tells us that, in a lonely forest glade, the good knight, Sir Percival, saw a lion fighting a serpent. He drew his sword to aid the lion, "for it seemed to him the more natural beast of the twain." The history of Scotland, from the death of James VI. to the Revolution of 1688, is that of a battle between two tyrannies, the lion and the serpent, the Tudor despotism in Stuart hands and the Knoxian despotism of the ministers of religion. These two forces destroyed each other. The triumph of the Presbyterian ideals, the claims to bind and loose, to ruin and excommunicate, to sit in the seats of the Apostles and judge mankind, to carry a crusade of compulsory Presbyterianism into England and even abroad, and to extirpate idolaters, endured but for ten or twelve years (1638-1650). It could only endure, that triumph, while the nobles, irritated by Charles's despotism and illegal measures, were at one with the Kirk, terrible as an army with banners. When once the Estates differed from the Commissioners of the General Assembly; when once the Kirk, thwarting the State, had brought the Cromwellian conquest on Scotland, the ranks of the Covenanters were split in twain. Under the persecutions and indulgences of the Restoration, the enormous majority of Presbyterians—ministers and flocks—learned to submit to compromise, which was only resisted, and vainly resisted, by the extreme left wing of the Covenanters, the societies of Cameronians, and especially of Renwickites. Among them alone survived the pretensions that had rent Scotland for more than a century. Meanwhile the Catholic despotism of James II. ruined the cause of royal tyranny, the lion and the serpent had destroyed each other. As the Presbyterian absolutism had invaded every corner of private life; as its claims to divine right were based, like the secular pretensions of the kings, on false criticism of isolated scriptural texts; as its odious cruelties were in contrast with the plain duty of professed "followers of the Lamb"; some may reckon the serpent the less natural beast of the twain. Sir Walter Scott justly said that our sympathies turn to the faction which, for the moment, has the worse of the struggle.

With the death of James I. ended that brief period of relative peace and quiet which Scotland enjoyed after his accession to the English crown. The dragon's teeth, plentifully sown by the Reformation, and by the king himself, were soon to bring forth their crops of armed contending men. The Reformation had scattered the fatal seed; while breaking away from the uniformity of the Church, Protestants desired a uniformity of their own—desired it with a zeal which shrank from no injustice of persecution. Now uniformity was for them impossible. Since the days when Knox and his English congregation at Frankfort quarrelled over the "mummuling" of the responses there had been two irreconcilable parties, High Church and Puritan, in the Protestant camp, and a third was rising. One faction was rigidly Calvinist, and detested most vestiges of old ecclesiastical ritual. Their altar was "the table"; candles, surplices, organs, windows of stained glass, devout gestures and attitudes, beauty of services, many of the rubrics in the Prayer Book, the prayers themselves—all things almost but preaching, psalm-singing, and "conceived prayers," were abominations to the precisians of England or of Scotland. Any theology short of Calvin's and Knox's was "Arminianism," and was to be put down and rooted out by the Parliament, as a flower of Rome. These men "saw red" whenever they thought of the danger of relapse into Catholicism, and of that they were always thinking.

Thus Mr. Row, a Presbyterian minister of the old school, explained the plague of 1625 as the vengeance of Heaven on Charles's marriage with Henrietta, a Catholic. "It is very remarkable that the Queene's masse, the pest of the soule, and a most rageing pestilence, killing bodies, came to London together (O that men had eyes in their heads to see, and hearts to consider, the Lord's wayes)."<sup>1</sup> It was the old story of the fog, a divine warning, sent when Mary Stuart landed in Scotland. Mr. Row firmly held that Buckingham was "a Papist," who, even if he did not murder King James, "marred all," whence the failure to relieve the besieged Protestants of La Rochelle.<sup>2</sup>

Again, in 1624, to spur on the futile and disastrous war with idolatrous Spain, a preaching Scot in England, Alexander Leighton, wrote his 'Speculum Belli Sacri' ('Mirror of the Holy War'), a masterpiece of fanaticism. In 1630 he circulated in England his 'Appeal to Parliament, or Sion's Plea against Prelacy.' This work was "The Cry of ane Howle in the Wilderness" of Presbyterianism. Whatever evil existed in the world was laid to the charge of the bishops, "knobs and wens and bunchy popish flesh." The voice is the voice of Andrew Melville and John Davidson, and the voice appeals to the Parliament of England.<sup>3</sup> The king did not escape. "God had suffered him to match with the daughter of Heth" (France), "though he missed an Egyptian" (Spaniard). "Down with the bishops" was the burden of Leighton's appeal to the English Parliament, then sitting. "Strike neither at great nor small, but at these troublers of Israel: smite that Hazael in the fifth rib." "Laud," said a written pamphlet, "look to thyself: be assured thy life is sought" (1629). "Deliver my soul," wrote Laud, "from them who hate me without a cause." They were to work their will, but already Protestantism, in these voices, was appealing, as of old against Cardinal Beaton, to its old weapons the dirk and the sword, and these things were "done in the green tree" long before Laud tried to thrust the liturgy on Scotland. We see the temper of the godly before King Charles set foot in his native country.

As for the other side, the backers of bishops, the Court of Star Chamber sentenced Leighton to pay a fine of £10,000, to be whipped in the pillory, have an ear cut off, his nose slit, and be branded S. S. for a Sower of Sedition, as he certainly was. Later he was to be whipped again, and lose his other ear. Laud himself was one of the judges who thus avenged the bishops for Leighton's instigations to smite them under the fifth rib. Leighton was allowed to keep one ear, and was spared the second flogging. Perhaps, had he not made an escape and been retaken, he might have kept both ears and a sound back. His son, condemned "a father's soul to cross," became an archbishop under Charles II., a saintly, ineffectual soul. Meanwhile the third party, the Independents, learned or ignorant, sane or insane, were rising, and some were to utter the word of all others most hateful to good men, "Toleration."

We have briefly illustrated the savage religious temper of Protestantism in Scotland and England when Charles I. began his reign. The Christianity of our fathers, notoriously that of the godly who fled to New England, meant intolerance, going to the lengths of the dagger, the axe, the hangman's shears, the pillory, and the scourge. Thus they "fought like devils for conciliation, and hated each other for the love of God." Uniformity was impossible except, perhaps, by dint of relentless and secular and one-sided persecution. Do not let us imagine that toleration for their maimed services and polemical preachers, had Charles granted it, would have satisfied the godly. The other side, the Arminians, the prelatists, "the bunchy knobs of papist flesh," must be put down, like Hazael. Liberty and tolerance were equally loathed by both parties, and free speech, from the pulpit, about predestination, was forbidden in England as it had been in Scotland. "The Puritan," says Mr Gardiner, "demanded exact conformity with the practices of which he approved. Laud demanded exact conformity with the practices of which he approved." The knot could only be cut, or rather cut at, by the sword. No statesmanship could have reconciled the parties peacefully.

Let no man think that Charles Stuart had a possible task. Naturally he sided with the religious party whose leaders maintained the Tudor absolutism, as against the party which aimed, more or less consciously, at the absolutism of the House of Commons. A better manner might have done something for him. "This king," wrote the Venetian ambassador not with perfect truth, "is so constituted by nature, that he never obliges any one, either by word or deed."<sup>4</sup> But, with good manners or bad, Charles had to face an inevitable religious war, and the inevitable revolutionary reaction against four generations of Tudor absolutism. He was born and bred in that old régime; and, from the very first, it was plain that of the régime England was weary. It is not, of course, true (as a Nonconformist divine has audaciously asserted in a Life of Cromwell), that all the gentlemen of England were on the side of the King. Puritanism and reaction against absolutism had scores or hundreds of leaders among the nobles and the gentry, Cromwell himself being, as he said, a gentleman. But the opposite opinion has been boldly maintained, a proof that the blindness of the parties to that old struggle still darkens counsel and clouds popular history.

Charles did not visit Scotland till 1633, when eight crucial years of his unhappy reign had gone into the irrevocable past. A few words must be given to the events of these years in England, before we turn to the contemporary occurrences in Scotland,—occurrences apt to arouse that deep distrust of the king, which united against him, later, the nobles and the preachers with their middle-class congregations, the mobs of towns, the fisher-folk, the sailors, and the ploughmen of the fields. The years between Charles's accession and his visit to Scotland in 1633 were occupied in the first bout of the inevitable battle between the Crown and the country. The deepest cause of the conflict was still the incurable suspicion and inappeasable terror of the Puritans. Charles had inherited a “sacred war” with idolatrous Spain, and a Protestant war to recover (with the aid of Holland, of Denmark, and, as he hoped, of France) the Palatinate. These were pious enterprises, but then Charles had married an idolatress, a “Daughter of Heth,” and in Buckingham he had a favourite, or a master, who, his political blunders apart, could not be dear to Puritans. Buckingham therefore, who had a Catholic wife, was described as “a Papist” and “a minion.” Charles, on marrying Henrietta, had promised a measure of quiet to his own Catholic subjects. But he could not and did not keep his promise to France, and he threw the Catholics to the wolves,—the accustomed sacrifice, which never conciliated the brethren, which never broke down the constant loyalty of Catholics, but which naturally made France indignant.

So early as 1626 Carelton introduced to the notice of the House of Commons the inextricable connection between “Popery, slavery, and wooden shoes,” a cry that was long to be popular and useful.<sup>5</sup> The endeavour to secure France as an ally in Protestant wars failed, by reason of the breach of the promise to the French king, the romantic adventures of Buckingham with the French queen, and the dismissal of the Catholic and French attendants of the young Queen of England. Charles could not, with his best endeavours, run with the idolatrous hare and hunt with the Puritan hounds.

In the war for the Palatinate, Mansfeld's troops, more or less subsidised with English money, drifted from disaster to disaster. Enormous sums were needed when Charles's first Parliament met in June 1625; indeed the warlike expenses had been so great that the Government, like the ordinary individual in straits, kept back the full schedule of its debts. From the beginning the Government and household of the young king were poverty-stricken, and financiers were too wary to make large advances on the security of the royal jewels. The House at once opened on the Protestant cry against "the wicked generation of Jesuits, seminary priests, and incendiaries." Eliot joined in; and while the enforcement of the persecuting Acts was insisted on, the Commons offered the most inadequate supplies; for war, however "sacred," is expensive, especially when managed in the traditional English way. So the feud between King and Commons about money began; at the same time began the Puritan attack upon a clergyman named Montague. He did not love the doctrine of predestination, to which the Puritans were tenderly attached; nor was he convinced that the Apostle had the Pope in his eye when he spoke of Antichrist. He saw no harm in works of sacred art, nor in exhorting a puzzled parishioner to consult his parson. He was also a strong supporter of Royal, not Presbyterian, Right Divine: so the Commons persecuted Montague, while Charles pardoned him and made him a bishop.

Thus what was to keep going on began at once. The religious triangular duel, the refusals of money, of tonnage and poundage, the king's attempts to extract money by force, the assertion of his prerogative, the failures of pressed and unfed soldiers and sailors, the quarrel with France, the disasters at Cadiz, at La Rochelle, everywhere; the mutinies, the arrests of politicians, the attacks on Buckingham, his murder, warmly applauded by many Puritans, the Petition of Right, the brawl in the House, the imprisonment of the members who led the brawl, the ministry of Weston, almost as much hated as Buckingham, the fall of Rochelle, the accession of Wentworth (Strafford) to the Royal cause, the dissenters' disorders which Laud could not repress, the discreditable peace with France and with Spain, the Dissolution, the beginning of Government without Parliament,—five years brought all these things, and, in 1633, led Charles back to Scotland. To Scotland we return.

That country had been a "more than usual calm" observer of the constitutional progress made by the sister kingdom. In the 'Annals' of Sir James Balfour, the English Parliament of June 1625 is dismissed in fifteen lines, without a single word about its religious and financial polemics. Spalding, who wrote 'The Memorials of the Troubles in Scotland and in England,' begins, quite naturally, in 1624, with domestic affairs, a feud between the Earl of Moray and Clan Chattan, Moray having "cassin them out of thair kindlie possessions." They were too hard for the Earl, wasted his lands, "sorned throw the northlandis," and "Clan Chattan becamis moir furiously." Moray gets a commission of Lieutenancy, and that revives the old feud for the Bonny Earl, slain in 1592; everything in Scotland is as it used to be, and so Spalding passes on to 1628. The "troubles" in England, so far, do not attract his attention. With him all is dirk and dourlach, hackbut and claymore, not constitutional progress.

In Scotland, in short, as Charles, on his accession, wrote to the Privy Council, "matters shall continue and go forward in the same course wherein they now are." The country was governed by the Privy Council, Hamilton (Tam o' the Cowgate), now Earl of Melrose, being Secretary; Sir George Hay of Kinfauns, Chancellor; Mar, Treasurer; and six prelates, including Spottiswoode, Archbishop of St Andrews, having seats. A rising of MacIans of Ardnamurchan was put down by Lorne, Gillespie Gruamach, son of the Catholic Earl of Argyll, vanquished at Glenrinnis, and himself later the defeated of Inverlochry, and the victim of the Restoration.

A large contingent of lords and gentry went to James's funeral, where Spottiswoode declined to wear lawn sleeves, which was reckoned very noble and patriotic. Charles (July 26) emitted a proclamation, intended to be soothing, to this effect:—"restless and unquiet spirits, popishly disposed, have presumed to disperse false bruits and rumours that his Majesty intends to make some innovation concerning the estate of religion, or at the least to give too much toleration and connivance to the Popish profession." His Majesty, despite his promises to France, reassured his Scottish subjects on this point; but he made it clear that he would not revert to the golden state of the Kirk in 1592, or revoke the Articles of Perth.<sup>6</sup>

But Charles now caused fear and distrust. It was usual for the kings of Scotland to revoke, on attaining majority, all grants of crown property made in their long and turbulent minorities. As king, Charles had no minority, as prince of Scotland he had. On May 17, 1625, Gilbert Primrose, then in London for James's funeral, wrote that he had been employed by Lord Melrose to draft the king's Revocation. "The words were words of fear," says

Dr. Masson.<sup>7</sup> When the dreaded Revocation arrived, on July 25, it proved that Charles meant to revoke,—not only the grants of his minority as prince, but those of “our predecessors in their times, in detriment and harm of our soul and conscience,”—annexing these old grants to the crown and its patrimony, rights, and rents. This was alarming news, though worse was to follow. The menace seemed to upset the real property of Scotland. As Dr. Masson judiciously observes, this demand was drawn up (Sir William Alexander being perhaps the adviser?) just three days after the English Parliament had granted the king its starveling supplies.<sup>8</sup> The hint as to Charles’s imperilled “soul and conscience” may have referred especially to the alienations of Church lands. Charles may be credited with genuine scruples as to the wholesale robbery of the Church, after the Reformation, and, as we shall see, he finally did restore to the Kirk “a living wage” for all its ministers, which they had never enjoyed since the great pillage. The king may even have seen the enormity of the mistake made by the privileged classes when they starved a set of men so potent as the preachers; the sure way of producing a democratic and demagogic clergy.

While the Revocation was but distant thunder of uncertain import, a financial Convention at Edinburgh (October 27–November 3) with twenty-nine representatives of the minor barons or lairds, and twenty-one of the burghs, voted £400,000 (Scots) in three years, and a five per cent income tax. The vote was unanimous and enthusiastic, all unlike the English grant. Charles hinted a desire to commute most of the taxes for a force of 2000 men, with shipping, but to this the Convention would not assent. As time went on, and the foreign wars lasted, however, men were drilled for home defence, and a few ships were poorly provided by the Scots.

Meanwhile the most important matter in hand was an alteration in the constitutions of the Privy Council, and of the Court of Session, the Court of the Judges, “the Fifteen.” Gilbert Primrose had announced from London, in May, that there would be a “scail” (a scattering, as when devotees “scail,” or rush hurriedly, out of kirk) “among our Counsellors and the Sessioners (judges) removed from Council.” This was written on May 10, 1625, the Revocation of grants in land was not drafted for despatch to Scotland till July, and we may doubt whether Charles removed the judges from the Privy Council, and made privy councillors resign their seats on the Bench, because he conceived that the arrangement would enable him to pass the Revocation more easily.* This is the opinion of Mr Hume Brown, and of others. But Mr Gardiner, no Cavalier, commends the action of the king. "One great blow had been wisely struck at their" (the nobles') "supremacy by Charles. . . . He had ordained that, with the exception of the Chancellor, men who sat in the Privy Council as administrators of the Government, should not also sit in the Court of Session as judges."<sup>9</sup>

The Council, as it stood, heard of the intended reorganisation in November 1625, and did not like what it heard. On November 17 they sent to the king a letter of remonstrance. As to the Revocation, there was "fear universally apprehended." The nature and extent of the Revocation had been studiously kept in obscurity. Never had the good subjects been so heavily disquieted. Charles may have been promised "lawful and great gain," but he would find rather loss and disturbance. The Revocation, in fact, is regarded by the contemporary annalist, Sir James Balfour, as the beginning of evils, and of the Civil wars. "Let the reader here behold the seeds of most base and wicked counsel sown, which yielded no better fruit than the alienation of the subjects' hearts from their prince, and laid open a way to rebellion."<sup>10</sup> This is untrue; "better fruit" was the endowment of the ministers. The Revocation "passed the seals" despite remonstrance, directed also against the changes in judicial organisation.<sup>11</sup>

The proposed alterations affected seventeen of the best of the Council, including Melrose. The Council asked that some of their number might confer with the king, and Sir George Hay, with Melrose, went to Court. They fared so ill that, in January 1626, Melrose was deprived of the secretaryship, which was given to Sir William Alexander, later Earl of Stirling, an old tutor of Prince Henry, a poet of merit, and a man especially active in the futile attempt to plant Nova Scotia, and in the creation of Nova Scotia baronets. Alexander was to be Scottish Secretary at the English Court; and Melrose felt aggrieved, and probably was not consoled by a Royal letter.<sup>12</sup> Melrose's private memoranda show his grudge against the Revocation as too indefinite in some clauses, and a needless substitution of prerogative for the ordinary processes of law. We naturally ask, who put the king on this course? and no more probable name suggests itself than that of Sir William Alexander, who superseded Melrose. Meanwhile, early in 1626, Charles had to meet his second English Parliament after the disasters of the hapless naval expedition against Cadiz. The fiery Eliot led the Commons, Buckingham was to be impeached, the quarrel with France grew more angry, and the king, just before this embittered Session, sent, on January 26, 1626, a letter to explain his mind to his Scottish subjects.

* Cf. Privy Council Register, i., xxxiv. lviii. Hume Brown, 'History of Scotland,' ii. p. 288. Rogers. Earl of Stirling's Register of Royal Letters, i., liv. lvi.

He began with the usual proofs that he was a most satisfactory prince: he had already given orders for the banishment of priests and Jesuits. He next expressed his desire to provide for the Kirk and education out of the teinds, or tithes, which, since the Reformation, had drifted to lay holders in commendam, for life only, or had been given in perpetuity to new peers (titulars), or had been cumbered with the services and pay of middlemen ("tacksmen"); and, generally, had gone into all but the proper pockets—those of the ministers of the Gospel.* It happened, in the intricate course of national and ecclesiastical pillage, that many landholders did not own their teinds, which belonged to some noble titular. Where the teinds were collected, as was usual, in kind—the actual "stooks" of corn,—the titular could ruin the occupant or owner of the harvest by making him leave the corn out in the wet till the teinds were gathered. This and other abuses led to endless feuds and slaughters, and Charles now expressed his design to free the gentry from these vexations, "that every man may have his own teinds" (those from his own lands) "upon reasonable conditions."

As to the Revocation in general, Charles avers that his intention is "not to wrong any of his subjects, nor to question any lands, teinds, profits, or privileges, save such as, belonging to the ancient patrimony of his crown, or annexed or falling thereunto, or belonging to the Church, are without any just cause or lawful form conveyed from the same to the detriment thereof, and against conscience, and may be 'laughfully' recovered."

This was far from pacifying the fears of landholders whose rights to old Kirk lands had now matured for generations. The king also averred that, in revoking grants by his predecessors, he followed the precedents of his father as regarded Queen Mary, of Mary as regarded James V., of James V. as concerned James IV., and so back to James III. But he does not say that any revoker went back behind the reign of his one immediate predecessor. He is establishing Commissioners to aid the treasury, and, as he is levying 2000 men for the wars, needs money. As to legal reconstruction, he is merely restoring the Sessions Court to its original institution, in order that judges, no longer occupied with Privy Council work, may have time for their duties on the Bench. He is about to introduce a Commission of Grievances, but, as this was resisted, and regarded as an introduction of a Star Chamber, the scheme was dropped. Alexander's secretaryship at Court was announced, Melrose retaining a kind of correspondentship in Scotland.<sup>13</sup>

* The different methods and degrees of robbery and malappropriation of the "spiritualities" of the Church, the tithes or teinds, are fully and lucidly explained by Dr Masson, in his excellent preface to Privy Council Register, i., New Series.

On March 23, the new Council was inaugurated, precedence over the Chancellor, Hay of Kinfauns, being given to Archbishop Spottiswoode, President of the Exchequer, "the first and last president that ever the Exchequer had," says Balfour. On July 12, this precedence of the archbishop was formally confirmed: but Kinfauns never yielded place to him: not even at Charles's Scottish coronation (1633): "Never a ston'd priest in Scotland should set a foot before him so long as his blood was hot," said Sir George to Balfour, who was Lyon King of Arms. "Weel, Lyone," answered the king, "letts goe to bussines, I will not meddle furdur with that olde canckered gootische man, at quhose handes there is nothing to be gained but soure wordes."<sup>14</sup>

Of course this precedence of a prelate increased the irritation of the nobles, and bred a jealousy against bishops, sometimes low-born, which was a potent cause of the later militant union of Kirk and peers. But Charles was, except for old Kinfauns, resolute or obstinate. He would give his new Nova Scotia baronets precedence over the lairds, or minor barons, who vainly complained: so the lairds too had a new grievance.

The new Council was indolent, but "auld Melrose" continued to work with his habitual energy. The main business was providing men and ships for the wars which now left England without a single friendly port except Huguenot Rochelle. "We have not in all the Christian world but one port to put a boat into, Rochelle," said Bristol in the House of Lords. "We have been like the broken staff of Egypt to all that have relied upon us."<sup>15</sup>

Without money, and with pressed men, starved, mutinous, and undrilled, Charles might have said of his foreign wars, ego rapulo

tantum. Scotland did next to nothing for the navy, but perhaps in all some 20,000 men left home "to fight the foreign loons in their ain countrie." From Sutherland, Mackay led the peasantry of Strathnaver, accustomed to half starvation, as Richard Franck found them some twenty-five years later. Mackay (Lord Reay) founded a house half Scots half Dutch; and Leslie, Seton, Lord Nithsdale, and others, raised levies, with many a Dugald Dalgetty in their ranks.

La guerre est ma patrie, might have been their motto, and they were worthy descendants of the old Scots Archer Guard of France. Many of these troops were "masterless men," "ill neighbours," ne'er-do-wells, like Thomas Tower, of Auchindoir parish, described by the minister as "ane drunkard, blasphemer of Godis name, and ane continuall tuilzear" (brawler), "and most fitt to serve the Kingis Majesteis varres." Another recruit was "ane sorcerer and charmer": it is better to fight than to burn, as a witch. Hawick sent a very lawless contingent, including a piper: on the whole the types of Nym and Pistol were well represented, waifs and strays from the running feuds in which the Gordons of Gicht were specially distinguishing themselves, in a manner worthy of Lord Byron's ancestors. Of these impressed ruffians many may later have borne arms for the Covenant.

While the Revocation hung like a thunder-cloud over every landed man in Scotland, Charles was not conciliating the Kirk. The laity had been wont to criticise and censure their preachers, in Edinburgh at least, on the Tuesday before Communion Sunday: a pleasant interlude of "heckling" which Charles put down. The Provost and Bailies pointed out that the fashion was as old as the Reformation, though we do not remember having met any account of a Tuesday's "heckling" of John Knox—a sight worth witnessing. Charles replied to the remonstrance with his usual tact, "the narrative, if it be true, shows what a Reformation that was, and how evil advised. . . . This is an Anabaptistical phrenzy."<sup>16</sup> Charles continued to persecute the Catholics, but that sop never satisfied the Presbyterian Cerberus. The subject of the Revocation was revived by a royal letter on July 11, 1626, considered by the Council on July 21. Charles now limited the Revocation to goods of the Church, annexed to the Crown, and later granted away, and to "Regalities and Hereditary Offices, and against the changes of holdings since 1540 from the ancient tenure of Ward and Relief to Blenshe and Taxt Warde." This was alarming, and, though the heritable offices, an old curse of Scotland, survived till 1746, their holders probably suspected that Charles might, at any convenient hour, pounce on what he actually spared. He added that he had appointed Commissioners to arrange terms of composition with all who voluntarily surrendered their holdings, as described, before January 1, 1627.<sup>17</sup>

No man surrendered, and, on August 22, Charles began an action at law against the recalcitrants, technically "a summons of reduction." All concerned were to show their titles, and "hear and see the same reduced." Thomas Hope, who had once defended imprisoned preachers, took charge of the action. The main change was to be in the Royal recovery of Church lands (temporalities), and teinds, or tithes (spiritualities). As an example of the distinction, the Earl of Gowrie, about 1592, enjoyed the lands, the temporalities, of Scone, as an "erected lordship"; they descended to his legal heirs, supposing him to have had any. But of the teinds or tithes, the spiritualities of the Abbey, he had only a tenure for life, like other lay abbots, or commendators, holding "in commendam."

The Kirk, from one point of view, did not regret the "erected lordships," hereditary, carved out of old Church lands. These, it was thought, could never again be wrung from their noble holders, and used to pamper an idolatrous or prelatical Church. The security of Presbyterianism lay, as has elsewhere been said, in the thoroughness with which the old Church had been stripped of her property. But, by "The Red Parliament" of 1606, contrary to the Act of Annexation of Church Lands to the Crown in 1587, "Bishops' Lands" (not including abbey and priory lands held by bishops) had been restored to the hated prelates. The old secular property was given back, or was to be given back to the new bishops of James's creation: not so the property of the old regular or monastic clergy. "The two Scottish archbishoprics and eleven Scottish bishoprics, had, before the end of James's reign, become very substantial benefices. . . ." <sup>18</sup> Meanwhile the teinds were scattered, as we saw, among lay holders of many different sorts, all tenacious; the Kirk receiving but a starveling portion. To improve this condition of affairs was the object of the Constant Plat of John Lindsay, "Parson of Menmure," a plat of which he himself despaired. During his Scottish visit of 1617, James had devised a "constant plat" of his own, for the better endowing of the preachers, the king intending it to sweeten his unwelcome changes as to kneeling at the sacrament and so forth. Things so fell out that the Kirk "was more damnified than bettered," as Spottiswoode remarked.

Charles's purpose now was to recover the teinds, or as much of them as he could, from the complex ranks of lay holders, and to give the ministers at last "a living wage" out of these sources. This project horrified not only the nobles but the bishops. In November 1626 these bodies held meetings at Edinburgh, nominally as to putting down Catholics. "In some parts of the country the Papists are so strong in kindred, alliance, and friendship, that none of the bounds dare or can execute any commission against them," the Council reports. Taking this opportunity of being met, the bishops sent two of their number and two ministers to Court, the Lords sent three young nobles, later notable in "the troubles," the Earls of Rothes and Linlithgow, and Lord Loudoun.<sup>19</sup>

The young peers were at first rebuked, but one of them, Linlithgow, was presently (January 12, 1627) made Admiral of Scotland, during the minority of the young Lennox. The registration of the Revocation was also postponed.<sup>20</sup> The petition, signed by Melrose and many others, and carried by the three young nobles, had at least been considered. Charles had at first (December 4, 1626) "snibbed" Melrose for his part in the matter, but listened with courtesy to his proposal to call a Scottish Parliament. The king (January 17, 1627) said that he would think of a Parliament if a new Commission proved unsatisfactory.<sup>21</sup> Charles had caressed and perhaps thought he had captured the young bearers of the petition, and the Privy Council received the New Commission on January 30, 1627. The Commissioners, a body of great weight, representing the prelates, nobles, lairds or minor barons, and burghs, was to cite all concerned to give in their surrenders before August. They were first, to induce lords of erections and other titulars of teinds, to sell the teinds to the owners of the lands on which they were levied. This would prevent the usual feuds and bloodshed at the collection of teinds on the fields, and secure "that the churches may be provided of sufficient ministers, the ministers of competent stipends, and that we may have a reasonable increase of our revenue."<sup>22</sup>

The Commissioners went heartily to work, but the minor barons, the probable buyers of the teinds from the titulars, desired that the king should first purchase from the titulars, and then the barons from the Crown. Sir James Learmonth of Balcomie, and Sir James Lockhart of the Lee, successfully negotiated this matter with Charles. Many questions of detail were left to the king himself. Lauderdale, Hamilton (great-grandson of Queen Mary's Châtelherault), Melrose, Nithsdale, and other great titulars, set the example of sending in their surrenders. Meanwhile the ten bishops on the New Commission proved troublesome. The Kirk's ideal, the recovery of all the teinds, was obviously shattered: the teinds were "too great a morsel for their greedy mouths," said Melrose. Charles "wondered and was displeased" at the insurrection of his very own men, the bishops and archbishops.<sup>23</sup> The ministers, both of the Conformist and good old Presbyterian parties, began now to speak of a General Assembly. When that came, chaos came with it. Meanwhile the details of valuation of teinds were worked at, and a certain amount of definiteness was reached, in Charles's "Decreits Arbitral," in 1629. The king had consulted in the summer of 1628 with members of the Privy Council and others. If we believe the gossip of Burnet, the angry nobles had a plot to slay these advisers on their return, in the good old style; but Burnet's evidence is not always trustworthy, and the date is unknown. The teinds were valued by Charles at nine years' purchase, and at one-fifth of the rents of the lands on which they were levied.<sup>24</sup> "All men desiring to have their own teinds came in willingly," says Row,<sup>25</sup> but this point is disputed. "It appears from a report of Commissioners in 1636 that at that time the far greater sort are not yet valued."<sup>26</sup> Parliament confirmed the settlement in 1633.

As for the Church lands (not the tithes), the holders were to retain them, paying a rent to the Crown. There is no doubt, we repeat, were it only for the evidence of Balfour—a Bishop-hater indeed, but as Lyon attached to the king—that the Revocation produced discontent, apprehension of greater changes to come, and a tendency on the part of the nobles to side with the exasperated preachers. The preachers, again, like most people, felt no gratitude for benefits that resulted from a political measure. The Revocation was an inducement to rebellion. Mr Gardiner says "in its final shape the arrangement is worthy of memory as the one successful action of Charles's reign . . . it weakened the power of the nobility, and strengthened the prerogative in the only way in which the prerogative deserved to be strengthened . . . by the popularity it gained through carrying into effect a wise and beneficent reform. . . . It is hard to say that the nobility had any real ground for dissatisfaction."<sup>27</sup> But there is no sign of any access of popularity: the prerogative could not be strengthened by diffusing general suspicion of revolutionary royal designs; and, in short, if the Kirk was better endowed, Charles was more detested.

His ecclesiastical policy blew the fire of hatred from another quarter. In July 1626, he sent down a letter as to the standing source of disquiet, the Articles of Perth. These, it will be remembered, enjoined kneeling at the Communion, which savours of idolatry. Nonconformist ministers ordained before the passing of the Articles were, for a time, to be gently used, provided that they did not agitate against the Articles. Ministers banished or imprisoned for nonconformity were, under certain conditions, to be repatriated and released. Ministers ordained since the passing of the Articles were to be urged, under episcopal censure, to conformity: all were to sign a band of conformity. But Catholic nobles, like Nithsdale, and (later) Huntly, Angus, and Abercorn, were not to be "troubled for their religion."<sup>28</sup> Yet, at Easter 1627, very few kneeled, and some ministers did not kneel at the Communion, in "the Great Kirk."<sup>29</sup> At Easter 1628, some preachers sent a remonstrance on the matter of kneeling to the king, which he answered angrily, in a letter to Spottiswoode, threatening "condign punishment."<sup>30</sup> There was no Communion. Robert Bruce, the veteran opponent of James, was confined to a three miles' radius of his house at Kinnaird. He had been preaching, near Edinburgh, that he was the only "lawful minister of Edinburgh living" (thus anticipating a later Cameronian divine), and that the Edinburgh ministers were, in his opinion, "greater enemies to the gospel of Christ than the bishops are," most of the Edinburgh preachers being conformists.<sup>31</sup> In 1630, Mr. Foster, at Leith, denounced Christmas celebrations, preaching on Christmas day.

It was obvious that the Articles of Perth were a smouldering fire. Many of the younger ministers did not much object to them, but the women, at all events, hated them furiously; and the older prelates, like Spottiswoode, had most reluctantly accepted them, merely to avoid the anger of the king. But younger prelates were coming in, who, in some cases, were anti-Calvinistic in doctrine. Latitudinarianism, “Arminianism,” had invaded the Kirk; already, as again in the eighteenth century, there were “Moderates,” who declined to preach “tidings of damnation.” The same men had no dislike of a modest amount of ecclesiastical costume, and of a liturgy which would prevent the grotesque language of “conceived” prayers: not really inspired by “the Spreit.” It was later, in 1634, that the devout Mr William Forbes became Bishop of Edinburgh. He lived but a few weeks as bishop there, but his faith, says Row, “was a strange miscellanie, farrago, and hotch-potch of Poperie, Arminianism, Lutheranism, and the rest,” in which he was followed by Bishops Maxwell, Sydserf, and Mitchell. “Then it was taught—The Pope is not Antichrist—A Papist living and dying such may be saved—Christ descended locally to Hell,—Christ died for all, intentionally to redeem all,—The Saints may fall from grace, finally and totally—Christ is really present in the Sacrament, Verbum audimus, motum sentimus, modum nescimus,” and other heresies.<sup>32</sup> To lay minds, it does not seem that the comment on the sacrament necessarily exceeds the sense of the nobly mystic words of Knox’s Confession of Faith—a theme not adapted for this place.* “The larger hope,” and the tolerance of Forbes’s teaching are not, laymen may think, less Christian in spirit than Spottiswoode’s cuffing of Father Ogilvie, whom he tortured and hanged, or Row’s use of “bellie-gods” as a synonym for bishops, however personally ascetic. While contemning Charles’s younger Scottish bishops as politicians; while detesting the odious policy of crushing the consciences of the people, we cannot but see that, in their doctrine, as often in their lives, these new conformist divines were infinitely nearer than their opponents to the mind of their common Master. They had reached a point in religion at which many of the Scottish clergy have now arrived; while certain of them have passed beyond it, into who knows what region of devout darkness and negation of belief. The world could not remain Calvinistic, even in Scotland, and the new bishops were pointing in the direction of Christian charity with one hand, while, with the other, they were forcing their flocks into a fold which these stubborn sheep would not enter. The bishops even favoured organs, and few kirks are now to be found without some such instrument. But, on this side, the bishops were guilty of an error condemned by a modern statesman, as by Charles Fox. They were "in advance of their time." *

* Mr Gardiner says that the Calvinistic doctrine is “that of a real but spiritual presence” (viii. p. 311).

Meanwhile the Kirk had understood that, by a definite promise of James, they were not to be tormented with innovations beyond the Articles of Perth. They had the word of the Marquis of Hamilton, when the Articles were ratified in 1621.<sup>33</sup> But this promise, Melrose told James at the time, was conditional on obedience to the Articles. How far they were obeyed we have remarked. In any case, as early as 1616, there had been attempts on the king's side to prepare and publish a Book of Canons, and a liturgy, and a large Commission was appointed to that end, under the sanction of the General Assembly at Aberdeen (vol. ii. pp. 510, 511). A draft of a liturgy was then drawn up; Cowper, Bishop of Galloway, being one of the constructors. (This was the Cowper, minister of Perth, who, in 1600, gave evidence as to the Earl of Gowrie's remarks on the extreme secrecy necessary in conspiracies. He died in 1619.) In 1619 Spottiswoode took the draft to Court, and it was to be printed. The thing stood over, and perhaps James thought that his promise of 1621 was binding on him.† In 1629, under Laud's influence, Charles returned to the project of the liturgy. Laud was pursuing his desire of uniformity, a mere will-o'-the-wisp in Protestant countries. Charles would now impose a liturgy by force. He failed, and by force the godly imposed the Covenant. Both parties were equally intolerant, equally reckless of conscience and of liberty. The king's idea was that the Scottish liturgy should be as near the English as Scottish national jealousy would permit. About 1629 a draft of what the Scottish bishops thought possibly feasible was taken to Court, but Laud recommended the mere imposition of the English liturgy.‡

Struthers, a conformist minister of Edinburgh (St Giles's Church), heard of these proceedings, and, on January 28, 1630, wrote a letter of remonstrance to the Earl of Airth, sometime Earl of Menteith, who, as a descendant of the second and legal wife of Robert II., caused some umbrage to Charles II. Struthers said that the people dreaded liturgy and organs. The bishops, he added, were already the victims of public detestation. When they deposed a noncon-* See Mr. Mathieson's 'Politics and Religion in Scotland,' i. pp. 326-344, for an appreciation of the bishops.

† The evidence is doubtful, being that of Hackett, in 'Life of Archbishop Williams' (p. 64), in the passage where he mentions James's expressed distrust of Laud.

‡ I follow Dr. Sprott in his work already cited.

formist, they could scarcely find a substitute to take his place. Popery may increase, "The people universally will be made susceptible of any religion, and turn atheists in gross."<sup>34</sup> Indeed the Reign of the Saints was attended by the rise of the craziest sects "of any religion," down to that of Meikle John Gib, who ended as a medicine man, or pow-wow, among the Red Indians. This was the result of uniformity enforced by secular violence. In 1631, Maxwell preached in Edinburgh, on the divine appointment of bishops, against which some of the canny prelates themselves remonstrated. Such was the condition of ecclesiastical affairs, so violent was the repugnance to Anglican innovations, when Charles, in 1633, came to Holyrood for his coronation, with Laud in his train.

It was on June 15 that Charles, with a very gallant company, entered Edinburgh. The good town had made some effort to sweep and garnish itself. The custom was to place all of what would now be the sewage of each house, simply in the public streets, whereby they "abounded with all kind of filth." This was forbidden for the time, and it was designed to appoint a dustman, "some honest man with ane kairt and hors," to carry away refuse. The heads on spikes which, by a lovable custom, usually decorated the gates, were removed: the heads were those of "some malefactors," unknown; and no Presbyterian prophet predicted that the king's head would soon be in little better case. A gallows with a casual malefactor, which enlivened the links (Bruntsfield links?) was also taken away.<sup>35</sup> The pageants were unusually magnificent, but the picture of the everyday state of the dirty town is more instructive than a record of its occasional splendour.

Though gallows and heads of malefactors were concealed, the real skeleton in the closet at once made its appearance. An Edinburgh preacher named Hogg, in his own name and that of other brethren, presented Charles with a list of grievances, which the king read through, says Balfour.<sup>36</sup>

1. The bishops had not observed the celebrated "caveats," as under the law of 1597. They ought to propose nothing in Parliament, Council, or Convention, in name of the Kirk, without warrant from the Kirk.

2. They do not give accounts of their stewardship to General Assemblies.

3. The Kirk should be heard on all this, and the bishops kept under the ignored caveats.

4. General Assemblies, by law (1592), should be held yearly : this law ought to be ratified.

5. The unholy Articles of Perth are contrary to an Act of 1567 ; moreover nonconformists are nicknamed " Puritans," and are oppressed.

6. New oaths for ministers are coined. Here Row, in a comment, avers that whoever takes the oath " obliges himself to be an incarnate dewill." Ne fait ce tour qui veult : but Row is very convinced. He adds, ominously, that all have " abjured antichristian prelacy in the Covenant" (1581) " which binds the posterity as well as the takers of it at first."<sup>37</sup> Row makes it clear, however, that many ministers were now on the conformist side.

These and similar ejaculations were presented to Charles at Dalkeith, on June 13, before he entered Edinburgh. The demands of Hogg were like the books of the Sibyl. Charles was to buy them later at a dearer ransom, or rather was to abandon much that, had he conceded what was now asked, he might have retained. His coronation service was adroitly contrived to increase the Protestant tremors of men who believed Buckingham to have been a Papist. Spottiswoode and some bishops wore white sleeves, which, at James's funeral, Spottiswoode had disdained. There was " a four cornered table in manner of an altar, with two books at least resembling clasped books" (a sight of dread), and candles, and a basin, " wherein there was nothing." There was a tapestry, wrought with the Crucifixion, to which the bishops becked and bowed, " for the quhilk they were all deposit." Matters had gone far beyond organs ; here was plain idolatry.<sup>38</sup> Later came the Riding of Parliament, the king " alighted at the stinking stile," so called par excellence.

The Parliament was a mere burlesque of a constitutional assembly. So irregular had the shadowy constitution been, that the all-important Lords of the Articles were chosen in different ways at different times. In the Reformation Parliament or Convention of 1560, according to Randolph, the Spiritual Lords were chosen by the Temporal (vol. ii. p. 76). This manner was revived. But the Spiritual Lords, in 1560, were in many cases lay holders of abbeys and parsonages " in commendam," and, as such, were paid to be trusty Protestants. In 1633 the Spiritual Lords, being bishops, were politically creatures of the king, who was the creature of Laud. Consequently they chose convenient Lords, including the young Duke of Lennox, and the young Marquis of Hamilton. He had been accused by Lord Reay (Mackay of Strathnaver) of treasonable designs, while abroad aiding Gustavus Adolphus, in 1631. But the king loved and trusted Hamilton: loved too blindly, trusted too long. The Sixteen Lords of the Articles chose eight from the Lairds, and eight from the Burgesses, and Charles added eight officers of the Crown.<sup>39</sup> The Lords of the Articles were thus a packed body, and to the House their recommendations were offered in block: there was no debate on clauses, in fact no debate at all. The first Act, financial, imposed an income tax, and a reward was offered for informers against dishonest returns. Another Act enabled the king to regulate ecclesiastical costume, which now included "whites," or surplices, a thing abominable, being derived from the vestments of the priests of Isis. The Revocation was ratified. Francis Bothwell, son of the adventurous Bothwell who had so harried King James, was rehabilitated, and there was an arrangement about his recovery of lands from the Earls of Buccleuch and Roxburgh (Scott and Ker), names apt to hold a good grip of the gear, and not likely to be conciliated to Charles by the proceeding.<sup>40</sup> *

Against such measures as these a Supplication was drawn up by many members. The ecclesiastical innovations were denounced, and "such an inquisition in men's estates as is not practised in any other nation in Christendom."<sup>41</sup> This Supplication was not presented, but a copy later came into Spottiswoode's hands, and a son of that Balmerino who was ruined by James VI. was put at, and for many months lay in prison, for his connection with the paper. His father had been a true prophet; he beheld Scotland "coming in a vile servitude, the foresight of which is all my wrack" (vol. ii. p. 504). The maltreatment of the Balmerino of 1633 produced a spirited remonstrance from the poet recluse, Drummond of Hawthornden, who advised the king to read Buchanan's 'de Jure Regni apud Scotos.'<sup>42</sup> A poet, a man of peace, one who of all things hated turmoil, Drummond spoke out, but Charles was deaf to every warning. When the crash came, Balmerino had "a contented revenge."

When the bills were to be voted on in Parliament, the king openly noted down his opponents' names on paper; he meant to intimidate, he only enraged his subjects. The bills were carried, but it is said that Rothes challenged the correctness of the computation of votes. He was stopped by being told that he would imperil his life if he demanded a scrutiny and did not thereon prove his case. He, too, had his revenge.<sup>43</sup> A constitutional opposition had never existed in Scotland. The method of the dirk and the ambushade had prevailed. From these, in England, Charles was safe. The complaints of his northern subjects reached him faintly, in London; when in Scotland, he closed his ears to them. The gossiping Bishop Burnet heard many strange things from his father, who remembered such ancient worthy prophets as Davidson and Robert Bruce. Among other things he heard that, had Balmerino not been acquitted (his case dragged on into 1635, and he had been found guilty of "leasing-making" by a majority of one vote) his prison would have been forced, the hostile jurors killed, and their houses burned. In 1630 the Lord Aboyne (Huntly's son) and the laird of Rothiemay, had been burned to death in the house of the laird of Frendraght (Crichton): times still were violent. Treachery at Frendraght was suspected, and a young lady, Margaret Wood, was tortured in the boot; was accused of "prevarication," and publicly flogged.<sup>44</sup> These things arose out of a Crichton and Gordon feud, and it is perhaps uncertain whether Crichton of Rothiemay deliberately burned the Gordons who were his guests.<sup>45</sup> The popular ballad, The Fire of Frendraght, preserves the memory of the affair. The savage old temper survived in Scotland, and this temper Charles deliberately provoked in the strength of the Tudor theory of monarchy. He made Edinburgh a bishopric, appointed to it the egregious Forbes, already named as having maintained that the Redeemer died for all, and he "dung down" the partition walls which had divided St Giles's into two, an unsightly arrangement.<sup>46</sup> In the decadence of our age, St Giles's is once more a single church, and a fee is charged for admission, the building being thus open (to capitalists) on "lawful days."

* The Francis Stewart of 1633 was the forebear of the Frank Bothwell of 'Old Mortality,' who keeps a list of his family's estates and of their actual holders, signed Haud Immemor.

Charles had departed for England on July 18; in August, Laud became Archbishop of Canterbury. Row tries to prove that Laud's is the name of the Beast (Revelation xiii. 17, 18). Charles had now two sons to succeed him, Charles (1630), and James (1633). This was grievous to good men, for had the king remained "a barren stock" his more Protestant sister, Elizabeth, would have succeeded. Strange fortunes were prepared for his children by Charles's next important step, the effort to introduce "Laud's Liturgy."

NOTES TO CHAPTER I.

- <sup>1</sup> Row's 'Historie of the Kirk of Scotland,' p. 339.
- <sup>2</sup> Op. cit. pp. 346, 347.
- <sup>3</sup> Gardiner, 'History of England,' vol. vii. p. 145. 1899. In the small cheaper edition.
- <sup>4</sup> Gardiner, 'History of England,' vii. p. 142. Citing Soranzo's despatch, July 2/16, 1626. Venice, MSS. <sup>5</sup> Gardiner, 'History of England,' vi. 110.
- <sup>6</sup> Privy Council Register, i. (N.S.) pp. 91-93.
- <sup>7</sup> Privy Council Register, i., xix.
- <sup>8</sup> Privy Council Register, i. pp. 81, 82.
- <sup>9</sup> Gardiner, 'History of England,' vii. p. 297.
- <sup>10</sup> Balfour, 'Annals,' ii. p. 134.
- <sup>11</sup> Privy Council Register, i. pp. 193, 194.
- <sup>12</sup> Fraser, 'Haddington Memorials,' i. p. 169, ii. pp. 145-147.
- <sup>13</sup> Privy Council Register, i. pp. 227-233.
- <sup>14</sup> Balfour, 'Annals,' ii. pp. 141, 142.
- <sup>15</sup> Gardiner, 'History of England,' vi. p. 307.
- <sup>16</sup> Privy Council Register, i., c.
- <sup>17</sup> Privy Council Register, i., cv. pp. 351-353.
- <sup>18</sup> Privy Council Register, i., cxlii.
- <sup>19</sup> Privy Council Register, i. pp. 456, 457.
- <sup>20</sup> Balfour, 'Annals,' ii. pp. 153, 154.
- <sup>21</sup> 'Register of Royal Letters,' i. pp. 103-119.
- <sup>22</sup> 'Register of Royal Letters,' i. p. 145. March 26, 1627.
- <sup>23</sup> Privy Council Register, Second Series, i., cxcvii.-cxcix.
- <sup>24</sup> Act. Parl. Scot. v. pp. 197-207.
- <sup>25</sup> Row, 'Historie of the Kirk of Scotland,' p. 345.
- <sup>26</sup> Mathieson, 'Politics and Religion in Scotland,' i. p. 350, note 2; not in Library.
- Gardiner, 'History of England,' vii. pp. 279, 280.
- <sup>28</sup> Balfour, 'Annals,' ii. pp. 142-145.
- <sup>29</sup> Row, 'Historie of the Kirk of Scotland,' p. 343.
- <sup>30</sup> Row, 'Historie of the Kirk of Scotland,' p. 346.
- <sup>31</sup> Row, 'Historie of the Kirk of Scotland,' p. 347, cf. Privy Council Register, ii. p. 537, as to Bruce.
- <sup>32</sup> Row, 'Historie of the Kirk of Scotland,' pp. 371-373.
- <sup>33</sup> Sprott, 'Scottish Liturgies of the Reign of James VI.' p. xxxv., citing Calderwood and Spottiswoode. <sup>34</sup> Balfour, 'Annals,' ii. pp. 181-184.
- <sup>35</sup> Documents Relative to the Reception at Edinburgh of the Kings and Queens of Scotland, Edinburgh, 1822. <sup>36</sup> Balfour, 'Annals,' ii. pp. 215, 216.
- <sup>37</sup> Row, 'Historie of the Kirk of Scotland,' p. 361.
- <sup>38</sup> Spalding, i. p. 36. <sup>39</sup> Act. Parl. Scot. v. pp. 9, 10.
- <sup>40</sup> Act. Parl. Scot. v. pp. 15-55.
- <sup>41</sup> Row, 'Historie of the Kirk of Scotland,' pp. 365, 366.
- <sup>42</sup> Masson, 'Drummond of Hawthornden,' pp. 233-241.
- <sup>43</sup> Row, 'Historie of the Kirk of Scotland,' pp. 366, 367, note 1.
- <sup>44</sup> Spalding, i. pp. 17-21.
- <sup>45</sup> Privy Council Register, ii. pp. 533, 534.
- <sup>46</sup> Row, 'Historie of the Kirk of Scotland,' p. 369.

CHAPTER II.

THE LITURGY AND THE COVENANT.

1633-1638.

WHILE in Scotland, Laud, like Charles, had been struck by the neglected and ruinous condition of the sacred buildings. As early as 1626, he had ordered the cathedral of the Bishop of Ross to be repaired, and "that every diocese should take the like course with their cathedral church, as being a principal parish church to them all."<sup>1</sup> A few new churches were built under Spottiswoode: one, at Dairsie in Fifeshire, is a curious example of Jacobean imitation of mediæval architecture. Decency, orderliness, uniformity, were what Laud and Charles desired in churches as in services. "Our father of blessed memory immediately after his coming into England compared the decency and uniformity of God's worship here, with that diversity, nay, deformity, which was used in Scotland, where no set or public form of prayer was used, but Preachers or Readers and ignorant Schoolmasters prayed in the Church, sometimes so ignorantly that it was a shame to all religion to have the Majesty of God so barbarously spoken unto; sometimes so seditiously that their prayers were plain libels girding at sovereignty and authority; or Lies, being stuffed with all the false reports in the Kingdom." So Charles said, or was made to say, in his 'Large Declaration,' issued in 1639 (p. 16).

There did, in fact, exist a book of common order for prayers in church, but, if the king is right, "conceived prayers," barbarous and political, were not unusual.

As to the condition of the sacred edifices, it was a not uncommon, if not an official Presbyterian opinion, that there was no holiness in a place: a house built with hands. The practical inference was that, in testimony to this doctrine, churches might be as neglected and dirty as suited the genius of the people and the age. Father Baillie, a Benedictine, described St Giles's Church in 1627. "Bare walls and pillars all clad with dust, sweepings and cobwebs . . . and on every side the restless resorting of people treating of their worldly affairs ; some writing and making obligations, contracts, and discharges, others laying counts or telling over sums of money. . . . The west end of the church is divided into a high house for the College of Justice, and a lower house, called the Low Tolbooth," for minor cases.<sup>2</sup> "Ye have made it a den of thieves."

In such circumstances, Laud and Charles desired to introduce decency, and, practically, the English Liturgy. The desire was, in itself, blameless ; not so the despotic measures by which a book of prayer, with, it might be feared, soap and water to follow, was thrust on the Kirk and the nation. The Book of Common Prayer of Knox was more a guide or directory to the conduct of the services than a text to be strictly followed : "conceived prayers," by the minister himself, were more congenial, and were perhaps directly inspired. They were as political as the sermons. Meanwhile, even to so learned and relatively moderate a Presbyterian preacher and historian as Baillie, later Principal of Glasgow University, the beautiful prayers of the Liturgy seemed "anti-christian." It is impossible to follow here, in detail, the development of a scheme for the revision of the Presbyterian book, a scheme which had hung incomplete for twenty years. The Scottish bishops practised a policy of delay, but Dr Sprott writes "It is evident that the Scottish Prayer Book was virtually settled in April 1636, by Laud and Wren writing into an English Liturgy the few changes suggested in Scotland, which they were willing to admit, and such other alterations, mostly in an opposite direction, as seemed good to them."<sup>3</sup> Not all of the Scottish bishops agreed. The book, and the Canons which preceded it, had no ecclesiastical sanction, either of all the bishops, or of a General Assembly. The imposition was an act of sheer royal autocratic papacy : the book, being English, insulted Scottish national sentiment ; the changes from the English version were deemed to imply a nearer approach to Rome. Protestantism was in danger. The landowners suspected that Charles meant to recover more of their old ecclesiastical estates, for the rebuilding of cathedrals, or cleaning of churches ; and thus, from "the rascal multitude" upwards, through every rank and condition of his subjects, he gave intolerable offence, and caused extreme apprehension. He lost three kingdoms and his head, not for a mass, but for a surplice. The Book of Canons, printed in 1636, preceded the Liturgy, and enjoined the acceptance of it; "The Masse in English," says Row. "All must subscribe the Oath of Supremacy and the Book of Canons."

An intention to introduce auricular confession was suspected. The communion table was to be at the upper end of the chancel, and the cup was named the chalice. There was to be no excommunication without the bishop's approval, and excommunication had been and continued, after 1638, to be the rod and staff that comforted and defended the Kirk. "Popish words" such as "clergy" and "laity" were employed. Happily the canons ("cannons" a joke of the day) could be turned against the wicked prelates, for the canons enjoined deposition for simony. Now the bishops were "glad to see money" (note the play upon words, or pun), and so they were righteously deposed in 1638. The complaints, and the joke, are chronicled by Row.<sup>4</sup>

The result of the introduction of the Liturgy is known to all. Baillie discovered that "the Liturgy is taken for the most part out of these Antichristian Writs"—the Romish rituals! Ministers were ordered to purchase the book and use it: they behaved in such various ways as they deemed convenient. On July 23, 1637, in St Giles's, "the common people, especially the women," made the historical riot. Row says that several stools were thrown at the dean; others, that one woman threw a stool: most historians now refuse the credit to Jenny Geddes. There was abundance of virtuous ribaldry, minutely chronicled by admiring pens. The bishop nearly fell into the hands of the mob, in the afternoon. It is not certain whether or not the tumult was prearranged, or whether the female "bangsters" were men in women's weeds. Spalding affirms that the riot was organised by the nobles, who heartily hated the bishops, as usurpers of their authority and "greedy mouths" gaping for their property.<sup>5</sup> Others attribute the beginning of the clamours to waiting-maids who were, apparently, keeping seats for their mistresses. These ladies liked sermons, it would seem, better than prayer, and meant to come in when the preacher arose. On the whole "the devouter sex," and the rascal multitude (which broke the church windows), were quite capable of doing spontaneously all that was done. Mr. Gardiner judiciously remarks that, if 'prentices disguised as women threw stools, they would not have missed. In any case the stool that was thrown played the part of the stone hurled at the tabernacle in the church of Perth (1559). The first shot in the long war had been fired.*

One effect of the Edinburgh riot was to perplex the Council, wherein, of course, the bishops, though no keen enthusiasts for the Liturgy, were of one mind, and most of the Lords probably of another. The next consequence was that public services of religion were put for a while under an interdict.<sup>6</sup> Again, the use of the Liturgy had been enforced under the sanction of "horning," a mild form of outlawry under which debtors habitually lay. Certain clergymen of Fife, notably Henderson of Leuchars, soon to be the most powerful minister in Scotland, took legal measures to stay the horning process. The Council decided that "horning" applied only to those who did not buy, not to those who did not use the Liturgy. Meanwhile the king commanded that the rioters should be punished (as in the Porteous case, they were not), and the Council were to enforce the use of the detested "mass-book."<sup>7</sup>

On the other hand, volleys of petitions or "supplications" were discharged against the book, from all classes, ranks, and bodies of the kingdom. The country, save in the north-east (the western Celt cared for none of these things), was united. Young Lennox carried to London a supplication from the Lords and Gentlemen, with a list of sixty-six other petitions.<sup>8</sup> The Duke could speak to the intense and uniform excitement of the country. The names of the noblemen suppliants by themselves prove the unanimity. From the far north came Sutherland; Fifeshire sent Rothes; for Ayrshire was Cassilis; for the eastern Border, Home; there were Lothian, Kinnoul, Wemyss, Dalhousie, Montgomery, Fleming, Lindsay, Elcho, Yester, Sinclair, Loudoun, Balmerino, Burley, Dalziel, Cranstoun, Boyd; men whose fathers had stood on different sides in the wars of Moray and Mary, of Church and Kirk. Drawn up in long lines, nobles on one side, ministers and lairds on the other side of the road, from the Cross and the Luckenbooths to the Stinking Stile, they had waited for Lennox: the Council received the petition (September 20), and handed it to him.

* An excellent account of the development of the Liturgy will be found in Mr. Hill Burton's 'History of Scotland,' chapter lxviii. The author goes into the question with the zest of a book hunter. Dr Sprott's work is also admirable. Of the riot perhaps the most complete contemporary account is in Lord Rothes' 'Relation of the Affairs of the Kirk, 1637-1638,' see the Appendix, Bannatyne Club, 1830. I have not thought it necessary to enter more fully into particulars.

Rothes had a conversation with Spottiswoode, and declares that the prelate merrily said "if the king would turn Papist we behoved to obey," and,—the fatal Tudor precedents in his mind,—he instanced Edward VI., Mary Tudor, and Elizabeth. He might have added Henry VIII. ; in any case it is clear that Charles I. was acting on the example of four English monarch-popes, who had changed the nation's creed at their will.<sup>9</sup> Rothes made the obvious reply ; parties in England had been so equal in force, that the king's will could lightly tilt the balance. In Scotland it was not so ; nearly all (for the Catholics were mere Ishmaelites), were then Presbyterian. When the Covenanters insisted that Charles I. and when the Protesters insisted that Charles II., should force Presbyterianism on England and Ireland, they returned, unconsciously, to Tudor principles. If it was wrong for the king to compel Scotland to accept the Liturgy, it was right for him to compel England and Ireland to accept Presbyterianism. Such was Covenanting logic.

Edinburgh was now thronged ; supplicants and excited persons of all ranks flocking in, as before the riot of December 1596. The only reply to their petitions was a royal order to Council bidding all strangers to disperse (October 17). The mob desired the Provost and Council to add supplicants for the town. There was a good deal of violence, and the Lords supplicant declined to depart from the city. The Council withdrew to Linlithgow, much as James did in 1596, but now nobody was alarmed.

A letter from the king was expected on November 17 ; again there was a huge gathering of anxious malcontents. They left commissioners of every rank in Edinburgh, to watch and warn ; these four sets of commissioners were later representatives of nobles, lairds, burgesses, and clergy.<sup>10</sup> They formed, in short, a kind of Committee of Public Safety, as in 1596 ; and were infinitely more powerful than the divided and timid Council who, from fear of mobs and tumults, acquiesced in the arrangement. This appears very weak on the part of the Council, but they were assured, says Rothes, by the king's advocate, Sir Thomas Hope, that the supplicant party might meet and choose commissioners "for any public business."<sup>11</sup> Here, in these four bodies of representatives, called "The Tables" was the nucleus of an organisation, revolutionary, so far as it resisted Government ; conservative, so far as it opposed a revolution on the part of the king. For years such standing committees were to govern Scotland.<sup>12</sup> The men of the Tables, the Sixteen, always protested their loyalty, and "conspired," as Charles II. said of later Whigs, "by advice of counsel." Their contention was that the bishops were the guilty parties, and, as such, ought to be prosecuted, not allowed to sit judging the case in the Council. The king, dallying with the crisis, merely published a statement of his aversion to Popery, and of his intention to do nothing contrary to law (December 7).<sup>13</sup>

The Commissioners of the supplicants kept up a kind of legal wrangle, presenting "Protestations" in answer to each move of the Council or utterance of the king. Traquair urged that they should make a humiliating submission, but, in February 1638, he found it necessary to go to Court and consult Charles. On February 15, Traquair having returned, Rothes announced to him that the supplicants desired all that the old Presbyterians had wanted,—yearly Assemblies, the enforcement of the "caveats" on bishops, the recall of the Articles of Perth, and, of course, the withdrawal of the Liturgy. The demands, if granted, would have made Scotland once more a slave to presbyters. Otherwise the nobles, barons, and burgesses would hang the bishops.<sup>14</sup> This last he said "in jest," and he actually protected prelates whom the godly intended to hang.<sup>15</sup> The supplicants now heard of a proclamation in which Charles, acquitting the bishops, took all the weight of the innovations upon his own Erastian head, and denounced meetings as treasonable. The supplicants therefore put in another Protestation, and went to Stirling where the Council was sitting. Their lawyers advised them to utter a Declinature, and, if that were refused, "a protestation according to order of law," as if the whole affair were a law-suit between the king and his subjects.<sup>16</sup> Roxburgh pointed out to Rothes, who was the leader, that the king had allies; for example, Huntly. Rothes answered that two Fife lairds could keep Huntly from crossing Dundee ferry, that "three parts of his name is decayed," and, in short, that the Gordons and the Cock of the North were not worth "a salt citron." That estimate later proved, at one time, nearly correct. In fact, there was, as yet, scarce any appearance of a Cavalier party, Aberdeen being the only considerable town that did not go with the supplicants. But in Scotland there remained "a set of men whose worth was hardly known" (as a Jacobite poet sings in 1745), and the godly burgesses were to reckon with the claymore ere all was done.

There now occurred a grotesque race to Stirling, Traquair spurring to get a new proclamation out, and the legal protestors of the supplicants hurrying after to meet it with a protestation. The supplicants, Lindsay and Home, won the race easily, and Stirling was soon full of the precisians whom an old song unfeelingly styles "the lousy tykes o' Fife." Proclamation and protestation clashed, amidst great crowds, at Edinburgh on February 22. No man was more forward in protesting than young MONTROSE. "He was a gay gallant," and he climbed up on a puncheon that stood on the scaffold, when Rothés remarked "James, you will not be at rest till you be lifted up there above the rest, in three fathom of a rope."<sup>17</sup> Though godly, Rothés was not exactly a saint, but, alas, he prophesied sooth! The leaders now sent to warn the country far and wide, bidding men neglect all proclamations inhibiting meetings. In 1596, it was the preachers who thus summoned illegal gatherings, but now the nobles took the lead.

They "fell upon the consideration of ane band of union to be made legally,"<sup>18</sup> for bands were as illegal as they were common, in all cases of feud, murder, and resistance to authority. We have heard of scores of "bands," usually for purposes of bloodshed. But this band was to be "made legally." Nothing more angered the Covenanters than to be told that the Covenant was merely a "band" with all the sanguinary associations of such documents. But of all bands, this modest "legally made" band was to be the bloodiest. For some fifty years it incarnadined the fields, and moors, and streets of Scotland. It became a kind of fetish, renewed again and again by the Westland and Galloway Whigs, long after it had ceased to harm "the idolatrous occupant of the throne," the Hanoverian king. Much sentimental writing has been produced in praise of the noble conduct of the Covenanters. But the point to be kept steadily in mind is this, the resistance to the thoroughly despotic, illegal, and strictly irreligious infliction of the prayer book on people who preferred "conceived prayers," was not only justifiable, but most praiseworthy. On the other hand, the expression of that resistance in a document binding the country, "while sun and moon endure" to a supposed band with Jehovah, was an anachronism fatal to the peace and liberty of two generations. The arrangement, in ten years, bred a civil war within a civil war, and for half a century deluged Scotland with blood and tears.

O pectora cæca! Could the men who thought the "legally made band" such a clever stroke of attorney-like statesmanship have foreseen their fates, they might never have sworn as they did, to the revised edition of the old "Covenant" of 1581, the Covenant which they broke, as some held (but this is a question of interpretation), when they left the king in English hands, and went home with part of their wages. The band gave itself out as "The confession of faith of the Kirk of Scotland," as first signed by James VI. and his household in 1580, again by persons of all ranks, with the sanction of the Privy Council and General Assembly in 1581, again, in 1590. To this was now added "a general band for the maintenance of the true religion, and the king's person." The Covenanters aver that "the present and succeeding generations in this land are bound to keep the aforesaid national oath and subscription inviolable," as if one generation could bind posterity to a form of belief, that belief being, in fact, Presbyterianism, with all its odious claims to interference with the State. The confession was negative, mainly anti-papal. The innovations of Charles were to be understood as banned in the confession of 1580-81, "no less than if every one of them had been expressed in the aforesaid confessions."

The important clause is "we promise and swear that we shall, to the utmost of our power, with our means and lives, stand to the defence of our dread sovereign the King's Majesty, his person and authority, in the defence and preservation of the aforesaid true religion, liberties and laws of the Kingdom." * The clause last cited appears capable of being understood as only binding the subscribers to defend the king's person, so far as he practises "the aforesaid true religion." Later, when the king's head was off, the English sectaries pointed out to the Covenanters that, in beheading the king (who was not a Presbyterian), they had not broken the Covenant.

"Gathered by God and a good cause," says Rothes, the Scots had made their legal band. "This being drawn, was revised and corrected by many learned ministers, and subscribed by many thousands of the nobility and gentry at the Greyfriars Kirk, on Wednesday the last of February." Preachers and burghs subscribed, and, as the saintly Rothes remarks, were "admitted again in Covenant with God."<sup>19</sup> Scotland was once more in the happy posture of Israel of old, and enjoyed a definite legal instrument, binding on all posterity, and regulating the relations between itself and the Creator of the universe. Nothing was absent but the signature of the other high contracting party. The whole affair was the most mischievous of ignorant anachronisms: Scotland was not really præ-Christian Israel, as the framers of the Covenant seemed to suppose.

* The whole band may be consulted in Gardiner's 'Constitutional Documents,' 54-64.

The public signing of the Covenant, probably on March 2, by the stern but weeping populace, on a flat stone in the kirkyard of the long dispossessed Franciscans, has been duly celebrated in Scottish art and letters. "What they felt," says Mr Gardiner, in the same strain as Rothes, "was the joy of those who had been long led astray, and had now returned to the Shepherd and Bishop of their souls." But surely "Bishop" is out of place?

They were not to be led "in pastures green, the quiet waters by." The position of Scotland was now much like its attitude throughout the War of Independence. Union with England would then have been a happy thing—but not a compelled union. The adoption of the excellent English Liturgy need not, perhaps, have led to the loss of souls, and would have saved the world from the eccentricities of "conceived prayers," such as many of us have listened to with a sigh or a smile. Even organs are no longer regarded in Scotland as the sirens of Satan. But an imposed liturgy the country would resist to the death. Indeed, looked at in a purely secular way, the imposed liturgy was a beginning of royal lawlessness: moreover, the nobles and lairds had to take thought of their kirk-lands. So the great band flew through the country. It was malignantly averred that the band was not legal, after all. This, if so, ought to have been known to Sir Thomas Hope, and to Johnston of Waristoun, who are said to have been the legal advisers. Johnston had later the misfortune to be hanged: for twenty-two years was the short duration of the reign of the Covenant. After that came another king who knew the Covenant but too well, and hanged Johnston.

The lovable Confession of 1581, now renewed, was much occupied by theological amenities. "We abhor and detest all contrary religion, but chiefly all kinds of Popery, in general and particular heads." Under "all kinds of Popery" were included, it seems, all shades of Christianity which were not "defended by many and sundry notable kirks and realms, but chiefly by the Kirk of Scotland, the King's Majesty, and three estates of this realm." Now was England one of these happy realms? If so, then the Episcopal model was not, as such, popish and damnable. But Calderwood manages to include it thus: "under the name of wicked Hierarchy is condemned Episcopal Government," and he adds other Presbyterian arguments.<sup>20</sup>

As for the legality of the band, Charles and his supporters argued that none but the Magistrate could administer a public oath. That the act of James (in 1581), then aged fifteen, was at most but a precedent. That only King and Council had a right to renew the oath. That the Covenanters had no right to interpret the old negative confession of 1581 as applying, for example, to the then unborn Articles of Perth. That they had added a clause of mutual defence "against all persons whatsoever," not excepting the king. That all such bands of subjects, without the king's privity, were notoriously illegal. Other arguments there were,—for example, that "it looked not like a thing approved of God, which was begun and carried on with fury and madness, and obtruded upon people with threatenings, tearing of clothes, drawing of blood," and other outrages.<sup>21</sup> Perhaps the opponents of the band had the better of the legal arguments. The band, one ventures to say (though a modern Scottish legist has defended it), so far as compliance with legality went, was a failure. Charles had broken the law: now his subjects broke it; some of them had to find out how the law stood in this matter in their later time.

The sole excuse put forward to shield Charles, by loyalists, is that he was deceived by his advisers. Lord Napier, the friend and adviser of Montrose, asserts that his own enemies at Court were actually guilty of forgery. The gentlemen of the bedchamber (and the king's old "whipping boy" Will Murray, a man of much and mysterious importance) were said to read the letters from Scotland which the king kept casually in his pockets, and to send information to the Covenanting leaders.<sup>22</sup> Lord Napier himself, in a memorandum, blames the bishops, as does Balfour. But it is certain that Charles dragged on the bishops: they could not stop Charles. Moreover, like Napoleon before and during the Russian campaign, Charles refused to listen to advice which thwarted his project. "The king is not pleased to allow any of us to come to inform him," wrote Traquair, the treasurer, on October 19, 1637.<sup>23</sup> Though Traquair also complained of the bishops, who had not a friend, the whole "wyte" of the innovations lies on the heads of Laud and the king. Charles had no force in the now mutinous condition of England, and the Covenanters were in communication with the English Puritan malcontents. The king came, at last, to understand that he must give up much, but he did not perceive his true line of policy. He should have withdrawn the Liturgy, and revoked his Revocation; with full assurances that he would not meddle again with property and hereditary jurisdictions. The preachers would thus lose the additions to their maintenance from the tithes, and the nobles—their losses recovered, their fears allayed, their hold over the lairds regained with their lordships of tithes—would be separated, as of old, from the preachers.

Charles himself recognised and said, that Loudoun and Rothes, leaders against the Revocation, were, for the same reasons, leaders of the Covenanters. But the king merely “drove time,” and, among all the things that he uselessly abandoned, he did not abandon the one thing needful, the Revocation, little as it benefited himself.

Meanwhile, the Covenant “flew like fire about.” It was carried everywhere, and signature was forced on every one, with the threats, tumults, and bullyings becoming in a people newly awakened to freedom.<sup>24</sup> “They hound out rascally commoners on men who have not subscribed the Covenant.” The bishops sent Andrew Learmont to Charles with complaints, and details. Non-covenanting ministers were daily cursed to their faces, and their stipends were not paid. The loyal were unprotected, a thing most incident to loyalists, always and everywhere. The friends of Freedom, as ever, allowed no freedom to any but themselves. The zealots of liberty of conscience permitted no liberty of conscience to exist among persons of other opinions. In what respect their conduct was better than the king’s (which was as bad as possible), it is difficult to discover; but historians usually prefer the cause of popular to that of individual tyranny.

Mar had written to the under keeper of Edinburgh Castle, probably about munitions for the hold; the under keeper, “a great Puritan by reputation,” blabbed (February 26, 1638).<sup>25</sup> Presently the Covenanters had seized the keys of the castle, and practically blockaded it. Great palpable lies were told. There had been a design, it was said, to blow up the chief supplicants at Dalkeith, like Darnley; and, that failing, to cut their throats: we are reminded of Arbuthnot’s treatise on Political Lying,—to coin their own falsehoods is part of the rights of free peoples.<sup>26</sup> Before this latest development of Covenanting fancy (springing from the storage, at Dalkeith, of powder which could not be placed in the castle), Charles called Laud to Council, with Spottiswoode, the Bishops of Galloway, Brechin, and Ross, and the Marquis of Hamilton. Spottiswoode had not the courage of Father Ogilvie, the Jesuit whom he had buffeted, tortured, and hanged. He and the other Scottish bishops were very reluctant to go home again, where their lives were in danger.<sup>27</sup> The resolution taken was to send Hamilton down to Scotland, with concessions. The marquis was unwilling to undertake the task, knowing the ferocity of public feeling, and the impotence of the Crown; though, of course, he concealed that opinion from the king. Writers like the impetuous biographer of Montrose, Mr. Napier, keep reminding us that Hamilton had been accused of aiming at the throne. Charles had chivalrously shown his sense of the absurdity of this charge, but Hamilton really was a broken reed. He wished to be secure in his own great possessions. "He was naturally dark and reserved in discourse," says Clarendon, and having been with Gustavus Adolphus, he spoke much of war. He was thought wise, because he was obscure: military, because he talked of fight and siege; and so "was looked upon as a worse and more dangerous man than he deserved to be." If all tales are true, Hamilton, like his ancestor the waverer Châtelherault, was "Mr. Facing Bothways."

Hamilton carried with him two proclamations. In the first, after a preamble about the disturbance caused by the Liturgy, the Canons, and the Court of High Commission, Charles reiterated his horror of "the popish superstition." He promised never to press the innovations, "except in a fair and legal way," thereby condemning his own recent measures. The Court of High Commission "shall never impugn the laws." He would pass an amnesty to all who forswore and delivered up the illegal bands: all who maintained them should be proclaimed traitors. How little Charles knew the mind of the Scots! He, in their view, was only "Christ's silly vassal," as Andrew Melville had told James VI. They, on the other hand, to repeat Mr Gardiner's eloquent words, "had long been led astray, and had now returned to the Shepherd and Bishop of their souls"; not only so, they butted other sheep who would not enter their fold.

Spottiswoode knew his gentle flock. They would never abandon the band. But the king was peremptory, saying "that as long as that Covenant was not passed from, he had no more power than the Duke of Venice."<sup>28</sup> This was true; but the way to get rid of the band was to restore the nobles to their commuted tithes, and to abolish the Liturgy and the Articles of Perth. Even that was too late. Charles gave Hamilton an alternative form of proclamation, dropping the explicit demand for the surrender of the Covenant. Hamilton, before setting out, had summoned his friends to meet him in Scotland, just as Gowrie's friends met him with a cavalcade in May 1600. The Covenanters filled Edinburgh with armed men, as if a great Scottish trial by law were going forward. The usual and useful panic about popish villains assembling was excited, with the accustomed effect. As the Covenanters mustered in great force, and were blockading the castle, Hamilton stopped at Dalkeith, whither (as we saw) a cargo of powder intended for the castle had to be carried. The supplicants would not meet Hamilton at that house. Rothes is extremely prolix about the negotiations which ensued, the supplicants defending the clause in their band about mutual aid as legal. A great deal of pettifogging was done by subjects who were blockading, with more or less of publicity, the king's own castle. To haggle about legalities while excluding the king's supplies from the king's house was truly characteristic of the nation.

At last Hamilton met Rothes. He was as conciliatory as possible, but vowed that Charles could, and if need be would, have recourse to the ultima ratio regum, and a fleet of sixty vessels. Wentworth, later in July, sent to Charles a plan for subduing the Scots. It may or may not have been feasible, but Wentworth was not present to be "thorough." Rothes was not daunted by Hamilton's menace.<sup>29</sup> Hamilton anticipated that the usual threats (their use was denied by Rothes) would be employed to make himself and the Council (one of whom was Lorne, "the gleyed Argyll") sign the Covenant. The supplicants would put in their wonted protestation against any proclamation that did not withdraw the Articles of Perth, establish the caveats, grant a General Assembly, to precede and be ratified by a Parliament (extreme Theocracy, with a lay backing, being thus re-established). Of course neither proclamation met these demands, and the men of the band were also set on punishing the bishops "for their crimes." Hamilton thought of risking the milder proclamation in a few days (this is what he probably meant by "dividing the proclamation"), but looked for no good result, and asked for military forces if his measures failed. Yet victory in war would be "but over your own poor people." They will not abate their "impertinent and damnable demands," and intend themselves to call a Parliament.

The idea of a republic, we learn from Rothes, was not absent from the apprehensions of Hamilton.

By June 9 Hamilton left Dalkeith and was at Holyrood, the open and public blockade of the castle having been raised. Some 60,000 men and above 300 ministers met the Commissioner at Edinburgh. On the 13th he meant to publish the milder proclamation. He found that Hope, the king's very unfit advocate, maintained the legality of the great band, as did most of the lawyers and judges. A layman has no right to an opinion, but it does not seem probable that, in any earlier age, the view would have been taken by lawyers. Meanwhile Hamilton hoped that the crowds would disperse, and that, by protracting matters, Charles might gain time for warlike preparations. Only a complete conquest would avail: a work "of danger and some difficulty." He dared not issue the proclamation on the 13th. The gentry and nobles stood with swords in their hands, lining the road to the town cross.<sup>30</sup> The brethren of Fife occupied all one side of the way: when Montrose's war came, Fife was not so forward! "The wicked and accursed ministers" thundered in the old style: the pulpit, says Hamilton, is "the causer of all these evils." We sigh for Cotterell and his handful of Cromwellian musketeers! They were to come at last, and purge the General Assembly away, as at last the French galleys swept into St Andrews Bay to punish the murderers of the Cardinal.

Already (June 15) Hamilton foresaw the use that might be made of the men of the West Highlands and the Isles, not that they cared a farthing for religious disputes, but that they hated Lorne. On June 24, he writes that he has told "some of the best affected of them" that he must return to Charles and seek new instructions. Meanwhile Berwick must be Charles's base, Dumbarton was secured: as for Edinburgh Castle there was little hope. The Covenanters had long been arming, getting weapons and stores from many foreign ports.<sup>31</sup>

Charles, on June 20, replied very calmly that his military preparations, money, and fleet, were adequate. "I intend not to yield to the demands of those traitors the Covenanters."<sup>32</sup> But Charles was not thorough. Hamilton left Edinburgh on a promise to return in a month or less. He mainly wished to gain time, and to see that Charles really was ready for war; but he also had a scheme in the pettifogging way, the issue by the king of the Confession of 1581 under royal authority. But it was soon proved that the legalists of the other band had excellently pious reasons for not subscribing this one. Hamilton had left for England when a royal letter induced him to return with a proclamation which was instantly "protested." "It was openly said," writes Mr Gardiner, "that the right to hold Assemblies came direct from God, and that no earthly prince might venture to interrupt them" (citing Protestation, 'Large Declaration,' 98).<sup>33</sup>

It were tedious, and in our space hardly possible to recount all the comings and goings of Hamilton in August and September. He dared not even see his mother, of the house of Glencairn, one of the most devout of the devouter sex. The Council itself he had difficulty in carrying with him, though Charles threw over almost all his ecclesiastical cargo in the storm. On August 20, the Covenanters were threatening to hold an Assembly and Parliament on their own authority.<sup>34</sup> Montrose had gone to Aberdeen to secure subscribers to the Covenant, but in Huntly's region his methods would not yet serve, and the doctors of the University had the better in an exchange of written papers. Meanwhile many a douce and canny preacher must have felt the qualms which Baillie, later Principal of Glasgow University, a cautious man, and at bottom no fanatic, notes in his own experience. "I find no example of a National Assembly meeting against the will of the supreme Magistrate, . . ." he says, the said Magistrate "rightly professing." Indeed such a meeting without a Royal Commissioner does not seem to be contemplated even by that golden Act of 1592. However, among other concessions, Charles granted a General Assembly.

Now the General Assembly in these ages was merely the curse and scourge of Scotland, from one point of view; its rock of defence, from another. James had reduced it to a harmless condition by a system of packing its court, of tampering with his promises, and by the gradual introduction of bishops. All this royal policy was unfair and illegal, as we have frequently stated. But James had never done the one thing necessary. He had never utterly destroyed the Kirk's weapon of excommunication—a relic of Rome if ever there was any—with its civil consequences. Excommunication had indeed been placed under episcopal sanction and restraint. But the first thing that "a free Assembly" would do, would be to deprive bishops of authority, and to excommunicate them. Thenceforth this fiery two-edged sword would be used in all directions by the banded preachers.

Again, the old insufferable dictation of the "prophets" would certainly revive the empire of the men who judged angels, kings, and everybody. At first the allies of the nobles, the prophets would presently revolt, and rule Scotland in their own wild way. There could be no peace, and there was no peace, while the prophets bore rule. Charles should have fought rather than permit a revival of theocratic anarchy. But he could not fight; he had not the means—he lacked men, ships, and money. England was not with him; and England too, for a season, was consequently to find her own neck under the heels of the Presbyterian saints. She did not enjoy or long endure that situation.

Meanwhile there seemed a gleam of hope. The laity were the strength of the Covenanters, but the laity now insisted on sharing the privileges of the prophets. This, as Baillie says, "imported the ordinary sitting of laic Elders" (laic is a popish word, alas!) not only in sessions but also in presbyteries; their voting there in the election of ministers to bear commission, "this they" (the preachers apparently) "took to be an innovation, and of great and dangerous consequences." Prophets who are to go to the Assembly should only be elected by prophets. Baillie himself appears to have held that laymen might vote: but the "Table" of preachers had to be coerced into permitting this by the nobles, lairds, and burgesses. "Sundry of the brethren are very jealous of the gentry's usurpation over them."<sup>85</sup> In fact, by this "usurping," the gentry, for the time, got rid of the dangers with which the prophets might threaten them.*

When the Assembly was held, a body calling themselves "the Ministers of the Church of Scotland" put in a remonstrance against Ruling Elders "having chief hand in choosing of Commissioners."<sup>86</sup> In short, and to be done with such matters, loyalists maintained that the Assembly of 1638 was not free and legal. The godly maintained that, for nearly forty years, no other Assembly had been legal and free. Covenanters abolished, by a rescissory act, the Assemblies and laws of the past at their pleasure. So did Cavaliers, unto the Covenanters' Assemblies, with another rescissory act, when they returned to power (1661). It is waste of time to wrangle over the legal pettifoggings of revolution and reaction. Both were apt to be virulent and unjust.

* But probably there was no "usurpation." The method of election seems to have been that deemed orthodox by the Synod of Fife in 1597. At least a writer who is not an expert in Scottish Presbyterian legalities, can only remark that the synod conceived elders, having commission from their sessions, in matters of manners, to possess votes in the presbyteries. The provincial synods had the right "to choose the Commissioners to come from each shire to vote in the General Assembly."

Every step, good or bad, taken by Hamilton and Charles, to lull, however so little, the fury of the Covenanters, failed. The Negative Confession of 1581, which Charles stooped to sign,—the king's counter-covenant,—was rejected. The Council, above all Lorne (whom we may henceforth call Argyll, as his father died at this time), were not to be trusted by the king, nor were the judges; the king's advocate, Hope, was as anti-Episcopal as the fiercest fish-fag of Edinburgh. Hamilton now bought of Mar the Castle of Edinburgh, retaining the old lieutenant, who, he says, was no Covenanter. He intended to make General Ruthven governor; but as the castle was without one sound musket, Ruthven would not accept the position. The bishops were accused of all manner of offences, religious and secular, before the Presbytery of Edinburgh. Their mere existence was a crime, their opinions damnable, their morals unspeakable; indeed Hamilton, writing to Charles, does not regard several of them as immaculate. The bishops would, of course, decline the judicature of the Assembly, a thing that had now been for many long years in abeyance. They would, of course, as certainly be condemned, whether they appeared or not, whether they were guilty or not. Hamilton provided for the Episcopal clergy, as for the purchase of the castle, out of his own estate. He expected that, very probably, he would be assassinated, or kept as a hostage, and prayed Charles not to consider his safety in that case. There is a well-known tale, to be set forth later, that Hamilton had really played a double part, and had bidden the leaders, before the Assembly met, to be resolute, when, he told them, they would attain all their desires. Montrose is given as, from his personal knowledge, the source of this anecdote: he, later, appears to make it one of his charges against Hamilton, to which we shall return.

The place of meeting of the Assembly (November 21) was Glasgow Cathedral, which has miraculously escaped destruction by Congregation and Covenant. The nobles, as usual in such crises, had brought in their retainers, and "the rascal multitude" was well represented, and behaved with its noble independence of manner.

“We might learn from Canterbury, yea, from the Pope, from the Turks, or Pagans, modesty and manners. . . . Our rascals, without shame, in great numbers, make such din and clamour in the house of the true God, that if they aimed to use the like behaviour in my chamber, I could not be content till they were down the stairs.” So writes Baillie, but though he had threatened the Principal of the University into withdrawing a protestation against the legality of certain performances, Baillie was perhaps never quite a True Blue Covenanter. He had a sense of certain elementary decencies. Even Baillie was wearied with the legal discussions which occupied the first days of the Assembly. Alexander Johnston of Waristoun, a fire-brand of the law, was clerk, and accidentally let out a specimen of the “wire-pulling” and electioneering devices of the Tables. Alexander Henderson, the ablest man, Baillie thought, of the party, was Moderator, and set, as he always did, an example of becoming manners.

It were tedious and profitless to follow the “hairsplitting argumentativeness,” as Mr Gardiner calls it, of both parties. The Assembly put aside the question as to the nullity of certain elections. They were not going to hear election petitions. They voted themselves competent judges of the bishops, despite the prelates’ declinature. Hamilton then made the last of his protestations; “he acted it with tears, and drew by his speech water from many eyes, as I think: well I wot, much from mine,” says Baillie.* He then left the place. Legally speaking, by the Act of 1592 the Assembly would appear to have been ended. But it went on sitting, and working its will. Argyll spoke—a “somewhat ambiguous” speech, “and at that time we did not well understand him.” In fact he had gone over to the larger party. “He was probably as incapable of withstanding a popular belief as he was of withstanding an army of his foes,” says Mr Gardiner, who, nevertheless, praises Argyll as a statesman. But the Presbyterian belief was doubtless genuine in Argyll. His repute for ambition, cunning, and lack of military courage, has made him the reverse of a popular hero. But we have no reason to suppose him to have been a character so unusual as not heartily to hate a bishop.†

* The Rev. Robert Blair is said to have called Cromwell “a greeting deevil,” but many public men, in those days, were as frankly lachrymose.

† Baillie, i. pp. 119-144. Burnet, ‘Hamilton Memoirs,’ p. 106. ‘Hamilton Papers,’ Camden Society, pp. 40, 61. Hardwicke MSS. ii. pp. 113, 121. The

On October 14 Hamilton had written to Charles a remark truly prophetic. "I know well it is chiefly monarchy which is intended by them to be destroyed, and I cannot say but that it hath received so great a blow as it can never be set right till the principal actors have received their just punishment." That came to some of them, as to Waristoun and Argyll, poena pede claudo. That great collective enthusiasm, which now bound all Scotland together, except the clans, and the Gordons, and probably a fair proportion of the preachers, could not long endure. As when Jason cast the clod among the armed men born of the dragon's teeth, the Covenanters were to turn against each other their swords, and the lightnings of their excommunications.

Charles, for his part, thanked Hamilton, who had done his best: hoped "to shew myself like myself" (as unluckily he did), "before February or March," and thought that perhaps the Parliament promised had better be held, and that Huntly might have the Lieutenancy of the North, Traquair and Roxburgh of the South, all being subordinate to Hamilton (December 7, 1638).<sup>37</sup>

In the absence of Hamilton the Assembly went "at a great rate," as Burnet observes. The last six General Assemblies were declared legally invalid. This rescissory act, getting rid of forty years of law and custom, enabled the brethren to pounce freely on bishops and Episcopalians. The bishops were put at, and, whereas it was rather more than their lives were worth to appear before a Court of which last document contains Hamilton's very free personal remarks on the leaders of both parties.

Hamilton's letter of Nov. 27 is a remarkable paper. He writes as if this note might be his last, such was the Covenanting fury, or so he represented it. The troubles, he says truly, are the result of the illegal introduction of the innovations by "my Lords of the clergy"—he should mean Laud, but he accuses the Scottish bishops. Yet he finds fault with Traquair for opposing them. He promises loyalty—he obstructed Montrose. For Roxburgh, he reminds the king of the character of him by James VI. Roxburgh, too, failed in time of need. Huntly is hated, but "will be of greater use when your Majesty shall take arms in your hand"—Huntly merely skulked, and thwarted Montrose. "Argyll will prove 'he dangerousest man in this State'"—this was verified. Tullibardine is "a true hater of Argyll": he was a broken reed. Lauderdale "is truly honest": he did not, in fact, prove loyal, and a man less "honest" never sprang from the house of Lethington than Lauderdale's son, the Duke under the Restoration. Southesk is applauded: he merely trimmed. Dalzell is praised: he, as Earl of Carnwath, persuaded Charles not to head a charge at Naseby. The Covenanting nobles are, of course, hostile, "none more vainly foolish than Montrose." "Next to Hell I hate this place. . . . I wish my daughters never be married in Scotland." Yet he tried to marry one of them into the house of Argyll.

they denied the jurisdiction, one of them was denounced as impudent—because he desired to appear! In absence many were excommunicated in the most summary fashion; the rest were deposed. Baillie exults over their poverty in exile. Gordon remarks that while scores of conformist ministers were assailed for their irregularities, there appeared to be no absolutely peccant evangelist among the non-conformists. But Baillie does mention one of the brethren against whom an information was laid. "But the main thing alleged against him was but meddling with the Church box, and negligence in accounting for it."<sup>38</sup> The holy man was merely accused of robbing the poor, and he had refunded some of the money. He was referred to the presbytery of St Andrews, and, let us hope, restored the coppers of the charitable to the local paupers.

The allegations against Spottiswoode were, first, breach of the "caveats" which King James had been too slippery to enforce. The archbishop was also a Sabbath-breaker, a Simoniac, and kept 50,000 marks that had been raised for the release of some captives who lay among the Moors. He had also embezzled 5000 marks left by a Mr Wilkie for a bursary at St Andrews. It was the habitual practice, deep into the nineteenth century, to rob the University of St Andrews, whether Spottiswoode was guilty or not. There were other charges of having falsified the Acts of an Assembly. "His accusers offered to prove that he was guilty of many other gross crimes, or at least that there were very pregnant presumptions thereof against him." These were not produced. In short to be a bishop was to be guilty of everything and anything.<sup>39</sup> A minister of Melrose had blasphemed "conceived prayers," comparing them "to a bird in a cage, flying here and there": adding that "their cacologies and tautologies were intolerable," as they are even unto this day.<sup>40</sup> To give modern instances of "conceived prayers" would amuse rather than edify. To the credit of Baillie, he did try to resist a clause in which the Kirk was said to have forsworn every kind of Episcopacy and the "Articles of Perth" ("before they were made") in 1580-1581.<sup>41</sup> "It is one thing," Baillie said, "to pass by a policy as inexpedient, and another to abjure it as contrary to some article of the Confession of Faith." "Some, for the refusal of that declaration alone have been deposed from their ministry." Baillie was opposed to Episcopacy, opposed to the Articles; "albeit I be not yet satisfied of our Church's old adjuration" (in 1581), "I did never expect that for this sole and only cause an Act should be set above my head, or the head of any other, importing no less than the merit of deposition and excommunication." Legalised boycotting was to be the sword hung over all who would not thoroughly purge the garner, "when any of our evil wishers pleases," and Baillie was "liable to all the pains whereunto anti-covenanters are now liable, or may hereafter be made subject" (July 1639).<sup>42</sup> The victory was almost always on the side of the most fanatical in the Assembly.

The Restoration turned preachers out of their parishes, and imposed oaths intolerable. The Restoration did but follow in the path of the Covenant, but popular narrators of these events are apt not to dwell on this circumstance. One better thing the Assembly did: it prohibited Sunday salmon-fishing. Netting seems to be meant, and nets laid on Sunday, as well as every other day, only hasten the extinction of the species.<sup>43</sup> Among other forms of freedom, that of the Press was put at. "Because several papers, the years past, had been printed against the Covenant, therefore the keys of all printing presses were put in the hands of Mr. Archibald Johnston" (of Waristoun, clerk of the Assembly). "The ordinance bore that nothing that concerned the acts of the Assembly, nor any treatise which concerned the Church, should be printed without Mr. Archibald Johnston's warrant and approbation, under pain of all ecclesiastical censure," which one takes to imply excommunication. Such was the amount of liberty permitted by men who are said to have fought for freedom of conscience.<sup>44</sup> Baillie thinks that the Assembly did not mean to trust "the youth" (Waristoun) quite so far. It was thought that Arminianism needed "a wipe" (in Randolph's phrase about Knox), and the wipe was administered by Baillie. Arminianism is "a deep, and large, and intricate subject," he says; he had only a night and a day for preparation, but he pleased the hurried Assembly.<sup>45</sup>

To keep down the Universities, which Knox had always dreaded and distrusted, Mr Robert Blair was sent to St Andrews, Henderson to Edinburgh, Dickson to Glasgow, and Andrew Cant to the eminently malignant and wickedly learned Aberdeen.<sup>46</sup> Just as the ancient Church had found that universities were not breakwaters of heresy, but fountains of the same (like the Well of St Leonard's), so love of the Covenant was not a natural or not a necessary flower of university soil. The four dictators became famous in the course of the troubles. The Assembly broke up on December 20, after a Royal Proclamation, issued by Hamilton, and followed by the inevitable protestation in reply.<sup>47</sup> Argyll addressed the brethren in such terms as he deemed convenient. They determined to meet at Edinburgh in July 1639.

The issue must now be left to the sword. The Tudor theory of monarchy had broken down in catastrophe, and only revolution and anarchy lay before the country. James and Charles had brought things to this pass. Liberty and freedom bear different senses in different ages. The liberty desired and secured by the Covenanters was, in one light, a mere shifting of the weight of tyranny into the opposite balance. "Of liberty of thought these Scottish preachers neither knew anything nor cared to know anything," says Mr Gardiner (viii. 374). Such appreciation of liberty of thought as did exist, was to be found among the excommunicated and deprived "Arminians." But national and political freedom from the intolerable Tudor system, an English gift to the north, freedom from the lawless caprice of a king, had been reached, and was, through infinite troubles, to be secured: as, in the long run, was freedom from the tyranny of preachers.

The Scottish Revolution was to produce no great man, at once soldier and statesman, such as Cromwell, Washington, and Napoleon. An English historian writes, "To pass from a history which tells of Wentworth and Northumberland, Cottington and Portland, Essex and Saye, to a history which tells of Rothes and Loudoun, Balmerino and Lindsay, is like passing from the many-coloured life of the 'Iliad' to the Gyas and Cloanthus of the 'Æneid.'" But Montrose and Argyll are not colourless and unoriginal. Montrose, the most sympathetic figure in the whole history of Scotland, was a poet as well as a soldier; Argyll had somewhat of the astuteness of Lethington. But whereas in the English, French, and American revolutions the shock of circumstances supplied an adequate armed force which would follow a great leader and sweep him into power, the civil war in Scotland produced no such coherent body; nothing like the armies of Cromwell, of the French Republic, or of the homogeneous United States. Montrose had to do miracles with Celtic levies, ever ready to disband: the Covenanters were smitten by Cromwell, and split into factions, marching only at the music of "the drum ecclesiastic." Had Argyll been a soldier; had Leslie been a genius; had Montrose, after making himself free from the Covenant, possessed the materials of a stable Royalist.

army, the man, not only great, but successful, would have been found.

At this point it may be well to sketch the characters and previous careers of the men most eminent in "the Troubles." Rothés has already played his part, for he died, aged forty-one, in 1641, at a time when he was veering towards the Royalist party. As the chief peer in Fife, he inherited the traditions of the Leslies who had been implicated in the murder of the Cardinal, and the anti-monarchic and Presbyterian sentiments of the county of the Melvilles. He had been active, as we know, in the opposition to the Revocation, and politically, if not personally, he was a sound Presbyterian. His Memoir as to the stormy affairs of 1638 exhibits him as cool, resolute, and genial: saying various things "in jest," which were to be transmuted into earnest. A fanatic he was not, and is probably not falsely accused of having been "prone to levity and addicted to pleasure." He was not an austere moralist, like Murray of old, or Argyll, but he had the universal and sincere jealousy and hatred of the bishops. For the part which he played he was excellently adapted: he had an attractive frankness of manner: his temper was admirable, he was not to be intimidated, and it remained to be seen whether or not he was to be bought. His son, created Duke of Rothés by Charles II., was one of the profligate oppressors of the Restoration: his face, in a miniature preserved by the family is marked by the worst passions. Rothés himself had a large fat chin, a high brow, great round eyes, and a countenance essentially Scottish.

Of Hamilton the character must be tracked through his many variations. Charles gave the clue to it, when he called the marquis "very active for his own preservation." His position, so near the succession to the Crown, probably never led him to indulge any dreams of ambition. "To hunt with the hounds and run with the hare," to make himself tolerable to both parties, was his real policy, and Gudyill, in 'Old Mortality,' justly says that his head was never of much value, though "a sair loss to him, puir gentleman." His instincts were loyal: Charles was his personal friend, and, however much he might tamper with the Covenanters, he never would have been a party to the selling of his prince.

Argyll has shared in the general unpopularity of the Campbells. They were, in Scotland, the foremost type of the man, or family, who "birses yont," who pushes forward, with a set policy of aggrandisement. Alone of the Highland clans, the Campbells had usually been on the side of the central Government. They had the police work of the West, they ousted Macdonalds and Macleans, and were perpetually accused of fostering the feuds by suppression of which they profited. The young Argyll, who was defeated at Glenrinnis in 1594, by Huntly and the Catholics of the North, and who, later, subdued the Macdonalds of Islay and Kintyre, broke down as a poverty-stricken Catholic exile. He was allowed to come home, and died in England, in the autumn of 1638, just before his son, the Argyll of the Troubles, while still a member of the Council, joined himself to the revolutionary Assembly of Glasgow. This earl was born apparently between 1605 and 1607.<sup>48</sup> He was added to the Council in May 1628, probably just after he attained his majority. His guardian was the Earl of Morton. In 1621 Lorne went to the University of St Andrews, where, like Montrose later, he left a silver medal attesting his skill in archery—his only proof of any military quality, it has been said. He approved of golf, "that excellent recreation, than which truly I do not know a better," cricket being then in its infancy, even in England, and football not setting this nobleman's genius.

At nineteen Lorne married Margaret, second daughter of Lord Morton. His relations with his father and his father's second wife and family were hostile, and Clarendon says that his father, the old earl, described Lorne to the king as "a man of craft, subtlety, and falsehood, and can love no man." That Clarendon could gossip foolishly about Scottish affairs, for instance, when he accuses Montrose of offering himself to the king as an assassin, is certain. The father and son, Argyll and Lorne, were on bad terms about money, and the sire may or may not have said something splenetic. Just before the St Giles's riot of 1637, Lorne had an altercation with the Bishop of Galloway: he defended Gordon of Earlstoun, who had brawled in church over the matter of kneeling at the communion. Lorne then convened Rothes, Traquair, "a great enemy of bishops," and other nobles, and showed that he, like every one else, entertained a jealousy of the prelates. The Council was the arena of a scandalous outbreak by the Bishop of Galloway.<sup>49</sup> So far Lorne merely shared the universal detestation of episcopal meddling, for which, again, the king was responsible. When the famous Samuel Rutherford was deprived of his parish, Anwoth, for non-conformity, Lorne took the side of the preacher, "a poor unknown stranger to him." Lorne was one of the Council who visited London soon after the Covenant was started, and his father, Argyll, is said to have advised Charles to keep him in England, "or else he would wind him a pirn."<sup>50</sup> Tangled in the threads of his own "pirn," Argyll at last died for his treasons.

As we know, at the Assembly of Glasgow, Lorne, now Argyll, joined the Covenanters, though he had signed the King's Covenant. He alone of the Council supported the Assembly. Whether Argyll merely "shouted with the largest mob" (as Mr Gardiner practically states), or whether he courageously supported the weaker cause, may be disputed. He certainly must have known the strength of the national movement, and the impotence of the king.

Argyll has a reputation for the reverse of beauty. One of his portraits gives him a fair, intelligent, and melancholy face. Another makes him a moustached and resolute personage. His eyes, those of "gleyed Argyll," were "ill placed," says Clarendon. A late portrait (1652) robs the marquis of all his gallant costume, and shows him as a gloomy being, in a black skull-cap, wearing something like the apparel of a preacher. Life has clearly not been a success with Argyll. As to his lack of military courage, "he was not John of Gaunt," and we shall have opportunities of estimating his conduct, his ambition, and his patriotism. He certainly was, to Royalty "the dangerousest man in Scotland," and could probably put 5000 Highlanders in the field, though he never led them with conspicuous gallantry, never to anything but disaster.

Unlike Argyll's, the laurels of Montrose are immortally guarded "under the wings of Renown." The leader of warlike men, swift and secret in his onslaughts, the poet, the cavalier, the soul of air and fire, the foremost to head a forlorn hope, at last the forsaken victim of a forsaken cause, Montrose is for ever dear to the imagination. Indeed, imagination was his master: if his fancy was affected by the universal enthusiasm for the national faith, with that tide went Montrose. If he beheld an insulted king, and suspected that he might himself be made the subject of an usurping subject, he stood for the Crown. His temper brooked no rival, his heart knew no fear, and, whether he wore the blue ribbon or the red, he bore himself still as the same gay gallant, flamberge au vent. In character he was rather French than Scottish: he had ideals learned from Plutarch's men: he must be active, he must be great.

Mr Gardiner says that "there was but one mean action in the life of Montrose," and the full truth about that action, as we shall see, cannot now be ascertained. It was his misfortune, after he changed sides, to work with forces strong only for destruction, not for construction, forces anti-national, not national. He "kept the bird in his bosom," and no heart of more passionate loyalty ever beat, than that whose posthumous fortunes were a chapter of romance.

Montrose, though of an ancient house, with rich lands on either side of Scotland, was not, like Huntly, Argyll, or Hamilton, the chief of a great "name" or clan. Born in 1612, he had for grandfather that Earl of Montrose who was so long at the head of the Scottish administration. His father was a quiet man, much addicted to tobacco: his mother was a sister of that Earl of Gowrie who was slain in his own house on August 5, 1600: the most mysterious event in the history of Scotland. Montrose's mother died when her son was but five years old, and, losing his father early, the boy became the ward of Lord Napier of Merchistoun, his brother-in-law, a man of intellect, sagacity, and loyalty. Of Montrose's happy boyhood, sports, and studies at St Andrews much has been told in his 'Life' by Mr Mark Napier. He married at seventeen, made the grand tour afterwards, and is said to have been very coldly received on his return by Charles, owing to insinuations by Hamilton. The later conflicts of Hamilton and Montrose are perhaps refracted in this anecdote, which is intended to account for Montrose's early devotion to the Covenant. But it is more probable that "the canniness of Rothes," and of a preacher, Mr Robert Murray, made a recruit of Montrose, who, by a functional necessity, had to be enthusiastic about something.

The manner of the great Montrose is thus described by Patrick Gordon, who wrote his book in the loyal and hopeless endeavour to vindicate his chief, Montrose's bane, the Marquis of Huntly. "I think, verily, he" (Montrose) "was naturally inclined to humility, courtesy, gentleness, and freedom of carriage . . . affecting rather the real possession of men's hearts than the frothy and outward show of reverence, and therefore was all reverence thrust upon him, because all did love him," as all who know him do to this hour.

In person Montrose was well knit and agile; his portraits vary so much from each other that it is difficult to form an opinion as to his face. The very pronounced Scottish countenance in the likeness attributed to Jameson, bears no resemblance to the dark, graceful, and melancholy cavalier of Honthorst. Montrose apparently had not all the beauty of his kinsman Dundee, but he made up for the lack by his dramatic appeal to sentiment. On hearts attached to the Covenant that appeal made no impression; perhaps no "Malignant" was more detested than Montrose by the brethren, and by the modern partisans of the brethren in history. Argyll has been no less unfortunate in exciting the rancour of Cavalier historians, while against him is the incomparably humorous portrait by Scott in the 'Legend of Montrose.'

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER II.

- <sup>1</sup> 'Register Royal Letters,' i. pp. 73, 74.
- <sup>2</sup> Baillie, 'A True Information,' etc. Wirtsburgh, 1627. Cited by Mr. Kinloch, in 'Studies in Scottish Ecclesiastical History,' pp. 23, 24.
- <sup>3</sup> Sprott, 'Scottish Liturgies,' p. lxiii.
- <sup>4</sup> Row, 'Historie of the Kirk of Scotland,' pp. 392-395.
- <sup>5</sup> Spalding, i. p. 79.
- <sup>6</sup> Rothes, 'Relation,' p. 4, Bannatyne Club, 1830.
- <sup>7</sup> Peterkin, 'Records of the Kirk,' p. 52.
- <sup>8</sup> Rothes, 'Relation,' p. 8.
- <sup>9</sup> Rothes, 'Relation,' p. 10.
- <sup>10</sup> The exact numbers and constitution form a perplexing subject. See Gardiner, 'History of England,' viii. p. 329.
- <sup>11</sup> Rothes, 'Relation,' p. 27.
- <sup>12</sup> Gordon, 'History of Scots Affairs,' Spalding Club, i. pp. 27, 28; Row, 'Historie of the Kirk of Scotland,' p. 486.
- <sup>13</sup> Gordon, 'History of Scots Affairs,' Spalding Club, i. p. 28.
- <sup>14</sup> Rothes, 'Relation,' pp. 56, 57.
- <sup>15</sup> Gordon, 'History of Scots Affairs,' Spalding Club, i. p. 34.
- <sup>16</sup> Rothes, 'Relation,' pp. 59-61, Bannatyne Club.
- <sup>17</sup> Gordon, 'History of Scots Affairs,' Spalding Club, i. 33, note 1.
- <sup>18</sup> Rothes, 'Relation,' p. 69.
- <sup>19</sup> Rothes, 'Relation,' p. 70.
- <sup>20</sup> Calderwood, iii. pp. 505, 506.
- <sup>21</sup> Gordon, i. pp. 53-56.
- <sup>22</sup> Napier's 'Memoirs of Montrose,' i. pp. 102-126.
- <sup>23</sup> Hardwicke MSS., 'Miscellaneous State Papers,' 1501-1726, London, 1778, ii. p. 96.
- <sup>24</sup> Gordon, i. p. 45; Napier, i. pp. 142-144; Burnet, 'Memoirs of the Hamiltons,' pp. 41, 42.
- <sup>25</sup> Traquair, 'Hardwicke Papers,' i. p. 100.
- <sup>26</sup> Hamilton to Charles, June 7, 1638; Gardiner, 'Hamilton Papers,' Camden Society, p. 3.

<sup>27</sup> Burnet, 'Hamilton Memoirs,' pp. 42, 43; 'Hamilton Papers,' Camden Society, pp. 1, 2.

<sup>28</sup> Burnet, 'Hamilton Memoirs,' pp. 43, 44, 46.

<sup>29</sup> Rothes, 'Relation,' pp. 112-139; 'Hamilton Papers,' June 7, Camden Society, pp. 3-7.

<sup>30</sup> Rothes, 'Relation,' p. 148.

<sup>31</sup> 'Hamilton Papers,' Camden Society, pp. 9-17.

<sup>32</sup> Burnet, 'Hamilton Memoirs,' p. 59.

<sup>33</sup> I am unable to find any such words and claims in the Protestation. "It shall be lawful to us to appoint, hold, and use the ordinary means, our lawful meetings and Assemblies of the Church, agreeable to the Law of God and practice of the primitive Church, the Acts of the General Assemblies and Parliaments," and so on. 'Large Declaration,' p. 105. By the Golden Charter of the Kirk, 1592, there were to be annual Assemblies, under certain royal conditions, which of course could not exist if Charles did not grant them. But I cannot find that, in 1638, the right to hold Assemblies is said to come "direct from God alone."

<sup>34</sup> Burnet, 'Hamilton Memoirs,' p. 70.

<sup>35</sup> Baillie, i. pp. 99, 100.

<sup>36</sup> 'Large Declaration,' pp. 265, 266.

<sup>37</sup> Burnet, 'Hamilton Memoirs,' pp. 107, 108.

<sup>38</sup> Baillie, i. p. 154.

<sup>39</sup> Gordon, 'History of Scots Affairs,' ii. pp. 99, 100.

<sup>40</sup> Gordon, 'History of Scots Affairs,' ii. p. 144.

<sup>41</sup> Gordon, 'History of Scots Affairs,' ii. p. 108.

<sup>42</sup> Baillie, i. pp. 177-184.

<sup>43</sup> Gordon, 'History of Scots Affairs,' ii. p. 162.

<sup>44</sup> Gordon, 'History of Scots Affairs,' ii. p. 167.

<sup>45</sup> Baillie, i. pp. 150, 151.

<sup>46</sup> Gordon, 'History of Scots Affairs,' ii. p. 169.

<sup>47</sup> Burnet, 'Hamilton Memorials,' p. 111; Balfour, ii. p. 315.

<sup>48</sup> Willcock, 'The Great Marquess,' p. 11. This is a biography of Argyll, not, as might be supposed from the title, of Montrose.

<sup>49</sup> Spalding, i. p. 78.

<sup>50</sup> Guthry, 'Memoirs,' p. 36.

CHAPTER III.

THE BISHOPS' WAR.

1639.

THE beginning of the first "Bishops' War" proved that all the enthusiasm and organisation were on the side of the king's rebels. The Tables became a strong central government; they raised money and men, they purchased arms from abroad, and their ranks, for the time, were almost exempt from the most ferocious and fatal of passions, military jealousy. On Charles's side the English Council advised a levy of 30,000 of the "trained bands"; Newcastle and Hull were to be fortified, and Carlisle and Berwick put into a posture of defence. But the trained bands would be reluctant soldiers, unlike the Scottish lads from the plough, still accustomed to make their hands keep their heads in private feud, full of spiritual and national excitement, led by their local lairds, and drilled by the covenanted Dalgettys returned from the Continental wars. Of these, Patrick Gordon tells us, enough came home to supply every grade of officers for 50,000 men!

Charles called the English nobles to do their almost obsolete feudal service. His forces, on paper, were reckoned at about 20,000, 5000 being under Hamilton. These were to join hands with Huntly in the north, sailing to Aberdeen, but, whether by virtue of Hamilton's jealousy and incompetence, or of Huntly's hereditary half-heartedness, or of the actual necessities of the Royal situation, this movement, in itself well calculated, ended in utter failure. On the English side, Arundel, a Catholic, or "of no religion," was to command, in place of Essex, who had some military experience. Holland, a favourite of the queen, was to lead the cavalry, wherefore Arundel all but resigned. On the other hand, the Scots, seeking efficiency, made the experienced, if old and crooked, Alexander Leslie their commander, though he was nominally but adjutant-general to Montrose in the operations now to be undertaken against Huntly.

On February 14 the Covenanters laid their case before the people of England, and pleased the Puritans by casting the blame on the bishops, the common scapegoats. The king replied. The Scots had no reason for apprehensions about their religion. Plunder and the overthrow of the throne were their desire. The 'Large Declaration,' a volume of some four hundred and fifty pages, by a clergyman of the old Presbyterian name of Balcanquhal, was published.* The case for the Crown is clearly stated, and the similarity of Jesuit and high Presbyterian ideals is enforced. But the book, of course, is a partisan tract of unusual dimensions; and such paper bullets of the brain, like all mere arguments, have never any effect upon opponents, beyond causing violent irritation.

The king's intended scheme of operations is well described by Burnet in his 'Memoirs of the Duke of Hamilton.' †

The royal plan, as we have partly seen, was for Charles to move in force on the Border. The fleet was to watch the coast; Hamilton's 5000 were to join Huntly—which they never did—and fall on the rear of the southern Covenanters, while dividing them from the brethren of the northern shires. The Earl of Antrim, a Scottish Macdonnell, was to divert Argyll by attacking Kintyre, from which the Campbells, under James VI., had ousted the Macdonalds. Wentworth was to lead an Irish force, victualling at Arran, to Dumbarton, the old Key of Scotland. Hamilton had managed to throw a few men with supplies into Edinburgh Castle, and the Castle of Dumbarton was reckoned secure. If Charles's leaders and men had been efficient, this was a good plot. But Ruthven, declining to be shut up in the untenable Castle of Edinburgh, had gone south to the king. Traquair, Roxburgh, and the Marquis of Douglas proved helpless in Tweeddale, Teviotdale, and elsewhere; the Covenanters seized Tantallon; Douglas, a Catholic, had no longer a name to conjure with, or a force to help or harm his prince. Roxburgh's

* It was "printed by Robert Young, His Majesty's printer for Scotland"; if it was printed in Scotland, Waristoun's censorship of the press must have been relaxed.

† Hamilton is his hero; on the other side Gordon upholds his chief, Huntly; Mr Mark Napier was in love with his kinsman of old days, Montrose, and has therefore to make Hamilton's conduct look as black as possible. None of the three Scottish nobles—Montrose, Hamilton, or Huntly—was in an enviable position, and it is hard now to unravel the rights and wrongs of their tangled affairs.

son went over to the Covenant, and the Kers would follow the son rather than his father.

When operations began, Huntly was holding a meeting at the village of Turriff, when Montrose, with his wonted mobility, descended on him. Huntly did not produce his commission of lieutenantcy, and the parties merely "glared at each other," and dispersed. This was on February 14.<sup>1</sup> On March 23 Leslie entered Edinburgh Castle, which offered no resistance. Sir William Stewart surrendered Dumbarton Castle, whether in consequence of an ingenious ruse de guerre, or because, as Burnet says, all his men were Covenanters. Traquair was driven from Dalkeith, not a strong house, and the powder stored there was seized, also the Regalia, which were lodged in the castle. Traquair was not the man to fight it out, and blow up his magazine, like our officers at Delhi, in the Sepoy Mutiny.<sup>2</sup> The whole of the south "was lost, without stroke of sword," and Charles's gate of Dumbarton was locked against him.

Now came the serious operations against Huntly. In that personal letter of November 27, 1638, which Burnet did not print, Hamilton had nibbled away Huntly's character as "much disliked," suspected of Popery, "to be trusted by you, but whether fitly or no I cannot say." Without the aid of Hamilton's 5000 men, Huntly, had he been a Montrose, might have made a stand; but he was no hero, and Hamilton never brought the men. He did not appear with his transports in the Firth of Forth till after Huntly was a captive. Like all of the Huntlys since Pinkie fight, the marquis was not to be trusted; though his language was nobly chivalrous.<sup>3</sup> Gordon and Burnet agree that Huntly's commission as lieutenant was to be kept back as long as possible. He was not to be the aggressor; he was to wait till the king was on the Border.<sup>4</sup> However, Huntly did now begin to arm and to fortify his capital, the most unhappy town of Aberdeen (March 1639). Montrose meanwhile arranged that Argyll should provide occupation for the loyal Earl of Airlie (Ogilvy), and Argyll ravaged, with the Camerons (for once on the Lowland side), Huntly's Highland domains in Badenoch.

Montrose had some 2000 men, horsemen of Angus, Perthshire, and the Crichtons and Forbeses, with drilled infantry, and officers from the foreign wars. Meanwhile Hamilton was confusing Huntly with commands to be dilatory. Huntly tried to make, in mid March, a pacific arrangement with Montrose, at his house near the town of that name, but Montrose insisted that he had a commission from the Assembly to deal with Aberdeen, "Meroz, that wicked city." Another set of heralds from Huntly found Montrose's men wearing the blue ribbon, "Montrose's whimsy," hence probably the phrase "true blue Presbyterian." Hence, too, the name of "the blue bonnets," which were soon to be "over the Border," for the gentry of the Covenant now adopted this headgear. Montrose had ever an eye for the picturesque, and knew the value of its popular appeal. Gordon, who was present, recounts a prodigy, the morning sun of March shining "of a perfect blood colour, like to fresh blood, whereof a little is poured into a bright silver basin." Learned men who beheld it could find no normal cause of this phenomenon. Huntly, meanwhile, for reasons best known to himself,* and certainly known to no one else, had disbanded his forces. The learned of Aberdeen, who had proved too hard for the godly in controversy, now fled by sea from the arm of flesh. Sixty of the best of the town, with the town flag, and a drummer, also departed to join the king.<sup>5</sup> Huntly having retired, like his father before James VI., Montrose and Leslie entered Aberdeen on March 30. They compelled the citizens to fill up and level their ditches and ramparts.

Leaving Kinghorn with a sufficient force to guard Aberdeen, Montrose with "dear Sandy's stoups" (portable pieces of artillery introduced by Alexander Hamilton), marched on the heels of the fugitive Huntly. The Covenanters plundered pretty freely, but that was only natural. The Cock of the North came in, and met his pursuer in confidence: he next, with twelve gentlemen, went to Montrose's quarters at Inverury. Huntly here signed, if not the Covenant, something like the king's futile Covenant. The rest of the Covenanters, says Gordon, "thought it not so satisfactory as Montrose did," for, as to religious treaties with the Almighty, or feuds of preachers and bishops, as such, Montrose probably cared no more than Lethington. Catholics were admitted to protection, if "willing to concur in the common course of maintaining the laws and liberties of the kingdom." This did not hold long, nor was it intended to hold. On returning to Inverury from the meeting with Montrose, Huntly found many of his feudal enemies there, Frazers and Forbeses. He sent to request that Montrose would not listen to these men, warning him that, if he took the chiefs of the Gordons south, the country would not be the quieter. Montrose told Straloch, who carried this message, that all was done by the votes of Committees (these he mentions disdainfully in his famous song), and that "he could not get things done by himself."

* William Gordon, in his 'History of the Gordons,' p. 168, says that Huntly acted by Hamilton's orders.

Covenanters from all quarters now met at Aberdeen, inveterate foes of the House of Huntly from of old. They sent to Huntly a safe-conduct, signed, so Gordon assures us, by Montrose among the rest, and Huntly came to them, relying on this document. Leslie now "put Huntly to perform some articles": to contribute to the expenses, pacify the Highlands, bring in certain prisoners, and so on. This Huntly refused.<sup>6</sup> Leslie then told him that he must go south with them: Huntly asked for the return of whatever paper he had already signed, and Leslie, "some say," took him prisoner. The Forbeses, Frazers, and Crichton of Frendraght (in whose house Huntly's kinsmen had been burned) now insisted that he should be detained. Spalding avers that "the General" took the lead in coercing Huntly to come south, and that Huntly asked for, and received, the band, whatever it was, that he had signed at Inverury. By "the General," Spalding seems here to mean Montrose. Gordon<sup>7</sup> assigns the seizing of Huntly to Leslie. Gordon doubts, as we saw, whether Montrose took part in the transaction because he was overpowered by votes, and by the glory of bringing in Huntly as a trophy, or whether he was constrained by the clamour of the northern Covenanters, Huntly's ancestral enemies. "It is uncertain."

In either case, says Mr Gardiner, in carrying Huntly away though he had a safe-conduct, Montrose "played but a mean and shabby part," "the only mean action in his life." So, certainly, had all the Covenanters concerned acted meanly. Montrose had already spoken of his inability to resist the Committee. We may wish that he had laid down his commission: he was not the man to dwell long in the Covenanting tabernacle. But we are not convinced that Huntly was really reluctant to leave the scenes in which Burnet, with clerical freedom, accuses him of playing a coward's part. Our evidence as to the whole affair is dubious, but Charles, writing to Hamilton (York, April 23), says Huntly is both "feeble and false."<sup>8</sup> He probably had no objection to being removed from a dangerous and difficult position. In Edinburgh (April 20) Huntly said: "You may take my head from my shoulders, but not my heart from my sovereign." Brave words, never carried into useful action. The "shabbiness" of Montrose, in carrying off Huntly, then, must be left to the judgment of the reader.<sup>9</sup> The writer believes that Huntly was no unwilling captive, and Montrose, certainly, no commander with full powers.

Montrose carried Huntly and his eldest son to Edinburgh. The second son, Lord Aboyne, had been allowed to return home; he was a lad of eighteen, and he, with his scapegrace schoolboy brother, Lord Lewis Gordon, became the centre of renewed troubles. It was not till May 1 that Hamilton with his 5000 men arrived in the Firth of Forth, where, Leith being strongly fortified, and all Fife opposing a landing, Huntly's country alone offered a chance of useful operations. Baillie indicates that Hamilton was believed to be too good a patriot to injure his countrymen: * he also attests the moderation and courtesy of Hamilton during his stay in the Firth, and avers that his forces died in numbers, while the rest were weakened by sickness. Hamilton, in fact, in place of fighting or preparing to fight, was feebly negotiating and making stolen visits to Covenanting lords. On May 8, Charles advised him to go north to Huntly's country, as originally designed, "to strengthen my party there."<sup>10</sup> This was not a command, but a counsel, a counsel which Montrose, in Hamilton's place, would have anticipated. The Gordons only wanted a leader. On the previous day, Hamilton had advised Charles to come to terms; his infantry could not handle, still less discharge, a musket! They improved in this respect, but Hamilton threw cold water on "Lord Aboyne's proposition," that the 5000 should join the Gordons, and was afraid to send his men to Aberdeen. Meanwhile Aboyne had visited Charles, who approved of his plan for fighting in the north. By May 21 Hamilton was proposing to send two of his regiments to Charles on the Border, whither Leslie was marching with a strong if ill-provisioned army, which he could not have done had the Gordons risen behind him in the north, aided by Hamilton. Baillie rode with Leslie as an armed chaplain. Thus, when Aboyne came to Hamilton, in the Firth of Forth, by May 29, he found no aid in men, and was merely introduced to a Colonel Gun, who would be his adviser in war. This officer, who had fought abroad, proved to be a failure, and was deemed a traitor.<sup>11</sup> Hamilton appears to have thought the cause hopeless, negotiation the least futile policy, and himself a person who ought rather to study the political situation than fight, or help others to fight.

* Mr Mark Napier says that, according to Baillie, this opinion was held "by many" (Napier, i. p. 194). But Baillie, in fact, says that it was held by few, "amongst which few I was one" (Baillie, i. p. 202).

Meanwhile Montrose dealt with the Royalist party of the north, where a ruffle called the Trot of Turriff (May 14) had been rather to the advantage of the Cavaliers. Bamff and Gordon of Haddo now nominally commanded a force raised by the lairds, and had a professional soldier, Colonel Johnston, to direct them. They occupied Aberdeen, and might have done something if Hamilton had followed the advice of the king and carried his forces to join the Gordons. Lord Lewis Gordon (a whelp who stole his father's jewels) had escaped from school, passed into the Highland domains of his family, and returned, in Highland dress, with kilted allies. The lairds, quarrelling among themselves, had left Aberdeen open to the Covenanting Earl Marischal (Keith), whom Montrose joined with a considerable force. His men looted houses, and killed all the dogs in Aberdeen, because the women, in derision, had adorned them with blue Covenanting favours. Baillie mentions the lenity of Montrose in sparing the town. But Baillie does not seem to have "panted after the blood and ashes of the loyal north," as Mr Napier avers.<sup>12</sup> He merely says that the Covenanters now disbanded, "it was thought, on some malcontentment, either at Montrose's too great lenity in sparing the enemy's houses, or somewhat else."<sup>13</sup> At this moment Baillie was anxious about the prospects of the Covenant, but his knowledge was mainly of Leslie's force in the south. On June 6 Glencairn, Tullibardine, Aboyne, and other Royalists came to Aberdeen, and soon, with Lord Lewis and his Highlanders, marched against the Earl Marischal and Montrose at Stonehaven.

The purpose of the Royalists was to make a diversion southward, leaving Montrose unattacked, but Colonel Gun, merely "to harden his men to be cannon proof," placed them within range of Montrose's artillery. The Highlanders, more frightened than hurt, ran away; to them guns were as unfamiliar as muskets to the forces of Montezuma. Aboyne retreated in good order to Aberdeen with his horsemen, but his three attendant ships, with guns and provisions, sailed away into the vague. Montrose followed Aboyne, and though the burgesses of Aberdeen stoutly defended the Bridge of Dee, he deceived Gun by a simple stratagem, a feint by his cavalry towards an impossible ford, while his infantry forced the bridge and entered the unlucky town on June 19. Baillie speaks of the Covenanters' intention to "have sacked the town orderly" (an operation unprecedented in war), but God was pleased to keep the Covenant "from all marks of the least alleged cruelty," for that night came news of negotiations between king and Covenant. Marischal and another are said to have pressed Montrose with the Committee's warrant for burning Aberdeen, whether "in orderly manner" or not; but they changed their minds, and came in to Montrose's opinion.*

That Gun, who allowed the Brig o' Dee to be taken, was a traitor in Hamilton's interest, was the opinion of Colonel Johnston, wounded at the fight on the bridge,† and he challenged Gun. The king preferred to honour Hamilton's favourite, who later obtained high military rank in Germany. Probably he was merely ignorant of the country, believed the ford to which Montrose's cavalry rode to be practicable, and was obstinate. The cry nous sommes trahis is seldom justified, but suspicion of Gun was rife and mischievous. Spalding does not incriminate Gun in this matter, but blames Aboyne even for cowardice, which is incredible.<sup>14</sup> Gordon, however, treats Gun's conduct severely.<sup>15</sup> Patrick Gordon, too, in 'Britane's Distemper,' reveals him as treacherous or imbecile.

