

BR794.L3 1829 v.1
ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY OF IRE
ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY OF IRE

John Mubcahy u

AN

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY

OF

IRELAND,

FROM THE

FIRST INTRODUCTION OF CHRISTIANITY

AMONG THE IRISH,

TO

THE BEGINNING OF THE THIRTEENTH CENTURY.

COMPILED

FROM THE WORKS OF THE MOST ESTEEMED AUTHORS, FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC, WHO HAVE WRITTEN AND PUBLISHED ON MATTERS CONNECTED WITH

THE IRISH CHURCH ;

AND FROM IRISH ANNALS AND OTHER AUTHENTIC DOCUMENTS,

STILL EXISTING IN MANUSCRIPT.

By THE REV. JOHN LANIGAN, D. D.,

FORMERLY PROFESSOR OF HEBREW, THE SACRED SCRIPTURES, AND ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PAVIA.

IN FOUR VOLUMES.

VOL. I.

SECOND EDITION.

DUBLIN :

PRINTED FOR J. CUMMING, 16, L. ORMOND-QUAY ;

SIMPKIN AND MARSHALL, LONDON ;

AND FOR R. CADELL AND CO., EDINBURGH.

1829.

PREFACE.

IN these times, when a laudable spirit of research pervades almost every civilized people of the globe, and that the histories of the most remote nations, as well barbarous as polite, are sought after with an extraordinary degree of curiosity, and read with proportionate avidity, the publication of an ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY OF IRELAND must be considered as a useful undertaking, from which much interesting information on the ancient state of the Christian church may be collected. The frigid apathy, however, with which the generality of Irish readers slur over every publication that treats of the ancient state of their native country, might be sufficient to deter an author from an enterprize of that nature; but although discouraging such an unpatriotic feeling as exhibits itself in the great bulk of our countrymen must be, there are still several learned and investigating gentlemen amongst our compatriots, as well as in the Sister Island, and on the Continent, by whom such a work has been long and anxiously desired, and from whom a liberal encouragement may, therefore, be reasonably expected.

When the long established character of Ireland for literature and sanctity is called into remembrance, when the great respectability of the ancient Irish Church is considered, and when we bring to our recollection the numerous places in the Continent to which she has sent her missionaries, who, with the most ardent charity, unceasing labours and fearless courage, have taught the use of letters, disseminated the saving truths of the Gospel, and triumphantly planted the banner of the Cross amidst barbarous and pagan nations, it must be a matter of surprise that her history should remain unwritten for the long period of 1400 years. Yet such is the fact, no connected history of the Irish Church has been hitherto published, although an abundance of materials for that purpose are still in existence; notwithstanding that the devastating hand of barbarism has been unsparingly engaged in the overthrow of our literary establishments, and in the destruction of our ancient records, the monuments of our nation's glory. These documents are, however, widely scattered, and are principally to be found in the decrees of synods and councils, the bulls and briefs of the popes, the rules of our ancient monks, the epistles of bishops, the registries of our churches, the annals of the nation, and the lives of our saints. Of these materials, some have been published through the medium of the press, by Colgan, Fleming, Wadding, Usher, Ward, Ware, Burke, and others; and their respective editions have been enriched by copious notes and illustrations. Others, principally written in Irish, containing matters of the utmost importance to our national history, and tending to elucidate the history and antiquities of various Celtic nations, are, for want of proper encouragement to translate and publish them, still suffered to remain in manuscript, a prey to moths and vermin, and must in a few years more, unless timely care be taken to prevent it, become irrecoverably lost to the world.

Of those books that have been published, that treat of things connected with the Ecclesiastical History of Ireland, the greater part have long since become scarce, are now only to be found in the libraries of Colleges, and in the collections of the curious, and therefore not accessible to the public in general. Besides this, being mostly in the Latin language, they are not accommodated to a large proportion of readers; and no one has hitherto undertaken to arrange them in a continued chronological series, so as to connect them with the general history of the whole Christian Church, or to embody them in one united whole, in the regular form of an Ecclesiastical History.

In the civil histories of Ireland that have been written by Keating, Mac Geoghegan, O'Halloran, and others, little of our Ecclesiastical History is to be found, beyond a few detached anecdotes, in great part fabulous, destitute of chronological accuracy, and often contradictory.

Usher, indeed, has collected much excellent materials for the history of the earliest times of our national Church, to the latter end of the sixth century, in which he was greatly assisted by valuable communications from David Rooth, R. C. bishop of Ossory, for which he repeatedly returns him thanks in various places of his Primordia.

In the accounts of the Irish bishops, published by Ware and Harris, much useful information is also to be found, although in the additions of the latter frequent errors and inaccuracies occur, on which, for the sake of truth, it was found necessary, in the course of the following work, to make some observations. The writers of the Irish *Monasticon*s have also furnished some materials for an Ecclesiastical History of the country, but great caution must be observed in using them, as they frequently abound in error, particularly Archdall, who converts into monasteries all the churches founded by St. Patrick and our earliest native Saints, is often inaccurate in his chronologies, and frequently confounds persons and places with each other that are totally different.

The book, miscalled Antiquities of Ireland, published by Dr. Ledwich, would, from its title, lead one to suppose that some information on this subject might be obtained from it; but upon examination it will be found to contain a studied misrepresentation of our ancient history, that some of our earliest Saints, of whose existence no doubt can be entertained, are by him attempted to be annihilated, that by the magical effects of his pen he labours to transform St. Senan into a river, St. Kevin into a rock, and St. Patrick, the great Apostle of our nation, into a nonentity. The reputation which this book has obtained with a particular class of readers and authors, who wish to degrade the Irish below the level of the most barbarous nations, called for particular notice and animadversion, in a work like this, now offered to the public; and if in the course of the observations made on the errors, misrepresentations, and ignorance of its writer, some asperity of language is indulged, the apology is more due to the reader than to the author of such palpably malevolent falsehoods.

In a regular and comprehensive Ecclesiastical History of Ireland there are numberless subjects that require to be treated of, with copiousness, precision, and accuracy. To render the work now offered to the public a book of that description, the author has, with the labour and close application of several years, collected not only every tract and document that he could meet with, written upon the subject of our Church History in Ireland, or by Irishmen, but also the works of numberless British and Continental writers, many of whom are of the first respectability; such as the venerable Bede, the Benedictines, Bollandists, the collectors of German history, Canisius, Muratori, Ughelli, &c. &c. who occasionally, and often largely, have discussed matters belonging to Irish ecclesiastical history, and treated of the very many ancient Irish saints and doctors, who, for several successive ages, continued to instruct and enlighten other nations.

To Muratori we are indebted for making public, in the 13th vol. of his works, printed at Arrezzo in 1771, a very ancient manuscript in Irish characters, which puts beyond dispute the existence of St. Patrick. This is the Antiphonarium Benchorensis, written in the 7th century, and originally belonged to the monastery of Bangor, in the now county of Down, whence it was removed to the monastery of Bobio in Italy, in the library of which latter place it was discovered by Cardinal F. Borromeo, and from which it was afterwards transferred to the Ambrosian library at Milan, where it is now to be found, No. X. Letter C. This curious and authentic document was shewn by Muratori to Montfaucon, a competent judge of ancient manuscripts, who, after the closest inspection, pronounced it to be above a thousand years old, and rejoiced that at length the existence of St. Patrick, and the reality of his mission to Ireland, was placed beyond the reach of controversy.

To render the account of illustrious Irishmen, presented in the following work, by far more copious and more accurate than any that has hitherto appeared, no enquiry has been neglected, and no pains have been spared. The mistakes of Colgan, Usher, Ware, and still more, those of Harris, together with the numberless errors of the authors of our Monasticons, have been carefully corrected. The most anxious endeavours have been used that nothing should be omitted that could tend to illustrate our ecclesiastical history, and render it as respectable and worthy of attention as it really is. Care has been taken that every thing essential and authentic belonging to it, in the great variety of works which have been consulted for this purpose, shall be found concentrated and arranged in a strict chronological series, commencing from the earliest records of Christianity in Ireland, and continued down to the beginning of the thirteenth century, the period at which it is found expedient to conclude the present work.

The existence of St. Patrick having been denied, for the purpose of shewing that the Church of Ireland, in its commencement, had no connection with the Church of Rome, and the acts attributed to our Apostle consequently condemned as forgeries, it was necessary to prove the existence of the one, of which, in reality, very few have entertained a doubt, and to clear up and exhibit the other, divested of many fabulous and strange appendages, by which they have been obscured; and to shew that the Christian doctrine, first preached to the Irish at their conversion from Paganism, was identically the same as that taught at Rome, and in all the churches in communion with the Holy See. For the existence of the saint, authorities the most unequivocal, both foreign and domestic, have been produced, which the most sceptical will hardly deny to be convincing; and for the unity between the Church of Ireland and that of the Church of Rome, it is shown that the doctrine and discipline of the Irish Church has run on in an uninterrupted course for several successive ages, during which she never substantially deviated from the rules and practices of the Catholic Church, which acknowledges the See of Rome, and the Pope as its visible head. It is true, indeed, that in the Irish Church some peculiarities have existed, relative to its liturgy, the administration of the sacraments, the system of its hierarchy and monastic institutions, its matrimonial regulations, and the mode of providing for the clergy; the nature of all which the author has taken much pains to amply discuss and explain. This he conceived to be particularly necessary, as it has been a practice of long continuance, with a certain class of authors, to labour with all their might to impress the world with an opinion that the Irish were in a stage of savage barbarism before the arrival of the English.

Whether the Irish character has been improved or debased by a connection with England, is a subject the author conceives to be not within the province of a writer of ecclesiastical history to discuss; but he hopes that in the practice of the Irish Church, which he has faithfully exhibited in the course of the following pages, will be found a complete refutation of these slanderers of the Irish character, and villifiers of the ancient religion of the Island of Saints.

The great quantities of misrepresentation and error respecting the Kelidei or Culdees, that have been published by Toland, amongst our native writers, and by Jamieson, Smith and others, amongst those of Scotland, made a particular enquiry into, and accurate description of the office and duties of that order of ecclesiastics peculiarly necessary. To place this subject in a clear point of view, a variety of the most authentic documents have been consulted and compared, and the results fairly stated. On the name, office and duty of the Corbes, Erenachs, &c. a full, and, it is hoped, a satisfactory account has been given. In this work also will be found a complete summary of the many Canons of the ancient Irish Church, which lie dispersed in various volumes, and hitherto inaccessible to the generality of readers. On the early ecclesiastical architecture of Ireland, and on the use of our ancient round towers, which have been long the subjects of investigation among the learned and curious in Irish antiquities, some opinions and conjectures are offered, which may perhaps serve at least to throw some new lights on, if not to give a satisfactory account of, these interesting subjects.

Of the numerous missions and evangelical labours of the Irish preachers of the Christian faith in Great Britain, France, Belgium, Germany, Switzerland, and various other nations of the continent, and of the many monasteries and other religious establishments founded by Irishmen in those countries, a full and accurate account is now presented to the public, deduced from the best authorities, and drawn from the clearest sources of information.

By long study and much reading on the subject of Irish Ecclesiastical history, the author has been completely enabled to detect the untruths and malicious aspersions thrown out against the Irish Church and people, by the false and flimsy Giraldus Cambrensis, and by many others of his followers; particularly those which are found to abound with pecular malevolence, in the work miscalled "Antiquities of Ireland," published by Doctor Ledwich. All which are here fully exposed and refuted by proofs drawn from the most indubitable authorities, as well foreign as domestic.

On account of the vast number of disquisitions necessary for wiping away the numerous fables, correcting the anachronisms, and overthrowing the misrepresentations and calumnies by which our ancient Church history has been darkened, and almost overwhelmed, the greater part of the following work has been necessarily thrown into notes, placed respectively after each section of the text. By adopting this mode the thread of the historical narrative is preserved entire, which would be otherwise unavoidably interrupted and broken, if such enquiries were inserted in the body of the work.

In the course of this undertaking, several matters relating to Irish Antiquities are explained, which, although not strictly ecclesiastical, could not be well passed over, as they bear some relation to the state of the Church. On this, as on every other occasion, the most approved authors have been consulted, and their opinions fairly stated.

To render this work more generally useful, and for the greater convenience of the reader, a copious general index is subjoined to the last volume, by which every person, place and thing mentioned in it, that are of any importance to the history, may be found in an instant.

In offering this work to the public the author's chief motive is to exhibit a faithful picture of the doctrine and practice of the ancient Irish Church, and to shew its connexion, at all times, with the universal Church of Christ. To attain so very desirable an object he has spared no pains in the collection and collation of such documents as materially bear upon the subject. And as his principal design was solely directed to the establishment of truth and the overthrow of error, he is conscious of having proceeded to the enquiry divested of all national or religious prejudices. The result of those enquiries, as they presented themselves to his mind, he has fairly and impartially stated, and to the judgment of a discerning public, he now submits them with the most respectful deference.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY

OF

IRELAND, &c.

CHAPTER I.

Of Christianity in Ireland, previous to the mission of St. Patrick.

SECT. I.

THE precise time, at which Christianity was originally introduced into Ireland, cannot be ascertained. Nor is it to be wondered at, that, while the first establishment of Christian churches in Britain, Gaul, Spain, and even in many parts of Italy is enveloped in obscurity, a similar inconvenience should affect the ecclesiastical history of an island, to which the arms of the Roman empire had not penetrated, an empire, which had been raised by God for the purpose of contributing to the more easy diffusion of the light of the Gospel. (1) Yet Tertullian informs us, that in his time the name of Christ reigned in places, inhabited by Britons, until then unexplored by the Romans. (2) Eusebius goes still farther back; for he asserts, that some of the Apostles had proceeded beyond the ocean to the islands called British, (3) and is followed by Nicephorus in his account of the dispersion of the Apostles. (4) The learned Stillingfleet has laboured hard to show, (5) that St. Paul preached in Britain. Were his arguments of sufficient weight, several of them would tend to prove, that the same Apostle had also visited Ireland. Others, whose testimonies have been collected by Usher, (6) pretend, that St. James the elder announced the Christian faith in Ireland, and even give the names of some of his converts and disciples. We are also told of an Aristobulus, brother of St. Barnabas, preaching together with twelve companions to the Irish in the apostolic age. (7)

(1) "Ut lux veritatis, quæ in omnium gentium revelabatur salutem, efficacius se ab ipso capite (Roma) per totum mundi corpus effunderet." St. Leo, Serm. 1. de Petro et Paulo. See also Origen contra Celsum, Lib. 2. Tillemont, Histoire des Emper. Tom. 1. Art. 1. and Jos. Zola, Commentar. De rebus Christ. Lib. 1. cap. 1. § 2.

(2) "Britannorum inaccessa Romanis loca, Christo verò subdita, et Sarmatarum, et Dacorum—in quibus omnibus locis Christi nomen, qui jam venit, regnat." Tertull. lib. adv. Judæos, cap. 7. Perhaps it will be said, that Tertullian alluded only to the northern parts of Great Britain beyond Adrian's wall, and to the people properly called Britons, as Stillingfleet maintains, Antiquities of the British churches, Chap. II. But it is well known, that the ancients used to speak of Ireland as one of the British islands, and there is an instance of even the name, Britanni, being applied to the inhabitants of both. Thus Rufus Festus Avienus—

Hæ numero geminæ, pingues sola, cespitis ampli,
Conditur occidui quæ Rheni gurgitis unda,
Dira Britannorum sustentant agmina terris.

See more ap. Usher, De B. E. Primordiis, cap. XVI. p. 723. I believe then there can be little doubt, that Tertullian had in view also the inhabitants of Ireland. Stillingfleet's object was to refute Dempster and other such fabulous writers, who pretended that Tertullian alluded to a Scottish kingdom as if then existing in N. Britain, and already Christian; a pretension which could be easily overthrown, as undoubtedly there was no establishment of Scots, at least of any note, settled in Britain at that period.

(3) Dem. Evang. l. iii. c. 7.

(4) Hist. Eccl. See Usher, Pr. p. 740.

(5) Antiq. of the Br. churches, chap. I.

(6) Pr. p. 5. & 743. It is very probable, that this story of St. James preaching in Ireland has proceeded from a confusion of Hibernia with Hiberia, one of the names of Spain, in which country St. James is said to have been.

(7) Ib. p. 744.

§. II. It is very much to the credit of our old annalists and ecclesiastical writers, that none of these uncertain traditions are to be found in their works, and that they never claimed for their country the honour of its having been visited by any of the Apostles, or of their immediate disciples. (8) Whenever Irish Christians are mentioned as having been instructed by the Apostles, it will be invariably found, that they were supposed to have lived in foreign countries, and that the accounts concerning them have originated with foreigners. Thus, to omit St. Beatus, (9) whose memory is celebrated in Switzerland, and who is said to have been a disciple of St. Peter, the name of Mansuetus is famous in Lorraine, who is likewise stated to have been instructed by St. Peter, and to have been sent by him to that country and appointed first bishop of Toul. That a person of that name governed the church of Toul, and that he was an Irishman, cannot indeed be denied, considering the concurrent testimonies of so many authors and the constant tradition of the inhabitants. (10) There is, however, no sufficient authority to prove, that he lived in the times of St. Peter; and it is more than probable, that his mission to Toul did not take place until late in the fourth century, or perhaps about the beginning of the fifth. (11) Nor is he to be confounded (12) with Mansuetus bishop of the Armorican Britons, who assisted at the first council of Tours A. D. 461.

(8) The fable concerning a famous Irish champion, Conal Cear-naigh, having been present at the passion of our Saviour, and of the wrath of an Ulster king on hearing of it (Usher p. 739) is very different from those traditions of the apostolic foundation of churches.

(9) Beatus is usually set down as a native of Britain ; but some one having said, that he was baptized in Scotia, (Usher ib. p. 745) hence it has been assumed that perhaps he was born in Ireland, as in St. Peter's time there was no British Scotia. Colgan accordingly ranks him among the Irish saints, Tr. Th. p. 750. It would be a waste of time to dwell upon such in every respect uncertain statements.

(10) His memory is highly revered at Toul under the name of St. Mansuy. His Life was written in the tenth century by the abbot Adso, who has some verses prefixed to it beginning thus :

Inclyta Mansueti claris natalibus orti
 Progenies titulis fulget in orbe suis.
 Insula Christicolæ gestabat Hibernia gentes ;
 Unde genus traxit, et satus inde fuit.

This Life without the verses has been published by Bosquet, Part II. and afterwards together with the verses by Calmet, Hist. Eccl. et Civ. De Lorraine, Tom. 1. App. p. 86 seqq. Among these verses I do not find this quotation by Dempster and from him by Usher, p. 750, "Protulerat quemdam generosum Scotia natum—Mansuetum." But even admitting it to be genuine, the name, Scotia, is clearly explained by Insula—Hibernia.

(11) Several churches of Gaul, and particularly in the neighbourhood of Toul, claimed their origin from disciples of the Apostles. The traditions concerning them may be seen in Bosquet, Historiarum Eccl. Gallic. Part. I. who has also given in the second part the so called Lives of some of those founders. Thus the church of Treves boasted of Eucharius, that of Metz of Clemens, that of Chalons sur Marne of Memmius, &c. With these and some others Mansuetus is classed as their contemporary and colleague by persons zealous for the honour of the church of Toul. Yet the very learned De Marca, who was a great stickler for those traditions, has not a word about Mansuetus in his Ep. ad Henr. Vales. de tempore quo primum in Galliis suscepta est Christi fides, although he expressly mentions Eucharius, Clemens, Memmius. He had, however, before him the works of Bosquet and Usher, as appears from his letter. According to Adso Ireland was well peopled with Christians in the times that Mansuetus lived—— “Insula Christicolæ gestabat Hibernia gentes.” Now it cannot be supposed, that such was the state of Ireland in the apostolic age. Calmet in a Dissertation sur les eveques de Toul, prefixed to the first vol. of his History of Lorraine, maintains that Mansuetus was sent from Rome to Toul about the middle of the fourth century, as, to omit other arguments of his, he shows from the succession of the bishops of Toul; “1. S. Mansuet, ou Mansuy. 2. S. Amon. 3. S. Alchas. 4. S. Celsin. 5. S. Auspice, vers l’an 450. 6. S. Ours, ou Urse, vers l’an 488. 7. S. Apre, ou Evre, l’an 500,” &c. In the little poem prefixed to the Life above mentioned is this distich,

Sedulus Ausonii per tempora longa magistri Obsequio Petri hæsit amore sui.

If by Ausonii is to be understood the poet Ausonius, master of St. Paulinus, we should place Mansuetus at a later period, charging however poor Adso with a huge anachronism. But it is more probable that by Ausonii he meant Itali, particularly as in another verse he has Ausonias for Italas. As to Mansuetus having been sent by St. Peter, it is easily reconciled with the truth of his story, by referring to the well known idiom of using the founder’s name for that of the church, over which he had presided; thus ad S. Petrum, for to the church of Rome; a S. Petro, from or by the said church; ad S. Martinum, to the church of Tours; and, what was very common among ourselves, ad S. Patricium, a S. Patricio, to, or by the see of Armagh. I shall add no more about Mansuetus than that our learned Rothe, notwithstanding his zeal for the honour of Ireland, admits (Hibernia resurgens, p. 197) the uncertainty of his having been a disciple of St. Peter.

(12) See Bosquet, Part. 1. cap. 20.

§. III. Descending from the days of the Apostles, we hear of the renowned St. Cataldus bishop of Tarentum, now Taranto, in Italy. The two brothers Moroni, who have written his Life, one in prose and the other in verse, and some other Tarentine writers would have us believe, that St. Cataldus arrived in Tarentum about the year 160 or 170. (13) But as, not to mention other circumstances, they tell us, that he had publicly taught in the great school of Lismore, which did not exist until 630, (14) it is plain, that his arrival at Tarentum cannot be placed earlier than some time in the seventh century. Even Colgan rejects those statements of the Tarentines after adducing unanswerable arguments to prove, that St. Cataldus did not leave Ireland until after A. D. 630, nor perhaps until after 636. (15) The history of this saint shall be given in its proper place. St. Firminus, the first bishop of Amiens, who is said to have suffered martyrdom in the persecution of Diocletian, has been taken by some for a native of Ireland, although the only authentic accounts (16) relative to him positively state, that he was of Pampeluna in Navarre, and son of Firmus a senator of that city. (17) Nor is there much better foundation for supposing, that St. Eliphius, his brother Eucharius, and sisters Menna, Libaria, and Susanna, all of whom, except Menna, are said to have been crowned with martyrdom at or near Toul in the persecution of Julian the apostate, were from Ireland. (18) Without remarking on their names not sounding as Irish, it is not easy to understand, what, admitting even that Eliphius might have left his country to preach the Christian faith, could have induced princesses (for such they are represented to have been) to travel from Ireland in those times as far as Lorraine. About the same period, according to some writers, lived Augulus, bishop, as some say, of London (19) and martyr, who by others is called Augurius a bishop in Ireland, without the addition of martyr. (20) It would be difficult to reconcile these statements; and I am convinced that, at whatever time Augurius of Ireland lived, he ought not be confounded with the British bishop Augulus or Augulius, as he is constantly called in the old martyrologies. (21) Equally obscure is the account given of the martyr St. Gunifort, whose memory was celebrated at Pavia on the 22d of August, but now on the 1st of September. He is said to have been of the Scottish (Irish) nation, and of a noble family. It is stated that, having left his country, where a violent persecution was raging against the Christians, he went, together with his brother Gunibald and two sisters, to Germany, whence, after the sisters had suffered martyrdom in that country, the two brothers removed to the North of Italy, where they also sealed their profession with their blood. The time of these transactions is not marked; (22) we do not read of any persecution, at least of a general nature, having raged in Ireland in the early ages of the Church; and the names of these saints appear more like Teutonic or Lombard than Irish ones. (23)

(13) See Usher p. 759. (14) Usher, Ind. Chron. ad An. 630.

(15) Colgan, AA. SS. at VIII. Mart. p. 560.

(16) See his Acts in Bosquet, Part II.

(17) Usher (p. 761 seqq.) has with his usual ability cleared up this matter, and exposed the nonsense and lies of that impostor Dempster concerning St. Firminus. It happened that in one or two legendary accounts of this saint Hibernia was substituted for Hiberia through a mistake, which has often occurred. But the name Scotia is not met with, except in Dempster's forgery. Strange that, in De Burgo's (Burke's) Officia propria sanctorum Hiberniæ, ad 25 Septemb. Firminus appears as an Irishman, and that even Bosquet, who has quite the reverse, is quoted among the authorities for the account there given of him. This error has been since corrected. See Note to Synopsis Decretorum at the end of the Supplement to the Breviary for Ireland.

(18) A German writer, P. Merssaëus Cratepolius, quoted by Usher (p. 785) says, that Eliphias was filius regis Scotiæ, that is, of Ireland. Baronius, (ad an. 362) who had before him the Acts of his and his relatives' martyrdom, calls him Tullensem virum; and Saussay (Martyrolog. Gallican.) makes them patria Tullenses. But, what is of greater weight, the abbot Rupert, author of the Acts of S. Eliphius (ap. Surium, Tom. 5. ad 16 Octob.) has not a word about Scotia. He begins his narrative by stating, that in the time of Julian “florebat—clarissimus vir Eliphius in urbe Tullensi, quæ civitas est Galliarum.” He then gives a short account of Eucharius and the three sisters Menna, Libaria, and Susanna, the two latter of whom, as well as Eucharius, also suffered martyrdom. Calmet in the fifth book of his History of Lorraine, where he treats largely of St. Eliphius, &c. does not even hint at Ireland or Scotland. He tells us that some authors make him a native of Soulosse, others of Gran, places not far distant from Toul, and the son of one Baccius of royal blood. He quotes an old inscription at the Hermitage de St. Euchaire, which begins thus: “Ex Catalauniæ regia prosapia Baccii et Lientrudis editi sunt nobilissimi sanctique subscripti; videlicet S. Eucharius, S. Eliphius, S. Libaria, S. Susanna;” &c. Calmet is of opinion, that by Catalaunia was meant Chalons. The story of Eliphius being the son of a king of Scotia originated in mistaking Scotia for Catalaunia, or more probably for Soulosse, which name was latinized into Scotia.

(19) Usher p. 169, and after him Colgan AA. SS. ad vii Febr. where he has Augulus among the Irish saints, understand the civitas Augusta in Britain, of which he was bishop, as the same as London. The Bollandists, at said day, doubt of it, as it does not appear, that London was the only city of Britain distinguished by the name of Augusta.

(20) See Usher, p. 988, and Colgan loc. cit.

(21) The Bollandists, without deciding in what persecution Augulus suffered, or how his being called Episcopus Hiberniæ, can be explained, sum up their disquisitions concerning him in these words: “Fuit ergo in Britannia, civitate Augusta, S. Augulus episcopus et martyr. Cætera, quæ e variis adjecta, nil solidæ rationis habent.”

(22) Tillemont (Memoires, &c. Tom. XVI. at St. Patrice Not. 1. on Art. 1.) observes from Ferrarius, that the history of St. Guni-fort was made up at a time when the chief magistrates went in Italy by the name of Potestas, (whence the Podestà of the cities of Lombardy) and consequently at rather a late period. To this observation may be opposed the well known verse of Juvenal, X. 100. "An Fidenarum Gabiorumque esse Potestas;" from which it appears that the word was used in that sense, at least in some places, much sooner than Tillemont imagined. Yet, considering every circumstance, I entertain no doubt that the history of St. Gunifort belongs to a later age than that, of which we are now treating. Dempster's nonsense concerning those saints having suffered martyrdom during the reign of the great and pious Theodosius, and even while he was at Milan, is well exposed by Usher, p. 795. Were we to believe Dempster, the name of one of St. Gunifort's sisters was Dardalucha, as he found that a St. Dardalucha or rather Derlugdacha is revered on the 1st of February at Frisingen in Germany. But this saint, who succeeded St. Brigid as abbess of Kildare and died A. D. 524, never left Ireland. (See her Acts in Colgan, AA. SS. at 1st February.)

(23) Perhaps the words Scotica gente, on which is founded the opinion of those saints having been Scots, have by mistake been substituted for Scythica (Scythian) gente. As a proof of the probability of such a mistake, there seems to be another in the mention made of a city Camara in the North of Italy, where Gunibald is said to have suffered. Usher thought it the same as Como, which, however, was constantly called Comum or Noviocomum. Could it have been the same as Camariano, a place near the North side of the Po in the ancient Insubria, mentioned by Alberti (Descrittione di tutta Italia, p. 394) ?

§. iv. It is, however, universally admitted, that there were Christian congregations in Ireland before the mission of Palladius, which took place in 431, of which, were there no other proof, the testimony of Prosper forms sufficient evidence. For in his Chronicle at that year he says, that Palladius was sent to the Scots believing in Christ, (24) that is, as he informs us elsewhere, (25) to the Scots living in Ireland. But how, or by whom, the Christian faith was first introduced into this country, it is impossible to determine. It would be impertinent to detain the reader with the story of Ireland's conversion having originated through the means of a Christian woman, by whom an Irish queen was instructed, who in her turn instructed the king, and he his subjects ; (26) whereas the famous transaction of this kind belongs to the history of Iberia (27) a country in Asia lying near the Black sea. Several Scottish writers from old John Fordun down to nearly our own days pretend, that a Donald king of Scotland, and his subjects, embraced christianity in the year 203, having, as some of those writers tell us, been taught by missionaries sent by Pope Victor, to whom Donald had applied for that purpose. (28) But, passing by the anachronism in supposing Victor to have been alive in that year, it is well known at present, that no Scottish kingdom existed at that time in Britain, (29) and, were there any foundation for this fable, it should be referred to Ireland, (30) the Scotia of those times, rather than to modern Scotland. Yet we do not pretend to this honour of having received missionaries from Pope Victor, or of having had a christian king at so early a period ; and it is more than probable, that the whole statement was fabricated by some Scotch zealot as a counterpart to the tradition maintained by their southern neighbours of having had a christian king Lucius, who corresponded with Pope Eleutherus before the latter end of the second century. (31)

(24) Ad Scotos in Christum credentes. That this is the true reading will appear hereafter, when treating of Palladius.

(25) De Gratia Dei contra Cassianum ; cap. 41.

(26) See Hector Boëthius, Scot. Hist. l. 6. and others quoted by Usher, p. 767. seqq.

(27) See Rufinus, Hist. Eccl. l. 1. c. 10. and after him all the Ecclesiastical historians.

(28) Boëth. Scot. Hist. l. 5. Dempster, Appar. ad Histor. Eccl. Scot. l. 6. &c. &c. See Usher p. 612. seqq. Buchanan, without mentioning the year or Pope Victor, simply says ; (Rer. Scot. lib. IV. ad XXVII. Rex.) “ Donaldus regum Scotorum primus Christianos ritus receperat.” Spottiswood (History of the Church, &c. of Scotland, B. 1.) will not allow, that the Scots were instructed by any Roman teachers; so averse was the good man to any connexion with Rome; but he still maintains that king Donald was a Christian.

(29) Usher p. 610 et alibi passim. Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 114 and 246, seqq. Lloyd on Church government, Chap. I. Stillingfleet, Antiquities, &c. Chap. II. and Preface. O'Flaherty, Ogygia vindicated, Chap. VIII. and all through, &c. &c. The matter is now so well understood, that the very Scots themselves admit and even prove it. See Innes, Critical Essay on the Ancient Inhabitants of Scotland, Vol. 2. Dissert. II. Chap. 2. and Chalmers, Caledonia, Vol. I. at Scottish period. The only question now remaining between learned men is whether, before the first establishment of a Scottish kingdom in Albany, in the year 503, under Fergus son of Erk (Usher, Ind. Chron. ad an. 503. Innes loc. cit. &c.) or, as others say, (see Tr. Th. p. 115, O'Flaherty, Ogygia p. 472, and Ogygia vindicated loc. cit. Chas. O'Connor, Preface to Ogyg. vind. p. 4) Loarn Fergus's eldest brother, there was a Scottish colony, dependent however on the Irish Dalriadans (of Antrim) planted in that country about the middle of the third century. Chas. O'Connor, however positive in maintaining (Dissertation on the first migrations and final settlement of the Scots in N. Britain, and Note to Ogyg. Vind. p. 162) that such a colony was settled in N. Britain A. 258 under Carbre Riada, does not pretend to call it a kingdom, but tells us that it was weak and struggling with difficulties, until the sons of Erk in the beginning of the sixth century laid the foundation of the first Scottish kingdom out of Ireland.

(30) Bozius, (lib. 8. de sign. eccl. cap. 1.) quoted by Usher, p. 615. understood it so; for he writes; "Tradunt in Scotia, quæ tunc erat Hibernia, Christi cultum disseminatum eodem tempore, quo in Britannia, sub annum sc. CCIII. Victore sedente."

(31) See about king Lucius, &c. Usher, Pr. capp. III. IV. V. VI. Stillingfleet, Antiq. chap. 2. and Dr. Milner's History of Winchester, Vol. 1. chap. 3.

§. v. Dr. Ledwich, after stating that the Britons (of G. Britain) were the first teachers of the Irish, (32) throws out some loose and incoherent assertions as if to show, that christianity made its way into Ireland through the exertions of Greek and Asiatic missioners, as he calls them. For, says he, Colman in his conference with Wilfrid (33) asserted, that the Easter, which he kept, was the same as that, which St. John the Evangelist observed. Not to inquire at present into the truth of Colman's position, of which in its own place, were the Doctor's inference of any weight, it would go to prove, that St. John or some of his immediate disciples had preached the Gospel in Ireland. It was thus that old Spottiswood concluded, (34) that, when St. John was relegated to Patmos, some of his disciples came over to Scotland, because the Scots maintained the correctness of their Paschal cycle by alledging his authority. Another equally potent argument adduced by the Doctor is, that Pothinus and Irenaeus, who were bishops of Lyons in the second century, were Greeks. But it does not appear, that they sent any missionaries either to Ireland or Britain; nor is there in the ancient history of the Church any account of Greek or Asiatic teachers coming to Ireland at that early period. He adds, that the Irish liturgy was not the same as the Roman; an argument, which he borrowed from Tolland, (35) who, however, was not fool enough to use it as a proof of the oriental origin of the Irish church, whereas he observes, that divers liturgies were formerly used in Ireland. Then the Doctor talks of the Gallican office, liturgy, or cursus, which, he says, was adopted by the British church, and "no doubt by the Irish." Stillingfleet, he adds, has shown, that this liturgy agreed with the Greek. This is not true; nor has Stillingfleet even undertaken to show it; who, on the contrary, in his long and learned dissertation (36) concerning that Gallican cursus expressly states, that it was distinguished from the Eastern liturgy or Cursus Orientalis. The fact is, that according to a little treatise on the origin of ecclesiastical cursuses or liturgies and offices, quoted by Usher, (37) St. German of Auxerre and St. Lupus of Troyes are said to have delivered to St. Patrick a cursus, which they had learned in the island of Lerins from Cassian, Honoratus, and others. (38) German and Lupus were neither Greek nor Asiatic missioners. Nor, although natives of Gaul, and consequently, should we believe the Doctor, of the Oriental school, were they full of horror and detestation of the Romish corruptions. (39) This soi-disant antiquary has read so little, that he does not know that several Popes of those days, and at the very period to which he alludes, were Greeks or Asiatics, such as Anacletus, Evaristus, Telesphorus, Higinus, Anicetus, Eleutherus, Anterus; nor that St. Ignatius of Antioch, St. Polycarp of Smyrna, St. Irenaeus, &c. were on the best terms with the see of Rome; nor that there was no Greek schism until many centuries after the times he refers to; nor that the variety of liturgies did not in any age of the Church, (40) nor does at the present time clash with the great principle of Catholic unity. (41)

(32) Antiquities of Ireland, 1st Ed. p. 358.

(33) Bede Eccl. Hist. Angl. L. 3. c. 25.

(34) History of the Church, &c. of Scotland, Book I.

(35) Nazarenus, Letter 11. §. 3. (36) Antiquities, &c. Chap. 4.

(37) Prim. p. 343, 840, and 917. This treatise may be seen in Spelman's Councils, &c. vol. 1. p. 176. seqq. and in Wilkins's, Vol. 4. p. 741. We shall see more about it elsewhere.

(38) See Usher's remarks p. 343. on the inaccuracy of some parts of that statement.

(39) Ledwich, ib. p. 360. O'Halloran, who knew nothing of ecclesiastical history, has some of this stuff about Asiatic Missions, &c. in his History of Ireland.

(40) See Gregory the great's third answer to Augustin's questions; Works, L. XII. Ep. 34, and in Bede, Eccl. Hist. L. I. c. 27.

(41) The Greek, Syrian, Armenian, &c. liturgies are practised in the very city of Rome. The Ambrosian liturgy is observed in the diocese of Milan. The Mosarabic liturgy is still kept up at Toledo.

Several Religious orders, with whom the detestation of Romish corruptions will certainly not be found, have their peculiar liturgies. I am really ashamed to mention facts so well known to the learned. But, as the Scripture says, answer a fool according to his folly.

§. VI. Not to dwell further at present on Ledwich's unlearned conjectures and wild corollaries, there is no authority or document to prove, that the first preachers of christianity in Ireland were Britons rather than persons from Gaul, Spain, or of any other country, that carried on trade with Ireland in those times. That a foreign trade with this country existed as far back, at least, as the period, in which Tacitus lived, is evident from his telling us, that the harbours of Ireland were better known in the line of commerce and among commercial people than those of Britain. (42) It is certain, that an intercourse of trade was kept up between Ireland and Gaul. (43) And not to inquire into the communication maintained with Spain after the arrival of the colony, commonly called the Milesian, from Gallicia in that country, it appears from various remains of antiquity discovered in Ireland, (44) that it was occasionally resorted to by traders from Carthage or other parts of Africa, and perhaps by some from more eastern tracts. It is very natural to suppose, that Christians of the countries now mentioned, on arriving in Ireland for commercial purposes, might, particularly considering the zeal of the primitive faithful, endeavour to convert some of the natives to the Christian faith and succeed in so doing. It might also have happened, that among the captives taken in the predatory excursions of the Irish along the coasts of Britain or Gaul, such as those under Niell Naõigiallach about the latter end of the fourth century and beginning of the fifth, there were some well informed Christians and even priests, who certainly did not lose any opportunity of instructing their masters. Nor is it improbable, that as early as the time of the persecution of Diocletian and Maximian, (45) the only one recorded as having raged in Britain, (46) some Christians and particularly of the clerical order thence took refuge in Ireland, as also perhaps from the Gauls and Spain, from which latter countries such persons might have fled hither during former persecutions. Whoever were the first founders of Christianity in Ireland, or whatever the time of its first introduction, there is reason to believe that Christians were to be found, at the period now under discussion, not only in the eastern and southern parts, but likewise in places more remote from Britain and the continent of Europe. (47)

(42) Melius aditus portusque per commercia et negotiatores cogniti. Tacitus, Vita Julii Agricolaë.

(43) See Probus, Vita S. Patricii, L. 1. §. 13, 14.

(44) See Governor Pownall's Account of some Irish Antiquities, Archæologia, Vol. 3.

(45) This persecution, which began A. D. 303, lasted in Britain, Gaul, and Spain not much more than one year. Usher, p. 167. seqq. Stillingfleet, Antiq. Chap. II.

(46) See Bede, L. 1. capp. 4, 6, 8.

(47) A very remarkable circumstance is related in the Tripartite history of St. Patrick (published by Colgan, Tr. Th.) Part II. cap. 35. St. Patrick, having crossed the Shannon on his way to Connaught, arrived at a place called Dumha-graidh (somewhere, it seems, in Leitrim, perhaps Drumahare, or in Roscommon) where he ordained one Ailbe (different from Ailbe of Emly) priest. As there was a deficiency of sacred utensils for celebrating mass, the saint pointed out to him a subterraneous stone grotto, where he would find an altar of nice workmanship and four chalices of glass. From a quotation in the narrative it appears, that this fact rested upon old authority. Jocelin also relates it cap. 105, but not so distinctly, and adds, that some persons thought those articles had belonged to Palladius or some of his companions. But, as Colgan remarks, Palladius or his followers had not penetrated so far into the interior of Ireland before the arrival of St. Patrick.

§. VII. Some Irish Christians used in those times to repair to other countries, where christianity had already risen to a flourishing state. This can be easily accounted for, considering the wish many of them naturally entertained of being better instructed in matters of religion than they could in their own country. A memorable, although unfortunate, instance occurs in the case of Celestius the favourite and most able disciple of the heresiarch Pelagius, whom St. Jerome more than once (48) exhibits as a Scot or Irishman. Pelagius, according to the generality of writers, was a Briton, and is so called by the ancients. (49) Were we to believe some obscure writers, he was abbot of Bangor in Wales; (50) but, as Stillingfleet has observed, (51) this cannot be true; for there was no monastery of Bangor at the time Pelagius broached his heresy, which he first disclosed about the year 405 at Rome, where he had lived for a long time before and kept a school. (52) Nor was it in a British monastery, as Ledwich says, (53) that Celestius became a disciple of his, but at Rome, after he had, when young, spent some time in a monastery, (54) but in what country is not known. While in that monastery his faith was sound; but, having afterwards met with Pelagius and Rufinus at Rome, he adopted their pernicious principles. (55) Marius Mercator states (56) that he was of a noble family, and St. Augustin has acknowledged that he was a man of an exceedingly sharp genius, (57) which indeed appears from the dexterity, with which he managed his arguments and endeavoured to puzzle his adversaries. (58) Some writers are of opinion that the passages of St. Jerome, from which it is usually concluded that Celestius was a Scot, refer not to Celestius but to Pelagius (59) himself and his master Rufinus, or, as St. Jerome used to call him, Grunnius. Without entering into a further detail on the subject, the authority of St. Prosper, who was well aware of the difference between Britons and Scots, is too explicit (60) to leave any doubt that Pelagius was a Briton.

(48) Ipseque (Pelagius) mutus latrat per Alpinum canem grandem et corpulentum—Habet enim progeniem Scoticæ gentis de Britannorum vicinia. Prol. ad L. 3. Comment. in Jeremiam. And, Prol. ad L. 1. of the same commentaries he says of him “Scotorum pulibus prægravatus.” Hence not only Usher, (Prim. p. 208 and 786) but also Noris, (Historia Pelagiana L. I. c. 3.) and Martianay (Not. ad Prol. l. 1. now quoted) conclude, that Celestius was a Scot.

(49) Prosper, in Chronico, has Pelagius Brito, and Poem. de Ingratis, Dogma quod antiqui satiatum felle draconis

Pestifero vomuit coluber sermone Britannus.

See more in Usher's Prim. p. 206.

(50) See Usher, ib. p. 208.

(51) Antiq. Chap. 4. (52) Noris, Hist. Pelag. l. I. c. 3. (53) p. 358.

(54) Gennadius, De Scriptor. Eccles. No. 44. (55) Noris loc. cit.

(56) Commonitor. ad Pintam cont. Julian.

(57) “Acerrimi ingenii.” S. August. L. 2. cont. duas Ep. Pelagii, cap. 3.

(58) See Usher, p. 231.

(59) Browerus thought so; Not. ad Venant. Fortunat. l. 3. epigr. 8. This opinion is ingeniously maintained by Garnier, Dissert. 1. in Marium Mercator. c. 5. Tillemont leans to it, T. XIII. Art. 216. I might add Skinner, Ecclesiastical History of Scotland, Letter 3. did that work deserve to be noticed.

(60) See above Not. 49.

§. VIII. We come now to an illustrious poet and theologian, of whom, if it shall appear that he was an Irishman, we may be justly proud. The celebrated Sedulius, according to several critics, belonged during at least part of his life, to the period we are treating of. Among the distinguished men of the ancient church there is scarcely any, concerning whom so many questions have been started and such a variety of opinions is to be met with.

The first question is whether he was an Irishman, or a native of some part of the continent. Following a crowd of older writers Usher (61) and Colgan, (62) who have discussed every thing relating to Sedulius, maintain, as do also Ware and Harris, (63) that he was a native of Ireland. Some British Scots have, as usual, put in their claim for Sedulius on account of his being generally designated by the appellation Scotus or Scotigena. But it has been clearly proved, and is now universally admitted, that, if he was a Scot at all, he was an Irish one, whereas in the very passages, from which his Scottish origin is deduced, he is called not merely Scotus but Scotus Hybernensis. (64) Others have said that he was a Spaniard (65); and some later writers have thrown out, as a mere conjecture, that he was an Italian. Labbe, (66) without determining to what country he belonged, confines himself to showing, that there is no sufficient proof of his having been an Irishman, and that he ought to be distinguished from another Sedulius, the commentator of St. Paul's Epistles, who was undoubtedly of Ireland and flourished in the ninth century. Bayle (67) follows Labbe, of whose dissertation he has merely given a summary. Mabillon (68) also has observed, that there were two of the name, one the great poet in the fifth century, the other who flourished in the eighth, and was certainly an Irish priest. But even Mabillon did not pretend to show, that the great Sedulius was not a native of Ireland. Amidst these doubts and disputes, and while nothing is adduced to overturn the assertion that he was an Irish Scot, an argument occurs, which has been overlooked by Usher, derived from the name Sedulius, a name quite common in Ireland, (69) and of which, except that of the poet, I believe no instance can be traced of old in any other country. And even admitting with Labbe that the Sedulius, whose annotations or Collectaneum we have on the Epistles of St. Paul and who is called Scotus Hybernensis, lived in the eighth and ninth century, which I allow to be very probable, (70) what is to be said of the collection of letters mentioned by Trithemius and beginning with the words, Sedulius Scotigena? (71) It is indeed objected that it should be proved first, that they were written by the poet; but I should rather think that, did it not appear from the correspondence that they were written to persons contemporary with the poet, Trithemius, however he might have been mistaken on some other points, would not have attributed them to him.

As to the precise time, in which he lived, it is generally agreed, that he flourished during some part of the fifth century. Trithemius says under Theodosius (the younger) A. 430. Colgan (72) places him about the same period. Usher thinks, that he belonged rather to the latter part of that century and died about A. 494. (73) It is certainly difficult to explain, why Sedulius does not appear in Gennadius' catalogue of ecclesiastical writers, were his works published before that time, whereas until that very year 494 Genadius brought down his work. In opposition to Usher's calculation a passage is quoted from ancient manuscripts, (74) in which Sedulius is expressly stated to have written his books in the time of Theodosius the younger and Valentinian the third, consequently before the year 450. If this is to be considered as decisive authority, we must suppose, to reconcile it with the silence of Gennadius, that Sedulius' writings were not generally known until many years after he had composed them. Some say that he was a bishop; but from the testimony of St. Isidore of Seville (75) it is clear that he rose no higher than to the rank of a priest; nor, as has been properly observed by Labbe and others, does the title, Antistes, given to him by some ancients, prove any thing to the contrary. (76) Some of the most beautiful hymns, (77) that are read in the Church, have been taken from Sedulius' poems.

(61) Primord. p. 769, seqq.

(62) AA. SS. Life of Sedulius at XII. Febr. (63) Irish Writers.

(64) See Usher, p. 771. Colgan, loc. cit. p. 321.

(65) See Usher, p. 770. yet F. Bivarius, though himself a Spaniard, leans to his having been an Irishman. ib.

(66) De Scriptor. Eccl. Tom. 2.

(67) Diction. Crit. at Sedulius. Dr. Ledwich says, p. 162. that Bayle has proved there were two Seduliuses. Now in the first place whatever has been proved was not by Bayle, but by Labbe; and, secondly, neither Labbe nor any one else has proved, that the older Sedulius was not an Irishman as well as the younger.

(68) Vet. Anal. Vol. 1. p. 363. Having quoted a passage concerning Sedulius, which see below (Not. 74), he adds, “Ex quibus apparet quantum a vero aberrant, qui hunc Sedulium eundem esse putant cum Sedulio Scotto seu Hiberno presbytero itidem poeta, quem seculo octavo floruisse constat.” As to his placing the younger Sedulius in the eighth century, it is easy to reconcile him with other writers; for Hepidanus the monk of St. Gall has at A. D. 818, Sedulius Scottus clarus habetur. Consequently he may be said to have flourished during part of the eighth century. But where Mabillon found, that he also was a poet, I cannot discover. There seems no doubt but that he was the same as Sedulius, abbot of Kildare, whose death is mentioned in the Irish Annals at the year 828. See AA. SS. p. 315.

(69) Colgan says that the name is written in Irish Siedhuil; I suppose the same as Shiel. He reckons eight eminent men of that name known in Irish history. AA. SS. p. 315.

(70) If Sedulius the poet was the same as the commentator, it is rather strange that St. Isidore of Seville, who in his Catalogue De Illustr. Eccl. Scriptor. mentions his poetical works, says nothing of his Annotations on St. Paul, as neither do Sigebertus Gemblacensis nor Honorius of Autun where treating of him in their catalogues. There is extant also a Collectaneum Sedulii in Matthaeum, which indeed cannot be attributed to the poet, whereas, to omit other observations of Labbe's, the poet himself is quoted in it. Trithemius, who attributes the Collectaneum on St. Paul to the poet, makes no mention of that on St. Matthew. In the Bibliotheca Patrum, Lyons 1677, Tom. 6. it is stated, that the author of the Commentary on St. Paul seems to have been the Sedulius of the year 818.

(71) See Usher, p. 771. These letters have not, as far as I know, been as yet published.

(72) AA. SS. ad XII. Febr.

(73) Pr. p. 777. Usher is followed by Ware, Irish Writers at Sedulius.

(74) Labbe gives it from an old MS. of Pithoeus, and Mabillon from a MS. of the monastery of Lerins in these words; "Incipit ars Sedulii poetæ, qui primo laicus in Italia philosophiam didicit; postea cum aliis metrorum generibus heroicum metrum Macedonio consulente docuit in Achaia; libros suos scripsit tempore Impm. minoris Theodosii filii Arcadii et Valentiniani filii Constantii." Vet. Anal. Vol. 1. p. 363.

(75) De Illustr. Eccl. Scriptor. at Sedulius.

(76) See Bingham, Origines Eccles. Book II. Chap. XIX. sect. 14.

(77) Ex. c. A solis ortus cardine—Hostis Herodes impie (since changed into Crudelis Herodes, Deum) &c. See Ware and Harris, Irish Writers, at Sedulius.

§. ix. It has been said that St. Briocus, from whom the town of St. Brieux in Britany got its name, was a native of the territory of Cork, (78) and was brought over to Gaul by St. German of Auxerre on his return from one of his missions in Great Britain. Fitzsimons has him in his catalogue of Irish saints. (79) But Lobineau, without even alluding to his supposed Irish origin, states (80) that he was a native of Great Britain, being of the same country and family with Rival one of the British princes, that emigrated to Armorican Gaul about the year 458.

(78) See Usher p. 997. Camden, Hibernia at Co. Cork.

(79) At 1. May. (80) Histoire de Bretagne; Vol. 1. p. 73.

§. x. Hitherto we have inquired into the history of such distinguished persons, as have been represented by foreign writers as born in Ireland, and concerning whom little or nothing is to be found in our old Irish Annalists, whose records of our ecclesiastical history usually begin with Palladius and St. Patrick and are, for the period we are now treating of, confined to an account of persons, who became eminent in their own country. To this description belong Ailbe of Emly, Declan of Ardmore, Ibar of Begery, and Kieran of Saigir, who, according to certain writers of their Lives, were bishops in Ireland before the arrival of St. Patrick. Of these saints we shall treat in the proper places; at present let it suffice to show, that there is no foundation for the high antiquity assigned to them, nor for their having been bishops as early as mentioned in those legends. That the three former, (for Kieran belongs to a much later period) were partly contemporaries with St. Patrick will not be denied; and that is as much as can be granted consistently with the truth of history. It is also to be observed, that these fables occur chiefly in the very tracts, called the Lives of those saints, tracts abounding with anachronisms and contradictions, while the old Irish annals and the most correct Lives of St. Patrick are in direct opposition to them. (81)

(81) Hence Warner had no right to say; "It seems agreed among all the Irish writers, that before Patrick or Palladius there were four bishops in Ireland." History of Ireland, p. 270. Nor did he know, that Sir James Ware, one of our most accurate and impartial antiquaries, did not recognize this agreement. (See Annot. ad Opusc. S. Patricii, p. 106.) Hanmer, in his Chronicle of Ireland, had detailed these stories as he found them in the legends, and Usher, who seemed inclined to believe them, copied the principal passages of the so called Lives relative to them. Colgan greedily swallowed them, (Tr. Th. p. 250. seqq.) but has been often obliged to contradict himself with regard to these subjects. Lloyd, On Church Government, (chap. 2.) says he dared not wholly reject those Irish legends of Kiaran, &c. and Harris, a servile follower of Usher, preferred (Bishops, at Ailbe and Kieran, and at St. Patrick) his statements concerning them to the authority of Ware.

§. XI. St. Ailbe is said to have been born in Eliach (82) in Munster. Then the following account of him is given. His father's name was Olcnaïs. When a boy, he wished to be enlightened concerning the creator of all things. On a certain occasion, while with uplifted eyes praying for this grace, he was overheard by a Christian priest, who had been sent to Ireland by the Apostolic see many years before St. Patrick. This priest accosted him, afterwards instructed him in the Christian faith, and then baptized him. (83) After some time we find St. Ailbe at Rome studying under a bishop Hilarius, and we are told that this same Hilarius sent (84) Ailbe to the Pope, that he might be ordained bishop by him; that he was very kindly received by the Pope, with whom he remained a year and fifty days; that in the mean while fifty holy men arrived from Ireland at Rome, among whom were Declan, twelve of the name of Colman, twelve Coemgens, and twelve Fintans; and that the Pope gave to those fifty men a separate habitation under the presidency of Ailbe. (85) Being ordained bishop, Ailbe was commissioned to preach the faith, but in what country we are not informed, to certain gentiles, which he did with great success. Having fulfilled this mission he returned home, preached all over Ireland, and converted many persons but not all; "because it was the will of God, that the holy bishop Patrick, who came to Ireland after Ailbe, should bring over all the Irish to the faith." (86)

Now this narrative is directly contradicted not only by Prosper, who expressly states that Palladius was the first bishop sent from Rome to Ireland, but likewise by the most respectable documents of our domestic history. Tirechan, one of our most ancient writers has, as quoted by Ware, (87) recorded that Ailbe was ordained priest by St. Patrick. In the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, (88) published by Colgan, the bishops Ailbe and Ibar are spoken of as obeying a certain injunction of their father Patrick, and Jocelin(89) distinctly calls them disciples of his. Hence Colgan himself reckons (90) Ailbe among the disciples of our great saint. And, what decides the question at once, the very accurate annals both of Ulster and Innisfallen place the death of Ailbe in the year 527. (91) Who will believe, that he could have been a preaching bishop some years or even one year before A. 432, the year of St. Patrick's arrival on his mission ?

(82) Hanmer explains this name by Ely O'Carrol. But there were other districts known by that name, which signifies a level tract of country. The Eliach or Eile, now called Eliogarty, is also in Munster, as indeed Ely O'Carrol formerly was.

(83) See Usher, p. 782.

(84) If Hilarius sent him to the Pope, it would seem that he was not a resident in Rome. Should there be any truth in what is said of Ailbe's expedition to Rome, I am inclined to think that Hilarius, bishop of Arles, who lived until the year 449, was the person alluded to, particularly as St. Patrick had spent some time among the celebrated monks of Lerins, of whose congregation Hilarius had been a member and probably a contemporary there with St. Patrick, who might accordingly have sent Ailbe and perhaps others for their theological education to that renowned school. I think this conjecture as probable as that of the Bollandists, according to whom (Commentar. præv. ad S. Patric. §. 4. Mart. 17.) said Hilarius was Pope Hilarius, or rather Hilarius, who, they say, ordained A. 464 Ailbe bishop as also Declan. It may be objected, that this conjecture accords better with the time of Ailbe's death, which was A. 527. Yet we may observe, that even between A.D. 464 and 527 an unusually long incumbency must have taken place. But I do not mean to insinuate, that Ailbe was ordained bishop during the life time of Hilarius of Arles. My conjecture goes no further than that Ailbe was perhaps, when young, sent to Hilarius for his education. Of this more hereafter.

(85) See Usher, p. 789.

(86) Ib. p. 793.

(87) Antiquities, chap. 29.

(88) L. III. cap. 33.

(89) Cap. 83.

(90) Tr. Th. App. V. ad Act. S. Patr. cap. 23. p. 265.

(91) Ware uses this argument, which is indeed invincible. (Annot. ad Opusc. S. Patric.) Usher was staggered by it; for, after quoting those Annals, (Ind. Chron. ad an. 527) he adds, that their statement cannot "cum illorum rationibus consistere, qui Ailbeum ante adventum Patricii Christianam fidem Hibernis annuntiavisse statuunt."

§. XII. Of Declan we read, that he was son of Ercus prince of Nandesi (Desies Co. Waterford,) and born in the house of one Dobran, where his father and mother, whose name was Dethidin, happened to be on a visit. While they were still there, Colman a holy priest, who afterwards became a bishop, came and preached to them the Christian faith and foretold the future greatness of the child. They believing delivered the infant to him to be baptized, which he did calling him Declan. Dobran, who was a relative of Ercus, on observing these circumstances, requested to be allowed to rear Declan, which his parents agreed to. After seven years, during which time he was taken particular care of, he was entrusted for his education to a religious and well informed Christian named Dymma, who having not long before returned to Ireland, of which he was a native, had constructed a cell in the neighbourhood. Declan had a schoolfellow of the name of Carpre or Carbre, who afterwards became a holy bishop. Having spent a long time under Dymma, his reputation became very great, and several persons came to put themselves under his direction, among whom are mentioned Mochelloc, Bean, Colman, Lachnin (or Lactin), Mobys, Findlug, and Caminen (or Caymin,) who afterwards erected cells in the vicinity of where Declan then was, not far from Lismore. (92) After these transactions Declan, taking some disciples with him, set out for Rome, where he arrived at the time Ailbe was there. He was most graciously received by the Pope, and highly honoured by the clergy and people of Rome. Having remained there a considerable time, he was ordained bishop by the Pope, and on being invested with power to preach in his own country, and receiving the apostolical benediction, set out on his journey for Ireland accompanied by several pious persons, among whom was Lunanus son of the king of the Romans! On his way he met in Italy St. Patrick, who was going to Rome, and who was afterwards sent by Pope Celestine to Ireland. Usher calculates, (93) that this meeting took place in the year 402. When returned to Ireland, he spent some time in Nandesi, and then having an occasion to go again to Rome was entertained on his way through Great Britain by the famous St. David of Wales. (94) Returning a second time to Ireland, he took up his residence at Ardmore on land granted to him by the lord of that country. (95)

To clear up the whole matter, it might be unnecessary to refer to any other authority than the very tract called Declan's Life, in which it is expressly stated that he survived Ailbe, (96) who, as we have seen above, died A. 527. This is more than sufficient to show, that he was not a bishop in the year 402 nor at any time before the mission of St. Patrick. Colgan, in opposition indeed to what he has elsewhere, reckons Declan among St. Patrick's disciples, and refers for a proof of it to several parts of his Life. (97) But I think it probable that Declan did not live early enough to be a disciple of our Apostle, although he might have been born before his death. Otherwise how can it be accounted for, that his name is not to be met with in Tirechan's list, (98) nor, what is much more remarkable, in any of the old Lives of St. Patrick, notwithstanding the minuteness, with which some of them make mention not only of such of his disciples as founded churches or monasteries, but likewise of very many of inferior note? From what is related of Declan it appears, that his reputation was very great in his time. It would have been therefore very strange to omit the name of so eminent a disciple, had he really belonged to their number. Calculating from the times of such of Declan's disciples, or friends, as we have some records of, we may conclude that he became distinguished during some part of the sixth century. Mochelloc (or Kelloc) (99) was, according to all probability, the same as Mochelloc, who is highly spoken of in the Irish Calendars and Martyrologies, and died very old in Fiodh Lethan a district not far from Lismore, in which was formerly a city called Cathuir mac Conchaidh. (100) His death is assigned to some year between A. 639 and 656, and his festival affixed to the 26th of March. (101) As to Colman we find several saints of that name in the sixth and about the beginning of the seventh century, (102) some of whom were of the same province (Munster) as Declan; for instance, Colman son of Lenine. (103) St. Lactin or Lactan was probably the abbot Lactean contemporary with St. Senan (104) in the sixth century. A St. Cayman of Dar-inis (105) is mentioned as having flourished in the early part of it. Then we have as contemporary with Declan St. David of Wales, who lived until a late period of said century. (106)

(92) Usher, Pr. p. 782 seqq. Colgan Tr. Th. p. 251.

(93) p. 790. Usher is followed by Smith, History of Waterford, p. 5.

(94) Hanmer, Chronicle, p. 69 New Edit. Usher omits this circumstance, as it did not square with his system.

(95) Hanmer, ib.

(96) Ailbe died vivente S. Declano. See Colgan AA. SS. p. 608. and Ware, Annot. ad Opusc. S. P. p. 106. Ledwich in his usual inaccurate manner says p. 361, that the annals of Ulster and Innisfallen, as cited by Ware, place the death of Declan later than that of Ailbe. Now in those Annals the name of Declan is not mentioned, nor does Ware cite them to that purpose, as he refers only to Declan's Life.

(97) Life of Declan, capp. 30, 31, 32, 33—49. Tr. Th. p. 269.

(98) Ap. Usher, p. 951.

(99) Mo, which signifies my, is frequently found prefixed, as an indication of affection, to the name of Irish saints; as ex. c. Moedoc, the celebrated prelate of Ferns, my Edoc or Edan, Mochocmoc, my Choemoc, &c.

(100) Archdall (Monasticon Hib. ad locum) could not guess at the precise situation of that town. Q. Might not Mocollop, the name of a parish not far from Lismore (See Smith's Waterford, p. 21,) be a corruption of Mochelloc?

(101) AA. SS. ad 26 Mart. Colgan has at 7 Mart. another Mochelloc, whom he places in the beginning of the 5th century as having been a disciple of Declan. But he alleges no other authority for his so early existence than the stuff contained in Declan's Life.

(102) Usher, p. 960. Colgan, AA. SS. p. 427.

(103) See below Chap. XII. §. 8. (104) AA. SS. p. 525.

(105) Ib. p. 393 and 397. There are two islands of this name, one, now called Molana in the river Blackwater below Lismore, and the other near Wexford. It is not clear in which of these islands Cayman resided. Colgan thinks it was the latter, and is followed by Archdall at Darinis.

(106) Usher from certain chronological supputations would fain place St. David's death in the year 544. See Pr. p. 526, and Ind. Chron. ad A. 544. The fact, however, as shall be proved hereafter, is that he lived many years later, and it is doubtful, whether he was even a bishop in that year.

§. XIII. We come now to Ibar, whose history is much less involved and obscure (107) than that of Declan. There is no mention of his journeying to Rome or any other place out of Ireland. He is stated to have been a native of Ulster, (108) a bishop before the arrival of St. Patrick, (109) and to have resided chiefly in his monastery in Beg-erin. (110) The history of Ibar is easily cleared up. In some of the Lives of St. Patrick he is, as has been seen above, expressly named together with Ailbe as a disciple of his. He is also mentioned as such in Tirechan's list (111). Colgan, contradicting himself, reckons him accordingly among the disciples of our great Apostle; (112) and that he was one of them cannot be doubted. He died in the year 500. (113)

(107) Usher quotes (p. 1061) a Life of Ibar, which seems to have been very short, as the account given of him is chiefly taken from incidental scraps of other documents.

(108) Usher p. 784. and 1061. (109) Id. p. 781.

(110) Id. p. 794. Beg-erin, that is, little Ireland, (Parva Hibernia, ib.) is a small island near the harbour of Wexford. It is now called Begery, which name is but a corruption of the old one Begerin, and not, as Seward says, (Topogr. Hibern.) signifying the little land in the water.

(111) Usher p. 950. (112) Tr. Th. p. 265.

(113) Annal. Ulton. and Innisfal. Ware Annotat. ad Op. &c. p. 106. Usher Ind. Chron.

§.xiv. Whatever claims any one of the saints we have now treated of might have had to a priority of time, compared with St. Patrick, Kieran of Saigir certainly had none at all; and it is surprising that men of learning, particularly such a man as Usher, could have received the incoherent and ridiculous accounts given of the times, at which he lived. Two Lives of his, which, I am compelled to say, abound in fables, have been published by Colgan, (114) from which alone it is evident, that he lived at a much later period than what has been usually assigned. After honouring him with the title of the first-born of the saints of Ireland, they proceed to inform us that his father was Lugneus a noble Ossorian, and his mother Liadain of Corcalaighde (Carberry) in South Munster. St. Kieran was born in Cape Clear island. (115) Having spent thirty years in Ireland still unbaptized, he heard of the Christian religion as flourishing at Rome, and went thither for the purpose of being instructed. There he was baptized and remained twenty years (116) studying the scriptures and canons, after which he was ordained bishop and sent to preach in his own country. On his way to Ireland he met St. Patrick in Italy, who was not as yet a bishop, and who told Kieran that he would follow him to Ireland in thirty years from the date of their meeting. This must have happened in the year 402, and accordingly Kieran, being then 50 years of age, was born A. 352. When arrived in Ireland he was miraculously directed, as St. Patrick had told him he would, to the place since called Saigir, (117) where he erected a monastery. Having ordained an innumerable multitude of bishops, priests, &c. he died at the age of about 300 years!!!

Other accounts state, that Kieran's meeting with St. Patrick somewhere out of Ireland occurred several years after the latter had commenced his apostolical labours in this country. Jocelin (118) places it at a time when St. Patrick was returning from Britain, whither he had gone some time before to procure a supply of additional helpers for his mission, and tells us that Kieran was then one of six Irish clergymen, who were proceeding to foreign countries for religious improvement, and all of whom afterwards became bishops in their own country. In Colgan's Tripartite history of St. Patrick (119) the precise place of meeting is not given; but, what is more to the purpose, it is represented as having occurred at least twelve years after St. Patrick had begun his mission in Ireland, and Kieran is stated to have then received directions from the saint concerning the district, in which he should erect his monastery. Accordingly Colgan, notwithstanding his credulity elsewhere, reckons him among the disciples of St. Patrick. (120)

It will however appear, that he is not to be ranked among those disciples. His name does not occur in Tirechan's list nor in any of St. Patrick's Lives except the two, which have been just quoted ; and even its appearing in them was evidently owing to the stories concerning him having got into circulation, which stories the authors of those two Lives endeavoured to reconcile with the true history of St. Patrick. (121) Had he been a disciple of our Apostle, how could he have become a scholar of St. Finnian of Clonard in the sixth century ? For such he is stated to have been not only in the Life of Finnian, (122) and in that of his illustrious namesake Kieran of Clonmacnois, (123) but likewise in the tract, (124) which is called his first Life, and which enters into more particulars than the other. At what time Finnian's school first became distinguished, is not accurately known, but we shall see hereafter that it could not be much earlier than the year 534. He died A. 552. (125) In both of Kieran's Lives (126) his namesake of Clonmacnois, who died, rather young, in the year 549, (127) and the two Brendans, one of Clonfert, who died A. 577 (128) and the other of Birr, whose death happened but a few years before, are spoken of as having had transactions with him. We may then safely conclude, that he belonged to the sixth century, became distinguished towards the middle of it, and died during its latter half. As this was known to be the case, his blundering biographers strove to reconcile their nonsense concerning the antiquity and privileges of the monastery of Saigir with the true date of his life by making him die at the age of about 300 years, although, had they calculated better, about 220 might have been sufficient.

(114) AA. SS. ad 5 Mart. The Bollandists reject them as incorrect and fabulous. Usher had the first of these Lives in MS. as appears from his quotations, p. 784. seqq.

(115) The first Life has ; “ Conceptus est electus Dei Kieranus natusque et nutritus est in regione Corcalaigndi, videlicet in Clera insula.” The second Life agrees with the first as to his father and mother, but has not the place of his birth. Ware was mistaken in making him a native of Ossory (Bishops—Ossory) although his father was from that country. The memory of Kieran is kept up in that island, some places and remains being honoured with his name. See Smith, History of Cork, Vol. 1. p. 287.

(116) Another account has fifteen years. Usher, p. 788.

(117) Seir-keran in the King's county.

(118) Vita S. Patric. cap. 93. Usher quotes p. 790. a part of Jocelin's text, but omits what did not agree with his system; for, while he gives some of Jocelin's words in such a manner as to make the reader think, that Jocelin alluded to the pretended meeting in the year 402, the whole context shows that the meeting spoken of took place, according to Jocelin, many years later; and that it happened not in Italy nor on St. Patrick's coming from Rome; and that, in direct opposition to Usher's calculation, Kieran, so far from being a bishop at Rome in the year 402, was not one until a considerable time after St. Patrick's mission to Ireland, when Kieran having returned from abroad was consecrated.

(119) L. 2. c. 9. (120) Tr. Th. p. 266.

(121) This will be seen particularly from the jumbled, aukward, and hesitating manner, in which Kieran is spoken of in the Tripartite, loc. cit.

(122) Vita S. Finniani cap. 19. AA. SS. ad 23. Febr. Several of his fellow students are mentioned there, such as Kieran of Clonmacnois, Columbkil, the two Brendans, Cannech, or Kenny, &c. all of whom flourished in the sixth century. Colgan refers to another life of Finnian, in which these same eminent persons are named as his contemporaries at that great school. See also Usher, p. 909.

(123) AA. SS. p. 471. There likewise the two Kierans, Columbkil, and the two Brendans are spoken of as fellow-students.

(124) Cap. 33. AA. SS. p. 463. The author of that Life well knowing, that Finnian's school was held in the sixth century, and acknowledging that Kieran was universally considered as a pupil of Finnian, cunningly endeavoured to reconcile this circumstance with his former positions by telling us, that Kieran was then very old, but that he was so humble as not to be ashamed to attend Finnian's lectures. "Iste S. Kieranus valde erat humilis in omnibus, qui multum diligebat divinam scripturam audire et discere usque ad decrepitam aetatem. Fertur enim de eo, quod ipse cum caeteris sanctis Hiberniæ illius temporis ad virum sanctum Finnianum abbatem sapientissimum monasterii Cluain Eraird exivit in sua senectute, et in divinis scripturis in sancta schola ejus legebat. Inde vero beatissimus Kieranus alumnus S. Finniani, sicut alii sancti Hiberniæ, dicitur." A strange thing indeed that, after 20 years of study at Rome, and having been a bishop A. 402, he should be found studying under Finnian about the year 540. Nor can these studies of his be reconciled with his having been a disciple of St. Patrick or a bishop during his time. In the Lives of Finnian and Kieran of Clonmacnois above quoted there is not the least hint of his great age, when attending at the school of Clonard; and he is simply mentioned as one of the ordinary pupils. Ware in his Annotat. ad op. S. P. p. 106. refers to the Life of Finnian as if showing, that Kieran was very old when he attended at his school. But he confounded what is said of him in his own Life with what is stated in that of Finnian. And yet in another place (Antiquities, c. 29.) he throws out a conjecture as if Kieran might have been alive in the time of Pope Gregory the great.

(125) Usher, Ind. Chron. The 4 Masters quoted by Colgan AA. SS. p. 406. have A. 548 (549). I should think the authority of the Annals of Innisfallen referred to by Usher the better one.

(126) 1st Life, cap. 33. 2d Life, cap. 11.

(127) Usher, Ind. Chron. (128) Ib.

§. xv. From what has been hitherto observed it appears, that there is no foundation for the opinion that a hierarchy existed in Ireland before the arrival of Palladius. (129) The Christians of those times, and who from various concurring circumstances seem to have been chiefly in the South-eastern parts of the island, were undoubtedly assisted by priests either natives or foreigners, or probably both, who however had been ordained in other countries. Their situation in this respect was similar to that of the Catholics of North America, who had no resident bishop among them until within these few years, and to that of the Catholics of even some parts of Europe at this day, who are destitute of bishops. Yet, as is the case in the countries now alluded to and was until lately in North America, they were not totally bereft of spiritual attendance, being, at least occasionally, visited by priests and religious teachers. (130) Their situation began to be better known at Rome after the mission of St. German of Auxerre and Lupus of Troyes in the year 429 (131) to Britain for the purpose of extirpating the Pelagian heresy out of that country. During that mission they could easily obtain information concerning the progress of Christianity in Ireland, and there is no doubt but that they were encouraged and assisted in their inquiries by St. Patrick, who, as will be seen hereafter, accompanied them in their spiritual expedition, and had been long intimate with St. German, whom Pope Celestine had deputed his legate on this occasion. It is natural to suppose, that, in giving an account to the Pope of the result of his labours, St. German did not omit to communicate some particulars relative to the state of the Irish Christians. Nor is it improbable, that some of those converts, who, as has been already observed, used to repair to the Continent for instruction, might have penetrated about that period as far as Rome, and there given some useful information with regard to the same subject. In consequence of such information, whatsoever quarter it proceeded from, and considering the increasing number of Christians in Ireland, the Pope deemed it advisable to appoint a bishop, to preside over them (132) and to superintend the ecclesiastical affairs of the country.

(129) Usher, although not very positive on the subject, was strongly inclined towards that opinion in consequence of what had been said in the legends concerning Ailbe, Declan, &c. (See Prim. p. 800.) On the same principle Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 250 seqq.) maintains, that there were some bishops in Ireland before Palla-dius. Not to quote O'Connor and others, who follow in the same track, Dr. Ledwich, having rejected (p. 361.) the traditions relative to Ailbe, &c. and their episcopacy, stoutly asserts (p. 388) that there was abundance of bishops in this country, but that they would not submit to Palladius or the Pope. He does not indeed tell us who they were, and it would be a hard matter to find them out. The Doctor in his fury against Popery did not like the accounts given of Ailbe, &c. not because they contain anachronisms, (for such trifles he could easily swallow) but because it was said, that those holy men had "travelled to Rome and there received ordination. This is incredible." Then this great antiquary and logician, finding himself puzzled by the mission of Palladius likewise from Rome, unblushingly tells us, that the Irish had many bishops among them before him, and even attributes to them (p. 389) the departure of Palladius from Ireland. Strange that Usher, Colgan, Ware, Harris, &c. had never heard of those Anti-Roman prelates, who routed Palladius out of this country. Mentita est iniquitas sibi.

(130) Upon this circumstance some anti-episcopalians have endeavoured to build a system concerning the ancient church government of the Scots, as if there existed among them, before the arrival of Palladius, an entire national church under a merely presbyterian form. To reconcile the fable of a great Scottish church in Britain, from at least the time of Pope Victor, with the want of bishops old John Fordun had said (Scotichr. l. 3. c. 8.) that the Scots of those days were governed only by priests and monks, "according to the mode of the primitive church." The Scotch presbyterians seized upon this idea as justificatory of their ecclesiastical discipline. The very learned French Calvinist Blondel came forward (Apolog. pro Hieronymo) as an auxiliary on this question, in the supposition, which it is strange so erudite a man could admit, of the existence of such a great church in Scotland at that early period. The deductions drawn by him and others gave occasion to Dr. Lloyd, bishop of St. Asaph, to inquire into the truth of those Scottish stories, and to demonstrate, as he has done in his Treatise on Church government, that there neither was nor could be any such thing as a considerable church of British Scots in those times. As several circumstances relative to the civil history of the Scots and their pretended antiquity in Britain were discussed in this work, Sir G. Mackenzie endeavoured to answer it, but was most ably refuted by Dr. Stillingfleet in the Preface to the Antiquities of the British churches. The Culdees, an order of men, of whom we shall treat elsewhere, have been introduced into this controversy, concerning which, notwithstanding the assertions of Toland (Nazarenus Part II. sect. 3) and others, it is needless to add any thing further, it being at present universally admitted, that the whole fabric was founded on fiction; and it matters little what such a fabulous writer as Fordun might have thought as to the primitive nature of ecclesiastical government.

(131) See Usher, Pr. p. 325 seqq. and Ind. Chron.

(132) The words of Prosper, Chron. Basso et Antiocho Coss. (A. D. 431) are decisive on this point. "Ad Scotos in Christum credentes ordinatus a Papa Celestino Palladius primus Episcopus mittitur." This is the reading of Labbe's edition, which is considered as very accurate, Nova Biblioth. MSS. librorum, Tom. 1. The edition of Canisius and another from an Augsburg MS. both extant in the Biblioth. Patrum, Lugdun. Tom. 8. agree in substance with it. The former has "Ad Scotos in Christum credentes ordinatur a Papa Celestino Palladius et primus episcopus mittitur." The latter, "Ad Scotos in Christum credentes ordinatus a Papa Celestino Palladius primus episcopus missus est." Bede reads it also in a similar manner, as appears from his Chronicle and Hist. Eccl. Angl. L. 1. c. 13, in both of which he has the important words Credentes and Primus. Smith observes in a note to c. 13. now quoted, that the most ancient MSS. have these words. He says "Credents—Primus. Verba hæc sunt antiquissimorum Bedæ MSS. nec ullam mutationis admittunt suspicionem." The same reading is found in a heap of Chronicles mentioned by Usher, (p. 799.) who however was inclined to prefer the reading of a certain copy of Prosper, in which the word primus happened to be omitted. But he was too good a critic to rely on that single authority, and accordingly endeavoured to make it appear that, admitting the genuineness of that word, it might be understood of Palladius having been the first sent of the two bishops appointed by Celestine for Ireland, whereas St. Patrick was the second; or that primus may be explained primarius or chief bishop. These are forced explanations, and never would have occurred to Usher, had he not wished to support the credit of the stories concerning Ailbe, Declan, &c.; nor do they agree with what Prosper has elsewhere; for, speaking (De Gratia Christi contra Cassianum, cap. 41.) of the spiritual benefit conferred upon the island by Celestine, he says simply, that he ordained a bishop for the inhabitants, Ordinato Scotis episcopo, whence it is clear that according to him they had no other bishop at that time; and Tillemont (Not. 1. at St. Patrice) was right in observing, that Usher's conjectures relative to primus were far from being solid. Some difficulties have been started also with regard to the word Credentes, chiefly founded on a passage of Nennius, (Hist. Brit. cap. 53) "Missus est Palladius episcopus primitus a Celestino Papa Romano ad Scotos in Christum convertendos." Hence it might be inferred, that Palladius's mission was to a land of mere heathens, among whom Christianity was until then scarcely heard of. Without entering into further disquisitions, it is sufficient to state, that the authority of Nennius, a comparatively late writer, does not deserve to be placed in competition with that of Prosper, who lived at the period of which we are treating and had the best opportunities of knowing the true state of Christianity in Ireland. Nennius, or whoever he borrowed that passage from, seems to have had the true text of Prosper before his eyes; but thinking it odd that Palladius should have been sent to a people, who were already believers, he changed credentes into convertendos, not reflecting that Prosper's object was not to exhibit Palladius as the first preacher of the Christian faith in Ireland, but as the first bishop appointed for the faithful there, and that it has frequently occurred, as the Bollandists justly observe (Comment. Praev. ad S. Patr.) that bishops have not been appointed for countries until a certain number of Christians were already living in them. He retained from Prosper's text the words in Christum, which agree very well with credentes, but not so with convertendos.

§. XVI. The person chosen for this purpose was Palladius, a deacon of the Roman church or, as some writers have called him, archdeacon, (133) who had already distinguished himself by his exertions for the object of delivering Britain from the infection of the Pelagian heresy. (134) From this and some other circumstances it appears very probable, that he was a native of that country, (135) as he is expressly called in an old document quoted by Usher. (136) Being consecrated bishop he set out for Ireland accompanied by some missionaries, four of whom, Sylvester, Solonius, Augustin, and Benedict, are mentioned by name in some of St. Patrick's Lives. (137) Where he landed is not particularly recorded; but it is very probable it was not far from where Wexford now stands; for we find him soon after in the territory called Hy-garchon, (138) of which Nathi son of Garchon (139) was then sovereign. It seems his arrival in that country was rather early in the year 431, the year of his departure from Rome, (140) whereas some time must be allowed for the first operations of his mission, which appear to have been successful. The most authentic accounts of it agree in stating that, besides having baptized some persons, he erected three churches, one called Cell-fine, in which he deposited the sacred books, and some reliques of St. Peter and Paul and of other saints, which he had brought from Rome, besides his writing tablets, all of which were preserved there with veneration for a long time after; another called Teach-na-Roman, that is, the house of the Romans; and a third under the name of Domnach-arda. (141) These churches are generally supposed to have stood in the territory now called the county of Wicklow, (142) and Domnach-arda is stated to have given its name to Donard (143) a village in the interior of that county.

As soon as the news of the progress of the mission and of its advancement into the very heart of the country reached Rome and other parts of the continent, fame, as usual, added to the pleasing information, and excited a confident assurance of its general success throughout the whole island. Hence Prosper did not hesitate to say, that through the exertion of Pope Celestine Ireland was become a Christian country. (144)

Prosper was not acquainted, when he announced such joyful tidings, (145) with the change which in the mean time had occurred with regard to Palladius. The success of his exertions alarmed the sticklers for polytheism, and he was denounced to Nathi as a dangerous person. That prince entered warmly into the views of the opponents of Palladius, who accordingly feeling himself unable to resist their violence, and being ordered to quit the country, found it necessary to withdraw, leaving however some of his companions, (146) who as being less known were not so much objects of persecution, to take care of his converts (147) and watch the more favourable opportunities for propagating the Gospel. He sailed from Ireland towards the latter end of the same year A. D. 431, (148) and, after being tossed about by storms, arriving in Britain, with the intention of thence proceeding to Rome, died not long after at, as is commonly said, Fordun in the district of Mearns in Scotland. (149)

Whoever considers the foregoing circumstantial account of Palladius' mission given by ancient writers at a time, when no rivalry existed between the Irish and British Scots, must wonder that persons could have been found either so ignorant, or so infected with national vanity, as to maintain, that he was sent by Celestine not to Ireland but to Scotland, (150) and that the object of his mission was not to preside over a new church and to propagate the Gospel, but to eradicate the Pelagian heresy. (151.)

(133) See Usher, p. 802. Alemand in his superficial book, Histoire Monastique d'Irlande, makes (Introd. p. 2.) Palladius a Canon Regular. But there was no such Order then at Rome. (See below Chap. IV. §. 15.)

(134) In Prosper's Chron. Coss. Florent. et Dionys. (A. D. 429) ed. Labb. we read, "Actione Palladii diaconi Papa Celestinus Germanum Antissiodorensem episcopum vice sua mittit, et deturbatis hæreticis Britannos ad Catholicam fidem dirigit."

(135) See Lloyd On Church, &c. Chap. 2. § 4.

(136) P. 1043.

(137) Second Life in Tr. Th. p. 13. Jocelín, cap. 25, &c.
See also Usher, p. 812. seqq.

(138) Colgan in a note Tr. Th. p. 9. says (and is followed by O'Flaherty and others) that Hy-Garchon is a maritime tract of the county of Wicklow; but the passage of Fiech's Scholiast, to which that note refers, runs thus: "Palladius—appulit in regione de Hy-Garchon in extremis Lageniæ finibus." And Marian Gorman, quoted by Colgan (ib. p. 374), speaking in his Calendar of a St. Ermineus has, "Ermineus, id est, Mernocus de Rath-noi in Hy-Garchon, id est, in Fotharta Lageniæ." By Fotharta, or, as pronounced in Irish, Foharta, most probably he meant a tract of country, of which the barony of Forth in Co. Wexford formed a part. The ancient Fotharta, or rather the seven districts of that name so called, as Keating and after him Colgan (AA. SS. p. 143) inform us, from Eochaid Fionn Fothairt a prince of the second or third century, comprized a very great part of Leinster. The town of Wexford, or the site on which it has been built, was in Fotharta. (See Archdall at Fionmagh.) But, as Rathnoi, mentioned by Marian Gorman, seems to be the same as Rathnew a place within a few miles of Wicklow, on comparing this circumstance with Fotharta and Hy-Garchon being as if identified, and with the statement of Fiech's Scholiast that Palladius landed in Hy-Garchon at the extremity of Leinster, it appears probable that Hy-Garchon comprized a great part of the present counties of Wicklow and Wexford, and that the landing place of Palladius was in some part of the latter county rather than of the former. Add to this that Nathi seems to have been a powerful prince and of sufficient weight to force Palladius to quit Ireland, and consequently sovereign of a more extensive country than a maritime district of the county of Wicklow. It may seem odd, that neither Hy-Garchon nor even Fotharta are mentioned by Harris, Antiq. or Beauford, Ancient Topography of Ireland, in Vallancey's Collectan. Vol. 3d; but I have frequently found, that those and other accounts of the ancient divisions of Ireland are very imperfect.

(139) According to O'Flaherty, (Ogygia vindicated, chap. 16.) the words, son of Garchon, are not to be understood as if Nathi was the immediate son of Garchon, but that he was of the family of Garchon, and prince of the sept and country called Hy-Garchon, which name was derived from Garchon or Garchuo a personage well known in Irish history, and whose genealogy O'Flaherty, ib. traces up to Conchabar a king of Ireland in the first century.

(140) See above Not. 132.

(141) In the second Life of St. Patrick, which the Bollandists considered as one of the best, we read, cap. 24. “ Nam beatus “ simus Papa Celestinus Romanæ ecclesiæ archidiaconum nomine “ Palladium episcopum ordinavit, et in Hyberniam insulam, tra“ ditis sibi beati Petri et Pauli et aliorum sanctorum reliquiis, ve“ teris quoque et novi testamenti voluminibus datis, transmisit.
 “ Palladius terram Scotorum intrans in Lageniensium fines per-“ venit, ubi Nathi filius Garrechon comes erat, qui sibi contrarius “ erat. Aliis vero, divina misericordia stimulante ad divinum “ cultum, beatus Palladius in nomine S. Trinitatis baptizatis tres “ ecclesias in eodem pago construxit; unam quæ dicitur Cell-fine,
 “ in qua usque hodie libros suos, quos a S. Celestino accepit, reliquit, “ et capsam reliquiarum B. Petri et Pauli sanctorumque aliorum, et “ tabulas, in quibus scribere solebat, quas ex ipsius nomine Scotice “ Pall-ere (al. Pallad-ere) id est, onus Palladii vocant, cum “ veneratione habentur; alteram, id est, Thech-na-Roman; ter“ tiam Domnach-ardec, (al. Domnach-aracha) in qua sunt (re-“ quiescunt) sancti viri de familia Palladii Sylvester et Salonius et “ ibi honorantur.” Fiech’s Scholiast says §. 13; “ Palladius ibi
 “ (in Hy-Garchon) fundavit ecclesias aliquot, nempe Teach-na-“ Roman, ædem Romanorum, Kill-fine, et alias.” An ancient author, quoted by Usher, (p. 812) agrees as to the three churches, and adds at Domnach-arte “ quam dicavit Silvestro et Solonio;”
 that is erected for their use and to be governed by them. Hence we may explain the origin of the mistake committed by the author of Usher’s Tripartite (p. 813.) in attributing the construction of that church and also of Teach-na-Roman to the disciples of Palladius. In the fourth Life of St. Patrick (cap. 28.) we are first told that Palladius erected three churches, one of which was Cell-fine, and then it is said that his disciples built Teach-na-Roman, and a third church called Dominica Arda. Together with this incoherent statement, the author tells us that Palladius remained but a few days in Ireland, as if he could have made in so short a time as many converts as would require three churches.

Jocelin has also (cap. 25.) three churches, as erected by Palladius, and over which he left some of his disciples ; and in Colgan's Tripartite (L. 1. c. 38.) they are mentioned by name and with all the circumstances given in the above quoted passage of the second Life.

(142) After a lapse of so many centuries it must be very difficult to determine the particular situation of those churches. As to Cell-fine or Kill-fine, none of our antiquaries have attempted to mention the place where it stood. Teach-na-Roman is placed, under the name of Teachromham, by Archdall, (Monast. Hib.) near the harbour of Wicklow. This he has done, as far as I can understand, on no other authority than on the supposition that the territory of Hy-Garchon did not extend far beyond that neighbourhood. For I do not find any church or place of that name in the modern topography of that country. Nor had he any right to say that Palladius founded an abbey there, as it was nothing more than a church with probably an habitation annexed for a few missionaries.

(143) Archdall Mon. Hib. and Seward Topogr. Hib. at Donard.

(144) Speaking of Celestine he says, Lib. de gratia Christi contra Cassianum. cap. 41. "Nec signiore cura ab hoc eodem morbo (Pelagian) Britannias liberavit, quando quosdam inimicos gratiæ, solum suæ originis occupantes, etiam ab illo secreto exclusit oceani: et ordinato Scotis episcopo, dum Romanam insulam studet servare Catholicam, fecit etiam Barbaram Christianam." I hope none of my countrymen will be offended at the epithet Barbaram given by Prosper to Ireland. Whatever country did not form a part of the Roman empire was so called at that period. But there was a time, when that epithet was applied to Rome itself, considered relatively to Greece. Thus Plautus, Prolog. ad Trinummum; "Huic nomen Græce est Thesaurο fabulæ. Philemo scripsit, Plautus vertit barbare." Prosper's words have been strangely misunderstood by some writers. Ware, (Annot. ad Op. S. Patr. p. 107.) could not reconcile fecit Barbaram Christianam with Scotos in Christum credentes, of which above, Note 132. He interprets Barbaram by infidelem, and supposes that Prosper's meaning was that Ireland was quite an infidel country before Palladius' mission. But surely there is a great difference between a country, in which some Christians may be found, and one in which Christianity is spread far and wide, as Prosper imagined was the case in Ireland after he had heard of the progress Palladius had made at first. Ware would fain strike out the word credentes, but finding the authorities for it too stubborn he says, that it is probably to be referred to the time when Prosper wrote his Chronicle, which was several years after he had written the tract against Cassian, and at which time the greatest part of Ireland was become Christian through the preaching of St. Patrick. This explanation is too absurd to merit any attention. It comes to this; Palladius was sent in the year 431 to the Scots, who were believers in Christ about the year 450. O'Flaherty (Ogygia vindicated, chap. 15.) stumbled upon a similar explanation of the word credentes in consequence of supposing, that by the Scots believing in Christ, as Prosper expressed himself, the whole nation was to be understood. Lloyd also, (On Church, &c. chap. 2. §. 4.) found himself puzzled in endeavouring to explain, how the island could be said to have been made Christian in Palladius' time, whereas in truth it was not; but at last he comes to this solution of the difficulty; "I should rather think with bishop Usher (Prim. p. 798.) that those words were only a good omination of Prosper's upon the sending of Palladius thither possibly upon his hearing at first better news than proved afterwards true." That possibly is not in Usher, and it is plain that Prosper had actually heard favourable accounts of Palladius' mission, although exaggerated, as Usher observes, by the trumpet of fame.

(145) Usher has with his usual sagacity observed, (p. 798.) that Prosper's book against Cassian was written not long after the mission of Palladius. Hence we may easily infer, that he had not then heard of the reverse, which Palladius met with.

(146) According to Jocelin (cap. 25) he left Augustin, Benedict, Sylvester, and Solonius in Ireland. Probus, (Vita S. Patr. L. 1. c. 25.) makes mention of Augustin and Benedict as having been in Britain with Palladius after his departure from Ireland. And in the other Lives of St. Patrick Sylvester and Solonius alone are spoken of as having remained behind, and being buried at Domnach-arda or Donard; (2d Life c. 24.—4th c. 28.—Colgan's Trip. L. 1. c. 38.) See above Note 141.

(147) Some writers speak in general terms of Palladius' mission as if had been nearly fruitless; see Usher p. 812—814. But their words must be understood as referring to his not having succeeded in converting the great body of the nation, which was reserved by the Almighty for St. Patrick; and hence the adage so common in Ireland, “Not to Palladius but to Patrick did God grant the conversion of Ireland.”

(148) See Usher p. 814. All accounts agree that his stay in Ireland was not long, although not so short as to be confined to a few days. The Annals of Innisfallen (ad A. 431) state, that he remained one year in Ireland.

(149) Fiech’s Scholiast in Tr. Th. p. 5 says of him; “Coactus circuire oras Hiberniæ versus aquilonem, donec tandem tempestate magna pulsus venerit ad extremam partem Modhaid versus Austrum, ubi fundavit ecclesiam Fordun; et Pledi est nomen ejus ibi.” An old writer quoted by Usher (p. 814) says; “Palladius vero reversus est ut iret Romam, sed mortuus est in regione Britonum.” By the part of Britain, in which he died, is to be understood the country of the Picts, as appears from Nennius, Probus, Jocelin, and others quoted by Usher, (p. 812) as also from the 2d Life of St. Patrick, (cap. 23) the 4th Life (cap. 28.) and Colgan’s Tripartite L. 1. c. 38. They all agree as to terra Pictorum. The last mentioned work has; “Et cum ad suos reverti statuisset, morbo correptus in terra Cruthiniorum sive Pictorum decessit.” From so many concurrent testimonies it is evident, that the story of his having suffered martyrdom in Ireland (see Usher p. 814, and the 4th Life of St. Patrick, cap. 28.) was entirely without foundation, not to enlarge upon the silence of Prosper and of the Roman and other martyrologies as to such an event. Fordun or Fordoun, a small town in Kircandineshire or Mearns, which formed a part of Pictland, is stated not only by Scottish writers, (ap. Usher p. 671) but likewise in some old Irish documents to have been the place of his death. For instance, in the second Life of St. Patrick, cap. 24, we read; “Post parvum intervallum (after his leaving Ireland) defunctus est Palladius in campo Girgin, in loco qui dicitur Forddun: dicunt vero alii martyrio coronatum esse eum illic.” As to this martyrdom at Fordoun there is as little foundation for it, as for that in Ireland; the Picts of that part of Great Britain were at that time, at least a great proportion of them, Christians. Campus Girgin in Irish Mag-Girgin (O'Flaherty marginal note to Tr. Th. p. 248) is the tract since called by corruption Mearns. By the country, which Fiech's Scholiast calls Modhaid, I should imagine he meant that of the Mæatæ, under whose name and that of Caledonians seem to have been comprized at a certain period all such parts of Great Britain as were not subject to the Romans. (See Usher, p. 1032.) If Fordun was a town of the Mæatæ, it will follow that some tribes of that name lived much more to the northward than Camden, who placed them in Northumberland, or H. Lhuyd who assigned to them the country about Lothian, were inclined to admit. (See Gibson's Camden col. 1065.) The memory of Palladius is still revered at Fordun, under the name of Paldi or Pad, and a chapel adjacent to a church is called Palladius' chapel. (Playfair's Geography at Fordoun.) It may be inquired how Palladius, after leaving Ireland, happened to arrive at a place so remote and in the North East of Britain. According to Fiech's Scholiast he had been driven by a storm as far as that country, and consequently should have sailed round the North of Scotland. It seems, however, more probable, that he landed somewhere in the North West, and thence continued his course by land until he arrived at Fordun, where he fell sick. I am inclined to think, that he wished to visit the newly converted Christians of that part of Scotland, viz. the Southern Picts, who, as Bede informs us, (Eccl. Hist. L. 3. c. 4.) had been instructed by the celebrated Ninian bishop of Candida casa, Whitehern in Galloway, now Whithorn in Wigtonshire, and whose country was included between the frith of Forth and the Grampian hills. (See Usher, p. 668.) The day of Palladius' death is variously given; 15th December, 25th December (both A. D. 431.) 27th January, and 6th July (A. D. 432.) See Colgan Tr. Th. p. 18. O'Flaherty, Ogyg. vind. chap. 16. and below Chap. IV. Not. 153.

(150) It would be tiresome to repeat the fables of John Fordon, Hector Boethius, Polydore Virgil, and others concerning Palladius' arrival about the year 429 at Fordoun, by order of Pope Celestine; how splendidly he was received by Eugenius king of the Scots; how well treated were his followers by king Dongard successor of Eugenius; and how, during many years, which he spent among the Scots in Britain, he ordained bishops and archbishops, sent missionaries to the Orkney islands, &c. &c. A heap of this stuff has been collected by Usher, p. 670. seqq. Now the fact is that Fordoun was not comprized in any Scottish kingdom until some hundreds of years afterwards, whereas, according to those same writers, the conquest of the country of the Picts, to which Fordoun belonged, by Kenneth, son of Alpin, did not take place until about the year 839. See Usher p. 715 seqq. and Ind. Chr. ad A. 838. Nor was there any such kingdom in G. Britain at the period we are treating of. Not to fatigue the reader with further authorities, Chalmers shows, (Caledonia, Book 2. Chap. 6.) where he has collected almost every thing that could be said on the subject, that the Scottish kingdom in the West of N. Britain did not commence until the year 503 under Loarn, who was succeeded by his brother Fergus. See also above Note 29. Besides all our old domestic historians, who agree as to Palladius having been sent to Ireland, we have Nennius, who, after mentioning his want of success, says that he went from Ireland to Britain; “Et profectus est ille Palladius de Hibernia, pervenitque ad Britanniam, et ibi defunctus est in terra Pictorum.” Hist. Brit. cap. 53. Prosper’s mention of an island as the theatre of Palladius’ exertions, an island distinct from Britain (see above Not. 144) is another incontrovertible argument against the foolish pretensions of Fordoun and his followers; the name of island could never have been given to what is now called Scotland. This argument has terribly puzzled some Scotch zealots. Poor Sir G. Mackenzie endeavoured to show, that Scotland might have been called an island in consequence of the Roman wall, by which it was separated from the rest of Britain. He might as well have said that China is an island on account of the great wall, that had been raised to keep out the Tartars. For a refutation of this silly evasion I refer to Ogygia Vind. Chap. 15. The same nonsense is repeated in Skinner’s Eccl. History of Scotland, Letter IV. in which we are told, that by the barbaram insulam Prosper meant the barbarous part of Britain, and that the country beyond the friths might be called an island. This is exactly in the manner of that notorious liar Dempster, Baron of Muresk, who in his rhapsodies here and there, ex. c. Menolog. Scot. at 14th March says, that the mountainous parts of Scotland were called Ireland. It is no wonder then, that some learned Scots now living reject the authority of such fabulous scribblers, or nu-gatores, as Pinkerton calls H. Boethius, Dempster, &c. (Pref. to Vitæ antiquæ sanctorum, qui habitaverunt in ea parte Britannicæ nunc vocata Scotia, &c.) See also Chalmers, Caledonia, passim. I shall conclude this subject with referring the curious reader to Usher p. 671. Colgan Tr. Th. p. 245. seqq. Lloyd on Church, &c. Chap. 2. §. 4. Stillingfleet, Antiq. Pref. and Chap. 2. O'Flaherty Ogyg. Vind. &c.

(151) No ancient writer has said that Palladius was sent to Britain for that purpose, although he had been instrumental in procuring the mission of St. German. (See above Not. 134.) But to admit with Prosper and all others, who had treated of him, that he was sent to a nation as yet little advanced in Christianity, ill accorded with the Scottish stories concerning the flourishing state of religion in N. Britain since the time of Pope Victor and the beginning of the third century. Accordingly Boethius and some other authors of the like stamp found it necessary to give a new object to his mission. They have been followed by Buchanan, (Rer. Scot. L. 5. at king Dongard) Spotswood, (History of the Church, &c. of Scotland, B. 1.) Mackenzie, &c. This unfounded notion seems to be still prevalent with some people in Scotland; for I find in the Statistical Account of that country, compiled by Sir J. Sinclair, Palladius spoken of as having been sent by Pope Celestin to oppose the Pelagian heresy! Vol. IV. p. 499, at Fordoun.

CHAPTER II.

*The existence of St. Patrick demonstrated.
Objections to it answered.*

SECT. I.

THE great work of the general conversion of the people of Ireland was reserved by the Almighty for the ministry of St. Patrick according to the Irish adage, that not to Palladius but to Patrick did God grant the conversion of Ireland. (1.) Notwithstanding this adage and the constant testimony and tradition of all the old writers and inhabitants of the country, corroborated by the universal consent of all the ecclesiastical historians, who have touched upon the affairs of Ireland, and the extraordinary reputation, which our great Apostle has enjoyed throughout the Christian world, some persons have ventured to throw out certain ridiculous objections against the very existence of so celebrated a saint. A Dr. Ryves, a Master in Chancery about the year 1618, had some doubts concerning the time, at which St. Patrick lived, but did not dare to contest his existence. (2) This audacious paradox was to appear in our own times, and has been ushered into the world by Dr. Ledwich in that book, to which he has given the title of The Antiquities of Ireland. Whether he be the original inventor of it, or, as rumour says, the copyist of some papers on this subject handed over to him by a late ingenious Irishman very little versed in Ecclesiastical history, who, it seems, was ashamed to announce it in his own name, is of small consequence; and Dr. Ledwich must remain responsible for this daring outrage on learning and truth. As to Ryves, who having applied to Usher on the subject wished also to consult Camden, Usher, enclosing a letter of his, thus writes to the latter; (3) "I gave him good leave to discredit, as much as he list, that pack of ridiculous miracles, which latter writers had fastened upon St. Patrick; but wished him in no wise to touch the credit of that worthy man himself, nor to question his succession to Palladius, nor to cast him unto lower times, contrary to the consent of all writers, that ever make mention of him." Camden agreed with Usher as to the ridiculous miracles being fabricated by late writers, and consequently affording no argument against the true history of St. Patrick. The mighty Ledwich, coming forward to support Ryves, accuses those two great men of "deviating strangely from strict veracity." "For (he continues) the Roman martyrology, Erric of Auxerre, Nennius and others never omit St. Patrick's miracles, when they name him; they are both coeval and from the same mint." (4) What a medley of equivocation and bad reasoning? The Roman martyrology has in general terms at 17 Mart. that St. Patrick was distinguished by very great miracles and virtues; maximis miraculis et virtutibus claruit. Erric of Auxerre merely says, (De Miraculis S. Germani, cap. 12.) that St. Patrick illustrated Ireland by his learning, miracles and virtues, &c. "Eam (Hiberniam) doctrina, miraculis nunc quoque et in perpetuum mirificis apostolatus sui illustrabat (Patricius) privilegiis." Nennius indeed goes farther, (Hist. Brit. cap. 58.) attributing to him the healing of the blind, lepers, and deaf, casting out devils, as likewise the recalling of some persons to life; "Sanctus itaque Patricius Evangelium Christi prædicabat, virtutes apostolicas faciebat, cæcos illuminabat, leprosos mundabat, surdos audire faciebat, dæmones ex obsessis corporibus fugabat, mortuos IX resuscitavit." Will the Doctor say, that these were ridiculous miracles? If so, he must apply the same epithet to those of the Gospel. This is not the sort of miracles that Usher alluded to, but some truly ridiculous ones, related by Jocelin, and in two or three other Lives of St. Patrick, none of which, however, occur in Fiech's hymn or in his Scholiast. Many similar foolish miracles are attributed to St. Dunstan and others. But surely no man of common sense would thence conclude, that such persons never existed. The fact is, that stories of that kind are in themselves strong proofs of their having existed, and of their having been held in great estimation.

The other argument adduced by Ryves was founded on the silence of Platina, (at Pope Celestine) concerning St. Patrick, although he had mentioned the mission of Palladius. Upon this Usher remarks in the above quoted letter; "You easily may see what little credit the testimony (or the silence rather) of so late an author, as Platina is, may carry to bear down the constant agreement of all our own writers." Ledwich does Platina the honour to say, (5) that "few were more conversant in ecclesiastical history than he." This alone is sufficient to show, how little the Doctor knows about ecclesiastical history; and every one, who has read Platina's meagre accounts of the Popes, cannot but perceive, that they are miserably deficient and frequently incorrect. The fact however is, that Platina in the few words, which he has about Palladius having been sent to the Scots, merely followed Prosper; nor was he bound to mention the mission of St. Patrick, as it was sufficient, according to his abridged method, to name the chief of that mission, who was Palladius. For, as we shall see hereafter, St. Patrick had been already appointed a member of that same mission, and not, as many have thought, newly constituted for that purpose by Celestine after Palladius' death. It might as well be asked, why did not Platina, or Prosper before him, give us the names of such of the members of that mission, as accompanied Palladius to Ireland; for surely no one will imagine, that he went all alone upon such an important errand. In the same manner Platina (ib.) mentions the mission of St. German to Britain, without saying a word concerning Lupus of Troyes or his other companions.

(1) Jocelin cap. 25. Usher p. 813.

(2) The sceptical conjecture of Maurice, Defence, &c. cap. Ledwich, (Antiq. p. 364, first edition, the one which I usually quote) thrown out without any sort of argument, is not worth the pains of inquiring into. I do not find in Hanmer any denial of the existence of St. Patrick, as Dr. O'Connor insinuates, Columbanus' third Letter, p. 48. 53. What Hanmer says (Chron.) is, that the Christian religion did not first begin in Ireland by St. James the Apostle, nor by St. Patrick. He then talks of Colman, who baptized Declan, and relates the old stories about the said Declan, Ailbe, Kieran, and Ibar. Next he proceeds to an account of St.

Patrick, which he gives in the usual manner, without the least indication of his having doubted of his existence. As to Keating's answers to Hanmer mentioned ib. (p. 53) they have nothing to do with the present question. Keating's animadversions on Hanmer (Pref. to History of Ireland) refer to his having said, that St. Patrick ought not to be called the first Apostle of Ireland, to something observed by Hanmer about Patrick's purgatory, and to other trifling matters. Dr. Ledwich must not be robbed of the honour of being the first writer, that has exerted his powers to strip St. Patrick both of soul and body.

(3) Usher's Letters; No. 33. (4) Antiq. p. 363. (5) Ib.

§. II. Having now done with Ryves, let us see what Ledwich gives us from himself. He does not scruple to say; (6) "It is an undoubted fact that St. Patrick is not mentioned by any author or in any work of veracity in the 5th, 6th, 7th or 8th centuries;" and he adds that Nennius and Erric of Auxerre, who lived in the ninth, are the oldest writers, that make mention of him. In answer to this false and, as will soon be seen, wilfully false statement, I shall first adduce St. Patrick himself, of whom there are two tracts still extant, one entitled his Confession, and the other his Letter against Coroticus. Not to anticipate what the reader will find elsewhere (7) concerning these most valuable documents, it is sufficient at present to observe that, besides their being considered as genuine by Ware, who first published them (8) from very ancient manuscripts, by the Bollandists, (who gave a new edition of them (9) from a MS. different from those used by Ware) and by Tillemont, (10) &c. &c. they bear internal marks of their high antiquity. Of these I shall here mention but one, which has been already noticed by Tillemont. In the Letter against Coroticus St. Patrick says, that "it was the custom of the Roman and Gallic Christians to send holy men with large sums of money to the Franks and other nations (or Gentiles) to redeem the baptized captives. (11)" This letter therefore must have been written while the Franks were still pagans, and consequently before A. D. 496, the year that Clovis and his followers became Christians. The fervour of Clovis after his conversion is too well known to leave any doubt, that any of his Franks would have dared to make Christian captives after that period. But the fact is, that the Franks were still hovering on the frontiers of Gaul, when the Letter was written, and had not yet advanced much into that country, their progress having been but slow until after the decisive battle of Soissons in the year 486. It is ludicrous enough to observe, how the Doctor refers to the very passage now quoted as a proof of the Letter not being genuine. "Whoever" he says (12) "writ this was but little acquainted with the state of Italy under the Gothic princes, or of the French under the Merovingians." What has the state of Italy to do with the question? Is it because Roman Christians are spoken of? The Doctor seems not to know, what every one moderately versed in history is acquainted with, that the name, Romans, used to be given to the Roman colonists and their descendants, who were settled in the provinces belonging to the Roman empire. Thus there were Romans living in Britain, which Prosper calls a Roman island; Romans living in Gaul, to whom St. Patrick alludes, Romans in Spain, &c. The truth is, that no one but a person well informed of the state, not of France but of Gaul before it became France, and of the predatory incursions of the Franks before their conversion to Christianity, could have written in the manner we have seen.

This mighty critic declares the Confession to be a rhapsody of travels, miracles, &c. (13) It is not, however, a rhapsody of misrepresentations and sophisms. It is really a most edifying tract, breathing all through sentiments of the most profound humility and a zeal truly apostolical. I allow that such profane scoffers at truth and religion, as Ledwich, cannot feel any relish in the perusal of such works. There is scarcely any miracle mentioned in it, and in the visions therein recorded we find nothing puerile or unworthy of the operation of the Almighty. Tillemont was so struck with the spirit, that pervades it and the letter against Coroticus, that he considered St. Patrick as more like the Prophets and Apostles than the other saints who appeared after them. (14) The Doctor urges against the authenticity of the Confession the omission of some circumstances, which are mentioned in some of St. Patrick's Lives, ex. c. his "relationship to St. Martin and his advancement to the episcopate of Ireland by Pope Celestine." One would imagine, that such omissions should be considered by him as proofs of its authenticity, whereas he rejects those very circumstances as fabulous, (15) where it suits his plan to do so. The works, in which such matters occur, are denounced by our Aristarchus as fabulous; but here comes a work in which they do not occur; therefore, he says, it is spurious. Bravo, thou mighty reformer of Irish history! As to the rest, St. Patrick's object in writing the Confession was not to give an entire history of his own life.

(6) Antiq. p. 375.

(7) Below Chap. VI. VII.

(8) S. Patric.—Opuscula. London, 1656.

(9) At 17 Mart. The Bollandists or, as Ledwich calls them, Bollandus, (for he seems not to know, that after the death of Bollandus there were such men as Henschenius, Papebrochius, &c. who continued with extraordinary learning and judgment the great work first undertaken by him) are on one occasion, together with Tillemont, favourites with our Doctor, "liberal, learned, and enlightened Roman Catholics" (p. 366.) because they have said, that several of the writers of St. Patrick's Lives were very fabulous. They, however, admitted and maintained the authenticity of those two tracts of St. Patrick. Nor is it true that, as he states, (ib.) Bollandus, i. e. the Bollandists, declared the whole of the Irish sanctology to be a "compilation of arrant fblers, and not older than the 12th century." For, besides their acknowledging that some of those Lives of St. Patrick were derived from more ancient documents, yet with many interpolations, ex. c. Colgan's Tripartite, they allow, with regard to other parts of what Ledwich calls the Irish sanctology, that many of the Lives of our saints are very ancient, such as those of Pulcherius, Ytha, Maidoc, &c. See at Pulcherius, 13 Mart.

(10) Memoires, &c. Tom. 16. at St. Patrice. I am really astonished at Dr. O'Connor's assertion (Columbanus' 3d Letter, p. 49.) that St. Patrick's Epistles are rejected as spurious by Tillemont. Under the name Epistles he must have meant to include that against Coroticus, and I know of no other epistle now extant as supposed to be of St. Patrick, unless his Confession may be so called, as it seems to have been by some persons. (See Ware's Præf. ad Opusc. &c.) Dr. Milner, whom Dr. O'Connor was animadverting upon, had appealed to the Confession and the Ep. ad Corot. (Tour in Ireland, Letter XI.) Hence I suppose, that Dr. O'Connor comprized the Confession under the title of Epistles. Now Tillemont expressly maintains the genuineness of both tracts, and lays it down that they are the surest authorities for a true Life of St. Patrick. He doubts indeed of the Canons, that go under St. Patrick's name, being entitled to so remote a date, but does not insinuate the least suspicion against the antiquity of either the Confession or the Letter.

(11) "Consuetudo Romanorum et Gallorum Christianorum; mittunt viros sanctos idoneos ad Francos et cæteras gentes cum tot mil. solidorum ad redimendos captivos baptizatos." It is probable, that by gentes he meant gentiles, in which sense I find it used in the Confession, p. 7. Ware's Ed. Whether or not is of little consequence, whereas the Franks, who used to carry off Christian captives, could not have been Christians themselves at that time.

(12) P. 161.

(13) P. 160.

(14) Memoires, &c. at St. Patrice, Art. 1.

(15) See p. 371, 372, and the whole of Chap. XV.

§. III. The Canons attributed to St. Patrick, (16) and in which his name so often occurs, afford another invincible argument against Ledwich's assertion. I will not now inquire, whether they were all collected during St. Patrick's life time, or all actually delivered by him or in synods held under his presidency; but this much I can state as certain, that several of them were drawn up at a time, when paganism was far from being extinct in Ireland. Among the canons of the synod of Patrick, Auxilius, and Isserninus the eighth begins thus: "Clericus si pro gentili homine fidejussor fuerit." In the thirteenth we read; "Eleemosynam a Gentibus offerendam in Ecclesiam recipi non licet." And in the fourteenth; "Christianus qui—more Gentilium ad aruspicem meaverit." See also Can. 20. 24. From these Canons it appears, that Pagans were generally mixed with Christians at the time they were framed. Now it is certain that since, at the latest, the middle of the sixth century (17) very few traces of paganism were to be found in Ireland; and from that period the zeal of the holy men of this country for propagating the Gospel began to be directed to foreign parts, as there was little or no necessity for their exertions at home. Witness the spiritual labours of Columb-kill, Columbanus, Gallus, &c. Accordingly, should it be even admitted, which however I see no reason for, that the above quoted canons were not made by our Apostle, yet, as they existed before the middle of the sixth century, and were given to the public in his name, it is plain that he must have been well known in Ireland at that distant period.

(16) They have been published by Ware, (Opusc. S. P.) Spelman, (Concil. Vol. 1.) and Wilkins (Concil. M. Britannicæ et Hibernicæ Vol. 1.). Several of them, together with other Irish Canons, have been published also by D'Achery (Spicilegium Tom. 9, and in De la Barre's edition Tom. 1.). Dachery in a Monitum says, that the whole of them were made before the eighth century. Martene and Durand have added some more old Irish Canons. (Thesaur. nov. Anecd. Tom. 4.)

(17) It is scarcely worth while to notice a Ledwich-like assertion of Campbell, who in his flimsy book, Strictures on the Ecclesiastical and Literary history of Ireland, objecting to the rapid progress of Christianity in this country says, p. 98, that in after-ages, that is, after St. Patrick's time, paganism was found "loitering in the land, and sometimes maintaining its ascendancy in the highest stations." And yet for his after-ages he appeals only to the sixth century and the beginning of the seventh. According to him Dermot, monarch of Ireland, who, having reigned 20 years, was killed in battle about the year 560 (4 Masters, and Colgan Tr. Th. p. 6—450—663.) was a pagan. If so, he was a strange sort of one; for it was he, who granted to the great Kieran Clonmacnois, the island Inis-Aingean, and very many other places for his monasteries; Usher Pr. p. 957. As to his transactions with Columbkil, to which Campbell alludes in a very ignorant manner, and of which O'Donnel has written largely in his Life of Columbkil, it is sufficient at present to observe that, so far from showing that he was not a Christian, they prove directly the reverse. I wish Campbell had told us where he read that Dermot had a Druid in his retinue; he had, I know, bards or poets according to the custom of the Irish princes; but those bards were Christians. Then he says that Congall, who reigned in the beginning of the 7th century, was a pagan, and is said to have burnt all the clergy at Kildare. Now there was no Congall king of Ireland at that time, nor is there the least mention, in any authentic document, of such burning of the clergy at that period. There was a Conal (or Congal) who together with his brother Cellach began to reign over Ireland A. D. 642, (Usher Ind. Chron.) but they were both Christians. A king of the name of Congal reigned in the beginning of the eighth century. O'Flaherty says he began to reign A. D. 704, and that his reign lasted seven years; Ogygia, p. 432. Some stories had been fabricated concerning him, as if he had been a persecutor of the Church, and committed great atrocities at Kildare, of which, however, not one word is to be met with in the detailed account of that place given by Colgan, Tr. Th. and Archdall Mon. Hibern. &c. &c. Keating has these stories, Book 2. at A. D. 693. Warner adds that Congal was a pagan; Hist. of Ireland p. 315. Campbell followed Warner, but he mistook the eighth for the seventh cen-

ture. The least knowledge of Irish history is sufficient to show, that the nation would not have recognized a pagan sovereign at that period. So far from Congal being a pagan and a persecutor, his reign was remembered with gratitude as prosperous and peaceable, and himself represented as a beneficent prince. O'Flaherty quotes an Irish distich to that purpose. See also O'Halloran, Hist. of Irel. Book IX. Chap. 5. He is spoken of as a Christian in Colgan's AA. SS. p. 454—744, &c. was a near relative of Dunchad, who became Abbot of Hy in the year 710, and grandson of the pious king Donald the second. (See Tr. Th. p. 448.) Next he quotes a passage full of lies from a so called Life of Gildas, the falshood of which Usher had exposed long ago, Pr. p. 907. and after him Colgan AA. SS. p. 189. seqq. To their remarks I shall merely add, that, as the blundering author of that stuff to other praises of his saint adds that of having refuted and reclaimed heretics in Ireland, it would follow, according to him, that Christianity had been already widely diffused through the country. The fact however is, that no heresy existed among us in Gildas' time, for which we have the authority of the great S. Columbanus, who survived him by some years, and who writing to a Pope asserted, that Ireland had never yet been tainted with heresy. "Nullus hæreticus, nullus Judæus, nullus schismaticus fuit." So much for, as Ledwich calls him, p. 159, "the learned and ingenious Dr. Campbell, whose talents and accomplishments do honour to his native country." Yet this pair of worthies do not always coincide in opinion; for Campbell did not call in question the existence of St. Patrick; but on the contrary, as if knowing what his comrade was about to give to the world, he writes, p. 87; "Nor should it impeach the history of St. Patrick, that its unlearned writers have interspersed it with miracle and blemished it by fable. Livy abounds with prodigies, yet Livy is the prince of historians," &c.

§. iv. I shall pass over the Irish hymn or Metrical account of St. Patrick attributed to Fiech bishop of Sletty, who certainly lived in the fifth century. The Bollandists and some other judicious critics doubt of his having been the author of it. But it does not follow, that it is not very ancient, and most probably not later than the seventh, or perhaps the sixth century. The discussion, however, of this point might lead us too far at present. For the same reason I shall not here enlarge on the argument furnished by the Latin hymn ascribed to Secundinus one of St. Patrick's first companions, (18) and in which the saint is spoken of as still living. From the style and other circumstances it is easy to perceive, that it was composed long before the Doctor's favourite century, the ninth, as will evidently appear lower down.

(18) See below, Not. 28.

§. v. In the seventh century we have a witness of unquestioned authority, Cumman author of the learned letter to Segienus, abbot of Hy, concerning the Paschal question. (19) This letter was written, according to Usher's calculation, in the year 634, (20) and is more than once highly praised and even analyzed by Ledwich. Cumman arguing from various cycles refers in the first place to that, "which," he says, "St. Patrick our Pope brought with him. (21)" This was well known to the Doctor, who, it appears, had read the whole epistle with attention, and even tells his readers that Cumman "enters on an account of the various cycles, as those of Patrick, Anatolius, Theophilus," &c. (22) But in another place, (23) giving likewise an analysis of the same epistle, and referring to the cycles adduced by Cumman, he omits that of Patrick, while he carefully mentions those of Anatolius, Theophilus, Cyrl, &c. What shall we say of such a proceeding as this? Is it not a wilful suppression of the truth, and a shameless imposition on the public? Or what can we think of a man, who, knowing that Cumman had spoken of St. Patrick, as the Pope or bishop of the Irish nation, has the effrontery to appeal to that same Cumman to prove, that St. Patrick was an ideal personage? (24)

(19) It is the 11th letter in Usher's Sylloge Ep. Hibern.

(20) Pr. p. 937 and Ind. Chron.

(21) “Primum illum, quem sanctus Patricius Papa noster tulit—secundo Anatolium—tertio Theophilum,” &c. In ancient times the title Papa, i. e. Father, used to be given to other bishops besides the bishop of Rome.

(22) Antiq. p. 63. (23) p. 169. (24) See p. 368.

§. VI. A very interesting document, belonging to the same century, has been published by Mabilion. (25) It consists of Litanies for the use of the Anglican church in that age. He found them together with a copy of the Psalms in the library of Rheims, written in the old Anglo-Saxon characters. Besides St. Gregory the great and other saints prior to that period, they contain the names of St. Patrick, St. Brindan (Brendan), St. Carnach, St. Munna, Columcille, St. Brigid, &c. Not one of the saints famous in England about the latter end of the seventh century is mentioned in them; not Cuthbert, Wilfrid, Aidan, Aldhelm, Laurentius, Mellitus, &c. whose names would certainly not have been omitted, had those Litanies been of a later period.

The Antiphonarium Benchorense is probably of equal antiquity. It belonged to the monastery of Bangor in the county of Down, and is now in the Ambrosian library of Milan, whither it was removed from the monastery of Bobio. It has been published by Muratori, who considered it as written in the seventh or, at least, the eighth century. (26) Dr. O’Conor maintains, that it must have been written before the year 691. (27) It contains a hymn in honour of St. Patrick teacher of the Scots. (28) broisiana, Tom. IV. Patavii, A. 1713. He thought, that it was about a thousand years old. It may be doubted whether Dungal was, as Muratori says in the above quoted passage, the person that presented it to the monastery of Bobio; for, although he gave many books, among which some antiphonaries, (see below Not. 138 to Chap. XX.) to that monastery, yet that of Bangor is not specially mentioned in the catalogue of said books; and it is not improbable that it was in the library of Bobio, before Dungal went to Italy in the early part of the ninth century. As St. Columbanus, the founder of said monastery, had been a monk of Bangor, a certain intercourse was kept up between both places. In his preface to it in Anecdota Ambros. Muratori makes no mention of Dungal, but strives to make out the age of it from what is said towards the end concerning Cronan, abbot of Bangor, who seems to be spoken of as alive when it was written.

(25) Vet. Anal. Vol. 2. p. 669. seqq.

(26) “Edidi jam ego vetustissimum Antiphonarium celeberrimi monasterii Benchorensis in Hibernia, seculo Christi septimo aut saltem octavo exaratum, quod temporibus Caroli magni Dungalus monachus Scotus Ticinum deportavit, et Bobiensi deinde monasterio dono dedit.” Muratorii Opera, Arezzo, 1771. tom. 13. part. I. p. 240. This Antiphony may be seen in Muratori’s Anecdota Am-

(27) In his Epistola nuncupatoria (Rerum Hibern. Scriptor.) he treats learnedly of the age of the Antiphonarium Bencho-reuse, and states that the copy, published by Muratori, was written at a time when Cronan was abbot of Bangor. He then asserts (p. 167.) that this Cronan died in 691, although Archdall (at Bangor) assigns his death to 721. Thus it appears that said copy belonged to the seventh century. Dr. O'Connor refers to said work, in his Third Letter under the name of Columbanus, (p. 58) for what he had said of that MS. But in this letter there must be an error of the press; for, instead of A. 640, before which it is here said that it was written, we ought to read, conformably with the Epistola, &c. A. 691.

(28) Hymnus S. Patricii magistri Scotorum. It is the hymn attributed to St. Secundinus, of which more elsewhere.

§. VII. The illustrious Adamnan flourished in the seventh century, and died early in the next. (29) His Life of St. Columba, or Columb-kill, in three books, is most highly esteemed by the best critics, none of whom have called its genuineness into question. It is frequently referred to by our Doctor, as a work of authority. For example, arguing against the rights of the see of Armagh and the mission of St. Patrick, he urges, (30) that Adamnan in his Life of Columba has not a word about Armagh, its bishop, or primacy. Let me observe incidentally, that this is a ridiculous argument; for surely Adamnan was not writing an ecclesiastical history of Ireland, nor does he speak of any Irish bishop except such as some particular circumstance of the acts of St. Columba had a reference to. We might as well ask the Doctor, why Adamnan has not made mention of the Asiatic missionaries, who, according to him, were the founders of Christianity in this country. In another place, (31) talking of his favourite church of Aghaboe, he tells us that it was noticed by Adamnan in the sixth century. The poor Doctor must be always bungling. Adamnan lived not in the sixth, but in the seventh and eighth centuries. Now this same Adamnan makes express mention of St. Patrick in the second preface to his work; “Quidam proselytus Brito, homo sanctus, sancti Patricii episcopi discipulus, Maveteus (32) nomine, ita de nostro prophetavit patrono,” &c. The Doctor knew this well, whereas he quotes (33) four long lines of that same short preface relative to the name Columba. Notwithstanding all this he appeals, in the same barefaced manner that, as we have seen, he did to Cumian, also to Adamnan, to prove that St. Patrick was an ideal personage. (34) It was, I dare say, the apprehension of his being obliged to acknowledge that Adamnan has spoken of our Apostle, that induced him to omit, in his paltry review of Irish literature, (35) an account of the writings of Adamnan. And elsewhere (36) he has endeavoured to undermine the genuineness of the three books of Columba’s life; 1st, because miracles and visions are recorded in them; and 2d, because the author “never mentions the sentiments of Columba or his Culdees on the points disputed between them and Rome, as Bede does, nor his dying command to his disciples to continue Quartadecimans,” As to miracles and visions, it would be useless to attempt a discussion with such a staunch philosophe as Ledwich ; but his other argument contains almost as many falsehoods as words. Columba never had any dispute with Rome, nor does Bede say any such thing. Columba died in the year 597, the very year, in which the monk Augustin arrived in England from Rome, (37) and consequently several years before the paschal and tonsural disputes began. The monks of Hy were not Culdees. The Irish were never Quartadecimans, as Ledwich might have learned even from Bede, and it is a most impudent assertion to state, that Columba gave any such dying command as this audacious scribbler has invented. On these subjects more in their proper place.

(29) A. D. 704. Usher p. 702 and Ind. Chron. The 4 Masters (Tr. Th. p. 498.) have A. 703 ; which, considering their mode of reckoning the years, was the same as A. 704.

(30) p. 390. (31) p. 396.

(32) Usher calls him Mochtheus ; Pr. p. 855. 1047. (33) p. 59.

(34) p. 368. (35) Chap. VII. (36) p. 404.

(37) See Usher, Ind. Chron.

§. VIII. We find St. Patrick's name in a very ancient little tract concerning the Liturgy, of which Usher writes thus in his above quoted letter to Camden ; “ Yet have I seen in Sir Robert Cotton's “ library an ancient fragment written before the time “ of Bede, wherein St. Patrick is not only menti- “ oned, but also made to be as ancient in time as “ hitherto we have still believed him to have been. “ It was found among Mr. Josseline's papers.—If “ you—will be pleased to transcribe that place of it, “ where the tradition of the Liturgy from man to “ man is described (for there this mention of St. Patrick is to be found)” &c. The Doctor alluding to this fragment says ; (38) “ A Cotton MS. recording “ St. Patrick is much boasted of ; surely we might “ expect to find in Usher's Primordia, published “ twenty-one years after his writing this letter to “ Camden, an account of its possessors, its letters, “ and language, so as to enable us to form some “ judgment of its antiquity ; but none of these ap“ pear, if I recollect right, in that work. A Cot“ tonian MS. occurs, but it is not noticed as remark- “ able for age or contents.” It is almost impossible to read this man’s silly effusions with patience. In direct opposition to what he here says, Usher has given extracts from that fragment, and in the language (Latin) in which it was written, in various parts of his Primordia, and quotes it as a MS. in the Cotton library, adding that it was written nine hundred years before ; that is, early in the eighth century, and calling it an anonymous tract on the Origin of ecclesiastical or liturgical offices. (39) In one of the passages quoted by Usher it is said, that German and Lupus had instructed the blessed Patrick, and placed him as archbishop in Ireland, &c.

 (40) The MS. referred to by Usher may be seen at this day among the Cotton MSS. in the British Museum. (41)

(38) p. 363.

(39) See Pr. p. 343, 840, 916. The whole tract has, as already observed (Not. 37. to Chap. I.) been published by Spelman Con- cil. &c. Vol. 1. p. 176, and Wilkins, Concil. M. B. &c. Vol. 4.
App. p. 741.

(40) Beatum Patricium spiritaliter sacras literas docuerunt atque enutrierunt, et ipsum episcopum per eorum prædicationem (pro eorum prædicatione, Spelman,) archiepiscopum in Scotiis ac Bri-tanniis posuerunt.” Pr. p. 840.

(41) Columbanus’ third Letter ; p. 54.

§. ix. Next comes Bede, in whose Martyrology, as well as in the Roman, and those of Usuardus, Rabanus, Ado, &c., the festival of St. Patrick in Ireland is marked at the 17th of March. (42) This is acknowledged by the Doctor, (43) who, however, after having railèd most indecently against Calendars and Martyrologies in general, (44) says, without adducing any argument, that it is very doubtful whether Bede wrote a Martyrology or not. This is really carrying too far the system of imposing on his readers; for Bede tells us himself, not by a bare hint, but in express terms, that he had composed such a work. (45) It is true that some additions have been made to it, which have been carefully distinguished by critics from Bede's original text. Not to quote Giorgi and others, let it suffice in this place to refer to the truly excellent and accurate edition of that work given by Smith, (46) in which the words above quoted (47) are set down as those of Bede himself. Here then is a most respectable witness, prior to the ninth century; for Bede died before the middle of the eighth, viz. A. D. 735. Notwithstanding all this, the Dr. is not ashamed to say, (48) that St. Patrick "was not heard of when Bede died in 735." But, it is objected, Bede has not mentioned our saint in his Ecclesiastical history, although he speaks of Palladius. What then? was he bound to do so? What had St. Patrick to do with the ecclesiastical affairs of the Anglo-Saxons, who did not become Christians until much more than a hundred years after his death? As to Bede's having made mention of Palladius, it is plain that he has done so only incidentally in consequence of, while having Prosper's chronicle before him, his entering upon some transactions in Britain during the reign of Theodosius the younger. Meeting on his way the passage relative to Palladius, he introduced it, in Prosper's own words, into his text in an indirect manner, and not as concerning any main object of his narrative. (49) And it is clear that, had he not so met with that passage, most probably he would not have left us a word about Palladius. Bede was in the habit of copying passages verbatim from old writers, ex. c. from Orosius, Eutropius, &c. Nor does he mention in that work any Irish saints, except such as had been engaged in converting the Anglo-Saxons, or other inhabitants of G. Britain, such as the northern Picts; or those Irishmen, who distinguished themselves on the paschal and tonsural questions. In like manner he has not mentioned several eminent British saints, of whose existence no doubt is entertained, whereas their acts did not come within the sphere of his undertaking; for instance, Kentigern, David, and many others. (50) I wish the Doctor would explain to us, how it has happened that the Asiatic missionaries, of whom he is so fond, are not to be met with in any of Bede's works. St. Patrick's name is also in the very ancient Martyrology, which existed before the times of Bede, usually called that of St. Jerome.

(42) "In Scotia S. Patricii Confessoris." In Scotia i. e. Hibernia; Smith, ed. of Bede's Historic. &c.

(43) p. 366.

(44) Not meaning to follow Ledwich through all his wild and incoherent vagaries, I refer the reader on this subject of Calendars, &c. in general, to Dr. Milner's Tour in Ireland, Letter XII. where he will find some just castigatory remarks on our hero's sceptical positions. I shall merely add, that Usher, Camden, Stillingfleet, Cave, &c. did not treat those venerable registers with disrespect. This unlearned impudence was reserved for our times.

(45) In the enumeration of his works given by himself at the end of his History, L. 5. c. 24. or Recapitulatio, he mentions "Martyrologium de natalitiis sanctorum martyrum diebus, in quo omnes, quos invenire potui—diligenter adnotare studui." D'Achery has published Spicileg. Tom. 4. a short martyrology in verse, said to have been written by Bede, in which St. Patrick is mentioned at March. It is certainly very ancient; for the last saint mentioned in it is Wilfrid, who died in 732, the year after Bede finished his history. It was written in England, and is particular in marking English saints.

(46) Bede's Historical works; Cambridge, 1722.

(47) Not. 42. (48) p. 375. See also p. 368.

(49) Bede's text runs thus; "Anno dominicæ incarnationis

423. Theodosius junior post Honorium—regnum suscipiens viginti et septem annis tenuit, cujus anno imperii octavo Palladius ad Scottos, &c.” L. 1. cap. 13.

(50) Pinkerton, (Vitæ antiquæ Sanct. &c.) in a note to the Life of Kentigern, very judiciously observes; “Beda non meminit Kentigerni; sed æque siluit de Patricio, Davide, Dubritio, Asapho, et aliis sanctis Brittonum: nam historia ejus solummodo ad Anglos spectat.”

§. x. It would be useless to trouble the reader with further testimonies (51) on a matter so clear, and concerning which no doubt has been entertained by any of the numerous critics, who have appeared during the last 200 years, and who have with indefatigable industry examined and collated a multitude of documents, that exist relative to the ecclesiastical history of Europe, and particularly to the lives of Saints. And it would be very extraordinary, that so many Memoirs of St. Patrick should have been written, as there have been ever since the sixth century, if no such person had ever been amongst us. For, whatever may be thought of some of the tracts still extant called his Lives, it is certain that much older documents did once exist. (52) Or how could it have happened, that so many places not only in Ireland, but in Scotland should have been distinguished by his name, and that so many churches or chapels should have been erected under the title of St. Patrick not only in the British Islands, (53) but in other parts of Europe? (54)

(51) See Columbanus' third Letter, p. 58. A passage there partly quoted, as from the Metrical Life of Willibrord by Alcuin, is not in that work but in his Miscellaneous poems, and is as follows; “Patricius, Cheranus, Scottorum gloria gentis—Atque Columbanus, Congallus, Adamnanus atque—Præclari patres, morum vitæque magistri—Hic pietas precibus horum nos adjuvet omnes.” Alcuin's Works—Poemata. No. 246. p. 1736. Paris. 1617. Alcuin died A. D. 804.

(52) Jocelin says, cap. 186. that sixty-six tracts or Memoirs (not Lives as some have understood him) had been written concerning the Acts of St. Patrick, the greatest part of which were destroyed during the Danish persecution. Colgan's Tripartite has the same number L. 3. cap. 99. and gives the names of some of the authors, (ib. and L. 1. c. 69.) for instance Columb-kill, Ultan, Adamnan, Eleran the wise, &c. Columb-kill lived in the sixth century, the three latter in the seventh. The Memoirs of Tirechan, so often quoted by Usher, were probably the same as those here ascribed to Ultan; see Pr. p. 818. In the Calendar of Cashel, one of the most respectable monuments of our ecclesiastical history, and written early in the eleventh century, St. Kienan of Damliag (Duleek) is stated to have written a Life of St. Patrick. He died, according to the four Masters, A. D. 488 (489). Archdall has followed them at Duleek. Colgan was inclined to assign him to the sixth century (Tr. Th. p. 217). One of his arguments is of no weight; viz. that, if he died in that year, he should have written the Life of St. Patrick, while still alive. For, as will appear hereafter, St. Patrick died several years before 489. At any rate, the age, in which Kienan lived, was long prior to the ninth century.

(53) Wherever the Scoto-Irish settled in G. Britain, there were churches erected under the name of St. Patrick; ex. c. in Argyle, &c. Several of the old churches in the Hebrides went under his name. (Martin's W. Isles, p. 27. Chalmer's Caledonia, V. 1, p. 266.) Will it be said, that the inhabitants of those countries and islands adopted from Ireland a saint, who was unknown to their forefathers, and to Columba and the others who had introduced Christianity among them? And this long after the Scots of Ireland and those of Britain ceased to be closely united. There was a St. Patrick's church in the Isle of Man. (Camden, col. 1449. Gibson's ed.) It is worthy of particular notice, that the old church of Glastonbury in Somersetshire, which existed before the reign of Ina, king of Wessex, and consequently before A. D. 689, was called the church of the Blessed Virgin Mary and of St. Patrick. (Monast. Anglic. Tom. 1. p. 12.)

(54) See Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 7—315. Until within not many years there was a church under the name of St. Patrick just close to the city of Pavia, erected perhaps not long after the great Co-

lumbanus, whose name is still famous in that part of Italy, was kindly received by the Lombards, of whose kingdom Pavia was the capital.

§. XI. I shall now briefly touch upon some objections brought forward by the Doctor. We have already seen of what little avail is the silence of Platina in this question, and that Adamnan and Bede, far from favouring his system, are unexceptionable witnesses to the contrary. He asks why Cogitosus has not given certain particulars relative to St. Patrick. (55) A strange question as coming from a man, who says, (56) that the work of Cogitosus is supposititious and unworthy of credit. Yet I allow that it is genuine, although not so ancient as some have imagined. But why expect an account of St. Patrick from a writer, whose only object was to give some acts of St. Brigid, and whose tract is not properly a Life of that saint, but a panegyrical discourse concerning her virtues, miracles, &c. ? Cogitosus enters so little into historical facts, that he does not even tell us in what part of Ireland St. Brigid was born, nor mentions the names of any of her contemporaries except those of her father and mother, of bishop Machille, from whom she received the veil, and of Conlaeth bishop of Kildare.

Next he appeals to the disagreement between the Irish clergy and the Roman missionaries, who had been sent to preach to the Anglo-Saxons. How, he argues, (57) could such a disagreement have taken place, if St. Patrick had received his mission from Rome? It will be seen hereafter how it could have occurred, and that it was very natural it should. Meanwhile it will be sufficient to observe, that this argument, admitted in its fullest extent, would prove nothing more than that St. Patrick did not come to Ireland direct from Rome; but it would not follow that he had never existed, nor that we should go as far as the Doctor's favourite Asia to look for the apostles of Ireland. In this rambling discussion of his I find some falshoods as usual. He says that the letter of Laurence, bishop of Canterbury, and two other prelates to the Irish Clergy (58) was written about A. D. 604. He could have easily learned from Usher, that said letter was written in the year 609. (59) He tells us, that St. Patrick was then dead but a hundred years. Now, even according to the vulgar opinion, which places the saint's death A. D. 493, he was then dead 116 years. But it will appear in its proper place, that St. Patrick died near thirty years earlier. He adds, that the letter of the clergy of Rome to five Irish bishops, &c. was in the year 630. The same great authority, Usher, might have taught him, that the date of this letter was A. D. 640, or, at the earliest, 639. (60) Then he repeats his nonsense, on which I have remarked already, concerning Columba and his Culdees differing from Rome in doctrine and discipline.

Another mighty objection is deduced (61) from the variety of opinions relative to the place of St. Patrick's birth, whence the Doctor would fain conclude, that he was never born at all. This is really ludicrous. Our hero would do well to let the world know where he was born himself; for many persons of my acquaintance, who have seen his book, are ignorant of the place, that can boast of his origin. But, to be serious, are there not doubts entertained concerning the birth-place of Constantine the great and many other eminent men, whose existence has never been questioned? In arguing against St. Patrick having been born in the country, now called Scotland, he exhibits a monstrous degree of ignorance. I know that our saint was not born in that country, nor in any part of G. Britain, but I should be ashamed to use such an argument as his, the sum of which comes to this: "St. Patrick is said to have been the son of Calpurnius a deacon, whose father was Potitus a priest; atqui there could be no priests in that country at that period, whereas the southern Scots did not receive the faith till 412, nor the northern until 565 ; ergo, &c.” In the first place he confounds the Picts with the Scots ; the people converted about A. D. 412 by Ninian were the Southern Picts, whose country lay to the north of the frith of Forth ; (62) those converted about A. D. 565 by Columb-kill were the northern Picts, whose territory was far up in the N. W. of Scotland above Argyle, &c. Secondly the part of G. Britain, in which many have said that St. Patrick was born, viz. about Kirkpatrick, did not belong, in his time, to either the Picts or Scots, but to the Roman province in Britain, which extended as far as the friths ; and there can be no doubt but that Christian families were to be found to its very northermost boundaries.

(55) p. 368. (56) p. 166. (57) p. 368, seqq.

(58) Ap. Bed. L. 2. c. 4. (59) Pr. Ind. Chron.

(60) Ib. and Syll. Ep. Hib. p. 22. (61) p. 371.

(62) See above Not. 149 to Chap. I.

§. XII. The Doctor next rakes out (63) every foolish expression that he could find in some late writers concerning St. Patrick, as if, because those writers had been mistaken in some points, it were to be concluded that there had been no such person. For instance, some one had said, that our saint was for a time a Canon of the church of St. John Lateran at Rome. Oh! exclaims this wonderful critic, there were no Canons there in his time. Well then, granting it, what is the consequence? Nothing more than that St. Patrick was not a Lateran Canon. But surely it does not follow, that he was an ideal personage. Some authors have given him the title of arch-bishop. Upon this the Doctor thus animadverts ; “ Here all his biographers, ancient and modern discover their ignorance of ecclesiastical history.” And supposing they do, how can their ignorance affect the existence of St. Patrick? But the fact is, and it is somewhat remarkable that Probus, and the authors of the second and the other older Lives of our saint published by Colgan, (64) never give him that title, although they speak of him as the Apostle of Ireland and presiding over all the churches of the country. Even Jocelin, who copied much from ancient documents, does not in the course of his book call him archbishop, notwithstanding his mentioning the archiepiscopal see of Armagh and its archbishops. (65) I find, indeed, that title applied to St. Patrick in the preface to Colgan's Tripartite and also in Usher's Tripartite, (66) both which works are evidently of a later date than that of Probus, and the second Life, &c. above alluded to. In the hymn attributed to Secundinus St. Patrick is simply called bishop. (67) It is odd, however, that the Doctor should object in any manner to the title of archbishop; for, immediately after the words above quoted, he adds; "On the establishment of Christianity, to preserve to the bishop of the metropolis his rank, the title of archbishop was invented." If so, that title was in use a very long time before the age of St. Patrick. And then he tells us that Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, was honoured with it at the Ephesine council, A. D. 431. He ought to have known, that the said Cyril was dead about 45 years before that council was held. But whatever may have been the date of that title, of which this is not the place to treat, (68) it has nothing to do with the question of St. Patrick's existence, although the use or disuse of it may serve as a clue towards discovering the periods, at which some of his biographers lived.

(63) p. 372. (64) Tr. Th. (65) Jocel. cap. 143.

(66) See Pr. p. 849.

(67) Audite omnes amantes Deum sancta merita—Viri in Christo beati, Patricii episcopi.

(68) See Bingham, Orig. Eccl. B. 2. ch. 17.

§. XIII. Another equally potent argument is squeezed (69) out of its having been said, that St. Patrick had been decorated by a Pope with the Pall and constituted his legate in Ireland. Now, says the Doctor with an air of triumph, there were no Palls bestowed in Ireland until A. D. 1152; nor was the legatine office known until the year 787. As to the latter point he is grossly mistaken; for we find persons acting with the power of legates in the Pope's name not only in the time of Gregory the great, but as far back as the days of Pope Leo in the middle of the fifth century. I do not, however, mean to uphold the story of the legateship of St. Patrick. His jurisdiction and powers, relative to his mission, were as extensive as could be required, without his having received such a special appointment. With regard to the Palls, the Doctor happens for once to be right. But why talk of these things, which were never spoken of until Jocelin, alluding to the customs of his own times, interlarded his account of St. Patrick with them? Usher rejected these stories, (70) but he had too much sense to imagine, that by so doing he weakened the true history of the saint; our Doctor has a mode of arguing different from that of Usher and of the generality of mankind.

(69) p. 372. (70) Pr. p. 870.

§. XIV. At length we are come to the winding up of his system. To show how St. Patrick was set up as the patron saint of Ireland in the ninth century, he tells us (71) that in said century Pagan practices were introduced, and that, as Rome had her Mars, Athens her Minerva, &c. so it was thought convenient to invest saints with the patronage of Christian nations. This may serve as a sample of the profaneness, with which this audacious scribbler is wont to treat of ecclesiastical subjects. He then talks of illiteracy, superstition, and clerical imposition. Led-wich to charge others with illiteracy ! As to superstition, could he have adduced any positive proofs of its prevalence among the Irish of that period ? And as to clerical imposition, he should have looked to himself, before he touched upon such a delicate point. Next he brings on the stage Dyonisius the Areopagite, St. James, &c. Pray, what has all this to do with the simple question of fact, viz. whether there was such a person as St. Patrick, who is said to have preached the Christian faith in Ireland ? Those random declamations against fables and mistakes are of no weight in such an inquiry as this. The point is to show, how and by whom St. Patrick was actually forced upon the people of this country and of all Europe in the ninth century, without having been ever heard of before. The Doctor indeed makes an attempt at such an explanation, and it is curious to see what sort of a one it is. The Danes or Ostmen were the authors of this fabrication ! “ At this very “ time, (the 9th century) the name of St. Patrick “ first appeared, and at this time the Ostmen were in “ possession of Ireland and of Armagh in particular, “ and now his reliques were placed there. These “ facts and dates most exactly agree, and therefore “ I conjecture, and I think on good grounds, that “ the Christian Ostmen, who seized the old Culdean “ abbey at Armagh, in imitation of others of that “ age, procured reliques and fixed on St. Patrick as “ their owner, then had a flaming legend composed, “ setting forth the wonderful life, actions, and mira- “ cles of the new saint.” (72) This is the wonderful discovery, the ipse dixit of our great antiquary. And how well arranged ! “ The name of St. Patrick first appeared at that time ;” a false assertion, and of which he could not give any proof. “ At the same time the Ostmen were in possession of Ireland and of Armagh.” Of all Ireland they were not either then or at any time ; nor did they ever, in their most prosperous days, possess as much as one half of Ireland, although they ravaged the greatest part of it. It is true, that several times in that century they got possession of Armagh. It was, for the first time, taken by them and plundered A. D. 830. (73) It was, together with its churches, burned by them in the year 839. (74) Farannan the primate and all the religious and students were expelled from Armagh by Turgesius, prince of those Ostmen or Danes, in 848. (75) The city was again laid waste by them A. D. 852. (76) Amlave one of their chiefs, besides killing a great number of the inhabitants, plundered and burned it in 867. (77) Maelcob, the bishop of Armagh, was made prisoner by those pagans A. D. 879. (78) The Danes of Dublin plundered Armagh, and committed great havoc there in the year 895. (79) During this whole period, which brings us to the end of the ninth century, the Danes, or, as the Dr. calls them, the Ostmen were pagans, and continued so for several years after. Where then are we to look for the Christian Ostmen, who seized the old Culdean abbey at Armagh in the 9th century? The Doctor refers us to Archdall's Monasticon Hib. as his authority. Let us then hear Archdall; "A. D. 919. Godfred Hua Himhair (son of Ivar) king of the Danes in Dublin, plundered the town (Armagh) sparing only the churches, the Colidei, and the sick; but the annals of Innisfallen place this event in the year 921." (80) The poor Doctor placed that year in the 9th century, in the same manner as, I suppose, he would call the century, in which we now live, the eighteenth; so little does he know even of the manner of reckoning time. Was it from Archdall he learned, that the Ostmen seized the old Culdean abbey at Armagh, or that there was such an abbey there at all? Let him then learn at last, that those Colidei of Armagh were, as will be seen hereafter, the officiating clergy of the cathedral. And who told him, that the Ostmen of that day were Christians? Although pagans, they might have spared churches, &c. Ware states (81) that the Danes of Ireland were converted to Christianity about the year 948, and that the first of them recorded as Christians were in the time of Godfrid, son of Sitricus, who succeeded Blacar as king of Dublin in that year. I am inclined to think, that the Sitricus here mentioned was the same as Sitricus, king of Northumberland, to whom king Athelstan gave his sister Editha in marriage, on condition of his becoming a Christian. Sitricus had three sons, Reginald, Anlaf, and Godfrid. The two latter are generally supposed to have been born of a former marriage. But it is very probable, that Godfrid, following the example of his father, became a Christian. (82)

To return to the Doctor, what shall we now say of his ninth century, Christian Ostmen, &c.? According to himself, (83) St. Patrick was spoken of in the year 858. But the Ostmen, who procured reliques, &c. for him, were not Christians until about 100 years later. Or is there any one so stupid as to imagine, that the whole Irish nation would have adopted a saint first introduced by their bitterest enemies, and that Armagh, a town so often plundered and burned by them, should be foremost in paying them that compliment? The Doctor ought to know, and so he did when it suited his views, (84) that a very great antipathy existed between the two nations, even after the conversion of the Danes, and that the Danish clergy of Dublin and the Irish clergy of Armagh were constantly at variance. What then could have bewitched him to advance such a monstrous paradox as that, which has been now exploded? I know not how to explain it, except by asking another question, viz. What will not an adventurous charlatan in history and theology dare to announce, in order to forward some paltry purposes?

(71) p. 373. (72) p. 391.

(73) 4 Masters and Tr. Th. p. 295. Their A. 830 was the same as 831.

(74) Ib. 839, i. e. 840. (75) Usher, Ind. Chron.

(76) Usher, ib.

(77) Tr. Th. p. 295, as corrected by O'Flaherty, MS note. Ware has A. 869. Antiq. cap. 24. Archdall misquoted Colgan in placing that event A. D. 873. Mon. Hib. at Armagh.

(78) Annals of Ulster, and Usher p. 860, and Ind. Chron.

(79) Ware, Antiq. cap. 24.

(80) Mon. Hib. at Armagh. Archdall has merely followed Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 296, except as to the year of the annals of Innisfallen, with which Ware agrees.

(81) Antiq. cap. 24 ad A. D. 948.

(82) See J. P. Murray, De coloniis Scandicis in insulis Britannicis et maxime Hibernia; §. 14. 15. Nov. Comment. Soc. R. Goetting. vol. 3.

(83) p. 375. (84) See p. 392.

§. xv. The Doctor endeavours to impose upon his readers by insinuating, (85) that our St. Patrick might have been the same as a Patrick of Auvergne, whose name occurs in the Roman martyrology at the 16th of March, or a Patrick of Nola, whose memory is celebrated there on the 17th of the same month. What he has on this subject he has taken from Usher, whose meaning, however, he misrepresents in a point of some consequence. Usher, having observed (86) that Patrick of Auvergne is placed at March 16 in Usuard's and the Roman martyrology, adds, that a Patrick is commemorated at Nola on the 17th, for which he quotes no martyrology, nor indeed could he, but a Calendar of Nola referred to by Philip Ferrarius. The Doctor very cunningly, after heading his paragraph with the authority of the two martyrologies, and having mentioned Patrick of Auvergne, subjoins; "the 17th of March is dedicated to Patrick, bishop of Nola;" thus wishing to make the reader believe, that the name of Patrick of Nola is given at that day in the martyrologies; while the fact is, that St. Patrick of Ireland is in them without any mention of Nola. And, let us observe the Doctor's tergiversation with regard to martyrologies. He had abused them all (87) and endeavoured to decry their authority, because all of them have our Apostle in the plainest terms at March 17; but now he has such a respect for them, that he would fain foist into them a person, whom they have not. Supposing even that a St. Patrick of Nola was mentioned at that day in the martyrologies, would it follow that our St. Patrick never existed? Might not there have been two or more saints of the same name affixed to one day? Or, if any confusion had occurred in those names, would it not be more natural to suppose, that Patrick of Nola was never bishop of that see but in reality the same as our St. Patrick, whose memory, it is well known, was and is still highly revered in many parts of the continent? (88) Such a mistake could easily originate in our St. Patrick's festival being kept at Nola on the usual day. The learned and laborious Ughelli, who was certainly more partial to Italy than to Ireland, not finding any thing authentic concerning a bishop of Nola of that name proposed this conjecture, (89) which is also approved of by the Bollandists. (90) As to Patrick of Auvergne, or any other Patrick that may occur in the calendars, why conclude from the mere identity of name, that there was no such person as our St. Patrick? But of those Patricks more in the proper place. What would the Doctor think, were any one to undertake to prove that there had been no such saint as Peter of Alexandria distinct from Peter the apostle, or that John Chrysostom was no other than St. John the evangelist?

(85) p. 375. (86) Pr. p. 897. (87) p. 365. seqq.

(88) See Tr. Th. p. 315.

(89) Italia Sacra; Tom. 6. at Nolani episcopi. p. 250. ed. A.

1720. Ferrarius says there are no acts extant of such a bishop of Nola. Catal. Sanct. &c. 17 Mart.

(90) Ad 17 Mart. p. 506.

§. XVI. He now enters into polemics, (91) in which I will not follow him. I shall only observe that, however he may falsify the transactions of former days, he ought not to corrupt the text of such prayers as are used at present by his neighbours. He quotes two prayers, as if from the Catholic breviary, without giving the Latin text. The former he adduces as recited on St. Patrick's day, and makes the Catholics address God in it, as if they prayed to be able through St. Patrick to fulfil what he commandeth. Now I maintain, that there is no such prayer used in any part of the Catholic church, nor any prayer of similar import to be found on any saint's festival. The prayer on St. Patrick's day is this; Deus, qui ad prædicandum Gentibus gloriam tuam beatum Patricium confessorem atque pontificem mittere dignatus es; ejus meritis et intercessione concede, ut, quæ nobis agenda præcipis, te miserante adimplere possimus. Per Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum, &c. "O God, who hast vouchsafed to send the "blessed Patrick, a confessor and bishop, to preach
 "thy glory to Gentiles, by his merits and interces"sion grant that by thy mercy we may be able to "fulfil those things, which thou commandest us to "do. Through Jesus Christ our Lord, &c." Our honest Doctor left out through Jesus Christ, and, instead of these words, inserted through him (St. Patrick). He refers us to the book of the peculiar offices of Irish saints printed A. D. 1769. I have three copies of those offices, the first of the year 1751, the second of 1767, and the third of 1792. In none of them is there either a prayer or lessons for St. Patrick's day; whereas the whole office of St. Patrick is contained in the Roman breviary. And whatever his edition of 1769 may contain, I assert that it has not such a prayer as that produced by him, and defy him to publish the original Latin. In some breviaries used on the Continent we find (92) forms of prayers for St. Patrick's day somewhat different from that now given, in none of which, however, is to be met with any thing like what he has obtruded on the public. The Dr. gives another prayer, as if from the anniversary of the finding of the reliques of St. Patrick, &c. For this also he refers to his book of the year 1769. Whether that prayer be genuine or not, it contains nothing reprehensible, except that the word, adore, has been substituted by him for revere. It is a shame to have recourse to such artifices. But the Doctor was well accustomed to them; witness his abominable perversion (93) of the meaning of a passage of St. Irenæus, quoted by Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical history, and in which the saint complains of certain innovators, chiefly Asiatics, who happened to be at Rome. The Doctor, with his usual candor, applies the passage to the church of Rome itself. As my object is not controversy, I refer the reader, for a fuller exposure of this base proceeding, to Dr. Milner's Tour in Ireland; Letter XVI.

I have now done with the question of the existence of St. Patrick. For as to some minor exceptions thrown out here and there, such as those relative to the Paschal controversy, the monastic rule of St. Patrick, &c. it will appear in the course of this history, that they are of no weight whatsoever. To enter into these discussions at present would be an anticipating of what will be found hereafter treated of at large. Nor will it be expected, that I should tire the public or myself with animadverting on some insignificant writers, who, being totally ignorant of the subject, or wilfully blind, have followed in the same track. We shall, however, meet with the Doctor often again, and he must be dealt with according to his merits.

(91) P. 377.(92) See Tr. Th. p. 189. seqq.(93) P. 360.

CHAPTER III.

Of the principal ancient documents relative to the history of St. Patrick—The place of his birth, in all appearance, Bononia now Boulogne sur mer in Picardy—Observations on the Aremoric tracts, and on the ancient continental Britain—The saint's family connexions—No relatives of his in Ireland.

SECT. I.

THE variety of opinions, and the many questions which have been agitated, concerning the country and time of St. Patrick's birth, his relatives, education, travels, ordination, &c. &c. render a previous discussion on these and other matters connected with them necessary; as otherwise the thread of this history should be constantly and unavoidably interrupted. I shall therefore endeavour to clear up the disputed points, and to lead the reader through this labyrinth, from which when once extricated we may be able to continue our course in a more steady and regular manner.

In these inquiries my principal guides shall be, next after St. Patrick's Confession and his Letter against Coroticus, Fiech's hymn or metrical sketch of the life of our saint, and the Life by Probus. In the former, which, as already observed, has a claim to very high antiquity, the narrative runs smooth and regular; nor do we find in it any of those ridiculous miracles, that disgrace some of the later Lives. There are extant some Scholia or notes on that hymn, which are usually quoted under the title of Fiech's Scholiast. They were written partly in Irish and partly in Latin, and have been published by Colgan, (1) who pretends that they are prior to the end of the sixth century. It must be allowed, that some of those notes bear marks of very high antiquity, while in others it is easy to perceive traces of a later date, and of a period at which the accounts of St. Patrick were already disfigured by fables and contradictory anecdotes. On collating them it appears, that they were not the composition of one person. For instance in Scholion 5. the Letha mentioned in the Hymn (2) is properly explained by Armorica or the maritime tract of the N. W. of Gaul, while in Scholion 11. it is interpreted "Latium, (3) i. e. Italy." In Scholion 9. we read, that on a certain occasion St. Patrick said; Dar mo dhe broth, which is explained, God is able to do this if he choose; and yet immediately after, as if to correct the author of that explanation, it is added that Dar mo dhe broth was a sort of asseveration familiar to St. Patrick, signifying; by my God judge or of judgment. On the whole it is evident that the Scholia, as we have them at present, are a compilation of observations, some more some less ancient, extracted from various writers.

(1) Tr. Th. p. 4. Usher now and then refers to them. See Pr. p. 827—831.

(2) Strophe 5.

(3) Colgan also made the same mistake in translating Letha Latium. This is not his only mistranslation of passages of the Hymn. The translation in the Appendix to the Life of St. Patrick by my late friend Mr. Patrick Lynch, Dublin, 1810, differs in some points from that of Colgan.

§. II. The Life of St. Patrick by Probus in two books (4) is a very valuable work. Colgan indeed was not friendly to it, because, he says, it does not agree, especially in the first book, with some of the other Lives. This is the very reason, why it is far preferable to them. It has nothing about Colgan's favourite visionary town Nemphthor in North Britain, but quite the reverse; nor any of the foolish miracles attributed to St. Patrick, when a child, in the tracts, to which Colgan was most uncritically partial. The author sticks very closely to the Confession and the Letter against Coroticus. The Bollandists, otherwise sharp enough with regard to the Lives of St. Patrick, yet looked upon this by Probus as very useful, particularly towards a regular arrangement of the Acts of our saint. (5) There have been some questions concerning the author's country, and the time in which he lived. (6) As to his country, it is evident from himself that he was an Irishman. Speaking of St. Patrick's having passed through Great Britain, and thence embarking for Ireland he says, that he entered upon our sea. (7) He represents the harbour, at which St. Patrick arrived, as a very famous one with us. (8) He calls St. Patrick our most holy father. (9) Some writers have imagined, that he lived in the seventh century; but from his making mention of Normandy (10) it is evident that he must be placed as low as the tenth. Dr. Milner, conceiving that he belonged to the seventh, endeavours to prove it by stating, (11) that "he is named among the respectable authors, whose works were in the library of York cathedral in the eighth century, by the celebrated Alcuin." (De Pont. et SS. Eccl. Ebor. ap. Gale XV. Scriptores.) This is a strange mistake, nothing being more clear than that the Probus, mentioned in that poem published by Gale, was the same as the celebrated grammarian of that name spoken of by Suetonius (De ill. Grammat. 24) and who in the poem quoted is classed with other grammarians. (12) Ware assigns our Probus to some time after the beginning of the tenth century; (13) and Colgan, who is followed by Nicholson, (14) was inclined to that opinion. (15)

I think there can be no doubt but that he was the same as Coeneachair (in Latin, Probus) who was chief lecturer of the school of Slane, and was burned to death in the tower of that place by the Danes, A. D. 950. (16) The Paulinus, whom he addresses, and at whose request (17) he wrote his work, was, I dare say, no other than Mal-Paulinus (for, as Colgan observes, the names, according to the Irish idiom, were the same) bishop and abbot of Indenen, a place not far from Slane, (18) who died A. D. 921. (19) In this supposition it will follow that Probus must have written either before, or, at the latest, in the year now mentioned.

(4) It was first published among Bede's works Tom. 3. of the edition of Basil, A. 1563. Colgan republished it in the Tr. Th. with the author's name prefixed, and under the title of fifth Life.

(5) Comment. Præv. ad V. S. P. 17 Mart. §. 4.

(6) See Usher, Pr. p. 817. and Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 61.

(7) "Mare nostrum—adiit." L. 1. c. 25.

(8) "Utique apud nos clarissimum." L. 1. c. 27.

(9) L. 2. c. 41. (10) L. 1. c. 10.

(11) Additional note to p. 94. Tour in Ireland.

(12) "Quid Probus atque Focas, Donatus, Priscianusve," &c. v. 1556. Let me here be allowed to observe, that Gale was mistaken in attributing that poem to Alcuin, as it is plain that it was written after his time. Not to adduce other proofs, it will suffice to remark, that Alcuin's own works are spoken of in it as being in the library; v. 1552. Casimir Oudin thought it probable, that the author was Fridegod, a monk, who lived early in the 10th century; Comment. de Script. Eccl. Tom 2. col. 467, 468.

(13) Irish Writers. (14) Irish Historical library.

(15) Tr. Th. p. 61.

(16) See below Not. 140 to Chap. XXII.

(17) See L. 2. c. 41.

(18) Tr. Th. p. 219 and Archdall at Indenen.

(19) 4 Masters ap. Tr. Th. p. 64. at A. 920 (921.)

§. III. Of the other Lives, published by Colgan, those, which he calls the second, third, and fourth, are full of fables, and seem to have been copied either from each other, or from some common repository, in which those stories had been collected. It is true that now and then we meet with some genuine remains of the true history of St. Patrick, particularly in the quotations from the Confession. It would be idle to adduce the many proofs, which they constantly exhibit of their having been patched up at a late period. Yet, strange to say, Colgan would have us believe, (20) that the second Life was written by a Patrick called junior or some other disciple of St. Patrick; the third by Benignus, likewise a disciple of his, who died A. D. 468; (21) and the fourth by Eleran the wise, whose death is assigned in our Annals to the year 664, i. e. 665. (22) As to the second and third Lives, Colgan's general argument is, that Jocelin names, (23) as the authors of four tracts concerning St. Patrick that existed in his time, Benignus, Mel, Luman, and a disciple called Patrick. Now he argues from certain data of his own, that neither Mel nor Luman could be the authors of either of those two Lives; therefore it remains, that they were written by Benignus and Patrick junior; and then from some other conjectures he assigns the second Life to this Patrick, and the third to Benignus. But supposing even, what Colgan had no means of proving, that Jocelin alluded to those said Lives, surely it is ridiculous to allege the authority of such a credulous and fabulous writer in an inquiry of this sort, and in direct opposition to the internal evidence, which the tracts themselves abundantly furnish. He adduces indeed a passage of the second Life (cap. 31.) in which, on mention being made of a bishop Loarn, a contemporary of St. Patrick, it is said that he is in Inreathan (a place near Downpatrick). Honest Colgan did not reflect, that this was a manner of speaking, which frequently occurs in the old tracts of our ecclesiastical history, and which means nothing more than that the remains of a person were in the place where he is said to be. Thus in that same second Life (cap. 24.) Sylvester and Solonius, two of Palladius' companions, are said to be in Domnach-ardec, that is, as appears from the sequel, their mortal remains. In consequence of not having made this observation Colgan has brought himself into innumerable difficulties and anachronisms, and committed heaps of blunders. He has adduced a similar argument in favour of Benignus being the author of the third Life; but, unfortunately for his hypothesis, the author, whoever he were, plainly indicates that he lived long after Benignus. For he mentions (cap. 38) Erc, son of Degeo, whose memory, he says, is revered in the town of Slane. Now Erc, according to the 4 Masters and Colgan himself, (24) died A. D. 512. As to his attributing the fourth Life to Eleran, his argument is really curious. Having found that among many others, who lived at various periods, Eleran was named as an author of Memoirs of St. Patrick, and being forced to acknowledge that said Life could not have been written before the seventh century, he looked out for one of the oldest of those authors, and thus fathered that production on Eleran, who, by the bye, would never have merited the epithet, wise, had he been the compiler of the many fooleries, which it contains.

(20) General Preface to Tr. Th. and Notes here and there to those Lives.

(21) Annals of Ulster, and Usher Ind. Chron. (22) Ib.

(23) Cap. 186. (24) Tr. Th. p. 31.

§. iv. Colgan's want of critical acumen is still more apparent in his maintaining, that the Life, which he has called Tripartite (because it is divided into three books or parts) and published under the name of the seventh Life, was written by St. Evin, who flourished about the latter end of the sixth century. And why? Because Jocelin says, (25) that Evin also had compiled the Acts of St. Patrick in a work written partly in Latin, partly in Irish. Now this description corresponds to the Tripartite. It appears, however, that it might be properly called an Irish work, as the proportion of Latin was very small compared with the Irish, until the whole was put into Latin by Colgan and his assistants. Usher, who had seen it in its original state, although he refers to it but seldom, calls it an Irish work written in the old Irish language. (26) Colgan tells us, (27) that the Irish text is, on account of its great antiquity, exceedingly difficult to understand, and that it used formerly to be read and explained in the schools, as a class book for the instruction of students, who applied themselves to learning the ancient pure Irish dialect. Such parts of it as were originally in Latin are chiefly quotations from the Scriptures, St. Jerome, and St. Patrick's Confession, with some odd scraps here and there extracted from ancient Latin documents concerning our saint. It is, in very great part, evidently derived from much older Memoirs, and often with such a scrupulous fidelity, that, instead of giving the substance of them, the very words are retained; and consequently we sometimes find passages, in which the present tense occurs where the past might have been used, and collateral allusions, that have no necessary connexion with the remainder of the text. Jocelin seems to have had this work before him, or some other very like it; for his text in very many places agrees with it word for word. Yet in his arrangement of facts he frequently differs from it, and usually on the wrong side. Whether this was the work he alluded to as written by St. Evin, (28) or at what time the Evin he meant might have lived, is of no consequence, whereas from innumerable passages it appears, that it was compiled long after the sixth century. Colgan admits the force of said passages; but pretends that they are interpolations foisted into the text of St. Evin. This evasion will not do; for the compiler or compilers of this work give us the names of the writers, whom they followed, and that twice. (29) They are Columb-kill, Ultan, Adamnan, Eleran the wise, Kieran of Belachduin, Hermedus or Ieremias bishop of Clogher, Colman Huamacensis, and Collatus a priest of Druim-relgeach (in Meath). No mention of St. Evin, an omission quite inexplicable in case he had been considered as the original author of the work, however afterwards interpolated and enlarged. I have touched already on the age of some of those writers; (30) the others lived at a later period, for instance, Kieran who died A. D. 770; (31) and Colgan himself thinks it not improbable, that Collatus was the same as Conlata, whose death is assigned to the year 868. (32) The work, as it exists at present, was put together at a time, when the Irish church had acquired no small degree of splendour; for we read of the bishop's Vicar general, Suffragan, Archpriest, Chancellor, Judge in spiritual matters, Chaplain, Almoners, &c. &c. (33) It appears to belong to some part of the tenth century; as certain persons are named, who lived about that period. Kinaetus, son of Fergal, prince of Meath, is spoken of in an historical manner, (34) as if not living when the work was composed. He died A. D. 868. (35) Kinngegan, king of Cashel, is also mentioned, (36) who was killed in the year 897. (37) No traces occur to show, that the author or authors lived as late as the eleventh century. With the exception of the usual fables relative to St. Patrick's younger days, it is a very useful work, and contains a much greater variety of details concerning his proceedings during his mission in Ireland than any other of his Lives, and far more accurate than those given by Jocelin. It is not to be confounded with a Latin work, which is often quoted by Usher under the same title of Tripartite, (38) and which must be assigned to a later period. (39) In case of my referring to the latter, I call it Usher's Tripartite. Of all the Lives of our saint Jocelin's is the worst, although it has been published (40) oftener than the others. Besides raking together all the fables he could collect he has added a number of stories, no where else to be found. So wretched a composition is scarcely worth attending to.

(25) Cap. 186. (26) Pr. p. 812, 818.

(27) Tr. Th. p. 169.

(28) Ware (Irish Writers) has Evin at the 7th century on the mere authority of Jocelin; but he says nothing about the Tripartite.

(29) Tripart. L. 1. c. 70. L. 3. c. 99.

(30) See above Chap. II. not. 52.

(31) 4 Masters ap. Tr. Th. p. 172. (32) Colgan ib. p. 173.

(33) Tripart. L. 3. c. 98. (34) Ib. L. 2. c. 5.

(35) 4 Masters ap. Tr. Th. p. 173. (36) Tripart. L. 3. c. 30.

(37) Tr. Th. p. 186, and O'Flaherty's MS. note ib.

(38) Harris seemed to think, that they were one and the same work. Alluding to a passage quoted by Usher from the Tripartite (i. e. his own Tripartite) he observes that it is not to be found in the printed Tripartite, meaning to say that the printed edition differed, with regard to said passages, from Usher's MS. copy.

(39) Usher's Tripartite was written at a time, when the name Scotia was used for that part of Britain now called Scotland. In it we read, that Palladius "in provincia Pictorum, quæ modo est Scotia in Britannia, vitam finivit suam." Consequently the author did not live before the eleventh century. See Pr. p. 813, and compare with p. 734.

(40) In Colgan's collection it is placed at No. 6.

§. v. Having premised thus much concerning the principal documents, from which the history of St. Patrick can be drawn up, let us first inquire what was the land of his birth. It would be a waste of time to examine all the various opinions, that have been started on this subject, such as his having been born in Cornwall, in Pembrokeshire in Wales, or, what was the strangest of all, in Ireland itself. Whoever wishes to see more about these speculations may consult Usher (41) and Harris. (42) The prevalent opinion since Usher's time, and since Colgan, who was led astray by him, published the Trias Thaumaturga, has been that he was born at Kilpatrick in N. Britain not far from Dunbritton or Dunbarton. Usher knew that, besides his own and the opinions, which he has rejected, there was another, but did not like to mention it, although he must have met with it in his acquaintances O'Sullivan and Dempster, whom he has so often attacked. The former says that St. Patrick was born in Aremoric Gaul. (43) Dempster tells us that the Aremoric Gauls claim him as their countryman. (44) He might have found this opinion mentioned also by David Rothe. (45) Usher's partiality for G. Britain would not allow him to discuss this point, which had he done it is very probable, that, considering his singular penetration, he would have agreed with O'Sullivan, particularly as he had read with care St. Patrick's Confession, which Colgan had not. And it will appear, that O'Sullivan, although charged by Harris with a gross error for what he had said, was substantially right.

(41) Pr. p. 819. seqq.

(42) Ware's Bishops, Harris' edition at Armagh p. 5.

(43) Patriciana Decas ; p. 4.

(44) "Galli Aremorici civem suum faciunt." Appar. ad Hist. Scot. p. 520.

(45) "Quamquam non desint, qui eum in Britannia Armorica genitum dicant." Hibernia Res. p. 199.

§. VI. It is curious to observe, on what slight grounds the opinion, to which Usher's great reputation has given so great a degree of plausibility, is founded. Fiech, he says, (46) states as certain, that

St. Patrick was born in Nemthur. But his Scholiast mentions, that Nemthur was a town in N. Britain, viz. Alcluit. This is now called Dunbritton. Usher, however, follows Jocelin, who distinguishes Nemthur, or, as he calls it, Emphor from Dunbritton. As to what Fiech says, it is certainly correct, although, as will be seen lower down, Nemthur is not the true spelling of the word. But why depend on the authority of such a hodge podge collection of contradictory notes as those Scholia exhibit? The fact is, that the author of that interpretation of Nemthur, not understanding the meaning of the word, and having read or heard, that St. Patrick was born in Britain, looked out for some part of Great Britain, where he might place Nemthur, not reflecting that there was another Britain distinct from the great one. His fixing upon Alcluit was very probably owing to there having been a church there or in the neighbourhood bearing the name of St. Patrick, whence he supposed that Alcluit might have been the place of his birth. Or it might have easily happened, that the name, Kilpatrick, gave rise to a vulgar opinion among the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, that the reason of its being so called was the saint's having been born there. Add to this the following strange fable concerning the origin of St. Patrick's well in the church of Kilpatrick. When an infant he was brought to a priest to be baptized. There being no water convenient, the priest made with the child's hand the sign of the cross upon the ground. Forthwith sprang up a fountain, with the water of which he first washed his own eyes, and obtained the blessing of sight, having been hitherto blind. After this he baptized the infant from the same fountain. Around this miraculous fountain or well the church was erected. (47) Then we have a rock in the Clyde, which is still called St. Patrick's stone. (48) On such mighty grounds was made up the story of Nemthor being the same as Alcluit, and the et caeteras.

Usher, who saw into the weakness of such arguments, passed over the question very slightly; but Colgan, whose method was to heap together authorities, whether good or bad, labours hard (49) to show, that Nemthur was the same as Alcluit or near it. But very properly he objects to himself; where do we find a town called Nemthur? Usher, who had a great knowledge of British history, overlooked such a question, well knowing that no town of that name could be found in any part of G. Britain. There is no Nemthur to be met with in Nennius' list of British towns, which Usher himself had illustrated, (50) or in any of the old Itineraries, (51) or in Ricardus Corenensis, (52) or in Camden, (53) Horsley, (54) &c. Colgan endeavours to extricate himself by saying, that Nem-thor or Nemh-thur signifies a heavenly tower (55) and that, as Alcluit or Dunbritton was a fort on a high rock over the Clyde, it might have been honoured with that name. But he ought to have shown from some sort of authority, that it was actually so called; and next, that it could with propriety be denominated heavenly or holy. (56) The good man was, however, soon compelled to descend from his heavenly tower; for Kilpatrick, the well, and the church over the well, all of which are in the low ground, fell in his way; and then he quotes on from Jocelin, &c. as if it were demonstrated, that Nemthur was the same place as Kilpatrick. This sort of reasoning is too pitiful to produce any effect; and I will now proceed to inquire into the claim of the Armorians to the honour of our Apostle's birth.

(46) Pr. p. 819.

(47) 4th Life, cap. 3. Tripart. L. 1. c. 4. &c. Jocelin has the same fable, (cap. 2.) but with this difference, that he makes the infant be baptized, before the fountain was miraculously produced.

(48) Statist. Survey of Scotland, Vol. 5. at Old Kilpatrick, and Garnett's Tour, Vol. 1. p. 6. They tell us also of a tombstone in the church-yard, on which is the figure of a man said to be St. Patrick.

(49) Tr. Th. p. 221. seqq. (50) Pr. p. 59. seqq.

(51) Ex. c. that which goes under the name of Antoninus. Nor is it in Ptolemy, or in the Britanniæ Chorographia of the Anonymus Ravennas.

(52) De Situ Britannia. (53) Britannia.

(54) Britannia Romana.

(55) The 4th Life, cap. 1. and Tripart. L. 1. c. 1. have the same interpretation of Nemthur. Lynch in his Life of St. Patrick explains it by Holy Tours, i. e. the city of Tours in France, and thence concludes that our saint was a native of that city. This hypothesis is much nearer the truth than Colgan's, but cannot be reconciled with the unquestionable fact, that St. Patrick's family lived very near the sea, nor with some other important circumstances, of which lower down.

(56) The meaning of Nehm is relative not to height, but to sanctity.

§ VII. Colgan acknowledges, (57) that there is an ancient tradition among the inhabitants of Armoric Britain, that St. Patrick was born in their country, and that some Irishmen were of that opinion. He quotes some passages from Probus and others, whence they argued in proof of their position, but omits, through want of attention to that most valuable document, the following passage of St. Patrick's Confession. "My father was Calpornius a deacon, son of Potitus a priest, of the town Bonavem Taberniæ. He had near the town a small villa Enon, where I became a captive." (58) Here we have neither a town Nemthor, nor Alcluit. Nor will any British antiquary be able to find out a place in Great Britain, to which the names Bonavem Taberniæ can be applied. Usher, although he had quoted these words (59) has not attempted to give any explanation of them, or to reconcile them with Nemthur. The word Taberniæ has puzzled not only Colgan, but some of the authors of the Lives, which he chose to follow; for, while they left out Bonavem as not agreeing with Nemthur, they retained Taberniæ, or, as they were pleased to write it, Taburniæ, which they endeavoured to account for by making it a district, that got its name from having been the site of a Roman winter camp, in which there were tents or tabernacles. (60) Colgan, who swallowed all this stuff, quotes Jocelin as his authority for Taburnia being situated near the Clyde at the south bank. (61) Great authority indeed! It is, however odd, that such a place should be unnoticed by all those, who have undertaken to elucidate the ancient topography of Great Britain. (62) The places of Roman camps in that country were usually designated by the adjunct castra whence chester, or cester, in which the names of so many cities and towns in England terminate.

Bonavem or Bonaven (63) Taberniæ was in Armorica Gaul, being the same town as Boulogne sur mer in Picardy. That town was well known to the Romans under the name of Gessoriacum; but about the reign of Constantine the great the Celtic name Bonaven or Bonaun, alias Bonon, which was latinized into Bononia, became more general. (64) According to Bullet, who informs us that Am, Aven, On, signify a river in the Celtic language, (65) the town was so called from its being at the mouth of a river; Bon mouth, on or aven river. (66) Baxter also observes, that Bononia is no other than Bon-avon or Bon-aun; (67) for aven, avem, avon, aun, are pronounced in the same manner. The addition of Taberniæ marks its having been in the district of Tarvanna or Tarvenna, alias Tarabanna, a celebrated city not far from Boulogne, the ruins of which still remain under the modern name of Terouanne. The name of the city was extended to a considerable district around it, thence called pagus Tarbannensis, or Tarvanensis regio. Gregory of Tours calls the inhabitants Tarabannenses. It is often mentioned under the name of Civitas Morinorum, having been the principal city of the territory of the Morini, in which Bonavem or Boulogne was also situated. (68) Boulogne was so connected with Tarvanna, that both places anciently formed but one episcopal see. Thus Jonas in his Life of the abbot Eustasius written near 1200 years ago calls Audomarus bishop of Boulogne and Tarvana. (69) It is probable that St. Patrick's reason for designating Bonaven by the adjunct Taberniæ was, lest it might be confounded with the Bononia of Italy, now Bologna, or with a Bononia in Aquitain, in the same manner as, to avoid a similar confusion, the French call it at present Boulogne sur mer. Perhaps it will be objected, that Tabernia is a different name from Tarvanna. In the first place it may be observed that, owing to the usual commutation of b for v, and viceversa, we might read Tavernia. Thus we have seen, that Tarvanna was called by some Tarabanna. To account for the further difference of the names nothing more is required than to admit the transposition of a syllable, or a letter, which has frequently occurred in old words, and particularly names of places. The Portuguese have changed miraculum, miracle, into milagre; Nogesia, the name of a town, became Genosia; (70) Dunbritton has been modified into Dunbertane, Dunbarton, Dumbarton. Probus agrees with the Confession, except that according to Colgan's edition, for Bonavem Taberniæ, he has Bannave Tiburniæ regionis, and adds that it was not far from the western sea (71) or Atlantic ocean. Although we may easily suppose, that some errors of transcription have crept into the text of Probus, yet as to Bannave there is no material difference between it and Bonavem. Ban might be used for Bon; (72) and the final m, which was a sort of nasal termination, as it is still with the Portuguese, could be omitted so as to write for Bonavem or Bonauem (v and u being the same letter) Bonaue. Probus' addition of regionis is worth noticing, as it corresponds with what has been said concerning the Tarvanensis regio.

(57) Tr. Th. p. 220.

(58) "Patrem habui Calpornium diaconem, filium quondam Potiti presbyteri, qui fuit in vico Bonavem Taberniæ; villulam Enon prope habuit, ubi capturam dedi." Confess. sub init. For Enon the Cotton MS. has enim. But what could enim there refer to? Enon, as Ware has it, is undoubtedly the true reading.

(59) Pr. p. 818.

(60) After telling us that St. Patrick was born in Nemthor, the author of the third Life adds (cap. 1.) "Patricius natus est in campo Taburniæ; campus autem Tabernaculorum ob hoc dictus est, eo quod in eo Romani exercitus quodam tempore tabernacula sua ibi statuerunt hyemali frigore." See also the 4th Life, cap. 1. According to these writers Nemthor was in Taburnia. But Jocelin says, (cap. 1) that Nemthor was near Taburnia, and has nothing about the time of the year, in which the encampment took place.

(61) Tr. Th. p. 223.

(62) Neither the Itineraries, nor Camden, nor the other writers above referred to have a Taburnia or Tabernia in Great Britain.

(63) The Bollandists in their edition of the Confession at 17 Mart. read Bonavem.

(64) "Gessoriacum Galli circa Constantini maximi principatum mutato nomine Bononiam vocare coeperunt." Hadrianus Valesius, Notitia Galliarum at Gessoriacum.

(65) Dictionaire Celtique, Memoires, at Am, Aven, On.

(66) Ib. Vol. 1st. p. 55. at Boulogne.

(67) "Gallorum Bononia eodem pene est etymo; quasi dicas Bon-avon sive Bon-aun." Baxter, Glossar. AA. Britan. ad Bonium.

(68) See more on this subject ap. Hadr. Vales. Not. Gall. at Gessoriacum and Tarvepna Morinorum. Malbrancq states, that this capital of the Morini got the name of Tarvanna from a prætor Tarvannus in the time of Augustus; "Tarvannæ nomen accepit, quod etiam ad circumjacens territorium sese extendit. He quotes from the frontispiece of its old cathedral this verse; "Ex Morinis Tarvana vocor prætoro volente." De Morinis; L. 2. c. 4.

(69) Bononiæ et Tarvanensis oppidi præsulem. Some writers have said, that the see of Boulogne was first established A. D. 1566. This is a mistake founded upon a practice, introduced in the middle ages, of denominating the see from Tarvanna or Terouanne alone on account of the greater dignity of the place. But after the destruction of Terouanne by the emperor Charles V. in 1553 the see of Boulogne was restored. See Hadr. Vales. loc. cit. The old diocese of Terouanne contained 800 parishes in the countries of Flanders, Artois, and the Boulonnais. (Memoire on Terouanne in Millin's Magaz. Encyclop. for October 1813.) Bucherius maintains, that Boulogne was the ancient see, and that it had a bishop in the time of Constantine, or, at least, of his sons. (Belgium Romanum, L. viii. cap. 15.)

(70) Hadr. Vales. at Gessoriacum; "transpositis, ut sæpe accidit, duabus prioribus syllabis." Thus in the old tract on the Liturgy, quoted by Usher, p. 343, we find Linerensi for Lirinensi.

(71) "De vico Bannave Tiburniæ regionis haud procul a mari occidentali" Probus, L. 1. c. 1.

(72) Baxter, Glossar, &c. at Bonium.

§. VIII. Now comes a most remarkable circumstance, viz. the old tradition of the inhabitants of that country, that St. Patrick governed the diocese of Boulogne or of the Morini as bishop for some time before he set out on his mission for Ireland. Malbrancq, to prove the truth of it, refers (73) to the Chronicon Morinense, the Catalogue of the bishops of Boulogne, and the Life of St. Arnulphus of Soissons. We have no intrinsic evidence in opposition to this statement, although Malbrancq has given to St. Patrick's ministry as bishop at Boulogne a longer period than can be reconciled with other circumstances of our saint's life. The Bollandists are angry (74) with him for having placed St. Patrick at Boulogne, but were not able to refute his position. They say they could not find what he has in any Life of Arnulph of Soissons. But might not Malbrancq have seen a Life, which they had not? As to his other arguments, their exception is, that bishops of Boulogne were unknown before the destruction of Terouanne. This we have seen not to be strictly true. But even admitting that Boulogne was not formerly a regular see, might not St. Patrick have officiated as bishop there and in the neighbourhood, as was frequently the case in the northern parts of Europe before episcopal dignity became permanently attached to certain towns?

It will not, I think, be denied, that under the name of Armoric Gaul was comprized the country of the Morini, or the tract, in which Boulogne is situated. Cluverius, Martiniere, and some other geographers have indeed confined Armorica between the Seine and the Loire; but in so doing they looked more to the usage of a certain period than to the more ancient acceptation of the name. For in older times the whole extent of the maritime districts of western Gaul was called Armorica, in so much that even Aquitain was distinguished by that name. (75) Hirtius, the continuator of Cæsar's Commentaries tells us, that the cities near the ocean in the extreme boundaries of Gaul were called Armoricae. (76) This extended use of that name continued for a long time after, (77) and indeed very justly; for it merely means maritime. Ar-mor (moir, muir) in the Gaulish, British, and Irish languages signifies by, upon, or near the sea. The inhabitants of the sea coasts were accordingly called Armorici, and Morini has the same meaning. "The people" says Camden (78) "which in old time inhabited the sea coast of Gaul lying nearest to Britain, were in their own language called Morini. Now Mor is in British the sea.—The Britons call such as live upon the sea coast Morinwyr; as Aremorica in the old Gaulish, and now in the British signifies by the sea side." And Lobineau observes, that the countries of the Aquitani, Armorici, and Morini went under the general name of Armórica. (79) In process of time the name became gradually confined to the tract between the Seine and the Loire, and in after ages was still more limited, being understood of only the country now called Britany. (80)

(73) De Morinis, L. 2. c. 19, 26. and Scholion at pag. 623.

(74) Comment. præv. ad V. S. P. §. 10. ad 17 Mart. Qu. Could the Bollandists prove, that St. Patrick did not officiate at Boulogne at least as a priest? See below Chap. IV. §. XIII.

(75) “Inde ad Pyrenæi montis excursum Aquitania, Aremerica antea dicta.” Pliny, Natur. Hist. L. 4. sect. 31. Har-douin's ed.

(76) “Cæteræque civitates positæ in ultimis Galliæ finibus, oceano conjunctæ, quæ Armoricæ appellantur.” De bello Gallico, L. 8. §. 25.

(77) Eutropius has, L. 19. “Carausius cum apud Bononiam per tractum Belgiæ et Armoricæ pacandum mare accepisset, quod Franci et Saxones infestabant.”

(78) Britannia, col. XXIX. Gibson's ed.

(79) “Par le terme d'Armorique les anciens entendoient toutes les cotes occidentales des Gaules, habitées par les Aquitains, les Armoricains, et les Morins, tous noms qui signifient la même chose, c'est à dire, peuples maritimes.” Histoire de Bretagne, vol. 2. p. 7.

(80) See Hadr. Val. Not. Gall. at Aremerica.

§. IX. The greater part of the old writers, who have spoken of the place, where St. Patrick, when a boy, was made captive, agree that it was in Armórica. Now it is plain from the Confession, that the place of his captivity was also that of the residence of his family, or a country house not far from their usual residence. The spot was called Enon, which might be translated River-house or River-lodge. (81) Fiech's Scholiast states, that certain pirates, when plundering Letha in Armoric Britain (82) where Patrick was with his family, killed his father and brought himself away to Ireland. But, to reconcile this statement with what occurs in a former scholion concerning Nemthor and Alcluit, he premises that St. Patrick's father and mother and five sisters together with a brother had all set out on a visit from Alcluit to Armorica, and crossed the Iccian sea, (83) which, by the bye, was the very part of the sea near Boulogne. That would have been no trifling excursion for a whole family about the close of the fourth century, and through such a country as G. Britain then was. Keating says; (84) "I have read in an ancient Irish manuscript, whose authority I cannot dispute, that St. Patrick and his two sisters were brought captive into Ireland from Armorica or Britany in the kingdom of France." O'Flaherty agrees (85) with Keating as to St. Patrick having been brought from Armorica, but adds the story (of which not a word in Keating) concerning the journey all the way from the banks of the Clyde to that country. The Tripartite has (86) the same story, and agrees on the whole with the Scholiast. The author of the fourth Life, not knowing how to account for St. Patrick's connexions with Armorica, says (87) that he was of an Armorican family, but that in consequence of a certain dispersion of the Britons by the Romans his parents had removed to the neighbourhood of the Clyde. Jocelin found it more convenient to be silent as to St. Patrick's having been made captive in Armorica, but has made up another story of his own invention to account for St. Patrick's mother having been a native of Gaul. For he tells us, (88) that she and a sister of hers had been made slaves and sold in N. Britain. It is strange, that Usher could have swallowed these fables of Jocelin, and opposed his authority, as to Armorica, to the Scholiast. (89) Probus, whom Usher knew to be more ancient (90) than Jocelin, in a passage, which he has quoted on another occasion, (91) calls St. Patrick's country, and the town where his family lived, Arimuric, (92) or Armorica.

(81) Enn habitation, and On river. Bullet at Enn.

(82) "Fecerunt prædas in Britanniae Armoricae regione Letha, ubi Patricius cum familia fuit;" &c. Scholion 5. Letha has nearly the same meaning as Armorica, being the British Llydaw, i. e. litoralis, upon the shore. Camden seems to confine Letha, or, as some writers of the middle ages call it, Letavia to the tract now called Britany. (col. CXXXII.) Whether the Scholiast understood it so or not, is of little consequence, whereas it is sufficient to show that, according to him, St. Patrick's captivity took place in some part of Armorica.

(83) Trans mare Iccium. This part of the ocean was so called from the Portus Iccius, which Cluverius thinks was the same as Gessoriacum or Boulogne. Horsley would have it to be the port of Calais. (Brit. Rom. Book 1. ch. 1.) I am more inclined to follow Baudrand, who (Lexic. Geogr.) makes it the same as Witsant or Vissent, or, as the sailors call it, Esseau, a harbour four leagues to the north of Boulogne. This was also Camden's opinion, col. 251. At any rate it was somewhere in that neighbourhood.

(84) History of Ireland; Book 1. p. 156. Dublin ed. A. 1723.

(85) Ogygia, L. 3. c. 85. (86) L. A. c. 16. (87) Cap. 1.

(88) Cap. 1. (89) See. Pr. p. 822. 823. (90) Ib. p. 817.

(91) Ib. p. 833.

(92) "Cum adhuc esset in patria sua cum patre Calpurnio et matre Concessa, fratre etiam Ructhi et sorore Mila nomine, in civitate eorum Arimuric, facta est seditio magna in partibus illis. Nam filii Rethmiti regis de Britannia vastantes Arimuric," &c. (Probus, L. 1. c. 12.) Colgan in a note says, that civitate eorum Arimuric is wrong, because Arimuric or Armorica was the name not of a town but of a large tract of country. But he might have easily known, that the epithet Armorica could and actually used to be applied to the towns in that maritime range. See above note 76.

§. x. But how can this Armorican origin of St.

Patrick be reconciled with Fiech's Nemthur? So far from there being any difficulty in the matter, there cannot be a stronger proof of what has been hitherto advanced than that very word as originally used by Fiech. Instead of Nemthur, it ought to be spelled Nemhthur as it is by Colgan, (93) and as it certainly was by all those, who interpreted it Holy or heavenly tower. Now Nemhthur, according to the Irish pronunciation, must be read Neuthur, whereas the letter m with h added to it, or a point placed over it, is pronounced like v. Between v, ph, and p the affinity is so great, that they have been and are frequently used for each other. Thus then we have Neuthur, Nephthur, Nepthur. (94) This must have been a proper name and not a mere epithet, such as that of holy tower; for no sensible writer, wishing to inform his readers, where his saint was born, would say that he came to the world in a holy tower, a phrase that might be applicable to hundreds of places, particularly in Ireland, where round towers existed from time immemorial. It cannot have been the name of a town, unless we are to place Fiech in direct opposition to St. Patrick himself, who, as we have seen, calls his town Bonaquem. (95) It was accordingly the name of a country or province well known at the time that Fiech's hymn was composed. We find such a country in the Gauls, viz. the great province usually called Neustria, but often Neptricum or Neptria. It comprized the extensive tract situated between the Meuse and the Loire, and consequently the territory of Boulogne. The name originated with the Franks about the time of the death of Clovis, (96) and probably was given from that being a newly conquered country, as if we were to say, New land. (97) According as other names began to be used for some parts of that great province, that of Neptria or Neustria became confined (98) to a smaller part of the whole, but not until long after Fiech's hymn had been written. Here again comes forward

Probus, who, regularly consistent with himself as to St. Patrick's country, gives us the true meaning of Fiech by asserting, that Bannaue or Bonavem, the birth place of the saint, was undoubtedly in the province of Nevtria. (99)

(93) Tr. Th. p. 223.

(94) Hence the Nemphor or Emphor of Jocelin, capp. I. XI. who, however, when spelling it with p, should have thrown out the m.

(95) Lynch's conjecture as to Holy Tours (see above Not. 55) is ingenious, but cannot be made to agree with the text of the Confession. That city was in our saint's time so respectable and celebrated that, had he been a native of it, nothing could have been more easily expressed. Nor would there have been any necessity for adding the name of the district, such as Taburniae. Besides, such a city as Tours could not have been denominated vicus. Let me add, that Tours was never comprized in any part of Armorica; nor could it be so, lying at too great a distance from the sea.

(96) On the various points here touched upon see Hadr. Vales. Notit. Gall. at Neustria.

(97) See Baxter at Neustria. (98) Hadr. Vales. loc. cit.

(99) "Quem vicum (Bannaue) indubitanter comperimus esse Nevtriae Provinciae, in qua olim gigantes habitasse dicuntur." L. 1. c. 1. This is one of the passages, which induced Colgan to dislike Probus. The Bollandists blame him for having used the word Nevtria; for, they say, he should have called it Nemthuria, and not made a province of it, as it was but a town. Those writers, being unacquainted with the Irish language, followed implicitly on many points Usher and Colgan. And why should Probus not make Nevtria a province, having just before mentioned the town Bannaue? Was he to say, that the town Bannaue was in the town Nevtria? They respected, however, Probus as an author, and have defended him against an unwarrantable attack of Stanishurst. Some others, among whom Harris, (Bishops, p. 6.) have endeavoured to depreciate the authority of Probus, who, in spite of their wish to support the fable of Nemthor in G. Britain, is vastly more respectable than their favourite Jocelin.

§. XI. The same Probus calls St Patrick a Briton, (100) and so is he usually called in chronicles, breviaries, &c. (101) In the older tracts of this kind Britain was said in general terms to have been his country; but in some of the later ones the word, great, has been added to Britain. To guard against this interpolation, the corrector of the breviary of Rouen has in the lessons for St. Patrick marked the Britain, his real country, by adding Gallicana. (102) This was the Britain; which Probus had in view, and which St. Patrick himself must have meant, when he mentions his having been in Britain with his parents; (103) for there is no other Britain, in which the town Bonavem Taberniae can be met with. But this Gallican, or rather Aremoric, Britain must not be confounded with the country now called Britany; for it lay much farther to the north. Pliny places in the very neighbourhood of Boulogne a people called Britons, whose territory stretched to near Amiens. (104) He mentions also the British harbour of the Morini, portum Morinorum Britannicum, (105) which is generally admitted to have been that of Boulogne. (106) Some learned men are of opinion, that it was so called because it was the harbour, whence people used to sail from the continent to G. Britain; (107) or because it was situated near the streights. (108) These are far fetched explanations, and which we are not under any necessity of receiving, whereas the Britanni are placed by Pliny in its vicinity, (109) that is, as Camden expresses it, near the county of Boulogne. (110) How far this Britain extended to the north or north-east of Boulogne cannot, for aught I know, be ascertained. Some remains of the name of Britain are found near the mouths of the Rhine; (111) but, as some writers contend that the place called Het huys te Britten (house of the Britons) owes its name to an occurrence of a much later period, (112) I shall not enter into any question upon this subject. It comes nearer to our purpose, that Pliny calls the part of the ocean between the Rhine and the Seine Britannic; (113) and I think it cannot be reasonably doubted, that the Herba Britannica, which he makes mention of, (114) got its name from a Britain in the continent, having been found in some part of the country now called Belgium.

That there was such a continental Britain, and in the very tract alluded to by Pliny, is expressly stated by Dionysius Periegetes, who describing the western continent of Europe, and proceeding from south to north, places the Britons near the northern ocean just before the Germans. (115) The text is so plain, that it has been understood by all the old commentators of a Britain in the continent, and Eustathius adds that opposite to it were the islands of the same name, viz. the British islands, which, he says, will be treated of hereafter. (116) I have been therefore surprized on observing, that Hill in his commentary on that passage strives, in opposition to Eustathius, to explain it of G. Britain; for, says he, there were no other Britons in Dionysius' time except those of the British islands. (117) This is indeed begging the question, and a strange critical mode of getting rid of the plain meaning of the author, who, within five short lines, twice makes his readers know that he is there speaking not of islands but of a continent, which, he tells us, some persons said was like in its form to the hide of an ox. But it has surprized me still more to find, that such a man as Usher could have led the way to this misinterpretation. He does not indeed deny, that there were at a very ancient period Britons in the tract, where Pliny has placed them, although he would rather call them Brianni; (118) but he says that there is no reason to show, that the Britons of Dyonisius might not be understood of the inhabitants of G. Britain. (119) Now what stronger reason need be required than that the author was in that passage expressly treating of a continent? There is, however, a still stronger reason, and of such a nature, that one would almost suspect that Usher had, in his inquiry concerning those Britons, looked into no other part of the Periegesis, than the above quoted passage. If Dionysius had not mentioned in his poem the British islands, there might be some colour for Usher's evasion; for it might be concluded, that he knew so little about them as to make them part of the continent. But he knew them well, and in that part of his work, where he is treating of islands, (120) describes them as situated opposite to the mouth of the Rhine, and represents them as the largest islands known in his time. (121)

(100) L. 1. c. 1. (101) See Tr. Th. p. 190. seqq. 222. seqq.

(102) "In Britannia Gallicana ortum." See the Bollandists. Comm. præv. §. 5. at S. Patr.

(103) "Et iterum post paucos annos in Britanniis eram cum parentibus meis." Conf. p. 9. Ware's ed. The Bollandist edition has "in Britannia." Dr. O'Connor's (1. Prolegom. R. Hib. Scr.) has Britanniis.

(104) "Deinde Menapii, Morini, Oromansici, juncti pago, qui Gessoriacus vocatur, Britanni, Ambiani, &c." Nat. Hist. L. 4. sect. 31. Hardouin's ed. Cluverius (German. antiq. L. 2. c. 27), who is followed by Usher Pr. p. 421.) wished to read Brianni for Britanni; but Hardouin, in a note to the name, says; "Ita libri omnes. Hi inter Gessoriacenses Ambianosque medii, in ora similiter positi ea loca tenuere certe, ubi nunc oppida Stapulae, Monstrolium, Hesdinium, et adjacentem agrum Ponticum, le Ponthieu, ad Somonam annem."

(105) L. 4. sect. 37.

(106) So Hadrian Valesius at Gessoriacum; Cellarius, Geogr. Ant. L. 2. c. 3. and others passim. Baudrand, however, makes it the same as Portus Iccius, which he distinguishes from Boulogne. See above not. 83.

(107) Hardouin, not. ad loc. cit.

(108) Hadr. Val. at Gessoriacum.

(109) Ricardus Corenensis, following Pliny, for Britannicus

portus has Britannicae gentis portus. De situ Britanniae, L. 1. §. 4.

(110) Britannia, Gibson's ed. col. XVI.

(111) Baudrand has; "Britanni etiam pop. Belgii, quorum tractus apud ostium Rheni Thuys (Het huys) te Britten appellatur, teste Ortelio."

(112) See Usher Pr. p. 418.

(113) "Ad Rhenum septentrionalis oceanus, inter Rhenum et Sequanam Britannicus, inter eum et Pyrenaeum Gallicus. L. 4. sect. 33. I do not see why this name might not be as well derived from the continental Britain as from the insular.

(114) L. 25. cap. 3. Hardouin says it was so called from Bretannia in Friesland. Hadrian Junius (Onomast.) and some others account for the name otherwise; but their explanation is not as natural as the former.

(115) Μηκος ἐπ' ἠπειροῖο τετραμμενον, ἠχι βορειῖς
Ὀκειαν κέχυται ψυχρὸς ῥοος· ἐνθα Βρετανοί, Λευκα τε φυλα νέμονται κρειμανεων Γερμανων,
Ερκυνίς δρυμοιο παρὰδρωσκοντες οροσκις.

Ἡπειρον κεινὴν κέλην ἐνεπῆσι Βοιη. ΟΙΚ. ΠΕΡΙΗΓ. v. 283—287.

(116) Των δὲ Βρεττανων τριτων παρανομι αἱ αντιπεραν Βρεττανιδες νησοι, περι ἂν ρηθῆσεται. Eustathius Comment. ad loc. cit.

(117) Hill refers on this occasion to Camden's Britannia; but Camden distinctly admits a Britain near Boulogne (above not. 110). Was Hill too proud to acknowledge, that there were Britons in the continent as ancient, at least, as those of his own country?

(118) See above not. 104. (119) Pr. p. 422.

(120) Having described the continents of Africa and Europe, he begins at v. 447, to treat of islands, having first invoked the Muse,

—————σὺ δὲ μὲν Διὸς ἐνεπέ Μετα
Νησων πασαων ἴσον πορον αἰτ' ἐνι ποντω, &c.

(121) Δισσαι νησοι εἰσι Βρετανιδες ἀντια Ρηνς—

Των τοι μεγεθος περιωσιον· εἰδε τις ἀλλη

Νησοις ἐν πασησι Βρετανισιν ἰσοφαρίζει. v. 566—569.

§. XII. I believe there can be no doubt but that the Britons of Albion were originally colonists from the Britannia of the continent. Bede states, that they came from the Armorican tract, and that from them the island of Britain received its name. (122) This offers a much more rational account of the origin of that name, than any of those ridiculous fables about Brutus, &c. which may be seen in Camden, or the fanciful, though learned, etymological conjectures of Bochart, who strives to prove, (123) that the name of the country was prior to that of the inhabitants, Barat-anac, the land of lead, whence Bretanica, Bretania, and, last of all, Britons. Camden himself leans to what had been laid down by Bede, which is perfectly consistent with what he has most learnedly proved, (124) viz. that the Britons came originally from Gaul. Every one knows what Cæsar has said concerning the maritime parts of Britain (that is, to the S. E. which alone he was acquainted with) being inhabited by people from Belgium. (125) And it would be idle to refer in this place to the authorities of Tacitus, Dio, &c. (126) on a matter at present so universally admitted.

At a later period this continental Britain received a great supply of men from the island. The usurper Maximus, on his expedition to Gaul against the emperor Gratian, landed at the mouth of the Rhine (127) A. D. 383. He was accompanied by a vast number of the youth of Great Britain, who never after returned to their own country. (128) Nennius says, that those followers of Maximus got tracts of land in various parts of the continent, some of which were near Cantguic. (129) As to the other places mentioned by Nennius I shall not attempt to give any opinion. (130) But I think it can scarcely be doubted that by Cantguic he meant the place called Catweyck or Katwick in Holland, two leagues below Leyden, where the middle branch of the Rhine formerly joined the sea, and near which a Dutch chronicler quoted by Usher (131) places a British settlement and the fortress since called Lot huys te Britten. (132) Usher adduces other authorities to show, that there was a British establishment in that neighbourhood, although, by the bye, he ascribes it to the refugees, who fled from Britain to avoid the fury of the Saxons. Yet it is difficult to believe, that such disheartened and persecuted fugitives could have erected, or, as Usher would have it, seized upon a fortress in a strange country, and, as his authorities state, subjected to their power the inhabitants of the neighbouring district. It will, I think, be allowed that such an undertaking and settlement ought, with much greater probability, be attributed to the fighting men, who followed Maximus to the continent, and a part of whom, it is but natural to suppose, was left to defend his point of communication with Great Britain. Nor can I agree with Usher, however favourable his opinion would be to my object, that the Brittia of Procopius is to be sought for in or near Holland. (133) For on close examination of the text of Procopius it will appear, that his Brittia was in reality the island of Britain, although, through a strange ignorance of geography, he distinguishes Brittia from Britannia. (134)

(122) “In primis autem hæc insula Britones solum, a quibus nomen accepit, incolas habuit, qui de tractu Armoricano, ut fertur, Britanniam advecti australes sibi partes illius vindicarunt.” Eccl. Hist. L. 1. c. 1. Some of those writers, who have treated the much disputed subject of the first settlement of the Britons in the country now called Britany, among others Lobineau, would fain make us believe that Bede did not mean to say, that the island derived its name from that of the colonists. In answer to such quibbling, I wish they would explain why, if that had not been his intention, he touched upon the name at all. He is there giving an account of the divers nations, who, having come from other countries, occupied by degrees the whole of the island. The first settlers, he says, were the Britons, and from these the island got the name of Britain. What can be more plain? Then, he adds, came the nation of the Picts from Scythia, that is, a people, according to him, called Picts before they arrived in Great Britain; after whom came the Scots, who were already known by that name in Ireland. The reason, that induced those writers to resort to that quibble, was that, in their opinion, there was no foundation for placing Britons in the province now called Britany before the middle of the 5th century. Be it so; but it does not thence follow, that there were not Britons in some other part of the continent. The Armorican tract mentioned by Bede was, as has been shown, far more extensive than modern Britany.

(123) Chanaan; L. 1. c. 39.

(124) Britannia, col. xvi. xvii. seqq. A. Du Chesne has also treated the same subject at great length; Histoire d'Angleterre, &c. Liv. 1: but he has given us scarcely any thing of his own, having followed Camden almost verbatim.

(125) Britanniæ—maritima pars ab iis (incolitur) qui, prædæ ac belli inferendi causa, ex Belgis transierant, qui omnes fere iis nominibus civitatum appellantur, quibus orti ex civitatibus eo per-venerunt." De bello Gallico; L. 5. §. 10.

(126) See Whitaker's Hist. of Manchester; Vol. 1. Corrections, p. 152.

(127) See Camden, col. 1504.

(128) "Exin Britannia omni armato milite, militaribusque copiis,—ingenti juventute spoliata, quæ comitata vestigiis supradicti tyranni domum nusquam ultra rediit." Gildas, De excid. Brit. cap. XI.

(129) "Noluitque (Maximus) dimittere milites, qui cum eo perrexerunt a Britannia, neque ad uxores suas, neque ad filios, neque ad possessiones eorum, sed dedit illis multas regiones a stagno, quod est super verticem montis Jovis usque ad civitatem, quæ vocatur Cantguic, (Prisius, Hist. Bryt. Def. p. 50, has Cantiguit, and Gale's edition Tantguil) et usque ad comulum Occidentalem, id est, Cruc-ochidient. Gale's edition has, "et ipsi sunt ad cumulum occidentalem, i. e. Crutochidenit."

(130) According to Hadr. Valerius Mons Jovis is the great St. Bernard. Cruc-ochidient means western mountain. (Camden col. 561.) Could Nennius have meant the Pyrenees? Gildas writes, (cap. 10.) that Maximus extended one of his wings to Spain and the other to Italy.

(131) P. 418. (132) See also Martiniere at Katwick.

(133) See Pr. p. 400. 419.

(134) The passage is in Procopius' work, De bello Gothico, L. 4. cap. 20. "Brittia autem insula in hoc oceano sita est, haud amplius CC. stadiis procul a litore, contra ipsa Rheni ostia, inter Britanniam ac Thulen insulam. Etenim Britannia ad solem occidentem, quâ extremam Hispaniam spectat, a continente stadia circiter quatuor millia distat. Brittia ultimis objacet Galliaë partibus, quæ ad oceanum vergunt—Porro Brittiam insulam nationes tres numerosissimæ, suo quæque sub rege, habitant, Angli, Frisones, cognominesque insulæ Brittones. Tanta est hominum multitudo, &c. In ea insula Brittia murum longum veteres ædificaverunt," &c. Here we have the island Brittia opposite the mouths of the Rhine about 25 miles from the continent, and over against the furthestmost parts of Gaul, an island inhabited by three very numerous nations, Angles, &c. containing a vast multitude of inhabitants, just as Cæsar had said of Britain in his time, and in which a long wall had been formerly built. Such a description cannot suit any island in or near Holland, but agrees exactly with Great Britain. But what shall we say of his placing Brittia between Britannia and Thule? I know not how to explain it, except that perhaps by Britannia he meant Ireland. His placing it towards Spain, as Bede (Eccl. Hist. L. c. 1.) also does, and about 500 miles from the continent, seems to favour this conjecture.

§. XIII. To return to Nennius, there is every reason to believe, that the followers of Maximus spread themselves to the southward along the Belgic coast, and even to a greater extent than the boundaries of the ancient Britain, of which we have already spoken. But whether they were the first British settlers in the country now called Britany, it would be presumptuous to decide. Nennius seems to have thought so; for he derives from them the Armoric Britons, (135) by whom he very probably meant, according to the usage of his times, the inhabitants of Britany. In an interpolation of Nennius, which seems to have been originally a note to the passage above referred to, we read that those followers of Maximus laid waste the western parts of Gaul, and killed the male inhabitants, but spared the females, whom they took to themselves as wives. (136) Several old writers, mentioned by Usher, (137) assign the same origin to the Britons of Britany, and they are followed by Baronius, Malbrancq, and many others. (138) But Usher and Lobineau maintain, that the first British settlement in the tract now called Britany was after the Saxon invasion of Great Britain. The latter places (139) the arrival of the British emigrants under a chief of the name of Rival or Reith about A. D. 458. One of his arguments against the contrary opinion is, that Maximus landed with his army not in that part of Gaul but at the mouth of the Rhine (140) Although I am not inclined to oppose Lobineau's system, which, as some writers think, gives even an older and more dignified origin to the Bretons than they are entitled to, (141) yet it cannot be denied that there were in the fifth century some respectable assemblages of Britons in Gaul. We find a Riothamus or Riothimus king of the Britons, who, as stated by Jornandes, (142) went with 12,000 men to Bourges as auxiliary to the Romans in the time of the emperor Anthemius, and therefore prior to A. D. 472, the year in which Anthemius was killed. To this Riothamus there is extant a letter of Sidonius Apollinaris, who in another place makes mention of Britons placed near the Loire. (143) He is not, as Lobineau has observed, to be confounded with Rival above mentioned. These Britons, who appear to have been so powerful, could not have been part of the refugees from Great Britain, who according to Gildas and Bede were poor stragglers and runaways, (144) evidently unable to form such an army. Nor is it to be granted to Lobineau, that Riothimus brought that army from G. Britain, and, as he says, about A. D. 470. For who can be made to believe, that at the very period, during which the people of Great Britain were struggling with various success against their Saxon enemies, (145) a king and a considerable army (146) would have abandoned their own country and gone elsewhere to fight other people's battles? Riethimus therefore and his Britons were undoubtedly continental Britons; and, comparing all the circumstances, their country appears to have stretched from the Rhine southwards into, at least, a part of the extensive tract now called Normandy. This further extension of the old Britain was most probably owing to the establishment of the followers of Maximus in those parts of Gaul.

(135) After what has been quoted above, Not. 129, Nennius continues; "Hi sunt Britones Armorici, et numquam reversi sunt ad proprium solum usque in hodiernum diem." I am willing to allow, that in his days (about the middle of the 9th century) the name of Armoric Britons was usually applied only to the people of Britany. Yet it must be observed that he could not mean, that the territories, which the followers of Maximus got possession of, were confined to that province, as he had just before spoken of many and extensive tracts, in which they were settled. Accordingly his meaning must have been, that the Armoric Britons were descended from part of that great multitude, which had accompanied Maximus.

(136) "Britones namque Armorici, qui ultra mare sunt, cum Maximo tyranno hinc in expeditionem exeuntes, quoniam redire nequiverant, occidentales partes Gallia solo tenus vastaverunt—acceptisque eorum uxoribus et filiabus in conjugium;" &c.

(137) P. 421.

(138) Among the writers of our own days, who are of the same opinion, I find Gifford, who says that Britany was so called from the followers of Maximus. (Hist. of France, Vol. 1. p. 34.)

(139) Hist. de Bretagne; Vol. 1. p. 5. (140) Ib. p. 6.

(141) Vertot has attacked Lobineau's system, and will not allow that there were Britons in Bretagne or Britany about the year 458. He pretends, that they were not fixed there until the sixth century, when they were received as fugitives by Childebert and Clotaire the sons of Clovis; History of the establishment of the Bretons, a political work undertaken to show the original dependence of the Bretons on the kings of France.

(142) De rebus Geticis; cap. 45.

(143) "Britannos supra Ligerim sitos." L. 1. Ep. 7. Was it in that part where Blois is now situated, which is said to have been founded by Britons?

(144) "Alii fame confecti procedentes manus hostibus dabant—alii transmarinas regiones dolentes petebant." Bede L. 1. c. 15. from Gildas cap. 25.

(145) See Bede L. 1. c. 16. and Smith's notes. The contest was kept up from about A. D. 456 to 492 the year of the great victory gained by the Britons near Bath.

(146) From the letter of Sidonius Apollinaris (L. 3. Ep. 9.) to Riothamus, whom both Usher (p. 143.) and Sirmond (Not. ad loc.) make the same as the king Riothimus, it is clear, that they were a brave and powerful body of men, of whom the 12,000, that fought near Bourges against the Visigoths, seem to have been only a detachment. Sidonius styles them armatos, tumultuosos, virtute, numero, contubernio contumaces.