While Montrose was Covenanter General in the north, in the south Charles, by May 1, had advanced to Durham, and sent a new Proclamation into Scotland. It was not absurdly truculent and threatening, as a Proclamation of April 7 had been. But the Proclamation of May 1 could not get itself proclaimed. Sir Edmund Verney, a true Cavalier, and a man of sense, reckoned the Royal army at 12,000 foot, and 2000 horse: the men untrained, the weapons worthless, the supplies meagre. Charles was at his wits' end for money: by no means of cajoling or threatening could funds be raised. Thus he could not maintain indefinitely tactics of defence on the line of Tweed, which would have outworn his adversaries, while they, in turn, knew that if they invaded England the hearts of Englishmen would be aroused against them, and Charles would be backed by men and money in abundance.

Weak as was the position of Charles, the brethren had their own

* Mr Gardiner, no prejudiced Cavalier, writes: "Montrose had brought with him orders to sack the town. He disobeyed the pitiless injunction." Perhaps the point might be disputed by apologists for the Covenanters. Gardiner, ix. p. 41.

† Here Major Middleton, later so notable on the Royal side, fought for the Covenant.

perplexities. Charles (May 14) had tried a new, conciliatory, but ambiguous proclamation, from Newcastle. He would not invade if "civil and temporal"—not ecclesiastical—obedience were given to him, but, if the Covenanters came within ten miles of the Border, then the king would not spare them.<sup>16</sup> Now, even the Covenanting Lord Advocate, Sir Thomas Hope, had already avowed his obedience in civil matters. Hamilton (May 14) informed the king that the Covenanters would "condiscend to all sivill obediens, yet it is with this damnabill 'but,'—that bishops must be abolished, or, at least, that Parliament must be heard on the matter."<sup>17</sup> Grounds for negotiation were thus being prepared; but Charles tried to raise reinforcements, and, in spite of the remonstrances of those about him, marched in person to Berwick. Hamilton represented the resoluteness of the enemy, and proposed to send some 3000 of his men, hitherto idle, to the king. They arrived on May 28. Leslie, up till then, had certainly force enough, if he advanced successfully and crossed Tweed at Kelso, to cut Charles off from Newcastle. Hamilton thought that, if successful, the Scots might proclaim a republic, for which they were totally unfit. They, on their part, told Holland that they would keep the ten miles' limit if he would withdraw his fleet and army.<sup>18</sup> On May 26 Henderson, at Dunbar, preached to the Covenanters on the wars of Israel and Amalek; the Royalists, thus early in the day, were dubbed Amalekites, and to Amalekites Saul was forbidden to give quarter! The king's friends were later treated on the precedent of Samuel, when he massacred Agag and others.

Hearing that English soldiers had published proclamations at Eyemouth and Aytoun, the Tables sent the fiery cross round among the Presbyteries, which now undertook military functions. Leslie advanced to Cockburnspath, near that deep ravine which Arran neglected to hold against the English invaders before Pinkie fight.<sup>19</sup> The Covenanters were in bitter need now of supplies, "a natural mind might despair," says Waristoun. But a reconnoissance of Holland's horse to Dunse retired before a force which Clarendon thinks was inferior, and this gave heart to good men. The Covenanters made renewed appeals to the preachers to raise the whole country between sixteen and sixty. They lacked tools for entrenching, they lacked beef, and bread, and beer, and horsemen, at Dunglas. Fife was dilatory. Dumfries, widowed of Munroe's regiment, feared an incursion by the Maxwells, who had no taste for the Covenant. The Johnstones and the Laird of Lag, with the Earl of Galloway and Lord Drumlanrig, were bidden to gather and protect Dumfries. Forced loans were to be raised, on pain of confiscation, for Charles was not alone in this illiberal measure. The Covenanters at Kelso had been mutinous for want of supplies.

Thus, by June 3 Waristoun and his junto of preachers "have bethought and better bethought," upon the want of money, food, material, and discipline, "the natural impossibilities either to retire, remain, or go on." They therefore negotiated a small private covenant or treaty with the Deity! "Mr David Dickson took instruments in my hand," says Johnston of the legal mind, that he and his friends would admire their heavenly Ally very much, if He extricated them from a position of threatened annihilation!<sup>20</sup> This was a step which could never have occurred to an Amalekite mind! While each party, Cavalier and Covenanting, was really in desperate straits, the Covenanters wrestled through to success, for the day after taking instruments with Omnipotence, the godly in Edinburgh heard of Holland's baffled reconnaissance; Lothian, however, was called in to join the main body of Covenanters at Dunse. Leslie was extremely perplexed, and Waristoun "was brought low before God indeed." Meanwhile the honest English amateur soldiers were full of fight, "cast up their caps with caprioles, shouts, and signs of joy," in hope of a tussle at last. They were moved to Birks, three miles above Berwick; and there they lay, unled, ill-fed, while Charles issued a proclamation!<sup>21</sup>

The king had been reinforced, but was short of money, as were his adversaries. Both parties were in a fright: victory would turn to the less nervous combatants. On June 4 the leaders sent round a letter saying that the people were disposed to surrender, or were hypnotised: "some Spirit of slumber hath overtaken and possessed them." But the leaders, taking heart, concentrated at Dunse (June 5). At this crisis a Royal page, Robert Leslie (he adhered to the king in captivity later) came with an informal proposal to Alexander Leslie for a conference. Charles had been frightened into adopting the defensive. In his place, Montrose or Dundee would probably have attacked Kelso in force a week earlier, occupied Dunse Law, and struck the first blow, securing the bridge at Kelso. But Leslie's advance to Dunse left Charles standing at gaze.*

* Mr Gardiner, who never cites Waristoun, supposes the Covenanters to have had abundance of money and supplies, quoting Baillie, i. pp. 212, 213. If so Baillie took a much more favourable view than Waristoun of the prospects of his party. They meditated the "offensive defensive," he says, an invasion of England, while they lay entrenched at Dunglas, where their earthworks are still to be seen. Baillie seems to have been unaware of the scarcity of spades and shovels. He says that tidings of an order to Holland, to attack Kelso in force, caused the retreat of Munroe from Kelso, and the concentration on Duns Law, a circular eminence, which Charles ought to have occupied and entrenched while he could. Holding Kelso and Duns Law, Charles might have threatened, from the sea, Leslie's rear at Dunglas. But the king's delay allowed Leslie to establish himself and secure supplies, so that, when it came to the push, the proposals for negotiations were from the Royal side.

The Scots willingly sent in the Earl of Dunfermline with a "supplication," and Sir Edmund Verney, with Dunfermline, visited the Covenanting camp. Charles was reduced to being thankful that his Proclamation, though refused, and, on legal points, refuted, was read by the leaders among themselves. After some haggling over safe-conducts, and after Waristoun had seen, to his indignant horror, a copy of Charles's 'Large Declaration,' the Covenanting commissioners entered the king's camp (June 11). Charles unexpectedly appeared at the meeting, to hear the rebels' grievances with his own ears. On June 18, after arguments in which Charles had the better in logic, a treaty was signed.<sup>22</sup> The "humble desires" of the men who burlesqued the part of "supplicants" had been:—

1. That the king would ratify all the Acts of the late Assembly in a Parliament in July.

Now to do so involved Charles in ratifying the excommunications and other penalties decreed against the bishops, who had been his too faithful servants.

2. The king was to permit all matters ecclesiastical to be determined by Assemblies, all civil matters by Parliament.

But what were "matters ecclesiastical"? The Assembly, under James VI., had encroached constantly on "matters civil," hence the long war of that prince with the Kirk.

3. Charles was to recall his forces, compensate losses in trade, hand over the excommunicated to endure their punishments, and withdraw all the manifestoes under his name.

Waristoun was a craven, or supplies came later than the moment when he was so alarmed. Gardiner, ix. p. 29.

These were their "humble desyres"! They were ready "not to insist to crave any point which is not so warranted." If England will not pay compensation, the suppliants would be satisfied with the estates of Catholics, "incendiaries," and bishops, to be administered for the preachers, the poor, and education. The brethren in England were to be safeguarded. Appointments to governorship of castles must be made "by the King and Estates, according to the old law of this kingdom." Here we recognise Waristoun, who, in 1641, maintained that the Estates must unite with the king in making appointments to the chief offices of State. "Records" to this unexpected effect were "discovered" by Waristoun at Dunfermline. He had casually found them in Hay of Dunfermline's charter chest. So says Wodrow in his entertaining collection of gossip and ghost stories.*

To this topic we shall return: meanwhile Waristoun inserted the full scope of the Parliamentary appointments of officers of State in his memoranda of humble desires. Waristoun reminded the nobles, Rothes, Loudoun, and Dunfermline, who were to treat, that they must not behave as they said that others had done, in reference to the Tithes and Revocation. "Every one then looked so to his own particular accommodation of the king that every one betrayed another, and all betrayed the public."<sup>23</sup> Thus the old real source of bitterness bubbles up. The public, above all the preachers, were not betrayed, but benefited by the commutation of tithes, but hoc nocuit, this was the source of the religious zeal of many a noble.

There was much wrangling on June 13, Waristoun speaking often. He insisted that the Kirk could excommunicate, "albeit not of civil punishments which behoved to be added by the civil law"; and Rothes remarked that, if a king sinned like David (which Charles II. did exceeding abundantly), the Kirk could excommunicate him,—and indeed Cargill did. This power of the preachers to excommunicate, and to make the civil authority enforce the sentence, is the "storm-centre" of the long war between Kirk and State. Much discourse out of the books of Samuel followed. Later came a dispute as to whether the king could proclaim Assemblies to gather, and whether he had a veto, and whether the Assembly could sit after he dissolved it. The reply was that only an Assembly could decide: how it would decide we can guess. This conference, * 'Analecta,' ii. 219.

indeed, contains the ground of quarrel in a nutshell. The right of preachers to dominate the civil magistate was asserted. Meanwhile the king was admitted to possess the right of calling Assemblies. His subjects could not do so, but the Kirk could "by herself convene," "in the case of extreme or urgent necessity," and so on, by "divine right." The king could not dissolve or veto an Assembly.<sup>24</sup> The king replied (June 15) that, after consulting the Councils of the two kingdoms, he could not ratify the acts of the pretended Assembly of Glasgow, but would withdraw all innovations, and leave all bishops, actual or future, to the censure of the Assembly, and matters civil and ecclesiastical to annual Assemblies and Parliaments. He would appoint, and meant to be present at, an Assembly in Edinburgh. If the Scots would disband, dissolve their Tables, and surrender the castles, he would withdraw his forces, and restore what had been taken during the war. Objections were made, Waristoun being very prominent; but Charles told him that the Devil could not put a more uncharitable construction on his Declaration. "He commanded me silence, and said he would speak to more reasonable men." Yet Waristoun went on to say that Charles evaded the question of the already proclaimed excommunication of the bishops. Then all kneeled, and begged that he would "quit bishops," to which he gave a smiling but evasive reply.<sup>25</sup>

Next day was Sunday, and the Covenanters in their camp modified the king's Declaration to their taste. On the 17th they returned to beg Charles to "quit bishops," if condemned (as they were sure to be) by the next Assembly. Charles retired for consultation, and Hamilton was overheard advising resistance to yearly Assemblies, which would deprive the king of his crowns, as they practically did.* The king, after much hairsplitting, made a few changes in his Declaration. On the 18th the Covenanters wrote out their view of the pact, in an "Information against all mistaking of his Majesty's Declaration." In brief, they announced that they held by the Assembly of Glasgow. Thus the pacification meant only a brief truce, as both parties were aware.<sup>26</sup>

Each side was content with the patent futility, because each side was at its wits' end. Charles beheld no prospect but that of defeat, if he fought. But he should have fought. Had he lost, if he fell he fell with honour; if he survived defeat, "likely all England behoved to have risen in revenge," says Baillie. Many of the best in all ranks of the Covenanters were averse to entering England. If their scruples were overcome, then in England, says Baillie, they could not support themselves; from Scotland they could neither have transport nor protection for convoys. There was but the slightest hope, or no hope, of aid from the English Puritans. There was too much murmuring in the Scottish camp; Home, and other Berwickshire gentry "were beginning to be suspected."<sup>27</sup> The king had made (but not on Waristoun) a most favourable impression. "The king was very sober, meek, and patient to hear all. . . . His Majestie was ever the longer the better loved of all that heard him, as one of the most just, reasonable, sweet persons they had ever seen."

* Burnet attributes to Hamilton the advice to concede all, and bide better times. ('Mem. Ham.' p. 140, cf. Waristoun, p. 87.)

Fatal fascination! An appeal to the sword was Charles's one chance; "fall back, fall edge." He must have won victory, or, dying, found honour and revenge; or, defeated, a united England behind him after a Cadmeian triumph of the Scots. Oh for one hour of Montrose!

Charles now entered on the path that led him through insult and unspeakable disgrace to the scaffold. The Covenanters entered on the path that brought them to the selling of "one of the most just, reasonable, sweet persons they had ever seen." From the first the Covenanters were determined to have every one of their demands; and their published version of the sense in which they understood the treaty was later burned in England by the hangman.<sup>28</sup> Charles, on his part, meant only to secure delay and cover from which he could operate for the restoration of Episcopacy at a more convenient season.

On July 1 Charles had a proclamation read in Edinburgh as to the meeting of the Assembly. The date, at that time not inconvenient to sporting lay elders, was August 12. Archbishops, bishops, and commissioners of kirks were warned to attend. Against this the Covenanters formally protested, in the usual way. Charles had legality on his side. The case of the bishops was to be decided in the Assembly: they ought, said the king, to be present. But the protesters argued that they had already been excommunicated, in many cases, and deposed by the Assembly of Glasgow. If the bishops did appear, they must be "delivered over to the Devil." * "Next day," or the day after (July 3), Edinburgh indulged in four riots, "one upon the Marquis of Huntly's gentlemen, the second upon Lord Aboyne, the third upon the Earl of Traquair, the fourth upon Sir William Elphinstone, Lord Chief Justice, whom, after the women had trampled under feet, and then housed, a lusty dame pulled the Covenant out of her purse and enforced him to subscribe it."<sup>29</sup> The carriage of Traquair and Kinnoul was thrust through with swords, the occupants with difficulty fled to Holyrood; Elphinstone was kicked. On July 5 some Lords came to Charles at Berwick to apologise; but he, naturally annoyed, postponed his visit to Edinburgh, and presently abandoned it.<sup>30</sup> Hamilton put the alternatives to Charles: he must abandon bishops and everything, or take "the kingly way"—war,—call a Parliament in England, and risk the chances of it, while leaving Scotland in the hands of the Covenanters (July 5).<sup>31</sup> Loudoun was at Berwick, and Charles, having received the Covenanting account of the conference, and their interpretation of it, called Loudoun and "said no more but, 'Why do you use me thus?'"<sup>32</sup> He determined not to go to Edinburgh, and appointed Traquair (a sound bishop-hater) as Commissioner to the General Assembly.

* Peterkin, 'Records of the Kirk of Scotland,' p. 231.

Meanwhile, though the castle was put in Ruthven's hands, the brethren would not return the ordnance, or destroy their works at Leith. They would not carry their suits before the Court of Session, the Covenanters having banned it as illegally convoked. They did not disband Munroe's regiment, they kept on holding meetings as of old. They would not permit certain nobles whom the king had summoned, to meet him, save Montrose, Loudoun, Lothian, Rothes, and Dunfermline, to whom they added, unbidden, Henderson the preacher (July 15).<sup>33</sup> Charles also wished to see Argyll, Cassilis, Lindsay, and others, but they came not. Charles demanded the cashiering of Leslie, the cessation of the Tables, the punishment of the rioters, the suppression of the paper about the Conference, the restoration of the guns and ammunition to the castle: so Henry de Vic heard, and wrote to Secretary Windebank. In most of these demands the king was justified: the brethren insulted him by acting as if their leaders could not be trusted with him (July 21).<sup>34</sup>

On July 17 Charles entered into an extraordinary arrangement with Hamilton, who usually shared his sleeping chamber at this time. Hamilton was to use all the means he could to find out, from Montrose, Loudoun, Rothes, and the rest, "which way they intend the estate of bishops shall be supplied in Parliament." If the bishops did not sit, how, it seems to be meant, was the royal interest to be recouped for the loss of their fourteen votes? Lacking the Spiritual Estate, how were the Estates to be constituted? Generally, Hamilton was to worm out the designs of the Covenanters. "For which end you will be necessitated to speak that language which, if you were called to an account for by us, you might suffer for it." The document assured Hamilton of safety, if he thus talked the language of Canaan, and pretended to be of the godliest (Berwick, July 17, 1639).<sup>35</sup> Diplomats have their own consciences, but Charles was authorising Hamilton to be a spy. Can it have been words used by him now, or on another occasion with similar licence, which were later made part of the charges against Hamilton? As for Rothes, with him Charles quarrelled on the point of declaring Episcopacy unlawful. If it were so, how could he maintain it in England and Ireland? Rothes professed no mind to go beyond Scotland; but if Charles insisted on the merits of the institution elsewhere, "our people" would "rip up" the iniquities of English and Irish bishops, so joining hands, as they did, with the English Puritans, and doing what Rothes disclaimed, —making war to inflict their Presbyterianism on England. Twice, says Rothes, Charles called him a liar: an example of "sweetness" (August, Rothes to William Murray, of the king's bedchamber).<sup>36</sup>

As for Montrose's dealings with Charles at Berwick, we have no information.* As he opposed, presently, in Parliament, certain sweeping constitutional changes, "the Zealots," says the Rev. Mr Guthry, a contemporary, and later a bishop, "became suspicious of him, that the king had turned him . . . at Berwick." The generous heart of Montrose may well have been moved by the insults which were Charles's daily bread. He may not have understood, in the same sense as the Zealots did, the clause in the Covenant about the king's "person and authority." The constitutional changes, reducing the king to the most faint and futile shadow of authority, on the modern pattern, may well have offended Montrose. No man is obliged, in honour, to adhere to a party in all its Protean shiftings, and all its excesses. But he who does not will be called a Judas, as if to desert a civil faction were to betray Christ! Such was the lot of Montrose. "He changed sides," people still say, as if that were necessarily wrong.

* Burnet says that Montrose "was much wrought upon, and gave his Majesty full assurance of his duty in time coming; and upon that entered in a correspondence with the king" (Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.', p. 149). But here Burnet probably reports the suspicions of the day, caused by Montrose's action in Parliament. He cites no documents.

Roths and the rest were sent away (July 21) to bring their comrades. Only Dunfermline, Lindsay, and Loudoun returned.* Charles determined, on pretence of important business, to return to London.<sup>37</sup> He had heard of some of the intended constitutional innovations in the Edinburgh Parliament, especially as affected the Lords of the Articles. He drew up, with the help of Hamilton, the instructions to Traquair as Commissioner, and that bishop-hater persuaded him that bishops were, legally, one of the Estates, and that an Act abolishing them, in their absence, and under their protest (which was handed in secretly), would not be binding.<sup>38</sup> Charles informed Spottiswoode that he "gave way for the present," yet "shall not leave thinking in time how to remedy" what was prejudicial "both to the Church and our own Government." He had behind him his belief that the Act abolishing bishops, to which he would assent, was not binding. Charles II., later, by merely adopting the rescissory Covenanting tactics, rescinded it. The Assembly of August 12, without mentioning the Glasgow Assembly, repeated its work "at a gallop," says Gordon, and imposed the signing of the Covenant upon all Scotland.<sup>39</sup>

This was assented to by Traquair and the Council; Traquair, at least, looked on the whole thing as a farce, knowing the king's intentions. The 'Large Declaration' was condemned, and Mr. Andrew Cant proposed that the author, Balcanquhal, Dean of Durham, should be hanged! The Sheriff of Teviotdale, Sir William Douglas, humorously said that "being better acquainted with hanging," in the way of business, than the ministers, he would be glad to do all that was necessary.<sup>40</sup> Thus pleasant were the godly among themselves, but earlier, Mr John Wemys, like Agamemnon in the 'Iliad,' had "wept like a waterfall," tears of joy "trickling down along his grey hairs like drops of rain, or dew upon the top of the tender grass." Nunc dimittis was the word of the ancient brethren, and the Moderator expressed his conviction that the king would have been sensibly moved by the spectacle.<sup>41</sup> The Moderator perhaps had a sense of irony.

The whole desire of the Assembly was to "give Christ the highest room." That meant giving supreme authority to the Prophets, such as the Presbytery of Fife. This policy could not endure. Preachers were already in full tide, denouncing Laud as "priest of Baal and son of Belial."<sup>42</sup> The king's God, and that of all England except non-Episcopalians, was Baal! "The wark gangs merrily on!" This example of the fanatical folly of the preachers is noteworthy. Rothes had deprecated the idea of forcing the true, the Presbyterian God, on the Baal-worshippers of England. But the Covenanters presently came, as in conscience they must, to that point, for it would be nefarious to tolerate Baal-worship.

* De Vic to Windebank, July 26.

Parliament met on August 31, for the first time in the then new "Parliament House." There was a large attendance: Huntly was present, so was his deadly foe, Crichton of Frendraght (he sat for Banff); in his house Huntly's kinsman had been burned. When Traquair and the nobles retired to choose Lords of the Articles, Argyll protested that this should not be a precedent. A Bill would be introduced whereby nobles, barons, and burghs should all elect their own representatives on the "probouleutic" board.<sup>43</sup> Huntly, with six Covenanting peers, and Southesk, were lords for the nobles. The nobles elected the Lords for the barons and burghs—they were Covenanters, including that expert in hanging, the Sheriff of Teviotdale, and the Laird of Lag, a name later disesteemed by the Remnant. The Lord Advocate, Hope, protested that only the king could elect the nobles as Lords of the Articles, while only the nobles could elect barons and burgesses.* This constitutional point is very obscure, as we have often seen: the Lords of the Articles, who had all the power, were elected, at various times, in all manner of ways. †

The question also rose (after much hairsplitting about an Act of indemnity for the rebellion), who were to supply the places of the lost fourteen episcopal votes? Charles had told Traquair to try to * Act. Parl. Scot., v. p. 254.

† Gordon gives an account of the arguments used by the party of Reform. On the king's side it was argued that in 1587, 1609, and 1612, and later, the nobles chose eight bishops, they chose eight nobles, and both sets chose eight from burghs and shires. The reformers argued that, till 1617, Lords of the Articles were chosen in Parliament publicly. Bishops had introduced the practice of going apart to elect. There was no statute law as to the whole affair, no Act of Parliament. Prescription and custom, since David II., could not bind Parliament. The burghs complained that they were called, not only to vote, but to debate and discuss, which the Lords of the Articles did not allow them to do (Gordon, iii. p. 66). As to 1587 and 1609, the statement made is erroneous.

secure fourteen ministers, or other persons approved of by himself. (Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' 150). The Record of the Act of Parliament gives no debates on this topic, but many wrangles about precedence. Mr Gardiner, as to these matters, cites a news-letter (MS.) of October 7, 1639. Montrose, Lindsay, and a party were striving to secure fourteen laymen, in place of the lost fourteen bishops.<sup>44</sup> Divers "known Covenanters" were of the same mind. Montrose became suspect, and on his door a paper was fixed, "Invictus armis, verbis vincitur."<sup>45</sup> The little rift within the lute of the Covenant had opened. Moreover, Charles would neither sanction the Parliament in calling Episcopacy "unlawful"—for then where was the Church of England? a mere temple of Baal, as the preacher said—nor would he be party to an act rescissory of the old Acts establishing Episcopacy. That would cut his plan for reintroducing Episcopacy, on the strength of these Acts, from under his feet. He would rather have his real intentions discovered than render them futile:<sup>46</sup> he would risk a rupture rather than submit. Meanwhile, by one vote, Argyll carried his Bill about the election of Lords of the Articles. The Covenanters also demanded freedom of debate, not mere voting, on each Bill sent down from the Lords of the Articles,* and that keepers of the great castles should be Scots, and chosen by advice of the Estates.†

Charles could not submit. The changes demanded were revolutionary. Parliament would have passed at one step into its present measure of authority. Admirable as our constitution may be, this leap to it out of Tudor monarchy was apt to startle a king. Traquair prorogued Parliament: it protested, and he adjourned, for a visit to Court, till November 14. Charles gave increase of rank to several of his supporters—Ogilvy was made Earl of Airlie, Ruthven was created Lord Ruthven of Ettrick. The Covenanters now sent Loudoun and Dunfermline to Charles in London (November 8). He declined to see them, as they were not commissioned by Traquair, and he prorogued Parliament till next June. Traquair, coming up, was out of favour, but bought back his power by showing to Charles a singular document, which proved that the enemies of Baal were * Rossingham, News-Letter, Oct. 28. Add. MSS. Brit. Mus. 11,045, fol. 68. Gardiner, ix. p. 53, note 2.

† Act. Parl. Scot., v. p. 303. There are traces of the Earl of Buccleuch's resistance to the claims of Francis Stewart, son of the Bothwell who so annoyed James VI. Act. Parl. Scot., v. p. 608.

seeking alliance with Baal, yea, with the idolatrous King of France ! So Charles regarded the matter. As to the incriminating paper produced by Traquair, Balfour (under 1641) says that Colonel Munroe "was imprisoned for delivering that letter to Sir Donald Gorme, which he gave to Traquair (as Munroe averred), written by the committee here to the French king to be a mediator betwixt the king and them."<sup>47</sup> In April, one William Colville (a connection of John Colville, the spy?) had been deputed to plead with France for intercession, by way of a treaty, "but had never been sent," says Baillie.<sup>48</sup> The letter to France gave Traquair a new locus standi; in revenge the Covenanters later pursued him as "The Grand Incendiary."<sup>49</sup> In the good old times—so near and so far away—the imaginers of this letter might, if their party was out of power, have lost their heads. But we have seen how hard it was, even in the good old times, to punish Scottish nobles for the rankest treason. They soon began to show no mercy to loyal subjects.

The Covenanters again sent up Dunfermline and Loudoun. They intrigued with the French ambassador, Bellièvre, proposing that, in any new treaty with Charles, their alliance with France was to be recognised, and Scots were to be put in the committee of Foreign Affairs, for the benefit of France. Richelieu would hear of no such policy.* Israel hath held forth the hand to Moab, she hath called even unto Midian! The Regent Murray had been as ready for an idolatrous French alliance in 1567. But when James VI. was suspected of such dealings with idolatry, the pulpits rang from Dan to Beersheba. In January 1640 Traquair came from Edinburgh with Dunfermline and Loudoun. Ruthven was reinforced in Edinburgh Castle, and the Scots at once sent Colville to Louis Treize, asking for mediation in the name of the ancient League. Montrose, on December 26, had declined to visit Charles, as men were still "filled with their usual and wonted jealousies."<sup>50</sup> Waristoun said that Montrose had done nobly, but he was also so noble as to sign the letter to Louis.<sup>51</sup> As to the earlier letter to France, never sent, Loudoun was now placed in the Tower for his concern with it. But he had pleas which, legally, were adequate. The deed had been intended, not done, before the Act of Amnesty, in the Parliament of 1639; he was covered by that Amnesty; again, he could only be tried in Scotland.

Charles's dealings with the Scottish Commissioners in spring came to nothing. The men, besides the two nobles, were the hanging sheriff of Teviotdale, Sir William Douglas, and one Barclay, formerly pædagogues of Argyll. In Edinburgh the prorogued Parliament was represented by a committee—Lothian, Dalhousie, Yester, Balmerino, Cranstoun, and Montrose's friend, Napier, with lairds and burgesses.<sup>52</sup>

* Gardiner, ix. pp. 91, 92. From French Archives.

All things in Scotland were unsettled. Ruthven wished to rebuild part of the works at Edinburgh Castle: the citizens treasonably refused to supply materials. The old works were shaken down by the guns fired on Charles's birthday (November 19, 1639) and mankind—as usual unable to see that effects follow causes, not vice versa—held that the walls crumbled from a prescience of bad fortune.<sup>53</sup> Perhaps the death of Spottiswoode was boded? He expired on November 27, 1639. His son, Sir Robert, was a better man.

In the new year, 1640, the Covenanters organised their fighting finance by "The Blind Band," taxing and assessing everybody. Many even of the godly did not relish these exactions. The castle was reinforced (February 10, 1640).<sup>54</sup> The question of money now preoccupied Charles; he was driven to call that three weeks' Parliament in England, the Short Parliament, which proved so ominous (April 13). In Edinburgh the Covenanters erected works commanding the castle gate, having heard that Charles had levied new forces under Northumberland; hence their threatening conduct. Ruthven remonstrated with them and threatened to fire: the town's party seized and imprisoned loyalists.<sup>55</sup> A wordy war of pamphlets, declarations, and protestations went on, and Ruthven occasionally fired upon Edinburgh (May 1).

While the Scots were reorganising their army, and beating up for money, exacting a tenth, as if, says Burnet, for a sacred war, while the ladies contributed their jewels, in England the financial efforts of the king were paralysed. Every corner was raked for money, threats were held over the City and the merchants, in vain: Spain, France, and even (by the queen) the Pope, were supplicated for loans, and supplicated to no avail. The national temper, overwrought by Laud (who had some thoughts of burning a heretic, and had imprisoned many Nonconformists), was in sympathy with the Scots. The Northern Counties could not be asked to serve again; the pressed men from the Southern Counties robbed right and left as they marched, burned the communion rails in churches, and, in the ardour of their Christianity, threatened, and on occasion murdered, their Catholic officers. Almost alone, the Catholics, scapegoats as they were, the whipping-boys of Charles's Protestantism, were now loyal to the king. At Newcastle, Conway failed to keep order among the reckless unpaid levies that were sent to him; the town could not be fortified, and in case of war it was the objective of the Scots, who meant to stop the coal supplies of London. Riots occurred in the capital, and were only calmed by calling out the trained bands.

In 1639, as we saw, Charles had his chance of fighting the Scots and rousing England against them, but he missed it. An offensive war against Scotland, successful or unsuccessful, would have been the saving of him; a defensive war he could not wage, nor wait till want of supplies caused the Scots to disband. In 1640 he might have yielded all along the line, become a puppet king, or abdicated. The old kings, the Plantagenets, had yielded to constitutional pressure, when their backs were at the wall, or had been murdered, or had caused a diversion by foreign campaigns. Charles would not yield, he could not carry the war into France, and the hour for his murder had not sounded. Strafford, returned from Ireland, pressed the policy of force,—he would strike at the Scots or let that kingdom go. It seems conceivable that, in the heat of controversy in Council, he dropped some words about using the Irish army not only in Scotland but in England. The words, spoken or not, were written down by Vane, and were to be used against Strafford on occasion.* But Charles now listened to Strafford, and now wavered; and, in May, prorogued to mid July the Scottish Parliament, which should have met, and did meet, on June 21. There was a technical informality, reported at length by Burnet, in the form of the prorogation, or there was something that the hairsplitters of the Covenant might reckon informality.<sup>56</sup> So they constituted themselves a Parliament, went through their destined work "at a gallop," and sent "two high declarations" to the new Scottish secretary, the Earl of Lanark. He was Hamilton's brother, a man of twenty-four, who had succeeded to the post on the death of the Earl of Stirling (Sir William Alexander).

* We have no doubt that the phrase of Strafford, even as given by Vane, did not bear the interpretation later fixed on it by the men who did the king's loyal servant to death. "You have an army in Ireland you may employ here" (that is, on the east side of St. George's Channel), "to reduce this kingdom" (that is, Scotland). Cal. State Papers, 1640, xxiii. p. 113). Mr Douglas Hamilton, editor of the Calendar, thinks this the probable interpretation.

The argument for holding, by way of a Parliament, a Convention as illegal as that which swept away the Church in 1560, was, as Mr Napier states it: "Is it less unlawful for us simply to vote Lord Burleigh into the chair, than to declare King Charles no longer on the throne, distinctly implying that there was no other alternative?"<sup>57</sup> There was no alternative. Charles had prorogued the Estates merely to gain time to muster his forces, and the Scots knew it. Charles had set the example of law-breaking. Tudor sovereigns had altered religion at their will; so would he, on that precedent. The Scots ever had in their minds the precedent of James III. at Lauder Bridge, and the reasonings of George Buchanan in his 'De Jure Regni' and his 'History.' It is futile to blame revolutions for being laws to themselves.

Montrose, as to the point of holding a Convention, opposed the new revolution, in which Lord Napier had a part. Waristoun wrote to Hepburn of Humbie, later (April 20, 1641), "Montrose did dispute against Argyll, Rothes, Balmerino, and myself; because some urged that, as long as we had a king, we could not sit without him; and it was answered that to do the less" (dispense with the royal permission) "was more lawful than to do the greater" (declare Charles dethroned).<sup>58</sup>

Parliament adjourned to November 19, to prepare war, having organised "a monster committee" of the Estates, on which Argyll, for his own ends, declined to sit. There were about forty members, from earls to tailors and saddlers. Among the names were those of Montrose, Napier, and Stirling of Keir, all three soon to suffer for their loyalty. Montrose had his reasons for being in, as Argyll had his for being out of a committee far too large for the direction of a war. Outside the ranks of the Covenant were Huntly (who, Napier admits, "never showed better than a mere skulker, throughout the whole of the troubles"), Atholl, and Airlie.<sup>59</sup> Airlie's son, Lord Ogilvy; Huntly's son, Lord Gordon, stood out for the Crown. Now the Committee had ordered that private defensible houses should be handed over to themselves, or, in case of resistance, "reduced." Argyll therefore received a commission "of fire and sword," for the extirpation of malignants (such as Ogilvy and the benighted Celtic non-Covenanters) on the frontiers between his region, or principality, and those of Atholl, Airlie, and Huntly, in Badenoch, Lochaber, and Rannoch. The non-Covenanters were to be "brought to their duty," or else "utterly subdued and rooted out of the country," or to "become Christians," so says the Act of Indemnity to Argyll in 1641.<sup>60</sup> This phrase, "rooted out," or its equivalent, "extirpated," later became notorious in the case of the Massacre of Glencoe. Here, perhaps, we may take it to mean, not universal massacre, but the driving of the anti-Christians out of their lands, "out of the country."

The people of Forfarshire, or Angus, were now threatened by Argyll's Campbells, whom they regarded much as England did the Irish army. The Celts, be they Campbells, or be they Macdonalds, were looked on as undisciplined savages by distant Lowlanders. To anticipate the savages of Argyll, Montrose dealt, by orders of Lindsay, it seems, with Ogilvy for the peaceful surrender of Airlie Castle. "I did render my house to the Earl of Montrose for the use of the public," said Airlie in 1641, "neither would he accept of it upon any other terms."<sup>61</sup> Montrose then wrote to Argyll, saying that he need not enter Forfarshire, Airlie Castle being already surrendered. Argyll was not to be balked of revenge against Ogilvy, a feudal foe, but first he treated the Earl of Atholl exactly as the Covenanters (Montrose being "art and part") had treated Huntly. He broke a safe-conduct of Atholl's and sent him to Edinburgh.* Having dealt with Atholl, Argyll next marched against Airlie; and gave orders to young Campbell of Calder to arrest Lord Ogilvy. He then, "goaded into savage exasperation by the intervention of Montrose," says Mr. Gardiner, ordered the burning of the Bonnie House o' Airlie, and Airlie's other house of Forthar, while the property was wrecked, and cattle were driven to stock Glen Shira.

To Campbell of Inverawe Argyll wrote, "See how ye can cast off the iron gates and windows, and take down the roof, and if ye find it will be longsome ye shall fire it well, that so it may be destroyed. But ye need not let know that ye have directions from me to fire it. . . ." <sup>62</sup> Argyll, at his trial in 1661, stoutly denied that he even knew of this deed of fire-raising.

* This is Mr Gardiner's view (ix. pp. 166, 167), and he is not a Highland partisan (cf. Napier, i. pp. 258-261), he quotes Guthry, who heard the statements of John Stewart of Ladywell, executed in 1641 (cf. Spalding, i. p. 271).

In Huntly's case, one may suspect that he was not sorry to go. Charles, as we saw, writing to Hamilton, called him "as false as feeble" (Hist. MSS. Com. xi. Appendix, pt. vi. p. 102). Burnet gives the letter (York, April 23, 1639), but not this remark about Huntly. The editor of the Hamilton Papers in the Hist. MS. Com. refers to Burnet, but does not observe that the bishop expurgated the king's observation that Huntly "is both feeble and false." Compare page 56, supra.

His letter to Inverawe, commanding the outrage, exists to bear witness against him. Gordon avers that Argyll drove Lady Ogilvy, who was about to have a child, from Forthar, and would not permit the lady's grandmother (who took permission), to receive her at Kelly.* "Atrocities" had begun, as usual, Argyll leading the way; and, as always, they were invented even when they did not exist. Argyll, later, was to get his own kail through the reek, and to think himself as unjustly treated as if he had not set the first example of robbery and arson. Aberdeen and Huntly's country were soon compelled to sign the Covenant, and were plundered and burned by the Christians under Munroe. Everywhere non-Christians were suffering extremity.<sup>63</sup>

So passed May and June, at the end of which Charles released the captive Loudoun, and sent him to Scotland in some hopes of peace.<sup>64</sup> Loudoun, in London, had been conspiring with Savile, who had a hereditary hatred of Strafford. The intrigue, according to Burnet, began when Dunfermline was also in London. "A person of quality of the English nation, whose name is suppressed because of the infamy of this action" (Savile), entreated Loudoun and Dunfermline to begin a new war, bringing papers of adhesion to the Scots signed "by most of the greatest peers of England."<sup>65</sup> In fact, on June 23, when Leslie's army was again mustering, Waristoun, the soul of mischief, wrote to Savile, suggesting the ruinous idea of an extension of the Covenant to England, with other treasonable proposals. Savile, with five other peers, answered through Loudoun. They refused to lend treasonable aid, their opportunity was not ripe, but they confessed a common cause. Later, Savile "sent them what they wanted": to bring the Scots to invade England, he forged signatures of the peers to a letter inviting a Presbyterian invasion.† The forgery by Savile was * That Argyll accused Montrose of "suffering Lady Ogilvy to escape" does not perhaps, as Mr Gardiner thinks, contradict Gordon's narrative. It is more important that Gordon clearly had a confused idea of the facts, for he dates the burning of Airlie Castle in 1639; repeats the story under 1640, and cannot imagine what more Argyll could find to do in that year.

† This is Mr Gardiner's view: he accepts the Letters published by Oldmixon ('History of England,' p. 141). Oldmixon, however, has confused the actual Letter (1) with the Savile forgery (2). Savile acknowledged the forgery later, as Mandeville (afterwards Manchester) records (Nalson, ii. p. 427. Add. MSS. 15, 567, a fragment of Mandeville's lost Memoirs. Gardiner, ix. pp. 179, 180, and 210, 211). Savile was a better forger, or employed a better than George Sprot, for the peers could not detect the imitation of their own hands. But Savile had detected some months later, when the deluded Scots met the supposed signatories at Ripon.

Meanwhile Leslie advanced with part of his forces to Camp Moor, near Dunse. Here he lingered for weeks, awaiting supplies, and here the rift in the Covenant was widened. The Committee of the Estates, as we saw, was too large for military purposes. There was an idea of erecting a Triumvirate; one man—Argyll—to be responsible north of Forth, and two men south of Forth. Montrose appears to have heard of the scheme through Archibald, brother of Sir James Campbell of Lawers. Montrose procured a modification of the draft commission, his own name was added to that of Argyll for the North, with those of Mar, Cassilis, and two others. Argyll, therefore, could not be a Dictator.* When Montrose joined Leslie, Argyll appears to have accused him of too much lenity (then his besetting sin) during the operations in the north. He was absolved by Leslie and the Committee. Next he was offered for signature a "band" in favour of Argyll's dictatorship.<sup>66</sup>

To check Argyll (whose vigorous methods of proselytising have been noted), Montrose presided over the drawing up of a private band, at Cumbernauld, the seat of the Earl of Wigtoun (Fleming), in the month of August. Any such association might be regarded as a breach of the Covenant, but, in Montrose's eyes, it was necessary to counteract the other band, and the movement in favour of Argyll, at once his personal enemy and a man cruel, revengeful, and dangerous to the internal peace of the north. The actual band of Montrose was later burned, but Mr Napier found a transcript (preserved, he says, by Sir James Balfour) of this "damnable" document, as Baillie calls it. The Cumbernauld band avers that "the particular and indirect practising of a few" (in favour of Argyll's northern dictatorship) is dangerous to the country and to the duty of the signing parties to the Covenant itself. The signatories bind themselves to mutual defence "as far as may consist with the good and weel of the public," quite a new kind of clause in a band. The names are Marischal, Montrose, Wigtoun, Kinghorn, Home (who had been discontented as early as only signatures to forge, and, to do Sprot justice, his signature of "Restalrig" defies detection.

* This is Montrose's account, given in May 1641. Napier, i. pp. 255, 256. Wodrow MSS.

June 1639), Atholl, Mar, Perth, Boyd, Galloway, Stormont, Seaforth, Erskine, Kirkcudbright, Almond, later Callendar (commanding under Leslie), Drummond, Johnston, Lour, D. Carnegy, and the Master of Lour.<sup>67</sup> These names, though noble, carried, at this period, no very special weight. Mar was not what Mar had been, the Keiths had no great following, and Montrose's allies proved broken reeds, mere "respectables," helpless or treacherous in a revolution. For the moment, however, the feelings which prompted the writing of the Cumbernauld band were known to be strong enough to make a dictatorial triumvirate perilous—the ambition of Argyll was thwarted; he bided his time, and the Committee of Estates went on as before.

On August 3 Strafford received a Royal Commission empowering him to lead an army of Ireland, and of such as the king might add in England, to resist invasion and rebellion in all three kingdoms. The Scots sent a manifesto into England: they appealed to Parliament, they promised to work no wrong and pay for all supplies which they took south of Tweed. Charles determined to march north in person; and Strafford, with no Irish army, was there to command. But, ere he arrived on the northern scene, all was over. On the night of August 20, Montrose was the foremost man to ford "the glittering and resolute streams of Tweed." On him the lot, by chance or cozenage, had fallen. He crossed alone, and, returning, led his men over. "I was, of all, myself the first that put my foot in the water, and led over a regiment in the view of all the army."<sup>68</sup> By August 29 the royal cause was undone. Conway made a feeble attempt at resistance on the fords of Tyne: he was outnumbered, his position was untenable, and next day the Scots entered Newcastle, which cowardly surrendered, and seized the magazine.<sup>69</sup>

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER III.

<sup>1</sup> Spalding, i. p. 137; Napier, 'Memoirs of Montrose,' i. pp. 166-168.

<sup>2</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' pp. 115-117.

<sup>3</sup> Gordon, ii. pp. 197 et seq.

<sup>4</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' p. 113; Gordon, ii. p. 213.

<sup>5</sup> Spalding, i. pp. 150, 151.

<sup>6</sup> Spalding's account differs, and is more to the discredit of Montrose.

Spalding, i. pp. 169-171.

<sup>7</sup> Gordon, ii. p. 205, note 1.

- <sup>8</sup> Hist. MSS. Com., Report XI., Appendix vi. p. 102.
- <sup>9</sup> Gordon, ii. pp. 210-237; Spalding, i. pp. 136-171.
- <sup>10</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' pp. 127, 128.
- <sup>11</sup> Hamilton Papers, pp. 89-92. <sup>12</sup> Napier, i. p. 200.
- <sup>13</sup> Baillie, i. p. 205. <sup>14</sup> Spalding, i. pp. 209-212.
- <sup>15</sup> Gordon, ii. pp. 270-281; Gardiner, ix. p. 41; Gordon, 'Britane's Dis-temper,' pp. 26-28; Spalding Club, 1845.
- <sup>16</sup> Peterkin, 'Records of the Kirk of Scotland,' p. 220.
- <sup>17</sup> Hamilton Papers, Camden Society, p. 83; Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' p. 131.
- <sup>18</sup> 'Johnston of Wariston's Diary,' Scot. Hist. Soc., p. 41; Peterkin, 'Records of the Kirk of Scotland,' p. 223. <sup>19</sup> Wariston, pp. 43-46.
- <sup>20</sup> Wariston, p. 58. <sup>21</sup> Gardiner, ix. p. 23.
- <sup>22</sup> Hardwicke Papers, ii. pp. 130 et seq. Compare Wariston, pp. 76-92.
- <sup>23</sup> Wariston, p. 76.
- <sup>24</sup> Wariston, pp. 80-82. <sup>25</sup> Wariston, pp. 82-85.
- <sup>26</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' pp. 142, 143, with the Terms.
- <sup>27</sup> Baillie, i. pp. 218, 219. <sup>28</sup> Peterkin, p. 230.
- <sup>29</sup> Cal. State Papers, Domestic, 1639, pp. 386, 387.
- <sup>30</sup> Cal. State Papers, 1639, pp. 370, 371.
- <sup>31</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' pp. 144, 145.
- <sup>32</sup> Cal. State Papers, 1639, p. 387.
- <sup>33</sup> Cal. State Papers, 1639, p. 395.
- <sup>34</sup> Cal. State Papers, 1639, pp. 408, 409.
- <sup>35</sup> Hardwicke Papers, pp. 141, 142.
- <sup>36</sup> Hamilton Papers, Camden Society, pp. 98-100.
- <sup>37</sup> Cal. State Papers, 1639, p. 419.
- <sup>38</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' p. 149. Charles to Spottiswoode, Aug. 6. Ibid.
- pp. 153, 154. <sup>39</sup> Peterkin, pp. 269, 270.
- <sup>40</sup> Peterkin, p. 268. <sup>41</sup> Peterkin, pp. 250-252.
- <sup>42</sup> Howell, 'Familiar Letters,' p. 276, cited by Hill Burton.
- <sup>43</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., v. pp. 252, 253
- <sup>44</sup> Gardiner, ix. p. 51, note 3. <sup>45</sup> Guthry in Napier, i. p. 222.
- <sup>46</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' pp. 158, 159. <sup>47</sup> Balfour, iii. p. 76.
- <sup>48</sup> Rushworth, iii., i. p. 119.
- <sup>49</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' p. 160. <sup>50</sup> Napier, i. p. 228.
- <sup>51</sup> See Gardiner, ix. pp. 92, 93, for the Covenanters' Letter to France. Bib. Nat. Fr. 15, 915, fol. 410.
- <sup>52</sup> Gordon, iii. pp. 79-81. <sup>53</sup> Gordon, iii. pp. 86, 87.
- <sup>54</sup> Gordon, iii. pp. 80-100. <sup>55</sup> Gordon, iii. p. 126.
- <sup>56</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' pp. 166, 167. <sup>57</sup> Napier, i. p. 234.
- <sup>58</sup> Napier, i. p. 236. <sup>59</sup> Napier, i. p. 239.
- <sup>60</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., v. p. 398. <sup>61</sup> Napier, i. p. 245.
- <sup>62</sup> Gardiner, ix. p. 167, note 3, quoting the letter from 'Notes and Queries,' Series v., ix. p. 364.
- <sup>63</sup> Gordon, iii. pp. 164, 165, 271; Willcock, 'The Great Marquess,' p. 107; Cal. State Papers, Sept. 12, 1640.
- <sup>64</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' pp. 170, 171. <sup>65</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' p. 165.
- <sup>66</sup> Napier, i. pp. 263, 264. <sup>67</sup> Napier, i. pp. 269, 270.
- <sup>68</sup> MS. in Montrose Charter Chest; Napier, i. p. 271.
- <sup>69</sup> Baillie, i. pp. 256, 257; cf. Clarendon, i. pp. 204, 205, on this disgraceful surrender of Newcastle.

CHAPTER IV

THE SCOTS INVASION OF ENGLAND.

1640.

THE presence of a Scottish army at Newcastle, confiscating the patrimony of St Cuthbert and the goods of Catholics or of Anglicans at will, would once have united England in arms. The Scots would have been driven from Tees and Tyne to the Naver, calling on their mountains to cover them. An England united and prepared would have done it: in a few years an England prepared, though not united, did it. But England was now neither united nor prepared. Strafford met the retreating levies of the king at Darlington. Terrified as they were, they were scarcely more uneasy than the Scots had been after their victory at the ford of Tyne. Some 4000 of the Scots army are said to have decamped, homesick no doubt, towards Berwick. Though the numbers are probably exaggerated, Leslie reports (September 2) "the evil carriage of our own soldiers," and "the multitude of runaways, who abandon the army."<sup>1</sup> Says Baillie, who was present, "If Newcastle had but closed their ports, we had been in great hazard of present disbanding," but the garrison was at once withdrawn.

Only the gentlemen of England had fought well. Wilmot had cut down one or two opponents in a cavalry charge: Strafford, from Darlington, reported to Charles, at York, that Wilmot had slain Montrose, a rumour contradicted by Vane on September 3.<sup>2</sup> The counties of Durham and York had begun to show some spirit; even now, had Charles concentrated at York and advanced, the heart of England might have been aroused, whether by victory or defeat. It was not to be. England, apart from all other distractions, was in one of her fits of fear about Popery: as absurd as if Spain had been in terror of a Protestant plot. It was commonly said that whoever was not Scotch was Popish. In place of aiding the king, the chief Puritan peers were in London, agitating and petitioning. They and the middle classes stood towards the invading Scots, as Brunston and Ormistoun, Knox and Glencairn, and the Douglasses, had stood of old towards the invading English. They called for a Parliament, for the trial of the king's ministers: while the Scots also now insisted on the punishment of "incendiaries," chiefly Traquair and Hamilton, Strafford and Laud. Baillie, by his pamphlets, was a chief agent in hounding Laud to the block; "We pant," says this clergyman, "for the trials of Laud and Strafford."

We need not dwell on the tragedy of Charles, the familiar steps to ruin with dishonour. The petition of the city for a Parliament was added to the petition of the peers. Hamilton was in terror: he wished to fly the country; that being forbidden he helped the Commissioners whom the Scots presently sent to London, with all his might. He "was very active for his own preservation." The Royalist garrisons in the castles of Edinburgh and Dumbarton yielded to scurvy and starvation. The great Council of Peers met, for the first time since Henry VII., at York. They appointed Commissioners to capitulate to the Scots at Ripon (October 2). In the Scottish camp there was trouble. Montrose, "whose pride was long ago intolerable, and meaning very doubtful, was found to have intercourse of letters with the king, for which he was accused publicly by the General in face of the Committee," says Baillie.<sup>3</sup> Montrose is said to have been betrayed by Hamilton and the gentlemen pickpockets of the king's bedchamber. Burnet says that his letter to the king happened to fall to the ground, and the address was noticed by Sir James Mercer, who picked it up. Wishart, Montrose's chaplain, blames the gentlemen of the king's bedchamber, who acted as spies for the Covenanters. Of these men, Will Murray, of old the king's "whipping-boy," is the most notorious. He is freely accused of being employed, now by Hamilton, now by Argyll; he is mixed up in every intrigue: he was always suspected, never discarded, and could probably have explained many a problem that history cannot unravel.<sup>4</sup> Montrose's letter was a mere protestation of loyalty, such as the Covenanters indulged in publicly. The king was not "the enemy," so Montrose was safe: he had not communicated with "the enemy." Meanwhile, in the meeting of Scots and English at Ripon, the forgery of Savile was detected. He justified himself by patriotic motives;

he too was safe ; who could denounce him, to whom ? The Ripon meeting haggled over the question of how much the Scots would take to remain quietly where they were. In the end they received a considerable sum of money, "brotherly assistance." The inevitable Parliament, the Long Parliament, met on November 3. Baillie, travelling south with the Scottish Commissioners, reports that the inns were "like palaces." The king at this time reprieved a Jesuit, sentenced to death for being one ; the anti-Popish agitation went on ; the presence of Rossetti, a papal agent, and the queen's futile dealings with him were resented. The utter uprooting of Episcopacy was clamoured for by the preacher Henderson, in a pamphlet which gave great offence to the English : "diverse of our true friends did think us too rash, and, though they loved not the bishops, yet for the honour of their nation, they would keep them up rather than we strangers should pull them down," says Baillie. The Scots cherished the ambition to see all England Presbyterian on their own model, a lovely dream, that came through the Ivory Gate.<sup>5</sup> The Root and Branch party, however, was powerful and very noisy. But Cheshire petitioners on the Episcopal side objected to "the mere arbitrary government of a numerous Presbytery, who, together with their ruling elders, will arise to near forty thousand Church governors."<sup>6</sup> The Cheshire petition was signed by four peers, more than eighty knights and esquires, seventy clergymen, three hundred gentlemen, and over six thousand freeholders and others. The anti-prelatists produced a counter-petition, in which the numbers all round were exactly doubled ! The thing was a forgery, or a Presbyterian joke.<sup>7</sup>

In March 1643 the satisfaction of the Scottish demands for money was postponed to the business of illegally condemning Strafford : "pleasure first, business afterwards." The Scots acquiesced in this arrangement. We do not dwell on a tragedy "too deep for tears," not the death of a brave man already near his end, but the moral overthrow and the worm that never dies in the breast of Charles. He appears to have yielded in fear of mob violence, which threatened the life of the queen. In August the arrangement with the Scots was completed, and, much to the wrath of the English Parliament, the king hurried northwards, to forget, if he could, in changed scenes : to save his servant, the incendiary Traquair, if he could ; to procure evidence of English treason in inviting a Scottish invasion ; to see whether the name of Stuart might yet have a charm, and make Scotland a rallying-point of resistance against the English; possibly to punish Argyll, who lay, as we shall see, under some suspicion of flat undeniable personal treason. Above all, Charles may have hoped to establish the less enthusiastic Covenanters in the chief offices of State.<sup>8</sup>

Already, in England, Catholics were dying for their religion. William Ward, a priest, was hanged at Tyburn, just as a friend of his, for no other crime than his creed, had perished thirteen years earlier. Resisting the fury of the House of Commons, and the pressure of the mob, as he should have done when Strafford was condemned, Charles now rode out of Palace Yard with his face to the north. The man should repent it, he said, who touched his horse's reins. If we may believe the Venetian Ambassador, the Scottish Commissioners had made him loyal promises.<sup>9</sup> He was their native king: Scotland had ever been jealous of his prolonged absences. But if he expected to win Scotland, to awaken Scottish national sentiment, the king was notably deceived. He went to abase himself in the dust, to assent to all that his soul loathed. He had apparently bought Rothes, by money and place, but at this moment Rothes died.<sup>10</sup> "From him his Majesty expected much service at the present conjuncture, he having given many assurances thereof."<sup>11</sup> He was to have enjoyed high office, in England, and to have married the rich Countess of Devon.<sup>12</sup> We have, perhaps, no right to say that Rothes, the chief fomentor of the Covenant, was bought. He may have been pricked in heart and conscience by the situation of the king. However, there were promises and hopes held before him: to Montrose no bribes were offered. To regard his change of party as the result of personal jealousy and self-seeking, is the note of a mind incapable of understanding a noble motive.

"Though jealousy of Argyll had, no doubt, its full weight in sending Montrose to the king's side," says Mr Gardiner, "there can be little doubt that he was swayed in the main by higher considerations." There can be no doubt, except among the unreflecting base. Rats do not desert to a sinking ship, as was the king's in 1639-1640. Had Montrose deserted the Covenant earlier, had he joined Strafford, had he led the king's army from Berwick to meet Leslie at Duns, English history would have been other than it is. But when the Royal ship had foundered, when Strafford's head had fallen, when every month brought its new attack, it was then that Montrose, in Scotland, began to stir for his king. On one side he saw the representative of centuries of legitimate monarchy, on the other, zealots led by or leading Argyll: and power in the hands of whatever great House best pleased the populace and the preachers.

Returning to Scottish affairs after the capture of Newcastle, we find, in 1640-1641, first the beginning of a split between the less immoderate and the more enthusiastic preachers; next, the affair of Montrose's so-called "plot" against Argyll. Before attending to these we may note a singular example of social manners. Ministers of the Gospel still carried daggers, "whingers," and used them. A preacher of the pleasing name of Lamb had been deposed, in the time of Episcopal darkness, by the Bishop of Galloway, as a quarrelsome person. The ministers of Edinburgh secured for this victim of prelatical prejudice a church in the Presbytery of Peebles. "They say he had stricken a man, whereof he died." His Presbytery suspended him, and he appealed to the General Assembly. They remitted him to his Presbytery, which irritated Lamb. On a Sunday, after hearing two sermons, he acted in an indescribably insulting manner to a young man unknown, and when the youth remonstrated, "with his whinger struck him, whereof presently he died." Mr Lamb then easily obtained a letter of Slains from the family of the young man, which means that he would pay the eric, or blood-wyte. "But we think the Constable will cause execute him," says Baillie, "murder (1), by a preacher (2), especially on the Sabbath day (3), while the Assembly was sitting (4), being a thing of dangerous example."<sup>18</sup>

The ministers had trouble within their fold. As soon as bishops were turned out, amateur professors of religion came in. A tailor and a surgeon from England, "and from Ireland a fleece of Scots people," dissatisfied with official Presbyterianism, had introduced conventicles of their own. Among them were a gifted ploughman and the laird of Lecky. They "sought edification by private meetings" (than which nothing seems more praiseworthy), and were said to be supported by two notable divines, Mr Blair of St Andrews, and Mr Samuel Rutherford, the author of celebrated devotional letters, and of 'Lex Rex,' a political treatise of liberal complexion. Henderson, Guthry, and others opposed the private religious meetings, as savouring of Brownism, or of that New Independent heresy then raising its head in England. A conference was held by both parties, and it was agreed that private devotional meetings had been vastly well in times of corruption, but that now, when the Gospel shone in all its purity, such assemblies might break up congregations, "and by progress of time the whole Kirk," which was very true. But Covenanters forbidding conventicles reminds us of the Gracchi denouncing sedition. The circumstance may be remembered when we find bishops equally intolerant.

The members of the conference signed the document, but those who had been friends of "revival" meetings encouraged them more than ever. "Such as kept those private meetings were, by the rigid sort, esteemed the godly of the land," a thing naturally irritating to the official godly. An Assembly at Aberdeen followed (July 1640), when Dickson, Rutherford, and most of the ministers and elders of the West defended the meetings, and would have carried licence for them, but Guthrie produced * the signed paper of the conference, disallowing these conventicles, and an Act of the Assembly against them was passed.<sup>14</sup> This Guthrie, later Bishop of Dunkeld, died in 1676. Always a moderate Presbyterian, he inclined to the Royal side. His evidence, in his book, is certainly not always accurate, though of value when he was personally concerned. In 1641 the conventiclars wished the Act of the Aberdeen Assembly to be revoked. Calderwood, the historian, was fiercely opposed to conventicles, however limited in number, being a Presbyterian of the old rock: Blair and Dickson were moderate. An eirenicon was found, but Mr Calderwood continued to be "very peevish" on points of the constitution of the Assembly. "Likely he shall not in haste be provided" with a living, says Baillie; "the man is sixty-six years, his utterance is unpleasant, his carriage . . . has made him less considerable."<sup>15</sup> Thus our old friend and authority who had bearded King James, became unpopular among the brethren: and indeed a certain peevishness and delight in hair-splitting may be remarked in his historical writings.

We now turn to the affairs of Montrose, whose advice was probably one of the causes that brought the king to Scotland in August 1641. It will be remembered that he had contrived the Cumbernauld anti-Argyll band, with eighteen other nobles, in August 1640, and had been known to write a protestation of loyalty to the king, from Newcastle. That gave no handle against him, for the Covenanters always kept up the farce of pretending loyalty to "his Majesty's sacred person and authority." But in November 1640 young Lord Boyd, on his deathbed, let out the secret of the Cumbernauld band, and Argyll got wind of it, and drew the whole truth from Lord Almond, at Callendar House, where Queen Mary and Darnley had rested on their way to Kirk o' Field. Argyll reported to the Committee of the Estates, who summoned Montrose and the other banders before them. They acknowledged and justified their band, and, says Guthry, "some of the ministers and other fiery spirits pressed that their lives might go for it."<sup>16</sup> But some banders commanded regiments, and were not lightly to be meddled with, and the quarrel was patched up, the Committee burning the band, whereof we have a copy. On May 26, 1641, at a sitting of the Committee new trouble began. Montrose had heard, from Atholl, Stewart of Grandtully, and John Stewart, younger of Ladywell, many things about Argyll's words and ways at the time when he was Christianising Lochaber, Angus, and Atholl with fire and sword, and took these gentlemen prisoners. Montrose sent Ladywell to collect evidence, and appears to have meant to denounce Argyll and Hamilton of treason when the king came (and for that reason Montrose desired him to come) to the Scottish Parliament.

* Not Mr James Guthrie, later a martyr.

Montrose was working at a paper on Sovereignty, in 1640-1641; it is printed by Mr Napier, and contains the ideas of the Great Marquis. They are peculiar. He acknowledges, of course, that sovereignty may, and does, exist in Republics, Aristocracies, as at Venice, and in Monarchies. He does not claim any more of sacredness for monarchy than for other polities, but he appears to hold that tampering with any form of sovereignty, once established—Republic, Aristocracy, or Kingdom—is so dangerous as to be positively wrong. The Scots, if they go too far, will suffer the worst of all tyrannies, that of subjects usurping power (he means Argyll, and other nobles with Argyll), and the end will be despotism: "the Kingdom fall into the hands of One, who of necessity must, and for reasons of State, will tyrannize over you." The One was then walking about England, in clothes ill-made by a country tailor; his sword very close by his side; a speck of blood noticed on his little white band. This One was to arrive, and tyrannize, and his officer was to turn the General Assembly into the streets. To revert to Montrose, the Doge of Venice, he says, "is no sovereign, is nothing but the idol to whom ceremonies and compliments are addressed." To this constitutional position of a Doge, Argyll, with his demand that the Estates should appoint the chief ministers of the Crown, would reduce the Sovereign of Scotland. The Highland chief and his allies, with the populace and popular preachers, would really hold the sovereignty. Charles ought not thus to abdicate power, but ought to hold frequent Parliaments, and never encroach on religion and just liberties, as guaranteed by law.

Montrose desires a reformed Charles, a contented people, safety from the tyranny of preachers, populace, and Argyll.<sup>17</sup>

But the worst of these is Argyll.

Montrose made no secret of his ideas. He wrote them out in a treatise, perhaps addressed to Drummond of Hawthornden. Here he named no names, but in private correspondence he spoke out to Mr Murray, a minister who, in the beginning of the troubles, had helped Rothes to convert him to the Covenant. Murray told Graham, another preacher. Graham talked, and the affair, as we saw, in May 1641 came before the Committee. What had Montrose said about Argyll's sayings? Montrose had averred that Argyll had said to Atholl, Ladywell, Grandtully, and other prisoners, that he and his party had consulted lawyers and divines about deposing the king, and that they meant to do it. He cited Ladywell as having heard the words, and Lindsay as having mentioned, on another occasion, that Argyll was to be Dictator. Lindsay, summoned, did not remember having named Argyll, and, if he had, it was no great matter. The evidence of Ladywell would be more serious. Montrose sent for him, and he appeared before the Committee in May, and signed a written statement in corroboration of Montrose. It is obvious that Argyll was a very unlikely man to have used, in the hearing of opponents, the language reported by Ladywell. But, in these days, men often did speak, over the bottle, with surprising indiscretion. Argyll is never charged with intemperance, but a glass of wine, and the heat of discussion, may have betrayed him into hasty expressions. This would be a theory less tenable if the measures taken against Ladywell had not evinced a desire to silence for ever, with little or no regard to law and usage, an inconvenient witness.

Having signed his corroboration of Montrose's charges, Ladywell was sent to the castle, and there was so worked on by Balmerino and Dury that he "cleared" Argyll. He also confessed that, impelled by Montrose, Napier, Stirling of Keir, and others, he had sent a report of Argyll's treasonable speeches to the king. The messenger who carried the report, Captain Walter Stewart, was captured for the Committee on his return.<sup>18</sup> In his possession was found a brief note to Montrose from the king, in which he merely promised to behave in Scotland on the lines laid down by Montrose in the treatise on sovereignty. On June 12 Charles wrote to Argyll, denying that he had promised high official places to Montrose and his associates. He avowed his letter to Montrose, taken with Walter Stewart, and maintained that it was such a letter as he ought to write. This was incontestable. But another paper, in cypher, or at least with cant names, "A. B. C." "the Serpent," "the Elephant," "the Dromedary," and so forth, was found in the captured Walter Stewart's possession. This paper was in his pocket, "and, with astonishment, he swore he thought it had not been in the world," writes Hope to Waristoun (June 7). This indicates that the cyphered paper really contained cryptic notes made by Walter Stewart of his own ideas, and that he probably thought that he had destroyed it. But he had casually kept it in his pocket! This was the least likely way of concealing a document which, according to what was finally dragged out of Walter Stewart, really contained, not his own words, but messages from Montrose, Napier, Keir, and Blackhall, taken by him to Traquair in London, and by Traquair to Charles, who gave "particular answers" to them.<sup>19</sup> Where were the "particular answers"? They were not found on Walter Stewart, or were not produced, and have never been discovered. And why, in place of the answers, was Walter bringing back the questions? It may be guessed, on the other side, that he was unconsciously carrying back Montrose's messages to Charles, in his pocket, hence his astonishment when they were found there. Traquair denied all connection with the Elephant, Dromedary, Serpent, and the rest, as did the king.<sup>20</sup> Montrose, Napier, and others averred that they had, indeed, sent Walter Stewart to Lennox, his chief, in London, but "only to speed his Majesty's journey to Scotland. . . ." "There was some other discourses to that purpose in the bye, as, that it was best his Majesty should keep up the offices [of State] vacant, till he had settled the affairs here. . . ." *

This is not very satisfactory. Walter Stewart's cypher papers may have been made by him to assist his memory, in London, and may have been his notes of "other discourses in the bye."

* Montrose's and Napier's Replies unto the Libel, 1641-42. Montrose Charter Room. Napier, i. pp. 295-297.

Whatever the document really was, it seemed like an attempt by Montrose's friends to secure office at the expense of Argyll, and the matter was carried to the long account of his enemies against Traquair. Lennox was more or less involved in an intrigue which employed so many of his clan. There are notes by Vane of a meeting of the English Privy Council on June 18, in which this business was discussed. Argyll, after the discovery of Walter Stewart's cyphered paper, appears to have informed Charles that he himself has been cleared (of the charge brought by Ladywell), by the Committee in Scotland. "He desires you to hear my Lord Traquair. A foolish business concerning Captain Walter Stewart. Whatsoever plot he was upon, your Majesty is not knowing of it, nor the Duke of Lennox. Great mistake." The notes are so confused that we cannot often tell who is being spoken about.<sup>21</sup>

The result was the separate caging of Montrose, Napier, Stirling of Keir, and Stewart of Blackhall in the castle (June 11). Montrose had certainly designed to denounce Argyll of treason in Parliament, on the strength of Ladywell's, and probably of other evidence. Ladywell, we see, recanted—he truckled to Argyll, but he was hanged for "leasing making." He was executed on July 28. Baillie writes "it is true that none ever died for no transgressions of that act" (against leasing making).<sup>22</sup> However, "stone dead hath no fellow," and Ladywell (there is little reason to suspect that he had been tortured) was inconvenient to Argyll.* It was also convenient to keep Montrose and his friends in prison, to brand them as "plotters," and denounce them with fury.

Montrose declined the judicature of the Committee; if tried he would be tried publicly, by his peers. Napier avoided the appearance of "contumacy," but gave negative answers without discussion. They had all, we saw, repudiated Walter Stewart's cypher, and the meaning which he chose to put upon it. Napier maintained, and his honour is not doubted, that if any were guilty he was, and he could not be induced to accept release from prison as a favour. Napier's conduct was nobly constant; he knew well why Argyll's Committee tried to separate him from Montrose. All the houses of Montrose were ransacked, and nothing worse was discovered than some old letters of euphuistic courtship. A copy of the harmless Cumbernauld band, with some of Montrose's thoughts on the subject, found in a charter chest, was made matter for outcry. On July 27 Montrose was called before Parliament. "My resolution is," he said, "to carry along with me fidelity and honour to the grave."* He nobly kept his word. Such was the demeanour of this turn-coat plotter, as Montrose is called by the devotees of the Covenant.

* Ladywell's exoneration of Argyll was to the effect that his speeches about deposing kings, "I now having thought better of them, were general, of all kings: howsoever, by my foresaid prejudicate opinion of his Lordship's actions, I applied them to the present." He speaks of "my weakness, not being able either to stand or go." This suggests the Boot, but Guthry, who was with Ladywell on the scaffold, says nothing of torture, but of persuasion on hope of mercy (Guthry, pp. 93-95). He adds that Argyll consulted Hope, as to whether Ladywell might be spared: Hope and other lawyers replied, "it was necessary for Argyll's vindication that he should suffer."

Montrose lay in close confinement during the visit of the king to Scotland. Watched at Edinburgh by Hampden and other Commissioners from the English Parliament, Charles combined strenuous efforts to win popularity with feeble attempts to recover authority. Lennox, after some hesitation, signed the Covenant, as did Hamilton. There were festivals, much lip-loyalty, and the king almost convinced himself that all was going well. He attended the sermons of the preachers, and had to listen to abuse of bishops. Fanaticism had been making great progress. "The Lord's prayer began to grow out of fashion, as being a set form."<sup>23</sup> An Act for abolishing "monuments of idolatry" was passed.<sup>24</sup> Already in the north, screens whose colours and gold had weathered the blasts in the roofless Cathedral of Elgin, were used as firewood. The ancient and beautiful seventh-century Cross of Ruthwell near Dumfries, with its Anglo-Saxon hymn in Runic characters, was broken into three pieces.† It had passed unscathed through the Border wars and the Reformation: it had for a thousand years proved that the dark ages knew more of art and poetry than Presbyterianism could provide or endure. In 1802 it found a shelter in the manse garden, and is now re-erected under the roof of the church. What the Vikings had spared in Iona, with much work of later times, wild preachers desecrated and destroyed. In Aberdeen, Easter Day was perforce kept as a fast (1642), "no flesh durst be sold in Aberdeen," says Spalding.

* The report from the MS. in the Cumbernauld Charter Chest is published by Mr Napier, i. p. 346. Balfour, iii. 30.

† For a picture of the cross and decipherment, see Stephens's 'Handbook to the Runic Monuments,' p. 130.

While Charles was in Edinburgh, old Lady Huntly was driven into exile to escape excommunication. Catholics were boycotted, and their property was confiscated. Charles accepted an Act by which he must choose his officers of State subject to consent of Parliament. Argyll now denounced one of these officers, Morton, who had brought him up.<sup>25</sup> The barons wished to give their votes on election of officers by ballot, Charles decried this as cowardly. Morton begged leave to refuse office as Chancellor, he did not wish to be a cause of trouble.<sup>26</sup> It will be remembered that while Roxburgh, "that awful man," had refused the Covenant, his son, Lord Ker, had taken it. But Ker now challenged Hamilton as a traitor to the king, for both Hamilton and his brother Lanark, the secretary, were suspected by all who held the ideas of Napier and Montrose. Ker was constrained to apologise before the House, and the Estates passed an Act acquitting Hamilton.<sup>27</sup> Meanwhile the battle over the appointment of officers of State raged, and even in Balfour's brief jottings of the debates we see that the king's self-control nearly broke down. Would they accept Loudoun as chancellor, yes or no? He pressed for a reply, "else he protested to God he would name none more to them."<sup>28</sup>

Meanwhile, what of "the plotters"? On August 28, Napier, Keir, and Stewart of Blackhall were brought to Parliament, where Charles encouraged them by taking off his hat, and nodding in a kindly way; but the hearing of their case was ever postponed.<sup>29</sup> Sir Patrick Wemyss (September 25) wrote to Ormonde saying that the king had "engaged his royal promise to Montrose, not to leave the kingdom till he come to his trial. For if he leave him, all the world will not save his life."<sup>30</sup> Would Charles be more loyal to Montrose than to Strafford? The world knows by what chicanery Strafford was brought to the block; doubtless Argyll would have found out a way for Montrose thither, as in the case of Ladywell. Perhaps Montrose, in criticising Argyll and Hamilton, and in accusing Argyll, had been guilty of "leasing making," and so might be righteously executed. But it was infinitely desirable that he should not speak in his defence, publicly, before his peers. "If this be what you call liberty," said the Earl of Perth, "God send me the old slavery again."<sup>31</sup> If Montrose lost his head for what he had done, then, as Argyll's Celts boasted, Scotland would serve King Campbell, not King Stuart.

While Loudoun had become Chancellor, Charles had nominated

Lord Almond as Treasurer. Perhaps because Almond had signed the Cumbernauld band, perhaps because he was not of the Argyll clique, or merely because the king had proposed him, Parliament resisted Almond's appointment. At this juncture, when the most that Charles could hope for was to save the lives and estates of men like Montrose and Napier, when Hamilton had secured himself by an alliance with Argyll, and when men like the Earl of Perth were dreading the new "liberty" more than the old slavery, a dramatic event—did not occur. In place of a successful return to the old Scottish methods of kidnapping or assassinating, a feeble effort was made to revive these practices, and the result was THE INCIDENT.

The exact truth about this mismanaged mystery can never, perhaps, be ascertained. In exploring the evidence we meet currents of cross-swearing; where only two witnesses can speak to certain details, they flatly contradict each other. Probably the first symptom of a brewing plot (which seems to have been overlooked by historians) occurs in a speech of the Chancellor Loudoun on October 5. He "remonstrated to the king and Parliament that there was a great confluence of people of late come into the town, upon what ground he did not know." A proclamation was issued against the gathering.<sup>32</sup> Later we shall find that Hamilton and Argyll were said to have 5000 of their "friends" concealed in the city. It was the Scottish custom in any crisis to collect "friends." Ker is said to have been accompanied by 600 men when he apologised to Hamilton, and Hamilton also was accompanied by many gentlemen of his name.

The first overt movement was on October 12, when Charles, with some 500 gentlemen not of the godliest, went down to the House. He told the Estates that he had come to Scotland with intent to "settle their religion and liberties," and that he had done it. "None should ever draw him from that." "Yet, my Lords, I must needs tell you a very strange story. Yesternight" (October 11) "my Lord Hamilton came to me, I being walking in the garden, with a petition of very small moment, and thereafter in a philosophical and parabolical way, such as he sometimes had used, he began a very strange discourse to me," to the effect that enemies had provoked the queen against him by calumnies, and so he requested permission to leave Court that night.<sup>33</sup> Next day (October 12) Hamilton, Lanark, and Argyll retired to Hamilton's house of Kinneil, some twenty miles away. On the 12th, therefore, the advanced party found itself deprived of its leader, the extremely cautious Argyll, while he, Hamilton, and Lanark were to be regarded as victims of an intended plot. Their partisans would, of course, suspect the complicity of the king with the conspirators. Now Charles, as reported by Balfour in the passage just cited, knew not a word of a plot against the life or liberty of Hamilton; but merely that he complained of having been traduced to the queen. Charles then produced a letter, full of loyalty, written to him by Hamilton, and received that day. "With tears in his eyes," the king complained of Hamilton's distrust of him: he had taken Hamilton, when accused of treasonable projects, to sleep in his chamber: yet his friend held him in suspicion.<sup>84</sup>

Our next source is in the statements of Hamilton and Lanark, written from their retreat at "Keneel," on October 22. Lanark had found, before October 11, that Charles had some suspicions both of himself and his brother; "he was pleased to say that he thought me to be an honest man, and that he had never heard anything to the contrary; but that he thought my brother had been very active in his own preservation," a phrase already cited. Days went on after Charles spoke thus, and Lanark hoped that an accommodation with Parliament was probable, when all was ruined by The Incident of October 11. On that day Leslie had sent for Hamilton and Argyll to come to him privily.

In the circumstances now to be related, Leslie ought at once to have told to the king what he proceeded, on October 11, to tell to Hamilton and Argyll. But "he said for excuse that he thought it a foolish business, and therefore omitted it."<sup>85</sup>

Going to Leslie's rooms, on October 11, Argyll and Hamilton had found him with Colonel Hurry, who "told them," says Lanark, "that there was a plot, that same night, to cut the throats both of Argyll, my brother, and myself." This fact Hurry had learned from Captain William Stewart, "who should have been an actor in it." The three nobles were to be inveigled into a room at Holyrood, as if to speak to the king on business. Two lords were to enter by a garden door (as Ruthven entered Mary's cabinet on the night of Riccio's murder); they were to be followed, as in that old crime, by a large company, who would slay Hamilton, Lanark, and Argyll, or convey them on board a ship of the royal navy. As there was but one witness, Hurry, Hamilton had told the king, in the garden, "in general, that he had heard there was some plot intended against his life."

According to Charles, as reported by Balfour, and more fully by Nicholas, Hamilton then spoke only of being calumniated, and of desiring to retire on that score, and, from a letter of Hamilton's presently to be cited, it seems that he said no more than this. But Hamilton's speech, the king said, was "problematical." Later, on October 11, Captain William Stewart confirmed Hurry's tale, and Hamilton and Argyll, sending for Lanark to Lindsay's house, told him all, and the three took measures for their safety. Next day (October 12) they wrote to the king, who, dissatisfied with their letters, went straight to Parliament, as we saw, with his "very strange story." In his escort were men whom Hurry and Captain Stewart had denounced. To avoid tumult, the three menaced noblemen did not go to the House "with our friends at our backs," but retired, as has been seen, to Kinneil. "I am most confident," adds Lanark, "his Majesty knows not of any such base design (if any such there were), yet I may say he injures himself much in striving to protect those that are accused."<sup>36</sup>

Charles, as a matter of fact, was praying Parliament vainly for a public trial of the case. On October 22 Hamilton also wrote, from Kinneil, to the king—to whom Lanark wrote we do not know. From Hamilton's letter of October 22, it seems that, in the garden, he only told Charles vaguely "that I knew not when I should be so happy as to attend on your Majesty again." Thus Charles did not know, from Hamilton, in the garden, on October 11, that there was "some plot intended against his life." Nor did Hamilton tell Charles later, on that night, when he had now two witnesses, Hurry and Captain William Stewart, to his story. The king knew nothing: but next day Argyll sent a Mr Maule with all that they had learned. Hamilton explains that he left the town, on the 12th, to avoid a street fight, and he protested that he was not base enough to suspect the king's knowledge of the conspiracy.<sup>37</sup> No more is known of Mr Maule, but his message proved to Charles that Hamilton was suspicious of a plot against his life and Argyll's.

We now come to the evidence of Captain William Stewart, interrogated by a Committee of the House, on October 12. He said that at nine o'clock P.M. of the previous day, he and Hurry were summoned to speak to Lieutenant-Colonel Alexander Stewart, who offered them drink. Both declined; Hurry because he was to dine with the Earl of Crawford at eleven, a very early hour. Hurry departed, but Colonel Alexander Stewart took the captain to his rooms, where he revealed the plot, saying that Lord Almond was to take the rôle of entering from the garden, that he would denounce Hamilton and Argyll, and, with a force of three or four hundred men, convey them to a ship. William Murray, of the king's bed-chamber, was to lure the two nobles into a drawing-room proper for the purpose of kidnapping them, and the Earl of Crawford, recently returned from the Imperial Service, was to command the four hundred men. Crawford was for killing the nobles; Almond intended merely to have them legally tried. Captain Stewart (though at feud with Argyll for the death of Ladywell and captivity of Stewart of Blackhall) refused to be concerned, but said that he might appear at Crawford's rooms where Hurry was to dine. On October 21 Captain William Stewart, again examined, gave similar evidence before a secret Committee of the House, for the public trial demanded by Charles was not granted. The captain now said that he had revealed all to Hurry, bidding him tell Leslie, which, as we know, he did, and Leslie then told Argyll and Hamilton. On October 12 Lieutenant-Colonel Robert Home, being examined, implicated Colonel Cochrane, who declared that William Murray had taken him to the king's bedside, for what purpose Cochrane did not say. On October 11, however, Colonel Cochrane had sent for Home to come to Crawford's rooms, where he promised to make Home's fortune; but Home declined to listen to his plan. Hurry, on the 12th and later, corroborated Captain Stewart; he had been approached by Crawford, but declined to deal with him, though by Leslie's permission he dined with the earl. He declared that Crawford asked him to come to him "early next morning" (the 12th) "with three or four good fellows, and it would be a means to make him a fortune." But the plot, if plot there ever had been, was for the night of August 11! Hurry did not go, as he heard a guess that Crawford meant to liberate Montrose from the castle, and attack Argyll on October 12. If so, this was a second plot.

On October 22 Lieutenant-Colonel Alexander Stewart, under examination, gave his account of his interview on October 11 with Captain William Stewart. The captain had spoken ill of Hamilton, and said that he certainly was a traitor. But he despaired of success in petitioning Charles for the release of his own uncle, Stewart of Blackhall, "for the marquis" (Hamilton) "is of such power with the king," adding "all was true that my uncle said" against Hamilton. Captain Stewart then informed the colonel that the town was full of Argyll's and Hamilton's men to the number of 5000. Now five days earlier, Loudoun had told the king and the House that "there was a great confluence of people lately, upon what ground he did not know."<sup>38</sup> The Royalists maintained that Argyll and Hamilton did not wish for a happy accommodation with the king, and that The Incident exactly suited their designs. Hamilton and Argyll may have gathered their men into the town to attain their purpose in another way, by force, or they may have heard of an attempt to be made against themselves. The colonel replied to the captain that if Hamilton and Argyll made any treasonable enterprise, Home, Roxburgh, Almond, and Mar could raise their counties against them, and Crawford would help. They could seize Hamilton in his coach, or in the king's rooms, "if the king were out of the way." They would carry their prisoner to a ship, and kill him, in the German fashion, if a strong rescue were attempted. Though the captain and the colonel thus differed widely in details, yet the idea of the plot clearly remained the same. It might be defensive, against the 5000 of Hamilton and Argyll, or these 5000 may have been summoned in anticipation of a Royalist attack.

When Crawford was examined (October 23), our knowledge of the plot was carried a day farther back, to Sunday, October 10. On that day the earl, and William Murray of the royal bedchamber, met Lords Ogilvy (of the bonnie House of Airlie), Gray, Almond, and Colonel Cochrane, and Murray asked the company if they had heard of a letter from Montrose to the king offering to accuse Hamilton of treason. (No such letter is known to have been written by Montrose.) Almond thought the charge improbable. As to his talk with Hurry on October 11, Crawford said that it merely concerned the colonel's desire to serve abroad; Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart had the same purpose. On Monday night (the 11th) he and his friends met and drank at Cochrane's rooms. (By this time they must have known, through William Murray, of Hamilton's visit to the king in Holyrood gardens, that Hamilton had suspicions, and that the game was up.) On October 27 Crawford admitted that, from the talk held on Sunday night (October 10), he gathered that there might be an idea of arresting Hamilton. He had no further information. He "did not remember" having talked about cutting the throats of traitors. His request to Hurry to come with three or four others on the morning of the 12th, referred only to the purpose of their taking foreign service, which is natural enough, as the 12th would have been "the day after the fair." The nobles were to have been seized on the night of October 11; on the 12th they decamped.

On October 23 and 27 Cochrane implicated William Murray as having spoken to him about the desirableness of "sequestering" Hamilton and Argyll, and as having sounded him about his regiment, then quartered at Musselburgh. He had made no attempt to tamper with Lieutenant-Colonel Home, and on Monday morning (October 11), near Holyrood, had told Crawford that he would have nothing to do with "cutting of throats." He denied that he had been with Almond, Crawford, Murray, and the others on the Sunday night (October 10), and Crawford had already withdrawn his original statement that Cochrane was there. On October 23-27 William Murray said that, by Cochrane's repeated desire, he had taken him into the king's bedroom, where he had an interview with his Majesty. As to Hamilton and Argyll, he himself, he confessed, had said that if they really were traitors, they should be legally "sequestered." On Sunday, October 10, his business with Almond was to tell him that the king wished him to resign the treasurership, the royal nomination being opposed by the House. A letter of Montrose to the king was spoken of, Murray saying that his Majesty would be loth to interrupt peaceful negotiations by noticing it. No names of Hamilton or others were mentioned in Montrose's letter (though historians are apt to say that Hamilton was named). Murray denied all knowledge of the plan that he should lure Hamilton and Argyll into a room where they should be arrested. He could not be expected to confess to that.

On October 25 Murray said that he had visited Montrose "casually" in the castle, and that the earl had wished to see the king. He had "high" matters to reveal. Murray offered to carry a note; next day a letter came from Montrose to the king, who thought the matter "neither so home, nor so high" as Murray had led him to expect. This letter, and another, the king regarded as deserving of neglect, for a man in Montrose's position "would say very much to have the liberty to come to his Majesty's presence." Murray sent information to this effect to Montrose on Saturday (October 9). About four o'clock P.M. on Monday, October 11, a third letter came from Montrose, which both the king and Murray thought worthy of consideration. Next morning Charles said that he thought of communicating the letter to Loudoun, Lennox, Argyll, Roxburgh, Morton, and Leslie, with whom he would confront Montrose. But by that time (Tuesday the 12th) the nobles had fled.

This is the sum of the depositions: the document ends with a tabular arrangement of the contradictions in the evidence.<sup>39</sup> The papers, published in 1874, were found among the MSS. of the House of Lords. The attention of the Estates was henceforth turned to The Incident. Charles said that he would not tell what he knew of Hamilton; why Argyll had fled he could not say; of Lanark he knew nothing but good. He could not tell what Cochrane had communicated to him in his bedroom, without Cochrane's permission. The king constantly demanded a public inquiry, even with tears in his eyes. "What would they grant him if not this, where his honour was concerned?" Mary Stuart had as vainly appealed for a public hearing. They who refuse it, as the House did refuse it, confess, if not their guilt, their apprehensions. They chose, as Charles said, anticipating Bunyan, "a private way to Hell." The "private way," the secret inquiry, of which we have given the results, led to a blank wall, as we have seen in the depositions. Montrose's letter of the 11th to the king was read; therein he had spoken of "a business which did concern the standing and falling of his crown." Montrose, examined, refused to be explicit. He would not wrong any particular person. This was not deemed satisfactory.<sup>40</sup>

In the end (November 15), Montrose, his friends, Sir Robert Spottiswoode and Sir John Hay (incendiaries), were released "under caution"; Montrose, after seven months' imprisonment, had no trial.

The Incident remains as dark as ever it was. It is needless to discuss Clarendon's absurd statement that Montrose, in an interview with the king, offered to assassinate Hamilton and Argyll. Mr Gardiner has scouted this piece of gossip.<sup>41</sup> William Murray, the groom of the bedchamber, had ever been suspected of treachery to the king. Crawford was a hot-headed soldier, who, if he meant a plot for the night of the 11th, did not even recruit leaders till the morning of that day, when a crowd of Dalgettys dined with him.

The peculiarity of the whole affair is that there seem to have been several threads of enterprise, which no one hand held. Montrose, like Stewart of Blackhall, knew, or, with the hopefulness of a prisoner, thought that he knew, enough to ruin perhaps Hamilton and perhaps Argyll. Had the plot succeeded, whether in Almond's more or less legal sense, or in Crawford's throat-cutting style, and had Charles listened to the prayers of Montrose, by the 12th of October Hamilton and Argyll would, if alive, have been prisoners, and Montrose would have been free to bring his charges in Parliament. The king's pathetic requests for an open trial prove that nothing, in his opinion, could come out against his own honour. The usual stupidity of conspirators declared itself in the senseless conduct of Crawford, if the evidence against him be accepted. It seems not inconceivable that Murray arranged the whole affair, behind Charles's back, to give Hamilton an opportunity for discrediting, by the conspiracy, both his opponents and the king. Murray was suspected, we know, of picking Charles's pockets of letters, in the Covenanting interest. Clarendon accuses him of betraying the king's raid on the Five Members (in 1642), and perhaps the theory that he was the root of The Incident, though difficult, is not the most difficult explanation. Nothing, to our knowledge, was even hinted against Montrose, at the time; the charge against him is due merely to the blunder of Clarendon. Against this conjecture a point must be noted. Murray, just after The Incident, rose in the king's favour. On November 11 Wiseman wrote to Penington, "Old William Murray, a friend told me, was this day sworn from a groom to be gentleman of the king's bedchamber; if true, such a mark of trust has not been known to be given to men of his quality."<sup>42</sup> Murray had been with Montrose, with the king, with Cochrane, with all concerned, whether as agent provocateur, or as manager of a plot, differently viewed by different men engaged. But he increased in favour.

Another question is, What could Montrose know against Hamilton, now allied with Argyll? Judging from the charges brought against the marquis on a later day, Montrose knew no more than that he had ever been a treacherous double-dealer. Before the Assembly of 1638, he had privately, as a kindly Scotsman, advised the Covenanting leaders to go on with courage and resolution; "if you faint and give ground in the least, you are undone." Montrose was Guthry's authority for this statement, having been present, and heard Hamilton's words. In 1643 the second charge against Hamilton was that he had said, "If they awed the king, he was such a coward, they might have of him what they would." This clearly refers to the story of his private advice, to the same effect, to the Covenanting leaders in 1638. Guthry reports the tale of 1638, first on the evidence of Andrew Cant, given to him and others on the day after Hamilton spoke the words, and of Montrose, who "drew him to a window," at supper, and told him all, on the same day as Cant spoke to him.* There was no time for hallucination of memory on the part of Cant and Montrose. Montrose, then, knew this treachery of Hamilton's, and would have revealed it to Charles, in October 1641. Probably he had no better evidence against Hamilton. In any case, the king continued to trust the marquis, while, on January 27, 1642, he sent to Montrose a verbal message by Mungo Murray, thanking him for his sufferings in his cause, and expressing reliance on his generosity, in a letter.<sup>43</sup> The result of The Incident was to make the king hated and suspected, most unjustly.

While the inquiry into The Incident was at its height (October 28), Charles announced the news of the Irish Rebellion. Tradition, in Wodrow, says that the news was brought to him while he was playing a match at golf, and that he finished his game. Into the question whether the king had himself lit the flame of the Irish outbreak, we have not to go. The news excited England, then seething with remonstrances, tumults, the three-cornered duel of Puritans, Episcopalians, and Sectaries, and with terror caused by The Incident, and the usual dread of a massacre of 100,000 persons by the Papists. The Irish Rebellion in many ways resembled the Indian Mutiny, and, of course, increased jealousy of the king. Charles hurriedly abandoned everything to Argyll and the Estates, tossed about honours, making Argyll a Marquis,<sup>44</sup> Leslie Earl of Leven, Waristoun a Knight, and so, on November 18, hurried back to England.†

Here it may be well to mark the effect of the Irish risings on political events. The precise number of English and Scots massacred, tortured, or left to die of cold and hunger, is matter of dispute. Mr Gardiner's remarks (x. pp. 64-69) are cautious, * Guthry, pp. 40, 41. Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' pp. 254, 255. Sir James Turner gives Guthry the lie, because, he says, this charge was not urged in 1643. But it was. Turner, 'Memoirs,' pp. 234, 235.

† An odd reason is given by Patrick Gordon of Ruthven, for Argyll's acceptance of the new title. The Argylls have usually been quite Celtic enough to lean to the second sight. "A cuss in ane old prophecie," says Gordon, declared that "the red-haired and squint-eyed Earl of Argyll should be the last Earl of Argyll," and the "cuss" was to be outflanked and turned by the new title. Argyll's son was earl, and the prophecy was false all round. 'Britane's Distemper,' p. 57.

yet 20,000 dead seems to be about his estimate. Mr Livingstone of Ancrum, a famous Covenanting preacher, says that some Scots in Ulster found the Scottish Covenanter army of revenge and relief more burdensome than the rebels had been. But what occurred was less important than what was believed. Horrible cruelties and outrages were attributed to the Irish, and it was taken for granted that every Irish or Scoto-Irish soldier or woman who came to aid the royal cause in England or Scotland, or to accompany her husband, had been engaged in the massacres. At all events each man, woman, and camp-follower was Papist and Celtic: in Scotland the men receive the worst character for lust and cruelty, from a Royalist writer, Patrick Gordon; and though these Irish troops were brave and well drilled, the Covenanters massacred them and their women, both in hot blood and in cold blood. They were looked on as Sepoys would have been, had Sepoys been brought from India, after the Mutiny, to take part in a British civil war.

To return to home affairs. A Commission of fifty-six members of the Estates was left in Scotland, as "Conservators of the Peace" (the details of the Army Treaty with England), and they governed the country. In London, Charles tried to win popularity with the city, and was countered by the passing of the Remonstrance, by the demand of Parliament for control over the militia, and over appointments to State offices, by riots near the palace, and the rising fury of the country on religious questions. All parties except the Sectaries were resolute against the toleration of any religion except their own, in each case. Parliament grasped at the executive. The queen's feeble plottings were known: the outcry of a popish conspiracy to murder everybody was raised: Parliament demanded a trained-band guard: the Commons clamoured for the blood of priests: in brief, the wound of the sting which the discarded Church had left in England was festering and inflamed. Civil war was at the gates. The Scottish Commissioners in London, allies of the English Parliament, were concerned about Ireland, and about religion. The English lords "preferred that Ireland should remain in rebellion, rather than that it should be conquered by Presbyterian Scotland. The Commons preferred that it should remain in rebellion rather than that the king should have an army at his disposal which he might employ against the liberties of England." <sup>45</sup>

In the matter of religion the Scottish Commissioners irritated the king by printing a discourse in favour of Presbyterianism (January 15, 1642). They had complained of English interference with the Kirk, why must they meddle with the Church? Whatever might have been the case in Scotland, Episcopacy was by law established in England. Charles did not acknowledge that in England he was but a Baal-worshipper. He sent Mungo Murray to Scotland with a letter to Loudoun, the chancellor, on this matter: he also, as we saw, sent comforting words to Montrose.<sup>46</sup> Motions towards uniformity of religion between the two countries Charles let pass. In April 1642, Scottish forces under Leven (Leslie) passed into Ireland. Charles himself wished to venture thither: this, of course, was not permitted, for Charles might clear his character as a Protestant, or he might win over the army. In any case the affair of the five members (January 1642), and of the attempt by the king on Hull, and his retiral to York, with the queen's to the Continent, had indicated that peace between him and his Parliament was a forlorn hope. Scotland refused to aid her prince. Baillie expresses the idea of the Covenanters. Prelacy must fall, for if Charles conquered in England, he would withdraw all that he had granted to Scotland.<sup>47</sup> Hamilton was sent to Scotland to do what he could, which was to do as he had ever done, and to engage his daughter to wed Argyll's eldest son, Lord Lorne.<sup>48</sup>

The General Assembly met at St Andrews (July 27, 1642), with Dunfermline as Royal Commissioner. The heads of the Assembly were full of politics. In May the Scottish Privy Council had met, to do what they could for the royal cause, and the "Banders" (Montrose's party of the Cumbernauld band) had flocked into Edinburgh "with great backs"—that is, with armed retainers. Greater "backs" came to oppose the Council from Fife, the focus of Presbyterianism, and a petition of the banders, against giving armed aid to the English Parliament (May 25), was rejected, nor did the Council dare to "assay any accommodation."<sup>49</sup>

Here it may be noted that, though Fife was the focus of Presbyterianism, and St Andrews its sacred town, yet "we found there," says Baillie, "in the people much profanity in ignorance, swearing, drunkenness, and the faults of the worst burghs." The records of the St Andrews kirk-sessions justify this description. "Notorious vices abound in the land," said the committee of this Assembly, and presbyteries are to give up to justice the names of "the adulterers, incestuous, witches, and sorcerers."<sup>50</sup> Drink was also abounding. We later shall find all this corroborated by a letter from an English soldier in Scotland.

Now it is the way of the best historians, as of Mr Gardiner, to applaud the "never resting, ever abiding power" of the preachers, which "pried into men's lives and called them to account for their deeds as no lay government, however arbitrary, could venture to do." Though England, having already a virtuous middle class, did not need, and finally rejected Presbyterian inquisition, still in Scotland, thought Mr Gardiner, it had abated the excesses of "the fierce ruffians who, in the sixteenth century, had reddened the country with the feuds of noble houses," and of "the rude peasants who wallowed in impurity." The moral saviours of Scotland were, on this theory, the preachers. With all respect for the clergy, who meant well, it appears that neither the cessation of feuds nor of "wallowing in impurity" was due to their exertions. King James's mounted police and forty years of intercourse with civilised England gradually diminished the feuds, which now took the form of Argyll's burnings and plunderings, of the fire of Frendraght, and the Huntly-Forbes feud, and of Montrose's later retaliations. As for "impurity," people "wallowed" in it just as much as ever: public penances had no better effect on the morals of lads and lasses than on those of Robert Burns, while "the abundance and increase of the sin of witchcraft in this time of Reformation is to be taken to heart by this reverend Assembly (1643)."<sup>51</sup> Batches of witches were burned. Yet witches did not decrease in number any more than incest, adultery, simple fornication, and drunkenness decreased. Major Weir was a pearl of devoutness, but not incapable of "impurity" and witchcraft. A people cannot be persecuted into propriety; and the Presbyterian discipline was not only intolerable, but a failure. It is not by espionnage that religion works for righteousness.

The Assembly of 1642 began by taking severe measures against Papists and other non-communicants. They supplicated the king to labour for "blessed Unity in Religion, and Uniformity in Church Government," that is, of course, for the establishment of Presbyterianism in England. If he consented, the tumults of resistance would be but "as the voice of a great thunder before the voice of harpers harping with their harps, which shall fill the whole island with melody and mirth." The difficulty was that the king, and a great party, did not want Presbyterian mirth, which was equally undesired by the Sectaries, or Independents, of all colours.<sup>52</sup>

The question of Patronage, which in the nineteenth century helped to split the Kirk into two, came up, and Argyll offered popular election, if "intrants would accept modified stipends." Lauderdale opposed, Baillie was not satisfied, and the matter dropped.<sup>53</sup> The English Parliament sent to the Assembly their petition to the king for peace: rendered impossible by bishops, Papists, "the corrupt and dissolute clergy," and, generally, by Malignants. Many bishops had been impeached and imprisoned, and Malignants resented it.

Cet animal est très méchant
Si l'on l'attaque il se defend.

The Assembly replied that, for anything they knew to the contrary, the Lord had a controversy with England for not being Presbyterian, and the controversy might not cease "till the government of his House be settled according to His own will," which is Presbyterian. On December 25, 1566, the Assembly had written a letter to England "against the Surplice, Tippet, Corner-cap," and other stones of stumbling, which they appear to have regarded as especially odious to the Supreme Being. They had on other occasions interfered with the English Church in this friendly way, and "were heartened to renew the proposition" for making Presbyterianism universal and compulsory: "the Prelatical Hierarchy being put out of the way," and deposited elsewhere. The Reformed Churches, the preachers argued, held their organisations to be jure divino, whereas most of the bishops, even, recognised that their system was "introduced by human reason." Therefore "no man's conscience" could possibly be aggrieved by the desirable reformation! The Kirk would be happy to "agree upon a common confession of faith, catechism, and directory for worship."<sup>54</sup>

The gentlewomen in Galloway had been rioting in church "with clubs and staves," against certain proceedings of the Kirk herself. As Prelacy was not the victim of their clubs, their conduct was reckoned unbecoming.<sup>55</sup>

Lord Maitland (later Lauderdale) carried the Kirk's letter to the English Parliament, and brought back their reply to the Commission and the General Assembly, a body which, says Baillie, "was of so high a strain, that to some it is terrible already." In a few years it came to be regarded as tyrannical even by Mr

Spang, Baillie's cousin and correspondent. The English "granted all our desire, in abolishing of bishops," and required the attendance of some of the brethren at their synod, the Assembly of Divines at Westminster. Henderson, Douglas, the emotional Rutherford, Gillespie, and Baillie were chosen to go, for the preachers: Cassilis, the pious Maitland, and Waristoun, for the laity. The early fights of the great rebellion had taken place: the Court was at Oxford, and what Hamilton did for his king in Scotland was to "keep down the malcontents" (Montrose's party) in union with Argyll. So Baillie tells us.<sup>56</sup> Things going ill with the Parliament, they appealed in a letter to Scotland for aid: Charles replied, on his side, and Hamilton persuaded the Council to print the royal declaration (December 20, 1642). Argyll was for publishing the Parliament's note as well as the king's, or neither; and, against the Council's desire to publish the king's alone, the usual agitation was organised (January 1643). A petition in favour of this course was put in by the Covenanters, and a counter-petition was drawn up by Traquair and Hamilton. This "was flown upon by the Commissioners" (of the Assembly) "and Conservators of the Peace" (the standing committee of the Estates), says Baillie. The Traquair document merely expressed a hope that nothing would be done to weaken Scottish loyalty to their king.<sup>57</sup> A petition could not be more temperate, courteous, and conciliatory. But it was "flown upon."

The right of petition was denied by the Kirk party to their fellow-citizens, who were threatened with citation before the General Assembly, which probably meant excommunication and outlawry. By "the new liberty" a mere political move was to be judged of by the preachers! The petitioners declared that (as bound by the Covenant) they would defend the king's authority and person. They objected to "imposing rules or laws of reformation to our neighbour kingdom," and probably that was their chief offence. In reply the Kirk party "took a very good and necessary, but a most peremptory and extraordinary course," says Baillie.<sup>58</sup> They published "A Necessary Warning" to be read in all pulpits, bidding the presbyteries to take measures against all who tried to procure signatures to Traquair's petition. We may imagine what historians would say had Charles tried to stop, by the agency of the bishops, the signing of the "supplications" of 1638-1640.

The governing faction of Scotland found in the Kirk a useful instrument of political tyranny. They sent Loudoun, Henderson, a Mr Barclay, and Waristoun, to the king as mediators for peace on the basis of Presbyterian uniformity in England, and to ask for an Assembly and a Parliament. Meanwhile (February 1643) Ogilvy and Aboyne went to Charles at Oxford, while Montrose met the queen on her return from abroad. Her Majesty had landed in Burlington Bay, where Vice-Admiral Batten, for the Parliament, fired into her bedroom, and drove her into the fields.<sup>59</sup>

Montrose advised the queen, at York, to strike the first blow in Scotland, otherwise the Covenanters would assuredly send an army to help the Parliament.<sup>60</sup> But Montrose was not heard till too late. Hamilton and Traquair hurried to York with the opposite advice; from the first, in spite of every failure, the marquis believed in his own powers of intrigue as more potent than the sword, Charles had secured the "cessation" of war in Ireland: trafficking with idolaters for an armistice, he could now release his army in Ireland to defend Episcopacy in England. It is vain to say that he might have made "concessions to Puritanism in London." No party of his subjects would be satisfied to let other parties be religious in their own way. Abolition of bishops "out of the way" (into the next world, probably) was the only concession that would satisfy the preciser sort. Charles could not meet them here, but he now rejected the idea of Montrose—to strike the first blow in Scotland,—the only practical idea, and he had cause, as usual, to repent having listened to Hamilton. Montrose, to be sure, would have enlisted Catholics, but they had as good a right to their creed as Baillie or Argyll—a point apt to be overlooked. Yet if the Argyll of 1685 might recruit murderers, like Balfour called Burley, and Fleming, it would appear that a king might use the arms of his Catholic and guiltless subjects.

The Scottish Commissioners were "uncomfortable" at Oxford, Baillie says: Charles would not let them go to meet the Parliament in London; and, when they persisted, the Earl of Crawford told them that their throats would be cut on the way. Crawford had this very practical idea.<sup>61</sup> The Commissioners therefore returned to Scotland, and, on May 10, resolved to summon a Convention of Estates for June 22. Meanwhile the Kirk party of politicians knew that Montrose was on bad terms with Hamilton, and they approached him with offers of promotion by their faction. Probably nothing was said or done by them that could not be disclaimed ; but enough passed to cause a rumour that Montrose “ had struck up an alliance with certain persons ”—so the queen wrote to him from York (May 31).<sup>62</sup> Guthry tells that Argyll’s faction, through Sir James Rollock and Sir Mungo Campbell, offered to pay Montrose’s debts, and make him Lieutenant-General, under Leven, if he would join them. Montrose, to drive time, gave an indecisive answer, and expressed a wish to consult the preacher, Henderson, on the return of the Commissioners from Oxford. After summoning, by their own authority, the Convention for June 22, the Covenanters sent Henderson to meet Montrose at Stirling Bridge.<sup>63</sup> Wishart, who was deep in Montrose’s confidence, tells a similar tale, and adds that the earl hoped to fish out from Henderson the Kirk party’s secrets. Henderson replied to Montrose that his party meant to aid the English Parliament with as strong an army as possible, and hoped for the earl’s help. Not knowing how to answer without either a dishonourable promise or a blunt refusal, Montrose asked Rollock whether Henderson had a commission to make his offers? Sir James thought that he had ; Henderson denied it, but expected that the Convention would make good his promises. All this was vague ; and indeed, without consulting Henderson, Montrose could easily guess the designs of his party.<sup>64</sup>

Charles, before the Convention of June met, had issued a declaration to the Scots, proclaiming his own wrongs at the hands of Parliament. He assured the Presbyterians that the fomenters of the war were not of their faith, and never would be—they were Sectaries of all kinds. It would have been well for the Scots had they believed the king ; but the glorious prospect of spreading Presbyterianism dazzled them. The king added that he was maliciously accused of having an army of Papists, who were regarded by the godly much as Basuto and Zulu troops are regarded by the white races of South Africa. No one could wonder, Charles said, if he received assistance from any of his subjects, whatever their creed (Captain Smith, a Catholic, had rescued the royal standard at Edgehill) ; but in fact he had forbidden Papists to repair to him. Meanwhile Papists were fighting for the Parliament—his men had captured twenty or thirty of them. He solemnly protested his loyalty to the Acts of the late Scottish Parliament.<sup>65</sup>

For his part, Hamilton advised the king to allow the Scottish Estates to meet in June, provided they did nothing towards raising forces for the use of his enemies. The Estates did meet, and voted themselves in possession of all sorts of powers. Hamilton had not the courage to protest, formally, but he feebly demurred. For a long series of such services he had lately been created a duke. Burnet explains that Charles was resolved, as in the first bishops' war, not to be the first to strike a blow, which was not wise in a military sense, and, politically, was futile. Hamilton was a veteran in the art of not striking blows; though, as Montrose said in a copy of verses, he had just "fleshed his maiden sword," at York,—in a dog!<sup>66</sup>

Meanwhile, in early July, the incompetent Scoto-Irish Royalist, the Earl of Antrim, a Macdonnell, was caught near Knockfergus, with letters from Nithsdale, Aboyne, and others in his pockets. He had, or was said to have, a commission to treat with the Irish rebels: Monroe, the Scottish Covenanting commander, was to be bribed to carry Charles's Irish army to England—if he declined, the Scots of Ulster were to be massacred; Charles's forces were to sail to the Solway, Nithsdale with the Maxwells was to join them; the Macdonalds, under young Colkitto ("left handed" or "ambidextrous" Col, of the Islay family), and Clan Gilzean were to assail the Campbells; Huntly, Aboyne, Montrose, and Marischal were to raise the North. "Great probability for all this, albeit no certain evidence can be had for some parts of it," says Baillie.<sup>67</sup> He adds that Huntly had marred all by refusing to aid—very like Huntly; and hints that this refusal drove Montrose to his conference with Henderson. As it was also said that Hamilton was to rise in arms—the very thing which he had prevented Montrose from doing,—we may deem it probable that the discovery of this large Royalist scheme was exaggerated, though Montrose, Aboyne, Huntly, and others had certainly been together at Aberdeen, in the early June.<sup>68</sup> But this was after the queen heard that Montrose "had struck up an alliance" with the Kirk party (May 31). About July 9 the Royalist scheme was announced, and when the Convention met, they sent the papers seized on Antrim to the English Parliament. They had now a good certain Popish plot such as their souls loved. The Papists were resolved "utterly to extirpate the true Protestant religion in England, Scotland, and Ireland"—D'Ewes recorded this terrible fact in his diary.<sup>69</sup> Such were the habitual tremors of the truly pious, who found in them a fearful joy, as children do in ghost stories. Parliament had decided to send emissaries into Scotland, not to ask for an army—a brotherly Scottish army was expensive,—but to demand the services of a contingent of divines for the Assembly at Westminster. But two Royalist victories now made men-at-arms fully as desirable as preachers, and (July 19) four members of the English House were despatched to ask for a Covenanted army. The deputation was dilatory; the Scottish Convention, puzzled by its delay, prosecuted some "incendiaries," and waited for the meeting of the General Assembly (August 2). After this the ecclesiastical and lay politicians worked hand-in-hand.

The chief business of the Estates, the Assembly, and the English Commissioners was the compilation of THE SOLEMN LEAGUE AND COVENANT between Presbyterian Scotland and Presbyterian England. The religion of the Kirk was to be preserved, that of England and Ireland was to be reformed, "according to the Word of God, and the example of the best Reformed Churches." Prelacy in England was to be abolished; what was to take its place? The exact phrasing, "according to the Word of God," is attributed to the younger Vane; the Scots can scarcely have failed to see the wide loophole for the evasion of Presbyterianism, but they accepted the article as amended. With the brazen and habitual hypocrisy of all concerned, they vowed "to preserve and defend the King's Majesty's person and authority, in the preservation and defence of the true religion, and liberties of the kingdoms."<sup>70</sup> One opinion was that the Scots should only enter England as armed mediators or "redders." But Waristoun knew the proverbial danger of "the redder's stroke," the thrust that slew Mercutio.<sup>71</sup>

The Solemn League and Covenant proved fatal in its consequence to the liberties of Scotland. From her struggle for the League she emerged a conquered people; the foot of Cromwell on her neck; her towns and pulpits occupied by Sectarian soldiers; her General Assembly put to the doors. This might not have occurred had the Scots simply broken their pact with the king, and sent their army to fight against his, lest he, if victorious over his Parliament, should break his pact with them. Had the Scots merely done this, the defeat and death of Charles would have left them tranquil. England would not have meddled with their beloved religion. But, by the Solemn League and Covenant, they deemed themselves sworn to thrust the Kirk on England, and to make war on her unpresbyterian "bloody and blasphemous sectaries." * They reaped as they had sown: at Dunbar, Worcester, and in the massacre of Dundee.

* "Bloody" was ever the favourite epithet in the mouths of the Covenanters.

The Covenant was accepted on August 17, taxation was imposed, and financial terms were arranged with the English rebels. Proclamations for levies were issued, and Leven was appointed general. "It is true he passed many promises to the king that he would no more fight in his contrary," says Baillie, but he saved his war-worn conscience with some words about "religion and country's rights" being in danger.<sup>72</sup> This apprehension was justified, in general opinion, by the "cessation," or truce, with the Irish rebels.<sup>73</sup> Mr. Henderson did not think that the divines at Westminster would pronounce for Presbyterianism till the Scots were over the Border. This was a good reason for haste; but English delays in sending money did not permit the Scots to cross Tweed till January 1644. The English Parliament accepted the Solemn League and Covenant in the meantime, and Baillie, with Gillespie (a very precious youth), Henderson, and other theologians, joined the Westminster Synod, where they found the Independents, "the bloody and blasphemous sectaries," active in obstruction. The Scots had difficulties in getting "ruling elders" accepted: there was hair-splitting over texts of the Greek Testament: Baillie foresaw the democratic anarchy of "particular congregations," but one thing was fortunately directed: "Both Houses did profane that holy day" (Christmas Day) "by sitting on it."<sup>74</sup>

The king, says Baillie, "was made ever to believe" that the Scots would not join his armed enemies. This was by the fault of Hamilton. Already Montrose, with Ogilvy, had set out, and carried far other news to the queen at Oxford. She would not believe Montrose, and wrote (August 28) to Hamilton expressing her confidence in him.<sup>75</sup> Montrose rode to Gloucester, which Charles was besieging, and implored him to strike a blow in Scotland before the Scottish could join the English rebels.<sup>76</sup> But "worthless courtiers" persuaded the king of Montrose's youth, rashness, and ambition. Montrose was completely baffled. Presently the Scots were mustering on the Border, and the letters of the Hamiltons announced their despair. Charles now listened to Montrose, who showed him that his change of mind came too late. The cavalier himself was ready to venture his life, and advised fight. Irish soldiers should be landed on the west of Scotland; the Marquis of Newcastle, commanding in the north, should lend a party of cavalry; German and Danish troops should be hired, and arms obtained from abroad. If it is unpatriotic to use foreign forces, then the Hanoverian Government sinned when, in 1745, they brought over Dutch and Hessian troops to oppose the king's great-grandson. Antrim, who had escaped from his captors, was at Oxford, and promised 2000 men, probably Macdonalds settled in Ireland, whose lands in Kintyre the Campbells had eaten up.<sup>77</sup>

These things occurred in December 1643, and in the same month Hamilton and Lanark came to Oxford from Scotland. If they had been warned, as Baillie says, that their "pye" was cooked in England, they took the risk. They were arrested and imprisoned, Hamilton on charges of treason. The accusations, with his replies, are printed by Burnet. The allegations prove, what scarcely needed proof, that Hamilton was wavering, incompetent, a Mr Facing-Bothways. His behaviour before the Assembly of 1638, his encouragement to the leaders to persevere, if correctly reported, might certainly merit disgrace, if not death. That he aimed at the crown for himself no man can believe. Montrose, says Wishart, told the king that, if Hamilton and Lanark were to be in favour, he must ask leave to seek employment abroad; "not that he desired any severity towards them, but entreated his Majesty to beware of further harm from them."<sup>78</sup> Lanark escaped, disguised as a groom, and joined the Covenanters. Hamilton was sent to Pendennis Castle, and later to St Michael's in Cornwall, whence he was released by the Parliamentary forces in 1646. Both of the brothers became more or less actively and fatally loyal too late, changing when the majority of their countrymen changed. The Oxford Parliament proclaimed the king's enemies traitors. Traquair and the dubious gentleman of the bedchamber, William Murray, were reluctant to sign a similar "band" of Montrose's, says Wishart: Murray was now created Earl of Dysart, his daughter later became the ill-famed second wife of the godly Lord Maitland, when that hero, as Duke of Lauderdale, was misgoverning Scotland for Charles II.

Montrose had many enemies at Court; in Scotland, among the nobles, he had scarcely three faithful friends. What he did was his own work; and though he received the title of marquis, and the commission of lieutenant-general under Prince Maurice, he was probably none the better for these honours. They "caused the incapable, impracticable Huntly, for ever lurking in the caves of Strathnaver, to hug and mumble the old bone of his lieutenancy benorth of the Granbean," says Mr Napier in his picturesque way.

It is probable that Huntly, who, like his father, had fled to the wilds of the Naver, resented Montrose's elevation more than his own perhaps collusive capture by the Covenanters at the beginning of the troubles. Crawford of the practical ideas about throat-cutting was not conciliated; Douglasses, Carnegies, Kers, Maxwells "in different degrees, refused to minister to the glory of Montrose, and left the king to ruin."<sup>79</sup> Scottish jealousy of a great man fermented in the minds of the Royalist nobles. It was not till March 1644 that Montrose rode north from Oxford with Aboyne, Ogilvy, Crawford, Nithsdale, Reay, and the Colonel Cochrane of The Incident. At York (March 13) he communicated with the Marquis of Newcastle, who, in his elegant way, was undertaking the defence of his title-giving town against Leven and some twenty-two thousand Scots. From Newcastle, as Montrose wrote to Spottiswoode, there was scant promise of help, but he hoped to see some fighting; and Argyll had returned to Scotland, whither Montrose intended to follow him.

Leven was now confronting the Marquis of Newcastle. He had crossed Tweed at last on January 19, 1644, with twenty regiments of foot, three or four thousand horse, and 120 guns of various calibre, including light field-pieces invented by "dear Sandie," as Alexander Hamilton, brother of Tam o' the Cowgate, "auld Melrose," the first Earl of Haddington, was affectionately styled. Second in command was Baillie (not the letter-writer); and Leven's nephew, David Leslie, was with the army, a better soldier than the uncle. Tweeddale marched under the Earl of Buccleuch, who had borne no conspicuous part in the troubles. The town records of Selkirk show that the preachers, to stimulate recruits, told them that the English were being oppressed—by Papists! Loudoun, Dunfermline, Lindsay, Cassilis, Marischal, Livingstone, and Maitland were among the noble leaders of the Scottish rebels, and the fugitive Lanark tampered with the loyalty of the Mayor of Carlisle, while Sir Alexander Hamilton commanded the soldiers of his name. A Douglas led Nithsdale and Annandale, the Galloway Whigs followed Colonel William Stewart, and a Hepburn of Humble was commissary-general. On how many fields had these old family flags been raised against king and queen!

The advance was slow; the siege guns for battering Newcastle had been sent to Blyth by sea, and arrived late. Morpeth was taken and garrisoned by Leven on January 26; on February 3 he was before Newcastle; but the Marquis of Newcastle had entered the town in force, though he held it without energy. Leven had been joined by that charming writer of memoirs and honourable soldado, Sir James Turner, a kind of Dugald Dalgetty. Turner had come back from the Scottish army in Ireland, where he had saved many women from massacre and drowning.<sup>80</sup> The Scots forces were wasting from hunger and disease in Ireland, at Newcastle he found Leven's force lusty, well provisioned, but raw, untrained and undisciplined, with inefficient officers. Had Newcastle beat up the quarters of any of their bodies, Turner thought that they would have run. The Scots tried one night to bridge the Tyne with boats, and might have been cut to pieces in the manœuvre, so Turner suggested a diversion to alarm the garrison. It was a bright moonlight night, and old Leven, whom Turner despised, said that the matches of the Scots matchlocks would thus be too visible to the Royalists on the walls. Turner pointed out first that the moonlight would eclipse the match light; next, that for the purposes of an alarm, the more the matches were seen the better. In fact, they frightened "certain great people" on the Scottish side, who fled in panic from their own men, and, a neap tide flowing (which Argyll, a skilled sailor, should have observed, says Turner), the attempt was abandoned. Turner was much amused by this amateur soldiering; but it was better than the imbecility of Newcastle.<sup>81</sup>

Newcastle found himself between the armies of Leven in the north and of Fairfax in Yorkshire. On February 22 Leven left forces to watch Newcastle, crossed Tyne near Corbridge on the 28th, and entered Sunderland on March 4. Newcastle had been reinforced; but, after making a show of fight, retired, suffering considerable losses from want of supplies, and heavy storms of snow. Leven also, after moving on Durham, withdrew, and (March 17) stormed a fort at South Shields.<sup>82</sup>

Now Montrose joined the Marquis of Newcastle. Under that commander, and under a black banner, with a naked man hanging from a gibbet—motto, I dare,—fought a Miss Pierson, captain of a troop of Lord Carnwath's horse! Carnwath himself, like other Scottish Royalist nobles, was disgusted at the promotion of Montrose, and threw down a commission of lieutenancy of Clydesdale brought to him by the marquis from the king.* On March 23

* This Carnwath seized the king's bridle at Naseby, and turned him from charging with the Guards. Charles ought to have pistolled him; but when did king ever resent this affront?

Newcastle faced Leven. But Newcastle, said Montrose, "was slow," and two days of irresolute skirmishing preluded to a retreat. Had the Graham been commander, there would be another tale to tell.* Montrose, with a very ragged regiment and broken-down horses, now crossed the Border, and had reached the Annan Water when his English levies deserted him (April 13).† Nevertheless, Montrose pushed on to Dumfries, where the provost, Sir James Maxwell, received him well: for this crime he was executed by the Covenanters.‡ Of Antrim and his Irish no news came, and Callendar (Montrose's old ally as Lord Almond) was bringing a force against him. At this time, as Turner says, Huntly "was making some bustling in the North," and the Estates sent regiments to Stirling and Perth; one of these was Lord Sinclair's. Now Turner took counsel with his conscience, having been hitherto of Dalgetty's mind as to serving any side which paid him well, and came to the opinion that Covenanting was treason. With Lord Sinclair himself, he determined to carry his regiment over from the Covenant to Montrose, a course which the civil conscience must condemn. With Napier, the Master of Napier, and Stirling of Keir, they sent messengers to invite Montrose to Stirling, whence he could raise the clans. But Montrose, understanding that Callendar had turned traitor and had a large force to intercept him, withdrew into the north-east of England, "and thus, by Montrose's negligence and Callendar's perfidy, was lost the fairest occasion that could be wished to do the king service."§ More light is thrown on Montrose's failure at Dumfries by a letter of instruction for Lord Ogilvy from the hero. This was intercepted when Ogilvy was later taken prisoner. He was to tell the king that the Earl of Hartfell (Johnstone of Johnstone), Morton, Roxburgh, Annandale, and Traquair had (like Carnwath) refused the royal commissions, "crossed the business, and went about to abuse us who had undertaken it."<sup>83</sup> Moreover, Montrose was neglected by Newcastle, disappointed by Antrim, and all but betrayed by Hartfell.

* Napier, ii. pp. 393-395. From Montrose papers, depositions before the Committee of Estates, in 1644, 1645; cf. Sanford Terry, pp. 207-212.

† Wishart, pp. 43, 44. Wishart glances at "the envy of some," which caused Montrose to be so ill provided; probably Carnwath is intended.

‡ So Spalding, ii. p. 391. The editors of Wishart (p. 45, note) find, in M'Dowall's 'History of Dumfries,' the name of John Corsane as provost.

§ So writes Turner. Wishart says nothing of the invitation to Stirling.

Here we must desert Montrose on the eve of a gallant exploit in England, and return to the fortunes of the cause of Presbyterianism at Westminster. The Scottish visitors had gleams of happiness, for organs and carven wood-work of churches, and old church windows, and "many fine pictures of Christ and the Saints," were being burned and broken.<sup>84</sup> Devout Hollanders sent sympathetic messages, but the English divines did not seem anxious for the advice of the Dutch.<sup>85</sup> Baillie preached before Parliament, "wherein I was graciously assisted"; but the Independents obstructed business over the question of many congregations under one Presbytery—they preferred each congregation to stand on its own feet. The ideal of the Independents was rather like that of the Scottish candidate for the House of Commons, who, in answer to a question about his religion, said that he "was a member of his own private chapel." They averred that the Synod of Divines at Westminster "was but an Antichristian meeting, which would erect a Presbyterie worse than bishops," a blasphemy recorded by Baillie.<sup>86</sup> Baillie wrote thus at the time when he heard of the skirmishes between Leven and Newcastle, at which Montrose was present. Meanwhile books were published which pleaded openly for toleration and freedom of conscience—the climax of wickedness; and every kind of wild heresy prospered in the army, especially under the illuminé Cromwell. Already, it may be, he held the Scots in a slight aversion, which heaven was pleased to increase on better acquaintance.

Before returning to Montrose's deeds in Northumberland, we should advert to the "bustling," or rather fumbling, of Huntly in the north. It is recorded by Patrick Gordon, who makes out the best case possible for his chief. Argyll, he says, had engaged his nephew, Huntly's son, Lord Gordon, for the Covenant on the old plan of insurance—the father on one side, the son on the other. Lord Gordon was to bring out his "name" for the Covenant, Huntly sitting still; just as Argyll later sat still under Cromwell, while his son, Lorne, was out for Charles II. But Huntly's kin, the young lairds of Drum, Haddo, and Gight, would not let him sit still; they rode into Aberdeen, and took the Covenanting officials prisoners about the time of Montrose's march to Dumfries. Huntly now mustered men at Aboyne; was dissatisfied with his forces; heard at Aberdeen of Montrose's retreat to the English border, and also that Argyll was approaching in force. Drum and Nathaniel Gordon, scouting south, plundered the Covenanting town of Montrose; but Huntly fled, as usual, to Strathnaver, and Argyll took Haddo and Gight in their castles, and sent them to Edinburgh, where Haddo was imprisoned in Haddo's Hole and executed: the Covenanters now resorting to that short way with Cavaliers. Argyll then garrisoned Aberdeen, leaving Lord Gordon in command, with a committee.<sup>87</sup> This was the result of Huntly's "bustling,"—this, and his increased jealousy of Montrose's commission.

While Argyll (March 30, 1644) was leaving Aberdeen for Edinburgh, Montrose was advancing through Northumberland to attack the Covenanting garrison which Leven had thrown into Morpeth. Not troubled by the neighbourhood of the armies of Leven and the recreant Callendar, he joined Clavering, and, accompanied by the Earl of Crawford, tried to take Morpeth by assault without guns. Montrose "did not know the word impossible," but this task was beyond him. His first effort failed at daybreak; under cloud of night he threw up earthworks close to the fort, he brought six guns from Newcastle, and made a practicable breach. If one of the defenders, Captain MacCulloch, who then parleyed with Montrose, tells truth, the marquis gave him a romantic, discouraging, and perfectly false account of a great disaster to the main Scots army at York, of the success of the force at Huntly, and other matters. So the citadel of Morpeth surrendered and was destroyed, and Montrose had a similar success against a fortress at the mouth of the Tyne. He scoured the country far and wide, but was summoned by Rupert to his aid, and arrived the day after Rupert and Newcastle, by confidence and carelessness, lost the fatal field of Marston Moor (July 2). In that strangely amateur but bloody contest, Cromwell fought like an expert, Leven fled from victory to Leeds, the regiment of Buccleuch rushed wildly from the field, and David Leslie got no gratitude from the English for his share in the Parliamentary victory. He and his Scots helped to massacre the men who keep the honours of the day—Newcastle's White Coats, who, refusing quarter, died in their ranks, like the Spartans of old. So many Scots fled that a bitter feeling broke out between the two countries, the Covenanters claiming for David Leslie the merit due to Cromwell, and even averring that Cromwell showed cowardice after receiving a slight wound.<sup>88</sup>

Montrose came a day too late for Marston Moor; Newcastle had fled by sea, Rupert deprived Montrose of all his men, and the great marquis was left to undertake, single-handed, the most romantic adventure in our chronicles—the greatest enterprise in the history of Scotland since Bruce was a solitary fugitive. Bruce triumphed; Montrose failed because, by no fault of his own, his effort was made too late. But only they who measure merit by success can sneer, as modern historians have actually done, at the unfaltering heroism, unquenchable loyalty, and resourceful genius of the great Montrose.*

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER IV.

- <sup>1</sup> Terry, 'Life of Alexander Leslie,' p. 128.
<sup>2</sup> Cal. State Papers, 1640, p. 649; 1640-41, p. 9.
<sup>3</sup> Baillie, i. p. 262.
<sup>4</sup> Wishart, 'Deeds of Montrose,' p. 15, and note. Murdoch and Morland Simpson: Longmans, 1893. Napier, i. pp. 271, 272.
<sup>5</sup> Baillie, i. p. 306. <sup>6</sup> Gardiner, ix. p. 285, note.
<sup>7</sup> Cal. State Papers, 1641-43, p. v.
<sup>8</sup> Cal. State Papers, 1641-43, pp. 81, 104; Gardiner, ix. pp. 409-412.
<sup>9</sup> Giustiniani, Gardiner, ix. p. 417, note 2.
<sup>10</sup> Cal. State Papers, 1641-43, p. 105.
<sup>11</sup> Bere to Pennington, Aug. 28; Cal. State Papers, 1641-43, pp. 106, 107.
<sup>12</sup> See Rothes' 'Relation,' Appendix, pp. 225, 226. His letter to Waristoun.
<sup>13</sup> Baillie, i. pp. 367, 368. <sup>14</sup> Guthry, pp. 78-82, 1748.
<sup>15</sup> Baillie, i. pp. 361, 362-372.
<sup>16</sup> Guthry, p. 90. <sup>17</sup> Napier, i. pp. 280-292.
<sup>18</sup> Guthry, pp. 89-94. Letter of Thomas Hope of Kerse to Waristoun, June 7, 1641. Napier, i. pp. 308, 309. <sup>19</sup> Napier, i. pp. 321-323.
<sup>20</sup> Napier, i. pp. 317, 318. Advocates' Library MSS.
<sup>21</sup> Cal. State Papers, 1641-43, p. 20.
<sup>22</sup> Baillie, i. pp. 381, 382. <sup>23</sup> Gordon, iii. p. 250.
<sup>24</sup> Balfour, iii. p. 60. Act. Parl. Scot. v. p. 351.
<sup>25</sup> Balfour, iii. pp. 69, 70. <sup>26</sup> Balfour, iii. pp. 71-73.
<sup>27</sup> Balfour, iii. p. 86. <sup>28</sup> Balfour, iii. p. 79.
<sup>29</sup> Napier, i. pp. 353-355. Balfour, iii. p. 55.
<sup>30</sup> Carte, Ormonde Papers, i. p. 5.
<sup>31</sup> Gardiner, x. p. 19. Citing Webb to Nicholas, Sept. 5. Nicholas MSS.
<sup>32</sup> Balfour, iii. p. 90. <sup>33</sup> Balfour, iii. pp. 94, 95.
<sup>34</sup> Balfour, iii. p. 95; Cal. State Papers, 1641-43, p. 138.
<sup>35</sup> Nicholas's Notes. Cal. State Papers, 1641-43, p. 138 (October 14, 1641).
<sup>36</sup> Hardwicke Papers, ii. pp. 299-303.
<sup>37</sup> Hamilton Papers, Camden Society, pp. 103-105.

---

* Many years ago the author was fishing in the Beaulie, attended by an old Highland gillie, whom he met for the first time. "My name is Campbell," said the gillie, "but my heart is with the great Montrose."

- <sup>38</sup> Balfour, iii. p. 90.
<sup>39</sup> Hist. MSS. Commission, iv. pp. 163-170.
<sup>40</sup> Balfour, iii. pp. 96-134.
<sup>42</sup> Cal. State Papers, 1641-43, p. 163, cf. p. 179.
<sup>43</sup> Napier, i. p. 366.
<sup>45</sup> Gardiner, x. p. 101.
<sup>46</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' pp. 188, 189.
<sup>47</sup> Baillie, ii. p. 34.
<sup>49</sup> Baillie, ii. pp. 43, 44. Napier, ii. p. 373.
<sup>50</sup> Peterkin, i. p. 327.
<sup>52</sup> Peterkin, i. p. 323.
<sup>54</sup> Peterkin, i. pp. 325, 326.
<sup>56</sup> Baillie, ii. p. 58.
<sup>57</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' pp. 206-209.
<sup>58</sup> Baillie, ii. pp. 59, 60, Feb. 18, 1643.
<sup>59</sup> Napier, ii. p. 375.
<sup>61</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' pp. 216, 217.
<sup>62</sup> Napier, ii. p. 380.
<sup>64</sup> Wishart, pp. 31-33, 1893; cf. Baillie, ii. p. 74.
<sup>65</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' pp. 221-224.
<sup>66</sup> Napier, ii. p. 377.
<sup>67</sup> Baillie, ii. p. 74.
<sup>69</sup> Gardiner, 'Great Civil War,' i. p. 178 (1893).
<sup>70</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' pp. 238-240; Gardiner, i. pp. 229, 230.
<sup>71</sup> Baillie, ii. p. 90.
<sup>73</sup> Baillie, ii. p. 104.
<sup>75</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' p. 241.
<sup>77</sup> Wishart, p. 38, note 4.
<sup>79</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 388, 389.
<sup>81</sup> Turner, pp. 31-33.
<sup>82</sup> Sanford Terry, 'Life of Alexander Leslie,' pp. 176-207.
<sup>83</sup> Napier, ii. p. 407.
<sup>85</sup> Baillie, ii. p. 144.
<sup>87</sup> 'Britane's Distemper,' pp. 55, 56.
<sup>88</sup> Sanford Terry, p. 259. Note on David Buchanan's pamphlet.
- <sup>41</sup> Gardiner, x. p. 26, note 2.
<sup>44</sup> Balfour, iii. pp. 164, 165.
<sup>48</sup> Napier, ii. p. 374.
<sup>51</sup> Peterkin, i. p. 354.
<sup>53</sup> Baillie, ii. pp. 47, 48.
<sup>55</sup> Baillie, ii. p. 53.
<sup>60</sup> Wishart, p. 26.
<sup>63</sup> Guthry, pp. 129, 130.
<sup>68</sup> Spalding, ii. p. 253.
<sup>72</sup> Baillie, ii. p. 100.
<sup>74</sup> Baillie, ii. pp. 115, 120.
<sup>76</sup> Wishart, p. 35.
<sup>78</sup> Wishart, p. 39.
<sup>80</sup> Turner, pp. 20, 21.
<sup>84</sup> Baillie, ii. p. 134.
<sup>86</sup> Baillie, ii. p. 145.

CHAPTER V.

THE YEAR OF MONTROSE.

1644-1645.

THE time was apt for prodigies. Two airy armies, near Banff, were seen to fight upon a hill, clash of arms and sound of guns were heard; the neighbouring people concealed their property. The minister and other persons of Ellon, in Buchan, saw, at midnight, the sun shine clear as at mid-day, the sun of Montrose! At Rethine, in church about the time of morning prayer, was heard for several days together music of organs and other instruments, which numbers resorted to hear "with unspeakable transport and never-wearied delight." It was long since the Kirk had silenced church music. When the preacher and people entered the church "the music ceased with a long note," like the last wail of the last oracle from Delphi. As, on the day when Prince Charles landed in Moidart, a gun-shot was heard all over the north, so "a heavy mounted piece of ordnance" rang in the ears of the kingdom when young Colkitto landed in the west, bringing home again the Macdonalds driven to Ireland by Argyll a generation ago,—unluckily, with their wives and children. So writes Patrick Gordon.<sup>1</sup>

Montrose, after Marston Moor, had returned to Carlisle, sending Ogilvy, who was captured, as we saw, with despatches to the king. Then the great marquis vanished from the eyes of men. Disguised as a groom of Colonel Sibbald, he rode alone with that gentleman and with Sir William Rollock across the guarded Border. He was recognised, and loyally saluted, by a Scot who had been in Newcastle's army. The man kept the secret. Riding hard for four days, Montrose reached Tullybelton, a house of his cousin, Patrick Graham of Inchbrakie, near the Tay, between Perth and Dunkeld. "It may be thought that God Almighty sent his Angel to lead the way, for he went as if a cloud had invironed him through all his enemies," says Patrick Gordon. Sibbald and Rollock he despatched to Napier and the rest of his near kin. They returned "corby messengers," with tidings of the triumph of Argyll, and the flight of Huntly, "without a stroke stricken"; evil news for the solitary leader lurking in cots and among the forests. "As he was one day in Methven wood" (where Bruce suffered his first defeat), "he became transported with sadness," and besought the Divine Majesty to make him an instrument in the cause of the king. "Lifting up his eyes he beheld a man coming the way to St Johnstoun with a fiery cross in his hand, and hastily stepping towards him, asked him what the matter meant?"

It meant that Alastair Macdonald, son of left-handed, or ambidexter, Col, and called Young Colkitto,* was marching into Atholl from the north, and that the Covenant was raising the country to encounter him. Colkitto was a man of great courage; indeed the Macdonalds attribute to him the triumphs of Montrose. Sir James Turner says that "though stout enough, he was no soldier," and that he was addicted to strong waters. He was of gigantic strength, and, in Ireland, had so impressed Leven that he sent the chief over to be reconciled to Argyll, who held his father and two brothers in prison, and had seized their lands. Argyll slighted Colkitto, who returned to Ireland bent on revenge, and received from his kinsman, Antrim, the command of 1500, called "Irishes," but probably exiled Macdonalds, M'Leans, and other victims of the Campbells. With letters from the king to Seaforth, chief of the Mackenzies, and to the heads of his own clan, Colkitto then sailed for Argyll, capturing two Covenanting provision ships on the way. He wasted Argyll's country far and wide, mastered two castles, Mingarie and another, and appealed to the M'Leods, M'Neils, and M'Leans, in vain—the fear of Argyll was on them. Meanwhile Colkitto's ships were taken and burned by English vessels of war; his retreat was cut off; he marched through the trackless mountains into Lochaber, and hoped to join hands with Huntly.

Finding that Huntly had fled, he marched on to Seaforth, but the Mackenzies had gone over to the Covenant, and only free passage and victuals were given to Colkitto. Gathering recruits, he set off for the Gordon country, but was faced by the Grants, and the forces of Murray and Ross. With Seaforth behind him, and Argyll gathering on his rear; with the Covenanters of the north-east in front of him, Colkitto was driven to descend the hills into Atholl and the valley of Tay. But there were mustering all Covenanters—Fife, Perthshire, and Angus—at Perth, and never was leader so hard beset as Colkitto: however, encouraged by a letter from Montrose, purposely misdated from Carlisle, he seized the castle of Blair Atholl, which Montrose held all through his year of victory.

* See vol. ii. p. 533, for Old Colkitto. They were of the lively House of Dunyveg in Islay.

A force of Atholl men, Stewarts, and Robertsons, and Murrays, was now watching Colkitto; the two armies were drawn up on two neighbouring hills, and some Badenoch men went to and fro between them, in the interests of peace. Colkitto himself “in a deep contemplation and profound silence, lifts up his eyes to heaven with a short mental prayer.” As he ended his appeal, two men in plaid and kilt approached him; the first was Montrose! * In a moment the hostile Atholl men, arrayed on their hill, saw the air dark with the bonnets that the Macdonalds tossed up, and heard a salute of a thousand muskets. They expected an assault; but the news coming to them that Montrose with the royal commission was here, the thousand of Atholl rushed into the embraces of Colkitto’s twelve hundred, and the marquis raised the standard of the king. It floated over a strange array, many armed with muskets, more with bows and arrows, clubs, rusty skians, and whatever they could pick up: of ammunition there was but one round for each musket. In this all but incredible manner did Montrose find the nucleus of forces which, if they did the king’s cause little good (they came too late), wrought endless scathe to the Covenant.<sup>2</sup>

Surrounded as they were by hostile forces, Colkitto and Montrose aimed first at the Covenanting army in Perth. Avoiding the road down Tay and through Killiecrankie, to be rendered famous by a later Graham, they crossed the hills to Loch Tummel, broke through the opposition of the Menzies clan, forded Tay on August 31, and advanced on Glen Almond. Their Atholl contingent were in touch with a force of reluctant Covenanters, under Lord Kilpont, son of the Earl of Menteith who, as of “too red blood,” had been obliged by Charles to take the title of Airth. Kilpont and Drummond, son of the Earl of Perth, joined Montrose, on sight of his royal commission, with about 500 men. He had now some 3000, Macdonalds, Stewarts, Robertsons, Murrays, Kilpont’s Lowlanders, and broken men of Huntly's out of Badenoch. In Perth, Lord Elcho (eldest son of Lord Wemyss) had 7000 foot and from 700 to 1000 horse, with nine guns, a weapon strange and terrible to Highlanders. Kilpont commanded the artillery of Montrose—bowmen; the marquis led his followers on foot, in Highland costume, with targe, and Dalgetty's "darling weapon," the pike.* He took a strange step, asking Elcho to put off the battle in honour of Sunday, September 1, 1644. "Their answer was, they had made choice of the Lord's day for doing the Lord's work." The preachers had promised success—the Rev. Frederick Carmichael, of Markinch in Fife, is reported to have said, "If ever God spoke certain truth out of my mouth, in His name I promise you to-day a certain victory."<sup>3</sup> It seemed safe inspiration, Montrose being outnumbered by three to one, and having no guns or cavalry; while, if the Covenanters agreed to a Sunday truce, he might retreat in the night.

* Wishart says Montrose was in Highland dress; he may have worn the trews. The separate philabeg had probably not come into use.

The scene was Tippermuir, a wide plain, three miles from Perth. Elcho held the right wing of the Covenant, Sir James Scott the left, Tullibardine the centre; the cavalry, all gentlemen, were on the wings. To avoid being outflanked, Montrose extended his thin and ragged line only three deep. They had orders not to fire till they came to close quarters, and after a volley to charge with swords and the butt: bayonets were not in use. Colkitto held the Royalist centre, Montrose the right, Kilpont the left, for the Macdonalds lacked swords and pikes; with the butt they were to play. The Master of Maderty, sent in by Montrose as an envoy, was taken prisoner—such respect the Covenanters ever showed to the royal commission. Montrose drove in the enemy's skirmishers; in retiring they confused the first Covenanting line, and then, with a yell, the whole force of the Royalists charged, fired into the beards of the foe, seized the guns that did little scathe; met the advance of the Covenanters with swords, pikes, and stones picked up on the field, and drove the untried levies in wild flight. Montrose's men racing against Scott's for a hill, took the position, charged down with the claymore, and cut up their opponents. The Covenanting cavalry made a vain attempt to rally, and though Montrose forbade his men to turn the captured guns on the fugitives, "men might have walked upon the dead corpses to the town," writes the Irish officer, so active was the pursuit. Guns, ammunition, and supplies were the reward of the victors. Some 2000 men are said to have been slain, many were taken prisoners: of the burghers ten "burst with running." The deposition of the provost of Perth (January 31, 1645) puts the prisoners at only three or four hundred. Montrose set guards in the town: the suburbs are said to have been plundered; but he caused to be written "a general protection" for the inhabitants of Perth. The Rev. George Halyburton, minister of Perth, said grace before the dinner of the Malignants.<sup>4</sup>

* Carte's 'Original Letters,' i. p. 73, 1739. The account is "by an Irish officer in Alexander Colkitto's forces," perhaps the brave MacGahan.

The country gentlemen near Perth did not crowd to the royal standard: excommunication and the loss of their estates and lives, if captured, were too obvious dangers. Argyll was following cautiously in Montrose's wake, who (September 4) moved north-east, heading for his own country, and encamped at Collace. Here, on the 6th or 7th, Lord Kilpont was stabbed by one of the gentlemen whom he had led to join Montrose, Stewart of Ardvoirlich near Loch Earn. The murderer escaped, was welcomed by the Covenanters, and became an officer of Argyll. The cause of the crime is uncertain. Wishart says (as matter of report) that Ardvoirlich tried to inveigle Kilpont to assassinate Montrose, and slew him when he refused. A member of the Ardvoirlich family gave Scott the family tradition, that a private quarrel arose, and that the deed was unpremeditated. The official Covenanting version runs that Ardvoirlich was an unwilling recruit; that he spoke to Kilpont of deserting with several of his name; that Kilpont resisting him, was slain, and that the act was "good service."<sup>5</sup> Mr Gardiner says "the favourable reception given by Argyll to the supposed murderer was a sign that all who joined in a Highland Rising might be assassinated with impunity, as far as the Covenanting authorities were concerned."<sup>6</sup> As a further proof, and as additional cause of the ferocity of the war, on September 12 the Committee of Estates put a reward of over £1500 sterling on Montrose's head.<sup>7</sup> We do not hear that Montrose offered any price for the head of Argyll.

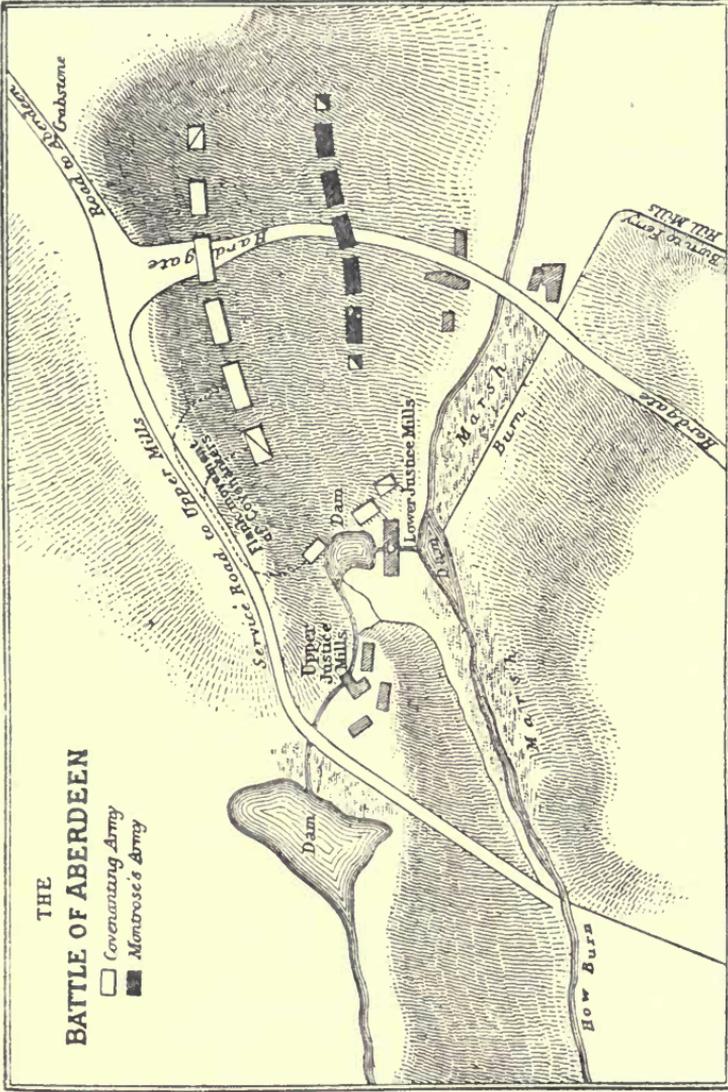

As Montrose, moving north, neared Dundee Law, Lord Airlie, with two of his sons, came in; Lord Ogilvy, the eldest, lay in the Tolbooth prison in Edinburgh: his kindred were truly loyal. They and Nathaniel Gordon brought a handful of forty or fifty mounted gentlemen, but many Highlanders had, as usual, gone home with their loot; and most of Kilpont's force had deserted. The Gordons practically stood neutral in their own country; Huntly was skulking; Lord Gordon was with the Covenanters. The enemy had 2000 foot

THE BATTLE OF ABERDEEN

- Covering Army
- Monrose's Army

Edw. Waller

and 500 horse ; Montrose had, it is said, but 44 horse and 1500 foot. On Friday, September 13, Montrose, still marching north, summoned Aberdeen to yield : "Otherwise, that all old persons, women, and children, do come out and retire themselves ; and that those who stay expect no quarter." A gentleman and a drummer were sent into the town with this message. The provost and baillies, in reply, summed up Montrose's offer thus : that they were invited to surrender, "otherwise no quarter except to old persons, women, and children," which was not exactly in accordance with Montrose's threat.

Why did he, usually humane, threaten at all ? Partly to terrify ; partly, perhaps, by promise of a sack of the town, to encourage his army, much outnumbered by the Covenanters, who were under Burleigh. The murder of Kilpont may also have exasperated him. The magistrates of the good town, behaving like gentlemen, had given Montrose's poor little drummer boy a coin valued at £6 Scots. But as the lad with the flag of truce passed the Covenanted heroes of Fife, one of them shot the little fellow, whether in an excess of piety, or for the sake of the coin, is unknown. This cruelty may have enraged Montrose, whose bearer of a flag of truce at Tippermuir had been captured, and, if unreleased, would probably have shared the fate of Haddo.<sup>8</sup> The Aberdeen magistrates did not send out the women and children, as desired ; confiding, perhaps, in the strength of their position and their superior numbers.

Montrose drew up his little force, and placed his handful of horse on the wings, intermixed with his musketeers for their protection ; for the Covenanters had 500 horse, and 2000 foot to his 1500. The battle, fought on ground now covered by houses and the railway line, cannot be easily understood. Lord Gordon, on the Covenanting side, was not present—the Forbeses and the Crichtons refused to serve under him,—but Lord Lewis Gordon had eighteen horsemen of his own. The Irish of Montrose drove the Covenanters out of some gardens and houses, and repelled a charge of lancers. Mr Gardiner says that Lord Lewis now charged the Royalists on their right wing, with his eighteen horsemen, who did not come to the shock, but fired pistols and retired ; and this does appear to be the meaning of Patrick Gordon. But his discourse is so obscure that we know little except that the Covenanters made a well-conceived turning movement on Montrose's left flank ; then failed to charge, and were routed when Montrose brought two dozen cavaliers with a party of Colkitto's force across from his right to his left ; whereon

Nathaniel Gordon charged at their head and cut to pieces the enemy, who had the tactical superiority. On the right, Montrose's Irish being charged by Sir William Forbes of Craigievar's horse, opened their ranks, and enfiladed their assailants as they galloped through. The Royalist infantry then broke the Covenanting foot, and pursuers and pursued swept into the town in a mass.<sup>9</sup> "The Royalists lost but seven men, the Covenant men a thousand," says Patrick Gordon, —a monstrous exaggeration.

Would that the tale could pause here, but, as was inevitable, the flight being through the town, many were slain in the streets. This could not be prevented, but Spalding, here a good authority, tells us that Montrose at once returned to "the body of his army," while the Irish (who, of course, were "the body of his army,"—Spalding may mean "to his camp") cut down the flying townsmen, and would strip a man before slaying him, "syne kill the man." "Sum women they preissit to defloir" (to "press" to do a thing is to make an attempt in that direction), "and uther sum thay took away perforce to serve thaim in the camp." Thus the women later massacred by the Covenanters at Philiphaugh may have, in part, been Aberdeen lassies, if Spalding speaks true. Women were slain if they were heard to mourn their men, he says, a thing not easily credible.

In spite of all this, Spalding can muster but 115 named, and three anonymous men slain, in the battle, the pursuit, the sack, in the streets, and in the adjacent country; nor does he, when he comes to details, mention a single woman. The Burgh Records are entirely silent as to any cruelties to women, unless they be included in "old and young" slain in the streets. Baillie, then in London, was apt to hear exaggerated reports, but merely says "the town was well plundered."* I find no mention of slain women beyond Spalding's, except in the Diary (really Reminiscences) of Alexander Jaffray, later one of the commissioners to Charles II. at Breda (1650). Jaffray was in the battle, but, like other mounted men, rode away as fast as his horse would carry him. He says, "about seven or eight score men, besides women and children, were killed,"<sup>10</sup> a higher estimate than Spalding's 118, which is minute and probably correct. The contrast between the long and cruel story of Spalding, and the quiet chronicle of the Burgh Records, makes it hard to ascertain the full truth. But as far as the evidence of Spalding goes (and he was a Royalist), Montrose made no attempt to check Colkitto's men, yet Farquharson, one of his officers, befriended the town, says Patrick Gordon. This affair, if Spalding tells truth, must be reckoned the deepest blot on Montrose's character, whether as a soldier or a man; whatever blame may fall on the Covenanting magistrates for not withdrawing women, children, and the aged, and on the Fife man who shot the drummer.

* Cf. Baillie, ii. pp. 234-262.

Aberdeen was a town notoriously attached to the Royalist cause, though at this time under Covenanting magistrates. Montrose, then, in leaving his Irish loose for four days within its walls, did what he himself could not expect his most earnest advocate to palliate, much less to defend. Yet the matter is not commented on at the moment, as far as I can discover, by any writer, which is curious,* and leaves a doubt as to the slaughter of women. Why does Spalding mention none in his list of victims?

After the battle of Aberdeen, Montrose sent Sir William Rollock to Charles at Oxford. Captured on his homeward way, Rollock was released by Argyll on his promise to murder Montrose, says Wishart (cf. Napier, ii. p. 459). Argyll and Lothian, with some 2500 foot and 1200 or 1500 horse, were now pursuing Montrose, and his main object was "to lead them a dance." The Gordons, far from aiding him, were in arms against him, with Lord Gordon and Lord Lewis. The skulker, Huntly, was aggrieved, it seems, by not receiving his royal commission from Montrose.<sup>11</sup> Burying his guns, Montrose moved on the Spey, where he was faced by an overwhelming force of the Grants, Frasers, and other Covenanting clans, while Argyll from Strathbogie ravaged the Huntly country. Montrose worked round to the head of Spey, into Badenoch, where he had a severe illness; thence he moved into Atholl, then through Angus, whence he crossed the Grampians northwards, and again reached Huntly's country, galling Argyll by night onsets. On October 24 he left Strathbogie and seized Fyvie Castle. Argyll had usually been a considerable distance behind his heels, destroying such lands as Montrose had spared. At Fyvie, however, he came, unlooked for, within two miles of Montrose, whose weakened force was destitute of lead for bullets. Here such mounted men as he had recruited among the Gordons deserted, leaving him with but fifty horse. He occupied a hill above Fyvie Castle, but the enclosures on the lower slopes were seized by Argyll's musketeers. An Irish officer, O'Gahan (the name is variously written), scattered these assailants by a charge, and captured their gunpowder.* For bullets Montrose melted down all the pewter plates and vessels in the castle, and after more skirmishing, Argyll withdrew, missing his opportunity: he was not very keen to come to handstrokes.

* Mr Gardiner cites (ii. p. 148), for the atrocities, not only Spalding, but 'Patrick Gordon, 80.' There is not a word about the slaying of women in 'Patrick Gordon, 80,' if his 'Britane's Distemper' be intended; though on p. 161 he gives the Irish a bad character for callous cruelty, lust, and plundering. This is just after he has described (p. 160) the massacre of 300 Irish women, many of them about to be mothers, by the Covenanted troops of Leslie at Philiphaugh. The tender mercies of Monk at Dundee, later, were on a large scale.

Montrose, finding that the Campbell was trying to bribe his men, and that Sibbald and Rollock, the only companions of his first adventure, were treacherous, and had deserted, deceived Argyll by a ruse, and gained the Fiddish at Balveny.† Except the Ogilvies, most of his gentlemen and many of his men now deserted Montrose. He did not despair, but from Badenoch, by a march across the snowy mountains, came down on Atholl. So Argyll retired from Dunkeld to Perth, and threw up his commission, as did Lothian, while Argyll went home to Inveraray. They were succeeded by a professional soldier, General Baillie, released for home service by the recent capture of Newcastle—a great blow to the Royalists in England. We know, from South African experience, the difficulty of dealing with such a man as Montrose. But in Africa our gallant adversaries were well-mounted men; Montrose's levies did their twenty-four miles of mountain march on foot. The Boers had abundant ammunition; Montrose had to use melted pewter pots. Yet he had driven the army of the Covenant out of the country, and Argyll to Inveraray. There Argyll deemed himself safe; the passes into his country were difficult, little known, and obscured by snow. Moreover, he had the sea at his castle door, and galleys ready for flight. Montrose, though he had lost his Lowlanders, was now reinforced by Clanranald, brought in by Colkitto; the Macdonalds had their old grudge against the Campbells, and Montrose determined to winter in the Campbell country.

* Patrick Gordon, however, gives the credit to Donald Farquharson, and his description of the ground, and the failures of Argyll's cavalry charges, seems more authentic than the narrative of Wishart ('Britane's Distemper,' p. 91).

† The evidence as to Rollock is hazardous (Wishart, p. 77).

To Argyll at Inveraray came flying his shepherds from the hills south of Loch Awe, and about its head. Montrose, with Colkitto and all the western clans, had devastated the Menzies, and the Breadalbane Campbells; and while Argyll fled, he ruined the country of that potentate * (December 13, 1644; January 28, 1645).<sup>12</sup> Two hundred men, Montrose said, could have stopped him in a pass, but the Campbells had no leader. Of this pass, Patrick Gordon tells us that it skirted a loch, and was commanded by a castle on an island within pistol shot: the invaders having to march by a path cut in the rock between the castle and the overhanging precipice. Happily, the Macnabs were the local clan, dominated by, and hating the Campbells. At dawn a party of them hailed the castle, asking for a boat, as they carried letters from Argyll. They were ferried across to the castle, mastered it, most of the garrison being in bed, and so gave the command of the pass to Montrose.†

Argyll, meanwhile, cannot have been happy. General Baillie, having his commission as commander-in-chief, would not be at Argyll's orders. "If he lived he should remember it," was an expression of the marquis, as Baillie was informed, "wherein his lordship," quoth Baillie, "indeed hath superabundantly been as good as his word."<sup>13</sup>

Baillie, on January 1645, had to march to Roseneath and leave with Argyll 1100 of the Scots army that had fought in England. These were meant to stiffen the Campbells; quite contrary was the result. From Roseneath Baillie took the rest of his command to Perth.

On Saturday, January 18, 1645, the Estates, then in session, heard from Argyll that "he had got a fall and disjointed his shoulder, but would be well; that the rebels" (Montrose's army) "had fled to Lochaber," and were in Glen Urquhart.‡ Montrose, in fact, was moving from Inveraray north through the countries of friendly Macleans, Appin Stewarts, Camerons, and Campbells, * Montrose had now 3000 men ('Britane's Distemper,' pp. 95, 96).

† 'Britane's Distemper,' pp. 96, 97. The loch was Loch Dochart; the Macnab country ran westward from Killin, at the head of Loch Tay. Inspection of the scene and little island tower does not seem to corroborate Gordon's description.

‡ Balfour, iii. p. 256. This date proves that Wishart's date for the departure of Montrose from Argyll is erroneous. He must have decamped about January 14. Argyll's hurt did not occur on the march to Inverlochry, as Scott says in the 'Legend of Montrose.'

towards the Seaforth region. Behind him followed slowly Argyll, with the Campbells and the Lowland force from England. Baillie, with our old friend Hurry of The Incident, lay in Perth; Aberdeen and Inverness were strongly held for the Covenanters, the Grants and others guarded the Spey. Wherever Montrose met and fought a hostile force, he would have Argyll on his back. He encamped on the site of what is now Fort-Augustus, equidistant almost between the armies of Seaforth and Argyll. Here he held a council, and of the forces hemming him in, "resolved to discuss Argyll's army first," says Patrick Gordon. After the chiefs—Montrose and his young son, Lord Graham, and the rest, with Airlie—had signed a band at Killiewhemen (January 29, 30) they turned on their tracks, and made a two days' march southward, with dramach (oatmeal and water) for their best cheer, and, scaling the central mountains of Lochaber, beheld the northern sides of Ben Nevis.*

It was a march as unexpected as unprecedented, yet Montrose contrived to bring through a handful of horse. But Argyll, little as he expected Montrose to debouch from the skirts of Glen Nevis, was not taken by surprise. Lying at the old castle of Inverlochy, where the Lochy reaches the sea after flowing through a marshy plain, he heard, before he slept, that his outposts had been in touch with Highland patrols. It appears that at once, and in the moonlight, Argyll sought the shelter of his galley (the lymphad of his shield), whence he despatched orders to Sir Duncan Campbell of Auchencbreck, an accomplished and brave soldier who had fought in Ireland, but, says Baillie, "a vicious man."<sup>14</sup> Argyll had now "overtaken the rogues at Inverlochy," as Baillie says, or rather they had come to look for him there. It was about three weeks since Argyll had dislocated his shoulder; but, whether by reason of that accident, or because his chieftains with a preacher, an Edinburgh bailie, and other friends, dissuaded him from rushing into the fray, or because a second-sighted man, Allan M'Coll dubh, had prophesied defeat, Argyll at once placed himself in safety on board ship. † Both

* They marched up the Tarff to the pass of Corrieairack, down the sources of the Spey, crossed into Glen Roy, and so by Roy Bridge and Keppoch to the Spean, and then along the shoulder of Ben Nevis: "the ordinary route would have been down the great valley now traversed by the Caledonian Canal." Wishart, p. 83, note 13.

† Patrick Gordon, p. 100, mentions the second-sighted seer's warning. The author has known a second-sighted M'Coll in Glencoe, a most interesting person. Cf. Guthry, pp. 178, 179; Baillie, ii. p. 263.

armies stood to their arms through the moonlight night.<sup>15</sup> From his galley on the morning of Sunday, February 2, Argyll heard the trumpets of Montrose salute the royal standard in the dawn. The pibroch of the Camerons (who had deserted Argyll) sent out its cry to wolf and eagle, "Come to me and I will give you flesh."

Auchenbreck placed the battalions given by General Baillie to Argyll on the right and left wings; the centre consisted of Campbells and other clans, with two guns, and a strong reserve. In Montrose's force, Colkitto took the place of the Macdonalds since Bannockburn—on the right; O'Gahan commanded the left; the Stewarts of Appin, the MacIans of Glencoe, the Atholl men and Camerons were in the centre; Clanranald and Glengarry led the second line, and the reserve was of "Irishes and other Highlanders." Colkitto and O'Gahan led the Royalist wings, which charged with fury, not firing till they poured their shot "into the beards" of the enemy. The Campbell centre, unsupported, broke, and confused the second line; all the Covenanters fled, and Sir Thomas Ogilvy, with his little squadron, drove the fugitives into the sea, himself receiving a mortal wound. Auchenbreck and fourteen lairds of the name of Campbell were slain, and twenty-two were taken prisoners. Hundreds perished in the flight, others in Inverlochy Castle surrendered. Of these the Lowlanders were spared, the Macdonalds butchered the Campbells with clannish ferocity. The ground being level, offered no chance of resistance after "the break of the battle."<sup>16</sup> Montrose says that he did his best to save life: a few lines in the extant copy of his letter were deleted, "for the honour of some families." Concerning Argyll the letter, as it stands, says nothing.*

* Cf. Napier, ii. pp. 485-488, note. It does not well become civilians to censure the personal courage of men of the sword, as clergymen, like Baillie, Swift, and Burnet, have cast doubt on the valour of Montrose and Marlborough. Possibly the Campbells might have stood at Inverlochy had their chief been among them. But stand they did not, according to what Baillie heard. "All our people overtaken with a panic fear, without any necessity, turned backs and fled," save the gentlemen of the name, who died bravely (Baillie, ii. p. 263). Wishart (pp. 84, 85) gives the same account. Gordon says that the Campbell centre, the wings being broken, fell back on their second line, "who, instead of opening their ranks to receive them, and give the enemies a new charge . . . breaks their order and flies confusedly" ('Britane's Distemper,' p. 101). The Covenanters "drew up in line with alacrity," at first, says Wishart, "for as the prisoners afterwards admitted, they thought that Montrose was not present," till

In his despatch Montrose held out the fairest hopes for the summer, and deprecated concessions (the attempted Treaty of Uxbridge). "I have too much reason to know that they will not rest satisfied with less than making your Majesty a king of straw." He trusted soon to lay an obedient Scotland at the king's feet: "Come thou thyself, lest this country be called by my name." Among the many charming qualities which make Montrose the most sympathetic character in the history of Scotland, his undying youth of nature is not the least amiable. His "whimsies," the Blue Ribbon; the wisps of oats in the bonnets of his men; the trumpets that among the mountains salute the standard of the king, are marks of the high boyish spirit that does great things gallantly, and with an air. As boyish was his hope of recovering Scotland, that "dour" country, whose historians, to this day, drop their disparagements on Montrose as the sullen drippings from a cottage thatch, in time of thaw, descend and stain the whiteness of the snow.

Montrose was victorious; the great Whig clan was put out of action; but Newcastle was lost to the king, his diplomacy had failed, his finances were ruined, the new model of the Army of the Saints had arisen, and was not to spare nor to dally, but to strike at the king, and strike hard. The star of Cromwell was in the ascendant; and here Montrose was prophesying a royal triumph! He should have known better the fickle futility of the Seaforths, Huntly, the Homes, Roxburghs, and Traquairs—these were not Ogilvies or Napiers. And yet there were elements of hope in the situation, though it was hope deferred. Briefly, the campaign of Montrose, by calling Leven with his army to the Cumberland border, for the purpose of preventing the king from joining the marquis in Scotland, increased the growing hatred between Scots and English; for the English Parliament desired the services of Leven's army in the they heard his trumpets, "a sound of terror." They also knew that, while Montrose was present, their chief was absent—had retired on the previous night. This knowledge cannot have been reassuring. It was Argyll's presence, not his good sword (which his accident prevented him from wielding), that was needed. Patrick Gordon, disdaining to suspect Argyll's honour, tells his story of the prophecy, of the pressure put on Argyll to retire, and "he, it is to be thought, with great difficulty yielded to their request." This is the view taken by Scott. When every one combines to assure a man that a life so valuable as his ought not to be risked, above all when he is incapable of self-defence, he is apt to be persuaded.

south and west. In religion and in politics, the interests of the brethren south and north of Tweed were dividing, and a war—of Scotland for the king, and England against him—was inevitably approaching. The beginnings of religious and political discord between the two countries went hand in hand. The Scottish aid to England had been of the nature of a religious crusade against what the Estates, met in July 1644, called “the popish and malignant party.”<sup>17</sup> Some enthusiasts, like Lord Maitland (later Lauderdale), hoped to establish the sacred standard of Presbyterianism not only in England but on the Continent.

Things did not take that course. On January 23, 1645, the General Assembly at Edinburgh welcomed the Rev. Mr Baillie, bringing a letter from Loudoun, Maitland, Henderson, and Samuel Rutherford at Westminster. They regretted that their country had been invaded by “the basest of the children of men,” the Irish Macdonalds. But they sent “the Directory of Public Worship, concluded,” at last, and Presbyterian, “in both Houses of Parliament, and the principal Propositions of Church Government passed in the Assembly, all of them according to the Solemn League and Covenant.” They begged that there might be no quarrelling over slight divergencies in absolute uniformity,<sup>18</sup> The English divines sent a similar letter. The Assembly presently petitioned the Estates to punish such allies of Montrose and the king as might be come at; among whom were in prison the Earl of Crawford, Lord Ogilvy, and Wishart, the historian of Montrose. Others were Nathaniel Gordon, Sir Robert Spottiswoode, and Will Murray.<sup>19</sup> The nobles were forfeited; Montrose lay under excommunication; Carnwath was to be murdered if an assassin could be found,—“whosoever shall kill him is declared to have done good service to his country.”<sup>20</sup> It was not so easy to execute Crawford and Ogilvy, as Montrose might retaliate,<sup>21</sup> and even the Estates found “some harsh expressions” in a manifesto of the preachers, and “entreated the Assembly to amend the same.”<sup>22</sup>

“The Humble Petition of the General Assembly” may, perhaps, be defended as a mere request that men like Ogilvy, Spottiswoode, and Wishart should not be kept untried in prison,—and such a prison, where rats gnawed Wishart, and left indelible marks of their teeth. But the words of the clerical petitioners are, “May it therefore please your Lordships, in the zeal of the Lord, to proceed with some speedy course of justice against such persons as are known to have joined themselves either actually in arms, or by their counsels, supplies, encouragements, have strengthened the hands of the" (usual adjective) "enemies, whereby a cause of the controversy shall be removed, the land cleansed of the blood that is shed therein," and so forth. It does not appear that any chance of acquittal and release is contemplated; blood is to be "cleansed" by the blood of prisoners: "the zeal of the Lord" means zeal even unto slaying: the "controversy" is between the Eternal and his people, who have been sparing the Amalekites, unlike Samuel. In short, it does not seem as if any quibbling could clear the ministers from the charge of blood-thirst.

So far (except that the prisoners were not then slain) Kirk and State (the State of the Covenanters) had worked together without friction, but the ancient feud between the prophets and the secular rulers, Covenanted as they now were, was but sleeping. The Assembly sent a stiff exposure of his crimes to the king. He had permitted the mass in his own family (his wife being a Catholic), and had authorised The Book of Sports, enjoining the public to play games after church, on Sundays. In consequence of such sins, the Kirk would hold herself guiltless of "the sad consequences which may follow."<sup>23</sup> During this Parliament, Lauderdale died—Lord Maitland is henceforth Lauderdale; Lanark took part in the proceedings against his king, and Traquair was heavily fined. Argyll, who arrived ten days after Inverlochy, with his arm still in a sling, "as if he had been at bones-breaking" says Guthry, was thanked for his military conduct, and "intreated to continue in so laudable a course." He continued. Balmerino actually announced that Argyll had lost but thirty men at Inverlochy! "The contrary being certainly known, many thought strange that he, who was a nobleman, could speak so in a public audience."<sup>24</sup>

In England, the new model army of Cromwell and his fighting sectaries, who hated the Scots and their religion, or rather its imposition on England, was constituted (February 15, 1645). In March, Leven, now at Carlisle, would not move south to help the English, the danger at home was too pressing, and probably Charles then really thought of attempting a junction with Montrose.* Leven had been weakened, as we know, by detaching forces, under Hurry and Baillie, against Montrose; matters grew hot between him and the English in the end of May, and, at Carlisle, which he was fortifying, Leven told his English colonel that, if he would not yield to him a fort at Carlisle, "I desire no better occasion to cut you all in pieces."<sup>25</sup> Leven was to have another and much better "occasion," but he was no Montrose,—rather, according to Turner, was now verging on the imbecile. However, on June 14, the crushing defeat of Charles by Cromwell at Naseby relieved Leven from all anxiety about the king's junction in Scotland with Montrose.

* So Guthry, p. 186. Small, a messenger to Montrose from the king, with letters, was caught, disguised as a beggar, and hanged, May 1, 1645.

We left the great marquis at Inverlochy, on February 2. By February 14, thanks to the unparalleled mobility of his infantry, he had occupied Elgin. He was presently joined by Lord Gordon and Lord Lewis Gordon, who broke loose from Argyll, and by the shifty Seaforth. But, though Lord Gordon brought in a few horsemen, the Gordons at large did not yet rise, and the county people were all Covenanters. Now died Montrose's eldest son, Lord Graham, outworn by war; and at Aberdeen the gallant Farquharson, who fought so well at Fyvie, and "had been a great friend to the town at the late battle foughten there," was murdered by Hurry's Covenanters in the street.<sup>26</sup> Hurry, too, who was in the ranks of the Covenant, descending on the town of Montrose, seized the marquis's second son, James, now Lord Graham, and the boy, aged fourteen, was imprisoned in Edinburgh Castle. Eight hundred foot were at this juncture detached by Montrose to convey old Lord Airlie, in bad health, to Strathbogie. Montrose wasted the lands of the Earl Marischal, and of others who refused to come in to the king's standard. He held Hurry and Baillie at bay by a series of rapid marches, though Hurry had 700 horse to his 300. Baillie, after refusing battle, retired towards Fife. Montrose's own army was outworn; many went home, Lord Lewis Gordon gave perpetual trouble, and, his force melting away, Montrose could not move from Dunkeld on the Lowlands.*

Montrose, badly or treacherously informed by his scouts, now supposed that the enemy had crossed Tay, and were watching the fords of Forth. Sending part of his shrunken army to Brechin, he, with Lord Gordon, perhaps with Lord Lewis, and with 600 men and 200 horse, made a swoop on Dundee, which Baillie learned from his spies, and so followed at speed. The town had raised volunteers for defence, which provoked an armed mutiny among the "maltmen," on whom the burden of their quartering fell. Repairs to the walls and ditch were also in progress. Montrose arrived, and summoned the town by a messenger, who was caught, and later was hanged. Such injudicious measures were usually taken against the holder of the royal commission, and were apt, as the town of Dundee now learned, to lead to unpleasantness. The town was then a parallelogram; two streets from the east and two from the west converged on the church and market-place. Within the walls, at the north-west corner, was Corbie Hill or Windmill Brae, with its guns. From this eminence, not from Dundee Law, Montrose must have watched events after breaking in at the unrepaired part of the wall, and seizing the artillery, which commanded the West Gait and Nether Gait "ports."* "A great part of the buildings of the town and much corn and moveables were burned," so the burghers reported.†

* Wishart makes Lord Lewis the very soul of mischief, and the cause of the desertion of the Gordons. Patrick Gordon defends him (Wishart, p. 91; 'Britane's Distemper,' pp. 115, 116; Gardiner, ii. p. 218).

Now came scouts to Montrose with warning of Baillie's approach, with 3000 men, and of Hurry's, with 800 horse. Montrose's men had more or less been drinking, after a march of twenty miles. Some advised Montrose to fly, and seek his own safety, a reward being set on his head. Others desired to fight and die with honour. Montrose did neither. He called off the spoilers, "a feat beyond the power of any other commander in Europe," says Mr Gardiner; he used his 150 horse as a rearguard, accompanied by his best marksmen, and sent the rest of his force ahead. They cannot have been drunk, for they marched all night, while Baillie's pursuing cavalry were driven back by musketry fire. Montrose's natural course was to take to the Grampian hills, but he knew Baillie too well to suppose that he would leave the passes unguarded; so, calling a brief halt near Arbroath at midnight, he doubled back to the south-west. Baillie failed to drive him to the sea, he slipped past the Covenanters under cloud of night, and, in the dawn of April 5, reached Careston Castle on the South Esk. Baillie came up when but three miles severed the Royalists from the unguarded hills, but Montrose's men were so outwearied after sixty miles' march, a fight, and a feast, that they could scarcely be roused from sleep by the sword points of their officers. Roused they were, however, and reached ground where Hurry's horse could not follow them.<sup>27</sup> Says Wishart, "I have often heard officers of experience and distinction, not in Britain only but in France and Germany, prefer this march of Montrose to his most famous victories." As we hear of no carnage or outrages on women in Dundee, historians are obliged to lament the lack of a chronicler like Spalding,<sup>28</sup> who, in fact, merely mentions the burning of some houses.

* Wishart, p. 92, note. Maxwell's 'Old Dundee,' ii. pp. 491-495.

† Act. Parl. Scot., vi., i. p. 519. Mr Lamb's "Dundee" (1895) is a portentous tome, paged in the wildest manner, and it baffles scrutiny.

It is usual for modern Scottish historians to write as if Montrose encountered no regular troops, "had not been face to face with any commander who was a trained soldier," says Mr Hill Burton, who persistently belittles the great marquis. Mr Hill Burton, admitting that Baillie was "a trained commander," says nothing about Montrose's extraordinary retreat, admired by continental experts and duly appreciated by Mr Gardiner. The "trained commander," and the "thousand trained soldiers belonging to the army of the Covenant" (Mr Hill Burton admits their presence), found no grace at Montrose's face. But Presbyterian hatred bequeathed by tradition still influences Scottish historians, even as regards the military qualities of the marquis. Baillie had four regiments of infantry, and two of horse, with Loudoun's and Lothian's regiments of foot, "besides other great forces coming, as 1500 red coats out of Ireland, and some other regiments, yet were but 600 red coats."<sup>29</sup> Meanwhile, what the black coats could do against Montrose, they did. Easter day in Aberdeen was kept as a fast "to his intention." "No meat durst be made ready: searchers sought the town's houses and kitchens for the same."<sup>30</sup>

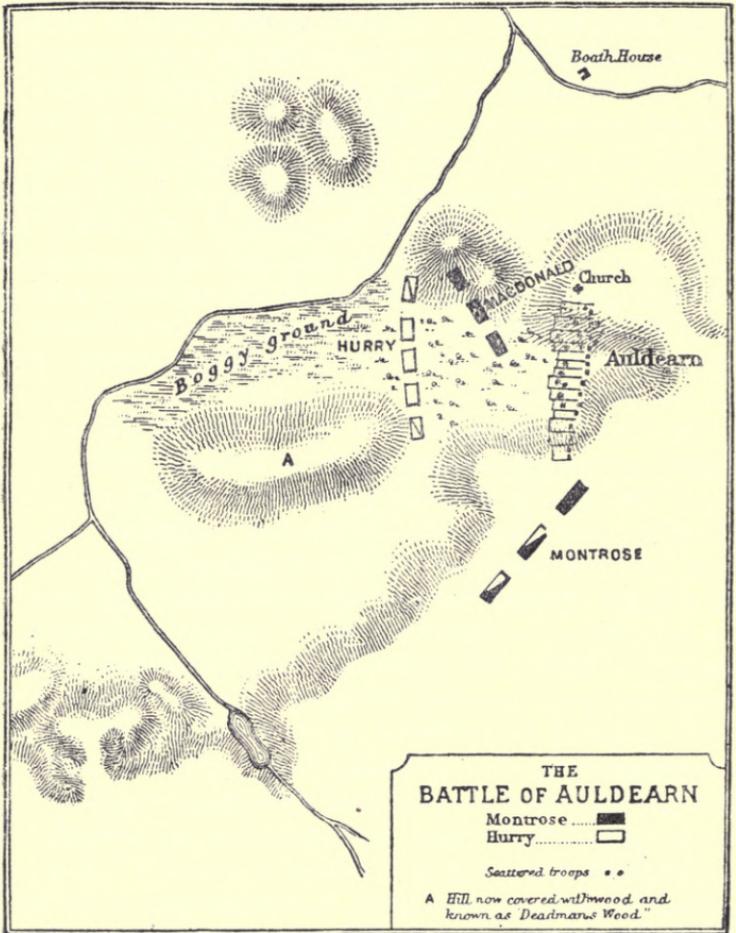

The next manoeuvre in the attempt to surround Montrose was a combination of Hurry, with 1200 foot and 160 horse, and the Covenanting levies of Seaforth, with Marischal, Sutherland, the Forbeses and Frasers. While Lord Gordon was raising his clan, and equipping 200 gentlemen of his name as cavalry, Colkitto and Inchbrakie recruited in the Macdonald, Cameron, and Stewart glens, and in Atholl. Hurry moved to watch Lord Gordon, Montrose, with about 600 men, visited Baillie's neighbourhood near Perth. He drew Baillie out, in four times his own numbers, covered his men's retreat with half a squadron of horse, moved up the Earn to Lochearnhead, and probably did no good to the lands of Ardvoirlich, murderer of Lord Kilpont. Marching from Lochearnhead to the braes of Balquidder, he picked up some recruits of the nameless clan, and met Lord Aboyne. This heroic youth worthy of the name of Gordon, had been fighting in England. Besieged in Carlisle, he cut his way through the Covenanting lines at night, with sixteen horse, dislocated his shoulder and injured his collar-bone by a fall, rode some sixty miles through hostile country before his hurt was attended to, and proved to Argyll that a dislocated shoulder need not incapacitate a resolute man.<sup>31</sup> At Loch Katrine Montrose heard of Hurry's march against Lord Gordon: he was occupying Aberdeen, where Lothian's regiment mutinied for clothes and pay. These, with Lady Hurry, arrived in a ship, and, on April 19, Hurry marched out of Aberdeen, having vainly tried to raise dragoons in the country.<sup>32</sup> Reaching the Dee on his northward march, Montrose was joined, at Aboyne, by Lord Gordon and his friends, the Master of Napier, and young Stirling of Keir, Colkitto also effecting his junction. Gordon had 1000 foot and 200 horse; Montrose had never been in such strength, and he went to discuss Hurry.

That able commander lured him on by Elgin and Forres, fighting rearguard actions, and drawing Montrose through a hostile country, towards the mass of the Covenanters under Sutherland, Seaforth, and others, near Inverness. Destitute of intelligence, Montrose halted nine miles from Inverness at Auldearn.* The night was very wet, and Montrose's patrols sought shelter (as the preachers' sons and other amateur officers did on the eve of Dunbar), not knowing that Hurry was rapidly marching back against them, with the whole army of northern Covenanters (May 8). Patrick Gordon blames Montrose for inefficient scouting, and indeed this great master of surprises, when in hostile country, with men outworn by scarcely credible marches, was himself apt to be surprised. Wishart, however, says that Montrose, hearing of the approach of Baillie from the south, "was now very anxious to retire." Wishart omits Gordon's story, that Hurry's army, in their morning march back to surprise the marquis, discharged their pieces, damped by the rain, and so gave Montrose the alarm, the sound being carried away from the sea by a providential shifting of the wind. Again Wishart makes Montrose deliberately choose an excellent position; while, according to Gordon, he had to make his dispositions hurriedly, his troops being half asleep when Hurry came into touch with them.

* Really Altdearn, which must surely mean "Burn of Dearn," not "High Dearn," as the editors of Wishart say, p. 98, note 2.

Following the plan of Mr Gardiner, who carefully examined the ground, we see the village street of Auldearn running due south from the church; Hurry advances by a road at right angles to the street. On the north (and right wing of Montrose), Colkitto's men were drawn up on hilly and broken ground, at a slant from north-east to south-west, covering the church, and the upper part of the village street, and protected, on their right, by the hill and bushy cover; on their left, by the walls of the gardens behind the houses of the villagers. Then came a gap: Montrose had no centre, but a few musketeers, as tirailleurs, were placed where his centre should have been, between Hurry's left and the cottages of the lower part of the street. South of the street, Montrose's left wing, with Gordon's horse, stretched from north-east to south-west, the horse outflanking those on Hurry's right wing. Behind Hurry's line was a hill now called the Dead Man's Wood. To Colkitto's wing Montrose entrusted the royal standard; this naturally was Hurry's point of attack; here the head of Montrose, and the price set upon it, might be won, for he would be with the standard of the king. Meanwhile Montrose's own command, the left, was hidden by the southward slope of a hill from the advancing Covenanters, their "trained commander" not suspecting its existence. It appears that Patrick Gordon is wrong when he places Lord Gordon's horse on the right of Colkitto, Aboyne's on the left of Montrose: all the horse were on Montrose's own left. On Colkitto's right, it is clear that the steep hill and broken and enclosed ground would have made the use of cavalry impracticable.<sup>33</sup> Montrose's dispositions, with no horse on his right, with no centre, but with the gap masked, and with his left concealed, like the Duke's infantry at Waterloo, by a dip of the ground, were as successful as they were unusual.

The brunt of the battle fell on Colkitto, who was charged by relays of foot and cavalry, the latter probably firing their pistols in the old style, and not pressing home, which the ground did not permit. Colkitto was driven back to the walls of the village gardens, where he delivered a hot fire, and attempted a charge, but the boggy ground threw his line into confusion. Now he was charged again by two regiments of foot and one of horse, whose supports came up and seconded them. His men gave ground, but not in disarray, while he, in the front, took several pikes in his targe, and cut them through with one sweep of his claymore. The enemy dared not come within the swing of his weapon, nor could the cavalry reach him; but his force was almost surrounded. "Let us die bravely," he whispered to those near him. A galloper brought the news of Colkitto's plight to Montrose, who called on the gay Gordons to mount the slope which hid them and charge. They topped the slope, they swept through Hurry's horse on his left, taking several colours, and slaying as they drove the Covenanters. "Now," said Colkitto, "those are indeed the valiant Gordons, and worthy of that name which Fame hath carried abroad of them." They fought as they fought at Glenrinn's fight; and Hurry's horse fled as had fled the footmen of Argyll. Montrose now led his infantry against the flank of Hurry's foot soldiers, confronted as they were by Colkitto, and in broken ground. Aboyne also charged with his horse; Colkitto again advanced; the Royalists, with yells of "Remember Donald Farquharson and James of Rynie!" (murdered by the Covenanters) broke clean through the Lowland ranks, and the murder was grim and great. Sutherland, Seaforth, and young Innes, being well mounted, easily escaped; Hurry did not attempt a charge with the two hundred horse of his reserve, a match in numbers for all Montrose's cavalry, but fled with them to Inverness.

"Montrose had shown himself master of cavalry tactics. . . . In whatever form the enemy attacked him, whatever might be the varying components of his own army, he was always ready to take advantage of the weakness of the one, and of the strength of the other," says Mr Gardiner. With the thousand horse which Rupert would not spare, what might not Montrose have done!

Si Pergama dextra!

But all was in vain. The successes of Montrose, we have seen, drew Leven back to the English border; this withdrawal bred bad feeling between England and Scotland; Leven's men received scorn instead of pay, and plundered for their living. Montrose had driven the wedge into the Anglo-Scottish Covenanting alliance, whence were to follow great results, but not now. For Montrose could not be everywhere, and, on June 14, the rashness of Rupert, the irresolution of Charles, with the superior skill and superior numbers of Cromwell, dealt to the royal cause the deadly blow at Naseby. Cromwell then, to the letter-writing Baillie's horror, "desired the House of Commons to come out expressly with their much-desired freedom of conscience." Never now would the Blue Banner of State Presbyterianism be set up south of Tweed. That cause was lost. Toleration was in, and Presbytery was out. But, says Baillie, "If we settle affairs here, Montrose will melt like a snail."<sup>34</sup> So it must inevitably be when affairs were settled in England. Montrose's army, thanks to the jealousy of Huntly and the habits of the Highlanders, did "melt like a snail" after every victory, and the marquis had again to bring together a new army. After Auldearn he did not occupy Inverness, where he would have found supplies, and caused a great loss of such a source to the Covenant. He halted at Elgin, where his wounded were cared for, and made arrangements for his invalids and prisoners at his central base, the castle of Blair Atholl.

His Napier friends—even the old Lord, a man of seventy, even the ladies of the family, and Napier's brother John—were being fined, imprisoned, and examined. But at Blair, Montrose held the brother of Campbell of Crinan, and hinted that if John Napier were executed "in a seeming legal way," the Campbells might expect reprisals. Montrose, none the less, never made reprisals on his prisoners, though urged so to do. At present he secured an exchange of prisoners with Argyll; at the same time he bade his lieutenant at Blair punish the excesses of Irish deserters.<sup>35</sup> He hoped, vainly, for good news from the English border, and intended to come down on his old college friend, Lord Lindsay, who, having usurped the title of Crawford, was now taking command in the south. (We continue to call him Lindsay.) General Baillie, with Lindsay's, Cassilis's, and Lauderdale's regiments, joined by Hurry with the remnant of his horse that fled at Auldearn, now marched towards Strathbogie, but found that Montrose, having left Elgin, was there before them. The armies faced each other all day; through the night Montrose moved to Balveny. Baillie followed; again he was outmarched and outmanœuvred; he found the foe in a strong position fortified by a river and rocks, and drawing supplies from Ruthven in Badenoch. Here his "red coats" and two other seasoned regiments let Baillie know that they regarded Montrose's commission and cause as at least as good as that of the Covenant; so Patrick Gordon says. His narrative is closely parallel here to Baillie's own vindication of his conduct, but Baillie avers that he now decamped to Inverness in search of supplies, not on account of a mutiny. The truth probably is that his hungry men were also angry men and spoke their minds.*

* 'Britane's Distemper,' p. 128; Baillie, ii. p. 418. It is possible that Gordon and Baillie do not refer to the same occasion.

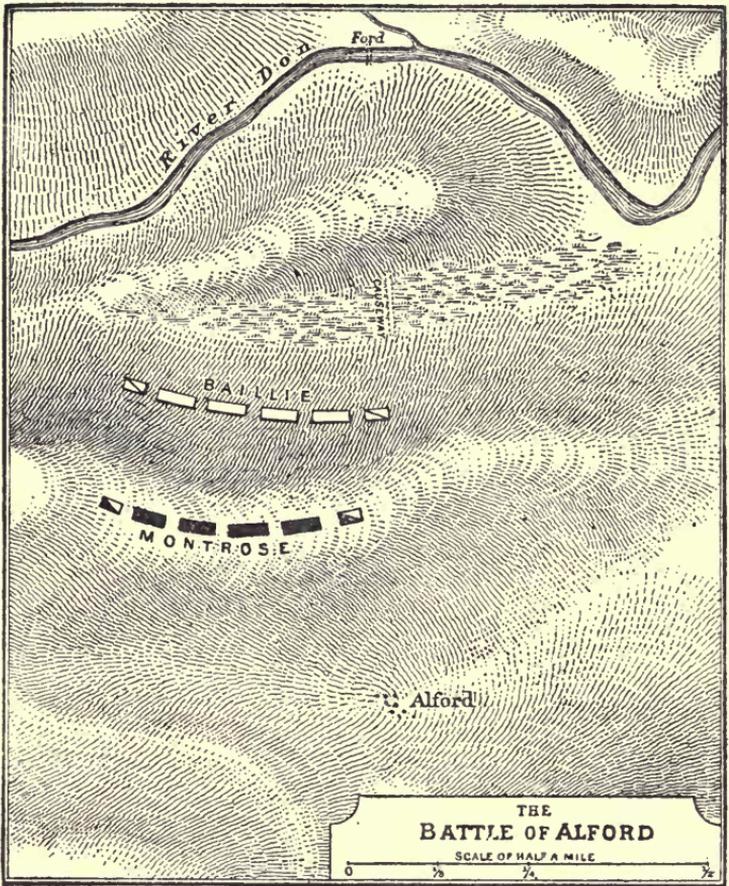

CAMPAIGN OF ALFORD

Montrose now marched south to deal with Lindsay, whom he would have caught at Newtyle, in Angus, but for some reason most of the Gordons went home, and Montrose had to wait—Aboyne being absent on sick leave—till the trusty eldest son of Huntly, Lord Gordon, could again call in his retainers. Throughout Huntly was obscurely making mischief; Lewis Gordon was a mere freakish featherhead, Aboyne was inconstant, only Lord Gordon was as true as steel; and Montrose often could not muster, in all, the full strength of a regiment. He had to leave Lindsay, who would have been a mere mouthful to him if in force, and to follow Nathaniel and Lord Gordon north, in search of the clan. They concentrated at the head of Strathdon, but Colkitto went west to bring in the Celts.

At this juncture Baillie was thwarted by the War Office of the period, the amateur strategists of the Committee of Estates. Censured for slackness, he wished to send in his papers. He met Lindsay and Marischal at Drum, on the Dee, and learned that Argyll was to take command and "pursue the rebels." Argyll would take over Hume's regiment, from Ireland (the Red Coats?) a force of 1200, with Crawford's and Lauderdale's, and a hundred of Balcarres's horse, raising also his own clan. In exchange Baillie was only to receive Cassilis's 400 infantry, and was reduced, he says, to 1300 foot and 260 horse. But "The Marquess of Argyll refused the employment; his reasons I know not," says honest Baillie. Taking the forces which Argyll declined to lead, Lindsay merely wasted Atholl, which Baillie had already done.<sup>36</sup> Montrose now marched south, crossed the Don, and paused at Alford. Baillie must fight or leave the low country open to the marquis. Colkitto was still absent in the west, recruiting, and probably the forces on either side were about equal in numbers. It also seems possible that Lindsay had gone into Atholl to watch Colkitto, otherwise his movement thither, which he certainly made, was sheer folly; Blair Castle he could not hope to take. At Keith, Montrose challenged Baillie to fight in the open, but the old campaigner was not James IV. At Alford, concealing part of his force as at Auldearn, he lured Baillie across the Don.

"In front was a steep hill which concealed him from the enemy, so that they could hardly see his front ranks." * Gordon's and Aboyne's handfuls of horse, on the right and left wings, were protected by Irish musketeers, as at Aberdeen. The Master of Napier commanded the reserve, which was quite out of view, the centre was composed of Farquharsons and Badenoch men. Two squadrons of Balcarres's horse and Lord Gordon's horse on Montrose's right, charged each other with resolute fury; Gordon and Balcarres fought with splendid courage, but Balcarres's third squadron refused to support him. The fight was equal, till Nathaniel Gordon bade the musketeers throw down their useless pieces, draw swords, and hamstring the enemy's horses. In a moment the Covenanting cavalry broke; Montrose's infantry, says Baillie, arrayed six deep, charged his line, which was only three deep. The Master of Napier now came on with Montrose's reserve; Baillie's infantry was taken in flank by Aboyne; the rest was slaughter. The boys among Montrose's camp followers mounted the sumpter horses, and charged into the mellay. But Lord Gordon was shot, Napier says, in the act of seizing Baillie by the sword belt. Baillie does not mention this: "our foot stood with myself, and behaved as became them," till the Master of Napier came on. The Covenant lost some 1600; Montrose not a dozen, but Lord Gordon's death meant a yet more wavering support from Huntly's clan. As for Baillie, he complains of the jealousy of Hurry, and of the weakening of his forces. He was exonerated by Parliament, which, driven from Edinburgh by plague, was to meet at Perth.<sup>37</sup> Though Montrose had won another fight, he had lost by Lord Gordon's death more than he had gained. None but Lord Gordon could have led into the southern Lowlands the great clan whose name stands as high as ever for chivalrous courage: as was seen at Dargai and Elandslaagte, as at Harlaw, Glenrinnis, Alford, Auldearn,—and Khartoum.

* Wishart, pp. 108, 109, cf. note 18, where there seems to be some confusion.

The essential condition of success for Montrose's enterprise had ever been that the king should join hands with him from England. But even the efforts of the queen to procure supplies from abroad for her champion had failed.* There had been promises of a regiment of horse from Charles—promises never fulfilled; there had also been an attempt by the Covenanting Lords with Leven's army to come to terms with the king. One of these lords was Callendar, no Covenanter in his heart,—indeed only a strong sense of his own interest probably prevented him from carrying his levies over to the royal side before Montrose's disappointment at Dumfries, in 1644.<sup>38</sup> * Cal. State Papers Scot., 1645. Montrose is scarcely mentioned in this volume of the State Papers, except on these occasions.

Callendar's force contained many officers, especially in Sinclair's regiment, who now, with Lord Sinclair himself, probably desired nothing better than to serve the king. But Charles would not promise to establish Presbyterianism in England (July 21; August 5): all negotiations were shattered on that reef.<sup>39</sup> He would rather (July 28) march north and join Montrose. Even Rupert dissuaded him from so perilous an enterprise; better were peace at almost any price: "I believe it a more prudent way to retain something than to lose all."<sup>40</sup> Desperate, indeed, was the cause when Rupert waxed prudent! Charles replied, "I confess that, speaking as a mere soldier or statesman, I must say there is no probability but of my ruin." He had the alternatives of entire submission—which meant infliction, by him, of Presbyterianism on England, and the desertion of faith and friends; or of fighting on "without expectation of good success more than this, to end my days with honour and a good conscience" (August 3).<sup>41</sup>

No Stuart save Mary ever spoke braver and more constant words: and in this faith Charles chose to live and die. But he could not join hands with Montrose though he made an effort. He reached Doncaster (August 18), but found himself between the army of Poyntz, and the overwhelming cavalry of David Leslie, 4000 horse marching north from Hereford to ruin Montrose. Ere Leslie could arrive Montrose had snatched his final victory.

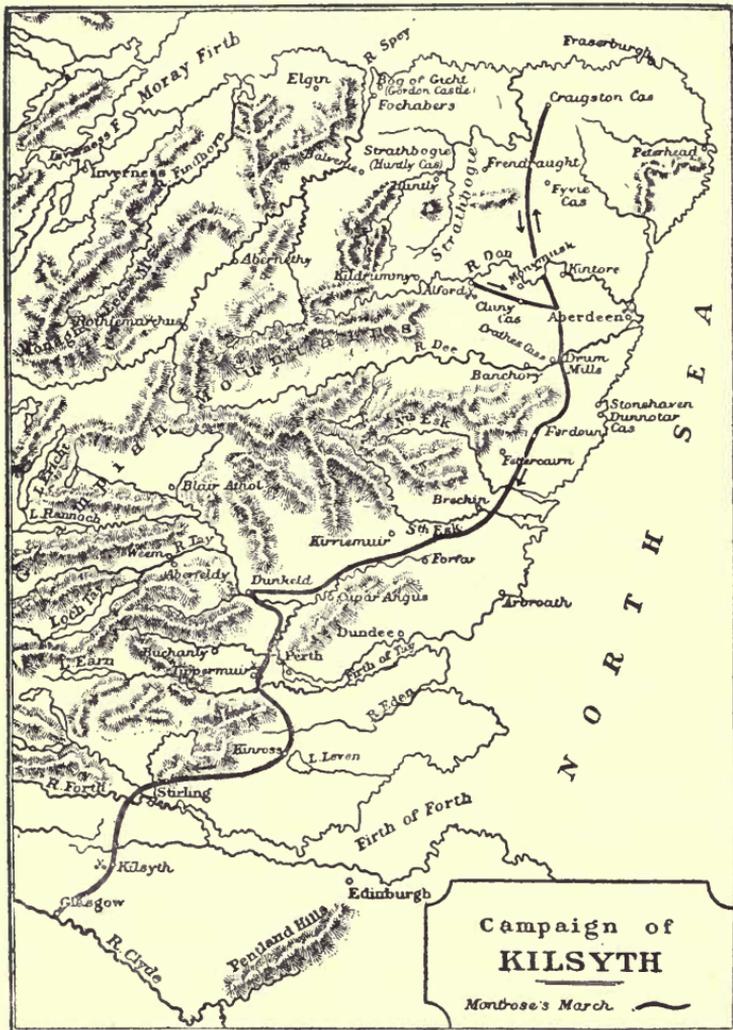

After Alford fight Montrose moved to the Dee: his Highlanders had dispersed as usual, and Aboyne was sent to recruit Huntly's men. Montrose waited at Craigton on Dee,<sup>42</sup> seven miles from Aberdeen. Aboyne was dilatory, and Montrose went south to Fordounkirk, the birthplace of Fordun, the old chronicler. Aboyne, when he came, brought few recruits, and was sent back for more, while the fighting clans—the Atholl men, Colkitto with Clan Gilzean, Clanranald, the Macgregors and the Macnabs (who took Loch Dochart Castle), the Farquharsons, and young Glengarry (Æneas Macdonnell), with Glencoe and Glen Nevis (Macsorlies calling themselves Camerons) were gathered to the standard. The Estates, driven out of Stirling by the plague, met at Perth (July 24). From Stirling they had issued summonses to levy 10,000 foot and 500 horse. They retained Baillie, as a semi-official general, under, or with, a committee of noble but helpless amateurs, such as Argyll.

Though still destitute of cavalry save for a hundred horse, Montrose, not waiting for Aboyne and the old Earl of Airlie (then recruiting among the Ogilvies), descended the Almond, and encamped in the wood of Methven, near Perth. The forces of the Covenant had their headquarters at the Bridge of Earn, where Baillie awaited the regiments summoned from Fife. That focus of godliness, then curiously unfortunate in its military children, sent 3000 men. Montrose alarmed the Estates by approaching Perth with musketeers mounted on baggage horses, to resemble cavalry.<sup>43</sup> The Estates sent out all their forces; they now had good intelligence, and hoped to fight Montrose without Aboyne and Airlie. By an ingenious ruse Montrose retreated safely to the passes, leaving twenty Highland marksmen under cover who emptied the saddles of the foremost Covenanters. The army of the Estates retired to the wood of Methven, and butchered, says Wishart, "the wives of the Irish and Highlanders, who followed the camp for love of their husbands."<sup>44</sup> We must ever remember that some modern Presbyterian writers disbelieve that the women were "wives,"—which makes a great difference. Meanwhile, at Little Dunkeld, south of Tay, Montrose welcomed Aboyne with 400, and Airlie with 60 horse, gentlemen as a rule. Patrick Gordon dwells on the superiority of Montrose's material to that of the Lowland levies; the southern peasantry being "by continual custom, born slaves and bondmen, their ordinary food pease and beans"; "pease-bannocks," indeed, were a staple on the Border even in the nineteenth century. The Highlanders lived on oats and barley, fish and game.<sup>45</sup> Sir James Turner, however, speaks very highly of the west Lowland fighting material, hardy soldier-like men, whom, as their prisoner, he observed in the Pentland Rising of 1666.

Having now the strongest force that he ever led, Montrose wished to attack before the Fife levies could join the Estates from the east, and the Hamiltons, under Lanark, arrive from the west. He marched to Kinross, burning Castle Campbell, as Argyll had just burned the House of Menstrie, the seat of the late poet secretary, the Earl of Stirling.*

* Guthry, p. 193. Argyll denied this act at his trial, in 1661 (State Trials, v. 1395), but he also denied burning the House of Forthar, which was done by his own order, as a letter of his, already cited, proves. Moreover, General Baillie says, as to the military committee of which Argyll was a member, "Did they not, in that capacity . . . sometimes such acts of hostility as I, without a special warrant from the Estates (though I had been in charge by commission), could not now have answered but at the rate of my head. . . ." (Baillie, ii. p. 424). Both parties were wasting and burning as usual.

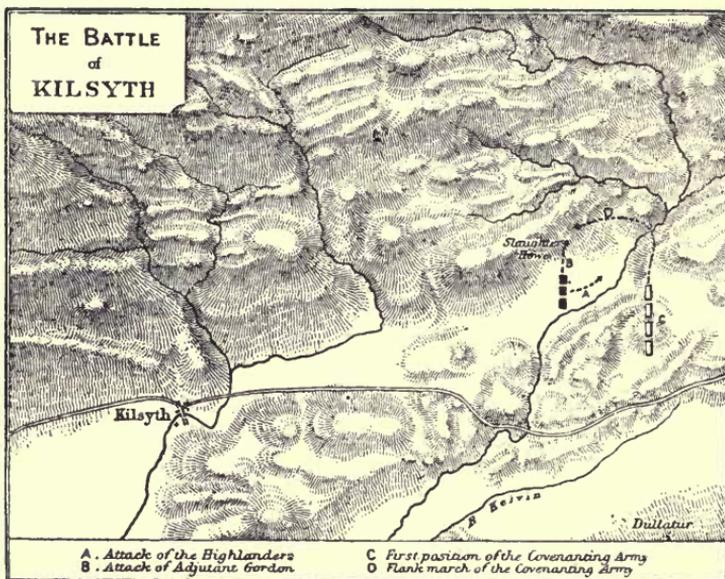

In some perilous scouting, by Nathaniel Gordon, prisoners were taken, and it was learned that "the kail-eaters of Fife" had almost mutinied, declining to cross Forth, but were still lured on by their preachers, "who told them jolly tales" of the approach of Lanark's contingent.<sup>46</sup> Montrose crossed Forth by a ford four miles above Stirling, and encamped at Kilsyth, half-way to Glasgow. The enemy next day crossed Forth by Stirling Bridge, the castle being held for the Covenant. They camped (after the interview between Baillie and the committee presently to be described), within three miles from Kilsyth, while Lanark, with 2000 foot and 500 horse, and Cassilis, Eglintoun, and Glencairn from Ayrshire were moving to join them. Montrose had the disadvantage in numbers, and, if defeated, Forth cut him off from the hills. But his men were in high heart; a great body of the hostile force, the soldiers of Fife, were shaking in their shoes; and the Committee of Argyll were certain to paralyse the skill of Baillie.

We have that general's account of Kilsyth fight, and what preceded it, and though he writes as a man on his defence, he may be trusted.

When the legions of Fife had arrived, Argyll, Lindsay, Burleigh (the fugitive of Aberdeen fight), Tullibardine, Elcho (the defeated of Tippermuir), and Balcarres, the Rupert of the Covenant, met Baillie, and Argyll asked, "What was to be done?" Baillie said that he would take the orders of the Marquis and the Committee. "Why so?" asked Argyll. Baillie stated his grievances. Without his knowledge prisoners were exchanged (by Argyll), without his orders houses were burned (by Argyll). "While I was present, others did sometimes undertake the command of the army." So they, in this happy temper, advanced within three miles of Montrose, and there slept.

Next day, Argyll was hot for an advance. The road, Baillie answered, was difficult; Argyll therefore proposed to go across country, through the corn. Baillie obeyed, and broke up his position which he had deemed impregnable (August 15). The Covenanters held the heights; below, Montrose was drawn up on a plain. He was out of range of musketry fire, nor could he be attacked, as Baillie's position was so steep and rocky in front that an orderly advance down hill was impossible. Montrose's men threw off their plaids, and stood to arms in their saffron shirts, a kind of fustanella, knotted, and leaving the legs bare. The Committee caused Baillie

THE BATTLE of KILSYTH

A. Attack of the Highlanders
B. Attack of Adjutant Gordon

C. First position of the Covenanter Army
O. Flank march of the Covenanter Army

SCALE OF MILES

Edw. Waller

to make a flanking march along the front of Montrose, to cross a brook that ran through a steep cloven glen, and to gain a hill on the Royalist left, whence they could descend with ease on Montrose's left flank: they had reconnoitred the ground, and thought that all this was feasible. Baillie "liked not the notion: there was all to be lost, little or nothing to be gained." The Committee voted, and all but Balcarres,—a soldier,—agreed with Argyll. Baillie, against his will, sent a force to occupy an enclosure on the desired heights, with the horse of Balcarres.

This movement seems to have been made behind a sheltering slope; on approaching its summit Baillie saw the Highland skirmishers climbing the steep cloven glen towards the cover of some low wooded ground. Returning to Argyll, he beheld Haldane attacking, without his orders, some cottages held by Maclean of Treshnish; the Clan Gilzean and Clanranald, as supports, were looking on. Baillie sent two gallopers to bid Haldane retire from his attack on this Hougoumont: Haldane refused, but was beaten back by Maclean, and then Macleans and Macdonalds, acting on impulse, and without order, charged straight up the difficult glen, racing for first place, leaped a stone dyke, and plunged into the centre of the Covenanting line, taking it in flank.* They thus cut through the army of the brethren as it marched across the head of the glen to its chosen hill; but they themselves were now "in the air," without flanking force or supports. On their left, Hume, Argyll's men, and three other regiments, had reached the desired hill on Montrose's left, where Adjutant Gordon charged their cavalry with his horse, and drove them back on their infantry, but was surrounded and enfiladed. Aboyne had been placed by Montrose in the rear, the Marquis deeming his a valuable life. Now, beholding the Gordons in jeopardy, Aboyne with his tiny guard wheeled on the flank of the red-coat Covenanting infantry, broke through, and joined the Gordons who were struggling against footmen and cavalry. The Gordons took heart, and held their own, till, after a message sent by Aboyne to Montrose, Airlie charged at the head of the Ogilvies; Nathaniel Gordon led on the rest of his clan, and from the desirable mountain of the strategical Committee, the Covenanted horse and foot fled pell-mell.

At the same time the Macdonalds and Macleans, isolated as they were, rushed, crouching behind their targets, into the infantry whom they had attacked ; Baillie galloped to call up the reserves of Fife, but they were running with the claymores at their backs, and many a St Andrews burghess "burst without stroke" says Baillie (the Rev. Mr). Their officers vainly tried to rally them : few escaped from that field out of 6000 men, except the mounted officers. Argyll galloped to the Firth, took boat, as usual, and made for Newcastle to seek reinforcements from England. These were already riding north under David Leslie, 4000 strong ; they picked up infantry at Newcastle. The other Covenanting nobles fled from Kilsyth, some to Berwick, some to Ireland ; Montrose had cleared the country.

* Mr Hill Burton makes the Highlanders charge "down the brae," vi. p. 373.

Few and gloomy words may tell what followed. Montrose marched to Glasgow, which he saved from plunder. This cost him the desertion of 3000 Highlanders, and of Colkitto, who went to sate his vengeance against Argyll in Kintyre. From August 20 to September 4, Montrose lay at Bothwell, where Aboyne and the Gordons left him, upon some pique about a pamphlet, in which their merits were not recognised ; or because Crawford, released with the other captives from prison, held the king's commission to command the horse. Indeed Wishart and Patrick Gordon give totally different accounts of the Gordons' conduct at Kilsyth. Montrose gladly received his friends, Crawford, the Napiers, the Stirlings of Keir, Wishart, and others, emancipated by the trembling officials from their prison in Edinburgh. Home and Roxburgh invited Montrose's coming to the Border, where they deserted him (Montrose to Ogilvy, Bothwell, August 28, 1645).<sup>47</sup>

Some raw levies were raised for Montrose in Annandale and Nithsdale ; the Catholic Marquis of Douglas added more from his estates ; and the marquis, fatally trusting to broken reeds like Roxburgh, Home, and Traquair, moved to Kelso, in hopes of being joined by English Royalists. Hence (Sept. 10) old Sir Robert Spottiswoode wrote to Digby, in England, a letter which was never posted. You have let David Leslie loose on us (he says) and sent no force to follow him. Montrose, here, has only "seeming friends." Roxburgh and Home, who called him to come, have yielded their houses to Leslie, when Montrose "was within a dozen miles of them," and have gone not unwilling prisoners to Berwick. Traquair "has promised more than he hath yet performed,"—or meant to perform. Montrose, undismayed, "with his small force is ready to pursue David Lesley," of whose strength he must have been misinformed.<sup>48</sup>

Counselled, it is said, by Traquair, and having secured Home and Roxburgh, willing prisoners as was deemed, Leslie marched not to Edinburgh, but suddenly down Gala, towards Tweed. Montrose, finding that he had been vainly lured to Tweed by the treachery or cowardice of Roxburgh and Home, had retired to the banks of Ettrick, opposite Selkirk. Leslie now lay in the deep valley of Tweed, and on the long haugh at the meeting of Tweed and Ettrick at Sunderland Hall. Montrose's force, "a few raw, undisciplined horse," Border lairds perhaps, and 500 Irish, with Airlie's little squadron of cavalry, occupied the haugh on the left of Ettrick and the present cricket-ground of Selkirk, and had partly fortified the steep bank above the existing Yarrow Road. A news-letter (official) describes the works as strong and well placed. The scouts of Ogilvy of Pourie, serving with Montrose, declared that there were no enemies within ten miles, but Charteris of Hemsfield (Amisfield) brought in news that Leslie was at Sunderland Hall, three miles away; he himself had lost several men in a skirmish with them. Montrose, with a strange lack of care, passed the night in Selkirk; it seems doubtful whether Hemsfield's report was ever brought to him. Patrick Gordon says that Hemsfield and his men "were esteemed to have brawled among themselves in a drunken fray"; so their report seems to have been distrusted and not sent in to the general.

As Montrose breakfasted next day at Selkirk, Blackadder came with tidings that Leslie was at hand. Montrose galloped downhill, crossed the Ettrick, and found his camp in confusion. The mounted gentry of the Border held off in parties, large or small, and did not venture their persons: so Patrick Gordon says. He adds that they numbered 1200—a thing incredible, the Border lairds of that time having no love of fighting. They did not fight. A news-letter of September 16 from Haddington speaks of a charge of 200 of Montrose's musketeers who were driven in, after which, despite Leslie's overwhelming numbers, there was an hour of hard fighting; "our horse endeavouring to break through, and the enemy with great resolution maintaining their ground." Leslie himself charged with his regiment, and penetrated the ranks. Airlie's horse, "wanting their foot, were not able to make great opposition." Patrick Gordon says that they made successful charges, but, surrounded by 2000 cavalry, cut through them and escaped. Ogilvy and Nathaniel Gordon were taken by the peasantry. Of 300 Irish, 250 fell; the rest, says Patrick Gordon, surrendered "upon promise of safe quarter, but it was not kept."<sup>49</sup>

Quarter, in fact, by a vile equivocation, had been granted to Stuart, the adjutant, but not to his men, says Mr Gardiner.<sup>50</sup> Wishart and Guthry (p. 203) are the authorities, with Patrick Gordon, for breach of promise of quarter. Whether this was so or not, some gentlemen, averring that they had received quarter, and yielding themselves prisoners, were later doomed by the Estates.<sup>51</sup> At their trial it was alleged that Leslie had forbidden quarter to be given to any Irish, which, if true, settles the question about them.* Sir George Mackenzie, Lord Advocate under Charles II., writes that, of the camp followers, "fourscore women and children were drowned, being all in one day thrown over the bridge at Linlithgow by the Covenanters, and six more at Elgin, by the same faction. . . ." (Napier, ii. 584-596). Sir James Turner witnessed a similar scene of Covenanted mercies and drowning of women in Ireland; he was fortunately able to stop the massacre. Guthry attributes the slaughter of the surrendered Irishmen to the advice of the preachers with Leslie. Patrick Gordon describes in very realistic terms the

* It is impossible to ascertain the truth about Philiphaugh fight. Tradition speaks of a heavy fog and a surprise; Leslie's approach, concealed by the Linglee hill, not being discovered till he was within striking distance. Wishart agrees: was he present? According to his editors, Messrs Murdoch and Morland Simpson, he was. The Covenanting news-letter of September 16 from Haddington ('A More Perfect and Particular Relation,' Published by Authority. Robert Bostock. London, September 25, 1645), seems to have escaped Mr Gardiner's notice. It makes both parties "continue all night in arms," alleges that Montrose was well entrenched, the battle began at 10 A.M., and the heat of the contest raged from 11 to noon. The Cavaliers rally, and lose Ogilvy and Nathaniel Gordon in their last stand. "It is conceived there is between two and three thousand killed," which must be mere rumour. "A hundred Irish were all since" (when?) "shot at a post." On this showing, there was no surprise and there was a stout resistance, the horsemen fighting on after the capture of the infantry. The tract is cited in Mr Craig Brown's 'History of Selkirkshire.' Mr Steel of Philiphaugh kindly lent me the brochure, which is rare. As against this news-letter, we have David Leslie's own statement that the fight was very easily won: apparently by a surprise; cf. p. 237 infra.

Guthry attributes the massacre of the women to the preachers' exhortations. Argyll and Lanark and Buccleuch, and other nobles, returned in Leslie's train, were present, though, as they say that part of Leslie's force was at a distance, we do not know what share they took in the fighting, they may have been with the distant division. See their letters in Mitchell, 'Commission of the General Assembly Records,' Introduction to volume i. Another in Willcock, 'The Great Marquess,' appendix vii. p. 387.

slaughter of 300 women, "married wives of the Irish." Wishart also tells of the murder of women and "cook boys," and the later drowning of stragglers, women, and children. Montrose, Crawford, the Napiers, and some forty horse reached the hills above Yarrow, and after repelling an attempt to take them, arrived at Traquair. The earl, with his son, Lord Linton, who had deserted before Philiphaugh, "was not at home." Traquair died a street beggar.

Montrose, escaping north, had lost, indeed, no part of his victorious forces except the 500 Irish. But he never could collect his men. Colkitto would not come in; Lord Lewis Gordon behaved like the wretch he was; for one reason or another Aboyne first wavered, then deserted; and Huntly, though he sacked Aberdeen, thwarted every plan of the great marquis.

Such was the end of the success of the unparalleled adventure by which, in a year's time, he who began as a solitary and disguised fugitive, drove the leaders of the Covenant out of Scotland and shattered their armies. Montrose had not understood that the once warlike Border was now a land of pacific pease-fed peasants, and of lords who had no following and neither head nor heart. Fifty years earlier he would have been backed by the spears of Home and Hepburn, Maxwell, Ker, and Scott. Nor did Montrose understand that his politics were ideal, not practical, nor appreciate the hatred which he had incurred as a leader of Catholic Celts, whose outrages are attested by the Royalist contemporary, Patrick Gordon.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER V.

- <sup>1</sup> 'Britane's Distemper,' pp. 62, 63.
- <sup>2</sup> 'Britane's Distemper,' pp. 63, 71-73; Wishart, pp. 51-57.
- <sup>3</sup> Wishart, p. 59.
- <sup>4</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 433-443. For the battle, Wishart, Patrick Gordon, and Carte's 'Original Letters,' ut supra.
- <sup>5</sup> Wishart, p. 64; Act. Parl. Scot., vi., i. pp. 359, 360.
- <sup>6</sup> Gardiner, ii. p. 142.
- <sup>7</sup> Napier, 'Memorials,' ii. p. 163.
- <sup>8</sup> Spalding, ii. pp. 406, 407; Napier, ii. pp. 452, 453.
- <sup>9</sup> Gardiner, ii. pp. 147-148; 'Britane's Distemper,' pp. 80, 81; Wishart, pp. 66-69.
- <sup>10</sup> 'Diary of Alexander Jaffray,' p. 50. Aberdeen, 1856.
- <sup>11</sup> 'Britane's Distemper,' p. 89.
- <sup>12</sup> Wishart, p. 81.
- <sup>13</sup> Baillie, ii. p. 421, ibis.

- <sup>14</sup> Report of an Irish officer with Montrose. Carte's 'Original Letters,' i. p. 76.
- <sup>15</sup> Montrose to the king, February 3, 1645. Napier, ii. p. 485.
- <sup>16</sup> 'Britane's Distemper,' pp. 101, 102; Wishart, pp. 84-86; Carte's 'Original Letters,' i. p. 76; Montrose to Charles, Napier, ii. pp. 485-488, note; Guthry, pp. 178, 179; Baillie, ii. p. 263.
- <sup>17</sup> Balfour, iii. p. 230.
- <sup>18</sup> Peterkin, pp. 416, 417.
- <sup>19</sup> Peterkin, pp. 420, 421.
- <sup>20</sup> Balfour, iii. pp. 254, 255, 282.
- <sup>21</sup> Guthry, p. 181.
- <sup>22</sup> Balfour, iii. p. 273.
- <sup>23</sup> Peterkin, pp. 429, 430.
- <sup>24</sup> Guthry, p. 180; Balfour, iii. pp. 272, 273.
- <sup>25</sup> Cal. State Papers, pp. 558, 559, 1644-45; Terry's 'Leslie,' p. 361.
- <sup>26</sup> 'Britane's Distemper,' pp. 111, 112; Spalding, ii. p. 455.
- <sup>27</sup> Wishart, pp. 92-95; 'Britane's Distemper,' pp. 116, 117; Napier, ii. pp. 495-497; Gardiner, ii. pp. 218-220.
- <sup>28</sup> Maxwell, 'Old Dundee,' p. 495; Burton, vi. pp. 370, 371.
- <sup>29</sup> Spalding, ii. p. 461.
- <sup>30</sup> Spalding, ii. p. 464.
- <sup>31</sup> 'Britane's Distemper,' pp. 117-120; Wishart, pp. 96, 97.
- <sup>32</sup> Spalding, ii. pp. 467-469.
- <sup>33</sup> Gardiner, ii. pp. 224, 225, note 2.
- <sup>34</sup> Baillie, ii. p. 280.
- <sup>35</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 515, 516.
- <sup>36</sup> Baillie, ii. pp. 418, 419.
- <sup>37</sup> Wishart, pp. 109-112; 'Britane's Distemper,' pp. 128-134; Baillie, ii. pp. 417-419.
- <sup>38</sup> Turner, pp. 37-38.
- <sup>39</sup> Gardiner, ii. pp. 285, 286.
- <sup>40</sup> Gardiner, ii. p. 287; Warburton, iii. p. 149.
- <sup>41</sup> Rushworth, vi. p. 132.
- <sup>42</sup> Wishart, p. 113, note 3.
- <sup>43</sup> 'Britane's Distemper,' p. 136; Wishart, p. 116.
- <sup>44</sup> Wishart, p. 117.
- <sup>45</sup> 'Britane's Distemper,' p. 138.
- <sup>46</sup> Guthry, p. 193; Wishart, p. 121.
- <sup>47</sup> 'Memorials of Montrose,' ii. p. 229.
- <sup>48</sup> 'Memorials of Montrose,' ii. p. 233, 234.
- <sup>49</sup> 'Britane's Distemper,' p. 160.
- <sup>50</sup> Gardiner, ii. p. 356.
- <sup>51</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., vi., i. p. 506.

CHAPTER VI.

THE REVENGE OF THE COVENANTERS.

1645.

MONTROSE, who never lost heart, passed the winter in marching and countermarching from Atholl to Huntly's country, and even threatened Glasgow in October, but was deserted, much against their will, by Huntly's clansmen, obedient to their jealous chief. The wife of the great marquis died; his old and dear friend, Lord Napier, died, outworn in Atholl.* A force of Campbells, quartered by Argyll on Lord Napier's lands in Menteith, were routed by the local band of Royalists. But "the Dagon of the Covenant" was being worshipped with bloody rites: ten prisoners, with Sir William Rollock, Sir Philip Nisbet, and Ogilvy of Inverquharity, "a lovely young youth" of eighteen, were beheaded at Glasgow in October.<sup>1</sup> "The English Parliament," says a modern writer, "by the execution of Strafford and Laud, had set the example how to deal with political adversaries, and the Scots were energetically emulating it."<sup>2</sup> This was not exactly Baillie's view of the matter. He writes (October 17, 1645), "It's thought Johnstone, Ogilbie (Lord Ogilvy), Sir John Hay, Sir Robert Spottiswoode, and divers others of the prisoners will, at that meeting" (of the Estates at St. Andrews, December 1645, January 1646), "lose their heads, . . . albeit to this day no man in England has been executed for bearing arms against the Parliament."<sup>3</sup>

The preachers were "rowing like ravens" for blood. The standing commission of the General Assembly, also several presby-

* The late Lord Napier and Ettrick informed the author that, in Atholl, he met a very old man, who pointed out a tree under which the internal parts of Montrose's friend were buried: a curious proof of the tenacity of tradition, for Lord Napier knew that this, in fact, was done.

teries, with individual preachers, and Waristoun addressing the Estates, were not to be denied. Waristoun's argument was in a tone of ferocious superstition. Their previous delay to shed the blood of men bearing the king's commission (a delay probably caused by dread of reprisals which Montrose never took) "had provoked God's two great servants against them, the sword and plague of pestilence." More blood must be shed to propitiate the Deity. This is the theology of Anahuac or of Ashanti; an insatiate god calls for human victims; thus the fanatics read the Gospel. With regard to the massacre of prisoners and women on the field of Philiphaugh, and to the later slayings in cold blood, it is not necessary to agree with Mr Hume Brown that "Montrose himself was primarily responsible." He never gave orders to slay prisoners;—to be sure his Highlanders and Irish took very few, and certainly the Macdonalds massacred Campbell prisoners after Inverlochy. Again, before Montrose's war, all Irish and Catholics born in Ireland, taken in arms, were ordered to be massacred by the English Parliament. But reprisals by Rupert, and anxiety for English prisoners in Ireland, caused a relaxation of this rule, after some Irish prisoners had been drowned at sea. Finally, the executions ordered by the Estates were designed to please the Deity as conceived of by the preachers and Waristoun; no one can accuse Montrose of that blasphemous folly.<sup>4</sup>

To the plea of those who had yielded on receiving quarter (and that in a war in which prisoners had already been exchanged), it was replied that "if quarter be sustained, the whole nation, and especially the Estates of Parliament, will violate the oath of the Covenant."<sup>5</sup> Need more be said against these men's view of their contract with the Creator than they here assert? Leslie, at Philiphaugh, had only forbidden to give quarter to the Irish; Sir Robert Spottiswoode was, for example, not Irish; his quarter ought to hold good. But, it was replied, the Estates must "judge before God, and avert his wrath"—by slaying Malignant prisoners. How far his wrath was averted by human gore, Scotland had yet to learn. Waristoun noted that even Parliament, like Noah's Ark, "contained both foul and clean creatures." The foul creatures, a large majority, condemned Sir Robert Spottiswoode (a non-combatant), William Murray, brother of Tullibardine, Nathaniel Gordon, Lord Ogilvy, and others. They died like gentlemen (Ogilvy escaped), but were much vexed by the preachers in their last hours.<sup>6</sup> A Roman brother, Tullibardine did not desert the slayers of his kinsman. Ogilvy was of kin to Hamilton and to Lindsay. By the old ruse, he escaped disguised as his sister, who had been allowed to visit him in prison. The lady was protected against Argyll by Lindsay, Hamilton, and Lanark; and it is probable that, as usual, the escape was connived at.<sup>7</sup>

"The House ordains the Irish prisoners taken at and after Philiphaugh, in all the prisons of the kingdom, especially in the prisons of Selkirk, Jedburgh, Glasgow, Dumbarton, and Perth, to be executed without any assize or process, conform to the treaty between the two kingdoms, passed in act."<sup>8</sup> A bad example, too closely followed. Under Charles II., Cameronians were "executed without any assize," of which we hear many complaints. Of the Covenanting precedent much less is said. Not only the men, but six poor Irish women, prisoners at Selkirk, were ordered by the Estates to be put to death in cold blood, if they had been on the field, or in the "rebellion."* The cruelty of the Estates and of their preachers thus far outdid that of soldiers who, at Naseby and Philiphaugh, while still hot from battle, butchered women. Yet "the two servants of God," profanely invoked by Waristoun, Plague and Sword, did not cease from their labours in Scotland.

The time was approaching in which the Scots were to follow the star of the Covenant into the deepest national disgrace. The excuses made for their handing over the king to the English in return for a portion of their arrears of pay, are to some extent valid; they had, in fact, no alternative, save—not to take their wages. But it was the blindness of mind which made them slaves to the preachers and interpreters of the Covenant, who put so strange and sanguinary a sense upon the contract, that brought them into a situation not to be escaped from with safety and honour. It was their desire to force upon unwilling people their Presbytery by Right Divine, and their bargain with Omnipotence (the fevered dream of theologians), that led Scotland through shame and disaster, till she and her Kirk lay under the heel of the English conqueror.

The position of the unhappy king, after Philiphaugh, was not unlike that of his grandmother, Queen Mary, in her English prisons. He was not yet a captive, but, as we have seen, he had abandoned hope of success in the war, and was prepared to die rather than to impose Presbyterianism and the Covenant on his subjects. But he still hoped to make the best possible bargain, now with the Parliament, now with the Independents and their section of the army, and again with the Scots. As Mary had been told, he "had too many irons in the fire." The Scots had long been on ill terms with their English paymasters, who did not pay them, so that they made themselves unpopular by plundering the country; while their interests of self-defence, during Montrose's victories, caused Alexander Leslie, as we saw, to cling to the Border, in place of falling in with the strategy of the English generals. The English were longing to see them evacuate Carlisle, Newcastle, and other towns, and the military jealousy as between Cromwell and David Leslie has been noticed.

* Craig Brown, 'History of Selkirkshire,' i. p. 193. Act. Parl. Scot., vi., i. p. 492. Five of the Irish had died in Selkirk gaol.

In September 1645 Loudoun not only spoke very freely to the English Parliament, being as freely answered, but candidly communicated to Montreuil, the French ambassador, his private opinion of his English allies.* An arrangement for peace through French mediation, between the Scottish Commissioners in England, the English Presbyterian party, and the queen, then in France, was thought feasible. Lord Holland, in talk with Montreuil, said that Charles might introduce a kind of Presbyterianism in England, without the name but with some shadow (quelque image) of bishops (as under the Restoration in Scotland), return to London, and meet Parliament. The former step could not be contrary to his conscience, as he knew that the safety of his soul would not be endangered, nor the second to his honour. (August 14/24.<sup>9</sup>) But a door must be open or shut! Charles would never definitely promise to force Presbyterianism on England.

The news of Kilsyth only made the Scots more dependent on the English. On September 18/28 Montreuil spoke of submitting certain terms, mainly arranged by Balmerino and Holland, to the queen, and to Mazarin. If all went well, the united parties might be too strong for the Independents. France, if the plan succeeded, "would separate Scotland from England." But the defeat at Philiphaugh was now known, and, as Montreuil wrote, came Rupert, with news of a treaty to be negotiated between the king and the Independents. The Scottish Commissioners, therefore, dreading the sectaries, looked to France. Balmerino (September 25/October 5) still was unwilling to break the Solemn * Montreuil seems the right spelling, but it is Montereul in the published edition of his despatches.

League and Covenant. To France, however, Sir Robert Murray was to be sent. Montereul (October 16/26) pressed on the Scottish Commissioners the idea that the state of their country was nearly as perilous as that of the king (which proved true), and also expressed his natural surprise about their zeal for thrusting an unwelcome religion on England, "a matter which did not concern them, but their neighbours." They replied: first, that they had consciences; next, that the Covenant was sacred; thirdly, that they could not be safe unless England was Presbyterian. That the English also had consciences does not seem to have occurred to them. Montereul made the obvious replies: he also told Mazarin that, since England would never accept Presbytery as de jure divino, Charles might do away, in a later Parliament, what he might establish in this. The institution of Presbyterianism, if introduced, would confessedly be of human origin,—the king, it would seem, having the Tudor power of changing his subjects' religion if he changed it to Presbytery—that is, with aid of the Presbyterian Parliament. But Charles could never accept the Covenant thus: he would be perjuring himself if he did so,—thus he would reason; and it was the Covenant and Solemn League that fatally severed the king from the Scots.

Already there had been a plan for the king to commit himself to the Scottish army, approved of by Balmerino.<sup>10</sup> Charles was now trying to come to terms with Leven (Alexander Leslie), who wisely confined himself to his military duties. On October 17/27, the Scottish Commissioners accredited to the English Parliament sent a note in cypher to Montereul. They conceived that the Scots and the "well disposed" (that is, Presbyterian) English would act together "if the king will condescend to establish ecclesiastical affairs as it may be resolved in the Parliaments and Assemblies of the two kingdoms, and according to what is established in the other reformed churches." If so, Charles would be met half way on most points. If the king accepted, and proposed peace on these lines, and if the English refused, the Scots would employ the best means compatible with the safety of the king to obtain peace.<sup>11</sup> Of course, the Scottish Estates could disavow the Commissioners if they chose.

Sir Robert Murray was sent to Mazarin with these terms, but the capture of Digby's papers at Sherburne, and the discoveries thereby made as to Charles's foreign dealings, infuriated the English Parliament. Meanwhile, the Scottish Commissioners at once feared that the queen would not come into their proposals, and dreaded a new negotiation between Charles and the Independents.<sup>12</sup> But Charles now rejected, from the Independents, terms much better than he ever again had a chance of obtaining, and Montereul says, on the authority of the Countess of Devonshire, that Dorset, Southampton, Hertford, and Lindsay plotted to give him up to the Parliament!<sup>13</sup> The king reeled from plan to plan and from plot to plot—to one thing constant never, except to a generous enthusiasm for Montrose. “From henceforth,” he told Montereul in January, “I place Montrose amongst my children, and mean to live with him as a friend, not as a king.” “Balmerino and the Scots believe that the king ought to throw himself into their army, and that I ought to incline him to do so,” wrote Montereul, on January 4/14, 1646. In the opinion of the French ambassador both ideas were wrong.

Early in January Montereul obtained permission to visit Charles at Oxford, where he remained for six days.*

The long despatch of Montereul to Mazarin, concerning the attitude of Charles, is most instructive. The young French diplomatist, a canon, whether he was a sincere Catholic, or whether he was of the faith of Aramis, Abbé d’Herblay, stood as much detached from the consciences, religious scruples, and religious ambitions of Scottish and English Presbyterians, of the Independents, and of the king, as if he had been a native of another planet, or a child of the twentieth century. Nothing to him were Anglican bishops, nothing to him were lay elders, prophets, presbyteries, and assemblies. He wished to secure the safety of the king, to whom came daily Job’s messengers of surrender, and he wished to do so through the Scots, the queen, and France: for the weakening of England by separation from Scotland. While Charles dallied with the alternative of throwing himself on Parliament or on the Independents, Montereul was able to tell Mazarin that, as was reported, the chief room in the Tower was being furnished for the king’s prison.<sup>14</sup> Such were the tender mercies of the Independents. As soon as Montereul, in his conversation with Charles, approached the point of religion, he saw that there was no hope. The Scottish Commissioners would be content with nothing less than the king’s consent to the imposition of the Kirk upon England. “Misfortune dogs him, or destiny leads him to his doom," for this point Charles would never grant. "He would rather lose his crown than his soul." He had his own Covenant, his Coronation Oath, and if the Scots were bound to their band, so was he to his vow. He spoke of some compromise, by which the door might be both open and shut. Montereul suggested his acceptance of the three propositions of Uxbridge (1645), the first of which modestly demanded that the king should take the Covenant. At Uxbridge, Charles had told Nicholas that if he reminded the proposers of this idea that they would infallibly be damned "it might do good."<sup>15</sup> The king would see the Brethren damned before he would swallow their band. But he was ready enough to go to the Scottish army, as soon as he had assurance from the Commissioners that he would be well received. The question arises later, Did he get this assurance or did he not?

* The dates here are confusing, because, where Mr Gardiner heads a letter of Montereul “January 5, 1646,” Mr Fotheringham, in his edition of the letters, heads the same epistle, January 15/25, and so on.

Afterwards Charles told Montereul what he thought of the Scots and of compromise. The Scots wanted Presbyterianism in England—first that they might get their arrears of pay ("mes gages! mes gages") out of the revenues of disendowed bishops; next, lest if bishops survived in England they might one day reappear in Scotland. He would provide the Scots' wages out of an Irish fund, and would promise never to alter the Kirk in Scotland. Montereul still urged submission. Charles, he said, could not save both Crown and Church. Though no casuist, Montereul thought that, the Church being as good as lost, the king might honestly save the Crown—and restore the Church later. Charles was firm, and next Montereul met Nicholas and Asburnham. They said that with the Scots, Presbytery was a mere matter of self-will, but the king was guided by conscience. No party ever dreamed that any other party could possess a conscience.

The king at last came to this, more, he declared, than the Scots "could reasonably expect": he would tolerate Presbytery in England. Montereul said that was of no avail—the Scots "had taken arms to put down every other form of worship"; they did not want to be tolerated, they wanted to be supremely intolerant. He advised Charles to try to purge his conscience of scruple by discussion with a Scottish theologian, which the unfortunate king did later. There was also trouble about Will Murray, whom Charles did not wish to receive, as he was on ill terms with Montrose, while he had a foot in the camp of the Scottish Commissioners. Montereul said that it was useless to carry to them the king's memorandum of his new proposals; and returning to town, found that he was right. His one hope now was that the queen, from France, might put pressure on her husband to yield. Charles (January 17/27) wrote to ask what assurances for his safety and liberty the Commissioners would give, if he joined their army, and whether they would combine with Montrose—an excommunicated man with a price on his head! "You have my last word," he wrote to Montreuil. "I foresee their entire ruin, if they do not come to terms with me." His prophecy was fulfilled. The king's other proposals to the Parliament were at this time declined. That iron was out of the fire. His idea of joining the Scots got wind, and the Independents planned to depose him, and to crown the child Duke of Gloucester. The Prince of Wales would not lay down arms; the Duke of York was unlikely to accept their offers. The report<sup>16</sup> was probably incorrect.

The Scottish Commissioners now let Charles know that they could not answer for their army's reception of him "unless he performed, before leaving, all that had been promised here,"—toleration, and a national synod to decide about religion. Yet Montreuil thought that he had the Commissioners' verbal assurance, copied out, for the king's safety. No more, practically, was ever obtained in the way of assurance—the Commissioners would give none in writing; and the various subterfuges as to the royal safety were worthless. The somewhat disputable affair of Glamorgan's Treaty in Ireland was now discovered, and inflamed the suspicions of the English.<sup>17</sup> Moreover, the fact that Will Murray had been dealing in France with the queen, in the interests of the Scottish Commissioners, and on the chance that the queen would induce Charles to come to terms with the Scots, was revealed to the English Parliament.<sup>18</sup> "The Scots," says Mr Gardiner, "with unblushing effrontery publicly declared that the charges were absolutely false from beginning to end." Charles also repudiated Glamorgan; in this course he has found a modern defender.

On February 5 Will Murray, returning from France in disguise, was arrested at Canterbury. Montreuil, however, received his packet safe with the queen's letter to Charles, and Sir Robert Murray managed to have a few words with Will, his cousin, who said that the king must take the Covenant.<sup>19</sup> Will escaped later from being hanged as a spy, by the justice of the court which tried him. It had become plain that if the king did not take the Covenant he was doomed, for Montereul, in the letter just cited, says, Jay eu bien de la peine à tirer des Ecossais une image de seureté, “a ghost of an assurance of Charles’s safety” (Feb. 19/March 1). A minute of it had just been drawn up.<sup>20</sup> But Charles, if he knew himself, never would sign the Covenant. He would not “leave those grounds which upon no consideration must I quit.” He adds, writing to the queen, “even in those things I shall go as near the wind as I can, according to that wit which God has given me” (Oxford, Jan. 22, 1646).<sup>21</sup> Now the intricate arrangements between the king and the Scottish Commissioners, as to assurance for his safety and liberty, were characterised by the fact that both sides throughout went “as near the wind” as they could; Charles playing for his life and crown, the Scots for the valuable guarantee of their wages which the custody of his person would give them. The wind into which Charles never would sail was the Covenant,—of that he assures the queen again and again (Feb. 1, 1646). He met all the queen’s arguments in favour of this final shame with conclusive replies. He would not promise what his conscience forbade, on the faint chance that “I shall not be put to it.” “I do not understand how the Independents’ wilfulness against Presbyterian Government can free me from my promise to the Scots” (Feb. 8).<sup>22</sup>

In March (no date) Sir Robert Murray wrote down a verbal assurance from the Scottish Commissioners, for honour, respect, and safety to Charles in their army, but only if Charles would accept the Uxbridge propositions and the Covenant, which the king was to announce in one letter to Parliament and the Commissioners, and in another to the Scottish Estates.<sup>23</sup> The king (March 2) had approached the Independents with an offer of general (Protestant) tolerance, but as they knew he was dealing with the Scots they supposed that he must be ready to accept the intolerance of Presbyterianism. He was not; but this the Independents could not understand, knowing that the Scots would accept nothing less.<sup>24</sup> Meanwhile Loudoun, the chancellor, arrived from Scotland, probably with leave from a quorum of the Estates, to treat with the king.* Knowing that the king would never accept the Covenant, Montereul engaged the Scots Commissioners to sail as near the wind as this: Charles should allow ecclesiastical matters “to remain established as they had already been, and might be established in future by both Parliaments and by the assembly of the clergy of both kingdoms, while he should not sign, but simply approve the Covenant by letter.”<sup>25</sup> Montrose would be obliged, in this case, “to leave the country for a short time,” without other loss. The king, remembering Strafford, was absolutely firm about the safety of Montrose. Four days later (March 16/26) Montreuil wrote that Loudoun assured him that Leven and the army of Scotland “were fully informed of our design,” and that their chief cavalry general would meet the king.<sup>26</sup> And now Montreuil averred that the king need not even approve of the Covenant by letter, nearer the wind was that approval than Charles could go.<sup>27</sup>

* See Gardiner, iii. p. 74, note 1. Montereul asserts that Loudoun had very ample powers from the Scottish Parliament” (i. pp. 170-173), so he “had learned.”

This new assurance, satisfactory as regarded the Covenant, was only Murray’s attested written report of what the canny Scottish Commissioners had promised verbally.* Men who refuse to set their hands to their promises, clearly are “already looking how they shall step over their word,” as Ranald of the Mist said to Argyll. But the Commissioners expected to carry with them the Presbyterians of the Parliament and of the city, with an army of 20,000 men.<sup>28</sup>

Things were going ill in Parliament for Presbyterian claims. “The pope and king were never more earnest for the headship of the Church than the plurality of this Parliament . . . yet almost all the ministry are zealous for the prerogative of Christ against them,” says Baillie (March 17).<sup>29</sup> The prerogative of Christ meant that of the Presbyteries. Just as James VI. was “Christ’s silly vassal,” according to Andrew Melville, so the Parliament were to be Christ’s silly vassals. Englishmen would not endure this tyranny of preachers and elders: Parliamentary Commissioners, they decided, in certain cases, were to oversee, and, if necessary, * Here Mr Fotheringham, editor of the Montreuil papers, makes, I think, a slip. He writes (i. p. 177, note 1), commenting on his translation of Montreuil’s letter of March 16/26, where Montreuil says that even the approval of the Covenant is dropped, “This is evidently an error, since the letter of security given by Sir Robert Murray (see p. 163) makes special mention in the last sentence, of the king having to sign the Covenant.” But that is an earlier document of March, —without date of day. In Murray’s assurance of March 16/26 (the day on which Montreuil is writing), there is no mention of the Covenant at all, the document is printed by Mr Gardiner, iii. p. 75, note 1, citing Ranke’s ‘Engl. Geschichte,’ viii. p. 174. Montreuil, as his letter of March 16/26 shows, sent a copy of this assurance to Mazarin (Montreuil, i. p. 175). The importance of Mr Fotheringham’s mistake is conspicuous.

quash Presbyterian excommunications.<sup>90</sup> The City petitioned in favour of Christ's prerogative: the City was snubbed. This drove the devout of the moneyed class into closer union with the Scots; but Charles would not accept the Scottish Commissioners' slippery assurance, even when, as now, the mention of the Covenant was dropped. The king already (Feb. 19) had written to the queen, "I assure thee, I put little or no difference between setting up the Presbyterian Government or submitting to the Church of Rome." This was not tactful, the queen being a Catholic. He spoke of his shame and grief about surrendering Strafford, . . . "yet I believe if thy personal safety had not been at stake I might have hazarded the rest," . . . the Church of England he would not surrender.* "God hath favoured my hearty tho' weak repentance." In answer to the queen's prayers (for in what did one shade of heresy differ from another, to the queen? especially if the promise could later be broken), Charles, like Lovelace, said,—

I could not love thee, dear, so much, Loved I not honour more!

"Consider that, if I should quit my conscience, how unworthy I make myself of thy love." Thus strong on the point of his own conscience, Charles styled the conscience of the Scots as to their Covenant oath, "a pretence, really no more."

He was now ready to tolerate Catholics, in return for 5000 soldiers from France, hoping "to suppress the Presbyterian and Independent factions."<sup>81</sup> The good king believed that these factions must be damned for want of sacraments. None of the reformed churches except the Anglican and Lutheran "can justify the succession of their priests, which if this (Church) could not undoubtedly do, she should have one son less for me." Charles, being in this mind, was not likely to be converted by the Rev. Mr Henderson of Leuchars in the county of Fife. Henderson was, however, for the times, a reasonable man, though he preached against Amalekites.

On March 18 Montreuil was with the king; by the 23rd Charles's last army had surrendered. But would Charles accept the assurance even without the Covenant? Not Charles, he would not assent to the temporary banishment of Montrose, whom, of course, he could not consult. "Montrevil's juggling" he despised * 'Charles I. in 1646,' p. 19. The king does not mention Strafford by name, but his meaning is obvious.

(Oxford, March 22).<sup>32</sup> He now wished to return to London on no definite promises, which terrified the city with fear of a Cavalier rising, and united the men of trade and the Houses, but disgusted Baillie. Too obviously the prophets were now to be left in the lurch, and presbyteries to be hampered in their excommunications. Charles had now to use one of the too many irons always in the fire—the Scottish Commissioners. The result was that he promised, if he came to the Scottish army, “to be instructed concerning the Presbyterian Government,” and to satisfy them as far as his conscience would then permit. What did the Scots promise on this occasion? Charles, on April 4, from Oxford, writes to the queen, “Montrevil and I are agreed. He went yesterday” (April 3) “to the Scotch army, who are to send their horse to meet me at Harborough.” On April 6 he says that “I shall be received into the Scotch army as their natural sovereign, with freedom of my conscience and honour. . . .” He was sending a message to London, but it was not despatched till it could be dated May 18.<sup>33</sup> The king’s belief that he had assurance and would be met by the Scottish cavalry was disappointed.

He wrote to the queen while Montereul was riding to the Scots besieging Newark. (His letter is of April 11/21). There Montereul found that the Scottish Commissioners, now with their army, knew nothing about the matter of the king’s retreat to them, so pressingly urgent as it was. Balmerino, indeed, had been sent from town to inform them, but with the folly of fanaticism, had declined to “desecrate the Sabbath” by riding to Newark on that day! He tarried at a place thirteen miles distant. When Montereul rode to him there he merely drivelled so feebly (il s’est comporté si faiblement) that the Scottish Commissioners with the army would neither send cavalry to meet the king nor even permit Montereul to warn him not to leave Oxford. This first betrayal must have assured Charles of the worth of the slippery Scottish promises made to him through Robert Murray (March 16/26). Had he left Oxford when he had arranged to do so, he would probably have been taken; but he waited for news from Montereul, who wished still to believe in the good faith of Loudoun (a Campbell). But he augured ill for Charles; the Scots at Newark were utterly callous as to his probable capture and ruin.<sup>34</sup>

On April 16 Montereul wrote from Newark to Secretary Nicholas, who was at Oxford with Charles. He had met Loudoun

(the chancellor), Balcarres, and Dunfermline at Royston. They would send cavalry to meet the king at Burton, and have a larger force to join him at Bosworth. For what concerns the Presbyterian form of Church Government, they wish his Majesty to grant that to them as promptly as possible. They at first proposed "something more rude," in fact they had already "stepped over their words" given at London to Montreuil. The king, said Montreuil, should not come to the Scots if he could do any other thing: it was a last despairing resort.<sup>85</sup>

No wonder that, on April 21, Charles wrote to the queen, "The Scots are abominable relapsed rogues, for Montrevil himself is ashamed of them." And this was the second betrayal,—"the relapsed perfidiousness of the Scots," said the king.<sup>86</sup> He had actually written (April 18) to bid Montrose join the Scots at Newark, if the marquis heard from Montreuil that all was happily arranged!<sup>87</sup> On April 22 the king thought of going to Lynn, or of trying to join Montrose by sea. Fairfax was marching from fallen Exeter on Oxford; Fairfax was the man to whom Charles might have turned with least danger. He was a gentleman; and the Independents might have made terms with their king even yet—they would not, at least, have sold him. Meanwhile in London, the Commons treated as breach of privilege a petition from the divines at Westminster, in which they averred that Presbyterianism was jure divino. They pursued the Brethren into their biblical entrenchments with a fire of annoying inquiries. It was more clear than ever that the Solemn League and Covenant would not be kept as the more enthusiastic devotees of presbyteries had expected it to be.

Charles had little better occasion to hope that the Scots would keep their shifty promises to him (the names of the givers of the promises being obscured), yet to them he must now fly. The questions are, were the Scots or Charles most deceitful, was Charles or were the Scots most deceived? It is for the purpose of discovering the answers to these questions that we have dwelt on the details. Nobody can clear Charles of "double dealing," when he was at once treating with the Presbyterians and treating for Catholic help to "crush the Presbyterian and Independent factions" themselves. But while he was thus offering himself at auction, with the reservation of his conscience, to the highest bidder, he meant to keep his terms with the highest bidder. His profession of readiness to "be instructed" by a Caledonian theologian was a mere attempt to conciliate good will: the Catholic nobles under James VI., and Mary herself, had submitted to "be instructed," as the Scots knew, without edifying results. The Scots promised more. The details are obscure, at least "their disposition was all that the king could wish," and they were sending troops to Burton (April 20-26), and averring that Charles should be met at Harborough by David Leslie with 2000 horse. The letter (Montreuil to Nicholas, announcing this)<sup>38</sup> seems to have reached Oxford on April 26, and before the dawn of April 27, Charles, disguised, his long lock cut, his beard altered, rode over Magdalen bridge, with Ashburnham and Hudson, a sporting chaplain, and began his circuitous journey to the Scottish camp.

Hudson's account of the whole adventure is most interesting.<sup>39</sup> At Baldock, Charles sent him to Montreuil, "and desired him to make an absolute conclusion with the Scots"—if he got that in the terms he demanded, he would come among them. The terms (safety, honour, and conscience) were again verbally promised, and the promise was copied out (by Hudson), but was not signed by the Scots. Montreuil adds that the king was to be received avec honneur; but here a lacuna occurs in the despatch, followed by the word auprès du Parlement d'Angleterre. This clearly corresponds to Hudson's version, "That if the Parliament refused, after a message from the king, to restore the king to his rights and prerogatives, they (the Scots) should declare for the king, and take all the king's friends into their protection."<sup>40</sup> Montreuil assured Hudson of the serious purpose of the Scots, and wrote a note to beg the king to "accept such security as was offered." They deceived Montreuil.

Mr Gardiner thinks that the Scots "may very well have been somewhat unscrupulous in their dealings with the king," just as they had lied "with unblushing effrontery" to the English Parliament.<sup>41</sup> But what was the "message" which Charles was to send to the English Parliament. On that, and on its refusal by Parliament, depended the Scottish declaration for the king; but not on that, I conceive, hung his security from them for person, honour, and conscience. No conditional clause was attached to the promise of this security, as far as Hudson's scanty evidence shows. Again, if Montreuil's argument "always turns on the engagement made through Sir Robert Murray," why should Mr Gardiner take that to be the earlier engagement, which insisted that Charles shall take the Covenant? Why not the assurance of March 16/26, in which the Covenant is not mentioned? * Mr Gardiner decides that (if his own suggestion as to the Scottish promise turning on their expectation that the king would accept Presbyterianism, for England, be correct), Charles, "intending to deceive, became deceived." Deceived he was, but I do not see reason to suppose that he intended to deceive.

The king came to Montreuil, at Southwell, "and there," says Sir James Turner, who was on the spot, "did the Earl of Lothian, as President of the Committee, to his eternal reproach, imperiously require his Majesty (before he had either drunk, refreshed, or reposed himself) to command my Lord Bellasis to deliver up Newark to the Parliament's forces, to sign the Covenant," establish Presbytery in England and Ireland, "and to command James Graham (for so he called great Montrose), to lay down arms: all which the king stoutly refused, telling him that he who made him an earl had made James Graham a marquis. Barbarously used he was,—strong guards put upon him, and sentinels at all his windows." So says Sir James, who was present, pitied his king (Turner was ever hopelessly trying to save the lives of prisoners from Covenanting zeal), and even offered to try to arrange an escape.†

Assez! We see how these Scots kept their word. They need not have given it. They gave it, or half gave it, with circumstances of manifest and pettifogging treachery; they gained their end; they broke their word with brutality; and they took the king to Newcastle, to make their best bargain with the Parliament, to whom they falsely pretended that they had not expected the visit of his Majesty. Parliament, May 19, unanimously decided that "they had no further use of" the Scottish army. At Newcastle the Scots denied their assurance to Charles; "resorted to unblushing falsehood," says Mr Gardiner.<sup>42</sup> Charles had to pass his time in being enlightened by Henderson, who conducted himself like a gentleman of honour, now as always. He died before either party * Compare Gardiner, iii. pp. 101-102, and notes, with iii. pp. 73-75, notes.