§. xiv. The name, Britain, as applied to part of Belgium and the northwest of Gaul, was well understood not only in the time of St. Patrick, who lived during the period that we have now been speaking of, but likewise in a later age. In a Life of our St. Fursæus we read, that having crossed the sea for the purpose of going to Rome, he arrived in the province of Britain, that is, as appears from the whole context, a Britain in the continent, and that on his landing he proceeded through the district of Ponthieu to a place belonging to Duke Haymon. (147) Ponthieu is a maritime tract in Picardy extending to near Boulogne, and it is known from other authorities, that it was the residence of that Duke. (148) The saint's journey was directed to the south-east; and he is represented as proceeding towards Rome. Hence it is evident, that the writer did not mean by Britain the modern Britany; for Ponthieu lies in a quite opposite direction to a journey to Rome from any part of Britany. It is also to be observed, that the province of Britain, in which Fursæus had arrived, is said to be called by the moderns Normandy. Now in the first place Britany was never included under that name, and secondly at the time, in which the compiler of the Life, as we now have it, lived, the province of Britany was in full possession of its own name, nor has it lost it at any time since it was first so called ; while the name of the old Britain, in which was Ponthieu, was gradually swallowed up in the general denomination of Neptria, or Neustria, after the acquisition of that country by the Franks, and after it became a part of the kingdom of Soissons under Clotaire one of the sons of Clovis. The passage relative to the name of Normandy has puzzled the Bollandists on perceiving, that it excluded both Great Britain and Britany, which were the only Britains, that they seem to have had any thought of. They object, that Ponthieu is not in Normandy. It certainly is not, taking the name according to the precise boundaries of that province as fixed at present. They might, however, have easily found that, after the Normans began to occupy various parts of the north-west of Gaul, the name Normannia was used indiscriminately for that of Neustria, (149) under which name Ponthieu, Boulogne, &c. were, as we have seen, formerly contained. The names of Neustria and Normannia became so identified, that, according as one of them happened to be limited to a smaller extent of country, so was the other. The modern Normans, when writing in Latin, call their country Neustria. (150)

Besides the positive arguments hitherto alleged to show, that there was a Belgic Britain before the conquests of the Franks in that country, I might adduce many indications corroborative of what has been stated, such as the mention made by some ancient authors of the Alobrites or Gallo-britons of those tracts, the great probability of the Frisii and the older Britons having been the same people. But, to avoid prolixity, I beg leave to refer the reader to some passages in the subjoined note. (151)

(147) “ In Britanniam provinciam quæ a modernis Normannia nuncupatur,—pervenit. Veniens autem per Pontivum pagum in possessionem quamdam Haymonis ducis, quæ Macerias et Maioc vocabatur.” (Vita S. Furs. L. 2. ap. Colgan AA. SS. at 16 Jan.) This Life has been published also by the Bollandists at same day. It was compiled from older documents, as appears on comparing it with the very ancient Life of Fursæus published by Mabillon (AA. SS. Ord. Bened. Sec. II. p. 299. seqq.) and with the account given of that saint by Bede, L. 3. c. 19. The compiler, who is supposed to have been Arnulfus Abbas Lantiniacensis (abbot of Lagny between Paris and Meaux) has, however, made many additions, partly from documents no longer extant, and partly as observations and interpolations of his own. (See Mabillon loc. cit.) One of those interpolations is evidently the passage; quæ a modernis Normannia nuncupatur; and indicates a writer not earlier than the tenth century. Arnulfus lived in the eleventh. But the words, Britannia provincia, must have been taken from an old document; for that name had, long before Arnulfus’ time, ceased to be given to the country, in which Ponthieu is situated; and hence the compiler, to prevent any mistake of the reader, remarked that in his time it was called Normandy.

(148) Hadrian Valesius writes; “ Pagum Pontivum vetus liber de vita S. Judoci vocat; vocat et liber vetustissimus de vita B. Fursæi abbatis; et ambæ vitæ Haimonem ducem in eo pago sedem habuisse tradunt.” Notit. Gall. at Pontivus pagus.

(149) Hadr. Vales. at Nortmannia.

(150) Bochart (Dedication of his Geogr. Sacra) speaking of Caen in Normandy calls it Cadomum Neustricæ ocellum.

(151) “ Alobrites apud Anonymum antiquissimum Belgarum nomen fuit, quasi dicas Gallobritones. In Vaticano codice dicuntur vitiose vel saltem συνονυμῶς Alobriges.” Baxter, Glossar. Antiq. Brit. ad Alobrites.—“ Sunt autem Aremorici veteres Belgæ, hoc est, Alobrites, sive Belgicæ Britannicæ reliquiæ.” Idem ad Aremorici.—“ Prodente Dionysio Afro hi (Britanni) Germanis

proximi Flandriam sive Wallonum patriam occupavere. Dionysii interpres Eustathius et alios esse scribit in adversa insula Britannos, quos quidem fuisse Belgas veteres sive Wallones—nullus dubito. Et cum Plinius scribat Herbam Britannicam a Frisiis Germanici militibus ostensam, pronum est credere ipsos Frisios dictos fuisse Britannos, imo et initio Belgas universos. Certe Aremoricis Britannis horum απογόνους Breiz eorum dicitur Britannia; et Prezec Brizonec, Aremorice loqui est.—Etsi dissimulandum non sit tantumdem esse, sive quis dicat Frisones, Brisones, Britones, sive Brigantes, pro dialectorum scilicet diversitate. Etiam Ravennati geographo Frisones dicuntur Frixi et Frigones—Quid quod et Procopio in libro de bello Gothico Frisii dicantur una cum Anglis Britanniam nostram incolere? Plinius etiam Belgicorum Britannorum meminit; imo vel anonymo Ravennati Gallia Belgicæ sive Franciæ Rhinensis incolæ Alobrites tamquam Gallobritones appellantur.” Idem ad Britanni.

§. xv. St. Patrick mentions his country under the name of Britanniæ. It is not improbable that the using of that name in the plural number was owing to there having been more Britains than one, in the same manner as, when the name Gaul began to be extended to countries contiguous to the original Gaul or country of the Celts, we find Galliæ often used instead of Gallia. (152) A passage of St. Patrick's Confession, in which he thus names his country, has been quoted above. (153) In another place he says that he had a great wish to go to the Britains, as to his country, and to see his relatives, and to proceed as far as the Gauls for the purpose of visiting the brethren and the saints. (154) I have quoted this passage, lest it might be supposed that I wished to evade an objection, which some minor critics would probably frame on our saint's having distinguished his Britain from Gaul. They might argue thus: the Britain I am treating of was itself in the Gauls, having been a part of Belgic Gaul; therefore St. Patrick's Britain could have been no other than Great Britain. To this I answer that the country, called in later times Belgic Gaul, was originally quite distinct from the real and properly called Gaul, which comprized only the country of the Celts, the name by which they called themselves, and which the Romans changed into Galli. It was separated from Belgium by the rivers Marne and Seine, as it was from Aquitain by the Garonne. The languages, institutions, and laws of those three countries were different. The authority of Cæsar (155) is decisive on these subjects, although he himself, in compliance with the Roman phraseology and for brevity sake, often comprizes them all under the general name of Gaul, which was used at Rome in consequence of the nearest parts, to Italy, of that great continent to the west of the Rhine, whence so many swarms of warriors issued and crossed the Alps, having belonged to the country of the Celts or real Galli. Had those parts borne the name of Belgium, this would probably have become the general name instead of Gallia. But, although the Romans spoke in that manner, the respective inhabitants of those countries retained among themselves the true original names. Thus in the continent of Europe a person, except one well versed in geography, is seldom met with that has heard of Wales, and who does not speak of the whole country, to the south of Scotland, under the general name of England. Should a foreigner, not well acquainted with the topography of our islands, hear you say that being in Dublin you had wished to go to Wales and then to England, he would not understand you. Now his difficulty would be exactly similar to that, upon which the objection above proposed would be founded. A man living at Rome, and accustomed to hear only the general name of Gaul used for all the countries between the Rhine and the ocean, would, alluding to the tracts mentioned by St. Patrick, probably not have distinguished the Britain, mentioned by St. Patrick, from Gaul. But the saint well knew the name of his country ; and it was, at the time he was writing, well understood by the people whom he was addressing. It may be here incidentally observed, that St. Patrick's calling his country Britain furnishes a very strong argument in favour of the antiquity of his Confession ; for that name, as has been already remarked, began to fall into disuse after that of Neustria became prevalent. To show still more of what little weight such an objection ought to be considered, let it suffice to add that Britany, although situated in the real Gaul, and although it got its name at a comparatively very late period, yet is spoken of as a country distinct from the Gauls. Thus we read that St. Maclovius bishop of St. Malo, being driven from his see, cursed the Bretons and went to the Gauls. (156) Should any one, however, wish for a text, in which Gaul is mentioned as St. Patrick's country, there is at hand a passage of Probus, who lived at a time when the name of Britain had become obsolete with regard to the Belgic one, in which he writes that on the saint's endeavouring to escape from Ireland a man sold him to be carried to Gaul, and that the sailors brought him to his own country, having landed at Bourdeaux (157)

(152) Catullus has them both in one line ; “ Hunc Galliæ timent, timent Britannia.” xxvii. His saying Britannia cannot be ascribed to the division of Great Britain, that took place when it fell under the government of the Romans, such as prima, secunda, Maxima Cæsariensis, &c. whereas these divisions did not exist until after Catullus' death ; nor could any part of Great Britain be called a Roman province in his time, as appears from the well known testimony of Tacitus : “ Igitur primus omnium Romanorum D. Julius cum exercitu Britanniam ingressus, quamquam prospera pugna terruerit incolas, ac litore potitus sit, potest videri ostendisse posteris non tradidisse. Mox bella civilia—ac longa oblivio Britannia etiam in pace—Divus Claudius auctor operis—redactaque paulatim in formam provinciæ proxima pars Britannia.” (Julii Agricolaë Vita.) I know indeed, that the reason generally assigned for the plural form, Britannia, is that the other islands near Great Britain were comprised under that name. I doubt, however, whether such a reason could account for the use of it so early as the days of Catullus.

(153) Not. 103.

(154) Ut pergens in Britannias et libentissime paratus eram, quasi ad patriam et parentes; non id solum, sed eram (paratus) usque Gallias visitare fratres, et ut viderem faciem sanctorum Domini mei." Conf. p. 17. Ware's ed.

(155) "Gallia est omnis divisa in partes tres: quarum unam incolunt Belgæ; aliam Aquitani; tertiam, qui ipsorum lingua Celtæ, nostra Galli, appellantur. Hi omnes lingua, institutis, legibus, inter se differunt. Gallos ab Aquitanis Garumna flumen, a Belgis Matrona et Sequana dividit.—Helvetii—reliquos Gallos virtute præcedunt—Eorum una pars, quam Gallos obtinere dictum est, initium capit a flumine Rhodano: continetur Garumna flumine, Oceano, finibus Belgarum: attingit etiam a Sequanis et Helvetiis flumen Rhenum—Belgæ ab extremis Gallie finibus oriuntur (therefore not in the real Gallia); pertinent ad inferiorem partem fluminis Rheni." (De bello Gallico; L. 1. §. 1.)

(156) "Maledictis Britannis in Gallias abiit. Sigebert, Chronic. and M. Florilegus ad A. D. 561. See Usher Pr. p. 533.

(157) Vir—vendidit eum in Galliam—Suscipientes ergo B. Patricium duxerunt eum in navi in terram suam: qui cum navigare coepissent, fuit illis ventus contrarius multis diebus—venit cum Gallis post dies duodecim ad Brotgalum. Probus, L. 1. capp. 13. 14. The words terram suam, refer not to the sailors' country but to that of St. Patrick; for, a few lines before an Angel is stated to have said to him; "Vade ad hæreditatem tuam, de qua venisti." This passage of Probus is made to refer to our saint's return from a third captivity, of which I do not pretend to guarantee the truth. But the genuine account given by St. Patrick himself, and by Probus elsewhere, of his return from his first and, I believe, only captivity in Ireland, furnishes an invincible proof that he was a native of the country generally called Gaul. See below, Chap. IV. §. VII. VIII.

§. XVI. Although St. Patrick wished to see his relatives and friends in his native country, yet he tells us that his reason for not going to visit them was, that he durst not absent himself from Ireland, lest he might lose the fruit of his labours and become guilty in the sight of God. (158) Had he been a native of Kilpatrick or of any part of the West of Great Britain, (those who would fain bring him from that country have never looked for other parts of it on this question) might he not have ventured to cross the channel, and spend some little time with his family, which, including his return, would have taken up but a few days? Or could he have said that, in consequence of his mission in Ireland, he was under the necessity of not seeing any of his relatives? (159) Surely had it been inconvenient for St. Patrick to quit Ireland for even a few days, those relatives, who were certainly respectable people, would not have hesitated to take a trip across the channel to pay him a visit, which would have so highly gratified him. Just before the words now quoted he talks of the children of God acquired, through his ministry, in the extremity of the world. (160) A man born in the continent might naturally speak in that manner; but it is difficult to believe, that a person, who was himself one of the ultimi Britanni, and whose country was so very near Ireland, could have made use of such an expression.

Considering all that has been said hitherto I should hope, that no petty quibbles will be resorted to in opposition to such a mass of evidence. Some one might perhaps object that, as Boulogne, where St. Patrick's family resided at the time he was made captive, was in the territory of the Morini, he should have designated his country rather by this name than by that of Britain. But have we not seen from Pliny, that the Britanni were in the immediate neighbourhood of Boulogne? We have also seen, that the district of Ponthieu was in that Britain.

St. Patrick tells us, that his family lived in the district of Tabernia, or Tarvenna, and yet he calls his country Britain, inasmuch as under that name the minor districts were included, in the same manner as our counties are comprized under the general name of the province. It must also be recollected, that the name Morini was rather a surname, signifying maritime people, than the proper name of a nation or territory. And in fact we do not find any particular name for their territory, such as Morina, Morinia, or Morinium; and it is clear, that they were called Morini for no other reason than that they inhabited part of the coast of Belgic Britain. Should it be said, that this Belgic Britain is but seldom alluded to by ancient writers, I answer first, that the country of the Belgæ was very imperfectly known to the Romans during the golden days of their literature. (161) Next it may be observed that, having begun to lose its old name soon after the settlement of the Franks, it is no wonder that there should be few such allusions to it by later writers, when treating of the tracts, which it comprized. We have, however, seen, that it has been not only alluded to but expressly mentioned oftener than has been imagined; and I hope that to the authorities and arguments, which may be collected from other quarters relative to Belgic Britain, the writings of St. Patrick, and some of our Irish documents will in future be added as serving to throw great light on the ancient state of a country, whose antiquities have been too much neglected.

(158) " Scit Deus quod ego valde optabam, sed alligatus Spiritu, qui mihi protestatur; si hoc fecero, ut futurum reum me esse designat; et timeo perdere laborem quem ego inchoavi." Confes. p. 17.

(159) " Numquid sine Deo, vel secundum carnem Hiberione veni? Quis me compulit, alligatus Spiritu ut non videam aliquem de cognatione mea?" (Ep. cont. Corotic.) See some other proofs of St. Patrick's having been a native of the Continent below, Chap. IV. §. XIX.

(160) "Filiorum Dei quos nuper adquisivit in ultimis terræ per exhortationem parvitatæ nostræ." (Ib.) And in the beginning of the Confession he speaks of the ultimum terræ, where he was among foreigners.

(161) Cæsar speaking of the Belgæ has ; "A cultu atque humanitate Provinciæ longissime absunt; minimeque ad eos mercatores sæpe commeant." (De bello Gall. L. 1. §. 1.)

§. XVII. Before concluding this chapter, it becomes necessary to enter into an inquiry concerning our saint's family and connexions, in which I shall endeavour to be as brief as possible, notwithstanding the many idle stories, that we find in some of those writings called his Lives, relative to his kindred. He was, as he himself informs us, of a respectable family and of that class of citizens, who were entitled to hold municipal offices ; (162) a privilege, which in the Roman empire was annexed to estated men, who alone formed the municipality or Curia, whence the members of it were called Curiales or Decuriones. (163) Elsewhere he says that his father was Calpornius a deacon, and son of Potitus who had been a priest. (164) It may perhaps be thought, that their having been ecclesiastics cannot be easily reconciled with their rank as Decurions, whereas, since the time of Constantine the great, laws had been enacted prohibiting such persons from entering into holy orders and subjecting them to penalties in case they did ; upon the principle that both situations were incompatible, as the Decurions were bound to attend to the public and civic duties, while the clergy, in virtue of their profession, were exempt from that burden ; so that, in case of Decurions becoming church-men, the whole weight of those duties would have fallen upon those, who might still remain laymen. But it is well known, that these laws were often either not enforced, or modified at various times by succeeding emperors, (165) until, to come to the period about which St. Patrick was born, Theodosius the first exempted from the penalties all such Decurions as had been ordained before A. D. 388 ; and, with regard to such as might be ordained afterwards, established the rule, that they should either provide proper substitutes to serve in their stead, or give up their estates to the Curia at their ordination. (166) To this last condition I am inclined to think that St. Patrick alluded, where he says, that he sold his nobility ; (167) inasmuch as, coming under that regulation, he forfeited his estate for the purpose of becoming a clergyman. His family was very probably of Roman origin. Whether the names of his grand-father, father, and of himself, being purely Latin, should be considered as indicative of Roman extraction, I will not undertake to decide ; for it might be answered, that the provincial subjects of Rome did not unfrequently assume Latin names. But in his letter against Coroticus he seems to speak of the Romans as his fellow citizens, (168) and in the old catalogue of celebrated saints in Ireland the bishops of the first order, who were in St. Patrick's time, are stated to have been Romans, (169) &c. By placing the Romans before those of other nations it was probably meant, that St. Patrick was a Roman, that is, of a Roman family settled in Belgic Britain.

Be this as it may, his mother was, according to all the old Irish writers on the subject, (170) a native of some part of the Gauls. By some she is called Conches or Conques, by others Conchessa, and is said to have been the daughter of Ocmuis, or, as he is variously named, Ocbasius, or Secbasius. (171) There is a sort of tradition that she was a near relative of the great St. Martin of Tours, either his sister, or, what is less improbable, a niece of his. I have not been able to find any sufficient authority for it, and it seems to be founded on a mistake, in consequence of its having been said that St. Patrick, after his release from captivity, spent some time with St. Martin at Tours. Hence a conclusion was drawn, that there was some family connexion between them; and as that connexion could not have been in the paternal line, St. Patrick's father and grandfather having been always spoken of as Britons, while St. Martin was known to have been a native of Pannonia, it was inferred that the relationship must have been on the side of his mother. Yet in Fiech's hymn there is not a word about it, notwithstanding the degree of respectability, which it might have been supposed to add to the history of our saint; nor does Probus mention it, although he states that St. Patrick remained four years with St. Martin, and more than once speaks of Conchessa, or, as he calls her, Concessa. The authors of the Lives, called second, third, and fourth, are equally silent on this subject. St. Patrick does not give the least hint as to such a relationship, although he found himself under the necessity of showing, that he was respectably connected. (172) Add, that there is no ground for supposing, that there were any brothers or sisters of St. Martin residing in Gaul. Neither Sulpicius Severus, nor Paulinus, nor any of St. Martin's biographers have, as far as I could discover, made mention of them, nor does it appear that any member of his family, which was settled at Pavia, followed him to that country. We are told that, after he quitted the army, he went to Italy to see his parents, who were pagans, and that he exerted himself to bring them over to the Christian faith. The mother was converted, but his father remained obstinate. (173) Nothing is said of brothers or sisters of his, nor of any relative going with him on his return to Gaul.

(162) "Ingenuus fui secundum carnem; Decorione patre nascor. Vendidi enim nobilitatem meam." (Ep. cont. Corot.) For Decorione we are to read Decurione; i. e. De Curia.

(163) See Bingham, Orig. Eccles. Book IV. ch. 4. The name and rank are still kept up in many cities of Italy; and to be a Decurione is considered as a proof of no ordinary nobility. I believe it would be difficult for the sticklers for St. Patrick's birth in North Britain to find a Curia or Decurions in Kilpatrick, or any place near it, in the fourth century.

(164) "Patrem habui Calpornium diaconem, filium quondam Potiti presbyteri." (Confess. p. 1.) Probus says the same; L. 1. cap. 1. In Fiech's hymn even his great grandfather is mentioned under the name of Odissius.

(165) Bingham ib. B. V. ch. 3. Tillemont, Mem. Tom. X. p. 207.

(166) Cod. Theod. Lib. 12. Tit. 1. de Decur. leg. 121-123.

(167) Above Not. 162.

(168) "Non dico civibus meis neque civibus sanctorum Romanorum, sed civibus dæmoniorum."

(169) "Primus ordo catholicorum sanctorum erat in tempore Patricii.—Hi omnes episcopi de Romanis, Francis," &c.—See Usher p. 913.

(170) Usher, p. 822.

(171) See Usher ib. and Colgan Tr. Th. p. 224.

(172) Above Not. 162.

(173) Sulpic. Sever. De vita B. Martini; cap. 4.

§. XVIII. Still more unfounded are the stories concerning St. Patrick's sisters, who are said to have been with him in Ireland, and their numberless children. Part of this stuff is given by Usher; (174) but Colgan has collected the whole of it in a large dissertation, (175) to which I refer those, who may have a taste for such reading. Who could swallow such fables as, ex. c. that Tigris or Tigridia, one of those pretended sisters, had seventeen sons who all became bishops, priests, or monks, and five daughters nuns; (176) or this other, that Darerca another sister had also seventeen sons, all bishops, and only two daughters nuns? (177) And here arise mighty controversies; for some of Darerca's sons are ascribed by certain writers to Tigridia, and some others to Liemania. Lupita another sister is said to have remained a virgin, although one of our old genealogists has exhibited her as a mother. Then comes another sister Cinnenum, or, as others have called her; Richella, for whom also Colgan has endeavoured to make out a number of sons, that became bishops, priests, or deacons. And, what is no less ridiculous, among the names of all these sons we find those of persons, who lived at various periods, and who, as Colgan himself is forced to acknowledge, were Irishmen both by father and mother's side; such as Kieran, Brendan, Loarn, Lurach, Columb, Maccarthen, and others. Darerca, according to those notable accounts, was twice married; first to one Conis a Briton, and afterwards to Restitutus a Lombard!!! Yet, not to be too severe, instead of Lombard we might read a bard or son of a bard; for in those stories, as given in Irish, Restitutus is called Huabaird. The name Restitutus, however, is rather an odd one for an Irish bard. On the whole it is not to be wondered at, that Tillemont has rejected all this nonsense concerning our saint's relatives said to have been with him in Ireland; for St. Patrick himself has plainly told us, that there were no such persons with him at the time he wrote his Epistle against Coroticus. (178) His anxious wish to see his relatives (179) in the continent indicates that he could not enjoy any such comfort in Ireland. The very ancient practice of designating religious women by the name of sisters was, in all probability, the cause of mistaking some pious ladies, who lived in or about St. Patrick's time, for real sisters of his. Besides, there is a passage of the Confession, which might have helped to strengthen this mistake. Speaking of the number of converts made through his own and the exertions of others, he says, that he does not know the number of those, who are born of our kind or generation, except the widows and the continent. (180) But it is plain from the whole context, that he alludes to a spiritual not a carnal generation; and indeed it would have been strange, that, had he any married sisters along with him, he could have been ignorant of the number of their children.

That the holy females, said to have been St. Patrick's sisters, did really exist, there can be no doubt. Darerca is mentioned in our Irish annals as having died A. D. 518. (181) Now who will believe that St. Patrick, who in the year 432 was about 45 years of age, could have had a sister, that lived until the year 518? As to Liemania, Colgan after many inquiries found himself forced to conclude, that she was the same as Darerca, and has endeavoured to account for her having two names. (182) Cinnenum, that is, Cinne-noem or holy Cinne, was undoubtedly the saint Cinne or Cinnia, whose Acts are given by Colgan at 1st February. She lived in the nunnery of Druindubhain (Co. Tyrone) about A. D. 480. Being of royal parentage she was also called Ricinne or Richinne i. e. royal Cinne. From Richinne was formed the name Richella. There remain still Lupita and Tigridia, both of whom are spoken of as weaving and preparing linen cloth for religious purposes. (183) Although Lupita's memory was famous at Armagh, where she was buried, (184) yet we are not bound to believe Fiech's Scholiast, when he tells us that, being a sister of St. Patrick, she was brought captive together with him to Ireland (185) Nor are we to listen to some writers, who have added Tigris or Tigridia as having been joined with them in that same captivity. For, not to repeat former observations, it is scarcely to be supposed that St. Patrick, who describes in a very feeling manner his own captivity, would have been totally silent concerning that of a sister or sisters of his, had they been partners of his misfortune. He mentions indeed the servitude of some pious women, who were persecuted for their faith, (186) and hence probably the origin of these fables.

(174) Pr. p. 824. seqq.(175) Tr. Th. p. 224. seqq.(176) Jocelin, cap. 50.(177) Tr. Th. p. 227.(178) See above Not. 159. That letter was written many years after St. Patrick had commenced his mission in Ireland. See below Chap. VI. §. x.

(179) Above Not. 154. As St. Patrick was far advanced in life at the time he wrote the Confession, it seems more probable that the term parentes, in the passage referred to, is to be understood not of parents in the English sense of the word, but of relatives. This acceptation of parentes had crept into use as far back as the time of St. Jerome; and hence the Italian parenti and the French parens.

(180) “Omnes virgines Dei ita hoc faciunt, non sponte patrum earum, sed persecutionem patientur—et nihilominus plus augetur numerus, et de genere nostro qui ibi nati sunt nescimus numerum eorum, præter viduas et continentes. Sed et illæ maxime laborant,” &c. p. 16.

(181) “Quies Darercæ, quæ Moninne nominata est.” Usher, Pr. p. 826. The 4 Masters ap. Colgan, AA. SS. p. 190. have A. D. 517, which year, considering their mode of computation, is the same as Usher’s A. 518. He has very properly made this Darerca the same as the one, reported to have been St. Patrick’s sister. Colgan has fruitlessly laboured to distinguish them, AA. SS. ad 22 Mart. which day he assigns for her festival, reserving the sixth of July for another Darerca. Marian Gorman at 22 Mart. calls her a virgin. See AA. SS. p. 719.

(182) AA. SS. p. 718.

(183) “Lupita, Tigrida—textrices et sacrorum linteorum erant confectrices.” Tripart. L. 3. c. 98.

(184) Usher p. 824.

(185) Probus calls the captive sister Mila; L. 1. c. 12. He also mentions a brother of his named Ructhi, as also made captive at the same time. But, as Colgan remarks, neither Mila nor Ructhi occur in any of the other accounts of our saint; and the passage of Probus, in which those persons are spoken of, bears evident marks of interpolation.

(186) “Sed et illæ maxime laborant quæ servitio detinentur, usque ad terrores et minas assidue perseverant.” Confes. p. 16.

CHAPTER IV.

Of the year of St. Patrick's birth—That of his captivity and first arrival in Ireland—Names or surnames given to him, and his proceedings during his captivity—Return to his country—His studies at Tours—The vision, in which he was invited to Ireland—His transactions with St. German of Auxerre—Also in an island, most probably Lerins—Sent to Rome by St. German—Appointed by Pope Celestine assistant to Palladius—Sets out for Ireland—Consecrated bishop somewhere in the N. W. of Gaul—Of some companions of St. Patrick.

SECT. I.

HAVING endeavoured to clear up the account of St. Patrick's country and connexions, we must now proceed to treat of himself in person. The variety of opinions concerning the year of his birth, and the number of years that he lived, under which are included many other questions relative to the chronological arrangement of his transactions, renders such an inquiry exceedingly irksome, and induces a necessity of examining several hypotheses on these subjects, some of which have been rather generally received.

Usher laid down two chronological positions, upon which he built his whole system ; one, that St. Patrick lived full 120 years, and the other, that he died A. D. 493. Then having found, that Florence of Worcester in his Chronicle had assigned St. Patrick's birth to A. D. 372, he followed him in this point, as said year answered his purpose very well. (1) Colgan agrees with Usher as to the saint's death in 493, but places his birth in 373, and indeed on the 5th of April, whence he concludes that St. Patrick died in the 120th year of his age. His argument for differing from Usher is strangely incorrect. From a tradition that St. Patrick was born on a Wednesday, joined with there being in the Irish calendars a festival of St. Patrick's baptism assigned to the 5th of April, he drew his inference that St. Patrick was born on a fifth of said month, and therefore A. D. 373, whereas, he says, the fifth of April fell on Wednesday in that year. (2) Now in the first place the festival here mentioned was not in commemoration of the baptism of St. Patrick, but of the first baptism which he performed in Ireland. (3) Next, supposing even that said festival was relative to the baptism of St. Patrick himself, what bewitched Colgan to make him be baptized on the very day he was born? Did he find it any where recorded, that our saint came into the world in an imminent danger of death? Lastly it turns out, unluckily for Colgan's argument, that the 5th of April fell in the year 373 not on Wednesday but on Friday. Harris copied these bad calculations of Colgan, and has added a huge blunder of his own. He says he must differ from Usher as to St. Patrick's birth in 372, and place it in 373, because even according to Usher himself St. Patrick, who died A. D. 493, lived but 120 years. (4) Poor Harris thought that, if St. Patrick's birth had taken place in 372, he should have lived 121 years. But Usher was a better calculator than Harris. He has not pretended to fix the day, or the month in which St. Patrick was born. If indeed he had stated, that the saint was born early in the year any time before the 17th of March, his calculation would have been wrong, and Harris' objection would be of weight. But supposing St. Patrick's birth to have occurred during some part of the year after the 17th of March, it would follow of course that, to make him die after having completed his 120th year, he must have been born in the year 372. Harris calculated worse also than Colgan, who, as he ought to have remembered, did not give to St. Patrick full 120 years of life, observing that, in his computation, 18 days were wanting to complete that number.

The above mentioned tradition concerning St. Patrick's baptism on a Wednesday is found in an old document called the book of Sligo, in which we read, according to Usher's interpretation, that St. Patrick was born, baptized, and died on a Wednesday. (5) Usher did not attempt to draw any consequences from what is said of the birth and baptism; but he availed himself of the datum that St. Patrick died on a Wednesday, and thence, in opposition to various jarring computations, which he had met with in the course of his reading, concluded that the year of our saint's death was 493, whereas in that year the 17th of March fell on Wednesday. It is indeed true, that not only Jocelin, but, what is of much greater weight, the Annals of Ulster had assigned it to that year, although, as will be seen lower down, it is observed in them, that some documents place it in 458, the year to which it is assigned also by Giraldus Cambrensis and others. The register of Glastonbury, Capgrave, &c. have A. D. 472; the Anglican Martyrology A. D. 481. The greater part of the chroniclers, such as Marianus Scotus, Sigebert, Florence of Worcester, &c. &c. have A. D. 491. Next comes a variety of statements concerning the number of years, which St. Patrick lived, and consequently as to the year in which he was born. Marianus Scotus gives him 92 years, which Baronius thought should be read 82. But Usher alleges the authority of a MS. copy of Marianus, in which the saint's age is said to have been 122 years, which number is given also by Sigebert and other chroniclers. The Annals of Boyle, William of Malmesbury, &c. have 111 years, Stanihurst 97. Probus, and the third Life have 132 years; an Anglo-Saxon martyrology quoted by Usher 131, which number agrees with an old breviary of Rheims, in which St. Patrick is said to have died when he reached his 132d year. Jocelin's computation of 123 years was, I suspect, derived from the 132 of Probus, for which Jocelin, thinking it too great an age, supposed that we ought to read 123; i. e. by inverting CXXXII into CXXIII. (6) But 120 became at length the favourite number; for it best agreed with the conformities sought to be found between St. Patrick and Moses. They were said to be like each other in four respects; I. They both heard an angel speaking from a bush. II. They both fasted 40 days and 40 nights. III. Their years were the same, viz. 120. IV. Where their mortal remains are is not known. (7) This number of years was also very convenient for the division of the various periods of St. Patrick's life into even numbers. Thus his age began to be divided into four equal periods of 30 years each, two of which were elapsed when he arrived on his mission in Ireland, while the two latter were so arranged as to leave one of them for his active and apostolic proceedings, and the other until his death for retirement. (8) A Scholiast of Nennius divided the 120 years only into three parts of 40 years each, the last of which was that, during which he preached in Ireland. (9) Jocelin, whose numbers were not even, divided his 123 years of our saint's life into three unequal portions of 55, 35, and 33. (10)

(1) Usher Ind. Chronol. ad A. 372—493, and the pages of Primordia there referred to.

(2) Tr. Th. p. 234.

(3) Aengussius in his Festilogium says at 5 April; “Baptismus magni Patricii coepit in Hibernia:” and the Martyrologium Tam-lactense has; “Baptisma Patricii venit ad Hiberniam. See Tr. Th. p. 232.

(4) Archbishops of Armagh, p. 7.

(5) Pr. p. 882. Usher wrong as to the baptism. See not. 3. and below Chap. V. §. vi.

(6) See on these subjects Usher, p. 879 to 885, and Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 232, seqq.

(7) “ In quatuor rebus similis fuit Moysi Patricius. I. Angelum de rubo audivit. II. Quadraginta diebus et quadraginta noctibus jejunavit. III. Annos CXX peregit in vita praesenti. IV. Ubi sunt ossa ejus nemo novit.” (Tirechan ap. Usher, p. 887.) Nennius (quoted ib.) has; “ Quatuor modis aequantur Moyses et Patricius;” and then he goes on stating the same conformities, except his adding, at the second, that they both fasted on a mountain. M. Florilegus ad A. 491 has followed Nennius. The compiler of the Tripartite was so pleased with these conformities, that, although elsewhere (L. 3. c. 103.) he says that St. Patrick died in the 122d year of his age, he has given them to his readers and added some others. (L. 2. c. 63.)

(8) Usher’s Tripartite has; “ Anno sexagesimo aetatis suae missus a Celestino Papa ad praedicandum in Hiberniam beatissimus archiepiscopus Patricius venit. Aliis sexaginta annis in Hibernia vixit; triginta annis praedicando et baptizando per diversas Hiberniae provincias; aliis vero triginta annis in suis cellis et in monasteriis theorice vixit. (Pr. p. 873.) In the same strain we have the following verses taken from a spurious tract called St. Patrick’s Testament, and translated into Latin.

Ter denis annis versatus in aede Saballi,
Ter denis aliis peragravi laetus Iernam:
Centum et vicanos annos vivendo peregi;

Praesentem ad noctem hanc seclum producitur istud. (See ib. p. 887, and Ware, Opusc. S. P. p. 109. A division of the first 60 years into thirties is proposed by Usher, p. 886.

(9) “ Quadragenarius erat quando de captivitate exivit, et per 40 annos didicit et Deo servivit, et 40 praedicavit. In his tribus quadragenariis maxime Patricius aequatur Moysi. Nam sicut Moyses fuit 40 annis in domo Pharaonis velut in captivitate, et 40 in exilio in terra Madian, et 40 in praedicatione,” &c. ap. Usher, p. 886.

(10) Jocelin, cap. 191.

§. II. Passing by these whimsical speculations, and certain extravagant hypotheses relative to the year in which St. Patrick was born, (11) let us now endeayour to lay down some fixed principles, which may lead us to as near the truth as can be expected upon a subject, that has been so much darkened by conjectures and wild suppositions. Baronius and Petavius were of opinion, that the number CXXXII of Probus (the years of St. Patrick's life) was originally LXXXII, which through a mistake in transcribing was changed into the former by merely substituting c for l. (12) The Bollandists adopted this correction, (13) and undertook, in conformity with it, to determine the times of our saint's birth and death. They assigned the former to A. D. 377, and the latter to 460, thus giving him full 82 years of age. Next they drew up a chronological arrangement of the principal transactions of his life, in which, however, we find more of conjecture and ingenuity than of solid argument founded on historical facts. (14) For instance, who will not smile on finding them gravely calculating the sixty years, vulgarly assigned to St. Patrick's mission in Ireland, from the time that he was about 22 years of age and not long returned from captivity? It is true that, instead of calling the sixty years those of his mission, they give them the name of the sixty years of his apostolic life. It would have been better to give up the whole story of the sixty years than to strive to defend it by such quibbling. Equally nugatory are the calculations, by which, with a show of precision, they attempted to fix the times of certain journies of our Apostle to Rome after his mission had commenced; for no such journies ever took place, as will be seen hereafter.

(11) Ex. c. that of Stanihurst, who, after some writers, assigns his birth to A. D. 361; and, what is still more absurd, the date, A. D. 336 marked for it in the Annals of Connaught.

(12) See Tillemont, Mem. &c. Tom. XVI. p. 783. Colgan also thought that the CXXXII was owing to an error of transcription; but he supposed that the original reading was CXXII. Tr. Th. p. 232.

(13) Comment. Praev. ad v. S. Patr. §. 5.

(14) Porter has followed the Bollandists in their doubts concerning the great number of years commonly allowed for St. Patrick's life, and also in some of their chronological arrangements. (Compend. Annal. Eccl. R. Hib. p. 126.)

§. III. To Tillemont, who had studied St. Patrick's tracts with much attention, is due the merit of having been the first to point out a right mode of discovering the true period relative to St. Patrick's life; and, had he been better acquainted with Irish history, he would have made still further progress in clearing up the whole matter. Having taken particular notice of some passages in the Confession, in which St. Patrick speaks of his promotion to the episcopacy, and of his being long known to the people of Ireland, he thence concluded that St. Patrick was consecrated when about 45 years of age. (15) I do not agree with him as to some other points, particularly his bringing St. Patrick to Ireland so late as A. D. 440; whereas there can be no doubt but that his arrival on the mission took place in the year 432. But I acknowledge my obligation to him for having marked out the passages alluded to, from which, when combined with some other circumstances, I think we may come near a consistent chronological account of our saint's life. At the time that St. Patrick had determined on preaching the Gospel in Ireland, and when he was to be ordained bishop for that purpose, a certain person, who had been long a friend of his, reminded him of a fault, which he had committed when a foolish boy scarcely 15 years of age, and not content with such private admonition and with telling him that he was unworthy of the episcopacy, announced said fault to the whole congregation. The saint had confessed this fault before he became a deacon, and in the bitterness of his sorrow communicated it to that person as his friend. Yet notwithstanding his having repented of it, and the consideration of his having been at the time so very young and uninformed, which, however strict the discipline of the church was with regard to candidates for holy orders, might have served as pleas of indulgence, and actually did so prior to his deaconship, that friend came forward after thirty years to expose him in public. Those thirty years must be counted from the time the fault had been committed; for St. Patrick meant to show that, after having fallen into it, he had passed many years of an irreproachable life. He adds, that the shame of having been thus denounced for what had happened so long before was near overwhelming him with grief; but that in the night of the same day he was informed in a vision, that the exposure of his name was disapproved of by the Almighty, and was encouraged to keep up his spirits and to persevere in his determination. (16) Another passage pointed out by Tillemont is that, wherein, treating of his pastoral exertions, he says, that God and the people of Ireland know how he behaved himself among them from the time of his youth. (17) Now, had he been sixty years old when he undertook his mission, according to the vulgar opinion, or more than between forty and fifty, would he have spoken of himself as then a young man?

(15) Memoires, &c. Tom. XVI. S. Patrice; Art. 2. and Notes.

(16) See Confess. p. 10, 11, 12. Out of all this affecting narrative, the substance only of which I have given, I shall quote but his return of thanks to God for his having comforted him and encouraged him not to desist from his purpose; “Idcirco gratias ago ei, qui me in omnibus confortavit, ut non me impediret a perfectione quam statueram, et de meo quoque opere, quod a Christo didiceram.” p. 11.

(17) Vos scitis et Deus, qualiter apud vos conversatus sum a juventute mea, et fide veritatis et in sinceritate cordis.” Ib. p. 18.

§. iv. Following what has been now stated St. Patrick was 45 years old, or perhaps only in his 45th year when he was consecrated bishop. His consecration must, as will be shown, have taken place either in the year 432 or towards the latter end of 431. Thus then we may assign his birth to A. D. 387. (18) This leads us to the discovery of the time of his captivity, which, as he tells us, happened when he was about sixteen years of age, (19) and consequently some time, and perhaps late, in the year 403. This year formed part of a period much spoken of in Irish history. At that time the renowned Niell Naoigiallach or Niell of the nine hostages, king of Ireland, after having ravaged the coasts of G. Britain was plundering the maritime districts of the Gauls, until he was killed by a countryman of his own in the year 404 or 405, and, what comes very much to our purpose, near the Portus Iccius, and therefore not far from Boulogne. (20) Keating, who, as we have seen, (21) makes Armorica the scene of St. Patrick's captivity, assigns it to the expedition of this Niell. Having given a quotation from a MS. in which St. Patrick is said to have been brought to Ireland during the reign of Niell, who plundered Britain, England, and Gaul, he subjoins; "It is more than probable that, when this Irish prince had finished his design upon the kingdom of Wales, he carried his arms in a fleet to France—and from thence he led St. Patrick—into captivity." (22) I find in Keating but one expedition of Niell to the coasts of Gaul, during which he says in another place (23) that St. Patrick and 200 of the noblest youth were brought away. Nor has O'Flaherty more than one expedition of his to that country; so that, how many soever might have been his or the expeditions of other Irish chiefs against the maritime parts of G. Britain, (24) this against Gaul must have been the one in which St. Patrick was made captive. Consequently this event occurred in the latter end of Niell Naoigiallach's reign and not so early as the ninth year of it, as stated in the passage above referred to, which has been quoted by Keating. (25) For we have no authority for his having visited Gaul at any time until the period already given, and which is so clearly marked in Irish history. Our saint's captivity may then be safely assigned to A. D. 403, and to a time not long prior to Niell's death. Thus the dates of his birth and captivity, considering the circumstances now mentioned, help to confirm each other, and combined with his age at consecration authorize us to place his birth in the year 387.

(18) It is remarkable, that the 17th of March fell on Wednesday in the year 387. This will help us to understand the drift of the passage from the book of Sligo as to its assigning St. Patrick's birth to a Wednesday. According to the usual style of the martyrologies the 17th of March used to be marked as the Natale or Natalis of St. Patrick, that is, the day of his heavenly birth or first appearante in heaven. This manner of speaking not being understood by some persons gave rise to a notion that he was born, in this world, on that day, in the same manner as it caused the mistake of those, who believed that Scotland or Ireland was his country. (See Usher, p. 820 and Tr. Th. p. 221). On the other hand the Irish Calendars and Annals placed his death, or requies on that day; and hence the 17th of March was considered as the anniversary of his birth as well as death. Now assigning his birth to A. D. 387 we have the Wednesday sought for. Usher knowing that it would not answer for his year 372 overlooked the matter. Nor would it do for Colgan's 373; for in neither of these years did March 17 fall on a Wednesday.

(19) "Annorum eram tunc fere sedecim". Conf. p. 1.

(20) Colgan writes; (Tr. Th. p. 449.) "Niellus Naoigiallacha—anno imperii 27 et Christi 405, occubuit juxta Portum Iccium in Gallia, a quodam sicario insidiatore e sua gente, nempe Eochodio filio Ennii Kenselaich interfectus." I suspect that Niell's death took place rather in the year 404; for it was in 405, according to Colgan (ib.) and O'Flaherty (Ogygia, p. 413) that Dathias (Dathy) his successor ascended the throne; and it is probable, that some delay as to his being recognized king occurred in consequence of Niell's having fallen far from his own country, and of the time requisite for the proceedings in appointing a new sovereign. (See Ware, Antiq. Chap. X. Harris' ed.) O'Flaherty relating the same circumstance adds, that it happened near the Loire, and that Neill was killed by a poisoned arrow shot across that river; "Niellus rex dum Aremoricam bello premeret ab Achaio (Eochaid) filio Ennii Kennsalii (Eana Kinselagh) rege Lageniae ob veteres inimicitias venenata sagitta trans Ligerim jacta propter mare Ictium confossus est." (Ogyg. p. 403.) Lynch (Cambr. Evers. p. 299.) had also mentioned the Loire, but omitted other circumstances given by O'Flaherty, whose account of the place, where the transactions occurred, is quite contradictory. For surely the Loire was never supposed to be near the part of the sea called Ictium, and which got that name from being near the Portus Ictius or Ictius, of which above; Chap. III. §. ix. O'Flaherty quotes Usher to show, that the Mare Iccium extended as far as the Loire. But Usher says no such thing; what he has (Pr. p. 8.) is this; "Est autem mare Icht (Iccium) ut ex Albei etiam et Declani Vitis didicimus, illud quod Galliam et Britanniam interfluit." This is the same as if he had told us that it is the part of the sea, which we now call the streights of Dover. Nor could Usher or any one moderately skilled in geography speak of the sea near the Loire as flowing between Gaul and G. Britain. What puzzled O'Flaherty was, that he wished to reconcile what he read in Lynch about the Loire with what Colgan and the old documents have about Niell having been killed near the Portus Iccius. The right way to reconcile those passages would have been to observe, that Lynch was mistaken as to the Loire, Ligeris, instead of which he should have written Liana, Liane, the small river that falls into the sea below Boulogne. Across that river a man might have shot an arrow; but where could a person be found strong enough to make an arrow fly from one side to the other of the Loire, near where it joins the ocean? While I am on the subject of Niell Naoigiallach I cannot but express my astonishment, that Usher has spoken of him as reigning in the year 360 (Ind. Chron.) and that he followed the wretched authority of his Tripartite, according to which Niell's reign would have commenced A. D. 352. (See Pr. p. 587.) Usher knew that Niell reigned only about 27 years (ib.); and consequently, according to his computation, he should have died about A. 479, a date quite repugnant with Irish history, and with the circumstance, that between the reign of Niell and his son Leogaire there intervened only about 24 years, during which was the reign of Dathy. Now Usher himself places the commencement of Leogaire's reign A. D. 427. It is odd, that he paid attention to a work, which in the very same passage brings St. Patrick a captive to Ireland in the first year of the emperor Julian; i. e. A. 361.

(21) Chap. III. §. ix.

(22) Hist. of Ireland; B. 1. p. 156. Soon after he mentions these circumstances as evident.

(23) Ib. p. 149.

(24) See Usher p. 828. Fiech's Scholiast speaks of seven sons of a Factmudius a British king, who ravaging Armorica killed St. Patrick's father and made himself a prisoner. Probus has a similar story (L. 1. c. 12) but calls that king Rethmitus, and adds that the saint's mother was also killed on that occasion. Now it is clear from the Confession p. 9. that his parents were still alive after his return from captivity. As to the names Factmudius, Rethmitus, Fectmacius, &c. it is probable that they were latinized corruptions of the Irish word Fommaire or Fammaire a pirate, or depredator at sea. (See Lynch's Life of St. Patrick; chap. 8.) As St. Patrick was known to have been taken and brought to Ireland by persons of that description, it may be conjectured, that some Irish story-teller, wishing to save the honour of his country, strove to throw the blame of that act on the Britons, and thus gave occasion to what has been said about the seven sons of king Factmudius. St. Patrick himself gives us to understand in his letter against Coroticus, that he was taken by people from Ireland; "Numquid piam misericordiam ago erga gentem illam, quae me aliquando ceperunt, &c.?"

(25) The passage quoted by Usher from his Tripartite, of which above Not. 20. has this same ninth year of Niell's reign as that, in which St. Patrick was made captive. But the author thought that this happened in G. Britain. His ignorance of the history of those times was so great, that he identified the first year of the emperor Julian with the 9th of Niell Naoigiallach.

§. v. According to Fiech's hymn his first name was Succat. This would have been an odd name for the son of a Calpornius and the grandson of a Potitus. I do not mean to deny, that such a name was applied to our saint, not however as his original one but as a sort of surname after the commencement of his mission. Probus, who writes it Sochet, seems to speak of it as an additional name. (26) Stanihurst has Suchar or Socher. (27) If this be the true reading, we might suppose that it was given to St. Patrick as an epithet to indicate his meekness; for Socair in Irish means mildness, ease, and also plain, smooth, &c. If the name was Succat, I know not how to account for it better than by deriving it from Succa, a word signifying, in low Latinity, a linen garment worn in public by bishops. (28) In this hypothesis St. Patrick might have been styled the Succat, as a person wearing a succa, a circumstance quite new to the Irish in his time. He never speaks of himself under any other name than Patricius. Were we to believe Fiech's Scholiast, he got this name from Pope Celestine, when he was ordained bishop; although, as will be seen below, Celestine was not the person who ordained him. This is like the other story of his having been called Magonius by St. German of Auxerre. (29)

(26) "Sanctus Patricius, qui et Sochet vocabatur." Probus L. 1. c. 1. In the second Life (cap. 12) it is written Succet; and in the Tripartite (L. 1. c. 17.) Suchat.

(27) De Vita S. Patricii; Lib. 1. (28) Ducange at Succa.

(29) These trifles are summed up by Fiech's Scholiast in the following words; "Succat primum nomen ejus in baptismo a parentibus suis: Cathraige nomen ei inditum servitutis tempore in Hibernia; Magonius, i. e. magis agens quam caeteri monachi, nomen ejus tempore discipulatus apud Germanum: Patricius vero vocatus tempore suae ordinationis; et Celestinus Petri comorbanus sive successor est qui hoc ei nomen indidit." Schol. 6. We find similar stories in the second Life and in the Tripartite, loc. cit. Not. 26.

§. VI. On being brought to Ireland St. Patrick was obliged, according to some accounts, to serve four different families, (30) or, as others say, four brothers; (31) from which circumstance, we are told, he got the surname of Cothraige or Cathraige. (32) One of those four masters, whether a brother of the others or not, perceiving that he was faithful and diligent, and wishing to have him to himself, purchased him from his partners. This man's name was Milcho, or Miliac. He lived in that part of Dalaradia, which is now comprized within the county of Antrim. Some say that he was a prince; others that he was a magus, that is, invested with a religious function; and others represent him only as a rich man. (33) St. Patrick calls his master merely a man, (34) without adding any thing concerning his situation in life. With that profound humility, which every line written by this truly great saint breathes, he tells us that he had been very negligent and careless about religion when a boy; but that, when finding himself in his miserable state of slavery, God opened his eyes and brought him to a sense of his duty and a sincere sorrow for his former transgressions. (35) His occupation was to tend sheep, (36) an employment that allowed him sufficient leisure for attending to his devotional practices, in which he was so assiduous that he would at times repeat a hundred prayers during the day and nearly as many more at night; and that whether on a mountain or in a forest, amidst snow, frost, or rain, he used to rise before day-light for the purpose of praying; so lively was his faith, charity, and fear of God, and so fervently did he feel the operation of the Holy Spirit. (37) To this recital of St. Patrick's religious pursuits Probus has added, that he used also frequently to peruse the psalms and hymns, (38) as if indeed he could have found books containing them in the North of Ireland at that period, or, when suddenly made a prisoner, had time to provide himself with religious tracts, or, while still a careless boy, was anxious about them.

(30) Fiech's hymn, Stroph. 3. Second Life, cap. 12.

(31) 4th Life, cap. 15.

(32) Fiech's hymn, ib. The Tripartite has; (L. 1 cap. 17.) "Cothraige, quod quatuor familias denotat, appellatus est, quia quatuor familiis debebat inservire." Colgan observes that, to spell it correctly, it should be Ceothir-tegh, from Ceothir, four, and tegh, a house. (Tr. Th. p. 17.)

(33) Probus, who says nothing about the four families, relates that St. Patrick was on his arrival in Ireland apud quemdam gentilem immitem regem in servitute detentus. (L. 1. c. 2.) Jocelin calls his master a petty king; "regulo paganissimo, Milchoni nomine, in aquilonari parte ejusdem insulae principanti in servitutum venditur." (cap. 13.) Fiech's Scholiast has; "Est hic Michul sive Milchuo, filius Hua Buani, rex aquilonaris Dal-aradiae." (Schol. 8.) Tirechan writes; "Cothirthiac (Patricius) servivit quatuor domibus magorum; et empsit illum unus ex eis, cui nomen erat Miliac Mac-Cuboin magus;" (ap. Usher p. 829.) In the second Life we are told, that the saint "in regionem Dailaraidi devectus—quatuor divitibus cum omni cordis devotione servivit. Videns autem unus eorum, nomine Miliuc, quod esset servus fidelis, emit eum ab aliis ut sibi soli serviret." (cap. 12.) Concerning Dal-aradia see more below; Chap. V. §. III.

(34) "Intermisi hominem, cum quo fueram sex annis." Conf. p. 6.

(35) "Deum verum ignorabam—Et ibi (in Ireland) Dominus aperuit sensum incredulitatis meae, ut vel sero rememorarem delicta mea, et ut converterer toto corde ad Dominum Deum meum, qui respexit humilitatem meam, et misertus est adolescentiae et ignorantiae meae, et custodivit me antequam scirem eum," &c. Confess. p. 1, 2. And p. 5. "Scio illud certissime, quia utique, priusquam humiliarer, ego eram velut lapis qui jacet in luto profundo; et venit qui potens est, et in sua misericordia sustulit me." From these passages the reader may judge what opinion is to be formed concerning the miracles attributed by Jocelin and others to St. Patrick when a boy, of which, however, neither Fiech's hymn, nor the Scholiast, nor Probus make any mention.

(36) Jocelin (cap. 13.) and the Tripartite (L. 1. c. 18.) have changed the sheep into hogs; and Harris with wonderful sagacity makes St. Patrick write, that his constant business was to feed the hogs, although even Jocelin says only, that the saint was entrusted with the care of a drove of hogs; “Patricius porcorum custodiae mancipatur;” that is, while those animals were roving and feeding on acorns or whatever else might fall in their way through the forests, mountains, &c. Harris, who was probably unacquainted with this practice, which is so general to this day on the continent, thought the saint was employed in feeding them in troughs. Had that been the case, he would have had but little time for the prayers, which he was so constant in repeating. What makes Harris’ blunder still worse is, that he is there striving to put in English St. Patrick’s own words, among which we find mentioned not hogs but sheep. I am sorry that Lynch (Hist. of S. P. ch. 10) has copied that wretched translation of Harris. But he had not the Confession before him; for, if he had, he would not have translated pecora by hogs.

(37) “Sed postquam Hiberionem (St. Patrick constantly calls Ireland Hiberione) deveneram, quotidie pecora pascebam et frequens in die orabam; magis ac magis accedebat amor Dei et timor ipsius, et fides augebatur, et spiritus augebatur, ut in die una usque ad centum orationes, et in nocte prope similiter; ut etiam in silvis et monte manebam, et ante lucem excitabar ad orationem per nivem, per gelu, per pluviam, et nihil mali sentiebam, neque ulla pigritia erat in me—quia tunc in me Spiritus fervebat.” Conf. p. 6. The mountain here alluded to is said to have been that of Mis, or, as it is called at present, Sliebh-mis in Antrim. See Fiech’s Scholiast, No. 9. and Tripartite, L. 1. c. 19.

(38) “Frequenter enim psalmos et hymnos ruminabat.” (L. 1. c. 2.) Jocelin goes still further; for he says (cap. 12) that St. Patrick, from a very early time of his life, used to read the whole Psalter every day. Compare with Not. 35.

§. VII. Passing over some idle stories relative to our saint’s proceedings during his servitude, (39) I must remark that there is no foundation for what we read in some of his Lives concerning his having been often favoured at that time with the converse of an angel Victor, or that it was said Angel who answered to him that the period was arrived for his liberation from captivity. (40) This angel Victor was introduced in consequence of a mistake founded upon what St. Patrick relates concerning a vision, which he had some years later, and in which he thought he saw a man of the name of Victoricus as if coming to him from Ireland. For Victoricus some read Victor, (41) and certain circumstances of two distinct visions were confounded together. St. Patrick indeed tells us, that he was informed in his sleep, that the time of his liberation was arrived, but makes no mention of either an angel or the name of an angel. His account of the whole transaction is very clear. He says, that on a night he heard, while asleep, a voice announcing to him; "Thou fastest well, and soon art to go to thine own country." After a little time he heard again; "Behold, a ship is ready for you." And the ship was not near where he lived, but about 200 miles off, (42) and in a part of Ireland, where he never had been, nor was acquainted with any one. He then betook himself to flight and got off from the man, with whom he had been for six years. (43) "And I came," he adds, "in the power of the Lord who directed my course towards a good end, (44) and I was under no apprehension until I arrived at where the ship was. It was then clearing out, and I called for a passage. The master of the vessel got angry, and said to me; Do not pretend to come with us. (45) On hearing this I retired for the purpose of going to the cabin, where I had been received as a guest, and while going thither, I began to pray. But, before I had finished my prayer, I heard one of the men crying out with a loud voice after me; Come quickly, for they are calling you; and immediately I returned. And they said to me; Come, we receive thee on faith; (46) be our friend just as it may be agree“able to you. We then set sail, and after three days “reached land.” (47)

(39) Jocelin (cap. 14.) and the Tripartite (L. 1. c. 20.) have a fable concerning a certain vision of Milcho and its explanation by St. Patrick; and how a time would come when, on his preaching to them, Milcho's two daughters (the Tripartite adds a son of his Guasactus) would become Christians, while Milcho himself would remain in his infidelity. Now it is plain from our saint's own testimony, that neither at that time, nor for many years after, had he the least idea of ever being employed as a missionary in Ireland. See Conf. p. 6.

(40) The angel Victor appears in Fiech's hymn as ordering St. Patrick to go beyond sea. The Scholiast adds, that he came to him in the form of a bird. I find the same stuff in the Tripartite (L. 1. c. 19.) together with the statement, that our saint was accustomed to enjoy daily and familiar conversations with that angel. The second and third Lives follow Fiech's hymn. The fourth has an angel as acting on that occasion, but does not give his name. Jocelin, who was never behind, when opportunities of this kind occurred, has a flowery description of the angel Victor appearing under a human form, and relates part of the conversation. (cap. 15.) Probus often mentions an angel as conversing with St. Patrick and directing him how to act, but does not call him by any particular name.

(41) It is worth observing, that the author of the 4th Life, who gives no name to the angel, calls the man, that appeared as if coming from Ireland, not Victoricus but Victor. (cap. 25.) The reverse of this mistake occurs in the second Life, cap. 14. where the angel is called Victoricus. Of Victoricus more hereafter.

(42) “Ecce navis tua parata est; et non erat prope, sed forte habebat ducenta millia passus.” (Conf. p. 6.) Probus, following the Confession nearly word for word, has also ducenta millia passuum. (L. 1. c. 3.) The Tripartite, quoting the Latin text of St. Patrick, has “forte habebat ducenta millia passuum.” (L. 1. c. 22) Jocelin, (cap. 15.) says, that the place was distant ducentis millibus passuum. The third Life has “quasi ducentis millibus passuum;” (cap. 14.) and the fourth, quoting, in like manner as the Tripartite, from St. Patrick himself, has; “Spatium 200 mille passuum erat usque ad locum," &c. (cap. 21.) Harris, although he affects to follow the Confession, omits the distance of the place where the ship was lying, and merely says, that St. Patrick "made all the haste he could to the sea side, and found a ship," &c. thus wishing to make the reader think, that the vessel was within no great distance of where the saint was. He was aware that the circumstance of a ship, destined by Providence for carrying St. Patrick back to his own country, being placed about 200 miles from Antrim, could not be well reconciled with the hypothesis of St. Patrick's being a native of the country now called Scotland, a country so near the Antrim coast that they can be seen from each other, and between which there could not have been wanting frequent communications and opportunities for crossing to either side even in boats. The ship was undoubtedly lying in some part of the South of Ireland, and in a harbour or river convenient for a passage to Gaul.

(43) Probus (L. 1. c. 3) and the fourth Life (cap. 16.) have seven years; which must be understood not of seven years complete, but of the saint having been freed in the seventh year. Fiech's hymn, the Tripartite, and other accounts agree as to only six full years. See Usher p. 830, and Colgan Tr. Th. p. 236. In some of those tracts it is said, that there was a law in Ireland, according to which slaves should become free in the seventh year. The Tripartite has; "Gentilis enim ille populus solebat servos septimo servitutis anno manumissos libertate donare, nisi ipsi sponte velint amplius servire." (L. 1. c. 21.) They tell us, that this was conformable to the practice of the Hebrews; more Hebraeorum; (ib. cap. 18. Second Life, cap. 12. Fourth, cap. 16.) But those writers forgot, that the privilege granted in the Mosaic law to slaves, as to their being freed in the seventh year, was relative only to native Hebrews, and was not extended to strangers. (See Levitic. XXV. 39—46.) Accordingly St. Patrick was not in the same situation with regard to his Irish master, as a Hebrew servant would have been relatively to his Hebrew master. Did such a law exist among the ancient Irish, it would add to the many arguments adduced by my late learned and valuable friend General Vallancey to prove the oriental origin of the Irish nation. Whether they had such a practice or not, St. Patrick was authorized to escape, as soon as he could, from a state of servitude, into which he had been forced against his will. Nor was there any necessity for the fable, which the Scholiast, the Tripartite, Jocelin, &c. have concerning the lump of gold found in the ground, wherewith he might pay his ransom. It is strange, that Butler's account of St. Patrick has six months instead of six years.

(44) "Et veni in virtute Domini, qui viam meam ad bonum dirigebat." p. 7. I doubt whether bonum means here good, that is, a good end or purpose, or should be taken as the name of a place. The Bollandists, in their edition of the Confession, instead of bonum have Benum, and with them the whole passage runs thus; In virtute Dei, qui vitam meam dirigebat, veni ad Benum." They interpret it the river Boyne. But surely the Boyne is by no means so far from any part of Antrim as 200 miles. I find, however, that Fiech's Scholiast brings St. Patrick in his escape to the Boyne; (Schol. 9.) but then, in opposition to the Confession and all the authorities quoted above, (Not. 42.) he makes St. Patrick travel only 60 miles, or, he adds, as others say, one hundred. If Benum be the true reading, which is really very probable, it is not to be understood of the Boyne, the Latin name of which was, according to Ptolemy, Buvinda, not Boandum as Colgan writes it, or Boinum as Usher sometimes does in compliment to modern readers. Benum agrees much better with Bantry, the ancient name of which, or rather of the district, or, as now called, the barony, was Bentraighe, that is, the shore of the Ben (traigh shore, Lhuyd and Shaw, Ir. Dictionary) so that Ben, latinized into Benum, was the name of the bay, and Bentraighe that of the adjoining territory. Bentraighe is spoken of in the Life of St. Cannera, (AA. SS. at 28 Jan.) it being the district in which she was born. (See also Smith, Hist. of Cork, vol. 1. p. 39. and Seward at Bantry.) Near the bay is a place called Adragoal or Ardgoal, probably so named from a colony of Gauls that settled there. This circumstance, together with its favourable position, might have made it a resort of Gallic navigators. The distance of about 200 (Roman) miles answers very well, taking a straight line through the central parts of Ireland. Or if bonum, as in Ware's edition, was a proper name, it might signify the river now called Bandon (a and o used indiscriminately, see Baxter at Bonium) which falls into the sea at Kinsale, a harbour quite convenient for an intercourse with Gaul. It must however be acknowledged that Benum seems to be the genuine reading ; for it is more likely that a transcriber on meeting with benum, the meaning of which he did not understand, would have changed it into bonum, than that he would write benum for bonum, a word of obvious and well known import. As to what the Scholiast has about the Boyne on this occasion, he does not say that it was there St. Patrick embarked, but has a story about one Kienan, that sold him to certain sailors, by whom, on Kienan's repenting of what he had done, he was set at liberty ; " and afterwards," adds this bungler, " Kienan was baptized by St. Patrick ;" thus confounding the time of St. Kienan of Duleek's conversion, which occurred during our Apostle's mission, with that of the escape from captivity.

(45) Probus L. 1. c. 4. makes the master of the ship say ; " Nequaquam tu nobiscum ibis sine naulo ;" as if his reason for not giving him a passage was that, as Probus states, St. Patrick had acknowledged he had no money to pay for it. This circumstance is certainly very probable, although the saint himself does not mention it.

(46) " Veni quia ex fide recipimus te." Conf. p. 7. The expression ex fide is probably to be understood of their giving him a passage on his word or credit, and that they would wait for payment until his arrival in Gaul. The saint observes, that those men were Gentiles.

(47) " Protinus navigavimus, et post triduum terram cepimus." This was merely the regular time of a passage with a fair wind from Bantry bay or Kinsale, &c. to any of the ports of Normandy or Britany. These three days have puzzled poor Harris, following his preconceived idea that, as St. Patrick was going to his own country, his voyage was directed to the West of Great Britain. Accordingly, to patch up the matter, he tells us that St. Patrick " is said to have had a bad voyage, having been three days on sea." Now Harris' favourite Jocelin says, (cap. 17.) that the wind was very fair ; " Ventis ad vota spirantibus, vela committentes post triduum applicuerunt." See also fourth Life, cap. 23. Neither St. Patrick himself nor Probus says any thing about unfavourable winds. The Tripartite indeed (L. 1. c. 25.) mentions a storm, which, it is plain, was introduced for the purpose of making St. Patrick perform a miracle by quelling it. There is a passage elsewhere in Probus (L. 1. c. 14.) in which a voyage, distinct from the one we are now treating of, is mentioned, during part of which the wind was contrary; but that voyage is stated to have lasted twelve days.

§. VIII. That the land, in which they disembarked, was Gallic ground appears not only from all the circumstances, which have been now considered, but likewise from Fiech's hymn and the Scholiast. In the former we read, that crossing the sea he went beyond Albion and remained in Letha. (48) The latter makes the angel say to St. Patrick, that the time was come for his going beyond sea to apply to study, and then places him in Gaul as studying there. (49) In two breviaries of Rheims, one published A. D. 1612, and the other of a more ancient date, it is stated, that the persons, with whom he sailed from Ireland, were merchants from Gaul, and that they brought him to Treguier in Britany. (50) St. Patrick was still at a considerable distance from his native place; for he did not reach it until 28 days after, having travelled through a deserted country. (51) While on their way, he and his fellow travellers became destitute of provisions, and were near perishing through want of food. The chief man (52) among them said to him; "Christian, what dost thou say? Thy God is great and all-powerful. Why then canst thou not pray for us, as we are in such danger of famine?" The saint desired them to turn with faith and their whole hearts to the Lord God, and that, as nothing is impossible to him, he may send them food in abundance. And, with the assistance of the Almighty, so it happened. For, behold, a drove of swine appeared full in their view, of which having killed many they stopped for two nights to recover and refresh themselves. They returned the greatest thanks to God, and showed great respect for St. Patrick. They found also some wild honey, and offered him part of it. But one of them said; "this is an offering; thanks to God." On hearing this, the saint would not taste any thing. (53) From St. Patrick's saying, that he tasted nothing, it does not follow that he abstained from food during the remainder of the journey, and much less that he ate nothing for 20 days, as some story-tellers would have us believe. (54) On the night of that day Satan fell upon him in his sleep like a huge stone, and rendered him powerless. But on his invoking the assistance of Elias he was soon freed from that dreadful pressure. (55) St. Patrick makes mention of no other circumstances, that might have occurred until he reached his native place, which must have been in the year 409 or 410.

(48) Stroph. 5. For Alpes, which Colgan's translation has, he tells us himself in a note ad loc. that we are to read Albion according to an old marginal remark. He has shamefully translated the Letha of the hymn by Latium; for the author meant a part of Gaul, as appears from his connecting it with the residence of St. German. (About Letha or Llydaw see above chap. III. and note 82.) Colgan was not the first, who mistook Letha for Latium. In the second Life (cap. 17.) the voice announcing to St. Patrick his liberation from captivity is made to say, that a ship was ready for him that he might go to Italy. The author, or, perhaps, the translator, mistaking Letha for Latium, thought the text would be better understood by his writing Italy. His mistake, however, shows what he had found in older documents and that some part of Gaul was the country, for which the vessel sailed.

(49) Schol. 9, 10. As to Jocelin's saying that St. Patrick sailed to Britain, meaning G. Britain, it is sufficient to observe, that he had no foundation for it, and that, as he has frequently done, he adapted his narrative to the opinion that our saint was a native of that country.

(50) "Galliae mercatoribus, qui ipsum advexerunt ad Trecorensem minoris Britanniae civitatem." Ap. Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 194. In the parallel passage of the other Rheims breviary, ib. p. 195, there is an error of the press, Turonensem for Trecorensem. The error is quite palpable; for the text goes on thus, "Turonensem minoris Britanniae urbem vectus." Now Tours was never comprized in Britany, nor do ships go up so far the Loire. Colgan's collections are full of such errors, which render very many parts of them exceedingly obscure. It is very probable, that from this tradition of St. Patrick having landed at Treguier was derived what we find in one or two of the Lives concerning his arrival on that occasion in a Britain. The fourth Life has (cap. 23.) "Elevato velo, prospero flatu ad Britonicos sinus pervenerunt." Did the author, when writing Britonicos mean to convey the idea that he alluded to Britany? for he uses elsewhere the word Britannicus. Or was Britonicos the reading, which he had met with in a former document?

(51) "Et viginti octo dies per desertum iter fecimus." Conf. p. 7. If Treguier was, which I see no reason for questioning, the harbour where he landed, it will be easily granted that, allowing some necessary halts, that number of days was no more than a reasonable time for a journey on foot thence to Boulogne. According to Probus (cap. 9.) St. Patrick preached in various towns on the way, and made many converts. Waving other observations, what towns could he have passed through in a desert? It may be asked how could the coasts of Britany from Treguier upwards and of Normandy, &c. be called a desert? Whoever is but slightly acquainted with the state of Gaul at that period will soon answer the question. The Franks and Saxons had been ravaging those coasts as far back as the latter end of the third century, at which time Carausius was employed in resisting them. (See above chap. III. note 77.) To the incursions of the Franks, which were repeated for about 150 years before they formed the plan of establishing themselves in Gaul, add that the Vandals, Alans, Suevi, &c. ravaged the whole of the Gauls A. D. 407 and the following years. The civil wars, that came on, augmented the desolation (See Tillemont Mem. tom. X. p. 555. Ruinart, Annal. Franc. and Gibbon, Decline and fall of the Roman empire; chap. 30, 31) and we may calculate, that until about the year 417 the plunderings of that unfortunate country had but little abated. St. Patrick informs us, that many thousands of his countrymen had been made captives and dispersed amidst various nations. (Conf. p. 1. 2. In fact his country had suffered most severely. Among the plundered cities Arras and Amiens are specially mentioned. It is then not to be wondered at, that many parts of Gaul remained destitute of inhabitants, and it is probable that, as this journey was performed A. D. 409 or 410, the saint and his fellow travellers preferred taking their course through the most unfrequented tracts, lest they might fall in with some of the ferocious hordes, who were then roaming through various provinces of that country.

(52) St. Patrick designates him by the title of gubernator, the same as that which he had given to the head man of the ship, who had at first refused to take him on board. To understand this, it must be recollected, that those fellow travellers of the saint were not sailors, in our acceptation of the word, but merchants, who, according to the general custom of ancient traders, had gone themselves to Ireland to dispose of their goods there, and, after probably having purchased some articles in Ireland, were returning to their homes. The ship, we may easily suppose, was a hired one; but the managers and directors of its course were the merchants themselves. It seems that some of those merchants were from our saint's own native place, whereas he speaks of his journey in such a manner as to insinuate, that he had some companions during the whole way. An account, which occurs here and there concerning St. Patrick having been sold to those merchants, is scarcely worth noticing. From his own narrative it is clear, that they received him as a guest and wished to treat him as a friend.

(53) "Et unus ex illis dixit, hoc immolatum est: Deo gratias. Exinde nihil gustavi." Conf. p. 8. From the context it would appear, that immolatum was relative to the honey; as if that man meant to say that he considered it as a libation to his God. The term may be used either for sacrifices or for libations. St. Patrick on this occasion closely adhered to the injunction of St. Paul, who, although he teaches that idols are nothing, and that, without asking questions, it is lawful to eat whatever is sold in the market or laid before us, lays down the following rule; But if any man shall say: this is sacrificed to idols: eat not of it for his sake that showed it, and for conscience sake; for conscience sake, I say, not thy own, but another's. (1 Cor. X. 28, 29.) Probus has given a strange turn to the fact. He says that our saint's fellow travellers asked him to take some wild honey, whereas he used not to eat flesh-meat. (L. 1. c. 7.) Now in the first place it was the wild honey itself, that the saint refused to taste; and, in the second, supposing even that what was said to be immolatum was meat, St. Patrick's objection to it was not that it was such, but because it was represented as offered to a false god. From a similar 'mistatement has arisen, I believe, the fable in the Tripartite L. 1. c. 32. of how St. Patrick being one day tempted to eat pork hid some under a cask, but, having through supernatural agency repented of what he was about, he threw the meat into water, where it was transformed into fish. Jocelin has the same story cap. 23. and adds a droll practice on St. Patrick's day of some bad fasters among our ancestors with regard to what they called Patrick's fish. From that time out the saint, they say, became fully determined never to eat flesh-meat. I cannot find any sufficient authority for this statement, and I think that St. Patrick, however he might have observed the rules of such religious communities as he lived with at times, yet during his mission and when preaching the Gospel in various parts of Ireland, followed the rule, given by our Saviour, of eating whatever was laid before him, but without violating the general laws of the Church relative to abstinence. In the Tripartite itself (L. 3. c. 42.) St. Patrick is stated to have been, on a certain occasion, invited to a great entertainment by a chief named Lonan (somewhere in the now county of Limerick) and, while on the point of partaking of it, to have been teased by certain fellows calling on him for food, to whom he gave a roasted sheep, which a young man of the name of Nesson and his mother were bringing to Lonan's table. Jocelin (cap. 75) makes mention of that entertainment, and of our saint's having taken share of it, but instead of a roasted sheep he makes the saint give those fellows a live ram. He thus gave a twist to the anecdote, lest he should appear to acknowledge that there was flesh-meat on Lonan's table. Amidst all his nonsensical tales Jocelin has displayed no small degree of art in patching them together.

(54) Jocelin, cap. 18. Tripart. L. 1. c. 27. To account for this fable they pretend, that the saint's companions sacrificed part of the swine to their idols. But he says no such thing himself. The honey alone was that, which was called an offering, and that by one man alone. The plain meaning of the words; exinde nihil gustavi; is that having, as it seems, eaten of the swine's flesh, and perhaps taken some of the honey, he would not taste any more of it, nor perhaps any thing else on that occasion, in consequence of what the man had expressed.

(55) Butler was much mistaken in making a great stone really fall upon him. As to the calling on Elias the saint says ; “ Et dum clamarem Heliam, Heliam, viribus meis, ecce splendor solis decidit super me, et statim discussit a me omnem gravitudinem.” Conf. p. 8. This will, I believe, be admitted to be a sufficient proof, that St. Patrick considered the invocation of saints as commendable and salutary.

§. IX. He then proceeds to relate, that a few years after he suffered captivity again. (56) This was a short one, as he was freed from it on the sixtieth night after that, on which he was first in the power of the marauders, (57) who very probably were some of those roving bands of Franks, that made a trade of carrying off prisoners for the purpose of selling them or of getting money for their ransom, and to whom St. Patrick alludes in his letter against Coroticus. (58) In what year this second captivity occurred is, as far as I know, impossible to determine, even setting aside the question, whether St. Patrick wrote many years, or not many, (59) which latter reading seems to be the correct one. But the phrase not many years might be understood of four, five, or six years ; so that we are left in the dark as to the precise period of their termination. Whatever was the number of those years, we may safely assume that he did not spend them in idleness, which indeed his piety and fervour would not have allowed him to do. When he returned to his own country from Ireland, he was about 22 years old, an age at which he was fully capable of fixing on a state of life. I am greatly inclined to think that it was not long after, when, having enjoyed for some time the society of his parents and friends, he went to the celebrated monastery or college of St. Martin near Tours for the benefit of his education. The most consistent accounts bring St. Patrick to

Tours soon after his arrival in his own country, and some of them go so far as to make him proceed directly thither from the port where he had landed. This, however, can be easily reconciled with the authentic fact, that he had previously visited his relatives ; so that, as he remained with them but a short time, he might, in an abridged mode of writing, be said to have gone forthwith to Tours. (60) He is said to have spent four years there, (61) a time which I find no reason for objecting to. But we are not to suppose, that he there became a monk. His object in going to and remaining in that house was merely to study and receive a Christian education. (62) What Probus says of his having been initiated at Tours in the ecclesiastical state is indeed very probable, and perfectly consistent with the whole tenour of the saint's further proceedings. It proves, by the bye, that our saint did not become a monk ; for in those times monks did not receive orders except in some extraordinary cases, ex. c. if a monk's sanctity were such as to induce the bishop to confer orders on him, as we read of St. Jerome, or when permission was given to ordain one of the monks for the service of the monastery. Except in this latter case, when a monk was admitted to the ecclesiastical profession, he was taken out of the monastery, and obliged to serve the church ; for the two states viz. of clergyman and monk, were in general deemed incompatible. (63) As to St. Martin's monastery of Tours, in which, on the whole, St. Patrick was never more than a student, it was not merely a monastery in the strict sense of the word, such as those that anciently existed in Egypt, or those for whom St. Basil drew up a rule in the fourth century, or the Benedictine and other monasteries that commenced in the West after the times we are treating of, but rather a college, in which a bishop lived in common with some of his clergy, or with persons retired from the world, and in which young men were instructed and prepared for the service of the church. As certain rules similar to those of monastic houses were observed in such establishments, they also began to be called monasteries. This excellent institution was first introduced into the Western church by St. Eusebius of Vercelli, and thence imitated by St. Martin and other prelates. (64)

(56) “ Et iterum post annos non multos adhuc capturam dedi.” (ib.) Probus has multos annos; (L. 1. c. 10.) and it is to be observed, that non was wanting in the Armagh MS. of the Confession, which was one of those that Ware had made use of. (See his marginal note at p. 2.) Usher has followed the Armagh reading, annos multos, Pr. p. 834. And yet, strange to say, he reckons those annos multos at two years; Ind. Chron. at A. 395 and 397.

(57) “ Nocte illa sexagesima liberavit me Dominus de manibus eorum.” p. 9. In Ware’s edition after these words follow a few lines, which have been evidently displaced, as what is contained in them belongs to the account of the saint’s return from his Irish captivity. The whole text is better arranged in the Bollandist edition.

(58) P. 28. Concerning other plundering hordes see Not. 51.

(59) See above Not. 56. It is odd that the Bollandists place the second captivity only three months after St. Patrick’s return to his own country, following in this computation the Tripartite, L. 1. c. 29. in opposition to Probus and to St. Patrick himself. In this part of the saint’s history they went quite astray both as to times and places, and have given us mere hypotheses and calculations of their own, without paying due attention to former authorities.

(60) One of the Rheims breviaries quoted above (Not. 50) after bringing St. Patrick to Treguier adds, that thence “ venit ad S. Martinum episcopum Turonensem, sub cujus et suorum institutione quadriennium peregit.” The other has; “ Ad S. Martinum episcopum Turonensem accessit, sub cujus institutione quadriennium peregit.” We find in Probus, after a confused account of a captivity, which, though called the third, was in reality the first, (see Usher p. 833.) it expressly stated that St.

Patrick, having landed in Gaul, “pervenit ad Martinum episcopum Turoni, et quatuor annis mansit cum eo, et tonsura capite ordinatus est ab eo in clericum, et tenuit lectionem et doctrinam ab eo.” (L. 1. c. 14.) In the tracts now referred to St. Patrick’s repairing to Tours and there spending four years is placed before the time of his going under the direction of St. German of Auxerre, and very justly; for German was a mere layman for several years after St. Patrick’s return. As to what is said of our saint’s going to St. Martin it is not to be understood of St. Martin in person, who was already dead some years, but, as the Bollandists have remarked, of St. Martin’s monastery, according to a manner of speaking that often occurs in ecclesiastical documents; ex. c. ad S. Petrum, for Rome; but which seems not to have been rightly understood by Probus and others. (See above Note 11. to Chap. I.)

(61) See preceding Note, and Third Life, cap. 22. These authorities are of more weight than Usher’s Tripartite and Joh. Tinmuth. (ap. Pr. p. 834.) for the space of only 40 days.

(62) In the passages quoted (Not. 60) there is not a word relative to St. Patrick’s monachism. His education and instruction are the only objects alluded to, besides, what Probus adds, his having received the tonsure and perhaps some minor orders. Probus makes him no higher than a clericus, meaning, according to the style of his times, that he was not even a deacon. St. Patrick’s promotion to the priesthood is placed by Probus several years later. (L. 1. c. 17.) The Third Life, in which our saint is spoken of as having spent four years with St. Martin, has nothing about his having embraced the monastic state. We find this story only in the Tripartite and Jocelin; and it appears to have been derived from no other source than from its having been recorded, that St. Patrick had been for some time in a college called a monastery, whence those sapient compilers concluded, that he had become a monk. To mend the matter St. Patrick’s clerical tonsure, mentioned by Probus, has been changed in the Tripartite (L. 1. c. 32.) into a monastic tonsure.

(63) Fleury, Institution au Droit Ecclesiastique; Part 1. ch. 25. St. Jerome says; “Alia monachorum est causa, alia clericorum: clerici pascunt oves, ego pascor.” Ep. 1. ad Heliodor.

(64) St. Ambrose writes; “Hæc enim primus in Occidentis partibus diversa inter se Eusebius sanctæ memoriæ conjunxit, ut et in civitate positus instituta monachorum teneret, et Ecclesiam regeret jejunii sobrietate." (Ep. 82. ad Eccl. Verceil.) "Quod ipsum," says Baronius ad an. 328. num. 22, "præstantissimum vitæ genus sanctus Martinus Turonensis transvexit in Gallias et sanctus Augustinus in Africam, qui admirabili connexione," &c. According to the description of St. Martin's establishment by Sulpicius Severus, it was partly a monastery, strictly speaking, and partly a college or seminary for the education of ecclesiastical students. After telling us that St. Martin had a cell to himself and that some of the brethren dwelt in cells excavated in the mountain, he writes; "Discipuli vero octoginta erant, qui ad exemplum beati magistri instituebantur—Nemo ibi quidquam proprium habebat—Ars ibi, exceptis scriptoribus, nulla habebatur, cui tamen operi minor aetas deputabatur." Among other observances of strict discipline, such as abstinence from wine, he mentions the coarseness of their dress, and remarks that it was wonderful to see how they submitted to the rules of the house, particularly as several of them were of noble families. "Many of them," he adds, "we have since seen bishops." (De vita S. Martini, cap. 7.) Here we have an exact picture of an ecclesiastical seminary, united to a monastery. St. Augustin often speaks of his own institution; let it suffice to quote but one passage; "Volui habere in ista domo Episcopi meum monasterium clericorum. Ecce quomodo vivimus. Nulli licet in societate habere aliquid proprium." (Serm. 49 de Diversis.) And Possidius in his Life cap. 25. tells us, that he and his clergy lived together, having every thing in common; "Cum ipso semper clerici, una etiam domo ac mensa, sumptibusque communibus alebantur et vestiebantur." See also Fleury, Institution, &c. Part 1. ch. 17.

§. x. Having left that house at the end of four years, St. Patrick, as the Rheims breviaries state, applied himself most fervently to works and practices of piety. This was the period, during which, being, as it is natural to suppose, among his relatives, the second captivity, of which above, most probably took place. To return to the saint's own narrative, he relates that he was a few years afterwards, that is, as the context seems clearly to point out, after the second captivity, with his parents, who requested of him not to leave them any more, considering all the hardships he had undergone. "And," he adds, "I saw in a nocturnal vision a man coming as if from Ireland, whose name was Victoricus, (65) "with innumerable letters, one of which he handed "to me. On reading the beginning of it I found "it contained these words; The voice of the Irish. "And whilst reading I thought I heard at the same "moment the voice of persons from near the wood "Foclut, which is near the western sea. (66) And "they cried out as if with one voice; We intreat "thee, holy youth, to come and walk still amongst "us. (67) And I was greatly affected in my heart, "and could read no longer; then I awoke." St. Patrick thanks God that what those people were crying out for was granted to them many years after by the Almighty. But he does not say, that he then formed, as some writers pretend, (68) a resolution of preparing himself for preaching the Gospel in Ireland. In what year this vision occurred I will not pretend to ascertain. (69) I find it mentioned, however, that St. Patrick was then about 30 years of age. (70) If this account be true, we may assign the vision to A. D. 417. The same authorities state, that soon after he went to put himself under the direction of St. German of Auxerre, when he was full 30 years old. (71) This brings us to the year 418, in which German was appointed bishop, having been but a very short time before taken from the laical state and secular administration, and successor of Amator, who died on the first of May in said year. (72) If we are to believe Probus, St. Patrick was a priest at the time the vision occurred, (73) and accordingly must have been then at least 30 years of age according to the discipline of the Gallican church. (74) Be this as it may, it is plain that our saint could not have placed himself under the direction of St. German until the year 418; (75) at which time, counting from A. D. 387, the year of his birth, he had completed his 20th year.

After the period, at which St. Patrick attached himself to St. German and began to study under him, it is exceedingly difficult, and, I believe, impossible to arrange correctly, either as to chronological order or topographical accuracy, the succeeding transactions of his life until near the time of his mission. The accounts concerning the places, in which he spent those years, and the divisions of that space of time, are so confused and contradictory, that a precise and every way unobjectionable narrative cannot be expected. Were we to take the words of Erric of Auxerre in a strict sense, we should, according to him, admit that St. Patrick remained constantly with his illustrious teacher. (76) But, as he was mistaken with regard to the number of years, during which the discipleship of our saint lasted, he might have been also mistaken in this point, unless we should confine Erric's mistake to that of the years, and suppose that St. Patrick did not join himself to St. German until a few years prior to his mission. This hypothesis might seem to receive some degree of credit from Probus, who, as his text runs at present, makes St. Patrick proceed straight from St. Martin's monastery to a desert, there to pass eight years, and thence to an island where he remained nine years; next to the rock Hermon; whence, after having spent there a considerable time, he makes him take a trip to Ireland and preach to the natives; but, on his not succeeding in his holy exertions, the text sends him to Rome, and at last from Rome to Auxerre to put himself under the direction of St. German. But, considering the interpolations and derangement of that part of Probus' work, (77) we must look for some more consistent authorities, that may guide us as to this part of our saint's history. On the whole I think we may lay down, as a sufficiently authorized fact, what has been stated above, viz. that St. Patrick, when 30 years of age, placed himself under the guidance of St. German; but it does not thence follow, that he spent the remainder of his years until near the period of his mission constantly at Auxerre. For it would be quite too sceptical to reject all that we read in his Lives and other tracts (78) of his having passed during that interval a considerable portion of his time in other places; nor will this prevent his being considered as having been during that whole period under German's direction, by whose advice, it is to be presumed, he was guided in the selection of such places as were the most conducive to his instruction and edification.

(65) Hence the name of the angel Victor. (See above Not. 41.) Could the name, Victoricus, have any reference to Victricius a famous saint among the Morini, and who is greatly praised by Paulinus of Nola in a letter to him? (Ep. 22.) After having suffered for the faith, and laboured much among the Morini, he became bishop of Rouen. Malbrancq treats largely of him, Lib. 2. De Morinis.

(66) The wood Foclut is called in Fiech's hymn Caille Fochlad. The Scholiast says that it was in Hy-Amalgaidh, now Tirawley in the county of Mayo.

(67) "Rogamus te sancte puer, ut venias et adhuc ambules inter nos." Conf. p. 9. It would seem that, instead of puer, some of the old writers read pueri, as if it were; we boys intreat thee, O saint. Fiech's hymn, (Stroph. 8.) the Scholiast (No. 15) the third Life, cap. 20. Probus L. 1. cap. 18. and the Tripartite L. 1. c. 30. speak of the voice as if coming from children; some of them say infants. The fourth Life, cap. 25. for sancte puer has sancte Patrici, and so has Probus, loc. cit. Perhaps it might be thought, that St. Patrick was at that time not young enough to be called puer; but those people from Foclut might be supposed to have addressed him according as he had appeared in Ireland during his captivity; or St. Patrick might have extended the term puer to an age exceeding that, which it is usual to refer it to, somewhat in the same manner as we use the name, lad. It may also be asked how the people of Foclut could be introduced speaking in such a manner as if they were acquainted with St. Patrick, or how he could have known any thing about that place, having lived very far from it in Antrim or Down. Without recurring to other solutions it will be sufficient to observe, that, as the saint had been employed as a shepherd, he might have had many opportunities of going to Mayo or other parts of Connaught, either with his master or others, for the purpose of attending the sale or purchase of sheep, just as in our times shepherds resort occasionally from all parts of Ireland to the fair of Ballinasloe and to other great fairs.

(68) Not to quote some old writers, Harris mentions (Archbishops of Armagh p. 9.) this resolution, and then makes St. Patrick begin to travel. I shall not enter into a controversy on the subject of that resolution, although it might appear from various parts of the Confession, that St. Patrick did not understand the drift of the vision until at some later period, when he was informed by our Saviour of the task, which he had to undertake. (See Conf. p. 11.)

(69) Harris (ib.) places the vision about two years after St. Patrick's return from the second captivity, and quotes Usher in support of his assertion. But the two years allowed by Usher in the passages referred to were those, that intervened between the saint's return from Ireland and the second captivity. (See above Not. 56.) As to the years, that thence elapsed until the time of the vision, and which St. Patrick calls a few years, Usher has not undertaken to determine the number of them.

(70) "Erat autem tunc quasi annorum triginta." (Fourth Life, cap. 25. Tripartite L. 1. c. 31. Second Life, cap. 21.)

(71) Fourth Life cap. 26. Second Life, cap. 22. Tripart. L. 1. c. 33.

(72) It is painful to observe, what shifts Colgan was reduced to in endeavouring to show, that St. Patrick had been under the tuition of St. German as far back as A. D. 396, and indeed at Rome, as if St. German had, when very young, kept a school there. And then he strives to bring St. Patrick, after having been with German at Rome, to St. Martin in person. I pass over other absurdities, in which he has involved himself; and all for the purpose of reconciling his computation of St. Patrick's years with certain stuff which he had found here and there, that induced him to think that St. German was his first preceptor after his Irish captivity, and with the story of our saint's having been under his direction full thirty years, as likewise with the mistranslation Latium for the Letha of Fiech's hymn. (See Tr. Th. p. 241. seqq.) Usher has given some of those passages, that led Colgan astray, without attempting to reconcile them, simply observing that those were mistaken who allowed even only 18 years for the time that St. Patrick remained under St. German, the number mentioned by Erric of Auxerre and some others after him. (Pr. p. 837. seqq.)

(73) Probus L. 1. c. 17. 18.

(74) The Council of Agde required that age for the ordination of priests as well as bishops; "Presbyterum vel episcopum ante triginta annos, id est, antequam ad viri perfecti ætatem perveniat, nullus metropolitanorum ordinare præsumat." Can. 17. This rule had been established long before by that of Neocaesarea, and, we may be sure, was observed in the Gallican church prior to its confirmation by the council of Agde.

(75) The Bollandists (Comment. ad Vit. S. P. §. 5.) bring St. Patrick to Auxerre in the year 414. Thus the 18 years mentioned by Erric of Auxerre (above Not. 72.) might in some manner be accounted for, as added to 414 they make 432. They state that in said year the saint attached himself to Amator, and afterwards to St. German; but Erric speaks of the 18 years as all passed under St. German, which, rigorously taken, could not be true. If, as indeed is not improbable, St. Patrick had been for some time at Auxerre with Amator, we might suspect, that it was by him he was ordained priest, and thus have a clue for what Probus and others say of his having been ordained bishop by one Amator not long before his setting out for the Irish mission. Those writers might have confounded one ordination with another, and, having heard of an ordination by Amator, understood it of his episcopal ordination, of which alone they make mention, excepting Probus. For Probus relates (L. 1. c. 17.) that St. Patrick was ordained priest by Senior, a bishop who lived on the mountain Hermon at the right side of the ocean, in dextro latere maris oceani, and whose city was protected by seven walls. The Bollandists follow Probus with regard to Senior, and say that he was bishop, perhaps of Pisa; whereas they supposed that St. Patrick was then in Italy; for which supposition they could not produce any voucher worthy of credit, no more than for their conjecture that this ordination took place in the year 410, at which time our saint would have been, according to them, about 33 years old, as they placed his birth in 377. It is plain from Probus, that he did not allude to any part of Italy, as he places Senior's residence near the ocean, that is the Atlantic. The whole passage is very curious, not that we are bound to believe what it contains, but because it may be worth while to search for the place that Probus here alluded to. His phrase, right side of the ocean, must be understood as meaning the south side, according to the well known style of the ancient Irish, who, in the same manner as the nations of the East, called the South the right and the North the left, in consequence of their considering the point where the sun rises as the leading one in fixing geographical and astronomical positions. (See Vallancey, Collectanea de rebus Hibernicis; Vol. 2. p. 269. and O'Brien Ir. Dict. at Deas.) The name, Hermon, signifies a great rock, being a compound of two Celtic words, Her, great, and Maen, rock. (Bullet, Dict. Celtique at Herma.) This rock or mount adjoining the ocean to the South must be sought for in the great promontory of Britany, or close to some of the bays of Normandy. At first sight it might seem probable, that Hermon was one of the rocks near St. Malo, and that the town, called St. Malo's city, was Aletum or Aletha, a place of considerable note and the see of the celebrated St. Maclovius, whence it got the name of St. Maclovius' town, afterwards corrupted into St. Malo. Some writers maintain, that it was an episcopal see before the time of St. Maclovius. (See Hadr. Vales. Notit. Gall. ad Aletum.) The name of St. Malo together with the see was transferred in the 12th century to the present St. Malo, about a league distant from Aletum, the ruins of which are still to be seen under the name of Quidalet or Guichalet. (ib. and Martiniere at Aleth.) But what must we say of the seven walls mentioned by Probus? For, although Aletum was a garrison town, and the residence of the Prefect or commander of the soldiers called Martenses, we meet with no account of its having been defended by such a number of walls. I am therefore inclined to think, that the Hermon of Probus is the rock now called Mont St. Michel, and which might justly be called Hermon, as it is a really stupendous rock, situated in a bay between Avranches and Dol at the points of Normandy and Britany. It has the sea to the North and is so close to it, that in times of high water it becomes an island. It was a celebrated place long before the period, in which Probus lived. A church was erected on its top in honour of St. Michael A. D. 709 by Autbert bishop of Avranches. Hadr. Valesius (at S. Michaelis Mons) says that it is thought to have been built by Paternus, who was bishop of Avranches in the sixth century. A Benedictine monastery was also established there, and a considerable town grew up at the base and sides of the rock. It was much resorted to by pilgrims, and supplied with a numerous garrison. To add to its natural strength, it was fortified in a prodigious manner, having from the bottom upwards various ranges of walls, which, including the balustrades around the church on its summit, may be fairly computed at the number of seven. (See Martiniere at Mont St. Michel.) It will naturally be objected, that it was not an episcopal see; but this is easily obviated on reflecting, that we often find bishops residing in monasteries, as was the case in Ireland, where the superior of the monastery was very often both bishop and abbot, a custom, according to which, not to enlarge at present upon something similar having been practised in the West of Gaul, Probus, as an Irishman, or whoever he got that passage from, might have conceived Senior of the rock Hermon to have been a bishop. As to the objection that no bishop of the name of Senior is spoken of by any writer as living in any part of Gaul at that period, it equally affects the hypothesis of the Bollandists; for no mention is made of a bishop of that name then in Italy. Perhaps the Senior of Probus is not to be taken as a proper name, but as signifying aged, old. It may also be objected, that there seems not to have been any town or church at Mont St. Michel in St. Patrick's time. Be that as it may, it is sufficient to observe, that as it was a place of note long before Probus wrote his work, being mentioned among the great monasteries of France in a deed of Lewis the pious A. D. 817, (Hadr. Val.) he, or others before him, who little minded chronological dates, might have thought it had been so when St. Patrick was living. And it is probable that, to add to the respectability of that holy rock, a story had been circulated concerning our saint's having spent some time there, particularly as it was inhabited of old by hermits before the time of Autbert. (Martiniere.) What I have now endeavoured to explain will serve to throw light on a very strange passage in the third Life (cap. 25); "Et Angelus duxit eum ad montem Arnon ar muir Lethe supra petram maris Tyrrheni in civitate quæ vocatur Capua." Probus had in like manner mentioned the interference of an Angel in sending St. Patrick to Hermon. Here we have likewise a rock in ar muir Lethe, the sea of Letha or Armoric Gaul. (See above Not. 48.) What follows in that passage after petram was added by some bungler, who was striving to interpret the Irish words ar muir Lethe, and mistook Lethe for Latium. Hence was introduced the Tuscan sea and, wonderful to tell, Capua; which has greatly puzzled honest Colgan, who, knowing that Capua lies several miles distant from the sea, conjectured that for Capua we might read Caieta. Jocelin (cap. 26) has copied this stuff about the Tuscan sea and Capua, but calls the mountain Morion. The Tripartite (L. 1. c. 37.) does not mention Capua, and retains the name Hermon. Colgan knew not what to do with a mountain or rock Hermon, Arnon, or Morion, as he could make out none of that name in Italy; but the Bollandists jumped over the difficulty by changing the mountain into a river; for they could have no other foundation for guessing at a Senior, bishop of Pisa, than their understanding Arnon, as in the third Life, of the river Arno, on which the city of Pisa is situated.

(76) "Patricius—sanctissimo ejus (Germani) discipulatu 18 addictus annis." (De miracul. S. Germ. L. 1. c. 12.) It was during this time that St. Patrick is said to have got the name of Magonius (above Not. 29) or, as Nennius has, Maun. Q. If there be any truth in this story, might not Maun be the same as Maen, a rock, by which appellation we may suppose that our saint was distinguished?

(77) L. 1. capp. 15—21. It is evident, that the text of Probus has been interpolated and thrown out of its original order in the chapters here referred to. One proof will suffice. After reading, as the text now stands, that St. Patrick was at Rome, we find him returning from Italy and then immediately we have the following passage ; “ Transnavigato vero mari Britannico et arrepto versus Gallias itinere venit—ad—Germanum, videlicet, Antissiodorensis Ecclesiæ episcopum.” Thus we should place the British sea between Italy and the Gauls. Colgan had good reason to say ; “ Ecce iterum insulsam et inversam rerum gestarum narrationem.” (Not. ad loc.) He says iterum, alluding to a former observation of his on the absurdity of making St. Patrick preach the gospel in Ireland before he had been regularly appointed to that mission. It is strange, that the Bollandists (§. 5.) have swallowed that absurdity ; for in consequence of following the corrupted text of Probus they send St. Patrick, as a preacher, to Ireland straight from the school of their Senior of Pisa in the year 413, according to their whimsical calculations, and then bring him to Auxerre in 414. Now there is nothing more clear from the Confession than that St. Patrick never undertook the office of a missionary in Ireland until after he was consecrated bishop, and had been for a considerable time under the direction of St. German. Probus is not to blame for all this nonsense ; for it is plain from other parts of the work, ex. c. L. 1. c. 27. that he knew of no other preaching of St. Patrick in Ireland than that which commenced A. D. 432.

(78) See Usher, p. 835, seqq.

§. XI. In one of the Lives it is stated that he spent four years with St. German, and afterwards nine years in an island called insula Tamerensis, on the expiration of which he went to Rome, with the approbation of St. German, who sent along with him Segetius a priest as a voucher of his good character. (79) According to this account, in which there appears no inconsistency as to the number of years, we have a total of thirteen years, which, counting from the year 418, at which time St. Patrick was in his thirty-first year, brings us to A. D. 431 when Pope Celestine was planning the great mission for Ireland, and when our saint being then in the 44th year of his age set out for Rome, recommended by St. German as a proper person to be employed with others in that holy undertaking. But, as all the Lives agree in stating, that he was with St. German, and had consulted with him on the business immediately prior to his journey to Rome, and consequently set out straight from Auxerre, which is confirmed also by his having been accompanied by one of St. German's priests, it is more natural to suppose, that the four years spent with St. German were not before but after the nine years, which he is said to have passed in the island. It will be easily admitted that, after nine years employed in study and retirement, four years of active service were not too many for his becoming completely qualified for a correct administration of the sacraments and for all the practical duties of the pastoral profession. Nor is there any other manner of reconciling the statements of the various writers of St. Patrick's Lives, concerning his having been with St. German, when 30 years of age, his living in an island or islands, and then his being with that saint immediately before he set out for Rome, than by laying down that, when 30 years old he actually put himself under the guidance of St. German, who soon after sent him to study for some years in a place fit for that purpose, after which, on our saint's return, he kept him with himself for some years longer until the affair of the Irish mission was determined upon. It is thus we find those circumstances arranged in Fiech's hymn, where he is stated to have been first with St. German, then in islands of the Tuscan sea, and again with that saint studying the Canons under him. (80) Probus also has the nine years in the island prior to St. Patrick's studying under St. German. But as in that part of his work there are evident marks of confusion, as we have seen already, I will not enlarge on that circumstance. There is, however, an argument, to which no such objection can be made, furnished by Probus in another place, where his text runs regular and consistent. Having told us that St. Patrick had been for a considerable time under the immediate inspection of German, he then relates how our saint set about the necessary preparations for his mission to Ireland, and of his being accompanied by Segetius, or, as he calls him, Regirus. (81) Hence it appears, that the discipleship under St. German in person was immediately prior to the affair of the mission, and consequently after the period spent in the island. It now becomes easy to rectify the text and fix the true meaning of the passage of the third Life above referred to; (82) for which purpose nothing more is requisite than to place, as ought to be done, the four years at St. Martin's monastery not only before those in the island, but likewise before the other four years under St. German's immediate direction.

It has been just observed, that Probus agrees with that Life as to the number of nine years in the island. (83) The Tripartite has seven years, (84) which Colgan accounts for by supposing an erratum of a transcriber, who wrote seven instead of nine. Usher has quoted a passage from Tirechan, in which St. Patrick is said to have spent seven years partly in islands of the Tuscan sea and partly elsewhere. (85) But no reliance can be placed on that passage, at least with regard to the number of years, as appears from the stuff that immediately follows concerning our saint's having remained full thirty years in one of those islands. (86) This same number of thirty years is spoken of in some of the Lives as having been spent with St. German, and indeed, to complete the blunder, in the island (87) It is needless to remark further on this trash, than that these thirty years were introduced to make up the pretended age of sixty at the commencement of our saint's mission; for, as it was generally admitted that he was 30 years old when he placed himself under the direction of St. German, it was thought necessary to allow 30 years more for the period of his discipleship, besides the consideration of the fine sound of those even numbers of thirties. (88)

(79) Third Life, capp. 21. 22. I must not conceal, that the author places the four years passed at Tours between the four other years with St. German and the time of St. Patrick's going to the island. This must be taken as a hysteron proteron; for we have already seen, that St. Patrick had been at Tours before he went to Auxerre. See above Not. 60. and the Bollandists, who also place St. Patrick's abode in St. Martin's monastery prior to his going under the direction of St. German. (Comment. præv. ad V. S. P. §. 5.)

(80) "Apud Germanum remansit in australi parte Latii (Letha.) In insulis maris Tyrreni mansit, uti memoro (memoratur). Legit canones apud Germanum." (Stroph. 5. 6. Colgan's translation.) The word remansit can mean only, that St. Patrick spent some time with St. German before he went to the islands. I much doubt whether the Irish phrase comdhfargaib, which Colgan has rendered remansit, should not rather be translated, visited or conferred with; as I also suspect that instead of australi parte, the South, the words, andes an deisciort, would be better explained by South-east. Leaving these discussions to persons more deeply versed in the Irish language than I can pretend to be, I shall only add that this narrative has given occasion to a singular mistake, which we find in some of the Lives of St. Patrick; viz. that, while in the island, he was instructed there by St. German himself. (Second Life, cap. 22. Tripart. L. 1. c. 33.) As if it were not well known, that St. German never resided nor taught in any of those islands near the south of France. Those good people supposed, that the account given in the hymn related to one uninterrupted chain of part of St. Patrick's life, and accordingly placed St. German along with him in the island or islands.

(81) "Apud quem (S. Germanum) non parvo tempore demoratus est in omni subjectione—misitque cum illo S. Germanus presbyterum nomine Regirum." L. 1. c. 21. seqq.

(82) Not. 79.

(83) "Permansit cum insulanis illis novem annis." (L. 1. c. 16.) There is indeed in the preceding chapter an account of St. Patrick's having spent eight years with certain hermits, as if prior to the nine years; but it is evidently an interpolation, and a mere repetition, with one or two variations (ex. c. eight for nine) of the same anecdote.

(84) L. 1. c. 34.

(85) “Septem annis ambulavit et navigavit, in fluctibus et in campestribus locis et in convallibus montanis, per Gallias atque Italiam totam, atque in insulis quæ sunt in mari Tyrrheno; ut ipse dixit in commemoratione laborum.” (Pr. p. 835.) Where St. Patrick has said so I cannot discover; in his tracts still extant there is not a word about these seven years, or plains, vallies, &c. There is a saying attributed to St. Patrick, in which his travels in Gaul, Italy, and some islands are mentioned; but no number of years is spoken of: “Timorem Dei habui ducem itineris mei per Gallias atque Italiam, etiam in insulis quæ sunt in mari Tyrrheno.” (ib. p. 836.)

(86) After laborum (Not. 85) the text goes on thus: “Erat autem in una ex insulis, quæ dicitur Aralanensis, annis 30, mihi testante Ultano episcopo.” If Ultan, who was bishop of Ardbraccan in the seventh century, ever said any such thing, the text must have been corrupted as to the number, by there being inserted thirty instead of, perhaps, three, a part of the total of the seven years just before mentioned. These calculations were patched up to support the favourite notion of St. Patrick's having been sixty years of age when his mission commenced. By adding 37 to 22, his age on escaping from captivity, we have 59 full years; then allowing a year or only some months for his preparations, prior to his setting out for Ireland, we come to sixty years. It is pitiful to consider, what useless trouble Colgan put himself to (Tr. Th. p. 241. seqq.) in endeavouring to arrange and distribute the 38 years, which he supposed had elapsed between the captivity and the mission, and to determine the respective places, in which so many years were spent, &c.

(87) “Arelanensis erat nomen insulæ, in qua sanctus Germanus docuit sanctum Patricium per triginta annos.” (Fourth Life, cap. 26.) And the second Life has, cap. 22. “Patricius quando pervenit ad Germanum in insula Arelanensi nomine, in qua docuit eum, triginta tunc annos impleverat; triginta annis legit cum illo." We find the same story with all its circumstances in the Tripartite. (L. 1. c. 33.) See Not. 80.

(88) See above Notes 7. 8. 86. 87.

§. XII. We may now lay down, that St. Patrick went to some island probably in the year 418; but it becomes requisite to inquire what island it was, and whether the saint might not have passed the nine years partly in one island and partly in others. There were at that time religious establishments in several of the small islands of the Mediterranean, between the coasts of France and Italy; (89) among which that of Lerins, now called St. Honorat from the founder of that house St. Honoratus, became the most eminent. The author of the third Life, calls the island, that St. Patrick went to, Tamerensis, i. e. the island Tameria or Tamaria. (90) Colgan conjectures (91) that it was the same as Capraria, now Capraia, for which he had no foundation except his having misunderstood a passage of Usher. For although Usher, speaking in general of the islands inhabited by monks, mentions Capraria, (92) he does not make it the same as Tamaria; but, on the contrary, in another place (93) throws out a very plausible conjecture that Tamaria was no other than Camaria, now Camargue near Arles, an island close to the mouths of the Rhone formed by the branches of the river. This conjecture seems to be favoured by an expression of Probus, in the island between the mountains and the sea. (94) For it is not easy to understand these words except of an island in a river or lake, such as is Camargue, unless we should so explain them, as if Probus meant to say that the religious persons, to whom St. Patrick was sent, lived between the mountains of the island and the sea (95). Yet, in whatever manner that passage is to be understood, as we have no account of any religious house in Camargue at that time, although there were then monasteries in other parts of Provence, (96) we cannot lay much stress on that conjecture, particularly as the character of Patroclus, who was bishop of Arles at that very period, was not such as to induce any pious person to place himself under his jurisdiction. (97) Passing over this conjecture and some strange hypotheses concerning the insula Tamerensis, (98) we must observe that the one or two writers, who have called the island by this name, meant the very same island, which in some of the other Lives is called Arelanensis. (99) For those that have Tamerensis say nothing about Arelanensis; and vice versa in the Lives, that have the latter name, we do not find the former. It is therefore very reasonable to suppose that Tamerensis is merely a various reading, and Arelanensis another, for the name of some island celebrated at that time for a school of learning and piety. It must be also recollected, that this island is to be sought for in some part of the Mediterranean not far from the western coast of Italy. (100) Now where can we find an island, with which these circumstances will so properly agree, or whose name bears such an affinity with Arelanensis, as the famous insula Lerinensis, Lerinum, Lerins, in which so many holy and learned men have been educated, and which might have been justly called a seminary of bishops? (101) The Bollandists agree as to the probability of this opinion, and even think that the expression of Probus above quoted is relative to it. (102) In fact that island is so near the coast and the mountains, that it might, in a loose way of speaking, be said to lie between them and the sea, that is, the altum mare the wide sea. Should it be objected that Lerins, or St. Honorat, is not in that part of the sea properly called Etruscan, but rather in the Gallican or Ligurian, it is sufficient to observe that it lies so far to the East towards Italy, that writers living at a period, when topographical niceties were not so strictly attended to, may be excused for placing it in the Italian or, according to their phrase, the Tyrrhene sea. Usher seemed inclined to think that Lerins was the island, in which St. Patrick remained, but mentions (103) an objection founded upon St. Honoratus not having as yet established his monastery there at the time St. Patrick might have repaired thither. This objection might have some weight, considering Usher's calculations as to the division of our saint's life, and his having antedated by many years the transactions of it, but is of no avail in the hypothesis that St. Patrick did not go to the island until A. D. 418; whereas it is universally admitted, that Honoratus' establishment in Lerins had been formed long before that year. (104) I think then we may safely conclude, that Lerins was the island, to which St. Patrick retired; and what better school could St. German have sent him to, than that, in which his friends Hilarius of Arles, Lupus of Troyes, Maximus of Riez, and so many other great men had been formed? (105) As to what we read of St. Patrick having been in islands, (106) without entering into further disquisitions it is sufficient to observe, that very near Lerinum was another island called Lero, (now Ste Marguerite) which became celebrated by its having been chosen for his place of retreat by the great St. Eucherius of Lyons. (107) St. Patrick might have occasionally visited this island, or some of the other small islands off those coasts then inhabited by persons, who had retired from the world. (108)

What has been already stated in this chapter concerning the monastery or college of St. Martin near Tours is equally applicable to the institution at Lerins, which was in great part a seminary for the education of clergymen, and thereby distinguished from the monasteries strictly so called, of whose plan that object constituted no part. Before concluding this subject of the islands, it will not be amiss to add a few words concerning the staff, called the staff of Jesus, so much spoken of in the Lives of St. Patrick. He is said to have received it from a hermit in an island of the Etruscan sea, to whom it had been delivered by our Saviour himself, whence the name staff of Jesus, with an order to give it to St. Patrick, when he should arrive there. (109) Neither Fiech's hymn, nor the Scholiast, nor Probus (110) make any mention of it. Jocelin (111) and the Tripartite (112) have some prodigious stories relative to it, and compare it with the rod of Moses. St. Bernard speaks of it in his Life of St. Malachy, and describes it as covered over with gold and adorned with most precious gems, where he relates that Nigellus, the usurper of the see of Armagh, had taken it away together with the book of the Gospels, which had belonged to St. Patrick; adding, that both were held in such veneration, that whoever had them in his possession was considered by some foolish people as the real bishop. Giraldus Cambrensis says that in his time it was removed from Armagh to Dublin. (113) It was in all appearance the crosier used by St. Patrick, and might have been originally a plain walking stick. If there be any truth in St. Patrick's having got it from a person in that island, it is probable that he brought it with him as a keepsake of a friend. According to some accounts that person's name was Justus. (114) I find a bishop of that name among those, who assisted at a synod of Arles held about A. D. 450, and which was composed chiefly of prelates, who had been elevés of the school of Lerins. (115)

(89) Usher p. 836.

(90) Cap. 22. The same name occurs in Usher's Tripartite; Pr. p. 835.

(91) Tr. Th. p. 30.

(92) P. 836.

(93) Ind. Chron. ad An. 409.

(94) "Vade ad illos, qui sunt in insula inter montes et mare."
L. 1. cap. 16.

(95) The matter was thus understood by the compiler of the Tripartite; for, after mentioning that St. Patrick was in mari Tyrrheno, that is, in an island of that sea, he says that there he went to certain persons, who dwelt in a cavern between a mountain and the sea. (L. 1. c. 34.)

(96) Fleury, Hist. Eccles. Liv. xxiv. §. 56.

(97) See Tillemont, Memoires, &c. Tom. xv. p. 54.

(98) The Bollandists, having rejected the conjecture as to Camargue, give us one of their own, which is really unworthy of such men as Henschenius and Papebrochius. They would have us take the insula Tamerensis for Ireland itself; Tamerensis for Temoriensis from Temoria the capital of Ireland. What a wild idea! Ireland was never called by that name. In the third Life, where the word Tamerensis is found, Ireland is often mentioned but under no other name than Hibernia. Connected with this extravagant explanation is their sending St. Patrick to preach in Ireland long before his regular appointment for that purpose. (See Not. 77.) Another droll conjecture has been started by Porter, Compend. Annal. Eccl. &c. p. 123. He places the insula Tamarensis opposite the mouth of a river Tamar, that flows in England into the Irish sea. We find indeed a river Tamar in England viz. that of Plymouth (Camden Britannia, col. 25); but does it flow into the channel, and where is the island?

(99) See Not. 86 and 87. Colgan would fain read Arelatensis for Arelanensis, as he thought that Camargue was the island alluded to; (Tr. Th. p. 17.) while elsewhere he makes Tamaria a different island from the Arelanensis. (ib. p. 30.) The Bollandists also, prepossessed with their hypothesis concerning Tamarensis (Not. 98.) distinguish it from the insula Arelanensis.

(100) In mari Tyrrheno. See Notes 80–85–95.

(101) See Tillemont, Memoires, &c. Tom. xv. p. 395.

(102) “Inter montes et mare—inter Alpes Maritimas et mare Gallicum-Hetruscum.” Comment. præv. ad V. S. P. §. 9.

(103) Pr. p. 836.

(104) Some writers, and among others the Bollandists, say that Honoratus founded his monastery about A. D. 375. According to Tillemont (Tom. XII. at St. Honorat Art. 7.) this foundition could not have taken place earlier than about A. D. 400. At any rate it was by many years prior to A. D. 418.

(105) In the tract on the Liturgy quoted by Usher, p. 343, Germanus himself is spoken of as having been a member of the monasterium Lirenense, or, as it is there written, Linerense together with Lupus. But this cannot be reconciled with what is known of the whole tenor of St. German's life, and only shows that he was much connected with the pious solitaires of Lerins, among whom there were persons of various nations and tongues. (See Tillemont at St. Honorat.) In the stories concerning St. Patrick's proceedings in the island there occur certain circumstances, that have a sort of similarity with some, which are said to have taken place in Lerins. I will mention but one. Probus says (L. 1. c. 16.) that St. Patrick, when in the island between the mountains and the sea, drove away a huge beast, that used to hinder the islanders from getting water at a fountain. This is somewhat like the story concerning St. Honoratus having driven a dragon out of the island of Lerins. Tillemont, ib.

(106) Fiech's Hymn, Tirechan, &c.

(107) Tillemont Mem. Tom. xv. Art. St. Eucher.

(108) See St. Ambrose, Hexam. L. 3. c. 5. and St. Jerome, Ep. 30. ad Oceanum.

(109) Henry the monk of Saltrey in Huntingtongshire in his fabulous book, De Purgatorio S. Patricii, says (cap. 1.) that St. Patrick received it from our Saviour himself. The Tripartite has the same story; L. 1. c. 37.

(110) Probus speaks of a staff, with which St. Patrick struck a certain grave; (L. 2. c. 21.) but he neither calls it the staff of Jesus, nor tells us how the saint came by it.

(111) Cap. 24.

(112) L. 1. c. 36-37.

(113) Whoever wishes to know more about this staff may consult Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 263. and Lynch, Life of St. Patrick, p. 119.

(114) Jocelin, cap. 24. and a Paris breviary quoted by Colgan, loc. cit.

(115) Tillemont, Mem. Tom. xv. p. 407.

§. XIII. The termination of the nine years passed in the island brings us to A. D. 427, at which time, as we may reasonably calculate, our saint was 39 years of age. On his returning to Auxerre he could not but have been actively employed by such a bishop as St. German. It is very probable that in the interval between that year and A. D. 431 he spent some time in his own country; and perhaps to his officiating at Boulogne as a priest we ought to refer what, as we have seen above, (116) Malbrancq has about his having acted as bishop in that town. For, his hypothesis concerning St. Patrick having been consecrated bishop in the year 424, or at any time before 431, cannot be reconciled with the most creditable accounts, that we have as to the time of his consecration. And, whether or not there were any bishop officiating in that country at this period, yet it appears more consistent to suppose, that our saint acted there only as a priest, particularly as very little time seems to have elapsed between his promotion to the episcopacy and his repairing to Ireland. Nor will this invalidate the assertion of Malbrancq, that St. Patrick at some time after A. D. 424 (the year in which he supposes him to have been consecrated at Rome) officiated at Boulogne; for although it may be doubted, whether the saint was then a bishop or only a priest, the fact of his having acted there as a clergyman remains untouched. Similar doubts as to the rank of celebrated men at the time of certain exertions of theirs frequently occur in ecclesiastical history; and Malbrancq himself furnishes us with a case quite in point. He tells us that the famous St. Victricius had preached and greatly exerted himself among the Morini, and that he was afterwards made bishop of Rouen; and he adds that one of the reasons, which induced St. German to send St. Patrick to Boulogne among that people was the state, to which their church had been reduced by the loss of Victricius. (117) Malbrancq was of the opinion of those, who maintain that Victricius had preached to the Morini before his episcopacy; while others hold that he was already bishop of Rouen at the time of his pastoral labours among them (118)

(116) Chap. III. §. VIII.

(117) De Morinis, L. 2. c. 26.

(118) See Tillemont, Mem. Tom. x. Art. St. Victrice.

§. XIV. It was during the same interval that St. Patrick accompanied St. German and Lupus of Troyes in their spiritual expedition to G. Britain in the year 429 (119) for the purpose of extirpating the Pelagian heresy, which had taken root in that island. This fact is stated in some accounts of St. Patrick's proceedings; (120) nor in the Lives, that are silent about it, is there any circumstance to be met with, that might tend to invalidate it. The Bollandists do not admit it; as it would not accord with their calculations and their presupposing, that our saint was at that time still in Lerins. But, since it has been shown that he was not, nothing remains to prevent our receiving it as true; for it will not be denied, that German and Lupus took with them some clerical companions, nor does there appear any reason to show that St. Patrick was not one of them. And, as he was most probably at Boulogne (121) at the time they set out, he was accordingly in the very track of their course to Britain, and so had nothing more to do than to join them at the place of embarkation, which was perhaps Boulogne itself, or if not, certainly some port not far from it. (122) For, besides those having been at all times the usual places for taking a passage from the Gauls for Britain, it appears from the two prelates having on their way stopped for some time at Nanterre in the diocese of Paris, (123) that their journey was directed towards the Streights. In what particular manner St. Patrick was employed while in G. Britain it would be useless to inquire, as we have not records sufficient to guide us, there remaining only an imperfect account of the acts of that memorable expedition. (124) But we may be sure that he was not idle during that time, and I will here for once observe, that whatever is to be met with here and there concerning St. Patrick's having preached in any part of G. Britain (125) must be referred to this period or to that of some short delays, which he is said to have made while crossing that country in his progress from Gaul to Ireland in the year 432. For it is clear from his own testimony, (126) that from the time he undertook his mission he remained with the Irish people during the whole remainder of his life.

(119) Usher Pr. p. 325. and above chap. 1. §. xv.

(120) Fiech's Scholiast has, num. 10; " Venit autem Germanus in Britanniam ad extirpandam haeresim Pelagii, quae in ea multum crevit. Et sic venit cum Patricio et aliis multis, illamque haeresim continuo extirpabat—Ipsae et Patricius reversi sunt in Galliam." This is what Jocelin alluded to, however mistaken as to the time, where he writes (cap. 92); " Quia pestis Pelagianae haeresis atque Ariana perfidia pluribus in locis Britanniae fidem foedaverat, ipse (Patricius) praedicando," &c. As to what Jocelin says of the Arian heresy then infecting Britain, there is no foundation for it. (See Bede L. 1. cap. 17. and Stillingfleet, Antiquities, &c. chap. 4.) A passage quoted by Usher (p. 840) from William of Malmesbury (De antiq. Glaston. Eccl.) contains something to the same purpose; and in the old tract on the liturgy (ib. and p. 343.) the preaching of German and Lupus in Britain and St. Patrick's connexion with them are spoken of in such a manner as to favour an inference, that he was along with them on that expedition.

(121) To St. Patrick's preaching the Gospel at Boulogne and in the adjacent territory is seemingly to be referred a passage of Probus, in which among the countries, that were to be enlightened through his ministry, Normandy is mentioned. " Scotiam atque Britanniam, Angliam et Normanniam—baptizabis." L. 1. c. 10. We have seen already (chap. III. §. xiv.) that the name of Normandy had been sometimes extended to tracts not comprized within the modern limits of that province.

(122) See above chap. III. notes 83. 106.

(123) Usher p. 327. and Tillemont, Memoires &c. Tom. xv. p. 16.

(124) Tillemont, ib.

(125) Besides the passage quoted (Not. 121) in which howsoever we may understand Britanniam (see Chap. III.) Probus certainly meant by Angliam a part of G. Britain, he writes (L. 2. capp. 24, 25) that at a certain time, when all Britain was nearly overspread with infidelity, St. Patrick was almost despairing of doing any good among the inhabitants, as they would not pay attention to his preaching; but that the Lord comforted him and told him, that his toils would not be quite useless. Accordingly on the day, after that affliction had seized him, he had the consolation of baptizing Muneria the daughter of a prince of the country. Probus gives us no hint as to the time when this might have happened; for in that part of his work, it being on miracles, he observes no chronological order. Yet it may be justly doubted whether the Britain here alluded to by Probus, or by whomsoever he got those anecdotes from, was not rather the Belgic than the insular one. The circumstances of G. Britain from A. D. 427 to 432 included (the only period to which we are authorized to assign any preaching of St. Patrick in that country) were not such as to afford a reason for asserting that infidelity prevailed there almost universally. The only complaint we meet with as to the state of the church of G. Britain at that time is its having been infected with the poison of the Pelagian heresy; nor did the deplorable state, to which that church was reduced by the Saxon persecution, and which is so feelingly described by Gildas, take place until after A. D. 450. (See Usher p. 415. seqq. and Ind. Chron.) On the other hand there are good reasons for believing, that the churches of Belgic Britain, which comprehended, besides the district of the Morini, some other adjacent territories, were in a sad condition about A. D. 427 or 428, the time at which St. Patrick seems to have gone to Boulogne after his return from Lerins. We may add to what Malbrancq has on this subject (see above §. XIII) the effects injurious to religion, that must have been produced in those tracts by the ravages of the Barbarians (Not. 51.); and we may suppose that the situation of those churches was somewhat similar to that, in which Victricius had found them some years before, and which is thus described by Tillemont; “Ce que les Romains appellaiant les Morins et les Nerviens, et qui comprend à peu pres la Flandre, le Brabant, le Hainaut, et le Cambresis, avait receu quelque connoissance de la verité des le temps de Diocletien. Mais la negligence des pasteurs ou les ravages des barbares y ayant empesché le progrès de l'Evangile, Dieu choisit Saint Victrice pour," &c. (Memoires, &c. Tom. x. p. 671.) The baptism of that British princess, but under the name of Munessa, is mentioned also in the third Life, (cap. 78) and, following the context, must be supposed to have been performed in Ireland; for it is there stated, that her parents hearing of the great reputation of St. Patrick brought her to him. In the Tripartite it is said (L. 3. c. 73.) that the daughter of a British king came to Ireland to be instructed by the saint; and Jocelin also has (cap. 159) the princess, calling her Memessa, her having been brought to St. Patrick, the baptism, &c. but without telling us in what country it took place. He would indeed elsewhere (cap. 92.) vain make us believe, that St. Patrick went to G. Britain after his mission had commenced; but our saint's authority is vastly preferable to that of a writer, who in that same chapter has so many falshoods, not to say lies, concerning 30 British bishops in Ireland, the isle of Man then subject to Britain, the fall of the magician Melin, &c.

(126) Confess. p. 17.

§. xv. The saints German and Lupus remained in Great Britain until the Easter of the year 430, and some time in that year returned to Gaul. (127) It is very likely, as has been observed elsewhere, (128) that the information, which they might have obtained, during their absence from home, concerning the state and wants of the Irish Christians, was communicated to Pope Celestine, who either had already determined on sending a bishop to Ireland, or was advised to do so by those prelates. But a bishop was not to be sent unaccompanied by other missionaries; and who could be better qualified for being chosen an assistant to that bishop than Patrick, who had lived six years in Ireland and had acquired a sufficient knowledge of the language of the country? Having returned from Great Britain together with the two prelates, he accompanied, according to the most consistent account, St. German to Auxerre, (129) where it would appear they did not arrive until rather late in the year now mentioned. And this accords with the sequel of our saint's proceedings; for it must have been either towards the close of said year or early in the next, viz. A. D. 431, that he was sent to Rome by St. German, recommended by him to the Pope as a person fit to be employed in the mission, which was then preparing for Ireland, and of which Palladius was appointed the chief. (130) We have already seen in this chapter, that St. Patrick went straight from Auxerre to Rome; nor, looking to the period of his return from Britain, was there much time to spare between it and that of his setting out for the capital of the Christian world. Whether he arrived in Rome before Palladius set out thence for Ireland, or not long after, cannot be ascertained; but there can be no doubt of his having been well received by the Pope; (131) for, were there no other reason for such a favourable reception, the recommendation of such a great saint as German would have been sufficient. He was accompanied by Segetius a priest, (132) who, besides being commissioned to give a good character of him, was probably charged with letters from St. German to the Pope concerning the success of his mission and the state of religion in Great Britain. The object of our saint in going to Rome or of St. German's recommendation was not to obtain an ecclesiastical preferment in that city; and all that we read in some late writers concerning St. Patrick's having been a Canon Regular of St. John Lateran is totally destitute of foundation; (133) for, besides there having been no such description of clergymen belonging to that church until a much later period, (134) our saint did not remain long enough at Rome to become regularly attached to that or any other church in that city. (135)

(127) Usher, Ind. Chron. (128) Chap. 1. §. xv.

(129) Fiech's Scholiast says (num. 10.) that St. German remained in Britain until he was informed, that his own city was infected with Pelagianism, and that he then returned to Gaul accompanied by St. Patrick as far as the city. William of Malmesbury writes (De antiq. Glaston. Eccl. cap. de S. Pat.) that St. German, after having settled the affairs of Britain, "inde in patriam meditatus reditum, Patricium ad familiare contubernium ascivit; eumdemque post aliquot annos Hiberniensibus, jubente Celestino papa, praedicatorum misit." As to aliquot annos, counting from A. D. 430 to 432, it cannot stand; but that writer knew so little of the chronology of those times, that he brings St. Patrick to Ireland in the year 425.

(130) See Chap. 1. §. xvi.

(131) The Bollandists (Comment. &c. §. 5.) say, that St. Patrick went to Rome A. D. 430, and, what indeed I did not expect to meet with, that he was at first repulsed by the Pope. They add that he then returned to St. German, by whom he was sent after Palladius' death to the same Pope Celestine, who a few days before his death in 432 entrusted him with the care of the Irish mission. The former part of this statement is in direct opposition to all the accounts, that we have of St. Patrick's transactions at Rome, except a garbled one in Fiech's Scholiast, (num. 13, 14) which is as follows: "Germanus autem Patricio ait; pergas ergo tu ad successorem S. Petri, nempe Celestinum, ut te ordinet, quia hoc munus ipsi incumbit. Venit ergo Patricius ad eum, et nec ei honorem dedit; quia ante misit Palladium in Hiberniam ut doceret eam." Then, after sending St. Patrick to the islands of the Etruscan sea, &c. they make him return to St. German and continue thus: "Misit ergo Germanus denuo Patricium ad Celestinum et Segestium cum eo—Postea intellexit Celestinus Palladium decessisse—Tunc ordinatus est Patricius in conspectu Celestini et Theodosii junioris regis mundi. Amator ex Antissiodorensis episcopus est qui eum ordinavit. Et Celestinus non vixit nisi una septimana post quam ordinatus est Patricius." This story of two applications of our saint to the Pope for the purpose of being employed on the Irish mission, which, as Colgan remarks, are not mentioned by any other writer, was evidently fabricated for the purpose of reconciling the account of St. Patrick having gone to Rome, recommended by St. German, about the time that Palladius set out for Ireland, and not having been then or there consecrated bishop, with the other story of his having been consecrated at Rome by Celestine himself; for which latter part, however, the sapient Scholiast, finding it could not agree with other accounts, substituted his being consecrated only in the presence of Celestine. The Bollandists saw into the absurdity of some parts of that unchronological narrative, and accordingly placed the first application of our saint to the Pope after the nine years spent at Lerins, whence they make him go straight to Rome, as if St. German had nothing to do with that application, although the Scholiast tells us he had. They were aware, that a recommendation by St. German would not be slighted by the Pope. On the whole it is strange that they could have paid any attention to such stuff, in which Theodosius the younger, who never resided at Rome, and Amator of Auxerre, who was dead 14 years before, are placed in company with Celestine; particularly as they did not admit, that St. Patrick was consecrated at Rome.

(132) Instead of Segetius Probus calls him Regirus. This may be owing to an erratum of transcription, as all the other Lives have Segetius or Segestius. The Tripartite (L. 1. c. 35.) makes him St. German's vicar in spritualibus; and it would seem that he was a member of the clergy of Auxerre. I find a bishop of this name in Italy during the pontificate of Leo the great about A. D. 443. (Tillemont, Tom. xv. p. 424) Might he have been the same person? Or would it be reasonable to conjecture, that Segetius, when a priest, had been sent by Pope Celestine with letters to S. German relative to his proceeding to G. Britain, and that, after having been with him in that country, he, on his returning to Rome, was requested to take St. Patrick along with him and to introduce him to the Pope?

(133) There is not a word in any of the Lives of St. Patrick concerning his having been a Canon Regular of St. John Lateran; nor is even the name of that church mentioned in them. Dr. Ledwich therefore had no right to deduce, with an air of triumph, an objection from that ill founded statement of late invention against the history of our saint and his very existence. (Antiq. of Ireland, p. 372.) The poor Doctor did not know or did not wish to know, how this story originated. Let us then explain the matter to him. We have seen above, (Not. 64) that the practice of part of the clergy of a diocese living in common with the bishop had been introduced in several churches at an early period. The name Canonici or Canons, although it had been given originally to all such clergymen as were in the Canon or roll of a church (Bingham B. 1. ch. 5. sect. 10.) became particularly appropriated to those only, who thus lived in a community, inasmuch as they were bound to observe certain canons or rules relative to the institution. (Fleury, Instit. Part 1. ch. 17.) This is not the place to inquire into the regulations made at various periods for the purpose of upholding that salutary discipline, such as those of Chrodegang bishop of Metz in the eighth century, of the council of Aix-la-chapelle A. D. 816; &c. It is sufficient to state that, in consequence of such enactments, those clergymen, who observed them, might have been called Canonici regulares, that is, observants of the rules, while those, who had renounced living in common, were called simply Canonici. According to this acceptation St. Patrick might be said to have been during part of his life a Canon, and even, should any one wish to add to the title, a Canon regular (although not of St. John Lateran); whereas the discipline, according to which he had lived both in St. Martin's college and in Lerins, was similar to that observed in the communities of Canons. But he could not by any means be called a Canon regular of St. Augustin; because no such description of Canons was known until the eleventh century, at which time some communities of clergymen adopted a sort of monastic rule, vulgarly attributed to St. Augustin, who, however, has left no rule except certain regulations which he had drawn up for the direction of a nunnery under the superintendence of his sister, and which have, with some necessary alterations, been applied to communities of men under the title of the Rule of St. Augustin. This new class of Canons regular adopted the practice of vows, yet retaining the privilege of forming diocesan chapters, and of being employed in the care of souls. They soon branched out into various subdivisions, such as Praemonstratenses, Trinitarians, &c. and became very numerous. We may judge of the number of their establishments in England from the Monasticon Anglicanum, the second volume of which is taken up with an account of them. In Ireland we had very few of them until the arrival of the English. Alemand (Hist. Monast. d'Irlande) and after him Harris (Antiq. of Ireland, ch. 38) have been guilty of a huge mistake in classing such a multitude of our ancient monasteries under the head of Canons regular of St. Augustin. Since the eleventh century the name of Canons regular has been confined to these institutions alone, and as such they are usually spoken of in the Canon law, and alluded to by Canonists. Thus Gibert says (Corpus Jur. Can. tit. XIII. reg. 3.); “Tantum seculo XI. visi sunt primum Canonici regulares, sic vocati, quia religiosorum vota faciebant, et ea vitæ clericali adjiciebant.” Of these Canons regular we shall have occasion to treat more largely hereafter. To return to what concerns St. Patrick, Gabriel Pennotus (Hist. Can. Reg. lib. 2. c. 34, 35.) and some other writers zealous for the honour of their institution have pretended, that our saint was a Canon regular, that is, of St. Augustin. But their claim has been strenuously opposed by several writers of the order of Augustinian hermits, more generally known by the single name of Augustinians, who maintain that he was one of themselves. Colgan has a whole dissertation on this contest, (Tr. Th. p. 237, seqq.) in which he states the arguments of both parties; and it is amusing enough to observe, with what sort of historical and critical skill the question has been handled, and how honest Colgan has endeavoured to accommodate matters between the disputants. Let it suffice here to remark, that both parties are in the wrong; the former for the reasons already assigned; and the latter for a reason equally powerful, viz. because the order of Augustinian hermits did not exist until about the beginning of the 13th century, when they appeared in Lombardy under the name of Eremitæ fratris Joannis Boni, ordinis S. Augustini; and afterwards became more generally known in consequence of the bulls concerning them of Gregory IX. and Alexander IV. both of whom lived in that century. I now conclude this long note with asserting, that St. Patrick was never a monk, properly so called, nor a Canon regular of St. Augustin, nor an Augustinian hermit.

(134) There were no Canons of any sort attached to the church of St. John Lateran until the time of Pope Gelasius, whose pontificate began A. D. 492. So Onuphrius Panvinius tells us (Lib. 2. de Eccl. Later. c. 3.) and adds, that they lived in common ac-ording to the rule of St. Augustin. This might be understood as merely meaning, that they lived in a manner similar to that of St. Augustin's establishment, (see above Not. 64.) did he not elsewhere call them Canons Regular of St. Augustin; "Gelasius Canonicos, ut vocant, Regulares ordinis Sti. Augustini Laterani primus collocavit, qui ibidem usque ad Bonifacium VIII. a quo expulsi sunt, permanserunt. Ex Archivis basilicæ Lateranensis." (Note to Platina's Life of Felix II. alias III. just before the Life of Gelasius.) That learned man was certainly mistaken in this point; for the Canons regular of St. Augustin were for the first time placed in the Lateran church by Alexander II. (Fleury Instit. Part 1. cap. 22.) and, as Onuphrius himself marks in his Ecclesiastical chronology, in the year 1062, or as it would appear from Fleury, (Hist. Eccl. L. 61. §. 6.) in 1063.

(135) It is plain from the nature of the business, upon which St. Patrick went to Rome, that he was not regularly attached to the service of any church there; and that his stay was short can be easily collected from a comparison of dates. His arrival in that city could scarcely be previous to the year 431, and from the sequel it will appear that he left it in the course of said year or very early in the next. It is allowed on all hands, that his abode at Rome on the occasion we are now speaking of was not that, during which it has been said by some that he studied at Rome, nor that of his being a Canon of the Lateran church. Those, who admitted these stories, have looked out for another part of his life, to which these circumstances might be assigned. Usher has affixed to A. D. 402 St. Patrick's first journey to Rome (Pr. p. 790-835. and Ind. Chron.) and quotes some passages, in which it is stated that he spent a considerable time there, which Usher considered as part of the seven years mentioned by Tirechan as passed by the saint in the Gauls, Italy, and the islands. (See above Not. 85.) Tirechan, however, makes no mention of Rome. Colgan, notwithstanding certain difficulties, which he did not well know how to get over, has in substance followed Usher, placing St. Patrick's first arrival in Rome A. D. 403, and observing that he could not have remained there more than six years. (Tr. Th. p. 243.) This was in fact the only period, to which he or Usher could, in their hypothesis of our saint's having been born A. D. 372, or 373, assign those pretended studies at Rome ; for all the years from 409 to 432 were so taken up with other transactions, that no time could be found for them during this interval. But it happens unluckily for this system, that St. Patrick was, as has been shown, at the time guessed at for his Roman studies a captive in Ireland ; nor had Usher, by whom Colgan was led astray, any ground for his calculations except the fables concerning our saint, when on his way to Rome, having met Kiaran of Saigir and Declan in Italy ; which fables have been already exploded (chap. I.). Besides, there is not a word in any of the Lives of St. Patrick relative to those studies at Rome or his ever having been there until he went thither on the business of the Irish mission. As, however, it was stated in some of those Lives that he had been actually at Rome, and received the Pope's benediction, &c. this was amplified into his having remained there a considerable time for the sake of study. Yet Nennius is the only old writer, in whom we find this story, which, were it true, would certainly not have been omitted by all those, who had professedly undertaken to give an account of his life. The Bollandists, although they placed St. Patrick's birth ten years before the true time, did not, however, find room for those Roman studies, nor did they bring St. Patrick to Rome until A. D. 430. (See above Not. 131.) If it should be asked, whether he had been at Rome for any time ever so short before he went thither on the affair of the mission, I will answer that such a question is of no consequence, and that there is nothing to be met with in any of the Lives, which may lead us to think so. Were we indeed to follow the printed text of Probus, such a conclusion would seem to follow ; for we read (L. 1. c. 20.) that he went to Rome and received the Pope's blessing ; and then (cap. 21, 22.) it is stated that he remained a considerable time with St. German, who, when the proper time was arrived for his setting out for Ireland, sent with him the priest, whom he calls Regirus. (See Not. 132.) But it is evident, that the text of Probus has in that part of the book been deranged (Not. 77.) and that what is found in cap. 20. ought to follow cap. 22. This is confirmed by what Probus has about that priest having been sent with our saint as a witness or voucher for his character. Was he to vouch for him to the people of Ireland, who knew less of that priest than of St. Patrick himself ? And yet such would appear to be the meaning of Probus, were we to adhere to the order of his text as printed; and we should also admit that, according to Probus, our saint was sent to Ireland not by the Pope but by St. German himself; for, as the text now stands, neither Rome nor Celestine is mentioned after what we find in capp. 21 and 22. The circumstance, however, of St. Patrick being said to have been accompanied by the priest, which, as we read in others of the Lives, was for the purpose of introducing him to the Pope, shows that Probus could not have meant what the text in its present state would seem to convey. If what Tirechan says about the saint having been not only in the islands but in Italy were true, we might suppose it probable that on some occasion or other he visited Rome, as other holy men used to do; but a visit is very different from a permanent residence.

§. XVI. The business upon which St. Patrick went to Rome, and what occurred in consequence, is very clearly and consistently stated by Erric of Auxerre and in some of the Lives, whence we learn that the saint, being approved of by the Pope, received his benediction, and was empowered by him to proceed to Ireland. (136) But they do not inform us, that he was consecrated bishop at Rome, while on the contrary in the greater part of the Lives his consecration is placed elsewhere, and after his departure from Rome, as will be seen lower down. It will also appear from the Confession, that he was consecrated not far from his own country, and, comparing the authorities furnished us in the Lives, in some part of the North-west of Gaul. It is easy to account for his not having been made bishop at Rome; for Palladius was the person fixed upon as chief of the mission and as the bishop on that occasion; (137) nor was it or is it usual to send, on the commencement of a mission, more than one bishop to any one country, particularly of such small extent as Ireland. Thus Gregory the great appointed at first but one bishop, Augustin, for the mission of England. (138) The account of St. Patrick's consecration by Celestine is not to be met with in any of the Lives except those two compilations of all stories, viz. Jocelin's and the Tripartite ; (139) whence it made its way into some breviaries and other late documents. (140) It has been rejected not only by the Bollandists, but even by Colgan, who, while he holds that St. Patrick was instituted by Celestine, yet maintains that he was not consecrated by him nor at Rome, but somewhere not far from the part of the sea that separates France from Great Britain. (141) Instead of saying with Colgan that St. Patrick was instituted by the Pope, that is, qualified to be consecrated bishop, I think it more consistent to lay down, that he was appointed only principal assistant to Palladius ; a situation, which, although it entitled him to be raised to the episcopacy in case of Palladius' death, was not equivalent to episcopal institution. For it is not to be supposed that, while there was no necessity for his consecration, Palladius being the then bishop, the Pope would have instituted him and thus authorized him to get himself consecrated when and wherever he pleased even during the life-time of Palladius. I have no doubt that the Pope's intention was that, in case of the demise of Palladius, St. Patrick should succeed him ; and there can be no objection to our supposing, that this intention had been officially declared. All this, however, was not tantamount to actual institution. If it be asked, why St. Patrick did not set out for Ireland in company with Palladius, there are two answers at hand ; first, that it is very probable he did not arrive at Rome until after Palladius' departure ; and secondly, that, besides being detained at Rome by some details relative to the mission, he got leave to pay a visit to St. German and his relatives in Gaul, and to settle some domestic concerns before his parting from his friends, under, however, the obligation of repairing to Ireland as soon as he conveniently could.

(136) Erric writes (De Vita &c. S. Germ. L. 1. c. 12.); “Ad sanctum Celestinum urbis Romae Papam per Segetium presbyterum suum eum direxit (Germanus) qui viro praestantissimo probitatis ecclesiasticae testimonium apud sedem ferret apostolicam. Cujus judicio approbatus, auctoritate fultus, benedictione denique roboratus, Hiberniae partes expetiit.” The fourth Life has (cap. 29.); “Misit ergo, ut praefati sumus, S. Germanus B. Patricium Romam, ut cum apostolicae sedis Episcopi licentia ad praedicationem exiret: ita enim ordo exigebat—Perveniente vero illo Romam, a sancto Papa Celestino honorifice est susceptus; et traditis sibi Sanctorum reliquiis ab eodem Papa Celestino in Hiberniam missus est.” The third Life agrees in substance with the fourth, except that St. Patrick’s consecration as bishop is placed before his arrival at Rome and his presenting himself before the Pope, which is contrary to all the other accounts, and is undoubtedly owing to a misplacement of the chapters, by making one the 24th, which ought to be the 26th. By what we find in these and other documents concerning the active part taken by St. German in procuring the appointment of St. Patrick for the Irish mission, we are to explain a passage of the old tract on the Liturgy, in which he is spoken of in general terms as having been constituted for that purpose by German and Lupus: “B. Patricium spiritaliter litteras sacras docuerunt (Germanus et Lupus) atque enutrierunt, et ipsum episcopum per eorum praedicationem archiepiscopum in Scotiis ac Britanniis posuerunt.” This does not exclude his having been previously directed to Rome by German (for elsewhere we do not find that Lupus was concerned in this business) and chosen among others by Celestine through his recommendation. Perhaps the word praedicationem here signifies commendation or praise according to a truly classical acceptance, which we find in the best writers; as when Cicero says, Virtutem alicujus optime praedicare. Were we to interpret it preaching, how could it apply in this place? For no one could be appointed to any situation by mere preaching. The meaning of the passage may then be this, that, in consequence of those saints having recommended St. Patrick, he became at length a bishop or archbishop, and was employed in Ireland, &c. In a somewhat similar passage of William of Malmesbury quoted above (Not. 129.) Celestine is expressly mentioned as the person, by whose order German sent St. Patrick to Ireland.

(137) It is worth remarking, that this is the very reason assigned in some of the Lives for St. Patrick's not having been consecrated bishop sooner than he was. The Scholiast says that, when St. Patrick went to Rome on what he pretends was the first of two visits to that city (see above Not. 131.) the Pope refused to ordain him, i. e. bishop; and why? Because he had already appointed Palladius; "Nec ei honorem dedit; quia ante misit S. Palladium." The same reason is assigned, and in clearer terms by Probus (L. 1. c. 24.); "Necdum tamen vir Domini Patricius ad pontificalem gradum fuerat promotus; quod ideo nimirum distulerat, quia sciebat quod Palladius archidiaconus Celestini—ordinatus ab eodem Papa directus fuerat ad hanc insulam." And the second Life, in accounting for the delay with regard to St. Patrick's consecration, has (cap. 23.); "Certi etenim erant quoniam Palladius archidiaconus a Celestino Papa urbis Romæ—ordinatus et missus fuerat ad hanc insulam."

(138) Bede Eccl. Hist. L. 1. c. 27.

(139) See Jocelin cap. 25. and Tripartite, L. 1. c. 39. In the latter we have this pretty statement; Celestinus Papa coram S. Germano et Amato rege Romano eum (Patricium) ordinavit in episcopum, et Patricii insignivit nomine." St. German was certainly not at Rome in the year 432. And who was Amatus king of Rome? Something about Amator the predecessor of St. German was floating on the compiler's brain, and accordingly he patched up this neat piece of intelligence. From a similar source proceeded an equally ridiculous passage of the Scholiast. (Above Not. 131.)

(140) See Usher p. 841.

(141) To the authorities in favour of St. Patrick's consecration at Rome Colgan opposes the "antiquiores actorum S. Patricii aucthores," viz. the authors of the second, third, and fourth Lives. He then sums up his conclusions in these words: "Ex adductis supra testimoniis infero sequentia corollaria. Primum; quod S. Patricius prius fuerit a sede Apostolica institutus episcopus, et destinatus ad conversionem Hiberniæ, quam in episcopum consecratus. Secundum; quod audita jam morte Palladii (qui anno 431 obiit) et per consequens anno ultimo Celestini (qui obiit anno 432 die sexto Aprilis) S. Patricius in episcopum consecratus et in Hiber- niam missus fuerit. Ex quibus etiam refellitur placitum Malbranci asserentis ipsum anno 424 fuisse a Celestino ordinatum. Tertium ; quod episcopus, qui ordinavit S. Patricium (sive Amathus, sive Amatorex vel Amator vocetur) non fuerit S. Amator antecessor S. Germani in sede Antissiodorensi ; cum Amator Antissiodorensis obierit anno 418, die primo Maii—Quartum ; si concedamus S. Patricium aliquandiu obivisse munus episcopale Bononiæ inter Morinos, antequam in Hibernia prædicaverit, minime tamen concedi posse, quod illud munus pluribus annis ibi exercuerit, ut contendit Malbrancus, sed solum aliquot mensibus anni 432, quo ordinatus et missus in Hiberniam." (Tr. Th. p. 253.) He then gives it as his opinion, that St. Patrick was consecrated somewhere in Belgium or in the neighbourhood of that country.

§. xvii. St. Patrick left Rome either late in the year 431 or early in 432. Were we to believe some late writers, he was accompanied by Germanus, Axiilius and Servinius, Canons of St. John Lateran. That there were no Canons of that church in those times, we have seen already. As to Germanus, he is not mentioned in any of the Lives as a traveling companion of our saint ; and it is plain that a Germanus having been mentioned as such was owing to a misconception relative to the part, which St. German of Auxerre had acted for the purpose of having St. Patrick sent to Ireland. (142) The other two are very much spoken of in our church history under the names of Auxilius and Iserninus, or, as some call the latter, Esserninus or Serenus. They certainly were afterwards in Ireland with St. Patrick. It is stated in some of the Lives, that they were promoted to some degree of holy orders at the same time and in the same place that he was consecrated bishop. But whether they accompanied him from Rome, or were selected by him from among young clergymen of his acquaintance in Gaul cannot, as far as I know, be ascertained ; particularly as there are reasons to doubt whether they came to Ireland with St. Patrick or rather some years later. (143)

Be this as it may for the present, and passing over some stories of Jocelin and others about the number of St. Patrick's companions, (144) we may assume as certain that our saint went to Auxerre to take his leave of St. German; (145) and next we find him in a town called Eboria or Eburia situated somewhere in the Northwest of Gaul. (146) Colgan has endeavoured (147) to find out this town in or near Belgium; but his conjectures do not agree either with the names of places or with the situations of them. His thinking that it was the same as Boulogne might do very well, were there not too great a difference between the names Eboria and Bononia. Nor can his other conjecture of its having been in the country of the Eburones, now called the territory of Liege, be admitted; whereas, besides there having been no town there of that name, (148) the direction, in which it lies, would not have answered for a tour from Auxerre towards Great Britain. It was probably Evreux in Normandy; for the name Ebroica, (149) one of those by which it has been known, differs but little from Eboria. Evreux is near enough to the sea to agree with what is said of St. Patrick's having soon after his being there embarked for Great Britain, if we suppose that he took shipping at the mouth of the Seine; which is not improbable, considering his wish to hasten his arrival in Ireland as much as possible (150)

(142) The name of this Germanus was, as Usher conjectures, first introduced by that mighty historian Vincent of Beauvais, who in some part of his Speculum Historiale has; "Mittitur cum Germano Patricius, et Hiberniis episcopus ordinatur." Poor Vincent perhaps meant the great St. German; but we know, that he was not sent with St. Patrick. Usher seemed inclined to think, that a Germanus, who is said to have been made bishop of the Isle of Man, might have accompanied him. (See Pr. p. 842.) But it will be seen elsewhere, that there was no such person.

(143) See Usher p. 842 and Colgan Tr. Th. p. 19.

(144) Jocelin says (cap. 26.) that he was accompanied all the way from Rome by 20 men distinguished for their morals and wisdom. The third Life (cap. 27.) and Usher's Tripartite give him 24 companions, and others raise the number to 34, partly it seems from Rome, and partly picked up elsewhere. (See Pr. p. 845.) Such a huge number of missionaries at one stroke was never heard of before nor since. Not to mention the expense of conveying and maintaining such a caravan, why did not those story-tellers reflect that, if St. Patrick were to appear in Ireland with such a host of foreigners, and particularly Romans, he and the whole of them would have been driven immediately out of the country?

(145) It would be unnecessary to look for authorities in proof of a circumstance so natural, especially as Auxerre lay in the very track of our saint's journey. On this subject we may safely believe what Jocelin tells us (cap. 26.): "Versus Hiberniam—regressum maturavit. Divertit autem ad B. Germanum nutritorem et eruditorem suum; ex cujus munere accepit calices et vestimenta sacerdotalia, copiam codicum et alia quæ pertinent ad cultum et ministerium ecclesiasticum."

(146) That Eboria was in that part of the Gauls is evident from the concurrent testimonies of Probus and the second and fourth Lives, in which it is spoken of as not far from the port, at which St. Patrick embarked for Great Britain. The Bollandists well knowing, that it must have been in the continent, have by a strange conjecture, for which they had no foundation except a certain similarity of name, converted Eboria into Eporedia, now Ivrea in Piedmont. (Comment. &c. ad V. S. P. §. 5.) Could Ivrea be said to be near a port, whence one could sail for Great Britain after having been at Auxerre?

(147) Tr. Th. p. 254.

(148) The Eburones are mentioned by Cæsar, De Bel. Gall. L. 2. §. 4. L. 6. §. 31. and elsewhere. In his time they had a town named Atuatuca. Afterwards their chief town was Tongern, so called from Tongri, which was another name of the tribe. (Cellarius, Geogr. Ant. L. 2. c. 3.)

(149) The people of the district, in which Evreux is situated, are called by Cæsar (L. 3. §. 15.) Auleri Ebuovices. In Peutinger's table and Antoninus' Itinerary from Rouen to Paris their town is called Mediolanum Aulercorum. Afterwards it went by the name of Civitas Ebroicorum, then Ebroica, and so on until the name was frenchified into Evreux. See Cellarius, L. 2. c. 2. and Hadr. Vales. Not. Gall. at Aulerici Eburovices.

(150) It may be objected that, if St. Patrick embarked at the mouth of the Seine, he would have lost the opportunity of seeing his relatives at or near Boulogne before his final departure from his country. To this we may answer that, on his going to Rome he most probably knew that he would be certainly sent to Ireland, and accordingly might have taken his last leave of his friends before he set out on that journey. And for reasons, which will be seen below, (Not. 161) he might have wished not to go again to Boulogne. Besides who knows but he had relatives also at Evreux? In the territory of that city there was a town called Conchæ, now Conches; and, however bold the conjecture may appear, yet it is not unreasonable to suspect, that his mother, who was called Conchessa, might have got that name from having been a native of Conchæ.

§. XVIII. While our saint was still in that place, Augustin, Benedict, and some others, who had left Ireland with Palladius, came to him and announced to him the death of the latter in Britain. (151) Hence it appears, that they were already apprized of St. Patrick's having been appointed to the Irish mission and next in rank to Palladius. On receiving this information it became requisite for St. Patrick to be consecrated, as the mission could not go on without a bishop, nor were there any bishops then in Ireland. (152) For this purpose he applied to a venerable prelate, who lived in the neighbourhood of Eboria, and from him received episcopal consecration. (153) Probus says this prelate's name was Amator, while by others he is called Amatorex, (154) Amathæus, Amatus, &c. (155) It is probable that those writers had in view Amator bishop of Auxerre, and that they might have confounded St. Patrick's ordination as priest with his consecration as bishop. (156) But, as he was dead 14 years before the time we are treating of, he could not have been the bishop, by whom our saint was consecrated. (157) Nor do we find any Gallican prelate, living at that time, named Amator or Amatus. The venerable St. Amandus of Bourdeaux, who succeeded Delphinus about A. D. 404, was still alive in the year 432, having survived St. Paulinus of Nola, who died in the year 431. (158) The name Amandus might have been easily changed into Amatus, Amathaeus, or Amator. The description given by Probus and others of the consecrator of St. Patrick corresponds very well with what we know of St. Amandus. For they represent him as an archbishop, and a man of extraordinary sanctity. The chief and perhaps only difficulty that occurs against supposing that St. Amandus was the prelate alluded to by these writers is, that Bourdeaux was too far out of the track of St. Patrick's journey towards Great Britain. To this it may be answered, that St. Amandus, of whose proceedings we know little or nothing after about the year 408, might, in consequence of the troubles caused by the irruption of the Goths, the devastation of Bourdeaux in the year 414 or 415, and the final occupation of that city by them in 418 or 419, (159) have been obliged to quit his diocese and to take shelter in some part of the Gauls not subject to that nation. About the very time, that St. Patrick was on his way towards Ireland, the southern provinces of that country were harrassed by wars between the Romans and the Goths. The want of information concerning the transactions of the last years of St. Amandus' life and even the time of his death seems to lead to a conclusion, that he had retired into some solitary place, such as Probus and others hint at by giving us to understand, that the consecrator of St. Patrick lived in the country. Add to this, that no account remains of any archbishop of Bourdeaux between him and Gallicinus, who held that see about the year 474. (160) If, however, St. Amandus was not the prelate sought for, our not being able to decide who Amator might have been does not invalidate the truth of the transaction, it being well known that the history of the Gallican prelates of those days is very imperfect, and that the names of many of them are sunk in oblivion. We have an instance of this in the case just referred to of Gallicinus being the next mentioned as archbishop of Bourdeaux after St. Amandus.

(151) Probus has (L. 1. c. 25.); “Audientes itaque de morte Palladii archidiaconi, discipuli illius, qui erant in Britanniis, id est, Augustinus, Benedictus, et cæteri venerunt ad St. Patricium in Euboriam, et mortem Palladii ei denunciabant.” The second Life (cap. 26.) and the fourth (cap. 31.) give the same account, and nearly in the same words. Harris, although he had the works now quoted before his eyes, yet has fabricated a quite different account of the matter; and tells us (Bishops p. 11.) that, “as Palladius died among St. Patrick’s relations, it was easy for him to hear of his death, which he soon did.” He adds, that the saint was then at Auxerre. What stuff, invented to keep up the story of St. Patrick’s having been a native of North Britain! Even had he been such, what right had Harris to say, that Palladius died among his relations? For Kilpatrick, where Harris pretends that St. Patrick was born, is at a great distance from Fordun, where Palladius died. (See Chap. 1. not. 149.) And what relatives could St. Patrick, who was born in a Roman province, have among the Picts? As to his having got that news at Auxerre, it is not worth arguing against; unless one would say that Eboria and Auxerre were the same place; which, independently of the great difference of the names, would be in direct opposition to Probus and the other writers, who often mention Auxerre under its own name of Antlissiodorum.

(152) See Chap. 1.

(153) Probus after the words cited (Not. 151.) immediately subjoins; “Patricius autem et qui cum eo erant declinaverunt iter ad quemdam mirae sanctitatis hominem summum episcopum Amatorem nomine, in propinquo loco habitantem; ubi S. Patricius, sciens quæ superventura essent illi, episcopali gradu ab eodem archipraesule Amatore sublimatus est.” The second and fourth Lives (loc. cit.) agree with Probus almost word for word; and the third Life has the same in substance, cap. 24. Notwithstanding these explicit testimonies, some of the writers, who hold that St. Patrick was consecrated at Rome, pretend that he went thither after he had heard of the death of Palladius. Usher, who took the lead on this point, (see Ind. Chron. at A. 432) has been followed by Harris, and others. The Bollandists also, though they admit that St. Patrick was not consecrated at Rome, yet send him to that city after the death of Palladius, that is, according to them, on a second expedition (above Not. 131). The whole of this hypothesis was framed for the purpose of explaining how it came to pass, that St. Patrick was appointed head of the Irish mission after Palladius. But had it been considered, that the whole business had been arranged at Rome before the departure of Palladius, and that due provision had been made for supplying his place in case of any untoward accident, those writers would not have placed themselves in direct opposition to Probus and the above quoted Lives, without being able to produce from any other a single passage in favour of their system. For even the Scholiast does not say, that St. Patrick before his second going to Rome had heard of Palladius' death, but merely that, while he was there, the Pope had got an account of it. (See Not. 131.) And this is likewise all that Jocelin (cap. 25.) and the Tripartite (L. 1. c. 39.) have on the subject. Usher's hypothesis has given rise to a very serious objection, and I allow, very hard to answer on his principles, against the mission of St. Patrick by Pope Celestine. It is this. Palladius arrived in Ireland A. D. 431, and remained there until about the end of said year. (See Chap. 1. §. xvi.) Between his departure from Ireland and arrival at Fordun some not very short time must have intervened, probably three weeks or a month. How long he stayed at Fordun we do not know, but there is no reason to make us think, that he died as soon as he reached that place. It is altogether most likely, that he lived until some time in the year 432. Then we must allow some weeks to have passed between the day of his death and the time, at which news of it was announced to St. Patrick at Eboria in Gaul or at Auxerre, as some of those writers would have it. For besides some delay, which it is reasonable to suppose Palladius' companions made at Fordun after his death, it is to be observed that the distance between it and the part of Gaul, where St. Patrick then was, is very considerable, and that in those days there was neither post-travelling nor fast-sailing packet boats. On the whole I think it must be admitted, that our saint could not have heard of Palladius' death until about the latter end of February or the beginning of March A. D. 432. How then can we account for a journey of his to Rome and his arriving there in due time to be consecrated, or even to receive powers relative to the mission from Pope Celestine, who died on the sixth of April in that year? To obviate this objection Usher says, that Bale or Balaeus (Centur. 14.) assigns the death of Palladius to the 15th of December. Harris (Bishops p. 11.) and O'Flaherty (Ogygia vind. ch. 16.) have greedily seized on this date. Now admitting it, no small difficulty still remains. For in all probability St. Patrick, whether at Auxerre or elsewhere in Gaul, could not get the account of it until about a month after; accordingly his preparations for going to Rome, the journey thither, and his proceeding there must be all crammed into the time that elapsed between the middle of January and the latter end of March; I say the latter end of March, whereas we are not to suppose, that the Pope could attend to business until the very day of his death. The fact however is, that Palladius did not die as soon as that despicable scribbler has stated; for the Anglican Martyrology and Ferrarius, much better authorities than Bale, place his natalis, or exit from this world, on the 27th of January. (P. Ferrar. Catal. &c. at said day, and Colgan Tr. Th. p. 18.) As to what some have said of his having died on the 6th July, that is A. D. 432 (for it would be absurd to assign it to A. D. 431 the year of Palladius' departure from Rome for Ireland) this date would be still more contrary to Usher's calculations; but there are much better reasons for affixing Palladius' death to January 27. The short way to get rid of these difficulties is to reject the whole of Usher's hypothesis, as indeed we must in conformity with all the old Lives of St. Patrick. I have dwelt thus much on this subject, merely to show the futility of the objection now discussed, and which has been so often brought forward by persons not acquainted with the true history of our saint.

(154) Second Life, cap. 26; Third, cap. 24. Fourth, cap. 31. &c.

(155) See Usher p. 839.

(156) See above Not. 75.

(157) Baronius fell into this mistake (in Martyrol. Roman. Mai. 1.) Pagi in his strictures on the Annals of Baronius (Critica, &c. ad A. 431.) throws out a conjecture almost equally inadmissible. Having found an Amator bishop of Autun, of whom the Sammarthani make mention (in the Gallia Christiana) about the year 314, he thought he might have been the consecrator of St. Patrick, and that accordingly this Amator was not as ancient as is commonly supposed. But, not to enlarge on the awkwardness of making a huge leap of above 100 years on no other foundation than a mere coincidence of names, Autun is not so situated as to allow us to look for Eboria in its neighbourhood. Instead of lying between Auxerre and the Ocean, it is between that city and Rome. Now, supposing even that it was on his way from Rome to Auxerre that St. Patrick got the account of Palladius' death, and supposing him to be then near Autun, who does not see that he would have pushed forward to Auxerre to be there consecrated by his friend St. German, rather than stop at Autun, which is not very far distant from it?

(158) Sammarthan. Gallia Christiana, Tom. 2. col. 789, 790. It is there added, that he was perhaps the Amandus, who subscribed the synodical epistle of the Gallican bishops to Pope Leo, A. 451.

(159) Tillemont having touched on these transactions makes the following remark; "Il ne faut pas s'étonner si parmi tant de troubles il ne s'est rien conservé des actions de S. Amand." Memoires, &c. Tom. x. Art. S. Amand.

(160) Tillemont, ib. It is related by Gregory of Tours, that St. Amandus gave up his see for some years to a St. Severinus. If so, might not the year 432 have been one of them, and spent by him in retirement?

§. XIX. On the occasion of St. Patrick being about to be consecrated bishop, a person, who had been a friend of his, publicly announced a fault, which the saint had been guilty of when a boy, and of which we have already seen an account in this chapter. This friend's object seems to have been to prevent St. Patrick from going to Ireland and quitting his own country for ever. For this purpose he did not scru-ple to denounce him as unworthy of being promoted to the episcopacy, expecting that thereby he would be obliged to remain among his relatives and friends, who were very anxious on this subject, and not only besought him with tears in their eyes not to quit them, but even offered him many presents to induce him to remain. (161) These persuasives failing, recourse was had to the desperate shift of endeavouring to excite a prejudice against him in the mind of the consecrating bishop. But all these manœuvres were of no avail; for the Lord was with him and enabled him to surmount every difficulty. (162) From what we have now seen, it is evident, as Tillemont has properly observed, (163) that St. Patrick was consecrated in his own country, by which we are not to understand his mere native town, but some place not very far from which his relatives and old friends and acquaintances resided. This is an additional proof, that he was not consecrated at Rome. It is also an invincible proof, that he was a native of the Continent, and precisely of some part of the N. West of the country now called France; (164) nothing being better ascertained than that he was consecrated bishop before he embarked at some Gallic port for G. Britain. If the neighbourhood of Evreux was the place of his consecration, there is nothing to prevent our supposing that he had relatives in that part of Gaul; (165) and, as to his paternal connexions at Boulogne, it will not be denied that some of them, on hearing that he was at Evreux, might have repaired thither with a view of endeavouring to put a stop to his going to Ireland. And here it may be allowed to observe, that St. Patrick's not making the route by Boulogne his way to G. Britain might have been owing in some measure to his wish to avoid the importunities of his relatives, whom he had already found so much opposed to his determination.

(161) " Sed ut Patriam et parentes amitterem; et munera multa mihi offerebantur, cum fletu et lachrymis, et offendi illos, necnon contra votum aliquantis de senioribus meis. Sed, gubernante Deo, nullo modo consensi, neque adquievi illis, non mea gratia, sed Deus qui vicit in me, et restitit illis omnibus, ut ego venirem ad Hibernas gentes Evangelium praedicare." Confess. p. 14. The seniores, whom he mentions, were apparently his elder relatives and friends. He uses the same term, where he speaks of the charge brought against him by the former friend, whom he reckons among them. "Et quando temptatus sum áb aliquantis senioribus meis, qui venerunt, et peccata mea (divulgaverunt) contra laboriosum episcopatum meum—adversus verbum quod confessus fueram antequam essem diaconus, propter anxietatem moesto animo insinuavi amicissimo meo, quae in pueritia," &c. Ib. p. 10. Tillemont's conjecture (Mem. Tom. xvi. p. 459.) that by seniores he meant priests agrees with neither the context, which plainly shows, that under at least a part of these seniores he comprized some of his relatives, nor with his using the word presbyter, wherever he talks of a priest. Besides, it would be very awkward for a person, while as yet only a priest himself, to use the phrase my priests.

(162) See above Not. 16.

(163) Mem. Tom. xvi. p. 458. He adds (p. 783.) and that country G. Britain. In this point Tillemont followed the current opinion of his day, having relied on Usher and the Bollandists; without paying any attention to Probus and the other Lives, several of which he appears never to have looked into.

(164) Compare with Not. 141. (165) See Not. 150.

§. xx. It is related, that Auxilius, Iserminus and some others received certain clerical orders on the same day that St. Patrick was consecrated, and from the same bishop. (166) These persons are spoken of as companions of his on the affair of the mission. (167) Every thing being thus arranged, St. Patrick soon after embarked, probably at the mouth of the Seine, and had a prosperous passage to G. Britain. According to Probus and some of the Lives he crossed that country without stopping on the way, and hastened his course until he arrived in Ireland. (168) Yet some writers pretend, that he preached for some days in G. Britain, (169) and it is added that he spent some time in the neighbourhood of Menevia, or, as it is now called, St. David's in Wales. (170) As these subjects are of little consequence, it is unnecessary to enter into any further discussion about them. (171)

(166) The second Life has (cap. 26.); "Sed etiam Auxilius et Serenus (Iserminus), et caeteri inferioris gradus, ordinati sunt eodem die, quo sanctus Patricius." The fourth Life (cap. 31.) has nearly the same words. Probus, (L. 1. c. 25.) without giving their names writes; "Sed et alii nonnulli clerici ad officium inferioris gradus ordinati sunt." Nennius seems to say, that Auxilius was then ordained priest and Iserminus deacon. Whence he got this information I do not know; nor is the matter worth inquiring into.

(167) See above §. xvii.

(168) Tunc venerabilis sacerdos Domini Patricius navem celeriter ascendit, et pervenit in Britanniam, omissisque omnibus ambulandi anfractibus cum omni velocitate, prospero fluctu mare nostrum in nomine S. Trinitatis adiit." Probus L. 1. c. 25. Second Life, cap. 26. &c.

(169) Nennius in a passage, almost word for word the same with that just quoted from Probus, throws in this addition; "Et praedicavit ibi (in Britannia) non multis diebus." In the chronicle of Matth. Florilegus the not many days of Nennius have been changed into many. See Usher, p. 839, 843.

(170) Usher, p. 843. seqq. (171) See above §. xiv. and Not. 125.

CHAPTER V.

St. Patrick's arrival on his mission A. D. 432. Landed somewhere in Leinster—After a short time goes to E. Ulster—His proceedings there—Returning thence goes to Meath—His reception there by the king Leogaire and others—His transactions in various parts of that province—Proceeds to Connaught, where in the course of several years he converted a vast number of persons—Termination of his mission in that part of Ireland.

SECT. I.

AT length we are come to St. Patrick's arrival in Ireland, which was in the year 432. (1) Pope Celestine was already dead; for the Irish Annals, (2) in marking the date of this event, add, that it took place in the first year of the Pontificate of Sixtus, viz. Sixtus the third, who, after a vacancy of 21 days, was raised to the Papal chair on the 28th of April in the same year. Hence it appears, that our saint did not land in Ireland until some time after that day. The place, where he landed, is generally supposed to have been what is now called Wicklow; for Probus tells us that it was a harbour, then very famous among the Irish, in the country of the Evoleni, which country or district, according to Colgan and other antiquaries, was a maritime tract of the present county of Wicklow. (3) Other writers call St. Patrick's landing place Inbher-de, that is, the mouth of a river De or Dee, (4) which those, who hold that our saint landed at Wicklow, tell us was the ancient name of its little river now called Leitrim. (5) St. Patrick having landed went to a place in the neighbourhood called Anat-cailtrin, where he was repulsed by the natives and obliged to go again on board the ship.

(6) This repulse has been stated as proceeding from Nathi Hua-Garrechon, who had already opposed Palladius. (7) There are, however, very good reasons to doubt whether Nathi had any thing to do with this affair, particularly as we have but very slender authority for it, (8) nor is Nathi spoken of on this occasion in the greatest part of the Lives. And it is not very likely, that St. Patrick would have preferred landing in the district belonging to a chief, who had declared himself so hostile to the Christian religion. What follows, on the same authority, concerning Sinell, a Leinster man, the son or rather grandson of Finchada, having been the first convert and the first person baptized in Ireland by our Apostle, (9) is not less doubtful. For, besides that Sinell is stated to have lived until A. D. 549 (10) and accordingly could not have been, in 432, of an age sufficient to become a convert, Probus and others Lives inform us, that Dichu, a native of Ulster, was the first person converted in Ireland by St. Patrick ; and it is more than probable, that what has been said about Sinell originated in provincial pride and rivalry. After St. Patrick's leaving Aonach Tailten, or rather Anat-caltrain, Usher's Tripartite sends him to a place called Rath-inbher, so called from having been a castle near the mouth of a river. Usher threw out a conjecture (11) that this place might have been the same as Old-court near Bray at the mouth of its little river, and has been followed by Harris and others, as if it were almost certain. But that name would answer equally well for a place near the mouth of any river, and, considering the circumstances of the narrative, better for the neighbourhood of the river, at which our saint landed, than of any other. Jocelin relates, that from Anat-cailtrin St. Patrick turned off towards a small island not far from the shore since called St. Patrick's island. (12) If this statement be correct, it will follow that Anat-cailtrin was in the tract extending from Dublin to Skerries, near which is that small island now called Holm-patrick. It will also follow that Inbher-dee must be looked for somewhere in the bay of Dublin, or between it and Skerries. (13) Another account, without mentioning Anat-cailtrin, states that St. Patrick, after the opposition he had met with, returned to the ship which had brought him to Ireland, and then turning to the left, that is, to the North, with an intention of proceeding to Ulster, and sailing along the coast of the Bregenses, put in at Holm-patrick, (14) where he remained for some time. Probus, who makes no mention of the opposition made to our Apostle, or of his having put in at Holm-patrick, agrees with the other Lives in stating, that his reason for going forthwith to Ulster was to pay a visit to his former master Milcho, and to endeavour to bring him over to the Christian faith. (15)

(1) It would be a waste of time to adduce proofs of this being the true date; for, besides its being the only one that can agree with what we have seen about Prosper's mission, Pope Celestine, &c. it is laid down in our best Irish Annals. As to what some writers have said to the contrary, it is easy to show, that they were mistaken. Thus the date A. D. 425 assigned by Wm. of Malmesbury (See ch. IV. not. 129) and copied from him by Stanihurst, Alford, Cressy, and others, is strangely erroneous; for, in that case, St. Patrick would have been in Ireland five or six years before Palladius. Tillemont went to an opposite extreme; (Mem. Tom. xvi. p. 784.) and it is strange, that he could have fallen into such a mistake. He thought that St. Patrick's mission could not have commenced before A. D. 440. One of his arguments is that, as Palladius did not arrive in Ireland until A. D. 431, some years should be allowed for his mission, which, as it would appear from Prosper, was attended with some good effects. For a full and satisfactory answer to this argument I beg to refer the reader to Chap. I. and ib. notes 144, 145. His other argument is that, considering the short time, that intervened between Palladius' arrival in Ireland and the death of Celestine, it was impossible that St. Patrick could have been appointed by that Pope as his successor for the Irish mission. This difficulty, which, by the bye, should not have induced Tillemont to go as low down as the year 440, has been already solved by what is stated and discussed at full length in the preceding chapter, and particularly in note 153.

(2) Annals of Ulster, Innisfallen, and the 4 Masters. See Usher p. 1046, and Colgan Tr. Th. p. 254.

(3) Probus writes (L. 1. c. 27.); “Consummato igitur navigio ac labore S. Patricius—in optatum portum regionis Evolenorum, utique apud nos clarissimum, delatus est.” Colgan in a note says, that for Evolenorum we must read Cuolenorum, that is, the tract called in Irish Crioch-cuollan, whence he concludes, that the harbour was that of Kilmantan now called Wicklow. (See also Usher, p. 845.) If Cuolenorum be the true reading, Usher’s and Colgan’s corollary will naturally follow; but I confess I have some doubts on this subject; for it is not easy to admit that the harbour of Wicklow could at any time be very famous, clarissimus, considering not only how badly situated that place is for trade with the interior of Ireland, but likewise the badness of the harbour, which is fit only for small vessels. And if we retain Evolenorum, which I find no sufficient reason for rejecting, we may suppose that Probus meant the harbour of Dublin, i. e. the portum Eblanorum of Ptolemy. Between the two names (b and v being commutable) the difference is very small; and the harbour of Dublin was very celebrated, at least in Probus’ time, the Danes being then in possession of it.

(4) Third Life, cap. 28.—Jocelin, cap. 29. In second Life, cap. 25, Deac.

(5) See Harris, Bishops p. 11. Colgan says, that the real name of that harbour was Inbher-Dagadh, from a prince of that name, who had been drowned there. (Tr. Th. p. 109.)

(6) Third Life, cap. 29. Jocelin (cap. 30.) has Aonach-Tailten, mistaking a place in the interior of the county of Meath, where solemn sports used to be held, and thence called Aonach Tailten or the sports of Tailten, (Colgan Tr. Th. p. 31. not. 43. and Seward at Tailten) for Anat-cailtrin, which was near the sea. In the same third Life both places are well distinguished; for in the chapter now quoted Anat-cailtrin is said to have been overflowed by the sea, while in the 43d chapter mention is made of the place of royal sports, qui dicitur Tailtin. I cannot but think that Tailten or Taitin was situated at or near the place now corruptly called Teltown in the barony of Kells.

(7) See above, Chap. 1. §. xvi. Nathi's opposition to St. Patrick is mentioned in the second Life, cap. 25, and in the Tripartite L. 1. c. 42. The old tract, quoted by Usher (p. 846.) on the same subject, and on what follows about Sinell, was in all likelihood one of the two works now referred to; for the words of the whole passage are almost exactly the same. This passage, as it appears in the second Life, is evidently an interpolation, as it not only breaks the thread of the narrative, but is directly contrary to circumstances related in the 28th and 29th chapters of said Life. Even as it is found in the Tripartite, it smells strongly of interpolation, and has all the appearance of a note, that had crept into the text. It is also to be remarked, that the opposition made by Nathi to St. Patrick is in this work related immediately after that of the people, who lived near Inbher-de, and as distinct from it.

(8) See Not. prec.

(9) The Tripartite adds to what we have seen about Nathi, "Sinell vero filius Finnachdha per praedicationem S. Patricii omnipotenti Deo credidit, et a S. Patricio primus ex gente Scottorum baptizatus fuit; et sibi et semini ejus benedixit vir sanctus." Colgan gives us (Tr. Th. p. 18.) a genealogy of Sinell, whence it appears that he was grandson of Finchada and eighth in descent from Corbmac Cucorb king of Leinster, and says that he was surnamed the elder. The Bollandists have, with regard to Sinell, followed the Tripartite.

(10) To that year (alias 548) is assigned the death of Sinell, alias Senchell, the elder in the Annals of the 4 Masters. See Tr. Th. p. 188. no. 120, and his Life AA. SS. at 26 Mart. in which there is nothing about his having been converted by St. Patrick.

(11) Pr. p. 846.

(12) Jocelin cap. 30. For Aonach-Tailten of his text I read Anat-cailtrin. See Not. 6.

(13) Since the occupation of all that coast by the Danes or Fingalls it is no wonder, that almost all the old names have been lost.

(14) "Unde navem denuo ingressus dedit vela ventis et, juxta fines Bregensium ad sinistram flectens, dirigit in Ultoniam—In via autem—declinavit ad quamdam parvulam insulam," &c. (Tripart.

L. 1. c. 44.) The country of the Bregenses or Bregii was between Dublin and Drogheda. (Colgan Tr. Th. Ind. Topogr. at Bregae.) If Wicklow was the port of St. Patrick's arrival and accordingly that whence he set sail for Ulster, would the coast of the Bregenses be thus the first spoken of, without any mention of the coast southward between them and Wicklow? Our saint's stopping for a while in Holmpatrick is mentioned also in the second Life cap. 28, and in the fourth, cap. 32. In both of them the district of the Bregenses is the first referred to as to St. Patrick's course towards Ulster.

(15) Probus, L. 1. c. 27. Second Life, cap. 28. Third, cap. 30. Fourth, cap. 32. &c.

§. II. St. Patrick, then continuing his course, arrived with his companions at a port in the district now called the barony of Lecale in the county of Down. (16) Having landed, and gone a little way into the adjacent country to rest themselves and deposit their luggage, they were met by a herd in the service of the lord of the district, whose name was Dichu or Dicho. Thinking they were robbers, he ran to give information to his master, who immediately came up with an armed force for the purpose of exterminating them. Dicho, however, on seeing St. Patrick was so struck with his appearance that, being also internally moved by the Almighty, he brought the whole party to his house, which was at the place now called Saul. There the saint had an opportunity of announcing to him the Christian faith, and, through the mercy of God, Dicho became a believer and was baptized, being the first person converted by St. Patrick in Ireland. All his family followed his example and likewise became Christians. (17) It was, if we are to believe some of the Lives, on this occasion that the celebrated church or chapel, called Sabhall Padruic, or Patrick's barn, as Probus interprets it, (18) was erected. (19) We are told that, in compliance with Dicho's wish, it was, contrary to the usual practice, constructed in a direction from North to South. The reason assigned for its being called a barn is, that it was built according to the form and position of Dicho's barn ; but I should rather think that it was originally nothing else than a real barn belonging to Dicho, in which St. Patrick celebrated divine worship, in the same manner as even in our own times barns have been used in Ireland for the same purpose. This barn was probably thenceforth applied to religious objects. It was certainly, as will be seen, a favourite retreat of our Apostle. On the site of it a regular church and monastery were erected, but not as early as the time we are now treating of. That this barn was presented to St. Patrick by Dicho as a place for religious exercises, and for the accommodation of himself and other pious persons, I see no reason for doubting ; but what is added concerning Dicho's having annexed, by donation, lands for the support of an ecclesiastical establishment there accords neither with the system followed by St. Patrick, (20) nor with the practice of the religious men of those days, who, instead of being endowed with estates, earned their scanty meals with the labour of their hands. The most that may be allowed is, that he accepted of a small field or spot of ground annexed to the barn ; and in fact it is thus that the matter is represented in some of the Lives. (21)

(16) There have been some doubts concerning the part of Lecale, and the port at which St. Patrick landed. Harris says it was the bay of Dundrum ; but it is much more probable that it was at or near Strangford. The part of the sea near where he landed is called a fretum or streights, and the place of landing is represented as being very near Sabhall Padruic or, as it is now called, Saul. These circumstances agree much better with Strangford bay and lough than with any part of the bay of Dundrum. In the second Life we read (cap. 29) ; “ In quoddam fretum, quod est Brennese, se immisit (Patricius) et ad terram descendit ad ostium Slain.” The third Life has (cap. 33.) nearly the same words and, instead of Brennese, reads Brenasse. The Tripartite states the whole matter thus: “Appulit in portu de Inbher Slainge. Ibi que e navi ipsi et socii cgressi defessos artus somno et quiete in loco postea Sabhall Padruic appellato reficiunt.” (L. 1. c. 47.) Colgan says that the fretum Brennese was the same as Lough Cuana, that is, the lake of Strangford; although he adds that it was perhaps part of the bay of Dundrum. This conjecture will not suit what is stated of its proximity to Saul. As to Inbher Slainge, the mouth of the Slainge or Slain, Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 19.) endeavours to account for the name by telling us, that Slieve-donard, the highest of the mountains of Mourne, was anciently called Slainge, and that thence, perhaps, the name was extended to the bay of Dundrum, which is adjacent to a part of those mountains. But it is plain that Slainge, as connected with Inbher, must mean a body of water, and the question then arises, where it is to be found. Harris cuts the difficulty short by giving us a river Slaing or Slain, which, he says, falls into the North end of the bay of Dundrum. I cannot find a river so called in that or any other part of the county of Down, and I am very much inclined to think that Slainge is the same as Strangford lough, or probably a part of it; and that the name Strangford does not mean, as Seward supposes, strong ford, alluding to the rapidity of the current in the bay; for, were this the origin of the name, it should have been called Strangbay, not Strangford. And it is more natural to admit, that Strangford means the ford of the Strang, which is, I dare say, no other than the Slainge, the name of which has by a slight alteration been changed into Strang. Harris had no right to say, that Saul is on the East side of the bay of Dundrum; for it is situated some miles to the North of that bay, and at the East side of a branch of Strangford lough.

(17) This interesting narrative is given very perspicuously by Probus L. 1. c. 28. Second Life, cap. 29. Fourth, cap. 33. As to Dicho having been St. Patrick's first convert, Probus writes; “Credidit ergo homo ille (Dicho) primus omnium insularum cum omni domo et familia sua.” The second Life expresses it still more clearly; “Credidit et baptizatus est, et primus Scotorum per Patricium confessus est.” Here we have a direct contradiction of what appears about Sinell in the interpolation at Ch. 25. of said Life. (See above Not. 7.) The fourth Life has; “Credidit et baptizatus est; qui primus Scotorum, ut fertur, per Patricium confessus est.” Colgan, who wished to reconcile all parties, thought that the matter might be settled by laying down, that Dicho was the first convert not in all Ireland, but in Ulster. This evasion, which has been adopted by Harris, cannot by any means agree with the authorities now quoted. The Tripartite, indeed, treating of this subject, (L. 1. c. 47.) makes Dicho the first Christian in Ulster; an addition that became necessary in consequence not only of what it has about Sinell (above Not. 9.) but likewise of its placing Seschnen and his son Benignus (of whom hereafter) as converts before Dicho. This stuff, together with some strange fables related in that part of the Tripartite, and which Jocelin has not forgot to amplify (cap. 32.), is not worth attending to. The same Tripartite and the third Life (cap. 31.) call Dicho son of Trichem, on which the other Lives are silent. The second and fourth Lives have one Rus son of Trichem, who lived to the South of Dicho’s residence. Had the authors known that Dicho also was his son, it is odd that they have not designated him as such, in the same manner as they did with regard to Rus. Be this as it may, hence has proceeded the notion that Dicho and Rus were brothers. And then come three and four more brothers, all of the most noble house of Dalfiatach descended from Fiatach Fionn once king of Ireland. (See Tr. Th. p. 19—110. Ogygia vind. ch. 12.)

(18) L. 1. c. 28.

(19) Third Life, cap. 31. Tripart. L. 1. c. 47. Jocelin, cap. 32. Usher’s Tripart. Pr. p. 846.

(20) St. Patrick made it a rule not to accept of presents, at least of any considerable value, lest, as he himself says, he might give occasion to the incredulous to defame his ministry. And he challenges the people to point out any donations he had received; “Forte autem, quando baptizavi tot millia hominum, speraverim ab aliquo illorum vel dimidium scriptulæ. Dicite mihi et reddam vobis.” Confess. p. 19. On the contrary he used to make presents, out of his own property, to princes and powerful people for the purpose of smoothing the way for his apostolical exertions, until at length he reduced himself to poverty. Of this more hereafter.

(21) Third Life, cap. 31. Tripart. L. 1. c. 47.

§. III. St. Patrick having remained not many days at Dicho's house, and left his ship or boat in the care of Dicho until he should return, set out by land for the place where Milcho his old master lived. (22) This was, as already observed, (23) in the large territory called Dal-aradia, (24) and its precise situation is marked by the circumstance that it was near the mountain called Mis in the county and barony of Antrim. Proceeding thither our Apostle, according to Probus and others, directed his course to a district occupied by the Crutheni or Irish Picts, and comprized within what we might call the province of Dal-aradia; in which district they seem to place Milcho's habitation. (25) He was an obstinate heathen, and, on hearing of St. Patrick's approach, was determined not to receive or see him. But it will not be easily believed that, to guard against the saint's visit, he set fire to his house, furniture, and property, and, to complete the climax of his folly, threw himself also into the flames and was burned to death. (26) St. Patrick, finding his efforts for the conversion of Milcho unavailing, returned to the district in which Dicho resided, that is, to Maginish, (27) and remaining there for several days preached the Gospel with great success throughout the whole of it. One of his principal converts on this occasion was Rus or Ross son of Trichem, (28) who lived in a town called Derluss, and afterwards Inreathan, (29) near Downpatrick on the South side. Passing over some prodigious fables, that occur concerning Ross in one or two of our saint's Lives, (30) we read that St. Patrick met in that neighbourhood a youth, called Mochoc, whom, after instructing him, he baptized and tonsured, thus dedicating him to the ecclesiastical state. It is added that he gave him the book of the Gospels and some sacred utensils. (31) This, however, must be understood as not having all taken place during the present stay of St. Patrick in Mag-inis or Lecale, whereas some time must be allowed for Mochoe's learning Latin so as to be able to understand the book, and for qualifying himself for the clerical state. (32) And we may admit, that either Mochoe followed St. Patrick, or that, as the saint in the course of his mission visited that country more than once, he had opportunities of furthering the youth's education and of promoting him in the church. Nor is there any thing repugnant to probability in what is related of Mochoe, who is well known in our Calendars and Annals, and, having governed as bishop, or abbot, a church at Antrim, died A. D. 496, (497) June 23. (33)

(22) Probus, L. 1. c. 29. Second Life, cap. 29, 30. The Tripartite and Jocelin mention some transactions as having taken place while St. Patrick had been on this occasion at Dicho's house. Being partly ridiculous, and partly irreconcilable with the short stay he made in that place, they are undeserving of any notice. The vessel, in which the saint had sailed to near Saul, was rather a boat or wherry than a ship; for it is recorded, that on reaching land they hid it in some sequestered part of the coast. This could not have been done, had it been a ship. It was therefore a sort of large boat, which St. Patrick had either purchased or hired.

(23) Chap. IV. §. VI.

(24) Dalaradia must not be confounded with Dalrieda. The former (says Harris, Antiq. p. 48 and Bishops, p. 8.) comprehended the South and S. East parts of the county of Antrim and the greatest part of, if not all, the county of Down. It extended from Newry to the mountain Mis in the barony of Antrim. The latter, he adds, comprehended the North, N. West, and part of the South of the county of Antrim. It has been called also Reuta and by corruption the Routs. According to a statement in Usher's Pr. p. 1029. Dalrieda stretched 30 miles from Glenfinnaght (one of the Antrim Glynnnes in the eastern part of the county) to the river Bush. The Rev. Mr. Dubourdieu in his excellent work, (Statistical Survey of the county of Antrim, p. 4.) extends the Routs (supposed to be the old Dalrieda) more to the West, viz. as far as the river Bann.

(25) The second Life has (cap. 30.); “Cumque vellet ire et visitare praedictum hominem Miliuc coepit per terram iter dirigere ad regionem Cruthenorum donec perveniret ad montem Mis.” We find nearly the same words in the fourth Life, (cap. 34.) and in Probus (L. 1. c. 29) except that, through an error of transcription, Egli appears in the text instead of Mis. These Crutheni, or as they are called in Irish Cruithneach, that is, Picts settled in a part of Ireland, are often spoken of in our history, as distinct from the Picts of G. Britain. Colgan has confounded them with the Dal-aradii in general (Tr. Th. p. 380.) and has been followed by O’Flaherty (marginal notes ib. and elsewhere). Usher is, I think, more correct on this point. His opinion was, that those Crutheni possessed only the northern part of Dal-aradia, viz. the tract since called Clandeboy. (Pr. p. 1019—1047.) The Clandeboy, alluded to by Usher, is what has been named North Clandeboy. I cannot describe it better than by quoting the following passage from Mr. Dubourdieu’s work; p. 3. “North Clandeboy, so called ‘to distinguish it from South Clandeboy, a territory in the county of Down, extended from Carrickfergus bay, and the river Lagan, west to Lough Neagh; consequently it contained the baronies of Belfast, Masserene, and Antrim.” That the name Crutheni was not co-extensive with Dal-aradii is evident from a passage in the third Life (cap. 57.) in which, among other northern tribes converted by St. Patrick, the Cruithne and Dalnaraide are mentioned distinctly; whence we see that, although the Crutheni lived in a part of Dal-aradia, they did not occupy the whole of it, and that there was a tribe or people called Dal-aradians distinct from them. Some of the Crutheni might, perhaps, have been found in other parts of Ulster. A place called Dun-cruthen, apparently in the district now called the barony of Colerain, is mentioned in the Tripartite. (L. 2. c. 125.) Colgan thinks the name signified Fort of the Crutheni, and conjectures that it was the same as Dunboe. How any of those Crutheni or Picts came to be settled in Ireland, is not easy to discover. In the Chronicon Pictorum, published by Innes (Critical Essay, &c. Vol. 2.) an allusion is made to the Picts of Ireland. Whether some of the Picts, who, as Bede tells us, (Eccl. Hist. L. 1. c. 1.) touched at Ireland before they occupied the northern parts of G. Britain, were allowed to remain in Ireland, let those, who have more leisure, inquire.

(26) This story is told in almost all the Lives of St. Patrick. If there be any truth in it, we may suppose that Milcho's house was by some accident burned, and that he lost his life on that occasion. This misfortune would be naturally attributed to his refusing to see the saint; and thus was laid a foundation for story-tellers to build on. It is added that St. Patrick foretold that, in consequence of the horrible act of Milcho, all his posterity would be reduced to slavery. If so, how can the Tripartite, which in common with the other Lives, relates this prediction, be reconciled with itself, when it makes Guasact, afterwards bishop at Granard, a son of Milcho, and places two sisters of his, both called Emeria, in the nunnery of Clonbrone near that town (L. 2. c. 30.)? Jocelin also has (cap. 36.) those two Emerias of Clonbrone, but makes no mention of Guasact. Both he and the Tripartite had already given us a pretended vision of Milcho relative to these circumstances. (See above Ch. IV. not. 39.) That there were such persons in Ireland and probably in St. Patrick's time, I do not mean to question; but we have no sufficient grounds to make us believe, that Milcho was their father. In Tirechan's list of St. Patrick's disciples (ap. Usher, Pr. p. 951.) I find a Gosachus, who was, perhaps, the same person as Guasactus.

(27) The second Life has (cap. 30) campum Inish ubi Dichu erat. The same name occurs in the fourth Life, cap. 36. Mag is the Irish word for campus; and Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 19.) observes, that the district, afterwards called Lecale, went in older times by the name of Mag-inis, i. e. the insular plain. For it is almost an island and a level tract of country.

(28) See Not. 17.

(29) The Tripartite (L. 1. c. 52.) calls it Brettan, and Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 19.) says that in his time it was merely a castle and a gentleman's seat, known by the name of Breatain, near Downpatrick.

(30) Third Life, cap. 33. and Jocelin, cap. 34, 35.

(31) The second Life has (cap. 32.); "Baptizavit eum ac totondit, et dedit ei Evangelium et Ministeir." The Tripartite, having mentioned the baptism and tonsure, adds (L. 1. c. 53.);

“ Reliquit discipulo vir Dei sacrum Evangeliorum codicem cum aliis sacri ministerii utensilibus.”

(32) Jocelin (cap. 37.) makes St. Patrick on this first occasion teach Mochoe, or, as he calls him, Mochua, only the alphabet, that is, the Roman Alphabet, for the purpose of learning Latin. From the mention often made of St. Patrick's giving alphabets to his Irish disciples the Bollandists, who were totally ignorant of the Irish language, and nearly so of Irish history, rashly concluded (Comment. §c. at 17 Mart. §. 1.) that alphabetic writing was unknown in Ireland until the arrival of St. Patrick. Their arguments have been already well answered; (see among others Ware and Harris, Antiq. Chap. 3.) and, without entering into further discussions, it will suffice here to observe that, besides the Ogham characters (on which see the chapter now quoted and Vallancey, Collectan. de reb. Hibern. Vol. VI. parts 1 and 2, and elsewhere passim), the old Irish alphabet called Bethluisnon was of a quite different construction from the Roman. It was therefore necessary for the Irish, who wished to learn Latin, to make themselves previously acquainted with its alphabet, in the same manner as whoever among us wishes to know Greek must first learn the Greek letters. The Bollandists' argument is like that of an Arab, who, on being told that the Europeans cannot read Arabic books without being taught the letters, would thence conclude, that they have no letters of their own. The late Mr. Tighe has published an inscription in alphabetic characters, prior to the period of Christianity in Ireland, in his Statistical Survey of Co. Kilkenny; p. 622.

(33) Annals of the 4 Masters, Tr. Th. p. 20. and AA. SS. p. 189.

§. iv. These transactions occupied the latter end of the year 432, and part of 433, until not long before Easter time. St. Patrick having determined on celebrating that festival near Tarah, where the princes and states of the whole kingdom were to be assembled about that time, took leave of his friend Dicho and sailing southward arrived in the harbour called Colbdi, (34) now Colp at the mouth of the Boyne. There leaving his boat (35) he and his companions set out on foot (36) for the plain of Breg, in which the city of Tarah was situated. On their way, and, as it seems, very soon after getting out of the boat, it is said that they went to the house of a respectable man, whose name was Seschnen, there to pass the night, and that, being well received by him, St. Patrick baptized him and his family. A son of his, whom at the baptism our saint, considering his sweet disposition, called Benignus, became so attached to him that he insisted on going along with him. St. Patrick received him with pleasure into his society, and thenceforth Benignus became one of his most favourite disciples, and afterwards archbishop of Armagh. But, whether or not it was on this occasion that Benignus attached himself to St. Patrick, (37) it is not to be supposed that his baptism and that of Seschnen and others took place during that very night, which our saint spent in their house. For, although the Apostles occasionally baptized persons without waiting until a certain time for instruction and probation had elapsed, (38) yet St. Patrick, who was well acquainted with the church discipline of his time, undoubtedly adhered to it as far as the circumstances of a new mission and the urgency of cases would allow. Accordingly, when adults offered themselves, he took care to have them previously instructed and to keep them in the rank of catechumens, at least for some days, before they should be baptized. (39) And if it be true that Benignus and others were baptized about this time, it is very probable that their baptism did not take place until the Paschal solemnity, which was then near at hand.

(34) Probus, L. 1. c. 33. In the second Life (cap. 34.) it is written Colpdai; and in the fourth (cap. 39.) we read Inver-Colpoe. The Tripartite (L. 2. c. 1.) has Inver Boinne, or mouth of the Boyne.

(35) The Tripartite (L. 1. c. 55.) introduces on this occasion

Loman or Luman, whom it makes a nephew of St. Patrick, as left to take care of the boat; and (L. 2. c. 1.) adds that, in consequence of an order of the saint, he sailed up against the current of the river as far as Trim. This was too good a story to be slightly passed over by Jocelin, who, (cap. 51.) to make it still more marvellous, subjoins that, the sails being hoisted, the vessel went up, without the assistance of oars, notwithstanding furious blasts of wind in the direction straight opposite to its course. He might as well have said, that it had been carried in the air; for, as Usher has remarked, (Pr. p. 853.) the channel of the Boyne is so unfit for navigation, that it would be impossible for a boat to proceed as far as Trim, even were both the current and the winds favourable. Tirechan quoted by Usher (ib.) has a part of this story as given in the Tripartite, but, instead of calling Loman a nephew of St. Patrick, he makes him only a disciple of his. (As to our apostle's pretended relatives in Ireland, see Chap. III. §. xviii.) Connected with this fable is what we read in the tracts now referred to (for in the other Lives there is no mention of Loman) concerning his having been placed at Trim (Jocelin makes him a bishop) and the antiquity of that church, which Tirechan says was founded the 22d year before that of Armagh. This foundation could not have been prior to A. D. 433, the year in which St. Patrick first preached in Meath. There can be little doubt, that Loman lived at a much later period, and that he was no other than the bishop Loman, who is reckoned in the third order of Irish saints in the catalogue published by Usher, p. 915. The saints of that order flourished in the seventh century, as appears from the times of the kings, during whose reigns they lived. The donations of towns and lands spoken of in the above tracts as made by Fedlimid, chief of the country about Trim, to St. Patrick and Loman (Tirechan makes him give away his whole territory) do not by any means agree with the times of St. Patrick. (See above Not. 20.) Tirechan, or rather the person, who assumed his name and who was a Meath man, represents these possessions as annexed for ever to the see of Trim. But it seems they were claimed by the archbishops of Armagh; and hence Jocelin, one of whose patrons was the primate Thomas O'Connor, mentions a disposal of those lands &c. made not long after, in virtue of which the right to them was transferred to St. Patrick and the see of Armagh. The Tripartite also, a compilation apparently patched up at Armagh, has something to the same purpose. Thus we have a key to the whole business. While it was pretended that those possessions belonged to St. Patrick, that is, to Armagh, and not to Trim, the name of St. Patrick was mistaken for the saint considered personally, and thus he and Loman were made contemporaries; whence flowed other allegations, &c. Had Usher and the Bollandists reflected on these circumstances, they would not have laid down, that Loman was the first bishop consecrated in Ireland and Trim the oldest Irish see.

(36) Pedestri itinere; Probus, L. 1. c. 33. and the second Life, cap. 34. much better authorities than the third Life or Jocelin, who make them go in a chariot.

(37) The conversion of Seschnen, &c. as having occurred on this occasion is mentioned only in the third Life (cap. 36.) and Jocelin (cap. 39.). The Tripartite (L. 1. c. 45.) makes it prior to St. Patrick's first arrival in Lecale and the conversion of Dicho; but this date is contradicted by the whole tenour of St. Patrick's proceedings. See above Not. 17.

(38) An ancient commentator on St. Paul, usually quoted under the name of Ambrosiaster, writes (in Ephes. 4.); "Primum omnes docebant et omnes baptizabant, quibuscumque diebus vel temporibus fuisset occasio. Nec enim Philippus tempus quaesivit aut diem, quo Eunuchum baptizaret; neque jejunium interposuit. Neque Paulus et Silas tempus distulerunt, quo Optionem carceris baptizarent cum omnibus ejus."

(39) In the Epistle against Coroticus St. Patrick alludes to the rules and ceremonies relative to the administration of baptism. He speaks of the white garment, chrism, &c. The 19th canon of what is called his Synod runs thus; "Octavo die Catechumeni sunt; postea solemnitatibus Domini baptizantur, id est, Pascha, Pentecoste, et Epiphania." From the mention of Epiphania it is plain, that this canon must be very ancient; and I find no reason for denying that St. Patrick himself was the author of it.

§. v. On the following day, which was Easter-eve or Holy Saturday, St. Patrick continued his journey and arrived in the evening at a place called Tertáfer-feic, now Slane. (40) Having got a tent pitched there he made preparations for celebrating the festival of Easter, and accordingly lighted the paschal fire about night-fall. (41) It happened that at this very time the king Leogaire (42) and the assembled princes were celebrating a religious festival, of which fire-worship formed a part. There was a standing law that, at the time of this festival, no fire should be kindled for a considerable distance all around, until after a great fire should be lighted in the royal palace of Temoria or Tarah. (43) St. Patrick's Paschal fire was, however, lighted before that of the palace, and being seen from the heights of Tarah excited great astonishment. On the king's inquiring what could be the cause of it, and who could have thus dared to infringe the law, the Magi told him that it was necessary to have that fire extinguished immediately, whereas, if allowed to remain, it would get the better of their fires, and bring about the downfall of his kingdom. (44) Leogaire enraged and troubled on getting this information set out for Slane, with a considerable number of followers and one or two of the principal Magi, (45) for the purpose of exterminating those violators of the law. When arrived within some distance from where the tent was, they sat down, and St. Patrick was sent for with an order to appear before the king and give an account of his conduct. It was arranged, that no one should show him any mark of respect nor rise up to receive him. But, on his presenting himself before them, Herc son of Deago disobeyed the injunction and standing up saluted him, and receiving the saint's blessing became a believer. (46) He was afterwards bishop of Slane and celebrated for his sanctity. (47) Passing over certain contests between St. Patrick and the Magi, and some partly prodigious and partly ridiculous fables, we find St. Patrick the next day (Easter Sunday) in the palace of Tarah preaching before the king and the States general, and disconcerting the Magi. The only person, that on his appearing there rose up to pay his respects to him, was Dubtach an eminent poet (48) and instructor of Fiech son of Erc, who afterwards became bishop of Sletty. (49) Dubtach was the first convert on that day, and the saint became greatly attached to him. Thenceforth he dedicated his poetical talents to Christian subjects, and some works of his are still extant. (50) St. Fingar or Guigner, who is said to have suffered martyrdom with many others some years afterwards either in Cornwall or Britany, is stated by one Anselm, who has written his Acts, (51) to have been converted on that occasion, or rather on the preceding night, and to have been the son of a king called Clito. It is added that he was the only person, who stood up in honour of St. Patrick; thus attributing to him what was done either by Here or Dubtach. Of all this there is nothing in the Lives of St. Patrick, the authors of which would not have omitted so remarkable a circumstance, had it occurred. (52)

(40) Tr. Th. p. 20.

(41) All the Lives agree in stating, that this Paschal fire was lighted in the evening of the day of St. Patrick's arrival at Slane, and hence Jocelin was not wrong in saying, (cap. 40.) that said day was Holy Saturday. Harris, probably through ignorance of the ceremonies observed at Easter time, omitted the circumstance of that fire having been Paschal and lighted merely through a religious motive. According to Harris' account (Bishops, p. 14.) one might suspect, that St. Patrick by lighting a fire meant to bid defiance to the king without any necessary cause, while his real object was to celebrate the festival in the manner practised by the Church.

(42) Leogaire king of all Ireland was son of Niell Naoigiallach, and succeeding his cousin Dathy, (see Chap. iv. not. 20.) who was killed in the continent, began his reign A. D. 428. (O'Flaherty, Ogygia, p. 429. and Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 449.) This date agrees with Ware's computation, who, with our antiquaries (O'Flaherty ib.) assigning 35 years to his reign places (Antiq. cap. 4.) his death in the year 463. It agrees also with what is mentioned in some of the Lives of St. Patrick, viz. that he arrived in Ireland in the fourth year of Leogaire's reign. (Usher p. 815) Yet Usher affixes (Ind. Chron.) the first year of Leogaire to A. D. 427. Unless this be owing to an error of the press, we must admit that he contradicts himself; for elsewhere (Pr. p. 949.) he lays down, that the latter end of the 4th year of Leogaire might have been the same as the latter end of A. D. 432. This could not happen, had Leogaire's reign begun any time in the year 427.

(43) In the second Life (cap. 34.) we find a summary account of these transactions agreeing in substance with the other Lives, thus expressed: "Fixo itaque ibi tentorio debita Paschae vota in sacrificium laudis Domini celebravit. Isisin indainsir sindam dorighmedhned feis Temradhi la Leogaire mac Neill & la firu Ereann;" or, as translated by Colgan, "istud erat tempus et hora, qua celebrabantur encocnia Temoriana per Leogarium filium Neill, et per populos Hiberniae. Congregatis igitur regibus et ducibus ad illum Leogaire regem eadem nocte, qua sanctus Patricius pascha, illi festivitatem exercuerunt suam. Statutum autem apud eos erat ex edicto, ut quicumque in cunctis regionibus, sive longe sive juxta, illa nocte ignem prius accenderet quam in palatio Temoriae succenderetur, morte damnaretur. Sanctus vero Patricius, rite Pascha celebrans, incendit divinum ignem," &c. Colgan, following Keating, says that this festival used to be celebrated once in every three years. Yet Probus (L. 1. c. 35.) seems to speak of it as held every year. On this subject let our antiquaries decide. The law here alluded to adds another to the innumerable proofs, such as the name Bealtinne for the first of May, &c. &c. (see Vallancey's Vindication of the ancient history of Ireland, p. 394, seqq.) that could be adduced to show that, in the time of Heathenism, fire was an object of worship in Ireland. That the Irish adored the sun is evident from St. Patrick himself, who, alluding to that mode of idolatry, says (Confess. p. 22.); "Nam sol iste, quem videmus, Deo jubente propter nos quotidie oritur sed nunquam regnabit, neque permanebit splendor ejus. Sed et omnes, qui adorant eum, in poenam miseri male devenient. Nos autem credimus et adoramus Solem verum, Christum;" &c. The moon, and probably the stars, or the whole host of heaven, were also objects of veneration; and even the wind or air. (Ware and Harris Antiq. cap. 16.) Well-worship was a prevalent superstition; and some, who adored water as a propitious deity, considered fire as a bad one. A singular anecdote relative to this opinion occurs in the Tripartite (L. 2. c. 70.). It is there related, that in a place called Finmagh (in Mayo) there was a well, which the foolish vulgar called king of the waters, and which they considered as a god and worshipped as such. This superstition was much enhanced by the circumstance, that a certain Magus, who worshipped water as a propitious god, and held fire to be an evil genius (et ignem habebat ut infestum) had got himself buried under a stone in that well. This reminds us of the old Oriental contests between the worshippers of fire and those of water, and leads to a conclusion that some connexion had existed between Ireland and remote parts of the East. The Irish believed in the existence of a sort of genii or fairies called Sidhe (third Life cap. 48.) and supposed to inhabit pleasant hills. But, as O'Flaherty justly observes, (Ogygia, Part III. c. 22.) they knew of no such beings as Jupiter, &c. and he concludes thus; “Unde colligendum Hibernorum numina fuisse deos topicos, sc. montanos, campestres, fluviales, aequoreos, et id genus alios locorum genios.” As to idols properly so called, the use of them was not general in Ireland, as will be seen below, Not. 45.

(44) “Hic ignis, quem videmus,—nisi extinctus fuerit hac nocte, non exstinguetur in aeternum: insuper et omnes ignes nostrae consuetudinis superexcellet; et ille, qui incendit eum, regnum tuum dissipabit.” (Probus, L. 1. c. 35.) The other Lives agree in substance. Supposing this part of the narrative to be true, there is nothing in it which may not be easily admitted. Those Magi had some knowledge of the preaching of Christianity in Ireland, and wishing to put a stop to it made use of these arguments. But it will not follow, that they were endowed with a sort of prophetic gift, any more than the Jews, when they said of our Saviour; If we let him alone in this manner, all will believe in him; and the Romans will come and take away our place and nation. John xi. 48.

(45) The Magi, so often spoken of in the history of St. Patrick, seem to have enjoyed a rank and privileges similar to those of the Brahmins of Hindostan and, besides the superintendance of religious matters, to have practised the arts of divination, necromancy, &c. Ware, Harris and some other writers call them Druids, and consider them as similar in every respect to the Druids of Gaul and Britain. It is true, that the persons called by Probus and others Magi, who pretended to foretel the consequences of allowing the preaching of the Gospel, are called in Fiech's hymn (Strophe xi.) Druidh. But, although the names seem to agree, yet they were, I believe, a description of persons very different from the Druids described by Cæsar (De bello Gall. L. vi. §. 13. seqq.). For the Druidical religion, as there explained, was far from being the same as that of the ancient Irish. Instead of the worship of the sun, moon, and elements (see Not. 43.) the religion of the Gallic Druids was downright idolatrous, consisting, in theory, of a multiplicity of gods, the chief of whom was Mercury, then Apollo, Mars, &c; and, in practice, of heaps of images or idols. Among the principal deities of the Irish we find first the name of Bel, Mann, or other names relative to the sun, of which a very remarkable instance is still extant on Tory-hill (Co. Kilkenny) called in Irish Sleigh-Grian or the hill of the sun. In a circular space formerly dedicated to heathen worship, and similar to those so generally met with in Ireland, there is still remaining a cromlech or large stone supported by others, on which is an inscription in Pelasgic, or, at least, very ancient characters, which, written in Roman letters, gives these two words Beli Diuose, that is, Bel Dionusos, or Bel Bacchus. That Bel was the sun is universally admitted; and it is well known that Dionusos or Dionysos, as a surname, was originally applied to the sun. On this subject let me quote the 29th epigram of Ausonius. “Ogygia me Bacchum vocat—Osirin Ægyptus putat—Mystae Phanacen nominant—Dionyson Indi existimant—Romana sacra Liberum—Arabica gens Adoneum—Lucaniacus Pantheum.” All these names were merely epithets or surnames of the sun; for, as Huet observes, (Demonstr. Evang. Prop. iv. cap. 3.) “Osirin et Liberum nemo solem esse nescit.—Adonin autem esse solem et asseverat Macrobius,” &c. (See also Bryant, Analysis of Anc. Mythol. V. 1. p. 305. 4to. ed.) Next came the moon, under various names or epithets. (See Vallancey, Vindication &c. p. 493. seqq.) Of those kinds of worship or of that of water Cæsar says nothing; and accordingly Harris was wrong in applying (Antiq. ch. xvi. sect. 2.) indiscriminately his account of Druidism to the state of Ireland. Nor had he a right to introduce into that account Diana, of whom Cæsar makes no mention, although, inasmuch as she was taken for the moon, the Irish had her under other names. It is, however true, that a number of semigods or genii were venerated in Ireland (Vallancey ib.); but the greater gods, the Dii majorum gentium, were different from those of Gaul. As to the practical part of religion, the use of statues or idols was far from being general in Ireland, although it cannot be denied that some were to be met with, to which St. Patrick alludes, when he says, (Conf. p. 16.) that the Irish had worshipped idola et immunda. Idols, properly so called, are not mentioned but once in the Lives of St. Patrick, and that only in three of them, which are the most intermixed with fables. The third Life (cap. 46) has an idol, called Cenverbhe, and made of gold and silver, which king Leogaire used to adore. The Tripartite (L. 2. c. 31.) calls it Cromcruach, (i. e. heap of the sun, from Crom an ancient name of the god of fire or the sun; Vallancey, ib. p. 495.) and adds that twelve smaller idols of brass were placed around it. Jocelin (cap. 56.) agrees, as usual, with the Tripartite, except that to the great idol he gives the name of Ceancroith, which he interprets head of all the gods. I strongly suspect, that what are here called idols were in reality nothing else than plain rude stones, placed in a circular space of the sort above mentioned, the large one indicating the sun, while the smaller ones represented the signs of the zodiac. Of stones thus arranged there are very many remains in Ireland, as, ex. c. on Tory-hill (Stat. Survey of Kilkenny, p. 622.) Cairngraimey, or heap of the sun, in the county of Antrim (Dubordieu, Stat. Surv. p. 581.) and other places noted for the worship of the sun. On Killeny hill not far from Dublin, a place of worship thus laid out is still in tolerable preservation. Harris suspects that the Ceancroith of Jocelin ought to be read Cean-grioth, i. e. head of the sun. As to the name Crom-cruach, which Harris was wrong in explaining by crooked stone of adoration, the thing so called as being a cruach (heap) could hardly have been an idol regularly shaped. But, admitting the truth of what the Tripartite &c. have, it will only follow, that in that one instance there were real idols. The place was called Mag-slecht, or field of adoration, and was situated in some part of the now county of Leitrim. It is remarkable, that it was in that district the worship of idols is said to have been first practised in Ireland. Lynch (Cambr. Evers. p. 59.) writes;

“Tigermasius (king of Ireland) idolorum in Hibernia colendorum author, quorum praecipuo dum ingenti multitudine stipatus cultum in Brefnia impenderet, ipse ac comites eadem morte sublatis sunt anno mundi 3650.” Yet, if we take the name idols in a more enlarged sense, that is, for any material objects distinguished by adoration, it is certain that they were very general in Ireland. For the upright stones, found in the circular spaces and in many other parts were intended to represent objects of adoration, according to that original mode of superstition, which was prior to the more refined fashions of idolatry, and to the practice of exhibiting deities under human forms. The famous stone at Clogher, which the pagans used to cover with gold, and adore as representing Kermant Kelstach a deity of the northerners (Ogygia, Part III. cap. 22.) was of this kind. Those stones were, in fact, the baetylia of the Phenicians mentioned by Sanchoniathon or Philo Byblius, (ap. Euseb. Praep. Evang. L. 1. c. 10.) for a further account of which the reader may consult Bochart, Chanaan, L. 11. cap. 2. Our rocking stones are some of those baetylia, viz. moving or animated stones, which had Bochart rightly considered, he would probably not have changed, by a conjectural emendation, the animated stones of Philo into anointed stones. While other nations substituted for those rude emblems statues of elegant form and workmanship, the Irish adhered to the old practice with very few exceptions. (See Vallancey, Vindication, &c. p. 460 seqq.) Another very remarkable circumstance is, that in the same manner as with the Persians, Chanaanites, and apostate Hebrews, the mountains and hills, viz. the high places, as they are called in Scripture, without any covering, and in the open air were the chief places of religious worship in Ireland. As to sacrifices, a certain species of them, such as that of a sow pig for the increase of the fruits of the earth, was observed by the Irish; but I greatly doubt whether, notwithstanding what some say, they had the practice of human sacrifices, particularly such as those horrid ones which were so common in the Druidical system of Gaul. Nor can any argument be deduced from the name Druidh occurring in Fiech’s hymn; for it signifies merely wise men, being the old plural of Draoi or Druí, in the same manner as Philidh is the plural of Phile a poet. In modern Irish Draoith is used, instead of Druidh, to signify wise men or Magi; ex. c. in the Irish version of Matth. II. 1. The oak tree (in Irish Darach, Dair, Darag,) whatever veneration the Irish might have had for it as well as almost all pagan nations, had nothing to do with this name; and it is more than probable, that even the Gallic and British Druids did not thence derive their appellation. Druidh, at least in Irish, meant nothing else than wise men or Magi, the word used by Probus and the other writers, who have given us Lives of St. Patrick in Latin. It is therefore a mistake to conclude from the similarity or even identity of the name Druid, that the pagan systems of Gaul, Britain, and Ireland were the same. One might as well argue from the general acceptance of the Latin word Sacerdotes, that all religions were and are the same, Christian, Jewish, Pagan, &c. whereas all of them have their sacerdotes. I allow that some analogies are to be found between the ramifications of the Irish, Gaulish, and British superstitions, as is the case between every pagan system; and particularly between the Irish and British, owing to causes, which the reader may find in Lhuyd's, Camden's, and Vallancey's works; but I think that on a close examination it will be found that the system of the Gallic Druids, as described by Cæsar, was much different from that of our Irish Magi, or, if any one choose to call them so, Druids. I have, however, to guard against equivocation, preferred retaining the name, Magus, Magi.

(46) If this account be true, it will follow that Herc was only about nine years old at that time, as according to the Annals referred to by Usher (Pr. p. 1047 and Ind. Chron.) he died A. D. 514. (the 4 Masters have 512 i. e. 513.) in the ninetieth year of his age. Most of the Lives, however, seem to represent him as then a grown up person. In Usher's Tripartite (Pr. p. 849) he is spoken of as one of the king's pages; Unus ex juvenibus regis nomine Ercus; and is said to have offered his own seat to St. Patrick, who blessed him, &c.

(47) Probus has (L. 1. c. 37.); "Hercus filius Degeo, cujus reliquiae nunc venerantur in civitate, quae vocatur Slane."

(48) Fiech's Scholiast calls Dubtach the Arch-poet or chief of the Irish poets or bards. The Tripartite makes him the arch-poet of the king and kingdom; and Jocelin calls him a certain poet of the king, whence Harris formed his poet laureat.

(49) Harris here introduces Fiech as being present at Tarah with Dubtach and there converted. This is in direct opposition to what the Scholiast, the Tripartite, &c. relate as to Fiech, who, as will be seen hereafter, did not become known to St. Patrick until some years after Dubtach's conversion. Harris was led astray by not having rightly understood Probus and the author of the second Life, where they say that Fiech, then a youth, was at that time a disciple of Dubtach; but they do not mention his having been along with him, when St. Patrick made his first appearance at Tarah.

(50) Tr. Th. p. 8. no. 5. Ware and Harris, Writers, p. 6.

(51) Although certainly not written by Anselm archbishop of Canterbury, (see Tillemont, Mem. Tom. xvi. p. 471.) they are printed in some editions of his works. They have been published also by Messingham, (Florilegium insulae sanctorum) and Colgan AA. SS. Febr. 23.

(52) Among other fables in that tract of Anselm it is said, that of seven Irish kings assembled on that occasion Clito was the most noble and powerful. Now there is nothing better authenticated than that the head king was at that time Leogaire. That there was a saint Fingar I am ready to admit; and it is very probable that he was one of those newly baptized Christians, who were carried off by Coroticus, of which hereafter.

§. vi. In some of the Lives it is said that Leogaire himself, terrified by certain miracles performed by St. Patrick, became a convert; but this cannot be reconciled with what we read in other Lives concerning his obstinate infidelity, (53) nor with the statements given by the saint in his Confession. For it can hardly be supposed that he would have suffered imprisonment and various persecutions, on account of his preaching the Gospel, from any of the petty princes, (54) had their chief, the king of all Ireland, been a Christian. Nor do I find sufficient authority for what is related of the queen's conversion, (55) although the arguments against it are less strong than in the case of the king. Yet St. Patrick, who, when touching upon the extraordinary success with which God blessed his mission, makes mention of the sons and daughters of chieftains, who had embraced the Christian faith, (56) says nothing about any queen having been converted. Be this as it may, it seems that he got permission from the king to preach the Gospel on condition of his not disturbing the peace of the kingdom. (57) He then repaired to Tailten, the place where public games were celebrated ; (58) and it seems that the chiefs assembled at Tarah had adjourned thither. According to the Tripartite St. Patrick arrived at Tailten on Easter Monday, and remained there or in the neighbourhood until the Monday following. (59) He preached to Carbre a brother of Leogaire, but was very badly received, insomuch so that his life was in danger from him. The conduct of Conall, another brother of theirs, was quite different ; he listened to St. Patrick with delight, believed, and was baptized. To this memorable Easter week, which was the first that occurred since the saint's arrival on his mission, must, I believe, be referred the origin of the festival called St. Patrick's baptism, that used to be held on the 5th of April. This festival was instituted, as already remarked, (60) in commemoration not of St. Patrick's having been baptized, but of the first solemn baptism performed by him in Ireland. I say, solemn, because I find no reason for supposing that he had not already baptized, in a private manner, some of his converts, such as Dicho and others in Ulster. But it is more than probable, that he reserved such converts, as he acquired since his landing at the mouth of the Boyne for the Paschal time, which was the principal solemnity in the year for administering the sacrament of baptism. And it must be recollected, that not only Easter eve or Holy Saturday, but likewise the whole of Easter week, and, in some churches, many days following were, as belonging to the Paschal solemnity, considered fit for that purpose. (61) The baptism of St. Patrick is said to have been performed on a Wednesday; (62) now the 5th of April A. D. 433 fell on a Wednesday and apparently in Easter week; so that according to the Paschal cycle of 84 years, and the method of applying it practised in Gaul, which St. Patrick introduced into Ireland (of which more hereafter) Easter Sunday, as kept in Ireland, seems to have fallen in that year on the 2d of April. As to what is said of Conall having given to St. Patrick his own castle or house to be changed into a church &c. (63) it merits no more attention than many other stories of the same kind fabricated in later times.

(53) Probus (L. 1. c. 46) makes the king say to his nobles on that same day (Easter Sunday); It is better for me to believe than die; and tells us that accordingly he and many others professed themselves Christians. The second Life (cap. 41.) and the fourth (cap. 49.) agree, nearly word for word, with Probus. The Tripartite (L. 1. c. 67.) has the same account, and yet afterwards (L. 2. c. 8.) states that Leogaire was not a sincere believer, and that he used to say, that his father Niell had laid an injunction on him never to embrace the faith of Christ but to adhere to the gods of his ancestors. According to the third Life (cap. 42.) he remained an infidel, and Jocelin (cap. 49.) says, that St. Patrick could not prevail on him to receive baptism. Even Colgan more than once, (ex. c. AA. SS. p. 111.) represents him as an obstinate pagan and a persecutor.

(54) See Confess. p. 20.

(55) The third Life (cap. 42.) and Jocelin (cap. 49.) having mentioned the obstinacy of Leogaire, state that the queen was converted. The Tripartite also (L. 1. c. 67.) seems to make her a Christian and calls her Angussa, adding an anecdote concerning her interfering with St. Patrick in favour of a child then in her womb, who was afterwards Lugadius king of Ireland. But from what is related (ib.) of the unfortunate end of Lugadius it would seem, that he was not a Christian; and if not, it is probable that the mother had not been one.

(56) “ Filii Scottorum et filiae regulorum monachi et virgines

Christi esse videntur. Et etiam una benedicta Scotta genitiva nobilis, pulcherrima, adulta erat, quam ego baptizavi." (Confess. p. 16.) The manner, in which the Scots are alluded to in this passage, is well worth the attention of our antiquaries; for, as the Bollandists and Tillemont have observed, and after them Innes, (Crit. Essay, &c.) it plainly shows, that in St. Patrick's time all the people of Ireland were not called Scots. When speaking of the great mass of the nation, the saint uses the name Hiberionaces, from Hiberione his name for Ireland. From the context, in which this passage occurs, it appears that his object was to show, that not only very many of the lower order in Ireland had become Christians, but likewise some persons of the ruling and powerful party, a description of persons, which, from the commencement of Christianity, has been uniformly found to be more careless about religion and less easy to be converted than any other. In his letter against Coroticus, which was written before the Confession, these Scots are introduced by St. Patrick among the persecutors of Christians; but before his death he had the consolation to see several of them brought over to the faith. The Scots were at that period in Ireland, compared with the old inhabitants, what the Franks were for a long series of years in Gaul before they became so mixed with the Gallic people as to give their name to that country. And, following the analogy usual in such cases, we may conclude that the invasion of Ireland by the Scots, who were a warlike nation such as the Franks, ought not to be referred to as high an antiquity as some of our historians have pretended. Otherwise it would be very difficult to explain, how they could have been in our saint's time considered as a nation distinct from the greater part of the people of Ireland. Yet within less than a hundred years later the appellation of Scots was extended to all the Irish, and our island became as well known under the name of Scotia as that of Hibernia. The Scots might have been four or five hundred years in Ireland before the distinction of names between them and the other inhabitants totally ceased; a length of time nearly equal to that, which elapsed from the arrival of the English in this country, before their descendants were, at least generally, comprized under the name of Irishmen.

(57) Probus and others relate, that St. Patrick after his interview with Leogaire preached freely through the country. The Tripartite goes further, and mentions (L. 2. c. 8.) an agreement entered into between them, according to which the saint pledged himself not to eject Leogaire from his kingdom, and the king promised not to make an attempt on St. Patrick's life. If there was any such compact, we must suppose that Leogaire was impressed with the false notion suggested to him by the Magi (Not. 44.) that St. Patrick's views might be hostile; and that on the other hand he had conceived such an opinion of his supernatural power, that he was afraid to have him put to death. The Bollandists assign the permission granted to St. Patrick by Leogaire to the year 436; but, according to what the Tripartite has, it must have been given in 433.

(58) See Not. 6.

(59) The Tripartite has (L. 2. c. 4.); "Prima autem feria venit Patricius ad Talteniam." That this was Easter Monday is clear from a passage lower down (cap. 6.) which, after the account given of the saint's transactions with Carbre and Conall, runs thus; "Paschae quoque clausula finita, prima feria exiit," &c. These two passages appear as quotations from some old Latin work, and are therefore entitled to a certain degree of credit.

(60) Chap. IV. §. 1.

(61) See Bingham, Orig. Eccles. Book XI. ch. vi. sect. 7.

(62) Usher has (p. 882) from the book of Sligo a passage in Irish, which literally translated is as follows; "Three Wednesdays of Patrick, birth, baptism, death." As he seems to have been unacquainted with our Calendars and Martyrologies, that explain what was meant by the baptism, (see Chap. iv. §. 1.) he thought it might have meant the baptizing of St. Patrick himself, while it is well known that St. Patrick's baptism, so celebrated in Ireland, was the one first solemnly administered by him in this country.

(63) Third Life cap. 44. Tripart. L. 2. c. 5, &c. The place, according to this story, was thenceforth called Domnach-Patrick, Donagh-Patrick four miles East of Kells. The most, that can be allowed, is that Conall gave him a spot of ground to build a church on; and thus the matter is represented in the fourth Life, cap. 52. In course of time that church might have swelled into a considerable religious establishment and town. (See above §. 11. and

Not. 20.) Archdall (ad loc.) quotes Colgan to show that it was anciently called Domnach mor muighe siuil; but in the passage referred to Colgan gives this name to a Donagh-Patrick in the diocese of Tuam.

§. VII. Henceforth it becomes extremely difficult and next to impossible to arrange, with a sufficient degree of chronological accuracy, the subsequent transactions of St. Patrick's mission. We here lose the assistance of our best guides in this respect; (64) and Usher himself has been obliged, in endeavouring to fix dates, to jump over many intermediate years here and there. (65) Colgan has nearly followed Usher; while the Bollandists, wishing to strike out a new arrangement, have succeeded worse than either of them. The Tripartite, although abounding in anachronisms, now becomes our best resource; but, however aided by some dates supplied by our Annals or other documents, it is not to be expected that a regular series of proceedings, year by year, can be drawn up for the information of the reader.

(64) The second Life stops short at what passed between St. Patrick and Leogaire, and so does the first book of Probus, which is the only truly historical one, as the second is merely a miscellany of miracles and some odd facts thrown together without any chronological order.

(65) Pr. Ind. Chron.

§. VIII. St. Patrick, having celebrated Easter week set out on the following Monday (66) for other places in Meath, in which he seems to have passed a considerable time, although it would be ridiculous to admit the number of churches and religious foundations reported to have been established by him in that territory. (67) He is said to have erected a church at a place called Druim-corcorthri, perhaps Drumconrath in the barony of Slane, and to have placed over it one Diermit. The church of Drumshallon not far from Drogheda is mentioned also among those of his foundation. Turning towards the district of Delbhna Assuill, now Delvin and Moyashill in Westmeath, he preached with success to the inhabitants, notwithstanding the opposition of of a man called Fergus, who seems to have been a relative of the king. (68) St. Patrick then went to the celebrated hill of Usneagh (in Westmeath,) the territory about which belonged to two brothers, Fiach and Enda, (69) the latter of whom became a convert. Passing over the stuff about the splendid donation of lands made on that occasion to the saint, it is worthy of observation that Enda is stated to have entrusted one of his sons, named Cormac, to the care of St. Patrick, who accordingly superintended his education. He tells us in his Confession that, to gain the good will of the chieftains, he used to make presents to them, and provide for some of their sons, whom he used to keep along with himself. (70) He is then made to proceed from Usneagh to the country now called Longford; but the most remarkable transactions, which the Tripartite assigns to this period, (71) occurred many years after and will be related in their proper places. Yet there is every reason to believe, that a considerable number of converts was made in that district as well as in Meath and Westmeath during this first time of St. Patrick's preaching in those tracts, and that he left some of his companions or newly ordained priests to take care of these congregations. It was a rule with him to supply his converts, according as he acquired them, with clergymen. (72) How long he remained in the districts now mentioned we have no grounds for ascertaining; but we may be certain that he continued there long enough for the purpose of consolidating these new churches and of instructing and preparing persons for ordination, to whose care they were to be consigned. When on the point of quitting, for some time, those parts of Ireland, he turned off a little to the Northward for the purpose of destroying the idol Crom-cruach, or as some say, thirteen idols, standing in Mag-slecht, or, as others call it, Moy-slecht, which is stated to be a plain near Feanagh in the county of Leitrim. (73) This he effected by his prayers, and is said to have erected a large church (74) in the neighbourhood, over which he placed Mauran surnamed Barban.

(66) See Not. 59.

(67) Many of the persons named as placed over those churches are known to have lived long after St. Patrick's time. For instance it is said (Tripart. L. 2. c. 10.) that he placed one Casanus over the church of Domnach-mor in campo Echnach (Donaghmore near Navan), to whom he consigned for his education Lonan son of Senan afterwards abbot of Killhailleach (King's county, Archdall). Jocelin has the same (cap. 144). Now this Lonan was contemporary with Finnian of Clonard (Tr. Th. p. 174), who died A. D. 552. (Usher Ind. Chron.) In like manner Cromman abbot of Leekin (Westmeath) is reckoned (Tripart. ib. cap. 20.) among those persons then appointed by St. Patrick. But Colgan suspects, (AA. SS. p. 140. No. 5.) that Cromman was contemporary with the renowned Fechin, who died A. D. 664 (665). And, to account for Cromman's having been a disciple of St. Patrick, he has been made to live 180 years. (Tr. Th. p. 175). The Tripartite is full of stories of this kind, as in it we find collected a heap of those pretensions to high antiquity, which many religious institutions and episcopal sees were anxious to claim, through a sort of pious vanity not peculiar to Ireland, and of which many instances occur in the ecclesiastical history of almost every Christian country.

(68) Tr. Th. p. 174. no. 48.

(69) The Tripartite (L. 2. c. 17.) makes them brothers of the king Leogaire. But from other documents and particularly the third Life (cap. 43.) it appears that St. Patrick was not acquainted with any other brothers of Leogaire than Carbre and Conall. Jocelin speaks of them (cap. 100.) and mentions another brother called Leoger, but different from the king. Some of our antiquaries have given more brothers to king Leogaire and sons to Niell Naoigiallach than, I am sure, they really had.

(70) “Interim præmia dabam regibus, propter quod dabam mercedem filiis ipsorum qui mecum ambulant.” Confess. p. 20.

(71) Ex. c. The appointment of Mel to the see of Ardagh, although he had not yet arrived in Ireland. It has also Guasactus as then placed bishop at Granard, without, I am sure, any sufficient foundation. In all the other Lives there is nothing about him or any see of his; and had such a circumstance occurred, it would not have been omitted; for in that case Guasactus would have been the first bishop consecrated in Ireland by St. Patrick, and accordingly his name and reputation would have spread far and wide. And it can scarcely be supposed that, at so early a period of our saint’s mission, the congregations had become sufficiently numerous or respectable so as to entitle them to be governed by bishops. Concerning Guasact see more above Not. 26,

(72) “Ut clerici ubique illis ordinarentur ad plebem nuper venientem ad credulitatem.” Confess. p. 14.

(73) O’Connor Map of Scotia Antiqua, Seward, &c. See above Not. 45.

(74) When we hear of churches erected by St. Patrick, very many of which were certainly of much later foundation, we are not to understand such edifices as are so called in our days, but humble buildings made up of hurdles or wattles, clay and thatch, according to the ancient fashion of Ireland, and which could be put together in a very short time.

§. IX. St. Patrick then set out for Connaught, and not sooner I dare say, considering the time he must have spent in the last mentioned districts, than the year 435. (75) According to the Tripartite he crossed the Shannon at a place called Snaw-daen, (76) and arriving at Dumha-graidh ordained priest one Ailbe (77) different from the great Ailbe of Emly. Among a heap of other transactions, most of which belong to a later period, we find recorded the conversion of Ethnea and Fethlimia daughters of the king Leogaire, who had been placed under the direction of two magi, Mael and Caplat. These men also, notwithstanding their violently opposing St. Patrick at first, are said to have embraced Christianity. (78) The occasion of St. Patrick's meeting with those princesses is thus stated. When advanced into the plain of Connaught (79) he stopped with his clerical companions at a fountain near the royal residence Cruachan (now Croghan near Elphin) and at break of day began to chaunt the praises of the Lord. (80) The ladies, having come very early in the morning to the fountain for the purpose of washing themselves, were struck with the singular appearance of persons clothed in white garments and holding books in their hands. On inquiring who they were and to what species of beings they belonged, whether celestial, aerial, or terrestrial, St. Patrick seized the opportunity of announcing to them the true God author of all; and answering certain questions of theirs, such as, where his God dwelt, in heaven or on the earth, on mountains, in vallies, in the sea, or in rivers; was he rich, how to be revered, was he young or old, had he sons and daughters, were they handsome &c. explained the principal truths of the Christian religion. Delighted with his discourse they expressed a wish to know how they could become acceptable in the sight of the Almighty, and declared themselves ready to go through whatever the saint would command them to do. Accordingly he instructed them; and, on their having professed their belief in the doctrines proposed by him, he also baptized them. In answer to their desire of seeing Christ face to face, he told them that Eucharistic communion was one of the necessary requisites with regard to that object, upon which they said; "Give us the sacrifice of the body and blood of Christ, that we may be freed from the corruption of the flesh, and see our spouse, who is in heaven. And, St. Patrick then celebrating Mass, they received the holy Eucharist." (81) It is added, that they died immediately after; but this, I dare say, is a mistake, that originated in their having received the veil, as it is mentioned (82) they did, and thus becoming dead to the world and nearer to God. (83) If we are to believe the Tripartite, the church of Elphin was founded about this time, and the place for it is said to have been given to St. Patrick by a magus called Ono. Over this church was placed Asicus who became a bishop, but certainly not as early as the time we are now treating of. (84) Bronus, bishop of Caissel-irra (West Cashel in Co. Sligo) is spoken of also in this part of our saint's history; but, although a disciple of St. Patrick as was also Asicus or Asacus, (85) he did not become a bishop until several years after this period. (86)

(75) Usher places (Ind. Chron.) St. Patrick's journey to Connaught in the year 434. His reason for doing so was that, having taken Jocelin for his guide, he passed over the saint's proceedings in Meath, Westmeath, &c. after what had passed between him and Conall (§. vi.), and supposed that he went to Connaught directly from Conall's house. But the order and arrangement of St. Patrick's journeys and excursions, as laid down in the Tripartite, is much more natural and consistent, as will be seen all through, than that of Jocelin. For although the Tripartite, treating of the incidents, that might have occurred in such places as it states the saint to have been in, frequently inserts transactions and names of persons of a much later period, yet it observes a rather regular system with regard to his movements from one place to another, while Jocelin rambles here and there, according as it suited his fancy. As to what he has (cap. 55.) concerning St. Patrick's anxious wish to proceed without delay to Connaught, on account of the vision, in which he seemed to hear the voice of persons from near the wood of Foclut (see above Chap. IV. §. x.) such an argument would prove too much; for it would thence follow, that he should, immediately on his arrival in Ireland, have gone straight forward to that country, or, at least, have moved thither directly from Ulster. It must likewise be observed, that in said vision the whole nation appeared as if addressing him, and that accordingly he might have chosen for the theatre of his first exertions such parts of Ireland as he might have thought most favourable to his views. Now the capital, Tarah, and the adjacent districts must naturally have been considered as such; in the same manner as at the commencement of Christianity great cities and capitals, such as Antioch, Rome, Alexandria, &c. were generally fixed upon for the same purpose, and indeed for a very good reason; as whatever becomes prevalent in a metropolis is thereby more speedily and easily diffused through the provinces.

(76) Q. Might it have been near Drum-snave in Leitrim? Ferrar's nonsense about St. Patrick having crossed the Shannon at Lumneach, now Limerick (Hist. of Limerick p. 4.) is not worth attention.

(77) I cannot discover the place called Dumha-graidh. It was in Connaught; and so Colgan tells us in his topographical Index, but does not inform us in what part of that province. This is his usual mode of marking the positions of places. He says in Leinster, in Munster, &c. and no more. The Ailbe here spoken of was Ailbe of Senchua in Tirellil. How could he be ordained by St. Patrick, particularly at this early period, as he did not die until A. D. 545 (546)? AA. SS. p. 191.

(78) The conversion of these magi and of Ethnea and Fethlimia is related in the third and fourth Lives, Probus, Tripartite, &c.

(79) Probus (L. 2. c. 13.) has campum Hai, which Colgan explains by Machaire Connacht. It is the level country of Roscommon. (See Seward at Magh-nai.)

(80) So the Tripartite (L. 2. c. 44.) alluding to the Lauds and Morning service. Probus says, that St. Patrick was then holding a synod near the fountain together with three bishops and many clergymen, and deliberating on ecclesiastical concerns. The third Life also mentions bishops as present. But who were those three bishops at that time? I am sure there were none such then in Ireland.

(81) Probus, L. 2. c. 15. Tripart. L. 2. c. 44, 45. From this passage it appears, how essential it was, according to the opinion of our Irish theologians, for all persons come to the use of reason not to neglect receiving the Eucharist, notwithstanding their having been recently baptized.

(82) Tripart. L. 2. c. 44.

(83) St. Patrick makes mention of a young lady of an illustrious family, whom he had baptized, and who some days after came to tell him that she was admonished by a messenger of God to become a virgin of Christ and to come near to God; "Ut esset virgo Christi et ipsa Deo proximaret." He says on this occasion, that the more those virgins were persecuted by their parents the more did their numbers increase. Conf. p. 16.

(84) It is impossible, in following the history of St. Patrick as given in the Lives, to determine the true times of the foundation of most of our ancient sees or of the first bishops. It becomes therefore necessary to treat of them under a distinct head, which will be found lower down.

(85) Tirechan's list ap. Usher, p. 951.

(86) Bron was bishop in St. Brigid's time, and died A. D. 511 (512). Tr. Th. p. 176.

§. x. St. Patrick, proceeding westward, preached in the territory of Hua Nolella, of which Tirellil or Tiraghrill (Sligo) now forms a part. Among other disciples he left there Cethenus. He is said to have visited the native place of Cethecus (87) another of his disciples, which appears to have been in that district. Some time after he seems to have been at Huarangaradh (Oran in Roscommon) at which place he afterwards erected a church, called Killgaradh. (88) Near this place he assigned situations for some Gallic disciples and followers of his, who wished to live in retirement. This is more probable (89) than what we are told of his moving down to the district called Hy-maine, (90) there founding a church at Fidhart, and placing over it a deacon of the name of Justus, who, as the Tripartite adds, when in the 140th year of his age, baptized St. Kieran of Clonmacnois. (91) Next we find him at Mag-seola, at some distance from Elphin to the west, (92) in which place he is said to have held a synod. Among the persons named as bishops on that occasion I find Sacellus of Bais-leac-mor (Baslick, Roscommon) and Felartus of Domnach-mor in Mag-seola, both of whom were disciples of St. Patrick, (93) but whether then bishops or not there is good reason to doubt. Thence he is said to have gone to the neighbourhood of the lake Techet (now Lough-Gara, Sligo) and to have laid the foundation of a church at a place called Druimnea. (94) In the same tract, continues our author, he founded the nunnery of Kill-athracta, so called from the virgin Athracta, daughter of Talan and sister of a St. Coeman; (95) whom St. Patrick is said to have placed over it. But it so happens, as will be seen elsewhere, that St. Athracta did not live before some time, and perhaps late, in the sixth century. Turning into the country called Kierragia Airteach (96) he there pacified two brothers, who were near killing each other in consequence of a dispute about their paternal inheritance, and got from them a field, (97) in which he erected a church, placing over it Cona a brother of Sacellus. (98) We now find St. Patrick in that part of Mayo, called at present the barony of Costello, where he is said to have instructed one Loarn, and placed him over a church, the name of which is not given. (99) Proceeding westwards to the district called Cera (now barony of Carragh) he preached there, baptized a vast multitude of people, and left among them Conan (100) a priest. Thence he went to Umallia or Hymallia (the territory of the O'Maleys) and there erected a church at Acadh-fobhuir (Aghagower) assigning it to Senachus a most holy and humble man, whom, we are told, he consecrated bishop. (101)

(87) Cethecus or Cethiacus is found in Tirechan's list. His mother was of a Tirellil family, and he was born in that country. His father was a Meath man, from Domnach-sarige near Duleek. Cethecus is well known in the Irish Calendars and is called Patrick's bishop, that is, says Colgan, a suffragan of St. Patrick. He is said to have been employed as bishop in various places far distant from each other, as ex. c. sometimes at Domnach-sarige, and other times in Tirellil. In this there is nothing improbable; for although Cethecus could not well have been a bishop before A. D. 440. (see below Chap. VI. Not. 4.) it is very natural to suppose that St. Patrick wanted the assistance of some bishops, who, without being attached to any fixed sees, might ordain priests, &c. and perform other episcopal functions in places where he could not attend himself. And this was undoubtedly the mode first practised by him; nor was it, I believe, until about the time of the establishment of the see of Armagh, that other regular sees were formed in Ireland. Colgan thought that Cethenus was the same as Cethecus; but they are mentioned distinctly in the Tripartite (L. 2. cap. 41—48.), and the former is not called a bishop. They are distinguished also in Tirechan's list, one by the name of Cetennus, and the other by that of Cethiacus.

(88) Cethecus was buried at Kill-garadh or Oran. But it does not thence follow, that he was bishop of Oran, as Archdall says (Monast. Hib. at Oran). See Not. prec. Nor should Oran have appeared among the monasteries; for it was no more than a parish church.

(89) Considering the unhappy state of many parts of Gaul in those times, it is not to be wondered at, that some persons from that country, on hearing of the progress made by their countryman in Ireland, might have taken shelter here. Colgan quotes (Tr. Th. p. 177.) from the Litanies of Aengus invocations of Gallic saints, whose remains were in various parts of Ireland. It is, however, more probable that the greatest part of them did not come to Ireland until several years later than this period.

(90) A district partly in Roscommon but chiefly in Galway.

(91) Kieran was born A. D. 516. (Usher Ind. Chron.) This, together with the stuff about the 140th year is more than sufficient to show, that Justus could not be placed over a church as early as the Tripartite states. It is also to be observed, that in Kieran's Life he is said to have not only baptized him but likewise instructed him. Yet Archdall, in his usual uncritical manner, gives us an abbey of Fidhard, and, to make the story better, places it both in Roscommon and Galway; founded, he says, by St. Patrick who consigned it to Justus. Besides the incorrectness of the latter part of this statement, Archdall was mistaken also in calling it an abbey; for the church of Fidhard, according to even the Tripartite, was no more than a deanery, although afterwards it became a parochial church in the diocese of Elphin, as Colgan says it was in his time.

(92) The situation of Mag-seola, the field of Seola, is laid down somewhat precisely in the Tripartite (L. 2. c. 39), which places it "in regione de Hy Bruin Seola, quae haud parum ab Ailfinnia ad occidentem distat." Harris seems to have overlooked this passage; otherwise, he would not have reckoned (Antiq. ch. 7.) Hy-Bruin Seola among the Hy-Bruins, whose situations are not easy to be guessed at.

(93) Tirechan's list has Sachellus and Falertus. Of either of them very little more is known. Colgan has a bishop Fulartus, or rather Fulartach (AA. SS. at March 29). Archdall, according to his usual mode of converting churches into monasteries, has introduced the Domnach-more of Falertus into his Monasticon (at Dunmore Co. Galway) although the Tripartite, the only authority on the subject, mentions it as simply a church. He is wrong in placing it at Dunmore, whereas it was at the place now called Donaghpatrik in the barony of Clare in said county.

(94) Colgan, without any authority, places (Tr. Th. p. 271.) a monastery at Druimnea, and so does his humble follower Archdall. This and some other churches, the foundation of which has, upon no sufficient grounds, been attributed to St. Patrick, would not be worth noticing, were it not for the sort of importance, that these and other writers have attached to them.

(95) Harris is shamefully wrong (Antiq. at Monasteries p. 270.) in making Athracta a sister of St. Patrick; for, besides that among all those pretended sisters of his (above Chap. III. §. xviii.) no such person as Athracta is mentioned, the family connexions of Athracta are distinctly mentioned both in the Tripartite (L. 2. c. 54.) and in her Acts at 9th Feb. He is also wrong in placing her nunnery in Roscommon, a mistake which even Ware had fallen into. From the same documents it is clear that it was in some part of Sligo, and the same as Killaraght, a place in the barony of Coolavin, and not, as Archdall says, in the half barony of Coloony, there being no such barony or half barony in that county. (Stat. Survey of Sligo p. 107.) As to the Killaraght of Roscommon, which also Archdall has, it had either nothing to do with St. Athracta, or undoubtedly was not her original nunnery.

(96) Kierragia Airteach was a district of what is now called Roscommon, adjoining Kierragia-Airne, which, as O'Flaherty observes, (marg. not. to Tr. Th. Ind. Geogr.) is now the barony of Costello in Mayo.

(97) Jocelin has this transaction, be it true or not, (cap. 76.) but, through his ignorance of Irish topography, places it in Kerry in Munster. The Kierragia of Munster was distinguished by the surname Luachra.

(98) Colgan was inclined to think, that Cona was the same as Mochonna (my Cona) of Cluain-airdne a church in that district, and who is mentioned in the Irish Calendars at September 30. His only reason for doubting of their identity was, that this St. Mochonna's death is assigned by the Four Masters to A. D. 713. (Tr. Th. p. 178.) Consequently either he was not the same as Cona, or the Tripartite amidst its numberless anachronisms has placed Cona in times long prior to his real ones.

(99) Here again comes forward Archdall with a monastery, called Aghamore. It is curious to observe how he made it out. Colgan, searching for Loarn's church, found a priest of that name, who was reported to be revered in the parish church of Achadmore; but he says nothing about a monastery. Archdall, however, proprio motu, converted that church into an abbey, and indeed under the abbot Loarn, as if every parish priest had been an abbot.

(100) There is a Conan in Tirechan's list.

(101) We find in our Ecclesiastical history several persons of the name of Senach. There is one in Tirechan's list. It is not improbable that he was this Senach of Aghagower. Ecce iterum Crispinus! Archdall places a monastery under Senach at Aghagower, although in whatever account we have of him no such thing is mentioned, and Colgan more than once (Tr. Th. p. 178. 271.) calls Aghagower merely a bishop's see.

§. XI. While St. Patrick was thus labouring in Connaught, it is related that on the coming on of Lent (102) he retired to Cruachan-aichle (Mount Eagle) and remained there until he completed the quadragesimal fast. I do not mean to deny, that he might have spent some part of that holy season in retirement on that mountain; but it is difficult to believe, that he would have absented himself from his converts during the whole of a time, which, according to the universal practice of the Church, particularly required the presence of a bishop among his people. Such a retirement for the purpose of more strictly observing the duties enjoined in Lent would have answered very well for a hermit, but would not have well suited St. Patrick, who, in the then thriving state of his mission, would have been better employed in preparing his Catechumens for baptism at Easter, and those, who were already baptized, for a worthy celebration of that great solemnity. In one of the Lives he is merely said to have retired to the mountain in Lent-time, without any mention of the number of days, which he might have passed there. (103) Or, if it be true, as other Lives state, that he remained 40 days and as many nights on that mountain, I should rather assign those days and nights to some part of the year different from Lent. (104) That precise number of 40 days and nights does not correspond exactly with the whole time of Lent, which, even in St. Patrick's time, consisted, including Sundays, of 42 days. According to the Tripartite, the Lent, which it makes St. Patrick pass on the mountain, although his fasting days are said to have been forty, consisted of 43 days; for it informs us, that he commenced his fast on the Saturday before the first Sunday in Lent. (105) Whatever might have been the season of the year, in which the saint observed this fast, we are to consider his fasting only in the same light, as we do that of other holy persons, that is, as consisting in abstinence from food and drink, as far as the calls of nature would permit, and not, as the Tripartite and Jocelin have represented it, in a total abstinence from every sort of aliment during 40 days and nights. (106) As to what we read in some of the Lives about St. Patrick having been surrounded by innumerable demons in the form of birds, (107) and his having driven them into the ocean at the foot of the mountain, to which Jocelin has added the expulsion, at the same place, of all poisonous animals collected there from every part of Ireland, (108) it would be a waste of time to dwell upon these and some other fables relative to pretended transactions on Cruachan-aichle. It is indeed very probable, and, considering the constant tradition of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, I dare say certain, that St. Patrick spent some time in prayer, meditation, and fasting, on that mountain, which for said reason has been since called Cruach Phardruic (Croagh-Patrick in Mayo,) that is, the heap or mountain of St. Patrick.

(102) Harris speaks of this as the Lent of the year 434. Whatever we may think of the truth of the whole transaction, it must be assigned to some year later; for all the proceedings of St. Patrick after his first celebration of Easter A. D. 433 until his arrival at Cruachan-aichle could not be comprized within less than two or three or perhaps more years. The third Life (cap. 85.) places the saint's visit to that mountain several years after this period. (See also Jocelin, cap. 171.) The Bollandists assign it to about the year 453.

(103) "Exiit in desertum, id est, Croighan-eigle in tempore Quadragesimæ ante Pascha." 3d Life, c. 85.

(104) Probus, (L. 2. c. 19.) and the fourth Life (cap. 59.) have the 40 days and nights, but do not mention their having been in the time of Lent. Nennius and others, forming a comparison between St. Patrick and Moses (above Chap. IV. §. 1.) reckon those days without alluding to the Lent-fast. And in fact, were St. Patrick's fasting merely that of Lent, what reason would there have been to liken him to Moses on that account any more than the millions of Christians, who have fasted in that time of the year?

(105) L. 2. c. 63. The author must here have alluded to the commencement of Lent as observed at his own time in Ireland.

And elsewhere (L. 3. c. 87.) he expressly calls the Saturday, before the first Sunday, the first day of Lent, caput jejunii. This is a circumstance worth noticing. It is well known that, for at least six centuries, the longest Lent in the Western church did not exceed six weeks, and accordingly that the real fasting days were at most 36, Sundays having been always days of exemption. This is the Lent still observed in the diocese of Milan. How and by whom the four days beginning with Ash Wednesday came to be added, it is not easy to ascertain. Perhaps they were introduced gradually; and it is probable that, to check the habit of gormandizing on the last days previous to Lent it was deemed advisable to anticipate the fast by a day or two, in the same manner as some religious communities do, at present, abstain from flesh meat on some of the last days of Carnival. The Saturday prior to the first Sunday of Lent was, it seems, a day of great feasting and intemperance with our ancestors, particularly as it was not a day of abstinence. To put a stop to such excesses, it was made a part of Lent. As to the three preceding days, I cannot find the precise time, at which they were received as fast days in Ireland. It was probably at a later period than in some other parts of Europe; for those days seem not to have been known by the Irish as a part of Lent, when the Tripartite was compiled, viz. in the tenth century. See above, Chap. III. §. iv.

(106) The other Lives make no mention of total abstinence. Probus and the author of the fourth Life speak in general terms of St. Patrick's fasting; but it does not hence follow that he did not take some nourishment occasionally. The third Life, as we have seen, merely states, that he went to the mountain in the time of Lent. The wish to make out conformities between him and Moses gave rise to the addition as to complete abstinence; and hence it got into the Tripartite, which mentions those conformities, and into Jocelin's collection of stories. Roth's arguments in favour of it (Elucid. 4ta in Jocel.) prove nothing more than its possibility; but, as the schoolmen say, a posse ad esse non fit conclusio.

(107) Probus (L. 2. c. 19.) says that St. Patrick, when he arrived at the top of the mountain, was surrounded by a multitude of birds, but does not call them devils. "Multitudo avium venit circa illum, ita ut non posset videre faciem caeli et terrae ac maris propter aves." In this there is nothing improbable, as it is easy to believe that sea fowls and various birds of prey might assemble in great numbers on seeing a person in such a lonely spot. It appears, however, that they soon dispersed; for Probus says no more about them. The circumstance became amplified, and the poor birds were transformed into demons.

(108) Jocelin is the only biographer of St. Patrick, that has spoken of the expulsion by him of serpents and other venomous creatures from Ireland. From his book this story made its way into other tracts and even into some breviaries. Had such a wonderful circumstance really occurred, it would have been recorded in our Annals and other works long before Jocelin's time. Colgan has a very good dissertation on this subject, (Tr. Th. p. 255. seqq.), in which he refutes Jocelin's assertion and shows the weakness of Roth's arguments in defence of it (Elucid. 5. in Jocel.). Among other proofs Colgan alleges, that in the most ancient documents of Irish history there is not the least allusion to venomous animals ever having been found in this country.

§. XII. From this mountain St. Patrick went (109) to Corcothemne, a district, it seems, not far distant, and is said to have there baptized some thousands of persons. In this tract he preached against the superstitious practice of some people, that revered a certain well as containing something divine. (110) Proceeding Northwards he arrives in Tir-Amalgaidh (Tirawley) the country of king Amalgaidh not long before deceased, whose seven (111) sons, after the termination of a dispute concerning the succession to the principality, which had been recently decided by the monarch Leogaire in favour of Enda Crom, were, together with a great number of people, assembled at a place called Forrach-mac-namalgaidh. Thither St. Patrick repaired, and having preached to the assembly gained over to Christ the seven princes, including the king, and twelve thousand persons more, all of whom he soon after baptized in a well called Tobur-enadharc, the well of Enadharc. (112) This celebrated conversion is mentioned in most of the Lives of St. Patrick with more or less circumstances, and has been recorded by Nennius and other writers. (113) On this occasion, or not long before the general conversion took place, an attempt was made against St. Patrick's life, in which the Magi were principally concerned; but Enda, one of the converted princes, and his son Conall protected him against their fury, and the sudden death of Recraid their chief deterred the others and made them desist from their wicked purpose. (114) The saint himself, after mentioning his having been in remote parts of Ireland, where no missionary had ever been before, (115) relates that certain persons wished to kill him, but that the Almighty and under him some powerful friends delivered him out of their hands. By those remote parts it is very probable he meant Tir-Amalgaidh, which seems to have comprised a greater extent of country than the present barony of Tirawley, and among other tracts some parts of Erris. And a few lines before he speaks of his having baptized several thousands of persons, (116) whereby he seems to allude to the transaction we are now treating of. It has been observed, that by this important event and the great success of St. Patrick in that territory was fulfilled the wish of the people from near Foclut, expressed in a vision many years before, for his coming to their country. (117) The Tripartite and its follower Jocelin say, that St. Patrick placed over these numerous converts the holy Manchen surnamed the Master; but that celebrated man, who was also surnamed the Wise, and of whom hereafter, lived in the seventh century, and died A. D. 652. (118) A church Domnachmore in that district is spoken of on this occasion and a bishop Mucna; (119) as also the church of Killala, over which, were we to believe the Tripartite, St. Patrick placed Muredach as bishop, who, as will be seen, was not as yet born at that period, having flourished in the sixth century; and it is very probable that Mucna did not live earlier. Before quitting Tirawley, he is said to have gone to a place near the river Moy, which in after times was called Lia-na-Manach, the rock of the Monks, from its having got into possession of certain monks, (120) and to have there converted a prince Eochad son of the former monarch Dathy. (121)

(109) The Tripartite and Jocelin, in consequence of their having placed St. Patrick on the mountain in Lent, make him celebrate Easter immediately after his descent, and, says the former, at Aghagower. The other Lives make no mention of this celebration of Easter.

(110) See Not. 43.

(111) The Tripartite (L. 2. c. 76.) mentions twelve sons, and even gives their names. But lower down (cap. 77.) it states that in St. Patrick's books only seven sons are spoken of.

(112) I wish some of our antiquaries would point out the precise situations of these places and not merely say with Colgan that they were in Tir-amalgaidh, which even a child could collect from the history of the transaction.

(113) See Usher p. 865.

(114) Probus L. 2. c. 23. See also Tripart. L. 2. c. 79—84.

(115) Hence it appears, that St. Patrick knew that in some of those parts of Ireland, which he would not have called remote, such as the Eastern and Southern districts, the Christian religion had been announced and practised before his time.

(116) See Confess. p. 19, 20. (117) See Chap. iv. §. x.

(118) Usher, Ind. Chron. Usher indeed, in consequence of his close adherence to Jocelin, mentions the Master Manchen at A. D. 434, the year, to which he erroneously assigns the conversion of the princes and people of Tir-Amalgaidh. Colgan does not attempt to fix the date of it, notwithstanding his having usually followed Usher in his chronological calculations. He must have known, that this conversion could not be placed as early as the year 434. And as to Manchen, whom Usher at that year speaks of merely by way of quotation from Jocelin, Colgan's endeavours (Tr. Th. p. 111) to find out a Manchen in St. Patrick's time are of no avail; it being evident, from the epithet Master, that the Tripartite and Jocelin alluded to the great Manchen of the 7th century.

(119) A St. Muckin of Magin (in Tirawley) is mentioned in the Irish Calendars at the 4th of March ; but there is no account of the time in which he lived. He was probably the same as Mucna, whom the Tripartite (L. 2. c. 83.) makes mention of, not as having been placed by St. Patrick over Domnach-mor, but rather as having been buried there. Archdall however (at Domnachmor in Mayo) reckons it among the abbeys founded by St. Patrick, although even Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 271.) following the Tripartite speaks of it as simply a church. As to Mucna having been placed bishop at Domnachmor, Colgan indeed so states it (AA. SS. at 4 Mart.), but without any sufficient foundation ; and then finding himself puzzled about the time that Mucna lived he throws out a conjecture, that his appointment took place A. D. 470 ; although it is clear, that St. Patrick's preaching in Tirawley was about thirty years prior to that date. Colgan assigns as a reason for this conjecture, that the Tripartite seems to indicate that Mucna was alive about the year 520 ; for it has (loc. cit.), " Venit Patricius ad Ecclesiam de Domnach-mor, ubi est episcopus Mucna." He imagined, that est referred to Mucna's being alive at the time the Tripartite was written, which he most uncritically (see above Chap. III. §. iv.) thought was in the sixth century ; and thus, not to make Mucna live too long, he affixed his appointment as bishop to the year 470. But he should have known, that nothing is more common in some of St. Patrick's Lives than to use est for requiescit ; so that the meaning of the passage now quoted is, that Mucna's remains were at Domnach-mor ; but at what time they were deposited there we have no means of discovering. At any rate there is not the least foundation for the assertion that he was made bishop by St. Patrick ; for the Tripartite, the only authority on the occasion, says nothing about it. I have here said thus much about Mucna, as no other opportunity will occur for treating of him.

(120) Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 271) and after him Archdall (at Lianamach) have changed this rock into a monastery founded by St. Patrick. The Tripartite, however, which they are pleased to quote, does not mention either church or monastery there, but describes it as a spot forming part of the estate of some monks in later times, and as having got its name “ a monachis postea possidentibus.” (L. 2. c. 90.) These monks were probably those of Kilmore or Kilmormoy (Kilmormoyle, Archdall), that is, Kilmore near the Moy; for Lianamach is stated to have been above the church of Kilmore. A monastery was erected there, it is said, by one Olcan, whom the Tripartite (L. 2. c. 92.) calls a disciple of St. Patrick. There is an Olcan in Tirechan’s list, and also an Oltcan. Usher (p. 951) makes Olcan bishop of Derkan in Antrim after his return from his studies in Gaul. The founder of Kilmormoy was certainly another person (see Olcan’s acts AA. SS. at 20 Febr.); and whether or not he was Oltcan of the list, I am not able to determine.

(121) Tripart. L. 2. c. 91. Jocelin (cap. 145.) calls him only a nobleman.

§. XIII. Having crossed the Moy near its mouth our Apostle entered Hy-Fiachra (the barony of Tireragh, Sligo) and proceeding along the coast is said to have baptized seven sons of one Drogen, and to have selected among them Mac-erca for the purpose of his being particularly instructed in religion. This Mac-erca, when duly qualified, was some years afterwards placed over the church of Kilroe in Tirawley. (122) St. Patrick having gone as far as the river Sligeach (Sligo) turned towards the East and on his way was opposed by some inhabitants of Calrigia, (123) who, on his addressing them, soon became pacified and asked for his pardon. Wishing to inquire into the state of the churches in some of the back parts of Connaught he went as far as Moylurg, where he was badly received by the family of Mick-erca. Maneus, whom he is said to have baptized some time before and who was afterwards a bishop, (124) is stated to have interceded for them, being a relation of theirs, and thus to have averted a part of the divine vengeance, which was to fall upon that family. The saint then returned to Calrigia, and at Dromahare baptized one Maccarthen. (125) In the neighbourhood of that place he is said to have erected a monastery at Druimlias, and to have placed over it his pupil Benignus, who, it is added, governed it for 20 years. The mention of this circumstance is alone sufficient to show, that, at whatever time there might have been a monastery there, it was not founded by St. Patrick. (126) From that country he went to the maritime parts of North Connaught, and continued his course through Caissealirra (West Cashel,) Drumcliff, &c. until he arrived in Ulster. Thus ended his mission in Connaught, where he spent on the whole seven years, having crossed the Shannon three times. (127) We may hence conclude, that his departure from that province did not take place until about the beginning of the year 442.

(122) Tripart. L. 2. c. 97. It was a church situated within a mile of Killala (Stat. Survey of Mayo, p. 147.), of which some ruins still remain. Archdall is right in placing it in Mayo, but wrong in converting it into a monastery, and still more singularly wrong in saying, that it was erected either by St. Fechin or St. Patrick. Colgan, whom he quotes for that purpose, has no such thing; nor does he mention any patron saint of Kilroe, except Macerca.

(123) This district must, besides a part of Sligo, have comprehended some part of the present county of Leitrim; for Dromahare is mentioned (Tripart. L. 2. c. 103) as situated in Calrigia.

(124) See Tripart. L. 2. c. 35. Maneus is there said to have been consecrated bishop by Bron; if so, it is difficult to believe, that he was among St. Patrick's followers at this time, that is, about the year 440. See above Not. 86.

(125) Who this Maccarthen was, we have no further account. If there was such a man at Dromahare, he was certainly different from the great St. Maccartin of Clogher. The Carten in Tircchan's list was in all probability the latter.

(126) The compilers of the Tripartite in this story about Druimlias (L. 2. c. 103) plainly alluded to the celebrated Benignus, as appears from their calling him the alumnus of St. Patrick. Now this Benignus was, although occasionally employed here and there, a rather constant companion of the saint, and afterwards became archbishop of Armagh. Who then will believe, that he was left behind at Druimlias and that for 20 years? The Tripartite does indeed mention elsewhere another Benignus, as contemporary with St. Patrick, whom it makes a brother of Cethecus; but I have no doubt that this Benignus was introduced merely to answer some objection against certain stories about the real Benignus, such as that of his having been abbot of Druimlias. If ever there was a person of that name abbot in said place, he must have lived at a later period. I pass over the multitude of chapels and houses, which, says the Tripartite, (loc. cit.) St. Patrick and his disciples built at Druimlias; things which belong to after times and not to the commencement of a mission. Harris was mistaken in placing Druimlias in Sligo, and has been followed by Archdall, who however, has the same Druimlias again in Leitrim, where alone it ought to be placed. For, as Dr. M'Parlan observes, (Stat. Survey of Sligo, p. 100.) there is no such abbey or place in Sligo, it being in Leitrim about a mile East of the town of Dromahare.

(127) The Tripartite has (L. 2. c. 108.); “Tribus autem vicibus trajecto Sinnano flumine, venit in Connaciam, in eaque—mansit annis septem.” According to this passage it might seem at first sight, that during those seven years St. Patrick had been twice back and forward in some other province different from Connaught, as it states that he crossed the Shannon three times on his way to that country. And yet, as has been seen in the course of this chapter, the same Tripartite, after having once brought the saint into Connaught, represents him as constantly employed there, and makes no mention of any excursion of his to any other province until his departure for Ulster. There is indeed one passage (L. 2. c. 104.), which is evidently misplaced; for, after mentioning St. Patrick's being at Druimlias in Leitrim, he is made to appear in the North of Antrim, and then immediately after we find him travelling along the coast of Sligo from South to North. I think it is easy to reconcile the Tripartite with itself, if it be recollected that St. Patrick had been during those seven years once or twice in some parts of Leitrim to the East of the Shannon, and accordingly had to cross the river a couple of times more for the purpose of getting into the heart of Connaught. Jocelin also assigns (cap. 96.) seven years, and uninterrupted, to St. Patrick's preaching in Connaught; which, considering all his proceedings and exertions there, were not too many.

CHAPTER VI.

Arrival in Ireland of the bishops Secundinus, Auxilius, and Isserninus—St. Patrick's proceedings in Tirconnell, Dalrieda, Dalaradia, and other parts of Ulster—Next in Meath and Leinster—Thence he goes to Cashel—Conversion of Aengus either then, or afterwards, king of Munster—His transactions in other parts of that province—Cause of his writing his Letter against Coroticus—The saint again in Ulster—Some account of Maccallus, Mocteus, and Maccarthen—Foundation of the church and see of Armagh.

SECT. I.

BEFORE we follow St. Patrick to Ulster, it is necessary to mention a matter of no small importance in our ecclesiastical history, which, according to some of our annalists, occurred during the time that he is stated to have been in Connaught; I mean the arrival in Ireland of the three bishops, Secundinus, Auxilius, and Isserninus, who, we are told, were sent as auxiliaries to St. Patrick in the year 439, (1) but by whom we are not informed. The two former are said to have been brothers, and nephews of the saint by his sister Darerca; but we have already seen (2) what little credit is due to these stories about St. Patrick's relatives. That those three prelates were in Ireland along with our Apostle is unquestionable; but if it be true, that Secundinus and Auxilius were disciples of his, as they are called in Tirechan's list, how can it be admitted that they first appeared in Ireland as bishops? Nor will it be easy to understand how Auxilius and Isserninus could be said to have come to Ireland at that time, whereas in almost all the Lives of St. Patrick they are spoken of as having joined him in the continent, and having received some degree of clerical ordination at the time that he was consecrated bishop. (3) And they are generally represented as having been among the persons chosen to accompany him on his mission to Ireland. The most satisfactory mode, that I can discover for reconciling these authorities, is, that St. Patrick, finding himself in want of episcopal helpers, had sent them and Secundinus to G. Britain or Gaul for the purpose of their being consecrated bishops according to the established usage of the church, which required the presence of at least three bishops for the consecration of another; and which, although it might be dispensed with in some cases of urgent necessity, our saint, who was well acquainted with the Nicene and other decrees on that subject, did not think himself authorized to depart from, (4) particularly as those countries were not far distant and an intercourse of trade was kept up between them and Ireland. In this manner the difficulty can be readily solved; and it is quite natural to suppose, that St. Patrick would have chosen as his first colleagues those followers and disciples of his, who had been for some years members of the clerical body. It is true, indeed, that Auxilius and Isserninus seem to be spoken of as having been made bishops some years later by St. Patrick himself; but this can be very well understood not of their episcopal consecration, but of their being, after having been employed in various parts of the country, affixed to particular sees. (5) The arrival of those three persons, as bishops and auxiliaries to St. Patrick, about the year 439 was a circumstance well worth recording; but it does not contradict their having been already in Ireland.

(1) Usher, Ind. Chron. from the Annals of Ulster and Innisfallen. The latter have; "Secundinus et Auxiliarius (Auxilius) et Esserninus mittuntur in auxilium Patricii; nec tamen tenuerunt apostolatam, nisi Patricius solus."

(2) Chap. III. §. XVIII. (3) Chap. IV. §. XVII—XX.

(4) This observation will enable us to form an opinion concerning those several bishops, whom the Tripartite makes mention of as being in Ireland very soon after St. Patrick's arrival, such as Luman, Asicus, Cethecus, &c. The fact is, that the first bishops in Ireland next after St. Patrick were Secundinus, Auxilius, and Isserninus, who were foreigners and, it seems, from Gaul. With their assistance he consecrated others in the course of his mission. In the order of the holy bishops (ap. Usher, p. 914.), that were in St. Patrick's time, the first mentioned are those, who were Romans, and Franks, that is, natives of Gaul.

(5) Usher, (Ind. Chron. ad A. 448.) following his Tripartite, says, that St. Patrick appointed Auxilius bishop of North Leinster. His see was, from his name, called Kill-ausaille (Killossy, Kildare). The third Life (cap. 58.) states, that St. Patrick "ordinavit ibi Auxilium discipulum Patricii." Colgan's Tripartite does not mention ordination, but informs us (L. 3. c. 18.) that he left there Auxilius, and at Kilcullen Isserninus: "In ecclesia, quae, ex ejus nomine denominationem sumens, Kill-ausaille vulgo vocatur, reliquit S. Auxilium; in Kill-cuillin S. Isserninum." Colgan took it into his head that Isserninus was the same as saint Sezinus or Sezni, an Irish saint celebrated in Britany, whose acts interspersed with fables he has published (AA. SS. ad Mart.) from Albert le Grande (De SS. Britann. Armor.) Sezinus is said to have been born in Ulster A. D. 402; to have studied at Rome; to have become bishop at Warrham! in Ireland; to have arrived in Britany A. D. 477, and to have died at Guic Sezni in that country as late as the year 529, having lived, they tell us, 127 years. Lobineau (Hist. de Bretagne p. 76.) mentions St. Sezni, adding that scarcely any thing is known about him except his name. Now Isserninus is always spoken of as a foreigner, and after his consecration lived constantly in Ireland until his death in the year 469. But, because Isserninus has been sometimes called Serenus, Colgan, perceiving some affinity between that name and Sezinus, gave himself the useless trouble of striving to identify two quite different persons.

§. 11. St. Patrick being arrived in the province of Ulster preaches in Tirconnell (Donegal) and is said to have erected a church in Rathcunga, (6) and to have thence turned back a little towards the river Erne, near which he gave his blessing to prince Conall, (7) a brother of the king Leogaire, and to his son Fergus. On this occasion, if we are to believe the Tripartite, he foretold the birth and extraordinary sanctity of the great Columba, (8) who was to descend from Fergus. Thence he went to a small district called Mag-hithe, (9) where, they tell us, he founded the church of Domnach-mor, (10) and placed over it one Dubduban. We find him next in the country now called Innish-owen, where he is said to have converted the dynast Owen, from whom it has got its name, (11) and to have spent some time with him at Ailech, the place of his residence. (12) He is then stated to have crossed the Foyle and to have remained seven weeks near the river Faughan (Derry). Be this as it may, we are not bound to believe that during this time he laid the foundation of seven churches in that neighbourhood. (13) Soon after we meet with a similar story as to his having, on his return to Innish-owen founded the church of Domnach-mor-muighe-tochuir, and placed over it a bishop Maccarthen brother of the Maccarthen afterwards bishop of Clogher. But there was no second bishop Maccarthen; (14) nor can we suppose that the one of Clogher had been first bishop of that church with the long name; so that its pretensions to such great antiquity fall to the ground. (15) The account given, on this occasion, of St. Patrick's having fixed on a place for the erection of the church of Domnach-bile in the same country is, if true, not to be referred, as by some writers, (16) to the then erection of said church, but to his having marked out a spot as well situated for that purpose, on which the church was afterwards built. And it is still more incorrect to say, that St. Patrick placed over it Aengus, son of Olild; for, according to the Tripartite, this Aengus son of Olild, and grandson of the dynast Owen, is merely said to have been initiated in clerical orders by the saint, that is, to have received the tonsure. He was, when arrived at a mature age, probably the founder of that church (17) several years after St. Patrick's visit to Innish-owen.

(6) Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 176.) says, that this place was called so in his time, and that it was in the district of Tir-aodha (barony of Tyrhugh). Archdall has changed this church into an abbey of St. Patrick's foundation.

(7) This Conal was surnamed Gulbanus, and was different from the Conal mentioned above Chap. V. §. vi.

(8) Adamnan in his second Preface to the Life of Columba mentions a prophecy concerning him by Mauctaneus or Mavateus a holy Briton and a disciple of St. Patrick. Had Adamnan known that St. Patrick himself had delivered such a prophecy, he certainly would have recorded it.

(9) Near the river Fin in Donegal. Tr. Th. p. 181.

(10) Donaghmore in the barony of Raphoe, now a rectory. (Seward, ad loc.) I need scarcely inform the reader, that Domnach-mor (Donaghmore) means a great church (Dominica magna); and hence comes it that we have so many places of that name in Ireland.

(11) Innish-owen the Island or rather peninsula of Owen.

(12) Three miles to the North of Derry. (Colgan Tr. Th. p. 181.) I very much suspect the truth of what is said in the Tripartite concerning the early conversion of several of those princes or chieftains. St. Patrick speaks of them as, in general, adverse to him, although some of their sons and daughters became Christians, flii Scottorum et filiae regulorum (see Chap. V. §. vi. not. 56.); and several of the former accompanied him in his spiritual expeditions, (ib. §. viii.) while many of the latter embraced the state of Christian virginity, notwithstanding the persecutions they suffered on that account from their parents. It is clear from his Confession, that at the time he wrote it the greatest part of the kings or chiefs were not as yet converted; for he makes mention of the sufferings of himself and his followers, and of the precautions he used to take against giving occasion to a general persecution, usiug, among other means, that of making presents to those kings, some of whom, however, while obstinate themselves, allowed their sons to follow him.

(13) The Tripartite (L. 2. c. 119.) goes so far as even to give the names of six of those churches; but Colgan could not find any account of them, one only excepted and that obscure enough, viz. Badoney, which Archdall might have passed over without swelling his Monasticon with it. If such churches had been really erected by St. Patrick, they would have been well known and held in high estimation.

(14) There is but one Maccarthen or Carthen in Tirechan's list. In the fragment of the Life of Maccarthen of Clogher (ap. Colgan AA. SS. 24 Mart.) there is no allusion to a brother Maccarthen; nor does Usher, who had a Life of him (Pr. p. 856.) mention any such brother. The good people of that church in Innish-owen wished, I dare say, to claim the honour of its having been governed by the celebrated prelate of Clogher; but the compilers of the Tripartite, finding that this could not accord with the circumstance of his life, and striving to patch up the business, introduced the second Maccarthen. And we may observe that the real Maccarthen was most probably too young, at the period we are treating of, to be a bishop; for he lived until A. D. 506.

(15) Archdall, following the Tripartite, makes mention of this church at Domnach-glenne Tochuir.

(16) Harris, Bishops, p. 18. Archdall, at Movill (Donegal).

(17) Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 181.) says that Domnagh-bile was afterwards called Magh-bile, and that a monastery was there, which, however, he neither ascribes to St. Patrick, nor exhibits as placed by him under Aengus. These circumstance we find in Archdall alone, who has also strangely confounded the account of Magh-bile or Movill of Donegal with that of Movill in Down, a well known monastery, which was governed by St. Finnian in the sixth century, and continued in a flourishing state to a very late period. As to Movill in Donegal I much doubt, whether it was ever a monastery; for Colgan, although he thought so, yet could not make out any one abbot of it. Harris (Monasteries) has the two Movills or Maghbiles, and attributes the foundation of both of them to St. Finnian. Archdall goes further, and pretends to give the names of some of the abbots of Movill in Donnegall, such as Finnian, Siollan, Aengus, M'Loingsy, &c. Now these are the same identical persons, whom with many others he reckons at Movill in Down, where indeed and where alone they ought to be. He was led astray by the Index topographicus to Colgan's AA. SS. in which Finnian is mentioned as having been at both Maghbiles. The compiler of that Index, who probably was not Colgan himself, was deceived by the identity of the name Maghbile, which signifies the plain of the tree or trees. In our Calendars, Martyrologies, and Annals Maghbile is often mentioned, and in a general and absolute manner, without any allusion to a second monastery of that name. Ware was therefore right in marking but one Maghbile or Movill, viz. that of Down, and ought to have been adhered to by Harris.

§. III. Our Apostle now departs from Innishowen and, crossing the streights at the North end of Lough-Foyle, proceeds to Dun-Cruthen (18) where, we are told, he placed a bishop of the name of Beatus. (19) Not to dwell on some stuff about seven churches said to have been founded in that neighbourhood by St. Patrick in as many weeks, and of which Colgan could find no account, we next meet with him at the eastern side of the Bann, (20) and moving forward through Dalrieda, in which country he is said to have baptized a posthumous infant, to whom he gave the name of Olcan, (21) and who afterwards became bishop of Derkan. Several churches are here mentioned as erected by him in Dalrieda, as likewise the persons, partly bishops and partly priests, placed over them, all of whom, together with their churches, (22) we may pass over without the least injury to the true history of our saint. From Dalrieda he went to Dalradia, in which country he is said to have founded many churches, the origin of which is, however, so uncertain, that it would not be worth while to mention any of them, had they not been introduced as monasteries by Archdall into the Monasticon. (23) In a part of the country near Lough-ethach (Loughneagh), and at the East of it, St. Patrick was opposed by a chieftain named Carthen, and forced to quit his territory. It is added that a younger brother, also called Carthen, who lived in another part of that district, became a convert. Having gone from Dalardria to the tract called Gaura, (24) he was badly received there and driven out by the people. Accordingly he turned off to the district of Imchclair, and having converted a considerable number of people placed over them a priest named Columb. (25) While he was still in those parts (the now county of Tyrone) Cinnia, (26) daughter of a dynast named Echodius, became a Christian and dedicated her virginity to the Son of God, notwithstanding the great opposition she met with at first from her father, who, however, although unwilling to become a Christian himself at that time, was induced by the saint to permit her to take the veil. St. Patrick then entrusted Cinnia to the care of the holy virgin Ceta-maria, (27) who lived in the nunnery of Drum-dubhain. Thence he went to a small territory, called Hua-meith-tire, in which he is said to have erected a church at Teaghtalian (now Tehallan) (28) and to have placed over it a bishop Killen. (29) The chief of the district, Owen son of Brian, together with his subjects embraced, we are told, the Christian faith on this occasion. From that district St. Patrick went to the adjoining territory of the Mugdorni (Cre-mourne (30) in Monaghan), and having arrived at a place called at a later period Donnach-maigen (Donaghmain) is said to have converted Victor proprietor of it, who, if we are to believe the Tripartite, made over his lands and property to the Church, and after some years became bishop in that place. (31) The saint's preaching is stated to have been attended with great success throughout all the country of the Mogdurni.

(18) Colgan threw out a conjecture that Dun-cruthen was the same as the present Dunboe, and has been followed by Archdall. It is probable, that Duncruthen was situated elsewhere. (See the Rev. Mr. Sampson's excellent work, Stat. Survey of the Co. of L. Derry, p. 487.) It was not far from the district called Kennacta (Kenaght in L. Derry) which the Tripartite (L. 2. c. 125.) thus joins with it; "In istis partibus in regione Kennactae," &c.

(19) Among several persons of the name Beoadh or Beoan Colgan has endeavoured to discover which of them this Beatus was, but could not come to any decision. The Tripartite represents him as the intimate friend of a holy man, named Eugenius, who very probably was Eugenius bishop of Ardstrath (Tyrone) in the sixth century. If so, Beatus was not contemporary with St. Patrick.

(20) Harris says that St. Patrick crossed the Bann at Coleraine. Where he got this information I do not know; for it is not given either in the Tripartite or by Colgan.

(21) This is the Olcan, whom Usher (Ind. Chron.) makes return from Gaul A. D. 450 after having completed his studies. But, if he was born about the time we are now treating of, that is, about the year 443, how could he have finished his education in 450?

(22) Archdall has contrived to swell up his book with many of those pretended foundations of St. Patrick in the part of Antrim called Dalrieda. Thus he has Rathmoane (Rathmodain), which, whatever was its origin, is spoken of as merely a church under the care of a priest. He has also Achadhnacill, a place not mentioned in the Tripartite or in any of St. Patrick's Lives. The process, by which he made out this monastery, is rather curious. A priest Cathbad is mentioned (Tripart. L. 2. c. 130.) as placed over a church at Fothrat. Colgan suspected, that he might have been the same as St. Cathub, who was revered at Achadcinn or Achadnacill. Here Archdall comes in and tells us, that this church was built by St. Patrick, although Colgan does not say so; nor indeed could he; for Cathub, who governed that church, died, as Colgan himself informs us (AA. SS. p. 192.) from the 4 Masters, A. D.

554 (555) and consequently was not appointed to Achadnacill by St. Patrick. Then we have Tulach, notwithstanding its being called only a church, over which is said to have been placed a bishop Nehemias, concerning whom Colgan could make out nothing satisfactory. The person alluded to was, I dare say, no other than a St. Nehemias, who died in the year 654. Next we have from Archdall Domnachcoinre, a church, which by whomsoever built, probably by a person of the name of Conry, had nothing to do with a monastery. In like manner he has converted the plain church of Druimindeich into an abbey. The Enan, who is said to have presided over it, was probably, as Colgan thought, Enan son of Muadan, whose festival was held on the 25th of March. (see AA. SS.) Now this Enan was a disciple of Comgall of Bangor, and accordingly must have lived late in the sixth century. Another of those monasteries of Archdall is Kilitragh (Cuill-ec-trann) a mere church said to have been placed under a bishop Fiachrius.

(23) Archdall has covered over Dalaradia (part of which near Lough-neagh was called Hy-tuirtre) with monasteries founded by St. Patrick. 1. Domnachbruin, or rather Domnachbrain. 2. Domnach-combuir. 3. Domnachfothairbe. 4. Domnachlibeir. 5. Domnachmoelain. 6. Domnachmor in Magh-damhorna likewise in Dalaradia, not Dalrieda as Archdall has it. 7. Domnach-riascaigh. 8. Domnachrighduin. 9. Domnachsainre (Domnachfainre, Tripart.) 10. Gleann-indeachta. 11. Gluaire, also in Dalaradia. 12. Imleachcluann. 13. Kilglais. 14. Lanavach. 15. Rath-easpuic-innic. 16. Rathsithe. Colgan was not able to give any account of the greatest part of these churches, nor excepting Domnach-combuir, does he call them monasteries. The very names of many of them refer to founders different from St. Patrick. Thus Domnach-brain was a church founded by a person of the name of Brain; Domnach-libeir by one Libeir, a name that occurs more than once in our history; Domnach-moelain, by a Mullen or O'Mullen, &c. Amidst the little that is known concerning three or four of them there is nothing to prove, that they were erected by our saint. For instance, St. Molassius is said to rest at Gluaire. We find two or three eminent persons of that name in the sixth or seventh century, one of whom might have been the founder of that church. In like manner St. Coeman is said to be at the church in Imleachcluann, and Colgan observes that there was a church called Kill-coeman in the diocese of Connor. More than one Coeman or Coman are celebrated among the Irish saints; but they all lived later than the period we are now treating of. Rath-espuic-innic, that is, the fort of bishop Innic, was so called, says the Tripartite (L. 2. c. 133.) from the bishop Vinnoc, whom St. Patrick placed over it. Jocelin (cap. 149.) and the third Life (cap. 71.) have a holy man Vinnoc contemporary with St. Patrick, but do not call him bishop. Most probably he was the same as Finnian or Finan who, although different from the great Finnian of Clonard, yet lived at the same time, that is, in the sixth century. Finan and Vinan are the same name in Irish; thus Adamnan writes Vinnian for Finnian. Vinan and Vinnoc are likewise the same, being diminutives of Vin or Fin; in the same manner as Coeman Coemoc, Aedan Aedoc, &c. Finan was, as appears from his having been under the direction of Coelan of Nendrum, (see Usher, p. 954.) a native of some part of the north of Ireland not far remote from the place where Rath-espuic-innic is stated to have been, viz. in the now barony of Antrim. On the whole, with regard to the greatest part of these establishments, there is no sufficient authority to show, that they owe their origin to St. Patrick.

(24) This district was, it seems, near Lough-neagh to the S. East and South.

(25) Tripart. L. 2. c. 142. No church is mentioned. Colgan remarks, that in Imchclair, alias, Maghclair (a tract in the neighbourhood of Dungannon) there was a church called Domnachmor, in which a priest Columb was revered. Archdall seized upon this observation, and thence made out that the abbey of Donaghmore in Tyrone was founded by St. Patrick, although the Tripartite, which alone could be appealed to, makes no mention even of a church there in St. Patrick's time.

(26) See above Chap. III. §. XVIII.

(27) Jocelin (cap. 79.) calls her Cethuberis, and says she was the first Irish virgin, that took the veil. This he repeats, cap. 188. where he gives her the name of Ethembria; but where he got his information I cannot discover.

(28) Tehallan is in the county of Monaghan and barony of Monaghan. Hence it appears, that Harris was mistaken (Antiq.

ch. 7.) in making Hy-meith-tire the same as the present barony of Orior in Armagh. The name Teagh-talain, the house of Talan, seems to indicate a church founded by one Talan; for several Irish churches were denominated in like manner; ex. c. Teagh-Munnu, Taghmon in Wexford. Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 184.) observes, that there was a St. Tellan son of Colgan a chief of that very district, whose name is in the Irish Calendars at June 25. There can be little doubt that from him said church got its name; if so, it was not founded by St. Patrick.

(29) The festival of St. Killen was kept at Tehallan on the 27th of May; but we are not bound to believe, that he was placed there by St. Patrick. There were so many saints of the name of Killen (see AA. SS. p. 331.), that we cannot decide which of them he was.

(30) It is evident from the whole context, that the regio Mugdornorum (Tripart. L. 3. c. 12.) was no other than Cremourne, the name of which was derived from the Irish Crioch-Mugdorn (Crioch nation, country). Colgan was wrong in confounding it with the mountainous country of Mourne in Down; for surely this country does not join the barony of Monaghan. In his Topographical index to Tr. Th. he calls it Mugdorna, while the Tripartite has not that name but designates it as the territory of the Mogdurni. Harris, it seems, took his Mogdurna (Antiq. ch. 7.) from Colgan, and with him makes it the same as Mourne in Down. It is probable that Mourne also was called Mugdorn; but the regio Mogdurnorum mentioned in the Tripartite, was certainly in Monaghan. Nor was it confined to what is now called Cremourne; for Donaghmain, which has given its name to an adjoining barony in said county, was in it.

(31) Jocelin also has (cap. 139) Domnach-maghin, as he spells it, Victor, &c. but, as well as the Tripartite, says nothing about a monastery. Archdall, however, could not let it escape, and to mend the matter, has placed it in Mourne in Down, where no Domnach-maghin is to be found. It was no other than the village, now called Donaghmain, in the barony of said name and county of Monaghan. Victor would have been a strange name for an Irishman in St. Patrick's days; and as to donations of lands, &c. made to the saint we have already seen in what light they ought to be considered.

§. IV. Thence he proceeded to Meath, and, having instructed the inhabitants of the northern parts of that province, arrived at Bile-tortan near Ardbraccan, and there is said to have laid the foundation of a church afterwards called Domnach-tortan (32) and to have placed over it Justin a priest. (33) He visited also the country about Slane, probably for the purpose of inquiring into the state of the congregations, which had been formed in that neighbourhood since the year 433. I am very much inclined to think, that it was during the time passed on this occasion in Meath, and which might have been about the beginning of A. D. 443, (34) that he left in that country the bishop Secundinus, who although he chose for his ordinary residence Domnach-Sachnall (35) (Dunshaghtin), yet, as appears from various circumstances, was entrusted with the care of the new converts, not only in Meath but in the more northern parts of Ireland, (36) while St. Patrick was proceeding on his mission through Leinster and Munster. The suffraganship of Secundinus lasted about six years; (37) and, as he died A. D. 448, we may place the commencement of it early in 443, a date which agrees very well with the whole tenour of St. Patrick's proceedings.

(32) Archdall (at Donaghmore, Meath) has changed this church into a monastery called, he says, Bile-tortan. But this was the name of the place in Pagan times. He then tells us, that it is the same as Donaghmore near Navan; but Colgan, whom he refers to, does not say so.

(33) In Tirechan's list of St. Patrick's disciples there is a Justianus.

(34) Compare with Chap. V. §. XIII.

(35) The place got its name from Secundinus, whom the Irish called Sechnall. Domnach-Sechnall, the Dominica or church of Sechnall. The name has been gradually corrupted into Dunshaghtin, or Dunshaghtin. See Usher. Pr. p. 826. and Ware Opusc. S. P. p. 150.

(36) The Tripartite (L. 3. c. 98.) calls him St. Patrick's Vicar and Suffragan, although it states (ib. c. 86.) his usual residence to have been at Dunshaghlin. And in another (ib. cap. 81.) St. Patrick is said to have charged him with the care of the arch-see of Armagh and of the primacy during his own absence. This is a garbled account founded on the true one; I say, garbled, because Secundinus was dead before that see was established. The absence, indeed, alluded to in the Tripartite is said to have occurred on occasion of the saint's going to Rome; but it is certain that St. Patrick never went to that city after his arrival in Ireland as a preacher of the Gospel. The real absence was that caused by the saint's spiritual tour to the South of Ireland; and accordingly Secundinus was left in charge of the northern districts, and consequently among others of those, which afterwards belonged to the see of Armagh.

(37) Usher, (p. 875.) thinks, that six years is the true reading relative to Secundinus as spoken of in an old catalogue of bishops of Armagh. And although he supposed, that said see was founded in the year 445, yet he maintains that Secundinus was never bishop of it. The fact is, that the story of his having governed that see originated in his having been invested with a very extensive jurisdiction in the North during St. Patrick's absence.

§. v. Matters being thus settled in Meath, our Apostle moved into Leinster, and going straight forward to Naas, the residence of the kings of that province, is said to have baptized in a fountain near the North side of the town the princes Illand and Alild, (38) sons of king Dunlung, both of whom became afterwards sovereigns of Leinster. (39) An anecdote is related of one Foillen an officer of the court of Naas, who pretending to be asleep, lest he should comply with the saint's wish to see and instruct him, slept in earnest never to wake again in this world. (40) St. Patrick turning into Hy-Garrechon, that is, into some part of the present county of Wicklow (41) was very badly received by Driehir prince of that country, who knowing the enmity, that his father-in-law king Leogaire bore to the saint, became also hostile to him. But he was most hospitably entertained by a man in an humble walk of life, named Killin, who even killed the only cow that he possessed for the purpose of treating the saint and his companions. (42) This good man was amply rewarded for his attention by the blessings, that came upon himself and his family in consequence of the saint's benediction. From that country St. Patrick went to Maghliffe, or the now county Kildare, through which the Liffey winds its course, and having laid the foundation of several churches, and arranged the boundaries of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, left some of his companions in those tracts, and, among others, bishop Auxilius at Killossy, and bishop Isserninus at Kilcullen. (43) How long he remained in that country we are not informed; but, considering the length of time requisite for the transactions now mentioned, it may be reasonably supposed, that he did not leave it until about the latter end of the year 443. (44) Thence he went to Leix (now part of the Queen's county) and when arrived at its borders got notice from a pious lady, called Briga, of a snare prepared for him and his followers by the people of a part of that district, by means of which it was intended to entrap them in the bogs and kill them. They, however, continued their course and providentially escaped without falling into the pits. The saint then proceeded to the house of his friend the arch-poet Dubtach, who lived in Hy-Kinsellagh, that is, as it seems, in the parts of that great territory (45) which is now comprized within the county Carlow. In one of their conversations on religious subjects St. Patrick asked him did he know any one in that country whom he would think fit to be promoted to holy orders. Dubtach answered that he had a disciple named Fiech, (46) then absent, whom he thought well disposed for that purpose. Before the conversation was ended Fiech returned from Connaught, whither Dubtach had sent him to present some poems of his composition to the princes of that province. (47) Fiech was of an illustrious family, being son of Erc of the house of Hy-Bairrche in Leinster. (48) At the time of his meeting St. Patrick he was already a Christian, or, at least, a catechumen. (49) Some accounts add, that he was then a widower, his wife having died not long before and left an only son named Fiachre. (50) The saint, finding him properly qualified, gave him the clerical tonsure, and supplied him with the necessary means for cultivating the ecclesiastical studies, in which he made great progress as well as in piety. After some time he became a bishop, (51) being the first Leinster-man that was raised to the episcopacy, (52) and at length the chief bishop of the whole province. (53) His see was at Sletty; (54) and he is said to have governed also a monastery, which was called Domnach-Fiech. (55) He has been ever since held in a very high degree of respect and veneration, (56) and seems to have lived to a great age; for it is said, that sixty of his pious disciples departed this life before himself. St. Patrick is stated to have met with great encouragement from Crimthan son of Enda Kinsellagh and king of Hy-kinsellagh, who, although hostile to Fiech and his connexions, is represented as a pious prince that founded and endowed seventy churches, (57) two or three of which are mentioned by name. (58) The saint moving forward arrived in Ossory, and there, according to the Tripartite, converted numbers of people, and founded many churches, &c. none of which, nor their superiors, are particularly specified.

(38) According to the 4 Masters Illand died A. D. 506, and Alild in 526. As to the former having been baptized by St. Patrick the difficulty with the regard to time might be got over; but how can we account for the baptism of Alild at that time, particularly as the Tripartite adds, (L. 3. c. 16.) that two daughters of his Mugania and Fethlimia, were also baptized by the saint in the same fountain? Supposing Alild to have been then only 24 years old, we should admit that he reached an age of above 100 years. Usher's Tripartite (Pr. p. 826.) is more cautious on this point; for it mentions in general terms, that the sons of Dunlung, who ruled in North Leinster, believed and were baptized. Usher (Ind. Chron.) assigns their baptism to A. D. 448 in pursuance of his calculations, according to which St. Patrick founded the see of Armagh, went to Great Britain, &c. before he set out for Leinster. But his system cannot be reconciled with the series of our saint's transactions as given in the Tripartite.

(39) Jocelin has cunningly omitted the whole of what is said about St. Patrick having been at Naas, and, instead of it, has given (cap. 69. seqq.) some fables concerning his having, after coming from Meath, crossed Finglas river, and from an eminence at about a mile from the village of Ath-cliaith, now Dublin (I suppose the high ground about the Royal Canal) blessed it and foretold its future greatness and prosperity. Then comes a heap of trash, which bears every mark of interpolation, unless we suppose that Jocelin could in one breath have contradicted himself, about a great city of Dublin as having been founded by the Norwegians, &c. and existing in St. Patrick's time, its king Alphin, and his daughter Dublinia, from whom the city took its name, &c. &c. Among other stories we read that the king and the citizens of Dublin, to show their gratitude to St. Patrick, became tributary to the see of Armagh. This nonsense was undoubtedly fabricated at Armagh, and either Jocelin was induced, in compliment to his patron the archbishop Thomas, to insert it in his book, or it was foisted by some other hand into his MS. Usher has given some of these stories (p. 861. seqq.) and affixed them to A. D. 448. See Not. prec.) Harris also touches on them (Bishops, p. 20). But they are not worth the trouble of refutation; as neither Ath-cliaith nor Dublin, nor king Alphin, are ever mentioned in the other Lives of St. Patrick; nor would the Tripartite, which was so very minute as to the places where the saint was, or might have been, and particularly if kings were in the way, omitted the circumstances, had there been any foundation for them.

(40) Tripart. L. 3. c. 15. Hence the imprecation, which, adds the Tripartite, a person wishing bad rest to another used to pronounce: May he sleep as Foillen did in the castle of Naas. Colgan says, (Tr. Th. p. 112.) that this imprecation was used in his time. It would not be worth mentioning, were it not to show how Jocelin has shifted the scene of this anecdote to serve his purpose of bringing St. Patrick to Ath-cliath or Dublin. For he says (cap. 72.) that it occurred at Castle-knock just after the saint had left Dublin, and, the better to hide his trick, calls that unfortunate man not Foillen but Murin.

(41) See Chap. I. §. vi.

(42) Tripart. (L. 3. c. 17.) Here is another proof furnished by the Tripartite itself, that St. Patrick did not always abstain from flesh-meat. (See above Chap. IV. Not. 53.)

(43) See above Not. 5. Killossy is placed by Rawson (Stat. Survey of Kildare p. vi.) within a mile of Nass. Archdall is wrong in saying that it was not far from Kildare, and also in making St. Patrick found an abbey there—wrong likewise in calling Auxilius a nephew of his. (See Chap. III. §. xviii.) The Kilcullen, where Isserninus was fixed is what we now call Old Kilcullen, formerly a respectable town. The new Kilcullen or Kilcullen-bridge was not known until the 14th century (Rawson ib. p. vii. and Seward at Kilcullen). The Tripartite (L. 3. c. 18.) joins Mactalius as left with Isserninus at Kilcullen; but, although he was certainly bishop of that place, he could not have been there, even as a disciple, at the time of Isserninus' appointment; for, as Colgan (Not. ad loc.) observes from the Annals of the 4 Masters, he lived until the year 548 (549). In O'Connor's map of Scotia Antiqua (Dissertations &c.) Maghliffe, or, as he calls it, Moy-Liffe, is erroneously made to be the same as the Co. Dublin. Killossy and Kilcullen, which the Tripartite places in Maghliffe, surely are not in this county.

(44) Usher, following his erroneous calculations of which above (Not. 38.) affixes the appointment of Auxilius, &c. and other transactions in North Leinster to A. D. 448.

(45) Hy-Kinsellagh was the Southern part of Leinster (Tr. Th. p. 565.) Harris says (Irish Writers at Fiech) that it comprehended part of the counties of Wexford, Carlow, and Queen's county. And yet, strange to tell, in his account of ancient territories (Antiq. ch. 7.) he confines it to a great part of the county of Wexford. Now instead of thus confining it, he should have added to it the county of Kilkenny, as Seward has done, who however ought not to have added Wicklow.

(46) See Chap. V. §. v.

(47) Tripart. L. 3. c. 21. Here we have a proof that the art of writing was known and practised in Ireland before the arrival of St. Patrick. (See Chap. V. Not. 31.) It is very remarkable that although Fiech must, as a scholar of Dubtach, have known how to write, yet in the very same chapter of the Tripartite the saint is stated to have given him an alphabet written with his own hand for the purpose of his learning it; that is, the Roman alphabet to enable him to learn Latin.

(48) Fiech's Scholiast, No. 1.

(49) The Scholiast (ib.) represents him as a Christian and fit to receive immediately the clerical tonsure. According to the Tripartite he was then only a catechumen, and is said to have been baptized by St. Patrick. Dubtach might have been his instructor in the Christian religion as well as in the Bardic profession. I think it also very probable, that there were several Christians in said district about that time; otherwise, how could St. Patrick have consulted Dubtach concerning persons of his acquaintance fit to be admitted into the clerical order? They should have been believers in Christ before such a question could have been asked. As to the persons, by whom they had been instructed, baptized, &c. we may suppose that they were visited occasionally by some priests either of St. Patrick's or Palladius' appointment, or by some of those who were in Ireland before the arrival of Palladius. (See Chap. I. §. xv.)

(50) Tripart. L. 3. c. 21. The Scholiast does not mention these circumstances. But in several Callendars, &c. quoted by Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 185.) Fiachre is called the son of Fiech, and they are mentioned as jointly revered in certain churches.

(51) Scholiast, No. 1. Tripart. L. 3. c. 21. Jocelin, cap. 115. In the passages now referred to Fiech is not stated to have been consecrated bishop by St. Patrick on this first occasion of the saint's being in Hy-Kinsellagh, but after some time, as the Scholiast expresses it; "Et postea ab eodem (Patricio) consecratus est episcopus." Jocelin adds, that he was not consecrated until he regularly officiated in the subordinate orders. At any rate it is not to be imagined that Fiech, who received the first rudiments of ecclesiastical learning from St. Patrick himself, would have been raised to the episcopacy until after some not inconsiderable lapse of time; and hence it appears that Usher was wrong in affixing (Ind. Chron.) Fiech's consecration to the same year that he supposed St. Patrick to have arrived in Hy-Kinsellagh, after the appointment of Auxilius, &c. viz. A. D. 448 (see Not. 44.); not that Fiech might not have been a bishop in that year, admitting, what seems very probable, that his first interview with St. Patrick was about the beginning of the year 444.

(52) Tripart. loc. cit.

(53) Tripart. loc. cit. Scholiast No. 1. This precedency of Fiech was, I dare say, originally meant as relative to only South Leinster; or, if it be understood of the entire province, must be explained as not having taken place until after the death of Auxilius and Isserninius. And in fact the Scholiast mentions it in terms, that indicate a time much later than when Fiech was first made a bishop. After episcopus (above Not. 51) he adds; “et tandem Lageniæ archiepiscopus institutus.” As to the meaning of the title, archbishop, when given to the other prelates besides the metropolitan of Armagh, we shall see elsewhere.

(54) In the Queen's county about a mile to the West of Carlow, and not far from the river Barrow.

(55) Tripart. L. 3. c. 23. Jocelin, cap. 117. This monastery is stated to have been at the East of the Barrow, and consequently in some part of the now county Carlow. Jocelin says it was at a place called Forrach, and tells us it was founded after Fiech had been fixed at Sletty; while the Tripartite mentions it as Fiech's first establishment, over which he presided for a considerable time until he removed to Sletty at the west side of the river. Archdall (at Sletty) has confounded those two churches together, notwithstanding the very precise manner, in which they are distinguished in the passages here referred to.

(56) Probus (L. 1. c. 41.) calls him an admirable bishop; “Mirabilis episcopus factus est in Themoria.” How Themoria (Tarah) got into Probus' text, I cannot discover. All the other writers, and they are not few, who speak of Fiech, represent him as bishop at Sletty. To his great reputation is owing the mistake of the celebrated hymn or metrical Life of St. Patrick having been attributed to him, in the same manner as many tracts, whose authors were unknown, have been attributed to St. Augustin. Although that hymn is very ancient, yet it is evident that the author of it was not contemporary with St. Patrick.

(57) Tripartite, L. 3. c. 25. This is the most extravagant flourish I have met with as yet in honour of any of the Irish princes. It is not easy to reconcile Crimthan's piety, or even Christianity, with the hatred which he is said to have borne to the family to which Fiech belonged. If he was king of Hy-kinsellagh at the time St. Patrick was there, that is, about A. D. 444, he must have retained his bodily powers for a very long time; for we find him fighting battles in the year 483, (Usher, Ind. Chron.) or 471 (4 Masters Tr. Th. p. 565). Colgan, however, quotes the same 4 Masters (Tr. Th. p. 185) as stating, that Crimthan was killed in the year 465 (466), and O'Flaherty maintains, in opposition to Colgan, that this is the true account of Crimthan. (MS. Notes to Tr. Th. p. 565 and 155.) Be this as it may, we may safely reject at least the story of his 70 churches.

(58) One of these churches is said to have been at Inisfail and another at Inisbeg, both which were, according to Colgan, (Tr. Th. p. 186.) in the diocese of Ferns, but in what part of it he does not inform us, nor can I find elsewhere. The Tripartite makes St. Patrick place over the former St. Conoc and St. Cadoc; but Conoc, or Mochonoc, and Cadoc, who was his nephew, flourished elsewhere and not until the sixth century (AA. SS. at Conoc, 11 February). And at Inisbeg it mentions Erdicus and Augustin. By Erdicus was probably meant Benedict, who, together with Augustin, had been in Ireland with Palladius, and afterwards called upon St. Patrick at Eboria. (See above Chap. IV. §. XVIII.) It would require great credulity to believe, that those two companions of Palladius would have been left at an obscure church, of which no trace is to be found. To add to the confusion, Augustin of Innisbeg is said to have been a disciple of Fiech (Tripart. L. 3. c. 22.). If so, he was not placed there by St. Patrick. Archdall has, as usual, changed these two churches into monasteries, and in the county of Wexford, with the appendage of being founded by St. Patrick, &c.

§. VI. St. Patrick now proceeding to Munster goes straight forward to Cashel, the usual residence of the kings of that province (59) On his approaching the city, which probably was about the beginning of A. D. 445, (60) it is related that the king went out to meet him, and having welcomed him with great respect conducted him to his court. (61) The king is generally said to have been the celebrated Aengus son of Natfraich, whose piety and zeal for religion has been most highly praised by many of our ancient writers. Although it cannot be doubted that he became a Christian, his accession to the throne seems to have been some years later than the time we are now treating of; (62) and in that case it will follow, that, if he was converted by St. Patrick, he was not then a king but one of those young princes, who, as the saint himself informs us, had embraced Christianity. (63) It will also follow that, if any king of Cashel paid such great attention to our Apostle, he was probably Natfraich himself. It is true, that this prince is never spoken of as a Christian; but he might have shown civility to the saint as a stranger of rank and respectability, and permitted him not only to preach the Gospel to his subjects but to instruct his own children. Young Aengus was, I dare say, one of those fortunate pupils, and, when placed on the throne, was highly instrumental in forwarding the cause of Christianity in Munster. The celebrated anecdote concerning the king's foot having been pierced by the point of St. Patrick's staff during the baptismal ceremony, and which he is said to have borne patiently, thinking it formed part of that ceremony, is more likely to have occurred in the case of a boy than in that of a man, and a king, who could scarcely be supposed to have fallen into such a mistake. This accident could not have happened in the very act of baptism, as the mode of baptizing then practised was by immersion, and in fact is stated to have occurred after it, when the king, as they call him, or rather young prince, while receiving the saint's benediction, stuck so close to him that one of his feet got under the point of the staff. (64) St. Patrick is said to have converted several other persons of rank at Cashel, and after this prosperous commencement set out for other parts of Munster, and spent seven entire years in that province, preaching the Gospel, baptizing new converts, reviving the faith of those who were already Christians, (65) erecting churches, appointing clergymen, &c.

(59) Tripart. L. 3. c. 29.

(60) Usher has (Ind. Chron.) A. D. 449, in consequence of his former calculations (above Not. 44.) But this date cannot be made to agree with what we are told of St. Patrick having remained in Munster for seven years, nor with his subsequent proceedings prior to the foundation of the see of Armagh in the year 445. Harris says, that St. Patrick had deferred his tour to Munster on account of the progress made already in the South by his precursors, referring to Ailbe, Declan, &c. We have already seen (Chap. I.), that these persons are not entitled to that distinction. Yet it cannot be doubted, that St. Patrick had some precursors in the South and South east parts of Ireland, as there were Christians in Ireland before the mission of Palladius; and, considering the greater proximity of these parts to the continent, besides their lying convenient for an intercourse with G. Britain, it may reasonably be supposed that they had already received no small share of the light of the Gospel.

(61) Tripart. L. 3. c. 29. It adds that the court or palace was at the place where a stone, called Patrick's stone, afterwards lay. In the third Life (cap. 61.) it is said, that the stone was called Leac Coithurgi, Leac, stone, and Coithurgi, or Cothrige, one of the names of St. Patrick (above Chap. IV. §. VI.); and that the kings of Cashel used to be appointed on it; through veneration (adds Jocelin, cap. 74.) for the saint, who perhaps had celebrated the divine mysteries on it. This stone was to be seen on the ascent to the cathedral situated on the famous rock of Cashel. (See Seward at Cashel.) Usher's Tripartite (Pr. p. 865.) makes the king proceed to the plain of Femyn to meet the saint, and has been followed by Harris. If so, that plain must have been at the North side of Cashel, as it was from Ossory that St. Patrick went straight to that city. But it appears from the Life of Declan, that the plain of Femyn was to the South of Cashel towards Clonmel; for in it we read, that St. Patrick, having left Cashel to proceed to the territory of the Desii, went to the plain of Femyn, where he was met by Declan, who had crossed the Suir from the county of Waterford side for the purpose of paying his respects to the saint. This anecdote of Declan's going to Femyn to meet St. Patrick has been confounded in Usher's Tripartite with the king's advancing to welcome him before he entered Cashel. Smith has given (Hist. of Waterford, p. 4.) too great an extent to Maghfemyn, or, the plain of Femyn. For he comprizes within it the whole barony of Middlethird, and consequently the city of Cashel, although in Declan's Life that city is spoken of as quite distinct from any part of the country of the Desii, in the northern district of which Magh-femyn lay; "campi Femyn in aquilonari Desiorum plaga—S. Patricius—a regione Desiorum ad civitatem Cassel reversus est." (See Tr. Th. p. 201.) Harris is still more astray in making it (Bishops, p. 20.) the flat extensive country, that surrounds Cashel. The present boundary between the diocese of Cashel and that of Lismore is the best rule to go by for finding out the northern limits of the territory of the Desii, which, in the ecclesiastical division, has been placed under Declan of Ardmore. This see became united to that of Lismore, and is now comprized under its name. These united dioceses extend northwards to about midway between Cashel and Clonmel, and there also ended the country of the Desii, in which lay Magh-femyn.

(62) Keating says (B. 2.) that Aengus reigned 36 years and was killed in the battle of Killosnadh (Co. Carlow). He does not mark the precise date of that battle; but it is assigned by the 4 Masters (Tr. Th. p. 565.) to A. D. 489 (490). Accordingly Aengus did not begin to reign until the year 454, a period certainly later than that of St. Patrick's arrival in Munster, even in Usher's hypothesis of affixing it to the year 449. He must have been very young when the saint came to Cashel; for, to omit other arguments, St. Naol of Kilmanagh, who died A. D. 564, is stated to have been a son of his. (AA. SS. at Naol or Natalis 27 January.)

(63) See Not. 12.

(64) In the Life (cap. 60.) we read; "Credidit ei et baptizatus est. Cumque Patricius caput regis benedixisset cuspis baculi affixa est pedi regis. Sed rex, benedictionem valde desiderans, dolorem pedis pro nihilo reputavit." Jocelin also says (cap. 74.) that it happened after the baptism at the time of the saint's giving his blessing and touching the prince's head. He introduces, as usual, a miracle, telling us that the prince felt no pain from the wound, which is contradicted both in the passage now quoted from the third Life, and in the Tripartite, (L. 3. c. 30.) where it is added that, when the prince was asked by St. Patrick why he had not given some indication of the hurt and pain he had felt, he answered that he thought the piercing of his foot to be a part of the holy ceremony, and accordingly submitted to it.

(65) "Fidei propagandae et refovendae." Tripart. L. 3. c. 31. Hence it is clear, that there were Christians in Munster before St. Patrick's arrival there. (See Not. 60.)

§. VII. In none of our apostle's Lives is there a word to be found about any synod then held at Cashel, or a meeting there between St. Patrick, Ailbe, Declan, &c. and regulations made concerning the privileges of the sees of Cashel, Ardmore, Saigir, &c. This stuff occurs only in the Lives of Ailbe and others of those pretended precursors of St. Patrick, but having been given to the world by Usher, (66) has led astray several writers. It was patched up at a late period, and at a time when some bishops claimed a degree of preeminence and antiquity for their sees, to which they were not originally entitled. The whole story is thus related. Ailbe of Emly, Declan of Ardmore, Kieran of Saigir, and Ibar of Beg-erin were at first opposed to St. Patrick, and disinclined to acknowledge him as their superior, but in the end came to a good understanding with him. Kieran led the way in submitting to St. Patrick's jurisdiction. Next comes Ailbe, who on hearing that the saint was at Cashel went thither to pay his respects to him and the king. Being a very humble man, he received St. Patrick as his master, and it was decreed by the king and the saint, that the archbishopric of all Munster should be attached to the city and chair of Ailbe. (67) Ibar was for a considerable time very stiff in refusing to submit to St. Patrick; but at length, being admonished by an Angel, entered into an agreement of peace and harmony with him. Declan did not wish to oppose the saint, but was unwilling to consider him as his superior. But he also was visited by an Angel and ordered to wait on St. Patrick and obey his commands. He immediately set out and, having met the saint at Hymneon in Magh-femyn, (68) humbled himself before him. St. Patrick received him with great kindness, and blessed his country and the whole nation of the Desii. On his returning to Cashel he was accompanied by Declan, and there it was decided that, in the same manner as Ailbe was placed over the people of Munster, Declan should rule the Desii, and, as Ailbe was to be a second Patrick and patron of Munster, so Declan likewise should be a second Patrick and patron of the Desii. (69) It is added that, while other parts of Ireland should be subject to St. Patrick, the Desii should be under Declan. (70) The three saints, Patrick, Ailbe, and Declan (71) having thus arranged the extent of their jurisdiction, and made many useful regulations, blessed the king, and taking leave of him set out for the respective districts, that were to be the scenes of their spiritual labours. But all this fine account of the opposition to our Apostle by those four prelates, of the synod of Cashel, &c. &c. falls to the ground; first, because, had such things occurred, they would not have been omitted in all the Lives of St. Patrick; and, secondly, because, as has been shown already, (72) not one of said persons was a bishop as early as has been pretended. Yet there may be some truth in what is said of an opposition to St. Patrick, not however as if any of those now spoken of, two of whom, Ailbe and Ibar, were even disciples of his, had been concerned in it, but because the saint himself seems to allude in his Confession to a sort of murmuring against him, (73) originating, it would appear, in a spirit of rivalry and jealousy, which might have actuated some of the Christians who were in Ireland before his mission, but could not have got hold of any of his own converts or disciples.

(66) Pr. p. 801—866 seqq.

(67) “ Sanctus Albaeus accepit beatum Patricium magistrum suum, quia erat Albaeus valde humilis. Tunc rex Aengus et Patricius ordinauerunt, ut in civitate et cathedra sancti Albaei semper esset archiepiscopus omnium Mumoniensium.” Life of Ailbe, cap. 20. This city and chair of Ailbe has been constantly understood by our old writers as that of Emly; but it is doubted whether it ought to be honoured with the title of an archiepiscopal see. Keating (Book. 2. p. 6.) asserts, that Emly was never an archbishopric, and that no see in Munster ever enjoyed that rank except Cashel. He pretends, that the opinion of Emly having had archbishops is founded on a mistake, owing to the archbishop and clergy of Cashel having been obliged during the Danish persecution, in the time of Turgesius (ninth century), to quit the city and take shelter in the fastnesses of Emly, where they remained for some time. The prelates of Emly are indeed usually styled merely bishops, although Harris (Bishops at Emly) reckons among them Maelbrigid archbishop of Munster, who died A. D. 895; and, what is of much greater weight I find, in the ancient Life of St. Pulcherius, one of them, that lived in the 6th or 7th century called archbishop of Emly. There seems to have been some sort of preeminence annexed to that see in consequence of its having been the first established in Munster; but it did not consist in that extensive jurisdiction, which archbishoprics, properly so called, were possessed of. There was no truly archiepiscopal see in Ireland, except Armagh, until the beginning of the 12th century, when the primate Celsus raised Cashel to that rank, which, through the interference of his immediate successor St. Malachy, was confirmed by Pope Innocent II. St. Bernard’s testimony is decisive on this point; “ Erat et altera metropolitana sedes, quam de novo constituerat Celsus, primae tamen sedi et illius archiepiscopo subdita tamquam primati” (Vit. S. Mal. cap. 10.). And (ib. cap. 11.) “ Petit Malachias confirmari novae metropolis constitutionem—et confirmationis quidem privilegium mox accepit.” This new metropolis was Cashel ; and however we find, that Miler O’Dunan, who assisted at the synod of Usneagh, or Fiadh-mac-Aengusa (Westmeath) in the year 1112, over which Celsus presided, is called Archbishop of Cashel. (See Jus. Primat. Armac. §. VII.) In this same work the author, Dr. Macmahon, says (§. 62.) that Celsus transferred the archbishopric from Emly to Cashel ; but this does not agree with the text of St. Bernard, who speaks of a quite new institution ; and it is certain that, whatever honorary rank Emly might have enjoyed, its jurisdiction was never of that really metropolitanical sort, which was conferred on Cashel. From what has been now observed it appears, that Keating was wrong in supposing, that there were archbishops of Cashel in the 9th century. It is very doubtful whether Cashel was even a bishop’s see at that period. But of this elsewhere.

(68) See Not. 61.

(69) The people of Munster and the Desii seem to be spoken of as distinct from each other, although the country of the Desii is now comprised in Munster. In Declan’s Life, where all these stories are to be found, an Irish distich, relative to the privileges of Ailbe and Declan, is given and said to be pronounced by St. Patrick on that occasion. It may be seen, together with some paraphrases of it, in Usher’s Pr. p. 866. and Harris’ Bishops at Emly.

(70) Et ut Hibernienses in alii locis. S. Patricius servirent, ita et Nandesi gens suo patrono. S. Declano omne exhiberent sub Deo obsequium. (Life of Declan, c. 30.) The drift of this passage was to insinuate, that Declan’s see, that is, Ardmore, was exempt from the jurisdiction of Armagh.

(71) Harris adds Kieran and Ibar as having been at Cashel on that occasion, and says that the former was then placed at Saigir, and the latter at Beg-erin. Now in the first place they are never mentioned either in Declan’s Life, the fountain-head of this fable, nor in the garbled accounts given of their acts, as having been members of that pretended synod. Kieran is said indeed in both his Lives (AA. SS. 5 Mart.) to have visited, on a certain occasion, Aengus at Cashel ; but no allusion is made to a synod. We are also told that St. Patrick, Aengus, and many others paid a visit to Kieran at Saigir. Harris confounded the narrative of his and Ibar's proceedings relatively to St. Patrick with what was said to have occurred at Cashel between him and Ailbe and Declan. And as to the appointments to Saigir and Beg-erin, Harris ought to have known, that in the stories concerning this matter Kieran and Ibar are exhibited as having been bishops in those places before St. Patrick's mission began in Ireland.

(72) Chap. I. §. x. seqq.

(73) In one place he writes (Conf. p. 17.) ; " Rideat autem et insultet qui voluerit, ego non silebo," &c. He dwells much on his having had no interested views in coming to Ireland, and that, far from looking to temporal advantages, he refused to accept of presents that used to be offered to him, and laid out his own property in procuring means for facilitating the progress of the Gospel, and protecting his converts. I allow that these and some other expressions of his may be understood relatively to calumnies of the Pagans ; but certain passages occur, in which he seems to allude to the carpings of some Christians and probably members of the clerical order, as ex. c. where he says, that in the course of his mission he had, with great risk visited even the remotest parts of Ireland, where no missionary had ever been before. (ib. p. 19.)

§. VIII. The first district mentioned as visited by St. Patrick after his departure from Cashel was Muscrighe Breogain, (74) seemingly a part of the extensive flat country lying between Cashel and Limerick. The saint is said to have founded several churches in that district, and to have left some of his disciples at one of them, which is specified by the name Kill-fheacla. (75) Thence he went to the territory called Ara-chliach (in the now counties of Tipperary and Limerick), in a part of which, Hy-Cuanach (barony of Coonagh) he was at first violently opposed by the dynast Olild. But in consequence of a miracle, to obtain which St. Patrick had ordered Ailbe and Ibar (76) to offer up their prayers to God, Olild, his family, and his subjects are said to have been converted and baptized. While St. Patrick remained in Ara-chliach, he foretold, if we are to believe the Tripartite, divers circumstances relative to future occurrences in that country, and among others, the foundation of a monastery at Kill-ratha and of a church at Kill-teidhill. (77) Next we find the saint in that tract, which lies to the East of Limerick, and we are told that he was there hospitably entertained by a chieftain named Lonan, (78) and that he met with young Nesson, whom after some time he placed over the monastery of Mungret, which he had founded. (79) Some inhabitants of Thomond or North Munster (Clare), having heard of St. Patrick being in those parts, crossed the Shannon for the purpose of seeing him and, when instructed in the Christian religion, were baptized in the field of Tir-glais. (80) He was also waited upon by prince Carthen son of Blod. (81) This prince likewise is said to have been converted and baptized at Saingéal near Limerick. (82) St. Patrick did not cross the Shannon on this occasion, but, according to the Tripartite, having ascended mount Fintine near Donaghmore, and looking over the country of Thomond blessed it and foretold the birth, after some years, of Senan of Inniscatty. (83) Afterwards the saint went to Luachra, beyond which he did not continue his course in any other part of West Munster. (84) While in that district, he is said to have prophesied, that the great patriarch of monks and star of the western world would be born in West Munster, viz. St. Brendan of the race of Hua-Alta, and that his birth would be several years after his own death. (85) Turning back from Luachra, he directs his course towards South Munster or Desmond; (86) but his transactions in that country are passed over in a loose general manner, and nothing occurs, that might help us to form even a rational conjecture concerning his proceedings. He is said to have visited also the southern part of the country of the Desii (Waterford) and with the assistance of the chieftain Fergar and the nobles, &c. to have, after great toils, arranged the ecclesiastical affairs of that territory. (87) When near the banks of the Suir, he was kindly received by the inhabitants, and, thence continuing his progress through the now county of Tipperary, proceeded to Muscrith-Thire (Lower Ormond), where, among many others, he converted, says the Tripartite, (88) two brothers, of a powerful family, Munech and Meachair, while their eldest brother Furech remained obstinate in his infidelity. Having now spent seven years in Munster he set out on his return to Leinster, and was followed by the chieftains and multitudes of people from all parts of that province, who wished to take their leave of him and receive his blessing, which from an eminence he cheerfully bestowed on them and on all Munster. (89)

(74) There were several tracts in Munster named Muscrighe, so called, says Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 186.) from a prince Musc, son of king Conor the great. O'Brien with much greater appearance of truth derives that name from Mus, pleasant, and Crioch, country. (Ir. Dict. at Muiscrith.) One of them was surnamed Mitine, and is the present Muskerry in the county of Cork. Another was denominated Thire, and was the same as Lower Ormond in Tipperary. Muscrighe Breogain was, I am sure, that which O'Brien calls Muscrith Jarthar Feimion, the country about Emly and Tipperary. It was certainly different from Muscrighe Thire. Jocelin seems to have confounded them together; for he makes (cap. 75.) St. Patrick proceed from Cashel to Ormond. But the circumstances, which he mentions as having occurred there, did not take place, according to the Tripartite, until after the saint had traversed various other parts of Munster. Yet we must observe, that the ancient Ormond or Urmuman (third Life, cap. 61.) that is East Munster, was more extensive than the district, to which that name still adheres.

(75) Tripart. L. 3. c. 32. I do not find any place, to which this name corresponds, except Kilfeacle, not far from the town of Tipperary. Archdall has a Kilfeacle in Cork, and indeed, an abbey, which, however, he says is unknown. His reason for placing it there is, that it was in Muscragia or Muscrighe, as if there had been no other district so called than the present Muskerry. But Muscrighe Breogain, in which Kill-fiachla, or Killfeacle, was situated, must not be confounded with Muscrighe Mitine. (See Not. prec.) Archdall was led astray by Harris, (Antiq. cap. 7.) who makes these two Muscrighes adjacent to each other, and both comprized in what is now called Muskerry.

(76) Tripart. L. 3. c. 33. Here they are called bishops; but that must be understood of their having been so, not at that time, which was probably A. D. 446, but at a later period. They were then in a state of scholarship, and belonged to that class of young gentlemen, whom the saint was wont to have in his suite as pupils. See Not. 12.) Ibar was, in all likelihood, older than Ailbe, having died long before him, viz. in the year 503. (Chap. I. §. XIII.) He was of an illustrious family of Ulster (Usher p. 1061.) (and probably had accompanied St. Patrick since his departure from that province for Meath and Leinster. He might have been old enough about the year 446 to be a bishop; but, had he been then one, we would rather imagine that St. Patrick would have assigned to him a district, in which he might exercise his functions, than keep him along with himself. As to Ailbe, he could not have been a bishop so early, whereas he lived until A. D. 527. (Chap. I. §. XI.) At the time that the saint took him under his care, which cannot be supposed to have been prior to his arrival in Munster, of which province Ailbe was a native, he must have been very young. I have already observed (Chap. I. Not. 84.) that, if it be true that Ailbe studied under a bishop Hilarius on the continent, the most probable conjecture is that he was Hilarius of Arles. Besides other circumstances there touched upon, the time answers very well; for Ailbe might have been sent about 446 to Hilarius, who lived until the year 449. Whoever that Hilarius was, he is expressly distinguished from the Pope of that time, both in Ailbe's and Declan's Lives, and consequently must not be confounded, as has been done by the Bollandists, with Pope Hilarius. The whole matter is involved in such obscurity, that it is useless to attempt an elucidation of it. Nor can it be ascertained, by whom Ailbe was consecrated; although there can be scarcely a doubt of his having been a bishop before the year 492, in which king Aengus was killed.

(77) Archdall has these places in the county of Limerick. Killteidhill was, I dare say, the same as Kilteel in the barony of Coonagh; although he has made them two distinct places. As to Killrath, it would be difficult to find it out at present. Archdall has no right to call Coeman, its founder, a disciple of St. Patrick. The Tripartite does not mention him as such.

(78) Jocelin (cap. 75.) and the third Life (cap. 61.) place these transactions in Ormond; the Tripartite in Hyfigente, a tract of country extending along the Shannon towards Kerry. Hence we see that the ancient Ormond was more extensive than the modern. (See Not. 74.) Concerning the entertainment prepared by Lonan see Chap. iv. Not. 53.

(79) Here we have another of the Tripartite's anachronisms. Nessian, who is well known in our ecclesiastical history, and has been often called Deacon Nessian, belonged to the second order of Irish saints, which flourished after St. Patrick's time. (Usher Pr. p. 914.) He died A. D. 552. (Tr. Th. p. 186.) How then could he have been placed over Mungret by St. Patrick, or how could St. Patrick have founded that monastery for him, unless we were to suppose that he lived about 140 years? Archdall ought not to have said (at Mungret) that the fact is indubitable. O'Halloran's nonsense about the monastery of Mungret having existed in the fourth century, and referred to by Archdall, is not worth consideration. Almost equally ridiculous is the assertion of Ferrar, (History of Limerick, p. 4.) that it was founded by St. Patrick in the year 433.

(80) Tir-glais, the land of greenness, the same, perhaps, as Tirdaglass in Lower Ormond; da, of. If so, St. Patrick had moved some miles up the left bank of the Shannon.

(81) This Carthen was the chieftain of N. Munster. Colgan in a note to Tripart. L. 3. c. 44. has, as if from the MS. text; "Carthennus Blodii filius Theodoricianae familiae progenitor." The three last words have been omitted through mistake in the printed copy of the Tripartite. This family was, as Colgan remarks, that of the O'Briens of Thomond. In Keating's pedigrees he is placed, under the name of Carthan Fionn, at the head of that illustrious line. He was called also Carthan more or the great. (See Vallancey's Collectanea, Law of Tanistry, &c. Vol. 1. p. 439.)

(82) See Vallancey, loc. cit.

(83) Tripart. L. 3. c. 46. This alone is sufficient to show the falsehood of certain stories about the high antiquity of Senan, some of which Archdall has at Inniscattery. Of Senan more elsewhere. What mountain Fintine was I cannot determine. There is a Donaghmore very near Limerick.

(84) Tripart. L. 3. c. 47. More than one district was named or surnamed Luachra, which means rushes. O'Brien (Ir. Dict. at Muscrith) has Muscrith Luachra, the land, he says, lying between Kilmallock, Kilfinan, and Ardpatrick. But from what follows in the Tripartite it is plain, that the Luachra, to which it alludes, lay more to the West. It was not far from the borders of Kerry, and, I think, in the now barony of Connillo, (Co. Limerick) in which is a mountain anciently called the mountain of Luachra, near which was St. Ita's monastery (Ita's Life, Jan. 15.). This Luachra might have been a continuation of the tract mentioned by O'Brien, and which, on account of its being a pleasant country, was distinguished by the epithet Muscrith.

(85) This passage is well worth consideration. 1. It shows that the celebrated Brendan of Clonfert, the Brendan here spoken of, was a native not of that place, nor of any part of Connaught, as some have thought, but of Kerry, as Ware states (Bishops at Ardfert) after many old writers. 2. That the Luachra, where this prophecy is said to have been delivered, was in the neighbourhood of Kerry, whereas said prophecy was here introduced in consequence of the mention made of Luachra. 3. That St. Patrick did not live until A. D. 484, this being the year in which Brendan was born. (Usher Ind. Chron. and Colgan Tr. Th. p. 187.) As to the number of years, that were to intervene between the death of St. Patrick and the birth of Brendan, there is a palpable error both in the Tripartite, (L. 3. c. 47.) and in the parallel passages of the 4th Life (cap. 79.) where it is said, that Brendan would be born in the 120th year after St. Patrick would leave this world. The true reading was, I believe, the 20th year. By prefixing C to XX. the change was easy from 20 to 120. Now St. Patrick died, as will be seen, A. D. 465. Brendan's birth in 484 was consequently in the 20th year after that date.

(86) Harris has committed a huge blunder, (Antiq. cap. 7.) where he says that Desmond is West Munster, and now Kerry.

But the very name, Desmond, means South Munster. Kerry, or, at least, the greatest part of it, was not included in the ancient Desmond, as it belonged to Iar-Muin or West Munster. Some parts of the East of modern Kerry might have been comprized in Desmond, as adjoining the county of Cork, which was the real Desmond. How could it be said, that St. Patrick had turned back from Luachra, adjoining Kerry, to go to Desmond, if Kerry, generally speaking, was the same territory?

(87) Tripart. L. 3. c. 49. Not a word about Declan.

(88) L. 3. c. 51. (89) Ib. c. 54.

§. IX. Following the dates hitherto laid down, we may suppose that St. Patrick's departure from Munster took place in the year 452. Secundinus, whom he had left to superintend the churches of Meath and the northern parts, (90) was already dead, having departed this life in the year 448, and 75th of his age. (91) He was a very wise and holy prelate, and the first bishop that died in Ireland. (92) An anecdote is related of him, which shows what little reliance is to be placed on the stories relative to grants of lands made to St. Patrick. It is said, that he expressed a disapprobation of the saint's excessive disinterestedness in refusing presents from the wealthy and donations of lands, which, did he accept of them, would enable him to support a multitude of holy persons. But on St. Patrick's explaining to him the reasons of his conduct, he became sorry for what he had said, and begged for forgiveness. (93) It was, according to some accounts, (94) on the occasion of his having been pardoned by the saint, that he set about composing his poem or alphabetical hymn in honour of St. Patrick, in which the saint is spoken of as still alive, and which I find no reason for not considering as a genuine work of Secundinus. (95)

It is very probable that the horrid transaction, which compelled St. Patrick to write his letter against Coroticus, occurred before his departure from Munster, and in some maritime and South-east part of that province, as that tract lay very convenient for an expedition against the Irish coast from either South Wales or Cornwall, in one or other of which Coroticus' principality was in all likelihood situated. (96) Colgan assigns the martyrdom of Fingar, and his companions, (97) the history of which was perhaps built on the affair of Coroticus, to about the year 450; (98) and, if he be right, it must have taken place while St. Patrick was in Munster. We may therefore be allowed to touch on those transactions in this place, particularly as, excepting the Munster coast, we do not meet with St. Patrick, during the latter years of his mission, preaching in any maritime part of Ireland southward of Louth.

(90) See §. iv.

(91) Usher Pr. p. 825 and Ind. Chron. The Bollandists, proprio motu place his death A. D. 459. But the authority of the Ulster and Innisfallen annals, joined with that of the 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 19.) and the concurrent testimonies of Colgan himself (ib.) Usher (loc. cit.) and Ware (Op. S. P. p. 151.) is much better on this point than that of the Bollandists. The fable about Secundinus having been a nephew of St. Patrick is, without resorting to other arguments, sufficiently refuted by the circumstance that, when Secundinus was in his 75th year, the saint had not passed his 61st year. (See Chap. iv. §. iv.)

(92) Life of Declan (See Usher p. 826. Tripartite L. 3. c. 89. and Jocelin, cap. 177.) What then has become of Ledwich's abundance of bishops, that were in Ireland before the time of Palladius? (See above Chap. 1. Not. 129.)

(93) Jocelin, cap. 176. Tripart. L. 3. c. 88. Compare with Chap. v. §. II.

(94) This is the occasion or cause assigned for the composition of the hymn by the anonymous author of the preface to it. (ap. Colgan Tr. Th. p. 211.) The Tripartite (L. 3. c. 89.) mentions its composition without referring it to that occasion.

(95) This poem or hymn has been published by Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 211, and republished by Ware, (Opuscul. S. Patric. &c. p. 146, seqq.) who calls it an Alphabetical hymn, inasmuch as the strophes, consisting each of four lines, begin with the letters of the alphabet, following the order of them, A, B, C, &c. This order is plain in Ware's edition, which at strophe 10 has Kastam, where Colgan writes Castam, and at strophe 21 XPS for Christus as ap. Colgan. There are several various readings between these two editions. But they are of little or no consequence. The first Strophe is,

*“ Audite omnes amantes Deum sancta merita
Viri in Christo beati, Patricii episcopi;
Quomodo bonum ob actum simulatur Angelis,
Perfectamque propter vitam aequatur Apostolis.”*

And the last, *“ Zona Domini praecinctus diebus ac noctibus
Sine intermissione Deum orat Dominum; Cujus ingentis laboris percepturus praemium (praemia, Colgan)*

Cum Apostolis regenabit sanctis super Israel.”

In the last line, instead of sanctis, Colgan's edition has sanctus. It has also an addition composed later than the hymn, and apparently after St. Patrick's death, concluding with these words; “ Patricius sanctus episcopus oret pro nobis omnibus, ut deleantur protinus peccata, quae commisimus. Amen.” This hymn is also in the very ancient Antiphonarium Benchorensis, which has been published by Muratori. (See Chap. II. §. VI.) In this edition there are some readings different from those both of Colgan's and Ware's editions; but in general it agrees somewhat more with the latter than with the former. It has, like Colgan's, an addition in the following words; “ Patricius episcopus oret pro nobis omnibus — Ut deleantur protinus peccata, quae commisimus — Patricii laudes semper dicamus — Ut nos cum illo semper vivamus.” On the whole, the hymn is well worthy of illustration, as it contains excellent allusions to the most sound doctrine and discipline; and it would be desirable, that we had a completely correct copy of it.

(96) Coroticus is constantly spoken of as a king of the Britons. Jocelin, who calls him Cereticus, says (cap. 150) that he reigned in a part of Wales. The Bollandists threw out a conjecture, that the name signified king of Ceretica (Cardiganshire). But there is nothing to show, that it was not really a proper name, and in fact a very common one among the Britons. It was originally the same as that of the great Caractacus or Caratacus. A wicked British king, Careticus, is mentioned as living in the sixth century, Ranulph.

Polychron. ap. Gale, Scriptorum xv. p. 225. Cereticus, another British king, about A. D. 620, is spoken of by Camden. (Britannia, col. 862.) We find in Bede (L. 4. cap. 23.) a Cerdic, likewise a British prince, towards the latter end of the seventh century. The name is undoubtedly the same, being no other than Caraduc as it is written in the Welsh, or, the Caradeuc of the Bretons. As therefore the name Corotic, Caretic, Ceretic, Cerdic, was so usual among the Britons not only in Ceretica, but wherever there were Britons, the conjecture of the Bollandists cannot lead to any decision as to the country of the tyrant alluded to by St. Patrick. If the martyrdom of Fingar, &c. formed part of the persecution by Coroticus, there would be reason to think, as will be seen below, that he reigned in Cornwall.

(97) See above Chap. v. §. v.

(98) AA. SS. Ind. Chron. and at St. Hia, 25 Jan.

§. x. This prince Coroticus, though apparently a Christian, (99) was a tyrant, a pirate, and a persecutor. He landed with a party of his armed followers (100) many of whom were Christians, at a season of solemn baptism, (101) and set about plundering a district (undoubtedly maritime), in which St. Patrick had just baptized and confirmed a great number of converts, and on the very day after the holy chrism was seen shining in the foreheads of the white-robed neophytes. (102) Having murdered several persons, these marauders carried off a considerable number of people, whom they went about selling or giving up as slaves to the Scots and the apostate Picts. (103) St. Patrick wrote a letter, not extant, which he sent by a holy priest whom he had instructed from his younger days, (104) to those pirates, requesting of them to restore the baptized captives and some part of the booty. The priest and the other ecclesiastics, that accompanied him, being received by them with scorn and mockery, and the letter not attended to, the saint found himself under the necessity of issuing a circular epistle or declaration against them and their chief Coroticus, in which announcing himself a bishop and established in Ireland, he proclaims to all those, who fear God, that said murderers and robbers are excommunicated and estranged from Christ, and that it is not lawful to show them civility, nor to eat or drink with them, nor to receive their offerings, until sincerely repenting they make atonement to God and liberate his servants and the handmaids of Christ. He begs of the faithful, into whose hands the epistle may come, to get it read before the people every where, and before Coroticus himself, and to communicate it to his soldiers, in the hope that they and their master may return to God, &c. Among other very affecting exhortations he observes, that the Roman and Gallic Christians are wont to send proper persons with great sums of money to the Franks and other Pagans for the purpose of redeeming Christian captives, (105) while, on the contrary that monster Coroticus made a trade of selling the members of Christ to nations ignorant of God. What was the fruit of St. Patrick's exertions on this occasion is not known. The account of the martyrdom of Fingar and his companions was probably built upon a traditionary and exaggerated statement of the persecution of Coroticus. (106) It is thus given. Fingar, alias Guigner, the son of an Irish king, having embraced the Christian faith, (107) fled, to avoid the consequences of his father's wrath, together with several young nobles, to Britany, where he was kindly received by the chief of the province, and having got ample possessions from him erected an oratory. Afterwards he returned to Ireland, and there collected nearly 800 faithful, among whom were seven bishops and his sister Piala. Leaving Ireland they arrived at a port called Heul in Cornubia, where they met Hia, an Irish virgin, who had set out after them. While preparing to continue their tour towards Fingar's retreat they were attacked by Theodoric king of the country, who put them all to death. That country, or, as it is denominated Cornubia, was in all likelihood Cornwall. (108) What affinity there may be between this garbled story and the affair of Coroticus, I leave to the reader to decide for himself. (109)

(99) Tillemont (Mem. Tom. xvi. p. 462.) calls him a Christian; and, I think, with reason, because the sentence of excommunication pronounced by St. Patrick in the Epistle seems to include Coroticus together with his associates. On that account he gave directions that the Epistle should be read in the presence not only of his subjects but also of Coroticus himself. Had he not been a Christian, he could not have been excommunicated. What the saint expresses concerning his wish that those robbers and murderers, of whom Coroticus was the chief, may return to God, plainly alludes to the profession of Christianity; “Quod si Deus inspirat illos, ut quandoque Deo resipiscant, et vel sero poenitent,” &c. It is true that in some of St. Patrick’s Lives he is spoken of as not a Christian. We read in the third Life (cap. 72): “Nunciata sunt S. Patricio mala opera cujusdam regis Britonum Coritic crudelis et immitis tyranni, ut converteret eum ad viam veritatis. Hic Coritic namque erat persecutor et interfector Christianorum, misitque Patricius ad eum epistolam; sed rex ille deridebat doctrinam Patricii.” Probus, who calls him Chairtic, agrees (L. 2. c. 27.) with what is here quoted except that, instead of doctrinam Patricii, he has salutaria ejus monita. Jocelin speaks of him (cap. 150.) in terms of the greatest horror, although he does not represent him as an infidel. In these Lives, as likewise in the Tripartite (L. 3. c. 100.) where he is called Corthec, there is a ridiculous fable of his having been, in punishment of his crimes, changed into a fox and having suddenly disappeared so as never to be seen again. But the Epistle itself is the best, and indeed the only good authority with regard to what concerns Coroticus.

(100) Tillemont (loc. cit.) makes Coroticus in person one of the party. It is, however, difficult to determine, from the Epistle, whether he was so, or had only ordered his soldiers on that wicked expedition. The text is so obscure and in many parts so corrupt, that minor questions of this kind cannot be easily decided. At any rate whatever occurred was perpetrated in consequence of his orders, “ a latrunculis jubente Corotico;” and accordingly, whether present or not, he was equally guilty.

(101) I find nothing, that may lead to ascertain which of these solemn times it was, whether Easter, Whitsuntide, or the Epiphany; for, on this last festival also baptism used to be administered solemnly in Ireland.

(102) “ De sanguine innocentium Christianorum, quos ego innumeros Deo genui, atque in Christo confirmari, postera die qua chrisma neophyti in veste candida flagrabat in fronte ipsorum.” Here we have in a few words an exact description of the ancient discipline, according to which the sacrament of confirmation or chrism used to be administered immediately after baptism by the bishop, in case he were the baptizer or present on the occasion. We see also the white garment of the newly baptized. Without quoting longer passages of authors on this subject, one very like St. Patrick’s words occurs in Amphilochius’ Life of St. Basil, cap. 5. “ Baptizavit Maximinus episcopus Basilium et Eubulum, et vestivit albis, atque ungens eos sancto chrismate,” &c. This practice continued some hundreds of years, even with regard to infants. Alcuin treating of infant baptism writes (De Offic. cap. de Sabbato Paschae); “ Postea vestiatur infans—Sivero episcopus adest statim confirmari eum oportet chrismate.”

(103) By Scots he meant those of that nation who still remained pagans, and of whom, generally speaking, a smaller number in proportion was converted than of the other inhabitants (See Not. 12.). He gives the epithet of apostates to the Picts, meaning the Southern Picts, who had embraced the Christian faith on the preaching of Ninian, (see Not. 149 to Chap. I.) and many of whom, it seems, afterwards apostatized. The Northern Picts could not have been called apostates in St. Patrick’s time, as they were first converted by Columb-kill in the sixth century. To the epithet, apostates, the saint adds, indignissimorum, pessimorum—Pictorum. But how could Coroticus and his pirates have sold their Irish captives to the Southern Picts, whose country was in the North-east of Scotland? It is hard to suppose, that they would have marched them thither by land; and as to conveying them by sea it would have been necessary to sail round about England or about the north of Scotland. The fact is, that the Picts so condemned by St. Patrick were those who, together with the roving Scots, had, about that very time, (A. D. 450) advanced into the heart of Great Britain, and to oppose whom Vortigern invited the Anglo-Saxons. (See Usher, Ind. Chron. ad A. 450). And hence it appears that the Scots, who bought the Irish captives, were then in Great Britain on a plundering expedition. Coroticus and his followers carried on a trade of making slaves, and bringing them to Great Britain there to dispose of them, perhaps in lieu of their own countrymen, to the Scots and Picts. What we have now observed will throw light upon the period, at which Coroticus' persecution took place; for after about the year 450, and the defeat of the Scots and Picts by the Saxons (Bede, L. 1. c. 15.) near Stamford, those invaders were soon obliged to relinquish their conquests and return to their own country; (Warrington, History of Wales, p. 45.) nor do we find the Scots and Picts again united against the Britons, whereas not long after the Picts became allied to the Saxons. (Bede ib.) It proves also the genuineness and antiquity of the Epistle; for no other than a contemporary could have written with an exactness so conformable to the state of those times.

(104) “ Et misi epistolam cum sancto presbytero, quem ego ex infantia docui, cum clericis,” &c. The word infantia must not be understood of what we usually call infancy, as it has been by Tillemont (Mem. Tom. xvi. p. 462 and 784), who accordingly found himself perplexed in some chronological points relative to St. Patrick, but of that age at which boys used to be dedicated to the clerical state. Thus we find the infantes paraphonistae, choir boys, infantes monasterii, the novices in monastic houses. In the statutes of the Benedictine order we read, that the infantes were bound to hear the rule expounded every day; which shows that they were supposed to have arrived at a certain age of discretion. (See Ducange at Infantes.) We are not therefore to conclude from the expression made use of by St. Patrick, that the affair of Coroticus occurred about 30 years, as Tillemont seemed to think, after his arrival in Ireland. The priest spoken of might have been 14, nay 16 years old, when the saint began to instruct him, and yet be called an infans. Supposing that he joined St. Patrick in the year 433, he might be entitled, about 450, to the appellation of a holy priest. It is not improbable that Benignus was the person. Were it necessary, we could recur to another explanation by supposing, that said priest was one of those persons, who had accompanied our apostle to Ireland, and that he had been under his care when in the continent. The clerici, however, or younger ecclesiastics, whom St. Patrick sent along with the priest, were undoubtedly natives of Ireland.

(105) See above Chap. II. §. 2.

(106) Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 34.) was inclined to be of this opinion, and has been followed by the Bollandists.

(107) See Chap. v. §. 5.

(108) Albert le Grande maintains (De Sanctis Britan. Armor.) that the Cornubia spoken of in Fingar's Acts was Cornouaille in Britany, and informs us, that Fingar's festival is celebrated at Vannes on the 13th of December. I find in Lobineau (Hist. de Bretagne, Tom. I. p. 13.) a Theodoric son of Budic and Count of Cornouaille. But he lived late in the sixth century; and there appears no reason for considering him as a persecutor and tyrant, unless it should be said that his having put to death Macliau the usurper of his principality was an act of cruelty. Colgan holds that Cornubia was Cornwall, and adduces a very strong argument from the mention made of St. Hia and the port Heul. For, as Camden states (Britan. col. 22.) the town of St. Iies in Cornwall has got its name from Iia an Irish woman of great piety, who lived there. The river, that flows into the harbour of St. Iies, is called Haile, seemingly the same name as Heul, and by which not only the river but the harbour also was probably called, before Iia or Hia settled there. Camden does not indeed call Iia a martyr; but we are not bound to vouch for the accuracy of the acts of Fingar and his companions.

(109) The chief difficulty, that Colgan finds (Tr. Th. p. 34) against supposing that the account of Fingar, &c. was built on the history of Coroticus is, that the tyrant is called Theodoric. He says that this might have been owing to a mistake of a copyist. The name, Theodoric, was not unknown among the Britons. A Teudric, or Theodoric, was king of Glamorgan about the latter end of the sixth century, (Usher, p. 562.) But there are more serious difficulties in the way of that hypothesis, and which Colgan was not aware of, as he had not read the Epistle against Coroticus, and knew nothing about that tyrant except of his cruelty in general.

It would, however, be a useless task to endeavour to unravel that heap of fables called the Acts of Fingar. Who knows but they originated in some transactions, that occurred during the civil wars of Wales, Cornwall, or Britany? (See Not. prec.)

§. XI. To return to our apostle's progress through Ireland, it is related that, having left Munster, he arrived at Brosna (110) (King's county), and was there entertained by bishop Trian a foreigner, who lived at a place called Craibhech. (111) Thence he went to Hy-failge, (112) where a chieftain of the name of Failge, an obstinate pagan, formed a plan for killing St. Patrick. His determination coming to the knowledge of Odran the saint's charioteer, this faithful servant, without communicating the matter to the saint, requested permission to sit for a while in the easy part of the curricule, feigning himself greatly fatigued. The saint complying with his wish condescended to act in the mean time as driver. As they were going along, Failge advanced and, mistaking Odran for St. Patrick, transfixed him with a lance. It is added, that Failge was soon after struck dead by the Almighty. (113) Although we are not bound to receive as authentic some of the circumstances mentioned relatively to Odran's martyrdom, yet there is no reason for denying that he really lost his life for the faith of Christ. (114) Subsequent to this event we find no regular account of St. Patrick's proceedings until we meet with him again in Ulster, and in that part of it, which was the scene of his earliest exertions in Ireland, viz. Magh-inish, or, as now called, Lecale. (115) In this country was his favourite retreat, Sabhall, and it is very natural to think, that after his great labours in the southern parts of Ireland he had need of some repose. While in that district he met with Maccaldus, (116) a man of a most profligate life and captain of a band of robbers, who annoyed the whole country with their continual plunderings and murders. This desperado, on seeing St. Patrick walking along a road, entertained a design of killing him, and said to his comrades; "Behold that impostor, who leads the people astray; let us try whether his god be powerful or not." Then one of them, whose name was Garvan, pretending to be sick, lay down under a cloak, and, when the saint came near them, the others said to him; "One of our party has been taken ill, pray sing over him some of your incantations, that so he may be restored to health." The saint answered, that it would not be surprising were he sick; when, on looking at him, his companions found him dead. They were so struck by this prodigy, that they cried out; "this is truly a man of God." Maccaldus was converted, and afterwards baptized. (117) Wishing to know what penance he should undergo for his crimes, St. Patrick ordered him to quit Ireland without taking any thing with him except a coarse garment, and, entrusting himself to a leathern boat, to land in the first place the wind would bring him to, and there serve God. He obeyed, and was wafted by the wind to the Isle of Man, where he was most kindly received by two holy bishops, Conindrus and Romulus, (118), who directed him in his penitential works, and with so much spiritual advantage that he succeeded them as bishop of the island and became renowned for his sanctity. (119)

(110) Jocelin (cap. 77.) and the third Life (cap. 63) have the river Brosnach. There is a river of that name which, flowing through the King's county, falls into the Shannon near Banagher. This river is many miles distant from the town Brosna, which Seward places in the barony of Clonlisk. The Tripartite does not mention a river, but seems to allude to a town or small district of that name, "loca quae Brosnachca appellantur". (Tripart. L. 3. c. 54.) Whether it were the town or the river, that St. Patrick arrived at, is of little consequence.

(111) Colgan in both his Topographical indexes places Craibhech in Munster, that is, in East Munster, as he observes at Trian's Acts (AA. SS. p 725) The reader must recollect that a part of the King's county was formerly comprized in Munster, Colgan followed the old division of the provinces. Archdall has most unaccountably placed Croibhech or Croebheach in Kerry, and he adds, near the river Brosnach, as if said river were in Kerry. Then he mentions Trian as having been there. And, what is truly strange, he quotes Colgan for his purpose, notwithstanding his repeated statement that said place was in E. Munster or Ormond. He has also made out a monastery there, and why? Because a Daluan of Croebheach is spoken of as a disciple of St. Patrick (Tripart. L. 2. c. 12.) Hence Colgan, who wished to multiply the churches founded by St. Patrick, made (Tr. Th. p. 271.) him erect one for Daluan, although the Tripartite is silent on that subject; and Archdall, who was equally anxious to swell up his Monasticon, transformed that church into an abbey of St. Patrick's foundation. As to Trian, I find no mention of him except in the passages of St. Patrick's Lives already referred to, and which alone constitute what Colgan calls his Acts (23 Mart.). Perhaps he was the same as St. Trena of Killelga (Meath) who flourished early in the sixth century, and whom Colgan has at 22 Mart.

(112) This district comprized, besides other tracts, a great part of the King's county.

(113) The history of Odran's martyrdom is thus given, with more or less circumstances, in the Tripartite (L. 3. c. 56.), the fourth Life (cap. 57.), and Jocelin (cap. 73.). The third Life (cap. 59.) makes no mention of the pious contrivance of Odran, but merely represents him as having been killed by Failge, or, as it calls him, Foilge, in the presence of St. Patrick. Only one Failge is spoken of in all those Lives, except the Tripartite which introduces two chieftans of that name in Hy-failge, one surnamed Berraide, whom it makes the murderer, and the other Ros, who is exhibited as a worthy good man, and deserving of the benediction conferred by the saint on himself and his posterity. It is plain that this second Failge was brought on the stage in compliment to some illustrious families of the Hy-falgian line, and to wipe off the shame of their being descended from a bigoted tyrant. The third Life makes the wicked Foilge the progenitor of the other Foilgi; it has (loc. cit.) "Invenit autem (Patricius) virum pessimum nomine Foilge, a quo orti sunt alii Foilgi; qui aurigam Patricii jugulavit coram eo in curru suo,"

(114) The name of Odran, as a martyr, occurs in some martyrologies. Colgan has his Acts (19 February) which are merely extracts from the Lives of St. Patrick referred to in the preceding note. He observes, that Odran is the only martyr on record, that suffered in Ireland by the hands of an Irishman. In his Chronological Index (ad AA. SS.) he affixes his martyrdom to A. D. 451, which comes near to the date above assigned for St. Patrick's departure from Munster, viz, A. D. 452. Colgan did not follow Usher as to the time, at which the saint entered Munster, and which he supposed to be the year 449. In Usher's hypothesis St. Patrick would not have left that province until A. D. 456; nor could Odran's death be placed earlier. From Odran the place called Desert-Odran in Hy-falgia got its name (Tripart. L. 3. c. 98). Colgan could give no account of its situation; but Archdall has boldly placed it in the Queen's county, as if all Hy-falgia were comprized in that district. Some writers have marked the festival or commemoration of Odran at the 27th of October; but this was the day fixed for another Odran, who died in Hy, many years later. (See AA. SS. p. 372.)

(115) See Chap. v. §. III.

(116) Probus (L. 2. c. 9.) calls him Mac-fail. In the third Life (cap. 63.) he is called Maguil. Jocelin (cap. 151.) has "Magiul, qui et Machaldus." In the fourth Life (cap. 81.) he appears under the nickname of Cyclops.

(117) The Tripartite (L. 3. c. 60.) and Jocelin (loc. cit.) add, that all these robbers were converted. They tell us also, in which they are joined by the other Lives, that St. Patrick at their request restored Garvan to life.

(118) Probus says (L. 2. c. 11.) that Coindrus and Romulus were the first preachers of the Gospel in Evania, or Man; "Qui primi docuerunt verbum Dei et baptismum in Evania, et pereos conversi sunt homines insulae ad Catholicam fidem." They are named in like manner in the fourth Life, (cap. 81.) but are not expressly stated to have been the first apostles of the island. In the Tripartite (L. 3. c. 61.) they are called Conderius et Romai-lus. Were we to believe Jocelin, (cap. 92.) St. Patrick himself was the apostle of Man; for he pretends that the saint on returning from an excursion to G. Britain undertook the conversion of the inhabitants of the smaller islands, particularly Eubonia, id est, Mannia. But we have already seen (Chap. iv. §. xiv.) that St. Patrick did not make any such excursions. The Chronicle of Man, quoted by Usher (p. 642.), mentions as an opinion, that St. Patrick was the first that preached there the Catholic faith; “primus fidem catholicam praedicasse fertur Mannensibus.” (See Chronicon Manniae, in Johnstone’s Atiquit. Celta Norman. p. 43.) This opinion was perhaps founded on Jocelin’s book. The other Lives are quite silent on the subject, and give us no hint as to the propagation of Christianity in Man except on the occasion of Maccaldus, where they mention Conindrus and Romulus. The authority of Probus is certainly far superior to Jocelin’s and to the fertur of the Chronicle. The Tripartite, indeed, throws out a hint, that the mission of St. Patrick had some influence on the progress of the Gospel in that island; for it exhibits (loc. cit.) Man as having become famous, after the arrival of St. Patrick, by serving as a retreat for monks, &c. “Venit autem (Maccaldus) in Manniam sive Euboniam, olim Druidum et gentilium vatum, postea, ab adventu sancti Patricii, Christi mystarum et monachorum secessu et sede nobilem claramque insulam.” As Man was an Irish island, or, at least, inhabited by Irish people (Usher loc. cit. see also Nennius, Hist. Brit. cap. 8.) and not, as Jocelin pretends (loc. cit.) then subject to Britain, we can easily understand how pious persons fond of a sequestered life used to resort thither from Ireland. The same Tripartite immediately adds, that the bishops Conderius and Romulus were the persons who disseminated and propagated the faith and doctrine of Christ in that island. Had St. Patrick preached there himself, the Tripartite would not have omitted to mention it. Would it be allowable to conclude from a collation of these passages, that those two bishops had been appointed by St. Patrick? Jocelin says (cap. 152.) that they were, and that the saint placed them over the island after the death of its first bishop Germanus. This Germanus is not spoken of in any of St. Patrick’s Lives except Jocelin’s; nor is he mentioned in the Chronicle of Man. He was a fictitious person, introduced in consequence of the Cathedral of Man (see Camden, col. 1447, and Wood’s Account of the Isle of Man, chap. 7.) having been dedicated to a St. German, who was no other than the great German of Auxerre, and who was highly revered by the ancient Irish. Usher had seen into the mistake of sending one Germanus from Rome along with St. Patrick, (see above chap. iv. not. 142.) but was so led astray by Jocelin that he admitted a Germanus disciple of St. Patrick and placed by him as bishop in Man. (Pr. p. 643—842.) And then, still following Jocelin, he makes St. Patrick give him as successors Conindrus and Romulus, whose accession he affixes to A. D. 474. (Ind. Chron.) Now not only St. Patrick was dead at that time, but according to the Tripartite, &c. those two bishops were in Man before the foundation of the see of Armagh, and therefore prior to A. D. 455. On the whole we may conclude, that there is no sufficient foundation for St. Patrick's having preached in Man; that its first bishop was not the pretended Germanus; and that, although it is not improbable that Conindrus and Romulus had received their appointment from our saint, we have no decisive testimony on that subject.

(119) Probus (L. 2. c. 11.) thus concludes his account of Mac-caldus, or, as he calls him, Macfail; "Igitur Macfail, ubi susceptus est ab eis, ad regulam eorum corpus et animum suum exercitavit, et totum vitæ tempus apud istos duos sanctos episcopos exegit, usquedum successor eorum in eodem episcopatu, Deo cooperante, fieri, promeruit. Hic est Macfail episcopus clarus et sanctus postmodum effectus in Evonicasium civitate, cujus nos adjuvent sancta suffragia." Usher, having quoted (p. 1031.) the former part of this passage, omitted the latter here marked in Italics. He did not relish the invocation of saints. The Tripartite (L. 3. c. 61.) has, as a quotation from an older work; "Hic enim Maccaldus est episcopus et antistes clarus Ard-ebnanensis, cujus nos suffragia adjuvent sancta." Ard-ebnanensis from Ard-ebnana the hill of Evania or Man. The Irish called the island Eumhonia, i. e. Eubonia, as Gildas and others have it. They called it also, Eumhania, or Euvania, whence came Evania. (Colgan Tr. Th. p. 187.) Prefixing the letter M, indicating fondness, the name became Mevania, as we find it in Orosius (See Colgan AA. SS. p. 60.) Camden had no right to change Mevania into Menania (Britan. col. 1439.) From Mevania came Mannia, now Man. According to the Ulster Annals Maccaldus died A. D. 488. (489.)

§. XII. Passing over some stories and anachronisms relative to St. Patrick's further proceedings in the Northern parts, I shall merely remark that he is said to have intended to erect a church in some part of the tract, now called the county of Louth, and, it seems, in or near the spot where the town of Louth is situated. (120) It would appear, that his object was to fix there a permanent see; for it is added, that he was warned by an Angel, that his peculiar church was to be more to the North at Macha, afterwards called Armagh, the place he had conceived a predilection for being intended for a holy Briton. The saint then withdrew from that spot, and retired to a hill not far distant, since called, from his name, Ardpatrick. There he erected a church and spent some time, but how long we are not informed. Meanwhile Mocteus, the holy Briton already announced to him, arrived in that neighbourhood and established a monastery at Louth. (121) It is thus the matter is related in the Tripartite (122) and by Jocelin; but we know from better authority, that Mocteus was a disciple of St. Patrick, (123) and, although it is very probable that he was along with the saint in Louth, he was too young at that time to be the superior of a monastery. (124) There can be, however, no doubt of his having afterwards founded and governed the church and monastery of Louth as bishop or prior, or only priest (125) and abbot, until A. D. 535, the year of his death. (126) To this period, prior to the foundation of Armagh, and consequently to 455, we should assign, according to some accounts, the appointment of St. Carthen or Mac-carthen to the see of Clogher, which, they tell us, St. Patrick had governed himself for some time. (127) If a circumstance connected with this subject be true, he could scarcely have been placed there so early; for he is represented as old and feeble at the time of his nomination to Clogher. Now it is difficult to suppose that, if he was old about A. D. 454, he could have protracted his life until 506, the year in which he died. (128) He was undoubtedly a disciple of St. Patrick, (129) and became bishop of Clogher; but the precise time of his accession cannot be ascertained. As to the story of his having been with St. Patrick in Italy, (130) it is not worth attending to; but we may safely admit, that he accompanied the saint through various parts of Ireland; and he was probably one of those noble pupils whom St. Patrick had taken under his care, being of the illustrious house of the Arads of Dalaradia. (131) Some writers have said, that he governed the monastery of Darinis before he was placed at Clogher. That they were mistaken is evident from what is recorded of him in the Lives of St. Patrick and in the fragment of his Acts published by Colgan; whereas in these documents he is exhibited as having constantly attended St. Patrick, until, wishing for repose and a resting place, the saint appointed him to Clogher. (132) That he was worthy of his appointment appears from the great veneration, in which his memory has been held ever since. (133)

(120) Tripart. L. 3. c. 65. seqq. Usher relates his having heard from the inhabitants of Louth, that St. Patrick had lived there for some time (Pr. p. 854.) Not only Jocelyn, whom he refers to, but also the Tripartite is favourable to this traditionary assertion.

(121) Archdall in direct opposition not only to the Tripartite but to Jocelin (cap. 134.) makes St. Patrick himself the founder of the monastery of Louth. He mistook what they say of the saint having, on quitting that country, given up the church, &c. of Ardpatrick to Mocteus for a grant to him of that of Louth itself. This account of the addition of the premises of Ardpatrick to the house of Louth smells too much of the times, when new possessions were bestowed on monasteries.

(122) L. 3. c. 67.

(123) Adamnan in his second preface to the Life of St. Columba says of him; "Proselytus Brito, homo sanctus, sancti Patricii episcopi discipulus Moctheus nomine." In some editions of Adamnan for Mochtheus we find Maveteus; Colgan's edition has Mauctaneus; but Usher's MS. had Mochtheus. The annals of Ulster likewise call him a disciple of St. Patrick. (See more ap. Usher, p. 855.)

(124) Colgan has Mochtheus at 24 Mart. (AA. SS.) He lived to a great age, and is therefore usually styled longævus. Some story tellers, and among others Jocelin (cap. 135.) thence inferred that he lived 300 years. Colgan (Notes to Acts) rejects this nonsense and quotes an Irish distich, whence we may conclude that his age did not exceed one hundred. This was certainly an age sufficient to entitle him to the epithet of longævus, but not to make us admit that he had erected the monastery of Louth before the foundation of Armagh, that is, at the latest, A. D. 454, at which time he could not have been more than 19 years old, as his death occurred in 535.

(125) An Epistle attributed to him was headed with these words; Mauchteus peccator presbyter, sancti Patricii discipulus, in Domino salutem." The Tripartite (L. 3. c. 98.) calls him St. Patrick's arch-priest, archi-presbyter, and in the book of Sligo, quoted by Usher he is styled simply sacerdos. Yet the Calendar of Cashel and the Donegal Martyrology speak of him as a bishop, and are followed by the Four Masters and Colgan (Acts at 24 Mart.). Ware also (Writers) mentions him by that title. If he ever were a bishop, it must have been after his Epistle was written. Would not Adamnan have given him that title, if it had belonged to him? His successors at Louth are called abbots, in the Irish Annals, until the 9th century, at which period bishops appear among them. (See Archdall at Louth). As to certain works attributed to him, and his having been confounded with Bachiarius. See Ware and Harris (Writers) and Colgan lococit.

(126) Annals of Ulster, Usher p. 855.

(127) Jocelin cap. 143. The Tripartite makes mention of this appointment L. 3. c. 3. while it does not treat of the foundation of Armagh until many chapters lower down. But there seems to be an anachronism in the order of the narrative; for it gives some hints that the see of Armagh then existed. It has nothing about Clogher having been specially governed by St. Patrick.

(128) Usher, p. 856 and Ind. Chron.

(129) Tirechan's hist. in which he is called Carthen. See not. 14. and Tr. Th. p. 268.

(130) See Usher, p. 856.

(131) Usher, ib. Colgan says (AA. SS. 24. Mart. p. 737.) that he was of the very ancient family of Eochad son of Mured, which seems to have been a branch of the sept of the Arads.

(132) The story about Maccarthen having governed Darinis originated, I believe, with the Scholiast of Marian Gorman, who had, through mistake, given him, in his Calender, the surname of Ferdachrioch, that is, the man of two countries or places, a title which, as will be seen elsewhere, belonged not to Maccarthen, but to his successor Tigernach. The Scholiast, wishing to show how that surname was applicable to Maccarthen, introduced Darinis. In one or other of the places so called there might have been a Maccarthen, but not the one of Clogher. The other Irish martyrologies and calendars, when treating of Maccarthen, do not mention Darinis. Instead of its being certain, as Harris pretends (Bishops, p. 176.) that he had been abbot there, it is certain that he had not. The founder of the abbey of Darinis, now Molana (Co. Waterford) was St. Molanfide. Archdall has jumbled the matter most egregiously; after stating (at Molana) that it was founded by St. Molanfide in the sixth century, he adds, that "the abbot Ferdachrioch, who had taken the name of Macarten, and was consecrated bishop of Clogher, died A. D. 506." How could Maccarthen have been abbot of a monastery founded and already governed by another person in the sixth century, and having afterwards governed the see of Clogher, die so early in that very century as 506? Another pretty mistake is his making Ferdachrioch the original name, and Macartin or Maccarthen the surname. There was also a Darinis near Wexford, of which we find a St. Neman abbot in the seventh century (AA. SS. at 8 Mart.). To return to the Scholiast, what could have induced him, when looking for a second place for Maccarthen, to go so far from Clogher down to Munster, or to the South of Leinster? I scarcely entertain a doubt that he wrote not Darinis but Damhinis, now Devonish in Lougherne and in the diocese of Clogher. Yet this celebrated monastery could not have been governed by St. Maccarthen, not having been founded until several years after his death by St. Laisre, alias Molaisse. (See Usher p. 962.)

(133) Only a part of his Acts fell into Colgan's hands, although Harris in his usual loose manner says (Bishops, p. 177.) that he published Maccarthen's Life at large. Usher seems to have had an entire Life, (see p. 856) which Colgan thinks was different from that whence his fragment was taken.

§. XIII. The time being now come for erecting a metropolitcal see, St. Patrick departed from the district of Louth, after having probably spent about two years in that country and in some adjoining parts of Ulster. (134) He then went to the district of Macha, (135) where he was well received by Daire, a wealthy and much respected man, who made him a grant of a pleasant spot of ground on an eminence, called Druim-sailech or Ardsailech, that is, hill of sallows, (136) to build a church, &c. upon it. This high ground is that, on which the city of Ardmacha, or Armagh, rose by degrees, and where the ecclesiastical metropolis of Ireland was established. (137) St. Patrick erected a church there, together with, as we may safely conclude, an adjoining cloister for his clerical companions, which, considering the discipline and practices he had been accustomed to, might be called a monastery; (138) and it is very probable, that a habitation was provided in the neighbourhood for the pious women and virgins, who had placed themselves under his direction. (139) These were, at that period of the Irish church, as much as could be expected with regard to ecclesiastical establishments at Armagh, without recurring to certain stories concerning a number of churches, monasteries, and other buildings raised there by St. Patrick. (140) The time of this foundation has been very much contested, and of the various opinions concerning it there is not one, that is not liable to some objections. Usher and his followers, who affix it to A. D. 445, (141) are forced to lay down, that St. Patrick founded Armagh before he had preached to at least one half of the people of Ireland, and prior to his mission to Leinster and afterwards to Munster. (142) Now, besides its being natural to suppose, that he would not have set about establishing a metropolitical see for all Ireland, until he had visited its various provinces and, observing the progress of the Gospel in each of them, arranged their ecclesiastical concerns, the whole series of his proceedings, as given in the Tripartite, and in which the chain of events is on the whole tolerably consistent, leads us to agree with it in placing the foundation of Armagh at least two or three years after St. Patrick's return from Munster, (143) and consequently about A. D. 455. The Bollandists have assigned it (144) to the year 454 ; but, if we are to follow the clue given us by Tirechan, (145) Colgan and Ware, may be equally correct in placing it in 455. Following a similar clue offered by others, whose authority, however, is not equal to that of Tirechan, we may affix it to A. D. 457 or 458. (146) Between these jarring computations I do not pretend to decide which is the most accurate. I think, indeed, that Usher's hypothesis is totally inadmissible; and as to the other computations, not only the testimony of Tirechan, but other circumstances, which will be soon touched upon, incline me to assign the foundation of that see to either an early part of the year 455 or a late one of 454.

(134) Usher, following his system of placing the foundation of Armagh A. D. 445, brings St. Patrick to Louth in 443, (Ind. Chron.) Upon a similar principle I think 453 preferable. The saint departed from Munster in the year 452. For his progress towards Ulster and his delay in Maghlinis, &c. (sec. §. 11.) we may allow at least a year. This computation will answer for the supposition that his visit to some other parts of that province and to Louth commenced some time in 453.

(135) Macha seems to have been but a small territory. In it, however, was the royal city of Emania, the residence of the kings of Ulster, which we find called by Irish writers Emhain-Macha. (See O'Donnel's Life of St. Columba, L. 1. c. 84). It was near where Armagh now stands, and according to O'Donnel (loc. cit.) still existed it St. Columba's time. It is mentioned in Fiech's hymn (stroph. 22.) but not as a royal residence; for it is said that "in Armagh is the seat of royalty;" and there is added, according to Lynch's translation; "Long has been the prerogative of Emania." The growth of Armagh contributed to its downfall. Colgan writes of its noble ruins (Tr. Th. p. 6.); "Emania prope Ardmacham, nunc fossis latis, vestigiis murorum eminentibus, et ruderibus pristinum redolens splendorem."

(136) Usher (Pr. p. 857, and Ind. Chron. ad A. 445) and Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 289.) call it Salicetum. For, besides Jocelin, who has (cap. 163) Druimsaileach, Probus (L. 2. c. 3.) called it the high ground "quae nominatur Sailech," and in the third Life (cap. 82.) we find Drumsaileth. In these Lives as also in the Tripartite (L. 3. c. 68.) we are told that Daire at first refused the hill to St. Patrick, and gave him, instead of it, a place in the low ground, called, in some of them, Fearta (see Usher, p. 851); but that, being strongly affected by certain circumstances that occurred, he afterwards granted it to him.

(137) Probus (L. 3. c. 7.) writes; "Accepit ergo ab eo (Daire) S. Patricius praedium optatum et placitum sibi, et aedificavit in eo monasteria et habitationes religiosorum virorum; in quo loco jam civitas est Ardmach nominata est sedes ut episcopatus et regiminis est Hiberniae." Ardmacha signifies the hill of Macha, that is of the district so called, and not high field, as Ware and Harris have explained it. This is a more pardonable mistake than that of Seward, who (at Armagh) says, that its cathedral was called Druim-sailec. He ought to have known, that this was the name of the place, before a church was ever erected there.

(138) See Chap. iv. §. 9.

(139) In Usher's Tripartite (Pr. p. 858) it is said, that St. Lupita (see Chap. III. §. 18) was buried at Fearta (Not. 136.) while others place her remains at Armagh. But, as that place is very near the town, this difference can be easily reconciled. There was a church there, called Temple na fearta, and, according to Harris (Monasteries) a nunnery founded by St. Patrick. (See also Archdall at Temple-fartagh.)

(140) Jocelin (cap. 165.) represents St. Patrick as having built there a noble city, &c. &c. Strange that Usher has copied this stuff (p. 358). As to Harris, who has it also, he put into English whatever he could pick out of Usher's Latin. Probus mentions only religious houses as erected by St. Patrick (See Not. 137.) The Tripartite is still more moderate (L. 3. c. 78.) as it gives no account of any edifices at Armagh except of the church and the necessary habitations and out-offices for the clergy.

(141) The Annals of Ulster quoted by Usher, (p. 854.) are his authority on this subject. They have; "Anno Domini 444 (445) Ardmacha fundata est." He also observed that in the same annals the death of Iarlath, the third Archbishop of Armagh, is assigned to the year 482. Then he compares (p. 875.) this date with a catalogue of the prelates of that see, which was said to have been taken from the Psalter of Cashel, and which Colgan has published more at large (Tr. Th. p. 292.). In that catalogue eighteen years are reckoned for the administration of Iarlath, which Usher ingeniously stretches to the year 483, so as to place Iarlath's accession in 465. To Benignus the immediate predecessor of Iarlath are given 10 years, and thus Usher goes back to A. D. 455. Benignus is placed after Sen-Patrick, who also, according to said catalogue, governed for ten years, and thus we are brought to A. D. 445, the alleged year of the foundation of Armagh. All this might do very well, did not the catalogue mention Secundinus as predecessor of Sen-Patrick and holding the see for 15 years, or, as one of Usher's copies had it, six years (Colgan's edition has 16), and again prior to Secundinus St. Patrick himself. Now, if we should stand by this catalogue, it would follow that the see of Armagh existed more than 15 or 16 years before A. D. 445, and therefore prior to St. Patrick's mission, or, at least, more than six years before that time. Usher, to get rid of these difficulties, maintains that neither Secundinus nor Sen-Patrick (a personage, whose existence he otherwise admitted) were ever bishops of Armagh, and that the immediate predecessor of Benignus was the great St. Patrick himself. I agree with him as to Secundinus (see §. 4-9.); and also as to Sen-Patrick, not for the purpose of propping any hypothesis, but because there was no such person distinct from our apostle, although some writers have imagined there was. But of this more below. What then becomes of the authority of that catalogue? If, as Usher is forced to acknowledge, it is wrong from its very beginning, how can we depend on its computation of the years of Benignus, &c.? And it must be recollected, that in said catalogue there is no reference to the years of the Christian era. Now we may be allowed to suppose, that the compilers of the Annals, called of Ulster, Charles Maguire and Roderick Cassidy (see Colgan AA. SS. p. 5. Nicholson Ir. Hist. Libr. and Harris's Writers) were induced by some such inaccurate catalogues, or perhaps corrupt copies of them, to affix, when connecting old computations with the years of our Lord, the foundation of Armagh to the year 445. Colgan says, (Tr. Th. p. 291.) that this is the most probable date, and adduces in favour of it a most extraordinary argument, viz. that it is the only one, which will leave room for the incumbencies at Armagh of Secundinus and Sen-Patrick. He proposes this argument just after having quoted Usher, who, as we have seen, rejects those two persons out of the list of Armagh, because, in the hypothesis of that being the true date, there was no room for them; and yet Colgan thought, that, to provide a place for them it ought to be received. The good man might have easily discovered, that, were we to admit, with the above catalogue, those persons as bishops of Armagh, the see should have been founded several years before A. D. 445.

(142) Usher, Ind. Chron. ad A. D. 448-449. Harris, having copied from Usher what he has about the foundation of Armagh in 445, chanced to see into this difficulty, and accordingly represents (Bishops p. 19.) Armagh, although founded, not as yet endowed with the metropolitical rights; for, he says, "it was not yet in St. Patrick's power to accomplish this; because the greatest part of Leinster and Munster had not been at this time reclaimed from paganism." This is a silly evasion, and in direct opposition to the statement generally given in the Lives; viz. that St. Patrick went to Macha for the express purpose of establishing his see there, and that, as soon as the church, &c. was erected, Armagh became immediately the metropolitan see of all Ireland. Giraldus Cambrensis has expressed it very perspicuously in a few words; "Baptizatis catervatim populis, et tota jam insula ad fidem Christi conversa, apud Ardmacham sibi sedem elegit; quam etiam quasi metropolim constituit, et proprium totius Hiberniae primatiae locum." (See more ap. Usher, p. 859.) Harris would not have been reduced to the necessity of resorting to that quibble, if he had put off this foundation until after St. Patrick's return from Munster.

(143) It may be worth observing, that even in Jocelin, and the 3d and 4th Lives, St. Patrick's preaching in Munster is treated of many chapters before mention is made of the foundation of Armagh, which is not spoken of until towards the end of each of those works.

(144) Comment. Praev. ad Vit. S. P. &c. §. 5.

(145) Tirechan, quoted by Usher (p. 854) says, that the church of Trim was built the twenty-second year before the foundation of that of Armagh. The year in which he supposed that Trim church was erected, was 433 (see chap. v. not. 35); and consequently, according to him, Armagh was founded either in 454 or 455. Now, although we are not bound to believe all that Tirechan and others have concerning Trim, we may safely believe that he knew something as to the time that Armagh was founded, and that his reason for specifying the 22d year, prior to it, was that this date corresponded with A. D. 433. Hence Colgan has (Ind. Chron. ad AA. SS.); "A. 455, Ardmacha extracta, et in sedem totius regni metropolitanam erecta per S. Patricium secundum S. Tirechanum." This computation is also that of Ware (Bishops at St. Patrick); nor is the number, 455, mentioned by him, a typographical error, as Harris pretends; for, were it so, it would have been marked in the Errata, it being an error too important to be overlooked. I allow that on the point now under discussion Ware is rather obscure; he states that Armagh was founded A. D. 455, and governed for ten years by St. Patrick, until Benignus became bishop, who in 465, that is, in the very year of his appointment, as the English translator has it, resigned the see to Iarlath. Although I do not agree with Ware as to the latter assertion, yet there is no necessity for recurring to any typographical error. Harris might with more plausibility have appealed to Ware himself in other parts of his works. For in the Antiquities (cap. 29.) and Annotat. ad S. P. Opusc. (p. 141.) he has A. 445, following the Ulster Annals and Usher. But these tracts were published some years before the general work on Bishops, which did not appear until the year 1665, whereas the Antiquities came out in 1654 and the Annotations in 1656. Ware, on more diligent inquiry, changed his opinion between that year and 1665.

(146) The Tripartite (L. 2. c. 2.) places the church of Trim 25 years before that of Armagh; Jocelin (cap. 52.) has the 25th year. The former would bring the foundation of Armagh down to A. D. 458 (See not. prec.); the latter to either 457 or 458. The Annals called Cluanenses (see Colgan AA. SS. p. 5.) place it about A. D. 457 (ib. p. 503.); and the 4 Masters, (ap. Tr. Th. p. 290) have the year 457, (458). O'Flaherty, in a manuscript addition to Tr. Th. p. 318, gives an extract from an unpublished work of his, entitled Ogygia Christiana, in which, treating of the foundation of Armagh and of the succession in that see, he writes; "Ardmacha metropolis A. 458, a S. Patricio fundata est; et S. Benignus ab eo sibi substitutus immediatus successor" With regard to the latter statement we shall see lower down; but as to the year 458, I dare say O'Flaherty's chief authority was that of the 4 Masters.

CHAPTER VII.

St. Patrick spends the remainder of his life in Ulster—Not different from Patrick senior or Sen-Patrick—Of the synods attributed to him—Of the bishops stationed in Ireland during the latter days of St. Patrick—Of the tract called his Confession—Place and time of his death—Celebration of his obsequies—Some observations on Patrick's Purgatory—Of certain treatises, which have been ascribed to St. Patrick.

SECT. I.

ST. PATRICK having thus established the see of Armagh, spent the remainder of his life between it and his favourite retreat of Sabhul or Saul. He may indeed have made excursions to some of the districts adjacent to both places; but we do not find any account, at least that can be depended upon, of his having thenceforth visited again the other provinces of Ireland, or undertaken any long journey. For we are not to listen to Jocelin, who, alluding to the practice of his own times, tells us that our Apostle having fixed the metropolitical chair in Armagh, and brought over the whole island (1) to Christ, set out for Rome with the intention of getting the privileges of the new metropolis confirmed by the Holy See, and of procuring relics; and that, when arrived there, the Pope granted him every thing he wished for, decorated him with the pallium, and appointed him his Legate in Ireland. (2) This pretended tour to Rome, and the concomitant circumstances, are all set aside by the testimony of St. Patrick himself, who, as has been already observed, (3) gives us most clearly to understand that from the commencement of his mission he constantly remained in Ireland until he published his Confession, which was not written until after the foundation of Armagh; and that he did not leave it afterwards is equally plain from his telling us, that he was afraid to be out of Ireland even for as much time as would serve for paying a visit to his relatives, because in that case he would be guilty in the sight of God, and would disobey the orders of Christ our Lord, who had commanded him to come among the Irish and to stay with them for the remainder of his life. (4) In like manner fall to the ground some other fables, which Jocelin adds on this occasion, such as St. Patrick having, when returning from Rome, founded many monasteries in Britain, and filled them with monks, and his having brought thirty foreign bishops with him to Ireland. (5) A singular fact is related as having occurred about the time of building the church of Armagh, which shows how strictly the fasting rules were observed by the ancient Irish. One of St. Patrick's disciples, named Colman, having been one day greatly fatigued by getting in the harvest, became exceedingly thirsty, but, for fear of breaking through the regulation of fasting until vesper time, would not taste even a drop of water. (6) The consequence was that, before the regular hour for taking nourishment came on, he died. Had the saint been apprized of the danger Colman was in, he would certainly have dispensed with his not observing the rules on that occasion. Colman was buried near the cross fronting the new church of Armagh, and was the first, whose remains were deposited in that burying ground.

(1) From these words it is plain that Jocelin supposed, that St. Patrick had, as stated in the preceding chapter, preached throughout all Ireland before he founded Armagh. (Compare with ib. Not. 142.)

(2) Jocel. cap. 166. There is not a word of all this in the other Lives of St. Patrick except in the Tripartite (L. 3. c. 81 seqq.) which, however, makes no mention of his applying for a confirmation of his metropolis, his obtaining the pallium, &c. and merely exhibits the saint as proceeding to Rome in a miraculous manner, and there getting for his church of Armagh a great quantity of relics, concerning which it has some ridiculous fables not worth animadversion. This story was patched up to give a degree of lustre and dignity to the relics, which in later times used to be shown publicly at Armagh. Jocelin, having got hold of it, took care to add a good deal of his own invention to it. But owing to his ignorance of the ancient discipline of the Church, his additions are of a very clumsy sort. St. Patrick having been already invested with full powers, such as those that Palladius had enjoyed for propagating the Gospel and establishing the means necessary for preserving the Christian faith in Ireland, was not under any necessity of applying to Rome for a confirmation of the privileges annexed to the see, which he had chosen for himself. His right of appointing a metropolis flowed from the extensive nature of his mission, as he had been sent not to a part of Ireland but to the whole island, and there being no other bishop in the country when he arrived there, was, in fact, originally no bishop of all Ireland. And to this he alludes in his Epistle against Coroticus, where he says, “Hiberione constitutum epis- copum me esse fateor." The bishops whom in process of time he appointed to various sees, having derived their authority from him, became, ipso facto, his suffragans; and according to the usual practice of all countries, these new bishops, and others afterwards appointed in whatsoever part of Ireland, continued suffragans and subject to St. Patrick's successors in Armagh, in the same manner as the primacy of St. Peter has descended to his successors in the see of Rome. St. Bernard's testimony concerning the extent of the jurisdiction of Armagh over all Ireland leaves not a shadow of doubt on this subject. In Jocelin's days a special confirmation by the Holy see was requisite for the establishing a metropolis, but this was not always the case in more ancient times. (See Fleury Instit. in Dr. Eccl. part. 1. ch. 15.) Nor is there in the other Lives of St. Patrick the least allusion to an application as made by him for the confirmation of Armagh. On the contrary the Tripartite (loc. cit.) tells us that, before he set out for Rome in search of relics, he entrusted Secundinus with the care of the archbishopric of Armagh and the primacy of Ireland; thus supposing it to have been already fully established. There have been many opinions concerning the origin of metropolitical sees, which the reader will find some account of in Bingham's Origines, &c. (Book II. ch. 16.); but in the case of Armagh we have an argument directly opposite to those, who have pretended that the metropolitical rights of cities in the ecclesiastical system were founded on similar rights as to their civic or temporal dignity. The truth is, that according to the most ancient usages the primatial and metropolitical privileges were derived from the founders of sees, whether the places were great or small. The patriarchal rights of Alexandria descended from St. Mark; the primatial of Rome from St. Peter, the metropolitical of Armagh, where there was not even a house before, from St. Patrick. As to what Jocelin says of the Pallium, it is sufficient to observe, that no such ornament, as granted to archbishops or bishops, was used in the Western church until the sixth century. (Fleury, ib. ch. 14.) And as to the legatine authority, such as understood by Jocelin, St. Patrick had no occasion for it. (See Chap. II. §. 13.) But on these subjects more elsewhere.

(3) Chap. iv. §. 14.

(4) Confess. p. 17. It is strange that the Bollandists, who had examined the Confession with some care so as to comment on and publish it, have admitted this pretended journey of St. Patrick to Rome. They might have observed that, had it taken place, it would have been mentioned in some of the Roman or other documents of the day. Their assigning it to A. D. 455 or 456, consistently with their placing the foundation of Armagh in 454, would bring it within the pontificate of Leo the great. Now it is scarcely credible, that the appearance at Rome of such a great saint as St. Patrick, announcing the conversion of a whole nation, could have been overlooked in the splendid and enlightened times of that Pope, whose transactions, as well as those of the persons with whom he had intercourse, have been so minutely recorded. Usher affixes that journey to A. D. 462, thus widely departing from his former computations; for, having assigned the foundation of Armagh to A. D. 445, he should, consonantly with Jocelin, his chief authority, have placed that journey very soon after, and accordingly not later than 446 or 447. But another story of this same Jocelin, who has done so much injury to our church history, led Usher astray on this point. Jocelin says (cap. 167) that St. David was in his mother's womb, when St. Patrick was in Great Britain on his return from Rome. Now Usher imagined that St. David was born in 462, and therefore he assigned (Pr. p. 870) the Roman tour to that year. What others have said about it, I will not inquire; for why dispute about non-entities?

(5) Jocelin cap. 167. 168. Usher has copied (p. 870. 872) this stuff; and Harris, as usual, follows in his train. Those would have been strange times for St. Patrick to travel through Britain and to found monasteries there, while the inhabitants were struggling for existence against the Saxons. Jocelin has already brought (cap. 92) thirty British bishops to Ireland. Thus between British and other foreign prelates we got sixty, a good round number for such a small country, exclusive of natives.

(6) It is well known that very many Christians in former times abstained, on fast days, until the time allowed for refection, not only from every nutritive substance but even from the lightest and simplest sort of drink. In the Life of the abbot Silvanus of Mount Sinai it is related that, as he and his disciple Zachary were travelling one day, the latter wished to drink of some water, which he found on the way, when the abbot stopped him saying, "My child, this a fast day." (Tillemont. Mem. &c. Tom. x. p. 451.)

(7) Tripart. L. 3. c. 77. Jocelin cap. 165. Colgan, AA. SS. ad 4 Mast.

§. II. It has been said, that St. Patrick soon after the foundation of Armagh resigned the see to Benignus; (8) but neither do I find any sufficient authority for this assertion, nor does it agree with what we read in the more consistent accounts of those times, viz. that Benignus did not become bishop of Armagh until after St. Patrick's death. I should rather call it a conjecture than an assertion; whereas I dare say it stands on no better basis than a supposition, that the accession of Benignus took place in the year 458, which was thought to be that, in which the see was established. (9) It is impossible to reconcile the jarring dates and opinions that occur with regard to these subjects, and the only safe method we can pursue is to follow the thread of the history without altering it in compliment to chronological hypotheses. Nor can it be doubted that St. Patrick governed Armagh in person for some years. (10) Could it be proved that Benignus became archbishop in the year 458, it would follow, either that St. Patrick, having governed the see since 454 or 455, then appointed him administrator of it, or that he died in said year and was immediately succeeded by Benignus. As to the former supposition, we have no authority for it, nor is Benignus ever mentioned as a coadjutor or suffragan in that see. (11) For the latter there is certainly some foundation; whereas, besides Giraldus Cambrensis, who expressly states that St. Patrick died A. D. 458, Nennius, according as some writers have understood him, gives the same date by telling us, that sixty years elapsed from St. Patrick's death until that of St. Brigid. We must, however, observe that Nennius' computations will bring us rather to the year 465. (12) Yet, what may appear of more weight than the authority of Cambrensis, some of our own Annals give a hint at the same date by laying down, that Sen-Patrick died in 458. (13) For, although their authors or, at least some of them, distinguished that person from the great St. Patrick, but as contemporary with him, yet in reality they were one and the same. Under the name of Sen-Patrick they understood an elder Patrick, Patricius senior, whom they supposed to be different from the Apostle. Now there is not mentioned in any of the Lives of St. Patrick (14) any such person as distinct from him; but we find the title of senex given to the saint himself at the part of his history relative to his latter days. (15) This epithet being applied to him, when he was really old, contributed in part to lead astray some of the writers of our Calendars, and compilers of Annals, as if there had been a Patrick older than the saint, and hence arose the confusion in that catalogue of the archbishops of Armagh, which has, besides St. Patrick, a namesake of his surnamed senior. (16) But this subject has been principally obscured by the fables concerning Glastonbury, as it was pretended not only that our Apostle was buried in that place, but that he had been abbot of that monastery, and even a deed was forged in his name relative to its supposed antiquities and privileges. (17) The Irish writers finding themselves puzzled by those Glastonbury stories, and unwilling to allow the Glastonians the honour of having among them the remains of St. Patrick, endeavoured to compromise the matter by giving them, instead of our Apostle, Sen-Patrick or Patrick senior. (18) This, however, was not what those monks wished for. They insisted on having a right to the great St. Patrick, and him alone they understood by the name of Patrick senior. (19) Nor is it improbable that this addition of senior was owing chiefly to those pretensions of the Glastonians; for, as there were in the course of ages several distinguished persons called Patrick, one of whom is particularly mentioned as having retired to Glastonbury in the ninth century, (20) the monks were not content with the honour of having had in their house a Patrick of a late period, but maintained that their Patrick was the most ancient one, the Patrick senior, the apostle of Ireland. Our writers thus pressed admitted a Patrick senior at Glastonbury, but took care to distinguish him from the apostle, while their condescension went so far as to allow that he was contemporary with him.

I should not have dwelt upon this subject of Patrick senior, had not even Usher, and, after him, Ware, Colgan, and many others (21) admitted the existence of such a person as distinct from St. Patrick. Usher complains more than once that he has been confounded with the apostle, and indeed some of his hypotheses, particularly that of assigning the saint's death to A. D. 493, required that they should be considered as distinct persons. The truth, however, is that they ought not to be distinguished; and accordingly when we find the year 458 mentioned as that of Patrick senior's death, we have a right to conclude that in some of our documents said year was laid down as the last of our apostle, just as it was understood by Cam-brensis. But, as will be seen lower down, there are very good reasons for believing, that he died seven years later.

(8) See Not. 146 to Chap. vi.

(9) The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 293) place the foundation of Armagh in the year 457 (458); then they assign the death of Benignus to 467 (468). Now as Benignus had been supposed to have governed that see for ten years (Not. 141 to Chap. vi.) it would follow in that case that his accession took place A. D. 458. Hence it was concluded that St. Patrick gave up the see, when established, to Benignus. What then will become of the ten years, which the catalogue referred to (ib.) allows for Sen-Patrick, or rather for the real St. Patrick?

(10) The words of St. Bernard (Vita S. Mal. cap. 7), “in qua (Ardmacha) et vivus praefuit,” cannot be understood of his having merely founded the see. What we read in the Lives about his having proceeded to Macha for the purpose of there forming a permanent residence for himself (see chap. vi. §. 12.) proves the general belief that he had governed Armagh for no very inconsiderable time. Add to this, that Benignus is constantly called his successor, and not merely in the see, but, as will be seen lower down, in the primacy over Ireland; and in such a manner as plainly to indicate that he succeeded St. Patrick after his death. The Tripartite, (L. 3. c. 72) mentions Benignus as rather a young man and still a disciple at a time when St. Patrick presided at Armagh.

(11) The only person spoken of as administrator of Armagh during St. Patrick’s life time is Secundinus, who is represented as such in the Tripartite (L. 3. cap. 81.) during St. Patrick’s pretended absence at Rome. This is a mistake; first, because there was no such absence; and, secondly, because Secundinus was dead since A. D. 448. (see Chap. vi. §. 9) and therefore, some years (ten according to the Tripartite itself) before that see was founded. Upon this mistake, was built the introduction of Secundinus into the catalogue of the prelates of Armagh (Not. 141 to Chap. vi.) and the calculation of the Bollandists, who assign the death of Secundinus to A. D. 459. He had acted however as vicar and suffragan of St. Patrick elsewhere, and during a real absence of his from certain parts of Ireland. (See Chap. vi. §. 4.) But Benignus is never mentioned in our old documents as an administrator of Armagh but as successor there of St. Patrick.

(12) Nennius writes (Hist. Briton. cap. xi.) “A morte Patricii usque ad obitum Sanctae Brigidae 60 anni sunt.” Usher observes (p. 883.) that, following the chronology of Sigebert, who places the death of St. Brigid in the year 518, this computation would bring back the death of St. Patrick to 458. Was Usher certain, that Nennius supposed the death of St. Brigid to have been in that year? I believe Nennius thought it was later, as it surely was. For he adds: “A nativitate Columkillae usque ad obitum Sanctae Brigidae 4 sunt anni.” Now Columkill was not born before the year 520, as will be proved elsewhere; and St. Brigid’s death is in the Ulster Annals assigned to 524, while in some other documents it is placed in 525. (See Usher p. 884.) The year, that has the best claim to the birth of Columba, seems to be 521 ; if we admit that this was known to Nennius, which he might have collected from Adamnan and Bede, it will follow that he placed St. Brigid's death in 525, from which deducting the sixty years back to St. Patrick, we have, according to him, our Apostle's exit in the year 465.

(13) The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 293) place the death of Sen-Patrick at A. D. 457, that is, 458. They followed the Annals of Ulster, which have these remarkable words at said year, "Quies Senis Patricii, ut alii libri dicunt. What can the alii libri refer to except the time of St. Patrick's death being marked in some books differently from the vulgar opinion that prevailed in the days of the compilers, viz. that he died in the year 493 ? It may be, however, that an allusion is here made to the date laid down, (A. D. 454) in the Annals of Connaught for the death of the old Patrick, Sen-Patrick, senis Patricii episcopi Glosoniensis (Glastonbury) ecclesiae." See Usher p. 895.

(14) It is true that Fiech's Scholiast has Patrick senex or senior as distinct from the apostle. But his blundering scholia cannot be called a Life of the saint. He introduces him on occasion of striving to explain a very obscure passage of Fiech's hymn (Stroph. 33.), in which it is said that when St. Patrick died, he proceeded to another Patrick, and that their souls went together to heaven. What this means will be inquired into hereafter. The Scholiast says, that the other Patrick was Patrick senior, whose remains are at Glastonbury of the Irish (Glastenberiae Hibernorum) and that the soul of St. Patrick waited for him from the 17th of March until the latter end of August, at which time the latter died, that they might go to heaven together. This nonsense, which Colgan rejects with indignation, while it shows what little dependence is to be placed on the Scholiast, proves that he supposed his two Patricks to have died in the same year.

(15) The Tripartite (L. 3. c. 86.) mentioning a circumstance that occurred after the foundation of Armagh, of a pair of horses bestowed by St. Patrick to Fiech of Sletty, calls him the holy old Patrick : "duos equos curriles, qui sancti Senis Patricii currum," &c. From the whole context it is evident, that the Patrick here spoken of was St. Patrick himself. (Compare with Jocelin, cap. 116.)

(16) See Chap. vi. Not. 141.

(17) This deed is in Wm. of Malmesbury's tract, De Antiquitate Eccl. Glaston. in Gale's xv. Scriptores, and has been published among the Opusc. S. Patricii by Ware, and in the Monasticon Anglic. Tom. 1. p. 11. It is entitled Charta S. Patricii, or Epistola de antiquitate Avalonica, from the old name of the island Avalonia (Somersetshire) in which that monastery was situated. Ware has ably exposed (Annotat. p. 131. seqq.) the absurdities of that spurious document; and Usher, who has written most learnedly on the Antiquities of Glastonbury (Pr. p. 104 to 125), observes (p. 116) that it was never heard of until after the arrival of the Normans. Yet the other stories as to St. Patrick having been at that place had been circulated earlier, and their origin can be easily accounted for. The first establishment of Glastonbury was founded, if not entirely, at least chiefly by religious men from Ireland, who, as Cambden states (col. 79 Gibson's ed.) held schools there of religion and learning and were maintained at the royal expense. Hence it was called Glastonbury of the Irish (See Not. 14.) The memory of St. Patrick could not but be greatly revered by the Irish settled there; and we find that the old church, that existed before the reign of king Ina, was called the church of the Blessed Virgin Mary and of St. Patrick (see Chap. II. Not. 53). From these circumstances it was no difficult matter to deduce, in the ninth or tenth century, that St. Patrick had been there in person, and thence flowed all the other stories. That first establishment, however, could not have been formed as early as the time of St. Patrick, whereas it could not have been prior to the conversion of the Irish nation, and considering all circumstances, was subsequent to, at least, the partial conversion of the Anglo-Saxons, which did not take place until about the beginning of the seventh century. The princes, who encouraged the religious teachers at Glastonbury, were of that nation, and in that century numbers of holy and learned men went from Ireland to Britain for the purpose of converting and instructing the new settlers in that country. But although the commencement of the house and school of Glastonbury cannot, with any probability, be placed before the seventh century, yet there can be little doubt that it existed in an early part of it, as appears from a grant made in favour of it in the year 670 by Kenelwach a king of the West Saxons. (Usher Pr. p. 112.)

It is now clear, that all that has been said about St. Patrick having been abbot of Glastonbury, of his or any other Patrick contemporary with him, having been buried there, is quite fabulous. And although Wm. of Malmesbury represents its church as the most ancient in England, it will be found on close inquiry, that its real antiquity does not ascend higher than the period now mentioned.

(18) The Calendar of Cashel, a work of the 11th century (Colgan AA. SS. p. 5.) and consequently written after the promulgation of the Glastonbury fables, has (ap. Tr. Th. p. 10.) these words at 24 August; “Senior Patricius Ros-delac in regione de Mag-lacha jacet; sed secundum aliquos, et verius quod Glastenberiae apud Galla Hibernos (Walla Hibernos) quae est civitas in regione Saxonum, et Scoti eam inhabitant.”

(19) Usher (p. 892. seqq.) quotes a heap of passages to this purpose. One writer has; “Hibernensium peregrini praedictum locum Glestoniae, sicut et caeterae fidelium turbae, magno colebant affectu; et maxime ob beati PATRICII SENIORIS honorem, qui faustus ibidem in Domino quievisse narratur.” A Glastonian poetaster, having mentioned three Patricks, adds; “Archiepiscopus primus Hiberniae—Is primus postea abbas Glastoniae.” He was angry with those, that did not allow St. Patrick’s remains to be at Glastonbury; “De hoc Patricio, Columba, Brigida—Delirat plurimum Chester in chronica—Scribens in Duno quod horum corpora—Sunt uno tumulo.” And it is the great St. Patrick, who is so often spoken of in the rhapsody of William of Malmesbury.

(20) Ranulph of Chester in his Polychronicon L. 5. c. 4. as quoted by Usher Pr. p. 896 (for by the bye I do not find the words there in Gale’s edition ap. xv. Scriptores) relates that an abbot Patrick retired from Ireland about A. D. 850, to Glastonbury, and that he died there on the 25th of August. But on account of that being St. Bartholomew’s day, his festival was put off to the following day, and pretended to be the same as the festival of St. Patrick the apostle, whom the monks claimed. Usher was mistaken (Ind. Chron. ad a. 850) in placing the abbot’s death on 25th August, every where else the 17th of March was considered as the great St. Patrick’s day. Why transfer it to August 25th? The fact is that their real Patrick was the one mentioned by Ranulph, or some other Patrick, perhaps of the 7th or 8th century, that died on the 24th August; and then comes this most striking circumstance, that the Calendar of Cashel (see Not. 18.) and that of Marian Gorman or his Scholiast (AA. SS. p. 366.) affix to that day the death of Patrick senior, who, says Marian, was of Ros-dela in the country of Mag-lacha, where he is placed also by the Calendar of Cashel and Fiech's Scholiast in the passage alluded to above (Not. 14.) while they add that he was not buried there but at Glastonbury. Colgan (Ind. Topogr. to Tr. Th.) says that Ros-dela was in Ossory, where (ib.) he places also Mag-lacha. Yet he has (Ind. Top. to AA. SS.) a Mag-lacha in Thomond, in which country we find Mag-lacha the birth place of St. Senan of Inniscatthy. (See below Chap. ix. §. 4.) It is most probable, that the Patrick of Ros-dela was the real Patrick of Glastonbury. Colgan, treating of divers persons called Patrick (AA. SS. p. 366) found himself greatly perplexed. Wishing to maintain the existence of a Patrick senior in the apostle's time, he says that he was first at Ros-dela, then bishop of Armagh, and afterwards at Glastonbury, &c. Then he strives to find out another Patrick, who also went to Glastonbury, but in the ninth century.

(21) The Bollandists, to avoid the many difficulties that occurred on this subject, gave a new turn to the name Sen-Patrick. According to them it does not mean Patrick senior or the elder, but the son of Sannan, called Deacon Sannan, who is said to have been a brother of the apostle (Usher p. 824); so that Sen-Patrick is the same as San-Patrick, or Patrick son of Sannan. This Patrick has been called Patrick junior, and is distinguished by Usher both from the apostle and from Patrick senior (p. 894.) He is the Patrick who, according to Jocelin, (cap. 166.) was buried at Glastonbury. In this point Jocelin is followed by the Bollandists; but they add a circumstance directly opposite to what he has; for they make this Patrick succeed his uncle in the see of Armagh and govern it for ten years, while Jocelin states that after the uncle's death he went straight to Britain, and remained there for the rest of his life. These fine conjectures of the Bollandists will not answer any purpose. In the first place there were no nephews of St. Patrick in Ireland; secondly all the Glastonbury stories and the passages of our writers concerning Sen-Patrick are relative to a Patrick the elder; and nothing is more evident than that the name was a mere abbreviation of Senior Patrick or Patrick senior.

§. III. To return to St. Patrick's proceedings at Armagh, it is related that, when the see was fully established, he held synods, (22) in which canons were decreed and ecclesiastical matters regulated. It is indeed very natural to suppose that he did, and two of them are particularly mentioned; but the accounts of their acts are very imperfect. One of those synods is called simply the Synod of St. Patrick, and the other bears the title of the Synod of bishops, i. e. Patrick, Auxilius, and Isserninus. Under the head of the former are some canons, which seem to have been enacted at a later period, or perhaps in some other country; but among the canons of the latter, with one or two exceptions, we meet with nothing to make us doubt that it was really held in Ireland and by those bishops. (23) This synod is generally supposed to have been held about A. D. 456, (24) and, I believe, justly; for it is plain from the whole tenour of the canons that they were intended for every part of Ireland, and consequently after the whole system of the Irish church had been consolidated by the establishment of Armagh, which, as has been seen, (25) most probably took place in 454 or 455. Next we find in them every mark of a church well provided with ministers not only of the higher order, bishops, priests, and deacons, but also of the inferior rank, such as the lectores and ostiarii. Abbots, monks, and nuns are also spoken of. These institutions, without referring to other proofs, are sufficient to show, that a fully formed church existed in Ireland when the synod was held. Now it would be very difficult to understand how the Irish church could have grown to such maturity before about the year 456. Nor can it be placed much later than that year, whereas Auxilius, who was present at it, died in 460. (26) Besides the canons belonging to the two synods, there are extant many others attributed to St. Patrick, which will be treated of in another place. (27).

(22) Jocelin, cap. 168.

(23) Even Tillemont, notwithstanding his critical scrupulosity, admits that, excepting two or three of the canons, he could find no reason for denying their genuineness. (Mem. &c. Tom. xvi. p. 786.)

(24) Spelman, (Concil. &c. Tom. 1. p. 52) has, circa A. 456. Wilkins (Concil. M. B. &c. Tom. 1. p. 2.) simply A. 456. Harris having, in obedience to Usher, assigned the foundation of Armagh to the year 445, places (Bishops p. 20.) the synod in 448. He was right, however, in supposing it subsequent to that foundation.

(25) Chap. vi. §. 13.

(26) Annals of Ulster, (ap. Usher p. 827.) The 4 Masters, quoted by Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 19.) place the death of Auxilius in 454, that is 455. If this were the true date, we might calculate that the synod was held immediately after the foundation of Armagh in 454 or 455, and that Auxilius died very soon after. But the 4 Masters, in assigning that date, do not agree with themselves when they affix the foundation of Armagh to 458, so that the synod would have been, in this hypothesis, held before Armagh was established; which cannot be admitted.

(27) See below, Chap. xxxii. §. 11.

§. iv. It may be asked why the names of Auxilius and Isserninus alone appear joined to that of St. Patrick in the title of the synod now mentioned. Could the reason be that they were the only bishops then in Ireland? I can scarcely believe such to have been the case. Benignus indeed could not at that time have had the care of the see of Armagh; for, if he had, he must have assisted at the synod, and the omission of his name would be quite unaccountable. But in several of the canons bishops are spoken of in such a manner as plainly to indicate, that there were some in every part of Ireland, and that their number was proportional to that of the clergy in general. (28) Unless then we should suppose that these canons were added after St. Patrick's time, for which I do not find sufficient grounds, it must be admitted that bishops were then stationed in various parts of the country. As to their not having attended at the synod, we may be allowed to believe that their presence in the districts assigned to them could not have been well dispensed with at that period ; and we may add that it might not have been prudent to hold a large assembly of persons from divers quarters, lest the king Leogaire, who was still alive, and other pagan chieftains, should take umbrage at such proceedings. The whole matter seems to have been conducted in the following manner. St. Patrick having established his see, and wishing to make regulations for the right government of the whole Irish church, called to his assistance Auxilius and Isserminus as being, next to himself, the most experienced and, since the death of Secundinus, the oldest prelates, as to the time of ordination, then in Ireland. (29) Nor will it be any discredit to the newly promoted bishops, chosen out of the Irish converts, to admit that they were not yet as well versed in matters of ecclesiastical discipline as those venerable prelates, who had been always Christians and had, from their earliest years, studied in the schools of the Continent. Assisted by them our apostle drew up those decrees, which, although written in a very brief manner, contain a great deal of excellent matter, and show that the authors were well acquainted with the more ancient canons of the church. They are, in fact, rather in the form of instructions and injunctions delivered by St. Patrick to the clergy of Ireland, than the result of the proceedings of a synod properly so called.

(28) The 23d canon runs thus ; “ Si quis presbyterorum Ecclesiam aedificaverit, non offerat antequam adducat suum pontificem ut eam consecret." The 24th requires that no strange clergyman be allowed to officiate in any manner, unless he be permitted by the bishop; and there is added, "Nam qui a Gentibus sperat permissionem alienus sit." The mention here made of Pagans proves the great antiquity of this canon. In the 30th a bishop, who may go into the diocese of another, is ordered not to attempt to ordain any one unless he get permission for so doing from the ordinary. Such regulations as these could not have been made for Ireland, were there but three bishops throughout the whole extent of it.

(29) See Chap. vi. §. 1.

§. v. It would be satisfactory to know who were the other bishops in Ireland during the latter days of St. Patrick, and which were their sees. Were we to believe certain story-tellers the country was then crowded with bishops. They tell us, that St. Patrick had consecrated between three and four hundred of them. (30) This extravagant assumption so contrary to the established discipline of the church, (31) and concerning which the more correct accounts of our apostle are totally silent, (32) does not merit the trouble of refutation. Tirechan's list of particular disciples of St. Patrick (33) may help, in some degree, to guide us as to this matter. It is, however, an imperfect guide. In the first place we do not know whether all those persons were ever bishops, and it is almost certain that several of them were not; (34) secondly, as to those who became bishops, it is clear that some of them were not raised to that rank until after St. Patrick's death; (35) while, with regard to others, it is doubtful at what time they were appointed. Next it is to be observed that of several of those disciples scarcely any accounts remain. (36) With the aid, however, of other data or hints that list will enable us at least to guess at some of our bishops, that were contemporary with St. Patrick. And first as to Ibar, there called Iborus, of Beg-erin, although he was not a bishop as early as has been vulgarly imagined, (37) yet I think there can be no doubt of his having been one before our saint's death, as in all probability he was old enough to be raised to that dignity prior to A. D. 465. Next comes Fiech of Sletty, or Feccus, who, considering the time that he first became a member of the clerical body, (38) was assuredly, long before said year, well qualified for the episcopacy. Mel or Melus ought, I believe to be placed in the same class. He was a Briton, and is said to have been a bishop when he arrived in Ireland. (39) Whether or not, he is stated to have been a bishop about A. D. 453; (40) nor do I find any reason to doubt of it; and it seems that his appointment to Ardagh took place when St. Patrick was on his way from Munster to Ulster. He died in the year 488. (41) Maceleus comes next, the same in all probability as Maccaleus, (42) whose name has become memorable in consequence of his having been the bishop, from whom St. Brigid received the veil, about, as some writers have calculated, A. D. 467. (43) We may reasonably suppose that he had been consecrated before the year 465. His church, that is, as now usually expressed, his see, was at Cruachan Brigh-eile in Hyfalgia, a place somewhere in the King's county; but his jurisdiction seems to have extended over a considerable tract of country. (44) To these we may add Cethecus or Cethiacus, who, although it cannot be admitted that he was a bishop prior to the year 440, (45) yet, according to the concurrent testimony of our ancient writers, must have been consecrated before St. Patrick's death. (46) Having been employed by the saint as bishop in various parts of Ireland, we cannot point out any fixed see for him, unless we should so call the place where he was buried, viz. Kilgaradh or Oran in Roscommon. (47)

(30) The Tripartite (L. 3. c. 97.) has 370 bishops consecrated by St. Patrick himself. Nennius, and others after him, (see Usher p. 950.) have 365, a favourite number, as Lloyd has observed (On Church Government, Ch. iv. §. 3.), in the style of exaggeration, being equal to that of the days of the year. Jocelin (cap. 185.) reduced them to 350, which number he probably took from the old catalogue of Irish saints (see Usher p. 913.), to the first order of which, beginning with St. Patrick, 350 holy bishops are assigned. But it does not make them all consecrated by St. Patrick as Jocelin does; and besides it gives that number not only for St. Patrick's time but for the whole period, that extended to near the end of the reign of Tuathail, that is, to near A. D. 544. There can be no doubt, that after St. Patrick's death the number of bishops encreased rapidly, and still more so that of the chorepiscopi, who, however, in the old Irish documents are usually included under the general denomination of bishops. Accordingly there might have been in the course of above a hundred years, reckoning from about the year 440 to 544, between bishops properly so called and chorepiscopi, about 350 in all.

(31) The general rule was that bishops were not to be appointed, unless there was a necessity for them. I will not, in the case of Ireland, lay any stress upon the canon of the Council of Sardica, which had been enacted before St. Patrick's time, and required that bishops should not be placed except in respectable cities; for that canon could not be applied to this country, in which very few cities were then to be found. And not only the creation of a see at Armagh, until then only a field, but numberless other instances prove that it was never observed in Ireland. Nor was it strictly adhered to in other countries (see Bingham, Book 11, ch. 12.); yet no example is to be met with in any country, entirely Catholic, of such a great number of bishops at one time, as that of 350 would have been for Ireland. I say entirely Catholic; lest any one might alledge the case of the numberless bishops in Africa during the schism of the Donatists.

(32) Probus says (L. 2. c. 35.) that St. Patrick had ordained bishops, priests, &c.; “post episcopos et presbyteros in ecclesia ordinatos, post totum ecclesiasticum ordinem bene ac perfecte compositum.” This agrees with what we read in the third Life (cap. 94.) and the fourth (cap. 95.); “post episcopos, presbyteros, diaconos, reliquosque ecclesiasticos ordines constitutos.” Neither these Lives nor Probus mention the number of those bishops nor of the other members of the clerical body appointed by St. Patrick.

(33) It has been published by Usher, (p. 950) as follows ; “ Benignus, Bronus, Sachellus, Cethiacus, Carthacus, Cartenus, Connanus, Firtnanus, Sigeus, Cetennus, Seneaticus, Olcanus, Iborus, Ordus, Naziarius, Miserneus, Senachus, Secundinus, Gosachus, Camulacus, Auxilius, Victoricus, Bressialus, Feccus, Menathus, Cennanus, Nazarus, Melus, Maceleus, Mactaleus, Culeneus, Asacus, Bitheus, Falertus, Seseneus. Muirethchiser, Temoreris (qui fundavit ecclesiam sanctam Cairce, quam tenuit familia Clonoaviss) Daigreus, Justianus mac Hy, Daimene, Oltcanus, Domnallus, et alii quamplurimi.” By alii quamplurimi I dare say Tirechan (alluding not to the whole nation but merely to St. Patrick’s particular disciples) meant to insinuate that there were, at least, as many more as those, whose names he has given. Thence would result a number of above 80 persons. Miserneus is, I believe, only another name for Isserninus or Esserenus, made up by prefixing the endearing letter m. It would be odd that, having particularly mentioned Secundinus and Auxilius, he would have omitted their venerable colleague Isserninus. Instead of Justianus mac Hy, Daimene, read Justinus, Mac-lua Daimene, that is a person of the family of Daimene, who, according to Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 286.) was Endeus of Arran.

(34) Usher (loc. cit.) seems to speak of them as if they were all bishops and in St. Patrick’s time. But it cannot be admitted that there were then about 80 bishops in Ireland. Tirechan must, I think, be understood not of bishops but of disciples, some of whom became bishops either before the saint died, or after, while others did not. Colgan, when quoting his catalogue, calls them simply disciples, and mentions the festival days of several of them without giving them the title of bishop. (See Tr. Th. p. 268.)

(35) For instance Mactaleus, who was bishop of Kilcullen, must have been very young when St. Patrick died ; for he lived until A. D. 549. (Tr. Th. p. 19.) And even supposing that he had not lived so long, he could not have been bishop there until after the death of Isserninus in the year 469. (Usher, Ind. Chron.) Even Benignus was not raised to the episcopacy during the lifetime of our Apostle. (See above, sect. II.)

(36) Little or nothing is known of Firtnanus, Sigeus, Cetennus, Seneaticus, Ordius, Naziarius, Camalacus, Bressialus, Menathus, Nazarus, Culeneus, and Muirethchiser. Seseneus was probably the Sezinus or Sezni of Guic-Sezni in Britany. (See Not. 5 to Chap. vi.) Who Carthacus was I cannot well discover; for it is hard to believe that he was the celebrated Carthach, grandson of king Aengus of Cashel, and who, having flourished in the sixth century, was master of the still more celebrated Carthach or Carthagh of Lismore. Unless we should admit that there is an error in the list, it may be concluded that he was a still older Carthach, and probably of the same illustrious family. Might Culeneus have been the same as St. Mac-Culindus, who is said to have been bishop of Lusk, where his memory was celebrated on the 6th of September, and to have died in 497? (See Butler's Lives of Saints of 6th Sept. and Archdall at Lusk.)

(37) See Chap. i. sect. XIII. and Chap. vi. sect. VII.

(38) See Chap. vi. §. v.

(39) In his Acts (6th Febr.) Colgan quotes a passage to this purpose from a Life of St. Brigid, which, erroneously I think, he attributes to Ultan of Ardraccan. According to other accounts which are more consistent, Mel was raised to the episcopacy by St. Patrick himself; and even Jocelin, however partial to British bishops, joins (cap. 102) in this statement. As to what is said of his having been a nephew of St. Patrick by his sister Darerca, we have already seen what opinion ought to be formed of such stories. Add that in said Life of St. Brigid, whence the whole account of Mel is chiefly taken, this or any other relationship to our apostle is never mentioned.

(40) In the Life of St. Brigid just referred to he is said to have been a bishop, when that saint was in her mother's womb. Now she was born about A. D. 454.

(41) Annals of Ulster, Usher (Ind. Chron.), Ware (Bishops at Armagh). The day of his death was the sixth of February. Harris, to shew his learning and appear as correcting Ware, says that an old Calendar "placeth his death on the 8th of the Ides of February, that is the 5th of February 487, with which the Annals of Ulster agree." The poor man did not know that the 8th of the Ides corresponded not to the 5th but the 6th of that month, as Ware has it; although he might have found it in all the common tables of the Roman Calendar. And as to A. D. 487 it was ac-ording to the computation of some of our old annalists, the same as 488. Ware understood these subjects vastly better than his dull corrector. Two or three of our ancient writers have distinguished Mel from Melchus, and have been followed by Ware and Colgan. Melchus, according to one account, was brother to Mel; and, what must appear very singular, they are both placed together as joint bishops at Ardagh (Tripart. L. 2. c. 26). Ware, to guard against this absurdity, places Melchus after Mel. Then we have Melchus's festival also on the sixth of February. Two brothers, co-bishops of one see, and dying on the same day of the year! The fact is that they were one and the same person, and the real name was probably Melchu, which having been latinized and contracted into Melus, to bring it nearer to mel, honey (for, as the Tripartite has, L. 2. c. 29. Melus was homo vere melleus), gave occasion to this distinction. Would not Tirechan, having particularized Mel, have mentioned also Melchu, had such a person been his brother and along with him at Ardagh? Or would his name have been omitted in all the Irish martyrologies and annals, while they make particular mention of Mel or Melus? Even Jocelin has Mel alone. And in the old enumerations of St. Patrick's pretended nephews, with the exception of an interpolated one (Tr. Th. p. 227.) we find only Melus. He is said to have written some Memoirs concerning St. Patrick. If so, they are not now extant.

(42) Colgan says (Tr. Th. p. 268.) that Maceleus was perhaps one Macetus or Maccetus, a person mentioned in the Tripartite. Strange that he should look out for that obscure person, while he had at his hand Macalleus, whose name, considering the Irish and ancient manner of pronouncing the letter c, was the very same as Maceleus or Makeleus. But having found Maccalleus elsewhere, and wishing to swell the number of St. Patrick's disciples, he thought it better to distinguish him from the Maceleus of Tirechan.

(43) Usher (Ind. Chron.) That St. Brigid received the veil from Maccalleus will be proved in its proper place.

(44) In a passage from Tirechan quoted by Usher (p. 1031) it is said, that St. Brigid got the veil from the son of Cuille or Caille, i. e. Maccaille in Uisniuch Midi (Usneagh in Westmeath). Yet he might have happened to be in that place, although it was not his usual residence ; and it was probably comprized within the district, or, as we now call it, the diocese assigned to him. Cru-achan-brigh-eile in Hy-falgia is expressly mentioned in the Calendar of Cashel and other documents (Tr. Th. p. 525.) as the place where his church was. Colgan says (in p. 231.) that it was on the confines of Leinster and Munster, by which he meant, I suppose, Munster according to its former extent before a part of it was added to the King's county. The Eile, with which the name of that place terminates, was perhaps the district commonly called Ely O'Carroll. Maccaeus has been thrust in among the pretended nephews of St. Patrick in the interpolated enumeration alluded to above, Not. 41.

(45) Compare with Chap. vi. Sect. 1.

(46) See Not. 87 to Chap. v. (47) Not. 88 to Chap. v.

§. VI. There are some other persons mentioned in Tirechan's list, who certainly were bishops, but whether before or after the death of St. Patrick, let us briefly inquire. Bronus of Caissel-ira (West Cashel in Sligo) was a bishop in St. Brigid's time, (48) and I should have no difficulty to admit that he was one before St. Patrick's demise, except that his having lived until A. D. 512 renders it rather improbable that he had been raised to that rank before the year 465, unless we should suppose that he lived to a very great age. On a similar principle there is reason to doubt also of Cartenus or Maccartin of Clogher having been a bishop before that period ; for, although he died earlier than Bronus, viz. in 506, yet his being represented as old, when appointed to that see, excites a suspicion that he was not consecrated prior to the death of our apostle. (49) Asacus, or as others call him, Asicus, is one of those, whom a very old tradition acknowledges as a bishop in that early period of the Irish church. He was placed at Elphin, and, according to some accounts, as bishop, (50) by St. Patrick. It is, however, doubtful whether he was one during the saint's life time. It is related of him that, through a penitential spirit, he withdrew from his diocese and retired to the mountain Sliebhliag (Slieve-league in Donegal), where, after a considerable time, he was discovered by his disciples. He could not be prevailed on to return to his see, but went with them to a solitary place, and, when dead, was buried at Rath-cunga (51) (barony of Tyrhugh in said county). Next to Asacus is mentioned Bitheus, concerning whose episcopacy some doubts might be entertained were he not mentioned in quotations from old documents as a bishop and contemporary with Bronus and Asacus, who was his uncle. (52) This last circumstance is sufficient to show, that he did not become a bishop until after St. Patrick's death; for, if it is doubtful whether the uncle was one at so early a period, we may conclude that the nephew was not. Where his see or church was I cannot rightly discover. (53) He is said to have been buried at Rath-cunga, (54) where his uncle's remains had been deposited. Olcanus was undoubtedly a bishop, and, if Usher's calculation could be supported, might have been one before A. D. 465. But, as has been already observed, (55) this cannot be reconciled with the testimony of the Tripartite, according to which he was not born until about the year 443. It is said that he went to Gaul for the sake of study, and, having after a considerable lapse of time returned to Ireland, presided over a great school, and was raised to the episcopal rank. (56) His see was in that part of the now county of Antrim anciently named Dabrieda, (57) and is called by some Derkan or Derkon, by others Rathmuighe or Airthir-muighe. (58) He has been sometimes called Bolcan, and his festival was held on the 20th of February. (59) Cennanus or Kennanus was, I believe, the celebrated St. Kienan of Daimhliag (60) or Duleek, whose death our Annalists affix to A. D. 489. (61) Did other circumstances agree, it might be admitted, that he was a bishop before the death of St. Patrick; but we are told that he was born nearly about the same time with Olcan, and consequently about the year 442. (62) In this case his promotion to the episcopacy could not have been prior to about 472. His native place was, I dare say, not in Ulster, as the Tripartite seems to state, but in Meath. (63) He was of an illustrious family, and is said to have been baptized, when an infant, by St. Patrick. The Kenan mentioned by Usher, and who, he says, went to Gaul and became a monk in St. Martin's monastery of Tours, was, as far as I can judge, a different person. (64) That Kenan was a native of Connaught, and is said to have erected a church in the territory of the Eugenan sept, (65) while our Kienan was either a Meath or an Ulster man, and his peculiar church was at Duleek, of which he was the founder. (66) He wrote a life of St. Patrick, and his festival was kept on the 24th of November. (67) I am strongly inclined to reckon among those distinguished men of Tirechan's list, who became bishops either in or not long after St. Patrick's time, also Falertus, or Felartus, or, as sometimes called, Fulartus of Domnach-mor in Magh-Seola, now Donaghpatrick in the county of Galway; (68) not because he is mentioned as such in the Tripartite, which, unless corroborated by other authorities, cannot be safely depended upon with regard to the times of our bishops; but because I find him also in the Life of Benignus as having been placed there by St. Patrick. (69) If this statement be true, which I find no reason for contradicting, we must admit that his promotion took place before the death of our Apostle, although, for reasons already more than once assigned, it could not have been prior to the year 440.

(48) See Chap. v. sect. ix. Not. 86.

(49) See Chap. vi. sect. xii.

(50) Jocelin, cap. 107. The Tripartite (L. 3. c. 39.) quotes from an ancient author a passage, in which it is said that St.

Patrick placed Asicus at Elphin. But it does not state whether he was then a bishop or not. According to the chronology of the Tripartite Asicus would have been fixed at that place about A. D. 437 (see Chap. v. sect. ix.) at which time he could not have been a bishop. After some words we read in said passage; "Assicus sanctus episcopus fuit faber acris Patricii." Here he is called bishop; but the addition of his having worked in brass for St. Patrick would seem to indicate that his promotion did not take place until after, at least, the foundation of Armagh, when the saint, having a permanent residence, had occasion to employ him. Next we may suppose, that he was not made bishop of Elphin until after he had ceased to work at Armagh, as he must have resided in his diocese. The passage above referred to may, I think, be explained in the following manner. Asicus was placed at Elphin when a priest by St. Patrick not many years after the commencement of his mission; when Armagh was founded he was summoned thither to assist in making utensils for the use of the church; afterwards, but whether before or after the death of the saint cannot be ascertained, he became bishop of Elphin.

(51) Tripart. L. 2. c. 40. Archdall makes Rathcunga an abbey founded by St. Patrick, and refers to Colgan. But neither he nor the Tripartite mentions St. Patrick founder of an abbey there. At most they attribute to him the erection of a church at Rathcunga. (See Chap. vi. §. II.) But whatever was the religious house in that place, it owed its origin, at the earliest, to the followers of Asicus.

(52) Tripart. L. 2. c. III. Compare with ib. c. 39 and 43.

(53) The Tripartite has (L. 2. c. 52.) "St. Bronius, S. Biteus de Caissel-ira." Bronius was certainly bishop of that place; but do these words mean that Biteus was also bishop thereof? If so he was not appointed to it until, at the earliest, A. D. 512, the year in which Bronius died, and accordingly must have been very young when a disciple of St. Patrick. Or is there a transposition in the text, so as that it should be read, "St. Bronius de Caissel-ira, S. Biteus," &c.

(54) Tripart. L. 2. c. III. (55) Chap. vi. sect. III.

(56) Jocelin, cap. 86. It is strange that Usher, who (p. 951.) took his account of Olcan from Jocelin, has affixed his return from Gaul to A. D. 450 (Ind. Chron.) Jocelin exhibits Olcan as having been baptized, when an infant, by St. Patrick; and, without recurring to the Tripartite, it is plain that this baptism took place some years after the commencement of the saint's mission. Then Olcan is represented as a grown up person (grandiusculus) when he set out for Gaul. Now, adding the time that he spent there, how could he have returned to Ireland as early as the year 450? The Tripartite does not mention Olcan's studies in Gaul.