† Lothian has apologists. Mr Hamilton, Cal. State Papers, 1645-47, p. xlvii., avers that he meant to intimate, in calling Montrose "James Graham," that no titles given since the war began were to be recognised. Then Montrose was an earl. He also meant that the Commissioners upheld the forfeiture of Montrose by the Estates. So much for the king's "authority," guaranteed by the Covenant. So much for Lothian's "honour," promised to Montreuil in such terms as he deemed sincere. These promises were but a day or two old. Dr Mitchell (Gen. Ass. Com. Records, i., xxv. note) backs Mr Hamilton.

had converted the other. Of course, Charles did his best to embroil all parties of his rebels; he met perfidy with its own weapons. To Montrose he wrote (May 19), "I am in such a condition as is much fitter for relation than writing"; the bearer would tell the tale. "You must disband your forces and go to France. . . . Your most assured, constant, real, faithful friend, Charles R."<sup>43</sup>

The great Montrose replied that he was the king's servant "as well by passion as by action"—prophetic words. He wished to know what conditions were to be granted to himself and his men, and, from Wishart's and Guthry's evidence, it seems that, by another messenger, he wrote that if the order to disband had been extorted from the king, he would fight on.<sup>44</sup> The king kept insisting in affectionate letters, but bade him delay as long as he might without breaking his word. Montrose met Middleton (who had fought under him at the Bridge of Dee) on July 22, and accepted "safe transport beyond sea."* The transport, when it reached the harbour of Montrose Bay on the last appointed day, August 31, was manifestly not "safe." The Covenanting skipper refused to start on September 1, after which the Marquis would be at the uncovenanted mercies of Argyll and Waristoun. Montrose saw through the clumsy knavery, found a barque from Bergen at Stonehaven, put on board Sir John Hurry (who had changed sides long before), Wishart and other friends, and himself escaped disguised as Wishart's servant; so Wishart informs us.<sup>45</sup>

We need not linger over the sufferings of Charles: "I never knew what it was to be barbarously baited before." † He was not even to use his Prayer Book privately! Meanwhile the double-

* This meeting with Middleton was arranged by the Duke of Hamilton, who, released from prison by the Parliamentarians, had made his peace with the Covenanters, and visited Charles at Newcastle in July. Both blushed on meeting; the king admitted that the duke had cause for resentment, and entreated him to aid Montrose, the cause of his disgrace. The duke behaved nobly, according to Burnet, his biographer; Montrose, if taken, would certainly have been hanged, but the duke, through Colonel Lockhart, arranged the meeting between Montrose and Middleton, and the offer of safe transport abroad (Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' pp. 279, 280). But Mr Napier (Memoirs, 1856, ii. p. 639) proves, we fear, that Middleton's terms for Montrose are alluded to by Charles (July 16) before Hamilton met the king (July 17).

† Mr Gardiner writes "treated," but "baited," in the text, is the word for the Presbyterian pressure, and the preachers' threats that the king should learn what Kirk censure meant. ('Charles I. in 1646,' p. 45; Gardiner, iii. p. 114.)

dyled shame of the Scots, their perfidy to their king, their treachery to their English brethren, was detected, and known of all men. They had promised, or half promised, to the king, and broken trust; they had dealt with him underhand, and denied it to Parliament. As concerns the king, they had broken the Covenant (doubtless they salved their consciences with their usual gloss). The Solemn League and Covenant they had broken to the Parliament.<sup>46</sup>

Now, in this mortifying crisis, Argyll came to the front. A group of preachers, Cant, Blair, James Guthrie (later hanged), were sent by the General Assembly to "bait" the king, but Argyll, Lindsay, Loudoun, and Balmerino also arrived at Newcastle and stiffened David Leslie against offers by Charles.<sup>47</sup> He, Argyll, left for London on June 15, "with great professions of doing me service there," says Charles to the queen; "his errand (as is pretended) is only to . . . moderate the demands which are coming to me thence" (June 16). "Argyll is very civil and cunning" (Baillie calls Argyll "cunning"), "but his journey to London will show whether he be altered or not; if he be, it must be for the better . . ." <sup>48</sup> Argyll did not alter, he merely developed, to the end. Charles may refer, in his letter to the queen, to a secret mission, entrusted by himself to Argyll, Loudoun, and Dunfermline (the secret they did not keep). They were to try to get leave for some of his servants to come to him, and to aver that the king would grant a temporary trial of Presbytery. He also wished, when the terms of Parliament came, to defer answering till September 16.* So Burnet avers, informed by Lauderdale, who was with Argyll. Argyll himself, when tried in 1661, avers that he carried, as a Commissioner, "instructions for hastening the propositions," but adds that, by the king's desire he consulted Richmond (Lennox), and the Marquis of Hertford, as to the propriety of the Scottish army's declaring for the royal cause.<sup>49</sup> Argyll was a strange person to entrust with such an errand.

All that Argyll is known to have done in town was to make a speech to the Parliamentary Committees. He advocated at once uniformity and a kind of toleration; but he would not tolerate anything "contrary and destructive to our Covenant." This indicates no wide region in which freedom could expatiate; that region, * Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' p. 283.

however, would be occupied by "peaceable men, who cannot, through scruple of conscience, come up in all things to the common rule."<sup>50</sup>

Before examining the rest of Argyll's speech to the English, we may note that it is regarded as the high-water mark of his political career, and we may ask, What was his statesmanship worth? Mr Gardiner observes that "his timidity in the field was equalled by his timidity in the Council," which, if true, makes Argyll worthless as a statesman. "He was the type of the adroit party leader who is moved by his party, but never succeeds in guiding it." "The tail wagged the dog!" we know that sort of statesmanship. Yet, the historian goes on, "Argyll's statesmanship, so far as it can be distinguished from attempts at statesmanship forced upon him by others, proceeded in the right lines." But if he never guided his party, where is his statesmanship? Its merit appears to have lain in supporting the Scottish people, under the Kirk, in resistance to the feudal nobles. "If Argyll had done nothing else, he would have deserved credit for the Parliamentary reforms of 1640, when, after wresting power from the king and the nobility, he placed it in the hands of the lesser gentry and the burghers." But did he? In the Parliament of 1648, the power was in the hands of the nobles, backed by many of the burghs and lairds. Yet that power was nullified by the spiritual power of the Kirk. What Argyll really did was to increase and render dominant the force of a set of preachers, incapable, as even Baillie said, of statesmanship. What they and their flocks did unto Scotland, we have still to see. It resulted, says Mr Gardiner himself, in "an insane undertaking," though "it does not follow that those who supported it were themselves insane." Yet Argyll, himself, speaks of his policy ("whatever hath been said by me or others in this matter") as that of "a distracted man."<sup>51</sup>

The policy of the Solemn League and Covenant inevitably became that of men who, if not "insane," were blinded by the crazy belief that they, like Israel of old, were in direct national relations with Jehovah, relations denied to less favoured people. Argyll, as far as in him lay, handed Scotland over to this "strong delusion."

As for his speech to the English Parliament, he saw, and said,—what had been plain to all men of sense since Lethington,—that it were well for England and Scotland to be "altogether one." But with what manner of England was Scotland now to be one? With the army which made the Commonwealth? He also now proposed (to conciliate the Independents) that a via media should be found "to avoid on the one hand lawless liberty in religion, and on the other persecution of peaceable men" (like Cromwell's army!) "who, through scruple of conscience, could not adapt themselves in all things to the common rule." An admirable ideal; but neither practical politics nor compatible with the Solemn League and Covenant, which Argyll and his party later thrust on the perjured Charles II., they well and duly knowing that he was perjuring himself. Argyll's words to the English, and his action later, are irreconcilably contradictory.

After 1648, says Mr Gardiner, Argyll "becomes the slave and, unless every indication we possess is to be distrusted, the unwilling slave of the Kirk, which formed the basis of his authority in Scotland." Yet Mr Gardiner had just exclaimed, "Who shall say after this" (after the mere words of the speech), "that Argyll was not as much Montrose's superior in statesmanship as he was his inferior in character?" Montrose's statesmanship was not that of "a slave and an unwilling slave." Yet Argyll's statesmanship had to be that of a slave and an unwilling slave, unless he either joined Montrose or joined Cromwell. Union with Cromwell, or union with Montrose, —either was an honest course. Argyll was incapable of either, and his fortunes went down, with those of Scotland, in his "unwilling" following of the Kirk to discomfiture and disgrace. If reluctant, "an unwilling slave," Argyll loses even the character of an honest fanatic; if unreluctant, he was a crazy fanatic; while to statesmanship he has no pretensions whatever.*

Argyll, to return to his speech, would not deny that Scotland had "a natural affection to his Majesty." They "would rather see him reformed than ruined." To be "reformed" in Argyll's sense, that is, to be covenanted, and to force Presbyterianism on England, was, in Charles's view, to be dishonoured in this world, and damned in the next. Then the marquis accepted all the "Propositions" of Parliament, and to this extent he kept "his great professions of doing me service," as the king had written.

On June 24, Charles, who, except in the last stand of his conscience, was as slippery as the Scots, told the queen that he must merely drive time till his affectionate Scots and loyal English quarrelled among themselves. To go to London, if he safely could, "will be the best put off."<sup>52</sup> He must find "a handsome denying answer." If he stayed in Newcastle when the Scots departed home, he would be a prisoner; "as for going to Scotland, I can only do it, as I am ready to die, for the queen, but not otherwise" (July 1).

* I cite, for Mr Gardiner's opinion, "The Last Campaign of Montrose," 'Edinburgh Review,' January 1894, clearly by Mr Gardiner, as the chapter on the same events in his history demonstrates.

In place of saying "No!" heartily to the impossible propositions of Parliament, or of accepting till changed times enabled him to break his promise (the plan of the queen and Montereul), Charles merely drove time by "handsome denying answers" (August 1). We have seen that he had asked Montrose to delay his departure as long as he honourably could, and apparently Montrose had sent a reassuring message about Seaforth and Irish auxiliaries.*

If it was Charles's policy to waste time, and let dissensions arise, it was the policy of the Scots to hasten matters. No sooner had the Commissioners returned with the king's reply, than the Scots announced their willingness to disband their army, and give up the garrisons (Berwick, Carlisle, and Newcastle) "upon reasonable satisfaction." Their question to the English now was merely "How much will you give us to go away?"<sup>53</sup> They could not bring back an uncovenanted king to holy Scotland. The preachers would not stand it; they would probably have excommunicated the king and all who backed him. The Commission of the General Assembly issued "A Solemn and Seasonable Warning."

These ravens (Leighton, alas, sat among them on this occasion) were not yet gorged with gore: there had been "too much indulgence to many who have been active in the late execrable rebellion." Therefore the Lord kept up, on just grounds, his "great controversy" with his new Israel. The preachers knew, of course, that many who had been goaded into taking the Covenants hated the Covenants: they foresaw the rising Royalist party of "the Engagement." Let there be no "false glosses," they said, on the Covenant, pressing "the defence of the king's person and religion" (to which they were all sworn), "to engage in those ways that would tend to the ruin of both." The ambiguous clause in the Covenant, about the king's person, has already been commented upon. Only "atheists" would violate the Covenant, "in whole or in part." Charles, while uncovenanted, must not cross Tweed.

With this amiable document before them, approved among others

* Gardiner, iii. p. 132, referring to an undated letter in the French Foreign Office Archives, lii. 517.

by the monster Nevoy who urged David Leslie to the massacre of Dunavertie, and by the saintly Leighton, who became an archbishop,<sup>64</sup> the Scots Commissioners, thralls of the pulpit, had no alternative. They must go home, and they must leave their king behind, a captive. So they asked "How much?" The reply was £200,000 down, and £200,000 more by instalments. A quarrel seemed apt to arise on the claim of the English Parliament to dispose of the royal person. There were many other causes of delay. Charles sailed so near the wind as to offer a three years' probationary trial of Presbyterianism. What an offer to make to Presbyterians,—a temporary trial of a Divine ordinance! The Scottish Estates were met, Hamilton pressed them to give their king honour and shelter north of Tweed. Argyll opposed, and the preachers backed him. They must "be heard in all things which concern the meaning of the Covenant."<sup>65</sup> Loyalty to the authority and person of the king is either part of that band, or it is not. If not, what meaning had the hundreds of canting protestations of loyalty; and where is the boasted legality of the band? If yes, how could the Covenanters refuse shelter to their king? They refused their king honour and safety, unless Charles did violence to his conscience by adoring their fetish. Mr Gardiner says, with truth, "it is hard to find serious fault with the resolution thus taken" (to desert their native king), "except by condemning the whole ecclesiastical and political system which the Scottish nation had deliberately adopted."<sup>66</sup> Well, we do condemn the "ecclesiastical system," and that monstrous and cruel idol, the Covenant. As developed and interpreted by the prophets, it had become an engine of stupid superstition. Men suffer for their stupidity as sorely as for their sins, and men could do no more preposterously stupid thing than bind themselves, and posterity, and England, to supposed Covenants with Deity, drawn up by a lawyer and a preacher.

"My opinion upon the whole business is," wrote Charles to the queen, "that these divisions will either serve to make them all join with me, or else God hath prepared this way to punish them for their many rebellions and perfidies."<sup>67</sup> In brief, £200,000 were paid down by the English, and the Scots marched home, leaving their king behind, and fondly hoping for another £200,000 in instalments (February 3-11, 1647). Some promise of the king's safety they had, but they had broken their own assurance to the same effect, and knew what words were worth. They had brought themselves into the same labyrinth as Elizabeth wandered in, through her treatment of Mary. The Scots would have incurred less odium, in England and in Europe, if they had taken Charles home and immured him (as Argyll is said to have suggested) or beheaded him. Even that they could not do; the English Parliament, which claimed his person, would have avenged him. Only one thing they could do,—they could shake the dust of England off their feet, and cross Tweed without the thirty-six cart-loads of money, the £200,000. "The surrender of the king has added horror to the English hatred of the Scots. They cry to them that they are worse than Jews, creatures who have sold their king and their honour," writes Montereul. "The women of Newcastle can scarcely be prevented by blows and threats from stoning the Scottish soldiers when they pass by" (Feb. 12, 1647).<sup>58</sup> It may have been Macleod of Assynt's duty, later, to surrender Montrose to his death. But what stamps Assynt is his acceptance of the blood reward, the 400 bolls of meal. It is the £200,000 of blood money that mark the Scots with eternal infamy. The money was due, and had been voted previously, but was not paid till they filled up the measure of their shame.

*Traitor Scot,
Sold his king for a groat!*

L'Ecosse, parjure à sa foi, Pour un denier vendit son Roi!

These are not pleasant rhymes.

It is not to be supposed that the desire to desert the king was universal in Scotland; even the Solemn Warning of the preachers proves that fact. Not to speak of the Clans and the Gordons, the nobles were not all present at the meeting of the Estates which clinched the bargain; though Guthry seems to exaggerate when he says that not a third attended.<sup>59</sup> The gentry, burghs, and commonalty "a hundred for one abhorred it, and would never have instructed their Commissioners that way," but the constituencies "were overawed." Several ministers, among them Guthry himself, did their best in the Assembly for the king, but the other Guthrie, he who came to be hanged, with the more precise brethren, held sway. Guthry represents Hamilton and Lanark, though they voted against the desertion, as lukewarm, and negligent of opportunities, "some of their friends were accidentally absent, others on design, and some downright deserted them," says Burnet.<sup>60</sup> "All apprehended that some strange curse would overtake those who were active in this infamous business." A curse did overtake them; for when they saw the king in danger, and repented, and would have rescued him, they were thwarted and ruined by "the prophets" to whom they had enslaved themselves.

While a sentiment, national and remorseful, began to move some of the Covenanting nobles in favour of the king, first a prisoner at Holmby, then in the hands of the Independents of the army at Newmarket (June 1647), the Scots partially disbanded their own forces, keeping 6000 foot and 1200 horse. They retained the men and officers most under the influence of Argyll. They divided the king's price. On January 20, 1648, Argyll gave a power of attorney to Archibald Campbell to receive the £10,000 sterling awarded to him by the Estates of Scotland, "as part of the first £50,000 of the last £200,000 due to Scotland" for arrears of army pay. On June 8, 1648, an ordinance sent from the Lords was passed in the Commons, appointing £35,000 to be paid to Argyll; but the statements do not encourage us to be certain that the marquis ever got the money. Hamilton obtained £30,000, while the leading fanatics among the preachers—Blair, Dickson, Cant, and others—"began to live very sumptuously," says Guthry, whose evidence is always that of a partisan.<sup>61</sup>*

As to the embers of the Royalist rising, David Leslie drove Huntly into the wilds of Lochaber, where he was unwelcome to the Camerons; and then, meeting Argyll and Sir James Turner at Dunblane, Leslie moved against the Macdonalds in Kintyre. Turner reflected that, though Royalists, the Macdonalds had deserted Montrose, but forgot that he himself, though a Royalist, had fought for the Covenant. Trysting at Inveraray, Leslie marched into Kintyre, where Colkitto, "no sojourn he was, though stout enough," left the passes undefended. The levels of Kintyre suited regular forces, and Colkitto fled to Islay. He stationed 300 men at Dunavertie, a castle without any water supply, and left his father's garrison, also waterless, at Duniveg—"a mad prank." He himself retired to Ireland, where he perished in a brawl,—clearly enough Montrose's victories owed much to the valour, nothing to the tactics and strategy, of the brave Colkitto. The Dunavertie garrison yielded, by Leslie's command, "to the kingdom's mercy, and not to his"—"a nice distinction," says Sir James. They were then all put to the sword, Turner only succeeding in saving one young man. He never heard Argyll advise Leslie to take the usual Covenanting course; but David Leslie confessed to him that Argyll egged on Nevoy to pray and preach for massacre. Turner vainly pleaded with Leslie, for "Mr. John Nave" (Nevoy), a preacher, kept praying and preaching for cold-blooded butchery. Apparently Leslie thought that Nevoy represented "the mercy of the kingdom," and Turner believed that "he hath repented it many times since."<sup>62</sup>*

* As to Argyll, while Guthry gives him £30,000, and "for his friends £15,000," the Acts of Parliament (Scots) mention smaller sums in a different proportion (Act. Parl. Scot., vi. p. 643; cf. Willcock, 'The Great Marquess,' p. 188; and Cal. State Papers, 1648-49; vi. 149, 150).

Leslie next took Duniveg, that famous old Macdonald castle in Islay; the governor, however, old Coll, coming out to speak to a friend, was promptly hanged. In Mull, Maclean delivered fourteen "very pretty Irishes," who "had all along been faithful to him." Hanged! Sir Duncan Campbell was not, however, allowed to massacre the whole clan of Maclean; Argyll refused him that satisfaction.<sup>63</sup> The state of affairs after this quieting of the clans is tersely described by Sir James Turner, a man of the world, and a writer anxious for historic truth. Charles had reckoned the Scots as Montrosites, Neutrals, Campbellites, and Hamiltonians. Turner regards the Campbellites, backed by the Kirk, Leven, and David Leslie, as one party; the Hamiltons, with the brave Middleton's influence over the army, as the other. Hamilton's object was to disband the army; Argyll's faction argued that this could not be done. "Never so great danger as now, the king's person, which they were bound to defend by the oath of their Covenant (observe there was no former tie on them), being in the hands of the Independents, who were sworn enemies to his sacred person and to Presbytery." They added the danger from Huntly, who was * Turner had read Guthry's book in MS., and in an appendix to his own work criticises it severely. As to the massacre of Dunavertie, he writes: "It is true that David Leslie hath confessed it afterwards to several, and to myself in particular oftener than once, that he had spared" (would have spared) "them all, if that Nevoy, put on by Argyll, had not, by preachings and imprecations instead of prayers, led him to commit that butchery." Turner denies, however, Guthry's tale that Nevoy, Leslie, and Argyll walked over ankles in blood. Three hundred men could not make so great a puddle of blood on so hot a day, and "David Leslie never saw these men either dead or alive" (Turner, p. 240).

presently caught and put in prison. Argyll's party and the Kirk carried their point, and kept up part of the army,<sup>64</sup> but did not use it to secure the safety of the king.

The Scots Commissioners, through the autumn, had been dealing tediously with Charles, who, on November 14, escaped to Carisbrooke Castle in the Isle of Wight—a mere trap, as Hammond, the governor, would not permit him again to escape. In December he dealt with the newly-covenanted Traquair, representing the Commissioners; but the religious difficulty remained insuperable. On December 15 the king made new proposals; they were inadequate, but the Scottish Commissioners insisted that England should adhere to the Covenant, establish Presbytery, disband all forces, and give the king some authority over the militia and parliamentary veto. Near the end of the month, Loudoun, Lanark, and Lauderdale visited Charles at Carisbrooke. Lauderdale, the enthusiastic Maitland of earlier years, was now turning Hamiltonian, though still corresponding with Baillie as a bibliophile. It is curious to read his letters as a book collector in this crisis, and to note how the strong literary element in the House of Lethington mixes with the tortuous politics hereditary in the Maitland blood.<sup>65</sup> Unlike Lauderdale, Loudoun later reverted to the head of his clan, Argyll, in the coming tumults.

With the Scottish Commissioners Charles now came to a hapless compromise, which could never conciliate the Kirk. He would allow the Covenant to be forced upon no man, though he would guarantee the safety of those who had taken it already. He would give Divine Presbytery a three years' trial (as before), while an assembly of clergy, with twenty of his own nominees, were discussing its merits. He would suppress Unitarians, Independents, and sectaries in general. This was the blindness of folly. He alienated the friends of toleration and the army, while he insulted the deep-rooted superstition of the Covenanters. Discuss Presbytery, indeed—nothing could be more offensive! There were many other conditions and privileges to be granted to the Scots. The three Commissioners signed; and the foolish document, "The Engagement," was "lapped in lead," like the friends of King Pandion, and buried at Carisbrooke—"that sad place," say Loudoun, Lanark, and Lauderdale.<sup>66</sup>

Mr Gardiner calls "The Engagement" "dishonest from the beginning." The Engagers "wished to humble the Presbyterian clergy in Scotland" (small blame to them if they did), "though they deceptively posed as the advocates of Presbyterianism in England." It was a thoroughly Hamiltonian policy of feebly facing both ways, repentantly ready to be loyal, but still hoping to avoid a quarrel with the preachers. There were two possible ways—that of Montrose, and that of the Kirk and Argyll. Hamilton and his party tried to walk in both paths at once. Before this (December 17) Charles had heard of Huntly's capture, and vainly implored Lanark to save his life. He himself was presently a captive in strict confinement; the Houses would address their king no more (December 30). On January 24, 1648, the Scottish lords left London; they had been trying to arrange a Royalist rising in aid of a Scottish invasion.<sup>67</sup>

Now the Commissioners must try to get the Scots Estates, the Kirk, and the people to accept "The Engagement," and make a stroke for the king. "But in the Commission of the Kirk, Argyll carried all before him." Now the scene is changed; says Turner, "The king is in no danger; the Parliament of England, though Independent, and Scotland are good friends . . . the king hath not taken away Prelacy . . . neither were the Scots bound to defend his person by virtue of the Covenant, but in the defence of the true religion, which, according to their gloss, is Presbyterial government."<sup>68</sup>

So writes Sir James Turner, pointing out the casuistry which we noticed when first describing the Covenant. The argument, as Sir James remarks, contradicts the argument used by the same party, a few months earlier, against disbanding the Scottish army. "Here you see an army necessary and not necessary, for one and the same cause." But now Hamilton, or Callendar, not Leven or David Leslie, was to command the army. The Commissioners had let it be understood that the king would sign the Covenant: Baillie had his doubts, and Montreuil, now in Edinburgh, found the public overjoyed by the news of the king's imprisonment (January 18/28).<sup>69</sup> Having the greatest contempt for the good faith of the Scots, Montreuil declared that for another £100,000 ces gens d'honneur, Lanark, Lauderdale, and Loudoun, would have acquiesced in the imprisonment of their king. But Lindsay talked of fighting: the split among the noblesse of the Covenant was apparent.<sup>70</sup> Hamilton was bestirring himself, too late, but the preachers were crying that God was strong enough to punish the Independents, without Scottish assistance. Anything, any injury to the king, was more tolerable than to fight side by side with Amalekites. This idea of the ministers was presently to split Scotland into hostile camps.

Six Commissioners from the English Parliament had arrived in Edinburgh in February 1648, and a partial account of their proceedings has been left by Thomas Reade, their secretary for some weeks. Reade was a crypto-Royalist, and intrigued with the Engagers. He says that the Commissioners "left no way unattempted whereby to divide the Scots into parties, and to this end they bribed the Clergie, which, although I did not pay them the monie (that Captain Fox, their steward, did), yet I writt the letter to London, which certified that the Ministers had had their encouragement. . . ." * To bribe the ministers to a task so congenial seems a sinful English extravagance, but all the wealth of Indies would not have bought them to preach for the Engagers.

Montereul very naturally expected Hamilton to use this opposition of the pulpiteers—"the bellows-blowers"—as an argument for doing nothing, as usual, and saving himself.

Hamilton had not even this amount of common sense. For a disunited Scotland to make war was to increase beyond estimate the great peril of the king, and to woo defeat. The pulpit was much more powerful with burgesses, commonalty, and even lairds, than the modern press, because there is always an opposition press, but there was hardly a germ of an opposition pulpit. With the black coats against them, the Estates could not raise adequate forces, and the end was certain. Despite this temporary ruin, a great step was taken in the direction of civil and religious liberty when the Estates dared to oppose the despotism of the prophets. They were defeated, some died, more were ruined; still they suffered, however unworthy, in the good cause of political and personal freedom from prophets sitting in the seats of the Apostles.

Meanwhile, Argyll was holding council with Balmerino, Balcarres, and other precisians, and Montereul foresaw that, despite the difference of their tenets, the true blue Scottish Presbyterians would come to a friendship with the Independents of England, through their common hatred of royalty.<sup>71</sup>

A Committee of the Estates met on February 10, 1648, to hear the Commissioners. Little was done at first, and Lanark told Montereul that he looked forward to the inevitable ruin of the king and of the House of Hamilton. In fact, his own widow, from Worcester fight to the Restoration, is said to have been supported by one of her female servants.<sup>72</sup> On the 15th February, Loudoun explained "The Engagement," and Lauderdale proved that the Independents had broken the Covenant and all their treaties. Four things, he said, the English hated,—the Covenant, Presbyterianism, the Monarchy, and the Scots. Charles must have agreed with his English subjects on three points out of the four. The preachers complained that they ought to have been consulted, and some Hamiltonians remarked that the preachers would make them regret the bishops. Already some of the ministers had "vomited insults" against their king, and against those who would unite under his standard the sanctified victors of Philiphaugh and Dunavertie with Malignants that had drawn the sword for Charles.<sup>73</sup> One preacher, after denouncing the king, turned round and insulted as perjured traitors the English Commissioners who were present! He had not been bought! Sunday, with its political sermons and prayers, was the liveliest day in the week in Presbyterian Scotland; and every one must have regretted that he could not go to all the churches at once. Montereul was certain that the Prince of Wales should not leave France for Scotland—the Scots would either sell him or use him as a mere tool.

* Reade's Relation, edited by Mr C. H. Firth; Clarendon State Papers, 298 note; Miscellany of the Scot. Hist. Soc., vol. ii. p. 295.

When, on March 3, an Assembly of the Estates met, nearly fifty earls and lords appeared. Only a few "were for our way"—the anti-Engagement way, says Baillie; the most notable of them were Argyll, occasionally Loudoun (already trimming), Eglintoun, Balcarres, and Balmerino. In fact, the king's friends had a majority; even from the large towns the burgesses were for the king. The preachers then put out a printed declaration, of course on the other side, to be read in all churches.* The brethren were angry, for the hot-blooded Argyll had challenged Lindsay to mortal combat—they were to fight on the links at Musselburgh, a spot open to the observation of all mankind. The natural result was that these desperadoes were interrupted "before they began their play," says Baillie. The malicious Guthry declares that they had an uninterrupted hour for their play. "Why took they not their pastime?"<sup>74</sup>

Balfour writes that the seconds could not make Argyll fight till he saw Colonel Haddon coming up as policeman. "Then was he something stout, and refused to subscribe that paper,"—a written apology perhaps. The marquis was equally averse to signing the paper, and to taking off his coat and boots and fighting, "in respect of the coldness of the weather."<sup>75</sup> *

* A minute account of the weary dealings between the Commission of the Assembly and the Estates is in Mitchell, i., xxxiii. note i.

The events at this great crisis are full of curious matter, but space forbids more than the bare statement of results. Argyll, with eleven lords, and some thirty lairds and burgesses, proved recalcitrant to the proposals of the king's party; while Hamilton declared that though he had the majority in Parliament, the preachers had more influence with the country.<sup>76</sup> As Malignants came in, including the loyal Edward Wogan, the clergy grew more angry. From March to July the wrangle of the representatives of the State and of the Kirk continued, the preachers rejecting every attempt at compromise. Hamilton was not the man to take either of two feasible courses—to desist from his enterprise, which was merely fostering futile Royalist risings in England, or to seize the loudest preachers and lock them up in Blackness or Dunnottar. The attempt to win the preachers by proclaiming for Presbytery in England made the English Royalists "apprehend that the bondage would be the same, only the masters changed; and this made the king's party resolve rather to perish than receive any help from the Scots on these terms."<sup>77</sup> There was open war between Kirk and State. As early as March 27 Baillie had written, "I am more and more in the mind that it were for the good of the world, that churchmen did meddle with ecclesiastical matters only; that were they never so able otherwise, they are unhappy statesmen; that as Erastian Cæsaro-Papism is hurtful to the Church, so an Episcopal Papa-Cæsarism is unfortunate for the State."<sup>78</sup>

After May 11 the Estates began to levy forces, though very short of money, and vainly asking for aid from the queen in France. The preachers thundered against the levies; and, though Baillie feared that they would expose "the mystery of their own weakness," according to Turner he was himself as noisy as any of them. Montereul wrote (May 9/19), "the solemn curses which the ministers are uttering in the churches, against the army, and the orders they have sent to other preachers in the country to do the same, on penalty of losing their livings, will not prevent the forces from being levied."<sup>79</sup> "The whole west of Scotland cried up King Christ, and the Kingdom of Christ, thereby meaning the uncontrollable and unlimited dominion of the then Kirk of Scotland," says Turner, who was sent to reduce Glasgow to order.<sup>80</sup> He quelled a mutiny, and quartered troopers on the godly, doing more scathe than "James Graham" (Montrose), says Baillie. Turner imposed "Turner's Covenant"—a declaration of submission to Parliament. But the preachers held a field communion service, making "that peace so often inculcated, and left as a legacy by our blessed Lord to his whole Church . . . the symbol of war and bloody broils." Armed multitudes flocked to Mauchline to communicate, and numbered some 2000 horse and foot. Middleton charged the conventicle with insufficient forces: he and Hurry were wounded, but "the slashing communicants" retired when Callendar and Turner came up.

* 'General Assembly Commission Records,' i. pp. 393-412; Baillie, iii. p. 36; Guthry, p. 261. In 1649 a young student of Montrose's University, St Andrews, came into the hands of the General Assembly. The candid lad was accused of saying that "Argyll was infamous" for oppressions. He explained that he had, in fact, merely observed that Argyll "had not been famous," in a military way, "and in his not fighting with the Earl of Crawford whom Argyll himself had challenged . . . In this act he thought that Argyll's honour suffered much, which posterity could not but take especial note of." The youth also called Strachan, Argyll's led captain, "a notorious villain," so he was ordered to be flogged, but he took his name off and went down.

When the army invaded England at last, in August, they did so to face Lambert and Cromwell, while behind them were mustering all the no less hostile Westland fanatics and allies of the preachers and Argyll. Premature risings in England were crushed; Lanark in vain urged that the Scottish army should clear its rear by beating the western Scottish fanatics before crossing the Border. Lambert, in fact, had driven the loyal Langdale into Carlisle, and Langdale was asking for aid, while refusing to sign the Covenant.* Now it * Reade, already cited, avers that Sir Marmaduke Langdale had orders from Hamilton not to fight till the Scots came up. This was "a mere plot upon the English to hinder them from fighting, that they might not beate the enimie, and so destroy the intended designe of the Scots, for Sir Marmaduke was two for Lambert's one." Reade adds that he heard Lanark say, "I hope not," when a rumour came that Langdale had beaten Lambert. This was a common Royalist opinion, and Mr Firth cites to the same effect a tract of 1649, 'Digitus dei, or God's Justice upon Treachery and Treason, exemplified in the Life and Death of the late James, Duke of Hamilton,' Miscel. Scot. Hist., ii. 297, note 1. Musgrave's Relation (ibid. pp. 302-311) shows the distrust between the northern English cavaliers (who were asked to sign the Covenant) and the Scots. This was the cause of the Engagers' disasters and of the failure of Charles II. in his march to Worcester in 1651.

had been determined by the "Engagers," in a foolish hope of conciliating the preachers, not to unite with Amalekites; otherwise Montrose might have been brought over to help an army led by Hamilton and Callendar. But this was wholly out of the question. On July 8, with a General Assembly raging on their rear, and suspending loyal ministers (July 12–August 12), Hamilton crossed the western Border. "The half of our forces in Scotland were unlevied, and an enemy behind our hand, ourselves in a very bad condition, without money, meal, artillery, or ammunition," says Turner. Lanark was left with a force to watch the fanatics. The weather, as the Scots advanced, was wet; "Dear Sandy," that great artillery man, "was grown old and doted"; there was not one field piece with the wretched army.<sup>81</sup> Lauderdale, who had reverted to the ancestral Lethingtonian view of the tyranny of preachers, was hopeful, and Lambert fell back to hold the Stanemoor pass.<sup>82</sup> England was in a distracted state: the Prince of Wales was in the Channel with ships of war; Commons, Lords, and City were all at odds; but, as the Scots moved south, Cromwell was marching north.

Near Kendal the Scots held a Council as to their route on London. Turner was for a march through Yorkshire, an open country, as against the much enclosed fields of Lancashire, "full of ditches and hedges, which was a great advantage the English would have over our raw and undisciplined musketeers." The wolds of Yorkshire would suit the Scottish horse, and the old northern weapon, Dalgetty's "darling," the pike.<sup>83</sup> Hamilton preferred the route later taken by Prince Charles in 1745, and by the Jacobites in 1715. But Cromwell, with excellent artillery, was joining hands with Lambert near Knaresborough (August 13). Anxious to stop Hamilton, he left his guns behind, made a swift march in Montrose's manner across the fells westward, and reached the Ribble before the Scots, and before Monroe, with the Scottish army from Ireland, could join the Duke. "It was thought that to engage the enemy was our business," wrote Cromwell, like the soldier that he was. Callendar and Middleton, with the Scots cavalry, had reached Wigan, when, hearing of Cromwell's advance, Callendar left his command "in the air," and went back to consult Hamilton, who, on the 17th, reached Preston. Now Hamilton sent to Middleton, at Wigan, for the cavalry, and, as news came that Langdale was engaged with Cromwell on the north-west of Preston, a dispute as to tactics arose between Callendar and the Duke. Callendar prevailed, the Scots foot crossed the Ribble, to be on the same side of the river as their distant horse; and Langdale was left unsupported, except by a handful of horse under the Duke. Consequently, after a gallant and prolonged resistance to Cromwell's larger force, Langdale's infantry broke up; his horse fled north to join Monroe; Langdale himself, with the Duke, managed to cross the Ribble and join Baillie, who commanded the Scottish infantry.

Cromwell, advancing, drove the luckless Baillie south and still south. In his retreat to the south of the Ribble, the Duke had again and again charged, and did honour to his name. Turner highly praises his valour: "One more charge for King Charles," cried the Duke, who seems to have known his own incapacity for command, but who did not waver now when his person was in peril. It was Callendar, the false friend of Montrose, who persuaded Hamilton to send his foot across the Ribble. It was Callendar who opposed the military skill of poor Baillie and Turner, and urged a drumless march, the ammunition left behind, southwards, through the night. Now the victorious Cromwell, in Preston, was between Monroe on the north, and Hamilton on the south, but was trammelled with two or three thousand prisoners taken from Langdale. But, just as Hamilton had retreated, so Monroe would not advance. Middleton, with the Scots horse, missed the foot who were wandering to meet him, and Hurry was wounded and taken by Cromwell's cavalry in a skirmish. In the dark of the following night, Turner was wounded by one of his own pikemen, "being demented, as I think we all were." The Scots, in a nocturnal panic, attacked each other horse and foot. At Wigan, and Winwick, and Warrington the Scots, though superior in numbers, were so utterly unled (the real soldiers being hampered and confused by amateur superiors all at odds among themselves)—while Callendar was bidding Baillie surrender, Baillie was calling to any man to shoot him sooner—that Cromwell had an easy and complete victory. The Scottish infantry was captured: Hamilton accepted quarter at Uxbridge, where he and Callendar wrangled,—the Duke, thought Turner, had rather the better in the dispute. Callendar deserted, with half of the remaining forces, and had the unique good fortune to escape to Holland. The rest were dead, or prisoners, Hamilton being now near the block; he had ruined the king's affairs, and had not maintained his "activity for his own safety." The preachers, though Baillie thought that "the mystery of their weakness" was to be divulged.

- <sup>52</sup> 'Charles I. in 1646,' p. 50.
<sup>54</sup> Mitchell, Review Gen. Assemb. Com., i. 147-152.
<sup>55</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., vi. p. 634.
<sup>57</sup> 'Charles I. in 1646,' p. 49.
<sup>59</sup> Guthry, p. 238; Act. Parl. Scot., vi., i. p. 612.
<sup>60</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' p. 311.
<sup>62</sup> Turner, pp. 45-240.
<sup>64</sup> Turner, pp. 50, 51.
<sup>66</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' p. 327.
<sup>68</sup> Turner, pp. 50, 51.
<sup>70</sup> Montereul, ii. pp. 379, 380.
<sup>72</sup> Montereul, ii. p. 401, note.
<sup>74</sup> Baillie, iii. p. 36; Guthry, p. 261.
<sup>76</sup> Montereul, ii. pp. 430-432.
<sup>78</sup> Baillie, iii. p. 38.
<sup>80</sup> Turner, p. 53.
<sup>82</sup> Gardiner, iv. p. 166.
- <sup>53</sup> Baillie, ii. p. 391.
<sup>56</sup> Gardiner, iii. p. 182.
<sup>58</sup> Montereul, i. p. 439.
<sup>61</sup> Guthry, pp. 241, 242.
<sup>63</sup> Turner, pp. 48, 49.
<sup>65</sup> Baillie, iii. pp. 22, 23.
<sup>67</sup> Gardiner, iv. p. 56, note 1.
<sup>69</sup> Montereul, ii. pp. 376, 377.
<sup>71</sup> Montereul, ii. pp. 383-386.
<sup>73</sup> Montereul, ii. p. 404.
<sup>75</sup> Balfour, iii. p. 395.
<sup>77</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' p. 345.
<sup>79</sup> Montereul, ii. p. 479.
<sup>81</sup> Turner, p. 59.
<sup>83</sup> Turner, p. 62.

CHAPTER VII.

KIRK'S TRIUMPH. NATIONAL RUIN.

1648-1650.

It was the weakness of the Government, not of the Kirk (as Baillie had feared), that was demonstrated after the rout of Hamilton's forces. The country, or the people who swayed the country, the preachers, in short, were against the Government with its Parliamentary majority. From the pulpits alone did the populace hear a more or less educated statement of the points at issue, enforced by threats of excommunication in this world, and damnation in the next. Of the former penalty, even the leaders of the Parliamentary majority were afraid; they were also reluctant to shed kindred blood at home, and were overawed by English forces left by Cromwell to support Argyll. The result was that, in a few months after Preston, the Kirk and Argyll, with his backers Eglintoun, Elcho, the turncoat Loudoun, and the rest of the Opposition, were in power and in momentary alliance with Cromwell, Lauderdale being at the time of Preston on the seas with the Prince of Wales. The precisians gaily observed that the defeat of their loyal countrymen in England (August 17), fell on "St Covenant's day."

Loudoun, Eglintoun, and the preachers, no longer having the fear of Turner before them, gathered the country folk of the west, many of them armed with pitchforks and scythes, in the fashion of James Mòr's men at Prestonpans a century later. Ayrshire had not felt the hand of Montrose like Fife; and Argyleshire, and the western Whiggamores (from Whiggam, an exhortation to plough-horses), were ardent. Argyll raised what the claymore had spared of his clan; Cassilis with Ayrshire joined the forces at Linlithgow. The Committee of Estates, the patrons of the Engagement, thought that to attack the Whiggamores was merely to bring Cromwell on them, and, knowing that all Engagers were likely to be excommunicated and ruined, they simply looked to their own safety.<sup>1</sup> The fierce Earl of Arran (James Stewart), had he been alive and an Engager, would have laid the leading ministers by the heels, before crossing the Border to raise England and rescue Charles. Lanark was now for calling in Monroe's forces, seizing Stirling and Perth, and bringing down the clans against the fanatics in the following spring. The rest of the half-hearted Committee opposed him, and spoke of the peril of his brother, Hamilton,—whose doom, in fact, nothing could avert. The Committee sent men to "pack up the business" with the Kirk and her Scythemen; they negotiated; their surrender was certain. They deserted the gallant English Royalists under Musgrave, who had joined Monroe, and bade that leader turn them adrift at Berwick.<sup>2</sup> The Committee, in short, having now forsworn the Engagement, threw over the English who had risen on the strength of it; such was the behaviour of Covenanters in collision with the clerical interpreters of the Covenant.

At Haddington, Lanark, Lindsay, and Glencairn met the returning Monroe; Edinburgh was occupied by the Whigs, under Leven and Leslie; negotiations were going on, the ex-Engagers hurried to anticipate Argyll, who was seizing Stirling; Leven followed slowly after them. As Monroe was sending cavalry to pick up Argyll, that nobleman fled with his troopers, and made for the nearest boat on the firth; his Highlanders were cut down, drowned, or taken, to the number of about 700, "confounded with the suddenness of his withdrawing," which they ought to have foreseen by experience. The Castle of Stirling was, in fact, held by Norman Livingstone for the king; and Argyll was not the man to try to defend the town of Stirling, which probably was not defensible.

The craven Committee of Estates, despite this success, capitulated to the Kirk; Lanark standing out, and retiring north. Monroe's forces were ordered to return to Ireland, which was impossible, the Scottish commanders of the garrisons of Belfast and other towns having yielded to Monk. The men of Monroe, marching to Glasgow, were dispersed and maltreated by Whiggamores, whose sons, probably, had to deal with Claverhouse. The anti-Engagers, now Argyll's party, before the formality of a general election, constituted themselves the Committee of Estates; as some legally had been members of that Committee, subject to a declaration of approval of the Engagement, which declaration they had never signed.<sup>4</sup> They sent a grateful and friendly message to Cromwell, and (September 13) promised to surrender Carlisle and Berwick. To the English Houses they despatched Commissioners to show how trusty they were, and begged that Hamilton and other prisoners should be looked to closely. Thus the left wing of the Kirk was allied with "the bloody and blasphemous sectaries," who would have no Presbyterian government, and no Covenant. This was a sore cross to many good men.

Hamilton had been allowed a moment's interview with the king as his Majesty was being brought through Windsor to his trial. "My dear master!" was all that Hamilton could say. "I have been so indeed to you," answered the king, embracing him.<sup>5</sup> It is hard to believe that Hamilton was ever deliberately disloyal; but, like Charles, he had always "gone too near the wind." As a statesman he had no courage, no resolution; and he had kept fatally asunder the king and the one man, Montrose, who, if he could not have turned the tide, had at least made the cause glorious in the field.

On September 22 Argyll met Cromwell on the Tweed. Cromwell accepted the surrenders of English towns, and sent Lambert to Edinburgh with seven regiments of horse, securing "the peaths" by an infantry command at Cockburnspath. The new Whig Committee of Estates, "Christians and men of honour," said Cromwell, was now under foreign protection.<sup>6</sup> The Estates were to meet in January.

On October 4 Cromwell arrived in Edinburgh, where he dined with Argyll and Waristoun. It was later asserted, with gross improbability, that they discussed with Cromwell the execution of the king. It was publicly demanded by Cromwell that all Engagers should be removed from offices of trust; and he arranged that one of Eglintoun's sons should be given 2000 of the Preston prisoners, to be sold as recruits to idolatrous Spain or idolatrous France. This evinced little regard for the souls of 2000 Protestants; but it may have been reckoned that these were already lost for disloyalty to the Covenant,—not that this view can have occurred to Cromwell, who was no Covenanter. But there were no purchasers.<sup>7</sup>

It was during this visit to Edinburgh that Mr Blair (if we may believe Row, his biographer) spoke of Cromwell as a great liar and "a greeting" (weeping) "deevil."

The Parliament that met in Edinburgh on January 4, 1649, was, of course, Whiggish. How far it was representative of the Estates may be learned from the number of nobles present. There were but sixteen as against fifty-six, who had sat in the Parliament of March 1648. Great changes were made in the members for shires and burghs. The new members, of course, were elected, but the absence of hereditary peers proved that, as of old, the Opposition dared not attend a Scottish Parliament. Their Whig opponents were protected by English regiments, and the forces of the Engagers were scattered.

Loudoun the turncoat, Argyll, Eglintoun, Cassilis, Leven, and Balmerino (who had wavered about the Engagement) were in their places. Waristoun made "a long, tedious speech" against the Engagers. On January 5 Argyll "broke the Malignants' teeth," as he pleasantly said, by "a very long speech," arraying Amalekites into five "classes": 1. Statesmen; 2. Committee men; 3. Relapsed Malignants; 4. Promoters of the Engagement; 5. Petitioners in favour of the levies of the Engagers. Waristoun talked for two hours in the same style. The Scottish Commissioners now in London were Lothian, Chiesly, and Glendinning. This day (January 5) arrived their letter about Pride's Purge, "how above 160 members of the House of Commons were extruded by the blasphemous army," whose leader had so lately sat at meat with Waristoun and Argyll. The Commissioners in London asked the Estates how they were to act in the matter of the king's trial? Next day fourteen articles of instruction were drawn up. The Commissioners were to insist on the Covenant, and on intolerance, and to "give no occasion of offence." Difficult orders were these to execute! The Commissioners were not to justify the king's proceedings and actions, or do or say "what may import a breach, or be a ground of a new war." They were to ask the party in power to remember the promises made by quite another party at Newcastle; for, if the king be sentenced, misery and bloodshed will follow, "and how grievous it will be to this kingdom, considering his delivery up at Newcastle." But, all the same, "show that the king's last concessions are not satisfactory to us in point of religion."<sup>8</sup> Were these wavering instructions to go at once, or to wait three or four days till after a fast; the Whig party doted on fasts? Argyll and Waristoun were for delay, but were out-voted even in that assembly.

On January 25 a curious event occurred, showing the unfortunate position in which Argyll now found himself. He had fraternised with the leader of the sectarian army which was now about to slay its king ; but his preaching allies, the sole base of his power, while rejoicing in the king's fall, had a religious hatred of Cromwell's army of Sectaries. It was plain enough that Cromwell would put his hands in the blood of a Scottish king, and equally plain that the Kirk party would still clamour for the intrusion of Presbyterianism on England. War was at hand, a war of religious intolerance and of national revenge against England, which would give an opportunity to the Royalists and Engagers in Scotland. The Covenanters would be where the Engagers had been—would find Cromwell armed in their front, and their armed, domestic foes, the Royalists and Engagers, in the rear. Argyll, whose statesmanship had enslaved himself and the country to the Kirk (he was "the slave," and, apparently, "the unwilling slave of the Kirk," writes Mr Gardiner), must have seen that he ought, in prudence, to reconcile to the Kirk the Engagers, semi-Covenanters ; that he must gain the Prince of Wales, soon to be king, to the Covenant ; and must induce him to withhold or withdraw the commissions of the Royalists. As yet all this was impossible. The Kirk would fight against England as unpresbyterian, and yet would not join hands with the Engagers. A poor army would the Kirk have in its holy war for the Solemn League and Covenant, without the aid of Engagers or Royalists. Nor could the prince lend prestige, for certainly Montrose would prevent him from taking the Solemn League. At this time Montrose, having received from the Kaiser the title of field-marshal, had leave to raise, for the royal cause, independent companies in Flanders.<sup>9</sup> How was Montrose to be kept from influencing the prince against the Covenant and Solemn League? At this moment he had nearly abandoned hope of being serviceable : on December 3, 1648, he wrote to Rupert to that effect. As to raising levies, "there is nothing of honour amongst the stuff here." He had therefore intended to return to the Kaiser, but he is ready to "forego all, abandon all fortunes and advantages in the world," and sink with Rupert and the cause, "rather than save himself." The resolve was as fatal to, as it was worthy of, the great marquis.<sup>10</sup> How, Argyll may have asked himself, was Montrose's influence with the prince to be countered?

Lanark had not submitted to the abandonment of the Engagement, and he sent a Mr Mowbray to the Prince of Wales, as Hyde writes on December 5, to say that he would serve under Montrose, were it but as a sergeant. He would raise 10,000 or 12,000 men, and "make sure of the heads of the contrary faction," probably in the old Scottish way.<sup>11</sup> Montrose always distrusted the Covenanting Lanark, still more did he distrust Lauderdale, who had visited the Hague, had found Presbyterian fault with Charles's Anglican chaplains, and boasted of what the Engaging or Hamilton party would do. The problem was, is the prince to swallow the Covenant, and the Solemn League and Covenant, and Presbytery for England and Ireland, with Lauderdale and (Montrose suspects) with Lanark, or is he to stand by his honour with Montrose?

Rebuffed by Montrose, who would have no such sergent, Lanark came to Edinburgh in December, and renounced the Engagement. He was confined more or less strictly, while Lauderdale came quietly over from Holland, obviously in no danger. The Estates privately determined to arrest both Lauderdale and Lanark, while through Balmerino these lords were allowed to receive due warning. They therefore went abroad in the vessel which brought Lauderdale home, and returned to Holland, where they could act in unison with Argyll, and against Montrose.* If Mr Gardiner's theory be correct, Argyll had now secured in Lanark and Lauderdale secret semi-official representatives of his cryptic alliance with the Hamiltons to keep Montrose and Charles II. apart, and to win Prince Charles to be a perjured "Covenanted king." Whether Argyll wished him also to take the Solemn League vow, for forcing Presbyterianism on England, may well be doubted. The intrigue was clever, and succeeded in ruining Montrose, but it also entailed the disgraceful Covenanting defeat of Dunbar, the rending of the party of the Covenant, the conquest of Scotland, and the fall of Argyll. To such measures Argyll was reduced, because the slaying of Charles I., conspicuously certain before Lanark "escaped" (January 25), must inevitably break his alliance with Cromwell and the Sectaries, for, as Sectaries, the Kirk would war with them, and Argyll was thrall to the Kirk. Such was his statesmanship. The day was to come when Argyll should speak of his friends, the extreme precisians, as "madmen" (so it is reported), and he appears, as we have already noted, to admit that he himself at this time was little better. In his Instructions to his Son, he writes, "by that confusion my thoughts become distracted . . . whatever, therefore, hath been said by me or others in this matter, you must repute and accept them as from a distracted man . . . in a distracted time wherein I lived."<sup>12</sup>

* Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' p. 377. Burnet, of course, does not hint at collusion between Lanark and Argyll. Balfour, iii. p. 386. Balfour is equally innocent. Gardiner, 'Commonwealth and Protectorate,' i. pp. 18, 19, and notes, quoting Graymond to Brienne, Jan. 30/Feb. 9, Hare MSS., iv. 551, fol. 296, and Feb. 6/16, fol. 310, where "Graymond says that the Countess of Lanark had confirmed his suspicions." Montrose himself (Jan. 8, 1649) had heard of "new impostures." Napier, ii. p. 683.

Armed with the instructions of the Estates, Lothian and the other Scottish Commissioners thrice protested against the proceedings towards the king. "That comely head" fell beneath the headsman's axe on January 30. Argyll's Parliament had been quietly passing the Act of Classes, depriving of all manner of offices all "classes" of Engagers, also confirming acts against all such as deal with devils, or transgress the law of Dian. Never was a Parliament in Scotland so entirely under the sway of the preachers. Every man, from the ministers of state to deacons of crafts, who could be placed in the classes of Unlawful Engagers (three classes were now reckoned) was expelled from office, as well as every man found guilty of swearing, "uncleanness," drinking—or neglecting family prayers! If we believe what a Cromwellian soldier wrote, scarcely any person eligible for office can have been found. Moreover, nobody in the less guilty classes could be readmitted till he had "given satisfaction to the Kirk and the two kingdoms" (soon there was only to be one kingdom, the other became a Commonwealth). As Mr Mathieson observes, "The clergy were thus invested with an absolute veto on all public appointments, unlimited in duration, and as arbitrary as it was unlimited in scope." "They call any one a Malignant whom they please," said the Prince of Orange to Spang.<sup>13</sup> * The late learned and amiable Dr Mitchell, though apt enough to approve of the doings of the ministers, remarks that the Act of Classes became "the main source of the divisions and troubles in which the Church was torn asunder by various factions till its constitution was utterly overthrown."<sup>14</sup>

On January 30 Charles I. was murdered in public. On February 5 Charles II. was proclaimed king at Edinburgh, provided that, in accordance with the laws of God and of the realm, he took the Covenant and the Solemn League and Covenant.<sup>15</sup> This acceptance of Charles as king must mean war with England ; and Scotland must fight with one arm tied up, and with her head absent; for "Amalekites" could not be employed, and Montrose, the only military genius of the country, had a price set on his life, and had been given over by the Kirk to the Devil. Such was the position into which the Kirk and Argyll had led the country. They, "or some of them," as Waristoun confessed in Parliament (Feb. 27, 1649), had invited Cromwell to enter the country in September: soon he was to come without invitation.<sup>16</sup>

* Baillie, iii. p. 76.

To moralise on the death of Charles I. is superfluous. Nothing in life became him like the leaving it. He was the victim of the competing religious intolerances of his age, of the Tudor tradition of despotism, and of his own incapacity, as a man whose ply was taken under these influences, to see things as they were. What had been his father's security, the English throne, proved his death-trap. Had he been king of Scotland only, he could never have risked either the Revocation or the religious innovations. Now, not only had Tudor monarchs altered creeds at their will, but the fanatics of the Covenant broke with Charles because (among other reasons) he would not consent to alter the creed of England. To do that, they held, was right and necessary; to change the Presbyterian forms of Scotland was the greatest of crimes. This was a crucial example of what, instructed by time, we hold to be the stupidest of superstitions. Charles was intolerant of Catholics, of Presbyterians, of Sects; the Covenanters were intolerant of Catholics, and Episcopacy, and of Sects, till their most vehement party allied itself with the Sectarian Cromwell. In an age when all imposed their will, as far as they might, on the consciences of others (which had no right to exist), Charles acted like the rest of mankind. His great misdeed, the desertion of Strafford, he expiated by his blood and tears, and his sin has this palliation that he consented to Strafford's death because he dreaded danger to the queen. "The white king" died true to his conscience, and true to Montrose. A friend and a foe did not long survive him. Balmerino expired at the end of February 1649, and was buried in the chapel of Restalrig, in the land which his father won by the shameful forfeiture of the Logans (1609). Hamilton was executed shamefully on March 9, by the sanguinary tyrants who held sway in England.

Before studying the tangle of intrigue which followed the death of Charles I., we may ask, What had Scotland gained by the Covenant and the Solemn League and Covenant? She had dealt a blow to hated Episcopacy and loathed liturgy, north of Tweed. On the other hand she had obtained presbyters, for her ruin, far more dictatorial in civil matters, more intolerant in ecclesiastical matters, than the bishops had been. As to their interference in politics, we have seen much and are to see more, from their clamouring for the blood of prisoners of war to their purging of the army before Dunbar, and their denunciation of the measures adopted by the Estates in the Engagement. The General Assembly had not only "censured" ministers who would not go all lengths with them, but excommunicated, or threatened to excommunicate, such of the deposed as still did their work or received their stipends.<sup>17</sup> We have seen that James VI. prohibited ministers from preaching on certain subjects. The Assembly of 1648 dictated to them the topics on which they must preach. These were, among others, the errors of Sectaries, the errors of Erastians, "the unlawful Engagement,"—as "lawful" as the Estates and the king could make it—the sins of Malignants, and so on. The presbyteries were to detect ministers who avoided these topics, or were too "sparing" and "general" in their denunciations. Under such orders to be fanatical the saintly Leighton winced, and he went from his parish to see his father in England, when he could.<sup>18</sup> It is no great marvel that the Engaging army occasionally thumped the preachers who were thus denouncing them, though we appear to lack evidence in detail of these natural proceedings.<sup>19</sup> The Assembly, in brief, set the example of deposing, and even excommunicating, clergymen who did not share the views of the majority. It was obvious that new presbyter was old priest "writ large," and that preachers were not exceeded in intolerant intermeddling by bishops. Says Milton :—

new foes arise
Threatening to bind our souls with secular chains,
Help us to save free conscience from the paw
Of hireling wolves whose gospel is their maw.

In addition to other boons of the Kirk, the country had obtained the Westminster Confession of Faith, an amazing document which, writes Mr Hume Brown, has "produced that astonishing precision of thought regarding the mysteries of human destiny which has ever since been one of the national characteristics." If it is desirable to think with precision concerning matters about which nothing is known, then the Westminster Confession and the Shorter Catechism may be worth what they cost in blood and tears. The results, again, of the new Directory of Public Worship were, in practice, the increase of "conceived prayers," till even the Lord's Prayer fell out of use, and little was to be heard in church except the observations of the minister.<sup>20</sup> These, if the Assembly of 1648 was obeyed, must have been mainly political harangues, "stuffed with all the false reports of the kingdom," though the preacher might take an occasional "wipe" at witches, sectaries, and other sinners.

The practical fruits of all these improvements may be observed in a letter from an English soldier in Scotland (September 1650): "It is usual with the Scots to talk religiously . . . and the very next moment to lie, curse, or swear, without any manner of bounds or limits." This warrior had only found the virtue of hospitality in "the Lady Winton, a Papist." The beds in Scotland were filthy, "full of fleas and covenanters"—the English word for lice! To this had come the brotherly understanding, and thus did the blasphemous English deride the Covenant. The women are "dirty, and do all look like witches (if there be any such creatures), wherewith, by their frequent burning of them, it seems this country abounds (fourteen and sixteen being burned in a little village near Wadington (Mordington?) about a year since . . .). No table, window, or cupboard but slut may be written in large characters upon it. For the sins of adultery and fornication, they are as common among them as if there were no commandment against either. . . . Instead of having no other God but one, the generality of people . . . do idolise and set up their ministers, believing what they say, though never so contrary to religion and reason."

The preachers, from their pulpits, spread the usual tales of "atrocities," accusing the devout Cromwellians of "killing men, women, and children." Having examined the kirk sessions' books, this observer had documentary evidence to the frequency of "whoredom and fornication, the common darling sin of this nation." The poor live—men, women, children, and cattle—in filthy cottages, and can be evicted whenever their lairds are so minded. All this relates to Berwickshire and the Lothians. A soldier in a hostile country is no unprejudiced witness. But for the dirt we have Richard Franck's account in his angling tour, 'Northern Memoirs'; for the "darling sin" we have the kirk sessions' records; for the witch-burning, legal records; and for the preachers the annals of their General Assembly. Few forms of Christianity in the seventeenth century could afford to charge each other with cruelty. Puritans, Prelatists, Presbyterians, all tortured and burned witches; but the English sectaries in Scotland were horrified by Presbyterian ferocities.

The Edinburgh correspondent of the 'Mercurius Politicus' writes from Leith on October 23, 1652, that the English Commissioners for the administration of justice met on Wednesday last. Two confessed witches were brought before them, and were asked why they had confessed? They had been hung up by the thumbs and whipped by two Highlanders; lighted candles had been set to the soles of their feet and between their toes; finally, lighted candles were thrust into their mouths. Out of six accused, before being turned over to the English magistrates, four died of their torments. The English judges "ordered the ministers, sheriff, and tormentors to be found out, and to have an account of the ground of their cruelty." Other horrors, perhaps more ghastly, are recorded ('The Spottiswoode Miscellany,' ii. 90, 91; citing 'Mercurius Politicus'). When the ministers thus made torture, and torture of women, a thing as frequent as flagitious, we need not be surprised that rough soldiers under the Restoration applied, to the detriment of the preachers, the methods of which the preachers had set the example.

As to ordinary moral offences, sixty people accused of these were brought before the English Commissioners on one day, "most of them for facts done divers years since, and the chief proof against them was their own confession before the Kirk, who are in this worse than the Roman religion, who do not make so ill an use of their auricular confession. Some of the facts were committed five, six, ten, nay, twenty years ago."

Such were, according to English observers, "the inconveniences of Presbyterial government"; and the Iroquois modes of torture and the punishments for vice neither diminished the numbers of light o' loves nor of sorceresses. "Murthers are very frequent, but robbing and stealing more." Among other unfortunate victims we note George Sprot, a weaver in Eyemouth, probably a son or grandson of that George Sprot of Eyemouth, writer, who was hanged for his share in the Gowrie Conspiracy in August 1608.

Such was Scotland under Presbyterian theocracy.*

To return to the politics of the unhappy country: Sir Joseph Douglas was sent to Charles II., at his brother-in-law's court at the Hague, with news of his conditional proclamation. He should be king if he would be Covenanter.<sup>21</sup> Baillie (February 7) communicated with his cousin, Mr Spang, a Scottish minister in Holland. Spang obtained an interview with the Prince of Orange, and describes the state of opinion among Charles's friends. Montrose, though he had not offered his presence on account of the hatred borne to him alike by the Precisians and by Lanark, Callendar, and Lauderdale, now practically of their party, was ordered by Charles to meet Hyde (January 28, 1649).<sup>22</sup> Hyde himself was intriguing to escape from trouble by an embassy to Spain, whither he presently went, leaving Charles in bad hands. From Hyde, or otherwise, Montrose heard of the king's death. He fainted, and, on recovering, shut himself up for two days; his well-known verses, "Great, Good, and Just," written at this time, rather reflect his anguish of mind than his art as a poet.<sup>23</sup> Charles II. not only welcomed now, in his grief and wrath, his loyal supporter, but appointed him lieutenant-governor and captain-general in Scotland.† This (February 22) was two days after the arrival of Sir Joseph Douglas from the Scottish Estates, with promise of Commissioners to follow if Charles was likely to take the pledges of the Covenanters. Lanark and Lauderdale, with Callendar, Seaforth, Lord Sinclair, young Lord Napier, and the inscrutable Will Murray, were all at the Hague.

These Scots were in four factions! Montrose, Sinclair, and Napier, absolutely distrusting the Hamilton half-hearted party, * 'A Perfect Diurnal,' September 16-23, p. 505. In Gardiner, 'Charles II. and Scotland in 1650,' p. 134 et seq. Scottish History Society, 1894.

As to witchcraft, see the case of Lady Pittadro, sister of Sir John Henderson of Fordel, one of the leaders of the Fifeshire levies who were cut to pieces in their flight from Kilsyth. This lady was accused in 1649, and lay in the filthy Tolbooth of Edinburgh from July to December 1649, when she apparently found means to poison herself. There was a local witch mania in Inverkeithing, which was abated, according to tradition, when the wives of the magistrates were accused. Ross, 'Aberdour and Inchcolme,' pp. 339-341, citing an Act of Parliament of July 1649. One Walter Bruce, a preacher, was very active in this stupid cruelty. While the Sectarrians were averse to witch-burning, the process was not unusual in England at this time. Presbyterians may have been the persecutors. Several books on the side of mercy appeared in England at this time, but, for fifty years, mercy was deferred.

† 'Hist. MSS. Com. Report,' ii. p. 173; Wishart, pp. 229, 230.

wished the king to join Ormonde in Ireland; Callendar and Seaforth thought only of their own security; Seaforth had been the most fickle of double-dealers; Will Murray was the emissary of Argyll; and Lauderdale "haunts the Duke of Hamilton" (Lanark) "like a fury": these two, says Hyde, "abate not an ace of their damned Covenant in all their discourses." The English loyalists, Hyde adds, desired Montrose to be employed as "the man of the clearest honour, courage, and affection to his service."<sup>24</sup> But many of the Scots at the Hague "cut" Montrose when they met, though Lanark, two or three months ago, had offered, honestly or with a different motive, to serve under him even as a sergeant, and to get rid of "the heads" of the opposite faction.

Such was the condition of affairs when Spang wrote to Baillie (March 7, March 9, 1649). "Remit of your rigour," is the refrain of the sensible Spang. He cries for the abolition of the "Act of Classes," disqualifying all Engagers from all authority, for different periods, and under various humiliating conditions of restatement, after "satisfying the Kirk." But Spang will hear of no dealings with Malignants, Royalists who would shake off the League and Covenant, or with the English, such as Culpepper, and Hyde, with their scheme for Charles's descent on Ireland. Spang saw the Prince of Orange, who thought that Charles might more readily take the Covenant than the Solemn League and Covenant, which attacked the consciences of his Anglican adherents, and "required a delivering up of all Malignants." A Malignant, said the prince, was anybody whom the precise chose to call by that name, even if he were a Covenanter; and now the prince spoke his mind about the Act of Classes, lately passed. "Here, I profess, I was at a strait," says the honest Spang. The prince proposed an Act of Amnesty. Spang protests to Baillie against the tyranny of the constantly sitting Commission of the General Assembly. "Is not the liberty of the Kirk come to a fair market thereby?" The preachers were "casting out their brethren and bringing so many to beggary": the Government of the Restoration, later, merely followed their bad example.

Clearly a relatively moderate party was growing amongst the ministers, to develop into the Kirk as it should be after 1689. "I wish we used prudence, lest we open a door to tyranny, whilst we think to shut tyrants out of the Kirk." It was rather late in the day to arrive at such opinions. Spang makes one notable remark.

We have more than once noticed the clause in the Covenant binding to respect for the king's person "in the defence and preservation of the aforesaid true religion." The "bloody Independents" note that "hedge," says Spang, and declare that "their putting the king to a violent death is not against the Covenant, for they have put him to death not for his defending religion and the Parliament's liberties, but for going about the overthrow of both." Mr Spang adds, "Think of this."<sup>25</sup> Either the fighting Covenanters broke the Covenant, or it was so framed that they had no right to inveigh, as they did, against regicide. Such was the dilemma.

Meanwhile (Feb. 24) the Scottish Commissioners to the English Parliament who were intended to go to the king, charged the English House of Commons with breach of the Solemn League and Covenant, with the suppression of king and constitution, and, worst of all, with countenancing "ungodly toleration." Down with toleration, up with compulsory Presbyterianism and a covenanted king, such was the burden of their speech. Never were there such impossible diplomatists as they who followed the star of the Covenant. The Scottish Commissioners in England were setting out for Holland, when they were arrested and taken north to Berwick. The Rev. Mr Blair, of St Andrews, was one of these captives. He had been in London when the king was done to death. He was anxious, not only to attend Charles on the scaffold, but also to deliver his testimony thence in such terms that "he laid his account to die with the king, and would as willingly have laid down his head to the hatchet as ever he laid his head to a pillow." So says Row, minister of Ceres in Fife, Mr Blair's son-in-law.<sup>26</sup> Mr Blair, on the scaffold at Whitehall, were as romantic a figure as Athos, below it.

But, in practice, a different set of ideas prevailed. Cassilis, the Laird of Brodie, Alexander Jaffray, provost of Aberdeen (later a Quaker), with Wood, Winram of Liberton, and Livingstone, minister of Ancrum, were sent to the king at the Hague, while Huntly was decapitated at Edinburgh, as what is called an "object lesson" to Charles. This was the fate for Royalists who were not Covenanters (March 22, 1649).

The Commissioners began by asking Charles to put away Montrose, a bloody miscreant, who "continues in the highest contempt against God" (that is against the Scottish preachers), "under that fearful sentence of excommunication, without the smallest sign of repentance." Montrose valued their "fearful sentence" at less than a pin's fee.<sup>27</sup> How could anything but mischief come, when the negotiators thus denounced the leader who acted under the commission of the king's father, and had just received his own? Strange is the desire for a crown, that leads a man, and a young man as Charles was, to admit to his presence envoys who address him thus, and whose brethren, at home, are killing another of his father's servants, for no other crime than that service. Huntly, at his slaying, had been man enough to refuse to be relaxed from the excommunication of the Kirk, which could not affect him where he was going.<sup>28</sup> These fanatics, these parochial pulpiteers, pretended that what they bound on earth was bound in Heaven.*

The Commissioners at the Hague continued to insult Montrose, who "dishonours and pollutes all companies" (March 30). Charles said that he must see all their proposals before he answered the charges against Montrose. The Commissioners gave him, in a book, all the scriptures of the Covenant, Solemn League, and Westminster Assembly. He was to accept all these, and discontinue the English liturgy at family prayers. The Kirk Commissioners did this part of the work. Charles would accept the Covenant and the rest for Scotland; for England and Ireland he would not, without the advice of the Parliaments of these kingdoms. Baillie and his friends, in deep grief, recognised, and justly, the hand of Montrose in this refusal to put a yoke on the necks of the realms of England and Ireland. The refusal would involve the Scottish swearer to the Solemn League in perjury.<sup>29</sup> Montrose had told Charles (May 21) that for him to take the Solemn League meant "shame and ruin." It meant his desertion of Montrose, shame enough, Dunbar and Worcester were sufficient scathe. The Covenanters interfered with the king's domestic devotions: they had rebelled against his father because "they but imagined that he intended to meddle with them in the like kind." "They murder those of your best subjects, while they pretend to treat with your Majesty's self. . . . Trust the justice of your cause to God and better fortunes."<sup>30</sup> For the moment Charles listened to honour and Montrose. The Commissioners returned to Scotland empty-handed, happier than they who, a year * Huntly's estates, by the way, "were forfeited and, like the Bishopric of Argyll, conveyed to Argyll." Argyll, at his trial in 1661, protested that he had done his best to save Huntly, and had protected the interests of the family. The Huntly estates were deeply in debt to Argyll. Willcock, pp. 226, 227. 'State Trials,' v. 1426-27.

later, brought a perjured prince to see the mangled remains of the noblest of his servants.

Scotland had now a short space in which it ought to have passed an act of amnesty, and united all its children in the common cause of resistance to her "auld enemy of England," and "the bloody and blasphemous sectaries." From the middle of August 1649 to the end of May 1650, Cromwell was subjugating Ireland, and reaping the laurels of massacre at Drogheda and Wexford. If Scotland was not to taste of the same mercies, as she did, Scotland should have put her house in order, thrown over the Covenant, and united her sons. But the preachers and the spirits which they had raised made any such course impossible. They desired a Covenanted king, which meant, in this case, a wilfully perjured king, as a kind of royal figurehead to a Covenanted government. Their proceedings must be stated with brevity. The king sent Montrose to the European courts, as Monsieur Thiers went the same circuit in the Franco-German war of 1870. Cottington and Hyde begged in southern, as Montrose did in northern Europe, to no purpose. On June 12 Charles wrote to Montrose, from Breda, "I will not determine anything touching the affairs of that country" (Scotland) "without having your advice thereupon. As also, I will not do anything that shall be prejudicial to your commission."<sup>81</sup> These promises the king broke, taking the Covenants which he never meant to keep, and permitting Montrose to fall into the hands of those who executed, generally, all prisoners who bore the commission of their king.

From this period till December, while the Covenanters were trying, through Winram of Liberton, to bring Charles into their net, Montrose was amused by the loyal and lively letters of Elizabeth, sister of Charles I., the Winter Queen of Bohemia. This undefeated lady, once so dear to Protestants, was a true Pantagruelian, and through a lifetime of heartbreaking misfortunes, laughed at destiny. A portrait of Montrose, probably that noble one in sable armour, by Honthorst, she received, welcoming it as sovran "to scare the brethren." She sent the marquis, by way of entertainment, a proclamation against "that detestable bloody murderer and excommunicated traitor, James Graeme," and against Lords Morton and Kinnoul. Them Montrose had sent to occupy a strong position in Orkney, where he could join them later and march south. They both died ere his unhappy arrival, and Montrose's smile at Elizabeth's badinage must have been bitter, for he knew, no less than Jeanne d'Arc had known, that he was going to his doom.<sup>82</sup> Living with "crowned heads," weak as "the unavailing heads of the Dead" in the Odyssey, Montrose had applications from Scotland, full of sanguine promises, "entreating and pressing him earnestly" to come, "all men being weary and impatient to live any longer under that bondage, pressing down their estates, their persons, and their consciences." The Covenant rode them like the Old Man of the Sea; but they had not the heart, it proved, to rise in arms.<sup>83</sup> They served the Earl of Argyll in the same fashion in 1685.

Winram's mission from the Covenanters occupied time from November 1649 till February 1650. The Hague was the haunt of the half-hearted worthless leaders of the Engagement, Hamilton (late Lanark), Lauderdale, Callendar, the chief cause of the débâcle of Preston, Sinclair, and the rest. They were entreating Charles to abandon "one man, a bloody excommunicated rebel,"—Montrose—the one man who stood between him and perjury, and also between Hamilton with his party, and their homes and lands. So wrote Wishart to Lord Napier, then at Hamburg (January 1, 1650).<sup>84</sup> Seaforth was one of those who pressed Montrose to come to Scotland, where he dared not be himself, for the treble turncoat was a thing of words.

Winram had paved the way for the arrival of new Commissioners from the ruling party of Argyll and the preachers. Of all Charles's advisers only Nicholas, his father's old secretary, declared that "honourable terms were inconsistent with the abandonment of Montrose."<sup>85</sup> Relatively honourable it would have been to abandon Montrose, giving him fair notice, for the field-marshal of the Kaiser had employment enough, and friends enough, in Europe. But Charles preferred to send Montrose to wage war in Scotland, while he dealt with the dominant party for Commissioners to come to Breda and treat for peace. The king (January 12/22, 1650) wrote from Jersey to tell Montrose what he was about. Nothing, not "the treaty we expect," is "to give the least impediment to your proceedings." These "proceedings" "will be a good means to bring them to such moderation in the treaty" as Charles desires. He promises that he will not, "before or during the treaty" (that is, the negotiations), do anything contrary to Montrose's authority. "Proceed vigorously and effectually."<sup>86</sup> In a private letter, Charles promised, on the same date, that his friendship would never fail.<sup>37</sup> He also sent Montrose the Garter,—the George and Ribbon are still in the possession of his posterity.

Montrose set forth: he soon knew what must befall him. Royalists in Scotland, such as they were, would not join an "excommunicated traitor," with a price on his head; while the king, at Breda, was palavering with Commissioners from Kirk and State who would insist on his swallowing the Covenants and abandoning Montrose. It may be an excuse for Charles that he believed in golden reports about the men and arms whom Montrose had gathered and recruited in Scandinavia and Northern Germany, and in 20,000 men in buckram, promised by the Scottish dreamers, before they knew that the king was treating with the Covenanters.* At last, after long delays from stormy seas, Montrose reached Kirkwall in March 1650; having by this time received the Garter, and the king's commands and assurances of January 12/22. On March 26 he wrote from Kirkwall to Seaforth (in safety across the sea), "I am going to the mainland, . . . and shall live or die, your cousin," etc. "Montrose," says Mr Gardiner, "was far too experienced a soldier not to be aware that few, if any, of the professing Royalists of Scotland would rally round the king's standard in the hands of a man whom the king might at any moment disavow." He answered Charles's letter of January 12 on the same day as he wrote to Seaforth (March 26)—he had received it on March 23. But even if Charles and the marquis had been in telegraphic communication, matters were so managed that Montrose was doomed. He knew this and wrote, acknowledging the Garter, "with the more alacrity and bentsell" (vigour) "shall I abandon still my life to search my death for the interests of your Majesty's honour and service." For the last time he bade Charles "be just to yourself," for he knew that the Scottish Commissioners, and the whole Hamiltonian crew, would be urging and cajoling his king to perjure himself. He ended—

"Your Sacred Majesty's most humble, faithful, and most passionate subject, MONTROSE."

The letter reached the king: it is endorsed by Nicholas.<sup>38</sup>

* Letter of Jan. 20/30. The 20,000 had been promised long before. Carte, 'Original Papers,' i. pp. 345-351. Other even more shadowy "hopes," are named by Nicholas to Ormonde, ibid. i. pp. 358, 359.

Charles, at Breda (where the Covenanting Commissioners were), on April 15, bade Napier continue to assist Montrose.<sup>89</sup> On May 1 Charles signed the Treaty of Breda, submitted to all dishonour, and presently (May 12/22) was about sending Sir William Fleming to bid Montrose lay down his arms. "We hope . . . that we shall be able, in a little time, to make his peace in Scotland." "I do not despair of doing it in a little time."<sup>40</sup> And he "did it," Charles did it, by a message of May 3/13 to his Parliament, in which he says that he "has now given satisfaction to your Commissioners," and "recommends very particularly" that such conditions shall be made for his forces in the north "as shall be reasonable and necessary to free the kingdom from these troops, according to our positive and express order in that behalf." (For details, see Note at the end of this chapter.)

"Our positive and express order," as if "we" could order anything! Not a word is said of Montrose, a knight lost in a bungled game of political chess: lost and unregretted. For Montrose, on May 21, after Charles had not even dared to name him in "our positive order," had gone where Jeanne d'Arc went, carrying, like her, "fidelity and honour to the grave." Like her, loyal; like her, for a year victorious; like her, deserted; like her, insulted by brutal soldiers, and vexed by professional Church or Kirk men; the great marquis had passed into his rest.

Of the Action of Montrose I have written in detail, on his Passion ("Action and Passion" he had promised to Charles I.) I have no heart to dwell. On April 9 he sent Hurry (the man of the Incident—his beaten opponent at Alford) to occupy the Ord of Caithness, a hill above the sea, just north of the village of Helmsdale, at the mouth of the pleasant Helmsdale river. Montrose joined Hurry there; his banners, with the bleeding head of Charles I., and his own device—a lion about to leap a chasm—floated over 40 horse, 500 foreign mercenaries, and 700 raw Orcadian levies. The Orcadians had long ceased to be a warlike people. Montrose now advanced by the route of the railway of to-day, his purpose being to join hands with Seaforth's clan. The Earl of Sutherland was hostile, his castle of Dunrobin, with other forts, was strongly held, and Montrose turned up the valley of the Fleet, where the river, as it approaches the sea, lies in deep black pools, under lofty banks.* Turning to his left from Strath Fleet, Montrose cut across the peninsula, and struck the Oykel where it is fordable, above the Kyle, a long narrow estuary receiving the waters of Oykel, Shin, and Carron.

* "The Mound" did not yet exist.

Here he should have met Seaforth's men, from the south, in rugged country, unsuitable for cavalry. But not one Mackenzie rose. Seaforth, who was with Charles, knew too much to bid his clan rise for the paltering king; or his brother, Mackenzie of Pluscardine (near Elgin), had lost heart. Montrose was deserted.

Against him Leslie was sending Colonel Strachan, with such forces as he could muster. Strachan, whom Balfour describes as the son of a brewer at Musselburgh, was said to have been remarked on, in 1649, by a St Andrews student, as a "notorious villain to his country and Presbyterian government."<sup>41</sup> Blair says that, according to the Engagers, Strachan joined the English army with Cromwell, when the Duke of Hamilton invaded England.<sup>42</sup> Guthry declares that, as soon as the Engagement Parliament rose, Argyll sent Strachan to Cromwell, to ask for an English force that might join the Argyll and Kirk party. "This was represented to the grand committee . . . but the duke slighted it."<sup>43</sup> Strachan, as a suspected Independent, had been under the notice of the Kirk, but had signed the Solemn League. In a letter to the Rev. James Guthrie, an extreme fanatic, he says, "If James Graham lands near these quarters he will suddenly be de—ed" ("defeated" or "disappointed"?).* Strachan prophesied truly, and though later he was "delivered to the Devil" by the Kirk, he now overthrew the excommunicated Montrose.

On April 24 Montrose was at Carbisdale on the south side of the Kyle; the place is visible from the railway bridge which spans the estuary near Invershin. Behind him was the hill of Craigcaoinichean, which local people, and the ordnance map, render the "Hill of Lamentation" (a name that might be older than the defeat of Montrose), but which is usually translated "The Mossy Hill." It was sparsely overgrown with wood. Except 400 Rosses and Monroes, not resolute fighters, Strachan had with him but 240 horse of Leslie's army, and 40 musketeers. They were enough. The rise and fall of the ground, Gordon of Sallagh says, and the luxurious broom in a corrie, lent Strachan cover.<sup>44</sup> He cleverly left one troop in view; Montrose's patrol of horse took them for the whole array of the enemy. Montrose began to align his troops; Strachan then drew his cavalry from cover, and broke the half-formed untrained ranks of Montrose. The Orcadians ran; the foreign mercenaries were cut down on the hill, where the wood was too thin for their protection.*

* Wishart, p. 303. The date of this letter is dubious; Mr Gardiner thinks it is June 3, 1649.

Young Frendraght, who was wounded and taken to his uncle's house, Dunrobin, is said to have given Montrose his own horse. He had no line of flight except up the very difficult Strath Oykel. He might have headed for Ullapool, but, wherever he went, the price on his head was apt to allure some scoundrel. He threw off, or concealed, his cloak, and the Star of the Garter; he appears to have adopted a rustic disguise, and of the miseries of his flight, little is known and we prefer to know little. Kinnoul, who was with him, vanishes from our ken, the foxes and eagles alone could tell the tale of the end of Kinnoul. Sallagh says that the marquis was welcomed to milk and bread, "in a cottage in that wilderness," still so desolate. It may have been here that Montrose, escaping a party in pursuit by hiding under a trough, exclaimed, on their departure, that he had endangered his hosts, and "determined never to do the like again to avoid death of which, he thanked God, he was not afraid." †

After crossing the watershed on the westward way, Montrose reached Loch Assynt, a long lake stretching from the Inn of Inchnadamff, westwards, towards the sea at Loch Inver. Macleod of Assynt had been, in Montrose's knowledge, Seaforth's man, and, now and then, a Royalist. He was at present, however, one of Sutherland's "tail"; and Sutherland, Sallagh tells us, had made him sheriff depute. He seized Montrose, and gave him up to the pursuers. Assynt's position is that of Sir John Menteith, who gave up Wallace to the English. Assynt and Menteith had both changed sides; both held office under their new masters; one surrendered Montrose, and the other Wallace, taking rewards for the blood of * "Scroggy wood," Balfour's phrase, means low scattered underwood. Balfour, iv. p. 9. See Mr Gardiner, 'Ed. Rev.,' Jan. 1894, for Balfour's authority. See Sallagh, in Gordon of Gordonstoun, pp. 554, 555, and Wishart, pp. 304-309, note by the editors. Gardiner, 'Com. and Prot.,' i. pp. 237-243.

† Miscellany, Scottish History Society, vol. i. p. 223. The tradition was written down, in 1792, by George Marsh, who had it from his mother, née Milbourne. The Milbourne of 1650 is described as wealthy. No trace of him or his exists, hence, if the story is true, the host of Montrose may have been an honest cotter, whose descendants attributed to him wealth and "gentrice."

BATTLE OF CARBISDALE

April 27, 1650.

Strachan's March.

English Miles

these heroes. Assynt and Menteith, conscientious men, discharged a painful duty, let us say. It was, in the same way, the duty of Kingsborough and Lady Macdonald, ninety-four years later, to arrest another valuable fugitive, Prince Charles. But blind to duty, indifferent to a reward of £30,000, content with honour and humanity, they helped the Wanderer to escape. Not so Assynt. "The hare kindles on his hearthstane" in his ruined castle beside Loch Assynt; and there will ne'er be a Macleod of Assynt again. The lands of Neil Macleod were handsomely raided, in revenge, by the Mackenzies (who had no right to feel virtuous indignation), the Mackays, and Glengarry. After the Restoration, Neil being tried for his behaviour to Montrose, pleaded an alibi; then why, in 1650, did he claim the reward for what he had not done? It was partly paid in sour oatmeal, proverbially remembered.*

We do not love to study too closely the Passion of Montrose. By his Presbyterian countrymen he was insulted as was Wallace by the English.<sup>45</sup> He was mounted on a rugged sheltie, under which his feet were tied. He was preached at, the usual text about the slaughter of the Amalekites being selected. "Rail on!" said the marquis. In Dundee the burgesses honoured themselves and their sense of Christian charity by supplying him with clothes "suitable to his birth, place, and person." On May 18 Montrose was driven by the hangman through Edinburgh, in a cart. At the door of the Tolbooth he gave the man drink money. He had received and read his sentence, that of hanging, the most shameful death. Being a proclaimed "traitor" he had no trial, any more than the Earl of Argyll had in 1685. The people were expected to stone him, and his hands were bound that he might not shield his face: the people threw no stones. The cart was halted before Moray House in the Canongate, where Argyll had dined with Cromwell. Now Argyll, Waristoun, and Lord Lorne with his young bride, looked down on Montrose in the hangman's cart. Argyll had the decency to cause the blinds to be partially closed<sup>46</sup> (Graymond to Mazarin, May 23, 1650).

Montrose turned his face towards them; an Englishman cried out that for these seven years bygone they durst not look him in the face. †

* See Wishart, Appendix xiii., an interesting essay by Messrs. Murdoch and Morland Simpson.

† Wigton MS. in Napier, ii. p. 779.

The author of this account makes the Argyll party “creep in at windows.” But, if Graymond, in his report to Mazarin, is right, they were only peeping out from behind a half-veiled window. If that was so, they probably retired before the eyes of Montrose. Lorne, in 1685, went the via dolorosa on which the marquis had preceded him.

In prison the captive was baited by preachers. He cast their charge of breaking the Covenant back upon them, says Graymond; “he had maintained the principles of the Covenant, in terms of his oath.” It was so—he “took the oath without the gloss.” He was to be hanged on Monday, May 20. By eight of that day the preachers flocked about him, James Guthrie among them, like ravens round a fallen stag. Montrose listened courteously to Guthrie; his reply was that of a Cavalier, “airy and volage”—dealing with erudite divines, he made some quotations from the Latin. As to his employment of the Irish, they were, he said, the king’s subjects. Then, with a flash of humour, “we see what a company David took, to defend him in the time of his strait.” “He did all that in him lay to keep” his men “back from bloodshed; if it could thereby have been prevented, he had rather it had all come out of his own veins.” The Covenant he had taken and had kept. “Bishops, I care not for them. I never intended to advance their interest.” He had merely opposed the Covenanters when, under the Solemn League, they attacked the king in England.

Threatened by Guthrie with the posthumous results of dying excommunicate and unrepentant, he said that he would never declare “his duty” to have been “his sin.” Their crazy superstition that what they “bound on earth, God will bind in heaven” (so Guthrie put the case), was nothing to Montrose.* He told his keeper that there was no need to deprive him of a knife, lest he should commit suicide. He had foreseen the end, “and if my conscience would have allowed me, could have dispatched myself.” They would not permit him to be shaved; he said, “I would not think but they would have allowed that to a dog.” Informed of his sentence, he said, “It becomes them rather to be hangmen than me to be hanged.” Trail, in his Diary, writes that to the ministers he said, “I pray you, gentlemen, let me die in peace.” He was rated by Loudoun, that turncoat, in presence of the Estates. He defended his movement from Orkney: it was "by his Majesty's special direction and command, in accelerating of the treaty." How true that was we know. "At the reading of the sentence, by Waristoun, he lifted up his face," silently. He was clad in "a scarlet coat to his knee, trimmed with silver galoons, lined with crimson taffeta," the rest of his apparel black, with carnation hose, garters, and roses in his shoon. "With a great deal of courage and modesty, unmoved and undaunted," says Balfour, he listened to the insults of the traitor Loudoun.*

* From an eyewitness, the Rev. Patrick Simson, to Wodrow. Mr Simson lived till 1715. Napier, ii. pp. 785-788.

Everything was ready. "A great trinket prick had been made for James Graham's head." By a happy economy it also served later for that of Archibald Campbell, Marquis of Argyll.

To the gallows Montrose, says an eyewitness, writing as he looked on, went like a bridegroom. "I never saw a more sweeter carriage in a man in all my life . . . he is just now a turning off from the ladder." He had addressed the people. "It is spoken of me that I would blame the king. God forbid. For the late king, he lived a saint and died a martyr. . . . For his Majesty now living, never any people, I believe, might be more happy in a king. His commands to me were most just, and I obeyed them." Were most just! It is the "noble lie" of Plato: the commands were most unjust as regarded the hero. Montrose knew it well, but, like Jeanne d'Arc, to the last he defended the honour of his king. "The ministers, even on the scaffold, were very bitter against him."

He would not deign them word or sign,
But alone he bent the knee,
And veiled his face for Christ's dear grace
Beneath the gallow tree.

He had made his peace. To the weeping hangman he gave some gold, the last gift of a lavish hand. Wishart's book, the record of his deeds, was tied about his neck—he loved it more, he said, than his Order of the Garter. "And so, with an undaunted courage and gravity," he met his doom. Mr Gardiner, not an effusive writer, truly says, "Great in life, Montrose was even greater in his death."

The dead can still be insulted. His comely head with its love-locks was placed on the appointed spike. His trunk was buried where felons were laid, in the Borough Moor. His limbs were exhibited, one here one there, and Charles II. must have beheld some fragments of the hero whom he had sent to die. His heart, rescued by the Napiers, and kept in a silver case, had a history as romantic as his own, in perils of war by land and sea.

* For Montrose's speech, from the Wigton MS., see Napier, ii. pp. 794-796. It corroborates Balfour's statement that he declared he came "by his Majesty's just commands." "Be not too rash," he said, and appealed them before the Court of Heaven.

Not for Montrose, felix opportunitate mortis, was to be the spectacle of chicanery, hypocrisy, and perjury; of defeat and ruin; of return to a loveless life with harlots and jesters, that awaited the king for whom he died. What place was there for Montrose in the satyr rout, or among the dull misgovernors of the Restoration? He was not born, like Lauderdale, to be the butt of the filthy practical jokes of Charles II., or to hunt brave ignorant peasants, like the later "glory of the Grahams." He had carried fidelity and honour to the grave. He had as deliberately chosen the path of honour, with certain death before his eyes, as did Jeanne d'Arc when her Voices foretold her fate in the fosse at Melun.

---

NOTE TO CHAPTER VII.

Charles II. and the Death of Montrose.

DID Charles II., while treating with the Scots at Breda, allow Montrose to persevere in his hopeless and fatal expedition, merely that a movement in the north might induce the Covenanters to offer milder terms? Next, when Charles decided to dishonour himself by signing the Covenants, did he exact any assurances from any one for the safety and liberty of Montrose? Lastly, did Charles, when he heard of Montrose's defeat at Carbisdale, basely disown him, in a letter to the Scottish Estates, and deny that he acted by royal orders and under royal commission?

The extreme candour of Mr Gardiner's mind induced him to take the most favourable view of the conduct of the young king. Mr Gardiner's statements we must examine. At the end of 1649, he says, Montrose, then at Gothenburg, "had the prospect of reaching Scotland with a force" (of foreign mercenaries) "not altogether contemptible, at least as a nucleus for the native troops which he expected to rally round him."<sup>1</sup> Montrose did not reach Kirkwall till "some time before March 23," 1650. At Kirkwall he received a letter written by Charles, in Jersey, on January 12/22, 1650. In this letter Charles informed Montrose that (contrary to his advice) he was about to negotiate with the Covenanters, but that Montrose must not apprehend from the treaty "anything to give the least impediment to your proceedings"; on the other hand, "vigorous proceeding will be a good means to bring them to moderation." Neither before nor during the "treaty" (that is, the negotiations at Breda) will Charles do anything contrary to the powers conferred by his commission on Montrose. This letter the marquis had leave to publish. In a private letter (January 12/22) Charles added, "nothing shall make me consent to anything to your prejudice."<sup>1</sup> The king also sent to Montrose the Garter. Such were Montrose's last commands from Charles, and, receiving them, he knew that his doom was dight. There could be no powerful rising to aid Montrose while the king was in treaty with the deadly enemies of the marquis. The letter of Charles "cut Montrose to the heart," says Mr Gardiner.<sup>2</sup> He replied (March 26) that "I would abandon still my life to search my death for the interests of your Majesty's honour and service," and warned Charles to be "just to himself,"—to remember his honour. Montrose then rode to his doom.

<sup>1</sup> 'Commonwealth and Protectorate,' pp. 190, 191 (1903).

Meanwhile Charles's letters of January to Montrose had been published in France, and in the English newspaper, 'A Brief Relation,' of February 19, 1650. The Covenanted Estates in Scotland thus knew exactly the relations between Montrose and Charles, knew that the marquess was acting by the king's commands and under his commission.<sup>3</sup> Charles, it is important to note, could not possibly hope later to deceive the Estates by denying that Montrose acted on his commission. The thing was public, and was much discussed.

Before Montrose himself received the royal letters, the king was negotiating at Breda with the relentless Commissioners of the Covenant. On May 1 he signed a draft Treaty, abandoning honour and promising to accept the Covenants. How Montrose sped, Charles then knew not.

At this point Mr Gardiner writes, "There can be no doubt that before the king signed the draft agreement" (May 1) "he had received assurances that if Montrose would lay down his arms, not only he and his troops but the Scottish Royalists in Holland should receive complete indemnity." But Montrose had been defeated on April 27, before Charles signed the draft Treaty of May 1. If the alleged "assurances" were really given, they applied "in case Montrose would lay down his arms," they would not apply to a captive with no arms to lay down.<sup>4</sup>

Again, who had power to give Charles assurances of an indemnity for an excommunicated Malignant and proclaimed "traitor" like Montrose? What power in Scotland could thus beard the Kirk? Certainly, we might think, not Argyll, "enslaved" to the Kirk, as Mr Gardiner says that he was.

However, Mr Gardiner, defending Charles II., avers that he did not desert Montrose: "there can be no doubt that . . . he had received assurances of . . . complete indemnity." He goes on, "though the evidence is far from complete, there are reasons for thinking that these assurances were given, not by the official Commissioners" (at Breda), "but by Will Murray acting as Argyll's agent." Now Mr Gardiner publishes a document proving that the indemnity was "by the king's agreement with the Scots Commissioners." Will Murray, "Argyll's agent," we know was accused of pocket-picking, and was a man odious to Montrose. Even if he conveyed, as Mr Gardiner thinks, assurances from Argyll for Montrose's safety, the king ought to have known that such assurances were not valuable. Argyll had no power to give them; none to enforce them if given, for the Kirk would cry aloud for Montrose's blood, and the Estates had ever fed these ravens with the flesh of Cavaliers. This much, however, might be said for Charles; when his father was in the hands of the Scots at Newcastle he had arranged for

<sup>1</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 752, 753.

<sup>2</sup> 'Commonwealth and Protectorate,' i. p. 208.

<sup>3</sup> 'Commonwealth and Protectorate,' i. p. 192.

<sup>4</sup> 'Commonwealth and Protectorate,' i. p. 206.

the safe departure of Montrose when he disbanded. The safety was, after all, only secured by a stratagem on Montrose's part, but, if Argyll now gave assurances through Will Murray (which is Mr Gardiner's theory), Charles II. may have supposed that what had happened before might happen again, and that Montrose, after disbanding, might get safely away.

Mr Gardiner, at all events, from a letter of Charles to his envoy, Sir William Fleming, in mid May 1650, infers that Charles "had got a promise from a person like Argyll, whose real influence he was certain to overrate." In the circumstances which Mr Gardiner supposes to have existed—private dealing between Argyll and Charles through Will Murray, while Argyll, for political reasons, was hoping to circumvent the Kirk secretly—an assurance of indemnity from Argyll for Montrose is really not inconceivable. For, granting that Montrose was in arms, in the extreme north, Argyll could arrange for his escape behind the back of the Kirk after Montrose disbanded. What, then, is Mr Gardiner's ground for saying that "there can be no doubt" that Charles had assurances for Montrose's safety? The ground is a note of Secretary Long's at Breda, dated May 5/15, when Montrose (unknown to Charles) had already been given up to Holborne by Macleod of Assynt. The note runs, "Order to Montrose to lay down arms . . . 10,000 dollars paid to his use in Sir Patrick Drummond's hands. Indemnity for him, Earls Seaforth" (in Holland), "Kinnoul" (dead!), "Lords Napier and Reay," etc.<sup>1</sup>

"Now will it be believed" (as Macaulay might have asked) that, in Mr Gardiner's text of this note of Long's, in 'Charles II. and Scotland,' p. 126, published for the Scottish History Society in 1894, the words "for him" (Montrose) do not occur after "indemnity." Long's phrase in 'Charles II. and Scotland,' p. 126, runs—"indemnity for Hon. E. Seaforth," and so on, nothing about indemnity for Montrose. Mr Gardiner, in the 'Edinburgh Review' of January 1894, p. 155, gives one text of Long's note, in modern spelling, with "indemnity for him" (Montrose), while, in 'Charles II. and Scotland,' also of 1894, he gives another text, in Long's own very odd spelling ("Lords Napper and Rey"), without any mention of "indemnity for him" (Montrose). However, supposing that Montrose really is included in the indemnity, what was the assurance for it? Long writes: "This upon king's agreement with Scots Commissioners." Then the assurance seems to be theirs, not Argyll's, though we know not how they could have a right to give it unless they risked it on Charles's private assurance of Argyll's sanction.

Long's note goes on, "Sir W. Fleming sent with the orders" (to disband) "all his" (Montrose's) "officers and soldiers indemnified. Montrose to stay in safety for a competent time in Scotland, and ship to lie provided for transporting [him] where he pleased." I would rather believe that Charles, when he was forced into dishonour, and signed the promise to take the Covenant, still had heart enough to care for the safety of Montrose. From Long's note, he seems to have had that amount of human nature, and to have supposed that, "by agreement with the Scots Commissioners" at Breda, he had assurances. But how he was led into this belief, who can say! Did the Commissioners deceive him on this point to obtain his signature to the draft treaty? Did Will Murray, Argyll's agent, deceive both the Commissioners and the king? Or had Argyll really given assurances?

In any case, as Mr Gardiner says, Charles knew that there was no grant of indemnity by the authority of the Scottish Parliament, for he now sent Sir William

<sup>1</sup> Carte MSS., vol. cxxx. fol. 119.

Fleming with a letter of May 8/18 to Parliament, asking for the safe departure of Montrose's men, "without any allusion to a preceding promise." This letter of May 8/18 to the Scottish Parliament sufficiently proved that the king was accessory to Montrose's proceedings, but we shall show that, by a later command of Charles to Fleming, the letter was never delivered to the Estates. Charles might have—as a motive for this later command not to deliver the letter to Parliament of May 8/18—the desire to conceal, as far as that letter went, his accession to Montrose's expedition. But no such concealment was possible, as Charles knew, and there was no reason, if Montrose were defeated, for presenting the letter. But a copy of a "Public Letter" by the king to his "right entirely beloved cousin" Montrose (May 5/15) was delivered and read to the Estates, and entirely demonstrated that Montrose acted under royal commission.

We now come to the mission from Breda of Sir William Fleming. On May 3/13 he got orders to bid Montrose disband, with all assurances of the king's hopes for his good, and with "duty and affection." A private royal letter to the marquis also mentioned the 10,000 rix dollars lying at his call. Certainly Charles had somehow persuaded himself that he had secured Montrose's safety; on what precise grounds of conviction we do not know.<sup>1</sup> Two days later (May 5/15) Fleming received further instructions. He was to take counsel, in Scotland, with Will Murray (who travelled with him), "concerning any further treaty with Montrose in order to our service, than what your public instructions do bear." He was to give most affectionate messages to Montrose.<sup>2</sup> Fleming also carried the letter of May 8/18 to the Scots Parliament, announcing that Charles was bidding Montrose to disband, and asking for security to such of his men as wished to leave the country, "according to our positive and express order"—as if he had any right to give orders!<sup>3</sup> That letter, acting on a later command, Fleming "carefully concealed."

On May 9/19 Fleming received further instructions. If the Covenanters are not satisfied with Charles's concessions, or are merely driving time, "Montrose is not to lay down arms." If he has a considerable force, he is not to disband; Fleming is to consult on this point with Will Murray—Argyll's man! Murray must clearly have deceived Charles into belief in his loyalty.<sup>4</sup>

Here the instructions to Fleming cease, as far as they were known to Mr Gardiner. But, by a curious accident, Mr A. G. Reid found an unpublished later set of instructions to Fleming in an odd volume of 'The Wigton Papers' which he bought at a book sale. The new orders, we repeat, are later than May 9/19, are of May 12/22, 1650. Fleming is here bidden to find out the truth of a report which has reached the king concerning Montrose's defeat. If the tale is true, or if Montrose is not in Scotland, Fleming is not to deliver to Parliament the king's letter of May 8/18 already cited. He is to conceal it carefully and show it to nobody; and he obeyed his orders. But if there has been no fight, or if Montrose is still at the head of a considerable force, then Fleming is to deliver to Parliament the letter of May 8/18, that Montrose "may be induced to lay down arms immediately, according to our express order. . . ."<sup>5</sup>

Now we come to the final puzzle: did Charles disgrace himself by writing a letter to the Scots Parliament, declaring that he "was not accessory in the least

<sup>1</sup> 'Wigton Papers,' ii., ii. pp. 472-476. Miscellany of the Maitland Club.

<sup>2</sup> 'Wigton Papers,' ii., ii. pp. 476-478.

<sup>3</sup> 'Wigton Papers,' ii., ii. pp. 478, 479.

<sup>4</sup> 'Wigton Papers,' ii., ii. pp. 478-480.

<sup>5</sup> 'Proceedings of Society of Antiquaries of Scotland,' pp. 199-202 (1899-1900).

degree" to Montrose's "invasion"? Sir James Balfour says that, on Saturday May 25/June 4 a letter from the king, dated May 12/22 (the date of Fleming's last instructions), to that infamous effect (Charles not accessory to Montrose's invasion) was read aloud to the Estates.<sup>1</sup>

Also, a copy of the king's letter to Montrose, of May 5/15, was read. In this, Charles, we know, calls Montrose "right entirely beloved cousin," and bids him disband because of the full agreement arrived at by the Treaty of Breda. This was "a public letter," a letter for publication. Now how could Charles write to the Estates disclaiming accession to Montrose's invasion, and yet, by the same post, show his complete accession, by his public letter to Montrose of May 5/15? Again, how could he send the disgraceful letter read aloud in the House, when, in his instructions to Fleming of the same date (May 12/22), he was still uncertain as to whether Montrose had been defeated or not? And how could Fleming deliver to Parliament the letter of May 5/15, when, by his newly-discovered orders of May 12/22, he was strictly forbidden, in the case of the truth of the report of Montrose's defeat, to deliver the compromising royal letter to the Estates of May 8/18? Nothing is said, in Fleming's instructions of May 12/22, about an alternative letter—which he is to deliver to Parliament if Montrose has been defeated—in place of that of May 8/18. Had such an alternative letter, the disgraceful one, been given to Fleming, it would be mentioned in his instructions of May 12/22. But was the abject letter described by Balfour given to Will Murray, not to Fleming? Again, how could Charles write the infamous letter reported by Balfour when his own commission to Montrose had long been in print, in the newspapers? For all these reasons it seems almost impossible that Charles should have written the letter which was read to the Scots Parliament on May 25/June 4, as described by Balfour.

Further, an absolutely different and quite harmless account exists of the king's alleged letter to Parliament of May 12/22. In this other version Charles merely asks for information; it is a letter "sent by Mr Murray" (Will Murray), and it appeared in the English newspaper, 'Several Proceedings,' for June 6.<sup>2</sup> It may be suggested that, on May 12/22, Charles bade Fleming conceal, in case of Montrose's defeat, his compromising letter to Parliament of May 8/18, and at the same time he may have given to Will Murray the disgraceful letter of May 12/22. But Fleming did deliver the letter to Montrose, the compromising letter of May 5/15. And Murray, on this hypothesis, also delivered the contradictory letter of May 12/22 described by Balfour, while again an entirely different letter of May 12/22 was given to the press. Into Balfour's report (iv. p. 25) of what Argyll told the House that Lothian told him, namely, that Charles said in conversation, "His Majesty was nowise sorry for Montrose's defeat, as he acted contrary to his command," we need not go. It is not evidence against Charles; it does not prove that, by the letter which Balfour reports, he practically signed Montrose's death warrant, if Montrose chanced to be alive when the letter reached the Estates.

The brain may be said to reel in face of this embroglio. If we think Charles as stupid as heartless and mean, we might explain matters thus. Hearing on May 12/22 an uncertain report of Montrose's defeat, he then forbade Fleming to deliver to Parliament that letter of May 8/18, which proved his accession to Montrose's adventure, if Fleming found that the story of the defeat was true. Then, forgetting that his commission to Montrose was matter of public knowledge through the press, Charles entrusted to Will Murray the lying and despicable letter to Parliament described by Balfour. But he forgot to forbid Fleming to publish the public letter of May 5/15 to Montrose; it was delivered by Fleming and read to the House—or it was copied by Will Murray and read to the House—and the king appeared before his Estates as the most false and foolish of men. Montrose's words to the Estates, and on the scaffold, "His Majesty's commands to me were most just, and I obeyed them," proved once more the falsity of the king's letter as described by Balfour.

<sup>1</sup> Balfour, iv. p. 24.

<sup>2</sup> 'Charles II. and Scotland,' p. 103.

It may be conceivable that Charles was at once so incredibly stupid and so desperately depraved, but then there is the harmless summary in the newspaper, 'Several Proceedings,' of the king's letter of May 12/22, in which he merely asks for information. Now it was the interest of the Edinburgh correspondent of 'Several Proceedings' to send to his journal the letter described by Balfour, for it would have sickened the heart and paralysed the arm of every Cavalier in England. Was his summary a false version given to him by some secret Cavalier in the House who heard read the letter described by Balfour, and tried to prevent its fatal consequences? Or was there a forgery, or other jugglery, by Will Murray, in the hope of making the Covenanters think Charles fit for any baseness? And was the contradictory royal letter of May 5/15 to put in to the same end? Meanwhile the letter of May 12/22, described by Balfour, though handed to the Committee of Despatches to be answered (so such a letter, genuine or forged, really existed, apparently), cannot be found in the Register House at Edinburgh, where the Rev. John Anderson kindly made research for it.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER VII.

- <sup>1</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' p. 367.
- <sup>2</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' p. 369; Musgrave in Clarendon MSS. 2, p. 867.
Cf. Gardiner, iv. p. 227, note 3.
- <sup>3</sup> Guthry, pp. 290, 291; Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' p. 371.
- <sup>4</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' p. 375.
- <sup>5</sup> Burnet, 'Mem. Ham.,' p. 379.
- <sup>6</sup> Carlyle, Cromwell Letters, pp. lxxii-lxxv.
- <sup>7</sup> Gardiner, iv. p. 231; Cromwell Letters, lxxvii. lxxviii.
- <sup>8</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., vi., ii. p. 129; Balfour, iii. pp. 383-385.
- <sup>9</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 670, 671. <sup>10</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 679, 680.
- <sup>11</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 681, 682; Clarendon State Papers, ii. p. 460.
- <sup>12</sup> Willcock, p. 223.
- <sup>13</sup> Act. Parl. Scot. vi., ii. pp. 131, 143-147; Mathieson, 'Rel. and Pol. in Scotland,' ii. pp. 106, 107.
- <sup>14</sup> Mitchell, 'Rec. Com. Gen. Ass.,' i., xli.
- <sup>15</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., vi., ii. p. 157.
- <sup>16</sup> Balfour, iii. p. 388.
- <sup>17</sup> Peterkin, p. 510.
- <sup>18</sup> Peterkin, p. 509.
- <sup>19</sup> Peterkin, p. 499.
- <sup>20</sup> Grub, iii. p. 106.
- <sup>21</sup> Baillie, iii. p. 66.
- <sup>22</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 684, 685.
- <sup>23</sup> Wishart, pp. 228, 229.
- <sup>24</sup> Napier, ii. p. 695.
- <sup>25</sup> Baillie, iii. pp. 67-84.

- <sup>26</sup> 'Life of Robert Blair,' p. 215. Wodrow Society, 1848.
- <sup>27</sup> Clarendon State Papers, ii. pp. 474, 475.
- <sup>28</sup> Balfour, iii. p. 393.
- <sup>29</sup> Baillie, iii. pp. 512-521.
- <sup>30</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 700-705.
- <sup>31</sup> Napier, ii. p. 706.
- <sup>32</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 708-722.
- <sup>33</sup> Napier, ii. p. 729.
- <sup>34</sup> Napier, ii. p. 730.
- <sup>35</sup> Nicholas Papers, i. p. 160; Gardiner, 'Com. and Prot.,' i. p. 208.
- <sup>36</sup> Carte, 'Original Letters,' i. p. 358.
- <sup>37</sup> Napier, ii. p. 752.
- <sup>38</sup> Gardiner, 'Charles II. and Scotland,' pp. 42, 43. Scottish History Society.
- <sup>39</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 755-757.
- <sup>40</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 757-759, note i. to 759.
- <sup>41</sup> Balfour, iii. pp. 411, 412.
- <sup>42</sup> 'Life of Robert Blair,' p. 206.
- <sup>43</sup> Guthry, pp. 270, 271.
- <sup>44</sup> 'A Genealogical History of the Earldom of Sutherland,' by Gordon of Gordonstoun, pp. 554, 555. Edinburgh, 1813.
- <sup>45</sup> Wishart, pp. 316-321.
- <sup>46</sup> Napier, ii. p. 781.

CHAPTER VIII.

CROMWELL AND SCOTLAND.

1650-1651.

CONTEMPORARY with the expedition and the tragedy of Montrose was the scurvy comedy of the negotiations at Breda. The last words of Montrose to his king warned him against dealing with the Scottish Commissioners who met him at Breda in the middle of March 1650. They were Cassilis and Lothian; Brodie of Brodie, and Winram of Libberton; John Smith and Alexander Jaffray (who escaped from the battle of Aberdeen), with the Reverend Messrs Wood, Hutchinson, and Livingstone, minister of Ancrum. Mr Livingstone "had some scruple that ministers meddled but too much in public matters," and he was reluctant to go.<sup>1</sup> Jaffray, who later saw the errors of Presbyterianism, and became a Quaker, writes: "He" (the king), "that poor young prince to whom we were sent, sinfully complied with what we most sinfully pressed upon him, where I must confess, to my apprehension, our sin was more than his." Indeed, even at the time this good man, like Montrose, "spoke of it to the king himself, desiring him not to subscribe the Covenant if in his conscience he was not satisfied; and yet went on to close the treaty with him, who, I knew so well, had for his own ends done it against his heart." But Jaffray yielded to the example "of others, gracious and holy men that were there."<sup>2</sup> Livingstone also seems to have had no liking for the transaction, for the king, during the negotiations, was guilty of promiscuous dancing, of using the English Liturgy, and of kneeling at the celebration of the Communion. This was clearly no king for a Covenanted people.<sup>3</sup>

The terms offered to Charles were such as could not leave him, if he accepted them, a shred of honour or a hope of the consolations of religion. He was to take both Covenants, force Presbyterianism on England, and Presbyterianise his own household. He was to persecute Catholics, and abrogate all such commissions as that which he had given to Montrose. He was also to sanction the legality of the Estates, and accept the recent constitutional reforms.<sup>4</sup> The Prince of Orange was expected to try to "soften" the preachers by aid of Dr André Rivet, but the preachers were not to be softened (April 4).<sup>5</sup> The Anglicans at Breda thought that Montrose, though an excommunicated rebel and traitor, was not too bad to be used against "the wicked sectaries in Ireland." But "the Montrosians laugh at this, as if he were to be caught with this chaff." They were "sure of the king's unalterable affection to Montrose." At this juncture, in mid April, Mr Gardiner avers that Argyll sent over Will Murray to offer to the king the hand of Lady Ann, the daughter of the marquis. Livingstone says "it was thought" that Argyll took this remarkable step, or rather (his grammar is a little involved) says that Will Murray and Sir Robert Murray, "it is thought, put him (Argyll) in hopes that the king might marry his daughter." This hardly justifies Mr Gardiner's assertion; his other authorities are quite as vague.* That the Murrays should put Argyll in hopes is one thing; that Argyll should "offer the hand" of his daughter is another. A spy at Breda says that the preachers there "stick not to call the king an idolater" (he kneeled at the Holy Communion), "an enemy to God's Church, and that God will curse and plague their land for admitting him." This was on May 6, and Charles was said to be insisting on an amnesty for Montrose. It was also said that the Queen of Sweden and the Prince of Orange urged Charles to accept any terms, "and afterwards keep only what he pleased." But this is mere rumour.<sup>6</sup> After much reluctance Charles signed, as we saw, a draft treaty on May 1, four days after Montrose's defeat (still unknown to the king), at Carbisdale. Even the queen mother, to whom shades of heresy were rather unimportant, was obliged to speak her mind to her son.<sup>7</sup>

As for the three Scottish preachers at Breda, they warned the king that he would have no luck; for his kneeling, as before mentioned, was "provocation against God to procure the blasting of all his designs." † A rather blacker crime, in the eyes of other * Gardiner, i. pp. 224, 225, and note 1, p. 225; 'Select Biographies,' i. p. 170; 'Charles II. and Scotland,' p. 114; Nicholas Papers, i. p. 172.

† 'Select Biographies,' i. p. 177.

men, was the king's treatment of Montrose. It becomes us not to judge a lad in Charles's position, perhaps, but a young man should have appreciated the boyish loyalty of the great marquis. Mr Gardiner is able to write: "There can be no doubt that before Charles signed the draft agreement" (May 1) "he had received assurances that if Montrose would lay down his arms, not only he, but the Scottish Royalists in Holland, would receive complete indemnity."* This point is so embroiled in obscure detail that it is treated separately in a note at the end of Chapter VII. supra.

It was the gracious habit of Argyll's party to take the lives of the king's servants while they themselves were negotiating with the king. As they had done to Huntly and Montrose, so they did to Hurry, Spottiswoode (said to have been one of the assassins of Dorislaus), Hay of Dalgetty (excommunicated for Popery), Alexander Charteris of Amisfield, and several other gentlemen taken at Carbiesdale, or otherwise fallen into their hands. Most of them, we rejoice to say, "died without repentance." Many of Montrose's secret papers were found and communicated to the Estates. His George and Garter were not laid before the House till May 30. On June 30 the Estates forbade Hamilton, Seaforth, Traquair, Callendar, Napier, Dalziel of Binns, Monro, and many other Engagers or Royalists—all, in fact, of the first or second "classes," to attend Charles or stay in Scotland without warrant. Of these was Lauderdale, whether that he was not in collusion with Argyll, or that Argyll could not aid him, or by way of a blind. On June 26 news came that Charles had arrived in Speymouth, and on the 27th that he had swallowed all the increased demands of the Kirk and Estates.<sup>8</sup>

The wails of loyal Cavaliers over their disgraces may be read in the Papers of Secretary Nicholas. He, alone, from the first, had maintained in Council that no treaty with the Scots could be honourable which implied "prejudice to his Majesty's affairs," in Ireland and Scotland, under Ormond and Montrose. He was, therefore, with the brave Hopton, put out of the royal deliberating board. The object of the Scots, said Nicholas, was to make the king despicable. They succeeded, and reaped their reward at the Restoration. The lad whom they were corrupting fought, as he might, for his honour; when that went, it went wholly; and thanks to Will Murray, says Nicholas, Wilmot and Percy deserted Hamilton for Argyll.<sup>9</sup>

* Gardiner, 'Cromwell and Protectorate,' i. 206 (1903).

By May 29/June 8 (?) Charles was at Honslaerdyck, about to cross to Scotland; at least, on that day he wrote a cold note of five lines to Montrose's son.<sup>10</sup> By May 23/June 2 the news of Montrose's defeat was only "given out," and "believed" at Antwerp.<sup>11</sup> The spy at the Hague (May 30) writes that Charles was "very much amazed at the hearing" of the death of Montrose, and might have "taken other resolutions," had he heard of it earlier.<sup>12</sup> "Many wonder he will trust himself with them"; it needed courage as well as shamelessness. The king had both qualities. The new demands and restrictions on his followers were now revealed to him, and, when the voyage was over, and the ship at anchor in Speymouth, the disgusted Mr Livingstone took the king's oath to the Covenants,—to Presbytery in England, to desertion of Ormond and the Irish, and everything. Both State and Kirk were guilty, says Livingstone, for, in fact, Charles did not deceive them, they were "without any evidence of a real change in his heart."<sup>13</sup>

The Kirk, henceforth, was to be split between the party which averred that Heaven could not be cajoled by accepting Charles's vows, and the party which tried to invent yet more oaths, for the purpose of cajoling Heaven. The king had taken with him his proscribed adherents, men who counselled deceit; they also were to cause trouble. A few Argyllians, of whom, absurd as it may appear, Buckingham now was one, were allowed to remain with Charles in Scotland (Buckingham had made friends with Will Murray), and Hamilton and Lauderdale, though "discouraged," were not banished. Buccleuch, Cassilis, and others were sent (July 4) to congratulate Charles on the circumstance that "it had pleased God" to move his heart, and they also bade him send away "his corrupt chaplains" and other wicked ones.<sup>14</sup> The mixture of hypocrisy and superstition is admirable. On his way south Charles saw, or might have seen, a quarter of the body of Montrose suspended over a gate of Aberdeen. But he continued on his road to Falkland, whence his grandfather had been wont to hunt the buck. Charles, too, "was at his huntis and pastyme," says Nicoll, in his amusing Diary.<sup>15</sup>

Meanwhile war with England was at hand. The Estates broke up to levy forces; the ministers raised a regiment of horse under Strachan, whose later conduct induced them to deliver him over to the devil. In England the godly appealed to Heaven and the press; they made adultery punishable by death, simple unchastity by sixty days; an Act against rouge and patches was proposed; and a Cavalier journalist was induced to turn his coat and write for the Commonwealth.<sup>16</sup> Fairfax would not lead an army against Scotland; he asserted scruples about the Solemn League; he may have had other scruples, being no Regicide. Cromwell took command and advanced; under him were Fleetwood, Lambert, and Monk. By July 19 Cromwell was near Berwick, with about 11,000 foot and 5000 horse. The Scots forces mustering at Leith were somewhat over 20,000, old Leven acting as figurehead, and David Leslie as commander, much trammelled by preachers and committees. The clergy "promised, in God's name, a victory over these erroneous and blasphemous parties," the English, says Nicoll, a diarist. He adds that, by the process of "purging" Malignants out of the army, half the forces were disbanded.<sup>17</sup> "The Scottish army being thus in purging daily," must have lost many officers of courage and experience. With more of common sense than the purgers, Leslie fortified Leith and the eastern approaches to Edinburgh. He had left few but women in the towns and villages on the road from Berwick, and had, as far as possible, cleared the country of supplies, but for these Cromwell relied on his ships. Cromwell had issued politico-religious proclamations; he was the real friend, he averred, to the substance of the Covenant.

He was at Musselburgh by July 30, and there was a skirmish, at Restalrig, variously reported by Balfour and Cromwell himself. That the English gouged out the eyes of a Scottish prisoner and sent him back naked "was reported"; also that Lambert was mortally wounded. The king had been allowed to visit the army of Scotland, but, by August 2, he was compelled to withdraw to Dunfermline, for to see the king among the soldiers was to be shaken in devotion to the Kirk. Charles was also pestered to sign a new declaration, to sink into deeper depths of shame. On August 2 he retired north of Forth, and, for three days, "purging the army" went merrily on,—“they purged out above eighty commanders. The ministers in all places preached incessantly for this purging,” which was expected to avert “God’s judgments upon the land and army.” To the end the preachers believed not in efficient leaders, but in miracles to be wrought by a pacified Jehovah. In military affairs the cashiering of officers, in face of the enemy, for politico-religious reasons (as it entails the appointment of men pious but inexperienced), is not apt to avert "judgments."<sup>18</sup> Balfour adds that Cromwell, before falling back on Dunbar, sent (August 3) "a letter, most ridiculous and blasphemous, to the Commission of the General Assembly.

He said to the preachers, "by your hard and subtle words you have begotten prejudice in those who do too much, in matters of conscience;—wherein every soul is to answer for itself to God,—depend upon you . . . your own guilt is too much for you to bear. . . . Is it therefore infallibly agreeable to the Word of God, all that you say? I beseech you in the bowels of Christ, think it possible that you may be mistaken. . . . There may be a Covenant made with Death and Hell. I will not say that yours was so."<sup>19</sup> At last we hear the right word spoken: "Your own guilt is too much for you to bear. . . . There may be a Covenant made with Death and Hell. . . . You may be mistaken!" The sulphurous fumes of the preachers' fatuous superstition are blown away. Such was Cromwell's "ridiculous and blasphemous letter." He argued that, in supporting the king, the Scots were "confederated with wicked and carnal men," despite all their purgatives. It was, therefore, necessary to clear themselves by purging the king; the king whom they had so completely demoralised.

Charles was asked, for purgative purposes, to sign a declaration averring that he desired to be "deeply humbled and afflicted in spirit before God, because of his father's opposition to the work of God, and to the Solemn League and Covenant, and for the idolatry of his mother," with many other perjured protestations.<sup>20</sup> Waristoun and James Guthrie brought this infamous paper to Charles; he refused to sign, and was "thundered at" in sermons as "the very Root of Malignancy." The Kirk published the declaration, the Committee of Estates backed them; unless Charles signed they would not defend his cause. It was Argyll, says Balfour, who first presented this odious declaration for signature to Charles. On August 9 "The Committee of the Army and the Kirk sent Lothian, Waristoun, James Guthrie, and others" to make him sign. He went out to hunt, and, on returning, "denied absolutely to declare anything that might rub upon his father." He had thrown to these wolves his living and loyal servants: now they demanded that he should desecrate the grave of the dead. On the 13th, after consulting Argyll, Lothian, Lorne, and others, he was ready to submit, "only he entreated them to be as sparing of his father's name and memory as necessarily could be."<sup>21</sup> Apparently Charles was to conciliate Jehovah by breaking the Fifth Commandment. For all these purgings were meant to remove "causes of wrath." Even before he signed, Leslie sent a declaration to Cromwell, that they would not support Charles unless he signed the documents (August 14) as a reply to his "ridiculous and blasphemous letter." By endorsing cruel charges against his own mother and his dead father, the king would cease to be offensive to the Deity, and a Jonah in the ship of the Covenanters.

Cromwell, who had victualled at Dunbar and had returned to "the Pentland Hills," to attack Edinburgh from the west, and to secure the Queen's Ferry over Forth, made answer. The thing, to his mind, was hypocrisy. Purgings out Malignants, the Scots kept "the head of them," a man who actually had a Popish army in Ireland! The "new formal and feigned submissions" of Charles in no way improved the case. Scots like Strachan and "Gibby Ker" saw this, and sent in a remonstrance. Charles must sign; if he did not, he knew what befell his father at Newark and Newcastle. "Your enemies . . . will win their ends," said Loudoun in a letter to Charles.<sup>22</sup> So the king, being warned by both Kirk and State that if he did not sign they would desert him—signed.

While Leslie was outmanœuvring Cromwell round Edinburgh, which he did with much skill, Charles rode to Perth (lodging at Gowrie House, the scene of the Gowrie Conspiracy), (August 16), to meet Highland reinforcements who had no scruples about Covenants. He was recalled by Loudoun, and it is reported that Argyll, in conversation with the king, said that it was necessary, for the present, to "please these madmen," the precisians. But the evidence for this impious expression is at third hand.<sup>23</sup> Soon after (August 20), Charles had to convey to Dr. King his excuses for deserting Ormond and the Irish. "I am a true Cavalier," he said. "What concerns Ireland" (his promise to desert his servants in Ireland) "is no ways binding,"—he could not really act without his Irish Council. Charles had outwatched all his Court, except Seymour and Chiffinch (later notorious), to see Dr. King alone. Long told King that Charles had wished to land in Denmark when the new proposals of infamy were brought to him on his voyage, but he was overborne by "the entreaties of his servants." He had signed the last declaration because "his life was at stake," as probably it was.<sup>24</sup> * Cromwell may have expected that his own appeal to the consciences of the Commission of the General Assembly would end in their abandonment of the royal cause. Their curious consciences were quieted, on August 16, by Charles's signature to the document that disgraced his father and mother.

Cromwell (August 18) returned to his position on the Braid Hills, threatening Queensferry and Leslie's sources of supply. But Leslie, though Edinburgh was almost famished, maintained his defensive tactics, countering every move of Cromwell with much astuteness. At Corstorphine and Coltbridge (noted for the flight of Gardiner's dragoons in 1745), Leslie had a position strengthened not only by the hills and the steep banks of the Water of Leith, but by lochans and marshes now drained and under culture. Moreover, the tower of Hamilton of Redhall barred the way to Queensferry, standing high on the precipitous eastern bank of the stream. Hamilton had sixty men in Redhall, and he held his house tenaciously, enduring a day's cannonade and declining to surrender even when his ammunition was exhausted. But Leslie, looking on, clung to his system and did not relieve the place.<sup>25</sup> The doors of Redhall were blown in by the English with petards, and the survivors were stripped naked; or so it was "reported." On this, and other occasions, Leslie incurred reproach for not attacking.† Cromwell retired again to the Braid Hills, then to Musselburgh, whence he shipped his numerous invalids, and making for England in despair of success, and in very dilapidated condition, reached Dunbar on September 1, followed by Leslie, who kept, when possible, on the hills above the road. The general situation is thus summed up by Mr Carlyle. "Cockburnspath" (the

* There is a pamphlet "by a Private Hand," averring that Leslie more than once offered to sell the king to Cromwell, and that Cromwell disdained the transaction. Mr W. S. Douglas, 'Cromwell's Scotch Campaigns' (96, note 2), citing Maidment's 'Historical Fragments.' Mr Douglas discredits the story, no doubt justly, though he attributes venality to Leslie, through misunderstanding a phrase of Cromwell's. But as the Kirk was in a very effervescent state, being pricked in its conscience, and having no real reply to Cromwell's taunt, one may conceive that, if Charles had not signed the declaration, he would have been in real personal danger. On the field he was brave enough, but he could not face being abandoned to the slayers of his father. Balfour, iv. pp. 89-96, seems to give a correct account of these disgraceful transactions.

† The details, worked out from local knowledge, may be studied in Mr Douglas's 'Cromwell's Scotch Campaigns.'

Peaths) "has been seized on Oliver's left" (in front), "and made impassable; behind Oliver is the sea; in front of him" (on his flank) "is Leslie, Doon Hill, and the heather continent of Lammermoor. . . . What is to become of Oliver?" Oliver thought the case bad. "Our spirits are comfortable, praised be the Lord,—though our present position be what it is," he wrote (September 2) to Haselrig at Newcastle. Despite his ships, he saw not how supplies could reach him.<sup>26</sup> After the battle, on September 4, Cromwell wrote that, at Musselburgh, it had been determined to fortify Dunbar, "which, we thought, if anything, would tempt them to engage." Perhaps fear of this was what really did tempt Leslie to desert his Fabian tactics and engage—this idea that Cromwell would fortify Dunbar. If so, we must applaud Cromwell, while we cannot much blame Leslie. Oliver had false news from a prisoner that the king had been allowed to join the army. They had three new regiments, the prisoner said, and they certainly had the king's "Malignant" guard. But Leslie was trammelled by the amateur Committee: the preachers put in their word, and purging had been active.<sup>27</sup>

"Some of our staff officers were most desirous to fall upon their rear . . . but the Council of War that gave orders to the General was against it, and that same day" (Sept. 2) "the Committee for purging the army was busy purging out those that should have been fighting."<sup>28</sup> This was lunacy. The idea of the ministers was that Engagers and Royalists were a kind of Achans, communicating a contagion of unholiness certain to prove "a cause of wrath." On the very eve of battle, officers, to whom their regiments were accustomed, left the field, and strange officers, ministers' sons, says Walker, were put over men who knew them not. These holy and acceptable leaders left their regiments, says Leslie himself, in the rainy night of September 2-3. "We might as easily have beaten them as we did James Graham at Philiphaugh, if the officers had stayed by their own troops and regiments."* A wild night had the Scots on Doon Hill; 22,000 ill-officered or unofficered men, of divers religious and political parties; hungry and wet in the rain (Sept. 1-2). Of the ruling Committee some thought that Leslie ought to have attacked on more occasions than one; and with that Committee was Waristoun, he that "took instruments" with the * September 5, Leslie to Argyll, 'Ancrum and Lothian Correspondence,' ii. p. 297.

Lord of Hosts. Burnet reports that his uncle, Waristoun, and the Committee, "thought that Leslie made not haste enough to destroy these sectaries . . . they still called on him to fall on." This hardly agrees with a statement in the 'Life of Blair,' in which the Committee is represented as averse to attacking Cromwell's rear guard. Nor does Leslie himself blame the Committee, in his letter to Argyll; he blames his regimental officers. Baillie, as late as January 1651, declares that Leslie descended from Doon Hill, "in consequence of the Committee's orders, contrary to his mind."<sup>29</sup> In the same way Major White, on September 10, told the English Parliament that Leven and Leslie wished to attack the retreating foes in Cockburnspath ravine, already occupied by a Scots force, "but the ministers did so importune them that they could not rest quiet until they had engaged." Cromwell, too, heard that "the clergy's counsel prevailed,—to their no great comfort" (September 4, to the Lord President).<sup>30</sup> *

Thus the evidence as to the mischievous tactics and fatal advice of the ministers is of uncertain value. Leslie may have been pressed by the preachers, but when he saw the English not on the march, but awaiting him, on September 2, he may also have reckoned that they did not mean to retreat, that they would fortify Dunbar, or withdraw by ship. He himself probably suffered from lack of supplies, and could ill afford to wait. In the afternoon he asked an English prisoner "how will you fight when you have shipped half your men, and all your great guns?" Leslie may have had this news, or he may have put a fishing question. The prisoner replied that the Scots would find men and guns at the foot of the hill, so reports Cadwall, "an army messenger."<sup>31</sup> Leslie, in fact, about four or five o'clock in the afternoon of September 2, had moved many of his men to the lower declivities of the hill, and in this operation the outspoken prisoner was taken. He was a one-armed man, yet loaded and fired thrice during the Scottish attack on his post. Cromwell and the staff dined in Dunbar town at four o'clock; by five, they were watching Leslie's movements. He drew down, says Cromwell, about two-thirds of the horse on his left "shogging also their foot and train much to the right, causing their right wing of horse to edge down towards the sea." Cromwell was at Broxmouth House, some two miles to the south of Dunbar, when he noted these movements. This is an important point to remember. Broxmouth House, with its grounds, occupied the relatively level land close to the sea, where the Broxburn flowed quietly, though swollen with the rains, and where its banks, not being steep, caused little difficulty to the movements of forces. But, higher up, the burn descends through a deep and narrow gully, or corry, with precipitous grassy banks, and but two places where an army might cross. Watching Leslie's descent from the commanding heights, Cromwell saw his advantage, as did Lambert. Leslie was being tempted to engage; for many weeks Cromwell had hoped for nothing better.

* In a newspaper article, quoted both by Balfour (iv. p. 347) and Nicoll (72), Guthrie is spoken of as "most instrumental in drawing on an engagement at Dunbar." Yet he violently attacked Leslie for his bad generalship, which, perhaps, does not look as if Leslie had acted, on this occasion, by his advice. See Mathieson, 'Religion and Politics,' ii. p. 124, note 2.

Leslie had, probably, as tradition avers, defeated Montrose at Philiphaugh by a surprise in a morning mist. His own words to Argyll, written after his defeat at Dunbar, show that he thought that battle very easily won. He meant, and he tried, to catch Oliver in the same way. All of Cromwell's forces were on the Dunbar side of the Broxburn on the afternoon of September 2. Leslie's were arrayed on the slopes above, the Broxburn flowed between the two armies. To get at Cromwell, whom he outnumbered, Leslie would have to cross the corry, and Cromwell might have defended that line. He garrisoned Broxmouth House; in a print of the battle we see soldiers and waggons within the garden walls. His army had been drawn up at right angles to the burn, his left leaning on Broxmouth House. In the night he marched his forces up to the edge of the corry, which now ran along his front; with each regiment he placed two field-pieces. Now here comes in the difference between Cromwell at Dunbar, and Montrose on the night before Philiphaugh, and Leslie on this very night of destiny. It rained in torrents, but Cromwell "rode all the night through the several regiments on horseback, upon a little Scots nag, biting his lip till the blood ran down his chin without his perceiving it, his thoughts being busily employed on the crucial action now at hand." Blood-specks on his linen bands—it is with these marks that we first saw Cromwell! On the other side of the burn, on Leslie's side, the "ministers' sons" and the other new officers had slunk under cover, the men had been allowed to crawl away and sleep under corn stooks, the horses were unsaddled, the matches of all but a few men

BATTLE OF DUNBAR

3rd Sept. 1650.

English Miles.

English
Cavalry Infantry
Artillery
Scottish
Cavalry Infantry

G. Philip & Son.

in each Scots regiment had been extinguished by Holbourne's orders. Thus "our own laziness," says Leslie to Argyll, was the cause of the Presbyterian defeat. Leslie had "shogged" his horse to his right; the burn was there most easily crossed. By that ford Cromwell determined to attack; he would throw most of his forces on the Scots right wing; if he drove off their horse he would take the infantry of their centre in the flank: and they, between the steep hill behind them and the corry or cleugh beside them, would have no room to deploy into a front at right angles to their old array. The cavalry of the Scots left wing never came into action at all, so hampered was their position or so feeble their hearts.

Cromwell, whom Leslie appears to have expected to surprise by a great cavalry charge from his own right across the levels of the burn, was really moving his own troops across the burn, before dawn, to surprise Leslie. Had that General and his officers not been "lazy" they might have caught Cromwell in the midst of this audacious and perilous manœuvre. He executed it safely, at three points, on the low levels,—at the present road above them, and at Brant's Mill, two or three hundred yards further up the burn. In a picture chart of the battle we see three parties crossing at these intervals. It seems, though not from Cromwell's account, that three English regiments of horse went over the corry by the upper crossing as early as four o'clock in the morning, drove in the outposts of Scots horse, and attacked the Scots left among their tents—if any tents they had; we hear of shelter under corn-stooks. The English foot and cavalry followed, and fell on the Scots foot, whose matches were not lighted—wet fumbling fingers had little chance then to renew the seed of fire. One or two Scots regiments with wheel-lock muskets had a less desperate chance.

But now the Scots horse met Lambert's less numerous cavalry; already their trumpets had sounded for action, though it seems odd to prelude with trumpets to an intended surprise. Charging down hill with levelled lances, the Scots at first drove back the enemy, but Cromwell, with his own regiment of horse and three of infantry, came up, and steadied Lambert and Monk's foot, who had been repulsed by the gallant stand of the infantry of the Scottish centre, as Cromwell's letter indicates. The whole English line now drove back the Scots, while they struck at the English infantry with the butt, and thrust with pikes. This gallant resistance was probably made by Argyllshire Highlanders under Campbell of Lawers. But the Scots infantry was presently charged on the flank by English cavalry; they broke at last and ran. The Scots horse also fled, being pursued, but not, it seems, very closely; of the infantry 10,000 were taken, and some 3000 killed and wounded. The cavalry of the Scots left easily escaped; the regimental colours, to the making of which the king had paid great attention, were captured. Balfour says that the horse of his side "received little or no hurt at all." The Scottish Covenanting cavalry seldom waited to do so. He names eighteen colonels and other men of note who fell, among them the negotiator, Winram of Libberton, with some others of good houses—Home, Wedderburn, Douglas, Maxwell, Scott, and Ker, but no lords. "General Leslie, and the noblemen that were with the army, first came to Edinburgh," says the 'Life of Blair.' "Malignant" lords were not so apt to be foremost in the flight. As for Leslie, his parallel to Philiphaugh was closer than he had expected,—if Montrose did not see his own orders executed on the night of September 12, 1645, neither did Leslie on the night of September 2, 1650.*

The Covenanters, the Kirk, the Committee of Estates, and David Leslie had got the kind of beating which Wellington ascribed to the gallant and loyal Blucher at Ligny. The Cavaliers of Scotland were not defeated, because neither they nor "Royalist Civil Dignitaries," to whom Mr Carlyle wildly attributes the movement down hill, were allowed to be present. "Surely," wrote Cromwell, "it's probable the Kirk has done their doo" (September 4). The Kirk had justified that opinion of parsons as statesmen which the Rev. Messrs Spang, Baillie, and Livingstone privately entertained. Their arguments had not confuted "these erroneous and blasphemous parties," the soldiers of Cromwell. About this time it came to be said that Malignants and Sectaries had much more in common than either had with the Covenanters. They were men of this world, and fought for king or commonwealth, not for a paper fetish and a preacher's dream. Of Cromwell's prisoners many died of hunger or of dysentery caused by eating raw cabbages; the rest were sent to New England, where they were well treated.

* This account closely follows Mr Firth, in 'Transactions of the Royal Historical Society,' New Series, vol. xiv. pp. 18-52. The original authorities, Scots and English, have also been studied, but the picture chart, discovered by Mr Firth, explains the battle. It was designed by Fitzpayne Fisher, and seems to be the only known result of his attempt to write an official history of Cromwell's campaign. In Mr Firth's view, each army, in the battle, was on the Berwick side of the Broxburn, and at right angles to that brook. This appears to be indubitably certain.

The undefeated Commission of the General Assembly instantly set to work to prove, by "A Short Declaration and Warning" (September 12), that it was impossible they should be mistaken. They observed that though the Lord's "judgments are unsearchable, and His ways past finding out," yet "we must not forbear to declare the mind of God." They knew all about it. Their remarks are as coherent as Swift's prophecy taken down from the Mouth of a Man Killed by the Mohocks, "Concerning these things neither do I know, nor do ye know, but I only." The king, they said, must examine himself about his own repentance for "the grievous provocations of his father's house, and his own guiltiness," as if these were responsible for Leslie's neglect, and "our own laziness." Malignants must still be purged, and, of all things, nobody must "blame the Covenant."<sup>82</sup>

James Guthrie and Patrick Gillespie were leading fanatics at this time, and Guthrie clamoured for the dismissal of Leslie, and preached at him from the pulpit. The preachers give us a hint of their ideas of strategy in their "Causes of a solemn public Humiliation." The fact that the king's horse guards "most malignant and profane," were left unpurged, was one cause of wrath and defeat. Another was the "diffidence" of some of the leaders, who omitted "fair opportunities and advantages," of which preachers, not soldiers, appear to be the best judges. Neglect of family prayers "in great ones and many others," also contributed to the disaster of Dunbar. But why did Jehovah give victory to "bloody and blasphemous sectaries"? Even the preachers of Fife, however, blanched at the idea of reading "these reasons" from the pulpit,—even the Synod of Fife would have removed the ban from penitent Engagers. "But this was altogether denied both by the Commission of the General Assembly and Committee of Estates convened at Stirling, the 25 of September 1650," says Balfour.<sup>83</sup> Henceforth the history of Scotland is the history of the processes by which the fetish of the Covenant was broken to powder. Slower was the work than the rapid destruction of the old "idol of St. Giles" in 1559-1560.

After Dunbar, Cromwell occupied Edinburgh and Leith, whence the populace had fled. The preachers took refuge in the castle, being of opinion that "the persecution is personal" to them. Cromwell is reported to have burned the minister's house at Musselburgh: other examples are given, but who can criticise the alleged "atrocities" of any war? Like Prince Charles in 1745, Cromwell assured the clergy of their liberty to preach—in neither case was the freedom accepted. Cromwell replied to Dundas, the commander of the castle, who had conveyed the preachers' refusal. "The" (Presbyterian) "ministers in England are supported, and have liberty to preach the Gospel; though not to rail, nor under pretence thereof" (of the Gospel) "to overtop the Civil Power, or debase it as they please." Cromwell took that view of Scottish Presbyterian pretensions which we follow in this history. His was, in short, the view that the Stuart kings had taken. The "glorious Reformation" to which the preachers "pretend" is based, says Cromwell, on "getting to themselves worldly power." So Elizabeth had foretold; so James VI. had found the case; so Cromwell regarded it; and the Restoration wrestled with the same intolerable claims. The ministers in the castle answered that Cromwell's talk of their "railing" was "the old practice of the Malignants." It was: Royalists and Sectarians were, happily, at one as regarded the theocratic claims of the heated pulpiteers who "had the whole wyte of the troubles of Scotland." The preachers also complained that amateur English laymen were preaching—as they did, quite as well as professionals. "Is it against the Covenant?" asked Oliver. "Away with the Covenant, if it be so!" In fact, "having reasonable and good leisure," and enjoying a theological bout as much as gentle King Jamie did, Cromwell bombarded the ministers with arguments and queries.<sup>34</sup>

On September 14 Cromwell marched to attempt Stirling, where the Estates Commission was, with the king. Stirling he found too hard for him. He learned (September 25) that the wild extremists, Strachan and Ker, were gone to the west, to raise forces there. They did collect a Whigamore army and assumed an independent position. They denounced Charles as not really under conviction, and would not be associated with an unawakened prince. At the same time they would not frankly go over to Cromwell. Cromwell now tried to reduce Edinburgh Castle by employing colliers to undermine it: probably a golden key opened the gates, for Dundas presently surrendered, though he had ample supplies. For the moment, perhaps, Dundas's loyalty was not suspected; not till December did he yield the acropolis. But the king's position, with a large party of the pious under Strachan moving independently, and full of moral indignation, in the west, was ticklish. Argyll had for some time found his strength in the extreme left of the godly—"these madmen,"—the men to whom their Covenant was everything, their country little, though religious difficulties still severed them from the blasphemous Sectaries. Would Argyll return to these good men, or would he, standing by the king, risk losing place and power to Hamilton, to the Engagers? The pass was awkward, for if Argyll and the preachers were right when they ruined the national effort to succour Charles I. at the time of the Engagement, could Argyll, without the wildest preachers, be right in supporting a conspicuously and trebly perjured prince, at the present juncture? Was the effort even safe? The extremists, like Guthrie, Gillespie, Strachan, and Ker, usually win the day, in Revolutions; moreover, Argyll was sincerely Presbyterian—his letters are rich in pious ejaculations. "My way shall be found straight, doing no other than what I profess, and that in His strength alone Who is only able to sustain His own, and guide them in a way they know not."*

As "the way" of Argyll was certainly dark, and as the king's position was perilous, he tried to light up the road by golden promises to the marquis. At Perth, a week before the attempt which he made to fly from the arms of the marquis into those of Airlie and Ogilvy, the loyal friends of the loyal Montrose, Charles, in writing, promised to make the Campbell a Duke, a Knight of the Garter, and even a Gentleman of the Bedchamber (perhaps Groom of the Posset?). "Whensoever it shall please God to restore me to my just rights in England," Charles had to promise, "I shall see him paid the £40,000 sterling, which is due to him."† What £40,000? due to Argyll from whom? Now £40,000 was the sum, or nearly the sum, still owing to Argyll, as his unpaid part of the arrears of the Scottish army when they surrendered Charles I. to the English at Newcastle. This, I conceive, is the £40,000 which the son of Charles I. promises to pay Argyll. The son pays what the son reckons the blood price of the father! This is the most odious transaction in all history: Mr Gardiner adopts the view here taken of the debt of £40,000. It is known that Charles, on his Restoration, took Argyll's head in place of paying him the balance of what was owing to him on the too notorious transaction at Newcastle. Charles had made his promises on * Argyll to Lilburne, Rosneath, August 30, 1653; Willcock, pp. 383, 384.

† 'Historical MSS. Commission,' vi. p. 606.

September 24; on October 4 he fled to men of whom a few had ever been loyal.

While the west was mutinous, at the centre Leslie was threatening to resign, and the royal household was being purged—among others, Long, the Secretary, and Sir Edward Walker, the historian of these "brabbles," were ordered off. In the north, Atholl, Ogilvy, Airlie, Middleton, and others had concerted a true Royalist rising, while Charles heard that Strachan was about to make a dash and seize his person. Therefore, on October 4, 1650, The Start occurred. The king, with seven of his household, left the future Duke and Knight of the Garter, Argyll, and rode off from Perth, with no baggage of any kind. Atholl was to send lads from the braes to occupy Perth; Airlie and the loyal Ogilvy were to raise the gentlemen of Angus; Dudhope was to seize Dundee; Middleton was to command under the royal standard. But Charles had blabbed to Wilmot and Buckingham, who were Argyllians. They seem to have persuaded him to countermand the manœuvre on October 2; but, irritated by persistent purging of his household, he reverted to the plan, now all confused, riding off on October 4. But the Committee of Estates had warning from Lothian, while Buckingham had returned to Perth with the news, and a party of Covenanted horse was sent after the king. He, galloping swiftly, reached Airlie's house of Cortachy, and, with a guard of 60 clansmen, made his way to a small cottage in Glenclova, where he was apprehended before dawn, by officers sent from Colonel Montgomery (he who failed to sell to Spain Cromwell's present of 2000 prisoners from Preston). In vain Dudhope and the clansmen assured the king that 2000 horse and 5000 foot were waiting for him up the glen. Montgomery's 600 horse arrived, Charles could not now escape, and, on Sunday, October 6, the unhappy prince was sitting under a powerful preacher at Perth. He abounded in apologies to his gaolers which he couched in the patois of Canaan.

But Atholl's, and Airlie's, and Middleton's men were not apologising. Sir David Ogilvy, a son of Airlie, cut up, on October 21, a regiment sent against the Royalists by the Estates. Leslie went against the victors with 3000 horse (October 24), while Ogilvy came to Perth and had secret interviews with Charles, in the garden by the Tay where Lennox and Gowrie had eaten cherries on the day of the Gowrie Conspiracy, fifty years ago. From Forfar, October 24, Middleton wrote to Leslie: "We are Scottishmen, we desire to fight for our own country; religion, king, and country are at hazard. . . . I beseech you to endeavour unity." On October 26 a new Northern Engagement was sent in, signed by Montrose's old true friend,—to whom he went when, alone and in disguise, he began his war against the Covenanters,—Patrick Graham of Inchbrakie. Atholl, too, signed, and at that date the Atholl men were formidable. Middleton and Mackenzie of Pluscardine, and Sir George Monroe, who had commanded the Scots in Ireland, were banded with the less honourable names, St Clair, Huntly, and Seaforth: all were under the preachers' ban for "the lawless Engagement" and other malignancies. "What shall be done to the least of us all . . . shall be taken as done to us all," said the gentlemen of the north. They pretended to maintain the Covenants, but they clearly meant to fight.

On the 26th the king and Committee of Estates published an indemnity for these gentlemen, even for their "accession to the late unlawful Engagement,"—unlawful because the preachers chose to call it so. On November 4 the Royalists of the north met Leslie at Strathbogie and accepted the indemnity. They had still to "satisfy" the now disrupted "Kirk," by various mummeries of penance. The unity now achieved was to be vain; Cromwell was to be master in the field. But, at last, there was a national spirit of resistance to spiritual tyranny. While the majority of the ministers tardily and reluctantly acquiesced in the decisions of Parliament, in favour of the new combination; a large and noisy minority resisted, under leaders like Guthrie. They were Remonstrants; the less violent majority of the brethren, accepting the resolutions of Parliament, were Resolutioners.

Which of these twain was the True Kirk? *

The gentlemen of the north, and the politicians and generals of Stirling, being in the way of reconciling their differences, the western Whigs under Strachan, with whom Gillespie and the bloodthirsty Nevoy were prophets, held aloof. Their commander, Strachan, having lived through a stormy youth, had, on his conversion, leaned to Sectarianism. He had swallowed the Covenant, at a pinch, but now qualms assailed his military conscience. In place of attacking * Balfour is the authority chiefly followed, with Nash to Edgeman, Dec. 12, 1650. 'Charles II. and Scotland in 1650,' pp. 148-153. See also Walker, and Row's 'Blair,' pp. 242-244, for the Start, and the excommunication of Middleton; and Baillie, iii. pp. 117, 118.

the English, Strachan was perplexing the preachers about points of theology. Was it right to make war against Cromwell? Guthrie and Waristoun rather thought not. They were of the extreme left of the Covenant; and between them and their old ally, Argyll, there was now a great gulf. Argyll had only been strong when he had almost the whole of the Kirk to back him. Baillie held that Charles had yielded, as he did after the Start, "by the extraordinary favour of God."<sup>35</sup> The "favour," naturally, was not conspicuous to really heavenly-minded men like Strachan, Guthrie, and the rest, who, while Cromwell made a trip to Glasgow (October 11-14), moved to Dumfries, and stole horses.<sup>36</sup> At Dumfries they produced a vast Remonstrance, celebrated in the history of the Kirk (October 17). The strong point of the Remonstrance was that, if politics were to be godly it was a mere "deceiving of the Lord" to put Charles in the foremost place. This was absolutely true: there was "no sign of a real change" in Charles, but then politics are politics. The king's heart was not a heart convinced of sin; he had decidedly not passed through the necessary processes of Effectual Calling, Justification, Sanctification, and Adoption. Strachan doubted much whether David Leslie was a chosen vessel; about Charles he had no doubts at all. This argument against "owning the king's interest" was open to the reply of Baillie. The precisians of the west were anxious to suspend the king's government "till he should give satisfactory evidence of his real change, whereof they were to be judges, who were never like to be satisfied." Indeed, only persons very easily satisfied would have regarded Charles as "under conviction." No Government is possible if the administrators are to be set aside when preachers and colonels doubt as to the reality of their conversion. But not to take the stringent measures of Guthrie and Strachan is to abandon the whole idea of "Dominion founded on Grace," is to give up godly politics. It is to be said for the Remonstrants that they, like Montrose, were idealists.*

On November 25 the Committee of Estates hardened their hearts to condemn the Remonstrance as "scandalous and injurious," and, in Elizabeth's words about the Puritans, "of dangerous consequence." Argyll and James Sword, a burgher of St Andrews, carried this reply to the Commissioners of the General Assembly, with charges against Guthrie and Gillespie.<sup>37</sup> The Commissioners found "many sad truths" in the Remonstrance, but, on the other hand, it "trenched upon some conclusions of the General Assembly," a perilous thing to venture. The Remonstrance itself had not been high pitched enough for Strachan, who dissented, and abandoned the western army. On November 26 the Estates met at Perth, and sent Montgomery to the west with a strong force. But Cromwell also had sent Lambert with 3000 horse to attack Strachan's western precisians, who had become equally detested by Malignants and by Sectarians. On December 1, Ker, who now filled Strachan's place, made an attempt to surprise Lambert, in Hamilton, at four in the morning. He was defeated; the righteous were scattered to all the winds, and he himself was taken.<sup>38</sup> On December 24 Dundas made dishonourable surrender of Edinburgh Castle: he was a poltroon, or his heart was with the Remonstrants. At Perth, Charles was talking the language of the Covenant—he had some histrionic talent. Engagers were now admitted, and as the western brethren were in no case to come to Perth, the Commissioners of the General Assembly were sharply spoken to, and decided that "we cannot be against the raising of all fencible persons" except the excommunicated, and all very obstinate evil-doers and Malignants.<sup>39</sup> Strachan, whose scruples had now carried him over to Cromwell, was to be "delivered to the devil." Some officers joined the English invaders; the Presbytery of Stirling, moved by James Guthrie, lifted up its voice for the Remonstrance; the Kirk was split in twain, some holding for the Covenant, and others for king and country; and, on January 1, 1651, Charles II. was crowned at Scone. Argyll placed on Charles's head an earthly crown, but at such a price of humiliations and crimes that Malignants reckoned Charles only to have paid his debt when he helped the marquis to a heavenly one. On January 12 there was an exchange of prisoners with the devil. At Perth, Colonel Strachan "was excommunicate and delivered over to the devil," by Mr Alexander Rollock; while Middleton, in sackcloth, was released from Satan, at Dundee. Mr James Guthrie had promoted the excommunication from which the persistent Middleton was now absolved; and Middleton, an unregenerate fighting man, did not forget. There was "no real change" in Middleton.

* Their Remonstrance may be found in Balfour, iv. pp. 141-160.

The first six months of 1651 were occupied by the Scots partly in throwing open employment to all subjects who would fight for king and country, partly in paper disputes between the preciser sort, the Remonstrants, and the Resolutioners—the clergy who preferred Scotland to Cromwell and even to the letter of the Acts against unlawful Engagers. The Remonstrants, among other arguments, actually based their case on Deuteronomy xxiii. 9-14, a set of sanitary rules applying to the host of Israel in the desert. Where the sacred writer speaks of ordinary sanitary precautions, the Remonstrants understood his words to apply to the presence of Royalists in the royal army. As Guthrie and another minister were demoralising the all-important garrison of Stirling by discourses to such effect as this, they were obliged to reside in Perth. This beginning of persecution is notable.

As regards the inner politics of the Court, Hamilton had been received on January 17, and Argyll retired to his estates, but not for long. Little has been said by us about the project of a marriage between the king and Argyll's daughter, Lady Anne Campbell. We do not know whether the idea originated with Argyll, or was suggested to him, with or without authority from Charles, by Will Murray. Nothing is said on the subject in the extant portion of the promises written by Charles on September 26, 1650, when the king was in so strait a place. In a note to Burnet's 'History of My Own Times,' Lord Dartmouth says that, by Charles's account, given to Colonel Legge at the time, Argyll made the proposal to him. Legge answered that it was wisest to drive time by consulting the queen mother, and so Argyll put Legge into Edinburgh Castle, where he remained till after the Start (October 4, 1650). But Charles did not give instructions on the subject to be conveyed to the queen mother, to Captain Titus, till January 23, 1651. When he did give them, they were in much the same terms as Argyll, according to Lord Dartmouth, had suggested to the king before Colonel Legge's imprisonment, which, again, must have been before the battle of Dunbar (September 3, 1650). The marriage, said Argyll (according to Dartmouth) and said Charles, on January 23, 1651, was to conciliate the Kirk and the Presbyterian party. It may be suggested that the project had been long in contemplation, and that Charles sent off Titus with the proposal to be laid before the queen mother for the purpose of winning back Argyll, who, six days before January 23, had retired to the west.* Titus returned to Scotland in May, by which time Tom Coke, an intriguer for the exiled English Royalists, had been caught in England, and had revealed all the plots and plotters for Royalist risings in England, a mortal blow to the cause. As for the royal marriage with Lady Anne Campbell, the queen mother left it in the condition of an entanglement, not an engagement: it might not be popular in England, and might irritate some factions in Scotland. Lady Anne, of whom we know very little, died about the time of the Restoration, unmarried. It is not probable that she broke her heart for Charles.

* Gardiner, i. pp. 387, 388, citing a letter of January 21, from Edinburgh as to Argyll's retreat ('Mercurius Politicus,' E. 622, 12), and Titus's instructions from Hillier's 'Attempted Escapes of Charles I.,' p. 328. Burnet's 'History of My Own Times.' The suggestion that the dispatch of Titus (who was also to bring Jermyn and Holles as sectaries) implies Charles's wish to win back Argyll, is my

While the king rode about inspecting fortifications; while a man of the border, Watt, made successful raids on parties of Cromwellians, and Augustine, a German, was equally successful; while some English provision ships were seized, and Cromwell "sat under" the grotesque Zacchary Boyd in Glasgow, the war of Remonstrants and Resolutioners was waged on paper. When the Estates met on March 13, Loudoun (who had become obstructive and Remonstrant) ceased to be President, yielding place to Burleigh, the vanquished of Aberdeen. Hamilton won a victory over Argyll on March 26. The question was, were lawless Engagers to be on the Army Committee? Loudoun, Argyll, Burleigh, Lothian, and others voted no, taxing Charles, who spoke, with deserting his best friends, —who had hanged his best friend. They were out-voted, and "at the earnest solicitation of the barons and burghs" (the "middle classes" who owed so much to Argyll) the king "takes upon him the conduct of the army."<sup>40</sup> The Commissioners of the General Assembly were also asked to hasten on the removal of the Act of Classes, and the Estates were to meet on April 17. The Commissioners (March 18) had already intimated that Guthrie maligned them, when he accused them of "going contrary to the Word of God, and to the Solemn League and Covenant."<sup>41</sup> They would now "join cordially against the public enemy." But the Argyll faction delayed the re-assembly of the Estates till May 21, when the Act of Classes was rescinded, the Engagers being obliged to take a band, which they swallowed without wincing (June 2).<sup>42</sup>

This proceeding naturally enraged the Remonstrants. The lawless Engagers professed penitence, the most utter hypocrisy, as Sir own. Nicholas wished both Hamilton and Argyll "in heaven." Argyll "will either betray the king or himself; rather trust Cromwell with his Majesty." Nicholas Papers, i. pp. 219-224; Feb. 8, March 6, 1651.

James Turner frankly declares, and the Kirk accepted the farce. Turner, we know, "had fallen to sin the unknown sin," by his shutting up of the Reverend Mr Dick of Glasgow, at the beginning of the Engagement. But he, even he, was absolved—"Behold a fearful sinne!" So the Remonstrants thought, but the bare fact was that the whole proceedings against Engagers had been absurd, and it was time to come back to practical politics.<sup>43</sup> These ended in the disaster of Worcester; still the great step had been taken, and Scotland was breaking away from "that Dagon, the Covenant." To secure a royal figurehead in Charles II. was rather in the nature of a loss, to baffle the Remonstrants was an inestimable gain. Mr Carlyle does not seem, from his comments, to have understood this point. The process of breaking away from the more extreme fanatics was long and painful as the division of body and soul. The Resolutioners could not without agony abandon their faith in the Covenants, yet Baillie seems, for one, to have honestly persuaded himself that Charles was "so good a king"; moreover, national sentiment was outraged by the dominance of English Regicides, the Presbyterian conscience could not endure the existence of blasphemous Sectarics in the land.<sup>44</sup> The Remonstrants, on the other hand, suffered the sorrow of being obliged to comply with Sectarics, breakers of the Covenant; but they were as certain as Sir James Turner that the repentances of Malignants, of Engagers, and of the king were a blasphemous farce. We regret to have to remark that, on the godly side, Loudoun, the Chancellor, "was procest for adulterie," in June, says Nicoll.

An honest man, under the Covenanting superstition, might have taken either side, but he could have been at ease in neither faction. Since toleration must to him, as to Guthrie, have seemed a "vomit," he could not readily, like Strachan, go over frankly to the Sectarian Cromwell. Perhaps the politics of no country, since time began, were ever in such an inextricable tangle, and all this came from the "legal band" so dexterously woven by Waristoun, Henderson, and others in 1639.

On July 16 the General Assembly met at St Andrews. Guthrie protested against Ruling Elders who had been in the Engagement. Professor Menzies of Aberdeen objected that the members of the Commission of the General Assembly—they having assented to the repeal of the Acts of Classes—were "scandalous persons," who could not sit in ecclesiastical judicatories. "Instantly there arose a great number on both sides, with great heat and fury"; it is to be hoped that the clergy had not carried their whingers into the Assembly, which probably met in the upper hall of the University Library. The object of the Remonstrants, and of Mr Samuel Rutherford, was really to prevent the holding of any General Assembly at all, as they were in the minority. At present they were not an Assembly, but "a confused multitude."* Mr Douglas, of the patriotic party, was chosen Moderator. In the midst of the wrangles over the legality of elections to the Assembly came (July 20) the news of a great defeat of the Royalists at Inverkeithing in Fife.<sup>45</sup>

The Scottish army, at this time, was concentrated about the Torwood, famous in the history of Bruce and Wallace, to prevent Cromwell from crossing the Forth. Lambert had reconnoitred the upper fords, and thought them practicable. Cromwell, with his main body, was at Linlithgow; he bombarded and took Callendar House (where Mary and Darnley had rested on the way to Kirk o' Field), and awaited the arrival of Harrison with reinforcements. These appeared at Leith, 3000 strong, and, in place of attacking the strong central position of the Scots, Cromwell sent a command of some 2500 men across the Queen's Ferry. They were led by Colonel Overton, he who, at Hull, after Preston rout, allowed Sir James Turner to subscribe to a circulating library. Cromwell hoped that this movement would cause Leslie to retreat on Stirling, but he found the Scottish lines still strongly held. In fact, they had dispatched an insufficient force to guard Fife, under Holbourn, with Brown of Fordel—Lord Balcarres was not with his regiment; Sir Walter Scott, an illegitimate son of Buccleuch, was there, and there was a command of the Macleans, the Spartans of the north. On July 19 Lambert was ferrying men and horse over the Queen's Ferry, Overton having secured the tête du pont on the Fifeshire side. The Scots Fife brigade were at Dunfermline, and both armies (though Balfour numbers the English at 10,000, the Scots at 2500) were probably of equal strength, say 4000 men. The English occupied the Ferry Hills on the north of the Firth, and had a breastwork across the little isthmus; the Scots faced them, in a strong position on kopjes, with a pass between. Lambert's left held the pass; he concentrated most of his force on his right wing, which charged up hill at the Scots left. Holbourn fled,—he was acquitted of cowardice by a court-martial, but found it wiser to leave the army. He was the officer who gave orders to extinguish the matches of the Scots matchlockmen at Dunbar. He had been dismissed, as of "doubtful trust," from the command of Stirling Castle; probably he lent too fond an ear to Mr Guthrie's unpatriotic sermons. The Scots reserve followed where Holbourn led—to the rear; the English right conquered the hill where the Scottish left was arrayed, while a fierce battle raged in the pass defended by Lambert's left. The battle was won by the English, Lambert's victorious right reinforcing his left, but Clan Gilzean was undefeated. Five hundred of the Macleans, under Sir Hector of Dowart, stood as they stood at Glenrinn, fought as they fought at Culloden. Now is said to have occurred the incident of "Another for Hector," a proverb in the clan—Scott cites the incident in the duel of the clans on Perth Inch, in 'The Fair Maid of Perth.' But Sir Hector was slain, Balfour says, "with 100 of his followers" (Nicoll makes the number 500), and Brown, mortally wounded, was taken. The Scots "sold their lives at a dear rate," says Balfour. He gives 800 slain on either side; Lambert gives, Scots, 2000 killed, prisoners 1400; English, "not above eight killed, but divers wounded." *Il ment comme un bulletin.**

* The patient reader may consult 'The Nullity of the Pretended Assembly at St Andrews and Dundee,' printed in the year 1652.

The victory at Inverkeithing and the later capture of Burntisland threw Fife open to Cromwell, who could now seize Perth, cut off Leslie's supplies, and stop the Gordons, whom Middleton was bringing down from Aberdeenshire. The General Assembly, in alarm, had deserted St Andrews for Dundee. Here they received a protest against the legality of their Assembly from the recalcitrant ministers, who, as Nicoll puts it, "pronouncit judgementis aganes this Scottis army, and wald not pray nather for the king nor the army." The like of this protest, says Nicoll, "hes not been hard, to ryp up the bowellis of thair mother church." Twenty-two protesters signed, but none appeared in person. They took the objections that the Assembly was "prelimited" by a letter of the Commissioners to the Presbyteries, "desiring them to cite all unsatisfied men to the Assembly, if, after conference, they were not satisfied." Exactly the same thing had been done, as regarded ministers who had not declared against the Engagement, in 1648.<sup>46</sup> The godly party, the Protesters of 1651, attempted to make out their case by "the most flagrant distortion and suppression of facts." It is needless to examine the hairsplitting by which the Protesters tried to prove the illegality of an Assembly in which they had not a majority. A few of their lay brethren, playing the spy for the English, were taken and hanged at this time, as Nicoll records with relish. The end of the affair was that Monk captured the Moderator of the Assembly and a few other brethren, and that a schism arose, the anti-patriotic party being now known as Protesters. They and their opposites wrangled and split legal hairs during the Cromwellian occupation of Scotland.<sup>47</sup>

* See Douglas, 'Cromwell's Scottish Campaigns,' pp. 274-287. Mr Douglas cites 'An Historical Account of the Clan Maclean' (1838), by a Seannachie, who writes from clan legend. But the author of the MS. edited by myself as 'The Highlands in 1750' (Blackwood), gives, at that date, a similar account of the Spartan valour of the Macleans at Inverkeithing and on other fields. This writer was, I believe, a Mr Bruce, a trusted agent of the Hanoverian Government and of the Pelhams. Cf. Cromwell, Letter clxxv., on the day after the battle, and Mr Douglas's authorities, and Balfour, iv. p. 313. Nicoll, pp. 53, 54. Sir James Turner succeeded to the command of Holbourn's regiment. Even with Mr Douglas's local knowledge, the exact place and conditions of the ground are only dubiously ascertainable.

As Leslie was outflanked by Cromwell's command of Fife and the Firth, he and the king took a daring step—the only step open to them perhaps, and, while Cromwell was engaged at Perth, they invaded England. If the Royalists and Presbyterians of England joined them, all might yet be well. But Tom Coke's revelations in spring had broken the Royalists, who, moreover, felt no desire to endure Presbyterianism, certain to be thrust on them if the Scots were victorious. The Engagers, too, had treated the English Royalists infamously in 1648. The English populace at large had no love of the Scots, who, in their simple opinion, had already sold their king, and had also plundered freely, as they received no pay when engaged for England in the late war.

Cromwell was not taken aback by Leslie's movement. He had sent Harrison with 3000 horse and other forces to the Border, and he now bade Monk take Stirling—a feat easily achieved. On August 4, Cromwell, writing to Lenthall, the Speaker, mildly observed that the Scottish invasion "may occasion some inconveniences." But he remembered how he had destroyed the Engagers at Preston, not by cutting between them and London, but between them and Scotland. Lambert was following Leslie; Cromwell was following Lambert;<sup>48</sup> both were between the Scots and their way of retreat homewards.

Cromwell is so cool at an agitating moment that even a Scottish chronicler must admire this efficient leader. The Scottish force was reckoned by the not less sympathetic Sir James Turner at 4000 horse and 9000 foot, with a few field pieces and "leather cannons, dear Sandy's stoups."* On the march to Carlisle the Scots plundered cruelly, but in England discipline was enforced.

In Scotland, while the Royalists marched south, "to win or lose all," and were "laughing at the ridiculousness of our own condition," Argyll stayed at home. He had fallen utterly from power, and was held in some contempt. A Royalist success could not improve his position; a Royalist defeat he did not wish to share. Politics conducted on theocratic principles, with the temporary aid of the lairds and burgesses, had broken down beneath his feet. Meanwhile, in Scotland all went wrong. The Committee of Estates, under Loudoun, was split into parties. Loudoun induced Argyll to meet him in Strathfillan, and asked him why he had deserted the Committee and lent no aid? The unlucky Committee met, and was captured at Alyth by an English party on August 28. Leven, Lindsay, the Earl Marischal, Keith, and Ogilvy, and eight preachers were caught, including Mr JAMES SHARP.<sup>49</sup> On September 1 Monk stormed Dundee. He twice, while preparing for the attack with artillery, offered quarter, says Nicoll, and adds that, after the storming, he "put all that were found out of doors to the sword, both man and woman."

On the part of Montrose at Aberdeen, such alleged conduct is severely reprobated by historians. But Monk was not a Royalist, nor were his men Papists. "Our word was God with Us," says an English writer who was present, and he adds that the English gave quarter "when they got to the market place." Obviously they did not give quarter before they reached the centre of the town. Balfour puts the number of women and children killed at 200. Mr Gardiner writes: "It is probable enough that before resistance ceased, some women and children and some inhabitants not in arms shared the fate of the combatants on the wall." Monk now gave up the place to sack for twenty-four hours, and a very great plunder was taken. Mr Hill Burton, who holds that (if we only knew) Montrose's men committed fearful atrocities at Dundee, disbelieves in a Dundee massacre by Monk's men. But such things did occur when towns were taken; and though we must accept what Spalding says of the misdeeds of Montrose, it seems proper to doubt or minimise the slayings attributed to Monk. What happened in his case was "the natural result of a storm" (Gardiner). Such is the impartiality of history. Covenanters and Sectaries may steal a horse; Royalists must not look over the fence.* As the biographer of Blair observes, Scotland had now no earthly hope except from the success of her army in England.

* Mr Gardiner prefers Lord Wentworth's reckoning, 12,000, in Cary's 'Mem. of the Civil War,' ii. p. 303. But Turner, by constant practice, was an adept at counting men.

We left the Scottish army, under David Leslie and Charles, on the point of crossing the English border by the Carlisle route. Argyll was not with them; his military successes had been inconspicuous. Mr Gardiner says: "The retreat of Argyll, necessary as it was, marks a descent which he would never be able to retrieve. He had disgusted all parties, because, though he was in some respects wiser than any, he had not dared to uphold in the day of peril the standard he had himself raised in more prosperous times" ('C. and P.,' ii. 34, 1903). "All the rogues have left us," wrote Hamilton. As the Marchioness of Argyll was in bad health, her lord received the royal permission to attend her sick bed. But Lord Lorne marched with the army, and probably led a contingent of Clan Diarmaid. On his courage no reproach was ever thrown.

The army, like that of Prince Charles in 1745, received few English recruits; for the last, the Engagers' army, had basely deserted its English allies. The militia of England, however, rallied gaily to their country's cause. Lambert and Harrison abandoned the design of a cavalry attack on the Scots at Warrington Bridge; but, on August 25, Lilbourne defeated the contingent of the loyal Earl of Derby at Wigan, and Royalist Manchester could not aid Charles by such self-sacrificing efforts as she made later for the White Rose. Rebuffed at Shrewsbury, Charles reached Worcester on August 22; but again he was there left uncomforted by recruits. Cromwell was advancing with 28,000 men to meet the 16,000 Royalists. On August 28, Lambert seized a broken bridge over the Severn at Upton, repaired it, and crossed the river with 11,000 men; and * 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 11-14; Nicoll, p. 58; Balfour, iv. pp. 315, 316. Balfour is much more angry with "cruel Monk" for sending three preachers to England than on any other score (Gardiner, i. pp. 468-470). Row, in 'Life of Blair,' talks of the English "not sparing women and children." The Rev. Dr M'Crie, the editor of Row, speaks as tartly of Monk as if Monk had been a Montrose, which is fair. (Blair, pp. 281, 282.)

Cromwell threw wooden bridges over the Teme, some two miles from Worcester. Militia of the Puritan eastern counties raised the English force to 31,000 men, and in various places large bodies were assembling to repel the advance of the Presbyterian Scots, dear neither to Malignants nor to Sectaries, and hated as foreigners. Having completed his bridges, Cromwell advanced and drove the Scots forces outside of the town into Worcester, which had been hastily fortified to some extent. At best it was but another Sedan, a death-trap, which the young king perceived.

Leaving the cathedral tower, whence he had watched the operations, he headed a cavalry charge against the English forces still on the east side of the river, where it was crossed by the bridge of boats. Cromwell recrossed in force, and the Scots were driven pell-mell into Worcester, mown down by their own captured guns. Their infantry surrendered; their horse failed to cut a way through; but the king was rescued by a squadron under Edward Wogan, "a very beautiful person," says Clarendon. Though historians overlook the circumstance, it is reported to Dean Swift in a letter from Sir Charles Wogan, the gallant and accomplished knight who carried off Clementina Sobieska from her prison at Innspruck to be the bride of James VIII. (the Chevalier de St. George). Wogan was to be renowned later for an exploit not less daring than the rescue of the king at Worcester. Hamilton died of his wounds; David Leslie was taken; Middleton was a prisoner, and might have been executed but for Sir James Turner, who refused parole, went merrily to London in disguise, and helped Middleton to make his escape. Both men joined Charles when, after his Odyssey of perilous adventures, he sailed to the Continent.

Such was "the crowning mercy" of Worcester on Cromwell's lucky day, and, later, his death day—September 3. Cromwell had more than double the number of his adversaries, who could only have won by virtue of extraordinary incapacity and cowardice on the English side. No such opportunities were given to the Scots. Many a man in England wished for the king's advent; Turner found the jolly bargees of Oxford most loyally tipsy. But nobody wanted Scottish Presbyterianism, or, in any case, Scots who had "sold their king for a groat." The Covenant, with its fruits, had not made Scotland more popular in England—rather emphatically the reverse. As for the king, who was a gay, undaunted exile, Catholics saved his life. "Puritan governments," says Mr Gardiner, "had taken good care that Charles should be absolutely secure of the devotion of every Catholic in England."

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER VIII.

- <sup>1</sup> 'Select Biographies,' i. p. 170. Wodrow Society.
<sup>2</sup> 'Diary of Alexander Jaffray,' 32-33. The book, in fact, is not a contemporary diary, but memoirs, written later.
<sup>3</sup> 'Select Biographies,' i. p. 174.
<sup>4</sup> Clarendon State Papers, ii., Appendix lii.
<sup>5</sup> 'Charles II. and Scotland in 1650,' p. 52.
<sup>6</sup> 'Charles II. and Scotland,' pp. 77-80.
<sup>7</sup> Gardiner, i. p. 228 (Nicholas Papers, i. p. 186).
<sup>8</sup> Balfour, iv. pp. 61-63.
<sup>9</sup> Nicholas Papers, Camden Society, i. pp. 161-172.
<sup>10</sup> Napier, ii. p. 766.
<sup>11</sup> 'Charles II. and Scotland in 1650,' pp. 115, 116.
<sup>12</sup> 'Charles II. and Scotland in 1650,' p. 111.
<sup>13</sup> 'Select Biographies,' i. p. 183. <sup>14</sup> Act. Parl., vi., ii. p. 603.
<sup>15</sup> Nicoll, p. 18. <sup>16</sup> Gardiner, i. pp. 282-286.
<sup>17</sup> Nicoll, pp. 19, 20; Act. Parl., vi., ii. p. 586.
<sup>18</sup> Balfour, iv. p. 89.
<sup>19</sup> Carlyle's Cromwell Letter, 136. <sup>20</sup> Peterkin, p. 599.
<sup>21</sup> Balfour, iv. pp. 89-91; 'Charles II. and Scotland,' 131-132; Edward Walker, 'Historical Discourses,' pp. 170-176 (1705).
<sup>22</sup> 'Charles II. and Scotland in 1650,' pp. 131, 132.
<sup>23</sup> Gardiner, i. p. 311 (1894); S.P. ix. p. 152.
<sup>24</sup> 'Charles II. and Scotland in 1650,' pp. 142-148.
<sup>25</sup> Nicoll, pp. 24, 25. <sup>26</sup> Carlyle, Letter cxxxix.
<sup>27</sup> Walker, 'Historical Discourses,' p. 179.
<sup>28</sup> 'Life of Blair,' p. 237. <sup>29</sup> Baillie, iii. 111.
<sup>30</sup> Gardiner, i. p. 319; 'Commons Journals,' vi. p. 464.
<sup>31</sup> Carte, 'Original Letters,' i. p. 382.
<sup>32</sup> Balfour, iv. pp. 98-102. <sup>33</sup> Balfour, iv. pp. 102-108.
<sup>34</sup> Carlyle, September 9-12, 1650. <sup>35</sup> Baillie, iii. p. 114.
<sup>36</sup> Baillie, iii. p. 118. <sup>37</sup> Balfour, iv. pp. 173-178.
<sup>38</sup> Carlyle, Letter cliii. <sup>39</sup> Row's 'Blair,' p. 251.
<sup>40</sup> Balfour, iv. pp. 274-281; Act. Parl., vi., ii. pp. 662, 663.
<sup>41</sup> Balfour, iv. p. 292.
<sup>42</sup> Act. Parl., vi., ii. pp. 676, 677; Row's 'Blair,' pp. 271, 272.
<sup>43</sup> Turner, pp. 93, 94.
<sup>44</sup> Baillie, iii. p. 145. <sup>45</sup> Peterkin, pp. 626-628.
<sup>46</sup> Mathieson, ii. pp. 93, 94, 137, and note 2.
<sup>47</sup> Peterkin, pp. 628, 629. <sup>48</sup> Cromwell, Letter clxxx., Carlyle.
<sup>49</sup> Nicoll, pp. 56, 57; 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' p. 23; Scot. Hist. Soc., Firth.

CHAPTER IX.

FROM WORCESTER TO THE RESTORATION.

1651-1660.

THE history of Scotland, from Worcester fight to the Restoration, is the tale of an interesting but incomplete experiment. The country was conquered, as it had been conquered by Edward I., and the vanquished were to enjoy the privilege of sending members to an English Parliament. Oaths were imposed, as by Edward in Ragman's Roll, and Scotland was placed under a people more advanced in civilisation than herself. She, far more than England, was entangled in the rusty chains of a feudalism which had lost its ideal. The bonds of kinship were still stronger in some ways than duty to the State. Justice was tardy and corrupt, partly through the old heritable jurisdictions held by nobles and barons, partly because "The Fifteen," the judges, were not "kinless loons," but partisans of the causes of their "names" and of their retainers. The towns, if Edinburgh is a fair specimen, were unlit at night, and at all times were abominably dirty. The ministers were still struggling to maintain their spiritual judicatories, and to drag men and women before their tribunals, for their religious opinions, or moral conduct in private life. The English came; they insisted that justice should be relatively rapid and honest, that the town should be lighted and comparatively clean. To them the victims of Presbyteries could appeal; while a man, if he chose not to observe the Presbyterian Sabbath with due strictness, or if his reading and reflection inclined him to object to the baptism of babies, might act, with some safety, as his conscience dictated.

At church he might "sit under" preaching corporals or colonels, who, as Nicoll admits, if "not orderly called," according to Presbyterian ideas, were none the less "weil giftit." These divines found most acceptance in Sutherland, where the devout listeners attested by deep groanings that they were mightily moved. In some respects the new régime suited the Malignants. If the king was expelled, the preachers were considerably reduced. But the partition of the estates of nobles and gentlemen among Cromwellian generals was unendurable. The commons, though attempts were made to gain their goodwill, felt the burden of the heavy "cess" for the maintenance of the English army of occupation. The preachers of both factions, Protesters or Resolutioners, bewailed the English tolerance, the spread of novel doctrines, the broken Covenant, and their own loss of power. The English leaned towards the Remonstrants; they preferred young Protester preachers, and violently "intruded" them on patriotic parishes, against the resistance of the congregations. They thrust Protesters into the high places of the universities; Gillespie, for example, was made by them Principal of Glasgow. They broke up the General Assembly, to the joy of some Protesters, who held it to be illegal. The two parties fought in sermons and pamphlets, and the Protesters, as a body, could not be won over by English blandishments. The nobles and gentry resented the loss of their lands, the commons had the old national instinct, the clans were unsubdued, and ten years passed amidst discontent, conspiracies, heresies, and risings, while the Covenant was sensibly depreciated.

A few examples of these various sufferings and sorrows may serve to illustrate the turmoil of the times. The national resistance in arms was cowed when Monk's army of occupation was reinforced after Worcester. It was said that all the nobles of Scotland now at liberty might sit together on a joint stool; France had not been brought lower after Poitiers than her old ally was now. Huntly capitulated with Monk, who lay in bad health at Dundee, and presently went to Bath, to take the waters. The Atholl men came to terms; Balcarres yielded in December; at the end of November the English had occupied Inverness; Dumbarton Castle, the Bass, and finally, on May 26, 1652, Dunnottar Castle opened their gates, but Dunnottar was vainly searched for the Regalia, the crown, the sceptre, the sword given by the Pope to James IV., and the other honours of Scotland. They had been carried away by a woman, in a bundle of flax, and entrusted to Mrs Grainger, wife of the minister of Kinneff, who concealed them under the floor of the kirk. The brave commander, Ogilvy, and his wife, who managed the business, were long imprisoned, but kept their secret.* Argyll still stood aloof. But for the capture of many of the Committee of Estates at Alyth, he might perhaps have made an effort to save Dundee from Monk's besieging army; but Wemyss affirmed that the marquis had raised no levies since Charles entered England.<sup>1</sup> Argyll (October 15) had attempted to arrange a conference for terms of peace with Monk, who refused, unless he had orders from his Government.<sup>2</sup> Only Loudoun, Home, Callendar, and Cardross attended an attempted Parliament at the head of Loch Tay; Argyll was too ill to appear. Moreover, his terms with England included his prevention of this meeting.

In January, Commissioners from England came to arrange a union of Scotland and England; and among the deputies from shires who accepted the terms was one from Argyllshire (April 26, 1652). Deane and Lilburne, in August 1652, entered the marquis's domains in force, and he signed a document regulating his position. He was to keep quiet, and inform the officers of the nearest garrison concerning any Royalist movement in his region: "It being always intended that this shall not hinder his Lordship's good endeavours for the establishing religion according to his conscience." Probably this clause was intended to save his oath to the Covenants; his efforts were not to be "by force." He, or Lorne, was to be ready to remove to any place in England; for the rest, he was to be secure in lands and property, except for the "cess" (August 19, 1652).<sup>3</sup> The English had to be content with this arrangement, enforced by five garrisons, but they heard that Glengarry, with 4000 men, intended to punish those who complied with the conquerors. Glengarry, or the Campbells themselves, more probably, took three of the garrisons as soon as Deane withdrew, two remained—at Dunstaffnage and Dunolly.<sup>4</sup>

The Union with Scotland, involving the overthrow of the Scottish Crown, was negotiated by a few Commissioners sent to London, men whom Lilburne denounced to Cromwell as "notoriously corrupt," and not satisfactory to "the most godly," that is the Protesters (Dalkeith, May 3, 1653). In September of 1653, Loudoun, writing to Charles, exposed the illegality of the proceedings. For example, "toleration to all sorts of religions" was established, "in any Gospel way every man pleaseth to choose,"* Catholicism, of course, not being reckoned as a "Gospel way." All the king's property of every kind was confiscated, with the property of those engaged in the invasions which collapsed at Worcester and Preston. "The whole estates, personal and real, of all true Scottish men are most unjustly forfeited." As for the Commissioners sent to London to treat for the Union, they were selected only by seven or eight gentlemen of each county that sent any Commissioners at all; and even the men sent only complied for fear that the Protesters would take open part with the English. Moreover, as regards religion, the Scottish Church had not been consulted in any single circumstance; nor were the nobles (mostly prisoners) consulted.<sup>5</sup>

* The story is told by Ogilvy, in 'Papers relative to the Regalia,' Bannatyne Club, and by Mr Brook in 'Scottish History Society Miscellany'; Row's 'Blair,' p. 332; 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' xviii., xix. pp. 339-342.

The Union was received by Scotland with a manifest lack of enthusiasm. England was swallowing and assimilating Scotland, and, by cess and forfeiture, devouring her real and personal property, while her distracted Kirk was set on one side. The Commission of Justice established in May 1652 might deserve all the praises given to it by Nicoll, as "proceeding more equitablie and conscientiouslie nor our own Scottis magistrates"; . . . "whereby some of the suitors declared that they found more love and kindness towards them by their supposed enemies, than of their own countrymen and friends . . . Their justice exceeded the Scottish in many things, as was reported."<sup>6</sup> But it was not every Scot who wanted strict justice. The privilege of sending a poor thirty members to the English Parliament was derisory, above all when, in April 1653, Cromwell turned the Long Parliament out of doors.

The Kirk being down, the northern Cavaliers beheld a gleam of light in a dark sky. They put forth, in March 1652, a declaration against "the bloody and barbarous inconveniences which hath always accompanied the Presbyterial Government, by their mixed authority with the civil power, and tyrannous persecuting of men's consciences." These Cavaliers and Cromwell were of one mind about the Kirk. Her preaching and praying are factious; her railing against authority sets the populace against the Union. The authors of the document abandon Presbytery, and esteem the excommunications of Presbyters no more than their fathers did those of the Pope.<sup>7</sup> Sir Alexander Irving of Drum, being bullied by Mr John Row and * See 'The Cromwellian Union,' Prof. Sanford Terry. Scottish History Society, xxvi. In this work the chaotic negotiations as to the Union will be found; as they came to nothing, they need not be dwelt upon.

the Presbytery of Aberdeen in the old way, for saying "if the Monarchy be gone, let the Devil take Presbytery," appealed to Colonel Overton, Commander-in-Chief within the said Presbytery of Aberdeen. Monk, in October 1651, had forbidden the preachers to impose oaths and covenants on the lieges, and had prohibited the civil magistrates from molesting excommunicated persons, or seizing their goods, or boycotting them. Thus the great and galling curse of Scotland, Presbyterian excommunication, was removed by English soldiers; and what no Stuart had the courage and force wholly to uproot—the tyranny of the preachers—was cast to the winds. Drum also appealed to Monk against the proceedings in which he was charged with Popery. He would yield if Lambert, Monk, Overton, or their substitutes, so commanded. Meanwhile "let me not be troubled with more such papers, that are but undigested rhapsodies of confused nonsense." Blessings on the name of Sir Alexander Irving of Drum! What had long needed saying this gentleman said. An English journalist wrote that "the buttoned cassock and bucky ruff" of the Rev. Andrew Cant ought to be "sent to Rome for relics of the Kirk of Scotland's conformity to the Canons and Constitutions of that Scarlet" person "who sits upon the Seven Hills," "as if ane wasna braid aneuch for her auld hurdies," says Andrew Fairservice.

The night is near gone!

said the song of the Reformers, in 1550-1560. The night was going, slowly, for "their stools of hypocritical repentance to chastise the incontinent" returned, and endured for more than a century.* The cry of gardy loo, and the throwing of filth out of windows, and the blackness of the unlit stinking streets, also returned when the English conquerors departed. These institutions had been reformed, for Edinburgh, as early as December 1651.<sup>8</sup> Smollett discovered the restored abominations yet prevalent, as may be read in 'Humphrey Clinker.'

In Kirk affairs the Protesters kept on protesting. As they "disallowed" the last Assembly, so they "disallowed" its once dreaded Commission, and appointed such of themselves as, like Guthrie, had belonged to the previous Commission, to remain as the only genuine sources of authority till things were reconstructed in accordance with their ideas (October 1651).<sup>9</sup> They protested against the Assembly of 1652, Waristoun heading the recalitrants.<sup>10</sup> They refused to pray for the king, a practice frequently forbidden by the English, so that prayers had to be edged in "for a distressed prince." They published a book, 'The Nullity of the Pretended Assembly at St. Andrews and Aberdeen' (1651), written, apparently, by Guthrie and Waristoun. Baillie found it "full of niggie-naggies, for no edification."<sup>11</sup> Finally, on July 20, 1653, Lilburne, taking up the part of purger, sent Lieutenant-Colonel Cotterell and Captain Hope to break up the General Assembly. By what warrant, the officers asked, did they sit? The Moderator, Mr. Dickson, replied, in the old strain, "that they had power from Jesus Christ to convene in his own High Court." Cotterell was backed, says Baillie, by "some rats of musketeers and a troop of horse"; he led the clergy out to Bruntsfield Links, and, next day, made them leave Edinburgh.<sup>12</sup>

* 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 348-356.

The Protesters, who tried to meet, were also packed off. Baillie says that they "insulted," Lilburne says that "they seemed very joyful," when the Resolutioners were broken up, but they managed, says Row, to protest both against the legality of the Assembly and against the dismissal of that illegal body. The Presbytery of Cupar was also sent about its business. Lilburne (July 12, 1653) had written to ask Cromwell how he should deal with the Assembly, for there were stirrings in the Highlands, and he suspected an alliance between Bible and bands and dirk and dourlach. Not hearing from Cromwell, Lilburne took the matter into his own hands.<sup>13</sup> Before the Kirk was thus reduced to subjection, the English occupants of Scotland had felt the pulse of a Highland rising, and Lilburne, as early as April 1653, had expressed his suspicion that the ministers "of the Assembly party" were vaguely encouraging it. The Remonstrants, or Protesters, including Waristoun, Guthrie, and Rutherford, had presented him with their book, 'The Causes of Wrath,' and with a pious letter. Lilburne hoped that some use might be made of the Remonstrants; but they were "kittle to shoe behind."<sup>14</sup>

The Highlands had never been absolutely quiet; Glengarry had his men out, and, in June 1652, Deane had sent forces through the north.<sup>15</sup> In the same month (June 25) Charles, from the Louvre, had announced to the loyalists of the north that Middleton would communicate with them. Charles also (August 5) wrote to the Moderator of the General Assembly, thanking that body for its loyalty.<sup>16</sup> On August 9/19 he gave Middleton his instructions. He was to go to Holland and take counsel with Hyde, he was to keep in touch with the Highland loyalists, and try to collect money during the winter among the mercantile Scots abroad.<sup>17</sup> Sir James Turner was with Middleton, and, before going to the Hague, he despatched Harry Knox with autograph letters from the king to Lauderdale and other Worcester prisoners then in the Tower (Sir James had made his own escape, after Worcester, in his usual diverting way). Other letters were for the Highland leaders, but all were misdirected, misdelivered, and interlined, with the most mischievous results, by Balcarres, as Hyde told Turner.<sup>18</sup> Sir James then went on the search for dollars, and Nicholas saw Middleton, who "seems a very modest discreet person, such as I have not yet met with of his nation" (Nov. 18/28, 1652).<sup>19</sup> Nicholas had already told Hyde about the intended Highland rising, which was like all Highland risings.

Charles and his advisers knew very well that chiefs would quarrel about pride of place till Middleton came, and various diplomatic devices were vainly attempted to control their tempers. They needed a Montrose, a Dundee, or a Prince Charles to lead. "Glengarry will not take it well that any man be put to have a superior command to him in the Highlands," says Nicholas.<sup>20</sup> Sir James Macdonald of Sleat was expected to appear in arms, but we presently find him making his peace with Colonel Fitch, just as Sir Alexander Macdonald of Sleat did in 1745 (Feb. 15, 1652).<sup>21</sup> But Charles went on including Sleat among the loyal. By way of securing a figurehead for the Highland barque, Charles, in March 1652, selected the Earl of Glencairn.<sup>22</sup> Glencairn was to conduct himself by various devices "which are most natural for any temper they can be supposed to be in": his Majesty recognising the vastness of the range of tempers open to the fiery Celt. Glengarry's men, in fact, were in the temper of stealing the Earl of Atholl's cows, on the plausible pretext that Atholl paid cess to the king's enemies, as the chief explained. "Soe my opinion is your people looke the better to themselves, qhich is the further advice of your lordship's humble servant, Donald Glengarie."<sup>23</sup>

Lilburne spoke of the loyal clans as "thieves" and "rabble," such is the ignorance of the Saxon.

What was Argyll doing at this time? He had engaged to keep his country and family as peaceable as might be. "The course he takes" (compliance with the English) "is merely for self-preservation," wrote Sir Robert Murray to Charles at this time. "He thinks men and things are not yet ripe enough to appear in arms," but, if the thing were safe, "he would certainly appear for the business that is now carrying on for your Majesty's service." Not a doubt about that, if the thing could be done securely and "effectually in his judgment."<sup>24</sup> Meanwhile Lorne, according to the good Scottish custom, "will most fully, heartily, and actively join with those that appear here for your Majesty."

This condition of the Argyll family proved fatal to the marquis. The English thought of him as Sir Robert Murray did,—he would be loyal to Charles, if he thought it safe. Consequently, at his trial under the Restoration, Monk put in Argyll's letters to himself and Lilburne, written at and after this period. In these the marquis was so unfortunate as to give information and assistance to the king's rebels, and on the strength of his letters, though manifestly written "for self-preservation," he was condemned. From Inveraray, on April 14, 1653, Lorne wrote a letter to the king, professing ardent loyalty.<sup>25</sup> By July, Lorne had ridden off to join "that crew," as Argyll calls the loyalists in a letter to Lilburne, and the marquis had written to Lorne, bidding him to "forbear such courses," under the threat of a father's curse. He then adds the curse, "as per copy" enclosed to Lilburne.<sup>26</sup> Either Argyll was sincere in "those great curses which he spoke," or he was not. If sincere, he laid himself open to the fatal charge of high treason. If insincere, he laid himself open to the anger of the English, especially of Monk, who, in fact, exposed these unlucky letters at Argyll's trial. In the following year Baillie described Argyll as "in friendship with the English, but in hatred with the country; he courts the Remonstrators, who were and are averse from him."<sup>27</sup>

In this desolation ended the "statesmanship" which placed political power in the hands of the Kirk. The pretensions of the Kirk were utterly incompatible with earthly politics. When Argyll came to perceive this fact, in 1650, he necessarily incurred the odium of the clerical extremists, while his attitude, after Worcester, lost him the support both of the "Assembly party" among the preachers, and of the middle classes. Most of the nobles were either hostile, or exiled, or lay in English prisons; he was alone.

In July the Highland leaders held meetings, Glencairn being proclaimed "Governor,"—the military leadership was left in the vague till Middleton should arrive ; he was expected to come from Norway. The Lowland lords were said to distrust the Celts, and "rag more as Montrose did,"—the word "brag" is perhaps a plausible emendation. The Celts were driving the cows of the pious Brodie of Brodie, and committing other outrages, says a news-letter.<sup>28</sup> By August 6 Lilburne reported to Cromwell that the rising had begun in earnest. Kenmure was "on and awa," as in Burns's song about his descendant. The Gordons of Kenmure (on Loch Ken in Galloway) had an amazing knack of being on the losing hand. Seaforth (son of the man so faithless to Montrose), Balcarres, Sir George Monroe, and many others were out, and nightly did parties from the Lowlands slip through the English lines, while parties from the Highlands made raids into "the braes." Lilburne at this time believed in the sincerity of Argyll's attempt to coerce Lord Lorne ; and he broke up a gathering of Remonstrant preachers at Biggar, where Mr Douglas, released from the Tower, was present.<sup>29</sup>

Waiting for Middleton, the Royalists merely made incursions, Kenmure pushing as far as the south coast of Fife, while Lilburne, in a hostile country, without reinforcements, lay on the defensive. Lorne quarrelled both with Glencairn and Glengarry ; * Argyll, protesting to Lilburne that "my way shall be found straight," by sending valuable intelligence enabled Colonel Cobbett to take Dowart Castle, the fortress of the Macleans in Mull.<sup>30</sup> Balcarres and Glencairn were now at open feud, and the whole Highland party was distracted by jealousies.<sup>31</sup> Charles was aware that the English "brag much" of Argyll's communications with them, and of "the great assistance and benefit" which they thence derived ; this he imparted to Lorne (November 2, 1653). He hoped that "no example would corrupt" the Campbells. If Lorne imparted, as is probable, the king's views to his father, Argyll had his warning.<sup>32</sup> At this time he was consulting with Lilburne at Dalkeith.<sup>33</sup>

* The Governor of Ruthven Castle for the English reports that, after a dispute between Lorne and Glencairn, Lorne fled, and sent a letter to the English commander, "to advise me where to fall on Glencairn's men to the best advantage ; but his bearer, proving false, carried the letter to Kenmure," which caused Lorne to take to flight ('Diurnal of Occurrences in Scotland.' Spottiswoode Miscellany, ii. 158). Glencairn certainly suspected Lorne, but there is no reason to believe that he was treacherous.

From Loch Lomond to Strathspey the Highlanders were up, and Lilburne found the whole country and the preachers ready to rise if a chance appeared. Even a Remonstrant Presbytery decided that they preferred Kenmure to the English.<sup>84</sup> Onfalls were made everywhere; the house of the pious Waristoun was plundered. Atholl had joined the Royalists; the English Governor of Ruthven in Badenoch in vain pointed out to them that England "is about to incorporate you, and make you one free Commonwealth with themselves." That was not what they wanted; even though the wavering Remonstrants now changed their minds again.<sup>85</sup> Cobbett, returning from the Isles, which he had mastered, would probably have been cut off in marching through Argyll's country, but for the protection of the marquis. As far south as Berwick, Dumfries, and Galloway, the moss-troopers were riding, and the country was so distressed that Lilburne advised a reduction of taxation (Dec. 6).<sup>86</sup> There were "35,000 captions out against men." The king thought of coming to Scotland, and Hyde (December 19) bade Middleton, in that case, "be sure the Kirk be modest, which will be the greatest argument to the king to venture with them, and that he be sure they will not use him as they did."<sup>87</sup>

At this juncture came the chivalrous Wogan, who rescued the king at Worcester. Long afterwards (Feb. 29, 1732), Sir Charles Wogan wrote to Swift about his gallant kinsman. "Clarendon looks upon him as a little out of his senses, because he was extremely loyal and brave. He omits, however, giving him the honour of having saved the king's life, at the battle, or rather flight, of Worcester, by the desperate stand he made at the head of 300 horse, against Cromwell's whole army, in the suburbs of that town, till the king and Colonel Careless were out of sight."<sup>88</sup> Wogan, of an ancient family of Wales, with branches in Ireland and in Essex, was originally on the Parliamentary side. He joined the Engagers in 1648; had no better fortune at Preston than his kinsfolk, Nick and Charles Wogan, in 1715; distinguished himself at the defence of Duncannon, against Cromwell's Irish invasion in 1649; and now brought over a little troop of horse from France. Landing at Dover, he and his men, in small groups, rode through hostile England, gathered recruits on their road, and, early in December 1653, made their way to Peebles. "They are gallantly mounted, richly clothed, and well armed, all men of good quality, had abundance of gold about them," said an observer at Peebles.

Between Paris and Peebles they were but twenty-seven nights on the way,

When Wogan rode first of the tender and true.

Must we add that "Wogan carried off the minister's horse"?* "Their march was almost miraculous," wrote Captain Peter Mews, after the glorious Wogan had died of a wound, and want of medical attendance.<sup>39</sup> Scott has celebrated Wogan in verse, and perhaps few remember that this later avatar, as it were, of Montrose, had a Regicide kinsman, Thomas Wogan.

The letters of Lilburne in the end of 1653, prove that he was very sensible of the dangers which the English dominion was incurring. He hoped to be superseded by Monk, but the war with the Dutch detained Monk in England. We may conceive the emotions of Argyll at this time, if he learned, as he probably must have done, that the king was well aware of his dealings with the English; and had been asked to issue a warrant for declaring him a traitor, on the ground of his general hostility to the Royal Cause, and especially "for joining the English in his own person in the taking of the Castle of Dowart,"—so writes Glencairn to Major Strachan.<sup>40</sup> "Argyll only has hindered all this summer's service," Glencairn adds in his instructions to Strachan, who is to visit Charles, and complain of "Balcarres's calumnies against Middleton and me." Balcarres, it was thought, destroyed the chances of this rising, but the king continued to trust him; he died abroad just before the Restoration. Nicholas writes (March 5, N.S., 1654) that Middleton has just sailed, at last, for Scotland, and that "there is a great combination forming against Lt.-Gen. Middleton and the king's service, by means of the malice of the Lord Balcarres and the treacherous practices of the Marquis of Argyll's faction in Scotland."<sup>41</sup>

On February 6, 1654, Charles had given Middleton his instructions: he himself, if his General found the circumstances encouraging, would set out for Scotland. All men were to shun a Colonel Bamfield, who, treacherously or not, had been taking a great deal upon himself, flattering Glengarry with a draft of a patent of the Earldom of Ross. The Huntly of the day, that Lord Lewis Gordon who played such a sorry part in the time of Montrose, did not show signs of stirring; but, as usual, his younger brother, Lord Charles, was ready to join the king's party.* Middleton arrived in Sutherland in the end of February 1654. Captain Peter Mews, who was with him, describes the forced march across the frosty rivers, and how, with Lord Reay and the Mackays, they watched the garrison of Wick. They were joined by Glengarry, Glencairn, Atholl, Kenmure, and others, 2500 men and 500 horse: Wogan had already died. But Middleton found that the flourishing reports sent to him in Holland were gross exaggerations. Magazines of food there were none. Mews traced "the footsteps of that anti-monarchical beast," Presbyterianism, even in the far north. Charles had an idea that the nobles would be content with regimental commands, and entrust the chief direction "to soldiers of fortune." It was not so: Glencairn quarrelled with Sir George Monroe (a very unfortunate soldier of fortune), challenged him with pleasing circumstances of good taste, and wounded him in the face and hand. Glencairn then retired to the south.† Mews wrote from Thurso, on June 4. Already Monk was marching north;<sup>42</sup> he had written to "His Highness" (Cromwell is now Protector, and His Highness) from Dalkeith on April 22. For the English, Morgan lay at Dingwall with a force, and the Provost of Dumfries had shot two of Kenmure's men with a fowling-piece. On May 4 Cromwell was proclaimed Protector at Edinburgh Cross; Argyll was unfortunate enough to be present at this proclamation.<sup>43</sup> Cromwell sent for some Remonstrants—Livingstone, Gillespie, Menzies, Guthrie,—and for Blair and Douglas; the first three went to town. For a number of years no Communion had been celebrated in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, St. Andrews, and other towns; the consolations of religion being denied to the people because the magistrates "complied with the English."<sup>44</sup> The magistrates, and therefore the people, "were excluded from the Table by the Act of our Church," says Baillie. Here we have a proof of "the bloody and barbarous inconveniences of Presbyterial government."<sup>45</sup> * 'Scotland and the Protectorate,' pp. 26-31. The last page contains a warrant to Loudoun the Chancellor, then skulking in Atholl, for an Earldom of—Blank!

* Letter to Lilburne, Peebles, December 12, 1653. 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 296-297. Compare Gardiner, ii. pp. 403, 404, and notes. Clarendon (xiv. 61) is so vague that one may doubt whether, as he says, Wogan's party were disguised as Cromwellian cavalry.

† Gwynne's 'Military Memoirs,' edited by Sir Walter Scott, p. 175. Gwynne makes the pair quarrel because Monroe called the Highlanders thieves. Lilburne heard that the dispute was about the Laird of Fairlie or Foulis, Monroe's brother, a devotee. 'Scotland and the Protectorate,' p. 89.

Cromwell's purpose was to conciliate the Remonstrators, purge the Resolutioners, and use the Remonstrators as the genuine Kirk. But Livingstone, in London, prayed for the king, "and for these poor men that now fill their rooms, Lord be merciful unto them." Cromwell, being asked to punish Livingstone, merely replied, "Let him alone, he is a good man, and what are we but poor men, in comparison of the kings of England."<sup>46</sup> Menzies and Gillespie gave Cromwell more satisfaction. To anticipate dates, they accepted, in August, an ordinance affecting, first the universities, "that none but able and godly men be authorised" (by the University Commissioners) "to enjoy the livings appointed for the ministry in Scotland; and to that end, that respect be had to the choice of the more sober and godly part of the people, although the same should not prove to be the greater part." The Saints used "godly" as the Jacobites used "honest." A "godly man," an "honest man," meant "a man on our side," in either case. The ordinance signified that only Protesters were to be presented to livings; they were to be intruded, despite the wishes of the majority of the parishioners—a cruel oppression. Waristoun, Nevoy, and Cant were on the Commission, as were Blair and Rutherford, who spoke against it.<sup>47</sup> "The Commission evanished in the birth," says Nicoll. Yet a few "intrusions," backed by military force, were made.<sup>48</sup> At last the English scheme had to be dropped, but ministers were obliged to take an oath of compliance, later.

We can understand the difficulties of Cromwell with the ministers during Glencairn's rising. The Resolutioners were clear for the king, because he was Covenanted. The Remonstrators, in addition to their habit of never agreeing with any one, were not all clear as to accepting the decrees of any State whatever, and the Protectorate was not even Covenanted. However, the Dutch naval war ended early in 1654, and Monk was now free to deal with Middleton and Glencairn. He began in May, by proclaiming Oliver, the Union, the admission of thirty Scottish members for an English Parliament (and such a Parliament!), free trade with England, abolition of servile tenures and hereditary jurisdictions—in brief, the modernising and defeudalising of Scotland. The great houses were forfeited, in the cases of the Duchess of Hamilton, Lorne, Lauderdale (a prisoner in England), Loudoun, Glencairn, Napier, Sinclair, Atholl, Seaforth, Kenmure; while the heirs of Buccleuch were fined £15,000, and eighty others of the best names in Scotland, in proportion. A fine of £3000 was heavy on Scott of Harden.<sup>49</sup> These were not the measures to win Scottish hearts; but free trade was a real blessing, lost at the Restoration.

The details of Monk's campaign must not detain us. Argyll, with English garrisons at Glasgow and Dumbarton, secured the south-west of Scotland. Making the Tay safe, and having Irish forces—Irish forces, that nefarious instrument—in Lochaber, Monk used them to destroy the Cameron and Glengarry country.<sup>50</sup> Constantly pursuing Middleton, Monk reduced his levies, burning all the lands through which he marched. By "drives," cordons, and farm burnings, he dealt with the irregular army of the king. "The Marquis of Argyll is resolved to engage in blood with us," his men taking English pay, writes Monk to Cromwell on July 17.<sup>51</sup> Though Argyll's men, according to Monk, did very little work for their money, still Argyll was as deep in treason as a man could be, waging war against an army under the standard of King Charles. He held a council of war with Monk at the foot of Loch Lochy, six miles from Inverlochy, a scene with unpleasant associations for the marquis (Monk to Lambert, from Glenmoriston, June 25, 1654).<sup>52</sup> It is obvious that Argyll, after all these transactions, had no reason to expect mercy at the Restoration. On his meeting with Monk they learned that the Camerons had cut up the Irish garrison at Inverlochy, "most of them in cold blood,"—the Camerons, we regret to learn, took example by the Covenanters.

Monk himself burned "Glengarry's house," Invergarry; they burned all the way, and Morgan was sent to make Caithness "unserviceable." At Inverness, Monk heard that Middleton was marching on Dunkeld; Monk followed. Middleton attacked the house of Glenorchy (Breadalbane), where he knew that Argyll was, but failed to catch him. On July 20 Monk learned that Morgan had met, fought, and routed Middleton at Lochgarry; the little loch that lies east of the long Loch Ericht, and just south of Dalnaspidal. Middleton's force was a weary troop of horse—Lowland, probably; while the remnant of the dead Wogan's English fought a gallant rearguard action, to protect the retreat. Monk estimates the force at 800. The splendid Highland infantry of Montrose were not present—it was a large cavalry skirmish.<sup>53</sup>

Turner met the fugitives disbanding—their horses nearly dead, their equipment ruinous, but their hearts full of fight. He sent to Glencairn, imploring him to recall them; but Glencairn wrote that he "was laid aside as useless to the king's service." "Hereupon I put on a resolution to get out of Scotland as soon as I could," says Turner. The game was up.<sup>54</sup> The Royalists in arms surrendered, party after party; though Middleton did not leave the country till April 1655. Graham of Duchray held out longest, as became a kinsman of Montrose. "The English gave tolerable terms to them all," says Baillie. They were even empowered to levy regiments to serve friendly foreign states; but Charles forbade this method of drafting fighting men out of the country. The Border moss-troopers, Armstrongs mainly, were reduced to order; as were the Highlands, now bridled by new forts at Inverlochy, Inverness, and elsewhere. The system of Justices of the Peace was revived.<sup>55</sup> Heavy fines were imposed on the unchaste, but probably the stool of penance was discarded. "Fornicators are startled at the punishment some have received, and drunkards begin to look towards sobriety." Four hundred pounds (Scots), for the first fault, in a noble; a hundred in a burgh, were sums which the amorous found worth considering. A system of passes hampered the land-loupers and Royalist agents.

After Oliver's death, when his son Richard was proclaimed Protector at Inverlochy, Lochiel and Glengarry came in, "very hearty in their expressions of joy" (October 5, 1658). Probably they really were not sorry to be rid of Oliver.<sup>56</sup> A treaty with Lochiel, in May 1655, had conciliated him, and settled, more or less, his running feud with the Mackintoshes.<sup>57</sup> By forts and garrisons, great and small, the subdued province was kept in great order, and Richard Franck could fish peaceably for salmon, from the Eden to the Naver and Brora. Unluckily, his 'Northern Memoirs' are excessively prolix, and he gives few details of interest either about sport or society. Cromwell's short way with Parliaments prevented Scottish members of the Union from airing their ideas at Westminster. As late as March 1659, Monk is "glad to hear it is come so far that the Scotch members shall sit in the House to vote for themselves." At the same time he observes, as to Argyll, "truly I think in his heart there is no man in the three nations does more disaffect the English interest than he." * Argyll

* Mr Firth, to whose publication of the Clarke Papers this chapter is so greatly indebted, says "Argyll's attempt to get paid to him a debt of £12,000 owing to him by the Government he" (Monk) "answered by showing that in reality Argyll was fallen on evil days,—deep in debt, hooted at as a traitor in the streets, on very bad domestic terms with Lord Lorne, “the hate of the country heavy upon him,” as Baillie, Nicoll, and Brodie of Brodie attest. Monk had found Argyll out, on the evidence of a certificate of Adjutant-General Smyth, of March 24, 1659, the very day on which Monk writes to express his hope that the marquis will be excluded from the Parliament of Richard Cromwell. When the Argyllshire men took the English garrisons in August 1652, Smyth, whose duty it was to provision the forts, went to Inveraray to consult the marquis, but did not like his reception. A dirk was thrown at him or his coxswain, and Smyth’s own head was broken when he entered the Castle. He was in as perilous a posture, in short, as Dugald Dalgetty, and the marquis “shut the door and went away from me,” in a manner somewhat unusual among gentlemen, while Smyth’s boatmen were set on and wounded.<sup>58</sup>

On the whole, after knowing him so long, Monk, like too many people, did not trust or love the marquis. When Monk brought about the Restoration, he secured, by documentary evidence, the condemnation of Argyll, just as, before he began his movement in favour of the king, he tried to keep that nobleman out of the Union Parliament.* He seems to have thought the Campbell chief an untrustworthy character. The wide diffusion of this prejudice is very remarkable. Despite the assignation to Argyll of the lands of Huntly (a matter of family convenience), of the lands of the Bishopric of Argyll, of an estate of Montrose’s, and probably “caduacs and casualties,” he was deeply in debt, having guaranteed sums for the public service when he was as much in power as the Kirk would permit. His country had been wrecked by the Macdonalds, and, though he received compensation, compensation is rarely adequate. That English £40,000, due over the sale of Charles I., he never did receive; and when he went up to London in 1655, he was arrested for debt. He obtained some relief from Cromwell’s Government, but was still in London in 1656, where he was of service to the Protesters.

The struggles of the factions in the Kirk were now excessively bitter, and so ramified and entangled that it is in vain to expect was its debtor for about £35,000” (‘Scotland and the Protectorate,’ lxi.). Referring to p. 414 (April 30, 1659), we find that Argyll really owes his Highness £3544 : 17 : 1½.

* ‘The Cromwellian Union,’ Scot. Hist. Soc. lxxviii. note 4.

them to be interesting, or even intelligible. The preachers fought about "niggie-naggies," as Baillie says; the Protesters splitting legal hairs to prove that they contained the only genuine Commission of the General Assembly; that the St Andrews Assembly, unfavourable to them, was illegal; that they were the truly godly, and so forth. Attempts at compromise and conciliation were vain. Baillie describes the pulpit eloquence of one Protester as "a strange kind of sighing . . . as the pythonising out of the belly of a second person." Probably this may have been a case of "automatic speaking," an "inspirational address." In the west this was found very attractive, a supernormal novelty: the same country produced the wilder Covenanters, and the early Irvingites, who were levitated, and "spoke with tongues." It was time to be doing something in this way, for the Quakers were abroad, interrupting the preachers in the Greyfriars Kirk in Edinburgh; asking them to prove their calling by signs and miracles, and running about clothed only in their shirts,—even that amount of decency being a concession to popular prejudice. The curious thing is that the same sort of miracles as those of modern spiritualism are attributed, by Nicoll, to the Quakers, aided by the Devil. He "careyt them from ane place to another,"—this is manifestly levitation, as in the cases of St Joseph of Cupertino, a contemporary, and Lord Orrery's butler. "They made swallows to come down from their chimneyis, and made them to cry out, 'My angellis, my angellis.'" They heard hallucinatory voices, and, altogether, their proceedings were in strong competition with those of duly "called" Presbyterian prophets of both factions.<sup>59</sup> In Clydesdale many emotional yeomen followed after the Quakers, while Guthrie and Waristoun tried to introduce a new Covenant, omitting all the very awkward old clauses about "King, Parliament, or the liberties of the land."<sup>60</sup>

At this time, a man of sense, Lord Broghill (Robert Boyle, son of the Earl of Cork), was president of the Council for a year: he was a Presbyterian, and more popular than the rest of the English rulers. "He is very intime with Mr James Sharp," the minister of Crail, says Baillie in 1656. We first met Sharp when he was captured at Alyth and taken to England, with some other ministers, and most of the Committee of the Estates, at the time of Worcester fight. He had now been released by the English at the price, his enemies declared, of unworthy submission to Cromwell. Broghill induced the preachers not to pray for the king, "far forgot here," says Baillie; adding "if men of my Lord Broghill's parts and temper be long among us, they will make the present Government more beloved than some men wish." Waristoun, out of work, and out of wages, was inclined to go the English way, which he presently did, thereby making himself, next to Argyll, the most unpopular man in Scotland.<sup>61</sup>

By September 1656 Sharp had gone to London with Broghill to see Cromwell, who, in the intervals of packing, purging, and dismissing Parliaments, wished to try his hand on the Scottish clergy. But now Argyll, "who was judged to be the Protesters' agent in London," induced Cromwell to wait till some Protesters arrived to tell their story.<sup>62</sup> In 1656, Simpson, a deposed Protester, and, in 1657, Guthrie, Gillespie, Waristoun, and others arrived in London. Cromwell, with two Independent and two English Presbyterian divines, and three of the Council, heard the men dispute about their "niggie-naggies." Waristoun broke out on the Protesters for bringing the king over in 1650. "You drew up the terms of the treaty," replied Sharp. Waristoun could only reply that he had repented, as if his changes of mind were to be a rule for the Kirk.<sup>63</sup> Baillie backed Sharp by a letter to the English ministers, Ashe and Calamy. What the Protesters really wanted was to purge the Kirk of the Remonstrants.<sup>64</sup> Baillie was afraid that Cromwell would subject the Kirk to an Erastian model, itself "far more tolerable than the tyrannic Turkish yoke of the Protesters," so he wrote to Sharp. The Protesters did procure permission to renew the idiotic Act of Classes, but Sharp was privately assured "that it should do no harm."<sup>65</sup>

The factions continued to fight, and issue clouds of books and pamphlets, till, on September 3, 1658, "the Protector, that old fox, died," as Mr Row states the case. The Protesters had gained nothing by their labours, except that Waristoun was restored to his old office of Clerk of Registership (July 1657).<sup>66</sup> He raised the fees for all sorts of legal documents, and became more unpopular than ever. He repented again, later, of taking service again under Cromwell, at least so he said, when he came to be hanged. In other respects "that very worthy, wise, pious, and diligent young man, Mr James Sharp," as Baillie called him, had foiled the Protesters. Cromwell is said to have styled him "Sharp of that ilk." In Scotland all was now quiet, but money was scarce and taxes were very heavy, which Monk regretted, and tried to relieve. When Cromwell died, the chance of the king's restoration did not seem good to Baillie. "What he minds, no man here knows, and few care" (November 11, 1658).

The times of this ignorance did not long endure. When Monk, to end the strife of Army and Rump, marched his command to Berwick and thence into England (January 1, 1660), he left Scotland tranquil behind him. On February 16, 1660, Sharp joined him in London to look after the interests of the Resolutioners, or Assembly party in the Kirk. The Covenants were revived by the Rumpish Parliament restored by Monk. Next, they who had restored the Covenant restored the king. The English domination had made Scotland a cleaner place than of yore; it had granted free trade, it had accelerated justice, except in anarchic intervals, it had bridled the Highlanders, but it had been extremely expensive to the country, which was heavily taxed for the English Army of Occupation. Merchants may have regretted the departure of the English; but national feeling, and feudal sentiment, preferred the prospect of a native Parliament, and the return of the old noble families. The Kirk desired the impossible, the restoration of the Covenants. The form of Assemblies, Presbyteries, and discipline in private morals, was finally regained under William III., but political interference by the Kirk fell into abeyance. Many things might be restored; great licence of intolerance the Kirk, some thirty years after 1660, was to recover; but the Covenant could never be brought back in all its tyranny. When we follow the ruinous course of misgovernment under the Restoration, we must remember that the administration, in many ways lawless and cruel, was trying to beat down the old intolerable Presbyterian pretensions, the immortality of the Covenant as eternally binding on the whole posterity of the generation which entered into that most mischievous of bands.

We have seen that the moral fruits of the period of fanaticism were not excellent. Despite that Presbyterian rigour, Balfour mentions a bachelor laird who had sixty-five bastards; it seems to follow that the Kirk, with all her power, could not restrain this country gentleman. Brodie of Brodie, a great laird and one much trusted by the extreme party, mentions that "my wretched sisters, one after the other," played the wanton, though he uses a harsher phrase. They "soudered sin wi' matrimony," later. Nicoll the diarist, a typical bourgeois, avers that unmentionable sins, for which the sinners were burned, greatly increased during the English domination, but probably detection may have been more strict. Witches continued to be burned in great numbers, but they were also burned in England during the Civil War, under the Commonwealth, and even under the Restoration. Nicoll's remarks on the general hardness and rapacity of men at this period, merely prove that revolutionary periods are demoralising, as Thucydides shows in the case of Corcyra.

On the other hand, a singular access of private piety had its good as well as its bad side. The practice of making private Covenants with the Deity and of keeping religious diaries arose, and long continued. Though much superstition is evinced in these diaries, it can hardly be doubted that their authors were often saintly people, doing their very best to live with eyes turned to perfection.* An example in print is the diary of Alexander Brodie of Brodie (born 1617). In 1640, moved by devotional enthusiasm, he helped to destroy two paintings of the Crucifixion and of the Day of Judgment, and the carved woodwork of Elgin Cathedral. His wife died in the same year; and though of an amorous complexion, he never married again. The indiscreet heroine of the old ballad says to the beggarman who has made prize of her virtue :

I thocht ye'd been some gentleman,
At least the laird o' Brodie ;

but as the ballad is not dated, we cannot affirm that Alexander was the man aux bonnes fortunes to whom she alludes. Brodie kept notes of hundreds of sermons by Cant, Henderson, Blair, Douglas, Row, and other glories of the contemporary pulpit. He was a ruling elder, and sat for Moray in the Estates; and in 1649 he was one of the Commissioners to Charles II., and one of the Kirk's Commissioners sent to him for the Treaty of Breda in 1650. He was already a judge or Lord of Session.

He retired to the north, under the English dominance, and tried to keep out of the war of Resolutioners and Protesters. He was "sinfully inclined" to accept employment under Cromwell, and did accept a judgeship in 1658. In 1661 he visited London, "and bought some history books, but nothing of divinity. This feared me that I was withering." He read the Koran, "but found nothing to seduce or stagger me." He found Leighton of opinion that "men in Popery, holding all their tenets, might be saved. . . . I was feared that his charity misguided might be a snare to him." The true doctrine seems to have been that the majority of Christians must be damned for a shade of opinion. Brodie saw and moralised on the Lord Mayor's Show. "Oh, learn me to die, to be crucified to all this . . ." At the celebration of the Communion in Westminster Abbey, he thought that, despite the ritual, "they might partake sparingly." But in Scotland for six years they might not, in many towns; the preachers refusing to celebrate, as we have already seen. The truth is that Brodie was attracted by the Liturgy; moreover, "I have seen, and daily, much disorder in conceived prayers and extravagancy, which does afflict me." One need not go back to 1661 to see extravagancy and disorder in "conceived prayers." Everything, down to the Lord Mayor's Show, was a subject of "exercise" with Brodie.

* This impression is left on the author by a MS. religious diary of his own fifth or sixth great-grandmother in Teviotdale, kept as late as 1715-1750.

In January 1654, "hearing of the approach of Glencairn, his heart grew like a stone." However, there was wet weather, Findhorn was in spate, Glencairn could not cross the water, and Brodie "considered and observed the Lord's providence." Glencairn crossed next day and ravaged the lands of the Laird of Leathin, and then Brodie "observed the ignorant, hasty, wrong applying and confirming His providences of the 18th January, in thinking that the danger was past." So he appointed a private day of fasting and humiliation at Leathin. The poor laird and Francis "confessed their youthful sins of uncleanness, and their particular guilt of covetousness," and so forth. Two sermons and a new private Covenant followed. John and Joseph and old Leathin and young Leathin, and old Francis and young Francis, and James and Janet, and seven other Janets and Johns made their personal confessions: old Francis appears to have been a free liver enough, but doubtless he did not enter into details. Thus Glencairn's rising had a moral effect on the Brodies, and the laird gave a stack of oats to Leathin's unlucky tenants. This example of an educated lay Covenanter has been chosen to illustrate the psychology of such men. Brodie was seriously disheartened when some witches were acquitted at Inverness; and, in brief, was a fair specimen of a devout, canny laird of his age. Though he owns to a sinful distaste for conceived prayers, he did not like bishops, partly because they were styled "my lord"

—a title of human institution. But he lived too far north for the later persecutions to make him uncomfortable.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER IX.

- <sup>1</sup> Clark to Lenthall, Dundee, Nov. 9; 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' p. 20.
- <sup>2</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 333-335.
- <sup>3</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 48, 49.
- <sup>4</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 365, 366.
- <sup>5</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 136, 208, 215.
- <sup>6</sup> Nicoll, pp. 65, 66, 69, 104.
- <sup>7</sup> Nicoll, p. 91.
- <sup>8</sup> Nicoll, p. 70.
- <sup>9</sup> Row's 'Blair,' p. 286.
- <sup>10</sup> Baillie, iii. pp. 190-194.
- <sup>11</sup> Baillie, iii. p. 214.
- <sup>12</sup> Baillie, iii. p. 225; Row's 'Blair,' p. 307.
- <sup>13</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 161-164.
- <sup>14</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 108, 109.
- <sup>15</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 45, 46.
- <sup>16</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 46-48.
- <sup>17</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 50-53.
- <sup>18</sup> Turner, pp. 105, 106.
- <sup>19</sup> Nicholas Papers, i. p. 320.
- <sup>20</sup> Nicholas Papers, i. p. 319.
- <sup>21</sup> Nicholas Papers, i. p. 314; 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 82, 83.
- <sup>22</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 91-101.
- <sup>23</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' p. 141.
- <sup>24</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' p. 134.
- <sup>25</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 120, 121.
- <sup>26</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 165-167.
- <sup>27</sup> Baillie, iii. p. 249.
- <sup>28</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 184-186.
- <sup>29</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 190-193.
- <sup>30</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' p. 221. Hist. MSS. Commission, vi. p. 617.
- <sup>31</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' p. 248.
- <sup>32</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' p. 254.
- <sup>33</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' p. 257.
- <sup>34</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 265, 266.
- <sup>35</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 269-271.
- <sup>36</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' p. 287.
- <sup>37</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' p. 294.
- <sup>38</sup> Scott's 'Swift,' xvii. 450 (1884).
- <sup>39</sup> 'Scotland and the Protectorate,' Firth, Scottish History Society, pp. 120, 121 (1899).
- <sup>40</sup> 'Scotland and the Commonwealth,' pp. 308, 309.
- <sup>41</sup> Nicholas Papers, ii. p. 62.
- <sup>42</sup> 'Scotland and the Protectorate,' p. 129.
- <sup>43</sup> 'State Trials,' v. 1403.
- <sup>44</sup> Baillie, iii. p. 280.

- <sup>45</sup> Cf. 'Scotland and the Protectorate,' p. 102.
- <sup>46</sup> Row's 'Blair,' pp. 313, 314.
- <sup>47</sup> 'Act. Parl.' vi., ii. 832; Row's 'Blair,' p. 318; Nicoll, pp. 135, 136, 137.
- <sup>48</sup> Baillie, iii. pp. 258, 283, 284. <sup>49</sup> Nicoll, pp. 125, 126.
- <sup>50</sup> 'Scotland and the Protectorate,' p. 144.
- <sup>51</sup> Historical MSS. Commission, vi. p. 616; 'Scotland and the Protectorate,' pp. 145, 146.
- <sup>52</sup> 'Scotland and the Protectorate,' pp. 138, 139-149.
- <sup>53</sup> 'Scotland and the Protectorate,' pp. 149-153.
- <sup>54</sup> Turner, pp. 109, 110.
- <sup>55</sup> 'Scotland and the Protectorate,' pp. 403-405.
- <sup>56</sup> 'Scotland and the Protectorate,' pp. 384, 385.
- <sup>57</sup> 'Scotland and the Protectorate,' p. 279.
- <sup>58</sup> 'Scotland and the Protectorate,' pp. 412-414.
- <sup>59</sup> Nicoll, pp. 147, 148.
- <sup>60</sup> Baillie, iii. p. 297.
- <sup>61</sup> Baillie, iii. p. 321, 322. <sup>62</sup> Row's 'Blair,' p. 329.
- <sup>63</sup> Row's 'Blair,' p. 331. <sup>64</sup> Baillie, iii. p. 330.
- <sup>65</sup> Baillie, iii. p. 354. <sup>66</sup> Nicoll, p. 201.

CHAPTER X.

THE RESTORATION.

1660-1666.

THE Scottish rejoicings over the Restoration were picturesque, noisy, and convivial. Noll and the devil were burned in effigy, the Castle guns were fired, and not a little was drunk on the occasion. But the shouts died away, and where did Scotland stand? The constitutional novelties of Argyll and Waristoun expired by a natural death; Charles named his great officers of State as his ancestors had done, without calling or consulting Parliament, and the Lords of the Articles recovered power. Glencairn, who had fought for the Cause in its darkest days, was Chancellor; Rothés, who had more than the sensuality and none of the Liberalism of his father, was President of the Council; Lauderdale, now a Duke, remained with the king in London as his chief adviser on Scottish affairs, though things were done by his rivals in Scotland at which he found it safest merely to connive: his position was difficult.*

Meanwhile we must go back, and trace the doings of a minister which were to lead to ecclesiastical changes and to all the Scottish unrest under the Restoration. On January 16, 1660, Monk, on his march to London, wrote to Douglas and Dickson, sending them, "according to their desire, a pass for Mr Sharp." He, as we know (at this time he was minister of Crail, and a "regent" in St Leonard's College, St Andrews), had lain in the Tower, after 1650, and was released, perhaps after signing a "tender" of compliance with Cromwell. He had already been the envoy of the Resolutioners to the Protector, and was again in London in 1659. Soon after Sharp's arrival in town (February 1660) Lauderdale and * Sir George Mackenzie, 'Memoirs of the Affairs of Scotland,' p. 78 (1821).

Lindsay were set free from the Tower, and, with Sharp, informally represented the views of the less extreme Scottish party, Sharp corresponding with Baillie and Douglas. From the first, Sharp kept expressing a desire to be recalled: he found himself in deep waters and strong currents; he had seen too much of England and the world to be a perfect Presbyterian, and to suppose that he could give his party entire satisfaction. As early as February 21 he desires to return to Scotland; again on March 27, and so on frequently.<sup>1</sup> Mr Osmond Airy, editor of the Lauderdale Papers, avers that, "in the most comprehensive sense of the word, Sharp was a knave, pur sang." That is not a certain opinion; Sharp rather yielded gradually and not without resistance to strong corrupting influences. He seems to have made the state of affairs clear enough, in his letters to Douglas. He does, on occasion, adopt the style of "the good old cause," but his genuine views are transparent in his correspondence with the men who sent him as their envoy.

"Rigid Presbyterianism," he says from the first, will not be accepted, and, though Douglas strongly objects to the phrase "rigid Presbyterianism," which apparently means, not the mere absence of bishops, but the intolerable claims of Andrew Melville's school, Sharp purposely continues to use it in writing to Douglas. This was fair warning as to the state of his own opinions. Even more clearly than the leaders of his party, he sees that the Protesters are so grave a danger to a satisfactory settlement, that matters are sure to tend to "moderate Episcopacy." He is not afraid of the words which Douglas thinks a contradiction in terms. While the Covenant endured, there could assuredly be no moderate Presbyterianism; and Baillie, for example, was more attached to the Covenant, at this time, than even to the hope of ousting Gillespie from the Principalship of Glasgow University. Sharp obviously would, even at this time, have been content with the shadow of Episcopacy implied, later, in Leighton's attempted "accommodation."

Sharp's letters of this date and onwards appear to indicate clearly enough that he saw how the world would go, and that he, unless recalled, would go with the world.* Douglas kept informing Sharp that the new generation in Scotland "bear a heart-hatred to the Covenant," "have no love to Presbyterian government, but are wearied of that yoke, feeding themselves with the fancy of Episcopacy.”<sup>2</sup> But Sharp tells Douglas that, in England, “I smell that moderate Episcopacy is the fairest accommodation, which moderate men, who wish well to religion, expect. . . . We” (the Scots) “shall be left to the king, which is best for us” (April 1660, no date of day). On April 26 Douglas wrote, saying that he wished Sharp to go and see the king; but already Monk had asked Sharp to go as his own envoy.<sup>3</sup> Mr Airy writes, “it is clear from extracts given by Wodrow that Sharp was playing the double game. He was supposed by the Resolutioners to be going to the Hague as their agent. In reality he went as Monk’s.” As Mr Airy frankly observes, speaking for himself, “it is with difficulty that we constrain ourselves to keep our hands off James Sharp,” but we must try to display the serene calm of history, and to look carefully into Sharp’s conduct.* Sharp did not conceal from Douglas and his friends that Monk had engaged him to go to Charles while Douglas was making the request by letter that he would do so (April 26). From Wodrow’s extracts it is certain that Sharp (April 28) told Douglas that Monk was sending him to Breda, and he “is sorry he cannot stay till he have Mr Douglas’s mind.” On May 8 Douglas writes “that his motion and the General’s came together.” Sharp therefore did not deceive Douglas as to his going to Breda for Monk. Both the Resolutioners and Monk were sending Sharp to see the king. With Sharp, Douglas and four of his allies sent a letter to Charles, saying that “the principles of the Church of Scotland are . . . fixed for the preservation and maintenance of lawful authority.”

* See 'The Correspondence of Sharp and Douglas,' Wodrow, i, 7, 8, 9, 12, 17, 18.

Charles knew better than any man how much truth there was likely to be found in that assertion, however sincere on Douglas’s part; moreover, which was “the Church of Scotland”? Were Resolutioners or Protesters the genuine Kirk? In Sharp’s instructions the five preachers in Edinburgh (whatever authority from the Kirk they may have had) remark that “we, for our part, shall not stumble if the king exercise his moderation towards them” (the Protesters), “yet we apprehend their principles to be such, especially their leaders, as their having any hand in affairs cannot but breed continual distemper and disorders.”<sup>4</sup> Baillie, later, suggests that as the protesting ministers can only live by preaching, and can only preach in English, they should be sent—to the Orkneys. Even so, James VI. sent the recalcitrant Bruce to Inverness, to be out of the way.<sup>5</sup> Such was the temper of the Resolutions: could it have been used so as to establish a harmless Presbyterianism?

* The observation is quoted from Mr Airy’s article in ‘The Quarterly Review,’ April 1884, p. 415.

Sharp did go to Breda; and at once (May 10) Douglas and his group began to move him, and Lindsay and Lauderdale in London, against Charles's use of the English Liturgy "in his family," and against toleration of Dissenters in Scotland. The case is plain: these leaders of the less frenzied party in the Kirk were already feeling their way back to their old position of intolerance. Moreover, Argyll and Gillespie, "with a world at their back," were holding a Communion—a Protesters' Communion—at Paisley (May 27). Meetings of such "slashing communicants" had already been preludes to civil war. "Neither fair nor other means are likely to do with them," groans Baillie, and, in fact, these words of his exactly express the situation, and means in no way fair were employed to little purpose. Would it have been fair to exile all Protesters to the Orkneys? Was it even possible?<sup>6</sup>

Douglas believed, and said that, at Breda, Sharp was "corrupted." He later heard that Sharp carried a letter from a noble to the king, saying that he was in favour of Episcopacy. Burnet names Glencairn as the author of the letter: we have no other evidence.<sup>7</sup> The personal question, so much debated, is merely as to the moment when Sharp decided to go with the prelatical current. If from the first—he was "a knave, pur sang." If at the last, he had been debased into a politician who made the best of the situation for himself. But, on the public question, what could the Government do to prevent "the inconvenients of Presbyterian despotism"?

On meeting the king, Sharp found that he had a royal memory of his preaching friends. He returned to London with the triumphant cortège, and (May 26) wrote that Charles "is resolved not to wrong the settled government of our Church." The editor of Baillie, David Laing, thinks it "evident that Charles entertained no such design" (of restoring Episcopacy in Scotland) "for several months after the Restoration," and if Charles did not, if Lauderdale did not (as Laing holds), it is improbable that Sharp did.<sup>8</sup> At this time he repeatedly assured the brethren that no change was intended.*<sup>9</sup>

* Mr Hill Burton rather wildly says that, in the summer of 1660, "Sharp was Archbishop of St Andrews"!

The Scots kept their Restoration festival on June 19, first with sermons, then with a banquet at Edinburgh Cross, the fountains running with claret. Three hundred dozen of glasses were broken after the toast to the king. Scotland was delirious with drink and joy; the nobles hastened to London—among them Lorne, who was well received. Argyll, we saw, had just been at a Protesters' Communion, tantamount, in the eyes of the Government, to a political meeting, and the protesting preachers' "study is to fill the people with fears of Bishops, Books" (the Liturgy), "destroying of the Covenant . . . and hereupon presses private meetings . . ." says Baillie.<sup>10</sup> The Protesters discerned the signs of the times, but Argyll did not. There are about seven distinct stories of second-sighted men that warned him. Dumb men had premonitions; dogs "yowled" under his window; he was seen, by a gentleman who "had the sight," "with his head off and all his shoulder full of blood," on the bowling green at Inveraray. Wodrow, Law in his 'Memorials,' and Baillie are responsible for these anecdotes. But Argyll himself, though thus warned, and conscious of his own treasonable action against Glencairn in 1654; aware, probably, that Glencairn had then asked Charles to proclaim him a traitor, and that Glencairn was now in favour; aware that, though Lorne was well received, his own curse on Lorne for taking the king's side had been handed by himself in writing to the English, went up to London, in place of staying, perfectly safe, among his fastnesses, with galleys ready for flight.

Had he been invited by the king, he must later have produced his safe-conduct. Wodrow, in his 'Analecta,' gives two stories, one, that Lorne was deceived into bringing his father to London; the other, that this was not the case. Argyll certainly showed no cowardice; he rather gave proof of audacity. Hyde refused to see him, and rebuffed him in the antechamber, probably expecting him to take the hint and escape. Undeterred by such conspicuous warnings, Argyll went straight to his undoing, was refused the king's presence, and was arrested. He was hated by the king. If any one gave Charles assurances for Montrose's safety, it was Argyll. He had tormented him with preachings, he had ruined the Engagement, he had accepted huge promises of money when Charles was at his mercy; and though much was covered by an Act of Indemnity, not thus covered was Argyll's action against the Royalists in 1652-1654. The marquis was conveyed to the Tower, where he lay till December, being then removed to the Castle of Edinburgh.

Meanwhile Sharp, in London, rather dissuaded Douglas from coming up himself: as for "the brethren," "I am apt to think they will not get content." He added that the new English Parliament "will make all void since 1639" (June 2). This was, one might think, fair warning that, in Scotland also, all might "be void since" 1638. Sharp discouraged addresses in favour of "settling religion according to the terms of the Covenant," as Douglas desired. His position was that the intended interference of the brethren in favour of English Presbytery was a blunder; their position was that their silence might be construed into approbation. They sent Sharp a paper for the king, intimating that the use of the Liturgy, in England, caused them "grief of heart." Their tastes were to dominate the desires of the sister kingdom!

Sharp (June 5) said that, in the newspapers, a visit from Douglas and Dickson to London was announced; he "wishes it may hold." "I am desirous to be taken off, and returned to my charge." They might have taken Sharp at his word, his desire to withdraw, so often repeated, so constantly ignored by his modern accusers. Douglas (June 12) replied that he and Dickson had never intended to come up. It was untrue that Scotland was in arms for the Covenant, but English reinforcements of the garrisons there arrived daily. Sharp writes (June 9), "I can do no good here for stemming the current of Prelacy, and long to be home." He has "sad apprehensions . . . and a languishing desire to retire home and look to God, from whom our help alone can come. . . . Take me off." "I hear they talk of bringing Episcopacy into Scotland" (June 10). He, Crawford, and Lauderdale do not know whether Douglas should come up or not. "You know I am against Episcopacy, root and branch," yet earlier letters had clearly shown no insuperable objection to "moderate Episcopacy" (June 12). On June 14 the king told Sharp that he "was resolved to preserve to us the discipline and Government of our Church as it is settled among us," and at that moment perhaps he was. Charles would grant a General Assembly, after a Parliament, but desired no visit from preachers. Sharp himself "saw no shadow of reason" for Scottish meddling with English ecclesiastical affairs. Dr Crofts, preaching before the king, said that Worcester rout was a divine punishment "for the guilt he had contracted in Scotland" (by taking the Covenant),

“and the injuries he was brought to do against the Church of England.” Both sides could take that line. In any case, says Sharp, “The Protesters’ doom is dight” (June 25).

In a notable letter of July 3, Douglas writes to Sharp, “After this, Assemblies are not to interweave civil matters with ecclesiastic; and he wisheth that the king were informed of this.” But what authority had Douglas for a promise which, if accepted and kept, would have saved Scotland from her miseries under the Restoration? He throws the blame of the “interweaving” on the Protesters. But the Assembly of July 1648 had bearded the Parliament before the Protesters existed as such. The Assembly had always meddled with civil affairs, when it was in its glory. If Assemblies could have been induced to act as Douglas says that they would, all might have been happily arranged. But when Douglas throws all the blame on the Protesters, he is so manifestly wrong that it is hard to believe him to have been candid. Wodrow, and Burnet, and Sharp’s modern critics, believe that he was tricking Douglas, all through 1660. To myself he seems to have openly shown his hand at this time.<sup>11</sup>

In Scotland (July 14) efforts were being made to secure Waristoun, but he escaped to the Continent for the time. Charles entrusted the government to the Committee of Estates of 1651 (captured, of old, by Monk, at Alyth), and Glencairn entered Edinburgh, as Chancellor on August 22. The Committee, of ten nobles, ten lairds, and ten burgesses, met on the following day, and, in a neighbouring house, met ten protesting preachers and two elders, under Guthrie. This was one of the “private meetings” which Baillie said “are, to my sense, exceeding dangerous,” as showing “a resolution to keep up a schism and a party of the godly, as they will have them called, for themselves, that will obey no church judicatory further than they please.” It seems then that Douglas’s promise not to meddle with civil matters would have been of no effect. The Protesters might have called counter Assemblies, and being “the godly” would have had followers, in plenty. Peace was impossible. The private meeting proved fatal to Guthrie, who, it will be remembered, had procured the excommunication of Middleton, had troubled the last hours of Montrose, and had “preached the poor little army down,” after Dunbar. His allies, like the Covenanters at the beginning of the troubles, drew up a “supplication.” The Cromwellians, they said, had done many evil things, including the "barbarous murder" of Charles I. But "beyond all" they had established "a vast toleration" in religion, the height of wickedness. After copious professions of loyalty to the king whom they had opposed in the Remonstrance, and in the protest against the Resolutions, they denounced Malignants who wished to bring back the Service Book. Never must "the vomit of toleration" be again "licked up." His Majesty was implored to enforce uniformity of religion (that is, Protestant Presbyterianism) in the three kingdoms, to fill all posts with Covenanters only, to "extirpate Prelacy," and abstain from the liturgy in the royal chapel; and publicly to approve of the Covenants.<sup>12</sup>

This supplication for a renewal of civil war (for it was nothing less) the Committee of the Estates instantly seized, with the men who drew it up. They were "in unlawful conventicle," "tending to disturbance . . . and if possible, rekindling a civil war." Illegal the arrest may have been, as illegal as the execution of Ladywell for "leasing-making," but something needed to be done, and probably it would have been wise to deport Guthrie to the Orkneys, as Baillie had suggested. Guthrie was for bringing chaos back again. One of the sufferers, Stirling, wrote to his kirk session, that they had only "avowed the Lord's marriage contract, in a sworn covenant, between the three kingdoms," and that they "abhorred a new war." But the "marriage contract" could be enforced at no smaller price.<sup>13</sup> Glencairn proclaimed "unlawful conventicles" and "seditious remonstrances." Guthrie's 'Causes of Wrath' and Rutherford's 'Lex Rex' were denounced, and preachers of seditious sermons were threatened with loss of their stipends. The Resolutions themselves had reason for alarm, but Sharp brought down a reassuring letter of the king to the Presbytery of Edinburgh (August 10). "We resolve to protect and preserve the government of the Church of Scotland, as it is settled by law." By what law? Did Charles then mean—did Sharp know that he meant—to "make void all before 1639"? A General Assembly was promised; Douglas and other preachers were to be sent for; and "we are very well satisfied with your resolution not to meddle without your sphere," says the king.<sup>14</sup>

Burnet has a story, from Primrose the Clerk Register, that Middleton read this letter before it left London, that he was angry with the concessions, till Sharp explained that they were merely meant to quiet the Presbyterians; a rescissory act would leave the law where it was before the Revolution. Middleton was a soldier; he acquiesced in but disdained the paltry equivocation. So Primrose told Burnet, but Burnet says that Primrose was "a man with whom words went for nothing."* Primrose was only to be believed when he abused Sharp! We cannot be sure that the prevarication about preserving the government of the Church "as settled by law" was already determined upon, and was known to Sharp.

At "the end of 1660" Sharp writes to Lauderdale, in London, advocating a General Assembly "immediately after the Parliament of 1661." Are we to believe that Lauderdale, the secretary for Scotland, was now being deceived by Sharp in a matter where Middleton, according to Primrose's story, was correctly informed?<sup>15</sup>

The certain facts as to the psychology of Sharp are, that from the time of his arrival in Scotland he was suspected and accused of forwarding the cause of a change to Episcopacy. He was, during the Scottish Parliament which opened on January 1, 1661, in constant attendance on Middleton, the Royal Commissioner. He was at the same time in correspondence with Patrick Drummond in London, a Presbyterian minister in attendance on Lauderdale; and Lauderdale, as he knew, would see his letters.† In these he protests that he remains "a Scot and a Presbyter," and has not touched on Church government in "sermons or conferences" at Holyrood or elsewhere. These letters go on till March 21, when he says that his inference is that they must come to "Erastianism in its worst form," or to "constant commissioners, moderators, or bishops," "a change in which I would be very loth to have a hand." Sharp then went up (April 29) to London, and thence, on May 21, wrote to Middleton. He had seen Clarendon, and learned that * Burnet, 'History of his Own Time,' i. pp. 192-200; cf. 'North British Review,' vol. xlvi. pp. 402-404.

† Mr Airy points to a difference "in tone" between a letter to Lauderdale "and other letters of Sharp's sent" (later) through Drummond, a London Presbyterian "in communication with Lauderdale," in fact his chaplain. But this letter asserts to Lauderdale Sharp's belief in an Assembly and Presbyterian peace, after the date when he is reported to have told Middleton that Presbyterianism was to be abolished. I cannot believe that Sharp and the king, in August 1660, were conspiring behind Lauderdale's back, while Middleton knew what was going on. Lauderdale was still Presbyterian; Sharp says that he himself is "a Scot and a Presbyter," and tells Lauderdale at the end of December 1660 that all Estates think Episcopacy should not be forced by Parliament on Scotland. 'North British Review,' ut supra, 430-435, June 1867, not 1848, as Mr Airy cites it.

what Middleton "did often tell me was not without ground," namely, that Episcopacy would be introduced. Here it is Middleton who, in Scotland, tells Sharp; not Sharp who, in London, tells Middleton, according to Primrose's anecdote, that Episcopacy would be introduced. Sharp's letter of May 21 need not contradict what Sharp, on March 21, wrote to Drummond, that he himself had not touched on the question in "sermons or conferences." Private talk with Middleton is not, in the sense here used, a "conference," whether in the French or English meaning of the word. I incline to suppose that Sharp did what he could, in the early months of 1661, to hit on some scheme more moderate than actual Episcopacy, less immoderate than intolerant Presbyterianism; that he found this impossible; that, "though very loth," he could not resist the temptation to go with the tide, and finally, reckless of his honour, took his chance and an archbishopric. It is probable that he was not the only waverer. In his letter to Middleton of May 21 he ends by saying, "I am sorry if Mr Douglas, after such professions made to your Grace, shall disappoint your expectations." Douglas "got down" on the Presbyterian "side of the fence."

As for Sharp, he was now lost. His position involved him in statesmanship, for which he (as Baillie and Livingstone thought of clergymen at large) was unfit. Hated, as a clerical statesman, by his nobly born associates, just as Spottiswoode had been hated, he was also despised by them, was bullied, was a mere tool, as a prelate must needs be, when Episcopacy is only a measure of police, and bishops but screens or shields against the Presbyterian weapon of excommunication. Though he was not without some drops of gentle blood, his father had been a sheriff clerk, and now he was a pot of clay, swimming with pots of gold, silver, and iron. He had really, at heart, no superstitions about the divine right either of Prelacy or Presbytery. He was intent on destroying the anarchy resulting from the old Presbyterian pretensions, now mainly supported by the Protesters. On that essential point he was sincere if not fanatical; hence his later accession to many disgusting cruelties, though by nature, as Baillie's earlier letters show, and as his portraits indicate, he was a man of kindly nature.*

* The view of Sharp's development taken here is based on his letters, summarised by Wodrow, or printed in the Lauderdale Papers, i. ii., especially i. 60-90, and ii. lxx. -lxxxii. Mr Airy, and Burnet, Baillie, Wodrow, and Douglas,

It is the gradual tragedy of a soul: the history of Lauderdale is another. Beginning as a sincere fanatic in youth, very unlike his kinsman Lethington, Lauderdale suffered long imprisonment, and many other tribulations, due to the insensate follies of Presbyterianism in 1648-50. Even this did not dispose him to welcome Episcopacy, but the bloom had been rubbed off his soul, and he, an accomplished scholar and Orientalist, yielded to the claims of his powerful and sensuous temperament. There was no oath which he scrupled to take, his abundant intellect was prostituted to brigandage under the guise of government, and long before the end his prolix talk and disgusting coarseness, as Lord Ailesbury tells us, made him detested by Charles II. ('Memoirs,' i. 14-16.)

On January 1, 1661,—to return to secular affairs,—Parliament met at Edinburgh, "and never any Parliament was so obsequious to all that was propos'd to them," says Sir George Mackenzie, the "bluidy Mackenzie" of Covenanting legend. The Act of Indemnity had not yet been passed; no man knew what he might suffer, or what he might gain, and Cromwell had tamed the Scottish temper of defiance.<sup>16</sup> Middleton sat as Commissioner, and Lords of the Articles were chosen, though Tarbet opposed this practice, as "prelimiting the judgment of Parliament." How the Lords were chosen on this occasion we are not informed. On January 4 the House was told by Middleton that the king desired the honourable burial, at his own expense, of the mangled remains of the great Montrose. The act was graceful, whether Charles had all that he has been accused of to repent, or not. On January 7 the fragments of the marquis, and of Hay of Dalgetty, were unearthed from beneath the gibbet or recovered from the "airts" to which hold that Sharp was a Judas from March 1660 onwards. The letters cited are marked, whether by Drummond, Lauderdale, or another, with lines and crosses at certain passages, and Mr Airy thinks that Lauderdale laid them before the king "to expose Sharp's weakness and insincerity" (Lauderdale Papers, i. x.). But if Charles was Sharp's fellow-conspirator, the exposure was superfluous. Before leaving for London, in April 1661, Sharp wrote to Baillie, "I am commanded to take a new toil, but I tell you it is not in order to a change of the Church." If Sharp then knew what he learned in May from Clarendon, his words are an unblushing falsehood. Hitherto he had but Middleton's account, which Clarendon confirmed; "I found that which your Grace often told me was not without ground": probably Sharp thought it, or tried to think it, groundless enough to justify his statement to Baillie (Baillie, iii. p. 460). In any case, Sharp was gliding to utter dishonour, but, in my opinion, the decline was gradual, a view perhaps more consistent with human nature than the theory of Mr Airy.

they had been dispersed. A coffin containing the trunk of Montrose, under a velvet pall, was borne by Atholl, Mar, Seaforth, and other peers, and by the young marquis, accompanied by 200 mounted gentlemen led by Kenmure, to the Tolbooth. Here Napier, with Inchbrakie, Gorthie, and other gallant Grahams, took down the head of the hero from its iron spike, Gorthie kissing it piously. He died that night, "a judgment," said the fanatics. The coffin was then conveyed to the Abbey Church at Holyrood, where it lay till May 11. On that day, with all possible solemnity and heraldic splendour, the remains of Montrose were carried to St. Giles's Church, where a stately and beautiful tomb, adorned by the escutcheons of his kin and his companions in arms, now marks the most sacred spot in Scotland, the resting-place of the stainless Cavalier.<sup>17</sup>

For the rest, the Parliament was so reactionary as to provoke the censures of "bluidy Mackenzie," at that time no official, but a rising advocate. They framed an oath acknowledging the royal prerogative and supremacy "over all persons and in all causes," ecclesiastic as well as civil. Cassilis retired from Parliament on this score; Balmerino, with others, also retired, when renewing the Covenant without royal consent was pronounced illegal. Here was a breach of an act of the Parliament of 1651, says Wodrow, which ordained that all members should sign the great band.<sup>18</sup> The king regained his right of appointing officers of State. After leading gradually up to it, the Parliament rescinded "all done in Parliament since the year 1638," save some private bills. They did but follow the example of the Covenanters who had rescinded the acts of all General Assemblies that were not to their liking. But Mackenzie remarks that others, as well as the fanatics, were displeased by the sweeping measures of reaction. The Parliament of 1648, which approved of "the unlawful Engagement," as the wild party called it, went by the board with the rest. As for church government, it was to be secured "as the king finds most consistent with scripture, monarchy, and peace," which did not promise well, on the second and third heads, for Presbyterianism. May 29 was appointed as a public holiday; "it was evidently framed to be a snare unto ministers," as all state holidays were. Patronage of livings was restored; it had been abolished in 1649, and remained, as we know, a stone of stumbling and an occasion of disruption. Moreover, presentees to livings had to take the oath of allegiance.

A yearly grant of £40,000 was made to the king, £32,000 being taken from the excise of ale and beer. "It lowered extremely the price of victual, because it heighten'd the price of beer and ale, . . . and it forced poor people also to leave off brewing. . . ." These seem rather salutary results, but already, in 1659, when the price of beer was raised, "God fra the hevinis declaired his anger by sending thunder, fyre, and unheard of tempests, and inundations," so Nicoll interprets the divine view of the case.<sup>19</sup> The subsidy was collected by soldiers, who were quartered on sluggish payers, a very practical grievance. Against several of the proceedings of Parliament, the brethren, such as dared to meet, made remonstrances to Middleton, who declined "to be terrified by papers."<sup>20</sup> The Synod of Fife set to work, but Rothes dismissed them, and the Earl of Galloway acted the same part in his shire. "The ministers did begin to thunder after their usual manner," says Mackenzie, but times had altered. The Synod even of Fife, the leader of old in many a struggle, was put to the door.<sup>21</sup> The Synod of Lothian was forced to censure its protesting brethren, and suspend them, and was then dismissed. "All this is but a short swatch" (specimen) of the oppressions of the times, says Wodrow.