(57) See Not. 24 to Chap. v.

(58) Usher, following Jocelin, calls it Derkan, and says that the name still remains in a part of the Routs (Dalrieda) called Clon-Derkan. The Tripartite (L. 2. c. 128.) calls the see Rathmagia or Airthirmugia, the chief town of Dalrieda, not far from Dunluce (see Seward at Rathmuighe). Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 114.) conjectures that Derkan was the name of the district, in which the town Rathmuighe was situated.

(59) Colgan, AA. SS. ad 20 Feb. There was another Olcan (Tripart. L. 2. c. 92) also called Bolcan or, as Jocelin writes it (cap. 141.), Volcan. He was, as Colgan observes, (ib. p. 377.) only a priest, and his festival was on the 4th of July. He is known by the name of Olcan of Kilmormoyle: (See Not. 120 to ch. v.) and was probably the Oltcanus of Tirechan.

(60) Daimhliag signifies a house of stone. If the church built of stone at Duleek was, as is generally said, erected by Kienan, it will follow that stone buildings, although rare in Ireland before the eleventh century, yet were not quite unknown. If, however, it should be contended that the original church founded by Kienan was not of stone, and that the place, where it was situated, did not get the name of Daimhliag until a later period, I shall not enter into a controversy about it.

(61) Ulster Annals, followed by Ware, (Antiq. ch. 26.) Annals of Innisfallen—4 Masters ap. Tr. Th. p. 217. Colgan (ib.) doubts of this antiquity, and refers to a Life of a St. Mochua, whence it would appear that Kienan did not erect Daimhliag until about or after A. D. 540. But in this case how could he have been a disciple of St. Patrick, which, however, Colgan maintains? Had he given us the passage he alludes to, we could be better judges of the matter. Meanwhile we may adhere to the date marked in the Annals.

(62) See Tripart. L. 2. c. 126.

(63) Kienan was born in Kennacta. There were two territories known by this name, one in Meath, and the other in the now county of Londonderry, the name of which is still retained in the barony called Kenaght. The Kennacta of Meath was the very district, in which Duleek is situated (see Tripart L. 2. c. 48.) It is then more probable that this was the Kennacta, in which Kienan was born, although the Tripartite elsewhere (ib. cap. 126.) seems to make the other Kennacta his country, owing, I should think, to its having been recorded in general terms, that he had been born in Kennacta, without its being specified whether it was that of Ulster or Meath.

(64) Usher (p. 1070) refers to a Life of the Kenan, whom he makes mention of, but says nothing of Duleek, although he names various places, in which that Kenan is said to have been. Colgan, however, applies (AA. SS. p. 443.) to Kienan of Duleek what Usher has of his Kenan, and so does Harris (Bishops. p. 137.) and Archdall (at Duleek). Usher sends his Kenan to Gaul in the year 450 (Ind. Chron.). Archdall, in his blundering manner, makes that the year, in which St. Patrick baptized Kienan.

(65) Usher explains this by Tyrone; but it might be as well understood of Innish-owen; and I strongly suspect that this was the district alluded to. For it is added, that Kenan placed over that church his beloved disciple Congellus. Now we find a Congel or Coemgal abbot of Both-chonais in Innish-owen (AA. SS. p. 454.). It is true that he lived about the latter end of the 7th century while Kienan is spoken of as having been a boy in the time of king Lagerius (Leogaire says Usher). But such anachronisms are far from being uncommon in those Lives. I am confirmed in my suspicion by the circumstance that Kenan is said to have been instructed by the most religious Nathan. Who could this person be except the celebrated Nathy of Achonry, who lived in the sixth century, and had taught several eminent persons, among others the great St. Fechin, who died A. D. 665? If, instead of Lagerius, we should read the name of some other Irish king of a later period, there will be nothing inconsistent in the account of Usher's Kenan, who was probably one of the two Kenans (ap Colgan AA. SS. p. 443) different from Kienan of Duleek.

(66) In all the documents I have met with relative to Kienan the foundation of that church is attributed to himself. Archdall, however, foists in St. Patrick as its founder.

(67) The Calendar of Cashel (Tr. Th. p. 217.) has at Nov. 24. “Sanctus Kienanus de Damliag, filius Sadnae—Hujus S. Kienani remanet incorruptum et illaesum corpus: scripsit vitam S. Patricii.”

(68) See Chap. v. sect. x.

(69) The passage is rather curious and deserves to be quoted. “Quidam tempore perrexit S. Patricius in occidentalem plagam Connachtensium, id est, in campum Sinil; et adivit domum Echini filii Briani, filii Ethac, regis Connachtensium. Et Patricius quaesivit hospitium ab illo. Et Echinus negavit, et noluit ipsum salutare, vel ad fidem converti. Et tum S. Patricius reversus est ad illum locum, in quo hodie est Domnach-mor-muige Sinil, sive Domnach-Patruic; et fundavit ecclesiam, in qua reliquit Felartum episcopum.” See more AA. SS. ad 29 Mart.

§. VII. A few others of those named in the list have been called bishops; (70) but we have not authority sufficient for deciding whether justly or not. Besides the persons, whose names are there given, there were some other bishops in Ireland at or about the period we are now treating of. One of them was Tassach of Rath-colptha near Down, from whom St. Patrick received the holy viaticum, and who is spoken of, in some of the Lives, as a bishop at the time that he administered it to him. (71) Another was Hercus or Ercus bishop of Slane, who might have been consecrated before the year 465. For, although he lived according to some accounts until A. D. 513, or, as others have it, 514, yet, as he was in his ninetieth year when he died, there is no anachronism in supposing that he was a bishop prior to St. Patrick's decease. (72) We may add, I believe, Mochoe or Mochay of Antrim, who, although sometimes mentioned by the name of abbot, yet is also styled bishop. (73) As he died in the year 497, it may be reasonably admitted that he was one as far back as A. D. 465. (74) If Moctheus of Louth became a bishop, as indeed his Acts published by Colgan, and several respectable authorities would make us believe, I should have no difficulty to admit that he was consecrated about the year 470. It is true that his death is assigned to A. D. 535. But as he lived to the age of, at least, 100 years, these dates can be very easily reconciled. Having treated of him elsewhere, it would be superfluous to add more at present. (75) To this same period I would willingly assign the promotion of the great Ailbe of Emly, if we be allowed to suppose, that he lived to a very great age, as it is said that he did. (76) He certainly was not a bishop when he joined St. Patrick in Munster, (77) nor much less at any time before that period. (78) Considering, however, that he was under our Apostle's tuition as early as perhaps the year 445, (79) and granting that he was only ten years old, it will not be denied that he could have been raised to the episcopacy about 465. The Bollandists have assigned the year 464 to his consecration ; but the principle, on which they formed this date, is quite too doubtful to be depended upon. (80) Yet, as he was a man of extraordinary merit, it may be fairly conjectured that he was promoted as soon as his age would permit ; and the only remaining difficulty will be, that, in case he was 30 years old about A. D. 464, he must have reached the age of about 93 years, whereas he died in 527. This hypothesis implies nothing extraordinary, particularly when there is question of persons of religious and abstemious habits, who, generally, live much longer than people of other descriptions. The circumstance of Emly having been considered as the most respectable see in Munster before the rise of Cashel, (81) seems to show that it was founded in St. Patrick's life time and no other person than Ailbe has ever been spoken of as its first bishop. We know that he was actively employed, as will be seen hereafter, in forwarding, as bishop, the interests of religion in Munster during the reign of Aengus, who was killed A. D. 490. To this list of these early prelates I cannot add Declan for reasons already enlarged upon. (82) I should be much more disposed to add Trian, who is said to have had his residence in a northern part of Munster. (83) His being described as a Roman, that is, a continental bishop, brings us back to an early period of the Irish church, and to those times when many holy men took shelter in Ireland before the Franks embraced the Christian religion.

(70) Ex. c. Sachellus, Tripart. L. 2. c. 52. Seneachus, ib. cap. 62. (See above Chap. v. §. x.) Victoricus or Victor, Tripart. L. 3. c. 12. (See Chap. VII. §. III.) But, were we to receive as bishops all those, who are so called in the Tripartite, there would be no end to them. Jocelin, however, an authority poor enough, has Victor, cap. 139. Archdall has an abbey Kilcholpa in Down for Tassach. Rathcolp is placed by him in Mayo, also for Tassach. What stuff to swell up his book!

(71) See Probus, L. 2. c. 35. Tripart. L. 1. c. 71. Third Life, cap. 89, &c.

(72) See Chap. v. §. v.

(73) Tripart. L. 1 c. 53. Jocelin, cap. 37. Colgan Tr. Th. p. 265.

(74) See Chap. v. §. III. A Durdracht of Antrim is mentioned in some Irish Calendars. But nothing certain is known as to the time, in which he lived. For we are not bound to give credit to a Menologium genealogicum quoted by Colgan, (Tr. Th. p. 110.) which makes him one of the pretended brothers of Dicho, St. Patrick's first convert. (See Not. 17 to Chap. v. Archdall swallowed this story and (at Antrim) has Durtract before Mochay. Another mistake is his affixing Mochay's death to A. D. 493 or 496. As to 493, I do not know where he found it; but the real year was 497, called indeed by the Annalists, to whom he refers, 496. He ought to have known, that, in their mode of computation, 496 was the same as what we call 497. It has been conjectured that Mochay's see was not Antrim but Dundrum in the county of Down. This cannot be reconciled with his being constantly known by the name of Mochay Aendrium, that is, as I find it generally explained, Antrim. Aengus Kelideus, quoted by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 95.), calls him “Mochay Aen-dromensis de Loch-Cuan.” This was the Lake of Strangford, in the neighbourhood of which Mochay was born. (See Chap. v. §. III.) I am sure, that Archdall (at Timahoe) is also mistaken in assigning the monastery of Teach-Mochoe (Timahoe in the Queen’s county) to this St. Mochoe. For it is he, whom Archdall alluded to, as is clear from his placing the death of the founder of Teach-Mochoe in 497. There is no reason to think, that St. Mochoe of Antrim had any establishment out of Ulster, nor that Teach-Mochoe was founded at that early period. The first abbot of it mentioned by Archdall, after Machoe, died in the year 925. The founder of it was undoubtedly some other Mochoe or Mochua, by which name many Irish saints were called. I may here observe, that Ware and Harris have omitted the monastery of Timahoe. Yet there certainly was one in that place.

(75) See Chap. VII. §, XII. I will merely observe that the rhapsody, called his Acts. (at March 24) although short, is crammed with fables, and seems to have been patched up by a foreigner.

(76) Ware, Ant. 9. ch. 29. at Emly.

(77) See Not. 76 to Chap. VI.

(78) Chap. I. §. XI.

(79) See Chap. VI. §. VI.

(80) See Not. 84 to Chap. I. and Not. 76 to Chap. VI.

(81) Not. 67 to Chap. VI.

(82) Chap. I. §. XII.

(83) See Chap. VI. §. XI.

§. VIII. Atlength we are come to the last days of St. Patrick. Passing over some unauthenticated circumstances, which, if true, would seem to have occurred not long before his death, (84) this was the period, at which he wrote his Confession. He was old, when he set about it, (85) and it seems he felt his dissolution approaching. (86) He had been already throughout every province of Ireland; (87) and he speaks of the bulk of the nation as then Christian, (88) and of his having ordained clergymen every where. (89) His object in writing it was to return thanks to the Almighty for his singular mercies to himself and to the Irish people, and to confirm them in their faith by proving that God had assisted him in a most extraordinary manner for the purpose of effecting their conversion. (90) He also wished that all the world, and particularly his relatives in the Continent, who had so urgently opposed his going to Ireland, should know (91) what the Almighty had been pleased to operate through his ministry, and that his mission had been undertaken not rashly but in obedience to the will of God. For this latter reason he composed it in Latin, apologizing, however, with great humility for the coarseness of the style. But, as he had been obliged to adopt another language, the Irish, instead of his own, the Latin, it was not to be expected that his style should be as terse as that of persons, who were constantly practising and improving themselves in the latter tongue. (92)

(84) The Tripartite (L. 3. c. 94, 95.) has a prophecy of St. Patrick concerning a certain Dichul, whom it calls abbas Ernatiensis, and who was afterwards abbot of Louth. Who he was otherwise, or at what time he lived is not known; at any rate he was long after our saint's days, emenso multo tempore, as Jocelin says, (cap. 140). Colgan, conjectures (Tr. Th. p. 115.) that he was the Dichul revered in the church of Cluainbraoin near Louth, and that this might have been what the Tripartite calls Ernatiensis. But he says nothing as to the time of that church's erection, or by whom founded, or whether an abbey or not. Archdall, however, from these premises deduces this notable statement; "We are told that St. Patrick founded an abbey at Cluainbraoin near the town of Louth." One half of his Monasticon has been patched up in this ridiculous manner.

(85) "Quatenus modo ipse appeto in senectute mea." p. 4.

(86) He concluded it with these words; "Et haec est Confessio mea antequam moriar." Ware (Annotat. p. 108.) says; "Verba haec innuere videntur illum, non diu ante obitum suum, eam literis mandasse." The saint writes as bequeathing to his Gallic and Irish cooperators in the work of the Gospel the many thousands of Christians then in Ireland; "Ut etiam post obitum meum Gallicis relinquerem fratribus, et filiis meis quos ego in Domino baptizavi, tot millia hominum." p. 6.

(87) “ Inter vos et ubique pergebam causa vestra—etiam usque ad exteras (extremas)—partes.” p. 19.

(88) “ Unde autem Hiberione, qui nunquam notitiam Dei habuerunt, nisi idola et immunda usque nunc semper coluerunt, quomodo nuper facta est plebs Domini et filii Dei nuncupantur.” p. 16. By Hiberione he means in this place the Irish nation according to the well known idiom of using the name of a country for the people, such as France for the French nation, &c.

(89) “ Ut clerici ubique illis ordinarentur.” p. 14.

(90) “ Ego non silebo neque abscondam signa et mirabilia, quae mihi a Domino ministrata sunt.” p. 17.

(91) Etsi in multis imperfectus sum, opto fratres et cognatos meos scire qualitatem meam, ut possint, perspicere votum animae meae.” p. 3.

(92) “ Sicut caeteri—qui sermonem illorum ex infantia nunquam mutaverunt, sed magis ad perfectum semper addiderunt; nam sermo et loquela nostra translata est in linguam alienam.” p. 4.

§. IX. St. Patrick was at Saul, when he was attacked with his last illness. (93) That place was, as has been already observed, (94) a favourite retreat of his. But we are not to give credit to the story of his having there spent the last 30 years of his life in retirement, a story made up merely for the purpose of dividing into even numbers the pretended 120 years of age vulgarly assigned to him. (95) In the greatest part of his Lives there is not a word about any number of years thus spent in a contemplative manner, and whatever time they allow for his abode in Ireland is made commensurate with that of his preaching and pastoral exertions. (96) But, as has been already remarked, (97) no reliance can be placed on those fanciful divisions of St. Patrick's years, and it is strange that some writers of real learning allowed themselves to be led astray by them. The saint, perceiving that his departure from this world was near at hand, wished to go to Armagh for the purpose of breathing his last and leaving his mortal remains in the place, that had been chosen for his peculiar see and the ecclesiastical metropolis of Ireland. When on his way thither, he was, it is said, stopped by an Angel, who ordered him to return to Saul, as that was the place, in which it was decreed that he should make his exit from this world. (98) Be this as it may, he went back to Saul, and died seven days after on the 17th March, (99) having been attended by the bishop Tassach and received from him the holy viaticum. (100) In Fiech's hymn we read that, when our Apostle died, his soul joined that of another Patrick, and that they proceeded together to heaven. (101) In this singular passage the author alludes to a second Patrick, who, as he supposed, died just about the same time with ours. He could not have meant a Patrick of Nola, a person whom he had never heard of, as his name was not in any public calendar or martyrology. (102) Nor could he have alluded to, the so called, Patrick senior, whereas that person's death was affixed to the 24th August. (103) For the same reason that second Patrick was not Patrick of Nevers. (104) Nor was he the pretended Patrick junior, who, according to whatever has been said about him, survived our Apostle some years. (105) We may therefore conclude that the said second Patrick was, in the opinion of the author of the hymn, the Patrick of Auvergne, whose depositio, or death, is assigned in some old martyrologies to the 16th of March. Now, supposing that there was such a person, it can be easily understood how, as his exit took place on the eve of the 17th of March, that author might have joined the two Patricks together, particularly if he imagined that one died late at night and the other early in the morning. It is, however, more than probable that Patrick of Auvergne was in reality the same as our St. Patrick, and that in consequence of a mistake in writing Avernia for Hibernia or Hivernia, his name got into the martyrologies as distinct from that of the apostle of Ireland. Through another mistake the 16th of March, the vigil of St. Patrick's day, might have been taken for that of his festival. That some such mistakes occurred is the opinion of very learned men, who could not discover any trace whatsoever of a Patrick bishop of Auvergne. (106)

(93) Tripart. L. 3. c. 101. Fiech's Scholiast ad Stroph. 23. Third Life, cap. 88, &c. &c.

(94) Chap. v. §. II.

(95) An Irish poem, called St. Patrick's Testament, is quoted on this occasion. That it is not merely fidei incertae, as Ware says (Annot. ad SA. Op. p. 109.) but really spurious, it would be easy to show, if necessary. Even Colgan mentions it as having been composed in the name of St. Patrick (Tr. Th. p. 234) and, when expressly treating of the writings ascribed to him (ib. p. 214) says nothing about it. In it is a fictitious dialogue between our apostle and St. Brigid, of a stamp similar to that of the dialogues with Ossian and the champion Caoilte. According to a Latin translation of part of it by one Kelly, St. Patrick is made to say, that of the 120 years of his life he spent 30 in preaching throughout Ireland, and 30 more at Saul. (See above Chap. iv. §. I.) This story got into Usher's Tripartite, but with a slight variation; for it does not make our saint pass the whole of the last 30 years at Saul but in various monasteries, leading in them a contemplative life. (See ib. Not. 8.) Jocelin having struck out (cap. 191) a new division of St. Patrick's life, allowed 33 years for the time spent by him in that manner chiefly at Saul and Armagh.

(96) Besides Usher's Tripartite, Jocelin's is the only Life, in which those years spent in contemplation are spoken of. In Fiech's hymn (strophe. 20.) St. Patrick is said to have preached for sixty years. The second Life (cap. 22.) and the fourth (cap. 26.) have the same, after premising that he was 30 years of age when he went to study under St. German, and that he spent the 30 following years with him. Concerning this notable sort of chronology enough has been seen already. All this to make up the favourite number, 120.

(97) Chap. iv. §. I. 11.

(98) Probus, L. 2. c. 32. Tripart. L. 3. c. 101. Jocelin, cap. 187. See also Fiech's Scholiast ad Stroph. 23. 24.

(99) Probus writes (L. 2. c. 33); “Haec Angeli dicta post septem dies, in die scilicet xvi. Calend. Aprilis expleta sunt circa B. Patricium.”

(100) Probus, ib. c. 35. Fiech’s hymn, stroph. 27. Tripart. L. 3. c. 103. The third Life has (cap. 89); “Appropinquante autem hora exitus ejus, dedit ei sacrificium episcopus Tassach.

(101) “Quando decessit Patricius, venit ad Patricium alterum, et simul ascenderunt ad Jesum filium Marie.” Stroph. 33.

(102) See Chap. II. §. xv.

(103) See above, §. II. Not. 20. The stupid Scholiast indeed understood it so; but has been well chastized by Colgan (See above, Not. 14.).

(104) A Patricius Nivernensis is in Usuard’s and the Roman martyrologies under the name of Abbot Patrick, at the 24th August. (Usher p. 897.) This is the very day, at which the Glastonians had their Patrick. In the martyrologies the Patrick of that date is placed at Nevers (Nivernis) without any mention of Glastonbury. Colgan has strangely misunderstood Usher on this subject. He applies (Tr. Th. p. 7.) to Patrick of Nevers what Usher has about another Patrick called Arvernensis (Auvergne). Usher had expressly stated, that the day marked in the martyrologies for Patricius Nivernensis is August 24, while the day assigned to Patricius Arvernensis is the 16th of March. Colgan, confounding Nivernensis with Arvernensis, says that Patricius Nivernensis is revered on March 16.

(105) Above Not. 21.

(106) The Bollandists, having examined this subject very closely, conclude thus (Ad 16 Mart. Sancti Prætermis); “S. Patricii Episcopi et Confessoris depositio Avernis, sive Avernis, memoratur apud Usuardum, Bellinum, Galesinium, et in hodierno martyrologio Romano, in cujus Notis haeret dubius Baronius, cum inter episcopos Arvernenses non recenseatur, et tandem putat errore prætermisum, nisi alterius fortassis civitatis episcopus fuerit. Joannes Savaro, vir eruditus, in Originibus Arvernensibus, cusis et recusis, late hoc dubium deducit, asseritque nullum vestigium esse apud Arvernos nominis, reliquiarum, aut alicujus cultus St. Patricii episcopi, sed hunc in prædictis martyrologiis allegatum alium non esse quam S. Patricium episcopum Hiberniae, sive Hiverniae, pro quæ voce alibi substitutam fuisse Arverniae sive Averniae, maxime cum primo loco apud Usuardum sequenti die legatur, Natalis S. Patricii Episcopi et Confessoris in Scotia; a quo die ob ejus Vigiliam ad ultimum hujus dici locum potuit in nonnullis fastis translatus fuisse, ac tandem loco Vigiliae intrusum fuisse nomen depositionis, quod absque ulteriore examine potuit descriptum deinceps fuisse." In the Gallia Christiana, under the head of the Bishops of Clermont (in Auvergne) Tom. 2. no Patrick appears. From these mistakes proceeded the mention made of Patrick of Avernia in the Glastonbury stories (See Usher, p. 895.). Maurice, one of Ledwich's champions (Antiquities &c. p. 364.) says; "Who can tell but Patricius Avernensis may have sunk a day lower in the Calendar, and made the Irish a Patricius Hibernensis?" Such quibbles are too contemptible to be answered. So then a Patrick, of whom nothing is known, would be the real one; and he, whose fame has resounded through the Christian world, must be converted into a phantom. Shame! Shame!

§. x. It would be well, were we as certain of the year as we are of the day of St. Patrick's death. The various dates assigned for it have been already mentioned, (107) and it would be a waste of time to examine them in detail. But before endeavouring to discover the true year, it becomes necessary to show, that he did not live until A. D. 493, the year laid down in the Annals of Ulster and of the 4 Masters, which have been followed respectively by Usher, Ware, Colgan, &c. If this date, to the plausibility of which Usher's ingenuity has chiefly contributed, can and ought to be set aside, the principal objections to any other hypothesis will immediately fall to the ground. In the first place I must observe, that said date is not founded upon any positive record, in which the saint's exit was affixed to it, but upon the supposition that his mission lasted for sixty full years, which, being reckoned from a late part of A. D. 432, (108) the year of his arrival, bring us down to 493. But what proofs are there to force us to admit, that St. Patrick lived to the uncommon age of, at least, 104 years? For such would be the case in this hypothesis, as it is certain that he was not less than 44 years old, (109) when his mission commenced. And what are the grounds, on which that number of sixty years was introduced? None that I can discover except the whimsical conformities between our apostle and Moses (110) first started by some theorist, and afterwards gradually received by way of pious belief. These conformities are of old standing, and, I dare say, more ancient than any of the present Lives of St. Patrick, including even Fiech's hymn; for we find them not only in Nennius but likewise in the fragments of Tirechan. One of them consisted in allowing 120 years for the life of our saint. Then it was thought expedient to divide this number into certain parts, and the best sounding division was reputed that of two equal ones of sixty each, viz. before and after his arrival on the mission, which were again equally subdivided. (111) Thus the full sum of 120 was retained and admitted even by some, who placed St. Patrick's death long before A. D. 493. (112) In like manner the number of sixty years for his preaching was allowed by some chroniclers, who assigned it to A. D. 491. (113) This hypothesis, however, clashed with other accounts, according to which the whole time of his mission did not exceed 40 years. (114) New calculations were then entered into, in which, while some of them broke in upon the round numbers of 120, 60, &c. care was taken to allow an extraordinary length of time for his age; and hence arose, first, the jarring systems as to the number of his years, (115) and, secondly, the addition, to the time spent in preaching and active exertion, of many years passed in retirement and contemplation. (116)

(107) Chap. iv. §. I. 11.

(108) See Chap. v. §. 1.

(109) See Chap. iv. §. 3.

(110) Chap. iv. §. 1.

(111) See above Not. 95. 96. and Chap. iv. §. 1.

(112) Nennius, according to whom St. Patrick, must have died about A. D. 465 (above §. 2.) has the 120 years; and Giraldus Cambrensis affixing our saint's death to 458, adds "in the 120th year of his age." (Topogr. Hibern. dist. 3. c. 17.)

(113) Marianus Scotus, or his interpolator, has at A. 491; "S. Patricius obiit—LX annis in Hibernia prædicavit." Yet in the same chronicle, at A. 432, he is said to have preached only 40 years. Usher has endeavoured (p. 880 seqq.) to amend the text of Marianus in one way, and Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 233.) in another. Neither of them, however, has done it in a satisfactory manner. The probability is that Marianus really allowed no more than the 40 years, which is the number marked also by a Scholiast to Nennius, (See Chap. iv. §. 1.) and that afterwards some dabbler in chronicle-making inserted in another part of the text 60 years, the number mentioned in other documents. He affixed them to the year 491 in consequence of his supposing that this was the year of St. Patrick's death; while according to what Marianus has at A. 432, the saint would have died in 472. Florence of Worcester, who also, as well as Sigebert and others, places his death in 491, allows sixty years for his preaching. (See Usher p. 881. and Colgan Tr. Th. p. 232. 255.) These chroniclers supposed that St. Patrick arrived in Ireland in 431, following Bede (Epitome) and others, who assigned the arrival of Palladius to A. D. 430, (See Usher, p. 899.)

(114) See Not. præc. Jocelin allowed for it only 35 years, and the Glastonians reduced it to eight. (Usher p. 379.)

(115) Chap. iv. §. 1.

(116) See above Not. 95. The Glastonians counted 39 years thus spent by St. Patrick, and, they said, at Glastonbury. (Usher, p. 879.)

§. XI. As therefore no dependence can be placed upon those preconceived hypotheses and vague traditions concerning the number of years assigned for St. Patrick's whole life, or for the course of his mission, &c. a different method must be resorted to, by which we may come, at least, near to the true year of his death. That he did not live until A. D. 493 nor until 491, (117) is evident from this circumstance, that Benignus his successor in the see of Armagh died in the year 468. (118) To ward off this argument Usher, and after him Ware and others pretend, that Benignus was appointed to that see during the life time of St. Patrick; but they could not produce any authority for this assumption, (119) while on the contrary every old document, that can be referred to on the subject, represents Benignus as a real successor of our Apostle, that is, after his death. And first we have the life of Benignus himself, in which the matter is so stated. (120) Next come all such Lives of St. Patrick, as make mention of or allude to the accession of Benignus to Armagh; in them it is constantly exhibited as having taken place after the decease of his master. The Tripartite, after relating how Benignus, when a boy, became a pupil of the saint, introduces the latter saying; "He will be the heir of my power, that is, he will be after me the supreme moderator of the Irish church." Then it adds; "And this prophecy was proved by the event; for he became afterwards so distinguished by his learning and miracles, that in the opinion of all persons he was judged worthy of succeeding his master S. Patrick in the archbishoprick of Armagh and primacy of Ireland." (121) Here we find Benignus called the heir of St. Patrick, and the saint foretelling his appointment, not appointing him, and the opinion or judgment of others mentioned as the immediate cause of his promotion. Several other Lives agree in substance with this statement. (122) If it should be objected that the assigning of St. Patrick's death to some time before A. D. 468 cannot agree with what those Lives have concerning the great number of years, which they allow for his life, I will reply, that I am not bound to answer for their bungling computations, particularly as, with the exception of Jocelin, (123) none of them mention the year of our Lord in which he died. The question is not which were the years, in which they might have imagined that St. Patrick or Benignus died; but whether they believed that the former died before the latter. Now as to this point they are unanimous, and it is of such a nature that it could have been easily known ; while the other question was involved in the darkness arising from jarring reckonings, nor did they trouble themselves about it. As soon, however, as the fact of our apostle having died before the incumbency of Benignus is ascertained, it necessarily follows that he could not have lived to as late a period as even A. D. 480. For, should we, for argument sake, admit that Benignus did not die quite as early as 468, yet we know that Iarlath his successor died 482, and was succeeded by Cormac, who died in 497. In confirmation of what has been now laid down, I beg to refer the reader to the account given of St. Patrick's prophecy concerning St. Brendan ; (124) of Nennius' computation of the times of St. Patrick, St. Brigid, and Columbkil ; (125) and of Kienan of Duleek who, as we are told, wrote a Life of St. Patrick, and consequently must have survived him, although he died himself in 489. (126) Further arguments will be found elsewhere, derived in great part from the genuine history of St. Brigid.

(117) Baronius (Annal. ad A. 491) and Petavius (De Doctrin. temp. Tom. 2. ad An. per. Jul. 5204) following the present text of Marianus Scotus (see Not. 113.) affix St. Patrick's death to A. D. 491. At the same time they state that he died at the age of 82 years. They did not reflect that these positions could not be reconciled, unless we were to suppose, what no one will admit, that St. Patrick was not born until A. D. 409, and so would have been a bishop when only 23 years of age, viz. in 432, at which time his mission commenced. They should either have placed his death much sooner than 491, or given him a much longer life.

(118) Ulster Annals (Usher p. 877.) 4 Masters (Tr. Th. p. 293.) Ware (Bishops at Benignus.) &c. &c.

(119) See above §. 2.

(120) Tr. Th. p. 293. The same is found in a passage of the Acts of Moctheus, which Usher himself has quoted (p. 876.) Colgan, perceiving that the Annals place the death of Benignus bishop of Armagh in 468, and that according to his own Life as well as that of Moctheus, he succeeded St. Patrick when dead, was so puzzled that he threw out (ib.) a conjecture of a most extravagant kind. The Benignus, he says, who died in 468, was different from the Benignus, who succeeded after St. Patrick's death, viz. after A. D. 493. But where could he have found a second Benignus bishop of Armagh in those times? All our writers mention but one, the great Benignus the favourite disciple of our Apostle. Nor was there room for any Benignus in that see about A. 493; whereas the then bishop was Cormac. Colgan was not unacquainted with Usher's evasion, but did not think himself authorized to resort to it, as he could not deny that St. Patrick died prior to the accession of Benignus.

(121) “Hic heres regni mei erit, hoc est. erit post me supremus Ecclesiae Hibernicae moderator. Et oraculum probavit eventus; nam puer ille postea ita doctrina et miraculis claruit, ut omnium judicio dignus habitus sit, qui magistro suo S. Patricio in archiepiscopatu Ardmachano et primatu Hiberniae succederet; quod munus, &c. Tripart. L. 1. c. 45.

(122) Probus (L. 2. c. 1.) makes St. Patrick say to Benignus; “Jam te fili meum successorem dignum esse sentio futurum.” In the third Life (cap. 36.) the saint is introduced as saying of him; “Quia mei heres regni est.” Tirechan has (Pr. p. 875); “Ipse est Benignus episcopus successor Patricii in Ecclesia Machiae.” Jocelin is still more explicit (cap. 39.) where he writes; “Ipsum successorum ministerii sui sicut et fuit, fore praedixit. Idem namque Benignus in regimine pontificatus primatusque totius Hiberniae successit S. Patricio.” This succeeding to the primacy as well as to the see, which is mentioned also in the Tripartite, is worth observation; for whereas Jocelin elsewhere (cap. 191) represents St. Patrick as retaining the primacy until the time of his death.

(123) As Jocelin lived at a later period than several of the chroniclers, who endeavoured to assign the precise time of St. Patrick's death, he took from them what he has (cap. 196.) about his having died in the year of our Lord 493, which he makes the same as the first year of the emperor Anastasius, whose reign began in 491, and places in the pontificate of Pope Felix II. alias III. who, by the bye, died early in 492.

(124) Not. 85. to Chap. vi. (125) Above §. 2. Not. 12.

(126) Above §. 6. Colgan's evasion (Tr. Th. p. 217.) viz. that Kienan might have written that work before St. Patrick's death will not answer the description of what is called the Life of a Saint. In such tracts it is always presupposed that the person, whose Acts are given, has, after persevering unto the end, been removed to heaven. Were it certain that Mel of Ardagh wrote Memoirs or Acts of St. Patrick (See Not. 41.) it would follow that he also survived him, and consequently that the saint died prior to A. D. 488. Supposing even that he had not written such Memoirs, the very report of his having done so shows that he was considered as a survivor of St. Patrick. Usher saw into this difficulty, and accordingly added from himself (Ind. Chron. ad A. 488) to S. Patricii the words ad huc superstitis. Ware (Writers) acted in like manner.

§. XII. At present it remains only to inquire which was the precise year, in which our great saint departed this life. We have seen that some accounts had A. D. 458. (127) This date would agree very well with the ten years allowed in one document for the incumbency of Benignus, while it would take away some of the ten other years marked in the same for St. Patrick's own administration of Armagh, which was not founded before A. D. 454. But, as has been shown, (128) the document alluded to cannot in its present state be used as a guide to direct us. That date would leave only 26 years for the whole mission of St. Patrick, a space of time shorter than what we meet with in any authority worth mentioning. (129) Besides this objection, a much stronger one occurs founded on the very remarkable tradition, and which I find no reason for calling into question, that our saint died on a Wednesday. (130) Now in the year 458 the seventeenth of March fell on Monday. For the same reason we must reject the hypothesis of the Bollandists, who assigned the death of St. Patrick to A. D. 460, (131) while in that year the 17th of March fell on Thursday. Nor can it be said, strictly speaking, that he died about 460, as there was no year, either before or after, near enough to it, with which that chronological criterion would agree. A much more probable supposition is, that he died about 472, the very year assigned in the Glastonian tablet referred to by Usher. (132) I say about 472, as the criterion now alluded to would suit not that year but 471. And if we admit that those, who allowed 40 years for the whole of St. Patrick's mission, supposed that it commenced in 431, (133) this computation would bring us straight to 471. It might also be granted that even reckoning the period of the mission from 432 to 471, it might, according to the mode of using round numbers, be said to have lasted 40 years, although in reality it would have been somewhat less than 39, whereas it had not begun as early as the 17th of March in the year 432. But a very strange objection arises against this hypothesis from what we have seen concerning the death of Benignus being assigned to A. D. 468. And, were we even to allow that the death of Benignus is placed rather too early, yet it can hardly be supposed that his accession to Armagh did not take place until A. D. 471, as thus there would remain only eleven years for the whole time of his incumbency and that of his successor Iarlath, who, as already observed, died in 482. Having now examined all the hypotheses worthy of consideration, I will venture to propose another, which is less liable to exceptions than any I have met with. I can scarcely call it a hypothesis, as I find it clearly laid down in a copy of the Annals of Innisfallen. This copy assigns the death of St. Patrick to the 432d year after the passion of our Lord, (134) a date, which exactly corresponds to A. D. 465, according to the system of Bede and others, who have affixed the passion to the year 33 of the Christian era.

By adopting this year as that of St. Patrick's death, full room will be found for the ten years allowed for his administration of Armagh, and we will have 33 years for the whole period of his mission, a number that comes near to the 35 of Jocelin. And, what is particularly to be remarked, the 17th of March fell in said year on Wednesday. (125) It will also be seen, that this date agrees better than any other with the sequel of our history. We may now, without resorting to conjecture, or tormenting ourselves with endeavouring to reconcile irreconcilable computations, safely state that our Apostle was called to heaven either at the age of 78 years or in his 78th year, as his birth occurred in 387, (136) and his death in 465.

(127) Above §. 2. (128) Not. 141 to Chap. vi.

(129) See Not. 113-114. The Glastonian nonsense about 8 years merits no consideration.

(130) See Chap. iv. §. 1.

(131) See Chap. iv. §. 2. The Bollandists, having laid down with Baronius and Petavius that our saint was 82 years old when he died, perceived that it would be absurd to follow them in their other supposition, viz. that he lived until 491. (See Not. 117.) Accordingly they looked out for an earlier period and guessed at A. D. 460. Yet they have been followed by Baillet, to whom alone reference is made in this date in L'Art de verifier les dates, Tom. 1. p. 96, at St. Patrice.

(132) P. 879. (133) Compare with Not. 113.

(134) "Quies Patricii 16 Cal. Aprilis anno 432º. a passione Domini." Annals of Innisfallen among Harris's Manuscripts in the library of the Royal Dublin Society.

(135) Usher (p. 882) argued very justly, in defence of his favourite year 493, against those who stood out for 490, 491, or 492, that in none of these years the 17th of March fell on Wednesday, as it did in 493. We find four years in a course of less than thirty, to which that criterion applied, i. e. four years marked with the Dominical letter C. viz. A. 465, 471, 482 and 493. The last could not, by any means, have been the year of St. Patrick's death; nor could 482, as that was the year, in which Iarlath died.

(136) See Chap. iv. §. 4.

§. XIII. As soon as the news of the saint's death had spread throughout Ireland, the clergy flocked from all quarters to celebrate his funeral obsequies. (137) This they did with extraordinary pomp and great profusion of torches and lights, (138) insomuch that for a considerable time, during which the obsequies were continued both day and night, darkness was dispelled, and the whole time seemed one constant day. (139) Every bishop and priest, according as he arrived at Saul, naturally wished to celebrate the holy mysteries in commemoration of their apostle, and hence the funeral service must have been kept up for several days. As it consisted not only in the celebration of mass but likewise in Psalmody and chaunting of hymns, (140) which was continued during the night; (141) and as there were probably various commemorations, such as those of the third day, ninth day, &c. (142) celebrated on this occasion, it is not to be wondered at that this sort of uninterrupted day had left a strong recollection of it in Ireland. A strange turn has been given to this circumstance, by converting that artificial light into real day-light, without the intervention of any night whatsoever, throughout the district around Saul. This long day, they tell us, lasted for twelve ordinary days, (143) the length of time during which the obsequies were celebrated. (144) Others made it still longer; but it is evident that the whole statement was founded on a misconception. (145) It is said that a furious contest was very near breaking out, concerning the place in which St. Patrick's remains should be deposited, between the Ulidians and the inhabitants of the district, in which Armagh is situated. (146) To prevent bloodshed matters were providentially so managed, that his body was interred at Down; (147) although part of his reliques were brought to Armagh. (148) It seems that, notwithstanding the general belief as to Down, there arose in course of time some doubts as to the particular spot, in which the body had been placed. (149) As to what is related of its having been found in the 12th century, this subject will be inquired into elsewhere.

(137) “Clerici enim Hiberniae confluebant ad celebrandas exequias Patricii undique.” Fiech’s hymn, Stroph. 31.

(138) Besides the lights used during the time of divine service, and those more or less numerous according to the rank of the persons, used in funeral processions (see Bingham Book XXIII. ch. 2.), a custom still prevalent in Catholic countries, it was considered an act of respect to keep lights around the corpse in the place (regularly the church) where it was deposited and watched until the time of burial. Eusebius tells us (Vit. Const. L. 4. c. 66.) that Constantine’s body was surrounded with lights and watched for several days and nights. Hence came what we call wakes.

(139) In the hymn (Stroph. 29. 30) it is compared to the long day caused by the standing of the sun for Joshua against Gabaon.

(140) St. Jerome (Epitaph. Fabiol. cap. 4.) describing the funeral service for Fabiola, writes; “Sonabant Psalmi, et aurata templorum tecta reboans in sublime quatiebat Alleluia.”

(141) St. Gregory of Nyssa (Vit. Macrinae) says, that the persons watching the body of his sister Macrina sang psalms during the whole night. To this singing by night during the obsequies of St. Patrick is probably to be referred what we find in Fiech’s hymn (Stroph. 31. Colgan’s translation); “Sonus consensus superni reddebat ipsos sopore irruente ubi humi decumbentes.” By consensus superni we may understand the singing of psalms and hymns, it being a sort of celestial music. In Lynch’s translation we have, instead of consensus superni the musical instrument. Could it be that instrumental music was allowed at the obsequies of our saint? This would form a singular exception to the practice of the church in those days; for, although the Jews in their watchings or wakes of the dead had that custom, (Matth. IX. 23.) yet among Christians no other than vocal music seems to have been allowed in their religious ceremonies until a period much later than that we are now treating of. I know too little of the Irish language to be able to unravel that obscure passage; but, if any thing like a musical instrument be mentioned in it, I should think that it was either a bell (for the use of bells was very ancient in Ireland) or some sonorous instrument, such as the trumpet of the ancient Egyptian monks, by which the time for attending the service was announced. The effect of the sound or noise of this instrument would be to rouse people from their sleep, not to bury them in sleep as Lynch's translation runs. Probus, however, relates that on the first night, the obsequies being celebrated by Angels, the clergy, &c. suddenly fell asleep. "In prima autem nocte exequiarum ejus sancti Angeli excubias vigiliarum ibidem fuerunt, hymnorum atque psalmarum modulationes in omnibus complentes; quicumque vero ad vigiliis primae noctis clerici vel laici venerant subito abdormierunt, et Angelis excubantibus locum dabant. In caeteris autem noctibus homines religiosi orantes, ac psalmos canentes, sacrum corpus ex more custodiebant." L. 2. c. 36. The Angels are mentioned also in the hymn, Stroph. 32. Whether the concentus superni as above, be connected with with them, is not clear from the text.

(142) See Bingham, Book XXIII. ch. 2. sect. 19.

(143) Probus L. 2. c. 34. Jocelin, cap. 193.

(144) Tripart. L. 3. c. 105.

(145) According to the Tripartite (L. 3. c. 106) some said, that it lasted for a whole year. This stuff was borrowed from the words of Fiech's hymn (Stroph. 28); "Spatio unius anni continuata lux erat." Lynch's translation has; "Till the year's end (from 17th March) continued the lights." The meaning of the author is very clear from the sequel. He attributes this continuation of light or lights to the celebration of the obsequies and the conflux of clergymen. As to his making it last for a year or great part of a year, it can be explained by supposing that various commemorations were held from time to time, which might have been repeated until they closed with the anniversary. That he did not mean day-light during that whole time, is evident from his saying (Stroph. 32), that Angels attended on the first night of the obsequies. Probus also mentions nights during this celebration (see Not. 141.); and hence I suspect that what occurs (L. 2. c. 31.) about the miraculous long day is an interpolation, especially as it is rather misplaced.

(146) Probus L. 2. c. 39. Tripart. L. 3. c. 107. Third Life, cap. 91. Jocelin, cap. 194. Ulidia or Ullagh, whence the modern name Ulster, comprehended only a part of this province. It consisted chiefly, of, at least, a great part of the now county of Down.

(147) Third Life, cap. 88. Fourth, cap. 107. Tripart. L. 3. c. 108. Yet (ib. c. 101) it mentions Saul as the place, where St. Patrick was to be interred. Jocelin, cap. 196, and Usher's Tripartite (Pr. p. 173.) have Down. More authorities will be found in Usher (p. 888, seqq.) and Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 259, seqq.) To these writers I refer those, who may wish to see a complete refutation of the Glastonian scribblers, who pretended that our saint died and was buried at Glastonbury. (See also above §. II. and Harris, Bishops, p. 23.)

(148) The Lipsana, or reliques of Patrick Senior, are mentioned in some old Calendars (Tr. Th. p. 262.) as being at Armagh. Patrick senior was no other than the great St. Patrick. This will help us to explain the expression of St. Bernard (Vid. S. Mal. cap. 7.); "In qua (Ardmacha) et vivus praeftit et mortuus requiescit." Usher (p. 888) quotes to the same purpose an unpublished Life of St. Patrick.

(149) Tirechan and Nennius say that the place, in which St. Patrick's remains lie, is unknown. (See Chap. iv. §. I.) Whatever truth there may be in this assertion, it need not be understood with regard to the place in general; such as that his body was somewhere in Down; but ought to be considered relatively to the particular spot. Nor does the conformity with Moses require any more. For, although the few feet of ground that contained the body of Moses, were not known, yet the place in general was, being a valley in the land of Moab over against Bethpoer. (Deuter. xxxiv. 6.) The Tripartite (L. 3. c. 108.) and Jocelin cap. 196.) state that St. Patrick's body was laid in a very deep pit, to prevent its being stolen. To guard against the commission of such a theft at any time, it might have been thought proper to conceal the spot as much as possible. We may also suppose that the accumulation of graves around that of the saint might, in a long lapse of time, have given occasion to doubt, which was his peculiar one. Similar doubts have been started concerning the burying places of several eminent saints.

§. XIV. It will not be expected that I should waste my time with giving an account of the so called Patrick's Purgatory of Lough Dearg (Donegall), or examining if there could have been any foundation for attributing it to our Apostle. It is never mentioned in any of his Lives; (150) nor was it, I believe, heard of until the eleventh century, the period at which the Canons Regular of St. Augustin first appeared. (151) For it was to persons of that Order, as the story goes, that St. Patrick confided the care of that cavern of wonders. (152) Now there were no such persons in the island, in which it is situated, nor in that of St. Davoc in the same lake, (153) until, I dare say, about the beginning of the 12th century. This purgatory, or purging place (154) of Lough Dearg was set up against another Patrick's Purgatory, viz. that of Croagh-Patrick, mentioned by Jocelin, which however ill-founded the vulgar opinion concerning it, was less objectionable. (155) Some writers have said that it got the name of Patrick's Purgatory from an abbot Patrick, that lived in the ninth century; (156) but neither were there Canons Regular of St. Augustin at that time; nor were such abridged modes of atoning to the Almighty for the sins of a whole life then thought of. It was demolished in the year 1497 by order of the Pope, although it has since been in some manner restored. No mention of it is allowed in any part of the Church service. (157)

(150) Colgan has published (Tr. Th. p. 285) a little tract, which he says he found in a MS. placed after the end of the Tripartite, and therefore attributes to the author of that work. In it this purgatory is spoken of together with its privileges, &c. But it was not written by that author, as, to omit other reasons, plainly appears from the mention of Canons of St. Augustin, a description of persons unknown when he lived. It is a transcript from the foolish Narrative of the monk Henry of Salterey (Huntingdonshire), which also has been published by Colgan (ib. p. 273).

seqq.) This Henry lived in the 12th century, and has related what he heard from another English monk, Gilbert of Lud, concerning that cavern, and chiefly the wonderful things that happened to Owen, an Irish soldier, who had the courage to enter it, and which Gilbert said he had been informed of by Owen himself. These visions of Owen, as they have been called, were thence copied by Matthew Paris, and others. See more ap. Colgan (loc. cit.) and Usher (p. 897. seqq.). The mighty Dr. Ledwich says (Antiq. p. 446.) that the story was trumped up to make the Irish more obedient and submissive; pray, to whom?

(151) See Not. 133. to Chap. iv.

(152) In the Narrative (see Not. 150.) we read; “Sanctum vero Patricium Dominus in locum desertum adduxit, et unam fossam rotundam intrinsecus obscuram ibidem et ostendit, dicens; “Quisquis veraciter poenitens, vera fide armatus, fossam eandem ingressus, unius diei ac noctis moram in ea faceret, ab omnibus purgaretur totius vite sue peccatis, sed et per illam transiens non solum visurus esset tormenta malorum, verum etiam, si in fide constanter egisset, gaudia beatorum.” Sicque ab oculis ejus Domino disparente, spirituali jucunditate repletus est B. Patricius, tam pro Domini sui apparitione, quam pro fossae illius ostensione, per quam sperabat populum aberrare conversurum: statimque in eodem loco ecclesiam construxit, et B. Patris Augustini Canonicos vitam apostolicam sectantes in ea constituit; fossam autem praedictam, quae in coemeteris est extra frontem ecclesiae orientalem, muro circumdedit, et januas serasque apposuit, ne quis eam ausu temerario, et sine licentia, ingredi praesumeret, clavem vero custodiendam commendavit Priori ecclesiae ejusdem—et quoniam homo a peccatis purgetur, locus ille Purgatorium S. Patricii nominatur.” This trash is to be found, nearly verbatim, in the little tract mentioned above (Not. 150.).

(153) Concerning St. Davoc’s island and monastery see Ware, Antiq. cap. 26. His account of it is, however, rather confused.

(154) Poor Harris thought, that what is called Patrick’s Purgatory was relative to the state of souls after death, and accordingly, having ventured on controversy, argues (Bishops, p. 25.) against praying for the dead from the circumstance of that purgatory being fabulous. He was not indeed the only person, that argued thus badly. But they might have easily discovered that it got said name from the supposition, that persons, who duly prepared spent some time there, were purged or cleansed from their sins while living. (See Not. 152.) As to praying for the dead, nothing can be more certain, as will be seen elsewhere, than that it was practised in Ireland ever since the days of St. Patrick.

(155) Jocelin writes (cap. 172.); “ In hujus (Croagh-patrick) montis cacumine jejunare ac vigilare consuescunt plurimi spinantes se postea nunquam intraturos portas inferni, quia hoc impetratum a Domine existimant meritis ac precibus S. Patricii. Referunt etiam nonnulli, qui pernoctaverant ibi, se tormenta gravissima fuisse perpressos, quibus se purgatos a peccatis putant, unde et quidam illorum locum illum Purgatorium S. Patricii vocant.” Why then should not the Canons Regular have another at Lough Dearg?

(156) See Usher p. 897. It was so little known even in the times of Henry of Salterey, that, as he relates, an Irish abbot, whom he consulted, told him he had never heard any thing about it.

(157) This fable had got into a Roman breviary printed in the year 1522. On this being taken notice of, orders were immediately issued, that it should not appear in any future edition, and accordingly it is not to be met with either in the Roman or any other breviary published since that year. Strange that Rothe and Colgan, who must have been aware of this and other circumstances, could ~~have~~^{not} attempted a vindication of it. Ledwich, amidst other stuff concerning this Purgatory, says that Pope Benedict XIV. preached a sermon on it. This is not true. That sermon was preached not by Benedict XIV. but by Benedict XIII. and not when Pope, but when archbishop of Benevento. See Hibernia Dominicana, p. 5. the very page, to which that faithful antiquary refers, p. 447.

§. xv. Besides the Confession and the Epistle against Coroticus some other tracts have been attributed to St. Patrick. But with the exception of, at least, some of the Canons already spoken of, (158) and of the treatise De Abusionibus Seculi, it is now generally agreed, that such of them as are still extant were not written by him. This treatise has been quoted as a work of our saint by writers of the 8th or 9th century. As, however, the style is quite different from that of the Confession, &c. it has been conjectured that in its present state it is only a translation from the Irish, in which language St. Patrick might have composed it. (159) A collection of Sermons pronounced by him is said to have existed; but none of them are now to be found. (160) A monastic rule is also mentioned; and it is not improbable that he drew up one similar to those, which he had observed himself at Tours and in Lerins. (161) Tracts like these now touched upon would agree very well with what we know concerning the occupations and proceedings of our Apostle; not so a large historico-political work foolishly ascribed to him by some of our antiquaries, which they call Seanchas More or the Great Antiquity. They tell us it was compiled in the year 439, and that St. Patrick was assisted in this mighty undertaking by two holy bishops, one of whom was Benignus, three kings, and three antiquaries, (162) who, according to this notable history, formed the famous Committee of Nine, appointed for this purpose by the senate called the Fes of Temor or Tarah. (163) So then St. Patrick and other ecclesiastics would have been members of the national assembly of Ireland, and that at a time when the far greatest part of the persons entitled to sit in it were Pagans. Would king Leogaire, who was never a Christian, (164) have allowed a place in that meeting to a foreigner, or, what would be still more strange, recognized his authority? And how could Benignus have been a bishop in 439, or even a senator, and chosen on a committee? In that year St. Patrick was better employed, preaching in Connaught, than in attending senates. The mixture of ecclesiastics with laymen in the states-general of nations was quite unknown in St. Patrick's days. What has become of the Seanchas More, is uncertain. (165) As to some other writings under the name of our saint, I refer the reader to those who have expressly treated of these subjects. (166)

(158) Above §. 3.

(159) See Ware, Opusc. S. Pat. &c. p. 139. and compare with Tillement, Mem. &c. Tom. xvi. p. 785.

(160) Stanilhurst (Vit. S. Patr. L. 2.) drew up a flowery sermon in St. Patrick's name, which Messingham, although he doubted of its genuineness, honoured with republication in his Florilegium.

(161) See Chap. iv. §. 9. 12.

(162) Colgan has (Tr. Th. p. 214); “Ad annum 438 (439) tradunt quatuor Magistri; Anno Christi 438 et regis Leogarii decimo, vetustis codicibus aliisque antiquis Hiberniae monumentis undique conquisitis, et ad unum locum congregatis, Hiberniae Antiquitates et Sanctiones Legales S. Patricii auctoritate repurgatae et conscriptae sunt. Authores, quorum opera illud opus congestum fuit, Leogarius, Corcus, et Darius, tres reges; Patricius, Benignus, et Carnechus, tres sancti episcopi; Rossius, Dubthacus, et Fergussius, tres antiquarii.” Colgan says that the second part of this compilation, the Legal Sanctions, was probably the same as the Collection of Canons, Canoin Phadruic, mentioned by Jocelin, cap. 185. Thus St. Patrick would not have meddled with state matters; but the contrivers of that story meant somewhat more than mere ecclesiastical regulations.

(163) See Keating, Book 2d, and O'Conor's Dissertations on the History of Ireland, Dissert. 1. Sect. 15.

(164) Chap. v. §. 6. O'Conor, whom I was really surprised to find abetting this silly story, says that Leogaire had been a Christian but apostatized. I wish he had told us at what time he became one.

(165) Nicholson, Ir. Hist. Libr. ch. 2. Keating derives from it the Psalter of Cashel, the Book of Armagh, &c. &c.

(166) Ware (Opusc. S.P.); Idem and Harris (Irish Writers); Colgan Tr. Th. p. 214 seqq. &c. &c.

CHAPTER VIII.

Benignus appointed successor to St. Patrick—Preached the Gospel in those tracts not visited by St. Patrick—Sends for Iarlath—Death of St. Benignus—Death of Isserninus bishop of Kilkullen—St. Brigid received the veil from Maccaicus—Her parentage—Place of her birth—Place where she received the veil—Visits Teffia—Goes with Erc bishop of Slane into Munster—Goes to the plain of Cliach, county Limerick—Goes to South Leinster—Goes into Connaught and resides a while in county Roscommon—Parentage and birth place of St. Iarlath—Death of King Leogaire and accession of Olioll Molt—Death of Olioll—Christian princes in Ireland at this period—Bishops Ailbe and Declan—Conference at Magh-Femyn—Synod of Cashel—Angus king of Munster grants the Island of Arran to Enda, on which he builds a monastery—St. Ailbe's great reputation—Restrained by king Angus from leaving his diocese—Several ecclesiastical schools erected—Several nunneries established—Foundation of St. Brigid's great nunnery of Kildare—Conlaeth first bishop of Kildare—Natfroich the spiritual companion of St. Brigid—Bishops contemporary with St. Brigid—Brigid or the abbesses of Kildare had no jurisdiction over the abbots or bishops—Cormac succeeds Iarlath in the See of Armagh—Cormac bishop of Trim—Luman first bishop of Trim—Death of several bishops—Bishop Cerban of Feart—Cerban near Tarah—Dubhtach or Duach successor of Cormac in the See of Armagh—Aengus Mac Nisse first bishop of Connor—Cailan abbot of Antrim—Canoc or Conoc founder of the monastery of Gallen—Brothers of Canoc—St. Daboec—Fortchern bishop of Trim—Churches of Kill-fortchern and Kilconnel—St. Fredolinus the traveller.

SECT. I.

THE see of Armagh did not remain long vacant. All those, who were concerned in appointing a successor to St. Patrick, were unanimous in the choice of Benignus; (1) and, accordingly his accession took place long before the end of the year 465, in which the saint died. We have already seen how, when young, he became a disciple of our apostle. (2) It is related in his Acts that, when he became qualified to preach the Gospel, he was employed in various parts of Ireland, (3) and particularly in places which St. Patrick had not visited in person. West Munster (Kerry) and some parts of the now county of Clare, districts, which, as already observed, (4) were not honoured with St. Patrick's presence, are particularly specified; and he has been considered as the apostle of those tracts, although then only a priest. (5) After his promotion to Armagh I find nothing remarkable recorded concerning his transactions. Several disciples of his are spoken of, and among them are some who have been called disciples of St. Patrick. (6) How long he governed Armagh is a subject involved in some doubt. If he died A. D. 468, (7) we cannot allow more than three years and some months for his incumbency; but could it be proved that it lasted ten years, (8) his death should be assigned to 475. Were it not that our Annalists agree in assigning his death to A. D. 468, (9) I would be much inclined to think that it was somewhat later; because the Tripartite mentions his having governed for several years, (10) an expression which, if founded on truth, would imply more than three or four years. In this case we might suppose that the 18 or perhaps only 17 full years, allowed by some writers for Iarlath his successor down to A. D. 482, ought to be divided between them both. Yet I allow we should have some better argument than a mere expression of the Tripartite, and perhaps mistranslated, to induce us to depart from the date given by the Annalists. His having resigned his see some years before his death is a mere Glastonbury story, and directly opposite to the express testimony of his own Acts, in which we read that, finding his end approaching, he sent for Iarlath, and received from him the Lord's body; and that after he was immediately succeeded by him. (11) St. Benignus died on the 9th of November and was buried at Armagh. (12)

(1) See Chap. vii. §. xi.

(2) Chap. v. §. 4.

(3) Among the parts of Ireland, through which he accompanied St. Patrick, Connaught is particularly mentioned. It will not be denied, that, while a scholar, he was with the saint in that province; but he was probably too young to be a preacher until after they left it, viz. about the beginning of A. D. 442 (See ch. v. §. 13.) Another Benignus, brother of Cethecus and a bishop, is spoken of as having been employed in Connaught; (Tripart L. 2. c. 52.) if there was such a person, he must not be confounded with the Benignus of Armagh.

(4) Chap. vi. §. 8.

(5) Sanctus autem Patricius in persona propria non visit populos Iarmomoniae, seu Occidentalis Momoniae, sed provinciam illam commisit S. Benigno; qui, cum septem aliis sociis S. Patricii discipulis comitantibus et collaborantibus, eos continuis verbi Dei praedicationibus, signis, et virtutibus multis, e tenebris idololatriae ad lucem fidei perduxit, et salutaribus undis Ecclesiae adunivit. Quem proinde ut Apostolum cultu et obsequiis ex voto devotè venerantur. Eadem etiam obsequia et officia praestare debent Corcamorogii, (Corcomroe in Clare) quos in fide Christi sedulo instructos, et baptizatos, Christi aggregavit ovili." Vit. S. Benigni, cap. 6. (Tr. Th. p. 203.)

(6) Ex. c. Buadmel, and Carellus, whom the Tripartite

(L. 2. c. 23) makes bishop at Tannach, somewhere in the county of Sligo.

(7) See Chap. VII. §. XI.

(8) Usher (p. 875) has ten years for the incumbency of Benignus, which he counts from A. D. 455 (See Not. 141 to Ch. VI.) In consequence of this calculation he was forced to reckon 13 years from the accession of Benignus until his death, which, as he observes (p. 877) some of our Annals place in 468. Thus then we should suppose, what Usher, by the bye, does not assert, that Benignus resigned his see three years before his death (see Ind. Chron. ad A. 465). But there is no foundation for this story of the resignation of Benignus, and accordingly Usher's computation cannot be reconciled with his own authorities. For, if ten years were the precise time of that incumbency, he should either have made them begin in 458 or end in 465. Still more perplexed are the calculations of the Bollandists, who also allow ten years for the episcopacy of Benignus, which they begin in 470 and terminate in 480. Having laid down that St. Patrick died in 460, they make him be succeeded by the pretended Sen-Patrick, of whom enough has been said already (Chap. VII. §. 2.) Sen-Patrick, according to them, died at Glastonbury in 470, and here they bring in Benignus. This sort of conjectural chronology is quite inconsistent with the date, that must be allowed for St. Patrick's death (Chap. VII. §. 12), and with the well authenticated fact that Benignus was his immediate successor. Besides it would leave only two years for the incumbency of Iarlath, who died in 482.

(9) To the Annals of Ulster and the 4 Masters referred to above (Not. 118 to Chap. VII.) add those of Innisfallen.

(10) L. 1. c. 45.

(11) “Cum vir Dei (Benignus) videret tempus suae resolutionis instare, curat accersiri S. Hierlatium filium Trieni—et ex ejus manu arrham et pignus aeternae beatitudinis corpus Domini devotissime sumit, et se ad vitae terminum et Patriae parat introitum. Fuit autem hic S. Hierlatius, qui ipsi in sede Ardmachana et primatu Hiberniae immediate successit.” Vit. S. Benigni, cap. 18. The Glastonians, in the same manner as they pretended to have had St. Patrick among them, took to themselves also his disciple Benignus, and, to mend the matter, assigned his arrival at Glastonbury to A. D. 460. Then it was added that he was buried at a place called Ferlingmer, and an epitaph was made out for him under the name of Beona. (See Usher p. 876, seqq.) We had persons enough of that name, (Colgan, AA. SS. p. 90.) one of whom they might have chosen for themselves without stealing St. Benignus of Armagh. Hence the story of the resignation of Benignus, which Ware has assigned to A. D. 465, the very year of his appointment. (See Chap. vi. Not. 145.) O'Flaherty in a passage of his Ogygia Christiana, part of which has been already quoted (ib. Not. 146.) calculates that Benignus, whose accession he affixed to A. D. 458, resigned his see six years after, viz. in 464. Thus he speculated to make room for the 18 following years of Iarlath's incumbency.

(12) Pr. p. 877. How a story about Benignus having died at Rome got into the Annals of Innisfallen, I cannot discover.

§. II. Isserninus, bishop of Kilcullen, (13) did not long survive his friend Benignus, as he died in the year 469. (14) Who was his immediate successor in that place I cannot venture to say, for it is scarcely credible that Mactaleus, who was bishop there in the sixth century, (15) could have been the person. It is very probable, that he was not succeeded there immediately by any one, in the same manner as we do not know of any successor of his colleague Auxilius (16) at Killossy. It is not to be supposed, that in those early times permanent sees were so generally established, that a bishop should be regularly appointed to a place, in which a former one had resided. At the time of Isserninus' death there were, at least, two bishops stationed in parts of Leinster not far remote from the district of Kilcullen, viz. Fiech and Maccalaus, (17) so that there was no necessity for appointing another to it, as the episcopal duties could have been performed by either of those prelates. Maccalaus was the bishop, from whom St. Brigid received the veil; and, as this remarkable circumstance occurred about the time we are now treating of, it will not be amiss to touch upon, in this place, the early part of the history of that extraordinary virgin. (18) She was of an illustrious family of Leinster. Her father Dubtach was of royal blood, being of the race of Ethee or Eochad brother of the celebrated (19) Con surnamed Kedchathath, (of the hundred battles). Her mother Brocessa or Brotseach was of the noble house of Dal-Concobhair (O'Connor), in the southern part of the territory of the Bregii. (20) They were both Christians, according to the most creditable account; (21) for, no attention is due to what we find in two or three of the so called Lives of St. Brigid concerning her mother having been a concubine, whom, when pregnant, the wife of Dubtach obliged him to dismiss, and of her having been purchased by a pagan poet or a Magus, and how, in consequence of his taking her to Ulster, she was there delivered of the saint. (22) This romance-like narrative cannot agree with the circumstance that the parents of the saint were Christians, I mean such strict Christians as were then in Ireland, nor with the rank of her mother's family and her being everywhere else spoken of as the wife of Dubtach. (23) St. Brigid was born at Fochard (Faughter) about two miles to the North of Dundalk, and in a district, which was formerly considered as part of Ulster. (24) Whether her coming into the world in that place was owing to her parents having had a residence there, or to their being on a visit at some friend's house, it is immaterial to inquire. Various years have been assigned for her birth; but, on comparing the best authorities it appears that it must have been in some year between A. D. 451 and 458, both included. Meanwhile we may follow Usher's computation, which affixes it to 453. (25) According to this date she was twelve years old when St. Patrick died, (26) and might have been known to him, in consequence of her singular sanctity having become conspicuous at a very early age, joined with her being of an illustrious family. But she could not have been a professed nun at that time, nor have already founded a religious establishment. (27) In the most consistent and authentic accounts of both saints, St. Brigid does not appear as a consecrated virgin during the life time of St. Patrick. (28) Accordingly we cannot admit what is said of her interviews, when Abbess of a monastery, with our Apostle, nor of her having, at his request, woven the shroud, in which his body was after his death enveloped. (29)

(13) Chap. vi. §. 5.

(14) Usher, Ind. Chron.

(15) Not. 35 to Chap. vii.

(16) See Chap. vii. §. 3.

(17) See Chap. vii. §. 5.

(18) Colgan has published in the Trias Thaumaturga six tracts, which he calls Lives, concerning St. Brigid. The first is an Irish poem celebrating her virtues and miracles, ascribed in an anonymous preface to St. Brogan of Rostuiric in Ossory near Sliabh-Bladhma (Slieve-bloom), who had been requested by Ultan of Ardbraccan to compose it, and therefore could not have written it about A. D. 526, as Colgan thought, and as Harris, in opposition to Ware, has placed it. For Ultan lived until the year 657 (Usher, Ind. Chron.); and accordingly Ware was more correct in reckoning Brogan among the writers of the seventh century. The second is the celebrated work of Cogitosus, who could not have lived in the sixth century, as Colgan and others imagined. For in his prologue he speaks not only of a succession of bishops of Kildare after Conlaeth, who died in 519, and which succession is mentioned in terms indicating a long lapse of time; but likewise represents the bishop of that see as the chief of the Leinster prelates, which he certainly was not until after that century. (See Usher, p. 965.) His description also of the church of Kildare plainly refers to a time much later than that period. Yet we cannot place him lower down than about the beginning of the ninth century or some time before the devastation of Kildare by the Danes, which began in the year 835 (836). (See Tr. Th. p. 629.) For it can scarcely be doubted, that it was about that time that the remains of St. Brigid were removed to Down, then a safe place, to guard them against the fury of those heathens. (See ib. p. 565.) Now these holy remains were at Kildare when Cogitosus wrote his book. (See cap. 35.) And that he lived before the said devastation is evident, first, from his not making, in his minute description of the church (ib.) the least allusion to its having been ever destroyed, or to the spoliation of the shrines of St. Brigid and Conlaeth, which he represents as very splendid and rich; secondly, from his stating that the city of Kildare and its suburbs were a place of refuge, in which there could not be the least apprehension of any hostile attack; “Nullus carnalis adversarius, nec concursus timetur hostium;” (cap. 36.) Cogitosus could not have written in this manner after the year 836, nor even after 831, (832) in which year Kildare was plundered by Kellach son of Bran. (Tr. Th. p. 629.) That mighty critic Dr. Ledwich says, (Antiq. p. 166) that the work of Cogitosus is supposititious, and why? Because it was not written in the sixth century! But surely it was written some time or another, and certainly by a man of the name of Cogitosus, who would not have been heard of but for this work, in which he has left us his name. The poor Doctor does not understand the very terms of the art of criticism. What he meant to assert seems to be that it was written in the 12th century, on account of what is said of the architecture of the church, in which he supposed that stone building was implied. Could not there be architecture without stone? Has he heard of such a country as Germany, or of the many fine houses there built without either stone or brick? He thought that the word, parietes used by Cogitosus, (cap. 35) should be understood of stone. How then would he understand the parietes tabulati, of the same writer and in the same chapter? The fact is that Cogitosus has not a word about stone in his description of the church. The book itself is rather a panegyrical discourse on St. Brigid than a regular Life. The third treatise is attributed by Colgan to Ultan of Ardbraccan, who is known to have written something concerning St. Brigid. (See Ware at Ultan and Harris, Writers, p. 30.) But neither he nor any writer of the 7th century could have recorded the many strange fables, with which it is crammed. Besides, it differs from the two former tracts in some material points. It is a hodge-podge made up at a late period, in which it is difficult to pick out any truth from amidst a heap of rubbish. The fourth, which is divided into two books, was written, at a period, when it was universally believed that St. Brigid's remains were at Down, and, I dare say, some time in the 10th or 11th century. Colgan suspects it is the same as the work on St. Brigid said to have been written by one Animosus, who might have flourished late in the tenth. (See Tr. Th. p. 563, and Harris at Animosus.) The fifth treatise or Life is, making allowance for many stories, tolerably well written. The author Laurence of Durham, who lived in the 12th century. The sixth is a rather long Latin poem, to which is prefixed a prologue beginning with "Finibus occiduis," &c. Colgan got both the prologue and the Life from the Benedictine library of Monte Cassino, in which it was marked as written by one Chilien a monk of Inniskeltra (in Lough Derg, river Shannon). And yet elsewhere (Tr. Th. p. 255.) he ascribes the prologue to Donatus an Irisman, who was bishop of Firole in Tuscany in the ninth century. Harris has followed this distinction (Writers at Donat). This Chilien, whether author of both (as Colgan has ib. p. 597) or not, was, according to a conjecture of his, the same as Coelan of Inniskeltra, who seems to have flourished in the eighth century, and not the seventh to which Harris assigns him (at Chaelien). Bollandus thought (ad 1. Febr. S. Brigida Comm. pr. §. 2.) that they were different persons. Be this as it may, if Chilien lived in the eighth century, I believe it was in the latter part of it. His calling St. Brigid's mother a countess smells of a late period. On the whole I suspect, that the author was later than even the eighth century. But it is not worth while to enter into a further discussion concerning him.

(19) Tr. Th. p. 613.

(20) Colgan (Tr. Th. ib.) has from an Irish life of St. Brigid; "Brotseac filia Dallbronacii, filii Aidi Memair de Dalconchabhair ex australi Bregiorum regione fuit ejus mater." (Concerning the district of the Bregii see Not. 14 to Chap. v.) And the Scholiast to a hymn in honour of St. Brigid, beginning, Audite Virginis laudes, says that it was composed, perhaps by Ultan of Ardbraccan, "as he was of Dalconchabhair, of which family was also the mother of St. Brigid Brotseach daughter of Dallbronac." (See Colgan loc-cit.)

(21) Cogitosus (cap. 1.) writes; "Sancta itaque Brigida, quam Deus praescivit ad suam imaginem et praedestinavit, a Christianis nobilibusque parentibus, de bona ac praevalentissima Etech prosapia, in Scotia orta, patre Dubtacho et matre Brocessa genita."

(22) These stories are given in the third and fourth Lives, which in very great part are mere transcripts of each other, agreeing, word for word, in very many passages. The former bears every appearance of being an abridgment of the later. Be this as it may, they form but one authority. And as to the Life called the fifth, whatever it has on these subjects was evidently taken from one or other of them. Amidst other nonsense contained in these tracts a Magus is introduced foretelling the future sanctity of the child, while she was still in her mother's womb.

(23) Besides what we have seen (Not. 20 and 21), it may be observed, that in the prologue to the sixth life Dubtach is represented as a noble pious man, and still more noble through his spouse and their holy offspring;

Dubtachus ejus erat genitor cognomine dictus ;

Clarus homo meritis, clarus et a proavis ;

Nobilis atque humilis, mitis, pietatos repletus ;

Nobilior PROPRIA CONJUGE, prole pia.

I should probably not have troubled the reader with any remarks on those stories, and passed them by, as Usher, Ware, and others have done, had not Harris, striving to appear more learned than Ware, foisted them into his account of the saint. (Writers at Brigid.)

(24) The fourth Life has (L. 1. c. 6.); “Villa illa, in qua sancta Brigida nata est, Fochart Muirthemne vocatur; quae est in provincia Ultorum, scilicet in regione quae dicitur Conaille Muirthemne.” Usher refers to this passage (p. 627). St. Bernard writes (Vita S. Mal. cap. 13.); “Venerunt aliquando tres episcopi in villam Fochart, quem dicunt locum nativitatis Brigidae virginis.”

(25) Ind. Chron. Colgan considers (Tr. Th. p. 620) Usher's opinion as the most probable. The Bollandists, viz. Henschenius and Papebrochius, assign (at 17 Mart. p. 533) St. Brigid's birth to A. D. 436 or 437, without, as Tillemont observes, any sufficient proof. They found themselves obliged to throw out this conjecture in consequence of their supposing that St. Brigid had interviews with St. Patrick, and that he had requested her to weave a shroud for him, which circumstance they assigned to A. D. 458, to make it agree with their hypothesis concerning St. Patrick's death in 460. Their predecessor, Bollandus, who admitted at (S. Brigid, 1 Feb.) these circumstances relative to the friendship between the two saints, was not, however, under the necessity of antedating the birth of St. Brigid, whereas he supposed with Usher, that St. Patrick did not die until the year 493. Now the successors of Bollandus, when they rejected this date, should have rejected also what has been said about the shroud, &c. and thus would not have been reduced to assign, in opposition to the best authorities, her birth to the time above mentioned, and her death to 506 or 517.

(26) It is stated in the Annals of Roscrea, quoted by Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 620.) that St. Brigid was born on the 8th day of the moon of February. This was, in the year 453, the 4th of March, as the Golden number was in that year xvii. Reckoning from that day to the 17th of March 465, we have somewhat more than 12 years.

(27) The lowest age, which I find to have been allowed in those times in any part of the Church for taking the veil, was that of 16 or 17 years. (St. Basil, Ep. Canonica. Can. 18.) The African canons fixed it at 25; and this regulation became very general in the Western church. Yet even in the countries, where it was received, it might have been dispensed with in certain cases. (See Gibert, Corp. J. Can. Tom. II. p. 410.)

(28) The Tripartite, however minute in every thing relative to St. Patrick, makes mention of St. Brigid only once, where it relates (L. 3. c. 4.) that, when listening, together with a vast number of people, to a sermon of his, she fell asleep and had a vision relative to the then state of the Irish church and to its future vicissitudes, as expounded by St. Patrick, who knowing that she had a vision desired her, after she awoke, to tell what she saw. She said that at first she saw a herd of white oxen amidst white crops, then spotted ones of various colours, after which appeared black and dark-coloured oxen. These were succeeded by sheep and swine, wolves and dogs jarring with each other. (See also Jocelin, cap. 95.) In this narrative there is nothing repugnant to the ways of the Almighty, who has been often pleased to impart to little ones secrets and gifts, which he withheld from the learned and wise of this world. It was thus that while the chief priests and Scribes remained in their infidelity, the children cried out, Hosanna to the Son of David, through a divine impulse, as appears from our Saviour's answer to those wiseacres; "And they said to him; hearest thou what these say? Jesus replied; Yes: have you never read, that out of the mouth of infants and sucking babes thou hast perfected praise ? Matth. XXI. 16. St. Brigid might have been at that time ten or eleven years old, an age fully sufficient to render her in the hands of God, an instrument fit for displaying the wonderful effects of his grace and his knowledge of all things. If in what is called the order of nature we find so many children of extraordinary precocity in learning, so many Enfans celebres, what may we not expect from the omnipotence of God in the order of grace ?

(29) This circumstance is mentioned in her third Life, (cap. 60.) and in the fourth (L. 2. c. 30.). The sixth Life also has it (cap. 46.); but it is omitted in the fifth. Neither Cogitosus, nor the author of the first Life, has a word about it ; and, what is very remarkable, they never once mention St. Patrick, notwithstanding the care, with which they collected whatever could redound to the honour of St. Brigid. Now, had she had those frequent interviews, or kept up a correspondence with him, or attended him at his death, &c. is it possible that those writers, who are evidently her most ancient biographers, would have been quite silent on such material points ? Next we have the Lives of St. Patrick, in none of which, except Jocelin's (cap. 188, seqq.) and the fourth (cap. 92, seqq.) which may be considered as an abridgment of Jocelin, is there even an allusion to that history of the shroud ? We have already seen (Chap. VII. §. 9. 13.) with what minuteness Fiech's hymn, the Scholiast, Probus, the Tripartite, and the third Life give an account of the last days of St. Patrick, his death, obsequies, &c. They specify the name of the bishop, who attended him, although otherwise scarcely known. Strange indeed would be their omitting to mention so celebrated a saint as St. Brigid, had she attended with the shroud at his exit. Nor with the exception of one solitary instance (See Not. prec.) does her name ever occur in these Lives of our Apostle. Had those circumstances, which have been reported by later writers concerning her transactions with St. Patrick, really occurred, it is impossible that they could have been overlooked by those authors, who lived nearer to their times. Perhaps she wove a pall or some sepulchral ornament to be spread over his grave, and hence might have arisen the idea, that she had done so during his life time. From what has been hitherto observed it follows also, that St. Patrick did not live nearly as late as A. D. 493. St. Brigid's reputation was spread far and wide before that time. In her exertions for forming congregations of holy virgins and establishments for them, which coincided so well with the views of our Apostle; she would and should have acted under his guidance, were he alive. Accordingly there would have been frequent communications between them, concerning which the ancient writers could not have been totally silent. Nor can their silence be accounted for in any other manner than that St. Brigid was still a child when St. Patrick took his leave of this world. (Compare with Chap. VII. §. 11.)

§. III. St. Brigid received a good education, (30) and to singular modesty and decency of manners united an extraordinary degree of charity towards the poor. (31) Instances are related of the interposition of Providence in replenishing the store, which she applied to her benevolent purposes. When arrived at a proper age, her parents were on the point of getting her settled in the married state; but she announced her determination to remain a virgin, to which, as we find nothing to the contrary, we may suppose they willingly assented. (32) She then applied to the holy bishop Maccaille or Maccaleus, (33) who, being well assured of her good disposition, admitted her into the number of sacred virgins by covering her with a white cloak and placing a white cloth or veil over her head. (34) If we are to believe Tirechan, Maccaille was then at Usny hill (Westmeath); (35) which place, although not his usual residence, was probably comprized within his district. (36) Hence it is not to be inferred, that her father resided in the province anciently called Meath; for he is constantly spoken of as a Leinster man, and seems to have lived not far from where she afterwards established her monastery of Kildare; (37) and the reason, for which she had recourse to Maccaille, was probably no other than that he was then the nearest bishop to her father's house. Nor could a priest receive her profession; for the consecration of virgins was reserved to the episcopal order. It has been said that Mel of Ardagh, not Maccaille, was the bishop, from whom she received the veil. This story is so plainly contradicted by the best authorities, that it is not worthy of refutation. (38) Another still more foolish story is that she received it in the Isle of Man. (39) The only foundation for it was, as Usher has justly remarked, that in consequence of the likeness of the names, Maccaille was confounded with Maguil or Maccaldus bishop of Man. (40) St. Brigid was undoubtedly, at least, 16 years old at the time of her consecration, as in those days that was the earliest age at which that ceremony would have been allowed. (41) We may also observe, that her parents would not have had the intention of getting her married at the time she declared for the state of virginity, unless she had reached that time of life. Supposing then that her consecration took place as soon as the laws of the Church would permit, it may be admitted that she was veiled in the year 469. (42) We are told that, when kneeling at the foot of the altar during the time of her profession, the part, on which she knelt, being of wood, recovered its original freshness and continued green to a very late period. (43) It has been also related, that seven or eight other maidens took the veil along with her, (44) and that some of them, together with their parents, requested of her to remain in their country. She complied with their wish, (45) and, being placed over her companions by the bishop, lived for some time along with them in a place assigned to them by him within his district, (46) and probably in that part of the king's county, which formerly belonged to Meath. (47) How long she remained there we are not informed; but, as her reputation for sanctity became daily greater and greater, crowds of young women and widows applied to her for admission into her holy institution. (48)

(30) "A sua pueritia bonarum litterarum studiis inolevit." Cogitosus, cap. 1.

(31) Ib. and cap. 2.

(32) It is said in the third Life (cap. 17), that, when her father and brothers were pressing her to accept the hand of a certain suitor, she prayed to God to visit her with some deformity, and that one of her eyes burst and was melted in her head, on observing which the father consented to her taking the veil, after which the eye was restored to her. In the sixth Life (cap. 9.) we find a different account; for, as there related, it was not St. Brigid that lost an eye but one of her brothers, who, having had the audacity to give her a blow, because she refused to marry, was in punishment for this crime struck by an Angel. There is nothing like either of these anecdotes in Cogitosus or in the first Life, nor even in the fourth.

(33) In Colgan's edition of Cogitosus the name is written Macchille, in that of Canisius and Messingham Macca; but the true spelling is Maccaille, which we find in Brogan's Irish poem or in the first Life, and in other documents (Tr. Th. p. 525.)

(34) "Qui (Maccalleus) caeleste intuens desiderium, et pudicitiam, et tantum castitatis amorem in tali virgine, pallium album et vestem candidam super ipsius venerabile caput imposuit." Cogit. cap. 3. In the first Life we have (Stroph. 8) "Posuit Maccaille velum super caput Sanctae Brigidæ" The Calendar of Cashel and Maguire in his Festilogium (ap. Tr. Th. p. 525.) likewise mention Maccaille as the person, who gave the veil; and, the latter adds, a white one, to St. Brigid. Tirechan says, that she received the pallium from Mac-Cuille or Maccaille. The fifth Life (cap. 28) calls the consecrating bishop Maccaleus. It is worth remarking, that the dress of the ancient Irish nuns was white; nor were there any distinct orders of them in Ireland until some centuries after St. Brigid's time, as they all followed the same rule that she had observed. The white garment of St. Brigid is mentioned in the third Life, cap. 103. We find nothing about cutting of hair, which was not practised in the profession of holy virgins as early, or, at least as generally, as the regulation for their wearing a particular habit. (See Tillemont, Mem. &c. Tom. x. p. 84-302, and Bingham B. VII. ch. IV. sect. 6.)

(35) " Sancta Brigida pallium cepit sub manibus filii Cuille in Huisniach Midi." (Usher p. 1031.)

(36) See Chap. vii. §. 5.

(37) In the fourth Life (L. 2. c. 3.) it is said, that after an absence of some duration she returned to her own country, that is, to the district where her relatives resided, and that in said tract a place was assigned to her for erecting a monastery for holy virgins, afterwards called Kill-dura.

(38) It is to be found in the third Life, (cap. 18) with the author of which Mel appears to have been a great favourite. This Life was, I suspect, patched up in the diocese of Ardagh, and very probably in an island of Lough Rie called the Island of all saints, in which Augustin Magraidain lived, who, having compiled Lives of Irish saints, died A. D. 1405. (Ware's Writers) Colgan got one of his copies of it from the monastery of that place. Yet, however partial to Mel, it mentions Maccaille but makes him a disciple of Mel, and represents him as introducing St. Brigid to him. Harris, having met with this stuff, makes Mel the bishop, from whom St. Brigid received the veil. Did he never read Cogitosus or the tracts quoted above (Not. 34. 35)?

(39) For this fable Usher quotes (p. 643.) Hector Boethius, Histor. Scot.

(40) See Pr. p. 1031. Usher has been followed by Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 525.) and Bollandus (ad Brigid. 1 Feb. Comm. pr. §. 4). Concerning Maccaldus see above Chap. vi. §. xi.

(41) Above Not. 27. Usher (Ind. Chron. ad A. 467) has from Hector Boethius St. Brigid's profession at the age of fourteen. But he remarks (p. 643) that he does not know whence that writer got his information. I am sure that he got it only out of his own head on the supposition, that St. Brigid became a nun as soon as was allowable. In the times of Boethius, who lived before the Council of Trent, that age was considered as sufficient for receiving the veil.

(42) Usher, reckoning her age only fourteen, has A. D. 467.

(43) Cogitosus, cap. 3.

(44) The fifth Life (cap. 28, seqq.) has seven; the third (cap. 18) mentions eight, although a few lines before it states that St. Brigid set out from her father's house with only three of them. It seems that, when they arrived at the place where the bishop was, they met there four or five other postulants.

(45) Third Life, cap. 18.

(46) Fifth Life, cap. 30.

(47) That it was in the ancient Meath may be collected from its having been not far from Usny hill, where St. Brigid received the veil. In the third Life (cap. 20) it is spoken of as surrounded by towns in Meath. Usny hill is not far distant from the now King's county, in which Maccaille seems to have usually resided. (See Chap. VII. §. 5.) In Fearcall, formerly a part of Meath, now the baronies of Ballycowen and Ballyboy (King's Co.) there was a place called Rath-brighide i. e. Brigid's town. (Tr. Th. p. 625). At any rate St. Brigid's dwelling was either in that district or in an adjoining one of Westmeath; and I find a Teghbrighide, or Brigid's house in Kinel-fiacha (Tr. Th. ib.) i. e. the country about Kilbeggan.

(48) Fifth Life, cap. 32.

§. IV. It would have been inconvenient to assemble so many persons in one place; and the good of the Church required that those pious ladies should be divided into various establishments in the respective districts, of which they were natives. On this account St. Brigid was probably invited by some bishops to proceed to their dioceses for the purpose of introducing that regular observance, which had rendered her first establishment so celebrated. Tef-fia, or the country about Ardagh, of which Mel was bishop, is particularly mentioned among the districts, which she visited; (49) and her interviews with that prelate on religious concerns might have given rise to the notion that from him she had received the veil. Erc bishop of Slane (50) was one of her friends, and it is said that she went with him to Munster on occasion of his paying a visit to his relatives, as he was originally from that province. (51) It is added that they were in the plain of Femyn, Magh-Femin, at a time when a great synod was held there, and that Erc spoke highly in honour of St. Brigid, and of the miraculous powers with which the Almighty had gifted her. (52) Thence she is said to have gone with her female companions to the house of a person, (53) who lived near the sea, and to have spent a considerable time there. (54) Next we find her in the plain of Cliach (county of Limerick) (55) where, as is related, she obtained from a chieftain the liberty of a man, whom he had in chains. (56) From that country she went to the territory of Labrathi (57) in South Leinster, and remained there for some time. Having not seen her father for several years she thence proceeded to his house to pay him a visit, (58) and after a short stay set out for Connaught, and fixed her residence, together with the other ladies of her institution, in the plain of Hai or Magh-ai in the now county of Roscommon. (59) While in that country, she was occupied in forming various establishments for persons of her sex, according to the rule which she had formed. (60) The times, in which the transactions now related occurred, are not specified; but having found them, partly in the third and partly in the fourth Life, treated of before the establishment at Kildare, I thought it advisable to give them in this place.

(49) Third Life, cap. 29. Fourth, L. 1. c. 34.

(50) See Chap. VII. §. 7.

(51) Third Life, cap. 71. seqq. About Erc's family and connexions see Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 544.).

(52) Third Life, cap. 72. On Magh-femyn see above Chap. VI. Not. 61. Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 625) has a Kill-brighde near Fethard in Tipperary.

(53) The reader must not think it strange to find St. Brigid and her companions travelling from one place to another, and taking up their residence in private houses. In the early times of the Church, and before monasteries or nunneries were established, consecrated virgins used to live with their relatives and friends, and could, according as necessity or certain duties required, appear in public. Fleury sums up the practice on these points in a few words;

“ Dans les premiers temps les vierges, même consacrées solennellement par l'évêque, ne laissoient pas de vivre dans les maisons particulières, n'ayant pour clôture que leur vertu. Depuis elles formèrent de grandes communautes ; et enfin on a jugé nécessaire de les tenir enfermées sous une clôture très-exacte.” Instit. au Dr. Eccl. part. 1. ch. 28.

(54) Third Life, cap. 73. Colgan (Not. ad. loc.) thinks that the place was Killbrighde, now Kilbride in the county of Waterford. It is in the neighbourhood of Tramore.

(55) Cliach is otherwise called Aracliach (Colgan AA. SS. p. 13.). The country about Knockany, the barony of Conagh, &c. were comprized in it. (See Chap. vi. §. 8.)

(56) Third Life, cap. 76.

(57) Ib. cap. 81. Colgan thinks that Labrathi was the same as Hy-Kinsellagh. (See above Not. 45 to Chap. vi.)

(58) Ib. cap. 87.

(59) See Not. 79 to Chap. v.

(60) The fourth Life (L. 1. c. 49.) has ; “ Post haec exiit S. Brigida cum suis ut peregrinaretur in provincia Conachtorum—et habitavit ibi in campo Haii, aedificans cellas et monasteria per circuitum.” See also Third Life, cap. 94. Colgan mentions (Tr. Th. p. 625.) several places in Connaught, called Killbrighde, Teghbrighde, &c. But we are not bound to believe, that nunneries were erected there at the time we are treating of. It is more probable that the ladies, who first submitted to her rule, were not shut up in convents. (See Not. 53.) In the passages now referred to a bishop is spoken of as being at the place, in which she dwelt. But his name is not given. Was he Cethucus, or Asicus? (See Chap. vii. §. 5. 6.)

§. v. Before we enter on the remaining part of the history of St. Brigid, let us endeavour to find out how other ecclesiastical matters were going on in Ireland. We have seen that Iarlath succeeded Benignus in the see of Armagh. His accession could not have been earlier than the latter end of A. D. 468, the year in which Benignus died. He was of the illustrious house of the Dalfiatach, and was born at Rathrena in the now county of Down, (61) a castle so called from the name of his father Trena. It is said that he was a first cousin of Dichuo, St. Patrick's first convert, Trena and Trichem, the father of Dichuo, having been brothers. Nothing particular has come down to us with regard to his proceedings, and all that we know further about him is, that he was the third archbishop, and that he died on the eleventh of February A. D. 482. (62) Accordingly his incumbency lasted, at the utmost, little more more than thirteen years. (63) During this period and for some years earlier the king of Ireland was Alild Molt, or, as some call him, Olioll Molt, who, from being king of Connaught, was raised to the throne of all Ireland in place of his relative Leogaire, (64) who fell in battle A. D. 463. (65) Whether he was a Christian or not, I am not able to ascertain; although some modern writers speak of him as such, and go so far as to assert that the Christian religion was during his reign incorporated with the civil constitution, (66) which is as much as to say, that it became the religion of the state. Yet it appears to me very strange, that his name never occurs in the Lives of St. Patrick, not even in the Tripartite, in which we find so many chieftains and subordinate kings mentioned as Christians. Alild's reign over Ireland began before the saint's death, and he had been king of Connaught for some years sooner. Therefore it would seem that, had he been a Christian, he would, in consequence of his dignity, have been particularly spoken of. His name occurs in one of the Lives of St. Brigid, but without the least allusion to his religion. As to a connexion between Church and State having taken place in his time, this cannot, I think, be reconciled with the fact that his successor Lugadius, as will be seen, lived and died a pagan. Alild, having reigned 20 years, was killed in the battle of Ocha in Meath, A. D. 483. (67)

(61) It has been deduced from a strange story related by Jocelin (cap. 132) about the wickedness and miserable end of one Tremei, whom the Tripartite (L. 3. c. 57, seqq.) calls Trena the father of Iarlath, that Rath-trena was in the district of Mourne. In the course of that story, as given in the Tripartite, the birth of Iarlath is placed after St. Patrick's return from Munster, that is, after A. D. 452. (See Chap. VII. §. 9.) How then could he be a bishop in 468? Yet by these fables about Trena the poor man's character has been terribly blasted. I do not mean to assert, that he was a Christian; but if there was such a monster of the name of Tremei or Trena, I am sure he was different from the father of Iarlath. From the same fables Colgan (at Iarlath, 11 Feb.), after him Harris (Bishops), concluded that Iarlath was rather young when raised to the see of Armagh. For the Tripartite represents him as having been baptized, when an infant, by St. Patrick, and therefore after A. D. 432. But Colgan, when giving credit to these stories, should have followed them as he found them, and consequently should have placed Iarlath's infancy not merely after 432 but after 452. Strange that he did not see into those shameful anachronisms, and reject such nonsense in toto!

(62) AA. SS. at 11 Feb. Ware, Bishops. Usher, Ind. Chron.

(63) The reckoning of 18 years for Iarlath's administration (See Not. 8 and 11.) cannot be reconciled with the dates marked in our Annals. Usher was so hard pushed to find room for them that (p. 875) he stretched them down to A. D. 483, as if that were the first year of the incumbency of Cormac the successor of Iarlath. Did he not know that Iarlath died on the 11th of February, or did he suppose that the see remained vacant a whole year? I suspect that the number XVIII, on which Usher built, (See Not. 141 to Chap. VI.) was a mistake of a transcriber for XIII. Ware very prudently said nothing about Iarlath's years, nor did Colgan in his enumeration of the bishops of Armagh (Tr. Th. p. 293). Harris, however, foisted into Ware, that Iarlath died in the 18th year of his pontificate.

(64) Alild Molt was son of Dathy, and consequently nearly related to Leogaire, who was Dathy's first cousin. (See Not. 20 to Chap. IV. and Not. 42 to Chap. V.) Usher, (p. 947) and Ware (Antiq. cap. 4.) instead of Dathy read Nathi.

(65) This is the year marked by Usher (loc. cit.) and Ind. Chron., Ware (loc. cit.), and O'Flaherty (Ogyg. cap. 93). It is specified by the observation that Leogaire reigned for full 30 years after the arrival of St. Patrick. Yet Colgan, following the 4 Masters, places (Tr. Th. p. 447) Leogaire's death (without adding that he was slain) in the year 458 (459). As I am not writing the civil history of Ireland, I will not enter into a disquisition on these subjects.

(66) O'Connor, Dissertations, &c. Dissert. 1 sect. 15.

(67) Usher, p. 1029 and Ind. Chron. Ware, Ant. cap. 4. O'Flaherty, &c. The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 565) assign that battle to A. D. 478 (479), thus reckoning the 20 years of Alild Molt's reign from 458. (See Not. 65.)

§. VI. Although it is uncertain what religion was professed by the monarch of Ireland, yet there can be no doubt that several of the minor kings and dynasts of this period were Christians. Some of those young princes, who had been instructed by St. Patrick, (68) must by this time have been in the possession of their domains. Illand, and perhaps Alild, princes of North Leinster, who are spoken of as Christians, (69) belonged to those times, as did Crimthan the dynast of Hy-Kinsellagh. (70) Among the Ulster chieftains, who were then Christians, I believe we may safely reckon Fergus, son of St. Patrick's friend Conal, and grandfather of St. Columba. (71) I pass over some persons of less note, and whom we should rather call nobles than chieftains, such as those belonging to the families of Dichuo, Daire, &c. In Connaught we find, at least, some members of the princely house of Tir-Amalgaidh, (72), and, if we are to believe the Tripartite, even a son of the monarch Dathy. (73) But of all the Irish princes of that period, who distinguished themselves as Christians, Aengus, king of Cashel, or Munster, has been most celebrated for his piety and zeal. It can scarcely be admitted, that he was a king when St. Patrick was in that province, nor can it by any means be allowed that the so much talked of synod of Cashel, or meeting at Magh-femyn, was held at that time. (74) Yet there is nothing to prevent our believing that, several years later, perhaps about A. D. 484, a synod and meeting were held in those places for the purpose of regulating the ecclesiastical concerns of the South of Ireland. Ailbe was certainly a bishop at that time; and it is not improbable that Declan of Ardmore, although younger than Ailbe, was then old enough to be one also. For, although he lived until towards the middle of the sixth century, in which he was particularly distinguished; (76) yet, if we suppose that he reached the age of about ninety, he might have been thirty years old in the year 484. Thus, with the mere exclusion of the name of St. Patrick, might be admitted what is related in the Life of Declan concerning a conference in Magh-femyn, at which the chiefs of the Desii attended, and a synod at Cashel, in which, with the approbation and cooperation of king Aengus, the extent of ecclesiastical jurisdiction was determined and many salutary decrees enacted. (77) Or, should it be contended that Declan was not a member of that synod, it will not follow that it was not held, particularly as it is alluded to in the Life of Ailbe. (78) As to the meeting at Magh-femyn, (79) it was most probably the one assembled there, when St. Brigid was in that country, and at which bishop Ercus attended. (80)

(68) See Chap. v. §. 8. and Not. 12 to Chap. vi.

(69) Chap. vi. §. 5.

(70) Ib. and Not. 57.

(71) See Chap. vi. §. 2.

(72) See Chap. v. §. 12.

(73) See ib. This prince, Eochad, who is called son of Dathy, must have been a brother of Alild Molt, who, if he had ever become a Christian, would not have been passed over by an author, who tells us that a brother of his was one.

(74) See Chap. vi. §. 6.

(75) See Chap. vii. §. 7.

(76) Chap. i. §. 12.

(77) "Commanentes in civitate Cassel S. Patricius et S. Albaeus sanctusque Declanus cum multis sanctis suis discipulis apud regem Aenaeam multa circa ecclesiastici regiminis et vigoris Christiani leges, et in Christianae fidei ulteriorem propagationem constituerunt."

(78) See Not. 67. to Chap. vi. It is somewhat remarkable that in Ailbe's life Declan is not mentioned on this occasion.

(79) Vit. S. Declan. cap. 30, seqq.

(80) Above §. 4.

§. VII. When Ailbe was returning from Cashel to Emly he was met by Enna or Enda, who requested of him to go back with him and to supplicate the king that he would please to grant him the island of Arn, (81) for the purpose of erecting a monastery on it. Ailbe complied with his wish and obtained for him said island, or perhaps only a part of it, unless we are to suppose that it was not as yet inhabited; which is indeed probable, as Aengus, on being spoken to on the business, observed that he had not before heard of such an island. Enda immediately set about building the monastery, which could scarcely have been founded before about A. D. 480, as he lived until about the year 540. (82) Nor can its foundation be assigned to a period subsequent to 490, that being the year, in which Aengus was killed. It has been said that Enda erected ten monasteries in the island, as if one had not been sufficient, or all the religious houses, that existed there in late times, should be ascribed to him. (83) The most authentic accounts make mention only of one monastery, in which he governed 150 monks according to the strictest rules of discipline. (84) Enda was of the illustrious house of the princes of Orgiel, (85) and son of Conal the son of Damen or Damhene. (86) This Damen could not have been the prince of Orgiel of that name, who is said to have lived in the latter part of the sixth century; (87) for, in that case, we should bring Enda down to the seventh, which cannot be reconciled with the most creditable authorities. (88) Enda's father is called Conal of Clogher, whence it may be inferred that he was born at or near that town. (89) According to some accounts he was brother in law to king Aengus, who is said to have been married to his sister Dairine. (90) This is less improbable than the stories concerning his having been actually prince of Orgiel; and, on having resigned his principality, gone to foreign countries for the purpose of doing penance; erected a monastery called Latinum after he had been ordained priest at Rome, on which occasion some monstrous fables occur which even Colgan rejects; and on the whole having spent 20 years in exile before he made application for a grant of the isle of Arran, it is unnecessary to examine these and some other vague circumstances of his life, which are to be met with here and there; and I will merely observe, that those rambles of 20 years after having reached the age of manhood cannot be reconciled with his having lived until about A. D. 540, unless we should suppose that he was, at least, 100 years old when he died. The resort of so many distinguished persons to his monastery, and the manner, in which he is spoken of in the old calendars and martyrologies, prove that he was an eminent saint and most highly respected. I do not find him marked by any other title than that of abbot.

(81) It is the largest of the South isles of Arran, which are three in number and lie in the mouth of the bay of Galway. It has been called Ara-na-naomh, or, Arran of the saints. In Ailbe's Life we read; "Magna est illa insula, et est terra sanctorum; quia nemo scit numerum sanctorum, qui sepulti sunt ibi, nisi solus Deus."

(82) In the Acts of St. Brendan of Clonfert it is related that, before he set out on his great voyage, he paid a visit to Enda in Arran and spent three days with him. (See Usher, p. 963.) This must have been, as Colgan observes, (AA. SS. p. 714) about A. D. 540. And it appears from the Acts of Kieran of Clonmacnois, that Enda was alive in 530 (Usher Ind. Chron.) and even later, as will be seen elsewhere when treating of Kieran. It is strange that Usher, on finding that Enda lived to so late a period, could have affixed the foundation of his monastery of Arran to A. D. 449. (Ib.) He was led astray in this and several other chronological points by his preconceived opinion, that Ailbe was a bishop earlier even than 449. Had he not placed the monastery of Arran too early, he need not have doubted (ib. at A. 530) of Enda's being alive in said year. Harris, as usual, follows Usher, and has (Monasteries) for Arran A. D. 449; although Ware, who is seldom wrong, and whose opinion he ought, at least, to have let the reader know, assigns (Antiq. Chap. 27 at Galway) that foundation to about the year 480. What has been now observed concerning the time that Enda founded his monastery serves also to prove, that whatever synod was held at Cashel during the reign of Aengus did not take place until the period we are treating of; for that monastery was erected very soon after the breaking up of the synod.

(83) In the Life of Enda or Endeus (AA. SS. 21 Mart.) written by Augustin Magraidin, and abounding in fables, we read (cap. 17) “Divisit in partes decem inter eos (discipulos) insulam, et in ea construxit decem monasteria; et in quolibet ordinavit unum superiorem quasi patrem, et alterum quasi secundum ei in potestate.” If these superiors of the respective houses were not mentioned, it might be admitted that Enda had constructed ten different cells at some distance from each other, all which, however, would have formed but one monastery of that sort, which the Egyptian monks called Laura. (See Bingham, B. VII. ch. 2 sect. 2.) But the author alluded to the ten religious houses, that were in the island in his days, and of which in Colgan's time there remained only the chapels or churches, which Archdall, with his usual wisdom, says (at Arran) were built by Enda.

(84) See AA. SS. p. 711, seqq.

(85) Orgiel or Oriel comprized the now counties of Louth and Monaghan, and some other districts.

(86) Colgan says that Enda was the Mac-hua-Daimene or Damhene of Tirechan's list. (See Not. 33 to Chap. VII.) I believe Enda could not have been a disciple of St. Patrick, unless perhaps when a mere boy. Usher happened to say (p. 867) that Enda was the same as Ennaus son of Cath-bothai, and that he died A. D. 457. But in the Addenda et Emendanda (p. 1048) he marked a Dele to what he had there written.

(87) See Tr. Th. p. 381.

(88) In a marginal note to Tr. Th. p. 381, seemingly written by John Conry, to whom the copy, which I use, once belonged, it is contended in opposition to Colgan, that Damen, the grand father of Enda, was the same as Damen, who lived late in the sixth century. But the arguments are of no weight, and some of them prove the very reverse. For instance, the writer refers to a passage of O'Donnell's Life of Columb-kill, (L. 1. c. 106) in which it is said that this saint called upon Endeus in Arran. Now O'Donnell places this circumstance before Columb-kill's departure from Ireland, which was in 563. Therefore the monastery of Arran existed long before 583, one of the earliest years guessed at in said note for the foundation of Arran. Columba might have paid that visit about A. D. 540. Another argument is that St. Carecha, said to have been sister of Enda, and grand-daughter of Damen, died, according to the 4 Masters in 578. Surely this proves the contrary of what the note-writer maintained. Carecha is marked as having lived to a very great age. How then could she have been the grand-daughter of a man, who, at the earliest, did not die until A. D. 560? We must, therefore, distinguish this Damen from the grandfather of Enda, or reject all that has been said about his having got Arran from king Aengus, his having been a superior of Kieran, visited by Brendan (see Not. 82) and even by Columba. Yet I acknowledge, that a difficulty of much greater weight than those alleged by the writer of the note may be deduced from the catalogue of Irish saints (Usher, p. 914), in the second order of whom we find an Endeus. That order flourished from about the year 544 until near the end of the sixth century. Endeus of Arran might have been alive for some time after 544, and so be reckoned in that order; but the difficulty consists in the name, Endeus, being placed towards the end of the list after the Brendans, Finmians, Kieran, Columba, &c. as if he were a junior compared with them, and accordingly should be supposed to belong not to the former, but to the latter part of the sixth century. Yet perhaps the name was misplaced in Usher's copy; and its appearing with one or two others within crotchets seems to indicate, that something of that kind had happened. Should this observation not be thought satisfactory, we may observe that the Endeus of the catalogue was a different person, perhaps the one of Emleaghfad who was a disciple of Columba, while the great Endeus of Arran is to be placed in the first order among the Ailbes, Declans, Mac-carthens, and so many others, whose names are not mentioned. The Bollandists state (at 21 Mart.) that he did not live down to A. D. 550, nor perhaps later than 540.

(89) Colgan relates that St. Fanchea (AA. SS. 1. Jan.) a sister of Enda was born at Rathmore near Clogher, formerly a castle and residence of the princes of Orgiel.

(90) Vit. S. Endaei, cap. 12. Unless this be a story founded on the kindness of Aengus towards Enda, we must admit that Aengus was twice married, first to Dairene, and next to Ethne Huathach, daughter of Crimthan of Hy-Kinsellagh, who was certainly his queen at the time he was killed. (See Tr. Th. p. 551, and 565, and Keating, Book 2.)

§. VIII. The reputation of Ailbe was daily increasing. Being a very humble man, he wished to shun the honour that was shown to him by every one, and accordingly determined on withdrawing from his diocese and on retiring to the island of Tyle, (91) there to live known only to God, and retired from the world. Aengus, however, thwarted his plan, and gave directions at all the seaports that Ailbe should be watched and not allowed to quit those, who by his preaching and baptizing were become children of God. (92) It seems that Ailbe was to be accompanied by several pious persons, and that his intention was to lead together with them a monastic life; for it is added that, though not permitted to leave Ireland, he then sent 22 men beyond sea. (93) These were allowed to depart; but the good king would not suffer his subjects to be deprived of the spiritual superintendance of Ailbe. This was probably one of his last pious acts, and not long prior to his being killed A. D. 490 in the great battle of Killofnadh. (94) The memory of Aengus was so much revered, that it was considered a great honour to be a member of his family and descended from him. Hence it has come to pass that a considerable number of persons have been called his sons, no matter in what part of Ireland they lived, and that many an Aengus has been changed into the king of Cashel, and many a Natfraich into his father. (95) These mistakes were carried so far, that of 24 children, whom it was pretended he had, twelve are said to have been saints. (96) I find only one saint, the Abbot Naal, who may with a sufficient degree of probability be pronounced a son of his, and who will be treated of hereafter. But among his less immediate posterity we shall meet with several persons, distinguished for their sanctity and learning.

(91) Tyle is the name used by the Irish for the Thule so much spoken of by the ancients. It is in fact the same name, and signifies a northern country, from thuah, the left, or North. Usher quotes (Pr. p. 868) a passage from Dicuil an Irish writer of the 8th or 9th century, in which the island Tyle is plainly supposed to be Iceland. It is well known that Irish missionaries have been in that island, and Dicuil speaks of some, who had been there in his time; but it is singular that it could have been resorted to by navigators from Ireland as far back as the 5th century. If what is said of Ailbe's intention of going thither be true, it shows that the ancient Irish carried on a more extensive commerce than is generally imagined.

(92) Vit. S. Albaei, cap. 40.

(93) Ib. Colgan (AA. SS. p. 241) thinks that for 22 ought to be read 24; and that those persons were the 24 disciples of Ailbe, whom Brendan, in the course of his voyage, found in an island leading an angelical life.

(94) The 4 Masters have (ap. Tr. Th. p. 565.); “Anno 489 (490) Aengussius filius Natfraich Momoniae rex occubuit in praelio de Killofnadh, caesus per Murchertachum filium Ercae, Illandum filium Dunlaing, Alildum filium Dunlaing, et Euchadium Guineach.” (See above Not. 62 to Chap. vi.)

(95) For instance Marian Gorman mentions (at 31 July) three sons of a Natfraich, viz. Follomon, Papan, and Colman Cumber.

Colgan says (AA. SS. p. 174) that in the margin was added, that this Colman was son of Darine, whom he supposed wife of Aengus. (See Not. 90). Thence he concludes that Colman was the son of Aengus, and only the grandson of Natfraich. Then he infers that likewise Follomon and Papan were sons of Aengus. Why place such reliance on a marginal note by some one, who confounded two Colmans together? Or was he sure that Darine was wife to Aengus? It is much more probable that she was not. Besides, those persons are expressly called sons of Natfraich. If Marian thought that their father was king Aengus, would he not have mentioned his name, especially as it was far more celebrated and revered than that of Natfraich? By a similar process Colgan (ib.) makes out another son of Aengus, one Iernoc.

(96) Colgan (loc. cit.). The extravagant fable of Aengus's 24 sons and as many daughters, and half of each number and sex saints (ib.), must have arisen, at least in part, from the circumstance of many persons having been called sons or daughters of men named Aengus. Hence they were fathered upon the king; and at length some compiler reckoning them up made out in all 48 individuals, of whom, according to various vulgar traditions here and there throughout Ireland, he was reported to have been the father.

§. IX. Ecclesiastical schools and seminaries, under the name of monasteries, were established and governed by several Irish prelates of this period. That of Ailbe was probably founded before the death of king Aengus. The monastery or school of Fiech of Sletty has been already spoken of. (97) From the mention made of several disciples of Benignus (98) it appears that he also had some establishment of that kind, or rather that he governed not only the see but the school of Armagh, which seems to have been entrusted to him for some time before the death of St. Patrick. Mel of Ardagh had a great monastery (99) before he was visited by St. Brigid. (100) That of Motheus of Louth has been highly celebrated, and he is represented as a man of learning. (101) Another renowned school was that of Ibar in Begerin,

(102) which he established after having preached the Gospel in various parts of Ireland, and in which he instructed a vast number of persons. (103) We may add, I believe, a school at Antrim under Mochay, whom we find not only called bishop but likewise abbot. (104) But the most distinguished institution of this kind in the more Northern parts of Ireland seems to have been that of Olcan of Derkan, who, although not a bishop in St. Patrick's life time, (105) was in all probability one about the year 480; (106) whereas Aengus Macnise the first bishop of Connor, who died, at the latest, in 514, had been a scholar of his son. (107) In Connaught we find an episcopal monastery or seminary said to have been governed by Asicus at Elphin, (108) before he retired to the desert where he was discovered by some of the disciples, who belonged to that school. (109) There were also some establishments at this period for holy virgins and widows, independently of and partly prior to those of St. Brigid; but I cannot venture to ascertain more than two of them, viz. one at Drum-dubhain in Tyrone, (110) and another at or near Armagh. (111) With great probability may be added that of Kilsleve-Cuilin, in which Darerca, who has been called a sister of St. Patrick, (112) is said to have lived. (113) As to other establishments of this kind, which some writers date from those times, either we have not sufficient proofs of their then existence, (114) or we know that some of them must have been founded at a later period. (115)

(97) Chap. vi. §. v.

(98) Above §. 1.

(99) Third Life of St. Brigid, cap. 29.

(100) See above §. 4.

(101) He is styled, Pater egregiae familiae—Lucerna Lugmadensium—magnus egregius, et longaevus. See AA. SS. p. 732. Compare with Chap. vi. §. 12 and Chap. vii. §. 7.(102) See Chap. 1. §. 13.

(103) In Ibar's Life, as quoted by Usher (p. 1061) we read ; "Adultas, sacerdos, et multa sanctimonia vitæ pollens, Ibarus missus est ad Evangelium prædiscandum per Hiberniam, in qua innumeros ad fidem Christi convertit—Ad fines Lageniensium venit, et australem ejus partem, ubi est litoralis parva insula Begerin, id est, Parva Hibernia, dicta; ubi celebre condidit coenobium, et sacras ibidem literas aliasque artes optimas docuit maximam multitudinem Hibernorum et aliorum."

(104) See Chap. VII. §. 7.

(105) Chap. VII. §. 6.

(106) Usher seems to place his promotion in 474 (Ind. Chron.).

(107) Olcan's Acts at 20 Feb.

(108) Tripart. L. 2. c. 40, Jocelin, cap. 107.

(109) See Chap. VII. §. 6.

(110) See Chap. VI. §. 3, and III. §. 18.

(111) Chap. VI. §. 13.

(112) Chap. III. §. 18.

(113) Kilsleve-Cuilin (the Killevy of Archdall) is in the county of Armagh. The 4 Masters, and Ware (Ant. cap. 26) make Darerca, alias Moninne, who died on the 6th July A. D. 518, abbess there. (See more Not. 116 to Chap. XVII.) As to an unnery of the same Darerea at Linn near Carrickfergus, which Harris and Archdall have, I can find no authority for it, except these few words of one of our martyrologies; "S. Darerca in Line" (AA. SS. p. 719). This passage may be understood of a church in that place under the title of St. Darerca; or there might have been a Darerca there different from the one of the 5th century. In p. 262 of the AA. SS. to which Archdall refers there is not a word about Line or Linn.

(114) A nunnery of St. Fanchea is mentioned in the Acts of Enda of Arran, whose sister she is said to have been. Colgan, who treats of this saint at 1 Jan. found a parish church at Rosoirthir in Fermanagh, in which her festival used to be kept, and thence conjectured that she had a nunnery there. From him Harris took it, and then Archdall, who has it at Ross Orry. But are we to suppose that every holy virgin established a nunnery? As to the authority of the Acts of Enda, it is not worth attending to (see Not. 83), unless corroborated by other testimonies; and it so happens, that what is said in them about Fanchea is intermixed with some of the most fabulous parts of the whole tract. Now I find no confirmation of what we there read about Fanchea. There were, as Colgan remarks, several saints of that name; but nothing occurs to make us admit that any of them founded a nunnery in the 5th century. Harris and Archdall have two of these pretended early establishments in the county of Longford, for which there is much less foundation than for that of Fanchea. One is Druimcheo, said to have been erected for St. Lupita. Certain absurd stories concerning Mel and Lupita (Tripart. L. 2. c. 29. and Jocelin, cap. 102.) have given rise to the notion of there having been a nunnery there in St. Patrick's time. Whatever house of that kind Lupita might have been in, it was no other than that of Armagh. (See Chap. vi. §. 13. Not. 139) And if ever there was one at Druimcheo, it must have been derived from the institution of St. Brigid, who had spent some time in that neighbourhood. The other is that of Cluain-Bronach or Clonbrone near Granard for the two Emerias. To support this position, much better authority would be requisite than the vague traditions about these pretended daughters of the unfortunate Milchuo. (See Not. 26. to Chap. v.)

(115) Kill-Liadain or, as Archdall calls it, Killiadhuin (King's Co.) is said to have been founded by Kieran of Saigir, and therefore not before the sixth century. (See Chap. i. §. 14.) For the same reason that of Ross-Benchuir (Co. Clare) belongs to the same period; for the first abbess Concha, or rather Cocchea, is stated to have nursed Kieran. (AA. SS p. 461-465.) As to Kilaraght, which also has been affixed to the 5th century, I have already noticed some mistakes concerning it (Chap. v. §. 10.), and more will be seen elsewhere.

§. x. Ware and Harris assign the foundation of St. Brigid's great nunnery of Kildare to about A. D. 480. It is very probable that it was established some time between that year and 490. (116) The occasion of her founding it is thus related. As the great reputation of the saint, and the supernatural gifts, with which she was endowed, attracted persons from all parts of Ireland to the place of her residence, the people of Leinster thought they had the best right to enjoy such a treasure on account of her being of a Leinster family. Accordingly they sent to the part of Connaught where she then was, (117) a deputation, consisting of several respectable persons and friends of hers, to request that she would come and fix her residence among her own people and relatives. She complied with their wish, and, when arrived in that district, was welcomed with the greatest joy. She was immediately accommodated with a habitation for herself and her companions, which was the commencement both of her great monastery and of the town or city of Kildare. (118) It got this name from there being a very high oak tree near that habitation or cell. (119) Some land was annexed to the house, as a help towards the maintenance of the inmates. (120) Yet they were poor, and accordingly we find, now and then, mention made of alms of various sorts brought to the nunnery. (121) But whatever property St. Brigid possessed or acquired in any manner was shared by her with the poor, and wonderful instances of her liberality have been recorded. Let it suffice to mention that of her having given in charity some very valuable sacerdotal vestments, which used to be worn by the bishop on the more solemn festivals. (122) She was very hospitable to strangers and particularly to bishops and religious persons. (123) Her humility was so great, that she used occasionally to tend the cattle on her land. (124) The extraordinary veneration, in which she was held, caused a great resort of persons, from the highest (125) to the lowest, to her monastery for the purpose of requesting her prayers, and, joined with the afflux of the poor and infirm claiming alms and relief, gave rise to a new town for the accommodation of such a multitude of visitors. Meanwhile her establishment was becoming more and more numerous, and it became necessary to enlarge her buildings proportionally to the number of her nuns and postulants. (126) Next she found it requisite to provide spiritual direction and assistance both for her institution and for the settlers and visitors at Kildare. Knowing that this could not be regularly had without a bishop, she made application for that purpose, and procured the appointment of a holy man to preside over that church and other churches belonging to her order. (127) If the latter part of this statement be correct, viz. that this bishop was to have jurisdiction over all the churches and communities of St. Brigid's institution, jointly however with herself, we will have one of the oldest instances, and perhaps the very first, of the exemption of religious houses from the jurisdiction of the ordinaries, or bishops in whose districts they were situated. That the saint herself and the abbesses, who succeeded her in Kildare, exercised certain rights and authority over the members of her institution, wherever they lived, will not be denied; but it is scarcely credible that the bishops of Kildare would have been allowed to interfere except with such of them as resided in their diocese. It seems, however, that some such privilege existed, with regard to Leinster, in the days of Cogitosus; for at that time Kildare was the ecclesiastical metropolis of the province, and Cogitosus a clergyman or monk there, was not backward in exalting the dignity of that see. (128) St. Brigid is mentioned as having appointed the bishop, whom she wished for; (129) but this must be understood relatively to his having been chosen in consequence of her recommendation, which it was not to be doubted would be attended to by the Irish prelates at that period.

(116) If we are to believe what is said of St. Brigid's having foretold to Illand, king of North Leinster, that he would be victorious in his battles, one of which was that in which Aengus, king of Cashel was killed (Fourth Life, L. 2. c. 10, seqq.) the house at Kildare must have been established before A. D. 490. For, she is spoken of as already settled there, and that was the year in which Aengus fell. (Not. 94.) Considering that she had been in Munster probably about the year 484 (see §. 4 and 6.) and spent sometime afterwards in Connaught before she founded Kildare, we may affix said foundation to about the year 487.

Colgan thought (Tr. Th. p. 565) it might have been about A. D. 483.

(117) Above §. 4. (118) Fourth Life, L. 2. c. 1. seqq.

(119) "Illa jam cella Scotice dicitur Kill-dara, Latine vero sonat Cella quercus. Quercus enim altissima ibi erat—cujus stipites adhuc manet." (Ib. L. 2. c. 3.) Usher has refuted (p. 626, seqq.) the assertion of that impostor Dempster, viz. that Kildare was so called from the reliques of a Scotch woman, Daria, mother of St. Ursula, which had been brought to Ireland. There was an Irish virgin of that name and a companion of St. Brigid at Kildare, who is mentioned in that same fourth Life, L. 2. c. 89. But the author derives the name, Kildare, not from her, but from the oak. And in the third Life (cap. 47.) it is called Cella roboris.

(120) See Cogitosus, cap. 5. where mention is made of reapers working for St. Brigid. The circumstance there related is given in the first or metrical Life in the following words; "Quodam die messis, licet erat pauper (non erat haec ansa reprehensionis menti religiosae) serenum fuit in ejus messe, per reliqua loca ingens pluvia." (Stroph. 15.)

(121) Third Life, cap. 47, 48, 50. Fourth, L. 2. c. 4, &c.

(122) Cogitos. cap. 29. Fourth Life, L. 2. c. 80. This act was somewhat similar to the celebrated one of St. Ambrose, who disposed of some sacred utensils for the ransom of captives, a proceeding which he maintains the propriety of in his Offices (L. 2. c. 28); and which was imitated by St. Augustin, as Possidius tells us in his Life, cap. 24.

(123) See Cogitosus, cap. 6. fourth Life, L. 2. cap. 55-59.

(124) Cogitosus, cap. 7, 8.

(125) See third Life, cap. 64, seqq.

(126) In the fourth Life (L. 2. c. 3.) after mentioning the first habitation or cell, which was assigned to St. Brigid, it is added that she erected there a monastery for a great number of virgins. Cogitosus in the prologue writes; "Haec ergo egregiis crescens virtutibus, ubi per famam bonarum rerum ad eam de omnibus provinciis Hiberniae innumerabiles populi de utroque sexu confluebant vota sibi voventes voluntarie, suum monasterium—et culmen praecellens omnia monasteria (nunneries) Scotorum—in campetribus campi Liffici (Maghliffe) supra fundamentum fidei firmum construxit."

(127) After the words just quoted Cogitosus continues; “Et prudenti dispensatione de animabus eorem regulariter in omnibus procurans, et de Ecclesiis multarum provinciarum sibi adhaerentibus sollicitans et secum revolvens, quod sine summo sacerdote, qui ecclesias consecraret, et ecclesiasticos in eis gradus subrogaret, esse non posset, illustrem virum et solitarium, omnibus moribus ornatum, per quem Deus virtutes operatus est plurimas, convocans, eum de eremo, et de sua vita solitaria, et sibi obviam pergens, ut ecclesiam in episcopali dignitate cum ea gubernaret, atque ut nihil de ordine sacerdotali in suis deesset ecclesiis, accersivit. “Et postea sic unctum caput,” &c.

(128) He describes it as a principal see and church, and gives its prelate the title of archbishop. The abbess, he says, was revered by all the other abbesses of Ireland. This may be true of the greatest part of them, whereas most of our nunneries followed the rule of St. Brigid.

(129) The fourth Life has (L. 2. c. 19.); “Conlianus episcopus sanctus et propheta Dei, qui habebat cellam in australi parte Campi Liffei, venit in curru ad S. Brigidam, et commoratus est apud eam aliquot diebus, quem beata Brigida primum episcopum elegit in sua civitate Killdara.” Cogitosus also seems to say (Not. 127.) that the appointment was made by her. But it cannot be supposed that so humble a saint would have arrogated to herself a privilege quite contrary to the canons of the Church, or that such a pretension would have been allowed by the hierarchy.

§. XI. The person thus appointed to the new see of Kildare was Conlaith or Conlaeth, or as some call him, Conlian, (130) who had hitherto led a recluse life and was distinguished for his sanctity. (131) It might seem from a passage already quoted, (132) that he was a bishop before he was placed at Kildare; but the text may be well understood of that title being given to him, as the usual one by which he was spoken of in after times, although he was not entitled to it until he was appointed to that see. (133) He was its first bishop; and whatever some persons have advanced concerning certain predecessors of his is not worthy of consideration. (134) The time of his consecration, or, what comes to the same point, of the erection of the see, is not mentioned; but it is probable that it was, at least, two or three years subsequent to the foundation of the nunnery, and not earlier than the year 490. Hitherto the institution had been attended by a priest, and one named Natfroich is distinctly spoken of as the spiritual companion of St. Brigid, and having remained with her all his life time, (135) notwithstanding the superintendance of Conlaeth. It is stated that he used to read for the nuns in the refectory, while they were at their meals. (136) By whom Conlaeth was consecrated we are not informed; but there can be no doubt of there having been a sufficiently full attendance of bishops on that occasion. (137) Fiech of Sletty the principal bishop of Leinster was still alive, and so were St. Brigid's friends Ibar and Ercus, and perhaps Maccalleus. Bronus of Cassel-irra, who is often mentioned in some of St. Brigid's Lives, and who seems to have paid her a visit while she was in Connaught, (138) might have then come to Leinster to shew his attention to the saint, particularly as he is said to have owed to her interposition and miraculous powers the exculpation of his character from a charge once brought against him, by an infamous woman before a great assembly, and in the presence of several bishops. (139) It has been said that Conlaeth presided over a College of monks at Kildare. I believe this is a mistake; he is not mentioned by any other name than that of bishop, nor are any monks spoken of as governed by him. (140) There was undoubtedly a body of inferior clergy under him for the service of the church; but we are not to suppose that all our clergy were of the monastic sort. I do not find any allusion to monks at Kildare until long after St. Brigid's time. (141) Much less admissible is the strange assertion of Colgan that bishop Conlaeth was subject to St. Brigid, whence he would conclude that the abbesses after her time were for many years invested with jurisdiction over the abbots, or, what would be the same, the bishops of Kildare. (142) There is not the least foundation for this statement ; while, on the contrary it is evident from the testimony of Cogitosus, that the bishops of that see were as independent as any others. All that can be admitted is, that in St. Brigid's time the church expenses seem to have been defrayed out of the funds of the monastery ; (143) and that her successors had, in virtue of the original foundation by the saint, a right to the use of the church. (144) While they presided over their institution, the bishops governed the diocese ; although the church or cathedral remained under the joint management of both parties. (145) To conclude the account of the establishment, &c. of Kildare, and of St. Brigid's proceedings about the year 490, I will merely observe, that, were we to believe the story-tellers of Glastonbury, she would have been in that place at this very period ; for they tell us that she arrived there in 488, and remained for many years in a small island near that monastery. (146) This nonsense is scarcely worth mentioning. From her Lives and every Irish document relative to her history it is plain that she spent her whole life in Ireland.

(130) Cogitosus (cap. 29) calls him Conlaith, and (cap. 35) Conlaeth. In the first Life (Stroph. 41.) the name is written Conlaidh ; the fourth has Conlian (Not. prec.), (131) See Not. 127, and 129.

(132) Not. 129.

(133) Cogitosus represents him as merely a holy man living in retirement until he was taken notice of by St. Brigid ; and then adds, Et postea sic unctum caput, &c. (See Not. 127.)

(134) Ware mentions a Red book of the Earl of Kildare, which has one Lonius and then Ivor before Conlaith, and which was followed by Stanihurst. He observes that this is an error, and, he might have added, a palpable one. For, as we have seen (Not. 129), Conlaith is expressly called the first bishop of Kildare ; and it is evident from Cogitosus (See Not. 126, 127.) that there neither was nor could be a bishop there before him; as the establishment of the monastery and the formation of a new town were the causes of a bishop being required there. And until then there was scarcely a house on the spot. Who that Lonius was it is difficult to discover; unless he were a person of that name, who lived in the sixth century and was revered at a place called Killgaura, the affinity between which name and Killdara might, as Colgan very properly remarks, (Tr. Th. p. 565), have led to the mistake of placing him at Kildare. As to Ivor he was the same as Ibar, who having had some communications with St. Brigid, and been a friend of hers, (third Life, cap. 54. fourth, L. 2. c. 23) was supposed by some blunderer to have been her ordinary, and therefore at Kildare.

(135) The fourth Life has (L. 1 c. 43) prior to the foundation of Kildare, the appointment of Natfroich to the duty of attending St. Brigid, which it erroneously attributes to St. Patrick, unless we should suppose that he was constituted her spiritual director, when she was very young. (See above §. 2. “S. Patricius dixit ad beatam virginem; ex hac die non licebit tibi sine sacerdote ambulare, sed sit sacerdos in comitatu tuo. Ordinavit tunc S. Patricius sacerdotem nomine Natfroich, qui in tota vita sua feliciter in comitatu S. Brigidæ vixit.” The author of the third Life has stupidly changed (cap. 41) the attendance on St. Brigid into that of an auriga; and hence the silly denomination of charioteer added to his title of priest. Poor Archdall tells us (at Kildare) that Natfroich is said to have been coachman to St. Brigid! Pray where were coaches to be found in those days? When St. Brigid and Natfroich happened to travel together, we may easily suppose that he drove the curricule; but this is very different from the menial office of a charioteer.

(136) Tr. Th. p. 629.

(137) Perhaps it was to the assemblage of bishops for the consecration of Conlath, that Cogitosus alluded, where he writes (cap. 6.); “Advenientibus enim episcopis, et cum ea hospitantibus,” &c.

(138) See third Life, cap. 85.

(139) The matter is thus related in the third Life, (cap. 39.); “Quaedam autem, quæ in precatum cesidit, dicebat infantem, quem genuit, esse cujusdam episcopi de discipulis St. Patricii nomine Broom. Ille autem negabat. Tunc omnes in concilio, audientes mirabilia et opera St. Brigidae, dixerunt quod haec quaestio per illam finiri possit. Adducta est itaque mulier cum suo infante in sinu ad Brigidam extra concilium. Dixit autem Brigida ad illum; De quo viro concepisti infantem hunc? Illa respondit, de episcopo Broon. Brigida dixit; non sic existimo. Tunc Brigida ad S. Patricium humilians se dixit; Pater, tuum est hanc quaestionem solvere. Patricius respondens ait; Mea filia charissima Brigida, tu revelare digneris. Sancta itaque Brigida signans os illius foeminae signo crucis Christi, statim intumuit totum caput ejus cum lingua; sed nec sic illa poenituit. Tunc Brigida linguam infantis benedixit, dicens ei; Quis est pater tuus? Ille respondit ambulans; non est episcopus Broon pater meus, sed quidam homo, qui sedet in parte concilii ultimus, ac turpis vilisque. Tunc omnes gratias egerunt Deo, et Brigida magnificata est, et mulier poenitentiam egit." The same narrative is given almost verbatim in the fourth Life (L. 1. c. 42.) and more diffusely, with some variations, in the fifth (cap. 50.). It is placed just before the appointment of Natfroich, of which above (Not. 135.) and if such a circumstance occurred in the presence of St. Patrick, St. Brigid must have been then very young. Neither Cogitosus nor the author of the first Life have a word about it, although they relate several miracles much less remarkable and worthy of being recorded than this would have been. I suspect that it is an imitation of a somewhat similar anecdote concerning St. Briccius or Briction bishop of Tours and immediate successor of St. Martin. (See Gregor. Turon. Hist. Fr. L. 2. c. 1.)

(140) Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 627) says it appears from Cogitosus and other writers of St. Brigid's Acts, that Conlaeth presided over monks when bishop of Kildare. But he refers to no particular passage, nor indeed, in my opinion, could he have done so. At least I have not been able to find one to that purpose, nor so much as the title of abbot applied to Conlaeth, as it frequently is in Irish history, whenever bishops had monasteries annexed to their cathedrals. Colgan had before said, that there were three dignitaries at Kildare in St. Brigid's time, viz. the abbess, an abbot, and a Bishop; and then he qualifies this strange position by stating, that Conlaeth was both bishop and abbot. The truth is, that there is no foundation for the existence of any establishment of monks there at that time. Archdall, to patch up the business, has (at Kildare) made Natfroich the first abbot, although his guide Colgan has no such thing, and never calls him even a monk. Natfroich is every where in St. Brigid's Lives called simply a priest. (See Not. 135.)

(141) For the first time we find St. Aidus both abbot and bishop of Kildare, who died in the year 638. (Tr. Th. p. 629) The college called of monks, over which Aidus presided, was in reality the chapter of the Cathedral, as plainly appears from Cogitosus, who describing the church tells us, (cap. 35) that the bishop used to enter the sanctuary by a door in the right side of the church, together with the collegiate body and clerical assistants (cum sua regulari schola et his, qui sacris sunt deputati ministeriis) to immolate the holy and Lord's sacrifice (sacra et Dominica immolare sacrificia); while there was another door at the left for the use of the abbess and nuns alone, by which they entered for the purpose of enjoying the banquet of the body and blood of Jesus Christ (ut convivio corporis et sanguinis fruantur Jesu Christi). Having happened to make mention of this church, I may add that the great aisle of it outside the sanctuary was divided by a partition separating the males from the females, and that each division had a door peculiar to itself. From what has been now observed we see that the nuns had not a separate church for themselves, although their habitation adjoined it on one side, while that of the bishop and chapter seems to have been close to it on the other. Colgan imagined (Tr. Th. p. 627) that both habitations were separated merely by a wall; but the church (and a very large one it was) formed a much wider line of separation.

(142) Colgan endeavoured (Tr. Th. p. 627) to support this whimsical and truly uncanonical position by referring to the singular system of the order of St. Birgitta of Sweden, which consists of both males and females, and in which the abbess has a jurisdiction over not only the nuns but even the monks. Colgan took into his head that, as there was an affinity between the names Brigid and Birgit, their monastic institutions were likewise formed on a similar plan. What has a likeness of names to do in this matter? Besides in the institution of St. Birgitta there was no such thing as jurisdiction over bishops. Colgan ought to have reflected that this Swedish princess most probably knew little or nothing concerning the system of St. Brigid; for at the time of her forming her establishment, viz. not long before A. D. 1370, the nunnery of Kildare was in a state of great insignificance. Archdall has given to his readers in a positive manner what Colgan had proposed as a matter of doubt, and tells them that the abbots of Kildare were for several years subject to the abbess.

(143) The anecdote above mentioned of St. Brigid having given some sacerdotal vestments to the poor shows, that they were considered as belonging to the nunnery.

(144) See Not. 141.

(145) Cogitosus writes (Prolog.) “ Et postea sic unctum caput et principale omnium episcoporum (alluding to Kildare being then the chief see of Leinster) et beatissima puellarum principalis felici comitatu inter se et gubernaculis omnium virtutum suam erexit principalem ecclesiam—quam semper Archiepiscopus—et Abbatissa—felici successione et ritu perpetuo dominantur. ”

(146) See Usher, p. 900, seqq.

§. XII. Iarlath, archbishop of Armagh, who died early in the year 482, (147) was succeeded by Cormac, whom Ware (148) and (Colgan (149) make son of Enda, who is said to have been a brother to king Leogaire. This is, I suspect, a mistake; for Enda's son Cormac, whom his father had entrusted to the care of St. Patrick, (150) is not mentioned in the oldest accounts concerning him as having ever become a bishop, although in the passages relative to him the see of Armagh is particularly spoken of. (151) As to Enda having been a brother of king Leogaire, which I think also a mistake, (152) it is irrelevant to the present subject. The Cormac of Armagh is mentioned in many Irish Calendars, but without the addition of son of Enda, which would not have been omitted, were he the same person. For Enda was a chieftain of high consideration; and were it merely to remind the reader of his having consigned his son Cormac to St. Patrick, the authors of these Calendars would have mentioned his name when treating of the archbishop Cormac. This archbishop is distinguished, in the Irish annals, from many other Cormacs by the addition that he was from the district of Ernaidhe. (153) How much more distinct would not his specification have been by marking him the son of Enda, had he been such? Ernaidhe was probably some part of the country near Lough Erne or the river of said name, unless it was the same as Ernatia, which seems to have been in the now county of Louth. (154) It was certainly different from the territory, in which Enda lived, viz. Usneadh or Usny. (155) Another mistake is, that Cormac had been bishop of Trim, before he was promoted to Armagh. It is true that some writers of our Calendars represent him as such; but it is easy to account for their having done so. There was a Cormac bishop of Trim in the eighth century, whose memory together with that of St. Luman and several others was revered there on the 17th February. (156) Now it happened that this was the very day of the festival or death of Cormac of Armagh; and hence it came to pass that the two Cormacs were confounded together. Then it became necessary to suppose the translation of Cormac from Trim to Armagh, a proceeding which would not have been allowed by the Western church, in the fifth century, without the greatest necessity. Next came another paradox, the burying of Cormac at Trim, because he, who was really bishop of Trim was buried there. Surely the clergy and people of Armagh would not have suffered the remains of their archbishop to be removed to another diocese. The two Cormacs are very clearly distinguished from each other in the Irish Annals. (157) And, what decides the whole question, it is to be observed that Trim was not an episcopal see in the 5th century, and that its first bishop Luman or Loman belonged to the seventh. (158) Cormac, concerning whose transactions I find nothing particular recorded, died on the 17th of February, A. D. 497. (159)

(147) §. 5.

(148) Bishops at Cormac. I believe he merely followed Colgan.

(149) Acts of Cormac at 17 Feb. (150) See Chap. v. §. 8.

(151) In the Tripartite (L. 2. c. 18, 19.) where Cormac son of Enda is said to have been consigned to St. Patrick, it is stated that Cormac used to receive from certain bishops, whom St. Patrick had appointed his masters, some cows every all saints' day towards his support; and that, as these were given to him in honour of St. Patrick, their successors used to continue this sort of payment to the see of Armagh after the death of Cormac. But it does not mention Cormac as having been bishop, and gives him no other name or title than that of Cormac Snithine. Thus the matter stands in the text as quoted at full length by Colgan at 17 Feb. Yet in his edition of the Tripartite in Tr. Th. he has thrown in some words indicating that this Cormac was bishop of Armagh. Instead of, as we read at 17 February, "Et sic postea haec servitus (of giving the cows) eorum ecclesiis adhaesit, donec Nuadhat abbas Ard-machanus" he swells up the text in Tr. Th. with the following words; "Et ille mos postea apud eorum successores transiit in consuetudinem et debitum, ut singuli nempe quotannis successoribus S. Cormaci vaccam debeant solvere, donec Nuadhat, &c." He thought that said tribute could not be paid to Armagh, unless Cormac had been bishop there. And then instead of the words, with which at 17 Feb. the text concludes the account of Cormac; "Cormacus Snithine est nomen hujus filii, (Would the author have called him merely a filius, had he been an archbishop?) Colgan has in Tr. Th. "Sanctus hic Cormacus a loco, ut apparet, educationis cognomento Snithine appellatus est. This is evidently an alteration of the original text. Jocelin, who usually follows the Tripartite, or, at least, certain documents, whence that work was in part derived, has (cap. 100) an account of Enda and his consigning Cormac to St. Patrick's care, which account he thus concludes; "S. Patricius baptizavit puerum, educavit, litterisque imbuat. Puer autem aetate, sapientia, et sanctitate crevit; virtutibus atque miraculis clarus in Domino requievit." Would he not have mentioned his having been raised to the primacy of Armagh, if he had known that to have been the case?

(152) See Not. 69 to Chap. v.

(153) Cormacus de regione Ernaidhe, episcopus Ardmachanus. (AA. SS. p. 359.)

(154) See Not. 84 to Chap. vii. I find (AA. SS. p. 315) an Ernaidhe in Muskerry, co. Cork; but it is not called a district; and besides it is more natural to suppose that Cormac was a native of Ulster rather than of Munster.

(155) See Chap. v. §. 8.

(156) AA. SS. p. 363. Colgan has the Acts of this Cormac at that day, and strives to distinguish him from an older one, likewise bishop of Trim, as he thought, viz. the Cormac who became archbishop of Armagh.

(157) The 4 Masters (ap. AA. SS. p. 360.) have; “A. 496 (497) Cormacus de Crich-anernaidhe, episcopus Ardmachanus, S. Patricii successor, emisit spiritum—A. 741 (742) Cormacus episcopus Athrumensis decessit.”

(158) See Not. 35 to Chap. v. More will be found lower down.

(159) Not. 157. AA. SS. ad 17 Feb. Usher, Ind. Chron. Ware, &c.

§. XIII. During the greatest part of Cormac's incumbency the king of all Ireland was Lugaid or Lugdach, who succeeded Alild Molt in the year 483. (160) He was son to the monarch Leogaire, and, at least, as impious as his father. After a reign of 25 years he was killed in 508 (161) by thunder, as a just judgment for his obstinacy in infidelity and his opposition to the Christian religion. (162) The death of archbishop Cormac was preceded by that of some of our most illustrious prelates. St. Mel of Ardagh died in 488; (163) St. Kienan of Duleek in 489. (164) The last year of St. Maccaleus, who had given the veil to St. Brigid, was A. D. 490. (165) St. Mochay of Antrim survived Cormac; yet only by about four months, as he died on the 23d of June A. D. 497. (166) St. Asicus of Elphin was probably dead by this time; but I cannot find the year of his death, although the day, on which it happened, viz. the 27th of April, would seem to have been recorded; if, however, he was the same as Assanus, whose name was affixed to that day. (167) Nor is it unlikely that Cethecus, Tassach, and perhaps one or two more of our bishops, who had been consecrated in St. Patrick's time, (168) had departed this life before the year now mentioned. Meanwhile other holy men were forming new churches. Munis, a bishop, who is said to have been a Briton and a brother of Mel, (169) is supposed to have founded the church at Forgney in the county of Longford (170) about the year 486. If he had been brother to Mel, that date would answer well enough; but the kindred between them is quite too doubtful to serve as a clue in this matter, being founded merely on the stories concerning their relationship to St. Patrick. There is, however, an argument, which, notwithstanding its being blended with fables, merits some consideration, and helps to fix the time, at which Munis erected his church. It is this, that said church existed before the birth of Kieran of Clonmacnois, (171) and is stated to have been erected 30 years prior to it. (172) Now, as Kieran was born, as is usually supposed, in the year 516, this computation brings us back directly to 486. Of Munis I find nothing else that can be depended upon, except that his festival was affixed to the 18th of December. (173) Another saint is usually joined with Munis, viz. Rioch, and, were we to believe the fables about St. Patrick's nephews, also a brother of his and a son of Darerca. (174) But St. Rioch belongs to the sixth century, having been contemporary with the holy bishop Aedus, who died A. D. 589, (175) and who had visited Rioch in his monastery of Inis-bo-finde in Lough Rec. (176) Is it then to be believed that he was brother to Mel, came with him to Ireland about A. D. 454, was St. Patrick's librarian, made bishop by him, &c. to omit other stuff raked together by Colgan? (177) Towards the later end of the 5th century I find a bishop Cerbanus of Fearta-Cerbain near Tarah, whose death is affixed to A. D. 500. (178) Nothing further is known about him. From his name Cerban, or Cervan, perhaps that of Killcarn in Meath has been derived. Could he be the same as Corpain, whom the Annals of Innisfallen call bishop of Iferte, (179) and whose death they assign to the same year, viz 500? Iferte is thought to be the country about Ard-fert in Kerry; (180) but that name might have been given also to other places, and bears a strong analogy to that of Fert or Feart-Cerbain. (181) Were it not for the addition, near Tarah, I should be inclined to conclude that Cerbanus was the same person as Corpain, and that Ardfert was his see.

(160) Above §. 5. This is the year assigned by Usher, Ware, &c. Yet Colgan, (Ind. Chron. to Tr. Th.) following the 4 Masters places the commencement of Lugaid's reign in 478 (479). See Not. 65.

(161) Colgan, still adhering to the 4 Masters, has A. D. 503 (504).

(162) Ware, Antiq. eap. 4. Keating, B. 2. p. 15. Ed. A. 1723. In the Tripartite (L. 1. c. 67.) it is related, that he was struck immediately after having spoken contemptuously of St. Patrick, and that the place, where this catastrophe occurred, was thence called Achadh-farcha, the hill of thunder. Colgan says (Tr. Th. p. 172.) that it was so called in his time, and that it lies in the county of Meath.

(163) Chap. vii. §. 5.

(164) Ib. §. 6.

(165) The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 526) have; "A. 489 (490) Maccalle episcopus obiit."

(166) AA. SS. p. 189. See more Not. 74 to Chap. vii.

(167) See Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 114.

(168) See Chap. vii. 5, 6, 7.

(169) Munis is reckoned among the pretended nephews of St. Patrick by his sister Darerca (Usher p. 825.) I will not trouble the reader with further observations on these fables. (See Chap. iii. §. 18.)

(170) We read in the Tripartite (L. 2. c. 2.); "S. Munis episcopus de Forgnuidhe in regione Cuircne, in boreali parte Midiae, ad ripam australem fluminis Ethne (Inny)." Archdall has Forgney in Westmeath, on the supposition that the territory of Cuircne did not extend beyond the western boundary of that county. But from Forgney having been in that territory, it appears that Cuircne comprized some part of the adjoining county of Longford, in which is Forgney, as it is called to this day, and in the barony of Shrowle (see Seward, Topogr. Hib.), through which flows the river Inny.

(171) Tripart. L. 2. c. 20 down to 26. Jocelin, capp. 113, 114.

(172) Colgan (AA. SS. p. 266) quotes a passage to this purpose from the Supplement to the Acts of St. Kieran.

(173) In the martyrology of Salisbury it is marked at 6 Feb., and Colgan has given his Acts, such as they are, at that day.

(174) Usher, p. 825. Ware, Antiq. cap. 26, at Longford. Colgan, at 6 Feb. Bollandus also at same day has admitted these stories.

(175) Usher, Ind. Chron.

(176) Inis-bo-finde or the island of the white cow, is in Lough-Ree, a lake formed by the Shannon between Connaught and the county of Longford. In the Life of St. Aedus, cap. 35, (AA. SS. ad 28 Feb.) we read; “ Venit sanctus episcopus Aedus ad insulam Bo-finde, id est, vaccae albae, quae est in stagno Righe; et suscepit eum S. Rioch abbas illius loci honorifice. Monasterium enim clarum in illa insula est, quod ex nomine insulae nominatur.” There is another island of the same name, or, as now called, Innis-boffin, in the ocean off the barony of Morisk, Co. Mayo. Usher (p. 825) mistook it for the other, but afterwards (p. 1070) corrected himself.

(177) Ad 6 Feb. Usher saw into these absurdities, and therefore distinguished (p. 1045) two Riochs, one the abbot of Inis-bo-finde in the sixth century, and the other an older one, viz. as he still thought, the nephew of St. Patrick. But in all the stories about Rioch this pretended nephew and the founder of Innis-bo-finde are spoken of as the same person.

(178) The 4 Masters (ap. AA. SS. p. 732) have at A. 499 (500); “ S. Cerbanus episcopus de Feart-Cerbain prope Temoriam obiit.” A holy priest Corbanus is mentioned in the Acts of St. Mochtheus (cap. 13) who might have become a bishop, and was, in Colgan’s opinion, the same as Cerbanus.

(179) “ A. 500. Quies Corpain episcopi Iferte.”

(180) Harris (Bishops at Ardfert) observes that Iferte, or Hy-

ferte, signifies the territory of miracles. Ware (Antiq. cap. 29) says that Ardfert is the high place of miracles. If Ardfert was in Iferte, we will have found the first bishop on record in Kerry, viz. Corpain. Yet Ware, who made great use of the Annals of Innisfallen, does not mention him at Ardfert.

(181) As Feart or Fert is an Irish word for miracle, we find it applied to several places. Feart-Cerbain may be explained the place of Cerbain's miracle; in like manner the phrase bishop of Iferte may be understood, bishop of the place of the miracle.

§. XIV. In the same year (A. D. 500) died on the 23d of April the celebrated St. Ibar of Beg-erin, (182) concerning whom every thing worthy of being recorded has been already related. Before we conclude the account of the 5th century, it must not be forgotten that Cormac, who died A. D. 497, was succeeded at Armagh by Dubtach, or, as some have called him, Duach. (183) Colgan adds to his name de Druim-dhearbh, but does not tell us where that place was situated. (184) Little or nothing remains relative to his history except that he governed the see for 16 years, and died in 513. The see of Connor was very probably established before the close of the 5th century; for Aengus Macnise its first bishop, who had been a disciple of Olcan, (185) did not, at the latest, live beyond the year 514. Ware states that Cailan, whom he supposed first bishop of Down, was contemporary with Macnise, and that he was raised to that see about the end of the century. (186) Cailan is called also Coelan, and had been abbot at Antrim, (187) perhaps under St. Mochay. Colgan does not, as far as I can discover, speak of Coelan as a bishop. He seems not to have had his Acts, which Usher refers to as indicating that from being abbot at Antrim he became bishop of Down. (188) Yet there are strong reasons for believing that he was not at any time a bishop; one of which is that we find him, when far advanced in life, still styled merely abbot of Antrim. (189) Or, if he became bishop of Down, he must have been promoted when very old, and undoubtedly not before some time in the sixth century. (190) Yet, whether bishop or not, he may be justly reckoned among the eminent men of the fifth, although he may have lived until about the year 540.

(182) Usher, Ind. Chron.

(183) Ware Bishops—Usher, Ind. Chron. &c.

(184) See Tr. Th. p. 293. Could it be Derver in the county of Louth, and diocese of Armagh? (185) Above §. 9.

(186) Ware Bishops at Down, and Antiq. cap. 29.

(187) Usher, p. 1065, where he is called Caylanus or Coelanus Nendrumensis abbas; and in p. 954. Coelanus Noendrumensis. Colgan mentions him (Tr. Th. p. 269.) by the name of Coelanus abbas Aondromensis, and would fain reckon him among the disciples of St. Patrick. Noendrumensis and Aondromensis or Aendrumensis equally signify his having been of Antrim. The particle na, of, is frequently prefixed to the names of places when persons belonging to them are spoken of; and, if followed by a word beginning with a vowel, is contracted into N. Harris not knowing this, or not reflecting on it, has given us (Monasteries) a Nendrum or Noendrum in Down, as Cailan's monastery, and has been followed by Archdall, who says that it is now unknown. It is no wonder that it should be so, whereas it never existed. Even Usher seemed not to understand the meaning of Noendrumensis, for (p. 954) he has a Q. An Edrumensis. No writer, however, went so much astray on this subject as Alemand, who (Monast. &c.) confounded Noendrum with Neddrum, and hence took occasion to criticize Usher for having placed a monastery at Neddrum, where there was none until late in the 12th century. To understand the subject it is to be observed that the largest of the Copland islands off the coast of Down, viz. Big-isle was anciently called Neddrum, John de Courcy having granted the greatest part of the lands, &c. of said island to the monks of St. Mary of York and of St. Bega of Coupland in Cumberland brought over some of these monks and founded for them a cell in Neddrum, to which he assigned lands in Duffren. The deeds may be seen at full length in the Monasticon Anglicanum, Vol. II. p. 1023. There were two grants, the former of which was to the monks of Coupland or Copland, and is dated A. D. 1178. The other, in which those of York are included, and the cell of Neddrum is mentioned, bears no date. Ware places the foundation of the cell in 1183, Harris has 1179 or 1183. It is now easy to understand, why the name of Copland was given to Neddrum and the adjacent isles. Usher, who was well acquainted with these matters, does not even hint at Neddrum, as the Benedictine establishment there was not formed until some hundreds of years after the period he was treating of.

(188) Pr. p. 1065. Usher writes; “Quem actorum ipsius descriptor—Dunensem postea in Ultonia factum fuisse episcopum significat.” The phrase, significat, is rather of a doubtful import.

(189) In the Life of St. Finnian of Maghbile (Moville), who flourished in the middle of the 6th century, it is related that, when a lad, he was sent to the venerable old man Coelan abbot of Antrim to be instructed by him, and that the latter thought it advisable to send him to a great monastery in Britain then governed by Nennio. (See AA. SS. p. 438 and Usher, p. 954.) Now this could not have occurred earlier than A. D. 520, and Usher mentions Coelan as still an abbot in that year. (Ind. Chron.)

(190) Coelan was no higher than abbot of Antrim, when Colman of Dromore was a pupil of his. (Usher, p. 1065.) If Colman lived so late as some writers thought, Coelan could not have been a bishop until about the middle of the 6th century. But we shall soon see that Colman lived many years earlier than is usually supposed.

§. xv. Colgan says that Canoc, otherwise Conoc or Mochonoc, founder of the monastery of Gallen in the King's county, flourished about A. D. 492. (191) Hence Ware (192) and after him Harris and others have laid down, that Canoc founded it about that year. He is said to have been a native of Brecknock in Wales but son of an Irish prince called Bracan or Brecan, who settled in that district, and from whom it has got its present name. (193) Brecan is said to have had a great number of children, the eldest of whom is usually stated to have been Conoc. (194) According to one account, Brecan died in the year 450. (195) If so, Conoc might have become distinguished in the 5th century. But we find a grandson of Breacan fighting battles about 603; (196) and it will not be believed that the grandfather's death could have preceded those battles by more than 150 years; or that Conoc, were he founding monasteries in 492, could have been uncle of a prince, who was able to fight in 603. Accordingly, admitting whatever are told about Conoc's lineage, and his founding the monastery of Gallen, it can scarcely be supposed that he was old enough to be an abbot until towards the middle of the sixth century. (197) Among several persons spoken of, I am sure without sufficient authority, as sons of Breacan and brothers of Conoc I find St. Dabeoc, (198) whose monastery was in an island of Loughderg in Donegall. But there is no proof of this statement, (199) nor of what some late writers have concerning Dabeoc having been contemporary with St. Patrick. (200) Another of the pretended brothers of Conoc is Diradius called of Edardruim; and accordingly an ancient monastery has been assigned to that place, (201) although never mentioned in our history. Then comes another brother St. Mogoroc of Struthuir, (202) concerning whose time nothing certain is known. We have also Carpreus of Kill-chairpre, (203) whose history is still more obscure, although there were several saints of that name. I pass over some other of those pretended sons of Breacan, as I do not find that our compilers of Monasticons have endeavoured to make out monasteries for them.

(191) Canoc's Acts at 11 Feb. (192) Antiq. cap. 26.

(193) David Powel (not Camden, as Colgan says) writes (Annot. ad Itiner. Cambr. L. 1. c. 2.); "Hic Brechanus natus erat patre Haulapho Hibernorum rege et matre Britannica, nimirum Marcella filia Theodorici filii Tethphalti reguli de Garthmathrin, illius nempe regionis, quæ ab hoc Brechano nomen accepit, et hodie Brechonia vel Brechinia dicitur, Britannice Brecheinoc. Hujus Brechani filia nomine Tydvael uxor fuit Congeni filii Cadelli powisiae reguli, et mater Brochmaeli cognomento Scithroc, qui Ethelfredum Northumbrorum regem ad Devam fluvium interfecit, ejusque copias fudit, circa annum Domini 603."

(194) The Cambrian Biography gives him 24 sons; the eldest of whom was Cynog or Conoc. Others have 12 sons, Conoc the eldest, and 12 daughters. (See Sir R. Colt Hoare's Notes to the Itinerarium Cambriae L. 1. c. 2. and Colgan at 11 Feb.) But Giraldus himself, the author of the Itinerarium, tells us (ib.) that he had 24 daughters all saints. (See also Camden, Britan. col. 703.) Aengus Kelideus, quoted by Colgan, reckons ten holy men sons of his, among whom Mochonoc, and who, one only excepted, having come to Ireland, either founded religious houses or led a monastic life. I just mention these things; the reader will judge what credit is due to them. I will merely observe, that several of those pretended sons of Brecan were certainly born in Ireland, and at different periods.

(195) A MS. quoted by Sir R. C. Hoare, loc. cit.

(196) See Not. 193.

(197) Colgan, who seldom stops at anachronisms, thought that Conoc might have been the same as Conan, a priest at the time St. Patrick was in Connaught (see Chap. v. §. 10.) and consequently about A. D. 440. We have already (Not. 58. to Chap. vi.) noticed a mistake of the Tripartite with regard to Conoc and his nephew Cadoc, who, by the bye, seems never to have been in Ireland. (See Cadoc's Acts at 24 Jan.) Colgan, in the Tr. Th. admitted that story of the Tripartite, but has nothing about it in AA. SS. Yet in this latter work he gives us (at 11 Feb.) a St. Duban as flourishing about A. D. 492, of whom or whose place of abode he knew nothing, except that Aengus Kelideus has among the so called sons of Brecan (Not. 194) one Duban de Rinn-dubhain alithir. These genealogical accounts, in which some of our old writers so much abound, cannot be depended upon, unless supported by other authority.

(198) Colgan refers (AA. SS. p. 312.) to Dabeoc what Aengus Kelideus says of one Mobeoc of Gleann-geirg. But surely this is not the same name as Lough-Derg, nor is Dabeoc the same as Mobaoc.

(199) Colgan, notwithstanding his endeavours to make Dabeoc a son of Breacan, yet quotes an old Hagiology, in which he is called son of Luinim, the son of Dibracha, of the race of Dichuo, St. Patrick's first convert. (See AA. SS. p. 313.) According to this account Dabeoc was no relative of Canoc, and must have lived long after St. Patrick's time. For Dibracha, his grandfather, is not called son of Dichuo, but said to be a descendant of his; and three or four generations might have elapsed between them.

(200) St. Dabeoc is never mentioned in any of the Lives of St. Patrick. O'Donnel, connecting him with the fable of Patrick's purgatory, was the first who placed him in those early times by introducing him (Vita S. Columb. L. 1. c. 10.) as prior to Columbkill. Ware, Harris, and others, were too hasty in assigning the foundation of his monastery to the 5th century.

(201) Harris and Archdall have this unknown monastery in Roscommon, because Colgan says (AA. SS. p. 313.) that there was a parish church of that name in the diocese of Elphin. Is every church to be converted into a monastery?

(202) Struthuir or Struthair was near Sletty in the Queen's county, and we find a monastery there in the tenth century. Colgan (loc. cit.) knows nothing about a Mogoroc there, but tells us that a saint of that name was revered on the 23d of December in the church of Dergne in the territory Hy-bruin-chualan. This was a part of the present county of Wicklow, and it is very odd that he could imagine, that Dergne might be the same place as Struthair. For Dergne, alias Delgne, was no other than the present Delgany, and is famous in our history for a great battle, mentioned by Colgan himself from the 4 masters, and by Ware (Antiq. cap. 24.), in which Ugair, king of Leinster, totally defeated Sitric and the Danes of Dublin in the year 1022. Archdall, on the supposition that Struthair might have been the same as Dergne, has placed it in Wicklow, although he says that it was near the church of Sletty.

(203) Colgan (loc. cit.) threw out a conjecture that this church was in the county of Sligo. Hence Archdall has a monastery so called, and founded, he says, about A. D. 500. (See at Sligo.)

§. XVI. St. Fortchern, who is said to have been bishop of Trim, should be placed in the 5th century, and even in St. Patrick's time, were we to believe Jocelin, (204) and the Tripartite, (205) They make him son of Feidlemid prince of the country about Trim (206) a son of king Leogaire. (207) He is stated to have been with many others a disciple of St. Luman of Trim ; and this is sufficient to show that he did not live so early, whereas Luman belonged to the seventh century, in which several of Fortchern's fellow-students are placed even by Colgan. (208) Accordingly there is no foundation for assigning the establishment of the church of Killfortchern, (209) to the 5th century ; at least if this be the St. Fortchern, from whom it got its name, which I think very doubtful. Another establishment, which ought not to have been placed in said period, is that of Kilconnel in the county of Galway. (210) The arguments adduced by Colgan for this high antiquity are of little or no weight, (211) and one of them proves the contrary of his position. (212) Some other foundations have been assigned to the 5th century, without the least appearance of probability, and in direct opposition to the whole tenour of Irish history. (213) As therefore this is not the proper place for inquiring about them, I will conclude this chapter with observing, that St. Fridolinus called the traveller, and who founded some churches in the Continent, did not, as some writers assert, (214) flourish as early as the year 495. It will be seen elsewhere, that he lived about 200 years later.

(204) Cap. 52. (205) L. 2. c. 1.

(206) See Not. 35. to Chap. v.

(207) Notwithstanding this royal descent I find in the Tripartite (L. 3. c. 98.) St. Fortchern de Rathaidme blacksmith to St. Patrick.

(208) See at 17 Feb. where he has Loman, Fortchern, and many others of those disciples.

(209) Kill-fortchern was in Idrone (county of Carlow) and is mentioned in the Calendars. Colgan calls it merely a church.

Archdall has it among the monasteries. Neither Ware nor Harris make mention of it.

(210) Kill-chonail, now Kilconnel, was in the district of Hy-maine, and got its name from a St. Conal, who is supposed to have been a bishop. Colgan has his Acts at 18 March.

(211) Scarcely any thing is known about Conal, except that he is spoken of in the Acts of St. Attracta (at 9 Feb.) as a brother of hers, and is there said to have had a church at Droma. Now Colgan himself doubts whether Droma was the same place as Kilconnel. Colgan's most plausible argument is founded upon a curious passage, which Usher found annexed to an old copy of Irish canons, (see Pr. p. 1049) in which St. Patrick is said to have reproved Conal and Ethian for having ordained unworthy bishops in Magh-ai (Roscommon), and to have denounced to them, that their churches would be always insignificant. But who can depend upon such stories, which were fabricated at a time when churches were wealthy in Ireland, and which do not agree with their situation in St. Patrick's days? A similar story is told in the Tripartite (L. 2. c. 123.); the scene is placed likewise in Connaught, but the guilty bishops are said to have been Mac-carthen of Clogher, and a pretended brother of his, also called Maccarthen; the saint is made to foretell that their sees would be unhappy, and particularly that of the latter; who was the more guilty of the two; for it should be neither powerful nor rich; "potentia et divitiis carebit." Jocelin has (cap. 123) the same story, but with some variations, and without mentioning names. It is unnecessary to prove, that St. Patrick never announced such judgments as these, and it would be ridiculous to infer from such grounds, that Conal was a bishop in his time. By Ethian was probably meant Etchen, a holy prelate of the sixth century, and who certainly was not guilty of the charge brought against him in that story. We will meet with him hereafter. As to Conal, there were many saints of that name; and from one of them Kilconnel was so called; but whether from its having been the place of his residence or from a church there dedicated in his name, cannot be determined. And supposing even that it was Conal's own church, Harris and Archdall ought not to have assigned the foundation of it to the fifth century, nor much less to the time of St. Patrick.

(212) Colgan observes that Conal is said to have been a brother of St. Attracta, whom he supposed contemporary with St. Patrick. It will, however, be seen that this saint lived either in the sixth or seventh century.

(213) Harris is shamefully incorrect in this respect. Ex. c. he places in the fifth century a monastery in Inismore founded by S. Columba, although he could not but have known, that Columba was born in the sixth. In like manner he assigns to the same period foundations by St. Iarlath of Tuam and St. Senan of Inniscathy notwithstanding its being indubitable that they belonged to the following century. One would imagine that Harris sometimes reckoned the centuries in Dr. Ledwich's manner, (see Chap. II. §. XIV.) and that he understood the time elapsed between A. D. 500 and 600 by the name of the fifth.

(214) Colgan has the Acts of Fridolin at 6 Mart. Ware following Possevin (Appar Sac.) and some German authors says (Writers), that he lived in the year 495. Colgan endeavoured to maintain this date, and Harris left it uncontradicted.

CHAPTER IX.

Establishment of the Irish or Scots in North Britain—Colman a bishop—Colman of Dromore—Caylan abbot of Antrim—Monastery of Locha founded—St. Maccarthen of Clogher—St. Tigernach of Clogher, stiled Ferdachrioch—Murchertach Mac Erca monarch of Ireland—Gildas taught at Armagh—Death of several bishops—Ailill succeeds Dubtach in see of Armagh—St. Sinell or Senchell—Natalis abbot of Kilmanagh—St. Sinan of Inniscathy—Abbot Cassidan—Death of Conlaeth bishop of Kildare—Nennidh Lamh-ghlan—St. Nennidh Laobhdearc—Death of St. Brigid—Birth of St. Columbkil—St. Derlugdach successor of St. Brigid—Death of St. Ailbe of Emly—And of St. Declan—Ultan succeeds Declan as abbot—School of Clonard—St. Finnian—Muredach prince of Hykinselagh—Enquiry into the times of St. David, Gildas, and Canoc—Paul the hermit—St. Carnech—Death of Muirchertach monarch of Ireland—Death of Ailild archbishop of Armagh—Tigernach of Clones—Lugadius bishop of Conor—St. Moctheus of Louth.

SECT. I.

WE are now arrived at the sixth century, a period in which the Christian religion became almost universal throughout Ireland, and in which our country could boast of many very holy and learned persons, who have been ornaments not only of the Irish, but of the whole Christian church. The early part of this age forms a remarkable epoch in the history of the British islands; for the year 503 was that of the regular establishment of the Irish or Scots in North Britain under Loarn son of Erk, and the first year of the new Scottish kingdom out of Ireland. (1) These settlers were Christians, and it is said that one of them, Fergus, brother and successor to Loarn, had when young been blessed by St. Patrick, who foretold that his posterity would enjoy sovereign power. (2)

Usher states, that a bishop Colman, by whom Finnian (of Maghbile) was first instructed, flourished in the beginning of this century. (3) He does not tell us where he was bishop, but plainly distinguishes him from Colman of Dromore, whom he assigns to a later period, (4) in consequence of having confounded him with Colmanel of Muckmore, (5) a mistake, in which he has been followed by Ware and others. (6) But from the very documents referred to by Usher it is evident, that Finnian's first master was no other than Colman of Dromore, and that he was eminent in the early part of the sixth century. We have seen that Finnian, after having been under the care of bishop Colman, was sent to Caylan abbot of Antrim. (7) Colman of Dromore had been himself a pupil of Caylan, (8) and consequently some years before Finnian was recommended to the latter, most probably by Colman himself, then a bishop, and who must have been very intimate with Caylan. Colman having received the rudiments of learning from Caylan was sent to study the Scriptures under Ailbe of Emly, perhaps about the year 500, and afterwards by advice of Macnise, bishop of Connor, erected a noble monastery on the bank of the river Locha, (9) that is, the Lagan, which flows through Dromore. This monastery must have been founded before the end of A. D. 514, in which, at the latest, Macnise died. (10) Hence it appears that the see of Dromore is more ancient than commonly supposed, and that Colman flourished not in the late but in the early part of the sixth century. He was of a Dalaradian family and therefore a native of the territory, in which his see was situated. The year of his promotion to the episcopacy is unknown, as also that of his death. (11) His festival is kept on the 7th of June.

(1) See Not. 29 to Chap. 1. To what has been there observed add that some of our old historians mark the date of this establishment by placing it 20 years after the battle of Ocha, in which Alild Molt was killed. (See Usher p. 1029.) That battle was fought in 483. (Chap. VIII. §. 5.) The notation of 20 years between the two events shows at the same time, that the 4 Masters and Colgan were wrong in affixing the battle to A. D. 478 (479), whereas it is universally agreed on, that the Scottish establishment under Loarn commenced in 503. From that mistake flowed others, as to the years in which some of our kings either began or ceased to reign.

(2) Tripart. L. 2. c. 135. and Jocelin c. 137.

(3) Ind. Chron. ad A. 500.

(4) Ibid. ad A. 550.

(5) Jocelin has (cap. 96.) a prophecy of St. Patrick concerning Colmanel of Muckmore. He has another (cap. 98.) concerning Comgall of Bangor, in which his birth after 60 years is foretold. It is known that Comgall was born A. D. 516. Jocelin says nothing about the number of years that were to elapse between the prophecy concerning Colmanel and his birth. But it seems that in some accounts the 60 years in the case of Comgall were extended also to that of Colmanel. Hence Usher, having confounded Colmanel with Colman of Dromore, affixes the birth of the latter to A. D. 516 (Ind. Chron. see also ad A. 456), and the foundation of his monastery to 550 (ib.)

(6) Ware (Bishops, and Ant. cap. 29.) agrees with Usher. And elsewhere (Writers) he brings down Colman of Dromore to the seventh century, in consequence of a story concerning a Colman having been consecrated at Rome by Gregory the great. This was the same person as Colman Ela or Colmanel, whom Jocelin in the prophecy alluded to (Not. prec.) represents as to become in course of time Apostolic legate in Ireland, and whom Colgan distinguishes by that title (third Index, Tr. Th. and AA. SS.) assigning his death to A. D. 610 (AA. SS. p. 247.). Colgan, however, did not confound this so called Apostolic legate with Colman of Dromore; for he not only expressly speaks of them as distinct persons (Tr. Th. p. 113. Not. 106 and 3d Ind.), but even reckons Colman of Dromore among the disciples of St. Patrick (ib. p. 269), and accordingly as very different from a man said to have been born in 516, and whose death he placed in 610. Yet, through a sort of negligence very usual with Colgan, he quotes (AA. SS. p. 191) without any observation a passage from Usher, in which Colman of Dromore is confounded with Colmanel. Harris, who has the same confusion at Bishops and Writers, distinguished them at Monasteries. Archdall (at Muckamore) has jumbled them together.

(7) Not. 189 to Chap. VIII.

(8) Usher, p. 1065.

(9) Usher, ib.

(10) It is very strange that Usher has, by mere conjecture, affixed (Ind Chron.) the erection of this monastery to A. D. 550. He seems to have paid no attention to the date of Macnisset's death, although he had before him the Annals of Innisfallen, which assign it to as early as the year 506 (507). He also confounded (Ind. Chron. at A. 550 compared with A. 456) the monastery near the Locha, viz. of Dromore, with that of Muckmore, a place in the county of Antrim; and hence Harris very wisely and after him Archdall assign the foundation of Muckmore to about 550. But of Muckmore and Colmanel more will be found in the proper place.

(11) Harris's conjectures as to A. D. 600 or 610 are quite nugatory. These dates refer to other Colmans, who lived later. The confounding together various persons of that name is not a late error. Ware (Writers) refers to a Life of Colman of Dromore, in which Columkill is introduced as prophesying concerning him. Now, unless we are to reject what is related of his education under Caylau and Ailbe, and his connexion with Macnissie, Colman was prior to Columkill by many years. We know that the latter had some transactions with Colmanelo; and hence, I believe, the mistake has proceeded.

§. II. St. Maccarthen of Clogher, whose history I have been obliged to anticipate, (12) died, as already stated, in the year 506; and, as some say, on the 24th of March. (13) He was succeeded by St. Tigernach, who fixed his see or residence at Cluan-eois (Clunes or Clones) in the county of Monaghan, (14) still retaining the government of the church of Clogher, for which reason he was surnamed Ferdachrioch, (15) or the man of two districts. He is said to have been of a princely family, grandson, by his mother, of a king Echodius, and to have had St. Brigid for godmother, through whose recommendation he was raised to the episcopal dignity. (16) He had received his clerical education, as we are told, in the monastery of Rosnat in Great Britain under the holy abbot Monennus, (17) and, it seems founded that of Clones before he was appointed bishop. Following the order of time, the next remarkable event we meet with is the death of Lugaid, king of all Ireland, in the year 508, (18) after which there was an interregnum of about five years, (19) at the expiration of which in 513 Murchertach son of prince Murdach and great grandson of Niell Naoigiallagh (20) was raised to the throne. (21) He is usually surnamed Mac Erca from his mother Erca, who was a daughter of Loarn (22) the first chieftain of the Irish who, as above stated, formed the great settlement in North Britain. She was a christian and had some saints among her nephews. (23) It is probable that also Muredach her husband was one. King Murchertach their son was undoubtedly a Christian; (24) and he is the first of our monarchs, whom we can with certainty consider worthy of that glorious name. He is represented as a good and pious sovereign. His reign continued until the year 533, or, as others say, 534. (25) I find another occurrence, worthy to be recorded, if true, assigned to the same year 508, viz. the return of Gildas, after having taught for some time at Armagh, to his own country, Britain. (26) This position is at best but an hypothesis, connected with another, which I believe cannot be maintained, concerning this Gildas having been different from, and many years prior to, Gildas the historian. (27) An opportunity will soon occur for inquiring into this subject. In the course of a few years, subsequent to the last mentioned, several of our prelates departed this life; Bron, bishop of Cassel-irra, in 512 on the 8th of June; (28) Dubtach, archbishop of Armagh in 513; (29) Ercus of Slane in 514, (30) to which year some of our Annalists assign also the death of Aengus Macnise bishop of Connor, while others place it in 507. (31) Whichever was the year of his departure from this life, the day, on which he died, was the third of September. (32) Some others of the more ancient Irish bishops were undoubtedly dead by the times we are now treating of; but the years of their demise are not known. Amidst this vacuum in our history nothing appears to me so singular as that the year, in which the celebrated Fiech of Sletty died, has not been recorded. (33) Yet the memory of the day of his death has been preserved; as we find his Natalis assigned to the 12th of October. (34)

(12) Chap. vi. §. 12.

(13) Usher, p. 856. There is a diversity of dates with regard to this matter. (See Ind. Chron. ad A. 506 and Colgan, AA. SS. at MacCarthyen 24 Mart.)

(14) Usher p. 856. Ware, Bishops.

(15) The Calendar of Cashel has (ap AA. SS. p. 740.); "S. Ferdachricus episcopus de Clochar, post episcopum MacCarthyennum." Now all accounts agree that the real name of MacCarthyen's successor was Tigernach, and that Ferdachrioch was merely a surname, which agreed very well with the circumstances, in which Tigernach was placed, but did not suit MacCarthyen, to whom some persons have erroneously applied it. (See Not. 132 to Chap. VI.) Harris has (Bishops at Clogher) on this point puzzled himself and his readers to no purpose. His mistake with regard to it is excusable; but not so his saying that Tigernach might have been the same as Tigernach bishop of Clonmacnois. There was no religious establishment, either see or monastery, at Clonmacnois until the year 548; while our Tigernach was bishop at Clones since 506. Nor was there any Tigernach of Clonmacnois in those ancient times. Harris confounded Cluan-eois with Clonmacnois, and applied to the latter what belonged to the former. Thus (at Bishops, Clonmacnois) he has a pretended bishop Tigernach in that place, for whom he quotes the 4 Masters. Now the 4 Masters knew nothing about such a person, but they write; "An. 548 (549) St. Tigernac, bishop of Cluaineois, died on the 4th of April." (AA. SS. p. 191 and 439.) This passage bewildered Harris, who has given us these dates, &c. at Clonmacnois. He ought to have known that the Irish Annalists, when treating of Clones, write Cluain-eois, Cluain-eosensis; whereas they express Clonmacnois by Cluain-mhic-nois or simply Cluan, whence Cluanensis. We find both places and names clearly distinguished in a passage of our Annals (AA. SS. p. 150), in which it is stated that in the year 548 (549) a great plague carried off Kieran Cluanensis (of Clonmacnois) and Tigernach Cluaineosensis (of Clones) the very person whom we are now treating of. Archdall, in obedience to Harris, brings in a Tigernach at Clonmacnois, but different, he adds, from the one of Clogher, and makes him succeed Kieran. All stuff! There was no abbot or bishop Tigernach there in those days.

(16) Tr. Th. p. 605. If this narrative deserves credit, we must suppose that St. Brigid's standing as godmother for Tigernach was in her younger days, and, at least 30 years before A. D. 506. On this occasion it is observed that whoever was recommended for the episcopacy by St. Brigid, was immediately approved of and chosen by the clergy and people. (Compare with what has been said about Conlaeth of Kildare Chap. VIII. §. 10.)

(17) Colgan, AA. SS. at Monennus 1 Mart. This Monennus was undoubtedly the same person as Nennio abbot and bishop of what was called the great monastery in Britain, and to whom Cailan of Antrim is said to have sent Finnian of Maghbile. (See Usher, p. 954.) Mo is merely the prefix indicating affection. Colgan would fain make him the same as Moena, who died bishop of Clonfert in the year 571. But how could a man, who had been a bishop in Britain before Tigernach became one in 506, be supposed to have lived to so late a period? Besides, the names are plainly different. Others have foolishly confounded him with Nennius, the British historian, who lived in the 9th century. Where was that monastery of Rosnat? Neither the Monasticon Anglicanum, Stevens, Tanner, Nasmith, nor Camden have, as far as I could discover, a word about it, although it is often mentioned in the Acts of some Irish saints. In those of Tigernach, quoted by Colgan (ib.) it is observed that it was otherwise called Alba, or white. Colgan hence concludes that it was no other than the famous monastery of Bangor or Banchor near the river Dee a few miles from Chester, and which must be carefully distinguished from the present episcopal town Bangor, which lies far to the West of where the monastery stood. (See Usher, p. 133.) His chief argument is that Ban, in Irish, signifies white, and so Ban-chor was the same as white choir. But, waving certain doubts concerning said monastery having existed at that early period, it is to be recollected that Ban has not that signification in the British language, which is that to be looked to in this inquiry. I suspect that Rosnat or Alba was the celebrated see called Candida casa or White house, now Whithorn. (See Not. 149. to Chap. 1.) The illustrious Ninia or Ninian had founded that see early in the 5th century, and there can be no doubt of an ecclesiastical school having been established there. (See Usher, p. 661. seqq.) When we read of Nennio being the bishop, to whom some Irish students were sent, this, I believe, must be understood as originally meaning that they were sent to the school held in the see of Nennio or Ninia, who was dead before Tigernach or Finnian could have repaired thither. And in fact Finnian's master is called Mugentius, and what is very remarkable, the place Candida (AA. SS. p. 634). The master of Endeus of Arran, who is also said to have been at that school, is called not Nennio but Mansenus. Let me add that Candida casa lay very convenient for students from the North of Ireland; and it is worth observing, that of those, who are spoken of as having studied at Rosnat or Alba, scarcely one is to be found that was not a native of Ulster. There is a village and parish in Dumbartonshire, called Roseneath, anciently Rossnachoich, (Stat. Acct. of Scotland, Vol. iv. p. 71.) But there is no mention of a monastery having been there.

(18) See Chap. VIII. §. 13.

(19) Usher p. 947. Ware, Antiq. cap. 4. O'Flaherty Ogyg. Part. III. c. 93.

(20) Tr. Th. p. 447 from the 4 masters.

(21) Usher and O'Flaherty, loc. cit. &c. The 4 Masters and Colgan follow a different line of chronology. In consequence of their having (erroneously I believe) assigned the battle of Ocha to 478 (479, see above Not. 1.) they make the 25 years of Lugadius end in 503 (504). Then they allow no interregnum, and immediately introduce Muchertach as king in said year.

(22) AA. SS. p. 690. (23) Ib. p. 782.

(24) Ib. p. 679 and elsewhere passim.

(25) Usher and Ware have A. D. 534; O'Flaherty 533, observing that Murchertach did not reign full 21 years, but only somewhat more than 20; so that, counting from A. D. 513, his demise fell within 533. The 4 Masters and Colgan (Ind. Chron. to Tr. Th.) beginning his reign in 504 (see Not. 21) allows him near 24 years, and so place his death in 528, or as they call it, 527. I believe Usher and O'Flaherty's calculations are more correct.

(26) Usher Ind. Chron. ad A. 508. Colgan AA. SS. p. 190.

(27) Usher has exerted all his ingenuity to support this hypothesis. He calls the Elder Gildas Albanus and the latter Badonicus.

(28) Tr. Th. p. 176. Concerning Bron see Chap. VII. §. 6. and VIII. §. II.

(29) Usher Ind. Chron. Ware, Bishops; to whom the sapient Harris adds, that the 4 Masters place Dubtach's death in the year 512. Did he not know, that 512 was the same with them as 513 with others? Colgan mentions (Tr. Th. p. 293.), that Dubtach's memory was revered on the 5th of February, or 7th of October. See more above, Chap. VIII. §. XIV.

(30) Usher Ind. Chron. The 4 Masters have A. 512 (513). Colgan says (Tr. Th. p. 20) that in the old Calendars Ercus is treated of at 2d October and 2d November. See more Chap. VII. §. VII.

(31) The Annals of Innisfallen have; "506 (507) Quies Macnissime Condire." Ware following these Annals has (Ant. cap. 29) the year 507. Harris with his usual sagacity observes (Bishops at Connor); that this date does not agree with that of the Innisfallen Annals, which have 506. But Ware knew what Harris did not, viz. that said 506 was the same as our 507. Archdall (at Connor) left A. 506, as he found it. But Ware (in Bishops) adds that, according to some, Macnissime died A. 514. He alluded to the 4 Masters and Colgan, who have (AA. SS. p. 190) A. D. 513 (514).

(32) Ware Ant. cap. 29 and Bishops. Here again Harris comes forward with a correction of Ware, and quotes Colgan as saying, that Macnissime died on the 3d of November 513. As to 513, it was the same as Ware's 514; but the variation November for September was owing to a mere error of the press, (at AA. SS. p. 190) a circumstance quite common in Colgan's work. Elsewhere he has third of September (ib. p. 377.) to which day he refers for the Acts of Macnissime. (See Chap. VIII. §. 14.)

(33) Colgan would wish to make us believe, that Fiech lived until about the middle of the sixth century. His argument, were it of any weight, would prolong Fiech's life until the tenth. It is this. In the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, which Colgan most strangely imagined to have been written about A. D. 550, there is a passage, (L. 1. c. 61.) in which Fiech is spoken of with this addition; "Qui hodie in Ecclesia Sleptensi est." Hence Colgan concluded (Tr. Th. p. 169) that Fiech was alive when that work was written, a work not earlier than the 10th century. (See Chap. III. §. IV.) But, as I have often observed, phrases of this sort are either to be understood relatively to the mortal remains of the persons mentioned being in the places spoken of, or are to be considered as quotations from older documents. Harris adds to Ware's account of Fiech (Writers), that he died early in the sixth century. He has not given, nor could he, any authority for this assertion, although it is not improbable that Fiech lived until about A. D. 500. (See Chap. vi. §. 5. and vii. §. 5.)

(34) Tr. Th. p. 7.

§. III. Dubtach was succeeded in the see of Armagh by Ailill or Ailild, (35) who is said to have been the son of a chieftain named 'Trichem, the pretended father of Dichuo St. Patrick's first convert, thus making Dichuo and Ailill brothers, as if we could be brought to believe, that a man, who in the year 432 had a settled family (36) and was then, in all probability, not less than 40 years of age, could have a brother capable of undertaking the duties of episcopacy in 513. And as to his princely extraction there is no foundation for it, except the confounding together different persons of the same name; nor is there any reason to make us admit, that even Dichuo was of a princely family. (37) The fact is that Ailill the archbishop was not, at least nearly, connected with Dichuo, and that nothing more can be ascertained concerning his origin than that he was a native of Clanbrassil, (38) a district far distant from Lecale, in which Dichuo's family resided. The mistake now pointed at is blended with another, according to which our Ailill has been confounded with Ailill called of Maghbile; (39) and who is reckoned among the sons of prince 'Trichem. This Ailill was the grandfather of St. Finnian of Maghbile, and remained, I believe, always a layman. From this confusion has been derived the opinion, that Ailill of Armagh had been married before he took holy orders; (40) for which there is no other foundation than the having jumbled together into one two very different persons, and who lived at different periods. Among the distinguished men of these times we must place St. Sinell or Senchell who has without sufficient foundation, as elsewhere observed, (41) been said to have been St. Patrick's first convert in Ireland. He was the son of Kennfinnain and grandson of Imchad or Finchada of the royal blood of Leinster. (42) It is related that St. Ailbe of Emly presented him with a cell, in which he had lived himself for some time, at Cluain-Damh (Clane co. Kildare). The time of this donation is not mentioned; but it might have been about A. D. 500. (43) Nor is it known how long Sinell remained there. We find him afterwards at Killeigh, (44) where he established a monastery, which, in course of time, became very celebrated. According to some accounts he was raised to the episcopacy. To distinguish him from another Sinell, a relative of his and a priest, who lived with him at Killeigh, he is usually styled Senior. (45) Having lived to a good old age he died on the 26th of March, A. D. 549. (46) I find it mentioned, but on no authority, that Luga-dius, an abbot of Drumshallon, who is said to have been son to king Aengus of Cashel, died in the year 515 or 516. (47) There is no certain account of that monastery having existed at this early period; (48) and as to the honour of having been a son of Aengus, it has been paid to so many persons that, unless such a claim be much better authenticated than it is in the present case, we may safely reject it. (49)

(35) Usher, p. 874, Ware, &c. &c. Colgan has at 13 January a strange incoherent medley, which he calls the Acts of St Alild.

(36) See Chap. v. §. 2.

(37) See Not. 17 to Chap. v. Ware has followed Colgan only so far as to call Ailill son of Trichem, a prince of East Ulster, but has nothing about Dichuo, &c. Colgan tells us that Trichem was of the illustrious house of the Dalriatachs. Harris adhering more closely to Colgan, makes Alild one of the six so called sons of Trichem, of whom Dichuo was said to be one, and in like manner reckons him among the disciples of St. Patrick.

(38) The four Masters have (ap. Tr. Th. p. 293) ; “ S. Alildus Ep. Ardmach. de gente de Hi Bressail ;” i. e. Clanbrassil in the county of Armagh. Colgan (at 13 January) strives to reconcile this with his assumption that Alild was son of the great dynast Trichem by saying, that the Hi Bressail sept was a branch of the Dalfiatachs. This is a pitiful evasion. If Alild was a son of Trichem who was of the great and right line of the Dalfiatachs, he would not have been placed in the distant and minor branch of the Hi Bressail.

(39) Tr. Th. p. 110. Maghbile, now Movill, is in the barony of Ardes, county of Down. It was the residence of said Alild, who must therefore have been different from the bishop Alild as being from Clanbrassil.

(40) Colgan at 13 January. Harris has in a most barefaced manner perverted Colgan's meaning on this subject. He makes him say that Ailill put away his wife before his taking holy orders. Now Colgan's statement is that the wife was dead before he became a clergyman. His words are “ Ab uxoris lege solutus (Alildus),” &c. He took this phrase from St. Paul, who uses it, (according to the Vulgate translation) where he declares that, in case of the husband's death, a woman may marry again. “ Nam quae sub viro est mulier vivente viro, alligata est legi ; si autem mortuus fuerit vir ejus, soluta est a lege viri.” Rom. vii. 2. Thus the words used by Colgan necessarily presuppose the death of the wife, and form a scholastic manner of speaking on this point. Harris then goes on to show that the Irish clergy were not bound to celibacy in those times. Whatever may be said as to certain orders of the clergy, of which elsewhere, this much I do assert, that in the whole history of the ancient Irish church there is no instance of any bishop having been exempt from that law. I mean real bishops and regularly consecrated ; for I know that in times of confusion certain persons, not consecrated, had, in consequence of having seized on the church property, got themselves called bishops.

(41) Chap. v. §. 1.

(42) Ib. Not. 9. and Tr. Th. p. 18. I have touched on this genealogy merely to show that the Sinell, who, it was pretended, had been converted by St. Patrick, was no other than the abbot Sinell, of whom we are now treating. Colgan (loc. cit.) represents said Sinell as the son of Kennfinain, who, as all accounts agree, was father of the abbot, and is so spoken of by Colgan himself in Sinell's Acts at 26 Mart. But, as it appeared from these Acts that Sinell could scarcely have been born at the time of his pretended conversion by St. Patrick, Colgan there studiously omitted any mention of it.

(43) Harris (Monasteries) by mere conjecture assigns the foundation of the monastery of Cluain-Damh to the 5th century. As Sinell lived to a great age and died in 549, he might have been in that place before 500. But there was no permanent monastery at Clane; and whatever establishment Sinell had there ceased with his removal elsewhere. Ware, who searched only for permanent monasteries, which he has done with great judgment, does not mention any at Clane. It is not easy to understand, how Ailbe could have resided for any time in that place. Perhaps he had there what we would call a lodge, to serve for occasional retirement from the labours of the episcopacy, or as a resting place in journeys to or from Armagh, or other places where bishops might have occasion to assemble together.

(44) It is in the King's county, and is called, in Irish, Killachuidh Drumfada.

(45) Colgan (at 26 Mart.) quotes the following passage from the litanies of Aengus Kélideus; "Centum et quinquaginta monachos sanctos cum duodecim peregrinis, qui cum S. Senchello seniore episcopo, et S. Senchello juniore presbytero—habitarunt in ecclesia de Killachuidh-Drumfoda in Hyfalgia, invoco in auxilium meum, per Jesum Christum, &c."

(46) The Annals of Ulster quoted by Ware (Ant. cap. 26 at King's co.) and the 4 Masters (ap. AA. SS. loc. cit.) have; "A 548 S. Senchellus senior filius Cennanuani (Kennfinani) abbas, de Kill-achuidh, &c. obiit die 26 Martii." Their A. D. 548 is the same as 549. Archdall (at Cláne) retains 548; but (at Killeigh) he makes Sinell live until 550. Where he got this date, or his account of Sinell's having died of the plague I do not know. Ware, whom he refers to, has no such thing.

(47) Archdall at Drumshallon. Where he found this piece of information, I cannot discover. Colgan, making mention of this Lugadius, (AA. SS. p. 169) does not tell us at what time he died.

(48) The Tripartite Life of St. Patrick has (L. 2. c. 12) the church of Druini-inis-clain (Drumshallon) as erected by him; and hence Harris and Archdall attribute the foundation of the monastery there to St. Patrick. But we have often seen what little reliance is to be placed on that work with regard to the origin of religious establishments. And in the case now before us, were we to receive its authority, it would follow that said church was created soon after the commencement of the saint's mission (see Chap. v. §. 8.), and at a time when the number of Christians was quite too small to make us admit the foundation of the many churches, which it assigns to that period. The first abbot of Drumshallon to be met with, concerning whom no doubt can be entertained, was St. Ronan, who died of the great plague in the year 665. (AA. SS. p. 141.)

(49) See Chap. VIII. §. 8. There have been several distinguished persons of the name of Lugadius in the 6th, 7th, and following centuries. One of them might have been at Drumshallon.

§. iv. It is more probable, although far from being certain, that Natalis or Naal, abbot of Kilmanagh, (50) who began to be distinguished about these times, was a son of king Aengus. (51) Little or nothing would be known concerning him, were he not highly praised in the Lives of St. Senan of Inniscatthy, who, when young, was a pupil of his, having been directed to his monastery and school by the abbot Cassidus. (52) Senan's younger days belonged to the early part of the sixth century, and accordingly this was the period, in which Natalis flourished. What time he died I cannot discover, unless we should apply to him what is said of a Naal of Invar-Naal (in Donegal) whose death is assigned to A. D. 564. (53) His memory was revered at Kilmanagh on the 31st of July. (54) Having now made mention of Senan, it will not be amiss to touch upon in this place the first part of the history of so very eminent a saint. It is related, as already seen, (55) that St. Patrick, being near the Shannon in some part of the now county of Limerick about, it seems, the year 448, foretold the birth and future greatness of Senan. One account, which appears tolerably correct, gives 40 years (56) between the prophecy and Senan's birth. Thus we may suppose that he was born about A. D. 488, a date sufficiently agreeing with the real series of the transactions of his life, but not reconcileable with some unchronological fables concerning him. Not to enlarge on that of his having succeeded, and immediately, St. Patrick in the see of Armagh, (57) this narrative, whether such a prophecy was pronounced or not, proves that, as Senan came into the world late in the 5th century, he could not have founded the abbey of Iniscathy prior to St. Patrick's arrival in Munster, as some of our historians have foolishly stated. (58) It shows also that even Ware was mistaken in assigning the foundation of that abbey to the 5th century. (59) Senan was a native of Corco-baskind, a district in the western part of Thomond. (60) His parents were Christians and noble. Ergind, or Ercan, his father, is said to have been of the royal blood of Conary I. formerly monarch of Ireland. Coemgella, his mother, was likewise of an illustrious Munster family. The very place of his birth is mentioned, viz. Magh-lacha, where his father had one of his residences. (61) When arrived at a certain age, he was forced by the dynast of Corco-baskin to join in an expedition undertaken against the territory of Corcomroe for the purpose of carrying off plunder. (62) A proceeding of this sort did not accord with the pious disposition of young Senan; and accordingly he contrived to avoid taking any share in the devastation of that country. God rewarded him for his christian behaviour; for, when the party to which he belonged, was routed with great loss, and he had fallen into the hands of their opponents, he was allowed to depart without injury, and to go whithersoever he pleased. This, and some other circumstances, which afterwards occurred, induced him to determine on renouncing the world. (63) He therefore placed himself under the abbot Cassidan, and having received from him the monastic habit, became in some time a great proficient in piety and ecclesiastical learning. (64) Next he repaired, as above mentioned, to the monastery of the most holy and learned Natalis, with whom he spent, perhaps, some years. Thence he went to visit other holy persons; but in the account given of these visits some anachronisms occur, which will be inquired into lower down. Let it suffice at present to observe that Senan's establishment at Iniscatthy cannot be placed earlier than about A. D. 534, and that a certain transaction relative to him, attributed to St. Brigid of Kildare, belongs not to her but to another saint of the same name. (65)

(50) In Irish Killmanach Drochid, about 8 miles to the West of Kilkenny and not far from the county of Tipperary.

(51) Colgan has endeavoured to give some Acts of Natalis at January 27 in consequence of his having thought that he was the same as a St. Naal abbot of Kill-naile in Breffny and afterwards of Devenish, and contemporary with St. Maidoc of Ferns. Some of the Irish Calendarists make him a son of king Aengus. This cannot stand; for Molassius founder of Devenish did not die until A. D. 564; and Maidoc belonged to a late part of the 6th century. Who then will believe, that such dates and circumstances are applicable to the son of a prince, who was killed in 490? (Chap. VIII. §. 8.) Nor could that St. Naal be the same as Naal of Kilmanagh, who certainly flourished about the year 520. If any abbot Naal was son of Aengus, this was the person. The times agree, and the place of his residence answers very well, as it was not many miles from Cashel.

(52) In the metrical Life of St. Senan we read; "In visione igitur. Hoc abbati praecipitur—abbati inquam Cassido—hoc jubetur a Domino—ut Senanum novitium—ad abbatem eximium—mittat Natalum nomine,—ut sub eius regimine—disciplinis et actibus—instrueretur plenius—fuit enim tunc temporis.—fama Natali celebris,—cum ingens congregatio—in eius contubernio—quingenta videlicet—et centum fratrum degeret.” Then follows various particulars, which it is not necessary to repeat, relative to the proceedings of Natalis and Senan. The abbot Cassidus is called Cassidan in the prose life of Senan, translated from the Irish (cap. 11.) and is said to have been a native of the territory Kierraihe Chuirke (probably a part of Kerry), and to have then dwelt in Irras, which, as appears from said Life. (cap. 10.) was a maritime district in Corco-baskind, and lying to the West of Magh-lacha. (See below Not. 60, 61.)

(53) 4 Masters (ap. Colgan, AA. SS. p. 174 and Ind. Chron.) have A. 563 (i. e. 564). This Naal is stated to have been the same as Naal of Kilnaile and Devenish, who is said to have succeeded St. Molassius. Strange jumbling; for the death of Naal of Inver-Naal is assigned to the 27th January 564, while Molassius lived until the 12th of September in the same year (4 Masters ib. p. 192.) How then could he have been succeeded by this Naal? Archdall makes a very sorry figure in this matter. He says (at Kilnaile) that Natalis died in 563 (564); at Inver he tells us that Natalis, who died in that year, was abbot of Inbher-naile, also of Kilnaile, and of Devenish. Then he informs us (at Devenish) that Molaisse having died 12th September same year, was succeeded by St. Natalis son of Aengus king of Connaught (he should have said, Munster) who was also abbot of Inbhernaile and Kilnaile. Thus Natalis would, when dead, have been created abbot of Devenish. This absurdity, however, is a necessary result of a close adherence to certain old hagiologists, quoted by Colgan, whom Archdall followed implicitly, and to the date 664 of the 4 Masters. Either then this date is wrong; or perhaps Naal of Devenish was a different person from the one of Invernaal. Yet they are usually spoken of as one and the same. I strongly suspect that the date 564 was originally marked for Naal or Natalis of Kilmanagh, and that, through a confusion of names, it was referred to another, who lived at a later period. Natalis of Kilmanagh, although well known about A. D. 520, might have lived until 564.

(54) AA. SS. p. 174. This notation of the festival of Naal of Kilmanagh is an additional proof of his having been different from the Naal of Inver-naal, &c. whose festival was held on the 27th of of January.

(55) Chap. vi. §. 8.

(56) Fourth Life of St. Patrick, cap. 79. Colgan in a note to the Tripartite (L. 3. c. 46) observes that in said chapter 46 there is a various reading as to the number of years, and that one MS. has 26. The 40 years of the fourth Life come, I believe, nearer to the truth.

(57) This story was founded on a mistake in having misunderstood some passages in the Lives of Senan. It is to be observed that St. Patrick, having baptized a great number of the people of Thomond, who had crossed the Shannon to be instructed by him (Chap. vi. §. 8.) was earnestly requested by them to visit their country. The saint told them that it was out of his power to comply with their wish. On their desiring to know would they have a bishop of their own after his death, and who would be the person, he said that God would provide them with a great bishop and patron from among themselves, whose name would be Senan. The metrical Life has; “Interca ab incolis—Antistes venerabilis—interrogatur saepius—quis post eum episcopus—sit futurus inibi.” The saint is then introduced saying; “Nascetur vobis parvulus—futura Dei famulas,—qui et Senanus nomine—in meo stabit ordine,—mihi, Deo propitio,—succedens episcopio.” From the whole context, and particularly from the second or prose Life (cap. 3, 4.) it is clear, that in these passages no more is meant than that instead of St. Patrick, who acted then as universal bishop of all Ireland and accordingly of Thomond, this district would have after some years a bishop of its own, and who might very justly be styled a successor of his. We could, if necessary, recur to the great maxim of the unity of the episcopacy, so well expressed by St. Cyprian; “Episcopatus unus est, cujus a singulis in solidum pars tenetur;” and according to which a bishop could be said to succeed other bishops although not attached to the same see. But in the case now under discussion the matter is quite plain. Yet it has been understood by some writers (see AA. SS. at 8 Mart. p. 542.) as if Senan had succeeded St. Patrick at Armagh. Usher, while he rejected this fable, fell (p. 873, seqq.) into a mistake almost equally unfounded. He supposed that, as Senan was spoken of as a successor of St. Patrick, the latter had been at Iniscatthy, and acted there as bishop for a considerable time. Usher must not have read the second Life of Senan, from which, as well as from the Tripartite, (L. 3. c. 46.) it is evident that St. Patrick did not visit the country about Iniscatthy, although he took care to supply the inhabitants with religious teachers. (See Chap. VIII. §. 1.) (58) O Halloran, &c. (59) Ant. cap. 26. at co. Limerick.

(60) Harris (Ant. ch. 7.) says it was the now barony of Moyarta, in the county of Clare. Although this barony forms a part of it, Corca baskind was, I believe, more extensive.

(61) Second Life, cap. 1. and 6. seqq. Magh-lacha was probably in the now barony of Clonderlach, which lies to the east of Moyarta. There is an affinity between the names Magh-lacha and Clonderlach.

(62) Ib. cap. 8. The metrical Life exhibits this transaction in glowing colours, under the description of a regular war, and represents Senan as a military man by profession. The author seemed to think that there were standing armies then in Ireland.

(63) Ib. cap. 10. (64) Ib. cap. 11.

(65) We read in the second Life of Senan (cap. 39.) that St. Brigid, daughter of Conchraid, of the family of Mactail, who had her cell at Cluan-in-fidi on the bank of the Shannon (Colgan thinks it was near where that river receives the Fergus), had prepared a vestment, which she wished to send to Iniscatthy for St. Senan. Finding no mode of conveyance she wrapped it up in hay and put it into a basket, which she entrusted to the current of the river, after having written on it a proper direction. It is added that it arrived safe to him. In the third Life of St. Brigid of Kildare (cap. 115.) and fourth (L. 1. c. 81.) this anecdote was transferred to her, with this variation, that the basket or box was entrusted to the ocean, and had to pass over a very great round and extent of sea. Thus a transaction, in which there is nothing improbable, was transformed into a marvellous story, which has helped to give rise to the opinion (Usher p. 874), that Senan was established at Inniscathy before the death of St. Brigid.

§. v. We are now approaching the last days of the great St. Brigid. Her friend Conlaeth, bishop of Kildare, (66) preceded her in his passage to eternity, having died on the 3d of May A. D. 519. (67) We may reasonably suppose, that a successor was appointed, but who he was is not regularly recorded. (68) Meanwhile St. Brigid's institution seems to have spread far and wide throughout Ireland; but from the loose manner, in which the establishments belonging to it are mentioned here and there, and the great neglect of chronological arrangement in her Lives, it is impossible to fix the times either of those establishments, (69) or of the principal part of the transactions of her life, particularly after the foundation of Kildare. She is said to have been at Armagh, and nuns are spoken of as being there with her. (70) Perhaps then we may be allowed to date from her own times the foundation of the Brigidine nunnery of that city. (71) St. Brigid was constantly occupied in promoting the good of others, and some very singular instances of her miraculous powers are related, relative to her exertions for that purpose. The most eminent persons of her times either visited her or corresponded with her. Besides several already mentioned, (72) St. Ailbe of Emly used to confer with her on holy subjects, on occasion of visiting her, which he did more than once. (73) The celebrated Gildas is said to have sent her, as a token of his esteem, a small bell cast by himself. (74) Brendan, called of Clonfert, who afterwards became so renowned, waited upon her to be instructed on a certain religious subject. (75) St. Brigid was attentive to the conduct of young persons not only females, as her station required, but likewise males. Of her watchfulness in this respect an instance is given in the case of Nennidh, surnamed Lamh-ghlan (clean hand), son of Ethach and a native of a place called Muli or Mula. (76) He was a student, perhaps at Kildare, when St. Brigid, happening to be with some of her nuns not far from the monastery, saw him running very fast and in an unbecoming manner. She sent for him, and on his coming up to her, which he seemed loth to do, asked him whither he was running in such haste. He replied, seemingly as if in jest, that he was running to the kingdom of heaven. I wish, said the saint, that I deserved to run along with you to-day to that kingdom; pray for me that I may arrive there. Affected by these words he requested that she would offer up her prayers for his pursuing a steady course towards heaven, and said he would pray for her and many others. She then prayed for him, and the Almighty was pleased to touch his heart, so that he did penance, and ever after led a most religious life. Next she foretold to him that he was the person, from whose hand in due time she would receive the holy viaticum on the day of her death. (77) Some circumstances are then related concerning the care he took to keep clean the hand, which was to be used on that great occasion, and whence he got his surname; and it is added that he afterwards went to Britain, where he remained until near the time that St. Brigid died. (78) The conversation between him and the saint must have occurred several years prior to her death, as he was then only a student and giddy; so that a considerable time must have elapsed before he was qualified, as a priest, to attend so great a saint at her departure from this life. He has been confounded with the celebrated St. Nennidh surnamed Laobh-dearc (part eyed) abbot and bishop at Inis-mhuigh-Samh (79) (Fermanagh) about the middle of the sixth century. Not only the surnames but several other circumstances plainly show, that they were distinct persons. (80) He is said to have written a Latin hymn in honour of St. Brigid, which is still extant. (81)

(66) See Chap. VIII. § XI.

(67) Tr. Th. p. 629. Ware, Bishops at Kildare.

(68) Colgan (loc. cit.) quotes an author, who calls Natfroich (of whom above Chap. VIII. §. XI.) a bishop, and thinks that he might have been bishop of Kildare. If so, he succeeded Conlaéth. Colgans adds that he flourished in the year 520. Archdall not only transformed Natfroich into a coachman and abbot, but changed the flourished of Colgan into died. In case Natfroich was made bishop after Conlaéth, it can scarcely be admitted, that he could have been a priest before St. Patrick's death in 465, or that it was by him he was appointed spiritual director of St. Brigid. (See Not. 135 to Chap. VIII.)

(69) Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 625) reckons a heap of churches, monasteries, &c. under the name of St. Brigid. But, with regard to the far greatest part of them, it cannot be ascertained whether they were erected before or after the foundation of Kildare, (See Chap. VIII. §. 4.) or even after the saint's death, as, I am sure, very many of them were.

(70) Fourth Life, L. 2. c. 32.

(71) This nunnery must not be confounded with another at or near Armagh, established, most probably, by St. Patrick. (See Chap. VIII. §. 9.) Harris and Archdall were wrong in attributing to him also the Brigidine nunnery. St. Brigid, as already proved, was not a nun until after his death.

(72) Chap. VIII. §. IV. and XI.

(73) Life of Ailbe. See Tr. Th. p. 604. Compare with what has been said (Not. 43.) concerning Ailbe's cell at Clane.

(74) Tr. Th. p. 605. and AA. SS. p. 183.

(75) Tr. Th. p. 605.

(76) Fourth Life, L. 2. c. 61. Colgan, having patched up from various documents the Acts of St. Nennidh at 18 Jan. represents him, without however offering any solid proof, as great grandson, by his father's side, of king Leogaire. For, an Eochad, grandson of Leogaire, is spoken of in Irish history. Colgan, who was wonderfully fond of giving a princely origin to our saints, would fain make him the same as Ethach, the father of Nennidh. Then to mend the matter he says, that Nennidh is supposed to have been a disciple of St. Patrick; as if St. Patrick could have had for scholar a great grandson of a king his cotemporary, who was most probably a younger man than himself, although he died some, not long, time sooner. Colgan is more rational in calling Nennidh a disciple of St. Fiech, as, supposing the latter to have lived until the beginning of the sixth century, Nennidh might have been at his school. A Nanned, (seemingly the same as Nennidh) is mentioned (Tripart. L. 3. c. 22) among some of Fiech's disciples. But Colgan (Not. ad. loc.) thinks he was different from Nennidh Lamh-ghlan, although in AA. SS. (at 18 Jan.) he makes them one and the same, besides contradicting himself also with regard to the genealogy of the latter. As there were in the sixth century several persons so called, no decision can be formed on the mere identity of name. As to the place called Mula, Colgan went quite out of his way in imagining that it was the isle of Mull to the west of Scotland, not that he supposed Nennidh to have been born there, but that he thought Nennidh, who is said to have spent some years out of Ireland, might have been in that island. But in the above quoted Life of St. Brigid Mula is mentioned in terms plainly indicating his birth-place; "Ninnidius, filius Ethach de partibus Mula." There are places enough in Ireland called by that name to this very day, such as Mullagh in Cavan, and Mullagh near Longford, of one or other of which Nennidh might have been a native.

(77) Fourth Life, L. 2. c. 62.

(78) Ib. and AA. SS. at 18 Jan.

(79) Colgan, Acts at 18 Jan. which Acts he affixed to that day in consequence of this confusion. For that, or, as others have it, the 16th of January was the festival day of Nennidh Laobh-dearc; whereas nothing is known concerning the day assigned to Nennidh Lamh-ghlan. Harris, following this mistake, placed the foundation of the abbey of Inis-mhuigh-Samh in the 5th century. Archdall calls it Inis-mac-saint. Of this abbey, &c. we will see elsewhere.

(80) The surnamed Laobh-dearc was a disciple of Finian of Clonard and contemporary with Columbkille, &c. therefore long after the time of the conversation held with St. Brigid by Lamh-ghlan, who most probably never had a monastery in Ireland, having lived much abroad, and perhaps was not even a monk. At least, there is nothing in any of St. Brigid's Lives to make us believe that he was. Colgan found himself greatly puzzled by the different surnames, which certainly were given to distinguish one Nennidh from the other.

(81) It has been published by Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 542.) and begins with the words; “Christus in nostra insula.” Then after some lines we have, “Audite virginis laudes, &c.” There seems to be some misplacement of the strophes, if we are to listen to an old Scholiast on it, quoted by Colgan, (ib. p. 545.) who says, that it began with Audite, &c. He writes; “*S. Nennidius Lamh-iodan, id est, mundimanus, composuit hunc hymnum in laudem S. Brigidæ, vel S. Fiechus Sleptensis. Audite virginis laudes est ejus initium. Vel S. Ultanus de Ardbreacain composuit, &c. Lamh-iodan is, as Colgan observes, (AA. SS. p. 115.) the same as Lamh-ghlan; for iodan is only another name for clean. As to Fiech’s being the author, it is sufficient to remark that it can scarcely be supposed, that Fiech survived St. Brigid, after whose death that hymn was composed. Colgan was inclined to think that Ultan of Ardracain was the author, because he had written a book on the Acts of St. Brigid. But it does not thence follow that he wrote also the hymn. Ware’s account of this hymn and author, as it appears in the English translation and in Harris, is strangely garbled. He calls him (Writers) Nimidus Lainidan, and conjectures that he was the same as the abbot Nennidh of a place in Lough-Erne, that is, of Inis-mhuigh-Samh. This Nennidh was, as we have just seen, different from Lamh-ghlan or Lamh-iodan corrupted, in the document used by Ware, into Lainidan, in the same manner as Nennidh into Nimid. If Ware, or his English translator, had not been deceived by the authority he followed, he would have known that the person, said to have composed that hymn, was called Nennidh-Lamh-ghlan; nor would he have spoken of two hymns instead of one, or, at least, not given to understand that the part alone beginning with Audite was in praise of St. Brigid; whereas the other beginning with Christus, &c. is equally relative to her. In Ware’s Latin original Nimidus Lainidan is mentioned only under the article Fiech, and incidentally*

§. VI. The time at length arrived, when this extraordinary saint was to receive the reward promised by God to those, who love him as she did. Nothing particular is recorded as to the nature of her last illness, and it is merely stated that finding her end approaching, she received, a short time before her death, the communion of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ from the hand of St. Nennidh. (82) That she died at Kildare cannot be called in question, as that was her permanent residence; nor are we to listen to a tale of her death having occurred in Ulster, which was patched up on the supposition that she was buried at Down, than which nothing can be more false. (83) It is universally agreed on, that she died on the 1st of February; but in what year it is far from being decided. Some foreign writers have said, in 518; a calculation founded upon having mistaken the year of St. Patrick's death, whence Nennius reckoned sixty years to that of St. Brigid. (84) Others have the year 521; (85) but a greater number of writers maintain that the year of her death was 523. (86) The former of these two dates is solely, and the latter almost chiefly founded on wrong supputations of the year, in which St. Patrick died, and on the admission of an unproved and indeed false assumption that St. Brigid survived him exactly 30 years. (87) It must, however, be allowed that some documents would, if we were certain of their correctness, favour the latter opinion. (88) Some Irish Annals assign it to A. D. 525, a date (89) best agreeing with what Nennius has concerning the birth of Columbkil having been four years prior to the death of St. Brigid. (90) It appears to me better supported than that of 523, which is the only one that can stand any competition with it; and between the two the reader may decide for himself. As to any other dates, that have been proposed, they are scarcely worthy of consideration. With this inquiry is connected that into the number of years that the saint lived. According to some accounts she died in the 70th year of her age; according to others in the 74th. (91) This diversity affects also the question concerning the year of her birth, which, although for the sake of convenience already supposed (92) to have been A. D. 453, was perhaps 455. (93) On these points, as they are of very little importance and do not affect the truth of St. Brigid's history, every one may follow whichever of the now mentioned calculations he thinks most convenient. This great saint is said to have written some tracts, one of which was a Rule for the members of her institution, and which, we may be sure, was a mere summary of the simple regulations universally observed by holy virgins and nuns before various Rules and different religious Orders were even thought of. (94) A letter, written in Irish, to a St. Aidus, son of Degil, concerning whom I can find no further account, is also attributed to her, besides two small pieces also in Irish. (95) It would be superfluous to enlarge on the extraordinary veneration, with which her memory has been revered not only in Ireland and Great Britain; (96) but in every part of the Western Church; (97) or to undertake a formal refutation of the impudent assertion of that pseudo-antiquary Dr. Ledwich, that St. Brigid was an imaginary saint. (98)

(82) Fourth Life, L. 2. c. 63. Nennidh, although he is said to have lived for some years in Britain, and, according to one account, even at Rome, was in all probability a member of the clergy of Kildare, and, it seems, particularly attached to the service of the nunnery. He is called simply sacerdos (Fifth Life, cap. 58) without any allusion to the monastic state.

(83) The author of the fourth Life, who lived at a time when St. Brigid's remains were supposed to be at Down (see Not. 18 to Chap. VIII.) imagined (L. 2. c. 99.) that she had been originally buried there, and accordingly that it was there or in the neighbourhood that she died. Hence the story; but it is more than sufficiently refuted by the testimony of Cogitosus, in whose days the body of the saint was still at Kildare, and indeed in a magnificent shrine. (See Not. cit.) It is odd that Colgan could have hesitated (Tr. Th. p. 618.) on a matter so very clear. Bollandus did not. (See Comment. prae v. ad V. S. Br. §. 6-7.)

(84) It had been said that St. Patrick died A. D. 458, (see Chap. VII. §. 2.) to which year if 60 be added we have 518. But, as the antecedent was false, so is the consequent.

(85) Marianus Scotus followed by Baronius, Ware, and many others.

(86) Usher, Colgan, Bollandus, &c.

(87) This story of 30 years intervening between the deaths of the two saints has been taken from the spurious tract called St. Patrick's Testament (see Not. 95 to Chap. VII.), in which we find the favourite division of our Apostle's years into thirties. To these was added another thirty, at the end of which St. Brigid was to bless Ireland. (Usher, p. 883.) Thence it got into the fourth Life of St. Brigid (L. 2. c. 99.), and became popular. Marianus Scotus, having assigned St. Patrick's death to A. D. 491, placed, agreeably to this supposition, that of St. Brigid in 521; while the sticklers for A. D. 493, following the same principle, fixed it at 523. One of these was Bollandus (at St. Brigid); but his successors Henschenius and Papebrochius rejected (at S. Patric. 17 Mart.) these thirty years, and made out another calculation for themselves, which cannot be admitted, placing her death in 506 or 517. Tillemont justly remarks, that they have not adduced any weighty proof for these dates, (Mem. &c. Tom. XVI. p. 470.) See Not. 25 to Chap. VIII.

(88) An Irish Life of St. Brigid and the Annals of Roscrea, referred to by Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 619.), assign St. Brigid's death to a Wednesday. Now the first of February fell on that day in the year 523. I suspect that this notation of Wednesday is only an imitation of the Wednesdays marked for St. Patrick. (See Chap. IV. §. 1.) To make the parallel still stronger, it has been added that St. Brigid took the veil also on a Wednesday. Colgan builds on this notation, which Usher was either ignorant of or overlooked, and argues that it cannot be applied to any year later than 523, because, according to the fourth Life of St. Brigid (L. 2. c. 99.), she died during the pontificate of Pope Hormisdas, and therefore prior to the month of August in said year. Little reliance, however, can be placed on that passage, as we find in it nothing but confusion, St. Brigid's death being said also to have occurred during the reign of Justinian and in the year 548, periods very different from that of Hormisdas. (See Usher, p. 884.)