The next event of public importance was the trial of Argyll, who, during the session of Parliament, had lain in Edinburgh Castle. He was allowed counsel,—in England a man accused of treason would not have been so fortunate,—and Mackenzie was one of his advocates. The indictment, drawn up under Sir John Fletcher, the king's advocate, wandered over the whole career of the marquis since he first took the Covenant, and included many charges of barbarity to the Macdonalds, often alleged on mere hearsay; indeed, the indictment was mainly a deluge of irrelevancies introduced to excite prejudice. Argyll was safe, by virtue of acts of indemnity, for all offences prior to 1651; where he was vulnerable was in his aiding and abetting of the English invaders during Glencairn's and Middleton's rising, when his own son, Lord Lorne, was in arms for the king. Argyll's defence on this point was that his conduct was but "common compliance wherein all the kingdom did share equally." Charles was fair enough to decree that only offences committed after 1651 should be insisted upon, and this grace was believed to be due to Lauderdale acting out of enmity to Middleton, and favour to Lorne, who had married his niece.<sup>22</sup> The restriction of the charge was no more than just, but was thought to be practically nullified when Middleton sent Glencairn and Rothes to court to work against the interest of Argyll. Meanwhile, during the numerous sittings of the Court in Edinburgh, Middleton pressed the charge of accession to the death of Charles I. Of this there was no kind of proof, nothing beyond conjecture as to the nature of talk between Argyll and Cromwell after Preston fight; and Parliament on this head acquitted the marquis honourably.

All now turned on his alleged abetting of the English in 1654-1655. Then came a dramatic moment. Says Mackenzie, "after the debate and probation was all closed, and the Parliament ready to consider the whole matter, one who came post from London knockt most rudely at the Parliament door, and upon his entry with a packet, which he presented to the Commissioner, made him conclude that he had brought a remission, or some other warrant, in favour of the marquis, and the rather because the bearer was a Campbell." The packet really contained "a great many letters" of the accused to Monk while commanding in Scotland; and these letters proved beyond cavil that Argyll had been giving intelligence to the English of the movements of the Royalists, and even of his own son.* Of the extant letters three are to Lilburne, three to Monk; if Mackenzie rightly says that there were "a great many letters," no doubt the proof against Argyll was more copious—it could not be more cogent—than that which we possess.† "No sooner were these letters produced than the Parliament was fully satisfied as to the proof of the compliance."<sup>23</sup>

Next day Argyll was forfeited, and sentenced to be beheaded, not hanged like Montrose. His demeanour, says Mackenzie, "drew tears from his very enemies," who were of milder mood than the foes of his great opponent. A respite was refused, but Argyll was not insulted and harassed as Montrose had been. Monk has been much blamed for sending down Argyll's letters, as if they had been private communications to a friend. But Monk and Lilburne were addressed by Argyll in their public capacity,—they were in no sense his friends. There was nothing to restrain Monk except the fact that, if Argyll had been a rebel against the king, he himself was in the same condemnation. Burnet says that Monk "betrayed the confidence in which they then lived."<sup>24</sup> Monk lived in no confidence with Argyll: no one did, and Monk trusted Argyll no further than he could see him. Argyll was not staunch to the English for whom he acted as intelligencer. In October 1656, in a conference with Don John of Austria, Charles II. is reported to have said, "to tell truth I have more of him (Argyll) than of any other, and except for Cromwell himself, it is certain that he carries immortal hatred at Lambert, Monk, and all the rest of their officers, and of this evidence shall be given anon."<sup>25</sup> Monk happened to be aware of the amiable sentiments entertained towards him by Argyll: the account of the conversation between Charles and Don John was sent to him by a spy named Drummond, who was present, or was informed by some person who was present.<sup>26</sup> If the spy's report is correct, we have a very pretty picture of perfidy on all sides. Argyll (1654) betrays his son's movements to Monk, and is his "affectionate humble servant." In 1656 Argyll is apparently aiding the king with money, and "carries immortal hatred at Monk." In 1661 Monk, who knows this, sees his chance, and has his revenge on Argyll, while Charles takes the life of the rebel of 1654, of the friend who advanced money in 1656.

* In the 'Dictionary of National Biography,' it is said that these letters are lost.

† About the production of this incontrovertible evidence, Wodrow says not one word (Wodrow, i. pp. 130-150); nor does Kirkton. Even in 1903 the Rev. Alexander Smellie avers that the letters merely "contained some expressions of goodwill to the Commonwealth and the Lord Protector." 'Men of the Covenant,' 65.

Argyll's reputation for courage, we know, was not good, and Burnet says that "his heart failed him," when the usual arrangements had been made for an escape. He had just put on his wife's clothes, and was going into her chair, but he feared that, if he were taken, his execution might be hastened.<sup>27</sup> Wodrow puts it that, after getting into petticoats, he said that "he would not disown the good cause."<sup>28</sup> It does not appear how escape meant apostasy, any more than in the escape of Ogilvy from St Andrews, or of the Earl of Argyll in 1681. But Argyll may have thought so, remembering the refusal of Socrates to break prison. As he said of Montrose, he "got some resolution to die," and "had a sweet time as to his soul," adds Wodrow. "I could die like a Roman, but choose rather to die as a Christian," he remarked to Mackenzie, who records the phrase.<sup>29</sup> Did he mean that he, like Montrose, could have died "in the old Roman way" (as was fabled of Lethington), but thought suicide wrong? He met his fate with perfect courage and composure, insisting that "those who were then unborn are engaged to the Covenant.”<sup>30</sup> He may thus be regarded as a confessor, and extreme Presbyterians have proclaimed him a “martyr” of their creed.

The title was perhaps better deserved by James Guthrie, who was hanged on June 1. He had been the heart and brain, with Waristoun, of the Remonstrants, maintaining the highest opinions of the duties and privileges of ministers. With Guthrie began that hanging of preachers which, nearly a century earlier, Morton is said to have thought requisite for the restoration of peace to Scotland. A long and brutal struggle was to follow. The essence of Guthrie’s offending, in Mackenzie’s opinion, was his refusal to accept king and council “as judges to what he preached, in the first instance.”<sup>31</sup> This was the old quarrel with Andrew Melville. A preacher is accused, for example, of using the pulpit as a vehicle of seditious or treasonable libels. He will only be tried, in the first instance, by other preachers. If they acquit him, as they are likely to do, there can be no court of second instance. Apostolic authority has given its verdict. The question is, are preachers or laymen to rule the State? To ensure the supremacy of the State, a moderate Episcopacy without the Liturgy, or the Articles of Perth, was forced on Scotland. Nonconformist ministers were put out of their livings, as in Ireland by Jeremy Taylor; and as Conformist ministers had been used by the Covenanters, and were again used in 1689. Their flocks clung to them, and were persecuted. So far they were sufferers for conscience’ sake. But the worthy men whom they followed were mortal enemies of freedom of conscience in religion. They suffered what, in 1638 and in 1689, they inflicted.

We have already criticised the proceedings of Sharp in 1660, 1661. On May 21, 1661, as we saw, he wrote to Middleton from London. He had seen Clarendon, who would only consent to the removal of the English garrisons from Scotland if Scotland adopted Prelacy. Lauderdale and Sharp were to write a Proclamation on the matter, to be issued after Middleton had visited London.<sup>32</sup> It was, practically, Clarendon who hurried on the intrusion of Episcopacy. On the Scottish side, Middleton is said to have declared that the majority in Scotland was for it; and Sharp, says Burnet, assured the king that only the Protesters, and not twenty Resolutioners, were against it.<sup>33</sup> Lauderdale and the king knew the Scots better, who had been bred in the faith, says Mackenzie, that Prelacy is “a limb of Antichrist.” “The king went very coldly into the design,” writes Burnet. The view of things that the Earl of Lauderdale had given him was the true root of the king's coldness in enforcing Episcopacy. But the Council in Scotland insisted on the change.

On the break up of Parliament (July 12), the Council became all-powerful, and the Earl of Tweeddale was despotically imprisoned for some observations on Guthrie's case.<sup>34</sup> At the end of August, Sharp, Glencairn, and Rothes returned from Court, and (September 8) issued a royal letter on ecclesiastical matters. This contained the quibble about maintaining the Kirk "as settled by law," the promise made in the previous year. After the Rescissory Act, "law" was what it had been in the last year of James VI. Bishops were therefore to be restored, and meetings of synods were forbidden. There is no possible defence of the prevarication of Government, which would have been odious in a pettifogging attorney. The king himself, in all probability, was already a Catholic as far as he had any convictions. To the north of Scotland, and especially to the Synod of Aberdeenshire, the change was welcome, and many ministers even in the south were wearying of Presbyterian unrest. But many Resolutioners and all Protesters were alienated, with the pious of their flocks, especially the zealous women of all social ranks. Of the bishops of 1638 only Sydsersf, Bishop of Galloway, survived. There were old clergymen who had been in the Episcopal Church of James VI., but Presbyterian ministers were preferred to the restored bishoprics and their scanty revenues. Sydsersf was translated to Orkney; Sharp got St Andrews with the primacy, which, as Grub, no unfriendly critic, remarks, "a person of strict rectitude, or even of high worldly honour, would never, under such circumstances, have accepted."<sup>35</sup> Fairfoul, minister of Dunse, took Glasgow, and the insignificant diocese of Dunblane fell to the saintly Leighton. The deanery of the chapel royal enabled him to use the Anglican Book of Common Prayer. It is, perhaps, still the popular opinion that the liturgy was restored with the bishops, but Dr M'Crie, in a review of 'Old Mortality,' writes, "at the Restoration . . . public worship was left to be conducted as it had been practised in the Presbyterian Church." *

* According to Dr M'Crie, Episcopacy was established because Charles thought that Presbyterianism "was not the religion of a gentleman." This is absurd; Episcopacy was established for the reasons which have been given, not for its "gentlemanliness," nor because "aspiring churchmen . . . were satisfied with seating themselves in their rich bishoprics." Wodrow remarks that the

To return to the bishops, Montrose's Wishart (a profane drunkard, says Wodrow, borrowing from Kirkton), got Edinburgh. The others, less notable, are impartially abused by Wodrow; Leighton's besetting sin was "an over extensive charity."<sup>86</sup> On December 15, 1661, the prelates were ordained at Westminster Abbey, being "rushed" through deacon's and priest's orders, to the discontent of Sharp.*

It was inconsistent that the bishops, on their return to Scotland, did not re-ordain such Presbyterian ministers as now adhered to Episcopacy. Leighton found, says Burnet, that Sharp had no scheme at all for getting rid of "conceived prayers" and introducing a liturgy. To Sharp, Burnet attributes quite another scheme—the prohibition by Council, on January 9, 1662, of all meetings of synods, presbyteries, or kirk sessions, until authorised by the bishops.<sup>87</sup> For reasons obvious to the Presbyterian conscience,<sup>88</sup> this precipitancy and the great increase of power allotted to bishops widened the breach between the preachers and the State. In Parliament (May 27, 1662), Episcopacy was restored, the Covenants declared unlawful, ministers who would not attend the new synods (synods under bishops) lost their livings; and patronage, abolished in 1649, was restored. All ministers appointed after 1649 were ordered to be presented afresh by the patron, to the bishop for collation, on or before September 20, and this struck, as Kirkton remarks, at the younger preachers.<sup>89</sup> The bishops sat in this Parliament, to the disgust of David Leslie, the victor of Philiphaugh, who attended as a peer.<sup>40</sup> All acts giving jurisdiction to kirkmen independent of the royal supremacy were rescinded; but the prelates were "restored to all the commissariats," the judgments, practically, of probate and divorce. All persons in places of public trust had to take an oath declaring it unlawful to enter into leagues and covenants, or to take up arms against the king. "Some compared this declaration to the receiving the mark of the beast in the right revenues of all the Scottish bishoprics "came but to £4000 or £5000 sterling a year, much of their rent being in victual" (Wodrow, i. p. 235). Wodrow took this from Kirkton's MS., to which he makes a general acknowledgment of obligations (Kirkton, 135). The richness of the bishoprics and the gentlemanly tastes of the king were not the causes of the establishment of Episcopacy; it is amazing that a learned historian should express such a theory. But Dr M'Crie repeats that Presbyterian writers of the time "repeatedly admit that they had no such grievance" as the imposition of the detested book (M'Crie, 'Works,' iv. 17; 1857).

* Compare Burnet's very interesting and generous account of Leighton, 'History of his Own Times,' i. pp. 242-253.

hand," says Wodrow. Lauderdale, at whom, as having been of old a very precious Covenanter, this act was thought to be aimed, said that he would take "a cartful of such oaths."<sup>41</sup> The working of the Act of Indemnity, which had been delayed to terrify possible recalcitrants, was also aimed at Lauderdale in a futile and perplexing fashion.

The affairs of Scotland, at this juncture, needed the most sagacious and delicate handling. But power was not concentrated, the members of the Government "fought for their own hands," and Middleton in Scotland aimed at money from fines and at the estates of Argyll. In London, Lauderdale counteracted him; Lorne was saved from the consequences of some hasty phrases in a private letter; and Middleton's objects were to settle the religious difficulty with the high hand, to oust Lauderdale by a scheme for excluding twelve persons from office,—these twelve to be selected by an unheard-of system of ostracism ("billeting") in Parliament,—and to extort fines to an enormous extent. His first plan culminated (October 1) in a foolish and fatal order of Council at Glasgow, whereby all preachers who did not conform by November 1 were to be ousted, and deprived of their stipends. Nearly 300 ministers went out, and the Council, terrified by a kind of ecclesiastical strike, extended the period of submission to February 1, 1663. The Presbyterians, when they ousted Conformist preachers in 1689, had plenty of old hands and of young enthusiasts to take their places, but the Council, at this juncture, had no such supplies of any value.

The affair of "billeting," after complex intrigues (Lauderdale being kept informed of what passed in Edinburgh by Sharp's brother, William), ended in Middleton's discomfiture. He had led Parliament to believe that the king desired the ostracism, and the king to suppose that it was the wish of Parliament. Charles, after receiving able and lawyer-like memoirs from Lauderdale and Middleton (published by Mackenzie), threw the billets of ostracism into his cabinet. Lennox's "billet" ostracised Crawford (Lindsay), Cassilis, Lauderdale, Lothian, Loudoun, Tweeddale, Sir Robert Murray, and Brodie of Brodie, among others. The leaven of the old Covenanting party among the lords and lairds was threatened. Lauderdale, however, secured the aid of Clarendon in frustrating a conspiracy of the clumsiest kind, but Middleton got leave to continue in Scotland, where his conduct in postponing a royal proclamation as to the fines of some seven or eight hundred persons excepted from the Act of Indemnity was represented to the king as an infringement of royal prerogative. Middleton's counsellors had, it is said, often deliberated in drink, and had not revised their proceedings when sober.

On March 10, 1663, Middleton was recalled, and the Keepership of the Castle of Edinburgh was bestowed on Lauderdale.<sup>42</sup> Meanwhile preachers like Livingstone of Ancrum, Nevoy or Neave, of the Dunaverty Massacre, and Donald Cargill, later so notorious, had been exiled, or sent north of Tay. Apparently Baillie would have sent them to Orkney. The bloodthirsty Nevoy, author of "a very handsome paraphrase of the Song of Solomon," says Wodrow, died abroad.<sup>43</sup> Such ministers as were determined to practise passive resistance left their manse and flocks in the winter months of 1663. "Parish churches, generally speaking, through the western and southern shires, were now waste and without sermon," says Wodrow. In the prime of the Covenant, many parishes had seen their "Conformist" and Engager ministers ousted, but no wail is made by history over the sorrows of Conformists. The vacant parishes, in 1638 and after the Engagement, were readily filled with fiery and godly young Covenanting preachers; but in 1663 there was a sudden demand for Episcopalian preachers on the part of Government. Jeremy Taylor, when he "ousted" Irish Presbyterians, had an easy source of supply of preachers from England. Nobody was likely to leave England for a Scottish parish, and, according to Kirkton, the north was ransacked for "a sort of young lads, unstudied and unbred." "We cannot get a lad to keep cows, they turn all ministers," said a local humourist, but Kirkton admits that "most of them were of two or three years' standing."<sup>44</sup> In their new parishes "the curates" were received, here with tears, elsewhere with curses, "strange affronts and indignities," barred doors, empty belfries, and ants' nests emptied into their boots—a pious waggishness of a shepherd's boy. In other cases the godly stoned the new preachers, and resisted the soldiers who escorted them. Women, "bangster Amazons," took the lead, as in the historical riot about the Liturgy. Kirkton attributes the wilder outrages to "the profane and ignorant." "I have known some profane people, if they had committed an error at night, thought affronting a curate to-morrow a testimony of their repentance."

Ten years later Leighton wrote to Lauderdale, "the negligent and indifferent throwing in upon them any that came to hand was the great cause of all the disquiet that hath arisen in these parts, filling all places with almost as much precipitancy as was used in making them empty." In a draft of a paper for Leighton, made by Burnet, the archbishop says that they had first made a desert and then peopled it with owls and satyrs.<sup>45</sup> Burnet, then very young, was offered any church he pleased, but the wisdom of the serpent dictated his refusal. He says that the livings were well endowed, and the manses well built and in good repair.

The ousted preachers were "a grave, solemn sort of people," "their spirits eager, and their tempers sour," but they commanded respect. They were of good families, "either by blood or marriage." Thus, in the Presbytery of Jedburgh we find Scotts, Elliots, and Kers, probably cadets of these families, but in all the Maxwell country only two Maxwells "wagged their paws in a pulpit"; they were a godless clan. In Fife gentle names are more frequent: taking Wodrow's whole list, however, it does not seem that the preachers, as a rule, "came of a gentle kind."<sup>46</sup> Still, they were the men to whom the parishioners were accustomed to look up; and they had taught the serious convinced vessels to pray almost or altogether as well as themselves. "I have often overheard them at it," says Burnet, "and though there was a large mixture of odd stuff, I have been astonished to hear how copious and ready they were in it." Such graces in private outpourings before small assemblies had not been welcome to the majority of the early Covenanting preachers, who, as we have seen, disliked and discouraged conventicles. But many of the now ousted ministers then inclined to favour such exercises. At meetings on Sunday nights the people discoursed on their "cases of conscience," a practice which partly satisfied that love of talking about ourselves that could no longer find an outlet in the confessional. Indeed, judging not only from Burnet but from Covenanting diaries, confession was informally practised, "the people very oft being under fits of melancholy, or vapours, or obstructions, which, though they flowed from natural causes, were looked on as the work of the spirit of God. . . ." Such phenomena will occur wherever religion is a matter of serious concern.<sup>47</sup>

From palatable political sermons, and pious assemblies to talk over sermons, and from informal confession to adored preachers, the faithful were now cut off, and their case is not less deplorable than that of Catholics after the Reformation, or of Episcopalians under the Covenant or the Commonwealth or the Revolution. Not only the serious of all classes, but the profane and ruffianly, were banded against the "curates," and preferred "to share the family exercises of the younger ministers who were ousted but sojourned among them," or to leave their parish kirks for those of really sound divines of older standing than 1649.<sup>48</sup> The assemblages would often overflow the limits of the kirk or minister's house, and thus large conventicles were held in the open air. The kirk of the curate was deserted. "He, only he, were my parishioners," writes a poetical curate in praise of his laird. "Going to hear those profane hirelings would take you to hell as soon as idolatry, witchcraft, adulteries," said the Prophet Peden, in a sermon preached at Glenluce.<sup>49</sup>

This condition of affairs greeted the Parliament of June 18, 1663. It met under Rothes as Commissioner: Lauderdale accompanied him to Scotland. Rothes intimated the king's desire that the Lords of the Articles should be elected in the manner "used before these late troubles." Many manners had been used: but the method now was the election by the clergy of eight nobles, who chose eight bishops, the sixteen electing eight from the barons, eight from the burgesses. This "packed" the Lords of the Articles for the crown. Rothes's niece was the young heiress of Buccleuch, she was married to James, whom Charles supposed to be his son by Lucy Walters; and on July 10, "James, Duke of Monmouth," was created Duke of Buccleuch.<sup>50</sup> On August 21 was passed an act for constituting a National Synod or Assembly, under the Primate, but the Synod never met.<sup>51</sup> On September 23 "an humble tender" of 20,000 foot and 2000 horse was made, to be ready to serve against invasion or rebellion in any part of the three kingdoms.<sup>52</sup> The force was employed, in part, during the risings which soon followed. Already (July 10) an act had been passed "Against Separation and Disobedience to Ecclesiastical Authority." Persons not attending their parish kirks were to be severely fined, at the discretion, within limits, of the Privy Council; and preaching by ousted ministers was to be held seditious. Thus many Presbyterians were placed in a position like that which Catholics had long occupied.<sup>53</sup>

During this Parliament, Waristoun, who had been captured in France, was tried, and received sentence of death. He was, or more probably feigned to be, idiotic. Lauderdale (July 2) describes to Sir Robert Murray his abject demeanour. "I have often heard of a man feared out of his wits, but never saw it before; yet what he said was good sense enough, but he roared and cried and expressed more fear than ever I saw."<sup>54</sup> If the caitiff was "disordered in mind" (as Burnet says), it does not appear how he could compose his own speech, read by him on the scaffold.<sup>55</sup> On July 9 Lauderdale announces that Waristoun had recovered composure and dignity.<sup>56</sup> Waristoun had been "an idol," says Burnet, of the Presbyterians; others, in their affections towards him, keep well "on this side idolatry." Mackenzie gives a deplorable account of the panic-stricken pietist who had disturbed the last hours of Montrose.<sup>57</sup>

Though, for the purpose of ousting Middleton, Lauderdale had pretended zeal for Episcopacy, his old training, and the inveterate jealousy and contempt of bishops which he and all Scottish nobles entertained, made him and Glencairn but lukewarm supporters of Sharp. The bolder apostate despised his low-born and timid comrade. In 1664 Sharp went to London, asking, practically, for a Court of High Commission. Burnet, who was about twenty-two at the time, says that he remonstrated with Lauderdale, who replied that he was only giving Sharp line. The eager Burnet then expostulated with Sharp, who became "jealous" of him.<sup>58</sup> The Court of High Commission, or "Crail Court" (so called from Sharp's old parish), put more power into Episcopal hands, a quorum of five, including one bishop, being entrusted with the work of punishing nonconformity.<sup>59</sup>

Our old friend, the cheerful Turner, now Sir James Turner, was the "secular arm" to which recalcitrant Whigs were handed over. He knew no "other rule but to obey orders," says Burnet, who claims to have been of his acquaintance. Years later, in 1668, a committee of the Privy Council reported many outrageous deeds of Sir James, but it had been determined to make a scapegoat of the gallant and learned officer. The accusations, with such replies as the knight deemed it prudent to make, are to be found in Wodrow.<sup>60</sup> In his memoirs he declares that he was all for leniency, "never came the full length of his orders," sometimes did not exact fines, and often exacted but a part of the legal amount. The character of Sir James was notably merciful; he had saved many lives of prisoners, and pled hard with Leslie for the captives butchered at Dunaverty. But "drinking, I confess," he writes, with honourable candour, "hath brought me in many inconveniences." Burnet puts the case more strongly: "he was mad when he was drunk, and that was very often."<sup>61</sup> Admitting, as Burnet does, that Turner "was often chid" for leniency, "both by Lord Rothes and Sharp," even so the inconveniences of an intoxicated commander, still more the excesses of his soldiers when quartered on recusants at a distance from him, must have been intolerable. We have a report of Turner's brutalities in a minister's house, from one who, as a child, was present. If Turner was really there in command, he must have been drunk, and should have been broke.

The outbreak of the war with Holland (1664), the closing of Dutch ports to Scots trade, and the "inconveniences" of Turner were well calculated to provoke insurrection. The letters of Rothes to Lauderdale, in 1665, are a long lament over the poverty of the country, the difficulty of collecting fines, the dangers of holding a financial Convention, when "griffinses" (grievances) so abound, and the spread of conventicles.<sup>62</sup> The idea of disarming the Whiggish west may have been adopted as much to procure arms as to pacify the recalcitrant, for there were neither men nor weapons to resist an invading force, and on many sides it was reported that invasion would be the signal for rebellion. Either "cess" (land-tax) or other taxation would prove as unprofitable as unpopular. On the news of a naval battle with the Dutch in June 1665, many suspected gentlemen were seized and imprisoned, among them a brother of Lord Eglintoun, Maxwell of Nether Pollock, Muir of Rowallan, a brother of Halket of Pitfirrane, and Sir George Monro.<sup>63</sup> On December 7 a severe ordinance against conventicles was issued by the Council,<sup>64</sup> and Turner was very busy in Ayrshire and Galloway. On November 24, Rothes, in spelling almost unintelligible, gave Lauderdale an account of the conventicles, secretly assembled, addressed by ousted ministers in lay costume, "at the side of a moss or a river," with scouts and sentinels to give warning of hostile approaches. The women are the chief cause of the trouble, being "influenced by these fanatic knaves."<sup>65</sup>

Ever since the death of Glencairn, in 1664, the Chancellorship had been vacant, and Sharp, with Alexander Burnet, now Archbishop of Glasgow, had been intriguing. They well knew that the nobles in power hated and despised them, and had no more love of Episcopacy than Montrose. Even the recall of Middleton, as Chancellor, is said by Burnet to have been aimed at by Sharp, who was also made hateful to Cavaliers by the statement that he had diverted the fines, intended to compensate them, to the purpose of raising troops. In the summer of 1665, according to Burnet, Sharp, in London, tried to undermine Lauderdale in the king's graces, but was detected and reduced to tears, by the burly favourite.<sup>66</sup> Charles, by a view of Sharp's correspondence in 1660-1661, already criticised, was led to regard him as "the worst of men," but, if Charles was Sharp's fellow-conspirator, he knew all about him already. Despite the distress and discontent, Rothes, in March 1666, reported that conventicles would scatter before a sheriff and a couple of his officers.<sup>67</sup> Rothes was quite mistaken in his view of the temper of the godly. They were intriguing with Holland, and had a scheme for capturing the castles of Edinburgh, Stirling, and Dumbarton, in July 1666.* On July 15 the States-General of Holland deliberated on the overtures of "the friends of religion," in Scotland, and it was determined to send assistance, arms, and ammunition as soon as the friends of religion had made themselves masters of the fortresses. A subsidy of 150,000 gulden was promised to the professors. The intrigue lasted till October, at least, and the rising in Galloway, commonly called the Pentland Rising, occurred in November.<sup>68</sup> From the 'Life of Gabriel Sempill,' by himself, it appears that the west country lairds, whether engaged in the intrigue with the Dutch or not, were discussing the chances of success in a rebellion.<sup>69</sup> Yet the rising, probably, arose on an accidental occasion.

On October 4, 1666, Rothes was demanding forces to overawe "the stubborn people in the west," where Turner tells us that he had not seventy men in his command, and of these all but thirteen were scattered here and there, quartered on recusants. Then the flame broke out. The lonely clachan of Dalry, in the valley of the Ken, was the scene of resistance to a few soldiers, accused of ill-treating an old peasant. One of four "honest men," who chanced to be drinking in the clachan, shot a soldier (November 13 or 14), and safety now seemed to lie in rebellion rather than in flight. A few lairds, such as Corsack, and young Maxwell of Monreith, joined the original four honest men, of whom M'Lennan of Barscobe, a local landed gentleman, seems to have been one. A tumultuary body marched down Loch Ken and so to Dumfries, where Sir James Turner, who was in bad health, was surprised and captured in his bedroom ; the fines which he had collected, and his commission, were taken by the insurgents.

* This appears from a MS. in the Advocates' Library, cited by Dr M'Crie, 'Memoirs of Veitch and Brysson,' p. 35, note.

Accounts of the affair differ: Turner says that M'Lennan of Barscobe, at Dalry, shot a corporal of his, for refusing to break the law by taking the Covenant—so the corporal reported. The captain of the rebels was one Andrew Gray, who soon left them,—Turner could get no information about him; a report, printed by Symson, a conformist minister, accuses him of running away with the money.* According to Blackader, the knight's captors numbered 50 horse and about 200 foot.† Poor Sir James was dragged up and down the country on a sorry nag, and knew that the wilder fanatics advised his death. "This notion of pistoling him was slighted, alas, it is to be feared too much," says Wallace, who led the rebels. Nelson of Corsack resisted this proposal, and Turner, later, did his best (as we learn on Covenanting evidence) to save the life of Nelson.<sup>70</sup> Sir James did not lose heart or humour, and stood beer to the preachers who attended the mob, for the amusement of hearing them say grace before they swigged it. Of the infantry he speaks in high praise: "I never saw lustier fellows or better marchers," and the horsemen executed their manoeuvres handsomely.

Wallace, a trained soldier from Edinburgh, an old blade of the Covenant, now commanded a force of over a thousand men.<sup>71</sup> Among the ousted preachers who rode with them was the famous prophet, Peden, who, foreseeing the hopelessness of their enterprise, deserted them when they approached the Clyde. Wallace, who thought himself no mean strategist, hovered between Edinburgh and Glasgow, ready to strike at either. In Edinburgh the Council (Rothes being on his way to London) had news of the rising by November 17, and summoned the loyal in all directions. On November 21 they issued a proclamation with no promise of indemnity, and they secured the passages over Forth against the malcontents of Fife.<sup>72</sup> The rebels, wandering about, were strongest at Lanark, where they renewed the Covenants "to the end we may be free of the apostasy of our times." They also refer to the * See Turner's 'Memoirs,' Kirkton, pp. 229-232. Wodrow, ii. pp. 17-20, and the Rev. Mr Blackader's account, 'Memoirs,' pp. 121-123. Edited by Andrew Crichton, Edinburgh, 1826. 'Veitch and Brysson,' pp. 380-384.

† If we are to accept the odd theory that the Jesuits were the fomenters of the rising, perhaps we may regard the mysterious Andrew Gray as a Jesuit!

injustice of their sufferings by fines, imprisonments, and quarterings of soldiers.<sup>73</sup> Of course, the renewal of the Covenants meant a revival of civil war, and Scotland was in a strait, persecution being inevitable whoever triumphed in the contest; but victory was not long uncertain.

Tom Dalziel of Binns, a stout old Cavalier, who had been in Russian service, marched on Lanark, and pursued the rebels towards Edinburgh, whither vague news of a Dutch landing, and hopes of recruits and supplies, had lured them. Their only chance lay in an onfall of their Dutch allies, and the appearance of a fleet of Hollanders at Dunbar was reported, forty sail in all.<sup>74</sup> From Edinburgh came neither recruits nor supplies; cold, and heavy rain, and fear had reduced the little army; they wandered into the Pentland Hills, and there had a scuffle with part of the royal army, who retreated to a steep hillside. In this affair fell two Irish Presbyterian preachers, "main instruments of the attempt," says Wallace.

His account of the battle of Rullion Green is obscure. "The enemy runs" is a phrase that occurs frequently; the Covenant seems to be victorious, yet somehow it is the Covenanters who retire, beaten and in great disorder, exposed to the attacks of the local peasantry. The facts may be explained if we prefer the account of Maitland of Halton, who fought on the Cavalier side.<sup>75</sup> Sir James Turner joined his friends unhurt, after the victory, and Wallace made his escape to Holland. The soldiers and country people took many prisoners, both laymen and preachers. So ended (November 28) a rising which appears to have been unconcerted. Probably the devout persons who had designed to seize, or betray to the Dutch, Edinburgh, Stirling, and Dumbarton castles, kept out of the rebellion. Their names have never been ascertained. They had, of course, quite as good a right to appeal to Holland as the Jacobites later had in their acceptance of French, Spanish, or Swedish assistance.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER X.

<sup>1</sup> Wodrow, i. pp. 7, 17.

<sup>2</sup> Wodrow, i, pp. 15, 16; 20, 21.

<sup>3</sup> Lauderdale Papers, i. p. 25; Wodrow, i. p. 20, 21; Mr Airy's note, Lauderdale Papers, i. pp. 25, 26.

<sup>4</sup> Wodrow, i. p. 22, note.

- <sup>5</sup> Baillie, iii. p. 459.
<sup>7</sup> Wodrow, i. p. 28.
<sup>9</sup> Burton, vii. p. 134.
<sup>11</sup> Wodrow, i. pp. 26-35.
<sup>13</sup> Wodrow, i. p. 73.
<sup>15</sup> Lauderdale Papers, i. pp. 56-60.
<sup>16</sup> Mackenzie, 19.
<sup>18</sup> Wodrow, i. p. 91. As to the ambiguities in the oath about supremacy, cf. Wodrow, i. pp. 92, 93.
<sup>19</sup> Mackenzie, pp. 31, 32; Nicoll, p. 247.
<sup>20</sup> Wodrow, i. p. 112.
<sup>23</sup> Mackenzie, pp. 37, 38.
<sup>24</sup> Burnet, 'History of his Own Times,' i. p. 226, Oxford, 1833.
<sup>25</sup> The Heads of a Discourse, etc., Act. Parl. Scot., vi. pt. 2, pp. 904, 905.
<sup>26</sup> Thurloe, State Papers, v. pp. 602, 603.
<sup>23</sup> Wodrow, i. p. 152.
<sup>30</sup> Mackenzie, p. 44.
<sup>32</sup> 'Archæologia Scotica,' vol. ii. pp. 103-107.
<sup>33</sup> Burnet, i. p. 236.
<sup>34</sup> Wodrow, i. pp. 219-221; Burnet, i. pp. 231-234; Mackenzie, p. 60.
<sup>35</sup> Grub, 'Ecclesiastical History of Scotland,' iii. p. 192.
<sup>36</sup> Wodrow, i. p. 238.
<sup>37</sup> Wodrow, i. p. 249, note; Burnet, i. pp. 255, 256.
<sup>38</sup> Burnet, i. pp. 258-260.
<sup>39</sup> Kirkton, 'Secret and True History,' p. 144.
<sup>40</sup> Wodrow, i. p. 259.
<sup>42</sup> Mackenzie, pp. 64-113; Burnet, i. pp. 258-278, 364-370; Lauderdale Papers, i. pp. 106-134.
<sup>44</sup> Kirkton, 'Secret and True History,' p. 160.
<sup>45</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. p. 225.
<sup>46</sup> Wodrow, i. pp. 324-329.
<sup>48</sup> Kirkton, 'Secret and True History,' p. 163.
<sup>49</sup> C. K. Sharpe, note to Kirkton, p. 164.
<sup>50</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., vii. pp. 449, 454.
<sup>52</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., vii. pp. 480, 481.
<sup>53</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., vii. pp. 455, 456.
<sup>54</sup> Lauderdale Papers, i. p. 145.
<sup>56</sup> Lauderdale Papers, i. p. 152.
<sup>58</sup> Burnet, i. pp. 375, 376.
<sup>60</sup> Wodrow, ii. pp. 101-104.
<sup>62</sup> Lauderdale Papers, i. pp. 218-240.
<sup>63</sup> Wodrow, i. p. 425.
<sup>65</sup> Lauderdale Papers, i. pp. 233, 234.
<sup>67</sup> Lauderdale Papers, i. pp. 235, 236.
<sup>68</sup> M'Crie, op. cit. pp. 377-380.
<sup>70</sup> Law's 'Memorials.' Wodrow MSS., p. 17.
<sup>71</sup> Wallace left a narrative, in M'Crie's 'Veitch and Brysson,' pp. 355-432.
<sup>72</sup> Wodrow, ii. p. 20.
<sup>74</sup> Wallace, in 'Veitch and Brysson,' p. 409.
<sup>75</sup> Lauderdale Papers, i. pp. 248-252.
<sup>6</sup> Baillie, iii. p. 404.
<sup>8</sup> Baillie, iii., lxxv.
<sup>10</sup> Baillie, iii. p. 404.
<sup>12</sup> Wodrow, i. pp. 66-71.
<sup>14</sup> Wodrow, i. p. 81.
<sup>17</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 825-837.
<sup>21</sup> Wodrow, pp. 112-128.
<sup>23</sup> Mackenzie, pp. 39, 40.
<sup>27</sup> Burnet, i. p. 224.
<sup>29</sup> Mackenzie, p. 47.
<sup>31</sup> Mackenzie, p. 50.
<sup>41</sup> Mackenzie, pp. 64, 65.
<sup>43</sup> Wodrow, i. p. 317.
<sup>47</sup> Burnet, i. pp. 279-284.
<sup>51</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., vii. p. 465.
<sup>55</sup> Burnet, i. pp. 370, 371.
<sup>57</sup> Mackenzie, pp. 134, 135.
<sup>59</sup> Wodrow, i. pp. 384-395.
<sup>61</sup> Burnet, i. pp. 384, 385.
<sup>64</sup> Wodrow, i. p. 430.
<sup>66</sup> Burnet, i. pp. 386-390.
<sup>69</sup> M'Crie, op. cit. p. 384.
<sup>73</sup> Wodrow, ii. pp. 25, 26.

CHAPTER XI.

THE STRIFE WITH THE COVENANTERS.

1667-1679.

FROM the skirmish of Rullion Green to the Revolution the melancholy and tedious chronicles of Scotland are the records of vacillating attempts, first, to reconcile irreconcilables, and secondly, to break down the spirit of the Kirk, or to do both at once.* The story might be told very briefly. Severity and attempts at compromise alternated. While the country, left to itself, might have acquiesced in arrangements by which Episcopacy was reduced almost to the shadow of a name, the extremists, especially some exiled ministers in Holland, Browne and M'Ward, would not be satisfied while the name of "bishop" endured. They must have "parity of ministers," "Christ's kingdom," as in the prime of Andrew Melville's day,—that and nothing less. The various and veering Governments could not grant these demands. They cared little or nothing for bishops, except as ecclesiastical policemen; nay, they cherished the old jealousy of the noble against the prelate, and they ruthlessly subdued the priestly pretensions of their clerical tools. All that Government wanted was to keep the Presbyterians in as good order as Cromwell had done. The Protector had allowed Presbyterianism to exist, minus the General Assembly, always the focus of seditious disturbance.

But Cromwell was backed by Monk and the garrisons; perhaps the Restoration Government could not have existed while every pulpit rang with denunciations of men in office under the names of Haman, Judas, and Ahab. The bishops were therefore maintained as police; and while bishops existed, peace was impossible. Every attempt at leniency seemed weakness to the Presbyterians, and encouraged resistance. In every offer of compromise the trap was detected, and the pious feared that "the dead carcase of the prayer-book" would be revived. The king's ministers were corrupt, and divided by private quarrels; the Presbyterians also were divided, but, on occasion, followed the lead of the extremists; and a dismal series of futile indulgences and irritating ferocities lead us to Bothwell Bridge, the Revolution, and at last to compromise and peace, the majority persecuting a helpless minority.

* Our most useful authority is Wodrow, minister of Eastwood, writing about 1715-20. He is the Calderwood of the period, very industrious, but, of course, not unprejudiced.

Nobody had a policy for Scotland, unless Dalziel's proposal to hang all rebels is a policy.<sup>1</sup> The conduct of Rothes and Sharp, of the military and clerical party, had caused the Pentland Rising. If the landed leaders of the aggrieved Presbyterians had joined that rising openly, the spirit of their party might have been crushed by forfeitures and executions. But no leaders of much social importance could be discovered. The search for them was not helped by the use of torture, which had not been openly and judicially employed in political cases—in trials for witchcraft it was usual—for thirty years. Among the sufferers was Mr Hugh Mackail, a young divine who, at the age of twenty-one, in 1662, had denounced the rulers, in a sermon, as Haman and Judas. He joined the rebels from Edinburgh; and, though he did not remain with them till their defeat, he was supposed to be able to make disclosures. He was put in the boot, a frame into which wedges were driven, crushing the leg.* "The executioner favoured Mr Mackail," says Kirkton, "but Corsack" (whom Turner vainly tried to save) "was cruelly tormented." They told nothing—probably they had nothing to tell. In Edinburgh some fifteen men were hanged. Like the Cavalier prisoners after Philiphaugh, some of them maintained that they had surrendered to quarter on the field. It was briefly replied that they were rebels. As far as evidence goes, perhaps thirty-five men were capitally punished.<sup>2</sup> Dalziel, in the west, is accused not only of extortion and torture, but of shooting one Finlaw without trial.<sup>3</sup> The story sounds incredible, as the authors of 'Naphtali' say (Stuart of Goodtrees, and Stirling, minister of Paisley), but Sir * Kirkton, p. 250. Cf. Note by C. K. Sharpe. Dumas gives the same account of the boot, as used in France, in 'La Reine Margot.' The wedge might merely squeeze the calf, or might, more cruelly, crush the shin bone. For Mackail see the contemporary 'Naphtali,' p. 238.

Robert Murray wrote to Lauderdale that the "damned book" "tells exactly the whole story, as I have heard it related."<sup>4</sup>

Many prisoners lay in "Haddock's Hole" (named after a Royalist prisoner, Gordon of Haddo) and Bishop Wishart, who himself had been in prisons often, sent food to the captives, as became the companion of Montrose.<sup>5</sup> While these prisoners lay expecting death, forfeiture, or exile to Barbadoes (which had no terrors for them), Sir William Ballantyne is accused of rapes of women, roastings of men, and of actual murder, in the south-west. "Turner was a saint to Ballantyne."* The rebellious district was ruined, for the time; and, while the preachers and leaders kept concealed, small bands rabled the houses of conformist ministers, whom they hated as spies, even more than they detested their religious principles. Dalziel, no doubt, had a policy, that of "Thorough"; but he also expected, and received, forfeited estates, while Rothes and other commanders enriched themselves on every hand.

Meanwhile the Royalist opponents of Burnet (Archbishop of Glasgow), Sharp, and Rothes, men like Bellenden, and Tweeddale, kept writing letters to Lauderdale, in town, deprecating the violence of the Church and Army party, and especially avowing hatred and contempt of Sharp. There was a dispute about the bestowal of forfeited lands, and Rothes perhaps exaggerated, while his opponents minimised the dangers and disorders of the time. Bellenden found "the burden of a priest too heavy for my shoulders," and the moment came when Sharp was "snibbed" (January 1667).<sup>6</sup> At a Convention of Estates, the Duke of Hamilton superseded him as president, and he was put under ecclesiastical arrest, condemned not to move out of his diocese. An old intrigue of his to reconcile Rothes and Middleton, through Dumfries, as against Lauderdale, was remembered against him; "he is strangely cast down, yea, lower than the dust," says Rothes to Lauderdale. Till he submitted and adopted a policy of leniency, he was baited and derided, becoming the tool of the Lauderdale party.†

* The story of the murder in Wodrow, ii. p. 65, is not authenticated, as far as I am aware.

† Mr Hume Brown writes (op. cit. ii. p. 398) that, by Gilbert Burnet's story, Sharp kept back a royal letter, desiring that no blood should be shed on account of the Pentland Rising. But Sharp did not go to London at the time preceding Mackail's execution, and Gilbert Burnet tells the tale of the royal letter, not about Sharp, but about Burnet, Archbishop of Glasgow. 'History of his Own Time,' i. p. 435. Oxford, 1833.

The financial convention of January 1667 voted the king £6000 a month, for a year, with every appearance of loyalty. Throughout 1667 Lauderdale's allies in Scotland keep mocking at the bishops as a futile set of men, and at Sharp as a knave, but a useful knave. On July 1, 1667, Sir Robert Murray, who had come down in Lauderdale's interest, wrote to him a long letter on the "fleeings" of the Church and Army party, on their desire to fix themselves in a military despotism, and on their exaggeration of the spirit of revolt.<sup>7</sup> This was ever the burden of Murray, Tweeddale, and Kincardine. But when government came into their own hands, they discovered that the soldiers and prelates had not been wrong, and themselves pursued, but in a vacillating style, the policy of suppression.<sup>8</sup>

Early in September 1667 Lauderdale let Sharp know that bygones might now be bygones, and the king was induced to write to the repentant prelate, who (January 18, 1668) confesses to Lauderdale his joy at the sight of an impression of that "diamond seal," which Prince Charles Edward was to lose in the Highlands.<sup>9</sup> *

Sharp being now tamed and made useful by Lauderdale, Rothes had to be removed from his posts as Royal Commissioner, Commander-in-Chief, and Treasurer. Sir Robert Murray's errand was to make Rothes accept the Chancellorship, resign his offices, including the Treasurership, and, if possible, forswear sack and live cleanly. Rothes in vain pleaded his ignorance of law and of Latin. He was obliged to accept a post for which he was totally unfit; and the desirable thing was to make him demit his other appointments before he visited the king in London. Murray kept reporting the financial corruption of the party that had been in power: on the other hand came in accounts of cruelties to conformist ministers; and the Archbishop of Glasgow was trying to move Sheldon, Archbishop of Canterbury, in favour of the Episcopal order in Scotland. But, on September 24, Rothes resigned, and meanwhile Murray had invented one of many futile forms of religious compromise. Murray's proposals were an indemnity (with exceptions), the persons indemnified to give securities for keeping the peace. Gentlemen were to be sureties for their retainers; the militia was to be settled as the king might appoint; it was to be decided whether or not the persons under vow to keep the peace must sign the declaration against the Covenant (September 13, 1667).<sup>10</sup>

* Sharp seems to have suggested that Rothes and Dalziel purposely caused the Pentland Rising, at least this appears to be the sense of Sir Robert Murray's letter to Lauderdale, Dec. 10, 1667. Lauderdale Papers, ii. pp. 86, 87.

By this time peace had been made with Holland, the army was disbanded, and the Episcopal party felt defenceless. The Presbyterians, or some of them, averred that the attacks on the "curates" had been made by soldiers in disguise; but that was by no means the opinion of the Archbishop of Glasgow.<sup>11</sup> The prelates insisted that the declaration should be taken by persons coming into the king's peace; but, after a long debate, and a repeated miscalculation of votes in the Council, Murray's party carried their point—only a promise to be pacific was demanded.<sup>12</sup> In an earlier list of persons excepted, some dead men's names were entered, and in the new list, "some still remain dead," says Wodrow, with unexpected frivolity. The bishops wrote to Lauderdale (September 16) hoping that "signs from heaven," such as ever attend good Episcopalians (they say), may be multiplied upon the burly person of the earl! They hope, however, that the security of "the clergy may be provided for by the Minister."<sup>13</sup> This Episcopal epistle much amused Murray and his friends: "S.S" (Tweeddale) "and I laughed till we was weary"; it was managed by a trick of Sharp's, for Archbishop Burnet was far from complaisant.<sup>14</sup> Murray's game now was to minimise all the disorders; even at Pentland fight, he heard, the Whigs had not above sixty muskets, and scarcely slew two men. The Covenanters described their doings as much more terrible, and the attempts of the moderate party to smooth matters over were always contradicted by new outbreaks.

In February 1668 our old friend, Turner, was deprived of his office, a scapegoat of greater men, Rothes and the Archbishop of Glasgow. Turner had lost his vouchers and other papers: Gilbert Burnet says that they were privily sent, sealed, to his rooms; "but he was by this time broken; so, since the Government had treated him hardly, he, who was a man of spirit, would not show his vouchers, nor expose his friends."<sup>15</sup> Ballantyne was exiled out of Scotland, and, after an alleged plan for killing Lauderdale, was slain by a cannon shot at a siege in the Low Countries. In spite of these sacrifices to public opinion, it is admitted by all parties that illegal conventicles increased more and more. "They grew very insolent," says Burnet. "The clergy was in many places ill-used by them. They despaired of any further protection from the Government." They even allowed themselves, in the wild west, to be bought out by their parishioners. Burnet could not find out what to believe about the "curates" in the Glasgow diocese. Too much mud was thrown by their enemies; yet the aggrieved parishioners had scruples about accusing them before the bishops,—this they called "homologating Episcopal power."<sup>16</sup> Leighton went to London, and found the king tolerant, as he was both by nature and policy. At this time (1668, 1669) Charles was conducting, unknown to his ministers, the negotiations with Louis XIV. which ended in the secret treaty of Dover, and he was professing to the General of the Jesuits his belief in the old faith.*

The king, himself a Catholic by conviction, was anxious for toleration on all sides, and Leighton was the friend of religious peace at almost any price. He was ready to reduce the Episcopal power to a residuum which almost escaped analysis, "observing the extraordinary concessions made by the African Church to the Donatists, who were every whit as wild and extravagant as our people were."<sup>17</sup> But, though meek as a dove, Leighton did not lack the wisdom of the serpent. "He thought it would be easy afterwards to recover what seemed necessary to be yielded at present." The fanatics, of course, easily saw through Leighton's policy. "They said this was visibly an artifice to lay things asleep with the present generation; and was one of the depths of Satan to give a present quiet, in order to the certain destruction of Presbytery," an institution odious to the fallen Archangel.<sup>18</sup> It was too obvious that the Satanic designs of Leighton would prove futile. His plan was to mix bishops and preachers in the Church judicatories, a majority deciding in each case, and the preachers being allowed their favourite enjoyment of a protestation, to the effect that they only submitted for the sake of peace. They were also to be permitted the old joys of "heckling" or censuring bishops, as in the palmy days of Andrew Melville. Bishops were to lose their negative vote, but Leighton said that "bishops generally managed matters so that they did not need it." Really, if Burnet does justice to Leighton, he was little better than a serpent in our national Eden, though the good man merely desired the blessing promised to peacemakers. Kincardine, who knew his countrymen, opposed dealing with them as if they would submit to any compromise, any "selling of Christ's kingdom and his prerogative." Already the exiles in

* See the papers between Charles, his eldest son James de la Cloche, and Oliva, in the author's 'Valet's Tragedy,' Longmans, 1903.

Holland, especially Browne and M'Ward, had sent over letters against signing a simple bond to keep the peace, "a burying of all Covenanted Reformation work," which, indeed, never was pacific.<sup>19</sup> "Touch not, taste not, handle not," was the word, says Burnet. Kincardine wished, not to treat, but to pass a law with concessions; but Lauderdale, afraid of the English cry of "the Church in danger," would not consent.

Leighton's plan of treating with the recusants was therefore adopted. Conventicles were increasing; Bruce, an outed minister, was wounded and taken—no harm befell him later. Burnet visited the Duchess of Hamilton in the west, and found frenzy prevalent. The duchess advised putting moderate "outed" preachers into vacancies, to check the power of "the furiouses." Hutchison, a renowned "outed" minister, did not much encourage the scheme of indulgence, but Tweeddale clung to it, when (July 11, 1668) one James Mitchell shot at Sharp, who was in his coach, giving alms to the poor. The scoundrel missed Sharp, and badly wounded Honeyman, Bishop of Orkney, as he was entering the vehicle. "Mr Mitchell was a preacher of the Gospel, and a youth of much zeal and piety," says Wodrow.<sup>20</sup> Hickeys says that he had been a familiar of the loathsome Major Weir, of whose sins witchcraft was the most venial. Turner met Mitchell in the Pentland Rising, and his zeal is at least as certain as his piety. Kirkton calls him "a weak scholar"; he was a cool hand at murder. He fired his pistol, walked away (or ran, according to Ramsay, writing on the day of the event), went into a house, changed his dress, and appeared in the street. "The cry arose, a man was killed. The people's answer was, it was but a bishop, and so there was no more noise." Thus Kirkton, a man of the day, whose manuscript Wodrow used as he chose, writing "some rogues answered it was but a bishop, and all was calmed very soon." We observe that Wodrow, in the next generation, is rather less truculent than Kirkton.<sup>21</sup>

The natural result of this assault was that Tweeddale told Lauderdale that the "planting of churches" must be deferred. Witnesses were vainly sought for, and Rothes saved a woman, Mrs Duncan, from the torture, saying "it was not proper for gentlewomen to wear boots."<sup>22</sup> By July 1668 Tweeddale had to tell Lauderdale that order could with difficulty be preserved. The fanatics were irreconcilable; a committee of them, it seemed, had planned the attack on Sharp.<sup>23</sup> But one set of Presbyterian rumours averred that the deed came from the Cavalier party!<sup>24</sup> The Government, however, found out that Mitchell was the guilty man: for the present he skulked. Meanwhile the policy of "indulgence" was not laid aside. The "outing" of the ministers had been easy; now every effort was made to restore them to pulpits. "The indulgences must not be reckoned part of our sufferings in this Church," writes Wodrow, to the grief of his editor, the Rev. Robert Burns (1836). But the indulgences did more to split the Kirk into hostile parties than the sword of Claverhouse did to break the spirit of Presbyterianism. Tweeddale worked on Robert Douglas and other outed preachers, went to London, and (June 7, 1669) obtained a letter from the king, which he presented to the Council on July 15. Peaceable outed ministers were to be restored, or appointed to vacancies, receiving stipends, if collated by bishops; if not, having manse and glebe. If they will not "keep presbyteries" (which were now under Episcopal sway), they must be confined to their own parishes. To their parishioners only may they preach, and only among them baptize or marry, except with licence of the ministers to whose parishes the incoming aliens belong.<sup>25</sup> * Ministers not replaced were to receive a dole. Conventicles were to be dealt with severely.<sup>26</sup>

In Scotland, a committee of the Council took the royal letter into consideration. Sharp made certain natural criticisms as to the precise meaning of "peaceable and orderly," and as to the kind of Presbyteries that were to be attended, urging that "as between 1592 and 1638" should be added. He was accused by Tweeddale of "debating the king's pleasure and frustrating the king's design"; the Archbishop of Glasgow, too, was bullied. The warrants for replacing outed but peaceable preachers were then signed (July 29).<sup>27</sup> Eighteen ministers "made their leg" before the Council, and Mr. Hutchison's speech seemed "discreet and pertinent" to Kincardine.<sup>28</sup> All did not like it so well; and the high-flying Presbyterians deemed it "not a sufficient testimony against the plain Erastianism" of the procedure. Reinstated preachers were in future allowed no opportunities to deliver sufficient testimonies. Two and forty preachers are reckoned to have been indulged at this time, including Robert Douglas. A considerable proportion served parishes named "kil"

* A preacher had doubted the validity of baptism if administered by conformist ministers. "I fear all the bairns that are baptized by curates, God reckons them as children of whoredom."

—this or that,—and more or less Celtic. Wodrow and Burnet agree in saying that the compromise was, at first, accepted joyfully by Presbyterians.<sup>29</sup>

But peace was not desired by the truly godly, and the exiles in Holland. The reinstated men “preached only the doctrines of Christianity,” they did not “preach to the times.” Their sermons were not topical leading articles, or personal attacks on local gentlemen. There was nothing in them of this kind of eloquence, drawn by C. K. Sharpe from a sermon by (or attributed to) the Rev. Michael Bruce. “The devil has the ministers and professors of Scotland now in a sieve, and O as he riddles, and O as he rattles, and O the chaff he gets!”<sup>30</sup> The churchgoing of our ancestors was enthusiastic, because the prayers and sermons, “to the times,” were often lively examples of party journalism. The reinstated preachers, at first, did not supply the article on demand; their flocks followed other orators to conventicles, and so the indulged reverted, says Burnet, to “servile popularity.” The people would not receive angels if they kept presbyteries, a horrid crime, Leighton wrote later. Wodrow takes a more favourable view of the successes of the reinstated evangelists, whose consciences probably pricked them, for they had dallied with Erastianism—not a doubt of it. Burnet, in a letter based on Leighton’s papers, says that “there are a store of people in the churches of those whom the Council indulged, but it is too notorious that most run thither either out of custom or vanity.” The people objected to a bishop as a distinct and unscriptural officer, without whose sanction ex-communications could not pass. The Kirk was thus deprived of her terrible old weapon, still hankered after. Moreover, to endure a bishop was to break the Covenant. Leighton vainly replied that the new kind of bishops was not the kind barred by the Covenant, and that the English Presbyterians approved of his arrangement, as in Bishop Usher’s ‘Reduction’ (1656).<sup>31</sup>

Whatever else the Indulgence might be, it was obviously illegal, in a sense odious to prelates,—admitting preachers who would not accept Episcopal collation. The conformist Synod of Glasgow, therefore, in September, made “a sputter,” says Wodrow,—that is, drew up, but did not present, what the king called “a new Western Remonstrance” against the Indulgence. A copy came into Lauderdale’s hands, and Archbishop Burnet was in danger, like Balmerino at the beginning of the troubles, from the elastic law against leasing making.<sup>32</sup> The Glasgow Synod, in case "no further use" was made of the papers in which they expressed "their humble resentments," recorded it in their Register, leaving Archbishop Burnet to lay their grievances before Parliament, or the Council.* The Council found the document "most illegal and unwarrantable," and the archbishop was forbidden to come to Parliament, at which Lauderdale was Commissioner. He had bided his time, hitherto, in London; as a quondam Presbyterian of the most zealous, he could not easily take part in the early repressive measures; he allowed Sharp and Rothes time to run their course, undermining them at Court. A man of violent temper, and of the loosest life, he was perverted, it was said, by his mistress whom he presently married, Lady Dysart, the daughter of the inscrutable Will Murray, who had been regarded as a traitor by all parties. She was a woman of strong intellect, and of many accomplishments, a famous beauty, who was even said to have beguiled the virtue of Cromwell. But she was jealous of Lauderdale's moderate allies, such as Murray; and is accused of avarice as insatiable as that of Arran's Countess in the youth of James VI. The temper of Lauderdale, who was pining for the pleasures of Whitehall, could not resist the provocations of the Covenanters, and he soon passed from indulgence to fury. He was, or may be guessed to have been, in the secret of the king's and the Duke of York's religion, and of their plans for tolerating Catholics. To this result tended a scheme for the union of the two countries, which we need not dwell on, as it was to the taste of neither nation. The new scheme for the Militia gave Charles 22,000 men, ready to march wherever they were ordered, as Lauderdale wrote to Charles; and a new and stringent Act of Supremacy not only enabled the king to deal with religious recalcitrants of either party, but was reckoned favourable to any royal design for introducing Catholicism.† "His Majesty hath the supreme authority and supremacy over all persons, and in all causes ecclesiastical within this his kingdom." This struck both the prelates and the "low and mean persons of the clergy, which consisted now of the sons of servants or farmers," says Mackenzie.<sup>33</sup>

On November 2, 1669, Lauderdale wrote to Murray from

* The paper, undated, is in Lauderdale Papers, ii. Appendix, lxiv.-lxvii.

† Lauderdale Papers, ii. pp. 140, 141, 164. Hamilton got possession of these letters on the death of Murray, and Lauderdale was in danger of impeachment.

Holyrood, on the matter of the supremacy in Parliament. Sharp, when he saw the Bill, "said wild things" to Tweeddale. "All king Harry VIII.'s ten years' work was now to be done in three days." Later he submitted, but tried to introduce a salvo which would have ruined the Act. Next day he repented and "snapped up" the Bishop of Ross for making the same proposal. The Bill was passed by the Lords of the Articles, unanimously, Burnet of Glasgow being absent perforce.<sup>34</sup> The idea of union, however, was universally detested, owing to the cruel restrictions already placed by England on Scottish trade.<sup>35</sup>

On December 2 Charles wrote to Lauderdale, demanding Archbishop Burnet's resignation, as he was mainly responsible for the western disorders and for the Synod's remonstrance. He might be an archbishop in the Universal Church, Lauderdale declared, but in Glasgow, not!<sup>36</sup> Leighton was chosen to supply Burnet's place. He was anxious to decline, but was recommended by personal virtues which Presbyterians could not deny, except by citing the text about Satan's powers of appearing as an angel of light. But Leighton knew that an actual angel, if guilty of "keeping presbyteries," would be rejected by the westland Whigs, at a time when "ministers had their houses robbed, and were nightly pursued for their lives in all the western shires."<sup>37</sup> The Presbyterians asserted that the criminals were vulgar robbers merely, but this view did not prevail among the clergy. Thus Leighton was aware that he was being put on a task for which old Tom Dalziel was better fitted; however, on his visit to London, his resistance was overcome.<sup>38</sup> He would take his part in what he later called "a drunken scuffle, in the dark" (1674).<sup>39</sup> By way, probably, of conciliating, the Kirk, Catholics, and Quakers (including Sir Walter Scott's ancestors, Swintoun and Scott of Raeburn), were persecuted (March 1670) and imprisoned. Wodrow often complains of leniency towards these offenders, but does not record this example of severity, one good deed in a naughty world of Prelacy.<sup>40</sup>

In London, Leighton had placed on paper his ideas of a scheme of "accommodation," and the king, to whom the pacification of Scotland was important, at this juncture of his secret alliance with Louis XIV., ordered Lauderdale to make an experiment in toleration. The offer of the declaration against the Covenant was to be restricted. Sharp was to be made to "allow and authorise the transportation" to vacant pulpits, "of such ministers as shall be lawfully presented to any of the churches within the diocese of Glasgow, and approved by the Bishop of Dunblane" (Leighton). Bishops must understand that no minister was to be "molested for his private opinions," as long as he behaved peaceably and orderly, (July 7, 1670).<sup>41</sup> At the same time conventiclers were to be punished by banishment, or imprisoned till they gave security, and the necessary militia were to be supported by the shires in which unlawful assemblies were held.

These conventicles were now used not merely in houses and barns, but in the open moors, and were attended by armed men. There was an important assembly of this kind at Beath Hill above Dunfermline, under the Rev. Mr Blackader (June 18, 1670). Barscobe, of the Pentland Rising, with wild Whigs from Galloway, was present, and many of the multitude slept on the hill the night before the preaching. Whether morality profited as much as pure religion may be doubted. A tent was set up, and the Rev. Mr Dickson preached and prayed: "Mr Blackader lay at the outside . . . to see how watch was kept." After three hours of devout exercise, the appearance of the lieutenant of militia was the signal for a brawl; Barscobe and another devotee rushed at the gentleman with pistols cocked. Mr Blackader interfered, and bade the people restore the lieutenant's horse, which they had taken. Blackader preached, and by his own account, which is followed here, the assemblage was quite orderly. "Public thanks were given in the Scots congregation at Rotterdam for this victory over usurped supremacy," and thus the affair might and did seem serious to the persons charged with the government of the country.<sup>42</sup> Meetings of this kind went on, and culminated at Drumclog, and in the rising which followed, nine years later. Welsh, Cargill, Blackader, and others passed through the country, rousing the passions which Leighton was trying to allay. Men detected as having attended their meetings were fined and imprisoned, or banished.

Parliament sat in July-August 1670, and passed "a clanking act," by which holders of field conventicles were to be punished by death.<sup>43</sup> Another Act ordered "subjects of the reformed religion" to attend the regular clergy's ministrations, and this, as Wodrow remarks with horror, amounted to "a real toleration of Papists." Burnet says that Lauderdale himself inserted this obnoxious clause, probably to please the Duke of York, and Murray told Burnet that the king "was not well pleased" by the death penalty on preachers who held conventicles. But the words of Morton's prophecy, made a century earlier, were to be fulfilled, namely, that there would never be peace in Scotland till some ministers were hanged. The king, however, "said that bloody laws did no good, and that he would never have passed it, if he had known it beforehand." Only Cassilis voted against the bloody law; but Leighton, who was not present, expressed his shame and abhorrence to Tweeddale, who assured him that there was no idea of putting the Act into force.<sup>44</sup> In Leighton "the cunning of the fox," says Wodrow, "went before the paw of the lion." Leighton was so singular as to think that a life of goodness and devotion, not a perpetual battle about unessentials, was the essence of Christianity.

As a matter of fact, religious persons too frequently rejoice in "hating each other for the love of God," and the westland Whigs were quite unmoved by the preachers of peace and goodwill, such as Gilbert Burnet, Charteris, Nairne, and Aird, whom Leighton sent about among the Whiggish congregations. Burnet was then for a short while Professor of Divinity at Glasgow. He tried to be all things to all men, but the Whigs loved the preacher no more than Dean Swift esteemed the historian. The "bishops' evangelists" found the peasantry learned in texts which prove Presbyterianism to exist by right divine, and "full of a most entangled scrupulosity." The itinerant missionaries were followed, as we saw, by men of the stamp of Welsh and Blackader, who confirmed the faithful in their opposition to compromise. It is not worth while to describe long negotiations with irreconcilables. "We were willing to make even unreasonable steps towards them on our side, and would they abate nothing on theirs?" No, they would not; it must be "parity of ministers" or nothing, except among the indulged.<sup>45</sup> The attempt at a treaty ended in disaster "to the great joy of Sharp and the rest of the bishops," says Burnet. Who can blame the precisians for declining to be under the rule of such bishops? The real question was not whether Scotland should be Presbyterian or Episcopalian, but whether Presbyterianism was to maintain such of her pretensions as are inconsistent with the freedom of the individual and of the State. After some twenty more years of the "drunken scuffle in the dark," Presbyterianism was established, but her fangs were drawn.

Presently the second Indulgence was driven like a wedge into the Presbyterian body. In 1671 Burnet was in London, and suggested a scheme to Lauderdale for putting two outed ministers, coupled, into vacancies, and adding a colleague to each minister already indulged. They were to divide the stipends; on this parishioners would voluntarily make up the full support of both preachers—and would soon weary of well doing. The preachers were to be tethered to their parishes, and the natural result would be “to create quarrels” among precisians.<sup>46</sup> Leighton approved of these worthy proposals, which took shape after Lauderdale’s Parliament of June 1672; the last Parliament, except “a short maimed meeting,” for nine years. As to religion, Acts were passed against “pretended ordinations,” without Episcopal sanction, and against “disorderly baptisms.” A renewal of the Act for keeping May 29 as a holiday was bitterly resented. “Presbyterians continued in their opinion that no human authority hath power to appoint constant returning anniversary holidays,”—accompanied, that is, by religious services enforced under fines. The renewed anti-conventicle Act forbade outed ministers to conduct family worship except in their own families. The “prayers” thus forbidden were obviously expected to be political harangues.<sup>47</sup> Before this Parliament in May 1672, Lauderdale had expected petitions for such toleration as at this time was extended in England to dissenters. But the Presbyterians suspected that the thin edge of toleration for them was only meant to introduce toleration for Catholics, of which they stood in deadly terror.<sup>48</sup>

Meanwhile the houses of conformist ministers were broken into, they were wounded, and forced to swear that they would cease to officiate. Some of the bullies were hanged. Burnet visited them in prison, and saw in them “the blind madness of ill-grounded zeal.” One fanatic justified all they had done, “from the Israelites robbing the Egyptians and destroying the Canaanites.”<sup>49</sup>

This intolerable state of things, commonly overlooked by Covenanting historians, is emphasised in a draft made by Gilbert Burnet “for Leighton’s use.” “The incumbents whom he sends” to vacant parishes “are beaten and stoned away, which cannot be got punished.” Leighton therefore suggests two alternatives, that Episcopacy “should be given up,” or that “offences against churchmen should be punished,” and that the existing laws, as “too severe,” “should be revised and made practicable.” It is added that the fatal first expulsion (in which the Restoration copied the bad example set by the Kirk in 1638, and at the time of the Engagement) was followed by "stocking again that desert we had made with a great many howles and satyres," the curates. But there had been "extreme neglect of exercising due authoritie, and so exposing it to be despised and trampled on."<sup>50</sup> Leighton had begun by enjoining on his robbed and insulted clergy the spiritual weapons of fasting, prayer, and joy in "crosses."<sup>51</sup> Leighton had never been rabbled himself; he might have hugged the "cross"—his clergy did not. It is plain that the "severities" of Government had been to a great extent merely verbal; so outrages continued and increased. It was a choice between executing the despised laws, or laws more "practicable" because less ferocious, or yielding Episcopacy in face of mob violence. That violence, we repeat, at this stage, is usually overlooked by historians. It does not appear in Wodrow and Kirkton, yet Burnet's report, and the draft cited, let in light upon the temper of the extremists, and partly account for the severities of Government.

The capture of the papers of the celebrated William Carstares, or Carstairs, who came over from Amsterdam, showed that the Dutch were intriguing for a Covenanting rising.<sup>52</sup> Many fines were exacted, and Lauderdale told Burnet that he wished the discontents to come to a head in a revolt, to be crushed by an army from Ireland. This was the natural impatience of a violent man, irritated by the pin-pricks of conventiclers and curate-rabblers. He now thought of Burnet's plan for coupling outed ministers and confining them to parishes—a cynical scheme of which Leighton approved. But the coupling part of the plan, to Burnet's grief, was neglected; the new Indulgence for single preachers was negotiated in August and September 1672, and, after many searchings of hearts, doubts, disputations, and disagreements, a number of preachers did come in.<sup>53</sup> The details may be read by the curious in 'The History of the Indulgence' on one side, and the 'Review' of it, and 'Balm from Gilead,' on the other. The Presbyterians "did now divide, and the sear of this wound is yet continuing among us," writes Wodrow as late as 1719.

At first the non-Indulged did not sunder themselves from the weaker brethren as from unholy men, though the exiles in Holland excited discord. "They were persuaded every point of truth ought not to be brought to the pulpit at all times," says Wodrow; his editor, the Rev. Mr Burns (1836), remarks that this view is "agreeable to corrupt nature." Later, the precisians in congregations arrived at the pitch of prescribing to ministers "the matter, subjects, and the very text they would have preached upon."<sup>54</sup> Gentle King Jamie hardly went to this length, even when a preacher refused either "to speak sense or come down." In short, a kind of mob Erastianism arose, if we believe Wodrow, the wildest saints dictating to preachers; "and then the flame broke out terribly."<sup>55</sup> The Indulged, in brief, fared ill. "Some had no peace, some scattered the flock, and in some places none at all came." Wodrow, in his jottings called 'Analecta,' tends to believe that there was a pious plot for a Bartholomew massacre of the Indulged.

The Kirk was now a house divided against itself, a fact which weakened attachment to the Covenant and the old Presbyterian pretension. But Lauderdale's marriage to Lady Dysart (1672), and the increasing violence of his temper, alienated from him Tweeddale. Murray died in this year, and opposition to Lauderdale arose under Hamilton, who had always been discontented, and Tweeddale himself, with many other nobles and gentlemen, among whom Sir George Hume of Polwarth was conspicuous. In the brief Parliamentary meeting of November 1673 Hamilton proposed that grievances should be expressed before money was voted; Polwarth spoke boldly; "I met with such a spirit as I never thought to see here," Lauderdale wrote to the king.<sup>56</sup> Charles agreed to alter the system of monopolies on salt, tobacco, and brandy, but Polwarth's demands of constitutional reforms, a Committee of Grievances (Domini ad Querelas), and the practical abolition of the Lords of the Articles, by the admission of all members of the Estates, were refused.<sup>57</sup> (This Laird of Polwarth is the Sir George Hume whom Macaulay so bitterly censured at a later part of his Whiggish career.)

Hamilton had a private interest to serve: the king was childless; his brother, the Duke of York, was a Catholic; setting him aside, the Hamilton claim to the Scottish crown would revive. Lauderdale, himself a duke, thought that Gilbert Burnet had worked mutiny in Hamilton's heart at London; and that Shaftesbury, whom Charles, in England, had deprived of the Seals, was intriguing with the Scottish opposition, "The Party." Lauderdale therefore adjourned the Parliament, and ruled henceforth as he chose, with a new Privy Council. His opponents, however, were many, and numbered the noblest names in Scotland—Morton (Douglas), Roxburgh (Ker), Queensberry, Drummond, and Dumfries. They raised a storm against Lauderdale in the English Parliament; he was to be forbidden the king's presence for ever. Kincardine represented Lauderdale at Court, the king and the Duke of York took his part, the English Commons "could pretend no jurisdiction over Scotland," as Kincardine plainly told them, and Lauderdale returned to London undefeated in April 1674.<sup>58</sup> His brother, Haltoun, Master of the Scottish Mint, was accused of debasing the coinage, in collusion with Lauderdale himself. The accumulation of several offices in one man's hands—Lauderdale holding seven, Haltoun three, Atholl four, and Kincardine being, like the rest, an extraordinary Lord of Session, as well as Vice-Admiral of Scotland—was another cause of complaint. A small family party dominated the administration. Once more, Lauderdale was accused of profanely saying to Sharp, "My Lord, sit down at my right hand till I make all your enemies your footstool," and of mimicking the sermons of Covenanting preachers. Again, his Indulgence confined ministers to their parishes, and put three or four of the outed into one parish, an exaggeration of Burnet's scheme of coupling, which was not thoroughly put into practice.

These and others were the humble resentments set forth in a wonderfully ill-printed pamphlet by Stewart of Goodtrees.* Hamilton's next plan (May 1674) was to capture a majority in the Council, and vote that the suggestions of various synods for a national synod on Church questions should be laid before the king.<sup>59</sup> Leighton seems to have backed this proposal, but Lauderdale (June 18, 1674) replied in a letter moderate in tone, and sensible in its arguments. The dissenters would not respect such a national synod as the existing laws permitted, for bishops would sit in it. Conformists, obedient to bishops, needed no synod. The motion was only meant to play into the hands of Hamilton's party in London. Lauderdale remembered the results of the Assembly of 1638; then, as now in 1674, women were the most turbulent agitators. Lauderdale here refers to a petition by women, who mobbed Sharp, threatened him with death, and probably frightened him. "The late mad pranks" (the stoning and rabbling of conformist ministers already noted) prevented Lauderdale from yielding to his inclination to mildness, as they "evidently threatened a rebellion." On June 20 Leighton expressed his dislike of the petty janglings of all

* 'An Account of Scotland's Grievances by reason of the D. of Lauderdale's Ministrie.' (s. l., et a.)

Assemblies, but, on June 25, represented that the dissenters might be offered another chance of "a free and full hearing." The proposed Assembly, however, might tend "rather to disparage the Government."<sup>60</sup>

On December 17, 1674, Leighton resigned, "from a great contempt of our unworthy and trifling contentions," little better than "a drunken scuffle in the dark." The Kirk is doing its best to destroy itself and religion "in furious zeal, and endless debates about the empty name and shadow of a difference in government, and in the meanwhile not having of solemn and orderly public worship as much as a shadow." Leighton was ill, weak, and desired a retirement in England, and the consolations of the Anglican religion. He had the soul of a devout Neoplatonist, he lived for charity, contemplation, and devotion, for peace and communion with his God. Christianity sufficed for him; the differences of the Churches, from that of Rome to that of Knox, were to him trifling. He could not see that the tumults arose about all that to a Welsh or a Cargill made religion valuable. "Christ's Crown honours" were at stake, these men thought. The rights of equal ministers to excommunicate, to browbeat the civil magistrate, to set up an imperium in imperio, to pry into and censure private life, to persecute all who did not hold their beliefs, to conduct bald services of which, whether in lecture, sermon, or prayer, the voice of the preacher was everything, and common worship was next to nothing: these things were "the Crown honours of Christ." For this great cause brave men would fight and die.

To the representatives of the State it was equally momentous that such desires should not be granted to the Welshes and Cargills: the State saw no means of preventing a recurrence of the old seditions, except by the imposition of a bastard and odious Prelacy. Leighton, much as he contemned this earthly life, had none of the spirit of the martyr. He might have lost his life, but he would have won an immortal crown, if, when a Commissioner of the General Assembly (1646), he had stood up and denounced the cries for blood. Again, he might have publicly denounced, as archbishop, the Act making conventicling a capital crime. He took neither opportunity, and acquiesced in the violences of the Covenant; and then, renouncing his covenanted oath, acquiesced in the violences of the Government. He was a saint, but neither martyr nor hero. When his adversary, Row, calls him "a pawky bishop," we can scarcely deny, remembering the revelations of Gilbert Burnet, that the epithet has its appropriateness. There was, in that fierce age, no help in Leighton, and he fled, physically broken and sick at heart, from the evils that were to come.

Both Wodrow and Burnet independently assure us that Lauderdale about this time connived "at the insolence of the Presbyterians," in Burnet's phrase.<sup>61</sup> There was ever a vacillation between connivance and severity, which encouraged disorder, and probably induced hot-headed young preachers, unepiscopally licensed by outed ministers, to think that audacity was the winning game. The presbyteries of the diocese of Glasgow drew up a set of charges against the extremists. Unlicensed men hold and preach at their assemblies. The Indulged ignore the rules under which they are permitted to hold benefices: they preach sedition, and introduce it into their prayers. Sheriffs and magistrates of burghs do not enforce the laws. Horrid crimes, of which adultery is the most venial, are committed at conventicles, "as our Registers more at length bear." Where are these Registers? In brief, the west was a land of anarchy, armed men acting as bodyguard to the preacher Welsh, a firebrand. It is not beyond belief that the promiscuous excitement of great "Holy Fairs" in desolate places tended to the reverse of strict morality.<sup>62</sup> Wodrow is reminded of the scandals brought against primitive Christians.

Scuffles occurred between soldiers and "slashing communicants," "so that the country resembled war as much as peace."<sup>63</sup> So Wodrow avers, yet censures the raising of forces by the Government as both needless and illegal. Garrisons were placed in and about the country houses of the dubious gentry in disturbed districts, and the expense of supporting men insolent and unruly as Frank Bothwell in 'Old Mortality' added to the miseries of the time.<sup>64</sup> The Bass Rock was crowded with captive ministers: gentlemen like Lord Cardross, Hume of Polwarth, Baillie of Jerviswoode, and Mr Kirkton the historian were involved in technical guilt by the perjuries and violences of a Captain Carstairs, said to have been a creature of Sharp's. The wives and sisters of gentlemen attended conventicles, which their husbands and fathers were charged to suppress. The Council made it penal to "intercommune" with or harbour a long list of suspected preachers and their attendants; but the lairds resisted a proclamation making them liable for illegal acts committed in their districts. Any three men of a commission on which Sharp and Alexander Burnet, restored to Glasgow, sat, could deal summarily with persons charged with offences.

In 1677 we find Richard Cameron and Robert Hamilton of Kinkel insisting on separation from the Indulged; another ill-omened name of "a Saint to prelates surly," John Balfour of Burley, now begins to appear.<sup>65</sup> Meanwhile Gilbert Burnet, in London, revealed Lauderdale's friendly confidences to himself, for which Swift calls Burnet "Dog," "Scotch Dog," and "treacherous villain." But Lauderdale overcame opposition, and Burnet was glad enough to retire from Court, and the scenes in which he was a busy and blabbing dealer. "The best of his friends acknowledged him to have betrayed friendship."<sup>66</sup> More and more affairs were left to Lauderdale and his brother, Haltoun, and to Sharp: Kincardine even was out of favour. Sir George Mackenzie, known to tradition as "Bluidy Mackenzie," became Lord Advocate (August 1677); he had pleaded for Argyll, he had been no courtier, and he usually writes in a calm and judicial style about the events of the time. To strengthen himself, Lauderdale procured that officers of State should not hold their offices for life, but during the royal pleasure—that is, his own.<sup>67</sup> In short, this violent and corrupt but intelligent minister held despotic power, which his cunning and ill temper prevented him from using in any consistent policy of "Thorough." He might persecute, he might connive at Presbyterian breaches of the law; one thing he could not be—just.

An extraordinary and hardly credible, indeed scarcely intelligible example of misrule, was given in the case of James Mitchell, who shot at Sharp and hit Honeyman. In the beginning of February 1674 Mitchell was caught. Burnet avers that Sharp observed a man eyeing him very closely, thought he recognised his would-be assassin, and had him arrested. Two long pistols of Scottish make, carrying a bullet almost of musket calibre (as we learn from Mitchell's indictment), were found on him. Sharp is said to have induced a friend of Mitchell's, by adjuring God that he would secure his pardon, to persuade the assassin to confess—"no hurt should come to him." Here Burnet's evidence must be hearsay; he personally hated Sharp, and cites no authority for his tale. Mitchell's friend saw him, and said that Mitchell would confess "if a promise were made under the king's name."<sup>68</sup>

Here we leave Burnet's story for the moment. Haltoun's account, in a letter of February 10, 1674, is that Sharp's brother, Sir William, and two of the archbishop's servants arrested Mitchell; that on February 10, before the Lord Advocate (Nisbet), the Chancellor, the Lord Register, and himself, Mitchell "stoutly denied the accusation"; that the Chancellor then took him aside, and gave assurance of his life, and that he then confessed, all present signing the confession.<sup>69</sup> Mackenzie denies that Mitchell asked or was promised his life. Haltoun's letter of February 10 proves, however, that life was promised to Mitchell, in Haltoun's presence. Burnet, to return to his version, says that the Council ordered Rothes, the Chancellor, Haltoun, and Primrose (Register), to examine Mitchell, and that Lauderdale allowed them to promise him his life. He confessed. Some were for cutting off his right hand; others said that he might learn to shoot with his left, and voted for cutting off both hands. Rothes, who was not always cruel, prevented this, by a jest which was Rabelaisian but to the point, and the jape was later called to mind, "and made the whole matter to be remembered." Primrose moved for Mitchell's life-long imprisonment in the Bass. It is evident that Primrose was Burnet's source, and we may remember that Burnet has described Primrose's word as worthless. At all events, Haltoun wrote, on February 12, that Mitchell was to be remitted to the Justice Court for sentence, . . . loss of his right hand and forfeiture, not perpetual imprisonment.<sup>70</sup>

On March 2 Mitchell's indictment was drawn up. His movements during the Pentland Rising were traced. He was accused of saying to Barscobe and others, after his attempt on Sharp, that he would "make the fire hotter." He then wandered in England, Holland, and Ireland, returned, and was married to his wife by the famous preacher Mr John Welsh. He next took a shop close to the archbishop's house in Edinburgh, and carried pistols; these he wore when arrested.<sup>71</sup> Sharp thus really went in danger. Brought on his signed confession before the Lords of the Justiciary, Mitchell disowned his confession, moved thereto, says Burnet, "by the judge, who hated Sharp"—"a rare judge," writes Dean Swift. Lauderdale and the Council then protested that "they were free," and that their promise of life was annulled. But Mitchell was resolute on his denial of his signed confession (March 25), and was sent to the Bass. On February 16, 1674, he had written a long letter "vindicating his practice"—his pistol practice?—but Wodrow does not print it. In January 1676 he was tortured—why was this not done at first? James VI. was not so dilatory! Tortured he was, and he denied any share in the Pentland Rising. On January 1678 he was tried; Primrose had by this time lost his place as Lord Register, and now hated Lauderdale, says Wodrow.<sup>72</sup> It was decided that Mitchell's signed confession could not be retracted, but that the promise of safety, if really given, "secured him of life and limb."

Witnesses to whom Mitchell had, later than February 10, 1674, repeated his confession, were brought in; one of these was the Bishop of Galloway. Rothes gave evidence to the confession, but denied remembering the promise of safety. Haltoun also, despite his letter already cited, remembered nothing of it, nor did Lauderdale, nor did Sharp, who, however, on Mitchell's arrest, promised, he swore, that he would do his best for him, "or else leave him to justice." The accused then asked for the production of the books of Council, which contained the revocation of the promise of life, thus proving that the promise had been made. The Lords of the Justiciary said that the demand came too late, and would not allow the books to be produced.<sup>73</sup> Primrose, says Burnet, had previously examined the books, knew the facts, told Lauderdale that "many thought there had been a promise," but had the inconceivable wickedness not to let his enemy know that the fact was certain. "He said within himself, 'I have you now.'" <sup>74</sup> "Primrose did most inhumanly triumph in this matter, and said it was the greatest glory of his life, that the four greatest enemies he had should come and consign their damnation in his hands." It is a most extraordinary fact that the four witnesses, or at least Lauderdale and Rothes, had really forgotten their assurance to Mitchell. Kincardine could not find Haltoun's letters, already cited as positive proof of the promise; and, though he warned Lauderdale that the assurance had been given, as he had not Haltoun's letters, Lauderdale despised his warning. "Poor Mitchell," as Wodrow's editor calls him, was hanged on January 18, 1678.*

* On this affair see Fountainhall, in Kirkton, p. 384, note. Fountainhall says that Mitchell left a paper justifying himself by the example of Phineas, to which Knox also appealed, though, says Fountainhall, the doctrine of murder is asserted by no sober Presbyterian.

"Of all the hellish crew let Mitchell rest,
Of all the pack (bad as he was), the best,"

says a contemporary ballad. The account of Mitchell's business in letters from Conventicles, during 1678, had increased, and, at the end of 1677, the bishops had drawn up a paper of advice as to their suppression. A Committee of the Council, with an armed force, should patrol and disarm the west, the soldiers being quartered on the guilty. Meeting-houses of Presbyterians should be pulled down, and landlords obliged to take a bond that their tenants would live orderly. Garrisons should be established.<sup>75</sup> The action of Lauderdale went beyond these suggestions of "bad men"; he arranged for a force to come over from Ireland, "if the phanatticks in the west should rise in arms" (Nov. 8, 1677).<sup>76</sup> He also warned the Highland lords and lairds to have their clans in readiness, Atholl and Perth were chiefly employed, Linlithgow was to command in chief. The Commission for raising the Highlanders was dated Dec. 26, 1677, and contained powers so ample that no spoilers were likely to be brought to justice for their excesses.<sup>77</sup> Glenorchy, then Earl of Caithness (now represented by the House of Breadalbane), with Mar, Murray, and Airlie, mustered his claymores. Nobles were forbidden to leave Scotland without licence—an order disregarded by Hamilton and several others of "The Party" opposed to the administration.<sup>78</sup>

By the end of January the plaids had occupied Glasgow, nearly 8000 in all, and "the bond" by which landlords were to bring to justice or evict conventicling tenants was offered. Cassilis refused it as illegal and impossible, but the arrangement was so far legal that it was of a kind frequently enforced in the Highlands. It was, however, averred that tenants at a rack rent, in the Lowlands, were not analogous to clansmen bound to services, and that lairds would not be responsible for farmers, as chiefs were for clansmen. The refusal of the bond by the nobles and gentry, beginning with Lord Cassilis, was almost universal. An attempt was then made to constrain them by "law burrows," the Scots equivalent for binding one man or family to keep the peace with another. The king was now to be placed under this form of protection, those who refused being put to the horn, or outlawed.<sup>79</sup> But the age for such antiquated engines of the law was over, and western Scotland, gentle or simple, was in a state of "passive resistance." Doubtless

Dr Hickey, who was with Lauderdale, is contemporary, but untrustworthy: he says nothing of the promise of life. See Ellis, 'Original Letters,' series ii. vol. iv. pp. 48-56. Hill Burton argues that Mitchell was mad—an impossible theory. (Hill Burton, vii. p. 206.)

Lauderdale hoped for a rising in arms, and was anxious to bring the discontents to a head; but the west, suffering intolerable things from Highland marauders, would neither sign the bond nor rise in arms.<sup>80</sup>

By the end of February the "Highland Host" was ordered home, laden with the loot of a thousand cottages, seizing horses, plate, wool, linen, and whatever was not too heavy to carry. Conventicles broke out again immediately.<sup>81</sup> The hot-headed young men, encouraged by the exiles in Holland, separated from, and, at least in one case, misused Indulged ministers. Meanwhile not only were Hamilton and his party in London, intriguing with members of the English House of Commons, but Atholl and Perth had joined them, and conventicles were frequent in Perthshire. Charles, however, who knew Scotland, averred that the gentry there could guide the peasantry as they pleased. If they raised a rebellion, it would spread to England, a Commonwealth might follow, and Scotland would be a conquered province within the year. "He thought they would not like that well."<sup>82</sup> The party feud of Hamilton and Lauderdale raged in London, but Lauderdale cleverly called a financial convention in Edinburgh while his enemies were in town, and £1,800,000 (Scots) was voted to the king.<sup>83</sup> The money was raised by tax, or "cess," and the Presbyterians were once more rent in twain by a feud, fomented from Holland, as to the lawfulness of paying cess for an end which their consciences did not approve of—a newly modelled militia. However, by dint of quartering soldiers on passive resisters, cess came to be paid, and here Wodrow first mentions the exertions, in Galloway, of John Graham of Claverhouse.<sup>84</sup>

He calls the Cavalier by the name of James in place of John, a singular slip in an historian so minute. John Graham of Claverhouse came of the same blood as the great Montrose, and, on the spindle side, had an ancestor in Robert III. of Scotland. His paternal property, Claverhouse, is now in the spreading suburbs of Dundee. The year of his birth is uncertain, but, as he entered the University of St Andrews in 1665, he was probably rather under than over seventeen at that date, and was a man of about thirty when he first appears in Scottish history (1678). He apparently did not complete his academical course, but, despite his bad spelling, very common among the nobles and gentry of his time, he is credited with proficiency in mathematics and languages. He went young to France, where he studied the art of war; and in 1674 entered the Horse Guards of William, Prince of Orange. At the battle of St Neff (August 11, 1674), when William was defeated by Condé, Claverhouse distinguished himself. It may be mere tradition which avers that he dismounted, in the retreat, and gave William his horse, but a rhymer of 1683 sings:

I saw the man who at St Neff did see
His conduct, prowess, martial gallantry.

He was the more conspicuous as the only wearer of a white plumach. In 1677 he resigned his commission, perhaps in jealousy of Mackay, over whom he was to win his fatal final victory. William probably recommended Claverhouse to his father-in-law, the king's brother, James, Duke of York; and the Marquis of Montrose, on the duke's request, offered Claverhouse a commission in the duke's regiment of horse (Feb. 19, 1678). In November, Montrose superseded Atholl as commander of the Royal Horse Guards in Scotland, and gave Claverhouse a troop.

Late in December 1678 he took his post at Dumfries, with some 300 horse. His duties were to disperse conventicles, and arrest outlawed preachers and others. His letters of December 1678, January 1679, attest his anxiety to preserve discipline (endangered by the negligence of the administration in forwarding supplies), and his respect for the law as it stood. "I am forced," he writes on February 8, 1679, "to let the dragoons quarter at large. . . . I have visited their quarters, and find it impossible they can subsist there any longer without a locality. What prejudice the king's service may receive by this I know not, but I am sure it is extremely improper to be thus quartered." Government supplied neither money nor fodder, and, despite his military instincts and sense of legal obligations, Claverhouse had to permit quarterings which he could not prevent.<sup>85</sup>

Meanwhile Wodrow avers that, though sober Presbyterians merely attended conventicles in their desire of "ordinances purely dispensed," and Gospel truth, things were running "to sad heights" in the great armed assemblages of the extremists. The Presbyterian party was rent by the separation from the Indulged, the cess controversy, and the controversy about "indefinite" or "unlawful" ordination of preachers. A kind of armed force patrolled the country, protecting huge conventicles, from December 1678 to May 1679. Welsh is said to have preached elsewhere, to smaller gatherings ; but the Government held him the chief fire-brand, and offered £500 for his apprehension. Two soldiers were brutally murdered, on April 20, while in bed, at night, and the chief ruffian was said to be one Scarlet, a polygamous tinker, who declared that he had taken service, as an armed guard, with the Rev. Mr Welsh, but had been with him for a fortnight only. He was also said to have been one of the guards of the notorious Richard Cameron ; and Robert Hamilton, a bloody fanatic, was credited with a share in the murder of the soldiers. This Hamilton tried to purge a conventicle of Cameron's by dismissing all payers of cess and hearers of the Indulged. He held poor Mitchell's principles about daring to be a Phineas, and murder idolaters. The lawless, distracted, incompetent Government had brought wild men to the front, and, of course, in the anarchy, reivers like Scarlet would find congenial occupation as "soldiers of Christ."

Meanwhile the Government was putting to the horn the flower of the Galloway gentry,—Gordons, Maxwells, and Macdougals, with a brother of the Earl of Galloway. New forces were raised, 5500 horse and foot of the militia were mobilised, and Claverhouse, Johnstoun of Westerhall, Grierson of Lag, and others, were made Sheriffs Depute extraordinary, with powers to disperse armed conventicles, to shoot if necessary, to take prisoners, and to seize the plaids of devotees, as evidence of their identity. The testimony of the miscreant Titus Oates, during the "Popish Plot," was used as a reason for disarming Catholics, and a priest was sent to the Bass. The infamous sham "Popish Plot" had been raging since October 1678, and though the king well knew the crazy absurdity of Oates's and Bedloe's tales, he probably had not the power, certainly had not the courage, to check a people demented by groundless terror. Thus Jesuits and Presbyterians, idolaters and lovers of the pure Gospel, were simultaneously persecuted. The Catholics, however, were not marching about England in armed multitudes, like the Scottish devotees.

To check these the Council, on May 1, ordered horse, foot, and dragoons to follow the parties headed by Welsh, Cameron, Kid, and others, "and, in case of resistance, to pursue them to the death." Carmichael of Thurston was also made a Sheriff Depute in Fifeshire, where he gave much offence. Thus the powder was ready, and the match was put to it in May and June 1679. Already (April 21) Claverhouse, in a letter to Lord Linlithgow, had said that Mr

Welsh was organising armed rebellion, that the peasants had taken possession of the arms of the militia, and Lord Ross added that they had provided halberts, with a sharp "cleek" for cutting the bridles of the dragoons, while Claverhouse's men had only obsolete and worthless weapons; such was the fashion of the Scottish War Office.<sup>86</sup>

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER XI.

- <sup>1</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. p. 11.
<sup>2</sup> Mr Mathieson reckons thirty-three, but others put the number above forty Mathieson, 'Politics and Religion,' ii. p. 215.
<sup>3</sup> Naphtali, p. 246.
<sup>4</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. p. 88, Dec. 10, 1667.
<sup>5</sup> Burnet, History of his Own Time, i. p. 433.
<sup>6</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. pp. xiii.-xv.
<sup>7</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. pp. 11-16.
<sup>8</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. pp. 11-16.
<sup>9</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. p. 93; also ii. pp. 17, 22, 31, 84.
<sup>10</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. pp. 52, 53.
<sup>11</sup> Wodrow, ii. pp. 88, 89.
<sup>12</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. pp. 55, 58, 63; Wodrow, ii. p. 90.
<sup>13</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. pp. 59-61.
<sup>14</sup> See Scottish Review, July 1884, pp. 20, 21; Mr Airy's article on Sharp.
<sup>15</sup> Burnet, i. p. 451. <sup>16</sup> Burnet, i. p. 452.
<sup>17</sup> Burnet, i. p. 503. <sup>18</sup> Burnet, i. pp. 517, 533.
<sup>19</sup> Wodrow, ii. p. 108.
<sup>20</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. p. 109; Wodrow, ii. p. 115.
<sup>21</sup> Wodrow, ii. pp. 115, 116; Kirkton, pp. 277-279; and C. K. Sharpe's note.
<sup>22</sup> Wodrow, ii. p. 118; Kirkton, p. 283.
<sup>23</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. pp. 113, 114.
<sup>24</sup> Wodrow, ii. p. 113, note.
<sup>25</sup> Kirkton, p. 305; note by C. K. Sharpe from 'Prelacy an Idol,' a sermon by Mr Frazer of Brae. <sup>26</sup> Wodrow, ii. p. 131.
<sup>27</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. pp. 189-191.
<sup>28</sup> See the speech. Wodrow, ii. p. 133.
<sup>29</sup> Burnet, i. p. 516; Wodrow, ii. p. 135.
<sup>30</sup> Kirkton, p. 271, note 1.
<sup>31</sup> Butler's 'Life of Leighton,' pp. 422-432 (1903).
<sup>32</sup> Burnet, i. pp. 518, 519; Wodrow, ii. p. 143.
<sup>33</sup> Wodrow, ii. p. 137, and notes; Act. Parl. Scot., vii. p. 554.
<sup>34</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. pp. 151-154.
<sup>35</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. p. 154; Mackenzie's 'History of Scotland,' p. 138.
<sup>36</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. pp. 166, 167, 172, 175.
<sup>37</sup> Mackenzie, p. 163.
<sup>38</sup> For his resistance, cf. Lauderdale Papers, ii. pp. 181, 182.

- <sup>39</sup> Lauderdale Papers, iii. p. 76.
<sup>40</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. pp. 179-181.
<sup>41</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. p. 187.
<sup>42</sup> Crichton's Life of Blackader, pp. 144-150.
<sup>43</sup> Wodrow, ii. pp. 169, 170.
<sup>44</sup> Burnet, i. pp. 534, 535.
<sup>45</sup> Burnet, i. pp. 536-542.
<sup>46</sup> Burnet, i. pp. 547, 548.
<sup>47</sup> Wodrow, ii. pp. 197-201.
<sup>48</sup> Wodrow, ii. pp. 201, 202.
<sup>49</sup> Burnet, i. p. 621.
<sup>50</sup> Historical MSS. Commission, xi.; Appendix, vi.; Hamilton MSS., pp. 148, 149. I owe the knowledge of the passage to Mr Butler's 'Life of Leighton,' pp. 476 (1903).
<sup>51</sup> Burnet, i. p. 529.
<sup>52</sup> Burnet, i. p. 621.
<sup>53</sup> Wodrow, ii. pp. 201-210.
<sup>54</sup> Wodrow, ii. p. 211.
<sup>55</sup> Compare Kirkton, pp. 330-336.
<sup>56</sup> Lauderdale Papers, ii. p. 241.
<sup>57</sup> Mackenzie, pp. 250-260.
<sup>58</sup> Lauderdale Papers, iii. pp. 1-35.
<sup>59</sup> Lauderdale Papers, iii. pp. 42-44.
<sup>60</sup> Lauderdale Papers, iii. pp. 52-59.
<sup>61</sup> Wodrow, ii. p. 267; Burnet, ii. p. 45.
<sup>62</sup> Wodrow, ii. pp. 262-266.
<sup>63</sup> Wodrow, ii. p. 279.
<sup>64</sup> Burnet, ii. p. 104.
<sup>65</sup> Wodrow, ii. pp. 347, 371.
<sup>66</sup> See his own account, shabby enough, and that of Sir George Mackenzie, pp. 315-317.
<sup>67</sup> Mackenzie, p. 325.
<sup>68</sup> Burnet, ii. pp. 127, 128.
<sup>69</sup> Wodrow, ii. p. 248.
<sup>70</sup> Wodrow, ii. p. 248.
<sup>71</sup> Wodrow, ii. pp. 249-252.
<sup>72</sup> Wodrow, ii. p. 459.
<sup>73</sup> Wodrow, ii. p. 470.
<sup>74</sup> Burnet, ii. p. 130.
<sup>75</sup> Lauderdale Papers, iii. 95-98.
<sup>76</sup> Lauderdale Papers, iii. 89.
<sup>77</sup> Wodrow, ii. p. 379, note.
<sup>78</sup> Wodrow, ii. p. 381.
<sup>79</sup> Wodrow, ii. pp. 406, 407.
<sup>80</sup> Wodrow, ii. p. 412.
<sup>81</sup> Wodrow, ii. pp. 418-421.
<sup>82</sup> Lauderdale Papers, iii. pp. 99-102.
<sup>83</sup> Wodrow, ii. p. 490.
<sup>84</sup> Wodrow, ii. p. 492.
<sup>85</sup> See Napier's wandering and rhetorical 'Memoirs of Dundee,' 'The Despot's Champion, by a Southern,' 1889, and Mr Barbé's 'Dundee,' dateless, but of 1903.
<sup>86</sup> Barbé, pp. 42, 43.

CHAPTER XII.

BOTHWELL BRIDGE.

1679-1680.

THE events which are to be recorded in the following chapter are, perhaps, more widely known to the world than any others in Scottish history. The tragedy of Mary Stuart, and the war and wanderings of Prince Charles, are also popular topics, but the end of Archbishop Sharp, and the sufferings of the Covenanters between 1679-1688, even yet thrill the hearts of the country people in the Lowlands. The memories of what both parties might well call "the killing time" are kept alive by conventicles held at the graves of the sufferers, and are the themes of preachers and of rhetorical popular historians. When one of these tells us that the Argyll executed for treason in 1661 "was baptised into the forgiving ruth (sic) of Calvary, and that the younger brother" (Argyll) "reminds us of the elder and His exceeding grace," we appreciate the firm and enduring hold which the fond legend of the "martyred" marquis exercises. Nor is he alone in this privilege. "Who will deny that they" (the men who passed three-quarters of an hour in shooting, slashing, and galloping a horse over the body of Archbishop Sharp), "knew the secret of our Lord?" Thus writes the Rev. Mr Alexander Smellie, M.A., in the year of grace 1903.<sup>1</sup> Against such determined credulity, and such a conception of "the secret of our Lord," criticism is powerless.

The state of society and of parties in the last ten years of the scuffle on which we now enter has been rendered with almost Shakespearian genius in 'Old Mortality.' It is true that Scott made some unexpected slips, such as leaving it to be understood that the liturgy was commonly used in the churches of conformist ministers. But his errors were probably like that voluntary mistake which represents the kettle-drums of Claverhouse sounding on a night march. The kettle-drums did not clash in fact, but they do so with much effect in art. Sir Walter was writing fiction, not history; he introduced picturesque though "unwarrantable" details; but his novel gives the colour of the times so truly and so vividly that we need only point to his romance, and say Tolle, Lege!

Torn by intestine controversies and personal disputes, the wandering bands of Covenanters were also given to subjective experiences which they could only interpret as of spiritual origin. Even the learned and prayerful Cotton Mather in the next generation was visited by a strange phantasm which entertained him with literary criticism. Men like Peden had similar experiences, angelic or satanic, which culminated in the case of "Muckle John Gibb," a fanatic who ended his career as a tribal medicine-man among the Red Indians. Cold and hunger on the wet moors, mist and clouds, wind and rain, aided the assaults of the Enemy. The Covenanters were also well informed about the diabolical accomplishments of their adversaries, such as Sharp's early prophetic dream, and the appearance of his wraith to two of his servants at St Andrews while he was in Edinburgh,—a case of "bilocation" common in the biographies of the saints. The 'Analecta' of Wodrow are rich in such anecdotes, though the narrator usually guards himself with "a very sincere Christian told" this or the other circumstance, or some equivalent remark. The wandering preachers of "the honest party," on the other hand, are credited by their admirers with powers of prevision, of healing, of shining in a light not of this world (N rays?), and were even occasionally attended by rappings and knockings. The Covenanters, in defiance of their distaste for good works, and distrust of a righteousness that is but filthy rags, styled many of the brethren "saints," and their records are now and then as rich in miracles as those collected by the Bollandists. Pious men had "great outpourings"; and a text that haunted the memory was regarded as a supernal monition, borne in upon the spirit. The doctrine of the lawfulness of tyrannicide was cherished by many; it could be justified by scriptural and classical parallels, by the cases of Phineas, Harmodius, and Aristogiton. Knox had been of this mind, though approval of murderers was certainly not a tenet of the "sober Presbyterians" of 1679. To them the death of an enemy was "a gracious providence," while the murderer need not be a good man. But among the more spiritually minded were many men not thoroughly sanctified, it is feared, who avenged personal sufferings with the carnal weapon, and justified themselves by the examples of Phineas or Jehu.

By the faction of Balfour of Kinloch (called Burley) and his kinsman Robert Hamilton (of the House of Preston), as, indeed, by Covenanters of both sexes in general, Sharp was above all men hated. A contemporary 'Life' of Sharp, which is not without hostile bias, tells us that his grandfather was a piper, and suggests that he should give the pipes to a church, "to save the expense of a pair of organs." His wife, a Miss Moncrief of Randerston, is spoken of by our author as "an ordinary swearer, tippler, scold, and prophaner of the Sabbath day." "The treachery of Judas, the apostasy of Julian, and the cruelty of Nero did all concenter in him."<sup>2</sup> "He was by all that knew him taken to be no better than a flat Atheist," says Kirkton, "a man of flagitious life, and not only a debauched palliard, but a cruel murtherer." As a student at St Andrews, Sharp became the father of an illegitimate child, and "strangled it with his own hands." "Many believed him to be a demoniack and a witch." Kirkton was one of the more temperate of his party, and, when he could make these assertions in cold blood, we may guess at the beliefs of the left wing of the Covenant. While Mr Osmund Airy does not press the charges of atheism, witchcraft, diabolical possession, debauchery, murder, and descent from a piper grandfather against this father in God, he shows that, by such precisians as Lauderdale and his gang, Sharp was reckoned "a poltroon of serviceable ability, and a liar whose lies could be reckoned upon. . . . When dirty work had to be done he did it really well."<sup>3</sup>

Even on this gentler estimate by the modern historian, Sharp was no admirable character. He was in 1679 more than ever hated. Poor Mitchell accused him of keeping back a clement letter of the king which would have saved bloodshed after the Pentland Rising. It does not quite seem certain that Sharp had the chance to do this, as, according to Gilbert Burnet, his own namesake, Archbishop Burnet of Glasgow, brought down the letter from London, and himself kept it secret till after the executions. But Sharp's evidence at Mitchell's own trial in 1678 bears, Mr Hill Burton says, marks of "crooked prevarication." "There was no assurance of life given him, or any sought by him there," said Sharp, —namely, at the Council bar,—when Mitchell "acknowledged his confession made before the Committee of the Council." Sharp spoke only as to that of which he was a personal eye-witness; he had not been on the Committee of the Council which examined Mitchell.<sup>4</sup>

Concerning Sharp's own murder on May 2, 1679, there is a needless controversy as to whether it was or was not the result of a premeditated plot, like the slaughters of Cardinal Beaton and Riccio. If these were pious deeds, as Knox held, why should they not be premeditated? Are we only to do good by impulse? The Presbyterian author of the popular 'Hind Let Loose' vindicates such actions as "lawful, and, as one would think, laudable."<sup>5</sup> "Several worthy gentlemen, with some other men of courage and zeal for the cause of God, and the good of the country, executed righteous judgment upon him."<sup>6</sup> Kirkton gives the case for non-premeditation away when he says that Sharp received "some warnings" at Kennoway, where he lodged on the morning of his death.<sup>7</sup>

Among the narratives of the deed, that of James Russell, "in Kettle," one of the doers, who later divided his party by the preciseness of his opinions, and the niceties of his conscience, is notable. He regarded the use of heathen names of days of the week, Thursday or Wednesday, as sinful, and a ground of separation.* Russell begins with an account of a meeting of the brethren near Rathillet (April 8, 1679), when much was said about recent armed and successful resistance to the troops of the Government in Fife. On April 11 Russell and his friends met again, and decided to "take some course" with Carmichael, the Sheriff Depute, who was accused by them of torturing people, and other ferocities. If they found Carmichael in Sharp's house "all present judged duty to hang both over the port." "Other worthy Christians had used means to get him" (Sharp) "upon the road before." The intended double murder was referred to a later meeting (April 18). Hackston of Rathillet was to be asked to command the party. He was known to be at enmity with Sharp about a civil lawsuit. On April 29 messengers were sent to collect the opinions "of other ministers and Christians." After more consultations, Rathillet fixed up a paper in the town of Cupar, threatening all who bought the distrained goods of passive resisters to cess, or to summonses before courts. Balfour of Kinloch * 'Faithful Contendings Displayed,' p. 114; Glasgow, 1780. The subscribers to this book are ploughmen, farmers, weavers, shoemakers, and other artisans, who kept up the zeal for the good old cause.

(called Burley), Rathillet's brother-in-law, noted for active resistance, was summoned. On Friday, May 2, twelve men met, Balfour on a bay horse, and Rathillet on a gray; their idea was to kill, or perhaps to terrorise Carmichael. Rathillet and Balfour were the only landed men present. They hunted for but missed Carmichael; however, Balfour, "having inquired the Lord's mind" recently, thought of the text, "Go on and prosper." This was corroborated by another text, "Go, have I not sent you?" These answers to prayer left no doubt as to the divine purpose.

According to depositions taken after the murder, two days earlier, Mrs Black, wife of the farmer at Baldinny, had kissed one of the conspirators, and requested him to "lay long Leslie," minister of Ceres (St. Cyres), "on the green also," beside Sharp (or Carmichael?). This lady now, says Russell, sent a boy "to ask how they had sped?" The boy returned to Mrs Black, and was sent back by her with the happy news that Sharp's coach was on the road. "Truly, this is of God," they said, and Russell, who had recently enjoyed "more than ordinary outlettings of the spirit," was of the same mind. He had mentioned the spiritual voice which counselled him, to various godly men, who had twice already lain in wait to kill Sharp, so unpremeditated was the deed! Rathillet, as being at private enmity with the prelate, would not "mar the glory of the action," and so refused to lead, while Balfour took the command. They came within sight of Sharp's coach near Magus, perhaps three miles from St Andrews. They pursued, firing into the coach, where Miss Sharp was sitting with her father, for the space of half a mile. Russell wounded the postilion, who behaved with courage; Russell stopped the horses, pistols were fired into the carriage. Russell and Balfour now made speeches to the unhappy archbishop in the style of the slayers of Cardinal Beaton. Balfour then shot a pistol at him, and Sharp said, "I will come to you, for I know you are a gentleman and will save my life; but I am gone already, and what needs more?" He and his daughter came out and knelt, Balfour slashed him across the face, Henderson cut off his hand, Balfour rode him down, and Russell, hearing the poor daughter say to her servant that the archbishop yet breathed, "hacked his head to pieces." The servant, Wallace, with extraordinary valour, resisted the plundering of the coach, and was cut across the face by Russell. Another saint then stabbed the dead archbishop, while Rathillet looked on “with his cloak about his mouth.” About half an hour or more was occupied in this glorious action.

One Guillon appears actually to have interceded with the pious doers of the deed; and he, with Rathillet, were the only members of the company who were taken and hanged. There are many other accounts of the action, but that of Russell is probably not the least valid and accurate. There is also a letter of Sharp's son, William, written on May 10. He asserts that twenty-seven men, in three parties of nine, watched for the archbishop. The archbishop received sixteen wounds; his daughter was robbed of her money, and cut in the hand as she begged her father's life.<sup>8</sup> Wodrow, who possessed Russell's plain and detailed narrative, publishes a different version, at second hand from Guillon. The archbishop is here represented as very cool, refusing to pray, offering money for his life, impervious to bullets, but terrified by cold iron, which cannot be warded off by magic, a belief as old as the scholiast on the Odyssey. A bumble bee, found in a box, not mentioned by Wodrow, was thought to be the prelate's familiar spirit. Yet another account, given by Wodrow, says that Miss Sharp was wounded in the thigh as well as the hand; William Sharp would have mentioned this had it been true.

Sharp, of course, was no more a martyr than Argyll. He had given much provocation to pious and determined persons, and they took his life. The circumstances of the deed, however, speak either to deliberate prolonged cruelty, or to clumsiness. Russell's narrative, of course, proves “premeditation,”—proves several designs to kill Sharp, though the actors did not, it seems, expect to meet, on May 2, the man whom they had purposed to hang over his own gate. A stately monument to Sharp, in the Dutch taste, with a relief representing the pursuit and death, was erected in the Town Kirk of St Andrews, and a cairn stands on the supposed scene of his fall, now covered by a dank plantation.

Judging from the opening part of Russell's narrative, the party of resistance, in Fife, had the better in their skirmishes with the soldiers. In Galloway and Dumfriesshire, Claverhouse had much disturbed conventiclors; few dared to sleep in their own beds, he wrote; and he made some prisoners. On April 21 he wrote that he could not send them to Edinburgh at once, because one, an old and infirm minister named Irwin, was “much troubled with the gravel.” It is melancholy to think of a soldier employed in catching ministers; but Claverhouse here does not show the "cold-blooded cruelty" with which he is credited. Of Mr Welsh he speaks in another tone; "he is accustoming both ends of the country to face the king's forces, and certainly intends to break out into open rebellion."<sup>9</sup> On the day of Sharp's murder, Lord Ross, at Lanark, wrote that he had put in irons some soldiers who had been robbing and assailing the country people. One of them had confessed, "and is in effect the Dr Oates in the case." Ross heard vaguely of many charges against his men, but this was the first that had come to his knowledge. On May 5 Ross wrote about the arrest of an enlisted soldier of the preachers; he had not yet heard of Sharp's death, and had doubts as to whether the enemy would ever appear in force. By May 6 Claverhouse was equally ignorant of what had occurred in Fife, and was riding distances of fifty miles on the hills, to seek men like Cameron, who vanished in the mists.<sup>10</sup> No letter from Claverhouse on the murder of Sharp is extant. The Council (May 4) vainly offered 10,000 merks and an indemnity to any of the assassins who should "discover his complices" in a deed repudiated by all Protestant churches. This document was written in the tone of belief in Oates's Popish Plot.<sup>11</sup> Wodrow gives examples of lawless imprisonment on suspicion of guilt in Sharp's murder, and of a man shot by a soldier who thought that he was attempting to escape. On May 29 Claverhouse wrote from Falkirk to Lord Linlithgow, that he had news of a huge conventicle of eighteen parishes, to be held on Sunday; and in seeking for the conventicle he suffered the notable rout of Loudoun Hill, or Drumclog.

We now follow the slayers of Sharp. Their next act was to thank the Lord for "leading them by His Holy Spirit in every step that they stept in that matter," says Russell.<sup>12</sup> The Lord replied to one of them, "well done, good and faithful servants." Making north towards Perth, they heard of the shooting of a Christian, young Inchdarnie, by a soldier, as described by Wodrow. In the inquest on the murder of the archbishop at Cupar, it was deponed that papers proving a long conspiracy against Sharp's life were found on young Inchdarnie, and in Russell's chest.*

Skulking through the country, the murderers pretended to be militiamen, for at Dunblane they were among people who were sorry for Sharp. They succeeded in reaching the western devotees, who were up in arms, and on May 29, that impious royal holiday, * C. K. Sharpe, note to Kirkton, p. 423.

they, under Robert Hamilton, entered the little ancient burgh of Rutherglen, near Glasgow, burned copies of a number of Acts of the Government at the Cross, and affixed their written testimony.

What followed is told by Claverhouse himself, writing from Glasgow, to which he retired after his defeat. His despatch is soldierlike; he makes no excuses for his disaster. He had left Glasgow on Saturday to inquire into the "insolency" done at Rutherglen; had taken a few prisoners, and a preacher named King; and then "made a little tour, to see if we could fall upon a conventicle, which we did, little to our own advantage." He found the enemy drawn up in battle array, in a strong position, "to which there was no coming but through mosses and lakes"—probably small lochans. Claverhouse now sent to Ross, at Glasgow, for reinforcements, which looks as if he was outnumbered; but he was beaten before they came.<sup>13</sup> There were four battalions of foot, with fusils and pitchforks, and three squadrons of horse. He had the better of some preliminary skirmishes, when the enemy advanced and attacked the foot in the first line. The conventiclers stood a discharge at ten paces, and "came to the shock," killing "the Cornet Mr Crawford and Captain Bleir," and Claverhouse's sorrel was stabbed with a pitchfork. "His guts hung out half an ell, and yet he carried me off a mile, which so discouraged our men that they sustained not the shock, but fell into disorder." The Covenanting horse then pursued, and though "I saved the standards," Claverhouse lost a considerable number of men, and fled to Glasgow. "The country was flocking to them from all hands. This may be counted the beginning of the rebellion in my opinion. My lord, I am so wearied, and so sleepy, that I have written this very confusedly."<sup>14</sup> So confusedly, that he seems to represent himself as having discouraged his men by his own flight!

However candid, Claverhouse cannot perhaps have meant to convey this impression. He does credit the enemy with courage very remarkable, above all in undisciplined forces; infantry charging dismounted dragoons, receiving a volley at ten paces, and coming resolutely "to the shock." As to the numbers on his own side, he says nothing, nor can we estimate certainly the four battalions and three squadrons of the enemy. An official account puts them at about 600, and Claverhouse's command at "a few and small number."<sup>15</sup> Russell makes the Covenanting forces but fifty horse, and a hundred and fifty foot, with pitchforks and halberts, with "a few" from Lesmahagow. Claverhouse, says Russell, had a troop of horse and two companies of dragoons, then mounted infantry. He declares that Claverhouse gave the word "No quarter"; it certainly was given on Russell's side. Rathillet, Hamilton, Balfour, and four others commanded the horse (thus fifty horsemen had seven or eight commanders), and the brave Cleland, who fell later in the arms of victory at Dunkeld, with others led the foot. It appears, from Russell, that after rather tame skirmishes—Claverhouse could not charge with his horse, on account of a wide ditch—the Covenanting foot crossed it and came to the shock, as in Claverhouse's own despatch, and the horse followed and pursued. The shooting on the royal side was very bad—only six or seven of the enemy were slain; of the Royalists thirty-six died, and Hamilton, who had given the word "No quarter," pistoled one or two prisoners, "and I bless the Lord for it to this day," he adds.<sup>16</sup> He reckons the giving of quarter "one of our first steppings aside," and quotes the usual texts about Samuel butchering Agag, after he had been received to quarter. Wodrow "cannot determine" whether Hamilton played the bloody part of which he boasts.* The Rev. Dr M'Crie says that Hamilton "appears to have been a pious man and of good intentions, but of narrow views, severe in his temper."<sup>17</sup>

By nine o'clock at night Claverhouse's remnant of fugitives had joined Lord Ross at Glasgow. Ross barricaded the streets and kept half of his force under arms.<sup>18</sup> On Tuesday the Covenanters attacked the town in two detachments, at two points; they were repulsed.<sup>19</sup> On Wednesday Linlithgow bade Ross retire to Stirling, as the Covenanters were coming together in great force, and he himself, with all his command in Edinburgh, joined Ross at Larbert on Thursday.<sup>20</sup> Their united forces were about 1800, without guns. They moved on Glasgow, but got intelligence that the enemy had occupied the town with about 7000 men. Linlithgow could not venture on an attack involving street fighting at such odds, and retired to Stirling, and thence, by order of the Council, to Edinburgh.<sup>21</sup> Wodrow says that he "finds some papers" averring that, after the repulse of the Covenanters at Glasgow, Claverhouse gave orders that dogs should eat their dead which lay unburied. Lord Ross, however, on the day of the affair, says that he can give no account of the losses of the enemy, "the town's people hurled their bodies so quickly off the street." <sup>22</sup> Wodrow continues his tale of dishonoured dead; his authority, "some papers," is perhaps not so good as that of Ross's letter.

* Wodrow, iii. p. 70. Mr Barbé, on grounds which seem good, estimates Claverhouse's command at about 180 men ('Dundee,' p. 49).

Meanwhile, the Council was raising the militia, and on June 11 Lauderdale wrote from London that the king was sending several regiments of horse and foot under the Duke of Monmouth, then the Protestant hero of an England still terrified by the fables of Titus Oates, Prance, Dugdale, and Bedloe, these imaginative reporters of Catholic conspiracies. <sup>23</sup> Dalziel was to act under Monmouth. The Covenanters, for their part, vainly appealed for aid to the Macdonalds and Macleans, who protest that they abhor the rebels, and are falsely maligned by Argyll. <sup>24</sup> At Glasgow, Hamilton, and in their leaguers about that district, the gathered Covenanters were quarrelling about their points of schism, such as separation from the Indulged, paying cess, acknowledging the civil courts, and so forth. Their numbers, according to Russell, were about 6000, on June 6, when Barscobe came to them at Glasgow, and went off to raise Galloway. Robert Hamilton says that his own death was plotted by some of Welsh's "rotten-hearted" party, who met at the clachan of Dalry, in the Glen Kens; and this appears to reflect on Barscobe, who, again, is said, erroneously, to have been murdered by Hamilton's faction. <sup>25</sup> It is sad to have to record these dissensions of excellent men, but when a career of pious murder is once entered upon, doubtless it is difficult to know where to stop.

"One party preached," says Russell, "against all the defections and encroachments upon the prerogatives of Jesus Christ." This, naturally, was the party headed by the men who had mangled and ridden up and down over Sharp, and had shot prisoners in cold blood after Drumclog. Opposed to these defenders of the prerogatives of Jesus Christ, "Mr Welsh and his party preached up the subjects' allegiance to the magistrate." We may hope that Russell exaggerates this deplorable defection. Welsh's armed contingent from Carrick misbehaved "in the houses of the godly, so that troopers and soldiers did not exceed them." In short, councils of war were occupied solely with text-splitting and squabbling, and minister ousted minister from the preaching place. All these things the earnest Russell recounts with perfect solemnity, and we see that "the rotten-hearted party" of Welsh wanted a free Parliament and a General Assembly, while the godly party wanted—who knows what? "The prerogatives of Jesus Christ" are somewhat indefinite, but they appear to be inconsistent with Welsh's ideal—"allegiance to the magistrate," if Welsh really preached that subversive doctrine. "The Covenanters," a modern divine assures us, "witnessed even with their blood" (and with that of other people) "for the Crown Rights of Christ."<sup>26</sup>

The remark may be true of some Covenanters, namely of the party of the murderers and of Hamilton, Cargill and Cameron, and their associates; but Russell (who, as a murderer, ought to be a good authority) hardly seems to think that it is true of Welsh, and those who preached up "allegiance to the magistrate." However these points may be decided, the Welsh party declared that the Hamilton party were asserting "supremacy" as the Crown did, and were encroaching on the "ministerial authority," and dictating the topics of sermons. Meanwhile, the Hamilton party accused the Welsh party of bad faith in the proclamation of a document styled "the Hamilton testimony," not in full accord with the Rutherglen testimony. It is a mistake to suppose that the feud was between the Indulged and Russell's party; it was between Russell's party, and that of Welsh, who did not reckon the Indulged mere idolaters.

If the Welshites were right, the Hamiltonians were as bad as James I. or Charles II., and were claiming for themselves the "Crown Rights of Christ"; while, if the faction led by the Magus Moor murderers was correct in its contention, the Welshites were betraying the Crown Rights of Christ to the magistrate. The sympathy of modern Presbyterian divines who write history appears, on the whole, to be with the good men headed by Russell, Balfour, Hamilton, and Richard Cameron, who seems to have been in Holland at the moment of these faithful contendings.<sup>27</sup> There can be little doubt that if the armed brethren of both parties had now been left unmolested by persecution, there would have been a Presbyterian Armageddon. Ure, of Welsh's party, writes that Hamilton's men said "they would sheathe their swords as soon in them that owned the Indulgence as they would do in many of the Malignants."<sup>28</sup> The Welshites declined to disown "the king's interest," saying that the reputation of Scotland had already suffered enough in the matter of the treatment of Charles I.<sup>29</sup> The quarrels of the two factions, in which the Galloway men sided with Ure and Welsh, were very hot.

But the bloodhounds of Claverhouse and Montrose, the minions of a profligate tyrant, with the militia and royal forces, did not leave the devotees to exterminate each other undisturbed, or merely to break up camp, and retire each party to its own place. The unhappy divisions of these days ramified into many subsections, so that about ten species of Presbyterians were later reckoned in Scotland. To Wodrow, Patrick Walker seemed "wild"; to Patrick Walker, John Gibb seemed "wild"; while Dissenters, about 1720, freely told Patrick, adorer of Cameron and Renwick as he was, that they looked on him as "a vile old apostate."*

Despite their differences, the brethren are said to have delivered, in Glasgow, an emphatic testimony against the errors of Prelacy, destroying the goods of the archbishop, pulling down the ornaments of the Cathedral, and defacing monuments. They are also said to have dug up the corpses of some children of the Bishop of Argyll, in his chapel, run swords through them, and left them there.<sup>30</sup> If this be true, the deeds were probably done to avenge alleged insults to the bodies of the Covenanters who fell in the attack on Glasgow.

Actions of this kind were apt to excite the fury of persecutors.

While the brethren were brawling among themselves and quarrelling about the selection of officers, Monmouth was moving slowly westwards with the royal forces. Partly he was delayed by the inefficient commissariat; partly, perhaps, he wished to let the Covenanters, in Prince Bismarck's phrase, "stew in their own juice." On Saturday, June 21, the Welshites were in a majority, but Rathillet and Hamilton had the advantage of being more ferocious.<sup>31</sup> The Welshites were for electing the most capable men as officers, the Hamiltonians were for a purging of the less orthodox, as before Dunbar. The leaders of Hamilton's faction left the gathering; the others drafted an address to Monmouth, which Hamilton says that he signed but did not read. They had been driven to arms in self-defence, they wrote, "by unavoidable necessity." They rejoice in the arrival of the princely and clement Monmouth (much relied on by Protestants while Jesuits and innocent men, like Hill, Berry, and Green were being hanged in England). They asked leave to send in a deputation. Next day, Sunday, Monmouth was at Bothwell, his patrols being close to the bridge over Clyde. Above the bridge the river flows between the flats, called "haughs" in Scotland, but the sides of the stream are steep and craggy, and the water is narrow, deep, and swift where the bridge crosses.<sup>32</sup>

* To those who have not time to read all the pamphlets of the Kirk's intestine feuds, 'Six Saints of the Covenant,' edited by Dr Hay Fleming, may be recommended (Hodder and Stoughton, London, 1901). This is an edition of the works of Patrick Walker, the original of Davie Deans, in 'The Heart of Midlothian.' Amusing as Davie is, the excellent Patrick is more copiously entertaining. The notes of Dr Hay Fleming are an inexhaustible treasure of Covenanting lore.