(89) Usher observes (loc. cit.) that some books referred to in the Annals of Ulster mark the death of St. Brigid at 525. This date has been followed by the 4 Masters. (Tr. Th. p. 619.). The Ulster Annalist himself has A. D. 524.

(90) See Not. 12 to Chap. vii.

(91) The Annals of Ulster and the Martyrologium Tamlactense have the 70th; the martyrology of Donegal the 74th. (Tr. Th. p. 620.) The author of the 4th Life gives her 80 years; but his statements are so contradictory that they are not worth attending to.

(92) Chap. viii. §. 2.

(93) In the hypothesis of St. Brigid having died in 523, and in the 70th year of her age as the Annals of Ulster, &c. state, Usher's calculation of her birth in 453 is perfectly correct; for, whatever was the year, the day, on which she was born, was later than the first of February (see Not. 26 to Chap. viii.); and thus, as she did not complete her 70th year, her birth must be assigned to 453. In like manner, still supposing that she died in her 70th year, which seems the best founded opinion, if she lived until A. D. 525, her birth must be placed in 455.

(94) See Chap. viii. §. 3. and Not. 34 ib. A droll controversy has been carried on between the Canons Regular of St. Augustin, and the Augustinian hermits, commonly called Augustinians; each party pretending that St. Brigid belonged to the class of nuns who followed their respective institutions, or that she had taken her Rule from them. Colgan strove (Tr. Th. p. 620.) to please both parties. The short mode of silencing the disputants would have been to tell them, that neither of their institutions existed until some hundreds of years after the time of St. Brigid. Yet in a certain sense her Rule may be said to have been somewhat Augustinian, inasmuch as we may reasonably suppose it agreed in substance with the directions drawn up by St. Augustin for the nuns over whom his sister presided. See Not. 133 to Chap. iv.

(95) One of these two tracts is a poem on the virtues of St. Patrick; the other is entitled, Quiver of divine love. Colgan tells us (Tr. Th. p. 610) that he had a copy of them and of the letter to Aidus. As to some works falsely ascribed to her, see ib. and Ware (Writers at St. Brigid).

(96) Hector Boethius writes (Hist. Scot. L. 9); “Effecta est ejusdem Brigidæ virginis ad posteritatem celebris usque adeo memoria, ut Scoti, Picti, Hibernici, et qui illis gentibus vicinas habent sedes Angli eam inter foeminas, quas Christiana ecclesia in Sanctorum numerum retulit, secundum Deiparam Virginem præcipua semper habuerint veneratione. Templâ Brigidæ inter hos populos sacra, quot vix alicui Divorūm, hujus rei certa sunt indicia.” Some old Irish writers call her the second Mary, or Mary of the Irish, and, as she had contributed so essentially to the forming of children of God and brethren of Christ, another, as it were, mother of our Saviour, alluding also to his words; Whosoever shall do the will of my Father, who is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother; Matth. XII. 50. I have mentioned this manner of speaking concerning St. Brigid, because Colgan, who quotes (Tr. Th. p. 622.) several passages relative to it, has not sufficiently explained them. Alcuin in one of his short poetical pieces (No. 247.) writes;

“Virginibus sacris præsens hæc ara dicata est,
Quarum clara fuit Scottorum vita per urbes,
Brigida sancta foemina, Christo simul Hafidelis,
Hæc nobis salutem per suffragia sancta,” &c.

(97) See Tr. Th. p. 623. seqq.

(98) Antiq. of Ireland, p. 378. Can any thing be more presumptuous or intolerable than to throw out such a palpable lie in direct opposition to as clear testimonies and universal consent of critics and historians as ever appeared on any subject? Not to mention the Irish Calendar and other numberless documents, St. Brigid's name is not only in the Roman martyrology, but in that of Bede, Usuardus, &c. and even in the Additions to that called of St. Jerome. It was also in ancient litanies used in the early part of the seventh century. (See Chap. II. §. 6) I call this assertion of Ledwich a lie; for elsewhere, as it there answered his purpose, he speaks of her as having really existed. Thus Dr. Milner, not having observed the passage above referred to, was induced to suppose (Tour in Ireland, Letter XI.) that he did not deny the existence of St. Brigid. It is true that he did not in that part of his rhapsody (p. 387.) where he would fain show, in a tone of the most profane levity and infidel-like spirit of calumny, that she was no other than a sort of Druidess appointed to take care of the holy fire in place of the heathen Druidesses of yore. Where did he find these Irish Druidesses? That the pagan Irish worshipped fire I admit; but the care of it was entrusted not to women but to men. Away then with this nonsense; and as to the Doctor's infamous assumption concerning St. Brigid and her nuns having been established at Kildare merely as preservers of fire, I will tell him that, so far from any such thing, there is not in any of her Lives nor of the very many old documents, in which her transactions are spoken of, the least allusion to such an employment or to perpetual fire. The first author, who has made mention of this fire, is Giraldus Cambrensis; and indeed he has given us stories enough about it. It was kept constantly burning in an inclosure near the monastery for, as Ware says (Antiq. cap. 17.), the benefit of the poor and strangers; to which Harris (Ch. 35) wantonly added, as was pretended. When that practice was introduced, we have no means of discovering. It was not observed in St. Brigid's time; nor did the writers of her Lives know any thing about it. On the contrary they relate, that, on an occasion of some strangers coming at night towards the monastery, St. Brigid ordered a fire to be made, and water warmed for washing their feet (Third Life, cap. 84. and Fourth, L. 2. c. 57.) Hence it appears that no fire was then kept constantly burning. Whatever was the system of the heathen Irish with regard to the preservation of fire, nothing occurs to prove that the practice of Kildare was in any manner derived from it; although I do not mean to deny that some remnants of Pagan customs have been observed, without however any bad intention, in Ireland as well as in other countries, and that it was sometimes even thought adviseable to allow certain such usages as being harmless in themselves, yet with the precaution of having them directed to the worship and honour of the true and almighty God. (See Gregory the great's Letter to Mellitus ap. Bede Eccl. Hist. L. 1 c. 30.)

§. VII. St. Derlugdacha, who had been a favourite scholar of St. Brigid, succeeded her in the government of the institution of Kildare, and is said to have survived her only a year, neither more nor less.

Accordingly her death is assigned to the first of February, (99) and must have occurred either in the year 524 or 526, according as that of St. Brigid's death may be computed. About the same time, viz. in the year 526, (100) and on the 13th of January, died Ailill archbishop of Armagh, after having governed that see nearly thirteen years. (101) He was succeeded by a namesake of his own, who is therefore called Ailill or Alild the second, and, like him, of the sept of Hi-Bressail. (102) St. Ailbe of Emly after a long life, the greater part of which was spent in preaching the Gospel, instructing and preparing others for the sacred ministry, (103) and in forwarding by all means in his power the good of religion, (104) was in the following year called out of this world, and his death is assigned in our Annals to the year 527. (105) The day marked for it is the 12th of September. The reputation of this holy and learned man was so great, that he was styled another Patrick, (106) and was reckoned among the principal fathers of the Irish church. (107) Of his writings there is still extant a Monastic or Collegiate Rule. (108) With Ailbe is usually joined Declan of Ardmore, who survived him; but how long we are not informed. To what has been already said of him (109) I have nothing to add, except that his festival was held on the 24th of July. (110) He was succeeded at Ardmore by St. Ultan son of Erc, not, it seems, as bishop but only as abbot. (111) Ultan had been a disciple of Declan, and had, before Declan called him to Ardmore, a monastery at Coning, a place apparently near Clonmel. (112) Concerning his transactions little or nothing else is known. (113) Some years prior to the death of Ailbe I find recorded that of two prelates, of whom very little is said in Irish history. One was St. Boetius son of Bronac, bishop of Monaster, or, as called from him, Monaster-boice in the now county of Louth. His death is marked at the 7th of December, A. D. 522. (114) The other was St. Beoadh bishop at Ardcarne in the county of Roscommon, (115) who died on the 8th of March in 524. (116) He was of royal descent, and of a very generous disposition. From the manner in which he is spoken of in the Irish Calendars, &c. it appears that he was held in high estimation.

(99) At said day Colgan has what he calls her Acts, which are meagre enough and not worth making extracts from. She is the saint whom Dempster pretended to have been a sister of St. Gunifort. (See Not. 22 to Chap. 1.) Her being revered at Trisingen (ib.) was probably owing to her connexions with St. Brigid, whose memory was most highly respected in Germany.

(100) Usher Ind. Chron. Ware, &c. The Irish Annals quoted by Colgan at 13 Jan. have A. D. 525, which was the same as our 526.

(101) Ailill's incumbency is generally reckoned at 13 years. It is more probable that the 13 years were not complete, unless we should suppose that Dubtach his predecessor died before the 13th of January A. 513. This, however, can scarcely be admitted; and from the days, on which his memory was revered (See Not. 29), it would appear that he died later in the year.

(102) In consequence of those two prelates having had the same name and been of the same sept and country (Clanbrassil) some thought they were one and the same person. But Colgan (at 13 Jan.) shows that they were carefully distinguished in the Irish Annals, and observes that, while the memory of the former was celebrated on the 13th of January, to that of the latter was assigned the first of July.

(103) The school established by St. Ailbe has been mentioned already (chap. VIII. §. 8. 9.). Besides Colman of Dromore (above §. 1.) I find Nesson of Mungret among those, who had received instruction from him. (See Usher, p. 961.)

(104) See Chap. VIII. §. 6-7.

(105) Usher, Ind. Chron. Ware, Bishops and Antiq. cap. 29. In this latter place Ware says that some have put off Ailbe's death to A. D. 541. I wish he had given us the name of, at least, one of them. No such date is assigned to it, as far as I can discover, in any of our Annals. Perhaps Ware confounded, as to this point, St. Ailbe of Emly with an Ailbe of Senchua, whose death is marked by the 4 Masters at A. D. 545 (546). See Not. 77 to Chap. v. Instead of 546, some documents might have had 541.

(106) Usher, p. 866.

(107) Cummian in his Paschal Epistle (Sylloge Ep. Hib. No. xi.), referring to the Irish fathers, has Ailbe first; "Interrogavi patres meos—successores videlicet nostrorum patrum priorum, Ailbei episcopi, Querani, &c."

(108) Ware, Writers, Colgan quotes a part of it, AA. SS. p. 328. I do not know, whether it has been as yet published.

(109) Chap. 1 § 12. vi. §. 6. viii. §. 6.

(110) Tr. Th. p. 269.

(111) In Ultan's Acts at 14 Mart. he is spoken of as merely a superior of monks. Hence it appears very probable that, although Declan is generally said to have been a bishop, there was not as yet a permanent see at Ardmore. In many parts of Ireland the bishops presiding over districts had not, in those early times, their residence attached to any particular place. (See Chap. viii. §. 2.)

(112) Coning was in the southern part of Magh-femyn. (See Not. 61 to Chap. vi.)

(113) Colgan's reason for treating of him at 14 Mart. was merely his having found mentioned at that day an Ultan Magonighe, who, as appears from the surname, was most probably a different person.

(114) The 4 Masters have 521, i. e. 522. AA. SS. p. 190. It is odd that Ware and even Harris make no mention of Monasterboice, although frequently spoken of as a monastery in our history. Boetius was a bishop; but the name, Monaster, indicating his place of residence, shows that he governed also a monastery.

(115) Archdall (at Ardcharn) has made him also an abbot. Yet in every document relative to him he is called simply bishop. Then Archdall most strangely places Ardcharn in Westmeath, notwithstanding its being well known at this day by the name of Ardcarne, and situated in the barony of Boyle near the county of Sligo. Colgan had observed that it was in the district of Maghluirg in Connaught; and Archdall might have easily found that this was the same as Moyleurg.

(116) 4 Masters, 523, i. e. 524, Colgan has at 8 Mart. whatever he could collect concerning this saint. He tells us that his real name was Aedh or Aidus, to which Beo, meaning lively or vigorous, was prefixed to mark his character. Accordingly he had no right to latinize it into Beatus. The name of Beoadh's father was Olcan.

§. 8. About the time of Ailbe's death we may, I believe, place the commencement of St. Finnian's famous school of Clonard. (117) The history of the first years of this most eminent and learned saint is involved in great obscurity, in consequence of anachronisms and stories that can scarcely be unravelled. (118) It is generally admitted that he was a native of Leinster, (119) but of what particular part of it we are not informed. Fintan of the race of Loschain was his father; the mother's name was Talech. They are represented as Christians; and accordingly it is related that, soon after the child was born, they sent him towards the church of Roscor to be there baptized by bishop Fortkern. The women, who were carrying him, were, it is said, met on the way by the priest St. Abban, who, having inquired whither they were going and what was their errand, undertook to baptize him, which he did at a place where two rivers unite into one, (120) Finnian, when arrived at a suitable age, received an ecclesiastical education under the bishop Fortkern. It is then added, that, when 30 years old, wishing to go beyond sea, he took leave of St. Fortkern, and, previously to his embarking for Great Britain, spent some time with the venerable Cayman of Darinis. (121) Then, crossing the Irish sea he went to Killmuine (122) in Britain, and there had interviews with the holy men David, Gildas, and Cathmael, alias Cadoc. A king of that country was, we are told, induced to make him a grant of lands and even of a town; so that, having erected three churches, he remained there for 30 years. (123) As to those pretended donations, we may pass them by; but how can this absence of 30 years be reconciled with the ténour of Finnian's life? It is not to be believed that he was more than sixty years of age when he returned to Ireland, as he would have been according to what we have now seen. (124) How long soever he had been absent, he thought the proper time was arrived for settling in his own country, and accordingly set out for it accompanied, it is said, by some religious Britons (125) who had become very much attached to him. On his passage to Ireland he stopped a while at Darinis to pay a visit to his old friend Caiman; (126) and thence continuing his voyage landed at the port of Kille-Caireni. (127) Thence he sent messengers to Muiredeach, (128) sovereign of Hykingsellagh, requesting permission to enter his territory. The prince, highly rejoiced at his arrival, went to visit him and, throwing himself at his feet, told him that, wherever he would wish to erect a church, he should not want ground for that purpose. Finnian then set about his mission, (129) erected some churches, and established a religious community at a place called Achadh-abhla. (130) Hence he went to the district of Hy-barche, and formed an establishment at Magna, (131) in which he gave lectures on the holy scriptures for seven years. It is related that on a certain occasion he preached before St. Brigid and her nuns; whence it appears that he had returned to Ireland some years before her death; for, according to the series of the narrative, this circumstance is placed after several other transactions of his, subsequent to his return. It is very probable that his return was prior to even A. D. 520, although he did not remove to Clonard (132) until perhaps about 530. Before his settling there, he is said to have been in some other places besides the above-mentioned; but whether truly or not, would be useless to inquire. Clonard was the scene of his greatest exertions and celebrity, and that renowned school will be often mentioned in the sequel of this history.

(117) Usher assigns it to A. D. 520, (Ind. Chron.) but gives no authority for this date.

(118) Colgan acknowledges that none of the various Lives of Finnian, one of which he has at 23 February, can be called genuine. Usher had a different Life, which he has followed, together with the Office of Finnian, published at Paris by Mesingham in 1620, and which Colgan has added to the Life or Acts.

(119) In one of the hymns of the office he is called, Nativus de Lagenia.

(120) Acts at 23 Feb. cap. 2. This story of Finnian having been baptized by Abban seems to have been taken from the Life of the latter, a tract full of fables, in which it is mentioned. Yet it is a ridiculous one, whereas Finnian was born many years before Abban. It may, however, help us to discover Finnian's birth place. Abban's principal residence was, as will be seen elsewhere, at Magarnuidhe near New Ross, on the river Barrow. At Ross we have the junction of the two rivers, viz. the Barrow and the Nore. Roscur might have been one or other of the places on either side of the Barrow, of whose names Ros forms a part, such as Rosberkon, Camross, &c. I would suspect that it was the same as the place called Old Ross, did not Colgan remark, (AA. SS. p. 623) that this town was in ancient times called Ros-glas, and afterwards Ros-mac-triun. As to the bishop Fortkern, if there was such a person when Finnian was born, he must have been different from Fortchern of Trim (see Chap. VIII. §. 16.) and was in all appearance the one of Kill-fortchern in the county of Carlow. (ib. Not. 209.) One of Harris's unfounded additions to Ware (Bishops, p. 136.) is that Finnian's master was Fortchern of Trim. On the whole it seems very probable, that Finnian was born somewhere near the Barrow, not far from New Ross.

(121) Acts, cap. 4. St. Cayman has been already spoken of (Chap. I. §. 12) as contemporary with Declan. As the Darinis where he lived, is most probably that near Wexford, this circumstance forms an additional argument, in corroboration of what has been said in the preceding note.

(122) Kill-muine or Kilmuni, is the name always given in Irish to Menevia or St. David's in Wales. (Colgan, AA. SS. p. 402, and Giraldus Cambr. Life of St. David.) In the office for Finnian it is said that he first went to Tours, and that it was on his way back that he stopped in Britain. I mention these things just as I find them.

(123) Finnian's Office, Lect. 6.

(124) If we add to Finnian's age of 30 years, when he left the school of Fortkern, the time spent with Cayman and the 30 years of his abode in Britain, he must have been above sixty at the time of his departure from that country. Usher, who received as true this story of 30 years absence, (Ind. Chron. ad A. 520.) must also have admitted the prior 30 and more years, as being founded on the same authority. Thus then, according to his hypothesis, Finnian was, at least, full sixty years of age in 520, and so must have been born as far back as the year 460. Usher supposed that Finnian began to teach in that year; but, even admitting it, we may observe that the age of sixty is rather late in life for a man to open a school. The Acts of Finnian exhibit him as not proceeding to Clonard until several years after his return from Britain; Usher, misled by a fable (below Not. 132) says, not until A. D. 544. Thus Finnian would have been 84 years old when he formed the school of Clonard. The fact is, that there is no sufficient authority for the account of the 30 years absence. Colgan writes, in the margin of Chap. XI. of the Acts that Finnian returned to Ireland after an absence of eight years. It is true that in said chapter, as edited by him, we read thirty; but perhaps this number was taken from the Office, whence Usher also took it, pr. p. 912.

(125) Two of them are particularly mentioned, Biteus and Genoc.

(126) Acts, cap. 12. Hence it is clear, that Finnian was not absent for 30 years, nor perhaps ten. For Caiman was already old (see ib. cap. 4.) when Finnian was with him before he set out for Britain. Are we then to believe, that he lived 30 years, or even half this number after that time?

(127) Kille-Caireni signifies the church, &c. of Cairen. I am sure it is the church town of the parish of Carn (co. Wexford) near Carnsore point, and where Mr. Fraser says a good harbour might be formed. (See Statistical Survey of Co. Wexford, p. 24.)

(128) Muiredeach was grandfather to the celebrated Brandedubh, who was king of Leinster in the latter part of the 6th century.

(129) In Finnian's Office we find a flourish in favour of him, where it is said that an angel ordered him to return to Ireland for the purpose of restoring the faith, which had been neglected after St. Patrick's death. In the Acts there is nothing about this neglect of religion, or of Finnian reforming the clergy, &c. as hinted in one of the hymns. He is spoken of as active in forwarding the interests of religion. As to a reform, there was no need of it at that period. St. Ailbe was still alive, as also St. Brigid, besides Enda, Mochus, Naal, Sinell, &c. &c. Such flourishes are but too frequent in compositions of that kind.

(130) Colgan, in his loose topographical manner tells us (AA. SS. p. 398) that this place was in Hykinselagh, and that it was anciently called Cro-saileach. Archdall has it in the county of Wexford, and, I believe, justly. Colgan refers to some Irish document for a story about Finnian having lived for 16 years in that place. The Acts, however, without mentioning any number of years, seem to give us to understand that Finnian remained there no longer time than was necessary to form the establishment.

(131) Archdall places Mugna and Hy-barche in the King's county. I believe Hy-barche or Bairreche was rather the country about Carlow. Fiech, a native of this tract, was of the sept of Hy-bairreche (See Chap. vi. §. 5.)

(132) Usher quotes (p. 909) without any animadversion (which I think really strange) from some register of the diocese of Meath a fable concerning Finnian having got the domaine of Clonard with its farm-houses and other appurtenances from Kieran of Clonmacnois. How could Kieran, the son of a carpenter, have had possession of Clonard, &c.? This story is akin with the nonsense of the book of Navan mentioned by Usher (p. 957) concerning Kieran having got above 100 monasteries, &c. from Diernit king of Ireland, one of which, I dare say, was supposed to include a grant to him of Clonard, which, according to this notable document, he might have made over to Finnian. But whatever grants Diermit might have made to Kieran, they could not have been prior to A. D. 544, the first year of his reign. Now the school of Clonard had been established long before that year, and Kieran himself had been a scholar there prior to his having any monastery of his own. Usher, to prop up that fable, places the grant of Clonard in 544 (Ind. Chron.), yet at A. 540 he has Kieran among Finnian's scholars. But it was, as will be seen, at Clonard that Kieran studied under Finnian. This stuff is not mentioned in the Acts of Finnian or Kieran. In the former (cap. 18) Clonard is represented as a sort of a desert, and the habitation of a huge wild boar, when Finnian arrived to take up his abode there. Harris, although an humble follower of Usher, omitted that silly tale, but Archdall, more faithful, has given it to the public at Clonard.

§. IX. In the Acts of Finnian are mentioned, as now seen, three eminent Britons, David, Gildas, and Cadocus, who, particularly the two first, are also much spoken of in the accounts of other distinguished Irishmen belonging to the period, on which we are now entering. It becomes therefore necessary to inquire into such part of their history as may help us to discover the times, in which they flourished, and to guard against various anachronisms affecting the transactions of our Irish saints. To begin with St. David, (133) I need not tell the reader that he was the celebrated bishop or archbishop of Menevia, (134) or, as now called from him, St. David's in Wales. He is said to have been grandson by the mother's side to the Irish prince Bracon or Brecon, and nephew of St. Canoc of Gallen. (135) If so, he could not have been born in the year 462, as some writers state upon an unproved supposition, that he came into the world 39 years after St. Patrick was on the point of arriving in Ireland on his mission. (136) Next we are told that, soon after his birth, he was baptized by St. Helvacus (Ailbe) bishop of Munster. (137) It will hardly be believed that Ailbe was already a bishop in 462; and we have a further indication of David not having been born so early from what is mentioned concerning his birth having been predicted by Ailbe, (138) who is said also to have superintended for some time his education. (139) Were we to believe certain rather modern writers, he would have been a bishop before A. D. 519, the year to which they assign the synod of Brevy, (140) in which David acted a conspicuous part, and his see of Menevia was declared metropolitanical. But there is better authority for supposing that he did not become a bishop until about 540, (141) a date agreeing with such accounts of him as appear most worthy of credit. This date cannot be made to agree with Usher's hypothesis, which many others have followed, viz. that he died in or about A. D. 544. (142) For it is certain that David governed the see of Menevia for many years, although the precise number of them cannot be ascertained. (143) That he was alive after the year 560, we may justly conclude from his having died during the reign of Maelgwn or Maglocun, by whose order he was buried in his own church of Menevia. Maelgwn, from his having been prince of North Wales, was raised to the rank of king of all the Britons about said year 560; (144) and it must have been after his being advanced to this dignity that he interfered with regard to the interment of St. David. While he remained chieftain or king of only North Wales, he had no jurisdiction or power at Menevia. (145) At what period of the reign of Maelgwn, which lasted until the year 593, (146) St. David died, cannot be determined, but that it was towards the latter end of it appears from his having had for many years under his tuition St. Aidan or Maidoc of Ferns, who was only a boy in the reign of Ainmireus, king of Ireland, which began at the earliest, in the year 566, (147) and who became distinguished before David's death. On the other hand it cannot be placed after the reign of Maelgwn, i. e. after 593. (148) If it be true that Tuesday was the day of his death, (149) we may, I think, with great probability suppose that the year was 589. From what has been now said concerning the time that St. David flourished it follows that St. Finnian, (150) although he might have been a companion of his in Britain, could not have been his disciple, as David was then too young to be the master of a man, who had returned to Ireland before A. D. 520. Finnian was in all probability older than David; yet I am very much inclined to think, that they studied together, at least during a part of their scholarship, in some eminent school in Britain. (151)

(133) Colgan has (at 1 Mart.) a Life of St. David copied from a MS. of the monastery of All Saints in Lough-ree (Co. Longford). Some writers imagined that it might be the same as that mentioned by Usher (p. 843.) as written by Ricemarchus. But they are evidently different; for the passage, and a long one it is, quoted by Usher, is not given by Colgan. Perhaps the author was Augustin Magraidin a member of that monastery, who wrote many Lives of saints. It differs but little from a Life published by the Bollandists, from a MS. of Utrecht: There are other Lives of St. David, concerning which the reader may consult Stillingfleet, Antiquities, &c. Chap. v.

(134) It is not my business to treat of the origin of the see of Menevia or rather the removal thither of the old see of Caer-leon in the time of David's incumbency, and which was ratified by the famous synod of Brevy. Usher (p. 81) and Stillingfleet (loc. cit.) have treated these points with much accuracy.

(135) AA. SS. p. 311. Of Bracan and Canoc we have seen above. (Chap. VIII. §. 15.) The daughter of Bracan, who was mother to St. David, is stated to have been called Melari, and surnamed Nonnita.

(136) In the Acts of St. David it is said that, when St. Patrick happened to be in the Vallis Rosina, in which Menevia was situated, an Angel foretold to him, that after 30 years a child would be born of the name of David, who at a proper time would have the care of that place. As St. Patrick soon after set out for Ireland, where he arrived in the year 432, Usher has hence concluded that St. David was born in 462. (Ind. Chron. and p.

443.) This calculation would answer very well, if it could be proved that the angel spoke in that manner. For as to the opinion of the writers of the Acts, viz. that David was born in 462, if, however they thought so, their authority is of little weight. I say, if they thought so; because we do not know whether they were rightly informed of the year of St. Patrick's arrival in Ireland. (See Not. 129 to Chap. iv.) Thus then the notation of 30 intermediate years cannot form a correct chronological datum. I do not know how it came to pass that the compilers of the Acts of our saints were so fond of the number thirty, as we have seen in the accounts of St. Patrick, St. Brigid, St. Finnian, &c. Jocelin gives a different turn to that prophecy, and attributing one somewhat like it to St. Patrick himself, who, he says (cap. 167), happening to be in Britain some years after the commencement of his mission, foretold the sanctity of St. David then in his mother's womb.

(137) Acts, cap. 6. Giraldus Cambrensis in his Life of St. David has, (according to the old edition) instead of Ailbe, Relveus bishop of Menevia, who, he says, had just arrived in Britain from Ireland. But, as Usher observes, p. 871, there was no bishop of Menevia before David himself. Yet there is no necessity for this observation, if we follow Wharton's edition in Anglia Sacra, Tom. 2. Giraldus' text is here Aelveo Muveniensiū episcopi, which plainly refers to Ailbe bishop of Munster.

(138) Life of Ailbe. (See AA. SS. p. 431.) Ailbe's reputation was not, until about A. D. 490, so generally established as to attribute predictions of this sort to him. If then we may be allowed to build upon traditions of this kind, David's birth must be brought down to the latter end of the fifth century or the beginning of the sixth. Meanwhile the 30 years, above treated of, (Not. 136) must be thrown out of the calculation.

(139) Usher, p. 871. from Ailbe's Life.

(140) Bale (poor authority indeed) quoted by Usher (p. 81) and followed by him (Ind. Chron.) places the synod in that year. Gibson, in an addition to Camden (col. 768) says it was held about 522. Wilkins treating of it (Concil. M. B. &c. Tom. 1. p. 7.) does not venture to decide on the time.

(141) Ranulph of Chester, as quoted by Usher, (p. 82) says that David was made bishop of Menevia in the year that Pope Silverius died, i. e. A. D. 540: In Gale's edition of Ranulph (xv.

Scriptores) I find no mention of St. David. Yet this notation, even if proceeding from an interpolator, is of old standing. The year 543 is that marked for David's promotion by the interpolator of Marianus Scotus. Others have 565, owing to a mistake in not understanding certain chronological terms. (See Usher, ib.) Some have assigned it to 577. (See LeNeve's Fasti Ecclesiae Anglicanae p. 510. This is quite too late, and cannot be reconciled with any credible authority concerning his transactions.

(142) Usher, believing that David died about that period, preferred the date 544 to the 546 of William of Malmesbury, and 547 of others (see p. 526) because Giraldus Cambrensis hints that David's death happened on a Tuesday. Now in the year 544 the first of March fell on Tuesday. This is a good argument against any other year about that time, but not against our being allowed to suppose that David died several years later than 544; whereas the first of March fell also on Tuesday in the years 550, 561, 567, 578, 589, 595, 600, &c. Passing by Cressy and other copyists of Usher, the Bollandists, and the minor writers of Lives of Saints, and even the author of L'art de verifier les dates (at Chronologie des Saints) have adopted his computation, as if the question had been decided.

(143) It has been said, that his incumbency lasted 65 years. (See Godwin, De praesulibus Angliae, ad Episc. Menev.) Were there any foundation for this statement, it would overturn Usher's hypothesis, according to which, counting from 462 to 544 St. David died at the age of eighty two (Pr. p. 526). Now if he was a bishop for 65 years, he should have been consecrated, when only 17 years old, which no one will admit.

(144) Humph. Lhuyd ap. Usher (p. 75). Rowland (Mona Ant.) has A. D. 560. In Lewis' History of Britaine (p. 204) the year of this elevation of Maclawn is mentioned as, according to Vitus, the year 552, and, according to Powel, 580. Usher himself has it from Matthew Florilegus at 581. (Ind. Chron.) As to 552, the date is certainly too early. Lhuyd's computation is the one usually followed, and seems well founded.

(145) Usher speaks (p. 75 and 525) of Maglocun as still prince of North Wales, when David died. His hypothesis required this caution. And, lest it might be objected that Maglocun was not sovereign even of N. Wales as early as A. D. 544, he has affixed his accession to that year. (Ind. Chron.). He must also have supposed that Maglocun obtained that sovereignty very early in said year, whereas St. David died on the first of March. But how could he explain that prince's issuing orders as to the burial of a person, who lived and died in South Wales? If it be said that he issued them during a certain predatory incursion (see Usher, p. 528) surely we are not to suppose that incursion took place in the first year of his sovereignty, nor much less prior to the first of March in said year. On the whole Usher's calculation on these dates are too much forced; and the simplest method of reconciling all the circumstances is to admit that Maglocun was king not only of North but likewise of South Wales, &c. at the time of David's death.

(146) Usher, (Ind. Chron.) Others place the death of Maelgwn somewhat earlier. Gibson (on Camden, col. 825.) has about 586 from a MS. note by Vaughan on Powel.

(147) Usher, p. 947 and Ind. Chron. O'Flaherty says in 568. Of this more elsewhere. Aidan is spoken of over and over as a disciple of St. David not only in his own Life (at 31 Jan.) but likewise in those of David. And from the former it appears that he was already grown up when he went to study under St. David. Usher was greatly staggered by these authorities, some of which he quotes (p. 965). He endeavoured in vain to shake them off (Ind. Chron. at A. 566), first by saying that the king Ainmireus, with whom Aidan had been a hostage, was perhaps an older one of that name; and secondly by observing that what is said of Aidan's having been with St. David might be understood of his having studied in David's monastery after his death. The former evasion is truly pitiful. Where could be found in the sixth century a king of all Ireland called Ainmireus different from him, who began to reign in 566? Besides, Usher well knew that Aidan flourished in the latter end of that century, and during no small part of the seventh. The latter explanation cannot be reconciled with the passages of the Lives. They are too numerous and too clear to be got over in this manner. St. David is introduced several times as speaking to or of Aidan when in his monastery. In the Life of the former we read (cap. 17) that Aidan, after he returned to Ireland, sent a person to David for the purpose of guarding him against a plan formed to poison him. But Usher says, that he could not as yet be persuaded that David lived to the age of 147 years, or until the year 604. As to the 147 years he was right; but had he rejected the hypothesis of David having been born in the year 462, he would have found matters easy enough. In fact that story of so great an age was patched up to reconcile the supposition of David's birth at that early period, with the real circumstance of his having lived until towards the latter end of the sixth century. As to his death being placed in 604, see the following note.

(148) Ranulph of Chester, as quoted by Usher (p. 82), says that David died in the same year with Gregory the great, i. e. A. D. 604. This date cannot agree with his having died during the reign of Maelgwn, nor with the notation of Tuesday as the day of his death. Yet it indicates a belief that he did not die until towards the time of that Pope, and very many years after 544. Others have said that his death was in the same year with that of St. Senan. This is very doubtful as will be seen hereafter. Meanwhile I shall merely observe that Senan lived to a later period than 544. Some writers have an extravagant calculation of David having lived until A. D. 642, founded upon the supposition that he did not take possession of the see of Menevia until 577, (which I find adopted by Sir R. C. Hoare, Annot. to Itinerary, &c. Vol. 2. p. 13) and that he held it for 65 years. According to this strange hypothesis he would have survived not only Maelgwn but likewise his disciple Aidan, who, it is well known, lived for several years after him. The truth is that St. David belonged wholly to the sixth century, being contemporary with the Irish saints of the second order, as will be seen lower down. As for certain biographical writers, who make him a bishop in the fifth, they are not worth attending to.

(149) Giraldus (Life of St. David, lect. 10.) relates that the saint foretold on a Sunday, that he would die on the third feria, i. e. the Tuesday following; and that so it came to pass. The same circumstances are stated in the Life published by Colgan, cap. 27.

(150) Finnian is not mentioned in the Lives of David; and, where in his own Acts he is spoken of as connected with him, he does not appear as a disciple of his.

(151) The school of Iltutus at Laniltult or Lantwitt in Glamorganshire was very famous in the beginning of the 6th century. (See Usher, Ind. Chron. at A. 508 and Stillingfleet, Ant. ch. 5.) There was the school of Paulinus at Withland or Whiteland in Caermarthen, not the isle of Wight as some have made it (see Stillingfleet ib.) in which St. David spent some of his early years. (Acts at 1 Mart. cap. 8.) Paulinus had been a disciple of Iltutus (Usher p. 472), and, considering the period, at which Iltutus' school was in vogue, could scarcely have opened his before A. D. 512. Hence we have an additional proof that David was very young about that time. In a Life of Iltutus David is mentioned, by mistake, as a scholar of his ; but, as the Bollandists and Stillingfleet observe, instead of David we must read Daniel, who studied under Iltutus and afterwards became the first bishop of Bangor.

§. x. Next comes the celebrated Gildas, who, although contemporary with St. David, was, I dare say, born some years before him. His history is extremely confused, and on this account several writers assert (152) that there were two distinct persons of that name, whom they distinguish by different surnames, and one of whom died before the other was born. The elder Gildas is called by them Albanius, and the younger Badonicus from Badon or Bath, not that he was a native of that place, but because he was born in the year of the famous battle of Bath, in which the Britons defeated the Saxons. There would have been no necessity for this distinction, had not certain story-tellers spoken of him as being more ancient than he really was, in the same manner as they did of St. David. Thus they have told us, that Gildas was preaching in a church at a time when St. David was in his mother's womb, and, that on her entering the church, he became suddenly incapable of continuing his sermon. (153) Now, as St. David was supposed to have been born in the year 462, it was calculated that Gildas, being then a priest and a preacher, must have been born above 30 years sooner ; and thus the year 425 was guessed at for his birth, and an older Gildas, different from him who was born in the year of the battle of Bath, was ushered into the world. (154) Upon this sort of foundation, the solidity of which the reader will be able to appreciate, has been erected the superstructure of the two Gildases. To support this baseless fabric it became necessary to derange the history of the times, and particularly to place the battle of (155) Bath about 30 years later than it was really fought. A heap of useless calculations and conjectures has been the consequence of the attempts made to prop up the hypothesis; while after all it is quite plain, that only one Gildas is the subject of the tracts called his lives, and that there is no necessity to suppose that the Acts of two different persons have been jumbled together. (156) These lives agree as to the name of his father, Can, or Coun, (157) who, it is said, was king or chieftain of the part of N. Britain called Arecluta or Alcluid, a part of Roman Britain near the Clyde. (158) Gildas was a younger son, and brother to Hoel who succeeded his father in the principality. As to the time of his birth, it is not marked in the lives; but I find it assigned on respectable authority to the year 490, (159) a date nearly agreeing with what is said concerning the time of the battle of Bath. When a small boy he was sent to the school of Iltutus, (160) which was celebrated about the beginning of the sixth century. Having spent some years at said school, and wishing to improve himself still more both in philosophy and theology, he went to Ireland, (161) and there frequenting several schools (162) acquired a great variety and extent of learning, so as to become eminently qualified for preaching the word of God. His proficiency was such that, according to Caradoc, he was employed for some time as a teacher in the school of Armagh. (163) He remained in Ireland until he heard of the death of his brother Hoel, a most promising brave young man, who fighting against the renowned king Arthur, was killed by him in a battle fought in Anglesey. This battle, in all probability, did not take place until about A. D. 517. (164) Gildas, on his return to Britain, became soon after reconciled with Arthur, who had a great esteem for him, and declared his sorrow for the death of Hoel. Next we find him superintending, by Cadoc's request, the school of Lancarvan for one year, (165) at the expiration of which he is said to have retired, together with Cadoc, to some small islands in the Severn or rather Severn sea, now called the Holmes. His reputation was then very great, and it was probably about this time, viz. about A. D. 520, that he sent, as we are told, a small bell to St. Brigid, who had expressed a wish for some token of his friendship. (166) How or where he afterwards passed his days it is not my business to inquire; (167) and it will here be sufficient to observe that all the lives agree in stating, that several years after his return from Ireland he wrote, when in retirement, those tracts of his, which are still extant. (168) In one of his lives we are told that, in compliance with an invitation from king Ainmireus, he went over to Ireland and there was employed in making certain ecclesiastical regulations. (169) The Annals of Ulster assign his death to the year 570. (170)

(152) Usher may be placed at the head of those, who distinguish two Gildases, as he has supported this hypothesis with great ingenuity. He has been followed, by Colgan, Ware, Cressy, &c. Bollandus maintains (at 29 Jan.) that they were one and the same person. Bale and Pits had preceded Usher; but Leland, a far better authority, has only one Gildas.

(153) This story is to be found in Capgrave's Life of Gildas, cap. 3. (ap. Colgan ad 29 Jan.) and in Giraldus' Life of David. See Usher, p. 443). In the Life of David, published by Colgan, the clergyman, to whom that accident is said to have happened, is not called Gildas, but simply quidam vir sanctus; and in the Life of Ailbe, who is said to have been present, and in which the miracle is referred to the inability not of preaching, but of offering the holy sacrifice, the person thus struck is called merely Sacerdos. (Usher, p. 871.) In course of time some legendary writer, wishing to enhance still more the greatness of David, said that the priest was Gildas.

(154) Usher, who was very apt to throw out chronological conjectures, assigns the birth of Gildas Albanus to A. D. 425. (Ind. Chron.)

(155) The battle of Bath is expressly assigned by Bede (L. 1. c. 16) to about the 44th year after the arrival of the Anglo-Saxons in Britain, which he placed (ib. cap. 15.) in the year of our Lord 449. Thus then it was fought in 492 (as marked by Smith at cap. 16) or, as others calculate, in 493, or in some year about that time. Whichever was the precise year, it was also that of the birth of Gildas the historian. But no year about 490 would suit Usher's hypothesis as to the two Gildases; for by placing the birth of said historian in that period, whatever worthy of belief is said of Gildas can be easily reconciled and explained without recurring to two distinct persons of that name. Usher, accordingly affixed, with Matthew Florilegus, the battle to A. D. 520, (Ind. Chron.) in opposition to Ranulph of Chester, who placed it in 493. And to get over the authority of Bede he says that he mistook the meaning of Gildas, in whose tract (De exc. Brit.) the said 44th year is mentioned not, as Bede thought, relatively to the time of the arrival of the Saxons, but to the number of years that elapsed between the battle and the year, in which Gildas wrote said tract. To understand the question, we must quote the words of Gildas: "Et ex eo tempore nunc cives nunc hostes vincebant—usque ad annum obsessionis Badonici montis—quique quadragesimus quartus (ut novi) oritur (al. orditur) annus mense jam primo (al. uno) emenso, qui jam et meae nativitatis est." Gale's ed. The latter part of this passage is certainly of a doubtful signification and may, perhaps, be understood in the manner proposed by Usher; although it must be allowed that, if Gildas alluded to the number of years, by which the battle was prior to that in which he wrote, he would probably have applied the number 44th rather to this year than to that of the battle. Bede copied the whole passage almost word for word, except that marking the time of the battle he has, "quadragesimo circiter et quarto anno adventus eorum in Britanniam." (L. 1. c. 16.) Usher thought that Bede mentioned the year as the 44th, because he found this number in Gildas, and consequently that Bede's chronology ought to be corrected by what he supposed the true meaning of Gildas. But even admitting that Usher has rightly understood Gildas, how could he prove that Bede founded his assertion of that date merely on the Gildas' text? Surely he could not want documents to direct him in assigning the times of the more remarkable transactions of his countrymen. Might not Bede's about the 44th year be relative to one period and Gildas' positive 44th to another? so that it would be true that the battle was fought about the 44th year after the arrival, and likewise precisely in the 44th before the year in which Gildas wrote, making altogether, until this last date, about 87 years. Besides, Usher's argument is merely negative, and, at most, proves nothing more than that we cannot conclude from Gildas' words that the battle took place about A. D. 392. It does not, however, show that it was not fought about that time, nor help us to fix the precise year of it. If he could have laid down, upon correct authority, the time, in which Gildas wrote, his mode of arguing would be conclusive; but he had no such authority to produce, although he undertook to assign (p. 447) said writing to A. D. 564, merely on his unproved hypothesis that 520 was the year of the battle of Bath and consequently of the birth of Gildas.

(156) Colgan has (at 29 Jan.) Capgrave's life of Gildas, and another published by John de Bosco from the Bibliotheca Floriacensis, besides extracts from the life by Caradoc of Lancarvan. He calls the life by Capgrave that of Gildas Albanius, and the other from J. de Bosco that of Gildas Badonicus, of which, however, he says, a great part belongs not to him but to Albanius. He might have said the same of the life by Caradoc, which, with Usher, he supposed to have been intended for Albanius. The fact is that they were all intended as the Acts of one and the same Gildas, although we meet with, as usual, some strange anachronisms here and there. Stillingfleet was perfectly correct in saying (Ant. &c. ch. 4.); "Caradoc's Gildas can be no elder the Gildas Badonicus. Although therefore the want of skill may make Caradoc set his Gildas elder than he ought to have done, yet whosoever will compare that Life published by Joh. a Bosco with the other by Caradoc will find, that they were designed for the same person."

(157) Caradoc calls him Nau, but agrees in other points.

(158) Hence Capgrave says that Can was a king of Albania, i. e. N. Britain; and thus Gildas got the surname Albanius.

Caradoc, alluding to his own times, calls that prince, a king of the Scots. But the Scots did not get possession of Arecluta until long after the birth of Gildas. Usher changed (p. 676 Ind. Chron. ad a. 425). Arecluta into Argathelia.

(159) The Chronicon Britannicum, published from a manuscript of the church of Nantz by Lobineau (Hist. de Bretagne, Tom. 2.) has; "A. 490. Natus est S. Gildas."

(160) In the life published by J. De Bosco we read (cap. 3.) "Beatus autem Gildas—a suis parentibus beato Hilduto traditur imbuendus; qui suscipiens sanctum puerulum," &c. Usher, well aware that his Gildas Albanus, whom he supposed to have been born in 425, could not have been, when a boy, at the school of Iltutus, says, (p. 473) that this is to be understood of Badonicus. He knew, however, that just before the words now quoted the father of the Gildas, who was sent to that school, is called Caun, the very man whom he himself (Ind. Chr. ad A. 425) makes the father of Albanus. Strange that Usher could think, that Iltutus was still keeping school about the year 530; for so he must have supposed according to his hypothesis of Badonicus having been born in 520, whereas it will be allowed that the pupil could not be less than nine or ten years of age when he was placed under Iltutus. Now he tells us elsewhere (ib. ad A. 508) that Iltutus was already an abbot when he baptized Samson, who, according to his own calculation, which he made later than I believe it ought to be, became a bishop in 521. (ib. ad An.) Thus Iltutus must have been an abbot, at the lowest, in 491, and then, we may fairly suppose, at least 35 years old. Are we to believe that he continued to keep a school for sixty years after? Usher indeed, to serve his hypothesis, brings the death of Iltutus down to 540 by mere conjecture. Add to this that Samson, although somewhat older than Gildas, was a school-fellow of his, (Life above quoted cap. 4. and Pr. p. 472). As he was a bishop in 521, how could the pretended Badonicus, who, as Usher would have it, was born in 520, have been his school-fellow?

(161) "Valedicens pio magistro—Iren perrexit, ut," &c. (said Life, cap. 6.) The editor J. de Bosco, not understanding the name, Iren, wrote in the margin that it was an academy in G. Britain, and hence a silly story was patched up about Iren having been the same place as Oxford. But Usher (p. 909) has shown that Iren was no other than Ireland or Erin. Stillingfleet, who was of the same opinion, has well exposed (Ant. &c. ch. 4.) the absurdity of that Oxonian fable. From what follows concerning the proceedings of Gildas it is evident, that he studied in Ireland.

(162) “Cum plurimorum scholas peragrasset.” (Said Life, ib.) Who would be fool enough to believe that there were many schools then at Oxford? In those times there were in Ireland, besides the school of Armagh, those of Ailbe, Mochtheus, Enda, Naal, &c. &c. Usher, in pursuance of his hypothesis, mentions (p. 907) among the schools, which Gildas might have frequented, that of Finnian at Clonard; imagining that it was his Badonicus, who is said to have come to Iren, and, according to him, in the year 540. (Ind. Chron.) But, as will be seen presently, the Gildas, who came to Iren, was the same identical person, who taught for some time at Armagh, and therefore not different from him, whom Usher calls Albanius.

(163) Caradoc has; “Gildas Britonum historiographus tunc remanens in Hibernia, studium regens et praedicans in civitate Ardmaca.” It is extraordinary that Usher, having quoted this passage (p. 859), still persisted in his hypothesis. He says (ib.) that the teacher at Armagh was Gildas Albanius. Now Caradoc makes him the same as the historian of the Britons, alluding, as Usher well knew, to his History or treatise De excidio Britanniae, which, being written about the middle of the sixth century, could not have been the work of the pretended Albanius, and is by Usher himself attributed to Badonicus. Thus then the Gildas, whom Caradoc so plainly describes as the one only person, is split into two by Usher.

(164) Caradoc describes Hoel as refusing to obey king Arthur, and invading various parts of South Britain. Arthur, therefore, to secure himself on the throne, found it necessary to attack him with vigour and, having overtaken him, killed him at a place now called Carrig-Howel, in the isle of Anglesey. The battle ought, considering these circumstances, to be placed in the beginning of Arthur's reign, which, according to Matthew of Westminster, or Florilegus, commenced in the year 516, or, as others say, 517. That it began in one or other of these years, seems generally admitted at present. (See Warrington, Hist of Wales, p. 69, Rowland, Mona Atiqua, 2d ed. p. 180. Biogr. Brit. &c. Usher, in compliance with his system, assigns (Ind. Chron.) the commencement of Arthur's reign and the death of Hoel to A. D. 508; whereas he supposed that Hoel was brother to Gildas Albanus, whose death he places in 512. Now as Hoel was killed before Gildas died, Usher was obliged to antedate the reign of Arthur. But even admitting that it began in 508, it is truly strange that he did not at last give up his whole hypothesis. For in that year his Albanus was, according to him, 83 years of age, and Hoel, whom he allowed to be the elder brother, must have been still more. It is not easy to believe that a man, about 85 years old, would have volunteered on predatory excursions. Then we have the clear testimony of Caradoc to prove that Hoel was a vigorous young man, magnanimus victoriosissimus juvenis, at the time of the battle. Usher (Ind. Chr. ad A. 508) desires us not to believe Caradoc, as, says he, "we have shown that Hoel's brother Gildas was born in 425." Usher indeed has often said so, but has not shown it any where. Why thus abuse poor Caradoc, whose account of Gildas is, on the whole, very consistent, and which is so often followed by Usher himself? Why not also reject Caradoc's assertion, that Gildas was contemporary with king Arthur, who, according to Usher, was born in 493? Who would say that a man born in said year was contemporary with another born in 425? Stillingfleet has rightly observed (ch. 4) on Usher's hypothesis; "that when he comes to fix the times in his chronological index, he doth overthrow his own supposition: for Caradoc, by his own confession, makes Gildas contemporary with king Arthur, and he (Arthur) is said by him (Usher) to be born A. D. 493." Rowland, who also admitted two Gildases, pretends that Arthur was not as yet king, when he killed Hoel or Howel, and that the battle was fought in 505. But even this supposition will not explain, how the pretended Albanus, a man born in 425, could have been brother, and a younger one, to Hoel. The fact is, that Caradoc repeatedly calls Arthur king of Britain, where he treats of the cause of the quarrel, battle, &c. Capgrave likewise calls him king on that occasion. It would be going too much out of my way to enter into an investigation of the perplexed history of Arthur; and I will only observe that, as the Welsh bards made him their hero on every occasion against the Saxons, it came to be believed that he commanded at the battle of Bath. Next it was supposed that he commanded there as king. Hence Matthew of Westminster, having assigned the beginning of his reign to A. D. 516, placed the battle in 520. Thus Gildas' birth was placed in that year, and so he came to be born after his brother's death, and after he had been teaching in Ireland. To get over these absurdities recourse was had to the paradox of the two Gildases. The true method, however, would have been to reject the story of Arthur having commanded as king in that battle; in which several writers with much greater appearance of probability assert that the general in chief was his uncle Ambrosius Aurelianus, who reigned in Britain until very near the end of the fifth century (Usher, p. 447) and consequently might have been present at the battle of Bath. And, if any one choose to maintain, that Arthur fought in that battle, nothing more is requisite than to assign, as I believe ought to be done, his birth to some years prior to 493, the one laid down by Usher; and to say, with William of Malmesbury (De gest. reg. L. 1. c. 1.) that Arthur was a warlike young prince before the death of Ambrosius. Nennius (Hist. Brit. cap. 62, 63) has Arthur at the battle of Bath as a general not king. "Arthur pugnabat contra illos in illis diebus, videlicet Saxonés, cum regibus Britonum; sed ipse dux erat bellorum." And the Chronicon Britannicum quoted above (Not. 159) mentions Arthur as a brave man about 490, at which year we read; "His diebus fuit Arthurus fortis." According to these statements, which are, at least, as worthy of credit as those followed by Usher, it will follow that he has placed Arthur's birth too late; and it is not easy to believe that, as Ambrosius was old enough in the year 455 (Ind. Chr.) to be a general, Arthur the eldest son of his brother Uther was not born until 493. In whatsoever manner the history of this champion may be arranged, it is certain that the real and only Gildas was born many years prior to 520; a fact, which cannot be weakened by the entangled and contradictory statements concerning the times and feats of Arthur.

(165) Usher, still persisting in his hypothesis, makes his Gildas Albanus the person thus superintending Cadoc's school, and assigns this circumstance to A. D. 508 (Ind. Chron.) so as to find room for that year and some other transactions before 512, in which he places the death of Albanus. To prepare us for this calculation he had previously stated that Cadoc flourished in the year 500 (ib.) But it will be soon seen that Cadoc could not have flourished so early, nor scarcely have had a school in 503. Even admitting that Cadoc's school existed in that year, it is odd that Usher would fain make us believe that a man 83 years old, as his Albanus must have been at that time, would have undertaken such a troublesome task.

(166) See above §. 5. Usher, sticking as usual to Gildas Albanus, assigns this affair of the bell to the year 484. (Ind. Chron.) But the Life (J. de Bosco) which mentions this transaction, and which Usher himself quotes (p. 905), has it after the return of Gildas from Ireland, and therefore, according to Usher's own calculation, later than 508. Now, if it had taken place in 484, it should have been prior to the arrival of said Albanus in Ireland, whom Usher does not bring among us until about 498. (Ind. Chron.)

(167) Caradoc says that he went to Glastonbury, and that he spent the remainder of his days partly there, and partly in the neighbourhood. Capgrave also sends him to that place, after, however, a previous tour to Rome. The life (ed. J. de Bosco) makes him go to Brittany, when thirty years of age, and the Chronicon Britannicum, published by Lobineau, assigns his arrival in that country to A. D. 520, a date, according to which, compared with that of his birth (See Not. 159) he would have been in said year exactly of that age. In the life (J. de Bosco), a thorough huge chronological blunder, Childeric son of Meroveus, is mentioned as king of the Franks, when Gildas repaired to Brittany. As Childeric reigned about the middle of the fifth century, Usher seized upon this anachronism, and tells us (p. 444) that it was his Albanus who went, at the age of thirty, to that country. But elsewhere it is his Badonicus, whom he often exhibits as passing several years in Brittany. Thus, when we read in said Life, immediately after the account of Gildas' arrival there, that ten years afterwards he, being still in Brittany, wrote his querulous epistle against the British kings, &c. Usher (ib.) exclaims that the author of the Life confounded the two Gildases together, whereas it was his Badonicus that wrote the epistle. Instead of recurring to this charge against that author, as he and Colgan often do, it would have been more fair to impute to him a chronological mistake with regard to Childeric than to accuse him of having confounded in the same breath two distinct persons. And observe that this is the author, on whom Usher mainly depends for Badonicus, notwithstanding his agreement in so many points with Caradoc, the biographer, as he thought, of Albanus. The British Chronicle has no allusion to the arrival in Brittany of any Gildas but one, or to any circumstances indicating a second person of that name.

(168) We have just seen, that in the Life (J. de Bosco) Gildas is said to have written his Querulous epistle ten years after his arrival in Brittany. Usher, following his explanation of Gildas' 44th year, and his date for the battle of Bath, states that Gildas wrote it in the year 564 (above Not. 155). He supposed (of which lower down) that said tract and the history or treatise, De excidio Britanniae, are not two distinct works, but only component parts of one and the same. But the Epistle must have been written many years before that time, whereas Gildas, about the beginning of it, informs us that he wrote it in the year in which Constantine, successor to Arthur, murdered the two sons of Modred, or, as others call him, Medrod. This was, according to Matthew of Westminster in the year 543, and must have happened about that time; whereas those young princes had taken up arms to avenge the death of their father, who was killed in the battle of Camlan, A. D. 542. Usher, who admitted that Constantine became chief king of the Britons in 542, and that he reigned only three years, was greatly puzzled by these dates, and has endeavoured (p. 537, and Ind. Chron. ad A. 542) to make out a distinction between this Constantine, and the Constantine whom Gildas inveighs against, and whom (Usher says) he seems to speak of as only king or tyrant of Damnonia (Cornwall). It is not easy to understand Usher's meaning on this point, and it would appear as if he intended to show that Gildas was inconsistent with himself. Now in the first place the Constantine of Cornwall was the very person, who became chief sovereign after the death of Arthur (See Warrington, p. 79 and Rowland, p. 181). Secondly, Gildas was not inconsistent in alluding to him as the tyrant of Cornwall, or in mentioning other British kings as contemporary with Constantine. For, Constantine's being appointed chief of the league did not deprive the other princes of their hereditary rights. As then the Epistle was written about the year 543, Usher's hypothesis concerning the battle of Bath in 520, combined with his explanation of the 44th year mentioned by Gildas (See Not. 155) falls to the ground. Between 520 and 543 there were only 23 years; and we may be sure that Gildas was of a much greater age than 23 when he penned that terrible epistle. It will also follow, that Gildas did not arrive in Brittany as early as A. D. 520 (See Not. 167), if it be true that he wrote the epistle about ten years after. But I strongly suspect that these ten years ought to be taken relatively not to the epistle but to the history or tract De excidio Britanniae, which appears to me a complete work in itself, distinct from the Epistle, and, I believe, written several years sooner. What is said of them is founded on Gildas' own words in his preface to the history, where he tells us that for ten years or more, previous to his setting about it, he had been silent; "spatio bilustris temporis vel eo amplius." In said preface Gildas gives a summary of its contents, which corresponds exactly with what we find in it alone, without at all alluding to the subject matter of the Epistle, although a larger work than the history. He says that he composed it in a mournful style, suitable to the sad state of his country. Hence it has been entitled, "De excidio Britanniae Liber querulus," that is a Book of lamentations, &c. and so it really is. The adjunct, querulus, led to the mistake of joining it to the epistle, which was also called querula, because it is full of complaints. It should, however, be rather called Epistola satyrica or flagellans, as it contains most tremendous invectives against the princes and clergy of Britain. Now, referring those ten or more years to the history alone, we may suppose that this tract was written not long after A. D. 530; and so Usher's interpretation of the 44th year may still be adopted, yet with this proviso that the battle of Bath and accordingly Gildas' birth be assigned to about 490. The title of British historian, as he is called in all the lives, was given to Gildas in consequence of his being the author of these works, particularly that De Excidio, &c. which in his preface he calls "qualemcumque gentis Britannicæ historiolum." To get rid of the argument deduced from this title and proving that there was but one Gildas in those days, the sticklers for the pretended Albanus invented a fable concerning his having written a history of the British kings, and thus have given us two Gildases historians instead of one. Strange that Ware (Writers at Gildas) could have copied this nonsense.

(169) In the Life (J. de Bosco), the only one that has Gildas in Ireland in the reign of Ainmireus, a pompous account is given of his exertions, and of the extraordinary benefits thence derived to the Irish church. The silly author, to enhance the glory of his hero, says that the people of Ireland had lost the Catholic faith, and that Gildas brought them back to it. The falsehood of this ridiculous fable is too palpable to require a refutation. Usher has shown (p. 907) the absurdity of it; and Cólgan (AA. SS. p. 189 seqq.) gives a long succession of saints and eminent ecclesiastics, who were in Ireland at that period, viz. about A. D. 467, as likewise before and after it. It was in Ireland that Gildas himself acquired his chief store of ecclesiastical learning, as that same author has recorded. (See Not. 161) Usher has well observed that this flourish in favour of Gildas is as foolish as another in that life, where we are told that Gildas preached throughout the whole country of the Angles or Anglo-Saxons. That Gildas was in Ireland at the time above-mentioned is not improbable, whereas he was contemporary with many Irish saints of the second class, whose times comprized the short period of Ainmireus' reign. And it will be seen that, together with others, he was engaged in regulating the liturgy and some other matters of church discipline in Ireland.

(170) Usher, (Ind. Chron.) According to the life last referred and the Nantz Breviary (AA. SS. p. 176) Gildas died in the small island Horata or Hoata, now Houat, whither he had retired, not long before his death, and when very old, from his monastery of Rewisius, now St. Gildas de Ruys. This monastery is in the diocese of Vannes, and opposite to the isle Houat. (See H. Vales. Not. Gall. at Reunvisius.) The Glastonians, according to their usual mode of robbing other places of their saints, pretended that he died near Glastonbury and was buried in that monastery. Accordingly we find this story in William of Malmesbury (De Ant. Glaston.) and in the lives by Caradoc and Capgrave. To this they added that his death occurred in the year 512. Usher and his adherents apply these accounts to their Gildas Albanus; but the Glastonians understood them otherwise. For it was the body of Gildas the historian, which they claimed as resting among them; the Britonum historiographus, as one of their chroniclers writes (Usher, p. 471); the Gildas neque insulsus neque infacetus historicus, as William of Malmesbury calls him; and whom also Caradoc and Capgrave exhibit as the historian. As to the date 512, it was brought forth to add to the antiquity of the monastery. Usher, having unluckily adopted it, bewildered himself in useless and contradictory calculations. In consequence of his distinguishing two Gildasses, and placing the birth of his Badonicus in 520 he has induced several writers to lay down that the real Gildas died when only 50 years of age, whereas it is expressly stated, as we have just seen, that he was very old at the time of his death. I shall now conclude this long and tiresome discussion with referring to Gale, the able and accurate editor of Gildas' tracts, who, as appears from his general preface (ad XV Scriptores) knew of only one Gildas in those times, however marked by various surnames or epithets, and of whom he writes; "Gildas historicus, Albanus, Badonicus, Sapiens (tot enim innotuit titulis) Iltuti discipulus," &c.

§ XI. The third eminent British saint of those times was Cadoc or Cadocus, or, as he is named in some Irish documents, Docus. He was contemporary with St. David and Gildas and a near relative of the former, whereas their mothers were sisters, (171) both daughters of the Irish prince, Bracan, of whom we have treated elsewhere. (172) Accordingly Cadoc was nephew to St. Canoc of Gallen. His father was Gundlaeus son of a king of South Britain, and chieftain of a part of what formed his father's kingdom. (173) As Cadoc was grandson to prince Bracan, his birth cannot be placed earlier than about the latter end of the fifth century. (174) When a boy he was entrusted to the care of St. Tathaeus or Thaddaeus an Irishman, who kept a celebrated school at Caerwent in Monmouthshire. (175) Having completed his studies at that school he went to the district of Glamorgan, and established a religious house, since called the monastery of Lancarvan, near the Severn and about three miles from Cowbridge. Meanwhile his father Gundlaeus had retired from the world and given up a considerable portion of his lands to Cadoc, whereby he became enabled to maintain a great number of poor students and to exercise hospitality, besides providing for the poor in general. We have seen that Gildas assisted him for one year in the direction of his school or academy, and that they afterwards remained together for some time in a small island. Cadoc must have afterwards resumed the care of his monastery and school, whereas we find that St. Canice, who was born in the year 516, or, as others say, 527, was a pupil of his. (176) He died the same year as Gildas, viz. A. D. 470, in his own monastery of Lancarvan, in the government of which he was succeeded by Ellenius one of his principal disciples. (177)

(171) In the Acts of Cadoc published by Colgan (at 24 Jan.) Cadoc's mother is said to have been Gladusa daughter of Bracan and sister of Melari the mother of St. David.

(172) See Chap. VIII. §. 15.

(173) Acts at 24 Jan. and Usher p. 464.

(174) See Chap. VIII. §. 15. Usher was forced by his hypothesis concerning Gildas Albanus to say that Cadoc flourished in the year 500 (See Not. 165). This date cannot be reconciled with what is said of his family connexions, nor with the series of his transactions.

(175) Tathaeus set up that school on the invitation of king Caradoc son of Inirius. Usher seems to place (Ind. Chron.) the commencement of it between A. D. 469 and 474. Camden was mistaken in calling (col. 741) Tathaeus a British saint, whereas in his Life, by Joh. Timmuthensis, quoted by Usher (p. 92) he is expressly called an Irishman.

(176) The venerable British abbot, under whom St. Canice studied, is called Docus. (See Usher, p. 952.) I believe there can be no doubt that he was the same as Cadoc of Lancarven. In like manner the contemporary of David and Gildas, as likewise of the Irish saints of the second class, appears under the name of Docus, and was certainly the same as the master of Canice. Who could this distinguished man have been except Cadoc of Lancarvan? There is no mention in the church history of Britain, as far as I can discover, of any eminent person in those days, called simply Docus; and, vice versa, our Irish writers do not mention Cadoc as celebrated at that period. Hence it is fair to conclude, that Docus and Cadocus were the same. A person well versed in the old British language might, I dare say, be able to show that the names are in reality not different. Usher has overlooked this point. It would not have suited his system to make Docus the same person as Cadoc. For he knew that Docus flourished in the middle of the sixth century; while, on the other hand, he assigned Cadoc to the beginning of it. There is a fable concerning Cadoc's having left his monastery and gone to Beneventum in Italy, where he became bishop under the name of Sopkias. Usher, true to his hypothesis, assigns this notable occurrence to A. D. 514 (Ind. Chron.), while others place it in 567. (AA. SS. p. 160.) This foolish story was probably founded on mistaking Beneventum for a place in Britain called Benaventa, whither Cadoc might have gone on some occasion; or, as Cressy observes (Church Hist. &c. Book x. ch. 21.) on the having confounded Cadoc of Lancarven with another Cadoc or Sopkias martyr at Beneventa or Banaventa, as Camden calls it, and which he thought (col. 531) to be the same as Wedon in Northamptonshire. Be this as it may, Usher had no authority for making Cadoc quit his monastery in 514. Another story, less silly indeed, is that of Iltutus having retired from the world through the exhortation of Cadoc (Usher, p. 472). Iltutus was undoubtedly prior to Cadoc, particularly if, as the same authority states, he had been a disciple of St. German of Auxerre. His having been Gildas's master is sufficient to show, that Cadoc was a junior, compared with him.

(177) Harpsfeld, and Pits, Colgan ap. AA. SS. p. 159. Cressy draws (loc. cit.) an objection against the date assigned by Harpsfeld from its having been somewhere said that Dubricius was present at Cadoc's death. This is one of the usual anachronisms relative to those old times, according to which eminent men of different periods are spoken of as contemporaries. Usher (Ind. Chron. ad A. 514) mentions Ellenius as placed over the monastery on Cadoc's pretended departure for Beneventum, which he himself considered as fabulous. (See Pr. p. 471.)

§. XII. To the account now given of David, Gildas, and Cadoc, we may add that in those times, and for several years previous, a great intercourse was kept up between the religious persons of Ireland and those of both Great Britain and Brittany; so that, while Irishmen repaired to either of the latter countries, many pious Britons used to spend a great part of their time in Ireland. Besides the many instances we have met with already, we find that Petranus, a nobleman of Brittany, and father of the celebrated St. Paternus, retired to Ireland about the beginning of the sixth century and there led a most holy life. (178) Paternus also visited Ireland and remained there for some time. (179) Petrocus a native of G. Britain, from whom Petrock-stow, now Padstow, in Cornwall, has got its name, spent twenty years in Ireland applying himself to the study of the scriptures and to the acquirement of general knowledge. (180) On the other hand St. Renan, an Irish bishop, retired to Brittany about the latter end of the fifth century for the purpose of leading a solitary life, which he did chiefly in the forest of Nevet in the territory of Cornouaille then governed by Count Grallo, who held him in very high consideration. (181) St. Sezin or Sezni also a native of Ireland, and a bishop, is said to have died in Brittany A. D. 529. (182) St. Jaova or Jovin studied in G. Britain under his maternal uncle Paul, one of the disciples of Illutus. Having returned to Ireland he embraced the ecclesiastical state. On being informed that his uncle had gone to Brittany, where he became first bishop of St. Pol de Leon, (183) Jaova went over to that country and there spent the remainder of his days, partly in the government of a monastery and partly in the administration of said see. (184) Of the visits of Brendan of Clonfert and others to either Britain, we shall see hereafter.

(178) Usher, p. 528.

(179) Ib.

(180) "In Hiberniam proficiscens, litterarum disciplinis et sacrae scripturae viginti annis se mancipavit—praeceptores eximie doctos excoluit—Hibernicas gazas in Coriniam seu Cornubium transtulit, et videndas omnibus exhibuit. (See Usher, p. 564 and Ind. Chron. ad A. 518.)

(181) Lobineau, Hist. de Bretagne, Tom. 1. p. 73 Grallo must have lived about the latter end of the 5th century, as he was the founder of the abbey of Landevenec, the first abbot of which was St. Winwaloe or Winwalloc, who was born not long after the arrival of the Britons in Armorica, and therefore, according to Lobineau's calculation about A. D. 458; and whose death Usher, (p. 464 and Ind. Chron.) assigns to A. D. 504. St. Renan was most probably the same as Renan the monk, who has, through mistake, been said to have been contemporary with St. Martin of Tours. (See Usher, p. 1043.)

(182) See Not. 5 to Chap. vi.

(183) Usher places (Ind. Chron.) the accession of Paul to that see in the year 529.

(184) Colgan has (at 2 Mart.) the Acts of St. Jaova from Albert Le Grande. In them a St. Kenan is mentioned as appointed by Jaova to administer the parish of Plou-kernan in that diocese. He was perhaps the Kenan spoken of by Usher, as we have seen elsewhere. (Chap. vii. §. 6.) Lobineau merely touches upon (p. 76) a St. Euflam, supposed to have lived about those times in Brittany, son of an Irish king, of whom, he says, incredible things are told.

§. XIII. Colgan assigns to the year 522 (185) the death of an Irish hermit named Paul, who is said to have been a disciple of St. Patrick or rather of Fiech of Sletty. That there was a person of that name at Fiech's school I do not mean to deny; but the prodigious stories concerning his manner of subsisting in a certain island, and the great age, to which he has been made to live, exceed all bounds of probability, and render any inquiry into his history useless. (186) St. Carnech, who, according to Colgan, died about 530, is better known in Irish history, although no detailed account remains of his transactions. (187) He was of the princely house of Orgiel and maternal grandson of Loarn the first chief of the Irish or Scottish settlers in N. Britain. As his mother was sister to Ercá, he was therefore first cousin to the then king of Ireland Murchertach. (188) He was abbot, and bishop, somewhere to the West of Lough-foyle and not far from Lifford. (189) Little more is known about him. Yet his memory has been held in high veneration; (190) and two brothers of his, Ronan and Breacan, are likewise reckoned among the Irish saints. The king Murchertach did not long survive his cousin St. Carnech, having been put to death, in a most cruel manner, in the year 533, or 534. (191) He was succeeded by Tuathal the second, a great grandson of Neill Neigilliach by his son Corpreus. Tuathal reigned for 10, or, as some say, 11 years. (192) At the time of Tuathal's accession to the throne the archbishop of Armagh was Alild the second, of the same family as his immediate predecessor likewise called Alild, (193) who died on the 13th Jan. A. D. 526 after an incumbency of 13 years. (194) Of other bishops then in Ireland we have scarcely any authentic account, although it is certain that there were many. Tigernach of Clones was still alive. Lugadius was, in all probability, already bishop of Connor, as he died as early as the year 538. (195) Of some others, who might have been bishops in those days, we will see lower down. I will now conclude this chapter with reminding the reader that St. Moctheus of Louth, most probably the last surviving disciple of St. Patrick, and whom we have often met with, (196) died in the year 535, and, it seems, on the 19th of August. (197)

(185) Ind. Chron. ad AA. SS.

(186) Colgan has (at 25 Jan.) what he calls the Acts of this Paul. The greater part of them is nothing else than a corrupt and ridiculous imitation of the history of St. Paul of Egypt, the first hermit; with this difference that, instead of a continental desert, the Irish Paul is made to pass his lonely days in a desert island.

(187) Colgan gives (at 28 Mart.) whatever he could collect concerning St. Carnech.

(188) See above §. 2.

(189) Colgan thinks that his monastery and residence was at a place called Cruachan-ligean, or near it, on the western bank of Lough foyle. He adds that it was perhaps at Cluain-laodh, now now Clonleigh, in that neighbourhood, which has at present a parish church. But elsewhere (Tr. Th. p. 495) he reckons the monastery of Cluain-loadh among the foundations of Columb-kill, and places there Lugadius one of his disciples. Archdall (at Clonleigh) imagined that it might be the same as Cruachan-ligean. Colgan, however, speaks of them as two distinct places not far from each other.

(190) Besides the mention made of him by our Hagiologists, his name occurs in the old Anglican litany published by Mabillon. (See Chap. 11. §. 7.) Colgan observes, that he must not be confounded with a British saint Carantoc, alias Cernach, who lived chiefly in Ireland. (See Cressy, B. ix. ch. 8.)

(191) Above Not. 25. See O'Flaherty, Carm. Chronograph.

(192) Usher, (p. 947) and Ware Ant. cap. 4.) O'Flaherty, in consequence of his calculations (Ogyg. Part. 3. c. 93) gives him eleven. The 4 Masters and Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 447) agree with Usher and Ware as to the number of years, but, adhering to their dates, make his reign begin in 527 (528).

(193) See above §. 3.

(194) Ware, Bishops, &c. He assigns the death of Ailild to A. D. 526, as does Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 293) who, however, following the old Irish mode of anticipating the vulgar era, calls that year 525. Usher, (Ind. Chron.) agrees with Ware, although he seems elsewhere (p. 874) to place it in 527. As Ailild (the first) died so early in the year as the 13th of January, it is very probable that his incumbency, which had begun in 513, did not last full 13 years.

(195) AA. SS. p. 191. It is a sad consideration that of many of our prelates little else has come down to us than the dates of their death. And concerning many more we do not know even that much. This, however, is a misfortune not peculiar to the history of the Irish church.

(196) Chap. vi. §. 12. vii. 7. viii. 8.

(197) Colgan states (AA. SS. p. 732) that the memory of St. Moctheus was celebrated on, at least, two days in the year, viz. March 24 and August 19. The latter day is that, to which the Annals of Ulster and the 4 Masters affix his death. Archdall (at Louth) has A. D. 534, not reflecting that, although this number appears in the Annals, it was the same as 535 of the Vulgar era. Allemand fell (Hist. Mon. &c. Introd. p. 19.) into a huge mistake with regard to Moctheus, placing him at Ferns and thus confounding him with Moedoc or Aidan, who was not born until after Moctheus' death.

END OF THE FIRST VOLUME.

BW5327 .L28 v.1

An ecclesiastical history of Ireland,

Princeton Theological Seminary-Speer Library

1 1012 00017 8766

BR794.L3 1829 v.2
ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY OF IRE
ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY OF IRE

John Mulcahy

AN ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY

OF IRELAND,

FROM THE
FIRST INTRODUCTION OF CHRISTIANITY
AMONG THE IRISH,
TO
THE BEGINNING OF THE THIRTEENTH CENTURY.

COMPILED

FROM THE WORKS OF THE MOST ESTEEMED AUTHORS, FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC, WHO HAVE WRITTEN AND PUBLISHED ON MATTERS CONNECTED WITH

THE IRISH CHURCH ;

AND FROM IRISH ANNALS AND OTHER AUTHENTIC DOCUMENTS,
STILL EXISTING IN MANUSCRIPT.

By THE REV. JOHN LANIGAN, D. D.,

FORMERLY PROFESSOR OF HEBREW, THE SACRED SCRIPTURES, AND ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PAVIA.

IN FOUR VOLUMES.

VOL. II.

SECOND EDITION.

DUBLIN :

PRINTED FOR J. CUMMING, 16, L. ORMOND-QUAY ;
SIMPKIN AND MARSHALL, LONDON ;
AND FOR R. CADELL AND CO., EDINBURGH.

1823.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY

OF

IRELAND, &c.

CHAPTER X.

Ailild the second, bishop of Armagh—Succeeded by Dubhtach or Duach—St. Senan—Erects the Church at Inniscarra—and of Innislunge—and of Innistuaisceart—Monastery of Inis-cathaig, now Inniscatthy—Kieran of Clonmacnois—St. Kieran of Saigir—St. Diermit abbot of Inis-clothran—St. Fedlimid of Kilmore—Bishop Illandus—St. Rioch, bishop of Innisbofinde—Tuathal monarch of Ireland killed—succeeded by Diermit—St. Finnian of Clonard—Finnian bishop of Maghbile—St. Frigidean—The two Brendans—Briga sister of St. Brendan of Clonfert—St. Iarlath of Tuam—SS. Comgall, Coemgen, and Kieran—Clonmacnois founded—St. Fintan of Clonenagh—Monastery of Benchor—St. Columbkil—David bishop of Armagh—succeeded by Feidlimid-fionn—St. Tegernach of Clones—Death of St. Senell or Sechnell—and of St. Odran—Columba son of Crimthan—Monastery of Tir-daglas—St. Mobhy Clairineach—St. Diermit of Glean-ussen—St. Dagaëus, bishop of Iniscaoin—Corpreus or Carbreus of Coleraine—St. Regnach sister of St. Finnian—St. Lasra.

SECT. I.

ALILD the second, having governed the see of Armagh for ten years, died in the year 536. (1) I have nothing to add concerning him except that his anniversary was kept on the first of July, which was probably the day of his death. He was succeeded by Dubtach or Duach, usually called Dubtach the second, relatively to a former Dubtach predecessor of Alild the first. (2) The second Dubtach is said to have been a descendant of Colla-Huas, an ancient king of Ireland, and from whom was derived a family powerful in part of the territory now called Tyrone, to which family Dubtach, perhaps, belonged. He held the see for twelve years. The loss, which the church sustained in the Southern parts of Ireland by the death of Ailbe, and, it seems not long after, of Declan, (3) was soon repaired by the exertions of some persons distinguished for their sanctity and zeal. St. Senan, whose early history has been already sketched, (4) was among the foremost in this pious work and in setting an example of Christian penance and mortification. After he had left St. Naal's monastery, it is said that he went to foreign parts, and having visited Rome and Tours spent, on his return towards Ireland, some time with St. David of Menevia, (5) with whom he continued very intimate until his death. (6) Senan's first establishment was at Iniscarra, (7) where he erected a church. While he was in that place, a vessel arrived in Cork harbour, bringing fifty religious persons passengers from the Continent, who came to Ireland either for the purpose of leading a life of stricter discipline or of improving themselves in the study of the Scriptures. (8) Senan, with the greatest civility and kindness, retained ten of them with himself, while the others were distributed in various establishments. (9) He was not long at Iniscarra, when Lugadius, prince of that country, insisted on his submitting to certain exactions, which Senan refused to comply with. The dispute was soon settled through the interference of two young noblemen, (10) who were then at the court of Lugadius. Not long after Senan, having left eight of his disciples at Iniscárta, (11) went to Inisluinge, (12) where, having erected a church, he gave the veil to some daughters of Brendan the dynast of Hyfiginte. Thence setting out by water for Inis-mor, he was driven by adverse winds to an island called Inis-tuaiscert. (13) Thinking that it was by a special providence he was driven thither, he erected a church which he left the care of to some of his disciples. He then made his way to Inis-mor, (14) and there founded a monastery, which he governed for some time. We are then told that, having left St. Libern or Liberius, with some others, at Inis-mor, he went to the island of Inis-caorach, (15) where also he is said to have constructed an oratory, over which he placed some of his disciples. After some other transactions (16) we find him at length settled in the island of Inis-cathaig, now Iniscatthy, or, as some call it, Iniscattery in the mouth of the Shannon. We have already seen, (17) that this monastery was not established as early as some writers imagined; yet it existed about the year 540, and before the time, in which Kieran of Clonmacnois is said to have repaired thither to place himself under the direction of Senan. (18) To the erection of this monastery much opposition is said to have been made by a dynast of Hyfiginte, Mactalius, who claimed the island as part of his territory, and, being a pagan, endeavoured, together with his magus, to expel the saint. Through the interposition of the Almighty he got over these difficulties, and formed a religious community highly distinguished for the strictness of its discipline. One of its rules was that females should not be admitted into the island. (19) Senan was a bishop, when he founded this establishment, and probably some time earlier; (20) but when or by whom he was consecrated, we are not informed.

(1) Tr. Th. p. 293. Usher, Ind. Chron. Ware, Bishops. Harris throws in a blundering observation, that some Irish Martyrologists place his death a year earlier; as if their A. D. 535 were not the same as our 536.

(2) See Chap. ix. §. 2. (3) See ib. §. 7. (4) Ib. §. 4.

(5) Whatever we may think of Senan's continental excursions, his visit to St. David must be understood as having taken place before the latter became bishop of Menevia, as his accession to that see was, most probably, not prior to about A. D. 540, at which time Senan was certainly established at Inniscatthy. Just before the account of that visit, &c. (Senan's second life cap. 18) it is said that Senan went directly from Naal's monastery to visit St. Maidoc of Ferns. But St. Maidoc was not as yet born at that time. It may be that in his latter days he was acquainted with Maidoc when young.

(6) The great friendship between David and Senan is mentioned also in the first or Metrical Life, cap. 25; but nothing is said of his having visited David in Britain, or of his having ever left Ireland. And indeed it is probable that he did not. They might have kept up an intimacy and correspondence without having seen each other. Senan is not spoken of in any of David's lives, whereas Brendan, Aidan, and other Irishmen are, as having been personally acquainted with him. What bewitched Harris (Bishops, p. 502) to make Senan a disciple of David? Was it because it is said in the second life (the only authority Harris could have) that Senan, after having completed his studies and travels, paid a visit to him? David was, I am sure, the younger man of the two.

(7) This place is five miles from Cork, near the river Lee, in the barony of Barrets.

(8) In the second life (cap. 20) they are called Romans, that is, natives of a country where the Roman laws were still in force, such as, according to an observation of the Bollandists, "Aquitani Romanis legibus etiam sub Francorum dominatu utentas." The whole passage is worth transcribing; "Dum autem ibi ageret (Senan), appellit ibi navis monachos adhevens peregrinos. In ea namque navi de ferebantur 50 monachi patria Romani, quos vel arctioris vitae vel scripturarum peritiae, tunc in ea multum florentis, desiderium in Hiberniam traxerat, ut ibi vivant sub magisterio quorundam sanctorum patrum, quos vitae sanctitate et monasticae disciplinae rigore intellexerant esse conspicuos."

(9) One of these other establishments is said to have been that of Finnian, in which we find no anachronism; but one occurs in reckoning that of Kieran among them, if, as appears most probable, the Kieran meant was he of Clonmacnois. For, this Kieran had no religious house of his own until after the foundation of Inniscatthy, which was later than that of Inniscarra. There is also another palpable one in reckoning among them that of Barr of Cork.

(10) Their names were Aidus and Lugadius, whose history was written in verse (second life, cap. 22.) by Colman, son of Lenine, who died in the year 601. Aidus was father to Cathald, king of Munster, who died in 625. (AA. SS. p. 149). Hence we may suppose that Senan was at Inniscarra about A. D. 532; whereas Aidus was young at that time.

(11) Neither Ware nor Harris have a monastery at Inniscarra. Yet Archdall refers to them, as if they had.

(12) This was either an island in the Shannon, or a place near that river, along which lies the country anciently called Hyfiginte. In the same second life (cap. 43) is mentioned Inisluaidhe now Inisula, where it appears there was some religious establishment. It is one of the islands of the Shannon between Limerick and Inniscatthy. Archdall, following some foolish authorities, says, (at Inisula) that Senan founded a monastery there before St. Patrick's arrival in Munster. Harris' position, although not so absurd, is equally wrong. He assigns it (Monas. under Clare) to the 5th century. Whether Inisluinge and Inisluaidhe were the same place or not, I will not stop to inquire.

(13) Could this be Inistusker an island off the coast of Kerry, barony of Corcaguinny?

(14) A great number of islands went formerly by the name of Inis-mor or Great island. The one here mentioned is usually supposed to be Inchmore, alias Deer island, in the river Fergus where this river joins the Shannon. (See Dutton, Statis. Survey of Clare, p. 330.) Archdall (at Inchmore under Clare) places it in Loughrea in the Shannon, meaning I suppose, the expanse or lake formed by the junction of this river and the Fergus. Colgan, (AA. SS. p. 539) thought, and I dare say justly, that the Inis-mor, in which Senan founded a monastery, lay further to the West, and near the Atlantic. Ware (Ant. cap. 26 at Roscommon) has a monastery of Inchmore in Lough-ree, the lake between the counties of Roscommon and Longford, and adds that it was founded perhaps by St. Liberius son of Lossenus. I suspect that he confounded the accounts of the two Inismors or Inchmores. For, one of the persons, and apparently the principal, whom Senan left at Inismore (in Clare) is said to have been Liborn or Liberius, who, according to Colgan, was the son of Lawcen or Loscen. Ware has not the Inchmore in Clare, nor has Harris; Archdall has both it and the one in Roscommon, jumbling together the accounts of them in a manner, which is not worth unravelling.

(15) One of the Enniskerry islands off the barony of Ibrickan, co. Clare. Mr. Dutton (Stat. &c. p. 329) says that is now called Mutton-island.

(16) An island or place, called Iniscunla, is mentioned among those, where he is said to have formed establishments. It is probable that some of these religious houses and churches were of later institution, and branches from the great monastery of Iniscatthy.

(17) Chap. ix. §. 4. To what has been there observed we may add, that in Senan's second Life Iniscatthy is represented as uninhabited until he took possession of it. This is a further proof of Usher's having been mistaken in supposing that St. Patrick had spent some time in that island.

(18) See below, §. 11. Not. 175.

(19) This regulation was observed even with regard to the most holy virgins. St. Cannera a nun from Bentraighe, a district near Bantry bay, wished to receive the holy viaticum from the hands of Senan and to be buried in Iniscatthy. Accordingly she set out for that island and, when arrived just close to it, was met by Senan who obstinately refused to allow her to land, and requested of her to go to the house of his mother, who lived not far distant and was related to Cannera. At length, however, on understanding that she was near her end, and that she wished to receive the holy Eucharist, he complied with her desire. As she died very soon after, her wish to be interred in that holy place was also fulfilled. Second Life, cap. 40. The dialogue between them is thus given in the Metrical life ; “ Cui praesul, quid foeminis—commune est cum monachis?—nec te nec ullam aliam—admittemus in insulam—Tunc illa ad episcopum ;—si meum credis spiritum—posse Christum suscipere,—quid me repellis corpore ?—Credo, inquit, hoc optime ; sed nulli unquam foeminae—huc ingressum concedimus—esto, salvet te Dominus—Redi iterum ad seculum—ne sis nobis in scandalum ;—etsi et casta pectore,—habes sexum in corpore.—Spero, ait, in Dominum—quod prius meum spiritum—de hac carne ejiciat—quam reverti faciat—Nec mora reddit spiritum,” &c. Concerning St. Cannera little else is known. Colgan has her Acts at 28 January. She was of a distinguished family of the ancient Carberry (See Smith, History of Co. Cork, Chap. 1.) ; and her mermory was revered in some churches, particularly in that territory.

(20) If it be true that he gave, as above mentioned, the veil to the dynast Brendan's daughters, when at Inisluinge, we must suppose that he was then a bishop.

§. 2. It may, perhaps, be allowed that St. Kieran of Saigir, concerning whom much has been said already, (21) became a bishop about the time we are now treating of, viz. about A. D. 538. His having been at Finnian's school of Clonard can be easily reconciled with his promotion at that period, as he was one of Finnian's first scholars, (22) and might have been above 20 years old when he went to study under him. Kieran, having retired to a lonesome spot, since called Saigir, in the territory of Hele and province of Munster, (23) there led at first the life of a hermit, and after some time erected a monastery, around which a city gradually grew up. (24) Next he established a nunnery in the neighbourhood for his mother Liadania and some pious virgins her companions, (25) whence the church of Killiadhwin has got its name. Besides the care of his monastery, Kieran was assiduously employed in preaching the Gospel in Ossory and elsewhere, and converted a great number of Pagans. (26) He is usually considered as the first bishop of Ossory and founder of that see. (27) It is rather singular that, notwithstanding all that is said in the tracts, called his lives, in praise of Kieran, he is not much spoken of in the accounts of our saints, who were his contemporaries, and that none of our annalists or Hagiologists have marked the year of his death. (28) Hence Colgan was inclined to think that he died in Cornwall, as some English writers have said, and where he was known by the name of Piron. (29) But, according to other accounts, he not only lived but died at Saigir amidst his disciples and the people of his diocese. (30) Although the year of his death is unknown, there can be little doubt of his having been alive after the year 550. (31) His memory has been revered particularly in the diocese of Ossory, on the 5th of March, the anniversary of his death. (32)

(21) Chap. i. §. 14.

(22) In the list of illustrious men mentioned in Finnian's Acts (cap. 19) as having studied under him the two Kierans are placed first. I allow that this may not be considered as a conclusive argument. Nor do I pretend to state as certain that Kieran was a bishop at the time above given. Yet it is more than probable that he was not, prior to it. But, as he is not named in the second class of Irish saints, who flourished after the year 544, we may suppose that he had become distinguished some years earlier.

(23) "In Australi plaga et regione Mumeniae, videlicet in plebe, quae vocatur Hele." (First Life of Kieran, cap. 6) This is the district, called Ely O'Carrol, and now comprized in the King's county.

(24) After the words now quoted we read ; "Et coepit B. Pontifex Kieranus ibi quasi eremita habitare ; quia eremus lata densa sylvis per circuitum erat, et de vila materia cellam suam incepit, et inde monasterium ; et postea civitas crevit Dei dono per gratiam S. Kierani ; quae omnia vocantur uno nomine Sayghir." Archdall (at Seirkeran), after saying that Kieran founded this abbey in 402, adds, that the monastery was founded in succeeding ages. For this nonsense he refers to Ware, who has it not.

(25) Harris, adhering to the stories about Kieran's great antitiquity, assigns this nunnery to the 5th century. Archdall goes further, placing it about the beginning of said century.

(26) First life, cap. 40.

(27) Ware, Bishops, and Ant. cap. 29. The see, says Ware, was afterwards translated to Aghaboe, but when it is not certain. Harris follows Ware. It is doubtful whether Saigir and Aghaboe were not distinct sees ; but of this hereafter.

(28) Ware (Bishops, at Ossory) places his death in 549, confounding him with Kieran of Clonmacnois, who died in that year. Yet elsewhere he supposed that he might have been alive at a much later period. See Not. 124 to Chap. i.

(29) Some English martyrologists, quoted by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 470), have at the 5th of March the commemoration of St. Piran, alias Kieran at Padstow in Cornwall. John Timmuthensis says that he was buried in that country after having spent there the latter part of his life. (See Usher, p. 791.) Camden makes mention (col. 22) of a chapel dedicated in the name of St. Piran, an Irish saint, on the way between Padstow and St. Iies. The Britons, says Colgan, (ib. p. 463) changed the Irish C or K into P, and so for Cieran or Kieran read Piran.

(30) First Life, cap. 40. Second, lect. 12. Colgan observes (p. 470) that Saigir is not expressly mentioned in these passages as the place of his death. The context, however, shows that it was meant by the authors ; whereas they tell us that, a little time before his death, he called together his people, populum suum, and gave them his benediction. Add that in the first Life (cap. 5.) it is said that his honour and resurrection would be at Saigir.

(31) St. Ruadan, who died A. D. 584 (Usher, Ind. Chron.) is spoken of in the first Life (cap. 36) as abbot of Lothra (Lorrah) in Kieran's life time.

(32) To this day Dempster (Hist. Scot. L. x. No. 774) assigns the festival of a St. Kieran, who, he pretends, lived chiefly in the Western isles of Scotland. But the St. Kieran so much respected in that country, and to whom Dempster alluded, was, as will be seen lower down, Kieran of Clonmacnois, and his festival was kept on the 9th of September.

§. 3. St. Diermit, abbot of Inisclothran, (33) was contemporary with Senan, and a particular friend of his. (34) He is said to have been of the illustrious house of the Hy-fiachri of Connaught, (35) and is supposed to have founded his monastery about A. D. 540. (36) He is generally styled only priest and abbot. (37) A book of prayers and litanies in verse is attributed to him, which, unless we suppose it to have been interpolated, must have been composed by an author of a later period. (38) The year of his death is unknown; but the day marked for it is the 10th of January. St. Fedlimid of Kilmore (co. Cavan) is said to have been a brother of his. This saint is called by some bishop of Kilmore; but there does not appear to have been any episcopal see in that place until the 15th century. (39) Nor have we any certain account of even a monastery having been erected at Kilmore by St. Fedlimid or any other person. (40) St. Fedlimid was perhaps no more than parish priest, or perhaps had there led a recluse life. Ware imagined that he might have been the same as a Fedlimid bishop of Clogher or Clones, whom he places third in succession after St. Tigernach. This is a mere conjecture, (41) for which he could not adduce any argument; and why should that prelate of Clones, who was also buried there, have been called Fedlimid of Kilmore? Among the many persons of that name it is easy to find room for one Fedlimid bishop at Clones, and for another, perhaps only a priest, at Kilmore. Concerning this saint I can find no further account than that he died on the 9th of August, but in what year we are not informed. (119) To this period, viz. about A. D. 540, (42) we may assign the monastery of the holy bishop Illandus at Rathlibhthen, (43) in which St. Aidus, son of Brée, of whom hereafter, had been educated. Illandus is said to have been a descendant, in the fourth generation, of the monarch Leogaire. His memory was revered on the 10th of June. (44) It may also be admitted that St. Rioch of Inisbofinde, who, as we have seen, (45) could not have been a disciple of St.

Patrick, or brother to St. Mel of Ardagh, (46) had by this time formed his establishment. For although St. Aidus, above mentioned, was himself an abbot, when he visited St. Rioch in his monastery, yet there is no anachronism in supposing that it might have existed in or about 540. St. Rioch, although usually styled abbot, was also a bishop. His monastery continued for several centuries. The year of his death is not recorded; but it seems the day of it was the first of August. (47)

(33) In Lough-ree, county of Longford. Colgan has at 10th January the best account he could find of St. Diermit.

(34) See Senan's metrical life, cap. 23.

(35) One of the districts, called Hy-fiachra, was the present barony of Tiereragh, Sligo.

(36) Colgan says that Diermit flourished about that year. Ware places (Ant. cap. 26 at Longford) the foundation of Inisclothran in the first times of the Irish church. Harris assigns it to the 5th century. But according to what Colgan has collected concerning this saint, it must have been much later; for he is said to have been descended in the seventh generation from Dathias, king of Ireland, who was killed about the year 427. This and some other circumstances, would lead us to believe, that Diermit flourished later than even 540. But his being said to be contemporary with Senan, and with Kieran of Clonmacnois, has induced me to treat of him in this place.

(37) Marian Gorman has given him the title of bishop.

(38) Colgan had a copy of that tract. Among other saints Adamnan, who lived until the eighth century, is mentioned in it.

(39) Ware (Bishops at Kilmore) says, that the bishops of the diocese, known by this name, were called bishops of Breffny (the name of the territory) or of Triburna, an obscure village where they resided, until in the year 1454 Andrew Mc. Brady, bishop of Triburna erected, with the consent of Pope Nicholas V. the parish church of St. Fedlimid at Kilmore into a cathedral. He adds, that there seems not to have been any episcopal see in that district until a late period, and that the first bishop he had met with there was Flan O'Conacty, called the bishop of Breffny, who died in 1231.

(40) Neither Ware, Harris, nor De Burgo have any old monastery at Kilmore (Cavan). St. Columba founded one at a place called Kilmore deathreib which Colgan (AA. SS. Ind. Topogr.) distinguishes from the episcopal town of Kilmore. Yet in the Trias Th. (p. 381.) he speaks of them as one and the same place, but corrects himself (ib. p. 494.) by telling us that Kilmore deathreib was in Connaught, and consequently different from the Kilmore of Cavan. Archdall, following Colgan where he was wrong, confounds (at Kilmore, Cavan) both places together.

(41) Harris (Bishops at Kilmore) has strangely misrepresented Ware's text. Instead of Fedlimid bishop of Clones, Harris makes him say, Diermit or Dermod (viz. of Inisclothran) bishop, &c. And yet (at Clogher) Harris himself, following Ware, has not Dermod but Fedlimid bishop at Clones.

(42) See Usher, Ind. Chron.

(43) This place was in the part of the ancient Meath, called Fearcall, and now comprizing the baronies of Ballycowen and Ballyboy in the King's county.

(44) (AA. SS. p. 422.

(45) Chap. VIII. §. 13.)

(46) So far from having been a brother of Mel and a Briton I find him called Mac-Hualaing, son of Hualaing, or of the family of Laing. (Rioch's Acts at 6 Mart.)

(47) This is the day on which his name appears in the Irish Calendars. In consequence of the story of his having been a brother of St. Mel, he is placed at the 6th of February in the martyrology of Salisbury; and hence Colgan has him at that day.

§. IV. We are now near the time, which until the first class of saints in Ireland, partly foreigners, partly natives, is stated to have continued. (48) This class is brought down to the latter years of Tuathal's reign, and accordingly to above A. D. 542. (49) From St. Patrick's arrival in 432 until this period it comprehended 350 holy bishops, (50) who were all either Romans, Franks, Britons, or Scots. (51) They observed one and the same discipline, viz. that introduced by St. Patrick, (52) one mass, and one celebration, that is, one uniform liturgy, (53) one tonsure, and one Easter or paschal cycle. (54) They did not reject the attendance and society of women; because, being founded upon the rock Christ, they did not fear the wind of temptation. (55) This class, which is represented as the holiest of all, was succeeded by another, which began in the latter end of the reign of Tuathal and continued until the close of that of Aidus son of Ainmereich, or Ainmireus, viz. until A.D. 598, or 599. (56) It consisted of 300 saints, few of whom were bishops, the greatest part having been priests. (57) Their paschal computation and tonsure were the same as those of the former class; but they admitted a diversity of Masses, or liturgies, and of monastic regulations. (58) They received a Mass from the Britons, David, Gildas, and Docus or Cadoc. (59) In the times of this class a rule was established, that women should not be allowed to serve in monasteries. (60) To it belonged, besides many others, two Finnians, two Brendans, Iarlath of Tuam, Comgall, Coemgen, Cieran (or Kieran) Columba, Cainech, Eogan mac Laisre, Lugeus, Ludeus, Moditeus, Cormac, Colman, Nessian, Laisrean, Berrindeus, Coeman, Ceman, Conan, Endeus, Aedeus, and Byrchin. It now becomes requisite to give some account of these distinguished persons, following, as nearly as we can, the order of the time, (61) without, however, forgetting others their contemporaries, or omitting to record such remarkable occurrences as took place in their times.

(48) This catalogue of the Irish saints, divided into three classes, and distinguished according to the order of time, has been published by Usher, (p. 913, seqq.) and is a very interesting document, throwing great light on our ancient ecclesiastical history. Even Ledwich admits (Antiq. p. 415) that it is extremely valuable. And yet he says (ib.) that the author lived about the 12th century. Why so? Because St. Patrick is mentioned in it. This is criticism! If this catalogue were written so late, would it end at the year of the great plague, A. D. 665? The fact is that it bears every mark of high antiquity, and was most probably drawn up some time before the disputes about the Paschal cycle and the tonsure had totally subsided, which was not until about the year 716. In the account of the third class mention is made of the various observances with regard to these matters; but we find no allusion to the time when uniformity became prevalent. The mighty Doctor adds; "It is to be lamented, that Usher did not take more pains in illustrating it." What an impudent observation! Usher dedicated full 57 pages (not including the Addenda, &c.) to the illustration of it, which he has executed in a superior manner far beyond the Doctor's comprehension. He has not, indeed, misrepresented the author's meaning, or given us a farrago of lying polemics, as the Doctor has done in four or five dull pages concerning it. This catalogue may also be seen in Fleming's Collectanea Sacra, or the Works and Acts of St. Columbanus of Luxeu, besides other tracts. It is in the Dissertatio de Monastica St. Columbani professione, Articul. 3. p. 430. seqq. and was taken from a very ancient Life of St. Patrick. Fleming says, that part of it was likewise in an old Life of St. Finnian. His edition differs in some immaterial points from Usher's, which is evidently more correct.

(49) Ledwich (ib.) reckons down to the year 534; but that was not one of the last, but the very first year of Tuathal's reign. The poor Doctor can never count right.

(50) See Not. 30 to Chap. VII. If the number be correct, it must be accounted for on the principle of including the chorepiscopi under the name of bishops, and on the practice of granting episcopal consecration to the superiors of religious houses. On this subject more elsewhere.

(51) As the author of the catalogue lived at a time, when the Franks were Christians and completely settled in Gaul, he gave that name to the Gallic missionaries, who accompanied St. Patrick to Ireland. The Irish were still called Scots, when he wrote. What then becomes of Ledwich's 12th century? Under Romans he included, I dare say, besides St. Patrick himself Chap. III. §. 17.) the companions of Palladius, who remained in Ireland.

(52) "Unum ducem Patricium habebant." The meaning of these words is, as appears from what follows, that there was no variety of monastic or religious regulations during the period assigned to the first class, whereas divers rules, &c. were introduced in the times of the second and third classes. Ledvich remarks, that the author was not devoted to Rome because, while he speaks of Christ as the head and St. Patrick as the leader, he does not mention the Pope. What a mighty theologian! The author had no occasion to mention the Pope, as his object was merely to touch upon the discipline observed by the Irish church, which was then no other than that established by St. Patrick. There was no question concerning the state and nature of the universal church, or the rights, and privileges of particular sees. Suppose a Protestant author were to write; "The clergy of London acknowledge one head Christ and the bishop as their leader;" would it follow that he did not allow the King's supremacy, or the canonical subordination of the bishop of London to the archbishop of Canterbury? One would imagine that our great Doctor would, to vex the Pope, have kept a fast hold of St. Patrick's leadership. But he was determined, at all hazards, on not allowing St. Patrick even a corner in this world, and accordingly asks (p. 406); "If St. Patrick had lived at the time it is pretended, and if he founded monasteries, would not the monks of St. Patrick have been mentioned, and would not his rule have been universal throughout Ireland?" That St. Patrick drew up a monastic rule is asserted by Ware (Opusc. St. Patr. p. 117) and others. (See Chap. VII. §. 15.) Supposing even that he did not, it is, however, certain that there were monks in Ireland, viz. such as those of Lerins and Tours, in his time. (See his Confession and Canons passim). Now these monks, and their successors down to the end of the first class of saints, observed the discipline laid down by St. Patrick, and thus his rule was, for at least 100 years, universal throughout Ireland, and so one of the Doctor's queries is answered. As to the other about the name of Monks of St. Patrick, it is one which any man of middling ecclesiastical reading would be ashamed to propose. The more ancient monks had no distinct appellations derived from the authors of monastic rules or from their superiors. Sometimes, indeed, they were distinguished by the names of the places where they lived, such as Nitria, Lerins, &c. Even the Benedictines did not assume this name until long after the death of St. Benedict. While he lived, they were merely monachi, or, at most, monachi Cassinates. Marsham has (propyl. ad Monastic Anglican.) well observed; “Schisma monachatus fuit origo Ordinum. Succrescentibus novorum monachorum sectis, qui Benedictinae regulae tenaciores fuerunt, distinctionis gratia, Benedictini nuncapara, coeperunt. Antea enim quum non erant a quibus distinguerentur, non erat opus discretivi nominis; simplex monachi sufficebat vocabulum.”

(53) What this liturgy was, will be inquired into elsewhere. The author's meaning is as clear as day-light. He tells us, that, whereas a diversity of liturgies, &c. was introduced after the times of the first class of saints, no such diversity existed during the period that it lasted. Out of this plain statement the mountebank polemic Ledwich squeezes out (p. 417) this nonsenical conclusion; “Our orthodox author saw and lamented the corruptions of popery in her numberless masses for saints, the dead and the like,” &c. Does this stupid quibbler mean to say, that the one mass and one celebration are to be so understood as if divine service had been celebrated only once during the whole time of the first class of saints? If this be not his meaning, he has uttered downright nonsense. What has the celebration of mass, or, in other words, of the public service of the church, on various occasions, such as the festivals of saints, to do with the nature of the liturgy? The mass and the substance of the liturgy are still the same, whatsoever be the day or occasion, on which it is celebrated. The Latin mass, strictly speaking, is the same every day; and so is the Doctor's favourite Greek mass. So are the Syriac, Slavonic masses, &c. And in the church of England service is not the essential part of the liturgy the same on holidays as on Sundays? Perhaps the Doctor disapproves of the practice of his church with regard to the observance of holidays. His manner of treating these subjects is very different from that of Usher, Stillingfleet, and Bingham, who well knew what is meant by a variety of masses or liturgies, which the author of the catalogue alluded to. Usher says of him (p. 916); “Et Missae quidem sive publicae liturgiae unum et eundem ritum initio a Patrio huc introductum, et a discipulis illius ipsius observatum ille notat.” And with regard to the variety afterwards introduced he adds (p. 917); “in quo (secundo ordine) ut et in tertio diversas Missas, sive dissimiles Liturgias formulas, in Hibernia receptas fuisse idem indicat." Here we see the man of learning, without ranting against popery. But where are such men to be found in our days? We have Ledwiches enough but no Usher. The unfortunate Doctor has, by his stumbling on this subject, overturned the fabric which he was striving to raise. One of the chief objects of his book is to shew, that the Irish had no connection with Rome, and that they detested the Romish corruptions, for more than ten centuries (See p. 360.) He meant to say, I suppose, until later than the tenth century of the Christian era; for were the ten centuries to be reckoned from the time at which they first became Christians, the detestation of Rome would have continued to a late period indeed. According to his explanation of our author's text every thing was right and free from Romish corruptions, as long as there was but one Mass; consequently the corruptions crept in together with the variety of Masses. Thus then they began as early as about the year 542, when the second class of saints made its appearance; for this class celebrated not one, but divers Masses. Hence it follows that the Finnians, Kierans, Columbkil, &c. were, as the Doctor must allow, staunch Romanists, and that the detestation of Popery ceased about 500 years sooner than he would elsewhere fain make us believe. It is a true saying that liars ought to have good memories.

(54) The paschal and tonsural questions will be treated of hereafter.

(55) "Mulierum administrationem et consortia non respuebant; quia super petram Christum fundati, ventum tentationis non timebant." Nothing can be plainer than the meaning of this passage. Those holy bishops did not scruple to be attended occasionally by females, or even to employ them as servants; nor did they refuse to converse with or sit in the company of women in the same manner as our Saviour had done. Ware says (Opusc. S. Patr. p. 124.) that the author was wrong in this assertion; because, as Jocelin relates, St. Patrick had decreed, that religious persons of different sexes should not be allowed to live together in one house; which was certainly ordered, as to monks and nuns, in the 9th canon of the Synod of Patrick, Auxilius, &c. as also that they should not drive in one curricule, nor hold frequent conversations with each other. Yet there is no contradiction between this canon and the words above quoted. The author of the catalogue was speaking of bishops, persons of a mature age and long habituated in the rules of exemplary conduct. The regulations relative to monks and nuns, many of whom were young and merely in a state of training unto a virtuous life, do not apply to bishops, who, by their very station, are obliged to mix with the world, and consequently to converse often with females. The situation of monks and nuns, on the contrary, requires a great degree of seclusion from the world, and there is seldom any necessity for such religious persons of both sexes to hold conversations together; but when any just cause might occur for such conversations, St. Patrick did not prohibit them, whereas the canon refers to frequent ones, held assiduc. Ledwich comes forward, (p. 418) with an explanation of that passage, which is so ridiculous, that it is strange how it could have come into any man's head. He says the meaning of it is that those bishops were married and not subject to temptation. Another opportunity will occur for demonstrating that our bishops were not married in those days; but let us now examine a little this shameful perversion of the text. It states that the bishops did not shun the society of women because, being founded on Christ, they did not fear the blasts of temptation. Surely any one of common sense would conclude from these words that they were not married, and that, notwithstanding, they were not afraid to converse with women, or to be attended by them, owing to the strength of their virtue. According to the Doctor's interpretation the passage would run thus; "They did not shun the company of women, because, being founded on the rock Christ, that is, married, they did not fear, &c. Thus then our Saviour, the rock, is transformed in matrimony. Or the Doctor meant to say, that they got themselves married, because they did not fear the wind of temptation!!! How would Sancho have startled, had he heard his master assign such a reason for entering into the married state? But our Doctor's flights exceed those of Don Quixote. We all know that very many persons marry because they are in dread of temptation; and I believe that this is the motive, which induces the far greater part of good Christians, according to the advice of St. Paul (1 Cor. VII. 9.), to embrace that state. It was reserved for Ledwich to let the world know, that in old times even bishops used to take wives to themselves, because they did not fear the wind of temptation. Apage!

(56) See below Not. 62 to Chap. XII.

(57) Ledwich (p. 419) distorts this plain statement into a fiction of his making, viz. that bishops were less honoured than abbots.

(58) As religious houses were multiplied, and the members of them became more numerous, some new regulations were added to the primitive simple system of rules. These additional statutes varied according to the discretion of the founders or superiors of the establishments, or as particular circumstances required, whereas every religious community, with few exceptions, was governed within itself; which system continued in Ireland later than in many other countries. While the rule of St. Basil was generally adopted by the Greek monks, and that of St. Benedict was received in the greatest part of the Western church, the founders of our monasteries were at liberty to make peculiar regulations, without confining themselves to any rule already established by others. Yet on the whole they adhered to the original plan introduced by St. Patrick, according to which the religious houses in Ireland were both monasteries and colleges, in which the sciences, particularly theological, were taught, and young men educated for the active service of the church, and in this respect the monastic system of Ireland differed from that of Egypt, and from the Benedictine institution as originally formed and formerly observed.

(59) Having treated at large of these three eminent men, I will now merely observe that from this passage it is clear that they were contemporaries with the second class of Irish saints, and with each other. Thus then St. David must have lived for several years later than 544, otherwise he would have been dead about the very time that this class was beginning to appear. Gildas, or, as our author calls him, Gilla must have been in high repute with the saints of that class, and looked up to by them as a senior, and experienced teacher. How can this be understood in the system of Usher, who makes him (p. 953) his Gildas Badonicus? For, this pretended Badonicus, who, he says, was born in 520, would have been a stripling, compared with the Finnians and some others of that class. The Gildas, so much respected by those saints, must have been he who had taught at Armagh, and whom Usher calls Albanus. But Albanus, according to him, had died in 512. The only way to get rid of these difficulties is to admit that there was but one Gildas, as, I think, has been sufficiently proved already. As to Docus, whom Usher passes over very slightly, who could he have been except Cadoc of Lancarvan, the contemporary and intimate friend of Gildas? (See Not. 176 to Chap. ix.)

When it is said that our saints received a mass, or liturgy, from St. David, &c. this must be understood only of some of them, whereas it is known that others followed that, which had been introduced by St. Patrick, for instance Comgall of Bangor. (See Usher, p. 917.) Cressey has mistranslated (B. xi. ch. 19) the passage, and makes the author say that those saints received the rite of celebrating Mass from David, &c. as if the Irish had no Mass before. Was this a wilful mistranslation?

(60) “Abnegabant mulierum administrationem, separantes eas a monasteriis.” This regulation was considered adviseable and necessary, after the monasteries or colleges became crowded with young students. We have seen that St. Senan, who lived in the times of the second class, had introduced it into his establishment of Iniscatthy. It was enforced also in those of St. Carthag at Lismore, St. Molua, St. Fechin, and others. (See Usher, p. 943. seqq.) until at length it became a general rule, which is observed to this very day in all the monasteries and convents of men, episcopal seminaries, and very many colleges in the Continent. Some of the superiors of our Irish communities would not allow women to enter even the churches or chapels belonging to them. This was not doing them any injury, whereas such churches or chapels were originally intended for the use of the monks alone, while the laity of both sexes had the parish churches to resort to. The mighty Ledwich sneers (p. 420) at the practice of excluding females from the monasteries. How would he like to see boarding schools composed indiscriminately of grown up boys and girls? He says that the separation of the sexes took place in consequence of “matrimony being interdicted the clergy.” Thus he allows that ecclesiastical celibacy was enjoined as early as the period of the second class of saints. He tells us that a manly religion does not want these sorts of regulations. Manly religion is a favourite phrase of his, and matrimony a subject which he recurs to with delight. I hope he does not consider matrimony as the quintessence of Christianity, and that he does not hold the future joys, to which he may aspire, in the same light as those of the Mahometan paradise.

(61) The author, in arranging the names of these saints, seems to have had in view, at least partly, the order of seniority. Yet there appear some exceptions to this rule. Nesson, ex. c. is named after others, than whom he was older. Endeus, if however he was Enda of Arran, should have been placed in the foremost part of the list, if seniority was the only rule, which the author intended to follow.

§. v. Before we enter into this detail, it will not be amiss to observe that Tuathal, towards the end of whose reign the second class of saints began, was killed in the year 544 by Moelmor, who was soon after put to death by Tuathal's friends. (62) He was succeeded in the monarchy by Diermit (the first) son of Cervail or Kerrbheoil, and a prince of the royal house of Neill Neigilliach. The reign of Diermit lasted until the year 565. (63) To come to the saints of the second class the first mentioned are two Finnians, the more distinguished of whom was the great teacher at Clonard. The history of this illustrious man has been already (64) brought down to the time, that he formed his establishment in that place, which was probably about A. D. 530. His reputation was so great for learning and sanctity, (65) that crowds of students and distinguished persons flocked to his school and monastery, among whom are mentioned (66) the two Kierans, Columkill, Colum of Tirdaglas, &c. Yet there is, I dare say, some exaggeration in what is said of his having had, in the course of his teaching, three thousand scholars. (67) Several writers speak of him as not only abbot but bishop of Clonard; (68) yet it is rather odd that, neither in his Acts nor in the Irish Calendars, is he called a bishop. We find him thus designated in one or two lives of other saints; (69) and Senachus, his successor in the government of the house of Clonard, was certainly one. (70) That Clonard was an ancient episcopal see, cannot be called in question; (71) but I confess I entertain a doubt whether Finnian or Senachus was its first bishop. Be this as it may, Finnian was distinguished not only for his extraordinary learning and knowledge of the holy scriptures, but likewise for his great sanctity and austere mode of living. His usual food was bread and herbs ; his drink water. On festival days he used to indulge himself with a little fish and a cup of beer or whey. He slept on the bare ground, and a stone served him as a pillow. (72) He was attended in his last illness by St. Columb son of Crimthan, (73) or, as otherwise known, St. Columb of Tirdaglas, and died at Clonard in the year 552, on, as some accounts state, the 12th of December. (74)

(62) Ware, Antiq. cap. 4. O'Flaherty agrees with Ware and Usher as to A. D. 544, being the year of Tuathal's death, although he supposed his reign to have lasted 11 years. (See Not. 192 to Chap. ix.) Colgan says (Tr. Th. p. 447.) that Tuathal was killed in the 11th year of his reign, which, following the 4 Masters, he makes the same as A. D. 538 (539). There can be little doubt that O'Flaherty's calculation is more correct.

(63) Ware, loc. cit. and Usher Ind. Chron.

(64) Chap. ix. §. 8.

(65) He was called Finnian the Wise ; and one of the writers of his Life, quoted by Usher, (p. 1046) says that he was chief among the saints of the second class, alluding to his name appearing at the head of the list.

(66) Finnian's Acts at 23 Feb. cap. 19. See also Usher, p. 909. Among the persons mentioned here and there as having attended Finnian's lectures, we find some, ex. c. Brendan of Clonfert, who, if it be true that they did so, must have been rather advanced in life at that time.

(67) In the Lauds for Finnian's office we read ; " Trium viro- rum millium—Sorte fit doctor humilis." This passage is not to be understood as if he had all that number of scholars at one time, but of the whole of those, whom he taught at Clonard from his commencement there until the time of his death.

(68) Ware (Bishops at Meath) calls Finnian the first bishop of Clonard. Harris adds that he was promoted in the year 520. For this date he had no authority, except Usher's assigning to that year Finnian's return to Ireland. But Usher does not bring him to Clonard until 544. It is true that Usher was wrong in this date, (See Not. 132 to Chap. ix.) but Harris had no right to place Finnian bishop at Clonard until he was settled there; which, although not so late as 544, was certainly later than 520. Ledwich (Antiq. p. 401) refers to Harris for this date of the see of Clonard, and throws out of his own what Harris has not, viz. that Clonard was the oldest see in Meath. On the contrary Harris (Bishops at Meath) and Ware (Antiq. cap. 29.) makes express mention of older sees in that country, such as that of Secundinus at Dunshaughlin, Kenan at Duleek, and Erc at Slane, of which we have treated already.

(69) On this point Adamnan would be an unexceptionable witness, if the holy bishop Findbarr, Finnio, or Vinnian, with whom he tells us more than once that St. Columba had spent some time, were the same as Finnian of Clonard. But there is every reason to think, that he was Finnian of Maghbile, whom we find called by other writers Findbarr or Finnbarr, that is, White-haired; which name, as far as I can discover, does not occur where Finnian of Clonard is undoubtedly spoken of. There is indeed an affinity between the names, and a person of the name of Findbarr might be called Finnian or Finnio, that is, whitish or fair, as Adamnan himself has shown; but it does not follow, that every Finnian could be called Findbarr, whereas a person might be of a fair complexion without having white hair. It is certain that Columba studied under Finnian of Maghbile, although he might have been also at the school of Clonard. In the life of St. Columb of Tirdaglass quoted by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 404) Finnian of Clonard is expressly called bishop. He seems to be also the bishop Finnian mentioned in the life of St. Colmanel or Colman, son of Beogni. (Ib. p. 405.)

(70) Hence, as likewise from some successors of Senachus at Clonard, having been bishops, Colgan argues (AA. SS. p. 402.), that Finnian had been one also. This, however, is not a necessary consequent; and it deserves to be remarked that in the list of the superiors of that establishment given by the 4 Masters (ib. p. 406.) Finnian, who appears first, is styled simply abbot, whereas Senachus, who is placed next after him, is marked as bishop, and then some abbots, after whom again some named bishops.

(71) As Clonard was an episcopal see since, at least, the times of Senachus, who died in the year 588, and as the prelates of that place were, at a later period, sometimes called the Comarbans or successors of Finnian, it became natural to suppose, that he had been bishop there. Thus we may account for his being called by that title in some tracts written long after his death. And hence perhaps the mention of his episcopal dignity in the prayer for his Office, although there is not the least allusion to it in the lessons. The prayer, as it now appears, is certainly a later composition than the other part of that Office.

(72) Finnian's Acts, cap. 31.

(73) Ib. cap. 20.

(74) The Annals of Innisfallen have; "A. 551 (552) Quies Finin Cluainard." They are followed by Usher and Ware, and their authority is, I believe, (See below, Not. 236.) preferable to that of the 4 Masters, who place his death in 548 (549) on no better authority, I suspect, than the supposition that he was swept away by the plague, that raged in that year. (See AA. SS. p. 150.) In the Acts of St. Columb of Tirdaglas, quoted by Colgan (ib. p. 404) we read that Finnian, finding his end approaching, sent for him; but no allusion is made to any plague or great mortality. Archdall thought fit (at Clonard) to follow the 4 Masters. Colgan pretends (ib. p. 406.) that Finnian must have been alive in 563, the year in which Columbkil left Ireland; because Adamnan relates (Vit. S. Col. L. 3. c. 2. Messingham's ed. or c. 4. Colgan's ed.) that just before his departure for Britain he paid a visit to his old master the bishop Finnio. For the same purpose Colgan refers also to some silly stories concerning the cause of Columbkil's quitting Ireland and his applying for penance to bishop Finnio; which stories Usher has given (p. 902 seqq.), and Harris copied in part (Bishops, p. 136). It is odd that Usher did not animadvert on those fables, particularly as he thought (p. 954) that said bishop Finnio was Finnian of Clonard. As to said fables, we will see elsewhere. Meanwhile I allow that bishop Finnio, mentioned by Adamnan, was alive in 563, a circumstance which Usher must have overlooked when he lays down as the same with our Finnian, whose death he assigns to 552. The fact is that the bishop Finnio of Adamnan was Finnian of Maghbile, as Colgan himself states elsewhere (Tr. Th. p. 372 and AA. SS. p. 644.). The memory of Finnian of Clonard was celebrated on, at least, three days in the year, one of which was the 23d of February. On this account Colgan has given one of his lives at this day, having intended to publish another at December 12, which, he says, seems to have been his Natalis or day of his death. (See AA. SS. p. 402. and compare with Not. 237, to this chapter.)

§. VI. The second Finnian was the bishop and abbot of Maghbile (Moville) in the now county of Down. (75) This saint, who is often called Findbarr, was son of Corpreus of the princely house of the Dalfiatach; and his mother's name was Lassara. (76) They were undoubtedly Christians; for Finnian was, as we have seen, (77) when very young, placed under the care of St. Colman of Dromore, by whom he was afterwards recommended to the abbot Caylan. This holy man directed him to the great school of Nennis in Britain, (78) concerning which we have treated already. (79) From Finnian's having been a pupil of Colman it may be safely deduced that he was born about the beginning of the sixth century. Having spent some time at Nennio's school, it is said that for his further improvement he went to Rome, where, he studied for seven years and was raised to the priesthood. (80) At what precise time he formed his establishment at Maghbile I do not find recorded; but most probably it was not later than the year 540, whereas Columbkil was young at the time of his studying there under Finnian. (81) On what occasion or when he was raised to the episcopal rank we are not informed; yet no doubt can be entertained of his having been a bishop. (82) He was not, however, the same as St. Frigidianus, bishop of Lucca in Italy, as some writers have imagined. (83) Not to enlarge upon what is said of St. Frigidian's parents having been pagans, and his stealing away from them, which by no means accords with what we know concerning the early years of Finnian, it is sufficient to observe that Frigidian, after an episcopacy of 28 years, died at Lucca, where his remains were discovered in the reign of Charlemagne (84); whereas it is certain that Finnian was buried at Maghbile, where his tomb used to be resorted to as distinguished by miracles. (85) Add that the Natalis of Frigidian, or the day of his death, was constantly marked the 18th of March, while that of Finnian was the 10th of September. (86) The confusion now alluded to has given rise to useless questions concerning the year of Finnian's death; (87) which, according to very respectable authority, occurred in the year 576. (88) I pass over some very uncertain anecdotes relative to proceedings of his, (89) and shall only conclude his history with observing, that his memory was highly revered in the territory properly called Ullagh or Ulidia, and that he was considered the peculiar patron saint of the people of that country. (90)

(75) Besides Maghbile in Down another place of the same name in Donegal is spoken of, where it is said, there was also a monastery. On this obscure and confused subject I have nothing to add to what has been said already. (Not. 17 to Chap. vi.)

(76) AA. SS. p. 649. (77) Chap. ix. §. 1.

(78) See Not. 189 to Chap. viii.

(79) Not. 17 to Chap. ix. (80) Usher p. 954.

(81) It is an undoubted fact that Columbkil studied in the monastery of Maghbile. According to his Life by O'Donnel (L. 1. c. 39) this was the first high school, to which he repaired after his boyhood. In the account of the miracle of water changed into wine for the service of the altar, the officiating bishop, whom Adamnan (L. 2. c. 1) calls Findbarr, is in this Life (loc. cit.) said to have been Finnian of Maghbile. Keating also (B. 2.) speaks of him as the master of Columbkil when young, and tells us that it was at his school that the latter got this name instead of his original one Crimthan.

(82) Besides the testimony of Adamnan (See Not. 69.) we have the authority of various Irish hagiologists (AA. SS. p. 643), who call him bishop of Maghbile. And in the Life of St. Comgall of Bangor he is thus spoken of; "Vir vita venerabilis, S.

Findbarrus episcopus, qui jacet in multis miraculis in suæ civitate Maghbile."

(83) Colgan undertook to support this hypothesis at March 18, where he has two so called lives of St. Frigidian or Fridian, bishop of Lucca. These lives were patched up, as Colgan admits, at a very late period, and are much like each other. Some circumstances are mentioned, which seem to show that the authors had confounded Frigidian with Finnian; ex. c. his having been at the school of Candida (Candida casa) in Britain, on which occasion they relate a story of his master Mugentius having, through envy, made an attempt to take away his life. They mention also his having been at Maghbile. In the second life the analogy is carried still further; for it is there stated that Fridian's first name was Findbarr. Hence it appears probable, that the traditions concerning Fridian and Finnian were jumbled together as if they had been relative to one person. It may perhaps be allowed that St. Fridian or Frigidian of Lucca, who was certainly a native of Ireland, had been educated at Maghbile under Finnian. The time, in which he lived, and his having been an Ulster man, agree very well, as will be seen elsewhere, with this supposition.

(84) See the Office for St. Frigidian, 18 Mart.

(85) See Not. 82 and AA. SS. p. 643. (86) AA. SS. ibid.

(87) Colgan endeavoured to show that St. Frigidian, whom he confounded with Finnian, died about A. D. 595. His conjectures are founded, in great part, on this confusion. But as they were distinct persons, it would be a waste of time to examine Colgan's calculations, some of which are quite wrong and others very doubtful. Archdall not only followed them (at Moville in Down), but amidst other trash has stated in a positive manner, that Finnian was buried at Lucca in 595. Ughalli (Italia Sacr. ad Ep. Luccases) places the death of St. Frigidian in 588.

(88) The Annals of Innisfallen have; "A. 576. Quies Finin Maghbile." Perhaps this must be understood of the year 577, whereas under the same date they place the death of Brendan of Clonfert, who died in 577.

(89) One of the most remarkable is a pretended dispute between him and Columbkil concerning the right to a copy of some part of the Scriptures. In O'Donnel's Life of the latter, (L. 2. c. 1.) a great repository of doubtful traditions, this dispute is said to have begun at a place called Droimfionn, where Finnian then happened to be. Colgan says (Tr. Th. p. 451) that the church of Droim-fionn is in the county of Louth and diocese of Armagh. What Colgan calls a Church Archdall has transformed into a monastery, and tells us that Finnian was bishop and abbot there. In several Irish Calendars there is not the least allusion to any such monastery as belonging to Finnian. He is constantly called Finnian of Maghfile, without the addition of any other place. Droimfionn, whoever erected a church there, was perhaps the same as Dromyn in the barony of Ardee, county Louth.

(90) Colgan (AA. SS. p. 646) quotes to this purpose the Sal-tair-na-rann of Aengus Kelideus. We have already seen that Ulidia comprized only some of the Eastern parts of modern Ulster and chiefly of the now county of Down.

§. 7. Next come the two Brendans, one of whom, viz. Brendan, commonly called of Clonfert, was more celebrated than the other. The accounts, which are to be met with here and there concerning this great man are extremely confused. In the first place opinions are different as to the place of his birth. Some writers make him a native of Connaught; (91) but this is a mistake founded on his having erected a monastery at Clonfert, in which he spent the latter part of his life, and whence he got the name, Brendan of Clonfert. According to the more ancient and consistent authorities he was born in Kerry. (92) His father was Finloga, of the distinguished family of Hua Alta. (93) Brendan came into the world in the year 484, (94) and is said to have received the first rudiments of his education under a bishop Ercus, (95) who was, perhaps, the celebrated bishop of Slane, and who, being of a Munster family, (96) might have been connected with that of Brendan. But, as more than one bishop Ercus is spoken of as being in those early times, and particularly in Munster, (97) no decisive opinion can be formed on this subject. How long Brendan remained under the care of that bishop I cannot discover. (98) Next we are told that, when a young man, he studied theology under St. Iarlath of Tuam, who was then old, and infirm. This statement cannot be reconciled with what is known concerning the times, in which Iarlath flourished, and nothing more can be allowed than that these two saints, being contemporaries, used to confer with each other on religious and theological subjects, or that Brendan, although about the same age with Iarlath, had perhaps attended to his lectures for some time. (99) In somewhat like manner must be understood what is said of Brendan's having been at the school of Clonard; (100) whereas it is very probable that he was not younger than Finnian, who taught there. To atone for the death of a person who had been drowned in the sea, and to which Brendan feared he had involuntarily contributed, he is said to have gone, by the advice of St. Ita, (101) to Britain, by which is to be understood not Great Britain, but Brittany. (102) Having paid a visit to Gildas, who was then living in that country, and advanced in years, (103) he went to another part of Brittany and formed a monastery or school at Ailech. (104) It is added, that he erected a church in a place, called Heth, somewhere in the same province. The famous voyages of St. Brendan would, were we to admit one account of them, have taken place after his arrival in Brittany, as if it were thence he set out on his wonderful expedition in search of the land of promise. (105) But, according to the Irish accounts, they were undertaken from a port in Kerry, and had been terminated before he set out for Brittany. (106) Although the narrative of these voyages abounds with fables, (107) yet it may be admitted that Brendan sailed, in company with some other persons, towards the West, in search of some island or country, the existence of which he had heard of. (108) As to the result of the expedition, whether real or not, its duration, and the wonderful adventures said to have occurred, the reader will not expect any inquiry in this place. (109) How long St. Brendan remained in Brittany we are not informed; but it seems that he founded the great monastery of Clonfert (110) not long after his return thence to Ireland. For this monastery and several others connected with it he drew up a particular rule, which was so highly esteemed that it has been supposed to have been dictated by an Angel. (111) He is said to have presided over three thousand monks, partly at Clonfert, and partly in other houses of his institution in various parts of Ireland, (112) all of whom maintained themselves by the labour of their hands. (113) He established a nunnery at Enach-duin, over which he placed his sister Briga. (114). He is said also to have erected a cell in an island in that neighbourhood, called Inis-mac-hua-Cuinn, or Inisquin. (115) According to some writers Brendan was a bishop and the first at Clonfert; but it is more probable that he was not; (116) nor do any of our old writers give him that title, while they usually call him only abbot. (117) At a late period of his life he paid a visit to Columbkil in one of the Western isles off Scotland. (118) There is reason to think that, some years prior to his death, St. Brendan retired from Clonfert to a place of less bustle and care, perhaps to Inisquin. (119) This much is certain that he died in his sister's monastery at Enach-duin on the 16th of May in the year 577, and 94th of his age. (120) From that place his remains were conveyed to Clonfert, and there interred. (121) Besides the Monastic rule, some writings have been attributed to this saint, with an account of which, as they rest on very doubtful authority, (122) I shall not trouble the reader.

(91) Hanmer, Chronicle, &c. p. 107. New Ed. Usher seems to have thought that he was born at Clonfert; for he says (p. 533) that Brendan died there in his own country; “ Clonafartae in patria sua obiit." Yet elsewhere (p. 955), when expressly treating of him, he does not call Clonfert the place of his birth, but merely of his residence, and tells us that he died at Enachduin in Connaught.

(92) A passage of the Tripartite life of St. Patrick (L. 3. c. 47), already referred to, (Chap. vi. §. 8) is decisive on this point. In it we are informed, that St. Patrick being in the South of Ireland, foretold that the great Brendan would be born in West Munster, that is, Kerry. Hence Ware was right (Antiq. cap. 29 at Ardfert and Writers at Brandon) in making him a native of that country. (See also Harris, Bishops at Ardfert.) A very old tradition confirms this statement; and we find that the church of Ardfert was dedicated under his name. Keating (Book 2) calls him Brendan Ardfeartha. A writer of his life, quoted by Harris (Writers ch. 15) says that he was born in Stagnili regione Mimenensium (Mumonansium). Brandon hill has been so called from this saint. (See Smith's History of Kerry, p. 26.)

(93) Tripart. loc. cit. and AA. SS. p. 89.

(94) Usher, Ind. Chron.

(95) Ware having read Ertus for Ercus, was inclined to think that the prelate, who took Brendan under his care, was a bishop of Ardfert, particularly as Brendan was a native of Kerry. Harris imagined that the name Ardfert might have been derived from this bishop Ert, as if signifying the High place of Ert. But the bishop's real name was Erc, Ercus, or Hercus, as we find it more than once in the Acts of Brendan. (See AA. SS. p. 74) Hanmen calls him Hercus.

(96) See Chap. VIII. §. 4. Ercus of Slane occasionally visited his relatives in Munster.

(97) In the Acts of Senan of Inniscatthy a bishop Ercus is mentioned as having been a disciple of his. But a disciple of Senan could not have been a bishop when Brendan was a boy. Colgan has (AA. SS. p. 540) Ercus a bishop at Domnach-mor-muighe Luadhat in Hy-Faolain (the territory of the O'Phelans and part of the Decies in the county of Waterford); and (Tr. Th. p. 544) reckons among the relatives of St. Ercus of Slane a bishop Ercus of the noble house of Corb, which, as appears from other circumstances, resided in the Decies or Nandesi country. In Colgan's Index to AA. SS. Ercus the master of Brendan is distinguished from Ercus of Slane; and yet (p. 309, ib.) he identifies them by making Brendan's master the same as the Ercus, who died A. D. 512 (513), viz. Ercus of Slane. (See Not. 30 to Chap. ix.)

(98) According to a Life of Brendan, quoted by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 74) he was only about six years old when Ercus took him under his care. If this be true, we must suppose that he spent several years with him, as many at least, as were requisite for completing his elementary studies.

(99) Iarlath of Tuam is reckoned, as has been seen, among the saints of the second class, and accordingly began to be distinguished after the year 540. Now, if we were to admit the above mentioned story, it would follow that he was dead by that time. Usher was so led astray by it that he made Iarlath flourish in the year 500 (Ind. Chron.) as indeed must have been the case if Brendan had, in his youth, been a scholar of his. In like manner that story induced Ware to state (Bishops at Tuam), that Iarlath flourished about the beginning of the sixth century. To this Harris added that Iarlath died about A. D. 540; because honest Colgan, in endeavouring to reconcile the story of Iarlath having been old, when Brendan was young, with the fact of his having belonged to the second class of saints, threw out a conjecture that he might have lived until that year. But, if he died so early, how could he have been placed among men, who began to be eminent about and after that very time? Or, if he was old and feeble at the beginning of the sixth century, are we to suppose that he was alive 40 years later? Ware was more correct, (Writers at Iarlath) where he says that he flourished in the year 550, as his Latin original has it; although (owing perhaps to an error of the press) the English translation, which has been followed by Harris, has 540. There is nothing more usual, nor at the same time more perplexing, at least to me, in many of the acts of our saints, than their making them either masters or pupils of certain eminent men in spite of the clearest chronological data.

(100) Acts of Finnian, cap. 19. (See Not. 66.)

(101) This celebrated virgin, of whom more will be seen hereafter, was greatly attached to St. Brendan, and seems to have been a relation of his. Her nunnery of Cluain-credhail, in the West of the county of Limerick, was near the place where Brendan was born. It is said that, when he was a year old, bishop Ercus placed him under her care, and that he was reared by her for five years. If there be any truth in this narrative, it must be understood of some time when St. Ita was still young and before she was old enough to preside over a nunnery. For, if we are to suppose that she was governing it, when Brendan was only a year old, viz. in the year 485, it will follow that she must have been born as far back as, at least, 460; whereas it will be admitted that, as abbess, she could not have been less than 25 years of age. Now, as St. Ita died in 570, it would follow, that she lived to the extraordinary age of 110, for which we have no authority. Accordingly what is said of the infant Brendan having been reared in her nunnery cannot stand; and indeed the whole matter, however explained, is very doubtful, although it is certain that a great intimacy existed between those two saints.

(102) Usher says (p. 532) that Brendan became abbot of Lhancarvan, having succeeded Cadoc. This cannot be reconciled with the history of Cadoc's transactions (See Chap. ix. §. 11.) nor with what Usher himself admits, viz. that Cadoc's successor was Ellenius. (Ind. Chron. ad A. 514.) What he adds about Brendan having baptized St. Machut or Maclovius, who afterwards came bishop of Alectum or Aletha (near St. Malo) in Brittany, is very doubtful. Usher tells us that the child Machut was baptized in the country of Glamorgan and afterwards educated by Brendan. Now Lobineau states (Hist. de Bretagne, Tom. 11. p. 75.) that he was born in Brittany, as appears also from his Life by Sigebert of Gemblours (in Surius at November 15), in which we read that he was born "citra oram Britannici maris," that is, on the French side of the British sea, or of the sea of Brittany, this being the country meant throughout the whole Life, by Britannia. Then we are told that his father was a Count of the name of Guent, who founded the town called Gimicastrum. This was the same as Giemum castrum, alias Giemacum, now Gien, a town on the Loire in the diocese of Auxerre. (See H. Vales. Not. Gall. at Giemum.) If Maclovius was baptized by Brendan (of which, by the bye, there is nothing in the Life now referred to), it must have been, I believe, in that country, and in or near Alectum; whereas, according to Lobineau, he was a native of the very district, of which he was afterwards bishop. That he was a disciple of Brendan is generally admitted. (See Mabillon Sec. Bened. Tom. 1. p. 217.) The Bollandists (at Brendan 16th May) ask, was there perhaps an Armorican Brendan? There is no necessity for searching for such a person; and it is to be observed that, among several other corresponding circumstances, the famous voyages, so much spoken of as performed by our Brendan, are ascribed to the master of St. Maclovius. Cressy (B. xi. ch. 30.) has confounded him with Brendan of Birr.

(103) Gildas retired to Brittany between, as seems most probable, the years 520 and 530, (See Notes 167 and 168 to Chap. ix.) and does not appear to have ever after returned to Great Britain. Brendan's departure from Brittany may be placed between 540 and 550. It was prior to the foundation of the monastery of Clonfert; and Brendan was residing somewhere near the ocean, seemingly in Kerry, when he determined on going to that country. The title of father, by which he is spoken of on that occasion, indicates that he was then far from being young. Gildas also was at that time a senior, although not yet very old. Add that Maclovius, who died, according to Lobineau, in 630, cannot be supposed to have been a pupil of Brendan earlier than not long before 550.

(104) Usher, p. 955. Ailech is evidently the ancient Alectum, of which St. Maclovius became bishop, and which was the episcopal see of that district, until it was removed to the present town of St. Malo. (See Not. 75 to Chap. iv.) Hence it is clear how Maclovius became a pupil of St. Brendan, as above. Not. 102.

(105) In St. Maclovius' life by Sigebert these voyages are placed after he had become a pupil of Brendan; and he is represented as having been one of the party of navigators.

(106) In the Acts of Brendan quoted by Colgan, (AA. SS. p. 74) we are told that Brendan, having returned from that expedition, used to entertain St. Ita with relating to her his adventures, &c. Then lower down an account is given of the circumstances, which induced that saint to advise him to withdraw to a foreign country and spend some time there; and how, in obedience to that advice he went to Brittany. In Brendan's Acts he is said to have set out in quest of the land of promise from the foot of the mountain, now called Brandon-hill, that is, I suppose from Brandon bay. (See Colgan, AA. SS. at 22 Mart.)

(107) Colgan (loc. cit.) admits that some parts of the history of that expedition are fabulous, but observe that it is spoken of in Irish documents of the eighth century.

(108) St. Barrinthus, and Mernoc a disciple of his, are said to have been in that country, and it is added that it was the account given of it by Barrinthus that induced Brendan to undertake his voyage. In that account it is represented as a Western country or island, but yet so large that, although they traversed it for 15 days they could not reach the end of it. The direction of Brendan's voyage is said to have been at first contra solstitium aestivale, by which, I dare say, was meant the North West point, alluding to the setting of the sun in summer. After 15 days sailing the wind ceased, and the navigators, although there was wind now and then, left the vessel to itself without minding or knowing its course. It might certainly have thus arrived in some part of America; and one would be almost inclined to think, that an idea was then entertained of the existence of a great Western tract of country, far distant from Ireland. It is said that Brendan laid in provisions for 50 days, which shows that the voyage was considered a long one.

(109) The voyages are said to have continued for seven years. Colgan (Ind. Chron. ad AA. SS.) places the commencement of them in 545. But if they were ever undertaken, Brendan must have set out some years earlier, whereas they were prior to his going to Brittany. And in his Acts it is related that, when arranging matters for the expedition, he paid a visit to St. Enda in Arran and received his benediction. Enda was, most probably, dead before that year. It is natural to suppose that Brendan was, at the time of undertaking such a perilous task, in the vigour of his age, and not yet sixty years old, as he was in the year 545.

(110) Clonfert or Cluainfearta signifies the valley of miracles. Ware (Bishops and Antiq. cap. 26.) assigns the foundation of this monastery to A. D. 558. The 4 Masters place it in 553 (554.) The Annals of Innisfallen have A. 562.

(111) Colgan writes (AA. SS. p. 192); "Erat hic celebratissimae sanctitatis vir tam in hoc monasterio, quam in aliis plurimis sibi subjectis, trium millium monachorum pater, et Regulæ monasticæ ab Angelo dictatæ conditor, ut habent Acta et de numero monachorum testantur Petrus de Natalibus," &c. St. Brendan's rule was observed for many centuries by his successors, according to what we read in his Life; "Illa usque hodie manet apud successores S. Brendani." The law or rule of Kieran and Brendan is mentioned more than once in the Ulster Annals, for this reason, it seems, as Nicholson remarks (Irish Histor. Library, ch. 3.) that a copy of both their rules was contained in one volume. Concerning the nature of those Irish rules see above Not. 58.

(112) See Not. prec. Usher, p. 910. Ware, Ant. cap. 26. &c.

(113) Ware, loc. cit.

(114) Ware, loc. cit. Enach-duin, since called Enaghduine, was in the district of Huabrain. (Usher, p. 955.) It is now called Annadown, and is situated near Lough Corrib in the county of Galway. In course of time it became a bishop's see but is now united to Tuam. (Usher ib. and Harris, Bishops at Tuam.) In opposition to a fact so well known Archdall says it was united to Clonfert.

(115) This island is in Lough Corrib, and was famous in the seventh century on account of its monastery, over which St. Meldan presided, and which might have been a continuation of Brendan's establishment.

(116) Ware (Bishops at Clonfert) has Moena first bishop of that see. The Ulster Annals, which he quotes, and those of the 4 Masters, place his death in the year, 571, and on the first of March; "Anno 570 (571) S. Moennius episcopus de Cluain-ferta S. Brendani obiit die 1. Marti." (See AA. SS. p. 489.) We have already seen (Not. 17 to Chap. ix.) how much Colgan was mistaken in thinking that he was the same as the abbot Monennus or Nennio master of Tigernach of Clones. Harris, having followed Colgan, added (at Clonfert) some stuff, as usual, to Ware's correct account of Moena. He says Moena's real name was Nennio, and then tells the reader that Colgan has published his life. But the greatest part of this so called life or Acts (at 1 Mart.) belongs not to bishop Moena but to the abbot Monennus, who was a very different person. Colgan has elsewhere (at 26 Feb. a bishop Moen or Moena a Briton, who had come from Brittany with St. Brendan on his return to Ireland. It is very probable that he was the bishop of Clonfert. Yet a difficulty occurs from his festival being marked not at the 1st of March but 26th of February. Whether they were the same or not, neither of them is to be confounded with an abbot Mainus, who is said (AA. SS. p. 414) to have lived and died in Brittany.

(117) The only passage of our ancient documents, in which I find any thing seeming to indicate that Brendan was a bishop, is one of the Calendar of Cashel (ap AA. SS. p. 439), where Moena is called bishop of Clonfert, and Comorban of St. Brendan. Now, as Comorban means successor, it would seem as if Brendan had been bishop there before Moena. Colgan, who was of this opinion, endeavoured to explain the matter by saying that Brendan resigned the see to Moena, reserving to himself the care of his monasteries. But it is very odd that, while our Annalists and hagiologists make mention of Moena as a bishop, they do not give that title to the far more celebrated Brendan. I suspect there is some mistake in that passage, and that the author's meaning was that Moena was a cooperator with Brendan in the ecclesiastical government of the establishment of Clonfert, and that he had been consecrated bishop for that purpose through his recommendation. Such a great institution, and in which a vast number of young men was educated for the service of the Church, required the assistance and presence of a bishop, in the same manner as there used to be a bishop in Columbkil's monastery of Hy. Or, taking the passage as it now stands, it may be understood of Moena's having succeeded Brendan not as bishop but as abbot; in which case we must suppose that Brendan retired, some years before his death, from the administration of Clonfert, leaving it to Moena, who thus, besides the care of the see, became charged with that of the monastery. And it must be recollected, that the name Comorban used to be given to the successors not only of bishops, but likewise of abbots. I find indeed Brendan expressly called a bishop in a Life of St. Fursa (16 Jan.): but as it was patched up at a very late period, as Colgan admits, probably about the 12th century, its authority is of little weight. As Clonfert was an episcopal see and had been one since St. Brendan's time, it might have thence, through mistake, been concluded that he had been bishop there. In the Life of St. Ita (15 Jan.) which is really ancient, and in which his name occurs several times, he is called by no higher title than Brendan abbot in Connaught.

(118) Adamnan (Vit. S. Col. L. 3. c. 17. Colgan's ed. and 12. Messingham.) writes; "Alio in tempore quatuor ad sanctum visitandum Columbam monasteriorum sancti fundatores de Scotia transmeantes in Hymba eum invenerunt insula, quorum illustria vocabula Comgellus Mocu-Aridi, Cahinnechus Mocu-Dalon, Brendenus Mocu-alti, Cormac nepos Liethain. Brendenus was the Brendan not of Birr, but of Clonfert, whereas, besides Brendan of Birr, the particular friend of Columbkil, being already (ib. cap. II. al. 8.) mentioned as dead, he is surnamed Mocualti, i. e. of the family of Hua Alta, to which he belonged. And O'Donnel in a parallel passage (L. 2. c. 106) calls him Brendan of Clonfert. This visit must have taken place after the year 563. It may be here observed that Adamnan, who is very particular in giving persons their proper titles, does not call Brendan a bishop either in the passage now quoted, or where he speaks of him again in the same chapter.

(119) See Not. 117 and AA. SS. p. 271.

(120) Usher, p. 955 and Ind. Chron. The Annals of Innisfallen and 4 Masters have A. 576, (AA. SS. p. 193) which comes to the same point. Poor Archdall, who seems never to have understood their mode of computation, retained (at Clonfert) the 576.

(121) Usher, ib.

(122) Such authors as Bale and Dempster are not worth attending to. If any one choose, let him consult Ware and Harris (Writers) and Nicholson (Ir. H. Libr. ch. 4). An Irish hymn in praise of St. Brigid was supposed to have been composed by St. Brendan. Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 609) holds that the author of it was Columbkil.

§. VIII. The other Brendan, who, from the place of his monastery is known by the name of Brendan of Birr, was probably born later than the former, although he died before him. He is usually called son of Luaigene, (123) and is stated to have been of a distinguished family of Munster. (124) Concerning his younger days I can discover no particulars, (125) prior to his name appearing among those of the chief disciples of Finnian of Clonard, and in a manner which shews that he was highly esteemed for his sanctity and supernatural gifts. (126) He was intimate with the two Kierans, (127) Brendan of Clonfert, and chiefly with Columbkil, to whom, as will be seen hereafter, he was very serviceable on a certain important occasion. At what precise time he founded his monastery at Birr (128) is not recorded; but there can be no doubt of its having been established some years prior to A. D. 563, the year in which Columbkil left Ireland, (129) and perhaps before 550. (130) He died on the 29th of November A. D. 571; (131) and his exit was revealed to Columbkil, then in Hy, at the very time it happened. (132) In one of the lives of the latter it is said that St. Brendan had composed some verses concerning his virtues and exemplary conduct. (133) It is certain that those two saints had a great esteem for each other.

(123) Usher having, with Ware and others, so called him (p. 955) corrects himself (p. 1064) by saying; "For Luaigne read Neim or Nemaind a famous poet." Archdall (at Birr) jumbling the whole together calls him "Brendan Luagneus son of Neim, or Nemaind, and a favourite poet," thus making Brendan himself the poet. Yet Usher in his Ind. Chron. (ad A. 571) again calls him son of Luaigne, and even refers to p. 1064.

(124) Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 544) reckons him among the relations of St. Ercus of Slane and the descendants of prince Corb, who resided in Munster, and in that part of it called the Decies. (See Not. 97.)

(125) His Acts, which Colgan intended to publish at the 29th of November, have not, as far as I know, appeared as yet. And the scraps from them, which he has given here and there, are so few and insignificant that scarcely any thing worth while can be gleaned from them. Usher has left us but four or five lines concerning this saint; and, what is very singular, Ware makes no mention of him except at Writers.

(126) In the list of Finnian's principal disciples (Acts of Finnian, cap. 19.) he is thus characterized; "Brandanus Biorra, qui pròpheta in scholis illis et etiam sanctorum Hiberniensium habebatur."

(127) In the first life of Kieran of Saigir (cap. 33) Brendan is spoken of as a friend of his. Hence Colgan drew a most strange conclusion, that he had been a disciple of St. Patrick, and has put him down as such in Tr. Th. p. 268; as if, because the story tellers had made Kieran contemporary with our Apostle, Brendan likewise must have been so. Colgan might with equal justice have argued, that Brendan of Clonfert, and even Kieran of Clonmacnois, who was born very many years after St. Patrick's death, had been disciples of his; for in the very same chapter they also are mentioned as friends of Kieran of Saigir, as likewise of Brendan of Birr.

(128) The reader need not be informed that Birr is a town now in the King's county. It was formerly considered to be in Munster; and hence Colgan has (Ind. Topogr. ad AA. SS.); "Birra monasterium in Elia in Mumonia."

(129) St. Brendan was a distinguished abbot, when a circumstance occurred relative to Columbkil's proceedings in Ireland. (See Adamnan L. 3. c. 2. M.'s ed.) In said chapter we read; "Brendanus illius monasterii fundator, quod Scotice Birra nuncupatur," &c.

(130) It is very probable that Brendan was an abbot before the death of his friend Kieran of Clonmacnois, who died in 549. (See below Not. 28 to Chap. xi.) The 4 Masters (AA. SS. p. 192.) relate that Brendan surnamed Biorra was seen rising into the air in the year 553 (554). Hence it would appear, that he was supposed to be at Birr by that time. This anecdote, which is similar to many others mentioned in the lives of saints, has been embellished by Archdall, who makes the saint ascend in a chariot.

(131) Usher, Ind. Chron. and Colgan, AA. SS. p. 193. Ware (at Writers) has 572, from, I suppose, the Annals of Innisfallen, which have A. 571. Ware thought that in this case, as in some others, they anticipated the vulgar era by one year. But it does not appear, that this mode of computation is regularly observed in those annals. Archdall (at Birr) has, from what he calls the Munster annals, a story concerning Brendan having lived 300 years, derived, I believe, from his having been confounded with Kieran of Saigir, whose father was, as well as Brendan's, called Lugneus or Luaigne. (See Chap. 1. §. 14.)

(132) Adamnan, L. 3. c. 8.

(133) O'Donnel, Life of St. Columba, L. 3. c. 41. See also Ware, Writers, at Brendan.

§. IX. Contemporary with the two Brendans was St. Iarlath of Tuam, who is placed next after them in the second class of saints. (134) He was son of Loga or Lughus of the noble house of Conmacnie, (135) and was born probably about the beginning of the sixth century. He is said to have been a disciple of St. Benignus of Armagh, and even to have received holy orders from him; (136) but this is a palpable mistake and quite irreconcilable with the periods, in which they lived. (137) From this mistake flowed another, viz. that of representing him as old when Brendan of Clonfert was young, (138) as indeed would have been the case had he been ordained priest by Benignus. His first establishment is supposed to have been at Cluanfois, (139) where he formed a monastery and a school, which was resorted to by several students, among whom is reckoned Colman son of Lenine. (140) Thence, by the advice it seems of St. Brendan of Clonfert, (141) he removed to Tuam, where being a bishop, he established his see. Whether he was consecrated before or after his settling there cannot be decided; but it is certain, that he was the first bishop of Tuam, (142) where his memory has been ever since highly venerated, and the cathedral dedicated in his name. (143) Certain prophecies concerning his successors have been attributed to this saint, but they do not bear sufficient marks of genuineness. (144) The year of his death is not known. The day marked for it in several of our Calenders is the 26th of December. (145) He was buried at Tuam, not in the cathedral but in a chapel called Scrin, or Shrine.

(134) He is there called Iairlaithea Tuama.

(135) Several districts in the Western parts of Ireland went under the name of Conmacnie. Harris (Antiq. ch. 7.) has among them a Connacne de Kinel Dubhain, since called Connacne de Dunmor in the county of Galway, now the barony of Downamore. As Tuam is in this barony, the Connacne, in which Iarlath's family resided, was probably that now mentioned.

(136) Colgan (Iarluth's Acts, 11 February) refers for these stories to the Life of Benignus, and has been followed by Harris, (Bishops at Tuam.)

(137) Benignus died in the year 468. How could Iarlath, who, as belonging to the second class of saints, did not become distinguished until about 540, have been a disciple of his? Or are we to believe what is said in said Life of his having received holy orders from Benignus, and being placed over a church by him? In this supposition we should admit that he was born, at the latest, in 438; whereas he must have been, at least, 30 years old, when ordained priest and appointed to the care of a congregation. This fable was built upon its having been recorded that Benignus had preached in Connacne, and other parts of the West. (See Chap. VIII. §. 1.) Now as Iarlath was a native of that country, it was thought not wrong to throw him into the number of the disciples of Benignus.

(138) See Not. 99.

(139) There was a place of that name not far from Tuam, and Colgan (AA. SS. p. 308) says it was thought to be that of Iarlath's first monastery. Harris and Archdall have a monastery there, as if the matter were certain. As to the time of said monastery Harris was quite mistaken in assigning it to the 5th century; Archdall comes nearer the truth, placing it about A. D. 540. If it was founded at that time, it is probable that it continued for many years later.

(140) Colman is represented (AA. SS. p. 309) as a grown up man, when he went to Iarlath's school. He lived, as will be seen elsewhere, until, at least, the year 601. Now if it be true that he studied under Iarlath, we must bring down that school to, at least, 550, the year in which Ware (Writers) says that Iarlath flourished. (See Not. 99.)

(141) It is thus, I believe, we are to understand what is said of Brendan directing him to go somewhat to the East, and foretelling that his resurrection would be at Tuam.

(142) I call him merely bishop of Tuam, because that see did not become archiepiscopal until some centuries after the death of St. Iarlath.

(143) Colgan quotes (AA. SS. p. 310) the following passage from the Catalogue of the churches of the diocese of Tuam; “Ecclesia cathedralis Tuamensis, sita Tuamiae, vocatur Tempull Iarlaithe, dicata S. Hierlatio primo episcopo Tuamensi, antequam haec sedes in archiepiscopalem erigeretur.”

(144) Even Colgan has his doubts concerning them. See A. A. SS. p. 309. and Ware and Harris (Writers.)

(145) The festival of St. Iarlath was and is still observed in the diocese of Tuam on the 6th of June. Colgan justly remarks that this might be owing to its having been transferred to that day, to prevent its clashing with the feast of St. Stephen. He has given Iarlath's Acts at the 11th of February, not that he thought this was the day of his death, but because Marian Gorman has a St. Iarlath at said day. It is plain that this calendarist, who mentions only one Iarlath, meant St Iarlath archbishop of Armagh.

§. x. In the list of the saints of the second class Comgall, Coemgen, and Kieran are placed next after Iarlath. The order of time requires our treating first of Coemgen, then of Kieran, and thirdly of Comgall, if it be true that St. Coemgen lived to the great age of 120 years; whereas, in this supposition, he should have been born in the year 498. Be this as it may, (146) Coemgen or, as his name is written at present, Kevin, (147) was of an illustrious family in the territory of Tirtuathal, the country of the O'Tooles. His father's name was Coemlog; and his mother, who was of the princely house of Dal Messincorb, was called Coemella. (148) They were Christians, whereas we find it related that Coemgen was, when a child, baptized by Cronan a priest. (149) At the age of seven years he was placed under Petrocus a learned and holy Briton, with whom he remained for five years. (150) Being now twelve years old his parents consigned him to the care of three holy elders Eogan, Lochan, and

Enna, to be educated by them in their monastery or school, in which he applied himself diligently to his studies during three years. (151) Next it is said that he became a disciple of Beonanus a hermit, and afterwards of a bishop Ligidus, who ordained him priest. (152) By the advice of this bishop he is said to have founded a monastery for himself at a place called Cluain-duach. (153) Then leaving some of his monks there he repaired to his own country, and formed his chief establishment at Glendaloch, (154) whence in his time or afterwards were derived several other religious houses in Leinster. At what time that monastery was founded is not recorded; but it must have been before A. D. 549, if it be true that he was abbot there when he went to pay a visit to Kieran at Clonmacnois, where he did not arrive until three days after Kieran's death. (155) It is related that on a certain occasion he visited also the three holy abbots Columb, Comgal, and Cainnich, then assembled at Usneach in Meath. (156) Having well arranged the order and discipline of this institution at Glendaloch, he retired (at what period of his life is not mentioned) to the upper part of the valley about a mile from the monastery, and there in a small place, beset with thick trees and refreshed by rivulets, led the life of a hermit for four years, practising the greatest austerities, until at length his monks prevailed on him to return to the monastery. (157) It is said, that when far advanced in years he intended to undertake a long journey, but was dissuaded from so doing by Garbhan a hermit, (158) who told him "that it was more becoming for him to fix himself in one place than to ramble here and there in his old age, as he could not but know that no bird could hatch her eggs while flying." On his end approaching he received the holy viaticum from St. Mochuorog a Briton, who had a cell to the east of Glendaloch. (159) St. Coemgen died on the 3d of June A. D. 618. (160) Although this saint was most probably not a bishop, yet Glendaloch became not long, it seems, after his death an episcopal see, in consequence of a city having soon grown up near the monastery. (161) Some writings have been attributed to him, but except perhaps a monastic rule, without sufficient authority. (162) How great the reputation of St. Coemgen has been appears from the vast concourse of persons, who for many centuries have continued to repair on the anniversary of his death to Glendaloch, there to celebrate his festival. (163)

(146) The only reason I can discover for placing this saint's birth in 498 is, that he is said to have lived 120 years. As he died in 618, it became necessary to go back for his birth to that year. Yet there are strong motives for doubting of his having been born so early. A brother of his St. Mocuemin, (See AA. SS. p. 586) was a disciple of Columba son of Crimthann (ib. p. 350) and abbot of Tirdaglas. Now this Columba had been a disciple of Finnian at Clonard and probably did not found his monastery until about A. D. 540. Next, among some nephews of St. Coemgen, by his sister Coeltigerna, or, as some call her, Coemaca, we find St. Dagan of Inverdaoile, who lived until 640, and who does not appear to have reached a very great age. Supposing Dagan to have been born in 565, it is not easy to believe that he was the nephew of a man who was then 67 years old, unless we are to admit a very uncommon disparity between the ages of the saint and his sister. Now it is certain, that Dagan was really a nephew of Coemgen. In the Irish metrical acts of St. Brigid there is a very obscure passage concerning Coemgen, which Colgan has thus translated; "Accesserat ad praelium Coemginus celebris; nivem per tempestatem agitat ventus: Glinndalachae sustinuit crucem, ita ut repererit requiem post tribulationes." This passage has no apparent connexion with what we find in the context as to St. Brigid, unless it should be considered as a sort of comparison between the watchfulness of the two saints. If the author alluded to a transaction in St. Brigid's life time, Coemgen would, according to him, have been a grown up man before her death, and so might justly be supposed to have been born in 498. The whole matter, however, is so obscure, that I shall say no more about it.

(147) Coemgen or Coemhgen, which signifies Pulcher genitus or Fair begotten (Usher p. 956) is the same name as Kevin, being thus pronounced in Irish. The letter M with the aspirate annexed (either H or a point) sounds like V. The diphthong OE has been generally modified into the single sound E. The letter G aspirated in the middle of a word almost loses its sound, as in Tighearna which becomes Tierna. (Vallancey, Irish grammar, at G.) It is scarcely necessary to add that the Irish C was always the same as K. I would not trouble the reader with these petty remarks, were I not forced to do so by the impudent and ridiculous quibbles of Ledwich, who in a sort of chapter, full of lies and ignorance, has entered into some details concerning St. Coemhgen and Glendaloch. He says (p. 35) that the name Coemhgen was unknown until after the 13th century, and would fain make us believe that it meant not a man but a mountain. And why? Because Giraldus Cambrensis, instead of that name, writes Keiwin or Keivin, and because in the life of St. Berachus it is spelled not Coemgen but Koemin, Coemin, and even Caymin. But are not these in reality all one and the same name, and applied by the authors, to whom Ledwich refers, to the celebrated abbot of Glendaloch? Suppose a person, treating of our mighty antiquary, should write his name Leadwich, as an ingenious author, who conceals himself under the signature Anonymous, has done; or that even it were written Leadwig, it would be immediately understood as the name of the antiquary; unless some one should be so foolish as to think that it was not the name of a man, but of a compound of lead and wig, taking, agreeably to a very usual trope, wig for what is contained under it. Similar to this folly is the Doctor's mode of arguing. He was striving to show, that St. Coemgen was neither a saint nor a man, but a mere mountain in the county of Wicklow. And thus he proceeds; "Keun is the name of many mountains in Wales noticed by Camden." Then he refers us to Lhuyd (Adversar.) who reckons Ceun, a Welsh word meaning back, among those that enter in the names of mountains. Pray what has this to do with St. Coemgen? It has, says the antiquary, "because the mountain Keun at Glendaloch was metamorphosed into St. Kevin." But where is the mountain Keuin at Glendaloch? And is it thus that this barefaced quack has the effrontery to substitute his lies for history! Or is an accidental likeness between the Welsh word Ceun and the name Kevin to be received as a proof of the non-existence of a person of the highest reputation, and who is mentioned over and over in numberless documents long prior to the Doctor's 13th century.

(148) AA. SS. p. 584–586. Harris, Writers at St. Coemgen. Ledwich takes fire (p. 35) at the account given by our genealogists of the family, whence this saint was sprung. He says that “to believe that a barbarous people, naked and ignorant as American Indians, should have preserved the pedigree of St. Kevin, is too much for the most stupid credulity.” The audacity of this pseudo-antiquary is intolerable. So then in the latter end of the fifth century and in the sixth, when St. Kevin's relatives lived, the Irish were still savages. How then did he forget himself so much as to give a pompous account (p. 159. seqq.) of the Irish schools and studies not only in the sixth century, but as far back as the middle of the fifth? Or how could he reconcile that barbarous state of Ireland with his praises of the Asiatic and Greek missionaries, whom he brings at a very early period to Ireland. (See Chap. 1. §. 5.) and with his telling us (p. 357) that there was certainly a Christian church in Ireland in the fourth and beginning of the fifth century, and that letters were then known and cultivated here? This incoherent charlatan changes his positions according as suits his convenience. When he wishes to keep out Rome and Palladius, and, above all, St. Patrick from any interference with the early christianity of Ireland, he represents the Irish as Christians and civilized long before any one from Rome came among us; but when he takes it into his head to drive a saint, ex. c. Kevin, not only out of the calendar but likewise out of existence, he describes them as naked and the greatest of savages even in the sixth century. As to the recording of genealogies, it did not require any great degree of learning, but was practised by the most ancient nations chiefly of the East, from some of whom, together with many other practices, it was derived to the Irish, with whom, as none but an incorrigible sceptic will dare to deny, it was a favourite sort of study. Strange that Ledwich, who is so fond of the Asiatics, could express a disbelief of it, and did not rather use it as an argument to prove, that we had been instructed by Eastern missionaries. The English translator of Ware's Writers has (at ch. 13) by a huge blunder made Coemlog a plebeian, because it is said that he lived "in plebe viz. Dalmoehocael," that is in the district called by that name.

(149) Usher, Ind. Chron. ad A. 498

(150) Usher, ib. ad A. 505. and p. 10. 8. We have already met with Petrocus (Chap. ix. §. 12.), and Usher reckons the 20 years, which he is said to have spent in Ireland, from 498 to 518. His reason for assigning them to this period was, I believe, its being said that Coemgen had been a scholar of his. But, as we have seen, (Not. 146) it may be justly doubted whether Coemgen was born as early as 498.

(151) Usher, p. 958, and Ind. Chron. ad A. 510. Instead of Eogan, one of those elders, Harris has (Bishops at Glendaloch p. 373) Dogain, owing probably to an error of the press. Hence Archdall also has the same name (at Glendaloch.) Concerning him and the other two masters of Coemgen nothing further is known; but it may be fairly supposed that they lived not far distant from the residence of his family.

(152) Harris, Writers at Coemgen, from a MS. Life, which he had got from Louvain. Supposing St. Coemgen to have been born in 498, I know of no bishop Lugidus, by whom he could have been ordained, when arrived at the proper age for priesthood, except Lugadius (same name, I dare say, as Lugidus) bishop of Connor. (See Chap. ix. §. 13.) But how account for Coemgen's going so far from his own country as the diocese of Connor? There might have been a Leinster bishop Lugidus in the days of Coemgen's youth; and that name was formerly very common in Ireland.

(153) Harris (loc. cit.) distinguishes this place from Glendaloch; but Hanmer, who also had a Life of St. Coemgen makes it the same and tells us, (Chronicle, &c. p. 126. New Ed.) that Glendaloch was of old called Cluayn-duach.

(154) Harris, loc. cit. Ledwich, to make a display of his learning, says (Ant. p. 33) that Glendalough or rather Glendalough seems to be an Anglo-Saxon compound, and that the name was derived from the first Firbolgian possessors of the valley, viz. the Tuathals or O'Tooles. So then those Firbolgians were Anglo-

Saxons! Oh! mighty antiquary! On this stupid statement it is sufficient to observe, that Glendalough is, both as a compound word and in its parts, downright Irish, consisting of Glen, valley, da two, and lough lake. The Doctor need not have gone further than Johnson's dictionary to learn that glen and lough are originally Irish words, which as well as very many others, have crept into the English language. The place has very appropriately been so called from there being two lakes in the valley. From this circumstance Hoveden (as Harris observes, Bishops p. 371) latinized the name of the see, afterwards established there, into Episcopatus Bistagniensis.

(155) Harris loc. cit. Usher p. 956 and Ind. Chron. ad A. 549. I suspect that Coemgen was not an abbot at that time. Yet, not having his Life, I cannot decide on this point.

(156) This visit is placed by Harris (loc. cit.) prior to Coemgen's going to Clonmacnois. But it is plain that it must have been some years later, whereas Comgall, as will be seen lower down, was not an abbot, until, at the earliest, A. D. 555.

(157) Harris, loc. cit.

(158) This Garbhan, who is called the son of Lugadius to distinguish him from other persons of the same name, had been a disciple of Coemgen and lived near where Dublin is now situated. His memory was revered on the 9th of July. AA. SS. p. 751.

(159) It can scarcely be doubted that this was the St. Mogoroc of Delgany mentioned above, Not. 202 to Chap. VIII. And hence we see that this saint lived in the 7th century.

(160) Usher, Ind. Chron. The Four masters have A. 617, which, according to their mode of computation, was the same year. Usher, (p. 956) adds or the year 622. If this was the real year of St. Coemgen's death, it will follow that he was born in 502 or late in 501, supposing that he lived unto the age of 120 years. (See Not. 146.)

(161) In Coemgen's life we read; "In ipso loco clara et religiosa civitas in honore S. Coemgeni crevit, quae nomine praedictae vallis, in qua ipsa est, Gleandaloch vocatur." (See Usher, p. 956.) Colgan treats (at 8 Mart.) of St. Libba or Molibba a nephew of St. Coemgen, and calls him bishop of Glendaloch. If he was really such, the antiquity of that see can be traced to the early part of the 7th century; nor do I find any sufficient reason to controvert Colgan's assertion. As to St. Coemgen, there is nothing in his Life to induce us to think that he also belonged to the episcopal order; but, as the see was ancient, and he the founder of the monastery that gave rise to it, some writers thought that he had been bishop there.

(162) See Ware and Harris, Writers at Coemgen. Archdall says (at Glendalough) that he wrote a Life of St. Patrick. Where he got his information I cannot discover.

(163) The mighty Ledwich says (Antiq. p. 46) that the 9th century was the era of the saintship of St. Kevin. He had already told us that St. Coemgen was not known until after the thirteenth. (See Not. 147.) Then he strives to amuse the reader with some legendary stories concerning the saint, as if to prove that, because said stories are unworthy of belief, he never existed. And, to show his deep and exotic learning, he refers to Giraldus Cambrensis, Brompton, and, wonderful to think, even to an Icelandic MS. But do not those very stories prove that St. Coemgen or Kevin was supposed to have been a real person? According to our antiquary's mode of arguing we would be authorized to doubt of the existence of very many of the most celebrated characters of old times, in consequence of the fables, which have been intermixed with their history. In his dull irreligious manner, after placing the saintship, as he calls it, of St. Kevin in the 9th century, he adds, that in the same age St. James was given to Spain and St. Andrew to Scotland. Pray does he believe, that there were such persons as the Apostles James and Andrew? It is difficult to guess at what he believes.

§. XI. Following the order of time, that is, of the years, as far as they can be discovered, in which our saints were born, we have now to treat of St. Kieran of Clonmacnois. (164) This great saint was a native of the province of Meath, although his parents, Beoan and Darerca, were originally from Ulster. (165) He is usually called the son of the carpenter, as his father was of that trade. The year of his birth is variously stated; but the most probable account seems to be that, which assigns it to A. D. 507. (166) Kieran is said to have received his early education under a St. Justus, (167) by whom, according to some accounts, he had been baptized. (168) When rather adult and properly qualified for applying to the higher sort of studies, he became a disciple of Finnian at Clonard. (169) How long he remained at his school we are not informed; but we may justly suppose that it was not for a short time, and that Kieran did not leave Clonard until he was well grounded in ecclesiastical learning. Thence, having received a certificate from Finnian together with his blessing, he repaired to the monastery of St. Nennidius in one of the islands of Lough Erne. (170) This saint, who was surnamed Laobh-dearc, and whom we had already an occasion of mentioning, (171) had been also a disciple of Finnian, (172) and, while at his school, might have become acquainted with Kieran. Having founded his monastery in that island called Inis-muigh-samh, where, or in a neighbouring district, he became also a bishop, (173) it is not improbable that he invited Kieran to spend some time with him and to assist him in the management of his institution. Kieran was received by him with great joy and remained for some in his monastery. Wishing to improve himself still further in the knowledge and observance of monastic discipline, he went to the great monastery of the Isle of Arran. St. Enda, who still governed it, received him very kindly and employed him for seven years in threshing corn for the use of the community. During that period he was considered as a pattern of piety and sanctity; and Enda is said to have had some visions relative to the extraordinary merit of Kieran, and the number of religious houses, which in course of time would belong to his institution. (174) At the expiration of those seven years he removed, according to one account, to Inniscatthy, where he was charged by St. Senan with the care of providing for strangers. (175) But his liberality to the poor was so great, that he incurred the displeasure of some of the monks, and accordingly thought it adviseable to quit that monastery. (176) He then proceeded to an island of Lough-rie called Aingin or Angina, (177) where, having erected a monastery, he was soon surrounded by a vast number of excellent monks. This was his first establishment, the commencement of which is placed by Usher in the year 544. (178) I should rather place it in 542, as thus we will have the seven years, during which, as we are told on good authority, that Kieran was an abbot. (179) He governed that establishment until the year 548, when, leaving the care of it to Adomnan or Domnan a Munster man, he removed to the Western bank of the Shannon, and on a site granted to him by King Dermot founded the great monastery of Clonmacnois. (180) The ground had belonged to Diermit before he became king of all Ireland; but he was already on the throne when Kieran obtained from him as much of it as was necessary for erecting a church and monastery. This prince had a great esteem for St. Kieran, who, it is said, had foretold to him his accession to the sovereignty. At the request of the saint he laid with his own hands the first part of the foundation. It is added that he made a grant of three or four other spots of ground for the use of the establishment. (181) St. Kieran did not long survive the erection of Clonmacnois, having been removed, in the prime of life, to a better world on the 9th of September, A. D. 459. (182) His death was occasioned by a dreadful pestilence, which raged in that year. (183) This saint, although he had risen no higher than to the rank of a priest, (184) was reckoned among the Fathers of the Irish church. (185) His institution, for which he had drawn up a particular rule, (186) was extended after his death to a great number of religious houses; and his memory has been most highly revered, not only in Ireland but likewise in Scotland. (187)

(164) As this St. Kieran was much more celebrated than the one of Saigir, there can be no doubt that he was the person meant by the author of the catalogue. He omitted the other Kieran as well as many other saints of that period, naming only such as were more generally spoken of. It is proper to caution the reader against an error of the press in the London or folio edition, p. 474 of Usher's Primordia, where in the list of the second class Céranus occurs instead of Cemanus. This erratum might induce a person at first sight to think, that Kieran of Saigir was mentioned in that list. The sequel, however, shows that the name was Cemanus.

(165) Kieran's Acts, cap. 1. and Colgan, Tr. Th. p. 181. To his having been a native of Meath Colgan refers a prophecy attributed to St. Patrick, in which it is said (ib. p. 145) that Kieran would be born in the southern parts, that is, relatively to Armagh. This prophecy is mentioned by Jocelin, cap. 113. Whether it was pronounced or not is of little consequence; but the denomination of southern parts seems to shew that Kieran's birth place was not only in Meath but in a district of it far to the south of Armagh; and it is very probable that it was somewhere in the neighbourhood of where he afterwards established his great monastery of Clonmacnois. This tract was comprized in the ancient Meath. Ware and Harris (Bishops at Clonmacnois) say that he was of the sept of the Arads, or of a family from the part of Ulster called Dalaradia. This however does not prevent his having been born in Meath.

(166) The Annals of Innisfallen, which are usually very correct and consistent, have, "A. 506 (507) Nativitas Ciarani filii artificis." Usher calculated that he was born in 516, because he had read in the Book of Navan that he lived only 33 years. (See Pr. p. 909 and 957.) If this were true, Usher's calculation would be right, because it is well known that Kieran died in 549. The authority, however, of that book is of little weight, and it is more than probable, that those 33 years were merely guessed at to make his life of the same length with that of our Saviour, as is observed in said book. In Kieran's Life it was remarked that he died rather young; and thence a conjecture was started that his age might have been 33. The Annals of Ulster in Johnston's Extracts (after Antiq. Celto. Norm. &c.) place his birth in 511 (512). This date would give us 37 years for the whole life of Kieran, which number of years is little enough to enable us to account for his various transactions and for the extraordinary estimation, in which he was held before his death. Yet these points can be better explained in the supposition that he was born in 507; as in this case he would have lived to the age of 42, which while sufficient for the purposes now alluded to, was not long enough for ranking him among persons much advanced in years.

(167) AA. SS. p. 113.

(168) In the Tripartite (L. 2. c. 49.) this Justus is called a Deacon, and is said to have been a disciple of St. Patrick.

(169) Kieran's Life, cap. 19. He is mentioned also in the Acts of Finnian, cap. 19. and is the first named in the list of Finnian's eminent scholars; "Kieranus filius artificis, qui Mac an Tsaoir dicitur." See more in AA. SS. p. 113.

(170) In Kieran's life, cap. 7. we find the following passage; "Sanctus enim Kieranus transacta temporis spatio, accepta magistri sui licentia et benedictione, ad S. Ninnidium, in quadam sylva stagni Erne commorantem, properavit." Usher, (p. 1064) quotes a similar passage from a somewhat different Life. The words, accepta-licentia, are in both of them, alluding, I believe, to a certificate or testimonial of learning and good conduct, such as that given in universities to deserving students, who are thence called licentiates. Usher places Kieran's departure from Finnian's school in the year 530. (Ind. Chron.) This date ill accords with that assigned by him for the birth of Kieran. For, in his hypothesis, Kieran would have then been only 14 years of age. Who will believe that he was so young at a time when he had completed his theological studies, and was probably already a monk? In what is said of him on his arrival at the monastery of Nennidius he appears as such. He was, I dare say, much more than 14 years old, when he first went to Finnian's school; whereas, besides its being related that he was then grown up, adultioris aetatis, it can scarcely be supposed that he was less than 18 or 20 when properly qualified for the biblical and theological studies cultivated at Clonard. I am inclined to think, that Kieran did not leave that school as early as 530; and for this reason that it seems not to have been established until about said year or not long before it. (See Chap. ix. §. 8.) If a conjecture be allowed, the year of Kieran's departure may be supposed to have been 533 or 534, supposing that he had spent three or four years there. At this time

Kieran would have been 26 or 27 years old, according to the Annals of Innisfallen, an age very usual for the completion of theological studies. But had he been born in 516, as Usher states, he would have been only 17 or 18, an age too premature for such an object. On the other hand, the accounts given of Kieran's subsequent transactions require, that his leaving Finnian's school be not placed later than about A. D. 534.

(171) Chap. ix. §. 5.

(172) Finnian's Acts; cap. 19. Hence, as before observed (Not. 80 to Chap. ix.) it appears how much Colgan was mistaken in confounding him with Nennidius Lamhglan.

(173) Colgan treating (at 18 Jan.) of Nennidhius quotes an Irish distich, in which he is called Doctor and Bishop. It is added that he was a descendant of king Leogaire, having been a great grandson of his by his father's side, as Colgan collects from old genealogical tables. He was highly respected, and is reckoned among the chief founders of the Irish monasteries. That his monastic establishment was in the above mentioned island is generally admitted; but as to his episcopal see some of our Calendarists place it at Domnach-mor in Magh-ene, a plane to the South of the river Erne, stretching between the lake and the bay of Donegall, There does not appear to have been a monastery in this place, although Archdall has it in his Monasticon under Fermanagh. The probability is that Nennidhius, having governed for some time the monastery in the island, was raised to the episcopal dignity and entrusted with the care of the district, lying along part of the southern bank of Lough Erne and thence to the West. Colgan (Ind. Chron. ad AA. SS.) makes him a bishop in the year 522. This is a mistake, founded on the supposition that he was the same as Nennidius Lamh-glan the contemporary of St. Brigid. Archdall says (at Innis-mac-saint) that he died in 523 or 530. As to 523, there is no authority whatsoever, except a conjecture (ap AA. SS. p. 114) that Lamh-glan died in that year. But, as he was a different person, it has nothing to do with the Nennidhius we are now treating of. And as to 530, the foundation for this date is still more pitiful. Colgan quoted Usher as stating (Ind. Chron.) that Nennidhius was living in the island in 530. Poor Archdall understood Colgan's words as if they meant, that he died in said year. The fact is that the year of his death is unknown ; but it must have been long after 530. In some Calendars his festival is assigned to the 16th, in others to the 18th of January.

(174) Acts of St. Enda or Endeus (at 21 Mart.) cap. 21, seqq.

(175) Usher, p. 1064, from a life of Kieran. In neither of the lives of Senan is there any mention of Kieran having been a member of the house of Inniscatthy, although in them he is spoken of more than once. We read that Kieran and Brendan waited upon Senan to make their confessions to him, which is thus expressed in the metrical life ; “ Kyeranus interea—et Brendanus praeterea—adveniunt Angelico—admoniti oraculo—ut sancto causas omnium—faterentur excessuum.” And in the other life, cap. 36. it is said that they called upon Senan to request that he would become their spiritual director and confessor, and that they fixed upon him, because he was older and their superior in rank, he being a bishop and they only priests. For, as Colgan observes, it was usual with the holy men of those days to choose a particular director of conscience, who in Irish was called Anmchara, i. e. spiritual friend or father. Kieran is mentioned also on another occasion in said lives, where it is related that, on his way to visit Senan, he gave his cloak to a poor man, whom he met almost naked, and that, when on the bank of the river near Inniscatthy, Senan sent a boat to bring him over, and ran forward to welcome him, bringing a cloak instead of the one he had given away. Yet I do not mean to deny, that Kieran might have lived for some time at Inniscatthy in the above mentioned capacity. In the metrical life of Senan (cap. 21.) we find that Kieran is called a companion of his, “ comes semper et socius;” but these words seem to mean nothing more than that they were constant friends. Usher, (Ind. Chron.) places Kieran’s departure from Arran and arrival at Inniscatthy in the year 538, thus allowing only eight years in all for the time he spent both with Nennidhius and with Enda. (See Not. 170.) According to this computation he would have remained but one year with Nennidhius. Be this as it may, although the time is probably too short, Usher’s date is merely conjectural, and cannot be reconciled with other dates, particularly those laid down by Usher himself. In the first place it is more than probable, as already remarked, that Kieran did not go to the monastery of Nennidhius as early as 530. Next, how will we be able to account for the time between 538 and 544, the year to which Usher assigns the foundation of Kieran's first monastery? For admitting that Kieran went from Arran to Inniscatthy, it is plain from the account given of what occurred in the latter place, that he remained there only for a short time. And in the life of Enda Kieran is represented as, when leaving Arran, bent upon erecting a monastery for himself. It is odd that Usher fixed upon the year 538, having placed Kieran's birth in 516; whereas he must have supposed that Kieran arrived in Arran seven years before, that is, in 531, and when he was only 15 years old. Now who can imagine, that St. Enda would have ordered a boy of that age to employ himself in threshing corn? Usher's motive for making these occurrences earlier than he ought was, I believe, his wish to reconcile them with the wrong date, (A. D. 449.) which he had assigned for Enda's foundation in Arran. (See Not. 82 to Chap. VIII.) Accordingly he drew back, as far as he thought he could, the transactions of Kieran with Enda, lest he would be obliged to suppose that the latter lived to a prodigious age.

(176) Usher, p. 1065. The cause assigned for Kieran's leaving Inniscatthy shows, that he did not remain there long. We may be sure that he exercised his great liberality as soon as it was in his power, and that in less than perhaps half a year he was persecuted by those stingy monks.

(177) Ware threw out a conjecture (Antiq. cap. 26 under Longford) that the islet Aingin or Inis-aingin was the same as the Island of all saints, in which there was a monastery long after the times of St. Kieran. Perhaps it was, but Harris (Monast. tables.) and Archdall (at Island of all saints) have gone further, stating, without giving us any authority, as a fact what Ware proposed by way of conjecture.

(178) Usher (Ind. Chron.) assigned this date on the supposition that St. Kieran got a grant of Inis-aingin from Diermit king of Ireland. As Diermit's reign did not begin until A. D. 544, Usher concluded that said grant could not be placed before that year. But might not Diermit have made such a grant before he became king of all Ireland? Inis-aingin was most probably part of his patrimonial territory, and one of those islands of Lough-rie, in which Diermit used to take shelter, when persecuted by his predecessor king Tuathal. (See the Tripartite life of St. Patrick. L. 2. c. 28.) Other accounts state, that Kieran got Inis-aingin from a priest called Daniel. Colgan quotes (Tr. Th. p. 175) to this purpose the following passage from a Life of Kieran ; “ Et venit ipse presbyter Daniel repletus Dei gratia, et insulam Angin, quae erat in sua possessione, Deo et sancto Kierano in aeternum obtulit.” This is, I believe, as respectable an authority, as the book of Navan, whence Usher derived his information.

(179) Tigernach states in his Annals, that Kieran, having founded the monastery of Clonmacnois, was abbot for seven years; but as, according to every other account, he founded it only one year before his death, I think Tigernach must be understood of the whole time, during which he governed both there and at Inis-aingin. The name and recollection of Inis-aingin were, in course of time, swallowed up in the greatness of Clonmacnois, insomuch that in some documents, ex. c. the Acts of Enda, Kieran is spoken of as setting about the establishment of the latter very soon after his departure from Arran, without any mention being made of Inis-aingin. As to the whole period of Kieran's abbotship, Tigernach is a respectable witness, having lived at Clonmacnois, where he was an Erenach, or as others say, abbot in the eleventh century. See Ware and Harris, Writers at Tigernach.

(180) Usher, p. 1065. The reader need not be reminded of the part of Ireland in which this celebrated place is situated. It was anciently called Druim-tiprad (AA. SS. p. 266.), and got its present name from a Connaught prince, but on what occasion I cannot discover. The Annals of Inisfallen have. “ A. 547 (548) Fundata est Clonmacnois, i. e. Nois Muccaid regis Connaiciae a quo nominatur Cluain.” The meaning of this seems to be that it was so called from a son of Nois Muccaid, king of Connaught. Perhaps his name was Tiprad. I find this name among those of the ancient princes of that province. (See AA. SS. p. 346.) That the monastery was founded in 548, appears not only from the now quoted annals, but likewise from the general testimony of our old writers that Kieran died in the year next after the establishing of it. (See Usher, p. 909. and Ind. Chron.) and Ind. Chron. ad A. 544) from the Book of Navan, of Kieran's having got above 100 churches and cells from Diermit, it is scarcely worth animadversion. Such huge grants were unknown in those times, and indeed at all times, as made by one individual to another; nor would our saints, particularly a Kieran, have accepted of large donations. They used to work with their own hands, and maintain themselves and others by their own labour. That fable was invented at a period, when there existed a great number of religious houses, in which the rule and institution of St. Kieran were observed. Those communities were gradually multiplied in the course of ages; but, as long as the saint lived, there is no account that can be depended on, of any monastery of his order besides Clonmacnois and Inis-aingin.

(181) This account of the foundation of Clonmacnois, which is the most correct I have met with, is taken from the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, L. 2. c. 28. As to what Usher has, (p. 957.

(182) Annals of Ulster, Innisfallen, and 4 Masters, Usher (Ind. Chron.) Ware (Bishops at Clonmacnois), Harris, &c. The Bollandists in a note to the Life of St. Cronan of Roscrea (at 28 April) say that they will prove at 9 September, that Kieran lived at Clonmacnois until 570 or later, and that said monastery was founded as early as about 519. Whether they have endeavoured to keep their word I do not know, not having their tomes so late as said month; but this much I am certain of, that, notwithstanding their confidential tone, they would not have been able to prove the truth of these paradoxes, in opposition to our best annalists, Kieran's connection with Finnian of Clonard, Nennidius, Enda, &c. and the whole history of Clonmacnois, where we find a successor of Kieran, prior to the year 570 (See below Not. 184.)

(183) Annals of 4 Masters at 548 (549) and Colgan (AA. SS. p. 150.) This pestilence was called Cron-chonnuill, that is, as Colgan explains it (ib.p. 831) the yellow jaundice.

(184) See Not. 175. Ware (Bishops at Clonmacnois) observes that some writers spoke of Kieran as a bishop; but he did not follow their opinion. Harris (ib.) seems to exhibit him as bishop of Clonmacnois, owing to his shameful mistake of placing Tigernach there as immediate successor of Kieran. Tigernach was bishop not at Clonmacnois, but at Clones. (See Not. 15 to Chap. ix.) Archdall (at Clonmacnois), besides following Harris's mistake, has given us a huge blunder of his own, where he introduces Oedlugh, abbot of Clonmacnois, as dying in the year 551. If this were true, we should suppose that Oedlugh was Kieran's immediate successor as abbot. To understand the source of this blunder, the reader must be apprized that there was an Aedlugh or Aidlugh son of Coman and abbot of Clonmacnois in the seventh century, as Colgan expressly states at 26 February, where he treats of him, and where he adds that he succeeded Cronan, who died in 637 (638). The 4 Masters place Aedlugh's death in 651 (652), as do also the Ulster Annals quoted by Usher, p. 970. In Colgan's text, where the 4 Masters are quoted, it has, as very usual in Colgan's works, unluckily happened that, through an error of the press, the number 551 appears instead of 651. This palpable erratum, which, on account of its opposition to the whole context a schoolboy would have discovered, was Archdall's authority for his Oedlugh, as he calls him. His reason for giving him that name was, that he has him lower down where he ought to be, viz. at A. 652, there calling him Aidhlog mac Camain as the name appears in Usher (loc. cit.) Colgan had referred to the very passage of Usher. Yet Archdall still remained blind; but to hide the confusion he changed (at A. 551) Aidhlog into Oedlugh. The real immediate successor of St. Kieran was Oena who died in 569 (570) according to the 4 Masters and AA. SS. p. 193. Colgan elsewhere (ib. p. 72) calls him Aengus or Aeneas. As to bishops of Clonmacnois, the first we meet with was Baitan or Boetan, whose death is assigned to A. D. 663 (664).

(185) Cummian in his Paschal epistle mentions him, together with Ailbe, Brendan, and others, under the name of Queranus Coloniensis. Alcuin joins him with St. Patrick and others, where he writes; "Patricius, Cheranus Scottorum gloria gentis, &c. See Not. 56 to Chap. II.

(186) It was called the Law of Kieran. Ware (Writers) observes that he is said to have written also some prophecies.

(187) Mr. Chalmers (Caledonia, Vol. 1. p. 318) mentions St. Kieran as a great patron saint of the Scoto-Irish in North Britain, and adds that many churches, several of which he names, were dedicated to him in Argyle, Ayrshire, and other places; and that an islet on the coast of Lorn bears his name. He shows that the saint was Kieran of Clonmacnois from his festival having been kept on the 9th of September, which is confirmed by Keith, although wrong in other points, List of Bishops, p. 233. In the Martyrolog. Scot. of Camerarius the 11th of September is marked for his festival, for the purpose, it seems, of distinguishing him from Kieran of Clonmacnois, and of making him appear as a native of the now called Scotland. Dempster, who stopped at nothing went further, saying that he lived chiefly in the Western isles (See above Not. 32.) Colgan shows (AA. SS. p. 470) that the statements of both Camerarius and Dempster are false. Had he been aware of the great veneration paid to St. Kieran in that country, and of the 9th of September being the true day of his festival, he could have cleared up the matter better than he has done. He might have learned from the Supplement to Kieran's Acts quoted by himself (ib. p. 266) that his name was exceedingly celebrated in Scotland; "Nomen per Hiberniam et Albaniam longe celeberrimum." His being so well known there and so much revered, preferably to several other eminent Irish saints, was, I dare say, owing in great part to the esteem in which he was held by St. Columba, who is said to have written a hymn in praise of Kieran, beginning with these lines; "Quantum Christi, O, Apostolum—mundo misisti hominem?—Lucerna hujus insulae—lucens lucerna mirabilis," &c. (See Tr. Th. p. 472.)

§. XII. St. Comgall, or, as more properly called, Coemgall or Coemgell, the renowned abbot of Bangor, was of a distinguished military family of Dalrardia, the very country, in which he founded his monastery. His father's name was Sedna, and his mother's Briga. It is said that his birth had been foretold by St. Patrick sixty years before he came into the world. (188) According to the Annals of Ulster he was born in the year 516; (189) but other accounts place his birth somewhat earlier. (190) When arrived at a certain age he wished to embrace the religious state, and, leaving his father's house, placed himself under a master capable of instructing him in various branches of learning, particularly ecclesiastical. After a certain lapse of time Comgall set out from his own country towards the more southern parts of Ireland, for the purpose of improving himself in knowledge and in the observances of a monastic life. Having arrived in Leinster he went to the monastery of Clonenagh governed by St. Fintan, who received him kindly and admitted him a member of his community. (191) Comgall must by this time have been of rather a mature age, and even older than St. Fintan, if we are to believe that the latter was, as we read in his Acts, younger than Columb-kill. (192) As the discipline was very severe at Clonenagh, Comgall after some time felt a strong temptation to leave the monastery and return to his relatives and country. But Fintan, to whom he disclosed his feelings and uneasiness, having prayed to God in his favour, he was soon relieved from this anxiety, and, while in the act of praying himself, he felt his heart, all of a sudden, overflowing with spiritual joy and comfort. (193) Being now fully satisfied with his state, he remained for several years under the direction of St. Fintan, who, finding him well qualified for the purpose, advised him to go back to his own country and to form there some religious establishments. (194) Comgall had been hitherto unwilling to enter into holy orders; but it is said that, before proceeding straight to Dalaradia he turned off to Clonmacnois (195) and after some time was there ordained priest by a bishop Lugidus. (196) We are told that, on his arrival in Ulster, he preached in various parts of that province, and spent some time in retirement in an island of Lough Erne. It is added that he intended to leave Ireland, and to spend the remainder of his days in Britain, but that he was induced by the pressing solicitations of bishop Lugidus, who had ordained him, and of other holy men, to remain in his own country. (197) Comgall then founded the monastery of Banchor, or as it is often called, Benchor, now Bangor (198) near the bay of Carrickfergus. This foundation took place about the year 559. (199) For the direction of his institution Comgall drew up a particular rule, which was reckoned among the principal ones observed in Ireland. (200) The number of persons that flocked to place themselves under this holy abbot, was so great that, as one place could not contain them, it became necessary to establish various monasteries and cells, in which, taken altogether, it was computed that there were 3000 monks, all observing his rule, and superintended by him. (201) Among them is mentioned Cormac, king of South Leinster or Hy-kinselagh, who in his old age retired to Bangor, and there spent the remainder of his days. (202) The reputation of this monastery was very much enhanced by the celebrity of some eminent men, who had been educated there under Comgall, particularly St. Columbanus, one of the greatest men of the age he lived in, so that the fame of Bangor spread far and wide throughout all Europe. (203) St Comgall observed and followed the liturgy introduced into Ireland by St. Patrick. (204) It is related that in the seventh year after the foundation of Bangor he went to Britain, wishing to visit some saints, and to remain there for some time; and that he established a monastery in the country called Heth. (205) If, as seems more probable, the Britain, to which Comgall repaired, was Great Britain, it is not unlikely that it was on this occasion that he paid a visit, together with St. Brendan and others, to Columbkil in one of the Western isles. (206) He is said to have contributed to the conversion of Brideus, king of the Northern Picts. Having returned to Ireland he continued to govern his monastery and its dependencies until his death, which occurred on the 10th of May A. D. 601, (207) after he had received the holy viaticum from St. Fiachra, abbot of Congbail and afterwards of Clonard. (208) St. Comgall has been justly reckoned among the fathers of the Irish church. (209) Whether he was the author of certain tracts, attributed to him, besides his Monastic rule, I leave to others to inquire. (210)

(188) Jocelin relates (cap. 98.) that St. Patrick being in the district, in which the monastery was afterwards founded, was asked to erect a church there, and that he declined doing so, saying that at the end of 60 years a child of light would be born of the name of Comhgall, i. e. beautiful pledge, who would in that place, establish a church, &c. Many such prophecies are mentioned as to the birth of our great saints; but we are not bound to believe that they were actually pronounced.

(189) See Usher, p. 869, and Ind. Chron.

(190) The Annals of Inisfallen have; A. 513 (514) Nativitas Comgol Benchor. According to the 4 Masters he would have been born in 511 or 512; for, while agreeing with every other account they assign his death to A. D. 600 (601); they observe that he died in the 99th year of his age, which is stated also in the Martyrol. Tamlect. quoted in Tr. Th. p. 113. In the first of Comgall's Lives published by the Bollandists (a trifling one indeed) he is said to have died in the 80th. Those, who place his birth in 516 tell us, that he died at the age of 85 or in his 85th year. Usher ib. Ware, (Writers) &c. This date (516) is probably the most correct, and agrees better than the others with some transactions of Comgall's life. Archdall (at Bangor) jumbles the whole together. After placing his birth in 516, and death in 601, he makes him die in the 90th year of his age!

(191) In Comgall's second Life, cap. 3, we read; "Jam pius juvenis Comgellus—direxit viam suam ad australem Hiberniae plagam, et intravit provinciam Lageniensium, et venit ad S. Fintanum, abbatem monasterii nomine Cluainedhnech, regentem in plebe Laighis positum, in aquilonali Lageniensium plaga, juxta radices montis Bladhma; recepitque S. Fintanus B. Comgallum in suam congregationem." Of this celebrated monastery and St. Fintan we shall see lower down. This second Life is also in Fleming's Collectanea Sacra.

(192) According to the earliest computation Columkill was not born until the year 519. Add that Fintan had been a disciple of Columba son of Crimthann, afterwards abbot of Tirdoglas. Now this Columba had been a scholar of Finnian of Clonard. Considering all circumstances it is hard to suppose, as will be seen, that Fintan founded the monastery of Clonenagh until about the year 548. Admitting that Comgall was received there in that year, it will follow that he was at least 32 years old when he assumed the monastic habit. In the supposition that he was born before 516, he would have been more than 32, and still by some additional years younger than Fintan. In this case the disparity of years between the abbot and the novice might appear too great, and Comgall would perhaps have looked out for a superior not so much younger than himself. Hence it may be concluded, that his birth ought not to be placed earlier than A. 516.

(193) Second Life of Comgall, cap. 4.

(194) Ib. cap. 11.

(195. I do not know how this can be reconciled with the directions given him by St. Fintan to proceed forthwith to his own country, or with its being related that he actually set out for that purpose. I suspect that Clonmacnois has been mistaken for Connor. At any rate, if he went to Clonmacnois, he could not have been there with St. Kieran, as we read in the Legend for his Office drawn up by Dr. Burke (Officia propria SS. Hibern.); whereas this saint was dead before Comgall had left Clonenagh. As he had spent several years in this monastery, where, at the earliest, he was not received until A. D. 548 (See Not. 192), how could he have been, after his departure thence, with St. Kieran, who died in 549?

(196) There is no account, in any catalogue of our bishops, of a Lugidus in those times at Clonmacnois. Ware indeed (Writers at Comgall) has what is said of his having there ordained Comgall. But at Bishops he makes no mention of him; and the first bishop of Clonmacnois, whom he names, is Baitan. (See Not. 184.) It is probable, that by Lugidus the ordainer of Comgall was meant the bishop of Connor, who might have been otherwise called Lugadius. (See Chap. ix. §. 13.) I am the more inclined to be of this opinion as Lugadius is spoken of as having had verbal communications with Comgall after his return to Ulster, such as a bishop of Connor might have had with a person living in the district, in which Bangor is situated. It is true that Lugadius of Connor is said to have died in 538, and therefore long before he could have ordained Comgall. Are we, however, certain that he died so early? And, admitting it, there might be in this case one of these anachronisms so usual in the Acts of our saints. For I do not mean to say that Comgall was ordained by that bishop of Connor, but merely to observe that as Lugadius lived in the sixth century, and not far from Comgall's residence, he might have been guessed at as the ordainer. Yet it may be allowed, that there was a bishop Lugadius, who actually ordained Comgall; but, if there was, I think we should look for him rather in the neighbourhood of Comgall's country than at Clonmacnois.

(197) It would be difficult to reconcile this narrative with the account given of Comgall having returned to his own country, in compliance with St. Fintan's advice, for the purpose of forming some religious establishments. I am very much inclined to think, that it is founded more on conjecture than on fact. The practice of going to foreign parts, which became so general with our Irish saints towards the close of Comgall's life, might have induced an opinion that he also had intended to quit Ireland, particularly as some of his own disciples, and among others the great Columbanus, had done so.

(198) Ware (Ant. cap. 26) says that the place got its name from White choir, which is the same as Banchor in Irish. But, if the name was originally Benchor, will this etymology be correct?

(199) Ware (ib.) has A. D. 555, and is followed by Harris and Archdall. Usher says (p. 956) about 555 or 559; but in his Ind. Chron. he assigns the foundation to A. 559; which comes nearer the truth. The Annals of Innisfallen places it in 557 (558). From what has been seen concerning the time that Comgall may have arrived at Clonenagh, and the number of years which he is said to have spent there, the foundation of Bangor cannot consistently with these and other circumstances, be carried farther back than the year 558. The date, 551 (552) assigned for it by the 4 Masters (ap. AA. SS. p. 192) is still less admissible than Ware's. It is very probable, that Comgall had not in that year completed one half of his monastic studies at Clonenagh.

(200) In the Supplement to the Acts of Kieran of Clonmacnois, quoted by Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 471), Comgall is named among eight chief framers of Monastic rules. The other seven there mentioned are St. Patrick, St. Brigid, St. Brendan, St. Kieran, St. Columbkill, St. Molassius, and St. Adamnan. We may observe, by the bye, that several others of our saints composed similar rules. But of this hereafter. Meanwhile see Usher, p. 919. and above Not. 58.

(201) We read in Comgall's second Life, cap. 13. "Constituitque magnum monasterium, quod vocatur Benchor in regione, quae dicitur Altitudo Ultorum (Ardes) juxta mare orientale; et maxima multitudo monachorum illuc venit ad S. Comgallum, ut non potuissent esse in uno loco; et inde plurimas cellas et multa monasteria non solum in regione Ultorum sed per alias Hiberniae provincias; et in diversis cellis et monasteriis tria millia monachorum sub cura sancti patris Comgelli erant. Sed major et nominatior caeteris locis praedictum monasterium Benchor est, ubi clara civitas in honore S. Comgelli aedificata est." By regione Ultorum in this passage is to be understood the particular territory anciently called Ulidia, and by other provinces of Ireland various districts in the Northern parts; for, although in the course of time Comgall's rule might have been observed far and wide throughout Ireland, yet it is to be supposed that during his life time it did not extend beyond such places as it would have been convenient for him to visit in person. One of those subordinate monasteries was at Cambos, now Camus, on the river Bann in the barony of Coleraine. (See Archdall at Camus.) It is mentioned by Adamnan (Vit. S. Col. L. 1. c. 49. Colgan's ed.) Usher expressed (p. 1009) a doubt whether Comgall of Bangor was the same as he of Cambos, whom he found called Congell. As to the name being spelled Congell, it can create no difficulty; whereas we often find it so written, where there can be no doubt of our Comgall being the person spoken of. In Colgan's edition of Adamnan (loc. cit.) we have not Congell but Comgell; and in his notes on that chapter he supposed, and indeed justly, that he was no other than Comgall of Bangor. Usher, in consequence of his doubt, mentions (Ind. Chron. ad A. 580) a Congell of Cambos as if distinct from the great Comgall of Bangor. There is no reason for admitting this distinction, and I have observed thus much, lest the reader might be led astray by the great authority of Usher.

(202) This fact is thus recorded in the Acts of St. Fintan of Clonenagh, cap. 18. "Cormacus filius Diarmadae multo tempore vixit in regno Lageniensium (australiū), et in senectute spreto regno apud S. Coemgallum abbatem in provincia Ultoniae in monasterio de Beanchoir monachus factus suam vitam sancte finivit.”

(203) In the Life of St. Malachy, cap. 5. St. Bernard writes; “Ipsū quoque locū Benchor tradidit ei princeps, ut aedificaret ibi monasterium, vel potius reaedificaret. Nempe nobilissimū extiterat ante sub primo patre Cōngello, multa millia monachorum generans, multorum monasteriorum caput. Locus vere sanctus foecundusque sanctorum, copiosissime fructificans Deo, ita ut unus ex filiis sanctae illius congregationis, nomine Luanus, centum solus monasteriorum fundato rexitisse feratur—Hiberniam Scotiamque repleverunt genimina ejus—Nec modo in praefatas, sed in exterās etiam regiones, quasi inundatione facta, illa se sanctorum examina effuderunt; e quibus ad has nostras Gallicanas partes sanctus Columbanus ascendens Lexoviense construxit monasterium, factus ibi in gentem magnam—Haec de antiqua dicta sint Benchorensis monasterii gloria.”

(204) Usher, p. 917. See above Not. 59.

(205) Usher, p. 956. Where this regio Heth lay I cannot rightly discover. If it was the same as the Heth mentioned in the Acts of Brendan of Clonfert (above §. 7.) it must have been in Brittany. But it appears more probable that the Britain, to which Comgall repaired, was Great Britain. Perhaps Heth, instead of being the proper name of a territory, means a tract lying near the sea. Baxter in his Glossary (at Lemanis) explains Hithe, the name of a place in Kent, as signifying coast or sea-shore. In Lhuyd's Armoric Vocabulary Aut is translated sea-shore, bank of a river, &c. The Heth, in which Comgall is said to have been, was a maritime district, for, as stated in his Acts, some Pictish pirates made an attack on the monastery. This circumstance of Pictish pirates induces me to think, that it was rather in Great Britain, and most probably in the North of it, than in Brittany, as it is not easy to believe, that the Picts would have in those times carried their predatory excursions so far from their own country. Eday, one of the Orkney islands, is called Hethy by Camden, col. 1469. But Comgall's Heth is not called an island.

(206) See Not. 118. In this supposition it is clear that Bangor could not have been founded as early as the year 555, whereas the seventh year following would have been 562. Now Columbkil did not leave Ireland until 563; and he had spent some not very short time in the Western isles before he was visited there by Comgall.

(207) Usher, Ind. Chron. The Annals of Innisfallen, adhering in this case to the more general mode of reckoning the Christian era, have; “A. 601. Quies Congoll Benchor.” The 4 Masters A. have 600, that is, 601; and add that Comgal governed Bangor for 50 years, 3 months, and 10 days. (See AA. SS. p. 42t.) They supposed that the monastery was erected in 522 (above Not. 199), in which computation they were certainly wrong.

(208) Colgan (AA. SS. p. 406.) has; “S. Fiachrius abbas de Congbail in Gleann-suilige in Tirconallia, et abbas etiam de Cluaineraid.” He places him between the years 587 and 652. Congbail is now called Conwall, and is in the county of Donegall. (See Archdall ad loc.) Whether Fiachra was only abbot of Congbail, or had already removed to Clonard, when he attended St. Comgall in his last illness, I cannot determine. In the second Life of Comgall the Fiachra, who gave him the viaticum, is said to have been from Idrone near the river Barrow.

(209) See Not. 56 to Chap. II.

(210) See Ware and Harris, Writers at Comgall.

§. XIII. Next after those saints of the second class, whose history we have endeavoured to illustrate, is mentioned St. Columba usually known by the name of Columbkil. But as an account of the transactions of this extraordinary man cannot be comprized in a few paragraphs, we must defer it for a while, as well as that of several other saints of the same class, lest the thread of our narrative should be too much interrupted. To return therefore to the last year of Tuathal's reign and the early part of that of Diermit, (211) the death of St. Enda of Arran (212) may be assigned to about the year 542, as he died not long after Kieran of Clonmacnois left his monastery. (213) His immediate successor as abbot of Arran was probably Benedict, a brother of Kieran of Saigir. (214) Dubtach, archbishop of Armagh is only called

Dubtagh the second, (215) died in 548. (216) I do not find the day of his death marked in our Annals or Calendars. He was succeeded by David son of Guaira Hua Farannais, whose family seems to have been a branch of the illustrious house of the Hua-Fiachraigh of Ulster; and hence probably the reason of this prelate being called, in the Psalter of Cashel, Fiachrius or Hifiachrius. (217) He is said by some to have exercised the functions of Apostolic Legate in Ireland; (218) but this opinion is founded on a mistake, whereas there did not appear any person invested with that title in Ireland until about the end of the eleventh century. (219) David did not long govern the see of Armagh, as he died in the year 551, and was succeeded by Feidlimid Fionn. (220) In the year next after the death of Dubtach the second, viz. in 549, several eminent persons were carried off by the great pestilence, that raged in said year. (221) Besides Kieran of Clonmacnois, of whom we have seen already, St. Tigernach bishop of Clones and Clogher (222) is first mentioned, and his exit is marked at the 4th of April A. D. 549. (223) To the 11th of June, same year, is assigned that of St. Mactalius bishop of Kilcullen, (224) Another saint already treated of, who died in this year, was Sinell or Senchel of Killeigh. (225) To these we have to add St. Odran abbot of Lettrech-Odran, (226) who died on the 2d of October. This saint was a native of that place, and had an intention to lead a religious life in some other part of Ireland. But being advised by Kieran of Saigir to remain in his own town he there erected a monastery, which became very respectable; and as he was a man of great virtue and sanctity, his memory has been highly revered, and thenceforth his name was added to that of the town, so that it was called Lettrech-Odran or Lettir-Odran. (227) Some other distinguished persons have been mentioned as having died in that year; but as to such of them as we have a correct account of, (228) there can be no doubt of their having lived for some time later. One of them is St Columba son of Crimthann, who had been a disciple of Finnian of Clonard, (229) and was the person who administered to him the last rites of the church. (230) He was of a noble and seemingly princely family of Leinster. (231) Of the time he was born or of the transactions of his earlier years I am not able to give an account. This much we know that, having completed his studies, he undertook the direction of three disciples, Coemhan, Fintan, and Mocumin, who followed him whithersoever he went. (232) It is related that, after having spent some time together in other places, they remained for a year at Clonenagh. Columba did not form any establishment there; but, after he had left it to go elsewhere, looking back on it from the adjacent mountain he thought it a very eligible spot for the erection of a monastery, and advised Fintan to settle there, which he accordingly did. (233) Soon after his departure from that place Columba founded the celebrated monastery of Tirdaglas, (234) and probably about the year 548. (235) He did not govern it long, as he died in the year 552. (236) The day assigned for his death is the 13th of December. (237) He was buried at Tirdaglas, (238) and, according to every appearance, was succeeded in the government of that monastery by one of his disciples, the above-mentioned Mocumin. (239)

(211) Above §. 5.

(212) See Chap. VIII. §. 7.

(213) In the last chapter of Enda's Acts at 21st March, the day of his death, it is related that having accompanied Kieran to the sea-side on his leaving Arran, and with tears in his eyes foretold the unhappy state, to which that and the neighbouring islands would be reduced at a future period, he returned to the monastery and, after recommending his soul to the Almighty God, departed this life. We have seen (§. 11.) that Kieran founded the monastery of Inisaingin not long after his departure from Arran, and that this foundation took place, very probably, in the year 542.

(214) The Calendar of Cashel, quoted by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 472) has at 10th June; “Benedictus filius Luagnei—comorbanus sive successor Endei Arranensis, et frater Kierani Sagiensis. Ipse est Papa, quem ferunt esse insulo Arannensi.” In this passage it is not expressly stated, that Benedict was the immediate successor of Enda; but considering the period, in which his brother Kieran lived (above §. 2), it is very probable that he was. Here we have an additional proof to show, that the foolish stories about Kieran having been contemporary with St. Patrick are not worthy of the least credit. It is somewhat remarkable that the title Papa, which in ancient times was used for bishops indiscriminately, is in that passage given to a simple abbot. It means father in general, as observed by Walafr. Strabo, De rebus eccl. cap. 7. “Papa paternitatis nomen est.” Thus the Greeks call every priest Papas or Pappas.

(215) See above §. 1.

(216) (Tr. Th. p. 293. Ware, Bishops, &c. The 4 Masters quoted by Colgan (ib.) have A. 547, viz. the same year as our 548. It is tiresome to find Harris still referring to the 4 Masters as if in opposition to Ware, whereas their dates are in reality the same.

(217) See Tr. Th. p. 292, 293.

(218) Tr. Th. ib. and AA. SS. p. 191.

(219) It is, as will be seen elsewhere, plain from the testimony of St. Bernard, that Gillibert, bishop of Limerick, was the first Apostolic Legate appointed for Ireland. It may be that David, as primate and then sole metropolitan of Ireland, made a general visitation of the churches throughout the kingdom; and, if so, the recollection of it might, in later times, have induced people to think, that he had acted in virtue of legatine authority.

(220) Tr. Th. p. 293. Ware, &c.

(221) Annals of the 4 Masters, and AA. SS. p. 150, 191, and 831,

(222) See Chap. ix. §. 2.

(223) The 4 Masters, according to their mode of computation, have 548, i. e. 549. Usher assigned, I know not on what authority, Tigernach's death to 550 (Ind. Chron.) Ware (Bishops at Clogher) has A. 550 or 549. The latter date is mentioned over and over by Colgan; and yet Harris makes him place Tigernach's death in 550, not reflecting that the passage he referred to was merely one of Usher's quoted by Colgan. But every where else, as in the pages already pointed at (Not. 221.) Colgan adheres to the 4 Masters.*

(224) See Chap. VIII. §. 2. If Mactalius was the same person as Mactaleus, one of St. Patrick's disciples in Tirechan's list (See Not. 33 and 35 to Chap. VII.) he must have lived to a very great age, even supposing that he was little more than a boy at the time of our Apostle's death. The real name of the saint is said by some to have been Eugenius, while others call him Aengus, and made him the son of one Eugenius, a carpenter, on which account he was surnamed Mactail, or son of the ax. (See Tr. Th. p. 185.)

(225) See Chap. IX. §. 3.

(226) It is now called Latteragh, a village in the barony of Upper Ormond, county of Tipperary.

(227) First Life of Kieran of Saigir, cap. 28. It is odd that Harris has overlooked this monastery. Archdall has it (at Latteragh), and adds that Odran there presided over 3000 scholars. This is really a ludicrous mistake, founded on an omission in Congal's printed text (AA. SS. p. 191), where, after mention being made of Odran's death in the year 548 (549), one or two lines have, through bad management of the press, slipped out, in which Finnian of Clonard was spoken of. Then Colgan refers to the catalogue of saints published by Usher, in the second class of which, as we have seen, Finnian is named, and to his 3000 scholars, &c. poor Archdall not having found Finnian's name prefixed to this detail, and seeing that Odran's appeared next before it, made over to him all Finnian's scholars, &c. notwithstanding Colgan's reference to Usher, his quotation of a hymn in Finnian's Office, and other circumstances too clear to be misunderstood by any one of common sense. Archdall has, on this point, led astray Seward. (Topogr. Hibern. at Latteragh.)

228 The 4 Masters, quoted by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 150, and 831,) assign to said year the death of a St. Columba of Iniskeltra, an island of Lough-Derg in the Shannon. This is evidently a mistake; for there was no religious house in Iniskeltra until, as Colgan himself informs us (ib. p. 746), the seventh century, when the celebrated St. Camin erected there a monastery. Yet he goes still further than the 4 Masters, and (Tr. Th. p. 269) reckons this Columba, who probably never existed, among the disciples of St. Patrick. And why? For no other reason, that I can discover, except that he was supposed not to have survived the year 548 (549). Upon the same notable foundation he makes Tigernach of Clones, Dubtach the second of Armagh, and several others, who were said to have died about that time, equally disciples of our Apostle, as if every one, that lived until 549, should have been under his tuition.

(229) Finnian's Acts, cap. 19.

(230) Ib. cap. 20. and above §. 5.