Monmouth's choice to advance across this bridge is singular, for he was advised to pass by an unguarded ford, about a mile to the left of the Covenanters' position. He might have sent a force to contain them at the bridge, and out-flanked them by way of the ford, if his numbers were sufficient.<sup>33</sup> Had they entrenched themselves and been united—for their courage is beyond cavil,—the Covenanters might at least have held their own. Their deputation was admitted to see Monmouth, who had gracious manners and was as beautiful as Claverhouse. They asked, "it seems," for a free Parliament and General Assembly—freedom consisting in no "clogs of oaths and declarations,"—and for an indemnity to all "who are or have been in arms."<sup>34</sup> This modest demand included the pardon of the slayers of Sharp and the victors of Drumclog, which, perhaps, no Government could possibly have granted. Monmouth, however, "reckoned their desires reasonable" (which they were not) "and just," but could offer no terms but unconditional surrender. They must lay down their arms before he would treat with them. They had half an hour to consider in, and their brawls were renewed. The party led by the murderers certainly could not accept of the terms. For what followed, the discrepant accounts of Russell, the murderer, and Ure, of Welsh's faction, must be studied.

In the front of Monmouth's force were four companies of dragoons, the Royal Guards, in which Claverhouse was a captain, "and Duke William's troop"; and there was a slight skirmish before the deputation crossed.<sup>35</sup> Russell avers that before the deputation crossed to see Monmouth, Barscobe, with six troops of horse and some footmen (doubtless from Galloway), "was commanded to go over and fight, but refused absolutely." A feud between Barscobe, the beginner of the Pentland Rising, and Hamilton seems to have arisen out of the disputes of the day. Russell places a skirmish before the going of the deputation to Monmouth. Both he and Ure agree that, when the deputation returned, an artillery duel began, Rathillet, says Russell, and many officers being at the bridge. Ure says no word of Rathillet, but agrees with Russell that the Covenanting gun drove off the Royalist gunners, and thinks that if any one had given orders to charge, Monmouth's artillery might have been taken. No officer gave any orders; the cannonade was renewed, and 500 of the royal infantry advanced to the bridge, which was narrow, with a central gate tower, and was commanded, on the Covenanting side, by houses and enclosures with walls. Ure says that Lord Linlithgow's son, with 300 foot, crossed the bridge, and that he himself rallied his own men and drove the enemy back beyond the gate tower. Ure lost three men, and retreated up the moor to the main body. "In all this hot dispute our commanders never owned us."

Russell makes Rathillet the last man to retreat from the bridge. Each faction, Ure for the Welshites, Hamilton for his own side, accuses the other of cowardice, treachery, or both. Russell, who puts the Royalists at 2300 ("being called 2300, foot and horse in all") and the Covenanters at 5000 to 6000 (Ure says 4000 foot, 2000 horse), thinks that the brethren had a good opportunity at the opening of the fight, while the king's forces were on the march and the guns were ill supported. He says that the Galloway men, Hamilton's enemies, were beating a drum for a parley. Ure, of course, gives an opposite account; and it is only certain that "all presently ran away," and, according to Ure, the flight of the murderer Balfour, with his horse, troubled the foot—but Hamilton denies this.<sup>36</sup> "What a sorrow's crown of sorrow it all is!" ejaculates Mr Alexander Smellie, who differs from Kirkton and Ure in making the royal forces much the more numerous.<sup>37</sup> "When we fled there was not ten men killed of us all," says Ure, after eight hours of "fighting"!<sup>38</sup> It is only clear that the bridge, barricaded as it was, was very ill defended; that the Covenanting horse (2000) "left the foot to the mercy of our army, who pursued them with all diligence and zeal, and have killed some hundreds of them, and made many hundred prisoners," says the Privy Council (June 22).<sup>39</sup> They put the rebels at "near seven thousand."

The pursuit was a mere massacre of peasants, foot-soldiers ill-armed, of whom the more part knew not, perhaps, wherefore they had come together. If the sword of Claverhouse was busy in avenging a somewhat problematical kinsman slain at Drumclog, we have no evidence to that effect. The ferocity of the pursuit has been partly attributed to the fact, as stated by Mr Hill Burton, that Hamilton took no interest in the work, "except in the raising of a gigantic gibbet, with a few cart loads of rope piled round it.”<sup>40</sup> The erection of this gibbet rests partly on the evidence of Captain Crichton, or Creighton, who was present with the king’s forces, but mentions only one cartful of new ropes. A diary of the day calls it “an extraordinary great gallows that would hang 30 or 36 persons.”<sup>41</sup> A poem of 1681 also avers that the Covenanters “prepared” a gallows for their captives, whereas Blackader’s Memoirs speak of “a gallows which stood there,” but both the cavalier Crichton and the persecuted Blackader agree that the captured rebels were guarded at that point. If Crichton himself saw the “cartful of new ropes,” it is vain to contend, like Dr M’Crie, and the editor of Blackader, that the gallows was merely a casual gibbet, which chanced to be standing on the scene. It is not the gallows itself, but the new ropes that are important. The poet of 1681 does not say that the rebels had erected, but that they had “prepared” the engine of the law.<sup>42</sup>

Another of the little points on which Cavalier and Covenanting historians do battle is “The Bluidie Banner.” In 1859 Mr James Drummond examined and copied an old banner, which its old owners declared to have been carried at Drumclog and Bothwell Bridge. They gave its provenance, and its pedigree, which really seems fairly probable in itself. The banner was inscribed in Hebrew characters,

JEHOVAH NISSI

FOR CHRIST AND HIS TRUTHS

NO QUARTERS FOR YE ACTIVE ENIMIES OF YE COVENANT.

The last words were in red letters.*

The Covenanting foot fled towards Hamilton; the horse, with Robert Hamilton, Russell, and Barscobe, sped to Cumlock, and, next day, broke up, “their heats and debates being still the more.”<sup>43</sup> Yet Hamilton, Russell, and Balfour made for Earlstoun, in the Glen Kens, and Barscobe entertained some of the party at “Kenmure town,” now probably New Galloway. They skulked * Dr Hay Fleming proves that a tiny set of fanatics, in 1723, had such a banner, but we do not know whether this was the banner copied by Mr Drummond in 1859, or whether the fanatics of 1723 had borrowed a genuine flag of Bothwell Bridge from its owners, or had copied their banner from such an authentic piece, or whether there was no such standard in 1679, the banner seen by Mr Drummond being, in that case, the manufacture of the silly sect of 1723. Hay Fleming, ‘Saints of the Covenant,’ ii. pp. 215-217; Drummond in ‘Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland,’ iii. pp. 253-258.

about Minnigaff, and Castle Stewart, listening to preachers, till news arrived, a week after the fight, "that Clavers was come." Then it was "time for us to go." "All, being so affrighted, dismissed." The Galloway men deserted the murderers from Fife, and, the Rev. Mr Welsh pressing for giving battle again, they rode to meet him. But "Clavers was pursuing and within a mile," and the gentry of Carrick wrote to Welsh to say that they would abandon him if he kept company with the assassins.

Thenceforth they rambled vaguely, and had many narrow escapes. Balfour and Hamilton fled to Holland; Rathillet stayed to dree his terrible weird. Cameron soon returned from Holland, where he seems to have been ordained by M'Ward and other clerical exiles, who, for many years, had spurred on the extremists at home. With Cargill, Cameron and Rathillet were to "lift up the standard" that fell when the Whigs ran away from Bothwell Bridge, and young Renwick was to follow in their steps. But there was no longer a semblance of an united Kirk. The majority of Presbyterians had not disowned monarchy; they were coming round to the frame of mind in which they soon consented to let the Covenants be a dead letter; and, after that, peace was established in Scotland. The persecuted Episcopalians, after 1689, only fought for their faith when they fought for their king.

The action of Government, after the rout of Bothwell, was relatively lenient, and the cruelties were mainly due rather to the careless inefficiency than to the deliberate ferocity of the administration. Wodrow says, to be sure, that a Major White, Claverhouse, "and others of their cruel temper," wished Monmouth to kill many of the prisoners, plunder the west, and burn Hamilton, Glasgow, and Strathaven. Tom Dalziel, who was not present at Bothwell rout, may not have disapproved of "Thorough," but Wodrow cites no evidence for his tale. Doubtless the troops seized horses and arms, but Law, the Covenanting author of the Memorials, says that the Covenanters, after Drumclog, did precisely the same thing. The military also harassed all and sundry on suspicion of having been at Bothwell, with an eye to their share of the fines. We may conceive that the lesser gentry were always exposed to the visits of men like Frank Bothwell at Milnwood, in 'Old Mortality,' in that scene which might fire the blood of a coward. In the hunt for the murderers, whom no man, woman, or child would betray, it is highly probable that the soldiers applied torture, just as Albemarle's officers did to the Highlanders when Prince Charles was a fugitive.<sup>44</sup> Wodrow gives examples of such atrocities by "the soldiers under Claverhouse," but does not say that Claverhouse was present, which he would do if he could; and only quotes vaguely "instances in his hands." In fact he relies, it seems, on tradition, and gives no vouchers for cases "well vouched and certain." * We may be certain that the country endured the brutal excesses of a soldiery not found by the Government in proper quarters and supplies, and given to rob wherever they had the chance.

As to the prisoners, the king, on June 29, gave the Council leave to torture such of them as might possess valuable information. Three or four hundred were to be banished to the colonies, as was practised by the Parliament in the Civil War. The rest might be dismissed on signing a promise not to take arms again; if they attended conventicles their pardon dropped. There was no massacre of captives, as after Philiphaugh, and at Dunaverty.<sup>45</sup> Two preachers, Kid and King, were hanged on the day, August 14, when an indemnity (London, July 27) was published. In this the king spoke of those who "poisoned our people with principles inconsistent with true piety and all human society, as well as with our royal government." The ideas of the extremists, in fact, were inconsistent "with human society." With exceptions, the indemnity covered all who would promise to live peaceably.<sup>46</sup> Fifteen prisoners were sentenced to death; all but two were persuaded by the Rev. Mr Jamison, deputed by "an Erastian meeting of ministers," to sign the bond of peaceable behaviour.<sup>47</sup> The mass of prisoners, some twelve or thirteen hundred, were warded "in the inner Greyfriars Churchyard," without shelter, till huts were erected in winter. Wodrow describes the guards as brutal and licentious. About eight hundred signed the bond, and were released; about a hundred escaped by simply climbing the wall, or putting on women's clothes in the huts and walking out. Many of those who signed the bond actually argued, so Wodrow "finds it said," that "their rising was not against his Majesty's authority, and consequently that it did not bind them up from any such appearance when occasion offered again."

* "Multitudes of instances, once flagrant, are now at this distance lost; not a few of them were never distinctly known . . ." (Wodrow, iii. pp. 120-123). An example of the worst is cited by Wodrow's editor from Sergeant Nisbet's Diary, iii. p. 122, note. The present writer, in childhood, had a Cameronian nurse, who assured him that a conventicle was held beside a burn in Selkirkshire, that Claverhouse occupied the brae above, and fired into the crowd, and that the bones of the Covenanters were still on the scene. I cannot find historical mention of this ill-sentinelled conventicle in a hollow.

What Wodrow "finds said" is not always evidence, but, if his story be true, we must suppose that, as Oates swore, wicked Jesuits had been at work in Scotland. Candid Presbyterian minds could not surely be so "jesuitical"!<sup>48</sup> Of the prisoners who would not sign, and professedly thought "killing no murder" in the case of an archbishop, about two hundred were drowned when their ship was wrecked off the Orkneys.<sup>49</sup> The skipper is said to have been a Papist, the crew monsters of cruelty. Blackader tried to prevail on the prisoners not to sign the bond to live peaceably; "that foul compliance," says Patrick Walker. Mr Blackader was soon afterwards taken and sent to the Bass, where the prisoners "paid at a twopenny rate for a glass of the halfpenny ale."<sup>50</sup> Here he died in 1686. In November five recalcitrant prisoners were hanged on Magus Moor; not that they had been engaged in Sharp's murder—the slayers could not be caught. A rude monument to their memories is still reverently regarded.*

After these punishments and some forfeitures (Claverhouse received, but did not much enjoy, the estate of Macdowall of Freuch), the Kirk and people might have awaited quietly the abdication of James II. But M'Ward, the exiled preacher, who "had the wyte of all the sorrows of Scotland" in these days, with others, consecrated Richard Cameron in Holland. It seems that Cameron returned in the autumn of 1679, bidden by M'Ward to raise the fallen standard, and prophetically warned that his own head should fall.<sup>51</sup> While Cameron was fanning the embers of revolt, Monmouth fell from power, when the Duke of York hurried to the sick-bed of the king. The duke may or may not have been in part responsible for the failure of a new Indulgence, the third granted under Monmouth's influence. On November 24, 1679, he was welcomed at Holyrood, and took his seat on the Council, being dispensed from taking the oaths. Cameron, who had no preacher ally save the elderly Cargill, held fasts on account of the duke's arrival, being urged thereto by letters from M'Ward, safe in Holland. The Duke of Hamilton and his party had again failed to oust Lauderdale; the Presbyterians generally were inclined to be quiet, but Cameron preached sermons

* "I do not know of any cairn where the archbishop was killed, but I do know one to the holy men that killed him," said a farmer's wife to a lady who asked about Sharp's cairn.

in favour of renewed civil war. Some passages appear to recommend assassination. "Are there none to execute judgment upon these wicked men, who are both treacherous and tyrannical. . . . And, if it be done, we cannot but justify the deed, and such as are to be commended for it, as Jael was." On the other hand, Cameron bade hearers, if asked whether such or such a fugitive was in the house, to "beware of lying on any account."<sup>52</sup> The Rev. Henry Erskine was composing a sermon against Cameron (who was most distasteful to peaceful Presbyterians), but he heard a voice saying "Audi! Audi!" (Hear); "Audi est," says Mr Erskine, meaning "Hear it is!" when the divine voice, dropping into the vernacular, remarked, "Beware of calling Cameron's words vain." Patrick Walker records this hallucination at second hand.<sup>53</sup>

Cameron is credited with prophecies less veridical than those of Jeanne d'Arc. The faithful were "to get a right Reformation." By their own confession they got nothing of the kind. In all Ayrshire and Clydesdale a man was to ride a day without seeing a smoking chimney before "the right Reformation" came. These judgments and mercies might be seen by some of the hearers. Cameron, like Knox, according to Lethington, was "a drivelling prophet," though he made the very easy prediction that after Charles I. there should not be a Stuart crowned in Scotland. It then seemed that the Act of Exclusion of the Duke of York would pass, one day or another, and the duke had no son. Cameron said that "he was assured the Lord would set up a standard against Antichrist that would go to the gates of Rome and burn it with fire, and that 'Blood!' should be their sign, and 'No Quarters' their word, and earnestly wished that it might first begin in Scotland."<sup>54</sup> So Patrick Walker lovingly declares, but Cameron was quite mistaken in his assurance from the Lord. He was not a genuine Highlander, but the son of a Falkland tradesman; and he had not the second sight. His love of blood and "no quarter" is characteristic of the extreme left of the Covenanters. Such was this "Saint of the Covenant." We are told that he and men like him fought for "freedom of conscience." His ideal, on the other hand, was to persecute people whose consciences differed from his, beginning in Scotland, and carrying fire and blood and the banner of "No Quarters" to the gates of Rome. This was a vast plan of campaign, and the means were inadequate.

Cargill and one Henry Hall of Haughhead (traditionally said to have owned "The Bluidie Banner") used to skulk and conspire near Queensferry. One of the preachers whom these men were wont to threaten, boycott, and insult, gave information. Hall was wounded mortally in a scuffle with the governor of Blackness; old Cargill escaped, and Hall died as he was being conveyed to Edinburgh (June 3, 1680).<sup>55</sup> In his pocket was found a long unsigned "testimony," or draft of a testimony, known as the "Queensferry Paper" or "New Covenant." The king and monarchy, according to this document, were to be abjured, a Commonwealth on Mosaic principles was to be established. Presbyterianism of the strictest kind (as in 1592, and 1638, or more so) "is the only right government of the Church, and ought to be rightly exercised, not after the carnal manner by a plurality of votes. . . ." This appears to mean that the Protesters, though in a minority, and not the Resolutioners, had a right to govern the Kirk, as being more godly. The banders were to destroy "all relics of idolatry and superstition," and "exercise righteous judgment" on all Malignants, that is, Royalists. The king, and all preachers not of their own sort, these men disown, and so forth.<sup>56</sup>

On June 22 Cameron and twenty mounted men of his way of thinking rode into Sanquhar, in Dumfriesshire, and promulgated a manifesto, in which they defied and disowned the king and the Hamilton Declaration, issued by Welsh's party before Bothwell Bridge.<sup>57</sup> If we may believe Row, the son-in-law and biographer of the celebrated Covenanter, Mr Blair, Cameron's faction meant to kill Millar and Veitch, two Indulged ministers. One of the party warned Millar, who informed Sir James Cochrane, later prominent in Argyll's rising in 1685. Dalziel, who now commanded in Scotland, sent Bruce of Earlshall on the track of Cameron; there was a sharp skirmish at Airs Moss; Richard Cameron and his brother Michael fought with as much determination as the Gunpowder Plot conspirators, and, happily for themselves, died in battle. Hackston of Rathillet was taken, and he, who had looked on while an old man was slowly mangled to death before his daughter's eyes, perished by the same cruel English method of execution as the captives of Carlisle and Culloden in 1746.<sup>58</sup> "They gave us all testimony of brave resolute men," says the unhappy Rathillet, speaking of his opponents. That testimony they certainly deserved; but the majority of the milder Presbyterian party regarded these martyrs in the spirit of Row, Blair's biographer. They and their successors were "the Remnant." The Kirk at large held aloof from them; they formed "Societies" with an organisation of their own; and, of course, were much disgusted by the "Erastian" settlement, under an uncovenanted king, William III., which followed the Revolution of 1688. Such were the people who came to be called Cameronians, a title which, in the next generation, was refracted on to the general mass of all shades of Presbyterians assembled at Bothwell Bridge.

It is not to be supposed that all Cameronians even in "The Societies" went all lengths with the framers of the crazy Queensferry Paper, whoever they may have been. To found a non-democratic hierocratic republic, in which carnal plurality of votes was not to decide questions, to carry the war of "No Quarters" from Scotland to the heart of Italy (as Walker says that Cameron desired), can scarcely have been the ambition of all Cameronians. Wodrow tries to split hairs about the authorship and authority of the Queensferry Paper, and tells us that the Cameronians and Society people themselves "did not pretend to vindicate every expression . . . yea, afterwards, in some of their public papers, they expressly disown it, in as far as it does anyway import any purpose of assuming to themselves a magistratical authority."<sup>59</sup> However, in 1684 a number of sufferers for the Queensferry Paper were exiled to America, and they very frankly write, "We adhere to the eight articles of the New Covenant drawn by Mr Donald Cargill, and taken of the worthy Henry Hall at the Kueens-ferrie, and does own the samin in all things as is agreeable to the Word of God."<sup>60</sup>

If we take the liberty to call the ideas of Cameron and Cargill delirious delusions, we only use the brotherly freedom which their disciple, Patrick Walker, employs in the case of another Saint of the Covenant, Meikle John Gibb. Mr. Gibb, indeed, was not even dubiously ordained, being a mariner, yet "a great professor." He drew about twenty-six women and three men after him, "the greater part of them serious, exercised, tender, zealous, gracious souls." Their nonconformist consciences rebelled against "all Crown dues, excise, and customs," wherefore they consistently abstained from "ale, tobacco, and other fool things." They retired to the Pentlands "to see the smoke and utter ruin of the sinful bloody city Edinburgh." Here they confessed to each other "sins that the world had not heard of," which argues extreme originality in vice. As they skulked in a great moss called The Deer Slunk, Mr Cargill visited them, though Gibb said that they did much better without ministers. Gibb carried pistols to use on husbands who came seeking their gracious exercised wives.

Cargill decided that Gibb was "an incarnate devil," for Gibb had outgone even Cargill. When he and his ladies were taken, the Duke of York "rejoiced," and, being set at liberty again, Gibb burned a Bible, apparently because the versified psalms are not "inspired," a point about which doubt is impossible. On the night before, a light shone round Gibb and another man as they prayed in the moss; just as "a strange light surrounded" Mr Welsh while he walked in the dark. Mr Gibb, like many another sufferer, was sent to America, where, says Walker, "he was much admired by the heathen for his familiar converse with the devil bodily,"—in fact, he seems to have become a Joss-a-keed, or medicine man, or was so held and reputed.<sup>61</sup> Mr Gibb has been accused of taking freedoms with his flock not unusual among prophets; he was also even more exclusive than Cameron and Cargill, holding aloof from them, as they did from the Indulged. As to burning the Bible, that was a mere protest against the human admixture of the Table of Contents, and the rhymed psalms. Walker does not charge Gibb with immoral license, and the admiration of the heathen for Gibb may have been misunderstood. On the whole, Gibb only went a little further than the other saints, being less educated than they in mere book-learning. His "strong delusions," as Wodrow calls them, were not more delusive than "the assurances from the Lord" which Cameron uttered in his prophecies, according to his admirer Walker. On Gibb's showing, it only "seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us to take out of our Bibles the psalms in metre."<sup>62</sup> Gibb denounced "making a tyrant patron of the Church," as Cameron and Cargill did. He also, most commendably, objected to "putting horrid pictures" into illustrated Bibles. He denounced the preachers for "making their books their God and their leader," "and their saying that learning is essential of a minister, without grace."<sup>63</sup> Gibb was a "Dopper": the preachers did not go far enough for him, as Welsh did not go far enough for Cargill, and Wodrow did not go far enough for Walker, and Walker did not go far enough for the brethren who called him "a vile old apostate."

Meanwhile the majority of Presbyterians were wearying of all these excesses. Nearly a century of religious violences had fatigued the country, and the day of a compromise between Kirk and State was approaching.

NOTES TO CHAPTER XII.

- <sup>1</sup> 'Men of the Covenant,' by Alexander Smellie, M.A., pp. 66, 243.
- <sup>2</sup> See elegant extracts by C. K. Sharpe, in Kirkton, p. 82, note.
- <sup>3</sup> 'Scottish Review,' iv. pp. 29-30.
- <sup>4</sup> 'State Trials,' vi. 1257; Hill Burton, vii. p. 203.
- <sup>5</sup> 'Hind Let Loose,' p. 635; Wodrow, iii. p. 48, note.
- <sup>6</sup> 'Hind Let Loose,' p. 123. <sup>7</sup> Kirkton, p. 83.
- <sup>8</sup> Narrative of Russell, and letter, in Kirkton.
- <sup>9</sup> 'Memoirs of Dundee,' Napier, ii. 202. <sup>10</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 203-207.
- <sup>11</sup> Wodrow, iii. p. 52, note. <sup>12</sup> Kirkton, p. 422
- <sup>13</sup> Lauderdale Papers, iii. p. 169. <sup>14</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 221-223.
- <sup>15</sup> M'Crie, 'Veitch and Brysson,' p. 441.
- <sup>16</sup> Hamilton's letter of Dec. 7, 1685; 'Faithful Contendings Displayed,' p. 201.
- <sup>17</sup> 'Veitch and Brysson,' p. 452. <sup>18</sup> Napier, ii. p. 220.
- <sup>19</sup> Ross to Linlithgow, June 2 (Lauderdale Papers, iii. p. 166).
- <sup>20</sup> Cf. Wodrow, iii. pp. 83, 84.
- <sup>21</sup> Linlithgow's Account, Lauderdale Papers, iii. pp. 167-170.
- <sup>22</sup> Lauderdale Papers, iii. p. 166; Wodrow, iii. p. 71.
- <sup>23</sup> Wodrow, iii. pp. 86, 87.
- <sup>24</sup> The petition of the loyal clans is published by Wodrow, iii. p. 88, who, of course, discredits their veracity.
- <sup>25</sup> 'Faithful Contendings,' p. 188; Kirkton, p. 452 note, 453; Law's Memorials.
- <sup>26</sup> The Rev. Mr Butler, 'Life and Letters of Leighton,' p. 574 (1903).
- <sup>27</sup> See the Rev. Professor Herkless's very sympathetic 'Richard Cameron,' p. 79. Cameron was in Scotland early in May 1679 (see 'Claverhouse to Linlithgow,' Napier, ii. p. 206). For a Welshite view of the quarrels, see Ure, in 'Veitch and Brysson,' pp. 456-474.
- <sup>28</sup> 'Veitch and Brysson,' p. 470.
- <sup>29</sup> Ure, in 'Veitch and Brysson,' p. 468.
- <sup>30</sup> Pamphlets of 1679 and 1682, and Indictment in the High Court of Justiciary, November 10, 1679, cited by Napier, ii. p. 229, note.
- <sup>31</sup> Wodrow, iii. p. 104. <sup>32</sup> Hill Burton, vii. p. 233.
- <sup>33</sup> Aiton, 'The Rencounter at Drumclog,' p. 72 (1821).
- <sup>34</sup> Wodrow, iii. p. 106. He cites no authority, and the demands are not in the written address, iii. p. 105.
- <sup>35</sup> Wodrow, iii. p. 106. Ure in 'Veitch and Brysson,' p. 476.
- <sup>36</sup> 'Veitch and Brysson,' p. 481.
- <sup>37</sup> 'Men of the Covenant,' p. 248. <sup>38</sup> 'Veitch and Brysson,' p. 483.
- <sup>39</sup> Lauderdale Papers, iii. pp. 171-173. <sup>40</sup> Hill Burton, vii. p. 232.
- <sup>41</sup> 'Saints of the Covenant,' ii. p. 217.
- <sup>42</sup> Kirkton, p. 469, note. M'Crie in 'Veitch and Brysson,' p. 459, note.
- <sup>43</sup> 'Memoirs of Blackader,' p. 229, note.
- <sup>44</sup> Russell, in Kirkton, p. 469.
- <sup>45</sup> Albemarle Papers, New Spalding Club.
- <sup>46</sup> Wodrow, iii. p. 110, and note. <sup>47</sup> Wodrow, iii. p. 118, and note.
- <sup>47</sup> Patrick Walker, 'Six Saints of the Covenant,' i. p. 54.
- <sup>48</sup> Wodrow, iii. p. 126. <sup>49</sup> Wodrow, iii. pp. 130, 131.

- <sup>50</sup> 'Blackader's Sufferings,' Crichton's Blackader, p. 267, note.
<sup>51</sup> 'Six Saints of the Covenant,' i. p. 225; ii. pp. 110, 163.
<sup>52</sup> See Herkless, 'Richard Cameron,' pp. 107-109.
<sup>53</sup> 'Six Saints of the Covenant,' i. pp. 227, 228.
<sup>54</sup> 'Six Saints of the Covenant,' i. p. 230.
<sup>55</sup> Wodrow, iii. p. 206. <sup>56</sup> Wodrow, iii. pp. 207-211, note.
<sup>57</sup> Wodrow, iii. p. 212, note.
<sup>58</sup> Row's 'Blair,' pp. 569, 570; Wodrow, iii. pp. 218-223; 'Six Saints of the Covenant,' ii. p. 165.
<sup>59</sup> Wodrow, iii. p. 208.
<sup>60</sup> MS. cited by Dr Hay Fleming, 'Saints of the Covenant,' ii. pp. 223-231.
<sup>61</sup> 'Saints of the Covenant,' ii. pp. 17-26.
<sup>62</sup> Wodrow, iii. p. 350, note; Gibb's Testimony.
<sup>63</sup> Wodrow, iii. pp. 350-353, note.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE KILLING TIME.

1680-1685.

WE have seen that, to Cargill, the Gibbites appeared to be extremists. He himself, after Airs Moss, "without any concert, and to the surprise of many," excommunicated the king, and many other gentlemen, at an assemblage in the Torwood. That Charles deserved excommunication is not to be doubted, but that Mr Cargill should take upon himself the function of a Church "was approved by none that I know of," says Wodrow, "but his own followers," who now set themselves up in distinction from the rest of the Presbyterians in Scotland, and "refused to partake in ordinances dispensed by any Presbyterian minister, till Mr Renwick came home to them from Holland, about three or four years after this."<sup>1</sup> In the following year Cargill was captured by "wild Bonshaw," of the fierce border clan of Irvine or Irving (July 12, 1681). One or two of his persecutors were smitten by "judgments." "Die what death I will, your eyes will not see it," he said to Rothes,—according to Patrick Walker. Rothes, already very ill, grew worse, and confessed to Mr Carstairs,<sup>2</sup> that he found Cargill's sentence of excommunication "binding upon me now, and will bind to eternity." If this be truly reported, Rothes exaggerated. Rothes and Cargill had signed the Covenant together, when at St Andrews, where the document exists. Rothes, we have seen, had been dangerously ill just before Cargill's alleged prophecy, which is thus open to criticism. He died on July 26; Cargill with four others was hanged on July 27, 1681. Lord Fountainhall reports timidity on Cargill's part. He declined to answer the Council on the "merely ecclesiastical question" of excommunicating the king and others. The truth is that he gave evasive replies, and asked for time to consider his answers. He advocated the Jael and Phineas doctrine of the right of individuals to kill people,—“the Lord giving a call to a private man to kill,”—as warranted by Scripture. Lethington would have replied that these are unusual motions of the Spirit, and that the subjective opinion of a private man to the effect that “the Lord has given him a call” is hardly evidence.<sup>3</sup> In a last document, Cargill, like John Gibb, denounced “the ministers of Scotland.” “How have they betrayed Christ’s interest and beguiled souls!” Unluckily this “interest” (as understood by Knox, Andrew Melville, and Cargill), seems to be incompatible with the existence of human society, and the extreme Presbyterian view throughout had been the cause of the miseries of a century.

According to Walker the Council would have sent Cargill to the Bass, as being old and incapable of further mischief, but Argyll’s vote for death turned the scale.<sup>4</sup> Argyll was presently in trouble himself. Parliament met the day after Cargill’s death, and framed “the cursed Test,” which Argyll would only take with a qualification.

The Duke of York was Royal Commissioner, and his interest, of course, was to secure his own succession to the throne, much imperilled by Protestant alarms in England, and by the Exclusion Bill; but secured by the conduct of the king, and the reaction against the insanity of Oates’s pretended plot, with its reign of terror. The creed of James, and his infatuated behaviour when king, not the vagaries of the Camerons and Cargills, were to cause his abdication, or flight, in 1688.

Sir George Mackenzie, the Lord Advocate, exhibited in office about as little scruple as Scroggs did when a judge during the fury of the Popish Plot in England. In an unofficial capacity, however, Sir George wrote, “it fares with heretics as with tops, which, so long as they are scourged, keep foot and run pleasantly, but fall so soon as they are neglected and left by themselves.”<sup>5</sup> Nevertheless, Mackenzie, less wise than witty, now helped the Government to whip the fanatical tops. At this time it seems that the Government might wisely have offered the most extensive Indulgence, and neglected the fanatics of Cargill’s kind, as they were “left by themselves,” and became negligible after the Revolution. But Claverhouse, a clear-headed man, was strongly opposed to a new Indulgence. “I hope nobody is so mad as to advise it,” he writes (April 1, 1682). We must remember, too, that the Government, for political reasons in England, could not abandon Episcopacy in Scotland. But, after 1688, Episcopacy was abandoned in Scotland, Episcopal ministers were "rabbled," and the Kirk was allowed to persecute Episcopalians. So the Kirk, after 1688, was contented enough, and the Cameronians could safely be left by themselves. Nothing short of what William III. conceded to the Kirk could have left the fanatics in a negligible condition, and what William gave, Charles, though by temperament averse to persecution, could not possibly give. Thus it was inevitable that the Scottish Government should continue, in Mackenzie's phrase, to whip the tops, and incur perpetual odium.

The king's message to Parliament urged remedies for the cure of the "violent distempers," which, at this distance, seem to have deserved mere contempt. Executions, as of two women who defied authority, merely won for the sufferers the reputation of martyrs, and the sympathy of the public. Into the act ratifying Protestantism, Argyll is said to have wished to introduce (and Dalrymple of Stair did introduce) an approval of the old Confession of Faith, and other matter unpalatable to the Catholic Duke of York, "so that nothing but his blood would satisfy him." Argyll, thenceforth, becomes, rather late, a Saint of the Covenant.<sup>6</sup>

After Worcester, and before the Restoration, Argyll, then Lord Lorne, had taken the royal side, and was "out," while his father, the marquis, stayed at home, and gave Monk information about the Royalists' movements. When the marquis had suffered for this, his son, after a period of distrust, was restored to the rank of earl, and held the wide heritable jurisdictions, as of a principality, whereby his descendant helped to hang James of the Glens in 1752. Argyll was thus a noble of vast influence, and, as he remained steadily loyal, he had, so far, no claim to be a Scottish worthy—rather, he persecuted the saints. As against the doctrine of the Protesters he fought at Worcester; he was "out" till Middleton retired from his opposition to the Cromwellian invasion. During the Pentland Rising he seized all the doubtful gentlemen of Kintyre, and raised 2000 men for the king; and he was waiting for Dalziel's order when the Covenanters fled from Rullion Green. He put down the Macleans, who, though disorderly, were not godly, and, if Patrick Walker tells truth, he gave the casting vote that hanged Mr Cargill.<sup>7</sup> There is no documentary evidence to this effect, as that part of the Register of Council has been lost or destroyed. Walker was familiar with the leaders of the Remnant, and reports what they believed.

Argyll himself, after the Pentland Rising of 1666, wrote from Edinburgh to Lauderdale (January 28, 1667): "The outed ministers that meddled in the late rebellion I think deserve torture."* How little Argyll guessed that, for "meddling in rebellion," he himself would be sentenced to suffer torture, though, luckier than the Rev. Mr Mackail, tortured in 1667, he escaped the boot! Argyll rebuked Sharp for calling him a Presbyterian: "I was a while bred under Presbytery, but I had been in other parts of the world, where church government was not made so great a matter of as by some in this country; but whatever was past, I took it not well to go under names" (Edinburgh, Feb. 2, 1667).

Not till he was most iniquitously condemned to death, escaping into exile, do we see any trace of the staunch Presbyterian in a nobleman who approved of the torture of the martyred Mackail. Yet this Argyll, soon after Cargill's execution, perhaps came near to sharing Cargill's fate. The circumstances are more or less mysterious.

The Duke of York, before the Parliament in which he was Commissioner, had made himself popular with the nobles, and—the saints excepted—with the people. He was an excellent golfer, and, as he writes himself, "I live here as cautiously as I can, and am very careful to give offence to none."<sup>8</sup> He was on good terms with Argyll, but Burnet avers, and Wodrow (in his gossiping 'Analecta') has a note to the same effect, that Argyll warned the duke that he would oppose the restoration of Catholicism. An opposition to the Duke of York's appearance as Commissioner was intended, but the party of Hamilton were faint-hearted. A general confirmation of the old laws against Papacy was passed, with an Act confirming, as a thing of divine right, the succession to the throne of the next representative of the Stuart line, that is, the Catholic Duke. "Argyll ran into this with zeal," says Burnet,—curious conduct in an earnest Protestant.

Haltoun (Charles Maitland, Lauderdale's brother) was accused of perjury in the case of poor Mitchell. Haltoun had denied, as we know, that promise of life had been given to Mitchell; but his own letters in proof of the fact (which have been already cited) were produced against him. The letters had been written to Kincardine, whose widow now made them public. Lord Auchinleck, father of * 'Letters from Archibald, Earl of Argyll, to John, Duke of Lauderdale,' p. 56. Edinburgh, 1829.

Dr Johnson's Boswell, and himself grandson of Kincardine, writes that the Duke of York got copies of the letters of Haltoun from Lady Kincardine, and showed them to the king, "who was stunned at the villany, and ashamed he had employed such a minister; and immediately ordered all his posts and preferments to be taken from him."<sup>9</sup> On August 31 an Act was passed as to religion. Charles is represented as zealous for the Confession of Faith made law in the Parliament of 1567. At that hour a queen had been deposed and imprisoned, and the creed of Knox was at its highest flight. That Charles, a king and, by conviction, a Catholic, should be zealous for this Confession seems a truly preposterous assertion. All manner of Papists and fanatics are denounced, and everybody is to be driven to church by ministers, magistrates, and bishops. A test oath is imposed, to keep Papists and fanatics out of every conceivable office; and this is done while a Papist holds the highest of all offices, that of Royal Commissioner. It is said that Dalrymple (Stair) had the Confession of 1567 put into the Test Act, thinking that it would be opposed, and that the Act would be dropped. But apparently nobody had ever read the Confession, which approves of resistance to tyrants. The takers of the test had to swear both to the Confession (which makes Christ head of the Kirk) and also to the headship of Charles II. They had to declare all Leagues and Covenants unlawful, and promise never to try to alter anything in Church or State! Finally, they had to swear that they took the oath, "in the plain genuine sense and meaning of the words," which are a set of plain genuine contradictions in terms. They made "no mental reservation or any manner of evasion."<sup>10</sup>

They might as well have sworn, in a phrase of John Stuart Mill's, that "Humpty Dumpty is Abracadabra." So elastic and incomprehensible a test was later applied as a means of persecution. No man could take it who had not a much stronger sense of humour than of honour. No man could keep it, for "the end of its commonwealth forgetteth its beginning." Gibbites and Cameronians were accurate and tranquil logicians compared to the framers of this test, which was passed in a day; and the members of the Royal Family, to make a combe of absurdity, were excepted out of it. A Catholic, the Duke of York, when he became king, would apparently be free to introduce his own creed, and the takers of the test would have to choose between adherence to the Confession and adherence to the rest of the paralyzing document. Argyll had more logic than humour (his poem on the subject proves that point), and he opposed the exception of the Royal Family, except, indeed, of the Duke of York.<sup>11</sup> Many of the conformist ministers (eighty, says Burnet) are for once applauded by Wodrow; they put forth their objections to the monstrous absurdity, and resigned their livings.

Explanations and attempts at reconciling contradictories were made by the Bishop of Edinburgh, and admitted by an Act of Council.<sup>12</sup> Argyll took the test with a qualification, "as far as it is consistent with itself, and with the Protestant religion."<sup>13</sup> On November 8 the Council wrote to the king, accusing the earl of "gross and scandalous reflections, . . . depraving your Majesty's laws, misrepresenting your Parliament . . . teaching your subjects to disappoint all laws and securities," and so forth. The perjured Haltoun, with Sir George Mackenzie, and Airlie, keeping up the Ogilvy feud, were among the writers of the letter.<sup>14</sup> Argyll was indicted of "leasing-making"—that elastic offence,—of treason, and other crimes, and sent before a jury. Montrose, Claverhouse, and Airlie were among the fifteen jurors, Ogilvies and Grahams had a Campbell at their mercy, and an unanimously voted verdict brought the earl in guilty. The king's pleasure in the matter had to be waited for; and Argyll, perhaps rashly, escaped in the dress of a footman, holding up the train of Lady Sophia Lindsay, who had visited him in prison. Every one has heard how he dropped the train in the mud, and how the quick-witted lady slashed him across the face with the wet and dirty garment.

Argyll fled to London, where the king knew his place of retreat, but would not disturb him, and, later, retired to Holland: his adventures, with the useful dreams that are sent to save saints, make a stirring page of romance. But escapes of this kind are almost always, if not always, collusive. Fountainhall asserts that Melfort deliberately permitted Argyll to walk off,<sup>15</sup> though elsewhere he seems to contradict this. Probably the Council simply wished to frighten Argyll away: indeed, it was believed at the time that he was merely meant to lose the power implied in his wide jurisdictions. The Duke of York writes, during the trial by judges, "that little lord will be once again at his Majesty's mercy" (December 13, 1681).<sup>16</sup> Burnet remarks that it was said, "Lauderdale had restored the family with such an extended jurisdiction that he was really the master of all the Highlands, so that it was fit to attain him, that, by anew restoring him, these grants might be better limited. This, as the duke wrote to the king, was all he intended by it, as Lord Halifax assured me."<sup>17</sup>

The king knew, as we saw, where Argyll lurked in London, "but he would have no search made for him, and retained still very good thoughts of him,"—of his brave ally at Worcester fight. On the whole, the design probably was to terrify Argyll, and have his power reduced; but to place Airlie, Montrose, and Claverhouse on his jury was "simply iniquitous," as an apologist of Claverhouse frankly remarks.<sup>18</sup> None of us is perfect, and Grahams and Ogilvies could have escaped the post of jurors by paying a fine. The feud of Clan Diarmaid with the Stuarts, to whom, from Sir Nigel's day to 1638 they had been loyal, burned up again, and it was not the Stuarts who won the victory. The whole affair is conspicuous even among the mean rascalities of the Restoration.

Meanwhile the Duke of York was regarded as likely to prove "a terrible master" when he came to the throne. Already the Edinburgh students had insulted him by burning the Pope in effigy. The schoolboys tried their watch-dog for licking the butter off a copy of the Test, and not swallowing it whole (as Argyll took the Test "with a qualification"), but there seems reason to hope that the tyke was not hanged till he was dead. Haltoun escaped from the consequences of his perjury and peculations by paying £20,000, part of which went to Gordon of Haddo, who was later made chancellor, and first Earl of Aberdeen in the present line.

"The new chancellor exceeded all that had gone before him," says Burnet.<sup>19</sup> In summer Lauderdale died; his picture is drawn by Lord Ailesbury, in his memoirs, where he appears as a coarse buffoon by taste, and as the detested butt of Charles II., who hated to have Lauderdale's fingers in his snuff-box. To escape this infliction, Charles invented a snuff-box on the lines of a pepper-caster! The Duke of York, after Argyll's escape, was wrecked, and hardly escaped, on a voyage to England. Whether he displayed cowardice and neglect of the crew is disputed; if so, it was against his previous character as a brave naval officer, and in consonance with his want of courage during the Revolution. Courage apparently may be lost, as "nerve" may be lost by hunting men.<sup>20</sup> With Aberdeen as chancellor and Queensberry as treasurer, the exaction of fines and compulsory church-going were more rigorously exacted. As Monmouth, Hamilton, and others had not taken the Test, there were new appointments to their jurisdiction, Claverhouse succeeding to those of Kenmuir (a family always engaged in all losing sides), and Agnew of Lochnaw (January 1682). Government and Claverhouse averred, with truth, that the deposed magistrates had connived at the safety of rebels, and murderers of soldiers; and Claverhouse was to punish all disturbances and church irregularities—pretty duty for a man of the sword!<sup>21</sup> Several commissions of this kind were granted, and David Graham, Claverhouse's brother, who "held courts in Galloway and Nithsdale," is accused of many severities.<sup>22</sup> Claverhouse's orders were to seize persons who would not go to church, and "a soldier only has his orders." As to Wodrow's tales of persons tortured by the soldiery, we do not find them in the contemporary 'Historical Notices' of Lord Fountainhall. We do find an appeal by Cheisley of Dalry (a murderer) against life-guardsmen who invaded his premises, and wounded him and his servants ("hamesucken"), to which the soldiers replied that they were requisitioning fodder, and were attacked by Cheisley. One guardsman was banished for life, the other was cashiered, and had to find sureties for good behaviour.<sup>23</sup> Thus soldiers could be checked, but Cheisley was a laird; the persons (anonymous usually) who are said to have been tortured were poor and powerless.

Claverhouse's letters, and a report by him, before the Committee of the Council, give his version of his proceedings. Galloway was in such a condition that, for many months, the Government "had looked on it as almost in a state of war, and it was thought unsafe for anything less than an army to venture into it." Claverhouse himself, a little later, had no apprehensions of a rising. But the flight of the Covenanters from Bothwell Bridge had left all their mounted men (some 2000, according to Russell) at large, with perhaps 3000 foot—men who were ready, in the Jacobite phrase, "to do't again." The escaped rebels of position, some 300 or 400, owning between 30,000 and 40,000 merks a year, were left undisturbed by Kenmuir and Vans Agnew, and other magistrates. "The churches were quite deserted,—no honest man, no minister, in safety."

Claverhouse first provided magazines of corn and fodder, and quartered on the rebels. His report (undated) is a summary. From his frequent letters to Queensberry, we learn that he was pained to find Kenmuir in relations with Barscobe. The inveterate rebel was living at home undisturbed. There should be a garrison at Kenmuir Castle, "a mighty strong place," standing on what looks like a very high artificial moat or mount, above the marshes, at the junction of Ken with Loch Ken. The house had suffered in Cromwell's time. Claverhouse meant to begin with rebels, accessories, and harbourers of these (such as John Brown, the Christian carrier, later shot), also to deal with field conventicles, or armed "demonstrations." What remains of the laws against the fanatics, he would try to enforce by threats "rather than severe execution." This means that he would enforce attendance at church,—as, indeed, the Kirk did by its officers, far into the eighteenth century. He had not so much as called at Freugh (forfeited to him), nor, apparently, had he drawn any profits therefrom. The Sanquhar exploit,—excommunication of the king and all,—had just been repeated at Lanark, and the town was fined.<sup>24</sup>

For dealing with such things, Claverhouse observed that it was usual "to put laws severely, against great and small, in execution, which is very just; but what effect does that produce, but more to exasperate and alienate the hearts of the whole body of the people? . . . in the greatest crimes it is thought wisest to pardon the multitude and punish the ringleaders." Claverhouse had called some parishes together, explained the existing state of the law, remarked that he, for one, had no wish to "enrich himself by their crimes," and advised them—to go to church. Resetters and ringleaders must expect no favour. This military beadle had some success; church was attended, but the ministers would soon unsettle the parishioners, "so mad are some of their wives." He asked for 100 dragoons, whom he would superintend "without any pay." "I should take horses here among the suffering sinners." If all failed, he must "do as others, and get as much money as I can (which I have not thought on yet), by putting the laws in execution" (March 1, 1682).<sup>25</sup>

Again he writes, "it will be of more consequence to punish one considerable laird" (he had the Dalrymples of Stair in his mind) "than a hundred little bodies. Besides it is juster." He caught the blacksmith of Minnigaff, who made the sharp steel hooks for cutting bridles; he resolved to hang the rebel armourer, as an example. Claverhouse, however, neither tried nor hanged the smith.<sup>26</sup> There were reports, not credited by Claverhouse, of a western rising. By March 25 he had taken the veteran Barscobe, of the Pentland and Bothwell Bridge risings. Barscobe submitted and was pardoned,—“offers, if he could get a remission, he would be active and useful to me in the business of the Glen Kens.”<sup>27</sup>

This hardened rebel had been living undisturbed in his lonely peel tower, where his arms, painted and carved, may be seen above the door. He shortly afterwards died,—was killed by extremists, says Law, in his ‘Memorials,’ and so says Glen Kens tradition. He certainly died in a brawl, but it seems to have been unpolitical; and medical evidence pointed to epilepsy as the cause of death. By April the churches were thronged, and all was orderly, “without having received a farthing money, or imprisoned anybody.” “I never saw people go more cavalierly from one extremity to another than this people does,” says Claverhouse.

His report to the Committee of Council adds details about the treatment of rebels. They were pursued, quartered on; their houses were seized, their goods ruined, “their wives and children brought to starving.” All this was done to make them renounce their designs of rising in arms, and to take the oath to live peaceably and accept safe-conducts. All lairds, but two or three, including Gordon of Earlstoun, “signed a bond much to that purpose,” but not the Test. This Earlstoun, a huge and noisy man, “the Bull,” dwelt in a little peel by the Ken, a mile or two above the clachan of Dalry where the Pentland Rising began. A wasted oak tree near the house is pointed out as his usual hiding place. Now it could not conceal a rook. The tenants might sign something equivalent to the Test, but not the Test itself, “by cause of their ignorance”! As for church-going, Claverhouse had made it almost universal. He had officially assured the people that “whatever their guilt was, if they gave obedience they need fear no great severity.” Obstinate lairds he imprisoned till they found security for their fines. He “actually brought in two outed disorderly ministers.” Galloway was peaceful, “the rebels are reduced without blood,” “the ministers” (conformist) “are in safety.”<sup>28</sup> This report is probably of the middle of May 1682. It certainly shows Claverhouse combining the offices of policeman and military beadle, or “kirk-officer,” but it does not present him as sanguinary or rapacious, the epithets conferred by Macaulay. After meeting Dalziel in Lanarkshire, he escaped in June from an alleged enterprise of Clydesdale Whigs, near the inn of “The Bille” (The Crook?) on upper Tweed.<sup>29</sup>

The Sir James Dalrymple of Stair, who is said to have included the Confession of 1567 as the Test, had been gently warned by Claverhouse to "walk warily." This Stair was author of the famous "Institutes of the Law of Scotland," and father of the author of the Glencoe massacre. His family had an interest in "regalities" and "hereditary jurisdictions," which might be compromised if their holders connived at the safety of rebels. Wodrow accuses Claverhouse, in August, of imprisoning and quartering on men merely because they were nonconformists, and would not promise to "live regularly" (whether this means to go to church, or to keep the peace and forswear rebellion).<sup>30</sup> The Bride of Lammermuir was the daughter of the elder Stair; unfortunately one man (Dr Hickeys), who heard her story from Stair's own lips, did not trust his memory, and declined to write it down. In his August raid at Glenluce, Claverhouse's jurisdiction collided with that of the younger Stair, Sir John Dalrymple. He derided Claverhouse's jurisdiction, and "offered him a sum of money not to meddle with that regality,"—so Claverhouse avers.<sup>31</sup> Failing here, and failing to thwart Claverhouse by proceedings in his own court, he found his factor and tenants heavily fined. The younger Stair brought charges against Claverhouse, who chose the offensive defensive strategy, and retorted with heavier accusations. Stair meant, he said, to stir up the people, and had behaved illegally and passionately. Claverhouse won his case, and was congratulated by Aberdeen,—“they wondered that he, not being a lawyer, had walked so warily in so irregular a country, while young Stair, though a lawyer . . . had exceeded his bounds, and had weakened the hands of his Majesty's authority” (February 12, 1683).<sup>32</sup> He was fined, and warded in the castle for a short time. His father went to Holland and intrigued, as Argyll was doing.

From his first arrival in Galloway (February 1682), Claverhouse had desired to make an example of a highly placed conniver at or shielder of rebels. He meant Stair, and, after gentle warnings, he carried through the policy of "Thorough." The lords of the Privy Council found Stair guilty of employing confessed harbourers of rebels as clerk and baillie of his jurisdiction, of imposing inadequate fines and not exacting them, of keeping people from appearing in Claverhouse's court, of falsely accusing Claverhouse of oppressions, and of other offences.<sup>33</sup> Young Stair's family, especially his awful mother, of whom tradition tells strange tales, were Whiggish, but it was his hereditary jurisdiction for which he was fighting. The Dalrymples never were loved in Scotland, and the Glencoe massacre, with the later attempts of a member of the family to assassinate the Chevalier de St. George, are not more glorious than the policeman's career of Claverhouse.

As an example of ferocities not in Claverhouse's jurisdiction, we might select the hanging of a woman named Christian Fyfe, because "she did beat the Rev. Mr Ramsay in the old Kirk at the ending of the sermon, and the reason was, she thought he was profaning the Sabbath." She disowned all authority—there was no honest minister in Scotland; she said that she went to church "not to beat a lawful minister, but one whom she thought a Judas and a devil." A reprimand of a humorous character would have been enough, but Christian was hanged. All this would be very terrible if correctly reported, but Christian was released as a lunatic rather than a fanatic: she was not hanged.

In November half the lairds in the Glen Kens, young Knocknalling, Holme, Overton, and many others, were sentenced, but Wodrow "thinks none of them were executed."

"Persecution" kept on running its course—that is, men suspected of accession to the Bothwell Bridge rising were hunted for, and, when taken, if they persisted in maintaining a rebellious attitude, were in many cases hanged. In May 1683 Claverhouse was placed on the Privy Council: in March and April he had been at Court in England, mainly busy about a claim to lands forfeited by Haltoun, which led to a quarrel between him and Aberdeen.<sup>34</sup> We find Claverhouse pressing (June 9) for the execution of a very slippery rebel, who tried to escape, he says, by aid of "a false sham certificate,"—the word "sham" was then new. "I am as sorry to see a man die, even a Whig, as any of themselves. But when one dies justly, for his own faults, and may save a hundred to fall in the like, I have no scruple."<sup>35</sup> Two other fellows were hanged for attacking a small party of guardsmen, killing one, and wounding another. The rebels suffered during a great Circuit through the disturbed districts.

At this time, the autumn of 1683, various circumstances produced greatly increased severities, culminating in martial law, which has been called "no law at all": it permitted, or rather enjoined, the shooting of suspicious persons who declined to own the king's authority, or to pronounce the Bothwell Bridge affair "rebellion." As we have seen, many denied that a rising "for the Gospel" was rebellion, and held themselves ready to repeat the action. The country was thus harassed by oaths, tests, and fines inflicted for even conversing with fugitive rebels, and for not denouncing them. Ladies, as Mrs Mure of Caldwell, were harshly used for merely hearing a minister preach in their own drawing-rooms, just as, long after 1688, the Duke of Hamilton was imprisoned for a similar offence in his own house. Not only peasants and tradesfolk, but gentlemen like Scott of Harden and many others, were heavily fined, often for the Presbyterian devoutness of the women of their families.

The causes which provoked an increase of persecution were the blending of the Russell and the Rye House Plots, in England, with the designs of the exiles in Holland and of Argyll, and the arrival from Holland of Mr James Renwick, to raise the standard that fell from the hands of Cameron. It not unusually happens that the respectable members of a suffering party are engaged in political intrigue, while the wilder members have a plot to assassinate some one, or to raise the rabble. Thus, after the Revolution, a plot to assassinate William III. coincided with the intrigues of Berwick and the excellent Lord Ailesbury, and, still later, Layer's plot became interwoven with Bishop Atterbury's. We thus find Monmouth, Lord Russell, Sidney, and others more or less in touch with Ramsay, Ferguson, and other would-be assassins, on one hand; and with Baillie of Jarviswoode, Argyll, the Rev. Mr Carstairs, an intimate of the Prince of Orange, on the other: and some of them were acquainted with the murder plot, while, through Renwick, who came back from Holland, more or less ordained, in the late summer of 1683, the organised "Societies" of Cameron's followers were in contact with the ramified discontents in England and Scotland. The trial of Earlstoun, in October 1683, threw no light on the Holland and other intrigues of the time; for Earlstoun, on the approach of the boot, "roared like a bull, and cried and struck about him so, that the hangman and his man durst scarce lay hands on him." He then swooned, and, reviving, accused Dalziel, whereon he was pronounced mad, and warded in the Bass, though he was only canny (November 23, 1683). Earlstoun had been examined already in July, when he implicated a few preachers and others, including Renwick. He probably told about as much as he knew.*

* S. P. Domestic, Charles II., vol. 427. Record Office. These papers contain nothing very important on the intrigues of Argyll and the rest.

On October 8, 1683, young Renwick was proclaimed for reviving field conventicles and for traitorous designs fostered in Holland.<sup>36</sup> Jerviswoode, Carstairs, and others mixed up with the Russell, Sidney, and Monmouth intrigues, were sent to Scotland to be tried. The irreconcilables appear to have shown themselves in the west, for (January 3, 1684) our old acquaintance, Sir James Turner, as well as Claverhouse and his brother, David Graham, were put on a commission to apprehend and try such persons.<sup>37</sup> Wodrow "scarcely thinks" that the commission at Dumfries (Claverhouse's) "would spare all who came before them," but he has no evidence on the matter, and only expresses a pious opinion.

In 1684 the Indulged ministers were again "outed," and many prisoners were sent to the American colonies. At this time Claverhouse should have been "in merry pin," like Lethington when in love, for he was wooing Lady Jane Cochrane, of the Dundonald family, which was Presbyterian and Whiggish. He was therefore accused, apparently by the Duke of Hamilton and others, of disloyalty. Sir John Cochrane (accused of betraying Richard Cameron) was in Baillie of Jerviswoode's plot. "He is a madman," wrote Claverhouse to Queensberry, "and let him perish,—they deserve to be damned who would own him" (May 19, 1684). "'Tis not in the power of love, or any other folly, to alter my loyalty."<sup>38</sup> "Had the young lady been right principled" (in the sense of the Covenanters) "she would never, in despite of her mother and relations, made choice of a persecutor, as they call me."

Meanwhile Queensberry and Aberdeen were at feud: Aberdeen had the worse of the quarrel, lost the seals, and was finally succeeded as chancellor by the Earl of Perth, who became a Catholic. On June 9 Claverhouse's wedding contract was signed, and on that very day an armed conventicle was found at the Blackloch, and Claverhouse had to leave his bride, and scour the mosses near Lesmahagow. "They might have let Tuesday pass," his wedding day, he writes.<sup>39</sup> But again he had to mount and ride, while old Dalziel insinuated, thinking of Drumclog, that "some people hazard small forces on very unequal terms." Dalziel anticipated a general rising, but Claverhouse (June 15) writes that "we have left no den, no knowe, no moss, no hill unsearched." There had been a slight skirmish with the royal foot; but, though Claverhouse "threatened terribly," he does not seem to have tried the effect of lighted matches between the fingers, or even to have flogged peasants to extort evidence, like King George's officers in 1746. These raids opened the honeymoon of "Black John of the Battles." In July the Covenanters had a success at the pass called the Enterkin, among the hills on the way to Edinburgh through Moffatdale. Some twenty-eight soldiers were conveying sixteen prisoners; they were fired at from an ambush, and lost several prisoners, and one or two of their own party.<sup>40</sup> Claverhouse was now appointed to the command of the forces in the west; but in August he took his bride to Dudhope, near Dundee, the spoils of the Lauderdale family, lost by them for Haltoun's peculations when Master of the Mint. Claverhouse was now Constable of Dundee, where he secured the commutation of the capital punishment on small pickers and stealers, there in prison. For the future, too, the cruelty which persisted so late in English law was to be abolished, thanks to "bloody Clavers."<sup>41</sup>

Efforts were still being made to unravel the part of Scottish malcontents in the intrigues for which, on the English side of the border, Sidney and Lord Russell died. The Scottish conspirators were, many of them, lairds in the peaceful glens of Tweed, Gala, Ettrick and Yarrow, such as Hume of Polwarth, Baillie of Jerviswoode (who suffered), and Murray of Philiphaugh. A laird declined to join an intrigue with the squires of such ominous names as "Hangingshaw," on Yarrow, and "Gallowshiels" (Gala). Lord Tarras and Philiphaugh confessed, betraying their associates, and evidence was wrung from Spence and Carstairs under torture. Fountainhall records (July 26, 1684) the torture of Spence, a retainer of the exiled Argyll. He did not deny that he could read the captured letters of Argyll in cypher (June 1683), but endured the boot and the odious "waking" (inflicted on witches, as on Father Ogilvie, S.J.) with manly resolution. Then he was tried with the thumb-screws, and was next offered the boot again. Like a Highlander of 1746, who bore a hundred lashes rather than betray Prince Charles, but gave some information when threatened with another hundred before the first wounds were healed, Spence finally lost heart—who can blame him?—and read "these hieroglyphic letters." To their contents we shall return. The sight of the horrors of torture was loathsome to Privy Councillors compelled to be present, whether in the reign of Charles II. or William III. Scott (in 'Old Mortality') represents Claverhouse as looking calmly on, in 1679, when he had nothing to do with the matter, not being of the Council, and Macaulay versifies from Burnet the "cruel eyes" of the Duke of York, "that dared to look on torture, but not to look on war."<sup>42</sup> Whether Burnet tells truth of the duke or not, we observe that torture was becoming a hateful spectacle to men. Nobody, like the lover in Molière, would have proposed the spectacle of torture as a treat to his lady. In earlier days we hear of no delicacy in the matter, whether Catholics or Protestants were being tormented.

Another victim of torture, Carstairs, gave Wodrow an account of his own conduct. He was mixed up in the intrigue with the notorious Shepherd and Ferguson the Plotter, who seems to have loved conspiring for its excitements, and he was arrested in Kent, being mistaken for Ferguson. After three months' detention in town he was sent for trial to Scotland, and languished in Edinburgh Castle for several months. He was known to be acquainted with the cyphers of the Argyll letters, but preferred torture to treachery. He also argued that, if accused in England, he should be tried by English law: in that case judicial torture would not have been administered.<sup>43</sup> This was overruled—illegally, it would seem—and he endured an hour and a half of the thumbikins, but not, as Macaulay erroneously said, of the boot. That was to be applied next day. He assured Wodrow that he and his Scottish associates had no murderous intentions; but he had certainly listened to Ferguson's proposals of murdering or seizing the king, which was sailing near the wind, as he continued to plot with Ferguson. Before he was put to the torture he was offered conditions—pardon, it seems—if he would speak out, and that "nothing I said should be used directly or indirectly against any man in trial that I should mention."<sup>44</sup> He rejected the conditions, and gallantly resolved to face the torment.

As we saw, on the sight of the boot, after an hour and a half of the thumb-screw, he faltered. What he confessed was used at Jerviswoode's trial as an "adminicle" of evidence against him. The position was that, when Carstairs shrank from a second infliction, he was offered "full pardon and remission," and "that he shall never be brought as witness against any person or judicatory, directly or indirectly, for anything contained in his answers." These are the chief parts of the conditions on which Carstairs capitulated and answered questions, and Wodrow prints them as "under the secretary's hand."<sup>45</sup> But many years later, shortly before his death in 1715, Carstairs stated the conditions thus in a letter to Wodrow: "no person was directly or indirectly to be mentioned in any trial as to that matter, nor anything in my depositions was to be adduced against any person; which condition was openly violated."<sup>46</sup> Principal Story, in his 'Life' of Carstairs, frankly remarks that "the engagement not to use his evidence against any accused party is not so distinctly expressed as his own report" (to Wodrow) "of his agreement with Melfort would have led us to expect."<sup>47</sup>

Whether Carstairs was absolutely straightforward or not, few, indeed, can presume to blame him. Jerviswoode was hanged on Christmas Eve, 1684. There was nothing in Carstairs's evidence as published to connect Jerviswoode with even knowledge of a plot to seize or kill the king: he was merely represented as nibbling at schemes "for rising in arms for rectifying the Government." Unluckily such schemes are regarded as treasonable by most Governments. Carstairs "heard the design of killing the king and duke from Mr Shepherd,* who told the deponent that some were full upon it." If Jerviswoode knew nothing about it, we shall see that Argyll, though absent in Holland, apparently knew very well. Jerviswoode left a last speech attributing his ruin to the faintness of his zeal for Protestantism. How still more furious zeal for Protestantism could have saved him, unless he had successfully conducted a revolution, is not apparent; but he denied that he had intended either the murder of the king and Duke of York, or "subversion of the Government"; only Carstairs puts it that "this unpleasant subject"—their plot—was not aimed at the persons of the royal brothers, or at "government by monarchy." What he intended may readily be conjectured. "Carstairs had some secrets of great consequence from Holland entrusted to him," says Burnet. The wind blew from the Dutch coast.<sup>48</sup> To bring in the Prince of Orange was neither to overthrow monarchy, as such, nor to murder Charles and James. But, whatever Argyll and Jerviswoode intended, their conduct was certainly treasonous.

As the Prince of Orange's hour had not yet come, the plans of Argyll and the other plotters were of the vaporous kind that cloud the dreams of exiles. They were not more coherent than most of the visions which amused the Jacobites of 1688-1786.

* This Shepherd told what he knew, on June 27, 1683. S. P. Dom. Charles II. vol. 426.

Argyll's letter to Major Holmes,* of June 21, deciphered by Spence, shows the state of affairs. Argyll had asked his accomplices in England to raise a sum of money, £30,000, and thought that 1000 horse would be needed for "the first brush" with the royal forces. Government had 1200 horse and 2000 foot, by way of an army in Scotland. These, when the rebellion began, would probably concentrate at Stirling, and would be aided by "all the heritors" or lairds, perhaps "50,000 men," though possibly half the number would hold back. This does not sound as if a rising was to the mind of the country. There was also the militia, 22,000 of all arms. Forces would come, too, from England and Ireland. Argyll's only hope, it is plain, was not in his clan, the Campbell claymores, but in "Browne," that is the Whig English peers.

He ends, very significantly, "some things are to be done to prevent the designs of enemies, that I dare not now mention, lest it should put them on their guard." If these phrases do not apply to a plot for murdering or seizing Charles and the Duke of York, no other interpretation was more likely to occur to the Government.<sup>49</sup> Moreover, Argyll speaks of "Mr Red" as a person whom he must consult with. Carstairs was "Mr Red," and Carstairs, through Shepherd, knew of the murder plot. Principal Story, defending Carstairs, admits that he "did not altogether withdraw from such intercourse with"—Ferguson, who sounded him about murder,—"as he deemed to be necessary in the interests of Argyll."<sup>50</sup> Meanwhile Argyll ("in the interests of Argyll") knew of "some things to be done to prevent the designs of enemies, that I dare not now mention, lest it should put them on their guard." Now Principal Story admits that Ferguson had managed, "by veiling the cowardly character of the scheme, to enlist the aid of some men of high character and principle to the extent of agreeing to an attack on the king's escort and seizure of his person."<sup>51</sup> The learned Principal is surprised by this "casuistry" among Whigs and Protestants! But to seize the king, and chance killing him, was simply the old Gowrie method, in Scotland, of changing the administration; and Argyll's letter can scarcely refer to anything else. Argyll's letter of June 21 was written while he clearly was not aware that, on June 12, the Rye House scheme had been betrayed. The distinction between a plot to kill, and a plot to seize a man of spirit with armed guards, is indeed casuistry of the most fine-spun tissue. Each party, when out of power, framed such plots; and to look on Whigs as more scrupulous than Jacobites is to evince great lack of humour, and keen partisanship.

* Holmes was examined in the Gate House, on June 29, 1683. S. P. Dom. Charles II. vol. 426. He said that Lord Grey was to lend Argyll £10,000 towards a rising in Scotland.

What the conspirators really had in view, if they did seize the king, is uncertain. Some hoped that Monmouth, like Absalom, would head a rising against his own father, "of which no particular method was laid down."

If the king and duke had been got rid of, then, failing Monmouth and the Duke of Hamilton, the Prince of Orange seems the likeliest person to profit by the plot; and Carstairs never, even after 1688, told the secret of the Dutch Court which he possessed in 1683-84. He wrote to Wodrow shortly before his death that the whole affair was "an unpleasant subject," and he did not exaggerate.<sup>52</sup> Taking everything into account, the long smouldering conspiracies and the renewed eccentricities of the hill folk, or extreme Cameronians, it is plain that human wisdom could not now have saved the Dynasty, that is, considering the religion of the Duke of York, the next heir to the throne, which was, after all, the main cause of the crisis. The dread of Popery was the strongest emotion of the vast majority of both nations; with the death of Charles II. the new king must, at the very least, insist on toleration, no Catholic king with a rag of honesty could do less, and once grant even toleration, and "then are we all gone!"

The result of the stormy state of the country was the beginning of "the Killing Time" strictly so called. It cannot be denied that the Government had good cause to look to its own safety, when a plot to murder was interwoven with two plans for armed risings, and with the arrival of Renwick from Holland, full of zeal, and breathing forth threats of organised assassination. Yet in a work from which more people have learned Scottish history than from any other—Scott's 'Tales of a Grandfather'—the worst deeds of "the Killing Time" are introduced before the causes of that cruel period of repression are indicated, and the main cause, the threats of Renwick, is omitted. The repression shocked a politician not famous for mildness. Claverhouse himself objected to a bond making landholders responsible for harbouring or comforting of fugitives by their people. "It is unjust to desire of others what we would not do ourselves; for I declare I think it a thing not to be desired, that I should be forfeited and hanged, if my tenant's wife, twenty miles from me, in the midst of hills and woods, give meat or shelter a fugitive" (October 30, 1684).<sup>58</sup> Those about Renwick, in 1684, declared war, in their apologetical declaration (October 15-28). This document is attributed by Wodrow to their "General Society," for they were now organised. They disowned the royal authority of Charles, "and all authority depending upon him;" they explain that they are at war "with all in civil or military powers who make it their work to imbrue their hands in our blood, or by obeying such commands," including "viperous and malicious bishops and curates," and all witnesses who appear when summoned to courts of justice in such cases. They pretend to have courts of their own to judge offences against them.

"We are a people by holy Covenants dedicated unto the Lord,"<sup>54</sup> and, as Cromwell told the preachers, "there is such a thing as a Covenant with Death and Hell,"—a Covenant after Cameron's own heart, to begin the war of No Quarter in Scotland, and carry fire to the gates of Rome. The declaration was to be fixed on market crosses and church doors. Wodrow attributes the "forming" of the paper to Renwick, who "was forced to go in with them to keep peace, as far as might be, among themselves." "And in prosecution of this" declaration, writes Fountainhall, "some of those ruffians fell in, at Suin Abbey, beside Blaikburn in west Lothan, and murdered Thomas Kennoway and Duncan Stewart, two of the king's Life-guard, in a most barbarous manner."<sup>55</sup> On December 12 the conformist minister of Carsphairn, in a lonely part of Galloway, was murdered. Kennoway is represented as a peculiarly oppressive ruffian and robber, and Mr Peirson of Carsphairn as not only serviceable to the authorities, but a defender of the doctrine of purgatory. The Privy Council, however, being irritated and alarmed by Renwick's declaration of war, and by the acts of war which followed, "give out a terrible commission," and "agree upon the bloody orders to murder in the fields all who should not expressly disown the aforesaid declaration."<sup>56</sup> One act of war was an attack on the town of Kirkcudbright, by a hundred and eight men, who broke open the prisons, and carried away such arms as they could seize. (Reported by Dalziel and others to Queensberry, December 18, 1684.)<sup>57</sup>

On December 20 Claverhouse's report came in: he had discovered and shot five skulkers, and taken three prisoners. The strange hallucinations of showers of blood and blue bonnets and swords falling in open places, are reported by Fountainhall,<sup>58</sup> and by Patrick Walker, who was present but saw nothing unusual. As for Claverhouse's success, Mr Napier has dealt with Wodrow's account of it, averring that one of the victims, James Macmichan, is the James Macmichael who, according to Wodrow, had just pistoled the Rev. Mr Peirson.<sup>59</sup> By Wodrow's account Claverhouse fired on and killed four out of six people "who were lurking and hiding, for what I can find they had no arms." Fountainhall (December 20, 1684) says that Claverhouse reports having "met with a party of these rogues who had skulked," killed five and taken three, "some of which were of the murderers of the minister of Carsphairn."<sup>60</sup> Space does not permit a criticism of all the evidence as to outrages; but, in this case, contemporary signed evidence seems better than Wodrow's anonymous "accounts" given long after date. Fountainhall notes (October 1684) even a more hideous trait of the times. Marion Purdie, a beggar woman in Edinburgh, had been accused of many acts of witchcraft. Mackenzie, the Lord Advocate, "gave no great notice to such informations against witches," and the unhappy Marion was allowed "to die of cold and hunger in prison about Christmas." The godly had no pity on witches, and Wodrow was of their mind.

Claverhouse's own report of his doings is not in the Queensberry papers. He no longer wrote to that newly made duke, whose title he had pleaded for at Court. Queensberry's brother, Colonel Douglas, was a martinet, who impounded his men's pay to purchase for them new cravats and ribbons, though he also tried to keep them sober.<sup>61</sup> On December 11, at the Council, Claverhouse defended some soldiers whom Douglas had cashiered, and whose arrears of pay he had used for clothing his regiment. Queensberry resented this, and the "warmth" of Claverhouse; and, after James II. came to the throne, had Claverhouse dismissed from the Council, for a few weeks only. But the military continued to act on the decision of the Lords of Council and the Judges; that for any one to refuse to abjure Renwick's declaration of war was to be "guilty of high treason," and, by decree of the Council, such men should be "immediately shot before two witnesses," by order of "the person or persons having commission from the Council for that effect."<sup>62</sup> The abjuration of Renwick's declaration of war, and erection of courts to try enemies of the Covenanters, does not seem a test very difficult to take, and it says nothing about religion, for the declaration was only to be abjured "in so far as it declares war against his sacred Majesty, and asserts that it is lawful to kill all those who are employed by his Majesty." Now to abjure the infamous declaration which Wodrow quotes from a paper in Renwick's own hand, might seem rather a pleasure than a duty to a Christian.

Suppose that any one denied (as some did deny) that the declaration was correctly described in the abjuration, then he who took the abjuration committed himself to nothing. The abjuration, says Sheilds, who took it, and repented, was "universally unscrupled, even by the generality of great professors and ministers too."<sup>63</sup> Sheilds, and others like him, devoted themselves to hair-splitting. On the whole, to abjure would be to enter on "an elective confederation with these wicked usurping judges," who audaciously imputed to the Renwickites that they "asserted murderous principles," which the friends of Renwick's document denied that they did hold. For, first, they did not threaten to take off "all who serve the king," but only "bloody" persons who serve the king. Sheilds has forty closely printed pages full of these flimsy sophistries to beguile the innocent, and it was this odious declaration, with the entangled scrupulosities of the preachers, that led to the martyrdom of Margaret Wilson and Margaret M'Lauchlan. Claverhouse was not present when the Council passed their decision; he did not scruple to act on his orders. Meanwhile, honest men were in a sad case. If they obeyed the law when summoned as witnesses against the saints, they came within the jurisdiction of Renwick's courts; and, if they took the abjuration of Renwick's paper, they found "the western phanatiques very insolent"; while, if they did not take the abjuration, they might be shot out of hand.<sup>64</sup>

Wodrow represents Douglas, Queensberry's brother, as surprising "six persons at prayer," and shooting them, merely because "they were upon their hiding and at prayer." His authorities do not say whether the abjuration was offered, nor does he tell us what authorities lay before him. His date is January 23, 1685. But Fountainhall, under January 1685, avers that Douglas, with eight or ten soldiers, met a small party of rebels, who killed two of his men, and Captain Urquhart, Meldrum's brother, "and had very nearly shot Douglas himself dead, had not the Whig's carbine misgiven, whereon Douglas pistoled him presently." Urquhart was buried in Edinburgh: he fell near Minnigaff in Galloway.<sup>65</sup> Fountainhall was a contemporary, a judge; Wodrow's authorities are undated, and anonymous. We can thus easily estimate the value of Wodrow's account.<sup>66</sup>

On February 6, 1685, died Charles II., and the usual foolish talk about poison was rife. The king, by temperament, was the reverse of saintly; his unchecked boyhood in the great war, his Bohemian life of wandering adventure in exile, and the utter ruin of his character under the pressure of the Covenanters and Argyll, had left him a man with few virtues except good nature, personal courage, and scientific interests. Yet Lord Ailesbury's "good king" was sincerely loved and lamented by many, and, despite his Scottish experiences of the Covenanters, he was of milder mood towards them than most of his advisers. Had he but visited Scotland, and seen for himself with his own eyes, the country would have been better governed. But to the Covenanters he was but one of the worst of "the treacherous and lecherous House of Stuart," epithets thoroughly deserved by the great wit who, if not born to a crown, might have been happy as the playwright of such a troop as Molière's Théâtre Illustré. His brother had no charm—even the loyal Ailesbury could not love him, and had a fatal remnant of honesty where the religion that conquered him by satisfying his intellect was concerned. James II. was no mere dullard; the Duke of Wellington and a celebrated Field Marshal of our own day have pronounced him a most lucid writer on military subjects. But the obstinacy, the want of good faith, the fanatical belief in his own prerogative of James II., with what must be called his cruelty in success, and his strange loss of the courage which he once possessed, brought shame and ruin on himself, and misery on his unfortunate descendants, the kings "over the water."

James promised to maintain religion as by law established: he never was crowned at Scone, and took no Scottish coronation oath, and so, at the Convention of April 1689, was denounced as no king de jure. Despite a more or less illusory Indemnity, the war against the refusers to abjure Renwick's abjuration went on, and the recalcitrants were shot. Grierson of Lag, the model of Scott's Redgauntlet, acquired a diabolical reputation which his subsequent existence of some fifty years did not outlive. It is impossible here to analyse all Wodrow's accounts of shooting in the fields. His information is apt to fail him when we ask, Why were the men shot? On the celebrated case of the Christian carrier, John Brown of Priesthill, slain by order of Claverhouse, who reports the fact to Queensberry on May 3, 1685, much has been written.<sup>67</sup> The shooting was well within the terms of the Act of Council; the man had arms, treasonable papers, refused to acknowledge royal authority, and, as was proved after his death, was harbouring a rebel red-handed from an attack on the king's soldiers. But, whatever doubt may cloud other points, the man was shot before the eyes of his wife, though he might easily have been sent to any justiciary—Claverhouse at that time was not of the Privy Council. In this particular the behaviour of Claverhouse seems beyond palliation, while his conduct to Brown's nephew, described with his usual careless candour, may, to many, seem only to deepen the stain upon his name.

Claverhouse was not concerned in the drowning of Margaret M'Lauchlan and Margaret Wilson near Wigtown (May 11, 1685). These women were aged, Margaret Wilson eighteen (or twenty-three), Margaret M'Lauchlan or Lauchlison sixty-three (or, on the evidence of her own fellow parishioners, eighty). From 1687 onwards, we find brief notices that women, "some" of extreme age, "some" very young, were drowned by the persecutors. Renwick and Shields, who published these notices, here apparently lied; only one old and one young woman were drowned. Not till 1714 do we get two accounts of the circumstances with any detail; these two accounts of 1714 vary, as do the narratives taken in February 1711, in the parishes of Kirkinner and Penninghame. Wodrow combined the story given in 'A Cloud of Witnesses' (1714) with that of the Penninghame record. Patrick Walker seems to have followed the narrative in 'Popery Reviving' (1714), and he garnished it with the oaths of the persecutors, omitting some beautiful utterances elsewhere attributed to the younger sufferer.

In these circumstances, as the record of the assize at which the women were tried by jury has perished, we cannot pretend to know the exact truth of this inexplicable affair. No women were to be examined, the Privy Council had decreed, who had not been active in a special manner "in these courses," and they, if found guilty, were to be drowned—an old Scottish punishment for high treason, and more merciful than the English punishment of burning, as in the case of Elizabeth Gaunt, burned in 1685.

We know nothing of special activity by the two women martyrs. We hear (Wodrow, Penninghame Kirk Session's Report) that Gilbert Wilson was a prosperous farmer or yeoman, a conscientious Episcopalian, as was his wife. We are told that his three children, Margaret, Thomas, and Agnes, deserted their parents when "yet scarce of the age that made them obnoxious to the law," and "fled to the hills, bogs, and caves" to avoid their father's form of religion. In 1685, after their flight, they were aged, Margaret, eighteen, Thomas sixteen, Agnes, thirteen. The most fanatical field preacher might have insisted that these babes should leave their life in caves, and the society of armed men whom they must have met, and should be restored to their most unhappy parents. However, they were left to the lessons of the partisans of Renwick's murderous declaration, and to the preachers of "Blood," and "No Quarters," with the natural results. Early in 1685, it seems, for dates are absent, the two Wilson girls and the old Mrs. M'Lauchlan were arrested in Wigtown, why we do not know, some say for refusing to drink the king's health with one Patrick Stewart. They were imprisoned, and (on April 13, 1685) were all three tried by a jury, before Grierson of Lag, Major Winram, Captain Strachan, and David Graham, sheriff of the county. All three were found guilty, and condemned to die by drowning. So Wodrow and Penninghame: as to the two women, 'A Cloud of Witnesses' avers that little Agnes was not condemned, or even tried, but released on bail of £100, and Wodrow and the Penninghame record admit that she was released on bail after being condemned.

On April 30 the lords of the Council bade the secretaries of state ask for the royal pardon, and command the magistrates of Edinburgh not to proceed to the execution of sentence till a day left blank. This, Wodrow says, was then regarded as "a material pardon." The elder martyr had petitioned and asked leave to take the abjuration, "I being most justly condemned to die . . . for my not disowning that traitorous apologetical declaration," which she had not read. On this showing, that refusal to abjure was the solitary ground of her condemnation. The old woman could not write, and the words are the form of the attesting notary, William Moir. A petition must also have come from Margaret Wilson, and, in that case, we may presume that she signed it, as she was able to write to her friends a long letter of reasons for not abjuring the murderous declaration of Renwick. No entry in the Register of Privy Council records the withdrawal of the reprieve, or the granting or refusal of pardon.

Before the royal intentions could have reached Edinburgh, and thence been conveyed to Wigtown, the old and the young woman were drowned, apparently in the estuary of the Blednoch water close to Wigtown. The details are variously reported, and it was denied in 1703, by a writer credited with full knowledge, that the women were tied to stakes. The same witness says that, if ever the circumstances are published, men "will not be very hasty to exclaim against the then governors." What the alleged palliating circumstances may have been we cannot guess,—indeed, no account but Wodrow's hints at the reprieve, which Wodrow only discovered after writing his narrative, and did not publish in full, omitting the remark which seemed to show that the women were, or were by the Council expected to be, in Edinburgh. Why the women were drowned at Wigtown, in the circumstances, is a puzzle. If their petitions were forged for them, or if, having consented to abjure, they "relapsed," the authorities at Wigtown, as Wodrow suggests, may have acted on powers which they did not possess, and so were "deeply guilty."

The accounts of this abominable crime, apparently so motiveless, in the case of a young girl and an old woman, agree in declaring that the elder sufferer was drowned first, that the younger refused to be terrified by her fate; that she herself was dragged out nearly inanimate, and persuaded to say something like "God save the king, if it be his will"; that either Winram or Grierson of Lag (in Walker's account) offered her the abjuration; that she refused it, and was thrust below the water. There are different accounts of her singing psalms and reading the eighth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, and of her dying words, "I am Christ's." Such discrepancies also occur in the evidence as to the death of Jeanne d'Arc, taken some twenty-five years after the event. The Penninghame evidence of 1711 is twenty-six years after the event. On the whole, it seems probable that death was inflicted by ducking, as in the swimming of witches. Some facts cannot be disputed: first, the horror of a crime that would soil "the calendar of hell"—a crime never punished by man; next, the courage which places Margaret Wilson in the white sisterhood of Jeanne d'Arc; and, finally, the infamy of the fanatic preachers or leaders who lured children into the wilderness to entangle them with sophistries rejected by the honourable Presbyterians of Scotland. The ministers, we learn from Sheilds, taught the people to flee from Renwick; when he was hanged "the ministers generally said, that though he might die in Christ, yet he died not for him, nor as a Presbyterian." 68

In almost all modern popular books on Covenanting times, this matter of Renwick's declaration of murder, and the nature of the counterstroke, the abjuration of that declaration in so far as that paper asserts the right to murder, are left designedly vague. They are stated, but lost sight of, in a work of 1903.<sup>69</sup> We find a brief account of Renwick's career, but therein not a word concerning his "Apologetical Declaration" of murder in October-November 1684. That declaration, however, had already been described by the author (without being attributed to Renwick, and with circumstances quite erroneous) as "a good-bye to meekness and gentleness," as if these qualities had marked the previous preachers of "Blood and No Quarters." "Perhaps the vehement and volcanic sentences ought not to have been penned." Perhaps not. But when we reach the martyrdom at Wigtown, we learn that the sufferers died for no "little matter." "It was a fringe of Christ's royal robe, and in their hands no harm, however apparently trifling, must befall the seamless vesture of their Monarch."<sup>70</sup> A "vehement and volcanic" "good-bye to meekness and gentleness" has become a fringe of the raiment of the Divine Sufferer! It was not so regarded by the contemporary Presbyterians of Scotland, who have no lot or part in the anarchist documents of Renwick's party.

The simple truth declared as such by Shields, Renwick's admirer and biographer, as by a recent historian, no friend of the "Praying Societies," is that "these hunted wanderers fell back on a doctrine which had been asserted by Scottish Presbytery when in the zenith of its powers . . . this, in substance, had been the teaching of Andrew Melville and before him of Knox."<sup>71</sup> Shields quotes Knox in corroboration, when Knox justifies resistance to tyranny, which needs no justification; what needs justification is organised murder. This Knox applauded, as in the case of Riccio, and clamoured for a Phineas to stab the idolater. Isolated Covenanters had acted on this doctrine, when private men had "a call from the Lord" to kill the ungodly. The declaration of Renwick was as official as "the Societies" could make it, and into this were expressed the last dark drops of the Lord's peculiar people in Scotland.

The penman of the party at once denied that they approved of murder, and also admitted that "some private persons, with the consent of the brethren of their community . . . did put forth their hand, as they found opportunity, to execute judgment. . . . They saw no other way possible than to put them to death, who had so forfeited their lives to justice, when there was no access to public justice." 72 Every anarchist who fires a bomb in a crowd, or stabs a woman because she is crowned, regards himself as "executing judgment"; but no anarchist, perhaps, has ever yet associated with his justice the name of Him who wore the seamless raiment. The Renwickian fanatics disclaimed the murder of Mr Peirson, and excluded the actors (several of whom seem to have been shot) from their communion. Apparently this murder was not the right sort of murder. 73

By these impudent sophistries the minds of innocent rustics were debauched; again, they would not take the apparently harmless abjuration, because it was "homologating" the authority of the king who had renounced the Covenant, or of the king who was an idolater. Such persons—girls, crones, ploughboys—were, as a rule, quite harmless; they were only misled by men like Renwick and Sheilds. They were shot down in the fields of Galloway and the south-west corner of Scotland for the sake of consciences perplexed by Cameronian casuistry. Their blood is on the heads of the casuists, as well as of the Council; and the posthumous honours of their tombs, with rhyming epithets, are certainly due to their dauntless courage. But, as regards the abjuration, they did not die for the religion of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland; and the Government which now imposed oaths to the king, or against the declaration, merely imitated the Government which had made swearing to the Covenant compulsory.

The April–May shootings coincided with the new steps of Argyll, and the Lowland exiles (Hume of Polwarth, Sir John Cochrane, Balfour and another murderer of Sharp, with Rumbold of the Rye House conspiracy) towards the invasion of Scotland. Preachers had been sent from Holland to stir up the Remnant, and the Council was well acquainted with the facts.

At the same time Parliament met in Edinburgh, on April 28. The House "will offer such laws" as may best secure the king and his family and administration, and will be "exemplarily loyal." The Chancellor denounced "a new sect, sprung up from the dung-hill and the dregs of the people . . . who kill by pretended inspiration." The Renwickites, in fact, had few or none of the Presbyterian gentry in their ranks, though some of their womenkind were devoted to young Renwick. The kingdom was to be "put in a posture of defence" (April 28), and the lieges to be ready in a fortnight. An Act was passed inflicting on witnesses who refused to depone, as to treason and conventicles, the punishment due to those who were actually guilty. If they did depone, then they had the fear of Renwick's private courts before their eyes. Owing of the Covenants was made treasonable, "an overt act of treason against heaven," says Wodrow. Husbands were made liable for the fines of their pious wives, and (May 8) all preachers and hearers at conventicles were decreed punishable by death and confiscation. Conventicles are described as "the nurseries and rendezvouses of rebellion." In some cases they deserved the title, but obviously not in all. The law applied even to small gatherings in private houses, but does not seem to have been carried out in action. By way of supply £216,000 was voted yearly to James for life.

All this is said to have "awakened people out of their slumber and security"; though Argyll, when he landed, found them fast asleep. The Act imposing the test was voted not to be applicable to women, thanks to the Bishops of Ross and Dunblane, as against Lauderdale, Eglintoun, and Linlithgow. Catholics, too, were relieved from the test, which must not be confused with the abjuration of Renwick's declaration. Cochrane, Polwarth, and other conspirators were forfeited. No Parliamentary approval was given to the edict of Council for shooting non-abjurants at sight. Clauses were to be inserted in leases binding tenants to orderly behaviour, as some lairds, in 1638, bound tenants to have family worship, "and to bear witness against the sins of their neighbours," and the like,—a practice which Wodrow wished to see revived.<sup>74</sup> An Act of Security for officers of State against all complaints for acting in his Majesty's service was passed on June 4. Breaking into and robbing the houses of conformist clergy was made a capital offence, and the Act seems to show that this pious practice was not unusual. It might easily have reached the pitch of "hamesucken," which was already a capital crime. "Since the Revolution, Presbyterian ministers required no such Act," but it would have been useful to Episcopalian ministers who were "rabbed."

In short, judging by Parliament, a king never had a more loyal country. And James might have had such Parliaments, and non-conformists might have endured such laws, if he had not made the fatal error of "licking up the vomit of toleration," as Mr Guthrie warned Charles II. not to do. Conceivably even his interest in protecting his innocent Catholic subjects might have passed, if his proceedings, especially in England, had not shown that he was bent on something far beyond toleration. Hoc nocuit.<sup>57</sup>

---

NOTE TO CHAPTER XIII.

The Case of John Brown.

THE story of the shooting of John Brown of Priesthill in Muirkirk parish has been much discussed. Wodrow heard his praises as of a devout man, addicted to the instruction of the young, "from people of sense and credit yet alive, who knew him." He owned or farmed a small piece of land, was a carrier, and appears in a list of harbourers and rebels in 1684. "He was in no way obnoxious to the Government, except for not hearing the Episcopal ministers," says Wodrow; yet "he had been a long time upon his hiding." A man so devout and peaceable might have been expected to abjure those parts of Renwick's declaration which declared war by murder, and no law inflicted summary capital punishment for staying away from church. He was carting peats one day, near his house, when Claverhouse, "whether he had got any information of John's piety and nonconformity I cannot tell," seized Brown. Wodrow "could not find" that the abjuration oath was offered to him. He was allowed to pray before being shot for his piety, and his eloquence so moved three troops of dragoons that "not one of them would shoot him." Claverhouse, "in a pet," did what was necessary with his own hand, before the eyes of Mrs Brown (herself about to be a mother) and of "a young infant standing by." The woman had "vainly tried tears and entreaties," and the deed finished, said, "Well, sirs, you must give an account of what you have done." The bloody Claverhouse replied, "To man I can be answerable, and, for God, I'll take Him into mine own hand."<sup>1</sup>

Wodrow gives no authority; and the story, if true, came from Mrs Brown, the young infant, the three troops of mutinous dragoons, or the guides of the dragoons through the mosses. Macaulay follows Wodrow, but says that the soldiers refused to shoot, not because of the moving nature of Brown's prayer, but in pity for Mrs Brown.<sup>2</sup> This motive Macaulay invented of his own will and fantasy.

Patrick Walker mentions Brown's marriage, in 1682, "upon Isabel Wier," and tells how Mr Peden prophesied Brown's bloody end. In early May 1685, Mr Peden stayed a night with Brown, and, on leaving, remarked that it was "a dark misty morning." About 5.30 A.M. next day, Brown, after family prayers, was going to the peat moss, when "bloody cruel Claverhouse" surrounded him with three troops of horse, and brought him back to his house. There he examined Brown, and asked his guides if Brown had ever preached. They replied no, but he had prayed much. He bade Brown pray before death, but thrice interrupted him. Brown took a touching farewell of his wife, with her child in her arms and her step-child, by Brown's first wife, standing by. Claverhouse then bade six soldiers fire, and Brown's brains were scattered on the ground. He brutally taunted the poor woman, and made the speech about taking God in his own hands.

<sup>1</sup> Wodrow, iv. 244, 245.

<sup>2</sup> Macaulay, i. 388 (1866).

She gathered her husband's brains and tied up his head, and straightened his body, and covered him with her plaid, and sat down and wept over him—it being “a very desert spot, where never victual grew, and far from neighbours.” She was comforted by an old woman, Jean Brown (elsewhere Walker calls her Elizabeth Menzies), one of whose sons, Thomas Weir, fell at Drumclog, while another, David Steel, was “shot when taken.” Whether this old woman's maiden name was Brown or Menzies, she must apparently have had a son by a husband named Weir, and another by a husband named Steel.

Walker does not say why Claverhouse had Brown shot; he does not say that it was merely for his nonconformity and piety. But he says that Mrs Brown (calling her by her maiden name, Weir), sitting on her husband's grave, told him that she never fainted or felt confused, though “her eyes dazzled when the shots were let off.” This is excellent evidence for Mrs Brown's presence, and that she was present is attested in works of 1690, 1691, and 1693, in identical terms, but without any details or any account of why Brown was shot. The same brief entry is quoted in ‘A Cloud of Witnesses’ (1714). But the ‘Cloud’ gives lines from Brown's epitaph which are not in Patrick Walker's version, though, if he stood beside Mrs Brown at her husband's grave, he might have copied—

Butchered by Claver'se and his bloody band, Raging most rav'nously o'er all the land.

The evidence of Walker and Wodrow is, of course, very late, being published thirty years and more after the occurrence. There are traces of confusion, for the story told of the shooting of Brown—refusal of the soldiers to fire, compliance of less scrupulous Highlanders, the brains and bones of the skull collected by the widow—is also told of David Steel, son of Jean Brown, or Elizabeth Menzies, mentioned by Walker as the comforter of Mrs Brown and mother of David Steel. The melancholy narrative is printed by W. MacGavin, Esq., editor of ‘Scots Worthies’ (1831), and is derived from “a MS. composed from the oral accounts of some of the descendants of the said John Steel,” a cousin of David Steel. The oppressor is not Claverhouse but Crichton.<sup>1</sup> On the whole, it seems certain that the Steels borrowed the story of Walker about Brown, not that Walker attributed to Brown a tale originally told about Steel.

Claverhouse's own account of the incident is contemporary, being dated May 3, 1685, in a letter to Queensberry. He says that last Friday he chased two fellows in the mosses, “a great way.” The eldest, John Brown, refused to abjure Renwick's declaration of war, and so, under the orders of the Council, should be shot. He would not promise not to rise in arms, “but said he knew no king.” Claverhouse took him to his house and searched it—bullets, match, and “treasonable papers” were found. “I caused shoot him dead, which he suffered very unconcernedly.”

It was not, then, for mere piety that Brown was shot. The other man, Brown's nephew, “John Brownen,” was ready to take the oath, but would not swear (which proves his respect for an oath) that he had not been in a recent attack and rescue of prisoners at New Mills. According to a tradition in the ‘New Statistical Account’ (v. 838), one Browning had been in arms at Airs Moss, and also at the attack on New Mills. In any case, Claverhouse says, “I did not know what to do with him. I was convinced that he was guilty, but saw not how to proceed against him.” So, when the carabines were presented, Claverhouse promised to spare him for the time, “and plead for him,” if he would make an ingenuous confession. So he confessed to having come straight from the attack on New Mills to his uncle's, John Brown's, house. Meanwhile the soldiers found "a house in the hill, under ground," with swords and pistols in it, the property of Brown.

<sup>1</sup> ‘Scots Worthies,’ i. 566-568.

"Brownen" gave abundance of useful information about armed rebels, and Claverhouse adds, "I have acquitted myself when I have told Your Grace the case." The young fellow had only been in arms for a month or two, Claverhouse added, "and if Your Grace thinks he deserves no mercy, justice will pass on him, for I, having no commission of justiciary myself, have delivered him up to the Lieutenant-General, to be disposed of as he pleases."

This pleading is not passionate, but Claverhouse was on the worst terms with Queensberry. We now see why Brown was "long on his hiding," as Wodrow says. He was a rebel. The mode of getting information out of "Brownen" is less legal than the shooting of Brown. As to "Brownen," Claverhouse, having no justiciary, handed him over, as he says, to Drummond, the Lieutenant-General.

Brownen, or Browning, was, I think, Walker's "John Binning," Sheilds's "John Buening," an obvious misprint, who, with four others, had a soldier jury, and the rope, at Mauchline on May 5, May 6, 1685, under Drummond. Brunen, or Buening, or Binning is clearly the "Bruning" of the gravestone to the memory of these five sufferers—

"Bloody Dumbarton, Douglas, and Dundee, Moved by the devil and the Laird of Lee,
Dragged these five men to death by gun and sword."

If "Brownen" is Brunen, Buening, Bruning, and Binning, Walker was misinformed, for he says that the Highlanders took Binning "waiting upon cattle without stocking or shoe." On the other hand, Browning, or Buening, or Bruning, or Binning was, obviously enough, the John Brownen whom Claverhouse was to hand over to Drummond, and under Drummond, Bruning, Binning, or Buening suffered two days later. Neither Wodrow nor Walker, nor any of the authors of 1690, 1691, 1693, and 1714, says a word of John Brown's nephew. As Walker and Wodrow omit so much that Claverhouse tells at the time of the occurrences, we do not know what is true in the stories they tell, while Claverhouse does not. It is only certain that John Brown was shot, in the presence of his wife, for refusing to abjure Renwick's declaration of war, and for possessing bullets, match, and treasonable papers. After his death (a few minutes) he was found to own swords, pistols, and a hiding place, and to be harbouring a red-handed rebel. He did not die for "his piety and nonconformity."

The Rev. John H. Thomson, in his popular edition of the 'Cloud,' gives the Steel variant of the Brown story, in all its pathetic details; neither noting Crichton's absolutely different version nor the improbability that exactly the same events occurred in the cases of both martyrs.

In preparing this note, I have used Mr Hay Fleming's 'Saints of the Covenant' (in which the identity of Binning, Buening, Brownen, Bruning, and Browning is not recognised) and 'The Despot's Champion,' with Napier. Mr Hay Fleming writes that though Claverhouse's letter of May 3, 1685, is contemporaneous, "it does not follow that all the details he gives are perfectly reliable"; which details are not "perfectly reliable" the critic does not say. That Wodrow's and Walker's details are the reverse of trustworthy, in omission if not in commission, seems highly probable, as they are late authorities, and in places contradictory, though resting clearly on one story, told also of David Steel and Crichton. Crichton himself tells a totally different story of the end of Steel, and we may be sure that the Steel legend, given by Mr J. H. Thomson, is a myth.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER XIII.

- <sup>1</sup> Wodrow, iii. p. 224.
- <sup>2</sup> Carstairs was the father of "Cardinal Carstairs," and much disliked his habit of conspiracy.
- <sup>3</sup> 'Six Saints of the Covenant,' ii. pp. 53, 209, 210; Wodrow, iii. pp. 279-283.
- <sup>4</sup> 'Six Saints of the Covenant,' ii. pp. 58, 211.
- <sup>5</sup> "The Stoic's Address to the Fanatics," cited by Principal Story, 'William Carstairs,' p. 90.
- <sup>6</sup> Wodrow, iii. pp. 290, 291, note.
- <sup>7</sup> Argyll's Defence, Wodrow, iii. pp. 317-322, note.
- <sup>8</sup> James to Dartmouth. Burnet, ii. p. 301, note.
- <sup>9</sup> Burnet, ii. p. 307, note.
- <sup>10</sup> Wodrow, iii. pp. 296, 297; Burnet, ii. p. 311.
- <sup>11</sup> Wodrow, iii. pp. 298, 299.
- <sup>12</sup> Wodrow, iii. p. 309, note.
- <sup>13</sup> Wodrow, iii. p. 317, note.
- <sup>14</sup> Wodrow, iii. p. 318.
- <sup>15</sup> 'Historical Notices,' ii. p. 762.
- <sup>16</sup> Burnet, ii. p. 319, note.
- <sup>17</sup> Burnet, ii. pp. 320, 321.
- <sup>18</sup> 'The Despot's Champion,' p. 101.
- <sup>19</sup> Burnet, ii. p. 323.
- <sup>20</sup> Burnet, ii. pp. 323, 324, and notes.
- <sup>21</sup> Wodrow, iii. p. 370, note; Claverhouse's commission, January 31, 1682.
- <sup>22</sup> Wodrow, iii. p. 383.
- <sup>23</sup> 'Historical Notices,' i. pp. 353, 363.
- <sup>24</sup> 'Historical Notices,' i. pp. 345, 346.
- <sup>25</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 265-268.
- <sup>26</sup> Napier, ii. p. 271, note.
- <sup>27</sup> Napier, ii. p. 274.
- <sup>28</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 270-279.
- <sup>29</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 283, 284.
- <sup>30</sup> Wodrow, iii. pp. 384, 385.
- <sup>31</sup> Napier, ii. p. 289.
- <sup>32</sup> 'Historical Notices,' i. p. 416.
- <sup>33</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 305, 306.
- <sup>34</sup> Napier, ii. p. 315 et seq.; 'The Despot's Champion,' pp. 146, 152.
- <sup>35</sup> Claverhouse to the Chancellor, Napier, ii. pp. 358-360.
- <sup>36</sup> Wodrow, iii. p. 446.
- <sup>37</sup> Wodrow, iv. p. 5.
- <sup>38</sup> Napier, ii. pp. 387-389.
- <sup>39</sup> Napier, ii. p. 397.
- <sup>40</sup> Wodrow, iv. pp. 172, 173; Napier, ii. p. 404.
- <sup>41</sup> Napier, ii. p. 410, citing 'Register of Privy Council,' September 10, 1684.
- <sup>42</sup> Burnet, ii. p. 428.
- <sup>43</sup> Compare MSS. of the Duke of Buccleuch at Drumlanrig, vol. ii. pp. 30, 31 (1903).
- <sup>44</sup> Wodrow, iv. p. 98.
- <sup>45</sup> Wodrow, iv. p. 102.
- <sup>46</sup> Wodrow, iv. p. 99.
- <sup>47</sup> In a document given by Principal Story, "the Council's copy of the conditions," the words "directly or indirectly a witness" are omitted. The Principal argues that these words were in the paper which Carstairs accepted, but that the Council "fraudulently omitted them in their copy." To myself the words in either copy appear to mean that Carstairs would not be compelled to appear in Court personally against his associates, and it is a moot point whether the terms of the conditions excluded the use of his recorded confessions as "an adminicle." But a little more or less of dishonour on the Government may scarcely merit close examination. Story's 'Carstares,' pp. 95-97.

<sup>48</sup> Burnet, ii. p. 431.

<sup>49</sup> Story, 'William Carstares,' pp. 82-84.

<sup>50</sup> Story, 'William Carstares,' p. 66.

<sup>51</sup> Story, 'William Carstares,' p. 70.

<sup>52</sup> Wodrow, iv. p. 99.

<sup>53</sup> Napier, ii. p. 421.

<sup>54</sup> Wodrow, iv. pp. 148, 149.

<sup>55</sup> 'Historical Observes,' p. 141.

<sup>56</sup> Wodrow, iv. p. 153.

<sup>57</sup> Napier, ii. p. 428.

<sup>58</sup> 'Historical Observes,' p. 142; Napier, ii. 428.

<sup>59</sup> Wodrow, iv. pp. 177, 197; Napier, ii. pp. 429, 430; i. p. 89. Wodrow's informant, his cousin, wrote about thirty years after the events, and says that three of Peirson's assailants were killed by the soldiers before the end of 1684. These victims appear to have been among the party cut up by Claverhouse after Peirson's murder, and as Macmichael and Macmichan are both said to come from Nithsdale, Napier is probably right.

<sup>60</sup> 'Historical Notices,' ii. p. 585.

<sup>61</sup> 'Historical Notices,' ii. p. 561.

<sup>62</sup> Wodrow, iv. pp. 154, 155.

<sup>63</sup> 'A Hind Let Loose,' p. 486 (1744).

<sup>64</sup> 'Historical Notices,' ii. p. 623.

<sup>65</sup> 'Historical Observes,' p. 146.

<sup>66</sup> Wodrow, if we follow Fountainhall, must have had imperfect information, or confused two different events. But the Rev. John H. Thomson, editor of 'A Cloud of Witnesses' (1871), appends Wodrow's tale to 'A List of Those Killed in the Fields' (p. 539), without a hint at the existence of Fountainhall's, a contemporary's, narrative. Fountainhall describes his own notes as containing "many errors and mistakes heir insert, on trust and from report, which on review will be purged and cut off." But it seems incredible that an advocate, living in Edinburgh in 1685, should have taken on trust the shooting and burial of a gentleman like Captain Urquhart. Criticism will never invade popular books on the Covenanters. Wodrow's own authority was probably the anonymous 'Cloud of Witnesses' of 1714. He quotes an edict of the Council as to the shooters of Urquhart (January 28, 1686), but does not connect it with Douglas's slaying of prayerful men (iv. p. 198).

<sup>67</sup> See Note to this chapter.

<sup>68</sup> Life and death of Mr James Renwick, p. 118 (1724). The documents for the narrative here given may be found in the Rev. Dr Stewart's 'History Vindicated,' second edition, 1869, a completely successful and courteous reply to Mr Napier's attempt to prove that the martyrs were never drowned at all! Mr Napier's learned but prolix and far from courteous arguments are in the third volume of his 'Dundee,' his 'Case for the Crown,' and his 'History Rescued' (1870). He built much on the apparent pardon, the reference therein to "Edinburgh," not Wigtown; the seemingly implicit denial of Sir George Mackenzie, who was present when "the material pardon" was passed; the absence of notice of the event in Fountainhall, and in many places where notices might be expected; and on the denials of the facts reported in 1714, and later by Wodrow and Walker. But the fact of the drowning is really beyond dispute.

<sup>69</sup> 'Men of the Covenant,' by the Rev. Alexander Smellie, M.A.

<sup>70</sup> 'Men of the Covenant,' pp. 315, 346, 347.

<sup>71</sup> 'Politics and Religion in Scotland,' ii. p. 310; Mathieson.

<sup>72</sup> Shields, 'Life of Renwick,' p. 63.

<sup>73</sup> Shields, 'Life of Renwick,' p. 65.

<sup>74</sup> Wodrow, iv. p. 280.

<sup>75</sup> Wodrow, iv. pp. 259-282.

CHAPTER XIV.

ARGYLL'S RISING.

1685.

THAT the Presbyterians of Scotland could never have freed themselves unaided from black Prelacy was made evident by the miserably futile expedition of Argyll. That adventure is interesting rather for the curious displays of Highland and Lowland character, of Presbyterian and Cameronian difficulties, than for other reasons. The account given by Macaulay, following Wodrow, who relied on papers of Argyll's, is perhaps unfair to the Lowland gentlemen, who are accused of poltroonery. The memoirs of two Lowlanders, Sir Patrick Hume of Polwarth and George Brysson, redress the balance, and are really as interesting almost as if Mr Louis Stevenson had told the story. When Argyll, Monmouth, and the Lowland gentlemen in exile began to meet and discuss projects for an invasion of England and Scotland, after the death of Charles II., it is probable that Polwarth, Fletcher of Saltoun, and others were not well disposed towards the great Highland Earl. "It was remembered that he beat Mrs Brisbane down his stairs for craving her annual rents, though he would have bestowed as much money on a staff or such like curiosity," says Fountainhall. "He used cruel oppression, not only to his father's, but even to his own creditors." These high-handed ways were not popular in the Lowlands. Polwarth believed, or pretended to believe, in "the hellish popish plot" invented by Titus Oates, and even as undesirable an ally as Argyll, a defender of Prelacy up to the date of his imprisonment, was welcome.<sup>1</sup> On the meeting of Argyll and Monmouth, in the Low Countries, they also were found to be at odds.

Argyll asked "who of us would take our hazard and go" to rescue Scotland. Polwarth, Sir John Cochrane, and other Low-landers cannot be blamed for wishing to understand the conditions and chances of the enterprise before committing themselves. The earl declined to go into details. He had been financed to the extent of about £10,000 by a Mrs Smith of London (retired to the Low Countries) and her friends, and had laid out the money very judiciously on arms and munitions of war, and on a frigate.* But he claimed the whole management, and in war, no doubt, a general should be untrammelled. But the Lowlanders were risking all; moreover, they were to commit their friends in Teviotdale and Tweeddale. If there was to be a combined movement, they must know with whom, and when, and where the six hundred border riders were to meet the Campbells. There was no harm in that amount of caution and foresight. Both Argyll and Polwarth were afraid that Monmouth would declare himself king: a Campbell would be the subject of a bastard Stuart, calling himself Scott by the name of his neglected and injured wife, the Duchess of Buccleuch.

To Polwarth, Monmouth said that he could prove his legitimacy, which was absurd, for Charles II., writing to his eldest bastard, James de la Cloche, gives him the precedence over Monmouth, by priority of birth, and by the rank of his unknown mother (1667).<sup>2</sup> Monmouth, however, promised to "lay no claim, or use no title, but by advice and to the advantage of the common cause," and, if successful, to place himself in the hands of Parliament. Argyll would not hear of Monmouth's going to Scotland, and stood firm to his post as responsible general. He was told that he had not yet been elected, and no information could be got from him as to the 5000 or 6000 clansmen who would come, he said, to his call. Except in clan fights, the Campbells had never done much successful service; at Glenrinnas as at Inverlochry, the Gordons under Huntly, the Macdonalds and Atholl men under Montrose, had found them an easy prey; at Flodden they had not stood to avenge their chief. The "Mountain Men," the Cameronians, on whom Argyll also relied, proved dissident, as was to be expected, when the time for action came. They believed Argyll to be guilty of the death of Cargill. Polwarth<sup>3</sup> argued in the pragmatical and provoking Lowland way. "General! General of what? Where is the army, and who has appointed my Lord for General?" This was in conference with Sir John Cochrane, to whom Claverhouse, years before, had wished the reverse of salvation. Cochrane was undoubtedly brave, and, at this time, was of Argyll's party. The Lowlanders wrung from the earl his assent to the selection of a Council. Prince Charles, later, had to submit to the same kind of control. The thing was practically inevitable, men of conflicting ideas and interests being engaged in a common venture. On April 24 the Council was framed, Argyll receiving "as full and ample power as any captain-general is ordinarily in use to have from any free state in Europe." The Dutch practice of sending to an army deputies, "without whose consent no great blow could be struck," was probably the fatal model.<sup>4</sup> Rumbold, of the Rye House Plot, the tortured Spence, and, according to Fountainhall, two of the archbishop's murderers, Balfour and Fleming, sailed, with Argyll and the Lowland gentlemen.<sup>5</sup> They touched in three days, most foolishly, at Kirkwall, where the bishop seized the luckless Spence and another man who went on shore. Spence had a close view of the boat again, and Government, which had known of the scheme for some time, was duly warned from Orkney. Wodrow says that Argyll ordered Polwarth to attack the town of Kirkwall. Polwarth says that he and his friends urged this method of rescuing Spence. "The earl and Cochrane opposed this motion vigorously."<sup>6</sup> Throughout, Wodrow, speaking for Argyll, and Polwarth, speaking for himself, contradict each other. Argyll was one of Macaulay's favourites; Polwarth he detested, and, in one place, speaks of "the worst action of his bad life"; and he remarks, "wherever there is a question of veracity between Argyll and Hume, I have no doubt that Argyll's narrative ought to be followed."<sup>7</sup> Probably each gentleman told what he conceived to be the truth. In any case, all that they did in Kirkwall was to capture some gentlemen as hostages for Spence and Dr Blackader, and, according to Fountainhall, to seize a ship with money and supplies.

* From Major Holmes's evidence, already cited, it seems that Argyll had provided arms as early as June 1683.

Government was prepared; they summoned all the lieges, ordered Irish troops to the north of Ireland, made Atholl Lord Lieutenant of Argyll, with his headquarters at the earl's castle of Inveraray at the head of Loch Fyne—all this by April 28, before the invaders sailed. The great Campbell cadets were secured, or thought it prudent to desert their chief, and would not or could not, as a rule, raise their retainers. The obvious fact is that Argyll would have been better advised had he stolen over like the prince in the song—

The Prince who did in Moidart land
With Seven Men at his right hand,
And all to conquer Kingdoms three,
Oh, that's the lad to wanton me.

The Campbells were well armed; Argyll's store of weapons was meant for the Lowlanders. Had the chief of Clan Diarmaid unexpectedly appeared at Inveraray, and sent round the fiery cross, he might have had 5000 muskets and claymores at his back, and, even if unsuccessful, could not have been taken in his own rough bounds. The £10,000 of Mrs Smith, too, would have been in his coffers. The alliance with the Lowlanders, the large preparations, were his ruin. They got wind, Government was ready, Inveraray was occupied by Murrays and Stewarts, the subordinate chiefs were overawed; and the Polwarth group kept pressing for a descent in Ayrshire, while Argyll naturally desired to clear the Atholl men out of his country. It is certain enough that Polwarth and Cochrane would have found scanty help in the south, the armed guerillas of Renwick would not join the earl who gave his casting vote for the death of a preacher, while, in all probability, Clan Diarmaid would have rallied to a chief who threw himself on the honour of his children. The expedition never had a chance. The Lowlanders thwarted every effort of Argyll to clear his country of the Atholl men; Argyll's changes of plan frustrated the Lowlanders' strategy of a march to the south.

After leaving Orkney, Argyll made for his own country, where his son, Charles, found that no gentleman would rise—they were prisoners, or in Edinburgh. Isla was Argyll's next point—he hoped to raise troops among the Campbells who had supplanted the Macdonalds in the old home of the Celtic sea-kings. Stewart of Ballechin commanded for Atholl in Isla; he had warning, and retired by sea, with all the arms in the island. Argyll made for Kintyre, also a Campbell conquest from the Macdonalds. Here some Lowlanders joined, and pressed for a march south. Here time was wasted, an enormous declamatory manifesto was issued, and Argyll emitted another, promising to pay his own and his father's creditors if he was successful.<sup>8</sup> Polwarth thought that the earl devoted too much time to polishing the style of these manifestoes. At Tarbet the whole force was of but 1800 men.

The kin of the earl, when approached by his son, Charles Campbell, "basely discovered all, and others were very backward to join." The eldest cadet of the clan, Lochnell, "gave his solemn promise to join the earl with all the men he could raise, and that upon a day appointed, and yet most treacherously he sent by an express the earl's letters, and probably his declarations, to the Council at Edinburgh, and afterwards joined the Marquis of Atholl, with his forces, at Inveraray." Wodrow, who gives these statements, used jottings made by Argyll later when a prisoner.<sup>9</sup> If the story be true, Lochnell behaved to his chief, in 1685, exactly as Macleod behaved to his prince in 1745. Sir Duncan Campbell of Auchinbrack came in with about eight hundred men. Delays had driven time to the end of May, when, on Argyll's showing, he desired to attack Stuart of Ballechin, who, at Inveraray, had only 600 men, and was awaiting reinforcements under Atholl and Breadalbane. "This vexed us exceedingly," says Polwarth, speaking for the Royalists; "we told him that Atholl, having the castle, might keep it till he got succours." Montrose, forty years earlier, could not take the castle of Inveraray for lack of guns, and whether Ballechin or Atholl now held the strength, Argyll's four-pounders in his ships would have battered the walls in vain. Argyll proposed this use of the ships, but the Lowlanders answered that the English ships would catch them, and that the Atholl men would merely manœuvre and detain the adventurers.<sup>10</sup> Wodrow, following Argyll, says that Cochrane averred he would go to the Lowlands, if he went alone "with a corn-fork in his hand," and that the others insisted on marching south with half of the force and arms. The Highland gentlemen, according to Polwarth, favoured the march southward. Argyll consented to divide the force, and then changed his mind, "which maddened Sir John Cochrane and the rest of us." Cochrane had a letter from Cleland (who fought at Drumclog and Bothwell Bridge), promising hopefully "to put all in a flame" in that country of the saints.<sup>11</sup>

But though Argyll had sent over preachers in April to stir up the remnant (which may partly account for the shootings of martyrs in May), Mr. Peden had prophesied that "Monmouth and Argyll will work no deliverance" as early as the end of February. Moreover, Renwick and the United Societies demurred, "because no mention was made," in Argyll's declaration, "of the Covenants," though "these sacred and solemn engagements" are named with all respect.

Again, Argyll "opened a door for confederacy with Sectarians and Malignants," and had himself voted for Cargill's hanging, while Cochrane "was guilty of that great gush of the precious blood of Mr. Cameron and these with him at Airmoss."<sup>12</sup> Hamilton, the No Quarter hero of Drumclog, averred that Argyll's money and Monmouth's came from "Sectaries, Papists, Malignants, and the Indulged, and other enemies of the Lord's cause."<sup>13</sup>

Thus the saints were divided among themselves: the gallant Cleland only created division in ranks always ready to split up, and the martyred Argyll is no martyr to the heart of the Remnant. Trusting, probably, to Cleland, the Lowlanders induced Argyll to give up the attack on Inveraray, and sail to Bute. Differences now arose between Polwarth and Cochrane as to landing and seizing supplies at Greenock, then a fishing village. Polwarth disapproved, but, as a few men were going, accompanied them. They stole some meal and "a pretty barque," after a slight skirmish, and returned to Rothesay.<sup>14</sup> Meanwhile Argyll had burned Rothesay Castle, in retaliation for the burning of a house of his own in Cowal. "This vexed us much, because it savoured of private revenge," smacking of "the bonny House of Airlie." Wodrow says nothing of the fire-raising. Charles Campbell had been defeated by the Atholl men in the Cowal country of Argyleshire; his fugitives gathered in Eileangreig Castle.

Argyll again wanted to attack the Atholl men; Polwarth again had a stormy conversation with him, but Wodrow declares that the Lowlanders now saw an attempt on the south to be impossible. Probably Cochrane took this view, and Polwarth took the opposite.<sup>15</sup> Argyll went and examined Eileangreig Castle, and announced that English frigates could not reach it in the narrows and shallows of the sea, whereas they certainly would capture the Lowlanders if they sailed south. There was every risk of a fight between Argyll's men and the sailors of the ships, who had been secured for Polwarth's interests. They all went to Eileangreig, and Polwarth, instructed by the seamen, said that frigates, well piloted, could come within easy gunshot. The ammunition and arms were entrusted to the castle, and the tiny guns installed in earthworks, but the English frigates blockaded the entrances of the channels. Meanwhile Rumbold, with three or four hundred men, marched to the head of Loch Fyne, and seized Ardkinglas Castle, opposite Inveraray. But Atholl's men only skirmished and detained Rumbold's forces, whom Argyll joined, and had some small success. Wodrow says that, with 1200 men, he meant to attack Atholl with 5000 and the Castle of Inveraray. But, whether through mutiny of the Lowlanders or not, he did not make this daring onfall, but retreated to his fort at Eileangreig. Here he meant to man all his vessels and prizes, and to attack the English frigates, which, says Polwarth, could have sunk any of his flotilla with one discharge. As Wodrow puts it, "a mutiny was raised among the seamen by those who still embarrassed the earl, so the design was entirely broke, and the earl forced into the measures of those who, cost what it would, resolved to be at the Lowlands."<sup>16</sup> By this time, too clearly, whatever these disunited helpless adventurers did must cost life and lands to all who could not make their escape, and there were many desertions. If ever any of them had a real plan of campaign it is inconspicuous; never was a conspiracy so helplessly futile.

Leaving the ships and a garrison at his fort, Argyll marched to Glendaruel. Raiding the country for cattle did not encourage the owners of the beasts; the Highlanders dwindled to about 500, the English frigates appeared before Eileangreig, and the garrison ran away, leaving guns, ammunition, ships, and supplies to the English. Too clearly Argyll made an error in placing his material where ships of war could take it at will. There was now no alternative but an abandonment of the Lowlanders (which would have been justifiable, perhaps), or a march with them to the discontented western Lowlands. Large forces beset the adventurers, and Glasgow was reported to be strongly held. The earl, says Wodrow, again wished to fight any opponents he might meet. Polwarth says that he advised Argyll to retreat with his men into his own country, but that the earl persisted in making for Glasgow. On June 10 they started thither, and met a considerable force of militia and regulars. Argyll was for fighting, Polwarth for continuing the march. After some manœuvring till dark, the earl insisted, says Polwarth, on a night retreat, the blazing camp fires deceiving the Royalists. Wodrow says that Rumbold proposed, and Argyll voted for, a night attack on the enemy. Here one or the other author, Wodrow, speaking for Argyll, or Polwarth, must be in error.<sup>17</sup>

They all lost their way in the morasses. A few reached Kilpatrick, not Glasgow; and now Argyll, through Wodrow, says "Sir John Cochrane, Sir Patrick Hume (Polwarth), and some other gentlemen went straight to Clyde, and would not so much as stay to reason the matter with my lord Argyll." 18 Polwarth says that, after eating a crust at a public-house, he went to look for Argyll, but met Cochrane, who was about to cross the Clyde in a boat. "I said, where is Argyll, I must see him." "He is gone away to his own country," replied Sir John. 19 Cochrane's party fought bravely, say Brysson and Polwarth, in a skirmish at a place called Muirdykes, escaped, and kept together till they heard that Argyll was taken (June 18). (Veitch and Brysson, p. 334.) "He would not come alongst with us over Clyde," says Brysson. Cochrane's party then broke up, Polwarth escaped, and, under William III., was made Earl of Marchmont. The story of his munching sheep's head brought to him by his daughter Grizel in the family vaults is too familiar for repetition. By Polwarth's account, derived from a gentleman who was present at the last meeting of Cochrane and Argyll at Kilpatrick, the earl asked Sir John whether he should cross Clyde or make for his own country, and Sir John advised the latter course. 20

Fox, in his 'History of the Reign of James II.,' avers that Polwarth and Cochrane "would not stay even to reason with him whom . . . they had engaged to obey," but crossed the river with two hundred men. Fox had not seen Polwarth's narrative, but Macaulay had. He leaves the point open: Argyll "was forced to cross the Clyde" (Macaulay, i. 435). This Argyll did, finding no shelter near Kilpatrick, and was captured by two militiamen and a weaver in crossing a burn. He was not recognised, being dressed as a peasant, but betrayed his name, it is said, by exclaiming "unfortunate Argyll!" The militiamen were servants of Sir John Shaw of Greenock (ancestor of Sir Hugh Shaw-Stewart), and, though the weaver and the servants were incredulous, Sir John recognised the earl, despite a beard which he had grown in exile, so says Fountainhall. 21 Macaulay writes, with naïveté, that some of the captors "wept, but were not disposed to relinquish a large reward," and face the "vengeance of Government."

In prison, Argyll reflected on his adventure and wrote, what was true, "there are some hidden ones" (the Remnant?), "but in this country I see no great party that desire to be relieved." Where were Polwarth's promised 600 horsemen of the Border shires? Their fathers deserted Montrose, they did not rise for Argyll—indeed they could not join him, unless they had been cavaliers like Edward Wogan. Argyll accuses his Lowland companions of embezzling stores: "some of them lived riotously and spoiled the provisions as they pleased. . . . I spent all the silver upon them, and they claimed all as their due. Blank and blank" (Cochrane and Polwarth?) "were the greatest cause of our rout, and my being taken, though not designedly, I acknowledge, but by ignorance, cowardice, and faction." Later, "I am not pleased with myself, I have so hard epithets of some of my countrymen." As to cowardice, we have seen that, by Polwarth's account, Argyll countermanded the night surprise, and ordered the night retreat.

Argyll, perhaps to expedite matters and discourage Monmouth, was condemned on the old absurd charge, and had no second trial, though that could only have ended in one way. He was not to escape again, whether by collusion or by a ruse. He writes, "this evening orders came that I must die upon Monday or Tuesday, and I am to be put to torture, if I answer not all questions upon oath."<sup>22</sup> Did he answer all questions upon oath? Wodrow gives the list. To answer truly, was to betray every accessory, every associate. "I answered but in part, according to a paper under my hand and signed," writes Argyll. Wodrow could not get the paper of answers. Macaulay and Fox ask how Argyll escaped torture; but Fox forgot that he had published the answer in his Appendix, a letter of July 16, from Barillon, the French ambassador at St. James's; and Macaulay, though fond of quoting Barillon, leaves his remark in silence. Writes the ambassador of France to Louis XIV., "The Earl of Argyll has been executed at Edinburgh: he left a full confession in writing, revealing the names of all those who helped him with money, and aided his plans. Thus he escaped torture."<sup>23</sup> But on the very day of his doom, June 30, Argyll wrote to the lady who gave him the money, Mrs. Smith, saying "your name could not be concealed . . . otherwise I have named none to their disadvantage." Mrs. Smith was safe in Holland:<sup>24</sup> and the sympathy of the Lords of the Council for one of their order probably induced them to be satisfied with the harmless disclosure of her not uncommon name. The story, as it reached Barillon, must have been grossly exaggerated.<sup>25</sup> It seems almost detective's or informer's work to allude to Barillon's letter, but it is better to face the evidence, and show in how innocent a sense his narrative is true, than to ignore his testimony. For the rest, we hear of no one molested on the score of the revelations which, according to Barillon, were made by the earl.

His conduct in prison was marked by more than one fine trait, especially by his care for the unfortunate clansmen who were true to him. "Only my poor friends" (kinsmen) "in Argyll have appeared in all Scotland. I was busy this day treating for them and in some hopes." We are reminded of the gentle Lochiel, in France, after 1746, "Let me perish with the people I have ruined!" Argyll had been anything but a foe of Prelacy; before his misfortune under the Test Act, he said "my gross compliances are now sad and grievous to me," and predicted that "deliverance shall come very suddenly." The story of how he took his usual sleep between his last meal and his execution is familiar, and his worst enemies never denied his personal courage. He was accompanied on the scaffold by two conformist ministers, if Charteris, whom he asked for, and who had refused the Test, can be called a conformist. His last speech was fortified by many scriptural citations, chapter and verse being carefully given. He declared that he died "with a heart-hatred of Popery and Prelacy," the religions of the overpowering majority of his fellow-Christians. Like Montrose, he had penned some last verses: they had no poetical merit.