(231) In the very beginning of his Life as quoted by Ware (Writers L. 1. c. 13. in Harris' ed. c. 15.), he is said to have been born of a noble family in Leinster; but in the 5th chapter he and Columkill are spoken of as sons of kings. See (Tr. Th. p. 457.) He was probably of the royal blood of Hy-kinsela, to which several princes of the name of Crimthann belonged.

(232) Acts of Fintan of Clonenagh, cap. 3. Coemban was afterwards abbot of Enach-trim or Annatrim in the Queen's county; Fintan was he of Clonenagh; and Mocumen became abbot of Tirdaglas after the death of Columba. See also Usher, p. 962, and Ind. Chron. ad A. 550.

(233) Fintan's Acts, capp. 4, 5. From this account it appears that Colgan was mistaken (AA. SS. p. 356) in making Columba the first abbot of Clonenagh. He had simply lived there for one year in retirement with his three disciples, until, their tranquillity being broken in upon by the crowds of their friends and other persons that used to visit them, he thought fit to leave it. But there was no monastery at Clonenagh before that founded by Fintan, as is evident from his Acts, ib. Archdall has (at Tirdaglas) copied Colgan's mistake; and (at Clonenagh) in direct opposition to Colgan, gives us an absurd and contrary one of his own; for, after stating that this monastery was founded by Fintan, he makes Columba succeed him there as abbot. It would require a book as big as Archdall's to correct all his blunders.

(234) In the barony of Lower Ormond, county of Tipperary, near Lough-Derg of the Shannon. It is odd that Ware has omitted this monastery, although it continued for many centuries. Harris has it in his Monastic tables, but, instead of naming the founder, only mentions an abbot of it in the 7th century.

(235) As Columba did not erect this monastery until after parting with Fintan, whom he left at Clonenagh, we cannot assign the commencement of it to a period earlier than that of the foundation of the house of Clonenagh, which, as we have seen (Not. 192), cannot consistently be placed before about 548.

(236) In his Acts it is stated that he died in the same year with Finnian of Clonard. Now Finnian died in 552. (above §. 5.) The 4 Masters place Columba's death in 548 (549), for no other reason, I suspect, than their having erroneously assigned that also of Finnian to said year. (See Not. 74.) Knowing that both these saints were supposed to have died in one and the same year, they accordingly marked this date for the death of Columba. But this very coincidence might have taught them, that Finnian lived later than 549. Considering Columba's and Fintan's proceedings, as just before remarked on, it is clear that the monastery of Tirdaglas was scarcely well established in that year. Unless then we are to admit that he died about its very commencement, for which there is no authority, it is but fair to allow that he governed it for at least three years, so as to be able to give it that stability, which it certainly acquired. The date 552 agrees very well with these circumstances, and thus we find confirmed that assigned for the death of Finnian.

(237) Ware, Writers, L. 1. c. 13. Harris' ed. c. 15. It cannot but seem rather singular, that he died but one day later than his friend and master Finnian, whose death is usually assigned to the 12th of December. (above §. 5.) It is indeed natural to suppose that Columba survived him, as he had administered to him the holy viaticum, or, as Finnian's Acts express it (cap. 20) the sacrifice, and that at the hour of his death; "sacrificium in hora exitus animae." Perhaps Finnian died of some contagious disease, which might have been communicated to Columba. Or is it certain, that Finnian died so late in the year as the 12th of December? I really doubt it. Perhaps the real day of his death was the 23d of February, on which his memory was celebrated at Clonard, and to which belongs his Office published at Paris and afterwards by Colgan. (See AA. SS. p. 402.)

(238) In the Acts of Fintan of Clonenagh (cap. 3.) we read concerning Columba; “Jacet in sua civitate, quae dicitur Tyrdaglas, in terra Momoniae juxta flumen Sionna.”

(239) He was otherwise called Natchoem or Mochoemin, and was brother to St. Coemgen of Glendaloch. (AA. SS. p. 586.) He is constantly called abbot of Tirdaglas, and died on the first of May, A. D. 584 (585). Ib. p. 193. Of him likewise we read in Fintan's Acts (loc. cit.); “B. Mocumin, qui est (requiescit) cum S. Columba magistro suo in civitate Tyrdaglas.”

§. XIV. Several other persons, concerning whom less is known than of some of those last treated of, are mentioned as having died or been distinguished about these times. St. Mobhy or Mobius surnamed Clairineach, that is, lame, abbot of Glas-naidhen in the now county of Kildare, is said to have died on the 12th of October, A. D. 545. (240) He is reckoned among the relatives of St. Brigid, (241) and studied under Finnian of Clonard, among whose principal disciples he is expressly named. (242) What time he established his monastery, or what remarkable transactions he was concerned in, no account, that I can meet with, has come down to our days. (243) If it be true that he died in 545, we may conclude that his life was rather short, unless we should suppose, for which there is no authority, that he was far advanced in years, when he became a disciple of Finnian. A St. Diermit, who is said to have founded the monastery of Glean-ussen, (244) must be placed in the period we are now treating of; whereas he was succeeded by St. Comgan, who died before the year 570. (245) St. Dagaëus also, who was bishop at Iniscaoin-Deghadh, (246) belongs to these times, if he was the same as Dagaëus or Daygeus, from whom St. Moctheus of Louth received the holy viaticum. (247) For in this case he must have been, at least, a priest in 535, the year of Moctheus' death; (248) and it will also follow that he lived to a good old age, as, according to our Annalists, he did not die until 587. (249) He is said to have been of the royal blood of Neill Neigilliach, and to have distinguished himself by his assiduity in transcribing sacred books, and ingenuity in making elegant covers for them, as also utensils and bells for the service of the church, many of which he distributed gratis in various parts of Ireland. (250) A college or monastery is mentioned as governed by him; (251) and it has been related that he performed several great miracles. (252) St. Corpreus, or Carbreus, bishop of Coleraine, is said to have flourished about the year 540, (253) and to have been contemporary with Tigernach of Clones, whose school-fellow he had been in Britain under the abbot Nennio or Monennus. (254) He was the son of Degill and grandson of Nad-Sluagh, a dynast of the country about Coleraine, who was a Christian in St. Patrick's time, and had received the saint with great respect and veneration. (255) Corpreus was consecrated bishop by Brugacius, who had been consecrated by St. Patrick. (256) He fixed his see at Coleraine; but I do not find any mention of his having established a monastery in that place. (257) The year of his death is not known; the day marked for it, or at least for his commemoration, is the 11th of November. Nor were there wanting in those times holy women and virgins, who presided over nunneries and directed the Christian education of females. To several of them already mentioned (258) we may here add St. Regnach or Regnacia, sister of the great Finnian of Clonard, (259) and abbess of the house called from her name Kill-regnaigne. (260) One of her eleves St. Lasra became distinguished not only for piety, but for knowledge, having been instructed by Finnian, and afterwards erected a church in her own country at Doire-mac-Aidmecain. (261) But of the female saints of that period by far the most eminent was St. Ita, with an account of whom we shall begin the following chapter.

(240) The 4 Masters have (ap AA. SS. p. 191.); “A. 544 (545) S. Mobhius cognomento Clairineach, qui et Berchanus, abbas de Glas-naidhen in Campo-Liffe, obiit 12 Oct.” The Campus-Liffe, or Magh-liffe, i. e. the plain of the Liffey was, as elsewhere observed (Chap. vi. §. 5. Not. 43.) the level part of the county of Kildare, through which that river flows. Colgan says (Tr. Th. p. 613.) that Glas-naidhen was in the territory of Galenga near the Liffey. If so, it was on the south side of the river, whereas the tract, anciently called Galen or Caëlan, is said to have been bounded by the Liffey on the North. (See Rawson’s Introd. to Stat. Survey of Kildare.) As to Mobhy having been called also Berchan, it does not enable us to discover any thing particular concerning him, as we find several other persons under that name in those early times.

(241) Tr. Th. p. 613. (242) Acts of Finnian, cap. 19.

(243) Were we to believe O’Donnel (Life of Columbkil, L. 1. cap. 43.) Mobhy would have had under his care at Glas-naidhen not only this saint, but likewise Cannich, Comgall, and Kieran of Clonmacnois. Without entering into further particulars it is sufficient to recollect what we have already seen concerning Comgall having been at Clonenagh, and Kieran in Arran at the very time alluded to by O’Donnel. In the Acts of these saints no mention is made of their having studied under Mobhy. Kieran and Cannich were certainly acquainted with him, as they also had been at Finnian’s school. And thus is to be accounted for whatever tradition there might have been as to their connexion with Mobhy.

(244) Colgan says (AA. SS. p. 417.), that this monastery was in Hy-barche in West Leinster. Archdall places it (at Gleane) in the King’s county; but Harris has it in the Queen’s county, where it is more probable that it was situated. For, Hy-barche seems to have been the district adjoining Carlow and comprehending the country about Sletty. (See Not. 131. to Chap. ix.) This St. Diermit, concerning whom we find no further account, must not be confounded with Diermit of Inisclothan. His memory was revered on the 8th of July.

(245) St. Comgan was, according to Colgan, who treats of him (at 27th February, p. 417), of the illustrious house of the Dalcassians in Thomond. Some have said that, by his mother’s side, he was nephew to Columbkil. But Colgan shews (Tr. Th. p. 478.), that this is a mistake. He erected a church in his own country on a hill called Cleann-indis or, the head of Indis; but whether before or after he became abbot of Glean-ussen we are not informed, His death preceded that of St. Ita, who died in 570. The precise year of it is not known, nor had Archdall any authority for assigning it to 563.

(246) This place was in the territory of Orgiel or Oriel, and in Colgan's time it had only a parish church. (AA. SS. p. 348.) Archdall calls it Iniskin, and places it in the upper half barony of Dundalk, county of Louth. Deghadh was probably the bishop's real name, which has been latinized into Dagaeus; so that Iniscaoin-Deghadh means the Iniscaoin of Dagaeus, and was thus distinguished from Iniscaoin an island in Lough-Erne.

(247) Life of Mochtheus, cap. 21. This Daggeus is called bishop, ib. cap. 20. But it does not appear that he was one, when he attended Mochtheus in his last illness.

(248) See Chap. ix. §. 13.

(249) The 4 Masters, quoted by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 732), have; A. 586 (587) "Dagaeus episcopus, filius Carelli, obiit die 18 Aug." Supposing him to have lived to between 80 and 90 years of age, he might have been the person, that attended Mochtheus. Colgan (at 19 Feb.) treats briefly of a bishop Dagacus, whose name was generally marked in the Calendars at that day. He thinks it very probable that he was no other than the Dagaeus, named at the 18th of August. It is not unusual to meet with more than one festival marked for one and the same saint.

(250) See AA. SS. p. 374.

(251) Ib. p. 344.

(252) Ib. p. 374.

(253) Ib. Ind. Chron.

(254) Ib. p. 438. See Chap. ix. §. 2.

(255) Tr. Th. p. 148.

(256) Ib. Brugacius is said to have been bishop at a place called Rath-Mugeaonaich, which Colgan (ib. p. 183) conjectured to be the same as Rath-muighe, alias Airthur-muighe. But it is probable that there was no bishop at Rathmuighe in St. Patrick's time, as the first person, who was bishop there, seems to have been Olcan. (See Chap. viii. §. 6.) Colgan, to patch up the business, adds another conjecture (AA. SS. p. 377), viz. that Brugacius was placed there by St. Patrick after Olcan's demise. Archdall (at Rathmuighe) follows Colgan. This evasion will not do; for, as has been observed in the chapter just referred to, Olcan himself could not have been a bishop until after St. Patrick's death. Either those places were different, or there is some mistake with regard to what is said of Brugacius having been consecrated by St. Patrick. His name is in the Calendars at 1st November.

(257) Harris marks a monastery at Coleraine without the name of any founder, and assigns it to the 5th century, for which he had no authority. It is plain from Tr. Th., p. 148, that there was no religious establishment there of any kind, either see or monastery, until Corpreus became bishop, which he certainly did not until some time in the sixth century. We find in later times a monastery at Coleraine; but there is no account of its having been founded by Corpreus. (See below Not. 222 to Chap. XII)

(258) Ex. c. St. Cannera, above Not. 18. Liadania, §. 2. Briga §. 7. St. Brigid of Cluan-in-fidi, Not. 65 to Chap. IX.

(259) Finnian's Life, cap. 21.

(260) The place is now called Reynagh, and is near Banagher in the King's county.

(261) Finnian's Life, cap. 22. Doire-macAidmecain signifies the wood (of oak) of the sons of Aidmecain. Colgan confesses that he could not discover where it was situated; yet in his Ind. Topogr. to AA. SS. he places it in Meath, for no other reason, I am sure, than that he thought it was in the same province with Kill-regnaighe, which was in the ancient Meath. But from the manner, in which both places are spoken of in Finnian's life, it would appear that they were rather far distant from each other; and, even if they were not, there are parts of Connaught and Munster much nearer to Kill-regnaighe than very many places in Meath.

CHAPTER XI.

St. Ita—Her birth—Establishes a nunnery at Cluain Credhuil—Her miracles—Several actions of her life—St. Senan—St. Carthagh the elder—Abbot Nesson founder of the monastery of Mungret—Life of St. Columbkil—His first name Crimthán changed to Columba—Goes to the school of St. Finnian of Maghbil—Studies under German in Leinster—and at Clonard under St. Finnian—Founds Doire Calgach—and Dairmagh or Durrough—Ordained priest by St. Etchen of Cluainbile—Founded a monastery at Kells—Many monasteries said to have been founded by him—Unfounded story of Finnian's manuscript—of king Diermit's decision—and the defeat of his army through the prayers of St. Columba—St. Columba goes to Hy, and founds a monastery and church there—Founds monasteries in the island of Ethica—Visits Skey—Superintends the ecclesiastical affairs of the British Scots—Visits St. Kentigern, bishop of Glasgow—Inaugurates Aidan as king of the British Scots.

SECT. I.

ST. Ita, (1) who may justly be called the St. Brigid of Munster, was of the princely house of the Desii or Nandesii, in the now county of Waterford. Her father's name was Kennfoelad, her mother's Necta. (2) They were Christians, as appears from St. Ita having been baptized in her childhood. (3) The time of her birth is not recorded; but it must have been some years prior to A. D. 484, if it be true that she had for some time under her care Brendan of Clonfert when an infant. (4) Yet, unless we are to suppose that she lived to an extraordinary great age, only a few years can be allowed for this priority of birth, and on the whole it may be laid down that she was born about the year 480. From her earliest year she appeared animated with the Holy Spirit, observing, besides other religious duties, even the fasts prescribed by the Church, and displayed an extraordinary degree of modesty, sedateness, and suavity of temper. It is related that, while she was still very young, a room, in which she was asleep, seemed to be all in a blaze, and that some persons, who hastened to extinguish what they thought to be fire, found it uninjured, and observed Ita, on awaking, to exhibit an Angelical form of exquisite beauty. Having reached the age fit for choosing a permanent state of life she applied to her mother, and, after expatiating on the divine commandments, requested of her to procure her father's permission to consecrate herself to Christ. The mother acted according to her request, but the father obstinately refused to comply with her wish, particularly as a noble and powerful young man had just made him a proposal for obtaining her in marriage. Ita then said to some people about her; "let my father have his own way for a while; I tell you that he will soon not only permit but order me to give myself up to Christ, and will allow me to go whithersoever I please for the purpose of serving God." Not long after she fasted for three days and nights, during which time she was assailed with constant attacks of the enemy of mankind, which she resisted with invincible firmness. On the third night her father was admonished in a vision not to oppose her inclination any longer; and accordingly without loss of time, after informing her of what had occurred to him, he advised her to take the veil immediately. Matters being thus settled she repaired to the church, and was there in due form clothed with the veil and enrolled in the list of consecrated virgins. (5) Some time after she prayed the Almighty to direct her in what place she might best serve him, and was instructed in a vision to proceed to the territory of Hy-Conaill and to remain in the western part of it at the foot of the mountain Luachra. (6) Thither she went and fixed her residence in a retired spot, called Cluain-Credhuil, where she was soon visited by a number of pious maidens, who flocked from all parts of the territory to place themselves under her direction. Thus her nunnery was established in a short time, and it was most probably the first in that part of Ireland. (7)

(1) This saint's name is sometimes spelled Ida; for, as Colgan observes, the latter Irish writers often use d instead of the t of the ancients. Her being called Mida is easily understood, as it is merely a compound of the particle indicating affection and the name Ida. Instead of Ita, Ida, Mida, we meet with Ite, Ide, Mide. It has been written also Ytha; but all these are still the same name. The Life of St. Ita, which has been published by Colgan at 15 Jan. is very ancient, and is acknowledged as such even by the Bollandists, who thought it might have been written by the author of the Life of St. Pulcherius, and accordingly in the seventh century. (See Comment. Praev. ad Vit. S. Pulcher. 13 Mart.) Ware says (Writers L. 1. c. 2.) that the author lived in the close of the sixth century.

(2) AA. SS. p. 72.

(3) Life of St. Ita, cap. 1.

(4) See Not. 101 to Chap. x. Brendan is spoken of several times in St. Ita's Life, without any allusion to this part of his history, which is to be found only in what is called his own Life, a document much less respectable than the other.

(5) Life, cap. 5. It is not improbable that St. Declan of Ardmore was the bishop, from whom she received the veil. The time of her receiving it seems to have been in the early part of the sixth century, and when Declan presided over the Nandesi country.

(6) Luachra was rather a name of the district, in which that mountain is, than of the mountain itself. (See Not. 84 to Chap. vi.) A part of Hy-Conaill was so called apparently from its abounding in rushes. The barony of Connello or Connillo, in the county of Limerick, is the ancient Hy-Conaill or, at least part of it. The southern division of this barony, or Upper Connello, was distinguished by the additional name Gaura, being called Hy-Conaill Gaura, and in a western part of this tract St. Ita formed her establishment.

(7) We may be allowed to suppose, that the want of a similar institution in those western parts was, in the order of Providence, the cause of St. Ita having been directed to settle there. Nunneries and establishments for the education of females had in all appearance, been formed already in her own country, particularly as St. Brigid had been there for some time. (See Chap. VIII. §. 4. and ib. Not. 54.)

§. II. The chieftain and other principal persons of Hy-Conaill, on being informed of the extraordinary sanctity of St. Ita, waited upon her and offered to her a large tract of land around the house for the support of her establishment. She refused to accept of more than a small spot sufficient for a garden.

(8) As another instance of her disinterestedness it is related that, a wealthy man having laid before her, as an offering, a considerable sum of money, which he could not induce her to receive, she happened to touch it and then called for water to wash the hand, which had been as it were defiled by the contact of corruptible silver. She carried abstinence and fasting to such a pitch that it is said she was cautioned by an angel to be less abstemious for the future, and not to exhaust her frame by such excessive austerity. Several miracles, some of which are of an extraordinary kind, have been attributed to her. One of them is said to have been performed on a man called Feargus, whom she delivered by her prayers from excruciating pains in his eyes and whole body, which had brought him to almost the last extremity. (9) She was favoured with the gift of prophecy, and with the knowledge of persons, whom she had never seen, and of distant and secret occurrences. When Columbanus, a Leinster bishop, was on his way to pay her a visit without his having given her any previous notice of it, she ordered an entertainment to be prepared, and on his arrival sent to ask for his episcopal benediction, before she could have known in an ordinary manner that he was a bishop, and mentioned other circumstances, which she could not have been apprized of except by supernatural means. A theft had been committed in a nunnery at a place called Dirco-Chuisgrigh. (10) One of the nuns was unjustly accused of it; but, as the matter was very obscure, the abbess and the whole community waited upon St. Ita to consult her. She immediately declared that the nun charged with the theft was innocent, and told them who was the guilty one. One of her own maidens had misbehaved and, having left the nunnery, rambled up and down until she was reduced to become a servant maid somewhere in Connaught. St. Ita, knowing by inspiration how she was situated and that she would do penance, if she had a proper opportunity, sent to her friend Brendan then at Clonfert to request that he would procure the poor creature's liberty. He accordingly did so, and sent her back to the nunnery, where St. Ita received her with great joy; and every thing turned out as she had foreseen. She had a knowledge of some transactions even of the other world, a very remarkable instance of which is thus related. An uncle of her's having died, she sent for his eight sons, who lived in the Nandesi country, and, upon their waiting on her, said to them; "Your father, who was my uncle, is, alas! now suffering in the lower regions for his transgressions; (11) and the manner, in which he is tormented, has been revealed to me. But let us do something for the good of his soul, that he may be delivered. I therefore desire that each of you do give, every day during this whole year, food and lamps to the poor for the benefit of his soul, and then at the end of the year return to me."

They, being wealthy, acted according to her injunction ; and, on their returning, she said ; “ Your father is half raised out of his situation through your alms and my prayers ; now go and repeat your donations during this year, and come to me again.” They did so, and then she told them that their father was quite out of the lower world, but that he was still without clothing, (12) because in his life time he had not given clothes to any one in the name of Christ. “ Now,” she said, “ let your alms for this year consist of clothes, that he may be clothed.” Having obeyed her orders they returned at the end of the year, and were informed by her that, through the great mercy of God, their alms and her prayers had been attended to, and that their father was then in the enjoyment of eternal rest. (13)

(8) Life, cap. 7. The text has “ quatuor jugera in usus hortorum.” According to a vulgar mode of translation this might be rendered four acres, &c. But I am not able to define the quantity of ground contained in the ancient Irish juger or acre.

(9) Ib. cap. 25. The author of the Life says, that the son of said Feargus was living in his time. This is one of the arguments adduced by Colgan and others for its antiquity.

(10) This place, of which no further account occurs, must have been, as appears from the narrative, not far from Cluain-Credhuil. The nunnery there was, in all probability, a branch of St. Ita’s institution.

(11) The words in the text are ; “ Heu nobis ! in poenis infernalibus pro commisis suis torquetur.” The phrase, infernal pains, affords a very strong proof of the antiquity of the Life, whereas for many centuries back the Western Church has, instead of it, generally expressed such pains by the name of purgatory. A similar phrase is still retained in one of the prayers of the Mass for the dead ; “ Libera Domine animas omnium fidelium defunctorum de poenis inferni, et de profundo lacu,” &c. I need not tell the reader that the infernus, or infernalibus in the now quoted passages do not refer to the hell of the damned, out of which the Church never expected any deliverance. This manner of speaking was used in consequence of an opinion held by many theologians, that not only the devils and the damned, but likewise the souls in a state of purgation are confined in subterraneous regions, yet with this difference, that the former are kept in its lowermost and deepest parts, while the place for the latter, although contiguous to it, is supposed to be higher up. (See Bellarmin De Purgatorio, Lib. 2, cap. 6.) But, as this place was still considered as under the earth, the name infernus, which signifies a lower region or tract, was often applied to it, in the same manner as it has been used also for the grave. Tertullian alluding to a soul, which would at last be removed to heaven, writes (Lib. de Anima, cap. 17.); “In carcerem te mandet infernum, unde non dimittaris, nisi modico quoque delicto mora resurrectionis expenso.”

(12) This means that, although he was freed from the purgatorial sufferings, yet his soul was not as yet in a state fit for enjoying the beatific vision and that heavenly clothing, of which St. Paul says, 2 Cor. v. 2. We groan desiring to be clothed over with our habitation, which is from heaven.

(13) Life, cap. 26.

§. III. This holy virgin had been once as far as Clonmacnois, and there received the body and blood of Christ from the hand of a worthy priest without its being known who she was. On its being afterwards discovered that she had been there, the priest, who had immolated the host which she received, (14) set out, with some other persons of the clerical order, for Cluain-Credhuil for the purpose of getting her blessing. One of them lost his sight on the way, but on their arrival at the nunnery, recovered it immediately through the intercession of St. Ita. She asked the same priest to sing mass in her presence, which done, she ordered the vestments, in which he had just immolated to be given to him. He said he could not take them, whereas their abbot Aeneas (15) had commanded them not to accept of any thing from her except her prayers. She answered that he would not be displeas'd at it, and then mentioned a circumstance, which she desired them to communicate to him, adding, that the abbot on hearing it would receive her present with joy. This induced the priest and his companions to take the vestments; and the affair ended as she told them it would. (16) Other holy abbots also of those times held her in high veneration. St. Comgan, supposed to be Comgan of Glean-ussen, (17) finding his end approaching, sent for St. Ita, and, in the persuasion that her attendance would be conducive to his eternal happiness, prevail'd upon her to lay her hands upon his lips and to close his mouth at the moment of his death. (18) She was often visited by St. Luchtigherna abbot of Inistymon, (19) who on one occasion brought with him St. Lasrean abbot of Druimliag, (20) who not being known to the nuns was not welcomed by them at the gate. But St. Ita, although she had never seen him before, told them who he was and that he was as holy a man as Luchtigherna. (21) The great St. Brendan did not think it beneath him to consult her on the nature of Christian duties, and her answers were full of wisdom and discretion. (22) This extraordinary virgin, having reached a great age, called together her nuns, and told them that her end was near at hand. Not long after she was taken ill, and having given her blessing to them, and to the clergy and people of Hy-Conaill, departed this life on the 15th of January A. D. 570. (23) A crowd of people from the whole country assembled around her remains, and several miracles took place on the occasion. They were then deposited in her own monastery. The clergy and people of Hy-Conaill took St. Ita for their patron saint; (24) but the veneration, in which she has been held, extended far beyond that territory. (25)

(14) "Qui immolavit hostiam, quam suscepit S. Ita."

(15) See Not. 184 to Chap. x.

(16) Life, cap. 17.

(17) See Chap. x. §. 14.

(18) From this anecdote it may be inferred that Comgan, although he had been abbot at Glean-ussen, ended his days in Thomond, his own country, and probably at Ceann-indis. (See Not. 245 to Chap. x. For it is hard to think, that he would have given St. Ita the trouble of going so great a distance as that between Glean-ussen and Cluain-Credhuil. On the other hand Ceann-indis could not be very far from the latter place, and was probably within a few miles of it, being separated by perhaps little more than the Shannon.

(19) In the barony of Corcomroe, county of Clare. The Irish Calendars mark the Natalis of St. Luch-tigherna at the 28th of April.

(20) This was most probably the same place as Drumlegagh in Kerry, where was formerly a very large wood, through which flowed the river Feal. (See Seward ad loc.) From this last circumstance it appears, that it was in that part of Kerry, which adjoins the county of Limerick, and consequently not far distant from Cluain Credhuil. It is odd, that Archdall, who has given us many monasteries that never existed, does not mention Druim-liag.

(21) St. Ita's Life, cap. 28. Lasrean is called son of Colman, to distinguish him from others of the same name. He is mentioned in the Calendars at 25 October. Concerning him and Luchtigherna see Colgan AA. SS. p. 72. Of either of them very little is known, except that the latter is said to have been a disciple of Ruadan of Lothra. (ib. p. 197.)

(22) See her Life, cap. 19.

(23) AA. SS. p. 72 The 4 Masters and other Annalists have A. 569, which is the same as our 570.

(24) Life, cap. 33. Another of their patrons was Senan of Iniscatthy; and hence it is said (ib. cap. 6.), that the entire nation of Hy-Conaill was to belong to these two saints.

(25) Alcuin in one of his minor poems joins her with St. Brigid. (See Not. 96 to Chap. ix.) Colgan in the Appendix to her Life has collected divers testimonies and eulogiums to this purpose.

§. IV. Before leaving those western parts of Ireland it will not be amiss to conclude the history of St. Senan, who has been revered as the other great saint of that country, and one of the patrons of Hy-Conaill. (26) From this circumstance it appears, that Senan's jurisdiction, besides some parts to the North of the Shannon, comprized also districts lying on the South and S. E. side of said river. He was, as has been seen, (27) fixed in Iniscatthy since about the year 540, at which time he was rather advanced in life and not less than about 50 years of age. (28) To the account of his acts already given I find nothing worth while to add, until towards the close of his life. It is related that, perceiving the time to be not far distant, when he should leave this world, he determined on going to the monastery of his first master Cassidus or Cassidanus, (29) and to the nunnery of St. Scota, his paternal aunt, the daughter of Cobhthach, that he might apply more fervently to prayer in these retreats and prepare himself for his wished for departure. (30) On his way thither he turned off a little towards the church of Kill-eochaille for the purpose of visiting certain holy virgins, the daughters of one Naereus, who had received the veil from him. (31) Having performed his devotions in the church of St. Cassidus he was returning to Iniscatthy, when in a field near the church of Kill-eochaille he heard a voice announcing to him, that he was to be removed to heaven without delay. Accordingly he died on that very day, and his body remained at Kill-eochaille until the next, when several of the principal members of his monastery arrived and had it brought to Iniscatthy. (32) Notice of his death was then sent to the prelates, clergy, and principal persons of the neighbouring churches, and his obsequies were celebrated for an entire week. On the eighth day, several respectable members of the hierarchy and clergy (33) having come up from other parts, the remains of the saint were deposited in his own church. This was the 8th of March, and to this day has been annexed his festival, although he is generally said to have died on the first. The year of his death is unknown; but there can be no doubt that it was later than 544, which some writers have assigned for it. (34) Among his disciples some are mentioned, who became bishops, such as Dallan, Sedna or Sedonius, Ere, and Mola, concerning whom I find little or nothing recorded. (35) Senan was succeeded in the government of Iniscatthy by Odran, who does not appear to have been raised to the episcopal dignity. (36) The reputation of St. Senan has not been confined to Ireland, and his Acts have been published among those of the saints of Brittany, on the supposition, whether well founded or not, that he was the same as St. Sané, one of the chief patrons of the diocese of St. Pol de Leon. (37) Yet, notwithstanding the great fame of this saint, and in spite of the many monuments still recording his name and transactions in the island of Iniscatthy, a pseudo-antiquary of our days has had the impudence to write, that he was no other than the river Shannon personified. (38)

(26) See Not. 24.

(27) Chap. x. §. 1.

(28) It is probable that he was born about A. D. 488. (See Chap. ix. §. 4.) In the life of Kieran of Clonmacnois (cap. 22. ap. AA. SS. p. 543.) Senan is spoken of as old at the time of his receiving that visit, on which he supplied Kieran with a cloak. (See Not. 175 to Chap. x.) It could not have taken place later than the early part of 549, the year in which Kieran died. If the Brendan, who on another occasion (See Not. cit.) waited, together with Kieran, on Senan, was Brendan of Clonfert, it would follow that Senan was born prior to 484, being represented as older than said Brendan. But it seems more probable that he was Brendan of Birr (See Chap. x. §. 8.), whereas from the manner, in which Kieran and Brendan are spoken of on that occasion, it would appear, that they were both abbots, and lived not very far from each other. This will not answer for Brendan of Clonfert, who was not abbot there until after Kieran's death. (See Not. 110 to Chap. x.) Nor is there any account of his having been, prior to his settling at Clonfert, abbot any where else in Ireland, at least in those parts, which were not far distant from Kieran's establishments of Inis-aingin and Clonmacnois. Brendan of Clonfert was probably in Brittany at the time of this visit to Senan. (See Chap. x. §. 7.) Now every circumstance accords with the supposition, that Brendan of Birr was the person, who then accompanied Kieran. He was, in all probability, an abbot before Kieran died. Birr is within a few miles of Clonmacnois; and, if we should suppose that Kieran was still abbot of Inis-aingin, when he set out for Iniscatthy, Birr lies not much out of the road, by which he must have passed, so that he and Brendan might, with little inconvenience, have met for the purpose of travelling together. What has been now observed will help to clear up two points of the history of Brendan of Birr; 1st. as to the time of his birth, which must be placed after that of Senan, and perhaps about the year 500; 2dly, that of his founding the monastery of Birr, which, in this hypothesis, was prior to the death of Kieran in 549.

(29) See Chap. ix. §. 4. It is not to be imagined that Casidus was alive at this time; but the monastery retained his name.

(30) Second Life of Senan, cap. 42. The nunnery seems to have been not far from the monastery, which was in the district called Irras. (See Not. 52 to Chap. ix.)

(31) Colgan thought that Kill-eochaille might have been the same as Kill-nac-caillech, cell of the nuns, in the county of Clare not far from Iniscatthy; and that the daughters of Naereus were perhaps those of Nateus mentioned by Aengus Kelideus. These conjectures, particularly the former, are very probable; but Archdall had no right (at Kilnagallegh) to change them into positive facts.

(32) Life, cap. 42.

(33) Among them is reckoned in the Second life (cap. 43.) Deron bishop of Limerick. But there was neither a bishop nor city of Limerick in those days. As to the city, Ferrar could not find any thing authentic concerning it until the middle of the 9th century. (Hist. of Limerick, p. 3.) And as to its see, neither Ware nor Harris were able to discover any undoubted bishop there before Gillebert, who lived in the eleventh. For as to St. Munchin or Manchan, it is more than probable that he was not bishop of Limerick; and, even if he was, as some say, its first bishop, the see was not yet formed in Senan's time; whereas Munchin lived in the seventh century. It is to be observed that the author of the Second life lived at a very late period and after the arrival of the English in Ireland, when Limerick had become a respectable city. In the first or metrical life, which is more ancient, the names of the bishops and abbots, who attended at Senan's funeral, are not given.

(34) This is the date assigned by Usher (Ind. Chron.) and, after him, by Harris and Archdall. Usher held that St. David of Wales died in that year; but it has been shown (Chap. ix. §. 9.) that his calculations were wrong, and that St. David was alive many years after. Then having read in the metrical Life of Senan, that he died on the same identical day that David did, he very naturally placed his death also in 544. Upon the same principle Colgan maintains (Not. 19 to said Life at 8 Mart.), that Senan must have lived to, at least, the year 580, whereas David did not die until about that time. I am inclined to think that Senan died some years earlier than David; nor do I find any reason for what is said of their having died in the same year, except that they both happened to die on a first of March. Hence it was said that they died on the same day; and this, instead of being understood relatively to corresponding days of different years, was easily mistaken for one day of one and the same year. The said Life, in which alone this identity of day is mentioned, has a story about David's death having been revealed to Senan at the very moment it happened, and his then lying down to die, whereas they had agreed not to survive each other. This is a strange and incredible story, as if indeed it depended on them to leave this world whenever they pleased; nor is there a word about it in the second Life or in the accounts of Senan given in the Calendars. (See AA. SS. p. 543.) If it were true that Senan had been for some time with St. Maidoc of Ferns, as stated in the second Life (cap. 18.) he should have lived until the latter end of the 6th century. But in this there is a huge anachronism; for his being with Maidoc is placed long before the foundation of Inis-cathly, at which time the latter was not yet born. (See Not. 5. to Chap. x.) It is probable that he died about the year 560; whereas we do not find, that he is said to have lived to a very great age, and it is stated that he was of a sickly constitution. (AA. SS. p. 544.) Nor is he mentioned as having had transactions with any of the eminent saints, who flourished in the South of Ireland after about that time, except Brendan of Birr who died in 571, (See Chap. x. §. 8.) and whose visit to Senan could not have been later than 549. (above Not. 28.) On the other hand it is difficult to suppose that he died much sooner than 560, as from the respectability, to which he raised the monastery of Iniscathly, it is fair to conclude that he governed it for, at least, about 20 years after its foundation about or somewhat prior to A. D. 540.

(35) Colgan treats of Sedna at 10 March. He thinks that he was the same as a St. Sedna, son of Eren, and native of a district in Munster, called Altraighe Cliach. Could it have been in what is now called the barony of Duhallow in the county of Cork? Altraighe is probably a compound of Al and traighe (shore or bank), and thus means the tract lying along the river Al or Allo, which flows through that barony. This Sedna presided over a church at a place called Cluan (not to be confounded with Cloyne) between the mountains Crot and Mairge also in Munster, but was buried at Kinsale. There is a parish called Clonnene in Duhallow, and in it is a range of mountains now called St. Hilary's. (See Smith's Cork, vol. 1. p. 302.) Sedna's being buried in Kinsale was probably owing to his having spent his last days there in the monastery founded by his brother St. Goban, who had been a disciple of the great Ailbe of Emly. Smith is wrong (ib. p. 227.) in making Colgan say that Goban was abbot at Kinsale in the seventh century. The Goban of that century was, as Colgan lays down, a quite different person, and is, together with Goban of Kinsale, treated of by him at 26 March. Archdall (at Kinsale), instead of Sedna, has Senan as buried there. This is, I believe, an error of the press; for (at Cluain) Sedna is the person mentioned. Another brother of Sedna was St. Melteoc, who was revered at Kinsale as one of its patrons on the 11th of December (AA. SS. p. 573.) This is, I dare say, the St. Multos, whose name the parish church of Kinsale bears, and not a female saint, whom Smith (ib.) calls Multosia. As to bishop Erc, Colgan thought he might have been Erc of Domnach-mor-muighe Luadhat. (See Not. 97 to Chap. x.) Concerning Dallan and Mola I can find nothing satisfactory.

(36) In the second life of Senan (cap. 42.) we find Odran joined in the same sentence with Erc and Mola, who are expressly called bishops, while no such title is given to him. Colgan indeed (AA. SS. p. 542) gives it to him, for no other reason, as far I can discover, except his supposing that, as Senan had been a bishop, Odran should have been one also. Harris has, as usual, copied Colgan. (Bishops, p. 502) But there is nothing more common in our Church history of those times than to find some abbots raised to the episcopal rank, although their successors were not. In the very passage (said Life, cap. 43) where the appointment of Odran is particularly mentioned, he is called simply abbot to preside over the monks. Nor had Colgan a better right to state, that he flourished about A. D. 580, as he had no authority for this date except his hypothesis concerning the year of Senan's death. (See above Not. 33.)

(37) Albert Le Grand, who drew up these Acts, was of that opinion. Colgan was not able to come to any decision on the subject. (See AA. SS. p. 528.) Lobineau says (Hist. de Bretagne, Tom. 1, p. 76), that of St. Sané scarcely any thing is known except his name. There is no proof that Senan ever lived in Brittany; but his fame might have easily reached that country, considering the great intercourse then kept up between it and Ireland. (See Chap. ix. §. 12.) Yet, as that was not the land of his residence, it is not to be wondered at, that his history was but imperfectly known there.

(38) The reader will easily guess, that I allude to Ledwich. For who else would dare to announce such a notorious and ridiculous falsehood? He says (Antiq. &c. p. 32; "We had made of the Shannon, saint Senanus; of the town of Down, saint Dunus," &c. This nonsense appears as corroborative of his endeavours to transform St. Kevin into a mountain. (See Not. 147 to Chap. x.) How is it possible to argue against such barefaced lies? Could this charlatan have been so ignorant of Irish history as not to know, that Senan was a very common name of persons in Ireland? Colgan reckons (AA. SS. p. 541) about 20 distinguished men of that name in former times. Surely all these were not the river Shannon. Besides, Senan was not the real name of the river. In Ptolomy's map it is called Senus, but the Irish name for it was Sionna (Life of Fintan of Clonenagh, cap. 3.) or Seinnon, which used to be latinized into Sinannus or Sinennus, as we find it written in the second Life of Senan himself, in which he is constantly called Senanus. Supposing, however, that the names were the same, how could the quack have proved his assertion? Does he mean to drive out of existence hundreds of Irish families, that bear the name of Shannon? According to his mode of treating antiquities many a person should be changed into rivers. The celebrated St. Nilus, with whom Senan was nearly contemporary, would have been a phantom and nothing more than the river Nile personified. Where did Ledwich find St. Dunus? Charles O'Connor has told him (Reflections, &c. in the Collectan. Vol. 3.), that there was no Irish saint of that name. But even if there had been one, why make him the same as Down personified? It would be more natural to suppose that a St. Dunus had been of some family of the Duns, of whom there are great numbers in Ireland. As I have touched on this impudent manner of treating subjects of antiquity, in which Ledwich is followed by a whimsical English writer called Faber, who has given us a rhapsody on the Cabiri, let me add another sample of his sweeping mode of exterminating saints. In a Note (p. 36.) he says; "Just such saints were St. Bron, St. Lhygad or Lugad, St. Genocus, St. Brecas. Colgan compared with Lhuyd, Advers. sub fn. Baxteri Gloss." A reader, who may not have an opportunity of consulting Colgan's works or Lhuyd's Adversaria, would perhaps be inclined to think, that these writers were favourable to Ledwich's position. Now the whole business comes to this. Lhuyd states that Bron, a Welsh word signifying breast, enters into the name of some mountains in Wales. Hence Ledwich would fain conclude, that there was no such person as a St. Bron bishop of Cassel-irra, although he is mentioned over and over in Irish history, particularly in the lives of St. Brigid, and not only the year but the very day of his death has been marked in our Annals. (See Chap. ix. §. 2.) By a similar sort of logic he strives to change Lugad also into a Welsh mountain. He roguishly calls him Lhygad, a name of Welsh spelling not received in the Irish language. But Lhygad means an eye, and occurs in the name of a mountain in Wales. Therefore St. Lugad was a mountain. Bravo! Which of the St. Lugads does he allude to? for we had seven or eight of them, some of whom are mentioned by Adamnan. Why not as well change our kings and chieftains into mountains, as many of them bore the name of Lugad? The attack on St. Genocus will, I dare say, be resented by the Welsh if ever they chance to meet with Ledwich's book of lies; whereas this saint was a countryman of theirs, and came to Ireland with Finnian of Clonard. (See Chap. ix. §. 8 and ib. Not. 125.) But our Doctor, or somebody for him, happened to find that Lhuyd has the Welsh word Geneu (mouth) as a part of some compound names used as to mountains. Ergo there was no such person as St. Genoc. In the very same page of Lhuyd they found that Braich (arm) is often used in like manner. Then another saint was looked out for, in the design of transforming him also into a mountain. The first, that fell in their way, was St. Brecas or rather Brecus, who is mentioned among the relatives of St. Ita by Colgan, AA. SS. p. 73. where his genealogy is given and the 15th of January is marked as the day, on which his name appears in the Calendars. Ledwich might as well have fallen foul of some of the Brecans; but as there were several persons so called he thought it more adviseable to pitch upon Brecus. Yet this name was not peculiar to the saint; for Irish history supplies us with some distinguished namesakes of his. I have taken the trouble of showing by what sort of process this audacious quack has endeavoured to extract from Lhuyd the above given passage, a process which he artfully concealed from the reader, who will now be able to judge what is to be thought of a soi-disant Reverend Doctor, who, while dealing out lies by bushels for the purpose of misleading the public, has the diabolical effrontery to denounce others as guilty of clerical imposture, pious frauds, &c. and who labours to overturn the most authentic facts by conjectures and etymological quibbles, in the same manner and upon the same principles, that some late petty philosophes have done in their impious attempts to show, that there never appeared on earth such a person as our Lord and Saviour JESUS CHRIST.

§. v. St. Carthagh, or, as some call him, Carthah the elder, is said to have flourished about the year 540. He was grandson of Aengus king of Cashel, (39) and educated under St. Kieran of Saigir. This does not well agree with the supposition of his having been distinguished as early as that year, unless it should be admitted that Kieran had been his preceptor before he became bishop in that place. (40) Nor will this seem improbable, if it be recollected that Kieran was a native of Munster, (41) and that Saigir was also in that province. (42) Accordingly Kieran might have been well known, in an early part of his life, at the court of Cashel, and entrusted with the care of the young prince Carthagh immediately after he had himself left Finnian's school of Clonard about, perhaps, the year 532. (43) It appears that Carthagh was young, probably not more than 17 or 18 years of age, when he was first placed under St. Kieran. (44) Some time after it happened that he and a female pupil of St. Liedania (45) conceived a violent passion for each other; but, their plan for indulging it having been miraculously thwarted, they both repented, and a part of the penance enjoined on Carthagh by Kieran was that he should absent himself from Ireland for some time. He then went to Gaul, and in that country, but in what particular part of it we are not informed, spent some years in the practices of a penitential life and in the study of the holy scriptures. (46) Having returned to Ireland he was welcomed with great joy by Kieran, who was by this time a bishop, and probably remained with him for some time. He seems to have received holy orders not long after, and, as can scarcely be doubted, from Kieran himself. Some monasteries or churches are mentioned, which he is said to have governed. (47) It is related that Kieran a little before his death entrusted and recommended the care of his monks to Carthagh, whence it has been concluded that he succeeded Kieran immediately as bishop of Saigir. The matter, however, is very doubtful; and it is more probable that, whatever superintendence Carthagh might have exercised for some time in that place, it was rather that of a friend than of a bishop. (48) Nor can the time be determined, at which he presided in any manner over the monastery of Saigir. (49) Carthagh undoubtedly became a bishop in course of time, but when or by whom he was consecrated we cannot discover. His see or the scene of his episcopal exertions was in Kerry near the river Mang. (50) In that country he met with young Mochuda, otherwise Carthagh junior, (51) who afterwards became so renowned as abbot of Rathen and first bishop of Lismore. He took him under his care and kept him with himself as a favourite disciple, until, when properly instructed and duly qualified, he raised him to the order of priesthood. St. Carthagh was old when he ordained Mochuda, and probably died not long after. The year of his death is not known; but it can scarcely be supposed to have been prior to 580. (52) His name is marked in the calendars at the 5th of March, on which day his festival was celebrated in many churches. (53)

(39) Colgan has endeavoured to give some Acts of this saint at 5 March. They are very imperfect. In several Irish Calendars he is called son of Aengus, owing perhaps to his having been spoken of as descended from him, and called a child of his. But it is more probable that he was his grandson, as expressly stated in the lives of Kieran of Saigir, in which he is often mentioned. Unless we should suppose that he was born but a very short time before the death of Aengus, who was killed in 490, it would be difficult to believe that he was his son, whereas it appears that he must have lived until about 580.

(40) See Chap. x. §. 2. Colgan calculated that Carthagh was under Kieran's care before the year 489, the year, in which, according to his mode of counting, Aengus was killed. He was led astray by one of those anachronisms, with which the Acts of Kieran abound. Aengus, Kieran, and Carthagh his disciple being spoken of as living at one and the same time. After all that we have seen about Kieran, I need not tell the reader that most probably he was not born until after Aengus' death.

(41) See Chap. 1. §. 14. (42) Chap. x. §. 2.

(43) Kieran was very probably one of Finnian's first scholars at Clonard: Supposing that he had spent two or three years at that school, not in elementary studies, but in acquiring what was taught there, viz. theological learning, he might have left it about 532, whereas said school was opened about or perhaps somewhat prior to 530.

(44) This circumstance shows that it is not only very probable, but certain that Carthagh was not an immediate son of king Aengus. It can scarcely be admitted that he became a pupil of Kieran until about A. D. 532. Being then not yet 20 years old, how could he have been a son of that king? (Compare with Not. 39.)

(45) See Chap. x. §. 2.

(46) According to some accounts he visited Rome during that time.

(47) One of these churches was at Druim-fertain or Ferdhaim in Carbria Hua Kiarrdha. Colgan has (Ind. Chron. ad AA. SS.) a Carbria at the boundary of the ancient Meath and Connaught. Instead of Carbria Hua Kiarrdha the Calendar of Cashel has Carbria Midensis. Colgan mentions (AA. SS. p. 142) Carbria Teffiac, of which perhaps that called Hua-Kiarrdha was a part. Teffia comprized, besides the county of Longford, a great part of Westmeath. Druim-fertain was probably in some part of that extensive territory and perhaps not far distant from Lough Shellin or Sillin, in an island of which, called Inisvachuir, Carthagh is said to have had also a church. Archdall had no authority, not even Colgan's, for assigning the foundation of this church, or, as he calls it, abbey, to about the year 540. Another church, called Kill-Carthaich, is in one account reckoned among those, which he founded or governed. It was in Tirconnel, now Donegall. I suspect that this church got its name rather from some other Carthaich or Carthagh than from him, whom we are now treating of. The Calendar of Cashel, which may be considered as good authority with regard to him, has it not among his churches. And the great distance of that place from our Carthagh's country cannot but excite a doubt on the subject. Archdall's assertion (at Kilchartaich) that he was bishop there, and about A. D. 540, does not rest on any sufficient authority.

(48) Colgan founds his position of Carthagh having succeeded Kieran as bishop upon an Irish life of the latter, in which is mentioned his having recommended his monks to the former. (See AA. SS. p. 475.) But might not Carthagh have taken care of them for a while without being bishop of Saigir? Neither in the Calendar of Cashel, nor in those of Marian Gorman, Donegall, and others, in which Carthagh is uniformly styled alumnus of Kieran, does he ever appear as his comorban or successor, notwithstanding the constant practice of our calendarists to mark distinctly the circumstance of a disciple succeeding his master in a see, whenever it occurred. The immediate successor of Kieran as bishop of Saigir was most probably Setna or Sedna (different from the Sedna above treated of, Not. 35.); and Colgan himself seems to have thought so; for he says (AA. SS. p. 473.), that he flourished about A. D. 570. Archdall (at Seirkeran) in his usual incorrect manner quotes Colgan as if saying, that Sedna died in 570. Colgan writes not died, but flourished. Then, instead of the 10th of March, which Colgan assigns for his festival, Archdall makes him die on the first. Sedna was certainly bishop at Saigir before the death of Carthagh. Now, if Carthagh was ever bishop there, how shall we account for his having left that see? For, as will soon appear, Carthagh, after being consecrated bishop, did not, on any occasion that we know of, withdraw from his episcopal functions. Ware indeed (Bishops at Ossory) has Carthagh bishop of Saigir; but, I believe, merely on the authority of Colgan.

(49) Colgan, following his ill-proved hypothesis, says (p. 473) that Carthagh became bishop of Saigir in the year 540. His reason for assigning this date was his having supposed, that Kieran died about that year. (ib. p. 466.) But we have seen (Chap. x. §. 2.), that Kieran lived for several years later. If Colgan had not swallowed the silly stories about Kieran having been contemporary with St. Patrick, he would not have guessed that he died as early as 540, or that Carthagh was promoted in said year. It was this date running in Archdall's head, that induced him here and there to affix various transactions of Carthagh to about 540. (See above Not. 47.) Harris has made the matter still worse by telling us (at Ossory, p. 402.) that Carthagh is said to have died about 540 ; although Colgan, his guide, expressly shows (AA. SS. p. 476.), that he must have been still alive after that period.

(50) Colgan has not the name of the particular place, in which Carthagh resided. He mentions a monastery called Thuaim, in which the saint was on a certain occasion. But it appears rather as a place, in which he and his companions happened to be entertained, than as that of his usual abode. Yet, as is plain from the narrative, Thuaim was in the neighbourhood of the river Mang. Colgan therefore is wrong in saying that it might have been the same as Tuaim-nava, alias Iniscarra. (See AA. SS. p. 533.) This place is in the barony of Barrets (co. Cork) far distant from the river Mang. There is a mountain in the barony of Dunkerron (Kerry) called Toomish, to which the name Thuaim may perhaps have some reference. That St. Carthagh was bishop in Kerry can be collected also from other circumstances, ex. c. the mention of the chieftains of Kiarraighe, and of the shore of Leamhna, which can be no other than Lough Lean or the lake of Killarney.

(51) Life of Mochuda quoted by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 475.) Mochuda was, as will be seen in its proper place, a native of Kerry, and was living in his own country when he met with bishop Carthagh. Thus we have an additional proof of what has been observed concerning Carthagh's see.

(52) Mochuda lived until the year 637 ; and it does not appear that he was of an extraordinary age when he died. Allowing him sixty years of priesthood, which is much more than the usual average, his ordination would have taken place in 577, at which time the ordainer St. Carthagh was not only alive, but although old, still able to exercise the episcopal duties. Thus then it is plain that Carthagh must have lived until about 580.

(53) Besides the churches said to have been governed by Carthagh, the Calendar of Cashel mentions one dedicated to him at a place called Inis-Carthach near Lismore. It is natural to suppose that, as he had been the master and instructor of the great Mochuda, his memory was revered in that district.

§. VI. Another distinguished saint of the South of Ireland, contemporary with Senan, and partly with Carthagh, was Nesson abbot, and most probably founder of the monastery of Mungret near Limerick. (54) The early history of this saint is involved in obscurity; for we cannot admit the story of his having become a disciple of St. Patrick, when in Munster; as if Nesson could have been a grown up young man about the year 450. (55) He may, at least in part, be said to have been a disciple of St. Ailbe of Emly, with whom he used to converse upon theological subjects and questions, the solution of which he was anxious to learn. (56) At the time of these conversations he could not have been very young; and it may fairly be inferred that he was born before the beginning of the 6th century. (57) It is also probable that he was then, or at least before Ailbe's death, abbot at Mungret (58) He never rose higher in the church than to the rank of Deacon, by which title he was known not only during his life-time, but likewise ever since (59) Yet his reputation was so great, that he has been considered as one of the fathers of the Irish church; (60) and therefore it can scarcely be doubted that he was the Nesson named in the second class of saints. (61) He died in the year 552; (62) and his festival was celebrated at Mungret on the 25th of July. (63) This monastery became very eminent, and is said to have contained at one time a prodigious number of monks. (64) Not long after the death of St. Nesson we find marked that of some other distinguished persons, concerning whom, however, very little is known. St. Cathub, abbot of Achad-cinn in the now county of Antrim, whose memory was revered on the 6th of April, died in 555. (65) The death of St. Bec or Beg surnamed Mac-De, or son of De, is assigned to 558. (66) This saint was distinguished by the gift of prophecy. He was of the house of Orgiel or Oriel, and his name is marked in the Calendars at the 12th of October. (67) To the same year is affixed also the death of a St. Aidan Hua Fiachra, (68) of whom I cannot discover any further account.

(54) We have already shown (Not. 79. to Chap. vi.) the absurdity of the opinion that St. Patrick founded this monastery for Nessian. Nor is there any reason to think that there was any such monastery established there either by St. Patrick, as Harris states, or by any one else before the times of Nessian, who ought, I believe, be considered as the founder of it.

(55) See Chap. vi. §. 8. ib. Not. 79.

(56) Life of Ailbe ap. Usher, p. 961.

(57) Ailbe died in the year 527. How long before his death he held these theological conversations with Nessian, we are not informed. Supposing them to have been in 520, and that Nessian was then 30 years old, (for he could hardly have been less when qualified for such conferences) we would thus have his birth in 490, about which year it is probable he came into the world.

(58) In the passage referred to (Not. 56) Nessian is styled egregius et sanctissimus. If, as seems very probable, it was meant to apply these epithets as suiting him at the time of those conversations, it will follow that he was then of a mature age. Yet we cannot mark the precise time, in which he formed his establishment at Mungret, while it is undeniable that he was abbot in that place. (See Tripart. Life of St. Patrick, L. 3. c. 42.)

(59) Besides the Tripartite, loc. cit. we have the authority of the third Life of St. Patrick, cap. 61. in which he is spoken of; “Nesan qui nunc dicitur Dechon Nesan.” Aengus Kelideus (ap. AA. SS. p. 629.) reckons him among the holy deacons.

(60) In Cumminian's Paschal Epistle Nessian is joined with Ailbe, Kieran of Clonmacnois, &c. That this was Nessian of Mungret, cannot be called in question, whereas Cumminian alludes to saints who left great establishments after them, and particularly in places not far distant from the Shannon. Now there was no other Nessian in those parts of Ireland, to whom these circumstances could apply.

(61) Chap. x. §. 4. Usher (p. 961.) applies to Nessian of that class what is said in Ailbe's life concerning the deacon Nessian, and, I dare say, justly. He confounds him with one Nessian, who, he thought, had led a recluse life in the small island called Ireland's eye. This is a mistake, which Usher was led into by a passage, which he quotes from John Alan, archbishop of Dublin. There was no St. Nessian in that island; but we find that three holy men, sons of Nessian of the royal house of Leinster, inhabited it in the seventh century. Their names were Dichull, Munnissa, and Néslug; and their memory was revered there on the 15th of March, at which day Colgan treats of them. The island, which seems to have been originally called Inis-Faithlenn, got from them the name of Inis-mac-Nessian, or Island of the sons of Nessian, insula filiorum Nessiani, as it appears in a brief of Pope Alexander III. to St. Laurence O'Tool. (Vet. Ep. Hib. Sylloge, Ep. 48.) This name has been sometimes contracted into Inis-Nessian. From what has been now observed it is plain, that Harris was wrong in attributing a monastery there in the 6th century to a St. Nessian. Archdall goes further, and says that he founded it about A. D. 570. There is not the slightest authority for this statement, nor for what he adds concerning St. Nessian's church, instead of which he should have written, the church of the sons of Nessian. Seward (at Ireland's eye) has copied, as he often does, part of Archdall's mistakes.

(62) Colgan, following the 4 Masters, has 551 (552.) See Tr. Th. p. 32 and 186. and AA. SS. p. 192. Usher (Ind. Chron.) reckons, by mere conjecture, Nessian among some persons, who, he says, flourished in the year 570. He had not seen the Irish Annals, in which the year of Nessian's death is distinctly marked. It was Usher's conjectural 570, that poor Archdall was thinking of. (See Not. P. c.)

(63) Tr. Th. p. 186.

(64) See Archdall at Mungret. It is strange that Ware has not made mention of this monastery.

(65) AA. SS. p. 192. There is a story concerning Cathul having lived to the age of about 150 years. It was, I suspect, patched up in consequence of his having been confounded with a priest Cathbad, who is said to have been in St. Patrick's time. (See Not. 22. to Chap. vi.)

(66) AA. SS. p. 192. I have marked 558, as being the same, for the 557 of the 4 Masters.

(67) AA. SS. p. 713.

(68) Ib. p. 192.

§. VII. To return to the second class of Irish saints, we may now enter upon the life of the great Columbkil, who is mentioned in it after some other saints already treated of (69) and who had been born before him. Colgan and others have published several lives of this saint, (70) from which, with the aid of other documents, I shall endeavour to extract whatever appears most authentic relatively to his transactions. We read that his birth and future greatness had been foretold many years before he came into the world. (71) His origin was of the highest rank according to the usual notions of mankind. By his father's side he was descended from Niall Neigiallach, being the son of Fedhlimid who was a great grandson of that monarch. (72) His mother Aethena, daughter of Macanava, (73) was of an illustrious and princely house of Leinster. (74) It is related, that, before she was delivered of him, an Angel appeared to her in a dream, bringing a robe or cloak of extraordinary beauty, which, after presenting to her, he soon after took away, and, spreading it out, let fly through the air. On her asking him what reason he had for depriving her of it, the Angel answered that it was of too magnificent a nature to be left with her. She then observed it as if expanding itself far and wide over plains, mountains, and forests, and heard these words; "Woman do not grieve; for you shall bring into the world a son, who is to be a guide of innumerable souls, and will be reckoned as one of God's prophets." (75) As to the year of his birth, there are various opinions, of which the most probable is that it was A. D. 521. (76) It is said that he was born at Gartan, (77) and baptized in the church of Tulachdubhglaisse by a holy priest Crothnechan. (78) According to some accounts his first name was Crimthan, which, by reason of his dove-like simplicity and innocence of life, was afterwards changed into Columba. (79) To this was in course of time added the surname

Cille or Kille, on account of the number of monasteries which he founded; (80) and by which he has been distinguished from other holy men of the same name. When very young he was entrusted to the care of a respectable priest, with whom he lived (81) near, as it is said, the church of Kill-mac-nenain. (82) On a certain occasion the clergyman having, after the celebration of mass, returned to his habitation observed it illuminated with a clear light, and saw a globe of fire suspended over the face of his pupil; upon which he threw himself, in an act of veneration, on the floor, well knowing that this phenomenon indicated the divine grace abundantly shed on young Columba. (83) In fact, he exhibited from his earliest years a true Christian spirit and application to useful studies, without being defiled by any stain of sin. (84) We are told that, when still a small boy, he recited the psalms together with Brugacius bishop at Rath-enaigh, whither he had accompanied his preceptor, whom the bishop had invited to celebrate the festival of Christmas. (85)

(69) See Chap. x. §. 13.

‡ (70) The Lives published by Colgan in the Trias Thaumaturga are five in number. The first is rather short, and, properly speaking, cannot be called a regular history. It is, according to a mode of writing very prevalent with old authors of the Acts of saints, a sort of dissertation, in which several anecdotes are recorded without scarcely any attention to chronological order. Colgan was right in supposing that it was the most ancient of all the so called Lives of Columbkil, and once thought it might have been that written by Cumineus Albus, which is quoted by Adamnan. But he preferred attributing it to some other author, whom, however, he was not able to identify. Yet there can be no doubt of its being the work of Cumineus, and as such it has been republished by Mabillon in the AA. SS. Benedict. Tom. 1. and from him by Pinkerton, Vitae antiquae sanctorum—Scot. &c. In both these editions he is called not Cumineus but Cuminus. The names are the same, having been latinized from the original Cumin. The passage referred to by Adamnan occurs in the 5th chapter of this tract, although with some variation of words. Mabillon took his edition from a MS. of the monastery of Compeigne, whereas Colgan followed the manuscript Supplement of Belfortius to Surias. Cumenus Albus, or White, became abbot of Hy in the year 657 (Usher, (Ind. Chron.) and accordingly was a different person from Cumnian the author of the Paschal epistle (See Chap. II. §. 5.) with whom he has been strangely confounded by Colgan (AA. SS. ad 22 Feb.) Harris (Writers at Cumnian), and even by the Bollandists at the 18th of April (Life of St. Lasreanus), although Bollandus himself had (at 24 Feb. p. 429) spoken of them as distinct persons. And that they were is evident from the the diversity of style, which we find on comparing the Life of Columbkil with the Paschal epistle. That of the former is easy, flowing, and abounding in round periods, while the style of the latter is concise, metaphorical, with an affectation of rare phrases and Hellenisms, such as Johannis petalici—inculti logii bifaris, &c. Add, that the monks of Hy did not receive the Roman cycle until many years after the death of Cumineus albus, as will be seen hereafter, and that it is by no means probable they would have chosen for their abbot so great a stickler for that cycle as the author of the Paschal epistle. It is strange that so learned a man as Mabillon could have headed the Life by Cumineus with calling him abbot of Hy in Anglia. Surely the little island Hy was never considered as comprized in England.

The second Life, as Colgan calls it, is plainly a compound of two distinct works. The saint's death is circumstantially related in the 19th chapter; and yet we find it treated of again in what Colgan marks the 35th, where some circumstances occur not mentioned in the former. The fact is, that the 19th chapter is the conclusion of an entire tract in itself, which seems to have been written by a foreigner, as a proof of which I will adduce only one passage, in which the author takes particular care to point out the situation of Hy, which he calls "Insulam Jonam, quae in septentrionali oceano inter Hiberniam et Britanniam sita est." (Cap. 6.) A person writing in Hy or in Ireland would not have thought it necessary to be so precise. The author lived probably at a time when Ireland was more generally known by the name of Hibernia, than of Scotia. In a parallel passage, in which Cumineus (cap. 12.) and Adamnan (L. 3. c. 17. Colgan's ed.) have Scotia, he introduces (cap. 12.) Hibernia. His work is a sort of biographical memoir, in which, considering its brevity, the series of transactions is tolerably attended to, and has been borrowed chiefly from the Life by Adamnan, with some additions from later documents. The remaining part of what Colgan exhibits as the second Life is by a different hand and in a less correct style. The author has taken almost the whole of it from Adamnan, and seems to have been a monk of Hy. But neither of these parts can by any means be attributed to Cumineus albus, whom Colgan imagined to be the author of the whole. Besides our having seen that the first Life is the real one written by Cumineus, the former part of the second bears evident marks, as now observed, of a period much later than that, in which Cumineus lived. The latter part, or from the 19th chapter to the end, is probably much more ancient than the former; but no argument occurs for ascribing it to Cumineus. Dr. O'Connor, following Colgan, quotes (Columbanus's Third letter, p. 55) as if from the Life by Cumineus, or, as he calls him, Cumnian, a passage, in which St. Patrick is mentioned as having blessed the grandfather and great grandfather of St. Columba. Said passage is not in that Life, but in the first chapter of the second, which Colgan had erroneously announced under the name of Cumineus. Nor is it the Life in which the quoted passage occurs, that has been republished by Mabillon, as the work of Cumineus. For what Mabillon calls the Life by Cumineus is as already seen, the identical one, which Colgan names the first.

The third Life is by Capgrave or rather Johannes Tinmuthensis, and is merely copied from Bede and Adamnan.

To the fourth place Colgan has assigned the celebrated Life by Adamnan, which is really an excellent work, and a genuine composition, notwithstanding the falsehoods and sneers of the ignorant pseudo-critic Ledwich. (See Chap. II. §. 8.) It was first published by Canisius, in the year 1604, and afterwards by Messingham in 1624. Colgan's edition is much more ample, especially in the first book, on which account he prefers it to the former ones. But I fear that several parts of it are interpolations; and it is plain that, if not the whole, at least the chief part of what he calls the first chapter (Lib. 1.) must be considered as such. For, besides the difference of style between it and the rest of the work the subjects mentioned in it are not in general of that kind, of which Adamnan professes to treat in the first book. Said chapter is not in Pinkerton's edition, which he has given us from a manuscript of the British Museum in the Vitae antiquae sanctorum, &c. This edition is in substance scarcely different from Colgan's, except in the two or three first chapters, which were wanting in that MS. It is very neat and well arranged, and might be the fittest to refer to in our account of the saint, were it not that, through a strange whim, as if books were intended only for the great, who perhaps never read them, so few copies of Pinkerton's valuable collection have been struck off, that, scarce as the Trias Thaumaturga is, this is still more scarce and less accessible so the generality of readers, although published so late as the year 1789. Accordingly whatever references may be necessary I shall make to Colgan's edition, adding if requisite, some occasionally to the other ones. I pass over some other editions, such as that of the Bollandists, as these now mentioned will suffice for our purpose. Adamnan's work was not intended as a regular history or biography of St. Columba, and consequently bears scarcely any marks of chronological arrangement. The first book is entitled, De Prophetis revelationibus; the second, De virtutum miraculis; and the third or last, De Angelicis visionibus.

The fifth Life, published by Colgan, consists of Extracts, translated into Latin, from a very large history of the saint, in three books, written in Irish by Magnus or Manus O'Donnel, prince of Tyrconnel, and completed by him in the year 1520. Colgan tells us, that he has omitted many parts of it, which he thought fabulous or foolish. He might indeed have overlooked also many other parts, which he has taken the trouble of giving to the reader. Yet, on the whole, it is a useful work, particularly on account of the attention paid by the author to chronological order.

A Life of St. Columba by a Dr. Smith, one of the ministers of Campbellton, came out in Edinburgh in the year 1798. The author has chiefly followed Cumineus, Adamnan, and Colgan's appendixes. As a history this tract is meagre enough, and often very incorrect in mere matters of fact.

(71) Adamnan in his second preface to Vit. S. Col. says that St. Mauctaneus, as Colgan's edition has, or Mochtheus (See Chap. VI. §. 12. and ib. Not. 123.) pronounced a prophecy concerning St. Columba in these words; "In novissimis seculi temporibus filius nasciturus est, cujus nomen, Columba, per omnes insularum Oceani provincias divulgabitur notum, novissimaque orbis tempora clare illustrabit. Mei et ipsius duorum monasteriorum agelluli unius sepiculae intervallo disternabuntur: homo valde Deo charus, et grandis coram ipso meriti." Upon a part of this prophecy, in which it is said that two small monasteries, one of Mochtheus, and the other of Columba, would be separated by only a small hedge, is founded, I believe, a story in O'Donnel (L. 1. c. 3.) that Mochtheus had lived in the island of Hy. But the two monasteries, alluded to by Mochtheus, were no other than two in Ireland; for there were several houses of Columba's order, one of which seems to have been near Louth, where was the monastery of Mochtheus. O'Donnel himself says elsewhere (L. 2. c. 11. 12.) that Hy was occupied by Druids, until Columba drove them out of it. If so, Mochtheus could not have had an establishment there. The second life adds (cap. 1.) a prophecy to the same purpose by St. Patrick himself, which is mentioned also in the Tripartite, (L. 2. 113.) and by Joceline (cap. 89.) But we may very safely doubt of its ever having been issued (See Not. 8. to Chap. VI.), and much more of the farrago of similar prophecies, which O'Donnel has raked together in the beginning of his compilation, and several of which are so nonsensical and evidently fabulous, that it is surprizing how Colgan could have published such stuff.

(72) All accounts agree in calling St. Columba's father Fedhlimid, and likewise in making Fedhlimid a son of Fergus, whom some persons have erroneously confounded with Fergus son of Erc, and brother of Loarn, who founded the Scottish kingdom in Britain. The Fergus, grandfather of St. Columba, was son of Conal, one of the sons of Neill-Neigilliach, and from whom, as Usher justly observes (p. 689.), the country of Tirconnel (alias Kinel-conuil) has got its name. Joceline (cap. 88) calls Fergus a younger brother of Conal in opposition, as Colgan shows, to every other account; yet he led astray Messingham, who in a note to his edition of Joceline (at cap. 138) speaks of him in like manner, and even confounds him with Fergus son of Erc. The Conal father of Fergus and ancestor of St. Columba is, in some genealogies of the saint, surnamed Gulbanins. (O'Donnel, L. 1. c. 1. and Tr. Th. p. 447-477.) For two Conals are spoken of in Irish history, both sons of Neill Neigilliach, viz. Conal Gulbanius, and Conal Crimthannius. Colgan frequently distinguishes them, (See his fourth Index to Tr. Th.) and quotes (ib. p. 544.) the following passages from the Annals of the 4 Masters; "A. D. 464 (465) Conal Gulbanius, son of king Neill, from whom Kinel-conuil, was killed, &c." "A. D. 475 (476). Died Conal Crimthannius, from whom the Clanna Colmain," &c. The principality of the former was Tir-connel, while, he adds, that of the latter comprized great tracts in Meath and Bregh. (See Not. 14 to Chap. v.) Following this statement, it appears that the prince Conal, who received St. Patrick so kindly at or near Tailten, and who was baptized by him (Chap. v. §. 6.) was Conal Crimthannius; and that Conal the father of Fergus was the surnamed Gulbanius, whereas Tirconnel was his territory, and the place of his residence. (See Chap. vi. §. 2. This then is the Conal, to whom St. Patrick is said to have, when in Tirconnel, foretold the birth and sanctity of his descendant St. Columba. (See Not. prec.) Having been obliged to touch on these genealogical subjects, I may be allowed to add, that the relationship to the saint, claimed by the O'Donnel family, is founded on their being derived from Dalach, who was a descendant of Sedna, paternal uncle of Columba. (O'Donnel, L. 1. c. 177.) On this account, as Colgan observes, (Tr. Th. p. 451) that great family was often called Siol-Ndalaich, or the race of Dalach.

(73) Adamnan has; "Matrem Aethneam nomine, cujus pater Latine filius navis dici potest, Scotica vero lingua Macanava." (See the second preface, or in the other editions cap. 1.) This was only a surname; for his real name was Dima. (Tr. Th. p. 477.) Smith (Life, &c. p. 5.) makes Aethnea, or, as he calls her, Aithne, mother not of the saint but of his father Felim, and says that she was daughter of Loarn the first king of the Scoto-Irish in Argyleshire. This is a strange mistake and in direct opposition to the express words of Adamnan and to every authority. He confounded Aithne with Erca, or Earca, daughter of Loarn, whom O'Donnel (L. 1. c. 1) after mentioning Aithne as the mother of St. Columba, introduces as mother of Felim, and consequently grandmother of the saint. And it is thus we find in what manner St. Columba was related to the Dalriada dynasty, which formed that kingdom in North Britain. (See also O'Flaherty, Ogyg. vindic. ch. 10.) We may here add that Felim or Fedhlimid was half-brother to Murchertach Mac-erca monarch of Ireland, (See Chap. ix. §. 2.) as they were sons of Erca, who, after the death of prince Muredach, married Fergus. By Muredach, who was grandson of Niell Neigilliach by his son Eugenius, she had Murchertach, Feradach, Tigernach, and Moen. Afterwards she had by Fergus (of whom Not. prec.) four other sons Sedna, Fedhlimid, Loarn, and Brendan. (See Colgan AA. SS. p. 782. and O'Flaherty, Ogygia, p. 471.) Thus then the saint was maternal nephew of king Murchertach.

(74) O'Donnel, L. 1. c. 60. compared with cap. 1. where he says that she was descended from Caithir king of Ireland. See Tr. Th. p. 477, where her entire genealogy is traced. Had Usher seen it, he would not have thrown out a conjecture (Ind. Chron. A. 522.) that she was grand-daughter of Nan the father of Gildas.

(75) Cumineus, or first Life, cap. 1. Adamnan, L. 3. c. 1.

(76) O'Donnel (L. 3. c. 57.) says that the year was 520. Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 486.) would fain draw it back to 519, founding this date on two suppositions; 1st. that St. Columba died in 596, and 2d, that he was then in his 77th year. Of these we shall see hereafter. Usher (Ind. Chron.) assigns the saint's birth to 522. But the grounds, upon which he proceeded, and which are the fittest to build upon, lead us rather to the year 521. Adamnan writes (second Preface, or, according to other editions, L. 1. c. 1.), that St. Columba left Ireland the second year after the battle of Cuil-dremne (near Sligo), and that he was then in the 42d year of his age. The battle was fought, as Usher (p. 694) shews from the Annals of Ulster, in the year 561. On this point Colgan agrees with him. (Tr. Th. p. 486 and Ind. Chron.) Thence Usher, with whom O'Flaherty agrees (Ogyg. p. 473), concluded that the year of the saint's departure was 563, as marked also in said Annals. Colgan here hesitated and thought it might have been 562. But surely it is natural to suppose that Adamnan would not have called the year 562, or any part of it, the second after 561. Laying down 563, as that of St. Columba's departure, and combining it with the time of the year, in which he was born, it will be easily seen that his birth must be placed in

521. For, as stated in the Calendars quoted by Colgan (p. 483.), he was born on a seventh of December. If Columba had been born in an early part of the year, he might have been said to be in his 42d year in 563, although born in 522. But, as his birth happened so late as the 7th of December, who could speak in that manner of his age, if said 7th of December was in 522? To assert with any sort of propriety that he was in his 42d year in 563, it should in Usher's hypothesis, be supposed, that he did not set out for Britain until after the 7th of December in said year. It will hardly be believed, that the saint and his companions deferred their departure until the depth of winter. On the contrary O'Donnel tells us (L. 2. c. 11.) that they arrived straight from Ireland in Hy on the eve of Whitsuntide. (See more below Not. 223. to Chap. XII.) It is very odd that Colgan, knowing that Columba was born in December, could have imagined that 519 was the year of his birth. Admitting even that he left Ireland in 462, he should, on comparing these dates, have been then in his 43d year. But Colgan was a very incorrect calculator in chronological matters. As a proof of 521 being the true year of the saint's birth I may refer to the Martyrol. Dungall. (ap Tr. Th. p. 486.) which assigns it to A. 520. Now, as often observed with regard to many of our old documents, this was the same as our 521. And it is more than probable, that O'Donnel took his above mentioned 520 from that martyrology. It is worth observing, that this date agrees exactly with Nennius' computation of the times of St. Patrick, Brigid, and Columb-kille. (See Not. 12 to Chap. VII.) Before dismissing this subject, I must remark that there is some mistake in Johnston's Extracts from the Annals of Ulster (ap. Antiq. Celto, &c.) where he marks, as from them, Columba's birth at A. 518. (519). Usher, who had a copy of said Annals and made great use of them, knew nothing about such date occurring in them. Nor did Ware or any other author I know of, that had access to those Annals.

(77) O'Donnel L. 1. c. 22. Gartan is in the barony of Kilmacrenan in Donegall.

(78) Ib. cap. 25. That place is also in Kilmacrenan and is now called Tully or Tullyaugnish. (See Archdall at Tully.) O'Donnel calls Cruthnechan son of Ceallachan. Colgan thought he was the same as one Caritanus, whose name he found marked in the Calendars, at 7th March, and accordingly has treated of him at said day. The names, however, are not so like each other as to make us, without further proof, believe that they belonged to only one person. What Colgan has concerning Cruthnechan is taken from O'Donnel, who raked together a heap of uncertain traditionary anecdotes. He is mentioned in Colgan's edition of Adamnan (L. 3. c. 2.) not as the priest who baptized St. Columba, but as the one, to whose care he was entrusted when a small boy. Neither in Messingham's edition nor in the first life does his name occur, although a priest is spoken of, in general, as having had the care of the saint. If Cruthnechan had been expressly named by Adamnan, it can scarcely be supposed that the transcribers would have omitted him, and it is more than probable that his appearing in Colgan's edition is owing to an interpolation. Yet we have no authority for denying, that said priest was called by that name.

(79) Martyrol. Dungall. ap. Tr. Th. p. 483. O'Donnel, L. 1. c. 30. Adamnan seems not to have known, that he had ever borne any other name than Columba. In the second preface he attributes his having been called so to the interposition of divine providence, as it was fit that a person of his sanctity should bear the name of that bird, under whose form the Holy Ghost had appeared. He says also that he had got, as if by chance, the same name as the prophet Jona; "cum Jona propheta homonymon sortitus nomen;" whereas the Hebrew word Jona signifies a dove. Such observations as these sufficiently indicate that, according to Adamnan, the saint had been originally called Columba, a name rather common in those days among the Irish Christians, and which we frequently meet with written either Columba or Columbanus, and sometimes Columbus. In the prophecies concerning the saint (See Not. 71.) no other name appears than Columba.

(80) That this was the real cause of the compound name Columbkille is evident from Bede, who writes (Eccl. Hist. &c. L. 5. c. 10); "Qui videlicet Columba nunc a nonnullis, composito a cella et Columba nomine, Colum-cellii vocatur." Notkerus Balbulus, speaking of him in his Martyrology, says; "cognomento apud suos Columkilli; eo quod multarum cellarum, id est, monasteriorum vel ecclesiarum institutor, fundator, et rector extiterit." (See more Tr. Th. p. 483 aud Usher, p. 687.) It is probable, that the saint began to be so called not much earlier than Bede's time, to which he alludes by nunc a nonnullis. Cumineus Albus and Adamnan, who were prior to Bede, never give him the name of Columb-kille. The story (Tr. Th. p. 483.) of Kille having been added in consequence of the saint having been educated in the church of Kille-mac-nenain is scarcely worth notice, and is rejected even by O'Donnel, who says (L. 1. c. 30.) that the true cause of this surname was the saint's having founded many monasteries and churches. Keating has a still more foolish story concerning the whole name of Columb-kille having been first given to him, when he was studying under Finnian of Magh-bile. (See Not. 81. to Chap. x.) Henceforth I shall call him simply Columba, except where, to avoid confusion, it may be necessary to add the surname.

(81) In Colgan's edition of Adamnan the priest is called Cruthnechan (See Not. 78.), the person who, according to O'Donnel, had baptized St. Columba.

(82) Martyrol. Dungall. ap. Tr. Th. p. 483. O'Donnel, L. 1. c. 30. seqq. Kilmacnenain must have been the place now called Kilmacrenan, which gives name to the barony, in Donegall.

(83) Cumineus, cap. 2. Adamnan, L. 3. c. 2.

(84) Adamnan writes (Second Preface, alias L. 1. c. 1.); "Qui etiam a puero, deditus Christiano tyrocinio et sapientiae studii, integritatem corporis et animae puritatem, Deo donante, custodiens quamvis in terra positus, caelestibus se aptum moribus ostendebat."

(85) O'Donnel, L. 1. c. 32. This bishop Brugacius must not be confounded with the Brugacius mentioned in Not. 256 to Chap. x. Rath-enaigh was, according to Archdall (at Ratheanich) in Inishowen. Where he got this information I cannot discover. O'Donnel says it was in Tireнна, by which name I do not find that Inishowen was ever called. Colgan merely tells us (AA. SS. p. 510.) that Tireнна was a district near the residence of Cruthnechan, who had Columba under his care. I wish he had been more precise. He mentions (Tr. Th. p. 373) a place called Eanack, three miles to the North of Derry, in the O'Cahan's country. Might it have been the same as Rath-enaigh, or the fort Enaigh? The memory of Brugacius was revered on the 3d of November. (AA. SS. p. 511.)

§. VIII. Having spent the years of his boyhood

under that clergyman, and being qualified for the higher sort of studies, he was sent to the school of St. Finnian of Maghbile, in the now county of Down, which was then very celebrated and much resorted to. (86) At this school Columba applied himself sedulously not only to the acquirement of learning but to the imitation of the virtues of his holy teacher. He remained there for several years, and had become a deacon before he left it. (87) While he was officiating as such, it happened on the occasion of some great festival that the wine for the mystery of the holy sacrifice could not be found; upon which Columba went to the fountain for the purpose of procuring, as deacon, water for the divine service. Having put some into a vessel he blessed it, invoking the name of Jesus Christ, who had changed water into wine at Cana in Galilee. His prayer was heard, and a similar miracle took place as to that which his vessel contained. Returning to the church he said to the clergy; "Here is wine for you, which the Lord Jesus has sent for the celebration of his mysteries." They and the bishop St. Finnian returned thanks to God for this extraordinary favour, which Columba ascribed not to any merit of his own but to that of the bishop. (88) Leaving Finnian's school and monastery he went to Leinster, and placed himself under a venerable old man called Germanus, a teacher of great reputation. (89) It is related that, being with him reading in a field, a girl, who was pursued by an assassin, fled towards them for protection, which, however, the monster not paying any attention to killed at their feet. Columba announced that God would punish him by a sudden death; and accordingly very soon after he dropped dead. (90) How long he remained with Germanus, cannot be ascertained; but it is probable that his stay with him was short, if it be true, as indeed is not unlikely, that for some time after he attended the lectures of Finnian of Clonard. (91) As to other schools, to which some writers have sent him, we may pass them by, (92) and now follow the saint in his return to his own country Tirconnel. He could not have been long there when he set about founding a monastery; for its foundation is assigned to the year 546, (93) at which time he was in the 25th year of his age. This monastery he erected on a pleasant eminence covered with oaks, called Doire-Calgaich, (94) near Loughfoyle to the west, and whence is derived the name of the town or city of Derry, now Londonderry, which owes its origin to that establishment. The site for building it and some adjoining land were granted to him by his relatives the princes of the country. (95) Having established his institution on a firm footing, and, according to some accounts, erected one or two churches in the neighbourhood, he determined on visiting other parts of Ireland for the purpose of contributing to the advancement of religion and piety. Consigning the care of his establishment to one of the elder monks he proceeded to the southern parts of the ancient Meath, and, having got a spot of land from a chieftain named Bredan, erected a monastery at Dair-magh, (96) now Durrough in the King's county. The precise year of this foundation is not known; but it was probably about A. D. 550 or not long after. (97) This monastery was not less famous than that of Derry, and was, at least for a considerable time, better known to foreigners. (98)

(86) O'Donnel, L. 1. c. 39. (See Chap. x. §. 6. and ib. Not. 81.) Smith, (Life, &c. p. 7.) instead of Finnian of Maghfile, whom he seems to have known nothing about, has Finnian of Clonard as Columba's first master in the highest class of studies.

(87) "Ipse quippe illis in diebus erat in diaconatus gradu administrans." Adamnan, L. 2. c. 1. who observes that the saint was then young "adhuc juvenis." If the discipline of most ancient churches, which required the age of, at least 25 years for a deacon, was observed in Ireland, it will follow that Columba was still with Finnian in the year 547, whereas he was not 25 years old until the latter end of 546. How can this agree with what the Annals of Ulster have concerning his having founded the monastery of Derry in 546? Either they are wrong, or Columba must have been ordained deacon before the age of twenty-five. And, indeed, there is some reason to think that he was. The adhuc juvenis of Adamnan might seem to point to the age of 22 rather than to that of, at least, full 25. Yet I find Adamnan elsewhere calling Columba a juvenis, when he was certainly much more than 25 years old. Passing over this doubtful argument, we may observe that the function of deacon comprized at that time in Ireland the duties of an acolythe; for Adamnan states (ib.), that Columba went, in his capacity of deacon, to fetch water for the use of the altar. Now, wherever acolythes were established, this was a part of their office. Nor was it, I dare say, until after the acolythate and other minor orders were regularly settled, that the age required for deaconship was fixed at 25 years, and for this reason, that this order or degree was thenceforth charged with only such duties as persons under that age were supposed to be unfit for. St. Epiphanius of Pavia was ordained deacon about A. D. 458, at the age of 20 years. (Tillemont, Tom. xvi. p. 481.) Yet, concerning other circumstances, we cannot admit, that Columba was less than about 22 when officiating as deacon in Finnian's monastery; and in this supposition he must have been there as late as the year 544.

(88) Cumineus, cap. 4. Adamnan, L. 2. c. 1. (compare with Not. prec.)

(89) O'Donnel, L. 1. c. 40. In Colgan's edition of Adamnan (L. 2. c. 25.) and also in Pinkerton's, he is called Gemnanus; but in Messingham's (L. 3. c. 4.) the name is Germanus. Colgan thinks he was the same as an abbot Gorman of Kill-gorman in West Leinster; but in what part of it he does not inform us. He thought also that he was very probably no other than a bishop Mogornan one of the pretended nephews of St. Patrick. Archdall applies these vague conjectures to Kilgorman in the county of Wicklow, and without further explanation calls the supposed bishop in that place not Mogornan but Mogornan. But Archdall's Kilgorman, far from being in West Leinster, is in East Leinster; nor is Colgan's West in this case an error of the press; for he quotes it twice from old authors and Calendars in p. 230. and 383. of Tr. Th. There were persons enough of the name of Gorman, from whom churches both in East and West Leinster might have been called Kilgorman, without twisting the name of either Germanus, or Mogormanus. A Germanus is mentioned in the life of St. Finnian of Clonard; but he is spoken of only as a poet. A religious foreigner of the name of Germanus appears in the first life of Kieran of Saigir (cap. 32); and it is very probable, that he was the person, to whom Columba, having left Maghbile, applied for further instruction. His being a foreigner was a strong inducement to do so, were there no other motive than that Columba wished to improve himself in a correct knowledge of the learned languages. Gemmanus is in all likelihood a mistake for Germanus.

(90) Adamnan, L. 2. c. 25. Messingham's ed. L. 3. c. 4.

(91) O'Donnel (L. 1. c. 41.) sends Columba from the school of Germanus to Clonard. Adamnan gives us no hint to that purpose, and mentions only one Finnian, viz. of Maghbile. Yet, as his work is not a regular history, his silence cannot be considered as a decisive argument on this point. Columba is expressly reckoned among the chief disciples of Finnian of Clonard in said Finnian's Acts, cap. 19. and in other documents, such as the Life of Kieran of Clonmacnois, and that of Columba of Tirdaglass. (See Tr. Th. p. 457.) If our saint was really at that school, he could not have been very young at the time; for he was already a deacon before he left Maghbile, and is spoken of as such when he was with Germanus.

(92) O'Donnel (L. 1. c. 43.) pretends that Columba went from Clonard to the monastery or school of Mobhy Clairineach. This cannot be reconciled with the date of Mobhy's death, which is assigned to A. D. 545. (See Not. 240. to Chap. x.) St. Columba was, in all appearance, still at Maghbile in 544 (above Not. 87.); and, as he was next afterwards with Germanus, how can time be found for his being at the school of Mobhy, particularly if, as O'Donnel himself states, he spent some time previous at Clonard? This is, I suspect, as unfounded a story as that of Comgall and Kieran having been scholars of Mobhy. (See Not. 243. to Chap. x.) It is probable, that Columba might have become acquainted with him a little before his death at the time that he was studying in Leinster under Germanus. Smith (Life

&c. p. 8.) has a fable concerning Columba having been also under Kieran of Clon, that is, Clonmacnois. Where he got it, I cannot tell. O'Donnel, at most, makes Kieran a fellow student of Columba in Mobhy's monastery. All that I find recorded as to Columba having ever been at Clonmacnois is what Adamnan relates (L. 1. c. 3.) concerning his having visited it on occasion of his having come to Ireland from Hy many years after the death of Kieran, as will be seen elsewhere. Yet there can be no doubt that Columba and Kieran were personally acquainted. (See Not. 187. to Chap. x.) Smith adds some nonsense concerning Kieran having preached in Kintyre, and died in 594; for which he refers to Ware, without pointing out where he said so; as indeed could not be done, whereas Ware never mentioned such things. How little Smith had examined these subjects appears from his supposing (p. 10.) that Columba, when in his 28th year, founded the monastery of Darmagh about the time of Kieran's death. Now the 28th year of Columba's age was A. D. 549, which was also that in which Kieran died. Why then give us that trash about his having died in 594? Yet, to do every man justice, this 594 is, perhaps, an erratum for 549. But the fable of Kieran having preached in Kintyre is not so. It is taken from such stories as those of Dempster and others concerning that great saint. (See Not. 32. and 187. to Chap. x.) The mistakes of some writers, who have made Columba a disciple of Comgall at Bangor, needs no refutation.

(93) Usher (Ind. Chron.) from the Annals of Ulster. The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 502.) place it in 535 (536). This date is evidently wrong, and is rejected by Colgan. (ib. and p. 450.) Are we to suppose that Columba could have founded a monastery before he was 15 years old? The 4 Masters, however, were not guilty of this absurdity, whereas they thought that Columba was born in 516 (517); and thus, according to their calculations, he would have founded it before he was full 19 years of age, counting from the 7th of December, the day of his birth. Surely it cannot be admitted that so young a person would have been recognized as abbot or superior of a religious community. Their date (517) and indeed all their dates relative to the saint's transactions are in direct opposition to Adamnan and the best authorities, so that Colgan was obliged to set them aside. But although he differed from them as to the time in which the monastery was founded, he was uncertain (ib. p. 503.) to what year it ought to be assigned, notwithstanding his having given, without animadversion, Usher's date (546) in the AA. SS. p. 191. a work printed indeed before the Tr. Th. O'Flaherty, in a marginal note to Tr. Th. p. 502. agrees with Usher. O'Donnel (L. 1. c. 48.) makes Columba set about erecting the monastery soon after he had got an account, by messengers expressly sent to him, of the death of Mobhy Clairineach. This circumstance confirms the date 546, whereas Mobhy died in October A. D. 545. (See Not. 240. to Chap. x) At this same time it overthrows what O'Donnel has about Columba having been ordained priest, and nearly bishop, before he founded the monastery. According to the discipline of those times he was too young in 546 to be ordained either bishop or priest; and hence it appears that, if that was the year of the foundation, the saint was still only a deacon when it took place, and for, at least, five years later.

(94) Adamnan has latinized the name into Roboretum Calgachi. At to the precise situation of the monastery Mr. Sampson says (Stat. Survey of Co. Londonderry, p. 472) "Probably the Catholic chapel, and thence to the Bishop's garden, is the site of the famous convent."

(95) The 4 Masters quoted by Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 450.) have; "Ecclesia de Doire-Chalgaich fundatur per S. Columbam-kille, locum offerentibus proceribus de Kinel-Connuill suis cognatis." This is more correct than O'Donnel's statement, who says (L. 1. c. 48.) that said place was given to the saint by prince Aidus son to king Anmiraeus, and who afterwards became king of Ireland himself. Aidus was perhaps not born in the year 546. His father Anmiraeus, who did not ascend the throne until A. D. 566, (Usher, p. 947.) or, according to O'Flaherty (Ogyg. part 8. cap. 93.) 568, was first cousin to St. Columba, being the son of Sedna the saint's paternal uncle. (O'Flaherty ib. and Tr. Th. p. 448.) It is difficult to believe, that Aidus could have been in possession of a principality as far back as 546, when his father's cousin Columba was not as yet 25 years of age. Accordingly the 4 Masters were right in not attributing to him the grant made to the saint. It was this story of O'Donnel that, it appears, induced Colgan to doubt of the time, in which the monastery was founded, (See Not. 93.) as he could not but perceive, that the time of Aidus' being placed at the head of a territory must have been later than 546. Hence to reconcile matters, having swallowed O'Donnell's position, he was inclined to think, that the monastery was not founded so early as is generally supposed. Archdall, among many blunders concerning St. Columba, says (at Derry) that Doire-Chalgaich had been granted to him in 535, but that the foundation of the monastery could not have been prior to 546. He had read in Tr. Th. that the 4 Masters assigned that grant to A. D. 535, a wrong date, as we have seen (Not. 93.). Yet he should have reflected, that they join the donation of the land with the foundation of the monastery, affixing them both to the same year. Had he done so, he would not have given this trash to the public.

(96) Adamnan, L. 1. c. 3. The name signifies the oak grove of the plain, or the plain of the oaks. Adamnan calls it (ib. c. 29.) in Latin Roboretum campi, while Bede (Histor. &c L. 3. c. 4.) interprets it Campus roborum. Adamnan observes, that it was in mediteranea Iberniae parte, and so it really was. For it is the place now called Durrough or Durrow (not to be confounded with Durrow in the Co. Kilkenny) in the barony of Ballycowen (part of the ancient Fearcall and South Meath) in the King's county. As to the chieftain Brendan, see Tr. Th. p. 507, where his death is marked at A. D. 585.

(97) Ware (Antiq. cap. 26.) and Harris (Monast.) say about 550. Archdall (at Durrow) has 546, forgetting that this was the year of the foundation of the house of Derry, and that some time must have intervened between it and that of Dair-magh or Durrow. From him, I suppose, the mighty Ledwich (Antiq. p. 56.) took the same date for Durrow, without making any mention of Derry, yet introducing some nonsense about Columba's pretended Culdees. Smith in like manner passes over (Life, &c.) Derry, and tells us that the saint founded the monastery of Dearthmagh in the 28th year of his age, that is A. D. 549; connecting this hypothesis with making him a scholar of Kieran of Clonmacnois. (See Not. 92.) O'Flaherty in various marginal notes to Tr. Th. p. 339. 373. 507) endeavours to prove, that Dairmagh was not founded until about the year 590 after the meeting at Drumceat. His only argument worth notice is that Adamnan (L. 1. c. 3.) having observed that Columba was founding said monastery, tells us, that he visited Clonmacnois, of which Alitherus was then abbot. Now Alitherus was not abbot there until about 590, as appears from the 4 Masters and Colgan. (Tr. Th. p. 373.) The manner, in which Adamnan speaks of Dairmagh might seem to indicate, that he supposed its foundation to have been not long prior to Columba's visit to Clonmacnois. He writes; "Monasterium, quod Scotice dicitur Dairmagh, divino fundans nutu per aliquot demoratur menses. Libuit animo visitare fratres, qui in Clonensi sancti Cerani coenobio commanebant." Instead of fundans Usher (p. 690.) has fundavit. But it is plain that fundans is the true reading; whereas otherwise the passage, the whole of which Usher has not quoted, would be quite ungrammatical, besides its occurring in all the editions, at least in those, that I have met with. The difficulty, however, is easily got over by explaining fundans not by what we call founding or newly forming, but in its very classical meaning of regulating and giving stability, as ex. c. in the phrase, legibus urbem fundare. A few lines before that passage, Adamnan, alluding to what might be now expressed by founding a monastery, uses the verb construere. That he did not mean the house of Dairmagh was first originally formed at the time he was speaking of, must be allowed, unless we are to reject every other authority relative to said establishment. O'Donnel not only places the foundation of it before St. Columba went to Hy, but tells us (L. 3. c. 13.) that Lasrenus was abbot there at the time of the assembly of Drumceat, adding that the saint went afterwards to make a visitation of it. This visitation is, I believe, what Adamnan meant by fundans. The 4 Masters mentioning the death of the prince Brendan in 585 (586) subjoin, that he was the person, who had, long before, made an offering of Dairmagh to God and St. Columba. Next comes Bede, who expressly states that Columba had erected this monastery before his arrival in Britain. These are his words; (Hist. &c. L. 3. c. 4.) "Fecerat autem prius quam Britanniam veniret monasterium nobile in Hybernia, quod a copia roborum Dearmach lingua Scottorum, hoc est, campus roborum cognominatur." O'Flaherty strove to evade the force of his argument by saying, that Bede mistook the name, and that the monastery of Derry was that which he meant. But it is clear that in this passage he followed Adamnan, who undoubtedly understood by Dearmach or Dairmagh not Derry but Durrogh. As to O'Flaherty's remark that Bede alluded to Columba's chief monastery in Ireland, which was not Dairmagh but Derry, I answer, that Bede seems to have known very little about Derry; whereas Adamnan, his guide, although he makes mention of it by the name of Roboretum Calgashi, yet does not any where introduce Columba as having resided there, while, on the contrary, not only in the above quoted passage, but likewise in L. 2. c. 2. he speaks of him as having been at Dairmagh or Robur campi. To conclude this subject, neither Usher, Ware, nor Colgan, although they had Adamnan's text before them, doubted of Dairmagh having been founded prior to Columba's settling in Hy.

(98) † Bede (L. 3. c. 4.) joins it with the monastery of Hy, as the two principal establishments of Columba. Some English writers have confounded Dairmagh with Armagh. (See Usher, p. 690.) Their mistake is more pardonable than that of Lucas Holstenius, who (Proem. ad Cod. Regularum) says, "that S. Columbanus (Columb-kill) Armacanum et Tyrhense monasteria fundavit A. 565." By Tyrhense he meant or guessed at the monastery of Derry. It is strange that a man of his reputation, and who wrote after Usher, Colgan and others had cleared up these matters, could have thrown out in that passage almost as many blunders as there are words.

§. IX. It was probably not long after the foundation of Dairmagh, and while Columba was still in South Meath, that he was raised to the priesthood. It is related that, being judged worthy of the episcopacy, he was sent, with the approbation of several prelates, to St. Etchen for the purpose of being consecrated by him. Etchen resided at Clain-bile, or, as otherwise called, Cluain-foda in the district of Fera-bile a southern part of Meath. (99) He was of an illustrious family of Leinster, (100) and is said to have been obtained by his parents from the Almighty through the blessing of St. Brigid, but at what time I do not find recorded. (101) Nor is there any authentic account of Etchen's proceedings until we meet with him as bishop in that place; and as the ordainer of St. Columba. (102) Being arrived near Etchen's church, the saint inquired for the bishop, and was told; "there he is below ploughing in a field." He then went up to him, and was welcomed with the greatest kindness by the holy prelate, who, on being apprized of the reason of his visit, did not hesitate to ordain him soon after. Yet, if we are to believe some authors, (103) a singular circumstance occurred in this business. They tell us that, through a sort of mistake, Etchen ordained him not bishop, as was the general wish of the clergy and people, but priest; and that, after having spent the following night together in prayer, Etchen, on discovering his mistake, offered to consecrate him bishop, which proposal Columba declined, attributing what had happened to a dispensation of Providence, and declaring that he would remain during the rest of his life in the order, to which he had been admitted. In our times such a mistake could scarcely occur in any part of the Church; and it is difficult to believe, that it could have happened even in Columba's days, although the ritual was then more simple than it is at present. (104) Be this as it may, it is certain that Columba never rose higher in the Church than the rank of priest. His ordination could not have been earlier than the latter end of A. D. 551, when he had just completed his thirtieth year. (105) Having spent some time at Dairmagh, it is said that he went thence to Kennanus, (106) now Kells in E. Meath, then a city and royal residence, and there founded a monastery. If it be true that he did so, concerning which there is some reason to doubt, (107) its foundation must have been later than the year 550, to which it has been assigned by some writers. (108)

(99) It is called at present Clonefad or Clonfad, and is the barony of Farbill in Westmeath. The situation of this place affords an additional argument against O'Donnel's statement, viz. that Columba was ordained priest before he founded the monastery of Derry. According to him the saint was in his own country, when it was thought adviseable to direct him to St. Etchen for ordination. Why send him all the way from Tirconnel to the South of Meath? Surely there were bishops enough in the adjacent parts of Ulster, who might have ordained him. No other reason appears for applying to Etchen for that purpose than that he lived not far from Columba's then residence; and, in fact, the distance between Clonfad and Durrogh is not great. We may therefore justly infer, that Columba's ordination by Etchen did not take place until, at the earliest, the time of his founding Dairmogh, which, as O'Donnel himself lays down, was later than that of Derry.

(100) Colgan has Etchen's at 11th February. His father was Manius Ecceas, and his mother Briga, both descended in collateral lines from Niathcorb, or Messincorb, the ancestor of all the kings of Leinster.

(101) Colgan thought that Etchen might have been born about A. D. 490, founding this date upon a supposition, that he became bishop before the death of St. Brigid, for which there is no authority worth attention. He quotes a long passage from the Life of St. Brigid by Laurence of Durham, in which a bishop Echeus is mentioned as contemporary with her and St. Mel of Ardagh. But in the first place the names Echeus and Etchen are different; and next, if there was such a bishop as that Echeus, how could Colgan have imagined that he was the same as Etchen? Could Etchen have been a bishop in the times of Mel, who died in 488? By another strange anachronism Colgan elsewhere (AA. SS. p. 632.) supposes Etchen to have been bishop at Clonfad in St. Patrick's days. For he makes him the same as a bishop Ethian, who is said to have been reprimanded by St. Patrick. (See Usher, p. 1049.) The account of that reprimand looks very like a made up story, and perhaps the contrivers of it, caring little about correctness of dates, meant Etchen by the name of Ethian. (See Not. 211. to Chap. VIII.) But Colgan ought not to have swallowed or authorized such a monstrous anachronism.

(102) There is abundance of authorities to prove these two points. The Calendar of Cashel has at 11th February, "S. episcopus Etchenus, qui ordinem presbyteratus dedit S. Columbae Kille." Colgan quotes also Mariam Gorman, the martyrology of Donegall, &c. &c. All accounts agree that his see was at Cluain-bile, alias Cluain-foda. I do not find any mention of a monastery of his. Colgan has (at 11 Mart.) a Librenus abbot of Cluain-foda, who he thought, lived in the beginning of the 7th century; but, as there was a place of that name different from that of Meath, he does not decide to which of them he belonged. Harris was not so scrupulous, and places Librenus at Cluainfoda in Meath, adding a mistake of his own in assigning it not to Westmeath, as he should have done (See Not. 99) but to East Meath. I may here add that, according to the martyrology of Donegall and the 4 Masters, St. Etchen died A. D. 577 (578), Feb. 11.

(103) Aengus or his Scholiast, &c. in Etchen's Acts. O'Donnel, L. 1. c. 47.

(104) In this anecdote it is presupposed, 1st. that it was intended to conserate Columba per saltum, that is, to raise him immediately from the rank of deacon to the episcopacy, without his passing through the priesthood. There are certainly many instances of the kind in ancient times, notwithstanding the contrary practice having been generally observed from a very early period, as appears from St. Cyprian (Ep. 52. alias 55. ad Antonian.) and confirmed by the councils of Sardica, Bracara, and others. 2dly. Although it was an universal and very ancient rule that several bishops, at least three as established by the great council of Nice, should be present at the consecration or ordination of a bishop, yet here we find an instance of a person, who was to be consecrated by one alone, and without any apparent necessity of such an urgent nature, as would at any time render it allowable. Whether the anecdote be true or not, it seems to indicate that it was not unusual in Ireland to have persons consecrated by one bishop. And yet it is certain that the Irish clergy were well acquainted with the decrees of the council of Nice and others on this subject. To explain this seeming paradox we must observe, that the order of Chorepiscopi was very general in Ireland. They were undoubtedly, at least very many of them, invested with episcopal powers, although being subordinate to the regular bishop, in whose diocese they were stationed, they were not allowed to exercise some parts of them without his permission. Now these Chorepiscopi used to be ordained or consecrated by the bishop, properly so called, or ordinary of the diocese, without his being bound to apply for the assistance of other bishops. See the 10th canon of the council of Antioch, and Bingham, (Orig. Eccl. Book 2. chap. xiv. §. 5.) who adds, that the city-bishops (ordinaries) were accountable for the ordination of the country-bishops (Chorepiscopi) to a provincial synod. In the case of St. Columba it is very natural to suppose, that the intention was to make him simply a chorepiscopus, so as to entrust him with the care of the rural district adjoining Dairmagh, and accordingly it was not necessary to apply for his consecration to more bishops than one. As the Irish had but one name for bishops and chorepiscopi, it is often difficult to know whether persons mentioned in our Church history were ordinaries of dioceses or of that subordinate class. If we read of their having been consecrated by only one bishop, we may justly conclude that they were only chorepiscopi. Or, if we find them, as is often the case, moving from one country or province to another, a similar inference may be drawn; whereas the canons did not allow, except on some extraordinary occasions, ordinaries to quit the sees to which they had been originally appointed. There is a third point connected with this anecdote, or rather with the supposition that it might have taken place. It is more difficult of explanation than those already discussed; for, it will be asked, could the rites used in the ordination of a priest have been mistaken for those practised in the episcopal consecration? It is true, that in later times some ceremonies and prayers have been added in the performance of these acts, which mark more distinctly the difference between them; yet they were always clearly distinguishable by the respective rites and forms of prayer used in administering them, as may be seen in Habert's Archieratikon (p. 312. seqq.) Bingham's Origines, &c. (B. 2. ch. xi. § 8-9. compared with ch. xix. § 17.) and as still observed by the ancient Oriental sects. (See Renaudot, Perpet. de la foy sur les Sacrements, L. v. ch. 8. 10.) Neither Etchen nor Columba could have been mistaken as to the nature of the act during its celebration. Therefore whatever was the oversight or mistake alluded to in that narrative, it must have been of some other kind. Etchen might have acted designedly in conferring at first only the order of priesthood, through a wish not to violate the rule of not ordaining per saltum, but with the intention of afterwards giving him episcopal ordination. To this Columba submitted, and meanwhile formed his determination not to rise higher. In process of time persons, who thought he should have been made bishop, ascribed the whole to a mistake; or it may be supposed that, through a particular interference of Providence, Etchen forgot that Columba had been sent to him for the purpose of being raised to the episcopal order, and knowing that he was only a deacon thought it sufficient to confer on him merely that of priesthood. At any rate this anecdote, whether true or not, plainly shews that the distinction between bishops and priests was well understood in Ireland.

(105) It is very probable, that Columba was ordained not long after the foundation of Dairmagh. Hence the date, about 550, assigned for it, seems to be nearly as correct as can be ascertained.

(106) Harris (Bishops, p. 138) explains the name as if signifying the see of Cenanus. This is an unfounded position of his own. Where did he find a Cenanus bishop there? The origin of the see of Kells and the name of its first bishop are unknown. Ware, treating of Kells (Antiq. cap. 29.) has nothing about see of Cenanus; but he observes, that the name of the place Cenanus (or Kennanus) was contracted into Kenlis, and afterwards into Kells. In fact, Kennanus was its original name, which it probably was known by before there was ever a bishop in Ireland.

(107) In the martyrology of Donegall (Tr. Th. p. 483) the monastery of Kennanus is reckoned among those, which Columba founded before he left Ireland. But it ascribes so many establishments to him, that we cannot depend on its authority as to any one of them, unless supported by other documents; and it is certain that several religious houses of Columba's order, said to have been founded by him, were not established until after his death. If a fact ought to be rejected on account of the absurdity of circumstances said to have accompanied it, that now under discussion must be set aside. O'Donnel states (L. 1. c. 63.) that, on the saint's approaching Kennanus, the guards refused him admittance; upon which he prophesied that it would soon pass into other hands. It is added, that Diernit, then king of Ireland, having arrived there soon after, made him a present of the whole city, as a compensation for the affront he had received, and that Columba accepted of it. Passing over some other stories, who does not see, that this is a fable fabricated in times very much later than those, in which Columba lived? In his days kings did not bestow cities to holy men, nor would holy men have accepted of them. Colgan (Tr. Tk. p. 508.) gives us no other authority for that foundation by Columba than the trash of O'Donnel. O'Flaherty in a marginal note (ib.) asserts, that the church, called St. Columba's, at Kells, was not erected until A. D. 807, and that the founder of it was Kellach, abbot of Hy, who at that very time, as Ware writes (Antiq. cap. 24.) fled to Ireland from the fury of the Danes, who had plundered his monastery and murdered many of the monks. O'Flaherty appeals for his assertion to Codex Cluanensis, and to a poema chronologicum. He might have appealed also to the Annals of Innisfallen, which assign the foundation of Kells by Kellach to 807. He refers likewise to Ware, who says (loc. cit.), that Kellach in that year either built or repaired the monastery of St. Columba at Kells. Yet in other places (ib. cap. 26. and 29) Ware attributes the foundation of said monastery to Columba himself, in obedience, perhaps, to a popular tradition. If it was really founded by him, it is difficult to account for the silence of our old authors as to any abbot there between his times and those of Kellach. Archdall, indeed, mentions (at Kells) one or two as prior to Kellach, but, I believe, on very shallow authority. They must have been unknown to Colgan; for, otherwise, he would have named, at least, some one of them, as he has with regard to the abbots of Derry, Dairmagh, &c. It may be objected, that the 4 masters quoted by Colgan (loc. cit.) assign a destruction of St. Columba's church of Kells to A. D. 802 (803) and therefore prior to Kellach's arrival there. This is probably a mistake. It must certainly have appeared as such to O'Flaherty, who had the 4 Masters constantly before him, and who would not have assigned the origin of that church to 807, unless he thought their calculation to be wrong and not consonant with documents, which he considered as more worthy of credit. As to any decision on this subject, let the reader judge for himself.

(108) Ware, Harris, &c. Their computation, which is at best merely conjectural, cannot agree with their own statement as to the time of the foundation of Dairmagh (See Not. 97); whereas some not very inconsiderable time must have elapsed between it and that of Kells. Besides, Columba was already a priest, when he is said to have set about the latter monastery ; so that if he was the real founder, its commencement cannot be placed prior to A. D. 552.

§. x. Several other monasteries or churches are said to have been erected by St. Columba in those times ; but there can be no doubt that many of them were not established until after his death, while others prior to it were not of his immediate foundation. Thus the house of Swords was not established by him, nor before the year 563, but some time in the seventh century. (109) Another pretended establishment of our saint is that in the small island of Rachlin, off the Antrim coast, for which there is not the least authority ; (110) besides its being well known at what time and by whom it was founded. (111) It was, however, of the Columbian order, as was also that of Raphoe, which I do not find sufficient arguments for ascribing to Columba himself, although it existed in Adamnan's time, who was, perhaps, the founder of it. (112) Three or four religious houses or churches called Skrine or the Shrine of St. Columba, indicate by their very name that they were not formed in his time, and that it is a gross mistake to ascribe their foundation to him. (113) The monastery of Druim-cliaibh, or Drumcliffe, in the county of Sligo, will, I dare say, on close examination, be found not to have been established until after the saint's death. (114) Much less reason is there for ascribing to him several other religious houses or churches, some of which are now unknown, (115) while others were merely churches or chapels dedicated in his name, or in which he was specially revered. (116) Certain monasteries, which existed in Columba's time, have been added to his foundations on the mere grounds of their having been mentioned by Adamnan. (117) We find, however, besides Derry and Durrogh, some religious houses, which were founded in Ireland either by

Columba himself, or by his disciples during his life time, or, at least, very soon after his death. Among them is to be reckoned that of Druim-Tomma (Drumhome) in the barony of Tyrhugh and county of Donegal. (118) A small monastery in a place, called Sath-reginden, was inhabited and seemingly founded by a Baitan, who lived in Columba's time, and became one of his monks. (119) A great establishment called Kill-mor-Deathrib, is usually ascribed to St. Columba, and probably on just grounds; (120) but unluckily its situation is wrapped up in obscurity. (121) Snamlathir, a monastery in the now barony of Carbury (county of Sligo) was founded, perhaps before his death, by Columbanus, son of Echad, who was probably a disciple of his. (122) Adamnan makes mention of a monastery, called Kailli-abinde, and founded, after Columba's departure from Ireland and perhaps after his death, by a Finten, son of Aidus, one of his disciples. But it is probable, that this monastery was somewhere in Scotland or its Western isles rather than in Ireland. (123) To conclude this subject, I have only to add, that a monastery at Eac-mac-neirc in the now county of Roscommon, although not mentioned by Adamnan, is usually ascribed by several authors to St. Columba, who is said to have placed over it the abbot Dochonna. (124)

(109) O'Donnel, who is followed by Colgan, says (L. I. c. 67) that Columba, having built a church at Swords, consigned it to the care of St. Finan surnamed the Leper. He places its erection before Columba's departure from Ireland. In opposition to this story, it is sufficient to observe, that this St. Finan did not die until between the years 674 and 693, as mentioned in his Acts at 16 Mart. How then could he have governed a church before 563? He is well known in Irish history, and was himself the founder of the monastery of Swords, but undoubtedly after the death of Columba, to whose institution, however, it seems to have belonged. Ware does not make mention of it; yet Harris does, erroneously ascribing it to St. Columba. Archdall has bungled his account of it in a most shameful manner. He says that it was founded in 512 by Columba. Yet this may be an error of the press, although not marked in his table of errata. For elsewhere he lays down, that Columba was born in 521. But what are we to think of his statement that Finan died before 563, and his referring to three different pages of the Tr. Th. in none of which does any such thing occur? In one of those pages (p. 509.) Colgan says that the monastery was founded prior to the year 563, but has nothing there about the time, in which Finan died. Archdall then adds, that others extend Finan's years to 593, or 597, and refers to his Acts. Now in the very page referred to, neither of these dates is mentioned; but, it is expressly stated, that Finan died between 674 and 693.

(110) Colgan was, to use a vulgar phrase, bewitched as to the mania of ascribing foundations of monasteries to our eminent saints. For his reckoning (Tr. Th. p. 494 and 509.) that of Rachlin among those established by Columba he refers to Adamnan (L. 2, c. 41.) and to O'Donnel (L. 2, c. 81.) The reader will be surprised at Colgan's inference, when he is told that those writers have not a word in the places referred to about a monastery in Rachlin, and merely to tell us that St. Columba happened to be there on a certain occasion, which is thus expressed by Adamnan; "Cum vir sanctus in Rechrea hospitaretur insula." They add that, while there, he reconciled a woman to her husband, having by his prayers obtained from God a change of her heart from inveterate hatred to true conjugal affection. According to Colgan's mode of deducing consequences, every place, in which the saint might have happened to spend a few days, should have been honoured with a monastery of his. Archdall, while meaning to follow Colgan as usual, fell into a blunder, which Colgan did not, although with a carelessness similar to that just noticed (Not. prec.) he refers to him for it. After saying that Columba founded a church in Rachlin he tells us, that the saint placed over it Colman a deacon. Here he confounds Rachlin with a place in the maritime part of Meath mentioned by O'Donnel (L. 1, c. 65.) under the name of Rachraind Orientalis Breagh, where, he says, Columba placed the deacon Colman over a church, which he had erected. Whether this be true or not is of little consequence.

O'Donnel, however, did not confound that place with the island, when he speaks of it, L. 2. c. 81. Nor did Colgan, who in one and the same page (Tr. Th. p. 494) makes mention of both of them as distinct, placing one immediately after the other.

(111) The Annals of Ulster and Tigernach assign to A. D. 635 the foundation of the church of Rechran or Rachlin by Se-genius abbot of Hy, (See Usher, Ind. Chron.) to whom it is attributed also by the 4 masters quoted by Colgan. (Tr. Th. p. 509.) notwithstanding his mistake in having ascribed it to Columba. Harris (Monaster.) makes Lugaid Laithir the founder of it about 591. He could have had no reason for this position, except his having misunderstood a passage of Usher (Ind. Chron. ad A. 590), where he observes that Lugaid, surnamed Laithir, is said to have founded a monastery in Rachlin. But Harris should have looked to the page of the Primordia referred to by Usher, and he would have found that the person, who said so, was the notorious Demp-ter, whose statement he merely mentions; while a few lines after he quotes the Annals of Ulster to show, that the church of Rachlin was founded in 635. Archdall, who swallowed every mistake, places Lugaid in Rachlin after his deacon Colman. (See not. præc.) Colgan thinks that this Lugaid governed a monastery before St. Columba's death, but, as will be seen lower down, different from that of Rachlin.

(112) Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 509.) calls Adamnan the patron and restorer of the monastery of Rathbotha (Raphoe). The title, patron, and the veneration, in which he was held there as such, seem to point out rather a founder than a restorer. It is true, that the Martyrology of Donegall reckons it among the establishments, partly monasteries, partly churches, formed by Columba before he went to Britain. But, as already observed, we are not bound to submit to its authority, unless corroborated by other documents. O'Donnel says (L. 1. c. 58.) that the saint repaired churches at Raphoe, without mentioning a monastery. Whether there were at any time many churches in that small town, I do not know; but it is certain, that one would have been sufficient for it in the days of St. Columba. Ware (Ant. cap. 29. and Bishops at Raphoe) ascribes a monastery there to Columba; but I believe he merely followed Colgan. The most that can be admitted is, I think, that the saint might have procured the erection of a church in Raphoe for the accommodation of the people. And it is thus, if I mistake not, we are to understand what the said Martyrology has about other establishments of his in that neighbourhood, such as Kilmacrenan, Tulach-Dubhglaisse, Gartan, and Seinglean. If the saint had any thing to do with them, it may be justly supposed, that they were not monasteries but simple churches, which, through his influence with the princes of the country his relatives, he was able to erect or get erected. Ware and Harris have no monasteries in said places, nor does even O'Donnel make mention of any thing more than the churches, while the Martyrology leaves it doubtful whether they were monasteries or not. Yet Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 494.) and his humble servant Archdall lay them down as such, besides others of equal uncertainty, and all as founded by Columba. Why should the saint have formed such a crowd of monasteries so near each other, while there was room enough at Derry for persons wishing to lead a monastic life?

(113) The Martyrology of Donegall reckons three Skrines among the establishments founded by Columba before he left Ireland; one in Meath, another in Ulster, and a third in Connaught. The Skrine or Scrinium Sti. Columbae in Meath is well known, and Colgan observes (Tr. Th. p. 494.) that perhaps it got that name from the shrine of St. Columba, which might have been deposited there for some time after it was brought from Hy to Ireland in the year 875. If so, the commencement of the monastery or church called Skrine, must be brought down to the 9th century. At any rate it is plain that it did not exist until after the saint's death, whereas some reliques of his must have been supposed to be kept there so as to entitle it to that denomination. In like manner the other Skrines must be assigned to some period later than that, in which he lived. The second Skrine was, according to Colgan, in that northern part of the county and diocese of Derry, called the Magilligan country. Archdall gives the name of Magilligan to the monastery itself; and why? because Colgan says that it was in the tract called Ardia, al. Aird-Magilligan. He thought that Ardia, instead of being a large district, was only a village or townland. As to the Skrine in Connaught Colgan does not mark its situation; yet he seems to have thought that it was the same as the Shrine of St. Adamnan, now Skreen, in the county of Sligo at a place anciently called Cnocna-moile, which in rather a modern Life of a St. Farannan (at 15 February) is said to have been granted by a prince Tiprad to St. Columba. (See Archdall at Skrine.) Why call it the Shrine of Adamnan, if it had existed since Columba's time? But Colgan adds another Skrine, or Scrinium Sti. Columbae, which, as appears from the 4 Masters, was in Kinel-Eoguin, now Tirone, and was plundered in the year 1203. Whether it was a monastery or church he does not tell us. Archdall has it not, having confounded it with the Skrine, which he calls Magilligan.

(114) The Martyrology of Donegall and O'Donnel (L. 1. c. 60.) assign to him the foundation of this church or monastery, and prior to his departure for Britain. In the Life of Farannan (See Not. prec.) it is said that Columba, after his return to Ireland on occasion of the assembly of Drumceat, erected a church in Carbre, now the barony of Carbury in the county of Sligo. As Drumcliffe lies in that district, O'Flaherty supposed that this was the place meant in said Life, and thence (MS. note to Tr. Th. p. 494.) concluded, that the church of Drumcliffe was not founded until the year 590. It is, however, very probable that it did not exist until a later period. O'Donnel says that Columba placed over it Mothorianus one of his companions. Colgan tells us (Tr. Th. p. 510.) that Mothorianus is the same name as Torianus or Torannanus. Then he mentions St. Tarannanus abbot of Bangor and Drumcliffe, but does not tell us at what time he lived, although owing to the misplacement of a date in the margin, it seems at first sight as if he placed him in the year 921, whereby Archdall was deceived (at Drumcliffe) so as to assign the death of the abbot Torannan to that year. It is very probable that this St. Tarannan was the same as Mothorianus. Now, if he was abbot also of Bangor, he must have lived in a later period than St. Columba, whereas we find a regular succession of abbots at Bangor, for many years after Columba's death, among whom there is no Torannan. I strongly suspect, that Tamannan, Torannan or Mathorianus was no other than Thorannu, one of those disciples of Columba, who followed him to Britain. From having been particularly revered at Bangor and Drumcliffe, he might have been supposed to have been abbot in both places. In all probability Thorannu spent the remainder of his life out of Ireland. (See below, Not. 160.) A strong presumption against the great antiquity of Drumcliffe arises from Colgan's not having been able to discover any intermediate abbot there between his Mothorianus or Tarranan and Mailpatrick, who died in 921, particularly as the church of Drumcliffe was very respectable. As to some of its late abbots having been called Comarbans or successors of St. Columba, that can be easily accounted for on the principle of its having been a monastery of his order. It is odd that neither Ware nor Harris make mention of it in their lists.

(115) Colgan made out (Tr. Th. p. 494.) a monastery of Columba's foundation in an island called Inis-locha-gamhna, or the island in Lough Gawn or Gawnagh in the barony of Granard, county of Longford. Archdall has it under the name Inchymory, and confounds it with Inis-aingin in Lough-ree, where, as we have seen, Kieran of Clonmacnois had formed a monastery. Colgan refers only to O'Donnel (L. 1. c. 104.) for the Columbian house in Lough Gawn. Now all, that O'Donnel says, is that the saint, as he was passing in that direction, blessed said lough or lake. This is certainly no authority for supposing that he established a monastery there. And yet Ware, (Ant. cap. 26.) has it as founded by Columba, and in the fifth century. For the former part of this position his only guide was, I believe, Colgan; and in the latter the word, fifth, must be an erratum, whereas Ware was too exact to let it slip from his pen. Harris and Archdall have copied it, not recollecting that Columba was not even born in that century. Colgan has also a monastery or church at Killchuana in the county of Sligo near Cnocnamoile, (See Not. 113.) for which he has no authority except the half fabulous Life of Tarannan, in which it is said that Columba placed there Cuannon, a disciple of his. Archdall, in his confusion on this point, removed this Killcuanagh or Kilcoonagh to the county of Galway, and made Cuannan a maternal brother of St. Carthag of Lismore. There is, however, a Kilcoonagh in Galway and in the deanery of Annadown, which was founded by Cuanna the brother of Carthag, whose birth Colgan assigns to the latter end of the sixth century in his Acts at 4 Feb. But he is not spoken of, nor could he, as a disciple of St. Columba. As to the Cuannan represented as such, and his Killchuana in Sligo, nothing authentic is known, and we may justly reject what is said of them in the Life of Farannan. Equally unknown is another pretended establishment of Columba in the same neighbourhood, and mentioned only in said Life, called All Farannain. The Martyrology of Donegall has among the saint's foundations Main in Leinster. The 4 Masters (ap. Tr. Th. p. 494.) call it (at A. 1014 and 1040) Maoin-Columb-kille. It might have had this name without having been founded by Columba. For (this purpose it was sufficient that it belonged to his order or institution. In what part of Leinster it was I cannot discover.

(116) To this class belonged, as Colgan seems to acknowledge, the church of Druimcollum, and some others in the diocese of Elphin; several churches in that of Derry, such as those of Cluain-laodh or Clonleigh, Cluain-maine or Clonmany, and particularly Fathen-Mura (now Fahan) which was founded by St. Murus its abbot, as appears not only from its name, but likewise from his being the patron saint; and who, as his Acts show (at 12 Mart.) lived in the seventh century. To this we may add some also in the diocese of Raphoe, such as that of Tory island, in which, were we to believe O'Donnel and Colgan, Columba placed Ernan one of his disciples. But Colgan himself tells us (AA. SS. p. 17.) that this abbot Ernan, whom he calls son of Colman, flourished about the year 650, and therefore very many years after our saint's death. The system of attributing foundations to Columba on the mere principle of their bearing his name was carried so far, that a church (not an abbey as Archdall has it) in a place called Glean-choluim-cille in the West of Thomond, has been reckoned among them, although he does not appear to have ever been in that part of Ireland. It might as well be supposed that all the churches called by the name of St. Paul, had been erected by that Apostle. Smith not understanding the name Tuamania, which Colgan has, places (Life, &c. p. 150.) Gleann-choluim-cille in Tuam!!!

(117) One of these was the monastery which Adamnan (L. 2. c. 36) calls that of the two rivulets of the field, duorum agri rivulorum. In Messingham's edition (L. 2. c. 14.) the name is Diviniruris rivulorum. He tells us that St. Columba paid a visit to the monks there, being invited by them. This shows that he was not the founder of it, as in that case there would have been no occasion for any invitation. Yet Colgan reckons it among his establishments, and endeavours to show that it was the same as Tir-da-chroebh somewhere in Meath, where he found that a St. Lugaid was held in veneration. Next he conjectures (Tr. Th. p. 377) that this Lugaid was the same as the surnamed Laithir, a disciple of St. Columba, often mentioned by Adamnan, particularly (L. 2. c. 38.) where he calls him the saint's legate or messenger. But Tir-da-chroebh does not mean a place of two rivulets, nor does there appear to be an error in Adamnan's text as to rivorum; for O'Donnel (L. 3. c. 15.) calls that establishment Mainister an da shruth, i. e. the monastery of the two brooks. Thus then Colgan's speculations remain quite unsupported. And as to the name Lugaid, it was so common that it cannot afford an argument for the truth of his hypothesis. Archdall, instead of communicating to his readers Colgan's ideas as conjectures, has (at Tirdacroebh) laid them down as facts. Another monastery ascribed by Colgan to St. Columba is that of Cloinfinchoil, supposed to be Clonfeakle in the county of Armagh. For this position he had no other authority than the following anecdote related by Adamnan (L. 3. c. 23.) There was, he says, in an Irish monastery called Clon-finchoil (name omitted in L. 3. c. 18. in Messingh. ed.) a holy old soldier of Christ, of the name of Lugaid (al. Lagud) son of Talchan, to whom the death of St. Columba was revealed in a vision at the very time it happened. Early the next morning he imparted it to another holy man called Fergnaus or Virgnous, (different, as will be seen hereafter, from Fergnaus, abbot of Hy) and told him that he saw the island of Hy, where he had never been, illuminated with an angelical brightness, and hosts of angels conveying Columba's soul to heaven. Fergnaus went shortly after to one of the Western islands called Hymba, where, having become a Columbian monk, he often related this fact. Now there is nothing in this narrative to make us believe that Cloin-finchoil was a Columbian monastery; for it does not appear that Fergnaus, was, at least at the time he got that information from Lugaid, a Columbian monk, or that he was a member of the monastery of Cloin-finchoil. Nor is there any foundation for making Lugaid abbot in that place. Colgan indeed does, (Tr. Th. p. 493) and gives him that title at 2 Mart. where he treats of him; but without adducing any additional argument. Had Adamnan known that he was an abbot he would not have omitted to call him so. Harris and Archdall have followed Colgan. The former says that Lugaid died in 580. How then could he have had a vision concerning Columba's death in 596 or 597? The latter tells us that he was a very aged man in that year. To understand this bungling, the reader must observe, that Usher reckons (Ind. Chron.) among several illustrious men, who flourished in 580, Lugad, son of Talchan, an old soldier of Christ, alluding to the phrase used by Adamnan. But although he was old at the time Columba died, he might not have been thought so in 580; nor was that Usher's meaning. Harris, however, went much farther astray than Archdall; for, while Usher says, flourished, he introduces death. Nothing could stop Colgan in his hunting after Columbian institutions. A curious instance occurs in his placing (Tr. Th. p. 494) among them a monastery at Cluinaich, in the diocese of Derry. Yet somewhere more than once (ex. c. ib. p. 450, 489.) he calls it only a church near Derry, which he conjectures to have been governed by one Columba, named Crag. This Columba happens to be mentioned by Adamnan (L. 1. c. 2.) who calls him a venerable clergyman, venerandum clericum. Upon this mere mention of his name (Colgan, ib. p. 489.) makes him a disciple of St. Columba. Now it is evident from Adamnan, that he was not; for he is introduced as asking two monks, who had just arrived at his habitation from Derry; "is your holy father Columba safe and well?" Had he been himself a disciple of the saint, he would have said not your but our. To the illogical process, by which Colgan changed Columba Crag into a monk, and gave him a monastery, Archdall has, as he often does, added something of his own. For (at Cluainenach) he tells us, that St. Columba founded an abbey there, and made Colum Crag, his disciple, abbot of it. It is thus that, next after this monastery, talking of Clonmanny (Cluain-maine) he says it was built by St. Columba, although Colgan has no such thing. (Compare with Not. prec.)

(118) Adaman (L. 3. c. 23.) makes mention of one Ernene, whose name, he says, may be interpreted Ferreolus, (from the Irish word Earnach, or Iarran, iron) and says that he was buried in Dorso Tommae (Druim-Tomma) among the remains of other monks of St. Columba. Accordingly there was a monastery in that place, founded most probably by the saint himself. Adamnan had seen Ernene, when very old, but speaks of him as having been a strong working man at the time of Columba's death. He does not represent him as the founder of that establishment, as Harris does; nor does he even make him abbot there, although Archdall presumes to say, that we are informed he was. Who gave that information, is quite unknown to me; certainly not Adamnan, who exhibits him as a simple monk; nor even Colgan, who, expressly treating of him at 1 January, merely tells us, he spent a great part of his life at Druim-Tomma, and was buried there. In one passage indeed, (Tr. Th. p. 490) he calls him, but without adducing any authority, abbot of that place. This seems to have been a slip of the pen.

(119) Adamnan relates (L. 1. c. 20) that Baitan had, on a certain occasion, applied to Columba for his blessing, and that, having governed for many years a small establishment, cellula, at Sath-reginden, he died at Derry. This last circumstance seems to show, that he was a Columbian monk. Colgan conjectured that the true name of the place was perhaps Rath-reginden, and that, as Baitan died at Derry, it was in some not far distant tract and probably somewhere in Tirconnel, and in the diocese of Derry. Archdall, in his usual blundering manner, introduces Colgan as speaking positively on the subject; and, not content with so doing, instead of Tirconnel, he has that place under county of Derry, adding that Colgan says it was founded by St. Columba; whereas, on the contrary, Colgan expressly states (Tr. Th. p. 377), that Baitan was the founder of it.

(120) We read in Adamnan, (L. 1. c. 50) who latinizes its name into Cella magna Deathrib, that, on St. Columba's arrival there on some particular occasion, several presents were brought to him by the people of the neighbourhood. O'Donnel says (L. 1. c. 110.) that he kept a school in that monastery. This is stated also in the life of St. Munna of Taighmon. Adamnan's words prove indeed, that there was such a monastery in the saint's time, but make it only probable that he was the founder of it. Yet, combined with the latter authorities, they seem to form a strong argument in favour of the common opinion, which I shall not controvert, as I do not find any thing material in opposition to it.

(121) Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 494.) places it in Connaught, without telling us in what part of that great province. Elsewhere he has it in Cavan. (See Not. 40 to Chap. x.)

(122) This monastery is mentioned by Adamnan (L. c. 43), who relates that one day, when St. Columba happened to be in Ireland (after the foundation of Hy) Columbanus drove a curricl in which they were both seated. He does not expressly say, that Columbanus was a disciple of his; but it cannot be doubted, that he was; for he appears as accompanying the saint, who had come to Ireland for some ecclesiastical purposes, “aliquibus ecclesiasticis utilitatibus coactus.” (Messingh. ed L. 2. c. 18.) Instead of utilitatibus Colgan’s edition (lo. cit.) has visitantibus, which makes no sense, and renders the author’s meaning quite confused. Adamnan then observes, that this Columbanus was the founder of the monastery, called Snam-luthir. But it does not appear, whether he founded it before or after St. Columba’s death. Archdall says, that Columbanus was, as we are told, the saint’s charioteer. This is like what he has about St. Brigid’s coachman. Did he imagine that St. Columba kept chariots? Or is it because Columbanus happened to drive the vehicle, in which the saint was travelling, that he must be called a charioteer?

(123) Adamnan (L. 2. c. 31.) speaks of Finten as young, when, among others, accompanying St. Columba in a journey across the Dorsum Britannicum (Drum-Albain) he became dangerously ill. The saint gave him his blessing, and foretold that he would live to a good old age; which was verified by his having afterwards founded Kailli-abinde and his not dying until far advanced in years. Adamnan does not mention his having ever returned to Ireland; nor could Colgan discover any place of that name. He says indeed, that there is a church in Carbury (Sligo), called Caille; but he could not find Finten there, instead of whom a St. Muadnata was revered. Besides, what becomes of abinde, the second part of said name, by which it was meant to distinguish Finten’s monastery from other establishments called Kailli or Caille? Archdall leaps over these difficulties, and gives us a monastery of Cailleavinde in the county of Sligo.

(124) O’Donnel (L. 1. c. 104.) relates, that St. Columba, having dedicated that place to God, left there as superior Dochonna, or, as he calls him, Dachonna. Colgan says, when expressly treating of him, (AA. SS. ad 8. Mart.) that he was more generally called Mochonna, but observes that his real name was Chonna, to which if Mo be prefixed, we have my Chonna; if Do or Da, thy Chonna. An author of a Life of St. Columba, quoted by Colgan (ib.), also calls him Dachonna, and tells us that St. Columba erected a monastery at Eas-mac-neirc, and gave him the care of it. Colgan states that he was of the family of a famous chieftain, Erc, from whom that place got the additional name of mac-neirc, signifying the sons of Erc. It is mentioned in the Tripartite life of St. Patrick (L. 2. c. 101.), where he is said to have foretold that Columb-kill would establish a monastery there. (See also Joceline, cap. 90.) Ware thought (Ant. cap. 26 at Roscommon) it might have been the same as Inchmacnerin, an island in Lough-kee. This cannot be reconciled with the older writers, who never speak of it as an island, and agree in placing it on the bank of the river Buell or Boyle. According to Colgan (loc. cit. and Tr. Th. p. 494.) it was the very monastery, which, many centuries later, fell into the possession of the Cisterian order, and became so famous under the name of Abbey of Boyle. The foundation of it is assigned by O'Donnel, &c. &c. to some time previous to the saint's departure for Britain; and here it will not be amiss to observe that, whatever monasteries were established in Ireland by himself in person, they were, as well as I can discover, all prior to that epoch.

§. XI. Besides the saint's exertions for establishing religious communities and churches, several other circumstances are related as forming part of his history. But, as they rest on very doubtful authority, we may pass them by, (125) and now proceed to inquire into the occasion or cause of his determination to leave Ireland. A silly story is told relative to this subject, and with circumstances quite unbecoming the conduct of holy men and even the gravity of common history. (126) The substance of it is as follows. Columba, happening to be on a visit with St. Finnian of Maghbile at Druimfionn, (127) borrowed from him a manuscript of some part of the holy scriptures, which he immediately set about transcribing, unknown to Finian. When he had nearly finished his copy of it, Finian, being apprized of the business, was highly displeased at Columba's conduct, and told him that he ought not to have transcribed a book, his property, without his permission. Next he insisted on getting said copy from Columba, maintaining that he had a right to it, inasmuch as it was the offspring of his manuscript. (128) To this strange plea Columba replied, that he would leave the matter to the arbitration of Diermit then king of all Ireland, who, on the case being laid before him, decided in favour of Finnian. Columba, irritated at this unjust sentence, declared to him in the presence of all the by-standers, that it would not pass unrevenged. Then we are told how about the same time Curnan, son of Aidus king of Connaught, fled to Columba for protection against the fury of Diermit, and how, by his order, that young prince was dragged from the saint's bosom and immediately put to death. (129) This atrocity added still more to Columba's resentment, so that, addressing the king, he told him that he would make a complaint to the princes, his relatives, for the various insults he had received from him. Accordingly he secretly set out for his own country, and, having escaped some snares laid for him by Diermit, arrived safe in Ulster. Anmireus, his cousin, then chieftain of Kinell-Connuill, and the two brothers Fergus and Domnald, heads of Kinell-Eoguin (Tyrone), on being informed of Diermit's proceeding, soon raised an army, and, being assisted by Aidus king of Connaught, challenged him to battle. (130) The engagement took place at Culdremni, (131) while Finian was praying for the success of the king's party, and, on the other side, Columba for that of his relatives and friends. (132) The prayers of the latter being more efficacious, Diermit's army was defeated with the loss of 3000 men, whereas of their antagonists there fell only one man. (133) Then come some other circumstances, which it would be idle to mention; and the whole of this notable story ends with telling us, that Columba felt remorse for the part he had acted in these troubles, and that he was directed by several holy men to undergo whatever penance would be enjoined on him by St. Lasrean, al. Molassius, of Devenish, who, on being applied to, ordered him to quit Ireland for ever, and to exert himself for the salvation of as many others as had fallen in that war. (134)

(125) It is really surprising that Smith, who, besides D. D. calls himself an honorary member of the Antiquarian society of Scotland, could have been so unacquainted not only with the true history of St. Columba, but likewise with the general history of the times, as to send him travelling to foreign countries before he settled in Hy, that is prior to A. D. 563, and representing him as caressed by king Sigebert (of Austria) and founding a monastery in Italy. He applies to him a passage of Walafrid Strabo, which is in this writer's Life of St. Gallus, a tract which Smith must not have seen, as otherwise he would have immediately perceived, that our Columba was not the person there spoken of, but Columbanus the disciple of Comgall and founder of the monasteries of Luxeuil and Bobbio. It is true, that these two great men have been confounded together by some former writers, and, among others, by Dempster, whose ignorance and impertinence on this point have been well exposed by Usher (p. 688). Smith followed Dempster, or some equally bad authority. But surely every one in our days, tolerably conversant in the history of Europe, knows that Columbanus, who became so celebrated in France and Italy, was a quite different person from Columbkille, and that he did not arrive in France until about the year 590. As to Columbkille, it is evident from his whole history, that he never visited any part of the Continent. O'Donnel's fable (L. 3. c. 27. seqq.) about his journey to Rome in the time of Gregory the great, and on his return stopping at Tours, is treated with indifference even by Colgan, who shows that some parts of it are absolutely false.

(126) O'Donnel has this story at great length in the beginning of his second book. Usher has given it, (p. 902. seqq.) in an abridged and less exceptionable form, from a foolish anonymous writer, who had the impudence to refer to Adamnan as his authority; although, as Usher observes, (p. 1194.) Adamnan could not have written such trash. (Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 462.) copied it from Usher. The author was so ignorant as to call Gildas a Saxon. We find some similar stuff in Keating (B. 2. p. 28. seqq. ed. a. 1723.) taken from such documents as the Black book of Molaga.

(127) See Not. 89 to Chap. x.

(128) In the account published by Usher, instead of a question about a book, we have, according to his printed text, one about a freeman, pro “quodam libero respectendo.” And soon after he has “liberi.” This must be owing to his having misunderstood the MS. whence he took it, so as to read libero and liberi for libro and libri, as Colgan has them, who knew more about this foolish tradition than Usher did. Yet Usher might have been easily deceived, as the matter is introduced abruptly without any mention of Finnian, who, on the contrary, according to said account, could not have been, as will be seen lower down, the person, between whom and Columba any such dispute existed.

(129) This anecdote relating to Curnan does not occur in the narrative as given by Usher.

(130) The matter is differently and more rationally stated in Usher’s account, according to which Columba merely threatened Diarmot with the vengeance of God, and then left the court in disgust. It is added that the king, incensed at the declaration made by the saint, proceeded with an army towards Tirconnel for the purpose of extirpating all his connexions and subduing their country. Thus he, not they, was the aggressor in this war.

(131) Adamnan calls it Culedreibhne. It was in the territory of Carbre, not far from Sligo to the North. The battle was fought in the year 561, (See Not. 76.) as appears from the Annals of Ulster. Johnston must have fallen into some mistake, where in Extracts from those Annals he marks this battle at A. 559 (560). It was, I dare say, on Johnston’s authority, that Pinkerton also (Not. to Adamnan, L. 1. c. 7.) assigned it to the said year. Yet in a note to Cumineus (cap. 22) he agrees with Usher as to Columba’s arrival in Britain A. D. 563. Thus he must have supposed, that the true year of the battle was 561. The 4 Masters have 555 (556); but Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 452) rejects this date, and adopts that of Usher.

(132) In the account (ap. Usher) Columba alone is introduced as praying for the protection of his friend, against the fury of Diermit's forces, for whom no saint is mentioned as interceding.

(133) According to what we find in Usher not even one man of this party was killed; and the slaughter of the king's troops is attributed to the appearance, in their camp, of an Angel in human form of an enormous size, in a military garb, heading a few men, at which sight they were so terrified that, instead of attacking their opponents, they fled precipitately, and in their hurry to escape, many of them killed each other.

(134) Not Lasrean but Finnian appears (ap. Usher) as the person to whom Columba applied for a suitable penance, and who prescribed it, omitting the part relative to perpetual exile. Following this account, Finnian could not have been the plaintiff in the pretended question about the book, nor his opponent during the battle.

(135) Adamnan relates, (L. 3. c. 4.) that, a short time before his sailing for Britain, Columba went to pay a visit to his venerable old master Finnian, who, on his approaching, saw him accompanied by an Angel, and said to some brethren then present; "Behold the holy Columba, who has merited the having a celestial being as his companion."

§. XII. Who does not see, that this is not history but poetry, and that there is scarcely a word of truth in it, except that such a battle was fought, and that it is very probable that St. Columba, without having been at all concerned in bringing it about, prayed for the protection of his kinsmen and their subjects against the fury of Diermit, who was bent on exterminating them? No one of common sense will admit the fable of the quarrel about the book, the groundwork of this ludicrous drama. And as to any dispute between Columba and Finnian, it is evident from Adamnan, that it did not occur, and that these two saints retained their mutual friendship and esteem to the last. (135) Equally groundless is his having been ordered to do penance for what occurred in that war, and to subject himself to perpetual exile. (136) Besides the retailers of this story differing among themselves as to the person, who imposed the penance, and the nature of it, (137) we find Columba remaining in Ireland for about two years after the battle, instead of fulfilling his penitential task, and afterwards returning to it, notwithstanding that pretended condemnation to perpetual banishment. Nor does it appear, that the attempt at excommunicating Columba, which was frustrated by the interposition of Brendan of Birr, took place after the battle of Culdremni, it being much more probable that it occurred several years prior to it. (138) It is now clear that all that has been said about Columba having been the cause or occasion of that battle, and consequently of his departure from Ireland, rests upon no other authority than the jarring fictions of some poetasters, who strove to embellish their rhapsodies with tales of saints contending against each other in support of the respective armies, for which they implored victory. And yet even in our days persons have been found either so foolish or malignant as to rake out those stories from the obscurity, into which they had fallen, and to deal them out to the public. (139) The true, or, at least, principal cause of St. Columba's going to Britain was his zeal for the conversion of the Northern Picts, who were still in a state of paganism, (140) and for the better instruction of his countrymen who were settled in Argyle and other adjacent tracts. (141) Besides this cause another is mentioned, which, indeed, may be admitted, as it implies nothing absurd or contradictory. It is said, that not having been able to succeed in his endeavours to reconcile the princes his relatives, and to make them desist from the deadly feuds, in which they engaged, this unhappy state of things was an additional motive for his leaving Ireland. (142) That he communicated his plan to some of the distinguished saints of that period and consulted them concerning it, is very probable. (143) We know that, a short time before his sailing for Britain, he paid a visit to his old master Finnian of Maghbile; (144) and Brendan of Birr is said to have directed him to form his establishment in the small island, which bore the name of one of the letters of the alphabet, I. (145)

(136) In the Life of St. Lasreanus referred to by Usher (p. 1066.) and quoted by Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 461.) part of the sentence said to have been pronounced by him is thus expressed; “Ut perpetuo moraretur extra Hiberniam in exilio.” Hence O’Donnel took what he also has about a perpetual exile.

(137) See Not. 134.

(138) Adamnan (L. 3. c. 3.) gives a very clear account of this transaction. A certain synod, he says, had issued a sentence of excommunication, not justly as afterwards appeared, against Columba, on account of some venial and excusable proceedings. On his arrival at said synod, Brendan, who had seen him at a distance, rose up, saluted him with great respect, and embraced him. Some of the elders, then taking Brendan apart, expostulated with him for his having shown such attention to a person, whom they had excommunicated. He replied; “If you had seen what the Lord has been pleased to make manifest to me this day concerning this elect of his, whom you are dishonouring, you would have never passed that sentence; whereas the Lord does not in any manner excommunicate him, in virtue of your wrong sentence, but rather exalts him still more and more.” On their asking how this could be he told them, that he saw a luminous pillar advancing before this man of God, when on his way, and holy Angels accompanying him through the plain. “Therefore,” he added, “I dare not treat with contempt him, whom I see preordained by God as a guide of nations to life.” Upon which the proceedings were withdrawn, and the whole synod paid him the greatest respect and veneration. In Messingham’s edition (L. 3. c. 2.) there is a stupid note attributing that excommunication to Columba’s mode of observing Easter. There was no dispute in Ireland about the time of celebrating that festival until after his death. Usher (Ind. Chron.) places it in the year 561 after the battle of Culdremni, as if it had taken place in consequence of said battle. Were this the case, it would set aside at once the story of the penance laid upon Columba, whereas the synod acknowledged that he did not deserve any censure. But there is every reason to think that it occurred several years earlier. Brendan seems to speak of him as one not yet invested with much authority, or very generally respected, destined, however, to be a leader of souls to heaven. O'Donnel (L. 1. c. 42) represents him as a youth at that time; but Brendan's calling him a man of God shows, that he was not then very young. It is highly probable, that the whole transaction ought to be assigned to about 550 or somewhat later, when Columba was planning his monastery of Durrogh. (See above §. 8. and Not. 97.) at which time Brendan was already abbot of Birr. (Not. 28 above; and Not. 130 to Chap. x.) This supposition is confirmed by the circumstance of the synod having been held in a place called (Colgan's Adamnan, L. 3. c. 3.) Hiseilte or the district of Seilte, which Colgan conjectures, and I think justly, to have been the same as Maggesilde in Leinster, afterwards contracted into Geisille. Colgan's Geisille must be the now barony of Geashill in the King's county, which is not far distant from Durrogh, and lay convenient for the attendance of Brendan.

(139) Besides Warner, O'Halloran, an equally wretched authority as to our church history, repeats all this nonsense more than once. (Hist. &c. B. VIII. ch. 4-7.) Dr. Ledwich, notwithstanding his admiration of Columba and his pretended Culdees, says, (Antiq. &c. p. 57) that "he instigated a bloody war without just cause, of which being made sensible he abjured his native land by a voluntary exile." The reader is already able to judge, what truth there is in this assertion; nor would I have troubled him with a refutation of those fables, were it not for the purpose of guarding him against giving credence to such vile imputations against the character of that truly holy man. But why did not the Doctor give the story, as he found it? Why call his exile voluntary in opposition to O'Donnel, the only biographer of Columba, who has this story (although the Doctor talks of biographers), and who exhibits it as enjoined on him by St. Molassius? Perhaps our antiquary thought, that the injunction of penances smelt of Popery.

(140) Bede writes (L. 3. c. 4.) that he came to Britain for the purpose of preaching to that people: "Venit de Hybernia-Britanniam, prædicaturus verbum Dei provinciis septentrionalium pictorum."

(141) Adamnan (Second Preface al. L. 1. c. 1.) comprizes the two objects in a few words ; “ De Scotia ad Britanniam, pro Christo peregrinari volens, enavigavit.” The phrase pro Christo alludes not to Columba’s own salvation, which he might have worked at home as well as any where else, but to the extension of the glory of Christ and the advantage of souls. The Martyrology of Donegall (ap. Tr. Th. p. 483.) has very well illustrated this subject. After stating his exertions for the good of religion in Ireland, it adds ; “ Salutis animarum et propagandae fidei aestuans desiderio, in Albionem profectus ibi extruxit famosum illud Hyense et alia plurima monasteria et ecclesias ; et in ea regione, quam de tenebris idolatriae fidei luci asseruit, et in religionis ac bonorum operum principiis solidavit plura praestitit beneficia et obsequia Deo grata quam in patria Hiberniae regione.” In the whole account or abridged Life of Columba, given in this Martyrology, there is not a word relative to his having been in any wise concerned in the war above treated of, or to the pretended penance laid on him, &c.

(142) Life of St. Farannan at 15 Feb. There were furious contests at that period between the southern and northern Nialls, to both of which parties Columba was related. The battle of Culdremni was one effect of their quarrels.

(143) Usher collected (Ind. Chron. p. 563) from anecdotes, which he had met with here and there, that Columba left Ireland in consequence of the advice of Finnian of Clonard, Brendan of Birr, and Lasrean al. Molassius. That he might have consulted several of his eminent friends is not improbable, but we are not to suppose, what Usher seemed to think, that his motives for quitting his country were of a merely prudential or political nature. In the passage now referred to Usher fell into a strange and with him unusual contradiction. He calls the Finnian, to whom, according to the document published by himself, and which he points out to the reader, Columba is said to have applied for advice and penance after the battle of Culdremni, (See Not. 134) by the name of Finnian of Clonard. Now he had already laid down, that this Finnian died in 552. Usher’s mistake proceeded from his not having been acquainted with the history of Finnian of Maghbile, who was the Finnian spoken of by Adamnan, Cumineus, and others, as the master and friend of Columba. (See Not. 74 and 81. to Chap. x.) This mistake staggered for a while Colgan as to the time of the death of Finnian of Clonard. But he corrected himself afterwards. Harris blindly following the same mistake, (Bishops. p. 136.) among other bungling about Columba and said Finnian, makes the latter live until 563.

(144) See Not. p. 135.

(145) Life of Brendan, quoted by Usher (p. 1059.) and Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 462.) I, which is one of the Irish names of an island in general, was probably the original name, by which Hy, al. Iona, as now more generally called, was known. By prefixing an aspirate to it was formed Hy as Bede calls it. In the annals of Ulster and Tigernach it is called Ia; in the Life of St. Blaithmaic by Walafrid Strabo Eo. See further variations of this name in Usher (p. 697.) and Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 495), who says, that in old Irish documents it is sometimes spelled Io, from which, with great probability, he derives Iona, as an adjective, so that insula Iona means the island of Io. By degrees it became to be considered as a substantive, and, being declinable, was preferred by several authors when writing in Latin. Baxter (Glossar. ad Sodorinas) has a foolish derivation from the Irish I, and the Pictish Onas, both of which, he says, signify island. Who would have tacked together two names from different languages in this tautological manner? Nor do we even find that it was ever written Ionas. Some have said that Iona means island of waves. (Garnett's Tour in the Highlands, &c. Vol. 1. p. 246.) Where is to be met with a Gaelic word ona of that signification? In some editions of Adamnan Iova appears by mistake (mendose, as Usher and Colgan observe) for Iona. The mighty Ledwich, who talks about Gothic without any knowledge of its ancient dialects, says (p. 59) that "I, Hy, &c. are obviously the Gothic Ai, Ei, referring to its oval or egg-like shape." What a parade of learning! Why not, instead of Gothic, have said either the German or Low Dutch, in which Ey, Ei signify an egg? But Gothic has a more recondite sound. Now the Doctor, should have looked for the genuine Gothic name for an egg, and he would have found that it was egg, from which was derived the old Alemaniic eig, since softened into ei, (See Ihre, Glossar. Suiogothic, &c. at Egg.) The name I or Hy was in use before an egg was ever called ei.

§. XIII. Before St. Columba set out for the island, now known by the name of I-Columb-kill, but which for shortness sake I shall call Hy, he must have got permission from the proprietor of it to settle there. Accordingly the grant of it made to him by his relative Conall king of the Albanian Scots (146) ought to be placed before his departure from Ireland, as it can scarcely be imagined, that he would have directed his course, and attended by a number of followers, to that small island without his being allowed to inhabit it. For it must be observed, that he is generally represented as having sailed straight from Ireland to Hy, (147) together with twelve of his disciples. (148) The year of his arrival, after a short passage was 563. (149) Having erected a monastery and a church, and arranged such matters as were connected with his establishment, in which occupation, besides his visiting the territories of his relatives in the mainland of Britain, he may have passed about two years; (150) Columba, taking with him some assistants, undertook his wished for task of converting the Northern Picts, who inhabited the whole of modern Scotland to the North of the great range of the Grampian mountains. (151) He was the first Christian missionary that appeared in that then wild country. (152) When arrived at the residence of king Brude, (153) he found the gate closed; and the king gave orders that it should not be opened; upon which the saint, advancing with his companions, made the sign of the cross on it, and, on his then pushing it with his hand, it immediately flew open. Brude, being apprized of this prodigy, was, together with his council, struck with terror, and went forward to meet Columba, whom he welcomed in the most kind and respectful manner, and ever after treated with every mark of attention. (154) It is probable, that the king's conversion took place not long after; but the Magi, the chief of whom seems to have been one Broichan,

(155) exerted themselves to prevent the missionaries from preaching to the people ; and it is particularly related that, one evening, while the saint and a few of his brethren were celebrating Vespers near the royal residence or castle, some of those magi coming near them did all they could to hinder them from being heard by the inhabitants, but that all their efforts were fruitless. (156) The Almighty was pleased to confirm Columba's mission by various miracles, the most remarkable of which was the resurrection of a boy, who had died a few days after he and his parents, together with the whole family, became Christians, through the saint's preaching, and were baptized. From the circumstance of his death some magi took occasion to jeer and insult his parents, and to boast that their gods were stronger than the God of the Christians. Columba, being apprized of the whole matter, went to the parents' house, and, desiring them to confide in the divine omnipotence, was shown into the place where the body was stretched. Then, having ordered those who were assembled there to withdraw, he prayed most fervently for some time, and directing his eyes to the body, said ; " In the name of the Lord Jesus Christ rise, and stand upon thy feet." Immediately the boy returned to life, and opened his eyes. The saint, lifting him up, and taking him by the hand, conducted him to his parents, upon which the people raise a shout, lamentation is changed into joy, and the God of Christians is glorified. (157)

(146) We have seen above (Not. 73), that St. Columba was related to the Dalriadan dynasty, which formed the Scottish kingdom in Britain. To understand the relationship between him and Conall it is to be observed, that the latter was great grandson to Fergus brother of Loarn, one of the great grandfathers of the saint. Conall's pedigree is very clearly traced in the line of the first Scottish kings ; 1. Loarn. 2. Fergus his brother.

3. Domangard son of Fergus. 4. Comgall son of Domangard. 5. Gauran, brother to Comgall. 6. Conall son of Comgall, and nephew to Gauran. (See O'Flaherty, Ogyg. p. 472, 473.) That Conall was the prince, who made a grant of Hy to Columba, is proved from the Annals of Ulster and Tigernach, and from the circumstance that it was an appendage of his kingdom. Hence it appears, that Bede was mistaken (L. 3. c. 4.) in attributing that grant to Bridius king of the Northern Picts. For in the first place Hy was, as Usher remarks, (p. 703), too far distant from the Pictish territories to form a part of them; being near the S. W. angle of Mull, which lies adjacent to the coast then possessed by Conall. Next how is it to be supposed, that Bridius, who was still a pagan when Columba arrived at Hy, would have been applied to by him for any grant, or would have voluntarily made him one? Bede indeed thought, that Columba did not get possession of Hy until after the conversion of Bridius and his subjects; but this supposition cannot be reconciled with the series of the saint's history, as constantly given, from which it is plain that he did not undertake that mission before he had there formed his establishment. Without appealing to O'Flaherty, the 4 Masters, and several old Scotch authorities (See Tr. Th. p. 496.) Chalmers admits (Caledonia Vol. 1. p. 265 and 322) that Hy was granted to the saint by Conall. Those, who have called it a Pictish island, merely followed Bede.

(147) In the second Life, a work taken from older documents, (See Not. 70) it is related (cap. 6.), that St. Columba, thinking that the proper time was come for preaching to the Picts, left his country, and sailed for Hy, where having erected a monastery, &c. O'Donnel says, (L. 2. c. 11.) that directing his course to Albion he landed in Hy on the eve of Pentecost, and that, having driven some Druids out of the island, he set about erecting a monastery. And in the Life of Farannan we read; "Peregrinationis cursum direxit sanctissimus pater (Columba) in insulam Hi, ubi," &c. It may perhaps be objected, that Cumineus and Adamnan say, that he sailed from Ireland to Britain. But as Hy was a British island, although then possessed by the Scots, they might, without any inconsistency, have included it under that name, particularly as the saint intended to go not long after, as he actually did, to Britain strictly so called. I shall not stop to inquire into the truth of a sort of story, that St. Columba landed in Knapdale in Argyle before he proceeded to Hy. (See Statist. Acc. of Scotland, Vol. XIX. p. 314.)

(148) Adamnan writes ; (L. 3. c. 4.) “ Sanctus cum duodecim commilitonibus discipulis ad Britanniam transnavigavit.” Usher (p. 694) has given their names from an appendix to a copy of Adamnan in the Cottonian library, now in the British Museum, and from which Pinkerton added them to his edition. Colgan justly observes (Tr. Th. p. 487) that Usher’s arrangement of the names is not all through correct, particularly in his making Mocutheimne and Mocufir proper names of distinct persons, whereas in reality they are surnames, meaning descendants of Theimne and Fir by prefixing Mocu or Mocua, which, as used by Adamnan and other other old Irish writers, has that signification. Yet Colgan’s own arrangement is in one or two points not very satisfactory. Without troubling the reader with further inquiries, or pointing out the mistakes of Hector Boethius and the lies of Dempster (See Usher, p. 695) concerning these twelve persons, I shall endeavour to mark them as distinctly as I am able. “ 1. Baithen, qui et Comin, sancti successor Columbae. 2. Cobtach frater ejus (i. e. of Baithen). 3. Ernaan, sancti avunculus Columbae. 4. Dermitius ejus ministrator. 5. 6. Rus et Fethuo, duo filii Rodani. 7. Scandal filius Bresail, filii Endei, filii Neil. 8. Luguid Mocutheimne. 9. Echoid. 10. Thorannu Mocufir. 11. Cetea. 12. Cairnaan filius Branduib filii Meilgi Grillaan.” Colgan has some doubts about Cetea, and was willing to put him out of the list. On the other hand, he makes Grillaan the name of a distinct person instead of joining it with Usher, as a surname to Meilgi. Pinkerton agrees with him as to Grillaan, and following a conjecture of his, adds Cetea to Mocufir, thus making Thorannu’s surname Mocufircetea.

(149) (See Not. 76. Bede says (Epitome, &c.) that Columba came to Britain, for the purpose of teaching the Picts, in the year 565 ; and elsewhere (L. 3. c. 4.) he observes, that his arrival was in the ninth year of the reign of Bridius king of the Picts. From a comparison of these dates Hermannus Contractus laid down in his Chronicle, that Bridius began to reign in 557. Hence, after passing through various hands, this notation of Bridius’ reign was thrust into an edition of Count Marcellinus without the authority of any copy of said Chronicle in its genuine state (See Usher p. 692.) Yet I find this Chronicle still referred to for the beginning of that reign. (Chalmers, Caledon. Pictish period.) But, setting it and that of Hermannus aside, it is clear that Bede must have supposed, that the first year of Bridius' reign was either 557, or more probably 556, to which it is assigned by Innes in his Chronological table, and from him, by Chalmers, ib. They call him Bridei, which agrees with the Bridius of Bede. Adamnan calls him Brudeus, as does Buchanan (Rer. Scot. L. 5. ad reg. 49.). His real name was, I believe, Brude, which was a very common appellation of the Pictish kings, thirty of whom are spoken of, as having been so called in the Chronicon Pictorum, published by Innes (Critical Essay, &c. Vol. 2.); and Buchanan (at reg. 68) has two more of those kings under the name of Brudus. To return to Bede's date, 565, Usher has proved, and it is now universally admitted, that Columba's arrival in Hy ought to be assigned to 563. Yet, if it be considered that Bede alluded chiefly to the time, in which Columba commenced his mission among the Picts, the two dates may in some manner be reconciled. For, although he reached Hy in 563, he might not have gone into the Pictish territories until 565, after having spent about two years in forming his establishment in the island. And it is very remarkable that Bede (L. 3. c. 4.) makes Columba live about 32 years after his arrival in Britain, whereas Adamnan expressly states, (Second Pref. al. L. 1. c. 1. and L. 3. c. 22.) that he did not die until 34 years after his departure from Ireland. Now comparing all these dates, the result is the same as to the time of Columba's death; inasmuch as 32 added to 565 bring us to the same point as 34 added to 563. Adamnan alluded to the epoch of his having become an inhabitant of Hy, "per annos 34 insulanus miles;" Bede to that of his preaching to the Picts. It may be objected, that Bede mentions the foundation of Hy, but does not place it before 565. To this I answer, that Bede was mistaken as to the time of that establishment (See Not. 146.) and, it would seem so much so, that, according to his making it follow the conversion of the Picts, it should be placed even later than 565. For it is not easy to imagine, that said conversion could have been completed within the very year in which he began to announce to them the word of God.

(150) See Not. prec. Adamnan introduces Columba as holding a conversation in Britain with king Conall at the time of the battle of-Moinmor, that is, in the year 563, between the Northern Nials and the Irish Picts, in which the latter were defeated with great loss. (See Adamnan L. 1. c. 7. and Colgan's notes.) Hence it appears, that Columba paid a visit to Conall, not long after his arrival at Hy.

(151) Bede (L. 3. c. 4.) after stating, that Columba came to preach to the Northern Picts, adds; "hoc est, eis qui arduis atque horrentibus montium jugis ab australibus eorum sunt regionibus sequestrati." As to the Southern Picts, he tells us that they had been converted long before by Nynia or Ninian. From the time of the arrival of the Scots the Southern Picts inhabited only an eastern part of Scotland between the Frith of Forth and these mountains mentioned by Bede. (See Not. 149 to Chap. 1.) The territories occupied by the Scots in the West lay between the Frith of Clyde and the western part of said range, by which they were separated from the country of the Northern Picts, as Adamnan informs us, (L. 2. c. 4.) where, having made mention of these Picts and the Scots of Britain, he says; "inter quos utrosque Dorsi montes Britannici disternini." By Dorsum Britannicum or Drum Albin was meant the highest part of the Grampian mountains. (See Buchanan Rer. Scot. &c. L. 1. p. 18. Elzivir ed.)

(152) Hector Boethius, not wishing to acknowledge that a great part of Scotland was until then immersed in Paganism, introduces Columba as merely reclaiming king Brudeus and his subjects from the Pelagian heresy. He lays the scene of his exertions in Lothian. But, as Usher observes (p. 692), Lothian did not at that time belong to the Picts, but to the Britons and Anglo-Saxons; and it is evident from Bede and Adamnan, that the conversion of Brudeus was not from heresy but idolatry. To this purpose Usher quotes (p. 688.) from a Scottish breviary, part of an office of St. Columba, in which we read;

" Per quem (Columbam) idonea vitae primordia Rex gentis sumpsit Pictiniae."

(153) Smith (Life, &c. p. 18.) says that Brude reigned at Inverness. Pinkerton says (Modern Geography, Vol. 1. p. 152) that the Caledonian kings, when converted to Christianity, chiefly resided there. Yet it is probable that Brude's castle, which was certainly near the river Ness, was not so far from the lake as Inverness is. (See Adamnan, L. 2. c. 34.) Pinkerton in his map of Caledonia places it close to the N. E. end of the lake, near where the river begins to flow out of it.

(154) Adamnan, L. 2. c. 35.

(155) Adamnan, L. 2. c. 33.) calls this magus Broichean the king's tutor, nutricius; and (ib. c. 34.) mentions his attempting to excite a storm in opposition to Columba.

(156) Adamnan, L. 1. c. 37.

(157) Adamnan, L. 2. c. 32. Cumineus also has recorded this miracle. He writes; (cap. 22.) "Post genuflexionem quoque et orationem surgens, in nomine Domini mortuum cuiusdam plebei filium suscitavit, et post celebratas exequias patri et matri reddidit." The boy's father is here said to have been a plebeian, and so he is called by Adamnan, who observes that he heard the word of life by means of an interpreter or expounder, on the preaching of Columba; per interpretatorem, sancto praedicante vir. From this passage it has been deduced, that said man did not understand the language in which Columba preached; if so, he must have been a foreigner, or so illiterate as not to understand the language of his own country, in the same manner as there are in all countries persons, who, being accustomed to some barbarous dialect or jargon, know so little of the correct manner of speaking, that it appears to them a sort of foreign tongue. It is not to be supposed, that Columba would have preached to the Picts in any other language than their own; and, without inquiring into whatsoever affinity there might have been between that and the Irish, it is sufficient to observe, that he might have learned it even before he went to Hy, as there was a colony of Picts settled in the North of Ireland long prior to that period. (See Chap. 111. §. 3. and ib. Not. 25.) Yet the words of Adamnan can, I think, be well explained without recurring to any question as to difference of language or dialect. His meaning probably was that, as said man was of an inferior rank and uneducated, he was instructed by a better informed person, or, as we may call him, a catechist, in the nature of the mysteries and truths announced by Columba in his sermons. Interpretator, or interpres, is more generally used to signify an expounder of difficulties than an explainer or translator of words.

§. XIV. It cannot be doubted that St. Columba's exertions were attended with great success, and that he erected some churches and religious houses in that country even during the time of his first preaching there. But it is very probable, that he did not then remain until the conversion of the whole nation was completed. For we find that he visited those parts more than once, (158) and it appears that there were magi and Pagans still remaining in the times of some of his later excursions through the Pictish territories. (159) Yet we may be assured, that he left spiritual instructors to provide for the religious wants of the new converts, and to propagate the Christian faith during the times of his occasional absence. Who they were is very imperfectly recorded, so that, although two or three of them may be guessed at, an exact account of them is not to be expected. (160) In the same obscurity is involved the history of the churches and ecclesiastical institutions first established in the newly converted provinces. It will be easily admitted that a church existed, from an early time of Columba's mission, at the King's residence; but, although we find a great number of religious establishments, both in that country and in other parts of Scotland, called by his name or those of his disciples, yet the precise period at which the more ancient of them were formed, cannot, as far as I know, be ascertained. (161) It is said that he penetrated even into the Orkney islands and formed cells in them. (162) The history of St. Columba's proceedings in the Hebrides or Western Islands is better known. With indefatigable zeal he visited them frequently, preaching the Gospel, supplying them with religious teachers, erecting churches, and forming religious communities. The names of several of the islands, which were blessed with his exertions, are particularly mentioned. Hinba or Hymba, where he founded a monastery, over which after some years he placed his maternal uncle Ernan, (163) seems to have been a favourite retreat of Columba. We find him there on various occasions and at different periods. He was in this island, when visited by four holy founders of monasteries in Ireland, Comgall, Cainnech, Brendan of Clonfert, (164) and Cormac Hua Liathain; and when, while celebrating Mass at their request, and in their presence, Brendan saw a very bright flame, like a burning pillar, as if rising from his head, which continued from the time of the consecration until the termination of the sacred mysteries. (165) It was there also that on another occasion he had some extraordinary visions and visitations from heaven, which lasted for three days and three nights. (166) There were several monasteries founded by himself, or, in virtue of his orders, by his disciples, in an island called Ethica, (167) one of which was governed by Baithen, (168) who afterwards succeeded him as abbot of Hy. Another monastery in Ethica, at a place called Artchain, was founded by a priest Findchan, with whom St. Columba was once highly displeased for his having concurred in raising to the priesthood Aidus, surnamed the black, of the royal blood of the Irish Cruthens or Piets, a sanguinary man, who had killed, besides others, Diernit monarch of Ireland. (169) Lugneus Mocumin, one of his disciples, was placed over a monastery in Elena, which seems to have existed before he became superior of it. (170) That St. Columba formed some, or perhaps more than one establishment in the isle of Skey, is very probable, whereas it is related that he spent some time there, attended by others (171). We may be sure that he had no other motive for visiting Skey than the good of religion, in which case it will not be denied that he erected, at least, a church in that island. Nor can it be questioned, that monasteries or churches were established, before his death, in many others of those islands, although the names of them happen not to be particularly mentioned by his biographers. (172) While St. Columba was thus engaged in converting and civilizing the inhabitants of the isles, he was at times obliged to struggle in their defence against certain desperadoes, calling themselves Christians, who made a trade of plundering them. (173) Having excommunicated some of the ringleaders, who were members of the royal family of the British Scots, (174) one of their adherents, determined on putting him to death, rushed against him with a spear, but providentially without effect. (175)

(158) This is clear from several passages in Adamnan. Thus (L. 2. c. 35.) he mentions the first journey of the saint to the residence of king Brude; in prima Sancti fatigatione itineris ad regem Brudeum. His calling it the first shows that others took place afterwards. He speaks of the saint as at another time travelling across Drum-albin, on which occasion young Finten fell sick. (See Not. 123.) In one place (L. 2. c. 27.) he introduces the saint as spending some months in the Pictish country, Pictorum provincia; in another (ib. c. 32) as spending there only some days.

(159) The conversion of the plebeian and his family (Not. 157) occurred during a visitation different from that, which lasted some months (Not. 158), and during which a miracle was performed by the saint, on which some barbarous gentiles, who were present at it, were forced to acknowledge the greatness of the God of the Christians. Hence we see that Paganism was not quite extirpated in the time of his first mission. Some other instances might be added, if necessary. Accordingly what Bede says (L. 3. c. 4.) of the Pictish (Northern) nation having been converted by Columba must, if applied to the great body of the people, be understood as the effect not of one mission but of several of his, together with, during the intervals, the cooperation of his disciples.

(160) We have already seen (Not. 123.) that Finten, on one occasion, accompanied St. Columba to Pictland. Adamnan (L. 2. c. 27.) makes mention of Lugneus Mocumin as having been also with him in that country. But he tells us (ib. c. 18.) that Lugneus when old, became superior of a monastery in the island called Elena, the same, I suppose, as Elen-ree, an island belonging to the shire of Argyle. If we are to believe O'Donnel (L. 3. c. 26.) one Mochonna, whom he represents as the son of an Irish king, became, by Columba's directions, a bishop among the Picts. Colgan says (Tr. Th. p. 452.) that a St. Mochonna's festival was kept on the 19th of May at Kill-chomharta, which, as no place of that name is to be found in Ireland, he thinks was in Pictland. It was probably the same as Cromarty. Chalmers (Caledon. Vol. 1. p. 322.) connects with the saint's mission in said country an account of the first bishop of Abernethy, who, he says, was Ternanus or Terrenanus, whose festival was held on the 12th of June. If this be true, we may fairly conclude that Ternanus was the same as Thorannu Mocufir mentioned above. (Not. 148.) But what has Abernethy to do with the conversion of the Northern Picts? That place was in the country of the Southern Picts, being situated in Stratherne, a part of Perthshire. They were Christians long before the mission of St. Columba. Some older Scottish writers call the first bishop at Abernethy Tervanus, and pretend that he was appointed by Palladius before the middle of the 5th century. (See Usher, p. 673.) Yet in the Scotichronicon quoted by Usher (p. 712.) the foundation of the church of Abernethy is attributed to the Pictish king Garnard successor of the Brude, in whose reign Columba came to Britain. Was Abernethy comprized within Brude's kingdom, although situated in the country of the Southern Picts? It is called in the said Scotichronicon the capital both civil and ecclesiastical of the whole kingdom of the Picts, notwithstanding our having seen (Not. 153.) that Brude's residence was far to the Northward near the river Ness. Some places more southerly than even Abernethy were subject to Brude. (See below Not. 162.) Leaving the illustration of this matter to the Scottish antiquaries, I shall merely observe that the circumstance of Ternanus' festival having been kept on the 12th of June favours the account given by Chalmers of the origin of the see of Abernethy. For on that very day was revered at Bangor and Drumcliffe, a St. Terennanus or Torannanus, who is said to have been a disciple of St. Columba (See Not. 114.) and whom Colgan conjectures (Tr. Th. p. 492) to have been the same as Thorannu Mocufir. Hence it appears exceedingly probable, that the first bishop of Abernethy was this disciple of our saint. There might have been Christians in that place before Columba's time; but it does not follow that it was an episcopal see; and it is known that he superintended the ecclesiastical affairs, not only of such parts of Scotland as he and his disciples had rescued from idolatry, but also of other tracts in that country, where Christianity had been already introduced.

(161) Chalmers reckons (Vol. 1. p. 320.) several of those churches bearing the name of Columb-kill. We have just seen what may be thought concerning the see of Abernethy. Some writers have attributed to him the foundation of a monastery at Dunkeld in the territory of the Southern Picts. But, according to more correct accounts, (Usher, p. 713.) the church of Dunkeld was not erected until near 27 years after that of Abernethy, which did not exist prior to the death of Brude in 584 (Usher, (Ind. Chron.) or 586 as marked by Innes and Chalmers. Hence it appears that said foundation at Dunkeld must be placed several years after the death of Columba. It was certainly directed to a St. Columba, who as Usher thinks, (p. 705.) was not Columb-kill, but a Columba, the first bishop of Dunkeld, who flourished towards the middle of the seventh century. As I have touched on these subjects, I may be allowed to mention two other establishments, still more distant than Abernethy or Dunkeld from North Pictland, which Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 495.) reckons among those of our saints, and for which he refers to Fordon's history of Scotland. The first is a monastery at Govan on the Clyde, attributed by Fordon not to Columba himself, but to Constantine a king of Cornwall, who, he says, came to Scotland with Columba, and preaching in Kentyre, converted all the inhabitants, and there suffered martyrdom. The latter part of this statement is, at least, very doubtful. The people of Kentyre were Christians long before Columba went to Hy. This Constantine is said to have been that once wicked king, whom Gildas has so severely scourged, and is treated of by Usher, p. 540 to 541.

Colgan has (at xi. Mart.) patched up a sort of Acts of his, and refers to Irish martyrologies, in which a British king Constantine is said to have retired to Ireland and to have placed himself under St. Carthagh Mochudda at Rathen (in Westmeath) where he afterwards became abbot and died. If so, he must have been alive after the year 630 or thereabouts, when Carthagh left Rathen. How then could he have been the Constantine of Gildas, who was king of Cornwall in 543? (See Not. 168 to Chap. ix.) Usher thought he was king there as late as 564, in consequence of his erroneous hypothesis in assigning to that year Gildas's Querulous epistle. Hence he argued (Ind. Chron. ad A. 590) that Constantine could not have accompanied Columba in his first departure from Ireland, but in what he calls the second. Yet, although this argument falls to the ground, and there is nothing to show that Constantine might not have ceased to be a king before 563, in which Columba first left Ireland, it is very extraordinary that neither Adamnan, Cumineus, O'Donnel, nor any Irish writer, who has recorded our saint's transactions, make any mention of his having been accompanied by this king, or of his having had him as a disciple. His name does not appear in the list of the twelve first companions. I strongly suspect that the account of this ex-king and martyr is merely a garbled alteration of the history of a king Constantine of the fifth century, mentioned by Buchanan (L. 5. R. 43.) and other Scotch writers, and whom, instead of Scottish, they should have called a British king, who, they tell us, was killed, not for religion but for a very different cause. Next after the monastery at Govan Colgan has, another in an island of the Frith of Forth, anciently called Aemonia and in Fordan's time Saint Colmy's inche. (See Usher, p. 704.) Fordon says that Columba lived there for some time, but does not speak of a monastery founded by him. He tells us that there was in said island a monastery of Canons Regular, which, as Chalmers states, (Caledon. Vol. 1. p. 320.) was erected by Alexander I. in the year 1123, and dedicated to St. Columba. From this dedication most probably is derived its name of Inch-Colm or Columba's island, and hence, I dare say, the supposition of its having been inhabited by him.

(162) Chalmers, ib. Vol. 1. p. 331. This is very probable, as much intercourse was kept up between those islands and North Pictland. If Columba or his disciples preached there, it must have been after what Adamnan relates (L. 2. c. 42.) concerning Brude having, at his request, recommended St. Cormac Hua Liethain to the protection of the prince of the Orkneys, in case, during a northern voyage of his, he should arrive in any of them, (as the saint foresaw that he would.) That prince was then at Brude's court, and was present while Columba was making said request. Were he a Christian, there would have been no necessity for the mediation of Brude, as the saint could have directly applied to him, and would certainly have obtained what he wished for. Cormac in fact landed somewhere in the Orkneys, and was, through that timely recommendation, preserved from being put to death. This shows that the inhabitants were not then Christians, but pagans, as O'Donnel calls them, L. 2. c. 62. where he relates this transaction. And hence we may judge, what opinion is to be formed of the stories of some Scotch writers about Servanus having converted that people before the middle of the fifth century, and his pretended appointment to the bishoprick of the Orkneys by Palladius. (See Usher, p. 672. seqq.) To mend the matter, we are told, that Servanus was the master of St. Kentigern of Glasgow, who is stated to have been still alive during the pontificate of Gregory the great, that is, about 160 years after Servanus was a bishop. If he preached in the Orkneys, we may be certain that his mission there did not commence until after Columba had undertaken the conversion of the Picts. That there were Irish missionaries in the Orkneys at a period later than that, which we are now treating of, will be seen hereafter. It is very probable that Servanus was a disciple of Columba. According to the register of St. Andrews, Brude, king of the Picts, made him a grant of the island in Loch-Leven in Kinross-shire. (Chalmers, Vol. 1. p. 437.) If so, he was contemporary with Columba, and was, perhaps, the same as Silvanus or Sillanus, a well known disciple of his.

(163) Adamnan, L. 1. c. 45. We have seen that Ernan was one of Columba's 12 companions. Pinkerton says (Not. to Cumineus, cap. 5.) that he was not able to discover, by what name Hymba is called at present. I also have sought for it, but hitherto without being able to come to a decision. Might it be the same as Cannay, near the harbour of which is a rock called Humbla? or rather the small but fertile island Mernoca, as Buchanan calls it, al. Inch-Marnock, near the Western coast of Bute? Its name signifies the island of Mernoc. Now Mernoc is the same name as Ernan, just as Maidoc is the same as Aidan. The old name Humba might have been changed into Eran's isle. Add, that there was a Columbian house in Mernoca.

(164) See Not. 118 to Chap. x.

(165) Adaman, L. 3. c. 17. Cumineus, cap. 12. This phenomenon is erroneously said by O'Donnel (L. 1. c. 67.) to have occurred at Swords, although Columba had no authority there. (See above, Not. 109.) He led astray Burke, who in the office of St. Columba mentions Swords as the place where it was seen.

(166) Adamnan, L. 3. c. 18. Cumineus, cap. 13.

(167) Ethica is called an island by Adamnan, L. 1. c. 19. Elsewhere he makes mention of it more than once under the name of Ethica terra. That it was not very small appears from its having been furnished with divers monasteries. (L. 3. c. 8.) Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 377.) doubted whether it might not be the Hethlandia of Buchanan, i. e. the largest of the Shetland islands. But, besides there being no reason to suppose that Columba ever proceeded as far as Shetland, the distance of Ethica from Hy was by no means as great as that of any of those islands. We find from Adamnan, (L. 2. c. 15.) that Baithen having set out early in the morning from Hy, arrived, with the help of a fine southerly breeze, at the third hour, or 9 o'clock A. M. of said day, in the harbour of Campus Lunge in Ethica. Pinkerton says (Not. to L. 2. c. 14.) that Ethica was perhaps the island now called Lewis. But how could Baithen sailing from Hy have reached Lewis as early as 9 A. M.? They are, at least, 90 miles asunder. Ethica, or according to the Irish pronunciation, Ehica, was no other, I believe, than Eig or Egg, an island about 36 miles to the north of Hy, and 6 miles long by two in breadth. Adamnan has indeed an island Egea, L. 3. c. 18. But his saying that Baithen was detained there by contrary winds seems to point to Ethica, which a late transcriber might have changed into Eig.

(168) See Adamnan, L. 2. c. 15. and L. 3. c. 8. Baithen's monastery was near the sea at what Adamnan calls Campus Lunge. Smith (Life, &c. p. 151) calls it Achaluing in Ethica.

(169) Adamnan, L. 1. c. 36. Aidus is called by the 4 Masters king of Dalaradia. See AA. SS. at xI. Mart. where Colgan treats of Findchan. Adamnan does not make him a king, but states that, after having killed Diermit, he spent some years in Findchan's monastery. Then wishing to become a priest he applied to a bishop, who refused to ordain him, unless authorized by the approbation of Findchan, which the latter had the imprudence and weakness to give, testifying it by placing his right hand on the head of Aidus. Columba, on being informed of this transaction condemned it as highly uncanonical, as if a man, who had murdered the king of Ireland, could be admitted to holy orders, and declared that Aidus was a son of perdition and would be snatched away by a violent death in the midst of his crimes. As to Findchan he foretold that the hand, which he had made so improper a use of, would rot and fall off, but that he would survive the loss of it. What will those who abet the fable of Columba's exciting a war against Diermit, say of this transaction? Will they venture to assert, that he would not have scrupled to contribute to the death of that monarch, while he was fired with such indignation against the man who actually killed him?

(170) See Not. 160.

(171) We read in Adamnan; (L. 1. c. 33.) "Cum per aliquot dies in insula demoraretur Scia vir beatus— ad comites sic ait, &c." Messingham's edition, (L. 1. c. 12.) instead of Scia has Scotia. This is a mistake, as appears not only from Scia being the reading also of Pinkerton's copy, but likewise from the circumstance of Adamnan's, although he usually called Ireland Scotia, never adding to it insula, in the same manner as he does not to Britannia. For, notwithstanding their being both islands, they were too well known to require the addition of that epithet, besides their having been considered as a sort of continent in comparison with the Western isles. In said chapter of Messingham's edition, some lines lower down, a transaction is spoken of as having occurred in the above mentioned district of Scotia. But the account of it is here quite misplaced. The words above mentioned, &c. have no connection with the Scotia (that is, Scia) higher up in that chapter. They refer to the 38th chapter of said book, in which Adamnan, after relating various occurrences, which are omitted in Messingham's ed. says, that St. Columba was on a certain occasion in Ireland, &c. and then (cap. 40.) has the words, above mentioned, &c.

when proceeding to give an account of said transaction, which, as he informs us, took place in a monastery (not a Columbian one) at Trioit, now Trevet in the county of Meath. Hence it appears, that this monastery was very ancient, which Archdall ought to have remarked. Adamnan speaks elsewhere (L. 2. c. 26.) of Columba as having passed some considerable time in Scia with some brethren.

(172) The establishments formed by St. Columba, or his disciples, are, with the exception of Hy, mentioned only occasionally by Adamnan, &c. according as some remarkable circumstances occurred in them or to persons connected with them; so that, were it not for such circumstances, the origin of the greatest part even of those, which are known, would be still involved in darkness. Many churches in the Western isles were named from our saint; (Chalmers, Vol. 1. p. 320.) but the name alone is not a sufficient criterion for deciding at what time they were erected.

(173) Adamnan relates (L. 2. c. 22.) that one Joan or John of the royal family of Gauran, and consequently of the British Scots, having twice plundered the house of a Columbanus, for whom the saint entertained great friendship, attacked it a third time and carrying off much booty was met near his ship by St. Columba, who requested of him not to take it away. Despising the saint's remonstrances he set sail, but was soon after on the very same day overtaken by a violent gust from the North, which sank the vessel in the sea, so that both he and all his followers were drowned, as Columba had announced would be the case. Adamnan states, that the vessel was lost between Mull and Colossa (Colonsay) whence it might seem that Columbanus lived in some one of the islands West of Mull, whereas we may naturally suppose that John lived in the mainland of Scotland, and was perhaps directing his course thither when he was plunged into the ocean. Yet we must observe that the harbour, whence John sailed with his booty, is called by Adamnan Aith-chambas-art-muirchol. Smith (Life, &c. p. 68.) calls it Camus in Ardnamurchan (in Argyle). If he be right, Columbanus was not an islander, and St. Columba was then in Scotland. But John was proceeding on a piratical excursion through the islands; for Adamnan writes that the saint announced that he would not arrive at the other lands, which he meant to plunder, "ad alias, quos appetit, terras;" by which must be understood some of the islands. Smith, through his aversion to miracles and prophecies, has most shamefully misrepresented Adamnan's meaning in the sequel of his narrative. He introduces Columba as pointing out, at the time of John's departure, a dark cloud forming in the North and fraught with destruction to him. Then he adds; "The cloud spread—the storm arose—sunk a boat, which no doubt the greed of plunder had too deeply loaded." Now Adamnan expressly states, that, when John set sail, and for some after, there was not a cloud to be seen, die serenissimo, but that, as the saint foretold, a northern cloud arose all of a sudden, whence proceeds the fatal blast, while all around the sea remained quite unruffled. Nor was it a mere boat, that John had. Adamnan calls it navis. When he mentions boats, he uses other words, ex. e. navicula (L. 1. c. 34.) or cymba; (L. 2. 34.) nor was John's vessel overloaded, as in such a case he would not have ventured to sail in search of further plunder. Add that Adamnan's object was to relate a miracle connected with prophecy. Such writers as Smith would do better not to touch on transactions, in which supernatural agency is said to have occurred, than to endeavour to corrupt the plain meaning of the authors, whom they pretend to follow.

(174) They were brothers of John, who also seems to have been comprized in the excommunication. That they were Christians is plain not only from their having belonged to the royal family, but likewise from the sentence of excommunication pronounced against them, which necessarily presupposed their having been considered as members of the church. Adamnan calls them Ecclesiarum persecutores, that is, persecutors of the congregations formed by Columba, and which with apostolical courage and impartiality he protected against those marauders, notwithstanding their high birth and their being kinsmen of his. This excommunication must have been prior to John's death, if, as appears probable, Adamnan meant to include him in the number of the persons, against whom that sentence was passed.

(175) Adamnan says (L. 2. c. 24.) that the name of the assassin was Lam-dess, that is, Right hand, and that, on his advancing against Columba, Findulgan a monk of Hinba, where this transaction occurred, putting on an outer garment of the saint, threw himself between him and Lam-dess, who, notwithstanding all his might, was not able to drive his spear through it. Smith, not wishing to admit any thing extraordinary in the business, transforms (Life, &c. p. 14.) that garment into a thick leathern jacket; for so he is pleased to interpret the word, cuculla, used by Adamnan. Where did he find this new meaning for cuculla, or cucullus, as it is more classically written? Had he looked into Ducange, he would have discovered that the cuculla of the monks was a wide sort of mantle sometimes longer, so as to reach the knees, or even the feet, and sometimes shorter, merely covering the head and shoulders, and which they used to wear, when they appeared in public. Without going to Catholic countries where they are still worn, he might have seen various forms of the cuculla in several books of easy access, in which the monastic dresses are described and represented. But he never would have met with such an odd fashioned one as a leathern jacket. If the worthy Findlugan had waited to fasten on a jacket, he would not have been ready in time to shield Columba against the charge made by Lamdess. This faithful disciple was, according to Colgan, (Tr. Th. p. 483.) brother to St. Fintan of Dunbleisque (in the now barony of Coonagh in the county of Limerick) and accordingly of a family of a district in said county, anciently called Ara-cliach. See below Chap. XII. §. 12.

§. XV. The apostolical labours of St. Columba were not confined to the Pictish territories and the Western isles. He superintended also the ecclesiastical affairs of the British Scots, and formed some religious establishments in their kingdom. One of them near Loch-awe in Argyle was governed by a monk of his institution named Cailten. (176) The saint was wont to visit various parts of that country, and it was on an occasion of his being in the Southern parts of it that he called upon St. Kentigern, bishop of Glasgow, with whom he spent a few days. (177) Nor is it improbable, that he visited even some parts of N. Britain then possessed by the Anglo-Saxons. There were Christians of that nation in Hy before his death, who had in all probability been converted either by himself or his disciples. (178) Meanwhile he did not neglect to keep a watchful eye over the monasteries of his institution not only in Scotland and the isles, but likewise those which he had formed in Ireland, (179) whither he often sent messengers on business relative to his establishments, or to various ecclesiastical and pious objects, (180) and occasionally repaired in person when matters of importance required his appearing there. (181) He was frequently visited by persons from Ireland, who were either former friends of his or came to consult him on various subjects. (182) These and all other strangers, no matter of what state or condition, he received with the greatest kindness, and entertained with the most becoming hospitality. (183) That Columba was held in the highest veneration as well by the clergy and people as by the sovereigns of his time, both Pictish and Scottish, whether in Ireland or Britain, is too well known to require any detail on this subject. A very remarkable instance of it occurs in his having been the person applied to for inaugurating, or, as his biographers express it, ordaining Aidan as king of the British Scots after the death of Conal. (184) The saint was unwilling to inaugurate him, as he would have been better pleased that Eogenan, or Eugene, Aidan's brother, were raised to the throne; but being repeatedly commanded in nocturnal visions to inaugurate Aidan, he consented to do so, and, on that prince's arriving in Hy, performed the ceremony. (185) Thenceforth Columba became much attached to Aidan; (186) and it was chiefly on his account, and for the purpose of adjusting some differences between him and Aidus king of Ireland, that he attended the assembly of Drumceat, of which we shall treat hereafter, it being now full time to see how ecclesiastical matters were going on at home during his absence.

(176) Adaman, L. 1. c. 31. Cailten died at Hy, having been sent for by Columba, who knowing that Cailten's end was near at hand wished to give him his blessing, so that he might terminate his life in the spirit of true monastic obedience. His monastery was afterwards called Kill-Diuni from Diuni a brother of Cailten, who seems to have been his immediate successor. As to the many other religious houses in the old Scottish provinces or kingdom, bearing the name of Columba or his disciples, I am not able to ascertain their respective degrees of antiquity.

(177) Life of Kentigern, cap. 39. The place, where he was visited by Columba, is called Mellindonar. Pinkerton observes that a stream, called Molendinar, flows through Glasgow. Hector Boethius has a story about Kentigern having been present on an occasion of Columba's discoursing on religion before king Brude. (See Usher, p. 704.)

(178) Two of those Christian Saxons, or Anglo-Saxons, are mentioned by Adamnan. The first was Genereus, a baker, whom he calls (L. 3. c. 10) a religious brother. In Colgan's edition instead of pistor we find pictor, as if Genereus were a painter. The genuine reading is, I believe, pistor; whereas Adamnan expresses his occupation in Hy by the word, opus. Had he been a painter, he would have said artem. Smith (Life, &c. p. 115.) makes two persons out of Genereus, or as he calls him, Gueren the baker, one of whom is simply Gueren, and the other a Saxon baker in general. He is equally inaccurate in stating that the editions of Adamnan published by the Catholics have pictor, as if designed to indicate that there were images in Hy. This is a very unfounded insinuation; for O'Donnel, who lived before any disputes existed in our countries concerning image-worship, had read in his copy pictor. (See O'Donnell L. 2. c. 26.) Next it is to be observed, that there are, at least, two editions by Catholics, those of Canisius and Messingham, which have (according to their division of chapters L. 3. c. 7.) pistor, and express the employment of Genereus by opus pistorum. The other Saxon, who is mentioned as being in Hy, (L. 3. c. 22.) was called Pilu. These converts were not indebted for their faith to Augustin or the other Roman missionaries, who had not as yet arrived in G. Britain, nor to British preachers, whereas the Britons, as Gildas and Bede have complained, added to their other crimes the horrid sin of neglecting to announce the Gospel to the Anglo-Saxons. (See Bede Hist. Eccl. L. 2. c. 22. and L. 5. c. 23.) On the contrary the Irish clergy and monks undertook that duty as soon as a fit opportunity occurred, and have been on that account often praised by Bede. It can scarcely be doubted, that they were the instruments used by the Almighty for the conversion of those early Anglo-Saxon Christians in Columba's time; and that, with regard to a part of that nation, they got the start of the Roman missionaries in the blessed work of bringing them over to the Christian faith.

(179) Adamnan has (L. 1. c. 29.) a very interesting anecdote relative to Columba's tenderness and affection for his monks at Durogh, at a time that during his absence they were governed by Laisran.

(180) Trenan, one of St. Columba's monks, is mentioned (Adamnan, L. 1. c. 18) as having been sent by him with some message to Ireland. Colgan says (AA. SS. p. 726.) that this Trenan was revered in the church of Kill-daalen on the 23d of March. Archdall has a Kildallan in the county of Cavan. But the person, whom Columba principally employed on these occasions, seems to have been Lugaid Lathir, who is called by Adamnan the saint's Legate. (See above Not. 117.) Besides the occasion of his going to Ireland with some dispatches or orders, on which Adamnan gives him that title, we find that at another time he was directed to sail thither in all haste and to proceed to Clogher for the purpose of relieving the holy virgin Maugina, one of whose hips had been broken in consequence of a fall on her returning from mass. Lugaid was bearer of a small box containing a benediction, which on his arrival at Clogher he was to dip in some water, which, when thus blessed, should be poured upon the broken part, and, joined with the invocation of the name of God, would effectually heal the fracture, as, says Adamnan, (L. 2. c. 5.) it instantly did.

(181) It is generally supposed that St. Columba after his first departure in 563 did not return to Ireland until 590, the year, in which was held the great meeting of Drumcèat. This is most probably a mistake founded on the fable of his having been condemned to a sort of perpetual exile (See §. 12.) O'Donnel having swallowed that trash, exhibits (L. 3. c. 1.) the saint as constantly remaining out of his own country until he was invited to attend at said meeting. Now Adamnan, a vastly better authority, gives us plainly to understand, that during the intermediate period between the years now mentioned Columba was to be met with in Ireland, and probably on more than one occasion. For instance, he tells us, (L. 2. c. 43. al. 18. See Not. 122.) that the saint spent some days in Ireland arranging certain ecclesiastical affairs. Those days were not prior to his first departure; for, if so, Adamnan would not have used that manner of expressing himself, which evidently refers to a temporary visit. Nor were they at the time of the meeting of Drumceat. Besides that meeting having been not of an ecclesiastical but political nature, Adamnan, when relating any circumstance, that occurred while Columba was in Ireland on said occasion, usually makes express mention of it. Thus he has (L. 1. c. 49.) a conversation between him and Comgall after the assembly of kings at Dorsum Cette (Drumceat). He refers to it again in the following chapter, for the purpose of marking the precise period of a transactiſn which took place at Coleraine, and after which he mentions another similar one, that occurred on the saint's arrival at Killmore Deathreib (See Not. 120. 121.) And here arises a still stronger argument, particularly if connected with what O'Donnel has concerning the various parts of Ireland visited by Columba after the meeting of Drumceat. So many excursions would have required not some days but some months. And in fact Adamnan states, that Columba remained for some months at Durrogh alone at a time, which must have been after said meeting. (See Not. 97.) Accordingly when Adamnan speaks of those temporary abodes or excursions of some days in Ireland, we cannot refer them all to the period of that assembly, that is, to A. D. 590. In another place (L. c. 38.) he has one of them expressed just as above, during which the saint was in the plain of Bregh, which as often observed, now forms a part of the counties of Meath and Dublin. Afterwards (L. 2. c. 36.) we read that, being for some days in Ireland, "aliquantis in Scotia diebus conversatus, he paid a visit to the monastery Duorum agri rivorum. (See Not. 117.) Who does not see, that so many excursions, which are represented as of short duration, do not belong to the time of the meeting of Drumceat? Some of them might have taken place during only one occasion of Columba's coming to Ireland; but it seem very probable, that he visited his native country more than once between the years 563 and 590. As to his returning to it again after the latter year, I find no reason to think that he did.

(182) St. Cainnech or Canice, al. Kenny of Aghaboe, besides the visit made together with Comgall and others, of which above, paid him another, which is mentioned by Adamnan, (L. 1. c. 4.) after a prosperous passage notwithstanding the weather being very stormy. Cainnech was very much attached to Columba, and we find him praying at Aghaboe for the safety of him and some of his companions when on sea during a violent storm, having known by a revelation, as Adamnan relates (L. 2. c. 13.) and not by a sort of conjecture, as Smith strives (Life, &c. p. 41.) to make the reader believe, that their situation was very perilous. This author has mangled, as usual, almost the whole account of this transaction, as any one may see on collating his statement with the text of Adamnan. If he did not like revelations, why touch upon circumstances connected with them? In Pinkerton's edition it is said, that the part of the sea, in which Columba was at that time, was the gulf of Coire vreccain or brecain. Smith tells us (p. 43) that Coire-brecain lies between Jura and Craignish. Now it is well known, that it is no other than the gulf connected with Lough Foyle (See Tr. Th. p. 374), and extending eastward towards the island of Rachlin near which Adamnan places it, L. 1. c. 5. where he calls it Charybdis Brecai. Next he Scotticizes the name of Cainnech into Kenneth. But of St. Cainnech more hereafter. Another visitor of Columba was Columbanus, son of Beognai. Adamnan says that in the beginning of his voyage towards Hy he was in danger of being lost in the Charybdis Brecai. He must not be confounded with another Columbanus surnamed Mocu-Loigse, whom Cumineus (cap. 8.) and Adamnan (L. 3. c. 12.) call a Leinster bishop. Mabillon in a note on Cumineus makes him bishop of Lagena in Lagenia or Leinster. There was no such town in Leinster, nor does the text of Cumineus point to any particular spot. His Episcopus Lagensis means no more than that Columbanus was a bishop of the province of Leinster. Colgan says (Tr. Th. p. 325) that he was surnamed Mocu-Loigse from his being of the family of a prince Laigis, whence was derived the name of Leix, a large district of Leinster; and that he was bishop at a place called Tulach-mac-comguil, of which I wish he had told us how it was called in later times. St. Columba had a great friendship for this Columbanus, so that, being apprized by a revelation of his death, he gave orders in the morning that the monks, who were preparing themselves for their respective occupations, should refrain from work on that day, and that some little addition should be made to their dinner, as he intended to celebrate the holy mysteries of the Eucharist. When every thing was ready for divine service, they, being clothed in white garments as on a Sunday or other solemn day, proceeded to the church along with the saint. When the choir had come to a part of the service, in which the name of St. Martin used be commemorated, he cried out; "This day you must sing for the holy bishop Columbanus:" and thus they became informed of his death. (See Cumineus and Adamnan, loc. citt.) A similar attention was paid by Columba to the memory of his friend Brendan by the celebration of mass in commemoration of his death on a day on which it was not expected by the community; (Cumin. cap. 7. and Adamn. L. 3. c. 11.) for it appears, that divine service was not celebrated every day in the monastery of Hy.

Among the many persons who went from Ireland to see this great saint one Aidan is mentioned, (Adamn. L. 1. c. 26.) a very religious man, who had lived twelve years with St. Brendan of Clonfert. On the day before his arrival Columba said to the brethren; "We intend to fast to-morrow, as usual, because it will be Wednesday; but on account of a stranger, who will be with us, the fast will be broken." So great was his discretion, that, although the fast of Wednesday was universally observed not only by our monks, but likewise by the whole Irish people, and even so late as Colgan's time (Tr. Th. p. 377.) yet he did not scruple to give the necessary refreshment to a fatigued guest, without obliging him to wait until the hour prescribed for taking food on fast days. His conduct on such occasions was like that of St. Apollon of Thebais (Tillemont, Tom. x. p. 38.) As Aidan arriving on Wednesday in the morning, was allowed to break the fast, thus, adds Adamnan, the prophecy was fulfilled. I shall mention only one more of those visitors, Cronan, a Munster bishop, who being with the saint, through humility, did all he could to prevent its being known that he was a bishop. Columba, not having yet discovered that he was one, desired him on a Sunday to celebrate mass "Christi corpus ex more conficere." He did so, and when come to the part of it, where the consecrated host is broken, called on Columba to join him as a priest in breaking the Lord's bread, "ut simul quasi duo presbyteri Dominicum panem frangerent." Columba then coming up to the altar, and looking him in the face, said; "Christ bless you brother; do you alone break it according to the episcopal rite; for now we know that you are a bishop. Why have you hitherto endeavoured to conceal yourself so as not to let us pay that veneration due to you by us?" (Adamnan, L. 1. c. 44.) This anecdote (which is omitted by Smith, while he gives us many others much less worthy of notice) is more than sufficient to show the falshood of the silly and unfounded hypothesis of some Presbyterian writers, particularly Scotch, who represent Columba and his monks, whom they most ignorantly call Culdees, as members of their sect, and not acknowledging any superiority, by divine right, of bishops over priests. Of this more elsewhere. Colgan treats of Cronan at 9th February, (AA. SS.) and states that he was of the Nandesi country (in co. Waterford), and that some old writers call him Cuaran or Mochuaroe. But what was Cronan's see he could not discover. He adds that he was son of one Nethsemon, and surnamed the Wise. By the phrase, episcopal rite, an allusion is made, if I do not mistake, to the benediction, which used to be given by bishops exclusively, at least in most churches, after the breaking of the host, and before a part of it was put into the chalice. This benediction varied according to the various festivals, and the practice continued for many centuries, even as late as the pontificate of Leo X. (See Cardinal Bona, Rer. Liturg. L. 2. c. 16.)

(183) It would be an endless task to relate instances of the hospitable disposition of Columba, and of his beneficence to the poor. Of the latter a very singular trait is recorded by Adamnan, L. 1. c. 41. A thief, called Erc, had come over from Colonsay to Mull, where, having covered his boat with hay, he hid himself under it, with the intention of proceeding at night to a small island, where (seemingly in a sort of sea-water pond) sea-calves or seals were bred and reared, the property of the monastery, and of loading his boat with them after being killed. Before he could execute his plan, he was (the saint having pointed out the place of his concealment) taken and brought to him, who said; "Why do you, transgressing the divine commandment, often steal what belongs to others? When you are in want, come to us, and on asking for it, you shall get what may be necessary." He then ordered a wether to be killed and given to the unfortunate man, lest he should return empty to his family. And foreseeing that Erc would not live long, some time after he gave directions to Baithen, who was then in Ethica, to send him a fat sheep and six bushels of corn, which, however, were not used by Erc, as he died suddenly on the day of their being brought to his habitation, but served for the celebration of his funeral obsequies.

(184) Aidan was son of Gauran, and consequently first cousin to Conal (See Not. 146.) He succeeded to the throne A. D. 574. (Usher, Ind. Chron. and O'Flaherty, Ogygia, p. 473.)

(185) The whole transaction is related by Cumineus, cap. 5. and Adamnan L. 3. c. 5. Columba was in Hymba, when an Angel appeared to him during the night holding a book, which is called the glass book of the ordination of kings. Perhaps it was like a sheet of paper enclosed in glass, or its cover was encrusted with glass or crystal. The Angel ordered him to read it, and to ordain Aidan king, as commanded in said book. Columba refused to obey the order, in punishment of which the Angel struck his side as if with a whip, and left a mark, which remained during his whole life. He then told him that he must not doubt of his having been sent to him by the Almighty, and threatened to strike him again if he should persist in his disobedience. Having appeared to him in like manner the two following nights Columba went over to Hy, and there read over Aidan the words of inauguration and, placing his hand on his head, gave him his blessing. Martene says (De Antiquis Ecclesiae ritibus, L. 2. c. 10.) that the inauguration of Aidan is the most ancient instance he had met with of the benediction or inauguration of kings in Christian times. From the mention made of the book, &c. it may probably be inferred, that this practice was still more ancient among the Irish and British Scots.

(186) Adamnan has recorded (L. 1. c. 8.) an instance of the saint's anxiety for the welfare and prosperity of Aidan. At a time when he was commencing a battle against some enemies of his kingdom, Columba, who was then in Hy, ordered his attendant Diermit to strike the bell. "Cloccam pulsa;" upon which the monks hastened after him to the church. He then desired them to pray for Aidan and his people, and after some time announced that the barbarians were defeated, and that Aidan had gained a victory, yet not without great loss on his side. Adamnan calls this battle bellum Miathorum, perhaps from its having been fought in the country of the Meatae, a people of N. Britain (See Nct. 149. to Chap. 1.) Usher thinks (Ind. Chron.) that it was the battle of Leithred, which, according to the Ulster Annals, Aidan fought against the Saxons, (Chalmers Caledon. Vol. 1. p. 282.) in the year 590. O'Flaherty (MS. note to Tr. Th. p. 341.) adds that it took place before Columba set out for the meeting of Drumceat. Clocca or Clog is frequently used by old Irish writers when speaking of bells. We find them mentioned at a very early period of our church history, ex. c. in the times of St. Senan and St. Brigid; and, if we are to follow the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick (L. 1. c. 7.) they were known and made in Ireland even in his days.

CHAPTER XII.

Death of Feidlimid archbishop of Armagh—Succeeded by Cairlan—St. Molaisse of Devenish—St. Sinach, bishop of Clonard—St. Muredach first bishop of Killalla—St. Aidus Brec—founds the monastery of Enachmicbrivin—Consecrated bishop, and fixed his see at Killare—Eugene bishop of Ardstrath—Naithi, called Cruimthir Naithi—St. Fechin of Fore—St. Fachnan of Ross—Succession of various monarchs of Ireland—St. Cainech founds the monastery of Aghaboe—Eogin mac Laisre—Lugeus—Molua erects the monastery of Clonsfert-Molua—Drew up a rule for Monks—Church of Kill-da-lua or Killaloe—Cormac Hua Liathain—Colman of Cloyne—Lasrean or Molaisse of Devenish—St. Natalis—Barrindeus governed a monastery at Druimcuillin—St. Coeman—Comman—Conan-dil—Endeus—Berchanus—St. Mobhy Clairineach—St. Fintan of Clonenagh—Bishop Brandubh—Cormac prince of Leinster—Columbanus—Fintan of Dumbleische—Sinell of Cluain-inis—Nennidhlamhdearg—Mogenoch—St. Carecha—St. Maugina—St. Columba goes to the assembly at Dromceat—Suppression of the order of Poets prevented by St. Columb, but reduced in their numbers—St. Colman decides that Dalriada should belong to the monarch of Ireland—St. Columb visits Derry, Durrrough, Clonmacnois and Coleraine—Has a vision and foretels the day of his death—Gives his benediction to his community and dies.

SECT. I.

THE archbishop of Armagh since the year 551 was Feidlimid Fionn, (1) concerning whom I find nothing recorded, except that he governed the see until 578, in which year he died either on the 30th of October or 20th of December. (2) He was succeeded by Cairlan, a native of Hy-Niellan in the now county of Armagh, and a holy man, who had, prior to his promotion, been for some time superior of a monastery somewhere in that country. (3) Cairlan held the see for ten years. (4) According to some accounts, St. Tigernach of Clogher had as immediate successor one Sinell, after whom several others are mentioned, as following in regular succession down to St. Laisrean or Molaisse of Devenish, who died about 570, and who is pretended to have been bishop there. (5) Passing by these spurious documents, and not to enter into a detail concerning some bishops of the latter half of the sixth century, of whom as much as is known has been said already, (6) we find that St. Senach was bishop of Clonard in those times, having either been its first bishop or the immediate successor of St. Finnian. (7) Although he was one of the chief disciples of said Finnian, (8) yet scarcely any thing is recorded of him. He died in 588, on the 21st of August. (9) To the same period belonged Fergus bishop of Down, who died on the 30th of March in 584. (10) He was of a princely family, and founded, either before or after his promotion, a church at Killmbian. (11) It is very probable that Fergus was the first bishop of that see; for, as to Cailan or Coelan, whom some writers make his predecessor, there are no sufficient proofs to show that he was. (12) In those times must be placed also St. Muredach, who is usually called the first bishop of Killalla and has been erroneously supposed to have been appointed to that see by St. Patrick. (13) He was contemporary with Columb-kill, and is mentioned as one of the persons, who assembled at Easdara or Ballysadare (co. Sligo) for the purpose of paying him their respects on occasion of his being in that place soon after the meeting of Drumceat. (14) Muredach was of the royal house of Leogaire. No account remains of the time of his promotion or of his death. The 12th of August has been assigned for his festival, and it was in all appearance the day on which he died. (15)

(1) See Chap. x. §. 14.

(2) Tr. Th. p. 293. I do not know why Ware and Harris represent Feidlimid as of a Hy-Niellan family. Colgan has not said so.

(3) AA. SS. at Cairlan, 24 Mart.

(4) Ib. and Tr. Th. p. 293. Ware had correctly stated that Feidhlimid died in 578 and Cairlan in 588. Harris comes forward, as usual, with some nonsense, as if Ware differed from the 4 Masters, who, instead of these dates, have 577 and 587. How stupid must he have been not to have discovered that such dates, although nominally differing by one year, were in reality the same as Ware's! He adds that the Psalter of Cashel also places Cairlin's death in 587; but had he looked into Tr. Th. p. 292. where said Psalter is quoted, he could have found that it does not mention the year of the Christian era, in which Cairlan or any archbishop of Armagh died. It merely states the number of years, during which each of them held the see, and gives ten to Cairlan.

(5) Ware (Bishops at Clogher) has, from the register of Clogher, after Sinell eight successors of his before we come to Laisrean. Now even supposing that Laisrean was bishop there, it cannot be believed that there were nine prelates of that see between Tigernach, who died in 549 (Chap. x. §. 13.) and the pretended accession of Laoisrean, which should have been prior to 570. What little confidence is to be placed in that register appears also from its making St. Enda of Arran bishop of Clogher after Laisrean, although he never was a bishop, and, as we have seen, died about 540. Then after three or four other prelates, as if succeeding Enda, it has by a most absurd anachronism, even Kieran of Clonmacnois!!! As if it were not universally known that Kieran died in 549. The compiler of that document, wishing to do honour to Clogher, did not scruple to reckon among its bishops the distinguished persons now mentioned, adding to them likewise the celebrated Adamnan, who, as will be seen, never rose higher than to the rank of a priest. I am rather surprized that Ware gave himself the trouble of copying such trash. Colgan having searched for the successors of Maccarthen and Tigernach in that see does not mention any one of those now spoken of, and gives us only three of them between the latter and Foeldavar, who died in 731 (732). As to the particular times, in which those three prelates, viz. Liberius, Aitmetus, and Hermetius, held the see, he was not able to form an opinion. (See AA. SS. p. 742.) and Harris, Bishops at Clogher.

(6) Ex. c. Moena Bishop at Clonfert (Not. 116 to Chap. x.); Dagaëus (Chap. x. §. 14.); Lugidus (ib. Not. 196); Dallan, Sedna, and others (Chap. xi. § 4); Etchen (ib. §. 9. and Not. 101-102); Columbanus Mocu-Loigse and Cronan (ib. Not 182.)

(7) See Not. 70, 71, to Chap. x.

(8) Finnian's Acts, cap. 19. Senach is there expressly called bishop.

(9) AA. SS. p. 406. Colgan has, from the 4 Masters, A. D. 587, which, however, was the same as our 588.

(10) Ware (Bishops at Down) quotes a passage of the Annals of Ulster, in which the death of Fergus is assigned to A. 583. The 4 Masters also have 583. (See Colgan AA. SS. at 30 Mart.) Considering the mode of computation followed by those Annalists down to about the eleventh century, that date is the same as 584. In both said Annals Down is, on this occasion, called by its ancient name Druim-leith-glais, for which several old writers use Dun-da-leth-glas.

(11) Annals ib. Colgan (loc. cit.) without being authorized by them, calls that church a monastery. Archdall, following him, gives us one of that name in the county of Down. It is natural to suppose, that Killmbian was in that country. But I find no reason for introducing a monastery there, unless we are to believe that every church, to the name of which Kill is prefixed, had one added to it. Now Colgan has heaps of names, so beginning of places, to which he assigns merely churches, while as to others with similar names he does not forget to mark such monasteries as were annexed to them.

(12) See Chap. VIII. §. 14. Had there been any bishop of Down, prior to Fergus, it should seem odd, that he is the first mentioned in both the Annals above referred to, and that, notwithstanding Colgan's frequently alluding to Down and naming several persons called Cailan, (See ex. c. Ind. tert. ad Tr. Th.) he has no bishop of that name in said see.

(13) See Chap. v. §. 12. Ware fell into this mistake, (Bishops at Killala, and Antiq. cap. 29.) and hence assigns Muredach to the 5th century Harris, wishing to appear more accurate has added that he was promoted about A. D 440.

(14) Life of St. Farannan at 15 February. It may be objected, that in said Life other persons are named as present at at Ballysadare, who certainly could not have been there at that time. But there are other convincing arguments to show, that Muredach did not live prior to St. Columba's time. We read in the Life of St. Cormac (26 March) that St. Patrick, St. Brigid, St. Columb-kill, St. Cannech, and St. Muredach bishop had blessed the port of Killala. Would Muredach have been placed so low down in the list, had he been contemporary with St. Patrick? Next it is evident from his pedigree, as given from old documents by Colgan. (AA. SS. p. 339.) that he belonged to a much later period. In tracing his descent from Leogaire, king of Ireland, Muredach appears in the sixth generation.

(15) In the old Calendars it is marked as his Natalis, by which is meant the day of a saint's death.

§. II. Another holy bishop of that period, and whose history is much better known than that of the above mentioned prelates, was St. Aidus or Aedeus, as he is called in the catalogue of the second class of saints. (16) He is usually surnamed son of Brec, this being the name of his father, who was a descendant of Neill Neigilliach by his son Fiach. (17) His mother was a Munster lady of the country now called Lower Ormond (18) in the county of Tipperary. The time of his birth is not recorded; but it is probable that it was between 520 and 530. (19) Although Aidus seems to have been born in Meath his father's country, (20) he was, after being baptized, and from his infancy, reared among his mother's relatives in Munster and well educated as to the duties of a Christian layman. Not having been intended for the ecclesiastical state, he did not apply in his younger days to the preparatory studies and course of learning necessary for it. On his father's death Aidus, being a grown up lad, went to Meath for the purpose of recovering a part of the inheritance, the whole of which his brothers had divided among themselves. Not succeeding in his endeavours he set out for Munster, and on his way thither passing near the monastery of the holy bishop Illandus (21) was taken notice of by him. The bishop sent him word that he would be glad to see him, and, on his coming up, asked him, why he was so uneasy about an earthly inheritance, and desired him to look for a vastly better one, that of heaven. Aidus answered, that he was ready to submit to whatever the holy man would direct him to do, and then became an inmate of the monastery, where with the duties of religious obedience he united the study of the Holy Scriptures and of literature. Notwithstanding his high rank he worked at the plough, when ordered to do so, and displayed in every respect such a truly monastic spirit, that after a certain lapse of time, Illandus thought it advisable that he should return to his mother's country and there form a monastery. Accordingly he repaired thither with some companions assigned to him and founded one at Enachmicbrivin. (22) Some time after, but when we are not informed, he went to Meath and being there consecrated Bishop fixed his see at Killair or Killare. (23) After his promotion he visited Munster occasionally, and is said to have erected some other religious houses both in that province and in Meath. (24) A nunnery at a place, called Druiard, (25) is mentioned as having been favoured with a visit of his. He was on a certain occasion entertained by St. Riach abbot of Inisbofinde in Loughree; (26) and we find him paying him a visit to Henan a holy hermit at Druiard, (27) who, on the arrival of Aidus, had nothing to treat him with except herbs and water. Without enlarging on some other matters of this kind, let it suffice to add, that several miracles have been attributed to him, and that he died on the 10th of November, A. D. 589. (28)

(16) See Chap. x. §. 4. Colgan has a life of St. Aidus at 28 February. It bears marks of considerable antiquity, and the narrative is much better arranged than in many other lives of our saints.

(17) Colgan observes, (AA. SS p. 422.) that from this Fiach the district of Kinel-fiacha in the ancient Meath got its name, and that from him were descended the illustrious families of O'Molloy and M'Geoghegan. Kinel-fiacha was about Kilbeggan and to the East of it.

(18) In the Acts Muscrige-Thire.

(19) Aidus is mentioned (Acts, cap. 3.) as a boy when St. Cainnich was a senior, that is a respected and venerable man. Now Cainnich was not born, at the earliest, until 516. If we allow only ten years between his age and that of Aidus, the birth of the latter may be assigned to 526. It can scarcely be placed later, because Aidus died in 589, and is represented as old before his death. But according to this calculation he would have been then only 63 years of age, an age at which men merely begin to be called old. Perhaps Cainnich was not, when the circumstance there related occurred, a senior, properly speaking, although he might have been called so, inasmuch as he afterwards became one. It may be even supposed, that he was not then above three or four years older than Aidus. Or, what is not improbable, the whole anecdote is founded on some mistake. It is hard to believe that Aidus was born later than about 520. In another Life of him, which Colgan considered unworthy of publication, although he quotes it, (Tr. Th. p. 605.) he is spoken of as a bishop in the times of St. Brigid. We need not stop to expose the absurdity of this supposition.

(20) The particular place of his birth is not mentioned; but it was most probably in Kinel-Fiacha. See Not. 17.

(21) That monastery was at Rathlibhthen in the now King's county. See Chap. x. §. 3.

(22) In some MSS. it is called Enachmidbrenin or Enacmid- bren ; but Colgan thinks, (AA. SS. p. 422.) that the true reading was Enachmicbrivin. As it was in Muscrige-Thire (Ormond and particularly the part called Lower Ormond) it was perhaps Nenagh (N prefixed as in Nendrum for Aendrum, Antrim) or more probably the place was known by the name of Annagh. Enachmicbrivin means Enach of the sons of Brivin, seemingly the same as the O'Brien family. Harris, who calls it Enachmidbrenin, was right in placing it (Monasteries) in the county of Tipperary, and in remarking that Allemand misplaced it in the county of Cork. Smith (Hist. of Cork, Vol. 1. p. 206.) fell into the same mistake, in consequence, I suppose, of his having confounded Muscrige-Thire with the Muskerry of said county, where he found a place formerly called Kilibrenin now Strawhall. He then confounded Killbrenin with the monastery founded by Aidus, referring to Usher and Colgan, neither of whom gives the least indication that said monastery was in that county. Usher merely says (p. 963.) that Enachmidbrenin was in Muscray-tire ; and as to Colgan, he expressly states (Tr. Th. p. 186.) that Muscrige-Thyre was in Ormond. That it was so, is evident from the account of the course pursued by St. Patrick on his return from Munster. (See Chap. vi. §. 8.) Archdall (at Strawhall) has with great simplicity copied the mistakes of Smith.

(23) In the now barony of Raconrath, county of Westmeath.

(24) One of them is specially mentioned, and as called from his name Rath-aodh or Rath-hugh in Kinelfiacha, now Rahue in the barony of Moycashel (Westmeath.) See Archdall.

(25) Colgan was not able to point out the situation of Druimard. Was it Dromard in the barony of Ikerin, co. Tipperary ? This is much more probable than his conjecture, followed by Archdall, of its having been the same as Killaird in the now county of Wicklow, a part of Ireland with which Aidus had nothing to do.

(26) See Chap. x. §. 3.

(27) Archdall makes Drumrath the same as Drumrany, and says that it is in the barony of Kilkenny West in Westmeath. Others place it in the adjoining barony of Brawney (See Seward ad loc.) A monastery was erected there in honour of St. Henan, apparently after his death. Archdall assigns the foundation of it to A. D. 588, for no other reason, as far as I know, than his having read that Aidus died in that year. What had the death of Aidus to do with the establishment of that monastery? The festival of St. Henan was kept at Drumrath on the 19th of August.

(28) 4 Masters and AA. SS. p. 193. They have A. 588. i. e. 589. The day of his death marked by them and in his Acts is 10th Nov. which appears also in several martyrologies, &c. Yet Colgan having found in some others the name of Aidus at 28 February, was induced to annex the Acts to that day.

§. III. According to some writers Eugene bishop of Ardstrath, now Ardstraw, (29) was contemporary with Aidus, having been distinguished about the year 570. (30) But, if he lived, as some say, until 618, (31) he was in all appearance rather a junior, in comparison with Aidus. Be this as it may, he cannot be placed earlier, as a bishop, than in the latter part of the sixth century, although it has been pretended that he had been a disciple of St. Patrick. (32) Eugene was of a Leinster family by his father's side, and of an Ulster by his mother's. (33) He was a great and zealous preacher, and died on the 23d of August. (34) The see of Ardstraw is said to have been transferred to Maghera; (35) and at a late period it was united to Derry. (36) In those times Achonry must be allowed to have been an episcopal see, if it be true that the celebrated Nathi of that place was a bishop. But it is much more probable, that he was not. He is constantly called Cruimthir Nathi, that is, priest Nathi. Had he been raised to the episcopacy, surely that is not the title, by which our hagiologists and calendarists would have handed down his name to posterity. (37) Having now made mention of him; we may here add that Nathi was placed at Achonry by St. Finnian of Clonard. (38) The time of his being fixed there was very probably not long prior to Finnian's death. (39) Nathi's school became highly distinguished, particularly by its having been that, in which the great St. Fechin of Fore received his ecclesiastical and literary education. (40) His name is always mentioned with the greatest respect; (41) and his festival was and is still observed in the diocese of Achonry on the 9th of August.

(29) In the barony of Strabane, county of Tyrone. Seward (at Rathlure) is shamefully wrong in placing Ardstrath and the river Derg in the county of Antrim.

(30) Usher, Ind. Chron. He mentions a Life of St. Cainnich, in which Eugene is said to have been contemporary with him and Comgall of Bangor. (See Pr. p. 957.) Hence he deduced that Eugene flourished in 570.

(31) Ware (Bishops at Derry) observes that Eugene died, as it is said, in 618. Harris refers to Usher as placing his death in 570. But Usher says nothing about it. Harris misunderstood flourished for died. Archdall (at Ardstraw) following Harris has in like manner misrepresented Usher's meaning.

(32) Colgan has (Tr. Th. p. 269) Eugene of Ardstrath in his huge list of the disciples of our Apostle; and yet (AA. SS. p. 406) reckons him among those of Finnian of Clonard. This is not enough; for elsewhere (ib. p. 438.) he makes him study in Britain under the abbot Monenus the master of Tigernach of Clones, Finnian of Maghbile, &c. (See Not. 17 to Chap. ix.)

(33) In his Life quoted in AA. SS. p. 438, his father is said to have been Cainnechus de Lagenia. This sets aside Usher's conjecture (p. 958), that he might have been the same as Eogen mac Laisre, or son of Laisre, mentioned in the second class of saints. His mother is called Muindecha of the race of the Mugdorni, the inhabitants either of Mourne in Down, or more probably of the territory, of which Cremourne in Monaghan now forms a part (See Not. 30 to Chap. vi.) As Eugene's maternal connexions were in Ulster, it is easy to understand how he became known in that province and was there appointed bishop.

(34) Ware, Bishops at Derry. Colgan intended to publish his Acts at that day.

(35) Ware, ib. He had no right to place this translation as early as he has done. The time of it is not known. Maghera is in the now county of Derry. Its church was dedicated to St. Lu-roch, whose festival was kept there on the 17th of February. Whether he was a bishop or not, Ware does not inform us. Colgan has at said day St. Lurec, but merely gives his name and genealogy. Ware thought that it was on account of St. Luroch that the see of Ardstraw was otherwise called that of Rathlure.

(36) Ware, ib.

(37) Ware having observed, (Antiq. cap. 29.) that Nathi is called only presbyter in the Life of Finnian of Clonard, says he cannot believe but that he was afterwards made bishop of Achonry. And in Bishops he actually lays him down as one, without however, alleging any authority. Nor is it only in Finnian's Life, or relatively to any particular transaction, that he is called Cruimthir or priest; whereas this is the title, which, as Colgan observes (AA. SS. p. 399.) is given to him passim. In Colgan's works, as far as I can discover, he is never called bishop. It is true that in one of the lives of St. Fechin Nathi is styled antistes. Yet a few lines before he is called presbyter. Besides, the title antistes, is often given to priests.

(38) We read in the Acts of Finnian (cap. 25.) that he went to a place where dwelt a man of God named Nathi a priest, and that, having performed a miracle there, the dynast of the district gave him the place on which it occurred, and called Achadchonaire, which Finnian then made over to the said priest Nathi. Hence Colgan, Ware, (Bishops) Harris, &c. make Nathi a disciple of Finnian; but Nathi was a priest before Finnian seems to have been acquainted with him.

(39) Finnian's excursion to Connaught and his meeting with Nathi are related as having taken place after almost all his Clonard disciples had left his school, and formed establishments of their own. Ware is therefore wrong (Antiq. cap. 29. and Bishops) in assigning the foundation of the church of Achonry to about 530; for at that time Finnian had scarcely begun to teach at Clonard. (See Chap. ix. §. 8.) I should rather assign it to about 550; and according to the series of his transactions, as given in his Acts, it appears as one of the last of his life.

(40) Life of Fechin, 20 January. From his having been a scholar of Nathi and even a priest before his death, it follows that Nathi must have lived to a great age. Fechin did not die until A. D. 665, when he was carried off by a plague. Now supposing that he lived to the age of 90, he would have been born in 575, and might have been ordained priest in 605. Nathi must have lived until, at least, this year. And as he had been a priest since the days of Finnian of Clonard, who died in 552, and some time prior to this event, Nathi's birth cannot be placed later than 520. On the whole, it is plain that he could not have lived less than about 90 years, or probably more, there being no sufficient reason to think, that his disciple Fechin reached the age which we supposed he did. It is very probable, that he did not pass his eightieth year, in which case he would not have been ordained priest until 615. In this hypothesis Nathi would have been still alive in this year; for, as we have seen, he survived Fechin's ordination. If Ware's statement, according to which Nathi should have been a priest in 530, were to be admitted, it would follow that he was born as early, at least, 500. How could this be reconciled with his having lived until Fechin also became one?

(41) Compare with Not. 65. to Chap. vii.

(42) The martyrology of Cashel, quoted in AA. SS. p. 596, gives him the title of bishop of Ros-alethir. Accordingly Ware (Bishops at Ross) says that he could not but be of that opinion. This title does not appear in the Life of St. Pulcherius, at 13 March, in which he is mentioned several times; but there is nothing in opposition to it. He is there called Fachnan the wise and virtuous.

§. iv. If St. Fachtna or Fachnan of Ross was a bishop, as there is good authority for admitting, (42) the see of that place existed at the period we are now treating of, and very probably before the year 570. (43) He was certainly established at Ross before that year, notwithstanding its having been supposed by some modern writers, that his monastery was not founded until many years later. (44) Hence it appears, that instead of having been a disciple of St. Barr or Finbarr of Cork, as is usually said, (45) he was prior to him. Fachnan was surnamed Mongach or hairy, as some authors explain it, while others think it should be written Mac Mongach, that is, son of Mongach. (46) He was for some time, and in all appearance before he settled at Ross, abbot of Darinis Moelanfaidh, now Molana, a small island of the river Blackwater in the county of Waterford. (47) His school at Ross was one of the most celebrated and frequented in Ireland, (48) and continued so after his death, the precise time of which is not known; it merely appearing that he lived until towards the close of the sixth century. (49) He died on the 14th of August, this being the day marked as his Natalis in the Calendars. (50) This saint must not, I think, be confounded with the St. Fachnan, to whose memory the church of Kilfenora has been dedicated. (51) He is said, but without any foundation, to have been succeeded at Ross by a St. Finchard. (52)

(43) Fachnan was at Ross before the death of St. Ita, which was in 570. Having lost his sight there, while living in a monastery founded by himself, he went to consult St. Ita upon a point relative to certain means, which he had been directed to use towards the recovery of it. The whole transaction is related in the Life of Pulcherius, cap. 4. where we read; “Tunc temporis (a short time before the birth of Pulcherius) S. Fachnanus sapiens et probus aliquo eventu factus est coecus, et nihil videbat. Ipse sanctus in australi Hiberniae plaga juxta mare in suo monasterio quod ipse fundavit (ubi crevit civitas, in qua semper manet magnum studium scholarium, quae dicitur Ross-alithre) habitabat—Et ait ad suos sanctus; scio quid faciam; ibo ad Dei prophetissam B. Itam,” &c. The surname alithre or alithri, or, as now spelled, oilithre, by which the episcopal town of Ross was distinguished from many other places of that name, was given to it on account of having a great resort of pilgrims.

(44) Ware says, (Antiq. cap. 26. at Co. Cork) that Fachnan founded the monastery of Ross about the end of the 6th century. Yet (ib. cap. 29. and Bishops at Ross) he tells us, that he flourished in the beginning of said century. It is odd that so accurate a writer could have contradicted himself. He ought to have said, that Fachnan flourished and founded that monastery about the middle of the sixth century. Colgan states (Ind. Chron. Tr. Th.) that he flourished in 590. It is probable, that he was still alive in that year; but he had flourished long before it. From those few words of Colgan Archdall (at Molana) deduced, by a strange sort of logic, that Fachnan founded the abbey of Ross about 590.

(45) Usher has (p. 971.) Fachtna or Fachnan among several persons, who are said to have studied under St. Barr. He is named also in a long list of those supposed disciples ap. Colgan, AA. SS. at St. Garvan, 26 Mart. It is plain that these lists have been made up at random, and that little or no dependence can be placed on them. That of Colgan differs very materially from Usher's. The compilers of them, wishing to do honour to St. Barr, thrust into them the names of many distinguished men, whom they had happened to hear of, without any regard to time or place. Of this more hereafter.

(46) In the martyrology of Cashel he is called "Fachtna Mongach quia cum caesarie natus." In some Irish calendars the surname is Mhicmongaigh, and hence Usher's filius Monghich, p. 971. But, as some old writers pretend (AA. SS. p. 596) it was meant to signify not the son of one Mongach, but hairy son or child. Yet others have understood it as meaning son of Mongach or rather Moenach, who, they say, was descended from Maccon a celebrated Irish hero.

(47) In the above quoted martyrology we read of Fachnan; "Fuit etiam abbas de Dar-inis Moelanfaidh in regione Desiorum in Momonia." Ware says (Antiq. cap. 26. at Co. Waterford) that a monastery was founded in Molanna or Darinis by St. Molanfide, as he calls him, in the sixth century, and is followed by Harris and Archdall. I wish he had told us something further concerning this saint. It is probable, that he only guessed at him from that name being added to Darinis. Colgan gives us no account of him, at least under the name of Moelanfaidh. But he makes mention (AA. SS. p. 188.) of several saints called Moeloc or Mailoc, which, he observes, is the same name as Moelan. One of them was probably the founder of that monastery; for faidh is, I believe, a surname, fada or fad long. At what time he lived, I cannot form any conjecture; and, for aught I know, he might have belonged to the 5th century. Archdall's huge mistake concerning Ferdachrioch, (Maccarthen of Clogher) having been abbot of this Darinis has been already animadverted upon. (Not, 132 to Chap. vi.) There is another Darinis near Wexford, in which a monastery was founded most probably by St. Cayman about the beginning of the sixth century (See Not. 121 to Chap. ix) and not, as Archdall thought, by St. Nemhan, who lived in the seventh.

(48) Above Not. 43. Usher, p. 907. Ware, Antiq. cap. 15.

(49) According to a statement in the Life of Pulcherius (cap. 30.) we find that Fachnan was alive not only after Pulcherius had founded a monastery, which he could scarcely have done before A. D. 580, but likewise 14 years prior to the death of Colman Mac-Feraidhe, prince of Ossory. Now this Colman died in 601, i. e. 602, (4 Masters, Tr. Th. p. 375, and O'Flaherty's MS. note) and consequently Fachnan lived until, at least, 588. Perhaps it may be said, that the Fachnan here spoken of was different from Fachnan of Ross mentioned in a former part of said Life (above Not. 43.); and in fact Colgan seems to distinguish them in his third Index to AA. SS. But, if that were the case, would not the author of said Life, who in both places exhibits Fachnan as a great saint, given us some clue towards discovering that he alluded to more than one of that name? particularly as the Life is written with great order, regularity, and a cautious precision in discriminating, when necessary, certain names by the addition of a surname or some other distinctive mark, lest the reader might confound different persons together.

(50) AA. SS. p. 596. Archdall says (at Ross) that his festival is held on the 14th of August, and yet he tells us (at Molana) that it is on the 19th of January.

(51) The history of the see of Kilfenora or, as Ware calls it, Fenabore is so obscure, that he was not able to decide by whom it was founded. In one place (Antiq. cap. 29.) he says, "it may be judged that St. Fachnan was the founder." In another (Bishops) he merely states, that its cathedral was dedicated to his memory. He clearly seems to have meant St. Fachnan of Ross. And so the matter appears to be understood at present in the diocese of Kilfenora, whereas the festival of the patron saint is kept there on the 14th of August, as if St. Fachnan of Ross was he also of Kilfenora. But it is much more probable, that they were different persons. That Fachnan of Ross did not found that see, or even a monastery there, is evident from its not being mentioned in the Calendars, where treating of him, notwithstanding the care taken not to omit that, besides Ross, he had governed also a house in Darinis. Why not mention likewise Kilfenora, had he been there? especially as it became an episcopal see. It may be said, that Fachnan was revered there not as founder of the see, but as the saint, in whose name the church was dedicated, long perhaps before there was any bishop of Kilfenora. Yet I can hardly believe that Kilfenora had not a Fachnan or Fachtna of its own. Among the real or pretended disciples of St. Barr we find, besides Fachnan of Ross, a St. Fachna de Ria. (AA. SS. p. 750.) He is the Fachtnanus of Usher, (Pr. p. 971.) a distinct person from Fachtna Mongich, or of Ross, there mentioned. Whether this Fachna, or Fachnan de Ria was a scholar, or not, of St. Barr, is of little consequence; but it cannot be doubted that such a person did exist in old times, probably in the seventh century. Why may we not suppose, that he was the founder of Kilfenora? Its very name seems to lead to this conclusion. Fachnan is often called Fechnan. Kilfenora is a compound name, thus probably formed; Kil-fen (a contraction of Fechnan)—o de, or from—Ra, or Ria.

(52) Ware (Bishops at Ross) fell into a singular mistake on this occasion, having been led astray by the confusion in arranging names and the errors of the press, that occur in one part of the AA. SS. where Colgan is reckoning up the so called disciples of St. Barr. He quotes (p. 750) a long passage relative to them, in which we read; “S. Finchadius de Domnachmor, S. Fachna seu Facundus de Ria, S. Facundus (Fachna) de Ros-alither.” Elsewhere (ib. p. 607) quoting the same long passage, it has happened that the words here marked in Italics were omitted by the printer, so that the text runs, “Finchadius de Ros-alither,” while Domnachmor and the two Fachnas are left out. Had Ware looked to p. 750, he would not have changed Finchad of Domnachmor into a Finchad of Ross. There is in the martyrology of Charles Maguire at 5 Mart. as cited in AA. SS. p. 471, a passage, whence, if it deserves credit, it might seem that one Conall succeeded Fachnan at Ross and elsewhere. Kieran of Saigir is made to foretell, that Conall would govern monks and monasteries after Fachnan of Ross-alithir. But there are so many fables concerning Kieran, that this is perhaps one of them. Yet in said passage it is not expressly said, that Conal was to govern the institutions of Fachnan; and it can be explained as simply indicating, that one would be later in time than the other. At any rate Archdall had no sufficient authority (at Ross) for representing Conall as the immediate successor of Fachnan.

§ v. Before I proceed to inquire into the history of other eminent ecclesiastics of those times, it is necessary to give some account of the changes that took place in the succession of the Irish monarchs between St. Columba's departure from Ireland and his attending at the meeting of Drumceat. Diermit, son of Cervail, having reigned 21 years, (53) was, as already observed, killed by a prince Aidus, surnamed the black (54) in 565 at a place called Rathbeg. The crown now reverted to the Eugenic branch of the northern Nialls, and two sons of Murchertach Mac Erca, (55) Domnald and Fergus, who had fought with great success against Diermit and the southern Nialls, (56) were raised to the sovereignty of all Ireland, which they held in partnership for only one year. They were succeeded by two other copartners on the throne, Boetan a brother of theirs, and his nephew Eochad son of Domnald, who ruled during two years. (57) After them Anmireus, son of Sedna of the Tirconnalian line, was in the year 568 raised to the throne, which he possessed during three years. (58.) He also met with a violent death, having been killed by one Fergus son of Nellin. (59) Anmireus was succeeded in 571 by his first cousin Boetan the second, whose short reign of less than a year was terminated by his having fallen in battle. (60) The next monarch after Boetan II. was Aidus or Hugh son of Anmiraeus. He began to reign in 572, (61) and occupied the throne for full 26 years, until, having marched against the people of Leinster for the purpose of exacting a tribute claimed by him, he was killed on the 10th of January, A. D. 599, in the battle of Duinbolg, in which his opponents were commanded by their celebrated king Brandubh. (62)

(53) See Chap. x. §. 3.

(54) See Chap. xi. §. 14 and ib. Not. 169. Ware (Antiq. cap. 4.) following the 4 Masters calls Aidus son of Suibne and king of Dalnaraida or Dalarida. In the English translation of Keating by D. O'Connor he is called Hugh Dubh Mac Swyny, who killed Diernit at Rathbeag in Muighline. O'Flaherty writes; (Carm. Chronograph.) "Dernitius ferro, fluctibus, igne perit." Diernit was buried, according to Keating, in a place called Cuinniry; O'Halloran (B. VIII. ch. 4.) says, at Clonmacnois.

(55) See chap. ix. §. 2.

(56) Ex. c. in the battle of Culdremni. See chap. xi. §. 11. and Usher, Ind. Chron. ad a. 561.

(57) Neither Usher in his list of the Irish sovereigns of those times (p. 947) nor Ware (Antiq. cap. 4.) has these two kings Boetan and Eochad. The 4 Masters and Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 448.) have them in their catalogue, and state that they were killed in battle, fighting against Cronan dynast of Kiennacta. (See Not. 63. to Chap. VII.) They are also in O'Flaherty's list, Ogyg. p. III. cap. 93. He differs from the 4 Masters and Colgan as to the years of the Christian era, in which these and other kings of that period reigned, but agrees with them in most part, as to the length of their reigns. As it is not my business to dive into the civil history of Ireland, I here follow his chronological suppositions, having enough to do in endeavouring to arrange the ecclesiastical department.

(58) Usher and Ware (loc. cit.) assign the beginning of Anmiracus', or Anmirach's, reign to A. D. 566, in consequence of their placing him immediately after Domnald and Fergus. Yet they agree with the 4 Masters and O'Flaherty as to his having reigned three years. We have already seen, (Not. 95. to Chap. XI.) that Anmiracus was first cousin to St. Columba.

(59) Tr. Th. p. 448. and Ware, loc. cit.

(60) The 4 Masters and Colgan, (ib.) say that Boetan II. was killed fighting against two princes Cumanii, or Cuimin, not brothers, but probably relatives, (see Keating, B. 2.) Ware makes this Boetan or Beotan (the first of the name mentioned by him) brother to Murchertach Mac-Erca, and places the commencement of his reign in 569. But, as Murchertach died in 533 or 534 (See Chap. ix. §. 2.) it is not probable that a prince, who did not begin to reign until 569, was a brother of his. He associates with him on the throne Eochan a son of Murchertach, and adds that, having reigned three years, they were slain by Cronan in the battle of Glengevin. This is the Cronan mentioned above; (Not. 57.) and the Boetan and Eochan of Ware (whom Usher also has as reigning three years, without, however, stating to what family they belonged) are in fact the Boetan I. and Eochad of the 4 Masters and O'Flaherty, whom they place prior to Anmireus. There is also this difference that the Boetan I. of the latter appears not as brother but son of Murchertach, and Eochad or Eochan as grandson, not son of the same prince. The three years, assigned by Ware and Usher to these joint sovereigns, are divided by O'Flaherty, &c. allowing two years for Boetan I. and Eochad, and one for Boetan II. whom they place after Anmireus. Boetan II. is stated (Tr. Th. p. 488.) to have been a grandson of Fergus of the Tirconallian line by his son Ninnidh. Consequently he was a first cousin of Anmireus, and also of St. Columba.

(61) Ware, Usher, and O'Flaherty agree as to this date, in consequence of the two former having allowed three years for the immediate successor or successors of Anmireus, which O'Flaherty divided as explained in the preceding Note.

(62) Usher, Ind. Chron. and Ware loc. cit. assign this battle to A. 598. O'Flaherty writes 598-9, which, on account of Aidus having been killed in January, corresponds to our A. 599. And, as Usher (p. 947) allows him 26 full years from A. 572, it is plain that his death must be placed in 599, unless we should suppose that he had been crowned before the 10th of January of the year 572. (Not. 182 to Chap. xi.)

§ VI. In the second class of Irish saints next after St. Columba is mentioned, his friend Caineus, commonly called St. Kenny. (63) He was a native of Kiennacta (64) in the North of Ireland. His father was a celebrated poet Laidec of the sept of Mocudalan or the race of Dalan, (65) and his mother's name was Melda. (66) Cainech was born in the year 516, (67) and, when arrived at the age of discretion, wishing to acquire learning and lead a religious life, (68) went to Britain and there placed himself under the venerable abbot Docus, (69) with whom he remained for some years in close application to his studies and in the practice of monastic obedience. Passing by a pretended tour of his to Rome, for which there is no sufficient authority, we find him afterwards at the school of Finnian of Clonard. (70) Having left this school, he is said to have preached for some years in the northern parts of Ireland; (71) and were we to believe some accounts, he passed over to North Britain, where he lived as a hermit in the land of the Picts. (72) After some time Cainech proceeded towards the South of Ireland, and, having stopped for a while in some religious house, wrote a copy of the four Gospels, which was preserved for a very long time, and was called Glass-Kinnich, or Chain of Cainech (73) Thence he went to the country now called Upper Ossory, and, being kindly received by the inhabitants, founded the great monastery of Aghaboe. (74) The time of its foundation is not known; but it was prior to the year 577. (75) Aghaboe became, in course of time, the residence of the bishop of Ossory, the see of Saigir having been transferred to it. (76) It is said, that Cainech, being patronized by Colman Mac Feraidhe prince of Ossory, (77) formed some other establishments in that country. His visits to St. Columba, and their mutual attachment, have been already mentioned. (78) He was likewise connected, by ties of friendship, with other great men of his time, such as the Brendans, Comgall, Fintan of Clonenagh, (79) &c. and, in his old days, with St. Pulcherius of Laithmor. Cainech was occasionally endowed with supernatural gifts, (80) and was versed in the art of composing works, so as to appear as a biographer and poet. (81) Having governed in person, as abbot and priest, the monastery of Aghaboe, he died in the 84th year of his age, on the 11th of October, A. D. 599. (82)

(63) It has been already observed, that Smith (Life of St. Columba) calls the saint Kenneth. He has never been known by that name in Ireland. We have had Keneds or Kineds, now Kennedys; but Cainech is a different name, and has been anglicized only into Canice or Kenny. Smith says that one of the Hebrides (Inch Kenneth) near Iona or Hy bears his name. I believe some person different from Cainech must be looked for in searching for the origin of that denomination, perhaps a Columbian monk, such as St. Kinaeth who became abbot of Durrough and died in 789. (Tr. Th. p. 507.) There is no reason to think, that Cainech formed any establishment in the Hebrides; nor did he belong to Columba's institution. I need not tell the reader, that the city of Kilkenny has got its name from a church having been there dedicated to St. Cainech or Kenny. Yet Ledwich, (Antiquities of Irishtown, &c. in 2d Ed. p. 382.) to show his learning, would fain derive it from Coil (which he changes into Kyle) ken-ui, or, he says, Wooded head near the river. This is a truly wooden-headed etymology. Where did he find that ui means river? He says the natives call it Cilcanuigh. Is not that evidently the Cell of Cainic? The Doctor will not allow saints any where.

(64) (Tr. Th. p. 182.) The Kiennacta here mentioned was that, of which the barony of Kenaght, (co. Londonderry) now forms a part. Colgan says that Cainech is the patron saint of that country.

(65) Ware, Writers, L. 1. c. 13. al. 15. and Usher p. 1065. Burke in the Office of St. Cainech (11th October) calls his father Lyadec. In the Life of St. Cormac (AA. SS. p. 752) he is called Lugad; and by Hanmer (Chronicle, p. 124. new Ed.) Lugaid Lechteag. Adamnan (Vit. S. Col. L. 3. c. 17.) gives to Cainech the surname Mocu-Dalon.

(66) Ware, ib.

(67) Colgan, after the 4 Masters, AA. SS. p. 190. and Tr. Th. p. 182. The year marked by him is 515, which, however, following the rule often mentioned was the same as 516. Usher has (p. 957) the year 527, which is that assigned also by Burke (Office. &c.) for the birth of Cainech. This date cannot be reconciled with Cainech's having been older than St. Aidus bishop of Killare; who was in all probability born about or not long after the year 520. (See above Not. 19.) Cainech's birth must therefore be placed some years before 527, and we may safely assign it to 516.

(68) Usher quotes from a Life of Caineach the following passage; “ Cum S. Cainnicus crevisset, et perfectus esset sensu, voluit scientiam discere et religiosae vitae vacare perrexit ad mare transnavigavitque ad Britanniam,” &c. Harris (Writers, at Caine,) and Burke (Office) say, that he was only 13 years of age, when he went to Britain. But surely a boy of that age would not have been considered as perfectus sensu.

(69) See Chap. ix. §. 11.

(70) In Finnian's Acts, cap. 19. and several other documents, Caineach is reckoned among the principal scholars of that great man.

(71) He is spoken of (AA. SS. p. 752.) as having been on some occasion at the mouth of the river Moy, which empties itself into the bay of Killala.

(72) Harris (Writers) and Burke in the Office, mention this Pictish hermitage of Caineach. Adamnan, who often makes mention of him, gives us no hint to this purpose, and, when touching on his visit to St. Columba, seems to exhibit them, all through, as having been made between Ireland and one or other of the Hebrides. I suspect that what is said of his having been in Pictland is founded on a mistake as to the meaning of a voyage to Britain, as if it always referred to the mainland. But it was not uncommon to use that phrase for a passage from Ireland to the isles adjacent to Britain, as even Adamnan has done. See Not. 147 to Chap. xi.

(73) Usher, p. 1065) from a Life of Caineach. In the passage quoted by him the place is called insula Roscree; and Burke (Office, &c.) calls it fluminis insulam Roscreensem. But Roscrea, a well known town in Munster, is not in an island. I believe that instead of Roscree, we ought to read Lochree, a lake formed by the Shannon, in the islands of which, as we have often seen, there existed religious communities prior to the time that Caineach moved towards the South, while at the same period there does not seem to have been any such establishment at Roscrea? Or might it have been the stagnum Cree, mentioned in the Life of St. Cronan, the same, I suppose, as Monelabog, in which is the island of Monaincha? Ware, quoting the same passage (Writers at Caine) omits the words insula Roscree, for this reason, we may conjecture, that he could not conceive why Roscrea should be placed in an island. Yet Harris has added them to Ware's text. The name, Glass-Kinnich, seems to indicate, that Cainech wrote a continued commentary on the Gospels, of that kind, which in the middle ages used to be called Catena, or Chain, for instance, Catena in Job. It may be that Catena, in this sense, was adopted from the old Irish divines.

(74) Adamnan, (L. 2. c. 13.) calls it Achad-bou, "quod latine Campulus bovis dicitur."

(75) Cainech had, as is plain from Adamnan, (L. 3. c. 17.) founded the house of Aghaboe, before he accompanied Brendan of Clonfert on a visit to St. Columba then in the isle of Hymba. Brendan died in 577. Hence it appears, that Harris (Writers) and Burke (Office &c.) were wrong in assigning that foundation to the time, in which Colman mac Feredach or Feraidhe ruled Ossory; whereas he could not have been sovereign of that territory until A. D. 582 (583) in which his father Feredach was killed. See the 4 Masters, and Tr. Th. p. 450.

(76) Ware and Harris (Bishops at Ossory) say, that the see of Saigir was transferred to Aghaboe, perhaps in 1052. But, as will be seen in its proper place, this translation occurred at a later period.

(77) This was the Colman mentioned above, Not. 49 and 75. His father's name is variously written, Feraidhe, Feradach, Feredach. Our old writers allowed themselves too great a latitude in spelling proper names, so as often to excite doubts as to the identity of one and the same person. Hundreds of instances might be adduced. Thus the very saint we are now treating of appears as Cainech, Cainnich, Cannich, Kinnich, &c. In the Life of St. Pulcherius (cap. 30.) we read, that St. Cainech had prayed for the eternal salvation of Colman, and that he would assist him in every thing.

(78) See Not. 182. to Chap. xi.

(79) In Fintan's Acts, cap. 7. it is related, that, his rules being so strict as not to allow either himself or his monks the use even of milk, Cainech, accompanied by some other holy men, went to Clonenagh for the purpose of inducing him to relax somewhat of the severity of his discipline. Fintan yielded as for his monks, but declined to change his own manner of living.

(80) Adamnan relates one instance of them. (See Not. 182 to Chap. XI.) Some others are mentioned in the Life of Pui-cherius.

(81) Ware (Writers at Cainic) attributes to him a Life of St. Columba and Hymns in praise of him. We may, I dare say, deduce another instance of his authorship from what has been remarked above, Not. 73.

(82) Four Masters and AA. SS. p. 190. They have 598, i. e. 599. Usher agrees (p. 957.) as to the year of his death, but, in consequence of his supposition that Cainech was born in 527, (above Not. 67) says that he died at the age of 72. Yet he observes, that in a Life of Cainech he found his death assigned to his 84th year. Ware, upon what authority I do not know, (Writers and Antiq. cap. 26. at Queen's County) places it in 600, and, as he gives him, with Usher, only 72 years of age, he must have supposed that Cainnach had been born in 528.

§ VII. In the same class, after Cainech the first named is Eogin mac Laisre, concerning whom I can find nothing satisfactory. (83) Then comes Lugeus, who, according to every appearance, was the same as the celebrated Ligidus or Molua of Clonfert-Molua. As he is more generally called Molua, (84) I shall, in my endeavours to give a sketch of his history, make use of that name. He was of a distinguished family of Hy-Figinte, a district of Munster. His father was Carthar, surnamed Coche, and his mother Sochla, a native of Ossory. (85) Of the time of his birth I do not meet with any account. Were it true that he had been at Finnian's school of Clonard, (86) he should have come into the world several years previous to the middle of the sixth century. Supposing that he was at that school, it was undoubtedly in his younger days, and before he became a disciple of Comgall of Bangor, which he could not have been earlier than about A. D. 559. (87) Under this great master he remained for, probably, a considerable time, and, having embraced the monastic state, became so distinguished by his virtue and abilities, that Comgall, finding him duly qualified for governing others, directed him to form an establishment for himself and to nourish the servants of Christ. (88) Accordingly Molua returned to Munster, and, being attended by some disciples, repaired to Mount Luachra in the now county of Limerick. (89) Wishing to establish himself in that district, he was advised not to remain there by the dynast, a worthy man, whose name was Foelan. (90) He then removed from that country, although it is probable that he left some of his disciples there, and went to Mount Bladhma, now Sliebh-bloom, near where his maternal relatives resided, and erected a monastery at a place since called Clonfert Molua, now Clonfertmulloe, (91) to which a vast number of monks resorted from various parts, who were all received with great kindness by Molua. Afterwards he returned to Hy-Figinte, where he founded several cells and monasteries. (92) He is said to have established many other religious houses, so as in all to have been as many as a hundred, (93) which however ought, I believe, to be understood not only of those founded immediately by himself, but as including others formed by his disciples, and belonging to his order or institution. For Molua drew up a particular Rule for his monks, which, we are told, was read and approved of by Pope Gregory the great (94). One of his regulations was the perpetual exclusion of women from the monastery of Clonfert-Molua. (95) The church of Killaloe, in Irish Kill-da-lua, or cell of Lua, is supposed to have got its name from the saint, either from his having lived there for some time, (96) or from its having been dedicated in his name. This is not improbable, (97) although far from being certain. It has been said by some writers, that Molua was afflicted with a leprosy, that is, with some cutaneous complaint, for 20 years before his death; but there is reason to think, that Molua, surnamed the leper, was a different person, and the real Molua of Killaloe. (98) A short time before his death he is said to have called upon Dagan, bishop of Achad-Dagan, for the purpose of consulting him as to the appointment of a successor for his monastery. Dagan told him that he would be succeeded by Lactan, a choice with which he was highly pleased. (99) St. Molua departed this life not long after the beginning of the seventh century. (100) The day assigned for his death is the 4th of August. This saint was reckoned among the Fathers of the Irish church (101).

(83) It has been already observed (Not. 33.) that, as he is called son of Laisre, he was different from Eugene, bishop of Ardstrath. Usher has (p. 958.) another conjecture, viz. that he might have been the same as the holy elder Eogan, one of those to whom St. Kevin's parents entrusted him, when he was 12 years old (See Chap. x. § 10.) But how could a man who was a senior when Kevin was so young, belong to the second class of saints? He must have flourished many years before that class began.

(84) His original name was Lua, whence Mo-Lua or my Lua. Some of our old writers have latinized it into Lugidus, and hence Usher (p. 943) and Ware (Writers) speak of Lugidus and Molua as one and the same person. St. Bernard calls him Luanus, by which name he is mentioned also in AA. SS. p. 57. There is in Fleming's Collectanea Sacra a Life of St. Molua taken from a MS. of Armagh. The fables, with which it abounds, show that it is not very ancient.

(85) Ware (Writers, L. 1. c. 13. al. 15.) quotes from a Life of Molua the following passage. "Beatissimus abbas Lugidus, generosis ortus parentibus, patrem habuit Cartharium, genere Mumeniensem; mater autem dicta est Sochla natione Osrigenensis." The English translator has most strangely rendered generosis by gentile. In the Life ap. Fleming we read (cap. 1.); "Fuit vir vitæ venerabilis de provincia Mumoniae, de regione Hua Fidhgenti de plebe Corcoiche, nomine Mo-Lua, cujus pater vocabatur Carthach, sed vulgo Coche dicitur; mater vero ejus Sochla, id est, larga, vocabatur, quæ erat de occidentali Laginiensium plaga, id est, Osraigi, oriunda."

O'Flaherty (Ogyg. p. 381.) follows this account. Instead of Hua-Fidgenti Hanmer has (Chronicle, p. 121 new ed.) Hua-fi in Munster. In the now quoted Life (cap. 27.) Hua-Fidgenti, or, as some call it, Hy-Figinte, is described as a country or people at the south side of the Shannon to as far as Mount Luachra in the west. It was in the now county of Limerick, although Harris (Antiq. ch. 7.) places part of it in Kerry. Many tracts in Ireland were denominated Corcach or Corcoick, which signifies moor, marsh, or low swampy ground. That Molua's father was called Coche, appears from several other documents, such as the Life of St. Moedoc cap. 20, and that of Pulcherius cap. 11. Colgan in his notes to them applies what is said of Molua, son of Coche, to the Molua whose festival was held on the 4th of August, that is, to the Molua, whom we are treating of. I do not find that he calls his father Carthar. As the name Carthar or Carthach was that of several princes and nobles of Munster, it became necessary to distinguish them by surnames or epithets. These, as in many other cases, were often used alone to designate persons; omitting, for conciseness' sake, the real names. Thus, although Molua's father was a Carthar, yet he might have been more generally called simply Coche.

(86) Colgan refers (AA. SS. p. 405.) to Molua's Life for his being a scholar of Finnian; and, in fact, it is mentioned, but I believe erroneously, in cap. 26. and as having occurred after he left Bangor.

(87.) See Chap. x. §. 12. That Molua was a disciple of Comgall, is universally admitted. See Usher, p. 919) Ware, (Writers at Molua), Molua's Life, passim.

(88) Life of St. Pulcherius, cap. xi. By nourishing the servants of Christ is meant not only the relieving of the bodily wants of the poor, &c. but likewise the supplying them with spiritual food.

(89) See Not. 6. to Chap. xi. Mount Luachra adjoins the country called Hy-figinte, of which Molua is said to have been a native (See Not. 85.)

(90) Life ap. Fleming, cap. 27.

(91) In said Life (see cap. 30. and Usher, p. 943.) Clonfertmolua is stated to have been at the very boundary of Leinster and (the ancient) Munster, between Ossory, Hele (Ely O'Carrol formerly in Munster) and Leix. Slieve-Bloom was in old times a boundary between Munster and Leinster. (Seward Topogr. &c.) According to the modern division Clonfertmulloe is in the King's county, and is now a parish. In the Life the origin of the name is thus explained; "Cluain-ferta-Molua, id est, Latibulum mirabile S. Moluae, eo quod ipse in sua vita multa miracula in ea fecit, et adhuc gratia Dei per eum patrantur." The former name of that place is said to have been Ross-Bulead, and the dynast, with whose permission Molua erected his monastery, Berach of Laigy or Leix.

(92) Said Life, cap. 31.

(93) St. Bernard makes mention of this hearsay as to the 100 monasteries. (See Not. 203 to Chap. x.) I am surprized that Usher has (Ind. Chron. ad a. 620.) applied St. Bernard's words to a Lua, who is spoken of in Jonas, Life of St. Columbanus, cap. 20. This Lua was one of those, who went to France with Columbanus, and was undoubtedly different from the Luanus of St. Bernard. It is plain from the text, that he meant a founder of monasteries in Ireland; nor does he speak of Columbanus or such other disciples of Comgall as went to the Continent, until after his touching upon the foundations of Luanus, who could have been no other than Molua of Clonfert-Molua, of whom we may assert that he did not go abroad with St. Columbanus.

(94) Molua's Life, (cap. 48); Usher (p. 920); Colgan (AA. SS. p. 585;) &c. It is said that the abbot, afterwards bishop, Dagan of Achadh-Dagain going to Rome, took with him a copy of Molua's rule, which, on being read by the Pope, pleased him so much, that he highly praised it and sent his blessing to the author. Usher (Ind. Chron.) assigns this transaction to A. D. 599. But it is more than probable, that no such transaction took place. It is, I dare say, a mere flourish made up by some monk of Molua's order, in honour of the Rule, which he observed. As to Dagan, it may be doubted, whether he was ever at Rome, if, as there is every reason to believe, he was the bishop Dagan mentioned by Bede (Eccl. Hist. L. 2. c. 4.) as a determined opponent of the Roman missionaries on the Paschal question.

(95) "Ut nulla mulier ibi semper intraret; et ab illo die usque hodie nulla mulier in illud monasterium audet intrare." (See Usher, p. 943.) Hanmer translates semper by always, not knowing that semper there means at any time for ever, being the same as in sempiternum. (Compare with Not. 60 to Chap. x.)

(96) Ware says, (Antiq. cap. 29.) that he lived there about the end of the 6th century. Harris, (Bishop at Killaloe) through some mistake or other, changed end into beginning. Archdall, (at Killaloe) has copied this mistake. I wish Ware had produced some authority for our Molua having lived in that place at any time. The want of that circumstance would not, however, prevent its church from having been called by his name. Or did Ware mean another Molua? (See below Not. 98.)

(97) I say not improbable, because we find about those times, other persons called Lua or Molua. That Kill-da-lua is derived from some one of that name was never called in question, until the mighty Ledwich appeared, who, ever anxious to exterminate saints, styles that derivation a childish analyses, (Antiq. p. 144.) and tells us that “St. Molua is an ideal personage.” And why? Because Kill-le-lua signifies the church upon or near the water, i. e. the Shannon. He ought to have written Kill-da-lua. But pray, were there not hundreds of churches near the Shannon and other waters in Ireland; and how has it come to pass that the church of Killaloe alone has got its name from water? Will this charlatan maintain, that there is no such family name as Waters, and that, wherever said word occurs, it must be understood of the element water? Supposing even that his derivation of Killaloe is correct, will it follow that no St. Lua or Molua ever existed? Whence then the name of Clonfert-Mulua, a place known at this very day? The Luanus of St. Bernard must have been a phantom, notwithstanding all the monasteries, which he or his disciples (phantoms also,) had founded. The churches, &c. erected by them must be considered as castles in the air. St. Moedoc of Ferns, Pulcherius, &c. and even Congall of Bangor must likewise be ideal personages, who, as appears from numberless authorities, were connected with Molua. Who can bear with patience the falsehoods and equivocations of an ignorant scribbler, who, while he never ceased to endeavour to cast ridicule upon Vallancey, a man vastly more learned and honest, as dealing in etymologies, recurs himself to the most extravagant and unfounded ones, whenever it suits his vile purposes to do so?

(98) According to Ware (Writers) Molua or Luaid, that is, he of Clonfert-Molua died of a leprosy. But in the Munster histories referred to by Vallancey (Law of Tanistry, &c. in Collect. Vol. 1.) it is related, that Molua-lobhar, or the leper, was brother to Aodh-Caomh, king of Cashel, or all Munster, and son of Conall the grandson of Carthan Fionn, who had been baptized by St. Patrick. Aoad-Caomh and Molua-Jobhar, were contemporaries with Brendan of Clonfert. The same account is given of Molua-lobhar also by O'Flaherty, (p. 389) who distinguished him from Molua of Clonfert-mulua, as appears from the manner in which he speaks of the latter at p. 381. If the latter had been brother to the king, such a circumstance would not have been omitted by the author of his Life; and, instead of his parents being called generous or distinguished, (See Not. 85) some higher epithet would have been applied to them. Next comes an essential difference founded on the one, Molua-lobhar, being expressly represented as the son of Conall, while the other is called son of Carthar or Coche. If they were distinct persons, as there is every reason to think, it may be fairly admitted, that the surnamed Lobhar was the founder of the church of Killaloe. In the above mentioned tract (Law, &c.) he is called the first bishop of Killaloe; but it would have been more correct to give him only the title of abbot. A Lugar Lobhar is named in the Calendars at 11 May. (AA. SS. p. 628) Might he have been Lua or Molua-lobhar? The whole subject is so obscure, that I cannot form any decisive opinion on it. Supposing that these Moluas were different, yet they were contemporaries; and hence it may be easily accounted for, why they have been sometimes confounded together.

(99) AA. SS. p. 585.

(100) The 4 Masters and Colgan (AA. SS. p. 210.) assign his death to A. D. 605 (606); Usher (Ind. Chron.) to 608; Ware (Writers) to 609. Archdall, (at Clonfert-mulua) having stumbled on a passage of the AA. SS. where Lactan, abbot of Clonfert-Molua, is said to have died in 622, makes Molua also die in said year.

(101) See Cumnian's Paschal Epistle, (Sylloge, &c.) in which he is called Lugidus.

§. VIII. Next after Lugeus, or Molua, is mentioned Ludeus. It is probable that the name ought to be read Lugdeus, in which case he might have been one of the St. Lugads of those days, perhaps that of Lismore in the Hebrides, who died in 589. (102) As to Moditeus, who follows him in the list, I can scarcely form a conjecture. (103) Cormac is better known, if, as appears most probable, he was the Cormac Hua Liathain, who is often mentioned by Adamnan, under the surname of nepos Liathain, and is generally supposed to have been a disciple of St. Columba. (104) His being called a descendant of Liathain seems to indicate that he was of the sept of the Hua Liathains, in the now county of Cork (Barrymore, &c.) If so, he must have left his own country and settled elsewhere, probably in the now county of Mayo; whereas we find him setting out from that country on one of his voyages in quest of a desert island. (105) We may also admit, that it was in some part of said country that he established a monastery; for although no particular account of it has reached us, it cannot be doubted that he founded one somewhere or other, (106) It is related of Cormac, that he, and some companions of his, sailed three times in search of some uninhabited spot in the ocean, adapted to the accommodation of a religious community, but without being able to discover one. (107) In the second of these voyages he was obliged to take shelter in one of the Orkneys; (108) and in the third, being driven for fourteen days to the Northward, he was in danger of being lost until, the wind having providentially changed, he was enabled to get out of those high latitudes. (109) It was probably after these fruitless expeditions that he founded his monastery. At what time he died I cannot discover. (110) His memory was revered on the 21st of June. (111) Colman, who is placed next to him in the class, was very probably the bishop Colman, founder of the see of Cloyne. It is true, that there were about those times several other holy men of that name; (112) but such of them, as we have any account of, flourished at periods later, more or less, than that of said class. (113) Accordingly we may fairly suppose that St. Colman of Cloyne was the person alluded to. He is said to have been of the royal blood of Munster by his father's side, whose name was Lenin or Lenine, and brother to one of the St. Brigids. (114) He is sometimes surnamed Mitine, (115) whence it may be justly inferred that he was a native of the country called Muscrighe Mitine, now Muskerry in the county of Cork. (116) The time of his birth cannot be ascertained; but it was probably about the year 522. His early years seem to have been dedicated to the study of poetry, and we are told that he became domestic poet to the prince Aodh Caomh, who was raised, about the middle of the sixth century, to the throne of Cashel, and that he was present, together with Brendan of Clonfert, at his inauguration in Magh-femyn, between Cashel and Clonmell. (117) Colman, following the advice of Brendan, soon after renounced his worldly pursuits, and is said to have repaired to the school of St. Iarlath of Tuam. (118) Some writers have called Colman a disciple of St. Finbar of Cork; a statement, for which there is not the least foundation. (119) Of any further transactions of his, or at what precise time he became bishop of Cloyne, I am not able to give an account. He died, according to some, in the year 601, and according to others, in 604. (120) The day of his death was the 24th of November. (121) Among several works, which, it is probable, were composed by Colman, I find only one particularly mentioned, viz. a metrical Life of St. Seuan, of Inniscatthy, written in Irish, and in a very elegant style. (122)

(102) 4 Masters and AA. SS. p. 193. This Lugadius, alias, Molugedus, Molugadius, &c. whose death is assigned to the 25th of June, a. 588 (589), is mentioned in several Calendars, and in some of them with great praise. In one of those drawn up by Aengus he is called lucerna Lismori de Albione. It is very probable, that he was the same as Luguid one of the 12 companions of St. Columba. (See Not. 148 to Chap. xi. and Tr. Th. p. 481.) Archdall places him at Lismore in co. Waterford. Had he looked into Tr. Th. ib. he would not have fallen into this mistake. Whether he was bishop or only abbot in the island of Lismore, Colgan does not undertake to decide. Usher thought (p. 958) that Ludeus might have been the same as Lugad Laithir the messenger of St. Columba. (See Not. 180 to Chap. xi.) But, besides his not having been as celebrated as Lugad of Lismore, it seems that he was not old enough at the period of the second class of saints to be reckoned among them.

(103) Usher (p. 958) threw out a quære, whether Moditeus might have been a St. Medocius, of whom he says a Life is extant. I cannot find any thing concerning such a Life or Medocius himself. There is a considerable difference between the two names. Moditeus is most probably a compound one, made up of Mo and Diteus. Might Diteus be a contraction of Diermitius or Diermiteus? If this be allowed, it may be supposed that Moditeus was either Diermit of Inis-clothrann, of whom above, Chap. x. §. 3. or Diermit of Glean-Ussen, ib. §. 14.

(104) I do not find sufficient authority for making Cormac a disciple of Columba. Adamnan seems to speak of him as merely a friend of his, and reckons him (L. 3. c. 17.) among the founders of monasteries in Ireland. Yet O'Donnel represents him (L. 2. c. 64.) as having been for some time abbot of Durrough, in which case he should have belonged to Columba's institution. Hence Colgan (AA. SS. p. 360.) has given him that title. It is, however, very odd, that Adamnan never alludes to it, and that he should have joined him with Cainech and others, as persons who had establishments of their own.

(105) Adamnan (L. 1. c. 6.) introduces Cormac as sailing "ab illa regione, quae ultra Modam fluvium sita Eirros Domnonn dicitur." Moda is, as Colgan justly observes, the river Moy, and Eirros, &c. the now called Irros, &c. that is, Erris. Usher having read, in his copy of Adamnan, Cirros, instead of Eirros, fell into a mistake (p. 959.) with regard to Moda, thinking it might be the Modona of Ptolemy, or the river Slaney of Wexford, and that Cirros, as he called it, was somewhere near said river.

(106) See Not. 104.

(107) Adamnan, L. 1. c. 6. The phrase used by him here and elsewhere is, that Cormac was searching for Eremum in Oceano. Perhaps his meaning was not such, as I have endeavoured in the text to explain, but that those voyages were undertaken for the purpose of discovering some particular island, the existence of which Cormac had heard of, in the same manner as Brendan is said to have sailed in quest of an unexplored island or country.

(108) See Not. 162. to Chap. xi. (109) Adamnan, L. 2. c. 42.

(110) O'Donnel says (L. 2. c. 64.) that Cormac died at Durrough, but does not specify the time. I wish we had better authority for Durrough having been the place of his death. See Not. 104.

(111) Tr. Th. p. 489. and AA. SS. p. 360. This date for his festival shows, besides other circumstances, that Cormac Hua Liathain was different from St. Cormac or Corbmac, whose Life Colgan has at 26 March. In some respects their history seems to agree. If the former Cormac was of the Hua Liathain of Munster, we have one point of coincidence; for the latter was a native of that province; next, both of them lived in the sixth century. Then it is stated that the latter left his own country for the sake of leading a religious life, and went to the now county of Mayo, where he established a monastery on the banks of the Moy. (Compare with Not. 105.) But in every other respect the accounts differ. Nothing is said of the latter having visited Columbkil, nor of any voyages made by him, &c. &c. He is represented as of the Eugenic line of the royal house of Munster, and is said to have been in Connaught before the year 537 (538). For we are told, that on his way to Mayo he called at the court of Eugene Bel, son of Kellach king of Connaught. Now Eugene Bel was killed in that year, according to the 4 Masters and Colgan. (AA. SS. p. 755.) There are indeed some circumstances mentioned in Corbmac's Life, which would bring his times down to a rather late part of the seventh century. Colgan thinks that they are interpolations; nor shall I endeavour to reconcile these anachronisms. Let it suffice to observe, that, unless we are to reject what is stated in this Life of his having been a brother, and apparently an elder one, of St. Evin of Rosmic-trevin (see below Chap. xiv. §. 3.) Corbmac must have lived in the sixth century. In the transactions attributed to him I find nothing worthy of particular notice, at least, that can be depended upon. Even the day of his death is doubtful. According to Colgan it was either a 26th of March or 13th of December.

(112) Usher (p. 960) makes mention of Colman of Dair-mor, Colman-Elo, and Colman Dub-culinn. The two former were, as will be seen lower down, later by some years than so as to be reckoned among the saints of the second class. And as to Colman Dub-culinn, he was still much later; for it can scarcely be doubted that he was bishop Colman son of Cuidel dubh, whose death, as Usher himself tells us, (p. 964) is assigned in the Annals of Ulster to A. D. 653, and who was abbot of Clonard and afterwards bishop, according to the 4 Masters and Colgan, (AA. SS. p. 406.) who place his death in 652, and spell his father's name not Cuidel-dubh, but Hua-Tel-duibh. Usher seems not to have been acquainted with the history of Colman of Cloyne.

(113) Colgan (AA. SS. p. 247.) marks the respective years, in which nine or ten Colmans died. All these dates, excepting that of the death of Colman son of Lenine, i. e. the bishop of Cloyne, belong to the times of the third class rather than of the second.

(114) AA. SS. p. 104. Colman is there called frater germanus superioris S. Brigidæ, that is, of a just before mentioned St. Brigid virgin, daughter of Lenin, who was revered on the 6th of March in the church of Kill-naninghean. Smith in his pitiful account of Colman, (Hist. of Cork, Vol. I. p. 142.) translated frater germanus "cousin german," and superioris S. Brigidæ "the celebrated St. Bridget of Ireland," that is, of Kildare. A school boy could scarcely have fallen into such mistakes. Colgan's text is as plain as possible. Having mentioned Brigid, daughter of Lenin, he proceeds immediately to her brother Colman. Surely, even without the help of the context, Smith might have easily known, that Lenin's daughter could not have been Bridget of Kildare, and that the sixth of March was not the day of this great saint's festival. And was he so ignorant of Latin as not to know the meaning of frater germanus? From what Colgan adds concerning Kill-naninghean it seems that it was somewhere in the now county of Wicklow. (See Archdall ad loc.)

(115) See AA. SS. ib. (116) See Not. 74 to Chap. vi.

(117) Vallancy, Law of Tanistry, &c.

(118) Colgan (AA. SS. p. 309) deduces from a passage of a Life of Brendan by Magraidin, that Colman studied under Iarlath.

Yet the matter is far from being clear. Magraidin says, that Brendan, (not when a boy, as he tells us, see Chap. x. §. 7.) going from Munster to visit Iarlath, met a man named Colman son of Lenin, and advised him to do penance, telling him that he was called by God to the way of salvation. To make an incidental observation, this statement shows that Brendan was then not a boy, but a respected man, and, as he certainly was, older than Colman. But it is not quite plain from what follows, that Colman accompanied Brendan to Iarlath's monastery. Be this as it may, Colgan was strangely mistaken in placing Colman at that school about the beginning of the 6th century, and at a time when he was a grown up man, as if he could have afterwards lived until 600 (601), the year, to which Colgan himself repeatedly assigns his death. (Compare with Not. 140 to Chap. x.) Magraidin adds; "This Colman son of Lenin was distinguished among the saints by his life and learning. He was the founder of the church of Cloyne, a celebrated cathedral in Munster."

(119) Ware is, as far as I know, the author of this opinion. Having found a Colman among the real or pretended scholars of Finnbar, he supposed him to be Colman of Cloyne. That Colman is not called son of Lenin, by which appellation Ware constantly distinguishes the bishop of Cloyne, but Colman de Doiron-Dhuncon. (AA. SS. p. 750.) Usher has (p. 971.) two Mocholmogs, or Colmans, among Finnbar's disciples, one the son of Gillem, and the other surnamed Cainnich. The son of Lenin is not mentioned any where as one of them. Colman of Cloyne was, I believe, older than Finnbar.

(120) The 4 Masters and Colgan (AA. SS. p. 247 and 539) have A. 600 (601). Ware A. 604. (Antiq. cap. 29. and Bishops at Cloyne.)

(121) Colgan, quoting (ib. p. 104.) several martyrologies and calendars, says that Colman's festival is celebrated on the 24th of November in the church of Cluain-uamhach (Cloyne) in the district of Uibh-Liathain. How Ware (loc. cit.) happened to assign his death to the 4th of November, I do not understand; but this date is certainly wrong, whereas Colman's festival has been, and is still, held on the 24th. Harris (at Cloyne) makes a silly addition to Ware, as if there might have been two Colmans sons of Lenin, one who died in 600 (601) on the 24th of said month, and was revered at Cloyne, and the other the Colman of Ware. Now it is evident, that although Ware's and Colgan's dates differ, they were treating of one and the same person viz. the Colman son of Lenin and bishop of Cloyne. Smith (Hist. of Cork, Vol. 1. p. 142.) having copied that trash of Harris, adds from himself, that, according to the Calendar of Cashel, &c. referred to by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 310) the bishop Colman died on the 4th of November. What a strange want of correctness! In that very passage Colgan has not the 4th but the 24th of that month. In a similar strain of inaccuracy Smith quotes (p. 141), as if from Magraidin, some words by Ware, which he subjoined to the passage from Magraidin given above Not. 118. Uibh-Liathain, in which Cloyne was situated, is the territory alluded to in Not. 105. and has been called, at least a part of it, until a late period, also O or Hua Liathain, al. Leathan. (See Smith ib. and p. 41.)

(122) AA. SS. p. 539.

§ ix. The history of Nesson, who is named after Colman, although he had been prior to him in the order of time, has been sketched already. (123.) We shall now proceed to Lasrean, who was undoubtedly the celebrated St. Molaisse of Devenish. (124) Although this saint was greatly respected both before and after his death, yet his history is but little known. (125) He was son of one Natfraich, and a native, it seems, of some part of Connaught. (126) Nothing else occurs concerning him, until we find him at the school of Finnian of Clonard, among whose chief disciples he is particularly mentioned. (127) It was probably soon after leaving said school that he retired to the island Daimh-inis, now Devenish, in Lough Erne, (128) where he erected a monastery, which became very famous, and continued to be so for many centuries. He was certainly settled there some years before Columbkil's departure from Ireland in 563. (129) Molaisse is said to have formed a rule for his monastery, (130) and was considered as one of the principal abbots of his time. He was visited by divers holy men of that period, among others by St. Aidus bishop of Killare, (130*) and was held in such estimation, that to do the honour to the see of Clogher, it has been pretended that he became bishop of it. (131) A journey of his to Rome is spoken of, (132) for which there is no foundation, except his having been confounded with his illustrious namesake of Leighlin. The year of his death is uncertain, it being assigned by some to 563 (564), and by others to 570 or 571. (133) As to the day, there is no question, it having been a 12th of September. (134) Whether or not St. Molaisse was succeeded at Devenish by a St. Natalis, has been inquired into elsewhere. (135) Barrindeus, who follows in the second class, was of the Niall family, if, as there is every reason to believe, he was the same as Barrinthus or Barrindus, who is mentioned in the account of the voyages of St. Brendan. (136) He governed a monastery at Druim-cuillin, now Drumcullin, in a part of the ancient Meath, adjoining Munster, now called the barony of Eglisli, and which in those days belonged to the Southern Nialls. (137) I do not find any thing further concerning his transactions, unless I should amuse the reader with an account of his supposed voyage to a western country or great island, and his travels therein, prior to the expedition of Brendan. (138) Barrindeus died on the 21st of May, (139) but in what year I cannot discover. (140)

(123) Chap. xi. §. 6.

(124) Molaisse or Molaisre the same as My Laisre. Usher was right (p. 961) in supposing that the Lasrean of the second class was he of Devenish. The St. Laserian, Lasrian, or Molaisse of Leighlin belonged to a later period. Laisran, disciple of St. Columba. (See Not. 179 to Chap. xi.) was not celebrated enough to be particularly named in that list; nor was Lasrean abbot of Drumliag, of whom ib. Not. 20.

(125) Ware mentions (Writers, L. 1. c. 13. al. 15.) a, so called, Life of his, and Colgan also had a copy of it. From some scraps quoted by him, (Tr. Th. p. 209 and 461) it seems to be not a biography, but a mere panegyric discourse pronounced on the day of his festival. And hence it is, I suppose, that they have given us so little concerning the transactions of this saint.

(126) He is constantly called the son of Natfraich. As to his having been a native of Connaught there is a passage of the AA. SS. p. 339. in which the virgins Osnata of Gleandallain, either in Carbria or Breffnia and Muadhnata of Caille in Carbria are said to have been sisters of Molaisse of Devenish. Carbria is the now Carbury of Sligo. Hence we may infer, that his family was either of that country or of some other not far distant part of Connaught. This supposition is confirmed by what we read in the Life of St. Maidoc of Ferns, (cap. 7.) concerning his having been a companion of Molaisse, before the latter went to Devenish. Now Maidoc was of a family of Breffny. Hence it is very probable, that Molaisse was also from that country. It is true, that in this narrative there is an anachronism; for Molaisse was already an abbot, when Maidoc was no more than a boy. Yet this does not invalidate their having been natives of the same territory.

(127) Finnian's Acts, cap. 19. and elsewhere passim.

(128) We read in Maidoc's Life (cap. 7.) "B. Lasserianus ad aquilonalem plagam Hiberniae se conduxit, et construxit clarissimum monasterium in stagno Erni nomine Daimh-inis, quod sonat latine Bovis insula."

(129) However silly the story of Columba's having been ordered by Molaisse to leave Ireland, (See Chap. xi. §. 11.) yet it presupposes, that he was a renowned abbot about 461, the year of the battle of Cul-dremni, and consequently one not of new standing.

(130) Ware, Antiq. cap. 26. at Fermanagh. In Tr. Th. p. 605. Molassius is reckoned among eight chief authors of monastic rules in Ireland. Yet it may be doubted whether this Molassius was not the one of Leighlin.

(130*) Life of Aidus, cap. 37. (131) See above Not. 5.

(132) AA. SS. p. 222.

(133) The 4 Masters and Colgan (AA. SS. p. 192.) have 563 (564); Usher (Ind. Chron.) 570, following one date of the Ulster Annals, which elsewhere place Molaisse's death in 563 (564). But, instead of 570, Usher ought to have said 571, as this was in fact the same as the 570 of the Annals; and accordingly Ware (Antiq. cap. 26) has A. 571. Whether this date or 564 be the true one I am not able to decide.

(134) Colgan and Ware loc. citt.

(135) Not. 53. to Chap. ix.

(136) See Not. 108 to Chap. x. Barrinthus is called (AA. SS. p. 721) nepos Neill. Colgan adds, (p. 725.) that he was of the branch of Conal Gulbanus.

(137) Usher quotes (p. 962) the following passage from the Life of St. Carthagh of Lismore; “Druim-cuillin, quod est in confinio Mumoniensium et Lageniensium et nepotum Neill; sed tamen est in terra nepotum Neill, in terra quae dicitur Fearceall.” We have often met with Fearceall or Fercall. It was a territory of S. Meath belonging to the Neills, of which the barony of Eglisli forms a part. Drumcullin in said barony is well known at this day. (See Seward ad loc.) Archdall has it there, but, as if through fear of being mistaken, gives it to us again, together with its abbot Barrindeus, in Westmeath. Surely he ought to have known that, as Druim-cuillin was near the frontier of Munster, it could not have been in any part of Westmeath.

(138) AA. SS. p. 721. seqq. See also Not. 108 to Chap. x. The Western country, in which Barrinthus is said to have travelled, is called “Terra repromissionis sanctorum, quam Dominus daturus est successoribus nostris in novissimo tempore.” There is a curious coincidence between this passage and the great emigrations to America in the late times, in which we live.

(139) AA. SS. p. 725.

(140) Usher says (Ind. Chron.) that Barrindeus flourished in 591. But, if he was an abbot at the time Brendan is supposed to have undertaken his great voyage, he must have flourished much earlier, and we may conclude that he was dead long before said year.

§ x. Who the Coeman was, whose name now occurs, it is perhaps impossible to determine, as there were several saints of that name in those times. Coeman, a brother of St. Coemhgen or Kevin, is said to have been abbot at Airdne-Coemhain (141) near Wexford. He must, as brother to Coemgen, have flourished during the period of the second class. To this period belonged also St. Coeman one of the disciples of Columba of Tirdaglas, and abbot of Annatrim in the now Queen's county, (barony of Upper Ossory) and contemporary with St. Fintan of Clonenagh. (142) He was not only abbot, but apparently the founder of that monastery, (143) where he spent the remainder of his days in great sanctity, and died highly respected on a third of November. (144) The year of his death is not known. (145) Another Coeman, said to have been called also Comman, is spoken of as living in those times; and were we to believe some accounts, from him Roscommon, where large grants of land were made to him, got its name. But the little I find related of him is of so pompous and vague a nature, that it cannot be depended upon. (146) Next come Cemanus and Conanus, (147) the former of whom was probably one of the Coemans of that period, but which of them I cannot point out. (148) Conan is sufficiently well known, (149) and is mentioned in several calendars by the name of Conan-Dil or Conna-Dil, that is, Conan the beloved. He was of the Tyrconnel line of the Nialls, being son of Tigernach, who was a great grandson of Conal Gulbanus. Hence it follows, that he was a relative, although somewhat distant, of Columbkil. From his having been only the fourth in descent from Conal Gulbanus, it is natural to conclude, that he lived in the sixth century. Conan governed a monastery, (150) probably of his own foundation, at Cnodain near Easruaidh (Astrath) on the North bank of the river Erne in the now county of Donegall. According to some accounts he became bishop at Easruaidh, where his festival was celebrated on the 8th of March, the anniversary of his death. (151) As to Endeus, who is mentioned after Conan, it can scarcely be admitted that by that name was meant the great St. Enda of Arran, whose history has been already given. (152)

Considering the time at which he died, (not long after 540) it is more probable, that the Endeus of the second class was a different person. We find an Enna or Endeus, a disciple of Columb-kill, and abbot at Imleachfoda, now Emlaghfad in the county of Sligo. He is usually called son of Nuadan, and his memory was revered on the 18th of September. (153) Nothing occurs to prevent our supposing that he was the saint alluded to in the list. Aedus or the bishop Aidus has been treated of above in this chapter. (154) Byrchinus must have been one of the distinguished men of those days, usually known by the name of Berchanus or Berchan. (155) St. Mobhy Clairineach, of whom we have seen already, (156) was called also Berchan; (157) and I am greatly inclined to think, that, as he was a much respected holy man, he is the person alluded to under the name of Byrchinus. (158) Or we may suppose, that he was the Berchan, a contemporary of St. Coemhgen, in whose Acts he is spoken of as having lost his sight, and being endowed with the gift of prophecy. (159)

(141) AA. SS. p. 584 586. Archdall (at Airdne-Coemhain), referring to these very pages, makes Coemhan brother to Dagan. He looked over them in too great a hurry. Dagan is there exhibited, in as plain a manner as possible, not as brother but nephew to Coeman, having been son of his sister, Coemaca. In the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick (L. 2. c. 54.) Coeman of Airdne-Coemhain is said to have been brother to St. Attracta, and consequently of a Connaught family. Following this statement, Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 177) contradicts what he has in AA. SS. ib. concerning Coeman, and tells us, that the brother of Coemhgen was Coemen of Enach-truim. He adds that Coeman brother of Attracta, and called of Airdne-Coemhain was perhaps the Coeman, to whom the church of Kill-coemain was dedicated in one of the Arran isles, called from him Ara-coemain, now Ardoilen. O'Flaherty in a MS. note (at Tr. Th. p. 177) maintains that the Coeman of Airdne-Coemhain was the brother of Coemhgen, and that he was also the one of Kill-coemain. Whether he was brother or not of Coemhgen, he was certainly the person revered in that church; whereas both there and at Aairdne-Coemhain his festival was held on the 12th of June. (See ib. and AA. SS. p. 715.) The name Airdne-Coemhain has a reference to an Arran or Aran island; for Airdne or Airne is the oblique case of Aran. The monastery near Wexford got that name from having been founded by, or dedicated to, a Coeman, who was well known in the isles of Arran. The only question now remaining is, whether he was the brother of St. Coemhgen; and there appears to be better authority for this opinion than for that, which makes him brother of Attracta.

(142) See Chap. x. §. 13. and ib. Not. 232. Usher (p. 962) laid down Coeman of Enach-truim, now Annatrim, as the Coeman named in the list, but afterwards introduced another Coeman, as will be seen lower lower down. Colgan in his perplexed account of divers Coemans (Tr. Th. p. 177) calls him brother of St. Coemhgen. (See Not. prec.) That he was not is evident from a passage in the Life of Fintan of Clonenagh (cap. 3) where Fintan's two fellow students under Columba of Tirdaglas are mentioned, viz. Coeman of Enachtruim and Mocumin, who succeeded Columba. Mocumin was a brother of St. Coemhgen. (AA. SS. p. 586.) Now, if Coeman also had been a brother of his, would not the author of Fintan's Life have, when touching on Coeman and Mocumin, have remarked that they were brothers, as they must have been in case each of them had been a brother of Coemhgen?

(143.) In Fintan's Life (cap. 3.) Coeman is called pater sanctus monasterii Enach-truim. The title of holy father seems to indicate, that he was the author or founder of it. This is much more credible than that Pulcherius, as is said in his Life, (cap. 12) founded this monastery, and afterwards made it over to Coeman. Pulcherius was much younger than Coeman, and if, as can scarcely be doubted, the latter was at Annatrim soon after the death of his Master Columba, which occurred in 552, (See Chap. x. §. 13.) it cannot be admitted that said monastery was founded by Pulcherius, who was not perhaps born at that time, or, at most, was then a mere boy. Hence I think, that Archdall among some other mistakes (at Annatrim) was wrong in attributing it to Pulcherius, and that Harris was right in making Coeman its founder. The authors of these lives were too apt to assign to the particular saints, whom they meant to panegyricize, foundations, that belonged to others.

(144) AA. SS. p. 597.

(145) The death of Coeman of Enachtruim is by a strange mistake assigned to A. 550 in the third Index to AA. SS. with a reference to p. 192. In this page we merely find a quotation from Usher, (Ind. Chron.) who says that said Coeman flourished in 550.

(146) Colgan appears not to have known any thing about a Coeman or Comman of Roscommon in those days, except what he met with in Usher, (p. 1066) who, searching for the Coeman of the second class, gives, from a so called Life of his, an account of him, in which he is said to have been of a royal family of Ulster, son of one Fealcon and Scribside. It is added, that he studied under Finnian of Clonard, and that he was sent by him to preach in Connaught. If so, he lived in the sixth century, and hence he appears in Usher's Ind. Chron. at A. 540. But neither in Finnian's Life, in which his proceedings in Connaught are related, nor any where else, is there any mention of this disciple, or of his preaching in that country. Many a scholar, who was never at his school, has been given to Finnian, ex. c. Carthagh of Lismore, who was scarcely born when Finnian died. Then we are told, that the king of Connaught was so pleased with him, that he made him a grant of the entire beautiful valley of Ross, which, by adding his name to it, was afterwards called Ross-Comman, and in which he erected a famous monastery. Who does not see that grants of this kind smell of times later than the sixth century? Ware (Ant. cap. 26) has Coeman at Roscommon, and says that he flourished in the year 550. His only authority was, I believe, that of the Life quoted by Usher. Archdall adds (at Roscommon) that this Coeman wrote a monastic rule, which was very generally observed in Connaught. Strange that this rule is overlooked by so many of our old writers! That there was a Coeman or Comman at Roscommon is well known; but he lived much later than the times we are now treating of. Archdall says, that he was succeeded by Aodan, and then tells us that Aodan died in 777. A fine leap from 540, in which, according to himself, Coeman flourished! Comman of Roscommon was undoubtedly no other than the bishop Comman of that place, who died in 743 or 746. His monastic rule, called the Law of Comman and Aodan, was received in three parts of Connaught in 771, (Ware, Writers at Coman.) This is the Rule attributed by Archdall to the pretended much older Comman. Even Ware was so led astray by the story of Comman having been a disciple of Finnian, that he admitted two Commans at Roscommon, one in the 6th century, and the other, framer of the Rule, in the 8th.

(147) In the London edition of the Primordia, (p. 474) owing to errors of the press, instead of Cermanus and Conanus we find Cerannus and Comanus.

(148) Ceman or Keman is nearly the same as Coeman. The spelling it Ceman was perhaps for the purpose of distinguishing one Coeman from another. Usher's conjecture that Ceman might have been the same as Comin, al. Baithen the successor of Columbkil in Hy, cannot stand, whereas the names are much different from each other.

(149) Usher, not finding any St. Conan of that period, threw out (p. 962) a conjecture, that by Conan of the class might have been meant Comain surnamed Brece, who died in 615. But, independently of other considerations, the names are too different to allow us to suppose that Conan and Comain were one and the same person. Had he seen the account, imperfect as it is, of Conan given by Colgan, (AA. SS. ad 8 Mart. p. 563.) he would not have been thus puzzled.

(150) Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 489) reckons Conan or Conna-Dil among the disciples of Columbkil. If so, his monastery would have been of the Columbian order. The thing is not improbable; but Colgan gives no authority for his position.

(151) See AA. SS. p. 563. (152) Chap. VIII. § 7. x. §. 13.

(153) Tr. Th. p. 490. Compare with Not. 88. to Chap. VIII.

(154) § 2.

(155) In the third Index to AA. SS. there are several Berchans. But in the passages referred to the times of most of them are not marked. For instance a Berchan of Inis-rocha in Lough Erne is mentioned, p. 713, without any time being assigned, except the day of his commemoration, the 24th of November. Archdall adds from himself, that Berchan lived about the beginning of the sixth century. How did he find it out?

(156) Chap. x. §. 14. (157) See Not. 240. to Chap. x.

(158) The only objection to this hypothesis is, that, if we are to believe the 4 Masters, Mobhy died in 545, and consequently very soon after the commencement of the second class of saints. I doubt, indeed, of his having died so early; but if he did, he must have finished his career at an early age, and consequently might have been reckoned in the second class as well as his fellow student Kieran of Clonmacnois, who died in 549. For in that case Mobly, al. Berchan, was too young to have been placed among the saints of the first.

(159) See Usher, p. 963. and Ind. Chron. where he says, that Berchan flourished A. 570.

§. XI. Having now gone through, as well as I was able the history of the saints named in the second class, excepting only what belongs to the latter days of Columbkil, I shall proceed to give an account of some of the many others, who, as our author says, belonged to it, although he has omitted their names. We have met with several of them already, that is, holy persons, who flourished between about 542 and the close of the sixth century; and as much has been stated concerning them as was necessary. Yet some still remain, whose transactions cannot be passed over in silence. To begin with St. Fintan of Clonenagh the celebrated master of Comgall of Bangor, (160) he was a native of Leinster, and son of Gabhren and Findath, both Christians. On the eighth day after his birth he was baptized at a place called Cluain-mhic-trein, whence it appears very probable that Fintan was born in the neighbourhood of Ross. (161) The time of his birth is not known; but it must have been a few years after 520. (162) He received his first education under the holy man, by whom he had been baptized, and, when arrived at a certain age, attached himself to St. Columba son of Crimthann, with whom he remained, until, by his advice, he established himself at Cluainednach, now Clonenagh, where he founded a monastery. (163) Fintan was only a young man, when he set about this foundation; (164) but it must be supposed that he was not less than 23 years of age, in which case we may assign its commencement to about A. D. 548. (165) Yet, young as he was, his reputation for sanctity soon spread far and wide, so that numbers of persons from various parts of Ireland flocked to Clonenagh, and became members of his institution. His monks not only lived by the sweat of their brow, but cultivated the ground with the spade or hoe, not having as much as a cow to assist them in their agricultural labours. The discipline of the house was in every respect exceedingly severe; (166) and the fasting part of it seemed almost intolerable, even to some very holy men, on whose interference Fintan somewhat relaxed it, though not with regard to himself. (167) Among the persons, who applied to him for admission into his monastery, is mentioned Brandubh a holy bishop from Hy-kinselagh, who waited upon him in the monastery of Achadh-Finglaiss in the district of Hua-drona (Idrone), where Fintan then happened to be. On Brandubh's declaring his wish to spend the remainder of his days at Clonenagh, Fintan advised him to remain at Achadh-Finglaiss, where the discipline was less strict than in his own monastery of Clonenagh; an advice, to which the bishop humbly submitted. (168) It is related that Cormac a young prince, son of Diarmad king of Hy-kinselagh, was kept in chains by Colum or Colman king of North Leinster, (169) who intended to put him to death, and that St. Fintan, having gone with some of his disciples to this king's residence for the purpose of procuring the deliverance of Cormac, so terrified Colum by his miraculous powers, that he gave up the young prince, who, having afterwards ruled Hy-kinselagh for a considerable time, ended his days in the monastery of Bangor. (170) Fintan was gifted also with a prophetic spirit, an instance of which is stated on occasion of his having happened to hear an unworthy priest offering the sacrifice, at which being horror-struck he foretold, that said priest would abandon his order and habit, and returning to the world die in the midst of his sins. (171) Columbkil is said to have had such an esteem for Fintan, that he directed a young religious, named Columbanus, of the district of Laighis (Leix), who was returning from Hy to Ireland to take him for his spiritual director and confessor. Accordingly Columbanus waited upon him, and told him what Columbkil had said. Fintan requested that he would not mention it to any other person during his life time, and died very soon after. (172) A little before his death, which, as appears from what has been now stated, was prior to that of Columbkil, (173) he appointed, with the permission and benediction of the brethren, and of other holy men who had come to visit him, Fintan Maeldubh his successor as abbot of Clonenagh. (174) Then blessing his people, and having received the Lord's sacrifice, he departed this life on a 17th of February. (175) His name is mentioned with particular respect, in various martyrologies, both foreign and Irish.

(160) See Chap. x. §. 12. Colgan has (at 17 Feb.) a Life of Fintan, which he thought was written very soon after his death. It would be easy to show, if necessary, that in this he was mistaken. It is, however, a very respectable tract, of a correct biographical kind, and bears marks of considerable antiquity.

(161) In the Life published by Colgan the place of Fintan's birth is called simply Cluain; but in another, which he quotes, (Not. 4. ad loc.) it is Cluain-mhic-trein, i. e. Cluain of the sons of Trein. Now the ancient name of Ross (in Wexford) is Ros-mhic-trein. Hence it may be justly inferred, that said Cluain and Ross lay in one and the same district.

(162) Columbkil, who was born in 521, is spoken of as a young man at a time, in which Fintan was considered as a boy. Life of Fintan, cap. 2.

(163) We have already seen, (Not. 233 to Chap. x.) that Fintan, not Columba, was the real founder of this monastery, as is most clearly expressed in his Life, (cap. 5.) where we read, that Fintan "habitavit ibi, et vitam durissiman tenuit, et monasterium famosum illias coepit edificare." The author then observes, that Cluain-Ednech means in Latin latibulum haederosum, the retired spot covered with ivy. Clonenagh is now a village in the barony of Maryborough, Queen's county.

(164) See Life, cap. 5.

(165) If it be admitted, that Fintan, as being younger than Columb-kill, was born in 525, he would have been 23 years old in 548. The foundation of Clonenagh cannot be placed much later than this year, consistently with Comgall's having been there as a disciple of Fintan. Compare Not. 192. and 199 to Chap. x.

(166) See Cap. x, §. 12.

(167) See above Not. 79.

(168) Life of Fintan, cap. 20. From this narrative it is evident, that Colgan (AA. SS. p. 355) Harris and Archdall (at Clonenagh) are wrong in representing Fintan as abbot of Achadh-Finglaiss. Had he been such, would he have spoken of it as one distinct from his own? Or would the discipline there observed have been different from that of Clonenagh? Hence it appears, that Fintan was merely a visitor there. Who was its abbot I cannot discover. Colgan says (ib. 354) that it was not far from Sletty. If so, it was more probably in the part of Idrone (co. Carlow) west of the Barrow than in that to the east of it, where it is placed by Archdall. As to Hy-Kinselagh, see Not. 45 to Chap. vi.

(169) This Colman died in 576 (577), 4 Masters and AA. SS. p. 354.

(170) Life of Fintan, cap. 18. Compare with Not. 202 to Chap. x.

(171) Ib. cap. 16.

(172) Ib. cap. 22. Colgan thought, that this Columbanus was the Columbanus Mocu-loigse, afterwards a bishop in Leinster, for whom Columbkil had a great regard. (See Not. 182, to Chap. xi.) His being of Leix agrees with the surname Mocu-loigse; but it is not easy to reconcile this hypothesis with the circumstance of Mocu-loigse having died a bishop prior to the death of Columbkil, unless we should suppose that he died very soon after his promotion. The Columbanus, who called on Fintan, appears as a young man, juvenis, and that a short time before Fintan's death. Now Fintan is spoken of as an old man before he died; and it is therefore probable that he reached the age of about seventy, and died about 595 (See Not. 165), or two years sooner than Columbkil. It is true that juvenis may be understood of a person near 30 years of age, and that said Columbanus might have become a bishop soon after the death of Fintan, and have died not long after. Yet, on the whole, it appears more probable, that the bishop Columbanus was a different person, although they were both natives of the same country.

(173) Usher in his conjectural manner assigns, (Ind. Chron.) without any authority, Fintan's death to A. 603. Archdall (at Clonenagh) amidst a heap of blunders says, that he died before 590. He followed an error of the press in AA. SS. p. 485, where 590 appears instead of 592, which Colgan has (p. 355.) when treating expressly of Fintan. To understand this, it must be observed, that from the circumstance of Fintan having died before Columbkil Colgan concluded, that his death was prior to either 592 or 597. He mentions 592, because it is the date (a wrong one indeed) assigned by the 4 Masters for the death of Columbkil, and which Colgan himself rejects elsewhere; whereas, as will be seen, its true date is 597.

(174) Life of Fintan, cap. 24. Fintan Maeldubh was a native of the neighbourhood of Cashel on the North side, de regione Eoghanach Cassil, and, as stated in the Calendar of Cashel, one of the masters of St. Fechin. He died in 625 (626); and his memory was revered on the 20th of October. (AA. SS. p. 355.) Archdall is intolerably incorrect with regard to the first abbots of Clonenagh. Having said that it was founded by Fintan, he makes him be succeeded by Columba, (son of Crimthann) thus directly contradicting his master Colgan in the very passage to which he refers. Then after Columba he makes Fintan, son of Gabhren, the next abbot. Surely the poor man, if he only knew how to read, might have seen, that this son of Gabhren was the very Fintan, who, according to himself, founded the monastery. Next after him he places another Fintan, son of Crimthann, for whom he refers to Usher, without marking where, as in truth he could not. There was no Fintan, son of Crimthann, at Clonenagh, although Ware (Writers cap. 13. al. 15.) mentions such a person from a corrupt Life of Fintan. (See AA. SS. p. 353.) The son of Crimthann was Columba the master of its founder. Archdall adds, that this pretended Fintan, son of Crimthann, was also bishop of Clonfert, and died on the 17th of February. Now this Fintan, bishop of Clonfert, (ap. AA. SS. p. 356) concerning whose times we know almost nothing, was Fintan Corah, and died on a 21st of February. Not content with all this blundering, he assigns the death of this Fintan of his to A. D. 603. And why? because Usher says that Fintan of Clonenagh (whom he never calls son of Crimthann) died in the said year. At length Archdall condescended to mention Fintan Maeldubh as successor to his Fintan, son of Crimthann. Thus out of two Fintans viz. the founder, called the son of Gabhren, and Fintan Maeldubh his immediate successor, he made out four; 1. a Fintan in general. 2. Fintan son of Gabhren. 3. Fintan, son of Crimthann. 4. Fintan Maeldubh. And it is curious to see with what composure he refers on these and numberless other occasions to Colgan, Ware, Usher, 4 Masters, &c. &c. for facts and dates, which they never even thought of. I suspect that, to help him in his citations, he employed some blockhead of a clerk, who threw together such dates, &c. as first fell in his way, without inquiring to what circumstances they were relative.

(175) Life, &c. cap. 24. Archdall, having bungled so much concerning the Fintans, could not but bungle also as to the day of this saint's death. He says, that he died on the 13th of March, and for this learned reason, that the AA. SS. to which he refers, assign his death to the 13th Cal. Mart. Bravo! But finding that Colgan modernized that date into Feb. 17. he tells us, that Fintan, son of Gabhren, died on this day, to which he affixes also the death of his Fintan son of Crimthann.

(176) See AA. SS. p. 356. In one of them he is called a bishop, but in the others, more correctly, only a priest.

§. XII. Another Fintan, usually called Fintan of Dunbleische, flourished in those times: (177) He was of a noble family of Ara-cliach, (178) and is said to have studied for some time under Comgall of Bangor, on which occasion he became acquainted with Finian of Maghbilē. We find him afterwards at a place called, from his name, Kill-fintan, (179) somewhere in Munster. Thence he went to Dunbleische in the district of Cuanagh (now Coonagh, Limerick) where he seems to have spent, with some companions of his, the greatest part of the remainder of his life. He died on a 3d of January. An eminent saint of this period was Ruadan, founder of the monastery of Lothra (Lorrah) in the county of Tipperary. (180) He is said to have been of noble extraction ; but I am not able to tell where his family resided or where he was born.- His birth, however, must be assigned to the early part of the sixth century, whereas he studied under Finnian of Clonard, and was reckoned among his chief disciples. (181) He was abbot of Lothra before the death of Kieran of Saighir, (182) and had probably founded it about the year 550. (183) He died in 584, (184) and his festival was held on the 15th of April. (185) Some writings have been attributed to this saint, concerning which let others inquire. (186) Another of the distinguished disciples of Finnian-was Sinell, son of Maynacur or Moenach, and abbot of Cluain-inis in Lough Erne. (187) Accordingly he flourished in the middle and latter half of the sixth century, and must have lived until, at least, 597 ; whereas that was the year in which the great Fintan Munnu, after having spent eighteen years under Sinell in Cluain-inis, went over to Hy. (188) This saint's memory was revered on the 11th of November. (189) In another island of the same lake, Inis-muigh-samh (Inismacsaint) Nennidh Lamhdearg, also a principal disciple of Finnian, and who became a bishop, established a monastery, perhaps as early as 534 or 535, the time about which, it seems, Kieran of Clonmacnois repaired to it. We have already seen (190) that this Nennidh was confounded with Nennidh Lamh-ghlan, and have given elsewhere (191) as much of his genuine history as is known. Among those eminent scholars of Finnian is mentioned Mogenoch Kille-comly, who was most probably the Genoc a Briton, who followed him to Ireland. (192) I cannot discover any thing particular concerning him, except that, if he was the same as a Mogenoch, bishop of Kill-dumha-gloinn, his memory was revered on the 26th of December.

(193) As to the holy virgins of this period, besides some already treated of (194) we find two very distinguished ones, both of the princely house of Orgiel and relatives of Enda of Arran. The first was St. Carecha, who died, in 577 (578) on the 9th of February, (195) after having governed a nunnery in some part of either the now county of Galway or that of Roscommon. (196) The second was St. Maugina of Clogher, for whom Columbkil had a particular regard, and whom he called a holy virgin. (197) Her death may be assigned to about the end of the sixth century, (198) and to a 15th of December. (199) It is not improbable, that she had some religious establishment at Clogher; but we have not sufficient authority for deciding on this point.

(177) Colgan has (at 3 January) a sort of Acts of this Fintan. They are so interspersed with fables, that little or no dependence can be placed on them.

(178) See Chap. vi. §. 8.

(179) Probably Killfinan in the county of Limerick.

(180) In the barony of Lower Ormond.

(181) Acts of Finnian, cap. 19. (182) AA. SS. p. 463.

(183) Compare with what has been said of the times of Kieran, Chap. x. §. 2.

(184) Usher, Ind. Chron. and Ware, Antiq. cap. 26. at Tipperary.

(185) This was the day, at which Colgan intended to publish the Acts of Ruadan. (See AA. SS. p. 398 and 465.) Ware (Writers) assigns for his festival the 17th of April.

(186) See Ware (Writers,) &c.

(187) Archdall calls it Clinish. Sinell is named as a disciple of Finnian in the Acts of the latter, cap. 19.

(188) See Fintan Munnu's Life quoted in Tr. Th. p. 460 and Usher, p. 1063. The year of Fintan's visit to Hy was that of Columbkil's death, viz. 597.

(189) AA. SS. p. 398. Archdall (at Clinish) was wrong in writing October instead of November.

(190) Chap. ix. §. 5.

(191) Chap. x §. 11. and ib. Not. 170, 173.

(192) See Chap. ix. § 8.

(193) AA. SS. p. 405. Colgan (ib.) makes them one and the same person. (Compare with his 13th and 24th Notes to the Life of Finnian, ib. p. 398.) Now the Mogenoch of Kildumha was reckoned among the pretended nephews of St. Patrick, (ib. p. 362, &c.) But, as St. Patrick had no nephews in Ireland, it can scarcely be doubted that this was the Mogenoch, a disciple of Finnian, and so far I think Colgan was right. Kildumha, or Kildumhagloin was in the district of Bregia (somewhere in the tract from Dublin towards Drogheda.) Colgan thought, that the Mogenoch of that place, although allowed by himself to have been a follower of Finnian, was a nephew of St. Patrick ! But he does not say, as Archdall does, (ad loc.) that St. Patrick founded a church there. Whether Kill-dumha-gloin or Kille-comly were the names of two different places or only of one is not worth inquiring into.

(194) See Chap. x. §. 14.

(195) Tr. Th. p. 381 and AA. SS. p. 193. Carecha is usually called sister of Enda. If so, she must have lived to a prodigious age. For Enda was very old himself when he died. Now it is difficult to suppose, that she survived him by about 35 years, as must have been the case, if she lived until 578. (See above § 10.) Then it is said that a sister of Enda was married to Aengus king of Cashel. (See Chap. VIII. §. 7.) who was killed in 490. In the supposition that Carecha was also a sister of his, these circumstances and dates cannot be reconciled. Perhaps she was niece to him, and even so must have been very old in 578. In our ancient genealogical tables sister often occurs for niece, or some other name of relationship, in the same manner as son does for grandson and even great grandson. Instead of 9th of February, Archdall has, (at Cluain-borean) perhaps through an error of the press, the 5th.

(196) The 4 Masters (ap. AA. SS. p. 193) call Carecha the virgin of Cluain-buirren. Colgan tells us, (p. 713.) that this place was in Hy-maine, a territory partly in Galway and partly in Roscommon. Yet (ib.) he says, that Carecha was of Dergain, which in his Topographical index he places in Connaught. The 4 Masters (loc. cit.) represent her as merely surnamed Dergain.

But I believe the surname meant the place where her nunnery was situated. In the Life of St. Ita (cap. 17.) we read that Aeneas, abbot of Clonmacnois arrived, on some occasion, at the nunnery of St. Chinreacha Dearcain, “ad monasterium sanctae virginis Chinreacha Dearcain pervenit.” It is clear from other circumstances, that by Chinreacha was meant Carecha. And the text seems plainly to indicate, that the spot, on which the nunnery stood, was called Dearcain or Dergain. The matter can be easily settled by supposing that Dearcain lay in a small district of the name of Cluain-buirren.

(197) Adamnan L. 2. c. 5. See Not. 180 to Chap. xi.

(198) Adamnan (ib.) relates, that St. Columba foretold that Maugina would survive the recovery there spoken of by 23 years. This must have been said after A. D. 563; for Columba delivered that prophecy in Hy. Supposing it to have been in 570, the death of St. Maugina would have fallen in 593.

(199) Colgan observes (AA. SS. p. 713.) that a St. Mugania was revered on the 15th of December in the church of Cluain-buirren. It is very probable, that she was the same as Maugina, who might naturally have been greatly respected there, not as once abbess of the nunnery, but as a relative of St. Darecha. It is evident from Adamnan, that Maugina's residence was Clogher; and Archdall had no right to say that she flourished at Cluain-buirren.

§. XIII. To return to the history of the great St. Columba, we have seen, (200) that, having inaugurated Aidan king of the British Scots, he became much attached to that prince. His wish to help in adjusting a dispute between him and Aidus the monarch of Ireland, together with some other motives, (201) induced Columba to go to Ireland in the year 490, at the time of the assembly of the States general of the kingdom at Drumceat. (202) Having set out in a small vessel, accompanied by Aidan and some monks, (203) it is said that, when out in the wide ocean, they were overtaken by a violent storm. (204) On its having abated they entered Lough Foyle, and landed in some part near the mouth of the river Roe. (205) He then went to Drumceat, which was not far distant, and, if we are to believe some accounts, was, on his appearing in the assembly, received very disrespectfully by the monarch Aidus, who considered him as an opponent of his and an adherent of Aidan. (206) Be this as it may, Aidus soon discovered, that Columba appeared there as a peace-maker, and thenceforth treated him with the greatest attention and veneration. A subject of no small national importance was then under discussion. Aidus and a majority of the members were so dissatisfied with the privileged order of the antiquaries and poets, (207) that their suppression and even banishment was on the point of being decreed by the assembly. It was alleged, that their numbers were become so great as to be over-burdensome to the kingdom, and that their impertinence was intolerable, inasmuch as, while they praised beyond measure such nobles as paid them well and pampered them, they vilified and abused others more worthy, merely because they refused to comply with their exorbitant demands for remuneration. (208) Columba allowed that such abuses should not be tolerated, but argued against the total abolition of the order, on the ground of its being in itself a useful institution. He was listened to; and it was agreed, on his motion, that they should be reduced to a limited number, proportionate with the various provinces and districts, and that they should be bound to observe certain regulations, which were then made relative to their conduct and the duties they had to perform. (209) This matter being thus decided, an inquiry now took place into the claim of Aidan, who pretended that he had a right to the sovereignty of the territory of Dal-rieda (in Antrim,) (210) and that said territory should be exempt, if not in the whole, at least in part, from paying tribute to the king of Ireland and from such burdens as other parts of the kingdom were subject to. (211) He founded this claim upon Dalrieda's being the hereditary principality of his family from as far back as the time of Carbre, surnamed Rieda, from whom it, as well as the sept of the Dalriedans, had got its name. (212) Aidus, on the contrary, notwithstanding that dynasty having been raised to a throne, insisted on considering said territory as a part of the Irish kingdom, and on its being as much subject to himself, and as chargeable with imposts, &c. equally with the rest of Ireland, as it had been to and under his predecessors, before the Dalriedans became sovereigns in Britain. The question being referred to St. Columba for his arbitration, he declined giving any opinion on it, but referred them to a St. Colman, son of Comgellan, (213), a man deeply versed in legal and ecclesiastical learning, who decided against Aidan on the consideration that Dalrieda being an Irish province could not but be subject in every respect to the king of Ireland. He proposed, however, a privilege in favour of the British Dalriedans, that, as descended from those of Ireland, they might hold them as allies, so that the Dalriedans of both countries should, in case of just necessity, assist each other, if called upon. This compromise was agreeable to both parties, (214) and nothing now remained to be done by Columba at Drumceat, except to procure the liberation of the young Ossorian prince Scanlan, whom Aidus had then with him in chains at that place. (215) The saint's exertions for this purpose were fruitless, and all that he could do was to give his blessing to Scanlan, and to encourage him to keep up his spirits; telling him, that he would survive Aidus and rule Ossory for many years. (216)

(200) Chap. xi. §. 15.

(201) O'Donnel (L. 3. c. 2.) reckons among these motives the saint's desire to obtain the liberation of the young prince Scanlan of Ossory. This is indeed a fact, Columba did, as will be seen, exert himself for that purpose. In this supposition we may also admit what O'Donnel has about messengers having been sent to him from Ireland to request his attendance at Drumceat. The relatives of Scanlan were, I dare say, the persons by whom they were deputed. Had they no other claims on Columba's condescension, they might have applied for a recommendation to his friend St. Cainech, who was particularly attached to Colman the father of Scanlan. (See above Not. 77.)

(202) Drumceat or Druimcheat, which Adamnan has latinized into Dorsum-cette, was situated, as Colgan observes, (Tr. Th. p. 375.) in the Ulster Kiennachta, now Kenaght in co. Derry. He had a copy of the Acts of that assembly, and tells us that it was attended not only by Aidus and many other kings and nobles, but likewise by the heads of clerical bodies. (See also Keating, B. 2.) Accordingly Columba had a right, as chief of his Irish establishments, to a seat in it. Colgan says (ib.) that it was held in 586, but corrects himself p. 452. and in his Ind. Chron. by assigning it to 590, which is the true date, as O'Flaherty remarks, (MS. Not. ib. p. 341. and Ogyg. p. 475) and as appears from Usher, (Ind. Chron. ad A. 590) Smith (Life of St. Columba, p. 23.) was strangely mistaken in placing it in 574, for which he refers to the Annals of Ulster. He confounded the year of king Aidan's inauguration, which was 574, with that of the assembly. Campbell went still more astray (Strictures, &c. p. 112.) where he says, that it was convened by the monarch Hugh in 558. What a shame not to have known, that Hugh did not become monarch until several years after that date, and Columba was not at Hy until 563! How then could he have come thence to Drumceat in 558?

(203) There is a ridiculous story, not worth refutation, of Columba having been accompanied by, at least, 20 bishops, 40 priests, 30 deacons, and 50 minor members of the clerical order. (See O'Donnel, L. 3. c. 3.) and Colgan's note.

(204) O'Donnel, ib. This was probably the storm, during which Adamnan says that St. Cainech prayed for Columba and his companions. See Not. 182. to Chap. xi.

(205) O'Donnel says, (L. 3. c. 4.) that they sailed up that river until they arrived at a place very near to Drumceat. He attributes this to a miracle; and indeed a sailing for some miles against its current might be considered as such. (See Mr. Sampson's Stat.

S. of Londonderry, p. 123, seqq.) Adamnan makes no mention of it; and, as we are not bound to admit miracles on such authority as O'Donnel's, we may be allowed to suppose that Columba landed near the river's mouth. On the whole, however, it appears, that the saint's object on sailing from Hy was to proceed straight to the assembly, to show which I have touched upon these minutiae.

(206) O'Donnel, L. 3. c. 5. where he adds a silly fable concerning the insolent behaviour of Conall, one of the sons of Aidus, towards the saint and his followers. On the other hand he says, that Domnald, another son, treated Columba with great distinction, and placed him on his own seat in the assembly. This is an altered account of a fact, related by Adamnan (L. 1. c. 10.) viz. that Domnald, being still a boy, was brought by his attendants to Columba, then at Drumceat, to be blessed by him, and that the saint, having complied with their request, foretold that Domnald would in the course of time become a celebrated king (of all Ireland,) and that he would live to a good age, and die peaceably in his bed.

(207) The nature of that order is described by O'Donnel (L. 3. c. 2.) in the following words. "The Irish nation, greedy of praise, and very solicitous about its antiquity, was accustomed, from its very origin, to hold in high estimation professors of antiquities, of whom there was a great number, and who in heathen times were called druids (wise men), soothsayers, and bards, but after the establishment of Christianity, antiquaries and poets. It was their official duty to describe the transactions, wars, and triumphs of kings, princes, and heroes; to accurately register the genealogies and prerogatives of noble families; and to mark and distinguish the boundaries of districts and lands. They wrote in verse preferably to prose, partly for the purpose of helping the memory, and partly to guard against the diffusiveness of prosaic writing." In this account of their functions there appears nothing relative to religion; and hence it seems that the author alludes only to such parts of their original institution as they were allowed to retain in Christian times. If they were, as he says, called druids and soothsayers (vates) at a former period, they had, although different from the British and Gallic druids, (See Not. 45. to Chap. v.) a sort of jurisdiction as to religious concerns. But I am inclined to think, that O'Donnel was wrong in placing the bards in the same order with the druids, &c. The Irish druid was, as we have often seen, (ex. c. ib.) the same as the magus. Now we find, that as far back as the first preaching of St. Patrick the poets, or bards, were distinguished from the magi. Thus Dubtach and his scholar Fiech were poets, (See chap. v. §. 5.) not magi. Of these poets we meet with several, in the early times of our church, who became Christians, while a converted magus is hardly to be found. The bardic order comprized the antiquaries and historians, as their writings were, in general, of a poetical kind. I scarcely doubt, that at all times this order of men was distinct from that of the druids or magi; and, in fact, Ware has treated of them as separate classes. Toland also (History of the Druids) held them as distinct orders, and is followed by Walker (Historical Memoirs of the Irish Bards, p. 29), who tells us, however, that the bards used to be taught by the Druids (ib. p. 6.), and that some of their Ollamhs or Doctors were admitted into the order of the Druids (ib. p. 8.). Be this as it may, the orders were still different. Some writers say that the Bardic order was, according to a regulation of the famous Ollam Fodla, hereditary, yet under certain conditions. (See ib. p. 26.) I believe this is no better than some other stories about Ollam Fodla. It does not accord with what Keating says (B. 2. p. 31. ed. A. 1723) of the vast numbers, who entered themselves into said order.

(208) Smith (Life, &c. p. 93.) has misrepresented the charge against the bards, as if it were for their having been adverse to the views of those, who propagated the Christian religion, and connected with the Druids. No such charge was brought against them, nor any other than the one I have mentioned. He misrepresents also the punishment intended to be inflicted upon them. He says it was death. Now O'Donnel expressly states, (L. 3. c. 2.) that it was to be only exile or deportation, exilio vel exterminatione. Perhaps Smith thought, that exterminatio signifies death.

(209) O'Donnel, L. 3. c. 7. (210) See Not. 24 to Chap. v.

(211) Smith (Life, &c. p. 23) says, in direct opposition to every authentic account, that the question between Aidan and Aidus was concerning the right of succession to the Scottish throne. What did he mean by Scottish throne? If that of Ireland, Aidan never thought of claiming it. If the small one of Argyle, &c. Aidus did not pretend to deprive Aidan of it. See below Not. 214.

(212) Carbre-Rieda lived in the third century, and was son to Conar or Conary II. monarch of Ireland. In reward of his military services a grant was made to him of the territory afterwards called Dal-rieda, that is, of the descendants of Rieda. He was the ancestor of Loarn and the other founders of the Scottish kingdom in Britain, who, even after their being settled in that country, continued to be called Dalriedans; and we find their new kingdom sometimes named Dalrieda, as if we should say the kingdom of the Dalrieda or Dalriedans. As Carbre-Rieda was son to Conar, hence some old Scotch writers speak of their kings as of his race, de semine Chonare. See on these subjects Usher, (p. 610 seqq.) and O'Flaherty, Ogyg. vind. chap. 12.

(213) Of this Colman I find no further account, except that he died in 620 (621). Tr. Th. p. 352.

(214) O'Donnel, L. 3 c. 10. Notwithstanding the manner in which O'Donnel has stated the whole question, and his giving us clearly to understand, that the claimed immunity from tribute regarded merely the territory of Dalrieda in Ireland, Keating pretends, (B. 2. p. 30.) that Aidus insisted on receiving tribute from that of Britain, as if the Scoto-British kings owed homage to the monarch of Ireland. He adds, (what does not distinctly appear in the wretched English translation) that Aidan's predecessors, although sovereigns in their new kingdom, paid a certain tribute, as vassals, to the Irish kings; and that Aidan was the first of that dynasty, who, with the assistance of St. Columba, became totally independent of the crown of Ireland. O'Flaherty (Ogyg. p. 475.) agrees with Keating, and, in proof of his assertion, refers to the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, (L. 2. c. 135.) in which it is said that the prophecy concerning the posterity of Fergus, viz. that they would enjoy sovereignty, was fulfilled in Aidan, son of Gauran, who seized upon the kingdom of Albany. (See also Jocelin, cap. 137.) From this he argues, that the predecessors of Aidan were a sort of provincial kings or limited sovereigns, who acknowledged the supremacy of the Irish monarchs, and that Aidan was the first really independent king of the British Scots. Chalmers (Caledon, Vol. 1. p. 283,) follows O'Flaherty, merely adding an it seems, and refers likewise to Adamnan, from whom, however, no argument can be drawn on either side of the question. Adamnan give the title of king not only to Aidan, but likewise to his predecessor Conall. (See L. 1. c. 7.) It may be that, as Aidan was the most renowned of those early kings of British Scots, he was the only one supposed, by some persons, worthy of being mentioned as the first Irish king of Albany.

(215) Keating amidst a heap of fables (B. 2. p. 32.) concerning Scanlan says, that he was confined at a place called Dubh-Eaghluis in Inishowen, and that the saint went to visit him there. Now Adamnan, who mentions the visit, (L. 1. c. 11.) expressly states, that it took place at Drumceat. Keating calls Scanlan king of Ossory; but it is evident from Adamnan (ib.) that Scanlan had not reigned before he became a prisoner. Besides, his father Colman, as Adamnan calls him, was still alive. (See above, Not. 49.) O'Donnel is more correct as to this point than Keating. He relates (L. 3. c. 2.) that the prince of Ossory, whom he calls Kinnfael, (probably a surname to Colman) being suspected by Aidus of some act of disobedience, gave up to him his son Scanlan as a hostage for one year, on condition of his being released at the end of it, and of other hostages being substituted for him. At the expiration of the year, Aidus refused to liberate Scanlan, and hence the necessity of St. Columba's application.

(216) Adamnan L. 1. c. 11. O'Donnel and Keating have some foolish stories of how Scanlan was, in virtue of certain strange miracles, delivered, in spite of Aidus, from his confinement on the very night after Columba had applied for his liberation. To this and some other stuff, connected with said stories, it is sufficient to oppose the text of Adamnan.

§. xiv. Columba remained at Drumceat but for a short time. (217) Thence he went to visit some monasteries; but how many or which of them were honoured with his presence on this occasion cannot be ascertained; (218) excepting that of Derry, which, particularly as lying at a short distance from Drumceat, he undoubtedly visited, (219) and his favourite monastery of Dairmagh or Durrough, then governed under him by Lasren, where he spent some months, arranging and regulating various matters relative to discipline. (220) While there, he paid a visit to Clonmacnois, the abbot of which was at that time Alitherus, and was received with the greatest marks of respect and veneration by the whole community and the people of the surrounding country. Having accomplished, as well as he was able, the objects he had in view in coming to Ireland, he set out on his return to Hy, and when arrived in the northern part of Ulster, had an interview with St. Comgall of Bangor somewhere not far from Drumceat. (221) Thence he went to Coleraine, where the bishop Conall, having collected almost innumerable presents from the people of the vicinity, prepared an entertainment for him. (222) This is the last place where we find St. Columba, until we meet with him again at Hy, attending as usual, notwithstanding his age, to the care of his monasteries and numerous churches. He had often prayed to God, that he would be pleased to call him to himself at the expiration of 30 years from his first arrival at Hy, and accordingly on the day, in which they were completed, viz. about the middle of the year 593, being then at Hy, entertained the greatest hope of his immediate departure from this life. While full of this delightful thought, he was suddenly apprized in a vision that his presence on earth was still necessary for four years longer, at the end of which he would be certainly removed to a better world. (223) When the happy hour was near at hand he conducted himself with the greatest composure, and went, accompanied by his attendant Diermit, to bless the barn belonging to the monastery. This was on a Saturday; and having expressed his joy at there being a sufficient store of corn for the year, he annouced to Diermit, with an injunction of secrecy, that said day would be his last in this world, as he was to be called away during the night next after it. The saint then ascended a small eminence, and lifting up his hands blessed the monastery. Thence returning he sat down in a hut adjoining or forming a part of the monastery, and occupied himself for some time with copying part of the Psalter, (224) and having finished a page with a passage of the 33d psalm (225) he stopped and said; "Let Baithen write the remainder." Afterwards he attended the evening service (226) in the church, and then returning to his cell, (227) sat or reclined himself on his bed of stone, and remaining awake delivered some instructions to Diermit to be communicated by him to the brethren. When the bell rung (228) for midnight prayers, he hastened to the church and was the first to enter it. Throwing himself on his knees, he began to pray. Diermit arriving soon after found him in a reclining posture before the altar, and at the point of death. The brethren now assembling surrounded him, and fell weeping. He opened his eyes and exhibited an extraordinary hilarity in his countenance. His right hand being lifted up, he moved it with the assistance of Diermit, as well as he could, to indicate, as he was not able to speak, his intention of giving benediction to the community, and then breathed his last (229) very early in the morning of Sunday the 9th of June, A. D. 597, (230) and in the 76th year of his age. (231)

(217) Adamnan, L. 2. c. 6.

(218) O'Donnel (L. 3. c. 15.) mentions Manistir an da shruth, or Duorum agri rivorum, (See Not. 117. to Chap. XI.) as visited by Columba after his having been at the meeting of Drumceat. But, as he spent only some days in Ireland at the time of said visit, (See Not. 181. ib.) it must be referred to some other occasion. Then O'Donnel brings him to the monastery of Snamh-luthir. (See Not. 122. ib.) Yet it is doubtful, whether the visit to this place might not have been at some other time. It has been said, that St. Columba was at Ballysadare (co. Sligo) at this period; (above §. 1. and Not. 14.) and that he then founded the monastery of Drumcliffe, a subject which has been already inquired into. (Not. 114 to Chap. XI.)

(219) O'Donnel (L. 3. c. 11.) makes Columba proceed directly from Drumceat to Derry.

(220) Adamnan, L. 1. c. 3. Compare with Notes 96. and 97. to Chap. xi.

(221) Adamn. L. 1. c. 49.

(222) Ib. c. 50. Adamnan says, that the presents were spread in the court yard of the monastery to be blessed by the saint before being made use of. The text is much confused in Colgan's edition here referred to, but is very clear in Messingham's (L. 1. c. 19.). From a monastery being mentioned it is plain, that there was one then at Coleraine, probably founded by the bishop Conall. (Compare with Not. 257 to Chap. x.) This Conall, whom Archdall calls Eonall (seemingly an error of the press) was, in all appearance, the immediate successor of St. Corpreus. (See Chap. x. §. 14.) Colgan thought (Tr. Th. p. 380) that he was a relation of his, and that his memory was revered on the 2d of April. It was usual, on the arrival or expected arrival of distinguished persons at a monastery, for the people of the neighbourhood to make presents or offerings (xenia) towards their being well entertained by the religious, whose means would otherwise have been inadequate to that purpose. Besides what took place at Coleraine, Adamnan (ib.) gives us an instance of xenia collected, on another occasion, at the monastery, called Cella magna Deathrib, when visited by Columba.

(223) Adamn. L. 3. c. 22. That the year, in which Columba had this vision, was 593, is clear from his departure from Ireland having been in 563. The day of it was the anniversary of his arrival at Hy; and, if the additional years, which he had to live, were, as the text seems to state, precisely four, neither more nor less, it must have been the 9th of June. For, as will be seen, he died on the corresponding day in 597. Thus then also the day of his arrival at Hy would have been the 9th of June. As to the last four years, supposing even that the time was somewhat more than exactly said number, yet it is clear from Adamnan, that it was not so except by a very few days; and hence it follows, that both Columba's arrival at Hy and the day of the vision are to be assigned to about the middle of the respective years.

(224) Ib. cap. 23. A favourite occupation of St. Columba was transcribing books, particularly sacred ones. We find him on another occasion writing also in a hut. (Ib. L. 2. c. 16.) Does this mention of a hut indicate, that the monastery of Hy was originally a sort of laura, consisting of separate cells or huts placed around the church? Or was that hut merely an out-office of the house, to which Columba occasionally retired to avoid being disturbed? This is more probable; and we find it remarked, as somewhat singular, that the establishment of Mobhy Clarineach consisted of small huts separated from each other. (See Tr. Th. p. 396.)

(225) The passage was this; “Inquirentes autem Dominum non deficient omni bono.” In the present Vulgate edition we read minuentur, instead of deficient, as it stood in the old Vulgate or Italic, before some emendations from St. Jerome’s revision (not version) were introduced into the text of the psalms. Minuentur is one of them. Hence it appears, that down to the times not only of Columba but of Adamnan, the Irish continued to read the old Vulgate, as it existed before the introduction of those corrections borrowed from St. Jerome.

(226) Ad vespertinalem missam.

(227) Adamnan calls it hospitiolum. He seems to make it the same as the hut, in which the saint had been writing.

(228) Pulsata personante clocca. See Not. 186. to Chap. xi.

(229) Adamn. L. 3. c. 23.

(230) After all that we have seen concerning Columba’s arrival at Hy in 563, and his having lived 34 years from that date (See Not. 76 and 149 to Chap. xi. &c.) it would be a waste of time to enter into a disquisition concerning various hypothesis assigning his death to some year or other different from 597. Whoever has leisure to inquire into them may consult Colgan, (Tr. Th. p. 484. seqq.) Usher, Ware, O’Flaherty, &c. agree as to 597. It is the date marked in the Annals of Innisfallen and hinted at by Bede. The only other year, to which Columba’s death could with any plausibility be affixed, is 596. But in opposition to this we have the admitted fact that he died on the 9th of June. Now Adamnan, as we have seen, positively informs us that it was early on Sunday morning; and it is known that the 9th of June fell on Sunday in 597, whereas in 596 it fell on the 10th. In Tigernach’s Annals (See Usher, p. 693) the rest of Columba is said to have been in the night of Pentecost. If Tigernach computed Pentecost, according to the Roman cycle, he meant the one of 596, which in said year fell on the 10th of June. If the saint died during the night of that Pentecost, how could his death have been constantly assigned not to the tenth but to the ninth of June? Tigernach was probably prepossessed with the idea, that 596 was the real year of his death, as he might have found it marked in some older Annals, which, however, considering their mode of computation, was in fact the same as 597. Then finding that Pentecost fell in 596 about the 9th of June, he supposed it to be the Sunday, on which Columba died. Adamnan, who mentions more than once this obituary Sunday, never calls it Pentecost, which, had it been so, he would assuredly have noticed as a very remarkable circumstance, combining the saint's removal to heaven with the celebration of that great festivity. Nor does O'Donnel say any thing about that Sunday having been Pentecost, although he took care to mention said festival on a much less interesting occasion. (See Not. 76 to Chap. XI.)

(231) The Annals of Innisfallen have; "A. 597 Quies Columbkille nocte Dominica 5 Idus Junii, anno 35^o peregrinationis suae, aetatis 76^o." Nothing can be more satisfactory on this point than the data laid down by Adamnan; 1st. that Columba was in the 42d year of his age when he first left Ireland; 2d, that after that epoch he lived 34 years. Hence it is plain that, whatever might have been the year, in which he died, he had not at the time of his death completed his 76th year. O'Donnel (L. 3. c. 57.) having supposed that the saint was born in 520, and on the other hand having laid down that he died in 597, concluded that this was the 77th year of his age. To prop up this computation, founded on his mistake as to the year of the saint's birth, (See Not. 76 to Chap. XI.) he found himself obliged to say, in opposition to Adamnan, that he left Ireland, not in the 42d but in the 43d year of his age. That his authority is not equal to Adamnan's, the reader will easily admit. Bede, who was not bound to inquire into the precise age of Columba, gives him (L. 3. c. 4.) 77 full years. That he was mistaken is evident; and I wonder that Ware (Writers at Columba) has implicitly followed him.

§. xv. The saint's remains were kept in the church until matins were finished, and then removed to the cell, whence he had come before his death. His obsequies were celebrated during three days and nights, at the end of which his body was in due form consigned to the grave. (232) It would be superfluous to enlarge on the extraordinary veneration, in which the memory of this great saint has been held not only in the British islands, but in every part of the Latin church. (233) In consequence of his having been the apostle of the northern Picts and the founder of many churches in the territory of the British Scots and in the Hebrides, he possessed an ecclesiastical jurisdiction over those countries, including even the bishops; which singular privilege was, through respect for his memory, enjoyed for a considerable time by his successors the abbots of Hy, although they were only priests in the same manner as Columba himself had been. (234) From this circumstance a strange conclusion has been drawn by some writers, as if Columba and his followers did not admit any essential difference between bishops and priests, without reflecting that, whatever sort of jurisdiction was exercised by the superiors of Hy, belonged to them not as priests but as abbots, and successors of Columba, and that it had nothing to do with the inherent relative powers, with which bishops and priests are by divine right invested, and which Columba has left us proofs of his having accurately discriminated. (235) Another effect of the great veneration paid to his memory by the churches and monasteries of his foundation or institution was the constancy, with which the greatest part of them, both in Ireland and elsewhere, adhered to the Irish Paschal computation, inasmuch as, in common with all his countrymen, he had followed it during his life time. (236) That St. Columba had drawn up a monastic rule for his institution cannot be doubted. (237) Some other tracts still extant, partly Irish and partly Latin, are attributed to him, the genuineness of which I find no reason for calling in question. (238) As to the celebrated prophecies under his name I cannot pretend to deliver any opinion. (239) St. Columba was succeeded in the government of Hy, and consequently in the superintendance over the whole order or institution, (240) by Baithen, whom we have often met with, (241) and who survived him only a year, neither more nor less, as he died on the 9th of June A. D. 598. (242)

(232) Adamn. (L. 3. c. 23.) From the manner, in which the burial is mentioned, it is difficult to determine, whether Columba's remains were deposited in a particular monument, or, according to the usual mode, in a mere grave or tomb. That he was buried in Hy is beyond any sort of doubt. As to a fable insinuating the contrary, see Usher, p. 708.

(233) Besides all the Irish martyrologies and calendars, the Roman martyrology and those of Bede, Usuardus, with many others, (See Tr. Th. p. 483) have St. Columba at 9 June; and in several of them he is named with singular respect. Not only was the day of his death commemorated, but a festival, together with an appropriate office, was established on occasion of the Translation of his reliques, together with those of St. Patrick and Bridget, by order of Pope Urban III. who sent to Ireland Cardinal Vivian for the express purpose of attending at said translation. Usher gives (p. 889, seqq.) an account of the whole transaction, and Colgan has prefixed the office to Tr. Th. Yet Ledwich writes; (Antq. &c. Note to p. 55. or, as in 2d. ed. 102.) "So unfriendly were the Columbean institutes to the cause of popery, that the festival of St. Columba was not permitted to be kept in Ireland till 1741. Burke, Hib. Domin. p. 22." This passage, which is connected with his nonsense and lies concerning the pretended Culdees, of whom elsewhere, betrays so much effrontery and ignorance, that it is difficult to say which predominates most. Can any thing be more flagrantly false, than to assert that no festival was kept of a saint, whom Adamnan over and over calls the patron of the institution, to which he belonged, and which comprized so many churches in Ireland dedicated to him? Or why would his name have appeared for so many centuries back in the Roman and other martyrologies, were it not allowed to keep his festival? Or would even the translation of his reliques have been annually solemnized, and that in virtue of papal authority? Ledwich refers to Burke, from whom he has stolen many a thing, yet usually taking care, in his malignant manner, to pervert Burke's meaning. Now Burke gives us (p. 22.) a decree of Benedict XIV. issued in 1741, whereby the Masses and Offices for the saints Rumold, Malachy of Armagh, Laurence O'Toole of Dublin, Frigidian of Lucca, Brigid, Pope Celestin I. Columba, Gallus, Columbanus, and Dymrna are raised to the rank of Duplex majus with regard to Ireland and all Irish establishments ubique locorum, to be celebrated as found already in approved missals and breviaries. Will it follow, that there were not kept until 1741, any festivals of St. Malachy or St. Laurence, who were both great favourites at Rome, or that the sees of Armagh and Dublin did not until then celebrate their memory? Was it in 1741 that St. Brigid began to be revered on the 1st of February at Kildare and all over Ireland? Or was even the Pope Celestin forgotten until his successor Benedict XIV. took notice of him? But our assuming pseudo-antiquary does not perhaps understand the phrase Duplex majus. If not, he is totally unfit for touching on liturgical subjects. Without looking into a breviary, he might have learned it not only from any priest he met with, but even from a sub-deacon, who would have told him that there are various gradations of festivals commencing with Simplex, and rising to Semiduplex, Duplex, Duplex majus, Duplex secundae classis, and, highest of all, Duplex primae classis. These gradations are relative to the various degrees of solemnity, with which festivals are celebrated. And we frequently find that festivals of the same identical saints are, according to the difference of times and places, raised from one class to the other. Thus St. Patrick's day is in Ireland a Duplex primae classis, while in the Continent it is placed in an inferior class, and in Italy as low as Semiduplex. Viceversa, many festivals, which here and there in other countries belong to the highest classes, such as those of St. Dennis of Paris, St. Martin of Tours, St. Ambrose of Milan, &c. are reckoned with us in a lower order, inasmuch as the Irish church had not the same reasons, that others had, for commemorating them in an extraordinary manner. Next it is sometimes thought adviseable to raise festivals from a lower class to a higher one, as has been lately done with regard to the festivals of one or two holy popes of ancient times. Exactly in the same manner Benedict XIV. considered it right, that the festivals, which were already kept, of the saints mentioned in his decree, should, on account of the benefits derived from them to the Irish church, be placed in a higher rank than that, in which they stood before. I am almost ashamed to have gone into this detail; but I was compelled to do so, in order to enable every reader to form an opinion concerning the Doctor's false assertion. Yet, by the bye, I cannot believe, particularly as he has seen breviaries and abused them, but that he understood the meaning of said decree. And yet, while impugning the known truth, he has the audacity to accuse (p. 74.) Burke of committing some wilful mistakes in certain lessons, which he drew up for Columba's festival. I know there are mistakes in them; but they were not wilful, Burke having copied them from O'Donnel. Why did he not deny at once the existence of Columba? But his dear Culdees were in the way. Yet a dull imitator of his, Faber, has done it for him, by telling us, (Dissertation on the Cabiri, p. 398.) that our St. Columba was a fictitious dove!!! What times are we come to, when such scribblers are allowed to obtrude their trash on the public!

(234) Bede writes (L. 3. c. 4.) "Habere autem solet ipsa insula (Hy) rectorem semper abbatem presbyterum, cujus juri et omnis provincia et ipsi etiam episcopi ordine inusitato debeant esse subjecti, juxta exemplum primi doctoris illius, qui non episcopus sed presbyter extitit et monachus." What Bede here calls the province was comprized in N. Britain and, at most, the Hebrides; and accordingly Notker Balbulus was wrong (Martyrol. at 9 June) in saying, that the abbot of Hy was primate of the Irish bishops. (See Usher p. 701. and Colgan Tr. Th. p. 498.) A similar mistake was committed by Carolus a S. Paulo (Geogr. sacr. at Hibernia) in consequence of his having confounded the small island of Hy with Ireland, a strange blunder for a geographical writer, which, however, has been corrected (Not. ad loc.) by Holstenius. Usher, (ib.) and Bingham (Origines, &c. B. VIII. ch. 3. sect. 14.) understand by Bede's province only North Pictland together with Hy; but Colgan adds the territory of the British Scots. According to a passage in the Saxon Chronicle, all the bishops of the Scots (in Britain) were subordinate to the abbot of Hy.

But Lloyd shews (On Church government, &c. ch. 7.) that this is a late interpolation, and maintains that the province, as Bede calls it, was only one diocese, which might have been co-extensive with the whole country of the Northern Picts, and that this diocese was governed by the bishop, who resided in Hy. For, as Usher shows (p. 701.) there was in that island not only an abbot, but a bishop. Lloyd adds, that when Bede speaks of bishops, as subject in a certain manner to the abbot, he must be understood not of more than one bishop at a time, but of the successive single bishops, who had their seat in Hy. This is a forced explanation of Bede, who plainly intimates, that in what he calls the province he supposed there were more than one bishop; otherwise he would have written not episcopi, but episcopus. If Bede meant to speak of only one diocese and its bishop, surely he would not have said “the whole province and even the bishops.” The natural and intelligible mode of expressing himself would have been the province and even the bishop. And it is a quibble to say, that there were bishops, one after another, in that one province or diocese. Suppose a person intended to state, that the diocese and bishop of Paris are subordinate to the Pope, would he say, the diocese and bishops of Paris? It would be easy to show, if necessary, that there were, in Bede’s time, some bishops among the Northern Picts, and his words are so clear, that Bingham (B. ix. ch. 6. sect. 18) refers to them as proving, that there were several. Next it is to be observed, that it would be contrary to every principle of canon law, that the bishop or bishops entrusted with the care of the Northern Picts, would be allowed to reside so far distant from their country as the island of Hy. The fact is, that the bishop stationed in Hy had nothing to do with those Picts. He was placed there for the purpose of performing episcopal functions, when required for the good of the monastery and its members, such as conferring ecclesiastical orders, &c. and had, in all appearance, a superintendance, as bishop, over the other islands, or at least, some of them. Lloyd gives as a reason of the subordination of the bishop residing at Hy to the abbot, that the royalty of the island had been given to Columba by the king of the Picts. Ledwich, following this idea, says (Antiq. p. 61.) that the king (Brudeus) granted him the allodality of Hy, thereby subjecting the bishop to his tem- poral power. What has that pretended temporal power of Columba to do with the question of the bishops being subordinate to the abbot? What Bede and others have considered as an extraordinary circumstance, was not that bishops are subject to the temporal power of sovereigns, but that a priest should have a sort of spiritual jurisdiction over bishops. As to the grant of the island, we have seen, (Not. 146 to Chap. xi.) that it was not made by the king of the Picts.

(235) The respect shown by Columba to the episcopal rank in the person of Cronan has been noticed already. (Not. 182 to Chap. xi.) I might add the circumstance of his having refused to be promoted to the episcopacy. (See §. 9. ib.) Waving this argument, let me ask, why it was thought necessary to have a bishop in Hy, if priests were supposed capable of exercising all, even the highest, ecclesiastical functions? But how, it has been said, could bishops have submitted to the jurisdiction of an abbot, who was no more than a presbyter? Did this question concern merely such bishops as lived in monasteries, it could be easily answered, nor would Bede have looked upon the system as unusual. There were, in his own times, and long before them, several monasteries, the abbots of which held a lower rank, as to holy orders, than some of the persons whom they governed. Many abbots, who were mere laymen, and yet had among their monks some priests, who were bound to observe the rules of the establishment. We frequently meet with bishops, who retired into monasteries, and subjected themselves to their regulations. An instance of this has occurred above (§. 11.) in the case of bishop Brandubh. A practice was introduced of appointing bishops for the accommodation of some great monasteries, to which description of bishops most probably belonged St. Moena of Clonfert. (See Not. 117. to Chap. x.) This practice was afterwards introduced into other countries; and there is extant a Bull of Pope Stephen II. in favour of the monastery of St. Denis, in which we read; “ Nos etiam idem et habere vobis episcopum per singulare privilegium concedimus, qui de vobis ab abbate, vel a fratribus, in monasterio vestro electus, et a fratribus nostris episcopis de illa regione consecratus, illa vestra monasteria a vobis aedificata provideri, et vice nostri nominis ubi et ubi fuerint regat, et praedicationi tam in ipso vestro monasterio quam in sibi subjacentibus deserviat." A similar privilege had been granted to the Monastery of St. Martin of Tours. The Annales Masciacenses, published by Labbe, have; "Anno 790 Andegarius episcopus monasterii S. Martini obiit." (See more in Ducange at Episcopi.) That these bishops, although chosen out of the body of the monks by the abbot or the whole community, were treated with particular respect cannot be questioned. Yet they may be said to have been in some manner subordinate to the abbot, inasmuch as they used to act, according to his direction, in certain cases, such as, ex. c. conferring orders, higher or lower, on those monks whom he thought fit to select and point out to them. This is not the system, which appeared extraordinary to Bede, but the very different one of an abbot exercising a sort of jurisdiction over bishops, who were neither inmates of his monastery, nor of the class of those bishops, whose functions were confined to monasteries. It seemed to him odd, that the prelates, who governed the sees and churches of the Northern Picts, should acknowledge a certain degree of supremacy in the abbot of Hy. But if the distinction between the power of order and that of jurisdiction, admitted by all the theologians and canonists, be duly considered, the difficulty can be easily solved. The former power is liable to no modification; nor is there any authority on earth, that can add to or diminish the inherent rights annexed to it, or that can, for instance, empower a priest to exercise validly every function, that a bishop can. The case is not so with regard to the power of jurisdiction, which may be extended or curtailed according to circumstances. A person may be consecrated bishop, to all intents and purposes as to the power of order, without possessing any jurisdiction; and we find instances of it in very remote times, such as that of Barsus and Eulogius, two monks of Edessa, related by Sozomen. (L. 6. c. 34.) Vice versa, a person of the clerical order may, although not actually a bishop, be invested with episcopal jurisdiction. Thus, if he be elected to a see and regularly confirmed, he becomes, prior to his consecration, and while perhaps still only a subdeacon, possessed of the jurisdiction appertaining to said see, and if it be metropolitanical, the suffragan bishops subject to him as if he had been actually consecrated. Several other cases might be adduced, if requisite, to show how bishops may become subordinate, in some respect, to clergymen of an inferior order. These cases were not as frequent in Bede's time as afterwards. Lloyd mentions (ch. 7.) that of the bishop of Oxford, of whom, while in that city, the chancellor of the University and even his deputy take the precedence. It will not now be difficult to understand, how the abbot of Hy, as successor of the Apostle of the Northern Picts, was allowed to retain a certain superintendence over their bishops, who were the successors of those, whom Columba had taken care to provide them with. And it is clear, 1. that it does not affect the question of the real difference between the episcopal and priestly orders; and 2d. that being a singular case, founded on the apostleship of St. Columba, the efforts of Blondel, Selden, Toland, and many Scotch writers, not including Chalmers, (see Caledon. Vol. 1. p. 321.) to oppose it to the ancient and constantly observed mode of Church government, cannot make the least impression on any unprejudiced mind.

(236) We read in the English translation of Ware's Writers (at Columba); "The time for celebrating Easter, which he kept, after the custom of his ancestors, on the Lord's day from the 14th to the 20th moon, contrary to the custom of the church of Rome, he gave in charge to his successors to observe," Ledwich (p. 61.) having picked up what is here said of the charge, adds, with profound ignorance, and in direct opposition to Ware, that Columba was a Quartadeciman. The poor man did not know that in the system of the Quartadecimans no regard was paid to Sunday more than any other day as to the celebration of Easter. Bede has exculpated (L. 3. c. 4.) the Irish from the charge of Quartadecimanism; and their always celebrating Easter on a Sunday shows that, far from being guilty of it, they condemned that system. Of these subjects more elsewhere. To return to Ware, his translator has misrepresented his meaning by the words, gave in charge. In the original Latin we have; "Tempus celebrandi Paschatis—successoribus observandum reliquit." This does not imply that Columba issued any injunction as to the observance of the Irish mode of computing Easter, and means no more than that he had observed it himself, and that, as Ware adds, his successors had observed it until A. D. 716. There was no dispute, in Ireland or Britain, concerning this point until several years after Columba's death; and Adamnan relates (L. 1. c. 3.)

“ that the saint, when at Clonmacnois, delivered a prophecy relative to the disagreement, which would take place, after a considerable time, as to the Paschal question.” But, so far from even hinting that Columba gave any charge to adhere to the Irish mode, Adamnan himself became one of the most strenuous opposers of it, and induced a great number of the Northern Irish to adopt the Roman computation. In the famous conference of Whitby (see Bede L. 3. c. 25.) Colman, who defended the Irish practice, alleged as an argument that Columba and his successors had observed it. He mentions no injunctions; and that there had not been any is evident from Wilfrid’s answering, that those holy men followed it, merely because the correct method had not been proposed to them, and that he entertained no doubt of their receiving it in case of their having been acquainted with it. What then are we to think of Ledwich’s audacious assertion (p. 405) which has been already touched upon, (Chap. II. §. 9.) viz. that Columba gave his dying command to his disciples to continue Quartadecimans!!!

(237) Wilfrid alludes to it in his answer to Colman (See Not. prec.) where he mentions the regulam ac præcepta of Columba and his followers. It is reckoned among eight principal rules formerly observed in Ireland. (See Tr. Th. p. 471.) Some Benedictine writers would fain make us believe that it was the same as that of St. Benedict. Without recurring to other arguments, the same Wilfrid informs us that it was not; for, as quoted by William of Malmesbury (L. 3. De Gestis Pontificum) he says that he was the first, who, on the Scots, that is, his adversaries the Columbian monks, being expelled, ordered the observance of the rule of St. Benedict by the monks in Northumberland. Here again we meet with more of Ledwich’s nonsense. Still persisting in his unfounded assertion as to the Irish and Britons having received their faith from the East, he says (p. 404.) that they thence received also their monachism, and learnedly tells us, that the seminaries of Columba and Comgall adopted the rule of St. Basil. For this he appeals to a mighty authority in Ecclesiastical history, M^rGeoghegan, who somewhere in his History of Ireland has a flourish about our Irish monks having perhaps brought from the Eastern countries the rules of St. Anthony, St. Pachomius or St. Basil, aye and those also of the famous solitaries of Mount Carmel and Thebais. That good man wished to let the world know, that he had heard of such persons, and imagined it would be doing honour to Ireland to associate our monks with such distinguished names. But where did he find that any Irish monks of those old times had travelled as far as Egypt or Palestine or even Asia Minor? Or what necessity was there for going all that way to look for monastic regulations, whereas the fundamental principles of them were well known in Ireland since the days of St. Patrick? The monastic discipline of the Irish was founded on that introduced by our Apostle, although variously modified in course of time, and differed in some essential points from the system not only of the Orientals, but likewise of the Benedictines. (See Chap. iv. §. 9. 12. v. §. 15. and Not. 52—58. to Chap. x.) Ledwich impudently represents (p. 406.) Cressy as an impostor for having said that Columba's rule was a rivulet from that of St. Patrick. Ledwich to charge others with the sin of imposture!!! Numquid diabolus factus est Christianus! But is it not more rational to suppose that said rule was derived from the system, whether put to writing or not by St. Patrick, which he introduced into Ireland, than to make, without shadow of proof, Columba adopt the rule of St. Basil? Had this rule been received by the Columbian or any other religious institutions of the Irish, surely some mention would have been made of it by Adamnan, or in one or other of the lives of our saints or other tracts, in which the monastic rules formerly observed in Ireland are often spoken of. Now that of St. Basil is never alluded to. Usher (p. 919) and Ware (Writers at Columba) make mention of Columba's rule as still extant. The former observes that it is written in very old and difficult Irish. There is reason to doubt, whether this be the same as the general rule, which had been framed for his entire institution. Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 471) distinguishes two rules written by Columba, one for his monasteries, and the other for certain brethren living in a desert, which he had a copy of and translated from Irish into Latin. He adds that this seems to be the rule alluded to by Ware. If it was, we may suspect that it was also the one which Usher had seen. But on this point I am not able to decide.

(238) A full account of them may be seen in Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 471. seqq.) and Harris (Writers at Columba). Colgan has published three of the Latin pieces, or hymns, the first of which is rather long, and contains a good deal of biblical and theological learning, commencing with the eternity, unity, and trinity of God, and, after treating of several sacred subjects, terminating with the day of judgment, the resurrection of mankind, and the future state of the just and unjust. The other two are beautiful prayers to the Almighty, written in rhyme. If these hymns be, as in all appearance they are, from the pen of St. Columba, they must be reckoned among the earliest compositions of that kind, and perhaps the earliest known, being more ancient than the specimen quoted by Pelloutier. (See Rees' Cyclop. at Rhyme.) There is a fragment of another Latin hymn, which he composed in honour of Kieran of Clonmacnois. Among his lost works was a Life of St. Patrick, which is mentioned twice by the authors of the Tripartite, as having been used by them in drawing up their compilation. Whether it was in Irish or Latin they do not inform us.

(239) Colgan rejects several of them as spurious, while he admits that some others may be genuine. See Tr. Th. p. 472.

(240) Bede, having mentioned Hy and other Columbian monasteries, writes; (L. 3. c. 4.) "In quibus omnibus idem monasterium insularum, (Hy) in quo ipse requiescit corpore, principatum tenet." See more in Tr. Th. p. 497.

(241) Baithen is the first named among the 12 original companions of Columba. (See Not. 148, to Chap. xi.) He governed for some time a monastery in the island of Ethica, (ib. §. 14.) and must not be confounded with another Baithen or Baitan of those times, of whom we have seen (ib. Not. 119. He was second cousin to Columba, being the son of Brendan, a son of Fergus, who was the paternal grandfather of the saint. A church in Tirconnel, in which his memory was revered, was called from him Teagh-basithin, i. e. the house of Baithen. (Tr. Th. p. 480.) Colgan says elsewhere, (AA. SS. p. 369.) that he was the founder of it. Archdall has this church in Donegall under the name of Taughboyne.

(242) Usher, p. 701. and Ind. Chron. Other accounts state, that Baithen survived Columba four years. (Tr. Th. p. 498.) But the dates given for his death and that of Columba are so wrong, and the difference between them and Colgan's own computations so irreconcilable, that it is better to adhere to Usher's statement, in which he merely follows the Annals of Ulster.

CHAPTER XIII.

Life of Columbanus—Studies under St. Comgall of Bangor—Goes to Britain and Gaul—Receives assistance from Carantocus, abbot of Salix—Erects the monastery of Luxeu—Works several miracles—Defends the Irish mode of calculating the Easter time, and is persecuted—Remonstrates with king Childeric on keeping concubines—is expelled from his monastery—Conveyed to Orleans to be banished from France—By his prayers restores to sight the husband of a Syrian woman who relieves the necessities of his people—Spends a night at the tomb of St. Martin at Tours—Arrives at Nantes—Foretels the destruction of Theodoric and his family—Embarks for Ireland, but is obliged to put back—Proceeds to the kingdom of Clotharius son of Chilperic—Is invited by the king to settle there, but declines the invitation—Foretels the succession of Clotharius to the kingdoms of Theodoric and Theodebert—Passes through the kingdom of Austrasia on his way to Italy—Stops a while at Mentz—Goes to Arbona near the lake of Constance—Converts some of the Suevi to Christianity—Destroys idols, and converts some of the inhabitants at Bregentz—Founds a monastery there—Advises king Theodebert to embrace the ecclesiastical state, who laughs at the saint, but who being shortly after defeated in battle is compelled to become an ecclesiastic—Arrives at Milan, and is kindly received by Agilulf king of the Lombards.—Confutes the Arians—Writes his letter to Pope Boniface IV. on the three chapters—Founds the monastery of Bobbio—Is invited by Clotharius to resume his convent at Luxeu, but declines the invitation—Dies.

SECT. I.

HAVING now concluded the history of St. Columba, surnamed Columbkil, let us proceed to that of his illustrious namesake, generally known by the name of Columbanus. (1) This great man was a native of some part of Leinster, and seems to have been of a respectable family. (2) Of the precise time of his birth we are not informed. According to some accounts it would have been about 559, and, according to others, several years earlier. (3) Having received a good classical education, and, being of a superior genius, made great proficiency in his studies, he began, when arrived at a certain age, to reflect on the dangers of youth, particularly as he was of an exceeding fine form. While meditating on this subject he happened to have a conversation with a religious woman, who cautioned him against the allurements of the world, and hinted that he would do well to quit his native district. He immediately determined on so doing, and, in opposition even to his mother, who did what she could to prevent him, left the province of Leinster, and went to place himself under the venerable Senile, a man celebrated for his piety and his knowledge of the holy scriptures (4) This able master, finding him endowed with great abilities, pushed him forward in his sacred studies, so that in a shorter time than usual he became well versed in them, and, while still a youth, wrote an exposition of the Psalms, and composed some other tracts. Columbanus then resolved on embracing the monastic state, and for that purpose went to Bangor, where he remained many years under the discipline of the abbot St. Comgall, and was distinguished for his fervour and regularity. At length he became inflamed with an ardent wish to retire to some foreign country, and communicated his plan to Comgall, who was at first unwilling to agree to it, as he did not like to part with a person, in whose society he felt great comfort. Yet reflecting, that Columbanus' exertions might be of great service elsewhere, he acquiesced, and told him he would give him some worthy companions to assist and comfort him in his spiritual expedition. The brethren being assembled, twelve of them were selected or offered themselves to accompany Columbanus. (5) Every thing being now arranged, he and his companions went first to Britain, but remained there only for a short time. They then determined on trying what good might be effected in the Gauls, with the intention, in case their toils in that country should turn out useless, of proceeding to some others. The Gauls, or, as we now call those provinces, France, were then in great need of some holy and resolute missionaries, who would be able and willing to stem the torrent of crimes and vices caused by the irruptions of the northern barbarians, and to rouse the clergy from the torpor and indolence, in which they indulged themselves. (6) Columbanus was highly qualified by his learning, zeal, and courage for this undertaking, (7) and was then in the maturity of his age, being about fifty years old when he arrived in Burgundy. (8) This was, according to the most probable account, in the year 589 or 590. (9)

(1) That Columba and Columbanus are the same name is universally admitted. Some old writers call Columbkil Columbanus; and, vice versa, the Columbanus, who is now to be treated of, is sometimes called Columba, which was, in fact, his real name, as he tells us himself in his letter on the Three Chapters, where he adds, that in Hebrew it is Jona, and, in Greek, Peristera. Jonas begins his Life with these words, "Columbanus, qui et Columba." We have already (Not. 125 to Chap. xi.) noticed the mistake of those, who, upon the mere grounds of the identity of name, have confounded these saints together. Having made mention of Jonas, I may here observe, that he lived in the 7th century, and was a monk of Columbanus' monastery of Bobbio as early as the times of Attala his immediate successor. It has been said that he was a native of Ireland, and a passage in his dedication to the abbots Waldebert and Bolenus seems to favour this opinion; for, apologizing for his want of abilities, he says; “Nobis ex Hibernia vix butyrum pinguescit.” But it cannot be reconciled with the manner, in which he speaks of Ireland in the first chapter, and which is like that of a foreigner undertaking to describe it. Thus he observes, that it is said to be a pleasantly situated island; “Insulae hujus situs, ut fertur, est amoenus;” and adds, that it is inhabited by the Scots, whom he praises in the following words; “Hanc et Sestorum gens incolit, gens, quanquam absque reliquarum gentium legibus, tamen in Christiani vigoris dogmate florens, omnium vicinarum gentium fidem praepellet.” Then he says, that Columbanus was of that nation. Were Jonas himself an Irishman, he would naturally have said, our nation. The Bollandists are right in making him a native of Susa in Italy, whither he tells us (Life of Attala, No 9. at 10 Mart.) he was allowed by Attala to go, after having spent 9 years at Bobbio, to visit his mother and brother. Mabillon has made the same observation. (Annal. Benedict. L. xi. §. 17 and Secl. II. Benedict at Jonas.) The passage Nobis, &c. merely alludes to Jonas having been taught by Irishmen. Mabillon’s edition does not differ, except in some verbal variations and in the division of chapters from that of Messingham. My references are to this latter division. He wrote also the Lives of Columbanus’ disciples, Attala, Eustasius and Bertulfus.

(2) Jonas (cap. 2.) ascribes to him what he calls pubertas nobilis, by which, in his pompous style, he probably alluded to the saint’s being of noble birth.

(3) The question depends, in part, upon that of the time, in which Columbanus arrived in France, of which I lower down. In the lessons drawn up for his office by Burke, he is said to have been born about 539, a date much earlier than that of Mabillon and others, but much more probable.

(4) The venerable man, here called Senile, was undoubtedly Sinell son of Maynacur, concerning whom see Chap. XII. §. 12.

(5) In the Life of St. Deicolus or Deicola, in Irish, Dichuill, (AA. SS. p. 117.) it is said that the chief companions of Columbanus were another Columbanus and Gallus with his maternal brother Deicolus. Of the two latter some account will be given hereafter. As to Columbanus, the other companion, it is sufficient to observe that he continued a simple monk, and died at Luxeu. Some others are mentioned as having been of that party, et. c. Caidoc, Fricor, Rantic, and a Quilian or Kilian. (Ib. p. 162.) Lua, who is mentioned by Jonas, (cap. 20.) was most probably one of them, as will be seen lower down (cap. 12.) He names three Scots or Irishmen, Cominin, Eunoc, and Aequon, besides Gorgan a Briton, as being along with the saint at Fontaines. Fleming, treating (Commentar. ad Vitam. S. Columbani, Collectan, &c. p. 320. seqq.) of the 12 companions reckons them thus; Gallus, Deicola, Sigisbertus, Columbanus junior, Cummin, Eunoc, Ecconan, Domitialis, Culian, Neemias, Lua or Potentinus, and Florentius or Albeus. But it is very doubtful, whether some of these persons were original companions. Potentinus was certainly with the saint at Luxeu, as will be seen lower down. Fleming's Ecconan or Equonan was the same as Acquon. The account of Sigisbertus, taken from a Breviary of Coire (at 11 July) is rather obscure. He was the founder of the monastery of Desertina in Rhaetia, the now Grison country. It is said, that he followed St. Columbanus from Ireland. If he were an Irishman, we may suppose that he changed his name in the Continent.

(6) Jonas writes, (cap. 4.) A Britannicis ergo finibus progressi ad Gallias tendunt, ubi tunc vel ob frequentiam hostium externorum, vel negligentiam praesulum, religionis virtus pene abolita habebatur; fides tantum remanebat Christiana. Nam poenitentiae medicamentum, et mortificationis amor, vix vel paucis in illis reperiatur locis." Those abuses are painted in still stronger colours by the author of the Life of St. Deicolus.

(7) We read in the same Life of Deicolus; "Redemptor mundi Deus et Dominus noster Jesus Christus—ad repellendas multiformes ignaviae tenebras de occiduis Hiberniae partibus splendidissimum radium Gallicis metis emergi praecepit, beatum videlicet Columbanum, egregium Sestigeroarum omnium patriotam." Baronius writes; (Annal. &c. ad A. 612.) "Magno plane Dei beneficio factum apparet, ut vir tantus ex Hibernia in Gallias veniens illustraret temporibus his perditissis Ecclesiam Dei; quem prae excelsum meritis si quis aliqua ex parte exaequet Eliae, haud mea sententia a scopo veritatis aberrarit," &c.

(8) In Messingham's edition of Jonas (cap. 3.) Columbanus is said to have been in his 20th year at the time of his setting out from Ireland. This is a mistake of a copyist. Instead of 20th, must be read at least, 30th, as Mabillon has it, or more probably 50th (see following note.) It is plain that had Columbanus been only in his 20th year at that time, he would have been too young to be a leader of a religious association formed for missionary purposes. He had, most probably, passed that age, when he first went to Bangor.

(9) Were we to follow Jonas, it should be admitted that Columbanus arrived in France before 575 or early in that year; and, in fact, several learned writers, whom it is unnecessary to quote, led astray by his authority, were of that opinion. He says, (cap. 5.) that Columbanus was graciously received by Sigebert king of Austrasia and Burgundy. Now Sigibert was killed in the year 575. In the first place we may remark, that Sigebert never possessed the kingdom of Burgundy, which belonged to his brother Guntchram or Gontran, and was held by him until 593, the year of his death. (See Henault, Abregé Chronologique, &c.) And as to the year of Columbanus' arrival in the kingdom of Burgundy, which was not long after his having reached France, the question relative to it is connected with the inquiry into the time of the foundation of the monastery of Luxeu. Mabillon has incontrovertibly proved, (Annal. Benedict. L. VIII. §. 10.) that this was about 590, at which time Gontran reigned in Burgundy and Childebert, son of Sigebert, in Austrasia. Ordericus Vitalis, referred to by Mabillon, places the arrival of Columbanus in the reign of Childebert, without any mention of the kingdom of Burgundy. This kingdom devolved to Childebert after the death of his uncle Gontran; but, when Columbanus arrived in France, he was only king of Austrasia. Usher, following Marianus Scotus, affixes (Ind. Chron.) the arrival of Columbanus in Burgundy to A. D. 589; Mabillon and others speak of it as belonging to 590. The difference between these dates is immaterial, particularly if we be allowed to suppose, that this arrival was in the late part of 589. But we find another date assigned by Mabillon himself (Observat. ad Vit. S. Waldeberti Sec. 3. Benedict. Part. 2.) where he concludes from a clause in a MS. written by a monk of Luxeu, that Columbanus arrived in Burgundy about 585. Pagi follows this date, (Critica in Annal. Baron. ad. A. 585.) and thence lays down that the saint had spent about five years in that country before he founded the monastery of Luxeu. Yet Mabillon in the Benedictine Annals makes no mention of this date 585, and constantly supposes that Luxeu was founded not many months after the arrival in Burgundy. And indeed there is every reason to think that it was. Besides, several circumstances and dates mentioned, as will be seen in the course of the saint's history, can scarcely be reconciled with that date. We might now guess at the year of the saint's birth, if we were sure that he was only in the 30th year of his age when he left Ireland. For supposing that he set out late in 588 or early in 589, and allowing about a year for his travels and delays in Britain and France before he reached the Voiges then comprized in the kingdom of Burgundy, it will follow that he was born in 559. To this statement, however, there is a very strong objection, founded on its being well known that he lived to a good old age, and most probably to beyond that of 72 years, as will appear lower down. Now, had he been born in 559, he would not have exceeded that of 56, whereas he died in 615. Accordingly Mabillon's emandation of the 20th of Jonas' text into 30th will not do; and the true reading was, I dare say, the 50th, in which case his birth must be assigned to about 539. (See above Not. 3.)

§. II. Columbanus and his companions, on their way through France, preached the word of God according as a favourable opportunity occurred, and edified the people by their good example. When arrived in a deserted part of the Vosges they stopped in an old half ruined fort called Anagrates. (10) In that wild tract they were soon reduced to the greatest distress, so that on one occasion they had for nine days no other food than the bark of trees and the herbs of the forest. Yet Providence did not abandon them. Carantocus, abbot of the monastery of Salix, (11) was inspired to send them a supply of provisions, which he did by his storekeeper Marculfus, who having delivered them, and received the saint's benediction, spoke, on his return, to every one, in such terms, of Columbanus, that people began to flock to him from various parts for the purpose of obtaining favours from God through his intercession. Columbanus delighted in solitude, and was often wont to retire to a cavern in a huge rock some miles distant from Anagrates, where all alone he used to spend his whole time in prayer and meditation, occasionally attended by a small boy called Domualis, who served as a messenger between him and the brethren. It is related that, on the boy's happening to complain to him of the great fatigue he underwent in procuring water, Columbanus ordered him to strike the rock, which when he had done, a fountain immediately started out of it, and thenceforth continued to afford an abundant supply. (12) When in that retirement, the saint lived merely on wild herbs and a sort of small apples, which that desert produced. The number of persons, who came to place themselves under the direction of Columbanus, daily increasing, he found it necessary to erect a monastery, and for that purpose fixed upon a spot, called Luxovium, now Luxeu, or, corruptly, Luxeul, in a thick part of the forest, and about eight miles distant from Anagrates. This foundation took place in 590, or perhaps, in the early part of 591. (13) A community still remained at Anagrates; but so great was the concourse of persons of every description, and particularly of young nobles, anxious to avail themselves of his instructions and to lead a religious life, that he was soon obliged to erect another monastery at a place in the neighbourhood, to which he gave the name of Ad fontanas (now Fontaines) from its being well furnished with springs. Over this new monastery as well as over that of Anagrates he placed superiors, subordinate, however, to himself. (14) For these establishments he drew up a monastic rule, most probably derived, at least in a great part, from that of his master Comgall of Bangor. (15).

(10) Jonas, cap. 5. Anagratés is now called Anegray, which, as well as Luxeu, &c. mentioned lower down, lies in the province since called Franche Comte. Bingham (B. VII. ch. 2, sect. 13.) has shamefully changed Luxeu into Lisieux in Normanday.) Jonas tells a pompous story of how Columbanus, after his favourable reception by Sigebert, was requested by him not to quit his kingdom, and that accordingly he took up his abode in that country. But, from what we have just seen, all this, however copied by many others, falls to the ground. The fact is, that the saint was not then patronized by any king, otherwise how could he and his companions have been soon after reduced to almost a state of starvation?

(11) Mabillon observes that, according to a well founded tradition, Salix was the place now called Le Saucy, three leagues distant from Anegray.

(12) Jonas, cap. 8.

(13) Fleury, (Hist. Eccl. L. 35. §. 9) assigns it to 590, the year of the saint's arrival in Burgundy. But, as some months elapsed before he founded Luxeu, it may be placed in 591.

(14) Mabillon says, (Annal. Benedict. L. VIII. §. 11.) that this is the origin or first instance of priories, or dependent small monasteries, subject to the head monastery and its abbots, as colonies are to the mother country. It may have been so in the continent; but there were certainly many instances of that kind in Ireland, or where Irish monks were settled, prior to the establishments of Columbanus. Columbkil superintended many inferior monasteries of this sort, and this power was derived to his successors. Without repeating what we have so often met with relative to this subject, let it suffice to refer to a passage of Bede quoted above, (Not. 240 to Chap. XII.) Comgall had established several of those subordinate monasteries or priories. (See Chap. x. §. 12.) Columbanus merely imitated his practice, and for the same reason, viz. that one monastery was not sufficient for containing the vast number of monks and students belonging to the institution.

(15) Fleming, the collector of the Acts, works, &c. of St. Columbanus, published by Sirin, was of opinion (Dissert. de Monast. S. Columbani professione) that he added somewhat to the Rule of Comgall. The Rule of St. Columbanus is easily met with, having been often published (See Usher. p. 920), even before Holstenius inserted it in his Codex Regularum. I must here observe, that after the Rule, as published by Messingham (Florilegium) &c. &c. there is in Fleming's collection, which may be seen in the Bibliotheca Patrum, (Tom. 12. Lyons, A. 1677) the S. Columbani abbatis Regula Coenobialis Fratrum, sive Liber de quotidianis poenitentiis monachorum. It appears as a supplementary rule to the general one, and is divided into 15 small chapters. It has been called Regula Coenobialis Patrum de Hibernia. There is also in Fleming's collection, and in the Bibl. Patr. (ib.), another penitential tract of St. Columbanus, entitled Liber de poenitentiary mensura taxanda, and consisting of 42 rules or paragraphs. A good account of St. Columbanus' Rule in general is given by Fleury, (L. 35. §. 10.) It was received and followed in France before that of St. Benedict was introduced into that country; and we find it approved of by the Freuch bishops in the council of Macon, A. D. 627. Mabillon admits (Annal. Ben. L. VIII. §. 17.) that it was different from the Benedictine, which, he observes, was not followed either in Britain or Ireland, when Columbanus arrived in France bringing with him the discipline of Bangor. He doubts, (ib. §. 16.) and for very strong reasons, whether the practice of perpetual psalmody, mentioned by St. Bernard (Vit. S. Malach.) as observed at Luxeu, was introduced there by the saint. I need scarcely add, that Columbanus' Rule was, after having been followed, for a long time, by several monasteries in France, and by some in Italy, Germany, and Switzerland, at length incorporated with that of St. Benedict. Without recurring to Mabillon, who treats of these subjects at large, the reader will find some very nice observations on them in Usher's Prim. p. 1050. seqq.

§. III. Several miracles are related as performed by St. Columbanus, as also various favours obtained from the Almighty through his prayers, while he remained in the places now spoken of. But a detail of them would lead us too far. His confidence in being assisted by God was so great that, on occasion of a great number of the monks of Luxeu lying sick, he ordered them to rise and thresh the sheafs of corn spread out on the ground. Those, who obeyed, immediately recovered their health; while others, who did not, were punished with long and dangerous illness. (16) Waldelen a wealthy chieftain and his wife Flavia, having no children, came from Besançon to request his intercession with God for the purpose of being blessed with an heir. The saint told them that he would comply with their wish, yet on this condition that the son who would be born, should be dedicated to the service of God; and promised them that, in case of their agreeing to this proposal, they should not want for other heirs. Full of joy they accepted of these terms, and the Almighty was pleased to give them a son, who was brought by his mother to the saint, who baptized him and gave him the appropriate name of Donatus. He was in due time educated in the monastery of Fontaine, and afterwards became bishop of Besançon, where he was still alive in our author's time. Waldelen and Flavia had next the happiness of having another son and two daughters, all three distinguished for piety; and Flavia, after her husband's death, founded a nunnery at Besançon. (17)

(16) Jonas, cap. 11.

(17) Ib. cap. 13.

§. iv. St. Columbanus, although living in France, continued to observe the Irish mode of computing Easter time. (18) Some Gallican bishops gave him a great deal of trouble on this account. Accordingly he wrote a letter to the Pope, in which he strenuously defends the Irish system, and requests his decision on the question, telling him, however, that the Western churches, meaning those of Britain and Ireland, will not agree to any thing contrary to the authority of St. Jerome, whom he considered as having approved of the calculation, on which it was founded. He then consults him on some other points, and concludes with informing him that he had read with great pleasure his Pastoral, and requesting a copy of his Commentary on Ezechiel. (19) It appears, that the Pope did not receive this letter nor some other memoirs, which Columbanus wrote to him on the subject. About the same time several Gallican bishops were assembled in council for the purpose of deliberating on that question, and of deciding on how they should act with regard to Columbanus. He wrote them a letter, in which he thanked God that they had met on his account, and wishes that they would, as the canons require, hold councils oftener than they used to do. He begs of them to examine, with mildness and humility, which is the right tradition relative to Easter time, and refers them to the answer he gave them three years before, his three tomes addressed to the Pope, and his memoir directed to the bishop Arigius. (20) He adds that he was not the author of the question, and that he and his companions merely wish to follow the practice of their elders. It would, he says, I think, be better for you to comfort us poor strangers than to go on disturbing us. He then tells them, that he did not dare to appear before them for fear of disputing in their presence, contrary to the precept of the Apostle; and that, if it be God's will that they should drive him out of the desert, whither he came from so great a distance for the love of Jesus Christ, he will say with the Prophet; If I am the cause of this tempest, make it cease by throwing me into the sea. He observes in the course of the letter, that he had lived in the forests of that country for twelve years, whence it follows that it was written either in 601 or 602. (21) Whatever was the result of this letter, or the decision of the council, we find St. Columbanus still persisting in his Paschal computation, and still annoyed by the Gallican clergy for so doing. For the purpose of being protected against their attacks, he had recourse to the then Pope, whether Sabinian, or Boniface the third or fourth, is uncertain, (22) and sent him copies of his letter to Pope Gregory, which had not been delivered to that Pope. (23) He requests of him to be allowed to follow the tradition of his elders, if it be not contrary to faith, and says that he does not disturb others with regard to their observances. We ask, he adds, for peace and ecclesiastical unity, such as that which St. Polycarp maintained with Pope Anicetus, and for permission to observe our own laws according to the regulation made by the 150 fathers of the council of Constantinople. (24)

(18) Fleury says (L. 36. §. 44.) that Columbanus celebrated Easter on the 14th of the moon. This is not correctly expressed. He ought to have said, that Columbanus reckoned the Paschal Sundays, viz. the Sundays, on which Easter could be celebrated, from the 14th to the 20th of the moon. This was contrary to the Alexandrian computation from the 15th to the 21st, which had been received at Rome not many years before the time of Columbanus, and thence introduced into France. Until the adoption of the Alexandrian method there were mistakes on both sides. Of these subjects more in their proper place.

(19) This letter has been published from Fleming by Sirin, and thence, together with the other letters and works of St. Columbanus, republished in the 12th tome of the Bibliotheca Patrum above mentioned. It shows a considerable share of learning, and is written with apostolical freedom, yet combined with expressions of great respect and esteem for St. Gregory, whom Columbanus says he would have waited on in person, did his health and the care of his institution permit him. Fleming thought (Comment. ad Vitam S. Columbani Collectan. p. 319.) that St. Columbanus indicates in this letter his having been already at Rome. But as Sirin justly remarks (ib. p. 164.), there is no foundation for this supposition, the words of the saint not requiring that explanation, but a different one, which is plain enough.

(20) Fleury says, (ib.) that Arigius is thought to have been archbishop of Lyons. Mabillon (Annal. &c. L. 9. c. 34.) thinks that he was the primus bishop of Vapincum, (now Gap) who lived in those times, and is often mentioned by Fleury himself. The name of the Archbishop of Lyons was properly Aridius, and he is so called by Fleury (L. 36. §. 49.) It is true that in some rather late documents he is called also Arigius, and his name is infamous in history, having been a friend of Brunehild and her copartner in the horrid persecution of Desiderius bishop of Vienne; although some writers have endeavoured to exculpate him, without, however, convincing any impartial reader. (See Sammarthan, (Gallia Christiana, Tom. IV. col. 40 seqq.) It is odd that Fleury, who places in 602 the council held concerning St. Columbanus, could have supposed that the bishop Arigius, to whom the saint's memoir had been addressed, was Aridius of Lyons; for he might have known, that he did not become archbishop of Lyons until 603. (Gallia Chr. ib.) Now, if this Aridius were the person referred to by Columbanus, the council should have been held after 602. Dupin, indeed, had said (Bibliothèque, &c. at Columbanus, 7th century,) what Fleury has as to Arigius; but he does not mark the time of the council. There was a council held at Challon sur Saone in 603; its business, however, was relative not to Columbanus but to Desiderius of Vienne. Besides, it is clear that St. Columbanus had written to Arigius before the assembling of the council concerning himself, and that Arigius was a well known bishop at the time, which cannot be said of Aridius of Lyons, whose first appearance we do not find until 603, and who, I suspect, was not in his own times called Arigius. The reason for afterwards giving him this name was probably a wish to confound him with St. Arigius of Gap, a person, highly esteemed by St. Gregory, and who, it cannot be doubted, was the bishop to whom Columbanus had directed a tract on the Paschal question.

(21) Fleury calculates that it was written in 602, because, he says, the monastery of Luxeu was founded in 590. But St. Columbanus reckoned the twelve years from the time of his arrival in the Vosges, which was in said year, and prior by some months to the foundation of Luxeu. (See Not. 9 and 12.) Mabillon (loc. cit.) states that the council was assembled in the 12th year from Columbanus's said arrival, which, he says, corresponds to A. D. 600, yet supposing that the 12 years, mentioned by the saint should be considered as not complete. This does not agree with what he has elsewhere as to the saint's transactions. If the council, in which the conduct of Columbanus was discussed, was the same as one thought to have been held in consequence of an order of the Pope issued in 599, it might seem that it ought to be assigned to 600. But Columbanus speaks of the council as if assembled merely on his own account, and, on the other hand, in the directions given by the Pope, concerning the subjects to be treated of in the council ordered by him, there is not a word about Columbanus or the Paschal question. (See Fleury, L. 36. §. 10.) Be the matter as it may, there is every reason to believe, that the council written to by the saint was held either in 601 or 602.

(22) As St. Columbanus's letter is directed to the Pope in general without any distinguishing criterion, it has been generally supposed that he was Boniface the third or fourth. Boniface the third became Pope on the 15th of February A. D. 606, and died on the 12th of November in said year. His immediate successor was Boniface the fourth, who, after a vacancy of more than ten months, was placed on the chair of St. Peter on the 18th of September in 607, and lived until 614. If the Boniface to whom Columbanus wrote on this occasion, was the third, the letter must have been written in 606; if he was the fourth, we must assign it to some time between the latter end of 607 and that part of 609, in which the saint began to be persecuted by Brunehild and her grandson Theodoric. It is evident from the letter, that it was written prior to this persecution. Mabillon (Annal. &c. L. x. §. 36.) makes mention of it, as directed to the third Boniface, while Fleming exhibits it as written to the fourth. Pagi (Critica &c. ad A. 605.) differs from both, and holds that Fabian, the immediate successor of St. Gregory, was the Pope addressed by Columbanus. In this case the letter was written either in the late part of 604, or early in 605.

(23) In the letter, just treated of, Columbanus says that the bearers of his letters to Gregory were twice prevented by Satan from delivering them. Perhaps they were intercepted by his opponents in France.

(24) He alludes to a part of the second canon of that council in which it is decreed, that the churches without the Roman empire are to be administered according to the traditionary custom of their fathers. “ Quae autem in Barbaris sunt gentibus, Dei ecclesias administrare oportet secundum patrum, quae servata est, consuetudinem."

§. v. A much more severe persecution awaited St. Columbanus, excited against him by that wicked old queen dowager, Brunehild, or, as the French now call her, Brunchaut, the relict of Sigebert king of Austrasia, and mother of Childebert, who became king also of Burgundy, (25) and died in 596. He left two sons, who succeeded him under the direction of Brunehild their grandmother, Theodebert king of Austrasia, and Theodoric, or Thierry, king of Burgundy. Brunehild lived with Theodebert, until, at the request of the noblesse of Austrasia, he banished her. She then fled in the year 599 to Theodoric, by whom she was kindly received. (26) When this prince was no more than a stripling, she contrived to corrupt his morals, in order to preserve her authority over him, insomuch so, that at a very early age he kept concubines. He had, however, a great veneration for St. Columbanus, and used to visit him very often. The saint, wishing to reclaim him, admonished him sharply to change his course of life, and told him how infamous it was to take up with concubines instead of getting a wife, by whom, as a respectable queen, he might have legitimate children. Theodoric was so much affected by these exhortations, that he promised to follow the advice of Columbanus. When Brunehild was informed of the king's intention, she became enraged, like another Jezabel, being afraid that if a queen were introduced, she would lose her own power and rank. (27) Some time after, the saint happening to call to see her at Brocoriacum (28) Brunehild, on perceiving him coming into the court, brought out the illegitimate children of Theodoric, who were then four, to meet him. When he saw them he asked what did they want. She answered; "they are the King's children; do you give them your blessing." "Know," he replied, "that they will never reign; for they are sprung from debauchery." Getting into a fury, she ordered the children to be withdrawn, and Columbanus left the court. She then dispatched messengers with orders not to allow his monks to quit the precincts of their monasteries, and an injunction to others not to receive them or give them any assistance. Columbanus, wishing to put a stop to these proceedings, went to Spissia, (29) where Theodoric was together with his grandmother. Having arrived there about sun-set he refused to stop in any of the houses belonging to the king, who, on being apprized of his determination, gave orders that he should be supplied at his lodging with every thing necessary in a splendid manner. Some exquisite dishes, wine, &c. were accordingly brought to him, which when Columbanus saw, he asked what was the meaning of this apparatus. The answer was, that they were sent to him by the king. He then said; "It is written, The Most High rejects the gift of the impious; (30) nor is it fit that the mouths of the servants of God should be defiled with the viands of one, who refuses them an entrance not only into his own habitation but likewise into those of others." On his having finished these words, the dishes, &c. cracked into pieces, and every thing was scattered on the floor. The king's officers being terrified, announced to him what had taken place, who, likewise struck with terror, hastened the next morning along with Brunehild to wait upon the saint. They asked pardon for what had been done against him and his monks, and promised to amend their conduct. He then returned to his monastery. (31)

(25) See Not. 9.(26) See Henault, Abregé, &c.(27) Jonas, cap. 17.(28) Bourcheresse between Challon and Autun. Fleury, L. 36. §. 57.(29) Espoisses between Semur and Montreal. Fleury, ib.

The saint's object in going to that place was not, as Fleury states, to appease Brunechild, but to give further admonitions to the king.

(30) Eccli. xxxiv. 23.

(31) Jonas, cap. 18.

§. VI. Brunechild and Theodoric, far from fulfilling their promise, still continued in their usual irregularities and scandals, which so displeased the saint that he wrote a very severe letter to the king, and threatened to separate from his communion, (32) unless he would speedily renounce his vicious habits. This was highly displeasing to Brunechild, who accordingly set every engine at work to envenom the king's mind against the saint, and procured the cooperation of pliant nobles and courtiers for that purpose. She solicited also the bishops to find fault with his monastic rule. The king thus pressed went in person, attended by his sycophants, to Luxeu, and, not having any thing improper to charge Columbanus with, made a complaint of his differing from the usages of the province in not allowing to Christians of every description access into the interior of his monasteries. The saint replied with firmness, that it was not his practice to allow it, but that he had proper places for receiving all sorts of people. Theodoric then forcing his way into the monastery said; "If you wish to derive any benefit from our bounty, all these places must be open to every one." He had already got as far as the refectory, when Columbanus thus addressed him; "If you endeavour to violate the discipline here established, know that I will do without your presents or any succour from you; and if you are to come to this place for the purpose of destroying the monasteries of the servants of God, and of corrupting the regular discipline, know that your kingdom will be destroyed together with all your royal race." The king, terrified by this denunciation, immediately withdrew, and, as the saint still reproached him with his conduct, said to him ; “ You hope I will give you the crown of martyrdom ; but I am not such a fool as to commit so heinous a crime ; and I now tell you what is best to be done. As your system is different from that of all other times, do you return to whence you came.” The courtiers added, that they did not like to have any one in their country, who would not associate with every body. Columbanus answered, that he would not quit the cloister, unless dragged out by force. A nobleman, named Baudolfus, was then left to watch him, and soon after sent him to Besançon, where he was to remain until the king’s further pleasure should be known. While there, he was left quite free without being guarded or disturbed by any one, and, as no orders appeared relative to him, he thought he might return to his monastery, as he accordingly did together with those, who had followed him. Brunehild and Theodoric, being apprized of his return, became greatly enraged, and ordered some military men to proceed to Luxeu and drive him out of the monastery. Many of them were exceedingly sorry for being employed on this errand. The saint was very loth to part with his dear monks and disciples, who would have followed him to any part of the world. But the king had given orders, that none should be allowed to accompany him except his own countrymen and such as were Britons, while those, who were native of France, should stay behind. These were encouraged by the saint to keep up their spirits, as God would soon avenge their cause. This final departure of St. Columbanus from his monasteries in the Vosges took place in the 20th year from his arrival in that country, and, as appears from other circumstances, A. D. 610. (33)

(32) This separation from communion is called excommunication by Jonas ; but it must not be understood in the strict sense of the word, or of a total exclusion from the body of the faithful. Columbanus, who was only a priest, was too well acquainted with the discipline of the church to imagine, that he could inflict such a punishment as general excommunication. What he meant was that he would not communicate in sacris with Theodoric, and that, for instance, he would not give him the Eucharist, nor even allow him to enter his church. Innumerable cases of this sort of partial excommunication occur in Ecclesiastical history; and we find three of them, exactly similar to what was threatened by Columbanus, in the proceedings of St. Ambrose, with regard to three emperors; 1. Maximus, whom, as Paulinus tells us (Vit. Ambros.) a communionis consortio segregavit, on account of his having shed the blood of the emperor Gratian: 2. Valentinian junior: (See Ep. 30 ad Valentin. junior.) 3. Theodosius, otherwise a most religious prince, for the massacre of Thessalonica. Yet in none of these instances did St. Ambrose mean that sort of excommunication, by which a person is cut out from all Christian communion and rejected by the whole church. Nor did he suppose that other bishops might not hold communion with those princes, if they pleased to do so. The Irish church distinguished six sorts of excommunication. (See below Chap. xxxii. §. 11.)

(33) Jonas has, (cap. 19.) “Vicesimo anno post incolatum eremi illius.” Fleury (L. 37. §. 6.) makes this 20th year the same as A. D. 610. Mabillon also (Annal. &c. (L. x. §. 47.)) assigns the saint’s departure to the same year. And here I may observe that he must have been wrong in calling A. 600 the 12th year of Columbanus in the Vosges; (above Not. 21.) for, whereas he admits that the 20th year of his abode there was A. 610, how could 600 have been the 12th? From Jonas having mentioned not 20 years complete, but only the 20th from the saint’s arrival in the desert, that is, from A. 590, it might seem that the year of the departure was perhaps rather 609 than 610. But from what will be seen in the following note it is evident, that the latter is the true date.

§. VII. The saint and his companions were escorted on their rout towards Ireland by a corps of guards commanded by one Ragamund, to whom, when they had reached Auxerre, Columbanus said; “Remember what I now tell you; Clotarius, whom ye now despise, will be your master in three years time." (34) Thence they were conducted to Nevers, to be there embarked in a boat plying on the Loire. (35) As some of them were rather slow in getting into the boat, one of them Lua, (36) a very holy man, was struck with an oar by one of the guards. The saint expostulated with him for his wanton cruelty towards unoffending persons, who were already persecuted more than enough, and announced to him that he would be struck by God in the very same spot; and so it turned out soon after; for, having returned to it he was there drowned. When arrived at Orleans, Columbanus and his followers were obliged to remain in tents on the bank of the Loire, and would not be allowed to enter any of the churches, the king having given orders that they should not. Being in want of provisions, two of them, one of whom was named Potentinus, (37) went into the city to procure something. The people were afraid to give them any supplies; but, as they were returning, they were met by a Syrian woman, who asked them who they were. On their explaining themselves and mentioning their business, she addressed them with great respect, and invited them to to her house, where, she said, they should get whatever they were in need of; telling them at the same time, that she also was a foreigner and from a distant country of the East. They went along with her, and sat down until she brought them some necessaries. Observing a blind man in the place, and inquiring who he was, she answered that he was her husband and a countryman of hers. They said, that if he were brought before Columbanus, he might recover his sight by means of his prayers. The blind man encouraged by these words, and strengthened by faith, followed them with the help of a guide on their return, and, just as Potentinus had finished relating to the saint what had occurred, presented himself before him, and requested his prayers towards being freed from his blindness. Columbanus, perceiving his faith, called upon the brethren to pray for this man, and, having lain prostrate for a considerable time on the ground, rising up touched his eyes and making the sign of the cross restored his sight to him. Thenceforth numbers of persons afflicted with various infirmities flocked to the saint, and the inhabitants of Orleans largely, yet secretly, contributed towards the wants of himself and his companions.

(34) Jonas, ib. In fact, Clotharius, who was then sovereign of only the kingdom of Soissons, became king of all France in 613. Hence it is clear, that the year of the saint's delivering that prophecy, and accordingly of his last departure from Luxeu, could not have been prior to 610.

(35) It may seem odd that, having arrived at Auxerre, they should have been brought so far to the South, and out of the straight line to the British sea, as Nevers. But it is probable that the first intention was to convey them by land; and, that as this was considered inconvenient for perhaps many reasons, it was resolved at Auxerre to embark them on the Loire. To meet with what we would call a packet boat, they were obliged to turn off towards Nevers, where there was a station for vessels of that sort.

(36) Jonas, cap. 20. This is the Lua alluded to above, Not. 5. He must have been either an Irishman or a Briton, as none others of the monks were allowed to accompany the saint. But his name, being a well known Irish one, favours the former supposition. It is very probable that he was one of those, who had followed Columbanus from Ireland. I do not say, certain, because there are reasons to suppose, that, besides his original companions, he had some other Irish monks in the Vosges. Mabillon (Annal. &c. L. x. §. 48.) fell into a mistake, similar to that of Usher, (See Not. 93. to Chap. XII.) thinking that this Lua was perhaps the Luanus mentioned by St. Bernard.

(37) We may, I think, conclude from his name, that Potentinus was a Romanized Briton. He afterwards established a monastery in a suburb of Coutance (in Normandy); and Jonas tells us (cap. 20.) that he was still alive in his time.

§. VIII. Being arrived at Tours, Columbanus requested of the guards to permit him to visit the tomb of St. Martin. They refused to comply, and ordered the boatmen to put forward; but, in spite of them, the boat stopped at the harbour, and thus he had the consolation of spending a whole night in prayer near that venerable monument. The next morning Leuparius, the bishop, invited him to dinner. The saint accepted of his invitation, and remained with him for that day. One of the guests was Chrodoaldus, who, although related by marriage to king Theodebert, was a faithful adherent of Theodoric. Columbanus, being apprized of this, said to him; "As you are connected by treaty with Theodoric, you will do well to let him know, that he and his children will be destroyed, root and branch, in the course of three years." The bishop, having supplied the saint with some necessary store, bid him a prosperous farewell. At length he and his followers arrived at Nantes, where they remained for some days waiting for a passage to Ireland. The bishop Sophronius paid them no attention; but the Almighty did not forsake them. Their wants were abundantly relieved by two pious ladies Procula and Dola or Doda, which made the courtly prelate so much ashamed, that, together with the Count Theodoald, he did all he could to hurry them off. A ship was found ready to sail for Ireland, and in it were embarked the saint's companions, their sea store, &c. while he himself was to go down in a boat as far as the mouth of the river, where he would join them. Just as the vessel had reached the ocean, it was encountered by an immense mass of waves, which drove it back and cast it on shore, where it lay stranded for three days. The master conceived that his being stopped in his voyage was owing to his having on board the saint's companions and articles belonging to him. Accordingly he determined on putting them out of the ship, which when he had done, the obstacles to his course immediately ceased. (38) The whole party then returned to Nantes, and were no longer disturbed, every one paying the greatest respect and attention to Columbanus. It was before his companions embarked in said vessel, that he wrote from Nantes (39) an excellent letter to the monks, whom he had left behind him in the Vosges. He gives them various salutary directions, and desires them to obey Attala, whom he orders to remain along with them, in case he thinks his doing so conducive to the good of souls. "But if" he adds, "you see danger, I mean danger of disunion, which may be caused by the Paschal question, you may come to me." Then addressing the whole community, he points out to them how they are to act, in case Attala should retire from the presidency.

(38) Jonas, cap. 22.

(39) It is odd, that Fleury (L. 37. §. 6.) speaks in a doubting manner of this letter having been written at Nantes. Mabillon does not; and, in fact, it is evident from the context, that it was written there. For instance, he says that, at the very time he was writing it, a person brought him word that a ship was getting ready to take him against his will to his own country. He tells his monks of Burgundy, that their brethren were then near the Britons, in vicinia Britonum, meaning those of Brittany. This is surely a positive indication that the place was Nantes. In Fleming's collection and in the Biblioth-Patr. this letter is marked No. 3.

§. IX. The saint and his followers, being now perfectly free, leaving Nantes proceeded to the kingdom of Clotharius son of Chilperic, (40) who, knowing how cruelly Columbanus had been treated by Brunechild and Theodoric received him with open arms, as a heavenly gift, and requested him to settle in his dominions. The saint declined his invitation, partly lest he might add fuel to the enmity existing between him and Theodoric, and partly for other reasons. Meanwhile, Clotharius detaining him as long as he could, he gave that king some good advice with regard to the management of his court. While he remained with him, a quarrel arose between Theodoric and his brother Theodebert concerning the boundaries of their kingdoms. Both parties sent ambassadors to Clotharius, calling upon him to assist one against the other. On this occasion he consulted Columbanus, who counselled him not to join either of them, whereas both their kingdoms would fall into his hands within three years. The king followed his advice. This was in 611, the year in which the two royal brothers were making preparations for war. (41) Some time after the saint applied to Clotharius for the purpose of being enabled, through his means, to pass through the kingdom of Theodebert (Austria) on his way towards Italy. Clotharius then ordered some persons to accompany him, who brought him first to Paris, where he cured a man possessed with the devil, and thence to Meaux, where he was most joyfully welcomed by Channeric, a nobleman very high in favour with Theodebert. This worthy man, wishing to detain Columbanus as long as possible at Meaux, and to have his family instructed by him, told the persons who had been sent with him by Clotharius, that there was no further occasion for their attendance, and that he would take care to have him introduced to the king Theodebert. The saint gave his blessing to Channeric's family, and devoted to God a daughter of his, named Farra or Burgundofora, then very young, who afterwards became eminent for virtue. Having left Meaux he was entertained, on his way, at Vultiacum (Eussi or Ussi) on the Marne by Autharius a distinguished and pious man, whose lady Aiga brought two small sons of theirs, Ado and Dado, to receive the saint's benediction. He blessed them ; and both of them, in course of time, retiring from the world, founded monasteries according to his Rule, and were celebrated for their sanctity

(40) Chilperic was one of the sons of Clotharius I. and got to his share the kingdom of Soissons. He was brother to Sigebert the grandfather of the saint's persecutor Theodoric. Chilperic's son was Clotharius II. to whose kingdom Columbanus went from Nantes, and which, says Jonas, (cap. 23.) was in the extreme parts of Gaul towards the ocean.

(41) See Henault, Abrege, &c. at Clotharius II.

§. x. At length Columbanus appeared before Theodebert, by whom he was received with marked distinction. By this time several of the monks, whom he had left at Luxeu, had joined him. Theodebert promised, that he would find for him agreeable places in his kingdom, every way fit for servants of God, and where he would have an opportunity of announcing the Gospel to nations in want of it. The saint answered that he would stop for a while in some such place, and try what good he could do in that line. The king left him to his own choice of a situation ; and Columbanus having embarked on the Rhine, and proceeding against the current, halted a while at Mentz, where he and his people were plentifully supplied with necessaries by the bishop ; and thence continued his course up the river. (42) Having examined divers places they came to the river Limath in Switzerland, and hence to the lake of Zurich. Travelling along its western bank they arrived in the district, now called the Canton of Zug, and liking the place fixed upon it for their abode. But soon finding the inhabitants exceedingly impious and obstinate, and that their exertions produced no other effect than to excite a violent persecution against themselves, they left that neighbourhood and removed to Arbona near the lake of Constance, where lived a worthy priest named Willimar, who treated them for seven days with great hospitality. Columbanus inquired of him if there was any retired place in those parts convenient for the erection of a monastery. He told him there was a very fit situation near the ruins of a town called Brigantium (Bregentz); and, as the saint and his companions expressed a wish to go thither, he provided them with a boat and rowers for that purpose. (43) When arrived there, Columbanus was not well pleased with the circumstances of the place, but pledged himself to remain there for some time to propagate the faith among the Suevi, who lived in the neighbourhood. On one occasion he found the people preparing to offer a great libation out of a huge vessel full of beer. On the saint's asking them what they meant to do with it, they answered that it was intended as an offering to their god Vodan. He then blew on the vessel, which immediately cracked into pieces, and the beer was all spilled. Having then preached to them against their superstitions, he ordered them to go to their homes. Many of them were soon after converted, and when instructed, were baptized. (44)

(42) Jonas, cap. 26.

(43) Walafr. Strab. Vit. S. Galli. L. 1. capp. 4. 5. 6. Jonas omits all that Walafrid has, as now touched upon, and makes no mention of any place or persons visited by Columbanus from the time he left Mentz until he arrived at Bregentz.

(44) Jonas, cap. 26. Fleury was mistaken (L. 37. §. 7.) in placing the scene of this anecdote of the libation of beer, &c. in the district near the lake of Zurich. Walafrid does not mention it, where he exhibits the saint as having been there. The only remarkable fact he relates as having occurred in said district is the burning of some places of idolatrous worship by Gallus, and his throwing the people's oblations into the lake, whereupon they formed a plan to kill him, and flog Columbanus. Mabillon (Annal.

&c. L. x. §. 52) exhibits the beer libation, &c. as having occurred at Bregentz.

§. xi. Just as these holy men had got out of the boat at Bregentz, they went to an oratory or chapel, which had been constructed in honour of St. Aurelia. Having prayed for some time, they formed near it some huts for themselves. There was a temple (45) at Bregentz, in which three images of gilt brass were affixed to the wall, and used to be adored by the people; who, having discarded the service of the holy altar, were wont to say; "these are our ancient gods and protectors." On a day of solemn worship in that temple a great multitude of people had assembled, partly on account of the feast, and partly to see the strangers. Gallus, who could speak the language of the country very well, (46) addressed them by orders of Columbanus, and exhorted them to return to the true God. Then taking the images he broke them in pieces with stones and threw them into the lake. On seeing this some were converted, and, confessing their sins, praised the Lord; while others were enraged at the destruction of the images. Columbanus then called for water, and blessing it sprinkled the temple, and, the usual psalmody in going round being observed, dedicated it a church. He anointed the altar, placed there the reliques of St. Aurelia, (47) and covering it celebrated Mass. At the conclusion of the whole ceremony, the people departed full of joy. A monastery was next erected, and suitable employment was assigned to each of the brethren, some working in a garden, others attending to the care of fruit trees. The particular occupation of Gallus was, it is said, the making of nets and fishing for the use of the community and of strangers coming to visit them. (48) Columbanus, having done so much good for the people about Bregentz, had an idea of going to preach the Gospel to the Venetici or Sclavi, (49) who were still immersed in ignorance ; but in consequence of a vision, which he had, perceived that the time was not yet come for the conversion of that nation.

(45) Fleury (ib.) calls this temple a church, and confounds it with the oratory of St. Aurelia. But, as far as I can understand the text of Walafrid, whence this narrative is taken, it was a pagan temple, or, at least, used as such, when Columbanus arrived at Bregentz. Perhaps it had been once a Christian church, near which stood the oratory. Walafrid seems to hint so much, where he speaks of the holy altar in such a manner as if, although neglected, it were within that temple. Mabillon (ib.) supposed that it had been originally a church dedicated to St. Aurelia, and which was purified by Columbanus. But if so, why, as will be seen lower down, does Walafrid say, that Columbanus placed there the reliques of St. Aurelia? Surely they should have been there already, if Mabillon's opinion be correct.

(46) This will not be wondered at, if it be recollected that, as the learned know, the Frankish tongue, which Gallus had time enough to become master of, when in the Vosges, was not different, except in some shades of dialect, from that spoken in Germany.

(47) Hence we may conjecture, that those reliques had been until then in the oratory.

(48) Walafrid, Vit. S. G. L. 1. cap. 6. Fleury very inadvertently applies to Columbanus what Walafrid here says of Gallus.

(49) Jonas writes ; (cap. 26.) “ Veneticorum, (al. Venetiorum) qui et Sclavi dicuntur.” To understand this, it must be observed that the Sclavi or Slavans, who had during the reign of Justinian made several irruptions into Dalmatia and other Illyrian provinces, (See Procopius De bello Gothico L. III. cap. 29, 38, 40) were settled in Columbanus' time, in some parts of the Venetic or Venetian province. (See Muratori, Scriptor. Rerum Italic. Tom. 1. p. 470, 471.) Venetia extended eastward as far as Histria, or Irtia; and Muratori relates, Annals, &c. that in 600 the Slavonians threatened Salona in Istria, and had begun to enter Italy.

§. XII. Meanwhile Theodebert, king of Austrasia, was very busy in making warlike preparations against his brother Theodoric. The saint, foreseeing what would come to pass, paid him a visit and advised him to embrace the clerical state and submit to ecclesiastical discipline, lest, besides the loss of his kingdom, he might suffer also that of his soul. The king and the courtiers laughing at this proposal, Columbanus said that, if he would not voluntarily become a member of the clerical order, he would in a short time be made one against his will. The war having broken out, Theodebert was defeated first near Toul, and a second time at Tolbiac. During this bloody battle Columbanus happened to be in a solitary place attended only by Chagnoald a member of his community. While reading he fell asleep, and soon after awaking announced to Chagnoald, that a dreadful engagement was at that very time going on between the two kings. Chagnoald requested of him to pray for the success of Theodebert against the common enemy. He answered that this was a foolish and irreligious proposal, not being conformable to the will of God, who has commanded us to pray for our enemies. Theodebert, being pursued, was taken at Cologne, and sent to Brunchild then at Challon sur Saone, who, having first forced him into the clerical order, a few days after ordered him to be put to death. (50) These transactions occurred in the year 612. Columbanus, reflecting on the state of affairs, and wishing to get beyond the reach of Brunchild and Theodoric now become so powerful, lost no time in quitting that country and setting out for Italy, (51) accompanied by the brethren, except Gallus, whom he was obliged to leave behind on account of his being ill of a fever. (52) He arrived at Milan in the same year 612, (53) after having spent about one year at Bregentz, (54) and was received with great kindness by Agilulf king of the Lombards, who gave him leave to settle in whatever part of his dominions he should think fit. While at Milan, Columbanus confuted the Arians by the authority of the Holy scriptures, and wrote a very learned tract against them. (55) Some time after, and according to every appearance in the year 613, (56) he wrote his celebrated letter to Pope Boniface IV. relative to the question of the Three Chapters, which, notwithstanding the decision of the fifth general council, still continued to agitate a considerable portion of the Church. (57) He would probably not have meddled with this question, had he not been requested, nay pressed by Agilulf to apply to the Pope for the purpose of inducing him to put an end to the schism, by which his kingdom was disturbed. (58) Columbanus, addressing him as the most honoured head of churches, the pastor of pastors, &c. (59) Yet, when entering on the subject, writes with great freedom, and is particularly severe against the memory of Pope Vigilius, whom he supposed to have prevaricated from his duty. (60) He tells Boniface that the Irish are orthodox believers, constantly adhering to the faith and apostolic doctrine, which they had received from his predecessors, and that they never had among them any heretics, Jews, or schismatics. (61) He says he had promised that the Roman church would not abet any error, and exhorts the Pope to assemble a council and to remove every pretext for the imputations brought against himself and his see. “For, as I have already said, we are attached to the chair of St. Peter; and, although Rome is great and renowned, yet with us it is great and distinguished only on account of that chair.— Through the two apostles of Christ we are almost celestial, and Rome is the head of the churches of the world.” (62)

(50) Jonas, cap. 27. Henault, Abrege, &c. at Theodebert II.

(51) Jonas, cap. 29. Walafrid (Vit. S. G. L. 1. cap. 7.) assigns as the cause of their departure from Bregentz a peremptory order to that purpose issued by Duke Gunzo, who was made to believe by their pagan enemies that their presence in that country was hurtful to the chace. How that could have been it is not easy to understand; and Walafrid had, I dare say, no better foundation for this than for some other stories of his, which I shall not trouble the reader with.

(52) Walafrid (L. 1. cap. 8.) tells us, that Columbanus imagined that Gallus was not really sick, and that he feigned illness as a pretext for remaining in that country, to which he supposed him to be much attached. He adds that, although Columbanus gave him permission to stay there, he laid an injunction on him not to celebrate mass during his own life time. Yet, says Walafrid, (ib. cap. 25.) he became reconciled to Gallus before his death, and gave orders that his staff should be sent to him as a mark of absolution. Jonas, who is older and much better authority than Walafrid, has not a word about any such misunderstanding. Columbanus was not a man to be easily imposed upon; nor is it at all probable, that he would have suspected so holy and dear a friend of an intention to deceive him. The truth is, if I be not much mistaken, that Columbanus advised Gallus to remain in those parts, whereas he might do so with safety, and by his knowledge of the language and other endowments was well qualified to improve the evangelical harvest, which had so happily commenced. That Gallus was attacked with a fever about the time of their parting, I see no reason for denying; and we may suppose that Columbanus considered it as an indication from God, that Gallus should not follow him.

(53) This is the date assigned by Mabillon, Fleury, &c. as also by Muratori, Annali, D'Italia at A. 612. That it is the true one is evident from this having been the year, in which Theodebert was totally defeated, and in consequence of which Columbanus was forced to make his escape from Bregentz.

(54) We have seen (above §. 9.) that Columbanus left the court of Clotharius in 611, and probably early in that year. Thence reckoning until that part of 612, which followed the campaign so fatal to Theodebert, and allowing some time for the saint's journey to Bregentz, we may infer that his stay in this place was no longer than about one year. Walafrid is evidently wrong (Vit. S. G. L. 1. cap. 6.) in stating, that he spent there three years; and I am surprised that Fleury (L. 37. §. 7.) has copied him without any observation. For, even supposing with Fleury, that Columbanus did not leave the court of Clotharius until 610, (which, however, is not correct) it must have been late in that year, as it was in the course of said year that he was put out of Luxeu, and some not inconsiderable time must have elapsed between that expulsion and his parting with Clotharius. How then could three years be reckoned from that part, or indeed any part, of 610 until the part of 612, in which the saint left Bregentz? Mabillon (Annal. &c. L. x. §. 52.) mentions those three years, but with the addition of an it is said, not meaning to give them as a computation of his own.

(55) Jonas, cap. 29. This, as well as some other works of Columbanus, has been unluckily lost.

(56) This is the year marked by Mabillon, Annal. &c. L. xi. §. 4. Pagi has either 613 or 614. (Critica in Annal. Bar. ad A. 614.) If it was the latter, it will follow that the letter was written early in that year; for Boniface IV. died in May in said year.

(57) It is not my business to enter into a disquisition concerning that great controversy, an account of which may be found in every general ecclesiastical history. I shall merely observe, that the Irish clergy did not trouble themselves about that question, although several very respectable writers, such as Fleury, Pagi, &c. thought otherwise, founding their opinion on a letter of Gregory the great, written in 592, and generally believed to have been directed to the bishops of Ireland. It is marked in the old editions of Gregory's works, as Ep. 36 of the second book of the Register, and with this head; "Gregorius universis episcopis per Hiberniam." In the Benedictine edition it is Ep. 51. ib. and in the head the words, per Hiberniam, are omitted. The editors observe, that they are not genuine, and that, in all probability, this letter was written to the bishops of Histria, who were great sticklers for the Three chapters and opponents of the fifth council. Mabillon also says, (An. Ben. L. xi. §. 4.) that, instead of Hiberniam, we ought to read Histriam. A mere perusal of the letter is sufficient to show, that it was not written to the Irish bishops. The persons addressed in it gloried in the persecution, which they suffered for what they thought righteousness' sake. This agrees very well with the circumstances, in which the Histrian bishops were placed at that time with regard to the proceedings of the court of Constantinople and the Exarchs against them, but cannot apply to the state of Ireland, over which neither the emperors nor their officers had any controul. The Irish kings of that period did not meddle with that dispute, nor is there in any of our ancient documents the least allusion to it, nor much less to a persecution on account of it. Whatever opinion St. Columbanus entertained concerning the Three chapters was formed by him in consequence not of what he had heard or seen in Ireland, but of the ferment, that agitated the north of Italy, relatively to this controversy.

I shall avail myself of this opportunity to caution the reader against supposing, that another letter of the same Pope was written also to the Irish bishops; which, together with that now treated of, Usher has inserted in the Ep. Hib. Sylloge, with this head; “Gregorius Quirino episcopo et cæteris episcopis in Hibernia Catholicis.” This head appears, indeed, in the Roman edition of Gregory’s works, although the Roman correctors of Gratian had remarked, (at De Consecr. Distinct. 4. can. 44.) that the Vatican MS. has not Hibernia but Iberia. It is now universally admitted, that the true reading is Hiberia, or Iberia. (See Ed. Benedicto Registr. Epistol. L. xi. ep. 67.) It is addressed to a bishop Quiricus (sometimes called Quirinus) of Iberia near the Black sea, in answer to his having consulted the Pope concerning the mode to be observed in receiving into the church persons returning from the Nestorian heresy. This alone proves that it was not written to any bishop of Ireland, where no Nestorians were to be found. Quiricus had consigned to a person going to Rome some letters for Gregory, which, however, he did not receive, the bearer having lost them at Jerusalem. Here we have a proof that those letters were not sent from Ireland; for surely no one, proceeding thence to Rome, would have previously gone to the Holy land.

(58) Columbanus writes; “A rege cogos, ut singillatim suggeram tuis piis auribus sui negotium doloris. Dolor namque suus est schisma populi pro regina, pro filio, forte et pro se ipso.” Once or twice more he repeats his having been urged by the king, as if apologizing for troubling the Pope with his letter.

(59) The letter is thus headed; “Pulcherrimo (honoratissimo) omnium totius Europae ecclesiarum capiti, Papae praedulci, prae-celso praesuli, pastorum pastori, &c.

(60) Besides some other harsh expressions, he has; “Vigila, quia forte non bene vigilavit Vigilus, quem caput scandali ipsi clamant.” The assertion of Ledwich (p. 168.) that he charges Boniface himself, whom he ignorantly calls Boniface the third, with heresy, is one of his usual falsehoods.

(61) Nos enim SS. Petri et Pauli et omnium discipulorum divinum canonum Spiritu sancto scribentium discipuli sumus, toti Haberi, ultimi, habitatores mundi, nihil extra Evangelicam et Apostolicam doctrinam recipientes. Nullus haereticus, nullus Judaeus, nullus schismaticus fuit; sed fides Catholica, sicut a vobis primum, sanctorum scilicet Apostolorum successoribus, tradita est, inconcussa tenetur.

(62) Nos enim, ut ante dixi, devincti sumus cathedrae S. Petri; licet enim Roma magna est et vulgata, per istam cathedram tantum apud nos est magna et clara.—Propter Christi geminos apostolos vos prope caelestes estis; et Roma orbis terrorum caput et ecclesiarum.

§. XIII. In the same year 613 Columbanus founded the monastery of Bobbio amidst the Apennines. (63) This place was pointed out for him to the king by one Jocundus, who said that the situation was very convenient for a religious establishment, and that there was an old church there under the name of St. Peter. Thither the saint went with his companions, and immediately set about repairing the church and erecting a monastery; (64) which being completed, he built at some distance an oratory in honour of the Blessed Virgin. (65) Meanwhile his prophecy relative to Clotharius was fulfilled; for that prince, from having been king only of Soissons, became in this year sovereign of the whole French monarchy. (66) Clotharius, observing how exactly what Columbanus had foretold came to pass, wished to see him, and having sent for Eustatius, who then governed Luxeu, requested of him to go in search of Columbanus, and, when he should find him, to induce him to come to his court. He told him that he might take along with him whomsoever he pleased of his nobles as vouchers of the king's good intentions, and that his expenses would be defrayed by the public. Eustasius, complying with the king's wish, undertook the journey in 614, and having found Columbanus, probably at Bobbio, opened to him his commission. The saint was highly rejoiced at seeing his dear disciple, and, detaining him for a few days, gave him some good advices as to the discipline and management of the people entrusted to his care. He desired him to make his apology to Clotharius, and to tell him that it was out of his power to wait upon him, and that he supplicated him to extend his royal protection to the monks of Luxeu. He charged Eustasius with a letter for him, containing some wholesome reproofs as to his conduct, notwithstanding which the king received it with great joy, and, taking Luxeu under his protection, provided it with an annual income, allowing Eustasius to stretch its boundaries as far as he thought proper. From this time out the saint spent the remainder of his life at Bobbio, where he survived by one year the return of Eustasius to France, (67) and died on the 21st of November A. D. 615, (68) having lived to a good old age and somewhat more than 72 years. (69) He was buried at Bobbio, where many miracles have been performed at his tomb, (70) and was succeeded there by Attala.

(63) The situation of Bobbio is too well known to require any observation of mine. Mabillon, (Annal. Ben. L. x. §. 55.) places the foundation of the monastery in 612. It is more probable that it was in 613; for Columbanus' arrival in Italy was rather late in 612, and it is plain that he spent some, not very short time, at Milan, before he repaired to Bobbio. Poor Ledwich (p. 168) makes Columbanus go straight from Luxeu to Bobbio, and attributes his expulsion from the former place to clerical resentment, alluding to his severe letter to Boniface IV. whom this mighty antiquary calls the third. Thus then the Pope is to be charged, instead of Brunchild and Theodoric, with the persecution of Columbanus! Nor was Columbanus sent to Nantes; nor did he go to the courts of Clotharius and Theodebert; nor did he spend any time at Bregentz. But what does Ledwich care about history? No, nor about chronology? The Pope must be abused. His motto is; Perish history and down with Popery! But if the Pope was able to drive Columbanus from France, why did he let him come into Italy so much nearer to him? I am almost ashamed to take notice of this ignorant man's effusions. Yet in this case he is chargeable with something worse than ignorance. For, as he refers to Dupin, whom he had certainly looked into, and who has given a clear sketch of Columbanus' history, he must have known that his own statement as to the cause of the expulsion from Luxeu, &c. was not true. And he must have known, that Columbanus had been expelled from that place three years before he wrote the sharp letter, and before the clerical resentment he talks of could have been excited.

(64) Jonas, cap. 29.

(65) Mabillon, ib.

(66) We have seen that Theodebert of Austrasia was defeated and assassinated in 612. Theodoric, who had conquered him, died the following year at Metz just as he was on the point of waging war against Clotharius, who soon after seized upon the dominions of Theodoric, and put two of his sons to death. A third son made his escape, and another, who was spared, was afterwards forced to become a monk. Brunchild was also put to death by order of Clotharius, who accordingly became possessed of all France in 613. (See Abregé Chronol. at Clotharius II.)

(67) Jonas, cap. 29.

(68) Baronius, Pagi, Mabillon, Muratori, &c. agree that 615 was the year of his death. As to the day some MSS. have, instead of xl. Kal. Decembr. ix. Kal. &c. But Mabillon (Annal. &c. L. xl. §. 17.) and Pagi (Critic. &c. A. 615.) show that the former is the true reading.

(69) It is usually supposed that Columbanus died at the age of 56, in consequence of its being said that he was only 30 years old in the year 589. (See above Not. 8—9. This cannot be reconciled with what Ado has (ap. Mabillon, ib.) viz. that he died in senectute bona. The age of 56 could not be called a good old age. We have, besides, the authority of Columbanus himself to show, that he lived to be really old and beyond the age of 72. He concludes his beautiful poetical epistle to Fedolius with these lines :

Haec tibi dictâram morbus oppressus acerbis,
 Corpore quos fragili patior tristique senecta.
 Nam ðdum praecipiti labuntur tempora cursu,
Nunc ad Olympiadis ter senae venimus annos.
 Omnia praetereunt, fugit irreparabile tempus.
 Vive, vale laetus tristique memento senectae.

Thus, having reached the years of an eighteenth Olympiad, he was then 72 years old, reckoning, according to the correct mode, each Olympiad at 4 years. Mabillon (ib.) seems to think, that Columbanus allowed, as some have done, five years for each, and consequently that he was then 90 years of age. It is strange that he could have entertained this idea, or thought that Columbanus lived to even to 72, whereas he had laid down more than once, that he was no more than thirty in 589. But although Mabillon contradicts himself, the fact is that the saint lived to the age of at least 72, to which it is assigned in the Histoire Litteraire (See below Not. 72.) his writing the Ep. to Fedolius. That Columbanus did not reckon the Olympiad at five years is plain from the very stile of the epistle, which is too full of vigour and classic recollections, particularly Greek, to be supposed the work of a man of ninety. Next we may observe that, if Columbanus lived to complete his ninetieth year, and even admit that he did not exceed it, it will follow that, as he died in 615, he would have been 64 years old in 589 when leaving Ireland. Now who will imagine, that he would have waited until that age to set out on a spiritual expedition, which required great strength both of mind and body? How long he lived after writing the epistle to Fedolius cannot be determined; perhaps about two or three years. Fleming has (Comment. ad Vitam S. C. p. 317. seqq.) some speculations, not worth attending to, concerning the age and distribution of the years of St. Columbanus.

(70) Jonas, cap. 29.

§. XIV. The plan which I have proposed to myself, will not allow me to enlarge on the writings of this great and holy man, such as, besides those already mentioned, his sermons or instructions, poems, &c. They are not difficult of access, (71) and an account of them is still more within the reach of every curious reader. (72) Let it suffice to observe, that, as evidently appears from them, he was gifted with a superior and very elegant genius, and deeply versed not only in every branch of ecclesiastical learning, but likewise in the classical studies, both Latin and Greek. (73) It would be superfluous to adduce proofs of the extraordinary esteem and admiration, in which his memory has been held by the Western church, or to enumerate the great advantages derived to religion and morality from his exertions and example, and from the illustrious school formed by him, which continued for ages to enlighten many parts of Europe, particularly France. (74) I have nothing more to add, than that St. Columbanus, besides the Irish computation of Easter, continued to observe at Luxeu and elsewhere the liturgy, which St. Patrick had introduced into Ireland, and which was retained by his master Comgall of Bangor. (75)

(71) Those, who cannot procure Fleming's Collection, which is become very scarce, may consult the above referred to edition of the Bibliotheca Patrum, A. 1677. Tom. 12. and the later ones. Usher has published some of the saint's tracts, particularly Poems in the Rer. Hib. Sylloge.

(72) An Analysis of Columbanus's works is given by Dupin, (Bibliothèque, &c. and with great accuracy in the Histoire Littéraire de la France, by the Benedictines, Tom. 3. where the reader will find a nice inquiry into also his works that are lost. Harris, (Writers.) has an enumeration of those contained in Fleming's Collection.

(73) His acquaintance with the Latin poets is visible in the letter to Hunaldus, and with the Greek ones in that to Fedolius.

He must have acquired this classical learning before he went abroad, and before his whole time was occupied by governing monasteries, preaching the Gospel, and communicating religious instruction. This is one of the proofs of the attention paid in Ireland to the study of the Belles Lettres, at a time, when they were neglected in many other parts of Europe.

(74) Ordericus Vitalis writes, (Histor. Eccl. L. 8. ad A. 1094.)

“Hic admirandae sanctitatis pater (Columbanus) inter præcipuos laboravit, signis et prodigiis gloriose inter terrigenas effulsit, et Spiritu sancto edoctus monachilem regulam edidit, primusque Gallis tradidit. Florentissimi de schola ejus monachi prodierunt, et in mundo, velut astra in firmamento, virtutibus micuerunt. Eustasius enim Luxoviensis, Agilus Resbacensis, Faro Meldensis, Audomaris Benoniensis, Philibertus Gemmeticencis, aliique plures episcopi et abbates excellentissimæ processere religionis, quorum sanctitas evidentibus miraculis caelitus ostensa est; ipsorumque studio in filiis Ecclesia insigniter propagata est.—In gestis etiam saepe memoratur Audoëni Rothomagensis archiepiscopi, et Noviomensis Eligii, aliorumque virorum, qui ab illo adunati sunt, ac ad pacem virtutum per ejus documenta proveci sunt.” (Bellarmine (De Scriptor. Eccles.) says of Columbanus, that, “ut novus quidam apostolus, Angliam, Gallias, et Italiam mirifice illustravit.” He might have added Germany. The memory of Columbanus is still highly respected in the North of Italy, and to him the beautifully situated town of San Columbano in the territory of Lodi owes its name.

(75) See Usher, p. 971.)

CHAP XIV.

Succession of Aidus or Hugh son of Anmireus, and other Irish monarchs, to the year 665—St. Cairlan archbishop of Armagh—Senach—Setna—St. Fintan surnamed Corach—Senach Garbh—Colman son of Comgell—St. Senell bishop of Maghbile—St. Sillan—St. Colman or Columbar son of Beognai—Colman, surnamed Elo.—Erection of Lann-elo—Linally—Colman son of Dairene—Doire-mor monastery founded by Colman—St. Pulcherius—St. Erin of Ros-nic-treoin—St. Borr or Finbarr bishop of Cork—His real name was Lochan—founds the monastery of Loch-eire—Cathedral of Cork—St. Donnogh, or Modomnoch—St. Domangart—Domangart of Slieve Donard—St. Scutin or Scotin—erects the cell called Teagh-Scothin—St. Berach of Cluain—Cairpthe—The holy virgin Faila—St. Sencha—Osnata, Muadhnata and Talulla, sisters of St. Molaise.—St. Libhan or Libana—St. Schiria—Ethnea, Sodelbia and Cumania, daughters of king Aidus—Corcaria-caoin—St. Derbilta of Irras—St. Inella or Derinella—Difference in keeping the Paschal solemnity—Priests Fechin, Airendan, Failan, Coman, Commian, Colman, Ernan, Cronan and others—Petranus bishop of Lusk—Senach bishop of Armagh—St. Aidan or Modoc bishop of Ferns—First called Aodh—Was born in Inis-Breaghmuigh in the now county Cavan—Several establishments by him—Founds Ferns—Archbishoprick of Leinster annexed to Ferns—Guairé king of Connaught being dangerously ill relieved by the prayers of St. Maidoc—St. Colman of Kilmacduagh—Bishop Loman or Luman—Bishop Murgus—St. Ultun, bishop of Ardbraccan—Ferganus or Virgnous, abbot of Hy—Segeneus abbot of Hy—Mac Laisre bishop of Armagh—Thomian or Thoman, bishop of Armagh—St. Carthagh of Lismore, otherwise called Mochuda—erects the Monastery of Killtullach—And of Raithin or Raithen—Drew up a Rule for Monks—Consecrated bishop—Expelled from Raithen by king Blathmac—Constructed a cell at Ardfinan—Erected Lismore—Dies—St. Cuanna of Kill-chuanna—Mochua son of Mellain—Three Mochoemogs disciples of Carthagh—Gobban, Sraphan and Laseran, sons of Nessainn—Molua Lughayr—Aidan—Fiachna—Finluag—St. Libba or Molibba, probably the first bishop of Glendaloch—Dagan, Mobai and Menoc, three brothers of Molibba—Dispute between the Irish clergy, and those of Rome and the Anglo-Roman clergy on the Paschal festival.