Fountainhall's remarks on Argyll's affair are odd and prolix: he supposed that the family, of which he speaks tartly, was now for ever ruined. As to the earl, "it was observed he has never been very solid since his trepaning of his skull in 1653," a circumstance which might account for the reported flights of temper. The Council, we learn, decided not to inflict on the earl the monstrous indignities heaped upon Montrose when brought prisoner into Edinburgh, when "it was reported that . . . this Argyll was feeding his eyes with the sight in the Lady Murray's balcony, in the Canongate, with her daughter, his lady, to whom he was new married, and that he was seen playing and smiling with her."<sup>26</sup> A majority of the Council "who are recovering somewhat of their power now" (as against the Treasurer and Chancellor) voted for death by the Maiden, not by the gibbet, as in Montrose's case, and for that of Rumbold, who was taken fighting hard. It is unfortunate that no good biography of the unhappy earl exists. He practically "conquered" Mull for his family, from the Macleans, thereby weakening a clan which would have been very serviceable to the Stuart cause in later years. The causes of his fall, at the time of the Test, are obscure, but probably it was determined to put at him as too powerful a prince; and the pretence chosen was infamous. Had he not been treated in this manner one sees no reason to suppose that he would have entertained, so late in the day, "a heart-hatred" of Episcopacy. He had disclaimed the name of Presbyterian in 1667. His adventure was ill timed, ill managed, and based on the sort of flattering information which commonly beguiles exiles, as it beguiled Monmouth. The Lowlands would not, in any case, have risen, especially as many may have believed with Fountainhall, that the Highlanders had no religion whatever,—Campbells being no better than Macdonalds. It is certain that the earl, who, whether he turned the scale in favour of Cargill's death or not, had expressed approval of torturing rebel preachers, no more deserved than his father the title of "martyr" which Principal Story confers on both noblemen. In private life he was, as some of his unpublished letters prove, a man of singularly affectionate character and tender heart.

As to the vengeance on the rebels in Argyllshire, Wodrow heard, vaguely, of "extraordinary cruelties exercised there," and that Atholl hanged twenty-three Campbells, but was checked, while ravaging the country, by the Council, who gave his lieutenancy of the shire to Lt.-General Drummond.<sup>27</sup> After the Revolution, Atholl, defending himself against a "calumnious process" of the new Argyll, averred that, beyond cutting down trees for huts, his Highlanders behaved well, whereas a regiment under Argyll, in 1689, destroyed his plantations at Dunkeld and Blair. For his own part, he says that he was blamed for not acting up to the orders of the Council, which he publishes. On May 20, 1685, the Council, through Perth, bade him burn Inveraray, and "destroy all houses, goods, and persons of any who join with Argyll." Again, "all men who joined are to be killed or disabled from ever fighting again." "Burn all houses except honest men's, and destroy Inveraray and all castles" (May 31). "Let the women and children be transported to remote isles. . . . But all this is with submission to your judgment." All heritors taken are to be executed, and a hundred of the ringleaders among the tenants and commoners (June 23)!

Atholl declares that he took, and, if he had acted on his orders, would have hanged, over a hundred men, not twenty-three only, and he only burned Dunstaffnage Castle, and that for military reasons. He did not spare Inveraray merely because he resided there! "the marquis never liked the place so well as to make it his residence had it been his own," and he could have burned it under his orders, when he left it. He had also spared the life of "Mr. Charles Campbell," and prints his grateful letter. We incidentally learn that three or four hundred western Whigs rose at Sanquhar, but were scattered by Claverhouse.<sup>28</sup>

The greatest sufferers by Argyll's rising were the Covenanting prisoners in Edinburgh. They were taken from their prisons on May 18, and sent, enduring countless hardships, to Dunnottar Castle, where they were crowded, with hateful disregard of health and decency, into a dungeon not much better than the Black Hole of Calcutta. Some took the oaths, some escaped, but about one hundred and seventy of both sexes were immured. The horrors of their captivity were caused by George Keith, sheriff depute of the Mearns, and were but slightly assuaged by the intercession of his wife and the orders of the Council. Even water was grudged them, and some died, a few escaped, the soldiers tortured all whom they caught. Many who would not take an oath involving the royal supremacy were banished.<sup>29</sup> The new Sanquhar rising and treasonous declaration made there in May led to severities in Galloway by Claverhouse, "without any pretended crime," says Wodrow, but we may conjecture that the affair at Sanquhar, and fear of aid from the Remnant to Argyll, was the cause of or pretext for the dragoonings.

On April 29, 1686, Parliament met, the king's purpose being to secure toleration for Catholics. "We cannot be unmindful of . . . our innocent subjects, those of the Roman Catholic religion who have, with the hazard of their lives and fortunes, been always assistant to the crown in the worst of rebellions and usurpations, though they lay under discouragements hardly to be named."<sup>30</sup>

Nothing could be more true, and James had more honesty than Charles II. But the outbreak of persecution in France, and the unshaken belief among true Protestants in Oates's popish plot, with the moral certainty that James would not be satisfied with mere toleration, but would fill all offices with Catholics, proved fatal to the king. Queensberry was superseded by Melfort, a convert; Murray, reputed to be a convert, was Commissioner in Parliament: such appointments practically justified resistance to tolerance, even if accompanied by the largest indulgence to nonconformists. If he could, and as soon as he could, James would certainly follow the example of Louis XIV.; and this certainty, with his own folly and loss of nerve, cost him three crowns. Real toleration in these days was not in the range of practical politics; persecution must be practised on the line of least resistance. The Episcopalians were soon to suffer in their turn, as the wheel of fortune revolved. The Commissioner, the Earl of Murray, offered free trade with England, with right to refuse free trade with Ireland, which sent cattle, horses, and victual, whence "this kingdom suffers great prejudice," and all the cruelty of cheap commodities. Supplies were not demanded, an indemnity (of which we hear little more) was offered, and these gifts were to be repaid by toleration for Catholics.<sup>31</sup>

Late in 1685, Perth, the Chancellor, had become a Catholic, whether from conviction or to ingratiate himself with James is uncertain, but he contrived the ruin of his house, which remained Jacobite to the last. He "bought altars, candlesticks, priests' garments," and "such trash" for Holyrood, says Fountainhall; and this audacious act met its natural reward. On January 31 there was a tumult of "the Mobilee" in Edinburgh—"the rabble against the mass priests." Three persons were killed by the soldiers, and a drummer and a fencing-master were hanged.<sup>32</sup> Thus threatened with Popery, the Parliament, on May 6, returned a cautious reply to the king's message,—they would be as tolerant as their consciences permitted, in considering the royal request. The Lords of the Articles (May 27) went as far as they dared in offering to permit Catholic worship in private ("all public worship being hereby excluded"), and the laws against Popery remaining in force.<sup>33</sup> This was going much further than the Covenanting strugglers for "freedom of conscience" could approve. As it reached the Estates the Act "countered the Court's design to bring in Papists to places of trust and power." The Chancellor therefore dropped the Act; the Council was to some extent purged of resolutely intolerant Protestants, while Catholics—the Duke of Gordon, Traquair, and Seaforth—took their places. Sir George Mackenzie lost his place as Lord Advocate; the post (February 1687) was conferred on the old foe of Claverhouse, Sir John Dalrymple.

On August 24 James wrote a letter to the Council: "we resolve to protect our Catholic subjects," "against all their enemies and the laws made against them," "according to our undoubted right and prerogative." Meanwhile, it seems that Mr. James Renwick announced that "I separate from and excommunicate all the ministers belonging to Scotland"; so Mr. Robert Cathcart, "a very pious and knowing Christian in Carrick," informed the world.<sup>84</sup> The Remnant were all at odds among themselves, and lost, by natural death, the celebrated Mr. Peden the prophet, remarked for his piety and clairvoyance. He prophesied that his body would be buried at the gallows foot, as it was; but it needed no super-normal information to convince him that this was highly probable. Little as we may like the spirit of religious persecution under Charles II., it had this plea, that the Presbyterian claims to dominate the State must be, and were, put down; with every circumstance of cruelty and superfluous military oppression. But James was now actually playing the royal Pope of a religion which was not even his own, and the Archbishop of Glasgow, and the Bishop of Dunkeld, were deprived of their sees by the Catholic Head of a Protestant church. The king, perhaps, dared not have attempted such a high-handed act by virtue solely of the royal supremacy in England, where the seven bishops were protected by a verdict of their countrymen. But in England as well as in Scotland, and in England to his ruin, he began to repeal the penal laws by virtue of his prerogative, enforcing toleration and abolishing religious tests, by proclamation. In 1687 he presented three successive forms of Indulgence to Scotland; into the third, of July, the Presbyterian ministers fell, and at a meeting of July 21 accepted better terms than they ever had hoped to obtain, with "a deep sense of your Majesty's gracious and surprising favour." They defended their loyalty, and the mass of them had been loyal,—so manifestly that perhaps Charles II. might, he certainly should, have tried the experiment of allowing Presbytery, deprived of the weapon of excommunication with civil penalties, to exist after the Restoration. The ministers who thus addressed the king acted, of course, on their own motion, as there was not in existence a ruling assembly of the Kirk.

Renwick, and the few preachers who thought with him, of course stood out against accepting toleration from a Popish usurper, as they called the king. Renwick, in Wodrow's opinion, would have come in at the Revolution; but probably he would have maintained the extreme attitude of the Cameronian Societies, and refused allegiance to an uncovenanted latitudinarian prince. In any case, the mass of the preachers had learned opportunism enough to take what they could from James, though they shared the boon with Catholics, Quakers, and Episcopalians.<sup>85</sup> They cannot but have seen that the liberty which a royal proclamation gave, another proclamation could withdraw; but in the meantime they saw no harm in practising the public exercises of their religion. "Their subserviency showed how sorely broken was the ancient Presbyterian spirit," says a recent historian, but civil society was impossible till "the ancient Presbyterian spirit" had been crushed.<sup>86</sup> Had it not been broken down, the peaceful Revolution of 1688 would have been impossible in Scotland; for the preachers would have insisted on the acceptance of the Covenant, by the Prince of Orange, with compulsory Presbyterian Government in England. It was left for a Whig Lord Advocate, Sir James Dalrymple, Claverhouse's old enemy, to prosecute the last martyr, Mr. James Renwick. He was hanged on February 17, 1688, and the commission of Sir George Mackenzie to supersede Dalrymple was read on the same day.<sup>87</sup>

Renwick, whose most notable feat was the Apologetical Declaration of war by murder, had foolishly hidden in the house of a friend in Edinburgh, who seems to have been a professional smuggler; "He dealt in English goods, and the Custom House officers were frequently searching his house for prohibited goods," says Wodrow.<sup>88</sup> Fountainhall says they were seeking "unfree goods stolen from the customs." Among other clandestine commodities was found Mr. Renwick. He fired a pistol at the searchers, missed, ran down the Castle Wynd to the head of the Cowgate, and was caught "by a profligate fellow." He was offered his life if he would acknowledge the Government, but pride and principle alike forbade. Under threat of torture, accompanied by promise from Dalrymple of indemnity for any on whom he might bring suspicion, he deciphered certain ciphered names in his papers. Bishop Paterson vainly interceded for his reprieve, and "professed kindness and concern in him." Renwick was only twenty-six at the time of his death, and in everything but his extreme fanaticism, which was the occasion of the deaths of so many ignorant people, seems to have deserved the affection of his friends. Wodrow, who disliked "the heights" to which he ran, has a singular tenderness for his memory, and constantly urges that he merely followed and tried to mitigate the opinions of his adherents. He was the last victim of the preachers who, safe in Holland, kept stirring the embers of extreme Presbyterianism. Every effort was vainly made to save him on the easiest possible terms.

The history of the nascent intrigues for the invasion by the Prince of Orange is difficult, and the part in which a Scot was concerned is specially obscure. Burnet, who had been making a tour in Europe, was invited to the Hague in 1686. In April 1687 he was accused, in Scotland, of treason, and of dealings in 1685 with Argyll. Among witnesses against him were named the notorious William Carstairs, and Sir John Cochrane, who had procured his pardon for the Argyll rising.<sup>39</sup> Fountainhall says that "the true quarrel" partly rested on a private letter of Burnet's, declaring that he had seen at Rome the document of a League, signed by James and all Catholic princes, "to extirpate the Protestants," "which is certainly false."<sup>40</sup> But Burnet had naturalised himself in Holland, where he was to marry a rich Dutch woman. He could not be given up, and plots to kidnap him were laid in France, and, he says, by Whitford, whom he denounces as the murderer of Dorislaus nearly forty years ago. He was intimate with the Prince of Orange, to whose character he dealt a stab murderous, and, we may trust, mendacious.<sup>41</sup> He cleared up, he says, the political mistrust between William and Mary, as good a wife as she was a bad daughter. "I found the prince was resolved to make use of me," says Burnet; but the full and precise nature of the uses to which Burnet was put remains undivulged. He avers that William had predictions "from a man that pretended a commerce with angels,"—a Medium of some sort. The Regent Murray burned Sir William Stewart for this very crime.<sup>42</sup> Burnet was removed from the prince's presence, but remained in constant correspondence with him. On June 10, 1688, the Queen of England gave birth to her unfortunate son, James, "the Chevalier de St. George," and the Prince of Orange, in his manifestoes of October, sank so low as to pretend to believe in the various and contradictory lies circulated by the Whigs. On this point Arbuthnot's treatise on Political Lying may be recommended. As Macaulay says, "posterity has fully acquitted the king of the fraud which his people imputed to him." They imputed it in various discrepant ways: on one theory the young prince was a brother of Fanny Oglethorpe, his mistress according to Thackeray. To Burnet's blundering version of events Dean Swift adds the note, "So here are three children!" "To palm one child upon a nation is certainly a thing very difficult; but to palm three, one after another!"<sup>43</sup> Populus vult decipi, but that the Prince of Orange shared the fatuous illusion we cannot readily suppose. The lies were useful, and he used them. As early as July 17 verses and letters, reflecting on the birth of the Prince of Wales, were seized in Scotland.<sup>44</sup>

As is common in political affairs, each side was indifferent to honesty and honour. The proceedings of James were so grossly obvious as to clear his Jesuit advisers from the charge of being "Jesuitical." Holyrood with its Catholic, or rather Jesuit, press and schools, was the centre of an illegal propaganda, while Protestant books of controversy were suppressed as dishonouring his Majesty's religion. The Castle of Edinburgh was in the hands of the Catholic Duke of Gordon, representing, in creed, and in the futility of his conduct, a long line of Huntlys. The usual autumn municipal elections in royal boroughs were prohibited, and royal nominees were appointed. The conformist or Episcopal clergy of Scotland were peculiarly active in their opposition to Popery, and their Presbyterian brethren no longer concealed their sense of the true nature of the king's conversion to the doctrine of toleration. The best account of affairs is probably that of Lord Balcarres, son of Balcarres who had pawned and ruined his estate in the royal cause, and died at Breda in the year before the Restoration. Charles gave a pension of £1000 a year to Lady Balcarres and her eldest survivor; and Lord Lindsay, editing the narrative of this survivor for the Bannatyne Club, "thinks it only due to the memory of the unfortunate House of Stuart to bear witness to the constant kindness and sympathy which my own family experienced at their hands, not merely during the sunshine of their prosperity, but in the darkest hours of mutual destitution and exile."<sup>45</sup> Young Balcarres, by marrying a daughter of Lord Northesk, fell into the shady side of Charles's favour, but recovered interest on the death of his wife, and became the friend of John Churchill (Marlborough), who often said that "he was the pleasantest companion he ever knew." James made him one of the six Commissioners of the Treasury. When an invasion by the Prince of Orange became certain, in the September of 1688, Balcarres found that the Treasury was well supplied, and proposed to levy ten battalions of foot, to raise 5000 Highlanders, and the Arrière Ban; and with 1200 horse of the gentlemen, and the 3000 of the regular army under Douglas and Dundee, to march to York and keep the northern counties of England in order. Melfort, the evil genius of James, rejected the scheme, and sent for Dundee with the regular army, thus denuding Edinburgh and Scotland of regular forces, and leaving the Government, the Council, at the mercy of the mob, for the militia could not be trusted. Balcarres with difficulty reached London, where he found Dundee with James, after the king's return from his flight. Balcarres and Dundee declared that the army which James had deserted after his own desertion by Marlborough at Salisbury, would gather at beat of drum, and that they could collect 20,000 men. Lord Ailesbury also reports in his Memoirs, that Dundee assured James that, if he would mount and ride with him, he would carry him safely to Scotland. At that moment Dundee and Balcarres were alone with the king, alone faithful among the faithless found. Their loyalty seems to have been based upon personal affection and the point of honour. The title of Viscount Dundee, bestowed on Claverhouse in November 1688, had not increased the loyalty of his commanding officer, Douglas, the brother of Queensberry, but made it impossible for any man like John Graham to desert the falling cause. Otherwise, it would have been as easy for Dundee as for Douglas to take service under William of Orange, who used all men of courage and ability. Already, with James at Rochester before his return to London, Dundee had made his offer to the king; Carte reports it in the same terms as Lord Ailesbury.<sup>46</sup>

But James had lost heart as well as head. 'At the last attempts of Balcarres and Dundee to impart courage to the king, he informed them of his intention to fly for the second time, and promised to Balcarres a commission for civil, to Dundee for military affairs (Balcarres, xviii.). Dundee remained in town, till "he had fixed a correspondence both with England and France," says Burnet, "though he had employed me to carry messages for him to the king" (William), "to know what security he might expect if he should go and live in Scotland without owning his government. The king said, if he would live peaceably, and at home, he would protect him: to this he answered that, unless he were forced to it, he would live quietly." "Quietly" Dundee did not live, whether he was "forced to it," or not.<sup>47</sup> While the regular Scottish army sent into England was scattered like sheep without a shepherd by the desertion of the king, the country, in mid October, learned that William and Mary "lay no claim to the crown at present"—"that the object of this expedition is that the late king's murderers be tried in Parliament, that the Impostor be sent back to his natural parents." Charles II. had not been murdered; the Prince of Wales was not an impostor; and Wodrow says that these and other proposals, "that excellent paper," were "so worthy of the prince"!<sup>48</sup> On November 3 all the Scottish bishops except Argyll and Caithness wrote to congratulate James on the storm which frustrated William's first attempt to cross. They styled James "the darling of Heaven," and in that light they and their flocks, after they had nothing but persecution to gain by it, continued, with an invincible and unreasonable fervour of loyalty, to regard the king's son and grandson. The bishops were, not much later, offered William's alliance against the Presbyterians. For himself, Bishop Rose refused it, and said that he believed his brethren were with him.<sup>49</sup> Yet while, after William had succeeded, the Episcopalians of Scotland took this certainly unselfish attitude, before William arrived their clergy had been denouncing the White Rose Prince as an impostor, and were, as Balcarres tells James, "extremely overjoyed at the noise of the Prince of Orange's coming over."<sup>50</sup> Of a people proud of its logical gifts, the Episcopalian Jacobites and the Covenanters are singular children.

When we study the character and conduct of James II. it seems impossible that any man should have been a Jacobite. But his domestic misfortunes bore such an ill look for his son-in-law and his daughter; his son was so natural an object of pity and affection; a Dutch or German ruler was so distasteful; the new Government with its wars so loaded the country with the National Debt, that the ancient sentiment of loyalty rose to a love passing the love of women, and the canniest of nations entered into a period of romantic struggles for an impossible Cause, cupitor impossibilium. That set of men, the bishops, who had been so slavish and so self-seeking, suddenly appeared ready to sacrifice all for a sentiment, a song, a flower; living in poverty and hope

Till our White Roses do appear
To welcome Jamie the rover.

This curious behaviour may, perhaps, suggest that the Scottish bishops were not quite such "hounds" as an eminent Presbyterian historian, the Rev. Principal Story, is pleased to style them. "The Scotch bishops regarded James's throne with an attachment akin to that of the hound to the master who has fed him when he wanted food, and lashed him when he needed discipline."<sup>51</sup> Principal Story repeats the anecdote of William's interview with Bishop Rose, but omits the bishop's statement that he believed his brethren to share his sentiments; that they never would acknowledge the Dutchman as king, and that, for his own part, he would liefer forfeit all his interests in the country. Now Rose and the other bishops abandoned everything—above all, cast themselves a prey to the Presbyterians, though William “had desired to save the Scotch Episcopal Establishment because he believed it was acceptable to many, if not most, of the powerful, but unprincipled, nobility of the kingdom,”—and for other reasons of State.<sup>52</sup> So says Principal Story. It would seem that the bishops, if dogs, were honest dogs, who rejected the greatest of bribes rather than desert a ruined master. As this very “unselfish faithfulness to a ruined master” is admitted in the case of Dundee,<sup>53</sup> it does not appear that bishops ought to lose the benefit of the act of grace, merely because they are bishops.

They might have continued to be bishops, as William wanted to propitiate the unprincipled nobility of Scotland, but they would not yield an inch of their legitimist principles. They believed that hereditary monarchy was jure divino, as their opponents believed that Presbyterian government was of divine right. Both ideas are obsolete, but a man is not a hound because he adheres to his principles. William's proclamation of October 10, 1688, set forth with much vigour the grievances of the country. James's advisers were, in a constitutional tone, blamed for James's own measures, “religion, law, and liberties” were overturned, absolute power was openly proclaimed for the express purpose of “introducing what religion they please.” Papists, contrary to law, were entrusted with the chief posts, civil and military; charters were violated, and free elections in the burghs were prevented. The barbarities of the dragoonings—“hanging, shooting, and drowning” (an obvious reference to the case of the Wigtown martyrs)—were denounced. The liberty to dissenters was explained as a mere stalking-horse for favouring Popery, a freedom which could be destroyed, as it was granted, with the stroke of a pen. Then, as if the case was not good enough, so good as to be unanswerable, the prince's remark about the “impostor” was brought in, an unworthy concession to the popular desire to be deceived.<sup>54</sup>

On the withdrawal to England of the 3000 men of the regular army, the Presbyterian ministers temporised with the Council till they received hopes from Holland to have “the Government of Church and State put into their hands," says Balcarres.<sup>55</sup> They then told Sir Patrick Murray that they would deal no more with a Popish king, but "would carry themselves as God should inspire," that is, according to circumstances. The Council, in the absence of the army, found the militia useless and themselves impotent. The Presbyterian leaders held meetings, and, "according to their ancient custom, nothing was determined without consulting them" (the preachers) "and that they approved." The communications of the Council with the king in England were broken: when Melfort got a message through, he sent "the truth disguised, and quite different from what the Viscount Dundee wrote to me" (Balcarres). Mob outrages were threatened, to frighten away the Chancellor, Perth. Atholl was a partner in these proceedings: his conduct throughout was shifty, even for these times. Perth, the Chancellor, was persuaded to disband such forces as were left, except four troops of horse; he himself, a timid man, fled to the country, and later was taken while attempting to escape by sea, and made prisoner for four years. These Drummonds, Perth and Melfort, hastened and secured the ruin of the king's cause, before and during his exile, and lost all for him and for their religion. By far the best of them, the Duke of Perth, fought bravely in 1745-1746, and died of wounds or fatigue when all was over.

The night after Perth left Edinburgh, December 10, the mob attacked Holyrood, held by Captain Wallace, with 120 men, and were repulsed with loss. Atholl, Tarbat, and Breadalbane gave the malcontents a summons to Wallace to surrender, and the town trained band, under Captain Graham, with the Provost, the Magistrates, and the Presbyterian leaders, headed a mob in a new attack. Cameronians took part in these faithful contendings. Wallace, attacked in front and rear, forsook his post; his men surrendered. "The gentlemen and rabble, when they saw all danger over, rushed in upon them, killed some, and put the rest in prison, where many of them died of their wounds and hunger."<sup>56</sup> Wodrow has plenty to say about starvation of Covenanters in Dunnottar Castle; about these sufferings of Royalists he is silent, alleging that "the youths killed all the soldiers they met with." The chapel was rifled, and next day all Catholic religious articles were plundered and burned, and the houses of several Catholics were sacked. "They opened the Chancellor's cellars and mine," says Balcarres, "and made themselves as drunk with wine as before they had been with zeal. Two or three days they rambled about the town, and plundered the Roman Catholics, who were but very few; some of their ladies they treated with the utmost barbarity."<sup>57</sup> . . . "They were willing to have done more, had it been in their power," says the author of 'Faithful Contendings Displayed,' for "in this reeling time the Societies were not idle," whether in Edinburgh or in the country. He says nothing about treating ladies "with the utmost barbarity."

At Traquair, under Ker of Kersland, they burned such pictures and books as they deemed "popish," including "The Queen of Peace, curiously drawn." "The work was gone about deliberately and methodically," says Dr. Hay Fleming. We are to presume that Lord Traquair's cellar had been moderately dealt with by the devotees who made an inventory of the works of art which they burned.<sup>58</sup> The Cameronians of the Societies, their religious peculiarities apart, were, in fact, methodical men, intelligently organised. Patrick Walker, the biographer of the saints, was then a youth of twenty-two, who had lain long in prisons—for example, he had shared the horrors of the Dunnottar dungeon; he had been condemned to torture, and it is believed that he had suffered both boots and thumbscrew. He makes no marvel of his own sufferings, but describes the process of rabbling conformist clergy. He had been present at fifteen rabblings, whence it appears that gangs of the Society men went about attacking ministers in parishes not their own, a kind of ambulatory conventicle. It has already been shown, from Burnet's evidence, that the conformist ministers in the south-west were "sair hadden doun" even before Drumclog; they were robbed, stoned, beaten, and insulted, while they had no body of excited public opinion to back them. When attacked by armed gangs in "that golden non-such interregnum," as Walker calls it, they merely trembled and submitted.

"How would they tremble and sweat if they were in the Grass Market, and other such places, going up the ladder with the rope before them, and the lad with the pyoted coat at their tail." They were merely being driven out of church and home, and deprived, with their families, of their subsistence. All of them, by law, had been forced to send in the names of nonconformist parishioners; and that, probably, was the extent of their offending. Their gowns were seized, with the church furniture, but, "we should not taste either their meat or their drink, or wrong anything that belonged to them, except their gowns." In the five western shires hardly one conformist dared to preach. The sufferings of the clergy in the alternate evictions by either party since 1638 must have been severe, and, in this instance, are specified in various pamphlets printed on the Jacobite side. But the persecuted "curates" caerent vate sacro. They did not join any rising; they were not shot, hanged, or tortured; and it must be admitted that mob violence was never more leniently exercised against defenceless men. Walker calls their complaints "gross lies," nor is it worth while to criticise the amount of truth which they contain.<sup>59</sup>

"When the rabble became settled" in Edinburgh, says Balcarres, Atholl assembled the Council and proposed a grateful address to the Prince of Orange. A colder address was sent; the archbishops and Sir George Mackenzie, with others, opposed the more effusive draft. The Chancellor, Perth, was now captured, and Atholl's faction confined him in Stirling Castle, under the Earl of Mar. James's party in the Council hurried to London, while Atholl distributed places among his friends, left Strathmore to keep order, and, with the heads of his faction, went to pay court to William. The prince refused to put any party or particulars to despair, by making them incapable of employment. Hamilton, who had been in London during all the turmoil, was sent for by William; he had, we know, ever occupied a middle position and had at one time led the opposition to Lauderdale. In a great meeting of the Scots in London, at White Hall, he was unanimously chosen President. His proposal, that for the present power must be placed in the hands of the Prince of Orange, till a Convention in March 1689, was accepted, "though unwillingly, from the great disasters at home, the mob being absolutely masters."<sup>60</sup>

The Jacobites were in doubt as to attending the March Convention in Edinburgh, but James sent Mr. Hay with permission for them to be present. Queensberry entered with Balcarres and Dundee into James's interest, Atholl passed from party to party, and the Jacobites learned that forfeited persons were to be allowed to vote, and even "to sit in Parliament," while still legally excluded. Returning to Edinburgh, Balcarres and Dundee found that the advocates had formed themselves into a kind of "vigilance committee" for the preservation of order; but Hamilton, by order of the Prince of Orange, disbanded the men of law, who were Jacobites. The Duke of Gordon was actually evacuating the castle, but was prevailed upon by Dundee and Balcarres to remain in a post where nothing energetic was to be expected from him. He did not fill the fortress with supplies, and this great strength was practically valueless to James; Gordon was no Kirkaldy of Grange. Meanwhile Hamilton had quartered some companies of infantry in the town, and westland Whigs were lurking "in vaults and cellars,"—lurking for a spring. Atholl was proposed as President, but the election of Hamilton discouraged the Jacobites, a score of whom withdrew, while the prince had a majority from the burghs. Disputed elections were decided in his interest, and Gordon would have surrendered the castle had not Dundee gone thither and told him that, in the old Scottish fashion of Queen Mary's wars, he meant to call a rival Convention at Stirling.

James had sent a letter entirely contrary to what had been settled between him and his party in London, "a fault of your advisers" (Melfort) "hardly to be pardoned," says Balcarres. The letter might forbid or dissolve the Convention, and both parties agreed that it could only be read after voting the Convention a free and legal meeting. This was "a pill to the loyal party so bitter it had never gone down, if they had not been persuaded your letter would have dissipated their fears"; they needed time to prepare for a rising if rise they must; and James had already licensed their attendance at the Convention. The letter was from Melfort, the curse of the Cause, and exhibited James in the most arrogantly despotic temper. In the Convention his interest was certainly lost, and his friends might honourably have deserted a prince unteachable by adversity, and in the hands of a man like Melfort, despised and distrusted by both parties.

Obdurately loyal, they designed to meet at Stirling, where Mar, the keeper of the castle, gave assurances, while Atholl was to bring down his clan for a guard; but Atholl wavered, and "broke all our measures." Dundee was informed that six or seven of the western Whigs designed to murder Sir George Mackenzie and him, and their place of meeting was pointed out. Dundee, at the next meeting of the Convention, appealed to Hamilton to have the matter investigated, but the majority of the House refused to permit this. The viscount had already been insulted and threatened (March 16, 1689). This was on a Saturday; on Monday the Jacobite members were to retire to Stirling, but Atholl, at a meeting, persuaded them to wait and attend the House next day. Dundee was not at the meeting till the decision was taken ; he had gathered a band of fifty horse for an escort, and had a number of his party waiting for him "at a house near the town." He declined to dally longer, but rode down the West Bow, and, knowing that Gordon was beleaguered in the castle, "in a manner blocked up by the western rabble," he paused at the north face of the rock, "and clambered up with great difficulty, the rock there being extremely steep." The Whigs who were blockading the ordinary roads to the castle ran to tell the Convention ; Hamilton, in a passion, had the doors locked, "the bells were rung backwards, the drums they were beat," and it was anticipated that, with fifty men, Dundee would attack the town. But Dundee rode northwards, "wherever might lead him the shade of Montrose," and the half-hearted Jacobite members were left to their fate without the presence of him whom Swift calls "the best man in Scotland."

Macaulay supposed that Claverhouse feared assassination ; Malcolm Laing that he "affected an alarm which he did not feel." Probably his plans were laid ; he saw that Atholl and the others were irresolute, he and they might be victims of just such a plot as "The Incident" apparently was, and Dundee, with the whole weight of the Cause on the only shoulders fit to bear it, rode with Lord Livingstone towards the glens and the homes of the last hope. But Livingstone deserted him ; and he, from his own house, declined to obey a summons to a Convention where he had been insulted, an assembly overawed by Cameronians, and by four Dutch regiments under Mackay.<sup>61</sup> It was in the middle of March that General Mackay embarked with three Dutch regiments for Edinburgh. He avers that Dundee and the bishops meant to seize the Williamite members of the Convention, which they were not likely to attempt with Dundee's fifty horsemen, as against the concealed Cameronians, and a number of Highlanders under the son of the Argyll executed in 1685. These forces were brought in, says Mackay, to counteract the highly improbable plot which he attributes to Dundee, who, for his letter to the Convention, was denounced a rebel. Mackay, on his arrival, secured Stirling Castle, for its captain, Mar, like the other Jacobite nobles, was a broken reed. Mackay's men were, apparently, Scots in Dutch service, not born Hollanders. Why they were called "the Butterbox" is obscure.<sup>62</sup>

In the Convention, Tarbat and Stair proposed a Union which suited neither Hamilton, the Presbyterians, nor the Jacobites. Queensberry came from London, apparently in James's interest, and Atholl wished Gordon to bombard the Convention from the castle, but he would not act without James's orders. Hamilton was in constant correspondence with William, who found it sagacious to trust him. The duke intercepted despatches of James to Dundee, sending him a commission as lieutenant-general, and promising help from Ireland—5000 men. He would grant "property and liberty," and "maintain the national Protestant religion," Episcopal (Dublin Castle, March 29, 1689). All were to have an indemnity except those who voted against James "in the late illegal Convention."<sup>63</sup>

When Gordon refused to fire on the Convention, the Jacobite members retired to their homes; and the rest, on Sir John Dalrymple's motion, declared James to have forfeited his right to the crown by his illegal acts, the Prince of Wales being also barred. There were only four adverse votes, including those of Sir George Mackenzie and the Archbishop of Glasgow. As ever, in Scotland, the Opposition either did not attend at all, or retired. Hamilton then proposed to offer the crown to "the Prince and Princess of Orange, now king and queen of England." Queensberry and Atholl acceded, and at the Market Cross, Hamilton actually, as herald, proclaimed the new sovereigns (April 3). Lorne (Argyll), Sir John Dalrymple, and Sir James Montgomery were sent to William with the Claim of Rights, passed on April 11, declaring any religion but Presbyterianism "contrary to the inclinations of the generality of the people," and Episcopal government an intolerable grievance. Sir James Dalrymple, writing from London to Lord Melville (April 11), suggests that the Convention should "qualify torture that it can never be used except when there is one witness or half probation" (April 14).<sup>64</sup> Atholl (April 13) told William that his conscience did not allow him to vote for abolishing Episcopacy; he never was whole-hearted in all his waverings. Hamilton meanwhile received powers to imprison suspected persons; Dundee took care of himself, but Balcarres, who was loyal but useless, was placed in the common jail, nor was his condition bettered by the intercepting of a silly letter to him from Melfort, with threats of what James would do to his enemies when he returned.<sup>65</sup>

William, as is well known, rejected the article proposed to him, "we shall be careful to root out all heretics and enemies to the true worship of God, that shall be convicted of the true Kirk of God of the foresaid claims, out of our lands and empire of Scotland." This would have involved the exile, at least, of all non-Presbyterians; it was a survival of the ancient oath of the kings before the Reformation. But, hearing that the words were a mere formula, William swallowed them, averring that he would not be a persecutor. Thus, on May 11, William was king of Scotland, a country which neither he nor any later king of England ever saw, till George IV. made his visit about one hundred and thirty years later. The constitutional and ecclesiastical changes of the new reign are subjects for later discussion. As to the new Constitution, it endured for less than twenty years, ending with the Union. In practice, too, the long war of one hundred and thirty years' duration between Kirk and State closed with the restored prominence of the Kirk without the Covenants, and with a saner conception of the powers and duties of the preachers. The two divine rights, that of sacred hereditary monarchy, and that of the apostolic privileges of preachers, had clashed so long and fiercely that they destroyed each other. The friends of the fallen dynasty were to be intermittently troublesome for two generations, but never really dangerous. The religion of the House of Stuart was the sword in the hand of the Angel who closed against them the gates of their ancient Paradise.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER XIV.

- <sup>1</sup> 'Historical Observes,' p. 184. Polwarth's Narrative, 'Marchmont Papers,' iii. p. 2.
- <sup>2</sup> 'The Valet's Tragedy,' 'Mystery of James de la Cloche.'
- <sup>3</sup> Polwarth, 'Marchmont Papers,' iii. pp. 18-20.
- <sup>4</sup> Macaulay, i. p. 422; Wodrow, iv. pp. 283, 284.
- <sup>5</sup> 'Historical Observes,' pp. 183, 184.
- <sup>6</sup> 'Marchmont Papers,' iii. pp. 39, 40; Wodrow, iv. p. 285.
- <sup>7</sup> Macaulay, i. p. 440, note. <sup>8</sup> Wodrow, iv. pp. 286-291.
- <sup>9</sup> Wodrow, iv. pp. 282, 283, 288, 289.
- <sup>10</sup> 'Marchmont Papers,' iii. pp. 45, 46. <sup>11</sup> Wodrow, iv. p. 292.
- <sup>12</sup> 'Six Saints of the Covenant,' i. pp. 71, 101, 102. Dr. Hay Fleming quotes Shields to the same effect, op. cit. ii. p. 141, notes 53, 54, 55.
- <sup>13</sup> 'Faithful Contendings,' p. 211.
- <sup>14</sup> 'Marchmont Papers,' iii. pp. 47, 48.
- <sup>15</sup> 'Marchmont Papers,' iii. pp. 48, 49; Wodrow, iv. p. 293.
- <sup>16</sup> Wodrow, iv. p. 294.
- <sup>17</sup> 'Marchmont Papers,' iii. pp. 60, 61; Wodrow, iv. p. 294.
- <sup>18</sup> Wodrow, iv. p. 295.

- 19 'Marchmont Papers,' iii. p. 61.      20 'Marchmont Papers,' iii. p. 62.
 21 'Historical Observes,' p. 181.      22 Wodrow, iv. p. 298.
 23 Fox, 'James II.,' Appendix, cxiv.
 24 Fountainhall, 'Historical Observes,' p. 190.
 25 Dr. M'Crie, in his 'Brysson,' points out Fox's singular error in overlooking Barillon's letter, published by himself! Macaulay had read Dr. M'Crie: he quotes Brysson as Bresson, but he, too, abstained from citing Barillon, his favourite authority.
 26 'Historical Observes,' p. 185.      27 Wodrow, iv. p. 310.
 28 'Additional Information for the Marquis of Atholl, against the Earl of Argyll.'
 29 Wodrow, iv. pp. 321-328.
 30 Wodrow, iv. p. 360.      31 Wodrow, iv. pp. 360-362.
 32 Fountainhall, 'Historical Notices,' ii. pp. 700, 710-711.
 33 Wodrow, iv. p. 366.      34 Wodrow, iv. p. 393, note.
 35 Wodrow, iv. p. 428.      36 Hume Brown, ii. p. 436.
 37 Wodrow, iv. pp. 438-445.      38 Wodrow, iv. p. 446.
 39 Wodrow, iv. pp. 406, 407.
 40 Fountainhall, 'Historical Notices,' ii. p. 793.
 41 Burnet, iii. p. 133.      42 Burnet, iii. p. 141.
 43 Burnet, iii. pp. 257, 258.
 44 Fountainhall, 'Historical Notices,' ii. p. 878.
 45 Balcarres Memoirs touching the Revolution in Scotland, Bannatyne Club, 1841.
 46 Macpherson, 'Original Papers,' iii. p. 299.
 47 Burnet, iv. p. 39.      48 Wodrow, iv. p. 467.
 49 Keith's 'Catalogue,' pp. 65-72.
 50 Balcarres Memoirs touching the Revolution in Scotland, Bannatyne Club, p. 5.
 51 'William Carstares,' p. 161.      52 'William Carstares,' pp. 164, 165.
 53 'William Carstares,' p. 169.      54 Wodrow, iv. pp. 469-472.
 55 Balcarres Memoirs touching the Revolution in Scotland, Bannatyne Club, 1841, p. 9.
 56 Balcarres Memoirs touching the Revolution in Scotland, Bannatyne Club, 1841, p. 16.
 57 Balcarres Memoirs touching the Revolution in Scotland, Bannatyne Club, 1841, p. 17.
 58 'Six Saints of the Covenant,' ii. pp. 182, 183.
 59 'Six Saints of the Covenant,' i. pp. 321-323; ii. pp. 184, 185.
 60 Swift censures Burnet for using the word "mob," short for "mobile," which was recently come into fashion.
 61 Balcarres Memoirs touching the Revolution in Scotland, Bannatyne Club, 1841, pp. 26-32; Napier, 'Dundee,' iii., citing the MS. minutes of the Convention.
 62 Mackay, 'Memoirs,' pp. 4-7 (1833).
 63 'Historical MSS. Commission,' xi. pp. 6, 178.
 64 Leven and Melville Papers, ii. (1843).
 65 Balcarres Memoirs touching the Revolution in Scotland, Bannatyne Club, 1841, p. 37.

DA
760
L25
v.3

Lang, Andrew
A history of Scotland

PLEASE DO NOT REMOVE
CARDS OR SLIPS FROM THIS POCKET

---

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO LIBRARY

---

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

3 1761 01370963 9

A HISTORY OF SCOTLAND

James III and VIII.

By permission of James Maxtone Graham, Esq. of Cullaghey.

500
1874

A HISTORY OF SCOTLAND

FROM

THE ROMAN OCCUPATION

BY

ANDREW LANG

IN FOUR VOLUMES

VOL. IV.

WITH A FRONTISPIECE AND INDEX TO COMPLETE WORK

82399
28/5/07

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD AND SONS
EDINBURGH AND LONDON
MCMVII

MICROFORMED BY PRESERVATION
SERVICES
DATE MAY 01 1990

PREFACE.

---

WITH this volume ends my 'History of Scotland,' closing when the last armed attempt to make Scotland once more an independent and separate nation was broken at Culloden. The fortunes of the country after that disaster must be left to the energy of some other hand.

The book is a "general history" of the events of seventeen centuries, and I cannot suppose that it does not contain errors to be joyously detected by specialists in various fields of research. I have never seen a History which was impeccable, and though I have throughout distrusted tradition, and endeavoured to discover the most original and authentic sources of information, it is not to be dreamed that my researches have been exhaustive.

Sir Walter Scott gave his assent to the saying that, "If the Scots do not prefer Scotland to truth, they certainly prefer Scotland to inquiry." Human nature prefers the good old story learned at school, or from tradition, to inquiry, with new results. Yet it is not the province of History to "preserve our illusions." I humbly venture to think that, even in histories for schools, it would be wise to let the pupils understand something about the nature and sources and relative credibility of historical evidence. Even in some passages of this volume it may be found that Memoirs written by their authors, mainly from memory, long after the events narrated, and that oral traditions, late and destitute of quoted authority, have been preferred by our historians to accessible contemporary despatches and other written records. I hope that the character of the last Stuart Prince of Wales born in England is here drawn with a measure of truth which has hitherto been withheld—partly from prejudice, partly from lack of many documents now accessible.

The Scottish History Society, meanwhile, has done much admirable work in publishing valuable manuscripts, and my thanks are due to Mr Blaikie, Mr Fitzroy Bell, and others for the 'Itinerary of Prince Charles,' the 'Memorials of Murray of Broughton,' and Bishop Forbes's 'Lyon in Mourning,' while Sir Hubert Jerningham, K.C.M.G., kindly lent me his original manuscript of Captain Daniel's account of his adventures in 1745-46. I owe much to Dr Mackinnon's 'History of the Union between England and Scotland,' and to Mr Scott of St Andrews University for permission to read in MS. some Scottish chapters of his valuable work on commerce. Other debts are acknowledged in the proper places; but I have particularly to thank Miss Josephine MacDonell of Keppoch for her assistance in elucidating certain episodes in the battle of Culloden, and the Rev. John Anderson of the General Register House for his discovery of new and important evidence.

To Anthony Maxtone-Graham, Esq. of Cultoquhey, I must express my grateful thanks for permission to produce his portrait of James VIII. and III., "the Old Pretender." Even the Old Pretender was once young and of a goodly presence.

It would be ungrateful, indeed, not to record my obligations to Miss E. M. Thompson for her transcripts from MSS. in the Record Office and British Museum; to Mr Murray, M.A., St Andrews, for his aid in correcting proof-sheets and references; and to Messrs Maitland Anderson and Smith of the University Library, St Andrews, for their unfailing kindness.

If there is a portion of this work which the author would more gladly rewrite than another, it is the part which deals with the Reformation. Here tradition has been little checked in her vagaries. For example, my own account of the last days of James V. (i. 455) omits the fact, which I have since ascertained from the MS. Liber Emptorum, that James passed nearly a week of his last fortnight at Linlithgow, where his wife was expecting her confinement. He did not desert her till his fatal illness began. I have also found (see i. 459-468) that Arran, while he was accusing Cardinal Beaton of falsehood, as, later, of forgery, was deposing the Archbishop of Glasgow from the Chancellorship, and giving the keys to Beaton. The evidence is in the MS. Register of the Privy Seal. Again (ii. 64), I have left it an open question as to whether Arran (Châtelherault) did or did not write a letter in which he submitted to Francis and Mary. But later researches in French Foreign Office archives and other sources leave me in little or no doubt that the letter (January 25, 1560) was a forgery procured by Mary of Guise (see my 'John Knox and the Reformation,' pp. 280, 281. Longmans: 1905).

Again (ii. 59 and note 63), I was misled as to the contents of Kirkcaldy's letter (July 24, 1560) about the terms of the Treaty of Leith by Mr Joseph Bain's Calendar. The facts will be found in 'John Knox and the Reformation' (pp. 140-150). Calendars are useful for reference, but are not otherwise to be implicitly accepted without reference to the original documents. It is my hope, if ever I have the opportunity, to correct the whole work in the light of such criticisms as commend themselves by their justice and accuracy.

As is usual, new information comes in too late for the author's purpose. Thus, for the history of 1745-46, Kirsch's materials from the Vatican Archives have reached me too late. (Historisches Jahrbuch, XXVII. ii., iii. München: 1906.)

CONTENTS OF THE FOURTH VOLUME.

CHAPTER I.

PARLIAMENTARY AFFAIRS. VICTORY AND DEATH OF DUNDEE. 1689.

	PAGE		PAGE
The opposition . . . . .	2	The race for Blair Atholl . . . . .	14
Opposition to "the Articles" . . . . .	3	Dundee and Lord Murray . . . . .	15
Compromise rejected . . . . .	4	Killiecrankie Pass . . . . .	16
The Dalrymples attacked . . . . .	5	Question of the battlefield . . . . .	17
Movements of Dundee . . . . .	6	Disposition of the forces . . . . .	18
Mackay and Dundee . . . . .	7	The Highland charge . . . . .	19
Keppoch at Inverness . . . . .	8	Death of Dundee . . . . .	20
Dundee in Lochaber . . . . .	9	The great Dundee . . . . .	21
Narrow escape of Mackay . . . . .	10	Mackay and Cannon . . . . .	22
Stout conduct of the Macleans . . . . .	11	Cameronian victory at Dunkeld . . . . .	23
Advice of Lochiel . . . . .	12	Dunkeld . . . . .	24
Quarrel with Glengarry . . . . .	13

CHAPTER II.

PARLIAMENTARY AND ECCLESIASTICAL SETTLEMENT. MASSACRE OF GLENCOE. 1689.

Intrigues of the Club (1690) . . . . .	27	Dalrymple's plans (1691) . . . . .	39
Intrigues of Annandale (1690) . . . . .	28	Glencoe comes in too late (1692) . . . . .	40
Polwarth deserts the Club (1690) . . . . .	29	Description of Glencoe . . . . .	41
Lords of Articles abolished (1690) . . . . .	30	Submission of Glencoe (1692) . . . . .	42
The Club betray Jacobite secrets (1690) . . . . .	31	MacIans to be "extirpated" (1692) . . . . .	43
The Kirk reorganised—torture of Payne (1690) . . . . .	32	The eve of massacre . . . . .	44
A quiet General Assembly (1690) . . . . .	33	The massacre (1692) . . . . .	45
Cameronians and Assembly (1690) . . . . .	34	The adventure of the Bass (1691-94) . . . . .	46
Kirk and Cameronians (1690) . . . . .	35	The heroes of the Bass . . . . .	47
The Highlanders (1690-91) . . . . .	36	A troublesome General Assembly (1692-93) . . . . .	48
Breadalbane and the clans (1691) . . . . .	37	Church troubles (1693) . . . . .	49
"Rooting out the clans" (1691) . . . . .	38	Triumph of the Assembly (1694) . . . . .	50

CHAPTER III.

THE EAST INDIA COMPANY. THE DARIEN DISASTER.

1693-1702.

Parliament and Glencoe (1695) . . . . .	54	English desire to steal Paterson's site (1697) . . . . .	66
Favour and dismissal of Stair (1695)	55	Early colonial days (1698) . . . . .	67
Heresy and blasphemy (1695-96) . . . . .	56	Encounter with Spain (1699) . . . . .	68
Hanging a heretic (1697) . . . . .	57	Scottish prisoners of Spain (1699) . . . . .	69
Attempts to revive commerce (1604-1695) . . . . .	58	The colony deserted (1699) . . . . .	70
East India Company (1695) . . . . .	59	The new expedition (1699) . . . . .	71
William Paterson . . . . .	60	The colony surrenders (1700) . . . . .	72
Passing of the Act (1695) . . . . .	61	Simon of Lovat . . . . .	73
William "surprised" (1695) . . . . .	62	Scottish indignation (1700) . . . . .	74
Privileges of the Company (1695) . . . . .	63	Parliament (1700-1701) . . . . .	75
Interference of English Parliament (1695-96) . . . . .	64	William desires union (1700) . . . . .	76
The Darien secrets . . . . .	65	Death of William (1702) . . . . .	77

CHAPTER IV.

THE EVE OF UNION, 1702-1705.

Commission of Union (1702) . . . . .	81	"The Queensberry Plot" (1704) . . . . .	96
A new Parliament demanded (1702)	82	Queensberry loses office (1704) . . . . .	97
Changes in administration (1702) . . . . .	83	Parliament of 1704 . . . . .	98
Commissioners of Union meet (1702)	84	Succession—limitations of royal power (1704) . . . . .	99
Development of Scots Parliaments (1427-1703) . . . . .	85	Act of Security—English retort (1704)	100
Parliamentary evolution . . . . .	86	Pressure on Scotland (1704) . . . . .	101
Statesmen of 1703 . . . . .	87	The affair of Captain Green (1704-1705) . . . . .	102
The parties (1703) . . . . .	88	Green condemned to death (1705) . . . . .	103
Court, Cavalier, and Country parties (1703) . . . . .	89	Green hanged—mystery of The Speedy Return . . . . .	104
Act of Peace and War (1703) . . . . .	90	Parliament—Argyll and the Squadron (1705) . . . . .	105
Scots Act of Security (1703) . . . . .	91	Cavaliers restricting royal power (1705) . . . . .	106
Merits and defects of the Courtiers	92	Union by two votes (1705) . . . . .	107
Lovat and Queensberry . . . . .	93
Exploits of Simon Fraser . . . . .	94
Treachery of Simon (1703-1704) . . . . .	95

CHAPTER V.

THE UNION, 1705-1707.

The Commissioners (1706) . . . . .	110	Law and judicature . . . . .	115
"Federalism a chimera" (1706) . . . . .	111	Scottish Parliamentary representation . . . . .	116
Meetings of Commissioners (1706) . . . . .	112	The twenty-five Articles (July 1706)	117
Taxation and the equivalent . . . . .	113	Jacobite intrigues (1705-1706) . . . . .	118
Things exempt from taxes . . . . .	114

Resistance to Union (1706) . . . . .	119	"Pierce" and Kersland . . . . .	128
De Foe's descriptions (1706) . . . . .	120	Cunningham and Hepburn (1706) . . . . .	129
Belhaven's rhetoric . . . . .	121	Success of Kersland (1706) . . . . .	130
Attitude of the Kirk . . . . .	122	Hamilton deserts the party of violence (1706) . . . . .	131
Chances of a rising (1706) . . . . .	123	Hamilton breaks another plan (1707) . . . . .	132
Attitude of the Cameronians . . . . .	124	Hamilton a third time deserts (1707) . . . . .	133
The Cameronians . . . . .	125	"The end of an auld sang" (1707) . . . . .	134
Cunningham's intrigues (1706) . . . . .	126	Charges of bribery (1711) . . . . .	135
Kersland and De Foe (1707) . . . . .	127

CHAPTER VI.

JACOBITE MOVEMENTS, 1707-1708.

Colonel Hooke's mission (1707) . . . . .	138	Falshoods of Kersland (1707) . . . . .	145
Quarrels as to trade (1707) . . . . .	139	Ogilvie the spy (1707) . . . . .	146
The equivalent's welcome (1707) . . . . .	140	Designs of France (1707) . . . . .	147
Friction (1707) . . . . .	141	Forbin's failure (1708) . . . . .	148
Kersland and the Jacobites (1707) . . . . .	142	Jacobite fiasco (1708) . . . . .	149
The Jacobites backward (1707) . . . . .	143	End of Kersland . . . . .	150
Hooke and the Jacobites (1707) . . . . .	144

CHAPTER VII.

JACOBITES AND WILD WHIGS, 1708-1714.

Law of Treason modified (1708-1709) . . . . .	152	Repeal debated . . . . .	163
Taxation and tolerance . . . . .	153	Argyll in favour of repeal . . . . .	164
The case of Greenshields (1711) . . . . .	154	The Ministry and the Restoration (1713-1714) . . . . .	165
Complaints of the Kirk (1710-1711) . . . . .	155	Mysterious plans of Hamilton (1712) . . . . .	166
Toleration and abjuration (1714) . . . . .	156	Hamilton's fatal duel (1712) . . . . .	167
The question of patronage . . . . .	157	James's honour—Bolingbroke's intrigues (1714) . . . . .	168
History of patronage (1560-1592) . . . . .	158	Virtues and defects of James . . . . .	169
History of patronage (1592-1712) . . . . .	159	A price set on James's head (1714) . . . . .	170
Mr MacMillan's career . . . . .	160	Death of Anne—accession of George I. (1714) . . . . .	171
Career of Mr MacMillan . . . . .	161
The day of Auchensaugh (1712) . . . . .	162

CHAPTER VIII.

THE JACOBITE RISING, 1714-1715.

Jacobite preparations (1714-1715) . . . . .	174	James, Bolingbroke, and Mar . . . . .	181
James and the Duke of Berwick (1704-1715) . . . . .	175	Mar raises the standard (1715) . . . . .	182
The fatal blunders (1715) . . . . .	176	Preparations of Government . . . . .	183
Cross news (1715) . . . . .	177	Measures of Government . . . . .	184
James countermands his message . . . . .	178	Mar dilatory . . . . .	185
"Queen Oglethorpe" . . . . .	179	Character of James . . . . .	186
Flight of Ormonde (1715) . . . . .	180	Treachery of a Maclean . . . . .	187
		Stair's attempt on James . . . . .	188

Indolence of Mar . . . . .	189	Kenmure and Forster's risings . . . . .	195
Narrative of the Master of Sinclair . . . . .	190	Mar's position . . . . .	196
Mar's negligence at Perth . . . . .	191	Mackintosh crosses the Firth . . . . .	197
Feats of the Macgregors . . . . .	192	Argyll saves Edinburgh . . . . .	198
Loch Lomond expedition . . . . .	193	A feint on Stirling . . . . .	199
The Master's raid . . . . .	194	Mar advances and retires . . . . .	200

CHAPTER IX.

THE END OF THE RISING OF 1715.

Dissensions of the Border Jacobites . . . . .	205	Victory of Jacobite right wing . . . . .	217
The Border Jacobites enter England . . . . .	206	Defeat of Jacobite left wing . . . . .	218
Jacobites at Preston—Wills advancing . . . . .	207	A powderless army . . . . .	219
Mackintosh uses Preston as a fortress . . . . .	208	The Grumblers' Club . . . . .	220
Street-fighting at Preston . . . . .	209	"That hell" of confusion . . . . .	221
The Jacobites captured . . . . .	210	The king lands . . . . .	222
Jacobite quarrels at Perth . . . . .	211	The king's journey . . . . .	223
Delays of Mar . . . . .	212	The king's view of affairs . . . . .	224
Simon of Lovat reappears . . . . .	213	Mar "captures" James (1716) . . . . .	225
Adventures of Lovat . . . . .	214	Melancholy of James . . . . .	226
Lovat takes Inverness . . . . .	215	Cadogan sent to hasten Argyll's movements . . . . .	227
Sheriffmuir . . . . .	216	The burning of villages . . . . .	228
		Flight of James and Mar . . . . .	229

CHAPTER X.

THE SEQUELÆ OF THE RISING, 1716-1717.

Charges against Argyll . . . . .	232	Wodrow on the rising . . . . .	243
James discharges Bolingbroke . . . . .	233	Clanranald on the situation . . . . .	244
James influenced by Atterbury . . . . .	234	Strange adventures at Avignon . . . . .	245
Bolingbroke's defence . . . . .	235	Letter from an assassin . . . . .	246
Reply to Bolingbroke . . . . .	236	An unsolved puzzle . . . . .	248
Virtues of James . . . . .	237	Webb of Wynendael a Jacobite . . . . .	249
The hangman at work . . . . .	238	Oxford a Jacobite . . . . .	250
Trial of the Jacobite Lords . . . . .	239	Escape of Oxford (1717) . . . . .	251
Duncan Forbes in favour of mercy . . . . .	240	Illness of James . . . . .	252
Letter ascribed to Forbes . . . . .	241	James driven across the Alps . . . . .	253
All Scotland irritated . . . . .	242

CHAPTER XI.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS. THE STORY OF CLEMENTINA.
1716-1719.

Generous nature of James . . . . .	256	Wogan and Clementina (1718) . . . . .	261
Dr Erskine . . . . .	257	Spain and the Cause . . . . .	262
James and Sweden (1717) . . . . .	258	Death of Charles XII. . . . .	263
Mar, Lockhart, and Argyll . . . . .	259	The Regent's discoveries (1719) . . . . .	264
Death of Mary of Modena (1717) . . . . .	260	The king goes to Spain (1719) . . . . .	265

The new Armada (1719) . . . . .	266	Success of Charles Wogan . . . . .	273
Expedition to Scotland (1719) . . . . .	267	Wogan and James Sobieski . . . . .	274
The Armada ruined (1719) . . . . .	268	Wogan's wild geese . . . . .	275
Jealousies of Mar (1719) . . . . .	269	A great adventure . . . . .	276
Tullibardine and Marischal . . . . .	270	Escape of Clementina (1719) . . . . .	277
Before Glenshiel . . . . .	271	A melancholy honeymoon . . . . .	278
Battle of Glenshiel (1719) . . . . .	272

CHAPTER XII.

HERESY AND SCHISM, 1720-1740.

The Bourignon heresy . . . . .	282	Simson suspended (1728) . . . . .	297
The heretical Simson (1717) . . . . .	283	Ebenezer Erskine protests (1732) . . . . .	298
The Auchterarder Creed . . . . .	284	Rebuked and protests (1732) . . . . .	299
The Marrow controversy (1718) . . . . .	285	Secession . . . . .	300
General Assembly (1720) . . . . .	286	"Associated Presbytery" (1733) . . . . .	301
The Marrow men protest . . . . .	287	The power of the Keys . . . . .	302
"Neonomianism" . . . . .	288	Erskine and Achilles . . . . .	303
Salvation versus decent behaviour . . . . .	289	Compromise rejected . . . . .	304
Chicane about abjuration . . . . .	290	Seceders revive the Covenants . . . . .	305
Patronage . . . . .	292	Covenant " the term of communion" . . . . .	306
Moderates and Marrow men . . . . .	293	A backward glance (1638-1744) . . . . .	307
Mr Ralph Erskine . . . . .	294	Wodrow versus "enthusiasm" (1709) . . . . .	308
Mr Simson again (1726) . . . . .	295	The "Moderates" . . . . .	309
The Squadron in theology . . . . .	296

CHAPTER XIII.

THE SECESSION. PATRONAGE. WITCHCRAFT. 1736-1809.

Lovat and ecclesiastical politics (1736) . . . . .	313	Quarrel about the Burgess Oath (1746, 1747) . . . . .	319
Cantrips of witches . . . . .	314	The Erskines handed over to Satan . . . . .	320
Torture and murder of women (1705) . . . . .	315	The Erskine family divided . . . . .	321
The Seceders and Whitefield (1741) . . . . .	316	Doctrinal troubles . . . . .	322
"Revivals" in Scotland (1742) . . . . .	317	Dr M'Crie excommunicated (1806-1809) . . . . .	323
The Cameronians call Whitefield "a boar" . . . . .	318	Carlylean sentiment in history . . . . .	324

CHAPTER XIV.

THE JACOBITE CHURCHMEN AND STATESMEN, 1704-1735.

Scottish Episcopal non-jurors . . . . .	327	The Episcopal Church rent by factions . . . . .	332
James and the bishops (1720-1722) . . . . .	328	Ritualists and anti-ritualists (1725) . . . . .	333
"The Usages" in ritual . . . . .	329	Bishops "serving the Covenanted cause" (1726) . . . . .	334
Lockhart and the bishops (1722) . . . . .	330
James advises forbearance in love . . . . .	331

Lockhart is betrayed (1727) . . . . .	335	The prince's governors . . . . .	349
Mar accused of treachery (1722-1724) . . . . .	336	Grievances of Clementina (1725) . . . . .	350
Atterbury's plot and Mar (1722) . . . . .	337	Clementina leaves James (1725-1726) . . . . .	351
Layer's plot discovered (1722) . . . . .	338	James's remonstrance (1725) . . . . .	352
Atterbury's letters and Mar's reply (1722) . . . . .	339	Clementina's headaches (1726) . . . . .	353
Mar's behaviour to Atterbury (1722) . . . . .	340	Lockhart discovered (1727) . . . . .	354
Was Mar foolish or treacherous? . . . . .	341	Lockhart exiled (1727) . . . . .	355
Mar's imbecile scheme (1723) . . . . .	342	Argyll and the Squadrone (1721) . . . . .	356
James obliged to discard Mar . . . . .	343	The Malt Tax (1724) . . . . .	357
"So base a thing!" . . . . .	344	Compromise attempted . . . . .	358
Attempted defence of Mar . . . . .	345	Wade in Scotland (1725) . . . . .	359
James misrepresented by historians . . . . .	346	Glasgow malt riots (1725) . . . . .	360
James pacifies a clan feud (1724) . . . . .	347	Action of Forbes . . . . .	361
The temper of Clementina (1722-1726) . . . . .	348	The brewers yield . . . . .	362
		Lord George Murray converted . . . . .	363

CHAPTER XV.

LIFE IN THE HIGHLANDS, 1715-1745.

Lovat on the Highlands (1724) . . . . .	367	Celtic oral literature . . . . .	378
Strength of the clans . . . . .	368	Second-sight—illiteracy . . . . .	379
Disarmament (1725) . . . . .	369	Lady Grange's story . . . . .	380
Wade's roads . . . . .	370	Character of Lord Grange . . . . .	381
Food in the Highlands . . . . .	371	Wodrow on Lady Grange . . . . .	382
Roads and agriculture . . . . .	372	Her kidnapping (1732) . . . . .	383
Agriculture . . . . .	373	Sufferings of Lady Grange . . . . .	384
Land tenure . . . . .	374	Attempt to rescue her (1740) . . . . .	385
Robbery and black-mail . . . . .	375	Story of Glengarry's wife (1727) . . . . .	386
Poetry and tales . . . . .	376	Glengarry's wife (1727) . . . . .	387
Honour, humanity, and hospitality . . . . .	377

CHAPTER XVI.

LIFE IN THE LOWLANDS, 1700-1745.

Lowland agriculture . . . . .	389	University curriculum . . . . .	401
Food and houses . . . . .	390	Lectures . . . . .	402
Enclosures . . . . .	391	Edinburgh University . . . . .	403
The Levellers (1725) . . . . .	392	Professors' salaries . . . . .	404
Education starved . . . . .	398	Poverty . . . . .	405
Schools . . . . .	394	Glasgow University . . . . .	406
The dominie . . . . .	395	Life of undergraduates . . . . .	407
Ruddiman . . . . .	396	Election of professors . . . . .	408
Studies . . . . .	398	Aberdeen University . . . . .	409
St Andrews University . . . . .	399	The libraries . . . . .	411
The classics . . . . .	400	Revival of literature . . . . .	412

Tea and poetry . . . . .	413	A fast is held . . . . .	418
The old songs . . . . .	414	Christian Shaw as a thread manu- facturer . . . . .	419
No art . . . . .	415	Gardening and planting . . . . .	420
Finance . . . . .	416
Christian Shaw's case (1697) . . . . .	417

CHAPTER XVII.

THE EXILED COURT. THE AFFAIR OF PORTEOUS. BEGINNING OF "THE 'FORTY-FIVE." 1728-1745.

Wharton and Atterbury (1727) . . . . .	423	Murray in Paris (1743) . . . . .	440
Death of Atterbury (1732) . . . . .	424	Murray and the English Jacobites (1743-1744) . . . . .	441
The childhood of Prince Charles . . . . .	425	Balhaldy enlists France (1743) . . . . .	442
"The Order of Toboso" . . . . .	426	Balhaldy launches the Prince (1744) . . . . .	443
Reconciliation and death of Clem- entina (1735) . . . . .	427	Dubious dealing of Louls with James (1743) . . . . .	444
Lovat turns to Jacobitism (1737) . . . . .	428	Prince Charles sails to France (1744) . . . . .	445
The Porteous affair (1736) . . . . .	429	Scottish confusions (1744) . . . . .	446
The hanging of Porteous . . . . .	430	French fleet for the Thames (1744) . . . . .	447
The parsons and the murder . . . . .	431	Disasters of the French fleet . . . . .	448
Argyll against Walpole (1737) . . . . .	432	Charles in retirement (1744) . . . . .	449
The Kirk and the Government . . . . .	433	Murray and Charles . . . . .	450
Origins of the civil war . . . . .	434	James rebukes Charles . . . . .	451
War with Spain (1739) . . . . .	435	Charles's own adventure (1745) . . . . .	452
Walpole and King James . . . . .	436	Murray the chief cause . . . . .	453
Murray and Balhaldy . . . . .	437
Intrigues in 1743 . . . . .	438
Balhaldy's schemes . . . . .	439

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE RISING OF 1745.

The Prince lands (1745) . . . . .	458	The Prince knows his danger . . . . .	473
The first recruits . . . . .	459	The Prince's plan rejected . . . . .	474
Cope's preparations . . . . .	460	Siege of Carlisle . . . . .	475
The standard is raised . . . . .	461	March through Lancashire . . . . .	476
Cope evades Charles . . . . .	462	Lancashiré does not rise . . . . .	477
Lord George Murray joins Charles . . . . .	463	Appearance of the army . . . . .	478
Charles crosses the Forth . . . . .	464	Lord George's feint . . . . .	479
Panic in Edinburgh . . . . .	465	The situation at Derby . . . . .	480
Lochiel enters Edinburgh . . . . .	466	The chiefs cause the retreat . . . . .	481
The Prince marches against Cope . . . . .	467	Charles's army of the North . . . . .	482
The eve of Prestonpans . . . . .	468	Skirmish of Inverurie . . . . .	483
The battle of Prestonpans . . . . .	469	The fight at Clifton . . . . .	484
Humane conduct of Charles . . . . .	470	Garrison left in Carlisle . . . . .	486
The political situation . . . . .	471	Return to Scotland . . . . .	487
England reinforced . . . . .	472

CHAPTER XIX.

THE END OF JACOBITISM, 1745-1746.

Hawley advances (1746) . . . . .	491	The attempted surprise . . . . .	507
Falkirk fight . . . . .	492	Lord George's error . . . . .	508
Inaction after Falkirk . . . . .	495	Forces at Culloden . . . . .	509
Death of the Glengarry leader . . . . .	496	Culloden . . . . .	510
Alleged desertions . . . . .	497	Conduct of the Prince . . . . .	514
Quarrel of Prince and chiefs . . . . .	498	Strange's account . . . . .	515
The Prince prophesies the end . . . . .	499	Conduct of the Prince . . . . .	516
The rout . . . . .	500	No fixed rendezvous . . . . .	517
The retreat . . . . .	501	Loyalty to the Prince . . . . .	518
The rout of Moy . . . . .	502	Cruelties of Cumberland . . . . .	519
Operations in the North . . . . .	503	Unbroken spirit of the clans . . . . .	520
Successes of Lord George . . . . .	504	Suppressive legislation . . . . .	521
"The finest part of the expedition" . . . . .	505	The end . . . . .	522
At Culloden . . . . .	506

APPENDIX.

The Death of Keppoch . . . . .	527
--------------------------------	-----

---

INDEX (by Miss E. M. SAMSON) . . . . .	537
--	-----

A HISTORY OF SCOTLAND FROM THE ROMAN OCCUPATION.

---

CHAPTER I.

PARLIAMENTARY AFFAIRS. VICTORY AND DEATH OF DUNDEE.

1689.

WITH occasional exceptions, as under Charles I. (1640-1641), Scotland had hitherto been almost free from the peculiarities of constitutional government. The king, or whatever party chanced to be in power, briskly hurried measures through Parliament by means of the packed Committee called the Lords of the Articles. There had been little debating, and no waste of time in verbal wranglings. On the other hand, when the Convention was declared to be a Parliament by William III. (June 5, 1689), all the elements which make for parliamentary delay were introduced by politicians eager for parliamentary reforms. The leading statesmen may be briefly characterised.

The Privy Council selected by the king included the Duke of Hamilton, who was appointed Royal Commissioner. Hamilton inherited the wayward and unstable character of a house demoralised by long expectancy of the Crown. He was anxious himself to drive time, and especially to avoid the full restoration of the Kirk. The unstable Atholl went to Bath: one of his sons was in prison for Jacobite leanings; another, though inclined to the winning side, was under suspicion. Argyll had military duties which claimed his attention, and was peculiarly detested by the extreme Whigs. Crawford was appointed President in the Parliament: he was very poor, very presbyterian, and his letters, almost alone among those of the statesmen of the period, are rich in the texts and unctuous style of an older generation. Yet he was not a patron of the Cameronian Remnant. Office and the spoils of office were what he desired. He was on bad terms with Hamilton. The Secretary in Scotland was Melville, raised to an earldom by William. He had been of the Royal side at Bothwell Brig, but found it convenient to go to Holland at the time of the Rye-house Plot. In the correspondence of Melville we find him lectured, warned, and threatened by Polwarth and others.

Polwarth, who had a seat in the Privy Council, was as fond of public speaking, as pragmatic, as much opposed to authority, as he had been when ruining the expedition of Argyll. Sir James Montgomery of Skelmorley, also of the Privy Council, was his parliamentary ally. Both were great in "the Club," a set of malcontents who met in a tavern, arranged their schemes in private, and, as being practically an organised and permanent Committee, commanded the majority of votes. They then spent the first part of the session (June 5 to August 2) in opposing the king, in demanding constitutional privileges for the House, and in threatening to hang the officials whom they most detested, especially these old enemies of Claverhouse, Sir James Dalrymple and his son, Sir John, who was Lord Advocate. The Solicitor-General, Sir William Lockhart, was of course a representative of Government, and an opponent of the Club. In the modern slang of the House, Parliament was guided and dominated by a "cave"—namely, the Club—to which rallied disappointed place-hunters, such as Sir James Montgomery, who, disappointed in his hope of the Secretaryship, soon engaged in a treasonable plot. In Melville's correspondence, which is copious, we meet with the letters of all these men, full of their various humours. The moment when William was not firmly settled on his throne was favourable to agitation, liberal rather than patriotic.<sup>1</sup>

During part of the two months which witnessed the wrangles of the Estates, the castle, under the Duke of Gordon, endured a kind of burlesque siege, and was the centre of trivial conspiracies, exaggerated by Hamilton in hopes of diverting the assailants of prerogative from their attacks on Government. Permission to torture some of the suspected cavaliers was granted, but the thumbscrew does not seem to have been needed. They had little to confess, and that little they told freely. All this while the great Dundee was moving in the North, but his actions are scarcely touched on in the contemporary correspondence of men absorbed in votes, Bills, Acts, and amendments. The western Whigs, armed and organised, allowed the Cameronian regiment, under Angus, to be recruited from their numbers, not without many searchings of hearts and many pious adjurations to soldiers who were serving an uncovenanted prince. They petitioned the Estates to renew the Covenants and act on the advice of a General Assembly which should, of course, drive out conformist ministers, who were three-fourths of the placed ministers of the country, or more, according to Crawford's reckoning. If a General Assembly were held, these men would not be for pure presbyterial government. Therefore they must first be expelled, and later, this was done on a large scale: meanwhile beginnings were made in individual cases. The country was so far from being Williamite, that the Militia were not to be trusted—that is, the Militia as distinguished from the "fencible men." Of the Acts passed by the Estates at this time, hardly one was "touched" with the sceptre by the Commissioner. They were therefore void, and little need be said about them.

As the affairs of the Kirk had been the chief occasion of the recent discontents, it might have been expected that the new Parliament would have begun by expelling the preachers who conformed to prelacy and refused to read from the pulpit the order of April 13, denouncing James and enjoining prayers for William. But the ardent souls of the Club desired to seize the opportunity of a king still unsettled on his throne, and to bring the Estates up to the constitutional level of the Mother of Parliaments at Westminster.

On June 17 Hamilton communicated his instructions as to the grievance of Lords of the Articles. These, according to the king's wish, should be chosen, eight out of each Estate, plus the officers of State. The Estates voted against the inclusion of officers of State, and, when Hamilton would not accept their views, sent a written remonstrance to the king. They wished, in fact, to conduct all business "in plain Parliament," and to be freed from the constraints of the Lords of the Articles. On April 13, 1689, they had voted that "the Committee called the Articles is a great grievance to the nation, and that there ought to be no Committees of Parliament but such as are freely chosen by the Estates to prepare motions and overtures that are first made in the House." This was a stretch of power which a Scots Parliament had never enjoyed except during the weak years of Charles I. The advanced party were the more anxious to secure these powers, as the Duke of Gordon, on June 13, to the scorn and contempt of James's friends, surrendered Edinburgh Castle. If William was to be pressed by the Club, it could be done with most success before he had overcome armed opposition. "I see plainly," wrote Sir John Dalrymple to Melville the Secretary, "they resolve to necessitate the king to do all things by the advice of the Parliament, and to fall upon any that he shall employ" (such as Dalrymple himself) "without their approbation."<sup>2</sup>

William offered concessions. On June 18, Hamilton, as Royal Commissioner, introduced a Bill, not for abolishing but for regulating the election of the Lords of the Articles. There should be twenty-four members in the Articles, the Lords choosing eight out of their Estate, as also the Barons and Burghs out of theirs. These Lords of the Articles should not prevent the House from considering any matter, even if its consideration had been rejected by the Twenty-four. The Act as to the Articles passed in the first Parliament of the Restoration was to be rescinded, but officers of State were to remain as ex officio members of the Articles, over and above the Twenty-four.<sup>3</sup>

The House kept rejecting this compromise, and insisting on a return to the state of affairs as it was in 1640. On June 26 they stated the nature of their objections. A constant Committee, like that proposed by William, was "a great grievance." Delay, they said, was in the very nature of the Articles: nothing could be proposed till the Lords of the Articles had first considered it, even though, by the compromise, their decision was not to be final. The compromise fixed the number of members in the Committee, which, it was argued on the other side, ought to be left to the discretion of the House in each case. The House would not acquiesce in the necessary presence of the officers of State in the Committee.<sup>4</sup>

On July 4 Hamilton proposed another compromise, raising the number of members from each Estate to eleven, and permitting monthly or even more frequent re-elections.<sup>5</sup> In the following year the House obtained all its desire, and was a free Parliament for seventeen years, after which it ceased to exist. Hamilton had tried, vainly, to draw the trail of Kirk reform across that on which the malcontents were in full cry, but he failed (July 10). An attack was now made on Argyll, and on Sir John Dalrymple, for tampering with their instructions when they went to offer the crown to William. Skelmorley also proposed to accuse Sir James Dalrymple of giving the king certain advice,—“he will lay it at Lord Melville’s doors, and we shall be quit of both.” Dalrymple was for a dissolution,—“the longer we sit, and the more concessions, the worse.”<sup>6</sup> Bets of five to one were laid that Dalrymple would be sent prisoner to the castle, where the unhappy Balcarres was again immured.<sup>7</sup> By July 13, after some four weeks’ session, no business whatever had been done: how unlike the proceedings of the Reformation convention of 1560! Hamilton (July 13) wrote that without his intervention the layers of odds on Dalrymple’s imprisonment would have won their bets.<sup>8</sup> It is to be remembered that Mr Renwick, the last martyr of the Covenant, had been condemned while Dalrymple was King’s Advocate. Though himself a sufferer under Claverhouse, he was hated by friends of the Covenant, and also by the older noblesse, while his opinion of the clans was so bad that he thought they would earn the £20,000 offered for the head of Dundee, as of old for that of Montrose.<sup>9</sup> William was to find in Dalrymple the most unpopular, if the most unscrupulously serviceable, of his ministers.

The advanced party now challenged the king’s right to nominate judges, and by “stopping the Signet” (practically closing the Great Seal) they delayed administration of judges. Fifteen thousand of the well-organised fighting-men of the Remnant in the West were in arms, under officers of their own choosing.<sup>10</sup> The western Whigs were thought to intend to move on Edinburgh for the laudable purpose of “the quickening of Parliament”: they by no means liked or understood the nature of constitutional delays. Sir James Montgomery (July 23) was showing the teeth of his discontent in a letter to Melville.<sup>11</sup> An Act was passed against the employment in State offices of various unpopular persons, especially such as had served, like the Dalrymples, under the old Government; but Hamilton refused to “touch” it as a token of the Royal assent. Bills were introduced on Church matters: that of Hamilton retained patronage, “a heavy yoke” said Crawford, and forbade the preachers to meddle in affairs of State, “the cause of many confusions and scandalous schisms.” Cardross’s draft abolished patronage, and proposed to purge out the disaffected ministers. Neither Bill became law, though the Presbyterian ministers petitioned for the "outing" of conformists. "Outed" ministers of the old régime were, however, restored to their parishes. While the Estates were still voting to "stop the Signet" and the course of justice, came tidings first of Killiecrankie, then of the death of Dundee in the arms of victory,—the defeat of Mackay was known long before the consolatory news of the hero's fall,—and Parliament, adjourned on August 2, did not meet again till April.<sup>12</sup>

This Parliament, with its Club, resembled the French Assemblies dominated by the Jacobin Club in the Revolution. It granted no supplies, but that screw had not the force of the same instrument in the hands of the Parliament of England, Scottish supply being insignificant to the English king. The stoppage of justice was dexterously removed by William in November, three of the judges previously on the Bench being appointed as an examining board for the admission of new members. The President, Sir George Lockhart, had been shot in the street by Chiesly of Dalry, father of Lady Grange, later so notorious: he was a desperate man, checked in a course of brutal injustice to his wife. The new President was Sir James Dalrymple, the Coke of Scottish Jurisprudence, a man hated by the extremists, and bearing the burden of that melancholy and mysterious family history which Scott has made immortal in 'The Bride of Lammermoor.' The proceedings of this Parliament, trammelled by the distance from London and the tardiness of communications, as well as by the temper of Polwarth and the Club, indicated, no less than other signs of the times to be later discussed, the necessity of the Union.

During the short session of June 5 to August 2, we find but little in the correspondence of the Scottish Secretary about the movements of Dundee. They were, indeed, in old Scots phrase, a "runabout raid"; Dundee beginning his campaign with but a handful of fifty or sixty horses, riding about the country to raise the clans who had served Montrose, and being pursued by Mackay, who, with mixed and inadequate forces, tried to stop or surround him.<sup>13</sup>

On March 27 Dundee replied to a letter from Hamilton and the Convention, summoning him to lay down arms and appear in Edinburgh. He said that he was living in peace at home, and that the hillmen had not been told to lay down their arms.

His horsemen did not exceed the number allowed by the Convention, and fell far short of Argyll's companions. Livingstone and other friends were known to have left him: he could not, in safety, pass through the country to Edinburgh, nor could he leave his wife "in the state she was in." If undisturbed till her trial was over, he would give parole to be peaceful "in the meantime."

On March 30 Dundee was denounced rebel in Edinburgh, while his commission, from James in Ireland, with a bragging letter from Melfort (March 29), was intercepted. Mackay now sent Sir Thomas Livingstone's dragoons to seize Dundee; the regiment (late Dunmore's) was at heart loyal to James, including Lieutenant-Colonel Livingstone, and sent useful messages to the object of their pursuit. He therefore retreated to his house of Ogilvy, taking his last farewell of his wife. He unfurled the Royal Standard (April 12-15?) on a hill-top outside Dundee, and on April 20 escaped from a surprise planned by Livingstone. Mackay, to prevent Dundee from "playing his personage" among the clans, and fearing that the Gordons would flock to him, ordered the Master of Forbes to use his hostile clan, and bade Atholl call out the Stewarts and Murrays to intercept him. But Stewart of Ballechin, the factor of the Marquis, was loyal, and, whether by connivance of the Atholl family or not, disobeyed the command. The Earl of Mar, too, was expected to be useful, also the chief of the Grants was to hold the fords of Spey. But the Grants (a clan with a strong taste for neutrality) made no speed, and Mar fell ill and died, while Mackay with a small force marched to the town of Dundee. His enemy had traversed the North, had doubled back, and was at Fettercairn on his way to Brechin, but hearing of Mackay's approach he doubled back again. Mackay, in pursuit, met Forbes, whose levies he dismissed as "little like the work," and at Strathbogy heard of Dundee in his neighbourhood. But he also heard, as he moved north after Dundee, who evaded him, of a letter in which the Viscount told the Magistrates of Elgin that he was coming with a contingent of 1000 Macdonalds, whom he had picked up at Inverness. Mackay, "at some nonplus," marched towards Elgin, hoping to be recruited by local levies, but found the country quite devoid of enthusiasm for "deliverance." At Forres he heard that Dundee had vanished from Inverness, and himself marched thither.

Dundee, in fact, when he went north from Fettercairn, had been joined at Castle Gordon by Dunfermline, with some fifty horse. Reaching Inverness, he there found forces less valuable than those which Montrose took over from Colkitto: they were led by Macdonald of Keppoch, who was, says Philip in 'The Græmeid,' quodlibet in facinus spoliolum impulsus amore, "a man capable of any crime, if he had a chance of looting." Keppoch happened then to be at Inverness, besieging the town, for the following reasons. Dundee, as he rode home from Edinburgh in March, had met Drummond of Balhaldy at Dunblane, who told him of the confederacy of the usual loyal clans—Camerons, Macleans, Macdonalds. He sent them a message, and as he moved north before Mackay he received their answer. They would "send a detachment to meet him on the borders of the Highlands," and Keppoch was despatched with his men to form this convoy. Macaulay makes the strange statement that Dundee "at this time seems to have known little and cared little about the Highlanders,"<sup>14</sup> and Balcarres says that he did not think of going to the Highlands till Livingstone tried to capture him. Dundee, in fact, could not conceivably be ignorant of the military value of the plaids, and he put himself into communication with Lochiel from the beginning, before he raised the standard.

But Dundee may well have been amazed by the conduct of Keppoch, a rebel to the Stewart as well as to the Orange Government. He found the chief in the act of "holding up" the town of Inverness for ransom, and informed him that he "would be looked on as a common robber."<sup>15</sup> Dundee extricated the town, Keppoch receiving 4000 marks (or £2700 Scots), which Dundee promised to repay—when the king came to his own again! Keppoch, then, in place of acting on Lochiel's orders and joining Dundee, strolled home with his plunder.<sup>16</sup>

Dundee marched to Invergarry, Glengarry's castle on Loch Oich, thence to Badenoch, and, hearing of Mackay's attempts to raise, or rather hound out, the reluctant neutral clans—Forbeses and Grants,—he fixed a tryst for May 18 at Lochiel's house on Loch Arkaig in Lochaber, a country so remote and rugged as to be safe from regular forces. Dundee, leaving Mackay at Inverness, now marched through Badenoch and Atholl, where Ballechin aided him, descended on Perth, and took public money, horses, and prisoners, including the Laird of Blair, who was sent to a remote western island of the Macleans. Mackay, after fortifying Inverness, attempted to win the Frasers and Mackenzies, or rather to hound them out, according to Lord Tarbet's letters, by force, but he found them rather against him than for him. He therefore ordered General Ramsay, with 600 of the Scoto-Dutch, to come north through Atholl and Badenoch and meet him, lest Dundee with the Camerons should fall on his own flank. But the civil authorities in Edinburgh took a crowd of Dutch fishing-vessels for the French fleet, were alarmed, and detained Ramsay, greatly endangering Mackay. He, by Tarbet's advice, proposed that Government should buy up the Argyll superiorities over the Camerons, Macleans, and other clans for £5000, as he reckoned that these loyalists were really at war with Argyll, not against William. But Government pitched on Campbell of Calder to negotiate this treaty—a Campbell "in whom the Highlanders could not be supposed to repose much trust," says honest Mackay. He himself wrote twice to Lochiel, who scorned to answer. Glengarry, when approached, politely suggested to Mackay that he should follow the example of Monk and procure a Restoration!

Meanwhile Dundee threatened the town of his own titular name, in which Lieutenant-Colonel Livingstone, with his dragoons, kept quiet, being friendly, but unable to join him. Having picked up a few cavaliers, Dundee went back through Atholl, where Ballechin secured the safety of his communications and intercepted the envoys of Mackay to Ramsay and to Edinburgh. From Strath-Tay Dundee led his men by rough paths to Loch Rannoch, and, passing along the north side of that black wind-beaten mere, went by way of Loch Treig-head, north-west, to Glenroy. Many horses were hopelessly bogged, and the author of 'The Græmeid,' with others, tramped on foot, carrying his saddle on his shoulders, "through regions condemned to perpetual frost, and never before trodden by the foot of man or horse. . . . Gladly Lochaber receives the Graham into her bosom. . . ." "Far Lochaber is certainly the world's end!" exclaimed the weary troopers. The Cameron tartan seems then to have been blue and yellow, if we may believe the poet. Dundee summoned the chiefs, Glengarry and the rest, and the fiery cross was sent round. The cross, of old, had been dipped in the blood of a slaughtered goat, but this appears to have been regarded now as pagan, and the cross was painted with red wax.<sup>17</sup>

Meanwhile Mackay, at Inverness, had been disappointed, as we saw, in making a junction with Ramsay, who was marching from Edinburgh. Ramsay, as he went north, found the Atholl men armed: they averred that Dundee lay between him and Mackay, and, when the two Williamite leaders might have joined hands, thinking that there was a lion in his path Ramsay hurried back to Perth. Dundee, knowing Ramsay's movements through despatches intercepted by Ballechin, tried to fall on him in Badenoch; and Mackay, much puzzled, set out to cut between Dundee and the south country. He hoped to surprise the Graham, and actually came within a mile and a half of his strongly situated camp within a wood and marsh, but did not repeat the success of Leslie over Montrose at Philiphaugh. Disappointed, Mackay denounced Tarbet (who was apparently, to judge by his letters, doing his best for a peaceful settlement) and Atholl to the Government. Tarbet was arrested, but after being released went to London, where he and his cousin Melville, the Secretary for Scotland, determined "to lose the General [Mackay], . . . though with him should be lost at the same time the king's service," says Mackay.<sup>18</sup>

That General, now reinforced from England, concentrated in the Grant country, hoping much from the sabres of Livingstone's dragoons on the level "haughs" or plains by the river. It was then a military postulate that Highlanders could not face cavalry, a theory which the clans were to demolish in practice. A deserter or spy from Dundee's camp revealed to Mackay the real intentions of Livingstone's dragoons, which made him uneasy. Dundee now took and burnt the fort of Ruthven held for William in Badenoch,—a fort which later defied Prince Charles in the beginning of the campaign of 1745. The deserter was released, and was able to tell Mackay that his cavalry was in treacherous communication with Dundee, who was within three miles of him. Mackay retreated before an enemy "four times his number," and escaped, "the hand of Providence being very visible."<sup>19</sup> The 'Memoirs of Lochiel' attribute Mackay's escape to the darkness of the night:<sup>20</sup> it was indeed fortunate for the Whig cause, since, if Mackay's little force of 700 had been swallowed up, all Scotland north of Tay would have rallied to King James.<sup>21</sup> It is curious to find the worthy laird of Scourie (Mackay) stopping to moralise, quite in Knox's manner, on the parallel between himself and "Saul, David, and others," whom "God called to a double blessing."<sup>22</sup>

Hurrying away from Dundee south-east, as hard as he could, Mackay was met by reinforcements, under Berkley (Barclay) and Leslie; he at once turned again in the clear long twilight, and meant to encounter the foe from whom he had been flying. This attempt to surprise Dundee at Edenglassie was frustrated by the treachery of some of Livingstone's dragoons. Mackay's force, however, had a ruffle with a detached wandering party of Dundee's,—Macleans, under Lochbuy,—who, surprised by 200 horse, seized a hill and held it with the resolution characteristic of their clan.<sup>23</sup> Mackay and the Lochiel writer give totally contradictory accounts of the losses on both sides, on June 9—a date is welcome!<sup>24</sup> The assailants were some of Livingstone's dubious dragoons: they were true, however, to their salt, and were accompanied by some of Berkley's (Mackay's "Barclay's") horse. Surrounded by the hostile cavalry, the Macleans charged with the claymore and routed the enemy. The author of 'The Græmeid' says that the Macleans stripped the red coats from the fallen English: he himself, being in command of the cavalry outposts of Dundee, led the Macleans, who had lost their way in the dark, to his chief.<sup>25</sup> Dundee now heard from the friendly dragoons that they could not join him, they were too closely watched, and there were rumours that James's son, the Duke of Berwick, was a prisoner. The Viscount now disbanded his Highland levies for the time, the Gordons left him, and he was in bad health. He was presently joined by Clanranald with his Macdonalds, and by Macdonald of Sleat, by some regarded as the head of the Sons of Donald, though Glengarry has probably the best claim to represent the blood of the Isles.*

Mackay, failing to find Dundee, went to Inverness and disposed of his forces here and there, as seemed best, about the country. But he found that he could not hope to subdue Dundee's guerilla war in the hills. He therefore requested the Government to make and garrison a strong fort at Inverlochry (now Fort William), to bridle the Camerons, Stewarts of Appin, and Macdonalds of Glencoe and Keppoch. After some movements in Braemar he himself went to Edinburgh. But there he found the wrangling Parliamenteers utterly inefficient and indolent; they were rich in pretexts for delay, and, absorbed in their Bills and Clauses and attack and defence of

* This appears to be proved in 'Vindication of the Clanronald of Glengarry': Edinburgh, 1821. My copy bears the autograph of "Col. Ronaldson M'Donell of Glengarry and Clanronald."

Prerogative, they had not even aided Mackay by sending frigates to cruise on the west coast.<sup>26</sup> At the moment when Dundee nearly overtook Mackay at Edenglassie (when the hand of Providence was so visible to the Scoto-Dutch General), the mischievous Keppoch slipped off with his men, ravaged the lands of Mackintosh, his feudal foe, and burned the house of Dunachton. Dundee, "seeing the country all in a flame, . . . was in a very great rage when he was informed of the authors." He told Keppoch that he would rather be a private in a disciplined force "than command such men as he," and that the chief must pack off. Keppoch made an apology, —he thought Mackintosh was untrue to the cause!<sup>27</sup>

While Mackay, in Edinburgh, was making preparations to secure the great pass from the west Highlands down Strath-Tay, meaning by that road to reach Inverlochy and erect forts to bridle the clans, Dundee had collected an army of 4000 men of the Macleans, Macdonalds, Camerons, and Stewarts, and was in hopes of ammunition and reinforcements from James in Ireland. The delay in sending these supports greatly annoyed the Highlanders, and they had also heard how the Duke of Gordon tamely surrendered Edinburgh Castle (June 13).<sup>28</sup> During the interval of repose Dundee consulted the chiefs as to the propriety of drilling their men and teaching them the modern methods of war, such as Sir James Turner describes in his 'Pallas Armata.' The Lowland gentlemen and the younger chiefs preferred this plan, not so Lochiel. This chief, in youth, had been a ward of the Marquis of Argyll, but had been won over from Covenanting courses by the cruelty of the Presbyterians after Philiphaugh, and by the constancy of their victims, the cavaliers, who were put to death at St Andrews. His interests, also, were naturally opposed to those of his feudal superiors, the Campbells, who had absorbed so many of the weaker clans, and were ready to swallow the Camerons. Lochiel was no rude illiterate chief of the old school, but a man like the great Maclean of Dowart, in the age of James VI., acquainted with courts as well as with camps. He possessed unparalleled strength and vigour; when ninety years of age he had not lost a tooth, and, says a writer who met him in 1716, "he wrung some blood from the point of my fingers with a grasp of his hand." He was not the less respected for stories that he had the second-sight.<sup>29</sup> The sagacious chief was averse to the drilling of the Highlanders, as suggested by Dundee. The natural mode of Highland warfare, under the chiefs and tacksmen as officers, had been triumphant in the days of Montrose. A few weeks of drill would change the clans into ordinary recruits, whereas their tactics were to charge up to the enemy's line, deliver one volley at a few yards' distance, and rush in with the sword. Lochiel instanced the recent conduct of the Macleans, when they routed Mackay's dragoons, and his advice prevailed with Dundee.

Meanwhile that leader saw a new example of Highland manners. The Grants had hanged two or three Camerons. The Camerons, on this quarrel, marched against the Grants in Glen Urquhart. Among the Grants was a Macdonell of Glengarry's family, who, confiding "in his name and genealogy," bade the Camerons retire. They replied that they respected his name, but did not see why it should protect the king's rebels of another clan. In the fight which followed, the Camerons drove the cattle of the Grants, but unluckily slew this Macdonell. Glengarry, in great anger, appealed to Dundee and demanded satisfaction from Lochiel. Dundee, a Lowlander, could not see how Glengarry had been wronged. If any one had a right to complain, it was himself, for the Camerons had acted without his orders. "On your principles," said Dundee, "if we meet the enemy and kill a Macdonald or two among them, what then?" Glengarry put on an air of bluster; Lochiel's men outnumbered his, he said, but valour would equal the difference in force. Lochiel, who understood his man, only laughed: the chiefs met at dinner in the friendliest way. Glengarry, in fact, had merely been acting a part to keep up his prestige with the clan. Indeed, in Dundee's final battle the Macdonalds resigned their claim to fight always in the right wing of the Royal army.<sup>30</sup> On June 27 (?) or 28 (so the letter is endorsed), Dundee, who had at last heard from James in Ireland, wrote to explain his situation to Melfort, who was, unhappily, with the king. Dundee anxiously hoped for the fall of Derry, then in the agony of its famous siege. He insisted on reinforcements from Ireland: he had received only four or five barrels of ammunition, and, having no money, he dared not go down into the Lowlands where his men would make enemies by looting for a livelihood. "We have not twenty pounds." He assured his correspondent of his friendship, but could not conceal the fact of Melfort's extreme unpopularity with the king's party, though he assured people that Melfort was for universal tolerance in religion. Even if he had been, his way would have been odious to the Presbyterians. "By some steps that maybe you was forced to make in favour of these ungrateful beasts, the Presbyterians, you gave unhappy umbrage to both the others." On July 7, James, writing from Dublin, said that he was sending—one regiment! About money he said nothing. From Struan, on July 15, Dundee gave Sir Thomas Livingstone news of the fall of Derry, whether he believed in the report or not, and courteously declined to turn his coat and surrender like the Duke of Gordon. "Wherein I can serve you or your family at any time you think convenient you may freely employ me."<sup>31</sup>

Mackay now intended to march from Edinburgh, join hands with Argyll, and scatter the clans in loyal Lochaber. He meant to take 4000 foot, four troops of horse, and four of dragoons—then a kind of mounted infantry. The foot consisted of a battalion from each of his Scoto-Dutch regiments, with the regiments of Viscount Kenmure (who owed Dundee a grudge), and of Leven and Hastings. At Stirling Mackay meant to review some regiments of foot and new levies of cavalry.

But between Stirling and his goal lay the castle of Blair Atholl, commanding Strath-Tay and the Pass of Killiecrankie through the Garry valley. The place belonged to the shifty Marquis of Atholl (of the family of Murray of Tullibardine). Mackay was now informed by the son of the Marquis, Lord Murray, that, contrary to his commands, Stewart of Ballechin, commissioned by Dundee, was fortifying the Castle of Blair in James's interest: Atholl himself was in England, like his descendant during the Forty-Five. Lord Murray was sent by Mackay to Blair to keep his clan neutral: he reported that he had done his best, but that Ballechin was obstinate.<sup>32</sup>

Lord Murray now received three letters from Dundee, which he did not answer, but sent them to Melville in London. He declared that he had done his best for the Williamite cause, by desire of his father, who was still at Bath. It appears that, whoever won, the Atholl family was safe: they would get credit from James for the loyalty of the Atholl Stewarts, if Dundee succeeded; if William were victorious, the Murrays had been kept from joining Dundee. "The Marquis of Atholl," says Macaulay, "was the falsest, the most fickle, the most pusillanimous of mankind,"—so much so, that at Bath he only "pretended to drink the waters."*

* Macaulay characteristically styles Ballechin "Ballenach."

Dundee's first letter to Lord Murray (July 19) informs him that "from your own mouth I know your principles," Jacobite; but Lord Murray now had the opposite set of principles. James has publicly promised, says Dundee, "that he will secure the Protestant religion as by law established, and put them in possession of all their privileges,"—since the Restoration,—“which should satisfy the Episcopal and Cavalier party?” (sic.) “He promises to all other dissenters liberty of conscience, which ought to please the Presbyterians. . . .”

Nothing could possibly be more odious to the Presbyterians than “liberty of conscience,” as Dundee ought to have known. There is to be a general amnesty, he says, except for the subjects who came over from Holland with the usurper William, and those who voted to dethrone the king,—pretty sweeping exceptions! James “cannot alter the clement temper that has ever been found in the family, and has eminently appeared in his person,” writes Dundee quite seriously! He adds, with truth, that he has told Melfort of his unpopularity, has hinted that he should resign, and Melfort will resign, even against the king's desire. On July 23, Dundee, still unanswered, says that he has taken possession of the Castle of Blair, since “I heard the rebels designed to require you to deliver it up to them, which would have forced you to declare before the time I thought you designed.” Murray must, at one time, have been in two minds; however, now he was resolutely Williamite.<sup>33</sup> Balhaldie, in the ‘Memoirs of Lochiel,’ says that Lord Murray in Atholl in July pretended that he would join Dundee, but that Ballechin suspected him, and seized the Castle of Blair before he could garrison it.<sup>34</sup> Mackay now hurried to take that castle which Montrose had held and used as a base all through his year of victory. Thither his western Highlanders came to join him, while the levels of Strathspey afforded supplies. There now began a race between Dundee and Mackay for this place of strength, ever since 1746 shorn of its battlements, but even in that year able to defy Lord George Murray.

Dundee was delayed by waiting for Lochiel to come up. Meanwhile he sent two gentlemen to Lord Murray, from whom (July 25) he still expected loyalty to James. Lord Murray's clansmen, now convinced of his real designs, rushed down to the Tummell, and drank King James's health in water. Ballechin took command of this fine fighting body, who went off and attacked Mackay's stragglers after Killiecrankie. Mackay met Lord Murray, whom he misdoubted. Murray said that his clan had gone off to put their cattle in security, "which made the General not so apt to judge ill of Murray as others did." Dundee had been joined by Cannon with James's promised regiment, merely 300 new raised, naked, undisciplined Irishmen, who added to the disgust of the clans by bringing news that supplies sent by James had been captured by English ships near Mull. Dundee, however, had won the hearts of his army, half-starved as they were. He reached Blair on July 27, and heard that Mackay had already entered the narrow defile of Killiecrankie. In that Pass, where the railway now runs, under precipitous cliffs, through woods that yield glimpses of the foaming stream of the Garry, the track at that time only permitted three men to march abreast.<sup>35</sup> The question was debated: Should Dundee wait with his slender force at Blair till the mass of the clans came up, or should he advance and attack Mackay? The regular officers were for the former course. Their men were weary and hungry. True, the clans had been victorious under Montrose, but then at first they had only to deal with militia. On the other side Glengarry spoke. He inherited the spirit of the Glengarry of Montrose's time, "as if by the Pythagorean transmigration of souls"; being "more of a politician than an open, frank, and sincere neighbour," says Balhaldie. He was in every rising, "yet he managed matters so that he lost nothing in the event." He was brave, but not socially trustworthy. This chief counselled advance,—the clans should keep on the high ground, far above the Garry. Lochiel had been silent; to him Dundee appealed. He disclaimed knowledge of war; his successes in skirmishes he owed, he said, to the valour of his clan, not to his own skill as a tactician. But he was for instant fight: the men were in good heart, the sole hope was in taking the offensive. It was vain to think of stopping the Pass—Mackay must have emerged from the defile. Dundee's face brightened as he heard Lochiel, with whom he expressed his hearty agreement.<sup>36</sup>

Lochiel had still a word to say. Dundee must not expose himself: on him depended army, king, and country. If the Viscount would not give his promise, Lochiel and his clan would retire. The whole Council applauded the advice of the veteran Cameron, but Dundee implored to be permitted "to give one shear darg" (one harvest-day's work) to King James. The clans would look for no less ; in future he would promise never to risk his person : fatal words, but worthy of Claverhouse. Dundee marched along by the high ground, while Mackay had cleared the Pass and was resting his men in a long wide "haugh," then under corn, on the left bank of the Garry, below the house of Urrard.* In this wide haugh, hard by the road, is a standing-stone, probably prehistoric, which is often erroneously pointed out to tourists as marking the spot where Dundee fell. The stone certainly bore this character as early as 1735. Above this position is a steep declivity, and crowning it a plateau on which stand the house and gardens of Urrard, then styled Runraurie. Bodies of Highlanders were seen by Mackay on the heights to the south of this plateau, and above * Professor Sanford Terry, in his 'John Graham of Claverhouse,' pp. 334, 337, fixes the field of battle farther to the west, between New Mains and Lettoch. I follow the narrative of Donald M'Bain, who was present (Napier, iii. 724). He says, "we drew up at Runraurie" (Urrard), leaving the baggage at the laird's smithy. A well-cut half-moon-shaped shelter trench scoring the round hill front just east of Urrard, above the plateau, seems to lend probability to my opinion.

When looking for the probable position of Dundee, while he was waiting for sunset to make his charge, I observed this trench embracing the semicircular front of the hill : it seems to be of no service for any pastoral, or indeed for any but a military, purpose. If I am right, Dundee must have occupied his men during this long pause in making this shelter from Mackay's feeble light guns. In any case, the Marquis of Tullibardine, who not only knows the ground but, from experience, the nature of war, accepts the Urrard site for the battle, and informs me that on this site relics of the fray have been discovered.

In 'The Scottish Historical Review,' October 1905, Mr A. H. Millar, adopting Professor Sanford Terry's site, quotes verses attributed to Iain Lom Macdonald, "who was with the Jacobite forces" at the battle, as well as at Inverlochy in 1645. The poet speaks of arrows as the missiles of the clans, artillery that would have shocked Dugald Dalgetty. He describes the fight as beginning at sunset, which is true, but hardly "confirms Professor Terry's account of the battle in every particular." The solitary indication of the site of the battle is given in the words—

"In the tender birch copse,
Near the farm of MacGeorge,
Full many a gay cloak lies torn."

Unluckily we do not know where MacGeorge practised agriculture, nor can the birch copse be identified ; and when we hear that the clans occupied "the crest of the hill," we can only ask "of which hill?" The poem, whoever wrote it, was composed after 1714 : the poet, in the spirit of prophecy, says that King James shall return, and "to Hanover thou shalt go back," "thou" being one of the Georges. Now Iain Lom, the supposed author, died in 1709 or 1710, "aged about ninety" (op. cit., pp. 64, 70). The verses do nothing towards confirming any theory of the site of the battlefield, and, unless interpolated at a later time, cannot be by Iain Lom, "an eye-witness," if he was an eye-witness.

it, where a steep, round, grassy hill is scored with a semicircular trench, perhaps the work of Dundee's men. They had enough time to make it.

Mackay saw that from the plateau of Urrard the clans, if they seized the place, "could force us with their fire in confusion over the river"—the Garry.<sup>37</sup> He caused his men, who now rose into the view of the Highlanders, to occupy the plateau, "where we got a ground fair enough to receive the enemy, but not to attack them," as is evident to all who know the place. Dundee had now occupied the steep hill above Urrard, and had another very steep eminence at his back. As at Flodden, there is a giant staircase of three steps. Dundee occupied the middle, Mackay the lowest step, with a declivity behind him; below it is the haugh, and beyond that the Garry. Mackay, knowing the rapidity of the Highland attack, had abandoned the old plan of sticking the bayonet into the muzzle of the musket, and had invented a mode of fixing bayonets with two rings, so as not to interfere with the discharge of the piece, yet be ready for action against claymore and target. Having marched his men up the steep brae above the haugh, Mackay drew them up three deep, with a space between each little battalion, and a gap in his centre, where he placed his two troops of horse: they would charge through the interval when the Highlanders had delivered their volley, "which, because they keep no rank or file, doth ordinarily little harm."

Hastings' English regiment, with details from others, was on Mackay's right; Balfour's on his left, with deep boggy ground between the two wings, which seems a strange arrangement, as the cavalry was to act in the centre. The General, a brave man but a most entangled writer, was much sniped at by the Highlanders as he arrayed his little army. He made a speech, in one vast and wandering sentence, about what his men owed to the Protestant religion and to their own safety.<sup>38</sup> On Mackay's left was a house, probably that of Urrard; there were also cottages. Of these Mackay might have made a Hougomont, but Dundee occupied the house with 60 of Lochiel's 240 men, who do not appear to have held it long. Mackay's force overlapped Dundee's on each wing, widely as the Viscount spaced out his clan battalions. On his right were the Macleans (to which the Macdonalds seem to have made no demur), then his few Irish, then Clanranald and Glengarry. In the centre was his handful of some 40 cavalry, very ill horsed. On their left was Lochiel, facing Mackay, and enfiladed by Leven's battalion,<sup>39</sup> while the Macdonalds of Sleat were on the extreme left.

A musketry duel was now engaged in: Mackay's leathern guns made plenty of noise, while the clans set up a shout more cheerful than that of the enemy. From this the second-sighted Lochiel, at once the medicine man and the chief of his clan, drew a favourable omen. Dundee now moved as if to outflank Mackay and cut him off from the Pass of Killiecrankie, by which he expected reinforcements and supplies from Perth. It is stated by the author of the 'Memoirs of Lochiel' that the left wing, Sleat's Macdonalds, were posted by the chief among cottages and garden walls, as cover during the musketry duel, and that, in the general attack, the aide-de-camp did not carry to them their orders, while they were delayed by the nature of their position. Hour after hour went by, Dundee was waiting till the sun sank,—at this time it was blazing in the eyes of the clans. Mackay says that his brother now drove Dundee's skirmishers out of some houses which must have been cotters' hovels clustered about Urrard.

As the sun was touching the western line of hills, Dundee gave the word to charge: the Macdonalds and, according to Mackay, Dundee's handful of horse came down on Hastings, fired their volley, and rushed among the troops with the sword. If this be so, the right and centre behaved gallantly; indeed, through the mist of Mackay's confused verbiage we see one thing, that his infantry gave way all along the line, "was just plying over all, though sooner upon the left, which was not attacked at all, than to the right, because the right of the enemy" (the Macleans) "had not budged from their ground when their left was engaged."<sup>40</sup> The Lochiel writer says the very reverse,—it was Dundee's left, the Macdonalds of Sleat, who charged last, though then "they cut off the regiment which was assigned to them." In any case, the Highlanders, though with heavy loss, carried Mackay's men with them in their rush, slaying on every hand, and hurling them down the narrow Pass above the roaring Garry. But half of Hastings' regiment, on Mackay's extreme right, having been attacked by no enemy, stood firm, as did Leven's, which had enfiladed the Camerons.

Sixteen of Dundee's horse, returning from the pursuit, found these brave regiments on the field, but could gather no force which would assail them. On the field, too, lay Dundee, still breathing; a bullet had pierced his armour on the lower part of his left side.<sup>41</sup> Where Dundee was really hit is uncertain.<sup>42</sup> Mackay's officers examined his body later, and report that the bullet struck him in the left eye. If so, could he retain consciousness and speak his last reported words? As the gentlemen stood by their dying leader, Leven's regiment scattered them by its fire, and mortally wounded Haliburton of Pitcur, the tallest man of the army. The English infantry, or part of it, now occupied "a gentleman's house," Urrard, and could then not be dislodged.

Two different accounts are given of the manner in which Dundee met his death. He certainly rode first of his cavalry, disappeared into the smoke, and was then seen to rise in his stirrup and wave his men on. But Mackay says that the Jacobite horse charged with the Highland left, the Macdonalds of Sleat; while the Lochiel writer says that Dundee, in the centre, was not within sight of his extreme left.<sup>43</sup> Now Balcarres, in his report to James, represents Dundee as falling in the attempt to induce the Macdonalds of Sleat to follow him. The Lochiel writer, on the other hand, tells us that on the morning of the battle a certain Sir William Wallace, a kinsman of Melfort, produced a commission from James superseding the Earl of Dunfermline, and giving him the command of the cavalry. In the charge, Wallace, from want of courage, or some other reason (to avoid the morass?), wheeled off to the left, and caused a halt and confusion. Dundee, who was ahead of his men, did not know that he was not being followed, till, perceiving the fact, he turned in his saddle and waved on his horse. At this moment he was struck and fell, unperceived by Dunfermline and sixteen cavaliers, who routed the horse of Mackay. Wallace, with the rest, "did not appear until the action was over!"<sup>44</sup>

This appears to be the more probable story, and is given on the authority of some of Dunfermline's sixteen.

Mackay, as he observes, never inquired into details of misconduct, "because they were a little too generally committed." "In the twinkling of an eye," his left, and the enemy, "were out of sight." He collected Hastings' and Leven's men, and, "marching off very softly," crossed the Garry, where it is fordable, under Urrard, and at last made for Strath-Tay, by way of Castle Drummond, retreating to Stirling. The Atholl men accounted for fugitives down the Pass who escaped from the clans, and if the Highlanders lost six men on the field to Mackay's one (as Mackay declares), the proportions of losses were altered in the pursuit. The clans appear to have lost about 600 out of 2000 engaged. The Lochiel author says that the fighting men chased till they could not see friend from foe in the darkness, and that they did not, as some report, delay to spoil Mackay's baggage, which they never set eyes on till late in the following morning.

To the Whigs in Edinburgh the first rumours brought keen anxiety. They expected Dundee to be in Stirling immediately, and Scotland to be his own. But the later news of the Viscount's fall turned their mourning into joy. There is good evidence that a Mr Johnstone heard the words of Dundee when he fell. "How went the day?" he asked. "Well for the king, but I am sorry for your lordship." "It is the less matter for me, seeing the day went well for my master."<sup>45</sup> The great soldier who died for a master so miserable sleeps in the old church of Blair. He had given his "day of shearing darg" to the king, happy in the opportunity of his death. Not even he could restore that prince who from a brave and beautiful lad had sunk, under religious bigotry and the licence of Court life, to be a false poltroon, on whose word no man could rely, in whose mercy none dared trust. We quit the great Dundee with the words put into his mouth by Sir Walter Scott* ("Old Mortality"): "The memory which the soldier leaves behind him, like the long train of light that follows the sunken sun, that is worth caring for. . . ." He has no monument raised by men's hands, but his memory keeps her dwelling in the light of setting suns on the hills of Atholl.

The death of the great Dundee, in the view of both parties, implied the ruin of the Cause. "The next morning the Highland army had more the air of the shattered remains of broken troops than of conquerors." The one man who could act the part of

* As to Dundee's alleged letter to James, dictated after his wound, Professor Terry (Appendix III.) gives a full account of the problem. The letter is not, of course, a forgery by Macpherson (i. 372). A form of it exists in a contemporary printed broadside, but I differ from Professor Terry as to the relative originality of the broadside and of the manuscript among the Carte Papers in the Bodleian Library. The MS., to myself, seems the prior composition, and is written, though the variations are slight, more in the spirit of Dundee. It seems impossible that Dundee dictated the letter, and yet not very easy to believe that any forger could catch his tone and spirit so successfully.

Montrose, who could control the clans, with the unfailling aid of the wise and venerated Lochiel, was gone. "That melancholy army" was commanded by General Cannon, an ordinary person, without sympathy or imagination. In vain fresh clans joined his forces—Glencoe, 500 Camerons, the Stewarts of Appin, the Stewarts of Atholl. In the braes of Mar they picked up Gordons, Farquharsons, Forbeses, till they numbered 5000 men, lions led by a sheep. The cavaliers of the South, broken reeds, sons of the men who failed Montrose, "were ready," so they said, but vainly waited for Cannon.

Mackay, combating the timidity of the Parliamenteers, who would have abandoned the North, concentrated at Stirling. He was indisposed to use the godly of the West, "whose pretensions appeared already exorbitant enough," but he had the regular Cameronian Regiment, of which the Earl of Angus was colonel.<sup>46</sup> This was fortunate for the Government. Mackay marched promptly on Perth, crossed Tippermuir, the scene of Montrose's first victory, and cut up a party of Cannon's Atholl men who were foraging. He now moved on Aberdeen, while Cannon, in place of descending on the Lowlands, was marching about the Braes of Mar, his men discouraged by the discovery at Perth that they were not invincible and were not capable always of resisting cavalry. On August 17 the Cameronians occupied Dunkeld, on the Tay, against which Cannon was moving with his whole force. But already the chiefs were irritated by the predominance foolishly assigned to the Lowland officers, the error which Dundee had avoided, and by the dilatory proceedings of Cannon in Aberdeenshire. Lochiel withdrew, Sleat withdrew, the army of Cannon was depleted. But the Cameronians were known to have been left without supports in Dunkeld, among people who hated them, and whom they, remembering the ravages of "the Highland Host," equally detested. Cannon had a skirmish with Lanier near Brechin, and then, hearing of the isolated position of the Cameronians, he retired to the hills and prepared to cut them off. At Coupar-Angus, within ten miles of Dunkeld, Lanier heard of the peril of the Cameronians. Three troops of dragoons had been sent by Ramsay to reinforce them, but they retired, in the face of the clans, despite the vigorous remonstrances of Lieutenant-Colonel Cleland. The pretext for the withdrawal of the cavalry was an order of Council, and, according to Sheild,

“the most part of people did say that they” (the Cameronians) “were betrayed, in which the Duke of Hamilton was blamed as having a chief hand.”<sup>47</sup>

The idea, though absurd, may have occurred to the Cameronians themselves, when deserted by the horse and exposed in an open town to the victors of Killiecrankie,—who were no longer 5000 men, but greatly outnumbered the new regiment. But their commander, Cleland, who had seen the back of Claverhouse at Drumclog, was a man of dauntless resolution. He strengthened and occupied with outposts the walls and enclosures, and made his principal point of resistance the church, and Atholl’s town house. On August 21, about seven in the morning, the Highlanders attacked, driving in the outposts, carrying wall after wall, the Macleans foremost. The castle, as Atholl’s house is called, and the old Abbey church, were then assailed. The gallant Cleland fell while encouraging his troops; the Major, Henderson, was mortally wounded. Monro took command, and ammunition was so scarce that lead was stripped from the roofs and cast into bullets during the fray. Macaulay describes the Highlanders as occupying the houses and “keeping up a galling fire from the windows.” The Lochiel narrator says the reverse,—the Highlanders stood exposed in the streets, “and killed them in the windows.” Cannon had no balls for his artillery, and the church and castle had to be taken, if at all, by a coup de main. The Cameronians, also in lack of ammunition, were, says the Lochiel writer, on the very point of surrendering when Cannon, “even against his men’s inclinations, commanded them to retire.”<sup>48</sup> The town was on fire, the Cameronians are said to have locked Highlanders up in the blazing houses, but a lock would not keep a door fast against Highland shoulders.

It was a question of “who will pound longest.” The brave Cameronians pounded longest, but we may doubt whether Mackay, and of course Macaulay, are right in attributing want of tenacity to the clans. At Ticonderoga the recall had to be sounded several times before the Highlanders could be dragged from the impenetrable abattis of the French. Mackay himself avers that the Highlanders “got a low esteem of the conduct of Cannon,” a thing not to be marvelled at.<sup>49</sup> He states the Highland loss at less than twenty men, as does the Lochiel narrator, who declares that, under cover, the Cameronians feared to expose themselves while aiming. "Cannon never could bring them to it the second time," says Mackay. The author of 'The Historical Record of the Twenty-sixth or Cameronian Regiment,' on the other hand, puts the Highland losses at 300, and those of the Cameronians at 52 out of 800, whereas the Lochiel narrator states them at 300. Doubtless great courage was shown on both sides, for the Cameronians were raw recruits who had never seen fire, and were vastly outnumbered, but they fought well under the shelter of strong walls, which, if artillery is not used, ought to ensure success. In any case this resistance was decisive. The effect of Killiecrankie was obliterated. Blair Atholl Castle was occupied by Mackay without opposition, the clans disbanded and went home cursing Cannon, and Mackay cantoned his troops near Perth. Had Dundee lived, all the North would have been over the Forth, and Dalrymple says that the old Puritan shire of Fife was not to be trusted. But the death of Dundee, the tenacity of the Cameronians, the imbecility of Cannon, and the courage and conduct of Mackay, had saved the bungling Government, which now returned to its political tasks and difficulties.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER I.

- <sup>1</sup> Leven and Melville Papers, 1689-1691: 1843.
- <sup>2</sup> Leven and Melville Papers, p. 68.
- <sup>3</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., ix. Appendix, 123.
- <sup>4</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., ix. Appendix, 128.
- <sup>5</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., ix. Appendix, 132.
- <sup>6</sup> Leven and Melville Papers, p. 151.
- <sup>7</sup> Leven and Melville Papers, p. 166.
- <sup>8</sup> Leven and Melville Papers, p. 170.
- <sup>9</sup> Leven and Melville Papers, p. 193.
- <sup>10</sup> Leven and Melville Papers, pp. 182, 185.
- <sup>11</sup> Leven and Melville Papers, p. 190.
- <sup>12</sup> The History of the Affaires of Scotland, pp. 137-189: London, 1690.
- <sup>13</sup> The authorities are Mackay's Memoirs of the War, &c., 1689-1691: Edinburgh, 1833. Memoirs of Sir Ewen Cameron of Lochiel (Maitland Club, 1842). Viscount Dundee's Letters (Bannatyne Club, 1826). The Græmeid: An Heroic Poem, by James Philip of Almerie close, 1691, edited by the Rev. A. D. Murdoch (Scottish History Society, 1888). Balcarres's Memoirs, 1841 (Bannatyne Club). Act. Parl. Scot., 1689-1695. Macpherson's Original Papers, vol. i., 1775: includes copies of Nairne MSS. Napier's Memoirs of Dundee, vol. iii., 1862. Mackay is perhaps the least lucid of military writers, and revels in a plentiful lack of dates. The Memoirs of Lochiel, very pleasantly written, are attributed to Macgregor of Balhaldie, who brought Prince Charles from Rome to France in 1744.* The Græmeid, by a companion of Dundee in the campaign, is a florid Latin epic, well annotated by Mr Murdoch. Brown's History of the Highland Clans (1838). The Despot's Champion (1889), and other modern works, deal with the campaign. Professor Sandford Terry's Life of Dundee (1905) has also been consulted.

<sup>14</sup> Macaulay, iii. 63 : 1860.

<sup>15</sup> Memoirs of Lochiel, p. 237.

<sup>16</sup> Dundee's own account. Macpherson, i. 353.

<sup>17</sup> The Græmeid, p. 111.

<sup>18</sup> Mackay, p. 25.

<sup>19</sup> Mackay, p. 35.

<sup>20</sup> Cf. Letters of Viscount Dundee, p. 60.

<sup>21</sup> Memoirs of Lochiel, p. 242.

<sup>22</sup> Mackay, p. 36.

<sup>23</sup> Mackay, pp. 38, 39; Dundee, p. 61; Memoirs of Lochiel, p. 245.

<sup>24</sup> The Græmeid, p. 211, note 3.

<sup>25</sup> The Græmeid, p. 216.

<sup>26</sup> Mackay, pp. 44, 45, 46.

<sup>27</sup> Memoirs of Lochiel, pp. 242, 243; The Græmeid, p. 180.

<sup>28</sup> MacSweeney's Report, Letters of Dundee, p. 63.

<sup>29</sup> Memoirs of Lochiel, pp. 24, 25.

<sup>30</sup> Memoirs of Lochiel, pp. 250, 255.

<sup>31</sup> Letters of Viscount Dundee, pp. 64, 71.

<sup>32</sup> Mackay, pp. 46, 47.

<sup>33</sup> Letters of Viscount Dundee, pp. 71-79.

<sup>34</sup> Memoirs of Lochiel, p. 255.

<sup>35</sup> Memoirs of Lochiel, p. 258.

<sup>36</sup> Memoirs of Lochiel, pp. 258, 264.

<sup>37</sup> Mackay, p. 51.

<sup>38</sup> Mackay, pp. 52, 54.

<sup>39</sup> King's Own Scottish Borderers.

<sup>40</sup> Mackay, p. 56.

<sup>41</sup> Memoirs of Lochiel, p. 269.

<sup>42</sup> See Terry, Appendix ii.

<sup>43</sup> Memoirs of Lochiel, p. 273.

<sup>44</sup> Memoirs of Lochiel, p. 268.

<sup>45</sup> Act. Parl. Scot., ix. Appendix, p. 56.

<sup>46</sup> Mackay, p. 63.

<sup>47</sup> Faithful Contendings, p. 413.

<sup>48</sup> Memoirs of Lochiel, pp. 286, 288.

<sup>49</sup> Mackay, p. 70.

---

* John Macgregor, son of a daughter of Lochiel (History of the Clan Gregor, ii. 294. 1901).

CHAPTER II.

PARLIAMENTARY AND ECCLESIASTICAL SETTLEMENT.
MASSACRE OF GLENCOE.

1689.

EVERY vice of treachery and greed which Thucydides ascribes to the influence of Revolution was now displayed by the prominent politicians of Scotland. The desires of the Club might, in themselves, be even applauded. They professed to wish for modern constitutional Government, not ignobly, if prematurely, and they won it for a few years. But the private designs of several of their leaders were mere self-seeking, notably in the case of Skelmorley, as Sir James Montgomery is usually styled. By a reversal to the methods of Charles II., William, as soon as Parliament adjourned, issued a proclamation, forbidding the lieges to leave Scotland and go with their grievances to the new king. Ross, Annandale, and Polwarth, "the heads of the Mobile," that is, of the mob,<sup>1</sup> were recalcitrant. They agitated in the country, framing an address which was signed by most of the barons and burghs,—the Provost of Aberdeen signed when he was drunk. They tried to bring the Westland Whigs to Edinburgh, by way of a "demonstration," and the Cameronian regiment, three weeks before its gallant stand at Dunkeld, mutinied for pay.<sup>2</sup> Polwarth told Lockhart that matters would never mend in Scotland till it came to throat-cutting. They desired a Republic, in Lockhart's opinion: place, and revenge on the detested Dalrymples, was what they really desired. By September, multitudes of all parties had flocked to Court to bewilder the king. The egregious Crawford outdid the preachers and prophets in the quoting of texts. "I dare not question but that God hath begun to put His feet in our waters, and that He will not draw in His arm, which He hath bared, until He make His enemies His footstool, . . . that He will find out carpenters to fray all these horns which push at His ark, and that in due time He will level all these mountains that are in Zerubbabel's way." <sup>3</sup>

Meanwhile he was evicting many scores of conformist ministers on the information of their parishioners, which caused sympathy and excitement in the breasts of English Churchmen. The evicted said that they were punished for being Episcopal; the other party averred that they suffered for purely political causes,—they would not pray for the new king and queen. The lists of the expelled show that Episcopal conformity was strong in St Andrews, in Fife, and in Teviotdale. A Cockburn at Ormiston did not match the Presbyterian ardour of his ancestors at the Reformation. Dundee and Perth ministers were conformist: they had preached with joy on Dundee's fatal victory, were tried, and were acquitted, which is curious.<sup>4</sup> There was nearly as clean a sweep made of conformists now as in 1638, as great an extrusion as of Presbyterians under the Restoration. The most marked results of these troubles were, perhaps, the pamphlet styled 'Scots Presbyterian Eloquence,' the replies to that, and a crowd of other tracts. The defenders of the Kirk argued that Sheild's notorious works were as anti-Presbyterian as anti-Episcopalian: Sheild represented, of course, the extreme left wing, semi-detached, of the Presbyterians. "'The Hind let Loose' was never the standard of our principles, nor approved by our party," says the Kirk's defender.<sup>5</sup>

These paper bullets of the brain flew about in a later strife. Meanwhile Crawford and his party were sorely exercised by fears that William, moved by Burnet, now Bishop of Salisbury, would be too lenient to Episcopalians.<sup>6</sup> In September, Polwarth carried to Court the Address manufactured by the Club.<sup>7</sup> Polwarth was to return to Scotland in a milder mood; not so Ross, Annandale, and Montgomery. A Vindication of the Address was written by Fergusson the Plotter, who, merely for love of plotting, it seems, had turned the coat he wore under Monmouth and sided with the Jacobites. This pamphlet was excessively vexatious to William, and Annandale, Ross, and Sir James Montgomery saw that they had hopelessly lost the Royal favour. In August 1690 Annandale betrayed his associates, and his confession tells the story of their doings during the adjournment of the Estates. Montgomery proposed, he said, that they should apply to their rightful king over