SECT. I.

WHILE Columbanus was absent in the continent, the Irish monarchy fell into the hands of a succession of princes of various branches of the house of Niall. Aidus, or Hugh, son of Anmireus, having been killed early in 599, (1) was succeeded by Aidus, surnamed Slani, son of Diermit Mac Cervail, and Colman Rimhe son of Boetan the first, (2) who reigned jointly for six years. (3) The throne then devolved in 605 to another Aidus, surnamed Uairiohdnach, son of Domnald the first, and grandson of Murchertach Mac-Era. (4) This Aidus, having ruled for seven years, (5) was succeeded in 612 by Malcovus or Moelcova, son of Aidus I. and grandson of Anmireus, who after a reign of about three years was killed fighting against Subhneus (Sweeny) Meann, (6) who became king of all Ireland in 615. Subhneus Meann was son of Fiachna, and grandson of Feradoch brother to Murchertach Mac-Era. Having reigned 13 years, he was killed by Congall Cloen, king of Ulster, and succeeded in 628 by Domnald II., brother to Malcovus above mentioned, who died peaceably in the 14th year of his reign, A. D. 642. (7) Next after him his two nephews, Kellach and Conall, sons of Malcovus, reigned jointly for eight years until Conall was killed in 654 by Diermit son of Aidus Slani; after which Kellach reigned alone until 658. (8) These two brothers were succeeded by two other brothers, sons of Aidus Slani, viz. Diermit now mentioned, called Diermit II. and Blathmac, who reigned together for seven years until they were carried off by the great pestilence in 665. (9) I have followed the reigns of our kings down to this date, because it was during them that the third class of saints flourished, their period being comprized between some time after the reign of Aidus son of Anmireus and the year of the great pestilence. But, prior to entering on the history of the saints named in said class, it is necessary to touch upon that of some distinguished persons, who belonged partly to its times, and partly to those which preceded them.

(1) See Chap. XII. §. 5.

(2) See ib.

(3) O'Flaherty, Ogyg. Part. III. cap. 93. These two kings were killed, Aidus by Conal Guthbin, and Colman by Lochan Dilman. Tr. Th. p. 448.

(4) See Chap. XII. §. 5.

(5) Ogyg. loc-cit.

(6) Ib. and Tr. Th. p. 448. O'Flaherty gives Malcovus the surname of Clericus. Is it for his having been invested with some clerical order? Or merely because he was a pious prince?

(7) Ogyg. ib. Compare with Tr. Th. p. 448. (where, however, the dates as to the vulgar era run different) and with Ware, Antiq. cap. 4. Domnald II. was that son of Aidus I. son of Anmireus, whose prosperity Columbkil had foretold at Drumceat. See Chap. XII. Not. 200.

(8) Ware, ib. Colgan (Tr. Th. ib.) following the 4 Masters agrees with Ware as to Conall having been killed by Diermit before the death of Kellach. O'Flaherty (Ogyg. ib.) differs from them all. According to him Kellach died before Conall, who, he says, reigned four years after him, viz. until 658. This seems very probable; for, as Diermit, who killed Conall, became afterwards king, it may be conjectured that he got possession of the throne immediately after his antagonist, in which case Conall would have been his immediate predecessor. As to our church history, this question is of very little importance.

(9) Ware and O'Flaherty, loc. cit. See also Usher, p. 947.

§. II. St. Cairlan, archbishop of Armagh, having held the see for ten years, died on the 24th of March 588, (10) and was succeeded by Eochaid, son of Diermit, concerning whom it is merely stated, that he also governed said see during about ten years, and died some time in 598. (11) Next after him was Senach, of whom nothing is recorded, except that he died in 610, and was succeeded by Mac-Laisre, of whom more hereafter. We find a Setna bishop of Saigir, contemporary with St. Molua of Clonfertmulloa, (12) and who accordingly lived towards the close of the sixth century. (13) His memory is said, but on weak authority, to have been revered on the 10th March. (14) St. Fintan, surnamed Corach, bishop of Clonfert, is said to have flourished in this period. (15) He had presided over a church at a place called Leamchuill (16) in Leinster, and, according to some accounts, even over the monastery of Clonenagh. (17) It is stated, that he either founded or governed a church also at Cluainmaithchin (18) in Leix. He became afterwards bishop and abbot at Clonfert, (19) and died on a 21st of February, but whether at Clonfert or elsewhere is uncertain. (20) It is said that he was succeeded, at least, as abbot, by Senach Garbh, who died in 621; (21) and, after him by Colman, son of Comgell. (22) According to our Annals a St. Senell, bishop of Maghbile or Moville, died in 603, and a St. Sillan, likewise bishop in the same place, in 619, (23) having been probably the immediate successor of Senell. St. Colman, or as otherwise called Columban son of Beognai and of the race of Sailni (24) became a bishop some time after the death of his friend Columbkil, whom he survived by several years. It cannot be doubted that he was the same as the celebrated Colman surnamed Elo or Ela. (25) He was a native of Meath, but spent many of his earlier years in the diocese of Conor, and, while there, is said to have erected a church and monastery at Muckamore, (26) a place two miles distant from Antrim. Returning to his own country, he found king Aidus son of Anmirech (Anmiraeus) and several other persons assembled, among whom were Columbkil and St. Cannich. This was most probably in the year 590, after Columbkil had gone from Drumceat to visit his monastery of Durrough. It was proposed to the assembly by Columbkil, that a spot of ground should be granted to their relative Colman, (27) where he might establish a monastery. Aidus Fla, or rather Slani, prince of Meath, and afterwards king of Ireland, who was present, said that there was a large forest called Fidh-elo in the district of Fercall in the southern part of his principality, where he might settle if he liked. Colman accepted of the offer, and said; "There shall be my resurrection, and henceforth I shall be named from that place." In fact, he was thence surnamed Elo, and constantly called Colman-elo, latinized into Colmanellus. (28) To the monastery, which he erected there, and which became very famous, was given the name of Land-elo (29) or or Lann-elo, that is, the house or church of Elo, now Linally or Lynally in the King's county. (30) This foundation, according to every appearance, took place in or very soon after the year 590. (31) We find Colman-elo, while still a priest, on a visit to Columbkil at Hy in 597, some short time prior to that saint's death. (32) Afterwards he became a bishop, but in what year or by whom consecrated,

I cannot discover. (33) This saint has enjoyed a great reputation, and died in 610 (34) on the 26th of September, and in the 56th year of his age. (35)

(10) See Chap. XII. §. 1.

(11) Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 293.) has 597, that is, 598. He was not able to mark the day or the month of his death, but observes that several Eochuids are named in the Calendars at different days, and that, if he was one of them, he might be the Eochuid of the 1st of January. This vague conjecture is, I am sure, the only authority, that Ware had (Bishops) for assigning his death to that month.

(12) AA. SS. ad 10 Mart.

(13) Compare with Chap. XII. §. 7.

(14) Colgan treats of Setna or Sedna at 10 March, to which he assigns him for no other reason than that he found in some calendars a Sedonius marked at that day. Yet he was doubtful whether this Sedonius might not have been the disciple of St. Senan, whose history we have touched on, (Not. 35. to Chap. XI.) and who also is treated of at said day by Colgan. See more about Setna of Saigir, Not. 48. ib.

(15) Ware says, (Bishops at Clonfert) "about the end of the sixth century." He borrowed this from Colgan, who speaks rather doubtingly of it at 21 Feb. where he treats of Fintan Corach. Yet the matter is not improbable, if it be true that he was succeeded, either as bishop and abbot, or only as abbot, by Senach Garbh, who, according to the 4 Masters, died in 620 (621). There are, however, some difficulties in the way, of which lower down.

(16) Archdall has it in the Queen's county, where it borders on the barony of Fassaghding, co. Kilkenny.

(17) If this be true, and there are divers authorities for it, Fintan Corach must have lived later than the time mentioned by Ware. For the Fintan, who was abbot of Clonenagh in the latter end of the 6th century, and until 626, was Maeldubh. (See Not. 174 to Chap. XII.) Nor can it be said that perhaps they were not different persons; for, without enlarging on other arguments, it is sufficient to observe, that F. Maeldubh's name is in the calendars at 20 October, while F. Corach's is placed at 21 Feb. If we may suppose, that he was not abbot of Clonenagh but a simple monk there, this difficulty may be got over; but the whole business is so confused and clogged with other difficulties, that I am not able to unravel it.

(18) I strongly suspect, that Cluainaitchin has been mistaken for Cluainedhnech (Clonenagh.) The Calendar of Cashel, which mentions it, has not F. Corach at Clonenagh; and vice versa in most of those, that have Clonenagh, we do not find Cluainaitchin. In this hypothesis the difficulty arising from placing him at Clonenagh will disappear.

(19) Marian Gorman says of him; Episcopus de Cluanferta Brendani. Others speak of him as abbot.

(20) We read of him in the Calendar of Cashel; "Fintanus Corach quiescit in Leamchulit inter Hy-duach et Laighis, vel in Cluainaitchin, vel in Cluainferta Brendani. Dicitur autem Corach, quia peregrinaturus sponsors dedit, se aut vivum aut mortuum reversurum."

(21) See Not. 15.

(22) The only authority I can find for making Fintan Corach predecessor at Clonfert of Senach and Colman is Aengus Kelideus, or rather, I think, (although Colgan is of a different opinion) a later scholiast on Aengus. He does not call them bishops; yet, as Fintan was one, it is probable that so were the two latter, who are omitted by Ware, but mentioned by Harris (at Clonfert.) The 4 Masters quoted by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 247.) place Colman's death in the same year with that of Senach, viz. in 620 (621.) The above mentioned scholiast says that Fintan, Senach, and Colman were three black Doms, tres nigri domini. Colgan (at 21 Feb.) explains these words as an allusion to the Benedictine habit, which, he says, was the only black one used by monks in those days. But he ought to have known that there were no Benedictines then in Ireland, and that the black habit was not prescribed to that order any where at that early period. The first mention of black monks occurs in the deed (ap. Ingulf.) of king Ethelbald for the monastery of Croyland, A. D. 716. If the scholiast meant in that passage the colour of a religious dress, he must have written at a time when such a colour became peculiar to some monks, whether Benedictines or others, in Ireland, perhaps as late as the 11th century, and supposed that the then practice had been also that of the ancients. Perhaps he alluded not to the habit, but to the colour of those persons skins as being of a blackish hue. Nothing was more usual in Ireland than to denominate men from their complexion, and we find in our history heaps of Dubhs, nigri, i. e. swarthy persons, Finns, Whites, fair-complexioned, &c. But the phrase domini, seems to indicate the Benedictine order, the members of which, as also some other monks began, in the middle ages, to be distinguished from those of the mendicant orders by the title Dominus, contracted into Domnus, and changed by the French into Dom, such as ex. c. Dom Mabillon, Dom Montfaucon, &c. And it is very probable, that the Scholiast's intention was to exhibit Fintan, &c. as Benedictines, in which case we may suppose that he was himself of that order.

(23) Annal. 4 Masters, and Colgan, AA. SS. p. 650. Their dates are 602 and 618, the same in fact as our 603 and 619. Concerning those two prelates I can find no further account. Merville has been often mentioned already, particularly in the account of Finnian founder of its monastery.

(24) Adamnan (Vit. S. Col. L. 1. c. 5.) heads the chapter with these words; “ De periculo S. Colmani episcopi Mocusailni;” but in the following text he calls him Columbanus son of Beognai, and mentions the danger he was in of being lost at sea. (See Not. 182. to Chap. XI.) Although Adamnan here calls him a bishop, yet it will be seen, that he was not one until after the death of Columbkil.

(25) Usher, (p. 1065) while he distinguishes Colman-Elo from Colmanel mentioned by Joceline, yet makes him the same as the Colman or Columban of Adamnan.

(26) The oldest writer, that, as far as I know, mentions this foundation of Muckamore, is Joceline, who (cap. 96) introduces St. Patrick as foretelling that Colmanel would there erect a church, &c. and would afterwards be a bishop and legate of all Ireland. Usher (p. 1065.) imagined, that Joceline's Colmanel was the same as Colman of Dromore, and led astray Ware (Antiq. cap. 29. and Bishops at Dromore.) This mistake has been copied into Butler's Lives of Saints (at Colman of Dromore 7th June) and, connected with another mistake of Usher as to Colmanel having been born in 516, has caused great confusion in the history of Colman of Dromore. (See Note 5. and 6. to Chap. ix.) The fact is that Colmanel, al. Colmanalli was no other than Colman-elo, whose memory was famous at Connor, as appears from his Life quoted by Usher, p. 960. Colgan expressly states (Tr. Th. p. 374.) that the person, called in Latin, as ex. c. by Joceline, Colmanellus, is Colman-elo, son of Beognai and the Colman of Adamnan. And what Usher calls the Life of Colman-elo is called by Colgan that of Colmanel. In this Life he is represented as the son of Beognai. He lived also at a later period than Colman of Dromore, who was perhaps dead before Colmanel was born; (See Chap. ix. §. 1.) and Colgan was mistaken (Tr. Th. p. 113.) in making him a disciple of Macnissi the first bishop of Connor, having misunderstood a passage in Colmanel's Life, where, on mention being made of Connor, it is said that the most blessed bishop Macnissi lies there. Strange that he could have supposed Colmanel, who lived, as he well knew, until 610, to have been a scholar of that bishop, whose death, as we have often seen, occurred, at the latest, in 514.

(27) In Colman-elo's Life we read, that Columbkil said to the assembly consisting principally of Nialls; "Date agrum bonum sancto Colmano fratri nostro," &c. Hence it appears, that although of the race of Sailni, he was connected with the Nialls; and in fact he is stated in said Life to have been of the family of Niall.

(28) See Not. 26.

(29) Usher p. 961.

(30) It is the barony of Ballycowen, and 4 miles south of Durrogh.

(31) I have said that the meeting in Meath, before which Colman-elo appeared, seems to have been in 590. It was after Columbkil had been established at Hy; for, as will be seen, Colman-elo was still a boy in 563, the year of that establishment. We know that Columbkil was in Meath in 590, on occasion of his visiting Durrogh, which belonged to the ancient Meath. It is true, that he might have been there also at some other time between 563 and 590. (See Not. 181. to Chap. xi.) But if we consider, that Colman-elo was only about 36 years old in 590, and that he had spent many years in the diocese of Connor before he attended at that assembly, there is every reason to believe, that this was the year in which it was held, and consequently that, or nearly so, of the foundation of Lann-elo.

(32) Adamnan relates, (L. 2. c. 15.) that, when the holy priest Columbanus, son of Beognai, had just set out from Hy on his return to Ireland, Columbkil foretold that they would never see each other again; which was verified by the event, for Columbkil died in that very year. Hence it is clear, that, as above hinted at, (Not. 24.) Colman-elo, al. Columbanus, &c. was not raised to the episcopacy until after Columbkil's death.

(33) Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 374.) most strangely imagined, that Colman-elo was consecrated bishop at Hy, and during the life time of Columbkil. He confounded him with a Columban, who is mentioned in the Life of St. Ita as a bishop in her time, and said to have been consecrated in Hy. But Colman-elo was quite too young to be a bishop before 570, the year in which St. Ita died. Besides, we know from Adamnan, (Not. prec.) that Colman-elo was only a priest when returning from Hy to Ireland. The Columban, spoken of in said Life, was very probably Columbanus Mocu-Loigse, a Leinster bishop, for whom Columbkil had a great regard, and whom he survived. (See Not. 182 to Chap. XI.) Some writers speak of Colman-elo as only an abbot; but from the testimony of Adamnan, and from his having been the bishop Colmanel of Joceline, (See Not. 26.) it must be allowed that he was raised to the episcopal rank. Why the latter has given him the title of Legate of Ireland, it would be useless to inquire. We had no apostolic legates in those days.

(34) Annals of Ulster, Innisfallen, 4 Masters, &c. Usher, (Ind. Chron.) Colgan passim, ex. c. (Tr. Th. p. 374.) I believe with Ware, (Writers, L. 1. cap. 13.) that for the 610 of the Annals we ought to substitute 611.

(35) The 26th of September is the day constantly assigned for his death, and accordingly Usher has (Ind. &c. at 610) vi. Kalend. Octobris. Yet through some mistake we find, in p. 961. Novembris, instead of Octobris. That he died in the 56th year of his age is laid down by the 4 Masters, and Colgan, (Tr. Th. p. 374, and ib. (Ind. Chron.) an assertion, which I find no sufficient reason for contradicting. Deducting from the year 611, we may conclude, that he was born in 555 or 556. Poor Archdall having, (at Muckamore) in spite of Usher and every body else, confounded Colman-elo with Colman of Dromore, tells us (at Lynally) that he was born in 516. And why? Because Usher, erroneously indeed, (See Not. 26) placed in said year the birth of Colman of Dromore.

§. III. Another bishop Colman, commonly called son of Dairene, or, more correctly, Daire (36) flourished in those times, and somewhat later than Colman Elo. He was of the royal blood of the kings of Cashel, (37) and a lineal descendant of the celebrated king Aengus. (38) Of his early transactions I meet with no account; but he was a bishop during the reign of Failbhe Fland, king of Cashel, who ascended the throne in 619, and died in 634. (39) How soon he became distinguished, cannot be ascertained; nor is there any foundation for the assertion of some writers, that he flourished as early as the year 570. (40) Colman resided in a monastery, founded by himself, at Doire-mor (great grove) in the district of Eile, and province of Munster, near the borders of Leinster. (41) Failbhe Fland had on some occasion injured Colman, upon which he applied to St. Pulcherius, who had great influence over the king, to accompany him to the court for the purpose of obtaining redress. (42) When they had represented the case, the king refused to comply with Colman's demand, and spoke in a haughty tone. Pulcherius then said to him: "It does not become you to answer in this manner to a great pontiff, (43) who is most holy in the sight of God, and not inferior to you according to the nobility of this world; for ye are of the same stock." (44) Pulcherius, continuing his discourse reprimanded the king so severely, that, being greatly terrified, he granted what was required of him. It is a misfortune, that, excepting what has been now touched upon, scarcely any thing else, not even as to the year of his death, is come down to us concerning this eminent saint. His festival was kept at Deire-mor on the 20th of May, the anniversary of his heavenly birth. (45) About this period lived, although he was earlier than some of those now treated of, St. Evin, likewise of the royal house of Munster, and called of Ros-mic-treoin, now Old Ross in the county of Wexford, not far from the river Barrow, whom I find titled not only abbot but bishop. (46) He is said, yet on very slight foundation, to have written a Life of St. Patrick. (47) He was contemporary with St. Molua of Clonfert-molua, who paid him a visit at Ros-mic-treoin, where Evin was then abbot, and performed miracles. (48) Although Evin died before Molua, it is probable that he lived until the close of the sixth century. His death, however, was prior to 602, having occurred during the reign of Brandubh, king of Leinster. (49) The day of it was a 22d of December, at which his name appears in several Irish calendars. (50)

(36) See Life of St. Pulcherius, cap. 16, at 11 Mart. The change of Daire into Dairene, or Darene, was probably the cause of the unchronological fable of Colman having been an immediate son of Aengus, king of Cashel, by a Dairne, who is said to have been his wife. (See Not. 95 to Chap. VIII.)

(37) In the said Life (ib.) we read; “Colmanus episcopus de gente regali Mumoniae, id est, Eoganacht, natus est.” By the addition, Eoganacht, the author meant to point out Cashel, near which that territory lay, and which was then the residence of the kings of all Munster, whether of the Eugenic or Dalcassian line.

(38) In many of our old documents he is called son of Aengus. (See AA. SS. p. 174 and 597.) This must be understood of his having been a descendant of his; for how could a man, who, as will be seen, was alive and vigorous after the year 619, have been the immediate son of that king, who was killed in 490? (See Chap. VIII. §. 8.)

(39) Finghin or Finine, king of Cashel, died in 619, and was immediately succeeded by his brother Failbhe Fland. (Law of Tanistry, &c. in Vallancey's Collectan. Vol. 1.) Colgan says, (AA. SS. p. 597.) that the Irish Annals place Failbhe's death in 633 (634). Hence it appears how much mistaken O'Halloran was (History, &c. B. VIII. Chap. 4.) in assigning the accession of Failbhe Fland to A. D. 546. According to another account his reign did not begin even as early as 619; for it is said that he died in the eighth year of it. (AA. SS. p. p. 561.) Add that he was the fourth in descent from Aengus. See the pedigree of M'Carthy-mor (Eugenian line) at the end of Keating's History, &c.

(40) This date was started by Usher (Ind. Chron.) on mere conjecture. Had he known at what period Failbhe Fland reigned, whose name he met with more than once in the Life of Pulcherius, or, as he quotes it, (p. 960.) Mocoemog, he would have given us a different one. He has been copied by others, such as Archdall, (at Kilcolman) &c. Even Colgan, though acquainted with the times of this king, implicitly quotes Usher's words without any observation, (AA. SS. p. 193.) and, with a still more extraordinary anachronism, makes Colman a disciple of St. Patrick, (Tr. Th. p. 260.)

(41) "Ipse enim (Colmanus) erat in suo monasterio, quod Scotice dicitur Doire-mor, id est nemus magnum; et est positum in confinio Mumuniensium et Lageniensium; sed tamen positum est in regione Mumuniensium, in regione scilicet Eile." Life of Pulcherius, cap. 16. The district of Eile, or Ely O'Carrol, is now comprized in the King's county, and Doire-mor is called Kilcolman, a place in the barony of Ballybrit, and diocese not of Meath, as Archdall says, but of Killaloe. Harris (Monast.) confounds Doire-mor with Lynally, although several miles distant from each other, as if the Colman we are now treating of were the same as Colman-elo, whom he makes no mention of.

(42) It is thus that the cause of Pulcherius having accompanied Colman seems to be hinted at in the Life of the former. But it is very probable, that the true and only cause was, that Colman being a bishop, required of Pulcherius to attend him as a companion. Colman could not have been shy as to calling on the king, being very nearly related to him through their common ancestor Aengus.

(43) Summo pontifici. Elsewhere also in said Life this title is given to Colman on account of his great sanctity.

(44) Said Life, cap. 22.

(45) AA. SS. p. 597.

(46) Ib. p. 215. Yet he is usually called only abbot. In the Life of St. Corbmac, (at 26 March) who was of the royal blood of Munster, of the Eugenic line, Evin, al. Emhin, is stated to have been a brother of his. Having left his own country, he went to the neighbourhood of the Barrow and erected, according to said Life, a monastery at Rosmictreoin, which, from the number of Munster men, who followed him thither, was called also Ros-glas-na-Muimneach. According to other accounts this monastery was founded by St. Abban, but afterwards governed by Evin. Had we no other authority for this position than the fabulous Life of Abban, in which it occurs, (see below Chap. xvii. §. 4.) it might be set aside; but we find it also in the Life of St. Molua of Clonfert-molua. It may, however, be suspected, that it slipped into this Life from that of Abban. As the matter is of little consequence, I shall not enter into a dispute about it. That Rosmictreoin was the same place as what is now called Old Ross is clear from its being described as in South Leinster, and near the boundaries of that province. (See AA. SS. p. 623, and 751.) It is said (ib.) that it was called also Ros-glas, as indeed the appellation Ros-glas-na-Muimneach indicates. But it must not be confounded with another Ros-glas in rather a northern part of Leinster, which is the place now called Monasterevan. (See below Chap. xxix. §. 14. and ib. Not. 89.)

(47) Joceline, (cap. 186.) attributes such a work to St. Evin. But, as there were other saints of that name, and in later times, it is uncertain which of them was the author of it. (See more, Chap. iii. §. 5.) To one of the late ones must be ascribed some Lives of saints, such as of Comgall, &c. said to have been written by a St. Evin. (See AA. SS. p. 192-215.)

(48) Life of Molua. See also Tr. Th. p. 170.

(49) Colgan (Tr. Th. ib.) refers to the Life of St. Evin for this statement, and observes, from the 4 Masters, that Brandubh died in 601 (602).

(50) AA. SS. p. 215.

§. iv. St. Barr, or Finbarr, commonly called of Cork, is usually supposed to have been distinguished, and raised to the episcopacy about the beginning of the 7th century. (51) This is not improbable, if it be true that he was contemporary with St. Maidoc of Ferns, and had been acquainted with St. David of Menevia in Wales. He was a native of Connaught, of the sept of Hy-Briuin ratha; (52) and his real name was Lochan, so that Finn-larr, (white-haired) contracted into Barr, must be considered only as his surname. Barr is said to have been taught in Leinster by one Mac-corb, who is pretended to have been at Rome and to have there heard the instructions of Pope Gregory the great. (53) If this be admitted, it will follow, that Barr must have been too young about the year 600 to be then a bishop, and that he did not begin to be distinguished until several years later. (54) But, although I find no reason for denying, that Mac-corb was the master of Barr, yet we are not bound to believe that he had been a disciple or hearer of Pope Gregory, whose name has, owing to its celebrity, been more than once introduced into the Lives of some of our saints without any foundation. (55) Barr is said to have gone in company with St. Maidoc to Britain, and even to Rome, accompanied by St. David. (56) Passing over this Roman expedition, (57) it is probable that Barr spent some time with St. David, who lived until late in the sixth century, (58) and that about the beginning of the next he founded his monastery near Loch-eire (59) on ground granted to him by a nobleman of the name of Edo, and lying at the South side of the river Lee. (60) It is said, that a multitude of persons flocked to this monastery for instruction, and that the afflux was so great, that said place was changed into a large city. (61) This, however, must be understood as having taken place gradually, and after a long lapse of time. (62) And as to the number of St. Barr's disciples, there is no doubt of its having been greatly exaggerated. (63) Another part of this pompous narrative is his having erected the cathedral of Cork, (64) as if it were different from the church belonging to the monastery. Barr became certainly a bishop, as many other abbots did; but the accounts of his successors as bishops are very imperfect until a long time after his death. (65) After an episcopacy of 17 years, (66) he died on a 25th of September it is said, at Cloyne, (67) but was buried at Cork. The year of his death is not known; perhaps it was about A. D. 623. (68) Several eminent disciples of this saint are spoken of; but Nesson is the only one among them, whose history is sufficiently clear, and of whose right to that title no doubt can be entertained. (69)

(51) Ware, Antiq. cap. 29. At Bishops he does not mention the time of Barr's being a bishop; but Harris has inserted into his text the beginning of the seventh century.

(52) The district of Hy-Briuin-ratha was a few miles to the East and N. E. of the now town of Galway, and comprized the present barony of Athenry. (See Oxygia, p. 376. and Harris, Antiq. chap. 7.)

(53) Life of Barr, cap. 15.

(54) Upon the supposition of Mac-corb having heard Pope Gregory, Usher (Ind. Chron.) brings down the time of St. Barr's flourishing until 630. Colgan (AA. SS. p. 607.) strove to patch up the business, by stating, that Mac-corb had been an auditor of Gregory before he was made Pope. Harris, following Usher, adds, to his making Barr a bishop in the beginning of the 7th century, Flor. circ. 630.. Bravo!

(55) See Not. 125 to Chap. xi. and 94 to Chap. xii. Yet there may be some truth in what is said about Maccorb's having come from Rome to Ireland. In a Life of St. Senan it is stated, that in his time, yet many years before that of Gregory, 50 Roman monks arrived in Ireland. (See Chap. x. §. 1.) Some of these monks are there said to have been fixed in the establishment of St. Barr of Cork. This is indeed an anachronism; for Barr could have had no establishment at that early period. But Barr's master might have been one of those Roman or rather continental monks. (See ib. Not. 8.) And, instead of supposing that any of them were entrusted to his care, it may be conjectured, that one of them was his master. It may be objected, that Mac-corb appears to be an Irish name. He might, however, have got this name in Ireland, by giving a Galic turn to his real name, as was often done; ex. c. Phadruig for Patricius, Seachlain for Secundinus, &c. Hanmer (Chronicle, &c. p. 108 New. Ed.) from a Life of Barr says, that his master was a bishop Torperus a disciple of Gregory. If supposed to have been the son of a man called Corbus or Corvus, the Irish might have called him Mac-corb. But the whole matter is so obscure, that it is useless to enlarge on it. It is better worth remarking that, as Hanmer says, Barr was a child when Brendan of Clonfert was old, that is, about 570.

(56) Life of Barr, cap. 28, and AA. SS. p. 221.

(57) In the Life of St. David (cap. 18.) Barr is mentioned, not as having travelled with him to Rome, but as paying him a visit on his return thence. Many a Roman journey of this kind, that never took place, is spoken of in the lives of our saints of those times. This visit of Barr to St. David is that, to which Giraldus Cambrensis alludes (See Usher, p. 953.) in his Life of David, where he calls Barr Barrocos.

(58) See Chap. ix. §. 9.

(59) In Barr's Life we read; (cap. 20.) "S. Barrius venit ad lacum, qui Scotice Loch-eire dicitur, juxta quem construxit monasterium," &c. This lake, or rather marsh, was, in all appearance, in the hollow part of the now city of Cork. That this spot was formerly a marsh is universally admitted, and the Irish name of Cork, Corcach, is alone a sufficient proof it. I may here observe, that Smith (History of Cork. v. 1, p. 368.) was strangely mistaken in making this Corcach and Corcach-Bascoin the same; for the latter was a district of the now county of Clare. (See Chap. ix. §. 4.) Bascoin or Baschin was added to its name, to distinguish it from several other places called Corcach.

(60) Hanmer, loc. cit.

(61) Barr's Life, cap. 20.

(62) Smith (ib. p. 369.) says that, according to the received opinion, Cork was founded by the Danes. Yet it must be admitted, that, as usual, a village arose near Barr's monastery, situated in a part of the present city, and which gradually swelled into a town of note even before the arrival of that nation.

(63) The school of St. Barr, or of his monastery, is little spoken of in our more ancient documents, and it is only in the the tract, called his Life, that we find any pompous account of it. This tract was evidently written at a late period, and a time when Cork, which indeed owed its origin to the monastery, had risen to the rank of a respectable city. We have already seen, (Chap. XII. §. 4.) that St. Fachnan of Ross-carberry (Rosailithri) has, without any foundation, been reckoned among his disciples, and (ib. §. 8.) corrected the mistake of those, who have ranked in the same class St. Colman of Cloyne.

(64) It is thus that Ware expresses himself, (Antiq. cap. 29.) but (at Bishops) he makes no mention of a cathedral.

(65) Ware (Bishops) reckons Nessian, and some others after him, (but so late as the eighth century) as successors of Barr in the see of Cork. Nessian was not a bishop, as appears from the account given of him by Colgan, who treats of him at 17 Mart. and calls him a priest. Smith, having confounded Nessian of Cork with Nessian of Mungret, who died in 552. (See Chap. XI. §. 6.) found himself (History, &c. v. 1. p. 369.) puzzled as to the period, in which Barr his master lived. But had he looked with more care than he did into the AA. SS. he would have found, that these two Nessans are accurately distinguished by Colgan. (17 Mart. p. 629.) Nessian of Cork, although a disciple of Barr, and revered at Cork; where he was buried, does not seem to have been abbot of the monastery. A Russin son of Lappain is called Comorban of Barr, that is, successor, in the Life of St. Molagga at 20 Jan. Hence Colgan (ib. p. 150.) and after him Harris conclude, that he was bishop of Cork. But the title, Comorban, is not alone sufficient to prove it; for the successors of abbots, as well as of bishops, were distinguished by that epithet, and Russin might have been so called as being a successor of Barr merely in the government of the monastery. The 4 Masters, who are usually careful to mark the episcopal rank of persons whenever they met with it, call Russin only abbot of Cork, who, according to them, died A. D. 685 (686.) Yet from other circumstances it appears quite certain that he was also a bishop. This, however, does not prove, that every abbot of Barr's monastery was likewise raised to that rank. Having touched upon this subject, I may be allowed to make an observation on a fable, to be met with in some late writers, of there having been at one time (about A. 800) seven hundred monks and 17 bishops in that monastery. This story is founded on a misrepresentation of a passage of the Litanies of Aengus Kelideus, in which he invokes the assistance of the 17 bishops and 700 servants of God, who (i. e. whose remains) lie at Cork with St. Barr and St. Nessan. (See AA. SS. p. 630.) This mention of 17 bishops is very favourable to the opinion of there having been a regular succession of prelates there after St. Barr; but we have no certainty, that they were all bishops of Cork, properly speaking; for it was quite usual in Ireland to raise pious monks to the episcopacy without giving them fixed sees. Add that the chorepiscopi, of whom we had great numbers, were styled bishops, and that perhaps no small part of those seventeen belonged to that class.

(66) Some say seven years. (See Ware, Antiq. cap. 29 and Harris at Cork.)

(67) Hanmer says that he had gone to visit Calangus abbot of Cloane (Cloyne), and there met with his death.

(68) Archdall (at Cork) refers to a MS. of Conry for the foundation of the monastery in 606, a date, which agrees very well with the most credible account of the time, in which Barr was distinguished. If we suppose, as is highly probable, that, when founding it, he was a bishop, and add the 17 years of his incumbency, his death may be assigned to 623.

(69) See Not. 65. The names of the other distinguished persons, said to have been disciples of Barr, may be seen in AA. SS. p. 630 and 750. In the passage there quoted from Barr's Life it is stated, that all of them, and others likewise who are not named, established monasteries in divers places, and dedicated them and themselves to St. Barr and his successors. The writer's meaning was, that these new monasteries were or had been subordinate to that of Cork. This is an assertion, for which there should be better authority than his, at least with regard to the whole of them. Thus, in his partiality for the house of Cork, of which he was most probably a member, he reckons among those disciples St. Facundus or Fachnan of Ros-alithri, although it is certain that this saint was prior to Barr. (See Chap. XII. §. 4.) He has in that list a St. Garbhan or Garvan, of whom Colgan treats at 26 Mart. (p. 750.) where he makes him the same as a Garbhan of Achadh-Garbhan, whose name occurs at that day in the calendars. Colgan threw out a conjecture, that Achad-Garbhan was perhaps the place now called Dungarvan. Following this conjecture, Harris (Monast.) considers them as one and the same place, and Archdall lays it down as a fact that Garbhan, a disciple of Barr, founded an abbey at Dungarvan, although he could not discover any vestige of it. The conjecture itself is very weak. Achadh and Dun have quite different meanings; the one signifies a field, and the other a fort; and the town of Dungarvan, in all probability, owes its name not to a monk but to a chieftain. Some of the monasteries ascribed to the so called disciples of Barr might have been colonies from that of Cork, established from time to time at various periods after his death.

§. v. It now remains to touch upon the history of some other distinguished persons, not bishops, who are mentioned as ornaments of the Irish church in the latter part of the sixth century. St. Domnoch, or Modomnoch, (70) a disciple of St. David, was of the princely house of the Nialls, son of Saranus, and fourth in descent from Eugene, one of the sons of Neill Neigilliach. Scarcely any thing is recorded of the earlier part of his life, except that, when returning to his own country, after he had completed his studies in Wales, he brought with him swarms of bees, which, it has been strangely said, were the first seen in Ireland. (71) He settled at a place, called Tiprad-Fachtna in Ossory near the river Suir (now Tibrach, co. Kilkenny), where his memory was revered on the 13th of February, whether as the anniversary of his death or not, is uncertain. As to the year, in which he died, no account remains; nor does it appear whether his establishment at Tibrach was a monastery or simply a church. A St. Domangart, whose name occurs in one of our hagiologies, is said to have been a brother of his. (72) He must not be confounded with another St. Domangart, once very celebrated, from whom is derived the name of Slieve Donard (the mountain of Domangart) in the county of Down, at the foot of which he is said to have erected a great monastery. (73) At what time this Domangart of Slieve-Donard lived cannot be ascertained, and his history is very obscure. That he was not a disciple of St. Patrick is plain from the very statement of those, who pretend that he was; (74) and according to other accounts he must have lived after the period we are now treating of. (75) My making mention of him in this place is owing merely to my having met with the name of a St. Domangart in these times, and it will be sufficient to add, that I find him called bishop, (76) and that his festival was kept on the 24th of March in two churches at Slieve Donard. (77)

(70) I need scarcely apprise the reader, that Modomnoch means my Domnoch. This saint is called Modomnoch in the Life of St. David published by Colgan. In the one written by Giraldus Cambrensis the name has been corrupted into Mandabnaucus, as Usher has it. (p. 953.) Giraldus elsewhere (Topogr. Hib. Dist. 1. c. 5.) latinizes it into Dominicus, in consequence of which Usher was led astray so as to think that Dominicus Ossoriensis, as Giraldus calls him, was a different person from Mandabnaucus. Colgan has (at 13 Feb.) such Acts of Domnoch as he was able to collect.

(71) This curious anecdote is mentioned not only in the Lives of St. David just referred to, but likewise in the passage of Giraldus's Topogr. &c. there marked, and, what seems of more weight, in the Calendar of Cashel and in the Life of St. Molagga (See AA. SS. p. 327.) Solinus had said, that in his time there were no bees in Ireland. It is more than probable that he was mistaken in this point, as he certainly was in what he adds concerning the scarcity of birds. I suspect that this importation of bees by St. Domnoch is a story made up to account for the scarcity of them at Menevia; for Giraldus (Life of David) says, that they continued to fall off there from the time of the swarms having followed Domnoch to Ireland, and he tells us (as stated also in the other Life) that Domnoch was, when with St. David at Menevia, charged with the care of the bee-hives. Now, as it happened that the number of bees in that district began to decrease, some wiseacre undertook to explain this phenomenon by saying, that they accompanied Domnoch on his return to Ireland. This story made its way over to us before the times of Giraldus, and, connected with what Solinus and others after him had said concerning there having been no bees in Ireland, induced some Irish writers of the 9th and 10th centuries to attribute the introduction of them to St. Domnoch. That there were bees in this country long before his time appears from the Rule of St. Ailbe of Emly, in which it is ordered, (Num. 37.) that a portion of honeycomb should be allowed the monks at their meals. (AA. SS. p. 328.) St. Patrick in his Confession makes mention of wild honey, apparently as a substance well known in Ireland.

(72) AA. SS. p. 326.

(73) This mountain hangs over the sea, and was anciently called Slieve Slainge from a hero of that name. Two churches, dedicated in the name of St. Domgard, existed there as late as Colgan's time, one at the foot of it in a place formerly called Rath-murbhuilg, afterwards Machaire-ratha; and the other on the top of the mountain, which was much frequented by pilgrims. (See Acts of Domangard at 24 Mart.) Giraldus Cambrensis, calling Domangard Dominick, thus writes; (Topogr. Dist. 3. c. 2.) "Mons altissimus, qui illi imminet mari, quod Hiberniam interfluit atque Britanniam, Salanga nominatur; cujus ad radices quia longis post temporibus S. Dominicus nobile monasterium construxerat, mons S. Dominici jam usitatus nomen habet." Usher, thinking that this S. Dominick was the same as Dominick of Ossory mentioned elsewhere by Giraldus, (See Not. 70) and not being acquainted with the history of St. Domangard, fell into a huge mistake (p. 954.) with regard to the situation of mount Slainge or Salanga, making it the same as the sacred promontory of Ptolemy, now Grenore point in the county of Wexford. The addition of Ossoriensis by Giraldus to the name of one of those Dominicks, as he called them, shows that he did not confound them together. Usher has led astray, or, at least puzzled Ware (Ant. cap. 10. al. 6. at Hieron) on this point. Archdall (at Carnsore) follows Usher implicitly, and makes the matter worse in various ways. He has St. Domangart of Ossory; while the saint of Ossory was Domnoch, whom Usher, following Giraldus, calls Dominick. Then, instead of Grenore, meant by Usher, and, as Ware has it, he places, with Harris, the sacred promontory at Carnsore, and, what was never before heard of, brings, of himself, Slieve Domangard to Carnsore point, as if it were not known to be the same as Slieve Donard, which he himself has, (at Co. Down) where he says, that St. Domangard there founded a monastery. This slovenly bungling has been followed in part by Seward (Topography, &c. at Carnsore point) who, however, is correct on this subject at Sliebh-Donard.

(74) Domangart is said to have been son of Euchodius, who was king of Ulster in the latter end of the 5th century, and during part of the sixth. In the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick (L. 3. c. 63. seqq.) he is represented as a tyrant and persecutor of the Christians. The birth of Domangart is placed a short time before the foundation of Armagh, and it is added that he afterwards became a disciple of our apostle. Now we have seen that St. Patrick did not survive the foundation of Armagh more than about ten years. How then could Domangart have been a disciple of his? Then we are given to understand, that Domangart was not born until after his father's death, which the 4 Masters assign to A. D. 503 (504). (See AA. SS. p. 743.) This sets aside the whole story; for St. Patrick was dead many years before this date. Jocelin, who (cap. 130.) follows the Tripartite as to Euchodius, Domangart, &c. omits what is said of the latter having been a disciple of St. Patrick. There is a fable concerning Domangart having been raised from the dead at Rome by St. Patrick, according to which he should have lived in the beginning of the 5th century. Such contradictory stories show, what little reliance can be placed on the accounts given of this saint.

(75) In some genealogical documents Domangart is stated to have been a maternal brother of St. Mura of Fahan, who lived at the earliest in the 7th century. Colgan not only allows it but maintains it; and yet he would have us believe, that Domnagart was in the times of St. Patrick.

(76) This title is given to him in the Martyrol. Tamlaet. and in a prayer, in which occurs the fable of his having been again brought to life by St. Patrick. It does not appear in some calendars, which mention his name, nor in the Tripartite or Joceline. There is reason to suspect, that he was no more than a hermit, who led a solitary life on the top of Slieve Donard, and that the monastery at its base was erected not by him but by others in commemoration of his memory.

(77) See Not. 73. Archdall, who treats of Domangart in two places (Slieve Donard and Carnsore) assigns in both of them his festival to the 4th of March, and refers to Colgan, who, on the contrary, has, all through, the 24th, at which day his Acts are given. As to the time of his death, the Tripartite and Joceline (loc. cit. Not. 74.) inform us, that nothing was known about it. Hence it is clear, that there is no foundation for what some have said of his having died in 506.

§. VI. St. Scutin or Scothin belonged to this period, if, as is generally supposed, he also had been at the school of St. David in Wales. He was of an illustrious family, and is said to have been related to St. Ailbe of Emly. (78) On his return to Ireland he constructed a cell for himself near Sliebh Mairge, or mount Mairge, in the now barony of Slewargy, Queen's county. This cell, which seems to have been a solitary habitation, (79) has been called Teach Scothin, and a church was erected there probably by himself. After a very edifying life spent in the practice of great austerities, he died on a 2d of January; but in what year is not known. In these times was also St. Berach (80) abbot of Cluain-Cairpthe in the now county of Roscommon. His father was Nemnald a descendant of Brian, formerly prince of Connaught and brother to Neill Neigiliach, (81) his mother was Finmaith, sister of a celebrated priest called Froech. (82) Berach was born at a place called Gortnalua, belonging to Froech, near Cluan in the territory of Conmacnie, (83) and, when only seven years old, was sent to the school of St. Dagaëus of Iniscaoin in the now county of Louth. (84) Having there distinguished himself by his piety and learning he removed to Glendaloch, where he placed himself under the direction of St. Coemgen, and embraced the monastic state. (85) It has been thought, that he spent some time with Columbkil in Hy. (86) Be this as it may, Berach formed an establishment for himself at Cluain-cairpthe in the desert of Kinel-dobhtha. (87) As to a cell attributed to him at a place called Disert Beraigh (Berach's desert) alias Dubberaith in Bregia, (E Meath) it is useless to inquire. The year of his death is unknown; (88) but the day of it was a 15th of February. (89) Some other holy men are mentioned by certain writers as having flourished in the latter half of the sixth century; but either the authority for their having belonged to this period is so defective, or their transactions so obscure, that I shall not trouble the reader or myself with endeavouring to unravel their history. (90) We shall meet with others, who began their career in these times; but, as they were distinguished principally in the seventh century, their history must be deferred for a while.

(78) According to some accounts Scutin and Ailbe were first cousins. This is a palpable anachronism, whereas Ailbe died very old long before Scutin could have gone to the school of St. David. Yet Colgan, with his usual composure, has swallowed it, at Jan. 2. where he has what he calls the Acts of St. Scutin.

(79) It does not appear that Schotin collected a religious community.

(80) Colgan has published (at 15 Feb.) two lives of this saint. The first is from a MS. of the Island of all saints in Loughree, and was most probably written by Magraidin. It abounds in fables. The second is from an Irish MS. and, though short, is fabulous enough.

(81) AA. SS. p. 346.

(82) Cruimther Froech, al. Fraech, that is, priest Froech, founded a monastery, once very famous at Cluan in the district of Muinte-eoluis in the now county of Leitrim (AA. SS. ib.) The place is now called Cloon in the barony of Mohill. He lived in the 6th century and died on a 20th of December, the day on which his memory was revered at Cloon.

(83) Second Life, cap. 2. It cannot be doubted, that the Cluan here mentioned was the same as that of the preceding Note. The author's placing it in Conmacnie does not contradict what Colgan says of Muinte-eoluis. For Conmacnie was a territory that comprized several districts; (See Not. 135 to Chap. x.) and one of the Conmacnies was in Leitrim. (Harris, Ant. cap. 7.)

(84) See Chap. x. § 14.

(85) First Life, cap. 6.

(86) Adamnan (L. 1. c. 19.) makes mention of a monk, Berachus, as sailing from Hy to the island of Ethica, after having received St. Columba's benediction. Colgan (not. ad loc.) thinks it very probable that he was the Berach that we are now treating of. It is, however, to be observed, that in neither of his Lives does any thing occur, not even the names of St. Columba, to indicate that he was at any time a member of the community of Hy.

(87) Archdall calls Cluain-cairpthe Clooncraft, and places it in the barony of Athlone. This is a mistake; for Dr. Beaufort, a very good authority on those subjects (Memoir of a Map of Ireland), (Topogr. &c.) has it, under the name of Cloncraft, in that of Roscommon. Archdall says, or seems to say, that this monastery had been founded by St. Patrick, for which he refers to King (MS.) in whose papers I have not been able to find it. Then he adds that the founder died in 580 or 600. Did he mean St. Patrick! Yet, to do him justice, I believe that Patrick is an erratum for Berach. He ought, however, to have given us a table of errata.

(88) Archdall says, that the founder of Cluain-cairpthe, meaning Berach, died in 580 or 600, and refers to Colgan, who has no such thing. All that Colgan states, and that in Ind. Chron. to AA. SS. is, that Berach flourished in 580. As to A. 600, he is silent, and, on the contrary, expressly says (ib. p. 347.) that the year of Berach's death is uncertain.

(89) Berach's name is marked also at this day in some foreign calendars, and with the title bishop. This is a mistake; for neither in his Lives, nor in the Irish calendars, does he appear as more than an abbot.

(90) For instance, Colgan (AA. SS. p. 253.) makes mention of an abbot Modan of Kilmodan in the now county of Longford, who is also called bishop of a place in that vicinity called Carnfurbhuidhe. This is all that he could, with any degree of certainty, say about him. He adds, that Modan flourished in 561, on the authority of an Irish Life of Columbkil, in which he had read, that this saint was in Modan's monastery at the time of the battle of Culdremne, which is known to have been fought in that year. O'Donnell (Life of Columba, L. 2. c. 6.) tells us, that the saint, when on his way to set out for Hy, and accordingly two years after the battle, stopped on the approach of night, at Kill-mudain (al. Kilmodan) and was very badly received by one Mudan, who treated him with great contempt. He does not say, that Mudan was an abbot; but, if he was, he is exhibited as, at least at that time, an unworthy one. Some other stories are added, such as that Mudan's habitation, or part of it, was on the next day consumed by fire, and that Kill-mudain was to become a receptacle of wild beasts. On the whole it is clear, that we have no sufficient authority for Modan's having been contemporary with Columbkil, or having lived in the sixth century. It is probable that, as Kilmodan at some time or other became a waste, one of our poets took it into his head to attribute its destruction to the wrath of Columbkil. Archdall has changed the name of Kilmodan into Moydoe, and, in his usual incorrect manner, instead of Colgan's A. 561, has A. 591. Then he says that Erclac, a disciple of St. Patrick, was a presbyter of Kilmodan. Had he looked more attentively into the Tr. Th. he would have found that the place, called (p. 267) Kilmudain or Kilmodan, was not the one now under discussion, but quite distinct from it, and more properly called Rath-mudain, situated in the diocese of Connor, where Erclac is said to have presided over a church. (See ib. p. 182. Not. 197.)

§. VII. Nor was the period, now treated of, deficient in female saints. The holy virgin St. Faila, alias Foila or Foilenna, whose memory was revered at Kill-faile in the diocese of Kilmacduach, was of the illustrious house of the Hy-fiachra of Connaught, (91) and daughter of Aidus, or Hugh, a great grandson of Dathy, once king of Ireland. (92) Three brothers of hers (93) are reckoned among the Irish saints. St. Faila's reputation was very great, as appears from the church of Kill-faile, called from her name, having been for centuries resorted to by multitudes of pilgrims. It is not known in what year she died ; but her festival was kept on the 3d of March. A St. Sincha died in 597. (94) Three sisters of St. Molaisse of Devenish, Osnata, Muadh-nata, and Talulla, are mentioned in the calendars at 6 January. (95) Osnata is called the virgin of Gleann-Dallain, a place either in Breffny or Carbury. (96) Muadh-nata was revered at Caille likewise in Carbury ; and Talulla at Kildare, where she was abbess about, it is said, the year 590. (97) A joint festival of these three holy sisters was kept at Enach-ard, (98) probably the place now called Annagh in the county of Leitrim and barony of Drumahare. (99) St. Libhan, or Libana, whose name occurs at 18 December, was celebrated in Ulster. She was of princely extraction, and had as her director St. Comgall of Bangor. (100) St. Schiria, from whom the church of Killskire or Killkire in Meath (barony of Kells) has got its name, and a sister of hers, Corcaria Caoin, are said to have belonged to these times. (101) Schiria was venerated at Killskire on the 24th of March, while Corcaria's name is not to be met with in the calendars. (102) The holy virgins, daughters of Aidus king of Leinster, and grand-daughters of king Corpreus, (103) who died in 547, lived also in these times. They are called by some writers, Ethnea, Sodelbia, and Cumania. Others make mention of only the two former, and calling them the daughters of Baithe, whose memory was revered in a church, near Swords, named of the cell of the daughters of Baithe. Yet by whatever names the daughters of Aidus were known, it is certain that they were distinguished by their piety and lived in a nunnery. (104) Some other holy nuns are spoken of, such as a St. Derbilias of Irras, the seven daughters of Fergus, who were revered on the 24th of May at Teagh-na-ninghean, somewhere in Connaught, St. Inella or perhaps, Derinella, &c. (105) But whether they lived during this period or at another cannot be ascertained; nor do I find any account whatsoever of their transactions.

(91) One branch of this family resided in the part of North Connaught, called Tir-fiachra, now Tyr-eragh, co. Sligo; and another, to which St. Faila belonged, in South Connaught. They were called Hy-fiachra from their progenitor Fiachra a brother of Neill Neigilliach.

(92) Dathy was the immediate predecessor of Leogaire. (Not. 42. to Chap. v.) Colgan in one place, (AA. SS. p. 456) tracing the genealogy of Aidus, the father of Faila, seems to exhibit him as grandson to Dathy, owing to an omission, in the printed text, of another Aidus, who was his father. For elsewhere (ib. p. 381.) the genealogy runs thus; Aidus son of another Aidus, the son of Lugad, the son of Dathy, the son of Fiachra.

(93) Their names are Colgeus, or Colga, Aidus, and Sorar. (AA. SS. p. 381. and 456) Colgeus is mentioned by Adamnan, (L. 1. c. 17.) who calls him Colgius the son of Aidus Draigniche of the race of Fiechrach. He governed a church, and perhaps a monastery, at Kilcolgan, called from his name, in the diocese of Kilmacduach, and barony of Doolkillen in the co. of Galway. Colgan treats of him at 20 Feb. He must not be confounded with Colgu or Colgeus, his contemporary, and also a disciple of Columbkil in Hy, of whom Colgan gives some account at the same day. This Colgu, al. Colgius, is called by Adamnan (L. 2. c. 7. and L. 3. c. 15.) The son of Cellach; and it seems that he became a bishop; for Adamnan (L. 1. c. 34.) introduces Columbkil as speaking to him about his diocese. Yet he is not there syled bishop, and perhaps the phrase, your diocese, may mean no more than the diocese in Ireland, to which Colgeus belonged without his being bishop of it. Colgan (ib.) conjectures that his church was perhaps at Kilcolgan in the O'Coghlan's country, King's county; and yet he lays down, (Tr. Th. p. 495.) that it was Kilcolgan in the diocese of Clonfert, county of Galway. Archdall, to patch up the matter, makes Colgeus, or, as he calls him, Colgan, abbot in both these places, as if there had not been Colgas, Colgus, or Colgeuos enough in Ireland to govern churches without allowing more than one to each of them. As to Aidus and Sorar the other brothers of St. Faila, I can find nothing further. Colgan, indeed, most strangely says, (AA. SS. p. 456.) that Adamnan makes mention of Aidus (L. 1. c. 16.) as likewise a disciple of St. Columba. There is no such thing in that chapter nor any where in the whole work. Adamnan has an Aidus in the title to cap. 17. of said book, but he was Aidus Draignicha the father of this Aidus; and he has nothing more about him than the words above quoted, where he marks Colgius as a son of his. In the list of Columba's disciples Colgan has no Aidus, brother of Colgius, or son of another Aidus.

(94) Annals of Innisfallen. Colgan (AA. SS. p. 623.) tells us, that there were seven holy virgins of the name of Sincha, and observes that there was a church in Meath called Teagh-Sinche, or the house of Sincha. He conjectures, that it was the same as Kill-ailbe, in E. Meath, where St. Abban is said to have established a nunnery, and to have placed over it a virgin Segnich. Harris following this loose and probably groundless conjecture, has confounded those places into one.

(95) AA. SS. p. 339. Osnata and Muadhnata have been already mentioned, Not. 126. to Chap. XII.

(96) In the AA. SS. p. 337. Gleandallain is placed in Carbria, i. e. the Carbury of co. Sligo, and at p. 339. in Breffny, alluding, I suppose, to the part of it now called Leitrim. Which of the readings be the correct one is of little importance, as those territories were contiguous to each other.

(97) Tr. Th. p. 629. Archdall (at Kildare) has changed 590 into 580, and the name Tabulla, which Colgan constantly has, into Falulla.

(98) AA. SS. p. 340.

(99) Enach, which, with one addition or another, was the name of several places in Ireland, is now usually spelled Annagh. As these students, as well as their brother Molaisse, were most probably natives of Leitrim (See Not. 126 to Chap. XII.) and of the part bordering on Carbury in Sligo, it is natural to suppose that the Enach or Annagh, in which their memory was revered, was rather this one than any of the other places of said names. Archdall (at Enachaird) thinks it might have been in Carbury; but there is no Annagh in that barony. He mentions the veneration there paid to the three sisters, and instead of Osnata, calls one of them Odnata, as if to distinguish her from Osnata, whom he speaks of in the immediately following article at Gleann-dallain. Wishing to swell his Monasticon with the addition of Enachaird, he writes in such a manner as to make the reader think, that the three sisters, whom he there speaks of, were different from those, of whom we have now treated.

(100) AA. SS. p. 339.

(101) Ib. They were the daughters of an Eugene, who was great grandson to Fergus a brother of Neill Negialliach. This line of generations agrees very well with their having been distinguished in the latter part of the sixth century. Another sister of theirs Corcaria Keann is spoken of. Colgan could find no account of her; and it is more than probable, that she was the same as Corcaria Caoin.

(102) Colgan justly observes that one of the two Corcagias, whose names occur, was perhaps the same as Corcaria. A mistake might easily have happened by changing r into g.

(103) See AA. SS. p. 212.

(104) This is clear from the Acts of St. Maidoc of Ferns. But the history of Ethnea, &c. and whether such were the names of the holy daughters of king Aidus, or how many were these daughters, is so involved in the obscurity of jarring documents, that I shall do no more than refer to Colgan, who treats of them at 29 March.

(105) See AA. SS. p. 339 and 340.

§. VIII. We may now proceed to third class of saints, of whom we read, as follows, in the ancient document (106) often alluded to. “The third order of saints was of this description. It consisted of holy priests and a few bishops, all 100 in number, who dwelt in deserts and lived on herbs, water, and alms. They shunned possessing private property, (107) and had divers rules and masses, (108) and divers tonsures, some having the corona and others their hair. (109) They differed also as to the Paschal solemnity; for some of them celebrated the feast of the Resurrection from the 14th of the moon, and others from the 16th. (110) They “ lived during the reigns of four dynasties, viz. of “ Aeda Allain, who reigned only three years, Dom“ nail, the sons of Mailcob, and the sons of Aeda “ Slaine, (111) and continued until the great mor“ tality. (112) Their names are, bishops Petran, “ Ultan, Colman, Murgeus, Aedan, Loman, and “ Senach, besides several other bishops. The fol“ lowing were priests; Fechin, Airendan, Failan, “ Coman, Commian, Colman, Ernan, Cronan, and “ very many other priests.” The author then concludes with these words; “ The first order (or class) most holy; the second very holy; the third holy.

 The first blazes like the sun, the second like the moon, and the third like the stars.” (113) As the persons, whose names are here given, are not placed in chronological order, it would cause great confusion to treat of them in succession. It will be also necessary to now and then interrupt the peculiar history of these saints, so as to make room for an account of other eminent persons or some important transactions belonging to the times, in which they flourished.

(106) See Usher, p. 914.

(107) Propria devitabant, al. omnia terrena contemnebant, &c.

(108) Compare with Not. 53 to Chap. x.

(109) This diversity of tonsures will be explained hereafter.

(110) On this subject more in its proper place.

(111) The author's quaterna regna, (a number and phrase, which he has also when treating of the other classes) I translate four dynasties, we have seen (above §. 1.); during the time he speaks of there was a succession of more than four reigns. Yet they may be reduced to four dynasties; a subject, which I leave to our antiquaries, at the same time observing, that, in allowing only 3 years to the reign of Aeda Allain, or, as others call him, Huairiodnach, the author differs from our Annalists. I must also remark, that, although he mentions the reign of the sons of Aeda Slaine, or Aidus Slani, he has leaped over that of Aeda Slaine himself, who was the immediate successor of Aeda son of Ainmerech, the king, with whose reign he had closed the period of the second class. (See Chap. x. §. 4.) As he joins the commencement of the third one, with the reign of Aeda Allain, it follows, in the supposition that O'Flaherty's chronology be correct, that the era, in which this class flourished, must be reckoned from A. D. 605. (above §. 1.)

(112) Ledwich in his sort of explanation of this document says, (Ant. &c. p. 420) that the third class continued from 598 to 658. As to 598 or rather 599 (Chap. xi. §. 5.) he would have hit the author's meaning, if the commencement of the class were affixed to the reign of Aidus Slani; but we have just seen, that he has placed it in that of Aidus Allain the successor of Slani. And as to 658, the Doctor did not reflect, that the close of the third class is placed not at the beginning but at the termination of the last reign alluded to, viz. that of Diermit II. and Blathmac, who began indeed to reign in 658, but died in 665 the year of the great mortality. (Above §. 1.)

(113) The Doctor, who is a great connoisseur in matters of piety and sanctity, attributes the inferiority of the second class, compared with the first, to corruptions, that began to appear in the church. Why not name some of them? Might not some men be more holy than others, without the church being infected? As to the third class, it appeared, he says, "when religion became clouded with superstition and human invention." How does he exemplify this assertion? Yet he finds some consolation in there being no direct acknowledgment of Rome or her doctrines. As this is not a place for controversy, I will merely tell him that the author of the document had no intention whatsoever of alluding to the doctrines of the Church, or to any corruption of them. He touches indeed on practices, but does not complain of any of them as bad. His object was to give a comparative view of the state of the Irish church at divers periods, and of the various degrees of Christian fervour, with which the clergy were in general animated. I say in general, because even in the third class there were individuals as religious and as holy as many of those of the higher ones. That no innovations as to doctrinal matters had taken place at the time the third class appeared, our self-sufficient Doctor might have learned from St. Columbanus, an excellent judge on these points, and who survived the appearance of said class. He might also have been instructed by that great man concerning the light in which Rome and her doctrines were held in Ireland. (See Chap. XIII. §. 12.)

§. IX. The first in the list, and certainly one of the oldest, is Petranus bishop of Lusk, (114) concerning whom I find nothing recorded, except that he died in 616. (115) If Senach, whose name occurs last among the bishops, was Senach of Armagh, (116) he should had the order of time, whereas he died in 610, and dignity of rank been attended to, have been the first named. But it is more probable, that he was Senach Garbh of Clonfert, who, although usually called only abbot. was in all probability a bishop, and who died in 621. (117) Aedan was the celebrated St. Aidan or Maidoc bishop of Ferns. His original name was Aodh or Aedh, a name exceedingly common among the ancient Irish, which, besides, being modified in various ways, both in Irish and Latin, (118) has been anglicized into Hugh. As this saint's name appears more generally under the form Maidoc, I shall use it in preference to Aedan or Aidan, by which some distinguished persons, with whom he must not be confounded, (119) are usually designated. He was of an illustrious family of Connaught. His father Setna was of the Hy-briiun sept, (120) and his mother Ethne of the race of Aulai. (121) Having been married for some considerable time they had no heir, and accordingly prayed to God that he might grant them a son, for which purpose they also gave great alms and often went to the monastery of Druim-leathan, (122) where they used to request the prayers of the holy men, who resided there. The Almighty being pleased to listen to their supplications, St. Maidoc was born in a small island called Inis-Breagh-muigh in the now county of Cavan. (123) The time of his birth was about the year 560, as appears from his having been, when a small boy, one of the hostages, whom the chiefs of Hy-briiun were compelled to give to Anniracus king of Ireland, (124) whose reign began in 568, and ended in 571. (125) When returned to his parents they consigned him for his education to some holy men, under whose care, besides attending to the studies suitable to his age, he became a great proficient in piety. After some time, and while Maidoc was still young, his reputation for sanctity became so great, that several well disposed persons wished to connect themselves with him, and to consider him as their master. His humility would not allow him to accept of this distinction; and to avoid it he left his own country and proceeded to St. David's establishment at Menevia in Wales. (126)

(114) One Macculind, and Cuynea M'Cathmoa, are spoken of as having been bishops at Lusk as early as the latter end of the 5th century, (See Archdall at Lusk) but on no respectable authority, that I can discover. Colgan makes no mention of them.

(115) Usher, p. 963 and Ind. Chron. He seemed to think, that Petranus might have been the same as the Armorican nobleman of that name, who has been mentioned Chap. ix. §. 12. But he afterwards changed his opinion, having directed (Addenda, p. 1196) the reader to affix the arrival of Petranus in Ireland to A. D. 498. Accordingly he must have been different from the bishop, who died in 616. Add, that Paternus, son of the Armorican Petranus, was bishop of Vannes about 640. (Usher Ind. Chron.)

(116) See above, §. 2. Usher, not troubling himself about other Senachs, laid down (p. 966) as certain, that Senach of Armagh was he of the list. Yet we find nothing particular as to the sanctity of this Senach, nor is there any day marked for his commemoration; a strange omission with regard to an Archbishop of Armagh.

(117) As much as is known concerning Senach Garbh has been already given. (Above, §. 2. and Not. 22.) His dying in 621 answers better to his being placed in the third class than to Senach of Armagh, who died in 610. That Senach-Garbh was really a bishop there is every reason to believe, as there seems to have been a regular succession of bishops at Clonfert. Prior to him we there find Fintan Corach and Moëna.

(118) It is curious to observe, into what various shapes the name Aodh has been transformed. As the Irish used to write OE or AE for AO, we find this saint in some Calendars under the form Oedus and Aedus. Among the Irish diminutive particles were an, and oc or og. Hence, as it was very usual to add one of these particles to the names, particularly of persons beloved, as ex. c. we say Johnny for John, he is called in various Irish documents, Aodan, Aedan, Oedan, Aodhog. Next comes the endearing prefix Mo, omitting, however, the o in case of the name beginning with a vowel; and thus he appears as Maodog, Moedhog, Moedoc, Maedoc, Maidoc. Giraldus Cambrensis says, (Vit. S. David.) “S. Aidanus, qui et Hibernice Maidocus dicitur. In Capgrave’s Legend it is remarked that, instead of Aidus or Aidan, as named in some works, he was called at St. David’s Moedoc, “which is Irish.”

(119) Some, among whom Hanmer (Chron. p. 127. New ed.) thought he was the same as St. Aidan bishop of Lindisfarne, of whom hereafter.

(120) This sept was descended from the Brian, once prince of Connaught, mentioned above, §. 6. Their territory was either Breffny (now Leitrim and Cavan) or, at least, a part of it. See AA. SS. p. 216.)

(121) Life of Maidoc, cap. 1. Colgan says that, instead of Aulai, the author should have written Amalgaid, the name of a prince, whose sons are much spoken of in the history of St. Patrick. Yet I find no real difference between the names, as the former is only a contraction of the latter. Thus the territory, anciently called, from that prince, Tir-amalgaid, has, for a long time back, been called Tir-awly. This Life, which Colgan (at 31 Jan.) has published in preference to some others, is of rather a respectable kind. The style indeed, is often incorrect; and Colgan complains that there is now and then neglect of chronological order. Yet, on the whole, it is a useful document. A St. Evin is said to have been the author. Colgan admits that he was not Evin of Ross, whereas he died before Maidoc. Whatever was the author’s name, he gives us to understand, (capp. 63-64.) that he was a clergyman or monk of Ferns, or, at least, of some church, of which St. Maidoc was patron.

(122) It is now called Drumlahan or Drumlane. Archdall places it in the barony of Belturbet, co. Cavan. I do not know of any such barony. Drumlahan is a well known place, in the barony of Loughtee, about three miles from Belturbet. It is very strange, that Colgan, in a list of monasteries founded by Maidoc, has among them Druin-lethan, which, as appears from what we have now seen, existed before he was born. Ware and Harris were, at least in part, led astray by him on this point.

(123) Colgan says, that this island is in a lake or marsh in a district of Breffny called Tellach-ethach. This is, as well as I can discover, the now barony of Tullaghagh or Tullahaw in the part of Cavan that borders on Leitrim. That district, together with some others of Cavan, was formerly comprized in Connaught.

(124) Maidoc's Life, cap. 2.

(125) See Chap. XII. §. 5. Harris (Bishop at Ferns) says that the account of Maidoc having been a hostage with Anmiracus cannot square with the truth of chronology, because he was a disciple of St. David, who, says Harris, died in 544; and consequently many years before the reign of that king. But what Harris, following Usher, thought to be true chronology, is quite the reverse, as has been already proved. (Chap. IX. §. 9.) As to the evasion of Usher and others, that there may be some mistake in the name of Anmiracus, and that the king, with whom Maidoc was a hostage, might have been one prior to him, it is not worth consideration. Independently of any mention of this circumstance or of Anmiracus, it is plain from the fact, universally admitted, of Maidoc having been a scholar of St. David, that the latter did not die as early as 544. From the Lives of both these saints it is evident, that Maidoc must have been, at least, 24 years old at the time of David's death. Thus then, in the hypothesis of it having occurred in 544, Maidoc's birth cannot be placed later than 520; and, allowing him to have been born in this very year, he should have lived to the age of 112, whereas, according to Usher himself, (p. 966.) he died in 632. Now in whatever accounts exist of St. Maidoc there is not the least indication of his life having been prolonged to any extraordinary length of time.

(126) Life, cap. 10. Menevia is there called, as usual with the old Irish writers, Killmuine.

§. x. Maidoc remained a long time in that place, and was greatly esteemed by St. David on account of his humility and strict observance of monastic discipline, of which some instances are related, as likewise of the interposition of Providence in his favour. (127) He is said to have wrought some miracles in Wales, and his reputation was so great, that, on an occasion of the English having invaded that country with a great army, the inhabitants, when assembled in arms to defend themselves, requested of St. David to send Maidoc to them, that he might bless them and their efforts. It is added, that his benediction had the wished for effect, and that the English were routed with considerable loss. (128) At what time he returned to Ireland is not exactly known; but it was prior to St. David's death, which was probably in 589 (129) He parted from St. David and his other friends at Menevia with their best wishes and blessings, (130) and having landed somewhere in the now county of Wexford, was well received by some of the leading men of that country, particularly by one named Dymma, who gave him some ground, on which he erected a church. (131) He afterwards formed a cell or small monastery at Desert Nairbre, a place supposed to be in the now county of Waterford. (132) There he remained for a time, apparently not long, and then set about establishing monasteries in various parts of Hy-Kinselagh, particularly, and one may say solely, in that now called Wexford. One of them was the celebrated monastery of Clonemore, (133) over which he placed Dicholla Gairbh one of his disciples. But his chief establishment was that of Ferns, on land granted to him by king Brandubh, after, from having been prince of Hy-Kinselagh, he became sovereign of all Leinster, and had defeated Aidus king of Ireland in the early part of the year 599. (134) Brandubh had an extraordinary esteem for St. Maidoc, and exerted all his influence to raise the monastery and new town of Ferns to the rank not only of an episcopal see, but likewise of an ecclesiastical metropolis. Accordingly he procured the convocation of a numerous synod, in which it was decreed, with the concurrent voice of the king, clergy, and people, that the archbishoprick of Leinster should be annexed to Ferns as the see and chair of Maidoc, who was then immediately consecrated bishop. (135) This transaction must be placed either in 599, or some time before the death of Brandubh in 602, (136) and hence it appears that what is said of Maidoc having paid a visit to St. David, who wished to see him before his death, occurred, if true, before he became a bishop. (137) We find him, after his consecration, visiting the holy virgins daughters of Aidus, king of Leinster, and taking with him a plough and a pair of oxen as a present for them. (138) His ecclesiastical dignity did not prevent him from joining his monks in their agricultural labours; and we are told that on one occasion he superintended 150 brethren making the harvest. (139) He was intimate with several distinguished holy men of his time, particularly Moluã of Clonfert-melua, who was his spiritual director, or father confessor, (140) Fintan Munnu, and others. Maidoc was remarkable for his hospitality and benevolence. On being informed that some relatives of his were prisoners in Hy Conall Gabhra, (141) he went to that country, although far distant from Ferns, for the purpose of delivering them, and did not desist, until he induced the chieftain, otherwise very harsh on this point, to give them up. It is added, that this chieftain was so affected by the saint's conduct, that he granted him a place called Cluain-claidheach, in which he erected a monastery. (142) Another time, when thinking of going to Cashel on some business, he changed his course and travelled as far as Kilmacduagh to relieve Guaire, king of Connaught, who was dangerously ill, and who recovered his health through the saint's prayers. (143) Several miracles are attributed to Maidoc; but this is not the place for giving an account of them. This much is certain, that his reputation for sanctity was very great, and that his memory has been highly revered, both in Ireland and in some other countries, particularly Wales. He died on the 31st of January, A. D. 632, (144) and was buried at Ferns.

(127) Life, cap. 11. seqq. See also Life of David, cap. 16. at 1 Mart.

(128) Life, cap. 17.

(129) See Chap. ix. §. 9.

(130) In the Life of David by Giraldus, we read; "S. Aidanus, qui et Hibernice Maidocus dicitur, virtutibus insignis et divinis affatim eruditus disciplinis, licentia primum a patre (David) deinde fratribus accepta, cum omnium benedictione Hiberniam petiit."

(131) In his Life (cap. 19.) he is said to have erected also a church on a field granted to him by a chieftain, whose name is not mentioned. Colgan thought that the place given to Maidoc by Dymma was Ardlathrann together with some ground adjoining, and hence Archdall has a monastery there. Ardlathrann, which was a maritime town, seemingly in the Southern part of the county of Wexford, is mentioned more than once in the Life, as a place where Maidoc happened to be on some occasions; and it is very probable, that he had there formed a religious establishment. But we are not to believe that he got a grant of the whole town.

(132) Maidoc is said (ib. cap. 21.) to have visited the country of the Desii (co. Waterford); and next after we are told that he erected the cell of Disert Nairbre. But it is not stated, that this cell was in that country. Yet from the context it appears probable that it was; and Colgan (Not. at loc.) places it there in the diocese of Ardmore. Smith (Hist. of Waterford, p. 92.) makes it the same as Bolhendesart in the barony of Upperrthird not far from the river Suir.

(133) In the barony of Bantry, co. Wexford. (See Archdall). N. B. The monastery of Fiddown in the county of Kilkenny was founded by another Maidoc, of whom Colgan has a very confused and doubtful account at 23 Mart.

(134) See Chap. XII. §. 5.

(135) The Life has; (cap. 28.) “Deinde facta synodo magna in terra Lageniensium decrevit rex Brandubh, et tam laici quam clerici, ut archiepiscopatus omnium Lageniensium semper esset in sede et cathedra S. Moedoc. Et tunc S. Moedoc a multis Catholicis consecratus est archiepiscopus.” Usher observes (p. 965) that by this regulation the archiepiscopate was removed from Sletty. (Compare with Chap. VI. §. 5. and ib. Not. 53.) He adds that it was afterwards transferred to Kildare, where, he says, we find it in the time of bishop Ferdornach, who died in the year 1101. But that privilege, such as it was, appears to have been annexed to Kildare long before this time; for Cogitosus, who did not live later than the early part of the ninth century, (See Not. 18 to Chap. VIII.) in his prologue calls the bishop of Kildare an archbishop. I have already remarked (Not. 67 to Chap. VI.) that these so called archbishops of those times in Ireland, excepting the primate of Armagh, were not, strictly speaking, metropolitans invested with such jurisdiction as the canon law has established. They enjoyed, by courtesy, a sort of honorary pre-eminence, which, as may be concluded from the title passing from one see to another, was, I dare say, often contested. It is true, that also in the African provinces the title of primate as the head bishop of each was called, used to pass through various sees; but there was a fixed rule as to this point; viz. that, with the exception of the bishop or primate of Carthage, to whom all the other primates, bishops, &c. were subject; those African primates were always the oldest bishops, by consecration, of the respective provinces. Now in Ireland we cannot discover any such settled regulation; and I am inclined to think, that some of those provincial archbishops owed their title and rank rather to the favour of princes than to ecclesiastical constitutions.

(136) Above, Not. 49.

(137) We have seen (Chap. ix. §. 9.) that St. David died some years previous to 599.

(138) Life, cap. 34. Of these holy virgins mention has been made above §. 7.

(139) Ib. cap. 40.

(140) Ib. cap. 20 and 54.

(141) Now Upper Connello in the county of Limerick. (See Not. 6 to Chap. xi)

(142) Life, cap. 38. Archdall says, that this place is not far from Rathkeale and now called Cluancagh.

(143) Ib. cap. 41.

(144) Usher, p. 966. Ware, Bishops at Ferns, &c. The 4 Masters (ap. AA. SS. p. 219) have A. 624 (625). The date 634 is more probably the true one, as appears from what Colgan (ib.) observes concerning that assigned by the 4 Masters to the death of Guaire king of Connaught, which, he says, cannot be reconciled with their placing Maidoc's death in 624. For Guaire is stated to have lived 30 years after he had been visited by the saint. It would lead me too far to enter into a discussion on this subject. This much I will say, that these Annalists are wrong either in their date for the death of Maidoc, or in their affixing that of Guaire to A. 662. Ware observes, that a writer of Maidoc's Life gives him about 50 years of episcopacy. This does not occur in that published by Colgan, and is contrary to the well known fact, that he did not become a bishop until, at the earliest, A. 599.

§. XI. Contemporary with Maidoc was St. Colman of Kilmacduach, who, according to every appearance, was the bishop Colman of the third class.

(145) He was of the illustrious house of the southern Hua-Fiachra of Connaught, (146) and was nearly related to Guaire, king of that province.

(147) From his father's name, Duach, he was sur-named Macduach, by which appellation he is more generally spoken of than by that of Colman. The earliest account I find of his transactions is, that he lived as a hermit in the forest of Burren (county of Clare), attended only by a young clerk, a disciple of his. Their only food was water cresses and wild herbs; their drink water; and deer-skins served them for clothes. Having constructed an oratory and a small habitation surrounded with trees, they remained there for full seven years without conversing with any other person. (148) Colman's reputation becoming very great, he was taken notice of by Guaire, a prince of great piety and liberality, who offered him as much land, as he should wish for the establishment of a religious community. The saint refused to accept of more than a small spot, on which he afterwards erected a monastery, and where he became bishop. (149) It was not far distant from his former habitation, and has been called, from his name, Kill-macduach. This foundation took place in the early part of the reign of Guaire, (150) and probably before the year 620. (151) After a well spent life, St Colman died on a third of February, (152) but in what year is not recorded. His memory has been most highly revered in his diocese. As to the bishop Loman named in the same class, he was, as far as I can judge, no other than the Loman or Luman bishop of Trim, whom some writers have, without sufficient foundation, pushed up as far as the commencement of St. Patrick's mission in Ireland. (153) Nothing certain is known concerning this saint, except that he was revered on the 17th of February at Trim, where his remains were deposited together with those of several other saints, who are called his companions. (154) Who the bishop Murgeus was I cannot discover, unless he may be supposed to have been the same as Murgenius (155) an abbot of Glean-ussen, who might have been a bishop, although I do not find him called by that title. (156) Ultan, who is the second named in the list of bishops, I place last, because he survived the others, at least those, the years of whose death are known. He was of the house of Hua-Conchovair (O'Connor) and is said to have been related to St. Brigid by her mother's side. (157) He was bishop at Ardbraccan, and is supposed to have been the founder of that see. (158) Ultan's name is often mentioned, particularly on account of his writings, one of which was a Life, or, at least, a work on some Acts of St. Patrick. (159) He wrote also a similar treatise concerning the transactions of St. Brigid; (160) and some have attributed to him a Latin hymn in honour of the same saint. (161) Ultan died on the 4th of September, A. D. 657. (162)

(145) Usher is evidently wrong (p. 964) in making Colman bishop of Lindisfarne, the same as Colman of the third class. That Colman did not die until 676, and accordingly was not the person alluded to, whereas the times of said class terminated in 665. It may, perhaps, be supposed, that Colman of Doire-mor above treated of, (§. 3.) and who flourished during that period, was the one meant by the author; but, as he seems to have been less known than Colman of Kilmacduach, it is more probable that the latter was the person whom said author had in view.

(146) See above Not. 91.

(147) AA. SS. p. 248. Colgan shows, that Keating was mistaken (Hist. &c. Book 2.) in making him a brother of Guaire. He was wrong also in calling him Mochua. These are trifles, compared with some prodigious fables, which Keating picked up concerning this saint.

(148) Colman's Acts, cap. 7. at 3 Feb. St. Colman retired to the forest in the time of Colman surnamed Aidhne, by which distinctive name the Southern Hy-fiachra of Connaught were known. (See AA. SS. p. 331.) This Colman was father to Guaire, and son of Cobhtach, who was a first cousin of Duach the father of St. Colman. (ib. p. 248.)

(149) Colgan pretends that Colman was a bishop, before he retired into the forest. His argument is, that some writers, when speaking of him as being in this retirement, give him that title. This proves no more than that he was a bishop at some time of his life; but it does not follow that he was one, when in the forest. To say that bishop Colman spent seven years in a desert, has nothing to do with the time of his consecration. It might as well be argued from a person's saying, King George was born in 1762, that he was a king in that year. An authority, the best I find for Colman's proceedings, quoted by Colgan (Acts, cap. 12.) has, "Cellam extruxit (Colmanus), quae ejus nomine Kill-macduach vulgo appellata est, quaeque postea, a rege Guario ejusque successoribus multis praediis dotata, in sedem episcopalem—erecta est."

(150) We have seen (Not. 148.) that Colman retired to the forest prior to the reign of Guaire. How long he was there before this king's accession is not known; yet, as he spent there, in all, not more than seven years, the foundation of Killmacduagh must be assigned to some one of the first years of that reign. This is confirmed by the circumstance, that Colman was settled at Killmacduagh at the time of St. Maidoc's visit to Guaire. (Maidoc, Life cap. 41.) Now, it is stated, (ib.) that Guaire lived for 30 years after said visit. On the other hand, Guaire's reign lasted, at most, 38 years; (AA. SS. p. 219.) and thus it is clear, that Killmacduach was founded in the early part of it.

(151) Colgan calculates, that Colman flourished in 620. He gives it as his opinion (AA. SS. p. 219.) that Guaire died about 642, and that the 4 Masters were wrong in their date of 662. He asserts (ib. p. 246.) that Guaire flourished about 630, as appears from all our ancient histories. According to Colgan's statement, and supposing that Guaire reigned 38 years, the commencement of his reign may be placed about 604. Then, if we suppose that Colman founded Killmacduach in the 5th or 6th year of that reign (and it could scarcely have been later) this foundation may be assigned to about 610. Having touched upon the times of Guaire, I may be allowed to animadvert on a huge anachronism of Keating, who makes him contemporary with Diermit Mac Cervail, king of Ireland, whose reign began in 544, and ended in 565. How could he have fallen into such a mistake, while knowing that Guaire carried on a war against Dioma, who succeeded Failbhe Fland, as king of Cashel, and whose reign did not begin until 634? (See above Not. 39.)

(152) This is the day marked for his Natalis in the Calendars; and yet it is not, as Ware and Harris say, that on which his festival is kept at Killmacduach. The day fixed for it in that diocese is the 29th of October. How this came to pass, I am not able to explain.

(153) See Not. 35 to Chap. v.)

(154) Colgan having patched up (at 17 Feb.) a sort of Acts of St. Loman, founded almost entirely on certain stories in the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick and in Joceline, quotes from the Martyrol. Tam-lact. the following passage; “Lomani Athtrumensis cum sociis suis; id est, Patricio hostiario, Lurecho filio Cuanach, Fortcherno et Coelo Ochtra, Aido, Aedo, Acdo, Cormaco episcopo, Conano, Comeno episcopo, Lacteno sacerdote, Ossano, Sarano, Conallo, Colmano, Luctano episcopo, et Finnsecha virgine. Hi omnes Athtrumie requeſcunt.” If by sociis suis we should understand disciples of Loman, as Colgan seems to think, Loman must be brought to much later times than those of St. Patrick. If, for instance, Ossanus was a disciple of his, Loman certainly belonged to the 7th century; for this Ossanus was, in all appearance, the person of that name, whose memory was revered at Rath-ossain near the West gate of Trim, and whose death is marked at A. D. 686. (AA. SS. p. 367.) Others of them are placed by Colgan himself in still later times. It may be objected, that Tirechan, who is supposed to have lived in the seventh century, speaks of Loman as being in St. Patrick’s days. (See Usher p. 853.) But, if Tirechan lived so early, the account given of Loman is undoubtedly an interpolation thrust into his work. For no author of that century could have written certain nonsense therein contained, such as ex. c. that prince Fedlimid, a son of king Leogaire, made a grant of all his territory, property, and family to the saints Patrick and Loman, and thus to the church of Trim. Such fables, relative to ecclesiastical endowments, did not appear in Ireland until a much later period. (Compare with Not. 35 to Chap. v.) Usher, having swallowed, at least in part, the stories about the Loman connected with St. Patrick, mentions, as if to find out the Loman of the third class, two other Lomans. But there is no account of their having been bishops; nor does Colgan, who adds (AA. SS. p. 363.) something about them, pretend that they were.

(155) Usher says (p. 965) that in the genealogies of Irish saints Murgeus is called Muirgeni Liban.

(156) Colgan has (AA. SS. p. 418.) Murgenius abbot of Gleanussen, whose name is in the calendars at 27 Januar. He was later than Comgan, of whom above, (Chap. x. §. 14.) but is not mentioned as his immediate successor. I do not meet any where else with the name of Murgenius.

(157) See Not. 20. to Chap. VIII.

(158) Ware Antiq. cap. 29. and Harris (Bishops at Meath). Ardraccan, or the high place of Braccan, was so called from an abbot Braccan, who, according to Ware (Writers, at Braccan) was alive in 650. If this be true, Ultan must have been but for a short time bishop there. Braccan is said to have written some prophecies.

(159) See Tripart. L. 1. c. 69. and L. 3. c. 99.

(160) In the Prologue to Chilian's metrical Life of St. Brigid (See Not. 18. to Chap. VIII.) we read; "Scripserunt multi virtutes virginis alme, Ultanus doctor, atque Eleranus ovans," &c. We have seen (ib.) how much Colgan was mistaken in supposing that Ultan's work on St. Brigid was the tract, which he has published under the title of her Third Life. Whether Ultan wrote it, as well as that on St. Patrick, in Latin or Irish I am not able to ascertain.

(161) Having already treated of this hymn, (Not. 81 to Chap. IX.) I shall merely observe, that it must not be confounded with another on St. Brigid, but written in Irish, usually ascribed to Columbkil, although, as Usher says, (p. 963.) some have thought it was composed by Ultan. Colgan, who has given (Tr. Th. p. 606.) a Latin translation of it, says nothing about its ever having been attributed to him.

(162) The 4 Masters, quoted by Colgan, (Tr. Th. p. 518.) have; "An. Christi 656 (657) S. Ultanus Hua Conchovair, episcopus de Ardbrecan, obiit 4 Sept. an. aetatis suae 180." This date is also that of the Ulster annals. (See Usher, p. 963 and Ind. Chron.) As to his having lived until his 180th year, this fable was probably made up to account for his having been a contemporary of Brogan, author of the Irish poem on St. Brigid, (See Not. 18 to Chap. VIII.) and who had been supposed to have flourished early in the sixth century. The truth is, that either Ultan was not contemporary with Brogan, or, if he was, that the latter lived in the seventh century; and that he did appears from what he has (Stroph. 10.) concerning St. Coemgen of Glendaloch.

§. XII. As to the holy priests of the third class, the order of time does not permit me to enter seriatim upon their history in this place, as several of them lived to a later period than some distinguished persons belonging to the first half of the seventh century, and after the times of certain important occurrences, by which the Irish church was much agitated. We have seen that Baithen abbot of Hy, and consequently chief of the whole Columbian order, died in 598. (163) He was succeeded by Fergnaus or Virgnous, (164) whose real name was Fergna. (165) It has been supposed that he was a distant relative of Columbkil; but this opinion is more than uncertain. (166) He had been from his youth a disciple of his at Hy, and was then remarkable for his good disposition and piety. (167) Little else is known concerning him, except that he governed Hy and its dependencies until 623, in which year he died on the 2d of March. (168) Fergnaus was succeeded by Segeneus, son of Fiachrius and great great grandson of Fergu's the grandfather of Columbkil. (169) We shall meet with Segeneus hereafter; meanwhile it is sufficient to observe, that he was the founder of the church of Rachlin, (170) and that he held the abbacy of Hy, &c. for 29 years, having lived until 652. (171) Senach, archbishop of Armagh, who died in 610, was, as already stated, (172) succeeded Mac-Laisre, or the son of Laisre, concerning whom so little is recorded, that even his Christian name is not known. (173) He died in 623, and his commemoration was held on the 2d of September, probably the anniversary of his death. (174) Mac-Laisre's immediate successor was Thomian or Thoman, the son of Roman. (175) Having governed the see of Armagh for about 37 years, Thomian died on the 10th of January, A. D. 661. (176) He took an active part in the Paschal controversy; and we find his name the first placed in the letter of the Roman clergy, written in 640, to several Irish prelates, priests, and abbots on that and some other subjects, which will be treated of lower down.

(163) See Chap. XII. §. 15.

(164) Usher, p. 702.

(165) Colgan has the Acts of Fergna or Fergnaus at 2 Mart. The 4 Masters interpose between Bãithen and Fergna Lasrean, who had been abbot of Durrough in Columbkil's time. (See Not. 179 to Chap. XI.) Colgan observes, that in several calendars, which mention Lasrean at 16 Sept. he is called abbot of Hy. And indeed it is probable that he was, yet only for a short time. The account given by the 4 Masters of the time during which his administration lasted, as likewise of that of Baithen, is so confused and, on the whole, so different from Usher's statements derived from the Ulster annals, that I am not able to form any decision on these points. (Compare with Not. 242 to Chap. XII.)

(166) The only sort of argument for that relationship is the genealogy of a St. Fergna, (ap. AA. SS. p. 450.) a descendant of Conal Gulbanus, the great grandfather of Columbkil. But this Fergna was in the seventh generation from said Conal; and hence Colgan admits, that it is scarcely credible that he was the abbot of Hy.

(167) Adamnan makes mention of him (L. 3. c. 19.) in these terms; "Virgnous bonae indolis juvenis, qui postea, Deo auctore, huic prae fuit Ecclesiae;" and again, "Virgnous in Dei amore serviens." Colgan (Acts, &c.) has confounded him with the Virgnous, to whom Lugaid announced the death of Columbkil, (See Not. 117 to Chap. XI.) although nothing can be more clear than that they were different persons. This Virgnous, having gone from Ireland to the Hebrides after the death of Columbkil, spent, as Adamnan relates, (L. 3. c. 23.) the remainder of his life in Hymba, partly as a monk in a state of subjection, and partly as a hermit. How then could he have been the abbot of Hy? Colgan strove to evade this argument by a quibble founded on a false reading in his edition of Adamnan, who writes; "Virgnous post multos in subjectione inter fratres inreprehensibiliter expletos annos," &c. Instead of multos, as Messingham's and other editions have, that of Colgan has multorum, by which the whole passage becomes ungrammatical and nonsensical. He then endeavours to shew, that the words, multorum in subjectione, are to be understood of Virgnous having had many persons subject to him. Where did he find such a phrase used for the government of others? Adamnan could not have written this barbarous Latin. But, as multorum is a palpable error, I need not say more about it.

(168) 4 Masters, Tr. Th. p. 498. AA. SS. p. 449. Their date is 622, i. e. 623 as Usher has it, p. 702, and Ind. Chron. Some of our calendarists have very absurdly called Fergna a bishop, and indeed of Hy. Surely nothing is more certain than that the abbots of Hy were always only priests, at least as long as they continued to be abbots. See Not. 234, 235 to Chap. XII.

(169) See Tr. Th. p. 374. (170) See Not. 111 to Chap. XI.

(171) Usher, p. 702. Tr. Th. p. 498.

(172) Above §. 2. In the catalogue of the archbishops of Armagh (Tr. Th. p. 293.) the name of Senach does not appear, owing to an omission of the printer. It is clear, that Colgan did not mean to live him out, as he had Senach's name before his eyes not only in the list from the Psalter of Cashel, but likewise in his favourite authority the Annals of the 4 Masters, who have at A. 609 (610); Senachus Ardm. obiit. Therefore Harris, instead of charging Colgan (Bishops at Armagh) with this omission, ought to have left it at the door of the printer, a wight, who has done infinite mischief to Colgan's works and caused vast trouble to the readers of them.

(173) Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 293.) imagined, that his real name was perhaps Terennan. For in a Life of St. Laurence of Canterbury it is said, that a St. Terennan archbishop of Ireland waited on him, and not only acknowledged the correctness of the Roman computation of Easter time, and of other practices, but likewise greatly exerted himself to introduce them into Ireland. Mac Laisre and Laurence were indeed contemporaries; but there is not the least foundation for what is here stated. Accordingly it cannot be of any use towards clearing up any part of Mac Laisre's history.

(174) See Tr. Th. p. 294, and Ware, Bishops at Mac Laisre.

(175) Colgan treats of Thomian at 10 Jan. He talks of his noble birth, singular learning, &c. all which may be true; yet I wish he had given us his authorities.

(176) Colgan, ib. His date, taken from the 4 Masters, is 660 which Ware justly calls 661.

§. XIII. One of the greatest ornaments of the period we are now inquiring into was St. Carthagh, usually denominated of Lismore, and otherwise called Mochuttai or Mochuda. (177) He was a native of Kerry, (178) and is said to have been of a noble family. (179) Yet we find him, when a boy, actually employed in tending his father's swine near the banks of the river Mang, when Providence put him in the way of being introduced to the holy bishop Carthagh the elder. (180) It is related that, as the bishop and some of his clergy proceeding in that tract were singing psalms, they were overheard by young Carthagh, who was so delighted with their psalmody, that neglecting the swine, he followed them as far as the monastery of Thuaim, where they were to remain during the night. (181) He did not enter the monastery, but unknown to the bishop and the people of the house, stopped without, near the apartment allotted to the bishop's party, listening to them, as they continued to sing until they lay down to sleep. It being now very late, Moeltuili, the chieftain of the district, who was very fond of Mochuda, and with whom he chiefly lived, became uneasy about him and sent persons to search for him, who having found him near the monastery, brought him the next day to Moeltuili's residence. Being asked why he had staid out during the night, he answered, "My Lord Chieftain, my reason for not coming to you was my being charmed with the divine song, which I heard the holy clergy singing, and I wish I were along with them, that I might learn that song." On hearing this, Moeltuili immediately sent for the bishop requesting of him to lose no time in calling upon him, and, when he came, recommended the boy to his care and to his being pleased to instruct him. The holy prelate, perceiving that he was gifted with an excellent disposition, received him with joy, and being greatly attached to him, kept him with himself, until he ordained him priest. (182) If the time of Mochuda's ordination was, as appears not improbable, about the year 580, (183) we may calculate that he was born about the middle of the sixth century.

(177) In a Life of his called the second, and published by the Bollandists at 14 May, it is said (cap. 1.) that at baptism he was called Carthagh, and that afterwards the name Mochuda was given him by his master Carthagh the elder. Yet it is probable that his original name was Chuda, or Chuttai (Cuddy) and that his master, who was very fond of him, did no more in this respect than instead of calling him Chuda, addresses him by the affectionate mode, Mochuda, that is, my dear Chuda. This Life, which is long and circumstantial, is far from being accurate in many of its assertions. There is reason to think that his being called also Carthagh was owing to his having been a disciple of the real Carthagh, as if we should say Carthagh's Mochuda. The other Life, called the first, has no mention of this or many other circumstances, and contains very little of a historical kind. Accordingly in my references to this saint's Life the reader is to understand that called the second, which is also the one usually quoted by Usher and Colgan.

(178) De gente Kiarraigh Luack (Luachra). Life, cap. 1.

(179) Keating (History, &c. Book 2.) says, that he was a Kerry man of noble birth and son of Feargus mac Roigh. In the Life he is represented as the descendant of a Fergus once prince of Ulster, who had been killed by Oella king of Connaught, and whose posterity were scattered through various parts of Ireland. It is added that Mochuda's father was Fingen son of Guel.

(180) See Cap. xi, §. 5. (181) See Not. 50. to Chap. xi.

(182) Life, cap. 1. See also Colgan AA. SS. p. 475. In referring to the chapters of this Life I follow the division of the Bollandists, omitting their subdivisions.

(183) See Not. 52. to Chap. xi.

§. 14. Being now a priest, it is said that he constructed a cell, called Killtulach, somewhere not far from the Mang; (184) but he did not remain there long, for, as we are told, he thence went to Bangor to place himself under the direction of St. Comgall, and, having staid there for some time, returned to Kerry, where he employed his time in attending to clerical duties. (185) Next we find him visiting Molua of Clonfert-molua, and afterwards Colman-elo, with whom he wished to remain at Land-elo. But this saint advised him to form an establishment for himself at a place not far distant, called Raithin or Rathen. (186) Carthagh acted according to his directions, and there erected a monastery, which soon became very celebrated. He drew up a Rule (187) for the direction of his monks, who, as persons flocked to him from various parts both of Ireland and Great Britain, are said to have swelled to the number of 367, all of whom provided for themselves and the poor by the labour of their hands. (188) While at Rathen, where he remained forty years, Carthagh was consecrated bishop. (189) Notwithstanding his great sanctity, and the extraordinary esteem in which he was generally held, he had, as has been the case with many illustrious and holy men, to encounter the envy of some clergymen or monks (190) of a neighbouring district, who at length induced Blathmac, son of Aidus Slani, and prince of that country, (191) to expel him and his monks from Rathen in the year 630. (192) Thence Carthagh went, accompanied by many of his monks, to Drumcullin the monastery of St. Barrjin (Bar-rindeus), (193) and having stopped there a while proceeded to Saiger, next to Roscrea, and thence to Cashel, where he was very kindly received by the king Failbhe Fland, who offered him a place for erecting a monastery, and whom he cured of a sore eye. Declining this offer the saint went to Ardfinan, and there constructed a cell, rather as a temporary habitation than a regular monastery. (194) Soon after Moelochtride prince of Nandesi, who was son in law to Failbhe Fland, made him a grant of the tract in which Lismore is situated. (195) In this place Carthagh formed a religious establishment not later, I think, than the year 633, (196) which, as he was already a bishop, became also an episcopal see, and within a short lapse of time acquired an extraordinary celebrity, and gave rise to a considerable town, as the very name, Lismore, indicates. (197) Its school, or, as it might now be called, university, was for a very long time equal, at least to any other in Ireland, and, (198) besides the Irish from all parts, was resorted to by students and religious persons not only from England and the rest of Britain, but likewise from various parts of the continent. (199) Lismore, however, did not rise to this pitch of greatness during the life of Carthagh, for he died a short time after he had there completed his establishments, having spent the last 18 months of his course in retirement in a lonesome part of the valley at the East of the town. (200) The day of this great saint's death was the 14th of May, and the year 637. (201) He was buried at Lismore, of which he was the first bishop. (202)

(184) It is stated in the Life (cap. 11.) that this cell was between the mountain Mysjs and the Mang. How that mountain is now called I do not know.

(185) According to the Life (ib.) it would seem as if he then acted as bishop in Kerry. This is directly contrary to what is expressly stated in the second chapter of his having been consecrated bishop at Rathen, where he was not settled until some time later. Accordingly the care, which he is said to have taken of Kerry or of a great part of it, must, if true, be understood of his exertions, not as bishop, but as a missionary priest.

(186) It is now called Rathyne, and is situated in the barony of Fertullagh, county of Westmeath.

(187) This rule was written in Irish. Usher had or saw a copy of it in an ancient MS. together with the Rules of Ailbe, Columkill, and Comgall, all written, he says, in very old Irish, and exceedingly difficult to understand. See p. 919.

(188) Cap. 2. In the Life, called the first, the number of monks is stated at 847, and it is added; “labore manuum suarum victum sibi ac pauperibus acquirentium.” Usher (p. 911.) refers to another Life, in which the number is said to have been 844.

(189) Life, ib.

(190) In the Life (cap. 4.) they are called envious clergymen. Keating says that they were the monks of Jobh-Neill. This place was somewhere not far from Rathen; how it is now called I cannot discover.

(191) In the Life, and elsewhere, it is said that Carthagh was expelled by king Blathmac. This must be understood not as if Blathmac were then king of all Ireland, which he did not become until 658 (above §. 1.) many years after the expulsion, but as said of him by anticipation, or inasmuch as he was at that time prince or king of Meath.

(192) Usher, Ind. Chron. The 4 Masters have A. 631 (632). See AA. SS. p. 561. Either of these dates come much nearer the truth than that of the Annals of Innisfallen 636. For, as, even according to these annals, Carthagh died in 637, where could time be found for his transactions subsequent to the expulsion, in case it occurred as late as 636? Besides, it was, as will be soon seen, prior to the death of Failbhe Fland, king of Cashel, which fell in the year 434. (Above, Not. 39)

(193) See Chap. XII. §. 9.

(194) The monastery, properly so called, of Ardfinan, was founded by St. Finian, surnamed the leper, who lived late in the seventh century.

(195) We read in the Life; (cap. 4.) “Dux Nandesi Mochlochtride filius Cobh-aich istam regionem, in qua nunc est civitas Mochudae Lismor, coram multis testibus obtulit S. Carthago.” By regionem we are not to understand a large tract of country; for it is spoken of (ib.) as not much more than a field, formerly called Maghsciath, i. e. the field of the shield. Keating (Book 2.) says, that the old name of Lismore was Dunsginne, alluding,

I suppose, to the hill near Lismore, on which there might have been a Dun or fort in old times.

(196) Usher, (Ind. Chron.) places Carthagh's arrival at Lismore in 630, the year of his expulsion from Rathen. But from his haltings here and there it appears probable, that it was somewhat later. Yet it could not have been as late as 636, to which it is assigned, together with the expulsion, in the Annals of Innisfallen. Carthagh could not, in this hypothesis, have completed this establishment and fixed it on a permanent footing before his death; nor could he have, as it is stated that he did, lived retired for 18 months after every thing had been properly arranged.

(197) According to the Life (cap. 4.) it would seem as if the name Lismore, or rather Lios-more, which signifies great habitation, village, &c. had been given to that place, before Carthagh's death. It states, that, when marking a site for the monastery, he was asked by a virgin Coemell, who had a cell in the neighbourhood, what he and his companions were about doing. He answered that they were preparing a small habitation to shelter themselves. It will not, she replied, be small but great; on which he subjoined; "What you say is true, for this place will be called Liosmor scotice, latine autem Atrium magnum." The author then adds; "Egregia jam et sancta civitas est Liosmor, cujus dimidium est asyllum, in quo nulla mulier audet intrare, sed plenum est cellis et monasteriis sanctis; et multitudo virorum sanctorum semper illi manet. Vir enim religiosi et omni parte Hiberniae, et non solum, sed ex Anglia et Britannia confluunt ad eam volentes ibi migrare ad Christum." That Lismore was resorted to also by continental students will be seen when we shall come to treat of St. Cataldus.

(198) See AA. SS. p. 154. (199) Ib. p. 557.

(200) Life, cap. 4.

(201) Annals of Innisfallen and Ulster. Usher, (Ind. Chron.) The 4 Masters, (ap. AA. SS. p. 561) have A. 636; which comes to the same point. Ware, (at Writers) agrees with Usher, &c. Yet (Antiq. cap. 29. and Bishops) he marks 638. This is a mistake founded, I suppose, on his having thought, that the 637 of the Annals of Innisfallen should be understood as 638. He might have observed, that these annals do not generally anticipate the vulgar era, as those of Ulster and the 4 Masters do.

(202) Colgan, or some fellow-labourer of his, has most awkwardly placed, in the Topographical index to AA. SS. under the head of Lismore in Munster, Lugadius, who was bishop or abbot of the island of Lismore one of the Hebrides, and died in 589. Hence Archdall has him at our Lismore, thus leading astray the reader, as if there were, at least, a monastery in this place before that of Carthagh. (Compare with Not. 102 to Chap. XII.) And what is still more unchronological, he places there a bishop, John in the time of St. Senan of Inniscatthy. Colgan, indeed, is to blame for this mistake also; for having met with, in a Life of St. Senan, a bishop of that name as contemporary with him, he threw out, with his usual carelessness about anachronisms, a conjecture (AA. SS. p. 539.) that he was perhaps the John, who is mentioned as bishop of Lismore in a calendar at 13 Nov. But the Calendar does not state at what period this John of Lismore lived. Archdall, however, had no right to give as certain what Colgan proposed as a conjecture. Then we find another mistake as to a St. Neman, whom the 4 Masters (ib. p. 568) call abbot of Lismore, placing his death in 610 (611). They could not have meant the Lismore of Munster; but it has unluckily happened, that in the above-mentioned index Neman is mentioned under the head of it, and thence Archdall removed him to that place. In like manner he brought thither an abbot Eochaid, or, as he incorrectly calls him, Leochaid, whose death is assigned (ib. p. 163.) to A. D. 634 (635). And why? Because he likewise is called abbot of Lismore, as if there were no Lismore except that of Munster. The 4 Masters and Colgan well knew that the abbot of this Lismore in 635 was Carthagh himself. Eochaid was, in all probability, a Columbian monk, and perhaps the Eochaid or Eoglod celebrated by Scottish writers as a preacher among the Picts, and of whom Colgan treats at 25 Januar. It is very natural to suppose, that he was abbot of the island of Lismore. Besides all these strangers, Archdall introduces another, as prior to Carthagh, for whom Colgan is not any way responsible, viz. St. Maidoc (misspelt Maidoe), and for no other reason than that Colgan, reckoning up (ib. p. 221) several saints of this name, has among them a bishop of Lismore, without, however, a word concerning the times, in which he lived. The wonderful critic Archdall took it into his head to make him earlier than Carthagh. The fact is, that, as is evident from the concurrent testimony of his Lives, and all our Annals, and even of Colgan, when expressly treating on this subject, there was no monastery at Lismore until the foundation by Carthagh, and that he was both its first bishop and first abbot.

§. xv. St. Cuanna of Kill-chuanna (Killcoonagh) in the county of Galway, where he governed a monastery, or, at least, a church, was maternal brother to St. Carthagh. (203) It is probable that he spent some time at Rathen, before he formed any establishment for himself. (204) If he became abbot of Lismore, as I find him called (205), it must be admitted, that, leaving Kill-chuanna, he succeeded Carthagh as abbot, and perhaps as bishop. (206) But the whole matter is very uncertain. Equally uncertain is the supposition of his having been the author of a historical work concerning Ireland. (207) St. Cuanna died on a 4th of February; but in what year is not known. (208) Out of the vast number of disciples, whom St. Carthagh had at Rathen, some are particularly named as having distinguished themselves by their humility; and it is related that the saint before his death assigned cells or religious houses to be governed by them (209) The first mentioned, as he had been the first who became a monk at Rathen under Carthagh, is Mochua son of Mellain, (210) otherwise called Cronan. (211) Nothing more is known concerning his parentage, or in what part of Ireland he was born. As to the time of his birth, it was probably about the year 570. (212) Having spent many years in a most exemplary manner at Rathen he was placed by Carthagh over a small establishment at Cluain-Dachran, (213) a place in that neighbourhood; Carthagh telling him at the same time, that this would not be the place of his resurrection, as he should have to go elsewhere. At what peculiar time Mochua was appointed to that situation we do not find ; but it must have been prior, by perhaps several years, to the expulsion from Rathen. (214) In the general persecution of the monks of that institution we may justly suppose that Mochua was not spared ; and we find him afterwards in another part of Ireland, as Carthagh had foretold. It appears that he governed a church, and perhaps a monastery, at Glaismor in the now county of Waterford. (215) According to some accounts Mochua presided over a monastery at another Glaismor (216) situated near Swords. But they rest upon very doubtful authority, and, as far as I can discover, no better than a mere similarity of names. (217) In what year this saint died is not recorded. His memory was revered at Lismore and in other parts of Nandesí on the 10th of February. (218) Among the eminent disciples of Carthagh are reckoned three Mochoemogs, one the son of Vairt, another the son of Cuaith, and a third, who afterwards became a bishop. Nothing further is known concerning them, (219) and almost equally obscure is the history of the three brothers Gobban, Graphan, and Laseran, sons of Nescainn, the first of whom is called a bishop. (220) This much may be relied on, that they were placed by Carthagh in a monastery, which he erected in a small island called Inispict, (221) about or before the year 620 on occasion, of a visit to Munster. Having remained there for a year, Carthagh, returning to Rathen, left these three brothers at Inispict under the care of a bishop Domangen, (222) together with twelve other monks. From this superintendence of Domangen it is clear, that Gobban, although he became a bishop somewhere or other, was not one at the time of his entering this monastery. It is not improbable, that his see was the very island of Inispict. (223) As to his brothers, I can find nothing further, that can be depended upon. (224) Next come, in the list of Carthagh's disciples, the names Molua Lughayr. Whether they indicate one or two persons, (225) nothing is known concerning him or those, to whom they belonged. Then are mentioned Aidan, Fiachna, (226) and last of all Finlug.

(203) In Cuanna's Acts at 4 Febr. Colgan quotes the following passage from the calendar of Cashel; "4 Febr. Natalis S. Cuanna, cujus ecclesia est in occidentali plaga Connaciae, et alia de Killchuanna in regione de Tirbrivin: Cormana nomen matris. Est de Lismoro, et ex eadem matre frater sancti Mochudae." His mother Cormana was otherwise called Meadh or Finmeadh; but Colgan shows that there was no real difference between these names. He says that Cuanna's father was Midarn or Midhurn of the house of Niall. Yet elsewhere (AA. SS. p. 338.) he distinguishes, and I believe justly, Cuanna son of Midarn from the half brother of Carthagh. Killcoonagh the saint's principal establishment is now a parish church in the diocese of Tuam and deanery of Annadown. The other Killcoonagh was somewhere in the Hy-briun country (Tir-brivin) likewise in Connaught, and was probably only a church dedicated to St. Cuanna. Archdall places it in Roscommon near the Shannon. Neither of them must be confounded with a Killchuanagh, supposed to have been in Sligo, and governed by a Cuanna disciple of Columbkil. (See Not. 115. to Chap. xi.) Nor must this Cuanna be confounded with the other, although Colgan (Tr. Th. p. 489.) seems to have done so. But in the Acts he does not, where not a word occurs about the brother of Carthagh ever having been with Columbkil. Archdall, who seems to have been fond of jumbling, has confounded them completely.

(204) It is said in Carthagh's Life (cap. 3.) that Cuanna a disciple of the saint went from Rathen to a district called Huibh-echach, not far from Lismore, together with a bishop Dimma, who also had been a disciple of his. Cuanna is likewise there called bishop, but, as Colgan thinks, by anticipation. Perhaps he was the same as the maternal brother of Carthagh, although styled only his disciple.

(205) St. Cuanna is usually said to have been of Lismore; de Lismoro (See Not. 203.) or Cuanna Lismorensis. In one Calendar he is expressly called abbas Lismorensis. This may be a mistake founded on his being named of Lismore, as he might have been in consequence of his having been there with Carthagh. Colgan (AA. SS. p. 338.) explains the words, de Lismoro, of the Calendar of Cashel, as signifying that Cuanna's memory was revered at Lismore on the 4th of February. But it does not follow that he was abbot in that place; and, had he been, it is odd that in said calendar this title is omitted.

(206) Colgan (ib.) was of this opinion, for which, however, he adduces no satisfactory proof. Were it true, it would throw light on what is said of the bishop Cuanna. (See Not. 204.)

(207) Ware (Writers) observes that the book of Cuan or Cuanna is often quoted in the Ulster Annals down to A. D. 628, but not later. Hence he thought it probable, that the author Cuanna flourished about this period. Whether he did or not, something more than this circumstance would be requisite to induce us to believe that he was the Cuanna of Kill-chuana.

(208) Cuanna's death seems to have occurred during the time that St. Fursey was at Perron in France. Hence Colgan deduced, that it probably was about 650; whereas Fursey was not at Perron until 648, and died there in 652.

(209) Life of Carthagh, cap. 3.

(210) Usher, (p. 971) instead of Mellain, has Niellain, and has been followed by Harris (Monaster. at Cluan-Dachran) and Archdall (at Clonrane.) Every where else I find him called Mellain, or Mellan.

(211) Colgan has him under this name at 10 Febr. In the Menologium of Maguir we read; "Mochua de Miliuc, id est, Cronanus filius Mellani." It is remarkable, that many of our saints Cronan are also called Mochua, i. e. My Chua.

(212) In Carthagh's Life (cap. 3.) Mochua is represented as having been from his youth a monk at Rathen. As he was the first, who there embraced the monastic state, we may assign his profession to about 590, the year in which, or nearly so, that establishment was formed, as appears from Carthagh's having governed it for forty years until his expulsion in or about 630. Now, if we suppose that Mochua was only 20 years of age, when he became a monk, we will have his birth about 570. According to a canon of the ancient Irish church the age of 20 years was necessary for the validity of the monastic vow, voto per ficiendo, as laid down in the 17th article of the Synodus S. Patricii, p. 35, in Ware's Opusc. S. Patr. &c. In some other churches the age of 18 was sufficient in those times, as appears from a decree of the second council of Toledo held in the year 531.

(213) Archdall calls it Clonrane, and places it in the barony of Moycashel, Westmeath. It was certainly somewhere very near Rathen; in proximo civitatis Rathen, as expressed in Carthagh's Life.

(214) The foundation of Cluain-dachran is very stupidly assigned by Archdall to about 630. Surely that, being the time of the persecution of Carthagh and his monks, was not a fit one for his forming new establishments near Rathen.

(215) It is now called Clashmore. In the calendars Mochua or Cronan is said to be de Glaismor in Desiis Momoniae. Glaismor is confounded by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 598.) with an unknown place called Gassmor, where one Cuancheir, a disciple of Pulcherius of Liathmore, is said to have erected a monastery. Colgan thought that Cuancheir was the same as Mochua, of whom we are now treating. But Mochua was never a disciple of Pulcherius; and the account given of Cuancheir is so fabulous, that what is said of him is not worth attending to. Yet Archdall assigns the foundation of Clashmore to said Cuancheir, differing in this respect from Harris, who more correctly attributes it to Cronan, al. Mochua.

(216) Archdall has it under the head of Moortown.

(217) In some calendars a doubt is expressed, whether the Glaismor of Mochua was that in the Nandesi country, or the one near Swords. This doubt was increased by the circumstance of there having been a Cronan abbot of the latter. Looking to the connexion between Mochua and Carthagh, it appears much more probable that his Glaismor was the former, as being situated not far from Lismore. The fact is, that the Cronan of Glaismor near Swords must have been different from the disciple of Carthagh, and lived at a much later period. He and all his monks were killed, as our calendarists tell us, by a party of Danes, who went to attack his monastery from their station at Inbher-Domnann. Now the Danes had no such stations in Ireland as early as the period we are treating of; nor is there any certain account of their infesting the Irish coasts until 795. (See Ware, Antiq. cap. 24, and J. P. Murray, De Colon. Scand. &c. in Nov. Comment. Soc. Gotting. Tom. 3.) This is more than sufficient to dispel the doubt, and to show that there is no sufficient foundation for removing Mochua from the Glaismor of Nandesí. Each Glaismor happened to have its Cronan, and hence the confusion. Inbher-Domnann was the mouth of some river to the north of Dublin between it and Holmpatrick, as we learn from the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, (L. 1. c. 44.) where it is stated that the saint, sailing along the coast of the Bregenses, and therefore northwards of Dublin, put into the river's mouth Inbher Domnann, and thence passed over to Inis-Padruic (Holmpatrick.)

(218) The Martyrologium Tamlaet. has at 10 Febr. "S. Cronani filii Mellain in Desiis et Lismoriae." From this and some similar expressions it does not follow, as Colgan thought, that he might have been abbot at Lismore. The phrase merely means that his festival was kept there.

(219) Archdall (at Lismore) has thrust in among its saints a St. Mochoemog, or, as he calls him, Macaomog as having died in 655. But the Mochoemog whom he meant, did not belong to Lismore. He was the celebrated Mochoemog or Pulcherius of Liathmore, a person quite different from the disciples of Carthagh.

(220) Colgan has patched up, chiefly from the Life of Carthagh, the Acts of St. Gobban, (at 17 Mart.) in which he treats also of his two brothers.

(221) Inispict lies near Inisharkan or Inishirkan off Carberry, county of Cork. Archdall says; "near Inishircan in the barony of Muskerry." If near Inishircan, how could it be in that barony? Colgan indeed, not knowing its situation, happened to place it in Muskerry. He might have easily perceived, that it could not have been in that district, being a maritime island, in freto Eogain, as mentioned in the Life of Carthagh.

222 St. Domangen's memory was revered on the 29th of April at Tuaim Muscraige. Archdall did not know where this place was situated. I believe it was the same as Tome, a place marked, as in Muskerry, in Smith's map of the county of Cork.

(223) Colgan conjectures, and with much probability, that Inispict was the place, in which Gobban's anniversary was commemorated on the 17th of March. In this hypothesis we may suppose, that it was there he presided as bishop and finished his earthly career. The monastery of Inispict was for a long period held in high consideration.

(224) Colgan has, without any authority, changed the name of Sraphan into Stephen. And why? Because he wished to find out a day for his commemoration. Now a St. Stephen was revered at Clonemore (co. Wexford) on the 23d of May. Ergo, he concludes, Sraphan was Stephen. Bravo! Archdall was such an humble follower of Colgan, that (at Inispict) he omitted the name Sraphan, instead of which he has given us Stephen. Then to find a day for Laseran, Colgan makes him the same as a Lasrean of Ardmacnasca (co. Down) for this mighty reason that Lasrean was son of one Nasc or Nascha. But in the first place Nasc is not the same name as Nescainn. And supposing it were, surely such an accidental coincidence is not a sufficient argument for removing Laseran, the brother of Gobban, from Inispict all the way to the county of Down. To what Colgan has about Lasrean of Ardmacnasca Archdall (ad loc.) adds from himself, that he was abbot of Hy, and died about 650. But even admitting, that there was a Lasrean abbot of Hy, (See above Not. 165.) he was different from the one of Ardmacnasca; for his father was not Nasc but Feradach. (Tr. Th. p. 498.) And as to his dying about 650, the 4 Masters (ib.) place the death of the supposed abbot of Hy in 601 (602). Colgan says nothing about the year, in which Lasrean of Ardmacnasca died. He states, (AA. SS. p. 17.) that he flourished about 652, which has been understood by Archdall as meaning death. Colgan observes that he died on a 25th of October. On this point Archdall is right enough; and it should have helped him to know, that this Lasrean was different from the supposed abbot of Hy, whose death is assigned to the 17th of September. Another mistake of Archdall is his placing Ardmacnasca in the county of Antrim. It was situated (Colgan, ib.) near a lough called Loch-loedh. Archdall, who cared nothing about misspelling names, instead of loedh, has laigh, and then learnedly tells us that it is now called Lough-neagh. This is not true; nor is there an instance to be found of this lake having ever had such a name. Loch-loedh, or the Calf's pool, was near Downpatrick. (See Tr. Th. p. 386.) It is called by Adamnan (Vit. S. C. L. 3. c. 13.)

Stragnum demersi vituli, and is connected with Strangford lough. Steward has (Topogr. &c.) followed Archdall in this mistake, as unfortunately he has done in too many other cases.

(225) Usher (p. 971) reads them as a name and sur-name; Colgan (AA. SS p. 631.) as two distinct names, and, I dare say, justly. For, unless they be considered as such, the number of the 12 distinguished disciples of Carthagh, whom the author undertook to enumerate, will not be complete. Yet elsewhere (p. 303) he seems to read them as Usher does.

(226) Aidan had a cell near Mount-Luachra in Connillo, county Limerick. (See Not. 6. to Chap. xi.) Fiachna had also one near Coningnibh, somewhere, it seems, in the same district. Yet this is not the cell called from him Kill-fiachna, but that of Aidan, to which this name, instead of Kill-Aidan which it had at first, was given in consequence not, as Archdall says, of Fiachna's having lived in it, but of his having been buried there. (See Usher, p. 971.) He was, in all probability, the Fiachna, whose memory was revered in Inispict on the 30th March, (AA. SS. p. 589) and whom Colgan has confounded with Fetchuo a companion of Columbkil, and one of the persons employed in the conversion of the Picts. To prop up his hypothesis, Colgan (ib.) pretends, that Inispict mentioned in the calendars, where Fiachna's name occurs, means the islands of the Picts, that is, some of the Western isles of Scotland. Yet he knew that there was an Irish Inispict, (See Not. 221.) and inhabited by monks of Carthagh's institution, to which Fiachna belonged. Why then go elsewhere to look for the place, in which this saint was venerated, or make Fiachna the same name as Fetchuo?

§. xvi. St. Libba or Molibba is said to have been bishop of Glendaloch in the early part of the seventh century. (227) His father was Colman or rather Colmad of the illustrious Leinster house of Dal-Mesincorb, and his mother Coeltigerna was sister to St. Coemhgen. Molibba was probably the first bishop of that see, (228) and died on an eighth of January, but in what year is not recorded. Three brothers of his, Dagan, Mobai, and Menoc are also reckoned among the Irish saints. The most celebrated of them was Dagan, usually called of Inverdaoile, a place near the sea in the now county of Wexford, where he governed a monastery. He is said to have been a disciple of Pulcherius of Liathmore, and it is added that he was but a small boy when this saint took him under his care. (229) He remained for many years at Liathmore, until being duly qualified for the purpose, and approved of by Pulcherius, he formed the above-mentioned establishment. Dagan is said to have, while still abbot, made some excursions out of Ireland, and to have visited Rome. (230) He was promoted to the episcopacy some time before the death of St. Molua, and probably about the year 600. (231) His see is called Achadh-Dagan, which seems to be only another name for Inverdaoile, or part of it. (232) He was an ardent supporter of the Irish practices as to the Paschal computation, &c. and his zeal was so great on these points, that, on occasion of his being in Britain and meeting with Laurence, archbishop of Canterbury, and other Roman missionaries, he refused not only to eat in their company, but even under the same roof with them. (233) Notwithstanding his warmth in this respect he is represented as a man of a very mild disposition, (234) and was greatly esteemed for his sanctity, as appears from his having been consulted by St. Molua on an important affair, (235) and from what is said of his having wrought miracles. He died on the 13th of September in the year 640, (236) and was buried at Inverdaoile. As the opposition of this saint to the Roman Paschal cycle, &c. is the first fact we meet with relative to the great contest on these subjects between the Roman and Anglo-Roman clergy on one side, and the Irish on the other, it offers a favourable opportunity for investigating the origin and nature of those disputes.

(227) Harris (Bishops at Glendaloch) places his accession in 612. I do not know where he found this date. Colgan, who treats of Molibba at 8 Januar. merely says, that he flourished about the beginning of the 7th century.

(228) See Not. 161. to Chap. x. Colgan and Harris, supposing that St. Coemhgen had been a bishop, make Molibba his immediate successor at Glendaloch, that is, according as Harris adds, six years before Coemhgen's death.

(229) Dagan's Acts at 12 Mart. from the Life of Pulcherius. If this be true, we may conclude that Dagan was not born before 565. For, as will be seen, the monastery of Liathmore did not exist until, at the earliest, about 576. Now supposing, which, however, there is nothing to prove, that Dagan was placed there soon after its commencement, and allowing him ten or twelve years of age at that time, his birth cannot be assigned to an earlier period than 565. On the other hand it cannot be placed much after 570; for he was a bishop before the death of Molua of Clonfertmuloa, who died, at the latest, in 609. (See Chap. xii. §. 7. and ib. Not. 100.) Colgan has most strangely confounded Dagan with one Dacan, who is said to have been with Petrocus in Cornwall, after he had left Ireland, as if he could have been contemporary with a man, who in all probability was dead before he was born. Petrocus had been the master of Dagan's uncle Coemgen when a child. (See Chap. x. §. 10). Are we then to suppose, that he lived to the time of Dagan's manhood, that is, until near the end of the sixth century. Harris (Writers at Dagan) has copied this mistake of Colgan.

(230) In one of the calendars he is called Dagan the traveller. As to his having been at Rome see Not. 94 to Chap. xii.

(231) Compare with Not. 229.

(232) Achadh-Dagan signifies the field of Dagan, alluding to the site of his church and monastery. There is nothing to prevent our supposing, that the old name Inverdaoile might have yielded to this new one, or that a part of the tract so called was, in consequence of that erection, thenceforth distinguished by the name of Achadh-Dagan. This would be a question of little moment, were it not that, in the hypothesis of these names belonging to two different places, it might be thought that Dagan of Inverdaoile, as he is usually called, was different from the bishop. His having been buried at Inverdaoile shows that this was his regular residence to the last. But, as the period, in which he flourished, was exactly the same as that of bishop Dagan of Achadh-Dagan, (a name, by the bye, which I find only in the Life of St. Molua) and as only one Dagan is spoken of as distinguished in those times, the difference of the names Inverdaoile and Achadh-Dagan does not furnish a sufficient argument to introduce two Dagens instead of one. Having touched on those names I may be allowed to add, that Harris was wrong (Monasteries) in calling the place of Dagan's establishment Inverdagan. For this he had no authority except an error of the press in AA. SS. p. 586, where this name occurs instead of Inverdaoile, i. e. the mouth of a river called Daoile.

(233) See the letter of the bishops Laurentius, Mellitus, and Justus, written in 609, to the Irish clergy ap. Bede, L. 2. c. 4. Smith the editor of Bede says, (Not. ad loc.) that Dagan had been deputed from the monastery of Bangor in Ireland to confer with Laurence on the points then in dispute. As to Bangor he was mistaken; for Dagan had nothing to do with that monastery. Smith's mistake was, I dare say, founded on a Scotch story concerning Dagan having studied at Bangor, which it places in Scotland! Smith, knowing that there was no monastery of Bangor in Scotland, thought that Dagan might have belonged to the real one in Ireland. I suppose that it was some similar story, that induced Mr. Lingard (Anglo Saxon Church, Chap. 1.) to make him a Caledonian bishop. That Dagan was an Irish bishop is evident from the very letter of the Roman prelates. For this letter was written to the clergy of Ireland, and in it bishop Dagan is spoken of as one of them. Then it represents Dagan as "coming into this island" (Britain); "Daganum episcopum in hanc insulam venientem." Accordingly he did not come from Caledonia or any part of Britain. With regard to Dagan's having gone to Britain for the purpose of conferring with Laurence, this is very probable and seems to be hinted at in the letter, where Dagan is said to have come to the Roman prelates; Daganus episcopus ad nos veniens, &c. This phrase conveys the idea of his having paid them a visit, whether to do so was his chief object in passing over to Britain, or, that happening to be there, he thought it right to call upon them. It will be asked, how could he have induced himself to visit persons, with whom he would not condescend to take food. To this I answer, that, if, as in all appearance was the case, he did really visit those bishops, his refusing to eat or even stay in the same house with them could not have been in consequence of any predetermination to that effect, but of something that occurred after his paying the visit. The best manner to account for the matter is to admit, that in their conversation concerning the disputed points some hot words were uttered, and that Dagan felt himself so hurt that he refused to partake of their hospitality. To suppose that he was previously resolved to keep up no sort of communion with them is directly opposite to the fact of his visit, and would indicate a line of conduct very unbecoming a bishop. Surely he would not have prejudged them before he had heard their proposals and what they had to say in their defence. Whether Dagan after conferring or disputing with the Roman bishops became determined, besides shunning their society, not to communicate with them in divinis, is not sufficiently clear. If he did, he went further than he ought to have done, as whatever difference occurred between the parties regarded neither faith nor any essential article of ecclesiastical discipline. In a similar case St. Columbanus, firm as he was on these points, did not cease to hold communion with the Gallican clergy, notwithstanding his being constantly teased by them. (See Chap. XIV. §. 4.) Yet, even in the supposition that Dagan proceeded so far as a separation in divinis, this is to be understood not as if he considered them excommunicated in the full sense of the word, that is, as quite out of the church, but of that sort of partial separation, of which we have innumerable instances in ecclesiastical history, and according to which some particular bishops or churches declined communicating together, while at the same time both parties were in communion with the great body of the Catholic church. One of the penalties or censures used in the African church was, that in certain cases a bishop was suspended from communion with other bishops, still, however, retaining the government and communion of his own particular church. (See Tillemont Mem, &c. Tom. XIV. p. 412.) Had Dr. Ledwich understood those subjects, he would perhaps not have exhibited, (Antiq. p. 369), Dagan's proceeding as tantamount to real excommunication, nor have exemplified it by the uncharitable conduct of the Britons towards the Anglo Saxons, a conduct founded not on religious principles but on their inveterate hatred of that nation, and quite different from the feelings and behaviour of the Irish towards the same people.

(234) Marian Gorman calls him Daganum praeplacidum de Inverdaoile.

(235) See Chap. XII. §. 7.

(236) The 4 Masters in Dagan's Acts. Their 639 is our 640. The name of this saint is marked in the calendars at 12 Mart. to which day Colgan has affixed his Acts.

CHAP XV.

Diversity of practice with regard to the time of celebrating Easter or the Paschal festival—Some of the Eastern Churches observed it on the 14th day of the Hebrew lunar month Nisan—Others, particularly those of Rome and all the West, did not celebrate it until the Sunday following the 14th day—Irish Church always adhered in substance to the Western practice—Decrees of Councils against the Quartadecimans—Difference in the mode of determining the commencement of the first lunar or paschal month—the Western Church followed the old Jewish Cycle of 84 years, and those of Alexandria adopted the Cycle of 19 years—Hence arose a difference in the time of celebrating the festival between these Churches—Roman Church adhered to the old Cycle of 84 years until the middle of the 6th century, when they adopted the Cycle framed by Dionysius Exiguus, which agreed with the Alexandrine method—This method not received in France until the year 590—The Irish Church from its beginning used the Cycle of 84 years—The whole paschal system of the Irish, introduced by St. Patrick, continued in Ireland without any dispute until after the arrival of the Roman Missionaries in Britain—Passed from Ireland into

North Britain—Irish never received their paschal computation from Eastern missionaries—Synod of Old Leighlin, wherein the generality of the Irish clergy agreed to adopt the Roman mode of keeping Easter—Opposed by some others of the Irish, and by the people of Hy—St. Cummian's paschal Epistle to Segenius abbot of Hy—Cummian's great knowledge of Greek—Irish libraries well stocked with books—Cummian supposed to be the same as Cummin-fada—St. Laserian a supporter of the new paschal computation—St. Fintan of Munnu opposed Laserian on this subject—Fintan refused admittance into the community at Hy returns to Ireland, and erects the monastery of Teach-munnu, now Taghmon—Discussions in Legh-cuin on the paschal controversy—Thomisan Archbishop of Armagh and several of the Irish clergy write to Rome to Pope Severinus upon that subject—Roman clergy answer the Irish prelates, and warn them against the Pelagian Heresy—No Pelagian sect ever in Ireland—Mission of St. Aidan to Northumberland on the invitation of king Oswald—Oswald gives Aidan the Island of Lindisfarne, and acts as his interpreter—Several monasteries erected and several of the English converted by Aidan and his auxiliaries—Aidan's diocese extended into Scotland; he had also the care of the church of York, which he and his successors governed for 30 years—Character of St. Aidan—Finan succeeds Aidan in the see of Lindisfarne, and like him perseveres in the old Irish mode of observing Easter—Variety in the mode of keeping the paschal feast among some of the English—Finan baptizes Peada prince of the Middle Angles and all his suite—Peada obtained from Finan four learned priests for the instruction of his subjects—Diuma an Irishman consecrated bishop and placed over the Middle Angles and the kingdom of Mercia—Ceallach or Kellach an Irishman succeeds Diuna, who died shortly after his consecration—Finan baptizes Sigebert king of the East Saxons, and also several of his friends and attendants—Finan, with the assistance of two other bishops, consecrates Ced, and appoints him bishop over the East Saxons—Death of Finan—Is succeeded in the see of Lindisfarne by Colman.

SECT. I.

FROM a very early period of the Christian church there was a diversity of practice with regard to the time of celebrating Easter or the Pasch. One general rule was universally admitted, viz. that it could not be celebrated before the fourteenth day of the first lunar month of the year, called in Hebrew Nisan, the month, in which our Saviour suffered on the cross and rose from the dead. Some churches, particularly those of Asia Minor, kept this festival as the Jews did their Pasch, on the fourteenth day itself, on whatever day of the week it happened to fall, alleging for their practice the authority of the apostles John and Philip, from whom they said it had been handed down to them. On the contrary, the far greater number of churches, such as those of Rome and all the West, together with the churches of Egypt, Palestine, Pontus, &c. &c. did not celebrate it until the Sunday following the 14th day, in consequence of our Saviour's resurrection having taken place on the first day of the week, now called Sunday. (1) This is not the place to enter into a narrative of what occurred, in consequence of this difference, between Pope Anicetus and Polycarp, or between Pope Victor and Polycrates of Ephesus, &c. As the Irish church was by no means in this quarrel, and always adhered, in substance, to the Western practice, I shall only remind the reader that the great council of Nice, to establish uniformity as to the time of celebrating so great a festival, decreed that it should be kept by the whole church on one and the same day, and that this day should be the Sunday next after the 14th day of the first lunar month. It was also resolved that it should not be celebrated before the vernal equinox, lest the church might seem to agree with the Jews, whose Pasch in some years fell before that point. For, according to the cycle used by them in arranging their lunar years, the first month sometimes began as early as the 5th of March, so that in such a case they held their Pasch on the 18th of said month, and consequently prior to the equinox, which was affixed to the 21st, either by the council, as some have said, or, at least, by very ancient custom, followed as far back as the fourth century by the Greeks and Orientals, but not so early by the Latins. The decrees of the council were submitted to by the churches of Asia minor, some of which had given up their former practice even before the council was held, and by whatsoever other churches, that had followed the Jewish computation of the Paschal festivity. Yet some troublesome individuals appeared here and there in the East, who retained the condemned system, and many of whom belonged to heretical associations of one kind or another. Against these obstinate persons, designated by the name of Quartadecimans, several decrees of councils were issued, and some severe Imperial laws enacted. For, in consequence of their resisting the authority of the council of Nice and of several other synods, they were henceforth considered as heretics, schismatics, and disturbers of the public tranquillity, whereby they were looked upon in a very different light from those who had, without any schismatical intention, followed the same practice previous to its being condemned by the Church.

(1) I do not know how to account for the practice of the Asiatics (of Asia Minor,) if their object was to commemorate the resurrection. I cannot but think, that the Easter or Pasch, which they observed, was meant, at least originally, as a commemoration of the last supper, or the Paschal one, which our Saviour had with his disciples on the evening or rather night immediately previous to his crucifixion. As this supper took place on the night of the 14th day of the moon, according to the more general method of reckoning the days, or, according to the Jewish mode, on the night commencing the 15th, the Asiatics, after fasting on the fourteenth in the day time, were accustomed to celebrate the Pasch immediately after, and to cease from fasting, while the rule observed in other churches was to continue the fast until the Sunday following, their object being that of commemorating the resurrection. Usher has touched upon these subjects with great learning in his Dissertat. de Ignatii martyris epistolis, &c. cap. 9. where he distinguishes the Pasch of the passion from that of the resurrection, the former, he says having been that of the Asiatics, and the latter that of the Romans, &c. I wish, however, he had been somewhat more explicit on this intricate question. The definition of the two Paschs, given by Bingham, (Book xx. ch. v. sect. 1.) does not agree with the statement of Usher, who understands by them not two distinct weeks, but distinct days. It may be asked whether those, who held that Easter should not be celebrated except on a Sunday, considered the 14th of the moon, in case of its falling on Sunday, as a fit day for the purpose. Some of them certainly did; among others Anatolius of Laodicea, as appears from his Paschal cycle. And, as far as I can judge, the same rule is marked in the Paschal canon of Hippolytus Portuensis, which was anciently observed for some time at Rome. (See Norris, De Paschali Latinorum cyclo.) But these Paschal calculations were drawn up before the holding of the council of Nice, after which new methods and computations were introduced.

§. II. It might seem that, matters having been so wisely arranged by the council of Nice, there could be no further questions agitated in the Church as to the true time of celebrating the Christian pasch. But a very great difficulty arose in consequence of a disagreement as to the mode of determining the commencement of the first lunar or the paschal month. The primitive Christians had adopted for this purpose, the Jewish cycle of 84 years, which was followed in very many churches until the time of the council of Nice, soon after which the church of Alexandria substituted in its stead the cycle of 19 years, not according to the method of Anatolius, bishop of Laodicea, its first inventor in the year 276, but as reformed by Eusebius of Caesarea. (2) This church was entrusted with the calculation of Easter time, (3) of which it was bound to give due notice to the Pope, to be by him announced to all the churches of Christendom. (4) It would have been well if the Romans had placed full confidence in the Alexandrine calculations; but some how or other it happened, that they retained or returned to the use of the old cycle of 84 years, which was accordingly received generally throughout the Western church. Now this cycle was incorrect, inasmuch as it supposed each lunation to be shorter by two minutes and some seconds than it really is; and hence it followed that in the time of St. Cyril of Alexandria there was a difference of two days between the Roman and Alexandrine reckonings of the days of the moon, the former calling, for instance, the third that, which the latter very properly called the first. (5) Another very important difference consisted in this, that in calculating the days of the solar months, to which the first day or New moon of the Paschal lunation should be affixed, the Latins began with the 5th of March and ended with the 2d of April; whereas the Alexandrians would not allow any new moon, prior to the eighth of March, to be considered as belonging to the Paschal moon, while they extended the latest new moon, fit for that purpose, down to the 5th of April. Hence it followed that the 14th day, which served for fixing Easter Sunday, might fall, with the Latins, on the 18th of March and should be no later than the 15th of April; while, according to the Alexandrine method, it could not be earlier than the 21st of March, and might be as late as the 18th of April. To these differences was added another, the Latins not allowing Easter Sunday earlier than the 16th day of the moon, whereas the Alexandrians were content with the 15th. Thus, if the 14th of the moon fell on a Saturday, the latter celebrated Easter on the following day, and the former put it off until the Sunday sennight. Connecting together the Latin rules, it might seem that, according to them, Easter Sunday could have fallen on a 20th of March; but it appears, that the earliest day allowed by them for it was the 21st. Yet even with this precaution they differed again from the Alexandrines, who marked the 22d as the earliest for that purpose, in consequence of their affixing the equinox to the 21st and their adhering to the rule that Easter should not be celebrated until after it. But afterwards, coming to admit the 21st as the equinoctial day, the Latins received likewise the rule as to the non-celebration of Easter before the 22d; still, however, differing in another point, viz. that they would not allow any Easter Sunday later than the 21st of April, although according to the Alexandrians it might be as late as the 25th of said month.

(2) See Smith's excellent dissertation on the Paschal controversies, Appendix to Bede's Works, No. 9. He shows that this cycle was not, as some have said, drawn up by the council itself.

(3) Many learned men have attributed to the council the commission with which the church of Alexandria was charged to this effect. Whether or no, that church was invested with it about that time with the general consent and approbation of the Christian world. See Smith, ib.

(4) Prideaux (Connection of the History of the Old and New Testament, Part II. Book 4.) says on this subject ; “ The Alexandrians being then of all others the most skilled in astronomy, for this reason the making of this calculation was referred to the bishop of that place ; and they, having applied the nineteen years cycle in a much better method to this purpose than Anatolius had before done, found it the best rule that could be made use of for the settling of this matter ; and accordingly went by it for the discharge of what was referred to them by the council. And therefore they having every year hereby fixed the day, the custom was for the bishop of that church to write of it to the bishop of Rome, who, having the day thus signified unto him, first caused it by his deacons to be published in his patriarchal church on the day of Epiphany preceding the festival, and then by paschal epistles notified it to all the metropolitans through the whole Christian world, and they by like epistles to their suffragans ; and by this means the day was every where known, and every where observed in an exact uniformity of time by Christians all the world over.” Prideaux is not correct in placing the paschal epistles of the Pope after the Epiphany ; for this was the day, on which the time of Easter used to be announced in all churches ; and consequently it was necessary to write said epistles previous to it. The notification of Paschal time used, as Smith justly remarks, to be made by the Pope even before the council of Nice. This is clear from the first canon of the council of Arles held in 314.

(5) See Usher, p. 927.

§. III. Considering this diversity of principles and rules, it is not to be wondered at, that serious questions occurred now and then concerning the time proper for the Paschal solemnity. In the year 387 it was celebrated at Rome on the 18th of April, and at Alexandria on the 25th, on which day it was kept also by St. Ambrose in his church of Milan, as he preferred the Alexandrine computation to that of the Romans (6) In 417 Easter day fell at Rome on the 25th of March, and at Alexandria on the 22d of April. Without searching for further instances, two important discussions occurred during the pontificate of Leo the great, one relative to the Paschal time of the year 444, and the other to that of 455. As to the former, the Roman calculation differed, by nearly a month, from the Alexandrine. The Pope, having consulted, on this occasion, Cyril of Alexandria and Paschasinus bishop of Lilybacum in Sicily, was induced by them to order the celebration of Easter on the 23d of April, the day marked by the Alexandrines. The second discussion was not so easily brought to a close, yet, for the sake of peace, Leo, although not fully convinced by the arguments of Proterius bishop of Alexandria, joined him in affixing the festival for that year to the 24th of April. To obviate these inconveniencies it was deemed adviseable to form a new Paschal cycle. That of 84 years continued at Rome down to, at least, 457, (7) when there appeared that of 532 years drawn up by Victorius of Aquitaine, concerning which let it suffice to observe, that, although it brought matters nearer to the Alexandrine computations than the other, yet it differed from them in several respects so as to leave room for further disputes. (8) Nor was there a final stop put to this controversy between the Romans and Alexandrians until about the middle of the sixth century, when the former adopted the cycle framed by Dionysius Exiguus about 525, and which agreed with the Alexandrine method and rules. Yet this cycle was not received in several parts of the Western church as early as at Rome. A difference concerning the Paschal time existed in France down to not only the year 590, (9) but to a later period, owing to the cycle of Victorius being still followed in some churches.

(6) See Smith, Dissertat, &c.

(7) Norris has proved (De Paschali Latinorum cyclo) that the cycle of 84 years, and no other, was followed at Rome before and during the time of St. Leo, and, at least, until towards the end of his pontificate.

(8) See Smith, loc. cit.

(9) Ib.

§. iv. The churches of Britain had originally followed the Roman practices, in every respect, as to the celebration of Easter. (10) Their cycle was of 84 years, to which they adhered, until after the arrival of Augustin and the other Roman missionaries, nor did they ever meddle with the Quartadeciman controversy, or with the differences, that took place afterwards between the Roman and Alexandrine computations. Even at the time of their disputes with the Romans and Anglo-Romans their Paschal system was substantially the same as that, which the Romans themselves had observed, until their adoption of the cycle and rules of Dionysius Exiguus, with scarcely any exception but one, viz. that, for a reason which shall be soon explained, at this period they considered the 14th day of the first lunar month, if a Sunday, as fit for the celebration of Easter, while according to the old Roman method, it was necessary to wait for the 16th. (11) What discussions occurred between the British and Roman clergy on this or other points, it is not my business to inquire into, (12) and I shall now endeavour to show how matters stood in Ireland. The Irish church had from its very first regular formation made use of a cycle of 84 years, (13) and its Paschal computation seems to have been exactly the same as that followed by the British church when Augustin arrived in Britain. It was quite different from the Alexandrine method, (14) and nearly agreed with the old one of the Romans, that is, the one followed by them before they fixed the 22d of March as the earliest day, on which Easter could be celebrated. (15) Another point, in which the Irish agreed with the Romans before the latter had received the Alexandrine rules, was their not allowing Easter time to be as late in the year as was allowed by the Alexandrians. (16) There is no doubt, that their whole Paschal system was introduced into Ireland by St. Patrick. (17) Yet he was not the author of it. Our Apostle merely delivered it to the Irish church, according as he had found it followed in some parts of Gaul. For it must be observed, that it was exactly the same as that, which was observed at Rome in his time, there being this very important difference between the two methods, that, while in the Irish system Easter could be celebrated on the 14th of the moon, if falling on a Sunday, the Romans, in St. Patrick's days, did not allow its celebration until the 16th. (18).

(10) Smith writes; "Notandum est illos vehementer errare, qui putant Britannos nona Romanis et Occidentalibus, sed ab Orientalibus ritum Paschatis edoctos. Diserte enim testatur Constantinus (magnus) in epistola, quam de hac re scripsit, eodem modo, ac Romae, in Britannia Pascha celebrari solitum."

(11) See Usher, p. 929 and 933. Bingham, accounting for the Paschal controversy between the Britons and Romans (Book xx. chap. v. sect. 4.) attributes it to the adhesion of the former to the old Roman canon.

(12) I cannot pass over an abominable calumny of some writers, among whom Ledwich, (Antiq. &c. p. 412.) against Augustin, archbishop of Canterbury. They say, that he excited Ethelbert, king of Kent, to slaughter the British bishops on account of their not submitting to the Roman practices. Nothing can be more false. Ledwich quotes a passage from Usher, (De Libert. Eccl. Britann.) in which indeed he states, but without any foundation, that Augustin excited Ethelbert against those bishops. Yet Usher has not a word about slaughter, either in the quoted passage or in what follows; nor were any bishops slaughtered by Ethelbert, or during the life time of Augustin. The whole matter is most clearly exhibited by Bede, (L. 2. c. 2.) who has been copied by Henry of Huntington (L. 3.): Augustin had, with the assistance and influence of Ethelbert, adjutorio usus Aedilbereti regis, procured two conferences about A. D. 603 with some British bishops and doctors, at the second of which several monks of their famous monastery of Bancor (near Chester) attended. After much debating Augustin reduced the terms, on which they and the Romans might live in ecclesiastical fraternity and peace, to three points; 1. that they would receive the paschal computation of the Romans; 2. that they would administer baptism according to the rite used at Rome; and 3. that they would cooperate with himself and his brethren in preaching the word of God to the English. They refused to agree to any one of these proposals, even to the third, in not complying with which they were certainly inexcusable in the sight of God, and added that they would not acknowledge him as their archbishop, thinking that he was a haughty prelate, because, on their coming to the conference, he did not stand up to salute them. Augustin, finding them so obstinate, is said to have announced to them, that, whereas they would not keep peace with their fellow Christians, they would get war from their enemies, and that, as they were unwilling to preach the way of life to the English, they would be punished by that nation with death. And so, says Bede, it came to pass; for, several years after Augustin had been removed from this world, Aedilfrid king of Northumberland, who was a pagan, (see Bede, L. 1. c. 34.) invaded the country near Chester with a great army. Together with the Britons, who marched out to oppose him, there was a great number of the British clergy and particularly of the monks of Bancor, who, when the battle was about to begin, stood apart from the scene of action praying for the success of their countrymen, and protected by a detachment under the command of one Brocmail. Aedilfrid, on being informed what they were employed in, said; "Whereas these men are crying out to their God against us, they, although unarmed, are in reality fighting against us;" and immediately ordered the first attack to be made upon them. Brocmail and his men instantly fled, leaving the clergy and monks to be slaughtered by the Northumbrians, while the battle was raging elsewhere. It is said, that about twelve hundred of those unarmed persons, who had assembled merely to pray, were killed in this massacre. It took place in the year 613 (Usher, Ind. Chron.) about eight years after the death of Augustin in 605. (See Smith, Not. to Bede L. 2. c. 3.) This is the dreadful slaughter alluded to by certain calumniators. Now who does not see that neither Augustin, nor Ethelbert, nor any Christian whatsoever contributed to it in the least ; and that it was totally unconnected with either the Paschal or any other question of ecclesiastical discipline? We may here remark, by the bye, that it evidently appears from what occurred in the above mentioned conferences, that there was not the slightest difference in points of faith or doctrine between the Romans and Britons ; for, had there been any, Augustin would not have requested the British clergy to join him in preaching to the Anglo-Saxons, upon the mere condition of their observing the Roman Easter and rites of baptism, matters purely of changeable discipline, and concerning which there exists in the Catholic church at this very day a diversity of practice, without its implying the least breach of Christian communion. As to the refusal of the Britons to submit to Augustin as archbishop, it is to be observed, that they had already an archbishop of their own, the bishop of Caerlegion on Usk (near where this river falls into the Severn) ; and surely it was not the intention of Augustin to compel them to receive himself as their metropolitan, unless all their bishops would consent to this change of jurisdiction. Nor does it appear that Augustin insisted upon it, although he had been invested by Pope Gregory with a legatine jurisdiction over them. (See Bede, L. 1. c. 27.) There have been many oppositions to the exercise of legatine powers even in very late times without their being considered as amounting to the guilt of schism. When the abbot of Bancor in his letter to Augustin (ap. Spellman and Wilkins, Concil. &c. and Smith's Appendix No. 10.) declined acknowledging his jurisdiction, he declared, however, his obedience to the church, and to the Pope, and to every one according to his just rank, observing at the same time, that he was under the immediate government of the bishop of Caerlegion. This bishop was considered by the Britons as possessed of a sort of patriarchal power, similar, for instance, to that of the bishops of Antioch and Alexandria, a power recognized by the see of Rome, and in no manner clashing with the supremacy annexed to said see. Away then with the quibbles and unfounded allegations of certain writers, who talk of a difference of doctrines between the Britons and Romans, and of the former not having been in communion with the latter, nor acknowledging any supremacy of the see of Rome at the period of Augustin's arrival in England.

(13) Usher, p. 929.

(14) See Cummián's Paschal epistle.

(15) Cummián says that among other differences between the Irish computation and the others there was one relative to the equinox. This must have consisted in their not affixing it to the 21st of March, and consequently not waiting for the 22d as the day, before which the celebration of Easter should not be allowed. Now the older Latins followed the same rule; (see above §. 2.) and we find an Easter Sunday observed in Spain on the 21st of said month as late as the year 577. (Smith loc. cit.)

(16) We have seen (§. 2.) that the Alexandrians celebrated Easter as late as the 25th of April at a period when the Romans did not allow it to be subsequent to the 21st. Bede observes (L. v. c. 22.) that the monks of Hy, after they had received the Alexandrine or new Roman computation kept Easter Sunday, in the year 729, on the 24th of April, and that this was the first time that they celebrated it on the corresponding day of that month. Hence it is plain, that the Irish had a rule, according to which Easter could not be as late as the 24th; for, otherwise, it would happen more than once to fall on that day.

(17) Cummián represents it as different from the cycle, which, he says, St. Patrick formed and brought to Ireland. Of this he gives no proof; and, as Usher observes, (p. 930) it is clear from the catalogue of Irish saints, that during the times of the two first classes there was only one Paschal computation known in Ireland, viz. the very one, which Cummián disapproved of, and which allowed the 14th day of the first lunar month, if falling on a Sunday, to be fit for the celebration of Easter. It was not until the time of the third class that, as expressly stated in said document, questions began in Ireland about the incorrectness of that cycle, or concerning the propriety of altering it. Nor is there any foundation for supposing that St. Patrick drew up one differing from it; whereas, if he had, the Irish would have followed his and no other.

(18) In the year 414 there was a question at Rome concerning the Easter time for that year, in consequence of the strict adhesion to the rule of not celebrating it until the 16th of the moon.

(See Smith, ib.) This was 18 years prior to St. Patrick's arrival in Ireland. Several writers have laid down, that the Irish computation was in all respects the same as that, which the Romans themselves practised in the time of St. Patrick. I cannot express their ideas on this subject better than in the words of Prideaux, (Connection, &c. Part II. Book 4.) who writes: "Till the Saxons came into this island (which was A. D. 449) the British churches having always communicated with the Roman, and received all its usages, as having been till about that time a province of the Roman empire, they agreed with it in the use of the same rule for the fixing of the time of their Easter; and the Irish, who had not long before been converted by St. Patrick, who was sent to them from Rome, followed the same usage. But afterwards, when the Saxons having made themselves masters of all the eastern and southern coasts of this island had thereby cut off all communication with Rome, all that correspondence, which till then the British and Irish churches had held with the Roman, thenceforth ceased, and was wholly interrupted, till the coming hither of Austin the monk to convert the English Saxons, which was about 150 years after. And therefore neither the British nor the Irish knowing any thing of the reformation, that had in the interim been made in this rule concerning Easter, either by Victorius or Dionysius, went on with the observing of the said festival according to the old form of the 84 years cycle, which they had received from the Romans before the Saxons came into this land. And in this usage Austin found them on his arrival hither; and they, having been long accustomed to it, could not easily be induced to alter it for the new usage of the Romanists, which Austin then proposed to them. And hence arose that controversy about Easter, which, &c." It was thus also that Bingham (see Not. 11.) and many others each understood the origin and nature of this controversy; but, though otherwise nearly exact, they were not aware of the true cause of the difference as to the 14th and 16th days of the moon.

§ v. To understand the origin of this difference, it must be recollected that, owing to the incorrectness of the cycle of 84 years followed at Rome, a palpable mistake, which could be discovered merely by eyesight, had crept into the Roman mode of reckoning the days of the moon. In the early part of the fifth century it had come to such a pitch, that what was really only the first day, was called at Rome the third, (19) and what was only the 14th was called the 16th. Sulpitius Severus, who lived at this period, having undertaken a revisal of the cycle of 84 years, and observing that the day called the 16th, on which, according to the Roman method Easter could be celebrated, was, correctly speaking, the 14th, thought it absurd to go on calling it the 16th. According he gave it the name of 14th, and laid down as a rule, that, as it was in reality the same day as the 16th of the former edition of the cycle, Easter Sunday might fall on the 14th, but not earlier. (20) St. Patrick, who was undoubtedly acquainted with Sulpitius Severus, and followed the Gallican practices, such as were observed at Tours, Auxerre, &c. brought this reformed cycle, and its rules, to Ireland, where it was observed without any dispute until after the arrival of the Roman missionaries in Britain. From Ireland it passed into the parts of North Britain possessed by the Scots and Picts, in consequence of its having been adhered to by Columkill and his disciples. The Britons also adopted it, not indeed as, strictly speaking, a new cycle different from the old Roman, which they had followed from the beginning, (21) but as a more correct and rational edition of it. The Romans, on finding the 14th day of the moon considered by the Britons and Irish as a fit day for celebrating Easter, thought that their system smelt of the heresy of the Quarta-decimans, (22) not reflecting that they never kept the festival on the 14th, unless it were a Sunday, (23) and that their admitting the 14th into their Paschal canon was owing to an error of the Romans themselves. For, had they not been in the habit of calling by the name of the 16th, that, which was really only the 14th, the first Paschal day of the Irish canon would have been called the 16th. They would have also recollected, that it was but a short time before their arrival in Britain that the Alexandrine system was received at Rome, instead of the former computation, which was, at least, as different from the Alexandrine, as that of the Britons and Irish. (24) From all that has been now said it is clear, that there is not the least foundation for the hypothesis of those, who pretend, that the Irish received their Paschal computation from Eastern missionaries. And indeed, had such been the case, it would have been very different from what it really was. (25).

(19) See above §. 2.

(20) Usher, p. 933. seqq.)

(21) In the time of Constantine the great there was no difference whatsoever between the Roman and British computations. (See above Not. 10.) That relative to the question concerning the 14th and 16th days was introduced many years after.

(22) The charge of heresy is brought, in the letter of the clergy of Rome (A. D. 640) against such of the Irish as still adhered to the former computation. In it we read; “ Reperimus quosdam provinciae vestrae, contra orthodoxam fidem, novam ex veteri haeresim renovare conantes, Pascha nostrum, in quo immolatus est Christus, nebulosa caligine refutantes, et quartadecima luna cum Hebraeis celebrare nitentes.” (See Bede, L. 2. c. 19.)

(23) This is acknowledged by Wilfrid in his conference with Colman; (ap. Bede, L. 3. c. 25) and Bede himself attests it more than once. Thus he observes, (L. 3. c. 4) that it is a mistake to charge them with always celebrating Easter on the 14th of the moon, as the Jews did; whereas they never kept it except on a Sunday, although, he adds, they had not learned the method of discovering which was the true Paschal Sunday.

(24) The abettors of the new Roman method looked upon as an important error the affixing of the earliest Easter Sunday to any day of the first moon except the 15th. Now we have seen (§. 2.) that, until the adoption of the Dionysian or Alexandrine rules that day was objected to at Rome, and that it was thought necessary to wait for the 16th. If then it was such a mighty error to assign any day different from the 15th the Romans had been as much mistaken as the Irish, with this only difference, that, while the latter began one day earlier than the 15th, the former began a day later. It is curious to observe with what confidence Wilfrid asserts, (ap. Bede, L. 3. c. 25.) that St. Peter, being at Rome, established the rule of beginning with the 15th; as if the Paschal computation observed there in Wilfrid's time were that which the Romans had followed from the commencement of their church. Colman was, unluckily for his cause, equally ignorant of the old Roman system, and, instead of showing the falshood of Wilfrid's assertion, appealed to the authority of St. John the Evangelist, who, he said, had celebrated Easter on the 14th. On this point Wilfrid had greatly the advantage of Colman, and pressed him with an argument, which he was not able to answer. Yes, said Wilfrid, St. John observed the Pasch on that day, according to the injunction of the Mosaic law, not caring about the day of the week; but your system is different from his, whereas you never celebrate it except on a Sunday.

(25) Spotiswood derived the Scottish Easter from some disciples of St. John the Evangelist; (See Chap. i. §. 5.) Sir G. Mackenzie from the Grecian church. (See O'Flaherty's refutation in Ogygia vindicated, ch. 17.) This nonsense having been overturned by Usher, Prideaux, Bingham, Smith, &c. it was reserved chiefly for Ledwich to revive it. This mighty Doctor, who cannot bear any sort of communication with Rome, tells us (Antiq. p. 358, seqq.) that it was brought to Ireland by Asiatics; and why? Because Colman said that it had been observed by St. John, (See Not. prec.) and because it agreed with the Asiatic system. But Colman, however mistaken on this point, did not say, that St. John or any of his disciples introduced it into Ireland; nor did it ever come into his head or into that of any Irishman of those times, that the first preachers of the Gospel in this country were Asiatics. If the Irish had been converted by missionaries from the East, how came it to pass, that the liturgy and every part of the church service were celebrated in Latin? Had those missionaries been Greeks, or from countries where Greek was generally spoken, the ecclesiastical language of Ireland might have been Greek; or if they had come from places still more to the East, it might have been Syriac. But there was no reason whatsoever why it should be Latin; for Ireland was not a province of the Roman empire, and Latin was as little known by the Irish as Greek, Syriac, or any other foreign tongue. The Doctor urges, that their Paschal computation agreed with that of the Asiatics, thus giving us a sample of his profound ignorance of the whole question. By Asiatics he seems to have meant those of Asia minor, who followed the Quartadeciman practice, previous to the Council of Nice. Now, in the first place, this practice was essentially different from that of the Irish, who always celebrated Easter on a Sunday. Ledwich identifies it (p. 360) with the British system, not knowing that, even before the council, the Britons, so far from agreeing with those Asiatics, had no other Paschal computation than the Roman one. (See §. 4. and Not. 21.) To see more of his ignorance, it is to be observed, that, in his hypothesis, there must have been a regular Christian church existing in Ireland before the time of the council, and as far back as the third century; for his favourite Asiatics immediately renounced their Quartadeciman system on the promulgation of the decree of the council. What immortal honour would our hero acquire were he able to prove that there was a settled Christian establishment in Ireland at that early period, and that it calculated Easter time in a manner different from that of the whole Western church? But it will be said, he does not distinguish it from the method of all the West; whereas he states, that it was the same as that of Britain. Aye; but this excuse will serve only to show that the poor Doctor contradicts himself, although unwittingly, through lack of knowledge. Great as he thinks himself, he did not know, that in those times there was no difference between the British and Roman computations; so that if the Irish one was the same as the British, it must have been also the same as the Roman, and consequently quite the reverse of the Asiatic. Perhaps he meant to insinuate, that we received Christianity from some of those outcast Quartadeciman heretics, who rambled about the world after the council was held. It may be that he would rather this had been the case than allow, that we had any thing to do with the Romans. But here likewise comes a stumbling block in his way, whereas the great maxim of these Quartadecimans was that the Paschal should be always celebrated on the 14th of the moon, whatever day of the week it might fall upon. If in his loose and desultory sentences concerning Asiatics and Greeks the Doctor alluded to Catholic missionaries, as having come to Ireland from the Eastern countries some time after the council of Nice, he might have easily learned, that they would have brought with them the Alexandrine computation, it being at that period and thenceforth universally received in all the Catholic churches of those countries. The truth is, that, in whatever manner the question be considered, it is evident that the Irish Paschal system was of Western origin. This has been so ably proved and learnedly illustrated by Usher, that every writer of any reputation, who since his time has touched on the subject, agrees with him on this point. Even the Doctor would agree, were it not for his inveterate hatred of the Romans. I know that, many years ago, after he had published the first edition of his book, he was told in a friendly manner that Usher had completely settled this controversy. The Doctor said, that he had not met with Usher's explanation of it. A strange answer, indeed! For Usher has left us full sixteen pages concerning it in the Primordia. But, if he had not, by that time, seen it in Usher, he ought to have looked for it before he undertook his second edition, and I dare say he did. Yet in this edition (p. 55. seqq.) the same stuff about Asiatics, and their having brought to Ireland their Paschal method, is found exactly as in the first, without the least notice of what Usher had written. Hence it may be judged by what spirit the Doctor was moved, when treating of this and other parts of our ecclesiastical antiquities.

§. VI. After the letter of Laurence and the other Roman prelates (26) became generally known, in Ireland, inquiries began to be made which was the right method of calculating the time of Easter. Some few were, it seems, willing to adopt the new Roman one, while others thought it sufficient to make a correction in the Irish system by affixing the earliest Paschal Sunday to the 16th of the moon, according to the old Roman practice, instead of the 14th. (27) But the bulk of the clergy and nation were attached to the old computation until the year

630, when, in consequence of an admonitory, letter from the Pope Honorius I. (28) a synod was held at or near Old Leighlin, (29) which was attended by a great number of persons, and among others, by the heads of several of the greatest religious establishments in the Southern parts of Ireland. (30) St. Laserian, abbot of old Leighlin, spoke in favour of the Roman system, and was strenuously opposed by St. Fintan Munnu of Taghmon. (31) The heads of the old establishments (32) declared, that they had been directed by their predecessors to follow the practices of the successors of the Apostles, (33) and accordingly proposed that Easter should for the future be celebrated at the same time with the universal Church. This was agreed to and the matter appeared to be quite settled, when not long after a troublesome person (34) started up, and by his intrigues rendered abortive part of what had been decreed. To put an end to this opposition, it was resolved by the Elders, that whereas, according to a Synodical canon, every important ecclesiastical question should be referred to the head of cities, (35) some wise and humble persons should be sent to Rome, as children to their mother. These deputies being arrived there saw with their own eyes Easter celebrated at one and the same time by people from various countries, and, having returned to Ireland in the third year from their departure, solemnly declared to those, who had deputed them, that the Roman method was that of the whole world. It is added, that several miracles were wrought in Ireland through the reliques of martyrs, which these persons had brought from Rome. (36) Henceforth, that is, from about the year 633, the new Roman cycle and rules were received in the Southern division of Ireland, comprizing not only Munster, but likewise the greatest part of Leinster and a portion of Connaught. (37)

(26) See Not. 233 to Chap. xiv.

(27) In the account of the third class of saints it is stated, that, while some of them celebrated Easter on the 14th, according to the old Irish rule, others held it on the sixteenth. And we find that in some churches (Usher says Gallican, p. 932) this was considered as the earliest Paschal day down to, at least, A. D. 710. The abbot Ceolfred, in his letter to Naitan king of the Picts (ap. Bed. L. 5. c. 21.) written in this year, inveighs against the rule of the 16th and represents it equally bad with the 14th. It had been, however, long observed at Rome, and was marked in the Paschal canon of Victorius. Thence it was seen by some of the Irish clergy, merely, I suppose, for the purpose of warding off the great objection of the Romans, viz. that in some years they celebrated Easter at the same time with the Jews.

(28) See Bede L. 2. c. 19. Usher assigns this letter to A. D. 629.

(29) Cummián (Paschal Ep.) has in Campo-Lene, the field Lene. Others have, in the White field, which was near Mount Marge, and not far from the Barrow. It was adjacent to St. Lasarian's monastery of Leighlenn, now called Old Leighlin. (See Usher, p. 936.)

(30) Cummián says, that the successors of bishop Ailbe (of Emly), Queran (Kieran of Clonmacnois), Brendin (Brendan of Birr), Nesson (of Mungret), and Lugidus (Molua of Clonfertmolua) were present either in person or by their deputies. Usher states, that the archbishop of Emly was president of the synod.

(31) Usher p. 936. seqq. from the Life of Fintan.

(32) See Not. 30.

(33) Cummián represents them as saying; "Decessores nostri mandaverunt per idoneos testes, alios viventes, alios in pace dormientes, ut meliora et potiora probata a fonte baptismi nostri et sapientiae et successoribus Apostolorum Domini delata sine scrupulo humiliter sumeremus."

(34) Cummián calls him a white-washed wall. It is not known who he was. It cannot be supposed that he was Fintan Munnu; for, his sanctity was so universally acknowledged, that Cummián would not have ventured to speak of him in that disrespectful manner, or to use some other severe expressions, which he has against that disturber of the peace.

(35) Cumnian's words are ; " Ut si causae fuerint maiores, juxta decretum Synodicum ad caput urbium sint referendae." One of the canons ascribed to St. Patrick runs thus in Ware's edition ; (Opusc. &c. p. 41.) " Si quae quaestiones in hac insula oriantur, ad sedem Apostolicam referantur." In Dachery's edition quae is omitted. The meaning of this canon is more clearly expressed, as quoted by Usher, (Discourse on the religion, &c. chap. 8.) the substance of which is as follows ; " If a difficult cause may occur, which cannot be easily decided by the Irish prelates and the see of Armagh, it shall be sent to the Apostolic see, that is, to the chair of the apostle St. Peter, which hath the authority of the city of Rome." This canon, which Usher copied from an old book of the church of Armagh, is attributed to a synod of Auxilius, Patricius, Secundinus, and Benignus, and is on the whole in these words ; " Quaecunque causa valde difficilis exorta fuerit, atque ignota cunctis Scotorum gentium judiciis, ad cathedram archiepiscopi Hibernensium (idest, Patricii) atque hujus antistitis examinationem recte referenda. Si vero in illa, cum suis sapientibus, facile sanari non poterit talis causa praedictae negotiationis, ad sedem apostolicam decrevimus esse mittendam, id est, ad Petri apostoli cathedram, auctoritatem Romae urbis habentem. Hi sunt, qui de hoc decreverunt, id est, Auxilius, Patricius, Secundinus, Benignus." Ware adds, (loc. cit. p. 128.) that it was headed, "De alienis provinciis adeundis ad judicandum in causis difficilioribus." I suspect that this canon, as now quoted, is not quite as ancient as St. Patrick's times, and that it is a paraphrastic explanation of the original short one of St. Patrick, &c. yet conveying its true meaning. It seems to allude to Scottish churches out of Ireland, which also should have recourse to the see of Armagh. Now there were no such churches in St. Patrick's days. These canons prove, besides the primacy of Armagh, that the Irish church did from the beginning acknowledge the supremacy of the see of Rome. Otherwise would it have referred its difficult questions to a see so distant from Ireland, while at that period there were several eminent churches much nearer to us, such as those of Tours, Toledo, &c. unless a peculiar prerogative were believed to belong to the chair of St. Peter.

(36) I have here followed Cumnian's narrative as closely as I could. He was himself one of those, who had deputed these messengers, received their report, and saw the miracles, &c. As to the arrangement of the transactions, including the synod of Campus Lene, I have, for the sake of perspicuity, followed that of Usher. Yet Colgan, who also had followed it, (AA. SS. p. 53) offers elsewhere (p. 409) some arguments to show, that it is not correct. He observes, that Usher was wrong in confounding Maghlene (Campus Lene) with the White field, the former having been in the territory of Fearcall (in the now King's county) and the latter in Lethglin, the district in which Old Leighlin (county Carlow) is situated. Accordingly he distinguishes two synods, one at Maghlene, and the other at White-field. His statement comes to these points. 1. There was a synod held at Maghlene, viz. that spoken of by Cummian. 2. Subsequently to it, the deputies were sent to Rome. One of them was, he thinks, Laserian, who, in his Life, is said to have gone to Rome together with several other persons, and to have been there consecrated bishop. 3. Laserian had returned from Rome before the holding of the synod of White-field, it being, says Colgan, so stated in the account of that synod given in the Life of Fintan Munu, where we read; "Lasreanus enim abbas monasterii Leithglinne, cui suberant mille quingenti monachi, novum ordinem defendebat, qui nuper de Roma venit." Colgan connects the qui, &c. with Lasreanus, as if the author meant to say, that he had come lately from Rome. But the context seems in some part to indicate, that qui is to be joined with novum ordinem, and that the author's meaning was, that the new order or computation had lately come, or been brought, from Rome. If Colgan's interpretation be right, it may be supposed, that Laserian was the bearer of the letter of Pope Honorius, and that on this account we find him called the Pope's legate, or messenger, a title, which has been afterwards misunderstood as indicating that Laserian was appointed Apostolic legate for Ireland. 4. After the return of the deputies from Rome was held the synod of White-field, described in Fintan's Life, and in which Laserian and Fintan Munu acted the distinguished part, which we have seen. Here a weighty difficulty occurs from the silence of Cummian concerning any synod being held after the return of the deputies. Yet it may be answered, that his mentioning the report delivered by them to those, who had sent them, pre-supposes a synod. And it is to be remarked, that Cummian says nothing about any contest at the synod of Maghlene, nor makes any mention of Laserian or Fintan. On the whole, Colgan's statement appears very consistent; and if Maghlene was, as he asserts, a place different from White-field, we must admit that two synods were held, one about three years before the other. But how is the chronology of these transactions to be determined? Usher calculated that the synod of Maghlene, which he considered the same as that of White-field, or Old Leighlin, was held in 630, because he thought the enormous difference of about a month between the Paschal computations for the year 631, occurred in the year next after that of the synod. It is known that, according to the Irish method, Easter should have been celebrated in 631 on the 21st of April, while at Rome it fell on the 24th of March. Cummian makes mention of this difference, where he says, as understood by Usher, that the deputies were at Rome in the Easter time, when said difference of a month occurred, alluding to the year 631. Colgan explains Cummian's text as signifying, that this great difference took place in the year of the return of the deputies, which, as well as the synod of White-field, he accordingly marks at 631; thus supposing, that the synod of Maghlene might have been held in 628, whereas, if different from that of White-field, there must have been at least three years between them. But his interpretation of Cummian's words cannot be reconciled with the context, and that of Usher is the only correct one. It may, however, be doubted, whether the year 631 was the first next, or the second next, after the synod of Maghlene, whereas the deputies might not have arrived at Rome prior to the Easter of the year immediately subsequent to that of the synod. In this case the Easter of 631, which the deputies saw celebrated at Rome, would have been in the second year after the synod, which consequently would have been held in 629. Yet this is an inquiry of very little importance, and we may safely adhere to the date assigned by Usher. It now remains to observe, that, if the synod of White-field was, as seems exceeding probable, different from that of Maghlene, it must have been held in 633 or 634. O'Flaherty, who agrees with Colgan as to the two synods, differs from him with regard to the times. He admits with Usher, that the synod of Maghlene was held in 630, and then places that of White-field in 633. (See Ogygia vindicated, ch. 17.) But, as delays usually occur in such cases, it might have been as late as 634. Bede, making mention (L. 2. c. 19.) of the letter of Pope Honorius to the Irish nation, seems to assign it about the same time that he sent the pall and wrote to Honorius, archbishop of Canterbury, which was, he says, in 634. (Others have said, in 633.) Supposing this to have been Bede's meaning, it will follow, that said letter was not written prior to the synod of Maghlene, or in 629, as Usher thought, (see Not. 28.) but after it, and when the Irish deputies were setting out from Rome. And thus we have an additional argument in favour of Colgan's statement of those transactions, excepting, however, his dates, which are in opposition even to Bede, if, as appears very probable, he ought to be understood as placing the Pope's letter to the Irish about the year 633 or 634.

(37) Bede writes L. 2. c. 3.) " Porro gentes Scottorum, quae in australibus Hiberniae insulae partibus morabantur, jamdudum ad admonitionem Apostolicae sedis antistitis Pascha canonico ritu observare didicerunt." He is treating in that chapter of some transactions of the year 635. His saying jamdudum cannot be construed into his having meant to state, that the Roman method had been universally received in the South of Ireland—a considerable time before that year; for, not to repeat what has been given from Cumman, in this case Bede would have contradicted himself, whereas from the manner, in which he speaks (L. 2. c. 19.) of the letter of Pope Honorius, it is clear that he did not consider that method as received in any great part of Ireland at the time said letter was written. Therefore the phrase jamdudum is not relative to the year 635; or, if it be, it must be translated merely already, without an allusion to any particular length of time. In fact, the Southern Irish had adopted the Roman system before that year. Bede makes mention, in the same chapter, of the Northern province of the Scots, meaning the Northern half of Ireland, in which, he says, the old Irish method was still observed at that period. He alluded to the well known ancient division of Ireland into two parts, viz. Legh-Cuin and Legh-Mogha, separated from each other by a boundary line extending from the mouth of the Liffy to where Galway now stands. Legh-Cuin, al. Legh-Con was the northern, and Legh-Mogha the southern half. (See Ware, Antiq. cap. 3. in Harris's ed. 4.)

Instead of Legh, it would be more correct to spell it Leath, which signifies half.

§. VII. One of the principal abettors of the Roman computation and promoters of its adoption by the Southern Irish was Cummian, author of the celebrated Paschal epistle to Segienus, or Segenius, abbot of Hy and others. (38) He seems to have been a Columbian monk, (39) and was probably educated in the monastery of Durrough, (40) which was subject to the superintendence of the abbot of Hy. At the time of the proceedings now related he had, apparently, an establishment of his own, which was, in all likelihood, that of Disert-chuimin, (so called from his name) now Kilcomin or Kilcummin in the King's county. (41) Segienus and his monks of Hy, who were greatly attached to the Irish method, in consequence of its having been observed by St. Columba, (42) were much displeas'd with Cummian for his opposition to it, and for his having, as there is great reason to believe, induced the Columbian monks of Durrough to unite with the whole clergy and people of the South in the adoption of the Roman system. To answer the charges brought against him, Cummian wrote his epistle (43) in defence of himself and of those, who were of his opinion. He says, that prior to his having consulted the successors of Ailbe, &c. (44) he spent a whole year in studying the subject in dispute, that he searched the holy scriptures, examined ecclesiastical history, inquired into the various cycles and into the divers Paschal systems of the Jews, Greeks, Latins and Egyptians. And very ably has he executed his task. Besides a multitude of texts of Scripture he quotes passages from Origen, St. Cyprian, St. Jerome, St. Augustin, St. Cyril of Alexandria, and Gregory the great. He refers also to councils, and dives into the intricacies of the Paschal computations, resting his arguments partly on the origin and nature of the Paschal solemnity, and partly on authority, particularly that of the great body of the Catholic church. Laying great stress on the doctrine of St. Cyprian and other Holy fathers concerning the unity of the Church, he says; "Can any thing more pernicious be conceived as to the mother church than to say; Rome errs, Jerusalem errs, Alexandria errs, Antioch errs, the whole world errs; the Scots and Britons alone are right." Cummián's knowledge of Greek is discoverable, and perhaps too much so, in this tract, which, on the whole, exhibits an extraordinary degree of learning of various kinds, and shows how well stocked with books, considering the times, the Irish libraries were at that period, and with what ardour the students made use of them. Cummián did not, however, succeed in convincing the monks of Hy, who, as will be seen, continued for many years after to follow the Irish computation.

(38) In the head to this Epistle, besides Segineus (of whom see Chap. xiv. §. 12.) Beccan, a solitary, is particularly mentioned as brother to Cummián. Colgan treats of him at 17 Mart. and says, that he was surnamed Ruim or Ruiminn. He makes him a native of Tyconnel and of the house of Niall, in consequence of his having confounded Cummián with Cummineus Albus abbot of Hy. Several Becans were distinguished in the South of Ireland, where we find a Becan of Kinsale, a Becan, son of Cula (AA. SS p. 623.) and a Becan of Cluain-ard. Mobece in Muskerry (ib. p. 615) or, as Archdall calls it, Killbeacan. The Becan, brother of Cummián, was probably in Hy at the time Cummián wrote his epistle, but might have afterwards settled in Ireland. For we are not bound to believe, that he was the Becan Ruiminn, who, according to the 4 Masters (ib. p. 630) died in Britain A. 676.

(39) Cummián's letter is in the form of an apology to persons invested with some jurisdiction over him, and he addresses them as his fathers, protesting that his differing from them on the Paschal question was not owing to any contempt of them but to a conviction of the truth of his opinion.

(40) According to Colgan (AA. SS. p. 411.) Cummian is said to have been abbot of Durrough. He might have been raised to that situation before his death; but it is more than doubtful whether he was abbot there at the time he wrote that letter. It is worth remarking that, as Colgan observes, Durrough was situated in the plain called Magh-lene. Hence it follows that the synod, called of Maghlene, may be supposed to have been held in that monastery, or in the open air near it. This furnishes an additional argument in favour of Colgan's account of that synod, &c. (See Not. 36.)

(41) Colgan says (ib. and p. 408.) that Disert-chuimin was at the borders of Leinster and Munster (old Munster), and west of Roscrea. This agrees with the situation of Kilcomin, which is seven miles west of that town. (See Archdall at Kilcomin.) Cummian placed some reliques of St. Peter and Paul in the church of Disert-chuimin; (Colgan, ib.) and we may justly suppose, that it is to them he alludes in his Epistle. He represents his habitation as a sort of lurking place; "Haec dixi, non ut vos impugnam, sed ut me ut nycticoracem in domicilio latitantem defenderem." This passage cannot be well understood as referring to the great monastery of Durrough, but is very clear if applied to Disert-chuimin.

(42) See Not. 236. to Chap. XII.

(43) Usher (Ind. Chron.) assigns it to A. D. 634. It seems, indeed, to have been written not long after the return of the deputies from Rome, which was in 633. If, as appears most probable, the synod of White-field was different from that of Maghlene, and was accordingly held after said return, we may be allowed to suppose that the Epistle was written previous to it; and thus the silence of Cummian with regard to this synod may be satisfactorily explained. (Compare with Not. 36.)

(44) See Not. 30.

§. VIII. This really learned man has, as observed elsewhere, (45) been most strangely confounded with Cumineus Albus, abbot of Hy, and hence it has been inferred, that he was of the Tyrconnel line of the Nialls and nephew to the abbot Segineus. (46) It is plain, that Cummian was a native of some part of the southern half of Ireland, or Legh-Mogha, (47) from which were all those members of the synod of Magh-lene (Campus Lene) mentioned by him, and whom he calls the successors of our former fathers, (48) thus alluding to the part of Ireland, to which he belonged. It has been conjectured, and with great probability, that he was the same as Cummin surnamed Fada, or the long, (49) a man celebrated for his learning. The names are not different; (50) and nothing can agree better than the times. For Cummin Fada, who was son to Fiachna, king of West Munster, was born in 592 and died in 662. (51) Now, as Cummian wrote the Paschal epistle about 634, he would, supposing him the same as Cummin Fada, have been at that time about 42 years old, an age answering very well for the composition of so learned a production. Next comes the great reputation for learning enjoyed by Cummin Fada; (52) and certainly it would have been well merited, were he the author of the Epistle. The only objection of any weight that I can find against this hypothesis, is that Cummin Fada is said to have been bishop of Clonfert, whereas Cummian seems to have been only a priest. Yet it is not certain that he never became a bishop; (53) and on the other hand there is reason to doubt, whether Cummin Fada was one. (54) Besides the Paschal Epistle, Cummian was, in all appearance, author of the treatise, De poenitentiarum mensura, a very learned abridgment of the ancient penitential canons. (55) I have nothing further to add concerning this distinguished man than that, if he was the same as Cummin Fada, he lived until 662, and died either on the 12th of November, or 2d of December in said year. (56)

(45) Not. 70 to Chap. xi. To the writers there mentioned, who fell into this mistake, we may add Archdall (at Kilcomin), and Ledwich, (Ant. p. 168) who adds that Cummian was a Culdee and apostatized. When the Doctor talks of Culdees he does not know what he is saying. And as to apostatizing, what did Cumman apostatize from? He received the Alexandrian, or new Roman cycle, &c. instead of the Irish one. If this be apostacy, there is not a greater apostate in the world than the Doctor himself. For he has received, and does pertinaciously follow, the Gregorian calendar or New stile, which has been brought from that mother of corruption, Rome, rejecting the good Old stile, which had been so long observed by the church of England. Cumman, by whatever name the Doctor may please to call him, was, at least, an honest man. He did not conceal the known truth. He did not act like the Doctor, when, analyzing Cumman's epistle, (ib. and p. 169.) he wilfully omitted what is there said of St. Patrick and his cycle. (See Chap. 11. §. 5.)

(46) This and similar stuff will be found in Colgan's Acts of Cumineus at 24 Feb. In consequence of said confusion he makes also Becan a nephew of Segineus. (See Not. 38.) But, if Segineus had been uncle to Cumman, would he not have been mentioned as such in the inscription to the epistle, in the same manner as Cumman there calls Becan his brother?

(47) See Not. 37.

(48) Successores nostrorum patrum priorum, Ailbei episcopi, &c. (See Not. 30.) Afterwards he says; "Visum est senioribus nostris. These elders were all Southernns.

(49) Ware, (Writers at Cummin Fada) who has been followed by Dupin, Bibliothèque, &c. at Cumman. Harris argues against this conjecture of Ware on the ground that the author of the Paschal epistle was connected with the monks of Hy, with whom Cummin Fada had nothing to do. How did he know this? Or how could he prove, that Cummin Fada was not a Columbian monk belonging to one or other of their establishments in the South of Ireland?

(50) The names, Cumin, Cummin, Cumman, latinized into Cumineus and Cummanus are frequently used for one and the same person.

(51) Usher, p. 972. from the Ulster annals. Colgan has (AA. SS. p. 149.) a fable concerning Cummin Fada having been educated by St. Ita, as if a man, who was not born until 592, could have been reared by a person, who died in 570. This fable has been copied by Harris, (Writers) although he might have observed, that Colgan acknowledges that the history of Cummin Fada has been corrupted by various anachronisms. In what Colgan adds concerning his having had for preceptor a St. Colman O'Cluasaigh, who is said to have written a panegyric on him, I find nothing contradictory. Of this Colman nothing further is known than that he died, according to the 4 Masters (ib. p. 247) in 661 (662) the year, to which, together with the Annals of Ulster, they assign also the death of Cummin Fada.

(52) In the Festilogium of Aengus, quoted by Colgan (AA. SS. p. 746) it is stated that, while other holy men received one gift or another from the Almighty, Cummin Fada received that of science and wisdom. He is said to have been the author of a hymn beginning with the words, "Celebra Juda festa Christi gaudia." (See Usher, p. 972 and Ware at Cummin Fada.)

(53) If Cumminian was the same as the priest Commian of the third class, (see Chap. xiv. §. 8.) it will follow that he was never raised to the episcopacy, as he was dead before the catalogue of saints was written. Usher thought (p. 968) they were the same; yet we have no positive proof of it, and there were other Commians distinguished in those days, to one or other of whom the author might have alluded, perhaps to Commian or Cumineus abbot of Clonmacnois, who died in 665. (See Usher, ib. and AA. SS. p. 90.) Colgan (ib. p. 59) reckons a heap of saints Cummins, Cummians, Cumineus's, &c. all of one and the same name.

(54) Colgan (ib. p. 149.) calls Cummin Fada bishop of Clonfert, and has been followed by Ware, (Bishops) who, however, does not give him that title in Writers, which he had published before the AA. SS. appeared. Nor does Usher, wherever he mentions his name, call him a bishop, as he certainly would have done, had he found him so styled in his documents. Cummin Fada is spoken of several times in the Life of St. Molagga (20 January) without that title; and it is particularly remarkable, that in the 19th chapter of said Life he is mentioned immediately after Conang ô Daithil and Russin, the former of whom is called comorban of St. Ailbe (of Emly) and the latter comorban of St. Barr (of Cork); while Cummin Fada is designated merely as the son of Fiachna. Had he been bishop of Clonfert, would he not have been styled a comorban as well as the prelates just named, that is, comorban or successor of St. Brendan? I suspect that the only foundation for making him bishop of Clonfert is a genealogical story of his having been half brother, by his mother's side, of Guaire king of Connaught. Hence it was inferred, that Guaire invited him to that province, and procured a bishopric for him. How little that story is to be depended on appears from its stating, that he was also maternal brother of Crimthann, son of Aidus king of Leinster. Thus his mother would have been married to three kings, Fiachna, Colman (father of Guaire), and Aidus. This is not enough; they moreover tell us that the said prolific princess was the mother of six bishops and six kings! (See AA. SS. p. 148.)

(55) This treatise was found by Fleming in the monastery of St. Gall under the name of abbot Cumean of Scotia or Ireland. It was afterwards published by Sirin, together with several other works, which Fleming had collected. Thence it has been republished in the Bibliotheca Patrum, Tom. 12. Lyons, A. 1677. It bears every mark of that line of studies, to which Cummián had addicted himself, and shows a great knowledge of the discipline of both the Greek and Latin churches. It contains, indeed, several penitential rules inapplicable, at least in Cummián's time, to Ireland, such as those against heretics, persons treating with barbarous invaders, &c. &c. so that I thought for a while it might have been the work of a Cummián, who, though an Irishman, lived somewhere in the continent. But on observing the stress laid by the author on the canons against the Quartadecimans, whom he names very particularly, it appeared to me that the author must have been one, who wished to guard his readers against having any, the most remote, connexion with those heretics. There was no Irishman or Cummián, to whom this criterion is so applicable as to the writer of the Paschal epistle. His detailing penitential regulations then unnecessary in Ireland can be easily accounted for, whereas his object was to give a summary of the penitential discipline of the whole Christian church in every part of the world. The style of this tract is often coarse and somewhat incorrect like that of the epistle. Dupin observes, (Bibliothèque, &c. at 7th century) that it is well worth consideration on account of the knowledge it conveys of various ecclesiastical practices of that period. In it we find the confession of secret sins and bad thoughts, with the penances enjoined, (passim) masses for the dead, (see capp. XI. and XIV.) the holy Eucharist constantly called sacrifice, (capp. XI. XII.) the celibacy of the clergy (cap. III.) &c. &c. As Cummin lived many years before Theodore of Canterbury, Fleury was mistaken (L. 40. §. 46) in saying that the latter was the first among the Latins that drew up a penitential.

(56) Some old calendarists assign the Natalis of Cummin Fada to 12 Nov.; but the 4 Masters place his death on the 2d of Dec. See AA. SS. p. 149.

§ IX. St. Laserian, the other great supporter of the new Paschal computation, was, it is said, (57) son of Cairel a nobleman of Ulster and of Gemma daughter of Aiden king of the British Scots. (58) The year of his birth is not known (59); and the early part of his life is involved in obscurity. According to one account he was a disciple of Fintan Munnu, while another places him under an abbot Murin. (60) When arrived at a mature age, he is said to have proceeded to Rome, and to have remained there for 14 years. (61) Then we are told that he was ordained priest by Pope Gregory the great, and soon after returned to Ireland. Coming to Leighlin (Old Leighlin) he was most kindly received by St. Gobban, who there governed a monastery. This saint conceived such a high opinion of Laserian that he gave up to him his establishment, and went to erect a monastery elsewhere. (62) Laserian is said to have had 1500 monks under him at Leighlin. (63) About the year 630 he went again to Rome, probably as chief of the deputation sent by the heads of the Southern clergy after the synod of Maghlene, (64) and was there consecrated bishop by the then Pope, Honorius I. (65) After his return to Ireland, in or about 633, he greatly contributed towards the final settlement of the Paschal question in the South, (66) which he survived only a few years, having died in 639 (67) on the 18th of April. This saint was buried in his own church at Leighlin, and his memory has been greatly revered in the province of Leinster. (68)

(57) The Bollandists have (at 18 April) a Life of Laserian or Lasrean, which, they say, was written after the year 1100. They justly observe, that it is a confused tract and often not worthy of credit. He is sometimes called Molassius or Molaissus, latinized from Mo and Laisre his real name, in the same manner as his namesake of Devenish was so called, with whom he must not (as has been done by Hammer, p. 123, new ed.) be confounded. (See Not. 124 to Chap. XII.)

(58) Ware (Antiq. cap. 29. and Bishops at Leighlin) says, that Laserian was son of Cairel de Blitha. Harris (Bishops) translates by Blitha; and perhaps this was Ware's meaning; for his account of this saint differs in many respects from that of the Life published by the Bollandists. For instance, according to Ware, his mother was daughter of a king of the Picts.

(59) The Bollandists supposed, (Comment. praeuv.) but without any authority, that he was born about 566. This conjecture is connected with a huge mistake of theirs, of which lower down, in stating that Fintan Munnu was then a monk in Hy.

(60) The Bollandist Life makes Fintan his master. But it is probable that Laserian was nearly as old as Fintan, who was young at the time of Columbkil's death in 597. In the account of the contest between them at Whitefield there is no allusion to this discipleship. According to Ware, Laserian studied under Murin, until he set out for Rome. Who this Murin was Ware does not tell us. He could not have been St. Murus of Fohen, (in Donegall) who flourished about the middle of the seventh century. Perhaps the person meant by the name of Murin was Murgenius abbot of Glean-Ussen; (see Chap. XIV. §. 11.) and there is reason to think, that Laserian studied rather in the South, where the clergy were inclined to receive the Roman cycle, &c. than in the North where it was violently opposed.

(61) Ware agrees with the Life as to these 14 years spent at Rome. The Bollandists think that, instead of fourteen, we ought to read four.

(62) Colgan was of opinion (AA. SS. p. 750) that this was the Gobban who governed a church at Kill-Lamhraighea, a place in the West of Ossory, viz. after having left Leighlin, and who was buried at Clonenagh. Archdall (at Leighlin) refers to Colgan and Usher as if placing the death of Gobban in 639, although Usher says nothing about him, nor does Colgan even mention his name in the page referred to.

(63) See Not. 36.

(64) Ib. I wish the account of Laserian's having been at Rome in the time of Gregory the great were as well founded as that of his mission thither after the synod of Magh-lene.

(65) Usher, p. 938. Ware, Antiq. cap. 29.

(66) See Not. 36.

(67) Annals of Innisfallen.

(68) Ware, loc. cit.

§. x. The distinguished opponent of Laserian, Fintan Munnu or Munna, was of the Niall family, and son of Tulcan and Feidelmia. (69) Whether he belonged to the Northern or Southern Nialls I do not find recorded; but it appears probable, that he was of the former, and that he was a native of the North of Ireland. (70) He is said to have been placed first at the school of Bangor under St. Comgall, and to have afterwards studied in the school of Kilmore Deathrib, which Columbkil is supposed to have governed for some time before his departure from Ireland. (71) Passing by this more than doubtful statement, Fintan's chief master and instructor seems to have been Sinell, son of Maynacur, with whom he remained for 18 years at Cluain-inis (72) until about the time that he resolved on going to Hy for the purpose of being admitted a member of the monastery. While preparing to set out for the island he was informed, that St. Columba died a few days before and was succeeded by Baithen. Fintan still persevered in his determination, hoping to be received by Baithen into his community.

When arrived in Hy, he was treated as a mere stranger; for even his name was not known there, and Baithen had never seen him until that time. (73) On being introduced to Baithen, he was examined by him as to his name, family, studies, conduct, &c. and his object in coming to Hy. Fintan, having answered all his questions, humbly requested to be admitted as a monk. Baithen replied; "I thank my God, that you are come to this place; but this you must know that you cannot be a monk of ours." Fintan much afflicted at these words said; "Is it that I am unworthy of being one?" "No;" answered Baithen; "but, although I should be very glad to keep you with me, I must obey the orders of my predecessor Columba, who some time ago said to me in the spirit of prophecy; Baithen remember these words of mine; immediately after my departure from this life, a brother, who is now regulating his youthful age by good conduct, and well versed in sacred studies, named Fintan, of the race of Mocu-Moie, (74) and son of Failchan, will come to you from Ireland (Scotia) and will supplicate to be reckoned among the monks. But it is predetermined by God, that he is to be an abbot presiding over monks, and a guide of souls. Do not therefore let him remain in these islands of ours, but direct him to return in peace to Ireland (Scotia), that he may there establish a monastery in a part of Leinster not far from the sea, and labour for the good of souls." The holy young man, shedding tears, returned thanks to Christ, and said that he would follow these directions. Soon after, having received Baithen's blessing, he returned to Ireland. (75) What is here related must have occurred in the year 597, as it was very soon after the death of St. Columba. We may fairly suppose, that Fintan did not delay long to set about forming his monastery, which has been called, from his name, Teach-munnu, the house of Munnu, (76) now Taghmon in the county of Wexford. He is said to have presided there over 152 holy monks. (177) Were we to believe certain confused accounts, Fintan founded some other establishments; but I shall not tire myself or the reader with searching for them. (78) Nor is it necessary to undertake a serious refutation of his having been abbot and bishop of Clonenagh. (79) Some writings have been attributed to this saint, but on such authority as cannot be depended upon. (80) Notwithstanding his opposition to the Roman cycle, he was, even at the time of the contest with Laserian, most highly revered for his sanctity and power of working miracles. (81) It appears, that Fintan soon after withdrew this opposition, and agreed with his brethren of the South. (82) He did not long survive this happy event; whereas he died in 635 on the 21st of October. (83)

(69) His Life begins with the following words, as quoted by Ware; (Writers, cap. 13. al. 15.) “Fuit vir vitæ venerabilis nomine Munnu, de claro genere Hiberniæ insulæ, idem de nepotibus Neil, cujus pater vocabatur Tulcanus, mater vero Feidelmia dicebatur.” Tulcan was descended from Conal son of Niall. (Tr. Th. p. 373.) Archdall, according to his usual carelessness as to spelling names, has (at Taghmon) Fulcan instead of Tulcan. This saint is sometimes called simply Munnu, as in the passage now quoted, and elsewhere throughout said Life; or Munna, as in the Life of St. Maidoc of Ferns; (cap. 32.) and at other times simply Fintan, as by Adamnan, (Vit. S. Col. L. 1. c. 2.) who calls him Fintan son of Tailcan. Colgan says (Tr. Th. ib.) that Munnu was a surname, and latinizes it into mundus, meaning, I suppose, that it signified clean. Adamnan speaks of Fintan as of the race of Mocu-Moie, which Colgan thinks ought to be read Mocu-Maine, by allusion to Fintan’s maternal descent, as his mother was of the family of Maine or Manius likewise a Niall. (ib. from Fintan’s Life.) Might it not be conjectured, that the name or surname Munnu may have some reference to the Maine branch of that family?

(70) Adamnan (L. 1. c. 2.) makes mention of a clergyman, named Colum-crag, as a friend of Fintan. Colum-crag lived somewhere not far from Derry. (See Not. 117 to Chap. xi.)

(71) O'Donnel, Life of St. Col. L. 1. c. 110 and Fintan's Life. (See Tr. Th. p. 460.) But how reconcile Fintan's having been a disciple of Columbkil before A. D. 563, the year of his departure for Hy, with Adamnan's speaking of him as a young man at the time of the same saint's death in 597? To mend the matter, it is added in the same Life and by O'Donnel, that Columbkil being at Kilmore-Deathrib told Baithen, that young Munnu, who was then in the school, would become a great and holy man. Now we know from Adamnan, (L. 1. c. 2.) that Baithen had never seen him until he went to Hy, and that even his name had not been heard of before in that island. Hence it is clear, that the account of Fintan having been a scholar of Columbkil's any where is fabulous. It was too much the fashion of our hagiologists to make the saints, whose acts they undertook to write, disciples of various eminent men without caring about times or places. Concerning Kilmore-Deathrib see Chap. xi. §. 10.

(72) See Chap. xii. §. 12.

(73) Hence it appears how much mistaken the Bollandists were (at Life of Laserian, Comment. pr.) in stating, that Fintan Munnu had been in Hy since the year 566, and that he was then a monk there. The fact is that, as will be seen directly, he was not at any time a monk of Hy.

(74) See Not. 69.

(75) Adamn. L. 1. c. 2. and Munnu's Life, (ap. Tr. Th. p. 461.) which adds, that the part of Leinster, to which he was directed to go, was Hy-kinselagh.

(76) In the Life of St. Maidoc of Ferns we read; (cap. 32.) "Quodam tempore sanctus episcopus Moedoc exivit visitare S. Munna abbatem habitantem in suo monasterio, quod dicitur Teach Munnae."

(77) AA. SS. p. 218. Yet, ib. (p. 606.) Colgan makes them 233; and (p. 50) 234.

(78) Colgan quotes (ib. p. 606) from the Life of Munnu a passage, in which he is said to have spent, before he went to Hykinselagh, five years in a monastery of his at Teachtelle in the district of Heli (Ely O'Carrol) in Munster. But why go to Munster, after he had been directed to settle in Leinster? From what I have met with of that Life, it is easy to perceive, that it is a confused fabulous tract; and it is better to follow Adamnan, and the author of the Life of Maidoc, who give us to understand, that Fintan, or Munnu, governed only one monastery, viz. that of Taghmon.

(79) Colgan has this fable, AA. SS. p. 356. Whence he got it he does not tell us. Perhaps he took it from some scholiast, who, finding that there were one or two Fintans at Clonenagh, and that there was a bishop Fintan, confounded Munnu with more than one of them for this wise reason, that he also was a Fintan. (Compare with Not. 174 to Chap. XII.) Archdall, the humble follower of Colgan, has copied this stuff (at Clonenagh).

(80) Hanmer (Chron. p. 123.) makes him the author of a book on the Paschal controversy, as if his disputation on that subject were to be construed into a book. Dempster ascribes to one Fintan a work on the Acts of Columbkil, and some Epistles to St. Baithen. Colgan thought, (Tr. Th. p. 470) that Dempster meant Fintan Munnu, although he was wrong in his account of Fintan. It is of no consequence whom he meant; for we may be sure, that the whole is one of his usual inventions.

(81) In the account of the proceedings at White-field it is related, that Munnu proposed to refer the question to the judgment of God to be declared by miracles. I very much doubt of his having done so. Such a proposal smells of later times than those, in which he lived. Be this as it may, Laserian is said to have declined the challenge, observing that, if Munnu wished to change the mountain Marge into White-field, or vice versa, God would grant him his request. (See Usher, p. 937.)

(82) We read, (ib.) that the synod of White-field terminated in the general consent of all those, who had attended it. "Postea consentiantes populi cum sanctis ad sua reversi sunt."

(83) The Annals of Tigernach have; "A. D. 634. the rest of Fintan, i. e. Mundu Mac Tullcain 12 Cal. Novemb." Usher has retained (Ind. Chron.) A. 634; but Ware (Writers at Munnu) more correctly substituted A. 635. For the 4 Masters, who generally anticipate a year, have also 634. (See Tr. Th. p. 373.) In Harris' edition the 24th of October appears, through an error of the press, instead of the 21st; and in Archdall's book, which is full of such errors, the 25th (at Taghmon). But, (at Clone-nagh) he has the 21st, joined, however, with another error, viz. 638 for the year of Fintan's death, instead of 634 (635).

§. XI. The proceedings in the southern half of Ireland concerning the Paschal controversy gave rise to discussions on the same subject in Leigh cuin or the northern half. It seems, that several of the clergy of this division were inclined to receive the new Roman computation, while others held out for the Irish one. It was accordingly thought advisable to consult the Holy see on this question; whereupon Thomian, archbishop of Armagh, (84) and several other prelates and distinguished clergymen wrote a letter to Rome, accompanied with some documents relative to it. (85) This letter was not received until a little before the death of Pope Severinus, who consequently had not time to draw up an answer to it, nor was it even opened during the short time that he survived. (86) But soon after his death the heads of the Roman clergy, the see being vacant, wrote, in answer to that of the Irish prelates, &c. a letter directed to the very same persons who had addressed the Holy see. It was written in 640, (87) some time between the first of August and the Christmas of said year, (88) and is headed with the names of Hilarus the archpriest, acting for the holy Apostolic see; John a deacon and Pope elect; John the primicerius, and acting for the holy Apostolic see; and John, counsellor of the same Apostolic see. The persons, to whom it is directed, are thus mentioned; "To the most beloved and holy Thomian, Columban, Cronan, Dima, (89) and Baithan bishops; Cronan, (90) Ernian, Laistran, Scellan, and Segenus priests; Saran and the other Scot doctors and abbots." (91) The letter begins with a charge against some persons of their province, as if renewing the Quartadeciman heresy; (92) whence it appears, that false reports had been circulated at Rome, and that the true state of the question was not rightly understood. Unfortunately the remainder of it is lost, except a part, in which the Irish clergy are cautioned against allowing the poison of Pelagianism to spread in their country. "For," say the Roman clergy, "you cannot be ignorant of "how that execrable heresy has been condemned; "whereas it has not only been abolished for 200 "years back, but, although buried, is every day "anathematized by us; and we exhort you to take "care, that the ashes of those, whose weapons have "been burnt, be not stirred up among you. For who "will not execrate the proud and impious endeavours "of those, who say that a man can exist without sin "through his own will, and not by the grace of "God? And, first of all, it is a foolish blasphemy "to say, that man is without sin, which no one can "by any means be, except the one mediator of God "and men the man Christ Jesus, who was conceived "and brought forth without sin. For all other men, "being born with original sin, are known (even "though not in a state of actual sin) to bear testi- "mony of Adam's prevarication, according to the "words of the prophet; For behold I was conceived "in iniquities, &c." This truly execrable heresy did not begin to make its appearance in Ireland until a short time before the Roman letter was written, (93) It was not infected with any such heresy in the days of St. Columbanus; (94) nor does Pelagianism seem to have made any progress in Ireland, or to have given rise to even one congregation separated from the Catholic church. (95) The most that can be allowed is, that, although there was no Pelagian sect in this country, there were some theologians, who, in discussing the important questions relative to Grace and Free will, were more inclined to favour the latter than the former, and, as has been too much the case with many divines of later times, intermingled certain Pelagian principles or embers with the doctrine of the Gospel.

(84) See Chap. xiv. §. 12.

(85) That such a letter was written by Thomian, &c. although not remarked by Usher and Ware, is evident from the letter of the Roman clergy, which is represented as an answer to the papers sent from Ireland, and begins with these words; “Scripta, quae perlatores ad sanctae memoriae Severinum Papam adduxerunt, et, eo de hac luce migrante, reciproca responsa ad ea quae postulata fuerant, siluerunt. Quibus reseratis,” &c. It is thus the passage appears in Smith’s edition of Bede, L. 2. c. 19. In an older edition, followed by Usher, (Sylloge Ep. Hib. No. 9.) it runs somewhat differently, so that Usher thought that before scripta we should place Ad. Be this as it may, the word, Scripta seems to indicate something more than a mere letter.

(86) Hence we understand why the Roman clergy say, Scripta —siluerunt. Quibus reseratis, that is, unsealed after the death of Severinus.

(87) Ware, (Bishops at Thomian) assigns this letter to 639. Usher also had (Sylloge, &c.) marked the same date; but having afterwards found, that Severinus died in 640, he affixed it (Pr. p. 938 and Ind. Chron.) to this year, and indeed justly; for Pope Severinus died on the first (not second, as Usher says, this being the day of his burial) of August in said year. (See Pagi, Critica, &c. ad A. 638. §. 3. and A. 639. §. 3. As the pontificate of Severinus lasted little more than two months, having begun on the 28th of May, and ended on the first of August, it is right to conclude, that the letter of Thomian, &c. directed to Rome, was written also in the same year 640, that is, the early part of it, and for the same reason I have stated, that it was not received by Severinus until a short time before his death.

(88) The vacancy of the Holy See after the death of Severinus continued four months and 24 days, and ended with the consecration of John IV. which, says Pagi, (at A. 639 §. 7.) took place on the 24th of December, A. D. 640. Hence it follows that, as the Roman letter was written during said vacancy, its date must be assigned as here stated.

(89) In all the editions of Bede, instead of Cronan, we find Croman; but Colgan observes (AA. SS. p. 16.) and, I think, justly, that Cronan is the true reading. Croman is not an Irish name, whereas Cronan was a very common one. As to Dima, Smith has changed it into Dinna. Yet there can be no doubt that the real name was Dima or Diman.

(90) Here again Bede's text has Croman.

(91) Some account of the persons here named will naturally be expected by the reader. Concerning Thomian we have seen already, Chap. xiv. §. 12. Of the others Colgan treats (AA. SS. at 6 Januar. p. 16, 17.) in a brief, but rather correct, manner. The bishop Columban was Columban Hua Telduibh, bishop of Clonard, who died on the 8th of February, A. D. 652 (653). Elsewhere (ib. p. 406.) Colgan calls him Colman; for the names Colman or Columban were frequently interchanged. Usher makes mention of him (p. 964) by the name of bishop Colman, son of Cuidel-dubh, and says that, according to the Ulster annals, he died in 653 (654). Ware (Bishops at Meath) marks his death at 651, for no other reason, as well as I can discover, than that, having found in AA. SS. (p. 406.) the death of Ossan, the successor of Colman at Clonard, assigned also to 652, he thought Colman's death ought to be drawn back at least one year. Harris, in his additions to Ware, mentions a typographical error, following which Ware would seem to place the death of Colman 852. This error appears in the Latin edition of Ware's Bishops, but has been corrected in the English translation. Cronan was bishop of Antrim, and died in 642 (643).

Dima or Diman was bishop of Connor. He was a native of Munster, and son of Aengus of the Dalcassian line of the royal house of that province. The occasion of his being settled at Connor was his having been, when young, placed in the monastery and school, which was governed by Colman-elo, while he resided in that diocese. (See Chap. xiv. §. 2.) He is mentioned in Colman-elo's Life, as a most exemplary disciple of his, by the name of Dima dubh, or black, on account of his black hair or dark complexion; and in that of St. Croán of Roscrea (if, however, the Dima there spoken of was the same, which I much doubt of), as very expert in transcribing books, After Colma-elo's return to his own country, Dima became abbot of his monastery, and afterwards bishop of Connor. He lived to a very great age, and his death is assigned in various Irish annals to the year 658 (659), and sixth of January, at which day Colgan has given his Acts. Ware (Bishops at Connor) has the 16th of January, 656. As to the 16th it must be an error of the press; for Colgan, from whom he took his account of Dima, constantly has the 6th. And as to A. 656, Ware was led astray by a similar error in p. 16 of AA. SS. where we find that number, while every where else (ex c. p. 17. 18, and Ind. Chron.) we have 658. Harris, to show his learning, adds to Ware that, according to an ancient calendar, Dima died on the 5th of January. And why? Because the calendar has the 8th of the ides of that month. Now a schoolboy might have informed him, that the 8th Ides, &c. was exactly the sixth of January in the modern mode of reckoning.

Baithan was, says Colgan, (ib. p. 17), in Airteach, i. e. at a place in that district called from his name, Tegh-baithin in the diocese of Elphin, and not far from the town of said name. He treats of him at 19 Febr. and calls him son of Cuanach, who was a Niall. Yet he doubts, whether the Baithan of this Tegh-baithin (for there were other places so called) might not have been Baithen son of Alla. Be this as it may, the son of Cuanach is expressly called a bishop, and perhaps his see was the Teghbaitin of Westmeath, where some of our calendarists have placed him. Smith is quite wrong. (Not. to Bede, L. 2. c. 19.) in making the bishop Baithan of the Roman epistle Baithan of Clonmacnois; for this place belonged to the Southern half of Ireland, none of whose prelates or clergy were concerned in this correspondence; nor was Baithan of Clonmacnois a bishop as early as 640. Besides we know from Cummian, (above §. 6. and Not. 30.) that the abbot or bishop of Clonmacnois had declared in favour of the Roman computation at the synod of Maghlene.

Cronan, the first mentioned among the priests, was abbot of Maghbile, or Merville in the county of Down. He died on the 7th of August, A. D. 649 (650.) Usher (p. 969) makes mention of a Cronan son of Silni; but nothing more is accurately known about him than that he died in 665. Here again occurs another mistake of Smith. He makes the Cronan of the letter Cronan of Roscrea. Without adducing other arguments it is sufficient to observe, that Cronan of Roscrea belonged to the South of Ireland. It is strange, that this laborious editor of Bede did not look into Colgan's AA. SS. Had he done so, his annotation on the persons named in said letter would not have been so meagre and incorrect as it is.

Ernian was, in all probability, Ernan abbot in Torey island, who flourished at this period. He is called the son of Colman, and must not be confounded with Ernen or Erneneus, son of Crescen, of whom Adamnan says (Vit. S. C. L. 1. c. 3.) that he was famous and very well known throughout all the churches of Ireland. For this Ernen, besides having been a Southern, died, as will be seen hereafter, in 635, and accordingly some years before Thomian, &c. wrote to Rome. Ernian of the letter was different also from Ernene or Ferreolus, who was buried at Druim-Tomma, and who, according to every appearance, was not a priest. (See Not. 118 to Chap. xi.) Usher seems to have confounded together these three Ernenes or Ernans. (Compare p. 968. with Ind. Chron. ad a. 635.) Colgan has taken care to distinguish (Tr. Th. p. 490.) Ernan of Tory island from the one of Druim-Tomma. Of the latter he treats particularly, at 1. January, the day to which he assigns his death; while he observes elsewhere (Tr. Th. ib. and p. 451.) that Ernan of Tory island seems to be the Ernan, whose memory was revered on the 11th of January.

Laistran was the same as Lasrean son of Nasca, and abbot of Ardmacnasca near Down. To what has been said of him already (Not. 224. to Chap. xiv.) I will only add, that the name Ardmanasca signifies the height of the son of Nasca.

As to Scullan there is some difficulty. Colgan (AA. SS. p. 17.) changes the name into Stellan, and makes him the abbot Stellan of Iniskeltair in Lough-Derg of the Shannon. That Scellan and Stellan were one and the same name I do not mean to deny; and it seems that Stellan of Iniskeltair was the Scellan disciple of St. Molua of Clonfert-molua, mentioned by Usher, (p. 969.) and who, he says, was the person named in the letter. But these statements cannot be reconciled with the fact, that both Iniskeltair and Clonfert-mulua were comprized in the southern division of Ireland. And then we know from Cumnian (above §. 6. and Not. 30.) that the monks of Clonfert-molua had received the Roman cycle, &c. since the time of the synod of Maghlene The Scellan of the letter was most probably St. Scellan, surnamed the leper, who was revered at Armagh on the first of September. (See Tr. Th. p. 311.) And hence we may discover at what period this saint lived.

Segenus is supposed by some writers to be the abbot Segenius of Hy; but, were this the case, it must seem odd, that his name should be placed so far down in the series. His rank, as abbot of Hy, would have entitled him to the first place after the bishops. It may also be observed, that the monks of Hy were at that time so much attached to the Irish cycle, that they were probably not inclined to enter into any negotiation about it. There were other Segens then living in the North, ex. c. Segen, son of Hua-cuinn, who died abbot of Bangor on the 10th of September, A. 662 (663), and whom Colgan (AA. SS. p. 17.) gives the preference to with regard to this inquiry. Or he might have been the Segen who succeeded Thomian in the see of Armagh, and who was probably a priest of that church in 640 although then young.

Saran, the last mentioned, was, says Colgan (ib.) St. Saran O'Crain, who died in 661 (662). I wish he had given us some further information concerning him. This much is clear that, although either an abbot or a master of theology, he was not a priest.

(92) See above Not. 22.

(93) The Roman clergy say; “Et hoc quoque cognovimus, quod virus Pelagianae haereseos apud vos denuo reviviscit.” This does not mean, that it had existed of old in Ireland; but that having been already crushed every where, it was beginning to be received, and that the abettors of this heresy fixed upon Ireland as one of the scenes of their wicked endeavours. The words now quoted are explained by what is added concerning the care to be taken against admitting its ashes into this country.

(94) See Chap. XIII. §. 12.

(95) There is not in any Irish document the least allusion to any Pelagian sect formerly existing in Ireland. Usher, treating (Gotteschalei, &c. Historia, cap. 1.) of this charge made by the Roman clergy, does not name a single Irish school or individual, to whom it could be applied. He justly rejects the fable advanced by the German author of the Life of St. Kilian, the apostle of Franconia, that one of the reasons why this saint went to Rome (A. D. 686, or 687.) was to be absolved from the censure under which Ireland lay on account of the Pelagian heresy; "Hibernia siquidem olim Pelagiana foedata fuerunt haeresi, Apostolicaque censura damnata, quae nisi Romano iudicio solvi non poterat." The falshood of this assertion shall be exposed hereafter; meanwhile I may observe, that it seems to have originated in an exaggerated interpretation of the passage quoted from the Roman letter.

§. XII. Whatever was the effect of admonition against the Pelagian heresy, of which there is no reason to think that it was not attended to, the Northerns, or at least a great part of them, still adhered to the Irish Paschal computation. Their perseverance in following this system was probably owing to the influence, which the monks of Hy enjoyed in that part of Ireland. (96) These monks were so much attached to it, that they observed it not only in the monastery, but likewise wherever they happened to be stationed. St. Aedan or Aidan, the apostle of Northumberland, introduced it into that country as late as the year 635. As a serious controversy was afterwards carried on there concerning this point, it becomes necessary to give some account of Aidan's mission. Oswald, king of Northumberland, (97) who had spent some years in exile among the Scots, and, together with his followers, had been converted by them to the Christian religion, was a very pious and zealous prince, insomuch so that, as soon as he got possession of his kingdom, wishing for the conversion of all his subjects, he sent to the elders of the Scots, with whom he was acquainted, requesting that they would send him a bishop, through whose ministry the English nation, over which he ruled, might be brought over to Christianity. (98) His request was granted; for they appointed for that purpose Aedan, (99) a monk of Hy, who, being found duly qualified in every respect, was consecrated

